The New York Times (2/21, Nossiter, 1.19M) reports "Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco of Louisiana for the first time unveiled a real package of assistance on Monday, proposing to use federal money for loans and grants that aides said would spur rebuilding in devastated areas." New Orleans officials "said the state's $7.5 billion proposal, which offers up to $150,000 in grants to repair or rebuild, along with inexpensive loans, would not have been possible without the $4.2 billion in new money promised by President Bush last week, and $6.2 billion allocated last year." The plan "de-emphasized" buyouts, focusing on "a combination of cash, and low or no-interest loans with the purpose of encouraging repairing and rebuilding."

Barbour's Days As Lobbyist Seen As Boon For Post-Hurricane Mississippi. The New York Times (2/21, Dao, 1.19M) reports the "legendary" K Street reputation of former lobbyist Gov. Haley Barbour "has proved invaluable to…storm-rattled" Mississippi. Barbour said in an interview, "It is obvious that my experiences and relationships over the last 35 years helped me help the state at a time when it needed it more than ever." Meanwhile, though Democrats "commend Mr. Barbour's response to the hurricane, they say it seems stellar mainly compared with the often stumbling performance of officials in Louisiana, which suffered far more devastation."

Group To Aide Minority-Owned Businesses Affected By Katrina. The New York Times (2/21, Olson, 1.19M) describes the Katrina Urban Entrepreneur Partnership, which is to begin "this month, giving needy entrepreneurs intensive help to ensure that they get part of the cleanup and reconstruction work on the Gulf Coast. Concerns have been raised that minority-owned companies are not getting a fair share of the posthurricane business. … The foundation is renting office space in New Orleans, bringing in professional business coaches on a rotating basis and identifying federally certified minority enterprises — beginning with demolition, construction and rebuilding businesses — that can benefit from such assistance."

New Orleans Police Often Had To Choose Between Family, Duty. USA Today (2/21, Johnson, 2.31M) tells the story of Paul Schubert, a New Orleans police officer, who, having "his job just before Hurricane Katrina hit last August, and then not returning for four weeks," was fired. He "says he fled to Texas to save his disabled wife." His "case has come to represent the no-win situation that many officers faced when family and police obligations collided, says David Benelli, president of the Police Association of New Orleans, which represents about 1,100 of the department's 1,400 officers."

Senate Approves Expanded Relief For Hurricane Katrina Victims. The Senate last week passed a bill that would expand relief for Hurricane Katrina victims. CQ Weekly (2/20, Starks) reports, "The legislation (S 1777) would extend the limit on disaster unemployment benefits, to 39 weeks from 26 weeks, and would lengthen the period in which jobless workers could apply for assistance. … The bill is sponsored by Susan Collins, R-Maine, the chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee."

Engineers Say Corps Should Examine New Orleans Levee Oversight. An outside engineering group working with the Army Corps of Engineers says the Corps investigation into the flooding of New Orleans is overlooking organizational failures as a cause of the flooding. The New York Times (2/20, Schwartz, 1.19M) reports, "The corps is spending about $20 million to understand the physical causes of the levee breaches that left more than 75 percent of New Orleans flooded. But the engineering group said the corps should also be looking into 'discontinuity and chaos' in the creation and maintenance of the levees, according to a letter from the group to Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, the chief of the corps."

Smells Around New Orleans Noted. The Washington Post (2/20, C1, Weeks, 744K) reports that in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans' air smelled of "flood sludge, refrigerator reekage and oil from cars and acid from batteries." Less than six months later, the floodwaters are gone and the air in much of the city is clear. In other areas, the smells "speak of New Orleans at the moment. From piles of debris along the sidewalks in the city and the suburbs rises a malodorous melange of fumes from sopping carpets, ancient linoleum, rancid bedclothes and abandoned appliances. … Some places smell the same as always: Tipitina's in Uptown is smoky, same as it ever was."

New Orleans Families Struggle To Return, Rebuild. The New York Times (2/20, Dewan, 1.19M) reports on the Baquets, a prominent New Orleans family displaced by Katrina. According to the Times, "As New Orleans struggles to pull its population back, even families with means like the Baquets, families who made New Orleans what it was, are struggling to return and rebuild."

Hard Hit Louisiana Parish Celebrates Mardi Gras. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 4, 2:10, Williams) reported it is Mardi Gras season "in Louisiana and while it culminates in New Orleans a week from now, celebrations and parades are already underway. In one community, St. Bernard Parish, they celebrated today in front of crowds that were thin but thankful and determined to celebrate." NBC (Savidge) added, "Unlike other Mardi Gras parades that will march through the relatively unscathed French Quarter, this year's St. Bernard Parish parade partied through the rubble of its own neighborhoods, every home here, all 27,600 of them, flooded in water five-twelve feet deep. Before Katrina, 67,000 people lived in this predominantly blue collar area. Only 8,000 have come back."

Chertoff Says Katrina Failures Continue To Haunt Him. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (2/19, Russert) if he has "considered stepping down," Chertoff replied, "When I took the job, I knew that we had a lot of work to do to mature the department. … I think my responsibility is to try to fix the department." Chertoff went on to say that the federal government's response to hurricane Katrina "does haunt me. … What does stick with me is the image of people who unnecessarily suffered because of delays in getting them evacuated. … I think we really fell short. And that's certainly something which I will always carry with me."

Chertoff Responds To Brown's Criticism. Asked on ABC's This Week (2/19, Stephanopoulos) to comment on criticism of him by former FEMA Director Michael Brown, Chertoff said, "I understand I removed Mike Brown. He's obviously not going to be happy with me. That's, kind of, human nature." Chertoff added that in the days after hurricane Katrina struck, "I couldn't get a hold of Michael Brown. He was flying around in a helicopter looking at damage; he was planning to go on Larry King or Rita Cosby."

Chertoff, on CNN's Late Edition (2/19, Blitzer), said, "I do want to respond to Mr. Brown's statement that I was wrong in making him go back to Baton Rouge. On Tuesday, he was flying around with politicians. He was doing interview shows. And the basic planning, which was getting buses to come into the Superdome and pick people up, had not been done."

WAR NEWS:

Lawmakers Said To Be "Chafing" At War Costs. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Chaddock, 61K) reports, "More than four years into the war on terror, Congress is chafing -- but not yet balking -- at a tab nearing $400 billion." President Bush's "latest emergency spending request, sent to Capitol Hill last week, includes $72.4 billion for the global war on terror. He also asked for another $19.8 billion for hurricane relief at home." The Monitor adds, "Few lawmakers care to risk not supporting US troops or first responders, making these must-pass bills. As such, they're attracting add-ons that lawmakers deem 'emergencies.' … Many Democrats plan to use the emergency spending request as a vehicle to address what they call urgent needs at home." The Monitor mentions comments along those lines by Democratic Sen. Patty Murray and Rep. David Obey.

Democratic Leaders Seen As Coalescing Around Plan For Quick Withdrawal From Iraq. The Boston Globe (2/20, Klein, 484K) reported, "After months of trying unsuccessfully to develop a common message on the war in Iraq, Democratic Party leaders are beginning to coalesce around a broad plan to begin a quick withdrawal of US troops and install them elsewhere in the region, where they could respond to emergencies in Iraq and help fight terrorism in other countries." The concept, dubbed "'strategic redeployment," is "outlined in a slim, nine-page report coauthored by a former Reagan administration assistant Defense secretary, Lawrence J. Korb, in the fall. It sets a goal of a phased troop withdrawal that would take nearly all US troops out of Iraq by the end of 2007, although many Democrats disagree on whether troop draw-downs should be tied to a timeline." Howard Dean, Democratic National Committee chairman, "has endorsed Korb's paper and begun mentioning it in meetings with local Democratic groups."

US Ambassador Warns Iraqi Shiites To Form Inclusive Government. US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad again expressed frustration with the majority Shiite coalition in Iraq for their failure to organize a government that includes minority Sunnis. Khalilzad suggested that US reconstruction aid may be withheld if the Shiites fail to appoint trustworthy leaders to head the nation's security forces, especially given reports of death squads targeting Sunnis.

The story was covered by CBS last night. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 3, 2:00, Schieffer) reported, "Iraqi politicians got an earful from the US Ambassador, who made it clear today that he is fed up with their failure to build a unified government for all Iraqis." CBS (Dozier) added Khalilzad sought to "steer" the Shiites "right" by "embarrass[ing] the heck out of them in public." Khalilzad said Iraq's "ruling Shiites are about to make a major mistake by appointing ministers, especially in the security services, that many Iraqis fear," and he "bluntly stated that the Shiites must choose more wisely or else." Ambassador Khalilzad: "We cannot invest billions of dollars in security forces if those forces are not trusted by the Iraqi people."

The Washington Times and USA Today (2/21, 2.31M) run an AP report on Khalilzad's remarks, while the New York Times (2/21, Tavernise, Worth, 1.19M) and Washington Post (2/21, A10, Hernandez, 744K) also note his comments.

Iraqi Highway Patrol Linked To Death Squads. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Moore, 958K) reports a "1,500-member Iraqi police force with close ties to Shiite militia groups has emerged as a focus of investigations into suspected death squads working within the country's Interior Ministry." Iraq's "national highway patrol was established largely to stave off insurgent attacks on roadways," but US military officials "say they suspect the patrol of being deeply involved in illegal detentions, torture and extrajudicial killings."

Suicide Bombings Kill US Soldier, Two Dozen Iraqis. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 3, 0:25, Williams) reported that in Iraq, the "relative lull there has been shattered in a string of bombings today that left 24 dead, including an American soldier. The worst of the attacks occurred in Baghdad, where a suicide bomber killed 12 people onboard a crowded bus." The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 2, 0:10, Schieffer), meanwhile, reported the US soldier was "hit by a roadside bomb near the Shiite city of Karbala." The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Daragahi, 958K), among other sources, also reports on the attacks.

US Seeks To Change Strategy With Counterinsurgency Academy. The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Ricks, 744K) reports on the "COIN Academy" or counterinsurgency academy in Iraq organized by the US commander, Army Gen. George W. Casey. The school "seeks, as a course summary puts it, to 'stress the need for US forces to shift from a conventional warfare mindset' to one that understands how to win in a guerrilla-style conflict." The purpose "of the school north of Baghdad is to try to bring about a different outcome than the US military achieved in 2003-04, when Army commanders committed mistakes typical of a conventional military facing an insurgency." Again "and again, the intense immersion course, which 30 to 50 officers attend at a time, emphasizes that the right answer is probably the counterintuitive one, rather than something that the Army has taught officers in their 10 or 20 years of service."

Politics, Bureaucracy Contribute To Decline In Iraqi Oil Production. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Cummins, Hafidh, 2.11M) report political disputes and bureaucratic snags have contributed to a sharp decline in Iraqi oil production, "raising questions about the country's ability to keep its petroleum industry from spiraling further into disrepair." In January, "production sank to 1.5 million barrels a day. The deterioration deprives Iraq of revenue from oil sales and is one more black eye for American reconstruction efforts."

In 2000, Hall Said Iraq Was Military Threat. In its "History Lessons" column, the Washington Times (2/21, 90K) excerpts a statement released on April 24, 2000 by Rep. Tony Hall (D) after returning from Iraq. Hall said, "I remain concerned about the military threat Iraq continues to pose to its neighbors and the world -- and convinced that until progress is made on eliminating weapons of mass destruction, lifting sanctions would be irresponsible." Hall added that "if Iraq would show good faith in keeping the promises it made at the end of the Gulf War, perhaps that would prompt good faith measures by the United Nations."

Marine Corps Officer Is Only Active Combat Artist. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Phillips, 2.11M) reports Warrant Officer Michael Fay, the Marine Corps' official artist, a "rarity because he is both front-line warrior and front-line artist. He is, as far as he knows, the only active-duty combat artist in the world today." The result is "work that does in images what Ernie Pyle did in his World War II newspaper columns: Convey the experiences, both frightening and mundane, of the common man thrust into war."

New Bin Laden, Zawahiri Audiotapes Released. New audiotapes of al Qaeda leaders Osama bin Laden and Ayman al Zawahiri have surfaced in which bin Laden vows never to be taken alive by the US and al Zawahiri brags about having escaped a US airstrike in Pakistan meant to kill him. The story was the lead on CBS, while NBC ran a full segment and ABC ran a brief. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 1, 3:15, Stewart) reported, "US officials still aren't certain what to make of it but in newly released excerpts from a message of al Qaeda's number two man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, the terrorist leader appears to acknowledge that the CIA came far closer than first suspected when it attacked this Pakistan border village last month." Zawahiri, "clearly in a taunting mood," also "claimed for the first time he was in the Tora Bora Mountains when US forces attacked the al Qaeda stronghold at the end of the Afghanistan invasion." Al Qaeda "also released a new version of Osama bin Laden's January audio message in which he pledged to never be taken alive," but it "had a voiceover in English, believed to be that that of this young man, Adam Gadahn."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 2, 2:10, Mitchell) reported, "Most likely recorded in January, Zawahiri invites President Bush to convert to Islam." Zawahiri (voice of translator): "Bush, despite all your crimes, foolishness, and black history, I offer you Islam." Mitchell: "An invitation, experts say, could actually be a warning." Ben Venzke, terrorism analyst: "We believe it is part of a greater warning cycle that we would see in the run-up to an attack." Mitchell: "On his newly released video, Zawahiri also takes aim at Pakistan's President Musharraf."

ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 3, :25, Gibson) reported, "The comments are on an old audiotape. But new attention is called to them. Bin Laden says Iraq has restored the energy of those who carry out war against America."

Observers Worry Afghan Judicial Reform Could Be Destabilizing. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Baldauf, 61K) reports "a growing chorus of European and Western donor nations call on" the Afghan government "to reform and professionalize the judicial system - as required by the Constitution and the Afghanistan Compact signed in London on Feb. 1," the chief justice, Islamic scholar Fazel Hadi Shinwari, "says that Afghanistan will be governed by Islamic laws or tumble into violent civil conflict." Instability has "long been President Hamid Karzai's chief concern. But when a group of European diplomats brought a démarche, or diplomatic petition, to Mr. Karzai on Feb. 11, demanding reform of the Supreme Court, insiders braced themselves for the worst." Privately, "some officials worry that taking on religious conservatives like Shinwari could be severely destabilizing."

Kaplan Says Military's New Strategy Needs Diplomatic Component. In a New York Times op-ed (2/21), Robert Kaplan of the Atlantic Monthly says, "Because of a bloody counterinsurgency that no one in the military wants to repeat, Iraq has profoundly affected the Pentagon's deployment strategies as it shifts toward a greater emphasis on the Pacific Rim while still facing a profusion of terrorist-related threats not just in the Middle East but also in Africa and elsewhere." The goal "from now on is to get into a place fast, before a problem begins to fester, when there is leeway to experiment and thus to make mistakes without suffering a loss of prestige." But there is a "major omission: the civilian -- or non-Defense Department -- piece of it is entirely missing." In this "worldwide struggle the civilian piece associated with the State Department will be a vital, unconventional asset."

Strain From Afghan, Iraq Wars Seen As Showing On Home Front. USA Today (2/21, Zoroya, 2.31M) reports the situation at Robins Air Force Base in Georgia, "where thousands of workers repair military aircraft, is a case study on how the war overseas has affected those serving on the home front. Here, a different kind of strain and battle fatigue has surfaced, often in startling ways." The "wounded came not from engaging the enemy, but from scores of workplace injuries that increased as the war intensified. The low morale was measured in rises in drunken driving and domestic abuse, discrimination complaints and lost productivity. Most dramatic were the suicides — double the national rate in 2004 — and murders on the base, the first in Robins' 65-year history."

Officers Learn Middle East Culture In Army Program. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, 744K) reports on a US Army "pilot program that is sending 21 Army officers to graduate school to learn about foreign cultures, business practices and languages, including Arabic." The Army "wants its leaders armed with skills to help them navigate road signs, engineering plans and simple conversations."

DOJ:

Attorney Asks DOJ To Clear Name Of Deceased Michigan Official. The Detroit News (2/21, Egan) reports, "Edward H. McNamara's attorney said Monday he would like the U.S. Justice Department to issue a letter clearing his client of criminal wrongdoing now that McNamara has died. … McNamara, who was Wayne County Executive from 1987 through 2002, died Sunday of heart failure. He was 79." The News continues, "In the waning days of his administration, federal and state police officers raided McNamara's county and campaign offices and seized cartloads of paper and computer records. … But McNamara was never charged, and his attorney, Christopher Andreoff, said the Justice Department has never told him that McNamara was the target or even a subject of the probe. He has heard nothing from the FBI or Justice Department since receiving subpoenas for campaign records more than three years ago, he said. … 'I would hope that the government would come forward, but they may not,' Andreoff said. … 'I would like to have such a letter from them now that he's passed, but whether they will do that or not, they tend not to do that in any case, whether someone is deceased or not.'" The News adds, "Andreoff said he wants to discuss the issue with McNamara's widow and other family members before contacting U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy. 'Now is not the appropriate time,' he said. … The wide-ranging probe is related in part to possible links between campaign contributions and the awarding of county contracts."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Both Sides In Enron Case Try To Shape Jury's Opinions. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Johnson) reports, "Everybody, it seems, has an opinion about Enron Corp. … But the one that counts will be reached by 12 people who will decide the fate of the energy trader's former leaders." The Post continues, "The jurors are an eclectic bunch: eight women and four men, three self-identified Hispanics and one Asian. It is a well-educated panel that includes an engineer, a courtroom manager, and employees of oil industry giants Royal Dutch Shell Group and Schlumberger Ltd. … Four alternates are standing by in case one of the regular jurors becomes ill or otherwise cannot continue through the trial of former chairman Kenneth L. Lay and former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling, which is likely to extend at least four months." The Post adds, "The way the Enron panel goes about its work will fuel a long-running debate about the ability of average citizens to assess responsibility for complex business frauds -- and will carry powerful implications for the way prosecutors bring future white-collar cases, according to experts on corporate crime. … 'Juries can understand lies, cheating and stealing,' said Ellen S. Podgor, a visiting law professor at Stetson University and co-author of a blog on white-collar cases. 'What they can't understand is complex accounting practices. You have to simplify it for the jury.' … That is exactly where the prosecution has focused its efforts. 'It is not about accounting. It is about lies and choices,' Assistant U.S. Attorney John C. Hueston told the jurors in opening arguments. … In contrast, defense lawyers have attempted to lead the jury down circuitous paths of accounting treatment, introducing audio and video clips full of arcane detail about complex business issues. … Defense lawyers also have signaled that they may make the jury itself the basis of appeals if the trial goes against their clients. Almost from the start, they raised questions about whether jurors from Houston, where thousands of workers lost jobs and retirement savings in Enron's collapse, could hear the case with open minds."

Ruling Curbs Executives' Chance To Accept Lucrative IPO Shares. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Siconolfi) reports, "Corporate executives, take note: The definition of improper stock trading in your brokerage account just got broader." The Journal continues, "A New York state court recently found former telecommunications executive Clark E. McLeod liable for receiving hot new stocks in his personal brokerage account. The rationale: His company was sending business to the same securities firm, Citigroup Inc.'s Salomon Smith Barney, that doled him the new stocks. … That is a big change. Previously, 'spinning' of initial public offerings of stock involved a direct quid pro quo. In a common form, securities firms allocated IPOs to the personal accounts of corporate executives, so the shares could then be sold, or 'spun,' for quick profits -- in exchange for business from the executives' companies." The Journal notes, "IPO shares are coveted because they often surge on their first trading day. Spinning has raised concerns among investors that the IPO market is rigged. … Bottom line: Senior executives now could skate on thin legal ice if they receive IPO shares from a Wall Street firm with which their company at some point does business, and don't disclose it to their board or shareholders."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Cotton Convicted In First Tennessee Waltz Trial. A federal jury on Saturday found Tennessee Waltz defendant William Cotton guilty of conspiracy and one of two counts of attempted extortion. Cotton was acquitted of the second extortion count. The AP (2/19, Poovey) notes, "Hours of secret FBI audiotapes and videotapes of encounters between Cotton," lobbyist Charles Love "and undercover agents posing as E-Cycle executives were the heart of the government's case." The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/19, Perrusquia) observes, "The case illustrates the challenges other Waltz defendants…may face when confronted with hours of taped evidence in trials slated for Memphis later this year. … Although the Cotton case is one of the least complex of the Waltz cases, the volume of taped evidence and complexity of federal extortion law seemed to dazzle jurors."

Meanwhile, WTVC-TV Chattanooga (2/20, Fields) reports on the reaction of Chattanooga-area lawmakers to Cotton's conviction. State Rep. Chris Clem "likens the fallout of the Tennessee Waltz investigation to fighting a disease, 'I would say it's equivalent to being diagnosed with a treatable cancer. … You're glad you can do something about it, but the treatment is still rather painful.'" Sen. David Fowler, who was mentioned in the FBI tapes but not accused of accepting bribes, "says it's unfortunate the fallout from Tennessee Waltz has undermined the public's trust in lawmakers."

Defense Attorney To Seek Lenient Sentence. The Chattanoogan (2/20) reports defense attorney Hank Hill "said he will ask Federal Judge Allan Edgar for leniency," saying that Cotton "'played a fairly minor role' in the FBI 'Operation Tennessee Waltz' sting." Hill "said he will point out that Cotton 'is a decorated war hero. He received two Purple Hearts' in Vietnam."

Cotton Resigns Commission Seat. The AP (2/21) reports that in a letter to Hamilton County Commission Chairman Larry Henry on Monday, Cotton resigned his seat in the wake of his conviction. The AP notes, "The 'Tennessee Waltz' scandal led to a special session of the legislature this year, which passed a sweeping ethics reform bill creating an independent ethics commission, restricting lobbyists and capping cash political contributions."

Some Black Political Leaders Say FBI Investigation Racially Motivated. The AP (2/20, Poovey) reports, "Some black political leaders are saying the 'Tennessee Waltz' sting operation targeted blacks and represents an attack on the Senate campaign of U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Jr." State Rep. Ulysses Jones "said many people in his district believe federal investigators went after black leaders," and Hamilton County Democratic chairman Stuart James "said the investigation has prompted 'complaints from the black community as a whole.'" However, the lead prosecutor, Assistant US Attorney John MacCoon "said it was 'absurd' to suggest race or partisan politics were factors in the investigation."

FBI Scrutinized Memphis Lawmakers. Under the headline "FBI Had DeBerry, Hargett In Sights," The Memphis Commercial Appeal (2/19, Perrusquia) reports, "House Speaker Pro Tem Lois DeBerry and state Rep. Tre Hargett were among several Memphis-area politicians originally in the crosshairs of an FBI corruption sting, yet were never charged." In an FBI surveillance recording played at Cotton's trial, "an undercover agent says Hargett is one who should be approached because 'we did something for Tre,'" and adds that "DeBerry 'has agreed to co-sponsor' legislation favorable to E-Cycle Management." On Saturday, "Hargett said he was surprised and angered by the inference."

Bredesen To Return Contributions From FBI Probe Targets. The Knoxville News (2/21, Stambaugh) reports, "Gov. Phil Bredesen's campaign announced Monday it will return $22,300 in contributions given since 2001" by Harold Eugene Grooms, Kenneth Frazier and Cocke County business H-1 Auto Parts, after Bredesen became aware that they were targets of the Operation Rose Thorn investigation. "Grooms has been under scrutiny by federal authorities since at least 2000, when two pilots were caught smuggling marijuana into East Tennessee and fingered Grooms as their boss. … H-1 Auto Parts has also been the subject of a federal search warrant," and Kenneth Frazier "has been identified by the FBI as the owner of the 440 Cockfight Pit." The AP (2/20) notes, "Grooms' home was raided last month by the FBI, Tennessee Bureau of Investigations and other agencies. Bredesen confirms knowing Grooms, but says he'll keep at 'arm's length' from him with his new troubles."

Gotti Racketeering Trial Begins Today. The AP (2/20, Neumeister) reports, "The latest attack on the Gambino family…begins Tuesday, when lawyers deliver opening statements in the racketeering case against John 'Junior' Gotti. The trial is a linchpin in the government's effort to permanently shut down the Gambino family, once a powerhouse in the gambling, loan sharking, labor union and extortion rackets." The AP notes that federal investigators have made significant progress against the Gambinos since "they infiltrated the family with an undercover FBI agent who was so well accepted that he was offered membership." The New York Post (2/19, Hamilton, Smith) adds that "a rematch of Gotti vs. the government won't be a simple replay of last year's trial, when a lone holdout juror derailed the bid to nail the ex-Gambino crime king for plotting to kidnap radio host Curtis Sliwa, loan sharking and extortion in the construction trade. This time, there's a new attorney for Junior, along with fewer witnesses against him, pared-down charges…and no co-defendants."

Gambino Case Built On FBI Wiretap, Informant, Undercover Agent. Under the headline "FBI Stalks The Gambino Crime Family In Westchester," The Westchester Journal News (2/19, O'Connor) reports on the FBI's surveillance of reputed Gambino crime family captain Gregory DePalma of Scarsdale. The Journal News notes that the case against DePalma is based on a listening device in DePalma's cell phone, "a member of DePalma's Westchester-based crew who was flipped by an agent from the FBI's White Plains office," and "an FBI mole" who "worked his way into DePalma's inner circle." The Journal News goes on to detail some of the recordings captured by the FBI wiretap.

Alleged Bonanno Boss Maintains Unconcerned Attitude As Trial Approaches. The New York Times (2/21, Rashbaum) reports on the trial of alleged mobster Vincent "Vinny Gorgeos" Basciano, set to begin Thursday, "where he stands accused of running the Bonanno crime family with a decidedly deadly hand." In pre-trial hearings, Basciano "has preened in his finely tailored suits and Ferragamo shoes" and "has been seen laughing and making jokes for the benefit of newspaper reporters." Although "the government has lined up 80 to 100 witnesses," Basciano "appears largely unconcerned. He sits in court listening intently, sometimes silently flashing a smirk to reporters, or an arched eyebrow." The New York Post (2/20, Haberman) notes that Basciano will "face an extraordinary number of Mafia turncoats. … 'There is not one trial in public consciousness that has seen as many rats,' one legal insider said. Former family godfather Joseph Massino, who was convicted in 2004 of committing seven rubouts but cooperated to skirt the death penalty, is expected to make his rat debut."

Congress Takes Up Dispute Over "Bad Check" School. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Mayer) reports, "Prosecutors in some Maryland and Virginia counties have adopted a potent tactic to discourage check-bouncing: threatening writers with prosecution if they don't attend 'bad check school' run by private contractors." The Post continues, "It is a way for the counties to make money -- they get a portion of the fees the companies charge people who attend the courses -- and law enforcement officials say the practice saves resources for fighting more serious wrongdoing. … But critics say the private companies violate the law when they send out letters warning check bouncers to attend classes or face prosecution. The critics add that in most states, it is not a crime to write a returned check unless there is intent to defraud. And federal law bars debt collectors from making false threats." The Post adds, "Nine Maryland counties, including Prince George's, Howard, Anne Arundel and Frederick, have turned to check restitution companies for such services. Some jurisdictions in southern Virginia are using an outside company, and Loudoun County is about to do so. The District has no check-restitution program but is considering one. … Local prosecutors say the threat of prosecution for not participating is legitimate. … But the practice is being challenged in several lawsuits nationwide. … The dispute has moved to Congress, where prosecutors want check-restitution programs exempted from federal debt-collection laws. Proposed legislation, designed to eliminate key legal arguments in lawsuits challenging the practice, has been approved by the House Financial Services Committee. Consumer advocates and debt collectors -- typically adversaries -- are fighting it."

Rising Poker Popularity Leads To Robbery Risk. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Vargas) reports, "The first time Doug Thomas looked up from his cards to see a gun pointed at him, the chips on the felt-topped poker table were piling up to about $100 a pot. The Texas Hold 'Em game was just revving up last month at the Manassas electrical shop when two masked men, armed with a semiautomatic handgun, ordered players facedown on the floor. … The second time was less than two weeks later and just a few blocks away. Nine players had paid $500 each for a seat at the poker game at his Manassas apartment, but Thomas wasn't making any money, other than the few bucks he skimmed off each pot to pay for food and drinks. The pizza and wings had just arrived when the police officers showed, weapons drawn." The Post continues, "As poker's popularity explodes, swallowing basements and living rooms in its wake, the danger also has increased, police say. No one tracks the number of poker-game heists because they are recorded simply as robberies, and many go unreported by hosts fearful of gambling charges. But police across the region and nation say private games are ripe for robberies. … The games' hosts acknowledge the danger and are reacting by keeping guest lists more exclusive and often risking serious criminal charges by taking money from players to pay for armed security. … For police, the mixture of a high-stakes game in a low-security spot such as a home is cause for worry. … Police say that in the past year and a half, calls about private poker games have increased steadily, including complaints from relatives worried about depleted savings accounts and from neighbors tired of watching cars clog cul-de-sacs the same night each week."

Groups Seek FEC Rules To Allow Ads Near Elections. Five groups, the AFL-CIO, the US Chamber of Commerce, the National Education Association, OMB Watch and the Alliance for Justice have petitioned the FEC to create new regulations that would allow them to lobby federal officeholders via TV ads in the days before a primary and general election. The Washington Times (2/20, Dinan, 90K) reports, "If the FEC does, it would be the first time the agency set standards for how groups can lobby without running afoul of the 2002 campaign-finance changes in the McCain-Feingold Act, named after Senate sponsors John McCain and Russell D. Feingold." In January, the High Court ruled in Wisconsin Right to Life v. FEC that grass-roots groups "have ways to lobby and mention the name of a federal candidate without being seen as actively campaigning. In their petition to the FEC, submitted last week, five groups said the court's ruling lets the FEC write regulations in time to govern the 2006 election."

High Court To Consider Vermont Campaign Finance Law. The Supreme Court next week will consider whether a Vermont campaign finance law violates the First Amendment. U.S. News and World Report (6/27, Halloran) reports that the case gives the court "its first opportunity to revisit the [1976 Buckley v. Valeo] money-is-speech precedent that defines unlimited campaign spending as a constitutional right. The outcome could have a dramatic effect on how far states can go in regulating campaigns in the future."

Families To Recover Art Taken In World War II. USA Today (2/21, Willing) reports, "She has pursued her family's stolen treasures for nearly eight years. … But Maria Altmann of Los Angeles, a 90-year-old widow and Holocaust survivor, says she never expected this: Austria's national gallery is preparing to send her and her four cousins five paintings worth an estimated $300 million, nearly 70 years after Nazis confiscated the artworks in her native Vienna." USA continues, "A long-shot victory by Altmann at the U.S. Supreme Court in 2004 and a win before an Austrian arbitration panel in January mean that the paintings, by early 20th-century Austrian master Gustav Klimt, could be headed to Altmann's three-bedroom home as soon as next month. … The Austrian government has declined to bid on the works, which include a gold-flecked portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer, Altmann's aunt, that has been reproduced on thousands of souvenirs. In a statement, Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel said the nation could not afford the $300 million valuation placed on the paintings by E. Randol Schoenberg, Altmann's Los Angeles-based attorney." USA notes, "The Altmann case has had an impact on the art world, says Robert Jarvis, art law specialist at Nova Southeastern University in Fort Lauderdale. Public museums are re-examining the backgrounds of many of their pieces. Some, such as New York City's Metropolitan Museum of Art, have agreed to return some pieces to their nation of origin rather than risk losing them in a lawsuit."

Only 21 States Have Complied With Voting Reform Law. CQ (2/20, Zeller) reports that four years ago, Congress "wrote a law intending to clean up once and for all the sorts of Election Day messes that yielded Florida's presidential results fiasco in 2000." But a "recent study by the nonpartisan group Electionline shows that only 21 states have met all of the law's requirements as of the deadline, which was Jan. 1." The group "monitored compliance with the baseline provisions of the law, which also called for the adoption of uniform voter identification rules, statewide voter registration databases and modernized voting machines that could be used by people with disabilities." The "furthest behind, according to the Electionline report, is New York, which is presently under review by the Justice Department to determine whether its $220 million in federal funding under the law should be confiscated." Still, "new machinery is not an airtight fix for voting irregularities either, the report found: California is scrambling to replace its recently acquired electronic voting machines to address concerns about their reliability and security."

Delaware Session To Teach How To Recognize Victims Of Human Trafficking. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (2/20, Billington) reports, "Human trafficking -- the modern version of slavery -- is a multibillion-dollar-a-year criminal enterprise, ranking behind drug trafficking in global crime statistics." The Journal continues, "Some victims of human trafficking are probably working in Delaware, experts say. … 'There's no doubt that there is human trafficking in every state in the union,' said Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Douglas Molloy of Fort Myers, Fla. Molloy has prosecuted several human-trafficking cases. … 'If you have an agricultural industry, for example, or large numbers of undocumented workers, you have slavery.'" The Journal adds, "Delaware has a large agricultural sector and other businesses -- such as food service and construction -- that lend themselves to human trafficking, but there have been no specific charges brought to date in the state, U.S. Attorney Colm Connolly said. … 'Some local law enforcement agencies have brought matters to us that they thought could be human trafficking, especially in areas such as prostitution rings, but further investigation did not bear that out,' Connolly said." The Journal notes, "Despite the lack of evidence human trafficking is a problem in the state, one advocacy group is organizing a training session Wednesday in Dover to promote ways to recognize potential victims and signs. … Attendees at the event will include police, social workers, hospital personnel and others who come into contact with the state's immigrant population. It is not open to the public. … A number of experts have said that police and prosecutors are not trained well enough to recognize obvious signs and to deal with victims."

LAPD Suspensions, Firings Down Last Year Despite Rise In Misconduct Reports. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, McGreevy) reports, "Although complaints against Los Angeles police employees were up last year, 46% fewer officers and civilian staff members were fired or suspended than in 2004, according to a report released by LAPD Chief William J. Bratton." The Times continues, "Last year, about 6,400 complaints were filed against police employees, an increase of nearly 4%, according to Cmdr. Eric Lillo, head of the Los Angeles Police Department's Internal Affairs Group. … At the same time, a separate report by the chief — to be considered by the Police Commission today — said 421 employees were fired, quit under pressure or were suspended last year, nearly half the 784 staff members who were terminated or suspended in 2004. … The LAPD has 9,357 police officers." The Times notes, "Lillo said the drop in the number of discipline cases was probably due in part to efforts by Bratton to punish those engaged in misconduct. … Department officials note that, because of limited investigative staffing, fewer complaints that might have brought disciplinary action were resolved in 2005 than the year before. Because the department has had trouble meeting its recruitment goals, it has become more difficult to promote experienced officers to these investigative functions. … Civil rights attorney Samuel Paz, a member of the National Policing Accountability Project, called on the Police Commission to determine why complaints overall were up."

Los Angeles Jail Riots Underscore California's Racial Divide. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Pomfret) reports, "A series of deadly racial attacks in the jails of this sprawling metropolis has cast a spotlight on long-simmering but little-discussed tensions between a shrinking black presence and an ascendant Latino one in California." The Post continues, "In almost every arena of public life -- schools, politics, hospitals, housing and the workplace -- African Americans and Hispanics are engaged in an edgy competition, according to interviews with teachers, students, politicians, researchers, government officials, civil rights lawyers, street cops and businesspeople." The Post adds, "Los Angeles's first Latino mayor since the 19th century, Antonio Villaraigosa (D), was elected last year with strong support from African Americans amid hopes of the creation of a true rainbow coalition in one of the world's most ethnically diverse metropolitan areas. But the reality, said Earl Ofari Hutchinson, a black radio talk show host who directs the Los Angeles Urban Policy Roundtable, is that 'the jail violence is only symptomatic of something larger.' … 'There is conflict and competition in all areas,' Hutchinson said. 'This city and this state is a caldron of racial issues. This thing is pulsating.'"

Efforts To Ban Gay Adoption Emerging Nationwide. In what USA Today (2/21, Stone, 2.31M) calls a "second front in the culture wars" over gay marriage, efforts to ban gays and lesbians from adopting children are emerging across the country. USA reports, "Steps to pass laws or secure November ballot initiatives are underway in at least 16 states, adoption, gay rights and conservative groups say. Some — such as Ohio, Georgia and Kentucky — approved constitutional amendments in 2004 banning gay marriage."

In a separate story, USA Today (2/21, Stone, 2.31M) adds, "The push against adoption by lesbians and gay men comes after successful campaigns in 11 states in 2004 to define marriage as a union between a man and a woman. At least six more states — Alabama, Arizona, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota and Wisconsin — may put marriage on the ballot in November."

Preschool Teacher Sues Catholic School After Losing Job Because Of Pregnancy. ABC World News Tonight (2/20, story 5, 3:00, Vargas) reported, "Polls show most American Catholics find abortion morally unacceptable. But a Catholic schoolteacher in New York says she was fired from her job because she decided not to have an abortion." ABC (Tapper) added Michelle McCusker taught at St. Rose of Lima, a Catholic school in Brooklyn, but "McCusker, who is Catholic and single, became pregnant. She decided to keep the baby. The school, backed by the Brooklyn Diocese, fired her." McCusker "and the New York Civil Liberties Union are suing the school, claiming gender discrimination," and "an anti-abortion group," Feminists for Life, "has sided with Michelle McCusker, claiming that the Catholic school was essentially encouraging abortion."

DOJ Will Not Charge Finnish Paper Maker With Price-Fixing. The AP (2/20) reports, "Finnish paper maker UPM-Kymmene Corp. said Monday that U.S. officials will not prosecute it over possible price fixing in magazine paper or antitrust related offenses in the American labelstock industry." The AP continues, "The world's largest magazine paper producer said the decision presupposes 'UPM's full and continuing cooperation with the U.S. Department of Justice antitrust division's investigations.'" The AP adds, "In August 2003, UPM received a grand jury subpoena in the antitrust division's investigation into the American labelstock industry. … Prompted by its own internal investigation of possible collusion, UPM in January 2004 contacted competition authorities in the European Union, the United States and Canada, which then gave the Helsinki-based company conditional full immunity concerning "certain conduct disclosed to the authorities." … In May 2004, European regulators raided several forest products companies in the investigation into alleged price fixing and cartel arrangements, based on UPM's information."

New Mexico Mulls Changes To Minimum-Service Rules. Inman News (2/20, Roberts) reports, "The New Mexico Real Estate Commission will meet this week to consider a controversial real estate regulation opposed by U.S. Justice Department antitrust officials." Inman continues, "Members of the state's Real Estate Commission had delayed their consideration of the rule change, which would require all real estate brokers in the state to provide a specified level of services to consumers, after receiving a letter from the Justice Department in November." Inman adds, "The meeting will be held on Wednesday and Thursday this week in the Las Cruces, N.M., real estate brokerage office of David Steinborn, president of the Real Estate Commission -- which is about 230 miles away from the commission's office in Albuquerque, N.M. The meeting data and location were not publicized on the commission's Web site as of Friday morning, but is now listed at the site. … The Justice Department and Federal Trade Commission have opposed laws and regulations in several states that have sought to heighten the level of services that real estate professionals must perform for clients. The federal agencies have charged that such measures can deny consumers the right to choose which services they want and do not want in a real estate transaction, and can potentially lead to higher costs for real estate services and a smaller field of real estate business models." Inman notes, "Proponents, including state lawmakers, real estate regulators and Realtor trade groups, have endorsed the laws as efforts to eliminate agents' confusion in real estate transactions involving a brokerage company that offers limited representation, and to ensure that consumers will receive all of the services that they need. … Opponents, including real estate professionals who offer low-cost limited-service options for consumers, have said that they are just giving consumers what they want, and they question the motives of such industry-backed efforts."

Electolux May Seek Acquisitions During Consolidation. Bloomberg (2/20) reports, "Electrolux AB, the world's largest appliance maker, may make acquisitions as the industry consolidates, Chief Executive Officer Hans Straaberg said. … 'We have clear evidence that Electrolux has been the predator and not the prey, and we intend to stay the predator,' Straaberg, who has a moose head trophy in his Stockholm office, said in an interview today." Bloomberg continues, "There are 'add-on' acquisitions that would be 'of interest' to Electrolux, the 48-year-old CEO said, declining to comment on any potential targets. The company was named Sweden's likeliest takeover target by newspaper Dagens Industri in December, based on interviews with 100 analysts. … Electrolux, the maker of AEG stoves and Frigidaire refrigerators, will lose its top ranking if Whirlpool Corp., the maker of KitchenAid appliances, succeeds in with its $1.68 billion purchase of Maytag Corp. Benton Harbor, Michigan-based Whirlpool last week agreed to delay that purchase so that the U.S. Justice Department can have more time to review the transaction."

BlackBerry Patent Fight Coming Down To The Wire. The AP (2/20, Stoughton) reports, "Say what you want about patent infringement lawsuits, but at least the BlackBerry case has drama." The AP continues, "A federal judge, clearly impatient with the long-running case, could issue an injunction as soon as this week on U.S. sales and service of the wireless e-mail device." The AP adds, "Most patent lawsuits are dismissed or settled long before they reach this stage. Remarkably, neither BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. nor tiny patent holder NTP Inc. have shown signs of backing down. In effect, they're daring each other to blink first and settle. … Governments, businesses and individual users are growing unnerved by the standoff. Although the odds of an actual shutdown are low, conflicting opinions about the possible outcomes and the spin from both sides have created a confusing picture. … James R. Spencer, a no-nonsense U.S. district judge widely respected in the legal community, now finds himself in the unusual position of weighing an injunction against RIM even as the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is expected to finally rescind NTP's patents. … But the system doesn't necessarily work in a timely fashion. Spencer has signaled that he is unwilling to delay his proceedings while awaiting final word from the patent office, which lags far behind the court system. A case that could change the practice of granting injunctions in patent cases, eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, will be taken up by the Supreme Court, but no decision is expected until the spring at the earliest. Spencer, meanwhile, has scheduled a hearing for Friday on the injunction and damages."

Maryland Power Company Seeks To Keep Lawmakers Out Of Merger. The Washington Post (2/21, B1, Mosk) reports, "Maryland's largest power company has launched a discreet but aggressive lobbying campaign to prevent the legislature from intervening with its plans to merge with a Florida utility to create one of the nation's largest electricity suppliers." The Post continues, "Constellation Energy Group has bulked up its roster of lobbyists in Annapolis, and the company's executives have been meeting with top lawmakers in recent days to try to dissuade the legislature from taking steps that would scotch the $11.5 billion deal with FPL Group, based in Juno Beach, Fla. … 'This company is launching a lobbying blitz in the halls of the legislature to speed this merger through,' said Sen. Leo E. Green (D-Prince George's). 'We need to step on the brakes.'" The Post adds, "Green and other top lawmakers predict a fierce legislative battle over the proposed merger, which they worry could mean sizable rate increases for the 1 million Maryland customers of Constellation's subsidiary Baltimore Gas & Electric Co. … The merger comes as state caps preventing rate increases are set to be lifted in July. And Senate Finance Committee Chairman Thomas M. Middleton (D-Charles) said he worries that Maryland customers would end up paying the costs of repairing FPL Group's hurricane-battered power lines."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Bush Outlines Energy Proposals In Michigan And Wisconsin. President Bush traveled to Michigan and Wisconsin yesterday to promote his alternative energy proposals. Of the networks, only NBC reported on the President's trip. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 7, 0:35, Williams) reported Bush "spent this holiday Monday outlining some of his plans to wean Americans off what he has called this nation's addiction to foreign oil. He toured a Wisconsin plant that makes batteries for alternative-powered automobiles and he praised both hybrid technology and ethanol, a fuel usually made from corn. Critics, however, also say the President also needs to push the car industry for better fuel efficiency and push drivers to use less oil."

Most print reports note that the President framed the oil dependence issue as a "national security problem." The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (2/21, Content, Barrett, 266K) notes Bush also said it is "a challenge to the economy and Americans' quality of life. The president, who like his father worked in the oil industry before entering politics, said, 'I know it came as a shock to some to hear a Texan stand up there in front of the country and say, we've got a real problem, America is addicted to oil. But I meant it, because it's a true fact, and we've got to do something about it now.'" Knight Ridder (2/21, Hutcheson) reports "the former Texas oilman said he's ready to try everything from wind power to nuclear energy to break what he calls the nation's addiction to fossil fuels." White House "advisers hope that the president's focus on energy will reassure Americans that Bush shares their concerns over high gasoline prices and home heating bills. Critics dismissed the trip as a publicity stunt and questioned the president's sincerity."

Bloomberg (2/21, Murray) quotes Bush saying, "We will start building nuclear power plants again by the end of this decade." Reuters (2/21, Zakaria) says Bush "pointed to France having built 58 nuclear plants since the 1970s, and China having 8 nuclear plants in the works, with plans to build at least 40 more over the next two decades." Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid "said Democrats were willing to work with Bush on alternative energy, but last year's energy legislation suggested Bush had different priorities. 'We need more than just rhetoric from a president who let Big Oil write our energy policies,' he said."

The New York Times (2/21, Bumiller, 1.19M) sees a political component to Bush's trip, reporting that it "dovetailed with his campaign travels. Wisconsin, Michigan and Colorado have races important to the White House this year, but of particular concern is Colorado, where a recent poll shows a Republican candidate for governor, Representative Bob Beauprez, trailing Bill Ritter, a Democrat and former Denver district attorney." Although Bush "did no overt politicking in the three states, the view of the White House is that his appearances are helpful to Republican candidates because they motivate the party's most faithful supporters."

Bush's statement that the country is on the verge of great technological breakthroughs also receives extensive coverage this morning. The AP (2/21, Riechmann) reports Bush said such breakthroughs "would 'startle' most Americans," while UPI (2/21) says Bush "outlined several such advances, including the lithium ion battery at the Wisconsin plant, wind-driven electrical generation and solar power."

The Detroit Free Press (2/21, Gray) reports, Bush "toured an Auburn Hills company that produces high-tech batteries and solar panels, saying the work being done at United Solar Ovonics could someday change the way Americans live their lives." Bush "met with United Solar Ovonics officials privately for about an hour and toured the plant with the company's president, Subhendu Guha. During the tour, he met with company employees and spoke to the media briefly." The Detroit News (2/21, Heinlein) says United Solar "is one of the most promising ventures of Energy Conversion Devices, the Michigan company which for decades has pioneered a wide range of alternate energy technologies."

The WisPolitics.com (2/21, Wise) reports that in Wisconsin, Bush also "pushed for increased use of ethanol as a way to meet the energy demands of a country 'addicted' to oil. 'You've got a lot of it in Wisconsin," Bush told an invitation-only audience of some 250 people gathered at Johnson Controls in Milwaukee."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Gerstenzang, 958K) reports that the President, "sounding more like a salesman for hybrid autos, said the combined gas-electric vehicles were 'a good deal for the American people, and consumers have begun to figure it out.'" He "said he was looking ahead to the day when solar panels are built into roofing materials, and houses can send to the electric grid the energy they create but do not use. 'We want solar power to be commonplace by 2015,' Bush said."

In its analysis, USA Today (2/21, Benedetto, 2.31M) says the trip was part of Bush's "drive to cut what he called the nation's addiction to oil." Today, in Golden, CO, "the president visits the National Renewable Energy Laboratory, a federal research facility that develops new energy technologies and helps move them to practical application in private business and industry." The Denver Post (2/21, Human, Gonzalez, Crowell) reports Bush "landed Monday evening at Aurora's Buckley Air Force Base on the last leg" of his three-city tour. Moments "after striding off Air Force One, Bush shook hands with Gov. Bill Owens and US Sen. Ken Salazar and teased both men for not wearing warm coats." Bush's appearance on the tarmac at Buckley "lasted less than 10 minutes. He grabbed the hand of Pete Beverly, 70, an Aurora resident who has spent about 2,000 hours volunteering with Habitat for Humanity of Metro Denver."

The Washington Post (2/21, A3, VandeHei, 744K) reports that as Bush spoke, "crude oil prices rose as a result of rebel attacks in Nigeria that reduced output by Africa's largest producer, underscoring the volatility of the oil market."

Energy Department Comes Up With Funds To Restore Jobs At Colorado Lab. The Washington Times/AP (2/21) reports that while Bush "is highlighting his budget proposals to help wean America from foreign oil," the Colorado lab he will visit "is meeting a $28 million shortfall by cutting its staff by 32 persons, including eight researchers." But this morning, Reuters (2/21, Doggett) is reporting the Energy Department "said it has come up with $5 million to immediately restore jobs cut at a renewable energy laboratory…Bush will visit on Tuesday, avoiding a potentially embarrassing moment as the president promotes his energy plan." Bush "proposed spending millions more dollars in renewable energy research. However, Democratic lawmakers and environmentalists questioned the administration's commitment when jobs were being eliminated at the National Renewable Energy Laboratory (NREL) in Golden, Colorado." Bush "will visit the lab on Tuesday to tout his proposal for more renewable energy research funding."

Congress Said To Be Close To Lifting Bans On Offshore Drilling. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Blum, 744K) reports, "For decades, drilling for oil and natural gas off of much of the US coastline has been off limits." But "this year, with Congress facing high energy prices and a fresh lobbying push from oil companies and their supporters, even drilling opponents acknowledge that they may lose their fight to keep bans in place." The Post adds, "A flurry of legislation from members of both parties would allow drilling for oil and natural gas in new areas of the Outer Continental Shelf -- land that lies under federal waters that surround the United States and typically stretch from three to 200 miles offshore."

Supreme Court Eminent Domain Case Generates National Controversy. The Supreme Court's decision in Kelo v. City of New London, which upheld the Connecticut city's use of eminent domain to condemn private property for economic development, has generated a national debate over the use of the power. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 8, 2:45, Schieffer) reported the decision has "sent more than 30 state legislatures into action to try to undo what the court did." CBS notes the case of Norwood, Ohio, where homeowners such as Carl and Joy Gamble are fighting "city officials who agreed to a local developer's $125 million plan to replace their middle class neighborhood with offices, condos and shops" in state courts.

Legislators Move To Limit States' Use Of Eminent Domain. Lawmakers in nearly every state are pushing bills and constitutional amendments to limit the government's use of eminent domain to seize private property for economic development. The New York Times (2/21, Broder, 1.19M) reports, "The measures are in direct response to the United States Supreme Court's 5-to-4 decision last June in a landmark property rights case from Connecticut, upholding the authority of the City of New London to condemn homes in an aging neighborhood to make way for a private development of offices, condominiums and a hotel."

USA Today (2/20, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Bills to restrict eminent domain have moved forward in Georgia, Virginia, Indiana, Kentucky and several other states, but none has become law yet. In New Mexico, the state Senate and House both approved limits, but the Legislature adjourned before final approval."

Supreme Court To Hear Arguments On Clean Water Act. The Supreme Court today will hear arguments over which bodies of water fall under Federal oversight under the Clean Water Act. The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Richey, 61K) reports, "that two cases consolidated for oral argument today question "just how far upstream the Clean Water Act (CWA) extends federal jurisdiction. … At the center of the dispute is a discrepancy between the words Congress used when it wrote the CWA and the regulations the US Army Corps of Engineers and Environmental Protection Agency wrote later to enforce the clean water law. Congress said US jurisdiction would extend over all 'navigable waters.' EPA and Corps of Engineers regulations interpret the law as extending far upstream, even to waters with no hydrologic connection to a tributary of navigable waters."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Savage, 958K) reports, "Federal regulators read this measure as protecting tens of thousands of small streams and hundreds of millions of acres of wetlands that flow toward larger waterways, even if they are far from the nearest river or bay. But to the surprise of environmentalists, the high court agreed to hear a direct attack on that broad view of the law. Farmers and developers say it is far-fetched to describe low-lying farm fields, or even dry creek beds in the West, as part of the nation's navigable waterways."

The New York Times (2/20, Barringer, 1.19M) reports that if the court supports the developers, more than "half of the nation's streams and wetlands could be removed from the protections of the federal Clean Water Act." The central question "is where federal authority ends along the network of rivers, streams, canals and ditches. Does it reach all the veins and arterioles of the nation's waters, and all the wetlands that drain into them? Does it end with the waterways that are actually navigable and the wetlands abutting them? Or is it some place in between?"

Clean Water Act Said To Be In Jeopardy. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 958K) discusses two cases -- Rapanos vs. United States and Carabell vs. Army Corps of Engineers -- that the new Supreme Court will hear when it comes back to session on Tuesday. The paper argues the two cases "pose serious challenges to the 1972 Clean Water Act," the law which gives the Federal Government authority to regulate "navigable waters" in the U.S. Tuesday's cases "concern wetlands that are (or may be) connected, but not adjacent, to navigable bodies," the question being does the Federal Government have the authority to regulate these types of wetlands.

NYTimes Says Clean Water Cases An Important Test For New Justices. An editorial in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) says the Clean Water Act cases are ""an important test of the legal philosophy of John Roberts Jr., the new chief justice, and Samuel Alito Jr., the new associate justice. If they take a hard-line states' rights stance, it will be a sign that they agree with ultraconservatives who want to restrict Congress's power to regulate critical national matters like environmental protection, public health and workplace safety. … These cases may give the American people the first clear indication of just how judicially modest the new justices intend to be."

Identity Issues Color Plan To Protect Florida Panther. The Washington Post (2/21, A3, Whoriskey) reports, "The Florida panther, the feline carnivore that roams what's left of the state's cypress swamps and other wilds, enjoys almost mythic status here." The Post continues, "Its image adorns license plates. The National Hockey League franchise is named for the cat. And it is, officially, the Florida state animal. … But now a new plan for saving the vaunted predator is reopening awkward questions for the animal's admirers: What, exactly, is a Florida panther?" The Post adds, "Scientists believe there are only about 80 left in Florida. And given the shortage of habitat in the cat's rapidly developing namesake state, the draft recovery plan for the Florida panther, issued recently by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, proposes to export some of the predators out of state -- and names potential sites in Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Georgia and Alabama. … The Florida panther roamed those states long ago, wildlife biologists said, and reintroducing it there could enable it to establish populations large enough to ward off extinction. … But the proposal to expand the range of the predator, which is being met warily from officials in other states, where farmers fear attacks on livestock, is also restarting debates about whether the Florida panther, officially considered an endangered subspecies, is for all practical purposes identical to the cougar, a far more common animal that lives in much of western North America."

Grassley Looks To Private Sector For Help With Rainforest Project. CQ (2/20, Adams) reports a "pet project that Republican Sen. Charles E. Grassley has had on the drawing board for more than two years" concerns "the construction of an enclosed rainforest on about five acres in Grassley's native Iowa — with a foil-wrapped exterior towering some 20 stories high." The "artificial rainforest — which has the working name of the Environmental Project — first won a $50 million earmark in the fall of 2003." But Grassley "raised the stakes for Iowa's private investors," and the "law now mandates that businesses or local governments cough up a match of $50 million in the next two years, or else be forced to give back whatever federal money hasn't been spent by Dec. 1, 2007."

Consumer Advocates Urge Ban On Carbon Monoxide Treated Meat. The meat industry has been spiking meat packages with carbon monoxide to give the meat a bright pink color that lasts weeks. Consumer advocates are urging the FDA to ban the practice, saying the agency violated its own rules by allowing the practice without a formal evaluation of its impact on consumer safety. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/20, A1, Weiss, 744K) reports, "The legal offensive has the meat industry seeing red. Officials deny their foes' claim that carbon monoxide is a 'colorant' -- a category that would require a full FDA review -- saying it helps meat retain its naturally red color."

Tribes, Casino Operators Rely On Cash To Influence Lawmakers. The Chicago Tribune (2/21, Dorning) reports, "Along with tawdry tales of bribery, money laundering and sham charities, the corruption scandal surrounding former lobbyist Jack Abramoff has thrown new light on the rising tide of gambling money pouring into the nation's capital." The Tribune continues, "As more states have moved to legalize gambling in one form or another and Indian tribes have turned to casinos as a lucrative source of income, the gambling industry's annual revenues have swelled to more than $78 billion. And with that wealth has come a determination to deploy larger sums to influence decisions made in Washington that can affect the bottom line." The Tribune adds, "Federal campaign contributions from the gambling industry have jumped more than 27-fold, from $478,000 in 1990 to more than $13 million in 2004, according to the Center for Responsive Politics, a non-partisan watchdog group. Washington lobbying expenses disclosed by the industry have nearly doubled in six years, from $6.1 million in 1998 to $11.4 million in 2004, according to the Center for Public Integrity, another monitoring group. … One California tribe, the Morongo Band of Mission Indians, rents a $1,500-a-night luxury suite at Washington's MCI Center that it lends out for fundraisers benefiting members of Congress friendly to their casino interests, including at least once to Rep. Jerry Weller (R-Ill.). … During the 2004 Republican National Convention, casino tribes helped foot the bill for an after-hours Wild Wild West Saloon party for a congressional committee chairman, Rep. Richard Pombo (R-Calif.), at a New York nightclub. The party featured a mechanical bull and music by big-name bands including the Charlie Daniels Band, .38 Special and Otis Day. … At least three of President Bush's premier Pioneer fundraisers were gambling industry chief executives. For years, the industry paid to fete senior congressional staff with annual three-day trips to Las Vegas, where casino operators made their case on legislative issues."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales Speaks At Dedication Of Alabama Church. The AP (2/21) reports, "The church where four black girls died in a racist bombing in 1963 was honored as a national landmark Monday, with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales recalling their memory amid a new string of attacks against churches in Alabama." The AP continues, "Speaking at the pulpit of Birmingham's Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, Gonzales compared the deadly bombing of the old brick building to a string of arson fires that have hit rural Baptist churches since Feb. 3. … The fires, Gonzales said, are a reminder 'there is still work to be done' in ensuring equal justice and fighting discrimination." The AP adds, "Gonzales called the building 'a catalyst for the cause of justice' as he referred to the children killed when a Ku Klux Klan bomb went off at the Sixteenth Street church on Sept. 15, 1963. … 'We protect this place for them,' Gonzales said during a ceremony where Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton signed a proclamation adding the church to a list of about 2,500 places that carry the title of National Historic Landmark." The AP notes, "The audience included relatives of the four girls who were killed — Addie Mae Collins, Carole Robertson and Cynthia Wesley, all 14, and Denise McNair, 11. … Sixteenth Street Baptist Church was an important meeting place for activists during the civil rights era, and the bombing became a worldwide symbol illustrating the depth of racial hatred in the South at the time. Three Klansman were convicted in the blast, the last in 2002. … Gonzales also was briefed during his trip on a string of fires that has scores of federal and state agents in Alabama checking out hundreds of leads. Investigators have said there does not appear to be a racial motive to the church fires. Some of the churches have had white congregations and others black memberships. … Ten rural, Baptist churches were damaged or destroyed by arsonists in central and west Alabama between Feb. 3 and Feb. 11, and investigators believe at least nine of the blazes were set by two suspects identified as men in their 20s or

30s. … Gonzales called the fire investigation a 'very intensive, collaborative effort.'"

WBRC-TV Birmingham (2/19, 5:03 p.m.) said that the "16th Street Baptist Church is in the spotlight. Tomorrow, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Interior Secretary Gale Norton will be in Birmingham for an event, declaring the church a national, historic landmark. White racists bombed the church in 1963, killing four young girls." The station added that in the 60's, the "church was used for rallies and marches during the civil rights movement." WAAY-TV Huntsville (2/19, 10:05 p.m.), WXTX-TV Columbus, Georgia (2/18, 9:59 p.m.), WIAT-TV Birmingham (2/17, 9:59 p.m.), WTTO-TV Birmingham (2/17, 9:01 p.m.), and WCFT-TV Birmingham (2/17, 6:09 p.m.), also covered this story.

Agents Probe New Fire At Alabama Church. The AP (2/21) reports, "A suspicious fire did minor damage to the exterior of a small church, but authorities said Monday they don't know whether it was linked to a string of suspected arsons that have damaged or destroyed 10 rural churches in Alabama." The AP continues, "Johnny Chambers, acting chief of the Glencoe Police Department, said members of the joint federal-state task force investigating the cases were still reviewing a blaze that happened early Sunday at Chapman's Chapel. … Like the other ones that burned, the church is small, with fewer than 20 members, and isolated. … But the church is about 75 miles northeast of the nearest of the previous fires, and the fire began outside the building near the ground. The earlier blazes were started inside, mostly near the pulpit."

"Dr. Wu" Gets 11-Year Sentence. The San Diego Union-Tribune (2/18, Soto) reports "Dr. Wu" was hunted by DEA agents for more than two decades. Wu, "a drug trafficker who authorities say ran an international operation while living in a trailer parked near North County beaches was sentenced to 11 years, three months in prison [Friday]. … His legal name is now Baron Michael Angelo Suarez-Rothschild, but he was born Michael Grabarek 55 years ago, authorities said. … He was the centerpiece of 'Operation Dr. Wu,' which led to the arrests of about 30 people on drug trafficking, money laundering and weapons charges in Southern California, Hawaii and elsewhere." Authorities said the drugs, "trafficked through San Diego, were delivered to users in Las Vegas, Detroit, and cities in Florida and Hawaii, as well as Singapore."

More Meth-Related Violence Said To Be Moving Into Dallas. The Dallas Morning News (2/18, Meyer, Trahan) reports that as border violence moves into Dallas, police "are turning up the heat." Michelle Deaver, a spokeswoman for the DEA in Dallas, "said Friday that authorities are investigating more meth moving into the Dallas area from the border. As U.S. lawmakers have made it increasingly tough to acquire a key ingredient in methamphetamine – pseudoephedrine…fewer people north of the border are 'cooking' the dangerous drug. That means more imports."

California City May Face Lawsuits After Outlawing Marijuana Dispensaries. The North County Times (2/19) reports that San Marcos has joined California's "short list," outlawing marijuana dispensaries. The "move sets the city up for lawsuits similar to those leveled on other cities that have enacted bans." San Marcos on Tuesday "became the first city in San Diego County to enact a ban on future dispensaries; one in operation now can stay. The decision came after a December raid by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration turned the spotlight on the Legal Ease Inc. medical marijuana dispensary. The raid was conducted after undercover agents bought marijuana without valid recommendations from a doctor."

16 Charged In Prescription Drugs Investigation. The AP (2/19) reports, "More than a dozen people have been charged with illegally selling prescription drugs, some of which have turned up in several western New York high schools. Officials with the federal Drug Enforcement Administration announced the charges against 16 people accused of selling OxyContin, hydrocodone and other prescription drugs to young people, many of them high school students. Authorities say most of those arrested are in the 19-to-21 age range."

Former Florida Basketball Assistant Sentenced In Cocaine Case. The Tampa Tribune (2/21) reports Former University of Florida basketball staff assistant Major Parker "was sentenced to six months of house arrest Friday after pleading guilty to drug charges. … Parker and Farrah Stephanie Moise were arrested Dec. 7, 2004, for allegedly trying to sell about a pound of cocaine to an undercover Gainesville police officer. According to police reports, Parker and Moise had been the subject of an investigation by the city police and Drug Enforcement Administration agents since November."

The AP (2/18) and Orlando Sentinel (2/18) also reported on this.

Three Arrested In Florida In Opium Investigation. The Naples (FL) Daily News (2/20) reports Moeen Mehri and two other men "were arrested recently after a confidential informant and an undercover investigator set up a drug buy in a Fort Myers hotel room." It was all part of an undercover sting that authorities "said involved the sale of $300,000 worth of opium." According to an affidavit, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration "received a tip from its Boise, Idaho, office about an opium source in Southwest Florida. The Idaho agents had developed an informant who said he could purchase large amounts of the illegal drug from Mehri."

Virginia Meteorologist To Testify Before Federal Grand Jury In Heroin Case. The Roanoke (VA) Times (2/18) reports, "News Director Shane Moreland confirmed that meteorologist Jamey Singleton will testify before a federal grand jury in the ongoing investigation into a heroin organization that allegedly supplied former WSLS-TV weatherman Marc Lamarre with drugs. Lamarre, 36, suffered a near-fatal heroin overdose on the evening of Feb. 2 and is recovering. … Gilbert Dennis Hadden, 21, of Detroit, is being held on federal charges of conspiracy to distribute heroin and distribution of heroin in connection with Lamarre's overdose."

In a separate story, the Roanoke (VA) Times (2/18) also reports, "Not one, but two WSLS (Channel 10) meteorologists -- Marc Lamarre and Jamey Singleton -- have struggled with a heroin addiction in recent months, according to an interview with Singleton that aired on WSLS's late-night newscast Friday.

Report: Syringes, Antidepressants Found During Raids At Turin Olympics. The AP (2/21) writes, "Italian police seized 100 syringes, 30 packages of antidepressants and asthma medication during Saturday's raids at the Austrian biathlon and cross country teams' private lodging at the Turin Olympics. … State broadcaster ORF, citing Italian prosecutor Raffaele Guariniello, said authorities also found equipment used to conduct blood tests and perform blood transfusions."

Reuters (2/20) reports, The International Olympic Committee and Italian police on Monday remained at odds over two anti-doping raids at the quarters of Austrian athletes competing in the Turin Winter Olympics. The IOC says it only found out about the raids on the same evening they took place, but Italian police insist it was a joint operation with the IOC."

The Los Angeles Times (2/21) reports, "The unprecedented weekend police search of Austrian Olympic skiers' quarters could signal a tough new approach in the campaign to eradicate doping in international sports. Authorities seized 30 packages of antidepressants, asthma medication and 100 syringes, some used, Italian state prosecutor Raffaele Guariniello told Austrian television. It was the first time police in an Olympic host nation had raided athletes' quarters during the Games in a search for performance-enhancing substances; until now, enforcement has been handled by sports authorities."

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (2/20, story 11, 1:55, Pizzey) reported, "Acting on a tip from Olympic officials, Italian paramilitary police raided the quarters of the Austrian cross-country and biathlon teams and suddenly the Winter Olympics were looking more like CSI Torino. An Italian prosecutor said more than a 100 syringes and 30 packs of drugs, including asthma drugs and anti-depressants, were found in the quarters outside the official Olympic Village. The search was sparked when anti-doping officials spotted this man, Walter Mayer, listed as the Austrian team's trainer in spite of being banned from this Olympics and the 2010 games after having been found guilty of doping offenses in Salt Lake City." Dick Pound, chairman, World Anti-Doping Agency: "It's incomprehensible. I mean, I can't understand why a country would have somebody like that identified so publicly with their team." Pizzey: "In a bizarre twist, Mayer drove hundreds of miles back to Austria before the raid. When police found him asleep in his car, he took off again, knocking down a policeman and ramming a roadblock before being caught and sent to a psychiatric hospital for examination. Athletes involved with Mayer were drug tested and if the results from this lab are positive, the dopers will not just be kicked out of the games, they could be charged with a criminal offense under Italian law."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 11, 0:30, Williams) reported, "Back here in Torino, a story that continues to get a lot of attention here, the doping scandal involving the team from Austria. The latest bizarre twist in this, the Austrian ski coach, who wasn't supposed to be at these games in the first place, and who then bolted after a surprise raid on the Austrian coaches' housing, well he is now in a psychiatric hospital. Authorities put him there yesterday after he rammed his car into a police roadblock in Austria."

Outgoing Utah US Attorney Pushed Gun Prosecutions. The Salt Lake Tribune (2/21, Gehrke) reports, "When Roosevelt Police Chief Cecil Gurr was gunned down in 2001, state prosecutors went after the gunman. But federal investigators set their sights on Michael Nelson Swett, a convicted felon who had provided the triggerman with the assault rifle used to kill the chief." The Tribune continues, "Swett was convicted of his role in Gurr's death, and sentenced to 10 years in prison. It was an early victory in a major dragnet aimed at cracking down on weapons crimes and getting guns out of the hands of felons, an effort that was the prime focus of U.S. Attorney Paul Warner, who announced this month that he is leaving the post." The Tribune adds, "During seven years in office, Warner's drive to cut down on gun crime resulted in the filing of more than 1,450 weapons-related cases. There was an elevenfold increase in the number of individuals charged with breaking firearms laws in his first three years in office, according to an analysis by The Salt Lake Tribune of Warner's record as U.S. attorney for Utah. … 'You couldn't swing a dead cat and not hit a convicted felon with a gun when we started the program,' Warner said in an interview. 'We've scooped most of the scum off the top of the bucket.'" The Tribune notes, "The program - begun as Project CUFF (Criminal Use of Firearms by Felons) in March 2000 and now called Project Safe Neighborhoods - was prompted in part by a shooting spree at Columbine High School in Colorado that killed 15. President Clinton's attorney general, Janet Reno, sought to make weapons crimes a national priority, and the emphasis continued after President Bush was elected, Warner said. ..In his first full year in office, 1999, Warner's office prosecuted 33 individuals for weapons crimes. By 2003, the number had skyrocketed to 362, a nearly 11-fold increase, according to an analysis of Justice Department data by the Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse at Syracuse University."

Government Said To Be "Throwing Money" At Failing Drug War. A Wall Street Journal editorial (2/21, Melloan) says the war against drugs "rages on with little mainstream challenge of its basic weapon, prohibition." Economist Milton Friedman "predicted in Newsweek nearly 34 years ago that Richard Nixon's ambitious 'global war against drugs' would be a failure. Much evidence today suggests that he was right. … The drug war has become costly, with some $50 billion in direct outlays by all levels of government, and much higher indirect costs, such as the expanded prison system to house half a million drug-law offenders and the burdens on the court system. … That reflects government's tendency to throw more money at a program that isn't working."

IMMIGRATION:

Groups Criticize Speedy Deportations. The New York Times (2/20, Swarns, 1.19M) reports, "As the Bush administration rapidly expands its efforts to detain and deport illegal immigrants, human rights groups warn that people fleeing persecution are increasingly vulnerable to being deported to their home countries." In 2005, "a bipartisan federal commission warned that some immigration officials were improperly processing asylum seekers for deportation. The commission made recommendations to ensure that the system of speedy deportations, known as expedited removal, had adequate safeguards to protect those fleeing persecution." But "one year later, only one of the commission's five recommendations has been put into effect. Meanwhile, domestic security officials have expanded the expedited removal program, in which illegal immigrants are swiftly deported without being allowed to make their case before an immigration judge."

US Cancels More Visas In Fight Against Corruption. The Miami Herald (2/19, Bachelet) reports, "Indicating a sharp increase in visa cancellations, the US Consular Affairs bureau estimates that about 250 senior foreign officials have lost their visas since a January 2004 presidential proclamation to stop the entry of 'persons engaged or benefiting from corruption' went into effect. Many more officials, politicians and relatives have had their visas canceled under older provisions linked to drug trafficking, money laundering and human rights abuses. One State Department official with knowledge of the program said that number was in the 'hundreds.'"

TAX:

Frist Says Capital Gains Tax Cuts Increased Revenue. In a USA Today op-ed (2/21), Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist touts the "supply side" revenue enhancements generated by tax cuts. Frist says, "Ever since the Senate approved the last major tax relief bill, in 2003, revenues have increased every year. In 2004, they went up 5.5%. Last year, they rose 14.5%, the largest increase in nearly 25 years. Total government collections, in fact, increased more after President Bush's 2003 tax cuts than they did after President Clinton's 1994 tax hikes." Frist adds that Republicans' "decision to reduce taxes on capital gains and dividends provides a good case study in effective tax policy."

WPost Criticizes Dynamic Scoring Of Tax Cuts' Budget Impact. The Washington Post (2/21, A14, 744K) reports says in an editorial that while Vice President Cheney touted the supply side argument, he "is the one who needs to reexamine his evidence. Yes, tax policies can help promote economic growth. But no matter how many times the vice president and his tax-cutting allies proclaim their belief in the tax-cut fairy, she doesn't exist. Tax cuts do not magically pay for themselves, bringing in more revenue than they deplete from the treasury." Proponents of "the magic tax cut have long argued that, if only the growth-enhancing effects of cuts were accounted for in the budgetary equation, this cost-free boon would become clear. Trouble is, responsible economists who have attempted to engage in this kind of 'dynamic analysis' haven't come up with the unalloyed positive conclusion the administration wants -- much less the proof of pay-for-themselves tax cuts."

USA Today Criticizes GOP For Seeking Tax Cuts. USA Today (2/21, 2.31M) says in an editorial that the Federal budget deficit "will be in the range of $400 billion this year. That means roughly $1 in every $6 spent by the government will be borrowed money. So a few weeks ago, with great self-congratulatory fanfare, Congress passed and the president signed what was billed as a $40 billion, five-year deficit reduction. Now Congress is weighing tax-cut packages that would wipe out those projected savings almost twice over." But "Uncle Sam doesn't have the money to do any of this." The "fiscally responsible policy would be to roll back some of the tax cuts, particularly those for the wealthiest Americans, or let them expire. But no. Bush and congressional Republicans won't hear of it."

NYTimes Says Bush Budget Omits Negative Information. The New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) says in an editorial that President Bush's "spending and taxing proposals are a mass of missing information. The cost of keeping the military in Iraq and Afghanistan isn't included. Neither, as it turns out, are the usual projections of the long-term effects of proposals to cut $183 billion from domestic programs other than entitlements." But specialists from the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "an independent watchdog organization," have "backtracked through tables of opaque data and deduced the following: Over five years, veterans' benefits would be cut 13 percent, or $10 billion. Despite all the political talk about energy research and alternate fuels, $4.4 billion would be cut from energy programs. Environmental spending, including for national parks, would be cut 22 percent, or $28 billion; housing, fuel, child care and nutrition programs for the poor and elderly would lose 13 percent, or $24 billion. Topping this surreal concoction is a 13 percent cut — $53 billion — in education and job programs by 2011."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Media Continue To Comment On Cheney's Hunting Accident. Vice President Cheney's accidental shooting of Texas attorney Harold Whittington continued to draw media attention over the weekend, including the covers of two newsweeklies and several of the weekend talk shows. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 6, 2:35, Seigenthaler) reported the coverage is "focused more on Mr. Cheney's role in the White House." Evan Thomas, Newsweek: "I think it's turning into a story, as so many stories do, of blue states and red states. I mean, the blue states think that Cheney was either slightly a comical figure or somebody who really did something wrong. The red states think this is a press confection, that, you know, the media is just out to get poor Dick Cheney." Seigenthaler: "According to a new 'Time' poll, 52% of the American people approved of the way the Vice President handled the aftermath of the shooting, and his overall job approval number remains largely unchanged at 29%." NBC correspondent David Gregory apologized on Meet the Press for speaking sharply to White House spokesman Scott McClellan, but he "and other Washington journalists contend the White House could have been more forthcoming. Longtime Cheney advisor Mary Matalin disagrees and insists that's only an issue inside the Beltway."

The New York Times (2/20, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that Matalin said it had been "a horrible week. She also took blame for the pounding [White House Press Secretary Scott] McClellan took in the briefing room. 'I don't buy that we did it wrong,' she said. 'But I do understand that every day over there is like walking up a mountain with bricks in your backpack, and when something starts the beasts not just growling but flinging themselves against their cages, I feel bad about that, and it's not a good day for him.'"

Meanwhile, in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (2/20, C1, 744K) Howard Kurtz writes, "Nothing makes journalists madder than the feeling that they're not getting the full story -- and the Bush administration has been giving them plenty of practice. On one controversy after another, the White House has been the gang that couldn't shoot straight, buying itself additional rounds of bad publicity by suppressing or delaying embarrassing information."

Degree Of Cheney's Independence From White House Control Sparks Commentary. Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident is the cover story in two major news magazines this week. While both magazines provide lengthy reports on the sequence of events before and after the incident, they also tend to focus on Cheney's power in the Bush Administration. Newsweek (2/27, Thomas), which reports that the incident "once again drew attention to the unusual nature of Cheney's power. He remains by far the most powerful vice president in history, and one of the most secretive and mysterious public officials to ever hold such high office in America." A report in Time's (2/27, Gibbs, Allen) cover package agrees, noting that the accident exposed "in the most public way yet the extent to which Cheney runs an independent operation and raise the question of how much the White House can control him -- or wants to. Cheney makes his own rules; he decides what intelligence matters, what secrets are worth keeping and what force is worth using, and he defends his positions with a breathtaking indifference to consequences and to complaint from those who disagree." A separate story in Time's (2/27, Cloud) cover package reports that "there are some unanswered questions about that day. For instance, why hasn't the Secret Service released its report? And why hasn't the local sheriff released the text of the depositions his office conducted?"

Bush, Cheney Teams Seen As Divided. As part of its cover package, Time (2/27, Gibbs, Allen) reports that "even six years in office together has not integrated the Bush and Cheney teams; in fact, in some ways they have grown further apart. … Many on Cheney's staff see Bush's aides as too liberal, while some Bush aides view the vice-presidential staff as wing nuts."

Aides Said To Be "A Little Scared" Of Cheney. In its cover story, Newsweek (2/27, Thomas) reports that Cheney's official staff is "a little afraid of him. NEWSWEEK once asked his press secretary (there have been seven of them since he became vice president) if Cheney went to church on Sundays. The spokesperson confessed she really couldn't ask the veep; the question was just 'too personal.'"

Hunters Raise Questions About Cheney's Actions. A separate story in Newsweek's (2/27, Tuttle) cover package that hunters around the country agreed last week that Cheney "broke a cardinal rule: in that exhilarating moment when the birds scattered up all around him, he didn't check to make sure his line of fire was clear before he pulled the trigger." Newsweek adds that Cheney's admission to having a beer with lunch sparked anger among some hunters, who "follow an iron rule of no drinking at all on the day of a hunt." Some "also complained that Cheney got off with a warning for hunting without a required $7 quail stamp. An ordinary Joe, they said, would have been hit with a stiff fine at least, especially if he had shot someone."

Carter Criticizes Administration's Handling Of Cheney Hunting Accident. Former President Jimmy Carter was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/20) about the Bush Administration's handling of Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident. Carter said, "Obviously now everybody in the White House, maybe not in the Vice President's office, agrees that they would have been much better had the information about the hunting accident been revealed immediately. Because that's a main concern, I think. Hunting accidents happen all over the world. I regret very much that this one did happen. But to conceal it for almost a full day, obviously -- and then, at first, to blame Mr. Whittington for the accident, I think were two mistakes that were made. And I'm sure almost everyone agrees that it could have been done better."

65% Say Cheney Should Have Taken Immediate Responsibility For Hunting Accident. CNN Live Today (2/20, 12:18 p.m.) reported, "Americans are divided over the way Vice President Dick Cheney handled the fallout from that shooting incident. In a Time Magazine poll, 65 percent said the Vice President should have taken immediate responsibility for accidentally shooting a fellow hunter. About half the respondents say they approve of the way the Vice President handled the incident. 42% say they disapprove. When asked of the Vice President is too secretive, 58 percent said yes compared to 33 percent who said no."

Cheney Approval Rating Down To 29% In Time Poll. William Schneider said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/20) that a Time Magazine poll has found that Vice President Dick Cheney's job approval rating "is down to 29 percent. That's down from 51 percent just before the 2004 election. Cheney's disapproval numbers have not changed much."

Bush Braves Subfreezing Temperatures For Bike Rides. President Bush took two bike rides in subfreezing temperatures this weekend. The AP (2/20) reports, "On Saturday, Bush pedaled about 90 minutes at a Secret Service training facility in Beltsville, Md. It was even colder on Sunday when the president, after church, braved temperatures in the low-20s." The AP also reports that Bush watched some of the Winter Olympics while onboard Air Force One on Friday. White House spokesman Trent Duffy said Bush watched the US-Switzerland curling match.

White House Says Bush Enjoyed Olympic Curling. NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 14, 1:00, Williams) reported, "Some long overdue recognition for a sport that is finally growing in popularity. The White House made a point of saying this weekend that while traveling on board Air Force One President Bush watched and enjoyed live coverage of the men's curling competition. By the way, the US beat Switzerland 7-3."

Stevens Said To Anchor "Center-Left Bloc" On High Court. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Lane, 744K) examines the influence of Supreme Court Justice John Paul Stevens, reporting, "At a time of conservative ascendancy on the court, he anchors a four-justice center-left bloc that would probably shrink to three if President Bush could appoint his successor." Stevens's influence "has grown in recent years. He has a knack for building coalitions across ideological lines, and he makes shrewd use of his prerogatives as the senior associate justice."

Snow Urges Congress To Increase Debt Limit. The Washington Post (2/20, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "Treasury Secretary John W. Snow told Congress last week that it had begun to use the TSP's government securities fund to keep from hitting the $8 trillion debt limit. He called on congressional leaders to increase the debt limit by mid-March, suggesting that was when the Treasury might not be able to meet its financial obligations. Snow also indicated that TSP investors should not worry about his decision to suspend reinvestment of some TSP assets on a daily basis. In a letter to Capitol Hill leaders, Snow said G Fund participants 'are fully protected and will suffer no adverse consequences from this action.'"

Coburn Seeks Crackdown On Government Conferences. CQ (2/20, Zeller) reports Republican Sen. Tom Coburn "is calling for a broader-ranging crusade against what he sees as a more routine sort of honest graft within the federal government" than the lobbyist-funded junket, the "generously padded professional conference circuit." According to Coburn's research, "federal spending on conferences has gone up 66 percent in the last five years, to at least $294 million in fiscal 2005 — not including expenses from the Interior, Commerce and Veterans Affairs departments, which did not participate in Coburn's study." One of the "chief offenders, as Coburn sees it, is the Health and Human Services Department, which spent $68 million on conferences last year."

Only Fraction Of Low-Income Seniors Signed Up For Drug Plan. The Washington Post (2/21, A1, Connolly, 744K) reports in a front page story that the Bush Administration's "$400 million campaign…to enroll low-income seniors in prescription drug coverage that would cost them just a few dollars per prescription has signed up 1.4 million people, a fraction of the 8 million eligible for the new coverage." By "some calculations, the government is on track to spend about $250 for each person it enrolls, and even then it would have only 2 million poor senior citizens taking advantage of what is perhaps the most generous government benefit available today."

Some Seniors Reject Medicare Plan Because Of Cost. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Fuhrmans, 2.11M) reports that after "weighing the specific plans available to them under the new benefit, some seniors are concluding that they'll end up paying more for the medications they currently take than if they continue with no coverage at all. Taking into account monthly premiums and co-payments -- which under some policies can run as high as 50% to 75% of a drug's retail price -- they think they can get a better or equal deal doing what they've always done: asking doctors for samples and ordering from pharmacies in Canada."

Efforts To Reconcile Pension Reform Bills Proving Contentious. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Schroeder, 2.11M) reports on efforts to reconcile the House and Senate versions of pension reform. The Journal reports, "Even naming the conference committee has been contentious. The Senate is fighting internally over the size of its contingent, with Democrats seeking an extra slot. Because much of the final language will be decided by the committee in closed-door meetings, Senate and House members are being barraged by lobbyists pushing their positions."

Congress Cool To Bush Call For Line Item Veto. The AP (2/21, Abrams) reports President Bush's "request for broad, and constitutionally questionable, authority to control spending by vetoing specific items in larger bills is drawing limited interest in Congress." Bush said line-item veto power "and a movement to curb lawmakers' appetite for special projects, or earmarks, would provide a one-two punch in reducing government spending." But "many lawmakers" are "reluctant to cede more power, particularly to an administration they see as not always treating Congress as an equal partner."

Lobbyist Sought Majority Interest In Contract After Seeking Earmark. The Washington Post (2/21, A3, Babcock, 744K) reports defense contractor Brent Wilkes, who has been implicated in the Randy Cunningham bribery scandal, told San Diego manufacturer Randy Beck that Congress had earmarked "$25 million in the military budget for the Navy to develop an acoustical system. He promised he could win the government contract to develop the system for Beck's Horizon Sports Technologies, according to allegations in a lawsuit." Wilkes "wanted $1.5 million up front to cover his lobbying expenses and a 51 percent interest in a new company they would set up to collect the government cash." Although it is "common for lobbying firms to charge clients large fees to pursue earmarks, Wilkes's demand for a majority interest in the resulting contract is highly unusual, experts said."

Democratic Senators Urge Higher Military Pay Raise Than Proposed By Bush. Ten Democratic Senators have urged the Senate Budget Committee to provide a pay raise too military personnel that is higher than the 2.2 percent increase proposed by President Bush. The Washington Post (2/21, B2, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The senators, in a letter organized by Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), call President Bush 's pay proposal 'a paltry increase' that 'neglects the value of their service and the very real challenges of recruiting and retaining an all-volunteer military in time of war.' … The senators did not propose a specific pay increase for the armed forces next year but urged the Budget Committee to support 'a pay increase that meets the needs' of military personnel."

Administration Accused Of Not Taking Responsibility For Mistakes. The New York Times' Paul Krugman (2/20) writes that the top figures in the administration are not "mensches," which he defines as "an upstanding person who takes responsibility for his actions." Krugman adds, "Officials in this administration never take responsibility for their actions. When something goes wrong, it's always someone else's fault.'

Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac Spent $23 Million On Lobbying In 2005. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac spent almost $23 million on lobbying last year as Congress considered measures to tighten oversight in response to accounting scandals at the two companies. The Washington Post (2/20, D1, Shin, 744K) reports, "Freddie Mac spent $12.6 million on lobbying, down from $15.44 million in 2004 but still enough to place it 11th among corporations that so far have filed lobbying disclosure forms for 2005, according to the Web site PoliticalMoneyLine. … Fannie Mae spent $10.1 million, up from $8.78 million in 2004 -- an increase that puzzled some campaign finance experts given Fannie Mae's pledges to cut back its extensive lobbying network."

Disclosure Seen As First Step Towards Lobbying Reform. The Washington Post's Jeffrey Birnbaum (2/20) writes that one lobbying proposal that has significant bipartisan support, which is: "Citizens should be able to find out easily who's lobbying their elected representatives." According to Birnbaum, "A growing number of people in both parties are pushing for a mega-disclosure provision as part of an effort to revise the capital's ethics laws." Cited as supporters of such a proposal are: House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas, and Sen. John McCain.

Protesters Gear Up For Rove Appearance At West Virginia Fundraiser. The Charleston (WV) Daily Mail (2/20, Thompson) reported, "Controversial presidential adviser Karl Rove is coming to Charleston this week, and local protesters are gearing up for his visit. Rove will be here Thursday for a $50-a-ticket fundraiser for the" state GOP at the Charleston Civic Center." Carrie Swing, president of Patriots for Peace, an anti-war organization, "said more than 100 members of the group will gather" outside of the convention center. The group "will display a wall of remembrance, a series of plastic panels containing names of the 2,273 soldiers who have died in the war."

Debate Over Anonymous Sources Reflects Tension Between Officials, Media. The Washington Post (2/21, A13, Lee, 744K) reports on the use of anonymous sources by reporters. The Post notes the debate over anonymous sources reflects the "tension between federal officials and the press at a time when the media's credibility is under assault, in part because the public believes journalists rely too heavily on anonymous sources in reporting and writing articles about Washington. … The demand for anonymity by officials leaves journalists grappling with an unpleasant trade-off: use the information and risk alienating readers with more unnamed sources, or leave it out and risk having a less informative article that fails to match those done by competing news organizations." The Post notes, "Agencies cite any number of reasons for keeping names out of the press: allowing lower-level officials to be quoted might steal the spotlight from the Cabinet secretary or other high-ranking official; the briefers are policy wonks who are uncomfortable talking to reporters; the agency is involved in an issue, but in a supporting role; the officials are there to provide context or technical explanations as a courtesy, not to be the face of an agency. … 'The vast majority of the Justice Department's briefings are on the record with the only exceptions being briefings that require the department's attorneys to explain highly technical and complex legal issues that require wordy responses not conducive for reporters to use on the record anyway,' Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, wrote in an e-mail response to questions. He added that most of those briefings 'take place after a DOJ official has already spoken on the record.'"

Cohen Says Administration Intimidating Potential Leakers. Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K) that the Bush Administration used its secrets "to construct a false case for war. … And now the administration is pursuing a policy of chasing down leaks by chasing down the reporters who get those leaks." Cohen adds, "It used to be that the government went to some pains to avoid asking a journalist about his sources. No more. … The result can only be a further sense of intimidation -- a message to potential sources that they had better keep their mouths shut."

Marcus Says White House Prefers "Its Own Truth." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K) that recent developments, including Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident and the Administration's handling of Hurricane Katrina "have reinforced and broadened the image of "an insular White House headed by an incurious president. … This White House prefers its own truth to the inconvenient facts. Layer onto that a chain of command mentality and a CEO-delegator president and, when reality hits -- whether in the form of a difficult war, a killer storm or a misfiring veep -- it's not terribly surprising that the White House has a hard time adjusting."

Kristof Says Cheney, Rumsfeld Should Resign. Nicholas Kristof writes in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) that President Bush can "rehabilitate himself to some degree -- if he acts quickly and decisively to reshuffle his administration and approach to governing." Among the changes recommended by Kristof are the resignations of Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Kristof adds that Bush should nominate a Democrat to replace Rumsfeld.

Critics Say State Department Reorganization Used To Demote "Disloyal" Officials. The Washington Post (2/21, A4, Kessler, 744K) reports a State Department "reorganization of analysts involved in preventing the spread of deadly weapons has spawned internal turmoil, with more than half a dozen career employees alleging in interviews that political appointees sought to punish long-term employees whose views they considered suspect." Senior State Department officials "deny that and say an investigation has found that the proper personnel practices were followed. But three officials involved in the reorganization, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to comment publicly, acknowledge that a merger of two bureaus reduced the influence of employees who were viewed by some political appointees as disloyal to the administration's policies." The employees "who say that they have been targeted once had a back channel to then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell and his deputy, Richard L. Armitage, who they said would on occasion ask them to bypass their superior, John R. Bolton, now the ambassador to the United Nations."

Historians Criticize Efforts To Reclassify Documents. Intelligence agencies have been removing thousands of historical documents from public view under a seven year old secret program at the National Archives. The New York Times (2/21, Shane, 1.19M) reports that the restoration of classified status to the documents began in 1999 but "because the reclassification program is itself shrouded in secrecy…it continued virtually without outside notice until December." The Times adds that historians "say the program is removing material that can do no conceivable harm to national security. They say it is part of a marked trend toward greater secrecy under the Bush administration, which has increased the pace of classifying documents, slowed declassification and discouraged the release of some material under the Freedom of Information Act."

Activist Says Congressional GOP Has Given Up Trying To Stop Government Growth. The Washington Times (2/21, Hallow, 90K) reports on M. Stanton Evans, who has been "at the center of the slowly building force of conservatism for half a century." Evans 'is fed up with a Congress that he has struggled for years to populate with Republicans. 'The Republican Party in Congress basically has given up on stopping the growth of big government,' he says. 'They're adding to the problem almost daily with their earmarks and their pork.'"

Conservative Authors Offering Opposing Assessments Of Bush. Michiko Kakutani writes in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) that conservative authors Bruce Bartlett and Fred Barnes offer opposing views of President Bush in their new books. Barnes "views Mr. Bush as 'a president who leads,' an action-oriented 'visionary,' an executive who combines 'F.D.R.'s cool optimism' and Teddy Roosevelt's 'pugnacity and determination.'" Bartlett "sees Mr. Bush as a 'pretend conservative' – 'a partisan Republican, anxious to improve the fortunes of his party' but 'perfectly willing to jettison conservative principles at a moment's notice to achieve that goal.'"

Dionne Says Government Should Expand Opportunities For Disadvantaged. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K), "Ron Sims, the county executive in Washington state's King County, believes government's job is 'to help create wealth more efficiently.'" His view "reminds Democrats that a commitment to active government is not simply about redistributing wealth. It is also rooted in the historically sound insight that effective government has always been essential to robust economic growth. Government, in the Sims formulation, should be a dynamic player in our nation's economic life." An Urban Institute Study notes that while policymakers "have spent much energy on the problems facing single mothers, they have done little about the disadvantages facing young men." Dionne adds, "The Urban Institute authors can be read as bringing Sims's practical focus on government's role in wealth creation to the task of expanding opportunities for the least fortunate among the young. This is good public policy. My hunch is that it could also be good politics."

WSJournal Praises Bush Health Care Reform Proposals. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) editorializes, "The more we look at the fine print in the health-care reforms President Bush is now stumping for, the more we see the potential for the most sweeping and beneficial changes in half a century." The Journal adds that Bush's reforms are "HillaryCare in reverse," adding that the President "has assembled an ambitious and mutually reinforcing set of health reforms."

NYTimes Says FDA Should Investigate Possible Cancer Risk Of Aspartame. An editorial in the New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) calls on regulators to examine the artificial sweetener aspartame in the wake of a report that says it may cause cancer. The FDA "has asked the Italian researchers for a detailed rat-by-rat report, not just the overall results made available so far. The Ramazzini group has an obligation to make its full findings public quickly if it expects regulators to take urgent action."

Investors Focused On May Fed Meeting. USA Today (2/21, Shell, 2.31M) reports that the May 10 meeting of the Federal Reserve is "likely to put investors on edge. … The reason: The May meeting is likely to provide investors with their first insights into the Fed's personality under [Chairman Ben] Bernanke and offer the best clues on when the Fed might stop raising rates." The meeting will be the first where "the 'Bernanke factor' will be in play." While it is "unclear whether the Fed will raise rates at this meeting," it could "shed light on whether the Fed is done raising rates."

Professor Says Bernanke Will Take Monetary Policy Off Front Page. Stanford University economic professor Robert Hall writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) that Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke "is completely committed to continuing the policy of a stable dollar. Under his leadership, the Fed is likely to make this commitment more formal, perhaps even stating a target such as 2.5% inflation. Mr. Bernanke has been outspoken on the point that inflation must be kept at the target -- it is as bad a failure of policy if it drops below as if it exceeds the target." Hall adds that Bernanke "will stick to his mandate to keep the dollar stable. Monetary policy will recede from the front page to the inner pages of the C section under Mr. Bernanke's leadership."

Big Firms Increasingly Hit With Overtime Suits. The Washington Post (2/21, D1, Masters, Joyce) reports, "Large employers around the country, from retail giants Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Lowe's Cos. to tech firms IBM and Electronic Arts Inc., are being hit with state and federal lawsuits alleging that they systematically failed to pay overtime to hundreds or even thousands of employees. … And many of the cases are bearing fruit." The Post continues, "Earlier this month, Swiss financial giant UBS AG agreed to pay up to $89 million to settle several state and federal lawsuits filed by financial advisers who were improperly classified as exempt from overtime. Insurer Allstate Corp. agreed last fall to pay up to $120 million to nearly 3,000 claims adjusters in California. Janitors who cleaned stores for Southern California grocery chains Albertsons, Ralphs and Vons won a $22.4 million settlement in 2004. … Although there are no comprehensive statistics, actions filed under the Fair Labor Standards Act -- most of which are overtime cases -- shot up 86 percent between 2000 and 2004, to 3,617, according to the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts. In contrast, labor cases in general rose 30 percent over the same period, the most recent for which figures are available." The Post adds, "There also has been an upsurge in multi-plaintiff overtime lawsuits in New York, California, Illinois and other states that have tough overtime laws and class-action rules that are favorable to plaintiffs, lawyers said. … The suits stem from state and federal laws that require employers to pay time-and-a-half to workers who put in more than 40 hours a week. Salaried managers and independent contractors are exempt -- unless their salaries fall below a certain threshold. Exempt categories are carefully defined to prevent employers from simply using the titles for workers to avoid paying overtime."

Wave Of Presidential Bios Aimed At Popular Audiences Noted. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Brownstein, 958K) reports on a tide over the past 15 years of presidential biographies "aimed at a popular rather than scholarly audience has surged onto bestseller lists." A dozen or so presidential books by David McCullough, Joseph J. Ellis, Doris Kearns Goodwin, Richard Reeves, Robert Dallek, Robert A. Caro and Edmund Morris "have spent about 300 weeks combined on the USA Today list of 150 bestselling hardcover and paperback books."

Clinton Says Presidents Shared Common Vision Of A "More Perfect Union." Rob Brownstein writes in the Financial Times (2/20) that the "popular success of these biographies reflects the resurgence of the presidency as the central focus in US political life since Ronald Reagan's election in 1980." Former President Bill Clinton "probably consumed presidential biographies as voraciously as any president. … His largest conclusion, he said, was that the greatest presidents, from Washington and Lincoln to both Theodore and Franklin Roosevelt, shared a common vision of 'a more perfect union' that knit together the country and broadened the circle of opportunity."

Clinton Offers Four Tests For Ranking Presidents. In his column in the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 958K), Ron Brownstein writes about a recent interview with former President Bill Clinton about "his reading, how it affected his approach to the presidency and the way he thinks historians should judge presidents." On "the way historians rank presidents," Clinton said, "I really think the circumstances determine where you are ranked -- whether you have big wars, like the Civil War or World War II. But there are three or four tests you can apply to any president, which are much fairer than ranking them where the deal is rigged based on the time in which they served. First, did they understand their times and articulate a vision of a more perfect union? Did they refrain from abusing their power? Then you have to say, Did they execute (their agenda), and were people better off when they stopped than when they started?"

Oral Histories Of Reagan Available On Internet. The University of Virginia's Miller Center of Public Affairs has compiled oral histories from friends and former advisers of President Ronald Reagan and is making them available on the internet. The Washington Post (2/20, A19, 744K) reports, "In conjunction with the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library, the Miller Center has been interviewing Reagan administration officials since 2001 and recently released more than 2,500 pages of transcripts. The interviewees include such well-known figures as former secretary of state George P. Shultz, former defense secretary Caspar Weinberger, Reagan treasury secretary and White House chief of staff James A. Baker III and longtime Reagan political adviser Stuart Spencer, as well as lesser-known officials who had close access to the president and who provided intimate reminiscences of his presidency. … A link to the transcripts can be found at http://www.millercenter.virginia.edu ."

Former Aides Remember Reagan. The Washington Post (2/20, A19, 744K) runs remembrances of Reagan from former members of his Administration including former Defense Secretary Frank C. Carlucci who discussed

Reagan's "detached style," saying, "When Colin [Powell] succeeded me [as national security adviser], and [Secretary of State] George [Shultz] and I had buried the hatchet, the three of us made a conscious decision. George said: 'Ronald Reagan has had the landing lights on and the flaps down for the last year. Now we're going to have to step up to the plate on foreign policy. The only way it's going to work is for the three of us to agree.' … George and I changed positions a number of times in those meetings because we decided if the three of us agreed, we knew we had Ronald Reagan. That's the way foreign policy was basically conducted. "

Poll Shows Decline In Number Who Back Clinton Bid, Rise In Rice Support. The San Antonio Express-News/Hearst Newspapers (2/20, Powell) reported, "Growing numbers of Americans oppose a presidential bid by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., in 2008 -- and favor a run by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice -- amid broad public willingness to elect a woman president, according to a nationwide poll released Sunday. The Presidents Day survey conducted for Hearst Newspapers by the Siena Research Institute of Siena College in Loudonville, N.Y., covered 1,120 registered voters and was completed Feb. 10. Some 48 percent of survey participants said Rice 'should run' for president at the conclusion of President Bush's two terms -- an increase of 6 percentage points over a similar survey a year ago. Meanwhile, "44 percent of survey respondents now say Clinton 'should not run' for president in 2008 -- up from 37 percent who felt that way last year. The percentage of registered voters who say Clinton 'should run' slipped from 53 percent to 51 percent over the past year, as support for a Rice candidacy increased, from 42 percent to 48 percent. The survey found 79 percent of participants were willing to vote for a woman as president and 64 percent said the nation is 'ready' for one. … The margin of error for the survey in both years was 2.9 percentage points."

The New York Daily News (2/21, Mahoney, 729K) notes that Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf said the Siena survey should be another reminder that Clinton "needs to begin stressing populist messages on improving the economy. … 'She needs to do better with white Catholic men from the Midwest,' Sheinkopf said."

Santorum Mortgage From Philadelphia Bank Raises Eyebrows. In a largely negative article, the Philadelphia Daily News (2/21, Bunch) reports that Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum (R) "and his wife received a $500,000, five-year mortgage for their Leesburg, Va., home from a small, private Philadelphia bank run by a major campaign donor -- even though its stated policy is to make loans only to its 'affluent' investors, which the senator is not. Good-government experts said the mortgage from The Philadelphia Trust Co." would "be a violation of the Senate's ethics rules if Santorum received something a regular citizen could not get." Records show that since 1998, Philadelphia Trust's "executives, directors and their spouses have donated $24,000 either to the senator's campaign or to the America's Foundation PAC. Of that total, $13,000 came from the man who signed the mortgage papers -- Philadelphia Trust CEO Michael Crofton -- and his wife." Though Philadelphia Trust "advertises itself as an independent private bank for 'affluent investors' -- who have liquid assets of at least $250,000," Santorum "has never held an investment portfolio with Philadelphia Trust. And in 2002, the year he obtained the mortgage, the value range he gave for his small number of investments could not have exceeded $140,000."

California Bar Exam Seen As One Of Nation's Toughest. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Dolan) reports, "Former San Francisco Board of Supervisors President Angela Alioto won't even say how many times she failed the California bar examination before she finally was licensed to practice law. … 'Consider it to be several,' said the antidiscrimination lawyer and daughter of the late, famed antitrust lawyer, Joseph Alioto. … 'And understand,' she quickly added, 'that for the last two years in a row I have been nominated as a national trial lawyer of the year.'" The Times continues, "Add two former governors, an eminent legal scholar and a former state Supreme Court justice to the ranks of those, like Alioto, who learned the hard way that obtaining a license to practice law in California is hard. In fact, it's harder than in almost every other state." The Times adds, "Of the 5,260 people expected to take the state's bar examination beginning Tuesday, more than half are likely to fail, rates from previous years indicate. Some law school graduates, like Alioto, flunk the bar multiple times before finally passing and becoming lawyers. … Failing the bar can be a crushing and humiliating experience, particularly when the applicant has spent months studying or is unaccustomed to failure. … Kathleen Sullivan, former dean of Stanford Law School and a former Harvard Law School professor, is considered such a legal superstar that news of her flunking the California bar last year made the front page of the Wall Street Journal. Sullivan remains a full law professor at Stanford and is associated with a private law firm. … Sullivan's failure, while a surprise to the legal community, attests to the exam's challenge. California's bar 'is one of the most difficult,' said Erica Moeser, president of the National Conference of Bar Examiners. … The three-day test is longer than other states' exams. The score needed to pass also is one of the highest, a factor Moeser believes may explain why applicants are significantly more successful in New York than in California, the states with the largest numbers of people taking the bar."

Man Finally Practicing Law After 48 Bar Attempts. The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Dolan) reports, "The record for most attempts at passing the California bar exam may be held by Maxcy Filer, 75, who took the exam 48 times. He estimates that he spent about $150,000 on bar preparation classes, motels and test fees from 1966 to 1991, when he finally passed. Filer now practices law in Compton and takes 'anything that walks in the door except bankruptcy and probate.'" The Times adds, "The lawyer's hurdles are not over, however. Last year, Filer got into trouble with the bar for failing to file a required document in a legal case. … The bar placed him on probation and ordered him to take and pass a two-hour test on legal ethics and rules of professional conduct."

AMA To Develop Performance Standards. The AMA has signed an agreement with Congress to draft more than 100 standard measures of performance which doctors will report to the federal government. The New York Times (2/21, Pear, 1.19M) reports, "The deal comes as the Bush administration pushes "pay for performance" arrangements with various health care providers in an effort to publicize their performance and link Medicare payment to quality. And it mirrors efforts in the private sector, where consumer groups, insurance companies and large employers who pay for health care are demanding more information on the quality of care."

Rice Works Phones Before Mideast Trip. On the eve of her departure for the Middle East, Reuters (2/21) reports, Secretary Rice "spoke on Monday with key foreign mediators in the Palestinian peace process after Israel stepped up pressure on the new Hamas-dominated Palestinian parliament by halting tax transfers. State Department spokesman Noel Clay said Rice held discussions with her counterparts in the Quartet -- big-power mediators the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations." USA Today/AP (2/21, Lester) also reports "Monday's conversations between Rice and representatives of Russia, the European Union and the United Nations 'covered issues of support to the Palestinian people,' State Department spokesman Noel Clay said."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, LaFranchi, 61K) notes Secretary Rice, "arrives in Cairo Tuesday on the first stop of a trip aimed at addressing the delicate issue of Hamas -- with decisions pending on dealing with the Palestinian Authority that are as portentous as almost any the Bush administration has made on Middle East affairs. How the administration handles the militant group's role in a Palestinian government will permeate President Bush's democratization program for the Middle East. ... And if the United States gets the Hamas riddle wrong, it could set back the war on terror by buoying the cause of Islamic radicalism across the Muslim world."

In a separate story, Reuters (2/21) reports Egypt will advise Rice "to give the Palestinian militant group Hamas more time and not to rush to judgment when Hamas forms a government, the state new agency MENA said on Monday." Quoting a diplomatic source, the state news agency reported, "Egypt will assert during the talks (with Rice) that it is important to give the Hamas movement a chance and time when it forms the government and not to rush to make judgments on it."

Meanwhile, contrasting US calls for reductions in aid to a Hamas-led Palestinian government, the Washington Post (2/21, A10, Wilson, 744K) notes, "Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, called on Muslim nations Monday to fund the Palestinian government after Hamas takes control of the cabinet." Khamenei is quoted saying, "The only way to succeed is to continue resistance against the occupier regime." The AP (2/21, Nasrawi) reports Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood made similar calls.

Hamas Premier Pick Will Extend Olive Branch To Fatah. The Washington Times/AP (2/21, Barzak) reports, "Hamas presented a pragmatic former university administrator as its choice for Palestinian prime minister Monday and the Islamic militant group reached out to Fatah and other factions to join a broad-based Cabinet that might stand a chance of gaining international approval. The 43-year-old Haniyeh "told reporters after meeting with Abbas that he would try to form a joint government with Fatah, the traditional Palestinian ruling party that Hamas trounced in the election, 'that can shoulder its responsibilities in the political area and internal issues.' So far, Fatah has refused to join." In a separate story, the AP (2/21, Weizman) calls Haniyeh a "pragmatist who prefers compromise to conflict with Palestinian rivals." Meanwhile, the New York Times (2/21, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "With an Israeli military helicopter circling overhead, Hamas opened talks on Monday with other militant factions on forming the new Palestinian government, a process expected to take at least two weeks."

Former US Official Proposes "Upgrade" Of Israel's Ties To NATO. In a Washington Post (2/21, A15, 744K) op-ed, former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs Ronald Asmus writes, "The best way to provide Israel with that additional security is to upgrade its relationship with the collective defense arm of the West: NATO. Whether that upgraded relationship culminates in membership for Israel or simply a much closer strategic and operational defense relationship can be debated. ... What must be clear is that the West is prepared to match the growing bellicosity against Israel by stepping up its commitment to the existence of the Jewish state."

Exit Polls Following Palestinian Election Were Incorrect. Columnist Carl Bialik writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) that exit polls following last month's Palestinian elections indicated the Fatah ruling party had scored a narrow victory over Hamas. The exit polls "had missed badly, far worse than, for instance, exit polls for the 2000 and 2004 U.S. presidential elections." Two of the pollsters, "who have been reviewing the results since the election, have different explanations. One suspects that Hamas strategically gamed the polling numbers to suppress Fatah worries. But another blames himself for failing to properly analyze the data, a mistake exacerbated by an unusual election system that magnified small differences between the two leading parties."

Arabs Nations Will Push Back On Hamas, Iran During Rice's Visit. As Secretary Rice prepares to visit the Middle East this week, Reuters (2/20, Hudson) reports that she "will face resistance from Arab allies...to enlist their support for a campaign to isolate two US adversaries, Hamas and Iran." Arab powers "such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia oppose Hamas' rejection of peace talks with Israel and fear a nuclear-armed Iran. But they are reluctant to explicitly support America in the Middle East, where US backing for its top ally in the region, Israel, angers many Arabs and clouds governments' cooperation with Washington." According to Reuters, "Complicating her mission, Rice will also make her appeal against a backdrop of deadly anti-Western protests in the Muslim world over cartoons published in Europe of Prophet Mohammad."

In its pre-trip coverage, AFP (2/20) says, "The US administration has made Egypt one of its test cases for the promotion of democracy in the Middle East. Rice said earlier this week that she was 'disappointed' that Mubarak has postponed municipal elections, scheduled to be held in April, for two years. 'The message that I will take to Egypt is that Egypt needs to stay on the democratic course,' she told Arab journalists in an interview. 'It needs to keep pushing ahead on the democratic course.'"

Hamas' Government Likely To Include Technocrats, Academics. Time (2/27, Robinson) examines what sort of rule Hamas is likely to establish. Time reports, "Palestinian insiders say the new government will be stocked with technocrats and academics rather than party ideologues. The job of Prime Minister is likely to go to Ismail Haniya, one of the more moderate top leaders." Hamas leaders "say they intend to impose order on the security apparatus, a move that may spark clashes between loyalists of the two parties."

Arab League Tries To Shore Up Palestinian Funding. In a related story, the AP (2/20, Nasrawi) reports, "The head of the Arab League said Sunday that members would meet this week to hammer out a plan for sending millions of dollars a month to the Palestinian Authority, despite US attempts to stop the flow of money to the new Hamas-led government. Secretary-General Amr Moussa said foreign ministers from several Arab countries were to meet Monday in Algiers to examine a plan to send about $50 million a month to the Palestinian Authority." According to the AP, "The money is part of Palestinian funding the Arab League approved last year — before Hamas' election victory."

Israeli Cabinet Cuts Off Tax Flow To Palestinians. After a Hamas-dominated legislature was sworn in on Saturday, the New York Times (2/20, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "The Israeli cabinet decided Sunday to immediately freeze the transfer of about $50 million a month in tax and customs receipts due to the Palestinian Authority." Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was quoted as saying, "It is clear that in the light of the Hamas majority in the parliament and the instructions to form a new government that were given to the head of Hamas, the Palestinian Authority is in practice becoming a terrorist authority. ... The state of Israel will not agree to this." The Washington Post (2/20, A1, Wilson, 744K) notes that "some of the more harsh options" were not included, "including barring Palestinians in the Gaza Strip with work permits from entering Israel for jobs. But together, the measures threaten to collapse the nearly bankrupt Palestinian government." The move by Israel "puts it at odds with ... the quartet. ... The group had recommended that Israel continue the transfers, an arrangement established under the 1993 Oslo accords, until Hamas forms the new cabinet," which should happen within five weeks. USA Today (2/20, Gutman, 2.31M), Los Angeles Times (2/20, Ellingwood, 958K) and Washington Times (2/20, Mitnick, 90K) run similar stories.

Meanwhile, USA Today (2/20, 2.31M) editorializes, "For all the disappointment that elections brought Islamists to power, the smart approach is to try to make Hamas accountable to the Palestinian people." That "requires patience and wisdom in a volatile situation -- and not doing anything rash that would allow Hamas leaders to make the United States a scapegoat for their own failings."

Haniya Will Be Palestinian Premier. AFP (2/20) reports, "The radical Islamist movement Hamas has chosen Ismail Haniya to be the next Palestinian prime minister after its recent landslide election win, the spokesman for their bloc in parliament has said." President Mahmoud Abbas was to be notified of the move by Hamas late Sunday.

Carter Urges Consideration Of Palestinian People. In an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/20, A21, 744K), former President Jimmy Carter writes, "During this time of fluidity in the formation of the new government, it is important that Israel and the United States play positive roles. Any tacit or formal collusion between the two powers to disrupt the process by punishing the Palestinian people could be counterproductive and have devastating consequences." He concludes, "It would not violate any political principles to at least give the Palestinians their own money; let humanitarian assistance continue through UN and private agencies; encourage Russia, Egypt and other nations to exert maximum influence on Hamas to moderate its negative policies; and support President Abbas in his efforts to ease tension, avoid violence and explore steps toward a lasting peace."

Bush Administration "Muddling" Toward Compromise In Middle East. Newsweek (2/27, Hirsh, Peraino) examines the Bush Administration's "grand democracy project in the Mideast." US officials "say they have no common strategy for handling the various Islamist parties flourishing in the newly tilled democratic soil of the Middle East." The Administration "is muddling its way toward compromise solutions."

Syria Condemns US "Interference" In Its Domestic Affairs. The Washington Times (2/20, Mount, 90K) reports the government of Syria "condemned U.S. plans to fund opposition groups." The Times notes that the State Department announced on Friday "that it had allocated $5 million to unidentified 'democratic reformers' in Syria. Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moualem complained that "It is interference in our internal affairs."

US Ambassador To Iraq Says Iran Aiding Insurgents. The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Hernandez, 744K) reports, "The US ambassador to Iraq accused Iran on Monday of providing weapons, training and support to Iraqi militia and insurgent groups responsible for the country's continuing violence and instability." At a news conference, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "criticized what he called Iran's 'negative role' in Iraqi affairs, saying the country's diplomatic relationship with its neighbor was tainted by a policy 'to work with militias, to work with extremist groups, to provide training and weapons.' He added that there was evidence the Iranians provided 'indirect help' to Sunni Arab insurgents who attack US and Iraqi government troops." Khalilzad's remarks "were unusually blunt." The Los Angeles Times (2/21, Stack, 958K) called the comments "unusually sharp. In the past, American diplomats in Baghdad have generally avoided overt, public criticisms of Iran. Instead, they stuck to vague grumblings about 'neighboring countries.'"

Iran-Russia Enrichment Talks Stall. The New York Times (2/21, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "A Russian effort to forge a compromise over Iran's nuclear program stalled Monday after five hours of talks in the Kremlin ended inconclusively" and "senior officials on both sides played down the prospects of agreement before a meeting of the [IAEA] on March 6 about whether Iran's nuclear program should be forwarded to the United Nations Security Council for possible punitive action." The Washington Post (2/21, A10, Finn, 744K) cites RIA Novosti as reporting, "But even as the nearly five-hour talks in Moscow were underway, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Iran would proceed with its nuclear research." Mottaki is quoted saying, "If we reach some compromise, we continue our cooperation from where we are now. That is, the research department will continue its activity." A late Reuters (2/21) story reports an Interfax news agency claim that Iranian negotiators "were poised to leave Moscow on Tuesday with no word of any progress" on the Russian proposal. Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov publicly warned the press Tuesday not to assume the talks were finished.

Bolton Says Iran Nuclear Issues Can Be Resolved Diplomatically. Time (2/27, Shannon, Ratnesar) interviews John Bolton, US Ambassador to the United Nations. Asked if the issue of Iran's nuclear program can be resolved diplomatically, Bolton said, "Sure. I never would have guessed that Libya was prepared to make the calculation that they were safer giving up the pursuit of nuclear weapons than continuing to go after them, and yet they did [give them up]. And that led to substantial progress in the relationship between Libya and the United States. If Libya can do it, Iran can do it too. That's why I say the decision ultimately is largely in their hands."

Pakistani Government Cracks Down On Cartoon Protestors. The AP (2/20) reports that protests over blasphemous cartoons in Islamabad, Pakistan were met with "hundreds" of arrests as Pakistani security forces "virtually sealed off the capital and used gunfire and tear gas." Pakistani authorities "declared they would arrest anyone joining a gathering of more than five people." Qazi Hussain Ahmad, leader of the Islamic opposition coalition, "was confined to his Lahore residence."

The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Lancaster, 744K) notes that "In keeping with the pattern elsewhere in Pakistan, protesters directed as much of their anger at Musharraf and his main Western ally, the United States, as they did at the newspaper cartoons and the Danish newspaper that printed them." The Post claims the violence yesterday was the worst "since the cartoon controversy erupted in late January" and "came after a week of sometimes violent protests in other Pakistani cities that left five people dead and scores of businesses, many of them Western franchises, in ruins."

Second Russian Newspaper To Close Over Muslim Cartoons. A second Russian newspaper has announced that it will close on the wake of protests over cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad. The New York Times (2/21, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The newspaper, Our Region, based in Vologda, north of Moscow, which printed its illustration last Wednesday, was the first in Russia to publish, at least in part, the Danish cartoons. The publication prompted criticism from public officials, an apology from the local governor and a criminal investigation into the paper's activity."

Pakistan Riots Elevate Security Concerns For Bush Visit. U.S. News and World Report (2/27, Omestad) reports that turmoil in Pakistan over European cartoons satirizing the prophet Muhammad have elevated the "already high security concerns surrounding President Bush's scheduled visit here next week, and it highlights the political pressures on [Pakistani President Pervez] Musharraf from Islamists and others critical of his support for American antiterrorism efforts." US News adds that the Bush Administration "has been pushing Musharraf to keep moving toward a restoration of full democracy -- but not too hard. … Washington's jitters over a Pakistan without the general are barely concealed. … Critics insist that Washington is shortsighted in not backing democratic political parties and is alienating Pakistanis incensed at civilian deaths in the war on terrorism."

Australian PM Criticizes "Segments" Of Muslim Community. In comments published yesterday, Australian Prime Minister John Howard said some segments of the Islamic community are "utterly antagonistic" to Australian society. The AP (2/21, Foley) reports that the remarks "immediately drew criticism from a Muslim group." Later Monday, Howard stood by the remarks in which he also "denounced 'extreme attitudes' held by some Muslims, including their views on women and support of jihad, or holy war." Agence France Presse (2/21) reports, "Islamic leaders immediately condemned the remarks as 'offensive and ignorant', saying they would fan the flames of prejudice against Islam."

Bolton Pushes Annan For Broader-Based Darfur Force. Reuters (2/21, Leopold) reports, "US Ambassador John Bolton said on Monday that Secretary-General Kofi Annan should be pushing UN officials harder in planning a force in Sudan's Darfur region rather than just lobbying the United States for contributions. 'It would be helpful, I think, if the secretary-general, in addition to prodding the US, could also be out there talking to the African Union and the Arab League, and in fact, even talking to his own peacekeepers about the importance of moving ahead here,' Bolton told reporters. When told of Bolton's remarks, Annan said, 'I'm not going to answer that.' But his spokesman Stephane Dujarric said the UN 'planning process was moving full speed ahead.'" Meanwhile, the AP (2/21) notes, "Sudan told a visiting US delegation that it opposed a proposal to deploy international peacekeepers to the troubled Darfur region and that it was committed to negotiations to end the tensions there." Vice-President Ali Osman Mohamed Taha is quoted as saying, "Sudan rejects replacement of the African Union forces with United Nations forces."

Trade Deficit Seen As Impetus For Administration Hard-Line On Chinese Currency. The Financial Times (2/20, Balls, Alden) reports that the US government is increasing pressure on the Chinese government to allow its currency to "rise against the dollar," and notes there are "threats growing in Congress to consider legislation aimed at slowing the burgeoning US trade deficit with China." According to the Times, the Bush administration is "disappointed" the renminbi has only been "allowed to rise by less than 1 per cent against the dollar" since July when the US successfully petitioned for revaluation. Wu Xiaoling, vice-governor of the People's Bank of China, "admitted that Beijing needed to open its capital account further."

The Wall Street Journal (2/20, Browne, Phillips, 2.11M) says on its website that the Administration "is sending signals that it is ready to take a harder line with Beijing" and attributes the new stridency to "political pressure on the administration from members of Congress, who say American jobs are being lost to the tide of inexpensive Chinese imports and the flight of manufacturing to China." The Journal notes US Trade Representative Rob Portman "announced a task force to take up complaints about unfair Chinese trade practices" and the Treasury Department, "which has so far sought to avoid confrontation with Beijing over the currency issue, is preparing the ground for a possible decision to label China a 'currency manipulator,' in a regular review scheduled for April."

Asian Shoemakers Prepare To Fight EU Tariffs. Shoemakers in China and Vietnam are joining forces to fight the EU's proposed double-digit tariffs on shoe imports. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Fong, 2.11M) reports, "The European Commission, finding evidence of dumping, is expected to recommend duties on imports of Chinese and Vietnamese shoes with leather uppers starting at 4% in April and rising to a little under 20% in the fall. EU officials confirmed yesterday that they will submit their plans to EU member nations on Thursday."

Blogs Have Undermined China's Ability To Control Who Addresses Public. A front page story in the Washington Post (2/21, A1, Pan, 744K) reports that with 16 million people in China writing blogs, "the Internet has provided a platform for citizens to express their views, shattering the Communist Party's monopoly on the media. The state still controls newspaper, magazine and book publishing, but the proliferation of sites that let users publish and even broadcast audio and video online have undermined the party's ability to restrict who can address the public and attract an audience."

Smith Bill Would Restrict Business With Countries That Censor Web Content. U.S. News and World Report

(2/27, Brush) reports on US web companies such as Microsoft, Google and Yahoo which have agreed to filter their search results in order to provide service in China. US News reports that Rep. Chris Smith has introduced legislation to restrict business with countries that censor online material. Smith's bill "would require US companies to locate their computer hardware outside China, create a basic code of conduct for Internet companies doing business in repressive countries, curtail tech exports to countries with censorship policies, and create a State Department office of Internet freedom. The State Department announced such a task force last week."

Nigerian Militants Attack Pipeline, Threaten More Violence. Nigerian militants yesterday launched attacks on an oil pipeline and a boat in Nigeria's delta region. The AP (2/21, Harris) reports, "There were no reported casualties in the attacks Monday on a Shell-oil operated oil pipeline switching station and a boat the militants claimed housed Nigerian military personnel. … Shell Spokeswoman Lisa Givert confirmed the oil-pipeline attack and said the houseboat was abandoned when the attackers blew it up."

Reuters (2/21, Ekeinde) reports, "The militants, who are holding nine foreign hostages, vowed to prevent Royal Dutch Shell from using the damaged Forcados tanker loading platform, which accounts for 15 percent of Nigerian exports, and threatened an even more devastating series of attacks on the whole region."

NBC Nightly News (2/20, story 6, 0:25, Williams) reported, "Since the beginning of the sabotage campaign last week, Nigerian production has been cut off by 1/5. Crude prices in London jumped more than $1.50 and there is great concern about a spike in prices when the US markets reopen tomorrow."

The Financial Times (2/20, Mahtani, Hoyos) reports Nigerian militants "threatened to extend their disruption of the country's oil industry to attacks on oil tankers." Over the weekend, militants carried out a series of attacks and kidnappings that caused the shutdown of an oilfield and Royal Dutch Shell to close one of its export terminals. The attacks "have led to a 25 per cent cut in oil exports from the world's eighth biggest crude exporter, a reduction likely to put upward pressure on prices when markets reopen today."

The Washington Post (2/20, A11, Chidi, 744K) reports the militants "asserted responsibility…for a series of raids, including one in which militants abducted three Americans, two Egyptians, two Thais, a Briton and a Filipino.'

Haitian President-Elect Has Yet To Give Victory Address. The New York Times (2/20, Thompson, 1.19M) reports that though Haitian President-elect René Préval was declared the winner of his country's presidential election Thursday he "has not yet officially addressed the nation, and he has not yet granted interviews." Préval "faces questions about the legitimacy of the back-room deal brokered by foreign diplomats that ended the possibility of a runoff and made him the victor."

Préval Distances Himself From Aristide. The Los Angeles Times (2/20, Williams, 958K) reports Préval's frequent appearances with Robert Manuel, national security chief during Préval's first administration, are seen as proof that Préval is no longer beholden to Jean-Bertrand Aristide because Aristide's associates forced Manuel into exile after he uncovered their connections to drug dealers. According to the Times, "Préval appears to be sending a message that Aristide shouldn't count on an invitation to return home any time soon."

Preval Inherits "Quagmire" Of Poverty, Violence In Haiti. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Roig-Franzia, 744K) reports that Renee Preval will wade into a "quagmire" next month when he is sworn in as Haiti's president. Preval "will be forced to confront the problems of a nation with almost no functioning judicial system, corrupt and inept law enforcement, deep poverty and abominable public sanitation. Then there are the violent gangs that rule urban slums, the kidnapping rings and a flourishing drug and money-laundering trade."

LATimes Says US Should Increase Haitian Aid. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/20, 958K) says that "President Bush should ramp up aid to Haiti" because if Preval's government fails, "boatloads of Haitians could once again begin washing up on Florida's shores," which could lead to increased drug trafficking into the US. President Bush should also be concerned with the "possibility that Venezuelan President Chavez…may decide to share some of his oil wealth with Haiti's poor, thus competing with Washington for influence in our hemisphere. But the primary reason we should help Haiti is that it is a humanitarian disgrace on our doorstep."

Administration Tries To Improve Relations With Bolivian President. The Washington Post (2/21, A9, Constable, 744K) reports that the Bush Administration is hoping Bolivian President Evo Morales, an "avowed leftist," is "a man with whom it can do business." The Post adds, 'In reaching out to Morales despite his antagonistic track record, and despite strong objections from some quarters of the U.S. government, analysts said, the Bush administration is trying to avoid mistakes that have been made with two other countries: Venezuela and Afghanistan. … Cultivating Morales, analysts said, would show that Washington has the confidence to distinguish between nominal and real adversaries, while combating many Bolivians' mistrust of U.S. motives."

European Authorities Worried Over Spread Of Avian Flu. NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 7, 0:30, Williams) reported, "There are real and spreading concerns here in Europe over bird flu. Today in Germany, the new chancellor there visited a region where the flu has been spreading. French authorities testing more birds in an affected area, searching anyone who could be carrying poultry and British officials are warning the public to be vigilant."

India Undertaking Massive Poultry Slaughter. The Wall Street Journal (2/20, 2.11M) reports on its website the Indian government has begun slaughtering "hundreds of thousands" of chickens after reporting its first bird-flu cases. Additionally the government "said yesterday it had found no case of human avian influenza after preliminary tests on a dead farmer earlier suspected to have been the country's first human victim of the disease."

European Poultry Industry Faces Ruin. The Washington Post (2/20, A14, Solanki, 744K) reports European poultry farmers say consumption has already fallen dramatically "and caused hundreds of millions of dollars in losses."

Experts Alarmed By The Flu's Rapid Dissemination. The New York Times (2/20, Kumar, Rosenthal, 1.19M) notes that health experts have predicted "widespread dissemination" of avian flu "for about half a year. … But the recent acceleration has perplexed many experts, who had watched the A(H5N1) virus stick to its native ground in Asia for nearly five years.

India Slaughters Chickens Following Bird Flu Reports. India has slaughtered thousands of chickens following reports of avian influenza. The New York Times (2/21, Kumar, Bowley, 1.19M) reports that "as state animal husbandry workers went about culling birds here on Monday, poultry farm owners hovered nearby, some angrily disputing the government's conclusions that large-scale poultry deaths in the area were the result of bird flu."

The Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) reports, "Health officials began a door-to-door check in western India for signs of people infected with the H5N1 bird-flu virus, as a massive poultry-slaughtering operation entered its second day. Six people, including three young children, with flu-like symptoms were hospitalized yesterday, joining a woman and a child who were placed in an isolation ward the previous day."

NYTimes Urges Aid To Fight Bird Flu In Africa. The New York Times (2/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "Bird flu has spread to several new countries in recent days, but the most worrisome by far is Nigeria. Health experts have dreaded the arrival of avian flu in Africa, a continent where the backyard chicken is everywhere and veterinary health systems are nowhere. … Rich countries should be sending platoons of veterinary experts to help Nigeria and its neighbors."

US Prepared To Begin Direct Trade With Turkish Cypriots. The US is prepared to begin direct trade with northern Cyprus for the first time in 30 years. The Washington Times (2/21, Kralev, 90K) reports that the Greek-Cypriot government in Nicosia opposes some of the steps the US is prepared to take "as 'creeping recognition' by the Greek-Cypriot government in Nicosia. … Washington and London have called for permitting direct trade to pass through northern Cypriot ports, while Nicosia wants the goods to be taken by truck to southern ports controlled by the internationally recognized Republic of Cyprus government. Opening ports in the north would be de facto recognition of a Turkish-Cypriot state, said Euripides Evriviades, the Cypriot ambassador in Washington."

British Historian Pleads Guilty To Denying Holocaust. British historian David Irving pleaded guilty yesterday to denying the Holocaust, conceding that he wrongly said there were no Nazi gas chambers in the Auschwitz concentration camp. The Washington Times/AP (2/21, Oleksyn) reports that Irving "was sentenced to three years in prison." Irving "has been in custody since his November arrest on charges stemming from two speeches that he gave in Austria in 1989 in which he was accused of denying the Nazis' extermination of 6 million Jews. He has contended that most of those who died at concentration camps such as Auschwitz succumbed to diseases such as typhus rather than execution." The New York Times also runs the AP story this morning.

Germany Resists US Effort To Open Holocaust Files. The New York Times (2/20, Cohen, 1.19M) reports that the US government's "demand" to open "a huge repository of information about the Holocaust contained in the files of the International Tracing Service" has been met with resistance by German officials concerned about breaches of privacy.

Senators Urge Code Of Conduct For Doing Business With Repressive Regimes. Sens. John McCain and Jon Kyl write in USA Today (2/21, 2.31M), "The free flow of information has always threatened repressive regimes, and dictators have always sought to restrict it. The Internet is a new challenge for these regimes because it empowers with information and speech any person who can access the network." McCain and Kyl add, "We believe that American companies must develop and agree to abide by a code of conduct governing their interactions with repressive regimes, and we applaud the suggestion by some companies that they will consider such a step. … There is every hope in the Congress that U.S. companies will take action on their own. But however this problem is solved, it's clear that something must change. Americans stand with those who oppose tyranny, not those who promote it."

WPost Criticizes Administration Response To Egyptian Election Postponements. An editorial in the Washington Post (2/21, A14, 744K) says Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak tried and failed twice last year "to stage a democratic election that would impress the Bush administration as credible without risking his hold on power." Mubarak "figures that the tide in Washington has turned against President Bush's democracy policy. … The election-quashing prompted only a tepid statement from Ms. Rice's spokesman, who said the administration opposed the postponement of elections 'as a matter of principle' but added, in an echo of the administration's critics, that 'democracy is not only about elections.'"

Analysts Say Chavez Intensifying Anti-US Rhetoric Ahead Of Elections. The Financial Times (2/21, Webb-Vidal) reports on 'the saga of deteriorating ties between the US and Venezuela." Over the weekend, Venezuela President Hugo Chávez warned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "against trying to build an international alliance to curb his government's expanding tentacles of influence across Latin America. … On Friday, he insisted that the US would receive 'no more oil' if it 'crossed the line' in its supposed efforts to undermine his 'revolution.'" Analysts "believe some of the recent provocations come because Mr Chávez is seeking to radicalise his anti-imperialist credentials ahead of elections in December."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/21, Sreeharsha, 61K) reports that Chavez "as spent much of this month warning of a possible US invasion, preparing a citizen army, and lambasting President Bush. His rhetoric has made him a darling of leftists worldwide. Yet, ordinary Venezuelans...are growing increasingly frustrated with the country's inadequate housing, under-resourced public hospitals, and damaged roads."

Chavez Taunts Rice. In a story picked up by three wire services, AFP (2/20) reports, "Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez launched a new verbal attack against US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, bluntly warning her: 'Don't mess with me, girl'" during his weekly "Hello President" television show. Chavez "has taken potshots at Rice since she called last week for an international 'united front' against Venezuela and described the leftist leader as a 'challenge to democracy' in Latin America." AFP later reports Chavez "has called" President George W. Bush 'Mr. Danger.'"

Marines Aid Rescue Efforts After Mudslide Hits Philippine Town. US Marines are assisting the efforts to aid victims of the mudslide on the island of Leyte in the Philippines. The story was the lead on both CBS and NBC last night. The CBS Evening News (2/19, lead story, 2:05, Mitchell) reported, "American Marines are in the Philippines where they spent the day digging for survivors from that huge mudslide that wiped away an entire village. As many as 1800 people may have been killed." CBS (Petersen) added the Marines "brought in what will be the first of waves of supplies, and as many as a thousand Marines are being made available from US ships in the Philippines on military exercises. Despite the sheer scope of the devastation, the Marines were confident they can help."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, lead story, 2:30, Potter) reported that the Marines "will help with relief efforts and will play a major role in the hunt for victims."

Failing To Reach Nuclear Agreement Could Hinder US-India Relations. Henry Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center in Washington, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/21, 2.11M) that as the Bush Administration prepares for the President's visit to India, it must "resist making a proposed civilian nuclear cooperation deal the primary theme of future relations with India, or one that requires immediate agreement. Indeed, failing to get this nuclear deal right could not only encumber improved U.S.-India relations, but aggravate the very security threats…that we are seeking India's help to mitigate."

Bush Administration Critic Is Daughter Of Indian PM. The Wall Street Journal (2/21, Wonacott, 2.11M) reports that ACLU staff attorney and Bush Administration critic Amrit Singh is also "the youngest daughter of Manmohan Singh, prime minister of India. Mr. Singh, 73 years old, will host President Bush at a summit in New Delhi early next month. While the soft-spoken Indian prime minister and his daughter share views on many issues, according to acquaintances, their public personas stand on opposite sides of the debate over the Bush administration's foreign policy."

At Least 66 Mexican Coal Miners Trapped After Explosion. The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 2, :15, Mitchell) reported, "Rescuers in northern Mexico are trying to reach at least 66 miners trapped after a coal mine explosion."

NBC Nightly News (2/19, story 2, 0:30, Williams) reported, "At least 6 others outside the mine were injured by the same blast. Officials say the miners are about 1,000 feet underground with limited oxygen, putting their lives in extreme danger."

Thousands Of Irish Immigrants Leaving The US. The Washington Post (2/20, A3, Garcia, 744K) reports the "Irish immigration boom that revitalized neighborhoods across New York over the past two decades" has been halted by stepped-up immigration law enforcement post-9/11. The Irish government "estimates that about 14,000 Irish returned from the United States since 2001." The Census Bureau reported "between 2000 and 2004, the Irish population throughout the United States shrank by 28,500 people, to 128,000."

Ten Killed In Crash Of Marine Helicopters At Horn Of Africa. The CBS Evening News (2/19, story 4, :15, Mitchell) reported, "The US military confirmed today that ten crew members were killed in Friday's crash of two Marine helicopters off Djibouti on the Horn of Africa. Rescuers picked up two men from the water. The helicopters were on a training mission when they crashed."

Canadian Provinces Allow Some Private Health Insurance. The New York Times (2/20, Krauss, 1.19M) reports Quebec "proposed to lift a ban on private health insurance for several elective surgical procedures, and announced that it would pay for such surgeries at private clinics when waiting times at public facilities were unreasonable." The proposal "came in response to a Supreme Court decision last June that struck down a provincial law that banned private medical insurance." Prime Minister Stephen Harper "is thought to favor the Supreme Court decision and will probably try to use it to encourage changes."

Wolfowitz's Campaign Against Corruption Noted. The Washington Post's Sebastian Mallaby (2/20) writes that after nine months as president of the World Bank, Paul Wolfowitz "has made headlines mainly by provoking a staff backlash." However, Mallaby notes that "In a series of tough decisions, some of which have been widely reported and some of which have not, Wolfowitz has challenged" the bank's approach to government corruption. Wolfowitz "is going to be tough on corruption, and he's going to push this campaign beyond the confines of the World Bank."

SUNDAY SHOW TRANSCRIPTS
2/19/06

NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: nearly six months after Hurricane Katrina, the head of Homeland Security is under intense fire in the U.S. Senate.

(Videotape, February 15, 2006)

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS (R, ME): The response of DHS must be judged a failure.

SEN. JOE LIEBERMAN (D, CT): You had the capability. It wasn't used well.

MR. RUSSERT: And also in the House, where a Republican investigation concludes there was a failure of initiative and a failure of leadership at every level of government. Can he restore confidence in his leadership? With us, the Secretary of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff.

Then, four days after he accidentally shoots his hunting partner, Vice President Cheney breaks his silence.

(Videotape, February 15, 2006)

VICE PRES. DICK CHENEY: I'm the guy who pulled the trigger that fired the round that hit Harry. It was, I'd have to say, one of the worst days of my life.

MR. RUSSERT: Did the vice president handle this situation properly? And was the media coverage appropriate? With us: New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, Wall Street Journal editorial page editor Paul Gigot, NBC News chief White House correspondent David Gregory, and the former counselor to Mr. Cheney, Mary Matalin. Dowd, Gigot, Gregory and Matalin square off.

But first, August 29, 2005, Hurricane Katrina devastates the Gulf region. Hundreds of thousands are homeless, more than a thousand die. The secretary of Homeland Security was in charge of the federal response to that disaster, and he joins us this morning for the first time since that hurricane week.

Welcome, Secretary Michael Chertoff.

SEC'Y MICHAEL CHERTOFF: Good to be here, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: What a week for you, hearings before the Senate and reports from House Republicans. The New Orleans Times-Picayune, the local paper down there, editorialized this: "Katrina was a disaster that had long been feared. The House report, then, is on target when it says that September 11 was a failure of imagination, but Katrina was a failure of initiative and leadership. Those who are responsible should be held accountable. Firing FEMA's Michael Brown was a start. But FEMA was under the Department of Homeland Security—Michael Chertoff's department. The House report concludes that he fulfilled his responsibilities 'late, ineffectively, or not at all.' If that's not grounds for dismissal, what is?" Have you ever considered stepping down?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, you know, like everybody else who is serving in the Cabinet, I serve at the pleasure of the president. And when I took the job, I knew that we had a lot of work to do to mature the department, and I was aware of the fact that something might happen, whether it was a manmade or a terrorist event, before we had a chance to finish the building. So I can't say I had my eyes closed about the challenge in the job. I continue to serve at the pleasure of the president. I think my responsibility is to try to fix the department. And as long as the president wants me to do that, I'm going to continue to stay on the job.

MR. RUSSERT: You haven't had any conversations with his staff about moving on?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, you know, I don't normally talk about conversations with the president or the senior staff. But the president knows that I am there as long as he wants and needs me, and I will work 24/7 to make this department as good as it can be.

MR. RUSSERT: Senate Joe Lieberman of Connecticut at the hearing said this: "Our conclusion is that the Department of Homeland Security had a responsibility to lead the preparation and response to Hurricane Katrina, and let us down. We've invested billions of dollars in the department. It had the capabilities to prepare for and respond to Katrina, and it didn't use them. As a result, a lot of people suffered and, unfortunately, a lot of people died." Does that haunt you?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: It does haunt me because what—it's not the criticism. Because, obviously, some of the criticism is obviously helpful. Some of it I don't agree with. But what does stick with me is the image of people who unnecessarily suffered because of delays in getting them evacuated. There was some tremendous success stories. I actually was very worried the first couple of days about rescues. I was worried, how were you going to get thousands and tens of thousands of people who are trapped in attics out of those attics? And there the Coast Guard and other parts of the department performed magnificently. But in the evacuation, I think we really fell short. And that's certainly something which I will always carry with me and something which I'm determined to fix, particularly as we come into hurricane season this year, which is just a hundred days away.

MR. RUSSERT: When you were last on, a few days after the hurricane began, you said that the levees were breached early Tuesday morning. We now learn that in fact it was around Monday morning at 8:30 that people were first notified the levees had breached. Why were you out of the loop?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, actually, I think what I said is that they'd been breached over night, Monday night. And we now know the levees began to be breached Monday morning. I think that the principle levee breach, 17th Street, we still haven't pinpointed the exact time of the breach.

This was really the biggest failure, I think, of the department in Katrina was the inability to get ground troops from New Orleans. The fact that we didn't have assets on the ground, trained people, proper equipment, to immediately send back messages about what was going on. And that's one thing we have already begun to fix. We've trained and recruited law enforcement personnel. We are acquiring the kinds of very sophisticated satellite gear that let us beam things directly back to headquarters. We've got better aerial assets, and we're integrating better with the military in terms of things like satellite capability and overflying P3s and other kinds of aircraft.

MR. RUSSERT: But FEMA knew on Monday morning that a levee had been breached. I was somewhat taken back by this testimony from Michael Brown before the Senate. "Question: You're telling us that a conversation directly with Secretary Chertoff would not have produced any kind of worthwhile results? Brown: No, it would have wasted my time."

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: I think that was a big mistake on Mike Brown's part. I mean, we had the ability to bring in all kinds of assets at the department. On the Sunday before the hurricane struck, I sat on a video conference and heard everybody go through the very extensive list of supplies that had been pre- positioned. And at the end, I asked two questions, I said, "Is there anything you need from us, Coast Guard, law enforcement, anything that you don't have?" And I was told, "We've got everything we need." And I asked about the Department of Defense, I said, "Is there something we need to do to help you there?" And was told that the Department of Defense was sitting at the table, and they were engaged.

I think that had we gotten earlier notice, we could have done more to help. But I also think, Tim, we have to acknowledge that this hurricane was simply overwhelming, and you will never have a catastrophe of this magnitude that will not have its problems and not have its suffering and not have its pain. So we aspire to do a lot better, but we also have to be realistic about the nature of the challenge.

MR. RUSSERT: But the Thursday of the hurricane, four, five days into it, you began to have your doubts about FEMA and its leadership, and this is what you said before the Congress.

(Videotape, February 15, 2006)

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Thursday night, I began to—I asked myself, "Are we dealing with a situation where it's not just the inherent, overwhelming challenge, but that maybe, despite good intentions, Mr. Brown is really not up to this."

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: "Mike Brown not up to this." The very next day, the president came down to the Gulf region, and here you are on the screen—right of the screen in the purple shirt, Mr. Brown in the middle, the president on the left. And this is where the president uttered these now-infamous words. Let's listen.

(Videotape, September 2, 2005)

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job.

MR. RUSSERT: The president is saying he's doing a heck of a job; the night before, you're saying, "I don't think the guy's up to it." Why didn't you tell the president?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, again, I never get into conversations with the president. But I do think the context of that remark is that Brown had been up for, you know, practically every night for the last few days. I think whatever my judgment was about whether his skills were matched to the challenge, I think certainly everybody believed at that point he was doing his best. And I think this is really an effort to kind of buck the troops up, recognize the fact that everybody was really exhausted and working hard. And the fact is, we were in the middle—still very much in the middle of the event, and we needed to keep people's spirits up, so I think you've got to look at this as—in the context of a recognition that everybody was really exhausted and overwhelmed by the nature of the challenge.

MR. RUSSERT: Was it an attempt to spin the American people? Things on the ground were in such stark reality to what the official pronouncements coming out of the government were?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: No, I think—I think, you know, when you are in a disaster, you actually look people in the eyes, and you see how they're working their hearts out. And even if it—if they haven't done the kind of job that you wish they could have done. As a human matter, I think you want to reach out, you want to, you know, pat them on the back, you want to buck them up. I don't think that's the time to start to engage in finger pointing or in—in, you know, giving brutal assessments about people's performance.

MR. RUSSERT: Taxpayers are obviously very concerned about where their money's going. There've been a series of reports this week about some of the federal money that was spent on Katrina. The Government Accountability Office said this: "The government squandered millions of dollars in Katrina disaster aid, including handing $2,000 debit cards to people who gave phoney Social Security numbers. Recipients improperly used their debit cards instead—intended for food and shelter for $400 massages, a $450 tattoo, $1100 diamond engagement ring and $150 worth of products at Condoms to Go."

How does that happen?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, let me break this into two parts. Let me first say that there's actually good news in that we have fixed the problem of people being able to call up with phony Social Security card numbers because we've now used—we've engaged a kind of contractor that we used to screen online applications, and we're now using that for telephone applications. So that's one problem we have corrected. The second problem of people misusing funds is kind of a common issue when you deal with disasters. People are entitled by law to receive a certain amount of compensation, money for food, and—and clothing and shelter. Inevitably, some people are going do misuse that. And unless we move to a voucher system, which would be a very cumbersome system, we have to try to balance the urgency of getting people some money so they're not literally left starving and without clothing against the fact that there will always be some scoundrels who will misuse the money or try to defraud us. And those people we obviously need to prosecute and punish.

MR. RUSSERT: There are some misjudgments that were made, however, that were not scoundrels, it appears to be your department. Look at this: "Mobile homes worth hundreds of millions of dollars are deteriorating in a muddy field in Arkansas and may never be used to house victims of Hurricane Katrina because of a dispute over where to install them, federal officials acknowledged. Only about 2700 of the 25,000 mobile homes ordered at a cost of $850 million have been installed, and at least 10,000 are sitting in Hope, Arkansas, according to documents and statements from FEMA officials. Though about 55,000 Louisiana families are still waiting for a manufactured housing unit, the mobile homes may never be used because FEMA regulations prohibit them from being installed in flood-prone coastal areas, federal officials said." $850 million in mobile homes that can't be used.

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, actually, they will be used. The challenge we face is where do we put them. It is true that there are certain parts of Louisiana and Mississippi where you can't put mobile homes because they're in a flood plain. And that's partly by regulation and partly common sense. Because you don't want to put something that's fixed, that's a mobile home, in a place that's going to flood again. We originally hoped that at least some significant number would be placed in other parts of Louisiana and Mississippi. It's turned out that some communities don't want to have that happen, and some people don't want to have that happen. And we're not going to force them to take these mobile homes. We estimate that several thousand more will be used for victims of Katrina and Rita. We are using others for victims of the wildfires out West. Still others will be used this hurricane season. So what we anticipate is that ultimately all of this stock of mobile homes will be used in disaster-related housing efforts.

MR. RUSSERT: But there are still thousands of people who are still homeless?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: There are. And we are—we are procuring trailers as quickly as we can. Now the biggest problem, Tim, is there is just a total shortage of housing in Louisiana. And that is, we've been battling that economic issue for the last six months.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi has said "Enough already." Let's take FEMA out of Homeland Security and report directly to the president. Let FEMA work and deal with hurricanes and natural disasters and let Chertoff and Homeland Security worry about terrorism. Why not do that?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: I think that would be a big mistake for a couple of reasons. First of all, to the extent things worked well in Katrina, it was only because we had a unified department and could get the Coast Guard involved, we could get TSA involved to help us construct an air bridge for evacuation. We would lose all of that extra help if we separated FEMA out. That's the first thing.

Second, catastrophes don't come labeled. Sometimes you know it's a natural disaster, sometimes you know it's a terrorist act, sometimes you don't know. I think the last thing we want to do is to have a situation where we have two parallel agencies fighting over who manages a particular type of a disaster.

Third thing, and I want to say this in the strongest possible terms, we're coming up on hurricane season. Nature doesn't wait for us to do yet another reorganization. If FEMA is pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security, I will predict with virtual certainty that we will be much less prepared this hurricane season than we will be if we keep the department together and finish the job of integrating.

MR. RUSSERT: If a tropical storm, a four or a five, hits New Orleans will the city flood again?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, this I think is a very serious question which I intend to address with the mayor and the governor, and actually the governors of both states in the next month. We are not fully rebuilt. The levees are supposed to be rebuilt by June to a level better than they were before Katrina. But we don't know if there's a dead-on hit, the worst scenario, we could still very easily have flooding. We've got impermanent structures, we'll still have some debris around. So we need to have a plan starting—you know, we need to start to build a plan now about how we will evacuate and take care of people come June 1, and I'm going to be very insistent on making sure my department and DOD are working with state and local government to do that.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to an issue that is confronting Washington, and that is our ports. And this a pretty interesting issue. "A company in the United Arab Emirates is poised to take over significant operations at six American ports as part of a corporate sale, leaving a country with ties to the September 11 hijackers with influence over a maritime industry considered vulnerable to terrorism." This is from the Associated Press.

"The sale would affect commercial U.S. port operations in New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia. Critics of the proposed purpose—purchase say a port operator complicit in smuggling or terrorism could manipulate manifests and other records to frustrate Homeland Security's already limited scrutiny of shipping containers and slip contraband past U.S. Custom inspectors.

Since the September 11 attacks, the FBI has said that money for the September 11 strikes was transferred to the hijackers primarily through the United Arab Emirate's banking system, and much of the operational planning for the attacks took place inside the United Arab Emirates.

Many of the hijackers traveled to the U.S. through the United Arab Emirates. Also, the hijacker who steered a United Airlines flight into the World Trade Center's south tower: born in the United Arab Emirates.

After the attacks, U.S. Treasury Department officials complained about a lack of cooperation by the United Arab Emirates and other Arab countries trying to track Osama bin Laden's bank accounts." Why would we allow a company based in United Arab Emirates be in charge of security for our ports?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, let me make it very clear, first of all. We have a very disciplined process, it's a classified process, for reviewing any acquisition by a foreign company of assets that we consider relevant to national security. That process worked here. Without getting into classified information, what we typically do if there are concerns is we build in certain conditions, or requirements, that the company has to agree to to make sure we address the national security concerns. And here the Coast Guard and Customs and border protection really play the leading role for our department in terms of designing those conditions and making sure that they're obeyed.

I do have to caution people, though. The fact that there were somebody born in United Arab Emirates or that some people went to the United Arab Emirates doesn't mean that every company there is automatically guilty, or automatically has to be excluded from owning something here any more than we...

MR. RUSSERT: But why take a risk?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Well, I mean, you know, Richard Reid was British. He was going to blow up an airliner. We don't say the British can't buy companies here. We don't take a risk. What we do is we require a very careful review—we have the FBI involved, we have the Department of Defense involved—of what the challenges are. We have, in fact, dealt with this port before because we deal with it overseas as part of our comprehensive global security network. We've built in, and we will build in safeguards to make sure that these kinds of things don't happen. And, you know, this is part of the balancing of security, which is our paramount concern, with the need to still maintain a real robust global trading environment.

MR. RUSSERT: Before you go, based on your department's performance during Katrina, why should the American people feel confident, comfortable, that you can keep us safe if, God forbid, there was a terrorist attack?

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Tim, I warned in July that we were not as prepared as we need to be, and this is an immature department. And we've—you know, Department of Defense took 40 years to get to where it is now. We have made a lot of progress in some areas. There are some areas, including disaster management, where we have a lot more to do. The good news, I guess, is that if there's anything redeeming out of this hurricane it is that we have learned some very valuable lessons. We have people who are very energized about getting the job of planning done, and getting the resources in, and I'm anticipating that we will be much better positioned this year. But I will warn everybody, this is still not something which is going to be done in six months. We're going to keep getting better and better, but this is a process that's going to take a little bit of time.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Secretary, we thank you for sharing your views.

SEC'Y CHERTOFF: Good to be here.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next: What a week for Vice President Cheney. His judgement, his future, and the behavior of the press corps through the eyes of Maureen Dowd, Paul Gigot, David Gregory and Mary Matalin. They are all next right here on MEET THE PRESS.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Maureen Dowd, Paul Gigot, David Gregory, Mary Matalin on the week of the vice president right after this.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we are back. Welcome all.

Mary Matalin, let me start with you. This was on Wednesday, Vice President Cheney accepting responsibility for what happened. Let's watch.

(Videotape, February 15, 2006)

VICE PRES. CHENEY: Well, it was not Harry's fault. You can't blame anybody else. I'm the guy who pulled the trigger and shot my friend.

MR. RUSSERT: "It was not Harry's fault." It seems to have evolved somewhat over a few days. Let me go back to Monday. The vice president said that he talked to Katharine Armstrong about getting the story out. And the story that first appeared was this. "After shooting two quail, ranch owner Katharine Armstrong said Harry Whittington dropped back to pick them up, but he did not vocally announce to the others when he rejoined the group. The mistake exposed him to getting shot. 'It's incumbent on him,' Armstrong said. 'He did not do that.'" And that same argument was picked up and echoed from the White House podium. Here's the White House press secretary.

(Videotape, February 13, 2006)

Mr. SCOTT McCLELLAN: She pointed out that the protocol was not followed by Mr. Whittington when it came to notifying the others that he was there.

MR. RUSSERT: Initially, there was—seemed to be an attempt to blame Mr. Whittington. Was the vice president part of that? Aware of it?

MS. MARY MATALIN: Absolutely not. When I spoke to the vice president Sunday morning, he made it more than clear that it was his fault, no matter what the conditions, no matter how much the shared risk. That this should not be blamed on Harry. What happens here is that's not the first account. That's the wire account of the Corpus Christi Caller-Times. The very first account, Katharine Armstrong just lays out the facts, and she includes in there how apologetic the vice president was at the immediate scene.

What happens as these stories go from the local to the national is you stop giving out facts. You stop answering questions, and you start making denials. "No, Cheney wasn't drunk." "No, it wasn't Cheney's fault." So as it progressed through the week, that's what happened.

If you go back to Katharine Armstrong's original description, given in context to locals who understand the frequency of hunting accidents, unfortunately, the culture of Texas, through the eyes of a person who actually saw, who has an expertise, there was no fault described. She laid out the facts: what Mr. Whittington had done, what the vice president had done, and included, clearly, the vice president's immediate reaction which was profuse apologies.

MR. RUSSERT: But they were quoting her directly, and many suggested that she also told the papers that she had first thought that the vice president had had a heart attack, so maybe she didn't see the whole event.

MS. MATALIN: She saw enough to be able to describe the—what happened and who was where and what happened immediately afterwards. Yeah, that's the problem with this. That's why—that is exactly why you're—Tim, you're going right to the point of why we wanted to have—rather than just throw something out there that night or the first thing the next morning, why we wanted to take our time. Speak to the sheriff so we'd have the voice of authority. Have Katharine be able to share with other witnesses, and she could be an eyewitness. That's why we wanted to take our time because there were differing accounts, and there was mass confusion. And all—the whole first night was a very human reaction to get Harry and his family attended to.

MR. RUSSERT: You mentioned "speak to the sheriff," and this is another issue raised. The "Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren said at least one deputy was turned away shortly after the shooting because security personnel at the Armstrong ranch were not aware of the agreement between the sheriff and the Secret Service." What was the agreement? Why wasn't the vice president interviewed that night after Mr. Whittington was brought to the hospital? Why wasn't he interviewed by the sheriff that night? Why did they—we wait 14 hours for an interview?

MS. MATALIN: The vice president was informed of the decision to be interviewed the next morning. The original request was that he be interviewed at 10 o'clock. He asked if he could move it up to 8 o'clock because he wanted to—shoot his day up to get to Corpus Christi to see Mr. Whittington. Now it took The Washington Post an entire week to speak to the culture of rural enforcement in a hunting area in south Texas. And it was through the voice of none other than the Democratic state party chairman.

This is rural law enforcement. They hunt from October till the end of February. There's a presumption of accident. There was—everybody knows everybody down there. Somebody had talked to some ranch hand and said this is an accident. They never go screeching in there. Some deputy who had heard it another way went to some other border post, and nobody there wasn't going to be allowed in to talk to anybody or let anybody in to see the vice president. That's just national security. But the suggestion there by the press, not the locals, was that Cheney was covering up. That it's always done this way. No, it's not always done that way. If someone had done some reporting or even called the Democratic state party chairman, they would have learned it's always done the other way where there's a presumption of accident.

MR. RUSSERT: The suggestion being that perhaps there had been drinking going on that afternoon, and it could have been detected that evening as opposed to the next morning. And again, pointing to Ms. Armstrong's own words, quote, "None in the hunting party was drinking alcohol, Armstrong said. No, zero, zippo. No one was drinking." And then on Wednesday, the vice president, with FOX News, said, quote, "I had a beer at lunch. After lunch we take a break, go back to ranch headquarters. Then we took about an hour-long tour of the ranch. We didn't go back into the field to hunt quail until, oh, sometime after 3 p.m." Was alcohol in any way, shape or form consumed during the afternoon? And should we accept the president's "a beer" as literally one beer?

MS. MATALIN: What Katharine Armstrong was answering is a literal fact going to the question she was asked, which is always the case on the Armstrong ranch, you don't drink and hunt, and you don't hunt with drinkers. And that's what the sheriff reported, that's what she reported. It is true that the vice president had a beer at lunch, and let me ask anybody sitting at this table who knows the vice president, has known him for many years, has seen him in social situations, he's known not to be a drinker. But let me ask you a more logical question—you think the Secret Service would let the vice president out, tanked up, with a loaded gun, or let him be around anybody who's drunk with a loaded gun? It just defies common sense that the press would even go there. And that's why these adversarial question-and- answer periods set up the presumption that Cheney would be drunk, or having to deny that Cheney was drunk, as opposed to presuming what we all know, that he doesn't drink, he wouldn't hunt and drink, the Secret Service wouldn't let anybody around him who is drinking and hunting.

That's why we get into the—that's why we take our time, try to slow down, try to get as many facts out as possible before we engage in what ended up, as was the case this weekend, happens way too frequently inside this bubble, inside this parallel universe of a feeding frenzy in the briefing room.

MR. RUSSERT: Scott McClellan said he was speaking for himself and the president when he said that this could have been handled better. And many people pointed to the president's own book, "A Call—A Charge to Keep," when he was governor—running for governor, he had a hunting accident, he shot a killdeer rather than a dove, and immediately went to the press, had a news conference, accepted responsibility, and said, "People watch the way you handle things, they get a feeling they like you and trust you." Could the vice president have handled this better?

MS. MATALIN: Killing a different bird is a slightly different situation than shooting your friend in the face. And I think what most normal people would empathize with—that is, people who have a full complement of human empathy—is that a—that person who shot his friend in the face would be most concerned with that friend's health, with giving that friend help, with getting to that friend's family, with consoling the other parties that were in the—with him that weekend. That's a little bit different situation. The problem with these rules is that they're presumed to be inviolate. This vice president, who is logical and who is human, was not following the conventional rule, but he wasn't doing anything that was irrational, that's for sure.

MR. RUSSERT: Once he was assured—excuse me—that Mr. Whittington was in the ambulance, on his way to his hospital, being transferred to another hospital, that any time during that night, before or after dinner, did he consider picking up the phone, calling the president, saying, "Mr. President, I want to tell you something terrible has happened. I shot a man inadvertently in a hunting accident, and I wanted you to be—to know and hear it from me"?

MS. MATALIN: Well, understand, what's going on in the course of the evening, they're in this 50,000- acre farm, it took a half-hour for the ambulance to even reach them, they had to get out, so—by the time they got back and called the family, located them, got them to the hospital, and made all those machinations, it's now, what, 10 or 11 o'clock back here? The vice president knew that the president had been informed within the hour, he knew that Karl Rove, who's dear friends with Katharine Armstrong and Harry Whittington, had called, so he knew that the president had a full accounting. I'm not—this question's repeatedly asked—I'm not sure what the implication of it is. What purpose would have been served by the vice president then waking up the president to say, "Feel my pain"? He knew he was fully informed, and he knew he was informed from personal friends, not just from the medics and the Secret Service. I just am hard-pressed to understand what is—what are we trying to—what itch are we trying to scratch?

MR. RUSSERT: "Well, I'm involved in a story, a tragedy that may affect this administration," and certainly it played out for the course of a week, "and you should be aware of it, Mr. President."

MS. MATALIN: But he was aware of it, he was aware of it.

MR. RUSSERT: And here—in initial reports, the White House chief of staff did not know the vice president had been the shooter.

MS. MATALIN: But Karl knew the entire story from Katharine. And I'll tell you something else, another human element, everybody in that White House, particularly those from Texas, are long-time friends with Harry Whittington. And I'll tell you something else, another human element here: Everybody in that White House, particularly those from Texas, are longtime friends with Harry Whittington. I—I—all the conversations I've had after the fact, everyone's concern was about Mr. Whittington and about Merce Whittington and about Sally Whittington and the whole family, and indeed the Armstrongs. Sorry, there was a human response before there was a political response.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Gregory, let me talk about the media response. You're the White House correspondent for our NBC News. This is an exchange that you had with the White House press secretary Scott McClellan. Let's watch:

(Videotape, February 14, 2006)

Mr. McCLELLAN: Other people in this room have questions, and we have an event coming up.

(End videotape)

MR. DAVID GREGORY: I'm sorry, but I'm not getting answers here, Scott, and I'm trying to be forthright with you, but don't tell me that you're giving us complete answers when you're not actually answering the question. Because everybody knows what is an answer and what is not an answer. And the final...

Mr. McCLELLAN: Well, David, now you want to make this about you, and it's not about you, it's about what happened. And that's what I'm trying...

MR. GREGORY: I'm sorry that you feel that way.

Mr. McCLELLAN: ...and I'm trying to provide answers to the questions.

MR. GREGORY: But that's not what I'm trying to do. I want...

MR. RUSSERT: There also had been an off-camera exchange that Gigot just referred to. Scott McClellan: "David, hold on, the cameras aren't on right now. You can do this later." David Gregory: "Don't accuse me of trying to pose for the cameras. Don't be a jerk to me personally when I'm asking you a serious question." McClellan: "You don't have to yell." "I will yell," Gregory. "If you want to use the—that podium to try to take shots at my personally, which I don't appreciate, then I will raise my voice because that's wrong." McClellan: "Calm down, Dave, calm down." Gregory: "I'll calm down when I feel like calming down. You answer the question."

Looking back at that a few days later, your sense?

MR. GREGORY: I think I made a mistake. I think it was inappropriate for me to lose my cool with the press secretary representing the president. I don't think it was professional of me. I was frustrated, I said what I said, but I think that you should never speak that way, as my wife reminded me, number one. And number two, I think it created a diversion from some of the serious questions in the story, so I regret that. I was wrong, and I apologize.

But I think what—what's interesting about all of this is that Mary and others in the White House have been eager to stoke this as a false debate between the vice president and the White House press corps, attempting to cast this as the White House press corps is a ping-pong in the culture wars. The reality is that that false debate obscures some real facts. You laid out some of them in terms of questions that were raised about how the vice president initially disclosed this, making the decision to not disclose it himself and have Katharine Armstrong do it.

It also overlooks a very important point, and that is there was disagreement, as Mary well knows, within the White House about how this was handled: the question of why the vice president didn't call the president. Also the fact that there were some White House advisers who told me this week, it made the president look bad, it raised questions about who was really running the rodeo in the White House.

The vice president created these questions. It's also emblematic of the rather secretive style with the press by the vice president. And so I think it—it's fair to disagree with the White House press corps, or with me, or the White House press corps generally, I think, is more important, in terms of how we go about answers. But I, for one, don't apologize for pushing hard for answers. I think people who view the news or view what I do for a partisan lens may think I was making a political statement. I was not. I make no apologies for pushing hard for information because sometimes it's hard to get.

MR. RUSSERT: Bill Crystal, the editor of the Weekly Standard, said this: "The White House press corps is crazy and pompous, and a lot of them are personally obnoxious as well. Instead of asking about Iran going nuclear, Hamas setting up a government in Palestine, 42 of the 60 questions to Scott McClellan were the White House press corps whining that they didn't get a phone call late Saturday night."

MR. GREGORY: Right. And let me just make one other point. Again, it's easy to try to make this a debate about the White House press corps vs. the vice president. No matter how you feel about the White House press corps, and—and we're worthy of criticism, and we can take our lumps—this is about how the vice president chooses to communicate to the American people. We are a proxy for the American people. Whether you have faith in us or not, and we do make mistakes, we are still a proxy. This is about how the vice president chooses to communicate to the public. My view is not that I should have been informed or others should have been informed. It's not about that. It's—it's a question of "Does the vice president have a responsibility to the American people to inform them of his public and private activities?"

MR. RUSSERT: Paul Gigot, you weighed in with an editorial on Wednesday, and a rather ironic one, I might say. "In the interest of restraining the imperial presidency, we have put together the following cover-up time line with the crucial questions that deserve to be answered." And this is part of it: "Five thirty p.m., Saturday. Who is Harry Whittington and whom does he lobby for? Does he know Scooter Libby? Seven p.m., who else did Mr. Rove talk to about this in the interim? Was Valerie Plame ever mentioned? Eleven a.m., Sunday. Has Ms. Armstrong ever worked for Halliburton? One thirty p.m., everyone involved confirms more or less everything, or so the official line goes. Their agreement is very suspicious. As for the Beltway press corps, it has once again earned the esteem in which it is held by the American public."

MR. PAUL GIGOT: It seemed like satire was appropriate to the occasion. Not looking at this, by the way, David, from—you know, I didn't speak to anybody from the White House or the vice president's office all week on this. It was looking at it from outside the Beltway and saying where did this story stand on the relative scale of importance? Looked to me to be a human tragedy, the vice president made a mistake, it was probably in not disclosing it himself, letting someone else do it. But that's a relatively minor mistake. I think scandal standards are declining in Washington if this becomes another big, huge scandal which this is supposed to be a metaphor for for governing, a bunker of secrecy which is, I think, what some of the Democrats in the Senate were saying. This is a metaphor for the way this administration operates. I just don't think that's true. And so I think mockery was appropriate.

MR. RUSSERT: Maureen Dowd, Time magazine has been doing some polling on this whole issue. I want you to talk about that and everything else you've heard this morning. This is what Time found:

"Most Americans--65 percent—think that the vice president should have taken immediate responsibility. Half--56 percent—do not think he was trying to hide something from the public by waiting to disclose the incident. Ten percent think that the vice president should resign over his handling of the situation. More than half--58 percent says he is too secretive." And when asked about the handling of the shooting incident, 52 percent approve of the vice president's handling; 42 percent disapprove. What's your sense?

MS. MAUREEN DOWD: Well, I think that the reason this story has evoked such fascination is because the vice president is like the phantom. You know, we hear the creak of the door as he passes, but we don't really know what he's up to. We don't know his schedule. We don't always know where he is. We don't know what democratic institution he's blowing off at any given minute, and so this allowed us to see how his behavior and judgement operated pretty much in real time—with the delay, but pretty much in real time.

And it covered all the problems of the Bush/Cheney administration: secrecy and stonewalling, then blowing off the rules that are at the heart of our democracy, then using a filter to try and put the truth out in a way that would most suit their political needs, and then bad political judgement in bungling a crisis. I mean, if there's one thing the Republicans are great at since Reagan, it's damage control. But he is such a control freak, you know, he doesn't even care about the damage.

MR. RUSSERT: Mary Matalin, the last number in that Time magazine poll is the overall approval of the vice president, and here it is. Approve: 29 percent; disapprove 41 percent. A 29 percent approval rating. Will that hamper the vice president's effectiveness in terms of governing, or helping fellow Republicans in the midterm elections?

MS. MATALIN: Absolutely not. Why—I've heard this repeatedly for six years. He's been the whipping boy for the liberals for six years and whenever he does go out on this show or he puts something on the top of his speech, he carries the day with his message, he broke during the campaign, he wins the debate, so no, it doesn't diminish his effectiveness, nor has his role in any way been diminished at the White House.

I love this reference to blowing off the institutions of democracy like freedom of the press. There—this is—we are not engaged in a false debate, we all have the same goal, which is to communicate with the public, to inform the public. What we thought we were doing Sunday morning by having an eyewitness who was there, who was an expert on hunting, going to a paper that understands the culture, who had the capacity to get it up on the wire quickly, was communicating and informing the public in which the vice president took responsibility, apologized, spoke to the reporter, was corroborated by the sheriff and our office, the vice president's office. I no longer work there. I don't see how that's violating the rules of the institution, the hallmarks of our democracy. We just didn't go through them.

MR. RUSSERT: Right.

MS. MATALIN: Let me pose a question here. What if I called David, instead of Katherine calling the Corpus Christi Caller-Times and said, "I'm just going to talk to you." I suppose David's first reaction, or any of his colleagues would be, "No, let's go through the process. Let's call the pool. Let's get everybody involved here." No, I know that's not true because I've done this with Cheney feeding frenzies before when he's had to go in for routine heart checks. There's no such thing as you just put out a statement. And if I ever did want to just give it to one guy—on occasion which I did so I had the time to walk through it—they would take it. They didn't say, "Stop! Let's go through the process and get the whole pool there." So it's disingenuous. I'm not starting a false debate. We're not undermining the hallmarks of the democratic institution, the freedom of the presss. But its much ado about nothing, or in the words of Harry Whittington, "What's all the hoopla about?"

MR. GREGORY: OK, but Mary, if that's the case, first of all, you know, the vice president of the United States accidentally shot a man for the first time since Aaron Burr killed Alexander Hamilton. Much different circumstance, admittedly. And the vice president's office doesn't feel an obligation to disclose that to the American people directly. You do it through a ranch owner in Texas? It just—it just strikes me as odd.

MS. MATALIN: It strikes you as odd because you live in a parallel universe. It did not strike Americans as odd. Press were calling me saying, "The president—the vice president needs to apologize." He did profusely and repeatedly to the victim of his accident, who was Harry Whittington.

MR. GREGORY: If you thought he did everything right, why is it that you ultimately—if the vice president said, "I did everything right," by disclosing it the way he did, why did you do a big national interview this week?

MS. MATALIN: Because you went on a jihad, David. For four days you went on a Jihad.

MR. GREGORY: And that's an unfortunate use of that word, by the way. This is not what that was.

MS. MATALIN: Oh, OK. All right. How—were you saving up for that line?

MS. DOWD: Mary, it isn't only the press. He blows off the FISA courts, he blows off the Geneva Conventions, he blows off the U.N. to go to Iraq. He wants to blow off everything. He's got a fever of about presidential erosion just the way he had a fever about going into Iraq.

MR. GIGOT: A hunting incident—the vice president can defend himself, but a hunting incident is a little different than the FISA court issue and the NSA.

MS. DOWD: But it's part of same pattern.

MR. GIGOT: It is not—it's—how about a little human empathy? I mean, he shot his friend. He's—it's really one of these incidents where I think we can all stand back and say, "Let's have a debate about the FISA Courts. Let's have a big debate about the NSA wiretaps. Those are important issues." This is a very different kind of circumstance.

MS. DOWD: But then he shot his friend and blames his friend.

MR. RUSSERT: Can I just pick up on that? The Democrats were very, very outspoken, as you might expect. The front-runner for the Democratic nomination 2008, the senator from New York, Hillary Clinton, had a news conference, and this is what she offered.

(Videotape, February 14, 2006)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON, (D-NY): A tendency of this administration from the top all the way to the bottom is to withhold information, to resist legitimate requests for information, to refuse to be forthcoming about information that is of significance and relevant to the job that all of you do and the interest of the American people. The refusal of this administration to level with the American people on matters large and small is very disturbing.

MR. RUSSERT: How do you respond?

MS. MATALIN: Putting aside the delicious hypocrisy there, what a missed opportunity. What if Mrs. Clinton had come out and said, "Do you know, I'm not a hunter, but lived in Arkansas and I understand this is an accident. These sorts of accidents are not infrequent. I don't agree with Dick Cheney on many things, as you know, but I do know Lynn and Dick Cheney and I have to believe like any human being that he must be feeling awful right now for shooting his friend. And most of all, I don't know Harry Whittington, but there's a man lying in a hospital bed and I think we should all pass our thoughts and prayers along to him. Now, I'd like to talk about the serious business of this nation, things that I do not agree with the vice president on." Well, Maureen Dowd, the diva of the smart set would be swooning. Moms across the country would be saying, "Hey, she thinks like me. That's right. A guy shoots his friend. That's not relative to my life. Let's move on to serious issues." No, that was a politically stupid thing to do, beside the delicious and just absurd hypocrisy of the forthcomingness of an administration.

MR. GREGORY: Tim, can I just speak up on a point that Paul made that I think is a good one, which is I think for the moment I'm the only one here representing the White House press corps. I think one of the things we may have missed this week is a little bit more empathy for the vice president, given what he went through. This is a terrible incident for two people, one of whom happened to be the vice president. I think we missed that a little bit in all of this questioning. I do think the vice president gave voice to that personal pain extremely well this week, which is why, I for one, was so pleased to see him speak publicly about it and, you know, why I think it would have been useful to speak about it more quickly.

MR. GIGOT: This is—I think this whole issue is an illustration of so many of our debates—every debate for that matter in Washington goes immediately to DEFCON 1, where both sides square off and it's bad faith on this side, bad faith on that side. You know, sometimes people make mistakes, human mistakes. And this is one of those cases where I think we ought to treat it in human terms.

MS. DOWD: But I think reporters would have had a lot of empathy for the vice president if he hadn't sent people out for four days to blame the victim. I mean, you know, I went hunting with Reagan and Bush Sr. and I've been on all these Republican hunting trips, and—but I've learned a lot about hunting this week. And the thing I've learned is that the shooter bears total responsibility for where everyone in the party is before he shoots, and they shoot abreast, not while someone's fetching a duck. So for him to send all these people out to blame this guy for so many days was not appropriate.

MR. GREGORY: I just wonder what Mary Matalin and others would have said if Vice President Gore had accidentally shot someone with similar facts and the press corps was pressing hard for answers and if Mary or others wouldn't think we would press just as hard for answers in that circumstance with this kind of story, I think that's mistaken.

MS. MATALIN: I don't know what answers you pressed for that weren't contained in this story. And you want to know why there's bad faith because this human accident, this tragedy is conveyed as "Vice president"—she just characterized it—"The vice president sent people out for four days to blame the victim." No such thing occurred. In the first story it was clear from his spokesman and Katharine Armstrong that he took responsibility and he was apologetic. He did not send anybody out to take the blame. I've explained how these stories go from putting out facts to issuing denials. He wasn't out—he wasn't out—and he wasn't not out for four days. If you go through those four days, the first day the story was out there in as complete a fashion as we could humanly do.

MR. RUSSERT: If Katharine Armstrong had not said, "We can't contain this story," is there a possibility that it would not have come out for...

MS. MATALIN: Absolutely, completely no. He called me—I talked to him, what, at 7 o'clock his time, it's Sunday morning, the—and we made a judgment call at that point, because I had three calls preceding my conversation with him, which ranged from, "It's a skin wound" to "Oh, he can still see." I said, "We don't have a coherent set of facts here." And one thing we know about the press corps is if you put out evolving sets of facts while you're collecting information, those bad facts are worse than no facts whatsoever. So I'm agreeing that we should all get from—at least not def-con one, so we move back to def-con five in these things? And could we not characterize this as he's blowing off the hallmarks of a democratic in—all the hallmarks of a democratic institution?

MR. RUSSERT: The president went and had a town meeting discussion, and one of the questions raised by one of the participants was: "We're all talking about vi—the media's all talking about Vice President Cheney. What about Vice President Gore, Mr. President? He went to Saudi Arabia and he said that there had been terrible abuses against Arabs, that they had been indiscriminately rounded up, and he criticized the visa program between the U.S. and Saudi Arabia." And that was being pushed very aggressively by some of the conservative blogs: Focus on Al Gore, not Dick Cheney.

MR. GIGOT: Well, I mean, the remarks were notable. I mean, I think, because when you go to a foreign country like that, particularly the heart of Wahabi Islam, and say, "We have indiscriminately rounded up Arabs in this country after 9/11." First of all, I don't think that's true, I don't remember us doing that. In fact, I think the reaction in America after 9/11 was quite gracious and understanding in trying to distinguish between terrorists and moderate Islams. So for him to go there and say that, I think it's a real story.

MR. RUSSERT: Before we go, Maureen Dowd, take 15 seconds, what's the most important thing we learned this week in covering this story?

MS. DOWD: Well, I do think, you know, I appreciate the vice president's attempts to put on a sweet pink tie and, you know, to tell Wyoming about, you know, his lust as a newlywed. But I think Mary had a very difficult job humanizing Dick Cheney, because I don't think he has given us much chance to see him as a human being.

MR. RUSSERT: David Gregory:

MR. GREGORY: I think it's important to always try to turn the temperature down, as Mary suggests, but I do think there's a tension between the White House press corps and the administration, and I don't think that that should be demonized as a political disagreement. It's, in some ways, healthy, and it's a reality.

MR. RUSSERT: Paul Gigot:

MR. GIGOT: Well, I think—well, let's make some distinctions between stories that really matter, and we ought to fight and fight hard about it and—where secrecy is an issue, and let's distinguish between those and what are really human accidents.

MR. RUSSERT: Mary Matalin:

MS. MATALIN: You know, in the average American, in the parallel universe, it's not about us, it's not about President Bush, it's not about Dick Cheney, it's about them, and they would like us all to focus on what are we doing for them? Well, let's have debate on policies and let's distinguish political events of no consequence to the nation from those that are.

MR. RUSSERT: To be continued. Mary Matalin, David Gregory, Paul Gigot, Maureen Dowd. We'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: That's all for today. We'll be back next week with an exclusive interview with California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger. On the set here at MEET THE PRESS: Arnold Schwarzenegger. A special time next Sunday, 11 a.m. Eastern and Pacific zones, 10 a.m. Central after early morning Olympic coverage. Check our Web site for times in your area, mtp.msnbc.com.

If it's Sunday, it's MEET THE PRESS.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. Vice President Cheney's shooting accident was the water cooler story of the week, putting him on the cover of both Time and Newsweek this morning. And a new poll in Time shows that almost two-thirds of Americans think Cheney should have stepped forward immediately to take public responsibility for the shooting. But a little more than half the country believe the vice president handled the overall situation just fine.

We'll get to that debate in just a minute, but first, another man in the hot seat this week, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. Welcome back to This Week.

CHERTOFF: Good to be here.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The House committee concluded this week that the response was a national failure. Do you accept that conclusion?

CHERTOFF: I think there were some significant failures. There were some significant successes. Obviously, the Coast Guard did a magnificent job. When we ultimately constructed the air bridge that allowed evacuation out of the airport on Thursday, we used TSA and we used all of DHS to make that happen. But clearly there were delays, particularly in getting buses into the Superdome, which caused unnecessary pain and suffering.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me get to that right now, because one of the reasons there was a delay was because that there wasn't an official recognition that the levees had been breached.

In fact, your department got a note the night of the -- the first night of the storm, August 29, 10:30 at night, a spot report -- and I want to show it to our viewers -- that said, there is a quarter-mile breach in the levee near the 17th Street Canal about 200 yards from Lake Pontchartrain allowing water to flow into the City. An estimated two-thirds to 75 percent of the city is under water.

You didn't receive that report until the next morning. Why not?

CHERTOFF: Well, that, of course, is a question I asked because that was troubling to me. I mean, the only way to make a decision is to really have real-time situational awareness of what's happening on the ground. Now, we had very experienced people working in the operations center.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And it came into the operations center.

CHERTOFF: It came in late at night. And I understand, by the way, that sometimes the first report is wrong, so you want to verify it and you want to understand the implications of that. Nevertheless, I've certainly reinforced the message since that Monday that I would rather get half-verified information earlier with a warning that it's not verified than have people feel they have to wait until they've proven it...

STEPHANOPOULOS: And that was one of many reports that came in during the day talking about possible breaches. Had you known at 10:30 that night, yes, this is a real report, the levees had been breached, wouldn't you have been able to start evacuating the city much earlier?

CHERTOFF: I don't actually know that it would have made much of a difference. I know on Monday, some investigations have revealed, they actually had lined up about 2,000 buses, so they had at least identified the assets to come in to do the evacuation as early as Monday. One of the questions is why that didn't happen, and I think that's a function of whether they had a deployment plan. Had anybody previously thought about how you would bring the buses in, how they would get there...

STEPHANOPOULOS: How could you not have thought about it?

CHERTOFF: Well, I mean, I think this is really ultimately the most significant breakdown was the kind of very granular specific planning that you needed to have to deal with this kind of emergency. They had planned some things well. For example, Coast Guard planned very well the ability to do 33,000 rescues.

But when I look back, the piece that seemed to me to be the real breakdown was the lack of a plan for how you get people out in a secondary evacuation, not the first evacuation, but the follow-on evacuation.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You've come in for personal criticism, not least from the man you fired, Michael Brown, the former head of FEMA. He gave this interview to a filmmaker doing a film called The New Orleans Story.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

(UNKNOWN): How do you rate Secretary Chertoff?

MICHAEL BROWN, HEAD OF FEMA: You know, C-minus. The secretary is a judge by training. And you can't do things like tell your disaster guy to go back to Baton Rouge and stay in Baton Rouge and never leave. That's not how you do operations. He just doesn't get it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Your response?

CHERTOFF: A couple things, George: First of all, I understand I removed Mike Brown. He's obviously not going to be happy with me. That's, kind of, human nature.

But a couple things: First of all, I really am not a judge by training. I was a judge for 18 months. What I was, was a prosecutor. I was the person who had to manage the prosecution of the investigation after 9/11, so I was deeply involved in the management of that crisis and other crises, as well.

As far as Mike Brown's complaint that I sent him on Tuesday, told him to get back to the operations center, it comes back to the buses. On Tuesday, when I asked question, I want to hear what our plan is for getting people evacuated, I didn't get a very clear sense that there was a well-developed plan.

And I couldn't get a hold of Michael Brown. He was flying around in a helicopter looking at damage; he was planning to go on Larry King or Rita Cosby.

And job one, if you are the operator in the field, if that's what the responsibility you want is, make sure you've got the plans in place to save lives. Then you do the flying around.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you do regret making him, then, the operator in the field?

CHERTOFF: Well, I certainly have to say -- when we made the decision before the hurricane, given his past experience in the prior year with four hurricanes, given his experience with me in Dennis earlier that year and given the team of people at FEMA, I felt that, actually, it was a reasonable judgment to expect he could handle this.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You know, it wasn't just Mr. Brown who has criticized you. Senator Collins said you appeared detached in your response. The House committee called your response late -- you responded late, ineffectively or not at all.

How do you respond to that criticism?

CHERTOFF: Of course, it's a little bit in contrast with Michael Brown, who said I was overinvolved with him. I think -- the weekend before, we all knew this was a big catastrophe.

The president declared an emergency. That was the critical legal thing that opened the door to moving everything into the area.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Some have said not an incident of national significance and they believe that was significant.

CHERTOFF: Well, I'm going to tell you because I actually brought the plan in question -- the plan specifically says that all presidentially declared emergencies are considered incidents of national significance.

So there was no need for me to sign an additional piece of paper. The president's order accomplished all that.

But the Sunday before, I sat down in a video conference and I listened to each of the managers in the field very carefully go over all the list of preparations that had been made.

And at the end of that, I said -- I asked two questions -- I said, is there anything that you need from our department that you haven't gotten because I will get it to you.

And the answer I got was, we have everything that we need and we are working with all the components.

And then I asked a second question. I said, have you reached out to the Department of Defense? Do you have what you need from them? Because I anticipated we might need some additional resources.

And there was someone from DOD sitting in the room -- I could see him on the video conference -- and Michael Brown, said we're here; we're working together; we're fully engaged and we have what we need.

So I certainly went into this not trying to second-guess or micromanage the experienced operators at FEMA but with a very clear sense that I wanted to be assured that everybody had focused on the critical elements of preparation.

Now, it turns out that, obviously, we didn't get done what needed to be done. And the question from me is, what are the elements of preparation? What are the elements of training? What are the elements of building capabilities that we have to get in place for this coming hurricane season which is only 100 days away?

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's exactly where I wanted to go next because you also faced a lot of questions from the House committee this week on that specific question, probably most passionately from Congressman Gene Taylor of Mississippi. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE GENE TAYLOR (D-MS): I hope you can sense a bit of controlled rage here because 99 percent of the work I have done since this storm is doing your job; 99 percent of the calls to my congressional office are complaints about FEMA. I have zero confidence that this nation is any better prepared for the next storm if it hits my district or Alabama or Florida or South Carolina than it was the last.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: He says you're not ready.

CHERTOFF: Let me tell you what we're doing. And, of course, I've spoken to Congressman Taylor. I have a lot of respect for him. I know he lost his house. And he spent a lot of time focusing on the needs of his constituents.

We have trained teams now that can actually go into a hurricane area, who have sophisticated equipment that will let them beam back to us real-time information.

We are putting in place a communication system -- and I've set a deadline of May to make sure it's in place -- to allow us to use aircraft or cutters as relay stations for radio communication, if, in fact, wireless towers go down.

We are in the process of retooling our logistics to make sure we can have real-time visibility where commodities are which we did not have in place previously.

We are starting to require the kind of technology and we're recruiting people who will actually go out and engage with (INAUDIBLE).

STEPHANOPOULOS: You say you're starting to do these things. Do you regret not putting more resources into FEMA before Katrina?

CHERTOFF: Well, of course, I didn't -- I wasn't around for the budget that was involved for...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you were there for several months before it happened.

CHERTOFF: I was there for several months.

What I saw when I came in was that FEMA wasn't ready. In fact, I gave a speech in July, saying our preparedness is not where it should be. And I started to lay out a plan that would concentrate preparedness under one accountable person, and then would let FEMA focus on its operational mission.

That plan by law could not come into place until October 1. Obviously, the hurricane didn't wait until then.

But I was worried about this. You know, we are still an immature department. A lot of progress has been made, and there are many, many fine things that we have in place now that were not in place two years ago, but I'm the first person to be aware that we're always racing the clock. And in terms of some of the capabilities and some of the planning, which should have been done earlier -- and some of it isn't a matter of money; it's a matter of sitting down and thinking through what plans you need -- you know, we've got to get that stuff done. At least a lot of it done by June 1.

STEPHANOPOULOS: It's also a matter of leadership, and The Wall Street Journal reported this week that five people have rejected overtures to actually become the head of FEMA, including the state management directors for Iowa, Texas, California and Florida.

First of all, is that true? And secondly, why is it so hard to find the right person?

CHERTOFF: First of all, I'm not sure who -- I'm not sure who are the people who gave the overtures, because I can tell you, we are not at a place now where I would make an offer to somebody.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you didn't offer it to the state director in California, who said he turned it down?

CHERTOFF: We are talking to a lot of people. There's some people who take themselves out of eligibility, sometimes because of family reasons. You know, they would have to move across the country, or things of that sort. I am very committed, however, to finding not just one person, but actually a team of people to lead FEMA who have substantial experience in emergency management, substantial experience in logistics and delivering commodities and goods where they need to go.

I want to get that done quickly. You know and I know that the process of getting people confirmed in Washington is not a quick process.

But once we've identified somebody -- and I'm hopeful within a very short time we will -- I'm going to ask that we do the background check process quickly, that -- so the president can make a decision. And then I'm going to ask Congress to act quickly so we can get somebody in place.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Did you ever offer the president your resignation?

CHERTOFF: When I took the job, I understood it was going to be a tough job. And the understanding up front was, as long as I can make a contribution, I will stay in my post. So it is really up to the president.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So never a formal offer.

CHERTOFF: I think it's understood by every presidential appointee that you serve at the pleasure of the president, that as long as he wants you to serve, my commitment is to serve him and serve the country at my post, and if he at some point he changes his mind, then that's his decision.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You know, before we go, I just want to get one other question on another subject. The Senators Clinton and Menendez have said they're going to draft legislation that would block the sale of the port operation in a lot of big cities -- New York; Newark, New Jersey; Camden, New Jersey; Philadelphia; Baltimore -- from a British company to a company controlled by the government of Dubai.

You were part of the government committee that has actually approved that sale. So do you not share their concern that this is a national security threat?

CHERTOFF: The actual details of the discussion, of course, are classified, so I can't talk about them.

Let me explain the process, though, so people understand. We have a committee with a number of departments involved. We are involved. And, of course, that means Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection. FBI plays a role. DOD plays a role.

We review investments by foreign companies for national security concerns. Sometimes they get vetoed. Sometimes they are approved, but they're subject to conditions, or safeguards that must be put into place.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Are the conditions on this deal? CHERTOFF: Again, I'm not going to talk about classified matters. I'm just laying the process out. It is a rigorous process. Sometimes there's debate about it. You can be assured that before a deal is approved, we put safeguards in place and assurances in place that make everybody comfortable that we are where we need to be from a national security standpoint.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Did you object to the deal?

CHERTOFF: Again, George, you're not going to get me to talk about classified matters. What I'm going to tell you is that we make sure there are assurances in place in general sufficient to satisfy us that the deal is appropriate from a national security standpoint.

One thing I should point out is, we have dealt with this port operator in Dubai for years, because many of our port security operations don't begin when you hit American territory; they actually begin at the port of embarkation. So we don't write with a clean slate. We have a lot of experience in general with overseas port operations when we make these decisions.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Secretary Chertoff, thank you very much.

CHERTOFF: Great. George, good to be here.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Up next, Senator Joe Lieberman and Congressman Tom Davis.

And later, Shaq the sheriff?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

O'NEAL: I went to regular academy. I got maced, had to go through a gas house. I got shot with a Taser twice. I did everything they did. So they know that I'm serious.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we're back now with two of Secretary Chertoff's critics this week in the House and the Senate, Congressman Tom Davis, Senator Joseph Lieberman. And Senator Lieberman, let me begin with you. You heard the secretary all week long in the committees. You just heard him on the program.

He says, yeah, we made a lot of mistakes, but we're fixing them. We're going to be prepared next time. Do you accept his responses, and is his job now, in your opinion, safe?

LIEBERMAN: Well, that's up to the president because obviously the secretary serves at the pleasure of the president, not of Congress. But there's no question in my mind, based on everything our committee and the Senate found, based on excellent work the House committee has found, that Secretary Chertoff failed to do his job.

I mean, the Homeland Security Act, presidential directives pursuant to the act, the national response plan all make clear that the secretary of homeland security is the lead federal official when it comes to preparation for and response to disasters, terrorists or natural disasters. And this is a story of a failure of leadership to prepare before the event and then a failure to respond aggressively when it hit.

STEPHANOPOULOS: He says he signed that order two days ahead of time, and that put in place all of the activity that was supposed to be put in place before a major natural disaster.

LIEBERMAN: Unfortunately, that is not the story, as our committee has found that the president declared an emergency on the Saturday before the Monday Katrina hit. That was unusual. That as the secretary...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Never happened before.

LIEBERMAN: Never happened before. That automatically makes it an incident of national significance, which gives the secretary enormous new authority. For some reason, over that whole weekend and not until Tuesday, he didn't do some of the things he should have done, appoint a principal federal officer.

We've got e-mails from Admiral Allen of the Coast Guard pleading that the secretary do something like that. He didn't stand up the incident management team that he's supposed to stand up. And most important of all, he didn't move in transportation capabilities to get the people who everybody knew couldn't get out of New Orleans on their own.

STEPHANOPOULOS: He acknowledged that as a failure. Congressman Davis?

DAVIS: There are a lot of failures here. They never got a unity of command between the state, local and federal government. They deployed more assets than they had at any storm in history, but it was woefully short. We talked about the transportation side of this.

I think one of the difficulties here is that Secretary Chertoff and his agency do a pretty good job in prevention on the terrorist side, but response is a different skill set. And you're competing for dollars within the same budget, and I think as a result of that, FEMA suffered and the response suffered.

STEPHANOPOULOS: A lot of people were surprised, frankly, at how tough your report was. I mean, you're a Republican. The House is controlled by the president's party, and yet it seemed like you didn't pull any punches except, some critics have said, in one area. You walled off the White House from investigation, did not pursue subpoena power, did not get the e-mails which would have really shown what was happening at the top levels of the White House. Why didn't you?

DAVIS: Well, we actually consulted with the Senate on that, see if they'd join us, but we had a time constraint to get this out by February 15. And to issue subpoenas, it was clear they would fight it. It would have cut off the 22,000 documents we did get from the White House.

We blistered the White House for not making these documents available, but we never could have gotten our report out on time, and we would have been in lengthy litigation over executive privilege. And weighing all that, we just couldn't get it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Have you heard from the White House about your report?

DAVIS: I haven't gotten a congratulatory call, if that's what you're asking.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's look forward now. You heard Secretary Chertoff, Senator Lieberman, talk go how he's trying to beef up FEMA going forward.

This has also brought back debate over whether FEMA should be in the Department of Homeland Security to begin with. In your original legislation, you said it should.

Senator Lott said this week it should be pulled out and made Cabinet status again. What should happen?

LIEBERMAN: George, let me first say that, based on FEMA's failures before, during and after Hurricane Katrina, I believe that it's time for FEMA as we know it to go. I think...

STEPHANOPOULOS: To go? What does that mean?

LIEBERMAN: I do. I think it has shown itself to be so dysfunctional. The fact is it's an emergency management administration but it's represented emergency mismanagement.

I think it's time to dissolve it and rebuild it within the Department of Homeland Security because, to take it outside, would be to make a redundant organization.

There are some very good people, a lot of good people in FEMA. They should be at the base of the rebuilding. They need more people. FEMA was underfunded and undersupported and that's part of the reason why it was unable to perform in response to our preparation to Katrina.

And, finally, they need strong leadership. This is a life and death, saving...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Seems like no one wants the job.

LIEBERMAN: Well, I bet you can find some good people to get in the job. And it needs experience. It needs either emergency management experience, tough private sector business management experience or military experience. STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman Davis, it sounds like Senator Lieberman is making a little news here. Can we make legislation? Will you sign on to the proposal?

DAVIS: Well, I think FEMA has to be reorganized. I'm not sure it should stay in the Department of Homeland Security for this reason. They are competing for dollars. Again, prevention is one thing...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you would take it out?

DAVIS: ... response is something else. I think they've got to be, just there at the right arm of the White House during any crisis. I think in this case the coordination between...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Cabinet level?

DAVIS: Absolutely. You've got to be able to have that level of communications in -- a bureaucratic layer reporting up through the secretary, in this case, just didn't work out at all.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Why not make it Cabinet level?

LIEBERMAN: Here's the reason why not, George. We created the Department of Homeland Security after 9/11 because we felt that the terrorists took advantage of our lack of organization, both, particularly, in preparedness and also in response.

The response to a terrorist attack is not much different than a response to a natural disaster. Somebody this week said to us, if terrorists had blown up the levees in New Orleans and the city had flooded, the federal government would have come right in.

True, and they would have come right in to do exactly what the federal government and the state and local government should have done in this case.

So I think the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security is, by law and the president's directive, the single lead federal official to prepare, to protect America from attack, whether from terrorists or natural disaster.

To create another organization off -- out of that, I think, would waste a lot of money and make us less effective. But, again, I say, FEMA has become to too many people in America and particularly in the Gulf coast a joke, a four-lettered word.

It's time for FEMA to go and build something better, stronger within DHS to take its place.

DAVIS: You know, the White House wouldn't even give us anyone under oath to testify in terms of what they were doing. They gave us a briefing on this.

It's important to get White House engagement. The White House has the magic wand. When they move, things happen in this government.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Can you hold their feet to the fire now? You said you were under time constraints before.

DAVIS: Well, I think we can. I think the way we can do it through the way we construct this.

Right now, FEMA is competing for dollars within the Department of Homeland Security, with immigration, with all of the other activities they do, many of them prevention.

We are talking about not prevention here but response. It's a different skill set and you need all the authority of the government. And I think being at the right arm of the president is the best way to do that.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Secretary Chertoff said he serves at the pleasure of the president. Do you think the president should keep him?

DAVIS: I think, in terms of the prevention side, he's doing a good job. He's organized that department. I think, on the response side, that these problems are much more systematic than just being about one or two people.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Before you go, let me bring you both in on this issue of whether these port operations should be sold to this company controlled by the government of Dubai.

Your Democratic colleagues, Senator Menendez, Senator Clinton, Senator Schumer, have all criticized this. Do you agree with their approach, legislation to block it?

LIEBERMAN: Not yet. George, my first reaction is to say, why did we let that happen?

But the more you look at it, the fact is that a lot of terminals in America are already owned, not ports, terminals owned by foreign companies.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Not Dubai, though?

LIEBERMAN: No, not Dubai, but you know, Dubai and the United Arab Emirates are allies of ours in the war on terrorism.

So I don't think we want to, just because it's a Dubai company even owned by the government, we want to exclude them from doing business here. The question is, can we set up systems that we're sure guarantee our security.

The truth is, I worry more about the failure to invest enough in port security in America through the Homeland Security Department to detect dangerous items, WMD coming in here, than I worry right now about this sale.

DAVIS: It's a tough one to explain, but we're in a global economy. Now, you've got Chinese owning American ports, running part of the Panama Canal now, people go -- and it hasn't had any ramifications on security. But I think we need to take a very close look at it.

LIEBERMAN: George, I'll just add this final word. Susan Collins, chairman of the homeland security committee, Senator from Maine, and I, ranking Democrat, are sending a letter to Secretary of the Treasury Snow, asking him -- and Chertoff, asking them to explain why the decision was made. Do it in closed session, which I guess Secretary Chertoff couldn't say some things to you here this morning.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Yeah, I wanted to know more about what he said inside those (inaudible).

LIEBERMAN: Yeah. Exactly. And then for us to reach a decision based on as to whether we want to do something to stop the sale. Right now, I don't know enough to say that we should.

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, gentlemen. Thank you both very much.

DAVIS: Thank you very much.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The roundtable is next, with George Will, Cokie Roberts and Katrina Vanden Heuvel of The Nation. And later, The Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JIMMY KIMMEL, TALK SHOW HOST: Sitting down for a one-on-one interview with Fox News is like Mrs. Butterworth sitting down with the Pancake Channel.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our voice this week, Shaquille O'Neal. The Miami Heat center is playing in his 13th All-Star game tonight, but off court he's on the beat, getting ready for his next gig, Sheriff Shaq.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

O'NEAL: I went to the regular academy. I got maced. I had to go through the gas house. I got shot with a Taser twice. I did everything they did. So them know that I'm serious, and when I'm done playing I will be sheriff somewhere in some city, in some county.

I have full powers of arrest. And you know, when I'm at work, I do police officer duties. Right now, I work Internet crimes against children. I work in a special victims unit. I teach children how not to get captured by these guys.

It is simple. When you're online, don't talk to strangers, don't give any personal information, don't tell them where you live, don't send pictures. If it gets too fishy and guys start asking you questions crazy, tell mom, tell mom to call the local authorities, and they'll call us, and we'll handle it from there.

Another thing I'm looking to do is go over to Congress and get some of these laws a little bit tougher. I'm sick and tired of people having sex with children and getting probation, only getting two years. And Congress, they're going to have to help out. They're going to have to help change these laws. No more of pleading out and getting two months, or going to a psychiatric hospital. We need harsh jail terms.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

O'NEAL: Hi, Shaq here.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

O'NEAL: When I retire, I'm going to take a week, take two weeks off. Somebody is going to have to hire me. Some city, some county, some federal position is going to have to hire Shaquille O'Neal. And he's qualified, and he's proven. Look it up.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And stay out of his way.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. Religious leaders in Iran back the use of nuclear weapons, next on Fox News Sunday .

The hunting accident and the vice president.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I'm the guy who pulled the trigger and shot my friend. It was, I'd have to say, one of the worst days of my life.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: We'll examine the political fallout and more with two influential senators, Republican Lindsey Graham and Democrat Evan Bayh. We'll also talk with one of Mr. Cheney's closest friends in politics, former Senator Alan Simpson.

Plus, the media's role -- doing their job or overdoing it? We'll ask our panel of Sunday regulars, Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams.

And on Presidents' Day weekend, our Power Player of the Week takes us behind the scenes of a national tragedy, all right now on Fox News Sunday .

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Let's get a quick check of the latest headlines. Hard-line religious leaders in Iran have issued a holy order that okays its use of nuclear arms against its enemies. One senior mullah says it's only natural as a countermeasure against other nuclear powers.

Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister of Israel, today ruled out all contact with the new Hamas-controlled government. The Israeli cabinet halted the transfer of tens of millions of dollars in taxes and customs fees to the Palestinians.

And Time Magazine reports President Bush had to lean on Vice President Cheney to go public about the hunting accident. According to the story, Cheney resisted saying anything about the incident until his talk with Mr. Bush.

Well, what a week here in Washington, with the fallout from a quail hunting trip overshadowing the business of government. Joining us now to talk about the vice president and other issues are two key senators, Republican Lindsey Graham, who joins us from South Carolina, and Democrat Evan Bayh of Indiana, who's here in studio with me.

Senators, welcome back to Fox News Sunday . Let's start with the controversy this week over the vice president's hunting accident. Here is what Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi saw in Mr. Cheney's handling of the incident. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REP. NANCY PELOSI (D-CA), MINORITY LEADER: This is yet again another manifestation of the arrogance of power of the White House. They don't come clean with the American people, or they think they're above the law and above accountability to the American people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senator Bayh, above the law, arrogance of power -- isn't that the kind of talk that makes Democrats look silly?

BAYH: Well, Chris, this was mostly a personal tragedy. This man got shot, was in the hospital, had a heart attack. I think more than anything, it goes to show how out of touch Washington is with the rest of the country.

We've got deep problems in this country -- economic, national security, financial -- and I think most folks understand this for what it was, a hunting accident. Now we ought to get on with the business of addressing the major problems that face the country.

WALLACE: So you think that the House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is out of touch?

BAYH: Well, I would have a respectful difference of opinion on the magnitude of this issue. And to get to your question, look, should the information have been disclosed quicker? Yes, no question about it. Should they be more forthcoming? Yes.

But I think we need to pivot, then, and address the major issues, not make a mountain out of a molehill. When we do that, I think we run the risk of damaging our own credibility with mainstream America.

WALLACE: Senator Graham, you're going to be happy to know we're not going to spend the entire interview talking about this, but I do have a question...

GRAHAM: Good.

WALLACE: ... or two for you. It turns out that you have gone hunting with the vice president and learned -- and lived to tell the tale.

GRAHAM: Yes.

WALLACE: If above the law is a stretch, didn't the vice president bungle this?

GRAHAM: It probably would have been better to have it come from the vice president's office, but I associate myself with Evan. And Nancy is the gift that keeps on giving for Republicans, but Evan Bayh's got it right, and I'm ready to talk about something else. He's one of the best hunters I've ever had the pleasure of hunting with. He's a nice man. He's very safety conscious. When people get out of position in quail hunting, it can be dangerous. And I think he deeply regrets what happened. And Mr. Whittington is a very fine man. And let's move on.

WALLACE: One more question, and then I promise we will move on. What about the argument that there is a view out there that this is a White House that is too secret, that tells the American people what they want them to know when they want them to know it, and that this feeds into that perception?

GRAHAM: Well, I don't buy that one bit. Mr. Whittington's privacy is something that we all should be somewhat concerned about. No matter what the vice president said or when he said it, there'd be some criticism. Senator Bayh, I think, has put this in the proper perspective.

It was a personal event, tragic in nature, and mistakes were made, but let's talk about what's going on somewhere else in the world far more dangerous to the American people than the vice president's unfortunate mistake.

WALLACE: Well, we're going to do that right now.

Senator Bayh, you said recently that Democrats shouldn't be afraid of talking about national security, shouldn't be scared off by Republicans. But you acknowledge that since Vietnam -- and let's put it up on the screen -- Democrats have been viewed by the American people as congenitally weak, too soft to be entrusted with our national security, as concerned with protecting Americans from our own government as from suicidal terrorists.

When Democrats disagree with the president about the NSA wiretaps, about the Patriot Act, about the conduct of the war in Iraq, shouldn't voters continue to see them as too weak and too soft?

BAYH: No, Chris, I don't think so. And the perception is one that is inaccurate. But if it's a perception that most Americans perceive, it's one we've got to address. So, look, we can go down these issues that you've mentioned one at a time. We need to do what it takes to listen to Al Qaida operatives, to know where they're calling from, to protect this country, period.

But there's no reason why we can't do that -- and Senator Graham would agree with me on this -- while also providing the American people some checks and balances to ensure that our civil liberties are being protected. It's a false choice.

If we only choose one as Democrats, not the other, then we run into trouble. The gist of my speech, as you know, was we've had an administration that's been tough for five years, but tough alone isn't enough. We need to be tough and smart. Too often we Democrats are viewed as being weak. We need to be both tough and smart.

WALLACE: But, Senator Bayh, I just -- I mean, you, obviously, as an individual senator can take any position you want, but the fact is that your Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, said at a news conference we've got the tape, we killed the Patriot Act.

It was Nancy Pelosi who talked about getting out of Iraq. I mean, this isn't image or spin. These are positions taken by the leaders of your congressional party.

BAYH: Well, we're about to reauthorize the Patriot Act. There was an attempt to filibuster it this week. It was defeated. I think only three votes supported that. So the vast majority of Democrats, Chris, are in favor of protecting this country.

We know that it is a dangerous world. We know that sometimes you have to use force to protect this country. But we need to do it in a way that is both tough and smart. You have to do both to truly provide for our nation's security.

And the irony of all this is, Chris, this administration has done so much to actually undermine our nation's security, whether it's Iraq, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, energy dependence, on and on and on.

Our problem, Chris, is that we want to, you know, hide from this issue. We want to try to change the subject. We have got to take it head on and reassure the American people that we have what it takes in a dangerous world to protect this nation.

WALLACE: Senator Graham, the implication of all this is that the Republicans and the president have been tough but dumb. How do you plead?

GRAHAM: Well, I don't think it's dumb to take Saddam Hussein out of power and put him in jail and let his people try him. I think the president's policies have been consistent. They've been focused. He's got a theme of what he's doing and why he's doing it.

Our Democratic friends have no theme. They vote for it. Then they vote against it. That's Senator Kerry's view of the authorization to use force, money to support the troops. Representative Murtha thinks we need to pull out of the region and sit on the sidelines.

Our Democratic friends have no theme as to why we're doing what we're doing. The president does. Whether you agree with him or not, he has got a reason he went into Iraq. He has an overall strategy to bring democracy to the Mid East. It's tough. We've made mistakes.

But people understand where Bush is coming from, and our Democratic friends come from all four corners of the court and really nobody knows what they believe.

WALLACE: Senator Graham, let's talk about a couple of specific national security issues. First of all, there's a big debate going on in the Senate now, not only party against party but even within the parties, about the NSA warrantless wiretap program.

Should Congress rewrite the law, Senator Graham, so that a special intelligence court would be able to oversee that program?

GRAHAM: I think there's a bipartisan consensus growing for three things, Chris. Number one, to make FISA more flexible. It was written in 1978. A lot of technology has changed -- to make it more flexible and more relevant.

Number two, to have broader congressional oversight than we have today, to have more people involved, more eyes looking at what the program is all about, and preserving judicial review, a warrant requirement in a limited class of cases.

I think there would be a bipartisan majority for those three things, and I hope the White House will work with us. I believe they will.

WALLACE: Let me ask you, just following up on that, Senator Graham, do you trust -- you know, as you said, more eyes looking at this program. Do you trust your colleagues in Congress to look at this super secret program and not to leak it?

GRAHAM: Yes, I do. Obviously, the New York Times article hurt the program, but the idea of the two branches working together is a constitutional must. It's not a nicety.

I think when Congress and the executive branch and the judicial branch are all together on the same sheet of music, we're stronger as a country. So whatever downside there may be to having Congress involved, the upside is greater. Having congressional support for a program like this makes us stronger as a nation.

I do believe we can provide oversight in a meaningful way without compromising the program, and I am adamant that the courts have some role when it comes to warrants. If you're going to follow an American citizen around for an extended period of time believing they're collaborating with the enemy, at some point in time, you need to get some judicial review, because mistakes can be made.

WALLACE: Senator Bayh, how do you feel about congressional oversight? How do you feel about court oversight? And do you think the White House will go along with it?

BAYH: It's nice to have some bipartisan agreement on your show here this morning, Chris. Look, we need to do what it takes to protect this country, period. There have been some technological changes that have taken place over the last 30 years that means that we need to go about that a little bit different way, and this program is doing that.

But at the same time, I've seen no reason, as Lindsey pointed out, that we can't do what it takes to protect America while also safeguarding our civil liberties. If there are some practical problems, the administration needs to come to us and tell us what they are so we can work with them to address those.

But it is in the administration's best interest to ensure there is some neutral party overseeing this to make sure that it's done right. Otherwise, you're going to have a number of Americans out there who incorrectly think that J. Edgar Hoover has been brought back to life and that there could be abuses taking place. And we don't want people to have to think that.

WALLACE: Let me ask you both about another program that just really sort of bubbled up to the surface this week. The Bush administration has just approved a company from the United Arab Emirates called Dubai Ports World buying and taking over some of the operations, as you can see there on the screen, of six of America's biggest ports.

Some of your colleagues, both Republicans and Democrats, say that this is potentially a serious security breach.

Senator Bayh, should this sale be blocked?

BAYH: I think we've got to look into this company, Chris. I think we've got to ensure ourselves that the American people's national security interests are going to be protected. And frankly, I think the threshold ought to be a little higher for a foreign firm. There can't be a choice between profits and protecting the American people.

We have to do, even if it costs us a couple extra bucks, what it takes to protect this country. I'll give you one little example. About 80 percent of the magnets that make our smart bombs go are now made in China. It's not smart to rely on China to produce important weapons systems for this country, just like it's not smart to outsource our port security if there's any doubt.

So, look. We have to do what it takes to protect America. When in doubt, if it costs us a little more money, well, that's the price of freedom.

WALLACE: Would you like to see a congressional investigation of this?

BAYH: I think we need to look into it to reassure ourselves, yes.

WALLACE: Senator Graham, your view about the sale of this company to Dubai Ports World and whether or not Congress should take a role in either blocking or at least investigating it.

GRAHAM: We certainly should investigate it. I don't know if we should block it. But it's unbelievably tone deaf politically at this point in our history, four years after 9/11, to entertain the idea of turning port security over to a company based in the UAE, who avows to destroy Israel.

So I'm not so sure it's the wisest political move we could have made. Most Americans are scratching their head wondering why this company, from this region, now.

WALLACE: Well, given that, why even consider going ahead with the sale, sir?
GRAHAM: Well, because I don't want to make a judgment without all the facts. Just on its face, it sounds like the wrong direction to go. We did this a few months ago with a Chinese company trying to buy some energy resources in the country.

Americans right now want free trade, but when it comes to national security issues, we want to maintain the infrastructure ourselves. We believe we're under siege. We are. I don't think now is the time to outsource major port security to a foreign-based company.

WALLACE: Senator Bayh, one last area I want to get into with you. It's no secret that you are actively considering a run for president in 2008. Last year, a senator from Indiana, you visited 22 states. By the end of the year, you had about $10 million in hand.

But let's take a look at the polls, if we can. According to the Cook Political Report, in a Democratic horse race, Senator Clinton, as you can see there, is way ahead. Senator Kerry is next. And you're back -- here you come -- in eighth place at 3 percent. With all due respect, sir, why isn't this a waste of your time and money?

BAYH: Chris, I care about the future of our country more than I do the polls. And I'm deeply concerned about the direction in which we're going, and I'm deeply concerned that this city that we're in today, Washington, D.C., is broken and rather than being an instrument for addressing our challenges has become an obstacle.

So I'm thinking about what role I might play in doing something about all of that. And it involves something more important than reading public opinion polls. You know, you do what you think is right. The politics tends to take care of itself.

WALLACE: Senator, one last question in this regard. You talked about the fact that Democrats, fairly or not, are viewed as soft.

BAYH: You'll give me credit for managing expectations well, Chris?

WALLACE: Yes. Yes. I would agree that nobody is overestimated at this point.

You talk about the fact that Democrats are viewed as being soft on national security. Given people's perceptions of her, fair or not, wouldn't be it a hard sell for the frontrunner in those polls that we just saw, Hillary Clinton, to persuade people that she can be tough on national security?

BAYH: Oh, I don't think so. If you're referring to her agenda, Chris, I think that's irrelevant.

WALLACE: I wasn't referring to her agenda.

BAYH: Well, OK. No, look. This is a general perception for our party. It is an inaccurate one. It's one that we need to take on. It is a threshold issue for a future commander in chief. Can we be tough enough and smart enough to protect this country?

Anyone who's going to be the nominee of our party and the president of the United States needs to meet that threshold first.

WALLACE: We're going to have to leave it there. Senator Bayh, Senator Graham, we want to thank you both so much for joining us and coming in today.

GRAHAM: Thank you.

BAYH: Thank you.

WALLACE: Up next, former Senator Alan Simpson on the week that was for his close friend, Dick Cheney, after this quick break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HARRY WHITTINGTON, ATTORNEY: My family and I are deeply sorry for all that Vice President Cheney and his family have had to go through this past week.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was Harry Whittington, the victim in last Sunday's hunting accident, apologizing to the vice president for all the fuss.

To get an idea of how Mr. Cheney has been getting through what he described as a very long week, we turn now to one of his closest friends in politics, former Senator Alan Simpson, who joins us from Cody, Wyoming.

And, Senator, welcome to Fox News Sunday .

SIMPSON: It's always a pleasure, Chris. And it's rosy-fingered dawn out here, and I'm up.

WALLACE: Well, good. We want you to be up at rosy-fingered dawn.

SIMPSON: I just want to tell -- let me just say, it was very interesting hearing Lindsey and Evan Bayh. Evan Bayh won't be in eighth place when the race narrows up. That's a very splendid man, and I served with his dad. Enough of that. And I know Lindsey, too. Go ahead. Shoot the works.

WALLACE: All right. Thank you, Senator. It's always a pleasure. I want to start with something that the vice president said to Brit Hume in his interview. Let's take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CHENEY: The image of him falling is something I'll never be able to get out of my mind. I fired, and there's Harry falling. And it was, I'd have to say, one of the worst days of my life at that moment.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Now, your friend is not a touchy-feely guy who generally lets people feel his emotions. But I've got to tell you, Senator, I was struck by how pained he seems to have been by this incident.

SIMPSON: Well, I haven't talked to him, because the first few days of it, I was in Ohio, and they were calling me, and I had the sense that they were saying have you talked to Cheney, and if you did, what did he say you should say -- in other words, a sinister approach to put a spin on it.

I haven't talked with him. As soon as this is over, I will have done all these, and I'm going to call him. But let me tell you, he probably went home that day when he got back to Lynn and probably put his head down on her shoulder and cried, because this guy -- think of how you would feel if you pulled up any kind of a gun and a human being was in front of it and he dropped. And then you went over to see him and he didn't say anything.

I always say in this line of work, how would you feel if this were happening to you -- not you, Chris, I mean, but there is a human element here that got lost in the perfect storm of people who don't like Cheney. They don't like hunting. They don't like guns. They don't like people who kill birds and eat them. I mean, good grief.

WALLACE: Some of his friends have been quoted in the press as saying they worry about the toll this is taking on the vice president. And let me point out not the political controversy, but, as you say, the human feeling about having shot his friend. Do you worry about that?

SIMPSON: I don't, because of what Whittington has said. These two have known each other -- if you hunt quail -- I can remember a lot of pellets falling around me. Of course, when you're six foot seven, a lot of them fall around you, but none at that range. But it is a devastating thing. It has to be. I can't imagine an accident like that.

But as long as Whittington -- I'll bet Whittington will call him. He's going to visit with his old pals on those wonderful places where you hunt quail, and it's not going to deter him from doing that, but it certainly, you know, is always in your craw, whatever you've done like that...

WALLACE: Senator, as we...

SIMPSON: ... the pain of it, the pain of it.

WALLACE: Senator, as we mentioned, Democrats have taken this opportunity to pound on the vice president and the White House for what they say is a display of arrogance. Let's take a look at some of that, sir.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY): A tendency of this administration from the top all the way to the bottom is to withhold information.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR HARRY REID (D-NV), MINORITY LEADER: This administration is the most secretive administration in modern history.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senator, what do you make of that?

SIMPSON: Well, you know, that's an interesting pitch, but we haven't had another 9/11, so something good must be going on with all this, quote, evil, secret stuff. And then this business of the 20- hour gap -- I mean, it is a laugher. I mean, that's a laugher. It's a lot more sinister than the 18 minutes on Rosemary Woods' tape with Nixon. I mean, what is this? What are they doing?

Let me tell you, the American people know that when you have an accident on your ranch, and you're the host, and a guy gets bucked off a horse and has a concussion, or there's a hunting accident, your first impression is not to pick up the phone and call your dearest, you know, A.P. or Reuters or Bloomberg. That is not the first thing in your head.

First thing is take care of the guy, go to the hospital, call his relatives, sit down, say who wants to do this. As I understand it, Dick said, you know, to her it's your call. And the sadness, the tragedy, was that she called the Corpus Christi Caller Times instead of the New York Times. This has just got them all worked up, for God's sake. WALLACE: Some Republicans, though, Senator, have also been unhappy with the way the vice president handled this. I want to point out one example. Peggy Noonan, the former Reagan speech writer, wrote an article in the Wall Street Journal in which she said that Dick Cheney has become the hate magnet for this administration.

And then she went on to say this. Take a look. She said, So Mr. Bush may feel in time that he has reason to want to put in a new vice president in order to pick a successor who'll presumably have an edge in the primaries. Senator Simpson, what do you make of that?

SIMPSON: Well, we have a word for it, but we won't use it here, out here in the wild west. Let me tell you, that is -- she is a wonderful gal. And I mean, I know her, and when I read her words, they're lyrical and they're marvelous.

Dick Cheney has become the hate symbol from the beginning. He was the hate symbol when he was with Halliburton. He was the hate symbol when he came in and the votes with South Africa and this and that. And then he was the hate symbol of hiding an energy conference. He was the hate symbol of terrorists, hate symbol of torture.

Let me tell you, those who don't like him have put a big red tail on his bum, and cloven hooves, and horns on his head. And let me tell you, if anybody thinks -- if this had happened to anybody else in America, it would have been like a sparrow belch in a typhoon.

WALLACE: Could you be a little more colorful, Senator?

SIMPSON: Well, I don't think I could, because it really is absurd. It's absolutely absurd. I go around the country. I travel all the time. And the American people are just shaking their heads and saying it's a hunting accident, a tragic hunting accident -- a victim, a guy who's hurt, and a guy who's hurt because he shot, who's pained, who's anguished. What's new, for God's sakes?

WALLACE: Senator, perhaps the most interesting part of all this is what we learned about the vice president over the course of the last week. In his interview with Brit Hume, he said that he thinks, as you just pointed out, that the national press corps is upset because they were left out, and then he added this shot. Listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CHENEY: It strikes me that the Corpus Christi Caller Times is just as valid a news outlet as the New York Times is, especially for covering a major story in South Texas.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Fair to say that your friend doesn't have much regard for the mainstream press, sir?

SIMPSON: I tell you, no. I think he has a high regard for the press, but he has a dismissiveness to stupidity. And where it started, where it started was when he and Colin Powell and Pete Williams, their press guy, when he was secretary of defense, answering questions on the first Gulf War, questions like when will you attack, where will the attack take place and how many forces.

Now, you've got to have rock for brains to ask questions like that. And I think at that time he just thought if they're goofy like that, you know, why not just stay away from them.

WALLACE: So summing up here, Senator -- and we love your tour of this whole event -- what does the last week tell us or should it tell us about Washington, about the politicians, about the press corps?

SIMPSON: Well, it tells you what -- you should listen to Lindsey Graham and Evan Bayh and know that, really, there is cooperation, but what it really tells you, what are we going to expect of the national press corps, and especially the Washington press corps, when something really happens.

How are we to trust, after a whole week of absolute dribble, and babble, and people, you know, interviewing themselves -- well, what do you think about Dick, oh, you know -- and Jay Leno and Letterman -- I asked them how would you feel if this happened to you.

Let me tell you, the American people are really waiting with sense of glee when something really, really happens in America, and I suppose they'll just have a catatonic stroke and pitch forward on their faces.

WALLACE: So I take it, Senator, do you really miss this place?

SIMPSON: No, I do. I loved it. I did. I loved it. And I loved it because it was fun. And I have a lot of pals on both sides of the aisle. I worked with President Clinton. I enjoyed him. President Bush, President Carter -- good people doing good things.

But let me tell you, you'll never find it if you just follow the Washington media. You'll never know the good. All you get is controversy, crap and confusion.

WALLACE: Well, there you go. That's a slogan. I've got to put that on a bumper sticker. Senator Simpson, we want to thank you.

SIMPSON: Yes.

WALLACE: It is, as always, a pleasure to talk with you, sir.

SIMPSON: A delight, Chris, you bet.

WALLACE: Up next, the media feeding frenzy over the vice president's accident. Sound reporting or just a chance to sound off? We'll ask our panel, Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams. Back in a moment.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CONNIE LAWN, AUDIO-VISUAL NEWS: Is it proper for the vice president to offer his resignation or has he offered his resignation?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

VICTORIA JONES, TALK RADIO NEWS SERVICE: And I was wondering whether this has caused Mr. Cheney to reflect on the kind of trauma that's experienced daily by the men and women in the military who have to shoot people?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

DAVID GREGORY, NBC NEWS: Don't tell me that you're giving us complete answers when you're not actually answering the question, because everybody knows what is an answer and what is not an answer.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was the scene at the White House briefing Monday with reporters in full throat over how the vice president's hunting accident was made public.

And it's panel time now for our Sunday regulars, Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams also from National Public Radio.

With all due respect, I think Alan Simpson would call all of us, what was it, controversy, crap and confusion.

HUME: Right.

WALLACE: He never lets you down, does he?

So, Brit, did the media handle this story well or did they over- handle it?

HUME: Did the media handle it well? WALLACE: Yes.

HUME: No, it was a slow news week in Washington, which contributed enormously to this, and there's this sort of perception among White House reporters that they are disdained, circumvented, ignored, overlooked, bypassed, and not taken seriously.

And this delay of, what, some 20 hours for the revelation that this hunting accident had occurred, and then its placement in the local paper in south Texas, obviously, contributed to the sense that once again, the press was being dissed and that something important had been withheld, and it feeds into the culture of secrecy and all that, so you had this Beltway firestorm.

And I've got to tell you, Chris, I think that this issue beyond the Beltway has no attraction.

LIASSON: With the exception of the late-night comedians, who had a field day with this, this is a story that was pretty easy to understand. The vice president shoots somebody. Then there was the issue of whether he should have disclosed it sooner or handled it differently.

And on that, there's a remarkable amount of consensus. There is a Time poll that showed 65 percent thought he should have taken immediate responsibility as opposed to waiting. And I guess among that number would be President Bush, whose spokesman made it pretty clear that he also thought that Cheney maybe should have come out sooner.

But at the same time, the Time poll showed that 69 percent said this would have no effect at all on their opinion of the vice president, which nationally is pretty low. I think his approval rating is 29 percent.

So I think, overall, is this an important, significant story that will change something politically? No. For people who -- including members of the press, who feel this White House is too secretive and the vice president has too much power and is unchecked, this becomes a metaphor for that.

KRISTOL: Time, of course, chose to put this on the cover in its next week's issue with this very dark, ominous subhead, How One Shot at a Quail Hunt Turned a Gentile Quail

Hunt into a Political Crisis. And then they highlight in their press release the first number Mara mentioned. Most people think Cheney should have come forward a little earlier. What they don't highlight are some -- let me just mention a couple of additional numbers from the poll.

Do you approve of how the vice president handled this? Fifty- two-42, yes, approve. What's your general approval or disapproval of the vice president? It's the same as the president, almost identical to the president's approval rating. And this is my favorite: Do you think the vice president is an asset to the president and to his administration or damaging? Forty-one-37, an asset. Cheney is not hurting the Bush administration. If anything, he's helping it some. I think he's a political and substantive asset to the Bush administration. This accidental shooting has done nothing at all to hurt, to change, the numbers on Cheney.

Time obviously commissioned this poll desperately hoping Cheney's numbers plummet, damaging Bush administration. They couldn't find a thing like that. So it tells you much more about the press corps than the vice president, I think.

WILLIAMS: Well, I think it tells you a lot about the press corps, because I think it's exactly right to say that the press corps -- I think this was an example of a week of repressed rage boiling over on the part of the press corps that the White House...

WALLACE: Press rage.

WILLIAMS: Yes, press rage. I think that's what we had here -- that they feel, you know, that for the longest time, if you think about the president -- you know, vice president's health issue, the energy panel, all that, that Cheney just doesn't want to talk. And he gets away with it.

He's a man who's not running for re-election. He's a man who, even among the White House staff, people feel, you know, he doesn't respond to any -- he doesn't answer to anybody except maybe the president. And you know, in terms of public imagery, there's -- the question is who's running this White House, is it Dick Cheney.

So I think this is a metaphor for lots of things, and I think it's going to stick around for a long time in the way that Carter and the killer rabbit had a problem, in the way that Quayle and potato had a problem, in the way that Gerald Ford and chewing gum had a problem. This is a metaphor for the secretive, imperial Dick Cheney.

HUME: Oh, please. If this will be remembered for anything very much, a big part of it will be the behavior of the press corps. And this is something that reporters need to be careful about, because whatever the situation is, if the press acts like a pack of jackals, which is -- clearly, the examples you saw are a sample of that, the sympathy almost always turns in the public toward not the controversy itself, or the victims, or whoever. It always turns toward the briefer and the people on the other side of the questions.

Reporters have an obligation, if they're concerned about something, to ask tough questions but be courteous and respectful about it, which puts the focus on the answers. This week the questioners put the focus on themselves. They behaved badly. And I think that feeds into the perceptions that are reflected in that poll, which came out rather remarkably well for the vice president and the administration.

LIASSON: You know what, there's a difference, though, between the behavior in the White House briefing room and the actual coverage. I mean, the three examples that you chose there, one of whom was, you could say, kind of a major mainstream reporter, David Gregory of NBC News -- the other two questioners are rather minor, represent rather minor journalism outlets.

Look, I think that the coverage, including on the late-night comedians' show, which is what gave this a lot of legs, was quite different than the behavior in the press room, which I agree can be pretty raucous and reflect poorly on the press as a whole.

WALLACE: Bill, let me ask you about one aspect of this that I'm interested in, and that's the dynamic in the White House. When you were chief of staff to Dan Quayle and he was in one of his occasional mishaps, did White House officials ever say to you here's how we want the vice president to handle this?

KRISTOL: Sure, sure.

WALLACE: And would you?

KRISTOL: Sometimes. I mean, you know, there's always tension between the vice president's staff and the president's staff. In this case, I know for a fact, since I had one of these conversations, that there were people in the White House who were unhappy on Monday night and Tuesday before the vice president had his interview with Brit, that he needs to come out faster. But they're childish.

I mean, I would say the White House -- the vice president's political judgment is actually better than that of the White House communications staff, which panics if there's one day of bad press and thinks that this is destroying our -- this is getting us off message, Bush was giving an important speech. Was he giving any important speeches -- I don't know -- on health care or something last week?

I think there's always a tendency, if you work for the president, to resent the fact that the vice president, if he's made some error, you know, and done something that he wishes he hadn't done, is stepping on the message of the day or two.

WALLACE: But I guess what I'm getting at is that I covered a White House, and I know in the White House I covered, the Reagan White House, that if the chief of staff, James baker, had called George H.W. Bush's office and said we want you to do something, it would have happened.

KRISTOL: Right. Well, I think...

WALLACE: I'm not saying that's good or bad, but I find it interesting that with this vice president it didn't happen.

KRISTOL: Well, what I'm struck by -- well, they should call the vice president's chief of staff and say it, then. I mean, there's an awful lot of -- they're scared to take on the vice president.

But you know, maybe they should just make a phone call to Dave Addington, the chief of staff, and say we think the vice president should go out. But they're scared to take him on. And then they sort of background to reporters -- well, the president -- you know, we're a little unhappy with the way the vice president's handling this. WALLACE: Let me just -- before we leave this subject, Brit, you became part of the story this week with your interview, the only interview with the vice president, and some of our colleagues in the press compared it to Bonnie interviewing Clyde, a Soviet leader sitting down with Pravda. How do you respond?

HUME: You know, I thought there'd be more of that than there was, actually, but that kind of thing completely misses the point of what was going on here. The last thing in the world that Dick Cheney needed on that day was a soft interview, because he was trying to get this thing over with.

And the only way to get it over with was to answer every question that anybody might have, within reason. So, you know, I was headed down to the White House to do the interview that day, and I was thinking you know, I've had interviews with Vice President Cheney in which he has not been tremendously forthcoming, and I thought God, you know, what am I going to do if he does that.

And then the more I thought about it, the more I thought there's no way he was going to do that. But my job was simply to sit there and walk through this episode with him and ask all the relevant questions, because he was ready to answer them and needed to answer them. That's why, you know, there's no problem about asking about the drinking, no problem about any of it.

And that was why the interview, I think, came out as it did, because he was ready to talk, and knew he needed to, and to get it over with, and I think that, you know, except for the -- except for the shouting here that goes on in the little aftermath and the silly news weeklies, this thing is over.

WALLACE: It's over for us. Thank you all, panel, for that segment. We have to take a break.

But coming up, security for America's ports. Why are some Democrats and Republicans outraged over a decision by the Bush administration? Some answers in a moment.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: On this day in 1945, 30,000 U.S. Marines landed on Iwo Jima. It took the U.S. 36 days to gain control of the Japanese island and its airspace. The battle changed the course of World War II. Stay tuned for more panel and our Power Player of the Week.

WALLACE: And we're back now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan. Well, there were a number of developments this week on the national security front, and let's deal with some of them.

Juan, the Bush administration approving a company in Dubai buying and taking over operations at six of America's biggest ports -- both liberal Democrats and conservative Republicans are upset about this one.

WILLIAMS: Well, you're going to have Senate hearings later this month on just this subject, but the idea that the Bush administration went ahead and did this, with really very little diligence in terms of checking, I think not only in terms of the security issue, which I would hope that they did some diligence on, but it's not clear that they did, but also with -- in terms of the politics, I think that they're -- earlier, I forget if it was Evan Bayh or Lindsey Graham who said it seemed tone deaf politically.

I think it was tone deaf...

WALLACE: Senator Graham.

WILLIAMS: ... politically, because what it's played out with is it's caused a tremendous stir among the Republican base, much more so than anywhere else. I think conservatives are concerned that somehow you are inviting, you know, the wolf or the fox into the chicken coop.

WALLACE: Now, Brit, there was an interagency panel that reviewed this, a panel headed by Treasury Secretary Snow. And Michael Chertoff, who's been on another show today, said, in fact, that there was a thorough vetting of the security of this company.

HUME: You know, this isn't a security issue. This is a political issue. And it doesn't sound good if you're going to let some Arab sheiks take charge of our ports. That's what it comes down to politically. I don't think the administration will be able to sustain this.

I think it will have to reverse itself in some way or create some entity that stands between the company and the management of the port. I just don't think -- it's just too politically troublesome.

WALLACE: I mean, one of the things about this, Mara, that I have to say I enjoy -- isn't this a perfect free shot politically for Democrats to play hawk, to attack George W. Bush from the right -- we're more concerned about security than you are?

LIASSON: Well, yes, but questions about port security have been raised ever since 9/11, and not just by Democrats. I mean, this is kind of one of those lingering holes in the homeland security net, I mean, that cargo containers are not checked or not enough of them, and the ports are considered vulnerable.

And those issues have not been addressed satisfactorily for a lot of members of Congress in both parties, and now you've got a company from a country that is not a 100 percent ally of ours in the war on terrorism coming in to run security. I think it raises a lot of questions. And I agree with Brit, I think it's going to be hard to sustain this.

KRISTOL: Yes, the interagency committee that does this is led by Treasury. It has a preference for encouraging foreign investment in the United States, which is on the whole a sensible idea. They've rejected one of 1,500 such applications, though, since 1988 when this interagency committee was started.

They act in private, which is fine. It's within government committee, but there have never been, therefore, public hearings where it was explained, if it's the case, that there's no security problem, that the Department of Homeland Security handles the security at the ports, that this corporation, though headquartered in Dubai, is just as reliable as some corporation headquartered in London.

If that's the day, the administration has done a very bad job of making that case. And I think it hurts a little bit when the president is fighting a general right on homeland security, and saying we're the tough guys, we're eavesdropping on international calls, we've got to do that for security, and suddenly on something that looks a little bit questionable on the surface, there's very poor public defense by the administration, public explanation by the administration, of why this shouldn't raise concerns. So it has given the Democrats a free shot.

WALLACE: Juan, let's talk about another issue. We also had a report this week from the human rights investigators for the U.N. calling for the camp at Guantanamo to be closed and for the detainees there to be tried or quickly released.

Now, Secretary General Kofi Annan said he did not endorse the report but made it clear that he pretty much agreed with the conclusions. Let's take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ANNAN: There would be a need to close the Guantanamo, and I think it will be up to the government to decide and hopefully to do it as soon as is possible.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: In fact, even the British seemed to be deserting us on Guantanamo this week. WILLIAMS: Well, it's not official. I mean, people say that Tony Blair feels this way. Tony Blair says it's up in the air, we need to discuss it, that it's really an anachronism at this point to still have these people held there.

But you're seeing these critics come from all over the map. I think this week has been obscured a little bit by the tempest over Vice President Cheney, but the fact is you had Secretary Rice up on Capitol Hill being excoriated by Republicans over what's going on in the Middle East policy, especially with the election of Hamas.

You had Chertoff on the Hill, again, being excoriated by Republicans about the handling of Katrina. You had a report come out on Katrina from a Republican committee saying that this substantially was ineffectual, a failure of initiative by the administration to properly handle it.

And you have Secretary Rumsfeld coming out and saying that the State Department, Karen Hughes and her effort to try to try to spread the American message in the Middle East, is not being sufficiently strong in terms of matching the message that's coming from our opponents.

I mean, it looks like there's lots of arguments about the way that policy is being done, and you know, it's easy to say oh, it's those Democrats, or it's those liberals, or if you disagree with this you're unpatriotic. But here's criticism coming from inside, so that's a different kind of criticism.

HUME: Chris, this is a huge problem, the idea of closing Guantanamo Bay. The leak and publication of the fact that we had facilities in Eastern Europe has led to the loss of those facilities, perhaps all of them.

If you're fighting a war on terror, an unusual kind of war, and you round people up, as at times you must, you need a place to put them, you need a place to question them, and Guantanamo is one such place. We've lost some already. This is a hindrance.

And it gets down to this whole question that's been there from the beginning of what kind of war this is. Is this a real war, a shooting war, a bloody war where rough things get done and everything is not a law enforcement operation, and you round people up, you capture them, and you hold them the way you do in a war, or is this something else?

The something else view has some sway on Capitol Hill, largely among Democrats, but also among such people as Chuck Hagel, people of that stripe. And I think that this is a serious problem for this administration. This whole issue and the need for these facilities is a big problem.

WILLIAMS: And now you see the administration is going to have to play ball with the Hill on the warrantless wiretaps. They're agreeing to go forward with some kind of law. That's been a tremendous shift this week. HUME: You know what caused that, though, Juan? The original feeling about not having any new legislation to authorize this in any way was believed by everybody involved, including the members of Congress who had been briefed, to be unwise because it would blow the cover of the program.

Well, that was taken care of now by the New York Times, so the need for all of that has diminished, and that opens the way for the administration to go along with added authorization.

LIASSON: Well, it took them a long time after the New York Times report to get to that. But look. Something is going to have to be done about Guantanamo to kind of rationalize the legal system and the legal appeals that these prisoners get. It's working its way through the U.S. courts, and they're going to weigh in on this, too.

WALLACE: Having said all that, there are 500 prisoners there. They're going to have to do something with them. All right, panel. Thank you. That's it for today. See you next week.

Time now for some mail about the criticism of President Bush at Coretta Scott King's funeral. Laura Hicks from Illinois writes, It is totally appropriate for the people who knew and love her to say what comes to their hearts to express whatever sentiment they want to express.

But Joan from Florida saw it differently. Mrs. King's funeral was used by Reverend Lowery for political purposes. This wasn't a eulogy. It was rhetoric to do harm to our president.

And Paul Oskay from Virginia offered this, I find interesting that you consider the reporting of the Muslim cartoons as a freedom of speech issue and some of the speeches at the funeral of the wife of Dr. Martin Luther King as inappropriate speech. Shouldn't both be considered freedom of speech?

WALLACE: As you enjoy this Presidents' Day weekend, we hope you'll take a moment to think of those American leaders.

This week we visited the site of a national tragedy that's been turned into a national treasure. It's the job of our Power Player of the Week.

PAUL TETREAULT, PRODUCING DIRECTOR, FORD'S THEATER: People will come here thinking they want to just see the tourist attraction, and they'll end up coming to see the theater. WALLACE: Paul Tetreault is producing director of Ford's Theater, a place with two very different personalities. By day, it's run by the National Park Service. Tourists come to see where Abraham Lincoln was assassinated.

TETREAULT: There are over a million people a year that come to Ford's Theater.

WALLACE: But by night, 100,000 people a year come for the same reason Lincoln did on April 14, 1865, to see a play.

TETREAULT: The house opens at 7 o'clock. They come in, and between 7:00 and 7:30, all they do is ooh and ah over the box, the place where that act happened. And then all of a sudden, the lights go down, and suddenly people are transformed.

WALLACE: After Lincoln's murder, the government turned Ford's Theater into an office building. Based on civil war photos, it was rebuilt and reopened in 1968. Even though it's a reconstruction, when Tetreault showed us the path of assassin John Wilkes Booth into the president's box, the sense of history was overwhelming.

TETREAULT: So he opens this door. He comes in at a loud moment in the play. Abraham Lincoln is sitting here. Mary Todd Lincoln is sitting there. He shoots the president about six inches away from his head.

WALLACE: One shot, back of the head...

TETREAULT: One shot, back of the head, and it was...

WALLACE: ... and history is changed forever.

Tetreault's job now is to take advantage of the history, to turn all those tourists into theatergoers. One thing he wants to tap into is Lincoln's legacy.

TETREAULT: Abraham Lincoln loved the performing arts. He came to Ford's Theater 10 to 12 different times during his presidency.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ACTRESS: I think (inaudible) more than anything in the whole world.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Of course, Tetreault understands if you want to attract audiences, it's the productions that count.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ACTOR: This will be my final year.

(END VIDEO CLIP) WALLACE: He wants to make Ford's the theater in Washington for American classics. But there is also the setting, a sort of time machine that transports you back to the 19th century.

As you stand here, it's remarkable how intimate it is. I mean, you're right up on the stage.

TETREAULT: This place is an amazing jewel box. Everyone who performs here -- all of the performers stand on that stage and just say it's so intimate.

WALLACE: And that is Tetreault's goal, to bring together the historic site and the active theater and create a true landmark for America's living history.

TETREAULT: Where you have sort of America's most famous theater, and not just famous for that act in 1865, but famous for wonderful and brilliant theatrical performances that really speak to America.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: One more thing we learned from our tour. General Grant was also supposed to be in the president's box that night but canceled at the last minute.

And that's it for today. Have a great week. And we'll see you next Fox News Sunday .

CBS – FACE THE NATION

SCHIEFFER: And good morning again. With us now, the Republican leader in the Senate, Bill Frist. Joining in the questioning this morning, Elisabeth Bumiller of the New York Time.

Well, we had quite an episode last week, Senator Frist, involving the vice president, the shooting accident.

I must say, as I was preparing for this program this morning, it seemed to me there was one question here. And that was, has this hurt Republicans in general?

But now Time Magazine has done some extraordinary reporting. They're reporting this morning that the president himself had to lean on the vice president to get this out in the open and made public.

We're told that at one point, the day after the shooting, the vice president was considering issuing a statement that did not even reveal that he had been the shooter.

What do you think about all this and the way it's been handled?

FRIST: You know, Bob, as a surgeon, I've been involved in taking care of lots and lots and lots of patients who have been shot both in the heart and in the chest and, always, my concern goes with the victim.

And it was great two days ago, or on Friday to see Mr. Whittington look so good, so healthy and not be hurt. So our thoughts and prayers are with him.

And then, it does go to the person who accidentally pulled the trigger. And there, the vice president has come forward and said that he did it. He said it was the worst day of his life. He was distraught about that. And he took full responsibility.

The actual timing -- I'm not saying the particular story you're talking about -- I do think what America does not want to see is what happened right afterward.

And that is where the Democratic leadership tried to inject partisan politics into what is a very, very tragic accident and an accident that did happen.

SCHIEFFER: Well, but, Senator, I mean, shouldn't this have been made public if, for no other reason, for the administration and the vice president's own good?

I mean, one can understand that he clearly was not thinking straight. And who would, after thinking they had killed their best friend -- or one of his best friends?

And, clearly, that's what he thought at the time. There's no question the man was shaken.

But the fact -- to hold this for a full day without giving an accounting of it and then to go back and find out that they were going to issue a statement, or at least thinking of a statement that didn't even mention that he was the one with the gun?

I mean, isn't that just going to raise all kinds of questions?

FRIST: Bob, I think we'll just have to let it play out. And I think the discussion of the story -- it will continue in terms of the specifics of the timing.

I am thankful that nobody did get killed. The vice president has taken full responsibility for that. The story, I'm sure, will continue to play out. A lot of other important business of the nation is being set aside. And I'm going to be focusing on that.

SCHIEFFER: Well, but let me just ask you on that. I won't make the whole broadcast about this, but has the vice president become a liability to the White House? Has he become a liability to your party?

FRIST: You know, absolutely not. Absolutely not. He is a bold leader. He understands and works very closely with the vision of the president of the United States in securing America's future to a safer, stronger country.

That means he has to be both a leader as well as a participant. And I think he does it very, very well.

BUMILLER: Senator Frist, let me just ask you one more question about this. The president signaled very strongly this week that he was not happy with the way this was disclosed. It's quite obvious.

Are you not willing -- are you happy with the way this was disclosed?

FRIST: You know, I'm going to leave it to them. I'm running over here another body, the legislative branch of government that was not involved in this situation at all.

Again, I'm very thankful that this tragic accident has been and is being resolved and that nobody was hurt irreparably. And I don't think it is appropriate to try to inject partisan politics into this particular event.

BUMILLER: Let me just ask, as a heart surgeon, one last question. This is a man who has a BB embedded in his heart. Can he live a healthy life like that?

FRIST: Yes. We leave pellets, bullets, in people all the time. In fact, a very clear indication -- I think just looking at him the other day -- that it looks like he is in great shape.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let's talk about something else. I take it that you're ready to talk about something else.

Senator Roberts, the chairman of the Intelligence Committee, said this week that he now believes that they're going to have to do something, either rewrite the laws or find some way to bring White House eavesdropping under the law and under the intelligence court that rules on whether or not these things are legal and is the one responsible for issuing the court orders to authorize it. Where do you come down on that?

FRIST: Bob, I am working on this every day, a very important issue because of the value of this program, a program that most everybody understands is absolutely critical to the safety and the security of all the viewers right now, the American people.

And that's the president's bottom line, as I've talked to him and the administration. There are a lot of issues that do need to be addressed.

I am one of those eight people, half Democrat, half Republican, who have been thoroughly reviewed with this program, discussed with this program. I believe the program -- I know the program is constitutional, that it is legal.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let me just stop and let me just get back to the question.

FRIST: It is legal.

SCHIEFFER: Since you know all about it, as you're one of the eight who knows more about it than the others...

FRIST: Right.

SCHIEFFER: ... do you think that the whole situation needs to be brought under the control of the court?

Do you think we either need new laws to do that or do you think it's okay to just keep going as you're going?

FRIST: Bob, there are two issues we're looking at. One of them that Senator Roberts mentioned is the overall oversight.

And the question -- are eight people, half Democrat, half Republican sufficient in terms of giving oversight, being briefed on this program?

And we're going to continue to discuss that as we talked about at the end of last week.

And then the second is new legislation required. That's also what's going to be discussed. Do we need to update the FISA, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act? Do we need to update that 1978 act today in this 21st century of technology?

And it's a question we are asking and will ask. Does it have to be thrown over to the courts, going back to your question? I don't think so. I personally don't think so.

SCHIEFFER: You don't think that the court needs to issue a court order before they do that?

FRIST; No.

SCHIEFFER: Do you think the law needs to be rewritten? I mean, you say you're going to look into it.

What's your feeling? Is it your sense that it is probably going to have to be rewritten?

FRIST: I can't really answer that now. I don't think that it does need to be rewritten, but we are holding hearings in the Judiciary Committee right now.

They've already begun under Arlen Specter and Pat Leahy. They're looking at whether we do need to put more statutory discipline around that. We have not been able to answer that yet.

BUMILLER: Senator Frist, what went wrong with the Medicare drug program?

FRIST: Well, it's interesting. The prescription drug program you're talking about -- first of all, I think no one would argue with the fact that giving seniors access -- affordable access -- to prescription drugs which they did not have before this program is a wrong thing.

BUMILLER: Right, but Senator Frist...

FRIST: And, secondly -- to go on to your question. What went wrong Right now...

BUMILLER: Hundreds of thousands of seniors were denied benefits because of computer glitches. I could go through a long list. So tell me what went wrong.

FRIST: The fact that, in a period of about six weeks, we took 25 million people who now have affordable access to prescription drugs and put them in a federal program and six weeks ago they were not in that federal program.

BUMILLER: But are you saying nothing went wrong?

FRIST: No, I didn't say nothing went wrong. Please don't put words in my mouth.

With that, you take 25 million people. You put them in a new government program. There are all sorts of stumbles and glitches and there is confusion.

So things have not been smooth, but the fact that, right now, a million prescriptions are being delivered each day, through a program that didn't exist, where seniors no longer have to choose between food in their refrigerator and medicines which are life saving is a good thing.

And I predict that six months from now or a year of a program that gives seniors affordable access to prescription drugs which are life saving, which they didn't have before which on average saves them $1400, is something that those seniors will appreciate.

BUMILLER: Will this be a liability for the Republicans in the '06 elections?

FRIST: No. The fact that we are giving seniors affordable access to prescription drugs by choice -- it's voluntarily -- that they didn't have before. Of course it won't be a liability. I think it will be a huge plus.

SCHIEFFER: Senator, the capitol has been engulfed in a corruption scandal, bribes, all kinds of things happening up there.

For a while, it looked like that people were ready to really get in there with some tough laws and reform them. But now the Republicans have elected a new leader over on the House side. He seems to be backing away from all of that.

I'm beginning to wonder, is the Congress just going to let this sort of fall under the cracks, or are you going to do something about it?

FRIST: Bob, speaking from the standpoint of the Senate, my goal -- our goal is to restore faith and confidence in our government today. And it's low right now.

SCHIEFFER: Well, aren't you going to have some tough new laws to do that?

FRIST: Yes, yes. And so what we did is very aggressively come back, and in a bipartisan way, with the leadership of Rick Santorum, John McCain, Joe Lieberman, put together a plan that with constant meetings, hearings, both in the Rules Committee, hearings in the Government Affairs Committee that have already been conducted. The week we get back from this recess, that bill will be marked up, and the following week we will have a very strong lobbying reform bill and ethics reform bill on the floor of the Senate. (inaudible).

SCHIEFFER: Will it include outlawing travel paid for by other people?

FRIST: It will be -- the bill hasn't been written or marked up yet. But the things that will be looked at is much further disclosure, much further transparency. Gifts, whether or not they should be banned, will be looked at, and how much travel should be paid for by outside groups. All of that will be looked at. And there will be a lot of restrictions. There will be a lot more definition between K Street and Capitol Hill.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Thank you, Senator.

FRIST: Good to be with you. Thanks, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: Back in a moment with a Democratic view on all of this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And joining us now from Rancho Mirage, California, Senator Barbara Boxer of California, who is a Democrat, of course.

Well, Senator Boxer, the Republican leader in the Senate says that the problem here with this Cheney episode is that Democratic leaders tried to inject partisan politics into the whole thing. What would you -- how would you respond to that?

BOXER: Well, this story has so many legs that it has nothing to do with partisan politics. Everybody is interested in it because it really speaks to vice president's penchant for secrecy. It now looks like he really, to the last moment, tried to keep it secret.

But you know, there was a mistake made. The vice president made the mistake. There was one victim. We all hope he'll get well. And I think what really resonates with the people I talked to is all the mistakes this administration is making where they don't own up to it and where there are thousands of people hurt, maybe millions of people hurt -- like the prescription drug benefit, like the fact that they raised the cost of student loans, like Iraq, where we now have 19,000 of our servicemen and women either dead or injured. And Katrina, which is still a mess.

We're talking about thousands and millions of people that are hurt by this administration. I think that's what's really important here.

SCHIEFFER: All right, well, let's go right to Elisabeth.

BUMILLER: Senator Boxer, this morning Michael Chertoff, the homeland security secretary, said that the Bush administration had made -- had had some secret -- had taken secret steps to -- about a company owned by the United Arab Emirates that is now running operations at six major American ports, including New York and Baltimore. He said they had taken secret steps to ensure that there would be no problem with this company. What do you say to that?

BOXER: It is ridiculous to say you're taking secret steps to make sure that it's OK for a nation that had ties to 9/11, could take over part of our port operations in many of our largest ports. This has to stop.

And what is the secrecy about? We have a committee headed by the secretary of the treasury, who is supposed to look at all of these purchases. Because what's happening here is this Dubai company is buying a British company.

My view is, I'm going to support legislation to say no more, no way. We have to have American companies running our own ports.

Our ports are soft targets. We're very worried about them. Al Qaida has said if they attack, that's one of the places they're looking. So this should be a no-brainer.

And for Michael Chertoff to say that they've looked at it in a secret way, this is the United States of America. What is all this secrecy anyway? We are supposed to be a democracy, where we let the American people know what's going on. And we know what's going on here. And this is just wrong. You don't have this company take over our ports. It's just wrong.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me just play the devil's advocate here, if I could, Senator.

BOXER: Sure.

SCHIEFFER: Nobody has questioned that this is not a good, solid company. It is owned by, you know, a company in Dubai. Why do you think this is dangerous for our security?

BOXER: Well, I just take it to the bigger picture. Since 9/11, we have to change the way we do things. And I just don't think any foreign company, period, ought to be running our ports.

Our infrastructure is at risk. We know it. Port security, nuclear plant security. Are we going to now have a foreign company oversee that? So it just seems to me very, very simple. And I don't think we're being overly paranoid. Very simple to say that our infrastructure has to be protected, and let's have American companies do that, or the government itself.

BUMILLER: Senator Boxer, Senator Frist just said on this program that he thought that the Medicare prescription drug plan would be a big plus, as he put it, for the Republicans in this year's midterm elections. Do you agree with that assessment?

BOXER: I don't, and let me tell you why. I think the more the American people look at this program, this legislation, that was crafted, in my opinion, to primarily benefit the pharmaceutical industry, the insurance industry, the more that that comes out, the more people will turn against the Republicans running this whole country. Let me tell you this...

BUMILLER: Just one...

BOXER: Yes, go ahead.

BUMILLER: Senator Frist does say that more people will be covered under this plan.

BOXER: All well and good. But we should have had a plan that was written to benefit the people.

Let me give you just one example. In this bill, the Republicans forced into this package a provision that says that Medicare cannot negotiate for lower prices. Now, that flies in the face of what the military does, what the Veterans Administration does. Here we have 40 million Americans eligible for this program. Imagine the wonderful power of negotiating that Medicare could have on behalf of these people. They do it with the VA, with the Pentagon. They didn't want to do it.

They also allowed more than 1,000 plants to move forward nationwide. It's very confusing. And they just put Medicare's role to be a very small part.

It's the privatization of Medicare, just as they wanted to do with Social Security.

So I think this is one of these laws where the more the light of day shines on it, the more people are going to turn against what the Republicans did.

Should we have a benefit for our people? Of course. Absolutely. But this was written for the special interests, and it's very sad. We blew this opportunity, and we should fix this. And we can fix it. But the Republicans don't want to.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you this, Senator Boxer. Some people say that the Republican -- or rather the Democratic agenda right now is to simply just jump on everything that Republicans do. Do you think that is enough to win back the House and Senate?

BOXER: Of course not. That's why I said we need to fix Medicare. And we have a plan to do that. That prescription drug benefit, we want to fix it so we allow Medicare to negotiate for lower prices. We want to take the savings from that, and then apply that to the coverage gap. Right now, after you spend about $2,700, until you spend about $5,100 on medicine, it's 100 percent your responsibility. We want to fix that.

We want to fix the student loan program. We want to reject the cuts that the president has made, the largest cuts in history, on education.

And these are the things that we will be offering to the American people. We want to change things for the better.

And yes, we don't want to have Gonzales, now the attorney general, investigate the Abramoff scandal because there are so many close ties between Abramoff and President Bush. We want to have a special prosecutor. So we want to clean the mess up there. And we will have a plan to do that.

SCHIEFFER: Well, what are you going to do about that? Because after this whole thing broke, it looked like in both the House and the Senate, people came forward with all these enormous reform packages to outlaw this and that.

BOXER: Yes.

SCHIEFFER: Now it looks -- over on the House side, it looks as if the Republicans are sort of backing away from that. It's not altogether clear what's going on in the Senate.

For example, would you favor outlawing people paying for members of the House and Senate to go on these trips? Should some of these things that lobbyists now pay for be outlawed, or is it enough, as some in the Senate seem to be saying, to just make sure it's all reported and written down and made public?

BOXER: I don't think there should be any trips paid for by lobbyists or trips where lobbyists are on the trip. It just should be outlawed. Straight ahead. You know if it's a non-profit, it's if it's a think tank, that's a foundation funded, that's different. But there shouldn't be any private-sector trips that are paid for anymore.

But, you know, it goes beyond that. Those are changes in the law we must do, and I support. But there really have been laws already broken. And what we need is to have an aggressive Justice Department go after the folks already in the Congress who have broken the laws. And that's where we want to have an outside counsel rather than have the president's man, Alberto Gonzales, conduct those investigations when Abramoff gave well over $100,000 to the president, appeared with the president on many occasions.

It just seems to me we need a breath of fresh air there. And have an investigation. We shouldn't forget it's not only changing the laws, which we should do, but it's prosecuting those who already broke the laws that we have on the books.

SCHIEFFER: Well, thank you very much, Senator. I would agree with you...

BOXER: Thank you.

SCHIEFFER: ... on one thing. There is a lot of air. We'll find out how fresh it is in the weeks to come. Thanks for joining us this morning.

BOXER: Lots of air.

SCHIEFFER: Back with a final word in just a second.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: Finally today, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld says one source of America's problems these days is that we are losing the public relations war to Al Qaida. In a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations he said, quote, The U.S. government still functions as a five-and-dime store in an eBay world.

Boy, did he get that part right. But, man, is he wrong about why. I've dealt with brother Rumsfeld since he was President Ford's chief of staff and, frankly, I like the guy. Not long ago, I reminded him that we have been arguing with each other for 30 years now. We both laughed.

But here is why I believe he's wrong. He thinks the press, for instance, makes too much of horrible events such as Abu Ghraib. I don't. A democracy by definition means openness. The founding fathers knew enough about human nature to know that government would always cover up its mistakes if it operated in secret.

Bringing mistakes to the fore is a strength, not a weakness. When America outlawed segregation, it acknowledged 200 years of wrongs far worse than Abu Ghraib. Would anyone argue that publicly correcting those wrongs made us weaker? To the contrary, it made us stronger. It showed the world that we live by the values we preach, and that those values work.

This administration has been secretive when there was no point to it. Has paid reporters to take the government line and has left the impression that bad news exists only in the minds of reporters. That's no way to win a P.R. war. It is a sure way to lose it. Our strength comes from emphasizing in every word and action the values that separate us from those who oppose us, not from adopting their methods.

That's it for us. We'll see you next week right here on Face the Nation.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: It's 11 a.m. in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 4 p.m. in London, 7 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition." We'll get to my conversation with the U.S. Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff in just a few minutes. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Susan. In New Orleans, Mardi Gras has begun. There are fewer parades and floats and far fewer tourists, but in a city still struggling to recover from the devastation of Hurricane Katrina, it's seen as a victory to have a celebration of any kind at all.

In contrast, there were no celebrations here in Washington this past week, as a Congressional report blasted the federal response to Katrina. The man in the hot seat, Michael Chertoff, the secretary of homeland security. I spoke with the secretary earlier today.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Secretary Chertoff, thanks very much for joining us.

MICHAEL CHERTOFF, HOMELAND SECURITY SECRETARY: Good to be here.

BLITZER: Here's the conclusion of the House report on Katrina: "It remains difficult to understand how government could respond so ineffectively to a disaster that was anticipated for years and for which specific dire warnings had been issued for days. This crisis was not only predictable, it was predicted. If this is what happens when we have advanced warning, we shudder to imagine the consequences when we do not. Four and a half years after 9/11, America is still not ready for prime time."

Do you agree with that bottom line conclusion?

CHERTOFF: Well, I said in July before Katrina that we had a lot more work to do in preparedness. And I think that was borne out, obviously, a month later. We have made a lot of progress in a lot of areas. We've done it in intelligence sharing and certain elements of security. There were parts of the department, in fact, that worked very well in Katrina, like the Coast Guard and TSA.

But there's clearly a lot of work we have to do in a department that is still an immature department by Washington standards. It was only two years old, a little over two years old by the time Katrina hit. The Department of Defense took 40 years to get where it got. Now, I'm not suggesting we're going to wait 40 years or even four years, but I think we have to put in perspective the fact that we've come quite a distance. We have quite a distance to come -- go, as well.

BLITZER: Is the country ready for another 9/11?

CHERTOFF: Well, first of all, what we're ready to do is stop another 9/11. And that's where our intelligence sharing, our increased protective measures, what we're doing now at the border to screen. All of those things are designed to prevent a 9/11. That's the best outcome.

We've certainly learned a lot of lessons from Katrina, from Rita. Rita was better than Katrina. We're doing a better job planning. We're closer -- more closely aligned with the Department of Defense. These things would be positive things if we were to have another attack.

But we've got a lot of work to do. And one of the things I want to say, Wolf, is we're 100 days from hurricane season, and we've got to start focusing on what we're going to do to make ourselves ready for the next hurricane.

BLITZER: Here is another conclusion from the House of Representatives report: "It does not appear the president received adequate advice and counsel from a senior disaster professional. The president's homeland security team did not effectively substantiate, analyze and act on the information at its disposal." You agree with that?

CHERTOFF: Well, I think first of all there was a failure to have real, clear information at our disposal. There was a real lack of situational awareness. We didn't have the capabilities on the ground to give us real-time, accurate assessments of the physical condition of the city.

BLITZER: But you knew that for days, that this hurricane was coming towards New Orleans.

CHERTOFF: Wolf, putting these capabilities together is not a matter of putting them together in a few days. It's a matter of planning and preparing for months.

BLITZER: But there has been these tabletop exercises. There was this fictional Hurricane Pam a year earlier in which they basically outlined all of these dire consequences that nobody seems to have paid any attention to.

CHERTOFF: Well, I'm not excusing the fact that planning and preparedness was not where it should be. We've known for 20 years about this hurricane, this possibility of this kind of hurricane. So, all during the '90s and, you know, for the first half of this decade, we had opportunities to get evacuation plans in place, better communications in place. But rather than look backward, my obligation now is to make sure we do a lot of the work we need to do between now and June 1.

BLITZER: Here's what your former FEMA director, Michael Brown, said when he testified on February 10 before Congress. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MICHAEL BROWN, FORMER FEMA DIRECTOR: The culture was such that I didn't think that would have been effective and would have exacerbated the problem, quite frankly, Senator.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Why would that...

BROWN: That's why my conversations were predominantly with the White House, because through the White House I could cut through any interagency bureaucracy to get what I needed done.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: He's basically saying that he ignored you. He didn't even want to talk to you during those critical hours and days when Hurricane Katrina hit, because it would have been a waste of time.

CHERTOFF: I think that's -- was a very big mistake on his part. The fact of the matter is, where things did work well was precisely because DHS brought its other assets into play. On Thursday, when we went around FEMA and constructed an air bridge to allow an evacuation from the airport instead of making people drive to Houston, it was because the department stepped in with TSA and the other assets to set that up. Coast Guard stepped forward and picked up a lot of the slack.

I think the idea that you can go this alone is -- was a huge mistake. And unfortunately, there was a price paid in terms of suffering and pain for people in New Orleans.

BLITZER: In an interview with a documentary filmmaker, he gives you this grade for the work he says you did or didn't do during that disaster.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Secretary Chertoff?

BROWN: You know, a C-minus. The secretary is a judge by training. And you can't do things like tell your disaster guy to go back to Baton Rouge and stay in Baton Rouge and never leave. That's not how you do operations. He just doesn't get it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: He says you just don't get it.

CHERTOFF: Well, first of all, you know, Mike Brown has given a lot of different versions of events. And I'm not going to get into the specifics of, you know, which version we're happening to hear right now. But I do want to make a point.

First of all, I lived through 9/11. I had perhaps the best on- the-job training for dealing with a huge crisis when I was running the response to 9/11 on the law-enforcement side during those weeks after the terrorist attacks.

I do want to respond to Mr. Brown's statement that I was wrong in making him go back to Baton Rouge. On Tuesday, he was flying around with politicians. He was doing interview shows. And the basic planning, which was getting buses to come into the Superdome and pick people up, had not been done.

And it seems to me correct then, and I think it's correct now, that job one is get the planning done, make sure the buses are there. When that's done, it's completely appropriate to go around and tour around and look at the damage. And that's what Admiral Allen did when I made him the PFO. But Admiral Allen always knew what was the most important thing to get done first, and he got it done.

BLITZER: The hurricane came in on a Monday morning. That was August 29. And the levees broke, basically, that day. But you went to sleep that night, you didn't even know that the levees had broken.

CHERTOFF: Well, that's right. One of the things that was the most disturbing to me about the entire week of what happened was the fact that on Monday around 7:00, I got a situation report that specifically said, there hasn't been any demonstration of a substantial breech of the levees.

It was one of the things I was, frankly, concerned about during Monday. So I breathed a sigh of relief. I figured, well, we have avoided at least one really bad outcome.

And of course, I was very disturbed to learn early Tuesday morning that there had been a substantial and irreparable breech.

That really boils down again to the fact that all decisions have to flow from proper and comprehensive information. And we didn't have that information.

And so our first job right now, as we get ready for next season, is training the people and building the capabilities to get information in real time.

BLITZER: Your critics have suggested you were disengaged, you were detached. On that Tuesday, it was August 30th, and you knew then that the levees had broken, water was coming in, the city was being flooded, tens of thousands of people were being made homeless -- you went to a bird flu conference in Atlanta.

CHERTOFF: And I'm glad to be able to correct that, because this is one of those urban legends that continues to persist.

I did two things on Tuesday. I did go, not to a bird flu conference. I did go to meet with the Health and Human Services secretary and the critical leadership of CDC on a plan for avian flu, which I think is a very serious issue.

But I also linked to the emergency operations regional center in Atlanta, which was responsible for running the hurricane response in Mississippi and Alabama. And I went to Atlanta specifically to be able to get an on-the-ground assessment of the hurricane from the people who were responsible for managing at the region.

So in fact, one of the reasons I went through with the trip was because I knew it would give me an opportunity to talk to the real operators who were watching the situation up close.

BLITZER: How many trailers are sitting in this cornfield, or cow field, whatever it is, in Hope, Arkansas, right now that FEMA, which is -- you're responsible for -- has dispatched to this area?

CHERTOFF: We staged about 10,000 -- not trailers, mobile homes. Trailers are actually -- there are tens of thousands of trailers right now being occupied by the people in the Gulf Coast. There are about 10,000 mobile homes in this field in Hope.

BLITZER: At a cost of, what, $300 million?

CHERTOFF: Well, that's the purchase price. Now, they will eventually be used. Some of them will be used with respect to areas of the Gulf that are not in the flood plains. Some of them have been used with respect to the wildfires, people who lost their homes in wildfires in Oklahoma and Texas. Some will be used in hurricane season this year, for example, if we have hurricanes in Florida or other places where there's wind damage but not flood damage. So this is not going to go to waste.

BLITZER: Why aren't they being used right now? There are so many homeless people who are being evicted from hotels and being told, you know, "You're on your own," basically.

CHERTOFF: Well, first of all, Wolf, no one is being evicted from hotels. Nobody leaves a hotel without getting a full measure of three months of rental assistance. So no one has been evicted -- no one who's eligible has been evicted from a hotel without getting a significant amount of money to find -- to pay for their rent.

Second, there are two problems with respect to mobile homes in particular. One is we obviously don't want to put them in a flood plain, because if there's another flood, you're going to lose the mobile home.

The second is there are some communities that we thought originally would take mobile homes that have decided they don't want them. And we're not going to cram mobile homes down the throats of communities in Louisiana and the Gulf -- and other parts of the Gulf Coast.

So this huge housing challenge we have has to be managed on a -- almost on an individualized basis in order to deal with what is a very serious human problem.

BLITZER: Here was the conclusion of the House report. "The secretary of homeland security became the president's principal disaster adviser responsible for enabling the president to effectively utilize his authority. Secretary Chertoff executed these responsibilities late, ineffectively, or not at all."

That's a damning indictment. Some are calling on you to resign. Are you thinking about that?

CHERTOFF: Well, Wolf, first thing, as I've said before, is I knew when I took the job there was a lot of work to be done in the department. As long as the president wants me to continue to do that work and thinks I can make a contribution, I'm going to stay at my post. Obviously, there's been a lot of criticism. I've listened to it all. Some of it I find helpful. Some of it I frankly disagree with. There's a lot of discussion about when particular documents were signed or not.

But I think the bottom line right now is to take the constructive criticism and use that to build toward, as I say, the hurricane season that is 100 days away. And we don't have a lot of time to waste before we start to address that next set of challenges.

BLITZER: Let's talk about lessons learned. Not only in terms of natural disasters, but potentially terrorism. Former New Jersey Governor Tom Kean, chairman of the 9/11 Commission, said this in early December.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TOM KEAN, CHAIRMAN, 9/11 COMMISSION: Four years after 9/11, it is a scandal that police and firefighters in large cities still can't talk to each other reliably when they're hit with a major crisis.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Is he right?

CHERTOFF: Well, first of all, Katrina was not an interoperability issue. It was an operability issue. So that's a separate set of issues.

Second, although we've got some work we have to do to promote interoperability, we have done some things. The 10 largest cities have been part of a rapid com program, which does allow for command level interoperability in terms of radio. We do have these, what they call gateway systems or repeaters, that allow us to transition from different kinds of systems that don't match directly but we can interface them through this gateway.

So we are making some steps. But I had a meeting last weekend in which I said, "Look, we are not at the level we need to be four years after 9/11." We're going to have to take some dramatic steps. We may have to force people to get together in terms of picking a particular type of technology and starting to build to that technology, as opposed to everybody exercising their right to buy their own system, you know, at will.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, but I have to ask you about this report of outsourcing ports in the United States to a company that's based in the United Arab Emirates. Ports sold to Dubai Ports World, this company, New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Miami.

Listen to what Senator Chuck Schumer of New York had to say about this idea.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) SEN. CHUCK SCHUMER (D), NEW YORK: Outsourcing the operations of our largest ports to a country with a dubious record on terrorism is a homeland security accident waiting to happen.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: And other members of Congress, including Curt Weldon, have said, "I have concerns over whether the United Arab Emirates has earned this level of confidence that the administration appears to be placing in it. This sale would transfer a vital national defense facet to a foreign nation in an unstable region."

Did you sign off on this idea?

CHERTOFF: You know, this issue comes up periodically every time a foreign-owned company wants to take over an asset that has national security significance. And there is a legal process Congress created for a committee to sit and review this. It's Treasury, Commerce, DHS, FBI is involved, and DOD is involved. We look at these transactions.

The discussions are classified. I can't get into the specifics here. But what I can tell you in general is this: We examine the transaction; we look at what the issue of the threat is. If necessary, we build in conditions or requirements that, for extra security, would have to be met in order to make sure that there isn't a compromise to national security.

As far as my agency is concerned, port security really rests principally with the Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection. And you can be sure that any transaction that goes forward is going to be carefully reviewed, and is also going to be carefully subject to the expertise of Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection.

BLITZER: So you're on board?

CHERTOFF: Well, this -- again, I don't want to talk about classified process, but the general process that has to work before this occurs requires a very thorough review, and, where appropriate, necessary conditions or safeguards have to be put into place.

BLITZER: So is it a done deal? Has it cleared?

CHERTOFF: Since I said it's classified, Wolf, I'm not going to go beyond my general description of the process. And certainly, Congress is welcome to look at this and can get classified briefings. You know, we have to balance the paramount urgency of security against the fact that we still want to have a robust global trading system.

BLITZER: Secretary Chertoff, thanks very much for joining us.

CHERTOFF: Wolf, good to be here.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And stay tuned to CNN day and night for the most reliable news about your security. Just ahead, a United Nations report calls for the closing of the prison at U.S. Naval base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

Capitol Hill Democrats calling for an investigation into domestic spying. We'll talk about oversight of U.S. intelligence with two members of the congressional committees on intelligence. They're standing by.

Then, why did Iraqi troops disappear during the fierce fighting for Falluja? We'll get the real story from the general who trained them.

Plus, this week, Iran announced it would begin to enrich uranium, a key step toward a nuclear weapon, potentially at least. United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan tells us what can be done to avoid a dangerous confrontation.

"Late Edition" continues right after this.

BLITZER: A chilly but sunny day here in Washington, D.C. Welcome back to "Late Edition." There were fierce battles on Capitol Hill this week over the U.S. program of wiretapping its citizens without a warrant. What's the real story?

Republican Senator Saxby Chambliss of Georgia is on the Senate Armed Services Committee, as well as the Select Committee on Intelligence. He's joining us from Atlanta. Democratic Congresswoman Jane Harman from California is a ranking minority member of the House Intelligence Committee. She also serves on the House Committee on Homeland Security. She's joining us in Los Angeles.

Thanks to both of you for joining us. Congressman Harman, I'll start with you. Do you have confidence in the Secretary of Homeland Security Michael Chertoff?

REP. JANE HARMAN (D), CALIFORNIA: I think he's a strategic thinker. He came with high hopes from all of us. He has taken personal responsibility for Katrina. He has a huge amount of work to do. I'm ready to wait and see if he fixes his department.

In contrast, by the way, our secretary of defense continues to stonewall after these new pictures of Abu Ghraib. If I were advising President Bush, I'd say the defense department is where I'd make the cabinet change right away.

BLITZER: So you're calling on Rumsfeld to resign or be fired?

HARMAN: I think that his leadership post-war in Iraq has been very damaging to the United States.

BLITZER: So should he be fired?

HARMAN: That's the president's call, but I think if I were going to change a cabinet department, that's the one I would change.

BLITZER: Senator Chambliss, do you have confidence in Michael Chertoff?

SEN. SAXBY CHAMBLISS (R), GEORGIA: Well, good leadership means that when mistakes are made that you're willing to step up and say that sure, we did make mistakes. We've got to learn from them. We've got to move forward. You know, I think this report that came out on the House side, and I expect one to be coming out from the government reform committee on the Senate side also that will be critical, is really getting at the nerve of this and really pointing out some very serious flaws that we have. Not just in the department but in their ability to react to a disaster like this.

And certainly the secretary is where the buck stops. Do I have confidence in him? From the standpoint of him saying that mistakes were made, we've got to move forward, I do. But from the standpoint of being able to deal with a disaster and having qualified people underneath him at the time of this incident, I think it's pretty weak as evidenced by this report.

BLITZER: You heard him defend the Bush administration's decision, Senator, to outsource, in effect, port handling at six major ports in the United States to a company based in the United Arab Emirates and part owned by the government of the United Arab Emirates. Are you comfortable with that decision?

CHAMBLISS: I would have to say at this point in time, Wolf, I'm not. You know, Congress does not have a direct oversight of decisions like this, but frankly, in a post-9/11 world we should be consulted in a very deliberate manner on this.

And certainly there are classified issues that have to be dealt with, but Jane and I deal with those classified matters on a daily basis. So, I think that Congress is due some explanation about this. It's suspicious on its face, but is it the right decision? It's difficult to say. I have confidence in the administration, but I just think Congress should be consulted.

BLITZER: What do you think, Congresswoman?

HARMAN: I think it's stunning, and I'm very disturbed by it. It's not that I would be against foreign shippers using our ports. We've had a lot of controversy about Chinese shipping companies on the West Coast. But my district surrounds the Port of Los Angeles, which, with the Port of Long Beach are the largest container ports on the planet. And I would not like Dubai or some other foreign government running those ports.

So I think the intelligence committees need classified briefings ASAP and this decision should be suspended until Congress can carefully review it. I would hope the administration would want to hold off until they had Congress on their side.

BLITZER: The U.N. secretary-general, following a U.N. report, Congresswoman, this week suggesting the United States shut down the Guantanamo Bay prison. A very damning report put out by the United Nations. Listen to what Kofi Annan said after that report was released.

Actually, he said this. He said, "One cannot detain individuals for perpetuity, and charges must be brought against them, and give them a chance to explain themselves and prosecuted, charged, or released. I think it's something that is common under any legal system, and I think sooner or later there will be a need to close Guantanamo." Do you agree with Kofi Annan?

HARMAN: Well, I certainly agree with his definition of the problem. It was shameful that we didn't have a legal framework around the detentions we did in this Iraq war. We did it in the first Gulf War. We had battlefield tribunals that sorted people out.

This time, I guess this president thought he had inherent authority again to do it some different way. I think the courts will require him to give each detainee a status. I think we may have to close Guantanamo. I was personally disappointed three times to go down there and not hear the straight story about what was going on there from those who briefed me.

BLITZER: What do you think, Senator?

CHAMBLISS: Well, I think from Kofi Annan's perspective, he's been pretty disengaged in the overall war on terrorism. Gitmo has served us well, even though we really had to figure out a way to deal with a massive number of prisoners in a short period of time. But we've done a lot of work down there, and we are treating those folks the way they ought to be treated.

Frankly, they're getting better medical care, better food, better housing than probably most of them have ever had in their lives. We're still getting valuable information from them, particularly with reference to the structure of al Qaida. So it's a necessary facility that needs to remain in place for some period of time. Forever, no. But for some period of time while we continue to fight this war.

BLITZER: But as you know, a lot of those detainees have been released. No charges have been filed. They've gone back to their home countries, Senator. Are you confident that all of those 500 or so who are there deserve to be there without any real due process afforded them?

CHAMBLISS: Wolf, a lot of them have been released, and we have found them back on the battlefield fighting American soldiers. We have to vet these individuals very thoroughly and make sure that we do the very best job we can to determine whether or not they really are bad guys still where they're going to come after us again.

If we're satisfied they're not, that they're really not criminals, then that's the point in time we can release them. But if there's the potential for them to come back and kill American soldiers and on the battlefield, then no, they shouldn't be released.

BLITZER: All right, go ahead, Congresswoman. Then we'll take a break.

HARMAN: I was just going to say we need a legal framework around all these issues: detentions, interrogations. Congress forced the administration to take the McCain amendment. And this NSA program. It has to comply with the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, and it has to comply with the fourth amendment.

BLITZER: We'll leave it there, but we're going to continue down the road. We have a lot more to talk about, including warrantless wiretaps, domestic surveillance. In a moment, more on the war on terror with Senator Chambliss and Congresswoman Jane Harman.

But up next, we'll have a quick check of what's in the news right now. Stay with "Late Edition."

(NEWSBREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I'm doing the right thing. Washington is a town that says you didn't connect the dots and then, when you do connect the dots, they say you're wrong.

In order to protect America, if somebody's talking to Al Qaida, we want to know who they are and why they're talking to them.

(APPLAUSE)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The president, speaking out earlier this week, defending the National Security Agency surveillance program without warrants.

Welcome back to "Late edition."

Once again, I'm joined by Republican Senator Saxby Chambliss of Georgia. He's in Atlanta. And in Los Angeles, Democratic Congresswoman Jane Harman of California.

Senator Chambliss, Senator Roberts was quoted in the New York Times as saying, yesterday, this: "I think it should come before the FISA court. We should be much more in concert with the Congress and everybody else and the FISA court judges" -- FISA, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

In effect, distancing himself from the Bush administration, now saying that the NSA warrant-less wiretapping program should be under the jurisdiction, if you will, of this FISA court.

Are you in agreement with your chairman, Senator Roberts?

CHAMBLISS: Well, I'm not sure that's exactly what Pat meant. Let me tell you the problem with the FISA court in this issue. The FISA court works well for what we use it for now.

We use it for anybody in the United States who is a foreign agent, or an agent of a foreign power -- we can surveil them -- or a U.S. citizen who also is engaged as an agent of a foreign power and who we suspect has committed a crime.

That's a pretty stringent requirement right there. But it's worked well. What we're talking about here is something entirely different.

These are phone calls that did not originate inside the United States. They originated outside the United States. And going through the FISA process to get a hold of a number that we don't know is going to be called until it actually is called simply is not going to work, either in the short, immediate term or, really, on the longer-term basis.

BLITZER: Congresswoman Harman, you're one of the so-called gang of eight, those leaders in the intelligence committees, the leadership in Congress, who have been briefed on what is going on.

Do you think it should be brought under FISA or kept separate, that the president has this blanket authority to authorize it?

HARMAN: I think it should be brought under FISA. I think that this is a capability we need. But it must strictly comply with the law and with the Fourth Amendment.

The president is not above the law. His legal arguments just don't wash here. FISA contemplated a 15-day period after the declaration of war when one would not need warrants.

It's been four years after the declaration of war on Afghanistan and the president is still claiming this inherent authority.

I believe that FISA has been modernized by Congress in eight respects and fully covers any activity that the president should want to accomplish under this program.

And I also believe that he's violating the National Security Act of 1947 by failing to brief Congress completely and fully.

BLITZER: On that matter, Senator Chambliss, the Senate Judiciary Committee, chaired by Arlen Specter, has had some extensive hearings on this surveillance program.

But the Senate Intelligence Committee hasn't. And Senator Roberts, the chairman says he doesn't want to have these hearings.

Listen to what he said this week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR PAT ROBERTS (R-KS): I believe that such an investigation at this point basically would be detrimental to this highly classified program and our efforts to reach some accommodation with the administration. This program is one which I believe is vital for the protection of the American people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Critics will argue, as you well know, Senator Chambliss, what happened to Senate intelligence committee oversight if the chairman isn't even willing to have hearings, to have an investigation on what's going on?

CHAMBLISS: Well, the chairman's not willing to have public hearings. And I think it's pretty obvious why. You can't have public hearings on classified issues like this. The judiciary did have -- committee did have some. Attorney General Gonzales came.

And he was limited as to what he could say. We did have a rather extensive hearing with General Hayden and Attorney General Gonzales and the Senate intelligence committee, and I think Jane and Pete Hoekstra had the same thing on the House side. We got fairly detailed briefings but not as -- they did not go as far as, frankly, I think they should have gone. But I think at the end of the day, here's what's going to happen on the Senate side.

We're in negotiations right now under Pat's leadership, Chuck Hagel, Olympia Snowe, Mike DeWine, who have had real concerns about this, have been talking to the White House over the last two or three weeks. And the White House has now agreed that a legislative fix for this is possible, and that more extensive briefings on a regular basis should be given to Congress. The exact details of that are being worked out, and I'm very hopeful that's going to be done by the time we get back after this Presidents' Day break.

BLITZER: We have to leave it right there. Senator Chambliss, as usual, thanks very much for joining us. Congresswoman Harman, thanks to you as well.

HARMAN: Thank you.

CHAMBLISS: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: And still ahead, when Iraqi forces stand up, coalition forces will stand down. That's a standard line in President Bush's speeches. But how much longer will that take? We'll get some insight from the retired U.S. Army general who was assigned to train those Iraqi forces.

And later, my special conversation with the United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan, who met this past week with President Bush at the White House. "Late Edition" will be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." One week after President Bush stood under a "mission accomplished" banner and declared the end of major combat operations in Iraq, U.S. Army Major General Paul Eaton was ordered to Iraq, ordered to begin the rebuilding of the Iraqi military. He was given a staff of six to do the job. Now retired after 33 years in the U.S. military, General Eaton joins us from Seattle. General, thanks very much for joining us. Welcome to "Late Edition."

EATON: Top of the morning, Wolf. Thanks for inviting me.

BLITZER: This came totally out of the blue to you, this order to go over to Iraq right after that May 1, 2003 speech, and to start building a new Iraqi army. Is that right?

EATON: Right. I was the commanding officer of the infantry center, chief of infantry for the U.S. Army, and scheduled to eventually go to a Pentagon assignment. And I got a call one day that the chief of staff had selected me to go forth and perform essentially the Title 10 requirements, man, train, equip nine light motorized infantry battalions for the Iraqi army, for the new Iraqi army.

BLITZER: What did you find when you got there?

EATON: After making my way to Baghdad, I rolled in on a group of folks who'd come in from Centcom, and the terrific turmoil in Baghdad had started to settle down and we just rolled our sleeves up, basically a fellow named Roland Tiso, Mike Greer and Bob Summers, terrific people, and set out to craft the infrastructure and to chart the way ahead for the new Iraqi army.

BLITZER: Now, you've been quoted as saying what you inherited, in your words, was a disjointed fiasco. What did you mean by that?

EATON: The preparation for the mission that I had rolled in on was incomplete. And the planning had been superficial, and it was really a dream mission for me because it was a package delivered to me that the team that we had assembled could actually resurrect a coherent program, which we did in about three or four days, and then set out to do the manning, training, equipping piece for the army to really lay the groundwork and the structure for the future of that country's security.

BLITZER: So, it was an important mission to rebuild the Iraqi army, which was then in the process if it hadn't already been disbanded, had been disbanded. Some 400,000 Iraqi troops basically either on their own or told you're no longer in the Iraqi army. Was that a huge mistake?

EATON: No -- well, Wolf, it's a great question. It's been posed a number of times. But the 23 May decision that Ambassador Bremer made to stand down the old Iraqi army, you've got the dynamics of a country that's 20 percent Sunni but it's 80 percent Sunni Kurd -- Kurds are by and large Sunni -- and 50 percent of the country's Shia. So who do you want to alienate?

Had we kept that old army, brought it back on the books in toto, we would have perhaps mollified the Sunni Arabs. But at the same time we would have grossly, seriously alienated, I believe, the Kurdish population in the north and the Shia population in the south and set the stage for some serious problems. History's going to be the judge, but that's the way I saw it.

BLITZER: Here's what Ambassador Bremer said the other day here on CNN. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PAUL BREMER, FORMER U.S. ADMINISTRATOR IN IRAQ: People need to remember, that military had conducted a genocidal -- decade-long genocidal war against the Kurds in the north, had killed hundreds of thousands of Shia in the uprising in 1991. To recall that army would have been to suggest to the Iraqi people we came to throw out Saddam but to impose some other colonel on them.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: So, what I hear you saying is that you basically understand and agree with the decision to allow the Iraqi army to be disbanded?

EATON: I not only agree, but I accept it as a fact. When I rolled in there, all of the military infrastructure had been destroyed. There were walls up, roofs on, but that was it. Doors, windows gone. Trucks had their engines removed. The wheels were gone. There was essentially nothing left but a few uniforms and steel pots lying on the ground outside of the barracks areas.

BLITZER: I was going to move on to the next level, then. So you're now in charge of training this new Iraqi army, but based on what I'm hearing, you never really got the support during that first year that was so critical that could have gotten the job well under way. It was sort of missed opportunity after missed opportunity, the Pentagon, for whatever reason, never giving you the authority or the wherewithal to get the job done.

EATON: A two-part answer and a good news/bad news: The good news is the United States Army, the Marines, our coalition forces stepped into the breach to do the right thing.

They didn't have enough soldiers to do the missions that they had. They were undermanned for the so-called phase 4. But we had terrific response on the part of the sergeants, lieutenants, captains, and colonels to get after the problem in a local fashion.

At the same time, I was given -- in fact after a 5 September briefing to the secretary of defense -- I was given the budget and the authority to move out, but there was still a failure on the part of senior leadership in the Pentagon to award the sense of urgency that we really needed from the very large staff that we had at the Pentagon. BLITZER: And that missed opportunity is plaguing the U.S. military right now. I assume you agree with that.

EATON: Wolf, if you take a look at national interests and the interest that we have in the success of other armies in this world, after our own, we've got to pay very close attention to the viability of the South Korean army, the viability of the Israeli army, and we've got to truly get after the viability of the Iraqi army.

And, to date, we are not putting the appropriate resources to help Marty Dempsey, Dan Bolger, Joe Peterson in the prosecution of the mission that they've got over there.

BLITZER: Is it a lack of sufficient forces? They don't have enough U.S. troops on the ground? Is that what you're saying?

EATON: I won't speculate -- you know, you ask a soldier if he's got enough of anything and very rarely will a soldier tell you, I've got enough soldiers, I've got enough ammunition, I've got enough anything.

Right now, from the very beginning, we did not put enough boots on the ground to prosecute phase 4 of this war. And we still have not awarded the appropriate resources to the men and women charged with assisting Iraq in rebuilding its security forces.

BLITZER: You have said that your big mistake was that you assumed that during that initial battle for Falluja when Iraqi forces went in, they would fight alongside the U.S. and coalition forces. But in the end, they simply ran away and disappeared. Is that right?
EATON: Wolf, they didn't run away. What happened -- they did not feel, internally, inside themselves, that they were a legitimate instrument to provide security for the nation of Iraq.

We had recruited these men under the previous program, under the initial program, to defeat enemies from without.

These young men signed up to fight external enemies. When they were first sent into Falluja by ground, they ran into a fire storm of the Mahdi army, the Shia, en route, who basically heckled them and then fired a few rounds into the formation -- why are you attacking your fellow Iraqis?

And we had not developed, internally and externally, the sense of legitimacy that sustains armies if they have to be applied for security problems internal to their borders. That was the basis of the problem.

And my problem, my failure, was to recognize that we had not developed the sense of -- internal sense of legitimacy within these soldiers to allow them to fight alongside Marines. And I regret that mistake.

But it was an intent to get these men and to allow Iraqi security forces to assist coalition forces in the security drama that we had in Falluja. BLITZER: General Eaton, we have to leave it there. Thanks very much for joining us. Thanks for your 33 years of service in the U.S. military. I appreciate it very much.

EATON: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: And, up ahead, we'll have a quick check of our Web question. And the Web question is this: Should the United States close the Guantanamo Bay prison? You can cast your vote at CNN.com/lateedition. We'll have the results in the next hour.

You're watching "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: Welcome back. In a moment, my conversation with the U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's making news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: The Palestinian parliament convened this weekend with the militant Hamas party in the majority. John Vause is joining us live from Jerusalem with the latest Palestinian and Israeli reactions. What is the latest, John?

JOHN VAUSE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, today, the Israeli cabinet backed away from some of the toughest sanctions it had been considering after Hamas was sworn into parliament, instead opting for a permanent freeze on the taxes collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinian authority.

That's about $50 million U.S. dollars reach month, about half of the monthly wages for 140,000 employees of the Palestinian authority.

Hamas says this move by Israel is nothing more than theft. Israel says, on a practical level, it had no choice because there were no guarantees that the money would not be used to fund militant attacks.

Israel is also calling on the international community for donor countries to stop direct aid payments to the Palestinian Authority, while calling at the same time for a continuation of humanitarian projects in the West Bank and also in Gaza.

Now, despite this looming cash crunch, Hamas is moving on with forming a government, today, nominating Ismail Haniyeh as the prime minister. He has three weeks to form a cabinet. Wolf?

BLITZER: John Vause, with the latest from Jerusalem. Much more on this story coming up when we'll speak with the ambassadors here in Washington from Germany, France and Britain.

Earlier this week, Kofi Annan, the secretary-general of the United Nations, met with President Bush over at the White House to discuss problems around the globe. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) BUSH: I enjoy visiting with the secretary-general. It gives us a chance to talk about our common interests and our desire for peace and liberty around the world.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Shortly after the meeting, I spoke with the secretary- general and began by asking him whether the Iranians are building a nuclear weapon.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

KOFI ANNAN, U.N. SECRETARY-GENERAL: I think the rules are very clear. Iran can develop peaceful nuclear -- have peaceful uses of nuclear energy but not a nuclear bomb. And this is what the whole debate is about.

BLITZER: Even as we speak, there are reports today that the Iranians have started enriching uranium, which experts believe could lead to a bomb.

What is the United Nations going to do to stop Iran from becoming a nuclear weapons power?

ANNAN: I think, first of all, the atomic agency in Vienna is dealing with this. And between now and the end of the month, they are preparing a report, working with the Iranians, monitoring the situation, and will give a report to the agency at the end of the month.

There will be a meeting in March where, depending on the nature of the report, if indeed Iran is not meeting its obligations on the NPT and its obligations to the IAEA, it will be referred to the Security Council for appropriate action.

BLITZER: Appropriate action being diplomatic sanctions or economic sanctions? Would that be the next step in the pressure on the Iranian regime?

ANNAN: That will be for the Council to decide, but, obviously, the Council doesn't -- these are some of the arsenal that the Council has, but it will be up to the Council to decide what the next step should be.

And I think it will depend very much on the report. If the report is a negative one, then the Council has a tough and urgent decision to take.

If it is a report that indicates that, despite their public pronouncements, the situation is either frozen or is -- or they see prospects of full cooperation with the agency, the Council will have to factor that in.

I hesitate to prejudge what the Council will say or prejudge what the report will contain.
BLITZER: How worried are you, though, that, if these pressures on Iran don't work, there could be military action, there could be action by the United States or Israel or a combination thereof or other countries?

Just as the United Nations failed to prevent the United States from invading Iraq with its allies and removing Saddam Hussein, how worried are you there could be a military confrontation, a unilateral U.S., let's say, attack at these nuclear sites in Iran?

ANNAN: I hope we never get to that point. I hope the international community will be able to work together and with Iran to negotiate an acceptable solution out of this.

I don't think, given the situation in today's world, that anyone would want to see further military escalation in the region. And Iran should cooperate and cooperate fully.

And I have urged them publicly to freeze the nuclear program to allow for negotiations to resolve this.

I do not know why they canceled their meeting with the Russians and if it is going to be rescheduled or if it's indefinite, but I would urge them to pursue the option that the Russians have offered and work with the European troika and others to resolve this crisis.

BLITZER: France, Germany and Britain, the troika.

Let's talk about Iran. The secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice -- you met with her today.

She is accusing Iran and Syria of fanning the flames, if you will, over this cartoon uproar involving the Prophet Mohammed.

Listen to what she said the other day.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CONDOLEEZZA RICE, U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE: Iran and Syria have gone out of their way to inflame sentiments and to use this to their own purposes. And the world ought to call them on it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: She says the world ought to call them -- Iran and Syria -- on it. You're the world. You're the United Nations secretary- general. Are you going to call Iran and Syria and tell them, don't fan these flames?

ANNAN: First of all, let me say that the violence we have seen is unacceptable. It is the wrong reaction to the offense and the insult that the Muslim world feels about the cartoons.

I have said very clearly that it was insensitive to publish those cartoons. I am for freedom of expression. I am for freedom of press. But that right has to be exercised with some sensitivity, some respect for religion of others, and it entails responsibility and judgment. And so, the fact that they feel offended by that should not allow any country or any group to attack innocent people and to destroy foreign legations. And so I would urge all governments and all people with influence, secular and religious, to ensure that we calm the situation and do not allow it to get out of hand.

BLITZER: Yesterday I interviewed the prime minister of Denmark, Anders Fogh Rasmussen, who said he agrees with Condoleezza Rice that Iran and Syria are making these situations even worse. Do you agree that they are doing that?

ANNAN: Well, I do not have any evidence to go by that. You had demonstrations all over the world.

BLITZER: But let me interrupt with all due respect, when you have no evidence. You know Damascus. This is a country where the police rule the day. If the government didn't want these people to burn down the Danish Embassy, they wouldn't have gotten close to that embassy.

ANNAN: The government has the responsibility to prevent these things from happening. They should have stopped it, not just in Syria or Iran but all around they should have stopped it. And not only should they have stopped it, not having stopped it, I hope they will pick up the bill for the destruction that has been caused to other foreign countries, which would also be legitimate. They should be prepared to pay for the damage done to Danish, Norwegian and the other embassies concerned.

Yes, one may say the government -- I had raised this with the ambassador of Syria in New York. I said, why couldn't you stop it? Of course, his answer was, it was so spontaneous we couldn't stop it. So the question has been posed, but in any event, all governments have a responsibility to stop this, to de-escalate, and in situations where they are not able to protect embassies and people they have the responsibility to protect, there has to be a cost.

BLITZER: The co-founder of Hamas, Mahmoud al-Zahar, said last week, he said this: "We should have killed all those who offend the Prophet, and instead here we are, protesting peacefully." This is the man who is now emerging as one of the key leaders of the Palestinian community now that Hamas has won this election. This is a serious issue, whether the United Nations and other international organizations, countries, should deal with the Palestinian Authority that is dominated by Hamas.

ANNAN: I think when the quartet met, we...

BLITZER: The quartet is the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

ANNAN: ... we made it very clear that Hamas, now that it's won the elections and is going to assume the responsibility for the government, has to transform itself into a political party. It has to accept all the engagements entered into by the Palestinian Authority, including the Oslo agreements and the road map. It has to accept the two-state solution, which implies recognition of Israel and it has to renounce politics... BLITZER: Terrorism.

ANNAN: Terrorism. It has to renounce terrorism. And if it did that, the international community, and I'm sure Israel, would deal with them, and it is something that is on the table. There is a transitional government in office headed by President Abbas with his team, and they have time to be able to change their policy and accept the requirements -- it's not only the quartet demanding that they do this. Leaders in the Arab region from President Mubarak and others are asking them to go to the same direction.

BLITZER: Well, it raises an interesting question. And I know you discussed this with the president today. I assume you discussed it -- was the vice president at that meeting as well?

ANNAN: He was there.

BLITZER: All right. This is what he said on February 3.

ANNAN: Who said?

BLITZER: The vice president, Dick Cheney. He said, their, referring to Hamas, "Their objective, part of their platform is the destruction of Israel. They are a terrorist organization. They need to give up their objective of the destruction of Israel. They need to forswear violence and I think close down their military wing before anybody is going to treat them seriously as a legitimate interlocutor."

Is the United Nations going to treat the Palestinian Authority as a legitimate interlocutor with Hamas failing, at least so far, to accept a two-state solution and renounce terrorism?

ANNAN: I think if you put it that starkly, I don't think it's -- we have made it very clear in the quartet and given them -- and U.N., United Nations, is part of the quartet. Yesterday there was quite a bit of excitement that the Russian federation has invited Hamas to Moscow. What was the purpose of that invitation?

In my own discussion with Foreign Minister Lavrov, he made it clear that we are bringing them to Moscow to reaffirm the three principles that the quartet has asked them to fulfill: renouncing violence, accepting the two-state solution and accepting all the earlier engagements entered into. You need them to press the point home with Hamas.

BLITZER: The U.S. Ambassador, John Bolton, to the U.N. said the other day, "It's not just simply this incident or that incident of corruption or mismanagement, but a culture problem at the U.N. that we're facing here." Is he right? ANNAN: Well, Mr. Bolton is relatively new at the U.N. Obviously, he has a right to his judgment. But, in fact, I will say in discussing this, the whole issue of who is U.N. and what is U.N. with the Oval Office, I said, it's an interesting situation. When we get into trouble and there's a problem with the U.N., they refer to the U.N. as if it's a secretary or some satellite out there. The member states have nothing to do with it, and yet the U.N. is its members. The U.N. can be as effective as its member states want it to be. I mean, we've slammed as corrupt, inefficient, oil for food, and yet when you analyze the report of Volcker, the scandal was with the member states and the government and the companies, not with...

BLITZER: But...

ANNAN: ... no, wait, let me say, not with the secretary. Yes, there was some mismanagement, but when it comes to corruption, only one staff member was found to have possibly have made $150,000. Of the $11 billion that was smuggled out, the secretariat had nothing to do with it. The 1.8 that was made through deals between companies and Saddam Hussein, companies promoted by their own governments, companies with contracts was approved by the 661 committee, you don't hear anything about corruption of the...

BLITZER: Here was the problem. With hindsight, I want your thought. The perception that your son Kojo got involved in a business deal in this oil for food, a United Nations-sponsored program, with hindsight, was that a mistake to let him do that?

ANNAN: I did not let him do that. To say to let him do that is wrong.

BLITZER: Did you know about it in advance?

ANNAN: I did not know about it in advance, and not...

BLITZER: You wish he wouldn't have gotten it.

ANNAN: Absolutely. I wish he had not been involved. But also in the whole investigation, at the end of the report, they did not find that -- it said that he had called the procurement department, and they did not come up with anything that he had really influenced the contracting. And not only that...

BLITZER: But the perception the son of the secretary-general involved, that would help that company.

ANNAN: It was not pleasant for me. I wish it had not been done. It gave me lots of grief. You must also know that he -- "Sunday Times" of London came up with an article that he had been involved with the Iraqi oil-for-food contract, and he won his -- he took -- came up with a libel suit, and they settled out of court because they knew it was wrong.

But what it is is, yes, that was true, but when you read the story, the issue was, secretary-general's son may have influenced a company to get a contract. Staff member took some money, and so forth and so forth, but the big picture was lost.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Kofi Annan, the U.N. secretary-general, speaking with me here in Washington earlier in the week. And coming up on "Late Edition," tens of thousands have been killed in the civil war in Darfur and the Sudan. Millions have been made homeless. Should the U.S. and its NATO allies now dispatch troops to the region?

And in just a moment, the ambassadors of three key NATO allies will weigh in on this, the Hamas victory, Iran's nuclear ambitions and lots more. This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

BLITZER: Welcome back. The tense nuclear negotiations with Iran, the uncertain Middle East peace process, the war on terror -- all global issues where the United States and Europe work very closely together.

Joining us now to discuss these issues and more are the representatives here in Washington of three key European nations. Wolfgang Ischinger is the ambassador of the Federal Republic of Germany. Jean-David Levitte is the ambassador of France and Sir David Manning is the British ambassador to the United States.

Gentleman, thank you very much for joining us.

And let me start with you, Ambassador Levitte. The Israeli Cabinet, the Israeli government has now decided to take several steps to prevent any contacts, if you will, with the Palestinian Authority now that Hamas is part of that Palestinian authority.

Does the government of France support that?

JEAN-DAVID LEVITTE, FRANCE'S AMBASSADOR TO U.S.: Well, France, as well as the E.U. countries has stated clearly that Hamas is a terrorist organization. That's number one. It means that we have no contacts with Hamas.

Second, we have expressed three demands to Hamas: First, recognize Israel. Second, stop violence. And, third, accept the Oslo accord.

And we are waiting for the new government -- now we have a new parliament. We have the president of the Palestinian authority, which remains Abu Mazen.

And there will be a kind of cohabitation between the president of the Palestinian Authority and the new government.

So our position is to wait and see what the new government will have to say about our three demands.

BLITZER; If the prime minister of the new government is from Hamas as opposed to Mahmoud Abbas, Abu Mazen, who is the president of the Palestinian Authority, will the government of France have direct contact with the Palestinian Authority if it has a Hamas prime minister? LEVITTE: We have stated that there are three demands. And we are waiting for the answers of the new government to these three demands. And, accordingly, we will review the situation and decide.

BLITZER: So do I understand it -- if in fact there is a Hamas prime minister and those demands have not been met, you will suspend contact with the Palestinian Authority?

LEVITTE: Well, we have no contacts at all for the time being because it's a terrorist organization.

BLITZER: And what about the government of Germany?

WOLFGANG ISCHINGER, GERMANY'S AMBASSADOR TO U.S.: Same position, Wolf. And I think I should add to what my friend Jean Levitte has said, that we had discussions about the right approach in what is called the quartet between the United States, the European Union, the U.N. and Russia.

And there was, as I understand it, broad agreement that that's the right way to move forward. So we are -- the E.U, and its member countries -- we are waiting to see what kind of government is going to be installed and what that government is going to say about these exact three points: the right of Israel to exist, renunciation of violence and is that government willing to accept existing agreements with Israel -- yes or no?

That's the criteria.

BLITZER: Ambassador Manning, I assume the British position is the same as the German and the French, or is there any difference you want to explain?

SIR DAVID MANNING, GREAT BRITAIN'S AMBASSADOR TO U.S.: No, it's exactly the same. And, in fact, when my prime minister, Prime Minister Blair, was talking to Chancellor Merkel last month in Germany...

BLITZER: The new chancellor of Germany?

MANNING: Indeed. They set out exactly those three conditions. And Prime Minister Blair has also made the point that we are clear -- and I'm sure this is the position of the U.S. administration -- that there has to be a two-state solution.

You cannot engage one side if they're denying that the other side has a right to exist. So we would like them to accept these three propositions that my colleagues have spelled out. And then we can move forward with the peace process.

But, unless they do that, there can't be a peace process.

BLITZER: And, in the interim, what happens to financial assistance to the Palestinians from the government of Britain, shall we say?

MANNING: Well, at the moment, we are continuing with the assistance that we have adopted. And, as my French colleague said at the beginning, we're waiting to see how this government reacts. Let's remember, it's only just forming now. We don't know exactly what position it will take.

We are very conscious of the humanitarian issue here. so there is a real humanitarian issue and I notice that the Israeli cabinet have picked up on that over the weekend.

But the position is clear. If we don't meet -- if the new government doesn't meet these criteria, we will be reviewing our support.

BLITZER: Here's what the president of the United States said in explaining the U.S. position toward a Palestinian authority with Hamas. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I have made it very clear, however, that a political party that articulates the destruction of Israel as part of its platform is a party with which we will not deal.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Now, the quartet -- you've spoken of the quartet, the United Nations, the European union, the United States and Russia. One member of that quartet seems to be out of sync with the rest of you. That would be Russia.

Listen to the president, Vladimir Putin.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PRES. VLADIMIR PUTIN, RUSSIA (THROUGH TRANSLATOR): Russia is maintaining contacts with the Hamas organization and intends in the near future to invite the leadership of this organization to Moscow.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Ambassador Levitte, is that a good idea?

LEVITTE: We've not been consulted on that. I don't want to comment on that.

We have these three demands and I think that they are accepted by all the members of the quartet. Now, up to Russia to decide what, as a nation they want to do, but this is not our position. We have no contacts with Hamas.

BLITZER: What about the German position on the Russian invitation to Hamas to come to Moscow?

ISCHINGER: Well, I would say, quite generally, that my government's position is that those countries that do not observe the same rules that we do, namely, regard them as terrorists and not talk to them at this point -- we expect those governments, if they decide to have contacts with this organization, to be very strongly endorsing our position, namely, to demand of Hamas, if they are going to be the party in power in the Palestinian Authority, to move their position forward and to agree to these three points of principle.

BLITZER: Ambassador Manning?

MANNING: I have little to add, Wolf. We weren't consulted, either. We are absolutely firm in the position taken by the quartet. And I think what Wolfgang has just said is absolutely right.

Anybody who has contacts with Hamas in any shape or form in the next few days and weeks needs to make it clear that those are the three conditions that are essential.

BLITZER: We have a lot more to talk about, including the cartoons of the Prophet Mohammed, the reaction in much of the Muslim world. Also, what's happening at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

We're going to continue our conversation with these three ambassadors here in Washington right after we take a short break. Much more coming up on "Late Edition."

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. We continue our discussion with Wolfgang Ischinger, the ambassador of the Federal Republic of Germany, Jean-David Levitte, the ambassador of France, and Sir David Manning, the British ambassador to the United States.

Let me begin with the German ambassador right now. We've seen the outrage in much of the Muslim world to the cartoons published in a Danish newspaper of the Prophet Mohammed, but many are suggesting this is indicative of a much bigger problem, especially in Europe, a clash of cultures, if you will, between Europeans, the west and Muslims, including many immigrants who have come to Germany or France or Britain over these recent decades. Is this part of a bigger problem that we're seeing?

ISCHINGER: I think we're discovering that it is, in fact, a bigger problem than many thought, the fact that there is this huge debate about freedom of speech, freedom of expression and how we should be respectful of religion. Our western culture is a culture that has always tended to be respectful of other religions.

I think it's true that there is a huge debate going on, not only in those countries in Europe that have been directly affected, such as the Danish, our Danish friends, but throughout Europe. What's the important thing to remember? I think all of our governments have said and have made very clear that while the principle of freedom of speech remains essential for free countries and for democracy, we also as governments need to remind ourselves and our citizens that we should be respectful.

Having said that, I think we've really made big efforts as governments to observe these standards. Having said that, nothing, nothing justifies violence. Nothing justifies burning embassies.

BLITZER: And France, weeks ago, even before the cartoons became a big issue we saw violence in the suburbs of Paris and elsewhere in France. How big of a problem is this in France right now, this divide, if you will, between the Muslim immigrants from North Africa and the Middle East to France, which now may be 10 percent of your population?
LEVITTE: It's eight percent of our population, but, Wolf, it had nothing to do with religion. It was more about inclusion, how these young generations can be better integrated in the social fabric of France, so it has nothing to do with religion.

BLITZER: You don't think there was a, whether a racial or ethnic prejudice that was part of this problem?

LEVITTE: Well, there may be prejudice, how to get a good job, how to get good schools, housing, these were the problems. These were the reasons why there were these demonstrations in the poor neighborhoods around our big cities, but it had nothing to do with religion at the time.

BLITZER: What about in Britain? Is there any rethinking of the immigration policies of Britain that's under way right now?

MANNING: The immigration policies are always being reviewed, Wolf. It's not triggered simply by this. We have to look about immigration in the round. It's about economic performance. It's about our European Union responsibilities and so on.

But of course, it's raised questions for us. If you have bombs on your underground railway system, of course you have a problem. We have been very conscious, I think, in Britain, ever since 9/11, and indeed before, about the need to try and make sure we become a successful, integrated society both ethnically and religiously.

But it's a big adjustment that we're asking society to make. And we have to work very hard at it.

BLITZER: This week, President Chirac suggested that Iran, now, is going forward and building a nuclear bomb. Explain what your latest intelligence is.

LEVITTE: Well, for three years, we've been negotiating with three countries that we represent with Iran. Why? Because we have deep suspicion about the motives. Is it only to produce nuclear electricity? Is it to build a bomb?

And we have asked (inaudible) that Iran suspend its activities which may lead to a bomb. It was applied, but unfortunately, after the election of President Ahmadinejad, a new policy has been implemented by Iran.

That is, they have started converting their uranium, which is the first step of enrichment. In the beginning of January, they have started enrichment.

So they crossed a red line and we have said, you put an end to the negotiating process, but the door is open -- up to you to decide. We expect you to go back to suspension.

And there will be a meeting on Monday in Russia because the Russians have proposed a way forward to solve the issue.

BLITZER: But the Iranians have rejected that. Ambassador Ischinger, what is Germany prepared to do if, in fact, the Iranians continue to maintain this policy, enriching uranium, rejecting that Russian proposal?

How far will Germany go in approving United Nations Security Council sanctions or economic, diplomatic, whatever sanctions to try to squeeze the Iranians?

ISCHINGER: If you had asked the three of us a year ago where we were, where the United States was, we could not have said in a very simple and straightforward way that we are united. Today, we are united.

BLITZER: Is there any daylight between the U.S. government's position and the positions of the so-called troika, the three countries that you represent, France, Germany and Britain?

ISCHINGER: Not one that I can see.

We decided together to make this decision to take the matter to the U.N. Security Council after the agency's next meeting in early March.

In other words, we have established a clear -- a unified approach. It's a Western approach. It's the United States and the E.U. three and, as a matter of fact, the entire European Union, working together.

And, more importantly -- and I think that's really the important point to make, the new point -- this effort undertaken by the E.U-3, strongly now supported by the United States, has also been receiving support, quite recently, actually, by such countries outside this group as Russia, China and a number of other important members.

BLITZER: So, Ambassador Manning, if the leaders of Iran, right now, are watching this program in Tehran, what do you hope they will emerge from this conversation, with what message?

MANNING: Well, as Jean-David Levitte said, the door is open to the negotiations, but it is up to them now. We cannot go back to a situation where they want the Paris agreement to continue to be discussed, when they have breached the red line.

BLITZER: What if they continue to say no? What will you do next?

MANNING: Well, we will certainly be going to the Security Council at the beginning of March.

First of all, there has to be a meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency. And then, we will have a meeting of the Security Council to discuss what we do next.

And I don't want to prejudge where that will take us, Wolf, but that is the sequence of events. And the only way that can be stopped is for the Iranian government to make it clear that it is going to go back to the terms that were negotiated under the Paris agreement.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time. But should NATO develop a peacekeeping or a logistical support, get involved, with troops, in trying to save lives in the Darfur region of Sudan?

LEVITTE: Wolf, we all agree that we should do more. There is now...

BLITZER: Should NATO and U.S. troops be involved ?

LEVITTE: Well, NATO is involved already and will continue to be involved through planning, logistics, common structure. And we approve that.

BLITZER: What about boots on the ground, getting NATO troops, soldiers into Darfur?
ISCHINGER: There's nothing wrong with trying to get more NATO support. There is nothing wrong. In fact, we should all make even greater efforts to -- through the E.U., through NATO, through the United Nations -- we are working in the process at the United Nations to establish a larger peacekeeping force.

The more support that force can get, the better. It is needed and our governments recognize that and are perfectly interested in helping to support this effort.

BLITZER: The British government, as well?

MANNING: We're in the same place, Wolf. The only caveat I would enter is that we have to be sensitive to what the African Union countries want themselves.

As therefore we have to make sure that, as we bring the international community into this process more effectively, that we are working with the African countries in doing so.

BLITZER: One final question to all of you and then I'll let you go: Should the United States shut down its prison at Guantanamo Bay?

LEVITTE: Guantanamo is an embarrassment. And so, it has to be solved one way or the other. It's necessary to have the people in Guantanamo get a fair trial.

BLITZER: What about the German position?

ISCHINGER: The sooner it's closed, the better it will be for the image of the United States, not only as a military and political but also as a moral leader, in the world.
BLITZER: Does the British government agree?

MANNING: The prime minister said it's an anomaly. It needs to be dealt with. We understand the context. You've lost a lot of people. It's difficult to find the right line to draw between your duties as a government for security and safeguarding liberty, but it is clearly an anomaly and it needs to be dealt with.

BLITZER: "Dealt with" -- be more precise.

MANNING: Well, I think the United States government is the only one that can deal with it. But we are clear that it is an anomalous situation at the moment and we hope that the United States government will find a way of dealing with that.

BLITZER: Ambassador Manning, thanks very much.

Ambassador Ischinger, good luck on your next assignment in London. We wish you only the best. Come visit us in Washington down the road.

Ambassador Levitte, thank you very much to you, as well.

MANNING: Thank you very much.

ISCHINGER: Thank you.

LEVITTE: Thank you.

BLITZER: And, coming up on "Late Edition," we'll take a closer look at what's been said on the other Sunday morning talk shows, in case you missed it. We'll take a quick break. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States.

On ABC's "This Week," Democratic senator, Joe Lieberman, the ranking member on the Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, blasted the Homeland Security secretary, Michael Chertoff, as having failed during Katrina, and then went a step further.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOSEPH LIEBERMAN (D-CT): FEMA has become to too many people in America, and particularly in the Gulf Coast, a joke, a four-letter word. It's time for FEMA to go, and to build something better, stronger within DHS.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On CBS's "Face the Nation," Democratic Senator Barbara Boxer and the Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist disagreed over the political fallout from new government plans providing prescription drug benefits for seniors. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR BARBARA BOXER (D-CA): I think the more the American people look at this program, this legislation, that was crafted, in my opinion, to primarily benefit the pharmaceutical industry, the insurance industry, the more that that comes out, the more people will turn against the Republicans running this whole country.

U.S. SENATOR BILL FRIST (R-TN), MAJORITY LEADER: The fact that we are giving seniors affordable access to prescription drugs by choice, it's voluntary, that they didn't have before, of course it's not going to be a liability. I think it'll be a huge plus.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On "Fox News Sunday," Republican Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and Democratic Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana agreed on the need for increased oversight of the National Security Agency's wiretap program.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR LINDSEY GRAHAM (R-SC): I do believe we can provide oversight in a meaningful way without compromising the program. And I am adamant that the courts have some role when it comes to warrants. If you're going to follow an American citizen around for an extended period of time believing they're collaborating with the enemy, at some point in time, you need to get some judicial review because mistakes can be made.

U.S. SENATOR EVAN BAYH (D-IN): It is in the administration's best interest to ensure that there is some neutral party overseeing this to make sure that it's done right. Otherwise, you're going to have a number of Americans out there who incorrectly think that J. Edgar Hoover's been brought back to life and that there could be abuses taking place.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: And over at NBC's "Meet the Press," the subject was Vice President Dick Cheney's hunting accident, where a Texas lawyer, Harry Whittington, was wounded. The

New York Times's Maureen Dowd saw it very differently than Cheney adviser Mary Matalin.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MAUREEN DOWD, COLUMNIST, THE NEW YORK TIMES: It covered all the problems of the Bush-Cheney administration: secrecy and stonewalling, then blowing off the rules that are at the heart of our democracy, then using a filter to try and put the truth out in a way that would most suit their political needs, and then bad political judgment and bungling a crisis.

MARY MATALIN, REPUBLICAN STRATEGIST: We're not undermining the hallmarks of the democratic institution, the freedom of the press. But it's much ado about nothing, or in the words of Harry Whittington, what's all the hoopla about?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Up next, the results of our web question of the week: Should the United States close Guantanamo Bay prison? And we'll also have a look at your e-mail. First, though, this.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Ibrahim al-Jaafari, what's his story? The Shiite leader has won his party's backing, and is set to head Iraq's first permanent government since the fall of Saddam Hussein. Since April, Jaafari has acted as interim prime minister, a term that has been marred by incessant insurgent attacks.

A medical doctor and religious scholar, Jaafari lived in London and Iran for a decade before returning to Iraq after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. One of his toughest challenges will be creating a new government that's inclusive of Iraq's minority Sunnis who are behind much of Iraq's insurgency.

Emily Hughes, what's her story? She may have missed the opening ceremonies, but the U.S. figure skater is still hoping to strike gold. Hughes, the 17-year-old alternate for Michelle Kwan, was thrust into the Olympic spotlight this week after Kwan re-injured her groin and dropped off the U.S. figure skating team.

In her first year as a senior competitor, Hughes placed third at the U.S. nationals, but was bumped from the Olympic team when Kwan received a medical bye. Stalled by a blizzard in New York, Hughes, the younger sister of 2002 Olympic champion Sarah Hughes, is now in Torino, Italy, and insists that despite the delay, she's ready to compete in Tuesday's figure skating event.

BLITZER: Our "Late Edition" web question asks, should the United States close Guantanamo Bay prison? Here's how you voted. Seventy- eight percent of you said yes. Twenty-two percent of you said no. Remember, this is not a scientific poll.

And that's it for your "Late Edition," Sunday, February 19. Please be sure to join us next Sunday and every Sunday 11 a.m. eastern for the last word in Sunday talk. I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington.

Supreme Court Plunges Into Abortion Debate

By GINA HOLLAND, Associated Press Writer

(AP) -- The Supreme Court said Tuesday it will consider the constitutionality of banning a type of late-term abortion, teeing up a contentious issue for a newly-constituted court already in a state of flux over privacy rights.

The Bush administration has pressed the high court to reinstate the federal law, passed in 2003 but never put in effect because it was struck down by judges in California, Nebraska and New York.

The outcome will likely rest with the two men that President Bush has recently installed on the court. Justices had been split 5-4 in 2000 in striking down a state law, barring what critics call partial birth abortion because it lacked an exception to protect the health of the mother.

But Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was the tie-breaking vote, retired late last month and was replaced by Samuel Alito. Abortion had been a major focus in the fight over Alito's nomination because justices serve for life and he will surely help shape the court on abortion and other issues for the next generation.

Alito, in his rulings on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia, has been more willing than O'Connor, the first woman justice, to allow restrictions on abortions, which were legalized in the Roe v. Wade decision in 1973.

The federal Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act prohibits a certain type of abortion, generally carried out in the second or third trimester, in which a fetus is partially removed from the womb, and the skull is punctured or crushed.

Justices on a 9-0 vote vote in a New Hampshire case reaffirmed in January that states can require parental involvement in abortion decisions and that state restrictions must have an exception to protect the mother's health.

The federal law in the current case has no health exception, but defenders maintain that the procedure is never medically necessary to protect a woman's health.

New Supreme Court Must Rehear Whistleblower Case

The Supreme Court said Friday that it will again hear arguments in the free-speech case of a whistleblower, apparently so that the new justice can break a tie.

The appeal was among about 20 that were heard, but not resolved, before Justice Sandra Day O'Connor retired late last month and was replaced by Samuel Alito.

The Bush administration wants the court to use the case to make it harder for government whistleblowers to win lawsuits claiming retaliation. Justices had seemed conflicted last October when they took up the appeal involving Los Angeles County prosecutor Richard Ceballos, who asserted he was demoted for trying to expose a lie by a sheriff's deputy.

It was not clear from Friday's announcement if the case was the only one that will require a new argument session because of a 4-4 split. Justices also did not set a date for the case to be reargued.

The case is Garcetti v. Ceballos, 04-473.

Judge rules contractor disobeyed court order in suit; Firm principals, facing another case in Virginia, ordered to appear in Mobile for deposition

Saturday, February 18, 2006

By BRENDAN KIRBY Staff Reporter

Even as they face fraud allegations in federal court in Virginia, a pair of former military officers ran afoul of a federal magistrate judge in Mobile this week.

The Virginia case -- the first civil lawsuit related to the reconstruction of Iraq to reach a jury -- began Wednesday.

That Virginia trial pits Custer Battles LLC against former employee William Baldwin and Mobile resident Robert "Bob" Isakson, a former FBI agent whose disaster services firm worked as a subcontractor. The two sued under the False Claims Act, a Civil War-era statute that allows private citizens to collect part of damages awarded against defendants who defraud the federal government.

Scott Custer, a former Army Ranger, and Michael Battles, a former Ranger who also served in the CIA, formed Custer Battles in 2002 and won contracts to provide security for the Baghdad airport and supply some American troops.

Witnesses testifying this week in Virginia accused Custer and Battles of delivering trucks that did not work and failing to perform adequately in supplying cabins, mattresses, generators and Internet service.

On Tuesday, the day before that trial began, a lawyer for Custer Battles was in Mobile federal court, explaining why Custer and Battles did not show up last month to answer questions of opposing lawyers in a separate fraud lawsuit involving Isakson's company, DRC Inc.

DRC's lawsuit accuses Custer Battles of fraud and kidnapping. Custer Battles and its two officers have denied those allegations and responded with a countersuit, accusing DRC of fraud. The counterclaim was the subject of the Tuesday hearing in Mobile.

U.S. Magistrate Judge William Cassady ruled at Tuesday's hearing that Battles' and Custer's absence from a Jan. 23 deposition was a "willful failure to obey" a court order. But he refused a DRC request to dismiss the Custer Battles suit, saying it's not clear that he has the authority to take such action after one violation of a court order.

"What is clear is if there is a second failure to comply, they get what they ask for," he said.

Cassady ordered Custer and Battles to show up for a deposition in Mobile on March 21 or face a contempt-of-court charge.

Isakson has accused Custer Battles' officials of kidnapping him and his 14-year-old son at gunpoint and using offshore shell companies to bilk the Coalition Provisional Authority out of millions of dollars. The authority was the American-run agency that governed Iraq immediately following the 2003 invasion.

The countersuit against DRC accuses Isakson and his company of overbilling Custer Battles for work that wasn't done and overstating DRC's financial and personnel resources, among other allegations.

Lawyers for DRC have described the allegations as baseless. "We are very suspicious about the motivation for filing this lawsuit," attorney Louis Braswell said at Tuesday's hearing.

Attorneys for Custer and Battles said their clients were unable to attend the Jan. 23 deposition because they needed to testify at a hearing in Virginia on the False Claims Act case.

Braswell told Cassady that he was suspicious of this explanation, as well.

"We have suspected all along that these plaintiffs have been attempting to avoid their depositions," he said. "This wasn't an evidentiary hearing. There was no chance they'd be called to testify. We think that it's a ruse to avoid appearing for the deposition."

Separately, lawyers for Custer Battles have asked the judge to dismiss the company's two founders as plaintiffs, leaving only the company as plaintiff. Lawyers for DRC contend that is yet another attempt by Custer and Battles to avoid giving depositions in the case.

Braswell said the entire case should be dismissed. "We have egregious conduct here," Braswell said in court this week.

Google Criticizes Gov't in Court Papers

By MICHAEL LIEDTKE

SAN FRANCISCO - Google Inc. on Friday criticized the Bush administration's demand to examine millions of its users' Internet search requests as a misguided fishing expedition that threatens to ruin the company's credibility and reveal its closely guarded secrets.

The Mountain View, Calif.-based company delivered its indignant critique in a 25-page brief that marked its initial legal response to the U.S. Justice Department's attempt to force the online search engine leader to comply with a 6-month-old subpoena.

The Justice Department has until Feb. 24 to respond to the papers that Google filed Friday. A hearing for oral arguments is scheduled March 13 before U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, Calif.

The case has attracted widespread attention because the Justice Department's demand to peek under the hood of the Internet's most popular search engine has underscored the potential for online databases becoming tools for government surveillance.

Hoping to revive an online child protection law that has been blocked by the U.S. Supreme Court, the Justice Department wants a random list of the search requests made by the millions of people who visit Google during any week.

The government believes the search requests will help prove that Internet filters aren't strong enough to prevent children from accessing online pornography and other potentially offensive Web sites.

Yahoo Inc., Microsoft Inc.'s MSN and Time Warner Inc.'s American Online already have provided some of the search engine information sought by the Justice Department. All three companies say they complied without relinquishing their users' private information.

But Google has steadfastly refused to hand over the requested information, a defiant stance that the company reaffirmed in a brief that depicts the Bush administration as heavy-handed snoops and technological rubes.

In one particularly scathing section, Google's lawyers ridiculed the government's belief that a list of search requests would help it understand the behavior of Web surfers.

"This statement is so uninformed as to be nonsensical," the lawyers wrote.

Although the Justice Department says it doesn't want any of the personal information, Google contends its cooperation would set off privacy alarms and scare away some of the traffic that has driven its success.

"If users believe that the text of their search queries into Google's search engine may become public knowledge, it only logically follows that they will be less likely to use the service," Google's lawyers wrote.

The American Civil Liberties Union, which is opposing the Bush administration's effort to revive the online child protection law, also filed a brief Friday in support of Google.

"This subpoena is the latest example of government overreaching, in which the government apparently believes it can demand that private entities turn over all sorts of information about their customers just because the government asserts that it needs the information," the ACLU's lawyers wrote.

Google also said it doubts the government would be available to shield the requested information from public scrutiny. The company maintains the data sought by the government could provide its rivals and Web site operators with valuable insights about how its search engine works.

As it battles the Justice Department, Google is cooperating with China's Communist government by censoring some of the search results that the company produces in a country that restricts free speech.

That odd juxtaposition has caused civil rights activists to applaud Google for defying the U.S. government while the champions of human rights and free speech jeer the company for bending to China's will.

Family to get back art taken in WWII

Richard Willing

She has pursued her family's stolen treasures for nearly eight years.

But Maria Altmann of Los Angeles, a 90-year-old widow and Holocaust survivor, says she never expected this: Austria's national gallery is preparing to send her and her four cousins five paintings worth an estimated $300 million, nearly 70 years after Nazis confiscated the artworks in her native Vienna.

A long-shot victory by Altmann at the U.S. Supreme Court in 2004 and a win before an Austrian arbitration panel in January mean that the paintings, by early 20th-century Austrian master Gustav Klimt, could be headed to Altmann's three-bedroom home as soon as next month.

The Austrian government has declined to bid on the works, which include a gold-flecked portrait of Adele Bloch-Bauer, Altmann's aunt, that has been reproduced on thousands of souvenirs. In a statement, Austrian Chancellor Wolfgang Schuessel said the nation could not afford the $300 million valuation placed on the paintings by E. Randol Schoenberg, Altmann's Los Angeles-based attorney.

"It's quite amazing," Altmann says. "I wanted some recognition that (the paintings) were our property. I never expected to actually have them."

The Altmann case has had an impact on the art world, says Robert Jarvis, art law specialist at Nova Southeastern University in Fort Lauderdale. Public museums are re-examining the backgrounds of many of their pieces. Some, such as New York City's Metropolitan Museum of Art, have agreed to return some pieces to their nation of origin rather than risk losing them in a lawsuit.

Family loved the arts

Altmann was born and reared in Vienna in a prosperous Jewish family that maintained an old-fashioned salon for painters, writers and musicians. In 1907, her uncle, Ferdinand Bloch-Bauer, who supplied sugar to Vienna's confectioners, commissioned Klimt to paint a portrait of his wife, Adele. After she died of meningitis in 1925 at 42, Bloch-Bauer hung it in a private room in his mansion before a bowl of flowers that he replaced each day, Altmann recalls.

Altmann and her husband, Fritz, fled Vienna after Nazi Germany annexed Austria in March 1938, and they eventually settled in Los Angeles. Bloch-Bauer, whose home and art treasures were forfeited to the German-controlled state, died in Zurich in 1945. In 1948, Altmann was told by the Austrian national gallery that the Klimts had been left to the gallery under terms of her aunt's will.

"We never had reason to doubt it," she says.

Altmann began to try to recover the Klimts in 1998 after learning from stories by Viennese journalist Hubertus Czernin that the gallery had not inherited the artworks but had bought them, beginning in 1941, from a Nazi doctor who wrote "Heil Hitler" on the bill of sale.

Citing U.S\l "l". and international law, Austria's lawyers argued that the national gallery could not be sued\l "l" in an American court. They also argued that Adele Bloch-Bauer's will indicated that she wanted the paintings to go to the national gallery after she died.

But in June 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Altmann's lawsuit could go forward. That paved the way for the arbitrator's ruling last month that returned the paintings to her family.

Schoenberg, Altmann's attorney, says he valued the Klimts at $300 million after consulting several private galleries and museum officials in the USA and Europe. He says the paintings were appraised in the late 1990s at $110 million to $160 million. Publicity produced by Altmann's lawsuit helped drive up the value, Schoenberg says dealers told him.

The publicity also led directors of many public museums to re-evaluate art whose ownership history could be questioned, says Jarvis, author of an art law textbook.

"Art has a way of disappearing during wars and resurfacing years later," he says. "The problem now is you're never sure about your collection. Everyone can make a claim. Do you really want the future of your collection to be in the hands of a court?"

Re-examining art treasures

Institutions such as the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City are not waiting to be sued. On Feb. 3, the Met announced that it will return a 2,500-year-old vase and five other pieces to Italy in return for extended loans from Italian museums. The Met and the Italian government are scheduled today to announce the repatriation of six more pieces. Italy, Jarvis says, is one of an increasing number of countries asserting its ownership of art and antiquities that have been removed illegally -- often through the looting of ancient tombs -- and sold.

Schoenberg says he has received inquiries about the paintings from some prospective buyers. The paintings are being prepared for shipment in Vienna while an arbitration court decides who owns a sixth disputed Klimt: the gallery, Altmann and her cousins or another Viennese family whose ancestors purchased art from the painter.

Altmann says she has mixed feelings about her victory. She says she's delighted that "justice has been brought about." But she also hopes that an agreement can be reached to keep the paintings in Austria or sell them to another museum or private collector.

"I can't have them in my house," she says. "There is no security for this. I would be always worried about being hit over the head."

BlackBerry Case May Be Nearing Resolution; Judge May Issue Injunction Soon On U.S. Sales, Service

RICHMOND, Va. -- Say what you want about patent infringement suits, but at least the BlackBerry case has drama.

A federal judge, clearly impatient with the long-running case, could issue an injunction soon on U.S. sales and service of the wireless e-mail device.

Most patent suits are dismissed or settled long before they reach this stage. Remarkably, neither BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. nor tiny patent holder NTP Inc. have shown signs of backing down. In effect, they're daring each other to blink first and settle.

Governments, businesses and individual users are growing unnerved by the standoff. Although the odds of an actual shutdown are low, conflicting opinions about the possible outcomes and the spin from both sides have created a confusing picture.

James R. Spencer, a no-nonsense U.S. district judge widely respected in the legal community, now finds himself in the unusual position of weighing an injunction against RIM even as the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is expected to finally rescind NTP's patents.

"These patents are ... guaranteed to go in the garbage," James Balsillie, co-chief executive of Canada's RIM, said in December. "At the end of the day, our position is real simple: Let the system work."

Unfortunately for Balsillie, the system doesn't necessarily work in a timely fashion. Spencer has signaled that he is unwilling to delay his proceedings while awaiting final word from the patent office, which lags far behind the court system. A case that could change the practice of granting injunctions in patent cases, eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, will be taken up by the Supreme Court, but no decision is expected until the spring at the earliest. Spencer, meanwhile, has scheduled a hearing for Feb. 24 on the injunction and damages.

Because patent infringement cases don't often rise to this level of importance and even fewer make it this far in the courts, it's hard to tell how Spencer will rule. An injunction he once issued on a sediment-control device, for instance, interested few people outside the construction industry. RIM v. NTP, on the other hand, could affect many of the more than 3 million BlackBerry users in the United States.

"His bottom line is that he wants this case off his docket," said Susan Dadio, a patent attorney in Alexandria, Va. "And if the two sides can't reach a settlement or resolve this, he will not be afraid to act himself."

Arlington, Va.-based NTP was co-founded by the late Thomas Campana Jr., an engineer who in 1990 created a system to send e-mails between computers and wireless devices. He is survived by his wife, who owns a large stake in NTP.

The BlackBerry hit the market in the late 1990s, becoming popular with lawyers, consultants and others who wanted to check e-mails away from their office and home computers.

In 2001, NTP filed suit. A year later, a federal jury in Richmond agreed that RIM had infringed on NTP's patents. The jury awarded the small firm 5.7 percent of U.S. BlackBerry sales, a rate that Spencer later increased to 8.55 percent.

Spencer issued an injunction in 2003 but held off on its enforcement during RIM's appeals. Those efforts largely failed and the case returned to his court last year.

Government and emergency workers would be exempted from any BlackBerry blackout, but the Justice Department has asked Spencer to hold off on an injunction until the details can be sorted out.

If granted, that delay would also permit corporate and individual BlackBerry users to switch to other devices or to download new software that RIM claims would work around NTP's patents.

RIM executives say the new software will prevent any service disruptions, but they have released few details. Some analysts are questioning the viability of the workaround and whether it might inconvenience users or degrade service.

The unanswered questions in the case have led thousands of companies to contact consultants in recent weeks for advice on alternative technologies, though few have actually made the switch.

At United Parcel Service Inc., as many as 3,000 managers, executives and technical support employees use BlackBerries. In the worst-case scenario, the company would switch those users over to Palm Treo handhelds, which are used by other employees, said Donna Barrett, a UPS spokeswoman.

David Johnson, infrastructure technology director for Grant Thornton LLP, said the Chicago-based accounting firm has been moving away from BlackBerries to a variety of devices supporting Microsoft Corp.'s Windows Mobile operating system.

That move has been due to personal preferences rather than the RIM litigation, but now the firm has asked two wireless providers to be prepared to supply backup devices for some of its 550 remaining BlackBerry users.

Even so, Johnson hopes RIM and NTP will work out their differences.

"If they want to kill each other and put each other out of business, all they're going to do is drive people to Windows Mobile faster," Johnson said. "This is stupid is as stupid does."

Analysts and others say both sides should settle. RIM would be able to avoid the headaches of the injunction and focus more on its business, especially with Microsoft posing a greater threat.

And NTP, they say, would fare better with a fat settlement (perhaps beyond the $250 million RIM has deposited in escrow) while continuing to reap royalties from licensing agreements with RIM competitors Nokia Corp., Good Technology Inc. and Visto Corp.

Those companies have only small pieces of the wireless e-mail market dominated by RIM. And eventually, some analysts say, the patent office would catch up to NTP, eliminating its leverage.

"Their days of milking these patents are nearing their end," Gartner analyst Ken Dulaney said, referring to NTP. "If they are indeed worried about the poor widow Campana, they should take the money."

Opinion: Did Politics Trump Law in Spying, Tobacco Cases?

Ann Woolner

Feb. 17 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Justice Department's internal police are on the job again. They are digging into whether government lawyers acted ethically in approving President George W. Bush's domestic surveillance plan.

The question isn't whether the administration's policy is legal. No internal investigation is going to shake the department's conviction that it is (against all evidence to the contrary.)

The answer the in-house cops are supposed to provide is ``whether the department lawyers complied with their professional obligations'' in reaching their conclusion, Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said.

Or, did the president's agenda run roughshod over the law?

Someone should answer that question. In fact, someone should pose that question over and over.

We know that too little attention to professional obligations led to Justice Department opinions that anti-torture laws don't apply in the war on terror, an opinion withdrawn after it was made public.

More recently, the Washington Post reported that upper levels at the Justice Department approved state election law changes that favor Republicans, despite objections from the department's voting experts. And allegations that political appointees at the department told career lawyers to pull punches in their case against Big Tobacco have been widely reported.

Slithering Around

What is going on over there?

Could it be that lawyers hired with taxpayer funds to enforce the laws of the United States instead look for ways to slither around them, all in service to a partisan agenda?

Don't expect much of an answer from the Office of Professional Responsibility, where the department's ethics cops reside. It typically writes its findings cryptically, with no one named as blameworthy, and sends them to the people who requested the investigation. That would be members of Congress in the tobacco and eavesdropping cases.

To whatever degree the office does answer the question, it won't happen anytime soon.

The same office is still looking into last summer's allegations of political interference in the department's civil racketeering case against tobacco companies that are accused of lying to the public repeatedly about the risks of smoking.

Anti-Smoking Program

Did political appointees at the last minute improperly force career lawyers to chop their plea for an industry-funded, $130 billion quit-smoking program down to $10 billion?

And why were three of the government's own witnesses told to soften their testimony against Big Tobacco?

Management guru Max Bazerman of the Harvard School of Business, for example, says he was told to ease up on his position on whether court-appointed monitors could recommend removal of top corporate executives with a history of misrepresentations.

```If you don't, Associate Attorney General Robert McCallum will pull you from the case before you testify,'" a clearly uncomfortable career lawyer told Bazerman, the professor said in a telephone interview this week.

He didn't change his testimony and wasn't pulled from the case. And department officials, including McCallum, denied political motives. They said a court of appeals decision required the government to change its position.

`Additional Influences'

That explanation didn't satisfy U.S. District Court Judge Gladys Kessler, who suggested that ``additional influences'' beyond legal considerations could explain the government's sudden downshift.

In fact, after the government cut back on seeking a stiff penalty, she let anti-smoking groups intervene to argue for one. Kessler, who is trying the case without a jury, could issue her decision any day.

In the meantime, Sharon Y. Eubanks, who led the government's tobacco litigation team, took early retirement in December at age 50 after 22 years with the Justice Department, citing a lack of support for the case from political appointees.

Eubanks joined the department when Ronald Reagan was president and worked there through Republican and Democratic administrations alike.

``I never saw anything like this,'' she said in a telephone interview this week about politicization at the department.

Voting Rights

In the department's voting rights division, almost a third of its 36 lawyers had resigned over a nine-month period, the Washington Post reported in January, many claiming political interference in their legal conclusions.

A Georgia voter identification law, which a federal judge would eventually strike down as resembling the old racially discriminatory poll taxes, was found objectionable by career lawyers but just fine by their appointed bosses, according to news reports.

Just because the career lawyers get reversed by their bosses doesn't necessarily mean there's something sinister afoot, former Attorney General Griffin Bell said in a telephone interview. ``It's not uncommon for people to get overruled,'' he said, declining to give an opinion on whether the current Justice Department is politicized.

``I am against any politicization'' at Justice, said Bell, whom Jimmy Carter appointed to fix a department riddled with politics from the Nixon years.

Court Order

So we will see what the Office of Professional Responsibility says, if anything, about the tobacco case and the eavesdropping issue.

In the meantime, public interest groups are looking for answers.

A court order this week moved the Electronic Privacy Information Center closer to the documents it is seeking from the Justice Department on eavesdropping.

The House Intelligence Committee announced hearings, too, after its Senate counterpart balked.

As for the tobacco case, a lawsuit brought by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington prompted another federal judge last week to order both sides to submit arguments in writing on the group's document request.

What we have now at the Justice Department is an apparent pattern. It is a scary one at that, for anyone who values the rule of law.

Is it acceptable to torture despite laws to the contrary? Sure. How severely should large companies be punished if found to be lying about the deadly nature of their product? Not very. Do state election laws that hurt minority voting strength violate the U.S. Voting Rights Act? Nah. And does a law forbidding wiretaps without court-approved warrants apply to this administration's war on terror? Nope.

Yes, call in the ethics cops. And anyone else who can say what's really going on at the Justice Department.

· D.C. Circuit Schedules Oral Argument in Appeal Involving Department of Homeland Security's Human Resources Regulations
National Treasury Employees Union, et al. v. Michael Chertoff, Secretary of Homeland Security, et al. [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. In this facial challenge brought by several federal labor unions, the district court upheld in part and struck down in part recent regulations, jointly issued by the Department of Homeland Security and the Office of Personnel Management, creating a new human resources management system for the Department of Homeland Security. While upholding significant portions of the regulations, the district court found fault with (among other things) their treatment of collective bargaining and with the new role prescribed for the Federal Labor Relations Authority in Department of Homeland Security matters. Both sides have appealed and have filed briefs on an expedited schedule, and the United States Court of Appeal for the District of Columbia Circuit has now set oral argument for April 6, 2006, before Judges Randolph, Griffith, and Edwards.

· D.C. Circuit to Hear Oral Argument in Appeals Challenging Computer Disconnection and Class Notice Orders and Seeking Reassignment of this Indian Trust Litigation to a Different District Court Judge

Cobell v. Norton [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On Tuesday, April 11, a panel of the D.C. Circuit (Tatel, Brown, Silberman) will hear oral argument in two appeals arising out of the ten-year-old Indian trust litigation. One appeal challenges an injunction requiring the Department of the Interior to disconnect major computer systems from the internet and from internal computer networks. The second appeal challenges an order requiring Interior to declare in all written communications with class members that its trust information is of questionable reliability. The appeal also seeks reassignment of the case to a different district court judge.

· Aviation and Admiralty Staff Monitoring Baltimore Water Taxi Incident

In early 2004, the water taxi LADY D capsized in a storm in Baltimore's Inner Harbor. Of the 25 passengers on board, five drowned. The taxi's insurers now apparently plan to go forward with suit against the United States on allegations of negligent inspection by the Coast Guard.

C. LAST WEEK

· Third Circuit Holds that Use of Interstate Facilities in the Commission of a Murder-For-Hire Is a Crime of Violence Regardless of Intent

Ng v. Gonzales [3d Cir.]. On February 7, the Third Circuit held that the alien's conviction for use of interstate commerce facilities in the commission of a murder-for-hire was a conviction for a crime of violence, and hence an aggravated felony, even where the putative hitman became a government informant and never intended to nor attempted to follow through with the scheme. Using the "formal categorical approach," which looked only to the elements of the statute, the Court reasoned that the intent of the putative hitman was irrelevant and concluded that the offense was a crime of violence under 8 U.S.C. § 16(b) because it posed a "substantial risk that physical force will be used against another," even if "some violations . . . will never culminate in an actual agreement or the commission of a murder."

· Ninth Circuit Reverses Adverse Credibility Determination, Grants Withholding and Remands for Asylum Determination of Chinese Alien Who Brought Falun Gong Articles to Friend in China

Zhou v. Gonzales [9th Cir.]. On February 7, the Ninth Circuit reversed the Immigration Judge's adverse credibility finding and held that Zhou's fear of arrest and punishment in China was subjectively genuine and objectively reasonable. The Court found that the evidence compelled a finding that the treatment Zhou feared constitutes persecution even though she is not a member of Falun Gong but brought newspaper articles pertaining to Falun Gong into China for a friend who was a Falun Gong member. The Court determined that the evidence established that the arrest and punishment she feared was on account of an anti-governmental political opinion imputed to her by the Chinese government. The Court found her ineligible for Torture Convention protection.

- Second Circuit Reverses "Safe Haven" Determination and Adverse Credibility Finding
  Tandia v. Gonzales [2d Cir.]. On February 7, the Second Circuit reversed the Immigration Judge's determination that an alien's one-month stay in France after allegedly fleeing Mauritania was sufficient grounds for a discretionary denial of asylum because the alien had found a "safe haven" in a third country before coming to the United States. The "safe third country" regulation allowing for a discretionary denial of asylum had been repealed three days prior to the Immigration Judge's decision. The Court also reversed the Immigration Judge's adverse credibility finding because it "involved impermissible speculation and conjecture."

- Stipulated Dismissal in Records Case Concerning Saudis' Departure after September 11
  Judicial Watch v. Department of State [District of Columbia]. On February 7, Judge Rosemary M. Collyer approved the parties' joint stipulation of dismissal and denied as moot defendant's motion to dismiss. Plaintiff filed this action after submitting a Freedom of Information Act ("FOIA") request to the State Department for information regarding the departure from the United States of Saudi nationals immediately after September 11, 2001. This request was identical to requests to the Department of Homeland Security and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which were the basis for an action now pending before Judge Richard W. Roberts, Judicial Watch v. Department of Homeland Security (District of Columbia). The State Department, which responded to plaintiff's FOIA request with a "no records found" determination approximately 22 months after its initial receipt, moved to dismiss the present action because plaintiff failed to utilize the administrative appeal process that must be exhausted as a prerequisite to filing suit. Judicial Watch sought a joint stipulation of dismissal with prejudice less than 24 hours after the filing of the State Department's motion to dismiss.

- Judge Grants Summary Judgment on Religious Infringement Claims of Post-9/11 Detainee
  Hady Hassan Omar v. Carl Casterline, et al., No. 02-cv-1933 [Western District of Louisiana]. Plaintiff, an Egyptian citizen, is a former detainee who was held for 73 days following the attacks of September 11, 2001, and subsequently released. He filed suit against a number of federal employees of the former Immigration and Naturalization Service and the Bureau of Prisons. Plaintiff challenged his conditions of confinement, alleging that defendants violated his constitutional rights, as well as his rights under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA). On February 8, after extensive discovery, Senior Judge Little entered summary judgment on plaintiff's First Amendment and RFRA claims, dismissing all defendants with prejudice. (Earlier, in 2003, the court granted defendant's motion to dismiss plaintiff's other constitutional claims, including a challenge to a body cavity search). The court discussed plaintiff's numerous allegations that his religious rights were infringed upon, including claims that he was fed pork, mocked because of his religious beliefs, misinformed about the onset of Ramadan, and others. Judge Little concluded that plaintiff failed to raise a triable issue of fact as to any defendant.

- Fifth Circuit Holds Contract Right to Terminate Agreement on Bankruptcy Is Subject to Bankruptcy Code's Automatic Stay of Actions Against the Debtor Bonneville Power Administration v. Mirant Corporation [United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit; United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas]. On February 13, the Fifth Circuit (DeMoss, Garwood, Smith, CJ.) held that the Bonneville Power Administration violated the Bankruptcy Code's "automatic stay" by attempting to terminate an option contract to purchase electricity from the debtor without first seeking permission from the bankruptcy court. The option contract provided that Bonneville Power Administration could terminate the agreement immediately upon the seller's bankruptcy. The Court, however, in conflict with the Third Circuit, held that such termination provisions could only be enforced if the debtor actually assigned the contract to a different party and were otherwise subject to the bankruptcy court's general power to prevent unilateral actions that interfere with the debtor's property.

- Eleventh Circuit Dismisses Petition for Review of Federal Aviation Administration Order for Lack of Standing Phillips v. Federal Aviation Administration [United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit; Federal Aviation Administration]. On February 13, the Eleventh Circuit (Tjoflat, Black, Carnes) dismissed a petition for review from a Federal Aviation Administration order holding that the Naples Airport Authority did not violate federal statutes or grant obligations by reserving to itself the exclusive right to distribute jet fuel at Naples Airport. In our brief, we argued that petitioners lacked standing to seek review of the Federal Aviation Administration order because an outstanding state court injunction prohibited them from engaging in fueling activities at the airport. The airport intervened and filed a motion to dismiss on similar grounds. The Eleventh Circuit granted the motion, dismissing the petition for lack of standing.

- District Court Enjoins Transfer of Terrorist Suspect to Iraqi Criminal Court
  Sandra K. Omar, et al. v. Francis J. Harvey, et al. [District of Columbia]. Shawqi Omar ("Omar"), a dual American-Jordanian citizen, through his wife and son, has filed a habeas corpus petition seeking relief from Omar's current custody in Iraq. Omar was captured by Multinational Force – Iraq (MNF-I) in October 2004, and has been in the custody of MNF-I since that time. Among other things, Omar has ties to Abu Musab al Zarqawi – the recognized leader of Al-Qaeda in Iraq – and is suspected of harboring insurgents and directing the selection and surveillance of potential kidnap victims. Upon learning that Mr. Omar's case had previously been designated to proceed before the Central Criminal Court of Iraq on February 2, petitioners filed an ex parte motion for a temporary restraining order seeking to prevent the transfer of Mr. Omar out of purported United States custody until the district court could consider the merits of the underlying habeas petition. On February 3, without affording government counsel prior notice or an opportunity to be heard, the Court granted the ex parte motion and set forth an expedited briefing schedule on the temporary restraining order. Respondents argued primarily that the Court lacked jurisdiction over the case because Mr. Omar was not in the custody of the United States but rather was in the custody of the MNF-I, and that although U.S. Armed Forces participate in MNF-I's custody over Mr. Omar, they do so only as part of MNF-I and not as the United States. Respondents also argued that the injunctive relief sought would violate fundamental principles of separation of powers by requiring the Court to interfere with the decisions of the Executive in military and foreign policy matters. On February 13, Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, sua sponte, converted petitioners' motion for a temporary restraining order to a motion for a preliminary injunction and preliminarily enjoined the United States from removing Omar from "United States or MNF-I" custody. The Court determined that the case raises questions that are "so serious, substantial, difficult and doubtful, as to make them a fair ground for litigation and thus for more deliberative investigation."

- Portuguese Appeals Court Reverses Wrongful Termination Finding
  DaRocha v. United States, [Lisbon High Court, Portugal]. A 1988 reduction in force separated Elias DaRocha from his job as a cook at the Officers' Club at Lajes Air Field, Terceira, in the Portuguese Azores. On February 13, 2006, the Lisbon High Court reversed the decision of a lower court that had found that DaRocha's separation was wrongful, awarding back pay of $330,000 and reinstatement. The Lisbon High Court held that employment contracts between Portuguese nationals and the United States are governed by a bilateral agreement between the United States and Portugal. Under article 95 of this agreement, only disciplinary actions are justiciable before Portuguese courts. As this termination was the result of a reduction- in-force, the Lisbon High Court ruled that Portuguese courts lacked jurisdiction to hear the matter and dismissed the case.

- United States Files Amicus Brief in Agent Orange Litigation
  Vietnam Association for Victims of Agent Orange v. Dow Chemical Co. [United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit; United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York]. On February 15, the United States filed a brief as amicus curiae, urging affirmance of the district court's dismissal of claims brought on behalf of all Vietnamese exposed to Agent Orange and similar herbicides during the Vietnam War against the chemical companies that supplied the herbicides to the U.S. military. The United States argued that the political question doctrine barred a court from second-guessing the President's determination that the use of herbicides for defoliation and enemy crop destruction was a necessary and lawful means of waging war. The United States also asserted that the Alien Tort Statute did not authorize an implied private right of action to challenge the defendants' alleged aiding and abetting of the United States' use of herbicides, that the plaintiffs failed to state a valid claim under international law, and that the government-contractor defense barred claims brought under the Alien Tort Statute.

- Argument to Be Heard in Constitutional Challenge to New Bankruptcy Provisions
  In re Michele Moore [Western District of Washington]. On February 15, the bankruptcy court heard oral argument on the debtor's motion, seeking a declaration that the "debt relief agency" provisions of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005, 11 U.S.C. §§ 525-527, are invalid and not enforceable as to attorneys. The challenged provisions establish certain standards of professional conduct for attorneys and others who provide "bankruptcy assistance" to a consumer debtor with less than $150,000 in nonexempt assets. 11 U.S.C. § 101(12A). "Bankruptcy assistance" includes "providing information, advice, [and counsel] . . . or providing legal representation[.] 11 U.S.C. § 101(4A). The debtor asserts: (1) that the term "debt relief agency" should not be interpreted to include attorneys, and (2) that if such provisions are deemed to apply to attorneys, they violate the First and Tenth Amendment of the United States Constitution. On February 16, we also filed an opposition in In re Ella Srymanske (District of New Jersey), in which a challenge also has been raised to the constitutionality of "debt relief agency" provisions. Similar challenges have been filed in five district courts and three other bankruptcy courts.

- McKesson Settles Department of Defense False Claims Act Case for $3 Million. On February 15, 2005, McKesson Corporation agreed to pay $3,000,000 to compromise False Claims Act allegations. The government's investigation focused on allegations that between 1997 and 2001, McKesson overcharged Medical Treatment Facilities for pharmaceutical products covered under its prime vendor contracts with the Department of Defense.

- Federal Court in Brooklyn Dismisses Suit Challenging "Extraordinary Rendition" Maher Arar v. John Ashcroft, et al., No. 04-CV-0249 [Eastern District of New York] (Judge David G. Trager). On February 16, the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York dismissed a civil lawsuit in which plaintiff Maher Arar – a dual Canadian/Syrian citizen who was detained at JFK Airport in September 2002 while en route to Canada --challenged his detention in the United States and subsequent removal to Syria, where he claims he was further detained and tortured. According to plaintiff, he was removed to Syria, pursuant to the United States' alleged "extraordinary rendition" policy, because federal officials, believing plaintiff to be a member of al Qaeda, intended for the Syrians to interrogate him under torture. Asserting claims under the Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA) and the "substantive" component of the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause (pursuant to Bivens), plaintiff sought declaratory relief from the United States and money damages from six federal officials in their individual capacities, including former Attorney General Ashcroft, former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) Director Robert Mueller, former Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) Commissioner James Ziglar, former INS Regional Director J. Scott Blackman, and former INS District Director Edward J. McElroy. In its February 16 ruling, the District Court dismissed all claims against all defendants. First, the court dismissed all declaratory-relief claims against the United States for lack of standing. Second, the court dismissed with prejudice the TVPA claim on the ground that plaintiff had not shown the defendants to have acted under "color of foreign law" as required by the statute. Third, as to plaintiff's due-process claims based on his alleged detention and torture abroad, the court found that the "jurisdiction stripping" provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act did not divest it of subject matter jurisdiction, and it declined to resolve whether plaintiff even possessed substantive due process rights while abroad. However, the court still dismissed those due process claims with prejudice on the ground that national security and foreign policy considerations are "special factors" that foreclose a Bivens damages remedy. Fourth, the court dismissed without prejudice plaintiff's due process claims based on his detention in the United States, and, as to this count only, granted plaintiff leave to re-plead in order to allege (if he can) the personal involvement by the defendants in a violation of plaintiff's asserted due process rights to be free from "gross physical abuse," and to have consular and court access, while in United States' custody. Finally, the court declined, on mootness grounds, to address the "state secrets privilege," which the United States had raised as an alternate ground for dismissing most of plaintiff's claims, given its decision dismissing plaintiff's claims on other grounds.

- D.C. Circuit Holds that Putative Intervenor in Tobacco Litigation was Properly Denied Permission to Intervene to Assert Privilege Objections in Trial Testimony United States v. British Am. Tobacco Australia Servs. Ltd. [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On February 17, the D.C. Circuit (Sentelle, Randolph, Griffith) rejected two appeals by British American Tobacco Australia Services Ltd. (BATAS) arising out of the government's civil RICO action against the tobacco industry. BATAS, a former subsidiary of defendant British American Tobacco Co. and a limited intervenor in the litigation, had sought to expand its intervention rights to assert privilege objections in the deposition and trial testimony of a government witness. The court of appeals upheld the district court's determination that BATAS's expanded intervention motion, which was filed only 20 days before the start of trial, was "clearly untimely" under Fed. R. Civ. P. 24(a), and thus declined to address BATAS's challenge to the district court's alternative conclusion that BATAS had waived its alleged privileges. The court further concluded that because BATAS's motion to intervene was properly denied under Rule 24, BATAS had no standing to appeal from a subsequent order in the case rejecting other defendants' privilege objections in the same witness's testimony.

- Oral Argument Scheduled in Challenge to Passive Enrollment Policy under Medicare Prescription Drug Program
  Erb v. McClellan [Eastern District of Pennsylvania]. On February 17, Judge John Padova will hear oral argument on the defendants' motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs, individuals who are eligible for both Medicare and Medicaid coverage, filed suit challenging the passive enrollment policy of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. Through passive enrollment, individuals who had been previously enrolled in a Medicaid managed care plan, and who did not affirmatively select a different plan, were, as of January 1, 2006, passively enrolled into a Medicare HMO that was run by the same organization as their Medicaid managed care plan in order to provide, to the extent possible, a greater continuity of drug coverage after January 1. Plaintiffs contend that passive enrollment was adopted in violation of the Medicare Act and the Constitution, and in any case should have been subject to notice and comment rulemaking. They seek to enjoin the entire passive enrollment process in Pennsylvania. We moved to dismiss, arguing that plaintiffs' challenge must be channeled through the administrative exhaustion process under the Medicare Act, and that the court lacks subject matter jurisdiction as a result.

- D.C. Circuit Affirms Decision that the District Court Lacked Leedom v. Kyne Jurisdiction to Review the Federal Service Impasses Panel's Decision not to Hear a Matter at the Behest of the Federal Aviation Administration's Unions
  National Air Traffic Controllers Ass'n v. Federal Service Impasses Panel. (Ginsburg, Randolph, Edwards) [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On February 17, the D.C.

Circuit held that the district court lacked jurisdiction under Leedom v. Kyne to consider a claim by two Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) unions that the Federal Service Impasses Panel had violated a clear and mandatory duty to take jurisdiction over a dispute between the unions and the agency. The FAA had objected to the Panel's jurisdiction based on a special labor statute enacted for the FAA in the 1990s and, in court, had explained as amicus why that statute deprived the Panel of jurisdiction. The court of appeals held that 5 U.S.C. 7119, which addresses the Panel's authority, was not sufficiently clear and mandatory to support Leedom jurisdiction in the face of "compelling arguments" on both sides as to the Panel's jurisdiction, and that, in any event, the unions had a remedy with the Federal Labor Relations Authority by alleging that the FAA's refusal to participate was an unfair labor practice.

From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Addresses Port Security. "'If there was any chance that this transaction would jeopardize the security of the United States, it would not go forward,' Mr. Bush said, discussing a government review of the deal that began in October and ended on Jan. 16 without producing any objections from officials in his administration. The president added, 'This is a company that has played by the rules, that has been cooperative with the United States, a country that's an ally in the war on terror, and it would send a terrible signal to friends and allies not to let this transaction go through. <blocked::http://nytimes.com/2006/02/22/politics/22port.html?ei=5094&en=deaf48dc0824b8d6&hp=&ex=1140670800&partner=homepage&pagewanted=print> '" (David E. Sanger And Eric Lipton, "Bush Would Veto Any Bill Halting Dubai Port Deal," The New York Times, 2/22/06)

Dan Bartlett Says The Necessary Safeguards Have Been Taken And The "Transaction Should Go Forward." BARTLETT: "Well, it's very important Hannah, for the American people to understand the details and facts of this transaction. First and foremost, the port security - the security of all of our ports around our country - is controlled by the United States Coast Guard and the U.S. Customs department. They are charged with not only the physical security of the ports, but also the containers - the cargo itself is controlled by the customs agencies that are charged with protecting the United States of America. So this transaction has nothing to do with changing that dynamic or that relationship where the Federal government is in charge. So I think what you are seeing here Hannah, is the President and the Administration have looked at this. The very people, the very departments - the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Defense and others - who are charged with the security of our country looked very closely at this transaction to ensure that there were no vulnerabilities or liabilities for the security of our country. And they found that there wasn't. So what the President is arguing, and he will discuss and we will make sure the United States Congress understands, is that this transaction should go forward." (CBS' "The Early Show," 2/22/06)

Homeland Security Officials Discuss Security At The Nation's Ports.
MSNBC'S RITA COSBY: "Admiral Bone, let me start with you. Are you confident that security is not going to be compromised?" U.S. COAST GUARD REAR ADMIRAL CRAIG BONE: "Yes, I am. The security of the ports and the facilities that are operating the ports, as well as the vessels in the ports, come under jurisdiction of the Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection. And there are safeguards in place with regard to security plans for the vessels, the facilities, and the ports themselves under an Area Maritime Security Committee." COSBY: "You know, Jayson Ahearn, would there be any role for this company in terms of security?

Is there any sort of crack, any loophole that they could have some sort of running of it?" CUSTOMS AND BORDER PROTECTION'S JAYSON AHEARN: "No, I think one of the important things for us to articulate to the viewers is that the security of the ports are still going to be the responsibility of the port authorities, consistent with the international shipment port security code, as well as the Maritime Transportation Security Act, to make sure that they are consistent with the physical security standards that are required. The ports have the overall responsibility. Certainly, the Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection have security that we share that responsibility with.
But we're not going to do anything that's going to go ahead and diminish the security of this country at our ports." (MSNBC's "Live And Direct," 2/21/06)

The Washington Post Outlines The Facts Surrounding The Port Transaction.
"None of the U.S. politicians huffing and puffing seem to be aware that this deal was long in the making, that it had been reported on extensively in the financial press, and that it went through normal security clearance procedures, including approval from a foreign investment committee that contains officials from the departments of Treasury, Commerce, State and Homeland Security, among other agencies.
Even more disturbing is the apparent difficulty of members of Congress in distinguishing among Arab countries. We'd like to remind them, as they've apparently forgotten, that the United Arab Emirates is a U.S. ally

At The National Renewable Energy Laboratory (NREL), President Bush Promotes Alternative Energy Sources. "President Bush told workers at Golden's National Renewable Energy Laboratory this morning, 'you're doing great work here.' NREL Engineers Praise The President's Commitment To Renewable Energy.

NREL engineer John Benner said he was surprised by the depth and breadth of the president's knowledge about alternative-energy technologies: solar, wind, biomass, hydrogen and others. 'What he was expressing about how photovoltaics work and the hydrogen cycle - it showed quite a bit of depth,' Benner said. Also, he said, the president appears to realize that introducing these new technologies will require a long-term national commitment and steady funding. 'It's encouraging that he appreciates the magnitude of the challenge and the time it will take to implement change,' Benner said." From Today's Morning Headlines

President Bush Addresses Port Security. "'If there was any chance that this transaction would jeopardize the security of the United States, it would not go forward,' Mr. Bush said, discussing a government review of the deal that began in October and ended on Jan. 16 without producing any objections from officials in his administration. The president added, 'This is a company that has played by the rules, that has been cooperative with the United States, a country that's an ally in the war on terror, and it would send a terrible signal to friends and allies not to let this transaction go through.'" (David E. Sanger And Eric Lipton, "Bush Would Veto Any Bill Halting Dubai Port Deal," The New York Times, 2/22/06)

Dan Bartlett Says The Necessary Safeguards Have Been Taken And The "Transaction Should Go Forward." BARTLETT: "Well, it's very important Hannah, for the American people to understand the details and facts of this transaction. First and foremost, the port security – the security of all of our ports around our country – is controlled by the United States Coast Guard and the U.S. Customs department. They are charged with not only the physical security of the ports, but also the containers – the cargo itself is controlled by the customs agencies that are charged with protecting the United States of America. So this transaction has nothing to do with changing that dynamic or that relationship where the Federal government is in charge. So I think what you are seeing here Hannah, is the President and the Administration have looked at this. The very people, the very departments – the Department of Homeland Security, the Department of Defense and others – who are charged with the security of our country looked very closely at this transaction to ensure that there were no vulnerabilities or liabilities for the security of our country. And they found that there wasn't. So what the President is arguing, and he will discuss and we will make sure the United States Congress understands, is that this transaction should go forward." (CBS' "The Early Show," 2/22/06)

Homeland Security Officials Discuss Security At The Nation's Ports. MSNBC'S RITA COSBY: "Admiral Bone, let me start with you. Are you confident that security is not going to be compromised?" U.S. COAST GUARD REAR ADMIRAL CRAIG BONE: "Yes, I am. The security of the ports and the facilities that are operating the ports, as well as the vessels in the ports, come under jurisdiction of the Coast Guard and Customs and Border as well as the vessels in the ports, come under jurisdiction of the Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection. And there are safeguards in place with regard to security plans for the vessels, the facilities, and the ports themselves under an Area Maritime Security Committee." COSBY: "You know, Jayson Ahearn, would there be any role for this company in terms of security? Is there any sort of crack, any loophole that they could have some sort of running of it?" CUSTOMS AND BORDER PROTECTION'S JAYSON AHEARN: "No, I think one of the important things for us to articulate to the viewers is that the security of the ports are still going to be the responsibility of the port authorities, consistent with the international shipment port security code, as well as the Maritime Transportation Security Act, to make sure that they are consistent with the physical security standards that are required. The ports have the overall responsibility. Certainly, the Coast Guard and Customs and Border Protection have security that we share that responsibility with. But we're not going to do anything that's going to go ahead and diminish the security of this country at our ports." (MSNBC's "Live And Direct," 2/21/06)

The Washington Post* Outlines The Facts Surrounding The Port Transaction. "None of the U.S. politicians huffing and puffing seem to be aware that this deal was long in the making, that it had been reported on extensively in the financial press, and that it went through normal security clearance procedures, including approval from a foreign investment committee that contains officials from the departments of Treasury, Commerce, State and Homeland Security, among other agencies. Even more disturbing is the apparent difficulty of members of Congress in distinguishing among Arab countries. We'd like to remind them, as they've apparently forgotten, that the United Arab Emirates is a U.S. ally that has cooperated extensively with U.S. security operations in the war on terrorism, that supplied troops to the U.S.-led coalition during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, and that sends humanitarian aid to Iraq. U.S. troops move freely in and out of Dubai on their way to Iraq now." (Editorial, "Port Security Humbug," The Washington Post, 2/22/06)

I. Parties

The parties to this Charter are: the U.S. Department of Transportation, the U.S. Department of Commerce, the U.S. Department of Defense, the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Department of the Treasury, the U.S. Department of State, the U.S. Department of the Interior, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the U.S. Department of Justice, the U.S. Department of Labor, the U.S. Department of Energy, the Office of the Joint Chiefs, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Office of Management and Budget, and the Federal Maritime Commission.

II. Authority

The authority to establish this Committee derives from a directive by the President in the U.S. Ocean Action Plan, issued December 17, 2004, "Supporting Marine Transportation."

III. Purpose

A. To create a partnership of Federal agencies with responsibility for the Marine Transportation System (MTS) - waterways, ports and their intermodal connections – to ensure the development and implementation of national MTS policies consistent with national needs and report to the President its views and recommendations for improving the MTS.

B. The partnership established by this Charter, to be known as the Committee on the Marine Transportation System (CMTS), and its constituent sub-organizations described in paragraphs VI-VIII below, will be responsible for the following:

- improving Federal MTS coordination and policies;
- promoting the environmentally sound integration of marine transportation with other modes of transportation and with other ocean, coastal, and Great Lakes uses;

- recommending strategies and implement plans to maintain and improve the MTS.

IV. Organization

The CMTS is a Federal cabinet-level inter-agency organization that reports to the President and is supported by three sub-organizations: the Coordinating Board (CB), the Executive Secretariat (ES), and Integrated Action Teams (IATs).

A. The Committee on the Marine Transportation System

1. The Committee is comprised of the heads of Federal agencies, or their senior level designees. Through the Committee each member agency has a unique capacity to work collaboratively on MTS matters. The Committee will meet as appropriate, but not less than twice a year, to address nationally significant MTS issues. The Committee or any of its members can identify proposed agenda items.

4. Consultation

In carrying out its functions and activities under this Charter, the Committee will consult with the Marine Transportation System National Advisory Council (MTSNAC), Congressional representatives and staff members, the public, and other interested parties.

B. Coordinating Board (CB)

1. The CB will be comprised of senior-level representatives designated by each Committee member. The CB will assist Committee members in exercising their duties and responsibilities in accordance with this Charter. The chair of the CB will be rotated among the Commandant of the U.S. Coast Guard, the Chief of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the Maritime Administrator and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration Administrator. The CB will meet periodically to assist the Committee in formulating its recommendations and will report directly to the Committee.

2. The Coordinating Board is responsible for:

- creating and implementing the joint strategic plan for improving the MTS;
- coordinating and integrating the work of each IAT;
- recommending interagency procedures and mechanisms to achieve coordination of the partnering agencies' MTS activities and programs, including budget and appropriations requests, research and development studies and projects, and acquisitions for products and services;
- selecting lead agency for each IAT; and
- overseeing data acquisition and management for the MTS to support performance metrics.

C. Executive Secretariat (ES)

1. The ES is the staff body of the CMTS, made up of Federal employees from CMTS member agencies. The ES Director will be an employee of the Department of Transportation who reports directly to the Under Secretary of Transportation for Policy. 1. IATs are responsible for the execution of the strategies developed within the joint strategic plan. An IAT will be created as needed, and could be either temporary or permanent in nature depending upon the issue or challenge that the team has been formed to resolve. The members of each IAT shall include representatives from the lead agency, member agencies and other organizations required to satisfy the mission of the IAT.

2. Each IAT lead agency shall:

- prepare an IAT action plan governing its work that aligns with the joint strategic plan. Each action plan shall include, but is not limited to, the following tasks:

Partial Birth' Abortion Ban Gets High Court Review

Feb. 21 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court will consider whether the federal government can ban what opponents call ``partial birth'' abortion, scheduling a reproductive-rights showdown that likely will be resolved by the two newest justices.

The court today said it will hear the Bush administration's appeal of a ruling that said the 2003 Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act is unconstitutional because it doesn't make an exception when a mother's health is at risk. The announcement came as Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. took the bench for his first day of arguments, joining new Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

The case has the potential to mark a turning point on abortion for the court, which in 2000 struck down a similar Nebraska law on a 5-4 vote. Abortion-rights advocates say a decision upholding the federal law would mark a retreat from the 2000 ruling and the principle that doctors can take steps they deem necessary to protect a patient's health.

``The procedures banned by the act provide significant safety benefits to women,'' according to a brief filed in Washington by the doctors challenging the law. The law ``would materially increase the risk of sterilization, infection and other serious health consequences.''

The law, which has never taken effect, would be the first nationwide ban of an abortion procedure since the landmark 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalized abortion nationwide. The law outlaws procedures in which a fetus is partially removed from the mother before being killed, including a procedure known as intact dilation and evacuation. Doctors who violate the law would be subject to criminal and civil penalties.

`Form of Violence'

In signing the measure into law in 2003, President George W. Bush said that ``a terrible form of violence has been directed against children who are inches from birth.''

The justices will hear arguments in their 2006-07 term, which starts in October.

Opponents say lawmakers and the administration are trying to undercut the court's 2000 decision in the Nebraska case.

``Congress passed the act in a blatant attempt to overrule contrary Supreme Court precedent,'' the doctors challenging the federal law argued. The group is led by Leroy Carhart, a Nebraska obstetrician who also led the challenge to the state statute.

The group says intact dilation and evacuation reduces the risk of trauma to the uterus and cervix and is the safest method for some women with infections, bleeding or clotting disorders, heart problems and cancer of the placenta.

Congressional Findings

The Bush administration contends that Congress studied the issue over nine years and concluded that the procedure isn't safer than other abortion techniques and actually creates additional risks for the mother. The government says those findings distinguish the federal law from the Nebraska statute.

The lower court ``erred by refusing to accord deference to Congress's findings, including its ultimate finding that partial birth abortion is never medically indicated to preserve the health of the mother,'' U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement argued.

Three federal appeals courts have said the law is unconstitutional. The case before the justices comes from the St. Louis-based 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled last year in favor of four doctors who sued to challenge the law.

Abortion was a central issue in the Senate debate over the Alito and Roberts nominations. Opponents of the procedure say they hope the court now will be more receptive to restrictions.

``With the new make-up of the high court, we are encouraged that the justices will determine that the government does have a vital and compelling interest in preventing the spread of the practice of abortion into infanticide," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice.

Chief Justice

As a government lawyer in the 1980s, Alito voiced opposition to the Supreme Court's rulings supporting abortion rights. His vote may make a difference in the latest case because he replaced retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was part of the five- justice majority in the 2000 decision.

Roberts, Bush's other appointee, replaced the late Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, a consistent vote to allow abortion restrictions.

In Roberts's first abortion ruling, the court in January unanimously told a lower court to reconsider a ruling that struck down a New Hampshire parental-notification law. The justices said the lower court should consider simply blocking enforcement of the notification requirement in cases of health emergency.

The case granted review today is Gonzales v. Carhart, 05- 380.

Court allows church's hallucinogenic tea

By Joan Biskupic, USA TODAY

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled unanimously Tuesday that adherents of a small Brazilian-based religion practicing in New Mexico may continue to use a hallucinogenic tea. The court rejected arguments by the Justice Department that the communion ritual undermines federal anti-drug law.

Chief Justice John Roberts noted that Native American Church members can use peyote.
By Ken Heinen, Getty Images

The court broadly interpreted the 1993 Religious Freedom Restoration Act, intended to protect people from U.S. laws that appear to be neutral but can impinge on sacramental practices. (Related item: Opinion:Gonzales v. O Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao Do Vegetal)

Chief Justice John Roberts said in his opinion for the court that Congress sought "a workable test for striking sensible balances between religious liberty and competing ... governmental interests."

The religious society, O Centro Espirita Beneficente Uniao do Vegetal, known as UDV, is a Christian Spiritist sect with origins in the Amazon rainforest.

Its U.S. branch has about 130 members in the Santa Fe area.

Adherents receive communion by drinking hoasca, a tea made from plants unique to the Amazon that contain dimethyltryptamine, which is considered a mind-altering drug under the controlled-substances law.

The case began in 1999, when U.S. Customs intercepted a shipment of hoasca. The sect sued to block the government from interfering with the shipments. Lower federal courts sided with the UDV, based on the 1993 religious-freedom law.

Lower courts rejected the administration's claim that the UDV should be stopped from using the tea based on a "compelling interest" in uniform enforcement of anti-drug law.

Roberts noted that federal law has an exception for the use of peyote by the Native American Church.

"If such use is permitted ... for hundreds of thousands of Native Americans practicing their faith," Roberts wrote, "it is difficult to see how those same findings alone can preclude any consideration of a similar exception for the 130 or so American members of the UDV who want to practice theirs."

Roberts said the long-standing exception for peyote undercuts the government's broader contention that the federal anti-drug law allows no exceptions based on religion.

Several mainstream religious and public-policy groups had supported the UDV's position. Hollyn Hollman, general counsel for the Baptist Joint Committee, praised the ruling.

Top court rejects appeal in Marine's death

Paul Foy, Associated Press

The U.S\l "l". Supreme Court rejected the appeal of a Provo man who sued\l "l" the government over his son's death during a 2002 Marine Corps training exercise.

Justices issued no comment in refusing Tuesday to hear arguments over the accidental death of Marine Pfc. Jeremy Ross Purcell. Nineteen-year-old Purcell was shot in the chest four times by another Marine at Camp Pendleton, Calif., who mistakenly loaded his rifle with live rounds for a training exercise that was supposed to involve only blanks.

"I'm really not surprised. I think they're afraid it will open the door to lawsuits," Jon Purcell, the Marine's father, said Tuesday.

Purcell, a retired Navy surveyor, acted as his own lawyer because he couldn't find an attorney to represent his case. Purcell appealed rulings that held the military was protected by the Feres Doctrine, which has shielded it from liability since a 1950 U.S. Supreme Court case.

"Every lawyer I contacted said, 'The Feres Doctrine, I can't do anything about it,' " Jon Purcell said.

Jon Purcell pursued the case by himself using court knowledge gained working as a private detective years ago. During that time, he worked closely with attorneys and was aware of court procedures. He estimates he spent hundreds of hours researching case law at Brigham Young University's law library.

"I submitted a petition for a writ of certiorari (to the Supreme Court)" he said. "I probably would have gone to Washington if they would have heard it. But since they denied it, I guess that's the end of it."

U.S. District Judge David Sam in Utah and the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver said only the Supreme Court could overturn or modify Feres v. United States, the case that established the government wasn't liable for injuries suffered by military personnel during service for the armed forces.

"First of all, I wanted to get the Feres Doctrine reversed so people who were injured or killed due to negligence can sue the government," he said. "In order to get my case back to the federal courts here in Utah, the Feres Doctrine had to be overturned and my case had to be remanded to the district court."

Purcell said he understood the government couldn't be held liable for every mishap in the military but argued his son's death was an exception.

"This isn't for any injury or death that comes along," Purcell said. "It's for cases where the negligence jumps out and beats you to death. It's exactly what happened in my son's case."

His lawsuit said the Marine Corps failed to adopt fail-safe procedures instead of relying on individual Marines to make certain they're firing blanks and not live ammunition during training.

Purcell said another Marine was wounded at Camp Pendleton under similar circumstances 18 months before his son's death, "and that should have put them on notice that something wasn't right."

Purcell said that he wanted the court to award him monetary damages because the military doesn't change unless it's hurt in the pocketbook. He thought that a monetary award would motivate military officials to make and enforce safety regulations.

Jeremy Purcell graduated from Jordan High School in 2001. His father said he was able to easily make friends and was mild-mannered.

"We have nine kids," Jon Purcell said. "And they range from the most serious of serious kids, which is my oldest son, to a scatter-brain. (Jeremy) seemed to be able to move among all of these different kids and they all loved him."

Jeremy Purcell was the sixth child.

"Everyone who ever knew him cared for him," his father said.

The Marine who fired the fatal shots was not named in Purcell's lawsuit. The Marine pleaded guilty to negligent homicide as part of a plea agreement and was sentenced in 2003 to a year in military jail

Former employee says war contractor falsified profits

February 22, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- A former manager for Rhode Island-based war contractor Custer Battles LLC said he was instructed by the company's president to inflate profits on a key contract by using shell companies.

William Baldwin was the first of two whistleblowers to testify this week in federal court in Virginia against their former employer, a defense firm based in Middletown, R.I.

Baldwin and his co-worker, Robert Isakson, are suing Custer Battles for defrauding the U.S. government of millions of dollars by filing false claims on invoices for work done in Iraq.

Baldwin said company founder Scott Custer, 37, told him to increase profits from 25 to 50 percent using sham companies set up in the Cayman Islands.

Custer and his co-founder, Michael Battles, 35, have denied the accusations, saying Baldwin and Isakson are disgruntled former employees who stand to gain from the lawsuit.

Under the law, individuals suing on behalf of the government are allowed to take a portion of the money awarded to the government if the court believes the government has been defrauded.

Baldwin's testimony on Tuesday seemed to be supported by an official supervisor of Custer Battles contracts, who said Battles had inadvertently left behind documents that spelled out the alleged profiteering scheme after he stormed out of a meeting with government officials in Baghdad.

A lawyer for Custer Battles said it was not certain who had created the documents.

Another defendant, former employee Joseph Morris, 43, refused to answer at Tuesday's hearing when he was asked if he had forged signatures on documents to make the fraudulent claims.

A judge told the jury they may conclude Morris' refusal to answer as his acknowledgment that his answer would be adverse to him.

Deal would end Odyssey inquiry; Firm says it has agreed to $13 million settlement with Justice

By BOB MOOS / The Dallas Morning News

Odyssey HealthCare Inc. said Tuesday that it has reached a $13 million agreement in principle with the Justice Department to end a civil investigation into its admission, retention and discharge practices.

Officials at the Dallas-based hospice company said the 17-month-old investigation focused on the clinical eligibility of longer-term patients from 2001 through 2005 and that the settlement doesn't involve any admission of liability or acknowledgment of wrongdoing.

"The investigation centered on whether we had the proper documentation to support hospice care," said chief financial officer Douglas Cannon.

Including the charge for the settlement, Odyssey reported a $1.8 million net loss for the fourth quarter of 2005, or 5 cents per share, compared to $8.8 million in net income, or 24 cents per share, for the same period a year earlier.

Odyssey announced the settlement after the market closed. Mr. Cannon said a final resolution of the investigation must be approved by the Justice Department and the inspector general's office at the Health and Human Services Department.

Justice Department officials didn't return calls late Tuesday afternoon.

"We are settling this matter to resolve the substantial uncertainties, delays, distractions and costs associated with litigating complex regulatory matters, thereby permitting our management team to focus its complete attention on patient care, operations and business development," Odyssey president and chief executive Robert A. Lefton said in the release.

When Odyssey announced the federal investigation in October 2004, company co-founder David Gasmire stepped down as chief executive and was temporarily replaced by another co-founder, Richard R. Burnham.

Mr. Burnham held the chief executive's job until October 2005, when Mr. Lefton joined the company.

Excluding the charge for the settlement, Odyssey reported $7.8 million in net income for the fourth quarter, or 22 cents per share, an 11.6 percent decrease from $8.8 million, or 24 cents per share, for the same period the year before.

Net service revenue for the fourth quarter increased 11.4 percent to $101.8 million, compared with $91.3 million for the same period in 2004.

Growth was driven largely by significantly higher admissions, company officials said.

Odyssey's shares lost 18 cents Tuesday to close at $19.72 on the Nasdaq.

Suit challenges federal deficit reduction law

By BRENDAN KIRBY Staff Reporter

A federal lawsuit filed in Mobile this month challenges a hard-fought bill designed to rein in entitlement spending and reduce the deficit.

The "Deficit Reduction Act of 2005," which includes a provision making it harder for seniors to qualify for government-funded nursing home care, squeaked through Congress with not a vote to spare in either chamber.

Republican leaders hailed it as an important first step in enforcing fiscal discipline on a spendthrift Congress, but it is jeopardized by a technical discrepancy in an obscure provision of the statute.

In the lawsuit, filed last week in U.S. District Court, local lawyer and activist Jim Zeigler has asked a judge to throw out the entire law, based on a basic constitutional prohibition: The Senate and House of Representatives approved different versions of the measure.

The Constitution requires each chamber to pass bills in identical form.

The bill passed by the Senate on Dec. 21 contains a provision that requires Medicare to cover the costs for 13 months for patients to rent some type of durable medical equipment. The final House version that passed Feb. 1, however, sets the period at 36 months before patients begin paying.

President Bush signed the Senate version into law Feb. 8.

The Senate passed a resolution hours after Bush signed the bill, confirming that the measure signed by Bush was the "true enrollment reflecting the intention of the Congress."

But Zeigler, a Republican activist with a history of filing ethics complaints against state and local politicians, rejected the notion that the discrepancy was a harmless mistake.

"That rises way above a typographical error," he said. "It's a $2 billion difference over a five-year period, according to the Congressional Budget Office."

The suit names U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as a defendant. Justice Department spokesman Charles Miller said lawyers are reviewing the suit.

Zeigler said his is the first legal challenge to the bill, but he added that he expects others to join the fight, either by signing on to his lawsuit or filing their own complaints.

The Mobile lawyer makes plain that his primary objection is the nursing home provision. In an effort to prevent wealthier seniors from gaining eligibility for government-funded nursing home care by dispersing their assets to relatives, the bill prohibits gifting for five years prior to the date of a Medicaid application.

Zeigler said the bill "is going to put granny on the street" without doing much to curb the practice Congress targeted.

"The affluent and their asset-protection attorneys can still do asset protection," he said.

Cecilia Street, a 70-year-old retired teacher from Mobile who heard Zeigler address the issue at the Mary Abbie Berg Center on Tuesday morning, said she has long-term care insurance that should protect her. But, she said, she strongly opposes making it harder for seniors to qualify for Medicaid-funded nursing care.

"I think it's totally crazy to do that (prohibit gifting) for five years to senior citizens," she said.

Legal scholars appear divided about the issue.

"I think it is straightforward that the constitution requires the House and Senate to each pass the same bill," said Michael Gerhardt, a Mobile native who teaches constitutional law at the University of North Carolina School of Law.

But Brannon Denning, a professor at Samford University's Cumberland School of Law in Birmingham, said he thinks a federal judge would be reluctant to nullify the law.

"There have been some suits that have alleged that a version that was signed was not the version that was voted on," he said. "They haven't gone very far."

Denning and Gerhardt both agreed the lawsuit faces an uphill battle on another point -- whether Zeigler has the right to sue. Plaintiffs in civil suits must demonstrate that they are sufficiently affected by an action.

Judge rules Justice Department can have limited involvment in BlackBerry case

RICHMOND, Va._A federal judge ruled Tuesday that the Justice Department can appear at a hearing later this week as he considers an injunction against BlackBerry wireless e-mail service.

But U.S. District Judge James R. Spencer denied the federal agency's request for discovery and an evidentiary hearing in the patent-infringement case.

On Friday morning, Spencer will hold a hearing to address an injunction on U.S\l "l". BlackBerry sales and service, as well as damages.

The case began in 2001, when tiny patent-holding company NTP Inc. sued\l "l" BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. for patent infringement. A year later, a jury sided with NTP.

Spencer finds himself in the position of considering an action against RIM when the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office is expected to rule against NTP's patents.

But Spencer has previously said he is unwilling to delay his proceedings while awaiting final word from the patent office. That agency's process is far behind the court.

Canada Lobbies for Maker of BlackBerry; Officials Contacting U.S. on Patent Review

By Yuki Noguchi
Washington Post Staff Writer

The court battle over patents for the popular BlackBerry e-mail device has attracted an unusual amount of political attention, with officials in Canada pressing for resolution in a case involving one of that nation's top technology companies.

U.S. District Judge James R. Spencer in Richmond is set to take up the case Friday and will consider issuing an injunction to shut down BlackBerry service because it infringes on another company's patents. About 3 million U.S. subscribers could be unable to use their devices or forced to implement a software work-around.

Research in Motion Ltd., the company that makes the BlackBerry, is one of Canada's biggest technology success stories, and its legal battle with McLean-based NTP Inc. has led top Canadian officials to contact their U.S. counterparts about a review of the patents that underlie the case.

Canadian Minister of International Trade David L. Emerson, when he was minister of industry, sent a letter to U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez requesting that the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office publicize its timeline for a review of the patent claims held by NTP. The letter and other communications were obtained by The Washington Post under the Freedom of Information Act.

"It is my understanding that NTP has dismissed the importance of the re-examination process," Emerson wrote to Gutierrez in a letter dated Nov. 7. "Ensuring that the courts have the benefit of the USPTO's expert review of those patents, or at least know when to expect such a decision," would give the North American marketplace some certainty, Emerson wrote, essentially echoing RIM's legal position.

A jury found RIM guilty of infringing some of NTP's patents in 2002 and has ordered RIM to pay royalties that now total more than $250 million. Having lost all the key battles in court, RIM has tried to get the patent office to expedite a review of the patents. In the initial stages of the review, the office declared all of the relevant NTP patents invalid, and RIM hopes that will bolster its case in court.

Internal e-mails at the patent office show that a Canadian Embassy official contacted the agency last year to see whether it would be advisable to have the Canadian patent authority try to "exert an interest or pressure upon the USPTO regarding these reexaminations."

Both communications indicate how exceptional RIM and NTP's case has become in an agency whose processes are often lengthy and byzantine, patent experts said.

"It goes to show the uncommon nature of the process, and how very politicized it's become," said Susan Dadio, a patent attorney and former patent agency examiner based in Alexandria. The Canadian government also filed three legal briefs during the course of RIM's litigation, another anomalous level of foreign-government involvement, she said.

The reexamination of NTP's patents also was given special status -- it was initiated in 2002 by the then-director of the agency, James E. Rogan, instead of at a company or individual's request, as is the norm.

RIM and NTP's special status could mean "you treat it more seriously" within the agency, said Stephen Maebius, a Washington patent lawyer.

But the patent agency denies that politics has intervened in the process.

"This case is definitely not being treated differently from any other re-exam," said Brigid Quinn, a spokeswoman for the USPTO. "[Politics] has absolutely no bearing on the USPTO's review."

A spokesman from the Commerce Department, which oversees the patent agency, declined to comment on ongoing patent procedures.

RIM did not respond to requests for comment.

"NTP has always expressed a willingness to settle; it is RIM that is making the decision to have its customers shut off," said Kevin Anderson, a lawyer representing NTP. He declined to comment on the proceeding at the USPTO.

Although both sides have said publicly that they are open to settlement, a source close to RIM and NTP's negotiations has said the two parties are still far apart in settlement talks, making a truce before Friday's hearing in Richmond unlikely.

Justice Department's assault on Google to backfire?

By Declan McCullagh

The U.S. Department of Justice's attempt to compel Google to divulge millions of search records could backfire on police and prosecutors.

If Google convinces California courts that a federal privacy law protects Internet users' search terms from a subpoena, it would become more difficult for law enforcement to seek such records in future criminal investigations, legal experts are saying.

That's "absolutely" a concern, said Paul Ohm, a former Justice Department prosecutor who now teaches at the University of Colorado at Boulder. "There's a lot of precedent for that kind of thing."

News.context

What's new:
Legal experts say the government should be concerned about whether a judge sides with Google over the subpoena for users' searches.

Bottom line:

A ruling in favor of Google over the civil suit, which the search giant says should be thrown out because of a 1986 privacy law protecting "electronic communication services," could mean future complications for criminal prosecutions.

More stories on this topic

In Google's written response to the Justice Department's subpoena (click here for PDF), filed with a San Jose, Calif., court on Friday, the search company argued that a 1986 privacy law means that it "cannot disclose the contents" of search terms based on a subpoena. A subpoena is a letter from a prosecutor sent without a judge's prior approval or review.

That law, called the Electronic Communications Privacy Act, or ECPA, provides potent legal safeguards for "electronic communication services." Google said that because of features it offers, such as the ability to send news alerts, it qualifies as such a service; the search terms of its users are therefore legally protected, it argued.

"It is time for the government to declare whether search terms are covered by ECPA," said Al Gidari, an attorney at Perkins Coie who co-authored Friday's brief on behalf of Google. "It makes no difference, in our view, that the government wants anonymous search queries. (Its argument) would allow them to search e-mail so long as we removed the customer names."

Last month, the Justice Department asked a judge to force Google to hand over a random sample of 1 million Web pages from its index, along with copies of a week's worth of anonymous search terms, to aid in the Bush administration's defense of an Internet pornography law. U.S. District Judge James Ware has scheduled a hearing for March 13.

It's not clear how often search terms are used in criminal investigations. One North Carolina man was found guilty of murder in November in part because he Googled the words "neck," "snap," "break" and "hold" before his wife was killed. In a CNET News.com survey published this month, Google, America Online, Microsoft and Yahoo declined to answer whether they had received requests for search records from police.

The Justice Department subpoena normally would have been a routine matter, and AOL, Microsoft and Yahoo voluntarily complied with similar requests. But Google's resistance sparked a furor over privacy, with Sen. Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, asking the Justice Department for details. A bill announced in the House of Representatives also would require Web sites to delete information about visitors.

There's no guarantee, of course, that ECPA will be decisive in this case: The Justice Department and Google could settle, or the judge could rule on unrelated grounds.

But if the federal courts adopt Google's interpretation of the law, the FBI and other police agencies would find it more difficult to obtain records of search terms in criminal investigations. Similar searches, such as those performed on databases like Lexis-Nexis or Westlaw, or on news sites such as those of The New York Times and Yahoo, would also receive higher privacy protection.

Lawyers in civil cases, such as divorce attorneys and employers in severance disputes, would also encounter a new legal roadblock when seeking search terms.

"That is a good thing for privacy and I think the correct application of the law," says Kevin Bankston, an attorney at the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a digital-rights group in San Francisco.

A spokesman for the Justice Department declined to comment Tuesday on whether the subpoena could backfire on prosecutors, saying the matter was under litigation.

Ohm, the former Justice Department prosecutor, said any federal appeals court that makes a sweeping proclamation about ECPA in a civil case is the government's "nightmare scenario" because such an interpretation of the law could make criminal investigations more difficult.

If that happens in the Google subpoena litigation, Ohm said, "Who knows? You may see calls for new legislation."

This case is unusual because it was brought by the Justice Department's civil division, which is hoping to use the search terms for social-science research instead of as part of a criminal investigation. The department's ECPA specialists in the Computer Crime and Intellectual Property Section would not normally have been involved, Ohm said.

ECPA says that anyone offering an "electronic communication service to the public" generally may not divulge the contents of a communication except with the consent of the user or to a law enforcement agency that has a search warrant or a court order--instead of just a subpoena.

One twist in ECPA, however, could doom the Justice Department's pursuit of the search terms of Google's users. A search warrant is usually authorized only for criminal investigations, and ECPA's court order requirement also specifies an "ongoing criminal investigation."

But the Justice Department's defense of the Child Online Protection Act in a lawsuit brought by the American Civil Liberties Union is a civil dispute, not a criminal investigation.

Secrecy battle delays Arar report

JEFF SALLOT

OTTAWA The final report of the commission into possible federal complicity in Maher Arar's deportation to Syria and torture there is being delayed because of a battle over national security secrecy.

Justice Department lawyers object to the proposed release of information that the inquiry chairman considers relevant to public understanding of the role played by the RCMP and other federal agencies in the Ottawa man's ordeal.

Mr. Justice Dennis O'Connor, the Ontario judge who is conducting the inquiry, had hoped to publish his report by the end of March.

'There is going to be a delay by a month or two,' because Justice Department lawyers object to the release of some information on national security grounds, Paul Cavalluzzo, the chief commission counsel, said yesterday.

Most of the report is written.

'It's a particular part of the evidence that they say if released would be injurious to national security and at this point at time I can't agree with that,' Mr. Cavalluzzo said in an interview.

The commission may hold a hearing in secret to try to thrash out the issue.

Mr. Cavalluzzo said he hasn't noticed any softening in the Justice Department's line on what should be kept secret since the Conservatives came to office. 'But it's early days.'

During the election campaign, the Conservatives promised to run a more open government.

Mr. Arar, 35, a software engineer, wants to get as much information about his case on the record as possible to clear his name. U.S. authorities arrested him in 2002 at JFK airport in New York as a suspected member of al-Qaeda. He was deported to Syria, his country of birth, though he was travelling on his Canadian passport.

The Syrians tortured him, Mr. Arar says, to extract a false confession that he had trained at an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan. He was released after 10 months. He has never been charged in any jurisdiction.

Government witnesses told the Arar commission that intelligence reports about Mr. Arar were passed along to the U.S. and that Ottawa received reports from Syria of Mr. Arar's statements made during interrogation.

Mr. Arar is suing U.S. officials in American courts\l "l". In a recent ruling, U.S. District Court\l "l" Judge David Trager narrowed the grounds for a possible lawsuit by Mr. Arar, saying the judiciary shouldn't second-guess what the executive branch does in cases involving national security and international diplomacy.

Washington's diplomatic relations with Canada might be harmed if Mr. Arar's case went ahead and it turned out 'certain high Canadian officials had, despite public denials, acquiesced in Arar's removal to Syria,' Judge Trager wrote.

Whether the U.S. government is trying to overthrow another government, or transporting foreigners to third countries for interrogation, Judge Trager said judges should not hold officials liable for damages 'even if such conduct violates our treaty obligations or customary international law.'

'This ruling is outrageous,' said Maria LaHood, one of Mr. Arar's U.S. lawyers. 'It's wacky.'

Truth Out - Sick of being lied to by the EPA, 9-11 plaintiffs use the courts to force the answers they seek

by Kristen Lombardi

Jenna Orkin doesn't expect to hear her truth about 9-11 unless someone forces the officials involved to tell it. For her, as for so many people downtown and in Brooklyn, 9-11 meant clouds of ash and smoke engulfing her apartment building, filtering down the halls of her son's Tribeca high school.

Within days of the World Trade Center collapse, someone ordered Environmental Protection Agency administrators to tell New Yorkers the air was safe. Reopen Wall Street, and bring back its thousands of workers. Reopen Stuyvesant High School, which Orkin's son attended. Ignore Brooklyn, where residents like her vacuumed inches-deep white ash from their windowsills. No matter that private tests showed the air remained full of lead, asbestos, mercury, benzene. No matter that, according to documents forced out of the EPA by a Freedom of Information request, the agency's own tests agreed that the air in Lower Manhattan—who wanted to bother with Brooklyn?—wasn't fit to breathe.

Even without testing, anyone could see the billowing cloud of debris released when the 110-story twin towers came crashing down. Dust from the Trade Center hung in the air for weeks. Putrid fires burned for three months.

"Any half-wit knew it was hell after 9-11," Orkin says. She has been pressing the EPA to test for and clean up toxic dust in her Brooklyn Heights neighborhood, across the East River from ground zero and smack in the plume's path. After tests revealed high levels of asbestos in her home, she paid thousands of dollars for a full abatement, which included ripping up the carpets. Her World Trade Center Environmental Organization website, wtceo.org, is devoted to the 9-11 fallout and replete with aerial photos and satellite images of the plume.

Not content with activism, she is today one of 12 plaintiffs suing the EPA in a class action lawsuit on behalf of residents, office workers, and students from Lower Manhattan and Brooklyn. Unlike so many others who've gotten sick from WTC-related pollution— including many of the plaintiffs—she hasn't experienced any symptoms. And neither has her son. What she's sick of is not being told the truth.

"We were being duped," Orkin says, leaning forward, "and I'd like to find out why."

Now she and her fellow plaintiffs just might. On February 2, U.S. District Court Judge Deborah Batts handed down a surprising pre-trial ruling, blasting the EPA for its response to 9-11 and allowing the case to go forward. That put Orkin and her colleagues one step closer to proving their claims in court.

In their 111-page complaint, they allege that thousands of people living, working, and attending school downtown and in Brooklyn were exposed to contamination after the EPA misled them about air quality. They claim that Christine Todd Whitman, then the EPA administrator, and her staff made false statements and failed to carry out its cleanup duties. As a result, they charge, the EPA violated their constitutional rights to be protected from being harmed by government officials.

In her 83-page ruling, Judge Batts found enough evidence for the case to proceed. She not only denied the EPA's motion to dismiss it, but refused to grant Whitman immunity. On the contrary, she scolded the former EPA head, declaring her statements so "deliberate and misleading" they "shock the conscience."

"No argument can be made that Whitman could not have understood from existing law that her conduct was unlawful," Batts wrote.

The EPA's spokesperson declined to comment on the ruling, referring questions to the Justice Department, which is handling the case. Its spokesperson, Charles Miller, refused to discuss pending litigation.

Whitman, now a New Jersey consultant, released a brief statement, expressing "outrage" and calling the plaintiffs' claims off-base. "Every action taken by the EPA during this horrific event," she said, "was designed to provide the most comprehensive protection and most accurate information to the residents of Manhattan."

Now that the suit can proceed, the truth of that statement will be put to the test. Bates's decision paves the way for the plaintiffs to sit government officials down and make them testify under oath. And this process of legal discovery, explains New York Civil Liberties Union lawyer Chris Dunn, who has sued federal departments, will prove enlightening for New Yorkers. All we know now is what EPA officials say in the press—in short, their spin. That's about to change.

"No one on the street can get an official to talk about government business," Dunn notes. "One of the biggest virtues of any lawsuit is that it can force the government to disclose information it won't otherwise."

By now, some truths about the 9-11 fallout are known. The lawsuit outlines EPA press releases issued in the first days after the attacks, beginning on September 13. All are reassuring in nature. But it didn't take long for private tests to contradict the rhetoric. By December 2001, the New York Environmental Law and Justice Project was collecting dust samples in elevator shafts and ventilation units downtown, and finding asbestos and other toxins at double the threshold of safety. A freedom of information request from the project yielded 800 pages of previously hidden EPA samples that had revealed the same.

Then in August 2003, the EPA inspector general issued a scathing 165-page report verifying such contradictions and disclosing some disconcerting news—that the White House had pressured the EPA to sanitize its warnings, for instance.

Says Joel Kupferman, of the law project, which serves as co-counsel in the suit, "No one can really argue there wasn't malfeasance."

No one can argue that people aren't getting sick, either. Take Bob Gulack, a plaintiff who works for the Securities and Exchange Commission. One month after the attacks, the SEC leased offices in a building on Broadway, two blocks from ground zero. Almost from the moment Gulack arrived, he began experiencing ailments he never had before. His lungs filled with fluid. He struggled to breathe. Doctors diagnosed him with reactive airway disorder and permanent lung damage, and attributed the ailments to 9-11.

He wasn't alone. As a union steward for 150 SEC employees, he's documented symptoms among dozens of co-workers, from burning eyes to heart palpitations.

"This is brand-new and it started with the World Trade Center collapse," he says, sitting in a workaday Asian restaurant on 72nd Street. Gulack, who now collects workers' compensation for his 9-11–related illnesses, avoids going downtown. He does not visit his office or old haunts for fear of triggering his asthma. The only time he ventures into Lower Manhattan is to attend hearings on the 9-11 fallout.

Still, he says, "I'm one of the lucky ones."

Some of the plaintiffs forked out thousands of dollars—from $5,500 on up to $18,000—to rid homes and businesses of the toxic dust. Those who couldn't afford the professionals mopped it up themselves.

For the plaintiffs, the sense of injustice is profound. "We have been forgotten," says Gail Benzman, whose continual strained coughing is excruciating to hear. Benzman developed sinusitis and asthma while working in a municipal building on Center Street, seven blocks from ground zero. "There is nothing for people who have gotten ill outside the pit."

Jeanne Markey, one of three Philadelphia lawyers representing the plaintiffs, says the lawsuit has made these frustrated activ ists—who've spent years asking for credible testing, medical monitoring, and a real cleanup—suddenly much more powerful. "It's one thing to say someone lied," she observes. "It's another thing to take that person to court because of the lie."

Ask any lawyer who's sued the federal government and they'll tell you the same thing: Discovery changes everything. Mitchell Bernard, of the National Resources Defense Council, in Manhattan, has taken on the EPA and other government agencies in court. He says there's a difference between what an official says in public and under oath.

When a political appointee makes a pronouncement, Bernard explains, "he is not under any obligation to tell the truth." In a deposition, he is.

Officials tend to have a script, says the NYCLU's Dunn. Reporters may ask questions, but officials can refuse to answer. In a deposi tion, they can't. "Depositions are the surefire way to get government officials to answer questions they don't want to answer," he adds.

And then there are the documents. Confidential records the public cannot access even through freedom of information requests—internal e-mails, meeting minutes—become treasures unearthed in the discovery process. If plaintiffs can get their hands on such records, Bernard says, "What comes out of it could be illuminating in terms of what actually went on at the EPA."

Markey says she and her colleagues have yet to develop a strategy for discovery. But she ticks off a number of questions: What was the justification for the EPA's assuring statements? Did it rely on test results? What were they? "We're interested in discovering the basis of the statements," she says.

For now, the plaintiffs have to keep waiting. While Batts's decision allows the case to move forward, it's not the final say. Markey expects the Justice Department to appeal, stalling the proceedings.

Miller, the department's spokesperson, says the case is still under review, and points out that a second class action lawsuit against the EPA—one involving first responders on the debris pile—was dismissed earlier this month. "One judge went one way and the other judge went the other way," he says, suggesting a reason for appeal.

Appeal or no, the plaintiffs aren't about to give up. As they see it, the lawsuit represents the last chance to force the EPA to live up to its mission to protect New Yorkers. Somebody, they say, has to fight for accountability.

"Somebody has to blow the whistle on these guys," exclaims Diane Lapson, a plaintiff who heads the tenant association at Independence Plaza North, an affordable-housing complex three blocks from ground zero. Lapson, 54, a product of 1960s social activism, sits at her kitchen table, sipping coffee, looking out at the scarred Lower Manhattan skyline, and combing through snapshots taken from her building—aerial views of the 9-11 cloud, of the Hudson River pier where twisted metal was loaded on barges bound for Staten Island.

She's furious with the government officials who told her not to worry. "They're the naked emperors," she seethes. "Somebody has to stand up and say, 'You guys have no clothes.'"

The Morning Update

This morning, President Bush will hold a Cabinet meeting to discuss the results and recommendations of the Hurricane Katrina lessons-learned review process led by Homeland Security Advisor Fran Townsend. The President's most solemn obligation is the safety and security of the American people. The lessons-learned review has identified 125 recommendations in 17 general categories where we can improve the Federal government's capability to respond to a catastrophic event.
With hurricane season just a little over three months away, it is time for action to be underway. We have already taken a number of steps, and will continue to move forward on these recommendations.

President Bush Outlines His Agenda As He Prepares To Travel To India And Pakistan Next Week. "A week ahead of a trip to South Asia, President Bush outlined his vision of a long-term U.S. alliance with India and Pakistan that would foster greater freedom in the region, facilitate peace between the two feuding neighbors and help thwart terrorism.
'Together, free Asians and free Americans will seize the opportunities this new century offers, and lay the foundation of peace and prosperity for generations to come,' the president said in a speech to the Asia Society in Washington. ... With more than one billion people, India already is the world's largest democracy, a status that has helped make it a natural U.S. ally in the post-9/11 world, while Pakistan is moving toward greater political freedom. As South Asia develops economically and politically, 'it will be a source of peace and stability and prosperity for all the world,' Mr. Bush said.

Homeland Security Advisor Fran Townsend Previews The Administration's Katrina Lessons Learned Report. Most important, I think, is the communications capability.

Secretary Rumsfeld Discusses The Need To Adapt To Warfare In The Information Age. "Our nation is engaged in what promises to be a long struggle in the global war on terror. In this war, some of the most critical battles may not be in the mountains of Afghanistan or the streets of Iraq but in newsrooms in New York, London, Cairo and elsewhere <http://www.latimes.com/news/opinion/commentary/la-oe-rumsfeld23feb23,0, 2026191.story?coll=la-news-comment-opinions> . U.S. Customs And Border Protection's Jay Ahern Discusses Security At Our Nation's Ports. AHERN: "That's one of the distinctions we need to make sure as the viewers understand. That the Department of Homeland Security, Customs and Border Protection, has a responsible for inspecting containers coming in from foreign to make sure that they don't contain any weapons of mass destruction or any contraband of any kind. I think it is important to know the ports in the United States are not just the first time we encounter this cargo. We have in 42 ports throughout the world Custom Border Protection officers, screening before they get put on the ship." MSNBC'S CHRIS MATTHEWS: "So it doesn't matter whether an Arab government-owned company buys a British company in a take-over. It doesn't matter to our security, you're saying." Secretary Snow Says Preventing The Port Deal Would Send "A Terrible Message." "U.S. Treasury Secretary John Snow on Wednesday defended the decision to turn over six major U.S. seaports to a government-owned business in the United Arab Emirates, saying that the deal poses no security risk and failure to do so would send the wrong message overseas. "On Tuesday afternoon Mike Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, made another of his frequent trips to New Orleans on a mission that speaks volumes about his approach to what is arguably the most important domestic policy job in the federal government. In an interview hours before his departure, the former Utah governor told me that his purpose was to exchange ideas with local officials about how to make the hurricane-stricken city 'a model of a new design for delivering health care in this country.' ... Over 5 Million People Sign Up For New Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit Over The Past Three Months. "About 5.4 million people have signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past three months, a number that the Bush administration trumpeted Wednesday but others said was indicative of the program's problems. The enrollees represent a quarter of the 22 million elderly and disabled people who could voluntarily enroll in the program. An additional 20 million were automatically enrolled because they were covered previously by their employer, Medicaid or other government programs. The latest numbers show that beneficiaries are warming to the program, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said from Pensacola, Fla. 'We wouldn't have 250,000 to 400,000 people a week enrolling if it wasn't a good deal for seniors.'

Quoting a saying from her days in Texas government, Spellings said, 'What gets measured gets done.' Graduating students, she said, need to have the math and science skills to compete with workers around the world. ... Spellings' speech drew supportive comments from the audience. Subject: FACT SHEET: THE FEDERAL RESPONSE TO HURRICANE KATRINA: LESSONS LEARNED

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release February 23, 2006

The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina: Lessons Learned

Today, The Administration Released Its Review Of The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina. The President's charge to evaluate the Federal government's response to the storm resulted in the report and recommendations released today by the Administration, The Federal Response to Hurricane Katrina: Lessons Learned. The product of an extensive review, led by the President's Homeland Security Advisor Fran Townsend, the Report identifies deficiencies in the Federal government's Security Advisor Fran Townsend, the Report identifies deficiencies in the Federal government's response and lays the groundwork for transforming how the Nation - from every level of government, to the private sector, to individual citizens and communities - pursues a real and lasting vision of emergency preparedness and response.

The Lessons Learned Report Assesses The Federal Response, Identifies Lessons Learned, And Recommends Appropriate Corrective Actions. The Report identifies the systemic problems in Federal emergency preparedness and response revealed by Hurricane Katrina - and the best solutions to address them. Where actions at the State and local level had bearing on Federal decisions or operations, they are included in order to provide full context. The Lessons Learned report includes:

* 17 lessons the Executive Branch has learned after reviewing and analyzing the response to Katrina;
* 125 specific recommendations to the President, which have been reviewed by relevant Federal departments and agencies, and will now enter an implementation process; and
* 11 critical actions to be completed before June 1, 2006 - the first day of the next hurricane season.

The President's Charge: The Government Will Learn The Lessons Of Hurricane Katrina

President Bush Ordered A Comprehensive Review Of The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina. In his September 15, 2005, address to the Nation from Jackson Square in New Orleans, the President made clear that the Federal government would learn the lessons of Hurricane Katrina so we as a Nation can make the necessary changes to be "better prepared for any challenge of nature, or act of evil men, that could threaten our people."

Hurricane Katrina Was A Deadly Reminder That We Can And Must Do Better In Responding To Emergencies. Hurricane Katrina and the subsequent sustained flooding of New Orleans exposed significant flaws in our national preparedness for catastrophic events and our capacity to respond to them. Emergency plans at all levels of government - including the 600-page National Response Plan that set forth the Federal government's plan to coordinate all its departments and agencies and integrate them with State, local, and private sector partners - were put to the test and came up short.

The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina: Lessons Learned

We Are Not As Prepared As We Need To Be At All Levels: Federal, State, Local, Community, And Individual. Hurricane Katrina obligates us to re-examine how the Federal government is organized to address the full range of potential catastrophic events - both natural and man-made.

Hurricane Katrina And Its Aftermath Provide Us With The Imperative To Design And Build A Unified System. The Lessons Learned Report confirms the imperative of integrating and synchronizing the Nation's homeland security policies, strategies, and plans across Federal, State, and local governments, as well as the private sector, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), faith-based groups, communities, and individual citizens. To achieve this, the Report identifies three immediate priorities:

* First, we must implement a comprehensive National Preparedness System to make certain that we have a fully national system that ensures unity of effort in preparing for and responding to natural and man-made disasters;
* Second, we must create a Culture of Preparedness that emphasizes that the entire Nation - at all levels of government, the private sector, communities, and individual citizens - shares common goals and responsibilities for homeland security; and * Third, we must implement corrective actions to ensure we do not repeat the problems encountered during Hurricane Katrina.

A Comprehensive National Preparedness System

* The Existing National Preparedness System Must Be Improved To Minimize The Impact Of Disasters On Lives, Property, And The Economy.
Pursuant to the National Strategy for Homeland Security, the President directed the creation of a comprehensive national preparedness system in Homeland Security Presidential Directive 8 (HSPD-8), starting with a national domestic all-hazards preparedness goal. In response, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has developed an Interim National Preparedness Goal. We must now translate this Goal into a robust preparedness system that includes integrated plans, procedures, training, and capabilities at all levels of government. The System must also incorporate the private sector, NGOs, faith-based and other grassroots groups, communities, and individual citizens. The objective of our National Preparedness System must be to achieve and sustain risk-based target levels of capability to prevent, protect against, respond to, and recover from major natural disasters, terrorist incidents, and other emergencies.

* The Response To Hurricane Katrina Revealed A Lack Of Familiarity With Incident Management, Planning Discipline, And Field-Level Crisis Leadership. Going forward, the Federal government must clearly articulate national preparedness goals and objectives. It must create the infrastructure for ensuring unity of effort. The Federal government must manage the National Preparedness System for measuring effectiveness and assessing preparedness at all levels of government. The Lessons Learned report outlines five elements that are critical for a National Preparedness System:

1. Building and integrating the Federal government's operational capability for emergency preparedness and response:

preparedness and response;

2. Strengthening DHS's capacity to direct the Federal response effort while providing resources to responders in the field;

3. Ensuring unity of effort and eliminating red tape and delays in providing Federal assistance to disaster areas;

4. Strengthening homeland security education, exercises, and training programs; and

5. Ensuring that homeland security assessments, lessons learned, and corrective action programs are institutionalized throughout the Federal government.

Creating A Culture Of Preparedness

* The Creation Of A Culture Of Preparedness Will Emphasize That The Entire Nation Shares Common Goals And Responsibilities For Homeland Security. A Culture of Preparedness must build a sense of shared responsibility among individuals, communities, the private sector, NGOs, faith-based groups, and Federal, State, and local governments. Our homeland security is built on a foundation of partnerships. The Lessons Learned Report outlines four principles to guide the development of a Culture of Preparedness:

1. A prepared Nation will be a long-term continuing challenge;

2. Initiative and innovation must be recognized and rewarded at all levels;

3. Individuals must play a central role in preparing themselves and their families for emergencies; and

4. Federal, State, and local governments must work in partnership with each other and the private sector.

Ensuring That The Federal Government Does Not Repeat Problems Encountered During Hurricane Katrina

* Changes Must Be Made Immediately To Prepare For The 2006 Hurricane Season. The 2006 hurricane season is just over three months away. Even while the process to implement the lessons learned from Katrina is underway, there are specific steps the Federal government can and should take now to be better prepared for future emergencies. The Lessons Learned Report recommends 11 critical actions to strengthen Federal response capabilities before June 1, 2006, many of which the Administration has already begun to implement:

1. Ensure that relevant Federal, State, and local decision-makers, including leaders of State National Guards, are working together and in close proximity to one another in the event of another disaster;

2. Ensure that for events preceded by warning, we are prepared to pre-position an interagency Federal Joint Field Office (JFO) to coordinate and, if necessary, direct Federal support to the disaster;

3. Ensure situational awareness by establishing rapid deployable communications, as well as instituting a structure to consolidate Federal operational reporting with DHS;

4. Embed a single Department of Defense point of contact at the JFO and FEMA regional offices to enhance coordination of military resources supporting the response;

5. Designate locations throughout the country for receiving, staging, moving, and integrating military resources to ensure the most effective deployment of Federal disaster relief personnel and assets;

6. Identify and develop rosters of Federal, State, and local government personnel who are prepared to assist in disaster relief;

7. Employ all available technology to update and utilize the national Emergency Alert System in order to provide the public with advanced notification of and instruction for disasters and emergencies;

8. Encourage States to pre-contract with service providers for key disaster relief needs, such as debris removal and the provision of critical commodities;

9. Enhance the mechanism for providing Federal funds to States for preparations upon warning of an imminent emergency;

10. Improve the delivery of assistance to disaster victims by streamlining registration, expediting eligibility decisions, tracking movements of displaced victims, and incorporating safeguards against fraud; and

11. Enhance ongoing review of State evacuation plans and incorporate planning for Continuity of Government to ensure the continuation of essential and emergency services.

Transforming The Federal Response To Future Emergencies

Acting On The Recommendations In The Lessons Learned Report Will Enable The Federal Government To Respond To Natural And Man-Made Disasters More Effectively And Efficiently. The lessons of Hurricane Katrina cannot be learned and put into action without change. As the Federal government works to implement the near-term critical activities and 125 recommendations, State and local governments, the private sector, NGOs, faith-based and community organizations, the media, governments, the private sector, NGOs, faith based and community organizations, the media, communities, and individuals should undertake a review of their respective roles and responsibilities in preparing for and responding to catastrophic events.

Together, We Will Strengthen Our Ability To Prepare For, Protect Against, Respond To, And Recover From Catastrophic Events. The lessons learned from Hurricane Katrina and the recommendations set forth in today's Report will yield preparedness dividends that transcend Federal, State and local boundaries. Their full implementation will help the entire Nation achieve a shared commitment to preparedness.

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary

For Immediate Release February 23, 2006

The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina: Lessons Learned

Today, The Administration Released Its Review Of The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina. The President's charge to evaluate the Federal government's response to the storm resulted in the report and recommendations released today by the Administration, The Federal Response to Hurricane Katrina: Lessons Learned. The product of an extensive review, led by the President's Homeland Security Advisor Fran Townsend, the Report identifies deficiencies in the Federal government's response and lays the groundwork for transforming how the Nation – from every level of government, to the private sector, to individual citizens and communities – pursues a real and lasting vision of emergency preparedness and response.

The Lessons Learned Report Assesses The Federal Response, Identifies Lessons Learned, And Recommends Appropriate Corrective Actions. The Report identifies the systemic problems in Federal emergency preparedness and response revealed by Hurricane Katrina – and the best solutions to address them. Where actions at the State and local level had bearing on Federal decisions or operations, they are included in order to provide full context. The Lessons Learned report includes:

- 17 lessons the Executive Branch has learned after reviewing and analyzing the response to Katrina;
- 125 specific recommendations to the President, which have been reviewed by relevant Federal departments and agencies, and will now enter an implementation process; and
- 11 critical actions to be completed before June 1, 2006 – the first day of the next hurricane season.

The President's Charge: The Government Will Learn The Lessons Of Hurricane Katrina

President Bush Ordered A Comprehensive Review Of The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina. In his September 15, 2005, address to the Nation from Jackson Square in New Orleans, the President made clear that the Federal government would learn the lessons of Hurricane Katrina so we as a Nation can make the necessary changes to be "better prepared for any challenge of nature, or act of evil men, that could threaten our people."

Hurricane Katrina Was A Deadly Reminder That We Can And Must Do Better In Responding To Emergencies. Hurricane Katrina and the subsequent sustained flooding of New Orleans exposed significant flaws in our national preparedness for catastrophic events and our capacity to respond to them. Emergency plans at all levels of government – including the 600-page National Response Plan that set forth the Federal government's plan to coordinate all its departments and agencies and integrate them with State, local, and private sector partners – were put to the test and came up short.

The Federal Response To Hurricane Katrina: Lessons Learned

We Are Not As Prepared As We Need To Be At All Levels: Federal, State, Local, Community, And Individual. Hurricane Katrina obligates us to re-examine how the Federal government is organized to address the full range of potential catastrophic events – both natural and man-made.

Hurricane Katrina And Its Aftermath Provide Us With The Imperative To Design And Build A Unified System. The Lessons Learned Report confirms the imperative of integrating and synchronizing the Nation's homeland security policies, strategies, and plans across Federal, State, and local governments, as well as the private sector, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), faith-based groups, communities, and individual citizens. To achieve this, the Report identifies three immediate priorities:

- First, we must implement a comprehensive National Preparedness System to make certain that we have a fully national system that ensures unity of effort in preparing for and responding to natural and man-made disasters;
- Second, we must create a Culture of Preparedness that emphasizes that the entire Nation – at all levels of government, the private sector, communities, and individual citizens – shares common goals and responsibilities for homeland security; and

Robert -- Attached is the letter that six of the prominent national business groups sent to Senator Specter endorsing the Senate version of the bill mostly due to concerns over section 215. Also included is a draft of the response that we sent. (We sent the same version to all six organizations.)

October 4, 2005

The Honorable Arlen Specter
Chairman
Senate Judiciary Committee
SD-224 Dirksen Senate Office Building
Washington, DC 20510-6275

Re: Sections 215 and 505 of the Patriot Act

Dear Senator Specter:

The undersigned organizations write to express our support for reforms to Sections 215 and 505 of the Patriot Act which allow the federal government to require voluminous and often sensitive records from American businesses, without judicial oversight or other meaningful checks on the government's power.

First, the business community stands with all Americans in the war on terror, and we remain prepared to do our part to keep the nation safe. We also believe that our country's commitment to freedom and free enterprise has resulted in our collective prosperity as a people. That said, we are concerned that the rights of businesses to confidential files--records about our customers or our employees, as well as our trade secrets and other proprietary information--can too easily be obtained and disseminated under investigative powers expanded by the Patriot Act. It is our belief that these new powers lack sufficient checks and balances.

Without sufficient factual and legal checks against the government's demands for company records, a costly burden will be imposed on businesses to litigate (when possible under the current Act) unwarranted or overly burdensome requests that could have been appropriately honed with proper standards and oversight ex ante.

Additionally, we are concerned about the expensive and time-consuming burden that compliance with document requests from the government places upon affected businesses. These costs are in addition to the legal costs and internal obligations (here and abroad) that affected businesses must navigate to protect confidential information and the personal privacy of their employees, customers and suppliers.

We believe that the Patriot Act is an important tool that has helped keep our country safe, and as Congress considers reauthorization of the Patriot Act this fall, we feel it is vital that modest reforms to the business records provisions be considered. Specifically:

> Section 215 of the Act currently allows the Justice Department to obtain secret orders for business records and other tangible items from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court. We support the revision in the Senate bill that requires a statement of fact and some linkage between the records sought and an individual suspected of being a terrorist or spy. As written, the government merely has to certify that the records sought are relevant to an authorized investigation, without stating any underlying facts for the court or judge or showing any nexus with an actual suspect of investigation. As a result, the current Act does not impose any limit on the breadth of records sought, or protect records that are privileged or proprietary. Without such facts, let alone any probable cause of wrongdoing, an unreasonable burden and expense is imposed on businesses to supply potentially large quantities of information that are difficult to collect and transmit, including trade secrets or other sensitive information.

Accordingly, the Patriot Act reauthorization should include the Senate bill's provision of a meaningful right to challenge the order when the order is unreasonable, oppressive, or seeks privileged information, as well as the right to challenge the permanent gag order attached to the demand.

Section 505 of the current Act provides a process for the FBI to obtain business records--including credit reports, customer records of communication service providers, and records of financial institutions -- without any court approval or oversight through a "national security letter" (NSL). The definition of financial institutions has now been broadened to include a host of businesses, big and small, that range from real estate closing firms, car dealerships, pawnbrokers, boat dealers, insurance companies, casinos and any other business designated by the Treasury Secretary. Ideally, this section should be revised to require individual suspicion linking the records to a terrorist, spy or other foreign agent--unfortunately neither pending bill makes this needed revision.

In addition, any reauthorization bill should provide a meaningful right to challenge the records demand under Section 505. Both the Senate and House versions of the bill do provide for this. Unfortunately the House bill also contains a criminal penalty for any company employee who discusses the NSL when that communication is not necessary to comply with the order, even without any intent to obstruct an investigation. Therefore, we support the Senate version of this section. Similarly, any effort to expand the Patriot Act to allow the FBI the ability to demand any record from any business in America without a factual predicate and without court approval through "administrative subpoenas" must be rejected.

Making these reforms to the business records provisions of the Patriot Act is a vital issue for American business. The provisions in question require a careful balancing of the government's efforts to protect and secure our nation weighed against the burdens placed on businesses and the potential violations of privacy and the civil liberties of employees and customers. We are concerned that the primary determinant of the proper balance is weighted heavily towards the agency of government that wishes to ensure national security. We suggest that our judiciary should continue to serve as a vital check over the government's powers because it can equitably weigh the government's interests against the interests of individuals and businesses whose livelihoods, legal responsibilities, and civil liberties are in question.

Furthermore, businesses must meet the stringent and demanding document retention and privacy requirements of every jurisdiction in which they do business (some of which are required by other Congressional laws), as well the expectations of their stakeholders of a return on investment. Businesses may face a loss of reputation, or litigation--here or abroad-- for violating the privacy rights of others by complying with these provisions of the Patriot Act. Even if U.S. law provides immunity for complying with business records demands in national security investigations, the increasingly global business environment suggests that companies may face civil liability or legal sanctions abroad for violating privacy rules in the US.

American businesses are dedicated to assisting government agencies in their tireless efforts to identify suspected terrorists and to prevent acts of terrorism. Reforming the Patriot Act is an important step to ensure that powerful law enforcement tools are focused on those who would do us harm and that privacy rights and businesses interests are protected by the checks and balances our Constitution demands.

Thank you for your hard work on this important legislation.

Mr. Tom Heinemann
1001 Pennsylvania Avenue NW
Suite 500 South
Washington, DC 20004

Dear Mr. Heinemann,

Thank you for participating on the recent conference call regarding the reauthorization of the USA PATRIOT Act. As always, your concerns are important to the Department, and we appreciated the opportunity to provide additional information to you and fully discuss your concerns about the USA Patriot Act. We want to make sure that in the future your organization feels comfortable calling on us to provide you with any information you might need before taking a position on those issues for which your organization and the Department have a shared interest.

Consistent with our discussion, I write today to provide information about sections 215 and 505 of the USA PATRIOT Act. The Department would welcome the opportunity to respond to any additional questions you or your members might have, and we look forward to working closely with you in the future to allay any concerns that may arise.

As we discussed, there are many misunderstandings about what the USA PATRIOT Act does — and does not — do. Thus, we believe some background on the Act's purpose may be beneficial. In the wake of the tragedy of September 11, 2001, Congress passed the USA PATRIOT Act primarily to provide prosecutors and investigators with the critical tools needed to fight and win the war against terrorism. The Act principally did four things. First, it removed the legal barriers that prevented the law enforcement and intelligence communities from sharing information. Second, it updated anti-terrorism and criminal laws so that they reflect current technologies. Third, it closed gaping holes in our ability to investigate terrorists. Fourth, the Act increased penalties for those who commit terrorist crimes. The Act accomplishes these four goals while protecting the civil liberties of all Americans and preserving necessary checks of government abuse – there has yet to be any documented abuse of any USA PATRIOT Act authority in the 4 years since its passage. The House of Representatives and the Senate have each passed a different version of a bill reauthorizing those provisions of the Act that are scheduled to sunset soon, and the two houses are now busy resolving the differences between the two reauthorization bills.

The most controversial provision of the USA PATRIOT Act, section 215 – contrary to the misinformation that has crept into the debate -- provides a useful tool for catching terrorists and spies. Section 215 authorizes the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (the "FISA Court") — a federal court made up of judges drawn from the U.S. District Courts — to require a person or organization to produce "tangible things" that are relevant to international terrorism and espionage investigations. These are the same types of materials that prosecutors have long been able to obtain with grand jury subpoenas in criminal investigations. Moreover, section 215 and grand jury subpoenas are both governed by a similar relevance standard: with respect to section 215, the requested records must be relevant to a national security investigation, while with respect to grand jury subpoenas, the requested records must be relevant to a criminal investigation. As a result, section 215 applies in a much narrower set of circumstances than do grand jury subpoenas. While grand jury subpoenas can be used to investigate all types of criminal conduct, section 215 can only be used "to obtain foreign intelligence information not concerning a United States person or to protect against international terrorism or clandestine intelligence activities, provided that such investigation of a United States person is not conducted solely upon the basis of activities protected by the first amendment to the constitution." 50 U.S.C. § 1861(b)(2).

Further, Section 215 does not empower FBI agents to obtain records without a court order. Rather, section 215 is in fact more protective of civil liberties than a grand jury subpoena in that it requires prior judicial review and approval – it is a court order, not a subpoena. In no circumstance can agents use this authority unilaterally to compel anyone to turn over records. Thus the Department's use of section 215 orders is subject to more scrutiny than is its use of grand jury subpoenas. Nor can 215 orders be used to investigate solely First Amendment protected activity. A further check on abuses comes in the form of Congressional oversight and reporting requirements on the exercise of authority under section 215. There is no similar requirement for grand jury subpoenas.

Both the House and the Senate reauthorization bills would amend section 215 to provide additional protections, several of which the Attorney General has publicly supported. First, the House and the Senate would make the "relevance" standard explicit, although we are concerned that the standard the Senate bills creates — more than 20 lines long — is confusing and will likely lead to time-consuming and unnecessary litigation. A standard that lacks clarity puts both the government and the recipient in a difficult position. Second, the House and Senate have made explicit a recipient's right to disclose receipt of a section 215 order to an attorney and to others whose assistance might be necessary for compliance with the order. Third, the House and Senate have both made explicit a recipient's right to judicial review of a section 215 order, which means that a section 215 order will have both prior and after-the-fact judicial review. Fourth, both the House and the Senate have provided additional protection for records that have been viewed as particularly sensitive — namely, library and bookstore records. Finally, both the House and the Senate have again scheduled section 215 to sunset and will thus require reauthorization in the future.

National Security Letters (NSLs) are similarly used by the FBI during the early stages of an investigation to obtain specified information from specified entities in international terrorism and espionage investigations. An NSL merely constitutes a request for the production of information; it is not self-executing. The FBI therefore cannot enforce NSLs either through administrative procedures or self-help. Rather, if the recipient of an NSL declines to produce the requested information, the FBI's only recourse is to turn to a federal court for an enforcement order. Notably, the FBI's authority to issue NSLs preceded the USA PATRIOT Act by many years; section 505 of the Act simply revised the standards governing the issuance of NSLs. The information acquired through NSLs is extremely valuable to the Department's terrorism and espionage investigations. Electronic communications, for example, often play a vital role in advancing the operation of terrorist organizations. As a result, pursuing and disrupting terrorist plots often requires the FBI to seek information relating to the electronic communications of particular individuals. Likewise, money is critical to terrorist organizations, and the ability to track the movement of funds through financial institutions is often essential to identifying and locating those supporting or engaging in terrorist operations. We would therefore oppose raising the standard beyond the current relevance standard, particularly in view of the fact that the records sought generally are held by third parties.

Both the House and the Senate have proposed amendments to the NSL authorities, although the Senate would amend only one of the several NSL authorities currently in federal law. Both reauthorization bills would add explicit judicial review and enforcement mechanisms, and the House would take one additional step toward securing sensitive national security investigations by adding a criminal penalty for knowing disclosure of an NSL that is accompanied by a nondisclosure order. As we discussed during the phone call, under the House bill, an NSL would not automatically be accompanied by a nondisclosure order, and the statute would be clear that anyone disclosing receipt of an NSL would have to notify the subsequent person of any nondisclosure order. With these safeguards in place, we do support the possible criminal penalty, as it is critical that targets not be tipped off about investigations, particularly with respect to an NSL, which is often used at the early stages of an investigation.

Finally, we would like to address an additional concern raised during the conference call: that the use of these authorities lacks sufficient oversight that could have a particularly negative impact on small businesses. As stated above, section 215 establishes numerous safeguards to ensure adequate checks and balances in addition to the requirement that a federal court explicitly authorize the use of section 215 through a court order. Not only does Congress exercise full oversight of this authority through extensive reporting requirements and oversight hearings, both PATRIOT Act reauthorization bills that were passed in the Senate and the House of Representatives included an additional sunset for this provision. Congress, the federal courts, and the Department's Inspector General all guard against misuse.

In summary, sections 215 and 505 of the PATRIOT Act provide national security investigators with important tools for investigating and intercepting terrorism, and at the same time establish robust safeguards to protect law-abiding Americans.

Thank you for the opportunity to discuss further the Department's response to your concerns. We welcome the opportunity to discuss these concerns with you, and I wish to personally extend to you the invitation to call upon me if at any point you have any questions or concerns about this or any other matters related to the Department.

Sincerely,

Crystal M. Roberts

2. Announcements, Updates, Releases and Relevant External Organizations:

- UPDATE: District Court Enjoins Transfer of Terrorist Suspect to Iraqi Criminal Court
  Sandra K. Omar, et al. v. Francis J. Harvey, et al. [District of Columbia]. Shawqi Omar ("Omar"), a dual American-Jordanian citizen, through his wife and son, has filed a habeas corpus petition seeking relief from Omar's current custody in Iraq. Omar was captured by Multinational Force – Iraq (MNF-I) in October 2004, and has been in the custody of MNF-I since that time. Among other things, Omar has ties to Abu Musab al Zarqawi – the recognized leader of Al-Qaeda in Iraq – and is suspected of harboring insurgents and directing the selection and surveillance of potential kidnap victims. Upon learning that Mr. Omar's case had previously been designated to proceed before the Central Criminal Court of Iraq on February 2, petitioners filed an ex parte motion for a temporary restraining order seeking to prevent the transfer of Mr. Omar out of purported United States custody until the district court could consider the merits of the underlying habeas petition. On February 3, without affording government counsel prior notice or an opportunity to be heard, the Court granted the ex parte motion and set forth an expedited briefing schedule on the temporary restraining order. Respondents argued primarily that the Court lacked jurisdiction over the case because Mr. Omar was not in the custody of the United States but rather was in the custody of the MNF-I, and that although U.S. Armed Forces participate in

MNF-I's custody over Mr. Omar, they do so only as part of MNF-I and not as the United States. Respondents also argued that the injunctive relief sought would violate ftlinefundamental principles of separation of powers by requiring the Court to interfere with the decisions of the Executive in military and foreign policy matters. On February 13, Judge Ricardo M. Urbina, sua sponte, converted petitioners' motion for a temporary restraining order to a motion for a preliminary injunction and preliminarily enjoined the United States from removing Omar from "United States or MNF-I" custody. The Court determined that the case raises questions that are "so serious, substantial, difficult and doubtful, as to make them a fair ground for litigation and thus for more deliberative investigation."

- UPDATE: Federal Court in Brooklyn Dismisses Suit Challenging "Extraordinary Rendition"
  Maher Arar v. John Ashcroft, et al., No. 04-CV-0249 [Eastern District of New York] (Judge David G. Trager). On February 16, the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York dismissed a civil lawsuit in which plaintiff Maher Arar – a dual Canadian/Syrian citizen who was detained at JFK Airport in September 2002 while en route to Canada --challenged his detention in the United States and subsequent removal to Syria, where he claims he was further detained and tortured. According to plaintiff, he was removed to Syria, pursuant to the United States' alleged "extraordinary rendition" policy, because federal officials, believing plaintiff to be a member of al Qaeda, intended for the Syrians to interrogate him under torture. Asserting claims under the Torture Victim Protection Act (TVPA) and the "substantive" component of the Fifth Amendment Due Process Clause (pursuant to Bivens), plaintiff sought declaratory relief from the United States and money damages from six federal officials in their individual capacities, including former Attorney General Ashcroft, former Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) Director Robert Mueller, former Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) Commissioner James Ziglar, former INS Regional Director J. Scott Blackman, and former INS District Director Edward J. McElroy. In its February 16 ruling, the District Court dismissed all claims against all defendants. First, the court dismissed all declaratory-relief claims against the United States for lack of standing. Second, the court dismissed with prejudice the TVPA claim on the ground that plaintiff had not shown the defendants to have acted under "color of foreign law" as required by the statute. Third, as to plaintiff's due-process claims based on his alleged detention and torture abroad, the court found that the "jurisdiction stripping" provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act did not divest it of subject matter jurisdiction, and it declined to resolve whether plaintiff even possessed substantive due process rights while abroad. However, the court still dismissed those due process claims with prejudice on the ground that national security and foreign policy considerations are "special factors" that foreclose a Bivens damages remedy. Fourth, the court dismissed without prejudice plaintiff's due process claims based on his detention in the United States, and, as to this count only, granted plaintiff leave to re-plead in order to allege (if he can) the personal involvement by the defendants in a violation of plaintiff's asserted due process rights to be free from "gross physical abuse," and to have consular and court access, while in United States' custody. Finally, the court declined, on mootness grounds, to address the "state secrets privilege," which the United States had raised as an alternate ground for dismissing most of plaintiff's claims, given its decision dismissing plaintiff's claims on other grounds.

- UPDATE: D.C. Circuit Holds that Putative Intervenor in Tobacco Litigation was Properly Denied Permission to Intervene to Assert Privilege Objections in Trial Testimony United States v. British Am. Tobacco Australia Servs. Ltd. [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On February 17, the D.C. Circuit (Sentelle, Randolph, Griffith) rejected two appeals by British American Tobacco Australia Services Ltd. (BATAS) arising out of the government's civil RICO action against the tobacco industry. BATAS, a former subsidiary of defendant British American Tobacco Co. and a limited intervenor in the litigation, had sought to expand its intervention rights to assert privilege objections in the deposition and trial testimony of a government witness. The court of appeals upheld the district court's determination that BATAS's expanded intervention motion, which was filed only 20 days before the start of trial, was "clearly untimely" under Fed. R. Civ. P. 24(a), and thus declined to address BATAS's challenge to the district court's alternative conclusion that BATAS had waived its alleged privileges. The court further concluded that because BATAS's motion to intervene was properly denied under Rule 24, BATAS had no standing to appeal from a subsequent order in the case rejecting other defendants' privilege objections in the same witness's testimony.

- UPDATE: Jury Voir Dire Begins in United States v. Moussaoui
  On February 15, in the Eastern District of Virginia, jury voir dire began in the death penalty phase proceeding of United States. v. Moussaoui. The defendant was present in the courtroom. Three of the twelve prospective jurors were excused for cause. Peremptory challenges and final jury selection is scheduled for March 6. On April 22, 2005, the court accepted Zacarias Moussaoui's guilty plea to a six-count indictment charging him with conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries, conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy, conspiracy to destroy aircraft, conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction, conspiracy to murder United States employees, and conspiracy to destroy property. With his guilty plea, Moussaoui acknowledged his role in conspiring with al Qaeda to attack the United States. The government is seeking the death penalty.

- UPDATE: Hayat Material Support Trial Begins
  On February 14, in the Eastern District of California, trial began in the case of United States. v. Hamid Haya and Umer Hayat. On January 26, a grand jury returned a second superseding indictment charging Hamid Hayat with providing material support to a terrorist organization and concealing that material support knowing and intending that it would be used to carry-out an act of terrorism transcending national boundaries. The indictment alleges, among other things, that Hamid Hayat provided such material support by agreeing to attend a terrorist training camp. The indictment further charges Hamid Hayat with three counts and Umer Hayat of two counts of making false statements relating to the lies they told the Federal Bureau of Investigation about Hamid's attendance at the training camp. Both Hayats confessed that Hamid had attended the jihadist training camp and provided details about the training he received.

- UPDATE: United State Filed Brief in* Gonzales v Carhart
  On February 14, the United States filed a supplemental brief with the Supreme Court in Gonzales v. Carhart, a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act. The brief alerted the court to recent decisions in other circuits and again asked it to hear the case, rather than vacating or remanding it.

- UPDATE: Ninth Circuit Hears Oral Argument in San Diego Boy Scouts Case
  On February 14, the Ninth Circuit heard oral argument in Barnes-Wallace v. Boy Scouts of America. Plaintiffs, a same-sex couple, an agnostic couple, and their minor sons, sued the city of San Diego, the Boy Scouts of America, and the Boy Scouts' regional affiliate (BSA) over the City's long-term, low-cost leases of two parcels of public parkland to the BSA. One of the leases involves parkland on which the BSA has built its regional headquarters, as well as campgrounds and recreational facilities for use by the general public. The second involves parkland on which the BSA has built a youth aquatic center for use by the general public. Plaintiffs claimed that the leases violate the Establishment Clause, the Equal Protection Clause, and parallel provisions of the state constitution by endorsing the BSA's discriminatory membership policies. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of plaintiffs on their Establishment Clause claims, and denied as moot their Equal Protection claims. BSA appealed, plaintiffs cross-appealed the denial of their Equal Protection claims, and the City settled with the plaintiffs. The Division argued as amicus curiae that the district court was incorrect as a threshold matter in finding that the Boy Scouts is a religious organization such that the Establishment Clause applied to the City's leases with the Boy Scouts. The Division also argued that even if the Boy Scouts is a religious organization, the leases do not violate the Establishment Clause because they are not properly considered aid to a religious organization, or, if they are, such aid does not violate the Establishment Clause because it is made available to nonprofit organizations in a neutral manner, serves a secular purpose, and does not advance religion.

- UPDATE: Supreme Court Arguments in Rapanos and Carabell
  On February 21, the Supreme Court will hear oral argument in Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. Corps of Engineers. The primary issues in both cases are statutory and constitutional challenges to the Federal Government's jurisdiction to regulate under the Clean Water Act wetlands hydrologically connected or adjacent to non-navigable tributaries of waters of the United States.

- Supreme Court to Hear Arguments in Texas Voting Case
  On March 1, the Supreme Court will hear oral argument in League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry. A number of different plaintiff groups filed suit in the Eastern District of Texas alleging that the congressional redistricting plan the Texas Legislature adopted on October 12, 2003, is unconstitutional and in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. A three-judge panel held that Texas' redistricting was constitutional and did not violate Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. Plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court remanded the case to the three-judge panel for further consideration in light of Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267 (2004). The three-judge panel held that the Texas redistricting plan remained constitutional in light of Vieth. Plaintiffs appealed the three-judge panel decision and the Supreme Court noted probable jurisdiction. The United States will argue that the redistricting plan does not violate Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. Specifically, the United States will argue that under the old plan, District 24, a district where African Americans comprise 21.4% of the population, was not entitled to Section 2 protection because minorities could not satisfy the three preconditions required to prove a vote dilution claim set out in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986). The United States will also argue that Hispanics are not entitled, under Section 2, to an additional majority-minority district in the south and west region of Texas primarily because they already have greater than proportional representation in that region.

DOJ_NMG_0015852

Cobell v. Norton [United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit; United States District Court for the District of Columbia]. On Tuesday, April 11, a panel of the D.C. Circuit (Tatel, Brown, Silberman) will hear oral argument in two appeals arising out of the ten-year-old Indian trust litigation. One appeal challenges an injunction requiring the Department of the Interior to disconnect major computer systems from the internet and from internal computer networks. Not to pile on, but [redacted] just abandoned [redacted] White House Report duties when [redacted] (it's a weekly obligation and Reyes used to make sure there was someone around to take care of it if he was going to be out). [redacted] didn't ask me, or Gordon for that matter, to cover [redacted]. Had [redacted] would have discovered that Gordon is out and I was scheduled to be out all morning (the report is due at noon). Below is Jan casting about for an OASG reviewer. I will take care of reviewing it right now before noon, no worries, but just FYI.

Jeff,
Gordon's out doing immigration review and I was out all morning on the Hill doing briefings -- I got this from Jan and was expected to turn it around before noon -- it was 30 minutes late to Jan because there were a lot of typos, and I have now missed a big portion of a birthday lunch that I was obligated to attend. I had no idea this was coming to me. I don't know if Gordon did and he neglected to mention it to me. Reyes used to make arrangements for the report to be covered when he was going to be out. It got done, no worries, but FYI for next time. Thanks.

Circuit (Sentelle, Randolph, Griffith) rejected two appeals by British American Tobacco Australia Services Ltd. (BATAS) arising out of the government's civil RICO action against the tobacco industry. BATAS, a former subsidiary of defendant British American Tobacco Co. and a limited intervenor in the litigation, had sought to expand its intervention rights to assert privilege objections in the deposition and trial testimony of a government witness. The court of appeals upheld the district court's determination that BATAS's expanded intervention motion, which was filed only 20 days before the start of trial, was "clearly untimely" under Fed. R. Civ. P. 24(a), and thus declined to address BATAS's challenge to the district court's alternative conclusion that BATAS had waived its alleged privileges. The court further concluded that because BATAS's motion to intervene was properly denied under Rule 24, BATAS had no standing to appeal from a subsequent order in the case rejecting other defendants' privilege objections in the same witness's testimony.

- UPDATE: Jury Voir Dire Begins in United States v. Moussaoui
  On February 15, in the Eastern District of Virginia, jury voir dire began in the death penalty phase proceeding of United States. v. Moussaoui. The defendant was present in the courtroom. Three of the twelve prospective jurors were excused for cause. Peremptory challenges and final jury selection is scheduled for March 6. On April 22, 2005, the court accepted Zacarias Moussaoui's guilty plea to a six-count indictment charging him with conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism transcending national boundaries, conspiracy to commit aircraft piracy, conspiracy to destroy aircraft, conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction, conspiracy to murder United States employees, and conspiracy to destroy property. With his guilty plea, Moussaoui acknowledged his role in conspiring with al Qaeda to attack the United States. The government is seeking the death penalty.

- UPDATE: Hayat Material Support Trial Begins
  On February 14, in the Eastern District of California, trial began in the case of United States. v. Hamid Haya and Umer Hayat. On January 26, a grand jury returned a second superseding indictment charging Hamid Hayat with providing material support to a terrorist organization and concealing that material support knowing and intending that it would be used to carry-out an act of terrorism transcending national boundaries. The indictment alleges, among other things, that Hamid Hayat provided such material support by agreeing to attend a terrorist training camp. The indictment further charges Hamid Hayat with three counts and Umer Hayat of two counts of making false statements relating to the lies they told the Federal Bureau of Investigation about Hamid's attendance at the training camp. Both Hayats confessed that Hamid had attended the jihadist training camp and provided details about the training he received.

- UPDATE: United State Filed Brief in* Gonzales v Carhart
  On February 14, the United States filed a supplemental brief with the Supreme Court in Gonzales v. Carhart, a lawsuit challenging the constitutionality of the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act. The brief alerted the court to recent decisions in other circuits and again asked it to hear the case, rather than vacating or remanding it.

- UPDATE: Ninth Circuit Hears Oral Argument in San Diego Boy Scouts Case
  On February 14, the Ninth Circuit heard oral argument in Barnes-Wallace v. Boy Scouts of America. Plaintiffs, a same-sex couple, an agnostic couple, and their minor sons, sued the city of San Diego, the Boy Scouts of America, and the Boy Scouts' regional affiliate (BSA) over the City's long-term, low-cost leases of two parcels of public parkland to the BSA. One of the leases involves parkland on which the BSA has built its regional headquarters, as well as campgrounds and recreational facilities for use by the general public. The second involves parkland on which the BSA has built a youth aquatic center for use by the general public. Plaintiffs claimed that the leases violate the Establishment Clause, the Equal Protection Clause, and parallel provisions of the state constitution by endorsing the BSA's discriminatory membership policies. The district court granted summary judgment in favor of plaintiffs on their Establishment Clause claims, and denied as moot their Equal Protection claims. BSA appealed, plaintiffs cross-appealed the denial of their Equal Protection claims, and the City settled with the plaintiffs. The Division argued as amicus curiae that the district court was incorrect as a threshold matter in finding that the Boy Scouts is a religious organization such that the Establishment Clause applied to the City's leases with the Boy Scouts. The Division also argued that even if the Boy Scouts is a religious organization, the leases do not violate the Establishment Clause because they are not properly considered aid to a religious organization, or, if they are, such aid does not violate the Establishment Clause because it is made available to nonprofit organizations in a neutral manner, serves a secular purpose, and does not advance religion.

- UPDATE: Supreme Court Arguments in Rapanos and Carabell
  On February 21, the Supreme Court will hear oral argument in Rapanos v. United States and Carabell v. Corps of Engineers. The primary issues in both cases are statutory and constitutional challenges to the Federal Government's jurisdiction to regulate under the Clean Water Act wetlands hydrologically connected or adjacent to non-navigable tributaries of waters of the United States.

- Supreme Court to Hear Arguments in Texas Voting Case
  On March 1, the Supreme Court will hear oral argument in League of United Latin American Citizens v. Perry. A number of different plaintiff groups filed suit in the Eastern District of Texas alleging that the congressional redistricting plan the Texas Legislature adopted on October 12, 2003, is unconstitutional and in violation of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. A three-judge panel held that Texas' redistricting was constitutional and did not violate Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. Plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court remanded the case to the three-judge panel for further consideration in light of Vieth v. Jubelirer, 541 U.S. 267 (2004). The three-judge panel held that the Texas redistricting plan remained constitutional in light of Vieth. Plaintiffs appealed the three-judge panel decision and the Supreme Court noted probable jurisdiction. The United States will argue that the redistricting plan does not violate Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act. Specifically, the United States will argue that under the old plan, District 24, a district where African Americans comprise 21.4% of the population, was not entitled to Section 2 protection because minorities could not satisfy the three preconditions required to prove a vote dilution claim set out in Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986). The United States will also argue that Hispanics are not entitled, under Section 2, to an additional majority-minority district in the south and west region of Texas primarily because they already have greater than proportional representation in that region.

Subject: Germany

At the outset, I think it is important to note what is a fact too little recognized: the extent to which the United States, together with other countries, has continued to rely on traditional criminal investigations and prosecutions as a central element of our counterterrorism strategy. In a recent speech to the Council of Foreign Relations, U.S. Attorney General Gonzales stressed that while the United States has used "all the authorities at its disposal" to fight terrorism – including military and intelligence authorities – the criminal justice system remains one of those key authorities. To cite only a few of the numerous terrorism prosecutions noted by Attorney General Gonzales: Richard Reid, the attempted shoe bomber; Zacharias Moussaoui, who has pled guilty to plotting to crash aircrafts into buildings in the U.S., and who know awaits the penalty phase of his trial; Uzair Paracha, convicted on November 23rd of participating in a plot to help an Al-Qaeda operative re-enter the United States; the conviction two weeks ago of Ahmed Omar Abu Ali, a resident of Virginia, in connection with a plot to conduct 9/11 style attacks and to assassinate President Bush; and the conviction earlier this year of Mohammad Ali Husain al-Moyad and Moshen Zayad, in connection with the financing of terrorist activities by Al Qaeda and Hamas. Not all of our prosecutions, of course, have ended in convictions: but all represent the ongoing commitment of the United States to pursuing the criminal justice option.

Moreover, it is important to acknowledge that none of these prosecutions would have been possible without the mutual legal assistance provided by our foreign counterparts. These cases represent, in the finest sense, the truly global aspect of the fight against terrorism: complex cases, tried in the traditional criminal justice system, based on cross-border law enforcement cooperation.

And, of course, it is not only the United States that has prosecuted terrorism cases in the criminal justice system. Whether it is the Yarkas group convictions in Spain; the Motassadeq conviction in Germany; the Bali bombing convictions in Indonesia; the Beghal convictions in France; the Bouyeri conviction here in the Netherlands; or the Badat conviction in the United Kingdom – the criminal justice system has repeatedly proven that it can work.

Moreover, since September 11th, there have been unprecedented steps taken to enhance international criminal justice cooperation – steps that have received far too little public attention. I will mention only a few here: The extradition and mutual legal assistance treaties between the European Union and the United States – the first ever treaties between the U.S. and the EU – which were completed in record time, and will encourage such innovations as joint investigative teams. The work of the law enforcement and counterterrorism expert groups of the G-8 – the Lyon and Roma Groups – on issues ranging from border security to terrorism finance. The bilateral counterterrorism law enforcement working groups established between a number of countries, including the United States and numerous counterparts. The negotiation of international law enforcement conventions that will help fight not only ordinary crime, but terrorism as well, including the UN Organized Crime Convention and the COE Cybercrime Convention; and there have been specific antiterrorism conventions as well, such as the OAS Counterterrorism Convention.

But that said, I do believe that we face two looming obstacles to the enhanced implementation of the criminal justice response to international terrorism. Both involve the question of data.

The first of these obstacles is the issue of "data protection." Data protection has been the subject of intensive discussions between the EU and the United States in a number of contexts, but the issue, of course, extends beyond the EU and the U.S. One of the central questions faced by all our countries is how to ensure that data is properly gathered and shared in order to protect our citizens, without endangering their privacy interests. In Europe, this issue has been brought to the fore again by the EU Commission's proposed legislation regarding data sharing for criminal purposes. Significantly, with the EU context, that legislation would permit the sharing not only of criminal justice information, but also fingerprint, DNA, and border control data, and would enshrine the principal of "availability." We applaud the emphasis this proposal would place on greater sharing of information within the EU, which has been championed by the EU's Terrorism Coordinator, Gyies DeVries. But the danger here, we believe, is the erection of barriers to sharing of this data outside the EU, with partners whose privacy systems do not precisely match those of the EU. The U.S., for instance, recognizes a general right of privacy which emanates from a variety of sources, including the U.S. Constitution; while it implements that right in a different fashion than does the EU, the core principals and protections, we believe, remain the same. It is for this reason, for instance, that we have been able to conclude data sharing arrangements with Europol, to reach data protection arrangements in the context of the EU/US MLATs, and to work with the EU to fashion data protection provisions for the COE Cybercrime Convention. But what we must seek to avoid, I respectfully suggest, is a prolonged series of "adequacy" findings regarding international data sharing for criminal justice purposes. One of the most searing indictments of the Commission established to investigate 9/11 in the U.S. was the failure of our internal agencies to share information. We, as criminal justice practitioners, must work to ensure that concepts of "date protection" that may have particular applicability in the economic context – the First Pillar – do not migrate into the context of law enforcement, where we have exchanged criminal justice for years while protecting privacy rights. To the extent that data protection becomes an obstacle to criminal investigations and prosecutions, it will strengthen the credibility of those who argue that the criminal justice system cannot deal with terrorism.

The second potential obstacle I see here involves the use of data – and in particular classified intelligence data – at trial. This is data protection, if you will, in another sense: how can we ensure that classified information can be used in criminal prosecutions, while both protecting it and ensuring that the trial is fair? Let me be clear at the outset that I am not talking here about withholding relevant classified information from a court or defendant; that is not permitted, contrary to what some may believe, under United States law. Rather, what I am advocating for here are the creation of procedures by which the relevancy of the classified information, and the need to disclose it publicly at trial, can be determined before trial, in in camera proceedings before the trial court. For more than 20 years, the U.S. has had such procedures in place, under the Classified Information

Procedures Act, known by its acronym as CIPA. CIPA allows the prosecution to obtain rulings by the trial court as to what classified information must be disclosed, and in what form, before trial begins – and thus to decide whether or not to forego prosecution rather than reveal that information. We believe that this system has not only ensured fair trials in cases involving classified information, but has allowed those of us engaged in criminal prosecutions to assure the intelligence agencies that their information will be protected at trial – or that, if it cannot be, that the prosecutors will agree that the trial will not go forward, and the information will remain secret. Speaking from personal experience, I can say that it is invaluable for us to be able to offer the same type of assurances regarding the legal systems of our foreign counterparts

You already have this, it's primarily your work, but I thought it would be helfpul to have it handy:

PREPARED REMARKS FOR
ATTORNEY GENERAL ALBERTO R. GONZALES
AT THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

NEW YORK, NEW YORK
THURSDAY, DECEMBER 1st, 2005

Thank you for that introduction; it's a pleasure to be here.

I understand that they lit the tree at Rockefeller Center last night – I guess that means the Christmas season has officially begun. We Texans like to believe that everything is bigger in the Lone Star State. But, I think that even this proud Houstonian can concede that you've got us on the Christmas tree.

It has been my experience that just one of the many great things about New York is that New Yorkers share their gifts with the entire Nation…Americans believe that's their tree in Rockefeller Center, just as they believe that the wonders of New York City are theirs, even if they've never visited.

That's one of the many reasons that September 11th galvanized the country in the manner it did. As so many have noted: We were all New Yorkers on that terrible day.

Thankfully, there has not been another attack on our homeland in the four years since. America quickly united in the fight against terrorism, and we've prevented this evil from returning to our shores. However, the horrors of terrorism have been felt around the globe. And as you've heard the President repeat: "We are safer, but not yet safe."

So the message four years removed from September 11th is the same as it was when we watched the twin towers fall, and saw the Pentagon burn, and witnessed the heroism over Pennsylvania aboard Flight 93. We must continue to be resolute in the face of a determined and deadly enemy that has killed innocent citizens from New York to London, from Madrid to Baghdad, from Amman to Bali.

And so, we must continue to work with our friends around the world who are also targets. We must remain active in identifying our nation's vulnerabilities. And we must stand firm in responding to those who would destroy all that has made America great.

I think we all know what is at stake. I am a product of the American dream. And as the father of two young sons, I wish for them – as all parents wish for their children – a world in which the hope and opportunity of that dream is available and abundant.

In this new century – as Americans face a new kind of enemy and a new brand of conflict – we must fight an intelligent war against terrorism using every tool available…while remaining true to the ideals that make America worth defending – especially civil rights and civil liberties.

This is the government's obligation. And it is the American people's expectation… it is your expectation.

The President has embraced this charge. He is leading a comprehensive war against terrorism. Speaking on the Iraq war at the Naval Academy yesterday, President Bush promised that:

DOJ_NMG_0015880

"We will never back down. We will never give in. And we will never accept anything less than complete victory."

When it comes to securing our nation and our neighborhoods, there is no alternative but constant pressure within a comprehensive strategy. I am proud to say that our friends and allies around the world also embrace this strategy. Like us, they are not sitting still, they are taking tough action to better protect their citizens.

We are continuing, everyday, to evaluate and employ existing laws and tools that can help us in this fight…and looking for new ways to stay ahead of a constantly evolving enemy.

I am committed to that goal, and so are the investigators, prosecutors, and policy makers at the Department of Justice. Prevention of future terrorist attacks is our highest priority. That's why we are using every available lawful means to protect America – recognizing that when it comes to terrorism and terrorists, no single tool can do the job. It will take every weapon in our arsenal to combat this evil enemy.

Recent headlines reflect some of the ways the Department of Justice does its part to fight the War on Terror – including the use of the PATRIOT Act; prosecuting terrorism cases in federal court; and helping to train our Iraqi counterparts as they establish a functioning judicial system. Let me touch on each of these briefly, before taking your questions.

The PATRIOT Act has given investigators additional authorities they need to help stop terrorists before they can hurt Americans and harm our way of life. As we know, the Act was designed by an overwhelming bipartisan majority in Congress to deal directly with the shortcomings in our system prior to September 11th – providing new and better methods of sharing information, increasing cooperation and coordination in the law enforcement community, and improving our ability to track and investigate terrorist activity in the United States.

Sixteen key provisions of the Act are scheduled to expire at the end of this year. For several months, Congress has debated these provisions. It is good in a democracy like ours that we discuss and analyze the wisdom of every law – particularly those that, if abused, would infringe your civil liberties. We have done that. Now, Congress must act to reauthorize the PATRIOT Act by sending the President a bill of which all Americans can be proud.

Another important tool we have in the fight against terrorists is our criminal justice system. Many of the Department's prosecutorial efforts are familiar to you. There was Zacarias Moussaoui, who admitted his role in a plot to crash airplanes into prominent buildings in the United States – and that he was selected for this operation by Usama bin Laden. A penalty phase trial to determine his punishment will begin with jury selection in February. You will also recall Richard Reid, frequently referred to as the "shoe bomber," who planned to detonate explosives on an airplane, and was sentenced to life imprisonment in Boston. And there was John Walker Lindh, the so-called "American Taliban," who has been sentenced to twenty years in federal prison for joining the Taliban's fight against the U.S.-led liberation of Afghanistan.

But those are just a few of our early, high-profile prosecutions. You may not have heard as much about some other, recent successes we have had in fighting the War on Terror. It is hardly the case – as some have sought to suggest – that we've disrupted only a handful of terrorist plots since 9/11. Far from it. I want to share a few with you this evening a few examples as a reminder that the threat is real – and the need for Americans to stay vigilant remains vital.

Just last week, on November 23rd, the Department of Justice obtained a conviction here in New York of Uzair Paracha, who was charged with providing material support to al Qaeda. Paracha was part of an operation to help an al Qaeda operative obtain documents to re-enter the United States to commit what Paracha believed was a planned chemical attack on the United States. Authorities who arrested Paracha found an al Qaeda associate's driver's license, social security card, and bankcard in the place where Paracha was staying. Paracha also had agreed to hold al Qaeda funds in a business where he worked until al Qaeda needed them for its operations.

Another verdict in recent days involved Ahmed Omar Abu Ali. Abu Ali was a resident of Falls Church, Virginia, a suburb of our nation's capital, who received training in weapons, explosives, and document forgery from al Qaeda while in Saudi Arabia. When police searched Abu Ali's home, they found tapes in Arabic promoting jihad and the killing of Jews, materials praising the 9/11 attacks and condemning U.S. military action in Afghanistan, and a book written by al Qaeda leader Ayman al-Zawahiri advocating the violent destruction of democracy. The operations planned by Abu Ali and his co-conspirators included a plot to assassinate President Bush using either multiple snipers or a suicide bomb, as well as a plot to conduct 9/11-style attacks with planes flying from other countries to the United States. Abu Ali faces up to life in prison for his crimes.

Earlier this year, a jury in the Eastern District of New York convicted two Yemeni citizens, Mohammed Ali Hasan Al-Moayad and Mohsen Zayed. Al-Moayad was the imam of a large mosque and Zayed was his assistant. Together they collected money through the al Farook mosque in Brooklyn and distributed it to al Qaeda and Hamas in order to help train, equip, and arm jihad terrorists. The government made its case against the pair with the assistance of our German colleagues, who worked alongside the FBI in an undercover operation and traveled to Brooklyn to testify about al-Moayad's and Zayed's actions. The evidence at trial demonstrated that, during conversations with undercover officials, al-Moayad boasted that he had helped funnel some $20 million to Usama bin Laden and millions more to Hamas. On July 28 of this year, al Moayad was sentenced to 75 years in prison; Zayed was sentenced to 45 years.

In April of this year, the Department obtained the conviction of Ali Al-Timimi, part of what has been referred to as the Northern Virginia Jihad Network, a group of nearly a dozen individuals who attended the Dar al-Arqam Islamic Center just outside Washington D.C. The group participated in paramilitary training with the encouragement of Al-Timimi, a popular spiritual leader at the Islamic Center. During a meeting held after the 9/11 attacks, Al-Timimi encouraged his followers to go to Pakistan to receive additional military training and then join the fight against American troops in Afghanistan. Several made it to Pakistan where they received military-style training at violent jihad camps.

One of Al-Timini's followers was later found in Gaithersburg, Maryland in possession of an AK-47 rifle and a copy of "The Terrorist's Handbook," containing instructions on how to manufacture and use explosives and chemicals as weapons.

I could go on with many more examples of our successful efforts to prevent terrorist attacks here at home.

These stories speak for themselves: The threat to our nation and our way of life remains very real. The terrorists are constant and unrelenting. Their plans are cunning, and their methods cold-blooded. As difficult as the task is, we must continue to bring the battle to our enemies every day – and do so on each and every front available to us.

On the most basic level, these cases – and others – highlight both the extent of our success and the reality of the continuing threat. They show that we're doing the right thing…and doing it to great effect.

Notwithstanding our many prosecution successes, there are some challenges associated with prosecuting – and I use that word both broadly and narrowly – the War on Terror.

Terrorism cases are difficult to investigate and prosecute. These matters are both local and global in scope, impact intelligence community sources and methods, and implicate sensitive diplomatic relationships. From evidentiary issues relating to the chain of custody, to the availability of witnesses, to video linked depositions of foreign witnesses, significant hurdles unique to terrorism cases present real difficulties. That is one of the reasons why the government has utilized all the authorities at its disposal to address the new situations presented by the war on terrorism.

One such authority is the ability of the military to detain enemy combatants.

Justice O'Connor, writing for the Supreme Court in the Hamdi case, reaffirmed both the importance and the legality of the military's long-established authority to detain enemy combatants captured on the battlefield during the course of hostilities, even if they are American citizens, to prevent them from returning to the battlefield and taking up arms against America once again. Justice O'Connor recognized, too, that it is consistent with our Constitution and the traditional laws of war that, quote, "a citizen, no less than an alien, can be part of or supporting forces hostile to the United States" and therefore be subject to detention during the course of hostilities.

Enemy combatants are held lawfully and for preventive reasons to protect America's soldiers and America's citizens. It would defy every past practice of war, not to mention common sense and sound policy, to release back into battle those whom we capture fighting against us.

Even so, the Department of Defense provides enemy combatant detainees privileges the likes of which no nation in history has ever afforded its enemies. The Supreme Court indicated that the government must provide some process, and the Department of Defense has. With Combatant Status Review Tribunals at Guantanamo, for instance, each detainee is entitled to a hearing, to present evidence that he believes might support his release, and to receive the assistance of a military officer in presenting his case. And a parole-type process called an Administrative Review Board provides persons established to be enemy combatants a chance, once a year, to be heard and released, even while a conflict is going on.

We can be proud of the procedural protections the Department of Defense has afforded our Nation's enemies, but we cannot discount the danger these detainees continue to pose to us and to our servicemen fighting abroad. Of the hundreds of detainees released from Guantanamo based on a determination that they posed only a low risk to this country, the Defense Department has reported that at least ten have returned to take up arms against the United States.

It's a further reminder that if we do not constantly engage the terrorists, I am convinced the terrorists will once again successfully bring the battle to our shores.

In addition to prosecuting terrorist in court and incapacitating enemy combatants, the Administration works to uphold the Rule of Law, protect the personal liberties and rights promised by our Constitution, and promote justice around the world. This obligation itself forms yet another front in the War on Terrorism – winning the hearts and minds of freedom loving people everywhere.

If we are to rally even more countries to our cause, we must continue to show the world that we are worthy of its trust. We must show that, while our enemies would kill innocent fellow Muslims celebrating a wedding in a hotel in Jordan, we are committed to respecting and honoring the innate value of all human life.

At the Department of Justice, we have taken a comprehensive and concerted approach to this task. The Department has investigated hundreds of bias-motivated incidents involving violence or threats against individuals perceived to be Muslim, or of Arab, Middle Eastern, or South Asian origin – and we've obtained a number of important federal convictions. We've also assisted local law enforcement in its efforts to do the same, resulting in more than 150 additional bias-related criminal prosecutions.

In addition, we are working closely with leaders of these communities to ensure that we are doing everything we can to promote fairness and respect for all people as we confront our common enemy. Senior officials in the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department have held meetings with leaders of Muslim, Sikh, Arab, and South-Asian American organizations in Washington and throughout the country to ensure that community concerns are being heard and addressed. And our Community Relations Service has held town and community meetings around the country aimed at ensuring better understanding among diverse communities.

Combating racism and bias against our Muslim citizens is both a moral imperative and essential to success in the War on Terror. As the President explained in his second inaugural address, "our country must abandon all the habits of racism, because we cannot carry the message of freedom and the baggage of bigotry at the same time."

Half a world away, we are sowing the seeds of justice in Iraq. One year ago, the Central Criminal Court of Iraq had the capacity to prosecute fewer than 10 trials and investigative hearings per month. In the first two weeks of September 2005 alone, the Court prosecuted more than 50 multi-defendant trials, and conducted 133 investigative hearings. This is progress for the Iraqi people who are desperate for a measure of normalcy and order, who want the lawlessness and brutality to end.

The Court is now expanding its reach throughout Iraq with separate branches in local provinces. Since the fall of Saddam Hussein, the Department of Justice has helped to train hundreds of Iraqi judges. These judges are now busy resolving cases under Iraqi law – more than 20,000 felony cases since 2003. This element of the President's National Strategy for Victory in Iraq will help diminish the rule of terrorists in Iraq – and I am proud that the Department continues to play a role in helping to bring relief to a population thirsting for justice.

History shows that our forefathers have remained vigilant and resolute in past conflicts similar to the one we now face.

During the long winters and many losses between the first shot at Lexington and the final victory six years later at Yorktown, even Washington and those most loyal to the revolutionary cause considered giving up their fight. Other good people quit the cause altogether.

Those who fought for union and equality in the Civil War had many dark days after bloody battles like Gettysburg where – as hard as it is for us to imagine now – they doubted the worthiness of their cause.

And there were those during World War II who said that the costs and dangers associated with liberating Europe from the Nazis was too much for this country to bear when it could remain safely ensconced an ocean away from the bloodshed.

Now it is our generation's turn to write history. We must reaffirm and rededicate ourselves to protecting this country for our children and grandchildren.

If we are to prevail in this struggle, we must show the same resolve and determination our forefathers did in the midst of the most trying conflicts of their day – from Valley Forge to Gettysburg to the Battle of the Bulge. At the same time, we must wage this war in ways that are true to our principles and values. We cannot allow ourselves to fall prey to the same sort of vicious cultural biases that our enemies display.

In November 1942, after a series of Allied victories, Winston Churchill gave an impassioned plea for the British people to be as "equally resolute and active in the face of victory" as they had been in weathering defeat after defeat through the dark days of 1939 and 1940. Churchill knew that the future of the war effort, even in late 1942, remained gravely uncertain, telling his audience: "I promise nothing. I predict nothing."

Yet Churchill concluded with words asking for endurance and resolve that are critically appropriate for our time. Churchill said, "Do not let us be led away by any fair-seeming appearances of fortune; let us rather put our trust in those deep, slow-moving tides that have borne us thus far already, and will surely bear us forward, if we know how to use them, until we reach the harbour where we would be."

We have not yet reached that harbour. So I would ask that each of you assume the mantle of Churchill's firm resolve and stout-heartedness. The terrorists killed nearly 3,000 Americans in our homeland on a single day, and we cannot doubt that they would gladly do so again tomorrow – and again every day thereafter.

To succeed, we must continue to pressure the terrorists on each and every front in this unconventional war and do so with all the tools at our disposal – from the weapons of war to those of the criminal justice system and of the war of ideas and values. It is only by these slow-moving but effective means that we will continue to ensure the safety of our Nation and preserve America as a symbol of political and personal freedom for our children, as our forefathers did for us.

Thank you. May God bless each of you and may He continue to bless America.

I look forward to your questions.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Says NSA Surveillance Program "Remains A Valuable Tool." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/23) about the NSA's domestic surveillance program. Gonzales said, "We believe this program has been effective, has been valuable, and these are the words from General Mike Hayden, the deputy director of national intelligence, from Bob Mueller, the director of the FBI. But we have to be careful about talking too much about the successes of this program and operational capabilities relating to this program. Much of the program has not been discussed publicly. It remains an effective program. We believe it has been compromised to some extent by the disclosures and by our discussions about the program, but it remains a valuable tool, and therefore, for that reason, I'm limited about what I can say about it."

Gonzales Calls Talk Of Bush Impeachment "Ridiculous." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/23) about calls from some lawmakers for President Bush's impeachment because of the NSA program. Gonzales said that "talk about impeachment, in this particular case, is ridiculous. This is about a commander-in-chief using authorities that have long been used by other commanders-in-chief in a time of war to engage in electronic surveillance of the enemy."

FBI Memos Show Agents Objected To Guantanamo Interrogation Techniques. According to FBI memos released yesterday by the ACLU, agents repeatedly warned Pentagon interrogators at Guantanamo – including then-commander Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller – of legal concerns over aggressive interrogation techniques and expressed doubt about the efficacy of the actions. ACLU had obtained the FBI emails and records under a FOIA request and released highly-redacted versions a year ago. The news coverage of the ACLU press conference generally was more critical of the Pentagon than the FBI, with most stories noting ACLU lawyer Jameel Jaffer said yesterday, "Now we can say that the documents show conclusively that abuse and torture at Guantanamo was not the result of rogue elements but was the consequence of policies deliberately adopted by senior military and Pentagon officials.".

In a very widely distributed story headlined "FBI to Gitmo: Hostile Interrogations Risky," the AP (2/24, Sherman) reports, "FBI officials, whose names were blacked out, indicated that senior military officials, including former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, were aware of and in some cases had approved of putting hoods on prisoners, threatening them with violence and subjecting them to humiliating treatment." Both Wolfowitz – through a World Bank spokesman – and Pentagon spokesman Larry Di Rita dismissed the memos as old news. The AP adds that FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko "said FBI agents properly reported abuse allegations through the bureau's chain of command, but noted, 'It is not within the scope of the FBI's jurisdiction overseas to investigate reports of alleged abuse of military detainees.'"

Under the headline "FBI Memos Reveal Allegations Of Abusive Interrogation Techniques," Knight Ridder (2/24, Brown) reports, "The agents tried to get the military interrogators to follow a less coercive approach," but Miller "overrode the FBI agents' protests, according to the documents. The memos offer some of the clearest proof yet that the abuses and torture of prisoners in U.S. military custody weren't the isolated actions of low-ranking soldiers but a result of policies approved by senior officials, the ACLU said."

Under the headline "E-Mails Show FBI Agents Fretted About Prisoner Abuse," The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Miller, 958K) reports, "Although prior documents have revealed tension between the FBI and military interrogators over the methods used at Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad," the Lueckenhoff email shows "that senior FBI officials in Iraq were reluctant to be drawn into any investigation of prisoner abuses." Yesterday, Kolko "said it was not within the FBI's jurisdiction overseas to investigate allegations of detainee abuse, but that agents had reported their findings through their chain of command and cooperated in Pentagon investigations and reviews."

Bloomberg (2/24, Rowley) notes, "FBI agents assigned to interrogate prisoners at Guantanamo objected to the techniques at meetings and two videoconferences with Pentagon officials in Washington, the 2003 memo said. During one of those meetings, a military commander

'blatantly misled the Pentagon into believing' that the FBI had endorsed the 'aggressive and controversial' techniques he proposed to use on the detainee, the memo said."

The Washington Post (2/24, A16, White, 744K) reports under the headline "FBI Interrogators In Cuba Opposed Aggressive Tactics" that Air Force Lt. Col. John Skinner "said a series of investigations and reviews have shown that Defense Department officials never encouraged or condoned abuse. 'No matter how hard some may try to manipulate documents and information to support their myth, the facts tell a different story,' Skinner said."

The Financial Times (2/24, Sevastopulo) notes "a Pentagon spokesman" said that "the FBI memos were 'another example of recycling old information'."

The New York Times (2/24, 1.19M) runs a truncated version of the AP story with the headline "Prison Interrogators Got F.B.I. Warnings," and Reuters (2/24, Dunham) reports the story under the headline "Files Show Military Rebuffs FBI Guantanamo Worries."

DOJ Seeks More Time To Comply With Lackawanna Wiretap Request. The AP (2/24) reports, "The Justice Department has asked for more time to answer an indicted Lackawanna (NY) businessman's questions about whether agents used secret wiretaps while investigating him." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge William Skretny had given the government until Feb. 27 to respond to the request by Mohamed Albanna, who is charged with two relatives of running an illegal money transmitting business that sent more than $3.5 million from western New York to Yemen. … On Thursday, prosecutors filed for a two-week extension, citing numerous such inquiries from defendants across the country following revelations that President Bush approved warrantless eavesdropping in some cases." The AP notes, "An affidavit by a Justice Department attorney in Washington said the department had contacted the National Security Agency about Albanna's case. The response must be carefully drafted, the affidavit said, to ensure consistency with other cases and will contain highly classified information."

FBI Informant Testifies Hayat Praised Terror Groups, Jihad. Under the headline "FBI Informant Says Terror Suspect Took Interest In Violent Groups," the AP (2/24, Barbassa) reports in a widely-distributed story FBI informant Naseem Khan testified Thursday that Hamid Hayat "took an interest in terrorist groups and spoke admiringly about jihad. … 'He never, ever considered himself American,' said Khan." Khan added that at one point "during long conversations at Hayat's home" Hayat "praised al-Qaida as 'a tough group,' adding, 'They're even smarter than the FBI, friend.'" The AP notes, "Even as he showed off his knowledge of militant groups and said he knew the location of training camps, Hayat struggled to provide details when Khan pressed him, the transcripts show." KXTV-TV Sacramento (2/23, Johnson) adds, "Hayat also related when a friend was cursing America and asked if Hamid was offended. Hamid told Khan, 'I said, "Man, this country is mine in name only, understand? My heart is in Pakistan," I told him.' When Hayat's father, Umer Hayat came on the line and heard the cursing, the younger Hayat said his father encouraged it," saying, "Well done. Curse some more."

Moussaoui Defense Objects To Number Of Potential Jurors With 9/11 Link. The AP (2/24, Sniffen) reports, "Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense complained Thursday that too many people connected to Sept. 11 victims were being approved as potential jurors for his sentencing. Three would-be jurors were subsequently rejected despite government protests." The AP notes, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema qualified 18 more potential jurors Thursday, but two approved earlier dropped out because of personal hardships, bringing the total to 83."

FBI Adds Yemeni Escapees To Most-Wanted Terrorists List. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/24) reports Yemeni prison escapees Jamal al-Badawi and Jaber Elbaneh "were added on Thursday to the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists." The AP notes that al-Badawi has been charged in the US in the USS Cole bombing and Elbaneh was indicted for his alleged role in the Lackawanna Six al Qaeda cell.

Toledo Terror Suspect Had Served As Prison Imam. The Toledo Blade (2/23, Boak) reports, "A year before he is accused of plotting to attack American soldiers in Iraq, Marwan Othman El-Hindi offered spiritual nourishment to Muslim prisoners" as an imam at the Toledo Correctional Institution," and . "Khelleh Konteh, the warden, said he walked Mr. El-Hindi out of the…prison for good on Dec. 30, 2003, after seeing the native of Jordan give an inmate contraband bread and oranges instead of lessons from the Qur'an." The Blade notes, "Proselytizing at a prison would have fit within the indictment's pattern of terrorist preparations, according to Senate committee testimony by FBI Director Robert Mueller last year. 'Prisons continue to be fertile ground for extremists who exploit both a prisoner's conversion to Islam while still in prison, as well as their socioeconomic status and placement in the community upon their release,' he said."

Terrorism Arrests Followed Raids On Islamic Charity. The Washington Times (2/24, Seper, 90K) reports, "The arrests this week of three men in Ohio on terrorism-related charges involving troops in Iraq followed raids by federal agents on a Toledo-based Islamic charity accused of providing funds to Hamas. … Treasury since has frozen the assets of KindHearts, pending an investigation for terrorism funding." However, "Jihad Smaili, a KindHearts board member, told reporters in Toledo he did not know any of the three men named in the indictment and denied they had anything to do with the charity."

Al Arian Confident Of Acquittal At Retrial. The Orlando Sentinel (2/23, Gutierrez, 265K) reports that in an interview with the paper on Wednesday, Sami al Arian, "who faces a possible retrial on terrorism-related charges, is confident he will be found innocent and says he is open to a plea deal if it affords him 'victory.' … Even if he wins his second round, as he likes to refer to it," al Arian "is likely to be deported to the Middle East." Al Arian said of jurors at his trial, "They were smart enough to see through the smoke and mirrors. The government will not give up on this case, which shows this has been a political case since the beginning."

Florida Man Charged With Illegal Money Transfers Released On Bail. The Tampa Tribune (2/24, Silvestrini) reports Tampa convenience store owner Hasan Qasem, "accused of illegally sending tens of thousands of dollars to Yemen, the occupied West Bank and Luxembourg was released from jail Thursday after a federal judge set bail." Qasem appeared "before U.S. Magistrate Elizabeth Jenkins, who followed the recommendation of Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Hoffer that she allow Qasem to be released on $20,000 bail."

FBI Says Chicago Crash Victim Had No Terror Ties. The Chicago Tribune (2/24, Heinzmann, Bowean, 643K) reports Lafi Hussein Nofal, who reportedly was carrying a large amount of cash and checks when he was killed in a crash on Chicago's Stevenson Expressway, causing the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force to launch an investigation, "was a physician from Puerto Rico who had real estate and business investments in the Chicago area but no known ties to terrorism." The Tribune notes that "the FBI released a statement early Thursday saying there was no known terrorism link, and referred further questions to the Illinois State Police." However, The Chicago Sun-Times (2/24, Sweeney) notes that the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force is continuing its investigation, although "there was no immediate belief that terrorism was involved, a spokesman said. The duties of the task force are expansive and will include determining whether the cache of documents and money is legitimate."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Signals Willingness To Delay Port Deal. The Senate Armed Services Committee yesterday held a hearing on the Dubai Ports World deal to manage six US ports. A troupe of Administration officials were grilled by a panel of mostly Democratic senators on the deal. Meanwhile, the Administration indicated it was willing to delay the deal's closing in order to address congressional security concerns. Media reports continue to depict the White House handling of the issue in a negative light, and see President Bush facing tough political challenges as a result of the controversy. Reuters (2/24, Cornwell, Drees), for example, reports Bush remains "under fire," while the Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Feldmann, 61K) says Bush "faces a serious test of his political skill after blundering in dealings with members of his own party, analysts say. The man who once campaigned as a uniter appears to have done just that -- uniting both parties against him."

Yesterday, CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer) reported Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove had said in a radio interview that Bush "might accept a delay in the deal." CNN (Bash) added that Rove said it is important "to get members of Congress to a place where they have a good comfort level with letting this deal go through." The Financial Times (2/24, Kirchgaessner, Yeager) quotes Rove saying, "There are some regulatory hurdles that still needs to go through on the British side as well that are going to be concluded next week. There's no requirement that it close...immediately after that." Rove's comments "represent a departure from Mr Bush's staunch defence of the deal early this week."

On ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 4), George Stephanopoulos said the White House is "feeling snake-bit. I think the President is a little bit irritated that this port issue wasn't flagged for him earlier." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, 0:35, Axelrod) also reported, "What the White House has said is that they are open to a delay in the closing date. That would allow time for some of the issues raised by Congress to be addressed. The White House says they are fine with that. One thing, however, that the President says he will not back off on: that's the threat of a veto if there is legislation passed to kill the deal."

In a potentially significant development, USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) reports the United Arab Emirates company "offered Thursday to delay part of its $6.8 billion takeover" of some port operations. The announcement "relieves some pressure from a standoff between…Bush and Congress, which has threatened to block the deal because of the UAE's purported ties to terrorism." The delay "did not appease some of the deal's harshest critics," such as Sen. Chuck Schumer, but "one prominent Republican who had raised concerns about the deal appeared optimistic. 'This is definitely a positive step,' said Rep. Peter King of New York." Knight Ridder (2/24, Douglas) says the firm is "yielding to intense political pressure." The New York Times (2/24, Cloud, Sanger, 1.19M) reports the action "came after the Bush administration and leading members of Congress," including Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner, "quietly told the company that more time was needed to derail Congressional action to block the deal." The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Ben White, 744K) runs a similar piece titled "Uproar Surprised Dubai Firm." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Hitt, 2.11M) and Baltimore Sun (2/24, Shaw, 296K) run pieces on the company's move, which is also mentioned in many of the stories covering other aspects of the controversy.

Meanwhile, reporting on yesterday's Senate hearing, the CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:20, Schieffer) reported, "A squadron of Administration officials trooped up to Capitol Hill today to explain the arrangement. … They did not make much headway to say the least. Congressional outrage is still at a boil." CBS (Attkisson) added, "In a rare freewheeling session, officials from Treasury, Homeland Security, Defense and State, all responsible for approving the ports deal, agreed Congress should have been brought in sooner but insisted the national security impact was thoroughly researched." Democrats "accused the Bush Administration of thumbing its nose at a law that mandates a deeper investigation when a business deal could affect national security." Likewise, CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Koppel) reported that "after two and a half hours of back and forth and a steady stream of questions and answers, it didn't appear that the Administration was able to change many minds, or to head off legislation to block the deal as early as next week."

The Washington Times (2/24, Hurt, 90K) reports the Bush Administration's "assurances were met with disdain by Democrats," while the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Weisman, 744K) reports, "Despite the entreaties of the administration, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) said bipartisan legislation will be introduced next week to scuttle the deal, or at least to force a 45-day investigation into the deal's national security implications." The hearing "presented two very different views of the United Arab Emirates." The country "is seen by the administration as a stalwart and indispensable ally in the terrorism fight and by Senate Democrats as a base for terrorism and nuclear proliferation."

The Washington Post (2/24, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column, "Yesterday's meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee felt like some weird role-reversal dream. There was Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), attacking Bush administration officials for being soft on terrorism and 'outsourcing our national security.' There was Gordon England, President Bush's deputy defense secretary, pleading with Democrats that 'it is very important that we strengthen the bonds of friendship and security with our friends and allies around the world.'"

The Washington Post (2/24, A6, Blustein, Pincus, 744K) reports on "a point emphasized by many people familiar with security operations at US ports: Among all the reasons to fret about vulnerabilities to terrorist attacks, the nationality of the companies managing the terminals is one of the least worrisome. … Nonetheless, politicians from both parties continue to pelt the Bush administration with criticism for its decision to allow Dubai Ports World… to buy Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co." Similarly, the New York Times (2/24, Romero, Timmons, 1.19M) says that "in the outcry over who should run America's seaport terminals, one clear trend appears to have been overlooked: American companies began withdrawing decades ago from the unglamorous business of stevedoring, ceding the now-booming industry to enterprises in Asia and the Middle East."

So "it is no accident that American companies are not in the top ranks of global terminal operators, who have ridden the coattails of the explosion in world trade."

The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Blustein, 744K) reports this controversy "follows the flap last summer over the proposed purchase by Cnooc Ltd., a Chinese state-owned firm, of Unocal Corp., the California-based oil giant. … The twin episodes are reminiscent of the late 1980s and early 1990s, when takeovers by Japanese companies of US businesses such as movie studios inflamed American anxieties."

The AP (2/23, Bridis) reports, "The senior Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee angrily accused the Bush administration Thursday of ignoring the law by refusing to extend an investigation of a United Arab Emirates company's takeover of significant U.S. port operations. … Clashing with a Treasury Department official on a mission to calm a political uproar, Sen. Carl Levin said the law has language specifically requiring a longer review than the one that an interagency committee conducted, if a business deal could affect national security. … 'Is there not one agency in this government that believes this takeover could affect the national security of the United States?' the Michigan Democrat asked at a committee briefing. Chairman John Warner, R-Va., in a very unusual procedure on Capitol Hill, allowed reporters to question the administration witnesses." The AP adds, "The Treasury official, Deputy Secretary Robert Kimmitt, and officials from other agencies said a multiagency group spent three months reviewing the port deal and said that all concerns about security were satisfied. … Levin insisted that the law that established the multiagency panel specifically said that any such review should be lengthened by 45 days if it could have an impact on national security."

MarketWatch (2/24, Watts) reports, "Warner also expressed concern about the administration's interpretation of the law, and said he would ask Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to provide a written explanation."

Bloomberg (2/24, Bliss) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the agreement includes provisions intended to enhance port security. … 'The United States government did request specific assurances from the parties involved in this transaction,' Gonzales said on CNBC. 'Those assurances have been given.' … He didn't give specifics. The Associated Press, citing documents obtained by the wire service, reported that DP World agreed to cooperate with U.S. investigations and reveal records on demand about 'foreign operational direction' of its business. The agreement doesn't force the company to keep copies of business records on U.S. soil, where they would be subject to court orders, the AP reported."

Gonzales Defends CFIUS Vetting Process. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/23) to describe the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States' vetting process. Gonzales said, "It's a very thorough vetting process that we're required to go through, in connection with acquisition of a US company by a foreign company or by a foreign country that may impact in an adverse way the national security of our country." The Department of Justice which is a member of the Committee on Foreign Investment "did our own independent assessment and made the determination that we had no reasons to raise an objection to this transaction going forward. We, all of us, have as our objective to ensure that our national security is not impaired in any way by this transaction."

New Jersey Sues To Block Port Deal. Reuters (2/23, Hurdle) reports, "New Jersey sued the U.S. federal government on Thursday to prevent a United Arab Emirates company from managing a terminal at the Port of Newark until security risks there have been fully assessed." Reuters continues, "The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Trenton seeks to bar state-owned Dubai Ports World from taking over the Newark facility as part of a deal under which it also would manage terminals at five other major U.S. ports following its takeover of P&O., a British company that had been operating the ports. … It claims the federal panel that approved the port-management takeover -- the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States -- failed to conduct a full investigation of the sale as required by law and it asks the court to order an investigation." Reuters adds, "New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine said the presence of the UAE company may threaten the security of an area that the FBI has called the most dangerous two miles in America because it also contains chemical plants, oil storage facilities, rail lines, and Newark Liberty International Airport. … The suit also claims the deal harms New Jersey's duty to ensure security at the port because it did not know what information was submitted by the UAE company or what assurances were offered on security. Failure to provide that information interferes with the state's sovereign rights under the 10th amendment of the U.S. Constitution, the suit says. … It names the Committee on Foreign Investments as well as Treasury Secretary John Snow, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff."

Chertoff Was Unaware Of Deal. The Washington Times (2/24, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was not aware a Dubai-owned company was seeking to operate terminals in six U.S. ports and that his agency was leading the review until after the deal's approval, an administration official said yesterday." Chertoff's spokesman, Russ Knocke, "told The Washington Times the issue rose no higher than the department's assistant secretary for policy, Stewart Baker." Chertoff "is the third Cabinet official to acknowledge he did not know his agency had signed off on the plan."

Ehrlich Leaning Toward Accepting Deal. The Washington Post (2/24, B5, Mosk, 744K) reports Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich said it is "looking increasingly unlikely that he will try to block a United Arab Emirates company from taking over port operations in Baltimore." Ehrlich "said he is continuing to review the security concerns raised by the proposed purchase by Dubai Ports World of the British company that oversees the movement of cargo containers at the Baltimore port." But "when asked yesterday if he now agrees with President Bush and supports the sale, Ehrlich said, 'Clearly, the facts are moving in that direction.'"

Governors May Raise Port Issue With Bush On Monday. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Bush faces more port-security heat from governors. Some gathering for winter governors' meeting plan to raise the Dubai-ownership issue at White House on Monday, but New York's Pataki, a deal foe, won't attend following recent surgery."

Port Authority Would Break Lease To Block Deal. The New York Times (2/24, McGeehan, 1.19M) reports, "The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey will break the lease of a big container terminal at Port Newark to stop a company based in Dubai from taking over part of the operation there, the agency's chairman said yesterday." Anthony R. Coscia, the chairman, "said the company that holds a lease on the terminal through 2030 violated the contract by selling a half-interest in it to Dubai Ports World without seeking the landlord's approval. He said the Port Authority would ask a judge in New Jersey Superior Court in Newark today to affirm its right to end the lease."

Bob Dole's Lobbying Role In Deal Seen As Creating Political Problem For Elizabeth Dole. The Washington Post (2/24, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "The lobbying of former Senate majority leader Robert J. Dole on behalf of the Dubai-owned company set to take over management of terminals at six major U.S. seaports is creating a political problem for his wife, Sen. Elizabeth Dole." The chairman of the North Carolina Democratic Party, Jerry Meek, yesterday "called on Sen. Dole to remove herself from 'any congressional oversight' of the Dubai port deal." A spokeswoman for Sen. Dole "rejected the criticism as 'a partisan attack' and defended the senator's role as a lawmaker and her husband's as a lobbyist." Former Sen. Dole "said in a written statement yesterday that he is not going to lobby his wife or members of Congress."

Rice Seeks To Calm Relations With UAE. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 5, 2:15, Schieffer) reported Rice "also tried to play a part in calming the bitter feelings in the United Arab Emirates." CBS (Hawkins) added Rice "flew into the heart of the storm over the management of American seaports today. She said the United Arab Emirates is a good friend and a strong ally in the war on terrorism. Rice said there are no national security reasons to stop an Emirates-owned company, Dubai Ports World, from purchasing a British firm that manages six major commercial ports in the United States. After meeting with Secretary Rice, today the UAE's economy minister told me she thinks the political controversy in Washington is the result of an unfortunate misunderstanding." Lubna Bint Khalid Al Qasimi, UAE Minister of Economy: "This case actually got stopped politically rather than pure trade business. It may just raise concerns for a lot of people about thinking twice about investing in the US."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 5, 2:20, Gregory) also reported Rice "arrived in Dubai for meetings tonight, and the President's homeland security advisor argued the UAE turned over a new leaf after 9/11." Still, the Administration "extracted extra security concessions from Dubai Ports World as a condition" for the contract.

More Commentary. In an editorial titled "Reaping What You Sow," the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M) says, "If the administration is in trouble with Congress, it's long overdue. For years now, the White House has stonewalled Congressional committees attempting to carry out their oversight duties. Administration officials appearing before Senate and House committees have given testimony that was, to put it generously, knowingly misleading. … The chickens are coming home to roost. A White House that routinely brands anyone who disagrees with its positions as soft on terrorism is now complaining that election-bound lawmakers are callously using the ports deal to frighten voters."

The Washington Post (2/24, A14, 744K) editorializes that "the White House's 'admission' that President Bush was unaware" of the deal "strikes us as completely unnecessary. Why should the president know? Twelve government departments and agencies, including the departments of Treasury, State, Defense and Homeland Security, had examined the deal over a three-month period and found it acceptable. Perhaps the White House should have anticipated this week's political storm and prepared for it. But because the objections are irrational, even that complaint is questionable. … If members of Congress really want to burnish their 'tough on terrorism' credentials, they should start by focusing on real presidential lapses, which are sufficient, and forget about the phony ones."

Paul Krugman, writing in the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M), makes a similar point, and adds that "there is, nonetheless, a kind of rough justice in Mr. Bush's current predicament. After 9/11, the American people granted him a degree of trust rarely, if ever, bestowed on our leaders." He "abused that trust, and now he is facing a storm of skepticism about his actions -- a storm that sweeps up everything, things related and not."

Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M), "As a country, we must not go down this road of global ethnic profiling -- looking for Arabs under our beds the way we once looked for commies. If we do -- if America, the world's beacon of pluralism and tolerance, goes down that road -- we will take the rest of the world with us. We will sow the wind and we will reap the whirlwind." He adds, "If there were a real security issue here, I'd join the critics. But the security argument is bogus and, I would add, borderline racist."

In the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Democrats loudly denounce any thought of racial profiling. But when that same Arab, attired in business suit and MBA, and with a good record of running ports in 15 countries, buys P&O, Democrats howl at the very idea of allowing Arabs to run our ports. … On this, the Democrats are rank hypocrites. But even hypocrites can be right." Krauthammer adds, "The greater and more immediate danger is that as soon as the Dubai company takes over operations, it will necessarily become privy to information about security provisions at crucial US ports. That would mean a transfer of information about our security operations -- and perhaps even worse, about the holes in our security operations -- to a company in an Arab state in which there might be employees who, for reasons of corruption or ideology, would pass this invaluable knowledge on to al-Qaeda types."

E.J. Dionne, in the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K), urges "a full-scale debate not only about this deal but about the larger flaws in our system of port security. That's the way to show the world that Americans take this issue seriously and are not engaged in an episode of Arab-bashing." Yesterday, Bush "insisted that the deal would leave our ports safe. … But many people in both parties are worried because they no longer take the administration's claims at face value. That, too, is progress."

In his Wall Street Journal column (2/24), Daniel Henninger writes, "One would not have thought it possible, but Washington's political class is defining our politics down. After nearly seven days of elevating the Cheney bird-hunting accident to the level of a national crisis, now comes this week's flap over managing the ports. To be sure, the matter of secure US ports trumps the hunting of quail as an affaire d'état. But it was the strikingly low quality of the politicians' commentary and behavior that attracted notice."

Chicago-Midway Temporarily Closed After Bomb Threat Found On Flight. The AP (2/24) reports, "A written bomb threat was discovered on a flight from Seattle to Chicago Thursday, prompting aviation officials to temporarily close air traffic at Midway Airport. … The Chicago Police Department and the FBI's terrorism task force searched the plane and its luggage but no bomb had been found as of 5 p.m., said FBI spokesman Frank Bochte. Investigators were trying to determine where the note came from, including whether it was left on the plane by a passenger on a previous flight, he added."

Investigators Widen Search For New York Anthrax. The New York Times (2/24, Chan, 1.19M) reports, "The authorities widened their investigation into possible anthrax contamination yesterday to include an apartment in Crown Heights, Brooklyn, and medical officials were giving antibiotics to seven people who could have been exposed to the spores. An eight-member team from the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, including two epidemiologists, along with F.B.I. agents, took samples yesterday from the Manhattan apartment" of Vido Diomande, "the Brooklyn warehouse where he used animal skins to make drums for his African dance troupe and a Dodge van that he is believed to have used to transport the skins, which are a suspected source of the bacteria." WABC-TV New York (2/23) notes, "Federal agents are still investigating but there is nothing suspicious, they say, about Diomande's motives. Mark Mershon, Dir. NY F.B.I.: 'I will tell you that we have essentially ruled out any criminal intent here. We believe this largely to be simply an accidental infection.'"

Standards Issued For Government PIV Cards. The Washington Times (2/24, Harper, 90K) reports, "The National Institutes of Standards and Technology has issued the final specifications for standardized Personal Identity Verification cards required for all federal employees and civilian contractors by Oct. 27." The cards are being developed "in response to Homeland Security Presidential Directive 12, an order issued in 2004 by President Bush for mandatory, standard governmentwide IDs." They incorporate "holograms, bar codes, microprinting and encrypted computer chips, which include signatures and personal demographic information, according to Identity Alliance, a private Indiana-based security firm."

White House Report Takes Responsibility For Katrina Response, Calls For Reforms. Days after a special House committee released a damning report on the response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House released its own 228-page report that acknowledged its own role in the flawed response. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 3, 2:30, Sawyer) said the report "has a full-on mea culpa, the government taking the blame, and issuing 125 recommendations to improve the response to the next catastrophe." ABC (L. Stark) added that the admission of failures is "something this Administration is not used to doing." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 6, 0:35, Schieffer) says the report "urges quick action in 11 key areas before hurricane season begins in June." CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer) called the report "packed with recommendations." But NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 4, 2:05, O'Donnell) reported senior officials "were notably careful to avoid finger pointing, except for a direct jab at former FEMA Director Michael Brown." Indeed, Reuters (2/23, Zakaria) reports that the document "did not single out anyone for blame."

USA Today (2/24, 5A, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports that the "Lessons Learned" study "called for 125 fixes, including better communications, better evacuation plans and first aid training for students." President Bush's homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend, who prepared the report, said, "FedEx can track a package anywhere in the world, real-time. FEMA should be able to do the same thing for ice, water and food." In its front-page story, the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Lee, Fletcher, 744K) says the White House report was "softer in tone" than the House study, but "echoed" many of its findings.

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Chen, 958K) writes that the study "essentially confirmed what has become conventional public wisdom: that there were systemic failures across the federal bureaucracy." Townsend said "a new 'culture of preparedness'" is needed. The New York Times (2/24, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that the recommendations "would reverse some of the steps" taken after September 11, 2001 to centralize responsibility, but some critics "worry that diffusing responsibilities among agencies could leave no one clearly in charge and not produce results." University of Maryland domestic security expert Michael Greenberger said, "This may simply be rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic." The Washington Times (2/24, Curl, 90K) and Knight Ridder (2/24, Borenstein) run similar stories on the release of the report.

President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff also commented on the report yesterday. The AP (2/23, Jordan) quotes Bush saying, "We will learn from the lessons of the past to better protect the American people. … I wasn't satisfied with the federal response." Chertoff "commended" the White House recommendations, saying, "We have already begun to take action to address many of the issues raised in the report, particularly those areas we need to improve before the start of the 2006 hurricane season." However, Fox News' Special Report (2/23, Cameron) pointed out that the report "chastises the Department of Homeland Security for poor planning and communication."

Report's Appendix Highlights "What Went Right." In his Washington Post (2/24, B2, 744K) "Federal Diary" column, under the headline "Acts Of Heroism Shine Through Homeland Security's Humiliation," Stephen Barr writes that while DHS "wiseguys" say "the brass has decided to rate the performance of employees on a five-level system," from "role model" at the top to "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" at the bottom, many people at Homeland Security performed bravely and exceptionally during Katrina. Barr writes that "some of the most interesting findings" in the White House report "are in Appendix B -- 'What Went Right,'" which highlights some of the individuals who made a positive difference.

Chertoff-Brown Relationship Seen As Crux Of Communications Failures. The Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Grier, 61K) writes that five months after Katrina, "one cause of the stumbling response…is becoming increasingly apparent: Two of the most important officials involved, Chertoff and Brown, did not get along." Chertoff "is by-the-book, a lean, terse manager. Brown is a talkative maverick who believes in leadership from the front lines. In Hollywood, that's a buddy movie; in real life, it was a recipe for delayed orders and crossed communications."

Residents Of Mississippi Town Feel Abandoned By Federal Government. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 7, 2:50, Pitts) reported on the recovery of Pearlington, Mississippi, "already one of the poorest towns in the nation's poorest state long before Hurricane Katrina. But look at it now. Nearly six months later, no running water, no schools, only occasional mail service. There is even a coffin still washed up in the street, refrigerators scattered in trees. Residents say Pearlington would have died if not for the store. And it's a store like no other in America, where everything's free." It's the "old grade school gymnasium turned clothing store, grocery store, all donations from across the country, a place where neighbors can wash clothes, take a shower and talk." Pearlington was "once home to nearly 2,000 people. There are now only about 600 left, mostly retirees. Some refuse to leave, some can't. And to a person nearly every one feel abandoned by the Federal Government, so they rely on each other and the kindness of strangers."

Hurricane Cleanup Process Said To Waste Money, Time. The New York Times (2/24, Eaton, 1.19M) reports on the "dozens of courthouse disputes and public controversies that have erupted over the still-gargantuan task of removing tons of debris in Louisiana and Mississippi, almost six months after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Government officials, contractors and workers all describe a complicated and bureaucratic process that wastes money, slows the cleanup and fails to ensure that the economic benefits of the work go to the people who need them most, the residents of the disaster areas." Approximately halfway through the article, the Times adds, "Officials of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Army Corps of Engineers, which handle much of the contracting for debris removal, say the agencies are satisfied with the cleanup's pace, given the magnitude of the task," noting "that Hurricane Katrina created twice as much debris as the four 2004 hurricanes in Florida combined."

Gulf Coast Houses Of Worship Struggle To Recover. USA Today (2/24, Konigsmark, Moore, 2.31M) reports that following Katrina's destruction, Gulf Coast "churches, temples and mosques have struggled not only to rebuild their homes but to re-gather their members. An estimated 900 houses of worship in the Gulf region were damaged, destroyed or unusable after the hurricanes, according to Religion News Service." USA Today notes that in December, the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund announced "that $20 million of the $90 million it will spend in the region will go to churches and other houses of worship, which are not eligible for public rebuilding funds."

Search Continues For Some Children Displaced By Katrina. USA Today (2/24, Koch, 2.31M) reports that though the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children says 97% of children displaced by Katrina are back with parents or other relatives, families "continue to search for at least 131 children whom they have not heard from since" the storm swept through the Gulf region. The center has heard from relatives who say they still don't know the whereabouts of 131 children — five in Mississippi and the rest in Louisiana, mostly New Orleans. The Find Family National Call Center in Baton Rouge, a joint federal and state effort, lists 1,960 people as missing, of whom 245 are age 20 or younger."

WAR NEWS:

Bombing Of Shiite Shrine Generates Wave Of Sectarian Violence In Iraq. A wave of Sunni-Shiite violence swept over Iraq in the wake of the bombing of the Askariya shrine in Samarra, even as US and Iraqi authorities appealed for calm. USA Today (2/24, Nichols, Komarow, 2.31M) reports "Iraq's government announced it would impose a daytime curfew today in hopes of quelling sectarian violence that exploded across the country this week, threatening to spark civil war and derail efforts to form a new government." The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Reid) says "such a sweeping daytime curfew indicated the depth of fear within the government that the crisis could touch off a Sunni-Shi'ite civil war."

In an article describing the political talks on the formation of a new government as "in ruins" the New York Times (2/24, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The threat of full-scale civil war loomed." The Times adds that the violence "provoked questions about the proper role of the American military, its ability to control powerful Shiite militias,…and the Bush administration's plans for drawing down troops." Another New York Times (2/24, Weisman, Worth, 1.19M) story says the violence "has abruptly thrown the Bush administration on the defensive," while "Iraqis and some American officials also said the Bush administration might have to rethink its political strategy in Baghdad." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Finer, Sebi, 744K) reports the "prospects for a political resolution suffered Thursday when Sunni Arab political leaders abruptly withdrew from talks with Iraq's Shiite ruling parties, blaming the police and army for failing to prevent retaliatory attacks -- and, in some cases, for participating in them."

The Financial Times (2/24, Negus, Dombey, Sevastopulo) reports "hopes that Iraq's rival factions would come together to build a government of national unity faded on Thursday," and the Los Angeles Times (2/24, Stack, Roug, 958K) says the "faltering political process seemed on the verge of collapse." The Washington Times (2/24, Behn, 90K) quotes US Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch telling reporters yesterday, "We're not seeing civil war igniting in Iraq." Reuters (2/24, Bohan) reports State Department Deputy Spokesman Adam Ereli also "disagreed that the political process was stalled and that there was chaos. 'Let's not blow this out of proportion. It's not a straight line with the same amount of movement every single day. I t is a path with twists and turns. We all know that, and that's always been the case,' Ereli told reporters." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Shishkin, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports that "from President Bush on down, US officials have warned repeatedly that there would be tough patches -- such as the current one -- on the road to a rebuilt Iraq." Still, "the split between Sunnis and Shiites is widening precisely at the time US strategists had hoped it would be starting to narrow."

The story was the lead on each of the networks, which also ran follow-up reports. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, lead story, 2:55, Vargas) "more than 130 Iraqis are dead. Seven US soldiers were killed. And more than 100 mosques, according to some reports, were attacked. Today, President Bush appealed for calm on all sides." President Bush: "The voices of reason, from all aspects of Iraqi life, understand that this bombing is intended to create civil strife. But the act was an evil act. Destruction of a holy site is a political act intending to create strife." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 1, 3:45, Dozier) said "it is the worst crisis this country has faced since Saddam fell," while NBC Nightly News (2/23, lead story, 2:45, Williams) reported "US military commanders in Iraq say they don't believe that nation will dissolve into civil war," but "tonight there are indications to the contrary." NBC (Boettcher) added, "Iraq was on full alert, but the death toll and tensions rose, and US hopes that Iraqis can form a national government of unity sunk." If al Qaeda "did this, its plan is working."

The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 2, 2:10, Axelrod) reported that "the President made sure to frame these pictures as the product of terrorists, not an internal Iraqi versus Iraqi Sunni-Shia meltdown." While Administration officials "say the violence appears to them to be dying down, Democratic Congressman John Murtha, a former Marine colonel whose among the most outspoken critics of the war, says the Administration is misjudging."

CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Starr) reported, "Sources tell CNN that at the highest levels of the US military the situation is being carefully watched to see if Iraqi security forces can take control across the country. US forces expect to remain in the background so their presence does not spark more violence. … The next 24 to 48 hours are considered critical by US commanders." CNN also reported, "Do not expect to see any more US troops being sent to Iraq to deal with the violence. It will be the major responsibility of Iraqi security forces." Similarly, ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 2, 2:25, Raddatz) reported "a senior military official tells ABC News that in the coming days, US forces will essentially sit back and watch Iraqi forces try to quell any violence, fearing that the US presence would inflame the situation." However, added ABC, "if a "prolonged civil war broke out, and the American military was unable to contain it, it could eventually hasten withdrawal." The Washington Post (2/24, A11, Graham, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "US Looks To Baghdad To Deal With Violence." The Knight Ridder (2/24, Landay) reports, "The situation 'calls into question a fundamental premise of our strategy in Iraq,' said a senior U.S. intelligence official, who…spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to discuss the crisis publicly."

USA Today (2/24, Nichols, Komarow, 2.31M) reports Sen. John Kerry "said the fresh violence underscores the Bush administration's failure to achieve a political solution -- a unity government -- in Iraq. 'It gets dicier as each day goes by,' he said. 'The clock is ticking.'"

The New York Times (2/24, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports "the violence on Wednesday was the closest Iraq had come to civil war, and Iraqis were stunned."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Daragahi, 958K) runs a story headlined "Clerics Take Lead After Iraq Bombing," in which it says "the religious leaders are notable for their lack of direct contact with American officials. Sistani, for example, has refused to meet with any since the US-led invasion of Iraq. Forces loyal to Sadr fought U.S. Marines in Najaf in the summer of 2004. And the vehemently anti-U.S. Muslim Scholars Assn. is believed to have close ties to the insurgency."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M) editorializes that Bush "should not underestimate his personal popularity among Shiites and the extent to which his words can have a calming effect. His statements condemning the mosque attack have been helpful but don't go far enough. A televised address to Iraqis would be in order -- or perhaps even a visit to convene a conference of national unity and seal an agreement on a new government. The most important thing now is that ordinary Shiites not feel abandoned."

The New York Times editorializes that the bombing "was a deliberate attempt to make it politically impossible to create a national unity government capable of leading Iraq to democratic stability. So far, the bombers have been successful," but "it shouldn't be this easy for a handful of mosque bombers to undo the modest but real" democratic progress.

Eliot A. Cohen, Professor of Strategic Studies at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M), "We may succeed in Iraq; we may also fail. Whether we do, however, depends partly on our skillful intervention, more on the attitudes and behavior of the Iraqis themselves, and even in the best case, on our willingness to persevere."

USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) editorializes, "Options are further limited because the United States has handed power to Iraqis -- and an Iraqi government can ask U.S. forces to leave. Even so, a reassessment is overdue of how Iraqi forces are manned and trained, perhaps with international help."

Rumsfeld To Discuss War On Terror At Truman Library. The Washington Post (2/24, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld plans to visit the Harry S. Truman library in Independence, Missouri next week "to talk about President Bush 's war on terrorism and Truman's launching the long struggle against international communism." The Post adds, "The speech is still being worked on, so Pentagon folks won't talk about it. And they caution that the event may yet be scrubbed. But spokeswoman Hollen Wheeler allowed that the library would be an 'appropriate venue for his message that day.'"

In 2000, Gore Affirmed Commitment To Ousting Saddam. In its "History Lessons" column the Washington Times (2/24, 90K) excerpts a June 26, 2000 joint statement by then-Vice President Al Gore and leaders of the Iraqi National Congress. The statement, released by Gore's office, said, "The Vice President reaffirmed the Administration's strong commitment to the objective of removing Saddam Hussein from power, and to bringing him and his inner circle to justice for their war crimes and crimes against humanity. Saddam's removal is the key to the positive transformation of Iraq's relationship with the international community and with the United States, in particular."

Ted Koppel Says US Interest In Iraq Is "About The Oil." Retired anchor and managing editor of the ABC program "Nightline" Ted Koppel writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M), "The Bush administration's touchiness about charges that we acted -- and are still acting -- in Iraq 'because of oil'" is "curious," as "keeping oil flowing out of the Persian Gulf and through the Strait of Hormuz has been bedrock American foreign policy for more than a half-century." He adds, "If those considerations did not enter into the Bush administration's calculations when the president ordered the invasion of Iraq in 2003, it would have been the first time in more than 50 years that the uninterrupted flow of Persian Gulf oil was not a central element of American foreign policy." In fact, "the reason for America's rapt attention to the security of the Persian Gulf is what it has always been. It's about the oil."

Gonzales Rings In Stock Exchange. KCBS-TV Los Angeles (2/23, 6:44 a.m.) showed "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales ringing the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange" on Thursday morning.

WPIX-TV San Francisco (2/23, 6:46 a.m.) added that Gonzales rang the bell "along with CEOs from several companies listed on the big board."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Timing Of Disclosure Is Focus Of Enron Testimony. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "Proceedings yesterday in the conspiracy and fraud trial of former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling touched on a question that could help determine whether the two men are convicted: Is an executive guilty of illegally hiding information if his company a short time later discloses it?" The Journal continues, "This issue came up during the third day of testimony by Paula Rieker, Enron's former corporate secretary and deputy investor-relations chief. Ms. Rieker, who took the stand as a government witness as part of an agreement in which she pleaded guilty to an Enron-related crime, previously testified that Messrs. Lay and Skilling had made misleading public statements about Enron's operations. … In at least one other controversial case, Enron disclosed more in its Securities and Exchange Commission filings than its executives did in public utterances. This involved outside partnerships run by Enron's then-chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, which did large amounts of business with the company." The Journal adds, "Purportedly hidden deals with these partnerships are a central part of the government's fraud allegations. Part of the defense in this case is that Enron did make disclosures -- albeit extremely dense and complex ones -- about the partnerships in SEC filings, even though Mr. Lay and other executives refused to answer questions about them in the weeks before the bankruptcy filing. … Yesterday's sparring between the defense attorneys and Ms. Rieker addressed this issue. In questioning, Bruce Collins, one of Mr. Lay's attorneys, focused on a claim by Ms. Rieker that the company had mischaracterized earnings from the company's high-profile retail-electricity unit, known as Enron Energy Services. Ms. Rieker said much of the unit's earnings in parts of 2000 and 2001 came from gains on stock sales and not from its "core" business of supplying energy and energy services to corporate and other customers. Enron officials didn't disclose those stock sales in various public statements, even after Ms. Rieker said she warned Mr. Lay, who was Enron's chairman, about the matter in 2000."

Lay Attorney Profiled. The Deal (2/24, Poole) profiles Ken Lay's attorney Mike Ramsey, who the Deal reports, "is now working on the biggest case in his life -- defending former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay, who faces seven criminal charges, including conspiracy and securities and wire fraud in advance of the company's collapse in late 2001. … In 1996, Ramsey successfully defended executives from Oxford Funding in a major bank fraud and conspiracy trial arguing prosecutorial misconduct. He secured an acquittal for cancer researcher Stanislaw Burzynski on fraud allegations in 1997. He won a case involving cross-dressing New York real estate heir Robert Durst, who was charged with killing an elderly neighbor, cutting his body into pieces and dumping them in Galveston Bay. … So it's not surprising that court watchers are thinking he'll get Ken Lay off, too." The Deal adds, "Ramsey is a man of simple tastes. He prefers black cowboy boots to lace-ups with his business suits. His office is in a residential neighborhood, not in a shiny office tower downtown. For lunch he often has peanut butter crackers and milk in the courthouse cafeteria. He works slowly and methodically, both in his physical movements and his questioning in court. Some casual observers would think maybe the 65-year-old is a little senile. … Far from it. Ramsey has a sharp mind, so sharp that he has to read a document only once to understand and remember it. … And Ramsey has a long memory, as everyone saw the first week of the Enron trial, when he remembered which articles had been read in their entirety and which ones had not when the judge handling the case, Simeon T. Lake III, could not."

Fannie Mae Report Faults Accounting, "Arrogance" In Fraud Case. Fannie Mae released a massive report Thursday that "found fault with the corporate culture of 'arrogance' under former CEO Franklin Raines but blamed the mortgage giant's accounting problems" on ex-CFO Timothy Howard and ex-Controller Leanne Spencer, USA Today (2/24, 1B, Farrell) reports. The report came after a 17-month investigation headed by ex-Sen. Warren Rudman into Fannie's $11 billion accounting fraud. The Washington Post (2/24, A1, Shin) reports that the study "found 'no indication' that Raines knew the degree to which accounting rules had been ignored under his leadership." However, his "imprint is palpable" throughout the tome, which says he "oversaw a 'culture of arrogance'" at Fannie Mae. The Financial Times (2/24, Hughes, Swann) says Treasury Undersecretary for Domestic Finance Randy Quarles, commenting on the report, said Fannie "still poses a systemic threat to financial markets." All three of these newspaper stories note that the report runs a whopping 2,652 pages. (A 34-page executive summary was also released.)

The New York Times (2/24, Labaton, Dash) says the report concluded that senior Fannie executives "manipulated" accounting so they themselves could receive "more than $27 million" in bonuses. The conclusions come as the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which oversees Fannie, considers whether to force some of them to return bonuses; the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department are also investigating. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A2, Hagerty) says the report "doesn't point to major new problems beyond those already identified by regulators and acknowledged by Fannie over the past two years."

The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Hilzenrath) writes that "in another time, or another company, success might have been riding on the basics," but "in the modern corporation, the core mission of delivering products or services can seem like a sideshow to the accounting machinations that ultimately determine the bottom line." In fact, even after a year and a half at work, "even the lawyers and accountants who labored to produce the report aren't entirely sure what happened."

The AP (2/23, Gordon) reports, "Fannie Mae's former finance chief and controller share primary responsibility for the accounting failures at the mortgage company struggling to emerge from an $11 billion scandal, a company-ordered report said Thursday." The AP continues, "It detailed a breakdown in financial controls and found an arrogant corporate culture at the government-sponsored company that is the biggest U.S. financer of home mortgage loans." The AP adds, "No major new accounting problems were cited in the report that followed an 17-month investigation by a team led by former Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H. … But there are many details. For example, Fannie Mae in 1998 was said to have improperly put off accounting for $200 million in expenses to future periods so executives could collect $27 million in bonuses. Rudman's inquiry affirmed this. … Documents cited in the report show that top-level management was focused on the $200 million deferral and meeting earnings targets that would trigger the payment of full bonuses." The AP notes, "Fannie Mae employees falsified signatures on accounting transactions that helped the company meet the 1998 earnings targets, according to the former director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. The agency first discovered the accounting-rule violations and earnings manipulation by Fannie Mae. … Rudman's report said Fannie Mae's former chairman and chief executive, Franklin Raines, contributed to a culture of arrogance at the Washington-based company."

Dow Jones (2/23, Burns) reports, "A new report on accounting problems at Fannie Mae may accelerate an ongoing Securities and Exchange Commission investigation, but lawyers say any charges or settlements may be more than a year away." The report's findings "won't come as a surprise to prosecutors or SEC lawyers who received weekly briefings on Rudman's investigation. Rudman said his team cooperated fully with the Justice Department, the SEC and other regulators during the 17-month investigation. … 'They know everything that's in this report already,' said one lawyer who declined to be identified by name. … SEC spokesman John Nester declined to comment, as did Justice Department spokesman Drew Wade."

Fannie Mae To Examine Pay Deal With Former CFO. Reuters (2/23) reports, "Fannie Mae will reexamine its former chief financial officer's post-employment compensation package, the company's chairman told Reuters on Thursday after an internal review blamed the old management team for a multibillion-dollar accounting scandal. … 'I would simply say that all options are on the table,' Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen Ashley said." Reuters adds, "The chairman said Fannie Mae's board would wait for results from other ongoing probes into the company's accounting problems. Investigations by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Securities & Exchange Commission and Justice Department remain open."

WSJournal Says Fannie "Routinely Flouted Both The Rules And Law." Under the headline "Fannie's Funny Business," the Wall Street Journal (2/24) editorializes, "The report's main findings paint the picture of a company that routinely flouted both the rules and law." It lets Raines "off lightly, blaming him mainly for a 'culture' that tolerated the accounting abuses. But the core of that culture was a belief that critics -- including us -- could be dismissed and assailed because the company knew it had Congress bought and paid for. And judging by the laughably weak reform that Financial Services Chairman Mike Oxley passed through the House, it still does. If Republicans on Capitol Hill want to know why voters think they've gone native, the failure to rein in Fannie even after a $10.8 billion accounting scandal is Exhibit A."

Judge Denies Request To Toss Adelphia Settlement. Reuters (2/24) reports, "A federal judge in Manhattan on Thursday rejected a bid by creditors of Adelphia Communications Corp. to throw out a $715 million settlement to compensate investors who lost money in the bankrupt cable company's collapse in 2002." Reuters continues, "Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber initially rejected the creditor's efforts to throw out the settlement. But the unsecured creditors, unhappy at the prospect of shareholders being paid ahead of them, appealed." Reuters adds, "In his ruling, U.S. District Court Judge Lewis Kaplan wrote that he agreed with the bankruptcy judge's decision and rejected the creditors' claims that the government had forced Adelphia into settling. … To avoid indictment, Adelphia reached the settlement with the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission in April 2005. Under its terms, the founding Rigas family agreed to forfeit more than 95 percent of its assets."

Dow Jones (2/24) reports, "In his order Thursday, Judge Kaplan found the company wasn't coerced and agreed with the bankruptcy judge that the assets being used in the restitution fund aren't part of the debtors' estate, but are part of a fund to be created and owned by the government. … 'Moreover, it is worth noting that if Adelphia had rejected the government's proposal and the government succeeded in forfeiting (Adelphia's) assets, the government's interest in the assets would have been superior to those of the creditors in any case,' Kaplan said in his order. … John Rigas and his son Timothy were convicted in 2004 of pocketing more than $ 2 billion from Adelphia (ADELQ) for their own personal use and misleading investors about the company's finances and performance. … Timothy Rigas, the company's one-time chief financial officer, was sentenced to 20 years in prison, while his father was sentenced to 15 years in prison. Both men remain free on bail pending appeal."

HealthSouth To Settle Class Action For $445 Million. The AP (2/24, Reeves) reports, "HealthSouth Corp. said Thursday it had reached a $445 million preliminary agreement to settle federal lawsuits resulting from a massive financial fraud that nearly drove the rehabilitation chain to ruin." The AP continues, "The Birmingham-based company will pay $215 million in common stock and warrants under the global settlement, and insurance companies will pay another $230 million in cash." The AP adds, "Investors involved in class action suits filed in federal court also will receive 25 percent of anything the company eventually gets in its lawsuit against fired chief executive Richard Scrushy, former auditor Ernst & Young and UBS, HealthSouth's former investment bank."

The New York Times (2/24, Whitmire) reports, "In March 2003, federal investigators raided HealthSouth's headquarters (in Birmingham, AL) and exposed what was then estimated to be a $2.7 billion accounting fraud. More recent restatements have estimated the fraud to be in excess of $4 billion. … After the fraud was exposed, 15 HealthSouth executives pleaded guilty to criminal charges, including all five of the company's chief financial officers. One former financial executive, Hannibal Crumpler, known as Sonny, was found guilty at trial. … In June 2005, a jury in Birmingham acquitted Mr. Scrushy of all criminal charges that he participated in the fraud. He still faces numerous civil suits in the case."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Leak Indictment. CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer) reported that Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, Lewis Libby has asked a federal judge to dismiss his indictment in the CIA leak case. Libby's lawyers say special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "lacks the authority to pursue the charges because he was not appointed by the President with consent of the US Senate." Fox News' Special Report (2/23, Hume) noted, "The motion was not unexpected, Libby's lawyers having said earlier that month they would file it. It's considered a longshot to win." The Washington Post (2/24, A5, Leonnig) reports that Libby's attorneys argued that "Fitzgerald was improperly appointed by the Justice Department instead of the president to investigate the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. That means his work and the charges of perjury, making false statements and obstructing justice brought against Libby in October are invalid, they said in court papers filed yesterday." The Post adds, "Other documents released with their filings show that by August 2004, eight months after beginning his investigation, Fitzgerald had amassed a large amount of evidence suggesting that Libby was lying to investigators. Libby's accounts of conversations with administration officials and reporters about Plame conflicted with others offered by virtually every administration official and reporter questioned by Fitzgerald's investigators." The Post notes, "Also yesterday, Fitzgerald asked U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton for permission to explain a 'factual matter' in a sealed filing that concerns his ongoing grand jury investigation and the reasons Fitzgerald believes he cannot release some of the documents Libby's defense lawyers are seeking."

Reuters (2/23) reports, "Since both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft removed themselves from the investigation because of their close ties to the White House … Fitzgerald reports to David Margolis, a career Justice Department lawyer." Libby's attorneys "argued that because Fitzgerald does not report to the attorney general, he should not have been appointed by a deputy at the Justice Department. … 'Because he was not appointed to that office by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate, he holds that authority improperly,' Libby's lawyers wrote." Reuters notes that Fitzgerald "was picked by then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey in December 2003 to investigate who leaked" Valerie Plame's identity.

The AP (2/23, Locy) reports, "The lawyers said illegal assignment of 'unsupervised and undirected power' to Fitzgerald requires that he be relieved of his duties in the investigation and that all actions he has taken be voided." The AP adds, "Unlike every other federal prosecutor, Fitzgerald did not have to seek approval from senior Justice Department officials to grant immunity or subpoena reporters and news organizations. Nor did he have to advise senior Justice officials before he sought Libby's indictment. … 'The attorney general may delegate powers but he may not abdicate responsibility,' Libby's lawyers wrote."

USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) also reports that Libby's lawyers said Fitzgerald "is operating outside the supervision of the attorney general, as required by federal law." The Washington Times (2/24, Seper, 90K) also reports on the defense motion.

Judge To Hear Arguments Today On Defense Request For Classified Documents. The AP (2/24) reports, "Defense lawyers and Mr. Fitzgerald are to appear in Federal District Court here on Friday to argue defense requests for classified records and evidence gathered by the prosecution about reporters who learned about" CIA operative Valerie Plame "from officials other than Libby."

Senators Call For Special Prosecutor To Probe Abramoff Ties To Pacific Territories. Democratic Sens. Jeff Bingaman and Ken Salazar are calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate lobbyist Jack Abramoff's activities in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Roche, 958K) reports that in a letter made public yesterday the Senators "asked Gonzales to provide the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee with a secret Justice Department report on security risks" in the two island territories. In their letter, the Senators "noted that the report was prompted by concerns that the islands might provide an entryway for terrorists in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks on the U.S. mainland. Also noted in the report were the substantial U.S. military assets in the Pacific islands that could be at risk."

Federal Grand Jury Indicts 32 Alleged Mobsters On Racketeering Charges. The New York Times (2/24, Preston) reports, "A Genovese crime family boss has been charged with capital murder, accused of ordering a mob killing — with help from his lawyer — while he was locked away in prison, federal and state authorities announced yesterday." The Times continues, "The mobster, Liborio S. Bellomo, 49, authorized the 1998 murder of Ralph Coppola, a member of the Genovese crew, according to a federal indictment unsealed yesterday in Manhattan. At the time of the killing, Mr. Bellomo was the acting Genovese boss although he was serving a 10-year sentence in federal prison for extortion, said Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York." The Times adds, "Mr. Garcia said Peter J. Peluso, a New York lawyer who frequently represented Genovese members, communicated Mr. Bellomo's order to execute Mr. Coppola from the prison to Genovese henchmen. Mr. Peluso pleaded guilty last July to serving as a messenger in the murder plot, Mr. Garcia said, and also admitted taking part in racketeering, extortion and obstruction of justice. … The indictment, which names 32 people as members of the Genovese family, including Mr. Bellomo, is a result of a three-year racketeering investigation of the family's operations in the Bronx and Westchester. Twenty-nine defendants were arrested yesterday, and the arrests of two others are pending. Mr. Bellomo is currently in federal prison in Coleman, Fla. Mr. Peluso has been cooperating with prosecutors, Mr. Garcia said. His information appears to have been crucial for the broad racketeering charges, and for yesterday's arrests."

Reuters (2/24, Kearney) reports, "The indictments cover charges spanning more than a decade and come after a 3 1/2-year investigation," Garcia said. "Several of the accused already were in jail and others were arrested on Thursday, when the indictments were unsealed. … 'Any time you take out top leader leadership of an organization charged with serious crimes ... you have to believe you are having an impact,' Garcia said at a news conference, declining to further assess the relative strength of the family." The AP also reports on the indictments.

Defense Rests At Ryan Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/24) reports, "Lawyers for former Illinois Gov. George Ryan rested their case Thursday at his public corruption trial. … Before sending jurors home for the weekend, the judge said there would be more rebuttal witnesses from prosecutors on Monday. She said closing arguments might get under way a week after that."

Judge Issues Limited Gag Order After Prosecutors Assail TV Comments By Ryan's Wife. The Chicago Tribune (O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "Federal prosecutors on Thursday blasted former Gov. George Ryan's lawyer, accusing him of orchestrating a bid to influence the jury in the trial's 11th hour after Ryan's wife," in Wednesday TV interviews, "contended that her husband was indicted because of his death-penalty stance and that he decided against testifying because witnesses can't tell their stories in the courtroom." US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer "issued a limited gag order barring comments about the integrity of the trial or the motivations of lawyers on either side of the case."

Close Campbell Friend Testifies About Delivering Bribes. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/24, Warren, Suggs, 430K) reports that at the corruption trial of former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell Thursday, businessman Dan DeBardelaben – Campbell's "longtime friend and golfing buddy" – "told jurors how, on three occasions in 1999, he delivered thousands of dollars in cash bribes from city contractor Samuel J. Barber Jr. directly to Campbell." DeBardelaben testified that "five days after the last payment to Campbell…the city approved an emergency authorization of $3 million to Barber's company…bypassing competitive bids" for the Y2K upgrade project. The Journal-Constitution notes, "Even lead defense attorney Billy Martin called DeBardelaben…a 'pivotal witness' for the government," and "Martin told the judge he may subpoena prosecutors and an FBI agent because he believes there should be more written documents showing DeBardelaben's statements about the case over the years that could be used to show inconsistencies." WSB-TV Atlanta (2/23) and WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/23, Carnes, King) also reports on DeBardelaben's testimony.

Alleged Philadelphia Latin Kings Leader Testifies In Own Defense. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/24, Anastasia, 423K) reports, "William 'King Homicide' Sosa, charged with heading a Latin Kings street gang that engaged in drug dealing, murder, kidnapping and rape, told a federal jury yesterday that violence and narcotics trafficking are 'against the rules' of the Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation. Taking the witness stand in his defense, Sosa…acknowledged that some 'rotten apples' had given the Latin Kings a bad reputation, but said that he neither took part in nor condoned criminality during the four-year period that federal prosecutors say he headed the Philadelphia branch of the national organization." The Inquirer notes that Sosa also said his nickname, Homicide, "stood for a Humble Oppressed Mind Increases through Cultural Independence a Desire for Education," although "prosecutors…have used witness testimony and evidence gathered during a three-year FBI investigation to portray Sosa as a volatile crime boss who embodied a more traditional interpretation of the nickname."

Government Witnesses Set To Take Stand In New York Mob Trial. The New York Times (2/24, Feuer) reports, "No one expects a Mafia defector to be Eagle Scout material. There is, after all, much truth to the adage that to catch a thief, it helps to have been one. … Nonetheless, the four informants scheduled to testify at the federal trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will each take the stand with résumés that might have impressed Capone. According to a letter filed yesterday by prosecutors in the case, the men have collectively committed a smorgasbord of crimes." The Times continues, "Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64, are former New York City police detectives charged with participating in at least eight killings as assassins for the mob. Their trial is to begin next month in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, nearly a year to the day after they were arrested on the Las Vegas Strip. … Prosecutors plan to introduce as witnesses two long-standing Mafia informants and a pair of turncoats specifically recruited for the case. Under law, prosecutors are required to disclose their witnesses' criminal histories, and in this case they include more criminal charges than the indictment. One of the witnesses is Alphonse D'Arco, former acting boss of the Luchese family, which employed the two defendants, prosecutors say. Mr. D'Arco has a conviction record that lists extortion, murder, murder conspiracy, robbery, arson, tax evasion, counterfeiting, narcotics trafficking, burglary, hijacking and assault, the prosecutors' letter says."

Witness In Gotti Trial Tells Of Life "On The Shelf." The New York Times (2/24, Hartocollis) reports, "His marriage collapsed after his girlfriend gave birth to his son. His income dried up because he could not run his extortion rackets from the federal prison where he was being held on mob-related charges. … But the most frightening moment for Michael DiLeonardo, a captain in the Gambino crime family, was when his girlfriend conveyed a message to him from Pete Gotti, the official leader of the family and the brother of the late boss John J. Gotti. … Mr. DiLeonardo was 'on the shelf,' his girlfriend told him. She did not know what that meant, but Mr. DiLeonardo did. … 'It means they broke me, they disenfranchised me,' he told a federal jury in Manhattan yesterday, as he testified for a second day in the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti. 'I'm not a captain, and I'm not a soldier. I'm the property of the Gambino family, but I have no say, no power. I'm not even to be recognized if other wiseguys want to recognize me.'" The Times adds, "He did not say why he was shelved, though he suggested it was because he was an ally of John A. Gotti, who was the rival of his uncle Pete Gotti. Whatever the reason, that exile, in November 2002, after 14 years as a made member of the Gambino family, was a turning point. … Being cast out convinced him to confess to three murders and become a government witness against Mr. Gotti and against a long list of other organized crime defendants. … He immediately began wearing a recording device, which the F.B.I. did not allow him to turn off, even when he visited his mother in the hospital, he said. He confided in his son Michael, who was 16, and felt rejected when his son thought it was wrong to cooperate with the government." The Times notes, "Under the racketeering laws, the prosecution must show that Mr. Gotti committed some of those crimes within five years of his 2004 indictment. … Because Mr. Gotti was in prison for a 1999 racketeering conviction before he was indicted, the prosecution has been trying to prove that he continued to communicate with Mr. DiLeonardo and carry out Gambino crime family business even from behind bars."

Two More Arrested In Alleged ELF Arson At Oregon Tree Farm. The AP (2/24) reports Nathan Frazer Block and Joyanna L. Zacher were indicted Thursday by a Eugene, Ore., federal grand jury "in the 2001 arson at a Clatskanie tree farm, court officials said, bringing the number charged in the case to six." Block and Zacher "were arrested Thursday in Olympia, Wash., after the 14-count indictments were handed up." The AP notes, "The government alleges the arson at the tree farm was part of a broad conspiracy from 1996 through 2001 in Oregon, Washington, Wyoming, Colorado and California, in which elements of the radical groups the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front allegedly took part." The Seattle Times (2/24) also reports on the indictments and arrests, as does The Olympian (2/24) in Olympia, Wash., under the headline "Two Olympia Residents Arrested In Ecoterror Arson At Oregon Tree Farm."

US Assesses Extent Of Cyber-Crime. Scripps Howard (2/23, Hoffman) reports, "One of the persistent unknowns in the battle against cyber-crime is the true scope of the problem." Scripps Howard continues, "Since the Internet revolution began a decade ago, U.S. businesses have been so reluctant to report cyber-victimization that experts believe the toll may be substantially higher than anyone estimates, law-enforcement officials say. … But a sweeping survey recently begun by the Department of Justice may provide the clearest picture yet of the scourge of computer viruses, worms, spyware, network intrusion, fraud, theft of information and other security breaches." Scripps Howard adds, "The departments of Justice and Homeland Security have unveiled plans to randomly - and confidentially - query 36,000 firms, which were selected as a sample of 5.3 million U.S. businesses across 37 industry sectors. … The survey data 'will provide the first official national statistics on the extent and consequences of cyber crime,' Justice spokesman Stu Smith said in a statement. … The department hopes it also will pierce the unwritten code of silence that most companies follow when it comes to cyber-crime. … 'Most companies that experience computer intrusions or breaches of security do not report the incidents to law enforcement,' FBI Director Robert Mueller said at a Feb. 15 Business Software Alliance town-hall meeting. … That reluctance stems from two beliefs by many firms: that it's a waste of time to report such an incident because there is little the police can do about it; and that revealing an attack could hurt their bottom line through bad publicity and diminished customer confidence in their security procedures."

California Execution Dispute Highlights Ethical Issues For Doctors. The Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Knickerbocker) reports, "In California this week, two anesthesiologists refused to monitor the administering of a barbiturate designed to render unconscious convicted killer Michael Morales before he was to be killed with two other drugs." The Monitor continues, "The execution was called off - or, at least, postponed. Death-penalty opponents cheered. And the roiling debate over the ethics of medical professionals' involvement in the officially sanctioned ending of human life got a little hotter. … At issue: Should a healer help the executioner?" The Monitor adds, "Beyond abortion (where the question of when life begins remains the major debating point), this includes executions carried out by the state and physician-assisted suicide now legal in Oregon and being considered in other states. … Similarly, medical ethics are involved in growing questions about military doctors taking part in the interrogation of prisoners and the force-feeding of those on a hunger strike. … In the eyes of most professional medical organizations, physicians have the ethical and professional obligation to do what they can to make people well, not to help kill them. … While most states now favor lethal drugs in capital punishment, courts increasingly are taking a skeptical view of a procedure that critics say violates the Constitution."

Maryland Police Say DNA Evidence Points To Killer Of Two. The Washington Post (2/24, B1, Klein) reports, "The crime was particularly heinous, even for county investigators familiar with violence: Two grandmothers in their seventies were stabbed to death during a robbery of their Suitland flower shop. More than two years later, Prince George's County police believe they know who did it." The Post continues, "A DNA match from a federal database led them to a man who is in the Alexandria jail on unrelated charges, police said yesterday. … Investigators have an arrest warrant accusing Adam I. Neal, 24, of two counts of second-degree murder. They believe he entered Suitland Florist on Sept. 24, 2003, robbing it of about $60 and going on a stabbing rampage, killing owner Mary Frances McDonald, 76, and her longtime friend and employee, Madeline 'Mattie' Thompson, 73." Police Chief Melvin C. High. "said investigators found DNA evidence at the scene but would not disclose whether it was blood, sweat, hair or some other substance. Police entered the DNA code into a national database to check for matches across the country but found none at the time, High said."

Contractor To Plead Guilty For Role In Cunningham Bribe Case. Defense contractor Mitchell Wade is expected to plead guilty in federal court today for his role in the bribery case involving former Rep. Randall Cunningham. The Washington Post (2/24, Leonnig, Babcock, 744K) reports that Wade has been cooperating for months with the investigation into Cunnigham's 'alleged trading of 'earmarks' in congressional appropriations for $2.4 million in cash, furniture, boats and house payments, sources said." Sources say Wade "is expected to admit to his sweetheart purchase of Cunningham's home and to providing hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash and gifts to the congressman."

Self-Defense Laws Raise Concerns Over Vigilante Justice. The Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Jonsson) reports, "Instead of embracing a citizen's 'duty to retreat' in the face of a physical attack, states may be taking cues from the days of lawless frontier towns, where non-deputized Americans were within their rights to hold the bad guys at bay with the threat of deadly force." The Monitor continues, "First enacted in Florida last year, 'Stand Your Ground' bills are now being considered in 21 states including Georgia, according to the National Rifle Association and the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. The South Dakota senate approved one just last week. … These new measures would push the boundaries beyond the self-defense measures already on the books. Twelve states already allow citizens to shoot intruders in their homes, and 38 states permit concealed weapons in public places. The 'Stand Your Ground' laws would allow people to defend themselves with deadly force even in public places when they perceive a life-threatening situation for themselves or others, and they would not be held accountable in criminal or civil court even if bystanders are injured." The Monitor notes, "Laws putting more judgment in an individual's hands stem from people's increased concern about crime in their communities. Proponents say it helps shift the debate from gun control to crime control, and that these laws are part of the rugged individualism of Americans. … Some critics say such 'Wild West' laws are vigilante justice, and commonplace confrontations and more likely turn to violence."

Four Charged In New York With Role In Human Body Parts Trade. The New York Times (2/24, Brick) reports, "Four men were charged yesterday with operating a corrupt $4.6 million enterprise to harvest human tissue from funeral homes and sell it for use in transplants and research." The Times continues, "The men — a former dentist, two of his workers and an embalmer — pleaded not guilty at their arraignment in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn. Justice John P. Walsh set bail of $1.5 million for the former dentist, Michael Mastromarino of Fort Lee, N.J., described by prosecutors as the ringleader, and lesser bail amounts for the other men: Joseph Nicelli, an embalmer from Staten Island, and Lee Cruceta and Christopher Aldorasi, Dr. Mastromarino's assistants." The Times adds, "The charges were the first public acknowledgment of a gruesome inquiry that has appeared on the covers of tabloid newspapers for months. The publicity was not lost on the defendants' lawyers, who accused prosecutors of making exorbitant bail demands with headline writers in mind. … Court documents filed in support of the charges provided the first official accounting of the investigation, alluding to participation by funeral home directors across the Northeast, but leaving unaddressed questions about the financing and scope of the operation. … The documents describe falsified records associated with 63 tissue extractions performed by Biomedical Tissue Services, a New Jersey company described as the center of an operation that garnered $4.6 million by fraudulent means."

Census Bureau Won't Change Method Of Counting Inmates. The Census Bureau has concluded that altering the practice of counting inmates as part of the population of the state in which they are being held would be so burdensome that it might cause new inaccuracies in the population count. The Washington Post (2/24, A13, 744K) reports that "the bureau said in a report requested by Congress and released this week that many of the home addresses of inmates on file at prisons are incomplete. It concluded that the change would require interviews with inmates and other efforts that would cost $250 million."

North Carolina Cardiologist Fined $2.6 Million For Medicare Fraud. The AP (2/24) reports, "A Charlotte (NC) cardiologist will pay $2.6 million to settle a federal lawsuit that alleges he defrauded Medicare for six years, according to a news release." The AP continues, "The U.S. Justice Department said Amir Hussein allegedly overbilled the medical program for the elderly and disabled from 1997-2003, which resulted in higher reimbursements from the government than he was entitle to receive. … Federal investigators also said Hussein billed Medicare for unnecessary services and sometimes billed twice for the same service." The AP adds, "The settlement money represents the amount of the fraud plus fines. The settlement also requires that he hire a government-approved auditor who will monitor his billing practices for five years. … The government said a whistleblower from Mecklenburg County who sued Hussein over his billing practices will receive a portion of the settlement money. The government joined the lawsuit."

Report Finds Continuing Problems In DC Group Homes. The Washington Post (2/24, A1, Barker) reports, "The District government has failed to meet promises to improve conditions for mentally and physically disabled residents in its group homes, even after a series of deaths stemming from inadequate care, a court monitor has found." The Post continues, "The health and safety of group home residents remain in jeopardy because of continuing problems with health care, nutrition and supervision, monitor Elizabeth Jones said in a newly released report. She said D.C. officials have made 'little meaningful progress.' … The city is behind in conducting investigations of deaths at group homes, Jones said in a report filed this week in U.S. District Court. Even when investigations were completed, the city failed to notify group home operators for more than a year of the results, she said." The Post adds, "Nurses cited for neglect continue to work in group homes, the monitor found. Also, the District missed a 90-day deadline this month that was designed to address some of the court's most pressing concerns -- and demonstrate the city's ability to make meaningful changes in the care of its most vulnerable citizens. … Jones's comments were part of another blistering quarterly review in a 30-year-old lawsuit against the District that centers on the quality of care for persons with mental retardation, many of whom also have severe physical disabilities. In November, her report found that a pattern of neglect had led to four deaths in the past year. … The new report was prepared in advance of a hearing Thursday before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle. The judge had given the city's Mental Retardation and Disabilities Administration until Feb. 10 to show improvements in the system, which serves about 2,000 people."

South Carolina Judge Apologizes After Barring Dog From Court. The AP (2/24) reports, "A North Charleston (SC) municipal judge says he is sorry if he offended a man using a medical service dog by questioning the man for bringing the animal into a courtroom." The AP continues, "Bob Godfrey removed his golden retriever from court Feb. 8 after Municipal Judge George Epps berated him for bringing her into the room. … But judges cannot bar medical service animals from court, a U.S. Justice Department spokesman said. … 'Assuming that the person with a disability is using an appropriately trained animal, the assistance animal should be admitted ... unless the animal presents a direct threat to others,' said Eric Holland of the Justice Department, which enforces the Americans with Disabilities Act." The AP adds, "Epps told The (Charleston) Post and Courier on Wednesday he didn't know dogs could be trained to pick up people if they fall. … That is why Godfrey travels with Jasmine, who also alerts him to high-pitched sounds he cannot hear, such as sirens. Godfrey said he is prone to falling because he has rods and screws in his back following an automobile accident. … 'It takes its little hands and helps pick you up,' Epps said to Godfrey in court according to an audiotape of the discussion. 'What does that dog do besides not supposed to be in this building? ... You ought to know better than to bring a dog into a courtroom. That just really upsets me.'"

Maine Misses Deadline For Voter Registration Law Compliance. The Bangor Daily News (Maine) (2/24) reports, "Despite receiving $17 million in federal money for a town-by-town upgrade of the state's voter registration system, Maine has missed its Jan. 1 completion deadline and is dropping the software contractor it hired to do the job." The News continues, "Secretary of State Matt Dunlap acknowledged Wednesday that the contractor would be paid about 12 percent of the value of its $4.5 million contract with the state, or $500,000. … Many states have fewer, county-based voter registration systems. Maine, with 503 towns and distinct voter lists, differs greatly, he said." The News adds, "In the meantime, computers bought with the federal money are sitting idle in town offices until the system is running. … They're not likely to be on line by the June primary election, but Dunlap hopes the system will be running by the Nov. 7 general election. … The state is parting with Covansys Corp., a technology services company based in Farmington Hills, Mich. It was hired to develop a centralized voter registration system to replace Maine's antiquated system of town-by-town registration." The News notes, "A U.S. Justice Department official would not comment Wednesday regarding the Jan. 1 compliance issue. … 'We are currently in communication with various states, and we are evaluating each individual state's situation. At the conclusion of that evaluation, we'll determine what type of actions, if any, should be taken,' said Eric Holland, the Justice Department spokesman."

DOJ To Intervene In Pennsylvania Voting Suit. The AP (2/24) reports, "The Justice Department plans to intervene in a lawsuit over voting machines in Westmoreland County, which could affect other counties in the state." The AP continues, "Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim sent a letter to state and county officials warning that a federal lawsuit will be filed within 10 days, county officials said Wednesday. … A citizens group successfully sued in Commonwealth Court to stop the county from buying new touch-screen voting machines because the county didn't first hold a referendum to let voters approve the new machines. That's required under the state constitution, but federal officials -- and the county commissioners -- argued that was superseded by the Help America Vote Act." The AP adds, "The federal law provides funds so counties can update their voting machines to prevent recounts and other problems like those that plagued the 2000 presidential election."

Indiana Man Seeks Office After Federal Firearms Conviction. The Fort Wayne Journal

Gazette (2/24, Mapes) reports, "A LaGrange County (IN) man with a federal felony record believes he should still be allowed to run for county office. … At least three county residents, however, have challenged Nathan K. Lumbard's candidacy." The Gazette continues, "The 23-year-old Howe resident filed to run in the May primary as a Democratic candidate for the LaGrange County Council. … Clerk Beverly Elliott said one challenge came from Lumbard's district, while the two others were just concerned citizens. … Lumbard's case will go before the LaGrange County Election Board on March 7, Elliott said. State law prohibits convicted felons from holding political office." The Gazette adds, "Lumbard was convicted on two counts of making false statements on federal firearms forms in August 2004. … During jury deliberation, Lumbard fled the federal courthouse in South Bend and was found a few weeks later in Mexico. He was sentenced to 21 months in federal prison. … Lumbard said the federal charges stemmed from an application to purchase a gun. At the time he completed the application, he faced felony theft and intimidation charges in LaGrange County. … Even though those charges were later dropped, he still was required to include them in his application, but didn't, investigators said." The Gazette notes, "Lumbard said he believes LaGrange County Prosecutor Jeff Wible pressured federal authorities to prosecute him. … 'I believe some of the motive was political,' Lumbard said. … Wible dismisses that notion. … 'I have no control over the U.S. Justice Department,' he said. 'What would the political motivation have been?' … Even if Lumbard is cleared to run for office, he may still face charges related to a LaGrange arson case from February 2004."

States Move To Restrict Picketing At Funerals. More than a dozen states have moved to restrict picketing at funerals after a small religious group staged anti-gay protests at funerals fro US troops killed in Iraq. USA Today (2/24, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "The rare action focused on a single person, the Rev. Fred Phelps of Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, has raised concerns about how to balance protesters' First Amendment rights and mourners' rights to be shielded from offensive messages." USA adds, "Westboro Baptist members picket military funerals, holding signs with such messages as 'Thank God for IEDs' and 'God Hates Fag Enablers.' They say God is punishing America for tolerating gays."

Author Says Supreme Court Should Stay Out Of Texas Redistricting. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed (2/24), American Enterprise Institute visiting fellow Edward Blum says that as the Supreme Court takes up the Texas redistricting case, as "controversial as the Texas remap was, courts shouldn't get entangled in what the late Justice Felix Frankfurter called the 'political thicket' of partisan redistricting. If political gerrymandering is a problem, it should be resolved by the voters, state by state and jurisdiction by jurisdiction." The Texas "mid-cycle remap was out of the ordinary, and DeLay made no secret of his desire to add Republicans to the Texas congressional delegation. But is that, per se, unconstitutional? No, it's not."

BlackBerry Patent Dispute Nears Courtroom Showdown. Reuters (2/24, Kaplan) reports, "The maker of the BlackBerry portable e-mail device faces a courtroom showdown on Friday in a patent infringement case that could lead to a shutdown of the service for millions of U.S. users." Reuters continues, "Barring a last-minute settlement, lawyers for BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. are due to appear before a federal judge at 9 a.m. to try to head off an injunction that would cut service to most of the more than three million U.S. BlackBerry customers." Reuters adds, "The Canadian company's lawyers will try to convince U.S. District Judge James Spencer in Richmond, Virginia, that an injunction cutting service would be premature and contrary to the public interest. … 'I'd say it's really a close case,' said Steve Maebius, a patent lawyer with the firm Foley & Lardner LLP. 'It's hard to say what (the judge) will do.'" Reuters notes, "NTP Inc. filed suit against RIM in 2001 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. A jury found in favor of privately-held NTP in 2002. … In 2003, Spencer granted an injunction that would have halted U.S. sales of the BlackBerry and shut down its service, but stayed the injunction pending appeal. … An appeals court in August of 2005 scaled back the ruling against RIM, but upheld some patent infringement claims. Subsequent appeals have been turned down."

BlackBerry CEO Refused Settlement Offer Last Year. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Heinzl, Sharma) reports, "Late last year, a tiny patent firm threatening to shut down BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd. offered a deal: For about $1 billion, it would go away. … Many customers and investors expected RIM's chairman and co-chief executive, Jim Balsillie, to pay up. They were hoping to avoid interruptions in the wireless email service that millions of lawyers, government workers and other professionals rely on. … Instead, the 45-year-old triathlete doubled down on his high-stakes bet. He pressed engineers to hurry development of new software that skirts the patent claims made by NTP Inc. Behind the scenes, he reached out to customers including wireless phone companies that sell the BlackBerry service, some of which were growing anxious about his hardball stance." The Journal adds, "Mr. Balsillie says fighting NTP tooth and nail is a gamble worth taking because NTP's patents are "committed to the garbage bin." Not everyone is so sure. Many expect RIM to settle eventually -- it came close to doing so last year -- and fear any savings on patent royalties won't make up for the damage to BlackBerry's brand and customer loyalty. Mr. Balsillie says he has always preferred a settlement but calls NTP's terms unreasonable. … Lawyers for the two sides are scheduled to appear today before Virginia federal court Judge James R. Spencer. He could decide as early as today on NTP's request for a shutdown of BlackBerry sales and service in the U.S., where most of the world's 4.3 million BlackBerry users live."

Microsoft Takes EU Dispute Public With Posting Of Defense. The AP (2/24, White) reports, "Microsoft Corp. took the unusual step Thursday of making public its formal response to European Union charges that it was failing to comply with a 2004 antitrust ruling." The AP continues, "The response, which companies usually keep confidential, was filed on Feb. 15 as the EU threatened the Redmond, Wash., software company with daily files of $2.38 million." The AP adds, "Microsoft said it believed it was in full compliance with the technical documentation EU regulators had demanded in 2004 to help rival software firms develop products that worked with Windows servers. … 'It also details numerous ways in which the Commission had ignored key information and denied Microsoft due process in defending itself,' the company said in a statement posted on its Web site along with its 78-page response and several appendices." The AP notes, "The EU denied similar complaints from Microsoft earlier, saying it had repeatedly reminded Microsoft of the need to provide 'complete and accurate specifications.' … Microsoft said it also was publishing two reports from software engineering professors who had examined the technical documentation created by Microsoft."

The Times (2/24, Doran) reports that Microsoft "stepped up its antitrust battle with the European Commission by publishing letters between Steve Ballmer, its chief executive, and Neelie Kroes, the EU Competition Commissioner, to show that it had complied with a Brussels mandate to allow competitors access to its technology. … The letters relate to a 2004 order that the American software company allow access to its so-called group server operating system software to competitors. In December Mrs Kroes accused Microsoft of failing to comply with the order and it faces the prospect of fines of €2 million (£1.4 million) a day." The Times adds, "Microsoft said last night that it had decided to publish the letters on the internet to show that it had made every effort to comply with its ruling. 'Transparency is vitally important in what can be a very opaque process in Brussels. We have decided to open this up so people can understand the issues,' said Horacio Gutierrez, a lawyer for Microsoft. … In a letter to Mr Ballmer dated November 9 last year, Mrs Kroes said that she was not satisfied with the speed of Microsoft's compliance with the order but was encouraged by the actions it had taken. 'I have been somewhat disappointed by the pace at which issues of compliance have been solved so far . . . I however take note of your unambiguously stated commitment to comply fully with the March 2004 decision,' she wrote. … In a reply written on December 15 — only six days before the Commission threatened to fine Microsoft €2 million a day for alleged non-compliance with the order — Mr Ballmer assured Mrs Kroes of the company's efforts to meet and go beyond the Commission's demands. He wrote that technical documents requested by the EU had been provided partly on paper and partly on CD. He also asked Mrs Kroes to let him know whether she needed help to access the documents on CD."

The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Jacoby) reports, "Faced with the prospect of large daily fines for not complying with European antitrust orders, Microsoft Corp. plans to argue in a hearing next month that regulators keep changing their minds about what they want the software giant to do to comply." The Journal continues, "The argument was outlined in a document Microsoft delivered confidentially to European Union antitrust authorities Feb. 15. The company made its response public yesterday amid its intensifying antitrust problems. EU antitrust authorities have 'moved the goal posts on us but have deliberately refused to articulate' what will satisfy them, Horacio Gutierrez, Microsoft's general counsel for Europe, said in an interview. … 'We have not moved the goal posts,' EU spokesman Jonathan Todd responded. 'What we require is compliance with [the EU's] March 2004 decision, which is written in black and white.'"

Boston Scientific Files For EU Approval Of Guidant Acquisition. The AP (2/24) reports, "Medical device maker Boston Scientific Corp. said Thursday that it has filed all the required paperwork with European regulators for its acquisition of Guidant Corp. … Boston Scientific has said in the past it expects to close the deal by the end of March." The AP continues, "After a long bidding war with Johnson & Johnson, Boston Scientific made a winning $27.2 billion bid for Guidant, or for $80 per share in cash and stock, in January. J&J had originally offered $25.4 million for the company in December 2004, but cut that bid down to $21.5 million by November after a summer of Guidant recalls. … Part of the agreement calls for Boston Scientific to sell Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses to Abbott Laboratories Inc. for $6.4 billion in cash with the two companies sharing rights to Guidant's line of drug-coated stents. The move is expected to speed up antitrust approval. Boston Scientific said that Abbott filed their paperwork with European regulators along with the company. … However, the Federal Trade Commission has not been able to comment on when the deal's regulatory review will be completed."

Guidant Cited For More Defibrillator Manufacturing Violations. The AP (2/24, Heher) reports, "Medical device maker Guidant Corp. failed to get the necessary federal approval for changes it made to a line of defibrillators, waiting more than a year to tell regulators it had repaired software in the devices, according to inspection documents released Thursday." The AP continues, "The inspection report by the Food and Drug Administration said a memory disruption flaw in Guidant's Prizm, Prizm 2 and Vitality pulse generators could cause the defibrillator to incorrectly administer an electric shock to a patient's heart. .. A company spokesman said Indianapolis-based Guidant notified the FDA about the malfunction problem in August 2002, when it was first discovered." The AP adds, "The company developed software to fix the problem in May 2004, nearly two years after the first of four confirmed malfunctions was discovered. But it did not submit the change to the FDA until August 2005, inspectors said. … Inspectors discovered the omission this month as part of their 21-day examination at Guidant's St. Paul, Minn., facility."

EU Approves Cisco Systems' Plan To Purchase Scientific-Atlanta. The AP (2/24) reports, "The European Union on Thursday cleared Cisco Systems Inc.'s proposed $6.9 billion purchase of Scientific-Atlanta Inc., saying the combination will not pose any antitrust problems in the European Union." The AP continues, "Cisco makes an assortment of networking gear while Scientific-Atlanta makes set-top-boxes for cable operators. But there is only "limited overlap" in their activities in Europe in cable modem and gateway products and even less in wireless mesh network products, set-top boxes and optical transmission products, the European Commission said in a statement." The AP adds, "The European Commission said that 'the new combined entity would continue to face a number of strong competitors and that new market opportunities, as well as relatively low barriers to entry, may attract new entrants. … Furthermore, buyers maintain competition in these markets by switching suppliers relatively often,' it added. … U.S. regulators raised no objections to the deal either, allowing the waiting period for their review to expire at the end of 2005 without taking any action."

South African Antitrust Body Bars Sasol-Engen Merger. The AP (2/24) reports, "A proposed merger between South Africa's Sasol Ltd, a synthetic fuels and chemical company, and Engen, a fuel retailer, was prohibited Thursday by the country's antitrust body." The AP continues, "In a statement, the Competition Tribunal said it had barred the merger between the country's largest refiner of white fuels and the largest retailer of these products, as the merged entity 'would enjoy a near-monopoly of refinery capacity and a retail market share in the inland market that is considerable.' … It said the merged entity could withhold supplies of refined products from other marketers of fuel in South Africa's inland regions." The AP adds, "The tribunal's decision is the second blow to Sasol this month, closely following Finance Minister Trevor Manuel's announcement in his Feb. 15 budget speech that a task force is to be appointed to investigate 'windfall gains' in the synthetic fuel industry."

Icahn Ratchets Up Pressure By Boosting Bid For KT&G. The Financial Times (2/24, Politi) reports, "Carl Icahn, the US financier, on Thursday increased the pressure on the management of KT&G, the Korean tobacco group, by launching a bid to acquire the company for 60,000 won a share. .. The bid is a 17 per cent premium to Thursday's market capitalisation of KT&G of Won8,300bn or $8.5bn." The Times continues, "The move was disclosed in a letter to Kwak Young-Kyoon, representative director of KT&G, in which Warren Lichtenstein, an associate of Mr Icahn in the takeover fight, launched another scathing attack on the company. 'You have flatly refused to listen to any of the proposals that we have made. In light of this, we have determined to make a proposal to acquire KT&G.' … KT&G said in a statement on Friday that it had received the letter and that it was given until February 28 to respond. … 'Until now, KT&G has not been able to confirm the true intent behind the proposal. The company does not have any further information as to whether the proposal will proceed,' it said." The Times adds, "Since building a stake of about 6.6 per cent in KT&G, with his partners, Mr Icahn has been agitating for the fast-growing ginseng business to be listed. A showdown is expected in the next few weeks, as three board members proposed by Mr Icahn will be put to a shareholder vote. … Mr Icahn's bid comes ahead of a visit by the company's management to the US next week to discuss their position with American shareholders. A meeting between KT&G and Mr Icahn may also occur, although it was unclear what effect the bid might now have on those plans, said people familiar with the matter."

UK National Grid Leading Bidder For New York Utility. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Berman, Smith) reports, "British utility National Grid PLC emerged as the leading bidder in the $7 billion auction for New York utility and natural-gas distributor KeySpan Corp., people familiar with the matter said." Another "rival bidder could emerge with a sweetened offer…but for now National Grid appeared in the best position to clinch a deal. National Grid is making its offer in cash, these people said, a factor trumping the cash-and-shares offer from Consolidated Edison Inc. of New York." UK National Grid "has been trying to establish a larger footprint in the Northeastern U.S. by branching into natural gas. It owns utilities in four states that serve three million metered accounts."

The New York Times (2/24, Sorkin) adds, "If National Grid were to emerge as the victor, it would be the latest acquisition for the London-based company in a recent spree in the United States." UK National Grid "acquired Niagara Mohawk in upstate New York for $3 billion in 2000. Just this month, it agreed to buy the Rhode Island assets of New England Gas for $498 million." The Times notes, "KeySpan is the fifth-largest distributor of natural gas in the United States and the largest in the Northeast, operating utilities in New York, Massachusetts and New Hampshire."

Report Claims Researchers Withheld Data On Chromium's Cancer Risks. The Washington Post (2/24, A3, Weiss) reports, "Scientists working for the chromium industry withheld data about the metal's health risks while the industry campaigned to block strict new limits on the cancer-causing chemical, according to a scientific journal report published yesterday." The Post continues, "The allegations, by researchers at George Washington University and the Washington-based Public Citizen Health Research Group, are based on secret industry documents obtained by the authors. … They come just days before the Occupational Safety and Health Administration is to announce its new standard for workplace exposure to hexavalent chromium -- a known carcinogen handled by 380,000 U.S. workers in the steel, aerospace, electroplating and other industries." The Post adds, "Documents in the report, published in the peer-reviewed online journal Environmental Health, show that the industry conducted a pivotal study that found a fivefold increase in lung cancer deaths from moderate exposures to chromium but never published the results or gave them to OSHA. Company-sponsored scientists later reworked the data in a way that made the risk disappear. … OSHA has not said what the new limit will be. But sources close to the agency have been told to expect a standard that would allow five times more exposure than it had initially proposed -- a shift that would be a victory for the industry, saving it billions of dollars in upgrades and plant closures."

USA Today (2/24, Weise) reports that the report, "published Thursday in Environmental Health" and "written by David Michaels of George Washington University's School of Public Health and Peter Lurie of the consumer group Public Citizen, charges that the industry misrepresented the dangers of hexavalent chromium in an attempt to thwart stricter workplace regulation. … The Industrial Health Foundation, an industry group, in 1998 commissioned a study of lung cancer mortality in workers exposed to the chemical at low, intermediate and high levels. The data came from four industrial plants, two in the USA and two in Germany, to provide a large-enough pool of workers for a statistically significant study. … The cancer risk was found to be elevated at the intermediate and high levels, according to the new paper. The authors charge that the research was completed in 2002 but not given to OSHA then, despite the fact that the agency was actively seeking all available data."

Young Opposes Proposed Renewable Energy Project. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "As Bush promotes renewable energy, Transportation Chairman Young targets one of the biggest proposed renewable projects on the East Coast: an offshore 'wind farm' of 130 turbines in Nantucket Sound. Young, calling the project 'controversial' and a potential threat to radar gear, proposes ban on wind turbines within 1.5 miles of shipping and ferry lanes."

22 Arrested In Texas Crack Cocaine Investigation. KCBD-TV (2/23) reports on its Web site, "The DEA headed an 18-month investigation leading to a major drug raid on Thursday. The outcome: 22 people were arrested and four kilos of crack cocaine are now off Lubbock streets. … Local, state and federal agencies tell us the twenty-two arrests shut down an entire crack cocaine organization."

15-Member Crack Cocaine Ring Busted In Texas. The AP (2/23) reports, "Local and federal officials in Kingsville have dismantled an alleged 15-member crack cocaine ring that operated near churches and schools. The defendants were indicted after a yearlong investigation involving the Kingsville police, the South Texas Specialized Crimes and Narcotics Task Force and the Drug Enforcement Administration."

Supreme Court "Tea Decision" Seen As Strong Endorsement Of Religious Freedom Act. In Christianity Today (2/23), Kevin Eckstrom and Sarah Pulliam write about the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allows a New Mexico sect to use hallucinogenic tea in religious rituals. Eckstrom and Pulliam say, "Some legal groups see Tuesday's Supreme Court 'tea' decision as an important precedent in religious freedom jurisprudence. Others see it as a harbinger of church-state relations under the Roberts court. But religious freedom advocates agree that the case means it will likely be harder for the government to limit expression after the ruling." The two add that the ruling was a strong endorsement of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act.

Morales Responds To Cancellation Of Bolivian Senator's US Visa. Reuters (2/23) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales criticized the United States on Thursday for canceling the visa of one of his closest confidantes in the leftist leader's first run-in with Washington since taking power a month ago. Sen. Leonilda Zurita, a leader of coca farmers whose battle cry was 'Long live coca, Death to Yankees!,' found out her multiple-entry U.S. visa…had been canceled when she tried to travel to Miami." According to Reuters, State Department Deputy Spokesman Adam Ereli said Zurita's visa was revoked after information was received about her, but he declined to elaborate. "With much respect, I want to tell the U.S. government not to confuse us with some parties implicated in drug-trafficking," said Morales.

British Task Force Seen As Arriving Too Late To Hinder Afghanistan Poppy Harvest. The UK's Herald (2/24) reports, "The 3300-strong British task force is being sent to Afghanistan two months too late to hinder the harvest of a record poppy crop destined to end up as heroin on the streets of Scotland. The troops deploying to Helmand province on a mission to help eradicate the narcotics' trade in the Taliban's southern heartland will not be fully in position before July. But local farmers will harvest the raw opium resin, which accounts for 90% of all heroin sold in the UK, in May," according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

The Washington Times (2/24, Wagner, 90K) reports FBI Special Agent Margo Barter agent "in the trial of the last two defendants in the biggest arson case in Maryland history testified yesterday about evidence found at the crime scene, including buckets and containers used to carry flammable liquids. … Mrs. Barter was among eight witnesses to testify yesterday" at the trial of Roy T. McCann Jr. and Michael M. Everhart," but "none of the testimony or evidence presented…linked the defendants to the conspiracy."

IMMIGRATION:

SEIU Official Backs Bush Guest Worker Proposal. Eliseo Medina, vice president of the Service Employees International Union, the nation's second-largest union, supports President Bush's guest worker program. The New York Times (2/24, Swarns, 1.19M) reports that while Medina's stance "has helped solidify his role as a prominent national labor leader," it is also "roiling the nation's unions. If such a plan is passed by Congress, it could result in the largest reshaping of immigration policy and the workplace in decades. … The disagreement among labor leaders over the guest worker plan, which has simmered mostly behind closed doors, has been overshadowed in recent months by the fractious debate among Republicans about how to handle the swelling population of illegal workers in the United States. But the guest worker plan is also generating tensions among those on the left, particularly in the nation's labor movement."

Texas Writer Says Most Illegal Aliens Seek Only To Improve Quality Of Life. Marisa Treviño, a freelance writer in Dallas, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) writes that the "bad guys" contributing to "increasing violence along our southern border" come from "two groups: warring drug cartels and 'coyotes,' who smuggle people across the border." Meanwhile, "Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner…recently said, 'A lot of the people coming across the border are criminals and potentially terrorists.'" Though "28% of federal inmates are non-US citizens," there has yet to be a Spanish-speaking illegal immigrant…jailed for being a terrorist." Treviño states, "There's no denying our fear of terrorists. What's not clear is why we should fear most illegal immigrants whose sole intent is to improve their quality of life."

TAX:

Deutsche Bank Reportedly In Settlement Talks With DOJ On Tax Shelters. The New York Times (2/24, Browning) reports, "Deutsche Bank is in talks with the Justice Department in an effort to settle a criminal investigation over the bank's role in questionable tax shelters, people briefed on the case say." The Times continues, "This month, a smaller German rival, the HVB Group, reached a nearly $30 million agreement with prosecutors while acknowledging 'criminal wrongdoing' in helping to carry out fraudulent tax shelter transactions." The Times adds, "For Deutsche Bank, the path toward a settlement may be rockier, in part because it had a much larger role in the creation of some questionable tax shelters and the transactions underpinning them, investigators have said. A potentially larger obstacle, say the people briefed on the case, is that Deutsche Bank appears unable to account for a number of those transactions. … In the past, Deutsche Bank has described the transactions it arranged for tax shelters, including ones known as blips and cobra, as regular and ordinary. … But Deutsche Bank has been unable to provide to federal prosecutors in Manhattan paper documents detailing some transactions for these shelters, according to the people briefed on the case. … The documents, if they exist, would detail, among other things, loans, trades and swaps of stock and derivatives and accounting records, frequently through offshore entities set up in the Cayman Islands. The transactions were used to generate artificial losses that were then improperly used by investors to offset legitimate gains from other taxable income."

Thomas Says Treasury Is Not First To Conduct Dynamic Analysis Of Tax Cuts. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M), House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas writes that a Journal article unfairly portrayed the work of the Joint Committee on Taxation on dynamic analysis. JCT "began developing macroeconomic models more than 10 years ago and issued its first official dynamic analysis for the 2003 Jobs and Growth Tax Relief Reconciliation Act. Even a Treasury Department document about its forthcoming division on dynamic analysis states, 'This type of analysis is already being done by the Joint Committee on Taxation...' … I share the view that the proposed effort by Treasury to better understand the macroeconomic effects of tax policy is good news, but no one should assume that they are the first to make this effort."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Aim To Turn Drug Benefit Into Liability For GOP. Democratic lawmakers across the country are using this week's congressional recess to attack the new Medicare drug benefit. They have planned more than 100 forums to portray the benefit as "deeply flawed" in an effort to turn the program, which some saw as a plus for the GOP, into a political liability going into this year's elections. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Lueck, 2.11M) reports that Democrats hope to "tie troubles with the drug benefit to broader campaign themes: that the Republicans are too cozy with big industries and that the Bush administration stumbles when responding to crises. To that end, Democrats are noting that private health insurers -- not the government -- design and administer the drug plans, and that drug makers are protected from negotiating prices directly with Medicare." The Journal also reports that Republicans "say Democratic carping will discourage people from signing up -- an outcome that Democrats, who have long supported drug coverage in Medicare, say they don't want."

Kinsley Says Medicare Drug Benefit Is "Doomed." Michael Kinsley writes in the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K) that the drug benefit, "Bush's only major domestic accomplishment in six years," has not "achieved its intended purpose of cementing the affection of senior citizens for the Republican Party." Kinsley adds that "even if this subsidy to senior citizens survives its rocky premiere, it is doomed. Simple transfers of money cannot keep up with the rising cost -- and rising benefit -- of pharmaceutical drugs."

LATimes Says Administration Should Make Better Use Of Generic Drugs. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (2/24, 958K) says it is "baffling that the Bush administration is not making better use of one of the best savings tools available: low-cost generic drugs. There are more than 800 generic-medication applications awaiting approval from the Food and Drug Administration -- an unprecedented backlog. … A larger dose of generic drugs is one of the few no-brainers to keep the nation's healthcare bill from growing even larger."

Government To Pay Employers To Keep Retiree Health Care Plans Alive. A new study by Credit Suisse First Boston says America's largest companies expect to be paid $4 billion over the next four years by the Federal government in order to keep their retirement plans alive. The New York Times (2/24, Walsh, 1.19M) reports, "When Congress authorized the Medicare drug benefit, it also agreed to start subsidizing the drug component of employers' retiree health plans, to keep them from shifting their retirees into the government program. The goal is to save the government money, even after the subsidies, while giving the retirees a better deal than they might get if they were pushed into Medicare." The Times adds, "With the program just starting its first year, it is not yet clear whether the subsidy will achieve its goals."

Senators Offer Key Points For Inclusion In Lobbying Reform Bill. A bipartisan group of Senators said yesterday that lobbying and ethics overhaul legislation that the Senate will soon consider should include provisions on gifts, travel and promises of lobbying jobs. The senators also said the measure should include greater openness about earmark projects. The AP (2/24) reports, "The bipartisan group of senators includes Rick Santorum, R-Pa.; John McCain, R-Ariz.; Russ Feingold, D-Wis.; and Barack Obama of Illinois, the Democrats' spokesman on the lobbying issue."

ACU Blasts McCain Lobbying Reform Bill. The Washington Times (2/24, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The American Conservative Union (ACU), in an e-mail this week to right-wing activists and the press, denounced [Sen. John] McCain's Lobbying Transparency and Accountability Act of 2005 as an attack on the First Amendment. … Mr. McCain's latest legislation 'is masquerading as a "lobbying reform" measure but essentially this cruel hoax against the American people has very little to do with reforming lobbying and has just about everything to do with shutting you up and stripping you of your First Amendment rights,' the ACU said." The ACU "urged its members to send 'urgent Blast Fax messages to President George W. Bush and all 55 Republicans in the United States Senate,' telling them that the lobbying bill 'is nothing more than a cleverly disguised attempt to cut average Americans like you out of the political equation.'"

Lott May Offer Competing Lobbying Reform Package. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Reformers battle flagging interest and internal discord on lobbying rules. Vulnerable Sen. Santorum of Pennsylvania, Republicans' point man on the issue, may face internal competition in advancing changes. Rules Chairman Lott is preparing his own package; his potential return to Senate leadership may hinge on a Santorum November defeat opening up a slot."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 9, :30, Williams) reported, "The bursting of the stock market bubble, the recession back in 2001,and some big job losses in the early part of this decade contributed to what turns out to be a 2.3% drop in family incomes in the United States. That same average soared by 17.3% in the 1998-2001 period." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The report, the most comprehensive survey of household wealth, also found a widening of the gap between households at the top and the bottom of the economic ladder."

The percentage of families investing in stocks fell 3.3 percentage points to 48.6% from 2001 to 2004, a level last reached some time between the 1995 and 1998 surveys."

These continuing jobless claims climbed by 41,000 to 2,495,000."

Mehlman Says Katrina, Recount Aftermath Hurting GOP Outreach To Blacks. Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the flawed Federal response to Hurricane Katrina and ongoing mistrust caused by the 2000 presidential vote have complicated the GOP's efforts to build support among African Americans. The Washington Times (2/24, DeBose, 90K) reports Mehlman said, "Katrina has made it harder because people saw a government at every level -- federal, state and local -- not operating the way it should." The Times adds the RNC chief "added that the constant rehashing of blunders and mistakes associated with the slow emergency response -- without talking about policies to deal with issues of poor education, inadequate work-force readiness and poverty that left many blacks more vulnerable to the storm's devastation -- hasn't helped either." Mehlman said he "has learned much in his 46 conversations with minority communities coast to coast. He said that the primary issues blacks care about are education, health care, jobs and opportunities to build wealth, but that since the fall he has heard an earful – 'and rightfully so' -- about Katrina at every stop."

Hillary Clinton Enlists Carville, Begala To Raise Funds. The AP (2/24, Humbert) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has turned to two of the masterminds behind her husband's 1992 presidential victory -- James Carville and Paul Begala -- to raise money needed to keep her in the Senate and possibly help finance a White House run of her own." The "tag-team money appeal began Wednesday when potential Clinton donors received an e-mail from Begala warning that 'Election Day is eight months away, but the Republican attack machine is going after Hillary Clinton big-time.'" Carville's "turn came Thursday. His e-mail cautioned that 'the GOP knows how to win and they play for keeps.'"

Democrats Weigh Clinton Nostalgia Versus Fatigue As Factor In Hillary Run. The Charlotte Observer/Knight Ridder (2/24, Thomma) reports that as they "ponder how to win back the White House, many Democrats fear that the early front-runner for their party's 2008 presidential nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, carries so much baggage that she'd drag the party down to defeat." Party insiders "think she'll enter the race shortly after her expected re-election as a New York senator later this year - with a $50 million head start on fundraising toward 2008. But ominous signs abound, and together they suggest that her campaign would conjure a clash between the lure of Clinton nostalgia and the fear of Clinton fatigue."

Texas House Republicans Rally For DeLay. The AP (2/24, Benjaminson) reports Rep. Tom DeLay "was likened to Stonewall Jackson, Lyndon Baines Johnson and a courageous World War I officer Thursday as members of the Texas Republican congressional delegation joined the former House majority leader to endorse his re-election." The "unusual display of GOP solidarity was remarkable for DeLay, who is aggressively campaigning for re-election to the seat he has held comfortably for 22 years." The Republicans "took turns singing DeLay's praises as a selfless leader who not only helped get them elected, but also won Republican majorities in Congress and the Legislature, and brought home the bacon for NASA, the port of Houston and other local needs."

Schwarzenegger Faces Questions From Right At GOP Convention. The AP (2/24, Blood) reports Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today "arrives at an early juncture in his re-election campaign -- a keynote speech at the state Republican Party winter convention in San Jose -- with conservatives openly questioning why they should support him." Is Schwarzenegger "the governor who sought new power to choke off state spending in 2005, or the one who this year called for record borrowing and submitted a budget that doles out $6 billion more than the state will collect in taxes?" GOP strategist Arnold Steinberg said, "When you look at the gyrations in his policies, it appears he's plagued by an absence of core values. He comes across as a caricature, where energy and enthusiasm are confused with core values." The AP adds Schwarzenegger has "disputed suggestions of a new direction in 2006." Conservatives at the convention "have proposed resolutions that challenge Schwarzenegger's positions on the minimum wage (he wants it increased $1 over two years, to $7.75 an hour), judicial appointments (he has named nearly as many Democrats as Republicans to the Superior Court), and spending and borrowing."

Robinson Says Summers Was "Terrible Politician." Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K) that Harvard University President Lawrence Summers' "is being forced to resign because, as brilliant as he is…he proved to be a terrible politician. That alone is reason for him to have to go." Robinson adds that there is "also the question of the direction in which he sought to lead Harvard." In the end Summers' great strength "was a passionate commitment to undergraduate education. Students liked him and sensed that he cared about them, and it's good that after a sabbatical he will return to the Harvard faculty."

US Won't Join Iran Nuclear Negotiations. The AP (2/24) reports, "The Bush administration rejected on Thursday a suggestion by former German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer that the United States join now-sidelined European negotiations designed to stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons." Fischer said, "It would be really helpful if the United States could join," adding, "Europe is not strong enough."

Pace Says Need For Military Action In Iran Is "A Long Way Away." The Washington Times (2/24, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Marine Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, dampened speculation during a National Press Club appearance that military action against Iran is near. 'I believe that the international community has many, many, many diplomatic, economic, other opportunities to influence Iran -- not only the United States, but all the international community -- to affect the way that Iran is acting in the world,' he said. 'So from where I stand, from where I sit, we are a long way away from needing the military option.'"

Rice Visits Lebanon To Showcase "Democratic Success Story." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited Beirut. The AP (2/23, Gearan) said Rice "hinted Thursday the United States would welcome the exit of Lebanon's pro-Syrian president. She praised democratic progress by other leaders in the country's fractured sectarian politics." The AP offered a reason for the Beirut stop: Rice's Middle East trip "has seen US allies snub her efforts to halt aid to a Hamas-led Palestinian government. But the journey has also let her highlight an emerging democratic success story in the region, with nearly a year passing since a flowering of street protests forced Syrian troops to leave Lebanon after three decades of domination."

The Washington Post (2/24, A8, Kessler, 744K) says Rice "snubbed the pro-Syrian president of Lebanon…deliberately not scheduling a meeting with him." The Secretary "disavowed any motive in the diplomatic slight, but it appeared calculated to undercut" Emile Lahoud. Knight Ridder (2/24, Strobel) reports Rice was "hoping to further isolate neighboring Syria and shore up Lebanon's fragile sovereignty."

Continued Hamas Funding Called "Setback" For Rice. Iran offered to fund the Hamas-lead Palestinian Authority even as Suadi Arabia refused to stop sending aid to the government. The Washington Times (2/23, Kralev, 90K) called the decisions "a setback for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." However, it notes that the Saudis "were more reserved than the Iranians," and "Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal was vague about direct support for a Hamas-led government."

West Bank Sees Intense Fighting. Israeli soldiers and Palestinian gunmen clashed in the West Bank, leaving three gunmen and two civilians dead. The Washington Post (2/24, A9, Wilson, 744K) calls the fighting "some of the most intense since Israel and a dozen armed Palestinian groups agreed a year ago to abide by a cease-fire." Human Rights-Israel, an independent group based in Tel Aviv, "called Israeli gunfire 'indiscriminate.'"

Europe Considers Aiding Abbas. The New York Times (2/24, Smith, 1.19M) reports the EU "is considering making direct payments to the moderate Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, as a way of supporting him while trying to maintain financial pressure on Hamas, the anti-Israeli militant group that swept to power in elections last month." The Times adds the proposal, if adopted, "would be a reversal in policy." In a parenthetical note, the Times reports, "A senior State Department official said Thursday that the United States had not seen Mr. Solana's proposal but that while European and American tactics might differ, their common approach in general would be to use their leverage to persuade Hamas to change its position. He said it was too soon to say if the idea of circumventing a Hamas-led government and aiding Mr. Abbas would accomplish that objective."

At Least 10% Of Palestinian Legislators In Jail. At least 10% of the Palestinian legislators are in jail either on sentences or as security risks. The Washington Times (2/24, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "In a political system caught between liberation-movement militancy and a state in the making, time in an Israeli jail is a powerful resume builder for politicians and a potential electoral asset for political parties." However, to "ensure that Israeli prison authorities wouldn't abuse prisoners in an attempt to influence their votes," the "Palestinian parliamentary bylaws forbid them from casting votes until they are free."

Bolton Criticizes UN Rights Council Resolution. While UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said the resolution on a new Human Rights Council was, although disappointing, the best option for replacing the Human Rights Commission, US ambassador John Bolton criticized it as containing deficiencies now seeks its renegotiation. The New York Times (2/24, Hoge, 1.19M), leading with Annan's acceptance, reports that the Commission's replacement "has been seen as a test of whether the United Nations can meet demands for fundamental change in the organization." The Washington Post (2/24, A12, Lynch, 744K) leads with Bolton's dissatisfaction, although it notes, "Bolton did not rule out the possibility that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice might still endorse the new rights council."

UN Approves Food Aid For North Korea, Agrees To Restrictions. The UN approved a $102 million food aid program for North Korea, including the limits the country demands on tracking food deliveries. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports that World Food Program executive director James Morris "said the agency will return to the bargaining table with North Korea to negotiate operating conditions 'that will allow us to do our work properly.' If Pyongyang won't give the WFP the access it needs, he said, it 'will be forced to withdraw.'"

Vatican Pushes Muslim Countries On Christians' Rights. Having supported Muslim calls for respect over the cartoons of Muhammad, the Vatican is now linking the issue to Muslim countries showing tolerance towards their Christian minorities. The Washington Times/Reuters (2/24, Heneghan) quotes Monsignor Velasio De Paolis, secretary of the Vatican's supreme court, "thundered" that "Enough now with this turning the other cheek. It's our duty to protect ourselves." The Vatican

South Korean Christians Link Rights, Evangelizing. Evangelical Christians in South Korea have linked human rights issue to spreading their faith. The New York Times (2/24, Onishi, 1.19M) reports, "The North Korean human rights issue has become so politicized that the actual plight of North Koreans is often emphasized or de-emphasized for other ends." For South Korea, "the issue of human rights in the North has been spearheaded by conservative Christians whose aim is to take their faith to the northern half of the divided peninsula." Christians in the South "have grown into the world's second-largest overseas missionary force after the United States'."

Arroyo Declares Emergency Rule In Philippines, Announces Foiled Coup Plot. Philippines President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo declared emergency rule after security forces said they'd stopped a coup plot and the commander of the Scout Rangers regiment is being held as an alleged leader. Demonstrations marking the twentieth anniversary of the "People Power" movement that ousted Ferdinand Marcos were canceled. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/24) reports, "Clashes erupted as police used water cannons to disperse about 5,000 protesters defying a ban on rallying at a shrine to the 1986 'people power' uprising that toppled former President Ferdinand Marcos. The military barricaded its camps to keep troops from joining the demonstrations."

The Washington Post (2/24, A8, Sipress, 744K) adds that Ferdinand Marcos's "overthrow ushered in a period of sustained political turmoil." Now, "many Filipinos declare that East Asia's oldest democracy has failed," as "Philippine democracy is little more than a ruthless contest among rival clans" and "ordinary Filipinos have little way to channel their interests through the electoral system."

Arias Wins Costa Rican Recount. Oscar Arias narrowly won reelection as president from a ballot recount, although authorities have not yet announce a winner as they rule on voting irregularities complaints. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Lyons, 2.11M) notes that this increases "the likelihood the nation will join a regional free-trade pact with the U.S.," although "the Congress in Costa Rica… has yet to ratify the accord" and the narrow victory will hinder Arias' to push it.

Indian Scientists Complain About Refused Visas. Just prior to President Bush's trip to India, three Indian scientists have complained about visa applications for the US. The New York Times (2/24, Sengupta, 1.19M) say the complaints "stirred a diplomatic tempest" and "prompted two unusual statements from the American Embassy in New Delhi expressing 'regrets.'" One of the scientists, Placid Rodriguez was "called by the consulate on Feb. 16" about his application to attend a March conference and "told it would take about eight weeks to review his answers to a new questionnaire." However, after the Embassy contacted him again, "Dr. Rodriguez did submit his completed questionnaire by e-mail. On Thursday, he said he received a call saying his visa had been approved."

The Washington Post (2/24, A12, Vedantam, 744K) adds that the "U.S. Embassy in New Delhi has granted a visa" to prominent scientist Goverdhan Mehta, but he "said that he had already canceled his travel plans." Officials say the "form letter saying 'you have been refused a visa,'" is "not a rejection but rather part of a conditional process aimed at obtaining additional information." Tony Edson, deputy assistant secretary for visa services, said "the department has greatly accelerated" visa approvals, but "acknowledged that many visa seekers have a very different impression of the application process."

Economist Advises Caution For Bush On India Trip. In its cover story, The Economist (2/23) says Bush "needs to avoid two kinds of mistake. The first, and most serious, would be to shower America's new friend with gifts that the United States can ill afford. Unfortunately, this has already happened" with his promise to share civilian nuclear technology." The second is "Mr Bush should also be wary of sending the wrong signal about America's intentions towards China." The commonly invoked idea "that India might somehow turn out to be a 'counterweight' to China" not only would fail, but "is liable only to reinforce China's fear that America's grand strategic design is to encircle it and block its rise as a great power." Bush also needs to "take care to ensure that friendship with India does not damage his close ties to Pakistan" and "not to tilt so far India's way that the Indians feel under no pressure to make concessions of their own" on Kashmir.

Credit Concerns Cause China To Hoard Bird Flu Samples. China's insistence on controlling bird flu samples it takes and the research performed on them put it at loggerheads with international health officials. The Chinese cite concerns that others will scoop research opportunities and worries over crediting Chinese scientists. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Zamiska, 2.11M) reports, "The standoff pits a high-ranking veterinarian in China's Ministry of Agriculture named Jia Youling against international health authorities leading the fight against bird flu." Since last summer, "China hasn't provided a single sample from its infected flocks, despite repeated requests by WHO amid the roughly 30 outbreaks the country has reported in the past 12 months," and "the genetic information contained in China's samples could help develop a more effective vaccine that could save countless lives."

Third Day Of Nigerian Street Violence Yields To Calm. After three days of rioting in Nigeria during which Christians attacked Muslims in retaliation for Muslim-on-Christian violence in the north, order has been restored. The New York Times (2/24, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "a semblance of the ordinary returned to the city's streets on Thursday." Many political analysts say the cartoons "were simply a pretext to act on very old grievances rubbed raw by political tensions." The Washington Post (2/24, A10, Timberg, 744K) adds in the first two paragraphs of its article, "Christian mobs… turned to disposing of the evidence in the crudest of ways" - burning bodies in the street - and the "Christian residents" of Onitsha "expressed little remorse" for the violence.

Moscow Roof Collapse Kills At Least 56. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 6, :20, Sawyer) reported, "At least 56 people were killed when a large roof collapsed over a market outside of Moscow. 32 people were injured. Investigators said heavy, wet snow on the roof may have triggered the collapse." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 8, 0:20, Schieffer) reported the collapse "happened early in the morning but authorities say about 100 people were inside, most of them market employees." NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 3, 0:25, Williams) also reported the story.

O'Grady Urges Recognition Of Latin American Gains. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in her column in the Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M) A "number of countries in" Latin America "are, in fact, making important progress" due to "heavy lifting in domestic politics," and "what matters most is acknowledging the gains, lest we become lost in the fog of partisan demagoguery." When "George W. Bush's political opponents…delivered some exquisite jeremiads on the subject of Latin American instability," they were "crocodile tears." In fact, "there is even an argument to be made that by stepping back, the Bush administration has encouraged a long-overdue maturation process of Latin governance," as "fundamentally what ails the region are matters of domestic politics that only locals can sort out."

WPost Supports Wolfowitz On Congo Debt Forgiveness Postponement. The Washington Post (2/24, A14, 744K) editorializes that the Congo "hopes to win approval of a reduction in its debt," but its "corrupt government keeps part of its oil revenue from showing up on its books, raising questions as to whether it deserves forgiveness." World Bank's president, Paul D. Wolfowitz, rightly argues that debt relief should be delayed," and his "proposed remedy is moderate. He suggests that Congo should adopt measures to reduce oil corruption" for three years before getting full debt reduction. Until then, "relief would flow into a carefully monitored poverty-reduction fund." It is best "to proceed slowly on Congo -- and send a needed wake-up call to other corrupt countries."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales Says NSA Surveillance Program "Remains A Valuable Tool." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/23) about the NSA's domestic surveillance program. Gonzales said, "We believe this program has been effective, has been valuable, and these are the words from General Mike Hayden, the deputy director of national intelligence, from Bob Mueller, the director of the FBI. But we have to be careful about talking too much about the successes of this program and operational capabilities relating to this program. Much of the program has not been discussed publicly. It remains an effective program. We believe it has been compromised to some extent by the disclosures and by our discussions about the program, but it remains a valuable tool, and therefore, for that reason, I'm limited about what I can say about it."

Gonzales Calls Talk Of Bush Impeachment "Ridiculous." Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/23) about calls from some lawmakers for President Bush's impeachment because of the NSA program. Gonzales said that "talk about impeachment, in this particular case, is ridiculous. This is about a commander-in-chief using authorities that have long been used by other commanders-in-chief in a time of war to engage in electronic surveillance of the enemy."

FBI Memos Show Agents Objected To Guantanamo Interrogation Techniques. According to FBI memos released yesterday by the ACLU, agents repeatedly warned Pentagon interrogators at Guantanamo – including then-commander Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller – of legal concerns over aggressive interrogation techniques and expressed doubt about the efficacy of the actions. ACLU had obtained the FBI emails and records under a FOIA request and released highly-redacted versions a year ago. The news coverage of the ACLU press conference generally was more critical of the Pentagon than the FBI, with most stories noting ACLU lawyer Jameel Jaffer said yesterday, "Now we can say that the documents show conclusively that abuse and torture at Guantanamo was not the result of rogue elements but was the consequence of policies deliberately adopted by senior military and Pentagon officials.".

In a very widely distributed story headlined "FBI to Gitmo: Hostile Interrogations Risky," the AP (2/24, Sherman) reports, "FBI officials, whose names were blacked out, indicated that senior military officials, including former Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, were aware of and in some cases had approved of putting hoods on prisoners, threatening them with violence and subjecting them to humiliating treatment." Both Wolfowitz – through a World Bank spokesman – and Pentagon spokesman Larry Di Rita dismissed the memos as old news. The AP adds that FBI Special Agent Richard Kolko "said FBI agents properly reported abuse allegations through the bureau's chain of command, but noted, 'It is not within the scope of the FBI's jurisdiction overseas to investigate reports of alleged abuse of military detainees.'"

Under the headline "FBI Memos Reveal Allegations Of Abusive Interrogation Techniques," Knight Ridder (2/24, Brown) reports, "The agents tried to get the military interrogators to follow a less coercive approach," but Miller "overrode the FBI agents' protests, according to the documents. The memos offer some of the clearest proof yet that the abuses and torture of prisoners in U.S. military custody weren't the isolated actions of low-ranking soldiers but a result of policies approved by senior officials, the ACLU said."

Under the headline "E-Mails Show FBI Agents Fretted About Prisoner Abuse," The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Miller, 958K) reports, "Although prior documents have revealed tension between the FBI and military interrogators over the methods used at Guantanamo Bay and Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad," the Lueckenhoff email shows "that senior FBI officials in Iraq were reluctant to be drawn into any investigation of prisoner abuses." Yesterday, Kolko "said it was not within the FBI's jurisdiction overseas to investigate allegations of detainee abuse, but that agents had reported their findings through their chain of command and cooperated in Pentagon investigations and reviews."

Bloomberg (2/24, Rowley) notes, "FBI agents assigned to interrogate prisoners at Guantanamo objected to the techniques at meetings and two videoconferences with Pentagon officials in Washington, the 2003 memo said. During one of those meetings, a military commander 'blatantly misled the Pentagon into believing' that the FBI had endorsed the 'aggressive and controversial' techniques he proposed to use on the detainee, the memo said."

The Washington Post (2/24, A16, White, 744K) reports under the headline "FBI Interrogators In Cuba Opposed Aggressive Tactics" that Air Force Lt. Col. John Skinner "said a series of investigations and reviews have shown that Defense Department officials never encouraged or condoned abuse. 'No matter how hard some may try to manipulate documents and information to support their myth, the facts tell a different story,' Skinner said."

DOJ_NMG_0015932

The Financial Times (2/24, Sevastopulo) notes "a Pentagon spokesman" said that "the FBI memos were 'another example of recycling old information'."

The New York Times (2/24, 1.19M) runs a truncated version of the AP story with the headline "Prison Interrogators Got F.B.I. Warnings," and Reuters (2/24, Dunham) reports the story under the headline "Files Show Military Rebuffs FBI Guantanamo Worries."

DOJ Seeks More Time To Comply With Lackawanna Wiretap Request. The AP (2/24) reports, "The Justice Department has asked for more time to answer an indicted Lackawanna (NY) businessman's questions about whether agents used secret wiretaps while investigating him." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge William Skretny had given the government until Feb. 27 to respond to the request by Mohamed Albanna, who is charged with two relatives of running an illegal money transmitting business that sent more than $3.5 million from western New York to Yemen. … On Thursday, prosecutors filed for a two-week extension, citing numerous such inquiries from defendants across the country following revelations that President Bush approved warrantless eavesdropping in some cases." The AP notes, "An affidavit by a Justice Department attorney in Washington said the department had contacted the National Security Agency about Albanna's case. The response must be carefully drafted, the affidavit said, to ensure consistency with other cases and will contain highly classified information."

FBI Informant Testifies Hayat Praised Terror Groups, Jihad. Under the headline "FBI Informant Says Terror Suspect Took Interest In Violent Groups," the AP (2/24, Barbassa) reports in a widely-distributed story FBI informant Naseem Khan testified Thursday that Hamid Hayat "took an interest in terrorist groups and spoke admiringly about jihad. … 'He never, ever considered himself American,' said Khan." Khan added that at one point "during long conversations at Hayat's home" Hayat "praised al-Qaida as 'a tough group,' adding, 'They're even smarter than the FBI, friend.'" The AP notes, "Even as he showed off his knowledge of militant groups and said he knew the location of training camps, Hayat struggled to provide details when Khan pressed him, the transcripts show." KXTV-TV Sacramento (2/23, Johnson) adds, "Hayat also related when a friend was cursing America and asked if Hamid was offended. Hamid told Khan, 'I said, "Man, this country is mine in name only, understand? My heart is in Pakistan," I told him.' When Hayat's father, Umer Hayat came on the line and heard the cursing, the younger Hayat said his father encouraged it," saying, "Well done. Curse some more."

Moussaoui Defense Objects To Number Of Potential Jurors With 9/11 Link. The AP (2/24, Sniffen) reports, "Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's defense complained Thursday that too many people connected to Sept. 11 victims were being approved as potential jurors for his sentencing. Three would-be jurors were subsequently rejected despite government protests." The AP notes, "U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema qualified 18 more potential jurors Thursday, but two approved earlier dropped out because of personal hardships, bringing the total to 83."

FBI Adds Yemeni Escapees To Most-Wanted Terrorists List. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/24) reports Yemeni prison escapees Jamal al-Badawi and Jaber Elbaneh "were added on Thursday to the FBI's list of most wanted terrorists." The AP notes that al-Badawi has been charged in the US in the USS Cole bombing and Elbaneh was indicted for his alleged role in the Lackawanna Six al Qaeda cell.

Toledo Terror Suspect Had Served As Prison Imam. The Toledo Blade (2/23, Boak) reports, "A year before he is accused of plotting to attack American soldiers in Iraq, Marwan Othman El-Hindi offered spiritual nourishment to Muslim prisoners" as an imam at the Toledo Correctional Institution," and . "Khelleh Konteh, the warden, said he walked Mr. El-Hindi out of the…prison for good on Dec. 30, 2003, after seeing the native of Jordan give an inmate contraband bread and oranges instead of lessons from the Qur'an." The Blade notes, "Proselytizing at a prison would have fit within the indictment's pattern of terrorist preparations, according to Senate committee testimony by FBI Director Robert Mueller last year. 'Prisons continue to be fertile ground for extremists who exploit both a prisoner's conversion to Islam while still in prison, as well as their socioeconomic status and placement in the community upon their release,' he said."

Terrorism Arrests Followed Raids On Islamic Charity. The Washington Times (2/24, Seper, 90K) reports, "The arrests this week of three men in Ohio on terrorism-related charges involving troops in Iraq followed raids by federal agents on a Toledo-based Islamic charity accused of providing funds to Hamas. … Treasury since has frozen the assets of KindHearts, pending an investigation for terrorism funding." However, "Jihad Smaili, a KindHearts board member, told reporters in Toledo he did not know any of the three men named in the indictment and denied they had anything to do with the charity."

Al Arian Confident Of Acquittal At Retrial. The Orlando Sentinel (2/23, Gutierrez, 265K) reports that in an interview with the paper on Wednesday, Sami al Arian, "who faces a possible retrial on terrorism-related charges, is confident he will be found innocent and says he is open to a plea deal if it affords him 'victory.' … Even if he wins his second round, as he likes to refer to it," al Arian "is likely to be deported to the Middle East." Al Arian said of jurors at his trial, "They were smart enough to see through the smoke and mirrors. The government will not give up on this case, which shows this has been a political case since the beginning."

Florida Man Charged With Illegal Money Transfers Released On Bail. The Tampa Tribune (2/24, Silvestrini) reports Tampa convenience store owner Hasan Qasem, "accused of illegally sending tens of thousands of dollars to Yemen, the occupied West Bank and Luxembourg was released from jail Thursday after a federal judge set bail." Qasem appeared "before U.S. Magistrate Elizabeth Jenkins, who followed the recommendation of Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Hoffer that she allow Qasem to be released on $20,000 bail."

FBI Says Chicago Crash Victim Had No Terror Ties. The Chicago Tribune (2/24, Heinzmann, Bowean, 643K) reports Lafi Hussein Nofal, who reportedly was carrying a large amount of cash and checks when he was killed in a crash on Chicago's Stevenson Expressway, causing the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force to launch an investigation, "was a physician from Puerto Rico who had real estate and business investments in the Chicago area but no known ties to terrorism." The Tribune notes that "the FBI released a statement early Thursday saying there was no known terrorism link, and referred further questions to the Illinois State Police." However, The Chicago Sun-Times (2/24, Sweeney) notes that the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force is continuing its investigation, although "there was no immediate belief that terrorism was involved, a spokesman said. The duties of the task force are expansive and will include determining whether the cache of documents and money is legitimate."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Administration Signals Willingness To Delay Port Deal. The Senate Armed Services Committee yesterday held a hearing on the Dubai Ports World deal to manage six US ports. A troupe of Administration officials were grilled by a panel of mostly Democratic senators on the deal. Meanwhile, the Administration indicated it was willing to delay the deal's closing in order to address congressional security concerns. Media reports continue to depict the White House handling of the issue in a negative light, and see President Bush facing tough political challenges as a result of the controversy. Reuters (2/24, Cornwell, Drees), for example, reports Bush remains "under fire," while the Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Feldmann, 61K) says Bush "faces a serious test of his political skill after blundering in dealings with members of his own party, analysts say. The man who once campaigned as a uniter appears to have done just that -- uniting both parties against him."

Yesterday, CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer) reported Deputy White House Chief of Staff Karl Rove had said in a radio interview that Bush "might accept a delay in the deal." CNN (Bash) added that Rove said it is important "to get members of Congress to a place where they have a good comfort level with letting this deal go through." The Financial Times (2/24, Kirchgaessner, Yeager) quotes Rove saying, "There are some regulatory hurdles that still needs to go through on the British side as well that are going to be concluded next week. There's no requirement that it close...immediately after that." Rove's comments "represent a departure from Mr Bush's staunch defence of the deal early this week."

On ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 4), George Stephanopoulos said the White House is "feeling snake-bit. I think the President is a little bit irritated that this port issue wasn't flagged for him earlier." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 3, 0:35, Axelrod) also reported, "What the White House has said is that they are open to a delay in the closing date. That would allow time for some of the issues raised by Congress to be addressed. The White House says they are fine with that. One thing, however, that the President says he will not back off on: that's the threat of a veto if there is legislation passed to kill the deal."

In a potentially significant development, USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) reports the United Arab Emirates company "offered Thursday to delay part of its $6.8 billion takeover" of some port operations. The announcement "relieves some pressure from a standoff between…Bush and Congress, which has threatened to block the deal because of the UAE's purported ties to terrorism." The delay "did not appease some of the deal's harshest critics," such as Sen. Chuck Schumer, but "one prominent Republican who had raised concerns about the deal appeared optimistic. 'This is definitely a positive step,' said Rep. Peter King of New York." Knight Ridder (2/24, Douglas) says the firm is "yielding to intense political pressure." The New York Times (2/24, Cloud, Sanger, 1.19M) reports the action "came after the Bush administration and leading members of Congress," including Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner, "quietly told the company that more time was needed to derail Congressional action to block the deal." The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Ben White, 744K) runs a similar piece titled "Uproar Surprised Dubai Firm." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Hitt, 2.11M) and Baltimore Sun (2/24, Shaw, 296K) run pieces on the company's move, which is also mentioned in many of the stories covering other aspects of the controversy.

Meanwhile, reporting on yesterday's Senate hearing, the CBS Evening News (2/23, story 4, 2:20, Schieffer) reported, "A squadron of Administration officials trooped up to Capitol Hill today to explain the arrangement. … They did not make much headway to say the least. Congressional outrage is still at a boil." CBS (Attkisson) added, "In a rare freewheeling session, officials from Treasury, Homeland Security, Defense and State, all responsible for approving the ports deal, agreed Congress should have been brought in sooner but insisted the national security impact was thoroughly researched." Democrats "accused the Bush Administration of thumbing its nose at a law that mandates a deeper investigation when a business deal could affect national security." Likewise, CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Koppel) reported that "after two and a half hours of back and forth and a steady stream of questions and answers, it didn't appear that the Administration was able to change many minds, or to head off legislation to block the deal as early as next week."

The Washington Times (2/24, Hurt, 90K) reports the Bush Administration's "assurances were met with disdain by Democrats," while the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Weisman, 744K) reports, "Despite the entreaties of the administration, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) said bipartisan legislation will be introduced next week to scuttle the deal, or at least to force a 45-day investigation into the deal's national security implications." The hearing "presented two very different views of the United Arab Emirates." The country "is seen by the administration as a stalwart and indispensable ally in the terrorism fight and by Senate Democrats as a base for terrorism and nuclear proliferation."

The Washington Post (2/24, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column, "Yesterday's meeting of the Senate Armed Services Committee felt like some weird role-reversal dream. There was Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), attacking Bush administration officials for being soft on terrorism and 'outsourcing our national security.' There was Gordon England, President Bush's deputy defense secretary, pleading with Democrats that 'it is very important that we strengthen the bonds of friendship and security with our friends and allies around the world.'"

The Washington Post (2/24, A6, Blustein, Pincus, 744K) reports on "a point emphasized by many people familiar with security operations at US ports: Among all the reasons to fret about vulnerabilities to terrorist attacks, the nationality of the companies managing the terminals is one of the least worrisome. … Nonetheless, politicians from both parties continue to pelt the Bush administration with criticism for its decision to allow Dubai Ports World… to buy Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co." Similarly, the New York Times (2/24, Romero, Timmons, 1.19M) says that "in the outcry over who should run America's seaport terminals, one clear trend appears to have been overlooked: American companies began withdrawing decades ago from the unglamorous business of stevedoring, ceding the now-booming industry to enterprises in Asia and the Middle East." So "it is no accident that American companies are not in the top ranks of global terminal operators, who have ridden the coattails of the explosion in world trade."

The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Blustein, 744K) reports this controversy "follows the flap last summer over the proposed purchase by Cnooc Ltd., a Chinese state-owned firm, of Unocal Corp., the California-based oil giant. … The twin episodes are reminiscent of the late 1980s and early 1990s, when takeovers by Japanese companies of US businesses such as movie studios inflamed American anxieties."

The AP (2/23, Bridis) reports, "The senior Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee angrily accused the Bush administration Thursday of ignoring the law by refusing to extend an investigation of a United Arab Emirates company's takeover of significant U.S. port operations. … Clashing with a Treasury Department official on a mission to calm a political uproar, Sen. Carl Levin said the law has language specifically requiring a longer review than the one that an interagency committee conducted, if a business deal could affect national security. … 'Is there not one agency in this government that believes this takeover could affect the national security of the United States?' the Michigan Democrat asked at a committee briefing. Chairman John Warner, R-Va., in a very unusual procedure on Capitol Hill, allowed reporters to question the administration witnesses." The AP adds, "The Treasury official, Deputy Secretary Robert Kimmitt, and officials from other agencies said a multiagency group spent three months reviewing the port deal and said that all concerns about security were satisfied. … Levin insisted that the law that established the multiagency panel specifically said that any such review should be lengthened by 45 days if it could have an impact on national security."

MarketWatch (2/24, Watts) reports, "Warner also expressed concern about the administration's interpretation of the law, and said he would ask Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to provide a written explanation."

Bloomberg (2/24, Bliss) reports, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the agreement includes provisions intended to enhance port security. … 'The United States government did request specific assurances from the parties involved in this transaction,' Gonzales said on CNBC. 'Those assurances have been given.' … He didn't give specifics. The Associated Press, citing documents obtained by the wire service, reported that DP World agreed to cooperate with U.S. investigations and reveal records on demand about 'foreign operational direction' of its business. The agreement doesn't force the company to keep copies of business records on U.S. soil, where they would be subject to court orders, the AP reported."

Gonzales Defends CFIUS Vetting Process. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales was asked on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/23) to describe the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States' vetting process. Gonzales said, "It's a very thorough vetting process that we're required to go through, in connection with acquisition of a US company by a foreign company or by a foreign country that may impact in an adverse way the national security of our country." The Department of Justice which is a member of the Committee on Foreign Investment "did our own independent assessment and made the determination that we had no reasons to raise an objection to this transaction going forward. We, all of us, have as our objective to ensure that our national security is not impaired in any way by this transaction."

New Jersey Sues To Block Port Deal. Reuters (2/23, Hurdle) reports, "New Jersey sued the U.S. federal government on Thursday to prevent a United Arab Emirates company from managing a terminal at the Port of Newark until security risks there have been fully assessed." Reuters continues, "The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Trenton seeks to bar state-owned Dubai Ports World from taking over the Newark facility as part of a deal under which it also would manage terminals at five other major U.S. ports following its takeover of P&O., a British company that had been operating the ports. … It claims the federal panel that approved the port-management takeover -- the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States -- failed to conduct a full investigation of the sale as required by law and it asks the court to order an investigation." Reuters adds, "New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine said the presence of the UAE company may threaten the security of an area that the FBI has called the most dangerous two miles in America because it also contains chemical plants, oil storage facilities, rail lines, and Newark Liberty International Airport. … The suit also claims the deal harms New Jersey's duty to ensure security at the port because it did not know what information was submitted by the UAE company or what assurances were offered on security. Failure to provide that information interferes with the state's sovereign rights under the 10th amendment of the U.S. Constitution, the suit says. … It names the Committee on Foreign Investments as well as Treasury Secretary John Snow, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff."

Chertoff Was Unaware Of Deal. The Washington Times (2/24, Scarborough, 90K) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff was not aware a Dubai-owned company was seeking to operate terminals in six U.S. ports and that his agency was leading the review until after the deal's approval, an administration official said yesterday." Chertoff's spokesman, Russ Knocke, "told The Washington Times the issue rose no higher than the department's assistant secretary for policy, Stewart Baker." Chertoff "is the third Cabinet official to acknowledge he did not know his agency had signed off on the plan."

Ehrlich Leaning Toward Accepting Deal. The Washington Post (2/24, B5, Mosk, 744K) reports Maryland Gov. Robert Ehrlich said it is "looking increasingly unlikely that he will try to block a United Arab Emirates company from taking over port operations in Baltimore." Ehrlich "said he is continuing to review the security concerns raised by the proposed purchase by Dubai Ports World of the British company that oversees the movement of cargo containers at the Baltimore port." But "when asked yesterday if he now agrees with President Bush and supports the sale, Ehrlich said, 'Clearly, the facts are moving in that direction.'"

Governors May Raise Port Issue With Bush On Monday. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Bush faces more port-security heat from governors. Some gathering for winter governors' meeting plan to raise the Dubai-ownership issue at White House on Monday, but New York's Pataki, a deal foe, won't attend following recent surgery."

Port Authority Would Break Lease To Block Deal. The New York Times (2/24, McGeehan, 1.19M) reports, "The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey will break the lease of a big container terminal at Port Newark to stop a company based in Dubai from taking over part of the operation there, the agency's chairman said yesterday." Anthony R. Coscia, the chairman, "said the company that holds a lease on the terminal through 2030 violated the contract by selling a half-interest in it to Dubai Ports World without seeking the landlord's approval. He said the Port Authority would ask a judge in New Jersey Superior Court in Newark today to affirm its right to end the lease."

Bob Dole's Lobbying Role In Deal Seen As Creating Political Problem For Elizabeth Dole. The Washington Post (2/24, A6, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "The lobbying of former Senate majority leader Robert J. Dole on behalf of the Dubai-owned company set to take over management of terminals at six major U.S. seaports is creating a political problem for his wife, Sen. Elizabeth Dole." The chairman of the North Carolina Democratic Party, Jerry Meek, yesterday "called on Sen. Dole to remove herself from 'any congressional oversight' of the Dubai port deal." A spokeswoman for Sen. Dole "rejected the criticism as 'a partisan attack' and defended the senator's role as a lawmaker and her husband's as a lobbyist." Former Sen. Dole "said in a written statement yesterday that he is not going to lobby his wife or members of Congress."

Rice Seeks To Calm Relations With UAE. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 5, 2:15, Schieffer) reported Rice

"also tried to play a part in calming the bitter feelings in the United Arab Emirates." CBS (Hawkins) added Rice "flew into the heart of the storm over the management of American seaports today. She said the United Arab Emirates is a good friend and a strong ally in the war on terrorism. Rice said there are no national security reasons to stop an Emirates-owned company, Dubai Ports World, from purchasing a British firm that manages six major commercial ports in the United States. After meeting with Secretary Rice, today the UAE's economy minister told me she thinks the political controversy in Washington is the result of an unfortunate misunderstanding." Lubna Bint Khalid Al Qasimi, UAE Minister of Economy: "This case actually got stopped politically rather than pure trade business. It may just raise concerns for a lot of people about thinking twice about investing in the US."

NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 5, 2:20, Gregory) also reported Rice "arrived in Dubai for meetings tonight, and the President's homeland security advisor argued the UAE turned over a new leaf after 9/11." Still, the Administration "extracted extra security concessions from Dubai Ports World as a condition" for the contract.

More Commentary. In an editorial titled "Reaping What You Sow," the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M) says, "If the administration is in trouble with Congress, it's long overdue. For years now, the White House has stonewalled Congressional committees attempting to carry out their oversight duties. Administration officials appearing before Senate and House committees have given testimony that was, to put it generously, knowingly misleading. … The chickens are coming home to roost. A White House that routinely brands anyone who disagrees with its positions as soft on terrorism is now complaining that election-bound lawmakers are callously using the ports deal to frighten voters."

The Washington Post (2/24, A14, 744K) editorializes that "the White House's 'admission' that President Bush was unaware" of the deal "strikes us as completely unnecessary. Why should the president know? Twelve government departments and agencies, including the departments of Treasury, State, Defense and Homeland Security, had examined the deal over a three-month period and found it acceptable. Perhaps the White House should have anticipated this week's political storm and prepared for it. But because the objections are irrational, even that complaint is questionable. … If members of Congress really want to burnish their 'tough on terrorism' credentials, they should start by focusing on real presidential lapses, which are sufficient, and forget about the phony ones."

Paul Krugman, writing in the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M), makes a similar point, and adds that "there is, nonetheless, a kind of rough justice in Mr. Bush's current predicament. After 9/11, the American people granted him a degree of trust rarely, if ever, bestowed on our leaders." He "abused that trust, and now he is facing a storm of skepticism about his actions -- a storm that sweeps up everything, things related and not."

Thomas Friedman writes in the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M), "As a country, we must not go down this road of global ethnic profiling -- looking for Arabs under our beds the way we once looked for commies. If we do -- if America, the world's beacon of pluralism and tolerance, goes down that road -- we will take the rest of the world with us. We will sow the wind and we will reap the whirlwind." He adds, "If there were a real security issue here, I'd join the critics. But the security argument is bogus and, I would add, borderline racist."

In the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Democrats loudly denounce any thought of racial profiling. But when that same Arab, attired in business suit and MBA, and with a good record of running ports in 15 countries, buys P&O, Democrats howl at the very idea of allowing Arabs to run our ports. … On this, the Democrats are rank hypocrites. But even hypocrites can be right." Krauthammer adds, "The greater and more immediate danger is that as soon as the Dubai company takes over operations, it will necessarily become privy to information about security provisions at crucial US ports. That would mean a transfer of information about our security operations -- and perhaps even worse, about the holes in our security operations -- to a company in an Arab state in which there might be employees who, for reasons of corruption or ideology, would pass this invaluable knowledge on to al-Qaeda types."

E.J. Dionne, in the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K), urges "a full-scale debate not only about this deal but about the larger flaws in our system of port security. That's the way to show the world that Americans take this issue seriously and are not engaged in an episode of Arab-bashing." Yesterday, Bush "insisted that the deal would leave our ports safe. … But many people in both parties are worried because they no longer take the administration's claims at face value. That, too, is progress."

In his Wall Street Journal column (2/24), Daniel Henninger writes, "One would not have thought it possible, but Washington's political class is defining our politics down. After nearly seven days of elevating the Cheney bird-hunting accident to the level of a national crisis, now comes this week's flap over managing the ports. To be sure, the matter of secure US ports trumps the hunting of quail as an affaire d'état. But it was the strikingly low quality of the politicians' commentary and behavior that attracted notice."

Chicago-Midway Temporarily Closed After Bomb Threat Found On Flight. The AP (2/24)

reports, "A written bomb threat was discovered on a flight from Seattle to Chicago Thursday, prompting aviation officials to temporarily close air traffic at Midway Airport. … The Chicago Police Department and the FBI's terrorism task force searched the plane and its luggage but no bomb had been found as of 5 p.m., said FBI spokesman Frank Bochte. Investigators were trying to determine where the note came from, including whether it was left on the plane by a passenger on a previous flight, he added."

Investigators Widen Search For New York Anthrax. The New York Times (2/24, Chan, 1.19M) reports, "The authorities widened their investigation into possible anthrax contamination yesterday to include an apartment in Crown Heights, Brooklyn, and medical officials were giving antibiotics to seven people who could have been exposed to the spores. An eight-member team from the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, including two epidemiologists, along with F.B.I. agents, took samples yesterday from the Manhattan apartment" of Vido Diomande, "the Brooklyn warehouse where he used animal skins to make drums for his African dance troupe and a Dodge van that he is believed to have used to transport the skins, which are a suspected source of the bacteria." WABC-TV New York (2/23) notes, "Federal agents are still investigating but there is nothing suspicious, they say, about Diomande's motives. Mark Mershon, Dir. NY F.B.I.: 'I will tell you that we have essentially ruled out any criminal intent here. We believe this largely to be simply an accidental infection.'"

Standards Issued For Government PIV Cards. The Washington Times (2/24, Harper, 90K) reports, "The National Institutes of Standards and Technology has issued the final specifications for standardized Personal Identity Verification cards required for all federal employees and civilian contractors by Oct. 27." The cards are being developed "in response to Homeland Security Presidential Directive 12, an order issued in 2004 by President Bush for mandatory, standard governmentwide IDs." They incorporate "holograms, bar codes, microprinting and encrypted computer chips, which include signatures and personal demographic information, according to Identity Alliance, a private Indiana-based security firm."

White House Report Takes Responsibility For Katrina Response, Calls For Reforms. Days after a special House committee released a damning report on the response to Hurricane Katrina, the White House released its own 228-page report that acknowledged its own role in the flawed response. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 3, 2:30, Sawyer) said the report "has a full-on mea culpa, the government taking the blame, and issuing 125 recommendations to improve the response to the next catastrophe." ABC (L. Stark) added that the admission of failures is "something this Administration is not used to doing." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 6, 0:35, Schieffer) says the report "urges quick action in 11 key areas before hurricane season begins in June." CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer) called the report "packed with recommendations." But NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 4, 2:05, O'Donnell) reported senior officials "were notably careful to avoid finger pointing, except for a direct jab at former FEMA Director Michael Brown." Indeed, Reuters (2/23, Zakaria) reports that the document "did not single out anyone for blame."

USA Today (2/24, 5A, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports that the "Lessons Learned" study "called for 125 fixes, including better communications, better evacuation plans and first aid training for students." President Bush's homeland security adviser Frances Fragos Townsend, who prepared the report, said, "FedEx can track a package anywhere in the world, real-time. FEMA should be able to do the same thing for ice, water and food." In its front-page story, the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Lee, Fletcher, 744K) says the White House report was "softer in tone" than the House study, but "echoed" many of its findings.

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Chen, 958K) writes that the study "essentially confirmed what has become conventional public wisdom: that there were systemic failures across the federal bureaucracy." Townsend said "a new 'culture of preparedness'" is needed. The New York Times (2/24, Lipton, 1.19M) reports that the recommendations "would reverse some of the steps" taken after September 11, 2001 to centralize responsibility, but some critics "worry that diffusing responsibilities among agencies could leave no one clearly in charge and not produce results." University of Maryland domestic security expert Michael Greenberger said, "This may simply be rearranging the deck chairs on the Titanic." The Washington Times (2/24, Curl, 90K) and Knight Ridder (2/24, Borenstein) run similar stories on the release of the report.

President Bush and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff also commented on the report yesterday. The AP (2/23, Jordan) quotes Bush saying, "We will learn from the lessons of the past to better protect the American people. … I wasn't satisfied with the federal response." Chertoff "commended" the White House recommendations, saying, "We have already begun to take action to address many of the issues raised in the report, particularly those areas we need to improve before the start of the 2006 hurricane season." However, Fox News' Special Report (2/23, Cameron) pointed out that the report "chastises the Department of Homeland Security for poor planning and communication."

column, under the headline "Acts Of Heroism Shine Through Homeland Security's Humiliation," Stephen Barr writes that while DHS "wiseguys" say "the brass has decided to rate the performance of employees on a five-level system," from "role model" at the top to "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" at the bottom, many people at Homeland Security performed bravely and exceptionally during Katrina. Barr writes that "some of the most interesting findings" in the White House report "are in Appendix B -- 'What Went Right,'" which highlights some of the individuals who made a positive difference.

Chertoff-Brown Relationship Seen As Crux Of Communications Failures. The Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Grier, 61K) writes that five months after Katrina, "one cause of the stumbling response…is becoming increasingly apparent: Two of the most important officials involved, Chertoff and Brown, did not get along." Chertoff "is by-the-book, a lean, terse manager. Brown is a talkative maverick who believes in leadership from the front lines. In Hollywood, that's a buddy movie; in real life, it was a recipe for delayed orders and crossed communications."

Residents Of Mississippi Town Feel Abandoned By Federal Government. The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 7, 2:50, Pitts) reported on the recovery of Pearlington, Mississippi, "already one of the poorest towns in the nation's poorest state long before Hurricane Katrina. But look at it now. Nearly six months later, no running water, no schools, only occasional mail service. There is even a coffin still washed up in the street, refrigerators scattered in trees. Residents say Pearlington would have died if not for the store. And it's a store like no other in America, where everything's free." It's the "old grade school gymnasium turned clothing store, grocery store, all donations from across the country, a place where neighbors can wash clothes, take a shower and talk." Pearlington was "once home to nearly 2,000 people. There are now only about 600 left, mostly retirees. Some refuse to leave, some can't. And to a person nearly every one feel abandoned by the Federal Government, so they rely on each other and the kindness of strangers."

Hurricane Cleanup Process Said To Waste Money, Time. The New York Times (2/24, Eaton, 1.19M) reports on the "dozens of courthouse disputes and public controversies that have erupted over the still-gargantuan task of removing tons of debris in Louisiana and Mississippi, almost six months after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. Government officials, contractors and workers all describe a complicated and bureaucratic process that wastes money, slows the cleanup and fails to ensure that the economic benefits of the work go to the people who need them most, the residents of the disaster areas." Approximately halfway through the article, the Times adds, "Officials of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Army Corps of Engineers, which handle much of the contracting for debris removal, say the agencies are satisfied with the cleanup's pace, given the magnitude of the task," noting "that Hurricane Katrina created twice as much debris as the four 2004 hurricanes in Florida combined."

Gulf Coast Houses Of Worship Struggle To Recover. USA Today (2/24, Konigsmark, Moore, 2.31M) reports that following Katrina's destruction, Gulf Coast "churches, temples and mosques have struggled not only to rebuild their homes but to re-gather their members. An estimated 900 houses of worship in the Gulf region were damaged, destroyed or unusable after the hurricanes, according to Religion News Service." USA Today notes that in December, the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund announced "that $20 million of the $90 million it will spend in the region will go to churches and other houses of worship, which are not eligible for public rebuilding funds."

Search Continues For Some Children Displaced By Katrina. USA Today (2/24, Koch, 2.31M) reports that though the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children says 97% of children displaced by Katrina are back with parents or other relatives, families "continue to search for at least 131 children whom they have not heard from since" the storm swept through the Gulf region. The center has heard from relatives who say they still don't know the whereabouts of 131 children — five in Mississippi and the rest in Louisiana, mostly New Orleans. The Find Family National Call Center in Baton Rouge, a joint federal and state effort, lists 1,960 people as missing, of whom 245 are age 20 or younger."

WAR NEWS:

Bombing Of Shiite Shrine Generates Wave Of Sectarian Violence In Iraq. A wave of Sunni-Shiite violence swept over Iraq in the wake of the bombing of the Askariya shrine in Samarra, even as US and Iraqi authorities appealed for calm. USA Today (2/24, Nichols, Komarow, 2.31M) reports "Iraq's government announced it would impose a daytime curfew today in hopes of quelling sectarian violence that exploded across the country this week, threatening to spark civil war and derail efforts to form a new government." The Washington Times/AP (2/24, Reid) says "such a sweeping daytime curfew indicated the depth of fear within the government that the crisis could touch off a Sunni-Shi'ite civil war."

In an article describing the political talks on the formation of a new government as "in ruins" the New York Times (2/24, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The threat of full-scale civil war loomed." The Times adds that the violence "provoked questions about the proper role of the American military, its ability to control powerful Shiite militias,…and the Bush administration's plans for drawing down troops." Another New York Times (2/24, Weisman, Worth, 1.19M) story says the violence "has abruptly thrown the Bush administration on the defensive," while "Iraqis and some American officials also said the Bush administration might have to rethink its political strategy in Baghdad." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/24, A1, Finer, Sebi, 744K) reports the "prospects for a political resolution suffered Thursday when Sunni Arab political leaders abruptly withdrew from talks with Iraq's Shiite ruling parties, blaming the police and army for failing to prevent retaliatory attacks -- and, in some cases, for participating in them."

The Financial Times (2/24, Negus, Dombey, Sevastopulo) reports "hopes that Iraq's rival factions would come together to build a government of national unity faded on Thursday," and the Los Angeles Times (2/24, Stack, Roug, 958K) says the "faltering political process seemed on the verge of collapse." The Washington Times (2/24, Behn, 90K) quotes US Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch telling reporters yesterday, "We're not seeing civil war igniting in Iraq." Reuters (2/24, Bohan) reports State Department Deputy Spokesman Adam Ereli also "disagreed that the political process was stalled and that there was chaos. 'Let's not blow this out of proportion. It's not a straight line with the same amount of movement every single day. I t is a path with twists and turns. We all know that, and that's always been the case,' Ereli told reporters." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Shishkin, Dreazen, 2.11M) reports that "from President Bush on down, US officials have warned repeatedly that there would be tough patches -- such as the current one -- on the road to a rebuilt Iraq." Still, "the split between Sunnis and Shiites is widening precisely at the time US strategists had hoped it would be starting to narrow."

The story was the lead on each of the networks, which also ran follow-up reports. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, lead story, 2:55, Vargas) "more than 130 Iraqis are dead. Seven US soldiers were killed. And more than 100 mosques, according to some reports, were attacked. Today, President Bush appealed for calm on all sides." President Bush: "The voices of reason, from all aspects of Iraqi life, understand that this bombing is intended to create civil strife. But the act was an evil act. Destruction of a holy site is a political act intending to create strife." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 1, 3:45, Dozier) said "it is the worst crisis this country has faced since Saddam fell," while NBC Nightly News (2/23, lead story, 2:45, Williams) reported "US military commanders in Iraq say they don't believe that nation will dissolve into civil war," but "tonight there are indications to the contrary." NBC (Boettcher) added, "Iraq was on full alert, but the death toll and tensions rose, and US hopes that Iraqis can form a national government of unity sunk." If al Qaeda "did this, its plan is working."

The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 2, 2:10, Axelrod) reported that "the President made sure to frame these pictures as the product of terrorists, not an internal Iraqi versus Iraqi Sunni-Shia meltdown." While Administration officials "say the violence appears to them to be dying down, Democratic Congressman John Murtha, a former Marine colonel whose among the most outspoken critics of the war, says the Administration is misjudging."

CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Starr) reported, "Sources tell CNN that at the highest levels of the US military the situation is being carefully watched to see if Iraqi security forces can take control across the country. US forces expect to remain in the background so their presence does not spark more violence. … The next 24 to 48 hours are considered critical by US commanders." CNN also reported, "Do not expect to see any more US troops being sent to Iraq to deal with the violence. It will be the major responsibility of Iraqi security forces." Similarly, ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 2, 2:25, Raddatz) reported "a senior military official tells ABC News that in the coming days, US forces will essentially sit back and watch Iraqi forces try to quell any violence, fearing that the US presence would inflame the situation." However, added ABC, "if a "prolonged civil war broke out, and the American military was unable to contain it, it could eventually hasten withdrawal." The Washington Post (2/24, A11, Graham, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "US Looks To Baghdad To Deal With Violence." The Knight Ridder (2/24, Landay) reports, "The situation 'calls into question a fundamental premise of our strategy in Iraq,' said a senior U.S. intelligence official, who…spoke on condition of anonymity because he wasn't authorized to discuss the crisis publicly."

USA Today (2/24, Nichols, Komarow, 2.31M) reports Sen. John Kerry "said the fresh violence underscores the Bush administration's failure to achieve a political solution -- a unity government -- in Iraq. 'It gets dicier as each day goes by,' he said. 'The clock is ticking.'"

The New York Times (2/24, Tavernise, 1.19M) reports "the violence on Wednesday was the closest Iraq had come to civil war, and Iraqis were stunned."

The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Daragahi, 958K) runs a story headlined "Clerics Take Lead After Iraq Bombing," in which it says "the religious leaders are notable for their lack of direct contact with American officials. Sistani, for example, has refused to meet with any since the US-led invasion of Iraq. Forces loyal to Sadr fought U.S. Marines in Najaf in the summer of 2004. And the vehemently anti-U.S. Muslim Scholars Assn. is believed to have close ties to the insurgency."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M) editorializes that Bush "should not underestimate his personal popularity among Shiites and the extent to which his words can have a calming effect. His statements condemning the mosque attack have been helpful but don't go far enough. A televised address to Iraqis would be in order -- or perhaps even a visit to convene a conference of national unity and seal an agreement on a new government. The most important thing now is that ordinary Shiites not feel abandoned."

The New York Times editorializes that the bombing "was a deliberate attempt to make it politically impossible to create a national unity government capable of leading Iraq to democratic stability. So far, the bombers have been successful," but "it shouldn't be this easy for a handful of mosque bombers to undo the modest but real" democratic progress.

Eliot A. Cohen, Professor of Strategic Studies at Johns Hopkins University's School of Advanced International Studies, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M), "We may succeed in Iraq; we may also fail. Whether we do, however, depends partly on our skillful intervention, more on the attitudes and behavior of the Iraqis themselves, and even in the best case, on our willingness to persevere."

USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) editorializes, "Options are further limited because the United States has handed power to Iraqis -- and an Iraqi government can ask U.S. forces to leave. Even so, a reassessment is overdue of how Iraqi forces are manned and trained, perhaps with international help."

Rumsfeld To Discuss War On Terror At Truman Library. The Washington Post (2/24, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld plans to visit the Harry S. Truman library in Independence, Missouri next week "to talk about President Bush 's war on terrorism and Truman's launching the long struggle against international communism." The Post adds, "The speech is still being worked on, so Pentagon folks won't talk about it. And they caution that the event may yet be scrubbed. But spokeswoman Hollen Wheeler allowed that the library would be an 'appropriate venue for his message that day.'"

In 2000, Gore Affirmed Commitment To Ousting Saddam. In its "History Lessons" column the Washington Times (2/24, 90K) excerpts a June 26, 2000 joint statement by then-Vice President Al Gore and leaders of the Iraqi National Congress. The statement, released by Gore's office, said, "The Vice President reaffirmed the Administration's strong commitment to the objective of removing Saddam Hussein from power, and to bringing him and his inner circle to justice for their war crimes and crimes against humanity. Saddam's removal is the key to the positive transformation of Iraq's relationship with the international community and with the United States, in particular."

Ted Koppel Says US Interest In Iraq Is "About The Oil." Retired anchor and managing editor of the ABC program "Nightline" Ted Koppel writes in an op-ed in the New York Times (2/24, 1.19M), "The Bush administration's touchiness about charges that we acted -- and are still acting -- in Iraq 'because of oil'" is "curious," as "keeping oil flowing out of the Persian Gulf and through the Strait of Hormuz has been bedrock American foreign policy for more than a half-century." He adds, "If those considerations did not enter into the Bush administration's calculations when the president ordered the invasion of Iraq in 2003, it would have been the first time in more than 50 years that the uninterrupted flow of Persian Gulf oil was not a central element of American foreign policy." In fact, "the reason for America's rapt attention to the security of the Persian Gulf is what it has always been. It's about the oil."

Gonzales Rings In Stock Exchange. KCBS-TV Los Angeles (2/23, 6:44 a.m.) showed "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales ringing the opening bell at the New York Stock Exchange" on Thursday morning.

WPIX-TV San Francisco (2/23, 6:46 a.m.) added that Gonzales rang the bell "along with CEOs from several companies listed on the big board."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Timing Of Disclosure Is Focus Of Enron Testimony. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Emshwiller, McWilliams) reports, "Proceedings yesterday in the conspiracy and fraud trial of former Enron Corp. top executives Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling touched on a question that could help determine whether the two men are convicted: Is an executive guilty of illegally hiding information if his company a short time later discloses it?" The Journal continues, "This issue came up during the third day of testimony by Paula Rieker, Enron's former corporate secretary and deputy investor-relations chief. Ms. Rieker, who took the stand as a government witness as part of an agreement in which she pleaded guilty to an Enron-related crime, previously testified that Messrs. Lay and Skilling had made misleading public statements about Enron's operations. … In at least one other controversial case, Enron disclosed more in its Securities and Exchange Commission filings than its executives did in public utterances. This involved outside partnerships run by Enron's then-chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, which did large amounts of business with the company." The Journal adds, "Purportedly hidden deals with these partnerships are a central part of the government's fraud allegations. Part of the defense in this case is that Enron did make disclosures -- albeit extremely dense and complex ones -- about the partnerships in SEC filings, even though Mr. Lay and other executives refused to answer questions about them in the weeks before the bankruptcy filing. … Yesterday's sparring between the defense attorneys and Ms. Rieker addressed this issue. In questioning, Bruce Collins, one of Mr. Lay's attorneys, focused on a claim by Ms. Rieker that the company had mischaracterized earnings from the company's high-profile retail-electricity unit, known as Enron Energy Services. Ms. Rieker said much of the unit's earnings in parts of 2000 and 2001 came from gains on stock sales and not from its "core" business of supplying energy and energy services to corporate and other customers. Enron officials didn't disclose those stock sales in various public statements, even after Ms. Rieker said she warned Mr. Lay, who was Enron's chairman, about the matter in 2000."

Lay Attorney Profiled. The Deal (2/24, Poole) profiles Ken Lay's attorney Mike Ramsey, who the Deal reports, "is now working on the biggest case in his life -- defending former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay, who faces seven criminal charges, including conspiracy and securities and wire fraud in advance of the company's collapse in late 2001. … In 1996, Ramsey successfully defended executives from Oxford Funding in a major bank fraud and conspiracy trial arguing prosecutorial misconduct. He secured an acquittal for cancer researcher Stanislaw Burzynski on fraud allegations in 1997. He won a case involving cross-dressing New York real estate heir Robert Durst, who was charged with killing an elderly neighbor, cutting his body into pieces and dumping them in Galveston Bay. … So it's not surprising that court watchers are thinking he'll get Ken Lay off, too." The Deal adds, "Ramsey is a man of simple tastes. He prefers black cowboy boots to lace-ups with his business suits. His office is in a residential neighborhood, not in a shiny office tower downtown. For lunch he often has peanut butter crackers and milk in the courthouse cafeteria. He works slowly and methodically, both in his physical movements and his questioning in court. Some casual observers would think maybe the 65-year-old is a little senile. … Far from it. Ramsey has a sharp mind, so sharp that he has to read a document only once to understand and remember it. … And Ramsey has a long memory, as everyone saw the first week of the Enron trial, when he remembered which articles had been read in their entirety and which ones had not when the judge handling the case, Simeon T. Lake III, could not."

Fannie Mae Report Faults Accounting, "Arrogance" In Fraud Case. Fannie Mae released a massive report Thursday that "found fault with the corporate culture of 'arrogance' under former CEO Franklin Raines but blamed the mortgage giant's accounting problems" on ex-CFO Timothy Howard and ex-Controller Leanne Spencer, USA Today (2/24, 1B, Farrell) reports. The report came after a 17-month investigation headed by ex-Sen. Warren Rudman into Fannie's $11 billion accounting fraud. The Washington Post (2/24, A1, Shin) reports that the study "found 'no indication' that Raines knew the degree to which accounting rules had been ignored under his leadership." However, his "imprint is palpable" throughout the tome, which says he "oversaw a 'culture of arrogance'" at Fannie Mae. The Financial Times (2/24, Hughes, Swann) says Treasury Undersecretary for Domestic Finance Randy Quarles, commenting on the report, said Fannie "still poses a systemic threat to financial markets." All three of these newspaper stories note that the report runs a whopping 2,652 pages. (A 34-page executive summary was also released.)

The New York Times (2/24, Labaton, Dash) says the report concluded that senior Fannie executives "manipulated" accounting so they themselves could receive "more than $27 million" in bonuses. The conclusions come as the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, which oversees Fannie, considers whether to force some of them to return bonuses; the Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department are also investigating. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A2, Hagerty) says the report "doesn't point to major new problems beyond those already identified by regulators and acknowledged by Fannie over the past two years."

The Washington Post (2/24, D1, Hilzenrath) writes that "in another time, or another company, success might have been riding on the basics," but "in the modern corporation, the core mission of delivering products or services can seem like a sideshow to the accounting machinations that ultimately determine the bottom line." In fact, even after a year and a half at work, "even the lawyers and accountants who labored to produce the report aren't entirely sure what happened."

The AP (2/23, Gordon) reports, "Fannie Mae's former finance chief and controller share primary responsibility for the accounting failures at the mortgage company struggling to emerge from an $11 billion scandal, a company-ordered report said Thursday." The AP continues, "It detailed a breakdown in financial controls and found an arrogant corporate culture at the government-sponsored company that is the biggest U.S. financer of home mortgage loans." The AP adds, "No major new accounting problems were cited in the report that followed an 17-month investigation by a team led by former Sen. Warren Rudman, R-N.H. … But there are many details. For example, Fannie Mae in 1998 was said to have improperly put off accounting for $200 million in expenses to future periods so executives could collect $27 million in bonuses. Rudman's inquiry affirmed this. … Documents cited in the report show that top-level management was focused on the $200 million deferral and meeting earnings targets that would trigger the payment of full bonuses." The AP notes, "Fannie Mae employees falsified signatures on accounting transactions that helped the company meet the 1998 earnings targets, according to the former director of the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight. The agency first discovered the accounting-rule violations and earnings manipulation by Fannie Mae. … Rudman's report said Fannie Mae's former chairman and chief executive, Franklin Raines, contributed to a culture of arrogance at the Washington-based company."

Dow Jones (2/23, Burns) reports, "A new report on accounting problems at Fannie Mae may accelerate an ongoing Securities and Exchange Commission investigation, but lawyers say any charges or settlements may be more than a year away." The report's findings "won't come as a surprise to prosecutors or SEC lawyers who received weekly briefings on Rudman's investigation. Rudman said his team cooperated fully with the Justice Department, the SEC and other regulators during the 17-month investigation. … 'They know everything that's in this report already,' said one lawyer who declined to be identified by name. … SEC spokesman John Nester declined to comment, as did Justice Department spokesman Drew Wade."

Fannie Mae To Examine Pay Deal With Former CFO. Reuters (2/23) reports, "Fannie Mae will reexamine its former chief financial officer's post-employment compensation package, the company's chairman told Reuters on Thursday after an internal review blamed the old management team for a multibillion-dollar accounting scandal. … 'I would simply say that all options are on the table,' Fannie Mae Chairman Stephen Ashley said." Reuters adds, "The chairman said Fannie Mae's board would wait for results from other ongoing probes into the company's accounting problems. Investigations by the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, Securities & Exchange Commission and Justice Department remain open."

WSJournal Says Fannie "Routinely Flouted Both The Rules And Law." Under the headline "Fannie's Funny Business," the Wall Street Journal (2/24) editorializes, "The report's main findings paint the picture of a company that routinely flouted both the rules and law." It lets Raines "off lightly, blaming him mainly for a 'culture' that tolerated the accounting abuses. But the core of that culture was a belief that critics -- including us -- could be dismissed and assailed because the company knew it had Congress bought and paid for. And judging by the laughably weak reform that Financial Services Chairman Mike Oxley passed through the House, it still does. If Republicans on Capitol Hill want to know why voters think they've gone native, the failure to rein in Fannie even after a $10.8 billion accounting scandal is Exhibit A."

Judge Denies Request To Toss Adelphia Settlement. Reuters (2/24) reports, "A federal judge in Manhattan on Thursday rejected a bid by creditors of Adelphia Communications Corp. to throw out a $715 million settlement to compensate investors who lost money in the bankrupt cable company's collapse in 2002." Reuters continues, "Bankruptcy Judge Robert Gerber initially rejected the creditor's efforts to throw out the settlement. But the unsecured creditors, unhappy at the prospect of shareholders being paid ahead of them, appealed." Reuters adds, "In his ruling, U.S. District Court Judge Lewis Kaplan wrote that he agreed with the bankruptcy judge's decision and rejected the creditors' claims that the government had forced Adelphia into settling. … To avoid indictment, Adelphia reached the settlement with the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission in April 2005. Under its terms, the founding Rigas family agreed to forfeit more than 95 percent of its assets."

Dow Jones (2/24) reports, "In his order Thursday, Judge Kaplan found the company wasn't coerced and agreed with the bankruptcy judge that the assets being used in the restitution fund aren't part of the debtors' estate, but are part of a fund to be created and owned by the government. … 'Moreover, it is worth noting that if Adelphia had rejected the government's proposal and the government succeeded in forfeiting (Adelphia's) assets, the government's interest in the assets would have been superior to those of the creditors in any case,' Kaplan said in his order. … John Rigas and his son Timothy were convicted in 2004 of pocketing more than $ 2 billion from Adelphia (ADELQ) for their own personal use and misleading investors about the company's finances and performance. … Timothy Rigas, the company's one-time chief financial officer, was sentenced to 20 years in prison, while his father was sentenced to 15 years in prison. Both men remain free on bail pending appeal."

HealthSouth To Settle Class Action For $445 Million. The AP (2/24, Reeves) reports, "HealthSouth Corp. said Thursday it had reached a $445 million preliminary agreement to settle federal lawsuits resulting from a massive financial fraud that nearly drove the rehabilitation chain to ruin." The AP continues, "The Birmingham-based company will pay $215 million in common stock and warrants under the global settlement, and insurance companies will pay another $230 million in cash." The AP adds, "Investors involved in class action suits filed in federal court also will receive 25 percent of anything the company eventually gets in its lawsuit against fired chief executive Richard Scrushy, former auditor Ernst & Young and UBS, HealthSouth's former investment bank."

The New York Times (2/24, Whitmire) reports, "In March 2003, federal investigators raided HealthSouth's headquarters (in Birmingham, AL) and exposed what was then estimated to be a $2.7 billion accounting fraud. More recent restatements have estimated the fraud to be in excess of $4 billion. … After the fraud was exposed, 15 HealthSouth executives pleaded guilty to criminal charges, including all five of the company's chief financial officers. One former financial executive, Hannibal Crumpler, known as Sonny, was found guilty at trial. … In June 2005, a jury in Birmingham acquitted Mr. Scrushy of all criminal charges that he participated in the fraud. He still faces numerous civil suits in the case."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Lawyers Seek Dismissal Of Leak Indictment. CNN's The Situation Room (2/23, Blitzer) reported that Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, Lewis Libby has asked a federal judge to dismiss his indictment in the CIA leak case. Libby's lawyers say special prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald "lacks the authority to pursue the charges because he was not appointed by the President with consent of the US Senate." Fox News' Special Report (2/23, Hume) noted, "The motion was not unexpected, Libby's lawyers having said earlier that month they would file it. It's considered a longshot to win." The Washington Post (2/24, A5, Leonnig) reports that Libby's attorneys argued that "Fitzgerald was improperly appointed by the Justice Department instead of the president to investigate the leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. That means his work and the charges of perjury, making false statements and obstructing justice brought against Libby in October are invalid, they said in court papers filed yesterday." The Post adds, "Other documents released with their filings show that by August 2004, eight months after beginning his investigation, Fitzgerald had amassed a large amount of evidence suggesting that Libby was lying to investigators. Libby's accounts of conversations with administration officials and reporters about Plame conflicted with others offered by virtually every administration official and reporter questioned by Fitzgerald's investigators." The Post notes, "Also yesterday, Fitzgerald asked U.S. District Court Judge Reggie B. Walton for permission to explain a 'factual matter' in a sealed filing that concerns his ongoing grand jury investigation and the reasons Fitzgerald believes he cannot release some of the documents Libby's defense lawyers are seeking."

Reuters (2/23) reports, "Since both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft removed themselves from the investigation because of their close ties to the White House … Fitzgerald reports to David Margolis, a career Justice Department lawyer." Libby's attorneys "argued that because Fitzgerald does not report to the attorney general, he should not have been appointed by a deputy at the Justice Department. … 'Because he was not appointed to that office by the president with the advice and consent of the Senate, he holds that authority improperly,' Libby's lawyers wrote." Reuters notes that Fitzgerald "was picked by then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey in December 2003 to investigate who leaked" Valerie Plame's identity.

The AP (2/23, Locy) reports, "The lawyers said illegal assignment of 'unsupervised and undirected power' to Fitzgerald requires that he be relieved of his duties in the investigation and that all actions he has taken be voided." The AP adds, "Unlike every other federal prosecutor, Fitzgerald did not have to seek approval from senior Justice Department officials to grant immunity or subpoena reporters and news organizations. Nor did he have to advise senior Justice officials before he sought Libby's indictment. … 'The attorney general may delegate powers but he may not abdicate responsibility,' Libby's lawyers wrote."

USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) also reports that Libby's lawyers said Fitzgerald "is operating outside the supervision of the attorney general, as required by federal law." The Washington Times (2/24, Seper, 90K) also reports on the defense motion.

Judge To Hear Arguments Today On Defense Request For Classified Documents. The AP (2/24) reports, "Defense lawyers and Mr. Fitzgerald are to appear in Federal District Court here on Friday to argue defense requests for classified records and evidence gathered by the prosecution about reporters who learned about" CIA operative Valerie Plame "from officials other than Libby."

Senators Call For Special Prosecutor To Probe Abramoff Ties To Pacific Territories. Democratic Sens. Jeff Bingaman and Ken Salazar are calling on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to appoint a special prosecutor to investigate lobbyist Jack Abramoff's activities in Guam and the Northern Mariana Islands. The Los Angeles Times (2/24, Roche, 958K) reports that in a letter made public yesterday the Senators "asked Gonzales to provide the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee with a secret Justice Department report on security risks" in the two island territories. In their letter, the Senators "noted that the report was prompted by concerns that the islands might provide an entryway for terrorists in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks on the U.S. mainland. Also noted in the report were the substantial U.S. military assets in the Pacific islands that could be at risk."

Federal Grand Jury Indicts 32 Alleged Mobsters On Racketeering Charges. The New York Times (2/24, Preston) reports, "A Genovese crime family boss has been charged with capital murder, accused of ordering a mob killing — with help from his lawyer — while he was locked away in prison, federal and state authorities announced yesterday." The Times continues, "The mobster, Liborio S. Bellomo, 49, authorized the 1998 murder of Ralph Coppola, a member of the Genovese crew, according to a federal indictment unsealed yesterday in Manhattan. At the time of the killing, Mr. Bellomo was the acting Genovese boss although he was serving a 10-year sentence in federal prison for extortion, said Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney for the Southern District of New York." The Times adds, "Mr. Garcia said Peter J. Peluso, a New York lawyer who frequently represented Genovese members, communicated Mr. Bellomo's order to execute Mr. Coppola from the prison to Genovese henchmen. Mr. Peluso pleaded guilty last July to serving as a messenger in the murder plot, Mr. Garcia said, and also admitted taking part in racketeering, extortion and obstruction of justice. … The indictment, which names 32 people as members of the Genovese family, including Mr. Bellomo, is a result of a three-year racketeering investigation of the family's operations in the Bronx and Westchester. Twenty-nine defendants were arrested yesterday, and the arrests of two others are pending. Mr. Bellomo is currently in federal prison in Coleman, Fla. Mr. Peluso has been cooperating with prosecutors, Mr. Garcia said. His information appears to have been crucial for the broad racketeering charges, and for yesterday's arrests."

Reuters (2/24, Kearney) reports, "The indictments cover charges spanning more than a decade and come after a 3 1/2-year investigation," Garcia said. "Several of the accused already were in jail and others were arrested on Thursday, when the indictments were unsealed. … 'Any time you take out top leader leadership of an organization charged with serious crimes ... you have to believe you are having an impact,' Garcia said at a news conference, declining to further assess the relative strength of the family." The AP also reports on the indictments.

Defense Rests At Ryan Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/24) reports, "Lawyers for former Illinois Gov. George Ryan rested their case Thursday at his public corruption trial. … Before sending jurors home for the weekend, the judge said there would be more rebuttal witnesses from prosecutors on Monday. She said closing arguments might get under way a week after that."

Judge Issues Limited Gag Order After Prosecutors Assail TV Comments By Ryan's Wife. The Chicago Tribune (O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "Federal prosecutors on Thursday blasted former Gov. George Ryan's lawyer, accusing him of orchestrating a bid to influence the jury in the trial's 11th hour after Ryan's wife," in Wednesday TV interviews, "contended that her husband was indicted because of his death-penalty stance and that he decided against testifying because witnesses can't tell their stories in the courtroom." US District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer "issued a limited gag order barring comments about the integrity of the trial or the motivations of lawyers on either side of the case."

Close Campbell Friend Testifies About Delivering Bribes. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/24, Warren, Suggs, 430K) reports that at the corruption trial of former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell Thursday, businessman Dan DeBardelaben – Campbell's "longtime friend and golfing buddy" – "told jurors how, on three occasions in 1999, he delivered thousands of dollars in cash bribes from city contractor Samuel J. Barber Jr. directly to Campbell." DeBardelaben testified that "five days after the last payment to Campbell…the city approved an emergency authorization of $3 million to Barber's company…bypassing competitive bids" for the Y2K upgrade project. The Journal-Constitution notes, "Even lead defense attorney Billy Martin called DeBardelaben…a 'pivotal witness' for the government," and "Martin told the judge he may subpoena prosecutors and an FBI agent because he believes there should be more written documents showing DeBardelaben's statements about the case over the years that could be used to show inconsistencies." WSB-TV Atlanta (2/23) and WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/23, Carnes, King) also reports on DeBardelaben's testimony.

Alleged Philadelphia Latin Kings Leader Testifies In Own Defense. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/24, Anastasia, 423K) reports, "William 'King Homicide' Sosa, charged with heading a Latin Kings street gang that engaged in drug dealing, murder, kidnapping and rape, told a federal jury yesterday that violence and narcotics trafficking are 'against the rules' of the Almighty Latin King and Queen Nation. Taking the witness stand in his defense, Sosa…acknowledged that some 'rotten apples' had given the Latin Kings a bad reputation, but said that he neither took part in nor condoned criminality during the four-year period that federal prosecutors say he headed the Philadelphia branch of the national organization." The Inquirer notes that Sosa also said his nickname, Homicide, "stood for a Humble Oppressed Mind Increases through Cultural Independence a Desire for Education," although "prosecutors…have used witness testimony and evidence gathered during a three-year FBI investigation to portray Sosa as a volatile crime boss who embodied a more traditional interpretation of the nickname."

Government Witnesses Set To Take Stand In New York Mob Trial. The New York Times (2/24, Feuer) reports, "No one expects a Mafia defector to be Eagle Scout material. There is, after all, much truth to the adage that to catch a thief, it helps to have been one. … Nonetheless, the four informants scheduled to testify at the federal trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will each take the stand with résumés that might have impressed Capone. According to a letter filed yesterday by prosecutors in the case, the men have collectively committed a smorgasbord of crimes." The Times continues, "Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64, are former New York City police detectives charged with participating in at least eight killings as assassins for the mob. Their trial is to begin next month in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, nearly a year to the day after they were arrested on the Las Vegas Strip. … Prosecutors plan to introduce as witnesses two long-standing Mafia informants and a pair of turncoats specifically recruited for the case. Under law, prosecutors are required to disclose their witnesses' criminal histories, and in this case they include more criminal charges than the indictment. One of the witnesses is Alphonse D'Arco, former acting boss of the Luchese family, which employed the two defendants, prosecutors say. Mr. D'Arco has a conviction record that lists extortion, murder, murder conspiracy, robbery, arson, tax evasion, counterfeiting, narcotics trafficking, burglary, hijacking and assault, the prosecutors' letter says."

Witness In Gotti Trial Tells Of Life "On The Shelf." The New York Times (2/24, Hartocollis) reports, "His marriage collapsed after his girlfriend gave birth to his son. His income dried up because he could not run his extortion rackets from the federal prison where he was being held on mob-related charges. … But the most frightening moment for Michael DiLeonardo, a captain in the Gambino crime family, was when his girlfriend conveyed a message to him from Pete Gotti, the official leader of the family and the brother of the late boss John J. Gotti. … Mr. DiLeonardo was 'on the shelf,' his girlfriend told him. She did not know what that meant, but Mr. DiLeonardo did. … 'It means they broke me, they disenfranchised me,' he told a federal jury in Manhattan yesterday, as he testified for a second day in the racketeering trial of John A. Gotti. 'I'm not a captain, and I'm not a soldier. I'm the property of the Gambino family, but I have no say, no power. I'm not even to be recognized if other wiseguys want to recognize me.'" The Times adds, "He did not say why he was shelved, though he suggested it was because he was an ally of John A. Gotti, who was the rival of his uncle Pete Gotti. Whatever the reason, that exile, in November 2002, after 14 years as a made member of the Gambino family, was a turning point. … Being cast out convinced him to confess to three murders and become a government witness against Mr. Gotti and against a long list of other organized crime defendants. … He immediately began wearing a recording device, which the F.B.I. did not allow him to turn off, even when he visited his mother in the hospital, he said. He confided in his son Michael, who was 16, and felt rejected when his son thought it was wrong to cooperate with the government." The Times notes, "Under the racketeering laws, the prosecution must show that Mr. Gotti committed some of those crimes within five years of his 2004 indictment. … Because Mr. Gotti was in prison for a 1999 racketeering conviction before he was indicted, the prosecution has been trying to prove that he continued to communicate with Mr. DiLeonardo and carry out Gambino crime family business even from behind bars."

Two More Arrested In Alleged ELF Arson At Oregon Tree Farm. The AP (2/24) reports Nathan Frazer Block and Joyanna L. Zacher were indicted Thursday by a Eugene, Ore., federal grand jury "in the 2001 arson at a Clatskanie tree farm, court officials said, bringing the number charged in the case to six." Block and Zacher "were arrested Thursday in Olympia, Wash., after the 14-count indictments were handed up." The AP notes, "The government alleges the arson at the tree farm was part of a broad conspiracy from 1996 through 2001 in Oregon, Washington, Wyoming, Colorado and California, in which elements of the radical groups the Earth Liberation Front and the Animal Liberation Front allegedly took part." The Seattle Times (2/24) also reports on the indictments and arrests, as does The Olympian (2/24) in Olympia, Wash., under the headline "Two Olympia Residents Arrested In Ecoterror Arson At Oregon Tree Farm."

US Assesses Extent Of Cyber-Crime. Scripps Howard (2/23, Hoffman) reports, "One of the persistent unknowns in the battle against cyber-crime is the true scope of the problem." Scripps Howard continues, "Since the Internet revolution began a decade ago, U.S. businesses have been so reluctant to report cyber-victimization that experts believe the toll may be substantially higher than anyone estimates, law-enforcement officials say. … But a sweeping survey recently begun by the Department of Justice may provide the clearest picture yet of the scourge of computer viruses, worms, spyware, network intrusion, fraud, theft of information and other security breaches." Scripps Howard adds, "The departments of Justice and Homeland Security have unveiled plans to randomly - and confidentially - query 36,000 firms, which were selected as a sample of 5.3 million U.S. businesses across 37 industry sectors. … The survey data 'will provide the first official national statistics on the extent and consequences of cyber crime,' Justice spokesman Stu Smith said in a statement. … The department hopes it also will pierce the unwritten code of silence that most companies follow when it comes to cyber-crime. … 'Most companies that experience computer intrusions or breaches of security do not report the incidents to law enforcement,' FBI Director Robert Mueller said at a Feb. 15 Business Software Alliance town-hall meeting. … That reluctance stems from two beliefs by many firms: that it's a waste of time to report such an incident because there is little the police can do about it; and that revealing an attack could hurt their bottom line through bad publicity and diminished customer confidence in their security procedures."

California Execution Dispute Highlights Ethical Issues For Doctors. The Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Knickerbocker) reports, "In California this week, two anesthesiologists refused to monitor the administering of a barbiturate designed to render unconscious convicted killer Michael Morales before he was to be killed with two other drugs." The Monitor continues, "The execution was called off - or, at least, postponed. Death-penalty opponents cheered. And the roiling debate over the ethics of medical professionals' involvement in the officially sanctioned ending of human life got a little hotter. … At issue: Should a healer help the executioner?" The Monitor adds, "Beyond abortion (where the question of when life begins remains the major debating point), this includes executions carried out by the state and physician-assisted suicide now legal in Oregon and being considered in other states. … Similarly, medical ethics are involved in growing questions about military doctors taking part in the interrogation of prisoners and the force-feeding of those on a hunger strike. … In the eyes of most professional medical organizations, physicians have the ethical and professional obligation to do what they can to make people well, not to help kill them. … While most states now favor lethal drugs in capital punishment, courts increasingly are taking a skeptical view of a procedure that critics say violates the Constitution."

Maryland Police Say DNA Evidence Points To Killer Of Two. The Washington Post (2/24, B1, Klein) reports, "The crime was particularly heinous, even for county investigators familiar with violence: Two grandmothers in their seventies were stabbed to death during a robbery of their Suitland flower shop. More than two years later, Prince George's County police believe they know who did it." The Post continues, "A DNA match from a federal database led them to a man who is in the Alexandria jail on unrelated charges, police said yesterday. … Investigators have an arrest warrant accusing Adam I. Neal, 24, of two counts of second-degree murder. They believe he entered Suitland Florist on Sept. 24, 2003, robbing it of about $60 and going on a stabbing rampage, killing owner Mary Frances McDonald, 76, and her longtime friend and employee, Madeline 'Mattie' Thompson, 73." Police Chief Melvin C. High. "said investigators found DNA evidence at the scene but would not disclose whether it was blood, sweat, hair or some other substance. Police entered the DNA code into a national database to check for matches across the country but found none at the time, High said."

Contractor To Plead Guilty For Role In Cunningham Bribe Case. Defense contractor Mitchell Wade is expected to plead guilty in federal court today for his role in the bribery case involving former Rep. Randall Cunningham. The Washington Post (2/24, Leonnig, Babcock, 744K) reports that Wade has been cooperating for months with the investigation into Cunnigham's 'alleged trading of 'earmarks' in congressional appropriations for $2.4 million in cash, furniture, boats and house payments, sources said." Sources say Wade "is expected to admit to his sweetheart purchase of Cunningham's home and to providing hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash and gifts to the congressman."

Self-Defense Laws Raise Concerns Over Vigilante Justice. The Christian Science Monitor (2/24, Jonsson) reports, "Instead of embracing a citizen's 'duty to retreat' in the face of a physical attack, states may be taking cues from the days of lawless frontier towns, where non-deputized Americans were within their rights to hold the bad guys at bay with the threat of deadly force." The Monitor continues, "First enacted in Florida last year, 'Stand Your Ground' bills are now being considered in 21 states including Georgia, according to the National Rifle Association and the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence. The South Dakota senate approved one just last week. … These new measures would push the boundaries beyond the self-defense measures already on the books. Twelve states already allow citizens to shoot intruders in their homes, and 38 states permit concealed weapons in public places. The 'Stand Your Ground' laws would allow people to defend themselves with deadly force even in public places when they perceive a life-threatening situation for themselves or others, and they would not be held accountable in criminal or civil court even if bystanders are injured." The Monitor notes, "Laws putting more judgment in an individual's hands stem from people's increased concern about crime in their communities. Proponents say it helps shift the debate from gun control to crime control, and that these laws are part of the rugged individualism of Americans. … Some critics say such 'Wild West' laws are vigilante justice, and commonplace confrontations and more likely turn to violence."

Four Charged In New York With Role In Human Body Parts Trade. The New York Times (2/24, Brick) reports, "Four men were charged yesterday with operating a corrupt $4.6 million enterprise to harvest human tissue from funeral homes and sell it for use in transplants and research." The Times continues, "The men — a former dentist, two of his workers and an embalmer — pleaded not guilty at their arraignment in State Supreme Court in Brooklyn. Justice John P. Walsh set bail of $1.5 million for the former dentist, Michael Mastromarino of Fort Lee, N.J., described by prosecutors as the ringleader, and lesser bail amounts for the other men: Joseph Nicelli, an embalmer from Staten Island, and Lee Cruceta and Christopher Aldorasi, Dr.

Mastromarino's assistants." The Times adds, "The charges were the first public acknowledgment of a gruesome inquiry that has appeared on the covers of tabloid newspapers for months. The publicity was not lost on the defendants' lawyers, who accused prosecutors of making exorbitant bail demands with headline writers in mind. … Court documents filed in support of the charges provided the first official accounting of the investigation, alluding to participation by funeral home directors across the Northeast, but leaving unaddressed questions about the financing and scope of the operation. … The documents describe falsified records associated with 63 tissue extractions performed by Biomedical Tissue Services, a New Jersey company described as the center of an operation that garnered $4.6 million by fraudulent means."

Census Bureau Won't Change Method Of Counting Inmates. The Census Bureau has concluded that altering the practice of counting inmates as part of the population of the state in which they are being held would be so burdensome that it might cause new inaccuracies in the population count. The Washington Post (2/24, A13, 744K) reports that "the bureau said in a report requested by Congress and released this week that many of the home addresses of inmates on file at prisons are incomplete. It concluded that the change would require interviews with inmates and other efforts that would cost $250 million."

North Carolina Cardiologist Fined $2.6 Million For Medicare Fraud. The AP (2/24) reports, "A Charlotte (NC) cardiologist will pay $2.6 million to settle a federal lawsuit that alleges he defrauded Medicare for six years, according to a news release." The AP continues, "The U.S. Justice Department said Amir Hussein allegedly overbilled the medical program for the elderly and disabled from 1997-2003, which resulted in higher reimbursements from the government than he was entitle to receive. … Federal investigators also said Hussein billed Medicare for unnecessary services and sometimes billed twice for the same service." The AP adds, "The settlement money represents the amount of the fraud plus fines. The settlement also requires that he hire a government-approved auditor who will monitor his billing practices for five years. … The government said a whistleblower from Mecklenburg County who sued Hussein over his billing practices will receive a portion of the settlement money. The government joined the lawsuit."

Report Finds Continuing Problems In DC Group Homes. The Washington Post (2/24, A1, Barker) reports, "The District government has failed to meet promises to improve conditions for mentally and physically disabled residents in its group homes, even after a series of deaths stemming from inadequate care, a court monitor has found." The Post continues, "The health and safety of group home residents remain in jeopardy because of continuing problems with health care, nutrition and supervision, monitor Elizabeth Jones said in a newly released report. She said D.C. officials have made 'little meaningful progress.' … The city is behind in conducting investigations of deaths at group homes, Jones said in a report filed this week in U.S. District Court. Even when investigations were completed, the city failed to notify group home operators for more than a year of the results, she said." The Post adds, "Nurses cited for neglect continue to work in group homes, the monitor found. Also, the District missed a 90-day deadline this month that was designed to address some of the court's most pressing concerns -- and demonstrate the city's ability to make meaningful changes in the care of its most vulnerable citizens. … Jones's comments were part of another blistering quarterly review in a 30-year-old lawsuit against the District that centers on the quality of care for persons with mental retardation, many of whom also have severe physical disabilities. In November, her report found that a pattern of neglect had led to four deaths in the past year. … The new report was prepared in advance of a hearing Thursday before Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle. The judge had given the city's Mental Retardation and Disabilities Administration until Feb. 10 to show improvements in the system, which serves about 2,000 people."

South Carolina Judge Apologizes After Barring Dog From Court. The AP (2/24) reports, "A North Charleston (SC) municipal judge says he is sorry if he offended a man using a medical service dog by questioning the man for bringing the animal into a courtroom." The AP continues, "Bob Godfrey removed his golden retriever from court Feb. 8 after Municipal Judge George Epps berated him for bringing her into the room. … But judges cannot bar medical service animals from court, a U.S. Justice Department spokesman said. … 'Assuming that the person with a disability is using an appropriately trained animal, the assistance animal should be admitted ... unless the animal presents a direct threat to others,' said Eric Holland of the Justice Department, which enforces the Americans with Disabilities Act." The AP adds, "Epps told The (Charleston) Post and Courier on Wednesday he didn't know dogs could be trained to pick up people if they fall. … That is why Godfrey travels with Jasmine, who also alerts him to high-pitched sounds he cannot hear, such as sirens. Godfrey said he is prone to falling because he has rods and screws in his back following an automobile accident. … 'It takes its little hands and helps pick you up,' Epps said to Godfrey in court according to an audiotape of the discussion. 'What does that dog do besides not supposed to be in this building? ... You ought to know better than to bring a dog into a courtroom. That just really upsets me.'"

Maine Misses Deadline For Voter Registration Law Compliance. The Bangor Daily News (Maine) (2/24) reports, "Despite receiving $17 million in federal money for a town-by-town upgrade of the state's voter registration system, Maine has missed its Jan. 1 completion deadline and is dropping the software contractor it hired to do the job." The News continues, "Secretary of State Matt Dunlap acknowledged Wednesday that the contractor would be paid about 12 percent of the value of its $4.5 million contract with the state, or $500,000. … Many states have fewer, county-based voter registration systems. Maine, with 503 towns and distinct voter lists, differs greatly, he said." The News adds, "In the meantime, computers bought with the federal money are sitting idle in town offices until the system is running. … They're not likely to be on line by the June primary election, but Dunlap hopes the system will be running by the Nov. 7 general election. … The state is parting with Covansys Corp., a technology services company based in Farmington Hills, Mich. It was hired to develop a centralized voter registration system to replace Maine's antiquated system of town-by-town registration." The News notes, "A U.S. Justice Department official would not comment Wednesday regarding the Jan. 1 compliance issue. … 'We are currently in communication with various states, and we are evaluating each individual state's situation. At the conclusion of that evaluation, we'll determine what type of actions, if any, should be taken,' said Eric Holland, the Justice Department spokesman."

DOJ To Intervene In Pennsylvania Voting Suit. The AP (2/24) reports, "The Justice Department plans to intervene in a lawsuit over voting machines in Westmoreland County, which could affect other counties in the state." The AP continues, "Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim sent a letter to state and county officials warning that a federal lawsuit will be filed within 10 days, county officials said Wednesday. … A citizens group successfully sued in Commonwealth Court to stop the county from buying new touch-screen voting machines because the county didn't first hold a referendum to let voters approve the new machines. That's required under the state constitution, but federal officials -- and the county commissioners -- argued that was superseded by the Help America Vote Act." The AP adds, "The federal law provides funds so counties can update their voting machines to prevent recounts and other problems like those that plagued the 2000 presidential election."

Indiana Man Seeks Office After Federal Firearms Conviction. The Fort Wayne Journal Gazette (2/24, Mapes) reports, "A LaGrange County (IN) man with a federal felony record believes he should still be allowed to run for county office. … At least three county residents, however, have challenged Nathan K. Lumbard's candidacy." The Gazette continues, "The 23-year-old Howe resident filed to run in the May primary as a Democratic candidate for the LaGrange County Council. … Clerk Beverly Elliott said one challenge came from Lumbard's district, while the two others were just concerned citizens. … Lumbard's case will go before the LaGrange County Election Board on March 7, Elliott said. State law prohibits convicted felons from holding political office." The Gazette adds, "Lumbard was convicted on two counts of making false statements on federal firearms forms in August 2004. … During jury deliberation, Lumbard fled the federal courthouse in South Bend and was found a few weeks later in Mexico. He was sentenced to 21 months in federal prison. … Lumbard said the federal charges stemmed from an application to purchase a gun. At the time he completed the application, he faced felony theft and intimidation charges in LaGrange County. … Even though those charges were later dropped, he still was required to include them in his application, but didn't, investigators said." The Gazette notes, "Lumbard said he believes LaGrange County Prosecutor Jeff Wible pressured federal authorities to prosecute him. … 'I believe some of the motive was political,' Lumbard said. … Wible dismisses that notion. … 'I have no control over the U.S. Justice Department,' he said. 'What would the political motivation have been?' … Even if Lumbard is cleared to run for office, he may still face charges related to a LaGrange arson case from February 2004."

States Move To Restrict Picketing At Funerals. More than a dozen states have moved to restrict picketing at funerals after a small religious group staged anti-gay protests at funerals fro US troops killed in Iraq. USA Today (2/24, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "The rare action focused on a single person, the Rev. Fred Phelps of Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, has raised concerns about how to balance protesters' First Amendment rights and mourners' rights to be shielded from offensive messages." USA adds, "Westboro Baptist members picket military funerals, holding signs with such messages as 'Thank God for IEDs' and 'God Hates Fag Enablers.' They say God is punishing America for tolerating gays."

Author Says Supreme Court Should Stay Out Of Texas Redistricting. In a Los Angeles Times op-ed

(2/24), American Enterprise Institute visiting fellow Edward Blum says that as the Supreme Court takes up the Texas redistricting case, as "controversial as the Texas remap was, courts shouldn't get entangled in what the late Justice Felix Frankfurter called the 'political thicket' of partisan redistricting. If political gerrymandering is a problem, it should be resolved by the voters, state by state and jurisdiction by jurisdiction." The Texas "mid-cycle remap was out of the ordinary, and DeLay made no secret of his desire to add Republicans to the Texas congressional delegation. But is that, per se, unconstitutional? No, it's not."

BlackBerry Patent Dispute Nears Courtroom Showdown. Reuters (2/24, Kaplan) reports, "The maker of the BlackBerry portable e-mail device faces a courtroom showdown on Friday in a patent infringement case that could lead to a shutdown of the service for millions of U.S. users." Reuters continues, "Barring a last-minute settlement, lawyers for BlackBerry maker Research In Motion Ltd. are due to appear before a federal judge at 9 a.m. to try to head off an injunction that would cut service to most of the more than three million U.S. BlackBerry customers." Reuters adds, "The Canadian company's lawyers will try to convince U.S. District Judge James Spencer in Richmond, Virginia, that an injunction cutting service would be premature and contrary to the public interest. … 'I'd say it's really a close case,' said Steve Maebius, a patent lawyer with the firm Foley & Lardner LLP. 'It's hard to say what (the judge) will do.'" Reuters notes, "NTP Inc. filed suit against RIM in 2001 in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. A jury found in favor of privately-held NTP in 2002. … In 2003, Spencer granted an injunction that would have halted U.S. sales of the BlackBerry and shut down its service, but stayed the injunction pending appeal. … An appeals court in August of 2005 scaled back the ruling against RIM, but upheld some patent infringement claims. Subsequent appeals have been turned down."

BlackBerry CEO Refused Settlement Offer Last Year. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Heinzl, Sharma) reports, "Late last year, a tiny patent firm threatening to shut down BlackBerry maker Research in Motion Ltd. offered a deal: For about $1 billion, it would go away. … Many customers and investors expected RIM's chairman and co-chief executive, Jim Balsillie, to pay up. They were hoping to avoid interruptions in the wireless email service that millions of lawyers, government workers and other professionals rely on. … Instead, the 45-year-old triathlete doubled down on his high-stakes bet. He pressed engineers to hurry development of new software that skirts the patent claims made by NTP Inc. Behind the scenes, he reached out to customers including wireless phone companies that sell the BlackBerry service, some of which were growing anxious about his hardball stance." The Journal adds, "Mr. Balsillie says fighting NTP tooth and nail is a gamble worth taking because NTP's patents are "committed to the garbage bin." Not everyone is so sure. Many expect RIM to settle eventually -- it came close to doing so last year -- and fear any savings on patent royalties won't make up for the damage to BlackBerry's brand and customer loyalty. Mr. Balsillie says he has always preferred a settlement but calls NTP's terms unreasonable. … Lawyers for the two sides are scheduled to appear today before Virginia federal court Judge James R. Spencer. He could decide as early as today on NTP's request for a shutdown of BlackBerry sales and service in the U.S., where most of the world's 4.3 million BlackBerry users live."

Microsoft Takes EU Dispute Public With Posting Of Defense. The AP (2/24, White) reports, "Microsoft Corp. took the unusual step Thursday of making public its formal response to European Union charges that it was failing to comply with a 2004 antitrust ruling." The AP continues, "The response, which companies usually keep confidential, was filed on Feb. 15 as the EU threatened the Redmond, Wash., software company with daily files of $2.38 million." The AP adds, "Microsoft said it believed it was in full compliance with the technical documentation EU regulators had demanded in 2004 to help rival software firms develop products that worked with Windows servers. … 'It also details numerous ways in which the Commission had ignored key information and denied Microsoft due process in defending itself,' the company said in a statement posted on its Web site along with its 78-page response and several appendices." The AP notes, "The EU denied similar complaints from Microsoft earlier, saying it had repeatedly reminded Microsoft of the need to provide 'complete and accurate specifications.' … Microsoft said it also was publishing two reports from software engineering professors who had examined the technical documentation created by Microsoft."

The Times (2/24, Doran) reports that Microsoft "stepped up its antitrust battle with the European Commission by publishing letters between Steve Ballmer, its chief executive, and Neelie Kroes, the EU Competition Commissioner, to show that it had complied with a Brussels mandate to allow competitors access to its technology. … The letters relate to a 2004 order that the American software company allow access to its so-called group server operating system software to competitors. In December Mrs Kroes accused Microsoft of failing to comply with the order and it faces the prospect of fines of €2 million (£1.4 million) a day." The Times adds, "Microsoft said last night that it had decided to publish the letters on the internet to show that it had made every effort to comply with its ruling. 'Transparency is vitally important in what can be a very opaque process in Brussels. We have decided to open this up so people can understand the issues,' said Horacio Gutierrez, a lawyer for Microsoft. … In a letter to Mr Ballmer dated November 9 last year, Mrs Kroes said that she was not satisfied with the speed of Microsoft's compliance with the order but was encouraged by the actions it had taken. 'I have been somewhat disappointed by the pace at which issues of compliance have been solved so far . . . I however take note of your unambiguously stated commitment to comply fully with the March 2004 decision,' she wrote. … In a reply written on December 15 — only six days before the Commission threatened to fine Microsoft €2 million a day for alleged non-compliance with the order — Mr Ballmer assured Mrs Kroes of the company's efforts to meet and go beyond the Commission's demands. He wrote that technical documents requested by the EU had been provided partly on paper and partly on CD. He also asked Mrs Kroes to let him know whether she needed help to access the documents on CD."

The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Jacoby) reports, "Faced with the prospect of large daily fines for not complying with European antitrust orders, Microsoft Corp. plans to argue in a hearing next month that regulators keep changing their minds about what they want the software giant to do to comply." The Journal continues, "The argument was outlined in a document Microsoft delivered confidentially to European Union antitrust authorities Feb. 15. The company made its response public yesterday amid its intensifying antitrust problems. EU antitrust authorities have 'moved the goal posts on us but have deliberately refused to articulate' what will satisfy them, Horacio Gutierrez, Microsoft's general counsel for Europe, said in an interview. … 'We have not moved the goal posts,' EU spokesman Jonathan Todd responded. 'What we require is compliance with [the EU's] March 2004 decision, which is written in black and white.'"

Boston Scientific Files For EU Approval Of Guidant Acquisition. The AP (2/24) reports, "Medical device maker Boston Scientific Corp. said Thursday that it has filed all the required paperwork with European regulators for its acquisition of Guidant Corp. … Boston Scientific has said in the past it expects to close the deal by the end of March." The AP continues, "After a long bidding war with Johnson & Johnson, Boston Scientific made a winning $27.2 billion bid for Guidant, or for $80 per share in cash and stock, in January. J&J had originally offered $25.4 million for the company in December 2004, but cut that bid down to $21.5 million by November after a summer of Guidant recalls. … Part of the agreement calls for Boston Scientific to sell Guidant's vascular intervention and endovascular businesses to Abbott Laboratories Inc. for $6.4 billion in cash with the two companies sharing rights to Guidant's line of drug-coated stents. The move is expected to speed up antitrust approval. Boston Scientific said that Abbott filed their paperwork with European regulators along with the company. … However, the Federal Trade Commission has not been able to comment on when the deal's regulatory review will be completed."

Guidant Cited For More Defibrillator Manufacturing Violations. The AP (2/24, Heher) reports, "Medical device maker Guidant Corp. failed to get the necessary federal approval for changes it made to a line of defibrillators, waiting more than a year to tell regulators it had repaired software in the devices, according to inspection documents released Thursday." The AP continues, "The inspection report by the Food and Drug Administration said a memory disruption flaw in Guidant's Prizm, Prizm 2 and Vitality pulse generators could cause the defibrillator to incorrectly administer an electric shock to a patient's heart. .. A company spokesman said Indianapolis-based Guidant notified the FDA about the malfunction problem in August 2002, when it was first discovered." The AP adds, "The company developed software to fix the problem in May 2004, nearly two years after the first of four confirmed malfunctions was discovered. But it did not submit the change to the FDA until August 2005, inspectors said. … Inspectors discovered the omission this month as part of their 21-day examination at Guidant's St. Paul, Minn., facility."

EU Approves Cisco Systems' Plan To Purchase Scientific-Atlanta. The AP (2/24) reports, "The European Union on Thursday cleared Cisco Systems Inc.'s proposed $6.9 billion purchase of Scientific-Atlanta Inc., saying the combination will not pose any antitrust problems in the European Union." The AP continues, "Cisco makes an assortment of networking gear while Scientific-Atlanta makes set-top-boxes for cable operators. But there is only "limited overlap" in their activities in Europe in cable modem and gateway products and even less in wireless mesh network products, set-top boxes and optical transmission products, the European Commission said in a statement." The AP adds, "The European Commission said that 'the new combined entity would continue to face a number of strong competitors and that new market opportunities, as well as relatively low barriers to entry, may attract new entrants. … Furthermore, buyers maintain competition in these markets by switching suppliers relatively often,' it added. … U.S. regulators raised no objections to the deal either, allowing the waiting period for their review to expire at the end of 2005 without taking any action."

South African Antitrust Body Bars Sasol-Engen Merger. The AP (2/24) reports, "A proposed merger between South Africa's Sasol Ltd, a synthetic fuels and chemical company, and Engen, a fuel retailer, was prohibited Thursday by the country's antitrust body." The AP continues, "In a statement, the Competition Tribunal said it had barred the merger between the country's largest refiner of white fuels and the largest retailer of these products, as the merged entity 'would enjoy a near-monopoly of refinery capacity and a retail market share in the inland market that is considerable.' … It said the merged entity could withhold supplies of refined products from other marketers of fuel in South Africa's inland regions." The AP adds, "The tribunal's decision is the second blow to Sasol this month, closely following Finance Minister Trevor Manuel's announcement in his Feb. 15 budget speech that a task force is to be appointed to investigate 'windfall gains' in the synthetic fuel industry."

Icahn Ratchets Up Pressure By Boosting Bid For KT&G. The Financial Times (2/24, Politi) reports, "Carl Icahn, the US financier, on Thursday increased the pressure on the management of KT&G, the Korean tobacco group, by launching a bid to acquire the company for 60,000 won a share. .. The bid is a 17 per cent premium to Thursday's market capitalisation of KT&G of Won8,300bn or $8.5bn." The Times continues, "The move was disclosed in a letter to Kwak Young-Kyoon, representative director of KT&G, in which Warren Lichtenstein, an associate of Mr Icahn in the takeover fight, launched another scathing attack on the company. 'You have flatly refused to listen to any of the proposals that we have made. In light of this, we have determined to make a proposal to acquire KT&G.' … KT&G said in a statement on Friday that it had received the letter and that it was given until February 28 to respond. … 'Until now, KT&G has not been able to confirm the true intent behind the proposal. The company does not have any further information as to whether the proposal will proceed,' it said." The Times adds, "Since building a stake of about 6.6 per cent in KT&G, with his partners, Mr Icahn has been agitating for the fast-growing ginseng business to be listed. A showdown is expected in the next few weeks, as three board members proposed by Mr Icahn will be put to a shareholder vote. … Mr Icahn's bid comes ahead of a visit by the company's management to the US next week to discuss their position with American shareholders. A meeting between KT&G and Mr Icahn may also occur, although it was unclear what effect the bid might now have on those plans, said people familiar with the matter."

UK National Grid Leading Bidder For New York Utility. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Berman, Smith) reports, "British utility National Grid PLC emerged as the leading bidder in the $7 billion auction for New York utility and natural-gas distributor KeySpan Corp., people familiar with the matter said." Another "rival bidder could emerge with a sweetened offer…but for now National Grid appeared in the best position to clinch a deal. National Grid is making its offer in cash, these people said, a factor trumping the cash-and-shares offer from Consolidated Edison Inc. of New York." UK National Grid "has been trying to establish a larger footprint in the Northeastern U.S. by branching into natural gas. It owns utilities in four states that serve three million metered accounts."

The New York Times (2/24, Sorkin) adds, "If National Grid were to emerge as the victor, it would be the latest acquisition for the London-based company in a recent spree in the United States." UK National Grid "acquired Niagara Mohawk in upstate New York for $3 billion in 2000. Just this month, it agreed to buy the Rhode Island assets of New England Gas for $498 million." The Times notes, "KeySpan is the fifth-largest distributor of natural gas in the United States and the largest in the Northeast, operating utilities in New York, Massachusetts and New Hampshire."

Report Claims Researchers Withheld Data On Chromium's Cancer Risks. The Washington Post (2/24, A3, Weiss) reports, "Scientists working for the chromium industry withheld data about the metal's health risks while the industry campaigned to block strict new limits on the cancer-causing chemical, according to a scientific journal report published yesterday." The Post continues, "The allegations, by researchers at George Washington University and the Washington-based Public Citizen Health Research Group, are based on secret industry documents obtained by the authors. … They come just days before the Occupational Safety and Health Administration is to announce its new standard for workplace exposure to hexavalent chromium -- a known carcinogen handled by 380,000 U.S. workers in the steel, aerospace, electroplating and other industries." The Post adds, "Documents in the report, published in the peer-reviewed online journal Environmental Health, show that the industry conducted a pivotal study that found a fivefold increase in lung cancer deaths from moderate exposures to chromium but never published the results or gave them to OSHA. Company-sponsored scientists later reworked the data in a way that made the risk disappear. … OSHA has not said what the new limit will be. But sources close to the agency have been told to expect a standard that would allow five times more exposure than it had initially proposed -- a shift that would be a victory for the industry, saving it billions of dollars in upgrades and plant closures."

USA Today (2/24, Weise) reports that the report, "published Thursday in Environmental Health" and "written by David Michaels of George Washington University's School of Public Health and Peter Lurie of the consumer group Public Citizen, charges that the industry misrepresented the dangers of hexavalent chromium in an attempt to thwart stricter workplace regulation. … The Industrial Health Foundation, an industry group, in 1998 commissioned a study of lung cancer mortality in workers exposed to the chemical at low, intermediate and high levels. The data came from four industrial plants, two in the USA and two in Germany, to provide a large-enough pool of workers for a statistically significant study. … The cancer risk was found to be elevated at the intermediate and high levels, according to the new paper. The authors charge that the research was completed in 2002 but not given to OSHA then, despite the fact that the agency was actively seeking all available data."

Young Opposes Proposed Renewable Energy Project. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "As Bush promotes renewable energy, Transportation Chairman Young targets one of the biggest proposed renewable projects on the East Coast: an offshore 'wind farm' of 130 turbines in Nantucket Sound. Young, calling the project 'controversial' and a potential threat to radar gear, proposes ban on wind turbines within 1.5 miles of shipping and ferry lanes."

Supreme Court "Tea Decision" Seen As Strong Endorsement Of Religious Freedom Act. In Christianity Today (2/23), Kevin Eckstrom and Sarah Pulliam write about the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allows a New Mexico sect to use hallucinogenic tea in religious rituals. Eckstrom and Pulliam say, "Some legal groups see Tuesday's Supreme Court 'tea' decision as an important precedent in religious freedom jurisprudence. Others see it as a harbinger of church-state relations under the Roberts court. But religious freedom advocates agree that the case means it will likely be harder for the government to limit expression after the ruling." The two add that the ruling was a strong endorsement of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act.

Morales Responds To Cancellation Of Bolivian Senator's US Visa. Reuters (2/23) reports, "Bolivian President Evo Morales criticized the United States on Thursday for canceling the visa of one of his closest confidantes in the leftist leader's first run-in with Washington since taking power a month ago. Sen. Leonilda Zurita, a leader of coca farmers whose battle cry was 'Long live coca, Death to Yankees!,' found out her multiple-entry U.S. visa…had been canceled when she tried to travel to Miami." According to Reuters, State Department Deputy Spokesman Adam Ereli said Zurita's visa was revoked after information was received about her, but he declined to elaborate. "With much respect, I want to tell the U.S. government not to confuse us with some parties implicated in drug-trafficking," said Morales.

British Task Force Seen As Arriving Too Late To Hinder Afghanistan Poppy Harvest. The UK's Herald (2/24) reports, "The 3300-strong British task force is being sent to Afghanistan two months too late to hinder the harvest of a record poppy crop destined to end up as heroin on the streets of Scotland. The troops deploying to Helmand province on a mission to help eradicate the narcotics' trade in the Taliban's southern heartland will not be fully in position before July. But local farmers will harvest the raw opium resin, which accounts for 90% of all heroin sold in the UK, in May," according to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

Eliseo Medina, vice president of the Service Employees International Union, the nation's second-largest union, supports President Bush's guest worker program. The New York Times (2/24, Swarns, 1.19M) reports that while Medina's stance "has helped solidify his role as a prominent national labor leader," it is also "roiling the nation's unions. If such a plan is passed by Congress, it could result in the largest reshaping of immigration policy and the workplace in decades. … The disagreement among labor leaders over the guest worker plan, which has simmered mostly behind closed doors, has been overshadowed in recent months by the fractious debate among Republicans about how to handle the swelling population of illegal workers in the United States. But the guest worker plan is also generating tensions among those on the left, particularly in the nation's labor movement."

Texas Writer Says Most Illegal Aliens Seek Only To Improve Quality Of Life. Marisa Treviño, a freelance writer in Dallas, in an op-ed in USA Today (2/24, 2.31M) writes that the "bad guys" contributing to "increasing violence along our southern border" come from "two groups: warring drug cartels and 'coyotes,' who smuggle people across the border." Meanwhile, "Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner…recently said, 'A lot of the people coming across the border are criminals and potentially terrorists.'" Though "28% of federal inmates are non-US citizens," there has yet to be a Spanish-speaking illegal immigrant…jailed for being a terrorist." Treviño states, "There's no denying our fear of terrorists. What's not clear is why we should fear most illegal immigrants whose sole intent is to improve their quality of life."

Deutsche Bank Reportedly In Settlement Talks With DOJ On Tax Shelters. The New York Times (2/24, Browning) reports, "Deutsche Bank is in talks with the Justice Department in an effort to settle a criminal investigation over the bank's role in questionable tax shelters, people briefed on the case say." The Times continues, "This month, a smaller German rival, the HVB Group, reached a nearly $30 million agreement with prosecutors while acknowledging 'criminal wrongdoing' in helping to carry out fraudulent tax shelter transactions." The Times adds, "For Deutsche Bank, the path toward a settlement may be rockier, in part because it had a much larger role in the creation of some questionable tax shelters and the transactions underpinning them, investigators have said. A potentially larger obstacle, say the people briefed on the case, is that Deutsche Bank appears unable to account for a number of those transactions. … In the past, Deutsche Bank has described the transactions it arranged for tax shelters, including ones known as blips and cobra, as regular and ordinary. … But Deutsche Bank has been unable to provide to federal prosecutors in Manhattan paper documents detailing some transactions for these shelters, according to the people briefed on the case. … The documents, if they exist, would detail, among other things, loans, trades and swaps of stock and derivatives and accounting records, frequently through offshore entities set up in the Cayman Islands. The transactions were used to generate artificial losses that were then improperly used by investors to offset legitimate gains from other taxable income."

Thomas Says Treasury Is Not First To Conduct Dynamic Analysis Of Tax Cuts. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M), House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas writes that a Journal article unfairly portrayed the work of the Joint Committee on Taxation on dynamic analysis. JCT "began developing macroeconomic models more than 10 years ago and issued its first official dynamic analysis for the 2003 Jobs and Growth Tax Relief Reconciliation Act. Even a Treasury Department document about its forthcoming division on dynamic analysis states, 'This type of analysis is already being done by the Joint Committee on Taxation...' … I share the view that the proposed effort by Treasury to better understand the macroeconomic effects of tax policy is good news, but no one should assume that they are the first to make this effort."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Aim To Turn Drug Benefit Into Liability For GOP. Democratic lawmakers across the country are using this week's congressional recess to attack the new Medicare drug benefit. They have planned more than 100 forums to portray the benefit as "deeply flawed" in an effort to turn the program, which some saw as a plus for the GOP, into a political liability going into this year's elections. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Lueck, 2.11M) reports that Democrats hope to "tie troubles with the drug benefit to broader campaign themes: that the Republicans are too cozy with big industries and that the Bush administration stumbles when responding to crises. To that end, Democrats are noting that private health insurers -- not the government -- design and administer the drug plans, and that drug makers are protected from negotiating prices directly with Medicare." The Journal also reports that Republicans "say Democratic carping will discourage people from signing up -- an outcome that Democrats, who have long supported drug coverage in Medicare, say they don't want."

Kinsley Says Medicare Drug Benefit Is "Doomed." Michael Kinsley writes in the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K) that the drug benefit, "Bush's only major domestic accomplishment in six years," has not "achieved its intended purpose of cementing the affection of senior citizens for the Republican Party." Kinsley adds that "even if this subsidy to senior citizens survives its rocky premiere, it is doomed. Simple transfers of money cannot keep up with the rising cost -- and rising benefit -- of pharmaceutical drugs."

LATimes Says Administration Should Make Better Use Of Generic Drugs. An editorial in the Los Angeles Times (2/24, 958K) says it is "baffling that the Bush administration is not making better use of one of the best savings tools available: low-cost generic drugs. There are more than 800 generic-medication applications awaiting approval from the Food and Drug Administration -- an unprecedented backlog. … A larger dose of generic drugs is one of the few no-brainers to keep the nation's healthcare bill from growing even larger."

Government To Pay Employers To Keep Retiree Health Care Plans Alive. A new study by Credit Suisse First Boston says America's largest companies expect to be paid $4 billion over the next four years by the Federal government in order to keep their retirement plans alive. The New York Times (2/24, Walsh, 1.19M) reports, "When Congress authorized the Medicare drug benefit, it also agreed to start subsidizing the drug component of employers' retiree health plans, to keep them from shifting their retirees into the government program. The goal is to save the government money, even after the subsidies, while giving the retirees a better deal than they might get if they were pushed into Medicare." The Times adds, "With the program just starting its first year, it is not yet clear whether the subsidy will achieve its goals."

Senators Offer Key Points For Inclusion In Lobbying Reform Bill. A bipartisan group of Senators said yesterday that lobbying and ethics overhaul legislation that the Senate will soon consider should include provisions on gifts, travel and promises of lobbying jobs. The senators also said the measure should include greater openness about earmark projects. The AP (2/24) reports, "The bipartisan group of senators includes Rick Santorum, R-Pa.; John McCain, R-Ariz.; Russ Feingold, D-Wis.; and Barack Obama of Illinois, the Democrats' spokesman on the lobbying issue."

ACU Blasts McCain Lobbying Reform Bill. The Washington Times (2/24, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "The American Conservative Union (ACU), in an e-mail this week to right-wing activists and the press, denounced [Sen. John] McCain's Lobbying Transparency and Accountability Act of 2005 as an attack on the First Amendment. … Mr. McCain's latest legislation 'is masquerading as a "lobbying reform" measure but essentially this cruel hoax against the American people has very little to do with reforming lobbying and has just about everything to do with shutting you up and stripping you of your First Amendment rights,' the ACU said." The ACU "urged its members to send 'urgent Blast Fax messages to President George W. Bush and all 55 Republicans in the United States Senate,' telling them that the lobbying bill 'is nothing more than a cleverly disguised attempt to cut average Americans like you out of the political equation.'"

Lott May Offer Competing Lobbying Reform Package. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Harwood, 2.11M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "Reformers battle flagging interest and internal discord on lobbying rules. Vulnerable Sen. Santorum of Pennsylvania, Republicans' point man on the issue, may face internal competition in advancing changes. Rules Chairman Lott is preparing his own package; his potential return to Senate leadership may hinge on a Santorum November defeat opening up a slot."

Net Worth Of Median US Family Rose 1.5% Between 2001-2004. A Federal Reserve report said the net worth of the typical American family has increased only 1.5% after inflation between 2001 and 2004. Between 1998 and 2001, the n et wroth of the median American family rose 10.3%. NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 9, :30, Williams) reported, "The bursting of the stock market bubble, the recession back in 2001,and some big job losses in the early part of this decade contributed to what turns out to be a 2.3% drop in family incomes in the United States. That same average soared by 17.3% in the 1998-2001 period." The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Conkey, 2.11M) reports, "The report, the most comprehensive survey of household wealth, also found a widening of the gap between households at the top and the bottom of the economic ladder."

USA Today (2/24, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports that the Fed report also said "the median net worth of the bottom 40% of families declined, while those at the top saw gains. The percentage of families investing in stocks fell 3.3 percentage points to 48.6% from 2001 to 2004, a level last reached some time between the 1995 and 1998 surveys."

New Claims For Unemployment Benefits Declined Last Week. The Labor Department reported yesterday that new claims for unemployment benefits fell last week, the first such decline since January. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M) reports, "Initial jobless claims dropped by 20,000 last week to a seasonally adjusted 278,000 after rising by the same number the week before. … The Labor Department said the number of workers drawing unemployment benefits for more than a week rose in the week ended Feb. 11, the latest week for which such data are available. These continuing jobless claims climbed by 41,000 to 2,495,000."

USA Today (2/24, Krantz, 2.31M) reports that the Dow Jones industrial average lost 67.95 points to 11,069.22. The Standard & Poor's 500 declined 4.88 points to 1287.79 and the Nasdaq dropped 3.85 points to 2279.32. Mehlman Says Katrina, Recount Aftermath Hurting GOP Outreach To Blacks. Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the flawed Federal response to Hurricane Katrina and ongoing mistrust caused by the 2000 presidential vote have complicated the GOP's efforts to build support among African Americans. The Washington Times (2/24, DeBose, 90K) reports Mehlman said, "Katrina has made it harder because people saw a government at every level -- federal, state and local -- not operating the way it should." The Times adds the RNC chief "added that the constant rehashing of blunders and mistakes associated with the slow emergency response -- without talking about policies to deal with issues of poor education, inadequate work-force readiness and poverty that left many blacks more vulnerable to the storm's devastation -- hasn't helped either." Mehlman said he "has learned much in his 46 conversations with minority communities coast to coast. He said that the primary issues blacks care about are education, health care, jobs and opportunities to build wealth, but that since the fall he has heard an earful – 'and rightfully so' -- about Katrina at every stop."

Hillary Clinton Enlists Carville, Begala To Raise Funds. The AP (2/24, Humbert) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "has turned to two of the masterminds behind her husband's 1992 presidential victory -- James Carville and Paul Begala -- to raise money needed to keep her in the Senate and possibly help finance a White House run of her own." The "tag-team money appeal began Wednesday when potential Clinton donors received an e-mail from Begala warning that 'Election Day is eight months away, but the Republican attack machine is going after Hillary Clinton big-time.'" Carville's "turn came Thursday. His e-mail cautioned that 'the GOP knows how to win and they play for keeps.'"

Democrats Weigh Clinton Nostalgia Versus Fatigue As Factor In Hillary Run. The Charlotte Observer/Knight Ridder (2/24, Thomma) reports that as they "ponder how to win back the White House, many Democrats fear that the early front-runner for their party's 2008 presidential nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, carries so much baggage that she'd drag the party down to defeat." Party insiders "think she'll enter the race shortly after her expected re-election as a New York senator later this year - with a $50 million head start on fundraising toward 2008. But ominous signs abound, and together they suggest that her campaign would conjure a clash between the lure of Clinton nostalgia and the fear of Clinton fatigue."

Texas House Republicans Rally For DeLay. The AP (2/24, Benjaminson) reports Rep. Tom DeLay "was likened to Stonewall Jackson, Lyndon Baines Johnson and a courageous World War I officer Thursday as members of the Texas Republican congressional delegation joined the former House majority leader to endorse his re-election." The "unusual display of GOP solidarity was remarkable for DeLay, who is aggressively campaigning for re-election to the seat he has held comfortably for 22 years." The Republicans "took turns singing DeLay's praises as a selfless leader who not only helped get them elected, but also won Republican majorities in Congress and the Legislature, and brought home the bacon for NASA, the port of Houston and other local needs."

Schwarzenegger Faces Questions From Right At GOP Convention. The AP (2/24, Blood) reports Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger today "arrives at an early juncture in his re-election campaign -- a keynote speech at the state Republican Party winter convention in San Jose -- with conservatives openly questioning why they should support him." Is Schwarzenegger "the governor who sought new power to choke off state spending in 2005, or the one who this year called for record borrowing and submitted a budget that doles out $6 billion more than the state will collect in taxes?" GOP strategist Arnold Steinberg said, "When you look at the gyrations in his policies, it appears he's plagued by an absence of core values. He comes across as a caricature, where energy and enthusiasm are confused with core values." The AP adds Schwarzenegger has "disputed suggestions of a new direction in 2006." Conservatives at the convention "have proposed resolutions that challenge Schwarzenegger's positions on the minimum wage (he wants it increased $1 over two years, to $7.75 an hour), judicial appointments (he has named nearly as many Democrats as Republicans to the Superior Court), and spending and borrowing."

Robinson Says Summers Was "Terrible Politician." Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (2/24, A15, 744K) that Harvard University President Lawrence Summers' "is being forced to resign because, as brilliant as he is…he proved to be a terrible politician. That alone is reason for him to have to go." Robinson adds that there is "also the question of the direction in which he sought to lead Harvard." In the end Summers' great strength "was a passionate commitment to undergraduate education. Students liked him and sensed that he cared about them, and it's good that after a sabbatical he will return to the Harvard faculty."

US Won't Join Iran Nuclear Negotiations. The AP (2/24) reports, "The Bush administration rejected on Thursday a suggestion by former German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer that the United States join now-sidelined European negotiations designed to stop Iran from developing nuclear weapons." Fischer said, "It would be really helpful if the United States could join," adding, "Europe is not strong enough."

Pace Says Need For Military Action In Iran Is "A Long Way Away." The Washington Times (2/24, Gertz, Scarborough, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Ring" column, "Marine Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, dampened speculation during a National Press Club appearance that military action against Iran is near. 'I believe that the international community has many, many, many diplomatic, economic, other opportunities to influence Iran -- not only the United States, but all the international community -- to affect the way that Iran is acting in the world,' he said. 'So from where I stand, from where I sit, we are a long way away from needing the military option.'"

Rice Visits Lebanon To Showcase "Democratic Success Story." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited Beirut. The AP (2/23, Gearan) said Rice "hinted Thursday the United States would welcome the exit of Lebanon's pro-Syrian president. She praised democratic progress by other leaders in the country's fractured sectarian politics." The AP offered a reason for the Beirut stop: Rice's Middle East trip "has seen US allies snub her efforts to halt aid to a Hamas-led Palestinian government. But the journey has also let her highlight an emerging democratic success story in the region, with nearly a year passing since a flowering of street protests forced Syrian troops to leave Lebanon after three decades of domination."

The Washington Post (2/24, A8, Kessler, 744K) says Rice "snubbed the pro-Syrian president of Lebanon…deliberately not scheduling a meeting with him." The Secretary "disavowed any motive in the diplomatic slight, but it appeared calculated to undercut" Emile Lahoud. Knight Ridder (2/24, Strobel) reports Rice was "hoping to further isolate neighboring Syria and shore up Lebanon's fragile sovereignty."

Continued Hamas Funding Called "Setback" For Rice. Iran offered to fund the Hamas-lead Palestinian Authority even as Suadi Arabia refused to stop sending aid to the government. The Washington Times (2/23, Kralev, 90K) called the decisions "a setback for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice." However, it notes that the Saudis "were more reserved than the Iranians," and "Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal was vague about direct support for a Hamas-led government."

West Bank Sees Intense Fighting. Israeli soldiers and Palestinian gunmen clashed in the West Bank, leaving three gunmen and two civilians dead. The Washington Post (2/24, A9, Wilson, 744K) calls the fighting "some of the most intense since Israel and a dozen armed Palestinian groups agreed a year ago to abide by a cease-fire." Human Rights-Israel, an independent group based in Tel Aviv, "called Israeli gunfire 'indiscriminate.'"

Europe Considers Aiding Abbas. The New York Times (2/24, Smith, 1.19M) reports the EU "is considering making direct payments to the moderate Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, as a way of supporting him while trying to maintain financial pressure on Hamas, the anti-Israeli militant group that swept to power in elections last month." The Times adds the proposal, if adopted, "would be a reversal in policy." In a parenthetical note, the Times reports, "A senior State Department official said Thursday that the United States had not seen Mr. Solana's proposal but that while European and American tactics might differ, their common approach in general would be to use their leverage to persuade Hamas to change its position. He said it was too soon to say if the idea of circumventing a Hamas-led government and aiding Mr. Abbas would accomplish that objective."

At Least 10% Of Palestinian Legislators In Jail. At least 10% of the Palestinian legislators are in jail either on sentences or as security risks. The Washington Times (2/24, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "In a political system caught between liberation-movement militancy and a state in the making, time in an Israeli jail is a powerful resume builder for politicians and a potential electoral asset for political parties." However, to "ensure that Israeli prison authorities wouldn't abuse prisoners in an attempt to influence their votes," the

"Palestinian parliamentary bylaws forbid them from casting votes until they are free."

Bolton Criticizes UN Rights Council Resolution. While UN Secretary General Kofi Annan said the resolution on a new Human Rights Council was, although disappointing, the best option for replacing the Human Rights Commission, US ambassador John Bolton criticized it as containing deficiencies now seeks its renegotiation. The New York Times (2/24, Hoge, 1.19M), leading with Annan's acceptance, reports that the Commission's replacement "has been seen as a test of whether the United Nations can meet demands for fundamental change in the organization." The Washington Post (2/24, A12, Lynch, 744K) leads with Bolton's dissatisfaction, although it notes, "Bolton did not rule out the possibility that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice might still endorse the new rights council."

UN Approves Food Aid For North Korea, Agrees To Restrictions. The UN approved a $102 million food aid program for North Korea, including the limits the country demands on tracking food deliveries. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Fairclough, 2.11M) reports that World Food Program executive director James Morris "said the agency will return to the bargaining table with North Korea to negotiate operating conditions 'that will allow us to do our work properly.' If Pyongyang won't give the WFP the access it needs, he said, it 'will be forced to withdraw.'"

Vatican Pushes Muslim Countries On Christians' Rights. Having supported Muslim calls for respect over the cartoons of Muhammad, the Vatican is now linking the issue to Muslim countries showing tolerance towards their Christian minorities. The Washington Times/Reuters (2/24, Heneghan) quotes Monsignor Velasio De Paolis, secretary of the Vatican's supreme court, "thundered" that "Enough now with this turning the other cheek. It's our duty to protect ourselves." The Vatican

South Korean Christians Link Rights, Evangelizing. Evangelical Christians in South Korea have linked human rights issue to spreading their faith. The New York Times (2/24, Onishi, 1.19M) reports, "The North Korean human rights issue has become so politicized that the actual plight of North Koreans is often emphasized or de-emphasized for other ends." For South Korea, "the issue of human rights in the North has been spearheaded by conservative Christians whose aim is to take their faith to the northern half of the divided peninsula." Christians in the South "have grown into the world's second-largest overseas missionary force after the United States'."

Arroyo Declares Emergency Rule In Philippines, Announces Foiled Coup Plot. Philippines President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo declared emergency rule after security forces said they'd stopped a coup plot and the commander of the Scout Rangers regiment is being held as an alleged leader. Demonstrations marking the twentieth anniversary of the "People Power" movement that ousted Ferdinand Marcos were canceled. The Wall Street Journal/AP (2/24) reports, "Clashes erupted as police used water cannons to disperse about 5,000 protesters defying a ban on rallying at a shrine to the 1986 'people power' uprising that toppled former President Ferdinand Marcos. The military barricaded its camps to keep troops from joining the demonstrations."

The Washington Post (2/24, A8, Sipress, 744K) adds that Ferdinand Marcos's "overthrow ushered in a period of sustained political turmoil." Now, "many Filipinos declare that East Asia's oldest democracy has failed," as "Philippine democracy is little more than a ruthless contest among rival clans" and "ordinary Filipinos have little way to channel their interests through the electoral system."

Arias Wins Costa Rican Recount. Oscar Arias narrowly won reelection as president from a ballot recount, although authorities have not yet announce a winner as they rule on voting irregularities complaints. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, Lyons, 2.11M) notes that this increases "the likelihood the nation will join a regional free-trade pact with the U.S.," although "the Congress in Costa Rica… has yet to ratify the accord" and the narrow victory will hinder Arias' to push it.

Indian Scientists Complain About Refused Visas. Just prior to President Bush's trip to India, three Indian scientists have complained about visa applications for the US. The New York Times (2/24, Sengupta, 1.19M) say the complaints "stirred a diplomatic tempest" and "prompted two unusual statements from the American Embassy in New Delhi expressing 'regrets.'" One of the scientists, Placid Rodriguez was "called by the consulate on Feb. 16" about his application to attend a March conference and "told it would take about eight weeks to review his answers to a new questionnaire." However, after the Embassy contacted him again, "Dr. Rodriguez did submit his completed questionnaire by e-mail. On Thursday, he said he received a call saying his visa had been approved."

The Washington Post (2/24, A12, Vedantam, 744K) adds that the "U.S. Embassy in New Delhi has granted a visa" to prominent scientist Goverdhan Mehta, but he "said that he had already canceled his travel plans." Officials say the "form letter saying 'you have been refused a visa,'" is "not a rejection but rather part of a conditional process aimed at obtaining additional information." Tony Edson, deputy assistant secretary for visa services, said "the department has greatly accelerated" visa approvals, but "acknowledged that many visa seekers have a very different impression of the application process."

Economist Advises Caution For Bush On India Trip. In its cover story, The Economist (2/23) says Bush "needs to avoid two kinds of mistake. The first, and most serious, would be to shower America's new friend with gifts that the United States can ill afford. Unfortunately, this has already happened" with his promise to share civilian nuclear technology." The second is "Mr Bush should also be wary of sending the wrong signal about America's intentions towards China." The commonly invoked idea "that India might somehow turn out to be a 'counterweight' to China" not only would fail, but "is liable only to reinforce China's fear that America's grand strategic design is to encircle it and block its rise as a great power." Bush also needs to "take care to ensure that friendship with India does not damage his close ties to Pakistan" and "not to tilt so far India's way that the Indians feel under no pressure to make concessions of their own" on Kashmir.

Credit Concerns Cause China To Hoard Bird Flu Samples. China's insistence on controlling bird flu samples it takes and the research performed on them put it at loggerheads with international health officials. The Chinese cite concerns that others will scoop research opportunities and worries over crediting Chinese scientists. The Wall Street Journal (2/24, A1, Zamiska, 2.11M) reports, "The standoff pits a high-ranking veterinarian in China's Ministry of Agriculture named Jia Youling against international health authorities leading the fight against bird flu." Since last summer, "China hasn't provided a single sample from its infected flocks, despite repeated requests by WHO amid the roughly 30 outbreaks the country has reported in the past 12 months," and "the genetic information contained in China's samples could help develop a more effective vaccine that could save countless lives."

Third Day Of Nigerian Street Violence Yields To Calm. After three days of rioting in Nigeria during which Christians attacked Muslims in retaliation for Muslim-on-Christian violence in the north, order has been restored. The New York Times (2/24, Polgreen, 1.19M) reports, "a semblance of the ordinary returned to the city's streets on Thursday." Many political analysts say the cartoons "were simply a pretext to act on very old grievances rubbed raw by political tensions." The Washington Post (2/24, A10, Timberg, 744K) adds in the first two paragraphs of its article, "Christian mobs… turned to disposing of the evidence in the crudest of ways" - burning bodies in the street - and the "Christian residents" of Onitsha "expressed little remorse" for the violence.

Moscow Roof Collapse Kills At Least 56. ABC World News Tonight (2/23, story 6, :20, Sawyer) reported, "At least 56 people were killed when a large roof collapsed over a market outside of Moscow. 32 people were injured. Investigators said heavy, wet snow on the roof may have triggered the collapse." The CBS Evening News (2/23, story 8, 0:20, Schieffer) reported the collapse "happened early in the morning but authorities say about 100 people were inside, most of them market employees." NBC Nightly News (2/23, story 3, 0:25, Williams) also reported the story.

O'Grady Urges Recognition Of Latin American Gains. Mary Anastasia O'Grady writes in her column in the Wall Street Journal (2/24, 2.11M) A "number of countries in" Latin America "are, in fact, making important progress" due to "heavy lifting in domestic politics," and "what matters most is acknowledging the gains, lest we become lost in the fog of partisan demagoguery." When "George W. Bush's political opponents…delivered some exquisite jeremiads on the subject of Latin American instability," they were "crocodile tears." In fact, "there is even an argument to be made that by stepping back, the Bush administration has encouraged a long-overdue maturation process of Latin governance," as "fundamentally what ails the region are matters of domestic politics that only locals can sort out."

WPost Supports Wolfowitz On Congo Debt Forgiveness Postponement. The Washington Post (2/24, A14, 744K) editorializes that the Congo "hopes to win approval of a reduction in its debt," but its "corrupt government keeps part of its oil revenue from showing up on its books, raising questions as to whether it deserves forgiveness." World Bank's president, Paul D. Wolfowitz, rightly argues that debt relief should be delayed," and his "proposed remedy is moderate. He suggests that Congo should adopt measures to reduce oil corruption" for three years before getting full debt reduction. Until then, "relief would flow into a carefully monitored poverty-reduction fund." It is best "to proceed slowly on Congo -- and send a needed wake-up call to other corrupt countries."

Brad,

I was able to arrange for a red carpet arrival for Gov. Lingle. While she is here, should we arrange for a tour of the building or something else of your liking? I have alerted Martha Pacold in the AG's office that the Governor will be in the building. The AG will be at the USA conference, however.

Thanks,
Bradley

Brad:

Please see the e-mails below from your subordinates. Before I even had a chance to review this chain of e-mails, the memo in question had left ODAG with the A/DAG's initials on it. So the package is in Exec Sec or OAG now.

With respect to the source of the purported delay, I note that the date of the document is 2/15/06 with an unrealistic due date of 2/17/06. (The memo accompanying this document gave no explanation whatsoever that would suggest an actual necessity to expedite it.) Although dated 2/15, it was not even received by Exec Sec until 12:15 p.m. on 2/16/06 according to their time stamp. The Associate's office signed off on it yesterday, 2/23/06, and it arrived in ODAG this morning -- 2/24/06. It was reviewed by a Senior Counsel and by me this morning and promptly given to the Acting DAG. Frankly, I do not think a turn around in ODAG of less than 6 hours is all that bad -- pretty impressive, actually, considering that it took CRT half a day to even get it to Exec Sec.

I recognize that neither you nor Wan had anything to do with this personally, but let me suggest that if CRT wants something to go to the AG for signature, CRT should allow sufficient time for actual review by the Associate's Office and ODAG -- not to mention by the AG's staff. When necessary, things can be expedited, but I am inclined to expedite a package only when there is a reason to do so. Accordingly, in the future, if you cannot allow more than a couple of days for review by OASG, ODAG and OAG, please have your staffers indicate the reason in the memo.

In the event that you or your subordinates believe that it really is necessary to "shake something loose" from ODAG, I would appreciate a phone call from Wan or you or your chief of staff rather than an attempt to get the AG's office to call us. This seems only an appropriate matter of courtesy.

Thanks,
Mike

Barbara Wells, the Exec Sec point of contact, said that someone in the AG's office is eagerly awaiting this package, but we can't do anything to force the DAG to sign off.

After speaking to Exec Sec I found that the package is currently in the DAG's office awaiting their signature. After that, it still has to go to the AG's office for signature and approval. Barbara Wells, the Exec Sec point of contact, said that someone in the AG's office is eagerly awaiting this package, but we can't do anything to force the DAG to sign off.

First I heard of this particular item was a call yesterday; Currie kindly found the item which hadn't yet been reviewed by anyone. We got it out of here within minutes of the call. We are all busy these days and the paper flow may not always seem the most interesting part of what we do, but we've been excellent about keeping our processes speedy in the past and this obviously serves as a reminder of why we need to do so. Brad:

Please see the e-mails below from your subordinates. Before I even had a chance to review this chain of e-mails, the memo in question had left ODAG with the A/DAG's initials on it. So the package is in Exec Sec or OAG now.

With respect to the source of the purported delay, I note that the date of the document is 2/15/06 with an unrealistic due date of 2/17/06. (The memo accompanying this document gave no explanation whatsoever that would suggest an actual necessity to expedite it.) Although dated 2/15, it was not even received by Exec Sec until 12:15 p.m. on 2/16/06 according to their time stamp. The Associate's office signed off on it yesterday, 2/23/06, and it arrived in ODAG this morning -- 2/24/06. It was reviewed by a Senior Counsel and by me this morning and promptly given to the Acting DAG. Frankly, I do not think a turn around in ODAG of less than 6 hours is all that bad -- pretty impressive, actually, considering that it took CRT half a day to even get it to Exec Sec.

I recognize that neither you nor Wan had anything to do with this personally, but let me suggest that if CRT wants something to go to the AG for signature, CRT should allow sufficient time for actual review by the Associate's Office and ODAG -- not to mention by the AG's staff. When necessary, things can be expedited, but I am inclined to expedite a package only when there is a reason to do so. Accordingly, in the future, if you cannot allow more than a couple of days for review by OASG, ODAG and OAG, please have your staffers indicate the reason in the memo.

In the event that you or your subordinates believe that it really is necessary to "shake something loose" from ODAG, I would appreciate a phone call from Wan or you or your chief of staff rather than an attempt to get the AG's office to call us. This seems only an appropriate matter of courtesy.

Thanks,
Mike

It's no big deal. I think it's a classic case of the inability of emails to convey emotions (or, in this case, the complete lack of emotions). I responded to Mike. Rena didn't mean anything at all by her email, but it's easy to misinterpret messages in an entirely electronic format. All is well with the world.

Judge orders Bush to answer suit filed by New Jersey over port deal

BY TOM FEENEY AND JOHN P. MARTIN STAR-LEDGER STAFF

A federal judge yesterday ordered the Bush administration to explain its decision to allow a company owned by the United Arab Emirates to take over some operations at ports in Newark and five other American cities.

The White House, meanwhile, welcomed the company's decision to delay the takeover for a short time but said the administration has no intention of reconsidering its approval of the deal.

U.S. District Judge Jose Linares in Newark ordered the government to respond next week to a lawsuit filed by the state of New Jersey that seeks more information about the approval and contends a further review of national security questions is required by law.

Linares' order requires federal officials to explain why they did not perform a full 45-day investigation into the sale of marine terminals at six American ports to Dubai Ports World, a company owned by the United Arab Emirates. His order asks for written briefs on Monday and sets a hearing for Wednesday.

The judge said he was taking no position on the sale, but noted that Port Newark is a critical part of the region's infrastructure and its proximity to chemical, electrical and telecommunications hubs make it especially worthy of protection.

"The potential breach of Port Newark obviously would pose a tremendous threat to the people of New Jersey," the judge said.

New Jersey's lawsuit is one of several legal challenges to the deal. Yesterday, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey filed suit in Superior Court in Essex County to block the company from operating a terminal in Port Newark.

That suit claims that under a 30-year lease signed in 2000, the authority has the right to approve of any transfer in ownership. A hearing was scheduled for Friday.

Dubai Ports World paid $6.8 billion to buy Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., a British firm that runs commercial shipping operations in Newark, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Miami and New Orleans.

Although the UAE is an important American ally in the Middle East, its past ties to terrorists prompted critics to question whether the sale would weaken security at the vulnerable ports. The FBI has said the UAE had financial ties to some of the 9/11 terrorists.

The sale is scheduled to close on March 2, but the Dubai company has said it will not take control of the American port operations immediately, in order to give the Bush administration time to quell the fierce, bipartisan opposition in Congress.

White House spokesman Scott McClellan said it will be "helpful to have some additional time to brief Congress about the facts and about the safeguards that are in place."

But the president's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, told reporters the administration does not intend to use the delay to reconsider its approval of the sale.

"There's nothing to reopen. In terms of the administration and executive branch process, it's been completed," he said.

The Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States, made up of representatives from 12 federal departments and agencies, is required by law to review purchases of certain U.S. properties by foreign companies. If the company is state-owned and is a risk to national security, the law requires a 45-day supplemental investigation. The Dubai Ports World sale was approved without the supplemental investigation.

New Jersey's lawsuit asks Linares to order the administration to conduct that supplemental probe.

Assistant Attorney General Patrick DeAlmedia told the judge the state filed the petition because it could not get information about the sale from the Bush administration.

No representative of the administration was present at the hearing. A spokesman for the Treasury Department said later that he could not comment on an active lawsuit. Spokesmen for Dubai Ports World and P&O did not return telephone calls.

Gov. Jon Corzine sent a letter to governors in the other affected states yesterday urging them to join New Jersey's lawsuit. Governors of Maryland, New York and Pennsylvania have expressed concerns about the takeover; Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has said he trusts his brother, the president, to make the right decision.

Several lawmakers from both parties plan to introduce legislation next week to put the deal on hold or kill it. Lobbyists for Dubai Ports went to Capitol Hill yesterday to brief congressional staffers.

House Republican leaders plan to meet Tuesday to decide whether they want to take that step, which Bush has said he would veto. Rep. Thomas Reynolds (R-N.Y.), a member of the leadership, said he is "beginning to get what I want, which is to slow down this process so we can take a look at it."

But Democrats and some Republicans continued to press for a fuller investigation of security issues.

"Nothing in the announcement by Dubai Ports World changes the fact that unless the president or Congress acts, in less than a week operations at U.S. ports will be in the hands of a foreign government. That is an unacceptable risk that we cannot tolerate," said Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.)

Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Judiciary Committee, demanded answers to a series of questions about the approval process in a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"The administration ... rushed through and rubber-stamped a secret review, and now they once again ask us to trust their vague assurances that adequate national security arrangements are in place," Leahy said.

Google's privacy concerns unfounded: US government

Greg Sandoval, Special to ZDNet

The US Justice Department has denied requesting anything from Google that could threaten the privacy of the search-engine's users, as the company recently contended.

But by trying to block the government's efforts to review a week's worth of search terms, Google is holding up efforts to protect children from pornography, according to a brief filed on Friday by the Justice Department.

The US Justice Department was responding to Google's legal filing earlier this month, in which the search giant argued that the government's request for 1 million pages from Google's index, as well as copies of a week's worth of search terms, would harm the company in numerous ways.

The information the Justice Department requested is to be used in a study to help the Bush administration defend the 1998 Child Online Protection Act (COPA), an Internet pornography law. The government is seeking to highlight flaws in Web filtering technology during a trial later this year.

Google maintains that complying with the government's request would mean disclosing important trade secrets, take up too many of the company's resources to produce and harm its reputation with users.

The issue has raised red flags among privacy-watchdog groups, which fear that Web sites could be used to spy on Americans or limit their right to free speech. The American Civil Liberties Union is challenging the COPA, arguing that Web sites cannot realistically comply with it and that the law violates the right to freedom of speech mandated by the First Amendment.

On 17 February, Google issued a strongly worded declaration to the court, criticising prosecutors for a "cavalier attitude" and questioning their understanding of search-engine technology.

On Friday, the Justice Department said Google's arguments were without merit.

"It should first be noted what is not at issue here," the Justice Department wrote in the 18-page legal brief. "The government has not asked Google to produce any information that would personally identify its users.

"The government seeks this information only to perform a study, in the aggregate, of trends in the Internet. No individual user of Google, or of any other search engine, need fear that his or her personal identifying information will be disclosed."

Google also failed to link the information the government requested to "any supposed trade secrets," the Justice Department said in its brief. As for the costs of complying with the Justice Department's subpoena, the government argued that Google could "comply with the subpoena with relative ease."

The Justice Department noted that Google's competitors -- American Online, Yahoo and MSN -- gathered the information without much trouble when those companies voluntarily complied with similar requests.

Lastly, the government hung its argument on precedent, saying that the right of the government to obtain information needed to present its case outweighed any of Google's arguments.

"The government has a legitimate need for the disclosure of data that is uniquely in Google's possession," the Justice Department said in its filing. "The balance certainly weighs in favour of disclosure of any alleged trade secrets."

The Justice Department requested that Google be given 21 days in which to comply with the court's order.

Google representatives could not immediately be reached for comment.

RIM, NTP urged to settle dispute; BlackBerrys could face shutdown as early as this week

By Michelle Kessler
USA TODAY

U.S. BlackBerry users happily continued sending mobile e-mails over the weekend after a federal judge decided to keep the popular devices running amid a nasty patent lawsuit.

But users are fretting about a future shutdown. That could happen as early as this week, if a five-year dispute between BlackBerry-maker Research in Motion and intellectual property firm NTP is not settled, says patent lawyer Stephen Maebius of Foley & Lardner.

NTP, a company with essentially one employee, owns several wireless patents dating to the 1990s. It says the BlackBerry infringes on them, a claim RIM denies. NTP sued RIM in 2001. The case only affects U.S. customers.

At a Friday hearing in Richmond, Va., NTP asked Judge James Spencer to halt sales of BlackBerry devices and service until the case is resolved. But Spencer refused. Instead, he urged the firms to settle, saying a business deal would make more sense than a court remedy.

Spencer set no deadline but made it clear time is running out. “You let this be a court decision, and you're going to get a court decision. A court-imposed decision will be imperfect,” he said.

Given Spencer's reputation for speedy trials, Maebius says, RIM and NTP can expect to be back in court in a week or two if they don't settle.

That worries many BlackBerry users. “It's indispensable,” says Lynda Hart, 32, a technical project manager in Modesto, Calif. In Houston, insurance executive Mark Torrison, 48, said: “I thought this thing would have gone away by now.”

RIM says it has a workaround that will keep BlackBerrys operating if it loses in court. But RIM testified Friday that it would take 2 million man-hours to implement. That's about a half-hour for each of the 4.3 million BlackBerrys in use. A company with 500 BlackBerry users would need a month to upgrade them all, estimates tech analyst Ken Dulaney at researcher Gartner.

It's uncertain how well the workaround will operate. RIM has released few details because of legal concerns. Customers “are on pins and needles,” says Dulaney.

RIM and Wall Street were pleased with Friday's hearing. “We're looking forward to the eventual decision, and we're feeling comfortable with our contingency plans in any event,” co-CEO Jim Balsillie said in a statement. RIM shares leapt 6.5% to $74.05 on the news.

Privately owned NTP also claimed success. “The court was receptive to the merits of our arguments,” it said in a statement.

As the court battle continues, a second fight is being waged in the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, which is re-evaluating NTP's patents. RIM has won key victories there, including one Friday. But Spencer doesn't have to consider the patent evaluation until it is complete, and that could take years. “This thing is far from over,” says lawyer Robert Sterne at Sterne Kessler Goldstein and Fox.

St. Bernard Parish residents sue FEMA over cruise ship departure

NEW ORLEANS About two dozen hurricane evacuees are fighting to stay on a cruise ship south of New Orleans.

They're in court today, suing to try to make the federal government keep the ship docked and pay for the housing.

The lawsuit says the Federal Emergency Management Agency hasn't given alternative housing and has shown no evidence it will do so by Wednesday's deadline to release rented cruise ships.

The suit says FEMA showed incompetence "before, during, and after Hurricane Katrina struck."

An agency spokeswoman wouldn't comment on the suit, but says FEMA has "been working around the clock" to provide long-term housing to people on the ship.

About 300 residents of St. Bernard Parish have been living on the Scotia Prince ship. Plaintiffs include a disabled woman, a fisherman whose FEMA trailer isn't hooked up yet and a high school senior.

Pa. woman gets $4.2 million from government to settle lawsuit

ERIE, Pa._A single mother will get $4.2 million from the federal government to settle a lawsuit in which she claimed botched pneumonia treatment left her mildly brain-damaged and bedridden with her legs amputated.

Karen Lee, 50, of Erie, a former teacher's aide, received $2.9 million last week. The money must be invested and paid out over time for Lee's medical care, said her attorney, Denis W. Krill. The total payout over 10 years will be more than $4.2 million.

The U.S\l "l". Attorney's\l "l" Office represented Lee's former doctor, Magnus K. Ikhinmwin, in the lawsuit under a 1995 federal law that offers legal protection to public health centers, Krill said.

Ikhinmwin formerly worked for the nonprofit Community Health Net, which got federal money.

Lee also settled for an undisclosed amount with Erie's Hamot Medical Center, where Ikhinmwin admitted Lee for treatment. Hamot's spokeswoman and its attorney declined comment, the Erie Times-News reported.

U.S\l "l". Attorney\l "l" Mary Beth Buchanan called the settlement with the federal government "fair and equitable." The defendants admitted no wrongdoing.

Krill and another attorney will get $725,000 in attorneys' fees and $70,000 for costs from the government portion of the settlement, Krill said. They also will receive money from Hamot's settlement.

According to the lawsuit, about 24 hours after Lee entered Hamot in November 1997 suffering from pneumonia in both lungs, she became agitated because she couldn't breathe and a nurse mistakenly believed Lee was suffering from alcohol withdrawal. Lee had been dependent on alcohol previously, and the nurse relayed her assessment to Ikhinmwin in a phone call.

Ikhinmwin, without examining Lee or ordering more tests, ordered Lee be treated throughout the night with a sedative commonly used to treat alcohol withdrawal, the lawsuit stated.

The drug caused Lee to stop breathing and suffer two heart attacks, the lawsuit alleged. She lost circulation to her arms and legs and was wheelchair-bound with severe nerve damage; her legs later had to be amputated above the knees in April 2002 and March 2003.

Lee is conscious and alert, but suffers from mild short-term memory loss and remains confined to a hospital bed in her mother's basement, Krill said. She plans to use the money to get therapy, prosthetic legs, a motorized wheelchair and possibly to modify her home or buy a new one that is wheelchair accessible.

"She is going to have medical bills the rest of her life," Krill said. "She asked for none of this. She asked to be treated like a human being and was not."

Analysis: Congress Puts 'Partial-Birth' Abortion Back on the Supreme Court's Agenda

Howard J. Bashman
Special to Law.com

On the U.S. Supreme Court's first official day of business after Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, the Court agreed to revisit the contentious issue of whether a ban on partial–birth abortion is constitutional. Because O'Connor provided the dispositive fifth vote to declare Nebraska's ban on partial–birth abortion unconstitutional, many believe that the Supreme Court in O'Connor's absence is now likely to reverse course and uphold the constitutionality of the federal Partial–Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 after hearing oral argument later this year.

Three different federal appellate courts have examined the constitutionality of this controversial federal law, and all three have held the law unconstitutional based on the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling, issued in 2000, in the Nebraska case. But while reaching the same outcome, these federal appellate courts did not employ identical reasoning. And on one three–judge panel, a majority expressed its profound dissatisfaction with the Supreme Court's current abortion jurisprudence.

Aside from presenting the question whether Alito's replacement of O'Connor will cause the Supreme Court to uphold a ban on partial–birth abortion, the case the Court has just agreed to review also presents two other controversial issues. The first, which was discussed in depth during both of the recent Supreme Court confirmation hearings, involves the level of deference that the Court should afford to congressional fact–finding. And the second involves whether the standard for declaring an abortion–related law facially unconstitutional will remain easier to satisfy than the standard for declaring any other law facially unconstitutional.

The case that the Supreme Court agreed to review last week arises from the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, and the lead plaintiff is the very same physician who served as the lead plaintiff in the case in which the Supreme Court in 2000 declared Nebraska's ban on partial–birth abortion unconstitutional. The 8th Circuit in August 2005 issued its unanimous decision striking down the federal Partial–Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003.

The 8th Circuit ruled that the Supreme Court's holding in the Nebraska case requires that any ban on an abortion procedure contain an exception for instances when the procedure is necessary to preserve either the health or the life of the mother. The federal ban on partial–birth abortion only contains an exception for when the procedure is necessary to save the mother's life.

Congress attempted to justify the statute's lack of a health exception by expressly finding that partial–birth abortion is never medically necessary. Not persuaded by Congress' finding, the 8th Circuit explained, "There remains no consensus in the medical community as to the safety and medical necessity of the banned procedures." Because some doctors testified that the procedure is sometimes medically necessary, the 8th Circuit ruled, the Supreme Court's decision in the Nebraska case required that the federal ban on partial–birth abortion be declared unconstitutional.

Next, in late January, a three–judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals issued a unanimous decision holding the law unconstitutional for three separate reasons. The opinion, by Circuit Judge Stephen Reinhardt, first concluded that the law was unconstitutional because it lacked a health exception. This is essentially the same ground on which the 8th Circuit relied in striking down the law.

Second, the 9th Circuit held that the law was unconstitutional because it placed an undue burden on a woman's right to choose a pre–viability abortion, since the law failed to distinguish between intact dilation–and–evacuation abortions (also known as partial–birth abortions) and non–intact D&E abortions, which the law supposedly was not intended to outlaw. According to the 9th Circuit, because the law could be understood to prohibit non–intact D&E abortions, the law unduly burdens the right of a woman to obtain a pre–viability, post–first trimester abortion.

And third, the 9th Circuit ruled that the law was unconstitutionally vague, because it "fails to define clearly the medical procedures it prohibits, depriving doctors of fair notice and encouraging arbitrary enforcement." Based on all three of these reasons, the 9th Circuit joined the 8th Circuit in striking down the law.

The 2nd Circuit, also in late January, likewise ruled that this federal law banning partial–birth abortions was unconstitutional. But, unlike in the other two circuits, the 2nd Circuit's decision was not unanimous. In fact, each of the three judges on the panel wrote separately. The majority opinion, by Senior Circuit Judge Jon O. Newman, rested exclusively on the conclusion that the law was unconstitutional for lack of a health exception. Newman's majority opinion states that "substantial medical opinion does support the view that the procedure might sometimes be necessary to avoid risks to the mother's health." The 2nd Circuit's ruling thus follows the same path that the 8th Circuit took in declaring the law unconstitutional.

In a concurring opinion, Chief Judge John M. Walker Jr. wrote that the Supreme Court's ruling in the Nebraska partial–birth abortion case was "flawed in at least three respects." First, in his view, the fact that one type of abortion procedure might be safer than another does not prevent the potentially safer procedure from being outlawed if the other, still legal procedure is safe enough. Second, Walker wrote, the Nebraska case impermissibly allows a statute to be held facially invalid on a speculative showing of harm. And third, he wrote, the Nebraska case "establishes an evidentiary standard that all but removes the legislature from the field of abortion policy." If Walker was attempting to provide the Supreme Court with a useful road map to follow in overruling the Nebraska decision from 2000, he has certainly succeeded in doing so.

Notably, it was a Clinton appointee, Circuit Judge Chester J. Straub, who dissented from the 2nd Circuit's ruling and would have held the federal ban on partial–birth abortion lawful under existing precedent. In his view, Congress' finding that partial–birth abortion is never medically necessary to protect a woman's health was adequately supported, and the government's compelling interest in preventing infanticide sufficed to override a woman's right to terminate her pregnancy via the "gruesome and inhuman" procedure in question.

Of these three federal appellate court rulings, the 9th Circuit's presents the most persuasive and wide–ranging argument in favor of declaring the Partial–Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 unconstitutional, while the concurring and dissenting opinions that accompany the 2nd Circuit's decision provide cogent arguments for overruling the Supreme Court's holding in the Nebraska case. I expect that the Supreme Court will uphold the constitutionality of this federal law by a vote of 5–4, and in the aftermath of such a ruling states too will be free to ban the procedure by enacting similarly worded statutes.

EDITORIAL: GOING TOO FAR SILVER RING THING LOSES FEDERAL FUNDS

To conservatives worried that teenagers out there are having sex, an abstinence program called the Silver Ring Thing, funded as part of President Bush's faith-based initiatives, seemed like a match made in heaven.

The Silver Ring Thing's national headquarters are at Christ Church at Grove Farm in Ohio Township. Over three years the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services gave the Silver Ring Thing program more than $1 million to celebrate the joy of no sex in three-hour light-show extravaganzas across the continent. Teenage attendees signed "a covenant before God Almighty" to remain chaste until they marry; they wore $12 silver rings inscribed with a Bible passage reminding them to "keep clear of sexual sin."

But it couldn't last, not in a country with a First Amendment ban on mixing public money and religious faith. The federal flirtation with Christ-centered abstinence ended in breakup on Thursday when an ACLU\l "l" lawsuit filed in May was settled in U.S. District Court in Boston, and Silver Ring Thing lost its latest $75,000 grant.

The suit\l "l" accused the federal government of allowing the Silver Ring Thing to use public tax money for what boils down to religious evangelism. Thursday's settlement bars Silver Ring Thing from receiving any more federal aid unless it can ensure the money won't be used for religious purposes.

No one can fault the Silver Ring organizers for offering hormone-charged youth an empowering way to say "no" to sex. Thousands of teens signed the covenant in good faith, and likely continue to live chaste lives pleasing to parents and, presumably, the Lord.

No one can say Silver Ring Thing was wrong to pitch a Christian salvation message to a new generation of spiritual seekers. They just can't do it with public money.

As Pittsburgh ACLU\l "l" director Barb Feige said this week, "Anybody can do their own religious programming for their own religions, but you can't do it with government funds. That's a constitutional violation."

New York Times sues U.S. Department of Defense for eavesdrop documents

NEW YORK_The New York Times sued the Department of Defense on Monday, saying the government has refused to turn over records related to its domestic warrantless surveillance program.

In a lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, the Times asked the court to order the government to comply with a Freedom of Information Act request requiring it to release documents or provide a lawful reason why it cannot.

The spying program was revealed by the Times in a story in December.

Maj. Susan Idziak, a Department of Defense spokeswoman, said the department will work closely with the Department of Justice on litigation regarding the matter.

The Times said a Dec. 16 letter to the Department of Defense requested all internal memos, e-mails and legal memoranda and opinions since Sept. 11, 2001, related to the National Security Agency spying program. The department is the parent agency of the NSA.

The newspaper said it asked for meeting logs, calendar items and notes related to discussions of the program, including meetings held by Vice President Dick Cheney and his staff with members of Congress and telecommunications executives.

It also requested all complaints of abuse or possible violations in the operations of the program or the legal rationale behind it.

And it sought the names and descriptions of people or groups identified through the use of the program and a description of relevant episodes used to identify the targets of the intercepts.

The lawsuit said the Department of Defense acknowledged receipt of the request on Dec. 30, 2005, but the response, required in 20 business days, never came.

In its lawsuit, the newspaper asked the court to order the materials released.

President Bush has defended the program to monitor electronic communication between the United States and international sites involving suspected al-Qaida operatives as vital to anti-terrorism efforts.

Justice Dept. Rejects Google's Concerns

By ASSOCIATED PRESS

Concerns by Google Inc. that a Bush administration demand to examine millions of its users' Internet search requests would violate privacy rights are unwarranted, the Justice Department said in a court filing.

The 18-page brief filed Friday argues that because the information provided would not identify or be traceable to specific users, privacy rights would not be violated.

The brief was the Justice Department's reply to strident arguments filed by Google last week as a rebuff the government's demand to review its search requests during a random week.

The department believes the information will help revive an online child protection law that has been blocked by the U.S. Supreme Court. By showing the wide variety of Web sites that people find through search engines, the government hopes to prove Internet filters are not strong enough to prevent children from viewing pornography and other inappropriate material online.

The Justice Department submitted a declaration by Philip B. Stark, a researcher who rejected the privacy concerns, noting that the government specifically requested that Google remove any identifying information from the search requests.

"The study does not involve examining the queries in more than a cursory way. It involves running a random sample of the queries through the Google search engine and categorizing the results," Stark, a statistics professor at the University of California, Berkeley, said.

Mountain View, Calif.-based Google has staunchly resisted the Justice Department since receiving a subpoena last summer, setting the stage for the current legal battle.

The case has attracted widespread attention because it has underscored the potential for Internet search engines becoming tools for government surveillance. A hearing is scheduled before U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose March 13.

U.S. Is Settling Detainee's Suit In 9/11 Sweep

NINA BERNSTEIN

The federal government has agreed to pay $300,000 to settle a lawsuit brought by an Egyptian who was among dozens of Muslim men swept up in the New York area after 9/11, held for months in a federal detention center in Brooklyn and deported after being cleared of links to terrorism.

The settlement, filed in federal court late yesterday, is the first the government has made in a number of lawsuits charging that noncitizens were abused and their constitutional rights violated in detentions after the terror attacks.

It removes one of two plaintiffs from a case in which a federal judge ruled last fall that former Attorney General John Ashcroft, the director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other top government officials must answer questions under oath. Government lawyers filed an appeal of that ruling on Friday.

In the settlement agreement, which requires approval by a federal judge in Brooklyn, lawyers for the government said that the officials were not admitting any liability or fault. In court papers they have said that the 9/11 attacks created "special factors," including the need to deter future terrorism, that outweighed the plaintiffs' right to sue.

"A settlement like this is not a precedent, but it's a form of accountability," said Gerald L. Neuman, a law professor at Columbia University who is an expert in human rights law and was not involved in the case. "When the government finds it necessary to settle, that changes the government's incentives. It doesn't mean the government will settle future cases that it makes different calculations about," like another lawsuit, brought as a class action on behalf of hundreds of detainees, that is pending before the same judge.

A spokesman for the Justice Department said officials would not comment on the agreement. But lawyers who represent both the Egyptian, Ehab Elmaghraby, who used to run a restaurant near Times Square, and the second plaintiff, a Pakistani who is still pursuing the lawsuit, described the outcome as significant.

"This is a substantial settlement and shows for the first time that the government can be held accountable for the abuses that have occurred in Abu Ghraib, Guantanamo Bay and in prisons right here in the United States," said one of the lawyers, Alexander A. Reinert of Koob & Magoolaghan.

The lawsuit accuses Mr. Ashcroft and the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III, of personally conspiring to violate the rights of Muslim immigrant detainees on the basis of their race, religion and national origin, and names a score of other defendants, including Bureau of Prison officials and guards at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn.

A 2003 report by the Justice Department's inspector general found widespread abuse of the noncitizen detainees at the Brooklyn center after 9/11, and in recent months, 10 of the center's guards and supervisors have been disciplined.

Mr. Elmaghraby, who spent nearly a year in detention, and the Pakistani man, Javaid Iqbal, held for nine months, charged that while shackled they were kicked and punched until they bled. Their lawsuit said they were cursed as terrorists and subjected to multiple unnecessary body-cavity searches, including one in which correction officers inserted a flashlight into Mr. Elmaghraby's rectum, making him bleed.

In a telephone interview from his home in Alexandria, Egypt, Mr. Elmaghraby, 38, said he had reluctantly decided to settle because he is ill, in debt and about to have surgery for a thyroid ailment aggravated by his treatment in the detention center.

"I wish I come to New York, to stay in the court face to face with these people," he said in imperfect English, adding that he had always expected the courts to uphold his claim. "I lived 13 years in New York, I see a lot of big cases on TV. I think the judges is fair."

The government had argued that the lawsuits should be dismissed without testimony because the extraordinary circumstances of the terror attacks justified extraordinary measures to confine noncitizens who fell under suspicion, and because top officials need governmental immunity to combat future threats to national security without fear of being sued\l "l".

The federal judge, John Gleeson of the United\l "l" States\l "l" District Court for the Eastern District of New York, disagreed, writing in his decision last September, "Our nation's unique and complex law enforcement and security challenges in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks do not warrant the elimination of remedies for the constitutional violations alleged here."

In all, 762 noncitizens were arrested in the weeks after 9/11, mostly on immigration violations, according to government records. Mr. Elmaghraby and Mr. Iqbal were among 184 identified as being "of high interest" to investigators and held in maximum-security conditions, in Brooklyn and elsewhere, until the F.B.I. cleared them of terrorist links. Virtually all were Muslims or from Arab countries.

That in itself is not evidence of discrimination, government lawyers wrote in the brief they filed on Friday with the Appellate Division, Second Department, because "the Al Qaeda terrorists who perpetrated the Sept. 11 attacks were Muslims from certain Arab countries" who "viewed themselves as conducting a religious war."

"There were no clear judicial precedents in this extraordinary context," the appeal brief said, calling the policy of holding people until they could be cleared "a bona fide response to a national catastrophe."

Unlike the detainees covered by the class-action lawsuit, who were held on immigration violations alone, Mr. Elmaghraby and Mr. Iqbal eventually pleaded guilty to minor federal criminal charges unrelated to terrorism: Mr. Elmaghraby to credit card fraud, Mr. Iqbal to having false papers and bogus checks. But they maintain that they did so only to escape the abuse. They were deported in 2003 after serving prison terms.

Mr. Iqbal was one of several detainees who returned to New York this year to give depositions in their lawsuits under conditions of extraordinary security, including the requirement that they be in constant custody of federal marshals and not call anybody. Mr. Elmaghraby did not come because of his ill health and because the settlement was close, said one of his lawyers, Haeyoung Yoon of the Urban Justice Center.

"His circumstances made it extremely difficult for him to continue," Ms. Yoon said. "But I also feel this is really the beginning of justice for what happened in New York and the United States after Sept. 11, the mass arrests, detention and basically disappearance of an entire community."

Mr. Elmaghraby, who had a weekend flea market stand at Aqueduct Raceway in Queens, was picked up on Sept. 30, 2001, in his apartment in Maspeth, Queens, when federal agents were investigating his landlord, apparently because years earlier the landlord, also a Muslim, had applied for pilot training. Mr. Elmaghraby says his wife, an American citizen, left him after being threatened with arrest by an F.B.I. agent when she arrived at his first court hearing.

Mr. Iqbal was arrested in his Long Island apartment on Nov. 2 by agents who were apparently following a tip about false identification cards. In his apartment they found a Time magazine showing the World Trade Center towers in flames and paperwork showing that he had been in Lower Manhattan on Sept. 11, picking up a work permit from immigration services.

The inspector general's report said that little effort was made to distinguish between legitimate terrorism suspects and people picked up by chance, and that clearances took months, not days, because they were a low priority. Among the abuses described in the report -- many of them caught on prison videotape -- were beatings, sexual humiliations and illegal recording of lawyer-client conversations.

After the report was released, Mr. Ashcroft said he made "no apologies" for finding every legal way to protect the public. Still, officials pledged to improve the system and punish abuses.

Traci L. Billingsley, a spokeswoman for the Federal Bureau of Prisons, said that its own investigation began in April 2004, after federal officials declined to prosecute.

She would not identify the 10 employees disciplined, but said that two had been fired and two demoted, and that the others had received suspensions ranging from 2 to 30 days. She listed the offenses as "lack of candor, unprofessional conduct, misuse of supervisory authority, conduct unbecoming, inattention to duty, failure to exercise supervisory responsibilities, excessive use of force, and physical and/or verbal abuse."

Because of the secrecy surrounding the cases, however, the taint of suspicion has been almost impossible for former detainees to dispel, their lawyers said. In one of the court hearings leading up to the return of the former detainees for depositions, for example, the federal magistrate asked what made them different from anyone else suing the government, "other than their ethnicity."

Ernesto H. Molina Jr., a Justice Department lawyer representing Mr. Ashcroft, replied, "That they came under the umbrella of a terrorist investigation, your honor."

Judge overturns Defense labor relations reforms

By Karen Rutzick

A judge ruled Monday that the Defense Department's new personnel system unlawfully diminishes collective bargaining, blocking the labor relations portion of the system from moving forward.

Judge Emmet Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia wrote in his decision that the department's regulations went beyond congressional intent.

"The design of these regulations appears to rest on the mistaken premise that Congress intended flexibility to trump collective bargaining rights," Sullivan said.

In the 2004 Defense authorization bill, Congress granted the department authority to create a new human resources system, based on the notion that the current system was too rigid and outdated to respond with agility to modern threats of terrorism.

The Pentagon issued regulations for its National Security Personnel System in November 2005, and a coalition of unions quickly filed a lawsuit over the labor relations portion of the plan.

Much of Sullivan's decision echoed, and even quoted from, an August 2005 decision issued by fellow District Judge Rosemary Collyer on the Homeland Security Department's similarly revamped labor relations system.

Collyer ruled that the DHS system was illegal because the department had the ability to override collective bargaining agreements by releasing so-called implementing issuances or documents from high-level officials amending the rules. Sullivan found that the Pentagon's system was similar enough to DHS' that much of Collyer's ruling applied.

"As was the case in [the DHS decision], this court concludes that . . . the new rule fails to ensure even minimal collective bargaining rights," Sullivan said. "As in [the DHS case], the regulations concerning management rights fail in this case because 'any collective bargaining negotiations pursuant to its terms are illusory: the secretary retains numerous avenues by which s/he can unilaterally declare contract terms null and void.' "

Sullivan went beyond Collyer's ruling in one area: He knocked down a new internal labor relations board, which would investigate and decide upon labor-management disputes in place of the governmentwide Federal Labor Relations Authority.

Collyer let DHS keep its board, but Sullivan ruled that the National Security Labor Relations Board, whose members would be appointed by the Defense secretary, "does not satisfy Congress' requirement for an 'independent third party' to review labor-management disputes."

Sullivan also ruled against the NSPS process for appealing personnel actions such as demotions, calling it "the antithesis of fairness." The judge cited the department's ability to reverse an appeal if it is found to affect the national security mission.

After Collyer issued her ruling, the Pentagon changed the standards by which the Merit Systems Protection Board could mitigate the penalty for employee misconduct. Originally the Pentagon followed DHS' lead and said the MSPB could not modify the department's penalties unless the action was found to be "wholly without justification." After the DHS ruling, the department changed its standard to "totally unwarranted in light of all pertinent circumstances."

But the change did not convince Sullivan: "The 'totally unwarranted' standard merely provides further evidence that this process fails to provide employees with fair treatment," he said.

Sullivan did rule in favor of the Pentagon in two areas. The unions argued that the department failed to meet its obligation to collaborate with them in creating the system. Sullivan said the department followed the law, however.

"While defendants may not have met Congress' requirements with enthusiasm, the court finds no evidence that defendants acted in bad faith," Sullivan said, citing numerous meet-and-confer sessions and the public comment period.

Also, the unions tried to argue that the department never had authority to broadly revamp the labor relations system beyond a couple of specific changes expressly stated by Congress. Sullivan found, though, that the "language of the statute" shows that "Congress clearly authorized defendants to establish a labor relations system that modifies" the current one.

Sullivan blocked implementation of the adverse action and appeals section of NSPS permanently, but he invited the government to submit a new labor-management relations proposal that complies with his ruling.

Both sides also have the right to appeal the parts of the decision that went against them, and both sides said their lawyers are reviewing the ruling to determine next steps.

In the DHS case, both sides chose to appeal unfavorable aspects of Collyer's decision. Lawyers had until Monday to file briefs in the appellate court, which will hear oral arguments April 6.

Court rules that IRS inappropriately outsourced mailroom work

By Jenny Mandel

A federal court ruled last week that the Internal Revenue Service acted illegally in spending fiscal 2004 appropriations to outsource its mailroom operations without first holding a public-private job competition.

The ruling by the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia (Civil Action 04-CV-0820) concluded that IRS spending on task orders for employees of Alexandria, Va.-based ServiceSource to perform mailroom work violated the 2004 omnibus appropriations act.

That act barred the IRS from using funds "to convert to contractor performance an activity or function ... unless ... the conversion is based on the results of a public-private competition plan."

Nancy Mathis, an IRS spokeswoman, said, "At the time the IRS awarded the contract for mailroom service, the agency believed it was in compliance with all procurement rules and regulations."

But Louis Oberdorfer, the district judge deciding the case, ruled that while the IRS signed a contract with ServiceSource before the act took effect, the conversion to private operations did not take place until task orders were written under that contract. Those task orders were written during the period covered by the 2004 appropriations act, leading Oberdorfer to conclude they were illegal.

Because of congressional delays in passing spending bills for fiscal 2004 and 2005, the ban on spending for direct conversions applied to the period of Jan. 23, 2004, through Dec. 8, 2004.

The National Treasury Employees Union, which filed the suit in May 2004, is seeking reinstatement with back pay for 44 employees who lost their jobs as a result of the conversion.

NTEU President Colleen Kelley called the decision "the culmination" of the union's efforts against direct conversions, in which agencies give federal jobs to contractors without competition under the guidelines of Circular A-76, the rulebook governing public-private job contests.

"NTEU's intention is to hold the IRS -- and other federal agencies -- accountable for every act they do that works to the detriment of their employees," Kelley said following the decision.

In his ruling, Oberdorfer asked NTEU and IRS to submit briefings within 30 days on their proposed remedies. Robert Shriver, a lawyer with NTEU who worked on the case, said the parties could settle or the remedy could be decided through the court in a process that could take "a few months." Shriver said NTEU will continue to argue for reinstatement with back pay for the affected employees.

Mathis said it was too early to know what remedy the IRS might present in its briefing. "We're still reviewing the decision," she said.

Deadline nears for move off ships; But St. Bernard residents' lawsuit against FEMA still up in the air

By Susan FinchStaff writer

The Federal Emergency Management Agency said Monday it will meet a Wednesday deadline to get more than 1,400 people, most of them first responders and their families in New Orleans and in St. Bernard Parish, out of emergency quarters on three cruise ships and into ready-to-occupy travel trailers or local hotel rooms.

But there could be a partial change in plans depending on the outcome of negotiations between FEMA lawyers and an attorney for St. Bernard residents who on Friday sued to force FEMA to keep one of the vessels, the Scotia Prince, berthed for another six months in Violet.

It's unclear whether the outcome of that suit also would affect Carnival Cruise Lines' Ecstasy and Sensation, which are moored in New Orleans. But Chalmette lawyer Michael Ginart Jr., who represents the St. Bernard plaintiffs, said he hopes to convince FEMA brass that the Scotia Prince is providing the storm-ravaged parish "special services, not just occupancy."

The number of evacuees on board the ship has dwindled, but Ginart said many St. Bernardians depend on it for an average of more than 2,500 daily meals, as well as access to a computer server and the ship's doctor.

Ginart and a FEMA lawyer said they might be able to reach an accord before Wednesday morning, when they are scheduled to report their progress to U.S. District Judge Peter Beer.

But there was no agreement Monday on the number of people actually aboard the Scotia Prince. Ginart pegged it at 643, but FEMA spokesman David Passey said that as of Sunday night, the number of passengers was down to 158, after a check showed many people had left without removing their names from the ship manifest.

Ginart said the Scotia Prince could act as a kind of transfer station, housing residents until they move on to trailers and making room on the vessel for more homeless evacuees. He also said that travel trailers being readied for people moving off the ship had been set aside for other St. Bernard residents, but those people now will have a longer wait.

At FEMA's daily press briefing Monday, Passey said that no one housed on the Scotia Prince, as well as Carnival's ships, will have to leave the vessels without having another place to stay.

As of Monday, Passey said, there were 499 people on the Ecstacy and 771 on the Sensation. More than 100 people departed on Sunday from the two ships combined, he said.

Passey said his agency has been working with the Police Foundation of New Orleans to try to find apartments in the city for police officers, firefighters, emergency medical technicians and their families.

Foundation executive director Bob Stellingworth said the group has "placed over 100 officers in apartments already" without FEMA's help and has been urging the agency to concentrate on that approach.

Stellingworth said FEMA took the foundation's advice on Saturday, but with the late start, "the original plan to have them in apartments or trailers just isn't going to happen by March 1."

Putting first responders into travel trailers on anything more than an interim basis, Stellingworth said, could prompt hundreds of firefighters and police to pull up stakes and go to work in other cities that already are courting them, like Houston and Dallas.

"We're still lobbying for the larger, 1,000-square-foot mobile homes similar to the ones (at a FEMA staging area) in Arkansas," he said. "We believe they should bring those down here and use them."

Passey said transfer of evacuees off cruise ships is the next, required step for FEMA to return them to permanent housing.

Asked about a need to keep the Scotia Prince in St. Bernard because the parish lacks grocery stores now, Passey said the majority of parish residents have found ways to shop for food.

"The federal government's role isn't feeding people for extended periods of time," he said, adding that the American Red Cross and other groups of volunteers will be in St. Bernard over the coming weeks to lend residents a hand.

New Orleans hotels probably would have enough rooms to accommodate people from the cruise ships, according to Darius Gray, president of the Greater New Orleans Hotel and Lodging Association.

He said his group was expecting FEMA to tap into hotel rooms for current cruise residents, but as of Monday had not been contacted about it.

"We just don't know what's going on," he said. "If we do know what's going on, we could certainly plan and assist in a much more effective manner."

ACLU Fighting Against Boy Scouts

By Bill O'Reilly, Andrew Napolitano, Show: THE O'REILLY FACTOR

O'REILLY: Back of the Book segment, as you may know the ACLU is trying to get Boy Scouts of America banned from using any public facility, the ACLU claiming Boy Scouts is a bigoted organization.In San Diego the ACLU won. The Boy Scouts were forced to leave Balboa Park. In addition to that, the city is reportedly going to pay the ACLU close to $1 million in legal fees. And that's happening all over the country.

Joining us now to explain is FOX News senior judicial analyst Judge Andrew Napolitano.

I mean, this is so bad it hurts.

JUDGE ANDREW NAPOLITANO, FOX NEWS JUDICIAL ANALYST: It's not a happy story.

O'REILLY: No, it's so bad it hurts. They have been, the ACLU has been successful in convincing the courts that, you know, no public facility should be used to aid the Boy Scouts. And then when they win, the judge awards them fees paid by the taxpayer. Is that how it goes down?

NAPOLITANO: That's correct, because the state of California, as have many states, and the Congress enacted statutes that encourage litigation to enforce people's civil rights. And the statutes say if you prevail against the government, you not only get the money that the jury awarded you, you get your legal fees paid for by the government against which you have prevailed.

O'REILLY: Is that in all cases?

NAPOLITANO: That is in virtually all civil rights and civil right cases.

O'REILLY: Can the judge say no?

NAPOLITANO: The judge cannot say no. The judge has discretion to the amount of the fees. So if the lawyers are asking for $750 an hour, he's going to say no, that's not too, much but I'll pay you a reasonable fee. The statutes say the fees must be reasonable.

O'REILLY: All right. Because in Portland, Oregon, the same thing. ACLU throwing the Boy Scouts off schools. The Boy Scouts were presenting stuff in schools and they said no. The judge reversed the award of attorney's fees there.

NAPOLITANO: That -- THAT was probably based upon an Oregon state statute, which is an anomaly. Most of the statutes do not let the judge decline to award legal fees, and here's why. The Congress and the state legislators have enacted a class of statutes called remedial. They encourage litigation by almost hanging out, as a carrot, if you win, you'll get your lawyer's fees paid.

NAPOLITANO: And damages.

O'REILLY: Right.

NAPOLITANO: Because they want this type of litigation to rid society of the cancer of discrimination. That's what the case law says.

O'REILLY: Doesn't that give way to frivolous lawsuits, though?

NAPOLITANO: It does. It does. Bill, it wasn't so long when I was in law school, it was unethical to encourage litigation. Now the legislatures have encouraged it by offering to pay legal fees.

O'REILLY: Now, in order to stop this, Congress would have to pass a law, right?

NAPOLITANO: And the state legislatures would have to pass a law. New York state, where you and I are right now, has one of the most liberal laws in the nation.

O'REILLY: Shocking.

NAPOLITANO: No, not shocking at all. But, of course, it results in taxpayer dollars…

O'REILLY: Sure.

NAPOLITANO: … ending up in the ACLU's treasury.

O'REILLY: Well, we've got it right here. ACLU has what, $120,000 in the state of Kentucky; $40,000, Tennessee; $180,000, Oregon; and $950,000 in California. Just -- and that's just a few.

Now if they lose, the ACLU loses, then they just go home, right?

NAPOLITANO: Correct.

O'REILLY: They don't get anything?

NAPOLITANO: The rule in the United States is you pay your own legal fees, except for this class of remedial statutes, where the fee shifts so that the loser, if it's the government, if it's the defendant, pays. If the ACLU lawyer sues\l "l" and the government\l "l" wins, there's no legal fee paid.

O'REILLY: All right. And most of these ACLU lawyers are working pro bono anyway.

NAPOLITANO: Right.

O'REILLY: So there's not a lot of big investment. All right, Judge, we got it, and there you go. Encouraging lawsuits in America.

NAPOLITANO: Unbelievable.

O'REILLY: Next, we'll wrap things up with The Most Ridiculous Item of the Day and some of your mail.

Ex-prosecutor fights back: Convertino says Justice Department has ruined his career

David Ashenfelter

Detroit Free Press

Feb. 28--A former federal prosecutor accused the U.S. Department of Justice on Monday of destroying his career because he publicly criticized its handling of the war on terror.

But Richard Convertino\l "l" stopped short of predicting that he would be indicted for alleged prosecutorial misconduct in a 2003 Detroit terrorism trial -- the first in the nation to result from the federal probe of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"I've been Swift-boated," Convertino\l "I" said at a news conference in Plymouth, referring to the 2004 campaign ads that attacked the war record of Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry, who served on Navy Swift boats in Vietnam. "I did nothing wrong."

Former Plymouth newspaper publisher W. Edward Wendover, a family friend who organized Monday's news gathering, said Convertino\l "I" believes he will be indicted soon over his handling of the terrorism trial.

Convertino\l "I" said he properly handled all of his cases as a prosecutor, including the Detroit terrorism case, although he is human and may have made some mistakes.

He also said he remains convinced that the evidence against the defendants in the terrorism case was overwhelming.

Two Detroit-area immigrants were convicted in U.S. District Court in Detroit in June 2003 for conspiring to provide material support and resources to terrorists.

The Bush administration initially hailed the convictions as a victory in its war on terror.

But the U.S. Attorney's Office later persuaded the trial judge to drop the terrorism charges on the grounds that Convertino\l "I" withheld crucial evidence from the defendants. Convertino\l "I" disputes that accusation.

The Justice Department has been investigating Convertino\l "I", who resigned and went into private practice last year, since late 2003 and recently finished calling witnesses before a grand jury in Detroit.

Custer: Firm lost money on Iraq work; Custer Battle lost $1.4 million, he says, after its top manager in Iraq "lost control of the [currency] project."

BY JOHN E. MULLIGAN
Journal Washington Bureau

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Rhode Island-based Custer Battles LLC spent about $1.4 million more than it was ever paid for its work on the project at the heart of the war-profiteering charges against the company, one of its cofounders testified in federal court yesterday.

"I have personally added up all the different buckets of information and I know exactly how much was spent on this project and it was millions of dollars more than we were paid," Scott Custer testified as the trial of the case against his company entered its ninth day in U.S. District Court here.

Custer denied any fraud in the Custer Battles accounting for a project to replace Iraq's national currency. The lawsuit alleging millions of dollars worth of such fraud was brought by two whistleblowers -- a former employee and a former business associate of the defendants.

Custer echoed last week's testimony by the co-owner of the firm -- former Rhode Islander Michael J. Battles -- that the two had little day-to-day involvement in the firm's billings to the U.S.-led Coalition Provisional Authority, which awarded several multimillion-dollar contracts to Custer Battles.

Custer said he "managed the people who managed the people who managed the contracts." Among such managers, Custer testified that one former employee, William D. "Pete" Baldwin, was largely to blame for what Custer portrayed as an unauthorized expansion of the key contract that led to the unauthorized spending that caught the eye of U.S. investigators in Iraq. Baldwin is one of the whistleblowers whom the defendants have portrayed as embittered former associates who stand to profit from the lawsuit.

As the Iraqi Currency Exchange project was going awry in the fall of 2003, Custer testified, "My role was trying to juggle 1,000 balls at a time" as one of the two owners of a company "with a 7,000-percent growth rate at the time."

Custer also said, "I constantly beat up Mr. Baldwin," over what he described as Baldwin's failure to stay in close communication with the home office.

Specifically, Custer charged Baldwin with sometimes "going dark for three, four, five days" when he was the only ranking company official in Iraq with responsibility for the project, and Custer and Battles were in the United States, often at their Rhode Island offices. "We didn't know what was happening. We didn't know if people were getting killed. We didn't know anything."

Between mid-September and early November of 2003, Custer said Baldwin "lost control of the project," permitting its unauthorized expansion and the unauthorized expenditure of sums that later became the source of accounting disagreements, an investigation by Pentagon agents and the current lawsuit.

Custer said the company spent about $13 million on the project, but was paid only $11.6 million by the CPA.

His testimony contrasted with his repeated praise for Baldwin, documented in e-mails.

Custer said he praised Baldwin "to try to pump him up." He said his criticisms were verbal, rather than written.

Four heart surgeons under investigation for billing

EUGENE, Ore._Four Eugene heart surgeons are under federal investigation for allegedly submitting false billing claims to Medicare, according to court documents.

The doctors, who have not been charged, have each hired attorneys.

The investigation first drew public attention last March when federal agents raided the Eugene offices of the doctors, taking with them boxes of billing records and copies of computer hard drives.

Information about the case has been limited because neither federal investigators nor the doctors have been willing to discuss the case publicly.

But details have surfaced in court documents filed last month in U.S. District Court in Portland.

The doctors are David Duke, Stanley Baldwin, Warren Glover and Richard Hicks, who is now retired.

All are veteran surgeons who ran an independent practice called Cardiovascular Surgical Associates until November 2004, when PeaceHealth, owner of Eugene's Sacred Heart Medical Center, purchased the practice and the doctors became PeaceHealth employees.

But PeaceHealth did not know the doctors were already under federal investigation at the time, said Robert Weaver, a Portland lawyer representing PeaceHealth.

PeaceHealth spokesman Brian Terrett said not even the doctors knew they were under federal investigation until the March 2005 raid.

Documents filed by government\l "l" lawyers\l "l" say they are investigating billing practices of Cardiovascular Surgical Associates.

A former employee of the practice alleged that the doctors submitted false claims to Medicare for its "Assistant at Surgery" billings. Specifically, the employee alleged the practice scheduled and billed Medicare for assistants at surgery who "were not performing procedures that would justify their presence," in violation of federal law, the court documents say.

"Assistant at Surgery" apparently refers to the common practice of having a second surgeon on the other side of the operating table from the main surgeon, who provides another set of hands and eyes as well as expertise if the operation gets complicated.

While the investigation continues, a legal skirmish has broken out over a PeaceHealth file that government investigators want.

Sometime before they sold to PeaceHealth, the doctors hired a Boston lawyer, Thomas Crane, who specializes in defending and advising doctors in health care fraud and abuse cases. Terrett said it's not uncommon for doctors to seek legal advice to avoid running afoul of Medicare billing rules.

Last August, PeaceHealth lawyers notified the government that they had found a copy of a file belonging to Crane, and that Crane had provided legal advice to the Eugene doctors.

The PeaceHealth lawyers said they were willing to waive attorney-client privilege and turn the file over to the government. But then Robert Hoevet, a Portland lawyer representing Baldwin, contacted the PeaceHealth lawyers and objected, saying attorney-client privilege still existed between the doctors and Crane, the attorney.

"We're caught in the middle," Weaver said. "We're holding this bag and we're waiting for someone to tell us who to give it to."

Lawrence Matasar, a Portland lawyer representing Duke, said on behalf of all four doctors that they had no comment on the investigation.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Nesler also declined to comment.

The judge in the case is expected to rule some time after March 20 whether the doctors can intervene, and whether their attorney-client privilege over the file still exists.

Please see the attached list of draft questions I pulled together. We can discuss at your office.

Michael

1. The McCain – Graham Amendment (1) requires that US government interrogators comply with the interrogation guidelines set forth in the US Army Field Manual and (2) prohibits the "cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" of anyone in US government custody anywhere in the world. The Amendment does not, however, define what constitutes "Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment (what is commonly referred to as "CID"), although CID is held to mean anything that what would otherwise be prohibited under the Fifth, Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution or, as Senator McCain has stated, it would ban any treatment that "shocks the conscience" such as mock executions or water-boarding. _____ do you believe McCain-Graham provides adequate guidance to interrogators as to what is permissible interrogation techniques? For example, what constitutes "degrading"? Is it degrading to have a female interrogate a Muslim prisoner? Is it cruel to detain someone used to cold weather in Cuba?

2. Opponents of McCain-Graham have argued that the Amendmnet would deprive the American Government of necessary tools needed to collect information. Do you believe stress techniques which were previously authorized for use at Guantanamo such as sleep deprivation or adjustment, temperature manipulation, food deprivation, isolation, wall-standing, hooding, subjecting detainees to noise, are cruel, inhuman and degrading techniques that should be banned by McCain-Graham? Or are these interrogation techniques that can produce reliable information – gathering that should not be banned?

3. Senator McCain has stated that what "shocks the conscience" is a subjective test given the context of the technique and the detainee. He would make the exception for the Ticking Bomb scenario where interrogation techniques that might ordinarily be viewed as cruel, inhuman and degrading would be permissible where the detainee was in possession of information that could stop an imminent terrorist operation. In this respect, is the McCain-Graham bill hypocritical? Isn't it stating that we shouldn't use coercive techniques unless we need to?

4. A much debated topic was whether we should draw an exemption for CIA officials. The theory was that we are attempting to address two very different circumstances. The first is what is appropriate behavior for the US military in treating POWs. For example, what techniques should govern how prisoners in Iraq are treated and questioned, and here we are discussing POWs and illegal combatants who are not in possession of sensitive information. The second circumstance considers whether stress techniques are appropriate if applied under a controlled setting, by trained professionals and only with respect to those illegal combatants in possession of sensitive information. Again, the argument is not that the CIA should be permitted to "torture" (Break bones, conduct beatings etc), but to apply stress-interrogation techniques which we don't want untrained personnel using. _____, do you believe whether we should make such a distinction?

5. Follow Up to 4: Does McCain – Graham implicitly allow for this exemption? Would it shock the conscience for a CIA agent to use stress techniques upon a terrorist detainee with knowledge of an imminent terrorist operation.

6. Many human rights watch organizations have argued that the "extended interrogation techniques" authorized by the Secretary of Defense created confusion among the military officers and servicemen as to how both POWs and illegal combatants should be treated. The argument goes that stress interrogation techniques designed for use at GITMO migrated to Iraq where soldiers in the field applied these techniques in "non-interrogation settings"; that these enhanced interrogation techniques created an environment that fostered numerous instances of reported abuses among US military that included 22 cases of non-accidental deaths, numerous beatings, broken bones and of course the instances reported at Abu Ghraib. Do you agree or disagree with this argument?

7. What are the consequences of the McCain-Graham? If stress techniques are now prohibited, will this lead to an increase in the use of renditions where detainees are forwarded to the custody of US allies who do not prohibit such stress techniques.

8. The Graham-Levin Amendment has been criticized as undermining the McCain-Graham protections through the inclusion of two provisions: the first, which provides that operatives who do use interrogation techniques that violate CID are shielded from legal penalties if they violated the ban while acting on "ordinary sense" or under the advice from a lawyer; the second, is that it explicitly enables the Combatant Status Review Tribunal to admit evidence extracted from a detainee by force based upon the statement's "value" to the case.

    a. Do these provisions amount, as some have maintained, to an authorization of torture as an interrogation technique?

9. Graham-Levin also prohibits detainees from directly challenging the legality of their detention in US Courts. This upends the Supreme Court decision that enabled Guantanamo detainees to file claims for wrongful imprisonment. [Discuss legal protections available to detainees. What should be permitted?]

- District Court Partially Invalidates New Personnel System at Department of Defense
  American Federation of Government Employees, et al. v. Rumsfeld, et al. [District for the District of Columbia]. On February 27, Judge Emmet Sullivan granted in part and denied in part the parties'cross motions in this case, a suit by labor unions challenging the Department of Defense's National Security Personnel System (NSPS). The Court ruled that the Department of Defense and Office of Personnel Management had sufficiently collaborated with labor unions in developing the Labor Relations portion of the NSPS, and that the agencies correctly determined that they have a statutory right to depart from Chapter 71 of Title 5 in constructing their Labor Relations system. The court found, however, that the Labor Relations system did not ensure that employees can bargain collectively, as required by statute, and that the National Security Labor Relations Board created by the Agencies to review certain labor disputes does not satisfy the statutory requirement of "independent third party review" because its members are appointed by the Secretary of Defense, serve solely at his discretion, are subject to agency performance reviews, and act in both investigatory and adjudicative capacities. The court also found that the NSPS process for appealing adverse personnel actions does not provide employees with "fair treatment" (finding instead that "the appeals process is the antithesis of fairness") for several reasons, including the fact that the regulations permit the Department of Defense to modify or reverse any decision of an administrative judge that the Department finds to be factually or legally incorrect. The court indicated that a "fair" appeal process would not permit one party to the dispute to unilaterally modify or reverse the decision of an independent adjudicator. The court permanently enjoined the NSPS appeals process and permanently enjoined the Labor Relations system unless and until the court approves a proposed order submitted by the government which would "selectively enjoin[ ]" the system in a manner consistent with the court's opinion.

- Second Circuit Determines that It Lacks Jurisdiction to Review the Immigration Judge's Discretionary Denial of Alien's Request for a Waiver of Inadmissibility Saloum v. U.S.C.I.S. [2d Cir.]. On February 6, the Second Circuit ruled that the amendments enacted by the REAL ID Act of 2005 did not override the jurisdiction-denying provisions of the immigration statute where the alien challenged a purely discretionary determination of the Immigration Judge, and did not raise any colorable constitutional claims or questions of law.

- Challenge Filed to Constitutionality of Public Company Accounting Oversight Board
  Free Enterprise Fund, et al. v. The Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, et al. [District of Columbia]. On February 7, plaintiffs filed a complaint challenging the constitutionality of portions of the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002 that create the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB), a nonprofit corporation that oversees audits of public companies subject to the securities laws. Plaintiffs allege that the creation of the PCAOB violates the separation of powers by vesting executive power in a private entity not sufficiently subject to Executive Branch control; violates the Appointments Clause because the PCAOB members are appointed by the Securities Exchange Commission rather than by the President or the head of an executive branch agency; and unconstitutionally delegates legislative power to the PCAOB by empowering it to promulgate rules and standards governing audits of public companies. Defendants, the PCAOB and its four individual members, are retaining private counsel and their deadline to respond to the complaint is March 2. We are considering whether to intervene in the case or take other appropriate action to defend the constitutionality of the statute and the interests of the United States.

- Seventh Circuit Concludes that It Does not Have Jurisdiction over the Denial of a Motion to Reopen Proceedings Where It Lacks Jurisdiction over the Underlying Claim Martinez-Maldonado v. Gonzales [7th Cir.]. On February 10, the Seventh Circuit dismissed two consolidated petitions for review for lack of jurisdiction. Observing that the Court lacked jurisdiction over the agency's discretionary denial of cancellation of removal, it held that where the Court lacks jurisdiction to review the underlying order, it also lacks jurisdiction over motions to reopen and reconsider arising out of that order.

- Federal Circuit Affirms Judgment Rejecting Employment Discrimination Claim Under the Congressional Accountability Act

Solomon v. Office of Compliance and Office of the Architect of the Capitol [United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit; Office of Compliance]. On February 13, the Federal Circuit (Lourie, Rader and Dyk, per curiam), issued a summary decision affirming the judgment of the Office of Compliance dismissing an employee's attempt to maintain an independent retaliation claim on the basis of alleged misstatements of a witness in a previous discrimination proceeding. The Office of Compliance had concluded that the action was barred by res judicata, and the court of appeals agreed in a decision issued just one business day after oral argument. The case arose under the Congressional Accountability Act, which makes specified anti-discrimination statutes applicable to employers in the Legislative Branch.

- Office of Personnel Management Subpoenaed in Suit Seeking Reimbursement of Federal Employee Health Benefits Fund
  Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois v. Cruz [Northern District of Illinois]. On February 14, the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) was served with a subpoena duces tecum in private litigation between the estate of a deceased federal employee and Blue Cross Blue Shield of Illinois, an insurance carrier under the Federal Employee Health Benefits Act. In this litigation, Blue Cross Blue Shield is attempting to enforce the employee's obligation to reimburse the Federal Employee Health Benefits Fund for amounts paid for certain health care services for the employee, because the employee received a tort recovery from a third party covering the injury for which the services were rendered. OPM's contract with Blue Cross Blue Shield requires Blue Cross Blue Shield to pursue such reimbursement. We have filed a Statement of Interest supporting Blue Cross in parallel state court proceedings and are working with OPM to consider our options in responding to the subpoena, much or all of which we believe is objectionable.

- Third Circuit Determines that Repeal of Suspension of Deportation Does not Have an Impermissible Retroactive Effect
  Hernandez v. Gonzales [3rd Cir.]. On February 14, the Third Circuit held that:
  (1) the alien had no due process right to apply for the discretionary relief of suspension of deportation; and (2) the repeal of suspension of deportation did not have an impermissibly retroactive effect on the alien, who pled guilty to a deportable offense, and became eligible for that form of relief, prior to its repeal. The Court distinguished INS v. St. Cyr, which held that the 1996 repeal of discretionary relief for certain criminal aliens under former section 212(c) was impermissibly retroactive.

- Challenge to Cuban Travel Disclosure Requirements Dismissed for Lack of Jurisdiction
  Sanders v. Snow [District of Columbia]. On February 16, Judge Reggie B. Walton issued an oral order from the bench dismissing this case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Plaintiff, Zachary Sanders, filed a class-action complaint in March 2005, seeking declaratory and injunctive relief to prevent federal defendants from imposing a proposed $10,000 civil monetary penalty against him (and others similarly situated) for failing to respond to a Requirement to Furnish Information about his unlicensed travel-related transactions in Cuba. Sanders claimed that any such penalty would violate his Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, as well as the Eighth Amendment's Excessive Fine Clause and the Administrative Procedure Act. Because there is an ongoing administrative proceeding to determine whether a final penalty should be imposed against Sanders, we moved to dismiss the action for lack of standing, ripeness, and exhaustion. The court dismissed the entire action from the bench after being satisfied that Sanders's administrative proceeding is still ongoing and not subject to undue delay.

- Court Denies Preliminary Injunction against Publishing Personal Information of Website Registrants

  Peterson v. National Telecommunications and Information Administration. On February 17, the district court denied plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction. Plaintiff sought to enjoin enforcement of a government requirement that registrants of Internet domain names in the ".us" domain publish their name, contact address, and telephone number in a public database. Although plaintiff publishes his name on his website, he alleged that the requirement would force him to disclose his personal address and telephone number in violation of his First Amendment right to speak anonymously. The district court concluded that plaintiff had not established any harm from the requirement because his home address and telephone already were easily obtainable from information he published on his website, and therefore that his speech was not anonymous. The court also concluded that the government's requirement was a content-neutral time, place, or manner restriction on speech valid under the First Amendment. Finally, the court held that the Administrative Procedure Act did not apply to the government's action because of the public contracts exception at 5 U.S.C. § 553(a)(2). Plaintiff's emergency motion for an injunction pending appeal was denied, and plaintiff's contact information and that of 17,000 other anonymous registrants was made public on February 21, 2006.

- Suit Filed In Baltimore Water Taxi Incident

  Indemnity Ins. Co. of N. Am., et al. v. United States, Civ. No. 06-422-WDQ [District of Maryland]. On Friday, February 17, plaintiff insurers filed suit against the United States and the Coast Guard alleging, among other things, negligent inspection of the water taxi that capsized in Baltimore Harbor in 2004. The subrogated claims appear to total $13 million.

- Supreme Court Affirms Injunction Allowing Religious Group to Ingest Sacramental Tea Containing a Hallucinogenic Controlled Substance

  O Centro Espirita Beneficiente Uniao Do Vegetal v. Ashcroft

  On February 21, the Supreme Court (per Roberts, C.J.), unanimously affirmed a decision of the En Banc Tenth Circuit upholding a preliminary injunction prohibiting the Government from prosecuting, threatening to prosecute, or otherwise interfering with the plaintiffs' use of a tea containing a hallucinogenic substance prohibited under Schedule I of the Controlled Substances Act. The Court held that the district court did not err in holding that the government had failed to demonstrate, with the necessary specificity required by the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, that the prohibition on "hoasca" furthers a compelling governmental interest. The Court rejected the government's assertion that the uniform application of the Controlled Substances Act justifies the prohibition, noting that an exception already exists for the use of peyote by Native American tribes. The Court acknowledged that the 1971 United Nations Convention on Psychotropic Substances requires the prohibition of hoasca, but concluded that the government had not shown (at the preliminary injunction stage) that compliance with the Convention constitutes a compelling governmental interest.

- Supreme Court Grants, Vacates, and Remands in Case Involving Foreign Sovereign Immunity from Attachment
  Ministry of Defense v. Elahi
  On February 21, in a per curiam opinion, the Supreme Court accepted the Government's recommendation to grant certiorari, vacate the court of appeals' judgment, and remand in a case implicating the immunity of a foreign sovereign from attachment under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA). Respondent, a judgment-creditor of Iran, sought to attach an international arbitration award in favor of Iran's Ministry of Defense that the Iranian ministry had reduced to judgment in the United States. The district court entered an order authorizing attachment, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed the order, holding that the Iranian ministry's judgment was subject to attachment under an exception to attachment immunity applicable to agencies or instrumentalities of foreign states. The judgment-creditor had not urged that ground as a basis for affirmance. After the ministry petitioned for certiorari, and in response to an invitation from the Court, the Government filed a brief that explained that: (1) under the FSIA, the exceptions to a foreign state's attachment immunity are narrower than the exceptions to the attachment immunity of a state's agencies or instrumentalities; (2) a ministry of defense is an integral part of a state, not a state agency or instrumentality; and (3) due to the posture of the case, the Iranian ministry did not have an opportunity to argue that it was part of the state rather than a state agency or instrumentality. The Supreme Court vacated the judgment and remanded the case for consideration of these issues.

- District Court Grants in Part, Denies in Part, Motion to Dismiss or Transfer in Locality and COLA Pay Case
  Matsuo v. United States [Hawaii] (Pro, J.). In this proposed class action challenging, among other things, the constitutionality of the statutory exclusion of employees in Hawaii and Alaska from the locality pay program established by the Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act, the district court on February 21, 2006, denied our motion to dismiss or transfer to the Court of Federal Claims plaintiffs' locality pay claims. The court granted, however, our motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction plaintiffs' additional claims challenging the statutory exclusion of the cost-of-living allowance (COLA) they receive from their "basic pay" for retirement purposes. As to the locality pay claims, the court dismissed plaintiffs' claims for damages and back pay, but held that jurisdiction exists under the APA over their claims for equitable relief, including a declaratory judgment that the exclusion of plaintiffs from the locality pay program is unconstitutional. In dismissing plaintiffs' COLA claims, the court agreed with us that such claims are subject to the exclusive review procedures of the Civil Service Retirement Act and the Federal Employees Retirement System Act.

- Commercial Branch Attorneys Speak At Department of the Treasury Debt Collection Seminar
  On February 21, 2006, John W. Showalter and Jonathan Welch gave presentations at the Department of the Treasury Financial Management Seminar on Debt Collection.

- District Court Invalidates Replacement of Federal Employees with Private Contractors at Internal Revenue Service
  National Treasury Employees Union v. Internal Revenue Service [District of Columbia]. On February 22, Judge Louis F. Oberdorfer denied the government's motion to dismiss and granted in part the plaintiff's motion for summary judgment . In 2003, the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) determined to convert its mailroom functions to private sector performance, and entered into a task-order contract for the provision of private contractors to replace federal employees as they departed, either voluntarily or through a contemplated reduction-in-force. Congress subsequently enacted the Treasury Department's fiscal year 2004 appropriations statute, which prohibited the expenditure of funds to "convert" a function to private performance without a public-private competition. The National Treasury Employees Union (NTEU) brought suit, claiming that the placement of task orders would violate that act. The district court held that it had jurisdiction over the action, ruling that NTEU had both constitutional and prudential standing to bring the suit, and that its jurisdiction was not revoked by either the Administrative Disputes Resolution Act or the Civil Service Reform Act. The court also held that the action was not moot, even though the IRS had spent only 2005 funds, which were subject to no similar restriction, to implement the reduction in force. On the merits, the court held that the agency's expenditure of funds to place task orders during 2004 constituted a prohibited conversion, and rejected the agency's contrary interpretation that "conversion" is a term of art that refers only to its prior decision to rely on public or private performance for a function. The court thus granted declaratory relief to the union and directed further briefing on the availability of any other remedies.

- Supreme Court Holds that Postal Exception to FTCA's Waiver of Sovereign Immunity Does not Apply to Most Physical Injuries Caused by the Delivery of the Mail
  Dolan v. United States Postal Service. On February 22, the Supreme Court construed the postal exception to the FTCA, 28 U.S.C. 2680(b), making the Act inapplicable to "[a]ny claim arising out of the loss, miscarriage, or negligent transmission of letters or postal matter." The Court held that "negligent transmission" did not extend to physical injuries caused to the plaintiff when she tripped over mail that was negligently placed on her doorstep, because such a holding would be inconsistent with the other terms of the exception - "loss and miscarriage." The Court gave "decisive weight" to its conclusion in Kosak v. United States, 465 U.S. 848 (1984), that "[o]ne of the principal purposes of the Federal Tort Claims Act was to waive the Government's immunity from liability for injuries resulting from auto accidents in which employees of the Postal System were at fault." Justice Thomas dissented. Justice Alito did not participate.

- Tenth Circuit Holds that the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act Authorizes the Equitable Remedy of Disgorgement
  United States v. Rx Depot [Tenth Circuit; Northern District of Oklahoma]. On February 22, the Tenth Circuit (Henry, McWilliams, Murphy) held that the traditional equitable remedy of disgorgement is available in civil actions under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. FDA obtained a consent decree and permanent injunction against defendant Rx Depot and several of its corporate officers for illegally importing prescription drugs from Canada. The district court denied the government's request for disgorgement of Rx Depot's illegal profits, however, concluding that the FDCA "does not contemplate such a remedy." The Tenth Circuit reversed that determination, concluding that disgorgement is authorized because the FDCA confers equity jurisdiction on the district courts, and absent an inescapable indication to the contrary, Congress is presumed to intend such a grant to authorize all traditional equitable remedies.

- Court Remands to Agency in Suit Challenging Privatization of Certain Air Traffic Control Services
  National Air Traffic Controllers Association v. Mineta [Northern District Ohio]. On February 23, Judge Ann Aldrich denied plaintiff National Air Traffic Controllers Association's (NATCA's) motion for summary judgment and granted in part and denied in part the Federal Aviation Administration's (FAA's) summary judgment motion and remanded the case to the FAA. The air traffic controllers union had brought this suit to challenge the FAA's policy of contracting out to private entities air traffic control services at control towers that guided a relatively low number of flights per hour. The Court rejected NATCA's national security argument against privatization. The Court also held that plaintiffs lack standing to challenge the privatization program on the basis that the FAA failed to perform any cost comparison study required by the Office of Management and Budget's Circular A-76.

- Court Upholds Cost-Containment Regulations for Supplemental Nutrition Program
  National Women, Infants, and Children Grocers Association et al. v. Food and Nutrition Service [District of Columbia]. On February 23, Judge Emmet G. Sullivan granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. This ruling upholds new regulations issued under the Special Supplemental Nutrition Program for Women, Infants, and Children (WIC), administered by the Department of Agriculture and individual state agencies. The Child Nutrition and WIC Reauthorization Act of 2004 requires state agencies to adopt new cost-containment measures affecting vendors that derive more than 50 percent of their annual food sales revenue from the WIC program. Plaintiffs, several WIC vendors and their trade association, challenged regulations recently promulgated to implement these requirements as inconsistent with the statute and as improperly issued without notice and comment or a regulatory flexibility analysis. Judge Sullivan concluded that the agency's interpretation of the Reauthorization Act is a permissible one, that the agency had good cause for issuing an interim rule without prior notice and comment, and that the agency was not required to perform a regulatory flexibility analysis.

- Reply Brief Filed in Support of Government's Subpoena to Google
  Gonzales v. Google Inc. [Northern District of California]. On February 24, the government filed its reply brief in support of its motion to compel compliance with a subpoena duces tecum. This action is ancillary to ACLU, et al. v. Gonzales (Eastern District of Pennsylvania), which concerns a challenge to the constitutionality of the Child Online Protection Act. The government's subpoena to Google seeks production of a sample of queries from its search engine and a sample of Internet addresses from its index of websites. The reply brief argues that these materials are relevant to the underlying action as they will form part of the test set to be used to prepare one of the government's expert reports. The brief further argues that these materials are not trade secrets of Google, and that Google nonetheless would be protected under the existing protective order. The brief also argues that Google would face only a minimal burden in complying with the subpoena, and that Google faces no risk of loss of customer confidence if it were to comply, as it already routinely allows the disclosure of the text of queries entered on to its search engine. Finally, the brief argues that the subpoena does not violate the Electronic Communications Privacy Act.

- Government Argues for Careful Consideration of Government Use Exceptions before Enjoining BlackBerry Use

NTP, Inc. v. Research in Motion, Ltd., [E.D. Va.] (Spencer, C.J.). On February 24, 2006, the United States appeared at a hearing on injunctive relief relating to NTP, Inc.'s patent infringement lawsuit against Research in Motion, Ltd. (RIM), the manufacturer of BlackBerry devices. RIM was previously held to have willfully infringed three NTP patents, although the Patent and Trademark Office, which is now conducting a reexamination of the patents, has since rejected two patents as invalid, and is expected to reject the third soon. Those decisions, however, are subject to appeal, and the court has ruled that it will not stay proceedings pending a final decision. While NTP has proposed broad exceptions to any injunction for federal, state and local governments, as well as first responders, we stressed the difficulties in identifying federal users and the need for both a clear plan and at least a 90 day grace period before any injunction takes effect.

· Court Rejects Constitutional Challenge to Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person Act

The Church of the Hills of the Township of Bedminster, et al. v. The Township of Bedminster, et al. (District of New Jersey). On February 24, Judge Chesler upheld the constitutionality of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Person Act of 2000, 42 U.S.C. § 2000cc et. seq. (RLUIPA). Plaintiffs brought several claims, including a claim under RLUIPA, after the Township of Bedminster denied the Church's application for a variance. The United States intervened to defend the statute. In an unpublished opinion, the court held that RLUIPA represents a permissible religious accommodation rather than an establishment of religion; and it does not violate the Tenth Amendment, because Congress did not try to create a substantive change to constitutional law, nor did it violate any principle of federalism since local and state governments are not being required to "legislate on behalf of the federal government." The court held that Congress had proper authority under Section V of the Fourteenth Amendment to enact RLUIPA because it merely codified existing First Amendment jurisprudence regarding the requirement that a system of individualized assessments cannot interfere with the free exercise of religion without satisfying strict scrutiny. Finally, the court held that RLUIPA falls within Congress's power under the Commerce Clause because RLUIPA contains a jurisdictional requirement that interstate commerce be affected before it is applied.

After visiting with U.S. troops stationed in Afghanistan and meeting with President Karzai, President and Mrs. Bush continued their trip to New Delhi, India. Upon arriving in New Delhi, the President is meeting with India's Prime Minister to discuss a range of issues important to the broadening and deepening relationship between our two countries.

In Kabul, President Bush Meets With Afghan President Hamid Karzai.
"President Bush, on an unannounced visit to Afghanistan, said Wednesday he remains confident Osama bin Laden 'will be brought to justice' despite a so-far futile five-year hunt. ... 'People all over the world are watching the experience here in Afghanistan,' Bush said as he stood side-by-side with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Amid extremely tight security, Bush made the surprise visit in Afghanistan at the onset of a scheduled visit to India and Pakistan. 'It's a thrill to come to a country which is dedicating itself to the dignity of every person who lives here,' Bush said. For his part, Karzai greeted Bush as 'our great friend, our great supporter, a man who helped us liberate.

In ABC Interview, President Bush Discusses Iraq's Political Path Forward. THE PRESIDENT: "There's no question that the bomber of the mosque is trying to create sectarian violence, and there's no question there was reaction to it. On the other hand, I had the duty, which I did, to call these leaders, Shi'a and Sunni leaders, as well as Kurdish leaders. And the response was that we understand this is a moment that we've got to make a choice if we're going to have sectarian strife or whether or not we're going to unify. And I heard loud and clear that they understand that they're going to choose unification, and we're going to help them do so. The presence of the U.S. troops is there to protect as many Iraqis as we possibly can from thugs and violence, but it's also to help the Iraqis protect themselves, and we're making progress in terms of standing up to these Iraqi troops so they can deal with, deal with these incidents of violence. ... I mean the ultimate success in Iraq - and I believe we're going to be successful - is for the Iraqi citizens to continue to demand unity. <http://abcnews.go.com/WNT/print?id=1671087> " ("Bush Not Worried About Low Approval Ratings," ABC News, 2/28/06)

President Bush Meets With Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi.
"President George W. Bush heaped praise on Iraq war ally Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi on Tuesday and called him a force for stability several weeks ahead of Italian elections. 'He's a man of his word, <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060228/pl_nm/bush_italy_dc&printer=1;_ylt=AjZS5F6JLlSqgKW5PaJJ5L0b.3QA;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE> ' Bush said after an Oval Office meeting with the Italian leader, who sent troops to Iraq when other European allies refused after the U.S.-led coalition invaded Baghdad nearly three years ago. Berlusconi, who has held power for the last five years, 'has brought stability to the Italian government,' Bush told reporters, adding that the consistency was helpful to his country's relationship with the United States." Intelligence Officials Detail Progress In The War On Terror, Negroponte Say Most Al-Qaeda Leaders Captured Or Killed. "Pakistani military forces have been driving Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters into neighboring Afghanistan, the Pentagon's top military intelligence officer said Tuesday. Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said Pakistan's military has done more fighting in the northwestern region of the country, next to Afghanistan. ... Meanwhile, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte testified that most of al-Qaeda's leadership as of 9/11 has been captured or killed <http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/news/20060301/a_pakistan01.art.htm> ." The Morning Update

From Today's Morning Headlines

In Kabul, President Bush Meets With Afghan President Hamid Karzai. "President Bush, on an unannounced visit to Afghanistan, said Wednesday he remains confident Osama bin Laden 'will be brought to justice' despite a so-far futile five-year hunt. ... 'People all over the world are watching the experience here in Afghanistan,' Bush said as he stood side-by-side with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Amid extremely tight security, Bush made the surprise visit in Afghanistan at the onset of a scheduled visit to India and Pakistan. 'It's a thrill to come to a country which is dedicating itself to the dignity of every person who lives here,' Bush said. For his part, Karzai greeted Bush as 'our great friend, our great supporter, a man who helped us liberate.'" (Terence Hunt, "Bush Confident Bin Laden Will Be Captured," The Associated Press, 3/1/06)

In ABC Interview, President Bush Discusses Iraq's Political Path Forward. THE PRESIDENT: "There's no question that the bomber of the mosque is trying to create sectarian violence, and there's no question there was reaction to it. On the other hand, I had the duty, which I did, to call these leaders, Shi'a and Sunni leaders, as well as Kurdish leaders. And the response was that we understand this is a moment that we've got to make a choice if we're going to have sectarian strife or whether or not we're going to unify. And I heard loud and clear that they understand that they're going to choose unification, and we're going to help them do so. The presence of the U.S. troops is there to protect as many Iraqis as we possibly can from thugs and violence, but it's also to help the Iraqis protect themselves, and we're making progress in terms of standing up to these Iraqi troops so they can deal with, deal with these incidents of violence. ... I mean the ultimate success in Iraq – and I believe we're going to be successful – is for the Iraqi citizens to continue to demand unity." ("Bush Not Worried About Low Approval Ratings," ABC News, 2/28/06)

President Bush Meets With Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi. "President George W. Bush heaped praise on Iraq war ally Italian Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi on Tuesday and called him a force for stability several weeks ahead of Italian elections. 'He's a man of his word,' Bush said after an Oval Office meeting with the Italian leader, who sent troops to Iraq when other European allies refused after the U.S.-led coalition invaded Baghdad nearly three years ago. Berlusconi, who has held power for the last five years, 'has brought stability to the Italian government,' Bush told reporters, adding that the consistency was helpful to his country's relationship with the United States." (Caren Bohan, "Bush Calls Italy's Berlusconi Force For Stability," Reuters, 2/28/06)

Intelligence Officials Detail Progress In The War On Terror, Negroponte Say Most Al-Qaeda Leaders Captured Or Killed. "Pakistani military forces have been driving Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters into neighboring Afghanistan, the Pentagon's top military intelligence officer said Tuesday. Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said Pakistan's military has done more fighting in the northwestern region of the country, next to Afghanistan. ... Meanwhile, Director of National Intelligence John Negroponte testified that most of al-Qaeda's leadership as of 9/11 has been captured or killed." The Morning Update

The President and Mrs. Bush continue their visit to India today, with President Bush and Prime Minister Singh discussing the strategic relationship between both countries. The United States and India have pledged to further strengthen economic, energy and security ties, and announced a groundbreaking nuclear agreement.

From Today's Morning Headlines

In India, President Bush And Prime Minister Singh Announce Nuclear Agreement That Will Benefit American Consumers. "President Bush <http://search.news.yahoo.com/search/news/?p=President +Bush> defended a nuclear agreement reached with India Thursday, saying the use of such fuel by that country could help ease energy prices in the United States.
Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh announced the landmark deal during a joint news conference after a meeting. ... He also said the deal could be a boon for U.S. consumers. 'Proliferation is certainly a concern and a part of our discussions, and we've got a good faith gesture by the Indian government that I'll be able to take to the Congress,' Bush said. 'But the other thing that our Congress has got to understand - that it's in our economic interests that India have a civilian nuclear power has got to understand - that it's in our economic interests that India have a civilian nuclear power industry to help take the pressure off of the global demand for energy. ... To the extent that we can reduce demand for fossil fuels, it will help the American consumer. <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/bush;_ylt=AgHL22zSu3YGxJ7h2TCr7wms0NUE;_ylu=X3oDMTA2Z2szazkxBHNlYwN0bQ--> '" (Deb Riechmann, "Bush Defends Nuclear Agreement With India," The Associated Press, 3/2/06)

President Bush And Prime Minister Singh Discuss Economic And Scientific Cooperation. "India and the United States agreed Thursday on a sweeping agenda for economic and scientific cooperation, one day after the two countries set a three-year target to double their trade. A joint commission on science and technology, more cooperation in cybersecurity and collaboration in agricultural research and the development of low-cost drugs to fight AIDS and bird flu were among the agreements reached during talks between President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, a joint statement said. ... 'People in the United States now understand trade with India is in their interest,' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060302/ap_on_bi_ge/india_us_business_ties;_ylt=Ar4AXeW612jeiZ5kaj0M0nZu24cA;_ylu=X3oDMTA5aHJvMDdwBHNlYwN5bmNhdA> he said." (Rajesh Mahapatra, "India, U.S. Agree On Economic Cooperation," The Associated Press, 3/2/06)

President Bush Condemns Terrorist Attack In Pakistan. "Bush condemned the attack and said 'terrorists and killers' would not prevent him from going to Pakistan on the final leg of his tour of South Asia. 'We have lost at least one U.S. citizen in the bombing, a foreign service officer, and I send our country's deepest condolences to that person's loved ones and family,' Bush said at a news conference in neighboring India, without naming the diplomat. 'Terrorists and killers are not going to prevent me from going to Pakistan.' <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060302/ap_on_re_as/pakistan_blasts;_ylt=AnAt4fXomKsUlGObNsPeh1hI2ocA;_ylu=X3oDMTA5aHJvMDdwBHNlYwN5bmNhdA> " (Zarar Khan, "4 Dead, Dozens Wounded In Karachi Blast," The Associated Press, 3/2/06)

Bipartisan Senate Vote Shows Strong Support For Patriot Act Renewal. "On a vote of 84-15, the Senate moved to end debate on a separate House-passed measure to renew the Patriot Act, with a vote on passage of it expected on Thursday. 'It is now crystal clear that (renewal of) the Patriot Act is on its way to becoming law <http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060301/pl_nm/security_patriot_dc> ,' said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican. 'Today's bipartisan vote of 84 senators ... brings us one step closer to ending the obstruction of America's No. 1 anti-terrorist tool,' Frist said, adding Democrats should stop their remaining delaying tactics." (Thomas Ferraro, "Senate Adds Safeguards To Patriot Act," Reuters, 3/1/06)

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Rep. Sensenbrenner (R-WI) Calls The Patriot Act A "Tremendous Asset" To National Security. "So what has the Patriot Act done? It has been a tremendous asset in helping thwart other terrorist attacks. The Justice Department and other agencies have properly utilized these new tools to detect, disrupt and dismantle terrorist cells in New York, Virginia and Oregon before they strike.
Since 9/11, the Justice Department has charged hundreds of defendants, of whom more than half have been convicted or pleaded guilty, as a result of terrorism-related investigations. Most important, this renewal would permanently tear down the pre-9/11 'wall' that prevented the FBI and CIA from communicating. This law recognizes the vital importance of sharing information to 'connect the dots.' The Patriot Act has made it much more difficult for America's enemies to live openly among us as they plot to murder innocent Americans. <http://www.usatoday.com/news/opinion/editorials/2006-03-01-opposing-view_x.htm> " (Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner, Jr., Op-Ed, "No Rights Have Been Violated," USA Today, 3/2/06)

New Data Reflects Economic Strength. "Strong income gains and unseasonably warm weather prompted consumers to spend more money than usual in January. Along with data showing manufacturing activity expanded in February, that suggests the economy is on track for robust first-quarter growth <http://online.wsj.com/article/SB114121849664186415.html?mod=economy_lead_story_lsc> . Personal income of Americans increased 0.7% in January, the biggest jump since September, according to the Bureau of Economic Analysis. The gain amounted to roughly $75.2 billion. At the same time, consumer spending increased 0.9%, about $76.7 billion, the largest climb in six months." NBC – MEET THE PRESS

MR. TIM RUSSERT: Our issues this Sunday: Iraq. Hundreds of civilians die as Iraqis, Sunnis and Shiites kill each other. Is this a civil war? What does it mean for the 130,000 American troops on the ground? With us: the top military man at the Pentagon, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Peter Pace.

Then, the debate rages over foreign investment in our ports, and a Council on Foreign Relations task force focuses on the growing concern over the anti-Democratic behavior of Russian President Vladimir Putin. With us: the co-authors of that report. He was the Democratic candidate for vice president in 2004, former Senator John Edwards. And he was the Republican candidate for vice president in 1996, former Congressman Jack Kemp. Edwards and Kemp, together only on MEET THE PRESS.

But first, what is going on in Iraq? Why the dramatic increase in bloodshed?

With us: our nation's top military man, General Peter Pace.

General, welcome.

GEN. PETER PACE: Thanks, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: What's going on in Iraq?

GEN. PACE: Well, what happened in Iraq was you have the extremists who see that the Iraqi people are going to the polls and voting for their own freely elected government. The terrorists are becoming more desperate—so desperate that they destroy one of their own most sacred shrines in an attempt to cause civil war and strife. The Iraqi people—the Kurds, Sunnis, and Shia—have walked up to that abyss, looked in and said, "That's not where we want to go." The Iraqi police, the Iraqi armed forces have maintained good calm, and the Iraqi people themselves and their leaders are saying, "Let's remain calm and let's figure this out together."

MR. RUSSERT: If you were to be asked whether things in Iraq are going well or badly, what would you say? How would you answer?

GEN. PACE: I'd say they're going well. I wouldn't put a great big smiley face on it, but I would say they're going very, very well from everything you look at, whether it be on the political side where they've had three elections, they've written their own constitution, they're forming their government. You look at the military side where this time last year there were just a handful of battalions in the field, Iraqi battalions in the field. Now there are over 100 battalions in the field. They had no brigades—that's about 3,000 men each. Now they've got about 31 brigades. No matter where you look at their military, their police, their society, things are much better this year than they were last.

MR. RUSSERT: The American people were asked that exact same question, how things are going in Iraq, and here's how they responded: Well, 36; badly, 62. Why do you think there's such a disconnect from your view and that of the American people?

GEN. PACE: I don't think we're getting the goodness out to the American people the way we should. Somehow we need to find a way to have balance in the amount of reporting that we're able to get out. If you remember back when the war began, we had 24/7 coverage. Folks could watch television, they could read newspapers, they could read magazines, and they could put together their own opinion of what's going on. Now the amount of coverage from the war zone is much less than it used to be, and understandably, the coverage, then, that comes out is the bombings and the things like that. People don't get a chance to see or hear about all the good things that are happening.

MR. RUSSERT: After the mosque was blown up, General Casey this week talked to the Pentagon reporters, and let me show you a small exchange he had with the press. Let's watch.

(Videotape):

General GEORGE CASEY (Commander, Multinational Force, Iraq): Could this happen again? Sure, yes, it could happen again. As I said, Iraq is not out of danger. There is still a terrorist threat here that is working to foment continued sectarian violence.

Unidentified Reporter: Is the country close to civil war, or could it fall into civil war?

GEN. CASEY: Anything can happen.

MR. RUSSERT: Anything can happen. Seventy-three percent of the American people believe we are headed to a likely civil war.

GEN. PACE: Anything can happen, and I agree with George Casey, and he's a very practical commander because he needs to be focused on the worst that could happen so he can be ready for it. Having said that, I believe that the Iraqi people having shown—shown in the last week to 10 days that they do not want a civil war. They are not attacking each other's mosque—mask—excuse me—mosques. You know, there was reports that there were hundreds of mosques attacked, not true, the number is somewhere in the range of about 30, of which less than half a dozen actually had significant damage done. The Iraqi people want to have calm, and they're working hard together, especially amongst their leaders, both political and religious, to maintain that calm.

MR. RUSSERT: But three-fourths of the deaths that have occurred over the last few weeks are executions largely tied to militias—the Sunni militia, the Shiite militia. Isn't that an indication of how insecure things are on the ground that these militias have risen up and are quite powerful entities?

GEN. PACE: The militia are a problem, they are a concern. The Iraqi government has clearly stated that there is no room in Iraq for militias that are not subordinate to the Iraqi government. There are some still that are out there performing duties for leaders who are not elected leaders. That is something to be dealt with, but it is not a major long-term problem as long as the Iraqi armed forces and the Iraqi police continue to be loyal to the central government, as they have been.

MR. RUSSERT: But the Interior Ministry has death squads that have—going into mosques and killing Sunnis.

GEN. PACE: I don't know that that's true. I know that there are death squads; I do not believe that they're responsive to leaders in the Interior Ministry. I think they're responsive to non-elected, non-appointed leaders. Regardless of who they're responsive to, they are a problem, they need to be dealt with. The Iraqi government is working very hard to vet all of those individuals who join their police forces, join their armed forces. They're working hard to ensure they have a balanced force—Sunni, Shia, Kurd—and they intend to have a loyal police force and a loyal army.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you have confidence in Mr. Jafari to be prime minister, the leader of Iraq?

GEN. PACE: Doesn't make any difference what Pete Pace thinks one way or the other. The only thing that's important is do the Iraqi people want him to be their prime minister? And if they do want him to be their prime minister, he should be. Or...

MR. RUSSERT: But if you have 130,000 American troops on the ground, the top military man doesn't have confidence in Mr. Jafari as a leader?

GEN. PACE: I didn't say that. What the top military man's saying, that's out of my lane. And although I certainly have an opinion and certainly will support the elected prime minister of the country, it's inappropriate for me to say one way or the other while the Iraqis are still deciding who their leader should be what my opinion is of one of their potential leaders.

MR. RUSSERT: Mr. Jafari said that one of his favorite American writers is Professor Noam Chomsky, someone who has written very, very strongly against the Iraq war and against most of the Bush administration foreign policy. Does that concern you?

GEN. PACE: I hope he has more than one book on his nightstand.

MR. RUSSERT: So it troubles you?

GEN. PACE: I would be concerned if the only access to foreign ideas that the prime minister had was that one author. If in fact that's one of many, and he's digesting many different opinions, that's probably healthy.

MR. RUSSERT: There's a lot of concern that the judgments made about the war before we went in have just proven not to be correct. There were no weapons of mass destruction, as been promised, in effect, as the primary rationale for the war; we were told we'd be greeted as liberators, that there would not be a long, protracted, bloody insurrection. How can we have been so wrong?

GEN. PACE: Well, first of all, with regard to the weapons of mass destruction, I certainly believed there were—that we would encounter them. We had our troops fully ready to be attacked by chemical weapons. So those of us who were in leadership responsibility positions believed that, that was in fact true. Turned out, at least to date, that we have not found any new. We have found some—some of the older caches, but no new weapons. Bottom line is that the Iraqi people are—are still so much better off today than they were under Saddam Hussein, that they've had three elections. They are getting their own government. They are able to move about to go to school, girls go to school. I mean, no matter what section of the society you look at right now, they are better off today than they were under Saddam Hussein.

MR. RUSSERT: Several conservative writers have reflected on the war this past week. Here's George Will in the Washington Post. He wrote this:

"Almost three years after the invasion, it is still not certain whether, or in what sense, Iraq is a nation. After two elections and a referendum on its constitution, Iraq barely has a government. A defining attribute of a government is that it has a monopoly on the legitimate exercise of violence. That attribute is incompatible with the existence of private militias of the sort that maraud in Iraq. Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute, writing in the Wall Street Journal, reports that Shiite militias 'have broken up coed picnics, executed barbers [for the sin of shaving beards] and liquor store owners, instituted their own courts, and posted religious guards in front of girls' schools to ensure Iranian-style dress.' Iraq's other indispensable man, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, says that unless the government can protect religious sites, 'the believers will.'"

Were there too few American troops in Iraq initially, in order to guarantee security for the Iraqi people? An absent security, this has created, fostered the growth of these militias and this sectarian war.

GEN. PACE: Let me take it backwards. First of all, there were many more militias before than there are now. That did not mean that militias are not a threat, they are. And as we've talked about already, the Iraqi government has a plan to deal with them so that the militias must be dealt with, and they must come under a central Iraqi government control.

With regard to the numbers of troops, it was then and is now a balancing act between having enough troops to get the job done and too many troops to be oppressive and creating more problems than resolving. I have been a member of the joint chiefs for the last four and a half years. I have been present when Tom Franks, early on, now George Casey and John Abizaid, each of the generals who've been in positions of responsibility, have come forward with their recommendations. I've sat with the joint chiefs of staff and reviewed those recommendations for troop—troop strength. We have made the recommendation to the secretary of defense and the president that the troop strength that the commanders are recommending is correct, so I am, have been very comfortable that what size force that the commanders have asked for is correct and that the balance between having enough and too many is about right. Most importantly, what is needed is more Iraqi troops, and in the last year, over 100,000 additional troops have been added to the Iraqi government. There's 232,000 police and army Iraqis right now serving their country. That's a enormous increase in their schedule to get up to 335,000 by the end of this year, which is exactly what we want. You do want more troops, but you want them to be more Iraqi troops.

MR. RUSSERT: General, many observers—objective observers say that you cannot have an insurgency this robust without being enabled by the population. Now, Lawrence Kaplan in The New Republic, who—a supporter of the war, said that he wrote on a story of a young man that called emergency line 130 to report insurgents shooting mortars; no one answered the line. And then he said you don't do it again because if you call that emergency line, insurgents get a hold of your phone number and come kill you.

GEN. PACE: Think about the two things that you said. One—one was that they're being supportive, and another is fear. I believe it's the fear factor, not the support factor. The tip line last March was getting about 400 tips per month. Now it's upwards of 4,000 tips per month that are coming in from Iraqi citizens telling their government and telling us where—where problems are.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you believe that the insurgency is in its last throes?

GEN. PACE: I believe that the Iraqi people are waiting to see what their government is going to do. Are they going to provide the kind of future that they have voted their government to provide for them? And I believe that the vast majority of those who are currently either afraid of the insurgents or taking money from the insurgents because it's the only way they get—they have to provide sustenance for their families, that those individuals will move more and more over to the side of the government as they see that the government is providing the kinds of services that a government should provide for its people.

MR. RUSSERT: But we have been told the insurgency was just a small group of dead-enders, that it was in its last throes. That just isn't correct, is it?

GEN. PACE: I think what is correct is that the number of individuals who will participate in insurgent-like activities is going to be dependant on not only military power, but more importantly economic and political power that's taking place in the country.

If you have an opportunity to get a job and feed your family, you're much less likely to accept $100 dollars to go plant a bomb on the side of the road. This is not about ideology, it's about sustaining your families in many cases. Once we have the Iraqi government functioning the way it should be, I think you'll see that the vast majority of those who, in the past, had be willing to participate in insurgent-like activity, will no longer do so.

MR. RUSSERT: And if it doesn't?

GEN. PACE: If what does not?

MR. RUSSERT: If it doesn't happen that way? If it doesn't play out that way, what happens then?

GEN. PACE: We continue to press forward until we are able to have the government that, in Iraq, that provides those kinds of services. I believe that it will, that we will in fact have a government that provides services to the people that are needed, that provides job opportunities, and in those job opportunities and in that future that is hopeful and optimistic, you will have the young men not following the insurgents, not being fearful insurgents, but living more normal lives.

MR. RUSSERT: Knight-Ridder reported this week that U.S. intelligence agency more than two years ago said that the insurgency "had deep local roots, was likely to worsen, and could lead to civil war." And that was just ignored by political and military leadership because they wanted to believe their own rosy scenario.

GEN. PACE: I do not believe it has deep roots. I do not believe that they're on the verge of civil war. I do believe that there are a small number, relatively small number, of individuals who are ideologically committed to the terrorist ideology and are going to do whatever they need to do to try to bring those citizens back under tyrannical rule.

MR. RUSSERT: William F. Buckley, conservative writer, said this, this week. "One can't doubt that the American objective in Iraq has failed. ... Our mission has failed because Iraqi animosities have proved uncontainable by an invading army of 130,000 Americans. ..." And he put forward two postulates. "One of these postulates, from the beginning, was that the Iraqi people, whatever their tribal differences, would suspend internal divisions in order to get on with life in a political structure that guaranteed them religious freedom. The accompanying postulate was that the invading American army would succeed in training Iraqi soldiers and policymakers to cope with insurgents bent on violence. This last did not happen. And the administration has, now, to cope with failure." That's William F. Buckley.

GEN. PACE: Mr. Buckley would probably do well to take a trip over to Iraq and walk the streets and talk to Iraqis, and talk to Iraqi government, talk to Iraqi army, talk to Iraqi police. I believe that what is happening there is very, very positive with regard to the training of the army, the training of the police, the loyalty of that army and police who were—performed exceptionally well during this most recent crisis. This is not a failure. This is a very, very difficult situation, putting together a democracy inside of a country that for the last multiple decades has known nothing but tyranny. This is not going to be easy to do, but it is come—coming along and is coming along with good progress.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you really believe it'll be safe for William F. Buckley to walk the streets of Baghdad?

GEN. PACE: I think not all the places in Baghdad, no, but I do believe that if he had a chance to get over there, properly escorted—I would want to be escorted myself—but properly escorted, that he would have a chance to talk to folks and see that the Iraqi people are positive about their future; that the Iraqi armed force and the Iraqi police are loyal to their government and are getting much, much better each day.

MR. RUSSERT: Again, let me show you the views of our fellow Americans. The war in Iraq; is it worth the cost? Yes, 29; no, 63. Can you keep an army at war without the support of the populace?

GEN. PACE: No, you cannot, and therefore it's a very important, as we talked about earlier in the show already, that we get more of the entire picture to the American people. What they're seeing is the same bomb going off every 15 minutes on television, as opposed to having an opportunity to see all of what's happening in Iraq. I believe that the American people who are able to see all that is happening in Iraq would understand much better that progress is being made. It is not a great smiley picture, nor is it a disaster. What it is, is a very tough environment that still has a lot of work to be done, but one in which we're making very, very good progress and one of which the American people can and should be very, very proud.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to Afghanistan. Here's President Bush who visited there on Wednesday meeting with President Karzai, shaking his hands there in Kabul. Afghanistan supplies 90 percent of the world's opium. More than a third of the economy of Afghanistan relies on drug trafficking. How could we have let that happen in the three—four years—five years we've been there?

GEN. PACE: First of all, we did not let that happen. That has been true for decades.

MR. RUSSERT: We've let it continue.

GEN. PACE: What has to happen now is we need to be able to assist and work with the Karzai government in providing alternative crops, alternative employment. Right now it's very difficult to walk up to a farmer and say, "Stop doing what you're doing with poppies," unless you have something else to offer that person. So it is—it is a problem. No country can continue to—can prosper if a large sector of its gross domestic product is based on an illegal crop. President Karzai knows that. The British government has been in the lead in that regard helping him. We're in support of both the UK and the Karzai government. We'll continue to work with them. It is a problem that needs to be worked on.

MR. RUSSERT: As much focus has been on Iraq, many have called Afghanistan the forgotten war. Suggestion that perhaps we've taken our eye off Afghanistan, the place where the Taliban and al-Qaeda were. Lieutenant General Michael Maples, the director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, testified this week before Congress—and this is sobering. This is how he described Afghanistan. "The Taliban-dominated insurgency remains a capable and resilient threat. In 2005, Taliban and other anti-coalition movement groups increased attacks by 20 percent over 2004. Insurgents also increased suicide attacks almost four-fold, more than doubled improvised explosive devices attacks and increasingly used beheadings to terrorize the local population. This more active enemy will continue to negatively impact Afghan government and international efforts to create a stable Afghanistan. We judge insurgents now represent a greater threat to the expansion of Afghan government authority than at any point since late 2001." How has that happened?

GEN. PACE: I think what has happened is that terrorists are recognizing the fact that Afghanistan has been left alone by them among other things, and that inside of that relatively stable environment, the Afghan government has made enormous strides: that they've had presidential elections, that they've had their parliament elected, and that the Karzai government and the people of Afghanistan are embracing democracy. That's a real threat to the terrorists and they are therefore, looking to increase their attacks on that government.

By the way, the normal attacks in Afghanistan were about three or four per day. So a 20 percent increase means instead of four per day, you've gone to five per day. So in a relative sense, it's a very, very small number.

Having said that, with the NATO forces going in there now, with 26 countries adding their weight to support the Karzai government, I think you're going to see the terrorists attack those new countries, because they understand—they, the terrorists understand—that the weight of NATO, the weight of the free world is more and more on the side of Karzai—President Karzai and his government. And the terrorists are understandably afraid of that outcome.

MR. RUSSERT: In April of 2004 in Afghanistan, Army Ranger Corporal Pat Tillman, the former NFL football player.

GEN. PACE: Yeah.

MR. RUSSERT: Was killed. It took three weeks for America to find out that it was friendly fire, not enemy fire. Mr. Tillman's father, Patrick Sr., said that the government has outright lied, that they scripted this, that they covered up, that they were afraid they were blowing up their poster boy and it would affect their recruiting. "Your recruiting would go to hell in a hand-basket if the truth got out." That's his dad. There were three investigations, internal investigations. The inspector general of the Defense Department has now said they're not good enough, they're not credible, and there's going to be another investigation. What do you say to Mr. Tillman today? Why, in his words, the cover-up? Why not come out with the truth? Why have there been three investigations that have not satisfied the family or the military?

GEN. PACE: Yeah. Well, first of all, the Tillman family has gone through enormous anguish, and the fact that that has happened to them is really regrettable. Second, each of the investigations has been done as thoroughly as the investigating officers were able to do at the time. But in the review process, especially this most latest review, in the review process, it was determined that some other factor needed to be looked at to be sure we had a complete picture. So, for example, this latest event is the fact that, although there's no evidence that there was criminal activity, the investigators did not specifically look at whether or not there was criminal activity, criminal activity being when Corporal Tillman was killed by friendly fire, was that fire by the friendly forces fire that should have been going on or was someone potentially firing a weapon when they should not have been? There's no indication that there was, but there was no specific recommendation in the report that there was not. And, therefore, the invest—inspector general reviewing as he should the investigation has said, "No, this is not the answer to all the questions, go back and look at into these things."

MR. RUSSERT: Governors across the country are very worried about the National Guard cuts proposed by the administration. Have you pledged to maintain National Guard at 350,000?

GEN. PACE: Yes, we have. There are—there are no cuts to the—to the Army National Guard. Three hundred and fifty thousand is the authorized end strength, and it will remain the authorized end strength. Currently, there are 333,000 soldiers actually in the Army National Guard. That is the part that has been funded in this budget. When the Army recruiting force is successful at filling those other 17,000, and as they do recruit to those additional spaces, that money will be provided. So the Guard will remain at 350,000.

MR. RUSSERT: General Peter Pace, we thank you for joining us. And as always, we wish the very best, and our prayers to your men and women on the ground in Iraq and Afghanistan.

GEN. PACE: Thank you very much. Thank you, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: Thank you, sir.

Coming next, two men, both one-time presidential candidates: Democrat John Edwards, Republican Jack Kemp. They are next, right here, together, on MEET THE PRESS.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: What do John Edwards and Jack Kemp think about Iraq, foreign investment in American ports, poverty and the growing tension in U.S. Western relations? After this station break.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we are back.

Want-to-be-vice presidents, welcome.

FMR. REP. JACK KEMP (R-NY): Former.

MR. RUSSERT: Jack...

FMR. SEN. JOHN EDWARDS (D-NC): Can you find another way to describe us?

MR. RUSSERT: ... Jack Kemp, how much trouble are we in Iraq?

REP. KEMP: Well, we're in serious trouble to the extent that there is such a split between the Kurds and the Sunnis and the Shiites, and then you've got added to that an incredible pressure from the Syrian border and the Iranian border. I've long felt we didn't have enough troops on the border of Iran and Syria to wall off the insurgents coming in from outside.

My most serious problem is that there is no economic component to the war on terror. In other words, there's no 21st century Marshall aid plan to—I think we should be building on President Bush's idea of a trade zone in the Islamic world, but there has to be aid and some type of hope that life can be better for women, their children, families and, as the general pointed out, some economic component that will lead to jobs and an opportunity to better one's life, one's condition in life.

MR. RUSSERT: Were there some fundamental misjudgments, obviously about weapons of mass destruction, but what about the intensity of the insurgency and the number of troops necessary?

REP. KEMP: Absolutely. Fundamental misperceptions, misconceptions, and as I said earlier, there has been little reward to those who want to bring peace. Sixty-five percent of the people, according to all the polls in Iraq, are very happy, very glad that Saddam is gone, but 80 percent of the people want the United States to set a timetable to make sure that—unambiguously, we tell the people of Iraq and the Islamic world that we're not going to have bases in Iraq. I think there's a very important consideration that we have to announce, that we have absolutely no plans to leave bases in Iraq as—and in my opinion, it's very important to set some type of a timetable. Not '06 or '07, but they have to know that by '08 or '09 at the latest, we're going to be—totally be out of Iraq.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Edwards, in November of 2005, you wrote an op-ed piece in The Washington Post, and said this: "I was wrong. Almost three years ago we went into Iraq to remove what we were told—and what many of us believed and argued—was a threat to America. But in fact we now know that Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction when our forces invaded Iraq in 2003. The intelligence was deeply flawed and, in some cases, manipulated to fit a political agenda. It was a mistake to vote for this war in 2002. I take responsibility for that mistake." Why were you so wrong?

SEN. EDWARDS: I don't think I was the only one who was wrong, but I'm the one who had to make the judgement about how to vote on this resolution about Iraq. I listened to the information we got on the Intelligence Committee which I served on. I talked to former Clinton administration officials. And it turns out that the very premise for voting for the resolution and for the invasion of Iraq, which was the presence of weapons of mass destruction, was inaccurate. It was wrong. I had an independent responsibility to make a judgement and cast this vote. It turns out that the vote was wrong and my judgement was wrong.

MR. RUSSERT: In February of '05, you praised the turnout in the election as a wonderful, extraordinary thing. And then back in November of '03, you were on MEET THE PRESS and I asked you about your vote then. Let's listen to your response in November of '03.

(Videotape, November 2003):

MR. RUSSERT: Do you regret your vote in giving George Bush, in effect, a blank check for the War in Iraq?

SEN. EDWARDS: No. I voted for what I believe was in the best security interest of the American people.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: That was after the war had begun considerably. We hadn't found WMD. What, what caused the change in your thinking?

SEN. EDWARDS: Well, the truth is I was, then, I was still trying to defend my vote. When the election was over and I had time to think about this and reflect on it, it became increasingly clear to me that I talk a great deal about the need for moral leadership in America and for America to provide moral leadership for the world. Well, the foundation for moral leadership is the truth. And for me, saying that my vote was wrong is the truth. And so I thought it was important to say it.

MR. RUSSERT: In October—I'm sorry, in February of '02, you said, "I think Iraq is the most serious and imminent threat to our country." Do you believe that was accurate?

SEN. EDWARDS: No. No, it's not accurate. I was wrong.

MR. RUSSERT: Just dead wrong.

SEN. EDWARDS: I was wrong. Absolutely.

MR. RUSSERT: Based on faulty intelligence.

SEN. EDWARDS: Based on the information. It wasn't just me—the information I got, the information that the Congress got.

MR. RUSSERT: What do we do now?

SEN. EDWARDS: It's hard. I mean, I—no pie in the sky. You know, I'm worried that, I'm worried that Iraq is beginning to slip away. You see the ongoing violence. The stalemate and then the formation of the government. It's absolutely critical for success that there be a representative government formed where every group in Iraq feels like they're being represented and their voice is being heard. I also think that our footprint, the size of our presence there now is still way too big. It sends a signal that we're going to be there forever, that we're not going to let the Iraqis protect themselves, that we're not going to let the Iraqis govern themselves. It suggests that we're there for oil. All those things are bad.

I think we have to reduce the size of our footprint. I said months ago that I think 40,000 troops should be redeployed. There's a way to do that. Secondly, I think we have to intensify the training of Iraqis so they can provide their own security. There's not a single battalion that's ready to operate on its own in the Iraqi Security Force. And then—and this is the hardest and may not be successful—if we reduce our footprint, we need to intensify our efforts to bring others into this so that it's not just us.

MR. RUSSERT: If a civil war breaks out when we withdraw because there's no way there to secure each—one side against another, what do we do then?

SEN. EDWARDS: At the end of the day, we can't do this for them. The Iraqis are going to have to do this for themselves. They're going to have to form their own government. They're going to have to decide whether everyone in Iraq will be represented in that government. And they're going to have to protect themselves. America cannot continue to do this for them. They have to do it themselves.

MR. RUSSERT: Well, let me turn to the whole issues of the ports. Six American ports being operated by a company from Dubai. Jack Kemp, you wrote in The Washington Times, "It was disappointing to witness the pessimism, cynicism and hypocrisy of some left and right who have been using a rather straightforward, commercial port operations contract to rant against the friendly United Arab Emirates, a country that chose, post-September 11, 2001, to stand with the West, (and the United States) in the war on terror. ... To turn down this contract would further weaken our relationships with moderate Arab allies and I believe ultimately, our own national security and our chances for peace and liberalization throughout the Middle East and Africa." You're very against public opinion.

REP. KEMP: Yeah.

MR. RUSSERT: Very much against Congressional opinion.

REP. KEMP: It's the right thing to do. First of all, as you quoted, after 9/11, President Bush said to the Arab world, "You're either with us or against us." And the UAE from Abu Dhabi to Dubai said, "We're with you." There are U.S. Naval ships in Dubai ports. The United States Air Force is operating in Abu Dhabi and al-Jafra. They have made a decision to support the United States in the war on terror. General Tommy Franks said they're a valued ally of the United States. They have said they want to be with us, they want to invest. And 80 percent of all the ports in the United States of America are operated by companies with ties to governments from communist China to Denmark to Taiwan to Singapore, and in this case Dubai. So I think it would be a mistake for us to turn our back on a friendly Arab country that's supporting us in the war on terror.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Edwards:

SEN. EDWARDS: Well, I don't think we should discriminate against anybody, including Dubai, the UAE, but I have a different view about what we should do.

I think that this is sufficiently important to the safety and security of America that American companies should be doing it. I would start by saying companies that are owned by foreign governments should not be operating or providing security for our ports.

I'd like to go further than that and say foreign companies shouldn't be doing this. We ought to be doing it ourselves. I think there's a practical issue with that, which Jack just made reference to, that they're already doing so much. So I—that's the starting place.

I also would like to see us use this as a vehicle to talk about what's actually happening in our ports. Five percent of our containers are inspected. We can do much better than we're doing right now. Number one, we ought to be moving toward the goal of screening all containers. We also ought to make sure that we have a tracking system so that we know what's happened to them in transit.

We also—we need to be—and by the way, these ins—these screenings—screening process, the use of that technology, we need to be careful, because some of these containers have lead around the outside of them, so it's difficult to see what's inside. And if the screening doesn't work we may have to physically inspect them.

And then last, we need to figure out a way, and there is—there are seals available that will do this—to make sure that these containers have not tampered with. So they're very specific practical things that have not been done by George Bush and this administration that very much need to be done.

MR. RUSSERT: You attended two conferences in the United Arab Emirates in 2005.

SEN. EDWARDS: Yes.

MR. RUSSERT: In 2000, President Clinton authorized sale of 80 F-16 Lockheed fighter jets that you did not object to.

SEN. EDWARDS: No.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you not trust the UAE?

SEN. EDWARDS: Oh, no. The UAE actually has done a lot of good things, and American's relationship with the UAE is a good relationship. I don't think this is about UAE, I don't think it's about Arab countries, I think this is—this is about whether America is going to operate and provide security for their own ports.

MR. RUSSERT: You don't think that being an Arab country and hijackers from—some of them came from that country has—is a factor?

SEN. EDWARDS: But at the end of the day there's a simple solution. The simple solution so that we don't discriminate against Arab country—countries, which I think is a terrible idea, the simple solution is America and American companies need to provide this—operate the ports and provide security.

REP. KEMP: That is just at odds with the reality on the ground. That, as I said earlier, 80 percent of all the ports in the U.S. are operated—not the security, not the control, not ownership, but operated. The flow of goods in and out of the United States ports. We have the recognition that the UAE was the first country to sign the container security initiative. They have been a valued ally. And very frankly, in a global economy, as Tom Friedman points out, as the world is flattening how can the United States withdraw from the type of trade and commerce that we do, not only with Asia, but with the Arab world? So it's a big mistake, and this is pointed at an Arab country, and I think it would weaken the United States security to say the UAE, "We're going to let you out of—we're going to put you out of our commerce in our ports."

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to a domestic issue. The two of you have gone to the University of North Carolina and the University of Southern California to talk about poverty. Katrina: Jack Kemp, when you were in the Republican administration, you were seen as the outreach person to the African-American community. Do you believe that the Bush administration response to Katrina, has created an image problem with African-Americans?

REP. KEMP: There's an image problem, no doubt about it. And government at every level failed the Katrina victims. And they are victims. This was a horrible mismanaged at every level of government, and it uncovered not only a level of poverty that is unacceptable in the 21st-century America that we live, in, but a level of racism. I'm not accusing anybody, Republican or Democrat of racism, but the generic attempt by government to handle this problem has led to, I think, a very big image problem for both political parties—and my party, which it should be thinking big time about what could be done. Abraham Lincoln had a Homesteading act, Franklin Roosevelt had the FHA and GI Bill. We—I think the president has attempted to do the right thing. I think we need to go further. I think we need a total enterprise zone for the whole Gulf region. I think we need to bring Habitat for Humanity into this, and the president's talked about urban homesteading in the Gulf region. We need a massive effort, dramatic effort to build housing, schools and create job opportunities for people in the Gulf Coast region.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator, after Katrina, you heard a lot of discussion about the racial divide, the economic divide. Do you believe either party has stepped up to deal with that issue?

SEN. EDWARDS: America hasn't done what it needs to do. This is the great moral issue of our time. Thirty-seven million people who live in poverty every day in a country of our wealth is wrong, and we have responsibility to do something about it. I—over the course of the last year, you know, I've had a little time on my hands. I've been moving around the country and meeting with families who live in poverty, and the—the most striking thing to me is they don't feel like anyone speaks for them, they have no champion, they have no advocate. Katrina gives us, because of the window that opened with Katrina and the aftermath, gives us an opportunity to do something about poverty in America, and they're such obvious things that we can do. Part of it's financial, part of it's not.

On the financial side, we can do something about raising the minimum wage, we can do something to expand the earned income tax credit, particularly to make it more applicable to single workers. Get rid of the marriage penalty in the earned income tax credit. These families need assets. We saw these families on our television screen for the Lower Ninth Ward in New Orleans. They didn't have a car, they didn't have bank accounts, they didn't have credit cards. We need to help these folks be able to—to accumulate some assets. We can set up an account for them, match what they're able to save, they need access to college, you know, and so many young people would—the government's cutting funding for financial aid for kids who want to go to college. We—we started a program in a small county in eastern North Carolina where we make college available to every young person who graduates, qualified to go and is willing to work while—during the time that they're in college.

And then, finally, and this is a critical component, responsibility matters. You know we, the American people, our country, we expect people that we're helping to help themselves. And where we—we have to address things like teenage pregnancy. One—one of the things I find when I sit at these tables with families who live in poverty is the mother of four or five children has kids who are having kids. We have to do something about that. We have to do something about the hopelessness of the young African-American men who live in the inner city. But this is something we can do if America makes a commitment to do something about it.

MR. RUSSERT: The two of you, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Kemp, join authors of the Council on Foreign Relations Task Force, "Russia's Wrong Direction, What the United States Can and Should Do." Let me read a little bit for our viewers:

"U.S.-Russian relations are clearly headed in the wrong direction. Contention is crowding out consensus. The very idea of 'strategic partnership' no longer seems realistic." And then this: "The Task Force recommends the United States pursue 'selective cooperation' with Russia rather than seek a broad 'partnership" that is not now feasible."

Many observers say Russia invites Hamas to visit with them. Russia cuts off natural gas to the Ukraine. Russia clamps down on the free press. Putin centralizes power. Why should we have any kind of relationship with a country like that?

REP. KEMP: A good question, except you can point to many contradictions in our relations with Russia post-Cold War and here in the early years of the 21st century. But as John and I have discovered in our Task Force, and we don't speak for all 15 or 20 members, but there is a consensus that without Russia's cooperation, all of the great issues of the day from nuclear proliferation to terrorism, to dealing with Iran and North Korea, to dealing with HIV-AIDS or education and the problems of poverty in the Third World, we need the cooperation of Russia. So it is a pragmatic relationship with Russia that has to be nurtured, and, in my opinion, I come at this from—as a congenital optimist and a believer, that economics is extremely important to the future of our relationship. We believe that we must work with Russia, and here we are on the eve of the G8 in July, the...

MR. RUSSERT: Industrial nations.

REP. KEMP: ...seven industrial democracies of the world plus Russia are going to meet, with Putin as chair. We think, and I don't know that I speak for everybody, but I really believe that our nation should call the administers of foreign affairs together in a G7 to remind the Soviet Union—I'm sorry, the Russians, that the G8 is not a perpet—not a perpetual organization.

MR. RUSSERT: That Russia—Russia risk being taken out of that.

REP. KEMP: I don't want to take them out. But I want them to know, and I think we believe—we believe that they should know the we can go back to the G7 if they don't cooperate on things like Iran, North Korea, nuclear proliferation, and the war on terror.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Edwards, John McCain, your co—former colleague in the Senate, said we should not go to the meeting in St. Petersburg in July, that—until Russia starts changing its behavior.

SEN. EDWARDS: Well, we came to the conclusion in the task force that that's not our recommendation.

I want to add one thing to what Jack just said. If you step back and look at this thing from altitude, there is the real potential in the world, if we do what we should and we have a smart foreign policy, that we can live in a world where the great powers attack the problems that face the planet, and that includes all the things that Jack just made reference to: HIV/AIDS, terrorism, proliferation, all the huge issues that the world's faced with. The reason our relationship with Russia matters is we want them working with us, not against us, to solve the world's problems. So it matters what our relationship with Russia is, it matters how we deal with Russia. The question on the G8 specifically is—and Jack just suggested it, it's a good idea—that we have a meeting of the G7, at least at the ministerial level, before anybody goes to St. Petersburg.

But the question on the G8 is, is it better to have Russia on the inside, or is it better to have them on the outside? At least for now, we believe it's better to have them on the inside, and the reason is we need their cooperation on issues that really matter to us, and the most glaring one of those issues is Iran. You know, we need the Russians to do what they've been doing, to cooperate, to continue to negotiate with the Iranians, to try to provide enriched uranium, control the fuel cycle in the dealings with the Iranians. And then at the end of the day—you know, the IAEA is meeting tomorrow, if they are—if Iran is referred to the Security Council, which a lot of us believe is what's going to happen, we're going to ultimately need Russia. We're going to need them in the Security Council. We want Russia, for example, if this—Iran continues on the track they're on now, we want Russia to stop helping them build this nuclear facility at Bushire.

We need Russia in this process, but we have to recognize all the things that are going wrong in Russia. Their economy has improved dramatically under Putin, but at the same time, the de-democratization is powerful. And on top of that, they're meddling, constantly meddling, and bullying the old Soviet states that are on their periphery.

MR. RUSSERT: Five years ago when President Bush first met with President Putin, the president was asked whether or not he trusted Mr. Putin, and this was President Bush's response.

(Videotape, June 16, 2001):

PRES. GEORGE W. BUSH: I'll answer the question. I looked the man in the eye, I found him to be very straightforward and trustworthy. We had a very good dialogue. I was able to get a sense of his soul; he's a man deeply committed to his country and the best interests of his country.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Jack Kemp, "straightforward and trustworthy," are those two words you'd describe for Vladimir Putin?

REP. KEMP: I don't think the president would say that today. Albeit, we want Putin's cooperation in the things that John and I have alluded to earlier. When they shut off in January natural gas supplies to Ukraine, it absolutely affected Europe to a great degree. Twenty-five percent of all the gas going into Europe comes from Russia, in 10 years it'll be 75 percent. So that was a big mistake. But they backed off, and now they need to sign the European energy accords. When I was in Israel when Hamas was invited to Moscow, and then we saw yesterday, I think, or Friday, Sergei Lavrov, the foreign minister of Russia, said to Hamas, "You have to recognize Israel." So there's these contradictions in our relationship, and I think it was reflected in President Bush's comments.

MR. RUSSERT: John Edward, before we go, you've been traveling around a lot. I noticed these three states on your schedule the last 24 months: Iowa five times; New Hampshire four times; South Carolina two times.

SEN. EDWARDS: I can't imagine where this is going.

MR. RUSSERT: I'm asking you.

SEN. EDWARDS: Well, I've actually been traveling all over the country, not just into the places that you mentioned. And everywhere I go, I'm preaching the gospel about...

MR. RUSSERT: But you're thinking about running for president in '08?

SEN. EDWARDS: It is something I'm considering, yes.

MR. RUSSERT: Fair enough. It's nice to have a Democrat and a Republican sit here together.

John Edwards, Jack Kemp.

REP. KEMP: Pleasure. Thank you, Tim.

MR. RUSSERT: We'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: That's all for today. We'll be back next week. If it's Sunday, it's MEET THE PRESS.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is the port deal dead, and has it dulled the GOP edge on national security? We'll ask two key Republican, the head of the Homeland Security Committee, Senator Susan Collins, and the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Congressman Duncan Hunter.

Then in a Sunday exclusive: Wesley Clark. He tried and failed in 2004, but is the general what the Democrats need in 2008?

George Will, Robert Reich and Bill Sammon debate the week's politics on our roundtable.

Plus as Jon Stewart prepares for the Oscars, advice from his protege.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COLBERT: First off, do not look Russell Crowe in the eye. He sees it as a challenge.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And as always, The Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JAY LENO, HOST, TONIGHT SHOW: This marks the beginning of lent. You know what President Bush is giving up for lent? Our seaports. Yes.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. President Bush landed at Andrews Air Force Base early this morning from his trip to South Asia to face a Congress still resisting that Dubai ports deal.

And our headliners are leading the fight, the chair of the Senate Homeland Committee, Senator Susan Collins, and the head of the House Armed Services Committee, Congressman Duncan Hunter.

Good morning to both you, and Congressman Hunter, let me begin with you. President Bush says Dubai has been a very strong ally in the war on terror. You call their track record terrifying. Do you no longer trust President Bush on national security?

HUNTER: No, I trust President Bush, but I think he needs to get more information. And the information that we've developed shows that in 2003, 66 high-speed electrical switches, that is triggers for nuclear weapons devices, were allowed to be transshipped through Dubai even over the protests of the United States.

And that same government that allowed those nuclear switches to go through also allowed former Nazi Alfred Hempel to ship 70 tons of heavy water, which is used again to develop nuclear systems, through Dubai.

And Dubai has a reputation of being the place where you go in -- if you want to ship something with anonymity, that is you want to mask the seller and you want to mask the buyer, you ship it through Dubai. And those people, that government is going to be under this ports deal the folks that own the regulation of our ports.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, sir, let me interrupt you there. Are you suggesting that President Bush does not have the information you just gave to our audience?

HUNTER: I don't think he has that information. I think that -- I think this thing was looked at by his board, this so-called CFIUS board, which is the Committee on Foreign Investment. I think they looked at it from a very superficial level, and they didn't get the intelligence briefs that go to Dubai's activities to transship things like centrifuge parts. They didn't look at the front companies that Germany has identified as operating in Dubai to secure nuclear components for Iran, and I think if the president gets that information, I think he's probably getting it now, I think we're going to see a turn around.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Collins, I saw you nodding your head. You've called this CFIUS process very flawed. Do you agree with Congressman Hunter that the deal ought to be stopped?

COLLINS: We don't know enough yet to know whether the deal should go through. The problem is that the 45-day investigation that was clearly required by law was not conducted.

The other problem is that the committee that conducts the view is weighed towards the Treasury Department. I think we need to scrap the committee, start again, constitute it within the department of Homeland Security, have the secretary of Homeland Security chair it, have a member of the intelligence community on it, which is not the case now, broaden the review that is done and ensure that Congress is consulted .

STEPHANOPOULOS: That would be a big change. Are you going to offer legislation to make that change to move it from the Treasury Department over to Homeland Security?

COLLINS: I am. Senator Lieberman and I are going to introduce a bill to do just that next week. I think the process right now is deeply flawed. It's too weighed toward investment concerns when the purpose should be and needs to be national and homeland security.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman Hunter, you're going to go even farther than that. You say you're going to propose legislation that would require, would actually prohibit any foreign entity from owning facilities that you deem critical to national security.

Now, right now, 80 percent of our port terminals are managed by foreign entities. Would you require all of them to divest and wouldn't that create economic chaos?

HUNTER: No, George. My bill would require divestiture after the Department of Defense and the Department of Homeland Security undertake a review and come up with a list of what they consider, not myself, not members of Congress, but what the Department of Defense and the Department of Homeland Security consider to be critical infrastructure for this country.

So it might be not only ports but power plants and other types of infrastructure. Once they put that list together, just like our maritime security program, which we've deemed to be important enough, that's our ships that we use in the vital operations in times of war, have to be operated by Americans and have to be owned by Americans.

By the same token, this list of critical infrastructure components would have to be owned by Americans. That would require divestment. But George, you know, back to this point of how much information is known by people, in our hearings just two days ago, your former boss, President Clinton, was referred to by the president of the ports deal as having made a phone call to the emir of Dubai, to the leader of Dubai, who is the sole stockholder and director of this company.

And President Clinton gave him advice on who he should hire to get this deal through. I don't think President Clinton, your old boss, knows the facts of the transshipments that take place through Dubai, sending nuclear components to all parts of the world, and especially to people who don't like America.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, actually let me just say one thing. The president's office did put out a statement where, in that statement, the president said that he actually supports the legislation proposed by you and Senator Clinton, which would ban foreign entities from managing our ports. But let me turn to you, Senator Collins. Do you agree with Chairman Hunter's idea that we should actually have divestiture of all foreign investment in our critical national security facilities?

COLLINS: No, I think that goes too far. Not all foreign investment is the problem. When you have an ally like Canada, for example, controlling aspects, I really don't have a problem with that. But in this case, we have a country that has a very mixed track record on terrorism, a country that the 9-11 Commission said had been both a valuable ally and a persistent problem.

And that's why we need an in-depth review. And only if the national security concerns are satisfied should the deal go forward. But I don't think we need a blanket prohibition. Obviously, I'd love to have all our ports operated by American companies, but I don't think that's practical.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me turn to the politics of this for a minute. Democrats are already starting to make hay on this, as you both know. And tomorrow, the first ad on this issue is going to go up. It's done by the Senate candidate down in Tennessee, Harold Ford. I want to show you some of it and have you respond.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. REP. HAROLD FORD (D-TN): President Bush wants to sell this port and five others to the United Arab Emirates, a country that had diplomatic ties with the Taliban. The home of two 9/11 hijackers whose banks wired money to the terrorists. I'm running for the Senate because we shouldn't outsource this to anyone.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Chairman Hunter, he's basically making the same argument you are, but are you worried that this issue, because the president is going in the other direction, is going to hurt your party in the mid-term elections?

HUNTER: You know, I don't think it's going to hurt our party, George, because a few years ago when the Chinese military tried to buy the old naval base in Long Beach, California, we stopped that and that was stopped by Republicans in Congress, even though your boss, President Clinton, supported that. So, I think the Republicans in Congress have a good record for security and have a good record on this type of an issue.

We're the only people who have actually stopped a facility, what we consider to be an important facility, being purchased by a foreign entity that was suspect. So I think that -- and also I think that the fact that President Clinton now is on record, at least in our hearing, according to the CEO of the Dubai World Ports corporation, as advising the emir on how to make this deal go through, I think that makes it difficult for the Democrats to get a partisan leverage.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Collins?

COLLINS: Well, I think it's too bad for this issue to be used in political campaigns. If it relates to our national security, then surely, we ought to all be behind the administration's new decision to have a thorough review, to report to Congress, and we ought to reform the entire process. That ought to be our focus. And I think it's unfortunate to see this issue used for political purposes.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Bottom line to both of you: Yes or no -- is this deal going to go through?

Chairman Hunter?

HUNTER: No.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Collins?

COLLINS: Too soon to tell.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And before I let you go, let me also ask you. President Bush, when he was in India, he was talking about -- he reached a deal with the Indians to provide them with nuclear technology and -- in return for having their civilian nuclear facilities but not their military nuclear facilities come under inspection.

Chairman Hunter, two of your colleagues, Chairman Hyde of the International Relations Committee, Senator Lugar, have raised serious questions about this deal.

Are you for it or against it?

HUNTER: Big numbers here, George, 14 and 22. Fourteen of the nuclear reactors would be monitored under an international -- by international organizations, but eight of them which could produce weapons material, nuclear weapons material would not be -- would not be monitored.

The president is trying to ride the nuclear tiger here. It's a tough job.

I think we really need to look at this one. And I'm inclined to think that the problem -- that this type of thing is not good for us because the problem is that this nuclear development and weapons development is a function of equipment and it's also a function of people.

And, as we continue to develop a pool of technicians and scientists in India who have the capability to work in the nuclear arena, those people can quickly move their talents from domestic energy production to weapons production.

So this thing has to be looked at very, very carefully. I'm skeptical. STEPHANOPOULOS: Senator Collins?

COLLINS: I need to look carefully at the deal. We need to make sure there are sufficient safeguards. In general, I am leery whenever we put any kind of nuclear ability off-limits to international inspections.

STEPHANOPOULOS: OK, thank you to both of you.

HUNTER: Sure.

COLLINS: Thank you.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Up next, General Wesley Clark and, later, Jon Stewart gets some last-minute tips for tonight's Oscars.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

COLBERT: If anybody pulls one of those Marlon Brando send up an Indian to accept your award, don't stand for it. As the host, you have the authority to confiscate the award in the name of manifest destiny.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we are back now with former NATO commander General Wesley Clark, former presidential candidate, as well. Welcome back to This Week.

CLARK: Thanks, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's pick up on that debate we just left off on. Are you for this Dubai Ports World deal or not?

CLARK: I think it ought to be reviewed. But, you know, the United States has to find a way to fit into the modern world.

Now, there's no reason American companies can't own and operate ports not only here and abroad. But our security doesn't depend on who owns the facility, in other words, who is collecting the money and taking the tolls. It depends on how we regulate the facility.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So it sounds like you're for this.

CLARK: Well, what I'm saying is that we have to strengthen port security overall in America.

It's weak and it doesn't matter who owns it, it's weak. We're not inspecting the containers that are coming in. We don't have the right radiation monitors out there. We don't know whose in the ports.

And port security actually starts abroad. You have to start with ports overseas that are loading the containers that are coming to America. It's too late once they reach our shores. So...

STEPHANOPOULOS: So you don't share the view this Dubai is a bad actor in the war on terror?

CLARK: Well, I've been to Dubai. I've met those people. A lot of the countries in that region have difficulties.

So I think that rather than labeling countries, what we need to do is take a very pragmatic look at what our own homeland security problems are.

In the area of port security even if we owned every port in America, that wouldn't be adequate for port security because the security has to start over there. We have to work with the people in Dubai, the people in Rotterdam, the people in Korea, the people in Japan, the people in China, because that's where the threats originate that come to our ports.

So there's no walling off America. We're in a global economy whether we like it or not.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So that means you disagree then with Senator Clinton's legislation, which would require American ownership and management of American ports?

CLARK: I think Senator Clinton has done a good thing in terms of raising the visibility on this issue. We need to get in...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you don't agree with the legislation?

CLARK: Well, when we go through the legislative process there's going to be some hearings, and we really need to take this apart.

Homeland security has not received the emphasis and attention it needs and in particular, port security hasn't. There have been any number of initiatives. There's money that's been laid out, but it hasn't been pulled together. So I think we need to look through the issue of ownership, the issue of control, the issue of regulation, the issue of how we relate to the ports overseas and all of that needs to be on the table. And then...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But you just said we can't wall off America.

CLARK: ... We cannot wall off America.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, if you can't wall off America that means you wouldn't prohibit foreign investment in these kinds operations, doesn't it?

CLARK: I think you have to recognize it's a very complicated place out there economically. Even labeling who is an American to own it, it's not a single American individual. It's an American company. Can it have foreign ownership in an American company? Can it be an international company with headquarters abroad but majority U.S. ownership?

It gets pretty complicated. What we need to be focusing on is how the ports are regulated and how we're dealing with the ports abroad...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Sir, I'm listening to you very closely. I have to catch you as no on that legislation.

But let's move on to Iraq. President Bush is scheduled to meet with General Abizaid and General Casey this week, and they're going to discuss this issue of whether and when we should start withdrawing troops.

There had been a hope that there would be a gradual reduction to about 100,000 troops by the end of this year. Do you think that should go forward?

CLARK: We're at the key point right now in Iraq. We've got a choice between kind of a C minus solution and F solution...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Not a very good choice.

CLARK: ... Getting involved was a big mistake. Pulling troops out and announcing a time line right now when we haven't set the conditions on the ground to do this would be a big mistake.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Even a gradual reduction down to about 100,000?

CLARK: Maybe we can reduce forces, but right now we shouldn't be focused on the troop strength. Right now we're at the decisive point of what's going to determine the future of Iraq. It's the politics inside Iraq.

What we have to do is we have to get the Sunni leadership into the government, and the constitution has to be modified so that there can't be a carve-up of Iraq into a Shia-dominated Iranian buffer state in the south, a Kurdish-controlled area in the north and leaving the Sunnis on the outside.

STEPHANOPOULOS: That seems to be the president's policy right now. The question is what kind of leverage do we have and what kind of leverage should we use over that Shiite majority to make sure they include the Sunnis?

CLARK: Well, starting with the idea of a U.S.-directed troop pull-down is the worst way to get that leverage.

What we have to do is we have to use the military leverage to gain political leverage. You can't just jawbone.

So I think we should be taking a number of military measures like deploying more troops on the border with Iran, like making it clear that we're going to be prepared to assist in the disarming of the Shiite militias if they don't comply with the disarmament requirements, like maybe selectively...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Wouldn't that put United States right in the middle of a civil war?

CLARK: We have to take leadership on the ground politically. We can't just mechanically go through a process of training the troops and leaving because we're leaving behind -- when we leave Iraq, that doesn't enter our interests in the region.

Iraq's part of that region so we've got interests in the Israeli- Palestinian issue, in the protection energy sources, in whether Iran gets nuclear weapons. We can't just walk away from the region.

And that means that it's not just about U.S. troop presence. It's about what kind of government is left behind in Iraq.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You've called this a decisive point. Some have feared that the last couple of weeks have been a tipping point where Iraq may tip over into civil war. General Casey says that crisis has passed. A lot of people question that. But my question to you is what should the United States do if this civil war does flare up? Should U.S. forces be put in between Shiites and Sunnis?

CLARK: Well, I don't think it's possible to do that in a practical sense for most of the country.

STEPHANOPOULOS: How so?

CLARK: Because there's not enough U.S. forces there, we don't speak the language, we don't know who all those people are. We can't control crime in Baghdad. We never could. We couldn't do it now. We might be able to protect certain key facilities, but the point is...

STEPHANOPOULOS: And you would be willing to deploy U.S. forces in that way?

CLARK: No. We're there right now doing this. What we have to do right now, we're at the edge of the abyss right now in Iraq. We have got to use all of our leverage to get responsible Sunni leaders into this government, whether that means moving the prime minister, Jaafari, out, whether it means playing the card of Arab Shiaism against Persian Shiaism. Whether it means...

STEPHANOPOULOS: What does that mean?

CLARK: ... threatening to move against the Shiite militias, whether it means using Muqtada al Sadr. There are a lot of different political forces. One of the things that's happened to us, George, is this debate, largely because the administration and the way it's been portrayed, is always about the military.

What's happening in Iraq is not about the military. It's about who controls the country and what the future policies of Iraq will be. Those are political questions. Our ambassador over there is trying to do that job, but he's not getting the help he needs. We've never established a regional dialogue we needed to with Syria, with Iran, with the other states in the region. We just haven't given the military the help it needs to resolve this problem.

And so I just have to shy away from the excessive focus on the military. This is not a problem the military can solve. They're part of the solution, and the military forces can be used to create political leverage, but we're not going to be able to change the forces in play in Iraq simply by jawboning. It won't be enough. We've got to use the leverage from the region and internally to get the responsible Sunnis into that government now and the constitution changed before it's too late.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let me turn to Iran. You told the Council on Foreign Relations earlier this month that before we take Iran to the U.N. Security Council over their proposed nuclear weapons program, we should try talking to them directly and doing business with Iranian businesses. That's a very different approach from what other Democrats like Senator Evan Bayh and Senator Clinton are calling for. They say we need tough sanctions now. Why are you convinced that your approach is better?

CLARK: Well, maybe we will need tough sanctions later on, but before any of that happens, years ago we should have talked to Iran, and it's not too late right now.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Directly.

CLARK: Directly to Iran. The Iranian state is not unified. There are differences in opinion in Iran, but rather than passing a $75 million Iranian Liberation Act funding proposal, why don't we just talk to the Iranian leadership, and see if there's not a way of...

STEPHANOPOULOS: But don't you believe that there's intent on developing a nuclear weapon?

CLARK: I think they are intent, and the more we press against them, the more difficult it would become for them to change their direction. Iran represents an historic opportunity for the Shias to have leadership in the Islamic world, and this nuclear issue is being crystallized in such a way that it's going to make it extremely difficult for them to back off.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But don't they know the message is, if you don't give up your nuclear program, then you're not going to be able to join this modern world? Isn't that what the United States is saying? Isn't that what the European community is saying?

CLARK: Well, it's a very mixed message going to the Iranians, frankly. We're not saying we're not going to buy their oil. China is not telling the Iranians, we won't help you build subways. The Russians aren't telling the Iranians, you're not going to get our billion dollars worth of weapons that you've ordered. It's a very mixed message, and really, it's the United States that hasn't taken its leadership responsibilities seriously enough to go and talk to the Iranians first before this crisis comes to a head.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's talk about some politics. It seems to me you're scratching the presidential itch just a little bit again heading up to New Hampshire later this month. What lessons did you learn from your campaign in 2004, and how will you decide whether to run in 2008?

CLARK: Well, what I'm trying to do is help the right Democrats get elected in 2006. That's the most important thing, and I'm very proud we've got something like 55 U.S. military veterans who are running for Congress as Democrats. I want to help each and every one of them. I think they can make a huge difference in the future of this country. I think having one-party domination of governments is very dangerous for American democracy. And frankly, that's where all of my energies and activities are focused.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, you've completely ignored my question, but let me re-ask one of them.

CLARK: Well, I just want to make it clear, George, right now I know there's a lot of speculation on 2008. And there's a lot of great people out there who are lining up and testing the waters and setting up exploratory committees.

I'm very proud of having had the opportunity to run in 2004. I did learn a lot.

And if you look at what qualities are required in a president today, this is a time where Americans are engaged and responding to foreign affairs like never before: the war on terror, the war in Iraq, the port issue, global trade, the avian flu. I mean, it just -- we cannot wall off the outside world.

So I think it's very important that Americans look to people who've got some experience.

Having said that, my focus is on 2006 and helping the right Democrats get in office because I think when you look at this country right now, we need a two-party system that works. We need Congress to do its job. We need real investigation of some of the abuses of authority that are apparently going on in the executive branch. We need to really...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Like what?

CLARK: We need to really get to the bottom of the Abramoff scandal. We should have a special prosecutor appointed for that. We really need a Congressional investigation of the whole business of the NSA wiretapping and how far that goes. Been a lot of squirrelling around the edges.

We've never finished the investigation of 9/11 and whether the administration actually misused the intelligence information it had. The evidence seems pretty clear to me. I've seen that for a long time.

I think Americans are best served by a strong two-party system, and that's been out of whack. And what I can do in 2006 is try to help the right Democrats get in office and that's what I'm going to do.

STEPHANOPOULOS: And we'll have you back after the midterms. General Clark, thanks very much.

CLARK: Thanks very much, George.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Coming up, Stephen Colbert on his boss hitting the big time.

(ROUNDTABLE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our voice this week, Stephen Colbert. He carried Jon Stewart's water for years on The Daily Show.

So we turn to the man who now stars in his own show, The Colbert Report for his take on how his old boss should handle tonight's Oscars.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

COLBERT: I think it's great Jon is doing the Oscars. I would have been out there and done it with him but I had to do This Week with George Stephanopoulos. I made a promise and I don't go back on my word.

This could be a big one for Jon. After all, 10 billion people watch? Twenty -- 100 billion people watch the Oscars. And so, this could be enormous for him. And, if he fails, it could be terrible. This could be the end of his career.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JON STEWART, HOST, THE DAILY SHOW: I have hosted other award shows -- the Grammys, actually, twice, and then a variety of lodge and rotary club events, so I'm ready.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

COLBERT: I expect a lot of jokes on the war in Iraq, a lot of jokes on abortion -- it's a funny word, like guacamole. I'd say he'll probably do a lot of jokes on the refugees from Katrina.

Advice for Jon? OK, first off, do not look Russell Crowe in the eye. He sees it as a challenge. Two, get drunk but not too drunk. Just fun drunk. Bring some hand sanitizer. A lot of people are going to want to shake your hand. You don't know where these stars have been.

Leave your mark on Hollywood. For instance, everybody calls Brad and Angelina Brangelina. Ben Affleck and Jennifer Garner already have the name Bennifer II. But there's not name so far for William H. Macy and Felicity Huffman. I recommend John refer to them as Filliam H. Muffman, especially if she wins.

Most of all, I'm glad I'm talking about this today because it is never too early to prejudge someone's performance. Finally, I would just say good luck because I think he will fail. I think I can say that because I am his friend. Yes, it's not going to work.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Great friend. You can see more of Stephen Colbert on our Web site, thisweek.abcnews.com

Now, the Sunday funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JAY LENO, HOST, THE TONIGHT SHOW: It was reported in the paper this week that, even as Hillary Clinton was working to try and stop this Dubai Port deal her husband Bill Clinton was advising Dubai on how to get the deal through.

She's trying to stop it. He's trying to make the deal. Forget women. Now he's cheating on her with other countries.

(LAUGHTER)

COLBERT: Last week, tensions boiled over between Sunni and Shiite Muslims in Iraq with the destruction of the Shiite Golden Mosque, an action that could well foment a civil war, if we're lucky, because if there's truly a civil war in Iraq, by definition, we can't be part of it.

That's called an exit strategy, folks.

(LAUGHTER)

CRAIG FERGUSON, HOST, LATE LATE SHOW: The president has just been in India. He's going through Maharishi period, I think. He's made the headlines for defending outsourcing in India. A

And I think that may have been a mistake, you know, because I don't know that -- you know, that's kind of playing the room a little too much. You know, he's talking about, it's OK for American jobs to go to India. Doesn't he know that we get the news here?

(LAUGHTER)

LENO: You know that deal for the Arab country to run our ports, this is on everybody's mind. It's on talk radio. It's all anybody talks about.

Now let's go live now to the Port of New York and talk to Dubai Ports World chief officer and deputy ruler of the Emirate, Sheik Hamdin.

Didn't you expect this kind of reaction?

(UNKNOWN): No, no, because we couldn't believe we were given the job ourselves.

(LAUGHTER)

I mean, we submitted the name as a joke to crack ourselves up. I mean, who knew that they were going to take us seriously?

(LAUGHTER)

You are funny and a mysterious people, you are.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's our show for today. And tune in to ABC tonight to see if Steve Colbert and the round table were right about tonight's Oscars.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. The Army will now launch a criminal investigation into the death of sports hero turned Army Ranger Pat Tillman, next on Fox News Sunday .

Civil unrest in Iraq. With the situation there so uncertain, can the U.S. continue to bring troops home? We'll get the latest from the chairman of the Joint Chiefs, General Peter Pace.

The storm over the storm. With new insights into the government's response to Hurricane Katrina, did President Bush have it right all along?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: We'll talk with Brownie, former FEMA director Michael Brown, in his first Sunday show interview since Katrina.

Plus, what has opposition to the ports deal done to the president's political standing? We'll find out more from our panel, Brit Hume, Nina Easton, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams.

And our Power Player of the Week. Everyone talks about the weather, but he does something about it. All right now on Fox News Sunday .

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Let's start with a quick check of the latest headlines. The death of Army Ranger Pat Tillman, the former pro football star who quit sports to fight in the war on terror, will now be the subject of a criminal investigation.

Tillman was fighting in Afghanistan. The Army first said he was killed by the enemy, then later by accidental friendly fire.

Two London newspapers report this morning all U.S. and British troops will be pulled out of Iraq by early next year. According to the reports, the presence of foreign troops has become an obstacle to peace. More on this and the Tillman story in a moment.

And before dawn today, President Bush and the first lady returned to the White House from a three-nation overseas trip. The president said stops in Afghanistan, India and Pakistan helped enhance U.S. security.

And we're joined now by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Peter Pace.

General, welcome back to Fox News Sunday .

PACE: Thank you, Chris.

WALLACE: What can you tell us about the decision to launch a criminal investigation into the death of Pat Tillman?

PACE: Well, first of all, for the Tillman family -- they've already been through a very, very long ordeal on this, and any additional pain to them is regretted.

But I think it's important to chase every single possibility, and the inspector generals have decided there's one more step to take, and they're going to do that to make sure that the entire picture is painted clearly and accurately so the family can have as much information as possible.

WALLACE: What's the difference between accidental friendly fire and negligent homicide?

PACE: That would be up to the lawyers, but as I understand what they want to make sure is that the individuals who fired their weapons were firing at a time when it was logical for them to be firing their weapons and not indiscriminately firing their weapons.

WALLACE: This will be -- and you talk about the pain for the Tillman family. This will be the fifth formal investigation into Pat Tillman's death. His family says they believe that there has been a cover-up.

Do you agree, at the very least, that this case has been mishandled? And what assurances can you give the Tillman family about this investigation?

PACE: I think every step of the way that the folks who have been responsible for investigating it have been trying to do the right thing, but, as we should be doing, we review the investigations. They go up the chain of command. Folks look at them to make sure they have complete information. If there's not complete information, they send it back.

In this case, it's unfortunate that it has to be looked at again, but I'm satisfied that it is being looked at again, because if one of the reviewing officials decided that there was something that had to be looked at, we should do that.

WALLACE: And your assurances to the Tillman family?

PACE: My assurances are that we will continue to look into this matter in great detail until we assure ourselves and them that all the facts have been looked at. WALLACE: President Bush is set to meet this week with top military commanders, including yourself, to review the situation in Iraq. First of all, what about this British newspaper report that all U.S. troops will be out of Iraq within a year?

PACE: They're not true. We're going to do exactly what we said we're going to do, which is to make the assessments of situations on the ground.

The commanders in theater will make their recommendations up the chain of command, and that will eventually get through the secretary of defense to the president for decisions about U.S. troop levels.

WALLACE: Is it fair to say that the spike in sectarian violence and the failure to form a new Iraqi government make it harder to pull our troops out?

PACE: No, I think that the response of the yet-forming Iraqi government to this most recent attack on the sacred mosque shows great promise for the future.

Here you have a government that's not even fully formed yet. They're facing a terrorist act of a magnitude that you can't even imagine, that they would take on a sacred facility like that, and the police and the security forces and the government itself responds pretty well.

So I think that the Iraqi people -- Kurds, Shia, Sunni -- walked up to the abyss, took the look in, didn't like what they saw, have pulled together, have pulled back from violence, and are working together to keep things calm and to find the right mix for their own government.

WALLACE: You talk about the government. The fact is it's coming up on three months since they held that election to create a permanent national assembly. They still don't have a government.

Has the failure of Iraqi politicians to come together and create a government destabilized the military situation, the security situation, in Iraq?

PACE: No, not at all. The Iraqi security forces are performing extremely well. Their army, their police are doing extremely well. The fact that it's taking a while for that government to form -- you have many, many different groups that need to be represented in a fair and representative government. They're working hard at it.

Democracy is not clean, not easy, but they're working real hard, and that government, when it does form, will have the support of a much improved and improving military.

WALLACE: You talk about security forces performing well. There have been reports -- one -- that in some cases the Iraqi police allowed some of these militias in the street to go ahead and get engaged in revenge killings. And there's also been concern, as you know, for some period of time about infiltration, particularly of the police, by some of these Iraqi militias. Is that not a concern?

PACE: It is a concern. On balance, the Iraqi army and the Iraqi police have done extremely well, certainly compared to their capacities a year ago, they are way better than they were.

But the fact is that there are still elements -- there are still militias that are performing outside the bounds of government control, and we need -- we, meaning they, the Iraqi government -- need to get it under control.

WALLACE: What about this question of sectarian violence? Is it part of our mission there for U.S. soldiers to be put in the position of protecting some Iraqis from other Iraqis?

PACE: I don't think we need to do that. Certainly, if U.S. armed forces see violence, one group on another, they're going to step in and stop it.

But right now the Iraqi army has over 100 battalions that are in the field. The Iraqi police have over 30 battalions that are in the field. There's plenty of Iraqi security forces to do the work that needs to be done to maintain peace between Iraqis.

WALLACE: Let's turn, if we may, to the broader war on terror. During his surprise visit to Afghanistan this week, President Bush flatly predicted that Bin Laden and his gang will be either captured or killed. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: It's not a matter of if they're captured and brought to justice, it's when they're brought to justice.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: General, after more than four years of hunting for Bin Laden, is that just rhetoric, or are you really getting closer?

PACE: It's not rhetoric. I could not tell you we're getting closer. I can tell you we continue every day with every resource we have to track down Bin Laden, Zawahiri, Zarqawi, so the president of the United States is saying what is true, which is that we will continue to hunt these folks.

WALLACE: He says it's not a matter of if, it's when. I mean, it's been more than four years, so how can you really say when?

PACE: I can't say when, but I can say it will eventually happen.

WALLACE: Why?

PACE: Why? Because we're going to continue until we find them. WALLACE: U.S. force levels in Afghanistan are set to drop from 19,000 to 16,000 fairly soon. But on the other hand, just this week, the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency told Congress that attacks by the Taliban and other groups surged 20 percent this year and that the Taliban represents a greater threat to the security of the government of Afghanistan than any time since late 2001. What's the situation there?

PACE: First of all, the current number is about 23,000, because we're going through a swap-out of units. So although it's a 19,000 base, with the units coming and going right now we're up about 23,000.

We will get down to around 16,000 and 17,000 U.S. troops, at the same time that NATO forces are coming in, and the size of the other countries that are there will increase. Clearly, as those forces enter the theater, the Taliban -- we're going to test them. And that's why we think there'll be violence in the future.

But remember, we're talking about small baselines. If there's four attacks in a day and you have a fifth attack, you've had an increase of 20 percent. And that's really the kinds of numbers we're talking about in Afghanistan.

WALLACE: Okay. New subject, the Dubai ports controversy. You say, and you've been saying this a lot in recent days as this has become a controversy, the United Arab Emirates is now a strong ally in the war on terror.

But this week Congressman Duncan Hunter, who, I don't have to tell you, is the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said that the deal should be killed and that the UAE has turned a blind eye to the transshipment of nuclear triggers to Pakistan and the shipment of nerve gas components to Iran.

Let's take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HUNTER: That's the nature of Dubai. It's a bazaar for terrorist nations to receive prohibited components from sources from the free world and from the non-free world.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: General, is Congressman Hunter wrong?

PACE: Well, I think the policy debate is going to continue in public, and that's outside of my lane. What I can tell you is that military to military, which is where my lane is, that we could not have better cooperation from United Arab Emirates.

They service our ships. They service more of our warships than any other port other than a U.S. port anywhere in the world. They have an air facility that they let us use for all of our needs in the region, specifically, especially, with regard to logistics. There's an air combat range where we're able to practice our combat maneuvers in the air.

Everything we do with the UAE military is very positive, very friendly, very supportive, and they've been very, very good partners.

WALLACE: But, sir, I want to press what Congressman Hunter is saying. He's talking about, in effect, a military and certainly an intelligence issue. He's saying that the UAE allows prohibited components of weapons of mass destruction to go through its ports, and, as he says, turn a blind eye to them. Is that true?

PACE: I do not know if that is true. I only know what I know about the military-to-military relationships, and they're very solid.

WALLACE: If that's true, would that change your judgment about the UAE?

PACE: I would not want to speculate on whether or not it's true, Chris. That would simply muddy the waters in a very, very important dialogue amongst the civilian leadership of this country.

WALLACE: Finally, sir, General Casey, your top commander in Iraq, says this week that he intends to continue the practice of paying for the placement of articles in the Iraqi media.

Two questions. First of all, has the Pentagon approved this, and do you see a contradiction between our efforts to build a free press in Iraq and the Pentagon putting out paid propaganda?

PACE: First of all, as I know the facts, General Casey has an ongoing investigation, and what he decided was that until he sees the final results of that investigation, he will continue to do what he was doing.

Secondly, it's really important, regardless of whether something is legal or not or authorized or not, to ensure that the perception is the correct perception. We do not want to do any damage at all to the correct perception of a free press and a press that is not influenced in a way that's incorrect or wrong. So we need to be very careful about how we do that.

WALLACE: Well, I'm confused, then. If you're concerned about that perception, why not stop the practice until you decide what to do?

PACE: Well, that's General Casey's investigation ongoing. What he knows about, what he's been doing so far, he's comfortable with. I have not seen the final results yet, but collectively, with General Casey, General Abizaid, my recommendation to the secretary of defense, the secretary -- we will determine what the proper functioning of that entity should be.

WALLACE: So you and the entire command of the Pentagon has not decided this issue.

PACE: That's correct. WALLACE: General Pace, we're going to have to leave it there. Once again, thank you so much for coming in. And please come back, sir.

PACE: Chris, thank you for your time, sir.

WALLACE: Up next, the man still in the eye of a political hurricane, Michael Brown, the former director of FEMA. Our exclusive interview with him in a moment.

WALLACE: Joining us now for his first Sunday show interview since Hurricane Katrina, the former director of FEMA, Michael Brown.

Welcome to Fox News Sunday . Thanks for coming in, sir.

BROWN: Thank you, Chris.

WALLACE: Let's start with the big picture. As you look back over last August, how do you assess responsibility for what went wrong? How big a percentage was the federal government's fault and how much of the blame do you apportion to the state and local level?

BROWN: Well, we have to remember in this country the primary responsibility is for state and local governments. FEMA and the federal government come in only in a catastrophe and only at the request of the governor to assist them.

WALLACE: So if you're going to say a percentage for federal, state and local for the responsibility for what went wrong, how would you assign it?

BROWN: Seventy percent state and local, 30 percent federal.

WALLACE: The most immediate problem, I think everybody would agree, was the failure to evacuate the city in the first place. We've all seen those pictures of the school...

BROWN: Right.

WALLACE: ... buses out in the parking lot. Here they are partially submerged. Why didn't they get used to get people out of New Orleans?

BROWN: To this day, I don't know. I mean, I literally called the president on Saturday and Sunday and said Mr. President, you've got to call Nagin and Blanco and through persuasive powers get them to do that mandatory evacuation. And when they...

WALLACE: And did he do that?

BROWN: He did do that. And when you think about the mayor saying well, I can get 90 percent of the people out, that still means 57,000 people are still stranded, people that cannot get out and people that wouldn't get out.

WALLACE: Let's talk about the federal role and the tapes that everybody has seen this week that has put Katrina back in the news. Sunday, August 28th, the day before the hurricane hits, you're on a video conference with the president and other key officials, and here is what he says.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I want to assure the folks at the state level that we are fully prepared to not only help you during the storm, but we will move in whatever resources and assets we have at our disposal after the storm.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: In fact, was the federal government fully prepared, as the president said?

BROWN: I don't think we were, Chris. I think that we had dropped the ball long before Katrina hit in not doing the kind of catastrophic disaster planning that the federal government should have been doing. That's where we dropped the ball.

WALLACE: So why did the president say they were fully prepared?

BROWN: Well, because I think the president was right in the sense that we were going to move every asset we could into New Orleans and Mississippi, into that 90,000 square mile area to help everybody.

WALLACE: In that same conference, the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, says -- and let's put it up -- If there is anything you need from the Coast Guard or any other components that you're not getting, please let us know. And you respond, I appreciate it. The Coast Guard and other DHS agencies have been incredibly good to us.

Sounds like you had what you needed.

BROWN: I did. And in fact, we always had cooperation from both the Coast Guard and all the other components of DHS, and I want to say on air, too, particularly from the Department of Defense. Secretary Rumsfeld and Secretary England had always advised me that I could get anything I needed.

WALLACE: So I mean, I guess the big question everybody asks is if you had all these assets -- this is the day before the storm hits -- why didn't they get to the people who needed them until Thursday or Friday or even later that week?

BROWN: Because I don't think that we realized -- I don't think the entire government apparatus realized what I knew in my gut on Saturday and Sunday, that this would be a catastrophic disaster of biblical proportions, beyond anything this country had faced before.

WALLACE: Well, why didn't they? I mean, that's your job as the head of FEMA. You're on these conferences. And you know, the tapes show you were sounding the alarm on Sunday, the day before the storm hit.

BROWN: Correct.

WALLACE: Why didn't they know and why didn't they then act in those first days?

BROWN: I don't know. And that's one of the things that I think we need to go back and find out, because I was sounding those alarm bells, and to this day I'm incredibly frustrated that we didn't move and could not move things faster.

WALLACE: All right. Secretary Chertoff says you were a big part of the problem, that on Tuesday, the first day after the storm, that you were out of touch. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MICHAEL CHERTOFF, DHS SECRETARY: I heard that he was flying around with governors and other people, that he was thinking about a T.V. appearance. And I gave him a very clear message: Job one is to get this thing done. Sit in the operation center. Get with the relevant managers. Make sure you are taking care of all of these issues.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: I understand your wanting to get out and to get a firsthand view of what was going on, but doesn't it make sense that you should have been in the operations center coordinating things?

BROWN: Absolutely not. And in fact, that's not how FEMA's operated in its entire history. Every FEMA director is in the field with the troops making sure they have what they need and cutting through that red tape.

I think Secretary Chertoff's order for me to stay in Baton Rouge was one of the tipping points that caused this disaster to be even worse.

WALLACE: But let's take a look at what happened on that date. This is Tuesday. It's the crucial day. It's the first day after the storm. It's not till late Monday that you even know that the levees have been breached.

You spent that day on helicopter tours of Louisiana and of Mississippi, and here's what you had to say about problems you were having staying in touch. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BROWN: We were having horrible cell phone problems making connections, and I was on two helicopters. I was on a helicopter with Governor Blanco in which we couldn't make contact, and then there was a time when I had flown MilAir to Mississippi to visit with Governor Barbour and my team in Mississippi, and we had a hard time making contact there.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Is that really where you needed to be, on helicopters and, by your own admission, having trouble staying in touch?

BROWN: We had trouble staying in touch, but we stayed in touch. If you go back and look at my cell phone logs, I had constant communication with both the White House and with Chertoff and DHS throughout those two-day periods. It wasn't easy, but we had contact.

And I'd correct another misperception. We knew about the levees breaking at approximately 1:49, 2 o'clock that afternoon.

WALLACE: On Monday.

BROWN: On Monday. And so that's why we were out trying to find out everything going on, so we could move assets where they were needed.

WALLACE: But one of the big complaints, sir, is that you were holding things up. You had said that you knew about the hundreds of people stranded in the convention center on Wednesday of that week.

And yet according to the Senate investigation, it wasn't until Friday, two days later, that FEMA actually ordered food and water to get to those people. Why the two-day hold-up?

BROWN: And that's incorrect, and I think the Senate is absolutely wrong. The minute that we learned about those people in the convention center, we immediately started ordering supplies in there.

The problem was we made the orders to get things there. It was actually physically getting them there, because the FEMA logistics system by that point was not doing as well as it should have done.

WALLACE: Why not? I mean, again, you know, the media was there. They're reporting it. They're able to get back and forth, in and out of New Orleans. Why can't the U.S. government, the state government, the local government get food and water and medicine to those people?

BROWN: And I love that premise. You know, the media was able to get one person and a camera crew and a sound guy there, which is easy to do, as opposed to moving literally tons of food and supplies into an area that's flooded.

And you can't go in and just start air-lifting and dropping things in there, even though I tried to get that done. So it's a difference between getting one or two people in there and getting a convoy of supplies in there.

WALLACE: All right. The White House has just completed a review of Katrina, and here is what the president's top homeland security adviser, Fran Townsend, had to say. Let's watch.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

TOWNSEND: Michael Brown chose not to follow his chain of command. That can't happen again. That has to be very clear.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Here's, I guess, the question. If, as you say, the secretary of homeland security, Michael Chertoff, was marginalizing FEMA, why wasn't it even more important for you to keep Chertoff and DHS fully in the loop?

BROWN: Because DHS and Chertoff don't provide anything that I need in that disaster. Chertoff can't move one bottle of water. He can't move one MRE.

And for Fran Townsend to now come out and say I wasn't following the chain of command completely belies exactly how we operated from the day this administration came in, from September 11th all the way through the Florida hurricanes in 2004.

I always dealt directly with the White House directly with the president.

WALLACE: But was that okay with Chertoff? Because he says -- and also, frankly, his predecessor, Tom Ridge, says -- you were -- I mean, one of the words that's been used, not by them specifically, is insubordinate. You were doing and end-run around your direct superiors at homeland security and going to the White House the whole time.

BROWN: You know, Tom Ridge was very smart. Tom Ridge knew that in a disaster he need to stay away. And in Florida in 2004, Tom Ridge stayed completely out of my way.

I never had any secretary of homeland security interfere with what my operations were up until Chertoff.

WALLACE: Well, wait. Interfere? I mean, they're your boss.

BROWN: Let me give you an example of what happened in Louisiana. I would give an order for something to happen. And somebody would go talk to Chertoff. And Chertoff would give a different order. And so there was this confusion about who was in charge.

I should have been in charge in there. I should have been making those decisions. And Chertoff should not have been second-guessing those decisions.

WALLACE: Did the White House know that you were doing an end-run around Chertoff during Hurricane Katrina, and did they, in effect, say that's fine with them, you can cut him out?

BROWN: Well, they continued to take my phone calls and they continued to talk to me about what I needed and what they could do to help me.

WALLACE: So how do you explain Fran Townsend saying that you didn't report up the chain of command?

BROWN: I think this is after the fact, trying to find an excuse.

WALLACE: You have said that calling Chertoff was a waste of time.

BROWN: Correct.

WALLACE: I want to put up some of the e-mails that you were sending at this same time. Let's take a look. August 29, the day the storm hit. Michael Brown to FEMA staff. If you'll look at my lovely FEMA attire, you'll really vomit. I am a fashion god.

August 30th, the day after the storm. Michael Brown to your assistant. Do you know of anyone who dog-sits? Bethany has backed out and Tamara is looking. If you know of any responsible kids, let me know.

And you can't take the time to call Secretary Chertoff?

BROWN: But I did call Secretary Chertoff. If you look -- again, if you look at my phone call logs, I kept that man in the loop. I have records showing that I called him and he called me.

But I think the other thing, Chris, is people like to take those e-mails and make fun of those. Those e-mails are no different than a heart surgeon who's in the middle of an open heart surgery moving a heart and saying hey, guys, do you want to play basketball? It's a little bit of levity. It's trying to bring some humor to keep the troops moving.

But for someone to come back now and say I didn't keep Chertoff in the loop -- I didn't...

WALLACE: Well, it's not somebody. Chertoff says you didn't keep him in the loop, and here's Fran Townsend saying you didn't keep Chertoff in the loop.

BROWN: And once again they are being disingenuous and they're still looking for a fall guy, because if you go back and look at the phone records, there is a constant chain of communication between me and Chertoff throughout the disaster.

WALLACE: Finally, and perhaps most important, from what you hear about all the changes the administration has made, all of this lesson learned report, the investigations by the Senate and the House, is the government any better prepared than it was last August 28th to deal with a disaster?

BROWN: Chris, I think we're worse off. If you look at what's happening in FEMA, they still have -- Chief Paulison is now talking about the hundreds of vacancies they can't fill. There's still this confusion about what FEMA is supposed to do and not do.

The partnerships between FEMA and state and local governments have been broken and will continue to be broken by the path that the secretary is headed down. So I think we're worse off today than we were even before Katrina.

WALLACE: And what about the White House? They just put out this more than 100-page report, lessons learned, big report that Fran Townsend presented to the president. Have they gotten their act together?

BROWN: Not yet. And I think what they need to do is recognize that FEMA -- despite the politics of it, FEMA needs to be pulled out of the Department of Homeland Security because it has a different mission, it has a different culture, and until it's independent, with its own budget and its own relationships with state and local government, it will continue to falter.

WALLACE: Hurricane season starts June 1st. What are you saying to the people of America?

BROWN: I'm telling you that they ought to demand right now that FEMA be pulled out. These people on the Hill ought to pull FEMA out right now, make it independent, and cut out the baloney.

WALLACE: Mr. Brown, we want to thank you so much for coming in.

BROWN: Thank you, Chris.

WALLACE: Up next, how much does the new storm over Hurricane Katrina actually change our understanding of what happened? We'll ask our panel, Brit Hume, Nina Easton, Bill Kristol and Juan Williams.

We'll be right back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BROWN: My gut tells me, I told you guys, my gut was that this is a bad one and a big one.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was then FEMA Director Michael Brown on the day before the storm hit, predicting the devastation from Hurricane Katrina.

And it's panel time now for Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Nina Easton of The Boston Globe, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams from National Public Radio.

So, Brit, what, if anything, did we learn this week from these government video conferences about what went wrong on Hurricane Katrina?

HUME: I would say we learned next to nothing. And what the Associated Press, which got all of this started, said we learned turned out not to be true, as the A.P. itself finally acknowledged on Friday evening in a very grudging three-paragraph, quote, clarification.

Basically, the story line that came out of this video, of an event, by the way, which was open -- at least in all relevant portions open to the press, attended by Fox News and other news organizations -- in fact, when you look at the tape of this supposedly confidential video, you see news cameras in the background in a number of the shots.

Well, there were news cameras there much of the time, and what the A.P. claimed we learned was that the president had been warned a day ahead of time that the levees stood a good chance of being breached.

What, in fact, he was warned was that the levees could be topped, and the briefing on that, by the way, also said that all the models predicted that while this was a possibility, that they were predicting that New Orleans would get very little flooding, relatively speaking.

Topping a levee means the water flows over the top. You get some flooding out of that. Breaching a levee means the whole levee gives way and water just comes pouring in, which was what happened in New Orleans.

So he received no such warning. The A.P. couldn't tell the difference between topping and breaching. Much of the rest of the media fell for it hook, line and sinker, forgetting the fact that, you know, it had been covered at the time, and we had, you know, a two or three-day frenzy over something that ended up turning out to be totally bogus.

WALLACE: Nina, the reason this became an issue -- and let's put up the quote from the president -- is on September 1st, in an interview, when obviously the blame game was going on, he said, I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees.

Now, as Brit points out, in fact, A.P. got it wrong. He was warned in that August 28th briefing that the levees might be topped, not breached. On the other hand, the next day Brownie says -- Michael Brown -- that he had been talking to the president and there had been some discussion of breaches.

How big a deal is this?

EASTON: Well, it's clear from Michael Brown that he thought this was going to be a catastrophic event. I mean, if you listen to those tapes...

HUME: Well, everybody said that at that time.

EASTON: That's right. And I think one thing -- if you put all the pieces together, it's clear that Michael Brown is good at sounding alarms. He sounded alarms about what would happen to FEMA if it was put in the Department of Homeland Security. There's lots of e-mail traffic now that shows that way back he issued those warnings.

He issued warnings about this hurricane coming. What I think he probably wasn't good on is follow-through. And you saw that not just -- you know, you've got the White House playing the blame game with him, but let's step back and look at the House committee.

The Republican House committee that investigated this blamed Mayor Nagin and the governor, Kathleen Blanco, for not evacuating. They should have evacuated. They got the call to evacuate 56 hours before landfall. The hurricane center was warning them. They didn't issue evacuation orders until 19 hours before the landfall.

But the same committee also criticized FEMA for not engaging in emergency activities that weekend, before landfall, and I think, again, when you look at some of the video from this that was released, old as it may be, it does show that there's a sort of passivity.

There wasn't somebody taking a leadership role and saying look, this is an emergency, you go do that, you go do that. There was a sense of briefings going on, but not that sense of let's get something done.

WALLACE: Bill?

KRISTOL: It's striking in retrospect how much damage Katrina did to the Bush administration, I think, politically. I mean, they had had a rough first half of 2005. The Social Security initiative was going nowhere. But other things were going pretty well -- elections in Iraq, et cetera.

Katrina began a series of events -- Harriet Miers' nomination, the Scooter Libby indictment, subsequent events also -- in which the administration has looked defensive, or reactive or less than fully competent.

And now we have a former pretty senior administration official, Mr. Brown, shooting at a current senior administration official, Mr. Chertoff, which is never something an administration wants. I underestimated at the time -- I mean, I've been in government. Government makes mistakes.

I thought this was not a great performance by the federal government, an even worse performance by the state and local governments, but this happens, and you know, it's something that people move on from.

But I think it's become in people's minds an emblem of an administration that just isn't as serious about the competent execution of the functions of government as it should be. And I'm struck talking to conservatives and Republicans. They agree with the president on basic political philosophy. They agree with his basic policy agenda. But they're worried that they just don't seem to be able to execute as well as they should be.

WILLIAMS: You know, I think it's a matter of execution here. I don't think it's a matter of topping or breaching. When the president says -- I don't know that we put this quote up. He says we are fully prepared, which is what he said. I think that he should have had a sense well, there are all sorts of possibilities of what could happen, do we have the facilities, the people on the ground to protect.

And so I think then it becomes a matter of people questioning competence, as you were saying, Bill. And I think that then people have questions going forward. Now, this morning, when Michael Brown says to you, Chris, that we are not fully prepared for the next time...

WALLACE: No, he says we're worse prepared.

WILLIAMS: Right. Yes. I mean, I think that's the alarm. I mean, if he's sounding alarms -- as Nina says -- if he's good at it, boy, we should listen to that. That's terrible.

I mean, the idea that, you know, we still don't have radio communications, we still don't have cooperation between local and state partners with federal officials -- that's terrible.

And then I don't know about his argument about whether or not FEMA should be removed from Homeland Security. I'm going to just put that off to two big boys having, you know, something in the backyard, Chertoff and Michael Brown.

But I just don't -- what I worry about is the reality, are we prepared for the next time and the possibility that it won't even be a natural disaster. You talked about hurricane season. But it could be a terror attack.

HUME: I think that there will never be a time when this government at all its levels or any other government will be prepared to do what anybody will think is a satisfactory job of responding to anything of the proportions that Hurricane Katrina was.

It was, as Michael Brown described it, of biblical proportions. And you know, that's -- it's just simply not going to be tidy. If one of these storms hits again somewhere, no matter how prepared or what your plans are, you're going to have a hell of a mess.

And there will be all kinds of finger-pointing, owing somewhat to the expectation that government can really quickly remedy a situation like that. Government can't when it's that big.

WILLIAMS: But shouldn't we practice...

HUME: It never will be able to.

WILLIAMS: Shouldn't there be practice? Shouldn't we be saying let's put more people on the ground, let's look at what the 9/11 Commission said, let's get the radios to communicate?

HUME: All of those things are being tried and, doubtless, things can be improved at the margins. But when it's this big and this bad, as we saw, government doesn't respond well and I don't think it ever will.

Now, you look at what happened in Florida, where you had a better prepared -- a smaller storm, but a bad one.

WILLIAMS: And the president's brother.

HUME: Well, you also had a better prepared state government and a better prepared local government. Now, Florida had had more recent experience. They'd gotten very good about the evacuations and very effective with them. And they did a better job.

But Florida didn't get hit with anything as big as Katrina. If it had, it would still be a terrible mess.

WALLACE: Nina, I want to pick up on something that Bill said, and that is the political damage to this administration that began with Katrina. The Democrats immediately pounced on this, called for an independent investigation. Can they continue to get political mileage on Katrina?

EASTON: Yes, I think Katrina is the gift that keeps on giving for the Democrats, absolutely. And I think the president did suffer from this. He doesn't want to be an ambulance chaser, as he saw Bill Clinton being, somebody who goes in after post riots in Los Angeles and so forth and wants to be there feeling everybody's pain.

On the other hand, he went off -- after Katrina hit, he went to San Diego. He went back to Texas. He gave speeches on other topics before he came back to Washington, before he ended up back on the ground on the Gulf, and that hurt.

WALLACE: All right. We're going to have to take a break here. But when we come back, the president takes another hit in the polls from the ports controversy. What's his strategy for bouncing back? The panel weighs in right after this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: On this day in 1956, the U.S. Supreme Court voted 9-0 in Brown v. Board of Education to ban segregation in public schools. It was a landmark in the nation's civil rights movement.

Stay tuned for more from our panel and our Power Player of the Week.

HUNTER: I intend to do everything I can do to kill the deal.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REID: We don't need 45 days to review this. We don't need 45 seconds. This is a bad deal for the American people.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was just part of the bipartisan bashing that continued this week over the Dubai Ports World deal.

And we're back now with Brit, Nina, Bill and Juan. Well, it's clear, at least for now, that the decision by Dubai Ports World to call for this 45-day national security review has not stopped the political bleeding, and we have a new poll now from Fox News/Opinion Dynamics. Let's take a look at that.

The president's job approval rating has now dropped to 39 percent. His rating is now minus 15. Last month it was just at minus three. And when asked which party they trust more to protect the country, people still picked Republicans by a five-point margin, but in January they led by 13 points.

Brit, how much of this do you attribute to the ports controversy?

HUME: I think a lot. I think it's proved to be a surprisingly enduring and damaging political issue for the administration. And I mean, it clearly sneaked up on them. Somebody should have said you know, this is easy to demagogue, and it is really easy to demagogue them, and it's just as juicy as it can be, because it looks so awful on paper -- you know, Arabs controlling ports.

Well, they don't really control them, and all the details get lost in the argument. And the media, of course, being the media, have not been in any great hurry to correct the misimpressions created by political figures, and they make a fair share of their own.

I heard on one of the cable channels, not our own, the other day someone saying that this company was taking over port security. Not true. But the other thing is that on Capitol Hill, you have a very restive Republican population up there, and this president is not running again, and he is approaching lame duck status. Too early to say that, that he's there, but he's getting there.

And the Republicans are quite eager for opportunities to declare their independence. This was an easy one, and a lot of them did.

WALLACE: Yes, let me ask you about that, Nina, because we continue to see erosion this week from Republicans, I guess most famously, as we mentioned with General Pace, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, Duncan Hunter, who said I'm going to kill the deal, the UAE is dangerous.

Do you think at this point now that this deal is really in jeopardy?

EASTON: I think it could be. There's another poll -- you mentioned the Fox poll. There's a poll going around in Democratic circles which is showing -- it's causing some amount of glee -- it's the James Carville/Stan Greenberg poll -- because it is showing that there is a surge of Bush loyalists leaving the Bush camp and moving into the Democratic camp.

In white rural areas, Bush is losing supporters. Why? Because I think there is this convergence of this anti-immigrant sensibility and the Dubai deal. So you can replace Dubai sheiks with illegal immigrants.

And Duncan Hunter has been out front on the immigration issue as well. I mean, he's been -- he's not only been fighting illegal immigration, he also supports reductions in legal immigration. So I do think that this is the whole -- you put these two pieces together, and it becomes a real political danger for the president.

KRISTOL: I don't think Bush loyalists are moving to the Democratic camp. I think they may stay home, and these new polls are bad. The generic congressional ballot, whom do you intend to vote for, Republican or Democrat, is now, in the latest Fox poll, plus 14 Democrat, having been at the plus 11 or plus nine in the last two polls.

WALLACE: Well, let me actually put up a poll. We've got one right here. We asked about the November congressional election and which would be better for the country. Forty-five percent said if Democrats win. Thirty-one percent sided with Republicans. So go ahead.

KRISTOL: Right, and the next question is who do you intend to..

WALLACE: Who you're going to vote for.

KRISTOL: ... vote for, and it's 48-34. In 2002, the last off- year election where Republicans did well, won a narrow majority in both bodies, that number was about even through almost all of 2002, never went more than plus or minus... WALLACE: Even in 1994...

KRISTOL: ... five.

WALLACE: ... when we had the big Republican, you know, Contract with America, the Republicans just before the election only led, I think, by, I don't know, three points or six points or something.

KRISTOL: Right.

WALLACE: I mean, we're talking here about 14 points.

KRISTOL: It's a big number. There has been no ideological change in the country. That's what strikes me if you look into these polls. People have not become liberal overnight. They don't believe in tax hikes. The don't believe in dovish foreign policy. They don't believe in liberal judges.

A certain number of Republicans and conservatives have lost confidence in the Bush administration and have lost confidence in the Republican leadership in Congress, and they're going to stay home as of right now. Some of them will stay home in November. And as of right now, Republicans will lose the House.

WALLACE: Do you really think they might lose the House?

KRISTOL: Oh, yes. If this generic number holds up, Republicans will certainly lose the House.

WILLIAMS: Oh, come on. I'm sick of all this Bush bashing, Chris.

(LAUGHTER)

WALLACE: I can tell that you've had enough of that.

WILLIAMS: I'm tired of this. Let me just say this. First and foremost, I think that if you're thinking about how the president could react to this, you've got to see a president who's saying wait a second, you know, I'm going to be steadfast on the Dubai ports deal, I've got to handle national security issues and relationships with the Arab world.

Americans understand it, but I don't think it's come home, and I think a lot of the fear-mongering that Republicans have been engaged in in the past to exploit the terror issue is now coming back to bite them. I think that's part of it.

But secondly, I don't think they're going to lose the House, because I don't think most people are going to run on national issues. If you talk to Republicans and talk to Republicans in charge of these congressional races, they talk about localizing these elections.

And here's the big point. Democrats don't have some alternative strategy on Iraq that says oh, this is how we should deal with Iraq, this is an exit strategy, this is the way we should deal -- the democrats are vacuous on this point. Bill, I don't know if you noticed this from the Republican perspective...

WALLACE: This really is too much for me to handle.

KRISTOL: Vacuous opposition parties can win control of Congress if one party is in charge of the presidency and Congress, and if voters of that party, supporters of that party, get sufficiently disillusioned to stay home. And that is the danger in November.

WILLIAMS: Well, the danger...

KRISTOL: The Democrats don't need -- in all honesty, the Democrats should keep quiet. They don't need a positive program. Every time they talk, they hurt themselves. They should be quiet and let Michael Brown attack Michael Chertoff, and let Duncan Hunter attack…

WILLIAMS: Right.

KRISTOL: ... President Bush. And the Republicans are doing plenty of damage to themselves.

WILLIAMS: Well, I think you can anticipate the White House is going to rebound. While they're coming up with new ideas, they'll go back to your one in the pocket every time, more tax cuts, more tax cuts, right?

They'll talk about school vouchers, and religion and abortion, and that's how they'll come back. But it comes to the war in Iraq. When it comes to terror, there's trouble.

WALLACE: Brit, where do you stand? I mean, my whole universe has been rocked here.

HUME: Well, I would only add this, that straight-line projections very rarely play out in politics. This is March. Election's a long way off. A lot will happen. It could get worse for the president. But it also could very well get better, and a lot better.

Remember, there's some underlying things that are in his favor, chief among them the economy, which is doing very well indeed. It is normally the key issue in the election. You say well, then, gee, how can he be in so much trouble. And when you get down to it, yes, Katrina didn't help, and the continued reminders of it don't help.

But at the end of the day, if the situation improves in Iraq, and it may well, I think that the atmosphere will change in his favor, and that doesn't mean there will be a big Republican landslide, but they probably can hold on to the House and Senate, probably.

WILLIAMS: But you notice that on Iraq, most Americans think now it's going to be civil war.

WALLACE: We're going to have to leave it there. Thank you all, panel. That's it for today. See you next week. I just can't stand everybody taking different positions here. Time now for some mail about our interview with Massachusetts governor and potential presidential candidate Mitt Romney.

Charles H. Young III from Nevada writes, Your question about Mr. Romney's Mormon faith were answered evasively. He's clearly a flip- flopper when it comes to the question of abortion.

But Sandy Stewart from Arizona had a different view. Mr. Romney has integrity. Ted Kenney and Hillary Clinton have absolutely none. I'll take his devotion and quality of character over theirs any day.

Be sure to let us know your thoughts by e-mailing us at fnsfoxnews.com. Up next, our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: It was a friend of Mark Twain who famously said everyone talks about the weather but nobody does anything about it. Well, Twain and his pal never met our Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JOHNSON: Our job is to provide that information that allows us to save lives and property. It's literally the difference between life and death.

WALLACE: General David Johnson is head of the National Weather Service, 4,700 people working in 122 forecast offices across the nation telling Americans everything from whether to take an umbrella to whether to evacuate. And even then, they stay on the job.

JOHNSON: In Slidell, with Hurricane Katrina coming ashore, people stayed in the weather forecast office and continued to issue those forecasts.

WALLACE: A forecast station looks a lot less complicated than we expected. Armed with Doppler radar and satellite images, the lead forecaster sits at a bank of computers.

JOHNSON: He's looking at precipitation, he's looking at winds, he's looking at the satellite shot and trying to figure out the best, most accurate forecast that he can provide.

WALLACE: And Johnson emphasizes for all the gizmos, the forecaster still makes a lot of judgment calls, calls that he says are constantly getting more accurate -- for instance, tornadoes.

JOHNSON: Our lead times have grown from about six minutes to about 13 minutes on average for all tornadoes across the country.

WALLACE: Meaning you know 13 minutes ahead of time it's going to hit here?

JOHNSON: And we issue that warning out to the public.

WALLACE: They've also gotten better at tracking hurricanes. The weather service can say today within 100 miles where a hurricane will be 48 hours from now. Two thousand five was the worst year on record for hurricanes. And Johnson says the storms may stay bad for a while.

JOHNSON: This is a cyclical thing, and since about 1995 we have been above average and we anticipate that we will stay above average for another decade or so.

WALLACE: Is there global warming? Is the weather warmer than it was 20 years ago?

JOHNSON: That's a scientific fact, that you can see that the ice cap is reduced and that the temperatures are getting warmer overall.

WALLACE: But he says you can't draw a link between the warming and more dangerous storms.

Johnson spent three decades in the Air Force.

JOHNSON: I flew airplanes in the Air Force and was a consumer of weather information for about 27 years.

WALLACE: Then he became the Air Force director of weather, looking for ways to exploit this country's technological advantage.

JOHNSON: Perfect weather for me was undercast, raining cats and dogs and a moonless night. That's the weather I looked for, because I didn't want my airplane shot.

WALLACE: But now Johnson's customers are the public. And like any weatherman, he knows how demanding they can be.

Do you take it personally when the National Weather Service makes a mistake?

JOHNSON: You bet. And I think every weather forecast office out there does, too.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: If you're wondering about this year's hurricanes, Johnson says the National Weather Service will issue its annual forecast on May 16th, just before hurricane season officially starts in June.

And that's it for today. Have a great week and we'll see you next Fox News Sunday .

CBS – FACE THE NATION

SCHIEFFER: Today on Face the Nation three issues: The situation in Iraq, the Iranian nuclear program and the ports controversy.

Are U.S. troops in Iraq making the situation worse? That is what Congressman Jack Murtha believes even though the U.S. commander in Iraq says the current crisis has passed. What would happen if U.S. troops left?

Iran is threatening to speed up its nuclear program. What should the U.S. do? And what about that port arrangement? These are the questions for Congressman Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, and the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Richard Lugar, Republican of Indiana.

I'll have a final word on the Katrina tapes.

But first Iraq again on Face the Nation.

Good morning again. Joining us in the studio, Congressman John Murtha. Of course, he is an ex-Marine. He was wounded in Vietnam. He was a hawk on Iraq.

But then last November, he said it is time to bring the troops home, and it rekindled a debate, made it even fiercer.

Congressman Murtha, thank you for coming this morning. And I want to start by quoting something that General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said this morning on Meet the Press.

He said he believes the war in Iraq is going, in his words, very, very well. What is your assessment?

MURTHA: Well, would I believe him? I mean, that administration -- this administration, including the president, have mischaracterized this war for the last two years.

They first of all -- they said it will take 40,000 troops to settle this thing right after the invasion.

Then they said there's no insurgency. They're dead-enders is what the secretary of defense said.

On and on and on with mischaracterization of the war. They said there's nuclear weapons. There was no nuclear weapons there; there were no biological weapons, no Al Qaida connections.

So why would I believe the chairman of the Joint Chiefs when he says things are going well?

I ask my staff -- when my staff -- when they make a statement like this, I say, look, look in the latest report to the State Department puts out, the weekly report and tell me how much progress we've made.

So they look at it. And we've made no progress at all. Sixty percent unemployment. The Iraqis want us out of there, 80 percent of the Iraqis want us out of there. Oil production below pre-war level. Water production, only 30 percent of the people are getting water.

Now our troops are being fed well and being taken care of. They're doing everything they can do militarily, but they're in a situation where they're caught in a civil war.

And there's two participants fighting for survival and fighting for supremacy inside that country. And that's my definition of a civil war.

So I don't believe the secretary. I think we're not making progress. We're caught in a civil war. We've lost almost 20,000 people in this war, if you count the casualties, and the people who have been killed in the three years we've been involved.

SCHIEFFER: Now, I'm going to make sure I understand. I mean, I think I understand what you're saying. But you're talking about a Marine, and here you are an ex-Marine. This is a military man. This is not somebody, some civilian out there at the Pentagon.

You're saying you no longer believe what Marine General Peter Pace says when he says he thinks things are going well.

MURTHA: That's exactly right. Why would I believe him with all the misstatements and mischaracterizations they've made over the last two years?

And the public is way ahead of what's going on in Washington. They no longer believe. The troops themselves, 70 percent of the troops said we want to come home within a year.

The only solution to this is to redeploy.

Let me tell you, the only people who want us in Iraq is Iran and Al Qaida.

And I've talked to a top-level commander the other day, about two weeks ago. And he said China wants us there also. Why? Because we're depleting our resources, our physical -- our mental, not our mental, our troop resources and our fiscal resources.

SCHIEFFER: Well, now, Congressman, when you say Al Qaida wants us there, why would Al Qaida want us there?

MURTHA: Because we're depleting our resources, very small proportion of what's going on in Iraq.

And they've diverted their attention away from the war on terrorism. The war on terrorism is worldwide.

In Iraq it's a civil war.

And we have diverted ourselves away from that war on terrorism. We're spending our resources, and we're caught in a civil war which are mostly Iraqis.

Al Qaida is a very small proportion of the number of people fighting in Iraq. Iraq will take care of this themselves.

One of the problems I see and one of the frustrating things is our ambassador keeps giving advice to the Iraqis. Every time we give them advice, they vote for somebody else. Chalabi gets 1 percent of the vote; he was our guy. He was a Defense Department guy. Allawi, who was a State Department guy, he got 8 percent of the vote.

Then I asked Director Negroponte the other day, I says, how come he only got 8 percent of the vote. Well, he's a good man. Well, that's not a point.

The Iraqis don't pay attention to our advice. Eighty percent of them want us out of there; 47 percent say it's justified to kill Americans.

So we're caught in a civil war, and I'm convinced that we've diverted ourselves away from the fight on terrorism.

SCHIEFFER: But let me just ask you this, because you have said before, and I believe this is a direct quote. You say only 750 to 1,000 terrorists are in Iraq, and that Iraqis will kill or force them out if we leave. Why would it be easier for them to do that if we leave than if we stay?

MURTHA: Well, when I say terrorists, I'm saying al Qaida.

SCHIEFFER: Al Qaida.

MURTHA: They're using terrorist tactics. The Iraqis are using terrorist tactics. But I'm convinced they know where they are. They know who they are. But they won't tell us because they've turned against us. We've lost the hearts and minds of the people. I said on the floor of the House when the first supplemental came up, the $87 billion.

The most important part of that supplemental was the reconstruction. We had to win the hearts and minds of the people. We had to get water supplied. We had to get unemployment down. We had to do all the things, electricity. Now, we've got generators. Our troops have air conditioning in -- not the troops in the field, but the commanders and so forth. So they used to sit in their air-conditioned places, and they have good food and they're well -- the Iraqis know this. And as they see the casualties, they start to turn against us.

Our troops are doing everything they can. I go to the hospitals all the time. I've seen for a year the morale was starting to deteriorate because they don't believe there's a mission. It's open-ended. There's no point to them being there because there -- when they go out, what's your mission, I'll say to them after I question them for a while, talk to them. And they say, well, my mission was to find IEDs, and that means the way they find them was blow them up and lose a leg or lose an arm or be blinded, as I saw the other day, or lose both his hands, like I saw one.

SCHIEFFER: Congressman, why do you think that the Iraqis are having such a difficult time training their people? We keep being told that we've got to get this force trained up. How long does it take the Marines to make a Marine out of a recruit? What, 16 weeks?

MURTHA: Well, it takes about 16 weeks, but then you go into the training of the units themselves. So I'd say it would take a year. We suggested to them, we said to this administration two years ago, you got to start training Iraqis. They didn't do it seriously until a year ago, and now they went from one unit being trained to no units being trained.

So, you know, the thing is, the rhetoric is so frustrating. When they keep making statements which are very optimistic, and then it turns out to be the opposite. And the public has caught on to that, and they're very pessimistic about the outcome.

SCHIEFFER: What do you sense that the Republicans in Congress want to happen here?

MURTHA: Well, it's interesting. A lot of Democrats say to me, you know, you're helping the Republicans because if they start to get out, if they get a schedule and a timetable to get out, which I think they need to do, it will help the Republicans. So, they may not say it privately, but they understand how serious this is.

When you have the public against it, when you have the troops against what we're doing, when you have the people in Iraq against it, when you have the periphery against what we're doing, you have to understand that it's going to have a dramatic impact on the outcome of the election. I think right now I'd predict there's going to be a big turnover in Congress because people are so dissatisfied with a lot of things. They way they've handled and mishandled the war, Katrina, and of course, natural gas prices, the Medicare problem, all those things are -- just like it did in '94.

SCHIEFFER: Congressman, where do you come down on this whole controversy over whether an Arab country should be allowed to operate key ports in this country?

MURTHA: Well, that's an interesting thing. Roosevelt said, President Roosevelt said the only thing you have to fear is fear itself when he talked about World War II, when World War II started. These guys have used fear as a club. These guys have used fear as a club, and so then they wonder why the American people would react so viscerally when they talk about letting the Arabs take over the ports. It's no surprise to me. Now, you know...

SCHIEFFER: You think they should be allowed to take them over?

MURTHA: Well, I have mixed feelings about it. I really haven't seen enough about it. I mean, my initial reaction was against it. But I says, let me take a look at it before I can make up my mind. Dubai has been a good ally.

But I tell you I'd have to vote against it right now. I'd have to say that with all the concerns I have about security at the ports, which is not the best in the world that -- I'm not sure I'd like Dubai taking over the ports.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you also about this statement by Iran this morning. The Iranian government says that if this whole situation about whether or not they can produce, enrich uranium goes to the United Nations, they're just going to speed up the process, which is what the west says is another step toward building a nuclear weapon. What should we be doing about Iran right now?

MURTHA: Let me tell you, Bob, that's the problem we have. One of the reasons I spoke out after trying to do this privately, and for years and years I've done everything behind the scenes, tried not to speak publicly about many of these things, trying to give advice to the president, but here we have a situation where our military is in such bad shape, it couldn't deploy to a second front.

And the Iranians know this. This is not something I'm telling Iranians. North Korea knows it; China knows it.

We're depleting our resources in Iraq, which is a civil war. We should redeploy out of there and redo the Army, redo our military so that we can prevent a war on a second front, so we can say to Iran, look, fellows, you have to be very careful about what you do because we can use military force.

SCHIEFFER: But I guess the one thing that worries me about it, if we just left, isn't it going to send a signal that they're going to take this to mean that they defeated us and won't that just give them...won't their morale go up and cause them to try us in another place, perhaps here?

MURTHA: I know that's the common theory because that's the fear that they try to sell to the American people. I don't see that at all. There was no terrorism in Iraq before at all.

The Iraqis have to settle this themselves. This is in the a we thing. This is a them thing. They have a government now and they have to settle this.

No matter how complicated it is, they have to sit down, figure out what needs to be done and settle this civil war themselves. There will be some fighting. But the Al Qaida, the thing that we're worried about worldwide, the threat we're worried about in the United States, will disappear because the Iraqis do not like them.

It's just that they put up with them because we've become occupiers and we've united everybody against us.

SCHIEFFER: Congressman John Murtha, who says it's not a we thing but a them thing.

We'll be back with in a moment with the Republican view of all of this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: And, with us now, Senator Richard Lugar. He is, of course, the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Senator, thank you very much for coming. Two points of view this morning: General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs says, in his words, things are going, quote, very, very well in Iraq.

And then you just heard Congressman John Murtha say, we're in the midst of a civil war; we need to get out of there. Where do you come down?

LUGAR: Well, we are not certain yet whether it's civil war but it could be. The question really is whether Iraqis want to be Iraqis as opposed to Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. And that hasn't been decided. We're on the cusp of the decision. When President Talabani was a Kurd that said that he doesn't like the idea of Mr. Jaafari and the current prime minister, a Shiite continuing, that Kurds and Sunnis want to have somebody else in that role and they want to bring the parliament, which, after all, was elected last December 15, into play, but you can't do that until you have the leadership and a Cabinet, this is a period of decision right immediately ahead of us.

If they don't make it, then the possibilities are that Sunnis will fight Shiites. Kurds would like to be left out of the whole picture altogether, but they're unlikely to escape. And the oil resources which, ideally, could be shared in the 18 provinces are not going to be shared.

And so, therefore, whether it's civil war or not, there's an internal conflict there that doesn't get to Iraq. It gets you to sects that continue to fight that have been suppressed by kings, by Saddam now have a chance to really make it on their own.

SCHIEFFER: But I take it you do not agree with General Pace that things are going very, very well, from what I just heard you say. Would that be...

LUGAR: Well, General Pace is correct that the training has gone reasonably well, and that was shown in the suppression of the fighting that occurred in the last couple of weeks. Now, some would say it's an a different success, some places did better than others. But nevertheless, substantial presence of an Iraqi government managing to bring things under control.

I think he's correct in the sense that, after all, there still is the hope for democracy, still a hope for a unified Iraq. That is important, because the absence of that we would have to examine also.

In other words, it's all well and good to suggest that the Iraqis want this or that, but the people are not thinking as Iraqis. They're thinking as sects, or as particular parts of Iraq. And in that kind of a turmoil, we're back into the war against terror in a big way, with an incubator for difficulty.

SCHIEFFER: Well, do you think that the administration -- and General Pace is part of that -- is giving us the straight story on what's going on there? Because it seems to me that they play down the bad news and have from the very beginning.

LUGAR: Well, it's certainly not emphasized. We've tried to, at least in a modest way in our office, to send out nine letters. I've sent covers with some of the materials Congressman Murtha mentioned, the March 1 report, which talks about oil. It talks about the problems of electricity not going on in lots of parts of the country, and the educational process, the commerce.

These are serious issues, which have to be a part of the discussion.

The heart of the matter, obviously for most Americans, is people are being killed, people dying, Iraqis and Americans. How are we going to bring order? Is there a desire for order on the part of the parties involved, and if there is not, what then is our strategy if Iraqis decide they don't want to be Iraqis?

SCHIEFFER: Well, that just brings me to my next question. What should we be doing here? I mean, Congressman Murtha just said it's not a we problem; it's a them problem. But we, it seems to me, have to decide where we go from here. Do we keep committing troops to this? Do we bring them home? Do we put them out to the side? Where should the United States be right now? What should we be doing?

LUGAR: President Talabani asked assurance from our military commanders this week that we would be with them during this critical period of time. The answer has to be yes. It can't be equivocal. Otherwise, the thing really does fall apart.

I think that's important. Talabani, the president of the country. And they're talking about putting their act together.

Now, the fact is that they may or may not be successful, but we better hope that they are, because the consequences for our country and the war against terror are very fateful if they are not.

SCHIEFFER: So -- so what you're saying is that we can't -- we can't draw down our troops at this time.

LUGAR: Not at this time.

SCHIEFFER: No?

LUGAR: No.

SCHIEFFER: The president is getting ready to meet with his commanders and they had been talking about reducing the troop levels.

LUGAR: Yes.

SCHIEFFER: You think no longer can we think about that.

LUGAR: No, I think we will be thinking about that. And I would not be at all surprised if the president and the troop commanders discussed various phases of withdrawal, but this is provided that this government comes into being, that the parliament meets, that the armed forces are able to suppress the dissidents. In other words, without our help, with us in the background. Those are the consequences at least of what we're looking at.

SCHIEFFER: But you don't think there are going to be any troop withdrawals in the immediate future.

LUGAR: Well, not in the next couple of weeks. I think it's been broadly discussed ever since some troops left, as I recall, after the December 15th election, that that was very possible, and the rotations might not occur in quite the same frame.

SCHIEFFER: Well, Congressman Murtha just said that some Republicans tell him privately that he's really helping them, because this war is very unpopular, and if he does bring pressure and they do begin to draw down these troops, it will help the Republicans in the coming election.

What's your sense of where Republicans are on this? Do they want troops out? Do they want to keep them there? I'm not asking you what you think.

LUGAR: Yes, yes... (CROSSTALK)

LUGAR: ... general support in the Republican ranks for the president and for the troops as they stand. I would say that very clearly, everybody reads polls. They have not been going well for Republicans, for the administration, for the Congress. But I think likewise, most people who are in that sort of a game would say in the event that Iraq does actually form a democracy, in the event our economy strengthens, for example, in the event several things happen, then politics is a very fickle business. The polls then trickle up, and people say that was statesmanship at that point.

SCHIEFFER: It sort of sounds like my golf game. If I can hit that next shot just right, then I'm suddenly a good player. But there's a lot of things...

LUGAR: There's a lot of similarities.

SCHIEFFER: ... that have to happen here.

LUGAR: Yes.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you quickly about Iran. What should we be doing on this, and how serious is this situation?

LUGAR: We should be proceeding as we have been with the three European partners but even in a more concentrated way in diplomacy with Russia and with China and with India.

These are all players for different reasons. The Russians because they offer a potential solution. They could do the centrifuge technology in Russia, and the Iranians would not have to develop that. They could be the beneficiaries of nuclear energy.

Much the same sort of issue and fact that the president was discussing with the Indians in his visit. The provision of nuclear materials so they can do peaceful work.

Now at the same time the Chinese and the Russians and the Indians have a strategic interest in the country. The Chinese and the Indians because they're negotiating large billion-dollar multi-year deals for Iranian gas and oil.

To the extent that there are alternatives like nuclear energy, then perhaps they are not so intense with this.

And finally, some people in the United Nations, as we take a look at the security council, will have to decide is it important that there not be further nuclear weapons in the Middle East given all the volatile situations we're already discussed in Iraq, but we could discuss in Lebanon, in Jordan, in the Israeli-Palestinian problem across the board.

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you quickly about the ports deal. Do you think it's wise to go forward with that?

LUGAR: I think it's wise to have the 45 days of examination, of two or three things, one of which is this procedure within the administration, not well-known to Congress, not very well-briefed, probably reasonably well done in this particular case, likewise the relationship with Dubai and that's important to talk about.

And finally, port security. This is what Americans are genuinely interested in. Do we have control of our ports and how does anybody owning the operations affect that?

SCHIEFFER: All right. Senator, thank you so much for being with us this morning. Back with a final word in just a minute.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

SCHIEFFER: Finally today, I am glad that Washington and the rest of the nation got to see those tapes of government videoconferences, which showed that government officials from the top down were warned that Hurricane Katrina held a potential for catastrophe, yet managed to do virtually nothing but watch it happen.

But didn't we know that already, that the huge bureaucracy cobbled together after 9/11 was a monumental flop?

That political hacks performed like political hacks? Yes, it was a disgrace. But after two days in New Orleans this week, I am convinced that we have to stop the tape and go live. The people of New Orleans I talked to feel abandoned by government at every level, and forgotten by the rest of the country.

But their worry is about now. What happens next? Are the levees really going to hold the next time? Will they ever collect on their flood insurance? Will they ever get their schools open again? Only 20 of more than 120 are open now.

As government bureaucracies and Congress wrangle over who's to blame for last time, there is still no real plan about what to do the next time. What we do know is that the next hurricane season is less than three months away. Sheriff Jack Stephens of nearby St. Bernard Parish, whose entire 140-person deputy force is now living in trailers, told me the other night, No one knows what will happen if we get another big one. We're hanging on by our fingernails.

Can't we stop the tape recorder just long enough to think about that?

That's it for us. We'll see you next week, right here on Face the Nation.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: It's 11 p.m. -- it's 8 p.m. here in Dubai, 11 a.m. back in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 7 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for this special "Late Edition" live from Dubai. We'll get to my interview with the CEO of Dubai Ports, an exclusive interview. We'll get to that in just a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred, for that. The United Arab Emirates is a federation of seven independent states, including Dubai. It's been a longstanding ally of the United States in this part of the world. But there has been an uproar in recent weeks over a proposed deal that would allow Dubai Ports World to purchase a British company and run six major port operations in the United States.

Earlier today, I went to the headquarters of Dubai Ports World here in Dubai and spoke with the CEO, the chief executive officer, Mohammed Sharaf. We have this exclusive interview, an interview you will see only here on CNN.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Mohammed Sharaf, thanks very much for joining us. Good to be here in Dubai. You realize now you're in the middle of a firestorm back in the United States. Our most recent CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll asked the American public if they support this deal. Sixty-six percent said they oppose it. Only 17 percent thought it was a good idea. Do you understand why people in the U.S. don't like this deal?

MOHAMMED SHARAF, DUBAI PORTS WORLD CEO: Well, Wolf, thank you very much for having me on your show here. We are an international terminal operator. We operate in five continents of the world. We are recognized as the best in the industry.

Obviously, the American people have an issue. We would like to know that and rectify if there are any security measures that we need to take and we have not taken it yet. But we are very confident that we have met and will meet all the requirements.

BLITZER: Well, let's talk about some of the criticisms that have been leveled, and I'm anxious to get your explanation. One of the criticisms that has been leveled is that security is not good. Duncan Hunter, the chairman of the house armed services committee, said, "Dubai can't be trusted. The people who will sell or allow a transshipment of anything to anyone, those people shouldn't be in charge of our ports."

SHARAF: Well, again, we are operating everywhere in the world, and transshipment is one of the core businesses that we handle, whether it is in Dubai or it's in Romania or it's in (inaudible) the Dominican Republic. And all the authorities are comfortable with the security measures that we take.

Plus, the security measures are not only the responsibility of the port operator. It is also the authorities, whether they are the custom authorities or the coast guard, whether it's in the U.S. or it's in the Middle East or it's in Africa or it's in Europe.

BLITZER: Now, how can you assure the American public that if this deal goes through the ports of Baltimore and Miami, New York, New Jersey, New Orleans -- these are some of the major ports in the United States -- that terrorists won't come in, infiltrate through you, DP World, and create havoc at these ports?

SHARAF: I would say number one, we are ISPS-approved terminal operator.

BLITZER: What does that mean?

SHARAF: That means International Standards for the Port Security. So we are approved by the international organization. We are approved by the U.S. authority to come into the U.S. I would say, look at our credentials in different ports around the world, whether it's in Korea, it's in China, it's in Europe.

We are dealing with each and every authority in each and every country. And we abide by countries' law and the international terminal operator security measures we take. What better way to have a terminal operator who export your goods from China to U.S.? We are in China. Goods are being exported from China to U.S.

Goods are being operated from Korea to U.S. And goods are being exported from Europe to U.S., and we are in all those facilities. So I would say that we meet all those requirements as far as the security is concerned.

BLITZER: There was a former maritime head under the first President Bush, the first George Bush, who said this the other day, referring to what's going on here in Dubai. And we're at this facility right now, and we've had an extensive tour of what you guys are doing.

But Warren Leback says, "The security in the ports is very lax, as we all know. In an ordinary container, you could put a dirty bomb with a GPS or a cell phone and set it off in the middle of a city. If the United Arab Emirates decides they are clandestinely supporting terrorists, they could put pressure on personnel to look the other way on the containers." SHARAF: I would say that it's easier to say than done. Any container which is loaded on a ship, the ship owner must know what's inside that box. They would not load it until they are satisfied what's inside it, because they have an obligation toward the terminals or the ports they're calling at.

They need to advise the authorities what's inside that. If they don't know what's inside that, they will not take it. Simple as that. Now, for us to say that OK, United Arab Emirates, that's a sovereign issue. We as a terminal operator, we don't get involved in loading boxes.

BLITZER: What percentage of the containers here in Dubai are actually physically inspected?

SHARAF: That, I don't have the real figure. I think the customs people would be the right people...

BLITZER: The UAE customs people.

SHARAF: UAE customs, yes. They would be the right people to tell you what percentage.

BLITZER: You do have, one of your customers here is the United States Navy.

SHARAF: Yes, we do.

BLITZER: In fact, right behind me, not that far away. And they're a regular customer of yours.

SHARAF: Yes. They're not our customers only here, they are our customers in Djibouti, where we have built a purpose-built tank farm for them. They are customers in Germany. They use our facilities in Germersheim. So we treat them as a commercial customer of ours, and we take all the measures with them, the security measures that they require.

BLITZER: Joseph King, who is former head of U.S. customs involved in terrorism issues in New York, said this. He said, "Once this company," referring to DP World, "gets control of ports, they will be able to get a certain number of employees into the U.S. legally on work visas. Once people are in the country, it is much easier to establish sleeper cells. The people who pulled off 9/11 and who made the first attack on the World Trade Center in 1993 also had legitimate visas."

What kind of controls would there be on workers coming into the United States representing DP World in terms of background checks, in terms of making sure that these are not al Qaida operatives?

SHARAF: Well, I would say that number one, there's a misconception about port operators. Port operators don't control the security of the port. Any personnel coming in to work in U.S. will have to go through U.S. immigration, will have to go through U.S. security authorities, and then only they can come in and work. BLITZER: But if you recommend them and you're operating these ports, they would have a tremendous advantage in getting in.

SHARAF: We are an international company. We have all nationalities. We have Americans working with us, we have British people working for us, we have Rumanian people working for us. And yes, we have UAE nationals working with us.

So as an international company we have all nationalities, and all of them have to go through security measures, whether they're working here or anywhere else.

BLITZER: The White House press secretary, Scott McClellan, says that you've made some concessions, you've made some agreements to bolster security. He says, "One thing that is key is that this company agree to additional security measures that they will take beyond what some others do in transactions like this."

SHARAF: Yes we do.

BLITZER: Do you know what he's referring to?

SHARAF: Yes, yes...

BLITZER: What is he referring to?

SHARAF: What we have said is basically that within the 45 days we will not interfere in the running of the terminals in the U.S....

BLITZER: This 45-day investigation...

SHARAF: Yes.

BLITZER: ... that is about to begin?

SHARAF: Yes. And within that 45 days and later on if they would require, we would also go through all the security measures as far as personnel are concerned.

Meanwhile, we keep the personnel who are there today, who have been operating in the U.S. satisfactorily. They're mainly U.S. citizens and British citizens.

BLITZER: So you'd be willing to cooperate with the U.S. Government...

SHARAF: Definitely.

BLITZER: ... whatever they want, you'd be willing to say, DP World, from your perspective as a businessman, you'd be willing to cooperate?

SHARAF: Of course, because you see, it's unlikely for us to comfortably operate in an environment where the authorities don't have confidence in you. So first thing, we have to create that confidence, make them understand that what sort of operation we run around the world and what sort of operation we're going to be running in U.S.

BLITZER: There's been some suggestion that perhaps you should bring in some American subsidiaries or some American partners to work with you in Miami or Baltimore or New York and these six ports that you want to take over, at least the operations. Is that something you're considering doing?

SHARAF: We already have American partners there. As part of the P&O acquisition, they already have U.S. Partners. So the question of bringing more U.S. partners does not arise.

BLITZER: You don't need any more American partners?

SHARAF: No, we do have. And again, as partners we have them -- we consider the port authority as our partner because we need to work very closely with them because their security is our security. Our security is theirs.

BLITZER: Another argument that has been made against this deal is that the United Arab Emirates participates, supports the economic boycott of Israel, which is a close ally of the United States. What do you say about that, because you're owned by the United Arab Emirates?

SHARAF: I'm a commercial arm of the government-owned company. I don't get into that issues of boycott. But what I can say is that those issues are today a minor issue. Today we are dealing with Israeli companies here, like you know yourself, Zim. They call at our ports.

BLITZER: That's the major Israeli shipping company?

SHARAF: Yes, and they're the largest.

BLITZER: Are they allowed to come here to Dubai?

SHARAF: Yes, they call here in Dubai regularly, and they have the services coming into Dubai. They call at our other ports.

BLITZER: Are these having the name Zim or are they subsidiaries of Zim?

SHARAF: Some combination of all. We had Zim ships here with Zim boxes. We have the Gold Star Shipping Line call here regularly...

BLITZER: Which is a subsidiary of Zim.

SHARAF: Yes, yes. So on commercial basis as a commercial operator we don't get into those issues. Those are more of the politicians. They have to decide on the bigger picture, basically, they want to lift that boycott or not.

BLITZER: So as far as you're concerned you would be happy to deal with Israelis and deal with Israeli companies?

SHARAF: I'm doing that today, around the world.

BLITZER: No problem?

SHARAF: No problem.

BLITZER: And the government doesn't have a complaint about that?

SHARAF: No.

BLITZER: What about this other issue that has come up, that the opposition is the result of anti-Arab discrimination? Do you feel that?

SHARAF: I would say that we need to clarify to the American people, I think, again, it's a misunderstanding or misconception of us as DP World, what sort of an operator we are. We need to clarify that.

We need to educate the people in America that we are truly a global company, and it is not in our best interest to get into those areas where we feel or our customer feels that security is an issue.

We have customers whose vessels call at our terminals, which cost hundreds of millions. Not only the vessel, the goods on them cost hundreds of millions of dollars. If they don't have any confidence in our operation, they would not bring their ship to our terminals.

Each ship has up to 9,000, 10,000 containers on that. Can you imagine, each container costs -- the value of each container is around $100,000. What's the value of the total ship? Would they bring their ship to our terminals if they don't feel secured or safe? Never.

BLITZER: This is a really important deal for DP World, almost $7 billion. If it doesn't go through, what are the ramifications?

SHARAF: Well, as far as we are concerned, the deal is going to go through, and the British -- the government has approved it. We're just waiting for next week to conclude the deal.

There are big consequences for the British market if it doesn't go through because investors are waiting for the money. The deal has been made. The management, the board of the port, the company has approved the deal. The government has approved the deal. The matter is basically waiting for the money to be transferred to the investors. If they don't, big losses are going to be there for the investors.

BLITZER: We have to leave it there. Thanks very much for joining us.

SHARAF: Thank you very much. Thank you.

BLITZER: Mohammed Sharaf, a 1985 graduate of the University of Arizona in Tucson, now the CEO of Dubai Ports World. He gave us an exclusive tour of the facility earlier today. Much more of that coming up here on "Late Edition," as well as tomorrow in "The Situation Room," we'll be reporting live from Dubai.

Just ahead on this special "Late Edition," is international oversight of U.S. port operations a problem? Is it a risk for the United States? We'll hear from one outspoken critic, a very different perspective. Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer of New York. He's standing by live.

And later, more from Dubai. My conversation with a top minister, the minister of economy and planning, Shaikha Lubna al-Qasimi.

And later gauging the war on terror from Afghanistan to Iraq. We'll talk with Nato supreme allied commander, General James Jones.

Our special "Late Edition" from Dubai continues right after this.

BLITZER: Our web question of the week asks this: "How much of a threat would the sale of ports to Dubai really pose to U.S. security? A major threat, a minor threat, or not a threat at all?" Cast your vote, go to cnn.com/lateedition. We'll have the results at the end of this program.

Straight ahead: a critical view of this entire Dubai Ports World deal. New York Senator Chuck Schumer standing by live. You're watching a special "Late Edition" live from Dubai.

BLITZER: Welcome back to our special "Late Edition."

I'm live in Dubai in the United Arab Emirates. Many lawmakers, Democrats and Republicans, in the Senate and the House of Representatives, strongly concerned about this proposed deal that would allow Dubai Ports World to take control of operations at 6 major ports in the United States.

One of them, leading the opposition, is Democratic Senator Chuck Schumer of New York. He's joining us now live from New York. Senator Schumer, thanks for joining us on "Late Edition."

You just heard the CEO of Dubai Ports World make the case that this is one of the most reputable port operators in the world, a strong commitment to security. Did he reassure you that this deal should now go forward?

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER (D), NEW YORK: No, not at all. In fact, I was a little bit disturbed by some of the interview. Obviously, he's a businessman. He knows the economics of his business.

But when it came to security, he knew virtually little. He didn't know the percentage of containers that are inspected in Dubai. Even though that might be the Dubai government's responsibility, you'd think the CEO of the company would know it.

He had very little idea of what kind of security checks were done in Dubai for potential employees who would get visas and come to the United States or, for that matter, security checks of people who worked at Dubai Ports World facilities in Dubai itself.

And I think it shows you that this deal was an economic deal. It was structured economically. It was approved by the CFIUS committee here in the United States, more or less on an economic basis.

And security concerns, which ought to be paramount, seem to take a back seat. No, I was disturbed by the interview.

BLITZER: (OFF-MIKE) customs, U.S. law enforcement. The port operators, basically -- they take these containers, they put them on the ships, they take them off the ships, and that's their major responsibility.

SCHUMER: Well, wolf, that's a far cry from what we're told by experts, some of the experts that you quoted.

But I've talked, for instance, to the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which is the government entity that runs our ports.

They say the terminal operators have a lot of say in security. They're responsible for controlling the perimeters. They're responsible for the employees. They're responsible for the cargo manifests going to the Coast Guard.

So, for instance, if you were to -- if you were a terrorist and you were to infiltrate one of these organizations, you could do untold damage.

Furthermore, many of the containers are not completely locked and tamperproof by a GPS system, which is something that ought to occur.

It is just poppycock that the port terminal operator has nothing to do with security. I know some pundits have latched on to that. Talk to anyone who knows about ports. They have a lot to do with security.

Are they the only people in charge of security? Absolutely not. And United States local authorities and federal authorities have real say and haven't been doing enough, frankly, particularly at the federal level.

But the port terminal operator has a great deal to do with security. And anyone who says otherwise doesn't know the business, hasn't talked to on-the-ground people.

BLITZER: Dubai Ports World now says they're willing to go through this 45-day review process to make sure that, from the U.S. national security perspective, this deal is worthwhile.

The Bush administration has begun that process, or will begin it within the next few days.

Do you believe this is going to be a real national security review, or is it simply going through the motions? SCHUMER: Well, there's a real worry that this review will be a rubber stamp. After all, it's the same people who went through it before. They are being required, under the 45-day review, to talk to many more people.

I was just shocked to learn, in their preliminary 30-day review, they didn't talk to any port operator, like the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, when they went through that review.

Now they'll talk to them. So that's good.

But I have to tell you, wolf, there is a great deal of dubiousness about how thorough this review will be, how careful it will be, and, most of all, how independent it will be.

And that's why a group, bipartisan, ten senators, five Democrats, five Republicans, just sent a letter on Friday to both Senator Frist and Senator Reid saying, it's great to have the 45-day review, but we need a few other things: first, to make sure that the review is independent and thorough; second, to have the report, the full report, sent to the Congress so that we can review it, and then a redacted report, non-classified, to be made public; and, finally, to give the Congress the opportunity to disapprove the deal because the president, in sort of an Alice-like Wonderland way has said, well, he's for this.

It's sort of first the verdict, then the trial. We need an independent -- both review and affirmation or disapproval that this is going to keep us safe.

BLITZER: Are you suggesting, Senator Schumer, that you have not yet made up your mind, that you're willing to go into this 45-day period with an open mind and that, under certain circumstances, you would support Dubai Ports World taking over operational control of these six ports of the United States?

SCHUMER: I'm very dubious of Ports Dubai World taking this over given the country's nexus with terrorism.

I've been made more dubious today by the interview where, you know, Mr. Sharif, the head of Dubai Ports World, didn't know basic security criteria that his company should use, the fact that he said, for instance, that if the deal didn't go through, British investors would be disappointed.

Well, I would say, to him and to everybody else, keeping the United States secure is a far greater concern.

So I'm very dubious of this deal and I want to see the review, but the strong burden of proof is on those who want the deal to go forward, given the country Dubai's nexus with terrorism in the past, not on those of us who say the deal shouldn't.

BLITZER: These six ports were being operated not by a U.S. firm over these years but by a British firm, P&O, which is now being bought by Dubai Ports World. Earlier in the week, I spoke with the Coast Guard admiral who's in charge of port security and I had this exchange. Listen to what he said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER; Can you assure the American public that the threat level will not increase as a result of this Dubai firm taking over the British firm's operations?

REAR ADM. CRAIG BONE: Yes. I can tell you that the measures that we put into place will assure that.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Admiral Craig Bone.

You don't necessarily consider that to be the final word, his assurance to the American public?

SCHUMER: No, I don't, Wolf. And the reason is very simple, and that is that we don't know how thoroughly the Coast Guard explored this.

The initial report that the Coast Guard made in the CFIUS committee said, we have no way of knowing whether they're secure or not. And then it was overruled by the higher-ups. And no one knows why. No one knows who influenced that.

We've asked that. And I think that's one of the things I want to know, in terms of this 45-day review, why initial people who said, either don't do it or we don't have enough knowledge to approve or disapprove were overruled so quickly and so quietly.

If you go ahead and take a look at this deal down the road, Senator, are you among those who are suggesting now that only Americans should be operating ports in the United States?

Because you know, the American port operators basically went out of this business some 20, 30 years ago, and about 80 percent of all port operations right now are handled by foreign firms.

You know, we've sort of backed into this situation where ports are operated by foreign companies. And I suppose, before 9/11, it didn't make much of a difference.

One of the great problems is that this administration did no review after 9/11 to determine whether that should stay. After all, Wolf, we do not allow foreign companies or foreign countries to operate our airports, mainly for security reasons.

Why, then, do we allow them to operate our ports? I don't know if the answer -- if there's a definitive answer to that question yet, but it's certainly something that ought to be explored and asked.

So I think we need a whole review as to who should be operating our ports. And, having said that, the United States government, Washington, the administration, hasn't done enough on port security in general, no matter who operates our ports.

It's a disgrace that five percent of the containers are inspected, no more. It's a disgrace that we don't have nuclear detection devices at every port.

I've been talking about this since a few months after 9/11. And the only good thing that will come out of this sorry episode, however it comes out, is that there probably will be a lot more focus on the ports, as there should be, and secondly, there will be a whole change in the CFIUS process.

The CFIUS process, this secretive committee that approved this, was set up in the late 70s to, almost, provide, if you will, "security cover" to OK economic deals.

And, again, in the post-9/11 world, that doesn't work.

So we need to change the CFIUS process, to overhaul it, to make it more open, to make it more thorough, and to put a greater emphasis on national security. The CFIUS committee in the past has let economic or diplomatic considerations trump security considerations. That's not good enough post-9/11.

BLITZER: CFIUS stands for the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States. Senator Schumer, thanks very much for joining us. We'll continue this conversation down the road. Still ahead, we'll shift gears, talk a little bit about what's going on Iraq right now. The former foreign minister Adnan Pachachi, a key Sunni leader, joins us from Baghdad.

And later, we'll have more on the port controversy. I'm here in Dubai. I toured Dubai Ports World earlier today. Stay with "Late Edition." Our special report coming up.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're reporting live from Dubai today. A bustling economic center in the Middle East now in the middle of a controversy over a port deal back in the United States. Major developments also in Iraq this week, more than 500 Iraqis have died since an attack on a key Shiite mosque on February 22.

Just a short while ago, I spoke with a key Sunni leader in Baghdad, the former Iraqi foreign minister Adnan Pachachi.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Adnan Pachachi, thanks very much for joining us here on "Late Edition." Let me get right to the crunch of the matter. Is there a civil war already under way in Iraq?

ADNAN PACHACHI, IRAQI PARLIAMENT MEMBER: No, there is no civil war. There are a lot of tensions and differences, but no civil war. I don't think we'll ever have a civil war in the sense that you had a civil war in Northern Ireland or in Bosnia. I don't think this will happen in Iraq.

BLITZER: Why not? Because the tensions between the Sunnis and the Shia, they seem, at least the images that we're getting on a nearly daily basis, they seem so intense, they seem so ugly. Why don't you think your country could have a civil war?

PACHACHI: Wolf, the tensions are not between the Shia population and the Sunni population. It's really the militias, the armed militias, and certain fanatic groups that are really engaged in most of the acts of violence. But the idea that all the Shias will fight all the Sunnis in Iraq, no, this is not -- it's not a possibility at all.

And anyway, certain measures have already been taken. All the leaders from all sides have taken measures and they have undertaken, really, to defuse the crisis, and not to let this get out of hand.

I think this situation has greatly improved, but not sufficiently. But I think the idea of a civil war is getting further from possibility. But it's very important that we should form a national unity government very soon. I think that will help a great deal in diffusing the crisis, because a national unity government will include all the political groups represented in the parliament which has just been elected.

And I think this will hopefully improve the security situation.

But efforts are being made to do that, and certain measures have been taken to protect mosques and other places, and to prevent as much as possible the confrontation between the various armed groups.

BLITZER: It seems that many of the Sunni leaders and the Kurdish leaders have lost confidence in the man designated by the dominant Shia political party, Ibrahim Al-Jaafari, to be the prime minister. He has been the prime minister in the interim government. Do you have confidence in Ibrahim Al-Jaafari?

PACHACHI: No, our group, the National Iraqi List, has also sent a letter to the coalition, asking them to review or to reconsider the selection of Dr. Jaafari for the premiership.

And we indicated this is not a personal matter, but we feel that in order to have a government of national unity, the prime minister has to be acceptable to all the components of this government, and he should not be a controversial figure, which unfortunately Dr. Jaafari is.

And we believe that perhaps, somebody else, who will be able to unite people, should be considered for this premiership. BLITZER: We quote from Tareq Al-Hashimi, one of the Iraqi parliament members, who says: "What happened last Wednesday and afterward led us to the conclusion that we cannot tolerate Jaafari for the next four years."

Who would you like? What Shia political leader would you like to see emerge as the next prime minister of Iraq?

PACHACHI: Well, you know, Wolf, I am not going to mention names, obviously, but we have not received a reply yet from the coalition to our request that they should reconsider the selection of Dr. Jaafari.

But of course, awaiting their reply, we'll consult among ourselves the four lists -- the Kurdish Alliance, the Accord List, which you call the Sunni list, ourselves and the (inaudible), which is the Dialogue Council. I think awaiting the reply of the coalition, then we'll be able to decide what to do, and who to support.

BLITZER: But this could...

PACHACHI: We are still waiting...

BLITZER: ... this could take some time...

PACHACHI: ... because I think there are...

BLITZER: ... and clearly, there's no government in the interim. This clearly could take -- let me read to you what Lieutenant General Michael Maples, the director of the U.S. military's Defense Intelligence Agency told a Senate committee this past week. He said: "Sunni Arab elites have little cause to support the rebuilding of Iraq. Many Sunni Arab leaders view the current political solutions as predicated on perpetual minority status in a Shia-Kurd-dominated government." Do you accept that gloomy assessment as far as your fellow Sunnis are concerned?

PACHACHI: No, I -- this is an over simplification. I wouldn't agree with this simplified kind of opinion, really.

We are waiting now -- we hope that the parliament will be convened before the end of this week, and this by itself will be a sign that we are proceeding to implement the constitution and build a democratic system.

It's not a question of Shia and Sunni anymore, really, because, for example, our list has more Shias than Sunnis. And some of them are religious figures. This is also true of the coalition itself. There are of course mostly Shias, but also there are personalities in that -- in that list who have secular tendencies.

So it's not sort of a black-and-white situation where you have Shias and Sunnis on one side, and then Kurds on the other side, or something like that, no.

BLITZER: As far as U.S. troops in Iraq are concerned, there are about 130,000, 135,000 U.S. troops right now. Is that enough? Is it too much? What is your bottom line assessment of the U.S. military presence right now?

PACHACHI: Well, you know, it's interesting that when this situation flared up after the explosions in Samarra, the holy shrines, there were demands from all sides that the coalition -- or rather, the multi-national force -- should play a more active role in the maintenance of law and order, and I think this is the view of most political leaders, even those who have been demanding an early withdrawal of the multi-national force.

They believe that until the Iraqi forces are in a position to undertake the -- to defend the security of the country, there must be some role for the multi-national force. And this is the situation.

And of course, one of the first things that a new government has to do, really, is to disband or to disarm at least the militias, and to reorganize the armed forces in such a way that they will not have any divided loyalties, but they will be a professional force under the sole and only authority of the government, and with no loyalty except that to the state. I think when this happens, then of course the multi-national forces...

BLITZER: As you know, Mr. Pachachi, the Kurdish groups are very loyal to their Peshmerga militia; the Shiites have their own Mehdi militia, among others. Do you see any signs at all, realistically, that anytime in the near future, these militias are going to be disbanded?

PACHACHI: Well, you know, you cannot have a state in which military militias roam around, and then you are going to have a situation similar to that of Afghanistan, warlords in various parts of the country, fighting for authority and for territory.

We have to try to really form a national force, with loyalty only to the state of Iraq, and eventually and gradually, we hope to disarm the militias and to disband them. Because this is what the constitution says. The constitution is very clear that it prohibits armed militias outside the armed forces of the state.

BLITZER: Adnan Pachachi, we have to leave it right there. Thanks very much for joining us on "Late Edition." Good luck to you. Good luck to all the people of Iraq.

PACHACHI: Thank you. It's always a -- always a pleasure to talk to you. Thank you very much.

BLITZER: And coming up, much more on the port controversy. Dubai Ports World seeking to take over port operations at six major ports in the United States. Is this just business as usual for this booming economy here in Dubai, or is something else going on? My special interview with the top cabinet minister in the United Arab Emirates, the economic and planning minister, Shaikha Lubna al-Qasimi.

We'll take a quick break. More from Dubai right after this.

BLITZER: CNN reporters will be "On the Story" coming up after "Late Edition." That begins at 1 p.m. Eastern, 10 a.m. Pacific. And don't forget our web question of the week, How much of a threat would the sale of ports to Dubai be to U.S. security? Major threat, a minor threat, or not a threat. Cast your vote. Go to cnn.com/lateedition. We'll have the results later in our program.

Stay with us. We're live in Dubai. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: I'm Wolf Blitzer in Dubai. We're reporting on the ports controversy back in the United States. Coming up, I'll have a special interview with a top cabinet minister here in the United Arab Emirates. That's coming up. Let's get a quick check of your e-mail on this subject right now.

Mary from Dover writes this, Dover, Delaware: "Once again, the Bush administration proves its disregard for separation of powers by allowing the UAE deal without the proper oversight and without involving Congress."

Alan from Virginia Beach, Virginia, has a different perspective: "This sale to the UAE is for container 'terminals' and not ports. The COO of the company is an American. We already have many foreign companies that own U.S. terminals. The port ownership remains with the city or state. Security will remain with the Coast Guard and U.S. Customs."

We always welcome your comments. Our e-mail address, lateedition@cnn.com. And there's much more coming up from Dubai, more on this port deal, plus my exclusive interview with the president of Pakistan, General Pervez Musharraf, on this the day after his summit with the president of the United States.

My conversation with President Musharraf, that's coming up. And later, the hunt for Osama bin Laden. What will it take to capture the al Qaida leader? We'll speak with the supreme allied commander of NATO, General James Jones. "Late Edition" live from Dubai continues right at the top of the hour.

BLITZER: This is a special "Late Edition," live from Dubai, an exclusive on the ports controversy.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: If there was any doubt in my mind or people in my administration's mind that our ports would be less secure and the American people in danger, this deal wouldn't go forward.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: A controversial deal on U.S. ports puts the spotlight on Dubai. We took an exclusive tour inside the port, and we'll take a closer look at the controversy in a special interview with the United Arab Emirates' minister of economy, Sheikha Lubna al Qasimi.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition."

I'm Wolf Blitzer. We're reporting right now from Dubai. Earlier today, I spent time over at Dubai Ports World, had an exclusive tour of the port facility. My interview, coming up, with the economic minister of the United Arab Emirates, an exclusive.

That's coming up, as well as our exclusive with the president of Pakistan, President Musharraf on this day after his summit with President Bush.

First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now.

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. And we'll have much more on the ports controversy here in Dubai, what it means for U.S. ports as a result of a proposed takeover of port operations in six major ports in the United States. That's coming up.

But on this day after the president of the United States met with the president of Pakistan, I had an opportunity earlier today to speak exclusively with President Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: President Musharraf, thanks very much for joining us. Welcome back to "Late Edition." I know you've been incredibly busy these past few days, receiving the president of the United States.

Were you satisfied with the outcome of your talks with President Bush?

PRES. PERVEZ MUSHARRAF, PAKISTAN: Yes, indeed. I think I'm very satisfied. We developed very close understanding and there was a lot of substance in the interaction.

BLITZER: What about the double standard that seems to be taking place, one standard for India, another standard for Pakistan as far as nuclear weapons are concerned?

You must be somewhat disappointed. Listen to what the president said in Pakistan. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: We discussed the civilian nuclear program and I explained that Pakistan and India are different countries with different needs and different histories.

So as we proceed forward, our strategy will take in effect those well-known differences.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: What about that, Mr. President?

MUSHARRAF: I would tend to agree with him. When we are dealing with two countries, the interstate relations have different compunctions (ph); they have different nuances.

The relationship with India, who doesn't know which side it is directed, and the relationship with Pakistan has a totally different nuance.

So, therefore, one really, in interstate relations, countries have to look at each other's interests, the mutuality of interests.

Now, as far as the nuclear side is concerned, Pakistan really does not need much from United States at all.

What we need is nuclear energy. And we discussed that with him. And there was a very positive response from his side. So, our need, vis a vis, with the United States is totally different between -- as far as Indian needs with the United States is concerned.

And I'm a very strong believer that this tendency of being Indocentric in all relations doesn't have a rationale. And I wouldn't like to do that at all.

Pakistan has its interests and United States has its interests in Pakistan. We need to see that and we need to move forward on that track. And I think both of us move forward on the track, wherever there is mutual interest. And we don't have to bother what they are doing with India.

BLITZER: Mr. President, did the issue of A.Q. Khan, your nuclear scientist, whom the United States would like to question, did that come up during your talks with President Bush?

MUSHARRAF: No, it didn't come up during this talk. We already had spoken about it in the past, that we need to have some kind of an interrogation with him, which is mutually in a methodology which satisfied mutual concerns, and we are going forward on that, so there was no need of discussing it.

BLITZER: Let me read to you from an editorial that appeared in "The Washington Post" this past week.

It says this: "General Musharraf has been promising to restore democracy since his coup, yet throughout his years in power, he has sought to suppress Pakistan's secular democratic parties while striking deals with Muslim extremists."

The editorial goes on to say: "His refusal to restore democracy in his country has only made it more unstable."

I wonder if you'd want to respond to that editorial in "The Washington Post."

MUSHARRAF: Yes, I would like to respond very strongly against it. I think "Washington Post" doesn't know what he's -- what they are writing. I don't think they even know what our environment is.

When they are talking of restoring democracy, we have restored sustainable democracy in Pakistan.

What is democracy? I wonder whether "Washington Post" knows it. Democracy is really empowerment of people. We have empowered the people of Pakistan through the local government system, which was nonexistent in the past.

BLITZER: Mr. President, will there be free and fair democratic elections in Pakistan next year?

MUSHARRAF: Yes, surely. I think -- may I be allowed to go back to the question that you asked regarding -- this was regarding "Washington Post" about democracy in Pakistan?

BLITZER: Go ahead.

MUSHARRAF: And I was saying that we have introduced sustainable democracy in Pakistan. We have empowered democracy -- really mean the empowerment of people; we have empowered the people of Pakistan through a local democracy system, local government system, which was nonexistent in Pakistan.

It also means the empowerment of the women of Pakistan, and we have done that for the first time in the history of Pakistan. We have empowered the minorities of Pakistan, and we again, this is the first time that we've given them a joint electorate system, and they have been mainstreamed in the political milieu of Pakistan.

We have liberated the press and media. That is what is democracy, the freedom of speech and expression. Today, the electronic and press media in Pakistan are totally free, and there are dozens of private channels operating, whereas as there was only one in the past.

Then I myself have been elected, allowed to be a (INAUDIBLE) president in uniform through a two-thirds majority in the national assembly.

I hope "Washington Post" knows that that really is democracy. And I am here, holding this post through a very democratic and constitutional method.

I've been allowed, in the constitution of Pakistan, and I'm in the -- I hold two positions through a democratic process of being elected by two-thirds majority.

And ultimately, as far as my uniform issue is concerned, there will be elections in 2007, and I will abide by the constitution. "Washington Post" must know that this is democracy, unless they have some different kind of a version of democracy, which is their own, and I don't understand...

(CROSSTALK)

BLITZER: Mr. President, you will seek reelection, you will seek election next year, you will run. Is that right?

MUSHARRAF: Well, let next year come, and I'll look into that. With so much happening, let's see if the nation needs me. I'll serve the nation, certainly.

BLITZER: What about the hunt for Osama bin Laden? Only this weekend, we've heard from his deputy, Ayman Al-Zawahiri, once again. Are you any closer to having a better sense where these Al Qaida leaders are hiding out?

MUSHARRAF: Well, frankly, I wouldn't be able to say whether we are closer or farther. We don't know where they are.

We are launching our operations on all al Qaeda positions that we come to know, Al Qaeda or Taliban. And in the process, if we can get them, we'll get them.

But we don't exactly know where they are. I presume they're somewhere in the border area, on the Pakistan side or Afghan side. So I wouldn't be able to comment whether we've got any closer to them.

BLITZER: There was this story in the Associated Press the other day. Let me read a headline from it. "President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan has handed intelligence to Pakistan that indicates Mullah Mohammed Omar, the supreme leader of the Taliban regime ousted by U.S.-led forces and key associates, are hiding in Pakistan. Afghanistan also provided information about the locations of alleged terrorist training camps along the border and in Pakistani cities.

Is that correct? Is that accurate?

MUSHARRAF: That is -- they have given us a list, and I am really surprised and shocked why they have disclosed this to the media.

They have given a list. Now that they have done that, let me answer very frankly. We've already gone through it, this list. Two- thirds of it is months old, and it is outdated, and there is nothing. What there, the telephone numbers that they are talking of, two-thirds of them are dead numbers, and even the CIA knows about it because we are sharing all this information with them.

The location that they are talking of Mullah Omar is nonsense. There's nobody there. We've gone there exactly and seen that there are families living there and there's no sign of Mullah Omar. This also seems to be very, very old information.

And lastly, let me say, why were they waiting for a presidential visit to hand me over this list? What was stopping them from giving this list or sharing these numbers immediately on occurrence? Is that the way intelligence functions? I am totally disappointed with their intelligence, and I feel there is a very, very deliberate attempt to malign Pakistan by some agents, and President Karzai is totally oblivious of what is happening in his own country.

So therefore, I will say he should pull up his intelligence, he should pull up his ministry of defense, he should coordinate with our intelligence, and intelligence coordination means pass the numbers, pass the intelligence immediately, on occurrence. Don't wait for months for a presidential visit to hand over these things.

In any case, now that he has raised this accusation against Pakistan, let me tell you that I passed on a lot of information to him, his own information, what is the conspiracy going on against Pakistan in his ministry of defense and his intelligence setup. He better set that in order before accusing Pakistan on any issue.

BLITZER: It sounds as if, Mr. President, you have a serious problem right now with President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan. It certainly sounds like there's some tension in this relationship.

MUSHARRAF: Well, unfortunately, it is developing in the last one or two months. There was no tension. It was going on excellent, in an excellent way. Because he knows how he got elected, he knows how much we helped in the election process. If it was not for Pakistan, maybe he and his election would not have taken place smoothly. He knows that, because he's told me personally this.

Now, I know that there is a problem on the border area. There is a problem on the Pakistan side; there is a problem in Afghanistan also. Now, if anybody in the Afghan government throws the entire blame on Pakistan as if nothing is happening in Afghanistan, everyone is here, Mullah Omar is living in Quetta -- I keep going to Quetta so many times. Who is saying that he's living there? This is absolutely nonsense.

So whatever -- if at all he was there, he came in the past, then he should have said, told us exactly when he came so that we would have nabbed him. So this kind of nonsensical accusations are not acceptable.

Now, we know that how these are happening, and I have given this information entirely to him -- the intelligence, not information -- the intelligence, I pass -- when he gave me these numbers, I passed him intelligence on what is happening in his intelligence organization and in the ministry of defense.

He better set that right, because I feel now I am further confirmed that having passed this -- the intelligence that he want (ph), the information that he passed on to us, they leaked it out to the press. There was no need of doing that, because that certainly alerts whatever enemies we are operating against.

There is no need of releasing such sensitive information to the press. And he did that. His government people did that, and therefore the response, the harsh response that I am now giving against that.

BLITZER: President Musharraf, we have to leave it there, unfortunately. We're out of time, but thank you so much for joining us here on "Late Edition."

MUSHARRAF: Thank you very much.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And coming up, more on the very tense situation in Afghanistan and Pakistan. We'll speak with NATO's supreme allied commander, a four-star general, General James Jones. He's standing by in Washington for NATO's role in this entire operation.

And after that, more on the port controversy back in the United States. My special interview with the economic minister of the United Arab Emirates, Sheikha Lubna al Qasimi.

All that coming up. We're live in Dubai. Stay with us.

BLITZER: There's still time for you to weigh in on our Web Question of the Week: "How much of a threat would the sale of ports to Dubai be to U.S. security?" You can cast your vote, go to cnn.com/lateedition. We'll have the results later this hour.

Straight ahead, President Bush traveled to Afghanistan this week. Where does the military situation in that country stand right now? We'll get a assessment from NATO supreme allied commander, General James Jones. He's standing by.

We're standing by in Dubai. More on the port controversy coming up as well.

You're watching a special "Late Edition" live from Dubai.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I hope the people of Afghanistan understand democracy takes hold. You're inspiring others.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: President Bush earlier in the week make a surprise stop-over in Afghanistan on his way to India and Pakistan.

Welcome back to our special "Late Edition." We're live in Dubai.

More on the ports controversy coming up, but let's speak to NATO supreme allied commander, General James Jones. He's joining us now live from Washington.

General Jones, as usual, thanks very much for joining us. I assume you just heard that criticism leveled by President Musharraf of Pakistan against the president of Afghanistan, Hamid Karzai. He was not diplomatic; he was very blunt in suggesting that President Karzai is not appreciative active of what Pakistan has been doing for Afghanistan.

I wonder if you'd want to comment since NATO plays such a key role right now in trying to bring some sort of stability to Afghanistan.

GEN. JAMES JONES, NATO SUPREME ALLIED COMMANDER: Well, I wouldn't want to comment on the relationship between two heads of state, but it is certainly a part of the region of the country where we have to find the accommodation of working together. And that has been something I know that General Abizaid and General Eikenberry from the coalition force, the U.S.-led coalition force have been working on, and it's something that NATO will take an increasing interest in as we expand the mission later on this year.

BLITZER: There was an editorial in January in The Washington Post that said this, referring to NATO. Let me read it to you. It said, "NATO has been irrelevant in Iraq and has moved with imperfect unity and uncertain commitment into Afghanistan." Has the situation as far as NATO and Afghanistan improved since that editorial was written on January 9?

JONES: Well, I wouldn't agree with either part of that editorial. Where Afghanistan is concerned, I think NATO has, in fact, since 2003, moved with surprising agility, given the fact that there are 26 nations that have to agree on everything we do. And it's getting poised to take over the majority of the mission this calendar year in Afghanistan. And that's a real progress.

BLITZER: Afghanistan has been a very, very important part of the U.S. war on terrorism since 9/11. And shortly thereafter, the U.S. went in with its coalition partners and overthrew the Taliban regime there, went after al Qaida.

Take a look at the number of troops, though, killed in Afghanistan: 2003, 57 coalition troops were killed, 2004, 58, but last year, 129 were killed. That doesn't necessarily show the numbers moving in the right direction from the U.S. and coalition perspective. Is the situation in Afghanistan getting more dangerous now for U.S. forces?

JONES: Well, I think you can explain these numbers a couple of ways. One would be to say that as the Afghan national army develops more capacity, it's able to go into more places than ever before. And that's -- the same holds true for the coalition force as well. So, there are fewer hiding places for those who wish us ill in Afghanistan.

And I think, obviously, if you're going to go to more places, and the hiding places are being taken away, then you're going to have a little more of an uptick in violence. I think that the uptick in violence is fairly disparate. I think it's apportioned over the criminal element, the remnants of al Qaida and the Taliban and the narcotic industry, which is very much a part of the economy, unfortunately, of Afghanistan, but it's still fairly disparate.

But I do think we're going to see an uptick in violence in the spring, which is normal. But I don't think that means we have a resurgence or an insurgency that's returning.

BLITZER: There's been some suggestion that the insurgents in the Afghanistan are learning from the insurgents in Iraq in trying to follow that course. Listen to what Lieutenant General Michael Maples, the director of the DIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, offered in his assessment earlier in the week. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

LT. GEN. MICHAEL MAPLES, DIRECTOR, DIA: The Taliban-dominated insurgency remains capable and resilient. In 2005, Taliban and other anti-coalition movement groups increased attacks by 20 percent. Insurgents also increased suicide attacks and more than doubled improvised explosive device attacks. We judge that the insurgency appears emboldened by perceived tactical successes and will be active this spring.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Is it a situation where the insurgents in Afghanistan are copying what the insurgents in Iraq are doing?

JONES: Well, Wolf, I think certainly there's going to be a certain amount of copycat techniques. I would only add to that statement that the percentage increase has to be judged against a baseline that's pretty low. In other words, if you've only had 20 or 25 attacks, and it goes up 20 percent, that's not statistically very revealing.

And that's really what we're -- that's the baseline we're working against in Afghanistan. There clearly are going to be instances of duplication and imitation. They're going to try everything that they can, because the tide and the times are moving out.

And the Afghan national army is now approaching 30,000 strong. They're a capable army. They're admired by the people. They're out there mixing it up and doing the things that they need to do. The coalition is getting stronger. NATO is going to add about 11,000 troops by the time we're finished building up.

The United States is going to get -- and its coalition friends are going to get a strong, helping hand. I think this is a turning moment for the -- for what's left of the insurgency and also for the criminal element, the narcotic traffickers and all the others who are working on their own, in their own way to destabilize the growth of the Karzai government.

BLITZER: One of the most frustrating parts of this whole operation in Afghanistan is the failure to find Osama bin Laden, his number two, Ayman al Zawahiri, who just released another audio, videotape this weekend. Listen to what the president said when he stopped off in Afghanistan earlier in the week as far as Osama bin Laden is concerned. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: I am confident he will be brought to justice. What's happening is that we got U.S. forces on the hunt for not only bin Laden, but anybody who plots and plans with bin Laden. There are Afghan forces on the hunt for not only bin Laden, but those who plot and plan with him. We've got Pakistan forces on the hunt.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Without revealing any sensitive or classified information, is there any information that you have that suggests that the president's use of the word confident, that he's confident that Osama bin Laden will be found, is there any new information that's come forward recently to justify that confidence?

JONES: If there is, I'm not sure that I'm aware of it. My NATO mission is obviously to expand our presence in Afghanistan. And it's not in, shall I say, the offensive counter-terrorism mission to participate actively in that hunt.

But I do agree that -- with the president in that ultimately if he's still alive, there's reason to believe that we'll eventually be successful, particularly if we get good working relationships across both sides of the border, which would be, in my view, very important.

BLITZER: Is there a NATO role in dealing with this enormous problem with the poppies, the opium, the drugs that have become so critical to the economic well-being of Afghanistan and causing so much damage outside of Afghanistan?

JONES: Wolf, we all have to be very, very cognizant of the fact that this may be the most important problem the Karzai government faces in terms of restoring the economy and moving it in a positive direction. NATO does not have an active role in the sense that you won't see NATO troops out participating in eradication projects and the like.

But NATO will adopt a more passive role, that is to say, information watching, overwatch, security, and needs to be aware of what's going on in the counter-narcotics campaign. My judgment is that this is really, perhaps, job one starting this year in Afghanistan in order to help the Karzai government and the people of Afghanistan achieve the progress that they both want to achieve in the reconstruction of that country.

BLITZER: General Jones, we're almost out of time. But I wonder if you'd want to comment -- you're a four-star general -- on this U.S. Army investigation that has opened up. At least we learned word of it this weekend thanks to our Pentagon correspondent, Barbara Starr, that Pat Tillman, who left a million-dollar contract, multi-million dollar contract as a professional football player to serve his country and go join the U.S. Army as a ranger and fight in Afghanistan, that there's now an investigation for negligent homicide regarding his friendly- fire death in 2004 in Afghanistan. I wonder if you'd want to offer some perspective on this investigation.

JONES: Well, Wolf, I have no personal knowledge of the circumstances because I work in another part of the world. But simply as a man in uniform, I would say that the most important thing that has to happen in any investigation is that the truth has to come out, and it has to come out emphatically. And I'm quite sure that my colleagues who are working on this are dedicated to finding truth and getting to the bottom of whatever remains to be found out.

BLITZER: General Jones, thanks so much for joining us. Good luck to you. Good luck to all the men and women under your command.

BLITZER: We appreciate your joining us here on "Late Edition."

JONES: Thanks, Wolf.

BLITZER: And a reminder that, coming up right after "Late Edition," CNN presents "On the Story," including senior Pentagon correspondent Jamie McIntyre, who is just back from Afghanistan with the story of General Jones's operation there. More on that coming up.

We're here in Dubai. And we're going to have the latest on the ports controversy, including a special interview with the United Arab Emirates economics minister right after this.

BLITZER: Dubai, here in the United Arab Emirates, considered a model in this part of the world for economic progress. In fact, you drive around Dubai and see the construction that's going on, it is simply amazing. Much more on that coming up tomorrow in "The Situation Room" on CNN.

But joining us now to talk about the economic impact of this country and the ports controversy back in the United States is the economics minister here in the United Arab Emirates, Sheikha Lubna al- Qasimi.

She's also the country's first female cabinet minister.

Sheikha, thank you very much for joining us on "Late Edition."

Let's talk about the port controversy first. You know very well -- you studied in the United States, you go there quite often -- the opposition that has developed over these past few weeks to this Dubai Ports World, a company you used to work for, taking over port operations in six major ports in the United States.

Do you understand the extent of the opposition back in the U.S.?

SHEIKHA LUBNA AL-QASIMI, UAE'S ECONOMICS MINISTER: Yes. I think, in my opinion, this is all about a business deal. This is about global trade. And, when you look at the Dubai Ports World operation within the U.S. as part of a global deal, basically, that has six operating ports in the U.S., there's a perception in the states that it's not correct. When you deal with ports handling of containers, that's ports management. It is not owning the ports. So, it's not about taking over.

BLITZER: But it is taking over -- excuse me for interrupting -- it is taking over the terminals in the United States for this British company, P&O, which had been operating them?

AL-QASIMI: Yes. But what you're doing is you're handling containers. You're not taking over the acquisition of the port itself. And the security impact of this is really more related to security jurisdiction, which is not really the core competence or the work of a port operation.

BLITZER: Well, we did hear Senator Schumer, one of the vocal critics on this program, within the last hour, say that either company, whether it's P&O, the British company that has been operating these ports or Dubai Ports World, which will if this deal goes through, they still will play a significant role in making sure that these ports are secure.

AL-QASIMI: Well, the security of a port operation is basically leaving it in the hands of the right people.

When you have segregation of responsibilities, i.e., basically, security organization that deals with it, there is no impact, because you're talking about a port operation in terms of handling the boxes as they come in.

But most boxes go through certain routines with a procedure there. So, to me, it reflects a lack of understanding about how a port operates.

BLITZER: The American public was asked about this proposed deal. Sixty-six percent opposed it in our CNN-USA Today Gallup poll. Only 17 percent in favor of it.

What do you know that you would like to share with the American public right now to try to reassure them that if this company that's based here in the United Arab Emirates, is owned by the government of Dubai, what would you like them to know that would, perhaps, reassure them if this deal goes through? Because the opposition is Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives. It cuts across partisan lines.

AL-QASIMI: Well, first of all, let's understand this whole issue about Dubai Ports World is really a business deal. In a business deal you reflect foreign investment money that's coming to be invested in the states in various aspects, one of them is the port operation.

Now when you talk about certain developments of investment in the states, always remember that there is an impact on employment to people. The port is not replacing people. The people are actually maintaining the contracts that they had.

But in any foreign investment, for example, when -- for example, if you purchase or you buy American equipment, $1 billion worth of equipment, you're actually generating 10,000 jobs in the U.S. So when you start differentiating a particular business deal and look at it in a political environment and saying this is a deal and this is not, you're implicating environments that has to do with business. And therefore, benefits to the society in totality.

The port itself -- and I want to assure this -- this is not the first ports that they are actually managing. They manage over 20 ports worldwide in all different countries. And it's a world class operation. They are the top -- they are one of the top six so far.

BLITZER: Here is the criticism of the government, and you represent the government of the United Arab Emirates. As you well know, before 9/11, this government, United Arab Emirates, had relations, one of three countries, with the Taliban in Afghanistan, two of the 19 hijackers were from the United Arab Emirates. There were shipments of nuclear material that went through this port to Libya and Iran, and the financial operation that resulted in 9/11, at least a lot of it, went through the UAE, went through Dubai as well. You've heard these criticisms...

AL-QASIMI: Yes, I've heard. Yes, yeah.

BLITZER: ... What's the response?

AL-QASIMI: OK, let's look first in terms of the relationship with the Taliban. Remember the time, at that time, this was under the environment when the U.S. was actually fighting with the Russians and the acceptance of several countries being in a close relationship with the Taliban at the time was actually in an environment where the states was aware of it. As the country was notified about it, I think the relationship immediately discontinued.

If you look at the...

BLITZER: Well, they did have relations until almost the bitter end. Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates were two of the three countries that did have relations.

AL-QASIMI: No, but you see, we were actually -- we don't even share the same theology. This is a country that actually has participation of women. I'm a woman minister. If you were part of the Taliban or we actually their ideology, I would not be sitting here as a minister.

But let's look at the -- if we look at in terms of the -- when you're talking about the hijacking, you're talking about two. Now look at all the different terrorists that actually had played a role in all of this global organization worldwide. They actually are multi-national. They are not all the UAE. And you can't actually accuse a country because of two. Two do not make a nation.

So, to me, the terrorism and -- is really borderless, and it has no geography as part of it.

However, I think I need to make sure to emphasize that the UAE has been a global player in terms of war against terror in collaboration with the U.S., in all different aspects, from intelligence reporting -- even some of the people from Al Qaida, in terms of securing dialogue on an international level, not only with the U.S. but worldwide.

So that in itself reflects actually the initiative that's being taken by the Emirates. When we talk about the shipments of...

BLITZER: Nuclear...

AL-QASIMI: That actually -- when you look at any port operation, you have to distinguish between products coming in and being re- exported and from products sitting in transshipment mode. Transshipment means that you don't inspect the box.

However, I think the states have taken initiative in acting about this by creating the container security acts, and UAE was the first one to actually deal with this.

On the money laundering again, money laundering was a global problem that took place I think in 96 countries. So UAE is not one, but we've taken certain measures, and these are actually part of the...

BLITZER: Have you tightened up since 9/11...

AL-QASIMI: Absolutely.

BLITZER: ... because The 9/11 Commission was pretty critical of the United Arab Emirates.

AL-QASIMI: Well, if you look at what had taken place then, we worked very closely with the treasury in the States. There has been clearance, absolutely, from the IMF and World Bank in relation to clearing the UAE as being a site for money laundering. Definitely there has been a lot of tightening in terms of process of hawala (ph) and others and being on a network where there is dialogue worldwide to actually to combat in a money laundering.

BLITZER: The other argument that many members of Congress have made, and you've heard this, is that this is a country, the United Arab Emirates and you're the economics minister, that supports an economic boycott against Israel.

AL-QASIMI: Well, first of all, let's differentiate this. We actually had diminished the secondary and treasury boycotts to Israel. So this actually does not exist. That means these are the product that are actually part of American companies coming in here.

On the boycott at the primary level, in the framework of the FTA at the moment, basically part of the process is actually lifting the ban...

BLITZER: If you had a free trade agreement with the United States, what would you do? Would you eliminate that boycott of Israel? AL-QASIMI: Absolutely, yes. And we actually have our fifth round coming up next week. The whole team USCR team will be coming here on the 13th of March.

BLITZER: So why not just eliminate it right now? In practical terms, at least what we heard earlier today from Dubai Ports World's Mohammed Sharaf, that he trades with Israel, he lets Zim come into the ports here. Why not just say that you're going to cancel this boycott?

AL-QASIMI: It's a process that we have to go through, and we have to actually reflect in terms of which of these parts are coming in.

The issue right now is really more about perception about port handling. So when you talk about the perception in the states, it's all about handling boxes coming from Israel. Well, this is a world trade organization, and therefore, the handling of boxes takes place irrelevant where it's coming from.

BLITZER: Are you confident this deal is going to go through based on what you know, or do you think it will be stopped?

AL-QASIMI: I am very confident it will go through because in my belief this is purely a business deal. It has nothing to do with any other aspects of it.

But the concern I have in my mind in case something like this doesn't go, it will reflect on foreign investment worldwide because part of this is you have a business deal that got politicized, and what you do is you've increased entry barriers into the U.S. in terms foreign investments. The U.S. demands about $1 trillion per year in terms of foreign investments coming in.

The minute you put new legislation in, the minute you create other aspects that snaps core business...

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, but what you're suggesting is that if the deal were canceled, it would have economic ramifications for the U.S. and political ramifications in the Arab world or this part world?

AL-QASIMI: Well, and all -- because it's not about the Arab world. It's about competition for foreign investments, and at the moment you've got China, India, you've got Europe. And the environment there actually is pro for an investment. So you are competing worldwide, actually driving foreign money coming in for investment.

BLITZER: Sheikha, thank you very much for joining us. And you've got a beautiful country here in Dubai, and we're going to be spending a lot of time in the next few days looking around and getting a first-hand assessment. And we're going to be putting you into the "Situation Room" on CNN.

AL-QASIMI: Thank you. And I do hope that we have more Americans coming in to see what this place is all about. It's a beautiful country.

BLITZER: Appreciate it very much.

AL-QASIMI: Thank you.

BLITZER: We'll take a quick break. When we come back, we'll check our CNN poll. We'll get results of that. More of "Late Edition" from Dubai right after this.

BLITZER: And now, in case you missed it, some of the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows back in the United States.

On Fox News Sunday, the chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff General Peter Pace talked about the U.S. Army's decision to launch a criminal investigation into whether former NFL player Pat Tillman's friendly fire death, as it's called in Afghanistan, was the result of negligent homicide.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEN. PETER PACE, CHMN., JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF: I think it's important to chase every single possibility. And the inspector generals have decided that there's one more step to take.

And they're going to do that to make sure that the entire picture is painted clearly and accurately so the family can have as much information as possible.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On CBS's "Face the Nation," Republican Senator Richard Lugar and Democratic Congressman John Murtha talked about Iraq and the potential impact on the mid-term elections.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. RICHARD LUGAR (R), INDIANA: I would say that, very clearly, everybody reads polls. They have not been going well for Republicans for the administration, for the Congress.

But I think, likewise, most people who are in that sort of a game would say, in the event that Iraq does actually form a democracy, in the event our economy strengthens, for example, in the event several things happen...

REP. JOHN MURTHA (D), PENNSYLVANIA: When you have the public against it, when you have the troops against what we're doing, when you have the people in Iraq against it, when you have the periphery against what we're doing, you have to understand that it's going to have a dramatic impact on the outcome of the election.

I think, right now, I would predict there is going to be a big turnover in Congress because people are so dissatisfied with a lot of things. (END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: On ABC's "This Week," former Democratic presidential candidate, retired U.S. Army General Wesley Clark sidestepped questions about whether he will run for the presidency again in 2008.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WESLEY CLARK, FORMER DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: What I'm trying to do is help the right Democrats get elected in 2006. That's the most important thing.

And I'm very proud we've got something like 55 U.S. military veterans who are running for Congress as Democrats. I want to help each and every one of them. I think they can make a huge difference in the future of this country.

I think having one-party domination of government is very dangerous for American democracy. And, frankly, that's where all of my energies and activities are focused.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows here on "Late Edition, the last word in Sunday talk. We'll be right back.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

(voice-over): Hillary Rodham Clinton: What's her story? The junior senator from New York is among those leading the effort to block a deal that would allow a Dubai company to operate several U.S. port terminals.

Clinton is planning to introduce legislation that would ban companies owned by foreign governments from controlling American port operations.

The former first lady is also in the middle of a reelection campaign for the Senate. While she hasn't publicly stated any political ambitions beyond 2006, Clinton is widely expected to seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Here are the results of the Web question of the week. Take a look at these numbers. Remember, though, this is not -- repeat, not -- a scientific poll.

I'll be back here tomorrow in "The Situation Room." We're live in Dubai. I'm Wolf Blitzer. See you next week on "Late Edition" as well. Thanks very much for joining us.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter May Recall Gonzales For More NSA Surveillance Testimony. The AP (3/7, Shrader) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' written answers to questions about the Bush administration's eavesdropping program may require him to testify a second time before the Senate Judiciary Committee, the panel's Republican chairman said Monday. … 'There is a suggestion in his letter there are other classified intelligence programs that are currently under way,' Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., told reporters." The AP continues, "The comments from the moderate Republican come as the Bush administration is trying to quell criticism of its surveillance operations and work with the Senate on legislation that would write the program into law." The AP adds, "In a letter to Specter last week, Gonzales clarified his testimony in a half dozen areas covered in a daylong Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Feb. 6. … Gonzales said his answers were focused only on President Bush's program granting intelligence officers the power to monitor - without court approval - the international calls and e-mails of U.S. residents, when those officers suspect terrorism may be involved. … 'In all of my testimony at the hearing I addressed - with limited exceptions - only the legal underpinnings of the Terrorist Surveillance Program,' Gonzales wrote. 'I did not and could not address operational aspects of the program or any other classified intelligence activities.' … The Justice Department has not received a formal request to testify, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. 'As a matter of practice, officials from the department do not discuss, confirm or deny the existence or nonexistence of any classified intelligence programs in public settings,' he added."

GOP Seeks To Limit Scope Of Probe Into NSA Surveillance Program. Key congressional Republicans are seeking to head off oversight investigation into President Bush's use of the National Security Agency to conduct domestic intelligence gathering, and at the same time establish a statutory foundation for the program. Knight Ridder (3/7, Kuhnhenn) reports the congressional Republicans are "trying to limit the scope of any investigation into" the NSA program, and "some key lawmakers are also working to legalize such spying on U.S. citizens in the future, perhaps with some judicial restrictions." The "dual-track effort is designed to protect the Bush administration from an all-out congressional inquiry into the secret program, while rejecting Bush's argument that he already has full legal authority to order such surveillance."

Penalty Phase Of Moussaoui Trial Begins. The penalty phase of admitted al Qaeda co-conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui got underway Monday with opening arguments from the prosecution and defense. Assistant US Attorney Robert Spencer urged the jurors to sentence Moussaoui to death, saying he concealed information about the 9/11 plot thereby enabling the attacks to succeed. However, Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyer, Edward J. MacMahon, said there was no evidence to support the prosecution's contention that Moussaoui's cooperation could have prevented the attacks.

The story was covered by each of the networks in full segments, and CBS ran a second story on the 9/11 family members who are following the trial. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 4, 2:35, Thomas) reported that legal scholars "say the defense faces an uphill battle." Prof. Jonathan Turley, George Washington University Law School: "For Zacarias Moussaoui, this is the wrong crime, in the wrong place with the wrong jury. He's going to be tried in the shadow of the Pentagon by a jury in one of the most conservative districts in the country." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 3, 2:40, Stewart) noted that this "was the first time the government has argued that Moussaoui's silence was as much to blame for what happened that day as any of the dead 19 hijackers."

NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 3, 2:10, P. Williams) reported, "Moussaoui's lawyers said he knew none of the details of the 9/11 plan, not even the hijackers' names. They say he was shunned by al Qaeda members overseas, described by one as 'cuckoo in the head.'" MacMahon "said the death penalty would give Moussaoui martyrdom."

The New York Times (3/7, Lewis, 1.19M) reports Spencer said, "He killed the 9/11 victims as surely as if he had been at the controls in one of those airplanes." But MacMahon cited the 9/11 commission's conclusion that "the government had several indications of Al Qaeda's plans before that day" and contended that "there is no reason to believe that the authorities would have acted quickly on" information from Moussaoui "any more than they acted on other leads."

The Washington Post (3/7, A3, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) adds, "Prosecutors did not address the controversy over the failure to search Moussaoui's belongings before Sept. 11," saying only that "if Moussaoui had revealed all he knew…the belongings would have been searched in time." But MacMahon told jurors that "the real Moussaoui…was a bumbler who couldn't even fly a single-engine plane, a man so inconsequential that even his terrorist overseers dismissed him."

The AP (3/7, Sniffen) notes MacMahon "played videotapes of then-Attorney General John Ashcroft describing how the FBI and CIA didn't share information before the attacks, and of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying any way to prevent Sept. 11 would have had to have been in place years earlier."

USA Today (3/7, 6A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "In pleading guilty, Moussaoui acknowledged he was aware of a planned attack against the United States but said he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot. He told authorities he was part of a separate plan to fly a plane into the White House sometime after Sept. 11."

Victims' Relatives Watch Trial Over Closed-Circuit Television. The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 4, 2:20, Schieffer) reported, "The trial is not open to broadcast media cameras but is being televised by closed circuit to five Federal courthouses around the country where the families of the 9/11 victims are being allowed to watch. But while some family members wanted to watch, others did not." The AP (3/7, Caruso) notes that in New York, some brought "photographs or buttons with images of their loved ones," and many "held scarves or other items emblazoned with the American flag."

Victim's Daughter Opposes Imposition Of Death Penalty. In a USA Today (3/7, 2.31M) op-ed, Families of September 11 co-founder Carie Lemack – whose mother was killed in the attacks – writes that she wants to see Moussaoui imprisoned for life. "I do not want to give him the dignity of a planned execution, time to say his goodbyes, eat his last meal. His comrades did not give that to my mother. Let him sit in a cold, dirty cell alone for the rest of his long days, unable to direct his rants at anyone."

AP Seeks FOIA Access To Lindh's Petitions For Sentence Reduction. The AP (3/7, Sherman) reports, "The Associated Press sued the Justice Department on Monday for access to American-born Taliban soldier John Walker Lindh's petitions to have his 20-year federal prison sentence shortened." The AP continues, "The federal Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in New York, said the government has improperly refused to turn over Lindh's pleas to have his sentence reduced on the grounds that doing so would be an unwarranted invasion of his privacy. … AP's lawyers, in letters to the Justice Department and the lawsuit, however, said Lindh 'is a 'high-profile public figure' whose 'privacy interest in his petition is low to nonexistent.'" The AP adds, "Lindh's lawyer, James Brosnahan, also has told the news cooperative that he would have turned over the documents himself, but he can't under the terms of Lindh's imprisonment."

New York Imam Works To Bring Together Muslim Singles. In the third story of its special report "An Imam in America," The New York Times (3/7, A1, Elliot, 1.19M) again reports on Brooklyn imam Sheik Reda Shata, focusing today on his work counseling American Muslim singles about dating and marriage. The Times notes, "Whether issuing American-inspired fatwas or counseling the homesick, fielding questions from the F.B.I. or mediating neighborhood spats, Mr. Shata walks an endless labyrinth of problems. If anything seems conquerable, it is the solitude of Muslim singles. … It is his way of fashioning a future for his faith. It is his most heartfelt effort…to make Islam work in America."

PATRIOT ACT:

House Expected To Pass Patriot Act Renewal Today. The Washington Post (3/7, A15, Weisman, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "For a legislative fight that has stretched on for months, pitting the House against the Senate and the White House against members of the president's party, the battle to renew the USA Patriot Act will likely end very quietly this week." The House votes today, and "Republican leaders are so confident in its passage that they have scheduled the vote on the fast-track 'suspension calendar,' where approval takes the vote of two-thirds of the House."

Patriot Act Provision Would Crack Down On Meth Production. The AP (3/6, Kellman) reports, "Suffer from springtime allergies? You could be among the first affected by the USA Patriot Act poised for final congressional passage this week." The AP continues, "Besides terrorism, the bill takes aim at the production of methamphetamine, a highly addictive drug that cannot be manufactured without a key ingredient of everyday cold and allergy medicines. The bill would impose new limits next month for how much relief a person can buy over the counter. … And beginning Sept. 30, it'll take a flash of ID to buy that medication." The AP adds, "The legislation sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. and Jim Talent, R-Mo., would blanket the nation with one policy that would put medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter and out of the reach of meth cooks. … Rather than wait for localities to stitch together a patchwork of anti meth policies, the provision of the Patriot Act would leave meth producers nowhere to run but out of the country. It takes aim at the meth trade's weakest point — the supply of pseudoephedrine. … Beginning 30 days after President Bush signs the law, expected sometime this week, purchase limits go into effect. One person would be limited to buying 300, 30-mg pills in a month or 120 such pills in a day. The measure would make an exception for 'single-use' sales — individually packaged pseudoephedrine products."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says Dubai World Ports Deal Would Enhance Port Security. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Block, 2.11M) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the "proposed takeover of terminal operations at five U.S. ports by a Dubai company would give U.S. law enforcement a better handle on security at U.S. terminal operations." But Chertoff "warned" that the "unprecedented access that the Department of Homeland Security and other federal agencies would have to monitor the United Arab Emirates shipping company's personnel and business records would 'evaporate' if Congress stopped the deal from proceeding." Chertoff's "statements to a group of Wall Street Journal reporters marked the first time that he has said that Homeland Security had something to lose if the deal fell through."

70% Oppose Dubai Ports Deal. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 3, 1:45, Vargas) reported, "The President's aggressive defense of the ports deal has not only proved ineffective, but it's kind of backfiring against foreign management of any kind involved in the ports." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "You now have about 70% of the country against this Dubai ports deal. But 70% of them are against any foreign management of the ports. This whole story has taught people something they didn't know, that foreigners manage many of our ports. And they don't like it one bit."

Collins Plans Vote On Port Security Bill For April. The Washington Times (3/7, Fagan, 90K) reports Senate Homeland Security Chairman Susan Collins "said her committee will vote next month on legislation to improve America's port security and thinks the concern over a Dubai company running some U.S. port operations may give the bill new momentum." Collins plans to move the "ports security bill she wrote last year with Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat. The two are also working with House Homeland Security Chairman Peter T. King, New York Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat, on a similar House bill." The measure would "authorize $835 million each year for five years to improve current port security programs. It would create an office of cargo security policy, and set new requirements for examination of all inbound cargo."

Reuters (3/7, Cowan) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman, ranking Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said the Bush Administration's "plan for securing America's ports is inadequate and funding should be nearly double the White House's budget request for next year." Lieberman "called for spending more than $1 billion on port security in fiscal 2007. In remarks to reporters, Lieberman noted that the Bush administration budget only calls for $551 million for port security in the fiscal year starting on October 1."

Hunter Seeking Co-Sponsors For Bill To Block Deal. The Hill (3/7, Tiron) reports House Armed Services Committee Chairman Rep. Duncan Hunter, "who has promised to try to sink the Dubai Ports World deal, started circulating a 'Dear Colleague' letter yesterday to attract co-sponsors for legislation he plans to introduce today." The letter co-signed by Rep. Jim Saxton outlines "several provisions of the legislation, which would halt the Dubai takeover of management at some U.S. port terminals. It would also require any corporation that owns, manages or operates 'national defense critical infrastructure to be majority-owned by American citizens.'"

King Offers Compromise. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, Henry) reported, "Republican Peter King, the powerful chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee tells CNN that the mood among Republicans up here is increasingly sour about this port deal, so he has crafted a compromise that he presented to the White House with a warning: If they do not sign on, this whole port contract may blow up. He's basically proposing that the American portion of the contract be separated out so that the company, D.P. World, would have nothing to do with the actual operation of U.S. ports. Instead, that would be subcontracted out to various U.S. companies."

CQ (3/6, Speck) reports that in "discussions with the White House," Rep. King and Sen. Susan Collins "separately floated possible changes to the controversial DP World deal that would place a degree of separation between the company and port operations." Collins said, "What I have suggested to the White House is that [the company] create an American subsidiary." That would "give the U.S. government more authority over the company, and in that scenario, Collins said, American citizens would head up security operations."

Reid Says Port Deal Will Be Major Campaign Issue. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, Henry) reported, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid today on Capitol Hill signaled that this is going to be a major campaign issue and he expects other candidates to jump on the bandwagon." Reid: "It's resonating because people have come to the realization that the Bush administration is basically incompetent. And I mention some of those things in my presentation to you a few minutes ago. This port security issue is stunning."

British Court Dismisses Objection To DPW Purchase Of P&O. The AP (3/7, Wardell) reports the "controversial takeover of British shipping company P&O by Dubai's state-owned DP World received the green light Monday when Britain's Court of Appeal dismissed a Miami firm's objection to the deal." The Court of Appeal "declined to hear an appeal from Miami-based Eller & Co., which had tried to have the deal barred on technical grounds, arguing that U.S. concerns about a United Arab Emirates company owning significant operations at six major U.S. seaports could harm its business."

The Washington Post/AP (3/7, D2, Wardell) reports Eller & Co. "said that it will continue to pursue legal action in the U.S. courts in Florida. 'We will continue to fight to protect our business and the livelihood of thousands of our staff and subcontractors,' it said."

Port Deal Just One Instance Of Arab Investment In US. The Washington Post (3/7, A1, Blustein, 744K) reports in a front page story that the Dubai Ports World deal is only one of many instances of direct investment in the US by Arab concerns. Spearheading the "trend is Dubai's Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktum (popularly known as "Sheik Mo"), ruler of the freewheeling city-state, which is part of the United Arab Emirates. The ports deal is just one of a series of recent purchases by companies he controls." Behind "such transactions are two powerful forces. One, of course, is the high price of energy, which has left several oil-producing Arab countries swimming in cash. The other is the burgeoning U.S. trade deficit -- $726 billion last year -- which means that the United States needs foreign capital; a country that imports more than it exports must cover the gap with money from abroad."

Report Says DHS Still Funding Low-Priority Port Security Projects. The AP (3/7, Sidoti) reports an inspector general report says "the Homeland Security Department still spends money on U.S. port projects that aren't considered national security priorities even though it has made some corrections." Homeland Security Inspector General Richard L. Skinner's office "studied the fifth and most recent round of port security grants, which awarded $142 million for 132 projects. Of those, the 20 projects Skinner's report said scored low on the agency's threat scale received about 20 percent of the money awarded, or $29.3 million."

Chertoff Plans Trip To China. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, 2.11M) reported in its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff plans a trip to China later this month to convince Beijing to take back illegal immigrants picked up by U.S. immigration authorities. Chertoff has been pushing a catch-and-return policy on illegal immigrants from China and elsewhere since taking office last year."

Guards Say Security Lacking At DHS Headquarters. The AP (3/6, Margasak) reports, "Guards at the Department of Homeland Security say the agency mishandled a potential anthrax attack on its headquarters, one of several incidents that led two senators to request an investigation of the agency's own security." Derrick Daniels, a former employee of Wackenhut Services Inc., the private security firm used by DHS, told the AP, "I wouldn't feel safe nowhere on this compound as an officer." Democratic Sens. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota and Ron Wyden of Oregon have written "the agency's inspector general, seeking an investigation."

$5.5 Million Bail Set For UNC Graduate In SUV Attack. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A3) University of North Carolina graduate Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar, "accused of running down nine people on campus to avenge the treatment of Muslims, said at a hearing Monday that he was 'thankful for the opportunity to spread the will of Allah.'" Taheri-azar is charged with "nine counts of attempted murder and nine counts of assault" and "his bail was set at $5.5 million." Meanwhile, the AP notes, about 50 UNC students yesterday "held what they called an 'anti-terrorism' rally," which included "a group of Muslim students who debated with organizers and said Taheri-azar had not been linked to any terrorist group."

The Washington Times (3/7, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "When asked by The Washington Times as to why Mr. Taheri-azar was not charged with terrorism," the police department "said the investigation is ongoing and additional charges may yet be filed."

Federal Effort To Rebuild New Orleans Levees Questioned. Louisiana state officials have begun to question the Army Corps of Engineer's plans to rebuild the New Orleans levee system. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 6, 2:40, Vargas) reported, "There were 340 miles of levees protecting greater New Orleans. But large stretches were damaged by the storm. A $1.6 billion rebuilding project is 40% complete." But "a monitor says it will leave parts of the levees weaker than before Katrina, making New Orleans vulnerable to another catastrophe." ABC (Osunami) added, "The state's commission says the Army Corps of Engineers. responsible for fixing the levees, is still struggling with critical design issues." So far, "the plan is to concentrate on only the system's most vulnerable points. But most of this work will not even begin until sometime this summer."

NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 6, 2:05, Williams) reported, "They are already spending $1.6 billion on emergency repairs now and they've asked for more money in case we are headed into another bad storm season." NBC (Myers) added, "Today, the Army Corps of Engineers says 45% of repairs have been completed." Walter Baumy of the Corps of Engineers "promises the entire system will be rebuilt by June 1, just as strong as it was before Katrina." But "independent scientists question whether the levee repairs can be done in time. And even if they are, these scientists say design flaws and weak soils could again leave this city vulnerable to a major storm."

Following reports that two teams of independent experts had found that the Corps was rushing to rebuild New Orleans' levees and using inadequate materials, the AP (3/7, Pickler) reports the Bush Administration "defended the quality of materials" on Monday, "as President Bush got assurances from the Army Corps of Engineers that it was on track to restore the system by the start of hurricane season." Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, head of the Army Corps, "took issue with [the experts'] findings." He "said the Corps had yet to see the findings or information on where the teams took their samples. He suggested the monitors may have been testing the wrong soil."

WPost Runs "Clarification" On Katrina Briefing Editorial. In a "Clarification" of its March 4 editorial "Caught on Tape," on the leaked video of an Aug. 28 White House briefing on Hurricane Katrina, the Washington Post (3/7, A16, 744K) says, "We wrote that there was no evidence President Bush, after being briefed on the predicted damage, had asked follow-up questions. In fact, the full transcript shows that after Mr. Bush left the conference, some of his advisers, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, did ask about the involvement of the military and other preparedness issues."

FEMA Purchase Of Mobile Homes Criticized. NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 7, 1:00, Williams) reported, "A disturbing report tonight from the Inspector General of the Department of Homeland Security, the parent agency of FEMA, they found that FEMA bought way more mobile homes than it should have. More than 26,000 trailer homes meant for evacuees were purchased at a cost of almost $900 million. Now, when all we hear are stories of families without shelter still, many of these trailer homes are sitting empty, warping and sinking in the mud in some places where they're being stored at two different staging grounds in Texas and Arkansas. FEMA personnel apparently didn't realize these trailers can't be used in a flood plain area, so only about 5,000 of them will actually be used to house Katrina victims. FEMA now say it is will donate a lot of the surplus trailers to other Federal agencies."

aftermath of Hurricane Katrina." According to Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin, "Some 3 million telephone lines were knocked out as the violent storm hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29." He "said he hopes the panel's work will help strengthen communications throughout the nation, especially in areas vulnerable to natural disasters."

Congressional Delegation Views Hurricane Damage. Roll Call (3/7, Nelson) reports last week 34 House Members made up the first large-scale Congressional delegation to the Gulf region since Hurricane Katrina struck, in what Rep. Roger Wicker "a much more profound realization of the damage." They "stood at the levee breech that had destroyed the displaced residents' homes" and "were briefed by the Army Corps of Engineers on the ongoing levee fortification project along the Industrial Canal going on behind them." Roll Call adds, "Many lawmakers, including the Speaker [Rep. Dennis Hastert], seemed stunned by the scope of what they saw. 'I think you really have to be on the ground' to understand the extent of the destruction, Hastert said, particularly in Mississippi."

WAR NEWS:

US Ambassador Says "Potential Is There" For All-Out Civil War In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "The top US envoy to Iraq said Monday that the 2003 toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime had opened a 'Pandora's box' of volatile ethnic and sectarian tensions that could engulf the region in all-out war and disrupt the global economy if America were to extricate itself from the country too soon." In remarks that were "among the frankest and bleakest public assessments of the Iraqi situation by a high-level American official," US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "said the 'potential is there' for sectarian violence to become all-out civil war, but that Iraq for now had pulled back from that prospect after the wave of sectarian reprisals for the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra. … Abandoning Iraq in the way the US disengaged from civil wars in Lebanon, Afghanistan and Somalia could have dramatic global repercussions, he said."

Cheney Says Commanders, Conditions On Ground Will Drive Decisions On US Troop Levels. Fox News' Special Report (5/6, Baier) reported, "At a fundraising event in Florida, vice president Cheney said progress has not come easy in Iraq but has been steady, pointing to the Iraqi elections and the standing up of Iraqi forces." Cheney: "As that force grows in strength and the political process continues to advance, we'll be able to decrease troop levels without losing our capacity to defeat the terrorists." Fox added, "The Vice President went on to say that troop level decisions will be driven by conditions on the ground and by the recommendations of top US commanders."

US Working For "Better Balance" In Iraqi Police. As the threat of further sectarian violence looms, the New York Times (3/7, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The American military is scrambling to try to weed out ethnic or religious partisans from the Iraqi security forces. The United States faces the possibility that it has been arming one side in a prospective civil war." According to the Times, "There is no quick or painless fix. The efforts risk alienating Shiite politicians, who have fiercely resisted attempts to wrest away their control of the security forces. The moves may appeal, though, to recalcitrant Sunni Arabs, whom the Americans want to draw into the political process."

Eighty Percent Of Americans Believe Sunni-Shiite Civil War Is Likely. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 3, 1:45, Vargas) reported, "An ABC News/Washington Post poll out today suggests that Americans are becoming increasingly frustrated with the situation in Iraq. Eight in ten Americans believe a civil war between Shiites and Sunnis is likely. 65% says the Bush Administration has no clear plan for ending the war." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "About half the public wants a withdrawal of American troops. But they're split. Fewer than one in five say bring the troops home right now. About a third say bring them home gradually over time. Another third says have the troop level stay exactly the same. And then you have about 10%, actually 11% of the country says increase troops now. You have a chaotic situation in Iraq which has left the public confused." The Washington Post (3/7, Morin, 744K) reports that "in the face of continuing violence, half -- 52 percent -- of those surveyed said the United States should begin withdrawing forces. One in six favors immediate withdrawal of all troops, however, while about one-third prefer a more gradual return." The Post adds, "In question after question, the new survey reflected a sharp decline in optimism, perhaps sparked by the sectarian violence that has flared in Iraq."

Talabani Loses Showdown In Parliament. The AP (3/7, Mroue) reports, "Iraq's president failed in a bid Monday to order parliament into session by March 12, further delaying formation of a government and raising questions whether the political process can withstand the unrelenting violence or disintegrate into civil war. ... At the heart of the dispute is a controversy over the second-term candidacy of the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose most powerful supporter is the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr." According to the AP, "it remained unclear when parliament might convene, despite the constitutional directive that set Sunday as the deadline. Nor was it clear how the disagreement over al-Jaafari might be settled."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Peterson, 61K) says "the crisis has laid bare a deepening divide within Iraq's majority Shiite community. The other contender was Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi, backed by the faction of Sadr rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who has portrayed himself as a technocrat and centrist who can get the job done." Jaafari "has been widely blamed in Iraq for permitting the violence to erupt out of control."

The Washington Times (3/7, Behn, 90K) reports "Iraqi party leaders, deadlocked over whether Ibrahim al-Jaafari should serve another term as prime minister, are considering a plan that would allow him to serve for six months to a year and then review his performance."

At Least 16 Iraqis Dead In Wave Of Bombings. A series of insurgent bombings in Iraq left 16 dead. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 2, :15, Vargas) reported, "Security forces were targeted in most of the attacks. … Also, the US said today that 2,300 Americans have been killed in Iraq since the war began." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 7, 0:10, Schieffer) reported, "Another American soldier has died in combat in Iraq." NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 4, 0:40, Williams) reported, "In another dramatic development today, a sniper assassinated the commander of the Iraqi Army's Sixth Division, the man in charge of the forces protecting the capital and the highest-ranking Iraqi military officer killed since the US invasion." The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Daragahi, 958K), Washington Post (3/7, Anderson, Tyson, 744K) and New York Times (3/7, Semple, 1.19M) focus there stories on the attacks on the assassinated general.

Meanwhile, the AP (3/7) reports this morning from Hillah, "Two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously at separate sites in this mostly Shiite city early Tuesday, wounding at least three people, police said." The blasts "were detonated by remote control and were about five minutes apart, said police Capt. Muthana Khalid."

Fearful Of Shiites, Some Sunnis Now Welcome US Troops. As a result of the outbreak of ethnic and sectarian violence in Iraq, US troops are now being welcomed in some Sunni areas. The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 8, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "It has gotten so bad that Iraqis are welcoming American patrols to places like Dora, a mostly Sunni neighborhood in southwestern Baghdad." CBS (Dozier) added local Sunnis blame "car bombs, kidnappings and gangland executions" on "death squads that that they say operate within the mostly Shiite police force." US troops "never used to be this popular in this hotbed of Saddam loyalists. But now locals say you are most welcome in Arabic."

Tribal Leaders Declare War On Al Qaeda In Iraq. The Washington Post (3/7, Anderson, 744K) reports "tribal chiefs in Iraq's western Anbar province and in an area near the northern city of Kirkuk, two regions teeming with insurgents, are vowing to strike back at al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni Arab-led group that is waging war against Sunni tribal leaders who are cooperating with the Iraqi government and the US military." Anbar tribes "have formed a militia that has killed 20 insurgents from al-Qaeda in Iraq, leaders said." The Post adds, "Separately, more than 300 tribal chiefs, politicians, clerics, security officials and other community leaders met last week in Hawijah, about 35 miles southwest of Kirkuk, and 'declared war' on al-Qaeda in Iraq."

US Officials Say Iran Exporting Shaped Charges To Iraq. US officials believe Iran is exporting deadly shaped charges to Iraq for use by insurgents as roadside bombs. The military believes Iran's goal is to increase the US' casualties. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, lead story, 2:45, Ross) reported, "US military and intelligence officials tell ABC News they've intercepted shipments of these dread bombs at the border of Iran and Iraq. But others are getting through." What the US "says links them to Iran are tell-tale manufacturing signatures, unique types of machine shop welds and materials powered by the same Japanese electronics, all indicating they are built in the same bomb factory, which the military believes is in Iran." US intelligence officials "say Iran is using the bombs as a way to drive up US casualties in Iraq but without provoking a direct confrontation." Reuters (3/6, Olivari, Al-Mehdawi) says Tarek al-Hashemi, "a leading Sunni politician and a contender for speaker when the new parliament opens on Sunday, accused Iran of fostering instability in Iraq, partly through militias loyal to Shi'ite parties, in a bid to divert US pressure over Tehran's nuclear program."

Germany To Investigate Reports Intelligence Service Aided US In Iraq. The New York Times (3/7, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports, "A German opposition party said Monday that it would vote for a formal parliamentary investigation into allegations that the German intelligence service provided help to the United States during the invasion of Iraq, which the government vehemently opposed. … Because the two other opposition parties, the leftist Greens and the new Left Party, have already declared their support, the Free Democrats' decision seems to ensure a formal investigation." Germany's government "has made vigorous efforts to head off an investigation, saying it could harm the functioning of Germany's intelligence service and efforts under way to improve relations with the United States." The Washington Times (3/7, Crossland, 90K) also reports the story, saying the probe "could hurt Chancellor Angela Merkel's government, even though she only took over last November, because her Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier was chief of staff to Mr. Schroeder at the time of the war. Lengthy debate about the Iraq war and Germany's role in it could also put further strain on US-German relations at a time when Mrs. Merkel is trying hard to repair the damage done by Mr. Schroeder's opposition to the war."

Delays In Iraq Reconstruction Plan Draw Criticism. A plan for helping the new Iraqi government succeed is still "mostly dormant" four months after it was announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, USA Today (3/7, Komarow, 2.31M) reports. The plan "calls for sending teams of experts to help the fledgling governments in Iraq's 18 provinces establish democratic institutions, improve security and manage reconstruction. … However, after the first three of 16 teams were created in Mosul, Kirkuk and Hillah in conjunction with her visit, no more have been launched. … That pace is 'a huge problem' and means the United States is blowing its chance 'to quickly seize the momentum' as Iraq forms a permanent government based on December's elections, said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee."

Amnesty International Accuses US Of Widespread Prisoner Abuse. A report from Amnesty International accuses the US and its allies of committing widespread abuses in Iraq, including torture and the continued detention of thousands of prisoners without charge or trial. The New York Times (3/7, Cowell, 1.19M) reports that the report, entitled "Beyond Abu Ghraib: Detention and Torture in Iraq," says the US and its allies have "established procedures which deprive detainees of human rights guaranteed in international law and standards." The times adds, "Responding to the report, the United States military said all its detainees were treated in accordance with international conventions and Iraqi law."

Barone Says US Groups Have Vested Interest In Denying Saddam Had Ties to Al Qaeda. Michael Barone writes in the Washington Times (3/7, 90K), "Why, for two distinct groups of Americans, has it become a matter of conviction held with religious intensity that there cannot have been any relationship between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq? One group consists of Democratic politicians who oppose the Bush administration's policy in Iraq. … The other group consists of intelligence and other career government professionals, many of them Arabists." The Democrats "fear more Americans would support Mr. Bush and the war effort if they believed there was. The career professionals, with their many years of training in the subtleties of the Middle East, have developed a vested interest in the notion that religious Wahhabis like al Qaeda could never collaborate with a secular tyrant like Saddam."

Pakistani Forces Battle Pro-Taliban Rebels Along Afghan Border. Nineteen pro-Taliban rebels were killed in fighting with Pakistani security forces along the Afghan border Monday. The Washington Post/Reuters (3/7, A13) reports, "The rebels launched attacks on government positions in Miran Shah on Saturday as President Bush met Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in the capital. The fighting has raged since. … The semiautonomous ethnic Pashtun lands along the Afghan border are Pakistan's front line in the war on terrorism."

Musharraf Lashes Out At Karzai. Meanwhile, Musharraf lashed out at Afghani President Hamid Karzai over his recent comments casting doubt on its commitment to fight terrorism. The New York Times (3/7, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "In a speech to Pakistani journalists in Rawalpindi that was broadcast on state television, Mr. Musharraf accused India of feeding false information to Afghan officials suggesting that the Pakistani intelligence agency was training terrorists. He dismissed the allegation, and he described as 'nonsense' a list of Taliban members, including the leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, who Mr. Karzai said were operating in Pakistan."

NATO Commander In Afghanistan Downplays Insurgent Threat. Reuters (3/6, Dunham) reports, "NATO's top commander said on Monday he doubted Taliban and al Qaeda forces were capable of posing a serious insurgent threat as the alliance expands its Afghanistan operations, calling narcotics the top worry." NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe Gen. James Jones also "said the 26-nation alliance remained 25 percent short of the troops and equipment envisioned for its rapid-reaction force, and expressed renewed doubt he will be able to declare it fully operational as planned on October 1." Knight Ridder (3/6, Brown) notes Jones "said Monday that a 20 percent increase in attacks 'is statistically not very significant' because the average number of daily attacks by Taliban and al-Qaida fighters had been 'quite low.'" The Washington Times (3/7, Scarborough, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "NATO Shrugs Off Afghan Violence," while the Washington Post (3/7, Tyson, 744K) titles its report "Afghan Threat Played Down."

US Ambassador Says US Will Retain Preeminent Role In Afghanistan NATO Force. The Financial Times (3/7, Morarjee) reports its interview with Ambassador Ronald Neumann, in which he "said America's commitment to Afghanistan would not be compromised when NATO troops take command of the country's restive south later this year." Neumann added that "the success of the Nato mission in southern Afghanistan had ramifications far beyond the country's borders." The Times says these comments "come as Afghan officials become increasingly nervous that the withdrawal of about 3,000 US troops after the handover to Nato command will signal to the Taliban that American forces are gradually pulling out of the country."

Pentagon Opens Criminal Investigation Into Tillman Death. The Pentagon's decision to open a criminal investigation into the death of Army Ranger Pat Tillman once again was reported on the network news, with ABC and CBS running full segments on the story. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 5, 2:20, Karl) reported the "criminal investigation will seek to determine whether" Tillman's fellow "soldiers fired their weapons indiscriminately, without attempting to verify their target. If so, they could be found guilty of negligent homicide and face a maximum penalty of three years in prison. Privately, Pentagon officials doubt this investigation will result in criminal charges."

The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 2, 1:50, Martin) reported, "Charges could range from negligent homicide to involuntary manslaughter to dereliction of duty. But the investigators could also find the real culprit was the fog of war and not bring any charges."

Military Desertions Have Declined Since 9/11 Attacks. Pentagon records show that while the overall military desertion rate has declined since the 9/11 attacks in 2001, 4,387 Army soldiers 3,454 Navy sailors and 82 Air Force personnel have deserted. USA Today (3/7, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "Desertion numbers have dropped since 9/11. The Army, Navy and Air Force reported 7,978 desertions in 2001, compared with 3,456 in 2005. The Marines showed 1,603 deserters in 2001. That declined by 148 in 2005. The desertion rate was much higher during the Vietnam era. The Army saw a high of 33,094 deserters in 1971 — 3.4% of the Army force. But there was a draft and the active-duty force was 2.7 million."

Pentagon Seen As Cracking Down On Vietnam Deserters As Message To Current Troops. In a separate story, USA Today (3/7, Nichols, 2.31M) reports that three decades after the Vietnam War, hundreds of deserters are still on the loose. Attorneys for one recently-captured Vietnam era deserter "say the Pentagon, and the Marine Corps in particular, are cracking down on long-term cases in an effort to warn current-day troops in Iraq against deserting. … Chief Warrant Officer James Averhart, who has commanded the Marine Corps Absentee Collection Center since September 2004, told the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times that he had ordered cold cases reopened and that his squad had caught 27 deserters in his first 11 months on the job, a rate he suggested was higher than those of his predecessors."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Attorney Claims Enron Comment Was Sarcasm. Reuters (3/7, Daily) reports, "Former Enron Corp. CEO Jeffrey Skilling was using sarcasm when he told several top executives in 2001 'they're on to us,' his lawyer suggested on Monday at the trial of Skilling and ex-CEO Ken Lay. … The lawyer, Mark Holscher, sought to sow doubts about the comment that a witness, former executive Kevin Hannon, told the jury last week he heard Skilling say in reaction to a May 2001 analyst report that was sharply critical of Enron." Reuters adds, "Hannon had said he took Skilling's comment at the meeting to mean that investors were 'starting to understand how Enron made money,' and appeared to link Skilling to efforts to cover up the decaying state of Enron's finances. … 'Can you tell this jury whether (Skilling's voice) was dripping with sarcasm when he said "they're onto us?"' Holscher asked Hannon. … 'Anything's possible,' replied Hannon in the clipped manner he used throughout the day's cross examination. Hannon was formerly chief operating officer of Enron's Internet unit Enron Broadband Services."

Fastow Looms As Pivotal Witness. USA Today (3/7, Farrell) reports, "Finally, four years after Enron's spectacular collapse, the moment everyone's been waiting for has arrived: Andrew Fastow, the company's disgraced former chief financial officer, is expected to tell his side of the story in court here today." USA continues, "While the government's trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has been going on for more than five weeks, testimony from the first 10 witnesses has focused largely on the abysmal financial condition of two business units — Enron Broadband Services and Enron Energy Services. Several have said that Lay and Skilling made misleading statements about the units to the investing public. … But with Fastow, who pleaded guilty to two felonies, prosecutors are expected to zero in on what Lay and Skilling knew about the overall financial condition of Enron, and when they knew it. More than any other witness so far, the former CFO was in a position to know whether the defendants — particularly Skilling — were lying to investors or simply painting an optimistic, and legal, picture of Enron in 2000 and 2001."

The Washington Post (3/7, D1, Johnson) reports, "As early as Tuesday, Fastow will take center stage as the trial's most highly anticipated witness -- and one of its most unpredictable. His presence is expected to electrify the federal courthouse here, where court officials are preparing for an onslaught of bystanders eager to hear Fastow speak publicly for the first time since his January 2004 guilty plea. … Both the Justice Department's Enron Task Force and the defense team have plenty of reasons to fear Fastow and the impact of his testimony. Government lawyers have signaled that they hope to limit their questioning to a day or less, given the liabilities he brings with him -- admissions that he improperly pocketed millions of dollars during his tenure. Defense lawyers intend to keep him on the witness stand for days trying to tear apart his account. … On one point, however, both sides agree: Fastow, 44, remains the most elusive and demonized character in a story that has come to symbolize an era of corporate malfeasance."

Scrushy's Attorney Says Lay, Skilling "Doomed." USA Today (3/7, Farrell) reports, "As if former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling don't have enough to worry about with the government's star witness expected to begin testifying against them today, a prominent defense lawyer who helped win an acquittal for another embattled CEO says the two men are already toast, at least in the courtroom." USA continues, "Donald Watkins, a civil rights lawyer and businessman who last year helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy beat charges that he masterminded a $2.7 billion fraud, said in an interview Friday that Lay and Skilling are 'doomed.' … 'There comes a time when you can forecast the outcome of a contest,' said Watkins, who has not attended the trial but has followed it closely in the media. 'In this contest, these guys have lost.' … The reason, according to Watkins, is that the two men settled on the wrong defense strategy. In their opening arguments, lawyers for the two men told the jury that Enron was a solid company done in by a loss of confidence among investors and trading partners after the disclosure that former chief financial officer Andrew Fastow had diverted tens of millions of dollars into his own pocket. … Watkins says this defense — that Enron was fundamentally a healthy company — is a non-starter. 'Nobody's going to buy that,' he says. Further, the tactics used so far by the defense — vigorous cross-examinations of cooperating witnesses who have already pleaded guilty — 'lacks imagination.'"

DaimlerChrysler Suspends Employees In Bribery Probe. The New York Times (3/7, Landler) reports, "DaimlerChrysler has dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal investigation uncovered evidence that its executives paid bribes in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe." The Times continues, "In a report filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said it had 'determined that improper payments were made in a number of jurisdictions.' The payments, it said, could violate both German law and the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in the United States." The Times adds, "The Justice Department and the S.E.C. have been investigating accusations of bribery at DaimlerChrysler since last year. The company has cooperated with the investigations, and these latest disclosures shed more light on the far-flung corruption inquiry. … The filing, however, does not answer a crucial question: whether senior Mercedes managers knew about the payments. It does not identify the countries where bribes were paid, or say how many people were involved."

The AP (3/7, Moore) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said in August 2005 that it was investigating whether DaimlerChrysler had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations. … That criminal investigation is tied to an inquiry opened in 2004 by the SEC after an employee fired by the automaker said he was dismissed for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials. … DaimlerChrysler said then, and reiterated Monday, that it was cooperating with the investigations, sharing with both agencies information from its internal probe."

Wallison Suggests Reducing Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac Portfolios. Peter Wallison, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M), "The Rudman Report on Fannie Mae recites facts eerily similar to what we now know about Enron. … What we should learn from this -- much of which occurred after the adoption of Sarbanes-Oxley -- is that a board made up primarily of independent directors, an audit committee made up entirely of independent directors, a Big Four accounting firm alerted to the dangers of accounting fraud, and a regulator that claimed to be fully on top of what was happening, could not prevent senior management from fudging the accounting and misleading the board and investors." Wallison adds, "As reform legislation languishes in the Senate, Congress should consider the lessons of Enron, Fannie and Freddie: Despite our best efforts, error and fraud will occur. That's why it's important to make sure -- by reducing the size of Fannie and Freddie's portfolios -- that no future management failure at either company will threaten the stability of the economy."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Castigate Ryan As Closing Arguments Begin. In a story widely-distributed by Knight Ridder, The Chicago Tribune (3/7, O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "Closing arguments began in former Gov. George Ryan's trial Monday with prosecutors blasting him as a shameless, greedy politician at the center of a series of dirty deals that enriched cronies who kicked back cash and gifts to Ryan and his family. … In nearly five hours of arguments, prosecutors portrayed Ryan as a two-faced, serial liar who publicly claimed he did all he could to eliminate fraud at licensing facilities but privately gutted corruption-fighting efforts to keep his political fundraising machine humming along. … Ryan 'sacrificed public safety and integrity' to ensure the fundraising pipeline kept flowing," said Assistant US Attorney Joel R. Levin. The AP (3/7, Robinson) notes, "Defense attorney Bradley E. Lerman moved for a mistrial Monday in a dispute over a presentation Levin was making to the jury. Lerman said it included material concerning a 1994 crash that killed six children and had been ruled out as so emotional it could prejudice the jurors. … U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer did not rule immediately on the motion."

Campbell Will Not Testify At Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/7, Scott, Warren, 430K) reports former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell announced Monday that he will not testify in his own defense at his corruption trial, saying, "I desperately wanted to testify. I wanted to tell the jury my story. They wanted to continue the character assassination, but I am not going to subject my family to further damage." His "criticism of the prosecutors apparently struck a nerve," and US Attorney David Nahmias "summoned reporters to respond." Nahmias said, "We will not make any special exceptions for this defendant. All of our questions would be relevant to the alleged criminal offenses." WXIA-TV Atlanta (Carnes, King) notes, "Campbell says he would be happy to testify -- if federal prosecutors would stay away from questions about his private life, including asking about two former girlfriends," but "Nahmias said any questions to Campbell about his private life would be relevant to the case, and no one can dictate what prosecutors ask and don't ask."

New York AFL-CIO Appointing Special Committee To Address FBI Probe. The New York Times (3/7, Greenhouse, 1.19M) report in "Metro Briefing" that New York State AFL-CIO President Denis Hughes "announced yesterday that he would appoint a special committee to handle matters at the New York City Central Labor Council regarding a federal investigation of the council and its president, Brian M. McLaughlin." Hughes said that McLaughlin "would remain in charge of the council, but would not have a voice in decisions regarding the investigation. Last Thursday, F.B.I. agents raided the council's offices and Mr. McLaughlin's Queens office as part of an investigation into accusations of bid rigging for city contracts for street and traffic lights." The New York Daily News (3/7, 729K) notes that "the labor council, whose headquarters was raided by more than 20 FBI agents last week, would create a small 'rapid-response team' of about a dozen city labor leaders to handle the federal probe without any involvement from McLaughlin," and "the council also would hire its own independent attorney to deal with the feds." The New York Post (3/7, Campanile, 624K) adds, "The action plan, which has been cleared by the leadership of the national AFL-CIO, shows how concerned the labor leaders are about the McLaughlin probe and the possibility that he might be charged with a crime. Meanwhile, the federal probe received a thumbs-up from former city transportation boss Wilbur Chapman. 'Thank God - finally,' Chapman told The Post."

Nevada Brothel Owner Charged With Attempted Bribery. The AP (3/7, Ritter) reports, "The owner of three southern Nevada brothels was charged Monday with trying to bribe a county commissioner to relax laws affecting bordellos." Joseph Maynard Richards "is accused of funneling $5,000 to a commissioner in rural Nye County in return for support for a law to let brothels be built closer to county roads and highways." Commission Chairwoman Candice Trummell, a Republican from Pahrump, confirmed for The Associated Press that she was the cooperating witness" mentioned in the complaint." "'This was done in cooperation with the FBI, Trummell added, describing the FBI probe as an ongoing public corruption investigation that began before she was elected…in 2003."

FBI Investigating Alleged Misappropriation By FEC Official In Harassment Complaint. Roll Call (3/7, Kane) reports, "The FBI is investigating allegations that a former top official at the Federal Election Commission," James Pehrkon, "tried to settle a sexual harassment complaint from a female staffer by attempting to misappropriate $100,000 in taxpayer funds last fall. The investigation has embroiled at least a handful of FEC employees, each of whom has been put on administrative leave or no longer works for the agency, leaving vacancies in critical posts heading into the campaign season."

Indictments Have Not Slowed AIPAC. The Washington Post (3/7, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column AIPAC staff members say the indictments Steve Rosen, "who goes on trial next month for disseminating classified information," and is deputy Keith Weissman "have not been mentioned in any of the group's public meetings so far. And they say the pro-Israel lobby, unharmed by the Rosen flap, is putting on its biggest and best show ever this week: 4,500 participants, including more than 1,000 students, paying visits to at least 450 House and Senate offices." The Post adds that the scandal "doesn't seem to have slowed down the group. … Any talk of Rosen is confined to private donor meetings and hallway conversations -- where opinions are split on AIPAC's decision to turn its back on Rosen and Weissman."

Testifying For Defense, Sliwa Co-Host Says Gotti Was "Sick Of This Life." The AP (3/7, Neumeister) reports, "John 'Junior' Gotti said in 1998 that he was 'sick of this life' and would plead guilty to criminal charges, a lawyer who co-hosts a radio show with Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa testified Monday at Gotti's mob trial." Ron Kuby's testimony "was intended by defense lawyers to boost Gotti's argument that he had rejected life in the Gambino crime family when he pleaded guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges. On that front, they got mixed results." Kuby, who represented Gotti in 1998, "testified that Gotti said he 'wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this,' but the lawyer could not be more specific." WCBS-TV New York (3/6, Guzman) adds Kuby testified "By 'this', I asked Kuby, did he mean 'this mob life?' 'I took it to mean that he wanted to put criminal life behind him. That he was tired of being in jail, tired of being in court, tired of being away from his family. That he wanted that life to end.'"

Under the headline "Kuby's Testimony Radio-Active," The New York Post (3/7, Mangan, 624K) says Kuby's testimony gave "Gotti's defense yesterday…an unexpected boost," although "Under cross-examination, Kuby said he had no knowledge that Junior later stopped earning money from the mob -- and said Gotti never admitted to him he was in the mob." The New York Daily News (3/7, 729K) also reports on Kuby's testimony, under the headline "Sliwa Says Radio Partner 'Judas.'"

Peter Gotti Testifies He Was Not Bagman. The New York Daily News (3/7, Zambito, 729K) reports John Gotti's youngest brother, Peter, testified yesterday, called by the defense "to refute allegations made by mob snitch Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo that he acted as the go-between for $50,000 in mob cash belonging to his brother. 'Never,' Gotti said when asked if he'd ever picked up money for his brother. He said his brother wouldn't have allowed it since he was well aware of his gambling habits."

Jury Selection Begins For "Mafia Cops" Trial. Reuters (3/7, Pierson) reports jury selection began Monday for the trial of former NYPD detectives Stephen Caracappa and Louis Eppolito, "accused of having been hit men for the mob." Brooklyn U.S. District Court Judge Jack Weinstein set opening arguments for March 13 and assured hundreds of potential jurors assembled in his courtroom the case 'will be one of the most interesting experiences of your life.' … When Eppolito showed up in court 75 minutes late, Weinstein ordered that he be rearrested and that his $5 million bail be revoked until a good explanation was provided." However, Newsday (3/7 DeStefano) reports, "But after defense attorney Bruce Cutler explained to Weinstein that two disabled tractor-trailers had shut down the roadway, Weinstein reinstated bail and revoked the arrest." The New York Post (3/7, Haberman, 624K) notes that Cutler "was apparently so concerned by the unexplained absence he almost called Nassau County cops to check the Plainview, L.I., home where Eppolito is staying while awaiting trial."

The New York Daily News (3/7, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "Prospective jurors answered 77 questions, including whether they had read Eppolito's autobiography, 'Mafia Cop,' or watched the defense lawyers' 'Cutler and Hayes Show' on Court TV."

Media Whirlwind Surrounding Trial. The New York Times (3/7, Feuer, 1.19M) reports, "Depending on whom you ask…there are four books and a movie, five books and a movie, four books but no movie or five books but no movie about" the trial, which "has become the latest scoop for the disheveled band of newspaper reporters who write about the courts and has led, in at least two cases, to a literary luncheon and a book deal. … United States v. Eppolito and Caracappa is a mob case, which is to say, a case with 'color' — and therein lies the interest."

Court Rules Bulger Brother Must Forfeit State Pension. The AP (3/7, Maguire) reports the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court "ruled Monday that a brother of fugitive mobster James 'Whitey' Bulger must forfeit his $65,000-a-year state pension because he lied to grand juries investigating the gangster's disappearance. Lawyers for John 'Jackie' Bulger, a retired court clerk magistrate, had argued that his crimes were based on family loyalty and didn't affect his job." The AP notes that Whitey Bulger "is wanted in connection with 21 murders and is on the FBI's 'Ten Most Wanted' list."

Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing In Fraud Case. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A5) reports a Federal judge "refused Monday to allow a lengthy delay in the sentencing of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, even though lawyers for both sides said the move could jeopardize a federal corruption investigation involving Congress and the Bush administration." Abramoff attorney Abbe Lowell "warned that the defense would disclose information about the ongoing corruption investigation to demonstrate the level of Abramoff's cooperation, something that could affect his sentence in the fraud case." Lowell said, "We will name names. That is not a good thing for law enforcement."

Admitted Hitman Testifies He Did Not Commit Murder-For-Hire. The AP (3/7, Weber) reports, "In a stunning about-face," Phillip Harwood, "the admitted triggerman in the slaying" of Lita Sullivan, "denied Monday that he had ever seen the victim in person or that he killed her on orders" from her husband, James Sullivan, accused of hiring a hitman to kill her. Harwood testified "he was in a getaway car nearby when the murder was committed by a man named 'John' who worked as a bartender at a topless bar. … He admitted to the jurors that he bought the flowers that were delivered to the victim." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/7, Montgomery, 430K) notes, "When prosecutor Clint Rucker asked Harwood if he agreed to kill Lita Sullivan, Harwood replied, 'To be honest, I have to answer no. The agreement was to "take care of her" but my intention was never to participate.' 'What do you think Sullivan meant by "take care of her,"' asked Rucker. 'I figured he meant to kill her, you don't pay $25,000 to scare nobody,' said Harwood." Court TV (3/6, Grinberg) notes Harwood "emerged as a wild card for both the defense and the state, implicating Sullivan one instant while denying being the shooter."

WXIA-TV Atlanta (3/6, Shirek, Christensen) reports, "Harwood said he first met James Sullivan when he delivered furniture to him from Sullivan's former home in Macon, Ga. Harwood said Sullivan started to hint around about needing help dealing with his estranged wife in Atlanta who was 'trying to take everything he has.' When Rucker asked Harwood how he knew Sullivan wasn't joking about having his wife killed, Harwood responded, 'When I received $12,500 in the mail.'"

Defense Lawyer Grills Harwood's Former Girlfriend. The Palm Beach Post (3/7, Keller) reports that before Harwood took the stand, his then-girlfriend, Belinda Trahan, "finished a grueling cross-examination from James Sullivan's attorney...by insisting he is the man she saw pass an envelope full of money" to Harwood "as payment for killing" Lita Sullivan. "Item by item, point by point," defense attorney Ed Garland "showed inconsistencies and contradictions in Trahan's trial testimony and earlier statements she has made to authorities. By his questions, Garland suggested Trahan was motivated to come forward with her story in 1998 in order to collect a reward that still has not been paid, and that her story was influenced by news accounts she had read."

US Indicts Army Official For Fraud, Bribery.

The Army Times (3/6, Tan) reports, "An official at Army Test and Evaluation Command was indicted March 1 for fraud and bribery, according to the U.S. Justice Department." The Times continues, "Jeffrey H. Stayton, chief of aviation for ATEC was charged with two counts of honest services fraud, one count of bribery and one count of obstruction of justice after an indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in the Middle District of Alabama." The Times adds, "The grand jury in Montgomery, Ala., also indicted William Curtis Childree, a private contractor based in Enterprise, Ala. Childree, 67, is charged with two counts of honest services fraud and one count of bribery. … According to the indictment, in or about November 2001, Maverick Aviation, a business owned and run by Childree that buys and distributes helicopters for its clients, was chosen to produce and modify two helicopters for use by the U.S. government. The contract was worth about $4.7 million. … Stayton, 55, is accused of taking actions that favored Maverick's selection to get thecontract and misleading government officials about Maverick's performance under the contract , according to the Justice Department."

US, Britain In Dispute Over Mutual Extradition Agreement.

The London Times (3/7, Baldwin) reports, "Britain and the United States were locked in a deepening diplomatic dispute last night over Washington's failure to implement a mutual extradition agreement that Parliament approved three years ago." The Times continues, "Congress's refusal to ratify the deal means that Britain cannot prosecute criminals residing in the US, including sex offenders and paedophiles. … America has sought the extradition of 44 alleged offenders since 2003, and 12 have already been sent to the US. The extradition of several others has been approved but is awaiting appeal. In contrast, Britain extradited only five suspects from the US in the same period under the previous thirty-year-old extradition treaty, including just one in 2005." The Times adds, "Ministers have repeatedly raised the issue with their US counterparts, and Charles Clarke, the Home Secretary, protested again when he met Alberto Gonzales, the US Attorney-General, in London yesterday. … Diplomats led by Sir David Manning, Ambassador to the US, have also held about 30 meetings on the issue on Capitol Hill in recent months. But pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Indeed, America's failure to abide by its side of the deal is fast becoming a political embarrassment for a British government often accused of showing undue deference to Washington. … A senior US official told The Times yesterday that the Administration was sympathetic to Britain's concerns and hinted that a fresh attempt to force the treaty through the Senate would be made within weeks. … The official said that the problem had been caused by the influential Irish-American lobby, which is worried that the treaty could be used to pursue IRA suspects. Senators are worried about alienating any section of voters before November's congressional elections. British diplomats have emphasised that, after the Good Friday agreement, Britain has little interest in pursuing IRA suspects."

US Targets White Supremacist Prison Gang.

The AP (3/7, Flaccus) reports, "The inmates had to heat the letter to draw out the message, written in invisible ink. When they did, their orders were clear. … Within hours, prosecutors say, members of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang sneaked into a nearby cellblock and killed two black inmates with handmade shanks as part of an order to 'go to war' with blacks." The AP continues, "The deaths are two of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed by federal prosecutors in a sweeping case against the Aryan Brotherhood, a violent white supremacist prison gang that has infiltrated nearly every federal and state prison since its beginnings in San Quentin in 1964. … Prosecutors hope to dismantle the gang - nicknamed the 'Brand' - in a series of trials that together make up what's believed to be the biggest capital murder case in U.S. history. Of the 40 men initially charged, as many as 16 could face the death penalty for crimes that reach back 30 years." The AP adds, "Prosecutors are pursuing the highly organized gang with a racketeering law originally passed to target Mafia leaders - a tactic recently used with some success against other prison gangs in California and Texas. … Opening statements in the trial of (Barry) Mills and three others are scheduled to begin March 14 in federal court in Santa Ana. Mills and another alleged ringleader, Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham, face the death penalty in what could be a nine-month trial. … Four more defendants are set to go on trial in Los Angeles in October; court dates in California are pending for the remaining men. Nineteen of the 40 defendants struck plea bargains, and one has died. … The 140-page indictment against the gang alleges a web of conspiracies to murder fellow inmates who offended gang members, cheated them on drug deals, failed to comply with the orders of leaders or snitched to prison authorities. Prosecutors, who declined to be interviewed, spent six years compiling evidence and relied on informants for much of their case."

Nine Arrested On Billing Fraud Charges At California Medical Clinic. The San Diego Union-Tribune (3/7, Martinez, 353K) reports, "A Lemon Grove medical clinic was shut down after its owners and employees were charged with defrauding Medi-Cal out of more than $2 million, authorities said Monday. Nine people, including the owners and a doctor who worked at a medical clinic…were indicted last week on 47 counts that included conspiracy; insurance fraud; capping, or illegally referring patients; tax evasion; grand theft and operating a business without workers' compensation insurance, the District Attorney's Office announced." The Union-Tribune notes, "FBI agents first learned about the clinic in November 2004 when patients complained that they were being billed for treatment that they did not receive, said Daniel R. Dzwilewski, special agent in charge of the San Diego FBI office."

Michigan Credit Card Fraud Probe Expanded. The Detroit News (3/6, Shepardson) reported that the credit card fraud investigation of Dearborn perfume distributor Ali Abdul Karim Farhat and his brother, Hassan Farhat, "has grown into a money-laundering indictment charging the pair and 17 of their business associates and relatives. Defense attorneys now say prosecutors threatened to indict the suspects' family members unless they agreed to plead guilty," and they "accuse government investigators of improperly obtaining secret wiretaps in the investigation." The News notes that "hundreds of pages of secret wiretap records recently made public show that the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force went to great lengths in its investigation of the Farhats -- installing a secret surveillance camera outside a Dearborn business, stealing a suspect's trash and having an undercover agent pose as a businessman seated next to a suspect on an airplane flight."

Judge Hears List Of Complaints From Convicted Sniper Muhammad. The Washington Times/AP (3/7, Manning) reports, "Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad appeared in Montgomery County Circuit Court in Rockville yesterday with a list of complaints, including charges that jailers have restricted his access to court documents in his trial for six Washington-area sniper shootings. … He also complained about disagreements with his attorneys over legal filings and that he had been denied long underwear to wear in court." The AP continues, "Muhammad also lost a pair of pretrial motions during yesterday's hearing in advance of his scheduled May 1 trial. He was transferred to Montgomery County last summer from Virginia, where he has been sentenced to death." The AP adds, "Circuit Judge John Ryan granted a request from county prosecutors to present evidence of other shootings Muhammad and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo are accused of carrying out before and during the three-week October 2002 shooting rampage in the Washington region. … Judge Ryan also blocked a request by Muhammad's attorneys to hold separate trials for some of the six murders that occurred in Montgomery County, the first on Oct. 2 and the last on Oct. 22, 2002."

Baltimore Grand Jury Decries "Arrests Without Merit." The Baltimore Sun (3/7, Bykowicz) reports, "A Baltimore grand jury is calling for the number of city arrests that fail to result in criminal charges to be cut in half, saying such arrests erode public confidence in the Police Department, according to a report released Monday. … 'If the staggering number of arrests is to be validated, the percentage of arrests without merit must be drastically reduced,' the report says. The jurors also said that frequent police stops of residents is an approach 'bordering on violating a person's constitutional rights.'" The Sun adds, "The panel of 23 grand jurors that met from September to January was asked by a Baltimore Circuit Court judge to "address the lack of confidence that exists between many members of the public and law enforcement." … The grand jury appears to have done its research by reviewing media reports and arrest statistics, as well as speaking with each other and with 'several' residents, though the report does not say how many. Grand jurors talked to one person from the Police Department, the head of education and training."

New Jersey Verdict Highlights Crackdown ON Violent Animal Rights Activists. The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Knickerbocker) reports, "Animal-rights activists around the country - at least the most extreme - are becoming increasingly militant. And law enforcement officials and lawmakers are stepping up efforts to combat those who break the law." The Monitor continues, "These interconnected trends came to a head in New Jersey last week when an animal rights group and six of its members were convicted of inciting violence in their campaign to shut down a company that uses animals to test drugs and other consumer products. … The group, Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC), claims its actions constitute free speech. But federal prosecutors and the jury in a Trenton, N.J., courtroom called it harassment, stalking, and conspiracy - the first such conviction under the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act. The lab, Huntingdon Life Sciences (HLS), the largest of its kind in the world, is based in Britain and New Jersey." The Monitor adds, "Antivivisectionists and other animal-rights proponents have been organized in the US since at least the mid-19th century. But recently, their most extreme members have become more aggressive. … Members of the US House and Senate are sponsoring the 'Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act.' It would toughen the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act by imposing penalties for veiled threats to individuals and families, economic disruption or damage, and 'tertiary targeting.' … Along with the recent indictment of ALF activists charged with arson and other crimes in Oregon and other parts of the West, the convictions in New Jersey are a setback for extremist animal-rights activists."

Supreme Court Rules Colleges Must Permit Military Recruitment. The Supreme Court yesterday ruled the government can condition Federal aid to colleges and universities on their acceptance of military recruitment on campus. The story was reported briefly by each of the networks last night. NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 9, 0:20, Williams) reported, "In its unanimous opinion, the court said that if students and faculty disagree with the military's policies, they are free to protest, but they may not kick the recruiters off campus." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 6, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "Several law schools have barred recruiters from their campuses arguing that the Pentagon's don't ask don't tell rule discriminates against gays and violates freedom of speech."

ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 7, :20, Vargas) said the ruling was "a major victory today for the Bush Administration." While the AP (3/7, Holland) calls it "a setback for universities that had become the latest battleground over the military policy allowing gay men and women to serve only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves." Justices "seemed swayed by the Bush administration's arguments that after the terrorist attacks, and during the war in Iraq, the government had a responsibility to bolster its recruitment." Knight Ridder (3/7, Henderson) also says the decision "is a big boost to the military and a blow to 36 law schools that joined forces to fight what they'd described as overreaching by Congress." The schools "will now face a choice: Grant military recruiters full access to their campuses, or forfeit what in some cases is hundreds of millions of dollars."

Fox News' Special Report (5/6, Garrett) reported "the court ruled 8-0 that recruitment policy did not violate the first amendment because it governs conduct, not speech." The New York Times (3/7, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "It was a setback, although hardly an unexpected one, to a coalition of law schools that brought the constitutional challenge, as well as to the Association of American Law Schools." The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Bravin, Hechinger, 2.11M) says that "at oral arguments in December, the justices sounded skeptical of the argument that schools were being forced to endorse a message of antipathy to homosexuals." The government's lawyer, Solicitor General Paul Clement, "said schools remain free to express their views of military policy in other ways." The Washington Times (3/7, Taylor, 90K) reports that "because he was not on the court in December when the case was argued, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. abstained from the ruling, which drew mixed reactions from court observers yesterday."

The Legal Times (3/7, Mauro) reports, "Georgetown law professor Mark Tushnet, a former president of the AALS, predicted that the ruling would lead to an increase in 'the number and intensity of protests against military recruiting in the fall.'"

The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Savage, 958K), USA Today (3/7, Biskupic, 2.31M), Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Teicher, 61K) and Washington Post (3/7, A1, Barbash, Romano, 744K), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

More Commentary. Under the headline "Army 8, Yale 0," the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "Yesterday the Supreme Court upheld a provision of a law called the Solomon Amendment, which conditions federal funding for colleges and universities on their providing military recruiters the same access they grant to other employers. The decision was no Solomonic compromise but a complete rout of the other-worldly professors who had challenged the law. … . If those who run America's institutions of higher education really have principled objections to the military's presence, let them take a stand by declining taxpayer money. Then the rest of us can find out how much their principles are worth."

The Washington Post (3/7, A16, 744K) editorializes that the ruling "is no surprise. It offers the correct answer to the legal question the case posed: Can the government deny federal money to universities that, in protest of the military's discrimination against homosexual service members, bar military recruiters from campus or grant them access on terms less welcoming than those given to other employers? As the court ruled, the universities don't have a right to that money. But the Pentagon's legal win should not obscure the indefensible nature of the policy that underlies the dispute." However, "the gay ban still needs to be repealed."

Google Court Date Postponed Again. CNET News (3/7) reports, "Google's courtroom date with the U.S. Justice Department has been delayed a second time." CNET continues, "U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, Calif. on Friday postponed the hearing from March 13 to March 14 at 9:00 a.m PT." CNET adds, "The outcome will determine whether the Bush administration will prevail in its fight to force Google to help it defend an anti-pornography law in a trial in Philadelphia this fall. … Although the Justice Department also demanded that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online hand over similar records, Google was the only recipient that chose to fight the subpoena in court."

DOJ Probing Mandalay Bay Hotel-Casino's Compliance With ADA. The Las Vegas Business Press (3/7, Miller) reports, "Sixteen years after the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the issue of hotel-casinos' compliance with the law's accessibility guidelines is again emerging as a hot-button issue. Numerous private complaints have been lodged against an assortment of casinos, and the Department of Justice told the Business Press that it is in the midst of a probe involving ADA compliance and Mandalay Bay Resort. … 'It's an ongoing, active investigation. It is the resort in general,' said DOJ spokesman Eric Holland, who couldn't comment further because of the investigation. He added that policy investigations must go through a preliminary review first, then, if warranted, an active investigation will be launched by the Justice Department." The Press continues, "MGM Mirage, which now owns Mandalay Bay, acknowledged the DOJ was looking into issues at the property prior to its absorption of the Mandalay Resort Group, which owned Mandalay Bay. That merger was completed last April. 'The Department of Justice had made that company aware of certain areas of concerns,' said MGM Mirage spokesperson Yvette Monet. 'We are working with the Department of Justice to resolve the issues in a timely manner.' Mandalay Bay's hotel does comply with the ADA's disable accessible room standards, according to information supplied by MGM Mirage. … Two other MGM Mirage-owned properties -- the MGM Grand and New York-New York -- have reached separate settlements with the Justice Department in the past. The agreements, last revised in 2001, called for both resorts to provide more access to disabled people."

Claims Of Anti-Semitic Jury Selection Reach California High Court. The California Recorder (3/7, Mckee) reports, "Attorneys arguing that Alameda County, Calif., prosecutors routinely excluded Jews from death penalty juries have been asked a tricky question: Does it matter if the court record doesn't establish that any of the excused jurors were actually Jewish?" The Recorder continues, "The justices of the California Supreme Court posed that question in a death row inmate's habeas case last month, and they're going to want answers during oral arguments Wednesday in San Francisco. … They also want to know whether there was actual wrongdoing if a prosecutor had a separate, valid reason for removing a juror." The Recorder adds, "The last-minute queries throw a new wrinkle into a case that has fascinated the Bay Area legal community since July 2004. That's when the high court in the habeas corpus case of death row inmate Fred Freeman ordered an investigation into whether the Alameda County district attorney's office -- in collusion with now-deceased Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde -- intentionally purged Jews from capital juries because of a perception that they wouldn't sentence someone to death. … Former Alameda County prosecutor John 'Jack' Quatman, who prosecuted Freeman, raised the allegations, but wound up being branded a 'dishonest and unethical' man by a Santa Clara County Superior Court judge who presided over a weeklong evidentiary hearing 11 months ago. … Judge Kevin Murphy ruled that Freeman got a fair trial and that there was ample evidence Quatman fabricated his claims to embarrass Alameda County DA Tom Orloff, who took Quatman off capital cases in 1993. … The latest questions by the Supreme Court seem to indicate that the justices could be leaning toward deciding the case on a narrow issue, possibly whether jurors were let go simply because they appeared Jewish or that their surnames -- Mishell, Peisker and Laput -- sounded Jewish."

Judge Calls for Elimination Of Preemptory Challenges In Jury Selection. Morris B. Hoffman, a state trial judge and an adjunct professor of law at the University of Colorado, writes in the New York Times (3/7) criticizes the jury selection process in US trials a "side show" that "all too often takes over the circus in American trials." Hoffman notes, "Since peremptory challenges are not mandated by the federal or any state constitutions, Congress and state legislatures could abolish them tomorrow."

South Dakota Enacts Abortion Ban In Bid To Test Roe. Gov. Mike Rounds of South Dakota yesterday signed into law a bill banning abortion except to save the life of the mother. State legislators had enacted the measure in an attempt to get the US Supreme Court to reconsider its decision in Roe vs. Wade, which legalized abortion. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A5) reports the bill "would make it a crime for doctors to perform an abortion unless the procedure was necessary to save the woman's life. It would make no exception for cases of rape or incest."

The story was covered in a full segment by NBC, while ABC and CBS reported the story briefly. NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 10, 2:10, Tibbles) reported it is "a day South Dakota Governor Mike Rounds has been planning for." Gov. Mike Rounds, South Dakota: "We'll send a message to those individuals who are pro-life that we have tried the direct, frontal assault on Roe v. Wade." Tibbles: "The bill's sponsor says the ultimate goal is to force a showdown at the nation's highest court." Roger Hunt, South Dakota House of Representatives: "The United States Supreme Court is recognizing that there is a growing momentum to revisit Roe v. Wade." Tibbles: "Legislatures in at least 10 other states are considering their own abortion bans. Mississippi's could pass as early as next week."

ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 8, Vargas) reported the law "was designed by lawmakers to invoke a legal battle they hope will lead to the overturning of Roe versus Wade." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer) reported, "Lower Federal courts are almost certain to block the law before it takes effect July 1st." CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, King) reported that "that's just what supporters want, a direct challenge to the 1973 high court decision legalizing abortion." The New York Times (3/7, Davey, 1.19M) also says the law "will force a legal showdown before it ever comes into effect, an outcome its supporters, eager to overturn Roe, intended."

USA Today (3/7, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports, "Passions among supporters of the law were also running high. State Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican sponsor of the law, said an unidentified donor has already given $1 million to offset legal costs." USA Today (3/7, Lawrence, 2.31M) runs a second story, reporting the "new law…is creating a rift among anti-abortion Republicans during an election year. … Some Republican abortion opponents say they would prefer to continue the incremental approach that has resulted in increasing restrictions on abortion. They worry South Dakota's frontal assault could scare away moderates, light a fire under liberals and even set back the anti-abortion cause." The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Muskal, 958K) reports Planned Parenthood "runs the state's only clinic where abortions are performed. About 800 abortions are done each year in South Dakota."

Report Finds Minorities Are Moving To Sun Belt. A Brookings Institution report to be released today says that almost one-third of US metropolitan areas have seen declines in their white populations this decade as minorities have brought diversity to large sections of the country. USA Today (3/7, El Nasser, 2.31M) reports, "The influx of immigrants and people moving to the Sun Belt and Western mountain states from other parts of the USA is rearranging the ethnic tapestry of urban centers in an unprecedented way. Blacks, Hispanics and Asians are going where the jobs are. They're driving population increases in the fastest-growing areas, including Las Vegas, Atlanta and Orlando, says demographer William Frey, author of the report on shifts in populations from 2000 to 2004."

Whites Could Be Minority In New York City Area Within Few Years. Demographers say the influx of foreigners to the New York city area combined with the continuing exodus or non-Hispanic whites to other parts of the country will result in whites being a minority of the region's population within a few years. The New York Times (3/7, Roberts, 1.19M) reports, "The shift would make New York the first large metropolitan area outside the South and West in which whites do not make up a majority, according to an analysis of 2004 Census estimates by the Brookings Institution that was released yesterday."

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Approval Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal Seen As Likely. The Austin American-Statesman (3/7, Geewax) reports, "The Justice Department likely will approve AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. without demanding any major antitrust concessions, analysts said Monday. … But the Federal Communications Commission, which also must review the transaction, may consider restricting the new company from charging new fees for faster delivery of premium Internet services, they predicted." The American-Statesman continues, "Together, AT&T and BellSouth would become the nation's No. 1 supplier of local, long-distance, wireless and high-speed-Internet services. … In recent reviews of telecom mergers, however, Justice Department officials decided that size alone could not shield phone companies from competition from cable, satellite and other companies providing telecom services. … As a result, the Justice Department demanded no significant changes in those cases, so 'we see no reason why it would treat this case differently,' according to an assessment issued by Anna-Maria Kovacs, president of Regulatory Source Associates LLC, a research firm in Cambridge, Mass."

Dow Jones (3/7) reports that the deal "will face few antitrust hurdles…analysts predicted Monday. … Announced Sunday, the deal follows SBC Communications Inc.'s acquisition of AT&T and the formation of the new AT&T Inc. in November. It also follows Verizon Communications' February 2005 purchase of MCI Corp. … Both those recent deals, observers say, give regulators case histories from which to work. … 'They have a template to look at these things and follow the same framework,' said Paul Glenchur of Stanford Washington Research Group. … 'I don't think there's going to be a great deal of regulatory resistance,' said Jonathan Rubin, a research fellow at the American Antitrust Institute."

Reuters (3/7) reports, "U.S. communications regulators and antitrust authorities on Monday pledged to carefully review AT&T Inc.'s $65 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp….. 'We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services,' Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement." Reuters adds, "The agency must determine whether the deal benefits the public. The transaction must also receive approval from U.S. Justice Department antitrust authorities. … 'We're going to look at it closely,' the department's antitrust chief Thomas Barnett told reporters while attending a conference of attorneys general. … Analysts said they expect the deal to be approved, likely with similar conditions that were attached to two telecommunications deals given the green light last year, Verizon Communications' purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications acquisition of AT&T Corp. to form AT&T Inc. … Lawmakers also said they plan to review the deal."

Dow Jones (3/7) reports that the proposed deal "is stirring up some unease on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers and competing telecommunications companies are questioning whether the transaction requires special scrutiny." Dow Jones continues, "Concerns hinge in on the size of the deal and on expectations that AT&T's purchase will escalate a trend of consolidation in the telecommunications industry. … 'AT&T's proposal to purchase BellSouth would remove yet another potential competitor from the communications marketplace and calls into question whether the future of communications policy will be marked by strategies to promote vigorous competition or by further efforts to facilitate new mergers,' Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the top Democrat on the Senate Commerce Committee said in a statement." Dow Jones notes, "The transaction comes amid a favorable political climate for mergers, as the Bush administration has been friendly to large combinations. Many observers expect the Federal Communications Commission and antitrust regulators to approve the deal with few conditions even amid concerns the deal would leave companies with too much pricing power and consumers with two few choices."

AT&T Plans To Cut 10,000 Jobs After BellSouth Purchase. Bloomberg (3/7) reports, "AT&T Inc….plans to eliminate about 10,000 jobs after completing the $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. … The reductions will come in 2007 through 2009, Chief Financial Officer Rick Lindner said on a conference call today with analysts. With BellSouth and Cingular, San Antonio-based AT&T's workforce will rise to 317,000 from 189,000, making AT&T among the top 10 U.S. employers, according to Bloomberg data." Bloomberg adds, "Job cuts, which are about 3 percent of total employment, represent about 50 percent of the planned $18 billion in cost savings AT&T expects to extract from the purchase. The acquisition will cement AT&T's position as the dominant U.S. provider of local, long-distance and wireless calling and enable it to better fend off new competition from cable-television companies and Internet calling companies. … The reductions, which Lindner said will come mostly through attrition, are in addition to the 13,000 jobs that AT&T plans to shed as part of last year's combination between SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which created the largest U.S. phone provider. BellSouth and Cingular add 128,000 workers to the payroll."

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Could Change Vodafone-Verizon Dynamic. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Bryan-low, Singer, Sharma) reports, "AT&T INC.'S planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. not only changes the U.S. telecommunications landscape but could cause an unexpected shift in the dynamic between Britain's Vodafone Group PLC and Verizon Communications Inc., the co-owners of Verizon Wireless." The Journal adds, "Verizon has long been interested in buying out Vodafone's 45% stake in the venture, but has been holding out for the right terms. For months, Vodafone has been under pressure from investors to do a deal in order to generate cash for the company and pay out dividends to large shareholders. That gave Verizon the upper hand. … But now Verizon needs to get control of the venture more than ever, analysts say, just to keep pace with AT&T, which will take full control of cellular carrier Cingular Wireless and thus increase its exposure to the telecom industry's growth area. The power balance may have shifted in Vodafone's favor."

The Financial Times (3/7, Taylor, Van Duyn, Politi) reports that the merger announcement "increased the pressure on rivals including Verizon Communications to join an industry-wide consolidation." The Times continues, "The BellSouth purchase would also give AT&T sole control of Cingular Wireless, the biggest wireless carrier in the US. As a result, analysts noted, Verizon, its main rival, would be under pressure to buy out Vodafone's 45 per cent stake in Verizon Wireless. … Shares in Vodafone gained 2.9 per cent in London to close at 125 pence. Verizon's shares were up 1.25 per cent at $34 at noon in New York. … 'Verizon may be pressured more to improve its business mix by becoming increasingly focused on its attempt to buy out the remaining 45 per cent of Verizon Wireless from Vodafone,' said Jason Armstrong of Goldman Sachs in a note to investors."

The Washington Post (3/7, D1, Mohammed) reports, "With Sunday's announcement of AT&T's agreement to buy BellSouth Corp. for about $67 billion in stock, (AT&T Chairman Edward E.) Whitacre, 64, capped a career that has transformed what was once the smallest of the Baby Bells, Southwestern Bell Corp., into the largest local-phone and wireless company in the country. … What immediately followed was speculation about what Verizon's (Chairman Ivan G.) Seidenberg, 59, might do next to one-up his biggest competitor for more than a decade. He has already said publicly that he'd like to buy out Vodafone Group PLC's 45 percent stake in Verizon Wireless, the second-largest U.S. mobile phone company."

Qwest Could Get Buyout Offer After AT&T Deal. USA Today (3/7, Iwata, Davidson) reports, "For months, Qwest has been considered anything but a prized acquisition target — mostly because of its heavy debt and its lack of the large-scale wireless and high-speed Internet assets that are the communications industry's engines for growth in coming years. … That view might be changing in the wake of AT&T's proposed $67 billion purchase of BellSouth." USA continues, "Qwest — as well as Alltel and Sprint Nextel — could become an acquisition target, as Verizon scrambles to keep pace with AT&T, predicts analyst Ken McGee at technology consultant Gartner. … A combined AT&T and BellSouth would knock Verizon from its No. 1 perch in the industry and put it at a disadvantage in both the wireless and large-business markets, possibly forcing it to respond, says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Chris King." USA adds, "McGee predicts that Qwest will garner Verizon's interest as merger bait. 'They're unlikely to remain an orphan,' he says, noting that Qwest CEO Richard Notebaert has kept Qwest from a bankruptcy reorganization and appears to be slowly turning it around. 'Qwest must feel awfully lonely sitting there, watching everyone else dance.'"

AT&T Back On Top 22 Years After Breakup. The Washington Post (3/7, D5, Noguchi) reports, "Just a year ago, the hallowed AT&T Inc. brand appeared to be in its twilight, on the cusp of being merged out of existence. Now, with a proposed $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., the AT&T name is about to retake its place as the biggest brand in telecommunications." The Post adds, "Though it's been hard to track the complicated handoff of the AT&T name in recent years, it's clear that the new AT&T is a far cry from the old 'Ma Bell' company that was formed after Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876. … Before the breakup of the monopoly in 1984, there was effectively one company, AT&T, which sold telephones and supplied local and long-distance services. That was before cellular phones and the Internet. After the breakup, AT&T became a long-distance phone company. … In the late 1990s, AT&T for a brief period had a host of services under its umbrella. In addition to being the largest long-distance provider, it had a wireless operation, offered cable TV services, and sold dial-up and later high-speed Internet services. Over time, the pieces were spun off or sold. … By early last year, all iterations of the AT&T brand seemed headed for the dustbin of history -- again. In 2004, AT&T Wireless was subsumed by Cingular Wireless. … . Cingular's parent companies, BellSouth and SBC Communications Inc., had proposed an acquisition of AT&T, leaving no apparent heir to the name. But as marketing experts predicted, after closing its merger last year, SBC ditched its three-letter acronym for the nationally recognized AT&T name, which it now calls 'the new AT&T' in its advertisements."

Scripps Howard (3/7, Deibel) reports, "AT&T's $67-billion bid for BellSouth seems on the surface to go a long way toward reconstituting the old telephone monopoly, but 24 years after federal trustbusters forced the breakup, it's not your father's Ma Bell anymore. … Today's era of wireless and fiber optics convergence is light years away from the competitive landscape that U.S. District Judge Harold Green confronted when he OK'd the 1982 consent decree that divided AT&T into seven regional Bell operating companies two years later. … At stake now are upstart, low-cost challenges from Internet, cable and wireless competition, telecom analysts say."

Merger Could Lead To Lower Prices For Consumers. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Young, Vascellaro) reports, "The $67 billion merger that will make BellSouth Corp. part of AT&T Inc. is expected to accelerate the battle of the bundles. … The cable industry and the phone companies are aggressively competing to attract new customers by offering attractively priced packages of home phone, Internet, cable and cellphone services. AT&T Chairman and Chief Executive Edward Whitacre has long identified $100 as a potential target price for a package of those four services. While that price hasn't been offered yet, the merger increases the pressure on the phone and cable rivals to deliver more competitive packages as a way to keep competing services from poaching customers." The Journal adds, "Prices are already in the $100 range for packages that don't include wireless -- and industry executives expect them to come down. A larger AT&T will be able to compete more aggressively with cable companies and, after cutting costs, will likely be able to reduce prices of service packages."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Trumbull, Marks) reports, "Changes in the communications industry are spawning vast new choices - but not necessarily lower bills - for American consumers who dial, click, and channel surf. … Cellphones now carry video as well as voice. The Internet can be used for phone calls as well as data downloading. And television is fast becoming a digital medium, where content can be stored and retrieved anytime … This is the 'digital convergence' of communication platforms that telecom and cable companies have long been trying to create. The process holds great promise but means more volatility for consumers and firms. … The latest jolt is this week's announcement by AT&T that it plans to acquire BellSouth Corp. Together, the firms would create the world's biggest telecommunications company in terms of market capitalization and combine many of the pieces of the old 'Ma Bell' that in 1984 was broken into eight pieces by an antitrust settlement. … Indeed, for all the new competition, the scale of this $67 billion deal is just one sign of the market clout that telecom and cable companies still retain. The word monopoly no longer applies. But Americans are spending more than ever on communications services, and regulators still have a role to play as guardians of competition, consumer advocates say."

USA Today (3/7, Davidson) reports, "AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth gave fresh ammunition Monday to critics of a push by the big local phone companies to charge websites fees to ensure fast delivery of their content." USA continues, "Even before the deal, AT&T and BellSouth discussed plans to charge Internet-based phone company Vonage, Google and other Web providers new fees to ensure speedy delivery of their phone calls, video or other content. Though proposals in Congress would bar phone companies from blocking access to rival websites, none would prohibit their offering enhanced services." USA adds, "The question of whether an even bigger AT&T should have to comply with Internet non-discrimination principles is expected to take center stage as consumer advocates urge regulators to reject the deal. Some rivals say arguments for such restraints are bolstered by the clout a bigger AT&T customer base would have. 'Arguably, there's less competition as a result of these mergers,' says Paul Meisner of Amazon. … Consumer groups also fear the $67 billion deal will hamper competition for wireless and large business customers, driving up prices."

Deal Will Intensify Competition In Phone, TV, Internet. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Grant, Schatz) reports, "The picture just got fuzzier for the cable-TV industry, a once-mighty monopoly now under assault by new technology and corporate mergers." The Journal adds, "Even before AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp.…cable companies were under growing pressure. Their stocks have steadily declined amid investor alarm at new competition from satellite and phone companies. The explosion of video on the Internet is conjuring up a future when a cable middleman may no longer be necessary. Regulators are pushing the industry on decency issues and pricing policies. … And cable's once-commanding lead in the sale of high-speed Internet connections has eroded as telephone companies have steeply discounted competing offers. Cable used to enjoy a two-thirds market share, but in the past year telephone companies have picked up more new customers than cable operators did. … Now the AT&T megadeal could create the largest competitor yet for cable operators in the new race to sell packages of phone, TV and Internet services. Among phone companies, AT&T already had the most aggressive plans for pushing into the TV and broadband markets."

Consumers Groups Vow To Oppose Merger. The AP (3/7, Powell) reports, "Several of the nation's largest consumer groups said Monday they would oppose AT&T's purchase of BellSouth Corp., arguing that the deal will reduce competition and drive up prices in the telecommunications industry." The AP continues, "Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America said they would urge the Justice Department to block AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion offer. … The consumer groups also asked their members to contact the Federal Communications Commission, which must approve the acquisition, and to petition their congressmen to try to prevent the deal from going through." The AP adds, "The consumer groups warned that increasing consolidation in the telephone industry would boost the prices for local, long-distance and cell phone services. They added that more-limited choices for phone service — along with a similar merger trend in the cable industry — threatened to reduce the variety of broadband Internet services available to consumers. … 'If approved, this merger will lead to higher local, long-distance and cell phone prices for consumers across the country,' said Gene Kimmelman, a vice president of Consumers Union, which is headquartered in Yonkers, N.Y. … At the very least, Kimmelman said, federal regulators should 'require the merging companies to sell their Cingular wireless business to create more opportunities for competition between wireless and wireline services.'"

The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 1, 1:50, Schieffer) reported, "Consumer groups vowed today to stop the proposed $67 billion merger of AT&T and BellSouth. And some of the workers may hope they do stop it because AT&T has already said if the deal goes through, they intend to lay off as many as 10,000 people. The consumer groups say a merger would mean less competition in the telecom industry and higher prices for consumers." NBC Nightly News (3/6, lead story, 2:20, Thompson) reported, "For some, this acquisition has an unsettling sense of deja vu. 22 years ago, a court order split AT&T into seven regional companies. Four of those companies are now part of AT&T again, leading some to wonder if ol' Ma Bell is back." Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts: "We have to make sure that this deal doesn't send us backwards, back to 20 years ago, when AT&T had a monopoly." NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 2, 2:00, Quintanilla) ran a similar story.

Deal Could Undermine Telephone Industry's Broader Agenda. The New York Times (3/7, Labaton, 1.19M) reports that AT&T's proposal to buy BellSouth is a sign of "how far the regulatory climate, as well as the marketplace, has traveled in less than a decade, as the cable and phone industries have gotten into each other's businesses and new forms of phone service have grown. … The deal threatens to undermine parts of the telephone industry's broader regulatory and legislative agenda by making it more difficult for the industry to claim it badly needs relief from regulators and Congress."

FCC, Telecom Law Changes Could Affect Merger Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Schatz, Squeo) reports, "As AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. make the case for their $67 billion merger, they'll be counting on their vaunted lobbying clout to win over skeptical lawmakers and regulators. … Their efforts could be complicated by two factors: The changing makeup of the Federal Communications Commission and a push to rewrite the landmark 1996 telecommunications law." The Journal adds, "Regulatory experts say that given (FCC Chairman Kevin) Martin's push last year to impose minimal conditions on SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI, it would be surprising if he reversed his stance." The Journal notes, "Mr. Martin, though, represents just one vote on a five-member commission. The two Democrats likely will cast a skeptical eye toward such a transaction, especially given talk by phone companies to charge technology companies extra to guarantee speedy delivery on their networks. And the Bells may not be able to count on Mr. Martin's two Republican colleagues because of a shift in the makeup of the commission."

Two CEOs Likely To Play Big Role In Telecom Titan. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Searcey) reports, "Over the years, AT&T Inc. chairman Edward Whitacre and BellSouth Corp. chief executive Duane Ackerman had talked many times about a deal before they finally agreed to the largest one in the history of the U.S. telecommunications industry. … In two years, though, both likely will be retired. The Journal continues, "Before the deal Randall Stephenson, AT&T's chief operating officer, and Mark Feidler, who held the same title at BellSouth, were widely acknowledged to be the heirs apparent of their respective companies once their bosses retire. While it is likely they will play significant leadership roles in the combined company, analysts and investors believe that Mr. Stephenson has the inside track to be chief executive. … 'Randall is clearly the anointed one within AT&T and Mark as the No. 2 in BellSouth needs to know that he'll have to be No. 2 or 3 in the new entity,' says a consultant who has worked with both companies. … Both men declined to be interviewed yesterday. But people familiar with the situation say that Mr. Stephenson, who has spent his 24-year career with the company mainly overseeing telecom finances, and Mr. Feidler, a former corporate lawyer and investment banker, have both been supporters of a deal between BellSouth and AT&T. The two executives have a good working relationship and already have one deal in common. They both helped negotiate the Cingular Wireless acquisition of AT&T Wireless. BellSouth and AT&T own Cingular in a joint venture."

WSJournal Says Changing Technology Driving Industry Consolidation. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) says that while "all this telecom consolidation may or may not pay off for shareholders, the benefits to consumers are clear." The Journal adds, "Typical was the response from Massachusetts Democrat Ed Markey, a senior Member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who said 'Twenty years after the government broke up Ma Bell, this deal represents a mother-and-child reunion.' But the child has grown up and the mother has changed, even if Mr. Markey's rhetoric hasn't. Consolidation is being driven, as it should, by changing technologies, and by all manner of competition in a telecom world that Ma Bell wouldn't recognize."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/7), Bret Swanson, a senior fellow at Seattle's Discovery Institute and an editor of the Gilder Technology Report, writes, "Ma Bell's back: Run for your lives! -- or at least to the halls of Congress. That, it seems, is the overheated conventional wisdom. But the $170 billion combination of AT&T and BellSouth into the world's largest telecom company is a perfectly natural progression of business and technology. The merger will rationalize a market beset by decades of political mismanagement." Swanson adds, "Although this latest reintegration will not reduce the number of competitors in the marketplace, it is sure to supercharge the ever-present denunciations of monopoly that are behind every effort to regulate telecom. This time around, the main agent is the colossus Google. Exactly one decade after the disastrous 1996 act set us on a path for the telecom crash and a plunge to 16th in world broadband rankings, Google is leading an alliance of politicians, lobbyists and interested companies under the aegis of 'net neutrality.' If enacted, it will repeat the most basic mistakes of earlier legislation."

USA Today (3/7) editorializes, "Given the current, accommodating state of antitrust policy and the arrival of cable as a competitor in broadband and telephony, this deal might well be approved by federal regulators. It might even create economies of scale that would make the combination more efficient than the sum of its parts. … But it also should raise red flags for Congress and federal regulators. For all the talk of robust competition between cable and telephone, the reality has been less impressive. The most intense competition and the fastest roll-outs of new services have been largely limited to affluent areas. … What's more, the merger raises questions about the future of the Internet and digital entertainment. … For that reason, lawmakers and members of the Federal Communications Commission should take a long, hard look at where the Internet is headed and what might be done to prevent a handful of companies from gaining a chokehold over an evolving medium that is one of history's great innovations."

The Los Angeles Times (3/7) editorializes, "AT&T…now finds itself at the center of one of the largest mergers in business history. And concerns about the dangers of the" the purchase of BellSouth by AT&T "are exaggerated as well." The Times says the "merger would have practically no immediate effect on BellSouth's or AT&T's market. Customers would neither gain nor lose any options for phone, high-speed Internet or wireless services." In fact, the "proposed merger could actually promote…competition." Still, "regulators shouldn't just wave the merger through." The Times recommends, "Rather than trusting the company not to hamper the Internet or play favorites, regulators should require it to pledge to preserve a level playing field for all websites, programmers and services as a condition of the BellSouth deal."

Hybrid Program Seen As Key To NYSE Group's Future. The AP (3/7, Martinez) reports, "When the New York Stock Exchange transforms into a publicly traded company Tuesday, its agenda - staying competitive with faster all-electronic markets - will remain in place even as its corporate structure changes." The AP continues, "The NYSE's 214-year existence as a non-for-profit institution will end when it closes its $9 billion acquisition of all-electronic rival Archipelago Holdings Inc. On Wednesday, the combined company, called NYSE Group Inc., will begin trading on the floor of the Big Board under the symbol NYX." The AP adds, "Unfettered from the NYSE's seat holder leadership structure, in which the owners of 1,366 seats had a strong say in the direction of the Big Board, NYSE Group Chief Executive John Thain has big plans for the exchange, including trading options and corporate bonds, the possibility of extended trading hours and acquisitions of other exchanges and companies. … But as the $9 billion acquisition closes, the exchange can't look too far ahead, nor too quickly. The linchpin of its future is not new products or acquisitions, but its core business of trading stocks. And with the Nasdaq Stock Market's electronic trading platform slowly eating away at the NYSE's market share, the NYSE's new 'hybrid' program - the merging of electronic trading with traditional floor auctions - must be a fast and sure success."

Blackstone To Purchase CarrAmerica For $5.6 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Forsyth) reports, "Blackstone Group agreed to acquire CarrAmerica Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust with office properties across the U.S., for $5.6 billion." The Journal continues, "The deal is the largest in a string of transactions in which publicly traded real-estate companies have been bought by private or institutional investors willing to pay a premium for companies they believe are undervalued by Wall Street. .. Blackstone, a New York-based private-equity firm, has been aggressive in acquiring real-estate companies but has focused on the hotel sector. Two weeks ago, it said it would acquire MeriStar Hospitality Corp., a hotel REIT, for $940 million, plus debt, in a deal valued at $2.6 billion. The decision to grab a large office REIT is seen as an endorsement of the improving office market."

JP Morgan To Pay $1.5 Billion For Kohl's Card Unit. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Sidel) reports, "J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to buy the credit-card operations of department-store chain Kohl's Corp. for $1.5 billion, reflecting the bank's push into the lucrative 'private-label' business." The Journal continues, "It is the latest in a flurry of deals in which retailers have shed their in-house card businesses to concentrate on core operations. Last year, for example, Federated Department Stores Inc. sold its private-label business to Citigroup Inc. … And British bank HSBC Holdings PLC recently snapped up the private-label portfolio of Neiman Marcus Group Inc." The Journal adds, "For banks, the private-label portfolios are attractive at a time when profit growth has been slowing for general-purpose cards -- those branded by card-issuing financial institutions and card associations such as Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard International Inc. … J.P. Morgan executives have repeatedly said they want to acquire more private-label portfolios; both Citigroup and General Electric Co. already have large presences in this area."

Linde Likely Clinches BOC Deal With Increased Bid. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Hromadko, Esterl) reports, "German industrial conglomerate Linde AG raised its takeover bid for U.K.-based gas company BOC Group PLC to £16 ($28.06) a share, likely clinching a deal that will create the world's largest industrial-gas company in terms of sales." The Journal continues, "Linde said it intends to fund the deal -- which values BOC at £8.2 billion ($14.4 billion) -- with a fresh issue of equity and debt. … The transaction would create a leading world-wide industrial-gas and engineering group with combined sales of €11.9 billion ($14.3 billion), said Linde, based in Wiesbaden, Germany. The supplier of industrial gases, engineering services and forklift trucks said the BOC management board intends to recommend that its shareholders accept the offer. The bid represents a 39% premium to BOC's share price prior to Linde's offer in January."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Democrats Object To ANWR Language In Bush Budget. Democrats on the Senate Budget Committee said yesterday they oppose putting language in the 2007 budget bill that assumes the government will raise billions of dollars in oil drilling leases from ANWR. Reuters (3/6, Doggett) reported, "In its budget proposal to Congress, the Bush administration said it expected $7 billion would be raised by allowing oil drilling in the Alaskan refuge, and the Congressional Budget Office puts the figure at $6 billion. … 'It is irresponsible to base the country's budget on highly speculative and dubious projections of lease revenues for the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge,' all nine Democrats on the budget panel said in a letter to the committee's Republican chairman, Judd Gregg."

Panel Issues New Guidelines For Flu Vaccines. The Washington Post (3/7, B1, Levine, 744K) reports that after hearing testimony from Gary Stein, whose 4 year old daughter Jessica died of the flu, the federal Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, "voted for a surprise revision in national policy: It unanimously recommended that starting this fall, all children between 2 and 5 years old be vaccinated annually against influenza. … Children still suffer a 'substantial' amount of influenza, however, said Raymond A. Strikas, an associate director at the National Immunization Program, which is part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. And that was the major impetus for the committee's decision late last month. Its expanded coverage even includes parents and older siblings, because they also suffer by getting sick themselves or taking time off work to care for ailing youngsters. All told, nearly 17 million additional people now will be urged to get protection against the flu, bringing the total to more than 120 million men, women and children across the United States."

NYTimes Says Navy Should Be Cautious When Using Sonar. An editorial in the New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) says, "The debate over whether the Navy's use of sonar to detect submarines is harming whales and other sound-sensitive species is back again. … No one can deny that the Navy needs to conduct sonar training in shallow waters, where sound propagates differently than in the deep ocean. But at a time when evidence is mounting that sonar has been responsible for at least some of the whale strandings around the world — and when we do not yet know what caused a large stranding last year in North Carolina — it behooves the Navy to move with extreme caution."

Sixteen Arrested On South Dakota Reservation For Drug Trafficking. Indian Country Today (3/7, Melmer) reports, "Sixteen people on the Pine Ridge Reservation have been charged with possession of cocaine and marijuana and with the intent to distribute the drugs. The arrests, which came days after national news organizations ran stories about drug trafficking on American Indian reservations, were not intended to coincide with those articles, according to Paul McCabe, FBI spokesman from the Minneapolis regional office." Indian Country notes McCabe said that arresting officers "stopped in a local restaurant and were greeted by locals with pats on the back and congratulatory praise, thanking them and saying, 'We appreciate it - get them out of here.' He added that the case is still under investigation and people may come forward with more information as long as it remains open."

Israel Extradites Alleged Drug-Trafficking Mob Boss To US. The AP (3/7, Heller) reports, "A suspected Israeli mob boss, described by U.S. prosecutors as one of the world's most wanted drug traffickers, was extradited to the United States on Monday, police said." The AP continues, "Zeev Rosenstein, suspected of involvement in distributing more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the United States, mostly in New York and Miami, was handed over to U.S. marshals at Ben Gurion International Airport near Tel Aviv arport and taken aboard a direct El Al flight to Miami, where he will face the drug charges, police spokesman Mickey Rosenfeld said." The AP adds, "The target of numerous gangland assassination attemps in the past, Rosenstein was driven to the airport in an undercover police car accompanied by several motorcycles, Israeli radios reported." Rosenfeld "said the extradition was the result of a long investigation conducted in coordination with U.S. law enforcement agencies. … Israeli police, acting on an international arrest warrant, arrested Rosenstein more than a year ago for allegedly smuggling drugs from Europe to the United States. … A U.S. extradition request, submitted in December 2004, said Rosenstein was involved in distributing more than 1 million pills of Ecstasy, court documents said."

Cable TV Coverage. Bloomberg –TV (3/6, 2:00 p.m.) reported, "A suspected Israeli mob boss, described by US prosecutors as one of the world's most-wanted drug traffickers, has been extradited to the US. He's suspected in involvement in distributing more than one million Ecstasy bills in the United States, mostly in New York and Miami. Israeli police arrested Rosenstein more than a year ago."

Local TV Coverage. WKRN-TV, Nashville, Tennessee (3/6, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "One of the world's most wanted drug kingpins was put on a plane for the US. US prosecutors say Zeev Rosenstein distributed more than one million Ecstasy tablets, mostly in New York and Miami. He's long been accused of being one of Israel's top mob leaders."

KCOY-TV, Santa Barbara-Santa Maria-San Luis Obispo, California (3/6, 7:00 a.m.) reported, "A suspected Israeli mob boss has been extradited to the United States. Zeev Rosenstein is described by US prosecutors as one of the world' s most wanted drug traffickers. He is suspected of involvement in distributing more than one million Ecstasy pills in the US. Police say he' s been handed over to US marshals in Israel and taken aboard a direct flight to Miami where he will face the drug charges." KRIS-TV, Corpus Christi, Texas (3/6, 5:00 p.m.) reported a similar story.

Man Extradited From Saint Kitts To Face Drug Charges In US. The AP (3/6) reports, "Federal officials say a man accused of importing cocaine has been extradited from his native Saint Kitts in the Caribbean. Noel Heath was one of the top ten fugitives of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York field division." According to the AP, In 1995, Heath was indicted on charges of conspiring to import more than eleven pounds of cocaine in the Rochester, New York, area.

DEA Agent Accused Of Embezzling. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (3/7) reports, "A DEA agent who worked at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport has been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of embezzling money as a federal officer, embezzling public money and money laundering. Gregory Campion, 44, of Orlando, Fla., is expected to be arraigned…on March 8." Campion is accused of stealing cash from a storage vault. The Chronicle says the money had been seized by law enforcement agents as currency involved in federal drug offenses and was subject to forfeiture to the U.S. The report notes that Campion has been suspended without pay.

California Man Arrested For Impersonating DEA Agent. The AP (3/7) reports federal authorities arrested a Manteca, California, man for impersonating a DEA agent by showing a phony badge as he entered a courtroom. "Thirty-seven-year-old John D. Cohen picked the wrong courthouse security officer to try to dupe -- a retired DEA special agent. The officer told the U-S Marshal's Service the badge looked suspicious." The AP says agents later found guns, DEA apparel, a police uniform, handcuffs, bulletproof vests and forged law enforcement training certificates at Cohen's home.

The Sacramento Bee (3/6) writes Cohen "presented a fake DEA badge to security officers at the Sacramento federal courthouse last week."

The Contra Costa (CA) Times (3/6, Fischer) reports, "Federal authorities say a Pleasanton mortgage broker posing as a narcotics agent entered a secure portion of Coast Guard Island in Alameda last month and sold guards a Ford Crown Victoria he claimed was a retired police car. That breach was the first of two in February that attracted real agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency." On Monday, DEA agents "visited the Manteca home of…Cohen and seized a cache of weapons and law enforcement paraphernalia, along with Cohen himself."

Local TV Coverage. KOVR-TV, Sacramento-Stockton-Modesto, California (3/6, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Tonight a man is under arrest for posing as a federal drug agent…federal agents arrested 37-year-old John Cohen. The first red flag went up last week when he flashed a fake ID to the wrong person; the phony badge was only the beginning. DEA agent Gordon Taylor said the phony badge John Cohen flashed last week would pass as the real deal to a lay person but not to the security officer who knows the real badge would have an ID number."

Tandy Listed Among Defendants In Death-Row Lawsuit. The Terre Haute (IN) Tribune Star (3/7) reports three federal death-row inmates who contend that lethal injections are painful have been granted a stay of execution. In one case death-row inmate Clarence Edward Hill is suing the state of Florida, "alleging that lethal injection would violate his constitutional protection from cruel and unusual punishment." The U.S. Supreme Court "has agreed to hear the Florida case, to determine whether Hill's civil suit falls within federal appeals, as lower courts have ruled, or is a legitimate challenge to the conditions of a condemned inmate's death sentence." The Tribune Star says separately, attorneys also are alleging in a federal lawsuit that lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment, and defendants in the case include Karen Tandy.

California Marijuana Clubs Said To Fear More Raids. The San Diego Union-Tribune (3/6, Mcdonald) reports, "Nearly three months after federal agents raided 13 medical marijuana dispensaries in San Diego County, the government has yet to make any arrests or file any criminal charges. Most of the pot clubs that closed during the high-profile searches reopened days later. Meanwhile, at least 10 new dispensaries, cooperatives and delivery services have set up shop." However, the Union-Tribune says some worry that federal agents will show up with warrants in hand and eventually force the clubs to close for good.

Bush Budget Blamed For Opening Southern Border To Increased Drug Trafficking. Senior Congressional and Colombian officials are blaming a Bush Administration decision to divert money for Colombian drug interdiction and eradication programs to the war on terrorism for opening up the southern US border to a new wave of cocaine and heroin. The Washington Times (3/7, Seper, 90K) reports that some lawmakers "plan to bypass the White House by dipping into a $72.4 billion supplemental appropriation for the war on terrorism to fund $99.4 million in military and police aid to Colombia. An amendment to the pending emergency supplemental bill likely will be offered by Republican Reps. Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, chairman of the House International Relations Committee, and Dan Burton of Indiana, a member of the House Government Reform Committee. It would pay for three DC-3 marine patrol aircraft for the Colombian navy and two UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters and 10 Huey II helicopters for the Colombian national police."

DEA Agents Find Meth "Superlab" In Georgia, 3 Arrested. UPI/Washington Times (3/6) writes, "U.S. federal drug agents said they have broken up a methamphetamine 'superlab' in Smyrna, Ga., and confiscated more than 12 pounds of the drug. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency said they arrested three men -- all illegal aliens from Mexico -- and that on Monday two of the defendants pleaded guilty to charges that include manufacturing methamphetamine." According to UPI, the DEA said 24 large trash bags also were found filled with emptied pseudoephedrine tablet boxes.

ATF Probes Florida Warehouse Fire. The Miami Herald (3/7, Fantz) reports, "An investigative team from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms will begin examining what's left of a Pompano Beach warehouse gutted by an unrelenting inferno that began at 8 p.m. Friday and raged throughout the night." The Herald continues, "Officials who tried to stamp out the blaze at Pallet Consultant Corp. on Southwest 12th Avenue reported flames reaching 100 feet into the air. The blaze could be seen two miles away. … Sandra King, spokeswoman for the Pompano Beach Fire-Rescue, said one of the 120 firefighters from North Lauderdale, Fort Lauderdale, Lighthouse Point, Margate, and Broward Fire-Rescue was injured when a loaded water hose slammed into his stomach. He was treated and released Friday from North Ridge Medical Center in Fort Lauderdale. … King said ATF and explosive experts will help discern the cause of the blaze because propane tanks inside hundreds of pallets exploded. Damage is estimated to be $10 million to three businesses within the six-acre property."

IMMIGRATION:

RICO Being Used Against Employers Who Hire Illegal Workers. The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Gaouette) reports from Caldwell, Idaho, "Like many communities, this fast-growing agricultural pocket of southwestern Idaho is paying a high tab for illegal immigration. … When an illegal worker gave birth to a premature baby, Canyon County wound up with a $174,000 hospital bill. County officials say the jail spent thousands to house another illegal immigrant at a motel, after his tuberculosis threatened to infect fellow inmates. … But where others have merely chafed at paying costs like these, officials in Canyon County are trying a novel approach: The all-Republican county commission has filed a racketeering lawsuit against four big businesses in the area, charging that they deliberately hire illegal workers." The Times adds, "The spectacle of the county's political leaders taking its businesses to court has touched off a bitter local debate. But it has also put Canyon County, a largely Republican community of about 160,000, at the forefront of an emerging national effort to use racketeering laws to crack down on illegal immigration by seeking damages from employers. … So far, a handful of workers and businesses around the country have filed civil lawsuits under the RICO statute, known formally as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. The targets are companies that, the lawsuits say, have unfairly used illegal labor to cut wage levels or prices. … . In Washington state, workers who filed a civil suit against their employer, a fruit company, won a $1.3-million settlement in January. The Supreme Court has agreed to hear another of the immigration-related RICO cases this year. … But Canyon County is the first municipality to bring a suit of this kind against employers. The lawsuit was dismissed by a federal district court but has been appealed to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. If it succeeds, it could touch off similar actions, says the county's lawyer, Howard Foster."

Specter Bill Seeks Middle Ground On Immigration. The Senate Judiciary Committee will begin debating the Senate's main immigration bill Wednesday with a goal of having a final version ready for the full Senate by March 27. Knight Ridder (3/7, Montgomery) reports, "Sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, the legislation is designed to strike a middle course between a bill passed by the House of Representatives calling for tougher immigration enforcement and pro-immigration advocates who call for permanent legal status - and eventual citizenship - for the estimated 11 million aliens now in the country illegally." Judiciary Committee aides "said that the measure would create a 'gold card' program for illegal immigrants who entered the United States before Jan. 4, 2004. It also would create a guest-worker program to bring in more foreign laborers."

CQ (3/6, Sandler, Crowley) reported, "Specter's draft was received with a skeptical eye during the initial markup March 2, which resulted in no votes on proposed amendments but elicited lots of opinions. he Judiciary Committee will resume the markup Wednesday and likely will meet Thursday as well. But staff members say the initial focus is on border security, interior enforcement and employer provisions, so the panel may not begin considering the worker programs until next week."

Local Officials Say Federal Government Has Ignored Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (3/7, Vitello, 1.19M) reports that 100 local officials from 30 states gathered in Washington Monday generally agree the President Bush's record on illegal immigration is a "failure." The gathering, "organized and convened here under the banner of the Coalition of Mayors and County Executives for Immigration Reform, called for border security and, most urgently, reimbursement to localities for the cost of dealing with a problem its members say the federal government has ignored." The Times also reports, "The White House did not ignore the meeting, but at the last minute downgraded the rank of its representative. In place of Ruben Barrales, a deputy assistant to the president and White House director of intergovernmental affairs, who was originally scheduled to attend, the White House sent a liaison to city officials, Toby Burke."

TAX:

DOJ Takes Action Against Nevada, Michigan Tax Preparers. The AP (3/7) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department filed suit today to stop four people from operating what it claims is a tax fraud scheme." The AP continues, "The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas says the scheme cost the government at least 31 million dollars. … The government accuses the Las Vegas-based group of funneling income from clients through trusts in the Caribbean to help them avoid paying taxes. … It says the group returned the money through phony gifts or loans to the customers, their friends or family members."

The AP (3/6, Prichard) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has asked a federal court to prohibit three Hillsdale residents from preparing federal income tax returns for others, claiming the trio has cost the Treasury more than $25 million." The AP continues, "The government filed a complaint Monday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids against Joyce M. Stone, Charles J. Freed and Julie Shaffer. … Stone is Freed's mother, and together they own and operate an unincorporated tax-preparation business from their home, the department said Monday. The business also is a defendant in the lawsuit." The AP adds, "The complaint alleges that the defendants prepared customers' returns claiming improper deductions, including some for fictitious or inflated charitable contributions and employee expenses. … 'The Justice Department is working vigorously to stop the preparation and filing of the false or fraudulent returns that unfairly shift the tax burden to honest American taxpayers,' Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Tax Division, said in a written statement."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass New Line-Item Veto Bill. Speaking at the swearing-in ceremony for Ed Lazear, the new chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, President Bush yesterday urged Congress to give him line-item veto powers. Bush framed the issue as part of an effort to curtail "special interest" spending, and press accounts describe the move as an attempt to take the lead in the current debate over "earmarks." The story was not covered by the network newscasts.

The Washington Post (3/7, Fletcher, 744K), for example, says Bush is "seeking to reassert his party's scuffed reputation for fiscal conservatism," and adds "at first blush, Bush's proposal is being received with bipartisan approval in Congress." House Majority Leader John A. Boehner "praised the bill," while House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, says the AP (3/6), "issued statements supporting Bush, as did several conservative lawmakers." Sen. John Kerry, "who promoted a similar approach in his presidential campaign against Bush in 2004, immediately jumped on board. 'It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto,' Kerry said."

The New York Times (3/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports "Bush's push for the line-item veto could benefit from the current scrutiny over the growing practice by lawmakers of inserting spending for pet projects into legislation -- a practice that has figured into continuing corruption scandals." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid called "the line-item veto 'old hat.'" He added, "I just think it's an effort by President Bush to divert attention from real issues this country has." However, the Washington Times (3/7, Dinan, 90K) says "the move thrilled conservative Republicans on Capitol Hill." Addressing the timing of Bush's proposal, "White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration thinks the time is ripe, given the interest on spending cuts on Capitol Hill. He said the fight against wasteful spending is bipartisan, so he predicted the line-item veto proposal would attract bipartisan support."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, Bash) reported that Bush tried to "prove that he wants to crack down on what many called frivolous spending. And what he did was he formally introduced to Congress the concept of a line-item veto, something that he said he will use to strip out pork barrel or earmarked spending tucked away in the bills that he gets." CNN added "the bottom line politically is that the White House no matter what happens really wants to get credit here for at least trying. And talking to Republican strategists, they say that this is a good first step." Reuters (3/6, Bohan) notes Bush "has never vetoed a spending bill," while the Financial Times (3/7, Swann) reports Bush's effort "to restore the veto comes at a time of growing concern about Washington's apparent inability to restrain the growth in government spending."

USA Today (3/7, 2.31M) reports President Clinton "was given line-item veto power in 1996, but the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress." The AP (3/6, Taylor) notes Bush "is now pressing for a modified, weaker version. Instead of being able to strike items from bills, he would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote. Present law permits Congress to ignore these proposed rescissions, but under the Bush proposal lawmakers would have to vote on them. If majorities in both the House and the Senate agreed with the president, the cuts would take effect."

The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Gerstenzang, Havemann, 958K) reports, "Expressing optimism that the measure would win congressional approval and pass court tests, the White House said its proposal took into account objections the Supreme Court had raised in 1998 when it ruled that a similar provision signed two years earlier by President Clinton was unconstitutional." In Congress, however, "the outcome was less certain than the White House suggested." The Times adds, "Democratic leaders in the House and the Senate objected to the plan, but it probably will benefit from the momentum building to rein in 'earmarks.'"

House Conservatives Ready "Austere" Budget. The New York Times (3/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "With Congress heading into a politically perilous budget season, influential House conservatives plan this week to propose an austere alternative spending plan that would pare more than $650 billion over five years, balance the budget and drastically shrink three cabinet agencies." The legislation is "part of a push by some Republicans to re-establish themselves as champions of fiscal restraint." House "conservative leaders would go far beyond the president's own budget proposal, illustrating the difficulty the White House and the Republican leadership have had in persuading the caucus to speak with one voice on the matter. Senior aides say the conservatives' plan would wring about $350 billion from Medicare, Medicaid and other social programs and save $300 billion partly through a major reorganization of the Education, Commerce and Energy Departments."

Meanwhile, Budget Panels Considering "Token" Spending Cuts. Roll Call (3/7, Pierce) reports in its "Roadmap" column that the House and Senate budget panels are "looking at including less than $10 billion in savings or mandatory spending cuts in their versions of the budget resolution this year." Roll Call says the move "may be more of a face-saving effort than any real attempt to reduce the deficit." The amount "being bandied around by lawmakers for possible inclusion in any fiscal 2007 spending reconciliation measure is 'more a token amount than anything else,' explained one knowledgeable former Senate Budget Committee aide."

Snow Urges Lawmakers To Pass New Debt Ceiling. Treasury Secretary John snow yesterday notified Congress that the Bush Administration has taken "all prudent and legal actions" to keep from reaching the $8.2 trillion national debt limit. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) reports that Snow, in a letter to Congressional leaders, "urged lawmakers to pass a new debt ceiling immediately to avoid the nation's first-ever default on its obligations."

DC Circuit Nominee's Conservative Credentials Could Keep Him Off Bench. The Legal Times (3/7, Schwartz) reports on "the complex politics and loyalties often just behind the scenes of the judicial nomination process" of Brett Kavanaugh, staff secretary for President George W. Bush, who is "in the midst of a bitter confirmation battle over his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit." The Times reports on "the challenge Democrats have facing off against this 41-year-old Maryland native, whose stalled nomination is expected to come before the Senate Judiciary Committee again as early as next month. … Kavanaugh's conservative credentials are etched indelibly into his résumé. In fact, he's something of the Zelig of young Republican lawyers. A protégé of independent counsel Kenneth Starr, he was a key figure in the Whitewater investigation. In the recount fight after the 2000 election, he served as a foot soldier in the legal army that descended on Florida and gave Bush his presidency. As a lawyer for Bush in the White House counsel's office, he shepherded most of the administration's contentious federal court nominees, including Miguel Estrada and Priscilla Owen. … But whether his right-wing bona fides will incite enough Democratic opposition to keep him off the bench remains an open question."

Arguing Before Supreme Court A Once-In-A-Lifetime Experience For Many. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (3/7, Palmer) reports, "When R. Jonathan Hart stepped up to the microphone before the country's nine most powerful jurists on March 1, he joined a small, eclectic club of Georgia attorneys who have argued before the U.S. Supreme Court. … The Chatham County Attorney sought to convince the high court to uphold the decision of a Savannah, Ga., federal judge, affirmed by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, that the county is immune from suit for damages arising from an accident involving a drawbridge maintained by the county. … In preparing for the argument and drafting the county's brief, Hart got the assistance of, among others, a law school professor who has argued before the high court several times. But rather than have the professor, David J. Bederman of Emory University, argue the case, Hart decided to handle the case himself. … 'You only get to do this every once in a while in your lifetime,' he said. … Unless you are someone like Miguel A. Estrada, Hart's opposing counsel last Wednesday." The Report adds, "Estrada, a former nominee to a federal appeals court, has argued at least 16 times before the high court, according to his profile on Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's Web site. Before joining Gibson, Dunn, Estrada served as an assistant to the U.S. solicitor general from 1992 to 1997. … But for many non-government attorneys, the Supreme Court is usually a one-time gig. The 80 or so cases that the Supreme Court agrees to hear each year means that the Court entertains oral argument in a handful of cases coming out of Georgia federal and state courts in a given term."

Cheney Receives "Hero's Welcome" In Florida. Vice President Dick Cheney visited southwest Florida yesterday to speak to the Collier County Republican Party's "Victory 2006" event. The Naples Daily News (3/6, Hannan) reported on its web site that Cheney "received a hero's welcome" from "an adoring crowd of about 400." The Daily News added, "The vice president's Naples speech on Monday sounded like the beginning of the campaign for the 2006 congressional elections. It included a strong defense of President George W. Bush, and a call to elect Republicans to the House and Senate."

The Ft. Myers News Press (3/7, Parker) reports that Cheney "urged party faithful to work hard for Republicans in the fall elections and pressure Congress for tax cuts." The News Press also reports, "The packed crowd at the club included numerous party leaders and elected officials, including U.S. Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fort Myers, who introduced the vice president; Florida Republican Party Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan; GOP gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist; U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Miami, whose district includes part of Collier; and U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Sarasota, and the party's leading candidate in the U.S. Senate race against Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson."

WJXX-TV Jacksonville (3/6, 5:04 p.m.) reported that Cheney also "spoke in Boca Raton on behalf of Congressman Clay Shaw who's facing re-election this year."

The Miami Herald (3/7, Reinhard, 323K) reports that Cheney helped raise about $300,000 for Shaw at a luncheon yesterday.

Cheney's Failure To Mention Harris Raises Eyebrows. The South Florida Sun Sentinel (3/7, Man) reports, "The political buzz among several of those at Vice President Dick Cheney's fund-raiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fort Lauderdale, was more about how U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' Senate campaign may be unraveling. Cheney even provided some fuel when he said he was looking forward to swearing in a Republican replacement for Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson -- but didn't mention Harris by name."

Bush Said To Be "Fixated' On Oval Office Rug. The Washington Post (3/7, A15, Baker, 744K) reports that President Bush "seems fixated" on the rug in the Oval Office. Virtually "all visitors to the Oval Office find him regaling them about how it was chosen and what it represents. Turns out, he always says, the first decision any president makes is what carpet he wants in his office. As a take-charge leader, he then explains, he of course made a command decision -- he delegated the decision to Laura Bush, who chose a yellow sunbeam design." Bush "has his own touches in the Oval Office -- some Western-themed paintings and an on-loan bust of Winston Churchill courtesy of British Prime Minister Tony Blair. But it is the rug that animates the president. … Sometimes Bush describes it as a metaphor for leadership. Sometimes he relates how Russian President Vladimir Putin admired the carpet. Sometimes he seems most taken by the lighting qualities."

Majority Lack Confidence In Bush Ability To Reform Health Care. A new Wall Street Journal/Harris Interactive poll has found that a majority of US adults lack confidence in the Bush Administration's ability to reform the US health care system. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) reports, "About three-quarters of those polled in the online survey of 2,426 US adults say they aren't confident President Bush will be able to effectively make changes such as slowing the increase in health-care costs for the US as a whole or reducing out-of-pocket health-care costs. But Americans are divided along party lines about the president's ability to improve health-care, the poll shows."

Stark Says HSAs Would Increase Healthcare Costs. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M), Rep. Pete Stark, ranking member of the House Ways and Means health Subcommittee, writes, "Health Savings Accounts would profoundly increase healthcare costs for many consumers, lead others to ration necessary care, and increase the number of uninsured. … While the richest among us can afford to deposit more than $10,000 a year in an HSA, few middle-income Americans have even $1,000 a year to spare."

Administration Set To Approve Arkansas Health Care Plan. The Bush Administration is set to approve a health insurance program proposed by the state of Arkansas to cover 80,000 uninsured low income people in the state. The New York Times (3/7, Pear, 1.19M) reports, 'Arkansas will carry out the program, to be announced on Tuesday, under a waiver allowing the state to receive federal Medicaid money for coverage that does not meet the usual Medicaid standards for eligibility and benefits. … Under the plan, to be approved by Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, the state expects to enroll at least 50,000 workers with incomes less than twice the federal poverty level and 30,000 workers with higher incomes. The poverty level this year is $9,800 for an individual, $13,200 for a couple."

Report Criticizes Investigation Of Medicare Complaints. Senate investigators have found that Medicare's process for investigating complaints about bad care is "broken" and is of "no benefit to improving overall quality" of medical care received by beneficiaries. The Washington Post (3/7, A6, Gaul, 744K) reports, "The ongoing probe by the Senate Finance Committee determined that the number of complaints investigated by Medicare appears 'disproportionately low,' Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the committee chairman, wrote in a five-page letter sent to Medicare officials Friday. Grassley called on federal officials to consider major reforms, including redesigning the program and re-bidding contracts."

Senate Takes Up Lobbying Reform Bill.

Reuters (3/7, Ferraro) reports the Senate "began consideration of legislation on Monday that would require lobbyists to disclose more about their activities and ban gifts by lobbyists to members of Congress and staff." The Senate "hopes to complete action after voting on a long list of possible amendments later this week."

The AP (3/7, Abrams) reports the measure, "which would require lobbyists to be more open about the meals they buy and the trips they arrange for members of Congress, is a response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that hit Washington with details of millions of dollars from Abramoff's clients going to win friends and buy influence on Capitol Hill." But the Senate bill, "which combines measures produced by two Senate committees last week, has already come under fire from advocacy groups and some lawmakers who say the proposed changes, the first to lobbying laws in 11 years, are mainly cosmetic." The section of the bill "prepared by the Rules Committee deals with a major source of criticism of Congress: the special projects or earmarks that lawmakers insert in larger bills, often with little or no debate."

The Hill (3/7, Allen) reports rank-and-file senators "are eyeing" the lobbying-disclosure measure "as a vehicle for a host of pet causes — issues ranging from budget-process reform to the controversial Dubai Ports World deal — as Republican and Democratic leaders try to shepherd the politically imperative bill through the chamber without turning it into a legislative Christmas tree." Conservatives, "eager to find the means to cut government spending, may try to insert the president's new line-item-veto proposal or legislation establishing biennial budgeting, according to a Senate Republican aide."

Frist Taps Lott To Shepherd Lobbyist Reform Bill. CQ (3/6, Retter) reports more than "half a dozen senators worked to have an imprint on the Senate's ethics overhaul package this year, but only one name could be at the top of the bill that backers hope will restore faith in the legislative branch." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "gave his predecessor, Trent Lott, that privilege Monday when he named the Mississippi Republican — who has a predilection for upstaging Frist — to shepherd the overhaul legislation through Congress." Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff, "said his boss selected Lott and Susan Collins, R-Maine, to take leading roles because they are the members most likely to get the bill to the finish line." CQ adds Lott also "may have helped himself secure the assignment — which carries the potential public relations boost that comes with the mantle 'reformer' — by vowing to win passage within three days."

House GOP To Include Restrictions On 527 Groups In Lobby Reform Bill. The Hill (3/7, Bolton) reports House Republican leaders "have told their Senate counterparts that legislation curtailing the activity of so-called 527 soft-money groups will be included in the House lobbying-reform bill that leaders intend for conference negotiations." The 527 group provisions "are expected to hew closely to a proposal crafted by Federal Election Commission (FEC) Chairman Michael Toner and former Commissioner Scott Thomas." Restrictions on 527 groups is "a high priority for Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. Including 527 language in the lobbying bill, however, would put Democrats in a politically difficult position."

Lawmakers' Use Of Corporate Aircraft Scrutinized. USA Today (3/7, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that for "members of Congress — its top leaders, in particular" – the use of corporate aircraft for travel is "an accepted convenience of immense value in their whirlwind schedules, worth far more than the reimbursements the rules require. They can skip security lines, ignore airline schedules and stretch out in roomy leather seats. For corporations that provide the service, it's a chance to do favors for the powerful and gain influence unavailable to those without air fleets." Public records and "internal company documents obtained by USA TODAY show that over the past four years, BellSouth has flown federal government officials on such political trips about 100 times. The internal records offer rare detail about who goes on the trips and why — information that lawmakers and companies aren't now required to reveal." Top travelers "with the regional telephone company include House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Democratic Sens. Tom Daschle of South Dakota and John Breaux of Louisiana, both now retired." Ethics reform advocates, including Sen. John McCain and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., "have called for requiring lawmakers to reimburse companies for the full cost of a charter flight when they hop aboard their jets."

Bill Would Require Disclosure Of Grassroots Groups' Negative Phone Banks. The Hill (3/7, Schor) reports that as the Senate "begins debating proposed disclosure requirements for grassroots lobbying activity, a Democratic-leaning grassroots lobbying firm is helping to hit as many as 20 House Republicans with prerecorded, in-district phone calls attacking their records on port security." The calls "are funded by American Family Voices (AFV), a nonprofit group led by Clinton administration veteran Mike Lux and allied with Lux's firm Progressive Strategies." While Lux "declined to reveal the identities of the House Republicans targeted for calls, Reps. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Bob Ney (R-Ohio) have reacted angrily to the calls taking place in their districts, charging AFV with capitalizing on the Dubai ports-management controversy for political gain." AFV and "other nonprofits engaging in grassroots lobbying soon could be forced to reveal political strategies and financial backers under an amendment attached to one of the Senate's two pending lobbying-reform bills."

Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing In Fraud Case. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A5) reports a Federal judge "refused Monday to allow a lengthy delay in the sentencing of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, even though lawyers for both sides said the move could jeopardize a federal corruption investigation involving Congress and the Bush administration." Abramoff attorney Abbe Lowell "warned that the defense would disclose information about the ongoing corruption investigation to demonstrate the level of Abramoff's cooperation, something that could affect his sentence in the fraud case." Lowell said, "We will name names. That is not a good thing for law enforcement."

Thomas Won't Seek Reelection. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, King) reported, "The influential chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee made it official, today: He's going to retire. California Congressman Bill Thomas says he won't seek a 15th term next November. Even if he ran, he'd be forced to give up the helm of the Ways and Means Committee because of Republican-imposed term limits on committee chairmen."

The Hill (3/7, O'Connor, Cusack) says "there has been speculation that Thomas could join the Bush administration next year, possibly as treasury secretary." Thomas "did not rule out the possibility of joining the administration down the road, before adding that he is 'taking it one step at a time.'" Meanwhile, the AP (3/7, Dalrymple) calls Thomas "the congressional engineer" who turned many of President Bush's "campaign promises for tax cuts, free trade and prescription drugs into reality." Yesterday, Bush called Thomas "a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader."

USA Today (3/7, Kiely, Wolf, 2.31M) notes Democrats "need to pick up an additional 15 to win a majority. So far, only a few of the seats being vacated seem likely to be competitive. … Even so, some analysts believe that Thomas' decision to step down represents a troubling trend of experienced Republicans leaving." Thomas is "one of 17 Republican and eight Democratic House members who have decided not to run for re-election this fall. Five of the Republicans are losing their powerful committee posts because of term limits imposed by the caucus. They are Thomas; Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, chairman of the Budget Committee; Henry Hyde, R-Ill., chairman of the International Relations Committee; Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, chairman of the Financial Services Committee; and Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that funds the nation's overseas operations." CQ (3/7, Ota) reports there are "eight senior House Republicans whose chairmanships end with the 2005 session under their caucus rules. So far, that prospect has helped create a glaring weakness for the GOP majority in a tough midterm election year."

The New York Times (3/7, Toner, 1.19M) reports Democrats "quickly cited Mr. Thomas's retirement as an example of Republican incumbents' 'sensing the winds of change blowing at gale force,' as Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, put it." But "whatever the national outlook, political strategists expect Mr. Thomas's district to remain Republican."

The Washington Post (3/7, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports Thomas "will leave an impressive record of legislative accomplishment," but adds his "reputation as a shrewd legislative tactician has a dark side: He has shown himself willing to bully friends and adversaries alike if his arguments do not prove persuasive." Reuters (3/7), Roll Call (3/7, Drucker, Pershing), Washington Times (3/7, Hurt, 90K) and Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M), among other sources, run similar stories on Thomas' decision.

Smart Card Project May Be Falling Behind Schedule. The Washington Post (3/7, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The government's smart-card project appears at risk of falling behind schedule. Federal agencies are supposed to begin issuing government-wide identification cards that can vouch for the identity of federal employees and most contractors in October, but the Government Accountability Office warns that setting up and testing new ID systems may not be completed within deadlines set by the Bush administration. … The administration's timetable requires agencies to start issuing cards Oct. 27 and to verify or complete background investigations on employees and contractors in 2007 and 2008. But the project has hit some snags. The original guidelines called for the cards to carry electronic representations of two fingerprints, but the GAO said agency officials have objected because reading two fingerprint images will require a large amount of computer memory."

Goodman Says Barrett Report Contains Evidence Of Clinton-Era Misdeeds. Author Mark Goodman writes in the Washington Times (3/7, 90K) that the investigation by David Barrett, the independent counsel appointed in 1995 to investigate allegations against President Clinton's Department of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Henry Cisneros "led him into bleak wilds where unnumbered Clinton misdeeds allegedly lay beneath bureaucratic camouflage. These findings comprised a full 120 pages of his 684-page report -- but you won't find them in the final document published on January 19. That's because congressional Democrats, led by Sens. Byron Dorgan, Dick Durbin and John Kerry, used an appropriations bill to leverage a deal redacting the potentially lethal 120 pages. … What evil lurks in those 120 pages that made the Democratic congressmen press so hard for redaction? My money says, a den filled with opulent thieves, in white tie and tails."

Ornstein Criticizes "Part Time" Congress. Norman Ornstein, resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute writes in the Washington Post (3/7, A17, 744K) that the 2006 House schedule, with its "total of 97 calendar days, counted generously, is the smallest number in 60 years and the days of what Harry Truman derided as that 'do-nothing 80th Congress.' … A part-time Congress in a country with a $13 trillion economy and federal budget near $3 trillion, in a globalized, technologically sophisticated world, is itself a danger to the checks and balances built into American democracy, and to high-quality, careful policymaking and oversight. It's not too much to ask Congress to commit to spending at least half the year -- 26 weeks -- working full-time, five days a week, thus providing at least a measure of the deliberation and attention to detail that are so lacking now."

NYTimes Criticizes Wade Contributions To Lawmakers. A New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) editorial says Mitchell Wade, the contractor who bribed former Rep. Duke Cunningham, "admitted he had made illegal campaign donations to two lawmakers while pressing them to earmark more defense appropriations." Rep. Virgil Goode Jr.

"received $46,000 in illegal donations while successfully earmarking $9 million in taxpayer money as Mr. Wade talked of more jobs for the lawmaker's district. The other, Katherine Harris, the Florida Republican, received $32,000 of Wade money, illegally disguised as smaller contributions from Wade employees. … So goes licit political business these days in Washington. The prosecutor, Kenneth Wainstein, noted that Mr. Wade's company had been perceived as a classic 'American success story'…but was actually a model for spreading political corruption from Capitol Hill to the Pentagon."

WPost Says Congress Should Address Lawmakers' Involvement With Charities. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/7, A16, 744K) says, "Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum created his charity, 'Operation Good Neighbor,' when the Republican National Convention was going to Philadelphia in 2000." In the years since its creation the charity "appears to have done a lot to help his political allies -- and less than it might have in its stated mission of combating poverty, teen pregnancy and other social ills. … The Santorum story highlights a largely unexplored area of congressional ethics: lawmakers' involvement with charitable organizations." The Post adds, "There is an inevitable element of extortion whenever politicians get involved in soliciting charitable donations. And when lawmakers have a personal interest in the charity, the opportunities for abuse are greatly magnified."

Judge Criticized For Backing Unions In Pentagon Personnel Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) says in an editorial that to "protect the Republic today, the executive branch must first comply with something James Madison never imagined -- union work rules." Federal Judge Emmet Sullivan last week "sided with union plaintiffs and tossed out the Pentagon's new personnel system, which the Defense Secretary and White House say they need to safeguard the nation. His decision comes after federal Judge Rosemary Collyer threw out a similar personnel system at the Department of Homeland Security in August. (That case is under appeal.)" The "danger here is that the collective bargaining rights of 650,000 civilian workers will trump the collective right we all have to a military organized to confront 21st-century threats."

January Factory Orders Post Largest Drop In Over Five Years. The Commerce Department yesterday reported that new orders for manufactured goods in January fell 4.5% from the previous month, its steepest decline in more than five years. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Gerena-Morales, 2.11M) reports that the drop "reflected a 31% decline in orders for transportation products and equipment, such as autos and airplanes. … Overall orders for durable goods, including electronic equipment, were off 9.9%, also the sharpest decline since July 2000."

Stocks Decline In Monday Trading. Stocks closed down Monday after an increase in Treasury yields "raised concerns about the health of corporate profits, housing and the stability of stock prices," the Wall Street Journal (3/7, Patterson, 2.11M) reports. The Dow Jones Industrial Average finished down by 63 points to 10958.59. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index declined 8.97 to 1278.26 and the Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 16.57 to 2286.03.

DeLay To Spend Primary Night At Fundraiser Hosted By Lobbyists. USA Today/AP (3/7) reports, "Rep. Tom DeLay, whose association with lobbyist Jack Abramoff has left him politically vulnerable, is spending Texas' primary night tonight at a Washington fundraiser hosted by two lobbyists." DeLay "has three opponents in the Republican primary and could face a serious challenge in the general election after leaving his job as House majority leader amid campaign finance scandals." The fundraiser "is being held by lobbyists Bill Paxon and Susan Molinari, both former members of Congress from New York. The event will raise money for DeLay's re-election campaign." DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty "said DeLay would be in Washington for votes and has other events on his schedule including the fundraiser. She said he was unavailable for an interview."

DeLay Expected To Win Primary. Roll Call (3/7, Drucker) reports DeLay "is expected to beat the three challengers opposing him in the Republican primary, but the extent to which he can avoid a runoff by securing more than 50 percent of the vote in the suburban Houston 22nd district -- and by how much, if he does -- could be telling for Democrats," who "hope to ride their 'Culture of Corruption' slogan to a House takeover in November." The Washington

Times (3/7, Aynesworth, 90K) also says DeLay "is expected to defeat his three Republican opponents in the primary, setting up what political observers predict will be a tough general election race in November."

DeLay Makes Major Fundraising Push. The Hill (3/7, O'Connor) reports DeLay "is urging members of the National Rifle Association (NRA) and supporters of Texas Right to Life to dig deep into their pockets to help him retain his seat this year. The outreach is part of a broad direct-mail and telemarketing campaign to attract new donors and volunteers for the former majority leader's reelection." It also "marks a fundraising shift for DeLay this election cycle from a PAC-heavy strategy in which the once-powerful Republican doled out lobbyist dollars to his congressional colleagues to one in which DeLay and his team are primarily focused on his own reelection bid." The outreach "has three aims, said Shannon Flaherty, a spokeswoman for the campaign: get information directly to voters in the district, ask those voters to volunteer or donate money to the campaign and continue building a database of local and national supporters to contact between now and the November election."

Anti-DeLay Film Will Be Distributed This Spring. The New York Times (3/7, Halbfinger, 1.19M) reports, "A documentary about the Texas criminal investigation that led to the indictment of...DeLay...on campaign fund-raising charges is being put to use by Mr. DeLay's political opponents in an attempt to unseat him." The film, "The Big Buy: How Tom DeLay Stole Congress," will be "distributed this spring by the Hollywood producer and liberal provocateur Robert Greenwald, whose last release was a scathing attack on Wal-Mart sponsored by a variety of labor unions and other groups critical of the retailing giant." The Times adds, "A host of liberal organizations in Texas and nationwide, including People for the American Way, Democracy for America and the Pacifica radio station in Houston, are expected to sponsor the film's release."

Two Democrats Set To Square Off In Tuesday's Texas Gubernatorial Primary. The AP (3/7, Shannon) reports, "Two Democrats with long resumes but little name recognition are competing in Texas' gubernatorial primary election Tuesday for the chance to challenge popular GOP Gov. Rick Perry." Ex-Congressman Chris Bell (D) will face former Texas Supreme Court Justice Bob Gammage. Bell "gained notice as a freshman congressman for filing the first House ethics complaint against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He made the complaint shortly after the Texas redistricting engineered by DeLay caused Bell to lose his re-election bid." Gammage "once represented the same suburban Houston district in Congress now served by DeLay.

NRSC Chair Says GOP Faces Challenging Climate. The Hill (3/7, Savodnik) reports, "Senate Republicans face a stormy 'atmosphere' but will 'retain a strong Republican majority' in November, says Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.), the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC)." In an hour-long interview with The Hill, Dole "repeatedly noted that despite the political climate -- made worse by White House communications flops and GOP scandals -- Republican challengers are mounting viable bids in Michigan, West Virginia and elsewhere." But "she acknowledged that President Bush could have done a better job handling the Dubai ports deal, which has given Democrats an opportunity to look tougher on terrorism than Republicans, and that the president's poll numbers are less than optimal."

Democratic Effort To Deliver Unified Message Seen As Faltering. The Washington Post (3/7, A1, Murray, Babington, 744K) reports Democratic leaders had "set a goal of issuing their legislative manifesto by November 2005 to give voters a full year to digest their proposals. But some Democrats protested that the release date was too early, so they put it off until January. The new date slipped twice again, and now House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) says the document will be unveiled in 'a matter of weeks.'" The "failure of congressional leaders to deliver a clear message has left some Democratic governors deeply frustrated and at odds with Washington Democrats over strategy." There is "no agreement on whether to try to nationalize the congressional campaign with a blueprint or 'contract' with voters, as the Republicans did successfully in 1994, or to keep the races more local in tone. And the party is still divided over the war in Iraq."

Poll Finds Public Losing Faith In Democrats. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 3, 1:45, Stephanopoulos) reported the public is "going in the wrong direction, for Democrats. Back in January, you asked, 'Who do you trust to handle the nation's problems?' Americans said Democrats, 51% to 37. Today, that's down to 42% to 40%. And you know, that goes back to Iraq, too. They don't think Democrats have an answer to Iraq. They're sour on both parties."

Democrats' First Failure Seen In Not Justifying Opposition To Bush. In his Washington Post column (3/7, A17), E.J. Dionne says the Democrats' "real problem" in taking control of Congress "is that they have failed to show how their critique of the Republican status quo is the essential first step toward the alternative program they will owe the voters in the presidential year of 2008." This "failure has made it easier for Republicans to cast anti-Bush feeling (aka, 'Bush hatred') as a psychological disorder. The GOP shrewdly makes the president's critics look crazed and suggests that opposition to Bush is of no more significance than, say, the loathing that many watchers of 'American Idol' love to express toward Simon Cowell, the meanest of the show's judges." Bush's "critics need to identify precisely why they oppose him, not only so they can make clear that they are not psycho basket cases but also to convey the idea that they know what needs to be put right."

Clinton Suggests Recent GOP Criticism May Be Gender-Based. The AP (2/7, Fouhy) reports, "Responding to Republican claims that she may be too angry to win national office, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton told an audience Monday to wear such criticism as 'a badge of honor' and suggested that gender played a role in the attacks. Democrats, particularly Democratic woman, who run for public office are 'going to draw some unfriendly fire,' Clinton said at a breakfast fundraiser hosted by black and Hispanic women supporters. 'People will be attacking you instead of your ideas, they may impugn your patriotism, they may even say you're angry.' 'If they do that, wear it as a badge of honor, because you know what? There are lots of things that we should be angry and outraged about these days,' she said." The AP notes, "Until now, Clinton had not said she considered the criticisms gender-based, although many observers have done so."

Former Pentagon Spokeswoman Announces Challenge To Clinton. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, King) reported, "In New York State, a Republican announced today she's running for Democrat Hillary Clinton's senate seat. Kathleen McFarland is a former Pentagon spokeswoman under President Reagan. She's seeking the GOP nomination for the Senate after two other contenders opted out. Polls show Senator Clinton so far is well ahead of her potential Republican challengers."

The AP (3/7, Humbert) notes that McFarland's move "could put her into a September primary against former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, already endorsed by top state Conservative Party leaders. No Republican has won statewide office in New York without Conservative Party support since 1974. … 'I don't know what this woman is thinking, I really don't,' Spencer said Monday, arguing that McFarland's candidacy would be 'divisive [and] I guess helpful to Clinton.' 'I'm the only one who can unite the Republican and Conservative parties, which I am doing,' he added." McFarland "refused to address Spencer's criticisms, but said she would 'go after every party.'"

Roll Call (3/7, Kurtz) adds that McFarland "had been gearing up to challenge Rep. Carolyn Maloney (D) but changed her focus after no 'big name' Republican decided to challenge" Clinton. Spencer campaign manager Christian Winthrop "called McFarland's entry into the race 'too liberal, too late.' But it wasn't too late for McFarland to receive some national publicity: She was a guest on Chris Matthews' 'Hardball' on Monday night."

Pataki Leaves Hospital 18 Days After Suffering Burst Appendix. The AP (3/7, Goldman) reports that New York Gov. George Pataki (R) "was released from a hospital Monday after 18 days of treatment for appendicitis and complications that followed surgery. … 'I'm not 100 percent but I'm a lot better than I was a few days ago,' he said." Pataki "was hospitalized in Westchester County on Feb. 16 and had his appendix removed. He was transferred to" a "Manhattan hospital on Feb. 21 and was operated on later that day to deal with a blockage of his intestine." The New York Times (3/7, Pérez-Peña, 1.19M) notes that Pataki "will have to rest at his home…for at least a week, with care from a visiting nurse, his doctors said."

Poll Shows Giuliani "Most Popular Person In National Politics." The AP (3/7) reports that ex-New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani (R) "is the most popular person in national politics, according to a national poll released Monday by Quinnipiac University." Giuliani "edged out U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The Quinnipiac poll asked voters to rate politicians on a scale of 0 to 100, with higher numbers representing more favorable opinions. Giuliani's mean score was 63.5, according to the poll. Obama averaged 59.9, McCain 59.7 and Rice 57.1."

DOJ_NMG_0016177

President Bush's "average rating was 44.1 and Vice President Dick Cheney's was 41." Four potential '08 Democratic presidential hopefuls "were also mentioned in the poll's top 10: Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards received a 50.8 average, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner scored 50.7, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton averaged 50.4 and Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin scored 49. The telephone poll of 1,892 registered voters nationwide was conducted February 21-28 and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 2.3 percentage points."

The New York Post (3/7, Orin, 624K) notes that Quinnipiac's assistant polling director Peter Brown said, "Giuliani's ratings are uniform in all states. [He] is seen as the mayor of New York [during 9/11], and being a strong leader is the single strongest characteristic desired by voters in a presidential election."

Comcast Hiring Prominent Maryland Public Officials. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/7, A1, Mosk, Rich, 744K) reports that Comcast Cable Communications, Maryland's dominant cable provider, "has repeatedly given work to prominent public officials, their relatives or their friends. Those hired by Comcast and its affiliates have included two members of the University System of Maryland Board of Regents, two sons of a key General Assembly committee chairman and former county executives from Prince George's and Harford counties. … None of these politically connected workers has been accused of wrongdoing, and those who could be reached said they were hired on merit."

Sheehan Arrested In Protest Outside UN Headquarters. Antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan was arrested with three other protesters after a rally with Iraqi women outside UN headquarters in New York. Reuters (3/7) reports, "About 20 protesters went to the U.S. mission to the United Nations to deliver a petition with 60,000 signatures seeking an end to the war. Nobody from the mission received them so Sheehan and three other American women sat down in front of the building, refused to leave, and were arrested."

Unlike US, IAEA Chief Optimistic On Iran Deal. The New York Times (3/7, Hauser, 1.19M) reports, "The director of the International Atomic Energy Agency...said today that he hoped an agreement could be reached with Iran on its nuclear program." IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei is quoted as saying, "I am still very much hopeful that in the next week or so, an agreement could be reached." In its coverage, the AP (3/7, Jahn) reports, "ElBaradei's optimism was believed to be linked to a confidential Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich some uranium domestically, diplomats said. But the plan was expected to meet strong resistance from the US, which opposes any enrichment on Iranian soil." In a separate story, the AP (3/7, Schweid) reports, "Unless Iran executes a dramatic about-face and suspends all its nuclear activities, the UN Security Council will intervene 'quite actively,'" Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said. "The message to Iran is that it has 'crossed the international red line' and engaged in unacceptable enrichment activity 'and there must be a UN Security Council process to deal with that.'" Reuters (3/7, Heinrich, Hafezi) runs a similar report.

The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Crawford, Cullison, 2.11M) reports ElBaradei's statement "is at odds with US determination to refer Iran swiftly to the Security Council, with U.S. and EU officials citing inspectors' evidence that Iran's program includes elements that would only be aimed toward producing weapons, not energy." The Journal also reports, "Yesterday, diplomats were debating the possibility of letting Iran continue to experiment with enrichment in 20 centrifuges. Diplomats close to the IAEA say that Iran would likely do those experiments anyway if there is no compromise but noted an agreement would allow the return of IAEA inspectors."

Russia-West Rift Emerges. The New York Times (3/7, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "A serious rift emerged Monday when Russia split with the United States and Europe over Iran's nuclear program after the Russians floated a last-minute proposal to allow Iran to make small quantities of nuclear fuel, according to European officials. The reports of the proposal prompted" Secretary Rice to telephone ElBaradei to, "according to an administration official who was briefed on the conversation," say "'the United States cannot support this.'" According to the Times, "American officials said they had been assured by the Russians that there was no formal proposal on the table." In its coverage, the Financial Times (3/7, Dombey) said Russia "is seeking to convince the US and the European Union to allow Iran to continue limited uranium enrichment, the process that can create weapons grade material. But the idea has already been rejected by the US and the EU's big powers, and western diplomats said it could disrupt the uneasy common front on Iran between the five permanent members of the" UNSC.

Iran Stepping Up Development Of Shahab Missiles. Reuters (3/7, Charbonneau) reports, "As Iran pursues a nuclear program the West fears is aimed at producing bombs, Tehran also appears to be stepping up development of missiles capable of carrying atomic warheads, diplomats citing intelligence say. According to an intelligence report given to Reuters by a non-U.S. diplomat, a covert Iranian program run by people closely linked to Iran's military includes plans to arm its Shahab-3 missiles, which experts believe have a maximum range of around 2,000 km (1,240 miles), with nuclear warheads." The report, "which could not be independently confirmed, surfaced as the United States and its allies seek to highlight the potential security dangers of a nuclear-armed Iran."

Lead US Negotiator Defends US-India Nuclear Deal. The Washington Times (3/7, Sands, 90K) reports, "The proposed US-India nuclear deal will not open the door for Iran and other rogue states to acquire atomic weapons and technology, the Bush administration's lead negotiator insisted yesterday." Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said at the Heritage Foundation, "We don't see the connection between what Iran is doing and what India seeks to do." The Administration "has begun selling the India deal in earnest on Capitol Hill, where several top lawmakers are either cool to the accord or openly skeptical." Burns "rejected critics' assertions that bending the rules for India -- which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) -- will make it more difficult to rally opposition against Tehran."

Cohen Defends Deal. Under the headline "Judicious Double Standards," columnist Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (3/7, A17, 744K) that some are complaining Bush "has done something truly awful -- established a double standard. Well, duh -- yes. India is our friend and Iran, just to pick an example, is not. The cry of 'double standard' is a bit silly. … Reality imposes its own rules -- and they have nothing to do with double standards."

NYTimes Says Bush "Should Have Just Stayed Home." In a stinging editorial, the New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) bemoans President Bush's recently completed trip to Pakistan and India, claiming the visits "have done some real harm. The spectacularly misconceived trip may have inflicted serious damage to American goals in two vital areas," promoting nuclear nonproliferation and Pakistani anti-extremist efforts. "The nuclear deal that Mr. Bush concluded with India threatens to blast a bomb-size loophole through the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty," but "the most immediate damage was done on Mr. Bush's next stop, Pakistan. ... Sticking Mr. Musharraf with the unwelcome task of explaining to Pakistanis why" the US agreed to nuclear cooperation with "Pakistan's archrival, India, while withholding them from Pakistan left him less likely to do Washington any special, and politically unpopular, favors on the terrorism front. It's just baffling why Mr. Bush traveled halfway around the world to stand right next to one of his most important allies against terrorists — and embarrass him." The Times concludes, "Mr. Bush should have just stayed home."

Turkey To Press Ahead With Nuclear Plant Construction. The Washington Post (3/7, A14, Vick, 744K) reports, "Turkey is reviving its long-deferred quest for nuclear power, pressed both by serious energy shortfalls within its own borders and by strident nuclear ambitions in neighboring Iran that threaten to upset a regional balance of power." The Post adds that Energy Minister Hilmi Guler, in announcing the initiative to build as many as five nuclear plants, cited rising oil prices and his country's "need for multiple sources of energy make our need for nuclear energy an utmost priority," and notes that "Guler, who made his remarks while visiting a nuclear plant in Virginia, said the new Turkish reactors could provide about a tenth of the 54,000 megawatts the country expects to need over the next two decades." The Post adds that Iran's nuclear ambitions also factor into Turkey's decision to revive its nuclear "program, which has had numerous false starts since the early 1960s."

Hamas Revokes Some Powers From Abbas. Reuters (3/7) reports, "Hamas legislators voted on Monday to revoke all decisions made by the previous Palestinian parliament at its final session last month, including laws that gave President Mahmoud Abbas wider powers to appoint some judges." Senior Abbas aide Tayeb Abdel-Rahim "accused Hamas of attempting to oust the Palestinian president. 'We see this as a coup attempt to change the regime and they (Hamas) have to seriously reconsider their decisions.'" In its coverage, the New York Times (3/7, Myre, 1.19M) notes, "Shortly after the session began, it degenerated into shouting matches between the rival Hamas and Fatah factions, with Fatah legislators ultimately storming out." The Washington Post (3/7, A14, Wilson, 744K) quotes Fatah legislator and negotiator Saeb Erekat as saying the Hamas move was "absolutely unconstitutional," and that Fatah would appeal to the Palestinian High Court on Tuesday to overturn the vote. The Washington Times/AP (3/7, Barzak) and Los Angeles Times (3/7, King, 958K) run similar stories.

Mofaz Says Haniyeh Is Possible Target. The AP (3/7) reports Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz told Army Radio Tuesday that incoming Palestinian PM Ismail Haniyeh "will not be immune from pinpointed Israeli killings if the Islamic militant group were to resume its attacks on Israel."

North Korean To Hear US Counterfeiting Complaints Today. Ahead of today's briefing of senior North Korean diplomat Ri Gun by US Treasury Department officials in New York, Reuters (3/6, Eckert) reported Department spokesman Tom Casey "took pains to separate the technical explanation of the financial penalties from efforts to get North Korea to rejoin nuclear talks with the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea." Reuters reported Casey said that "North Korea should return to six-country nuclear talks regardless of the outcome of discussions on the U.S. financial crackdown on Pyongyang over money laundering." Ri's trip to New York "has raised hopes that the North may be poised to return to" the talks.

Free Trade Talks To Begin In June. A separate Reuters (3/6, Kim) piece reported Washington and Seoul agreed yesterday "to start a formal round of free trade talks in June, dealing a blow to farmers and unionists demonstrating against the plans." Automobiles, rice and services are expected to be key areas of initial disagreement.

South American Border Region Seen As Haven For Smugglers. The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 9, 4:30, Regan) reported, "Deep in South America, just miles from the beauty of Brazil's Iguaçu Falls is one of the most lawless places in the world. The Tri-border area where three countries, Paraguay, Argentina and Brazil, meet it is a smuggler's paradise, home to the largest illicit economy in the Western Hemisphere. Trafficking in everything from drugs to arms to counterfeit goods is a 24/7 unchecked operation." Illegal trade "here is costing American companies hundreds of millions of dollars each year. Almost all the activity takes place on the Paraguayan side of the border in the Wild West jungle town of Ciudad Dalleste. What is unusual is that most of the trade is run by members of a large and influential Middle Eastern population, many of whom immigrated to the area from Lebanon and Syria in the 1970s. Some are making huge sums off illicit trade and western authorities believe they're sending money to terror groups in the Middle East." Sources "in the State Department tell CBS News that at one point there were seven terrorist training camps in the Tri-border region. And they have no doubt the area is still a safe haven for terrorists."

OPEC Unlikely To Cut Output. The New York Times (3/7, Mouawad, 1.19M) reports, "Strange as it may seem, some OPEC oil ministers are feeling sorry for themselves. For the last three months, a few of OPEC's top representatives have argued that their oil-producing cartel, which pumps nearly 4 of every 10 barrels of oil produced around the world, needs to trim output to avert a potential oil glut and a -- highly hypothetical -- price collapse." The Times adds, "The current argument for cutting output first came up when the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries met in December in Kuwait. It resurfaced at a meeting in Vienna the following month and it is likely to top the agenda this week when the group meets here again to consider its production levels." It "almost certainly will not happen. For one thing, Saudi Arabia…is opposed."

The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) reports, "Saudi Arabia's oil minister was reported as saying the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries shouldn't trim oil output at this week's meeting." In an interview "with pan-Arab daily newspaper Al Hayat, published Monday," Ali Naimi also said "fears stemming from threats to oil supplies were the main factor behind prices of more than $60 a barrel."

China Seen As Exercising Restraint In Dealings With Taiwan. USA Today (3/7, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "Not so long ago, China would have been lobbing missiles across the Taiwan Strait, mobilizing troops and issuing bloodcurdling threats in response to any Taiwanese move toward independence. Times have changed: The mainland calculates that restraint, not retaliation, is the best response to Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian's provocative decision to scrap a neglected but symbolically important council dedicated to the reunification of China and Taiwan." USA Today adds, "Despite its conciliatory approach to the Taiwanese public, China passed an anti-secession law last year. That created a legal basis for attacking if the island declares independence. The mainland still has more than 700 missiles pointed at Taiwan."

WTO Rules Against Mexico In Soft-Drink Dispute. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/7) reports, "The World Trade Organization ruled that Mexico violated global trade rules in a soft-drink dispute with the US." A WTO panel "rejected a Mexican appeal, supporting US claims that Mexico was in breach of international law in imposing a 20% tax on drinks that are sweetened with anything other than cane sugar grown in Mexico."

Russia Reasserts Influence Over Former Soviet States. The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Weir, 61K) reports elections in Belarus and Ukraine approach "amid dramatic accusations of planned coups, state coercion, and vote-fixing," but "Moscow isn't worried. Instead, there is a sense of calm and fresh confidence here that contrasts sharply with the Kremlin's panicky reactions to the surge of 'colored revolts' that swept through the region in recent years. … But the inability of new leaders to fulfill revolutionary pledges, together with the failure of popular pressure to effect change in other Soviet satellite states, has opened the way for Moscow to reassert its influence in the region."

Russia Approves Pipeline Plan Over Environmentalists' Objections. The New York Times (3/7, Chivers, 1.19M) reports the Russian government has approved a proposal by Transneft, the state-owned pipeline monopoly to build an oil pipeline "that would pass along the shoreline of Lake Baikal, the world's most voluminous fresh-water lake," despite "objections from scientists and environmental groups." The Washington Post (3/7, A14, Finn, 744K) reports, "The decision followed a review process that environmentalists and some Russian experts involved in assessing the route say was marked by manipulation of an expert panel and political pressure on dissenting scientists. … Greenpeace and other opponents of the project said they recognized the need for a pipeline and objected only to the route."

Serb War Criminal Assisting Prosecutors Commits Suicide. The New York Times (3/7, Simons, 1.19M) reports Milan Babic, "a wartime Serbian leader who was closely cooperating with prosecutors, committed suicide in a prison cell of the war crimes tribunal in The Hague, the court said Monday." Babic "was found dead in his cell on Sunday evening, the court said in a statement. A senior court official said he had hanged himself, but the court spokeswoman would not confirm that."

Kristoff Pleads With Bush To Stop Darfur Genocide. In his column for the New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) Nicholas Kristoff writes, "For more than two years, the world has pretty much ignored the genocide unfolding in the Darfur region of Sudan, just as it turned away from the slaughter of Armenians, Jews, Cambodians and Rwandans in earlier decades. And now, apparently encouraged by the world's acquiescence, Sudan is sending its proxy forces to invade neighboring Chad and kill and rape members of the same African tribes that have already been ethnically cleansed in Darfur itself. … In the last few weeks, President Bush has shown an increased willingness to address the slaughter in Darfur. He should now encourage the French to use their forces to defend Chad from proxy invasions, make a presidential speech to spotlight the issue, attend a donor conference for Darfur, encourage the use of a NATO bridging force until U.N. peacekeepers can arrive, enforce a no-fly zone and open a new initiative for peace talks among the sheiks of Darfur."

Wickham Criticizes Administration Policy On Issuing Visas To Cubans. USA Today (3/7, 2.31M) columnist DeWayne Wickham criticizes the fact that though he Bush Administration "refuses" to grant visas to Cuban academics seeking to attend a conference in Puerto Rico, the Cuban national baseball team was granted visas to play in the World Baseball Classic being held in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Specter May Recall Gonzales For More NSA Surveillance Testimony. The AP (3/7, Shrader) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' written answers to questions about the Bush administration's eavesdropping program may require him to testify a second time before the Senate Judiciary Committee, the panel's Republican chairman said Monday. … 'There is a suggestion in his letter there are other classified intelligence programs that are currently under way,' Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., told reporters." The AP continues, "The comments from the moderate Republican come as the Bush administration is trying to quell criticism of its surveillance operations and work with the Senate on legislation that would write the program into law." The AP adds, "In a letter to Specter last week, Gonzales clarified his testimony in a half dozen areas covered in a daylong Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Feb. 6. … Gonzales said his answers were focused only on President Bush's program granting intelligence officers the power to monitor - without court approval - the international calls and e-mails of U.S. residents, when those officers suspect terrorism may be involved. … 'In all of my testimony at the hearing I addressed - with limited exceptions - only the legal underpinnings of the Terrorist Surveillance Program,' Gonzales wrote. 'I did not and could not address operational aspects of the program or any other classified intelligence activities.' … The Justice Department has not received a formal request to testify, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. 'As a matter of practice, officials from the department do not discuss, confirm or deny the existence or nonexistence of any classified intelligence programs in public settings,' he added."

GOP Seeks To Limit Scope Of Probe Into NSA Surveillance Program. Key congressional Republicans are seeking to head off oversight investigation into President Bush's use of the National Security Agency to conduct domestic intelligence gathering, and at the same time establish a statutory foundation for the program. Knight Ridder (3/7, Kuhnhenn) reports the congressional Republicans are "trying to limit the scope of any investigation into" the NSA program, and "some key lawmakers are also working to legalize such spying on U.S. citizens in the future, perhaps with some judicial restrictions." The "dual-track effort is designed to protect the Bush administration from an all-out congressional inquiry into the secret program, while rejecting Bush's argument that he already has full legal authority to order such surveillance."

Penalty Phase Of Moussaoui Trial Begins. The penalty phase of admitted al Qaeda co-conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui got underway Monday with opening arguments from the prosecution and defense. Assistant US Attorney Robert Spencer urged the jurors to sentence Moussaoui to death, saying he concealed information about the 9/11 plot thereby enabling the attacks to succeed. However, Moussaoui's court-appointed defense lawyer, Edward J. MacMahon, said there was no evidence to support the prosecution's contention that Moussaoui's cooperation could have prevented the attacks.

The story was covered by each of the networks in full segments, and CBS ran a second story on the 9/11 family members who are following the trial. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 4, 2:35, Thomas) reported that legal scholars "say the defense faces an uphill battle." Prof. Jonathan Turley, George Washington University Law School: "For Zacarias Moussaoui, this is the wrong crime, in the wrong place with the wrong jury. He's going to be tried in the shadow of the Pentagon by a jury in one of the most conservative districts in the country." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 3, 2:40, Stewart) noted that this "was the first time the government has argued that Moussaoui's silence was as much to blame for what happened that day as any of the dead 19 hijackers."

NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 3, 2:10, P. Williams) reported, "Moussaoui's lawyers said he knew none of the details of the 9/11 plan, not even the hijackers' names. They say he was shunned by al Qaeda members overseas, described by one as 'cuckoo in the head.'" MacMahon "said the death penalty would give Moussaoui martyrdom."

The New York Times (3/7, Lewis, 1.19M) reports Spencer said, "He killed the 9/11 victims as surely as if he had been at the controls in one of those airplanes." But MacMahon cited the 9/11 commission's conclusion that "the government had several indications of Al Qaeda's plans before that day" and contended that "there is no reason to believe that the authorities would have acted quickly on" information from Moussaoui "any more than they acted on other leads."

The Washington Post (3/7, A3, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) adds, "Prosecutors did not address the controversy over the failure to search Moussaoui's belongings before Sept. 11," saying only that "if Moussaoui had revealed all he knew…the belongings would have been searched in time." But MacMahon told jurors that "the real Moussaoui…was a bumbler who couldn't even fly a single-engine plane, a man so inconsequential that even his terrorist overseers dismissed him."

DOJ_NMG_0016189

The AP (3/7, Sniffen) notes MacMahon "played videotapes of then-Attorney General John Ashcroft describing how the FBI and CIA didn't share information before the attacks, and of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying any way to prevent Sept. 11 would have had to have been in place years earlier."

USA Today (3/7, 6A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "In pleading guilty, Moussaoui acknowledged he was aware of a planned attack against the United States but said he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot. He told authorities he was part of a separate plan to fly a plane into the White House sometime after Sept. 11."

Victims' Relatives Watch Trial Over Closed-Circuit Television. The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 4, 2:20, Schieffer) reported, "The trial is not open to broadcast media cameras but is being televised by closed circuit to five Federal courthouses around the country where the families of the 9/11 victims are being allowed to watch. But while some family members wanted to watch, others did not." The AP (3/7, Caruso) notes that in New York, some brought "photographs or buttons with images of their loved ones," and many "held scarves or other items emblazoned with the American flag."

Victim's Daughter Opposes Imposition Of Death Penalty. In a USA Today (3/7, 2.31M) op-ed, Families of September 11 co-founder Carie Lemack – whose mother was killed in the attacks – writes that she wants to see Moussaoui imprisoned for life. "I do not want to give him the dignity of a planned execution, time to say his goodbyes, eat his last meal. His comrades did not give that to my mother. Let him sit in a cold, dirty cell alone for the rest of his long days, unable to direct his rants at anyone."

AP Seeks FOIA Access To Lindh's Petitions For Sentence Reduction. The AP (3/7, Sherman) reports, "The Associated Press sued the Justice Department on Monday for access to American-born Taliban soldier John Walker Lindh's petitions to have his 20-year federal prison sentence shortened." The AP continues, "The federal Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in New York, said the government has improperly refused to turn over Lindh's pleas to have his sentence reduced on the grounds that doing so would be an unwarranted invasion of his privacy. … AP's lawyers, in letters to the Justice Department and the lawsuit, however, said Lindh 'is a 'high-profile public figure' whose 'privacy interest in his petition is low to nonexistent.'" The AP adds, "Lindh's lawyer, James Brosnahan, also has told the news cooperative that he would have turned over the documents himself, but he can't under the terms of Lindh's imprisonment."

New York Imam Works To Bring Together Muslim Singles. In the third story of its special report "An Imam in America," The New York Times (3/7, A1, Elliot, 1.19M) again reports on Brooklyn imam Sheik Reda Shata, focusing today on his work counseling American Muslim singles about dating and marriage. The Times notes, "Whether issuing American-inspired fatwas or counseling the homesick, fielding questions from the F.B.I. or mediating neighborhood spats, Mr. Shata walks an endless labyrinth of problems. If anything seems conquerable, it is the solitude of Muslim singles. … It is his way of fashioning a future for his faith. It is his most heartfelt effort…to make Islam work in America."

PATRIOT ACT:

House Expected To Pass Patriot Act Renewal Today. The Washington Post (3/7, A15, Weisman, Birnbaum, 744K) reports, "For a legislative fight that has stretched on for months, pitting the House against the Senate and the White House against members of the president's party, the battle to renew the USA Patriot Act will likely end very quietly this week." The House votes today, and "Republican leaders are so confident in its passage that they have scheduled the vote on the fast-track 'suspension calendar,' where approval takes the vote of two-thirds of the House."

Patriot Act Provision Would Crack Down On Meth Production. The AP (3/6, Kellman) reports, "Suffer from springtime allergies? You could be among the first affected by the USA Patriot Act poised for final congressional passage this week." The AP continues, "Besides terrorism, the bill takes aim at the production of methamphetamine, a highly addictive drug that cannot be manufactured without a key ingredient of everyday cold and allergy medicines. The bill would impose new limits next month for how much relief a person can buy over the counter. … And beginning Sept. 30, it'll take a flash of ID to buy that medication." The AP adds, "The legislation sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. and Jim Talent, R-Mo., would blanket the nation with one policy that would put medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter and out of the reach of meth cooks. … Rather than wait for localities to stitch together a patchwork of anti meth policies, the provision of the Patriot Act would leave meth producers nowhere to run but out of the country. It takes aim at the meth trade's weakest point — the supply of pseudoephedrine. … Beginning 30 days after President Bush signs the law, expected sometime this week, purchase limits go into effect. One person would be limited to buying 300, 30-mg pills in a month or 120 such pills in a day. The measure would make an exception for 'single-use' sales — individually packaged pseudoephedrine products."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says Dubai World Ports Deal Would Enhance Port Security. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Block, 2.11M) reports Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said the "proposed takeover of terminal operations at five U.S. ports by a Dubai company would give U.S. law enforcement a better handle on security at U.S. terminal operations." But Chertoff "warned" that the "unprecedented access that the Department of Homeland Security and other federal agencies would have to monitor the United Arab Emirates shipping company's personnel and business records would 'evaporate' if Congress stopped the deal from proceeding." Chertoff's "statements to a group of Wall Street Journal reporters marked the first time that he has said that Homeland Security had something to lose if the deal fell through."

70% Oppose Dubai Ports Deal. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 3, 1:45, Vargas) reported, "The President's aggressive defense of the ports deal has not only proved ineffective, but it's kind of backfiring against foreign management of any kind involved in the ports." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "You now have about 70% of the country against this Dubai ports deal. But 70% of them are against any foreign management of the ports. This whole story has taught people something they didn't know, that foreigners manage many of our ports. And they don't like it one bit."

Collins Plans Vote On Port Security Bill For April. The Washington Times (3/7, Fagan, 90K) reports Senate Homeland Security Chairman Susan Collins "said her committee will vote next month on legislation to improve America's port security and thinks the concern over a Dubai company running some U.S. port operations may give the bill new momentum." Collins plans to move the "ports security bill she wrote last year with Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat. The two are also working with House Homeland Security Chairman Peter T. King, New York Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat, on a similar House bill." The measure would "authorize $835 million each year for five years to improve current port security programs. It would create an office of cargo security policy, and set new requirements for examination of all inbound cargo."

Reuters (3/7, Cowan) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman, ranking Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, said the Bush Administration's "plan for securing America's ports is inadequate and funding should be nearly double the White House's budget request for next year." Lieberman "called for spending more than $1 billion on port security in fiscal 2007. In remarks to reporters, Lieberman noted that the Bush administration budget only calls for $551 million for port security in the fiscal year starting on October 1."

Hunter Seeking Co-Sponsors For Bill To Block Deal. The Hill (3/7, Tiron) reports House Armed Services Committee Chairman Rep. Duncan Hunter, "who has promised to try to sink the Dubai Ports World deal, started circulating a 'Dear Colleague' letter yesterday to attract co-sponsors for legislation he plans to introduce today." The letter co-signed by Rep. Jim Saxton outlines "several provisions of the legislation, which would halt the Dubai takeover of management at some U.S. port terminals. It would also require any corporation that owns, manages or operates 'national defense critical infrastructure to be majority-owned by American citizens.'"

King Offers Compromise. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, Henry) reported, "Republican Peter King, the powerful chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee tells CNN that the mood among Republicans up here is increasingly sour about this port deal, so he has crafted a compromise that he presented to the White House with a warning: If they do not sign on, this whole port contract may blow up. He's basically proposing that the American portion of the contract be separated out so that the company, D.P. World, would have nothing to do with the actual operation of U.S. ports. Instead, that would be subcontracted out to various U.S. companies."

CQ (3/6, Speck) reports that in "discussions with the White House," Rep. King and Sen. Susan Collins "separately floated possible changes to the controversial DP World deal that would place a degree of separation between the company and port operations." Collins said, "What I have suggested to the White House is that [the company] create an American subsidiary." That would "give the U.S. government more authority over the company, and in that scenario, Collins said, American citizens would head up security operations."

Reid Says Port Deal Will Be Major Campaign Issue. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, Henry) reported, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid today on Capitol Hill signaled that this is going to be a major campaign issue and he expects other candidates to jump on the bandwagon." Reid: "It's resonating because people have come to the realization that the Bush administration is basically incompetent. And I mention some of those things in my presentation to you a few minutes ago. This port security issue is stunning."

British Court Dismisses Objection To DPW Purchase Of P&O. The AP (3/7, Wardell) reports the "controversial takeover of British shipping company P&O by Dubai's state-owned DP World received the green light Monday when Britain's Court of Appeal dismissed a Miami firm's objection to the deal." The Court of Appeal "declined to hear an appeal from Miami-based Eller & Co., which had tried to have the deal barred on technical grounds, arguing that U.S. concerns about a United Arab Emirates company owning significant operations at six major U.S. seaports could harm its business."

The Washington Post/AP (3/7, D2, Wardell) reports Eller & Co. "said that it will continue to pursue legal action in the U.S. courts in Florida. 'We will continue to fight to protect our business and the livelihood of thousands of our staff and subcontractors,' it said."

Port Deal Just One Instance Of Arab Investment In US. The Washington Post (3/7, A1, Blustein, 744K) reports in a front page story that the Dubai Ports World deal is only one of many instances of direct investment in the US by Arab concerns. Spearheading the "trend is Dubai's Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktum (popularly known as "Sheik Mo"), ruler of the freewheeling city-state, which is part of the United Arab Emirates. The ports deal is just one of a series of recent purchases by companies he controls." Behind "such transactions are two powerful forces. One, of course, is the high price of energy, which has left several oil-producing Arab countries swimming in cash. The other is the burgeoning U.S. trade deficit -- $726 billion last year -- which means that the United States needs foreign capital; a country that imports more than it exports must cover the gap with money from abroad."

Report Says DHS Still Funding Low-Priority Port Security Projects. The AP (3/7, Sidoti) reports an inspector general report says "the Homeland Security Department still spends money on U.S. port projects that aren't considered national security priorities even though it has made some corrections." Homeland Security Inspector General Richard L. Skinner's office "studied the fifth and most recent round of port security grants, which awarded $142 million for 132 projects. Of those, the 20 projects Skinner's report said scored low on the agency's threat scale received about 20 percent of the money awarded, or $29.3 million."

Chertoff Plans Trip To China. The Wall Street Journal (3/6, 2.11M) reported in its "Washington Wire" column on its web site, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff plans a trip to China later this month to convince Beijing to take back illegal immigrants picked up by U.S. immigration authorities. Chertoff has been pushing a catch-and-return policy on illegal immigrants from China and elsewhere since taking office last year."

Guards Say Security Lacking At DHS Headquarters. The AP (3/6, Margasak) reports, "Guards at the Department of Homeland Security say the agency mishandled a potential anthrax attack on its headquarters, one of several incidents that led two senators to request an investigation of the agency's own security." Derrick Daniels, a former employee of Wackenhut Services Inc., the private security firm used by DHS, told the AP, "I wouldn't feel safe nowhere on this compound as an officer." Democratic Sens. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota and Ron Wyden of Oregon have written "the agency's inspector general, seeking an investigation."

$5.5 Million Bail Set For UNC Graduate In SUV Attack. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A3) University of North Carolina graduate Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar, "accused of running down nine people on campus to avenge the treatment of Muslims, said at a hearing Monday that he was 'thankful for the opportunity to spread the will of Allah.'" Taheri-azar is charged with "nine counts of attempted murder and nine counts of assault" and "his bail was set at $5.5 million." Meanwhile, the AP notes, about 50 UNC students yesterday "held what they called an 'anti-terrorism' rally," which included "a group of Muslim students who debated with organizers and said Taheri-azar had not been linked to any terrorist group."

The Washington Times (3/7, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "When asked by The Washington Times as to why Mr. Taheri-azar was not charged with terrorism," the police department "said the investigation is ongoing and additional charges may yet be filed."

Federal Effort To Rebuild New Orleans Levees Questioned. Louisiana state officials have begun to question the Army Corps of Engineer's plans to rebuild the New Orleans levee system. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 6, 2:40, Vargas) reported, "There were 340 miles of levees protecting greater New Orleans. But large stretches were damaged by the storm. A $1.6 billion rebuilding project is 40% complete." But "a monitor says it will leave parts of the levees weaker than before Katrina, making New Orleans vulnerable to another catastrophe." ABC (Osunami) added, "The state's commission says the Army Corps of Engineers. responsible for fixing the levees, is still struggling with critical design issues." So far, "the plan is to concentrate on only the system's most vulnerable points. But most of this work will not even begin until sometime this summer."

NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 6, 2:05, Williams) reported, "They are already spending $1.6 billion on emergency repairs now and they've asked for more money in case we are headed into another bad storm season." NBC (Myers) added, "Today, the Army Corps of Engineers says 45% of repairs have been completed." Walter Baumy of the Corps of Engineers "promises the entire system will be rebuilt by June 1, just as strong as it was before Katrina." But "independent scientists question whether the levee repairs can be done in time. And even if they are, these scientists say design flaws and weak soils could again leave this city vulnerable to a major storm."

Following reports that two teams of independent experts had found that the Corps was rushing to rebuild New Orleans' levees and using inadequate materials, the AP (3/7, Pickler) reports the Bush Administration "defended the quality of materials" on Monday, "as President Bush got assurances from the Army Corps of Engineers that it was on track to restore the system by the start of hurricane season." Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, head of the Army Corps, "took issue with [the experts'] findings." He "said the Corps had yet to see the findings or information on where the teams took their samples. He suggested the monitors may have been testing the wrong soil."

WPost Runs "Clarification" On Katrina Briefing Editorial. In a "Clarification" of its March 4 editorial "Caught on Tape," on the leaked video of an Aug. 28 White House briefing on Hurricane Katrina, the Washington Post (3/7, A16, 744K) says, "We wrote that there was no evidence President Bush, after being briefed on the predicted damage, had asked follow-up questions. In fact, the full transcript shows that after Mr. Bush left the conference, some of his advisers, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, did ask about the involvement of the military and other preparedness issues."

FEMA Purchase Of Mobile Homes Criticized. NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 7, 1:00, Williams) reported, "A disturbing report tonight from the Inspector General of the Department of Homeland Security, the parent agency of FEMA, they found that FEMA bought way more mobile homes than it should have. More than 26,000 trailer homes meant for evacuees were purchased at a cost of almost $900 million. Now, when all we hear are stories of families without shelter still, many of these trailer homes are sitting empty, warping and sinking in the mud in some places where they're being stored at two different staging grounds in Texas and Arkansas. FEMA personnel apparently didn't realize these trailers can't be used in a flood plain area, so only about 5,000 of them will actually be used to house Katrina victims. FEMA now say it is will donate a lot of the surplus trailers to other Federal agencies."

Experts Tell Panel Of Communication Breakdowns During Katrina. The AP (3/7, Mohr) reports that Monday, experts told members of an independent panel gathering information for the FCC that communication problems "left emergency crews confused and isolated in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina." According to Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin, "Some 3 million telephone lines were knocked out as the violent storm hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29." He "said he hopes the panel's work will help strengthen communications throughout the nation, especially in areas vulnerable to natural disasters."

Congressional Delegation Views Hurricane Damage. Roll Call (3/7, Nelson) reports last week 34 House Members made up the first large-scale Congressional delegation to the Gulf region since Hurricane Katrina struck, in what Rep. Roger Wicker "a much more profound realization of the damage." They "stood at the levee breech that had destroyed the displaced residents' homes" and "were briefed by the Army Corps of Engineers on the ongoing levee fortification project along the Industrial Canal going on behind them." Roll Call adds, "Many lawmakers, including the Speaker [Rep. Dennis Hastert], seemed stunned by the scope of what they saw. 'I think you really have to be on the ground' to understand the extent of the destruction, Hastert said, particularly in Mississippi."

WAR NEWS:

US Ambassador Says "Potential Is There" For All-Out Civil War In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Daragahi, 958K) reports, "The top US envoy to Iraq said Monday that the 2003 toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime had opened a 'Pandora's box' of volatile ethnic and sectarian tensions that could engulf the region in all-out war and disrupt the global economy if America were to extricate itself from the country too soon." In remarks that were "among the frankest and bleakest public assessments of the Iraqi situation by a high-level American official," US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "said the 'potential is there' for sectarian violence to become all-out civil war, but that Iraq for now had pulled back from that prospect after the wave of sectarian reprisals for the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra. … Abandoning Iraq in the way the US disengaged from civil wars in Lebanon, Afghanistan and Somalia could have dramatic global repercussions, he said."

Cheney Says Commanders, Conditions On Ground Will Drive Decisions On US Troop Levels. Fox News' Special Report (5/6, Baier) reported, "At a fundraising event in Florida, vice president Cheney said progress has not come easy in Iraq but has been steady, pointing to the Iraqi elections and the standing up of Iraqi forces." Cheney: "As that force grows in strength and the political process continues to advance, we'll be able to decrease troop levels without losing our capacity to defeat the terrorists." Fox added, "The Vice President went on to say that troop level decisions will be driven by conditions on the ground and by the recommendations of top US commanders."

US Working For "Better Balance" In Iraqi Police. As the threat of further sectarian violence looms, the New York Times (3/7, Wong, 1.19M) reports, "The American military is scrambling to try to weed out ethnic or religious partisans from the Iraqi security forces. The United States faces the possibility that it has been arming one side in a prospective civil war." According to the Times, "There is no quick or painless fix. The efforts risk alienating Shiite politicians, who have fiercely resisted attempts to wrest away their control of the security forces. The moves may appeal, though, to recalcitrant Sunni Arabs, whom the Americans want to draw into the political process."

Eighty Percent Of Americans Believe Sunni-Shiite Civil War Is Likely. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 3, 1:45, Vargas) reported, "An ABC News/Washington Post poll out today suggests that Americans are becoming increasingly frustrated with the situation in Iraq. Eight in ten Americans believe a civil war between Shiites and Sunnis is likely. 65% says the Bush Administration has no clear plan for ending the war." ABC (Stephanopoulos) added, "About half the public wants a withdrawal of American troops. But they're split. Fewer than one in five say bring the troops home right now. About a third say bring them home gradually over time. Another third says have the troop level stay exactly the same. And then you have about 10%, actually 11% of the country says increase troops now. You have a chaotic situation in Iraq which has left the public confused." The Washington Post (3/7, Morin, 744K) reports that "in the face of continuing violence, half -- 52 percent -- of those surveyed said the United States should begin withdrawing forces. One in six favors immediate withdrawal of all troops, however, while about one-third prefer a more gradual return." The Post adds, "In question after question, the new survey reflected a sharp decline in optimism, perhaps sparked by the sectarian violence that has flared in Iraq."

Talabani Loses Showdown In Parliament. The AP (3/7, Mroue) reports, "Iraq's president failed in a bid Monday to order parliament into session by March 12, further delaying formation of a government and raising questions whether the political process can withstand the unrelenting violence or disintegrate into civil war. ... At the heart of the dispute is a controversy over the second-term candidacy of the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose most powerful supporter is the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr." According to the AP, "it remained unclear when parliament might convene, despite the constitutional directive that set Sunday as the deadline. Nor was it clear how the disagreement over al-Jaafari might be settled."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Peterson, 61K) says "the crisis has laid bare a deepening divide within Iraq's majority Shiite community. The other contender was Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi, backed by the faction of Sadr rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who has portrayed himself as a technocrat and centrist who can get the job done." Jaafari "has been widely blamed in Iraq for permitting the violence to erupt out of control."

The Washington Times (3/7, Behn, 90K) reports "Iraqi party leaders, deadlocked over whether Ibrahim al-Jaafari should serve another term as prime minister, are considering a plan that would allow him to serve for six months to a year and then review his performance."

The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 7, 0:10, Schieffer) reported, "Another American soldier has died in combat in Iraq." NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 4, 0:40, Williams) reported, "In another dramatic development today, a sniper assassinated the commander of the Iraqi Army's Sixth Division, the man in charge of the forces protecting the capital and the highest-ranking Iraqi military officer killed since the US invasion." The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Daragahi, 958K), Washington Post (3/7, Anderson, Tyson, 744K) and New York Times (3/7, Semple, 1.19M) focus there stories on the attacks on the assassinated general.

Meanwhile, the AP (3/7) reports this morning from Hillah, "Two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously at separate sites in this mostly Shiite city early Tuesday, wounding at least three people, police said." The blasts "were detonated by remote control and were about five minutes apart, said police Capt. Muthana Khalid."

Fearful Of Shiites, Some Sunnis Now Welcome US Troops. As a result of the outbreak of ethnic and sectarian violence in Iraq, US troops are now being welcomed in some Sunni areas. The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 8, 2:30, Schieffer) reported, "It has gotten so bad that Iraqis are welcoming American patrols to places like Dora, a mostly Sunni neighborhood in southwestern Baghdad." CBS (Dozier) added local Sunnis blame "car bombs, kidnappings and gangland executions" on "death squads that that they say operate within the mostly Shiite police force." US troops "never used to be this popular in this hotbed of Saddam loyalists. But now locals say you are most welcome in Arabic."

The Washington Post (3/7, Anderson, 744K) reports "tribal chiefs in Iraq's western Anbar province and in an area near the northern city of Kirkuk, two regions teeming with insurgents, are vowing to strike back at al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni Arab-led group that is waging war against Sunni tribal leaders who are cooperating with the Iraqi government and the US military." Anbar tribes "have formed a militia that has killed 20 insurgents from al-Qaeda in Iraq, leaders said." The Post adds, "Separately, more than 300 tribal chiefs, politicians, clerics, security officials and other community leaders met last week in Hawijah, about 35 miles southwest of Kirkuk, and 'declared war' on al-Qaeda in Iraq."

US Officials Say Iran Exporting Shaped Charges To Iraq. US officials believe Iran is exporting deadly shaped charges to Iraq for use by insurgents as roadside bombs. The military believes Iran's goal is to increase the US' casualties. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, lead story, 2:45, Ross) reported, "US military and intelligence officials tell ABC News they've intercepted shipments of these dread bombs at the border of Iran and Iraq. But others are getting through." What the US "says links them to Iran are tell-tale manufacturing signatures, unique types of machine shop welds and materials powered by the same Japanese electronics, all indicating they are built in the same bomb factory, which the military believes is in Iran." US intelligence officials "say Iran is using the bombs as a way to drive up US casualties in Iraq but without provoking a direct confrontation." Reuters (3/6, Olivari, Al-Mehdawi) says Tarek al-Hashemi, "a leading Sunni politician and a contender for speaker when the new parliament opens on Sunday, accused Iran of fostering instability in Iraq, partly through militias loyal to Shi'ite parties, in a bid to divert US pressure over Tehran's nuclear program."

Germany To Investigate Reports Intelligence Service Aided US In Iraq. The New York Times (3/7, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports, "A German opposition party said Monday that it would vote for a formal parliamentary investigation into allegations that the German intelligence service provided help to the United States during the invasion of Iraq, which the government vehemently opposed. … Because the two other opposition parties, the leftist Greens and the new Left Party, have already declared their support, the Free Democrats' decision seems to ensure a formal investigation." Germany's government "has made vigorous efforts to head off an investigation, saying it could harm the functioning of Germany's intelligence service and efforts under way to improve relations with the United States." The Washington Times (3/7, Crossland, 90K) also reports the story, saying the probe "could hurt Chancellor Angela Merkel's government, even though she only took over last November, because her Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier was chief of staff to Mr. Schroeder at the time of the war. Lengthy debate about the Iraq war and Germany's role in it could also put further strain on US-German relations at a time when Mrs. Merkel is trying hard to repair the damage done by Mr. Schroeder's opposition to the war."

Delays In Iraq Reconstruction Plan Draw Criticism. A plan for helping the new Iraqi government succeed is still "mostly dormant" four months after it was announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, USA Today (3/7, Komarow, 2.31M) reports. The plan "calls for sending teams of experts to help the fledgling governments in Iraq's 18 provinces establish democratic institutions, improve security and manage reconstruction. … However, after the first three of 16 teams were created in Mosul, Kirkuk and Hillah in conjunction with her visit, no more have been launched. … That pace is 'a huge problem' and means the United States is blowing its chance 'to quickly seize the momentum' as Iraq forms a permanent government based on December's elections, said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee."

Amnesty International Accuses US Of Widespread Prisoner Abuse. The New York Times (3/7, Cowell, 1.19M) reports that the report, entitled "Beyond Abu Ghraib: Detention and Torture in Iraq," says the US and its allies have "established procedures which deprive detainees of human rights guaranteed in international law and standards." The times adds, "Responding to the report, the United States military said all its detainees were treated in accordance with international conventions and Iraqi law."

Barone Says US Groups Have Vested Interest In Denying Saddam Had Ties to Al Qaeda. Michael Barone writes in the Washington Times (3/7, 90K), "Why, for two distinct groups of Americans, has it become a matter of conviction held with religious intensity that there cannot have been any relationship between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq? One group consists of Democratic politicians who oppose the Bush administration's policy in Iraq. … The other group consists of intelligence and other career government professionals, many of them Arabists." The Democrats "fear more Americans would support Mr. Bush and the war effort if they believed there was. The career professionals, with their many years of training in the subtleties of the Middle East, have developed a vested interest in the notion that religious Wahhabis like al Qaeda could never collaborate with a secular tyrant like Saddam."

Pakistani Forces Battle Pro-Taliban Rebels Along Afghan Border. Nineteen pro-Taliban rebels were killed in fighting with Pakistani security forces along the Afghan border Monday. The Washington Post/Reuters (3/7, A13) reports, "The rebels launched attacks on government positions in Miran Shah on Saturday as President Bush met Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in the capital. The fighting has raged since. … The semiautonomous ethnic Pashtun lands along the Afghan border are Pakistan's front line in the war on terrorism."

Musharraf Lashes Out At Karzai. Meanwhile, Musharraf lashed out at Afghani President Hamid Karzai over his recent comments casting doubt on its commitment to fight terrorism. The New York Times (3/7, Gall, 1.19M) reports, "In a speech to Pakistani journalists in Rawalpindi that was broadcast on state television, Mr. Musharraf accused India of feeding false information to Afghan officials suggesting that the Pakistani intelligence agency was training terrorists. He dismissed the allegation, and he described as 'nonsense' a list of Taliban members, including the leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, who Mr. Karzai said were operating in Pakistan."

NATO Commander In Afghanistan Downplays Insurgent Threat. Reuters (3/6, Dunham) reports, "NATO's top commander said on Monday he doubted Taliban and al Qaeda forces were capable of posing a serious insurgent threat as the alliance expands its Afghanistan operations, calling narcotics the top worry." NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe Gen. James Jones also "said the 26-nation alliance remained 25 percent short of the troops and equipment envisioned for its rapid-reaction force, and expressed renewed doubt he will be able to declare it fully operational as planned on October 1." Knight Ridder (3/6, Brown) notes Jones "said Monday that a 20 percent increase in attacks 'is statistically not very significant' because the average number of daily attacks by Taliban and al-Qaida fighters had been 'quite low.'" The Washington Times (3/7, Scarborough, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "NATO Shrugs Off Afghan Violence," while the Washington Post (3/7, Tyson, 744K) titles its report "Afghan Threat Played Down."

US Ambassador Says US Will Retain Preeminent Role In Afghanistan NATO Force. The Financial Times (3/7, Morarjee) reports its interview with Ambassador Ronald Neumann, in which he "said America's commitment to Afghanistan would not be compromised when NATO troops take command of the country's restive south later this year." Neumann added that "the success of the Nato mission in southern Afghanistan had ramifications far beyond the country's borders." The Times says these comments "come as Afghan officials become increasingly nervous that the withdrawal of about 3,000 US troops after the handover to Nato command will signal to the Taliban that American forces are gradually pulling out of the country."

Pentagon Opens Criminal Investigation Into Tillman Death. The Pentagon's decision to open a criminal investigation into the death of Army Ranger Pat Tillman once again was reported on the network news, with ABC and CBS running full segments on the story. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 5, 2:20, Karl) reported the "criminal investigation will seek to determine whether" Tillman's fellow "soldiers fired their weapons indiscriminately, without attempting to verify their target. If so, they could be found guilty of negligent homicide and face a maximum penalty of three years in prison. Privately, Pentagon officials doubt this investigation will result in criminal charges."

The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 2, 1:50, Martin) reported, "Charges could range from negligent homicide to involuntary manslaughter to dereliction of duty. But the investigators could also find the real culprit was the fog of war and not bring any charges."

Military Desertions Have Declined Since 9/11 Attacks. Pentagon records show that while the overall military desertion rate has declined since the 9/11 attacks in 2001, 4,387 Army soldiers 3,454 Navy sailors and 82 Air Force personnel have deserted. USA Today (3/7, Nichols, 2.31M) reports, "Desertion numbers have dropped since 9/11. The Army, Navy and Air Force reported 7,978 desertions in 2001, compared with 3,456 in 2005. The Marines showed 1,603 deserters in 2001. That declined by 148 in 2005. The desertion rate was much higher during the Vietnam era. The Army saw a high of 33,094 deserters in 1971 — 3.4% of the Army force. But there was a draft and the active-duty force was 2.7 million."

Pentagon Seen As Cracking Down On Vietnam Deserters As Message To Current Troops. In a separate story, USA Today (3/7, Nichols, 2.31M) reports that three decades after the Vietnam War, hundreds of deserters are still on the loose. Attorneys for one recently-captured Vietnam era deserter "say the Pentagon, and the Marine Corps in particular, are cracking down on long-term cases in an effort to warn current-day troops in Iraq against deserting. … Chief Warrant Officer James Averhart, who has commanded the Marine Corps Absentee Collection Center since September 2004, told the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times that he had ordered cold cases reopened and that his squad had caught 27 deserters in his first 11 months on the job, a rate he suggested was higher than those of his predecessors."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Attorney Claims Enron Comment Was Sarcasm. Reuters (3/7, Daily) reports, "Former Enron Corp. CEO Jeffrey Skilling was using sarcasm when he told several top executives in 2001 'they're on to us,' his lawyer suggested on Monday at the trial of Skilling and ex-CEO Ken Lay. … The lawyer, Mark Holscher, sought to sow doubts about the comment that a witness, former executive Kevin Hannon, told the jury last week he heard Skilling say in reaction to a May 2001 analyst report that was sharply critical of Enron." Reuters adds, "Hannon had said he took Skilling's comment at the meeting to mean that investors were 'starting to understand how Enron made money,' and appeared to link Skilling to efforts to cover up the decaying state of Enron's finances. … 'Can you tell this jury whether (Skilling's voice) was dripping with sarcasm when he said "they're onto us?"' Holscher asked Hannon. … 'Anything's possible,' replied Hannon in the clipped manner he used throughout the day's cross examination. Hannon was formerly chief operating officer of Enron's Internet unit Enron Broadband Services."

Fastow Looms As Pivotal Witness. USA Today (3/7, Farrell) reports, "Finally, four years after Enron's spectacular collapse, the moment everyone's been waiting for has arrived: Andrew Fastow, the company's disgraced former chief financial officer, is expected to tell his side of the story in court here today." USA continues, "While the government's trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has been going on for more than five weeks, testimony from the first 10 witnesses has focused largely on the abysmal financial condition of two business units — Enron Broadband Services and Enron Energy Services. Several have said that Lay and Skilling made misleading statements about the units to the investing public. … But with Fastow, who pleaded guilty to two felonies, prosecutors are expected to zero in on what Lay and Skilling knew about the overall financial condition of Enron, and when they knew it. More than any other witness so far, the former CFO was in a position to know whether the defendants — particularly Skilling — were lying to investors or simply painting an optimistic, and legal, picture of Enron in 2000 and 2001."

The Washington Post (3/7, D1, Johnson) reports, "As early as Tuesday, Fastow will take center stage as the trial's most highly anticipated witness -- and one of its most unpredictable. His presence is expected to electrify the federal courthouse here, where court officials are preparing for an onslaught of bystanders eager to hear Fastow speak publicly for the first time since his January 2004 guilty plea. … Both the Justice Department's Enron Task Force and the defense team have plenty of reasons to fear Fastow and the impact of his testimony. Government lawyers have signaled that they hope to limit their questioning to a day or less, given the liabilities he brings with him -- admissions that he improperly pocketed millions of dollars during his tenure. Defense lawyers intend to keep him on the witness stand for days trying to tear apart his account. … On one point, however, both sides agree: Fastow, 44, remains the most elusive and demonized character in a story that has come to symbolize an era of corporate malfeasance."

Scrushy's Attorney Says Lay, Skilling "Doomed." USA Today (3/7, Farrell) reports, "As if former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling don't have enough to worry about with the government's star witness expected to begin testifying against them today, a prominent defense lawyer who helped win an acquittal for another embattled CEO says the two men are already toast, at least in the courtroom." USA continues, "Donald Watkins, a civil rights lawyer and businessman who last year helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy beat charges that he masterminded a $2.7 billion fraud, said in an interview Friday that Lay and Skilling are 'doomed.' … 'There comes a time when you can forecast the outcome of a contest,' said Watkins, who has not attended the trial but has followed it closely in the media. 'In this contest, these guys have lost.' … The reason, according to Watkins, is that the two men settled on the wrong defense strategy. In their opening arguments, lawyers for the two men told the jury that Enron was a solid company done in by a loss of confidence among investors and trading partners after the disclosure that former chief financial officer Andrew Fastow had diverted tens of millions of dollars into his own pocket. … Watkins says this defense — that Enron was fundamentally a healthy company — is a non-starter. 'Nobody's going to buy that,' he says. Further, the tactics used so far by the defense — vigorous cross-examinations of cooperating witnesses who have already pleaded guilty — 'lacks imagination.'"

DaimlerChrysler Suspends Employees In Bribery Probe. The New York Times (3/7, Landler) reports, "DaimlerChrysler has dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal investigation uncovered evidence that its executives paid bribes in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe." The Times continues, "In a report filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said it had 'determined that improper payments were made in a number of jurisdictions.' The payments, it said, could violate both German law and the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in the United States." The Times adds, "The Justice Department and the S.E.C. have been investigating accusations of bribery at DaimlerChrysler since last year. The company has cooperated with the investigations, and these latest disclosures shed more light on the far-flung corruption inquiry. … The filing, however, does not answer a crucial question: whether senior Mercedes managers knew about the payments. It does not identify the countries where bribes were paid, or say how many people were involved."

The AP (3/7, Moore) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department said in August 2005 that it was investigating whether DaimlerChrysler had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations. … That criminal investigation is tied to an inquiry opened in 2004 by the SEC after an employee fired by the automaker said he was dismissed for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials. … DaimlerChrysler said then, and reiterated Monday, that it was cooperating with the investigations, sharing with both agencies information from its internal probe."

Wallison Suggests Reducing Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac Portfolios. Peter Wallison, a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M), "The Rudman Report on Fannie Mae recites facts eerily similar to what we now know about Enron. … What we should learn from this -- much of which occurred after the adoption of Sarbanes-Oxley -- is that a board made up primarily of independent directors, an audit committee made up entirely of independent directors, a Big Four accounting firm alerted to the dangers of accounting fraud, and a regulator that claimed to be fully on top of what was happening, could not prevent senior management from fudging the accounting and misleading the board and investors." Wallison adds, "As reform legislation languishes in the Senate, Congress should consider the lessons of Enron, Fannie and Freddie: Despite our best efforts, error and fraud will occur. That's why it's important to make sure -- by reducing the size of Fannie and Freddie's portfolios -- that no future management failure at either company will threaten the stability of the economy."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Castigate Ryan As Closing Arguments Begin. In a story widely-distributed by Knight Ridder, The Chicago Tribune (3/7, O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "Closing arguments began in former Gov. George Ryan's trial Monday with prosecutors blasting him as a shameless, greedy politician at the center of a series of dirty deals that enriched cronies who kicked back cash and gifts to Ryan and his family. … In nearly five hours of arguments, prosecutors portrayed Ryan as a two-faced, serial liar who publicly claimed he did all he could to eliminate fraud at licensing facilities but privately gutted corruption-fighting efforts to keep his political fundraising machine humming along. … Ryan 'sacrificed public safety and integrity' to ensure the fundraising pipeline kept flowing," said Assistant US Attorney Joel R. Levin. The AP (3/7, Robinson) notes, "Defense attorney Bradley E. Lerman moved for a mistrial Monday in a dispute over a presentation Levin was making to the jury. Lerman said it included material concerning a 1994 crash that killed six children and had been ruled out as so emotional it could prejudice the jurors. … U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer did not rule immediately on the motion."

Campbell Will Not Testify At Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/7, Scott, Warren, 430K) reports former Atlanta Mayor Bill Campbell announced Monday that he will not testify in his own defense at his corruption trial, saying, "I desperately wanted to testify. I wanted to tell the jury my story. They wanted to continue the character assassination, but I am not going to subject my family to further damage." His "criticism of the prosecutors apparently struck a nerve," and US Attorney David Nahmias "summoned reporters to respond." Nahmias said, "We will not make any special exceptions for this defendant. All of our questions would be relevant to the alleged criminal offenses." WXIA-TV Atlanta (Carnes, King) notes, "Campbell says he would be happy to testify -- if federal prosecutors would stay away from questions about his private life, including asking about two former girlfriends," but "Nahmias said any questions to Campbell about his private life would be relevant to the case, and no one can dictate what prosecutors ask and don't ask."

New York AFL-CIO Appointing Special Committee To Address FBI Probe. The New York Times (3/7, Greenhouse, 1.19M) report in "Metro Briefing" that New York State AFL-CIO President Denis Hughes "announced yesterday that he would appoint a special committee to handle matters at the New York City Central Labor Council regarding a federal investigation of the council and its president, Brian M. McLaughlin." Hughes said that McLaughlin "would remain in charge of the council, but would not have a voice in decisions regarding the investigation. Last Thursday, F.B.I. agents raided the council's offices and Mr. McLaughlin's Queens office as part of an investigation into accusations of bid rigging for city contracts for street and traffic lights." The New York Daily News (3/7, 729K) notes that "the labor council, whose headquarters was raided by more than 20 FBI agents last week, would create a small 'rapid-response team' of about a dozen city labor leaders to handle the federal probe without any involvement from McLaughlin," and "the council also would hire its own independent attorney to deal with the feds." The New York Post (3/7, Campanile, 624K) adds, "The action plan, which has been cleared by the leadership of the national AFL-CIO, shows how concerned the labor leaders are about the McLaughlin probe and the possibility that he might be charged with a crime. Meanwhile, the federal probe received a thumbs-up from former city transportation boss Wilbur Chapman. 'Thank God - finally,' Chapman told The Post."

Nevada Brothel Owner Charged With Attempted Bribery. The AP (3/7, Ritter) reports, "The owner of three southern Nevada brothels was charged Monday with trying to bribe a county commissioner to relax laws affecting bordellos." Joseph Maynard Richards "is accused of funneling $5,000 to a commissioner in rural Nye County in return for support for a law to let brothels be built closer to county roads and highways." Commission

Chairwoman Candice Trummell, a Republican from Pahrump, confirmed for The Associated Press that she was the cooperating witness" mentioned in the complaint." "'This was done in cooperation with the FBI, Trummell added, describing the FBI probe as an ongoing public corruption investigation that began before she was elected…in 2003."

FBI Investigating Alleged Misappropriation By FEC Official In Harassment Complaint. Roll Call (3/7, Kane) reports, "The FBI is investigating allegations that a former top official at the Federal Election Commission," James Pehrkon, "tried to settle a sexual harassment complaint from a female staffer by attempting to misappropriate $100,000 in taxpayer funds last fall. The investigation has embroiled at least a handful of FEC employees, each of whom has been put on administrative leave or no longer works for the agency, leaving vacancies in critical posts heading into the campaign season."

Indictments Have Not Slowed AIPAC. The Washington Post (3/7, A2, Milbank, 744K) reports in its "Washington Sketch" column AIPAC staff members say the indictments Steve Rosen, "who goes on trial next month for disseminating classified information," and is deputy Keith Weissman "have not been mentioned in any of the group's public meetings so far. And they say the pro-Israel lobby, unharmed by the Rosen flap, is putting on its biggest and best show ever this week: 4,500 participants, including more than 1,000 students, paying visits to at least 450 House and Senate offices." The Post adds that the scandal "doesn't seem to have slowed down the group. … Any talk of Rosen is confined to private donor meetings and hallway conversations -- where opinions are split on AIPAC's decision to turn its back on Rosen and Weissman."

Testifying For Defense, Sliwa Co-Host Says Gotti Was "Sick Of This Life." The AP (3/7, Neumeister) reports, "John 'Junior' Gotti said in 1998 that he was 'sick of this life' and would plead guilty to criminal charges, a lawyer who co-hosts a radio show with Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa testified Monday at Gotti's mob trial." Ron Kuby's testimony "was intended by defense lawyers to boost Gotti's argument that he had rejected life in the Gambino crime family when he pleaded guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges. On that front, they got mixed results." Kuby, who represented Gotti in 1998, "testified that Gotti said he 'wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this,' but the lawyer could not be more specific." WCBS-TV New York (3/6, Guzman) adds Kuby testified "By 'this', I asked Kuby, did he mean 'this mob life?' 'I took it to mean that he wanted to put criminal life behind him. That he was tired of being in jail, tired of being in court, tired of being away from his family. That he wanted that life to end.'"

Under the headline "Kuby's Testimony Radio-Active," The New York Post (3/7, Mangan, 624K) says Kuby's testimony gave "Gotti's defense yesterday…an unexpected boost," although "Under cross-examination, Kuby said he had no knowledge that Junior later stopped earning money from the mob -- and said Gotti never admitted to him he was in the mob." The New York Daily News (3/7, 729K) also reports on Kuby's testimony, under the headline "Sliwa Says Radio Partner 'Judas.'"

Peter Gotti Testifies He Was Not Bagman. The New York Daily News (3/7, Zambito, 729K) reports John Gotti's youngest brother, Peter, testified yesterday, called by the defense "to refute allegations made by mob snitch Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo that he acted as the go-between for $50,000 in mob cash belonging to his brother. 'Never,' Gotti said when asked if he'd ever picked up money for his brother. He said his brother wouldn't have allowed it since he was well aware of his gambling habits."

Jury Selection Begins For "Mafia Cops" Trial. Reuters (3/7, Pierson) reports jury selection began Monday for the trial of former NYPD detectives Stephen Caracappa and Louis Eppolito, "accused of having been hit men for the mob." Brooklyn U.S. District Court Judge Jack Weinstein set opening arguments for March 13 and assured hundreds of potential jurors assembled in his courtroom the case 'will be one of the most interesting experiences of your life.' … When Eppolito showed up in court 75 minutes late, Weinstein ordered that he be rearrested and that his $5 million bail be revoked until a good explanation was provided." However, Newsday (3/7 DeStefano) reports, "But after defense attorney Bruce Cutler explained to Weinstein that two disabled tractor-trailers had shut down the roadway, Weinstein reinstated bail and revoked the arrest." The New York Post (3/7, Haberman, 624K) notes that Cutler "was apparently so concerned by the unexplained absence he almost called Nassau County cops to check the Plainview, L.I., home where Eppolito is staying while awaiting trial."

The New York Daily News (3/7, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "Prospective jurors answered 77 questions, including whether they had read Eppolito's autobiography, 'Mafia Cop,' or watched the defense lawyers' 'Cutler and Hayes Show' on Court TV."

Media Whirlwind Surrounding Trial. The New York Times (3/7, Feuer, 1.19M) reports, "Depending on whom you ask…there are four books and a movie, five books and a movie, four books but no movie or five books but no movie about" the trial, which "has become the latest scoop for the disheveled band of newspaper reporters who write about the courts and has led, in at least two cases, to a literary luncheon and a book deal. … United States v. Eppolito and Caracappa is a mob case, which is to say, a case with 'color' — and therein lies the interest."

Court Rules Bulger Brother Must Forfeit State Pension. The AP (3/7, Maguire) reports the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court "ruled Monday that a brother of fugitive mobster James 'Whitey' Bulger must forfeit his $65,000-a-year state pension because he lied to grand juries investigating the gangster's disappearance. Lawyers for John 'Jackie' Bulger, a retired court clerk magistrate, had argued that his crimes were based on family loyalty and didn't affect his job." The AP notes that Whitey Bulger "is wanted in connection with 21 murders and is on the FBI's 'Ten Most Wanted' list."

Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing In Fraud Case. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A5) reports a Federal judge "refused Monday to allow a lengthy delay in the sentencing of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, even though lawyers for both sides said the move could jeopardize a federal corruption investigation involving Congress and the Bush administration." Abramoff attorney Abbe Lowell "warned that the defense would disclose information about the ongoing corruption investigation to demonstrate the level of Abramoff's cooperation, something that could affect his sentence in the fraud case." Lowell said, "We will name names. That is not a good thing for law enforcement."

Admitted Hitman Testifies He Did Not Commit Murder-For-Hire. The AP (3/7, Weber) reports, "In a stunning about-face," Phillip Harwood, "the admitted triggerman in the slaying" of Lita Sullivan, "denied Monday that he had ever seen the victim in person or that he killed her on orders" from her husband, James Sullivan, accused of hiring a hitman to kill her. Harwood testified "he was in a getaway car nearby when the murder was committed by a man named 'John' who worked as a bartender at a topless bar. … He admitted to the jurors that he bought the flowers that were delivered to the victim." The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/7, Montgomery, 430K) notes, "When prosecutor Clint Rucker asked Harwood if he agreed to kill Lita Sullivan, Harwood replied, 'To be honest, I have to answer no. The agreement was to "take care of her" but my intention was never to participate.' 'What do you think Sullivan meant by "take care of her,"' asked Rucker. 'I figured he meant to kill her, you don't pay $25,000 to scare nobody,' said Harwood." Court TV (3/6, Grinberg) notes Harwood "emerged as a wild card for both the defense and the state, implicating Sullivan one instant while denying being the shooter."

WXIA-TV Atlanta (3/6, Shirek, Christensen) reports, "Harwood said he first met James Sullivan when he delivered furniture to him from Sullivan's former home in Macon, Ga. Harwood said Sullivan started to hint around about needing help dealing with his estranged wife in Atlanta who was 'trying to take everything he has.' When Rucker asked Harwood how he knew Sullivan wasn't joking about having his wife killed, Harwood responded, 'When I received $12,500 in the mail.'"

Defense Lawyer Grills Harwood's Former Girlfriend. The Palm Beach Post (3/7, Keller) reports that before Harwood took the stand, his then-girlfriend, Belinda Trahan, "finished a grueling cross-examination from James Sullivan's attorney…by insisting he is the man she saw pass an envelope full of money" to Harwood "as payment for killing" Lita Sullivan. "Item by item, point by point," defense attorney Ed Garland "showed inconsistencies and contradictions in Trahan's trial testimony and earlier statements she has made to authorities. By his questions, Garland suggested Trahan was motivated to come forward with her story in 1998 in order to collect a reward that still has not been paid, and that her story was influenced by news accounts she had read."

US Indicts Army Official For Fraud, Bribery. The Army Times (3/6, Tan) reports, "An official at Army Test and Evaluation Command was indicted March 1 for fraud and bribery, according to the U.S. Justice Department." The Times continues, "Jeffrey H. Stayton, chief of aviation for ATEC was charged with two counts of honest services fraud, one count of bribery and one count of obstruction of justice after an indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in the Middle District of Alabama." The Times adds, "The grand jury in Montgomery, Ala., also indicted William Curtis Childree, a private contractor based in Enterprise, Ala. Childree, 67, is charged with two counts of honest services fraud and one count of bribery. … According to the indictment, in or about November 2001, Maverick Aviation, a business owned and run by Childree that buys and distributes helicopters for its clients, was chosen to produce and modify two helicopters for use by the U.S. government. The contract was worth about $4.7 million. … Stayton, 55, is accused of taking actions that favored Maverick's selection to get thecontract and misleading government officials about Maverick's performance under the contract , according to the Justice Department."

US, Britain In Dispute Over Mutual Extradition Agreement. The London Times (3/7, Baldwin) reports, "Britain and the United States were locked in a deepening diplomatic dispute last night over Washington's failure to implement a mutual extradition agreement that Parliament approved three years ago." The Times continues, "Congress's refusal to ratify the deal means that Britain cannot prosecute criminals residing in the US, including sex offenders and paedophiles. … America has sought the extradition of 44 alleged offenders since 2003, and 12 have already been sent to the US. The extradition of several others has been approved but is awaiting appeal. In contrast, Britain extradited only five suspects from the US in the same period under the previous thirty-year-old extradition treaty, including just one in 2005." The Times adds, "Ministers have repeatedly raised the issue with their US counterparts, and Charles Clarke, the Home Secretary, protested again when he met Alberto Gonzales, the US Attorney-General, in London yesterday. … Diplomats led by Sir David Manning, Ambassador to the US, have also held about 30 meetings on the issue on Capitol Hill in recent months. But pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Indeed, America's failure to abide by its side of the deal is fast becoming a political embarrassment for a British government often accused of showing undue deference to Washington. … A senior US official told The Times yesterday that the Administration was sympathetic to Britain's concerns and hinted that a fresh attempt to force the treaty through the Senate would be made within weeks. … The official said that the problem had been caused by the influential Irish-American lobby, which is worried that the treaty could be used to pursue IRA suspects. Senators are worried about alienating any section of voters before November's congressional elections. British diplomats have emphasised that, after the Good Friday agreement, Britain has little interest in pursuing IRA suspects."

US Targets White Supremacist Prison Gang. The AP (3/7, Flaccus) reports, "The inmates had to heat the letter to draw out the message, written in invisible ink. When they did, their orders were clear. … Within hours, prosecutors say, members of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang sneaked into a nearby cellblock and killed two black inmates with handmade shanks as part of an order to 'go to war' with blacks." The AP continues, "The deaths are two of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed by federal prosecutors in a sweeping case against the Aryan Brotherhood, a violent white supremacist prison gang that has infiltrated nearly every federal and state prison since its beginnings in San Quentin in 1964. … Prosecutors hope to dismantle the gang - nicknamed the 'Brand' - in a series of trials that together make up what's believed to be the biggest capital murder case in U.S. history. Of the 40 men initially charged, as many as 16 could face the death penalty for crimes that reach back 30 years." The AP adds, "Prosecutors are pursuing the highly organized gang with a racketeering law originally passed to target Mafia leaders - a tactic recently used with some success against other prison gangs in California and Texas. … Opening statements in the trial of (Barry) Mills and three others are scheduled to begin March 14 in federal court in Santa Ana. Mills and another alleged ringleader, Tyler 'The Hulk' Bingham, face the death penalty in what could be a nine-month trial. … Four more defendants are set to go on trial in Los Angeles in October; court dates in California are pending for the remaining men. Nineteen of the 40 defendants struck plea bargains, and one has died. … The 140-page indictment against the gang alleges a web of conspiracies to murder fellow inmates who offended gang members, cheated them on drug deals, failed to comply with the orders of leaders or snitched to prison authorities. Prosecutors, who declined to be interviewed, spent six years compiling evidence and relied on informants for much of their case."

Nine Arrested On Billing Fraud Charges At California Medical Clinic. The San Diego Union-Tribune (3/7, Martinez, 353K) reports, "A Lemon Grove medical clinic was shut down after its owners and employees were charged with defrauding Medi-Cal out of more than $2 million, authorities said Monday. Nine people, including the owners and a doctor who worked at a medical clinic…were indicted last week on 47 counts that included conspiracy; insurance fraud; capping, or illegally referring patients; tax evasion; grand theft and operating a business without workers' compensation insurance, the District Attorney's Office announced." The Union-Tribune notes, "FBI agents first learned about the clinic in November 2004 when patients complained that they were being billed for treatment that they did not receive, said Daniel R. Dzwilewski, special agent in charge of the San Diego FBI office."

Michigan Credit Card Fraud Probe Expanded. The Detroit News (3/6, Shepardson) reported that the credit card fraud investigation of Dearborn perfume distributor Ali Abdul Karim Farhat and his brother, Hassan Farhat, "has grown into a money-laundering indictment charging the pair and 17 of their business associates and relatives. Defense attorneys now say prosecutors threatened to indict the suspects' family members unless they agreed to plead guilty," and they "accuse government investigators of improperly obtaining secret wiretaps in the investigation." The News notes that "hundreds of pages of secret wiretap records recently made public show that the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force went to great lengths in its investigation of the Farhats -- installing a secret surveillance camera outside a Dearborn business, stealing a suspect's trash and having an undercover agent pose as a businessman seated next to a suspect on an airplane flight."

Judge Hears List Of Complaints From Convicted Sniper Muhammad. The Washington Times/AP (3/7, Manning) reports, "Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad appeared in Montgomery County Circuit Court in Rockville yesterday with a list of complaints, including charges that jailers have restricted his access to court documents in his trial for six Washington-area sniper shootings. … He also complained about disagreements with his attorneys over legal filings and that he had been denied long underwear to wear in court." The AP continues, "Muhammad also lost a pair of pretrial motions during yesterday's hearing in advance of his scheduled May 1 trial. He was transferred to Montgomery County last summer from Virginia, where he has been sentenced to death." The AP adds, "Circuit Judge John Ryan granted a request from county prosecutors to present evidence of other shootings Muhammad and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo are accused of carrying out before and during the three-week October 2002 shooting rampage in the Washington region. … Judge Ryan also blocked a request by Muhammad's attorneys to hold separate trials for some of the six murders that occurred in Montgomery County, the first on Oct. 2 and the last on Oct. 22, 2002."

Baltimore Grand Jury Decries "Arrests Without Merit." The Baltimore Sun (3/7, Bykowicz) reports, "A Baltimore grand jury is calling for the number of city arrests that fail to result in criminal charges to be cut in half, saying such arrests erode public confidence in the Police Department, according to a report released Monday. … 'If the staggering number of arrests is to be validated, the percentage of arrests without merit must be drastically reduced,' the report says. The jurors also said that frequent police stops of residents is an approach 'bordering on violating a person's constitutional rights.'" The Sun adds, "The panel of 23 grand jurors that met from September to January was asked by a Baltimore Circuit Court judge to "address the lack of confidence that exists between many members of the public and law enforcement." … The grand jury appears to have done its research by reviewing media reports and arrest statistics, as well as speaking with each other and with 'several' residents, though the report does not say how many. Grand jurors talked to one person from the Police Department, the head of education and training."

New Jersey Verdict Highlights Crackdown ON Violent Animal Rights Activists. The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Knickerbocker) reports, "Animal-rights activists around the country - at least the most extreme - are becoming increasingly militant. And law enforcement officials and lawmakers are stepping up efforts to combat those who break the law." The Monitor continues, "These interconnected trends came to a head in New Jersey last week when an animal rights group and six of its members were convicted of inciting violence in their campaign to shut down a company that uses animals to test drugs and other consumer products. … The group, Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC), claims its actions constitute free speech. But federal prosecutors and the jury in a Trenton, N.J., courtroom called it harassment, stalking, and conspiracy - the first such conviction under the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act. The lab, Huntingdon Life Sciences (HLS), the largest of its kind in the world, is based in Britain and New Jersey." The Monitor adds, "Antivivisectionists and other animal-rights proponents have been organized in the US since at least the mid-19th century. But recently, their most extreme members have become more aggressive. … Members of the US House and Senate are sponsoring the 'Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act.' It would toughen the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act by imposing penalties for veiled threats to individuals and families, economic disruption or damage, and 'tertiary targeting.' … Along with the recent indictment of ALF activists charged with arson and other crimes in Oregon and other parts of the West, the convictions in New Jersey are a setback for extremist animal-rights activists."

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Rules Colleges Must Permit Military Recruitment. The Supreme Court yesterday ruled the government can condition Federal aid to colleges and universities on their acceptance of military recruitment on campus. The story was reported briefly by each of the networks last night. NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 9, 0:20, Williams) reported, "In its unanimous opinion, the court said that if students and faculty disagree with the military's policies, they are free to protest, but they may not kick the recruiters off campus." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 6, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "Several law schools have barred recruiters from their campuses arguing that the Pentagon's don't ask don't tell rule discriminates against gays and violates freedom of speech."

ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 7, :20, Vargas) said the ruling was "a major victory today for the Bush Administration." While the AP (3/7, Holland) calls it "a setback for universities that had become the latest battleground over the military policy allowing gay men and women to serve only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves." Justices "seemed swayed by the Bush administration's arguments that after the terrorist attacks, and during the war in Iraq, the government had a responsibility to bolster its recruitment." Knight Ridder (3/7, Henderson) also says the decision "is a big boost to the military and a blow to 36 law schools that joined forces to fight what they'd described as overreaching by Congress." The schools "will now face a choice: Grant military recruiters full access to their campuses, or forfeit what in some cases is hundreds of millions of dollars."

Fox News' Special Report (5/6, Garrett) reported "the court ruled 8-0 that recruitment policy did not violate the first amendment because it governs conduct, not speech." The New York Times (3/7, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "It was a setback, although hardly an unexpected one, to a coalition of law schools that brought the constitutional challenge, as well as to the Association of American Law Schools." The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Bravin, Hechinger, 2.11M) says that "at oral arguments in December, the justices sounded skeptical of the argument that schools were being forced to endorse a message of antipathy to homosexuals." The government's lawyer, Solicitor General Paul Clement, "said schools remain free to express their views of military policy in other ways." The Washington Times (3/7, Taylor, 90K) reports that "because he was not on the court in December when the case was argued, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. abstained from the ruling, which drew mixed reactions from court observers yesterday."

The Legal Times (3/7, Mauro) reports, "Georgetown law professor Mark Tushnet, a former president of the AALS, predicted that the ruling would lead to an increase in 'the number and intensity of protests against military recruiting in the fall.'"

The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Savage, 958K), USA Today (3/7, Biskupic, 2.31M), Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Teicher, 61K) and Washington Post (3/7, A1, Barbash, Romano, 744K), among other sources, run similar reports this morning.

More Commentary. Under the headline "Army 8, Yale 0," the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) editorializes, "Yesterday the Supreme Court upheld a provision of a law called the Solomon Amendment, which conditions federal funding for colleges and universities on their providing military recruiters the same access they grant to other employers. The decision was no Solomonic compromise but a complete rout of the other-worldly professors who had challenged the law. … . If those who run America's institutions of higher education really have principled objections to the military's presence, let them take a stand by declining taxpayer money. Then the rest of us can find out how much their principles are worth."

The Washington Post (3/7, A16, 744K) editorializes that the ruling "is no surprise. It offers the correct answer to the legal question the case posed: Can the government deny federal money to universities that, in protest of the military's discrimination against homosexual service members, bar military recruiters from campus or grant them access on terms less welcoming than those given to other employers? As the court ruled, the universities don't have a right to that money. But the Pentagon's legal win should not obscure the indefensible nature of the policy that underlies the dispute." However, "the gay ban still needs to be repealed."

Google Court Date Postponed Again. CNET News (3/7) reports, "Google's courtroom date with the U.S. Justice Department has been delayed a second time." CNET continues, "U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, Calif. on Friday postponed the hearing from March 13 to March 14 at 9:00 a.m PT." CNET adds, "The outcome will determine whether the Bush administration will prevail in its fight to force Google to help it defend an anti-pornography law in a trial in Philadelphia this fall. … Although the Justice Department also demanded that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online hand over similar records, Google was the only recipient that chose to fight the subpoena in court."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Probing Mandalay Bay Hotel-Casino's Compliance With ADA. The Las Vegas Business Press (3/7, Miller) reports, "Sixteen years after the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the issue of hotel-casinos' compliance with the law's accessibility guidelines is again emerging as a hot-button issue. Numerous private complaints have been lodged against an assortment of casinos, and the Department of Justice told the Business Press that it is in the midst of a probe involving ADA compliance and Mandalay Bay Resort. … 'It's an ongoing, active investigation. It is the resort in general,' said DOJ spokesman Eric Holland, who couldn't comment further because of the investigation. He added that policy investigations must go through a preliminary review first, then, if warranted, an active investigation will be launched by the Justice Department." The Press continues, "MGM Mirage, which now owns Mandalay Bay, acknowledged the DOJ was looking into issues at the property prior to its absorption of the Mandalay Resort Group, which owned Mandalay Bay. That merger was completed last April. 'The Department of Justice had made that company aware of certain areas of concerns,' said MGM Mirage spokesperson Yvette Monet. 'We are working with the Department of Justice to resolve the issues in a timely manner.' Mandalay Bay's hotel does comply with the ADA's disable accessible room standards, according to information supplied by MGM Mirage. … Two other MGM Mirage-owned properties -- the MGM Grand and New York-New York -- have reached separate settlements with the Justice Department in the past. The agreements, last revised in 2001, called for both resorts to provide more access to disabled people."

Claims Of Anti-Semitic Jury Selection Reach California High Court. The California Recorder (3/7, Mckee) reports, "Attorneys arguing that Alameda County, Calif., prosecutors routinely excluded Jews from death penalty juries have been asked a tricky question: Does it matter if the court record doesn't establish that any of the excused jurors were actually Jewish?" The Recorder continues, "The justices of the California Supreme Court posed that question in a death row inmate's habeas case last month, and they're going to want answers during oral arguments Wednesday in San Francisco. … They also want to know whether there was actual wrongdoing if a prosecutor had a separate, valid reason for removing a juror." The Recorder adds, "The last-minute queries throw a new wrinkle into a case that has fascinated the Bay Area legal community since July 2004. That's when the high court in the habeas corpus case of death row inmate Fred Freeman ordered an investigation into whether the Alameda County district attorney's office -- in collusion with now-deceased Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde -- intentionally purged Jews from capital juries because of a perception that they wouldn't sentence someone to death. … Former Alameda County prosecutor John 'Jack' Quatman, who prosecuted Freeman, raised the allegations, but wound up being branded a 'dishonest and unethical' man by a Santa Clara County Superior Court judge who presided over a weeklong evidentiary hearing 11 months ago. … Judge Kevin Murphy ruled that Freeman got a fair trial and that there was ample evidence Quatman fabricated his claims to embarrass Alameda County DA Tom Orloff, who took Quatman off capital cases in 1993. … The latest questions by the Supreme Court seem to indicate that the justices could be leaning toward deciding the case on a narrow issue, possibly whether jurors were let go simply because they appeared Jewish or that their surnames -- Mishell, Peisker and Laput -- sounded Jewish."

Judge Calls for Elimination Of Preemptory Challenges In Jury Selection. Morris B. Hoffman, a state trial judge and an adjunct professor of law at the University of Colorado, writes in the New York Times (3/7) criticizes the jury selection process in US trials a "side show" that "all too often takes over the circus in American trials." Hoffman notes, "Since peremptory challenges are not mandated by the federal or any state constitutions, Congress and state legislatures could abolish them tomorrow."

South Dakota Enacts Abortion Ban In Bid To Test Roe. Gov. Mike Rounds of South Dakota yesterday signed into law a bill banning abortion except to save the life of the mother. State legislators had enacted the measure in an attempt to get the US Supreme Court to reconsider its decision in Roe vs. Wade, which legalized abortion. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A5) reports the bill "would make it a crime for doctors to perform an abortion unless the procedure was necessary to save the woman's life. It would make no exception for cases of rape or incest."

The story was covered in a full segment by NBC, while ABC and CBS reported the story briefly. NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 10, 2:10, Tibbles) reported it is "a day South Dakota Governor Mike Rounds has been planning for." Gov. Mike Rounds, South Dakota: "We'll send a message to those individuals who are pro-life that we have tried the direct, frontal assault on Roe v. Wade." Tibbles: "The bill's sponsor says the ultimate goal is to force a showdown at the nation's highest court." Roger Hunt, South Dakota House of Representatives: "The United States Supreme Court is recognizing that there is a growing momentum to revisit Roe v. Wade." Tibbles: "Legislatures in at least 10 other states are considering their own abortion bans. Mississippi's could pass as early as next week."

ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 8, Vargas) reported the law "was designed by lawmakers to invoke a legal battle they hope will lead to the overturning of Roe versus Wade." The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 5, 0:20, Schieffer) reported, "Lower Federal courts are almost certain to block the law before it takes effect July 1st." CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, King) reported that "that's just what supporters want, a direct challenge to the 1973 high court decision legalizing abortion." The New York Times (3/7, Davey, 1.19M) also says the law "will force a legal showdown before it ever comes into effect, an outcome its supporters, eager to overturn Roe, intended."

USA Today (3/7, Lawrence, 2.31M) reports, "Passions among supporters of the law were also running high. State Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican sponsor of the law, said an unidentified donor has already given $1 million to offset legal costs." USA Today (3/7, Lawrence, 2.31M) runs a second story, reporting the "new law…is creating a rift among anti-abortion Republicans during an election year. … Some Republican abortion opponents say they would prefer to continue the incremental approach that has resulted in increasing restrictions on abortion. They worry South Dakota's frontal assault could scare away moderates, light a fire under liberals and even set back the anti-abortion cause." The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Muskal, 958K) reports Planned Parenthood "runs the state's only clinic where abortions are performed. About 800 abortions are done each year in South Dakota."

Report Finds Minorities Are Moving To Sun Belt. A Brookings Institution report to be released today says that almost one-third of US metropolitan areas have seen declines in their white populations this decade as minorities have brought diversity to large sections of the country. USA Today (3/7, El Nasser, 2.31M) reports, "The influx of immigrants and people moving to the Sun Belt and Western mountain states from other parts of the USA is rearranging the ethnic tapestry of urban centers in an unprecedented way. Blacks, Hispanics and Asians are going where the jobs are. They're driving population increases in the fastest-growing areas, including Las Vegas, Atlanta and Orlando, says demographer William Frey, author of the report on shifts in populations from 2000 to 2004."

Whites Could Be Minority In New York City Area Within Few Years. Demographers say the influx of foreigners to the New York city area combined with the continuing exodus or non-Hispanic whites to other parts of the country will result in whites being a minority of the region's population within a few years. The New York Times (3/7, Roberts, 1.19M) reports, "The shift would make New York the first large metropolitan area outside the South and West in which whites do not make up a majority, according to an analysis of 2004 Census estimates by the Brookings Institution that was released yesterday."

ANTITRUST:

Antitrust Approval Of AT&T-BellSouth Deal Seen As Likely. The Austin American-Statesman (3/7, Geewax) reports, "The Justice Department likely will approve AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. without demanding any major antitrust concessions, analysts said Monday. … But the Federal Communications Commission, which also must review the transaction, may consider restricting the new company from charging new fees for faster delivery of premium Internet services, they predicted." The American-Statesman continues, "Together, AT&T and BellSouth would become the nation's No. 1 supplier of local, long-distance, wireless and high-speed-Internet services. … In recent reviews of telecom mergers, however, Justice Department officials decided that size alone could not shield phone companies from competition from cable, satellite and other companies providing telecom services. … As a result, the Justice Department demanded no significant changes in those cases, so 'we see no reason why it would treat this case differently,' according to an assessment issued by Anna-Maria Kovacs, president of Regulatory Source Associates LLC, a research firm in Cambridge, Mass."

Dow Jones (3/7) reports that the deal "will face few antitrust hurdles…analysts predicted Monday. … Announced Sunday, the deal follows SBC Communications Inc.'s acquisition of AT&T and the formation of the new AT&T Inc. in November. It also follows Verizon Communications' February 2005 purchase of MCI Corp. … Both those recent deals, observers say, give regulators case histories from which to work. … 'They have a template to look at these things and follow the same framework,' said Paul Glenchur of Stanford Washington Research Group. … 'I don't think there's going to be a great deal of regulatory resistance,' said Jonathan Rubin, a research fellow at the American Antitrust Institute."

Reuters (3/7) reports, "U.S. communications regulators and antitrust authorities on Monday pledged to carefully review AT&T Inc.'s $65 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp….. 'We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services,' Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement." Reuters adds, "The agency must determine whether the deal benefits the public. The transaction must also receive approval from U.S. Justice Department antitrust authorities. … 'We're going to look at it closely,' the department's antitrust chief Thomas Barnett told reporters while attending a conference of attorneys general. … Analysts said they expect the deal to be approved, likely with similar conditions that were attached to two telecommunications deals given the green light last year, Verizon Communications' purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications acquisition of AT&T Corp. to form AT&T Inc. … Lawmakers also said they plan to review the deal."

Dow Jones (3/7) reports that the proposed deal "is stirring up some unease on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers and competing telecommunications companies are questioning whether the transaction requires special scrutiny." Dow Jones continues, "Concerns hinge in on the size of the deal and on expectations that AT&T's purchase will escalate a trend of consolidation in the telecommunications industry. … 'AT&T's proposal to purchase BellSouth would remove yet another potential competitor from the communications marketplace and calls into question whether the future of communications policy will be marked by strategies to promote vigorous competition or by further efforts to facilitate new mergers,' Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the top Democrat on the Senate Commerce Committee said in a statement." Dow Jones notes, "The transaction comes amid a favorable political climate for mergers, as the Bush administration has been friendly to large combinations. Many observers expect the Federal Communications Commission and antitrust regulators to approve the deal with few conditions even amid concerns the deal would leave companies with too much pricing power and consumers with two few choices."

AT&T Plans To Cut 10,000 Jobs After BellSouth Purchase. Bloomberg (3/7) reports, "AT&T Inc.…plans to eliminate about 10,000 jobs after completing the $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. … The reductions will come in 2007 through 2009, Chief Financial Officer Rick Lindner said on a conference call today with analysts. With BellSouth and Cingular, San Antonio-based AT&T's workforce will rise to 317,000 from 189,000, making AT&T among the top 10 U.S. employers, according to Bloomberg data." Bloomberg adds, "Job cuts, which are about 3 percent of total employment, represent about 50 percent of the planned $18 billion in cost savings AT&T expects to extract from the purchase. The acquisition will cement AT&T's position as the dominant U.S. provider of local, long-distance and wireless calling and enable it to better fend off new competition from cable-television companies and Internet calling companies. … The reductions, which Lindner said will come mostly through attrition, are in addition to the 13,000 jobs that AT&T plans to shed as part of last year's combination between SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which created the largest U.S. phone provider. BellSouth and Cingular add 128,000 workers to the payroll."

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Could Change Vodafone-Verizon Dynamic. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Bryan-low, Singer, Sharma) reports, "AT&T INC.'S planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. not only changes the U.S. telecommunications landscape but could cause an unexpected shift in the dynamic between Britain's Vodafone Group PLC and Verizon Communications Inc., the co-owners of Verizon Wireless." The Journal adds, "Verizon has long been interested in buying out Vodafone's 45% stake in the venture, but has been holding out for the right terms. For months, Vodafone has been under pressure from investors to do a deal in order to generate cash for the company and pay out dividends to large shareholders. That gave Verizon the upper hand. … But now Verizon needs to get control of the venture more than ever, analysts say, just to keep pace with AT&T, which will take full control of cellular carrier Cingular Wireless and thus increase its exposure to the telecom industry's growth area. The power balance may have shifted in Vodafone's favor."

The Financial Times (3/7, Taylor, Van Duyn, Politi) reports that the merger announcement "increased the pressure on rivals including Verizon Communications to join an industry-wide consolidation." The Times continues, "The BellSouth purchase would also give AT&T sole control of Cingular Wireless, the biggest wireless carrier in the US. As a result, analysts noted, Verizon, its main rival, would be under pressure to buy out Vodafone's 45 per cent stake in Verizon Wireless. … Shares in Vodafone gained 2.9 per cent in London to close at 125 pence. Verizon's shares were up 1.25 per cent at $34 at noon in New York. … 'Verizon may be pressured more to improve its business mix by becoming increasingly focused on its attempt to buy out the remaining 45 per cent of Verizon Wireless from Vodafone,' said Jason Armstrong of Goldman Sachs in a note to investors."

The Washington Post (3/7, D1, Mohammed) reports, "With Sunday's announcement of AT&T's agreement to buy BellSouth Corp. for about $67 billion in stock, (AT&T Chairman Edward E.) Whitacre, 64, capped a career that has transformed what was once the smallest of the Baby Bells, Southwestern Bell Corp., into the largest local-phone and wireless company in the country. … What immediately followed was speculation about what Verizon's (Chairman Ivan G.) Seidenberg, 59, might do next to one-up his biggest competitor for more than a decade. He has already said publicly that he'd like to buy out Vodafone Group PLC's 45 percent stake in Verizon Wireless, the second-largest U.S. mobile phone company."

Qwest Could Get Buyout Offer After AT&T Deal. USA Today (3/7, Iwata, Davidson) reports, "For months, Qwest has been considered anything but a prized acquisition target — mostly because of its heavy debt and its lack of the large-scale wireless and high-speed Internet assets that are the communications industry's engines for growth in coming years. … That view might be changing in the wake of AT&T's proposed $67 billion purchase of BellSouth." USA continues, "Qwest — as well as Alltel and Sprint Nextel — could become an acquisition target, as Verizon scrambles to keep pace with AT&T, predicts analyst Ken McGee at technology consultant Gartner. … A combined AT&T and BellSouth would knock Verizon from its No. 1 perch in the industry and put it at a disadvantage in both the wireless and large-business markets, possibly forcing it to respond, says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Chris King." USA adds, "McGee predicts that Qwest will garner Verizon's interest as merger bait. 'They're unlikely to remain an orphan,' he says, noting that Qwest CEO Richard Notebaert has kept Qwest from a bankruptcy reorganization and appears to be slowly turning it around. 'Qwest must feel awfully lonely sitting there, watching everyone else dance.'"

AT&T Back On Top 22 Years After Breakup. The Washington Post (3/7, D5, Noguchi) reports, "Just a year ago, the hallowed AT&T Inc. brand appeared to be in its twilight, on the cusp of being merged out of existence. Now, with a proposed $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., the AT&T name is about to retake its place as the biggest brand in telecommunications." The Post adds, "Though it's been hard to track the complicated handoff of the AT&T name in recent years, it's clear that the new AT&T is a far cry from the old 'Ma Bell' company that was formed after Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876. … Before the breakup of the monopoly in 1984, there was effectively one company, AT&T, which sold telephones and supplied local and long-distance services. That was before cellular phones and the Internet. After the breakup, AT&T became a long-distance phone company. … In the late 1990s, AT&T for a brief period had a host of services under its umbrella. In addition to being the largest long-distance provider, it had a wireless operation, offered cable TV services, and sold dial-up and later high-speed Internet services. Over time, the pieces were spun off or sold. … By early last year, all iterations of the AT&T brand seemed headed for the dustbin of history -- again. In 2004, AT&T Wireless was subsumed by Cingular Wireless. … . Cingular's parent companies, BellSouth and SBC Communications Inc., had proposed an acquisition of AT&T, leaving no apparent heir to the name. But as marketing experts predicted, after closing its merger last year, SBC ditched its three-letter acronym for the nationally recognized AT&T name, which it now calls 'the new AT&T' in its advertisements."

Scripps Howard (3/7, Deibel) reports, "AT&T's $67-billion bid for BellSouth seems on the surface to go a long way toward reconstituting the old telephone monopoly, but 24 years after federal trustbusters forced the breakup, it's not your father's Ma Bell anymore. … Today's era of wireless and fiber optics convergence is light years away from the competitive landscape that U.S. District Judge Harold Green confronted when he OK'd the 1982 consent decree that divided AT&T into seven regional Bell operating companies two years later. … At stake now are upstart, low-cost challenges from Internet, cable and wireless competition, telecom analysts say."

Merger Could Lead To Lower Prices For Consumers. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Young, Vascellaro) reports, "The $67 billion merger that will make BellSouth Corp. part of AT&T Inc. is expected to accelerate the battle of the bundles. … The cable industry and the phone companies are aggressively competing to attract new customers by offering attractively priced packages of home phone, Internet, cable and cellphone services. AT&T Chairman and Chief Executive Edward Whitacre has long identified $100 as a potential target price for a package of those four services. While that price hasn't been offered yet, the merger increases the pressure on the phone and cable rivals to deliver more competitive packages as a way to keep competing services from poaching customers." The Journal adds, "Prices are already in the $100 range for packages that don't include wireless -- and industry executives expect them to come down. A larger AT&T will be able to compete more aggressively with cable companies and, after cutting costs, will likely be able to reduce prices of service packages."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Trumbull, Marks) reports, "Changes in the communications industry are spawning vast new choices - but not necessarily lower bills - for American consumers who dial, click, and channel surf. … Cellphones now carry video as well as voice. The Internet can be used for phone calls as well as data downloading. And television is fast becoming a digital medium, where content can be stored and retrieved anytime … This is the 'digital convergence' of communication platforms that telecom and cable companies have long been trying to create. The process holds great promise but means more volatility for consumers and firms. … The latest jolt is this week's announcement by AT&T that it plans to acquire BellSouth Corp. Together, the firms would create the world's biggest telecommunications company in terms of market capitalization and combine many of the pieces of the old 'Ma Bell' that in 1984 was broken into eight pieces by an antitrust settlement. … Indeed, for all the new competition, the scale of this $67 billion deal is just one sign of the market clout that telecom and cable companies still retain. The word monopoly no longer applies. But Americans are spending more than ever on communications services, and regulators still have a role to play as guardians of competition, consumer advocates say."

USA Today (3/7, Davidson) reports, "AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth gave fresh ammunition Monday to critics of a push by the big local phone companies to charge websites fees to ensure fast delivery of their content." USA continues, "Even before the deal, AT&T and BellSouth discussed plans to charge Internet-based phone company Vonage, Google and other Web providers new fees to ensure speedy delivery of their phone calls, video or other content. Though proposals in Congress would bar phone companies from blocking access to rival websites, none would prohibit their offering enhanced services." USA adds, "The question of whether an even bigger AT&T should have to comply with Internet non-discrimination principles is expected to take center stage as consumer advocates urge regulators to reject the deal. Some rivals say arguments for such restraints are bolstered by the clout a bigger AT&T customer base would have. 'Arguably, there's less competition as a result of these mergers,' says Paul Meisner of Amazon. … Consumer groups also fear the $67 billion deal will hamper competition for wireless and large business customers, driving up prices."

Deal Will Intensify Competition In Phone, TV, Internet. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Grant, Schatz) reports, "The picture just got fuzzier for the cable-TV industry, a once-mighty monopoly now under assault by new technology and corporate mergers." The Journal adds, "Even before AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp….cable companies were under growing pressure. Their stocks have steadily declined amid investor alarm at new competition from satellite and phone companies. The explosion of video on the Internet is conjuring up a future when a cable middleman may no longer be necessary. Regulators are pushing the industry on decency issues and pricing policies. … And cable's once-commanding lead in the sale of high-speed Internet connections has eroded as telephone companies have steeply discounted competing offers. Cable used to enjoy a two-thirds market share, but in the past year telephone companies have picked up more new customers than cable operators did. … Now the AT&T megadeal could create the largest competitor yet for cable operators in the new race to sell packages of phone, TV and Internet services. Among phone companies, AT&T already had the most aggressive plans for pushing into the TV and broadband markets."

Consumers Groups Vow To Oppose Merger. The AP (3/7, Powell) reports, "Several of the nation's largest consumer groups said Monday they would oppose AT&T's purchase of BellSouth Corp., arguing that the deal will reduce competition and drive up prices in the telecommunications industry." The AP continues, "Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America said they would urge the Justice Department to block AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion offer. … The consumer groups also asked their members to contact the Federal Communications Commission, which must approve the acquisition, and to petition their congressmen to try to prevent the deal from going through." The AP adds, "The consumer groups warned that increasing consolidation in the telephone industry would boost the prices for local, long-distance and cell phone services. They added that more-limited choices for phone service — along with a similar merger trend in the cable industry — threatened to reduce the variety of broadband Internet services available to consumers. … 'If approved, this merger will lead to higher local, long-distance and cell phone prices for consumers across the country,' said Gene Kimmelman, a vice president of Consumers Union, which is headquartered in Yonkers, N.Y. … At the very least, Kimmelman said, federal regulators should 'require the merging companies to sell their Cingular wireless business to create more opportunities for competition between wireless and wireline services.'"

The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 1, 1:50, Schieffer) reported, "Consumer groups vowed today to stop the proposed $67 billion merger of AT&T and BellSouth. And some of the workers may hope they do stop it because AT&T has already said if the deal goes through, they intend to lay off as many as 10,000 people. The consumer groups say a merger would mean less competition in the telecom industry and higher prices for consumers." NBC Nightly News (3/6, lead story, 2:20, Thompson) reported, "For some, this acquisition has an unsettling sense of deja vu. 22 years ago, a court order split AT&T into seven regional companies. Four of those companies are now part of AT&T again, leading some to wonder if ol' Ma Bell is back." Rep. Edward J. Markey, Massachusetts: "We have to make sure that this deal doesn't send us backwards, back to 20 years ago, when AT&T had a monopoly." NBC Nightly News (3/6, story 2, 2:00, Quintanilla) ran a similar story.

Deal Could Undermine Telephone Industry's Broader Agenda. The New York Times (3/7, Labaton, 1.19M) reports that AT&T's proposal to buy BellSouth is a sign of "how far the regulatory climate, as well as the marketplace, has traveled in less than a decade, as the cable and phone industries have gotten into each other's businesses and new forms of phone service have grown. … The deal threatens to undermine parts of the telephone industry's broader regulatory and legislative agenda by making it more difficult for the industry to claim it badly needs relief from regulators and Congress."

FCC, Telecom Law Changes Could Affect Merger Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Schatz, Squeo) reports, "As AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. make the case for their $67 billion merger, they'll be counting on their vaunted lobbying clout to win over skeptical lawmakers and regulators. … Their efforts could be complicated by two factors: The changing makeup of the Federal Communications Commission and a push to rewrite the landmark 1996 telecommunications law." The Journal adds, "Regulatory experts say that given (FCC Chairman Kevin) Martin's push last year to impose minimal conditions on SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI, it would be surprising if he reversed his stance." The Journal notes, "Mr. Martin, though, represents just one vote on a five-member commission. The two Democrats likely will cast a skeptical eye toward such a transaction, especially given talk by phone companies to charge technology companies extra to guarantee speedy delivery on their networks. And the Bells may not be able to count on Mr. Martin's two Republican colleagues because of a shift in the makeup of the commission."

Two CEOs Likely To Play Big Role In Telecom Titan. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Searcey) reports, "Over the years, AT&T Inc. chairman Edward Whitacre and BellSouth Corp. chief executive Duane Ackerman had talked many times about a deal before they finally agreed to the largest one in the history of the U.S. telecommunications industry. … In two years, though, both likely will be retired. The Journal continues, "Before the deal Randall Stephenson, AT&T's chief operating officer, and Mark Feidler, who held the same title at BellSouth, were widely acknowledged to be the heirs apparent of their respective companies once their bosses retire. While it is likely they will play significant leadership roles in the combined company, analysts and investors believe that Mr. Stephenson has the inside track to be chief executive. … 'Randall is clearly the anointed one within AT&T and Mark as the No. 2 in BellSouth needs to know that he'll have to be No. 2 or 3 in the new entity,' says a consultant who has worked with both companies. … Both men declined to be interviewed yesterday. But people familiar with the situation say that Mr. Stephenson, who has spent his 24-year career with the company mainly overseeing telecom finances, and Mr. Feidler, a former corporate lawyer and investment banker, have both been supporters of a deal between BellSouth and AT&T. The two executives have a good working relationship and already have one deal in common. They both helped negotiate the Cingular Wireless acquisition of AT&T Wireless. BellSouth and AT&T own Cingular in a joint venture."

WSJournal Says Changing Technology Driving Industry Consolidation. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) says that while "all this telecom consolidation may or may not pay off for shareholders, the benefits to consumers are clear." The Journal adds, "Typical was the response from Massachusetts Democrat Ed Markey, a senior Member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who said 'Twenty years after the government broke up Ma Bell, this deal represents a mother-and-child reunion.' But the child has grown up and the mother has changed, even if Mr. Markey's rhetoric hasn't. Consolidation is being driven, as it should, by changing technologies, and by all manner of competition in a telecom world that Ma Bell wouldn't recognize."

More Commentary. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/7), Bret Swanson, a senior fellow at Seattle's Discovery Institute and an editor of the Gilder Technology Report, writes, "Ma Bell's back: Run for your lives! -- or at least to the halls of Congress. That, it seems, is the overheated conventional wisdom. But the $170 billion combination of AT&T and BellSouth into the world's largest telecom company is a perfectly natural progression of business and technology. The merger will rationalize a market beset by decades of political mismanagement." Swanson adds, "Although this latest reintegration will not reduce the number of competitors in the marketplace, it is sure to supercharge the ever-present denunciations of monopoly that are behind every effort to regulate telecom. This time around, the main agent is the colossus Google. Exactly one decade after the disastrous 1996 act set us on a path for the telecom crash and a plunge to 16th in world broadband rankings, Google is leading an alliance of politicians, lobbyists and interested companies under the aegis of 'net neutrality.' If enacted, it will repeat the most basic mistakes of earlier legislation."

USA Today (3/7) editorializes, "Given the current, accommodating state of antitrust policy and the arrival of cable as a competitor in broadband and telephony, this deal might well be approved by federal regulators. It might even create economies of scale that would make the combination more efficient than the sum of its parts. … But it also should raise red flags for Congress and federal regulators. For all the talk of robust competition between cable and telephone, the reality has been less impressive. The most intense competition and the fastest roll-outs of new services have been largely limited to affluent areas. … What's more, the merger raises questions about the future of the Internet and digital entertainment. … For that reason, lawmakers and members of the Federal Communications Commission should take a long, hard look at where the Internet is headed and what might be done to prevent a handful of companies from gaining a chokehold over an evolving medium that is one of history's great innovations."

The Los Angeles Times (3/7) editorializes, "AT&T…now finds itself at the center of one of the largest mergers in business history. And concerns about the dangers of the" the purchase of BellSouth by AT& T "are exaggerated as well." The Times says the "merger would have practically no immediate effect on BellSouth's or AT&T's market. Customers would neither gain nor lose any options for phone, high-speed Internet or wireless services." In fact, the "proposed merger could actually promote…competition." Still, "regulators shouldn't just wave the merger through." The Times recommends, "Rather than trusting the company not to hamper the Internet or play favorites, regulators should require it to pledge to preserve a level playing field for all websites, programmers and services as a condition of the BellSouth deal."

Hybrid Program Seen As Key To NYSE Group's Future. The AP (3/7, Martinez) reports, "When the New York Stock Exchange transforms into a publicly traded company Tuesday, its agenda - staying competitive with faster all-electronic markets - will remain in place even as its corporate structure changes." The AP continues, "The NYSE's 214-year existence as a non-for-profit institution will end when it closes its $9 billion acquisition of all-electronic rival Archipelago Holdings Inc. On Wednesday, the combined company, called NYSE Group Inc., will begin trading on the floor of the Big Board under the symbol NYX." The AP adds, "Unfettered from the NYSE's seat holder leadership structure, in which the owners of 1,366 seats had a strong say in the direction of the Big Board, NYSE Group Chief Executive John Thain has big plans for the exchange, including trading options and corporate bonds, the possibility of extended trading hours and acquisitions of other exchanges and companies. … But as the $9 billion acquisition closes, the exchange can't look too far ahead, nor too quickly. The linchpin of its future is not new products or acquisitions, but its core business of trading stocks. And with the Nasdaq Stock Market's electronic trading platform slowly eating away at the NYSE's market share, the NYSE's new 'hybrid' program - the merging of electronic trading with traditional floor auctions - must be a fast and sure success."

Blackstone To Purchase CarrAmerica For $5.6 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Forsyth) reports, "Blackstone Group agreed to acquire CarrAmerica Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust with office properties across the U.S., for $5.6 billion." The Journal continues, "The deal is the largest in a string of transactions in which publicly traded real-estate companies have been bought by private or institutional investors willing to pay a premium for companies they believe are undervalued by Wall Street. .. Blackstone, a New York-based private-equity firm, has been aggressive in acquiring real-estate companies but has focused on the hotel sector. Two weeks ago, it said it would acquire MeriStar Hospitality Corp., a hotel REIT, for $940 million, plus debt, in a deal valued at $2.6 billion. The decision to grab a large office REIT is seen as an endorsement of the improving office market."

JP Morgan To Pay $1.5 Billion For Kohl's Card Unit. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Sidel) reports, "J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to buy the credit-card operations of department-store chain Kohl's Corp. for $1.5 billion, reflecting the bank's push into the lucrative 'private-label' business." The Journal continues, "It is the latest in a flurry of deals in which retailers have shed their in-house card businesses to concentrate on core operations. Last year, for example, Federated Department Stores Inc. sold its private-label business to Citigroup Inc. … And British bank HSBC Holdings PLC recently snapped up the private-label portfolio of Neiman Marcus Group Inc." The Journal adds, "For banks, the private-label portfolios are attractive at a time when profit growth has been slowing for general-purpose cards -- those branded by card-issuing financial institutions and card associations such as Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard International Inc. … J.P. Morgan executives have repeatedly said they want to acquire more private-label portfolios; both Citigroup and General Electric Co. already have large presences in this area."

Linde Likely Clinches BOC Deal With Increased Bid. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Hromadko, Esterl) reports, "German industrial conglomerate Linde AG raised its takeover bid for U.K.-based gas company BOC Group PLC to £16 ($28.06) a share, likely clinching a deal that will create the world's largest industrial-gas company in terms of sales." The Journal continues, "Linde said it intends to fund the deal -- which values BOC at £8.2 billion ($14.4 billion) -- with a fresh issue of equity and debt. … The transaction would create a leading world-wide industrial-gas and engineering group with combined sales of €11.9 billion ($14.3 billion), said Linde, based in Wiesbaden, Germany. The supplier of industrial gases, engineering services and forklift trucks said the BOC management board intends to recommend that its shareholders accept the offer. The bid represents a 39% premium to BOC's share price prior to Linde's offer in January."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Democrats Object To ANWR Language In Bush Budget. Democrats on the Senate Budget Committee said yesterday they oppose putting language in the 2007 budget bill that assumes the government will raise billions of dollars in oil drilling leases from ANWR. Reuters (3/6, Doggett) reported, "In its budget proposal to Congress, the Bush administration said it expected $7 billion would be raised by allowing oil drilling in the Alaskan refuge, and the Congressional Budget Office puts the figure at $6 billion. … 'It is irresponsible to base the country's budget on highly speculative and dubious projections of lease revenues for the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge,' all nine Democrats on the budget panel said in a letter to the committee's Republican chairman, Judd Gregg."

Panel Issues New Guidelines For Flu Vaccines. The Washington Post (3/7, B1, Levine, 744K) reports that after hearing testimony from Gary Stein, whose 4 year old daughter Jessica died of the flu, the federal Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, "voted for a surprise revision in national policy: It unanimously recommended that starting this fall, all children between 2 and 5 years old be vaccinated annually against influenza. … Children still suffer a 'substantial' amount of influenza, however, said Raymond A. Strikas, an associate director at the National Immunization Program, which is part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. And that was the major impetus for the committee's decision late last month. Its expanded coverage even includes parents and older siblings, because they also suffer by getting sick themselves or taking time off work to care for ailing youngsters. All told, nearly 17 million additional people now will be urged to get protection against the flu, bringing the total to more than 120 million men, women and children across the United States."

NYTimes Says Navy Should Be Cautious When Using Sonar. An editorial in the New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) says, "The debate over whether the Navy's use of sonar to detect submarines is harming whales and other sound-sensitive species is back again. … No one can deny that the Navy needs to conduct sonar training in shallow waters, where sound propagates differently than in the deep ocean. But at a time when evidence is mounting that sonar has been responsible for at least some of the whale strandings around the world — and when we do not yet know what caused a large stranding last year in North Carolina — it behooves the Navy to move with extreme caution."

Sixteen Arrested On South Dakota Reservation For Drug Trafficking. Indian Country Today (3/7, Melmer) reports, "Sixteen people on the Pine Ridge Reservation have been charged with possession of cocaine and marijuana and with the intent to distribute the drugs. The arrests, which came days after national news organizations ran stories about drug trafficking on American Indian reservations, were not intended to coincide with those articles, according to Paul McCabe, FBI spokesman from the Minneapolis regional office." Indian Country notes McCabe said that arresting officers "stopped in a local restaurant and were greeted by locals with pats on the back and congratulatory praise, thanking them and saying, 'We appreciate it - get them out of here.' He added that the case is still under investigation and people may come forward with more information as long as it remains open."

Israel Extradites Alleged Drug-Trafficking Mob Boss To US. The AP (3/7, Heller) reports, "A suspected Israeli mob boss, described by U.S. prosecutors as one of the world's most wanted drug traffickers, was extradited to the United States on Monday, police said." The AP continues, "Zeev Rosenstein, suspected of involvement in distributing more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the United States, mostly in New York and Miami, was handed over to U.S. marshals at Ben Gurion International Airport near Tel Aviv arport and taken aboard a direct El Al flight to Miami, where he will face the drug charges, police spokesman Mickey Rosenfeld said." The AP adds, "The target of numerous gangland assassination attemps in the past, Rosenstein was driven to the airport in an undercover police car accompanied by several motorcycles, Israeli radios reported." Rosenfeld "said the extradition was the result of a long investigation conducted in coordination with U.S. law enforcement agencies. … Israeli police, acting on an international arrest warrant, arrested Rosenstein more than a year ago for allegedly smuggling drugs from Europe to the United States. … A U.S. extradition request, submitted in December 2004, said Rosenstein was involved in distributing more than 1 million pills of Ecstasy, court documents said."

Cable TV Coverage. Bloomberg –TV (3/6, 2:00 p.m.) reported, "A suspected Israeli mob boss, described by US prosecutors as one of the world's most-wanted drug traffickers, has been extradited to the US. He's suspected in involvement in distributing more than one million Ecstasy bills in the United States, mostly in New York and Miami. Israeli police arrested Rosenstein more than a year ago."

Local TV Coverage. WKRN-TV, Nashville, Tennessee (3/6, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "One of the world's most wanted drug kingpins was put on a plane for the US. Man Extradited From Saint Kitts To Face Drug Charges In US. The AP (3/6) reports, "Federal officials say a man accused of importing cocaine has been extradited from his native Saint Kitts in the Caribbean. Noel Heath was one of the top ten fugitives of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York field division." According to the AP, In 1995, Heath was indicted on charges of conspiring to import more than eleven pounds of cocaine in the Rochester, New York, area.

DEA Agent Accused Of Embezzling. The Atlanta Business Chronicle (3/7) reports, "A DEA agent who worked at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport has been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of embezzling money as a federal officer, embezzling public money and money laundering. Gregory Campion, 44, of Orlando, Fla., is expected to be arraigned…on March 8." Campion is accused of stealing cash from a storage vault. The Chronicle says the money had been seized by law enforcement agents as currency involved in federal drug offenses and was subject to forfeiture to the U.S. The report notes that Campion has been suspended without pay.

California Man Arrested For Impersonating DEA Agent. The AP (3/7) reports federal authorities arrested a Manteca, California, man for impersonating a DEA agent by showing a phony badge as he entered a courtroom. "Thirty-seven-year-old John D. Cohen picked the wrong courthouse security officer to try to dupe -- a retired DEA special agent. The officer told the U-S Marshal's Service the badge looked suspicious." The AP says agents later found guns, DEA apparel, a police uniform, handcuffs, bulletproof vests and forged law enforcement training certificates at Cohen's home.

The Sacramento Bee (3/6) writes Cohen "presented a fake DEA badge to security officers at the Sacramento federal courthouse last week."

The Contra Costa (CA) Times (3/6, Fischer) reports, "Federal authorities say a Pleasanton mortgage broker posing as a narcotics agent entered a secure portion of Coast Guard Island in Alameda last month and sold guards a Ford Crown Victoria he claimed was a retired police car. That breach was the first of two in February that attracted real agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency." On Monday, DEA agents "visited the Manteca home of…Cohen and seized a cache of weapons and law enforcement paraphernalia, along with Cohen himself."

Local TV Coverage. KOVR-TV, Sacramento-Stockton-Modesto, California (3/6, 10:00 p.m.) reported, "Tonight a man is under arrest for posing as a federal drug agent…federal agents arrested 37-year-old John Cohen. The first red flag went up last week when he flashed a fake ID to the wrong person; the phony badge was only the beginning. DEA agent Gordon Taylor said the phony badge John Cohen flashed last week would pass as the real deal to a lay person but not to the security officer who knows the real badge would have an ID number."

Tandy Listed Among Defendants In Death-Row Lawsuit. The Terre Haute (IN) Tribune Star (3/7) reports three federal death-row inmates who contend that lethal injections are painful have been granted a stay of execution. In one case death-row inmate Clarence Edward Hill is suing the state of Florida, "alleging that lethal injection would violate his constitutional protection from cruel and unusual punishment." The U.S. Supreme Court "has agreed to hear the Florida case, to determine whether Hill's civil suit falls within federal appeals, as lower courts have ruled, or is a legitimate challenge to the conditions of a condemned inmate's death sentence." The Tribune Star says separately, attorneys also are alleging in a federal lawsuit that lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment, and defendants in the case include Karen Tandy.

California Marijuana Clubs Said To Fear More Raids. The San Diego Union-Tribune (3/6, Mcdonald) reports, "Nearly three months after federal agents raided 13 medical marijuana dispensaries in San Diego County, the government has yet to make any arrests or file any criminal charges. Most of the pot clubs that closed during the high-profile searches reopened days later. Meanwhile, at least 10 new dispensaries, cooperatives and delivery services have set up shop." However, the Union-Tribune says some worry that federal agents will show up with warrants in hand and eventually force the clubs to close for good.

Bush Budget Blamed For Opening Southern Border To Increased Drug Trafficking. Senior Congressional and Colombian officials are blaming a Bush Administration decision to divert money for Colombian drug interdiction and eradication programs to the war on terrorism for opening up the southern US border to a new wave of cocaine and heroin. The Washington Times (3/7, Seper, 90K) reports that some lawmakers "plan to bypass the White House by dipping into a $72.4 billion supplemental appropriation for the war on terrorism to fund $99.4 million in military and police aid to Colombia. An amendment to the pending emergency supplemental bill likely will be offered by Republican Reps. Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, chairman of the House International Relations Committee, and Dan Burton of Indiana, a member of the House Government Reform Committee. It would pay for three DC-3 marine patrol aircraft for the Colombian navy and two UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters and 10 Huey II helicopters for the Colombian national police."

DEA Agents Find Meth "Superlab" In Georgia, 3 Arrested. UPI/Washington Times (3/6) writes, "U.S. federal drug agents said they have broken up a methamphetamine 'superlab' in Smyrna, Ga., and confiscated more than 12 pounds of the drug. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency said they arrested three men -- all illegal aliens from Mexico -- and that on Monday two of the defendants pleaded guilty to charges that include manufacturing methamphetamine." According to UPI, the DEA said 24 large trash bags also were found filled with emptied pseudoephedrine tablet boxes.

ATF Probes Florida Warehouse Fire. The Miami Herald (3/7, Fantz) reports, "An investigative team from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms will begin examining what's left of a Pompano Beach warehouse gutted by an unrelenting inferno that began at 8 p.m. Friday and raged throughout the night." The Herald continues, "Officials who tried to stamp out the blaze at Pallet Consultant Corp. on Southwest 12th Avenue reported flames reaching 100 feet into the air. The blaze could be seen two miles away. … Sandra King, spokeswoman for the Pompano Beach Fire-Rescue, said one of the 120 firefighters from North Lauderdale, Fort Lauderdale, Lighthouse Point, Margate, and Broward Fire-Rescue was injured when a loaded water hose slammed into his stomach. He was treated and released Friday from North Ridge Medical Center in Fort Lauderdale. … King said ATF and explosive experts will help discern the cause of the blaze because propane tanks inside hundreds of pallets exploded. Damage is estimated to be $10 million to three businesses within the six-acre property."

IMMIGRATION:

RICO Being Used Against Employers Who Hire Illegal Workers. The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Gaouette) reports from Caldwell, Idaho, "Like many communities, this fast-growing agricultural pocket of southwestern Idaho is paying a high tab for illegal immigration. … When an illegal worker gave birth to a premature baby, Canyon County wound up with a $174,000 hospital bill. County officials say the jail spent thousands to house another illegal immigrant at a motel, after his tuberculosis threatened to infect fellow inmates. … But where others have merely chafed at paying costs like these, officials in Canyon County are trying a novel approach: The all-Republican county commission has filed a racketeering lawsuit against four big businesses in the area, charging that they deliberately hire illegal workers." The Times adds, "The spectacle of the county's political leaders taking its businesses to court has touched off a bitter local debate. But it has also put Canyon County, a largely Republican community of about 160,000, at the forefront of an emerging national effort to use racketeering laws to crack down on illegal immigration by seeking damages from employers. … So far, a handful of workers and businesses around the country have filed civil lawsuits under the RICO statute, known formally as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. The targets are companies that, the lawsuits say, have unfairly used illegal labor to cut wage levels or prices. … . In Washington state, workers who filed a civil suit against their employer, a fruit company, won a $1.3-million settlement in January. The Supreme Court has agreed to hear another of the immigration-related RICO cases this year. … But Canyon County is the first municipality to bring a suit of this kind against employers. The lawsuit was dismissed by a federal district court but has been appealed to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. If it succeeds, it could touch off similar actions, says the county's lawyer, Howard Foster."

Specter Bill Seeks Middle Ground On Immigration. The Senate Judiciary Committee will begin debating the Senate's main immigration bill Wednesday with a goal of having a final version ready for the full Senate by March 27. Knight Ridder (3/7, Montgomery) reports, "Sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, the legislation is designed to strike a middle course between a bill passed by the House of Representatives calling for tougher immigration enforcement and pro-immigration advocates who call for permanent legal status - and eventual citizenship - for the estimated 11 million aliens now in the country illegally." Judiciary Committee aides "said that the measure would create a 'gold card' program for illegal immigrants who entered the United States before Jan. 4, 2004. It also would create a guest-worker program to bring in more foreign laborers."

CQ (3/6, Sandler, Crowley) reported, "Specter's draft was received with a skeptical eye during the initial markup March 2, which resulted in no votes on proposed amendments but elicited lots of opinions. he Judiciary Committee will resume the markup Wednesday and likely will meet Thursday as well. But staff members say the initial focus is on border security, interior enforcement and employer provisions, so the panel may not begin considering the worker programs until next week."

Local Officials Say Federal Government Has Ignored Illegal Immigration. The New York Times (3/7, Vitello, 1.19M) reports that 100 local officials from 30 states gathered in Washington Monday generally agree the President Bush's record on illegal immigration is a "failure." The gathering, "organized and convened here under the banner of the Coalition of Mayors and County Executives for Immigration Reform, called for border security and, most urgently, reimbursement to localities for the cost of dealing with a problem its members say the federal government has ignored." The Times also reports, "The White House did not ignore the meeting, but at the last minute downgraded the rank of its representative. In place of Ruben Barrales, a deputy assistant to the president and White House director of intergovernmental affairs, who was originally scheduled to attend, the White House sent a liaison to city officials, Toby Burke."

TAX:

DOJ Takes Action Against Nevada, Michigan Tax Preparers. The AP (3/7) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department filed suit today to stop four people from operating what it claims is a tax fraud scheme." The AP continues, "The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas says the scheme cost the government at least 31 million dollars. … The government accuses the Las Vegas-based group of funneling income from clients through trusts in the Caribbean to help them avoid paying taxes. … It says the group returned the money through phony gifts or loans to the customers, their friends or family members."

The AP (3/6, Prichard) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has asked a federal court to prohibit three Hillsdale residents from preparing federal income tax returns for others, claiming the trio has cost the Treasury more than $25 million." The AP continues, "The government filed a complaint Monday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids against Joyce M. Stone, Charles J. Freed and Julie Shaffer. … Stone is Freed's mother, and together they own and operate an unincorporated tax-preparation business from their home, the department said Monday. The business also is a defendant in the lawsuit." The AP adds, "The complaint alleges that the defendants prepared customers' returns claiming improper deductions, including some for fictitious or inflated charitable contributions and employee expenses. … 'The Justice Department is working vigorously to stop the preparation and filing of the false or fraudulent returns that unfairly shift the tax burden to honest American taxpayers,' Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Tax Division, said in a written statement."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass New Line-Item Veto Bill. Speaking at the swearing-in ceremony for Ed Lazear, the new chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, President Bush yesterday urged Congress to give him line-item veto powers. Bush framed the issue as part of an effort to curtail "special interest" spending, and press accounts describe the move as an attempt to take the lead in the current debate over "earmarks." The story was not covered by the network newscasts.

The Washington Post (3/7, Fletcher, 744K), for example, says Bush is "seeking to reassert his party's scuffed reputation for fiscal conservatism," and adds "at first blush, Bush's proposal is being received with bipartisan approval in Congress." House Majority Leader John A. Boehner "praised the bill," while House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, says the AP (3/6), "issued statements supporting Bush, as did several conservative lawmakers." Sen. John Kerry, "who promoted a similar approach in his presidential campaign against Bush in 2004, immediately jumped on board. 'It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto,' Kerry said."

The New York Times (3/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports "Bush's push for the line-item veto could benefit from the current scrutiny over the growing practice by lawmakers of inserting spending for pet projects into legislation -- a practice that has figured into continuing corruption scandals." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid called "the line-item veto 'old hat.'" He added, "I just think it's an effort by President Bush to divert attention from real issues this country has." However, the Washington Times (3/7, Dinan, 90K) says "the move thrilled conservative Republicans on Capitol Hill." Addressing the timing of Bush's proposal, "White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration thinks the time is ripe, given the interest on spending cuts on Capitol Hill. He said the fight against wasteful spending is bipartisan, so he predicted the line-item veto proposal would attract bipartisan support."

CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, Bash) reported that Bush tried to "prove that he wants to crack down on what many called frivolous spending. And what he did was he formally introduced to Congress the concept of a line-item veto, something that he said he will use to strip out pork barrel or earmarked spending tucked away in the bills that he gets." CNN added "the bottom line politically is that the White House no matter what happens really wants to get credit here for at least trying. And talking to Republican strategists, they say that this is a good first step." Reuters (3/6, Bohan) notes Bush "has never vetoed a spending bill," while the Financial Times (3/7, Swann) reports Bush's effort "to restore the veto comes at a time of growing concern about Washington's apparent inability to restrain the growth in government spending."

USA Today (3/7, 2.31M) reports President Clinton "was given line-item veto power in 1996, but the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress." The AP (3/6, Taylor) notes Bush "is now pressing for a modified, weaker version. Instead of being able to strike items from bills, he would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote. Present law permits Congress to ignore these proposed rescissions, but under the Bush proposal lawmakers would have to vote on them. If majorities in both the House and the Senate agreed with the president, the cuts would take effect."

The Los Angeles Times (3/7, Gerstenzang, Havemann, 958K) reports, "Expressing optimism that the measure would win congressional approval and pass court tests, the White House said its proposal took into account objections the Supreme Court had raised in 1998 when it ruled that a similar provision signed two years earlier by President Clinton was unconstitutional." In Congress, however, "the outcome was less certain than the White House suggested." The Times adds, "Democratic leaders in the House and the Senate objected to the plan, but it probably will benefit from the momentum building to rein in 'earmarks.'"

House Conservatives Ready "Austere" Budget. The New York Times (3/7, Hulse, 1.19M) reports, "With Congress heading into a politically perilous budget season, influential House conservatives plan this week to propose an austere alternative spending plan that would pare more than $650 billion over five years, balance the budget and drastically shrink three cabinet agencies." The legislation is "part of a push by some Republicans to re-establish themselves as champions of fiscal restraint." House "conservative leaders would go far beyond the president's own budget proposal, illustrating the difficulty the White House and the Republican leadership have had in persuading the caucus to speak with one voice on the matter. Senior aides say the conservatives' plan would wring about $350 billion from Medicare, Medicaid and other social programs and save $300 billion partly through a major reorganization of the Education, Commerce and Energy Departments."

Meanwhile, Budget Panels Considering "Token" Spending Cuts. Roll Call (3/7, Pierce) reports in its "Roadmap" column that the House and Senate budget panels are "looking at including less than $10 billion in savings or mandatory spending cuts in their versions of the budget resolution this year." Roll Call says the move "may be more of a face-saving effort than any real attempt to reduce the deficit." The amount "being bandied around by lawmakers for possible inclusion in any fiscal 2007 spending reconciliation measure is 'more a token amount than anything else,' explained one knowledgeable former Senate Budget Committee aide."

Snow Urges Lawmakers To Pass New Debt Ceiling. Treasury Secretary John snow yesterday notified Congress that the Bush Administration has taken "all prudent and legal actions" to keep from reaching the $8.2 trillion national debt limit. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) reports that Snow, in a letter to Congressional leaders, "urged lawmakers to pass a new debt ceiling immediately to avoid the nation's first-ever default on its obligations."

DC Circuit Nominee's Conservative Credentials Could Keep Him Off Bench. The Legal Times (3/7, Schwartz) reports on "the complex politics and loyalties often just behind the scenes of the judicial nomination process" of Brett Kavanaugh, staff secretary for President George W. Bush, who is "in the midst of a bitter confirmation battle over his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit." The Times reports on "the challenge Democrats have facing off against this 41-year-old Maryland native, whose stalled nomination is expected to come before the Senate Judiciary Committee again as early as next month. … Kavanaugh's conservative credentials are etched indelibly into his résumé. In fact, he's something of the Zelig of young Republican lawyers. A protégé of independent counsel Kenneth Starr, he was a key figure in the Whitewater investigation. In the recount fight after the 2000 election, he served as a foot soldier in the legal army that descended on Florida and gave Bush his presidency. As a lawyer for Bush in the White House counsel's office, he shepherded most of the administration's contentious federal court nominees, including Miguel Estrada and Priscilla Owen. … But whether his right-wing bona fides will incite enough Democratic opposition to keep him off the bench remains an open question."

Arguing Before Supreme Court A Once-In-A-Lifetime Experience For Many. The Fulton County (GA) Daily Report (3/7, Palmer) reports, "When R. Jonathan Hart stepped up to the microphone before the country's nine most powerful jurists on March 1, he joined a small, eclectic club of Georgia attorneys who have argued before the U.S. Supreme Court. … The Chatham County Attorney sought to convince the high court to uphold the decision of a Savannah, Ga., federal judge, affirmed by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, that the county is immune from suit for damages arising from an accident involving a drawbridge maintained by the county. … In preparing for the argument and drafting the county's brief, Hart got the assistance of, among others, a law school professor who has argued before the high court several times. But rather than have the professor, David J. Bederman of Emory University, argue the case, Hart decided to handle the case himself. … 'You only get to do this every once in a while in your lifetime,' he said. … Unless you are someone like Miguel A. Estrada, Hart's opposing counsel last Wednesday." The Report adds, "Estrada, a former nominee to a federal appeals court, has argued at least 16 times before the high court, according to his profile on Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's Web site. Before joining Gibson, Dunn, Estrada served as an assistant to the U.S. solicitor general from 1992 to 1997. … But for many non-government attorneys, the Supreme Court is usually a one-time gig. The 80 or so cases that the Supreme Court agrees to hear each year means that the Court entertains oral argument in a handful of cases coming out of Georgia federal and state courts in a given term."

Cheney Receives "Hero's Welcome" In Florida. Vice President Dick Cheney visited southwest Florida yesterday to speak to the Collier County Republican Party's "Victory 2006" event. The Naples Daily News (3/6, Hannan) reported on its web site that Cheney "received a hero's welcome" from "an adoring crowd of about 400." The Daily News added, "The vice president's Naples speech on Monday sounded like the beginning of the campaign for the 2006 congressional elections. It included a strong defense of President George W. Bush, and a call to elect Republicans to the House and Senate."

The Ft. Myers News Press (3/7, Parker) reports that Cheney "urged party faithful to work hard for Republicans in the fall elections and pressure Congress for tax cuts." The News Press also reports, "The packed crowd at the club included numerous party leaders and elected officials, including U.S. Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fort Myers, who introduced the vice president; Florida Republican Party Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan; GOP gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist; U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Miami, whose district includes part of Collier; and U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Sarasota, and the party's leading candidate in the U.S. Senate race against Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson."

WJXX-TV Jacksonville (3/6, 5:04 p.m.) reported that Cheney also "spoke in Boca Raton on behalf of Congressman Clay Shaw who's facing re-election this year."

The Miami Herald (3/7, Reinhard, 323K) reports that Cheney helped raise about $300,000 for Shaw at a luncheon yesterday.

Cheney's Failure To Mention Harris Raises Eyebrows. The South Florida Sun Sentinel (3/7, Man) reports, "The political buzz among several of those at Vice President Dick Cheney's fund-raiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fort Lauderdale, was more about how U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' Senate campaign may be unraveling. Cheney even provided some fuel when he said he was looking forward to swearing in a Republican replacement for Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson -- but didn't mention Harris by name."

Bush Said To Be "Fixated' On Oval Office Rug. The Washington Post (3/7, A15, Baker, 744K) reports that President Bush "seems fixated" on the rug in the Oval Office. Virtually "all visitors to the Oval Office find him regaling them about how it was chosen and what it represents. Turns out, he always says, the first decision any president makes is what carpet he wants in his office. As a take-charge leader, he then explains, he of course made a command decision -- he delegated the decision to Laura Bush, who chose a yellow sunbeam design." Bush "has his own touches in the Oval Office -- some Western-themed paintings and an on-loan bust of Winston Churchill courtesy of British Prime Minister Tony Blair. But it is the rug that animates the president. … Sometimes Bush describes it as a metaphor for leadership. Sometimes he relates how Russian President Vladimir Putin admired the carpet. Sometimes he seems most taken by the lighting qualities."

Majority Lack Confidence In Bush Ability To Reform Health Care. A new Wall Street Journal/Harris Interactive poll has found that a majority of US adults lack confidence in the Bush Administration's ability to reform the US health care system. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) reports, "About three-quarters of those polled in the online survey of 2,426 US adults say they aren't confident President Bush will be able to effectively make changes such as slowing the increase in health-care costs for the US as a whole or reducing out-of-pocket health-care costs. But Americans are divided along party lines about the president's ability to improve health-care, the poll shows."

Stark Says HSAs Would Increase Healthcare Costs. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M), Rep. Pete Stark, ranking member of the House Ways and Means health Subcommittee, writes, "Health Savings Accounts would profoundly increase healthcare costs for many consumers, lead others to ration necessary care, and increase the number of uninsured. … While the richest among us can afford to deposit more than $10,000 a year in an HSA, few middle-income Americans have even $1,000 a year to spare."

Administration Set To Approve Arkansas Health Care Plan. The Bush Administration is set to approve a health insurance program proposed by the state of Arkansas to cover 80,000 uninsured low income people in the state. The New York Times (3/7, Pear, 1.19M) reports, 'Arkansas will carry out the program, to be announced on Tuesday, under a waiver allowing the state to receive federal Medicaid money for coverage that does not meet the usual Medicaid standards for eligibility and benefits. … Under the plan, to be approved by Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, the state expects to enroll at least 50,000 workers with incomes less than twice the federal poverty level and 30,000 workers with higher incomes. The poverty level this year is $9,800 for an individual, $13,200 for a couple."

Report Criticizes Investigation Of Medicare Complaints. Senate investigators have found that Medicare's process for investigating complaints about bad care is "broken" and is of "no benefit to improving overall quality" of medical care received by beneficiaries. The Washington Post (3/7, A6, Gaul, 744K) reports, "The ongoing probe by the Senate Finance Committee determined that the number of complaints investigated by Medicare appears 'disproportionately low,' Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the committee chairman, wrote in a five-page letter sent to Medicare officials Friday. Grassley called on federal officials to consider major reforms, including redesigning the program and re-bidding contracts."

Senate Takes Up Lobbying Reform Bill. Reuters (3/7, Ferraro) reports the Senate "began consideration of legislation on Monday that would require lobbyists to disclose more about their activities and ban gifts by lobbyists to members of Congress and staff." The Senate "hopes to complete action after voting on a long list of possible amendments later this week."

The AP (3/7, Abrams) reports the measure, "which would require lobbyists to be more open about the meals they buy and the trips they arrange for members of Congress, is a response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that hit Washington with details of millions of dollars from Abramoff's clients going to win friends and buy influence on Capitol Hill." But the Senate bill, "which combines measures produced by two Senate committees last week, has already come under fire from advocacy groups and some lawmakers who say the proposed changes, the first to lobbying laws in 11 years, are mainly cosmetic." The section of the bill "prepared by the Rules Committee deals with a major source of criticism of Congress: the special projects or earmarks that lawmakers insert in larger bills, often with little or no debate."

The Hill (3/7, Allen) reports rank-and-file senators "are eyeing" the lobbying-disclosure measure "as a vehicle for a host of pet causes — issues ranging from budget-process reform to the controversial Dubai Ports World deal — as Republican and Democratic leaders try to shepherd the politically imperative bill through the chamber without turning it into a legislative Christmas tree." Conservatives, "eager to find the means to cut government spending, may try to insert the president's new line-item-veto proposal or legislation establishing biennial budgeting, according to a Senate Republican aide."

Frist Taps Lott To Shepherd Lobbyist Reform Bill. CQ (3/6, Retter) reports more than "half a dozen senators worked to have an imprint on the Senate's ethics overhaul package this year, but only one name could be at the top of the bill that backers hope will restore faith in the legislative branch." Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "gave his predecessor, Trent Lott, that privilege Monday when he named the Mississippi Republican — who has a predilection for upstaging Frist — to shepherd the overhaul legislation through Congress." Eric Ueland, Frist's chief of staff, "said his boss selected Lott and Susan Collins, R-Maine, to take leading roles because they are the members most likely to get the bill to the finish line." CQ adds Lott also "may have helped himself secure the assignment — which carries the potential public relations boost that comes with the mantle 'reformer' — by vowing to win passage within three days."

House GOP To Include Restrictions On 527 Groups In Lobby Reform Bill. The Hill (3/7, Bolton) reports House Republican leaders "have told their Senate counterparts that legislation curtailing the activity of so-called 527 soft-money groups will be included in the House lobbying-reform bill that leaders intend for conference negotiations." The 527 group provisions "are expected to hew closely to a proposal crafted by Federal Election Commission (FEC) Chairman Michael Toner and former Commissioner Scott Thomas." Restrictions on 527 groups is "a high priority for Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. Including 527 language in the lobbying bill, however, would put Democrats in a politically difficult position."

Lawmakers' Use Of Corporate Aircraft Scrutinized. USA Today (3/7, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports that for "members of Congress — its top leaders, in particular" – the use of corporate aircraft for travel is "an accepted convenience of immense value in their whirlwind schedules, worth far more than the reimbursements the rules require. They can skip security lines, ignore airline schedules and stretch out in roomy leather seats. For corporations that provide the service, it's a chance to do favors for the powerful and gain influence unavailable to those without air fleets." Public records and "internal company documents obtained by USA TODAY show that over the past four years, BellSouth has flown federal government officials on such political trips about 100 times. The internal records offer rare detail about who goes on the trips and why — information that lawmakers and companies aren't now required to reveal." Top travelers "with the regional telephone company include House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Democratic Sens. Tom Daschle of South Dakota and John Breaux of Louisiana, both now retired." Ethics reform advocates, including Sen. John McCain and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., "have called for requiring lawmakers to reimburse companies for the full cost of a charter flight when they hop aboard their jets."

Bill Would Require Disclosure Of Grassroots Groups' Negative Phone Banks. The Hill (3/7, Schor) reports that as the Senate "begins debating proposed disclosure requirements for grassroots lobbying activity, a Democratic-leaning grassroots lobbying firm is helping to hit as many as 20 House Republicans with prerecorded, in-district phone calls attacking their records on port security." The calls "are funded by American Family Voices (AFV), a nonprofit group led by Clinton administration veteran Mike Lux and allied with Lux's firm Progressive Strategies." While Lux "declined to reveal the identities of the House Republicans targeted for calls, Reps. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Bob Ney (R-Ohio) have reacted angrily to the calls taking place in their districts, charging AFV with capitalizing on the Dubai ports-management controversy for political gain." AFV and "other nonprofits engaging in grassroots lobbying soon could be forced to reveal political strategies and financial backers under an amendment attached to one of the Senate's two pending lobbying-reform bills."

Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing In Fraud Case. The Washington Post/AP (3/7, A5) reports a Federal judge "refused Monday to allow a lengthy delay in the sentencing of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, even though lawyers for both sides said the move could jeopardize a federal corruption investigation involving Congress and the Bush administration." Abramoff attorney Abbe Lowell "warned that the defense would disclose information about the ongoing corruption investigation to demonstrate the level of Abramoff's cooperation, something that could affect his sentence in the fraud case." Lowell said, "We will name names. That is not a good thing for law enforcement."

Thomas Won't Seek Reelection. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, King) reported, "The influential chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee made it official, today: He's going to retire. California Congressman Bill Thomas says he won't seek a 15th term next November. Even if he ran, he'd be forced to give up the helm of the Ways and Means Committee because of Republican-imposed term limits on committee chairmen."

The Hill (3/7, O'Connor, Cusack) says "there has been speculation that Thomas could join the Bush administration next year, possibly as treasury secretary." Thomas "did not rule out the possibility of joining the administration down the road, before adding that he is 'taking it one step at a time.'" Meanwhile, the AP (3/7, Dalrymple) calls Thomas "the congressional engineer" who turned many of President Bush's "campaign promises for tax cuts, free trade and prescription drugs into reality." Yesterday, Bush called Thomas "a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader."

USA Today (3/7, Kiely, Wolf, 2.31M) notes Democrats "need to pick up an additional 15 to win a majority. So far, only a few of the seats being vacated seem likely to be competitive. … Even so, some analysts believe that Thomas' decision to step down represents a troubling trend of experienced Republicans leaving." Thomas is "one of 17 Republican and eight Democratic House members who have decided not to run for re-election this fall. Five of the Republicans are losing their powerful committee posts because of term limits imposed by the caucus. They are Thomas; Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, chairman of the Budget Committee; Henry Hyde, R-Ill., chairman of the International Relations Committee; Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, chairman of the Financial Services Committee; and Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that funds the nation's overseas operations." CQ (3/7, Ota) reports there are "eight senior House Republicans whose chairmanships end with the 2005 session under their caucus rules. So far, that prospect has helped create a glaring weakness for the GOP majority in a tough midterm election year."

The New York Times (3/7, Toner, 1.19M) reports Democrats "quickly cited Mr. Thomas's retirement as an example of Republican incumbents' 'sensing the winds of change blowing at gale force,' as Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, put it." But "whatever the national outlook, political strategists expect Mr. Thomas's district to remain Republican."

The Washington Post (3/7, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports Thomas "will leave an impressive record of legislative accomplishment," but adds his "reputation as a shrewd legislative tactician has a dark side: He has shown himself willing to bully friends and adversaries alike if his arguments do not prove persuasive." Reuters (3/7), Roll Call (3/7, Drucker, Pershing), Washington Times (3/7, Hurt, 90K) and Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M), among other sources, run similar stories on Thomas' decision.

Smart Card Project May Be Falling Behind Schedule. The Washington Post (3/7, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The government's smart-card project appears at risk of falling behind schedule. Federal agencies are supposed to begin issuing government-wide identification cards that can vouch for the identity of federal employees and most contractors in October, but the Government Accountability Office warns that setting up and testing new ID systems may not be completed within deadlines set by the Bush administration. … The administration's timetable requires agencies to start issuing cards Oct. 27 and to verify or complete background investigations on employees and contractors in 2007 and 2008. But the project has hit some snags. The original guidelines called for the cards to carry electronic representations of two fingerprints, but the GAO said agency officials have objected because reading two fingerprint images will require a large amount of computer memory."

Goodman Says Barrett Report Contains Evidence Of Clinton-Era Misdeeds. Author Mark Goodman writes in the Washington Times (3/7, 90K) that the investigation by David Barrett, the independent counsel appointed in 1995 to investigate allegations against President Clinton's Department of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Henry Cisneros "led him into bleak wilds where unnumbered Clinton misdeeds allegedly lay beneath bureaucratic camouflage. These findings comprised a full 120 pages of his 684-page report -- but you won't find them in the final document published on January 19. That's because congressional Democrats, led by Sens. Byron Dorgan, Dick Durbin and John Kerry, used an appropriations bill to leverage a deal redacting the potentially lethal 120 pages. … What evil lurks in those 120 pages that made the Democratic congressmen press so hard for redaction? My money says, a den filled with opulent thieves, in white tie and tails."

Ornstein Criticizes "Part Time" Congress. Norman Ornstein, resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute writes in the Washington Post (3/7, A17, 744K) that the 2006 House schedule, with its "total of 97 calendar days, counted generously, is the smallest number in 60 years and the days of what Harry Truman derided as that 'do-nothing 80th Congress.' … A part-time Congress in a country with a $13 trillion economy and federal budget near $3 trillion, in a globalized, technologically sophisticated world, is itself a danger to the checks and balances built into American democracy, and to high-quality, careful policymaking and oversight. It's not too much to ask Congress to commit to spending at least half the year -- 26 weeks -- working full-time, five days a week, thus providing at least a measure of the deliberation and attention to detail that are so lacking now."

NYTimes Criticizes Wade Contributions To Lawmakers. A New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) editorial says Mitchell Wade, the contractor who bribed former Rep. Duke Cunningham, "admitted he had made illegal campaign donations to two lawmakers while pressing them to earmark more defense appropriations." Rep. Virgil Goode Jr. "received $46,000 in illegal donations while successfully earmarking $9 million in taxpayer money as Mr. Wade talked of more jobs for the lawmaker's district. The other, Katherine Harris, the Florida Republican, received $32,000 of Wade money, illegally disguised as smaller contributions from Wade employees. … So goes licit political business these days in Washington. The prosecutor, Kenneth Wainstein, noted that Mr. Wade's company had been perceived as a classic 'American success story'…but was actually a model for spreading political corruption from Capitol Hill to the Pentagon."

WPost Says Congress Should Address Lawmakers' Involvement With Charities. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/7, A16, 744K) says, "Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum created his charity, 'Operation Good Neighbor,' when the Republican National Convention was going to Philadelphia in 2000." In the years since its creation the charity "appears to have done a lot to help his political allies -- and less than it might have in its stated mission of combating poverty, teen pregnancy and other social ills. … The Santorum story highlights a largely unexplored area of congressional ethics: lawmakers' involvement with charitable organizations." The Post adds, "There is an inevitable element of extortion whenever politicians get involved in soliciting charitable donations. And when lawmakers have a personal interest in the charity, the opportunities for abuse are greatly magnified."

Judge Criticized For Backing Unions In Pentagon Personnel Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) says in an editorial that to "protect the Republic today, the executive branch must first comply with something James Madison never imagined -- union work rules." Federal Judge Emmet Sullivan last week "sided with union plaintiffs and tossed out the Pentagon's new personnel system, which the Defense Secretary and White House say they need to safeguard the nation. His decision comes after federal Judge Rosemary Collyer threw out a similar personnel system at the Department of Homeland Security in August. (That case is under appeal.)" The "danger here is that the collective bargaining rights of 650,000 civilian workers will trump the collective right we all have to a military organized to confront 21st-century threats."

January Factory Orders Post Largest Drop In Over Five Years. The Commerce Department yesterday reported that new orders for manufactured goods in January fell 4.5% from the previous month, its steepest decline in more than five years. The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Gerena-Morales, 2.11M) reports that the drop "reflected a 31% decline in orders for transportation products and equipment, such as autos and airplanes. … Overall orders for durable goods, including electronic equipment, were off 9.9%, also the sharpest decline since July 2000."

Stocks Decline In Monday Trading. Stocks closed down Monday after an increase in Treasury yields "raised concerns about the health of corporate profits, housing and the stability of stock prices," the Wall Street Journal (3/7, Patterson, 2.11M) reports. The Dow Jones Industrial Average finished down by 63 points to 10958.59. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index declined 8.97 to 1278.26 and the Nasdaq Composite Index slipped 16.57 to 2286.03.

DeLay To Spend Primary Night At Fundraiser Hosted By Lobbyists. USA Today/AP (3/7) reports, "Rep. Tom DeLay, whose association with lobbyist Jack Abramoff has left him politically vulnerable, is spending Texas' primary night tonight at a Washington fundraiser hosted by two lobbyists." DeLay "has three opponents in the Republican primary and could face a serious challenge in the general election after leaving his job as House majority leader amid campaign finance scandals." The fundraiser "is being held by lobbyists Bill Paxon and Susan Molinari, both former members of Congress from New York. The event will raise money for DeLay's re-election campaign." DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty "said DeLay would be in Washington for votes and has other events on his schedule including the fundraiser. She said he was unavailable for an interview."

DeLay Expected To Win Primary. Roll Call (3/7, Drucker) reports DeLay "is expected to beat the three challengers opposing him in the Republican primary, but the extent to which he can avoid a runoff by securing more than 50 percent of the vote in the suburban Houston 22nd district -- and by how much, if he does -- could be telling for Democrats," who "hope to ride their 'Culture of Corruption' slogan to a House takeover in November." The Washington Times (3/7, Aynesworth, 90K) also says DeLay "is expected to defeat his three Republican opponents in the primary, setting up what political observers predict will be a tough general election race in November."

DeLay Makes Major Fundraising Push. The Hill (3/7, O'Connor) reports DeLay "is urging members of the National Rifle Association (NRA) and supporters of Texas Right to Life to dig deep into their pockets to help him retain his seat this year. The outreach is part of a broad direct-mail and telemarketing campaign to attract new donors and volunteers for the former majority leader's reelection." It also "marks a fundraising shift for DeLay this election cycle from a PAC-heavy strategy in which the once-powerful Republican doled out lobbyist dollars to his congressional colleagues to one in which DeLay and his team are primarily focused on his own reelection bid." The outreach "has three aims, said Shannon Flaherty, a spokeswoman for the campaign: get information directly to voters in the district, ask those voters to volunteer or donate money to the campaign and continue building a database of local and national supporters to contact between now and the November election."

Anti-DeLay Film Will Be Distributed This Spring. The New York Times (3/7, Halbfinger, 1.19M) reports, "A documentary about the Texas criminal investigation that led to the indictment of…DeLay…on campaign fund-raising charges is being put to use by Mr. DeLay's political opponents in an attempt to unseat him." The film, "The Big Buy: How Tom DeLay Stole Congress," will be "distributed this spring by the Hollywood producer and liberal provocateur Robert Greenwald, whose last release was a scathing attack on Wal-Mart sponsored by a variety of labor unions and other groups critical of the retailing giant." The Times adds, "A host of liberal organizations in Texas and nationwide, including People for the American Way, Democracy for America and the Pacifica radio station in Houston, are expected to sponsor the film's release."

Two Democrats Set To Square Off In Tuesday's Texas Gubernatorial Primary. The AP (3/7, Shannon) reports, "Two Democrats with long resumes but little name recognition are competing in Texas' gubernatorial primary election Tuesday for the chance to challenge popular GOP Gov. Rick Perry." Ex-Congressman Chris Bell (D) will face former Texas Supreme Court Justice Bob Gammage. Bell "gained notice as a freshman congressman for filing the first House ethics complaint against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He made the complaint shortly after the Texas redistricting engineered by DeLay caused Bell to lose his re-election bid." Gammage "once represented the same suburban Houston district in Congress now served by DeLay.

NRSC Chair Says GOP Faces Challenging Climate. The Hill (3/7, Savodnik) reports, "Senate Republicans face a stormy 'atmosphere' but will 'retain a strong Republican majority' in November, says Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.), the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC)." In an hour-long interview with The Hill, Dole "repeatedly noted that despite the political climate -- made worse by White House communications flops and GOP scandals -- Republican challengers are mounting viable bids in Michigan, West Virginia and elsewhere." But "she acknowledged that President Bush could have done a better job handling the Dubai ports deal, which has given Democrats an opportunity to look tougher on terrorism than Republicans, and that the president's poll numbers are less than optimal."

Democratic Effort To Deliver Unified Message Seen As Faltering. The Washington Post (3/7, A1, Murray, Babington, 744K) reports Democratic leaders had "set a goal of issuing their legislative manifesto by November 2005 to give voters a full year to digest their proposals. But some Democrats protested that the release date was too early, so they put it off until January. The new date slipped twice again, and now House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) says the document will be unveiled in 'a matter of weeks.'" The "failure of congressional leaders to deliver a clear message has left some Democratic governors deeply frustrated and at odds with Washington Democrats over strategy." There is "no agreement on whether to try to nationalize the congressional campaign with a blueprint or 'contract' with voters, as the Republicans did successfully in 1994, or to keep the races more local in tone. And the party is still divided over the war in Iraq."

Poll Finds Public Losing Faith In Democrats. ABC World News Tonight (3/6, story 3, 1:45, Stephanopoulos) reported the public is "going in the wrong direction, for Democrats. Back in January, you asked, 'Who do you trust to handle the nation's problems?' Americans said Democrats, 51% to 37. Today, that's down to 42% to 40%. And you know, that goes back to Iraq, too. They don't think Democrats have an answer to Iraq. They're sour on both parties."

Democrats' First Failure Seen In Not Justifying Opposition To Bush. In his Washington Post column (3/7, A17), E.J. Dionne says the Democrats' "real problem" in taking control of Congress "is that they have failed to show how their critique of the Republican status quo is the essential first step toward the alternative program they will owe the voters in the presidential year of 2008." This "failure has made it easier for Republicans to cast anti-Bush feeling (aka, 'Bush hatred') as a psychological disorder. The GOP shrewdly makes the president's critics look crazed and suggests that opposition to Bush is of no more significance than, say, the loathing that many watchers of 'American Idol' love to express toward Simon Cowell, the meanest of the show's judges." Bush's "critics need to identify precisely why they oppose him, not only so they can make clear that they are not psycho basket cases but also to convey the idea that they know what needs to be put right."

Clinton Suggests Recent GOP Criticism May Be Gender-Based. The AP (2/7, Fouhy) reports, "Responding to Republican claims that she may be too angry to win national office, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton told an audience Monday to wear such criticism as 'a badge of honor' and suggested that gender played a role in the attacks. Democrats, particularly Democratic woman, who run for public office are 'going to draw some unfriendly fire,' Clinton said at a breakfast fundraiser hosted by black and Hispanic women supporters. 'People will be attacking you instead of your ideas, they may impugn your patriotism, they may even say you're angry.' 'If they do that, wear it as a badge of honor, because you know what? There are lots of things that we should be angry and outraged about these days,' she said." The AP notes, "Until now, Clinton had not said she considered the criticisms gender-based, although many observers have done so."

Former Pentagon Spokeswoman Announces Challenge To Clinton. CNN's The Situation Room (5/6, King) reported, "In New York State, a Republican announced today she's running for Democrat Hillary Clinton's senate seat. Kathleen McFarland is a former Pentagon spokeswoman under President Reagan. She's seeking the GOP nomination for the Senate after two other contenders opted out. Polls show Senator Clinton so far is well ahead of her potential Republican challengers."

The AP (3/7, Humbert) notes that McFarland's move "could put her into a September primary against former

Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, already endorsed by top state Conservative Party leaders. No Republican has won statewide office in New York without Conservative Party support since 1974. … 'I don't know what this woman is thinking, I really don't,' Spencer said Monday, arguing that McFarland's candidacy would be 'divisive [and] I guess helpful to Clinton.' 'I'm the only one who can unite the Republican and Conservative parties, which I am doing,' he added." McFarland "refused to address Spencer's criticisms, but said she would 'go after every party.'"

Roll Call (3/7, Kurtz) adds that McFarland "had been gearing up to challenge Rep. Carolyn Maloney (D) but changed her focus after no 'big name' Republican decided to challenge" Clinton. Spencer campaign manager Christian Winthrop "called McFarland's entry into the race 'too liberal, too late.' But it wasn't too late for McFarland to receive some national publicity: She was a guest on Chris Matthews' 'Hardball' on Monday night."

Pataki Leaves Hospital 18 Days After Suffering Burst Appendix. The AP (3/7, Goldman) reports that New York Gov. George Pataki (R) "was released from a hospital Monday after 18 days of treatment for appendicitis and complications that followed surgery. … 'I'm not 100 percent but I'm a lot better than I was a few days ago,' he said." Pataki "was hospitalized in Westchester County on Feb. 16 and had his appendix removed. He was transferred to" a "Manhattan hospital on Feb. 21 and was operated on later that day to deal with a blockage of his intestine." The New York Times (3/7, Pérez-Peña, 1.19M) notes that Pataki "will have to rest at his home…for at least a week, with care from a visiting nurse, his doctors said."

Poll Shows Giuliani "Most Popular Person In National Politics." The AP (3/7) reports that ex-New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani (R) "is the most popular person in national politics, according to a national poll released Monday by Quinnipiac University." Giuliani "edged out U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The Quinnipiac poll asked voters to rate politicians on a scale of 0 to 100, with higher numbers representing more favorable opinions. Giuliani's mean score was 63.5, according to the poll. Obama averaged 59.9, McCain 59.7 and Rice 57.1." President Bush's "average rating was 44.1 and Vice President Dick Cheney's was 41." Four potential '08 Democratic presidential hopefuls "were also mentioned in the poll's top 10: Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards received a 50.8 average, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner scored 50.7, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton averaged 50.4 and Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin scored 49. The telephone poll of 1,892 registered voters nationwide was conducted February 21-28 and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 2.3 percentage points."

The New York Post (3/7, Orin, 624K) notes that Quinnipiac's assistant polling director Peter Brown said, "Giuliani's ratings are uniform in all states. [He] is seen as the mayor of New York [during 9/11], and being a strong leader is the single strongest characteristic desired by voters in a presidential election."

Comcast Hiring Prominent Maryland Public Officials. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/7, A1, Mosk, Rich, 744K) reports that Comcast Cable Communications, Maryland's dominant cable provider, "has repeatedly given work to prominent public officials, their relatives or their friends. Those hired by Comcast and its affiliates have included two members of the University System of Maryland Board of Regents, two sons of a key General Assembly committee chairman and former county executives from Prince George's and Harford counties. … None of these politically connected workers has been accused of wrongdoing, and those who could be reached said they were hired on merit."

Sheehan Arrested In Protest Outside UN Headquarters. Antiwar activist Cindy Sheehan was arrested with three other protesters after a rally with Iraqi women outside UN headquarters in New York. Reuters (3/7) reports, "About 20 protesters went to the U.S. mission to the United Nations to deliver a petition with 60,000 signatures seeking an end to the war. Nobody from the mission received them so Sheehan and three other American women sat down in front of the building, refused to leave, and were arrested."

Unlike US, IAEA Chief Optimistic On Iran Deal. The New York Times (3/7, Hauser, 1.19M) reports, "The director of the International Atomic Energy Agency...said today that he hoped an agreement could be reached with Iran on its nuclear program." IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei is quoted as saying, "I am still very much hopeful that in the next week or so, an agreement could be reached." In its coverage, the AP (3/7, Jahn) reports, "ElBaradei's optimism was believed to be linked to a confidential Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich some uranium domestically, diplomats said. But the plan was expected to meet strong resistance from the US, which opposes any enrichment on Iranian soil." In a separate story, the AP (3/7, Schweid) reports, "Unless Iran executes a dramatic about-face and suspends all its nuclear activities, the UN Security Council will intervene 'quite actively,'" Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said. "The message to Iran is that it has 'crossed the international red line' and engaged in unacceptable enrichment activity 'and there must be a UN Security Council process to deal with that.'" Reuters (3/7, Heinrich, Hafezi) runs a similar report.

The Wall Street Journal (3/7, Crawford, Cullison, 2.11M) reports ElBaradei's statement "is at odds with US determination to refer Iran swiftly to the Security Council, with U.S. and EU officials citing inspectors' evidence that Iran's program includes elements that would only be aimed toward producing weapons, not energy." The Journal also reports, "Yesterday, diplomats were debating the possibility of letting Iran continue to experiment with enrichment in 20 centrifuges. Diplomats close to the IAEA say that Iran would likely do those experiments anyway if there is no compromise but noted an agreement would allow the return of IAEA inspectors."

Russia-West Rift Emerges. The New York Times (3/7, Sciolino, 1.19M) reports, "A serious rift emerged Monday when Russia split with the United States and Europe over Iran's nuclear program after the Russians floated a last-minute proposal to allow Iran to make small quantities of nuclear fuel, according to European officials. The reports of the proposal prompted" Secretary Rice to telephone ElBaradei to, "according to an administration official who was briefed on the conversation," say "'the United States cannot support this.'" According to the Times, "American officials said they had been assured by the Russians that there was no formal proposal on the table." In its coverage, the Financial Times (3/7, Dombey) said Russia "is seeking to convince the US and the European Union to allow Iran to continue limited uranium enrichment, the process that can create weapons grade material. But the idea has already been rejected by the US and the EU's big powers, and western diplomats said it could disrupt the uneasy common front on Iran between the five permanent members of the" UNSC.

Iran Stepping Up Development Of Shahab Missiles. Reuters (3/7, Charbonneau) reports, "As Iran pursues a nuclear program the West fears is aimed at producing bombs, Tehran also appears to be stepping up development of missiles capable of carrying atomic warheads, diplomats citing intelligence say. According to an intelligence report given to Reuters by a non-U.S. diplomat, a covert Iranian program run by people closely linked to Iran's military includes plans to arm its Shahab-3 missiles, which experts believe have a maximum range of around 2,000 km (1,240 miles), with nuclear warheads." The report, "which could not be independently confirmed, surfaced as the United States and its allies seek to highlight the potential security dangers of a nuclear-armed Iran."

Lead US Negotiator Defends US-India Nuclear Deal. The Washington Times (3/7, Sands, 90K) reports, "The proposed US-India nuclear deal will not open the door for Iran and other rogue states to acquire atomic weapons and technology, the Bush administration's lead negotiator insisted yesterday." Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said at the Heritage Foundation, "We don't see the connection between what Iran is doing and what India seeks to do." The Administration "has begun selling the India deal in earnest on Capitol Hill, where several top lawmakers are either cool to the accord or openly skeptical." Burns "rejected critics' assertions that bending the rules for India -- which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) -- will make it more difficult to rally opposition against Tehran."

Cohen Defends Deal. Under the headline "Judicious Double Standards," columnist Richard Cohen writes in the Washington Post (3/7, A17, 744K) that some are complaining Bush "has done something truly awful -- established a double standard. Well, duh -- yes. India is our friend and Iran, just to pick an example, is not. The cry of 'double standard' is a bit silly. … Reality imposes its own rules -- and they have nothing to do with double standards."

NYTimes Says Bush "Should Have Just Stayed Home." In a stinging editorial, the New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) bemoans President Bush's recently completed trip to Pakistan and India, claiming the visits "have done some real harm. The spectacularly misconceived trip may have inflicted serious damage to American goals in two vital areas," promoting nuclear nonproliferation and Pakistani anti-extremist efforts. "The nuclear deal that Mr. Bush concluded with India threatens to blast a bomb-size loophole through the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty," but "the most immediate damage was done on Mr. Bush's next stop, Pakistan. ... Sticking Mr. Musharraf with the unwelcome task of explaining to Pakistanis why" the US agreed to nuclear cooperation with "Pakistan's archrival, India, while withholding them from Pakistan left him less likely to do Washington any special, and politically unpopular, favors on the terrorism front. It's just baffling why Mr. Bush traveled halfway around the world to stand right next to one of his most important allies against terrorists — and embarrass him." The Times concludes, "Mr. Bush should have just stayed home."

Turkey To Press Ahead With Nuclear Plant Construction. The Washington Post (3/7, A14, Vick, 744K) reports, "Turkey is reviving its long-deferred quest for nuclear power, pressed both by serious energy shortfalls within its own borders and by strident nuclear ambitions in neighboring Iran that threaten to upset a regional balance of power." The Post adds that Energy Minister Hilmi Guler, in announcing the initiative to build as many as five nuclear plants, cited rising oil prices and his country's "need for multiple sources of energy make our need for nuclear energy an utmost priority," and notes that "Guler, who made his remarks while visiting a nuclear plant in Virginia, said the new Turkish reactors could provide about a tenth of the 54,000 megawatts the country expects to need over the next two decades." The Post adds that Iran's nuclear ambitions also factor into Turkey's decision to revive its nuclear "program, which has had numerous false starts since the early 1960s."

Hamas Revokes Some Powers From Abbas. Reuters (3/7) reports, "Hamas legislators voted on Monday to revoke all decisions made by the previous Palestinian parliament at its final session last month, including laws that gave President Mahmoud Abbas wider powers to appoint some judges." Senior Abbas aide Tayeb Abdel-Rahim "accused Hamas of attempting to oust the Palestinian president. 'We see this as a coup attempt to change the regime and they (Hamas) have to seriously reconsider their decisions.'" In its coverage, the New York Times (3/7, Myre, 1.19M) notes, "Shortly after the session began, it degenerated into shouting matches between the rival Hamas and Fatah factions, with Fatah legislators ultimately storming out." The Washington Post (3/7, A14, Wilson, 744K) quotes Fatah legislator and negotiator Saeb Erekat as saying the Hamas move was "absolutely unconstitutional," and that Fatah would appeal to the Palestinian High Court on Tuesday to overturn the vote. The Washington Times/AP (3/7, Barzak) and Los Angeles Times (3/7, King, 958K) run similar stories.

Mofaz Says Haniyeh Is Possible Target. The AP (3/7) reports Israeli Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz told Army Radio Tuesday that incoming Palestinian PM Ismail Haniyeh "will not be immune from pinpointed Israeli killings if the Islamic militant group were to resume its attacks on Israel."

North Korean To Hear US Counterfeiting Complaints Today. Ahead of today's briefing of senior North Korean diplomat Ri Gun by US Treasury Department officials in New York, Reuters (3/6, Eckert) reported Department spokesman Tom Casey "took pains to separate the technical explanation of the financial penalties from efforts to get North Korea to rejoin nuclear talks with the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea." Reuters reported Casey said that "North Korea should return to six-country nuclear talks regardless of the outcome of discussions on the U.S. financial crackdown on Pyongyang over money laundering." Ri's trip to New York "has raised hopes that the North may be poised to return to" the talks.

Free Trade Talks To Begin In June. A separate Reuters (3/6, Kim) piece reported Washington and Seoul agreed yesterday "to start a formal round of free trade talks in June, dealing a blow to farmers and unionists demonstrating against the plans." Automobiles, rice and services are expected to be key areas of initial disagreement.

South American Border Region Seen As Haven For Smugglers. The CBS Evening News (3/6, story 9, 4:30, Regan) reported, "Deep in South America, just miles from the beauty of Brazil's Iguaçu Falls is one of the most lawless places in the world. The Tri-border area where three countries, Paraguay, Argentina and Brazil, meet it is a smuggler's paradise, home to the largest illicit economy in the Western Hemisphere. Trafficking in everything from drugs to arms to counterfeit goods is a 24/7 unchecked operation." Illegal trade "here is costing American companies hundreds of millions of dollars each year. Almost all the activity takes place on the Paraguayan side of the border in the Wild West jungle town of Ciudad Dalleste. What is unusual is that most of the trade is run by members of a large and influential Middle Eastern population, many of whom immigrated to the area from Lebanon and Syria in the 1970s. Some are making huge sums off illicit trade and western authorities believe they're sending money to terror groups in the Middle East." Sources "in the State Department tell CBS News that at one point there were seven terrorist training camps in the Tri-border region. And they have no doubt the area is still a safe haven for terrorists."

OPEC Unlikely To Cut Output. The New York Times (3/7, Mouawad, 1.19M) reports, "Strange as it may seem, some OPEC oil ministers are feeling sorry for themselves. For the last three months, a few of OPEC's top representatives have argued that their oil-producing cartel, which pumps nearly 4 of every 10 barrels of oil produced around the world, needs to trim output to avert a potential oil glut and a -- highly hypothetical -- price collapse." The Times adds, "The current argument for cutting output first came up when the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries met in December in Kuwait. It resurfaced at a meeting in Vienna the following month and it is likely to top the agenda this week when the group meets here again to consider its production levels." It "almost certainly will not happen. For one thing, Saudi Arabia…is opposed."

The Wall Street Journal (3/7, 2.11M) reports, "Saudi Arabia's oil minister was reported as saying the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries shouldn't trim oil output at this week's meeting." In an interview "with pan-Arab daily newspaper Al Hayat, published Monday," Ali Naimi also said "fears stemming from threats to oil supplies were the main factor behind prices of more than $60 a barrel."

China Seen As Exercising Restraint In Dealings With Taiwan. USA Today (3/7, Wiseman, 2.31M) reports, "Not so long ago, China would have been lobbing missiles across the Taiwan Strait, mobilizing troops and issuing bloodcurdling threats in response to any Taiwanese move toward independence. Times have changed: The mainland calculates that restraint, not retaliation, is the best response to Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian's provocative decision to scrap a neglected but symbolically important council dedicated to the reunification of China and Taiwan." USA Today adds, "Despite its conciliatory approach to the Taiwanese public, China passed an anti-secession law last year. That created a legal basis for attacking if the island declares independence. The mainland still has more than 700 missiles pointed at Taiwan."

WTO Rules Against Mexico In Soft-Drink Dispute. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/7) reports, "The World Trade Organization ruled that Mexico violated global trade rules in a soft-drink dispute with the US." A WTO panel "rejected a Mexican appeal, supporting US claims that Mexico was in breach of international law in imposing a 20% tax on drinks that are sweetened with anything other than cane sugar grown in Mexico."

Russia Reasserts Influence Over Former Soviet States. The Christian Science Monitor (3/7, Weir, 61K) reports elections in Belarus and Ukraine approach "amid dramatic accusations of planned coups, state coercion, and vote-fixing," but "Moscow isn't worried. Instead, there is a sense of calm and fresh confidence here that contrasts sharply with the Kremlin's panicky reactions to the surge of 'colored revolts' that swept through the region in recent years. … But the inability of new leaders to fulfill revolutionary pledges, together with the failure of popular pressure to effect change in other Soviet satellite states, has opened the way for Moscow to reassert its influence in the region."

Russia Approves Pipeline Plan Over Environmentalists' Objections. The New York Times (3/7, Chivers, 1.19M) reports the Russian government has approved a proposal by Transneft, the state-owned pipeline monopoly to build an oil pipeline "that would pass along the shoreline of Lake Baikal, the world's most voluminous fresh-water lake," despite "objections from scientists and environmental groups." The Washington Post (3/7, A14, Finn, 744K) reports, "The decision followed a review process that environmentalists and some Russian experts involved in assessing the route say was marked by manipulation of an expert panel and political pressure on dissenting scientists. … Greenpeace and other opponents of the project said they recognized the need for a pipeline and objected only to the route."

Serb War Criminal Assisting Prosecutors Commits Suicide. The New York Times (3/7, Simons, 1.19M) reports Milan Babic, "a wartime Serbian leader who was closely cooperating with prosecutors, committed suicide in a prison cell of the war crimes tribunal in The Hague, the court said Monday." Babic "was found dead in his cell on Sunday evening, the court said in a statement. A senior court official said he had hanged himself, but the court spokeswoman would not confirm that."

Kristoff Pleads With Bush To Stop Darfur Genocide. In his column for the New York Times (3/7, 1.19M) Nicholas Kristoff writes, "For more than two years, the world has pretty much ignored the genocide unfolding in the Darfur region of Sudan, just as it turned away from the slaughter of Armenians, Jews, Cambodians and Rwandans in earlier decades. And now, apparently encouraged by the world's acquiescence, Sudan is sending its proxy forces to invade neighboring Chad and kill and rape members of the same African tribes that have already been ethnically cleansed in Darfur itself. … In the last few weeks, President Bush has shown an increased willingness to address the slaughter in Darfur. He should now encourage the French to use their forces to defend Chad from proxy invasions, make a presidential speech to spotlight the issue, attend a donor conference for Darfur, encourage the use of a NATO bridging force until U.N. peacekeepers can arrive, enforce a no-fly zone and open a new initiative for peace talks among the sheiks of Darfur."

Wickham Criticizes Administration Policy On Issuing Visas To Cubans. USA Today (3/7, 2.31M) columnist DeWayne Wickham criticizes the fact that though he Bush Administration "refuses" to grant visas to Cuban academics seeking to attend a conference in Puerto Rico, the Cuban national baseball team was granted visas to play in the World Baseball Classic being held in San Juan, Puerto Rico.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales May Be Recalled On Eavesdropping (AP)

By KATHERINE SHRADER, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' written answers to questions about the Bush administration's eavesdropping program may require him to testify a second time before the Senate Judiciary Committee, the panel's Republican chairman said Monday.

"There is a suggestion in his letter there are other classified intelligence programs that are currently under way," Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., told reporters.

The comments from the moderate Republican come as the Bush administration is trying to quell criticism of its surveillance operations and work with the Senate on legislation that would write the program into law.

In a letter to Specter last week, Gonzales clarified his testimony in a half dozen areas covered in a daylong Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Feb. 6.

Gonzales said his answers were focused only on President Bush's program granting intelligence officers the power to monitor - without court approval - the international calls and e-mails of U.S. residents, when those officers suspect terrorism may be involved.

"In all of my testimony at the hearing I addressed - with limited exceptions - only the legal underpinnings of the Terrorist Surveillance Program," Gonzales wrote. "I did not and could not address operational aspects of the program or any other classified intelligence activities."

Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the Judiciary Committee's top Democrat, said Monday that Gonzales should come back before the panel to "clear up the confusion he created first by ducking our questions, and later by further clouding the issues with a 'clarifying' letter that substantially revised his unsworn testimony."

Specter's comments suggest he too has concerns about Gonzales' letter. "We may have to have him back before the Judiciary Committee," Specter said.

The Justice Department has not received a formal request to testify, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. "As a matter of practice, officials from the department do not discuss, confirm or deny the existence or nonexistence of any classified intelligence programs in public settings," he added.

Specter was one of the first Republicans to break with the White House to question the surveillance program when it was disclosed in December. He's drafting legislation that would require a secret federal intelligence court to conduct regular reviews of the constitutionality of the monitoring.

GOP Lawmakers Work To Limit Probe Of Domestic Spying Program (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Republicans in Congress are trying to limit the scope of any investigation into how President Bush's secret domestic-surveillance program has operated. Some key lawmakers are also working to legalize such spying on U.S. citizens in the future, perhaps with some judicial restrictions.

The dual-track effort is designed to protect the Bush administration from an all-out congressional inquiry into the secret program, while rejecting Bush's argument that he already has full legal authority to order such surveillance.

The Senate Intelligence Committee is scheduled to vote Tuesday on a Democratic plan to conduct a broad investigation into the program. Committee chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., is trying to win support for a more limited inquiry. Roberts refused to say Monday whether he had the votes to forestall the Democratic demand for an investigation. Democrats need only one Republican to side with them to order such a probe.

Under Bush's order and without court warrants, the National Security Agency has tracked electronic communications of U.S. residents the administration says are in contact with suspected al-Qaida members abroad. The program was first disclosed by The New York Times and acknowledged by Bush in December. Critics say Bush's action violates the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires warrants from a special secret court to authorize government spying inside the United States.

The partisan clash over the scope of an investigation prompted Senate Republican Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee last week to demand a meeting with Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. He also threatened to restructure the Intelligence Committee in a way that would weaken Democrats.

Reid on Monday dismissed Frist's call for talks.

"Let's have the Intelligence Committee do its work," Reid said. "I believe that we should see if Senator Roberts, who is a man of his word, is going to allow a vote on whether there should be an investigation. So when that' s completed ... I'll be happy to consider a meeting, but until then, what's there to meet about?"

In the Senate, a handful of Republicans has been working to give the president statutory authority to approve the NSA program. The administration argues that the president already has that power under the Constitution and a congressional resolution that gave Bush authority to use force in hunting down terrorists. Most Democrats and some Republicans reject that interpretation.

Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Mike DeWine of Ohio and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina met Friday to discuss DeWine's proposal to legalize the warrantless spying while giving Congress the right regularly to review it. Graham wants a special federal court to have some authority over the program.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is proposing his own legislation that would require the foreign intelligence surveillance court to determine whether the NSA program is constitutional. Specter said Monday that only after such a determination can Congress decide whether and how to restrict the program legislatively.

Meanwhile, Specter said Monday that he wants Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to testify again before his committee about the legal rationale for the NSA program. Specter said he worried that Gonzales' subsequent written responses to the committee suggested that the administration was conducting other secret programs.

"The letter that he sent to clarify his testimony raises a lot more questions," Specter said. "There is a suggestion in his letter that there are other intelligence programs which are currently under way."

The ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Jane Harman of California, said last week that Gonzales and White House counsel Harriet Miers assured her by telephone that no broader program exists. Harman's conversation was first reported by The Washington Post on Friday.

Prosecutor Urges Death For Concealing Sept. 11 Plot (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 6 — A federal prosecutor on Monday asked a jury to sentence Zacarias Moussaoui to death, saying his willful decision to conceal his knowledge of the Sept. 11 terrorist plot when he was arrested weeks earlier made him responsible for the thousands of deaths that day.

In response, a court-appointed lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui told jurors they could not order the execution of a man on no more than a supposition: that had he revealed his knowledge of Al Qaeda's interest in flying planes into public buildings, the federal authorities would have prevented the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan heritage, is the only person to be charged in the United States justice system with direct involvement in the Sept. 11 attacks. He was in jail on that day, having been arrested three weeks earlier in Minnesota on immigration charges while he was taking flight lessons.

He has pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts and admitted that he was taking flight training to be available for a Qaeda campaign to fly aircraft into buildings. But he has insisted that he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot and that he does not deserve to die.

DOJ_NMG_0016236

Because he has pleaded guilty, the trial that got under way on Monday is solely over whether he is to be executed by lethal injection at a federal prison in Indiana or spend his life in prison.

In their opening statements, lawyers for the government and for Mr. Moussaoui presented starkly different portraits of his importance to Al Qaeda's plans to wage war on the United States.

Robert Spencer, an assistant United States attorney, told the jury that Mr. Moussaoui was "in the thick of the plot" but that because he had been arrested, his contribution to the attacks "in the end was to lie so his Al Qaeda brothers could go forward."

Mr. Spencer said that had Mr. Moussaoui told a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent in August 2001 what he knew about Al Qaeda's plans, the bureau and the Federal Aviation Administration would have gone on full alert and taken steps to hunt down the hijackers and increased security at the nation's airports.

He said documents recovered from Mr. Moussaoui's home after Sept. 11 provided valuable clues that would have led directly to many of the 19 hijackers of that day.

"He killed the 9/11 victims as surely as if he had been at the controls in one of those airplanes," Mr. Spencer said.

Edward J. MacMahon, one of the court-appointed lawyers who is conducting the defense over Mr. Moussaoui's objections, said it was true that his client had proudly proclaimed himself a member of Al Qaeda and said he was planning to fly a plane into the White House at the orders of Osama bin Laden.

But Mr. MacMahon attacked the government's argument that had Mr. Moussaoui spoken truthfully of what he knew when he was arrested it would have prevented the attacks. He cited the official commission that investigated the attacks and found the government had several indications of Al Qaeda's plans before that day. The report found that the authorities never fully appreciated the significance of some of the leads.

"You can't judge him to get revenge for 9/11," Mr. MacMahon said. "You can't make him some substitute for Osama bin Laden. And you can't make him a scapegoat for what government officials did not do" to prevent the attacks.

Even if Mr. Moussaoui had not lied, he said, there is no reason to believe that the authorities would have acted quickly on that information any more than they acted on other leads. What officials would have done is speculative, he said, adding that Mr. Moussaoui was regarded as unreliable even by his Qaeda colleagues.

"No one should be executed on such flimsy evidence, not even a member of Al Qaeda," Mr. MacMahon said.

Throughout it all, Mr. Moussaoui sat back quietly in a chair to the side, slowly stroking his beard, often staring intently at spectators, who included about 10 family members of the attack victims.

The jury was whittled down on Monday to 17 people who will hear the case over the next several weeks. When it comes time to deliberate, 12 of that group will decide Mr. Moussaoui's fate. The jurors, 7 women and 10 men, are all from the Northern Virginia area.

Under the federal death penalty law, the jury's first task is to decide whether the crimes to which Mr. Moussaoui has pleaded to resulted in the death of anybody. If the jury is unanimous on that issue, it will consider aggravating factors, like the severity of the crime, as well as mitigating factors. If it finds the aggravating factors outweigh any mitigating factors, it will vote on whether to recommend the death penalty. If it does so, again unanimously, the judge is obliged to impose it.

Because Mr. Moussaoui pleaded guilty, the arguments that would have been at the heart of a jury trial on the question of his guilt will now get an airing before the newly installed jury, which is to decide his sentence. So the proceedings to come will resemble in almost every way the kind of trial that usually determines guilt or innocence in a capital case, and therefore may last for several weeks.

In addition to arguing that Mr. Moussaoui played no part in the Sept. 11 conspiracy, his lawyers are expected to argue that he is mentally unstable, a potentially mitigating factor. The lawyers have arranged for a psychologist to testify that Mr. Moussaoui's behavior, notably his frequent outbursts in the courtroom during the earlier proceedings, show him to be suffering from a mental disorder, "most likely schizophrenia," that began with his experiencing racism as a youth in France.

The government, for its part, plans to emphasize the losses of the Sept. 11 attacks. Prosecutors have prepared more than 40 family members to testify about the devastating impact on their lives.

The trial will include statements from six Qaeda officials in secret United States custody, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the chief planner of the Sept. 11 attacks. But those statements that will be included at the order of Judge Leonie M. Brinkema are likely to be solely about Mr. Moussaoui's role in Al Qaeda and also may not be made public.

Mr. Moussaoui's actual role in the Sept. 11 attacks has remained an intriguing mystery to investigators. The official commission that studied the attacks concluded that Qaeda leaders might have considered using him as "a potential substitute pilot" on Sept. 11 because of friction among other participants, but that his arrest scuttled that possibility. The commission also speculated that he might have been meant to be part of a second wave of attacks and noted that Al Qaeda spent some $50,000 on his training.

Moussaoui's Lies Led To 9/11, Jury Told (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The Sept. 11, 2001, attacks would have been prevented and nearly 3,000 lives would have been saved if Zacarias Moussaoui had not lied to cover up the terrorist plot, prosecutors said yesterday as they began the long-awaited death penalty trial for the al-Qaeda conspirator.

If Moussaoui had revealed al-Qaeda's plans when he was arrested a month before Sept. 11, investigators would have identified 11 of the 19 hijackers and stopped the attacks, prosecutors said in their opening statements. The government would have tightened airport security and focused on the small knives and box cutters used in the hijackings, the prosecution contended.

"The FBI would have put on an all-out press," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer told a jury in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. "Moussaoui lied and nearly 3,000 people died. . . . His lies killed the Sept. 11 victims as surely as if he had been at the controls of one of those planes."

But defense attorneys turned hindsight back on the government, arguing that investigators ignored warning signs before the attacks and likewise would have failed to act on Moussaoui's information. They portrayed Moussaoui as bumbling and unstable and someone associates called "cuckoo in the head" but implored jurors to give him a fair trial.

"Moussaoui poses the ultimate test for our legal system," attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. told the 12 jurors and five alternates. "You cannot judge him to get revenge for the victims of Sept. 11, or for what happened on 9/11 or as some substitute for Osama bin Laden."

The passionate interchanges marked the beginning of the first -- and probably the only -- trial in the United States that will probe the events that brought down the World Trade Center, damaged the Pentagon and killed 40 people in a field in Pennsylvania when four planes were hijacked and used as missiles. Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 plot and is the only person charged in this country in connection with the attacks. The trial will determine whether Moussaoui is executed for his role.

The opening statements ended 4 1/2 years of anticipation for many of the victims' families, who crammed the crowded courtroom or watched via closed-circuit television at private satellite locations in New York City, Long Island, New Jersey, Boston, Philadelphia and Alexandria, hoping for a measure of justice and some insight into what happened that day.

What they got yesterday was a glimpse of the man who for many has come to personify the attacks. Although Moussaoui admitted a role in the conspiracy, neither he nor the government has been specific about that role. He has said in court that he was part of a planned second wave of terrorism and was to fly a plane into the White House.

Still, he is a powerful presence for victims' families. When prosecutors began playing an al-Qaeda training video after opening statements, Moussaoui stroked his beard, smiled and sang along in Arabic: "We defend our religion with blood."

The sight evoked strong emotions in Bradley Burlingame, whose brother Charles was the pilot of the plane that crashed into the Pentagon. "I had my little fantasy of crossing the rail and strangling him, but that's not how the American process works," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0016238

Burlingame and his sister, Debra, said they hope Moussaoui is executed. "It was quite chilling to be in the courtroom with this man. He epitomized what you think evil will be, and I think he enjoys it," said Bradley Burlingame, who flew in from Los Angeles for the opening statements.

The courthouse itself was under tight security. Snipers patrolled nearby rooftops while officers checked the identification -- twice -- of everyone who entered the building.

Yet the proceedings lacked some of the more theatrical elements that have come to characterize the case since Moussaoui was first charged in December 2001. Moussaoui, who is known for his courtroom outbursts and was repeatedly ejected by the judge during jury selection, sat quietly at his own table in the corner yesterday.

The day began with prosecutors and defense attorneys winnowing a group of more than 80 prospective jurors to the final 17 through peremptory, or unexplained, challenges. Eighteen jurors were initially chosen, but after they were seated and sworn in, one woman asked to be excused and was allowed to leave without explanation.

The 10 men and seven women -- all Northern Virginia residents -- cover a range of private-sector and government jobs. They include a woman whose brother-in-law works for the New York Police Department and was a rescuer at the World Trade Center, a man who served on a Navy ship in the Persian Gulf War and a Muslim woman born in Iran.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told the jurors that they will be exposed to classified national security information that they are never to disclose to others.

Prosecutors focused their argument on how Moussaoui lied to the FBI when he was arrested in Minnesota while training on a Boeing 747 simulator. He told agents he was only a tourist with a "dream" to fly, Spencer said, but later admitted when he pleaded guilty that he had lied to allow al-Qaeda to go forward with the plot.

Spencer began by evoking the emotion of Sept. 11, recalling a crisp fall day that dawned clear and blue, with workers at the World Trade Center sitting at their desks checking e-mail and passengers on the four hijacked planes sipping coffee.

"It started as an utterly normal day," Spencer said. "But a day that started so normally and with such promise soon became a day of abject horror."

Turning to face Moussaoui, Spencer pointed and said: "One of the people in that plan, one of the people in the conspiracy, is among us still. That man is the defendant, Zacarias Moussaoui." Spencer portrayed Moussaoui as "a loyal al-Qaeda soldier. . . . Moussaoui stands before you today, an admitted terrorist, a convicted terrorist, a proud and unrepentant terrorist."

Spencer also began outlining the details of the government's case for the death penalty. He told jurors that al-Qaeda wired $14,000 to Moussaoui. If Moussaoui had told the FBI of the money, agents would have traced it to the man in the United Arab Emirates who sent it. That man's cell phone number would have led them to a number of the hijackers, he said. In addition, others would have been traced through a list of flight schools later found in Moussaoui's belongings.

Prosecutors did not address the controversy over the failure to search Moussaoui's belongings before Sept. 11. The independent commission that investigated the attacks sketched a series of government missteps that led officials at FBI headquarters to believe that they could not gain a warrant. But if Moussaoui had revealed all he knew, prosecutors said yesterday, the belongings would have been searched in time.

"This man, the terrorist Moussaoui, did his part," Spencer said. "Moussaoui lied so that murders followed. He intended to kill Americans, and he did."

MacMahon sketched a different portrait. The real Moussaoui, he said, was a bumbler who couldn't even fly a single-engine plane, a man so inconsequential that even his terrorist overseers dismissed him: "Moussaoui was totally useless to al-Qaeda, a headache, totally obnoxious."

Defense attorneys honed in on the failure to stop the attacks, playing videos of former attorney general John D. Ashcroft and then-National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice speaking about how the attacks revealed problems with the nation's intelligence structure that went back years.

"The government case for death is predicated on the unlikely pretense that the government would have carried out a flawless investigation" if Moussaoui had told the truth, MacMahon said. "You cannot look at this through post-9/11 glasses."

Prosecutor: Moussaoui Did His Part For 9/11 (AP-Y2)

Opening its argument for executing al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, the government said Monday he "lied so that murders could follow" on Sept. 11, 2001.

But the defense portrayed Moussaoui as a buffoon isolated even by al-Qaida and urged jurors to deny him the martyrdom of a death sentence.

In a heavily guarded courthouse just miles from the Pentagon, where some of the 2,972 victims of Sept. 11 died, prosecutor Rob Spencer opened his case by telling the jury that "even though he was in jail on Sept. 11, he did his part as a loyal al-Qaida soldier."

"Had he not lied to agents in 2001, the U.S. government would have stopped those deaths, or at least some of them," Spencer asserted.

Court-appointed defense attorney Edward MacMahon scoffed at that idea. He termed Moussaoui's dreams of being a terrorist "sound and fury signifying nothing."

Considered a headache and even called "cuckoo in the head" by one al-Qaida leader, Moussaoui "was intentionally isolated from the real hijackers in the United States," MacMahon argued. "Nothing Moussaoui did or said — even a lie — caused anyone to die that day."

Now Moussaoui yearns for martyrdom, MacMahon asserted. "The only way he can appear as a smiling face on an al-Qaida recruiting poster is by your verdict," MacMahon told jurors. "Please don't make him a hero. He doesn't deserve it."

The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent, who faces either execution or life in prison without release, stroked his beard and intently studied the faces of jurors and the audience during opening statements.

Empaneled hours earlier, 10 men and seven women listened from the jury box. Across the hall, watching on closed circuit TV, Moussaoui's mother, Aicha, wept quietly when he entered court. One floor above, families of the Sept. 11 victims also watched on TV. Outside, snipers clad in black fatigues guarded the building.

Wearing a green prison jumpsuit and a white knit cap, Moussaoui remained quiet during proceedings, but as he left for a recess he told the lawyers, "All your stories, all your American creations have nothing to do with me."

Prosecutor Spencer said Moussaoui, the only man charged in this country in the Sept. 11 plot, should be held responsible for not stopping it after the FBI arrested him Aug. 16, 2001, while he was training in Eagan, Minn., to fly jetliners.

Moussaoui, Spencer said, was such an inexperienced pilot that the FBI suspected he might be a terrorist, but Moussaoui told them he was a tourist pursing a dream. That lie made him responsible for the deaths "as surely as if he had been at the controls of one of the planes" that al-Qaida hijacked and flew into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a field in Pennsylvania, the prosecutor said.

If Moussaoui had told the FBI the same plot details he described last April when he pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts, that would have been "all the government needed to know to stop 9/11," Spencer said.

Moussaoui himself says he conspired with al-Qaida to fly planes into U.S. buildings but he wasn't part of the Sept. 11 planning. Instead, he says, he was training instead to fly into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

If Moussaoui had come clean in 2001, Spencer said, the FBI would have been able to use his records to locate 11 of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers, including all four pilots. He also said the government would have keep those conspirators off airplanes and would have altered airport screeners to confiscate small knives and boxcutters.

MacMahon argued that Moussaoui knew less about the Sept. 11 plot than the government did. The inept government handling of the intelligence it had, he said, shows it would never have mounted the flawless probe Spencer described. "What the government wants you to believe is only a dream."

MacMahon said the U.S. government was told in 1995 that al-Qaida terrorists in the Philippines who had participated in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center were discussing hijacking a commercial jet and flying it into CIA headquarters, but they never changed their aviation security to prevent that.

He pointed out that the government knew two of the hijackers were in the United States for months before Sept. 11 and never put them on a no-fly list.

"Nothing they were told by some Muslim loner in Minnesota would have changed that" response by the government, MacMahon said.

He said the Sept. 11 hijackers traveled in teams and trained together, but Moussaoui traveled alone, didn't train with them and was never in the presence of a real hijacker.

He played videotapes of then-Attorney General John Ashcroft describing how the FBI and CIA didn't share information before the attacks, and of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying any way to prevent Sept. 11 would have had to have been in place years earlier.

The 17 jurors included a high school math teacher who has traveled widely in the Middle East, a Navy veteran of the first Gulf War and an Iranian-born Sunni Muslim woman. The judge will later designate five as alternates.

The final group included only two of 21 prospective jurors who had some connection to the Sept. 11 attacks or victims.

One was a woman whose brother-in-law works for the New York City Police Department and helped with rescue at the World Trade Center. The math teacher had a more remote connection: The fathers of two of her pupils are firefighters who responded to the crash at the Pentagon. She helped freshmen make a quilt to give to the fire department.

One woman who was seated said earlier that she would tend to assume an al-Qaida member is evil. Jurors also included a mental health researcher, a man whose father retired from the CIA just before Sept. 11, a man who serves in the military reserves and a federal government employee who said he thought there was a lack of communication between the FBI and CIA before the attacks.

Outside the courthouse, D. Hamilton Peterson of Bethesda, Md., who lost his father, Donald, and stepmother, Jean, on the hijacked plane that crashed in Pennsylvania, declared, "I want accountability."

"I believe Moussaoui is an excellent candidate for the death penalty," he said outside the courtroom. "He is nothing less than a mass murderer."

Moussaoui Chose Not To Stop 9/11, Jury Told (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, March 7, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — The U.S. government opened its case for the execution of al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui on Monday, charging that the French citizen withheld critical information that would have exposed the Sept. 11 plot.

“This man knew there was a ticking bomb in the United States,” prosecutor Robert Spencer told a federal jury. “He lied so his brothers could go forward with this,” he said. “He caused the deaths of nearly 3,000 people; he rejoiced in the death and destruction.”

Moussaoui, 37, is the only person charged in the USA in the 2001 attacks in which hijacked airliners crashed into the Pentagon, the World Trade Center and a field in rural Pennsylvania.

A Muslim of Moroccan descent, Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to six counts of conspiracy. The hearing, which continues today, is to allow a 12-member jury to determine whether he should be executed or spend the rest of his life in prison.

Execution hinges on whether prosecutors prove that Moussaoui lied or withheld from federal agents critical information that could have been used to prevent some of the 9/11 deaths.

Moussaoui was arrested Aug. 16, 2001, on immigration violations while enrolled at a flight school in Eagan, Minn. Instructors alerted authorities to Moussaoui because he lacked experience piloting planes but wanted training to fly a 747.

In pleading guilty, Moussaoui acknowledged he was aware of a planned attack against the United States but said he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot. He told authorities he was part of a separate plan to fly a plane into the White House sometime after Sept. 11.

Defense lawyers dismissed the government's claims Monday as “entirely speculative.” Edward McMahon, one of Moussaoui's lawyers, said the government's assertion that it could have unraveled the Sept. 11 plot with Moussaoui's cooperation in the 25 days before the attacks defied “common sense.”

McMahon said Moussaoui never had specific knowledge of the Sept. 11 plot. He said he could not have known the date for the attacks because the 19 suicide hijackers did not begin buying their airline tickets until Aug. 25, after Moussaoui was arrested.

Describing his client as a “strange Muslim loner,” McMahon said that even Moussaoui's associates in al-Qaeda — the radical Islamic group that carried out the attacks — regarded him as “a headache” and “cuckoo in the head.” McMahon said Moussaoui never had contact with any of the hijackers before the attacks.

“There is little evidence that Moussaoui had the means or opportunity to anything,” McMahon said.

Moussaoui has captured much attention for his frequent outbursts in court, where he has been reprimanded repeatedly by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema. The judge revoked his right to defend himself because of his misbehavior and appointed a defense team to represent him.

Moussaoui, dressed in a green inmate jumpsuit and white knit skullcap, sat quietly for the most part. He stroked his beard as lawyers he rarely has communicated with made their arguments to spare his life.

McMahon suggested a death sentence would make his client a hero for the terrorist cause.

“The only way to achieve that dream of martyrdom is by your verdict,” McMahon said. “Please don't make him a hero, ladies and gentlemen. He just doesn't deserve it.”

Among the victims' family members were Brad and Debra Burlingame, siblings of Charles Burlingame, the pilot of American Airlines Flight 77, the jet that hijackers crashed into the Pentagon.

“This is a very bad, bad evil man,” Debra Burlingame said of Moussaoui. “I would feel very comfortable with saying goodbye to Mr. Moussaoui for good.”

In an interview Monday with CNN, Moussaoui's mother, Aicha El Waifi, said she doubted her son could receive a fair hearing. “The only thing that I do hope is that my son will not be used as a scapegoat,” she said.
