Relatives of Sept. 11 victims gathered Monday at a courthouse near the site of the World Trade Center to watch a broadcast of the only man charged in the terrorist attacks as he stood before a judge to begin a sentencing trial.

The trial for Zacarias Moussaoui is taking place in Virginia, but victims' families watched via closed-circuit television at federal courthouses in New York City, Boston, Central Islip, N.Y., Newark, N.J. and Philadelphia.

The trial will determine whether Moussaoui, 37, is executed or serves life in prison for conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack planes and commit other crimes.

The families gathered at the courthouse just a few blocks from where the World Trade center once stood, some carrying photographs or buttons with images of their loved ones. Many also held scarves or other items emblazoned with the American flag.

"After 4 1/2 long years, this is our only attempt to get a scintilla of justice," said Sally Regenhard, whose son, firefighter Christian Regenhard, died in the attack.

"What does accountability feel like? That's what eluded the families of the victims," she said. "They all got away with murder, so we only have him left."

Christie Coombs of Massachusetts, who lost her husband in the attack, said Moussaoui murdered him "as much as if he had the controls in his hands and flown the plane into the building, which is what his intent was."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April. To obtain the death penalty, prosecutors must first prove a direct link between him and the Sept. 11 attacks. Moussaoui denies any connection to 9/11, but says he was training for a possible future attack.

Barry Zelman, whose brother Kenneth died on the 99th floor of the Oracle Corp., said some part of him wanted to see Moussaoui on trial in person. He said, "He's al Qaida in the flesh."

Zelman said he expects watching the trial to be difficult. He and others said it was ridiculous to think the trial would bring families a sense of closure or justice.

"There's going to be a lot of anger, a lot of emotion," he said.

Mindy Kleinberg of New Jersey, whose husband, Alan, died in the trade center, said she hopes the trial will yield answers to questions about Sept. 11.

DOJ_NMG_0016242

"We had a lot of questions that weren't answered because of this trial," she said.

Joyce Woods, of Pearl River, whose 26-year-old son, James Woods, worked for Cantor Fitzgerald, said she came "because we need to know that our government is protecting us."

But, she said, she anguished over whether to come. She said, "I'm afraid of his ranting," referring to Moussaoui's frequent courtroom outbursts.

Let Moussaoui Live (USAT)

By Carie Lemack

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Arguments begin this week in the sentencing trial of a man accused of conspiracy in my mother's murder. The U.S. government wants to put the confessed terrorist to death. But I want him to live. And I think Mom would, too.

The accused, Zacarias Moussaoui, has admitted he is a member of al-Qaeda and has publicly pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden. Last April, he pleaded guilty to the six terrorism conspiracy charges, admitting his intent to commit terrorism and aircraft piracy, and to use weapons of mass destruction. His admission earns him life in prison. The reason for the trial is to put him to death, thereby doing to him what he was willing to do to himself.

My mom, Judy Larocque, was murdered by madmen who yearned to die in their crazed belief that slamming the plane she had the misfortune to board into the World Trade Center in New York would bring them everlasting paradise. As a passenger on American Airlines Flight 11 on Sept. 11, 2001, Mom was granted neither a trial nor justice when she unwittingly became part of their evil plan.

Now, the government wants to put to death a man who it says had foreknowledge of the plot that killed my mom and 2,971 others. This man says that he was not supposed to be part of the 9/11 plan, but that he was going to "martyr" himself at a later date by crashing a plane into the White House. This man wants to die. So why is the government fighting to give him what he wants? A U.S. attorney close to the investigation denied that that was the government's intent. He explained that Moussaoui does not want to die at the hands of American officials and American courts.

Moussaoui's forum

But I disagree. Moussaoui wanted to tear the bonds that hold our country together — in the case of 9/11, literally limb by limb. His ongoing antics and sporadic outbursts in the courtroom, sometimes leading to his removal, have done just that, making a mockery of the trial.

The U.S. government should not give him a forum. He pleaded guilty to crimes that require life in prison. Let's give it to him. Take him away, so we don't have to hear from him again.

My opposition to his execution does not stem from compassion. Quite the contrary. Rather, it stems from two thoughts — one rational, the other pure emotion.

First, it costs more to put Moussaoui to death, according to several state studies cited by the non-profit Death Penalty Information Center, a group that opposes capital punishment.

In Moussaoui's case, there wouldn't even have to be a trial if U.S. officials agreed that life in prison was enough for the terrorist. They don't, and are prepared to spend millions arguing the case.

I prefer to see that money spent on almost anything else rather than on Moussaoui. Give it to the families of soldiers fighting Moussaoui's allies in Afghanistan, give it to New York City firefighters to buy walkie-talkies that work, but don't give it to a confessed terrorist seeking an audience.

The second reason is embarrassing to admit but true. I want Moussaoui to die a slow, painful death. I do not want to give him the dignity of a planned execution, time to say his goodbyes, eat his last meal. His comrades did not give that to my mother. Let him sit in a cold, dirty cell alone for the rest of his long days, unable to direct his rants at anyone.

True to Mom

I know that some 9/11 families will not agree with me, and I respect their views.

If I learned anything after Mom's murder, it is that we all grieve differently. But I also know that I have to be true to myself, and to Mom. This realization hit me when I was standing in my shower last week and the song on the radio made me cry.

DOJ_NMG_0016243

"She's gone so long. What can I do? Where could she be? ... Don't know what I'm gonna do

"I gotta get back to you."

Sweet Talkin' Woman by '70s rock sensation Electric Light Orchestra was my favorite song when I was2 years old. At my insistence, my mom played the record over and over as I danced in circles, screaming the words at the top of my lungs. But now those words have another meaning, one I did not fully understand until Mom's murder.

Getting back to Mom means getting back to living as she would want me to, dancing as I did when I was 2. But I cannot enjoy my life with the heavy conscience of someone who has been involved in taking one.

I would rather spend my energy getting back to living a life Mom would be proud of. Because, as the song's final line reminded me when I stood sobbing in the shower, it's so sad if that's the way it's over.

AP Sues For Access To Lindh's Petitions To Cut His Prison Sentence (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, The Associated Press

AP, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Associated Press sued the Justice Department on Monday for access to American-born Taliban soldier John Walker Lindh's petitions to have his 20-year federal prison sentence shortened.

The federal Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in New York, said the government has improperly refused to turn over Lindh's pleas to have his sentence reduced on the grounds that doing so would be an unwarranted invasion of his privacy.

AP's lawyers, in letters to the Justice Department and the lawsuit, however, said Lindh "is a 'high-profile public figure' whose 'privacy interest in his petition is low to nonexistent.'"

Lindh's lawyer, James Brosnahan, also has told the news cooperative that he would have turned over the documents himself, but he can't under the terms of Lindh's imprisonment.

The Justice Department did not immediately comment on the lawsuit.

Lindh, 25, was captured in Afghanistan in November 2001 in the U.S.-led effort to topple the Taliban following the Sept. 11 attacks. Lindh grew up in Marin County, Calif.

Prosecutors charged him with conspiring to kill Americans and supporting terrorists. He pleaded guilty to lesser offenses in 2002, including carrying weapons against U.S. forces. He avoided a potential life sentence and agreed to withdraw claims that he had been abused or tortured in U.S. custody.

The AP said it believes Lindh "contends in his petition that he was prosecuted and convicted unfairly in the immediate wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks, and that he was not, in fact, knowingly fighting the United States in Afghanistan."

The president decides whether to commute sentences or pardon people who have been convicted of crimes and have completed their sentences, usually on the recommendation of the department's Pardon Attorney.

Lindh, who is held at the medium security federal penitentiary in Victorville, Calif., first applied for clemency in September 2004, following up on his request 15 months later. Justice officials told him it would be at least a year before any decision is made.

AP first sought the records on Jan. 4. Nine days later, the department replied it could only release the documents with Lindh's written consent, according to the lawsuit. But Lindh is barred from making any public comment on the matter, including consenting to the release, under the terms of his plea agreement, the suit said.

A similar privacy issue is at the center of a long dispute between AP and the government over access to information about detainees at the U.S. military facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff last month ordered the Pentagon to release the identities of hundreds of detainees.

Tending To Muslim Hearts And Islam's Future (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The young Egyptian professional could pass for any New York bachelor.

Dressed in a crisp polo shirt and swathed in cologne, he races his Nissan Maxima through the rain-slicked streets of Manhattan, late for a date with a tall brunette. At red lights, he fusses with his hair.

What sets the bachelor apart from other young men on the make is the chaperon sitting next to him — a tall, bearded man in a white robe and stiff embroidered hat.

"I pray that Allah will bring this couple together," the man, Sheik Reda Shata, says, clutching his seat belt and urging the bachelor to slow down.

Christian singles have coffee hour. Young Jews have JDate. But many Muslims believe that it is forbidden for an unmarried man and woman to meet in private. In predominantly Muslim countries, the job of making introductions and even arranging marriages typically falls to a vast network of family and friends.

In Brooklyn, there is Mr. Shata.

Week after week, Muslims embark on dates with him in tow. Mr. Shata, the imam of a Bay Ridge mosque, juggles some 550 "marriage candidates," from a gold-toothed electrician to a professor at Columbia University. The meetings often unfold on the green velour couch of his office, or over a meal at his favorite Yemeni restaurant on Atlantic Avenue.

The bookish Egyptian came to America in 2002 to lead prayers, not to dabble in matchmaking. He was far more conversant in Islamic jurisprudence than in matters of the heart. But American imams must wear many hats, none of which come tailor-made.

Whether issuing American-inspired fatwas or counseling the homesick, fielding questions from the F.B.I. or mediating neighborhood spats, Mr. Shata walks an endless labyrinth of problems.

If anything seems conquerable, it is the solitude of Muslim singles. Nothing brings the imam more joy than guiding them to marriage. It is his way of fashioning a future for his faith. It is his most heartfelt effort — by turns graceful and comedic, vexing and hopeful — to make Islam work in America.

Word of the imam's talents has traveled far, eliciting lonely calls from Muslims in Chicago and Los Angeles, or from meddlesome parents in Cairo and Damascus.

From an estimated 250 chaperoned dates, Mr. Shata has produced 10 marriages.

"The prophet said whoever brings a man and woman together, it is as if he has worshiped for an entire year," said Mr. Shata, 37, speaking through an Arabic translator.

The task is not easy. In a country of plentiful options, Muslim immigrants can become picky, even rude, the imam complains.

During one date, a woman studied the red-circled eyes of a prospective husband and asked, "Have you brought me an alcoholic?"

On another occasion, an Egyptian man stared at the flat chest of a pleasant young Moroccan woman and announced, "She looks like a log!" the imam recalled.

"This would never happen in Egypt," said Mr. Shata, turning red at the memory. "Never, never. If I knew this boy had no manners I never would have let him into my office."

The Imam's Little Black Book

The concept of proper courtship in Islam, like much about the faith, is open to interpretation.

Islamic law specifies that a man and woman who are unmarried may not be alone in closed quarters. Some Muslims reject any mingling before marriage. Others freely date. Many fall somewhere in between, meeting in groups, getting engaged and spending time alone before the wedding, while their parents look the other way.

For one Syrian in New York, a date at Starbucks is acceptable if it begins and ends on the premises: The public is his chaperon.

Mr. Shata is a traditionalist. There were few strangers in his rural town of birth, Kafr al Battikh, in northeastern Egypt. Men and women often agreed to marry the day they met, and a few made the deal sight unseen. It was rare to meet anyone from a distant province, let alone another country.

DOJ_NMG_0016245

New York is not only the capital of the world, imams often joke, but also the crossroads of Islam, a human sampling more diverse than anywhere save Mecca during the annual pilgrimage known as the Hajj. Beyond the city's five boroughs, Muslim immigrants have formed Islamic hubs in California, Illinois, Michigan and Texas.

At the center of these hubs stands a familiar sight in a foreign land, the mosque. What was a place of worship in Pakistan or Algeria becomes, in Houston or Detroit, a social haven. But inside, the sexes remain largely apart.

A growing number of Muslim Web sites advertise marriage candidates, and housewives often double as matchmakers. One mosque in Princeton, N.J., plays host to a closely supervised version of speed dating. And so many singles worship at the Islamic Society of Boston that a committee was formed to match them up.

Fearing a potential surplus of single Muslim women, one Brooklyn imam reportedly urged his wealthier male congregants during a Ramadan sermon last year to take two wives. When a woman complained about the sermon to Mr. Shata, he laughed.

"You know that preacher who said Hugo Chávez should be shot?" he asked. "We have our idiots, too."

More than a matchmaker, Mr. Shata sees himself as a surrogate elder to young Muslims, many of whom live far from their parents. In America, only an imam is thought to have the connections, wisdom and respect to step into the role.

Mr. Shata began the service three months after arriving in Brooklyn in 2002, recruited to lead the Islamic Society of Bay Ridge, a mosque on Fifth Avenue.

Dates chaperoned by Mr. Shata — or "meetings between candidates," as the imam prefers to call them — often take place in his distinctly unromantic office, amid rows of Islamic texts. As a couple get acquainted, the imam sits quietly at his desk, writing a sermon or surfing the Arabic Web sites of CNN and the BBC.

If there is an awkward silence, the imam perks up and asks a question ("So tell me, Ilham, how many siblings do you have?") and the conversation is moving again.

Candidates are vetted carefully, and those without personal references need not apply. But instinct is Mr. Shata's best guide. He refused to help a Saudi from California because the man would consider only a teenage wife. Others have shown an all-too-keen interest in a green card.

Those who pass initial inspection are listed in the imam's version of a little black book — their names, phone numbers, specifications and desires. Some prefer "silky hair," others "a virgin." Nearly all candidates, men and women alike, want a mate with devotion to Islam, decent looks and legal immigration status.

Scanning the book, the imam makes his pitch with the precision of a car salesman.

"There is a girl, an American convert, Dominican, looks a little Egyptian. Skin-wise, not white, not dark. Wheat-colored. She's 19, studies accounting," Mr. Shata told a 24-year-old Palestinian man one afternoon.

"This is my only choice?" replied the man, Yamal Othman, who lives in Queens.

Such questions annoy Mr. Shata. An imam, he says, should be trusted to select the best candidate. Often, though, his recommendations are met with skepticism.

"It's harder than choosing a diamond," said Mr. Shata.

Sometimes, on the imam's three-legged dates, no one seems more excited than Mr. Shata himself. He makes hurried, hearty introductions and then steps back to watch, as if mixing chemicals in a lab experiment. Love is rarely ignited, but the imam remains awed by its promise.

Mr. Shata discovered love 15 years ago, when he walked into the living room of the most stately house in Kafr al Battikh.

The imam was tall, 22, a rising star at the local mosque. For months, Omyma Elshabrawy knew only his voice. She would listen to his thunderous sermons from the women's section, out of view. Then, one evening, he appeared at her home, presented as a prospective groom to her father, a distinguished reciter of the Koran.

The young woman, then 20, walked toward Mr. Shata carrying a tray of lemonade.

"She entered my heart," said the imam.

After serving the drinks, she disappeared. Right then, Mr. Shata asked her father for her hand in marriage. The older man paused. His daughter was the town beauty, an English student with marriage offers from doctors. The imam was penniless.

But before Mr. Elshabrawy could respond, a sugary voice interrupted. "I accept," his daughter said from behind a door.

"I loved him from the moment I saw him," Ms. Elshabrawy said.

DOJ_NMG_0016246

They now have four children.

The family posed last year for a Sears-style portrait, taken by a woman in Bay Ridge who photographs Muslim families in her basement. A blue sky and white picket fence adorn the background. The imam sits at center, with the baby, Mohammed, in his lap, his three daughters smiling, his wife wrapped in a lime-green hijab.

Mr. Shata carries the picture in the breast pocket of his robe. It is as close as most people get to his family. At the mosque, they are a mystery. His wife has been there twice.

Their years in America have come with great hardship, a subject the imam rarely discusses. The trouble is the illness of his 7-year-old daughter, Rawda, who is severely epileptic. She has dozens of seizures every day and rarely leaves home. No combination of medicine seems to help.

"Rawda is the wound in my heart," the imam said.

Mr. Shata offers long, stubborn theories about the value of marriage, but to observe him at home is to understand the commitment he seeks to foster in other Muslims.

The family lives in a spare, dimly lighted apartment two blocks from the mosque. Headscarves are piled over Pokémon cards. The gold-painted words "Allah is Great" are framed over a threadbare couch. In the next room, an "I {sheart} New York" bumper sticker is slapped on the wall.

Mr. Shata spends long hours away from his family, lecturing at mosques, settling disputes, whispering the call to prayer in the ears of newborn babies. On his walk home at night, he shops for groceries, never forgetting the Honey Nut Cheerios, a favorite American discovery of his children.

When he walks in the door, his face softens. Loud kisses are planted on tender cheeks. Mohammed squeals, the girls smile, sweet laughter echoes.

But then there is Rawda.

"My beautiful girl," the imam says softly one evening, holding his limp daughter in his lap after a seizure has passed. He places one pill in Rawda's mouth, then another. She looks at him weakly.

"There we go," he whispers. "Inshallah."

Her lids close with sleep. He lays her in bed and shuts off the light.

Hardship, the imam believes — like marriage, like life — is a test from God.

Foreign and Familiar

It is proof of the imam's uncommon popularity among women that he is trusted with roughly 300 female marriage candidates.

The mosque on Fifth Avenue is a decidedly male place. Men occupy every position on the board of directors. They crowd the sidewalk after prayer. Only they may enter the mosque's central room of worship. Only men, they often point out, are required to attend the Friday prayer.

One floor below is the cramped room where the women worship. On Fridays, they sit pressed together, their headscarves itching with heat. They must watch their imam on a closed-circuit television that no one seems to have adjusted in years.

But they listen devotedly. Teenage girls often roll their eyes at foreign imams, who seem to them like extraterrestrials. Their immigrant mothers often find these clerics too strict, an uncomfortable reminder of their conservative homelands.

Mr. Shata is both foreign and familiar. He presides over a patriarchal world, sometimes upholding it, and other times challenging it. In one sermon, he said that a man was in charge of his home and had the right to "choose his wife's friends."

Another day, to the consternation of his male congregants, he invited a female Arab social worker to lecture on domestic violence. The women were allowed to sit next to the men in the main section of the mosque.

The imam frowns at career women who remain single in their 30's, but boasts of their accomplishments to interest marriage candidates. He employs his own brand of feminism, vetting marriage contracts closely to ensure brides receive a fair dowry and fighting for them when they don't.

Far more than is customary, he spends hours listening to women: to their worries and confessions, their intimate secrets and frank questions about everything from menstruation to infidelity. They line up outside his office and call his home at all hours, often referring to him as "my brother" or "father." He can summon the details of their lives with the same encyclopedic discipline he once used to memorize the Koran.

DOJ_NMG_0016247

"Are you separated yet?" Mr. Shata asked a woman he encountered at Lutheran Medical Center one day last July. She nodded. "May God make it easier for you," he said.

A Chaperoned Date

By most standards, the Egyptian bachelor was a catch. He had broad shoulders and a playful smile. He was witty. He earned a comfortable salary as an engineer, and came from what he called "a good family."

But the imam saw him differently, as a young man in danger of losing his faith. The right match might save him.

The bachelor, who is 33, came to Brooklyn from Alexandria, Egypt, six years earlier. He craved a better salary, and freedom from controlling parents. He asked that his name not be printed for fear of causing embarrassment to his family.

America was not like Egypt, where his family's connections could secure a good job. In Brooklyn, he found work as a busboy. He traded the plush comfort of his parents' home for an apartment crowded with other Egyptian immigrants. His nights were lonely. Temptation was abundant.

Women covered far less of their bodies. Bare limbs, it seemed, were everywhere. In Islam, men are instructed to lower their gaze to avoid falling into sin.

"In the summertime, it's a disaster for us," said the bachelor. "Especially a guy like me, who's looking all the time."

Curiosity lured him into bars, clubs and the occasional one-night stand.

But with freedom came guilt, he said. After drifting from his faith, he visited Mr. Shata's mosque during Ramadan in 2004.

The imam struck him as oddly disarming. He made jokes, and explained Islam in simple, passionate paragraphs. The bachelor soon began praying daily, attending weekly lectures and reading the Koran. By then, he had his own apartment and a consulting job.

Now he wanted a Muslim wife.

If the bachelor had been in Egypt, his parents would offer a stream of marriage candidates. The distance had not stopped them entirely. His mother sent him a video of his brother's wedding, directing him to footage of a female guest. He was unimpressed.

"I'm a handsome guy," he explained one evening as he sped toward Manhattan. It was his second date with Mr. Shata in attendance. "I have a standard in beauty."

From the passenger seat, the imam flipped open the glove compartment to find an assortment of pricey colognes. He inspected a bottle of Gio and, with a nod from the bachelor, spritzed it over his robe.

The imam and the bachelor were at odds over the material world, but on one thing they agreed: it is a Muslim duty to smell good. The religion's founder, the Prophet Muhammad, was said to wear musk.

The car slowed before a brick high-rise on Second Avenue. Soon the pair rode up in the elevator. The bachelor took a breath and rang the doorbell. An older woman answered. Behind her stood a slender, fetching woman with a shy smile.

The young woman, Engy Abdelkader, had been presented to the imam by another matchmaker. A woman of striking beauty and poise, Ms. Abdelkader is less timid than she first seems. She works as an immigration and human rights lawyer, and speaks in forceful, eloquent bursts. She is proud of her faith, and lectures publicly on Islam and civil liberties.

She was not always so outspoken. The daughter of Egyptian immigrants, Ms. Abdelkader, 30, was raised in suburban Howell, N.J., where she longed to fit in. Though she grew up praying, in high school she chose not to wear a hijab, the head scarf donned by Muslim girls when they reach puberty.

But Sept. 11 awakened her, Ms. Abdelkader said. For her and other Muslims, the terrorist attacks prompted a return to the faith, driven by what she said was a need to reclaim Islam from terrorists and a vilifying media. Headscarves became a statement, equal parts political and religious.

"There's nothing oppressive about it," said Ms. Abdelkader. "As a Muslim woman I am asking people to pay attention to the content of my character rather than my physical appearance."

The pair sat on a couch, awkwardly sipping tea. They began by talking, in English, about their professions. The bachelor was put off by the fact that Ms. Abdelkader had a law degree, yet earned a modest salary.

DOJ_NMG_0016248

"Why go to law school and not make money?" he asked later.

Ms. Abdelkader's mother and a female friend who lived in the apartment sat listening nearby until the imam mercifully distracted them. The first hint of trouble came soon after.

It was his dream, the engineer told Ms. Abdelkader, to buy a half-million-dollar house. But he was uncertain that the mortgage he would need is lawful in Islam.

Ms. Abdelkader straightened her back and replied, "I would rather have eternal bliss in the hereafter than live in a house or apartment with a mortgage."

An argument ensued. Voices rose. Ms. Abdelkader's mother took her daughter's side. The friend wavered. The bachelor held his ground. The imam tried to mediate.

Indeed, he was puzzled. Here was a woman who had grown up amid tended lawns and new cars, yet she rejected materialism. And here was a man raised by Muslim hands, yet he was rebelliously moderate.

After the date, the bachelor told the imam, "I want a woman, not a sheik."

Months later, he married another immigrant; she was not especially devoted to Islam but she made him laugh, he said. They met through friends in New York.

Ms. Abdelkader remains single. The imam still believes she was the perfect match.

That evening, the imam stood on the sidewalk outside. Rain fell in stinging drops.

"I never wanted to be a sheik," he said. "I used to think that a religious person is very extreme and never smiles. And I love to smile. I love to laugh. I used to think that religious people were isolated and I love to be among people."

The rain soaked the imam's robe and began to pool in his sandals. A moment later, he ducked inside the building.

"The surprise for me was that the qualities I thought would not make a good sheik — simplicity and humor and being close to people — those are the most important qualities. People love those who smile and laugh. They need someone who lives among them and knows their pain."

"I know them," said Mr. Shata. "Like a brother."

PATRIOT ACT:

A Tame End To Patriot Act Debate (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

For a legislative fight that has stretched on for months, pitting the House against the Senate and the White House against members of the president's party, the battle to renew the USA Patriot Act will likely end very quietly this week.

Between three post office renamings and a measure to clamp down on the counterfeiting of manufactured goods, the House will give its final assent today on the Patriot Act's reauthorization. Republican leaders are so confident in its passage that they have scheduled the vote on the fast-track "suspension calendar," where approval takes the vote of two-thirds of the House. Just after they pass the Patriot Act, House members will vote to support the goals and ideals of National Engineers Week.

Passed after the 2001 terrorist attacks, the law made it easier for federal agents to secretly tap phones, obtain library and bank records, and search homes of terrorism suspects. Complaints by civil libertarians, librarians and others prompted lawmakers last year to insist on adding safeguards to the act before renewing it.

Some of the revisions affect National Security Letters, which are subpoenas for financial and electronic records that do not require a judge's approval. Libraries functioning "in their traditional capacity" will no longer be subject to such letters. Also modified is "Section 215 subpoenas," which are granted by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court. Recipients now will have the explicit right to challenge the subpoenas' nondisclosure or "gag order" requirements.

Some civil liberties groups, however, say the law is written in a way that will make it very difficult for a targeted individual to prevail in such an appeal.Less Call for Sweeping Lobbying Reform?

DOJ_NMG_0016249

As the Patriot Act battle ends with a whimper, the fight over the rules governing lobbying will begin. But just as the Patriot Act fight started with promises of major changes and ended largely with the status quo, the push for sweeping lobbying reform may be losing steam.

The Senate is scheduled to take up ethics and lobbying legislation this week. But first, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) hopes to merge two bills on the subject passed last week by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, and the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs.

Senate aides do not expect much trouble accomplishing the combination. The rules bill deals basically with lawmakers' actions, and the governmental affairs bill involves mostly demands on lobbyists. Together they would represent the Senate's response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandals.

The bills lean heavily toward expanding disclosure requirements on both lawmakers and lobbyists. In addition, one pending proposal would make it harder for lawmakers to pass narrowly targeted spending measures called earmarks. The bill would also double to two years the time that former lawmakers must wait before they can lobby their ex-colleagues on Capitol Hill.

Senators have said they expect debate on a variety of measures on the floor including a plan, once rejected in committee, to establish an independent office of public integrity. Some senators also plan to offer an amendment that would force lawmakers to pay charter fares for their private airplane trips rather than the first-class rates allowed under current law.Food Bill No Longer Small Potatoes

The biggest rhetorical battle in Congress may be a food fight. Tomorrow or Thursday, the House is scheduled to vote on the National Uniformity for Food Act, a measure to establish a federal system of food warnings that would replace the patchwork regulations of the states.

The measure has bipartisan support and was expected to pass with little controversy. But in recent days, the protests of state government officials and environmental groups have changed the equation. State attorneys general say the legislation will federalize a regulatory issue that has been handled at the state level and could replace some tough state standards with weaker federal rules.

The Natural Resources Defense Council hand-delivered bottles of Pepto-Bismol to House members and their staff with a special label warning that "H.R. 4167 side effects may include vomiting, diarrhea, birth defects, cancer and worse." A bipartisan group of attorneys general will protest the measure today at a news conference near the Capitol.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), the bill's author, said yesterday that his measure is the victim of a disinformation campaign.

"The uniformity in food warnings under the bill will enhance food safety and public health," he said. "Contrary to the assertions of the attorneys general, H.R. 4167 is sound public policy that provides protection for all citizens of all states."

Patriot Act Includes Crackdown On Meth Use (AP)

By LAURIE KELLMAN, The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Suffer from springtime allergies? You could be among the first affected by the USA Patriot Act poised for final congressional passage this week.

Besides terrorism, the bill takes aim at the production of methamphetamine, a highly addictive drug that cannot be manufactured without a key ingredient of everyday cold and allergy medicines. The bill would impose new limits next month for how much relief a person can buy over the counter.

And beginning Sept. 30, it'll take a flash of ID to buy that medication.

The legislation sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. and Jim Talent, R-Mo., would blanket the nation with one policy that would put medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter and out of the reach of meth cooks.

"If we leave it up to local jurisdiction, we're simply going to move the problem from one jurisdiction to another without addressing the root cause," said Fresno, Calif., Police Chief Jerry Dyer.

Pass a state or local law cracking down on methamphetamine production, set off a cycle that goes something like this:

DOJ_NMG_0016250

The black market price of cold tablets needed to make the drug skyrockets, driving the meth makers to the jurisdiction next door. There, they buy it in bulk — legally, cheaply, anonymously.

That is, until that state or city gets tough on meth with new laws of its own.

Rather than wait for localities to stitch together a patchwork of anti meth policies, the provision of the Patriot Act would leave meth producers nowhere to run but out of the country. It takes aim at the meth trade's weakest point — the supply of pseudoephedrine.

Beginning 30 days after President Bush signs the law, expected sometime this week, purchase limits go into effect. One person would be limited to buying 300, 30-mg pills in a month or 120 such pills in a day. The measure would make an exception for "single-use" sales — individually packaged pseudoephedrine products.

Many retailers, such as Kmart, Walgreens, Target and Wal-Mart, have already adopted guidelines to limit customer access to cold products or to limit their sales.

Similar state and local restrictions have caused seizures of meth labs to plunge by double-digit percentages in such states as Arkansas, Oregon and Missouri.

At the same time, drug agents began finding more meth from Mexican cartels on the street.

Still, closing down domestic meth labs is of unique urgency to public health and safety, law enforcement officials said.

The drug is made in clandestine labs with battery acid, drain cleaner or other chemicals that help turn the cold and allergy medicine into powder.

One quart of ether, another ingredient, holds the explosive power of several sticks of dynamite, said Sgt. Jason Grellner of the Franklin County, Mo., Narcotics Enforcement Unit, which has seized 600 meth labs since 1998 in a jurisdiction of 100,000 people.

Wading into the toxic soup of a meth lab puts officers in situations for which they are not necessarily trained, Grellner said.

"They have to know the job of a hazardous-waste chemist. They have to have the mindset of a firefighter. They have to be a natural-resources worker," Grellner said. "Wearing that many hats is a safety concern."

And an abandoned lab becomes an environmental hazard, pointed out Dyer.

"They were leaving the chemicals and equipment out in the open and vacating the property," Dyer said. "They found out that we started to trace down suspects with that equipment. Now they are burying these same items underground."

Oklahoma provides evidence that driving out meth labs doesn't mean getting rid of meth. Oklahoma's meth lab seizures have fallen 90 percent since April 2004, when it became the first state to ban over-the-counter sales of everyday cold and allergy medications.

At the same time, seizures of smokeable Mexican meth known as "crystal ice" rose nearly fivefold, from 384 cases in the 15 months before the law to 1,875 since.

"We're going to see trafficking by Mexican cartel organizations, on a much larger scale," Grellner said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says U.S. Ports Takeover Would Tighten Grip On Security (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday said the proposed takeover of terminal operations at five U.S. ports by a Dubai company would give U.S. law enforcement a better handle on security at U.S. terminal operations.

But the unprecedented access that the Department of Homeland Security and other federal agencies would have to monitor the United Arab Emirates shipping company's personnel and business records would "evaporate" if Congress stopped the deal from proceeding, he warned.

Mr. Chertoff has said on many occasions that he didn't consider Dubai Ports World's proposed $6.8 billion buyout of London's Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. a security threat to the U.S. However, his statements to a group of Wall Street Journal reporters marked the first time that he has said that Homeland Security had something to lose if the deal fell through.

DOJ_NMG_0016251

"We are in a position now where we can and, assuming this deal goes through, we intend to have a deep look into their practices, certainly in the U.S. ports," Mr. Chertoff said.

Mr. Chertoff also denied rumors he had any intention of resigning following criticism of how his department handled the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. On the contrary, he said that as the hurricane season approaches, he intends to remake the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said he will recommend not just a new FEMA director, but an entire management team to head the agency, which has been without a director since Michael Brown resigned 10 days after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast.

On the ports issue, Mr. Chertoff said his department was beginning to review and inspect P&O's current operations in the U.S. Members of Congress and governors from both parties were outraged at the prospect of an Arab government operating U.S. port terminals, and are angry that the White House didn't consult them before approving the deal.

Mr. Chertoff said DP World has committed to continue its participation in U.S.-sponsored port-security initiatives at all its overseas operations and to "assist and support federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies" as part of conditions for approving the acquisition.

According to the letter to the Homeland Security Department containing DP World's agreement, the company agreed to provide U.S. law enforcement, if asked, with information about its U.S. operations, facilities and personnel. It also agreed to provide federal agencies with any records in the U.S. involving its foreign operations. Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, federal law-enforcement and intelligence agencies have been trying to get inside information about global shipping operations, long seen as a potential conduit for smuggling terrorists and weapons around the globe.

Mr. Chertoff described the arrangement as a template for other foreign-owned port-terminal operators. "This actually gives us a better opportunity to raise the baseline of security, first with this set of terminal operators, but eventually, hopefully, unless Congress says you can't have foreign companies own or run terminal operations, we'll be able to raise the level for all them too," he said.

DP World has agreed to an additional 45-day review of the deal, but lawmakers are considering legislation that would bar it. If that happened, Mr. Chertoff said, the U.S. would lose the ability it would gain through the deal to more closely scrutinize terminal operations. "Obviously if the deal doesn't go through, these assurances evaporate."

Mr. Chertoff, who took over from the department's first secretary, Tom Ridge, just over a year ago, also said that some lawmakers still aren't completely committed to the Department of Homeland Security, and would like to see it broken up. He said the hope was destructive and hampered his agency's effectiveness.

After the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina, there are calls on Capitol Hill to break FEMA out of Homeland Security, a move Mr. Chertoff said would be a mistake. Mr. Chertoff said he hoped to have an emergency team in place along with supply contracts from companies that can track shipments of relief commodities like water, food and ice, before the hurricane season starts June 1.

April Vote Expected On Port Security (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Senate homeland security panel Chairman Susan Collins said her committee will vote next month on legislation to improve America's port security and thinks the concern over a Dubai company running some U.S. port operations may give the bill new momentum.

"My hope is that the silver lining of the controversy over the Dubai transaction is that it will prompt Congress once and for all to pass comprehensive legislation to deal with the broader underlying issue of port security," said Miss Collins, Maine Republican.

The administration is conducting a new 45-day review of DP World's $6.8 billion bid to purchase terminal operations at several key U.S. ports from a British company.

The deal is moving forward, however. Yesterday, Britain's Court of Appeal dismissed a Miami firm's objection to it. The takeover is now set to become effective tomorrow, the British company said in a statement.

Meanwhile, Miss Collins plans to move a ports security bill she wrote last year with Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat. The two are also working with House Homeland Security Chairman Peter T. King, New York Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat, on a similar House bill.

Miss Collins' measure would authorize $835 million each year for five years to improve current port security programs. It would create an office of cargo security policy, and set new requirements for examination of all inbound cargo.

Miss Collins said the Homeland Security Department is taking far too long to implement some security steps, like minimum standards for mechanical seals on cargo and identity cards for transportation workers.

"We want to make this a priority for the department, set clear deadlines, set clear standards, and I think it will make a real difference," she said.

The bill would create a program to entice private importers to enact top security standards for cargo in exchange for special treatment, like fewer searches. And it also would direct the department to come up with a detailed plan of how trade would resume after an attack at a U.S. port. There is no such plan in place now.

Mrs. Murray said an attack on one port would require all ports to be shut down for perhaps as long as four months, with devastating consequences.

"People in the Midwest who think they have nothing to do with ports would soon not have anything on the shelves of their grocery stores or Wal-Marts," she said.

Miss Collins also plans to introduce a new bill later this week with Sen. Joe Lieberman, the ranking Democrat on the homeland security panel. It would move the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) -- which approved the DP World takeover deal -- under the purview of the Homeland Security Department, as opposed to the Treasury, as is now the case.

Lieberman Calls For More US Port Security Funds (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, March 6, 2006

The Bush administration's plan for securing America's ports is inadequate and funding should be nearly double the White House's budget request for next year, a key Senate Democrat said on Monday.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut, the senior Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, called for spending more than $1 billion on port security in fiscal 2007.

In remarks to reporters, Lieberman noted that the Bush administration budget only calls for $551 million for port security in the fiscal year starting on October 1.

"This budget fails to address the damage that terrorists can do to us with weapons of mass destruction or dirty bombs in containers shipped into this country," Lieberman said.

Democrats' criticism of the administration's spending priorities came amid an uproar over White House approval of a state-owned Arab company's plan to manage six American ports.

The plan for Dubai Ports World to buy British port operator P&O is under a 45-day review and some Republicans in Congress have vowed to block it.

Separately, a White House spokesman expressed confidence that lawmakers would ultimately support the $6.85 billion Dubai Ports World deal.

"We're confident that at the end of this review process that more members will be comfortable with this transaction moving forward," said spokesman Scott McClellan.

However, the Republican chairman of the House Armed Services Committee planned to introduce a bill on Tuesday that would block the Dubai deal, his spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0016253

The legislation being prepared by Rep. Duncan Hunter (news, bio, voting record) of California and Republican Rep. Jim Saxton (news, bio, voting record) of New Jersey would also force foreign owners of U.S. ports, electricity plants and other "critical" infrastructure to sell their holdings and require inspection of all cargo.

Other details of the bill were not yet available, a Hunter spokesman said.

Later this week, the Senate Budget Committee is expected to craft a budget blueprint for next year and Lieberman has urged the panel to beef up domestic security by spending $8 billion more than President George W. Bush has proposed.

Besides port security, the added money would fund Coast Guard operations, emergency health preparedness, first responders and other Department of Homeland Security activities.

The Democrat's demand for more domestic security funds comes as the Republican-controlled Congress tries to find ways to control massive federal budget deficits. Next year's deficit is expected to come in around $355 billion.

Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record) of North Dakota, the senior Democrat on the budget committee, said he would pay for more domestic security spending by improving tax collection. Government experts have testified that about $350 billion in taxes due are not being collected by the Internal Revenue Service each year.

"It has been more than three years since the Coast Guard estimated more than $7 billion would be needed just to provide basic physical security at all U.S. ports" and to implement a 2002 maritime transportation security law, Lieberman said.

He added that Congress so far has appropriated about $750 million. "Much more clearly remains to be done," Lieberman told the Senate Budget Committee.

Hunter Readies Ports Bill (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), who has promised to try to sink the Dubai Ports World deal, started circulating a “Dear Colleague” letter yesterday to attract co-sponsors for legislation he plans to introduce today.

In the letter, co-signed by Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.), Hunter outlined several provisions of the legislation, which would halt the Dubai takeover of management at some U.S. port terminals. It would also require any corporation that owns, manages or operates “national defense critical infrastructure to be majority-owned by American citizens.”

The secretaries of defense and homeland security would have to prepare and maintain and a national defense critical infrastructure list, the letter says.

Hunter and Saxton also call for reforming the interagency Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States by mandating a 45-day investigation into transactions that may have national-security implications. The legislation would, additionally, require the president to provide regulations that mandate written notification to the administration of mergers, acquisitions and takeovers that may be subject to investigation by the committee.

British Court Allows Dubai Deal To Proceed (AP-Y2)

By Jane Wardell

AP2, March 6, 2006

The controversial takeover of British shipping company P&O by Dubai's state-owned DP World received the green light Monday when Britain's Court of Appeal dismissed a Miami firm's objection to the deal.

The Court of Appeal declined to hear an appeal from Miami-based Eller & Co., which had tried to have the deal barred on technical grounds, arguing that U.S. concerns about a United Arab Emirates company owning significant operations at six major U.S. seaports could harm its business.

The lower High Court had already approved the 3.9 billion pound ($6.8 billion) acquisition of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. and Monday's unanimous decision by the three judges of the Court of Appeal means that the deal is now free to proceed through the final regulatory stages.

In a statement following the decision, P&O said the takeover will now become effective on March 8 and that the shipping company's shares will be delisted from the London, Sydney and Tokyo stock exchanges on March 9.

DOJ_NMG_0016254

The deal was originally due to be closed last Thursday, but Eller's last-minute petition resulted in an extended three-day hearing in the High Court — which must give approval for the takeover to go ahead.

Justice Nicholas Warren gave that approval on Thursday, but placed a hold on his ruling to allow Eller to take the case to the higher court.

Justices Anthony Lloyd, David Neuberger and Martin Moore-Bick lifted the hold order Monday as they ruled that Eller had no case on four technical grounds, including an argument that hundreds of shareholders in Australia were not given adequate notice of a vote on the deal because of a mailing problem.

Eller said after the ruling that it was disappointed by the decision, but it did not intend to appeal the judgment. However, it said it would continue to pursue legal action in the U.S. courts in Florida.

"We are not alone in opposing this deal — many elected politicians in the U.S. and indeed the American public, share many of our concerns about the takeover," the company said in a statement.

"We will continue to fight to protect our business and the livelihood of thousands of our staff and subcontractors," it added.

P&O runs shipping terminals in New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia — a fact that has caused unease among some lawmakers and businesses in the United States who have cited security concerns about an Arab company taking over the ports.

DP World has attempted to defuse some of the tension by saying the U.S. ports will remain separate to the overall deal and submitting itself to a second 45-day investigation by the U.S. government, despite already receiving regulatory approval.

Chief Executive Mohammed Sharaf said Sunday he expected the deal to be completed.

"All the authorities are comfortable with the security measures that we take," he said. "As far as we are concerned, the deal is going to go through, and the British government has approved it."

"There are big consequences for the British market if it doesn't go through because investors are waiting for the money," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Lawyers for DP World warned last week that a delay beyond Friday meant that the company will not be able to access the money it needs to pay shareholders on time. Lawyers for P&O said they will pursue Eller for the costs of the British legislation.

President Bush has supported the takeover deal and lawmakers that were initially opposed seem to have softened slightly, tempering calls for an immediate vote to block the takeover. Many said the new probe reassured them and negated the need for legislation for now.

A U.S. federal judge has also ruled against a request by New Jersey to order an investigation into the takeover.

The High Court's Warren said in his ruling last week that U.S. concerns about port security and threats of port authorities withdrawing business were partly fueled by Eller and he did not find them credible.

U.S. Firm Loses Appeal Of P& O Sale (WP)

By Jane Wardell

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

LONDON, March 6 -- A British appeals court on Monday declined to hear a Miami firm's objection to the takeover of British shipping company P&O Group by Dubai's state-owned Dubai Ports World, giving the go-ahead to a deal that has caused an uproar in the United States over port security.

Miami-based Eller & Co. had argued that U.S. concerns about a United Arab Emirates company managing significant operations at six major U.S. seaports could harm its business. Eller had tried to have the deal barred on technical grounds.

Eller said that it will continue to pursue legal action in the U.S. courts in Florida. "We will continue to fight to protect our business and the livelihood of thousands of our staff and subcontractors," it said.

The $6.8 billion acquisition of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. was given the required approval by the High Court last week. But High Court Justice Nicholas Warren placed a hold on his ruling to allow Eller to take the case to the higher court.

The rejection of the appeal means that P&O can now list the deal at the British registry Companies House, the final regulatory stage of the transaction.

DOJ_NMG_0016255

Mideast Investment Up In U.S. (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Middle Eastern investment in the United States is once again picking up steam, showing big gains since the tense period following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. And while some takeovers are triggering alarm -- most famously, the purchase by a Dubai-owned company of a seaports management firm -- others are evoking warm welcomes.

Spearheading the trend is Dubai's Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktum (popularly known as "Sheik Mo"), ruler of the freewheeling city-state, which is part of the United Arab Emirates. The ports deal is just one of a series of recent purchases by companies he controls.

Other acquisitions include a $1 billion portfolio of 21,000 apartments in U.S. Sun Belt cities; a 2.2 percent stake in the automotive giant DaimlerChrysler AG that cost another $1 billion; and a Manhattan landmark building, 230 Park Ave. The emirate also made major purchases in other countries over the past year, notably a $1.5 billion takeover of Britain's Tussauds Group, which owns the famous waxworks, along with theme parks, roller coasters and other entertainment-oriented businesses.

On Thursday came news that yet another Dubai acquisition is drawing Bush administration scrutiny because of the national security risks -- this time of plants in Georgia and Connecticut that make precision components used in engines for military aircraft and tanks.

But an entirely different reaction greeted the disclosure several months ago that Dubai Investment Group had acquired the Essex House hotel in Manhattan and promised to sink $50 million into renovating it.

That announcement prompted New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg to exult: "Another iconic hotel overlooking Central Park will be preserved and its unionized workforce protected. This is excellent news for New York's tourism and hospitality industries."

Behind such transactions are two powerful forces. One, of course, is the high price of energy, which has left several oil-producing Arab countries swimming in cash. The other is the burgeoning U.S. trade deficit -- $726 billion last year -- which means that the United States needs foreign capital; a country that imports more than it exports must cover the gap with money from abroad.

Until now, investments in the United States from Europe and other parts of Asia have dwarfed those from the Middle East. But an increasing share of the foreign money required to fuel the U.S. economy is likely to come from places that, like Dubai, trigger visceral reactions among Americans seared by memories of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"The price of oil is going only one way -- up -- for the next five years, because it is going to take at least that long for alternatives to kick in," said Youssef M. Ibrahim, managing director of the Strategic Energy Investment Group, a consulting firm based in Dubai. "So there is no question in my mind that billions of dollars will continue flowing this way, and people cannot handle all of that kind of money here. You've got to circulate the money, and the United States is still the biggest market."

Already, the list of U.S. businesses owned by Arab investors -- not just from Dubai -- includes some well-known names. Among them are Caribou Coffee Co., the fast-growing rival to Starbucks Corp.; Church's Chicken, a fast-food concern; Loehmann's, a specialty retailer; TLC Health Care Services Inc., a provider of home nursing and hospice care; and even several financial publications, including the American Banker.

Such "direct" investment in hard assets -- companies, factories and real estate -- is generally preferable for the U.S. economy, in the view of most economists, to foreign investment in bonds, stocks and other financial assets. One advantage of direct investments is that they cannot be dumped in a panic the way that, say, a Treasury bond can. Moreover, they often involve high-wage jobs. Average annual compensation per worker at U.S. subsidiaries of foreign companies is about $60,500, 34 percent higher than the rate at all U.S. companies, according to the Organization for International Investment.

The main drawback of a direct investment is that it involves foreign control, which can raise national security concerns. That is why an interagency government panel, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, reviews many foreign takeovers. That process may be revamped by Congress due to indignation over the panel's decision to approve the purchase by Dubai Ports World of Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., a British firm that manages container terminals on the East Coast.

DOJ_NMG_0016256

Arab direct investments would probably be more extensive were it not for the political and legal atmosphere in the post-Sept. 11 era. "Middle Eastern investors are still a little skittish about investing in the United States," said James A. Fetgatter, chief executive of the Association of Foreign Investors in Real Estate.

To some extent, Arab investors think U.S. property is overpriced, so they are putting more of their overseas bets in Asia, said Gary Sheehan, an executive with Sentinel Real Estate Corp. in New York. But an additional factor is their fear about what might befall their holdings at the hands of U.S. authorities.

"I was in Bahrain the week before last and had a meeting at a bank where they said they would love to invest in the States," Sheehan said. "But they said: 'Syrian interests own 12 percent of our bank. So we know that if push comes to shove' " -- that is, a serious confrontation between Washington and Damascus -- " 'our assets will be frozen.' "

Such negativity toward investing in the United States could well deepen as a result of the controversy over the Dubai ports deal, some in the region warn. Sheikha Lubna al-Qassimi, the UAE economy minister, told the Financial Times last week that the United States will become less attractive if investment decisions are subject to political interference. "There are other countries that are competing for [our] money," she said.

But worries about a drying-up of Arab investment are overblown, according to others, including C. MacLaine Kenan, an executive in the Atlanta office of Arcapita Inc., one of the biggest firms serving as a conduit for foreign Arab investors in U.S. businesses.

Arcapita has raised billions of dollars from investors in the UAE, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and neighboring countries and has invested the majority of it in the United States, where it owns Caribou Coffee, Church's Chicken and other companies, as well as real estate. The investments have to conform with sharia, or Islamic law, which means that they cannot involve businesses that traffic in alcohol, pork, pornography or gambling and that they have to use special types of financing to avoid violating Muslim rules against charging interest.

"Our investors will spend some time complaining about U.S. politics, but at the end of the day, they're pretty shrewd in divorcing the economic opportunity from the political issue," Kenan said. "And they generally know the political problems will in most cases blow over. So every now and again, we get people saying: 'I wish this [U.S.] administration would do better. But by the way, how's this investment going?' "

The typical Middle Eastern investor is "a pretty happy camper," Kenan added, because markets in the region have soared along with oil prices. "So they have more appetite for investment abroad, and they know the United States is a place a smart investor needs to have some money."

Whatever Arab investors abroad finally do, their clout is relatively small -- at least for now. At the end of 2004, investors from Arab countries held just $4 billion in direct investment in the United States, according to Commerce Department data.

British investors, by contrast, held $252 billion, Japanese investors held $177 billion, Dutch investors held $167 billion and German investors held $163 billion. Their holdings span industries often deemed "critical," such as telecommunications (Finland's Nokia Corp. and Sweden's Ericsson Inc.), energy (British Petroleum PLC and Royal Dutch Shell PLC) and utilities (E.On AG of Germany, which controls much of the gas and electricity distribution in Kentucky).

Although foreign investors are far from controlling the U.S. economy -- their payrolls constitute an estimated 3.5 percent of the nation's workforce -- the United States is growing increasingly dependent on them as the trade gap widens. To obtain the money necessary to pay for imports, the United States this year will probably need to attract foreign capital at the rate of about $20 billion a week, which is equal to selling three companies the size of the maritime firm purchased by Dubai Ports World, noted Brad Setser, an economist with Roubini Global Economics LLC in New York.

To be sure, most of the money flowing into the United States comes in the form of Treasury bonds and other financial assets rather than corporate acquisitions. Foreigners held roughly $9 trillion of U.S. financial assets at the end of 2004, according to government data. Middle Eastern oil exporters held a modest percentage of that, including about $121 billion in U.S. government securities, the data show.

But the oil revenue flooding into the Mideast means that the region's financial strength is rising apace. The cumulative trade surplus of Middle Eastern oil exporters, which was $500 billion from 2000 to 2005, will come close to $800 billion by year-end, Setser wrote recently.

DOJ_NMG_0016257

"Which is just to say," he said, "that there are a lot more Dubai Ports Worlds out there."

Report Questions Homeland Security Plans (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Associated Press, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Homeland Security Department still spends money on U.S. port projects that aren't considered national security priorities even though it has made some corrections, a new report says.

In a report to be made public Tuesday, Homeland Security Inspector General Richard L. Skinner praises the agency for overhauling the Port Security Grant Program in 2005 to award money based on risk and to make only the 66 most vulnerable ports eligible.

However, Skinner said, the agency still has not entirely fixed the problems that led the inspector general's office in January 2005 to issue a dozen recommendations for improving design, management and oversight of the program.

This time, Skinner said, "We identified 20 projects that reviewers determined did not meet national security priorities but were funded nonetheless."

His office studied the fifth and most recent round of port security grants, which awarded $142 million for 132 projects. Of those, the 20 projects Skinner's report said scored low on the agency's threat scale received about 20 percent of the money awarded, or $29.3 million.

The report did not say where those projects were located. In one example, a grant applicant proposed installing card readers on critical buildings and upgrading current software for controlling access to the facility. The project received no score as a national security priority threat but received funding anyway.

Marc Short, a Homeland Security spokesman, defended the grant program. "Despite the scoring, the results are absolutely in accord with our risk assessment," he said.

The new report comes amid increased attention in Congress on port security as Dubai-owned DP World seeks to takeover significant operations at six U.S. ports. Republicans and Democrats alike oppose the deal and have introduced legislation to block it.

Although dated February 2006, Skinner's report is being made public Tuesday. The Associated Press obtained an advanced copy.

In October, Congress, at the behest of Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., ordered a review of the steps the agency has taken to comply with recommendations in the January 2005 report.

"It's been more than four years since 9/11, and the government still can't get port security right," Kerry said in a statement.

Since its inception, the grant program has awarded more than $700 million to make U.S. ports less vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

Because of that investment, Skinner's report said, the agency has "raised the overall bar of preparedness but it is not clear that DHS knows now much actual risk reduction has been achieved."

—

On the Net:

Homeland Security Department: http://www.dhs.gov/

Washington Wire (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke, June Kronholz, Gary Fields, And Greg Jaffe

Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

March 6, 2006, 4:13 pm Smooth Sailing Predicted for AT&T Deal

Philip Verveer, who filed the lawsuit that led to the 1984 breakup of the Bell System monopoly, said he doesn't expect the Justice Department to block AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp.

"This is a reassembly of many of the pieces we worked to take apart," said Verveer, who led the first Justice Department team that prosecuted the AT&T case. "But the circumstances are completely different today."

DOJ_NMG_0016258

The wave of technological innovation that followed the breakup has fundamentally changed the game, said Verveer, now a partner at Willkie Farr & Gallagher in Washington, where he represents communications companies including cable and satellite firms. Antitrust enforcers have already allowed the former Bells to buy their local-phone rivals and last year were permitted to take over long-distance providers AT&T and MCI, he noted. As a result, "there is simply not enough to block or significantly reconfigure this deal."

Verveer, who left Justice before the case was settled to become a top FCC regulator, said the broader concern is whether the Bells and others will continue to compete and innovate in providing broadband Internet-access service.

Verveer, now 62 years old, said he expects the FCC to require that AT&T accept the "net neutrality" nondiscrimination principles that it adopted last fall. "The critical issue for society and the economy is whether there will be a workably competitive environment for broadband," he said. "It's an essential service, and if it's not competitive, then inevitably there will be calls for new regulation."

Read more about the deal. Compare telecom titans AT&T, Verizon, read the transcript of AT&T's conference call and see a graphic on the new telecom sector. Plus, should regulators approve the deal?

March 6, 2006, 4:12 pm Chertoff Focuses on Chinese Illegals

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff plans a trip to China later this month to convince Beijing to take back illegal immigrants picked up by U.S. immigration authorities.

Chertoff has been pushing a catch-and-return policy on illegal immigrants from China and elsewhere since taking office last year. In an interview with Wall Street Journal reporters and editors, he said many Latin American countries are starting to streamline their repatriation programs, particularly Honduras and Guatemala. But China remains a problem that could grow over time, he said.

Chertoff estimated that U.S. authorities hold 19,000 Chinese illegal immigrants who the Chinese government hasn't repatriated for reasons it hasn't explained. He also said the problem is brewing with India, too. If left unchecked, it could become a major problem as more Chinese and Indian illegals make their way to the U.S. and the U.S. authorities run out of detention space. "How much is bureaucracy and how much is other motives" he said he can't tell. But governments move fast when they want to, he added.

March 6, 2006, 2:46 pm Police to Walk the Washington Beat

Top police executives from around the country are arriving in Washington Monday and Tuesday to ask Congress to restore cuts in law enforcement spending contained in the Bush budget plan.

The International Association of Chiefs of Police, which represents 18,000 law enforcement police chiefs and executives, is leading the effort. An IACP analysis of the budget for fiscal 2007 shows that assistance to local law enforcement agencies would be reduced to $1.535 billion from $2.609 billion in fiscal 2006. Community Oriented Policing for instance, was cut to $ 102 million from $478 million and local block grant programs for law enforcement has been zeroed out altogether from $416 million in the current year.

March 6, 2006, 11:40 am An Army of Enough

The Army hit its recruiting goals for February — the ninth month in a row that it has made its recruiting numbers, senior Army officials said. The service plans to announce that it reached its goal later this week. The active-duty Army, Army National Guard and reserves all missed their recruiting goals last year.

This year, the Army's numbers have been buoyed by the presence of more recruiters and bigger enlistment bonuses. It's still not clear that the Army will make its recruiting numbers for the year. Typically the summer months, following high school graduations, are the most crucial. But service officials are optimistic they can make both the active duty and National Guard numbers for the year — a big change from this time last year when the Army was struggling to meet its goals for the winter months.

The Supreme Court's 8-0 ruling Monday on university recruiting isn't expected to have much effect on the military's numbers. The court decided that in order to retain federal funding, universities must allow military recruiters on campus even though their ban on homosexuals violates the schools' equal-employment policies. The opinion by Chief Justice Roberts found no First Amendment violation by the Solomon Amendment, the law requiring that the military have access equal to other employers recruiting on campus, in part because the schools remain free to express their opposition to the military's antigay policies.

DOJ_NMG_0016259

Guards Fault Homeland Security Protection (WP)

By Larry Margasak

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Guards at the Department of Homeland Security say the agency mishandled a potential anthrax attack on its headquarters, one of several incidents that led two senators to request an investigation of the agency's own security.

The private guards complained that inadequate training led to confusion in handling bomb and biological threats and failure to stop test vehicles that were sent to checkpoints with improper identification.

"I wouldn't feel safe nowhere on this compound as an officer," former guard Derrick Daniels told The Associated Press. Daniels was employed until last fall by Wackenhut Services Inc., the private firm that protects a Homeland Security complex that includes sensitive, classified information.

An envelope with suspicious powder was opened last fall at the headquarters. Daniels and other current and former guards said they were shocked when superiors carried it past the office of Secretary Michael Chertoff, took it outside and then shook it outside Chertoff's window without evacuating people nearby.

The scare, caused by white powder that proved to be harmless, "stands as one glaring example" of the agency's security problems, Daniels said. "I had never previously been given training ... describing how to respond to a possible chemical attack."

"If the allegations brought forward by the whistleblowers are correct, they represent both a security threat and a waste of taxpayer dollars," Democratic Sens. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota and Ron Wyden of Oregon wrote to the agency's inspector general, seeking an investigation.

"It would be ironic, to say the least, if DHS were unable to secure its own headquarters," they wrote.

The IG's office had no immediate response to the request.

Homeland Security spokesman Brian Doyle said Wackenhut guards are still operating under a contract signed with the Navy, and the agency has little control over their training. A soon-to-be-implemented replacement contract will impose new requirements on security guards, he said.

Daniels, saying he was among the first guards to respond to the white powder incident, said the area where the powder was found wasn't evacuated for more than an hour. Available biohazard face shields went unused. When a belated order was given to evacuate the area, employees had already gone to lunch and had to be rounded up and quarantined.

Doyle, the Homeland spokesman, said the concerns were overblown because all mail going to the Homeland Security complex is irradiated to kill anthrax. "The incident was resolved before anything was moved," he said.

Daniels now works security for another company at another federal building. He is among 14 current and former Wackenhut employees _ mostly guards _ who were interviewed by The Associated Press or submitted written statements to Congress that were obtained by AP.

Wackenhut President Dave Foley disputed the allegations, saying officers have a minimum of one year's security experience, proper security clearances and training in vehicle screening, identification of personnel, handling of suspicious items and emergency response.

"In short, we believe our security personnel have been properly trained, have responded correctly to the various incidents that have occurred ... and that this facility is secure," Foley said. He declined, however, to discuss any of the current or former employees who have become whistleblowers.

A litany of problems were listed by the guards, whose pay ranges from $15.60 to $23 an hour based on their position and level of security clearance. Among their examples of lax security:

_They have no training in responding to attacks with weapons of mass destruction.

_Chemical-sniffing dogs have been replaced with ineffective equipment that falsely indicates the presence of explosives.

_Vehicle entrances to Homeland Security's complex are lightly guarded.

DOJ_NMG_0016260

_Guards with radios have trouble hearing each other, or have no radios, no batons and no pepper spray, leaving them with few options beyond lethal force with their handguns.

Wackenhut is no stranger to criticism.

Over the last two years, the Energy Department inspector general concluded that Wackenhut guards had thwarted simulated terrorist attacks at a nuclear lab only after they were tipped off to the test; and that guards had improperly handled the transport of nuclear and conventional weapons.

Homeland Security is based at a gated, former Navy campus near American University _ several miles from the heavily trafficked streets that house the FBI, Capitol, Treasury Department and White House.

Former guard Bryan Adams recognized his inadequate training one day last August, when an employee reported a suspicious bag in the parking lot.

"I didn't have a clue about what to do," he said.

Adams said he closed the vehicle checkpoint with a cone, walked over to the bag and called superiors. Nobody cordoned off the area. Eventually, someone called a federal bomb squad, which arrived more than an hour after the discovery.

"If the bag had, in fact, contained the explosive device that was anticipated, the bomb could have detonated several times over in the hour that the bag sat there," Adams said.

The bag, it turned out, contained gym clothes.

Doyle, the Homeland spokesman, responded to several allegations raised by the guards. He said dogs were replaced because "if you overuse them, their effectiveness drops." The detection equipment that substitutes for the dogs is a better method for detecting explosives, he said.

Guards who used the equipment said it was no match for the reliability of the dogs.

The AP videotaped two vehicle entrances at Homeland headquarters with light security.

One is guarded only during morning and evening rush hours. Movable metal barriers and an unmanned security vehicle only partially blocked the driveway, leaving enough room for a small car or motorcycle to drive through.

Another entrance was guarded with a manned vehicle with two guards but no other barriers.

Doyle said the vehicle entrances were adequate because, in all cases, a 10-foot fence topped with barbed wire separates vehicles from all buildings.

Some guards who continue to work at Homeland, who would speak only on condition of anonymity because of fear of losing their jobs, said they knew of two instances in which individuals without identification got into the sensitive complex.

Another described how guards flunked a test by the Secret Service, which sent vehicles into the compound with dummy government identification tags hanging from inside mirrors. Guards cleared such vehicles through on two occasions, this guard said, and one officer even copied down the false information without realizing it was supposed to match information on the employee's government badge.

Doyle, the agency spokesman, said such tests are conducted routinely. "I can assure you that if people fail the test they are let go," he said.

Marixa Farrar, a former guard, said two guards always should have been stationed inside the main building where Chertoff had his office, but she often was on duty alone.

One day last fall a fire alarm rang. As employees walked by Farrar, they asked if this was a fire or a test.

"There were no radios, so I couldn't figure out if it was a serious alarm," she said.

There was no fire.

Driver At UNC Cites Vengeance For Muslims (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

CHAPEL HILL, N.C., March 6 -- A University of North Carolina graduate from Iran, accused of running down nine people on campus to avenge the treatment of Muslims, said at a hearing Monday that he was "thankful for the opportunity to spread the will of Allah."

DOJ_NMG_0016261

Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar was accused of driving a sport-utility vehicle through the Pit, a popular campus gathering spot, injuring nine people Friday. None of the victims was seriously hurt.

University Police Chief Derek Poarch said Taheri-azar told investigators he intentionally hit people to "avenge the deaths of Muslims around the world." In a 911 call after the incident, Taheri-azar said he wanted to "punish the government of the United States for their actions around the world."

Taheri-azar, 22, appeared in Orange County District Court on nine counts of attempted murder and nine counts of assault.

His bail was set at $5.5 million and he was assigned a public defender, but he said after the hearing: "The truth is my lawyer."

Taheri-azar graduated from North Carolina in December after studying psychology and philosophy. Investigators believe he has spent most of his life in the United States.

On campus, UNC students held what they called an "anti-terrorism" rally. "We don't want terrorism here, and we're not going to stand for that where we live and where we go to school," said Kris Wampler, a student at UNC and member of the College Republicans, which helped organize the rally.

About 50 students attended the rally, including several Muslim students who debated with organizers and said Taheri-azar had not been linked to any terrorist group.

"When you think in terms of a global context, this was an isolated incident," said student Khurram Bilal Tariq, 22.

Stephen Mann, an 18-year-old freshman, said he was not singling out Islam with his call to label Friday's incident terrorism. He said a member of any religion who did what Taheri-azar is accused of doing should be called a terrorist.

"If you try to hurt someone in the name of a cause, that's terrorism," he said.

UNC Grad Driven To Kill (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

An Iranian native and recent University of North Carolina graduate admitted that his motive for driving a rental car across the UNC campus was to kill people.

Friday afternoon, Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar, 22, admittedly drove his rented Jeep Cherokee through a heavily trafficked section of the UNC campus known as "the Pit," injuring nine.

When asked by reporters if he was trying to kill his victims, Mr. Taheri-azar said, "Yes."

No one was seriously hurt in the vehicular ambush, and some are loathe to call it an act of terror. However, Mr. Taheri-azar apparently disagrees. After turning himself in Friday, he told authorities his attack was designed to "avenge the deaths of Muslims around the world," according to a statement from police Chief Derek Poarch.

The UNC's Department of Public Safety charged Mr. Taheri-azar with nine counts of attempted murder and "nine counts of assault with a deadly weapon inflicting serious injury with intent to kill."

Mr. Taheri-azar could, if convicted, face more than 100 years in prison. He is being held on $5.5 million bail.

When asked by The Washington Times as to why Mr. Taheri-azar was not charged with terrorism, Chief Poarch's office said the investigation is ongoing and additional charges may yet be filed.

When asked by Orange County District Court Judge Patricia Devine if he had any questions, Mr. Taheri-azar said, "I actually don't have any questions. I am thankful you are going to hear this trial to learn more about the will of Allah, the creator."

After leaving court, Mr. Taheri-azar said his attack was, "the will of Allah, the creator."

He said he intends to defend himself at his scheduled March 16 hearing.

But was it a terrorist attack?

"I think we are edging closer to that," said UNC professor Cori Dauber, "It's clear that he was trying to kill people." She hopes the FBI and the terrorism task force will release details about what was found inside Mr. Taheri-azar's apartment during their investigation and whether he received training from terrorist Web sites.

DOJ_NMG_0016262

The question of terrorism is already sparking a debate on campus. UNC senior Kris Wampler organized an anti-terrorism protest on campus yesterday that attracted dozens of students. "The university is very pro-Islamic, and it's been that way the whole time I've been here," Mr. Wampler said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Wampler thinks Mr. Taheri-azar's comments add fuel to the terrorist angle. "I think it really does justify what we're saying," Mr. Wampler said. "I hope he keeps talking. He's just building the case."

UNC's Muslim student association said Mr. Taheri-azar was not a member of the group and denounced his actions on its Web site Friday.

"Regardless of what his intentions prove to be, we wholeheartedly deplore this action," the group said on its site.

A statement from University Chancellor James Moeser described the attack as a "contemptible act of violence," but stopped short of calling it terrorism.

White House Defends Levee Reconstruction (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, March 6, 2006

The White House on Monday defended the quality of materials being used to rebuild the levees around New Orleans, as President Bush got assurances from the Army Corps of Engineers that it was on track to restore the system by the start of hurricane season.

Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, head of the Army Corps, told Bush in a private briefing that 100 miles of the 169 miles of levees damaged by the Aug. 29 hurricane have been restored. He repeated the briefing later for reporters at the White House.

Strock took issue with findings from two teams of independent experts who said the Corps was taking shortcuts and using substandard materials, leaving large sections of the system substantially weaker than before the hurricane.

"We are using the right kind of materials," Strock said. "There is no question about that."

The findings, first reported Monday in The Washington Post, were made by engineers on a National Science Foundation-funded panel and by a Louisiana team appointed to monitor the rebuilding.

Strock said the Corps had yet to see the findings or information on where the teams took their samples. He suggested the monitors may have been testing the wrong soil. He said the Corps is trucking in clay from Mississippi to rebuild the system because the local soil does not meet quality standards.

Strock acknowledged that the levees will not be able to protect low-lying areas in the event of another Katrina-like storm this year.

"If we were going to have another Katrina-like event, I think I can say with a high level of confidence you wouldn't see the catastrophic flooding that we saw in the first event," Strock said. "You would see overtopping, though, of levees. You would see flooding in low-lying areas."

Strock said the president, who is visiting the Gulf Coast Wednesday, told him he appreciated the Corps' work and that it was meeting the commitments that he made to restore the levees in time for the next hurricane season.

"He expressed confidence that we're doing that," Strock said. "So I think that he's comfortable with where we are."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan also rejected allegations of inferior rebuilding.

"The Corps of Engineers is using modern design and construction methods, which have greatly improved the last 40 years, which is the time when those levees were originally built," McClellan said.

The White House also defended Bush on Monday against fresh criticism that he was disengaged and uninformed in the run-up to Katrina's landfall.

Last week's reports about Federal Emergency Management Agency briefings, particularly before Katrina hit, prompted fresh criticism by lawmakers who said the government should have been better prepared for the storm that flooded New Orleans and killed more than 1,300 people. A video of an Aug. 28 briefing showed officials warning Bush and others that the storm might overtop levees, put lives at risk in the Superdome and overwhelm rescuers.

McClellan said the criticism of Bush for not asking questions during the video ignores the fact that before the videoconference he had been on the phone with governors in the region and received updates from then-FEMA chief Michael

DOJ_NMG_0016263

Brown and his own staff. Bush got on the videoconference to boost morale, not collect information, McClellan said, and he left before it ended for a previously scheduled press event at which he made a statement on the hurricane.

"Some have twisted the facts to fit a story line," McClellan said. "He was not there to participate in the full briefing. He was there for that purpose: to lift their spirits."

McClellan also said that referring to Bush's statement four days after the storm that "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees," ignores the explanations given by the White House and Bush himself about what he meant.

"What the president was referring to was the sense that, after the storm had initially passed, that there was a sense that that worst-case scenario had not happened," McClellan said. "Some have taken it out of context to suggest he was referring to any predictions before the hurricane hit."

Clarification (WP)

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

In the March 4 editorial "Caught on Tape," on the leaked video of a White House briefing before Hurricane Katrina made landfall, we wrote that there was no evidence President Bush, after being briefed on the predicted damage, had asked follow-up questions. In fact, the full transcript shows that after Mr. Bush left the conference, some of his advisers, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, did ask about the involvement of the military and other preparedness issues.

FCC, Others Face Katrina Phone Problems (AP-Y2)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP2, March 6, 2006

Downed telephone lines and damaged cellular towers left emergency crews confused and isolated in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, experts told federal regulators Monday.

Julliette Saussy, director of Emergency Medical Service of New Orleans, said communications eroded as the waters rose and only got worse.

"Surrounded by water and stranded ourselves, our worst fears were realized," Saussy told members of an independent panel gathering information to be presented to the FCC in June.

"We had no way to communicate except by line of sight. Our radios were not operable, most land lines and cell phones were useless and our communications centers were under water. When help arrived we could not communicate with them either," she said.

Some 3 million telephone lines were knocked out as the violent storm hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said.

At least 38 911 call centers went down, and more than 1,000 cellular towers were out of service. As many as 20,000 calls failed to go through the day after the storm, and about 100 TV and radio stations were knocked off the air, he said.

Martin said he hopes the panel's work will help strengthen communications throughout the nation, especially in areas vulnerable to natural disasters.

Harlin McEwen, chairman of the Communications and Technology Committee of the International Association of Police Chiefs, described Katrina's destruction as overwhelming.

"Usually, what happens is you have other resources surrounding where the incident occurred to come to the aid of those that are in need," McEwen said. "When you have an issue like Katrina, that affects three states and where much of the public safety infrastructure was wiped out ... that's a different issue."

In Jackson County, Miss., many first responders lacked the training in using backup systems such as satellite phones, said 911 director George Sholl.

Keith Parker, director of the National Association of Emergency Medical Service Officials, said the Mississippi Department of Health couldn't even reach local EMS agencies during the storm.

"The lack of communication created times of confusion and chaos," he said. "There will always be catastrophic events, the question is will we be better prepared for the next one."

DOJ_NMG_0016264

Members Struck By Gulf Devastation (RC)

By Suzanne Nelson

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — By almost any measure, what awaited the 34 House Members on last week's Congressional delegation as their bus approached the Royal Senesta Hotel on Bourbon Street was poor preparation for the rest of their trip.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Envoy Offers Bleak View Of Situation In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The top U.S. envoy to Iraq said Monday that the 2003 toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime had opened a "Pandora's box" of volatile ethnic and sectarian tensions that could engulf the region in all-out war and disrupt the global economy if America were to extricate itself from the country too soon.

In remarks that were among the frankest and bleakest public assessments of the Iraqi situation by a high-level American official, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the "potential is there" for sectarian violence to become all-out civil war, but that Iraq for now had pulled back from that prospect after the wave of sectarian reprisals for the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

"If another incident (occurs), Iraq is really vulnerable to it at this time, in my judgment," Khalilzad said, in an interview with correspondents of the Los Angeles Times Baghdad bureau and a visiting editor.

Abandoning Iraq in the way the U.S. disengaged from civil wars in Lebanon, Afghanistan and Somalia could have dramatic global repercussions, he said.

"We have opened the Pandora's Box and the question is, what is the way forward?" Khalilzad said. The way forward, in my view, is an effort to build bridges across these communities."

Khalilzad's central message of maintaining a U.S. presence in Iraq jibed with Bush administration policy. But he offered a far gloomier justification for it than assessments made in recent days by U.S. military spokesmen.

On Sunday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a televised interview that things in Iraq are "going very, very well, from everything you look at."

Khalilzad's comments came just before key U.S. decisions are expected on whether the situation in Iraq has improved enough to allow for a reduction of U.S. forces this year.

Army Gens. John P. Abizaid and George W. Casey, the top U.S. commanders in Iraq, plan to meet with President Bush as early as this week to make troop levels recommendations

Military officials must decide this month whether to cancel scheduled deployments of several Army combat brigades -- a decision that would lead to a reduction in the total number of U.S. troops in Iraq by mid-year from about 130,000 to about 100,000. For nearly a year, Gen. Casey has said that a "substantial reduction" of U.S. troops could occur in 2006, and pointed to spring as the time when the critical decisions would be made.

A reduction would signal the Bush administration's confidence in progress in the country. On Friday, however, Casey said that war planners factoring the recent violence is "certainly something that we will consider in our decisions."

Without touching on the issue of troop-reduction, Khalilzad described a highly flammable atmosphere in Iraq that dates at least to the highly polarizing Dec. 15 elections that handed Shiites a dominant share of authority.

"Right now there's a vacuum of authority, and there's a lot of distrust," said the diplomat, who is among the architects of the U.S. plan to reshape the political balance of the Middle East following the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

The Samarra bombing and the subsequent outbreak of violent reprisals by Shiites against Sunnis demonstrated that insurgents fully understand Iraq's fragility and will seek to exploit it, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0016265

"Khalilzad, who actively and publicly is involved in government talks, repeated his weeks-long assertion that the best way to prevent civil war or large-scale sectarian violence is to form a government of national unity drawing from all of Iraq's disparate groups as a way "to build trust and narrow the fault line that exists" between Shiite and Sunni.

In any case, Khalilzad said the U.S. has little choice but to maintain a strong presence in Iraq, or risk a regional conflict with Arabs siding with Sunnis and Iranians backing Shiite co-religionists in what could be a more-encompassing version of the 1980s Iran-Iraq war, which left as many as 1 million people dead. He described a worst-case scenario in which religious extremists could take over sections of Iraq and begin to expand outward.

"That would make Taliban Afghanistan look like child's play," said Khalilzad, an American of Afghan descent who served as U.S. envoy to Kabul, the Afghan capital, before taking on the post in Baghdad.

"What we've described reflects the aspirations of the people," he said. "If we were at variance with the aspirations of the people we'd be in trouble."

Khalilzad said U.S. officials have tried to enlist the support of governments of neighboring countries, even exploring "modalities of setting up a meeting" with Iran, which he said had been unhelpful in securing Iraq.

On Monday, Iraqi politicians continued to wrangle over the composition of a new government. President Jalal Talabani announced a decision to convene parliament on Sunday, only to be quickly countered by Shiite political leaders who asked him to postpone the session.

Shiites have nominated interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to serve a full term. Kurds have pushed to derail his candidacy.

Khalilzad described such day-to-day political jousting as healthy. "They are bargaining; They are shadow-boxing," he said. "This is a much better way than with guns."

Still, the politics of the gun spoke loudly Monday.

Violence, much of it with sectarian overtones, left at least 18 Iraqis dead across the country as multiple car bombs exploded across the capital. One U.S. soldier was reported killed in a combat incident in western Iraq.

Maj. Gen. Mubdir Hatam Jabouri, commander of the Iraqi Army in Baghdad, was killed by a single bullet to the neck while driving through western Baghdad in a lengthy vehicle convoy shortly after 5 p.m., said Mohammed Askari, an adviser to the Defense Ministry.

Jabouri, a Sunni Arab, commanded a force that is seen by many as a counterweight to those of the Interior Ministry, whose Shiite Muslim-dominated police and commando units have been accused of extrajudicial killings.

The U.S. military reported Monday that a U.S. soldier had died Sunday as a result of "enemy action." The soldier was killed in rural western Iraq, but much of the insurgent violence in the country has shifted to religiously diverse urban areas, said a U.S. official who requested anonymity.

On Monday, a car bomb in a crowded market of downtown Baqubah, a religiously mixed provincial capital 45 miles northeast of the capital, killed at least six people, including two children, and injured 21. The bomb exploded as police and passersby gathered near a murder scene, one of three fatal shootings reported in Baqubah.

Gunmen killed three Shiite laborers in the Sunni town of Hawija, near the northern city of Kirkuk. A roadside bomb targeting a U.S. patrol in Mosul killed one Iraqi civilian bystander.

At least two car bombs and sporadic mortar fire shook the capital. A car bomb near a bank killed one person and injured five in the Dora district, a religiously mixed area on Baghdad's southern edge.

Gunmen kidnapped a prominent university professor. Dr. Ali Hussein Khafaji, dean of the Engineering College at Mustansirya University, was abducted by two carloads of men as he left his home.

U.S. Is Seeking Better Balance In Iraqi Police (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 6 — As the threat of full-scale sectarian strife looms, the American military is scrambling to try to weed out ethnic or religious partisans from the Iraqi security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0016266

The United States faces the possibility that it has been arming one side in a prospective civil war. Early on, Americans ceded operational control of the police to the Iraqi government. Now, the police forces are overseen at the highest levels by religious Shiite parties with militias, and reports of uniformed death squads have risen sharply in the past year.

The American military is trying an array of possible solutions, including quotas to increase the number of Sunni Arab recruits in police academies, firing Shiite police commanders who appear to tolerate militias, and sending 200 training teams composed of military police officers or former civilian police officers to Iraqi stations, even in remote and risky locations.

There is no quick or painless fix. The efforts risk alienating Shiite politicians, who have fiercely resisted attempts to wrest away their control of the security forces. The moves may appeal, though, to recalcitrant Sunni Arabs, whom the Americans want to draw into the political process.

Trying to reform the police forces could take years, because sectarian loyalties have become entrenched, and police officers are rooted in their communities, senior military officials acknowledge. Critics say American efforts to train the Iraqi police also continue to be hampered by a shortage of troops and civilian advisers.

Several of the initiatives, such as enrolling more Sunni Arab students in police academies, have been going on for months. Others, such as the deployment of the new police training teams, are just beginning on a large scale. The wave of sectarian violence that followed the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22 has heightened the urgency of the measures.

After the bombing, mobs led by Shiite militiamen attacked dozens of Sunni mosques and left hundreds dead. Many police units stood aside, either out of confusion or sectarian loyalties, according to Iraqi witnesses. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, said Friday that police officers had allowed militiamen through checkpoints in eastern Baghdad, where much of the violence occurred.

The Iraqi Army poses less of a problem than the police, because the American military has direct operational control over it, and because the Americans took more care in building it up. Kurdish militiamen, though, make up a significant part of it.

The military's efforts to revamp the police are taking place alongside a strong push by the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, to press Iraqi politicians who are forming the new government to appoint a nonsectarian figure as head of the Interior Ministry, which controls the police.

"When you're forming a government, you can't form it with any kind of sectarian element," said Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, charged with controlling Baghdad. "That's got to be put aside, particularly with military forces." The attempts to erase sectarianism dovetail with a broader American initiative to strengthen police training this year by diverting more resources away from mentoring the Iraqi Army. The military hopes to have 200,000 Iraqi police officers in place by early 2007.

The development of the police is in some ways more crucial than that of the army, because the Americans want the police to handle all security inside Iraq.

The units believed to be most plagued by militia recruitment and sectarian loyalties are the police paramilitary forces, which have a total of 17,500 members, the American military says. The regular blue-uniformed police force numbers 89,000, and the border force totals 20,000. But there are serious doubts about whether anyone has an accurate overall tally.

The paramilitary forces are divided three ways — the commandos, the public order brigades and a mechanized brigade that will soon be shifted to the army. Matthew Sherman, a former Interior Ministry adviser, said Shiite parties were especially keen to seize control of those forces because they can operate anywhere in the country and have great autonomy.

The Interior Ministry is accused of sponsoring death squads in police or paramilitary uniforms. Mr. Khalilzad has been outspoken in his criticism of the interior minister, Bayan Jabr, and hinted last month that the Americans may withhold financing if sectarianism continues to dominate the security forces.

Officials at the most powerful Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which oversees the Interior Ministry, have lashed out at the Americans, arguing that the majority Shiites had every right to control security, because Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated government had used the army and the police to abduct, torture and kill Shiites.

"The Shiites were beheaded by the security forces before, and we are not ready to be beheaded again," said Hadi al-Amiri, the head of the Badr Organization, the Supreme Council's Iranian-trained militia. "We can relinquish any part of the government except for the security forces."

DOJ_NMG_0016267

American commanders say they have recently learned that virtually all the members of the 7,700-member public order brigades, which do light infantry duty, were Shiites. The brigades were founded in 2004, and were expanded after the Supreme Council took control of the Interior Ministry in early 2005.

"When we stood them up, we didn't ask, 'Are you Sunni or are you Shia?' " Maj. Gen. Joseph D. Peterson, in charge of police training, said in an interview at a base in Taji, north of Baghdad, as he was visiting soldiers newly assigned to the Iraqi police. "They ended up being 99 percent Shia. Now, when we look at that, we say, 'They do not reflect the population of Iraq.' "

No accurate census of Iraq exists, but the country is believed to be about 60 percent Shiite Arab, 20 percent Sunni Arab and 20 percent Kurdish (most Kurds are Sunni.)

Americans officials have pushed the Interior Ministry to diversify the forces. All recruits in the public order brigades have to go through a six- or seven-week training course, with 1,200 in each class.

The Americans ensured that the last three classes enrolled greater numbers of Sunni Arabs: The first of those was 42 percent Sunni Arab, the second 92 percent Sunni and the third, just starting, was virtually all Sunni, General Peterson said.

American officers say that when they try to talk to Iraqi commanders about the religious or ethnic breakdown of the forces, the commanders tend to shy away from those conversations, as most Iraqis do, saying they prefer to think of themselves as one people rather than in terms of sect.

Col. Gordon B. Davis, the top adviser to the public order brigades, said the senior commander of that force, a Shiite Arab from the old Iraqi Army, addressed the issue only with much reluctance. " 'You shouldn't be talking like this,' he tells us," the colonel said in an interview at the Iraqi command base in Baghdad's Kadhimiya neighborhood.

Colonel Davis said his advisers had no qualms about removing Iraqi commanders if it became evident they have sectarian loyalties.

For much of last year, the Second Public Order Brigade had a particularly bad reputation. It was accused by many Iraqis, especially Sunni Arabs, of detainee torture and illegal killings. Its ranks were filled with men recruited from eastern Baghdad who were loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, the firebrand Shiite cleric who had led two rebellions against the Americans.

The head of the brigade was the former police chief of Nasiriya, a southern city under the sway of hard-line Shiite parties, and was "rumored to tolerate" militias, Colonel Davis said. The Americans replaced him with a Sunni Arab commander in December, who then fired 160 people below him, presumably because those men had suspected militia ties, the colonel said. Since then, he added, officers have removed images of Mr. Sadr from gunstocks and vehicles.

In contrast to the public order brigades, the police commandos, an 8,300-member force that was founded in 2004 under a Sunni-led Interior Ministry, are more diverse, American commanders said. Many came from the old Iraqi Army, which had an officer corps dominated by Sunni Arabs, and from the domestic security services, which Saddam Hussein used to terrorize the population.

The commandos and the public order brigades essentially perform the same job, and will soon be combined as members of the "national police."

Mr. Sherman, though, said the commandos also have significant numbers of Shiites loyal to the Supreme Council. Maj. Gen. Adnan Thabit, a Sunni Arab, is the head of the commandos in name only, he said, having ceded control to Shiite partisans. "They've just taken a more kind of political bent over the past 10 months or so," said Mr. Sherman, the former Interior Ministry adviser.

The Americans hope that new mentorship programs this year will result in greater oversight of the police. For the last year, the police paramilitary units have had 11-member American military adviser teams assigned to them at the division, brigade and battalion command levels. That program will soon be bolstered by sending regular American troops into the field with the police.

"It's a huge difference, because now you've got a battalion partnering with another battalion," General Peterson said. "Instead of just 11 guys, you have that entire battalion, 500 or 600 guys."

In addition, the American command is reorganizing thousands of members of the American military police and former civilian police officers who are currently working with the Iraqi police in Iraq. Most are now based at police academies or high-level headquarters.

DOJ_NMG_0016268

Under the new plan, they will be sent across the country to smaller police stations, some in remote areas. There are a total of 200 teams, with the first already dispatched to more volatile areas like Baquba, northeast of Baghdad.

A senior American officer, who works with the Iraqi police and army units, said that, in handling the surge in violence after the shrine bombing, Iraqi units with American trainers attached generally performed better than those without. But many police units still lack American advisers, in part because finding experienced trainers willing to spend long periods attached to police units has been hard.

"It should be obvious that the presence of our embedded advisory teams in the army and police forces were an important stabilizing influence," said the officer, who was not authorized to speak publicly on this matter. "The question becomes how long that stabilizing influence is necessary."

Majority In U.S. Fears Iraq Civil War (WP)

By Richard Morin

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

An overwhelming majority of Americans believe that fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims in Iraq will lead to civil war, and half say the United States should begin withdrawing its forces from that violence-torn country, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll.

The survey found that 80 percent believe that recent sectarian violence makes civil war in Iraq likely, and more than a third say such a conflict is "very likely" to occur. These expectations extend beyond party lines: More than seven in 10 Republicans and eight in 10 Democrats and political independents say they believe such a conflict is coming.

In the face of continuing violence, half -- 52 percent -- of those surveyed said the United States should begin withdrawing forces. One in six favors immediate withdrawal of all troops, however, while about one-third prefer a more gradual return.

The survey also found growing doubt that the Bush administration has a strategy in Iraq. Two-thirds of those interviewed said they do not think the president has a clear plan for handling the Iraq situation, the highest level of doubt recorded since the question was first asked three years ago. But an even larger share -- 70 percent -- questions whether Democrats in Congress have a plan for dealing with Iraq, suggesting Americans see neither party as offering a coherent exit strategy.

The survey highlights how support for the war in Iraq dissolved since the first months after the U.S. invasion. At the end of 2003, nearly six in 10 -- 59 percent -- said the conflict was worth the cost; today, 42 percent share that view. In the past nine months, the proportion in Post-ABC polls who say the United States should begin withdrawing its troops has increased from 38 percent to a 52 percent majority.

Recent U.S. reversals in Iraq have not dramatically reduced overall support for President Bush, in contrast to some other national polls. His overall job approval rating stood at 41 percent, essentially unchanged from January. Nearly six in 10 disapproved of his job performance, the 11th consecutive survey since last April in which at least half the country has been critical of Bush's leadership.

In only one area -- terrorism -- does more than half of the public see Bush positively, and even here 46 percent disapprove while 52 percent approve. On every other issue tested in the poll -- including the economy, international affairs and health care -- Bush received negative marks.

Americans also expressed disappointment with Congress, which is now controlled by Republicans. Slightly more than a third -- 36 percent -- said they approve of the way Congress is doing its job, down seven percentage points in the past five weeks and the lowest marks for the legislative branch since October 1997.

But the survey showed Democrats slipping also. Asked which party they trust to deal with the country's biggest problems, 42 percent said the Democratic Party and 40 percent said the GOP. Barely five weeks ago, Democrats held a 14-point advantage.

Americans continue to fault the administration's performance in Iraq. Well under half -- 40 percent -- think Bush is doing a good job there, unchanged from late January but still down six points from December. Nearly six in 10 -- 57 percent -- said the war was not worth fighting, marking the 12th consecutive poll since December 2004 in which a majority said invading Iraq was a mistake.

DOJ_NMG_0016269

In question after question, the new survey reflected a sharp decline in optimism, perhaps sparked by the sectarian violence that has flared in Iraq after the bombings of a revered Shiite mosque two weeks ago. Since then, deadly confrontations have occurred between Shiites and Sunnis, who are a minority in Iraq but were favored under Saddam Hussein's regime.

The poll found that 56 percent think the United States is not making significant progress toward restoring civil order in Iraq, while 43 percent think that stability is being reestablished -- a 17-point drop in optimism since December and the most pessimistic reading on this question since it was first asked in June 2004.

The nation is split down the middle over whether the United States is moving ahead toward establishing a democratic government in Iraq. About half, 49 percent, say the United States is making progress on the political front, with 48 percent saying the nation and its allies are not gaining ground. Shortly after the December elections, almost two in three Americans said the country was making significant progress toward democracy.

Over the weekend, pressure mounted on Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to give up his bid for a new term, a move that would add to the political turmoil engulfing Iraq.

Although news from Iraq has not been good, the survey suggests Bush has been helped somewhat by improving perceptions of the U.S. economy. Forty-three percent believe the economy is either excellent or good, up from 35 percent four months ago. And nearly half -- 48 percent -- of the country approve of the way Bush is handling the economy, 12 points higher than in November. Still, slightly more than half (51 percent) disapprove.

Bush's standing in other areas is mixed as well. More than six in 10 disapprove of the way he handled Hurricane Katrina, a nine-point increase since early September. A growing majority (58 percent) also disapproves of the way he is dealing with the prescription drug issue. But his overall approval ratings on terrorism (52 percent), health care (38 percent), international affairs (44 percent) and ethics in government (40 percent) remain basically unchanged from recent Post-ABC polls.

Perceptions of Democrats, who have struggled to take advantage of Bush's lack of popularity, declined on several measures. In late January, Democrats held a clear advantage over Republicans -- 55 to 37 percent -- on which party could best handle the economy. In the new poll, Democrats still led, but by 49 to 40 percent.

The survey found a similar shift on Iraq. In January, Democrats had an advantage of 47 to 40 percent on which party could better handle the situation there, but the new poll found Americans evenly divided -- 42 percent on each side -- on that question.

A total of 1,000 randomly selected Americans were interviewed March 2 to 5. The margin of sampling error for the overall results is plus or minus three percentage points.

Assistant polling director Claudia Deane and staff writer Dan Balz contributed to this report.

Iraqi President Loses Try For Parliament (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

Iraq's president failed in a bid Monday to order parliament into session by March 12, further delaying formation of a government and raising questions whether the political process can withstand the unrelenting violence or disintegrate into civil war.

The deadlock came as snipers assassinated Maj. Gen. Mibder Hatim al-Dulaimi, the Sunni Arab in charge of Iraqi forces protecting the capital. A torrent of bombings and shootings killed 25 more Iraqis on Monday, ending a relative lull in violence. Officials also found four bodies.

At the heart of the dispute is a controversy over the second-term candidacy of the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose most powerful supporter is the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The Sunni Arab minority blames al-Jaafari for failing to control the Shiite militiamen who attacked Sunni mosques and clerics after the Feb. 22 shrine bombing in Samarra. Kurds are angry because they believe al-Jaafari is holding up resolution of their claims to control the oil-rich city of Kirkuk.

In a bid to force a showdown in the dispute, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, announced he would order parliament to convene Sunday for the first time since the elections in December and the ratification of the results on Feb. 12.

DOJ_NMG_0016270

Such a meeting would have started a 60-day countdown for the legislators to elect a president, approve al-Jaafari's nomination as prime minister and sign off on his Cabinet.

Talabani was mistakenly counting on the signature of Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite, who lost his own bid for the prime minister's nomination by one vote to al-Jaafari. Talabani had in hand a power of attorney from the other vice president, Ghazi al-Yawer, a Sunni, who was out of the country.

The Shiite bloc closed ranks and Abdul-Mahdi declined to sign, at least for now. In an emergency meeting with Talabani on Monday, seven Shiite leaders rejected the president's demand for them to abandon al-Jaafari's nomination.

It remained unclear when parliament might convene, despite the constitutional directive that set Sunday as the deadline. Nor was it clear how the disagreement over al-Jaafari might be settled.

The president first issued the challenge Wednesday in concert with Sunni Arab and some secular politicians.

"We want a prime minister who can gather all the political blocs around him, so that the government would be one of national unity," Talabani told reporters in Baghdad around midday Monday.

Leaders of all Iraq's major political factions scheduled a meeting Tuesday evening in an attempt to untangle the religious and sectarian differences behind the crisis, deeply compounded by continuing violence.

The attacks underscore the dangerous leadership vacuum and fresh political infighting that have torn apart many tenuous political bonds among the country's many religious and ethnic factions.

There also were increasing signs of a split in the Shiite factions, even though they managed to come together Monday night to reject the move to dump al-Jaafari.

Nevertheless, al-Sadr, the firebrand cleric whose backing had insured al-Jaafari's nomination at the Shiite caucus last month, predicted a "quick solution" on approving a government.

There were reports that al-Sadr had threatened to order parliamentarians loyal to him to boycott a Sunday session if Abdul-Mahdi, the Shiite vice president, had signed the Talabani order to convene the legislature.

"All obstacles to forming a national unity government soon will be resolved," al-Sadr said after meeting with Deputy Prime Minister and acting Oil Minister Ahmad Chalabi in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

Many of Monday's attacks targeted the country's Shiite-led security forces, accused by Sunni Arabs of repeated abuses against them under the cover of fighting the Sunni-driven insurgency. The government denies the accusations.

In Baqouba, a car bomb targeting an Iraqi police patrol exploded near the mayor's office and a market, killing six people and wounding 23, including four patrolmen, police said. Piles of charred, twisted wreckage and pools of blood marked the site.

Elsewhere, two bombs went off in Baghdad's notorious southern Dora neighborhood. One targeted an Interior Ministry patrol, killing six Iraqis. A second exploded as a U.S. patrol was passing, wounding five policemen who were guarding a bank and two civilians.

A U.S. soldier was also killed Sunday in insurgency-plagued western Anbar province, the military announced, bringing to 2,300 the number of U.S. service members who have died in Iraq since the war began three years ago, according to an Associated Press count.

Al-Dulaimi, the Sunni in charge patrolling Baghdad with his 6th army division, was killed when gunmen fired at his convoy.

The U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey, sent condolences to "his family, tribe, and the Iraqi Army during this tragic loss."

"This tragic incident will neither impede the 6th Iraqi Army Division from continuing its mission of securing Baghdad nor derail the formation of the government of Iraq," Casey said in a statement.

Iraqi Leadership Crisis Grows (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD - Pushing the legal deadline to the limit, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani Monday declared that Iraq's new parliament will convene for the first time on March 12.

DOJ_NMG_0016271

But an event that was expected to bring a glimmer of hope - and the formation of a US-backed unity government - is instead being overshadowed by a perfect political storm. While Iraq's leaders are battling over the post of prime minister, sectarian bloodshed has left more than 500 dead over the past two weeks. Party militias are exerting more control over the streets, and Iraqis are fed up with a weak government and collapsing services.

The political crisis revolves around the decision by the main Shiite bloc to extend the rule of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. He edged out his rival by just one vote with the support of anti-US Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Last week, an alliance of Sunni Arabs, Kurds, and others called for Mr. Jaafari to step down and a new candidate to come forward. The call for a new premier followed shortly after the deadly bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra sparked a rash of the sectarian violence between Shiites and Sunni Arabs, sliding Iraq further into civil conflict.

"The most likely scenario is the worst," says Toby Dodge, an Iraq expert at Queen Mary, University of London. "[Jaafari] staggers through, with Kurds and Sunnis and others undermining him. So you get a vastly weaker prime minister, backed by radicals."

The crisis has laid bare a deepening divide within Iraq's majority Shiite community. The other contender was Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi, backed by the faction of Sadr rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who has portrayed himself as a technocrat and centrist who can get the job done.

Forming a stable government is seen by US officials as a key step to enabling the start of any military withdrawal. A more distant goal, but one required before any US exit, is to ensure that Iraqi police and security forces are 2capable of halting sectarian violence and coping with the insurgency.

Jaafari has been widely blamed in Iraq for permitting the violence to erupt out of control - yielding a week of sectarian killings and attacks on mosques that mostly targeted Sunni Arabs - after the gold roof of the Askariya Shrine in Samarra was destroyed on Feb. 22.

Days of curfew finally brought relative calm. But insurgent violence continued Monday, with eight car bombs - five of them in Baghdad alone - that took at least 28 lives, according to news agencies. One morning blast struck a packed market in Baquba, 40 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing six, including two children. Two of the car bombs, one driven by a suicide bomber, struck at Mahmudiyah, 25 miles south of the capital.

Sunni Arabs blame the lethal result on Jaafari's inability to control Shiite militias and Shiite-dominated security forces, as well as a strategic inability to come to grips with the insurgency. Kurds further took issue with Jaafari's trip to Ankara, Turkey, without cabinet approval, which has strained relations with Iraqi Kurds.

Jaafari's entourage included no Iraqi Kurds, who hold top government positions in Baghdad, but some minority Iraqi Turkomen who are often at odds with ethnic Kurds, but have close ties to Turkey.

"The Jaafari government has a long history of failure," says Mustafa Alani, head of the Security and Terrorism program at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai. "Everything has deteriorated: security, basic services, corruption. There is no major achievement."

"Weak government contributes [to the violence], state infrastructure is disintegrating gradually, and militias are taking over," says Mr. Alani. "Those people [militiamen] are becoming more loyal to their parties than the state. I don't see how this can be changed."

The convening of parliament begins a 60-day period in which a new head of state must be elected, and a new prime minister and cabinet agreed upon. Lobbying has been fierce for weeks. On Sunday, President Talabani increased pressure against Jaafari, by sending an adviser to push the case with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's preeminent Shiite cleric, in Najaf.

"We reject Jaafari because we believe that Iraq needs a government of national unity and new faces," said envoy Barham Saleh, who is also planning minister, after the meetings.

Sunni Arab leaders have found unlikely champions in US diplomats, trying to ensure their place at the table of a unity government.

They have also been most recent targets of apparent revenge attacks. Gunmen on Sunday killed the nephew and cousin of Sheikh Harith al-Dari, leader of the main Sunni Arab religious group, the Muslim Clerics Association.

DOJ_NMG_0016272

Last Thursday, Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the Iraqi Accordance Front, part of the Sunni parliamentary bloc trying to oust Jaafari, survived an assassination attempt on his convoy that killed one guard and wounded five others.

In a separate incident the same day, a convoy of bodyguards for Defense Minister Saadoun al-Dulaimi, also a Sunni Arab, was attacked, killing one guard and wounding others.

"You can argue that Iraq has been without a government since the fall of the [Hussein] regime, and after three years we are in a very messy situation," says Hassan Bazaaz, an aide to Adnan al-Dulaimi. "We are on the brink of a civil war; in fact, we are in a civil war. The reason is because there is no government."

The December national election was meant to usher in Iraq's first postinvasion permanent government. But the hopes of Iraqis expressed on election day - almost as vociferous and hopeful as they had been when they first went to the polls in January 2005 - have faded with the passing of time, and amid political deadlock.

The result is growing, popular exasperation.

"What difference does [a new government] make?" asks an Iraqi political analyst who asked not to be named. "The real crisis is the daily killing of Iraqis, which no one writes about. This is because of the US occupation. Whether Jaafari gets back in is of no concern to Iraqis. Who is going to stop [the violence]?"

Any hope of effective rule will require real change, regardless of who holds the PM post.

"A new government along the old line will be weak, and divided on the sectarian side; they are only concerned about how much they can steal," says the Iraqi analyst. "The ministries of Interior and Defense tell you everything is fine and under control. If you listen to the minister of electricity, you would think people live in a state of full electric power. The minister of oil says Iraqis are living with everything."

That sentiment echoes Khalaf al-Olayan, another Sunni leader in parliament, who wrote on the Iraqi Accordance Front website that Iraq has gone from "bad to worse" with Jaafari.

"Jaafari's government failed to solve the chaos that followed the Samarra explosions and did not take any measures to solve the security crisis that could have pushed the country into civil war," wrote Mr. Olayan.

Another Jaafari government would mean "much more of the same - a many headed hydra, without the power to nail down the [pro-Shiite and abuse] problems in the Ministry of Interior," says Mr. Dodge at Queen Mary.

Sadr supports Jaafari "not because of who he is, but who he is not," says Dodge. "They would nominate anyone, to get around Abdul Mahdi getting it."

Leaders Consider Al-Jaafari Future (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Iraqi party leaders, deadlocked over whether Ibrahim al-Jaafari should serve another term as prime minister, are considering a plan that would allow him to serve for six months to a year and then review his performance.

The behind-the-scenes wrangling occurred as several bomb attacks around Iraq killed at least nine persons, including children.

"There is no power, there is no government; the country is really in a vacuum," said a source close to the political negotiations, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

The Kurds think that Mr. al-Jaafari has not supported their bid for the northern city of Kirkuk, the Sunnis are trying to weaken the Shi'ite-led United Iraqi Alliance (UIA) -- which they think wants to wipe out the Sunni minority -- and both are coming together in a political marriage of convenience to put pressure on the UIA, the source said.

For its part, the Shi'ite alliance -- with such powerful figures as Abdel Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), and nationalist cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who backed Mr. al-Jaafari -- is refusing to back down on its nomination.

If the talks collapse, some party leaders are ready to punt the issue over to the 275-seat National Assembly and put the question of the country's prime minister to a vote -- forcing the political infighting into the open.

DOJ_NMG_0016273

"In the coming days, we will see many dramatic political actions ... in which we will reach an agreement -- or if we cannot reach an agreement with the other slates, we will transfer the whole situation to the parliamentary council," said Karim al-Musawi, SCIRI's spokesman in Washington.

President Jalal Talabani said yesterday that he would convene the National Assembly in six days, but there were conflicting reports over whether he had received the required backing of other leaders for the session to proceed.

A Kurdish official familiar with the negotiations said there were two options on the table: taking Mr. al-Jaafari's nomination to parliament and face the possibility of it being rejected, or have the UIA propose a new candidate for the post of prime minister.

"We want a candidate who can work with all of us and not treat the government as his own," said the Kurdish official, who described the ongoing talks in Baghdad as "intense."

But none of the major political slates currently holds the necessary two-thirds majority in the National Assembly to approve any candidate.

"They have to compromise," the source said.

One suggestion, he said, was to "give Jaafari a chance, then have a six-month or one-year review."

In violence yesterday, six bombs in Baghdad killed at least nine persons, including two children. A sniper also fatally shot one of Iraq's most senior army officers, Maj. Gen. Mubdar Hatim al-Dulaimi, as he drove through west Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

In London, newspapers quoted the top British commander in Iraq as saying that Britain's 8,000 troops could be withdrawn from Iraq by summer 2008, with the first drawdown expected within weeks.

But Lt. Gen. Nick Houghton told the London Daily Telegraph the timetable was "reversible" if Iraq's political leaders failed to create a stable central government and curb sectarian violence.

18 Killed As Iraqi Parliament Prepares To Meet (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — A sniper shot and killed the Iraqi officer commanding army forces in the capital today as officials reported that bombings and other violence had killed at least 16 Iraqis and a U.S. soldier.

Maj. Gen. Mubdir Hatam Jabouri was killed by a single bullet to the neck while driving through western Baghdad in a lengthy convoy shortly after 5 p.m., said Mohammed Askari, an advisor to the Defense Ministry.

"He was such a dedicated and good-disciplined veteran officer of the Iraqi army," said Askari.

Jabouri, a Sunni Arab, was a commander of troops seen by many as a counterweight to the increasingly powerful forces of the Interior Ministry, whose Shiite Muslim-dominated police and commando units allegedly have been involved in extrajudicial killings.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military reported that a U.S. soldier in western Iraq died Sunday as a result of "enemy action."

Sporadic sectarian violence continued to erupt in the wake of the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra and reprisal attacks on Sunnis. Iraqi and U.S. officials hope a broad-based government drawing on Iraq's majority Shiites, Sunnis and Kurdish minority might cool sectarian tempters. But political talks have become bogged down.

Officials have announced that the newly elected parliament will meet next Sunday, an important step in the process of building a new government.

Meanwhile, much of the insurgent violence in the country has shifted to religiously diverse urban areas, said a U.S. official who requested anonymity.

A car bomb in a crowded market of downtown Baqubah, a religiously mixed provincial capital 45 miles northeast of the capital, killed at least six, including two children, and injured 21. The bomb exploded as police and passersby gathered near a murder scene, one of three reported fatal shootings in Baqubah today.

Gunmen killed three Shiite laborers in the Sunni town of Hawija, in northern Iraq near the city of Kirkuk.

At least two car bombs and sporadic mortar fire shook the capital. A car bomb near a bank killed one person and injured five in the Dora district, a religiously mixed area on Baghdad's southern edge.

DOJ_NMG_0016274

A car bomb explosion on the road to the Ministry of Industry compound injured five. Another car bomb struck a police commando patrol in the Mustansirya district, though there were no reports of injuries.

Yarmuk hospital officials reported receiving at least three unidentified corpses from Sunni Arab neighborhoods.

Gunmen kidnapped a prominent university professor. Dr. Ali Hussein Khafaji, dean of the Engineering College at Mustansirya University, was abducted by two carloads of men as he left his home.

Senior Iraqi General Killed In Ambush (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 6 -- The top commander of the Iraqi army division in Baghdad was killed Monday when his car came under small-arms fire while traveling through the capital, the U.S. military said.

Maj. Gen. Mubdar Hatim Hazya al-Dulaimi was one of the highest-ranking members of the new Iraqi army to be killed in insurgent violence. Under his leadership, the 6th Iraqi Army Division has been gradually assuming control of parts of the capital from U.S. forces.

His killing could set back security efforts in Baghdad, particularly following the recent outbreak of sectarian violence, according to a senior U.S. commander who worked closely with him.

"It could be a blow that takes a long time to overcome," said Maj. Gen. William G. Webster Jr., commander of the Army's 3rd Infantry Division, who oversaw U.S. troops in Baghdad for a year ending in January. "Losing a strong commander for even a little while in Baghdad could cause a further power shift toward what looks like the Shia control of the city."

Still, Dulaimi strove to cultivate strong subordinates, which could help the transition, Webster said. The Defense Ministry is expected to select Dulaimi's replacement.

The attack was one of the violent incidents across Iraq on Monday that left more than 20 people dead after a relative lull in bloodshed over the weekend.

President Jalal Talabani, meanwhile, announced that the country's new parliament, which was elected Dec. 15, would hold its first meeting on Sunday, the deadline set by the constitution for its first session. Lawmakers and political parties have been unable to agree on the composition of a new government, delaying the opening of parliament.

Dulaimi was killed about 4:35 p.m. in the western part of the capital when his convoy was attacked, a U.S. military statement said.

"Mubdar had been visiting his soldiers in Kadamiyah and was returning to his headquarters when his convoy came under small-arms fire attack," the statement said. It was not clear whether anyone else had been killed or injured in the incident.

"General Mubdar was a true Iraqi patriot," Maj. Gen. J.D. Thurman, commander of the Multi-National Division in Baghdad, said in a statement. "He leaves behind a professional and capable fighting force that will continue the fight for Iraqi freedom."

U.S. officials training the new Iraqi army hope it will take over combat operations in Iraq, enabling an eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops. Iraqi forces are currently in charge of security in about 60 percent of Baghdad. Only two weeks ago, Dulaimi had predicted that insurgent activity would decline because of the Iraqi army's operations.

"Because of the bravery of our armed forces that sacrifice themselves on a daily basis, the amount of insurgent activity will continue to decrease," Dulaimi was quoted as saying in a U.S. military statement.

The Iraqi general, in his mid-fifties, was an aggressive, inspirational leader and rising star within the army, Webster said. A Sunni Arab sheik from southern Baghdad, Dulaimi led a division under Saddam Hussein during the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s, and since Hussein's fall had commanded two other divisions before being selected by the Defense Ministry for the critical job in Baghdad. "He was certainly destined to be a senior leader of all the armed forces," Webster said.

But Dulaimi's hands-on style and unusual drive to lead from the front -- as well as his habit of shunning body armor -- also put him in greater danger. "He knew he had to be out with his soldiers for them to trust him," Webster said. "He put himself at more risk than his predecessors."

DOJ_NMG_0016275

Elsewhere in the capital on Monday, at least four car bombs exploded, killing four people and injuring 24, police said. Another four people were killed and 10 wounded when three car bombs detonated in the town of Mahmudiyah, about 15 miles south of the capital, security officials said.

In the worst attack of the day, seven people, including five children, were killed and 17 were injured when a car bomb exploded in a crowded market in central Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said.

A U.S. military statement said the explosion occurred near the office of the mayor, who was meeting with community leaders at the time to discuss ways to improve security. The statement blamed the attack on insurgent attempts to "incite sectarian violence within the community."

Five policemen who rushed to the scene were reportedly injured in a secondary bombing that targeted them.

The U.S. military reported the death of a U.S. soldier "due to enemy action" in the western province of Anbar on Sunday. Additional details were not available.

The bodies of a father and two of his sons were found Monday in the city of Hawijah, about 35 miles southwest of the northern city of Kirkuk, according to police. They said the victims were Shiite Muslims who appeared to have been shot execution-style, presumably by the Sunni-led insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

An offshoot of the group recently distributed leaflets in the town demanding the expulsion of Shiites in retaliation after Sunnis fled their communities around Baghdad.

Fearing sectarian violence, some Sunni families abandoned their homes following the destruction of a revered Shiite mosque in Samarra on Feb. 22. Attracted by the rich agricultural land around Hawijah, many Shiites had moved to the area during the rule of Hussein, residents said.

Residents of the town were "shocked by these leaflets, because many of these families who work in agriculture and cattle raising, as well as other jobs, have intermarried and lived here for many years without any problem," said local police Capt. Emad Khider.

11 Including An Iraqi General Are Killed In Baghdad Attacks; Army Says A G.I. Died Sunday (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 6 — A series of guerrilla attacks in and around Baghdad killed at least 11 people on Monday, including an Iraqi general, and wounded at least 58, officials said. The American military announced that an American soldier had been killed in Anbar Province, the western desert region that has become a wellspring of the insurgency.

The eruption of violence came as the country's sclerotic political process inched forward with an announcement by President Jalal Talabani that he would convene the newly elected Parliament on Sunday.

Maj. Gen. Mubdar Hatim Hazya al-Duleimi, the commander of the Sixth Division of the Iraqi Army, was fatally shot by a sniper on Monday afternoon while driving in western Baghdad, according to American and Iraqi officials. General Duleimi was the highest-ranking Iraqi military officer to be killed since the American-led invasion in 2003.

For more than a year the Sixth Division has been gradually assuming control of sectors of the capital from American forces.

In the deadliest attack of the day, a car bomb exploded in a marketplace in Baquba, just north of the capital, killing 7 people, including 2 young girls, and wounding 23, including 5 children, Diyala Province officials and hospital workers in Baquba said. The attack was one of at least seven on Monday involving car bombs.

The American military offered no further information on the American casualty in Anbar, except to say the soldier was killed Sunday and had been assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7, which is under Marine command.

Against this violent backdrop, Iraq's political leaders continued to jockey over the choice of a prime minister, the government's most powerful executive. The main Shiite bloc is backing Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who has held the post since a transitional government was formed last April, but he is opposed by a coalition of Sunni Arab, Kurdish and some secular politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0016276

Although the Shiite bloc won 130 of the 275 parliamentary seats, the Iraqi Constitution effectively requires a two-thirds majority to choose the prime minister, giving the Kurdish, Sunni and secular parties, with about 140 seats among them, a de facto veto.

Ahmad Chalabi, a secular Shiite politician and former Pentagon favorite, met Monday with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most revered Shiite leader, to discuss the issue. Mr. Chalabi also met with Moktada al-Sadr, the militant Shiite cleric whose power has grown as Mr. Chalabi's has faded. Mr. Sadr's bloc, the largest within the Shiite Alliance, has been backing Mr. Jaafari for the nomination.

"Mr. Jaafari must be given a chance to work on forming a government," Mr. Chalabi told reporters as he emerged from his meetings in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

For his part, Mr. Sadr predicted a "quick solution" to the impasse.

Ayatollah Sistani, who opposes a direct clerical role in government, made no statement.

American officials have been putting pressure on their Iraqi counterparts to pull together a broadbased coalition in the hope that widespread political representation would help unify the country and defuse the insurgency.

According to the Iraqi Constitution, the legislature must first approve a president by a two-thirds vote. The president must then pick a prime minister within 15 days. The prime minister has another 15 days to select a cabinet.

The selection of the prime minister and cabinet must be approved by a majority of Parliament, or the cycle is renewed with a new 15-day deadline for the president to choose a new prime minister.

But the expectation is that the politicians will have negotiated the package of president, prime minister and cabinet before the legislature announces its presidential choice.

Two Car Bombs Explode In Iraqi City (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

HILLAH, Iraq -- Two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously at separate sites in this mostly Shiite city early Tuesday, wounding at least three people, police said.

The blasts were detonated by remote control and were about five minutes apart, said police Capt. Muthana Khalid.

The first went off on a road on the northern side of the city, hurting no one, Khalid said.

Five minutes later, the second car bomb exploded at a bustling market, injuring at least three people, Khalid said.

Hillah, 60 miles south of Baghdad, has suffered repeated attacks. It is also the site of the single deadliest attack in the two-year insurgency, a suicide car bombing outside a medical clinic on Feb. 28, 2005 that killed 110 people.

Also Tuesday, police said four Iraqi officers were killed in two separate attacks on police patrols in Baqouba and Beiji, north of Baghdad. The assailants were not identified.

Iraqi Tribes Strike Back At Insurgents (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 6 -- First they killed the chief of the Naim tribe and his son. Then they killed a top tribal sheik who headed the Fallujah city council. Then they assassinated the leader of the al-Jubur tribe.

And now the reported killers of all these men -- al-Qaeda in Iraq, the insurgent group of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi -- have a powerful new enemy.

Tribal chiefs in Iraq's western Anbar province and in an area near the northern city of Kirkuk, two regions teeming with insurgents, are vowing to strike back at al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni Arab-led group that is waging war against Sunni tribal leaders who are cooperating with the Iraqi government and the U.S. military. Anbar tribes have formed a militia that has killed 20 insurgents from al-Qaeda in Iraq, leaders said.

Separately, more than 300 tribal chiefs, politicians, clerics, security officials and other community leaders met last week in Hawijah, about 35 miles southwest of Kirkuk, and "declared war" on al-Qaeda in Iraq. In a communique, the participants vowed

DOJ_NMG_0016277

"the shedding of blood" of anyone involved in "sabotage, killings, kidnappings, targeting police and army, attacking the oil and gas pipelines and their transporters, assassinating the religious and tribal figures, technicians, and doctors."

"Hawijah was never a hideout for terrorists and fugitives," the statement added. "Anyone who provides refuge to terrorists will be considered and dealt with like a criminal and terrorist."

Last month at a briefing in Baghdad, Maj. Gen Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman, said Zarqawi "finds these tribal leaders who have opted to embrace the democratic process . . . and he works to assassinate" them.

"What we're finding is indeed the people of al-Anbar -- Fallujah and Ramadi, specifically -- have decided to turn against terrorists and foreign fighters," he said. "The tribal leaders, if you will, said, 'Okay, that's enough, let's take out Zarqawi and his network and get them out of our cities.' " Lynch said "local insurgents" had killed six Zarqawi deputies in Ramadi since September.

Anbar province is a center of the insurgency and the deadliest region of the country outside of Baghdad for Iraqi civilians and U.S. forces. Tribal chiefs there said their militia, the al-Anbar Revolutionaries, has killed 20 foreign fighters from al-Qaeda in Iraq and 33 Iraqi sympathizers who aided the insurgents with arms and money in the past two months.

"Forming the group did not come from nothing," said Khalaf al-Fahdawi, a leader of the Sunni Albu Fahd tribe in Anbar. "It came from a need to destroy al-Qaeda, which we thought the Marines might have been able to do. We were wrong, since these armed men became stronger and raped other cities."

Leaders in Anbar and south of Kirkuk said they opposed both Zarqawi and the American military occupation of Iraq, describing them as feeding off each other to the detriment of the country.

"We are a group of the Anbar people who want to get rid of Zarqawi . . . because this is the only way to make the Americans withdraw from Ramadi or Iraq in general," said Ahmed Abu Ilaf, 30, a welder and member of the new Anbar militia from Ramadi, about 60 miles west of the capital.

"We are against Zarqawi and his followers because they aim to extend the presence of the occupation and hurt our forces to make them weak," said Hussein Ali al-Jubouri, a Sunni tribal leader and Hawijah city council member.

Hawijah leaders said they, too, wanted to create a militia to enforce their threats, but that U.S. military officials were opposed to the idea. For the time being, they said, they would intensify their cooperation with Iraqi military and police units.

Members of the Anbar militia said the group comprised about 100 people who have had relatives slain by al-Qaeda in Iraq. The group is led by Ahmed Ftaikhan, a former Iraqi intelligence officer from the now-disbanded Iraqi army who lives in Ramadi.

Fahdawi, the sheik from the Albu Fahd tribe, said the militia was forged in a series of secret meetings among tribal leaders, each of whom was asked to help form the group. Some contributed men, some money, Fahdawi said. U.S. military officers attended some of the meetings, he said, and helped "with "all kinds of financial support."

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, denied that American forces were funding the militia.

"All military activity is conducted through the legitimate structures of the Iraqi government and security forces," he said in an e-mail. "We are working hard to ensure these structures function properly, and funding a program such as this would only undermine that process."

A fighter in Zarqawi's group, calling himself Abu Azzam, said the al-Anbar Revolutionaries "are collaborators and dogs for America. They kill the mujaheddin to get money from the American crusaders. They are cowards and we have killed a lot of them. . . . All the people here support us and our jihad against the Americans and their followers."

Fahdawi said, "I cannot say that all the people in Ramadi support us, but I can say 80 percent of them do."

Ilaf, the militia member and welder from Ramadi, said the group has had real success.

"We have killed a number of the Arabs, including Saudis, Egyptians, Syrians, Kuwaitis, Syrians and Jordanians," he said. "We were also able to foil an attack by Zarqawi's men who were trying to attack an oil pipeline outside Ramadi. We killed four Iraqis trying to plant the bomb under the pipeline."

Iraq's Talabani Summons Parliament (REU-Y2)

By Nick Olivari And Faris Al-mehdawi

Reuters, March 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016278

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said on Monday he would convene parliament in six days, but political wrangling means a government of national unity is unlikely to be formed any time soon.

As Talabani met a constitutional requirement to summon parliament after elections in December, a car bomb north of Baghdad killed six people, including two children. Five other car bombs exploded in the capital, killing three police officers and wounding at least 24 people.

Nearly three months after the election, Iraq's political leaders are still fighting over the post of prime minister. The row is unlikely to end soon, meaning parliament may only get as far as naming a speaker in its first session.

"I will call today for parliament to hold the first session on the 12th of the current month since it is the last day that the constitution allows," Talabani said.

According to the Transitional Administrative Law, the U.S.-sponsored interim constitution still in force, lawmakers must first elect a speaker of parliament and then a president and two deputies, who in turn will name a prime minister to form a new government within two weeks.

But there is no timeframe for these posts to be filled. The new constitution, approved in a referendum last October, does give a timetable, but it will take effect only after the country's first four-year government is formed.

JAAFARI OPPOSED

Sunnis, Kurds and others are opposed to the nomination of Shi'ite Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and are calling for the Shi'ite Alliance, parliament's biggest bloc, to replace him.

The dispute has delayed the formation of the grand coalition government that Washington promoted in the hope of fostering stability and allowing U.S. troops to begin withdrawing.

Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Chalabi, a secular Shi'ite whose list failed to win a single seat in parliament, said an "urgent and radical solution" would be found to break the impasse.

Hussein Falluji, a Sunni politician, said there were three options, none of which included Jaafari.

The Shi'ite Alliance could change Jaafari and the political process could resume, he said, a new alliance could form a bigger bloc and name a new prime minister, or parliament could veto Jaafari by not giving him the two-thirds majority he needs.

Tarek al-Hashemi, a leading Sunni politician and a contender for speaker when the new parliament opens on Sunday, accused Iran of fostering instability in Iraq, partly through militias loyal to Shi'ite parties, in a bid to divert U.S. pressure over Tehran's nuclear program.

"The main player in Iraq is Iran," Hashemi said in an interview in Jordan. "It wants to create chaos for America in Iraq as part of the conflict over the nuclear issue."

Iran denies interfering in Iraqi affairs but Hashemi's views, typical of Sunni leaders, signal future tension for both Iraqi unity and potentially between Baghdad and Tehran.

DEATH TOLL RISES

Sectarian violence that has killed hundreds since the February 22 bombing of Samarra's Golden Mosque claimed more lives on Monday.

A bomb in Baquba killed six people, two of whom were girls aged three and four, and wounded 23 in what the U.S. military said was an attack aimed at sowing sectarian bloodshed.

It exploded near a market, packed with women and children, after police arrived to check a separate incident in which one person had been killed. Five policemen were wounded.

The blast shattered windows and wrecked stalls. Sandals and broken spectacles lay amid body parts in pools of blood.

"What did these people do to be killed by this bomb," said a distraught man at the scene. "They targeted innocent civilians."

The religiously mixed city of Baquba, 65 km (40 miles) northeast of Baghdad, has been the scene of several sectarian attacks since the Samarra bombing.

Sunni insurgents battling the Shi'ite-led government frequently launch attacks against U.S.-trained Iraqi security forces. Five separate car bombs around Baghdad killed three police officers, wounded five other policeman and at least 19 civilians. One other civilian was wounded in a mortar attack.

DOJ_NMG_0016279

Two other car bombs, one of them driven by a suicide bomber, killed three people, including two Iraqi soldiers, and wounded five, in Mahmudiya, some 40 km south of Baghdad on Monday, police said.

The two blasts occurred 10 minutes apart with one targeting an Iraqi army checkpoint.

Human rights in Iraq were also at the forefront on Monday when Amnesty International condemned the detention of 14,000 prisoners without charge or trial, saying the lessons of the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal had not been learned.

U.S. officials did not respond to a request for comment.

Germans Set To Investigate Help To U.S. In Iraq Invasion (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

BERLIN, March 6 — A German opposition party said Monday that it would vote for a formal parliamentary investigation into allegations that the German intelligence service provided help to the United States during the invasion of Iraq, which the government vehemently opposed.

An official of the Free Democratic Party, which has 61 seats in Parliament, said the party favored an investigation. Because the two other opposition parties, the leftist Greens and the new Left Party, have already declared their support, the Free Democrats' decision seems to ensure a formal investigation.

Germany's government, in which power is shared between the main left-of-center and right-of-center parties, has made vigorous efforts to head off an investigation, saying it could harm the functioning of Germany's intelligence service and efforts under way to improve relations with the United States.

Earlier the government had furnished a report on the allegation that two agents of the country's intelligence service were posted to Iraq starting shortly before the American military mounted the invasion.

That report was released some 10 days ago, but some in the opposition criticized it as falling short of a full, detailed disclosure of what the government may have been doing behind the scenes to support American policy.

In a full parliamentary investigation, rare in Germany, members of the Parliament would very likely publicly interrogate former and current members of the government under oath. In their comments on Monday, leaders of the Free Democrats said they wanted to investigate the roles of figures like Gerhard Schröder, the former chancellor; Joschka Fischer, the former foreign minister; and Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the current foreign minister, who was Mr. Schröder's chief of staff at the time of the invasion.

The likelihood of a full parliamentary investigation promises to breathe new life into a political scandal that has ebbed and flowed in Germany since January, when the German press first reported that German agents in Iraq gave information to the United States during the war, including information in choosing targets for the air and land combat.

The government conceded that intelligence agents did operate in Baghdad, but denied that they provided information about military targets.

The report to Parliament issued last month acknowledged exchanges of intelligence with the United States, but said none of the information would have helped the United States in the combat. After the government report appeared, new disclosures in the press — including articles in The New York Times, vehemently denied by the government, that Germany provided the United States with Iraq's secret plan for the defense of Baghdad — had the effect of intensifying the opposition's calls for an investigation.

"This was not sufficient in our eyes," Wolfgang Gerhardt, the Free Democrats' parliamentary leader said in a telephone interview on Monday, referring to the earlier government report. "It did not deliver the necessary information on the rendition of a German citizen, on C.I.A. flights and even not on the question of the political leadership in the former government.

"Our main question is not, 'What did the security service do?' Our main question is, 'What was the aim of the former Red-Green government to declare openly to be against the Iraq invasion and to treat the work of the security service without political leadership?' " The phrase Red-Green denotes the former coalition government of Social Democrats and the Green Party.

Opposition Parties Press For Iraq Probe (WT)

By David Crossland

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016280

BERLIN -- German opposition parties have joined forces to require a parliamentary inquiry into whether German spies helped the U.S. military in the 2003 Iraq war, in a move that could hurt Berlin's efforts to mend fences with the United States.

The liberal Free Democrats voted among themselves yesterday to demand the investigation, providing enough votes in the Bundestag to compel a probe into reports that German agents handed over sensitive documents detailing Saddam Hussein's defense strategy to the Americans.

The claim, first reported in the New York Times last week, exposed the former government of Gerhard Schroeder to accusations that it publicly opposed the war to gain popularity while privately helping the Americans to wage it.

Officials have warned that a probe, in which current and former officials would have to testify under oath, will put the spotlight on the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) foreign-intelligence service in coming months and thereby hamper its activities.

The inquiry also could hurt Chancellor Angela Merkel's government, even though she only took over last November, because her Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier was chief of staff to Mr. Schroeder at the time of the war.

Lengthy debate about the Iraq war and Germany's role in it could also put further strain on U.S.-German relations at a time when Mrs. Merkel is trying hard to repair the damage done by Mr. Schroeder's opposition to the war.

Yesterday's move by the FDP ends weeks of uncertainty about whether the Bundestag, or lower house of the German parliament, will launch an inquiry.

The other two opposition parties, the Left Wing Party and the Greens, had already called for a probe. The FDP's support gives the combined opposition sufficient votes to force an investigation.

The question now is what terms of reference the inquiry will be given. The FDP and Left Wing party want it to include the previous government's entire policy during the Iraq war. That would put the inquiry on course to look at some sensitive German-U.S. security issues.

These include the purported abduction of a German national to Afghanistan by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, as well as revelations that German security officials accepted a U.S. invitation to question two inmates at the Guantanamo Bay detention camp for terrorism suspects in Cuba.

The Greens, who were a junior coalition partner in Mr. Schroeder's government, want a narrower investigation focusing on the activities of the BND.

The German press has speculated that the various leaks to U.S. newspapers in recent months about German cooperation with U.S. agencies may have been deliberately planted by U.S. authorities to get back at Germany for not supporting the Iraq war and to tarnish Mr. Schroeder's image.

FDP domestic-policy specialist Max Stadler said: "We don't want an investigating committee against the BND; instead, we want a debate about the political responsibility for all that happened and what conclusions to draw from it."

The German government has admitted that its spies passed on information about locations of Saddam Hussein's Republican Guards and of an Iraqi secret-service base to the U.S. government.

But Mr. Steinmeier reiterated his denial yesterday of the New York Times claim that the BND handed the Americans a sketch of Iraqi defense installations around Baghdad in 2003.

Mr. Steinmeier told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung that the BND had found no trace of the sketch despite making an intense search. "So I can and must assume that it wasn't passed on by the BND," he told the paper.

Germany has so far confirmed that two BND agents were in Baghdad at the start of the U.S. invasion in March 2003 and has acknowledged that they provided some descriptions of the police and military presence in Baghdad.

Iraq Reconstruction Plan Draws Criticism Following Delays (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, March 7, 2006

A key program for helping Iraq's new government succeed and thus speed withdrawal of U.S. troops is still mostly dormant nearly four months after it was announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

DOJ_NMG_0016281

The plan calls for sending teams of experts to help the fledgling governments in Iraq's 18 provinces establish democratic institutions, improve security and manage reconstruction. That combination of military, State Department and other government personnel is critical to Iraq's future, Rice said during a November visit to Iraq.

However, after the first three of 16 teams were created in Mosul, Kirkuk and Hillah in conjunction with her visit, no more have been launched. Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said time was needed to work out security procedures and other needs, and more teams will be formed this year.

That pace is "a huge problem" and means the United States is blowing its chance "to quickly seize the momentum" as Iraq forms a permanent government based on December's elections, said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We need action," said Reed, who met with Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) members in Iraq last month.

Reed says the delays are emblematic of bureaucratic snags that have hurt U.S. efforts in Iraq since the beginning. It's taken more than three years to adopt the PRT concept, even though similar teams have been operating in Afghanistan and have been credited by the U.S. Institute for Peace with improving conditions and governance in Afghanistan's provinces.

Zalmay Khalilzad, who became U.S. ambassador to Iraq last summer, helped create and mobilize the teams while he was the ambassador to Afghanistan and advocated them for Iraq. The embassy plan calls for 16 teams, one for each province except for a single team handling the three provinces in the semi-autonomous Kurdish region of northeast Iraq.

Complaints about delays are off base, said Daniel Speckhard, who is Khalilzad's top aide overseeing Iraqi reconstruction. He said several new teams would be announced soon, based on the experience of the first three. They'll include a U.S.-led team in Baghdad. Great Britain and Italy also plan to sponsor teams, he said. NATO allies have sponsored many of the PRTs in Afghanistan.

"I actually feel pretty good about it," Speckhard said. "We're moving at an incredibly rapid pace for how significant the initiative is."

While the Afghan teams were mostly military, those in Iraq will include people from the State and Justice departments and the U.S. Agency for International Development and other agencies. They'll be led by a diplomat, not a military officer, and have about 100 members.

The Iraq insurgency has left the State Department and civilian agencies struggling to fill positions even in the relative safety of Baghdad's Green Zone. They don't have built-in, military-style units that can surge into the field for duty on PRTs. "It takes us 60 to 90 days to fill positions like that … we're looking for real expertise," Speckhard said.

There also have been bureaucratic delays. It wasn't until two weeks after Rice's visit that the Defense Department on Nov. 28 issued a directive that commits forces to supporting PRTs and similar efforts. The White House on Dec. 7 issued a new directive, giving the secretary of State clear authority to lead the multiagency efforts in Iraq and elsewhere. Those directives only began discussions between the agencies over who was responsible for security and other support for the teams.

"Setting these up requires careful planning, and we're moving forward with the logistical arrangements for them now," Casey said. "There is no delay in that."

He also said the State Department has enough qualified volunteers to fill the positions.

However, the government isn't backing up its plans with enough money for training and staff, said Anthony Holmes, president of the American Foreign Service Association, an organization of diplomats and other government officials who represent the United States overseas. A major problem is a shortage of Arabic-speaking officials to meet demand, Holmes said. The State Department doesn't have ready-to-go teams of diplomats for such missions, Holmes said, or the security people to protect them.

While the teams have their roots in similar units used during the Vietnam War, the concept gained new momentum after the U.S. involvement in Bosnia in the mid-1990s.

Along with the teams in Afghanistan and Iraq, the Pentagon's Joint Forces Command is developing exercises to streamline the creation of civilian-military teams and eliminate the delays holding up the Iraqi PRTs.

DOJ_NMG_0016282

"There is an intense effort underway to fix this problem," says retired Army colonel Paul Hughes of the U.S. Institute for Peace, who worked in the U.S. occupational government in Iraq in 2003. The teams, Hughes said, can make a big difference in Iraq, and it's critical they work quickly to stop Iraqi insurgents from gaining more influence.

"That is what insurgencies are all about," he said. The enemy doesn't have to accomplish anything positive, yet insurgents can win if they "show the people the government can't meet the peoples' expectations."

Amnesty Report On 14,000 Finds Prisoner Abuse Continues In Iraq (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

LONDON, March 6 — Amnesty International accused the United States and its allies on Monday of committing widespread abuses in Iraq, including torture and the continued detention of thousands of prisoners without charge or trial.

The accusations could fuel the debate over the treatment of detainees that flared after the publication of graphic photographs showing prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad being mistreated by American guards. More recently, British forces in Iraq have been criticized after videotapes showed British soldiers beating Iraqi youths after demonstrations in southern Iraq.

In its report, "Beyond Abu Ghraib: Detention and Torture in Iraq," Amnesty International also said the level of abuse by Iraqi forces since the transfer of power in June 2004 was increasing.

The United States and its allies, the report said, have "established procedures which deprive detainees of human rights guaranteed in international law and standards."

"The record of these forces, including U.S. forces and their United Kingdom allies, is an unpalatable one," it said. In particular, coalition forces deny "detainees their right to challenge the lawfulness of their detention before a court."

Hassiba Hadj-Sahraoui, the deputy director of the group's Middle East and North Africa program, described the way prisoners are detained as "arbitrary and a recipe for possible abuse."

At the end of November 2005, the report said, quoting coalition figures, more than 14,000 prisoners were held in Iraq: about 4,850 in Baghdad, 7,365 at Camp Bucca (near Basra, in southern Iraq), and more than 1,100 in the north, at Sulaimaniya.

Responding to the report, the United States military said all its detainees were treated in accordance with international conventions and Iraqi law, The Associated Press reported.

A British Foreign Office spokesman, speaking in return for anonymity under departmental rules, also denied the allegations. He said British forces in Iraq were currently holding 43 Iraqi prisoners under United Nations resolutions permitting detention of people deemed threatening to the security of coalition or Iraqi personnel.

All 43 were visited by the Red Cross and by Iraqi government officials, had their cases reviewed every month and had access to their lawyers and families, the spokesman said. Britain has some 8,000 soldiers in Iraq, mainly in the south. The Amnesty International report took particular issue with conditions in detention facilities run by Iraqis.

"Many cases of torture and ill treatment of detainees held in facilities controlled by the Iraqi authorities have been reported since the handover of power in June 2004," the report said. "Among other methods, victims have been subjected to electric shocks or have been beaten with plastic cable. The picture that is emerging is one in which the Iraqi authorities are systematically violating the rights of detainees in breach of guarantees contained both in Iraqi legislation and in international law and standards."

Lurking In Saddam's Old Tent? (WT)

By Michael Barone

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

The issue is historical now, but still worth exploring. Why, for two distinct groups of Americans, has it become a matter of conviction held with religious intensity that there cannot have been any relationship between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq?

One group consists of Democratic politicians who oppose the Bush administration's policy in Iraq. The Minnesota Democratic Party recently protested as "un-American" an ad showing military veterans and their families supporting the president's policies for saying, "Our enemy in Iraq is al Qaeda -- the same terrorists who killed 3,000 Americans on September 11, the same terrorists from the first World Trade Center bombing, the USS Cole, Madrid, London and many more."

DOJ_NMG_0016283

The Democrats, unfactually, say these words "make a connection between Iraq and the September 11 [2001] terrorist attacks and suggest the war in Iraq will prevent an attack by al Qaeda in America."

But of course, the ad is factually correct: Al Qaeda is attacking Americans in Iraq. And the Minnesota Democratic Party is in no position to guarantee al Qaeda will not attack America.

The other group consists of intelligence and other career government professionals, many of them Arabists. Case in point: Paul Pillar, CIA national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia, 2000-2005, now retired, writing in the most recent Foreign Affairs magazine. The "greatest discrepancy between the administration's public statements and the intelligence community's judgments concerned not WMD (there was indeed a broad consensus that such programs existed), but the relationship between Saddam and al Qaeda. The enormous attention devoted to this subject did not reflect any judgment by intelligence officials that there was or was likely to be anything like the 'alliance' the administration said existed." But the Senate Intelligence Committee report showed the CIA did obtain evidence of an al Qaeda-Saddam relationship from foreign intelligence and open sources.

That's not surprising. CIA Director George Tenet in October 2002 told Congress of "growing indications of a relationship with al Qaeda." And of course evidence of contacts between al Qaeda and Saddam's regime went back to the 1990s and were cited, without murmur of dissent, by President Bill Clinton.

So why do these Democrats and these government professionals seem to be so convinced there must have been no collaboration between al Qaeda and Saddam? The Democrats fear more Americans would support Mr. Bush and the war effort if they believed there was.

The career professionals, with their many years of training in the subtleties of the Middle East, have developed a vested interest in the notion that religious Wahhabis like al Qaeda could never collaborate with a secular tyrant like Saddam. If alliances could be formed across religious lines, what use would all their learning be?

The Minnesota Democrats cite the September 11 commission's report finding of no evidence of "operational" cooperation between al Qaeda and Iraq, although it did find evidence of many contacts. But, as Donald Rumsfeld likes to say, absence of evidence is not evidence of absence.

Neither al Qaeda nor Saddam operated under a Freedom of Information Act. Any collaboration between them on September 11 would have been kept very secret -- al Qaeda did not want to leave a return address. We do not know there was such collaboration. Nor do we know there was not.

Going back to the days before our military action in Iraq, it would have been irresponsible for any president to have assumed there was no relationship between al Qaeda and Iraq, given previous contacts between them and their proven hostility to the United States. President Clinton, responsibly, did not assume that, and neither did President Bush. Nor was there any indication intelligence could have been acquired that could have assured us, with 100 percent certainty, there was no such relationship.

Light on the Saddam regime's collaboration with terrorists will almost certainly be shed by analysis of some 2 million documents captured in Iraq. But, as the intrepid Stephen Hayes of the Weekly Standard has noted, almost none of those documents has been translated or released either to the public or to the congressional intelligence committees. It appears career professionals and, perhaps, political appointees have been blocking release of these documents.

Why do their superiors not order them released? Many Americans cling with religious intensity to the notion that Saddam somehow had no terrorist ties -- a notion used to delegitimize our war effort. We should bring the truth, or as much of it as is available, out into the open.

Pro-Taliban Rebel Holdouts Give Pakistanis A Fierce Fight (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Toll Among Militants Exceeds 120, Military Says

DOJ_NMG_0016284

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 6 -- Pakistani security forces battled pro-Taliban rebels holding out in a town near the Afghan border on Monday, killing 19 of them as the toll from three days of clashes rose to more than 120, the military said.

The rebels launched attacks on government positions in Miran Shah on Saturday as President Bush met Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in the capital. The fighting has raged since.

"Helicopter gunships have been pounding militant positions around Miran Shah," said a resident of the town that serves as the administrative capital of North Waziristan, a tribal region. "The situation is very tense."

The semiautonomous ethnic Pashtun lands along the Afghan border are Pakistan's front line in the war on terrorism.

After U.S. and Afghan opposition forces ousted the Taliban in late 2001, many al-Qaeda militants fled to the area, which was awash in weapons. Taliban supporters among the Pashtun clans offered al-Qaeda a refuge.

Hundreds of people have been killed since late 2004 as Pakistani forces have been trying to clear foreign militants from the border area and subdue their Pakistani allies.

Government forces faced stiff resistance as they tried to remove the last of the rebels from Miran Shah on Monday, said a military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan.

Militants launched attacks and seized government buildings Saturday in Miran Shah in revenge for a government attack Wednesday that killed 45 fighters.

The toll from the first day of fighting rose from 46 to more than 100 militants as more detailed reports arrived, Sultan said. Two militants were killed Sunday.

Five troops were killed and two wounded over the three days, he said.

Thousands had left Miran Shah since last week's violence and the exodus was continuing Monday, said the resident, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals.

Violence targeting the U.S.-backed Afghan government and foreign troops has strained relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan. On Sunday, Musharraf derided Afghan accusations that the Taliban leader, Mohammad Omar, was in Pakistan.

A U.S. military spokesman in Afghanistan welcomed the Pakistani action in Waziristan.

"We see this as a very positive move," Col. Jim Yonts said. "This issue in Waziristan is an example that they are fighting the war on terrorism."

2 Leaders Trade Barbs Over Fight Against Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 6 — President Pervez Musharraf lashed out Monday at President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan for "bad-mouthing" Pakistan in recent weeks and casting doubt on its commitment to fight terrorism.

In a speech to Pakistani journalists in Rawalpindi that was broadcast on state television, Mr. Musharraf accused India of feeding false information to Afghan officials suggesting that the Pakistani intelligence agency was training terrorists.

He dismissed the allegation, and he described as "nonsense" a list of Taliban members, including the leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, who Mr. Karzai said were operating in Pakistan.

The comments, echoing a message Mr. Musharraf has delivered in recent interviews, point not just to a new low in relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan, but also to difficulties with the United States.

President Bush visited Afghanistan and Pakistan last week, and Mr. Musharraf said he had sought to discredit the Afghan allegations in his meeting with Mr. Bush.

"The bad-mouthing against Pakistan is a deliberate, articulated conspiracy," Mr. Musharraf said. The Karzai administration, after several years of careful diplomacy with Pakistan, has become increasingly outspoken as violence has increased, including suicide bombings, beheadings and roadside bombs. Mr. Karzai came to Islamabad two weeks ago, and handed over what he said were intelligence files on Taliban members and others who, he said, were operating in Pakistan.

Mr. Musharraf said much of that information was outdated or wrong. He said, for example, that Pakistani officials found "decent people" living at an address given for Mr. Omar.

DOJ_NMG_0016285

Mr. Musharraf faces increasing international pressure to stem the infiltration of insurgents into Afghanistan and to prevent the recruitment and training of suicide bombers, which the Afghans say takes place in Pakistan, Western diplomats said.

President Musharraf's spokesman, Maj. Gen. Sahukat Sultan, said fierce fighting against militants in North Waziristan over the weekend was proof of Pakistan's commitment. More than 100 people, including five soldiers, have been killed.

NATO Commander Downplays Afghan Insurgency Threat (REU-Y2)

By Will Dunham

Reuters, March 6, 2006

NATO's top commander said on Monday he doubted Taliban and al Qaeda forces were capable of posing a serious insurgent threat as the alliance expands its Afghanistan operations, calling narcotics the top worry.

NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe Gen. James Jones also said the 26-nation alliance remained 25 percent short of the troops and equipment envisioned for its rapid-reaction force, and expressed renewed doubt he will be able to declare it fully operational as planned on October 1.

U.S.-led forces in 2001 overthrew Afghanistan's Taliban rulers who had harbored the al Qaeda network responsible for the September 11 attacks, and 23,000 U.S. troops currently are targeting Taliban and al Qaeda forces.

A wave of suicide bombings in recent months has killed dozens of people, part of an intensified insurgency that has killed more than 1,500 people since the start of last year. It has been the bloodiest period since the Taliban's overthrow, and the U.S. military warned of stepped up militant activity this spring.

"I think they are remnants," Jones said of the Taliban and al Qaeda at a Pentagon briefing. "... And I think that the upticks in violence are, in part, attributable to the fact that we're actually going to more places and taking the engagement to the enemy."

"My take on the situation in Afghanistan is that the Taliban and al Qaeda are not in a position to where they can restart an insurgency of any size and major scope," said Jones, a U.S. Marine Corps general.

Afghanistan, he said, was "fighting some internal demons."

"And one is certainly the narcotics culture and the dependence of the economy on narcotics -- which, from my standpoint, is probably the most serious problem facing the restructuring and the new path that Afghanistan would like to go on."

HEADING SOUTH

NATO is preparing to expand its International Security Assistance Force mission -- already in the north, west and the capital Kabul -- to the more volatile south, going from 9,000 to 16,000 troops, and ultimately the east. Jones sees the southward expansion by July.

The State Department last week said opium production and trafficking make up a third of Afghanistan's economy. Afghanistan produces 90 percent of the world's opium poppies and is the largest heroin-producing and trafficking country.

Jones said concerted international action was needed.

"NATO's role in it is not to be an active participant, for example, in destroying crops and eradication. NATO does have a responsibility to be supportive and helpful, but in the more passive areas -- in other words, in the intelligence-gathering, oversight, overwatch, security," Jones said.

"Ninety percent of the harvest in Afghanistan is bought on the streets of Europe and translated back into supporting terrorist activities in Europe. So there's a real reason that we should all be concerned about this."

The NATO Response Force, proposed by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in 2002, was supposed to have 25,000 troops deployable to distant trouble spots with five days' notice.

"At this point, we have not generated the force in sufficient numbers for me to be comfortable with standing up here and saying we will be successful," Jones said. "... We have generated about 75 percent of the requirement. So we're about 25 percent short."

Jones said he was "hopeful" but added, "As of right now, if this were 1 October today, I would not be standing here saying that we're fully operationally capable."

Jones said last month NATO was scaling back the force's first major maneuvers set for June.

NATO Commander: Drug Trade Is The Greatest Threat To Afghanistan (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -The top military commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization said Monday that the narcotics trade poses a greater threat to Afghanistan than a rekindled insurgency by Taliban and al-Qaida fighters.

Marine Corps Gen. James Jones, NATO's supreme commander, said he doesn't think that Taliban and al-Qaida remnants can "restart an insurgency of any size or major scope," but that they're part of a "wider span of problems" that includes the opium trade and rampant criminality.

Last week, however, Defense Intelligence Agency chief Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples said that attacks by Taliban and al-Qaida forces had increased by 20 percent in the last year.

Maples told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the insurgents represent a greater threat to Afghanistan now "than at any point since 2001," when U.S. troops and Afghan Northern Alliance rebels ousted the fundamentalist Taliban regime.

A total of 129 soldiers from the United States and its allies died in Afghanistan last year, more coalition deaths than in any other year since the Taliban were ousted in 2001, according to icasualties.org, a Web site that tracks U.S. and allied casualties. Of those, 99 were Americans. Those fatalities included combat deaths and deaths resulting from accidents and other non-combat related causes.

Jones said Monday that a 20 percent increase in attacks "is statistically not very significant" because the average number of daily attacks by Taliban and al-Qaida fighters had been "quite low."

"I don't think we're heading towards a revitalized insurgency," Jones told reporters at the Pentagon. "And I think that the upticks in violence are in part attributable to the fact that we're actually going to more places and taking the engagement to the enemy."

About 21,000 NATO troops from 36 countries are preparing to take over stability and security operations in southern and eastern Afghanistan in coming months. NATO will very likely take over stability operations throughout Afghanistan by the end of 2006, Jones said.

Some U.S. troops will be included in the NATO force, but that number hasn't been determined. Most U.S. troops, however, will concentrate on areas in eastern Afghanistan along the Pakistan border, where Taliban, al-Qaida and other anti-government groups remain active and where Osama bin Laden is believed to be hiding. Those soldiers will operate under a separate authority that reports to U.S. Central Command. There currently are about 23,000 U.S. troops in the country.

Jones said NATO's primary mission will be to assist in extending the authority of Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government across the country. Much of Afghanistan has never known central government rule and has been under the sway of powerful warlords since the Taliban's ouster.

Many of those figures are close U.S. allies, but some are believed to have profited immensely from the opium trade, which was nearly wiped out by the Taliban, but has exploded since its collapse. U.S. intelligence officials believe the Taliban, al-Qaida and other anti-government groups are financing their insurgency in part through the narcotics trade.

Karzai's government undertook an opium eradication program in 2004, and last year Afghanistan experienced a 21 percent decline in land devoted to poppy cultivation, the first since 2001. But opium production is likely to rise again this year, according to a U.N. report issued Monday.

The U.N. report, based on a survey carried out in December and January, said poppy cultivation is increasing in 13 Afghan provinces, remaining the same in 16 and decreasing in three.

Despite last year's decrease in overall land devoted to poppies, good weather and a low incidence of plant disease yielded a bumper crop of opium, the U.N. reported in November.

Last year, Afghanistan produced an estimated 4,100 tons of opium, the main ingredient in heroin, about 87 percent of the world's supply, the U.N. reported.

Most of the resulting heroin ended up in Europe, which is partly why NATO member countries have a keen interest in the Afghanistan mission, Jones said. He said that NATO troops won't participate directly in eradication, but will provide intelligence-gathering and surveillance.

DOJ_NMG_0016287

NATO Shrugs Off Afghan Violence (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

NATO's supreme allied commander downplayed yesterday press reports of a rejuvenated insurgency in Afghanistan, saying some of the violence stems from the drug trade and simple criminality, and not attacks by the ousted Taliban or al Qaeda.

"My take on the situation in Afghanistan is that the Taliban and al Qaeda are not in a position to where they can restart an insurgency of any size and major scope," said Marine Corps Gen. James Jones, whose NATO command is scheduled to take over the Afghanistan military and reconstruction mission later this year.

"Afghanistan is on the way to recovery, but is also fighting some internal demons," he said.

Since U.S.-led forces routed the harsh Taliban regime in December 2001, Afghanistan has held two nearly violence-free national elections that selected President Hamid Karzai and a new parliament. Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden planned the September 11, 2001, attacks from Afghanistan, where he built an army, terror training camps and a finance network.

Last year, there was an uptick in attacks as new Taliban and al Qaeda recruits organized in neighboring Pakistan and slipped across the border to Afghanistan to plant deadly improvised explosive devices and ambush security patrols.

Still, Afghanistan is far more peaceful than Iraq, the site of another al Qaeda-fed insurgency. And Gen. Jones seemed to signal that the Taliban-al Qaeda alliance is short-lived. He said one reason attacks are up percentagewise is that there were so few in 2004 that any increase seems significant.

He also said the emerging Afghan army is now operating in places it dare not go to a few years ago. "So the hiding places and the areas that were previously off-limits are now not off-limits," he said.

Gen. Jones has a keen interest in Afghanistan, even though it falls within the operational responsibility of U.S. Central Command, led by Army Gen. John Abizaid.

A major component in Afghanistan is NATO's International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), a group of European security forces who are training the Afghans, reconstructing public services, running the international airport and conducting counterinsurgency missions.

The ISAF is slated to take over the military mission, providing NATO with its first combat operation command far outside its traditional boundaries.

"At the end of the day, when ISAF takes over in Afghanistan, it will be roughly a 21,000-man force from 36 different nations," Gen. Jones said. There are 10,000 ISAF troops and 20,000 U.S. forces in Afghanistan. More than doubling the ISAF presence could mean that some of the U.S. troops will come home.

Central Command will continue to head the offensive counterterrorism mission, which includes the hunt for bin Laden, who is thought to be in the tribal areas of western Pakistan.

Defense and congressional officials say Afghanistan will not become a fully stable democracy until it rids itself of an embedded opium and heroin trade that corrupts the government and finances the insurgency.

Afghan Threat Played Down (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The commander of NATO forces said yesterday that rising attacks in Afghanistan will test NATO troops as the alliance expands into volatile southern regions of the country this summer, but he stressed that al-Qaeda and Taliban rebels lack the ability to reignite a major insurgency.

Marine Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, played down an increase in violence more than four years after the U.S.-led military campaign ousted the Taliban from power in 2001. He said remnants of al-Qaeda and the Taliban in pockets of the country cannot "restart an insurgency of any size and major scope."

Instead, Jones cited the growing cultivation and trade of opium poppies as the "most serious problem" facing the central Asian nation today. A field survey released yesterday by the Afghan government and the United Nations predicted an increase in poppy cultivation in 2006 in 13 provinces and a decrease in three, with 16 others remaining unchanged.

DOJ_NMG_0016288

"Afghanistan is on the way to recovery but is also fighting some internal demons. And one is certainly the narcotics culture and the dependence of the economy on narcotics," Jones said at a Pentagon news briefing. He said the military will play a supporting role in counternarcotics efforts, supplying intelligence and security while the Afghan government takes the lead in destroying crops.

Jones's assessment of the Afghan insurgency differed slightly in tone from that given last week by a senior military intelligence official. Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, testified before the Senate that "the Taliban-dominated insurgency remains capable and resilient." Attacks by the Taliban and other "anti-coalition" groups had increased by 20 percent in 2005, he said, including more suicide bombings and a doubling of strikes by improvised explosive devices.

"We judge that the insurgency appears emboldened by perceived tactical successes and will be active this spring," Maples said.

Jones also said violence is likely to grow this spring -- often a time of insurgent offensives in Afghanistan. "I think you're going to see more testing, more attacks," he said. "NATO, when it comes into the southern part, will be tested."

NATO plans by July to expand its military presence from the north and west and send several thousand more troops into the former Taliban stronghold of southern Afghanistan. That will leave the main mission of U.S. military forces as the eastern region along the Pakistan border, where much of the fighting takes place. Ultimately, Jones said, a 21,000-strong force from the 26 NATO member states and 10 other countries will assume the overall security mission in Afghanistan, although the U.S. military will continue to lead counter-terrorist operations under a distinct chain of command.

US Envoy Vows Commitment To Calm Afghan Fears (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

Ronald Neumann, the US ambassador to Afghanistan, said America's commitment to Afghanistan would not be compromised when Nato troops take command of the country's restive south later this year.

Mr Neumann said the US was the lead nation in Nato and the success of the Nato mission in southern Afghanistan had ramifications far beyond the country's borders. "This is the biggest mission Nato has taken on and it is a defining opportunity for the future of Nato," he said in an interview with the Financial Times.

His comments follow President George W. Bush's unscheduled stopover in Afghanistan last Wednesday on his way to India and Pakistan, where he reaffirmed US commitment to the war-torn nation.

Canada will take over command of the fight against the insurgency in southern Afghanistan as 6,000 British, Dutch and other Nato troops are deployed across the region in coming months.

Mr Neumann's remarks come as Afghan officials become increasingly nervous that the withdrawal of about 3,000 US troops after the handover to Nato command will signal to the Taliban that American forces are gradually pulling out of the country.

"Troops from the Dutch, the Romanians, the Canadian and the British may be very good, but their differing missions will result in confusion that militants will be able to exploit," a top Af-ghan government official said. With escalating tensions between Afghanistan and Pakistan, where Afghan intelligence officials believe militants are training and picking up supplies before launching attacks in Afghanistan, a major US troop presence is seen as a deterrent.

"Our neighbours have a history of hostile interference in Afghanistan, and only the US is strong enough to act as a bulwark against them," the Afghan official added.

Mr Neumann said the US would remain the lead nation of Nato and continue to provide air and logistical support, and troops in southern Afghanistan as well as leading the fight against the Taliban in the east.

"It is not acceptable for us to go away. We are a part of Nato," he said ahead of a meeting in Washington to discuss the details of a long-term strategic partnership between Afghanistan and the US later this month.

US training of the Afghan national army would also continue.

DOJ_NMG_0016289

Mr Neumann said it would ensure a sizeable US presence across the country. "The idea that we would leave those people out there on their own without support is a political fallacy."

Fewer Troops Desert Since 9/11 (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — At least 8,000 members of the all-volunteer U.S. military have deserted since the Iraq war began, Pentagon records show, although the overall desertion rate has plunged since the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

Since fall 2003, 4,387 Army soldiers, 3,454 Navy sailors and 82 Air Force personnel have deserted. The Marine Corps does not track the number of desertions each year but listed 1,455 Marines in desertion status last September, the end of fiscal 2005, says Capt. Jay Delarosa, a Marine Corps spokesman.

Desertion records are kept by fiscal year, so there are no figures from the beginning of the war in March 2003 until that fall.

Some lawyers who represent deserters say the war in Iraq is driving more soldiers to question their service and that the Pentagon is cracking down on deserters to discourage anti-war sentiment.

"The last thing (Pentagon officials) want is for people to think … that this is like Vietnam," says Tod Ensign, head of Citizen Soldier, an anti-war group that offers legal aid to deserters.

Desertion numbers have dropped since 9/11. The Army, Navy and Air Force reported 7,978 desertions in 2001, compared with 3,456 in 2005. The Marines showed 1,603 deserters in 2001. That declined by 148 in 2005.

The desertion rate was much higher during the Vietnam era. The Army saw a high of 33,094 deserters in 1971 — 3.4% of the Army force. But there was a draft and the active-duty force was 2.7 million.

Desertions in 2005 represent 0.24% of the 1.4 million U.S. forces.

Opposition to the war prompts a small fraction of desertions, says Army spokeswoman Maj. Elizabeth Robbins. "People always desert, and most do it because they don't adapt well to the military," she says. The majority of desertions happen inside the USA, Robbins says. There is only one known case of desertion in Iraq.

Most deserters return without coercion. Commander Randy Lescault, spokesman for the Naval Personnel Command, says that between 2001 and 2005, 58% of Navy deserters walked back in. Of the rest, most are apprehended during traffic stops.

Penalties range from other-than-honorable discharges to death for desertion during wartime.

Decades Later, Marines Hunt Vietnam-era Deserters (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the summer of 1965, Marine Cpl. Jerry Texiero quietly disappeared from his California base, plagued by personal demons and a mounting opposition to the Vietnam War.

Forty years later, in the summer of 2005, Texiero — now known as Gerome Conti — was taken into custody by police in Tarpon Springs, Fla., after the Marine Corps tracked him down.

Three decades after the war ended, hundreds of Vietnam-era deserters are still on the loose. Conti's attorneys, Louis Font and Tod Ensign, say the Pentagon, and the Marine Corps in particular, are cracking down on long-term cases in an effort to warn current-day troops in Iraq against deserting.

"My view is that the Marines are trying to send a message to people in the ranks today that they, too, will be required to participate in a war, whether they think it's illegal or immoral," Font says.

Marine spokesman Capt. Jay Delarosa says there was nothing unusual about the treatment of Conti.

However, the Marine official in charge of bringing in deserters said after Conti's arrest that his office was being more aggressive.

Chief Warrant Officer James Averhart, who has commanded the Marine Corps Absentee Collection Center since September 2004, told the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times that he had ordered cold cases reopened and that his squad had caught 27 deserters in his first 11 months on the job, a rate he suggested was higher than those of his predecessors. The Corps last month updated that number to 33 cases.

DOJ_NMG_0016290

"I have a different leadership style than the guys who have had this job. My job is to catch deserters. And that's what I do," Averhart told the newspaper.

Delarosa said Averhart would not answer questions from USA TODAY. Asked whether the Marine Corps stands by Averhart's comments, Delarosa said, "I wasn't involved in that particular interview with CWO Averhart." He added that the Marine Corps has "discouraged most requests for interviews because CWO Averhart has been frequently misquoted."

Will Van Sant, who wrote the Times article, says the Marines never contacted him after it appeared.

Conti, 65, says he was surprised. "I thought they couldn't possibly be looking for me anymore. I would think they would have stopped looking for anybody who had been gone as long as I had."

Conti was held for five months — four in solitary confinement — then given an other-than-honorable discharge in January. If he had been court-martialed and convicted, he could have faced three years in the brig and a dishonorable discharge.

Another long-term Marine deserter, Ernest "Buck" McQueen, was arrested in Fort Worth in January. McQueen was Ernest Johnson Jr. when he left Camp Lejeune, N.C., in November 1969 because of concerns about going to Vietnam. McQueen, 55, was discharged without disciplinary action.

McQueen says he didn't take a new name to hide. His Social Security card says "McQueen." He says he was born Ernest Johnson Jr., but when his biological father left, his mother raised her son by her married name, McQueen. When he joined the Marines, he says, they insisted he go by Ernest Johnson Jr.

The government drafted men for the armed forces during wartime from the Civil War until 1973. Conti and McQueen enlisted.

In 1974, President Ford offered clemency to Vietnam draft resisters and deserters. Only 27,000 of 350,000 eligible applied. The offer expired on April 1, 1975. In 1977, President Carter pardoned those who dodged the war by not registering or fleeing the country. Neither Conti nor McQueen applied for the Ford pardon. Both spent decades hiding their past from families and employers. McQueen kept his military experience from two wives and two children, and even Conti's best friend in Florida, Elaine Smith, knew nothing of his history with the Marines.

McQueen says he had been in the Marines for nearly two years when he learned of the My Lai massacre in 1968, when hundreds of Vietnamese civilians were killed by U.S. soldiers. "I saw photos of guys with ears on their chains. I lost my desire to be a part of it."

Conti says his decision to desert was a combination of lingering emotional scars from a childhood lived in foster homes and concerns about stories he also was hearing about Vietnam.

Special Agent Tom Lorang of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations (OSI) says most older desertion cases are filed away after an initial investigation is completed, although some are re-examined.

Except for the Marine Corps, military officials say long-term cases normally are closed when deserters voluntarily come back in or are stopped by civilian law officials, not through efforts to track them down.

That's not Conti's or McQueen's story. Conti says he was told his file was reopened and his fingerprints were run through a national database. He was in the database because he had been convicted of fraud and theft in 1998. He was on probation and paying restitution when the Marines caught up with him.

McQueen, a carpenter, says his former brother-in-law was called by Marine investigators, and he told them where to find him. "This kind of … put me in a financial bind," says McQueen, who had been doing carpentry for a church when he was seized.

Conti has returned to his job selling boats, which his employer kept open for him while he was locked up.

"They just need to declare amnesty for everybody from a certain time back or from certain conflicts," says Elaine Smith, Conti's friend. "These guys … just had issues, as we all did back in the '60s."

Military officials maintain that those who deserted the service are liable under law, no matter how unpopular a war was. "We actively investigate all cases of desertion," says Fred Hall, a spokesman for the Naval Personnel Command. "For each of the active deserters we have on our rolls — 1,190 as of 31 Jan. '06 — there is a federal warrant out for their arrest."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ_NMG_0016291

Lawyer Defends Skilling's Enron Comment As Sarcasm (REU)

By Matt Daily

Reuters, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON (Reuters) - Former Enron Corp. CEO Jeffrey Skilling was using sarcasm when he told several top executives in 2001 "they're on to us," his lawyer suggested on Monday at the trial of Skilling and ex-CEO Ken Lay.

The lawyer, Mark Holscher, sought to sow doubts about the comment that a witness, former executive Kevin Hannon, told the jury last week he heard Skilling say in reaction to a May 2001 analyst report that was sharply critical of Enron.

Hannon had said he took Skilling's comment at the meeting to mean that investors were "starting to understand how Enron made money," and appeared to link Skilling to efforts to cover up the decaying state of Enron's finances.

"Can you tell this jury whether (Skilling's voice) was dripping with sarcasm when he said 'they're onto us?'" Holscher asked Hannon.

"Anything's possible," replied Hannon in the clipped manner he used throughout the day's cross examination. Hannon was formerly chief operating officer of Enron's Internet unit Enron Broadband Services.

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, are on trial for conspiracy and fraud charges linked to the collapse of Enron into bankruptcy in December 2001.

That filing, the largest U.S. bankruptcy until then, was the first of a wave of corporate scandals that rocked Wall Street and prompted tighter financial disclosure laws.

Skilling also faces insider trading charges.

Hannon, 45, is the latest in a string of former top Enron executives to testify against Lay and Skilling. Hannon has pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities and wire fraud and could face up to five years in prison -- a sentence that could be reduced by helping prosecutors.

All attention on Tuesday will be focused on the prosecutors' star witness, Andrew Fastow, the company's former chief financial officer who operated the off-balance-sheet partnerships the company used to hide billions of dollars in debt while inflating earnings.

Lay and Skilling have blamed Fastow and his theft of tens of millions of dollars from his illicit side deals as the cause of a "run on the bank" that lead to the company's demise.

Fastow, 44, pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and will forfeit nearly $24 million and spend 10 years in prison. His wife, Lea, served a one-year sentence in jail for filing a false tax return in a case that was an outcropping of his.

Fastow arrived at the federal courthouse in downtown Houston on Monday morning and had to be ushered by marshals through a horde of photographers awaiting his appearance. He remained behind closed doors inside the courthouse, awaiting the end of Hannon's time on the witness stand.

Star Witness Fastow To Take Stage Today (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON — Finally, four years after Enron's spectacular collapse, the moment everyone's been waiting for has arrived: Andrew Fastow, the company's disgraced former chief financial officer, is expected to tell his side of the story in court here today.

While the government's trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has been going on for more than five weeks, testimony from the first 10 witnesses has focused largely on the abysmal financial condition of two business units — Enron Broadband Services and Enron Energy Services. Several have said that Lay and Skilling made misleading statements about the units to the investing public.

But with Fastow, who pleaded guilty to two felonies, prosecutors are expected to zero in on what Lay and Skilling knew about the overall financial condition of Enron, and when they knew it. More than any other witness so far, the former CFO was in a position to know whether the defendants — particularly Skilling — were lying to investors or simply painting an optimistic, and legal, picture of Enron in 2000 and 2001.

Enron collapsed in fall 2001 after the public learned it met earnings targets by selling assets to private partnerships controlled by Fastow. That shook investor confidence, but when they also learned that Fastow had diverted more than $30 million from those transactions into his own pocket, people were outraged.

With Lay and Skilling, he was vilified as a symbol of executive greed. Unlike Lay and Skilling, who vocally defended themselves even before they were indicted, Fastow has been silent the past four years. So excitement surrounds what he'll say in court this week.

"We're about to find out if he operated with a wink and a nod with Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling," says Philip Hilder, a Houston attorney who represents Enron internal whistle-blower Sherron Watkins and several other former employees.

But Hilder doesn't think Fastow's testimony will be explosive. "Andy Fastow is a single witness, but I don't think he's a make-it-or-break-it witness," he says. "The government has been putting on a steady stream of witnesses that corroborate the actions Fastow will talk about."

In fact, the prosecution should keep its questioning of Fastow narrowly focused on conversations with Skilling and Lay, says law professor John Coffee at Columbia University. "I don't think they'll let Mr. Fastow get anywhere near the exotic accounting techniques used by Enron," he says. "From the prosecution standpoint, they don't want him to be Hamlet, the brooding prince of Denmark. They want him to be Rosencrantz or Guildenstern, just a minor character."

Fastow Looms Large At Enron Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON, March 6 -- For five weeks, the shadow of former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow has hovered over the fraud trial of his onetime bosses.

Jurors have heard lawyers for former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling and chairman Kenneth L. Lay denounce Fastow for "stealing Enron's good name." They caught a glimpse of Fastow promoting secretive business partnerships that enriched him by more than $45 million at the company's expense. And they listened last week to testimony that Fastow called the structures "a good deal for me" in the presence of both defendants, leaving Enron employees at that meeting in a "stunned silence."

As early as Tuesday, Fastow will take center stage as the trial's most highly anticipated witness -- and one of its most unpredictable. His presence is expected to electrify the federal courthouse here, where court officials are preparing for an onslaught of bystanders eager to hear Fastow speak publicly for the first time since his January 2004 guilty plea.

Both the Justice Department's Enron Task Force and the defense team have plenty of reasons to fear Fastow and the impact of his testimony. Government lawyers have signaled that they hope to limit their questioning to a day or less, given the liabilities he brings with him -- admissions that he improperly pocketed millions of dollars during his tenure. Defense lawyers intend to keep him on the witness stand for days trying to tear apart his account.

On one point, however, both sides agree: Fastow, 44, remains the most elusive and demonized character in a story that has come to symbolize an era of corporate malfeasance.

To hear former Enron employees tell it, Fastow is far from likable. Under hostile fire at Enron, Fastow did not hesitate to wield his power to cow subordinates and bully investment bankers. The son of a New Jersey salesman, he exuded confidence in his own abilities and punished analysts who dared to cross him. Fastow and the prosecutors will probably try to keep that side of his personality off display.

But defense lawyers must walk a fine line as they seek to discredit Fastow as a liar and a thief. For years, he was the company's go-to man, an award-winning finance chief lauded for his ability to devise clever financial structures. Top executives compensated him handsomely, they said later, because they feared he might defect.

Skilling handpicked Fastow to ascend to the job of chief financial officer, took him on motorcycle races and vested him with tremendous responsibility. Lay insisted for months that Fastow had his "complete confidence" during warnings about his behavior, only to fire him abruptly in late October 2001 after reporters and analysts requested information about his private partnerships.

DOJ_NMG_0016293

If Fastow was motivated by greed and the desire for validation, Enron's leaders and its board of directors did little to rein him in. According to congressional testimony, no one at Enron bothered to inquire exactly how much Fastow was making from the deals, which helped the company generate cash flow and move billions of dollars in underperforming assets off its books. When the answer finally came in the fall of 2001, then-board member Charles A. LeMaistre jotted down the word "incredible" on his notepad. Within days, Fastow was gone.

After Enron filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001 and investigators pounced, Fastow's lawyer at the time took the unusual step of holding a news conference to quash rumors that Fastow had fled to Israel. Fastow steadfastly denied requests to testify before Congress and other investigative bodies, telling lawyers for the company's board the following January that he acted to help Enron and did nothing without the approval of his superiors, accountants and lawyers.

But a former colleague, Jordan Mintz, later told investigators that Fastow had said Skilling would fire him if the chief executive knew the scale of Fastow's profit from the partnerships.

People close to Fastow say he is furious about attempts to portray him as the fall guy for Enron's collapse. The company's downfall carried powerful consequences not only for Fastow, whose black hair has since turned gray, but also for his family.

His wife, Lea W. Fastow, heiress to a Texas real estate and grocery fortune, emerged from a halfway house in July. She spent most of her one-year sentence in an 8-by-10-foot cell in downtown Houston's Federal Detention Center alongside drug offenders and women awaiting trial on violent crime charges. She pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor tax count for failing to report $141,000 in income from her husband's partnerships. At the time of her plea, she told the judge she was taking prescription drugs often used to treat depression and anxiety.

Andrew S. Fastow pleaded guilty to two conspiracy charges that will send him to prison for 10 years -- agreeing to the deal only when his wife was on the verge of heading to trial. Their sons, Jeffrey and Michael, will be in high school and college by the time Fastow returns from prison. Because parole has been abolished in the federal system, Fastow must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence -- more than eight years.

Fastow's lawyer, David Gerger, declined to comment, as did many of Fastow's friends. Fastow mostly has been keeping out of the public eye, working with government lawyers to decode Enron's byzantine accounting practices. He occasionally walks through a local park and dines with his family at local restaurants in the neighborhood surrounding Rice University, near the city's finest museums and his immaculately maintained, ivy-covered home assessed at $690,000 in 2003.

As part of his deal with the government, Fastow turned over $24 million in cash and assets, including his unfinished $3.4 million dream house in another tony Houston neighborhood, waterfront property in Galveston, Tex., and 68 acres in Norwich, Vt.

Prosecutors sandwiched Fastow in the middle of their case in a strategic attempt not to leave jurors with any lasting, negative impressions. The witness scheduled to follow Fastow on the stand is Chris Loehr, a young analyst trainee who went to work for the Fastow-operated partnership LJM, named after the first initials of Fastow's wife and two sons. Loehr has never been charged with a crime, and he has cooperated with investigators for nearly four years -- making him a more difficult target for defense lawyers to sully. Former Enron treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr., who is serving a five-year prison sentence for his work on some of the partnerships, also will testify for the government.

Lawyer For Scrushy Sees Skilling, Lay As 'doomed' (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON — As if former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling don't have enough to worry about with the government's star witness expected to begin testifying against them today, a prominent defense lawyer who helped win an acquittal for another embattled CEO says the two men are already toast, at least in the courtroom.

Donald Watkins, a civil rights lawyer and businessman who last year helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy beat charges that he masterminded a $2.7 billion fraud, said in an interview Friday that Lay and Skilling are "doomed."

"There comes a time when you can forecast the outcome of a contest," said Watkins, who has not attended the trial but has followed it closely in the media. "In this contest, these guys have lost."

DOJ_NMG_0016294

The reason, according to Watkins, is that the two men settled on the wrong defense strategy. In their opening arguments, lawyers for the two men told the jury that Enron was a solid company done in by a loss of confidence among investors and trading partners after the disclosure that former chief financial officer Andrew Fastow had diverted tens of millions of dollars into his own pocket.

Watkins says this defense — that Enron was fundamentally a healthy company — is a non-starter. "Nobody's going to buy that," he says. Further, the tactics used so far by the defense — vigorous cross-examinations of cooperating witnesses who have already pleaded guilty — "lacks imagination."

"These types of trials involve not only legal issues, but political and social issues. You have to address all of that. They have ignored the political and social angles. When you do that, you lose every time. They never put the government on trial."

"Lay and Skilling are the poster boys for Sarbanes-Oxley," says Watkins, referring to the law passed after the exposure of accounting problems drove Enron and WorldCom into bankruptcy. "They're part of a Justice Department campaign to clean up accounting in Corporate America. The defense is treating it like it is a regular white-collar criminal case."

Watkins says the Lay-Skilling defense would have been better off putting the government itself on trial, digging into the process by which prosecutors built their case. In the Scrushy trial last year in Birmingham, Ala., Watkins and his legal team challenged the prosecution at every turn, forcing the government to put FBI agents on the stand to testify about how secret recordings of the defendant were made and handled.

"There are certain things that resonate with jurors," Watkins says. "They will not tolerate government misconduct, period. Every juror scans the courtroom and wonders privately, 'If I were sitting there, would they be coming after me, too?' You have to address these thoughts and make them think, 'Yes, they would steamroll me, too.' "

Lay's attorney, Mike Ramsey, respectfully disagreed with Watkins, saying, "It's very hard to handicap a case without being in the middle of it." But he did concede that so far, at least, "There have not been a lot of over-the-top attacks on people in the courtroom."

But after five weeks, Ramsey says, "I'm very happy with the position we're in right now. It's hard to know in the middle of a fight, in the fog of battle, whether you're winning. We're probably in better shape now than we thought."

As for the prosecution, Watkins says it is doing a good job pacing the trial. For the first two weeks, jurors listened to testimony from Mark Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations. Koenig, who pleaded guilty to one count of aiding and abetting securities fraud, was a minor player in the fraud that Lay and Skilling are alleged to have covered up at Enron, but he came across as credible and set the table for a number of issues that subsequent witnesses addressed.

Since Koenig stepped down, nine others have testified about accounting problems at Enron or other related issues. Today, prosecutors will call Fastow, and he is expected to implicate Lay and Skilling in the conspiracy to prop up Enron's earnings.

"In Scrushy's case, the government couldn't wait to trot out their big cooperators," Watkins says. The Enron prosecutors brought out "their more credible witnesses first" and put their biggest witness in a position where the entire case doesn't ride on his credibility.

According to Watkins' rules for managing white-collar criminal cases, there is some hope. In the Scrushy trial, the primary defense lawyer, Jim Parkman, emerged as a folksy, likable character who frequently got jurors and the judge to laugh.

"If the jury is not laughing with you, you are losing," Watkins says. In the Scrushy trial, "They bonded with Parkman. I have never seen jurors convict a defendant when they're laughing with a defendant. If there's no smiles, no laughter, those guys are doomed."

That's good news for Skilling. His lead attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, has emerged as the star of the trial, cracking up jurors with unscripted remarks and amusing U.S. District Judge Sim Lake with lively banter.

As for Watkins, Ramsey suggested he travel to Houston this week "to watch us work over Mr. Fastow."

DaimlerChrysler Suspends Employees In Bribery Inquiry (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016295

FRANKFURT, March 6 — DaimlerChrysler has dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal investigation uncovered evidence that its executives paid bribes in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

In a report filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said it had "determined that improper payments were made in a number of jurisdictions." The payments, it said, could violate both German law and the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in the United States.

The Justice Department and the S.E.C. have been investigating accusations of bribery at DaimlerChrysler since last year. The company has cooperated with the investigations, and these latest disclosures shed more light on the far-flung corruption inquiry.

The filing, however, does not answer a crucial question: whether senior Mercedes managers knew about the payments. It does not identify the countries where bribes were paid, or say how many people were involved.

A spokesman for DaimlerChrysler, Thomas Fröhlich, declined to comment beyond the facts in the filing. But he said, "Dieter Zetsche and Bodo Uebber are keen to take action on this."

Mr. Zetsche is DaimlerChrysler's chief executive, and Mr. Uebber is the chief financial officer.

Last October, a report on the United Nations oil-for-food scandal said DaimlerChrysler paid a kickback of 6,950 euros ($8,372) to Iraqi officials in return for a contract from the government of Saddam Hussein. The Justice Department and the S.E.C. are investigating this as well.

Bribery of foreign officials used to be fairly common in the auto industry. As recently as 1997, bribes paid to foreigners by German companies were tax-deductible in Germany. Now, foreign corruption is illegal in the European Union, as it is in the United States.

The investigation is a distraction for Mr. Zetsche, as he begins to turn around the company's flagship Mercedes-Benz division. The brand has been tarnished by quality problems in recent years, but sales of the Mercedes car group rose 16 percent in February, the company said Monday.

DaimlerChrysler painted an optimistic picture of sales at Mercedes and Chrysler, as both divisions roll out new models. It warned, however, that sales at its truck division would suffer because of a downturn in the market and stricter emissions standards in the United States and Japan.

With DaimlerChrysler's performance improving, analysts have not paid much attention to the scandal. They prefer to focus on other issues, like DaimlerChrysler's effort to fix its ailing Smart minicar division. Mercedes will also update the design of its best-selling E-class sedan this year.

"The make or break for Mercedes will be the face-lift of the E-class," said Arndt Ellinghorst, an analyst at Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein, adding, "I have confidence in Dieter Zetsche."

Still, the bribery payments took a bite out of DaimlerChrysler's bottom line. It said it reduced its 2005 operating profit by 16 million euros ($17.2 million) and its net income by 64 million euros ($76.8 million).

To reflect improper payments made from 1994 to 2002, DaimlerChrysler said it had reduced the balance of stockholders' equity, as of Jan. 1, 2003, by 222 million euros ($266 million).

DaimlerChrysler's practices came to light in 2004 in a lawsuit filed by a former Chrysler accountant, David J. Bazzetta, who said the company had maintained secret bank accounts to bribe foreign government officials. Mr. Bazzetta sued after being fired from his job.

In its filing, DaimlerChrysler said it had set up a global compliance organization to review its policies and practices.

"We have initiated improvements in our business processes as well as in compliance, control and training activities in order to foster a culture defined by openness and honesty," the company said.

DaimlerChrysler Finds Improper Payments (AP)

By MATT MOORE, AP BUSINESS WRITER

AP, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016296

FRANKFURT, Germany -- Automaker DaimlerChrysler AG said Monday that an internal investigation of bribery claims found evidence of "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. It said several employees had been dismissed or suspended.

The company disclosed the findings in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on Monday.

The German-American automaker is still under investigation by the SEC and the Department of Justice over whether it violated U.S. anti-bribery laws.

"We have determined that improper payments were made in a number of jurisdictions, primarily in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe," the company said in its filing. "These payments raise concerns under the U.S. FCPA, German law, and the laws of other jurisdictions."

"In connection with our internal investigation, we have identified and self-reported potential tax liabilities to tax authorities in several jurisdictions," it added. "These tax liabilities of DaimlerChrysler AG and certain foreign affiliates result from misclassifications of, or the failure to record, commissions and other payments and expenses."

The filing did not specify how many employees were dismissed or suspended, and did not identify them.

The U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act prohibits the payment of bribes to foreign officials.

DaimlerChrysler disclosed the investigation last year in a similar filing with the SEC.

The U.S. Justice Department said in August 2005 that it was investigating whether DaimlerChrysler had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations.

That criminal investigation is tied to an inquiry opened in 2004 by the SEC after an employee fired by the automaker said he was dismissed for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials.

DaimlerChrysler said then, and reiterated Monday, that it was cooperating with the investigations, sharing with both agencies information from its internal probe.

Company spokesman Thomas Froehlich told The Associated Press that both Chief Executive Dieter Zetsche and Chief Financial Officer Bodo Uebber had taken steps to ensure the company operates in a transparent and ethical manner.

"(They) are very much committed to taking action," he said.

The filing also said that because of the bribery claims, the company "recognized charges in our 2005 consolidated statement of income to correct misstatements relating to the years 2003 and 2004 which had the effect of reducing 2005 operating profit by 16 million euros and reducing 2005 net income by 64 million euros."

$1.5 Trillion Of Debt (WSJ)

By Peter J. Wallison

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

The Rudman Report on Fannie Mae recites facts eerily similar to what we now know about Enron. According to the report, the CFO of Fannie misled the board (and possibly the CEO) about the financial position of the company. The CEO, head of the corporate governance committee of the powerful Business Roundtable, regularly misled Wall Street and the board, but may not have understood the accounting. The auditors (this time not Arthur Andersen) failed to stand up to the management or didn't understand what was happening. The board, primarily made up of independent directors, and the audit committee, made up entirely of independent directors, were unable to penetrate the scam and remained clueless as earnings were manipulated. In Fannie's case there was also a regulator, but the regulator did not begin to look into any problems until it had been surprised by similar wrongdoing at Fannie's smaller sibling, Freddie Mac.

What we should learn from this -- much of which occurred after the adoption of Sarbanes-Oxley -- is that a board made up primarily of independent directors, an audit committee made up entirely of independent directors, a Big Four accounting firm alerted to the dangers of accounting fraud, and a regulator that claimed to be fully on top of what was happening, could not prevent senior management from fudging the accounting and misleading the board and investors. No surprise there. Many observers were saying, both before and after the enactment of SOX, that a management determined to defraud or mislead could evade the scrutiny of all the gatekeepers.

DOJ_NMG_0016297

This has important implications for the legislation now before Congress to reform the regulation of Fannie and Freddie and limit the size of their portfolios. Since dishonesty and incompetence are an unavoidable fact of life, and gatekeepers are unreliable, investors must protect themselves by diversifying their investments. But there is good reason to believe that diversification would not be available if dishonesty or incompetence at Fannie or Freddie in the future resulted in the collapse or financial incapacity of either.

Fannie and Freddie are not ordinary companies. They have almost $1.5 trillion of debt outstanding, which they borrowed to buy and carry portfolios of mortgages and mortgage-backed securities; these portfolios expose both companies to enormous interest-rate and prepayment risk. To hedge this risk, Fannie and Freddie are parties to derivatives transactions with notional values in the trillions, in which the counterparties are some of the largest financial institutions; any failure of Fannie or Freddie to meet its obligations would expose these institutions to substantial losses. Fannie and Freddie debt is also held widely by banks and other financial institutions, in some cases accounting for more than 100% of their capital; a decline in the value of that debt would seriously weaken these organizations and reduce their capacity to lend.

Finally, both companies are central to the real-estate financing market. If either of them could not function normally, that market -- amounting to almost a third of the economy -- would freeze up. As Alan Greenspan has pointed out for years, the risks inherent in the portfolios carried by Fannie and Freddie add up to huge systemic risk -- the danger that a failure at either company will spread to the economy as a whole.

So here is the key difference between Enron and either Fannie or Freddie. Dishonesty or incompetence in Enron's management hurt shareholders and employees, both of whom could have protected themselves through diversification of investments. Dishonesty or incompetence in Fannie's or Freddie's managements could throw the economy into chaos, and from that catastrophe diversification provides no shelter. Faith in boards, audit committees, auditors and even regulators has been shown to be misplaced. Sure, Congress would likely come in and bail them out -- but immediately, without extended debate, and with trillions of taxpayer dollars potentially at risk? Not a chance. And the damage in the meantime would be devastating.

As reform legislation languishes in the Senate, Congress should consider the lessons of Enron, Fannie and Freddie: Despite our best efforts, error and fraud will occur. That's why it's important to make sure -- by reducing the size of Fannie and Freddie's portfolios -- that no future management failure at either company will threaten the stability of the economy.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Slam Ryan, Call Him Shameless (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 7, 2006

Closing arguments began in former Gov. George Ryan's trial Monday with prosecutors blasting him as a shameless, greedy politician at the center of a series of dirty deals that enriched cronies who kicked back cash and gifts to Ryan and his family.

"You've heard of 12 days of Christmas. This was 12 years of Christmas," Assistant U.S. Atty. Joel Levin said of Ryan's four years as governor and eight years as secretary of state.

In nearly five hours of arguments, prosecutors portrayed Ryan as a two-faced, serial liar who publicly claimed he did all he could to eliminate fraud at licensing facilities but privately gutted corruption-fighting efforts to keep his political fundraising machine humming along.

Early in his years as secretary of state, Ryan received two warnings about questionable conduct by co-defendant Lawrence Warner, prosecutors said, but Ryan ran interference for his friend rather than demand a halt to the wrongdoing.

Prosecutors spoke of compelling circumstantial evidence that Ryan pocketed cash from Warner and lobbyist Arthur "Ron" Swanson, pointing out Ryan had scant known sources of cash for almost a decade, yet gambled thousands of dollars. After he left the governor's office, Ryan regularly took out cash from personal bank accounts, in sharp contrast to his few withdrawals when he was an officeholder, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0016298

"When this 12 years of Christmas fun comes to an end, what you find is he starts withdrawing cash on a regular basis like everybody else," Levin said.

After more than five months of testimony, jurors listened intently on the first day of what is expected to be at least four days of closing arguments. Levin shared his duties with Assistant U.S. Atty. Laurie Barsella, who is set to wrap up her remarks Tuesday before Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, delivers his closing argument. Warner's lawyer, Edward Genson, could argue beginning Wednesday.

The closing arguments played out in a packed courtroom. Ryan, wife Lura Lynn and their five adult children showed little reaction to the prosecution arguments.

Also in the courtroom for the fourth time during the trial were Rev. Duane "Scott" and Janet Willis, whose six children were killed in a 1994 crash caused by defective equipment that fell off a truck whose driver paid a bribe for his license.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer has limited details of that accident in a bid to try to keep jurors from figuring out that it was the horrific crash that has come to symbolize the tragic consequences of Illinois' licenses-for-bribes scandal.

But Monday Ryan's lawyers sought a mistrial after the prosecution displayed to jurors a document on the accident that referred to a "mudflap frame," the heavy part that fell from the truck. Prosecutors disputed the reference would trigger a connection by jurors to the Willis tragedy.

Pallmeyer has rejected numerous previous defense requests for mistrial, and the success of one this late in the trial would seem highly unlikely. Pallmeyer appeared displeased at the timing of the motion.

"I myself have this job for life, and I would be happy to start this case over on Monday morning," she said, her voice dripping with sarcasm.

Levin told jurors that Ryan's fingerprints were all over a series of crooked contracts and lease deals that went to Warner, Swanson and Harry Klein, another friend.

Klein played host to Ryan for 10 years at his Jamaican villa, where the two entered a corrupt arrangement to create a paper trail showing Ryan paid for the trips when, in fact, Klein reimbursed Ryan in cash for the cost of the stays, a combined $13,500 over the decade, Levin said.

In return, prosecutors allege Klein, a currency exchange operator, got a sweetheart lease on a building in South Holland and benefited from a Ryan-approved rate hike on the amount exchanges charge for selling state license plate stickers.

Even after Ryan allegedly lied to the FBI about his cash-back arrangement with Klein, the then-governor continued to travel to Klein's Jamaican villa every year, Levin said.

Ryan also steered another deal—the move of a secretary of state department to a Springfield complex represented by Swanson—on the heels of a Cancun vacation in which Ryan stayed at Swanson's time-share condominium, Ryan said.

Barsella said Warner "hit the jackpot" after Ryan was elected secretary of state in 1990.

For years, Warner had been an insurance adjuster. But after Ryan took office, Warner suddenly became a lobbyist, striking deals with vendors that brought him about $3 million even though he concealed his role, she said.

The benefits went to Ryan's family as well as himself, the prosecution contended.

Warner secretly funded loans of $145,000 to Comguard, a failing business owned by Ryan's brother, former Kankakee Mayor Tom Ryan.

Warner also lent Ryan's son-in-law Michael Fairman $5,000 and invested $6,000 in the cigar business of his son, George "Homer" Ryan. And he footed the $3,185 cost for the band at the wedding of Ryan's daughter, Jeanette Schneider.

"If your last name was Ryan, you knew you didn't have to repay these loans," Levin said.

Ryan was "like a walking conflict of interest" because he accepted gifts and benefits from friends who were doing business with his office, Levin said.

Early in his term in office, Ryan was warned by lobbyist Robert Cook about a shakedown by Warner and Donald Udstuen, a close Ryan political adviser, but Ryan tried to make it appear that Cook had misinterpreted their actions, Barsella said.

In addition, James Covert, a high-ranking secretary of state official, raised concerns with Ryan about Warner's access to the office. Ryan insisted Covert continue to work with Warner, Barsella said.

DOJ_NMG_0016299

Prosecutors alleged that Ryan's few cash withdrawals—only $6,703 from his bank from early 1993 through late 2002—were strong circumstantial evidence that Ryan's cash came from kickbacks from Warner and Swanson.

"Something is wrong with this picture," Levin said. "This man had another source of cash."

Swanson's bank records show numerous large cash withdrawals a day or two before meetings with Ryan, often on his birthday, the prosecution said.

Prosecutors also alleged that Ryan knew that Scott Fawell, his top political operative, often diverted state resources to election campaigns of Ryan and political allies. For Ryan's re-election as secretary of state in 1994, Fawell ran the campaign in his government office a few feet from Ryan, Levin said.

"Was it any secret how Scott Fawell was conducting business? No, it wasn't," Levin told jurors. "Ryan gave the keys to his political future to Fawell. Never once was Fawell reined in."

The prosecution also hit hard at fundraising among secretary of state employees by Ryan's political operation, saying it fueled the license-selling at driver's facilities.

Ryan's handpicked inspector general, called "a political hack" by Levin, scuttled investigations that threatened to expose the link between fundraising and license-selling, he said. With Ryan's support, the department was reorganized and many of the investigators were laid off, Levin said.

Ryan "sacrificed public safety and integrity" to ensure the fundraising pipeline kept flowing, the prosecutor said.

"Citizens for Ryan was for all intents and purposes George Ryan's pot of gold," Levin said. "He used the inspector general's office to protect that pot of gold."

mo'connor@tribune.com

rrbush@tribune.com

III. Ex-governor's Trial Nearing Its End (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, March 7, 2006

CHICAGO - Former Gov. George Ryan presided over payoffs and fundraising abuses so bad he "might as well have put up a `For Sale' sign over his office," a federal prosecutor said Monday at the close of his racketeering and fraud trial.

"You've heard of the 12 days of Christmas? This was 12 years of Christmas for Mr. Ryan, his family and his friends," prosecutor Joel R. Levin said.

The 72-year-old Republican who served one term as governor practiced concealment, deception and lies on a regular basis to cover up dirty deals in which he steered state contracts and leases, Levin said.

Ryan and longtime friend Larry Warner, 67, a lobbyist, were charged in a 22-count indictment with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. Testimony began more than five months ago, with as many as 22 hours of closing arguments scheduled to continue through Thursday.

As secretary of state for eight years in the 1990s and as governor for one term, beginning in 1999, Ryan allegedly steered state leases and contracts to Warner and other friends. In return, he was rewarded with free vacations, loans for his brother's business and even money to pay the band at his daughter's wedding reception, prosecutors say.

Ryan and Warner say they did nothing illegal.

Defense attorney Bradley E. Lerman moved for a mistrial Monday in a dispute over a presentation Levin was making to the jury. Lerman said it included material concerning a 1994 crash that killed six children and had been ruled out as so emotional it could prejudice the jurors. The crash was part of the initial investigation that later turned to corruption in state government.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer did not rule immediately on the motion.

Sitting solemn-faced in the spectator seats were the Rev. Scott Willis and his wife, Janet, whose six children were killed in the fiery accident involving a truck driver whose drivers license allegedly was obtained with payoff money from a woman raising Ryan campaign funds.

Ryan's chief defense attorney, Dan K. Webb, who is expected to address the jury on Tuesday, has said that the former governor's decisions in awarding state leases and contracts were made in good faith and had nothing to do with his friendship with Warner and other political figures.

But Levin said that Ryan had "sold his office."

"He might as well have put up a 'For Sale' sign over his office," Levin said.

Levin saved some of his richest sarcasm for his description of the Citizens for Ryan campaign fund, which he claimed financed his lifestyle.

On the visual display screen he projected a photo of Ryan with his arm around a woman who went to prison for selling licenses to unqualified truck drivers - including, prosecutors say, the one involved in the Willis case - and putting much of the cash into Ryan's campaign fund.

Levin said that Ryan appointed his old friend, Dean Bauer, as the inspector general in the secretary of state's office not to root out corruption but to protect the campaign fundraising operation which he described as "the goose that laid the golden egg."

Campbell, Eager To Talk, Won't Testify (AJC)

By Jeffry Scott , Beth Warren, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 7, 2006

Bill Campbell has told his story on radio, television, in newspapers and before church congregations. But he won't tell it to the jury.

Despite his frequent expressions of willingness — if not eagerness — to tell his story in court, the former Atlanta mayor said Monday that he will not take the witness stand in his own defense at his federal corruption trial.

Outside the courtroom, Campbell said he reached the decision after the prosecutors refused to agree not to ask him about his personal life.

"I desperately wanted to testify," said Campbell, who has met nearly daily with reporters to give his assessment of the trial . "I wanted to tell the jury my story. They wanted to continue the character assassination, but I am not going to subject my family to further damage."

The ex-mayor is on trial in federal court on charges that he used his office to extract bribes from contractors seeking business with the city.

Campbell's criticism of the prosecutors apparently struck a nerve. For the first time since the trial began seven weeks ago, U.S. Attorney David Nahmias summoned reporters to respond to comments by the former mayor.

"We will not make any special exceptions for this defendant," Nahmias said, reading a statement. "All of our questions would be relevant to the alleged criminal offenses."

The prosecution maintains that Campbell's personal life is fair game because his alleged crimes are inseparable from his personal life. They have called two women they portrayed as Campbell's girlfriends to testify about romantic getaways with the mayor purportedly bankrolled with cash bribes.

Campbell has acknowledged that there was corruption in his administration, but he blames a few of his underlings for abusing his trust by soliciting and keeping the bribes themselves. He insists that he is innocent of the federal charges of racketeering, tax fraud and bribery.

Throughout the trial, Campbell has indicated that he wanted to testify. On Monday, U.S. District Judge Richard Story demanded that his legal team say once and for all whether it intended to put the ex-mayor on the witness stand.

After the jury was sent home for the day, Story asked Campbell to stand as he reviewed Campbell's rights regarding testimony.

"You'd be subject to cross-examination just like any other witnesses," the judge said. "You also have a right not to testify. It is your decision."

The judge noted that Campbell himself is a lawyer but advised him to consult with his defense team.

"I would actually like a little more time," Campbell responded.

DOJ_NMG_0016301

Story told Campbell that he could have a few more minutes to continue discussing the issue with his defense team. Instead, Campbell replied, "It's my inclination not to testify. If I change my mind, I would e-mail lawyers."

The judge urged Campbell to be certain about his answer, because the prosecutors would need time to prepare their cross-examination.

"Based on your consultation with counsel, you have elected not to testify?" he asked.

"Yes," Campbell answered.

This is the seventh, and possibly final, week of Campbell's trial. The government's case stretched out over five weeks, while the defense team took five days to bring in witnesses to dispute the allegations. Unless Campbell has a change of heart today, the defense is expected to rest its case, and the government will be ready in the morning to call rebuttal witnesses.

Lawyers asked for some free time Wednesday to craft closing arguments, which probably will be heard Thursday morning.

Speculation over whether Campbell would testify has added a touch of tension to the already lively testimony.

Ron Carlson, a University of Georgia professor of criminal law who has observed testimony in the trial, expressed surprise at the decision not to testify.

"The defense could be thinking, 'We've got a good shot at winning this thing without Bill taking the stand,' " Carlson said.

Jurors aren't supposed to consider whether a defendant testifies or not, but it is human nature to question why defendants who talk publicly balk at facing cross-examination, Carlson said.

"He has announced he wanted to take this opportunity and clear his name," the professor said. "The jury will wonder, 'Why didn't he testify?' "

Campbell Will Not Testify (WXIA-TV)

WXIA-TV, March 7, 2006

Bill Campbell will not testify in his federal corruption trial. For days, Campbell has said he wanted to testify, but on Monday, he blamed federal prosecutors for keeping him from the witness stand.

Campbell left the door open, albeit slightly, as he suggested that he might change his mind overnight. However, it appears the jury will not hear from the one man who says he wants to tell his story.

“I absolutely want to testify,” Campbell said. “Every fiber of my being wants to testify.”

Campbell said he would be happy to testify -- if federal prosecutors would stay away from questions about his private life, including asking about two former extramarital girlfriends, both of whom were previously called to the witness stand. The women talked about travel and spending.

When told that he would be queried about the women and the money spent, Campbell said that for the sake of his family that he would not testify.

“The prosecution is not interested in the allegations in the indictment. They simply want to delve into my private life and that’s unfortunate, and that’s regrettable. And I’m not going to allow any more damage to be done to my family,” Campbell said.

Late on Monday, US Attorney David Nahmias said any questions to Campbell about his private life would be relevant to the case, and no one can dictate what prosecutors ask and don’t ask.

It is expected the jury would get the case late Thursday or Friday.

Metro Briefing (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK

POTENTIAL OPPONENT FOR CLINTON K. T. McFarland, left, a former spokeswoman for the Reagan Defense Department, formed an exploratory committee yesterday to raise money to challenge Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in this year's Senate race. A stay-at-home mother for the last 21 years, Ms. McFarland, a Manhattan Republican, also set about raising her national profile. She appeared on MSNBC's "Hardball," and in response to questions, said that a nuclear Iran was "the single biggest national security situation we face." Ms. McFarland would oppose John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers and a favorite of conservatives, for the Republican nomination.PATRICK HEALY (NYT)

UNION LEADER TO FORM SPECIAL COMMITTEE The president of the New York State A.F.L.-C.I.O., Denis M. Hughes, announced yesterday that he would appoint a special committee to handle matters at the New York City Central Labor Council regarding a federal investigation of the council and its president, Brian M. McLaughlin. Mr. Hughes said that Mr. McLaughlin, a Democratic assemblyman from Queens, would remain in charge of the council, but would not have a voice in decisions regarding the investigation. Last Thursday, F.B.I. agents raided the council's offices and Mr. McLaughlin's Queens office as part of an investigation into accusations of bid rigging for city contracts for street and traffic lights. Carolyn Daly, Mr. McLaughlin's spokeswoman, said yesterday that Mr. McLaughlin insisted he was innocent.STEVEN GREENHOUSE (NYT)

MANHATTAN: ANTIWAR PROTESTERS ARRESTED Protesters demanding the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq marched from the United Nations to the United States Mission yesterday, where four of them, including Cindy Sheehan — a Californian who became an antiwar activist after her son was killed in Iraq — were arrested, the police said. The group Women Say No to War, which helped organize the march, said that the protesters were arrested while trying to deliver a petition. Richard Grenell, a spokesman for the mission, said that Ms. Sheehan and a few others were invited in but that they declined because reporters could not go with them. Detective Kevin Czartoryski said the protesters had criminally trespassed and resisted arrest.(AP)

SUOZZI REJECTS RUNNING ON REPUBLICAN LINE The Nassau County executive, Thomas R. Suozzi, a Democrat running for governor, has ruled out the possibility of running on the Republican line. Mr. Suozzi, who is running in a primary against Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, said yesterday that he had received support from Republicans in local races, but dismissed speculation that he would run on that line. Joseph L. Bruno, the Republican leader of the state Senate, said in a television interview on Sunday that there was speculation about "the possibility of crossover," but yesterday, he said he would not pursue the idea.JENNIFER MEDINA (NYT)

PROPERTY TAX REBATES OFFSET INCREASES The city finance commissioner, Martha E. Stark, said yesterday that the $400 annual property-tax rebate approved in 2004 largely offset the effect of higher property-tax rates that took effect in 2003. Ms. Stark said that the average increase in taxes for one-, two- and three-family houses totaled $743 in the last three years, while most owners received two rebates totaling $800. The figure, presented at a City Council hearing, surprised several lawmakers and the city comptroller, William C. Thompson Jr. An assistant finance commissioner, Sam Miller, said taxes increased far more slowly than market values because of state-mandated assessment capsSEWELL CHAN (NYT)

SLEEPY HOLLOW: BOY DIES IN ICY POND A 6-year-old boy died after he fell into a pond while walking his neighbor's dog last evening, the police said. The boy, Julian Geach, left home about 5:30 p.m. with the dog, which his family was caring for. About 6:15 p.m., when the boy had not returned, his parents called the police. The dog was found near Fremont Pond, about a half-mile from the boy's home. A team of divers broke through the thin sheet of ice and slush on the pond's surface and recovered the boy's body, about 30 feet from the shore. He was taken to Phelps Memorial Hospital Center in Sleepy Hollow, where he was declared dead at 10 p.m.JENNIFER 8. LEE (NYT)

ANTHRAX PATIENT IMPROVES Vado Diomande, the New York City musician and drummer who contracted inhalation anthrax last month from making drums with untreated animal skins, was upgraded from serious to fair condition yesterday, the first change since Feb. 24, when his condition was downgraded from stable to serious. "He is breathing without assistance and eating solid food," said Alexander Harman, Mr. Diomande's brother-in-law. "He has his voice back." Mr. Diomande has been hospitalized in Pennsylvania since he collapsed after a musical performance there on Feb. 16. Meanwhile, workers continued to clean an eight-story Brooklyn warehouse where Mr. Diomande worked on the skins. The third and sixth floors of the warehouse, which house commercial lofts used by about 30 tenants, remained sealed yesterday.SEWELL CHAN (NYT)

MANHATTAN: WOMAN DIES IN FALL An elderly woman died from a suspicious fall in the stairwell of her East Side apartment building yesterday afternoon, the police said. The woman, Phyllis Weiner, 89, was taken to NewYork-Presbyterian/Weill Cornell hospital about 2:20 p.m., where she was pronounced dead on arrival. Ms. Weiner lived in an 11th-floor apartment at 157 East 57th Street. It is an elevator building, but her body was found on the 10th-floor landing. Investigators said it was unlikely that she had entered the stairwell by herself because she used a walker, which was found on the 11th floor. Ms. Weiner's purse was missing and a nephew, Michael Zerin, said she had gone to the bank earlier in the day. The police said they had no suspects.JENNIFER 8. LEE (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0016303

Compiled by John Sullivan

Labor Leader Brian McLaughlin Is Target Of Probe Into Bid- Rigging On Contracts. (NYDN)

By Juan Gonzalez

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

Council Prez McLaughlin may be asked to curtail his leadership responsibility

Brian McLaughlin - a target of a federal probe into possible bid-rigging of city street-lighting contracts - may be asked to curtail his role as president of the city's Central Labor Council.

Under a plan fashioned by Denis Hughes, president of the New York State AFL-CIO, McLaughlin would continue to serve as president, but Ed Ott, a top staff person, would assume some of the public functions normally handled by the president.

At the same time, the labor council, whose headquarters was raided by more than 20 FBI agents last week, would create a small "rapid-response team" of about a dozen city labor leaders to handle the federal probe without any involvement from McLaughlin, a Queens assemblyman. The council also would hire its own independent attorney to deal with the feds.

"Brian hasn't been accused of any crime and we have to be careful about a presumption ofinnocence," Hughes told me yesterday. "But this is the beginning and I don't know where it [the investigation] is going to go."

Hughes' goal is to keep McLaughlin's legal problems separate from the day-to-day work of the council, the powerful umbrella group that represents the city's 1 million union members.

All day yesterday, Hughes feverishly worked the telephones to win support for his plan from key city labor leaders. He is expected to hold an emergency meeting of the council's leadership this week to win formal approval for the plan.

"I spoke with Brian today and he understands what has to be done," Hughes said, adding that he also consulted with top officials at the AFL-CIO in Washington this weekend.

Hughes is perhaps the only labor official with enough influence over all sectors of the city's normally fractious labor movement to secure quick agreement on a strategy.

He is well-regarded by both the big municipal and service sector union leaders as well as by the construction trades, the group that has historically controlled the Central Labor Council.

With the federal investigation of McLaughlin likely to take months, Hughes and other top union leaders have reluctantly concluded that the council can't risk being paralyzed until the results are known. "Denis has stepped in and taken charge and the national is onboard," a labor source said.

Several union leaders told me yesterday they were troubled by McLaughlin's failure to speak out or even to contact many of his fellow union leaders. He has not been seen in public since Thursday morning's FBI raid on the council's W. 15th St. headquarters. He did report to work at the headquarters yesterday, but did not return phone calls for comment.

Late Friday, his lawyer, Paul Driscoll, issued a short statement that McLaughlin "denies all allegations against him."

Many union leaders are furious at the FBI's high-profile raid on Central Labor Council headquarters, given that there is no suggestion of any wrongdoing by the council itself. "This is a fishing expedition by the feds," said Arthur Cheliotes, president of Local 1180. "Until anyone proves otherwise, I'm with Brian and supporting him completely."

"Brian's been with us in very tough fights and many of us on a personal level are rooting for him," said Randi Weingarten, president of the teachers union and one of McLaughlin's closest allies in the labor movement.

As for Ott, who may soon assume many of McLaughlin's functions, he is currently the director of public policy and worker education for the council and is known as a fiery orator. Before coming to the council, he was a staff member at both Local 1180 and the Public Employees Federation.

TOUGH JOB FOR LABOR (NYPOST)

By CARL CAMPANILE

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- The New York state AFL-CIO went into crisis mode yesterday to respond to a federal probe linking powerful labor boss and Queens Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin to alleged bid rigging of city street-lighting contracts.

State AFL-CIO President Denis Hughes announced that the New York City Central Labor Council will hire its own lawyer to comply with questions from the feds about the scandal. McLaughlin is head of the CLC, which is part of the AFL-CIO.

About a half-dozen city labor leaders - all executive board members - will also be put on a special panel to help make rapid decisions about the probe and CLC business, sources said.

"We're going to do this in a upfront, aboveboard way," Hughes said.

Hughes also said McLaughlin will remain CLC president - for the time being - because he has not been charged with a crime.

Hughes said he informed McLaughlin of the planned actions.

The action plan, which has been cleared by the leadership of the national AFL-CIO, shows how concerned the labor leaders are about the McLaughlin probe and the possibility that he might be charged with a crime.

Meanwhile, the federal probe received a thumbs-up from former city transportation boss Wilbur Chapman.

"Thank God - finally," Chapman told The Post. "I'm happy that someone from the outside is looking at the process."

Chapman confirmed yesterday's Post report that when he was transportation boss, he questioned why just two firms - Petrocelli Electric and Welsbach Electric - continued to be awarded all the street- and traffic-light repair contracts throughout the five boroughs year after year, even after the DOT switched to new light-emitting diode technology in 1999.

"There has to be more than one or two companies to provide street lighting. I have trouble with that," Chapman said yesterday. "General Motors doesn't have a monopoly on selling cars in America."

Brothel Owner In Nevada Faces Federal Corruption Charge (AP)

By KEN RITTER, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 7, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The owner of three southern Nevada brothels was charged Monday with trying to bribe a county commissioner to relax laws affecting bordellos.

Joseph Maynard Richards, 72, is accused of funneling $5,000 to a commissioner in rural Nye County in return for support for a law to let brothels be built closer to county roads and highways. He could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

Richards told a judge he understood the wire fraud corruption charge on which he was arrested Saturday. Richards will plead not guilty, his lawyer said outside court.

"I'm surprised they brought the case, from what they have in the complaint," lawyer Leo Flangas said.

The 16-page complaint describes video and audiotaped conversations between Richards and an unnamed commissioner from June to November 2005.

Commission Chairwoman Candice Trummell, a Republican from Pahrump, confirmed for The Associated Press that she was the cooperating witness.

"I was told I never was a target of the investigation," the 27-year-old commissioner said, describing how she rewrote an ordinance "with Mr. Richards' interests in mind in exchange for the money."

"This was done in cooperation with the FBI," Trummell added, describing the FBI probe as an ongoing public corruption investigation that began before she was elected to the five-member commission in 2003.

Nye County ordinances require that brothels be 300 yards from a road or highway. Richards owns a property on which the complaint alleges he is prevented from building a brothel because of the rule.

No vote was ever taken on revising 300-yard limit, Trummell said.

Trummell said her discussions with Richards involved using the money to pay law school tuition at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. She has not enrolled.

Flangas noted that the complaint describes a signed document under which Richards transferred the money to Trummell through his Richards Family Trust.

"I don't know if it was a loan or a gift," Flangas said. "But it was done aboveboard. It was not a quid pro quo."

DOJ_NMG_0016305

Nye, which has seven brothels, is one of 10 rural counties in which prostitution is legal under county and state oversight. Prostitution is illegal in Nevada's most populous areas, including Las Vegas and surrounding Clark County, and Reno and surrounding Washoe County.

Richards owns the Mabel's Ranch, Cherry Patch Ranch and Cherry Patch II Ranch brothels, plus two massage salons and a striptease club in the Pahrump area about 60 miles west of Las Vegas.

U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Peggy Leen freed Richards without bail but with electronic home monitoring pending a March 22 preliminary hearing.

Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre had asked Leen to set a $1 million bail. Although he offered no proof, Myhre said Richards had been in contact with Nevada's most notorious fugitive brothel owner, Joseph Conforte.

Conforte, who used to own the Mustang Ranch brothel east of Reno, was accused of owing $13 million in back taxes when the IRS seized the property in 1990. Conforte reportedly fled to Brazil, where his lawyer has said courts wouldn't let him be extradited to the U.S.

Myhre said Richards is a multimillionaire who has passports and cash buried in an ammunition can in the desert that he would use to flee before he is prosecuted.

Richards shook his head no, causing his long mane of silver hair to brush the shoulders of his orange jail jump suit.

Flangas told the judge that Richards had no contact with Conforte.

Trial in an unrelated case in which a Las Vegas striptease club owner is accused of funneling money to Clark County commissioners in return for their support for laws benefiting his business is due to begin next week.

FBI Probes Use Of Funds By Ex-FEC Aide (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

The FBI is investigating allegations that a former top official at the Federal Election Commission tried to settle a sexual harassment complaint from a female staffer by attempting to misappropriate $100,000 in taxpayer funds last fall.

Amid AIPAC's Big Show, Straight Talk With A Noticeable Silence (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Words are seldom minced at the annual meeting of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

During a luncheon speech yesterday at the convention center, Daniel Gillerman, the Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, shouted a barnyard obscenity involving a bull when he dismissed the theory that Iran and Hamas might soften their anti-Israel views. The audience gave Gillerman a standing ovation.

The undiplomatic diplomat went on to describe a war on radical Islam: "While it may be true -- and probably is -- that not all Muslims are terrorists, it also happens to be true that nearly all terrorists are Muslim."

But ask people at this week's gathering about Steve Rosen, the father of modern AIPAC, who goes on trial next month for disseminating classified information, and you get the sort of look you'd expect if you inquired about an embarrassing medical condition.

"I'm not the person to ask about that," says Nathan Diament, a Washington representative for Orthodox Jews.

"Who?" responds Neil Cooper, a delegate from the Philadelphia area.

"Rosen? Which one is he?" answers a charity executive, with a smile.

"I need to read more about it," demurs Etan Cohen, a college student.

AIPAC staff members note that, with Iran and the Palestinians to worry about, the indictments of Rosen and former deputy Keith Weissman have not been mentioned in any of the group's public meetings so far. And they say the pro-Israel lobby, unharmed by the Rosen flap, is putting on its biggest and best show ever this week: 4,500 participants, including more than 1,000 students, paying visits to at least 450 House and Senate offices.

Indeed, the scandal doesn't seem to have slowed down the group. At last night's dinner, AIPAC set aside 27 minutes for the reading of its annual "Roll Call" of lawmakers, diplomats and administration officials attending the gathering. As of midday yesterday, RSVPs had come in from 57 embassies, from Burundi to Turkey; a score of Bush administration officials; a majority of the Senate; and a quarter of the House. Even the ambassadors of Pakistan and Oman supped at AIPAC's table.

DOJ_NMG_0016306

Any talk of Rosen is confined to private donor meetings and hallway conversations -- where opinions are split on AIPAC's decision to turn its back on Rosen and Weissman.

"I don't like the way AIPAC handled it, hanging them out to dry," said one West Coast delegate, after delivering an on-the-record no comment. "They didn't do anything different from what everybody else does in this town every day."

Rosen and Weissman are the first nongovernment officials to be prosecuted under the all-but-forgotten Espionage Act of 1917. The law, amended in 1950, makes it a crime for an unauthorized person even to have classified information knowingly; if Rosen broke that law, so do hundreds of other lobbyists and journalists as part of their normal course of business.

The New Yorker magazine reported last year that AIPAC's lawyer, Nathan Lewin, recommended that the two officials be fired after he heard from prosecutors about an FBI-recorded telephone call between Rosen, Weissman and The Washington Post's Glenn Kessler, in which Rosen observed that "at least we have no Official Secrets Act." Lewin and the prosecutors may not have realized that the line -- referring to a British law about publishing classified information -- was a stock joke Rosen used in conversations with Kessler and other reporters.

AIPAC at first defended Rosen vigorously, then dismissed him in April over unspecified conduct "beneath the standards AIPAC sets for its employees." The group has advised members that it has not taken a position on whether Rosen acted legally.

That nuance was understandably lost on most of the attendees asked about the matter at yesterday's session. "AIPAC doesn't support passing of state secrets to Israel, and that's my view, too," said Daniel Rathauser, a high school senior from New Jersey.

Max Newman, from Michigan, had no complaints, either. "I respect the way the organization handled it," he said. "What they did was against the policy of AIPAC."

Exactly what they did should come out in next month's trial. In the meantime, AIPAC is clamping down on what information it lets out.

Luncheon speeches by former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and former Virginia governor Mark Warner (D) were declared off the record. At another speech yesterday by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, reporters were turned away at the door; an AIPAC spokeswoman went through the room making sure no journalists had infiltrated.

At the public sessions, the message was uniform: AIPAC is strong, and getting stronger. "Thank God for AIPAC," Gillerman told the participants. "This is for us the greatest guarantee and insurance policy for the survival of Israel," he added. "Please don't ever change."

As Rosen and Weissman have learned, it already has.

Junior Gotti Was 'Sick Of This Life,' Radio Show Host Kuby Says (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- John "Junior" Gotti said in 1998 that he was "sick of this life" and would plead guilty to criminal charges, a lawyer who co-hosts a radio show with Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa testified Monday at Gotti's mob trial.

The testimony by Ron Kuby, a veteran civil rights attorney, was intended by defense lawyers to boost Gotti's argument that he had rejected life in the Gambino crime family when he pleaded guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges. On that front, they got mixed results.

Kuby, who had represented a Gotti co-defendant, testified that Gotti said he "wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this," but the lawyer could not be more specific.

"He told me he was sick of this life," Kuby said. "He wanted this to be over."

Outside court, Kuby said he never asked Gotti what he was referring to when he said he wanted out.

"I was functioning as a lawyer, not a priest," Kuby said. "He did not elaborate. I did not ask."

He said he assumed Gotti meant he was "tired of being a criminal, tired of being a defendant, tired of being in prison, tired of being away from family."

The government last year brought a new racketeering case against Gotti related to crimes not covered in his April 1999 plea deal. Prosecutors said Gotti continued to do mob business from prison after claiming he had quit the Mafia.

The testimony by Kuby put the radio personality in an odd position with Sliwa, who prosecutors say was shot twice in 1992 after Gotti ordered him kidnapped and beaten because of on-air rants against Gotti's father, John Gotti. The elder Gotti was convicted of racketeering in 1992 and died in prison a decade later.

Junior Gotti insists he had nothing to do with the attack on Sliwa.

Sliwa testified about the shooting during the current trial and another trial last September that ended with a hung jury.

On their radio show Monday morning before Kuby testified, Sliwa poked fun at his co-host, calling the liberal counterpoint to Sliwa's conservative viewpoints a Judas.

"Maybe you should be doing a radio show with John Gotti Jr.," Sliwa said.

Kuby said Sliwa had nothing to fear.

"I don't have a dog in this fight, outside of my allegiance to the truth," he said.

Final arguments in the case were scheduled for Tuesday.

Sliwa's Radio Co-Host Testifies For Gotti (WCBS-TV)

By Pablo Guzman

WCBS-TV, March 7, 2006

(CBS) NEW YORK "Curtis & Kuby" are a well-known WABC radio morning team. Partners. "Curtis", of course, is Guardian Angels co-founder Curtis Sliwa. In 1992, someone shot him after he got into a cab. From inside the cab. The Feds say that was done on the orders of John Gotti, who wanted to teach Sliwa a lesson for badmouthing his father on their radio show. And for that, Gotti is on trial.

"Kuby" is Ron Kuby, the activist lawyer who came of age with William Kunstler. Sliwa took the stand last Monday to, as he put it, "stare Gotti down." But now that it's the turn of the Gotti defense, his lawyer Charles Carnesi called Kuby to the stand. A rather interesting turn of events in a trial that has seen the government use the re-direct of their star witness, "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo, to bring out that young Gotti and "Mikey Scars" allegedly took girlfriends (behind their wives' backs) to party on a yacht Gotti supposedly hired for "Scars' " 40th birthday; and, to reveal that Gotti's father had a mistress. And a daughter in that illicit relationship. Or so it's alleged.

This, with the Gotti family --- particularly, the women and young Gotti's father-in-law --- in court.

In turn, one of the first witnesses Gotti's lawyer called was DiLeonardo's ex-wife. To say how embarrassed their son was about both the father being a rat AND putting his mistress up in a house on Staten Island near theirs.

It's been that kind of trial.

Enter Ron Kuby.

Part of Gotti's case revolves around his contention that by 1998, he became disillusioned with "this life of ours." That he was ready to do one last prison time, if it would settle the books with the government. So he could walk out of the slammer, and just be with his wife and five kids (that wife, by the way, Kim, expecting their sixth child, was in court today for the first time).

Kuby testified on the stand that while representing Gotti in 1998 (in the case alleging a Gambino shakedown of the strip joint "Scores"), that Gotti approached him "and he told me he was willing to plead to time in jail, so he could put all this behind him." By "this", I asked Kuby, did he mean "this mob life?" "I took it to mean that he wanted to put criminal life behind him . That he was tired of being in jail, tired of being in court, tired of being away from his family. That he wanted that life to end."

Now, at the end of the trial, the government will probably tell the jury to ignore whatever anyone says about Mr. Gotti wanting out of the Mafia after 1998. Because the time covered in the trial is a shooting of Curtis Sliwa in 1992. When, the Feds say, Mr. Gotti was very much a prince of the mob.

But that is not really Mr. Gotti's and his lawyer, Mr. Carnesi's, point. They are hoping that the jury interprets Kuby's testimony as another hole in what the government's star witness, Michael DiLeonardo --- "Mikey Scars" --- said on the witness stand. He said no one leaves the mob. Who will the jury believe? Kuby, the radio host, who said Gotti told him he wanted out? Or "Scars"? Who said, no one gets out. Not alive, anyhow.

DOJ_NMG_0016308

Because if “Mikey Scars” is lying about that, then --- could he also be lying about something else? And if a couple of jurors begin to have doubts about the government’s case, then --- could it affect the verdict?

The jury should start discussing just that within a couple of days.

KUBY'S TESTIMONY RADIO-ACTIVE (NYPOST)

By DAN MANGAN

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- John "Junior" Gotti's defense yesterday received an unexpected boost from Curtis Sliwa's radio partner, who testified that the ex-mob boss declared eight years ago he was leaving organized crime because he wanted to go legit.

"He told me he was sick of this life," criminal-defense and civil-rights lawyer Ron Kuby testified. "He wanted to get out of this life, to do real prison time . . . He wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this. He wanted this to be over."

Kuby, who co-hosts a WABC radio show with Sliwa, said he was representing Gotti's co-defendant in a racketeering case in 1998 when Junior made the confession.

Kuby's testimony in Manhattan federal court put the radio personality at odds with Sliwa, who prosecutors say was shot twice in 1992 after Gotti ordered him kidnapped and beaten because he was blasting his "Dapper Don" father on the air.

Yesterday's explosive testimony saying Gotti had left the mob in 1998 backed the defense's claim that the five-year statute of limitations had run out on Junior's alleged racketeering before he was indicted in 2004.

Kuby said the conversation occurred when Junior asked him to approach the feds to discuss a plea bargain for everyone involved in the earlier racketeering case.

Under cross-examination, Kuby said he had no knowledge that Junior later stopped earning money from the mob - and said Gotti never admitted to him he was in the mob.

Outside court, Kuby said he never asked Gotti what he was referring to when he said he wanted out.

"I was functioning as a lawyer, not a priest," he said. "He did not elaborate. I did not ask."

On their radio show earlier yesterday, Sliwa took aim at Kuby's willingness to testify.

"Maybe you should be doing a radio show with John Gotti Jr.," Sliwa said.

Two of Gotti's cousins also claimed Gotti left the mob by 1998.

Michael DiGiorgio said he visited his brother John, a Gambino crime-family associate, in federal prison in Miami, where he met John's cellmate, Gambino captain Tony Morelli.

Morelli asked Michael DiGiorgio to pass a message to Gotti that his family was having money trouble.

"Tony had complained to me that he felt abandoned . . . financially, that his wife was in financial straits," Michael testified.

When Michael, 43, relayed the message during a visit to Gotti in his Westchester County jail in 1998, Junior wasn't receptive, he said.

"John told me to tell Tony that he was out of that life . . . but there was nothing he could do to help him," Michael said.

Michael claimed he relayed the message to Morelli.

"I know what it meant - that [Junior] was no longer involved in the Mafia," he said.

Outside the presence of the jury, John DiGiorgio, 50, said Gotti's message meant "he threw in the towel. He was finished."

Also yesterday, Gotti's younger brother, Peter, testified about how criminal prosecutions had disrupted his family's life.

On cross-examination, prosecutor Michael McGovern asked him what his father, the Teflon Don, did for a living. Peter Gotti, 31, paused, then smiled.

"Boss," he said.

After a chuckle, he added, "I have no idea, Mr. McGovern."

Asked whether he was aware of his brother's role in the mob, he said, "I assumed he was definitely, you know, in a family."

Sliwa Says Radio Partner 'Judas' (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

"The Curtis & Kuby Show" played on the radio - and in court - yesterday as Curtis Sliwa called his on-air partner Ron Kuby a "Judas" for testifying on behalf of John A. (Junior) Gotti.

Kuby, a lawyer, bolstered Gotti's defense against claims the mobster sent two thugs to beat Sliwa for his on-air attacks against the Dapper Don John Gotti in 1992.

Gotti contends that he left the mob in 1998.

"He told me he was sick of this life," Kuby testified. "He wanted this to be over. He wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this." Kuby said the spring 1998 chat occurred while Gotti and dozens of others were under indictment for a loansharking and extortion scheme that involved the Manhattan strip club Scores.

"John Gotti . . . specifically asked me if I would do him a favor," Kuby testified.

Gotti, 42, wanted Kuby, then representing co-defendant Stephen Sergio, to approach federal prosecutors and discuss a plea deal for everyone involved.

Outside court, Kuby said he didn't question Gotti further about ending his mob life.

"I was functioning as a lawyer, not a priest," he said. "He did not elaborate. I did not ask."

Kuby gave a preview of his testimony on his morning WABC radio show yesterday - prompting Sliwa to call his decade-long radio partner "Judas."

"Curtis, you should have nothing to fear from the truth," Kuby said.

Sliwa was shot near his East Village apartment after he hailed a cab carrying two men prosecutors say were sent by Gotti.

The issue of Gotti's pre-1999 withdrawal from the mob is key because prosecutors must show at least one crime in the long-running conspiracy case occurred within five years of his 2004 indictment.

Gotti's attorneys want to play for jurors a recording of a prison visit with his father that they say will feature the Mafia scion using coded language to say he wants out of the mob.

Peter Outs Dead Dad On Stand (NYDN)

By THOMAS ZAMBITO, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

Dapper Don called 'Boss'

Peter Gotti (in September photo) testified his father, John (Dapper Don) Gotti, 'probably' was Gambino crime family head.

As he entered the witness stand yesterday, the youngest son of John (Dapper Don) Gotti made family history - then cemented his place in it with a one-word answer.

"Boss," Peter Gotti said.

That's how the Dapper Don's 31-year-old son described what his father did for a living, saying in a second what prosecutors spent a decade trying to prove.

No Gotti family member has ever testified at a criminal trial until yesterday, when Peter Gotti took the stand in his brother John A. (Junior) Gotti's defense to federal kidnapping and extortion charges in Manhattan.

Then again, Peter Gotti never had much to hide.

He was the one son of the Dapper Don who didn't embrace the life of a mobster, staying out of the headlines and living a trouble-free life - aside from a few gambling debts.

Heavyset, he bore just a slight resemblance to his late father. He wore an all-black outfit and his accent was rooted in the Howard Beach, Queens, neighborhood where he was reared.

After taking the oath and promising to tell the whole truth, Gotti started nervously.

But as he scrolled through family photos, he seemed more at ease, joking with his brother's attorney, Charles Carnesi, and making cracks about his brother's hair.

By using old family snapshots, Carnesi was trying to counter prosecutors' claims that several men were his brother's criminal associates - suggesting they were longtime childhood pals.

There was a photo of Junior Gotti, wearing the number 71 for his peewee football team in Howard Beach. "That's him with the Afro," Gotti joked.

And there were childhood photos that included the late Frankie Gotti, killed after being hit by a car near the family's Howard Beach home.

DOJ_NMG_0016310

Mother Victoria Gotti, seated in the audience, appeared to look away when the photo appeared on a courtroom screen.

But after he did his brother's bidding, federal prosecutor Michael McGovern made things interesting.

"Do you know what your father did for a living?" McGovern asked.

The question startled Gotti, as he shifted uneasily in his chair for several seconds before finally answering sheepishly.

"Boss," he said.

Asked if he knew his father was the head of the Gambino crime family, Gotti responded:

"I have no idea, Mr. McGovern," Gotti said. "I would probably say he was."

Under the old Mafia rules, such an admission could have merited a death sentence.

But Junior Gotti has admitted his mob membership, saying he quit the life by 1999, hoping to spare his children from the legacy of crime he inherited.

Asked whether he knew that his father was responsible for the deaths of former Gambino mob boss Paul Castellano and his bodyguard in a bloody takeover of the Gambino family, he said: "That's what I've read. I've heard."

McGovern peppered Gotti with questions, asking him if he knew that his brother, several uncles and a former brother-in-law - sister Victoria's ex Carmine Agnello - were in the mob. He said he had no direct knowledge but after 20 years of reading media accounts, he assumed they were.

"I'm in a bubble, not in a cave," he said. He added: "It's not my business. I don't really care."

He was shown surveillance photographs of himself with his uncle Peter Gotti outside his father's Queens headquarters, the Bergin Hunt and Fish Club. "I was at the Bergin as a young kid," he said. "My uncle was just another guy who was there."

Gotti was called to refute allegations made by mob snitch Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo that he acted as the go-between for $50,000 in mob cash belonging to his brother.

"Never," Gotti said when asked if he'd ever picked up money for his brother.

He said his brother wouldn't have allowed it since he was well aware of his gambling habits. "He simply didn't trust me with money," he said.

McGovern will continue his cross-examination today and Gotti promised he'll be ready.

"I'm gonna rack 'em up again tomorrow," he said.

Trial Begins Of NY Cops Charged As Mafia Hit Men (REU)

By Ransdell Pierson

Reuters, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK (Reuters) - Jury selection began on Monday in the federal trial of two former New York detectives accused of having been hit men for the mob in a case the judge predicts will captivate the jurors.

Defendants Stephen Caracappa, 64, and Louis Eppolito, 57, were charged early last year with secretly working for the Luchese crime family while employed as police officers and involvement in 11 murders or attempted murders.

The charges, which also include kidnapping and other crimes, set the stage for a colorful and closely watched trial. Both defendants had served on the force more than 20 years.

Brooklyn U.S. District Court Judge Jack Weinstein set opening arguments for March 13 and assured hundreds of potential jurors assembled in his courtroom the case "will be one of the most interesting experiences of your life." Twelve jurors and six alternates will be selected.

When Eppolito showed up in court 75 minutes late, Weinstein ordered that he be rearrested and that his $5 million bail be revoked until a good explanation was provided.

Weinstein, an 85-year-old former Columbia Law School professor known for toughness, set Eppolito free again after defense lawyer Bruce Cutler explained that his client had been seriously delayed by a "trailer accident" on the highway.

In the courtroom, the tall and overweight defendant seemed at ease, embracing Cutler and trading smiles and pleasantries with Caracappa and his co-defendant's high-profile lawyer, Edward Hayes.

DOJ_NMG_0016311

Cutler, best known for his successful defense of the late Gambino crime family boss John Gotti in several trials, said it will be tougher to defend Eppolito because federal prosecutors plan to have at least four Mafia informants and turncoats testify against him.

"The federal government is making sweetheart deals with all kinds of people -- including (crime family) acting bosses -- that will say what the government wants to hear," Cutler said in a telephone interview.

After retiring, Eppolito played a bit role as "Fat Andy" in the mob movie "Goodfellas" and played character roles in several other Hollywood productions.

BQE Jam Holds Up Cop Trial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 7, 2006

You think you have traffic problems?

Yesterday's huge jam on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway almost sent one of the "Mafia Cops" to jail before his racketeering trial even began after he was late to federal court for the start of jury selection.

Louis Eppolito, 57, who is living under house arrest with relatives in Plainview, walked into Brooklyn federal court about 90 minutes late after stewing in traffic on the BQE for nearly as long. When Eppolito finally arrived at the Cadman Plaza courthouse, an angry Judge Jack Weinstein ordered him arrested by federal marshals and his $5 million bail revoked.

But after defense attorney Bruce Cutler explained to Weinstein that two disabled tractor-trailers had shut down the roadway, Weinstein reinstated bail and revoked the arrest.

Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, 64, former New York City police detectives, are accused of being paid assassins for the mob in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Both have denied wrongdoing and are under house arrest.

Outside court, Eppolito told Newsday that he had left the home of his brother and sister-in-law at around 7:40 a.m. After an uneventful ride westbound on the Long Island Expressway, the trip suddenly turned chaotic when his car exited for the BQE, said Eppolito. Under the terms of his bail he is not allowed to have a cell phone, so Eppolito said he could not call the court.

Opening statements are set for March 13.

'MAFIA' COP IN A JAM (NYPOST)

By ZACH HABERMAN

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- A traffic jam almost landed reputed mob cop Louis Eppolito back in prison yesterday.

The ex-NYPD detective, accused along with his partner, Stephen Caracappa, of being paid hit men for the Mafia, arrived at Brooklyn federal court over an hour late - holding up the start of jury selection.

"Did you arrest him like I ordered?" a fuming Judge Jack Weinstein asked a courtroom marshall after Eppolito finally arrived.

While he was placed in their custody, a shaken Eppolito - who had been free on $5 million bail - was neither handcuffed nor had his arrest processed. The judge called off the guards after Eppolito explained he was not jumping bail - he was simply stuck in bumper-to-bumper traffic on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway.

"It was beyond my control," Eppolito, 57, said outside court. "I just sat in traffic in the car."

One of Eppolito's bail restrictions prevents him from having a cellphone, so he had no way of contacting the court or his attorney.

His lawyer, Bruce Cutler, was apparently so concerned by the unexplained absence he almost called Nassau County cops to check the Plainview, L.I., home where Eppolito is staying while awaiting trial.

Two hundred potential jurors in the hotly anticipated police-corruption trial filled out questionnaires yesterday, while Weinstein promised the trial would be "the most interesting experience of your life."

Caracappa, 64, and Eppolito are accused of using their positions within the department to leak sensitive NYPD intelligence to the Luchese crime family, information allegedly used to commit eight gangland slayings.

DOJ_NMG_0016312

The 42-page questionnaire asked a range of questions such as whether potential jurors had ever read Eppolito's autobiography, "Mafia Cop."

They were also asked if they recognized the names of well-known wiseguys, such as the late Gambino boss John Gotti, his whacked predecessor Paul Castellano, and turncoat Salvatore "Sammy Bull" Gravano.

The trial is set to get under way on Monday.

'Mafia Cop' Angers Judge, But Dodges Jail With Quick Excuse (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

Saved by gridlock! Blames BQE for missing court

Here's not the best way to start off your trial: Reputed Mafia cop Louis Eppolito got himself arrested briefly yesterday when he ticked off the judge by showing up late.

The portly ex-NYPD detective, accused of being a hit man for the mob, waddled into Brooklyn Federal Court more than an hour late, incurring the wrath of Judge Jack Weinstein.

After 140 prospective jurors had filled out a lengthy questionnaire in another room, Weinstein called an impromptu courtroom conference.

"Is he under arrest?" Weinstein asked a U.S. marshal, causing the color to drain from Eppolito's face.

When the lawman indicated Eppolito was not, Weinstein barked: "He's now under arrest and bail has been revoked."

Defense lawyer Bruce Cutler explained his client wasn't AWOL - he had been stuck in a traffic jam on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway caused by an overturned tractor-trailer.

The judge accepted the explanation and reinstated Eppolito's $5 million bail.

"I just sat in traffic in the car. It was beyond my control," Eppolito said outside court.

Eppolito and his former NYPD partner Thomas Caracappa are accused of leaking information about confidential informants and investigations to the Luchese crime family for years. Eppolito is charged with participating in eight gangland murders and Caracappa seven.

Prospective jurors answered 77 questions, including whether they had read Eppolito's autobiography, "Mafia Cop," or watched the defense lawyers' "Cutler and Hayes Show" on Court TV.

"For many of you [the trial] will be one of the most interesting experiences of your life," Weinstein told the jurors.

Take 1 Trial. Add The Mob. Yield: 4-5 Books And A Film. (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Depending on whom you ask, when you ask them and how honest they are, there are four books and a movie, five books and a movie, four books but no movie or five books but no movie about the federal racketeering trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa in the works.

The trial, which began yesterday with jury selection in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, has become the latest scoop for the disheveled band of newspaper reporters who write about the courts and has led, in at least two cases, to a literary luncheon and a book deal. It has also served as a midcareer change of pace for two investigators on the case who have cashed in on their inside knowledge, signing book deals of their own.

Almost from the day last March when Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64, two former New York police detectives, were slapped in handcuffs over dinner in Las Vegas, literary agents and Hollywood types have descended on the case. There were articles in Playboy and Vanity Fair, not to mention the city's newspapers. At a pretrial hearing in September, Mr. Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, mused aloud that every member of the prosecution team, except the two chief prosecutors, seemed to have a book deal.

But five books and (possibly) a movie? Without a doubt, the charges in the case are fairly spectacular, revolving around the accusation that the two men betrayed their badges in the 1980's and early 90's by helping to kill at least eight people while working for the mob. But the charges are also fairly old — some 20 years old. And dramatic as they are, they are not entirely surprising: the police and F.B.I. investigated the pair in 1994, but were unable to make a case.

DOJ_NMG_0016313

It is true that a gallery of "characters" will emerge at trial, including Burton Kaplan, a drug smuggler and wholesale clothier expected to testify that he served as the liaison between the two men and their Mafia overlord, Anthony Casso, who has the chilling nickname Gaspipe. Then there is Mr. Eppolito, who after his retirement, appeared in several movies, playing bit roles of the sort that one could easily miss while bending down to set one's popcorn on the floor.

It is also true, however, that the case does not really touch upon the larger sorts of issues that usually make a criminal trial— even a police-corruption trial — of interest. It does not, for instance, have the broader theme of cover-up, as did the Abner Louima case, in which one officer was charged with sodomizing Mr. Louima with a broomstick while others were charged with erecting a "blue wall of silence" to protect him. Nor does it have the bitter racial tensions of the Amadou Diallo case, in which white officers killed Mr. Diallo, a black man, in a hail of 41 shots.

United States v. Eppolito and Caracappa is a mob case, which is to say, a case with "color" — and therein lies the interest. On Feb. 9, USA Today ran a story deciding that it and other Mafia trials "have the ruthlessness, and the color, that America has come to expect from the mob." A subhead proclaimed: "A lot more colorful than ... Enron."

"This case has allure," said Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, who has been known to wax poetic on America's "psychological obsession" with the mob. "It's a throwback to an atavistic, bygone age."

In a time, and in a city, where it sometimes seems as if all the grit has packed up and moved away, "Mafia cops," as everyone calls the case, will offer glimpses of a salty, old-time Brooklyn. Testimony will include the tale of Eddie Lino, a Gambino family captain shot to death in his Mercedes on the Belt Parkway, and the story of Nicholas Guido, an innocent man killed in a case of mistaken identity because he shared a mobster's name.

"People like these trials for the same reason they're captivated by car accidents," said James Walden, a lawyer who spent six years in the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn prosecuting mobsters. "It's awful, it's degrading and all the characters are vile, but there's something in the theater of it that people can't seem to get enough of."

It helps, of course, when the theater allows catharsis without danger — when, morally speaking, the seats are free of charge.

"If you live a nonmob life, there's no reason to be threatened by the mob," said Gerald L. Shargel, a lawyer whose clients have included John J. Gotti, the late Gambino family don. "You can watch the stories unfold from a safe perch."

The safe perch in this case was the next-to-last row of the second-floor courtroom, where reporters, including three with book deals, sat to watch the trial begin. Not much happened: the jurors received a questionnaire asking if they had ever seen Mr. Hayes and Mr. Cutler on their show on Court TV. Mr. Eppolito, explaining that a tractor-trailer accident on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway delayed him, was late.

Mr. Cutler is an operatic presence, gruff and voluble and built like a tugboat. Mr. Hayes, by contrast, is lean and adrenal, with the quick wit of a bookie and a closetful of alligator shoes.

The prosecutors, Robert Henoch and Mitra Hormozi, are less prone to flaunt their personalities, but even Judge Jack B. Weinstein, as sober as they come, seemed to acknowledge that the trial would be a drama marked by courtroom flair.

"It will be an interesting trial," he told the jurors. "For many of you, it will be the most interesting experience of your life."

Bulger Brother To Lose Pension For Lying (LAT/AP)

By Ken Maguire, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

BOSTON — The state's highest court ruled Monday that a brother of fugitive mobster James "Whitey" Bulger must forfeit his $65,000-a-year state pension because he lied to grand juries investigating the gangster's disappearance.

Lawyers for John "Jackie" Bulger, a retired court clerk magistrate, had argued that his crimes were based on family loyalty and didn't affect his job.

But the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that he had an "unwavering obligation to tell the truth" to grand juries investigating his brother's disappearance.

DOJ_NMG_0016314

John Bulger, 67, pleaded guilty to perjury and obstruction of justice in 2003 for lying to two federal grand juries. He admitted that he lied when he testified he had not heard from his brother since he fled in 1995. He also admitted lying to a grand jury in 1996 when he said had no knowledge about a deposit box owned by his brother.

Because his crimes were committed while in office, John Bulger may have to repay $243,000 in pension money he has already received. The state had not yet decided whether to seek repayment.

It's not the only Bulger pension dispute.

The state is appealing a Superior Court's November ruling that gave another brother, former University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, $29,000 more than what he was awarded by the state's pension system. William Bulger's annual pension is now $208,000.

Whitey Bulger, 76, the oldest of the brothers, is wanted in connection with 21 murders and is on the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted" list. Prosecutors say he ran the Winter Hill Gang and was an FBI informant who ratted out his competitors in the 1970s and '80s.

Paul T. Hynes, attorney for John Bulger, did not immediately return a call to comment. A phone listing in South Boston for Bulger was temporarily disconnected Monday.

Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

MIAMI, March 6 -- A federal judge refused Monday to allow a lengthy delay in the sentencing of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, even though lawyers for both sides said the move could jeopardize a federal corruption investigation involving Congress and the Bush administration.

Abramoff attorney Abbe Lowell warned that the defense would disclose information about the ongoing corruption investigation to demonstrate the level of Abramoff's cooperation, something that could affect his sentence in the fraud case.

"We will name names," Lowell said by telephone at a hearing before U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck. "That is not a good thing for law enforcement."

The judge agreed to delay sentencing from March 16 to March 29, but he rejected a joint motion by federal prosecutors and attorneys for Abramoff and co-defendant Adam Kidan to hold off for at least 90 days.

"I just don't want to get involved in a situation where it just goes on and on and on," Huck said. "I don't see any reason for postponing the sentencing."

Huck said the government can always request a reduction in Abramoff's sentence later and that he probably would allow both Abramoff and Kidan to remain free for a reasonable amount of time after they are sentenced.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Jan. 4 to charges that he and Kidan fabricated a wire transfer to make it appear they were putting a sizable chunk of their own money into the $147.5 million purchase of the SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet in 2000. Kidan pleaded guilty late last year.

Abramoff also pleaded guilty in January to charges stemming from an investigation into his ties to members of Congress and the Bush administration.

Shooter Now Denies Killing Ga. Socialite (WP)

By Harry R. Weber

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

ATLANTA -- In a stunning about-face, the admitted triggerman in the slaying of an Atlanta socialite denied Monday that he had ever seen the victim in person or that he killed her on orders from the woman's estranged husband.

Testifying at the murder trial of millionaire James Sullivan, Phillip Harwood also denied having any intention to take part in the January 1987 murder of Lita Sullivan at her upscale town house.

The denials came even though Harwood is serving a 20-year sentence for manslaughter after pleading guilty to killing Lita Sullivan. As part of the plea, he agreed to testify against James Sullivan.

"Have you ever laid eyes on her face before today," prosecutor Clint Rucker asked Harwood.

"Other than on the news, no," Harwood responded.

"Did you agree to participate in the death of Lita Sullivan?" Rucker asked.

After a long pause, Harwood turned toward the judge and responded, "Well, your honor, I'd have to answer no. I did not agree to murder Lita Sullivan. The agreement was to take care of her. That was what was spoken to me. As far as participating, my intention was never to participate."

Sullivan, 64, was captured in Thailand in 2002. He's accused of paying Harwood $25,000 to kill his 35-year-old second wife. She was shot by a man carrying a dozen roses and posing as a flower delivery man.

Prosecutors, who are seeking the death penalty, say Sullivan feared losing money and his Palm Beach, Fla., mansion in the divorce.

Harwood said he was in a getaway car nearby when the murder was committed by a man named "John" who worked as a bartender at a topless bar. He said he met the man through a stripper friend of his. Harwood didn't give the man's last name.

"I heard two shots. He came running back and I drove off," Harwood said.

He admitted to the jurors that he bought the flowers that were delivered to the victim.

Harwood also testified that Sullivan had approached him a few months before the slaying and inquired whether he knew anyone who could "take care of" Lita Sullivan. Harwood said he took that to mean one of two things, "either to kill her or to take care of her."

He testified that Sullivan mentioned that bringing his wife flowers would be a good way to get her to come to the door, and said he told Sullivan it might cost him $25,000 to fix his problem.

Harwood confirmed for jurors that he accepted two payments from Sullivan: a pair of cashier's checks for about $12,500 before Lita Sullivan was killed and an envelope filled with cash after she was dead. He said he met with Sullivan in a restaurant in Florida, where he was given the final payment.

Asked by the prosecutor why he took the money, Harwood said he did so because he was scared.

"What's he gonna think if I didn't take the last part of the money?" Harwood said. "He paid me to have somebody kill his wife. Don't you think he might want to take care of loose ends?"

Harwoods' denials put the prosecutor in the unusual position of having to aggressively cross-examine his own witness.

"Do you bear any responsibility Mr. Harwood as you sit here?" Rucker said.

"I guess I do by proxy," Harwood responded, though he didn't clarify what he meant by that.

Rucker pressed Harwood about a claim that he wanted to warn Lita Sullivan three days before the murder.

"Didn't you have her phone number? Why didn't you just call her?" Rucker asked.

"I never thought about it," Harwood responded.

Rucker also questioned Harwood's other claims.

"Would you admit that that story by you is unbelievable?" Rucker asked.

"No, I wouldn't admit that," Harwood responded.

"Look at these jurors in the eyes and tell them you did not kill Lita Sullivan," Rucker asked.

"I did not shoot and kill Lita Sullivan," Harwood said.

Alleged Hitman In Sullivan Trial Blames Another Admits To Being Paid $25,000 To Kill Buckhead Woman (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 7, 2006

The man serving time for the 1987 killing of Buckhead resident Lita McClinton testified Monday that he wasn't the triggerman.

Phillip Anthony "Tony" Harwood said that although millionaire murder for hire defendant James Vincent Sullivan paid him $25,000 to kill his estranged wife, she was killed by a man he knew only as "John the bartender."

Harwood said on Jan. 13, he, John, and a woman he described as a hooker, travelled from North Carolina to the Atlanta area and checked into a hotel.

DOJ_NMG_0016316

On the morning of Jan. 16, Harwood said he drove John to McClinton's Buckhead townhome. Harwood said he sat in the car while John left the car. He heard two gunshots "a heartbeat apart" and when John returned he had blood on his face, Harwood testified.

Harwood said he then drove to a Suwanee reststop and called Sullivan, informing him of the hit.

Harwood, 55, pleaded guilty in 2003 to voluntary manslaughter in McClinton's death and received a 20-year prison sentence, avoiding the death penalty, in return for a pledge to testify against Sullivan.

When prosecutor Clint Rucker asked Harwood if he agreed to kill Lita Sullivan, Harwood replied, "To be honest, I have to answer no. The agreement was to 'take care of her' but my intention was never to participate."

"What do you think Sullivan meant by 'take care of her,'" asked Rucker.

"I figured he meant to kill her, you don't pay $25,000 to scare nobody," said Harwood.

Harwood said Sullivan first broached the subject at Sullivan's Palm Beach mansion on Nov. 24, 1986, nearly two months before the murder. Harwood had just moved Sullivan's furniture from Macon to Palm Beach, Fla.

"Mr. Sullivan told me he was having problems with his soon-to-be ex-wife — she was going to take him for everything he's got. He asked me if I knew of anyone who could take care of his problem," Harwood testified.

"I recognize shoe shuffling and BS-ing when I hear it. I think he was jiving me. He was angry and I didn't take nothing serious," he said.

Rucker asked Harwood when he knew Sullivan was no longer joking.

"When I got $12,500 in the mail," the witness said.

Earlier Monday, Harwood's former girlfriend was questioned for more than three hours by defense attorneys.

Belinda Trahan once again pointed out millionaire James Vincent Sullivan as the man she saw hand Harwood $25,000 in a Florida diner for the contract killing.

Defense attorney Ed Garland was questioning Trahan on the relatively short amount of time she had been in Sullivan's presence, when, in a voice bordering on anger, Trahan said, "I know what I saw and you can't take that from me no matter what you do."

Trahan didn't hesitate on the witness stand last week when she was asked to point out the person who gave her boyfriend money not long after the murder.

"He's right there," Trahan said, pointing to Sullivan. "Glasses. Blue suit. White hair."

Sullivan, 64, showed no reaction to Trahan's identification.

One of the most compelling witnesses in the trial to date, Trahan, 47, who now lives in Texas, spent almost two hours testifying for the prosecution Friday. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty for Sullivan.

Trahan came forward about the murder in 1998, after hearing of a television show about the unsolved killing. Employed by Texas attorney Ed Lieck, she told him she recalled being with Harwood when he met a man she later learned was Sullivan at a Florida diner.

Trahan testified Harwood, then living in Albemarle, N.C., had told her right before the slaying, " 'Some white guy wanted to take out his black wife.' They were in a divorce and he didn't want her to have anything."

Sullivan is white; Lita Sullivan was black.

Defense attorney Ed Garland questioned Trahan on details of the clothing she said Sullivan had worn in the diner. Under cross-examination, she admitted she had never heard Sullivan's name until she had heard it from Lieck.

Accused Hit Man And Star Witness Denies Shooting Millionaire's Wife (COURTTV)

By Emanuella Grinberg, Court TV

Court TV, March 7, 2006

ATLANTA — Prosecutors have cast convicted felon Phillip Anthony Harwood as the key to their 19-year-old case against a millionaire they believe took out a hit on his wife.

DOJ_NMG_0016317

But less than 10 minutes into his testimony in James Sullivan's capital murder trial Tuesday, the former truck driver turned jailhouse lawyer emerged as a wild card for both the defense and the state, implicating Sullivan one instant while denying being the shooter.

"Did you agree to participate in the death of Lita Sullivan?" Fulton County Assistant District Attorney Clint Rucker asked Harwood, 55, who is serving a 20-year sentence for voluntary manslaughter in exchange for his testimony.

"To be honest, I'd have to answer no. I didn't directly agree to murder Lita Sullivan," the tall, lanky witness answered after a long pause, setting the tone for his largely unapologetic testimony.

Story continues

advertisement

To the contrary, Harwood cast himself as an unwitting pawn in James Sullivan's plot despite numerous good intentions, from an attempt to withdraw from the plot to his plan to tell Lita Sullivan of the hit and turn the tables on her husband.

Harwood was unwavering in his story that, with the help of a topless dancer named Tracy, he enlisted a man simply known as John the bartender to gun down Lita Sullivan in her upscale Buckhead townhouse the morning of Jan. 16, 1987.

"Do you bear any responsibility, Mr. Harwood?" Rucker asked, his own tone incredulous at time of his witness.

"I guess I do, by what you may call proxy," said Harwood, whose jeans and beige shirt concealed a remote-controlled restraining mechanism. "I believe we're all accountable for our own acts, but I guess if you got down to the brass tax of it, it all began with Mr. Sullivan."

Prosecutors entered into evidence a piece of paper on which Tony Harwood had written James Sullivan's phone number.

Harwood testified James Sullivan asked him for help in November 1986, after the trucker hauled the wealthy investor's furniture from his home in Macon, Ga., to his Palm Beach mansion. Sullivan was living alone in the midst of an acrimonious divorce from his estranged wife, who was 10 years younger.

"He kind of goes, 'I've got this wife in Atlanta, and she's just trying to take me for everything I've got, do you know anyone who can take care of my problem?'" Harwood testified as he rubbed his forehead and flailed his arms in an attempt to imitate Sullivan.

Harwood said he tried to brush off the request. Even so, a few weeks later, he received a down payment of $12,500 in the form of two certified checks from Sullivan.

"I didn't take him seriously but then, when checks came, I thought what am I going to do now?" he testified.

Ultimately, Harwood testified he decided to keep the money out of fear for what might happen should he refuse it.

After the group's first trip to Atlanta to warn Lita Sullivan of the plot, according to Harwood, they returned a second time at John the bartender's behest, perhaps to see if they could persuade Lita to contract a similar hit on her husband.

With a picture of Lita Sullivan holding a bouquet of flowers projected behind him, the witness testified that he purchased the box of flowers that John the bartender carried to Lita's doorstep at the recommendation of James Sullivan, who said his wife adored flowers.

Even so, Harwood insisted he remained in the car, and expressed shock when his crony came running out of the complex after two gunshots rang out, his face spattered with Lita Sullivan's blood.

James Sullivan listened to the testimony Monday.

The sequestered jury panel of 13 women and three men appeared skeptical of Harwood's claims, taking notes mostly when his version of events contradicted those testified to by previous trial witnesses.

His story clashed most with that of his ex-girlfriend, Belinda Trahan, who spent two days on the stand describing how she finally came to realize her boyfriend was involved in Lita Sullivan's murder.

Nearly 11 years after Lita Sullivan's death, Trahan's tip to authorities finally enabled them to connect the dots between the defendant and his wife's death.

While Trahan testified that she saw Sullivan pass her boyfriend a newspaper concealing an envelope of cash at a restaurant table, Harwood insisted that the trade-off occurred in the bathroom.

Trahan also claimed that the meeting occurred days, maybe weeks, after the January shooting, while Harwood said they made the trip to Florida in August 1987.

Even so, Harwood said he bore no animus toward the woman he referred to as his common-law wife of three years.

DOJ_NMG_0016318

"I worshipped the ground she walked on," Harwood said. "Belinda was everything I had ever dreamed of. She was kind, considerate, a kid at heart, a good mother... she'd make any man proud."

"How do you feel about her today?" Rucker asked as Lita Sullivan's parents and relatives listened intently from the gallery.

"I'm glad she had more courage than I had," he said, referring to her decision to turn him in.

The prosecutor's questioning of his own witness grew increasingly testy as Harwood refused to acknowledge he was the shooter.

"Mr. Harwood, this is an opportunity for you to tell these jurors the whole truth," Rucker said, as Lita McClinton's father, Emory, wiped a tear from under his eyeglasses. "Can you look at these jurors and tell them you did not shoot and kill Lita Sullivan?"

"I did not shoot and kill Lita Sullivan," Harwood said as he turned his chair to face the panel.

Lawyers for James Sullivan will cross-examine the witness Tuesday.

Hit Man: James Sullivan Hired Me (WXIA-TV)

WXIA-TV, March 7, 2006

Tony Harwood points to James Sullivan.

The convicted hit man in the murder-for-hire trial of Palm Beach, Fla. millionaire James Sullivan took the stand as the state's star witness Monday afternoon.

Under questioning by Fulton County prosecutor Clint Rucker, Phillip Anthony Harwood said he first met the defendant when he delivered furniture to him from Sullivan's former home in Macon, Ga. Harwood said Sullivan started to hint around about needing help dealing with his estranged wife in Atlanta who was "trying to take everything he has."

When Rucker asked Harwood how he knew Sullivan wasn't joking about having his wife killed, Harwood responded, "When I received $12,500 in the mail." Harwood said Sullivan suggested he could "get to her by delivering flowers because she liked flowers." Harwood said he named his price at $25,000.

Lita Sullivan was shot and killed at her Buckhead condominium in January 1987 by a man posing as a flower deliveryman. Harwood avoided a death penalty trial in deal to testify at Sullivan's death penalty trial in Atlanta. Harwood has changed a part of his confession and claims he did not actually fire the shots that killed Lita Sullivan. He said in court that he hired his own hitman to carry out the job.

When asked to point out the man who paid him to kill Lita Sullivan, Harwood said, "Mr. Sullivan's sitting right over there," pointing at the defendant. When asked if Sullivan looked any different than when they met 20 years earlier, Harwood said he looked a lot older.

Earlier Monday, the woman Harwood described as his former common law wife, wrapped up her testimony. Belinda Trahan told jurors that James Sullivan was the man who sat down at a diner with her and Harwood and that Sullivan pushed a newspaper full of money toward Harwood as payment for killing Lita Sullivan.

During cross examination, Sullivan's attorney, Ed Garland, said Trahan's motive for testifying against Sullivan is greed. She responded, "Like I said before, I'm not interested in any reward so can we move on?"

While Garland tried to shake Trahan, he attacked her memory as faulty and her identification of James Sullivan as uncertain and unreliable.

"I know what I saw and you can't take that from me no matter what you do," said Trahan.

Alleged Hitman's Ex Cross-examined At Sullivan Trial (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Keller, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), March 7, 2006

ATLANTA — Belinda Trahan finished a grueling cross-examination from James Sullivan's attorney Monday by insisting he is the man she saw pass an envelope full of money to her then-boyfriend as payment for killing Sullivan's second wife 19 years ago.

"I'm absolutely sure of the man I saw," Trahan, 47, said, her voice rising. Then, as she did on Friday, Trahan stood in the witness box and pointed at Sullivan seated at the defense table, "looking down again, not looking at me." Trahan was questioned for more than five hours on Friday and Monday, and about three hours of that was an interrogation by Ed Garland, one of Sullivan's attorneys. Item by item, point by point, he showed inconsistencies and contradictions in Trahan's trial testimony and earlier statements she has made to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0016319

By his questions, Garland suggested Trahan was motivated to come forward with her story in 1998 in order to collect a reward that still has not been paid, and that her story was influenced by news accounts she had read.

Trahan says that Philip "Tony" Harwood told her he had participated in the 1987 slaying of Lita Sullivan, who was about to divorce James Sullivan, a millionaire who lived in Palm Beach at the time.

Harwood was subsequently arrested and told police that Sullivan paid him $25,000 for the job. Some evidence points to Harwood as being the man who delivered a dozen roses to Lita Sullivan, then shot her in the head. He has denied being the shooter.

Garland had Trahan refer to a synopsis of events that she typed in 1998, and to statements she made to police that year. She said back then that "I really wasn't paying attention" at the meeting with Sullivan and Harwood at a restaurant, and that "I didn't look at (Sullivan) real good." She also said she had never seen Harwood with a gun, but she testified that he always kept a 9 mm pistol in the moving van he drove. Lita Sullivan was killed with a 9 mm pistol.

Trahan denied having read about Lita Sullivan's murder prior to talking to police in 1998. Where did you get the information you gave them, prosecutor Kellie Stevens Hill asked.

"From real life," the earthy Trahan replied.

Harwood's much-anticipated testimony is expected this afternoon.

Sullivan, 64, was indicted for his wife's murder by a Fulton County grand jury in 1998. He was arrested in Thailand in 2002, and finally extradited to Atlanta in 2004.

Official Indicted For Fraud, Bribery (ARMYTIME)

By Michelle Tan, Times staff writer

Army Times, March 6, 2006

An official at Army Test and Evaluation Command was indicted March 1 for fraud and bribery, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Jeffrey H. Stayton, chief of aviation for ATEC was charged with two counts of honest services fraud, one count of bribery and one count of obstruction of justice after an indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in the Middle District of Alabama.

The grand jury in Montgomery, Ala., also indicted William Curtis Childree, a private contractor based in Enterprise, Ala. Childree, 67, is charged with two counts of honest services fraud and one count of bribery.

According to the indictment, in or about November 2001, Maverick Aviation, a business owned and run by Childree that buys and distributes helicopters for its clients, was chosen to produce and modify two helicopters for use by the U.S. government. The contract was worth about $4.7 million.

Stayton, 55, is accused of taking actions that favored Maverick's selection to get thecontract and misleading government officials about Maverick's performance under the contract , according to the Justice Department.

The indictment against the men also states that in exchange for Stayton's actions, Childree secretly wired to a third party $61,071.75 from a Maverick bank account to pay off Stayton's mortgage in Spotsylvania County, Va.

Stayton didn't disclose receipt of the payment to other ATEC or Army personnel or in his financial disclosure statements, according to the Justice Department.

The indictment goes on to say that in or around June 2005, after the grand jury investigation had begun, Stayton appeared before the grand jury and falsely testified that Childree's $61,000 payment was a loan.

ATEC plans and conducts tests and evaluations of weapons and equipment . Its headquarters is in Alexandria, Va.

The fraud charge carries up to 20 years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000 or both. If found guilty of bribery, the men could face up to 15 years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000 or both. And if Stayton is found guilty of obstruction of justice he could be given up to 10 more years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000 or both.

The case was investigated by Army Criminal Investigation Command and the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0016320

US Snubs Britain Over Sex Criminals (TIMES)

By Tom Baldwin in Washington

London Times, March 7, 2006

BRITAIN and the United States were locked in a deepening diplomatic dispute last night over Washington's failure to implement a mutual extradition agreement that Parliament approved three years ago.

Congress's refusal to ratify the deal means that Britain cannot prosecute criminals residing in the US, including sex offenders and paedophiles.

America has sought the extradition of 44 alleged offenders since 2003, and 12 have already been sent to the US. The extradition of several others has been approved but is awaiting appeal. In contrast, Britain extradited only five suspects from the US in the same period under the previous thirty-year-old extradition treaty, including just one in 2005.

Ministers have repeatedly raised the issue with their US counterparts, and Charles Clarke, the Home Secretary, protested again when he met Alberto Gonzales, the US Attorney-General, in London yesterday.

Diplomats led by Sir David Manning, Ambassador to the US, have also held about 30 meetings on the issue on Capitol Hill in recent months. But pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Indeed, America's failure to abide by its side of the deal is fast becoming a political embarrassment for a British government often accused of showing undue deference to Washington.

A total of 145 MPs, including many Labour backbenchers, have signed a Commons motion demanding that extraditions to the US be halted until the Senate ratifies the treaty.

A Home Office spokeswoman confirmed that it was encountering obstacles in extraditing suspects, particularly sex offenders, from the US. This is because the existing treaty, dating to 1972 and listing a schedule of extraditable offences, "was drawn up before the internet was invented". She said: "There are people we want who are successfully evading justice."

A senior US official told The Times yesterday that the Administration was sympathetic to Britain's concerns and hinted that a fresh attempt to force the treaty through the Senate would be made within weeks.

The official said that the problem had been caused by the influential Irish-American lobby, which is worried that the treaty could be used to pursue IRA suspects. Senators are worried about alienating any section of voters before November's congressional elections. British diplomats have emphasised that, after the Good Friday agreement, Britain has little interest in pursuing IRA suspects.

Those currently facing extradition to the US under the 2003 deal include the "Nat West Three" who face up to 35 years in prison if convicted of Enron-related fraud charges. Their lawyers, who are appealing to the House of Lords, claim they are victims of an unequal law.

Another Briton extradited to the US for financial offences is Nigel Potter, former chief executive of Wembley plc, who will today begin an appeal against a three-year sentence for fraud.

Potter was convicted of conspiring to bribe a US politician so that his company could install fruit machines at an American greyhound track. No bribes were paid, however, and Potter was acquitted of all but three charges of wire fraud.

In contrast to the white collar suspects being sent to the US, Britain is being prevented from bringing to justice US suppliers of computer child pornography, including some of those related to Operation Ore two years ago, which discovered 6,000 Britons using an American website.

The 1972 treaty also contains a statute of limitations which does not allow extradition for offences that took place more than six years ago. Officials say this is a particular problem in child abuse cases because victims often do not come foward until they are adults.

Since the new treaty was agreed in March 2003, countries such as Lithuania, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia and Peru have had extradition deals ratified by Congress. John Ashcroft, the US AttorneyGeneral in 2003, said that the new treaty "should serve as a model to the world for successful and efficient co-operation."

Prosecutors Target White Supremacist Gang (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016321

(AP) - SANTA ANA, Calif.-The inmates had to heat the letter to draw out the message, written in invisible ink. When they did, their orders were clear.

Within hours, prosecutors say, members of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang sneaked into a nearby cellblock and killed two black inmates with handmade shanks as part of an order to "go to war" with blacks.

The deaths are two of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed by federal prosecutors in a sweeping case against the Aryan Brotherhood, a violent white supremacist prison gang that has infiltrated nearly every federal and state prison since its beginnings in San Quentin in 1964.

Prosecutors hope to dismantle the gang - nicknamed the "Brand" - in a series of trials that together make up what's believed to be the biggest capital murder case in U.S. history. Of the 40 men initially charged, as many as 16 could face the death penalty for crimes that reach back 30 years.

Prosecutors are pursuing the highly organized gang with a racketeering law originally passed to target Mafia leaders - a tactic recently used with some success against other prison gangs in California and Texas.

"We're looking at this huge list of charges, and I'm unaware of any other case that's even close to this," said Dean Steward, attorney for Barry "The Baron" Mills, a lead defendant.

Opening statements in the trial of Mills and three others are scheduled to begin March 14 in federal court in Santa Ana. Mills and another alleged ringleader, Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, face the death penalty in what could be a nine-month trial.

Four more defendants are set to go on trial in Los Angeles in October; court dates in California are pending for the remaining men. Nineteen of the 40 defendants struck plea bargains, and one has died.

The 140-page indictment against the gang alleges a web of conspiracies to murder fellow inmates who offended gang members, cheated them on drug deals, failed to comply with the orders of leaders or snitched to prison authorities. Prosecutors, who declined to be interviewed, spent six years compiling evidence and relied on informants for much of their case.

Court documents suggest that patient gang members waited months to carry out the violent tasks ordered by their leaders, passing information from prison to prison and member to member using friends and spouses on the outside, corrupt prison guards and notes written with invisible ink.

In one case, for example, members of the Aryan Brotherhood allegedly spent a year planning the murder of Richard Barnes, the father of a fellow gang member who had testified against the gang. Members funneled his address and firearms to someone on the outside, who shot him in the head in 1983, according to court documents.

"This has the potential of being incredibly damaging to the brotherhood," said Joanna Mendelson, an investigative researcher with the Anti-Defamation League, which tracks the Aryan Brotherhood. "They rank among the most organized, systematic gangs in all the prison system."

Mills, who faces a number of charges in the current case, has already been convicted of luring another inmate into a recreation shack at a federal lockup in Atlanta in 1979 with the promise that he would get a new tattoo.

Instead, Mills nearly decapitated the man with a handmade knife - his punishment for cheating the brotherhood on a drug deal, according to court documents.

Mills, now 57, went on to become a founder of a three-member group that prosecutors say ordered and approved murders carried out by gang members or aspiring members. He is currently serving two life terms for the 1979 murder, which is detailed in the indictment as part of the government's racketeering case.

Mills, Bingham and the others going to trial have pleaded not guilty.

"The reality is, federal penitentiaries are violent and dangerous places and all of these guys - white guys - are a small minority and they're just trying to survive," Steward said.

Civil rights groups that monitor the Aryan Brotherhood say highly disciplined gang members managed to communicate frequently, despite 23 hours a day in solitary confinement.

Accused members often acted as their own attorneys and subpoenaed other brotherhood members to testify, allowing them to pass messages in court through hand signals and code words or slip messages into legal files, said Melissa Carr, an expert on the gang with the Anti-Defamation League.

DOJ_NMG_0016322

Some gang members write messages to outside helpers using coded alphabets or invisible ink made with their own urine, she said, while others pass tiny messages on a string, called "kites," from one cell to another when guards aren't looking.

Experts say prosecutors will face challenges in their push for death penalties - particularly because nearly all the victims were convicted felons and many defendants are already serving long prison terms.

"The jury says, 'Well, these people are in prison already and if they kill other prison inmates, who cares?'" said William McGuigan, a defense attorney who has worked on several Mexican Mafia cases. "They aren't outraged like they are if the victims are ordinary citizens."

Lemon Grove Medical Clinic Shut Down In Alleged Fraud Conspiracy (SDUT)

By Angelica Martinez, UNION-TRIBUNE BREAKING NEWS TEAM

The San Diego Union-Tribune, March 7, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A Lemon Grove medical clinic was shut down after its owners and employees were charged with defrauding Medi-Cal out of more than $2 million, authorities said Monday.

Nine people, including the owners and a doctor who worked at a medical clinic on Golden Avenue east of Lemon Grove Avenue, were indicted last week on 47 counts that included conspiracy; insurance fraud; capping, or illegally referring patients; tax evasion; grand theft and operating a business without workers' compensation insurance, the District Attorney's Office announced.

During the course of a 15-month investigation, the clinic billed Medi-Cal more than $2 million for services patients did not receive, said District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis.

“This was a tremendous amount of money and they were targeting vulnerable people,” Dumanis said.

FBI agents first learned about the clinic in November 2004 when patients complained that they were being billed for treatment that they did not receive, said Daniel R. Dzwilewski, special agent in charge of the San Diego FBI office.

Dumanis said the scheme targeted patients who are elderly and speak poor English. She said they were recruited at casinos, trolley stops and senior citizen homes.

The services the clinic billed Medi-Cal for but did not perform included nerve conduction studies, elaborate dizziness testing and other tests.

“The clinic was like a cash register,” said Rita Hanscom, a deputy district attorney.

Several of the employees also did not report the fraudulent income they earned from Medi-Cal and did not file related employment taxes, officials said. They said the clinic also did not have workers' compensation insurance.

One of those charged, Dr. Arthur Vallejo, wrote repetitive or useless prescriptions that cost Medi-Cal more than $53,000, officials said.

Vallejo, 46, and his wife, Cynthia, 28, both of Downey, were indicted along with clinic owners Anush Manukyan, 45, and her husband, Rafik, 50, both of Van Nuys.

Others indicted were Tommie L. Williams Jr., 52, of La Mesa; Marites Ramano Dioso, 34, of National City; Fernando C. Lantano, 40, and Alicia Musa Leonardo, 72, both of San Diego and Erlinda Solon Cabungcal, 62, of National City.

Patients told investigators they were paid to go to the clinic by Cabungcal, Dioso, Lantana and Leonardo.

Authorities said a North Hollywood clinic owned by the Manukyans was also under investigation.

Feds Expand Dearborn Credit Fraud Case With Indictments (DEN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, March 7, 2006

What started with two brothers now has 17 more people; racketeering, conspiracy are alleged.

DEARBORN -- What began as an investigation into whether two Dearborn brothers committed credit card fraud has grown into a money-laundering indictment charging the pair and 17 of their business associates and relatives.

Defense attorneys now say prosecutors threatened to indict the suspects' family members unless they agreed to plead guilty. They also accuse government investigators of improperly obtaining secret wiretaps in the investigation of Dearborn perfume distributor Ali Abdul Karim Farhat and his brother, Hassan Farhat.

When plea negotiations with some suspects failed, a federal grand jury in recent months charged additional people with bankruptcy fraud, conspiracy, false statements, mail fraud, bank fraud, money laundering and racketeering. In total, the indictments allege that the ring defrauded banks of $1.7 million.

At the same time, hundreds of pages of secret wiretap records recently made public show that the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force went to great lengths in its investigation of the Farhats -- installing a secret surveillance camera outside a Dearborn business, stealing a suspect's trash and having an undercover agent pose as a businessman seated next to a suspect on an airplane flight.

In January 2004, the two brothers were charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and held without bond for two weeks. Their arrest came largely on the basis of testimony from Myron Strong, a longtime FBI informant who later pleaded guilty to inventing evidence and conning the FBI out of $240,000. Strong is serving a 10-year-prison sentence.

The Farhats also were accused of supporting Hezbollah, the Lebanese terror group -- a claim withdrawn in February 2004 when, based on the unreliability of Strong's testimony, government prosecutors also dismissed the drug charge.

In April 2004, a federal grand jury indicted Ali Farhat and his brother, along with eight other people. In two later indictments, the grand jury added nine additional suspects.

The group was charged with running a "credit card bust-out scheme" that involved obtaining credit cards, racking up large balances and defaulting on the loans.

Defense lawyers say that by December 2004, the U.S. attorney's office began circulating plea agreements contingent on all defendants pleading guilty. At the time, 12 people had been indicted.

Defense lawyers say the plea offers were coercive.

"The government made threats and used intimidation in an attempt to coerce guilty pleas from the defendants," said a filing signed by eight defense lawyers and written by Philip J. Thomas, a lawyer for Abdul Halim Berro, one of the defendants.

"It is beyond comprehension how a federal prosecutor could be allowed to engage in bribe tactics in order to induce a guilty plea," Thomas wrote.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Cathleen Corken, the lead prosecutor, said the government would respond to the defense motions by March 8 -- Wednesday. A U.S. district judge set a March 30 hearing.

Sniper Lists Complaints To Judge (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad appeared in Montgomery County Circuit Court in Rockville yesterday with a list of complaints, including charges that jailers have restricted his access to court documents in his trial for six Washington-area sniper shootings.

He also complained about disagreements with his attorneys over legal filings and that he had been denied long underwear to wear in court.

Muhammad also lost a pair of pretrial motions during yesterday's hearing in advance of his scheduled May 1 trial. He was transferred to Montgomery County last summer from Virginia, where he has been sentenced to death.

Circuit Judge John Ryan granted a request from county prosecutors to present evidence of other shootings Muhammad and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo are accused of carrying out before and during the three-week October 2002 shooting rampage in the Washington region.

Judge Ryan also blocked a request by Muhammad's attorneys to hold separate trials for some of the six murders that occurred in Montgomery County, the first on Oct. 2 and the last on Oct. 22, 2002.

When the motion was first presented in court, Muhammad cut short his court-appointed attorney, saying he never agreed to filing the motion.

"I ask for that motion not to be put in," he said before the motion was heard. "I disagree with it 100 percent, Your Honor."

Throughout a legal process that began with his 2003 murder trial, conviction and death sentence in Virginia, Muhammad has actively inserted himself into his defense.

DOJ_NMG_0016324

Shortly before his first trial began, he briefly dismissed his attorneys and handled his own case, making an opening statement and questioning some witnesses. He eventually allowed his attorneys to return.

In court yesterday, Montgomery corrections officials testified that Muhammad has seven boxes of legal documents that he brought with him from Virginia.

He worked out an agreement with his jailers that gives him access to the material, but he complained that prison officials only give him limited records at a time. He said he needed to review much of it at the same time.

"I asked for access to all the material," he said. "All of the quote-unquote crimes that I committed occurred together."

Robert Green, warden of the Montgomery County jail, testified that Muhammad has adequate access to his records. Judge Ryan agreed after hearing both arguments.

Prosecutors say Muhammad and Malvo tried to extort $10 million from local governments during their spree. In all, they are accused of killing 10 persons and wounding three in Maryland, Virginia and the District in October 2002. They have been linked to earlier killings in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington state.

Malvo was also convicted in Virginia and sentenced to life in prison. He is scheduled to go on trial in Montgomery County in the fall for the six murders.

Malvo is not eligible for a death sentence because he was 17 when the murders occurred, and prosecutors said last week that they will not seek a death sentence for Muhammad in Maryland.

Grand Jury Decries 'Arrests Without Merit' (BSUN)

By Julie Bykowicz

The Baltimore Sun, March 7, 2006

A Baltimore grand jury is calling for the number of city arrests that fail to result in criminal charges to be cut in half, saying such arrests erode public confidence in the Police Department, according to a report released Monday.

"If the staggering number of arrests is to be validated, the percentage of arrests without merit must be drastically reduced," the report says. The jurors also said that frequent police stops of residents is an approach "bordering on violating a person's constitutional rights."

The panel of 23 grand jurors that met from September to January was asked by a Baltimore Circuit Court judge to "address the lack of confidence that exists between many members of the public and law enforcement."

The grand jury appears to have done its research by reviewing media reports and arrest statistics, as well as speaking with each other and with "several" residents, though the report does not say how many. Grand jurors talked to one person from the Police Department, the head of education and training.

The report gives about two dozen recommendations, but few are specific. One example: "Improve the quality of narcotics arrests." One recommendation was to reduce "arrests without merit" -- an apparent reference to arrests that don't result in charges -- by at least 50 percent before the end of this year.

The report cites a state Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services report that 21,721 African-Americans in Baltimore were arrested but not charged between April 2004 and March 2005. Grand jurors said this number shows that "countless people have been harassed."

Lt. Paul M. Blair Jr., president of the city police union, had not read the report, but he said that the recommendation to make fewer arrests conflicts with what officers hear at neighborhood meetings where residents complain about quality-of-life issues.

"Can they tell us which neighborhoods we should stop making arrests in?" Blair asked. "It sounds like it was a waste of paper if that's all they came out with."

Matt Jablow, a Police Department spokesman, said the phrase "without merit" does not make sense. "Officers are not allowed to make arrests without merit," he said. "There has to be probable cause, and that is merit."

If the grand jury is referring to reducing the number of arrests that fail to result in criminal charges, Jablow said, "we share that sentiment." He said the department has taken steps to improve training and report-writing.

The percentage of arrests that fail to generate charges has decreased from 23 percent in December to 14 percent last month, said Kristen Mahoney, chief of technical services for the city Police Department, referring to public safety statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0016325

The main function of a grand jury is to decide which criminal cases warrant indictments. Among the cases handled by this grand jury were the indictments of three Southwestern District officers. One officer is accused of raping a woman brought to the station house in handcuffs, and the other two are accused of doing nothing to stop it.

The grand jury is forbidden to discuss individual cases it hears, so those indictments are not mentioned in its report, nor is a public hearing in early January at which the police commissioner and mayor were criticized for what residents called aggressive tactics.

Circuit Judge Joseph P. McCurdy assigned the topic in September, on the heels of a Sun report about two judges saying in open court that they didn't believe police officers who were testifying in two particular cases.

"This is something the community as a whole needs to address," McCurdy said at the time.

Five years ago, another judge assigned a grand jury to study whether the public was losing confidence in the Police Department. This latest grand jury report was intended to build on those findings, which found distrust, McCurdy said. The judge did not return phone calls Monday.

The jurors -- 21 women and two men -- devoted 20 pages of its report to McCurdy's topic, touching on everything from media coverage to the number of arrests. Several recommendations were made for each topic.

Some examples:

Police officers should be "retrained to use better judgment and common sense in determining if an individual is actually involved in criminal activity."

Increase neighborhood patrols and build relationships by having officers participate in programs such as the Police Athletic League and school programs.

Create a public service announcement "emphasizing the progress that the [Police Department] has made."

Jablow, the police spokesman, said the report would be "a useful tool" in the department's efforts to build relationships. "We'll do whatever it takes to make this a safer city and to improve relations with citizens," he said.

Crackdown On Animal-rights Activists (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

Animal-rights activists around the country - at least the most extreme - are becoming increasingly militant. And law enforcement officials and lawmakers are stepping up efforts to combat those who break the law.

These interconnected trends came to a head in New Jersey last week when an animal rights group and six of its members were convicted of inciting violence in their campaign to shut down a company that uses animals to test drugs and other consumer products.

The group, Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC), claims its actions constitute free speech. But federal prosecutors and the jury in a Trenton, N.J., courtroom called it harassment, stalking, and conspiracy - the first such conviction under the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act. The lab, Huntingdon Life Sciences (HLS), the largest of its kind in the world, is based in Britain and New Jersey.

Antivivisectionists and other animal-rights proponents have been organized in the US since at least the mid-19th century. But recently, their most extreme members have become more aggressive.

Much of the focus for animal-rights supporters is on companies that produce animal products (mainly meat and fur). In their sights, too, are universities, hospitals, and other institutions that kill animals for medical research or product development. And they have been targeting anyone who does business with animal testers - financial institutions, contractors, and service providers, some with only a tenuous connection.

Activists' tactics include vandalism, personal warnings by e-mail and phone message, and other threats directed at family members - what's called "tertiary targeting."

"There really isn't a week that goes by that I don't hear about an incident," says Jacquie Calnan, president of Americans for Medical Progress in Alexandria, Va., which represents universities, pharmaceutical and biomedical corporations, and research organizations.

DOJ_NMG_0016326

Most of those engaged in medical science say animal testing is crucial to find cures for disease and new devices meant to keep people healthy.

"Virtually every human being in the country has benefited from animal research," says John Young, a lab animal veterinarian and director of comparative medicine at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center in Los Angeles.

For example, recent research (including the human genome project) established that mice and humans are virtually identical in their genetic makeup. Specially bred mice are used to investigate ways to treat human diseases.

US research facilities use more than 1 million animals every year: dogs, cats, guinea pigs, hamsters, monkeys, sheep, and other farm animals. Add in mice and rats (more than 90 percent of all lab animals), and the total jumps to nearly 30 million, according to the US Department of Agriculture.

While most such animals eventually are killed, supporters of such research say avoiding animal suffering is a major consideration in their work.

"I don't know of a scientist or veterinarian who is not committed to the welfare of the animals," says Dr. Young.

Members of SHAC, the Animal Liberation Front (ALF), and People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), strongly disagree. In some cases, they've infiltrated research labs to produce photos and videos that show otherwise.

"It's clear that if you look at the science we have much better ways of testing drugs to see whether they're going to be toxic or helpful in human beings," says Jerry Vlasak, a trauma surgeon in Canoga Park, Calif.

"Unfortunately ... the FDA [US Food and Drug Administration] is still requiring animal testing, but they're way behind the science on this issue," says Dr. Vlasak, who's also a spokesman for radical animal rights activists that often announce their "direct actions" anonymously. "The scientific alternatives are out there."

That's a minority view in the medical community, and it is one that many lawmakers oppose.

Members of the US House and Senate are sponsoring the "Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act." It would toughen the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act by imposing penalties for veiled threats to individuals and families, economic disruption or damage, and "tertiary targeting."

Along with the recent indictment of ALF activists charged with arson and other crimes in Oregon and other parts of the West, the convictions in New Jersey are a setback for extremist animal-rights activists.

Still, the crackdown by the FBI and other police agencies has not slowed activists' efforts. One anonymous group just launched a website listing the home addresses of 2,000 employees from 30 companies doing business with Huntingdon Life Sciences.

"From CEOs to lowly sales reps, from Alabama to Hawaii, we've sniffed them out," activists are told. "Visit them often, and make the message clear: when you contract with HLS... you get us!"

CIVIL LAW:

Court Upholds Campus Military Recruiting (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday that the government can force colleges to open their campuses to military recruiters despite university objections to the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays.

Justices rejected a free-speech challenge from law schools and professors who claimed they should not have to associate with military recruiters or promote their campus appearances.

The decision was a setback for universities that had become the latest battleground over the military policy allowing gay men and women to serve only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

The ruling does not, however, answer broader questions about the policy itself. Challenges are pending in courts in Boston and Los Angeles that could eventually reach the high court.

Justices seemed swayed by the Bush administration's arguments that after the terrorist attacks, and during the war in Iraq, the government had a responsibility to bolster its recruitment.

DOJ_NMG_0016327

Chief Justice John Roberts said that campus visits are an effective recruiting tool. And, he said, "a military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message."

The 8-0 decision upheld a federal law that says universities must give the military the same access as other recruiters or forfeit federal money.

Justices ruled even more broadly, saying that Congress could directly demand military access on campus without linking the requirement to federal money.

"When you're in the middle of war, even if it's not a terribly popular one, courts are hesitant to tie the hands of the military," said Jon Davidson, legal director of gay rights group Lambda Legal.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, called the decision "an important victory for the military and ultimately for our national security."

The military's policy had put college leaders in a thorny situation because of campus rules that forbid participation of recruiters representing agencies or private companies that have discriminatory policies.

Most college leaders have said they could not afford to lose federal help, some $35 billion a year.

Roberts, writing his third decision since joining the court last fall, said there are other less drastic options for protesting the policy. "Students and faculty are free to associate to voice their disapproval of the military's message," he wrote.

Joshua Rosenkranz, the attorney for the challengers of the law, said that the case called attention to the military policy. "A silver lining to the Supreme Court's opinion is the court made it clear," he said, "law schools are free to organize protests."

Geoffrey Shields, dean of Vermont Law School, said the school since 1999 has given up some federal money and will continue to bar recruiters "as a symbol of the importance of fair treatment of all people."

"We've stuck to our guns and I anticipate we'll continue to stick to our guns," he said.

Roberts' decision carefully sidestepped taking a stand on the policy itself, although he explained in a footnote that under don't ask, don't tell, "a person generally may not serve in the Armed Forces if he has engaged in homosexual acts, stated that he is a homosexual, or married a person of the same sex."

The court roundly rejected arguments that the policy raised important First Amendment free-speech issues for school leaders.

"Compelling a law school that sends scheduling e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance, or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display the motto 'Live Free or Die,'" Roberts wrote.

Roberts filed the only opinion, which was joined by every justice but Samuel Alito. Alito did not participate because he was not on the bench when the case was argued three months ago.

Congress passed the law, known as the Solomon Amendment after its first congressional sponsor, in 1994 — the same year that the "don't ask, don't tell" law took effect. Since then, an estimated 10,000 people have been discharged.

Air Force Lt. Col. Ellen Krenke, a Pentagon spokeswoman, said Monday that "equal access to law school, and all schools for that matter, for our recruiters is crucial to ensuring we attract a diverse and highly qualified pool of applicants."

"The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything," the chief justice said.

The case is Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, 04-1152.

___

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Supreme Court Sides With Military On Recruiters' Access To Campuses (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, March 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016328

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court said Monday that Congress isn't trampling free speech by threatening to withhold federal funding from universities that kick military recruiters off campus because the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays conflicts with the schools' anti-discrimination practices.

In a unanimous 8-0 ruling, the justices said Congress isn't stopping the universities from protesting the policy, nor is it asking the schools to endorse the policy by granting military recruiters the same access they give other employers.

Congress' Solomon Amendment merely seeks to regulate what universities "must do - afford equal access to military recruiters - not what they may or may not say," Chief Justice John G. Roberts wrote for the court.

The ruling is a big boost to the military and a blow to 36 law schools that joined forces to fight what they'd described as overreaching by Congress. The schools will now face a choice: Grant military recruiters full access to their campuses, or forfeit what in some cases is hundreds of millions of dollars.

"It's an untenable choice, there's just no question about it," said E. Joshua Rosenkranz, the attorney for the schools. "But this is a skirmish in a much bigger war about equality and human dignity. That's a war we're winning."

The case ends a dispute that dates back decades but intensified in 2002, when lawmakers eager to boost military recruiting in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks got tough on universities.

In essence, they tied federal funding for universities to the hospitality they extend to military recruiters. Schools that treated the military like other employers would get their money. Those that chose to express their displeasure with the military's policy on gays by sending recruiters off campus or denying them the kind of reception that other employers received would have to forfeit their funds.

Since 1994, the military's policy of "don't ask, don't tell" has allowed gay men and women to serve as long as they didn't disclose their sexual preference or perform blatant homosexual acts in public.

Many law schools have stringent anti-discrimination policies that include protections for homosexuals; they give the same chilly welcome to recruiters from all employers that they feel discriminate.

A group of law schools objected to the new rules, saying Congress' edict was a violation of their free speech rights. They argued that it not only slapped down their protest, but also forced them to "associate" with the military's message by facilitating their recruitment efforts.

A federal district court rejected their arguments, but the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia sided with the schools, saying Congress' action was likely unconstitutional.

At the Supreme Court last fall, it seemed clear that the justices weren't buying the schools' argument. Several justices said it was within Congress' power to tie funding to access.

Roberts asked several times why, if the law schools felt so strongly about the policy, they didn't forgo the federal money.

In his opinion on Monday, he outlined how First Amendment protections of free speech and association weren't jeopardized by what Congress did.

"The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything," Roberts wrote. "Law schools remain free under the statute to express whatever views they may have on the military's congressionally mandated employment policy, all the while retaining eligibility for federal funds."

He noted that the law might require schools to send e-mails or post notices about military recruiters because they do it for other businesses. But he said such "compelled speech" was only incidental to the requirement that military recruiters be treated equally.

Comparing that situation to similar ones the court has faced, Roberts wrote: "Compelling a law school that sends scheduling e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance, or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display the motto `Live Free or Die.'" He said it "trivializes" constitutional protections to suggest that the law schools face similar burdens.

Roberts said law schools aren't "speaking" when they aid students in the recruitment process.

"Unlike a parade organizer's choice of parade contingents, a law school's decision to allow recruiters on campus is not inherently expressive," Roberts wrote. "Law schools facilitate recruiting to assist their students in obtaining jobs. A law school's recruiting services lack the expressive quality of a parade, a newsletter, or the editorial page of a newspaper."

DOJ_NMG_0016329

Rosenkranz, picking up on the court's insistence that the law didn't prohibit law schools from opposing the military's policy, said some might respond with more aggressive protests.

"Imagine signs over interview rooms saying: `Danger: Discriminating employer inside.' Or imagine school-sponsored protests when military recruiters come," he said. "You haven't even seen protests until now."

The court's 8-0 ruling reflects the absence of Justice Samuel Alito, who hadn't been confirmed to the court when the case was argued and thus didn't vote.

U.S. Wins Ruling Over Recruiting At Universities (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — The Supreme Court on Monday upheld a law that cuts federal financing for universities if they do not give military recruiters the same access to students that other potential employers receive. The court ruled that the law does not violate the free-speech rights of universities that object to the military's exclusion of gay men and lesbians who are open about their sexual orientation.

The opinion by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was unanimous.

It was a setback, although hardly an unexpected one, to a coalition of law schools that brought the constitutional challenge, as well as to the Association of American Law Schools, which represents nearly all accredited law schools and since 1991 has required adherence to a nondiscrimination policy on sexual orientation as a condition of membership.

Many law schools initially chose to comply with the association's policy by barring military recruiters or by taking such steps as refusing to help the recruiters schedule appointments or relegating them to less favorable locations for meeting with students.

Congress responded with a series of increasingly punitive measures, all known as the Solomon Amendment, culminating in the 2004 statute at issue in the case. It requires access for military recruiters "that is at least equal in quality and scope" to access for other employers, on pain of forfeiting grants to the entire university from eight federal agencies, including the Departments of Defense, Education, and Health and Human Services.

With hundreds of millions of dollars at stake, all but a handful of law schools yielded. Nearly three dozen banded together as the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights and turned to the courts.

Carl C. Monk, executive director of the law school association, said in an interview on Monday that the group would continue to require its member schools to engage in "significant" activities to counter the impact of the Solomon Amendment, such as organizing faculty forums at which the military's policy could be analyzed and challenged.

The plaintiffs had persuaded the federal appeals court in Philadelphia that the Solomon Amendment imposed an "unconstitutional condition" on the universities' receipt of federal money by requiring them to surrender their First Amendment rights and become involuntary carriers of the government's anti-gay message.

But Chief Justice Roberts said on Monday that the plaintiffs' theory of the case, as well as the opinion by the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, was based on a fundamental misperception about what the Solomon Amendment was imposing.

"As a general matter, the Solomon Amendment regulates conduct, not speech," the chief justice said. "It affects what law schools must do — afford equal access to military recruiters — not what they may or may not say."

Pointing out that law schools remained free to disavow the military's policy, to denounce it or even to help students organize protests, Chief Justice Roberts said that "the Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

Citing a 1990 Supreme Court decision that upheld an equal-access requirement for student religious clubs in high schools, he continued: "We have held that high school students can appreciate the difference between speech a school sponsors and speech the school permits because legally required to do so. Surely students have not lost that ability by the time they get to law school."

To the extent that speech is involved when a military recruiter visits a campus, the chief justice said, the speech is "clearly" the government's, not the law school's. He said that placing the incidental assistance that universities must provide to military recruiters on the same plane as compelling students to recite the Pledge of Allegiance "trivializes the freedom protected" by a 1943 Supreme Court decision holding that the Pledge may not be required.

DOJ_NMG_0016330

While the conclusion that the Solomon Amendment does not directly infringe on the law schools' free-speech rights was at the heart of the court's analysis, the opinion contained several other important threads.

One was the conclusion that allowing military recruiters on campus was not an "inherently expressive" activity. Therefore, Chief Justice Roberts said, the case was not governed by two Supreme Court precedents dealing with freedom of expression. One of them declared unconstitutional a Florida law that required newspapers to grant a "right of reply." The other allowed organizers of the St. Patrick's Day parade in Boston to exclude a gay-pride group despite a nondiscrimination ordinance.

The difference, the chief justice said, was that both the newspaper and the parade organizers were engaged in expression with which the government could not constitutionally interfere, while law schools "are not speaking when they host interviews and recruiting receptions."

Another conclusion was that the Solomon Amendment did not interfere with another interest protected by the First Amendment, the law schools' freedom of association. The appeals court had found a violation of this freedom by analogy to a Supreme Court decision in 2000 that gave the Boy Scouts the right to exclude a gay scoutmaster despite a New Jersey nondiscrimination law.

The analogy was incorrect, Chief Justice Roberts said. Unlike Boy Scout leaders who become part of the organization, "recruiters are, by definition, outsiders who come onto campus for the limited purpose of trying to hire students — not to become members of the school's expressive association," he said, adding, "This distinction is critical."

The court also rejected an alternative theory of the case put forward by groups of professors from Harvard and Columbia Law Schools. Under their theory, the Solomon Amendment's mandate for equal access could be met by a school that simply excluded all employers who did not attest to a nondiscrimination policy. "That is rather clearly not what Congress had in mind," Chief Justice Roberts said, adding that this interpretation of the Solomon Amendment "would render it a largely meaningless exercise."

The constitutional power of Congress to "raise and support armies" was another significant thread in the opinion. Chief Justice Roberts said that in exercising that power, Congress could have directly required universities to admit military recruiters, instead of taking the more indirect approach of making access a condition of federal financing. "It is clear that a funding condition cannot be unconstitutional if it could be constitutionally imposed directly," he said.

The military interviews about 2,500 law students each year and hires about 400 for its Judge Advocate General's Corps, said Ellen Krenke, a spokeswoman for the Defense Department. The court's decision will not change the actual practice on most campuses because all but a few are in compliance with the amendment, she said.

The decision, Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, No. 04-1152, was announced on a day when, coincidentally, some four dozen uniformed Army lawyers were in the courtroom to be sworn in as members of the Supreme Court bar.

Paula C. Johnson, a named plaintiff in the lawsuit who is a law professor at Syracuse University and a visiting professor this semester at the City University of New York's law school, said that it was too early to talk about what campuses might do, but that she expected "things will begin to happen" as opponents of the military's policy had time to better organize.

"This could be a very important galvanizing measure," she said.

Mr. Monk, of the law school association, said in the interview that law schools retained the obligation to "create a welcoming environment for all their students." He added, "Ultimately, our hope is that gay and lesbian students who want to serve their country by becoming military attorneys will be able to do so."

Justices Back Military Recruiting At Colleges Taking Federal Aid (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Universities must give the military equal standing with other employers in on-campus recruiting or lose federal funding, the Supreme Court ruled.

DOJ_NMG_0016331

The unanimous decision, written by Chief Justice John Roberts, addresses a protest waged by many law schools against the military's policy of excluding homosexuals, but is unlikely to end it.

Chai R. Feldblum, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, said the decision would mean that law professors and students would now rechannel their efforts. The Supreme Court decision said schools were free to protest military recruiters, and Prof. Feldblum said she expected those protests to intensify and proliferate.

"I see that as a gauntlet thrown down by the Supreme Court, and I hope and expect that the law schools will pick it up," said Prof. Feldblum, a founding member of the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, or FAIR, the group of 36 law schools and faculties mounting the challenge. Prof. Feldblum said she also believed law schools would support legal challenges to the constitutionality of the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy, as well as efforts in Congress to change the law.

The schools had sought to deny military recruiters access to job fairs and other placement activities, citing the policy of the institutions' governing body, the American Association of Law Schools. Since 1990, the group has included sexual orientation along with race, religion, sex and other characteristics for which discrimination is forbidden. The schools required employers participating in placement activities to pledge that they didn't discriminate on such grounds.

Although the schools said they were holding the military to the same standard as other employers, the practice outraged many in Congress, which voted to require the schools to admit recruiters or lose federal funding. The Solomon Amendment, named for its sponsor, the late Rep. Gerald Solomon (R., N.Y.), imposed the following penalty: a cutoff in funding for the entire university, not just its law school, from all federal agencies. Individual students, however, wouldn't lose financial aid, and schools with "a longstanding policy of pacifism based on historical religious affiliation" were exempt.

FAIR sued to block the Solomon Amendment, claiming it violated First Amendment freedoms of speech and association. A federal appeals court in Philadelphia agreed, pointedly citing Supreme Court freedom-of-association precedents that allowed the Boy Scouts to bar gay scoutmasters and the Boston St. Patrick's Day parade to keep a gay group from marching.

But at oral arguments in December, the justices sounded skeptical of the argument that schools were being forced to endorse a message of antipathy to homosexuals. The government's lawyer, Solicitor General Paul Clement, said schools remain free to express their views of military policy in other ways. "They could put signs on the bulletin board next to the door, they could engage in speech, they could help organize student protests," he said.

Not all law students and professors oppose the Solomon Amendment, however. At various points in the litigation, a group of law students and professors, including several well-known conservative academics, filed a brief supporting the government's position, as did a group of law students who are veterans or currently serve in the military reserves.

In yesterday's opinion, the chief justice wrote that the military stands apart from other institutions, as the Constitution grants Congress power to "provide for the common defense" and to "raise and support armies."

The military's legal branch, the Judge Advocate General's Corps, annually visits about 200 law schools, at which recruiters interview approximately 2,500 students. Ultimately, about 1,000 of that number seek to join and 400 are accepted, said Pentagon spokeswoman, Lt. Col. Ellen Krenke.

Yale Law School's dean, Harold Hongju Koh, said a separate challenge to the Solomon Amendment he and several faculty members filed remains before a lower court. He said that the Supreme Court's "decision is clearly an invitation for law schools to engage in more speech, not less, in the months ahead. Many of us here at Yale Law School plan to accept that invitation."

Billions of dollars were at stake in the dispute. At Yale alone, $300 million in annual federal funding was in jeopardy because of the university's stance, according to the Yale faculty's lawsuit.

Dean Larry Kramer of Stanford Law School said that his administration would continue to endorse student demonstrations against military recruiters. But he said that the issue largely was symbolic. "For what it's worth, there's very little interest among our students in going into the JAG Corps, quite apart" from the military's antigay policies, Mr. Kramer said.

Michael Armini, a spokesman for Harvard Law School, said the decision wouldn't affect military recruiting on campus because the school already was in compliance with the Solomon Amendment.

Military Ban On Campus Rejected (WT)

By Guy Taylor

DOJ_NMG_0016332

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday ruled against universities that had prohibited military recruiters on campus.

The justices unanimously upheld a 1996 federal law that permits the government to withhold funds from universities that deny military recruiters the same access to students that is allowed other potential employers.

"Recruiters are, by definition, outsiders who come onto campus for the limited purpose of trying to hire students," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. wrote for the court in his third opinion since being confirmed six months ago.

Several universities had banned military recruiters to protest the Pentagon's policy against open homosexuality in the armed forces.

The ruling arrives as the Pentagon struggles to achieve recruiting goals for an all-volunteer military force facing the strain of prolonged deployments required by the ongoing war on terrorism.

The case grew from a suit brought by a coalition of law schools and professors, who argued that their First Amendment right of free expression was violated by the 1996 law on grounds that it forced them to associate with and promote the activities of military recruiters.

Chief Justice Roberts rejected that argument, saying, "A military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message."

The chief justice said that the legal core of the case had nothing to do with the "don't ask, don't tell" policy and that allowing military recruiters at universities is paramount to attracting talent to the armed forces -- particularly to the ranks of military lawyers.

Because he was not on the court in December when the case was argued, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. abstained from the ruling, which drew mixed reactions from court observers yesterday.

"This decision is particularly important given that our nation is at war," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, who added the ruling "leaves no doubt that the United States military will continue to have equal access to all segments of our population ... and will be able to recruit the best and brightest that America has to offer."

The American Civil Liberties Union had filed a brief supporting the law schools, and ACLU legal director Steven R. Shapiro said universities "should not be punished by the loss of their federal funding merely because they apply the same nondiscrimination policies to the military that they apply to every other employer that seeks to recruit on campus."

Nationwide, universities and colleges receive about $35 billion in federal funding annually.

Various universities have moved to bar military recruiters in the past, most notably during widespread demonstrations against the Vietnam War in the late 1960s and early 1970s. But campus outcry took a new turn in 1993, when President Clinton signed the "don't ask, don't tell" policy into law.

The policy allows homosexuals to serve in the military, but warrants their dismissal if they announce their orientation to others.

By the mid-1990s, several university law schools began barring military recruiters, along with those of any employer who could not promise that it would not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation, from operating on campus.

Congress responded with a law to block Defense Department funding to universities that refused to allow military recruiters. The law was later amended to block all federal funding, with the exception of student loan money, to any university that took such action

It was not clear yesterday what the Supreme Court's ruling may mean for the future of the "don't ask, don't tell policy."

Mr. Shapiro asserted that nothing in the ruling "endorses the military's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy or any other form of discrimination against gay people."

Joseph Zengerle of George Mason University School of Law -- the only law school to publicly side with the government in the case -- said the ruling fits within a high court pattern of giving "great deference to the military and how it organizes itself and handles its policies."

Citing the ongoing war on terror, Mr. Zengerle, a Vietnam veteran who heads a clinic giving free legal assistance to military personnel and their families, added, "The closer you are to a hot war, the more deference the court is going to give the executive branch and Congress in handling national security matters."

In other action yesterday, the Supreme Court:

DOJ_NMG_0016333

c Agreed to clarify when inmates can file civil rights lawsuits contesting prison conditions.

c Refused to consider whether a top judge in Illinois improperly voted to throw out a $1 billion judgment against State Farm after accepting campaign donations from company lawyers and executives.

•Declined to consider making it harder for grandparents to win visitation rights.

•Refused to hear a challenge to a statue at a Kansas college depicting a clergyman with a bishop's headdress that angered some Roman Catholics because of its phallic appearance.

Supreme Court Sides With Military Recruiters (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 7, 2006

Rejecting the views of some of the nation's top law schools and professors, the Supreme Court on Monday upheld the so-called Solomon Amendment, which requires universities receiving federal funds to give equal access to military recruiters on campus.

The unanimous decision was a sharp rebuke of the legal academe, many of whose members objected on First Amendment grounds to hosting military recruiters, because of the armed forces' policies against allowing open homosexuals in their ranks.

Writing for the 8-0 Court, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. said the academics' arguments "trivialize" some of the Court's First Amendment precedents while "exaggerating" others. Justice Samuel Alito Jr. did not participate in the ruling.

"This decision will force our schools to carve out an exception to our nondiscrimination policies for the military, and that is unfortunate," said Carl Monk, executive director of the Association of American Law Schools, which has opposed discrimination in legal education on the basis of sex since 1970. But he said law schools will obey what is now "the law of the land." Monk expressed the hope that "the day is not far off when gays and lesbians will be able to serve as military lawyers."

The challenge to the Solomon Amendment was brought by the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, which includes the law school faculties of Stanford, Georgetown, George Washington, New York and other universities. The AALS also joined the challenge, but not as a lead plaintiff.

Georgetown law professor Mark Tushnet, a former president of the AALS, predicted that the ruling would lead to an increase in "the number and intensity of protests against military recruiting in the fall."

Roberts wrote that the law, first passed by Congress in 1994, bears no resemblance to the compelled speech the Court has struck down in other cases, such as West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette and Wooley v. Maynard, which said states could not require students to recite the Pledge of Allegiance or force drivers to display a state motto on their license plates.

"There is nothing in this case approaching a Government-mandated pledge or motto that the school must endorse," wrote Roberts. Law schools argued that to give military recruiters equal access, they would be forced to distribute fliers or send e-mails to students that would convey an unwanted government message, but Roberts said those actions are "plainly incidental."

The ruling came as little surprise after oral arguments last December when justices showed little sympathy for the law schools' argument, especially after Solicitor General Paul Clement said law schools were free to show their disapproval of military recruiters in a variety of ways, including organizing student protests against them.

Referring to Clement's statement at oral arguments, Roberts wrote, "The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything." Roberts added, "As a general matter, the Solomon Amendment regulates conduct, not speech. It affects what law schools must do -- afford equal access to military recruiters -- not what they may or may not say."

Roberts also rejected an argument made by former acting Solicitor General Walter Dellinger III on behalf of a group of Harvard Law School professors that includes Dean Elena Kagan (in her capacity as a professor), Laurence Tribe, Lani Guinier, Randall Kennedy, and Robert Clark (a former dean).

They argued that by giving military recruiters disfavored treatment, Harvard and other law schools were, in fact, abiding by the Solomon Amendment because they would treat any other employer who violated their nondiscrimination policies in the same disfavored way.

DOJ_NMG_0016334

But Roberts, a Harvard Law School alumnus, rejected the argument, asserting that the federal law looks to the actual access military recruiters are given, not to the policy that leads to that access. "It is insufficient for a law school to treat the military as it treats all other employers who violate its nondiscrimination policy," Roberts wrote. "Under the statute, military recruiters must be given the same access as recruiters who comply with the policy."

The law was also attacked as an unconstitutional condition on federal funding, but the Court rejected that argument, too. Roberts said that because Congress has "broad authority" in the area of military recruiting, it could have imposed the access requirement on universities directly, rather than making it a condition of federal funding. "Because the First Amendment would not prevent Congress from directly imposing the Solomon Amendment's access requirement, the statute does not place an unconstitutional condition on the receipt of federal funds," Roberts wrote.

The ruling was Roberts' third majority opinion, and all have been without dissents or separate concurrences. Some critics of the military-recruiting decision took solace in that fact Monday, suggesting it means that the Court was not announcing a sweeping new doctrine.

"The unanimity of today's decision strongly suggests that the Court did not think it was changing any existing constitutional rules," said Steve Shapiro, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Certainly, nothing in today's decision endorses the military's 'Don't ask, don't tell' policy or any other form of discrimination against gay people."

Supreme Court Upholds Campus Military Recruiting (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The military has a right to recruit on college campuses and at law schools nationwide, the Supreme Court ruled Monday, despite the Pentagon's policy of excluding openly gay men and women from its ranks.

The justices unanimously rejected a free speech claim brought by some law schools and professors who said they should not be forced to aid an employer who discriminates against job applicants because of their sexual orientation.

In his first major opinion for the court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. called this legal claim a stretch. The decision upheld the Solomon Amendment, in which Congress said that colleges and universities that take federal money must give the Pentagon the same right to recruit on campus as other employers.

"The Solomon Amendment regulates conduct, not speech," Roberts said. "It affects what law schools must do — afford equal access to military recruiters — not what they may or may not say. ..(It) neither limits what the law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

Monday's case did not arise from campus opposition to the Iraq war, nor have there been major protests over military recruiting. Unlike the Vietnam era, campuses are not centers of widespread protests these days, nor have military recruiters been barred from entering campus grounds.

Nonetheless, several law schools have carried on a mostly symbolic protest against the Pentagon's refusal to change its policy against gays. Since the 1960s, the Association of American Law Schools had a policy of refusing to aid recruiting by employers who had discriminatory hiring practices. In 1990, this policy was amended to include sexual orientation.

To enforce this policy, some law schools refused to post information on recruiters for the armed forces who planned to visit, nor would they make rooms available where they could meet with students who were interested in becoming military lawyers.

"No one was denying them access. We just withheld affirmative support," said Stanford Law School dean Larry Kramer, who was a New York University law professor when the case began.

Lawmakers in Congress objected to what they saw as second-class treatment for military recruiters. In 1995, they adopted an amendment sponsored by the late Rep. Gerald Solomon (R-N.Y.) that threatened a cutoff of federal funds to a college or university that prevents the armed forces from recruiting on campus. In recent years, Congress has strengthened this amendment to say the military must be given full equal treatment when its recruiters visit a campus.

Colleges and universities did not challenge the law. They had $35 billion a year in federal aid at stake.

DOJ_NMG_0016335

"We are in a war, whether properly declared or not, and during a war, 1st Amendment rights nearly always retract," said Matthew Spitzer, dean at the USC law school. "The idea the Supreme Court would tell the federal government it could not attach a condition to the receipt of federal funds is unthinkable."

However, the law faculty at several dozen schools, including Stanford, NYU, Georgetown and the University of San Francisco, joined a lawsuit to challenge the measure as unconstitutional.

They relied in part on a Supreme Court ruling that was seen as a major setback for gays six years ago. The court in a 5-4 decision said the Boy Scouts of America had a free speech right to expel an openly gay Scout master because his presence conflicted with their message of "morally straight" behavior.

The challengers to the Solomon Amendment said the same logic should work in reverse. They said they had a free speech right to exclude anti-gay employers — including the Pentagon — because their presence would conflict with their message of tolerance and nondiscrimination.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in Philadelphia agreed and said the Solomon Amendment was unconstitutional because it "compels law schools to propagate the military's message," including its bias against gays.

The Bush administration appealed that ruling on behalf of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and the Supreme Court had no troubling in reversing it Monday in Rumsfeld vs. FAIR.

The chief justice said the law posed no free speech problems. First, the law schools and the faculty are not required to speak in favor of the military. Second, they may speak openly against the military without losing federal money. And third, he said, students will not be fooled into thinking the law school agrees with the Pentagon because it has permitted the Pentagon to recruit on campus.

"We have held that high school students can appreciate the difference between speech a school sponsors and speech the school permits," he wrote, referring to a decision that allowed a Bible study group to meet on campus at a high school. "Surely students have not lost that ability by the time they get to law school," Roberts said.

All the justices signed his opinion except for new Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who did not participate.

"I am obviously disappointed. There is no sensitivity in this opinion to the important concern the law schools have," said Duke Law professor Erwin Chemerinsky, who joined the lawsuit.

At USC, the protests over the Solomon Amendment have been low-key. "We have had students sign up for an interview with a military recruiter, and they demand to know why the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy hasn't been changed," Spitzer said.

UCLA Law School dean Michael Schill said the University of California system has a policy that required giving military recruiters access to the campus. "Even if the Solomon Amendment had been struck down, we would have had our own policy that allowed them to be here," he said.

While some faculty members and students oppose the Pentagon's policy, "it has not generated a large amount of controversy in the 18 months that I've been here," he said.

Gay rights advocates said they hoped school officials would make use of their free speech rights. The court's opinion "leaves room for students and universities themselves to speak out ... and show their abhorrence of the military's policy that discriminates against gay and lesbian people," said Jon Davidson, legal director of Lambda Legal.

Court Upholds Military Recruiting Law (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. government can withhold funds from universities that protest the Pentagon's ban on gay men and lesbians by denying military recruiters access to campuses and students, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

In a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts, the court rejected arguments from a group of law schools that claimed a federal law that allows the government to withhold funding in such situations violates colleges' First Amendment rights of free speech and free association.

DOJ_NMG_0016336

The law, known as the Solomon Amendment for its original sponsor in 1994, U.S. Rep. Gerald Solomon, R-N.Y., allows the U.S. government to deny funding to colleges that do not give military recruiters the same access and campus privileges that are given to other recruiters.

Most law schools that host recruiters insist that they sign a statement saying they do not discriminate based on sexual orientation. The law school consortium that brought the case, the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, said requiring schools to accept military recruiters undermined their opposition to bias and forced them to adopt a message they oppose. The military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy bars anyone who reveals his or her homosexuality from serving in the armed forces.

The case was not a test of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy. It drew attention in part because it became part of the national debate over gay civil rights and arrived at the court as the Pentagon was becoming increasingly aggressive in its wartime recruiting.

The American Association of University Professors, the American Civil Liberties Union and several universities filed briefs urging the justices to uphold a lower-court ruling that said the Solomon Amendment wrongly compelled schools to send, and subsidize, a message of discrimination.

In his first major opinion since becoming chief justice last fall, Roberts wrote, "Accommodating the military's message does not affect the law schools' speech, because the schools are not speaking when they host interviews and recruiting receptions."

Roberts said the basic communications required of colleges were bulletin board notices and e-mails. The chief justice said they hardly could be compared to the kind of "compelled" government speech that has been invalidated through the years, such as a West Virginia law that required schoolchildren to recite the Pledge of Allegiance and to salute the American flag, or a New Hampshire law that ordered the state motto — "Live Free or Die" — to be on license plates.

Joshua Rosenkranz, who represented the law schools challenging the law, said he did not expect universities to decline federal funds so they could block military recruiters. However, he said he expects faculty members and students will accelerate their public opposition to "don't ask, don't tell."

"Schools are not going to give up the money," Rosenkranz said, noting that billions in college funding are at stake. "But there are other ways to get the message across. You are going to see banners over military interview rooms and signs that say, 'Danger: Discriminating recruiters inside.' "

New Justice Samuel Alito did not participate in the case; he had not yet joined the court when the case was heard in December.

Justices Side With Military Recruiters (CSM)

By Stacy A. Teicher

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

Military officials might have to run a bigger gantlet of protesters as they search for recruits on America's university campuses. But they no longer have to worry that they'll be shut out altogether because of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy related to gay members of the armed forces.

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday that military recruiters must have the same kind of access as other employers coming onto campus to give out information and conduct job interviews, if the campus receives federal money. Most campuses rely on some share of the $35 billion the government channels each year to higher education.

An association of law schools and professors, the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights (FAIR), filed suit against Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to challenge the law that ties recruiters' access to federal funding - known as the Solomon Amendment. FAIR argued that campuses should be free to extend their own philosophy of nondiscrimination by requiring recruiters to sign pledges that they would not discriminate before being allowed the use of campus facilities. Under the Pentagon's policy, gay men and women can serve in the military only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

"A military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message," wrote Chief Justice John Roberts. "The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

DOJ_NMG_0016337

Supporters of the law schools' position were undeterred. "We're disappointed with the legal outcome of the case ... but this unanimous opinion is a call to arms to the law school administrations across the country," says Chai Feldblum, a law professor at Georgetown University and a board member of FAIR. The organization hopes "to see every single law school helping students to organize protests" against military recruiters on campus, "because the Supreme Court has told us that the way to exercise our First Amendment beliefs is by speaking out more."

The decision will come as welcome news for the armed services, which have worked diligently to overcome shortfalls in recruiting nationwide. In the last recruiting year, which ended in September, the Army missed its year-long goal for the first time since 1999, falling short of its target by 6,627 recruits. It represented the largest deficit since 1979.

At a time when the Pentagon is relying heavily on the Army in Iraq, recruiting is a matter of crucial importance to the military. Though higher-than-expected reenlistment rates have forestalled fears of a "broken Army," the Pentagon has made recruiting a top priority in recent months, approving enlistment bonuses of up to $40,000 and additional bonuses of $1,000 for soldiers who refer new recruits. It has also added more recruiters to the beat.

But with only a tiny fraction of recruits coming from law schools, some see the case as having a more symbolic significance.

"This was a very challenging case in some ways because, as the opinion makes clear, if you go too far in saying that allowing recruitment efforts you don't like violates your First Amendment rights, that might allow employment agencies to refuse to provide services on the basis of race, or religion, or national origin. There has to be some limit there," says Jon Davidson, legal director at Lambda Legal, a gay-rights advocacy group. Despite those intricate issues, the organization joined an amicus brief with the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of FAIR.

Now that the campus-recruitment issue has been resolved, "the next real piece of the fight will go directly to 'don't ask, don't tell' itself," Ms. Feldblum says. She adds that cases challenging the military policy are already under way in Massachusetts and California, and a bill has been proposed in the US Congress to replace the policy with a nondiscrimination clause that includes sexual orientation.

A Victory For Military Recruiters (WP)

By Fred Barbash And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday unanimously upheld a federal law that forces colleges and universities to permit military recruiting on campus, despite the schools' objections to the Pentagon ban on openly gay people serving in the armed forces.

By a vote of 8 to 0, the court upheld the Solomon Amendment, which permits the denial of federal funding to schools that do not allow military recruiters the same access given to all other job recruiters. But in ruling that schools must provide the military the same access to students as they would for any other recruiters, the justices noted that schools are still free to protest their presence on campus.

The Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights (FAIR) -- a coalition of law schools and professors that formed to sue the government -- had said the law "compelled speech" that made it appear schools were endorsing the government's exclusion of acknowledged gays in the military, thus violating the schools' right to free speech under the First Amendment.

But in writing for the court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said that Solomon "neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

"Law schools remain free under the statute to express whatever views they may have on the military's congressionally mandated employment policy. . . . Nothing about recruiting suggests that law schools agree with any speech by recruiters and nothing in the Solomon Amendment restricts what the law schools may say about the military's policies," Roberts wrote.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., the newest member of the court, did not take part in the case.

Though a federal district court had sided with the government, an appeals court in Philadelphia reversed that decision, ruling in favor of FAIR last year and blocking enforcement of Solomon. But yesterday's Supreme Court opinion rejected each argument that had been advanced on FAIR's behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0016338

"In this case, FAIR has attempted to stretch a number of First Amendment doctrines well beyond the sort of activities these doctrines protect," Roberts wrote.

So thorough was the court's rejection of FAIR's arguments that it ruled Congress could have achieved equal access not only indirectly, by threatening a funding cutoff, but also directly, through legislation based on its constitutional power to raise military forces. In fact, the court suggested in passing, even colleges and universities that do not receive any federal funding could be compelled by Congress to allow military recruiters.

"Congress's power in this area is broad and sweeping," Roberts wrote, "and there is no dispute in this cases that it includes the authority to require campus access to military recruiters."

So far, however, the government has chosen the more indirect approach of the Solomon Amendment. With yesterday's decision, many universities will now have to choose between their law schools' anti-discrimination principles and their dependence on federal money.

Most schools have made it clear that they could not afford to lose federal aid, which totals about $35 billion a year. Only a few schools -- including the law schools of New York University and George Washington University -- allowed their names to be publicly attached to the lawsuit.

Geoffrey Shields, dean of Vermont Law School, told the Associated Press yesterday that since 1999 his school has given up some federal money and will continue to bar recruiters "as a symbol of the importance of fair treatment of all people."

"We've stuck to our guns, and I anticipate we'll continue to stick to our guns," he said.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), who had called the appellate court's decision in favor of FAIR an "insult" to the military, said in a statement yesterday that "this decision will ensure that the military will continue to be comprised of our nation's finest -- men and women who know how to defend our country in a manner consistent with our values and principles."

Supporters of FAIR took solace in passages of the opinion that noted students and others would still be free to protest military recruiters. Tensions between Congress and academia over university efforts to restrict military recruitment date to the Vietnam War and campus protests against it.

"The court affirmed the idea of a vigorous public forum and that's what's refreshing," said Michael Tigar, a law professor at American University and an opponent of Solomon. "The opinion sounds these First Amendment themes. The message is: If you don't like something, there is always more speech."

Joshua Rosencranz, a New York lawyer who represented FAIR in the case, said the schools always saw the suit as a "scrimmage in a broader war" about equality.

"We brought the suit in part because there are those saying 'How dare you let protesters on campus when the recruiters were there?' " he said. "Well, this opinion makes clear that those rights are still in tact. It forced the government to state what the line was."

Attaching various strings to federal funding is itself standard practice, used most famously to secure equal treatment for women in athletic programs. It's been upheld by the courts in part because the educational institutions are free to reject the money if they object to the strings.

The decision, while closely watched, was unsurprising after the oral arguments in the case, during which the justices expressed great skepticism about equating the recruiting with protected expression. Roberts wrote that although the court held in 1977 that New Hampshire motorists cannot be compelled to display the state motto -- "Live Free or Die" -- on license plates, in this case the government "does not require any similar expression by law schools" and "does not dictate the content of speech at all."

"Compelling a law school that sends scheduling e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance, or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display the motto 'Live Free or Die,' " Roberts wrote.

Army 8, Yale 0 (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016339

Yesterday the Supreme Court upheld a provision of a law called the Solomon Amendment, which conditions federal funding for colleges and universities on their providing military recruiters the same access they grant to other employers. The decision was no Solomonic compromise but a complete rout of the other-worldly professors who had challenged the law.

Those professors, opponents of the Clinton-era law barring open homosexuals from military service, had claimed the Solomon Amendment violated their First Amendment rights by forcing them, as the Yale faculty put it in a friend-of-the-court brief, "to assist the military in telling some Yale Law students that they are not fit to serve in our country's armed forces because of their sexual orientation."

Chief Justice John Roberts, in an 8-0 decision (Justice Samuel Alito joined too late to participate), laughed the free-speech claim out of court: "Congress, for example, can prohibit employers from discriminating in hiring on the basis of race. The fact that this will require an employer to take down a sign reading 'White Applicants Only' hardly means that the law should be analyzed as one regulating the employer's speech rather than conduct."

And of course anti-military professors, unlike racist employers, are completely free to speak their minds on the subject. Yale can even show its disagreement with mainstream America, as it recently did, by admitting as a student a former senior official of Afghanistan's Taliban, a regime that treated homosexuals far more harshly than the U.S. military ever has.

The Solomon Amendment only denies federal funding to schools that discriminate against the military, but the High Court went one step further: It held that Congress, under its Constitutional authority to "provide for the common Defence," "to raise and support Armies" and "to provide and maintain a Navy," could mandate that colleges and universities permit military recruiters on campus, whether they accept federal money or not.

We hope Congress does not do so. If those who run America's institutions of higher education really have principled objections to the military's presence, let them take a stand by declining taxpayer money. Then the rest of us can find out how much their principles are worth.

Now Repeal The Ban (WP)

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

THE SUPREME Court's unanimous decision yesterday upholding the Solomon Amendment is no surprise. It offers the correct answer to the legal question the case posed: Can the government deny federal money to universities that, in protest of the military's discrimination against homosexual service members, bar military recruiters from campus or grant them access on terms less welcoming than those given to other employers? As the court ruled, the universities don't have a right to that money. But the Pentagon's legal win should not obscure the indefensible nature of the policy that underlies the dispute. The gay ban still needs to be repealed.

The Solomon Amendment, named for the late representative Gerald B.H. Solomon (R-N.Y.), is bad policy, but it's not unconstitutional. The threat to withhold federal money leaves law schools with an uncomfortable choice between forsaking federal support and violating their own anti-discrimination policies. But the First Amendment does not prohibit the government from attaching conditions to its largess. Universities remain free to oppose U.S. policy as vocally as they like. They just can't frustrate military recruiting efforts while accepting federal dollars. As Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. put it for the court, "Compelling a law school that sends e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance to the flag . . . or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display a particular motto on his license plate" -- forms of compelled speech the court has struck down. It "trivializes the freedom protected in [those cases] to suggest that it is."

It also trivializes the plight of gays in the military to focus on the ancillary consequences of the gay ban for American law schools. Universities are not the primary victim here. The real problem, which this litigation has tended to obscure, is that the military, even while fighting two wars, continues to root out Americans who wish to help by maintaining a policy that bars anyone who is openly gay. It robs itself of much-needed talent by way of their humiliation and exposure while forcing those in uniform to hide who they are.

This would be distasteful even if their presence in the military posed some real problem. But there's no evidence of that. A combination of bigotry and inertia keeps the gay ban in place. Now that the military has proved it can constitutionally exempt itself from university nondiscrimination rules, Congress should decide whether it really wants a military that requires such an exemption.

DOJ_NMG_0016340

Justice Department V. Google Court Date Postponed Again (CNET)

CNET News, March 7, 2006

Google's courtroom date with the U.S. Justice Department has been delayed a second time.

U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, Calif. on Friday postponed the hearing from March 13 to March 14 at 9:00 a.m PT.

The outcome will determine whether the Bush administration will prevail in its fight to force Google to help it defend an anti-pornography law in a trial in Philadelphia this fall.

Although the Justice Department also demanded that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online hand over similar records, Google was the only recipient that chose to fight the subpoena in court.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mandalay Bay Undergoes ADA Scrutiny (LVBIZ)

By VALERIE MILLER, BUSINESS PRESS

Las Vegas Business Press, March 7, 2006

Hotel says it is working with DOJ 'to resolve issues in timely manner'

Sixteen years after the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the issue of hotel-casinos' compliance with the law's accessibility guidelines is again emerging as a hot-button issue. Numerous private complaints have been lodged against an assortment of casinos, and the Department of Justice told the Business Press that it is in the midst of a probe involving ADA compliance and Mandalay Bay Resort.

"It's an ongoing, active investigation. It is the resort in general," said DOJ spokesman Eric Holland, who couldn't comment further because of the investigation. He added that policy investigations must go through a preliminary review first, then, if warranted, an active investigation will be launched by the Justice Department.

MGM Mirage, which now owns Mandalay Bay, acknowledged the DOJ was looking into issues at the property prior to its absorption of the Mandalay Resort Group, which owned Mandalay Bay. That merger was completed last April. "The Department of Justice had made that company aware of certain areas of concerns," said MGM Mirage spokesperson Yvette Monet. "We are working with the Department of Justice to resolve the issues in a timely manner." Mandalay Bay's hotel does comply with the ADA's disable accessible room standards, according to information supplied by MGM Mirage.

Department of Justice is investigating whether Mandalay Bay Resort is ADA-compliant.

Two other MGM Mirage-owned properties -- the MGM Grand and New York-New York -- have reached separate settlements with the Justice Department in the past. The agreements, last revised in 2001, called for both resorts to provide more access to disabled people.

While casinos are not specifically mentioned in the Americans with Disabilities Act, it does distinguish between hotels as either "newly constructed" or "existing." Although the act was passed in 1990, the cut-off for "existing facility" status depended on whether all building permit applications and extensions were certified as complete prior to Jan. 26, 1992. Besides offering accessible restaurants, pathways and assembly areas (including convention centers, arenas, movie theaters and showrooms), the newer hotels are required to have a certain number of disabled-accessible parking spaces and rooms for wheelchair users. That room count can go as high as 4 percent of the total room inventory, but the percentage decreases as more rooms are added. A smaller number of rooms must be made available to the hearing impaired.

Existing hotels only have to do what's "readily achievable" to comply with the ADA, unless they are being renovated and are thus considered "new." "They (hotels) only have to do what can be 'easily accomplished and can be carried out without much expense,' " UNLV Boyd Law School Professor and Chair Ann McGinley said, quoting the law. "It's just when it is expensive that they don't have to do it."

DOJ_NMG_0016341

She noted that while mom-and-pop shops may find it tough to become accessible for the disabled, Las Vegas resorts might have a hard time making that case. "So much is readily achievable," she said. "When you see casinos ... they make so much money, and they can't move a toilet seat?"

VENETIAN UNDER SCRUTINY

One recently constructed Las Vegas resort isn't passing muster with Nevadans for Equal Access, a disability rights group. The Venetian Resort, according to the group's president, Paul Martin, has failed to comply with the ADA requirements by making its main bridge over its lagoon too steep for wheelchairs.

"The (Rialto) Bridge from the (Venetian's) shopping center to the (Campanile) clock tower is totally inaccessible to anybody using a wheelchair," stated the complaint sent by Nevadans for Equal Access' attorneys at the Clark County Legal Services Program to the Department of Justice in late August 2001. The Venetian was also notified, Martin said, but neither the resort nor the department ever responded. DOJ's Holland said the department never received the complaint, and surmised it was lost as a part of the mail disruption after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. The Venetian did not respond to the Business Press inquiries at press time.

While Nevadans for Equal Access had sued Binion's Horseshoe, the Plaza and the then-Showboat hotels and casinos in the mid-1990s, forcing the properties to make the needed upgrades, Martin said his group doesn't have the wherewithal to take on the behemoth Venetian without the help of the DOJ. "It would use up all the resources of Clark County Legal."

Despite the complaints, Las Vegas hotels received high marks from one disability travel resource, Emerging Horizons. The California newspaper's editor, Candy Harrington, ranked Las Vegas above cities like Orlando when it came to meeting the needs of the disabled. Most of the complaints Harrington receives about Las Vegas concerns disabled-access rooms not being available because of previous reservations.

By the Business Press' count, most hotels have either met or exceeded ADA standards. However, a source familiar with the MGM Mirage-owned Luxor, which was built on the bubble in 1993, said the property was in the midst of trying to reach an ADA-required 51 wheelchair-accessible rooms and had 38 as of a month ago. MGM Mirage's Monet maintained all of its properties are compliant with the disability act, including the Luxor, which she said had 91 accessible rooms. "I cannot comment on information from an unofficial source," she said.

The properties of the MGM Mirage go the extra mile in trying to accommodate guests with disabilities, Monet added. That includes putting in necessities such as ceiling track bars (to hoist them out of bed) in some rooms at the Mirage Resort. "If they are going to that level, they are going way beyond what the government requires," ADA consultant Thomas Schmokel, who is wheelchair-bound, said. "I never see that in hotels. Tell me who they are and I'll put them in for an award."

WYNN RESORT EARNS KUDOS

Wynn Las Vegas has installed ceiling lifts with slings in some rooms, according to Richard Cotter, Wynn's executive vice president for hotel and food and beverage. He added that all table games are accessible for wheelchair customers and that the resort in the short time it has been open received an award from a group of disabled veterans.

"I'm sure you can find non-compliance, but most of the large properties are in compliance," said Tom Jones, a UNLV professor of hotel administration, who teaches accessibility requirements.

If a lawsuit is filed against a Nevada hotel or casino because of non-ADA compliance, monetary compensation is not awarded. Salt Lake City attorney Richard Armknecht, however, believes the Nevada law can be interpreted in a way to award damages. He successfully sued the Coast Resorts' Orleans Hotel and Casino in 2001, forcing it to renovate more than 800 rooms. The attorney currently represents a woman who said she was denied public accommodations at the Tropicana's Tiffany Theater. The casino denied the charge, saying an employee gave incorrect information.

"The whole enforcement of the ADA is through the courts," added UNLV professor Jones. "Somebody might not be in compliance for years, but if nobody brings a suit, then it may never come to light."

Judicial Bias Claims Reach Calif. High Court (LAW)

By Mike Mckee, The Recorder

California Recorder, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016342

Attorneys arguing that Alameda County, Calif., prosecutors routinely excluded Jews from death penalty juries have been asked a tricky question: Does it matter if the court record doesn't establish that any of the excused jurors were actually Jewish?

The justices of the California Supreme Court posed that question in a death row inmate's habeas case last month, and they're going to want answers during oral arguments Wednesday in San Francisco.

They also want to know whether there was actual wrongdoing if a prosecutor had a separate, valid reason for removing a juror.

The last-minute queries throw a new wrinkle into a case that has fascinated the Bay Area legal community since July 2004. That's when the high court in the habeas corpus case of death row inmate Fred Freeman ordered an investigation into whether the Alameda County district attorney's office -- in collusion with now-deceased Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde -- intentionally purged Jews from capital juries because of a perception that they wouldn't sentence someone to death.

Former Alameda County prosecutor John "Jack" Quatman, who prosecuted Freeman, raised the allegations, but wound up being branded a "dishonest and unethical" man by a Santa Clara County Superior Court judge who presided over a weeklong evidentiary hearing 11 months ago.

Judge Kevin Murphy ruled that Freeman got a fair trial and that there was ample evidence Quatman fabricated his claims to embarrass Alameda County DA Tom Orloff, who took Quatman off capital cases in 1993.

The latest questions by the Supreme Court seem to indicate that the justices could be leaning toward deciding the case on a narrow issue, possibly whether jurors were let go simply because they appeared Jewish or that their surnames -- Mishell, Peisker and Laput -- sounded Jewish.

"The whole point here is that the court is not going to be focusing on the law," said Dennis Maio, a former Supreme Court research attorney who's now of counsel in Reed Smith's San Francisco office. "The question is, was this person a member of a cognizable group and if so, did the prosecutor strike this person for that reason?"

The court's questions also seem to put a heavier burden on Freeman's attorneys at San Francisco's Habeas Corpus Resource Center -- namely, to show that prosecutors discriminated during jury selection in violation of the standards set out in People v. Wheeler, 22 Cal.3d 258, and Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, even though the record apparently doesn't establish who, if anyone, was Jewish.

Wheeler, issued by the state Supreme Court in 1978, and Batson, handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1986, are the guidepost decisions on jury selection bias.

Neither Gary Sowards, Freeman's HCRC lawyer, nor Morris Lenk, the San Francisco deputy attorney general handling the state's case, returned calls seeking comment.

But both laid out their positions in papers filed exactly two weeks after the Supreme Court's Feb. 14 order for supplemental briefing. Predictably, they offered diametrically opposite views.

Sowards argued that the high court's own case law in 1985's People v. Motton, 39 Cal.3d 596, holds that litigants need not know the "self-reported race or ethnicity" of a juror to violate anti-discrimination standards.

"Whether or not the prospective jurors excused by the prosecutor in this case actually were Jewish," he wrote, "is irrelevant to the question of whether the prosecutor exercised his peremptory challenges with the intent to systematically exclude a cognizable class from [Freeman's] jury.

"The prosecutor," he continued, "exercised his peremptory challenges against jurors who were Jewish or that he believed were Jewish."

Sowards noted that such exclusions result in an "error of constitutional magnitude requiring reversal."

In response, Lenk pointed to the high court's own 2002 decision in People v. Gutierrez, 28 Cal.4th 1083, which involved a prospective juror who acquired her Hispanic surname through marriage.

"Absent proof that any prospective jurors excluded by a prosecutor's peremptory challenges were, in fact, members of a cognizable group, no Wheeler violation has been stated," he wrote. "In other words, the right to trial by a representative jury is not violated unless it is established that the prosecutor has excluded a person who actually is a member of a constitutionally protected group."

DOJ_NMG_0016343

Lenk and Sowards also butted heads on the court's second question, which asked whether prosecutors violate Wheeler or Batson if they not only excuse a juror for the improper reason of religious faith, but at the same time for a valid reason, such as a juror being unwilling to impose the death penalty.

Sowards argued that other reasons would be irrelevant and that "discrimination based on race or religion cannot have a place in a prosecutor's decision to strike jurors from a criminal case."

But Lenk contended that the court itself has "repeatedly declared" that prospective jurors cannot be excluded solely on the presumption they are biased because of race, religion and ethnicity. He also pointed out that the evidentiary hearing judge concluded that Quatman had lied when he claimed he had excluded jurors based on religion.

Although it's not clear what prompted the high court's questions, Stephen Barnett, a professor emeritus at Boalt Hall School of Law, speculated the justices could be reacting to the U.S. Supreme Court's Jan. 18 ruling in Rice v. Collins, 126 S.Ct. 969.

In that decision, the court held that a Los Angeles prosecutor who dismissed a black woman from a jury pool to achieve gender balance in a cocaine possession case had "a number of other permissible and plausible race-neutral reasons." Among them, the woman was young, lacked community ties and had rolled her eyes in apparent disrespect when answering a voir dire question.

"It could be that the California [Supreme] Court just wants to make sure it's up to date," Barnett said in an e-mail response. "Rice doesn't necessarily present the issues raised by the court's questions, but it can be read as doing so."

Justice Carol Corrigan, who was a witness in the underlying evidentiary hearing, will not participate in Wednesday's arguments in In re Freeman, S122590. Justice Ming Chin has also recused himself.

Subbing for them will be Justices Paul Boland, of Los Angeles' 2nd District Court of Appeal, and Judith Haller, of San Diego's 4th District.

Unnatural Selection (NYT)

By Morris B. Hoffman

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Denver

THE side show of jury selection all too often takes over the circus in American trials. And the central culprit in that takeover is the peremptory challenge, a practice by which lawyers may exclude a certain number of prospective jurors without having to prove, or even state, a justification. Since peremptory challenges are not mandated by the federal or any state constitutions, Congress and state legislatures could abolish them tomorrow. They should.

It took Judge Lance Ito more than a month to pick the O. J. Simpson criminal jury. Selection of the Martha Stewart jury took a full week. When Judge Sim Lake of the Federal District Court in Houston spent just one day picking the jury that is hearing the criminal case against two former Enron executives, Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, he drew scorn from some defense lawyers, who seem to presume that fairness and inefficiency are inseparable bedfellows.

His lightning performance also drew praise from some jury reformers, who have been calling for the application of many of the techniques that Judge Lake used to streamline the selection process, including limiting questioning by lawyers and having prospective jurors fill out questionnaires before selection day.

But this debate has overlooked the real problem behind ponderous and insulting jury selection. Peremptory challenges give trial lawyers the power to manipulate jury membership by rejecting perfectly fair prospective jurors for any reason or none, as long as the rejection does not smack of race, sex or ethnic discrimination.

O. J. Simpson's lawyers and their jury consultants spent weeks poring over, and following up on, the prospective jurors' answers to a questionnaire that included such questions as "What is your political affiliation?" and "Do you have a religious affiliation or preference?" The modern raison d'être of these kinds of questions is not to discover disqualifying prejudice, but quite the opposite: to allow lawyers to discover jurors they think are secretly biased in their clients' favor while using peremptory challenges to disqualify those they imagine are not.

Under current constitutional limitations, lawyers may strike you from a jury pool because you are an Aries, but not because you are a female. But it is impossible to ferret out the striking lawyers' real motives, in a system that allows them to be completely irrational but not discriminatory. The inquiry itself drives biased lawyers to fabricate non-discriminatory pretexts. It is often difficult, even for the challenging lawyers themselves, let alone trial judges, to know whether some deeply lurking impermissible animus might taint gestalt judgments about particular jurors.

DOJ_NMG_0016344

In one famous case, a prosecutor excluded two African-American jurors because they had mustaches and beards that looked "suspicious." Is this perfectly permissible stereotypical nonsense, or unconstitutional stereotypical nonsense?

Even when they are not discriminatorily used, peremptory challenges are inconsistent with the fundamental ideal that trials are about truth detection, not about whose lawyer is the cleverest. The whole notion that lawyers may apply their own home-grown stereotypes to excuse perfectly impartial jurors, as long as those stereotypes do not touch on race, gender and ethnicity, infects the jury system with a profoundly trivializing gamesmanship. How can we expect the results of jury trials to be respected as rational applications of the law to facts found by disinterested citizens, when the process by which those citizens are selected devotes more time and energy to discovering their taste in music than their ability to be impartial?

For these and other reasons, some academics and lower court judges, jury foes and friends alike, have long criticized peremptory challenges. But last year, in a criminal case called Miller-El v. Dretke, Justice Stephen Breyer became just the second sitting Supreme Court justice in history to call formally, in a written case opinion, for the elimination of the peremptory challenge (for the record, he cited my 1977 law review article on the subject).

The first justice to do so was Thurgood Marshall, in a concurrence in Batson v. Kentucky, the 1986 case that first outlawed a prosecutor's discriminatory use of peremptory challenges in a single case (as opposed to a pattern of discrimination over many cases, which had been outlawed since 1965). As Justice Marshall presciently put it: "The decision today will not end the racial discrimination that peremptories inject into the jury-selection process. That goal can be accomplished only by eliminating peremptory challenges entirely."

Some critics of the existing system object not to peremptory challenges per se but to the notion that barring their discriminatory use is either meaningful or lawful. Justice Antonin Scalia, in particular, has been consistent and adamant in opposing extensions of the Batson doctrine — first to civil cases, then to criminal defendants (one might ask in both these circumstances what is unconstitutional about a private civil litigant, or a private criminal defendant, exhibiting racial bias in jury selection?), then to gender and ethnicity. Can religion or sexual orientation be far behind? And if it makes no sense to bar the discriminatory use of peremptory challenges on these grounds, how can we make sense of their use to discriminate on other grounds? The only solution is to get rid of them altogether.

Each extension of the Batson doctrine has subtly, and sometimes not so subtly, shifted the constitutional inquiry from the litigant's right to a fair and impartial jury (a right guaranteed, at least in the criminal arena, by the Sixth Amendment) to the prospective juror's right not to suffer race, sex or ethnic discrimination during jury selection (a right nowhere to be found in the Constitution). Today, almost 20 years after Batson, the problem is not just that racial discrimination continues to haunt jury selection, but also that the methods created to prevent it have overcorrected and now seem to value some disembodied notion of juror diversity over the constitutional command for fair trials.

To those of us who believe that jurors take their oaths seriously, that most jurors can put aside their biases, that strong facts rather than tricky lawyers win cases and that the jury system is an incredibly accurate albeit imperfect truth-finding device, the peremptory challenge system has become an embarrassment. After the latest string of California and New York celebrity trials, with 24-hour pundits constantly barraging us with their tactical and strategic views as if trials were procedural wars unrelated to any underlying truth, Justice Breyer's call for the abolition of the peremptory challenge is a welcome one. Congress and state legislatures, take note.

S.D. Enacts Ban On Nearly All Abortions (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

PIERRE, S.D., March 6 -- Gov. Mike Rounds (R) signed legislation Monday banning nearly all abortions in South Dakota, setting up a court fight aimed at challenging the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide.

DOJ_NMG_0016345

The bill would make it a crime for doctors to perform an abortion unless the procedure was necessary to save the woman's life. It would make no exception for cases of rape or incest.

Planned Parenthood, which operates the state's only abortion clinic, in Sioux Falls, has pledged to challenge the measure.

Rounds issued a written statement saying he expects the law to be tied up in court for years and not to take effect unless the Supreme Court upholds it.

"In the history of the world, the true test of a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society. The sponsors and supporters of this bill believe that abortion is wrong because unborn children are the most vulnerable and most helpless persons in our society. I agree with them," Rounds said in the statement.

The legislature passed the bill last month after supporters argued that the recent appointment of conservatives John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. have made the Supreme Court more likely to overturn Roe v. Wade .

Abortion opponents already are offering money to help the state pay legal bills for the anticipated court challenge, Rounds has said. Lawmakers said an anonymous donor has pledged $1 million to defend the ban, and the legislature set up a special account to accept donations for legal fees.

Under the new law, to go into effect July 1, doctors could be sentenced to up to five years in prison for performing an illegal abortion.

Rounds noted that it was written to make sure existing restrictions would still be enforced during the legal battle. Current state law sets increasingly stringent restrictions on abortions as pregnancy progresses; after the 24th week, the procedure is allowed only to protect the woman's health and safety.

South Dakota Bans Abortion, Setting Up A Battle (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Gov. Michael Rounds of South Dakota signed into law the nation's most sweeping state abortion ban on Monday, an intentional provocation meant to set up a direct legal challenge to Roe v. Wade, the 1973 United States Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal.

The law makes it a felony to perform any abortion except in a case of a pregnant woman's life being in jeopardy. Though the law is not scheduled to go into effect until July, officials working at the state's only abortion clinic, in Sioux Falls, where about 800 abortions take place each year, said they spent much of the day consoling women.

"This is a very real issue for a lot of people," said Kate Looby, state director of Planned Parenthood. "That's the part I think the legislators don't quite understand."

Mr. Rounds, a Republican, said in a statement after signing the legislation in Pierre that it was the right thing to do. The law will force a legal showdown before it ever comes into effect, an outcome its supporters, eager to overturn Roe, intended.

"In the history of the world, the true test of a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society," the governor said. "The sponsors and supporters of this bill believe that abortion is wrong because unborn children are the most vulnerable and most helpless persons in our society. I agree with them."

Around the country, abortion rights advocates responded with fury, calling the new law "blatantly unconstitutional," dangerous and counter to what a majority of Americans would support. Planned Parenthood, which operates the abortion clinic in South Dakota, pledged to use any means necessary — whether a federal lawsuit or a statewide referendum — to sideline the statute.

Under state law, if opponents collect 16,728 signatures of registered voters in the next three months the law will be delayed and a vote held on the issue in November.

"We're trying to evaluate the timing and the options now, but we're committed to making sure this does not come into effect," Cecile Richards, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a telephone interview. "It's a sad day for the women of South Dakota. We had really hoped that the governor would weigh women's health as more important than politics."

DOJ_NMG_0016346

Leaders on each side of the abortion debate said South Dakota's law had stirred new support and fervor for their causes. Abortion rights advocates reported a flood of donations, volunteers and membership requests since the abortion bill began drawing national attention last month.

Opponents said they, too, had had a flood of calls, including numerous donations to a defense fund to fight what is expected to be expensive litigation on behalf of South Dakota.

Already, the state's move seems to have emboldened legislators opposed to abortion elsewhere. For months, similar bills had been proposed in the statehouses of at least a half-dozen states, including Ohio, Georgia and Tennessee, but some efforts have gained steam in the weeks since the South Dakota Legislature overwhelmingly passed its ban.

"Legislators feel that now is the time to wrestle back their authority from the courts," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, based in Washington. "The courts have overstepped their bounds on issues like gay marriage, and the legislators are speaking up."

In Mississippi, an abortion ban with exceptions for rape, incest and the life of the mother passed the House on Thursday. In Missouri, legislation that would outlaw all abortions except to save the life of the mother was proposed last week.

But opponents of abortion have split over South Dakota's approach, a fact that Mr. Rounds acknowledged in recent weeks as he weighed whether to sign the legislation.

Some, including those who led efforts to pass the ban in South Dakota, said they considered this the ideal time to return the central question of Roe to the Supreme Court. State Representative Roger Hunt, who sponsored the bill in South Dakota, pointed to the appointments of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., both conservatives, and what he described as the "strong possibility" of the retirement of Justice John Paul Stevens in the near future and the naming of a conservative as his successor.

"This is our time," Mr. Hunt said on Monday.

Other national anti-abortion groups, though, have quietly disagreed with the timing, pressing instead to cut down on abortions by creating restrictions that may be more palatable to a wider audience, restrictions like parental and spousal notification laws and clinic regulations. If the Supreme Court upholds Roe, they have argued, the damage for those opposed to abortion rights will be grave.

"As much as this isn't the best strategic thing to do, it's there and it's the law of South Dakota now," said Daniel S. McConchie, vice president of Americans United for Life, another group. "We'll defend our position now — which is to oppose abortion."

Cristina Minniti, a spokeswoman for the National Right to Life Committee, said no one from her organization was available to be interviewed on the South Dakota law. Instead, she issued a one paragraph statement which stated, in part: "Currently there are at least five votes, a majority, on the U.S. Supreme Court to uphold Roe v. Wade."

Mr. Rounds, who became governor in 2003 after serving in the South Dakota Senate for a decade, declined to speak with reporters after the signing. In an earlier interview, he said that he personally felt uncertain about the timing of a challenge to Roe, but that he was leaning toward signing the bill, in part because he did not wish to divide the people who, like him, oppose abortion.

In the statement he issued on Monday, Mr. Rounds said he fully expected the law to be challenged, and that it might wind up in the nation's highest court. He compared the possibility of a reversal on Roe to that of the changing legal precedents around segregation.

"The reversal of a Supreme Court opinion is possible," the governor said. "For example, in 1896, the United States Supreme Court ruled in the Plessy vs. Ferguson case that a state could require racial segregation in public facilities if the facilities offered to different races were equal. However, 58 years later, the Supreme Court reconsidered that opinion and reversed itself in Brown vs. Board of Education."

Abortion Battle Gains New Intensity With Ban In S.D. (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016347

The near-total ban on abortion signed into law Monday in South Dakota sets the stage for renewed battles over abortion rights in courts, legislatures and political campaigns.

The new law bans all abortions in the state except to save a woman's life. Under any other circumstances, including rape or incest, performing an abortion would be a crime.

Gov. Mike Rounds said he signed the law because "unborn children are the most vulnerable and helpless persons in our society." He said he hoped the Supreme Court would overturn the 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade that legalized abortion nationwide, as it had overturned "separate but equal" racial segregation in 1954. "The reversal of a Supreme Court opinion is possible," he said.

Planned Parenthood Foundation of America, the only abortion provider in South Dakota, vowed to fight the ban in court. Democratic strategist Steve Hildebrand said some South Dakota activists are considering putting the new law before voters in November. He said 17,000 signatures would be required by May 2 to get it on the ballot.

Passions among supporters of the law were also running high. State Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican sponsor of the law, said an unidentified donor has already given $1 million to offset legal costs.

Rounds described the new law as "a direct challenge to … Roe v. Wade," the ruling that struck down state laws banning abortion. He said lower court action probably will prevent the law from taking effect July 1 as scheduled.

Cecile Richards, president of Planned Parenthood, called the new law "a complete wake-up call" that's already drawn "an enormous influx of new donors."

Abortion rights groups say similar bans are pending in at least eight states. Three were introduced last week, following passage of the South Dakota bill.

Some Abortion Foes Balk At S.D. Law (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — South Dakota's new law banning almost all abortions is creating a rift among anti-abortion Republicans during an election year.

The law bars abortions unless they're needed to save a woman's life. The ban has underscored disagreements between the law's supporters and those who favor exceptions for rape and incest. It has also exposed Republican disagreements over how best to reduce abortions when most Americans support keeping them legal.

State Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican who sponsored the law, says "this is the right time" to tackle the issue head-on. "Every year that goes by, there are more and more unborn children whose lives are being terminated."

Some Republican abortion opponents say they would prefer to continue the incremental approach that has resulted in increasing restrictions on abortion. They worry South Dakota's frontal assault could scare away moderates, light a fire under liberals and even set back the anti-abortion cause.

"I am very purely pro-life, and I would not have undertaken this strategy," Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway says. She says it plays into "somewhat hysterical claims of extremism" by the left and "seems to give a largely dying, discredited (abortion rights) movement a little bit of gas."

Daniel McConchie, vice president of the anti-abortion Americans United for Life, says taxpayers could be burdened with legal fees and state courts could be provoked to create state versions of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision, which legalized abortion nationwide in 1973. "It's a very high-stakes tactic," he says.

Democratic strategist Steve Hildebrand predicts the law will be "a huge benefit" for his party as it wends its way through the courts. He gives a preview of the case abortion rights supporters could make: If a murderer gets out of prison and rapes a woman, she's forced to have his child. If a father brutally rapes his daughter, she is forced to have his child. "You present those arguments to women voters, they are going to be outraged," Hildebrand says.

Two-thirds in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll in January said they did not want the Supreme Court to overturn Roe, compared with 25% who said they did.

DOJ_NMG_0016348

Many Republicans who oppose abortion, President Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain among them, favor exceptions for rape and incest as well as when a woman's life is in danger. “There is no consensus in the Republican Party,” GOP pollster David Hill says.

That has been apparent as the party's 2008 White House prospects respond to questions on the South Dakota ban. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Virginia Sen. George Allen said they would have signed it. McCain said last month on ABC's This Week that “my position has been consistently pro-life but (with exceptions for) rape, incest and the health of the mother.” McCain's aides later said he meant to say “life” of the mother, his longtime view and a much narrower exception than “health.”

Deirdre McQuade of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops calls the law a chance to end Roe's “stranglehold” on legislatures and “open up the possibility of people's values being reflected in their own state laws.”

Hunt says there's “national momentum” for the law he sponsored — similar legislation popping up in other states and the elevation of two new conservative Supreme Court justices, John Roberts and Samuel Alito. He says it's likely liberal Justice John Paul Stevens, 85, will retire within the two to three years he estimates it will take the new law to reach the high court.

South Dakota state Sen. J.P. Duniphan, a self-described “pro-life” Republican, opposed the law. “It is a very unnecessary, expensive challenge. And it is dividing the party.”

South Dakota Governor Signs Abortion Ban (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds announced today that he has signed legislation prohibiting nearly all abortions in his state, a move designed to invite a more conservative U.S. Supreme Court to revisit the 1973 decision that established a woman's right to choose.

The governor's action, which had been expected, makes South Dakota the first state to ban most abortions since the high court ruled in Roe vs. Wade. About half a dozen states are considering similar legislation.

"In the history of the world, the true test of a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society," Rounds said in a statement posted on his website. "The sponsors and supporters of this bill believe that abortion is wrong because unborn children are the most vulnerable and most helpless persons in our society.

"I agree with them," stated the governor.

The ban is scheduled to go into effect in July, but advocates for abortion rights have announced that they will challenge it in the courts.

"This ban is an attack on women's fundamental right of privacy and their ability to make the most intimate and personal choice about when and whether to have a child," Eve Gartner, senior staff attorney for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a statement released before Rounds announced he had signed the bill. "The U.S. Supreme Court has reaffirmed time and again the constitutional right to make the private choice to have an abortion. South Dakota is entering dangerous territory with this ban."

Planned Parenthood runs the state's only clinic where abortions are performed. About 800 abortions are done each year in South Dakota.

Rounds said he expected the South Dakota law to end up in the courts. He cited another Supreme Court reversal — the 1954 decision to end racial segregation — as a reason for optimism.

The South Dakota law "will give the United States Supreme Court a similar opportunity to reconsider an earlier opinion," he stated.

Since the 1973 ruling, the addition of new justices may have created a 5-4 majority opposed to Roe. Two recent additions, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Associate Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., are believed to have questions about the decision. Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the court.

The South Dakota law eliminates most abortions in the state, but Rounds said that it allows doctors to perform abortions in order to save the life of the mother. Abortion rights advocates question that assertion.

DOJ_NMG_0016349

Last month, the Supreme Court announced that it will hear another abortion case dealing with the legality of a 2003 federal law that banned a procedure known as partial birth abortions.

Sun Belt, Suburbs Get More Diverse (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Almost a third of the nation's 361 metropolitan areas have registered declines in their white populations this decade as minorities bring ethnic and racial diversity to vast sections of the USA, according to a Brookings Institution report to be released today.

The influx of immigrants and people moving to the Sun Belt and Western mountain states from other parts of the USA is rearranging the ethnic tapestry of urban centers in an unprecedented way.

Blacks, Hispanics and Asians are going where the jobs are. They're driving population increases in the fastest-growing areas, including Las Vegas, Atlanta and Orlando, says demographer William Frey, author of the report on shifts in populations from 2000 to 2004.

The white population declined in 111 metropolitan areas, including Los Angeles, New York and San Francisco. Aging whites are gravitating toward smaller communities such as St. George, Utah, and Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, Frey says.

The white population still dominates exurbs and "spillover" communities outside large metropolitan centers but minorities also are moving to these areas.

"These minorities are now spilling to parts of the country — the interior Sun Belt, suburbs and exurbs — which were once bastions of middle-class whites," Frey says. "As a consequence, white-bread America is experiencing diversity firsthand, rather than in magazines or TV images. … Politicians are going to have to figure out how to satisfy both groups."

Frey's key findings:

•Minorities now constitute a majority of children under age 15 in almost a third of large metropolitan areas, including Chicago, Phoenix and Atlanta.

•The black return migration to the South has gained momentum this decade. But blacks are gravitating less to the "Old South" states of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama and more to "New South" job hubs in Texas, North Carolina, Georgia and Florida.

•An area's ability to attract and hire immigrants increasingly can make or break it economically.

"The most distressing news is from the Northeast and Midwest," says Ned Hill, vice president of economic development at Cleveland State University. "White retirement is heading south without a compensating inflow of people and fewer births because of fewer immigrants." Cleveland registered one of the biggest losses in white population.

•Four of the metropolitan areas showing the fastest growth in Hispanics are in Florida.

Mickey Rosado, 37, is the first Hispanic on the city council in Cape Coral, Fla., near Fort Myers. The area had the nation's biggest jump in Hispanics, up 55.4% from 2000 to 2004. Hispanics are opening small businesses and working in agriculture, he says. Officials have to balance the needs of younger Hispanic families and older white residents. "It's a major issue," he says.

Whites To Be Minority In New York Area Soon, Data Show (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The influx of foreigners to New York and its suburbs and the continuing exodus of non-Hispanic whites to other parts of the country have transformed the face of metropolitan New York so profoundly that whites will constitute a minority of the region's population within a few years, demographers say.

The shift would make New York the first large metropolitan area outside the South and West in which whites do not make up a majority, according to an analysis of 2004 Census estimates by the Brookings Institution that was released yesterday.

The analysis also reveals a historic reversal: For the first time since at least the 19th century, the black population of both the city and, to a lesser extent, the region, has declined. In the five boroughs, according to the estimates, the number of blacks declined by about 30,000 since 2000, dipping below 30 percent of the overall population, as the migration of blacks to the suburbs and areas like the South outpaced immigration from the Caribbean and Africa.

DOJ_NMG_0016350

In contrast, the analysis found that while the greater New York region over all lost 162,000 non-Hispanic whites and several hundred blacks from 2000 to 2004, the region gained 288,000 Hispanic people and 201,000 Asians — more Asians, in fact, than any other metropolitan area.

Increasingly, the New York region's growing multiracial makeup reflects the changing face of the inner ring of suburbs as many new immigrants bypass the city altogether or migrate from the city to neighboring counties after a generation or less.

What makes the city and the region unusual, though, is that among the nation's 88 metropolitan areas with half a million or more people, New York is one of only three — Houston and Honolulu are the others — where the proportion of blacks, Hispanics and Asians each exceeds their share of the national population.

Whites have been a minority in New York City since the 1980's. But now that shift is extending to the wider metropolitan area, driven by immigration and higher birth rates among immigrants. Already, non-Hispanic whites are a minority of the metropolitan area's population younger than 15.

"New York is still the classic melting pot, with a whole diverse array of immigrants coming in, but the suburbs are now becoming part of this bigger melting pot," said William H. Frey, the Brookings Institution demographer who conducted the analysis. "The suburbs are now tasting this new diversity."

His analysis found that whites declined to 52.2 percent of the population in 2004 from 54.2 percent in 2000 in the census-defined metropolitan area, which includes the city, Long Island, the northern suburbs, northern New Jersey and northeastern Pennsylvania, but not Connecticut.

"We went down 2.1 percent from 2000 to 2004," Dr. Frey said. "If we go another 2 percent before the end of the decade, you're there." He added: "The suburbs are now contributing to this. They've all shown a decline in the percent of whites since 1990."

The approaching statistical milestone in the New York region has not been unexpected by demographers.

"What this shows is that the pattern is spreading out," said Andrew A. Beveridge, a demographer at Queens College of the City University of New York, "and the non-Hispanic white population is continuing to dwindle."

"The New York metropolitan area is becoming more like the city, and the nation's metropolitan areas are becoming more like New York," Dr. Beveridge said.

The trend was foreshadowed in an earlier analysis by New York's Department of City Planning, which found that while the region's ethnic and racial numbers had been driven for several decades by changes in the five boroughs, those changes were also being mirrored in the suburban counties closest to the city.

"The inner-ring suburbs are emulating the city," said Joseph J. Salvo, director of the department's population division.

What's happening in New York has already occurred in metropolitan areas in the West and South, including Los Angeles, Miami, Houston and San Francisco.

The proportion of whites has also dipped to just over a majority in the San Diego, Washington, Dallas and Las Vegas metropolitan regions as Asian and Hispanic people disperse beyond central cities and their suburbs and as blacks migrate to the South. In each of those areas, whites are already a minority of the population under age 15.

Atlanta led large metropolitan areas in black population growth and is poised to overtake Chicago as the region with the second-highest black population in total numbers, after New York.

In 1990, metropolitan Los Angeles and New York accounted for 30 percent of the nation's Hispanic population. By 2004, those two regions were home to only 23 percent of Hispanic people.

"For immigrant minorities, especially, friendship and family networks have drawn them to traditional ports of entry, even during times when labor market considerations would suggest they move elsewhere," Dr. Frey wrote. "Blacks, as well, have tended to follow well-worn patterns, initially out of the South and, later, to a network of cities across the North and West."

But more recently, he concluded, "many lower-skilled Hispanic migrants are moving to fast-growing areas of the country, in response to retail, service and construction job growth, while higher-skilled minority migrants are following the same professional opportunities that have attracted whites."

DOJ_NMG_0016351

ANTITRUST:

Phone Merger's Approval Is Likely (AAS)

By Marilyn Geewax, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, March 7, 2006

FCC might impose some limits on the new AT&T.

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department likely will approve AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. without demanding any major antitrust concessions, analysts said Monday.

But the Federal Communications Commission, which also must review the transaction, may consider restricting the new company from charging new fees for faster delivery of premium Internet services, they predicted.

Together, AT&T and BellSouth would become the nation's No. 1 supplier of local, long-distance, wireless and high-speed-Internet services.

In recent reviews of telecom mergers, however, Justice Department officials decided that size alone could not shield phone companies from competition from cable, satellite and other companies providing telecom services.

As a result, the Justice Department demanded no significant changes in those cases, so "we see no reason why it would treat this case differently," according to an assessment issued by Anna-Maria Kovacs, president of Regulatory Source Associates LLC, a research firm in Cambridge, Mass.

Consumer advocates say they nevertheless will raise objections to hold back the approval process.

Getting regulators and antitrust prosecutors to stop the merger would be "highly unlikely," said Jeff Chester, executive director of the Center for Digital Democracy. "Our job is to slow the deal down and make their lives so miserable that they have to impose safeguards" to protect consumers, he said.

Chester has his work cut out for him. Under the Bush administration, the Justice Department has been highly amenable to mergers.

Supporters of the AT&T-BellSouth transaction will argue that it presents no serious antitrust problems because AT&T's operations are concentrated in the Southwest and Midwest, while BellSouth's are in the Southeast.

The merger could run into bigger speed bumps at the FCC.

Chairman Kevin Martin required few changes in last year's two enormous phone company mergers. But some observers think the two new Republican members — Deborah Taylor Tate and, once he's confirmed, Robert McDowell — might take relatively tough positions on the AT&T-BellSouth merger because of their past experiences. Tate previously worked with state utility commissioners, who often tangled with the regional phone companies over rates and service.

McDowell was assistant general counsel at Comptel, a trade group for smaller phone firms that opposes this transaction.

With Tate and McDowell, the commission may be more likely to block the merged company from charging fees for fast delivery of new Internet services, such as voice and video. Executives at both AT&T and BellSouth have said they want to start doing that.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, co-chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, warned Monday that the merger "will call into question our commitment . . . to preserve fair rules that guarantee nondiscriminatory access to new services."

UPDATE: Few Antitrust Hurdles Seen For AT&T Deal (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones) -- AT&T (T) will face few antitrust hurdles in its $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth (BLS), analysts predicted Monday.

Announced Sunday, the deal follows SBC Communications Inc.'s acquisition of AT&T (T) and the formation of the new AT&T Inc. (T) (T) in November. It also follows Verizon Communications' February 2005 purchase of MCI Corp.

Both those recent deals, observers say, give regulators case histories from which to work.

"They have a template to look at these things and follow the same framework," said Paul Glenchur of Stanford Washington Research Group.

DOJ_NMG_0016352

"I don't think there's going to be a great deal of regulatory resistance," said Jonathan Rubin, a research fellow at the American Antitrust Institute.

Announced Sunday, the acquisition would cement AT&T's (T) position as the country's largest supplier of local, long-distance, wireless and high-speed- Internet services. The combination would serve 70 million local-phone customers, 54 million-plus wireless subscribers and more than 10 million DSL Internet users.

The combined company would likely have to divest some "special access" lines used by businesses to send high volumes of data, analysts said.

Combined with BellSouth (BLS) (BLS) , AT&T (T) would control the local phone market in 22 states, including the most populous areas of the South and Midwest. Rival Verizon would control the East and the much-smaller Qwest most of the less-populated West.

But consumer-activist groups have quickly announced their opposition to the deal, and some suggest the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission have let big telecom mergers go through without proper scrutiny.

"The regulators are permitting these mergers to proceed without installing adequate consumer and competition safeguards," said the antitrust institute's Rubin.

Shares of AT&T (T) were trading lower early Monday afternoon. They were recently off 35 cents to $27.64.

US Officials To Closely Review AT&T-BellSouth (REU)

Reuters, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - U.S. communications regulators and antitrust authorities on Monday pledged to carefully review AT&T Inc.'s $65 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp..

"We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services," Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement.

The agency must determine whether the deal benefits the public. The transaction must also receive approval from U.S. Justice Department antitrust authorities.

"We're going to look at it closely," the department's antitrust chief Thomas Barnett told reporters while attending a conference of attorneys general.

Analysts said they expect the deal to be approved, likely with similar conditions that were attached to two telecommunications deals given the green light last year, Verizon Communications' purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications acquisition of AT&T Corp. to form AT&T Inc.

Lawmakers also said they plan to review the deal.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens and his staff "will review the AT&T-BellSouth merger during the coming weeks, a process which will include meetings with the involved parties," said panel spokesman Aaron Saunders.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, the ranking Democrat on the committee, issued a statement expressing concern about the consolidation, particularly so soon after the SBC-AT&T deal closed.

"The proposed recombination of two of the remaining four Baby Bells will call into question our commitment to promote competition in the communications marketplace and to preserve fair rules that guarantee nondiscriminatory access to new services," said Inouye of Hawaii.

AT&T shares fell 97 cents, or 3.5 percent, to close at $27.02 while BellSouth shares rose $3.05, or 9.7 percent, to $34.51.

UPDATE:AT&T-BellSouth Deal Draws Scrutiny On Capitol Hill (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- AT&T Inc.'s (T) (T) proposed purchase of BellSouth Corp. (BLS)(BLS) is stirring up some unease on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers and competing telecommunications companies are questioning whether the transaction requires special scrutiny.

The combination would create the world's largest telecommunications company and reunite portions of AT&T (T) that the government broke up in 1984. The new entity would be a behemoth, with customers from California to Florida. It would offer phone and Internet access and roll out new television services, giving customers a new option for bundling services in a single package.

Concerns hinge in on the size of the deal and on expectations that AT&T's (T)purchase will escalate a trend of consolidation in the telecommunications industry. Just four months ago, regulators approved the takeover of AT&T (T) itself by SBC Communications Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s (VZ) (VZ) purchase of MCI.

"AT&T's (T) proposal to purchase BellSouth (BLS) would remove yet another potential competitor from the communications marketplace and calls into question whether the future of communications policy will be marked by strategies to promote vigorous competition or by further efforts to facilitate new mergers," Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the top Democrat on the Senate Commerce Committee said in a statement.

The transaction comes amid a favorable political climate for mergers, as the Bush administration has been friendly to large combinations. Many observers expect the Federal Communications Commission and antitrust regulators to approve the deal with few conditions even amid concerns the deal would leave companies with too much pricing power and consumers with two few choices.

Mergers are a particular threat for the small phone companies. The small companies are urging regulators to block AT&T's (T) plans to buy BellSouth (BLS), citing the risks of diminished competition.

"There are no benefits in this merger for consumers or the U.S. economy," said Earl Comstock, president of Comptel, a trade group for small phone companies. " This merger continues the anticompetitive resurrection of the old Bell monopoly."

The cable industry is also weighing in, arguing that the transaction undercuts AT&T's (T) efforts to persuade Congress to overhaul laws that require phone companies to get permission from each municipality in which they hope to offer television business.

"My point here is not to question the merger, which will be handled appropriately by the relevant federal agencies and Congressional committees," Kyle McSlarrow, the president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, wrote in a letter Monday to the leaders of the Senate and House committees that oversee the telecommunications industry.

"Rather, it is to suggest how extraordinary it is for an industry, in which one company alone - AT&T (T) - has a market capitalization greater than that of the entire cable industry, not only to ask for special favors from Congress but in fact demand free license to enter the video market while maintaining all current regulation on a much smaller cable industry."

- By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-6654; Siobhan.Hughes@ dowjones.com

AT&T Plans 10,000 Job Cuts After BellSouth Purchase (Update4) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 7, 2006

March 6 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc., the largest U.S. telephone company, plans to eliminate about 10,000 jobs after completing the $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp.

The reductions will come in 2007 through 2009, Chief Financial Officer Rick Lindner said on a conference call today with analysts. With BellSouth and Cingular, San Antonio-based AT&T's workforce will rise to 317,000 from 189,000, making AT&T among the top 10 U.S. employers, according to Bloomberg data.

Job cuts, which are about 3 percent of total employment, represent about 50 percent of the planned $18 billion in cost savings AT&T expects to extract from the purchase. The acquisition will cement AT&T's position as the dominant U.S. provider of local, long-distance and wireless calling and enable it to better fend off new competition from cable-television companies and Internet calling companies.

``It's a realization that the world is changing and it's changing faster and faster," AT&T Chief Executive Officer Ed Whitacre said on the call. ``We saw that the sooner we did this, the better off we'd be."

The reductions, which Lindner said will come mostly through attrition, are in addition to the 13,000 jobs that AT&T plans to shed as part of last year's combination between SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which created the largest U.S. phone provider. BellSouth and Cingular add 128,000 workers to the payroll.

The combined BellSouth-AT&T will have 70 million local-phone customers in 22 states including four of the largest: Texas, California, Illinois and Florida. Ownership of Cingular Wireless LLC, the largest mobile-phone carrier, will give AT&T 54.1 million wireless subscribers and along with the business segment will make up 72 percent of total revenue.

Profit Booster in 2008

AT&T and BellSouth combined had almost $100 billion in revenue last year and today have a stock market value of more than $160 billion, dwarfing the $98 billion of No. 2. Verizon Communications Inc. Sales at the new company are expected to return to growth in 2007, a year earlier than AT&T forecast on Jan. 31.

The deal, expected to close in early 2007, won't affect profit excluding amortization and merger-related costs in 2007 and will add to profit on that basis starting in 2008, Lindner said.

``The industry itself has become increasingly competitive," said John Cunningham, who manages $3 billion as the chief investment officer of J&W Seligman & Co. in New York and holds BellSouth shares. ``You need to see these kinds of mergers for these companies to thrive and survive."

BellSouth shares surged 9.7 percent. The company's shareholders will receive AT&T shares worth $37.09 for each BellSouth share, the companies said yesterday in a statement. AT&T will also take on $17 billion of BellSouth debt and plans to buy back $10 billion of shares.

Roll Up

By buying BellSouth, Whitacre is continuing his roll up of the companies formed when AT&T Corp. was split in 1984. Back then, AT&T Corp. dominated local- and long-distance phone services. The company had $150 billion in assets and employed more than 1 million. A year later, the business was split into eight pieces, one long-distance company and local-telephone providers, the Baby Bells. SBC was the smallest.

The combined AT&T-BellSouth will have more than $200 billion in assets, a reflection of both the expansion of the telephone industry into mobile service and fiber-optic lines and the push to automate more functions.

``The old AT&T is practically put together," said Sean Egan, managing director of Egan-Jones Ratings Co. said. ``A big portion of the split-up of the Bells has been reconstituted."

Regulatory Scrutiny

The purchase will help Whitacre, 64, form a company to compete with mobile-phone companies, cable-television operators such as Comcast Corp. and Internet phone-service providers like EBay Inc.'s Skype. As part of his plan, Whitacre bought AT&T Corp., the largest U.S. long-distance provider, for $16.5 billion in November and is preparing to offer television service along fiber-optic lines.

That competition may help AT&T win regulatory approval, analysts said. BellSouth, which operates in nine states, also doesn't compete in AT&T's states.

``The battle with cable is here," said Felix Rohatyn, the former Ambassador to France and Lazard Ltd. partner who advised Whitacre on the bid. ``This deal will make the new AT&T better able to compete, not just with cable and satellite but with all the new technologies that are coming at them."

The U.S. Justice Department, which last year approved SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T and Verizon's acquisition of MCI Inc., is unlikely to raise major antitrust concerns, said Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin, a former U.S. Federal Communications Commission chief of staff.

``They looked at those other deals, went through lots of paperwork, and they ultimately decided not that much was required," Levin said.

Shares

Shares of Atlanta-based BellSouth, the No. 3 local-phone company, rose $3.04 to $34.50 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading after earlier reaching $35.25. Before today, the shares had gained 16 percent this year and were trading at their highest in more than four years on speculation AT&T would make a bid. AT&T will pay 1.325 shares for each BellSouth stock.

AT&T shares, up 10 year, fell 97 cents, or 3.5 percent, to $27.02. AT&T will pay BellSouth $1.7 billion if the deal is terminated, according to regulatory filings.

DOJ_NMG_0016355

The deal sparked investor speculation that other telecommunications deals may be in the works. Shares of Sprint Nextel Corp., the third-largest wireless services provider, rose $1.10, or 4.5 percent, to $25.30.

Analysts Divided

Analysts were divided on the benefits of the merger. Wachovia Securities raised its rating on AT&T, while Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. cut the shares. JPMorgan called the agreement a ``clear positive" for BellSouth and said the implications for AT&T shareholders are unclear. Credit Suisse said the cost savings AT&T expects from the combination seem high.

Whitacre, who will be Chairman and CEO of the combined company through April 2008, said the most immediate benefits will come from combining Cingular ownership under one roof. AT&T said it will save about $2 billion a year, by merging networks, firing workers and forming one brand under AT&T.

The agreement to buy BellSouth is the biggest in the industry in six years. It caps a spending spree of more than $200 million during his 16 years at the helm of the company formerly known as SBC Communications Inc. AT&T Inc. was formed when SBC bought AT&T Corp. and changed its name.

Shareholders `Rewarded'

``AT&T is going to be a faster-growing, much larger, stronger company," said John Hodulik, an analyst at UBS AG in New York. Hodulik, among the most accurate analysts ranked by StarMine Corp., rates AT&T a ``buy" and has a ``neutral" rating on BellSouth. ``Shareholders will be rewarded for it."

BellSouth CEO Duane Ackerman will leave three months after the deal closes. Ackerman said it's the ``right time" for the merger. Whitacre and Ackerman pieced the deal together, AT&T Chief Operating Officer Randall Stephenson said in an interview.

``It will benefit customers. It will facilitate the industry's technological evolution. It will allow us reduce costs," Ackerman said today.

Cingular Wireless has driven revenue growth at AT&T and BellSouth. In the third quarter last year, for example, SBC's revenue was little changed excluding Atlanta-based Cingular. With the mobile-phone business, SBC revenue was up 21 percent. The wireless provider added a record 1.82 million subscribers. Verizon Wireless, its nearest competitor, added 2 million to 51.3 million.

``Wireless really drove this deal," Hodulik said.

AT&T and BellSouth have shared ownership of the business, AT&T with 60 percent and BellSouth with 40 percent, preventing each from reaping the full benefits.

Name Change

``No partnership between two independent companies, no matter how well run, can match the speed, effectiveness, responsiveness and efficiency of a solely owned company," Whitacre said.

The structure impeded Cingular's ability to develop services such as Internet access on mobile phones and televisions, Stephenson said. Cingular will change its name to AT&T.

``This really enhances our ability to get these services to market quick," Stephenson said.

Whitacre, a 6-foot-4 Texan, completed his first large acquisition in 1997 with the purchase of Pacific Telesis Group. In 1998, SBC bought Southern New England Telecommunications and a year later Whitacre orchestrated the $80.6 billion purchase of Chicago-based Ameritech Corp.

`Surprised the World'

``Whitacre surprised the world," said Atlanta-based telecom analyst Jeff Kagan. ``He's taken the smallest Bell and made it the largest Bell. He's done a lot more than anyone thought he could."

AT&T will pick up BellSouth's phone lines in parts of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee. About 60 percent of AT&T's lines are in California, Texas and Illinois.

Verizon and Denver-based Qwest Communications International Inc. are the only other remaining telephone providers from the breakup. Verizon offers service in 28 states including New York and California, as well as Washington D.C.

Whitacre sought advice from Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Evercore Partners, and Rohatyn Associates for the transaction. Citigroup Inc. and Goldman Sachs Group Inc. advised BellSouth.

The banks will be sharing fees for the biggest acquisition in the telecommunications industry since Verizon was created in June 2000 with the $71 billion merger of Bell Atlantic Corp. and GTE Corp., according to data compiled by Bloomberg. The last deal in any industry that was as large was Sanofi-Synthelabo SA's purchase of Aventis SA in France for $73 billion in August 2004.

AT&T-Verizon Battle

The combination sets up a battle between AT&T and Verizon. Until last year, the two companies operated mainly in separate states and barely competed. Since then, SBC Communications bought AT&T and Verizon acquired MCI, enabling them both to expand beyond their local-phone states and tap business customers.

Verizon had been the largest U.S. telephone company until SBC and AT&T combined. Verizon Wireless also lost its spot as the top provider of mobile-phone service when Cingular bought AT&T Wireless Services Inc. in 2004. Verizon is focused on acquiring the 45 percent of Verizon Wireless that it doesn't own from partner Vodafone Group Plc, spokesman Peter Thonis said today.

``It's a priority for us," Thonis said in an e-mail. He said Verizon's business plan is unchanged after AT&T's announcement and called the offer ``a logical and predictable move."

Whitacre's strategy has paid off for him. He received $17.2 million in total compensation last year, a 9.5 percent raise, according to a regulatory filing.

``He's a Texan, and he's winning," Kagan said. ``He does what he has to do to make the deals and grow the company. He doesn't take no for an answer. And everybody wins. The companies he acquires, the stockholders."

(AT&T executives began a call to discuss the purchase today at 10 a.m. New York time. To listen click on {LIVE} or listen on the Internet at http://www.att.com/investor.relations or http://www.bellsouth.com/investor)

To contact the reporters responsible for this story: J. Kyle Foster in New York at kfoster2@bloomberg.net Last Updated: March 6, 2006 16:15 EST

AT&T's BellSouth Call May Ring At Vodafone (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-low And Jason Singer In London And Amol Sharma In New York

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

AT&T INC.'S planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. not only changes the U.S. telecommunications landscape but could cause an unexpected shift in the dynamic between Britain's Vodafone Group PLC and Verizon Communications Inc., the co-owners of Verizon Wireless.

Verizon has long been interested in buying out Vodafone's 45% stake in the venture, but has been holding out for the right terms. For months, Vodafone has been under pressure from investors to do a deal in order to generate cash for the company and pay out dividends to large shareholders. That gave Verizon the upper hand.

But now Verizon needs to get control of the venture more than ever, analysts say, just to keep pace with AT&T, which will take full control of cellular carrier Cingular Wireless and thus increase its exposure to the telecom industry's growth area. The power balance may have shifted in Vodafone's favor.

"In terms of negotiating leverage, I think there's been a slight shift toward more bargaining power for Vodafone," said Andy Belt, a telecom consultant at Adventis Corp., a Boston consulting firm.

The two sides may well find common ground.

Vodafone's stake in Verizon Wireless could be valued at as much as $45 billion, analysts say. Investors seemed to warm to the prospect yesterday of a Verizon buyout, pushing Vodafone's shares in London 2.9% higher to 125 pence ($2.19). In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Vodafone's American depositary shares were at $21.90, up 90 cents, or 4.3%.

As the joint venture's name suggests, Verizon has always had greater brand and operational control of the company. That has led some Vodafone investors to ask recently why Vodafone Group's chief executive, Arun Sarin, doesn't bail out of the venture, especially because Verizon Wireless uses a different technology from Vodafone's other operations.

A sale of the Verizon Wireless stake could leave Vodafone, after returning some cash to investors, with enough left over to make acquisitions. One possibility: T-Mobile USA Inc., a unit of Deutsche Telekom AG. While Deutsche Telekom has said it aims to keep its U.S. division, the German company has considered selling in the recent past. T-Mobile USA also faces huge investments for new spectrum licenses in the near future. And it would give Vodafone its own brand name in the U.S. and a network based on the same technology it uses elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0016357

But that isn't in the cards yet. "We would not be interested" in T-Mobile USA, a Vodafone spokesman said yesterday. T-Mobile USA declined to comment.

Some observers say AT&T's bold strike means Verizon has to respond. Moving more aggressively to purchase all of Verizon Wireless is the most likely option, some say. Owning 100% of Verizon Wireless would help boost Verizon Communications' growth profile as it would be able to reflect all of the wireless carrier's growth.

It would also free Verizon Communications to offer wireless-related discounts and integrate its land line and wireless networks with new service offerings, particularly for business customers. As it stands, Verizon Communications must manage Verizon Wireless in the best interests of the joint venture.

Verizon Communications spokesman Peter Thonis said Verizon has a strong interest in buying out Vodafone, but added, "It isn't because we're reacting or responding in any way to AT&T."

Vodafone appears to be softening its stance on selling its stake. In a recent interview, Mr. Sarin said he wouldn't rule out a sale. "It's not a question of 'no, never, not at any price,'" he said. But, "we're not in a hurry," he added. "Verizon Wireless provides us a very good rate of return on our capital."

Because AT&T's integration of its land line and wireless business could have a negative competitive effect on Verizon Wireless, "the announcement of the deal may nudge Verizon [Communications] and Vodafone closer to each other," says David Barden, an analyst at Banc of America Securities. But, he adds, "It isn't clear it will nudge them enough to close the gap between them." Mr. Barden doesn't own shares in Verizon Communications or Vodafone. Banc of America has an investment-banking relationship with Verizon Communications, but not with Vodafone.

A sale would likely incur a hefty capital-gains tax for Vodafone. One way to mitigate that tax could involve Vodafone Omnitel NV, the Italian carrier in which Verizon Communications owns a 23.1% stake and Vodafone owns the rest. Verizon Communications could swap its holdings in Omnitel in part payment for Vodafone's Verizon Wireless stake.

Vodafone's Mr. Sarin has shown he is willing to quit countries when he thinks the time is right. The company said Friday that it was in talks to sell a majority stake of its Japanese business, which has struggled to stem a loss of customers. Some analysts say Vodafone's consideration of a sale in Japan could ease the pressure on the United Kingdom company to sell its stake in Verizon Wireless in the near term, but that shedding the U.S. business remains a possibility down the road.

"We view an exit in Japan as the better option than selling out of the U.S. at this stage," wrote Lehman Brothers in a research report yesterday. But, "we believe that the willingness of Vodafone's management to take decisive corporate action could well lead to a U.S. exit over the mid- to long-term."

Merger Pressure Rises After AT&T Deal (FT)

By Paul Taylor, Aline Van Duyn And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

The $67bn merger of AT&T and BellSouth to create the world's largest telecoms company on Monday increased the pressure on rivals including Verizon Communications to join an industry-wide consolidation.

Announcing the deal on Monday, Edward Whitacre, AT&T's chairman and chief executive, said the tie-up was "a logical fit" that would enable the enlarged group to offer a full range of fixed line, wireless and advanced IP-based services to consumers and businesses. The merger reflected "a realisation that the world is changing and it's changing faster and faster," he said. "We saw that the sooner we did this, the better off we'd be."

AT&T said it expected to cut 10,000 jobs between 2007 and 2009, as part of plans to eliminate $18bn in costs.

Although the Federal Communications Commission said it would "carefully weigh" the proposed deal, senior company executives were confident it could win regulatory approval and be closed within a year. "As a substantive matter, there are no obvious issues that would allow the government to block the deal; there could be things that we see on later, once the companies file their papers," Michael Powell, a former FCC chairman, told the Financial Times.

DOJ_NMG_0016358

Outside experts also expected regulatory scrutiny to be largely a matter of what conditions should be attached.

AT&T said the combined company would be better placed to roll out new services including internet television services and advanced broadband video, in competition with cable companies. Annual savings would average $2bn, starting in 2008.

AT&T said the merger would help position the combined company to roll out new services including IPTV and advanced broadband video services in competition with cable companies. Average annual savings per year would be $2bn starting in 2008.

The BellSouth purchase would also give AT&T sole control of Cingular Wireless, the biggest wireless carrier in the US. As a result, analysts noted, Verizon, its main rival, would be under pressure to buy out Vodafone's 45 per cent stake in Verizon Wireless.

Shares in Vodafone gained 2.9 per cent in London to close at 125 pence. Verizon's shares were up 1.25 per cent at $34 at noon in New York.

"Verizon may be pressured more to improve its business mix by becoming increasingly focused on its attempt to buy out the remaining 45 per cent of Verizon Wireless from Vodafone," said Jason Armstrong of Goldman Sachs in a note to investors.

Verizon acknowledged that getting control of the Vodafone stake – a deal that could be worth up to $50bn – was a priority. It was "working to acquire from Vodafone the remaining 45 percent of Verizon Wireless". Vodafone reacted cautiously, saying its "position has not changed".

Verizon declined to say whether active talks with Vodafone were under way. "This a logical and predictable move by AT&T," said Peter Thonis of Verizon. "This kind of consolidation of assets makes sense, providing new leverage and capabilities as Verizon and AT&T compete against cable."

Arun Sarin, chief executive, has recently signalled the board would consider selling stake in Verizon Wireless although he insisted last month he thought it was a "good idea" to stay in the US.

Mr Sarin has come under pressure from shareholders, unhappy about the group's share price performance and overall strategy, to dispose of the stake in Verizon Wireless because Vodafone has no clear path to control.

Instead, Vodafone is looking at exiting the troubled Japanese market, another bone of contention for investors, after confirming at the end of last week it was in talks with Softbank to sell at least a controlling stake in the Japanese subsidiary.

The Titans Of Telecom Face Off (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

One started out as an engineer in Lubbock, Tex.; the other as a cable-splicer's assistant in the Bronx.

From those humble beginnings, AT&T Inc. Chairman Edward E. Whitacre Jr. and Verizon Communications Inc. Chairman Ivan G. Seidenberg have built the two biggest U.S. telecommunications companies.

With Sunday's announcement of AT&T's agreement to buy BellSouth Corp. for about $67 billion in stock, Whitacre, 64, capped a career that has transformed what was once the smallest of the Baby Bells, Southwestern Bell Corp., into the largest local-phone and wireless company in the country.

What immediately followed was speculation about what Verizon's Seidenberg, 59, might do next to one-up his biggest competitor for more than a decade. He has already said publicly that he'd like to buy out Vodafone Group PLC's 45 percent stake in Verizon Wireless, the second-largest U.S. mobile phone company.

For years, since Whitacre was the head of Southwestern Bell Corp. and Seidenberg was running Bell Atlantic and before that Nynex, the two have outdone each other through a string of mergers, acquisitions and partnerships.

People who have followed Whitacre's trajectory describe him as unusually aggressive and competitive, fond of the bold stroke and seldom given to self-doubt afterward.

"It's a sport. It's a competition. In this business, scale really matters," said Reed Hundt, a former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission who has dealt with both men over many years. "It's like NFL linemen. You want 'em big, you want 'em fast, but most important, you want 'em big."

The aim of the AT&T-BellSouth merger is to strengthen AT&T for what is shaping up as a battle against the cable companies to sell consumers bundles of video, high-speed Internet, wireless and traditional land-line telephone service. The deal, if approved by regulators, would also give AT&T full control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest mobile phone company, which it runs as a joint venture with BellSouth.

DOJ_NMG_0016359

San Antonio-based AT&T yesterday said it planned to cut about 10,000 jobs, through attrition where possible, as part of $18 billion in cost savings it projects from the merger with Atlanta-based BellSouth. AT&T's stock price slid 97 cents, to $27.02, as the market digested the merger, while BellSouth's rose $3.04, to $34.50. Verizon shares rose 15 cents, to $33.73.

The AT&T-BellSouth merger, which will give the combined company local-phone service in 22 states in the South, Midwest and West, immediately raised questions whether Verizon would try to buy another Bell.

Michael H. Salsbury, a telecom lawyer with Chadbourne & Parke LLP who was a former top executive at MCI Inc., said Seidenberg would continue with his basic strategy and dismissed speculation he might bid for heavily indebted Qwest Communications International Inc., the main local phone company in much of the West.

"If you had a dollar to invest and you were Ivan Seidenberg, would you invest it in Qwest or in wireless? Where would you get a better return? Wireless." Salsbury said.

Verizon spokesman Peter Thonis declined comment on whether the New York-based company might be interested in Qwest, and he reiterated the company's long-standing position on Vodafone's stake in Verizon Wireless.

While Whitacre has a reputation for boldness, Seidenberg is pursuing what many in the industry regard as a more audacious and costly strategy of running fiber-optic cables right to people's homes to carry what he hopes will be increasing video and high-speed Internet traffic. It is far more expensive to run new fiber-optic cables to customers' homes, but the technology allows for the transmission of more data than traditional copper wires because glass fibers can carry data faster.

Verizon is spending billions of dollars to build out its new all-fiber network, while AT&T is taking a less-costly approach by running fiber-optic cable to neighborhoods and using copper wires from there, which may allow it to offer such services at lower cost, albeit with less bandwidth. Bandwidth is the rate that information can be transmitted along a communications line.

"The risk associated with [Verizon's fiber-optic] build-out is higher. That risk may be acceptable because the returns are so great -- lots more bandwidth," said Ellen Daley, an analyst with Forrester Research Inc. "The risk on the AT&T side is less, and the gain is less as well."

Analysts said that one advantage to AT&T's strategy is that it may be able to build its high-speed network faster than Verizon, allowing it to achieve economies of scale and to negotiate discounts from content providers as it competes directly with cable companies.

Consumer groups said the AT&T-BellSouth merger would probably lead to higher prices, arguing that the telephone companies and the cable companies will effectively be a duopoly with little interest in aggressive competition.

While the consensus view among analysts was that the merger would be approved, the concentration of power could still trip some concerns on Capitol Hill or among regulators, especially when it comes to open access on the Internet.

"These companies were going to compete against each other. Instead, we have just the opposite," and that makes it all the more important to ensure that these companies don't become gatekeepers of the Internet, said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), the ranking Democrat on the House subcommittee on telecommunications. "The United States needs open networks."

As a condition of approval for both the Verizon-MCI and SBC-AT&T mergers last year, the companies agreed not to impose restrictions on Internet traffic, which in effect would enable some programs to work better than others. That provision sunsets two years after the close of those mergers.

In recent months, Seidenberg, Whitacre and BellSouth chief technology officer Bill Smith have all said they would prefer a system that would allow the carriers to charge to carry some kinds of traffic -- statements that have prompted concern from Internet companies such as Google Inc., which rely on Internet pipes to reach consumers.

With the latest proposed merger, critics of further consolidation say consumers, regulators and software companies should seek to codify "network neutrality" into law for all carriers.

"This time around, this merger should put media and content providers on high alert," said Jason Oxman, vice president of regulatory affairs for Comptel, an association of competitive carriers. "This could be the end of the line if the Internet community doesn't recognize the threat to the open Internet."

DOJ_NMG_0016360

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin J. Martin, who initially opposed the network neutrality provisions in the earlier two mergers but voted for them in the end, did not tip his hand yesterday.

"We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services," he said in a written statement.

Qwest May Get A Buyout Nibble (USAT)

By Edward Iwata And Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 7, 2006

For months, Qwest has been considered anything but a prized acquisition target — mostly because of its heavy debt and its lack of the large-scale wireless and high-speed Internet assets that are the communications industry's engines for growth in coming years.

That view might be changing in the wake of AT&T's proposed $67 billion purchase of BellSouth.

Qwest — as well as Alltel and Sprint Nextel — could become an acquisition target, as Verizon scrambles to keep pace with AT&T, predicts analyst Ken McGee at technology consultant Gartner.

A combined AT&T and BellSouth would knock Verizon from its No. 1 perch in the industry and put it at a disadvantage in both the wireless and large-business markets, possibly forcing it to respond, says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Chris King.

McGee predicts that Qwest will garner Verizon's interest as merger bait. “They're unlikely to remain an orphan,” he says, noting that Qwest CEO Richard Notebaert has kept Qwest from a bankruptcy reorganization and appears to be slowly turning it around. “Qwest must feel awfully lonely sitting there, watching everyone else dance.”

Verizon declined comment. Qwest spokesman Robert Toevs said the company continues “to watch industry consolidation with interest.”

Qwest, which posted a $757 million loss last year, also has been plagued by heavy debt and an accounting scandal that led to shareholder lawsuits and criminal prosecutions of former executives. It tried unsuccessfully last year to buy MCI, later acquired by Verizon.

Qwest and smaller telecoms without wireless assets likely will be victims of corporate Darwinism, predicts Fariborz Ghadar, director of Penn State University's Center for Global Business Studies.

In industries such as telecom that require billions of dollars in capital and new technology, only two or three large players boast enough assets, customers and brand recognition to survive, he says.

“Consumers demand a spectrum of services, and if you can't afford to invest in that spectrum of services, you're going to be bought out,” Ghadar says.

The competition is getting brutal. If the AT&T deal is approved by regulators, Cingular Wireless — now owned jointly by AT&T and BellSouth — would increase AT&T's stock value as the company takes control of the fast-growing asset.

Verizon owns just 55% of the USA's top wireless carrier, Verizon Wireless, and has unsuccessfully tried to buy out its European partner, Vodafone. Verizon's stock would suffer relative to AT&T's if Verizon doesn't snap up the rest of Vodafone, King says. And the British company, which recently considered selling its Japanese wireless assets, might unload all its “far-flung global properties.”

In the large-business market, Verizon's MCI unit now competes head-on with market leader AT&T. AT&T's purchase of BellSouth will give it a further inroad in the corporate market in the Southeast. Robin Diedrich, an analyst at Edward Jones, says that federal antitrust regulators are likely to approve the AT&T-BellSouth deal as well as others in the telecom industry because new Internet and wireless firms are creating enough competition and choices for consumers.

Plus, Diedrich says, growing wireless companies such as Alltel appeal to investors now, as millions of consumers and more businesses favor wireless and Internet phones over old landline telephones.

Revival Of The Fittest (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016361

Just a year ago, the hallowed AT&T Inc. brand appeared to be in its twilight, on the cusp of being merged out of existence. Now, with a proposed $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., the AT&T name is about to retake its place as the biggest brand in telecommunications.

Though it's been hard to track the complicated handoff of the AT&T name in recent years, it's clear that the new AT&T is a far cry from the old "Ma Bell" company that was formed after Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876.

Before the breakup of the monopoly in 1984, there was effectively one company, AT&T, which sold telephones and supplied local and long-distance services. That was before cellular phones and the Internet. After the breakup, AT&T became a long-distance phone company. The company reached its marketing heyday during that time, with its "Reach Out and Touch Someone" advertising campaign, which promoted relatively expensive long-distance calling.

"I think it's still a slogan that people still remember," said Eli M. Noam, professor of finance and economics and director of the Institute for Tele-Information at Columbia University. "What they managed to do was maintain a reasonable market share," even in the face of competition from companies like MCI Communications Inc.

In the late 1990s, AT&T for a brief period had a host of services under its umbrella. In addition to being the largest long-distance provider, it had a wireless operation, offered cable TV services, and sold dial-up and later high-speed Internet services. Over time, the pieces were spun off or sold.

By early last year, all iterations of the AT&T brand seemed headed for the dustbin of history -- again. In 2004, AT&T Wireless was subsumed by Cingular Wireless.

Cingular's parent companies, BellSouth and SBC Communications Inc., had proposed an acquisition of AT&T, leaving no apparent heir to the name. But as marketing experts predicted, after closing its merger last year, SBC ditched its three-letter acronym for the nationally recognized AT&T name, which it now calls "the new AT&T" in its advertisements.

"It is one of the classic American brands," Noam said. "It has clearly lost some of its strength in recent years, but particularly for older Americans, the Ma Bell stands for quality and reliability."

Monopoly Concerns Resurface With Re-forming Of AT&T (SCRIPPS)

By MARY DEIBEL, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, March 7, 2006

AT&T's $67-billion bid for BellSouth seems on the surface to go a long way toward reconstituting the old telephone monopoly, but 24 years after federal trustbusters forced the breakup, it's not your father's Ma Bell anymore.

Today's era of wireless and fiber optics convergence is light years away from the competitive landscape that U.S. District Judge Harold Green confronted when he OK'd the 1982 consent decree that divided AT&T into seven regional Bell operating companies two years later.

At stake now are upstart, low-cost challenges from Internet, cable and wireless competition, telecom analysts say.

To be sure, bringing BellSouth back under the AT&T rubric will reunite four of the original Baby Bells, including SBC, Ameritech and Pacific Telesis. Others are former Bell babies Verizon - a combination of onetime East and West Coast telecom firms Bell Atlantic, Nynex and independent GTE - and the Denver-based Qwest, which is comprised primarily of former Baby Bell U.S. West.

AT&T's BellSouth acquisition also will extend the AT&T brand to No. 1 cell phone company Cingular, a joint venture by the two firms that was central to their negotiations, although growth potential may be limited when more than 80 percent of Americans already have at least one cell phone.

As important are the fiber-optic "pipes" that BellSouth has already run fiber-optic cable to many of the 14 million homes and 5 million businesses it serves in parts of nine Southeast states, including Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, North and South Carolina and Tennessee.

Unlike BellSouth, AT&T is poised to enter the video business big time with Project Lightspeed in competition with cable, broadcast and broadband. With BellSouth's fiber-optic backbone, AT&T will be able speed video, music, Internet and telecom services to customers in 22 states.

DOJ_NMG_0016362

These concerns prompted consumer groups to voice opposition to this new step in the consolidation of the telephone industry on grounds the sale will provide fewer choices for customers.

But others counter that, despite the dwindling number of telephone companies, there's increased competition from other firms including onetime local cable TV monopolies and others to "bundle" Internet, video, telecom and the like.

Where there was once a single company - AT&T - offering telecommunications services locally and long-distance, telecom analyst Jeffrey Kagan now points to multiple firms offering Internet, telephone, TV and wireless service.

As for AT&T's impending roll-out of video service nationwide, offering four digital channels simultaneously, Kagan said AT&T's game plan has sent cable companies "back to the drawing board to come up with a better package of services."

"Customers who make a move to a big telephone company or a big cable operator will do so because they're offering multiple services at a discount, or you can buy a la carte from multiple service providers if one-stop-shopping can't compete on price," Kagan said. "Unlike Ma Bell a quarter-century ago, consumers have a lot more choices today and they're growing."

Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America are not impressed and will urge the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission to reject the deal.

"Despite claims that the merger might foster competition between phone companies and cable giants, cable companies are just now entering the phone market and are not yet positioned to compete with the national phone duopoly that will exist if the merger is approved," the two groups said in a joint statement."

"The only other potential competitor - voice-over-internet phone service (VOIP) which relies on broadband connections - is threatened by the ability of the Bells and cable companies who own broadband wires to disrupt their VOIP transmissions."

Fast-growing VOIP companies including startups Skype and Vonage as well as AT&T's own CallVantage offer local and long-distance calling at cut-rate prices, now reach 4.4 million homes, up from 1 million a year ago. The Telecommunications Industry Association, a trade group of equipment makers, predicted last week that VOIP will expand to 18 million users by 2009.

Meantime, Jeff Chester, founder of the Center for Digital Democracy, worries that AT&T fees could turn the Internet into a "toll road."

"Instead of the Internet reflecting what the federal courts not long ago called 'the most participatory form of mass speech yet developed,' it's now threatened to be reduced to what AT&T called its private pipes," Chester said.

Alternately, Kagan said any attempt to turn the Internet into a toll road could spread competition for wireless Internet beyond neighborhood coffee houses and other Wi-Fi hotspots and into every home.

What The AT&T Deal Means For Consumers (WSJ)

By Shawn Young And Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

The $67 billion merger that will make BellSouth Corp. part of AT&T Inc. is expected to accelerate the battle of the bundles.

The cable industry and the phone companies are aggressively competing to attract new customers by offering attractively priced packages of home phone, Internet, cable and cellphone services. AT&T Chairman and Chief Executive Edward Whitacre has long identified $100 as a potential target price for a package of those four services. While that price hasn't been offered yet, the merger increases the pressure on the phone and cable rivals to deliver more competitive packages as a way to keep competing services from poaching customers.

Prices are already in the $100 range for packages that don't include wireless -- and industry executives expect them to come down. A larger AT&T will be able to compete more aggressively with cable companies and, after cutting costs, will likely be able to reduce prices of service packages.

Comcast Corp. is rolling out a $99 a month Internet, phone and cable bundle. The package -- currently available in parts of New England, the Philadelphia area and a few other markets -- represents about $30 off the price of purchasing each service individually. The package will soon be available elsewhere in the nation.

The basic bundles from Time Warner Inc. include digital cable, high-speed Internet, and home phone service, and range from $99 to $129.95 depending on the city. Packages are available in all 27 of the states Time Warner serves and savings start at roughly $15 a month over a la carte rates.

DOJ_NMG_0016363

Bundles do benefit big spenders and those who prize convenience. But they aren't great deals for everyone. People who spend very little on wireless or long-distance might be better off cherry-picking from different companies. And consumer advocates caution that customers shouldn't add services they don't already use just because they are cheaper in a package.

Another issue for consumers: Bundle prices often are introductory rates that will rise after a set amount of time. AT&T, for instance, increases its high-speed Internet price to $30 from $13 a month after the first year. The prices also don't include the taxes and fees that can add 20% or more to the total bill.

Bundling is still something of a novelty for consumers, though it is slowly catching on. In 2004, only 8% of consumers surveyed by Forrester Research, a consulting firm based in Cambridge, Mass., had a package of video, Internet and voice service from their phone or cable company, but by late last year 11% were buying packages.

For the companies that sell bundles, the goal is a more loyal customer and a larger share of that customer's spending. Customers who take several products together are much less likely to defect just because a rival offers a slightly better price. A survey by Yankee Group, a Boston-based consulting firm, found that 84% of households that got a package of Internet and video services from their cable company were satisfied with their carrier, compared with 67% of households without the bundle. Still, the survey found that some customers become willing to switch for savings of $15 a month or more.

Phone and cable companies have been locked in an intensifying battle as phone companies expand into video and cable companies start to offer phone service. The prize is the potential to provide all of a household's communications services. Bundle offers can be a way for service providers to cut off a competitor's link to the consumer's home altogether.

Cablevision Systems Corp. offers all its subscribers an introductory package of voice, cable and high-speed Internet for $89.85 a month. After a year, the price climbs to around $115. A la carte prices are $44.95 for Internet, $34.95 for voice and roughly $55 for digital cable. Verizon Communications Corp. offers packages that start at around $89.89 for home phone, high-speed Internet and satellite TV service.

AT&T has a four-way deal that includes wireless for $121 a month. The merger could make it easier for AT&T to extend its bundled offers, says company spokesman Michael Coe. The merger will give AT&T full control of the Cingular Wireless venture that is now a joint venture between AT&T and BellSouth.

Packages are convenient and can be good deals for consumers who already spend a lot on communications and entertainment. Bundles that now mostly appeal to consumers on the basis of price and convenience could develop into truly integrated services with features like cellphones that automatically become home-phone extensions when plugged into a base station at home, caller ID that is displayed on the TV screen, or video recorders that can be programmed with a cellphone.

Not all consumers stand to benefit from service packages, however, and many consumer advocates fear that the phone and cable companies will eventually become so large that they essentially can dictate prices. Bill Hardekopf, chief executive of SaveOnPhone.com, a consumer Web site, believes that consumers who spend little on long distance or wireless won't benefit from packages. One of the only alternatives will be through Internet-based phone services. Vonage Holdings Corp. and the Skype Technologies unit of eBay Inc. offer cheaper prices for Internet-based home phone service than most phone or cable companies. Vonage offers unlimited local and long-distance service in the U.S. and Canada for $24.99 a month with minimal taxes and fees. Internet-based services often can't offer full-service 911 and won't work if the power or Internet connection fails. Customers must already have high-speed Internet service.

Some of the current package offers that combine TV, phone and Internet service.

The Telecoms Strike Back (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull And Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

BOSTON AND NEW YORK - Changes in the communications industry are spawning vast new choices - but not necessarily lower bills - for American consumers who dial, click, and channel surf.

Cellphones now carry video as well as voice. The Internet can be used for phone calls as well as data downloading. And television is fast becoming a digital medium, where content can be stored and retrieved anytime, not according to a schedule in "TV Guide."

DOJ_NMG_0016364

This is the "digital convergence" of communication platforms that telecom and cable companies have long been trying to create. The process holds great promise but means more volatility for consumers and firms.

The latest jolt is this week's announcement by AT&T that it plans to acquire BellSouth Corp. Together, the firms would create the world's biggest telecommunications company in terms of market capitalization and combine many of the pieces of the old "Ma Bell" that in 1984 was broken into eight pieces by an antitrust settlement.

Indeed, for all the new competition, the scale of this $67 billion deal is just one sign of the market clout that telecom and cable companies still retain. The word monopoly no longer applies. But Americans are spending more than ever on communications services, and regulators still have a role to play as guardians of competition, consumer advocates say.

"The average consumer today wakes up with only two choices for full-service broadband communications, which is the future: the telephone company and the cable company," says Mark Cooper of the Consumer Federation of America in Washington. "What we've gone from is a regulated monopoly to an unregulated duopoly."

Other observers argue that, by and large, the marketplace is fulfilling its competitive promise.

What's clear to all, however, is that businesses are adapting quickly - with much of the focus for both companies and regulators now on how traditional phone companies will compete with cable TV providers in offering new services.

For their part, AT&T and BellSouth are positioning their planned merger as a win for consumers - and a way to go head to head with the cable industry.

"Together, we will lead the way into a new era of converged and bundled communications, video, and entertainment services," AT&T chairman Edward Whitacre said in a statement Sunday announcing the deal.

The companies would offer wireless service (through the Cingular brand), Internet, and traditional telephony with a dominant presence throughout the South and Midwest, and increasingly video services as well.

The pattern on prices varies from platform to platform.

"There's definitely some downward pressure" on prices for traditional phone service, thanks in part to new choices for making calls over the Internet, says Joe Laszlo, a senior analyst at Jupiter Research in New York. Wireless, too, is a "robustly competitive" market, he says, with customers paying less per minute as their usage continues to rise.

Online, the pattern is more subtle, with basic broadband rates steady even while special offers are pitched to new users.

Cable TV, many observers say, is an area where prices have tended to keep rising over the years, making that industry a source of particular scrutiny. One idea under review at the Federal Communications Commission: making companies offer "a la carte" services so customers can buy only the channels they want to watch.

Such plans might cut customer costs, some studies suggest.

But the overall trend is that communications of various sorts have been garnering a growing share of the time and money of the typical consumer. "I don't know how much further that can go," Mr. Laszlo says.

Some say companies will find themselves competing intensely for business.

But consumer advocates argue that regulatory vigilance remains much needed.

In particular, they contend the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger is anticompetitive and will end up leading to higher prices, fewer choices and less innovation, just what the 1984 breakup of Ma Bell was supposed to prevent.

"They couldn't put Humpty Dumpty back together again, but they're putting Ma Bell back together again," says Edmund Mierzwinski, the consumer program director at US Public Interest Research Group in Washington.

He and other consumer advocates have pledged to fight the deal at the Justice Department, the Federal Trade Commission, and the FCC. They contend that while the merger will not create a monopoly situation for phone service, it will eventually lead to a duopoly with each phone giant controlling a series of services in different parts of the country.

"This one is about the future of communication writ large," Mr. Mierzwinski says. "It's not just about telephone service, it's about the Internet, the delivery of video and about all of the convergences that have been occurring."

Consumers can now watch TV on their cellphones, call a neighbor over their cable line, or hook up to the Internet over the phone lines. In that sense there is more choice. But it doesn't necessarily mean many choices of which company provides the services.

DOJ_NMG_0016365

The upshot, some consumer advocates say, is a situation where prices have fallen on some services, but consumers often have to buy a bundle of services from the same company to get the best deals.

"If you're a consumer who can afford to spend $200 or $250 a month on communications services, then maybe your total costs have come down," says Jeannine Kenney, a Consumer's Union analyst in Washington. "The reality is now that competition is all about the bundle of services, and each company has a vested interest in maximizing sales of bundled services within their own territory."

The AT&T-BellSouth deal is hardly the first. AT&T already incorporates other former "Baby Bells" Ameritech and SBC. And consumer groups are keeping a close eye on whether past mergers are resulting in higher or lower prices.

Some consumer groups believe it's too soon to see the effects of mergers on long-distance services. For example, last fall, the Ohio Consumers' Counsel, a residential consumer advocate, argued against the SBC and AT&T merger unless the companies agreed to cap its basic rates for three years and cap the price of such features as call waiting and call forwarding.

"Most of the recommendations were not implemented and we believe residential customers are not getting their share of the benefits," says Ryan Lippe, a spokesman. "Consolidation often means fewer choices for customers."

In fact, Tuesday, the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio is expected to vote on changes of regulation for basic local phone service. "We could be seeing the potential for companies to increase their prices for just a dial tone," says Mr. Lippe. "If the proposed rules go into effect, a company like SBC could come in and become eligible to raise prices by as much as 20 percent per year."

However, it's not a given that a company will get a price hike, he adds. "We could still advocate for consumers."

AT& T Deal Puts Focus On Net Fees (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 7, 2006

AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth gave fresh ammunition Monday to critics of a push by the big local phone companies to charge websites fees to ensure fast delivery of their content.

Even before the deal, AT&T and BellSouth discussed plans to charge Internet-based phone company Vonage, Google and other Web providers new fees to ensure speedy delivery of their phone calls, video or other content. Though proposals in Congress would bar phone companies from blocking access to rival websites, none would prohibit their offering enhanced services.

The question of whether an even bigger AT&T should have to comply with Internet non-discrimination principles is expected to take center stage as consumer advocates urge regulators to reject the deal. Some rivals say arguments for such restraints are bolstered by the clout a bigger AT&T customer base would have. “Arguably, there's less competition as a result of these mergers,” says Paul Meisner of Amazon.

Consumer groups also fear the $67 billion deal will hamper competition for wireless and large business customers, driving up prices.

Yet while the proposed merger faces tough regulatory scrutiny, most analysts say the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission will approve it with only minor conditions.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin says the agency will examine “any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits” for new services.

“It'll get through relatively easily with light conditions,” says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin.

But there will be fallout. AT&T plans to cut 10,000 jobs, or about 3% of its new workforce, largely through attrition as it achieves more than $2 billion in cost savings.

The merger creates a behemoth with 70 million wire-line customers and 54 million wireless subscribers. Local phone companies such as AT&T now face their biggest competitive threats in residential service from wireless companies, cable companies and Internet-based phone companies.

DOJ_NMG_0016366

Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union says the deal gives Cingular Wireless, jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth, even less reason to offer its wireless service as a replacement for home phone service. The new company should have to divest Cingular, he says.

But Levin says it will be tough for regulators to justify tougher conditions than those placed on the SBC-AT&T and Verizon-MCI mergers. So AT&T-BellSouth might have to promise it won't block rival Net-based phone services or websites, among other things. It also will likely have to sell fiber lines serving some businesses, Levin says.

Battle Lines For Cable Giants, AT&T Deal Is One More Reason To Worry (WSJ)

By Peter Grant And Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

The picture just got fuzzier for the cable-TV industry, a once-mighty monopoly now under assault by new technology and corporate mergers.

Even before AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. -- a deal that would create the world's biggest phone company -- cable companies were under growing pressure. Their stocks have steadily declined amid investor alarm at new competition from satellite and phone companies. The explosion of video on the Internet is conjuring up a future when a cable middleman may no longer be necessary. Regulators are pushing the industry on decency issues and pricing policies.

And cable's once-commanding lead in the sale of high-speed Internet connections has eroded as telephone companies have steeply discounted competing offers. Cable used to enjoy a two-thirds market share, but in the past year telephone companies have picked up more new customers than cable operators did.

Comcast Corp., the U.S.'s largest cable operator with more than 21 million subscribers, saw its stock fall 22% in 2005. While it has picked up a little bit of ground this year, it's still down 17% from the beginning of 2004. Mediacom Communications Corp., the No. 7 operator, is down 33% from the beginning of 2004. Charter Communications Inc., No. 4, is down 72%.

Now the AT&T megadeal could create the largest competitor yet for cable operators in the new race to sell packages of phone, TV and Internet services. Among phone companies, AT&T already had the most aggressive plans for pushing into the TV and broadband markets. Adding BellSouth's customers would lift AT&T's annual sales to $120 billion in 22 states, giving the company cash and scale to pursue its strategy nationwide. AT&T already is planning to streamline its operations. It announced yesterday plans to cut 10,000 jobs following its purchase of BellSouth.

The likely result for cable operators: more pressure to cut prices for high-speed Internet and slower growth of price increases for television. Cable companies also may have to increase capital spending to keep up with the new TV technology the phone companies are planning. In November, Comcast's stock fell 5% after it raised its estimated 2005 capital spending to $3.5 billion from an earlier prediction of $3.2 billion to $3.3 billion.

Consolidation in the telephone industry could put pressure on cable operators to get bigger as well. Both Comcast and the cable unit of Time Warner Inc. are expected to bulk up later this year when they divide up the systems of Adelphia Communications Corp., which has been operating under bankruptcy protection. As part of that deal, Time Warner Cable will issue public stock, giving it a currency for future acquisitions.

Cable operators are hoping that, at least in the short term, a merger of AT&T and BellSouth would slow AT&T's launch of TV service. They point out that for months, if not years, management's attention will likely be focused on integrating the two companies.

Meanwhile, the cable companies aren't standing still. Comcast has greatly increased its video-on-demand offerings with ambitious plans to offer a library equivalent to 5,000 hours of movies, programs and other features by year's end. Large cable operators are also pushing into a wide range of other new technologies that will give them interactive commercials and many of the other features that AT&T is planning.

"There's not a thing that [phone companies] can offer that we can't offer to our customers as well," Steve Burke, Comcast's chief operating officer, said yesterday after the AT&T deal with BellSouth was announced.

DOJ_NMG_0016367

WSJ's Dennis Berman discusses10 the impact of AT&T's $67 billion deal to buy BellSouth. • Plus, WSJ's Almar Latour, Julie Ask of Jupiter Research and Om Malik of Business 2.011 discuss the possible effects of an AT&T -BellSouth merger on the telecoms sector.

The cable industry, like the phone business, has been in upheaval for years, as both try to jam more services through their pipelines into America's homes. While telephone companies have been planning to move into the TV business, cable operators have been racing to offer phone service. Late last year, a venture of Sprint Nextel Corp. and a consortium of cable operators including Comcast, Time Warner and Cox Communications Inc. announced plans to offer wireless phone service together.

The cable guys have notched some victories. While phone giants like AT&T and Verizon Communications Inc. have barely launched television service, cable companies already provide phone service to more than five million U.S. subscribers. The cable-phone business is expected to grow even more this year because Comcast is launching the service on a massive scale.

"Cable operators have been able to prove their ability to compete and adapt to a changing environment," says Michael Willner, chief executive of Insight Communications Co., the country's eighth-largest cable operator. "The cable market is oversold [by Wall Street] because of unwarranted fears."

Cable enjoyed an early lead in the race to sell high-speed Internet connections. By moving faster than phone companies with a more attractive and problem-free product, cable companies dominated the early business.

Aggressive Strategy

But about two years ago, phone companies embarked on an aggressive strategy to grab market share through steep price cuts. Last year was the first full year that telephone companies added more broadband subscribers than cable operators -- 5.2 million vs. 4.4 million -- according to Leichtman Research Group Inc. The market share of the top cable providers has been whittled down to about 57%, according to Leichtman.

Telephone companies also currently enjoy a clear edge in the wireless business. A merger of AT&T and BellSouth would strengthen AT&T's hand in wireless because the companies are co-owners of Cingular Wireless. With a single owner, Cingular will be freed up from the conflicts that occur when a company has to serve two masters.

Meanwhile, the cable industry's wireless venture with Sprint is facing delays. When it was announced late last year, executives predicted that the service would be launched in the first half of 2006; now, they are saying it will be in the second half of the year. A spokeswoman for the venture, Melinda Tiemeyer, pointed out that the venture involves numerous companies and requires "a lot of different areas coming together" like marketing, retail and the actual product.

Satellite continues to pose a formidable threat, with Rupert Murdoch's DirecTV Group Inc. planning to offer more than 150 national high-definition channels by 2007, as well as 1,500 local high-definition channels, surpassing what most cable companies can currently offer. Satellite operators have more than 27 million subscribers, compared with about 66 million cable customers.

Many investors saw a powerful signal when Comcast made its unsuccessful bid to buy Walt Disney Co. in 2004. The message they read: Comcast believed that TV distribution wasn't enough to sustain its growth, and it needed more TV content. While Comcast executives have vehemently denied this, the company's stock has mostly stayed well below $33.93 price it hit the day before it announced the Disney bid. Comcast's shares were down 11 cents at $27.06 in 4 p.m. trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Before AT&T announced its plans to buy BellSouth, the phone giant said it planned to offer its own television service to 18 million homes by the first half of 2008. AT&T also is planning to beef up its alliance with satellite-TV operator EchoStar Communications Corp. by offering consumers a service, named HomeZone, that combines satellite TV with movies, programs and other on-demand content off the Internet.

It is still unclear whether AT&T will be able to execute its TV plans. So far, it is offering its TV service only in San Antonio and some experts are skeptical that the company will be able to move ahead with a broad rollout later this year. AT&T and EchoStar already are months behind in their plans to launch HomeZone.

Starting in the 1970s and 1980s, cable operators shook up the television industry by offering better reception and racier fare than the traditional networks, which are beholden to federal decency standards because their signals travel over government-granted airwaves. The cable industry also benefited from local monopolies, painstakingly negotiated one market at a time across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0016368

But in the converging worlds of telecommunications and media, cable's competitors increasingly are the better-connected telephone giants, which have maneuvered through the federal legislative and regulatory landscape for decades.

Since taking over a year ago from Michael Powell, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has ordered several major reviews of the cable business. The commission recently issued a report suggesting consumers would have lower cable bills if cable operators offered channels using an "a la carte" lineup -- selling individual channels rather than a prepackaged bundle. It is also examining whether to cap the cable giants' ability to extend their reach through mergers. FCC action on either of those issues would require congressional action.

An effort to force the cable giants to meet the same decency requirements as broadcasters has failed so far in Congress. But in response, the cable companies have offered new family-friendly packages of programming. The new packages haven't been well-received in Washington because they don't include ESPN or other popular channels. FCC Chairman Martin has continued to keep up pressure on the industry.

Meanwhile, as soon as this week, key House lawmakers could release a draft of a bill that would help clear the way for the Bells to get into the cable-television business. Essentially, the bill is expected to establish national video franchises. That would allow the phone companies to avoid having to seek permission from local governments to offer video service in their communities.

Separately, Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain is planning to introduce a cable "a la carte" bill this month. That legislation may not get very far, but Mr. McCain's presidential aspirations could easily result in the proposal ending up as at least part of any potential campaign platform.

Fighting Back

In the cities where phone giants have invaded cable's turf, cable companies are fighting back with aggressive pricing packages. Cablevision Systems Corp., facing competition in the New York region from Verizon, is offering new customers the first year of phone, cable and high-speed Internet service for about $90 a month. Insight Communications introduced a similar package about a year ago and is still evaluating what to charge customers once their initial discount period burns off. "We're packaging aggressively and getting more customers for it," Mr. Willner says.

In Keller, Texas, the first city where Verizon offered TV service, the local cable operator, Charter Communications, dropped the price of a package of TV and broadband services to $50 a month from $100 for the first year. Verizon recently announced that 23% of the Keller market is now taking its TV service, which charges $39.95 for 180 channels, $34.95 if the subscriber also takes Verizon's broadband service. A Charter spokeswoman said its special offer, which recently was increased by $10 a month, was partly a response to satellite competition.

Cable companies also have come out with new ways to hold on to customers who are about to switch providers. Time Warner Cable typically charges $39.95 a month for its broadband service for subscribers who also take its TV service. If customers call to disconnect their broadband, they're offered a slower service for $29.95 a month.

Time Warner doesn't generally advertise the lower priced service, says Mark Harrad, a company spokesman. "It's a save tactic," he says.

Consumer Groups To Oppose AT&T Purchase (AP)

By EILEEN ALT POWELL, AP Business Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK — Several of the nation's largest consumer groups said Monday they would oppose AT&T's purchase of BellSouth Corp., arguing that the deal will reduce competition and drive up prices in the telecommunications industry.

Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America said they would urge the Justice Department to block AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion offer.

The consumer groups also asked their members to contact the Federal Communications Commission, which must approve the acquisition, and to petition their congressmen to try to prevent the deal from going through.

DOJ_NMG_0016369

If approved, the combined company would become one of the largest telecommunications operators in the world and include Cingular Wireless LLC, the nation's largest wireless operator. Cingular today is jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth.

The consumer groups warned that increasing consolidation in the telephone industry would boost the prices for local, long-distance and cell phone services. They added that more-limited choices for phone service — along with a similar merger trend in the cable industry — threatened to reduce the variety of broadband Internet services available to consumers.

"If approved, this merger will lead to higher local, long-distance and cell phone prices for consumers across the country," said Gene Kimmelman, a vice president of Consumers Union, which is headquartered in Yonkers, N.Y.

At the very least, Kimmelman said, federal regulators should "require the merging companies to sell their Cingular wireless business to create more opportunities for competition between wireless and wireline services."

Mark Cooper, director of research for the Consumer Federation of America in Washington, D.C., said consumers should be worried that the promise of broadband Internet technologies was being compromised by consolidation in both the telephone and cable industries. Those companies control the circuits on which data, television and phone communications move.

"We've been through a series of mergers that have reconstructed most of the old Ma Bell system," Cooper said, referring to the historic 1984 government breakup of the old AT&T monopoly into seven "baby bell" telephone providers.

The phone companies have argued that they face growing competition from cable companies, which have been getting into the phone market and offering an increasing array of broadband services, such as high-speed Internet access.

Randall Stephenson, AT&T's chief operating officer, told analysts Monday that AT&T already was feeling competitive pressure, saying the phone company has to tailor its prices to reflect those of local cable companies.

"We're finding that we're having to be far more targeted in our pricing based on who the competitor is in a particular market," he said. "I don't see that effect changing as we bring BellSouth into this equation."

But the CFA's Cooper said consolidation in both the phone and cable industries meant "that when consumers wake up in the morning, they have two choices for a full-service broadband network, telephone and cable."

He called it "an unregulated duopoly" and added: "Every consumer knows that two is not enough for real competition."

Jeff Chester, executive director of the Center for Digital Democracy in Washington, D.C., which promotes democratic access to broadband, fears that companies the size of a merged AT&T-BellSouth will have the heft to become "a virtual toll booth" on the Internet.

That's because the communications industry is moving to broadband, which allows voice, data, video and mobile communications to move over a single wire.

"The cable industry and the phone industry have the same business model, which is to begin charging increasing fees to consumers for using broadband communication," Chester said.

At the same time, he argues, they have the ability to give priority on their circuits to "premium" services or to companies with which they have alliances. This will make it harder for new technologies to emerge, because they will have trouble getting access to the delivery system.

"We need to make a stand today," Chester said. "If we allow them to turn today's Internet into a digital dirt road while only they and their partners can run lightening-fast operations, you won't see competition."

Bill Hardekopf, chief executive of the SaveonPhone.com long-distance search site, said the sheer size of the combined AT&T-BellSouth company was likely to be a red flag to federal regulators.

"This company will have a tremendous amount of market share and say as to what goes on in the industry," Hardekopf said. "To have that much of a share and that much of a voice in one company cannot be healthy for consumers."

In fact, the merged company would have 70 million local-line phone customers, 54.1 million wireless subscribers and nearly 10 million broadband subscribers in nearly two dozen states.

"This is not a done deal," Hardekopf said. "Regulators can still block it for competitive reasons."

Is Antitrust No Longer The Issue? (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016370

WASHINGTON, March 6 — As head of the Federal Communications Commission during the Clinton administration, Reed E. Hundt killed talks about a possible merger in 1997 when he said that a proposed deal between AT&T and SBC would be "unthinkable" under antitrust laws.

Last year those two companies combined with little resistance. And on Monday Mr. Hundt said that AT&T's proposal to buy BellSouth for $67 billion was "eminently thinkable," and that if he were still at the commission, "I would bless the deal."

His statement was a sign of how far the regulatory climate, as well as the marketplace, has traveled in less than a decade, as the cable and phone industries have gotten into each other's businesses and new forms of phone service have grown.

While government officials and industry lobbyists say the AT&T-BellSouth deal faces few regulatory obstacles, those same changes in the marketplace may bring different political headwinds.

The deal threatens to undermine parts of the telephone industry's broader regulatory and legislative agenda by making it more difficult for the industry to claim it badly needs relief from regulators and Congress.

The Bell telephone companies have lobbied hard for the last year to get Congress to adopt a measure that would make it easier for them to offer video services. The phone companies want federal legislation that would pre-empt local authority over such services. (The cable industry has fought equally hard against the measure.) That fight is central to the telephone companies' new strategy of offering video service to compete head-on with cable and satellite companies that offer paid television services.

As Internet service providers, the large phone companies are meanwhile involved in a political fight over whether they must offer equal access to all Web providers, an approach called "Net neutrality." Content providers like Google and Yahoo, and companies providing Internet-based phone service like Vonage, seek legislation to prevent phone companies from favoring their own Web sites and those offered by their partners, over rivals and Internet phone companies.

While the phone companies fight that move, they are also battling legislative efforts to make it easier for municipalities to offer free wireless Internet services.

But the continued consolidation of the telephone industry that the latest deal contemplates gives the phone companies' opponents significant political leverage in all three debates — and for the time being, could make it harder for AT&T and Verizon, the two largest phone companies, to prevail on all fronts.

"The reverberations at first will be subterranean, but they will be of earthquake proportions," Mr. Hundt said.

The cable industry, awaiting regulatory approval of its own major consolidation in which Time Warner and Comcast expect to divide up Adelphia, was quick Monday to point out the perils of a consolidating telephone industry. But Verizon, signaling that it will not raise major objections to the BellSouth deal, issued a statement that called it "logical and predictable." And Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the F.C.C., issued a noncommittal statement.

"The F.C.C.'s primary responsibility is to determine whether the proposed transaction is in the best interest of consumers," Mr. Martin said. "We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services."

The agency will be considering what conditions to impose on the deal in a process that could take as long as a year.

The AT&T-BellSouth deal provides a vehicle for regulators and lawmakers to consider what to do in the "Net neutrality" debate and whether the telephone companies can charge more money for certain content providers. The issue came to national attention in November when Edward E. Whitacre Jr., the blunt-speaking leader of AT&T, complained in an interview in Business Week Online about the current state of affairs.

"We and the cable companies have made an investment, and for Google or Yahoo or Vonage or anybody to expect to use these pipes free is nuts," Mr. Whitacre said.

In the same interview, Mr. Whitacre was asked whether it was possible that his company would ever acquire BellSouth.

"It sure would be nice, but it doesn't have much chance of happening because of market power, size, etc.," he replied. "I think it would be real hard to do. I don't think the regulators would let that happen, in my judgment."

While AT&T seems to have overcome that concern, lobbyists and others in the industry said Monday that there would be pressure on regulators to impose conditions assuring that consumers continue to have unfettered access to the Internet, and precluding discrimination by AT&T against companies like Google and Yahoo.

DOJ_NMG_0016371

Any new rules, however, might not prevent phone companies from offering a more expensive tier of service providing faster Internet access for the transfer of video and other large files.

In the case of the video-franchise legislation, the telephone companies in recent weeks had begun to see progress on favorable legislation in the House that could be derailed by the deal.

Wasting no time, the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, the cable industry lobbying and trade organization, sent a letter to top lawmakers on Monday arguing against legislation that would remove local control over the introduction of video services by the Bell companies.

The cable industry, having put together its franchises city by city, contends that the phone companies should face the same hurdles for video delivery.

"It is important to take stock of where we are in 2006," said the letter from Kyle McSlarrow, president and chief executive of the association. "In the last decade, the Bell monopolies have all but wiped out their telephone competitors; they have swallowed their long-distance competitors; and with the announcement of the AT&T-BellSouth merger, they are on the verge of recreating Ma Bell. And only one competitor really stands in their way: the cable industry."

Next Step In Phone Deal: P.R. (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. make the case for their $67 billion merger, they'll be counting on their vaunted lobbying clout to win over skeptical lawmakers and regulators.

Their efforts could be complicated by two factors: The changing makeup of the Federal Communications Commission and a push to rewrite the landmark 1996 telecommunications law.

In a statement yesterday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said the agency would "carefully weigh" the deal. Regulatory experts say that given Mr. Martin's push last year to impose minimal conditions on SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI, it would be surprising if he reversed his stance.

Mr. Martin, though, represents just one vote on a five-member commission. The two Democrats likely will cast a skeptical eye toward such a transaction, especially given talk by phone companies to charge technology companies extra to guarantee speedy delivery on their networks. And the Bells may not be able to count on Mr. Martin's two Republican colleagues because of a shift in the makeup of the commission.

Deborah Taylor Tate is a Republican commissioner sworn in earlier this year. Ms. Tate is a former Tennessee regulator who remains largely an unknown figure in Washington. Ms. Tate, whose term expires in June 2007, has kept her home in Tennessee and is expected to return there and possibly run for office, so she may not want to adopt a position that is perceived as anticonsumer.

The other Republican seat is vacant. President Bush has nominated veteran telecommunications attorney Robert McDowell to fill that slot. Mr. McDowell is assistant general counsel for Comptel, a group that represents small phone companies that have fought pitched battles with the Bells over access rates and interconnection issues.

It would be unwise to assume Mr. McDowell might automatically side with small companies while considering conditions for the merger, says Earl Comstock, chief executive at Comptel. "He's good at representing his client."

Mr. McDowell faces a confirmation hearing Thursday in the Senate and is expected to be questioned by senators about his thoughts on competition and the need for some sort of "Internet neutrality" legislation, which says consumers can use the Internet as they choose and network owners can't slow or discriminate against rivals' data traffic. If his confirmation drags on and the commission is deadlocked, it can't approve the AT&T-BellSouth transaction.

Another element muddying the waters is the looming rewrite of the nation's telecommunications law. The current laws were written in 1996 when most consumers relied on traditional telephones for local and long-distance calling. Now, wireless phone and Internet phones are taking up a greater share of the market, which has led phone companies to seek new revenue streams, notably pay-TV service, to replace that lost business.

DOJ_NMG_0016372

There are all kinds of new issues on the table because of increased reliance on the Internet. The phone companies were looking to Congress to make it easier to launch video services across the country by adopting a national video franchising requirement, which would allow phone companies to avoid seeking permission from local authorities to offer pay-TV services.

Former Rep. Thomas Bliley, one of the key authors of the 1996 Telecom Act, sees competition among traditional phone, wireless and cable as the future. "But right now, the only meaningful choice other than the Verizons and AT&Ts, especially for business customers," are small phone companies, he said. "Many of these companies are spending billions to build their own networks. And if we move too fast, these companies could get shut out and business and residential customers would have less choice."

Business customers protested last year's big deals, saying they would further consolidate the industry and result in higher prices for high-volume data lines. "When I'm at home, I have choices. At least it's a duopoly of phone and cable. In the enterprise market, we don't have any choices," said Brian Moir, a Washington attorney who represents large corporate users of telecom services and wants regulators to impose conditions, as part of the deal, to protect business customers.

Sen. Daniel Inouye (D., Hawaii), the top Democrat on the Senate Commerce Committee yesterday said that the proposed recombination "will call into question our commitment to promote competition in the communications marketplace and to preserve fair rules that guarantee nondiscriminatory access to new services."

In a statement, he said that "coming only 125 days after the FCC's approval of the SBC-AT&T merger, AT&T's proposal to purchase BellSouth would remove yet another potential competitor from the communications marketplace and calls into question whether the future of communications policy will be marked by strategies to promote vigorous competition or by further efforts to facilitate new mergers."

Philip Verveer, who filed the lawsuit that led to the 1984 breakup of the Bell System monopoly, said he doesn't expect the Justice Department to block the deal. "This is a reassembly of many of the pieces we worked to take apart, but the circumstances are completely different today," said Mr. Verveer, now a partner at Willkie Farr & Gallagher in Washington.

Mr. Verveer, though, said he expects the FCC to require that AT&T agree to accept the "net neutrality" nondiscrimination principles pledged to the FCC last fall as a condition of the SBC-AT&T deal.

In the end much will depend on AT&T's government-relations executives. Indeed, lobbyists in town frequently remark that one of the best elements of SBC's purchase of AT&T was its inheritance of AT&T's lobbying shop, which has deep relationships with Republicans and Democrats.

Jim Cicconi, a Texan with close ties to President Bush, was the head of AT&T's Washington office before its acquisition. Afterward, he bypassed SBC's team to become the senior executive vice president of external and legislative affairs for the combined company. He served in both the Reagan and first Bush administrations and is close to James Baker and former President George H.W. Bush.

BellSouth's Washington operation isn't too shabby either. Led by Herschel Abbott Jr., who has been with the company since 1991, BellSouth has been a force in key issues in the telecom industry. Mr. Abbott played a critical role in persuading the White House in mid-2004 not to appeal a court ruling about fees the Bells charged others to lease access to their local-phone networks. Recently, BellSouth tried to persuade lawmakers to launch a narrowly focused telecom rewrite that only addressed the video franchising issue.

Two Young Men Likely To Play Big Roles In Telecom Giant (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Over the years, AT&T Inc. chairman Edward Whitacre and BellSouth Corp. chief executive Duane Ackerman had talked many times about a deal before they finally agreed to the largest one in the history of the U.S. telecommunications industry.

In two years, though, both likely will be retired.

Before the deal Randall Stephenson, AT&T's chief operating officer, and Mark Feidler, who held the same title at BellSouth, were widely acknowledged to be the heirs apparent of their respective companies once their bosses retire. While it is likely they will play significant leadership roles in the combined company, analysts and investors believe that Mr. Stephenson has the inside track to be chief executive.

DOJ_NMG_0016373

"Randall is clearly the anointed one within AT&T and Mark as the No. 2 in BellSouth needs to know that he'll have to be No. 2 or 3 in the new entity," says a consultant who has worked with both companies.

Both men declined to be interviewed yesterday. But people familiar with the situation say that Mr. Stephenson, who has spent his 24-year career with the company mainly overseeing telecom finances, and Mr. Feidler, a former corporate lawyer and investment banker, have both been supporters of a deal between BellSouth and AT&T. The two executives have a good working relationship and already have one deal in common. They both helped negotiate the Cingular Wireless acquisition of AT&T Wireless. BellSouth and AT&T own Cingular in a joint venture.

Mr. Feidler, 49, a graduate of Vanderbilt Law School who joined BellSouth in 1991, is known for getting into the nitty-gritty of the business. Associates say he has an excellent, almost impish sense of humor. He isn't a practical joker but is known for his wit, and he makes it clear he doesn't take himself or his situation too seriously.

"Mark is probably the smartest guy in whatever room he's in. He's a strategic thinker with a giant brain," says a former consultant who has also worked with both companies. "Unfortunately, I don't think he has a shot at the top job."

What has endeared Mr. Stephenson, 45 years old, to Wall Street is a blunt and charismatic style. He has been a patient and competent sideman to Mr. Whitacre and is known for his rapid recall of matters at hand. Like Mr. Whitacre, he is a very hands-on manager and focused on the minutiae of his business. He is known as a gentleman and is popular with the upper-echelon of management at AT&T.

In an era of new regulations, many executives and companies have become tight-lipped and stick to scripts. But Mr. Stephenson, who holds a master's degree in accounting from the University of Oklahoma, always makes an effort to explain issues and to be as forthcoming as possible, analysts who have dealt with him say.

"He's not the kind of executive who says I'll get back to you on that," says one telecom analyst who has met with him frequently.

A loyal lieutenant to Mr. Whitacre, Mr. Stephenson nevertheless pushed the company to change and was a proponent of the Cingular deal with BellSouth, the consultant said. He was also a proponent the decision of AT&T to have a presence in Hollywood near the content providers for its Internet television venture, Project Lightspeed, the consultant said.

Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Feidler are energetic executives approaching the prime of their careers, but they must still answer to and take direction from a chief executive who is for now firmly in charge. Their roots are starkly different from Mr. Whitacre, 64, and Mr. Ackerman, 63, both of whom started at the bottom of the phone business, working on equipment in the field, before ascending through the executive ranks.

And as much as Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Feidler pushed for the deal between AT&T and BellSouth, it was still Mr. Whitacre who finally convinced Mr. Ackerman to sign. "Ed and Duane largely did the deals themselves. The key meetings were those guys one-on-one," said one person familiar with the deal.

Mr. Ackerman and Mr. Whitacre have a great deal of respect for one another and share a cultural affinity for one another's similar telecom backgrounds. After many attempts at a deal through the years Mr. Ackerman finally relented because he found his company in somewhat of a pickle. SBC Communications had acquired AT&T Corp. and all its enterprise assets to become AT&T Inc., and Verizon had taken over the business assets of MCI Inc. Suddenly, BellSouth had two major competitors who could sell a better package of services to companies in its own backyard. The two men met a handful of times to discuss terms of the deal, but there wasn't much wrangling. Their companies' stocks have been trading at roughly similar prices and because they had contemplated a deal for so long there wasn't much to haggle over.

Mr. Whitacre is known as an operator. He is a master of the deal and a broker who has honed his skills at timing with his many acquisitions through the years. His board members trust him implicitly and he can assemble them rapidly if he wants to move fast on a deal.

It has long been assumed that the gentlemanly, restrained Mr. Ackerman would end his career by finally relinquishing his longstanding caution about the deal-making that has transformed the industry while BellSouth stayed close to its regional roots.

DOJ_NMG_0016374

Since the late 1990s BellSouth flirted with several deals but always backed away. The company bid unsuccessfully against the former WorldCom Inc. for Sprint Corp. several years ago and later held talks with both MCI and AT&T Corp.

Last year, according to people familiar with the situation, Mr. Ackerman approached Mr. Whitacre about a merger deal that would have split BellSouth into separate directories, landline and wireless businesses. Mr. Whitacre declined, these people say. Officials from neither company could confirm that situation. Mr. Whitacre was unhappy when BellSouth tried to pursue a takeover of AT&T, people familiar with that situation say. Mr. Ackerman backed off, and Mr. Whitacre, then chief executive of SBC Communications Inc., bought AT&T, they added. That deal was only completed five months ago.

It had been expected that Mr. Whitacre would retire close to November, when he turns 65. His associates said he wasn't ready to retire, and, last week AT&T's board extended his contract until spring 2008. Mr. Ackerman has said he would stay on at BellSouth to shepherd the acquisition, which is expected to take about a year to close. If asked to leave, Mr. Ackerman would collect $9 million as well as millions of dollars' worth of restricted stock and options, according to public filings.

Not Your Ma's Bell (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

If the criticism of AT&T's plans to buy BellSouth for $67 billion sounds familiar, it's because the same hyperventilating occurred last year when SBC bought AT&T and Verizon acquired MCI. We're back at the same old stand, and while all this telecom consolidation may or may not pay off for shareholders, the benefits to consumers are clear.

Consumer "activists" and other critics are convinced that these telecom mergers mean fewer competitors and higher prices. But they're using a model of the industry that dates to the break up of Ma Bell in 1984, when cable companies and phone companies didn't provide each others' services and the consumer wireless market was practically nonexistent. So when Mark Cooper of the Consumer Federation of America asks the Justice Department to block the AT&T/BellSouth merger because there won't be "enough competition" for phone service, he's looking for competitors in the wrong places.

Mr. Cooper refuses to acknowledge phone services offered by cable companies, wireless carriers and VOIP providers in today's telecom market. But these mergers are a direct result of competitive pressures from those very technologies. AT&T knows it has more to fear from a cable giant like Comcast than from a fellow phone company like Verizon.

Today's traditional phone companies have been steadily losing lines to wireless providers, and they need the size and synergies to invest in broadband, where cable companies already have a big head start. The most obvious benefit to consumers is the lower prices that result from increased "intermodal" -- or cross-technology -- competition. But another benefit is the faster rollout of new services made possible by economies of scale.

The biggest battle in telecom right now involves Bell companies that want to offer cable programming via Internet protocol television, or IPTV. AT&T and Verizon have been pushing their own version of IPTV to compete with traditional cable service, but BellSouth has not been involved in this effort thus far, mainly because it couldn't afford the investment risks. With the additional resources available through an AT&T merger, BellSouth customers in the Southeast could be getting cable competition sooner than they otherwise would.

Others argue that wireless competition would suffer from a combined AT&T/BellSouth because AT&T would control all of Cingular. But Cingular has been jointly owned and operated by BellSouth and AT&T for some time, which means the merger would do nothing to alter wireless market share. Besides, it would be difficult for Cingular to become a predatory monopolist in a marketplace with Verizon, T-Mobile and other wireless rivals.

Among the regulatory bodies that will vet this deal is the Federal Communications Commission, and Chairman Kevin Martin's record is encouraging. It's true the FCC's approval of the Verizon-MCI merger last year included some bad provisions like a temporary rate freeze and bundling requirements. But Mr. Martin was working without a Republican majority on the five-member panel and had to make concessions to win over the two Democrat commissioners.

He shouldn't have that problem this time around; confirmation hearings for a third GOP appointee -- Robert McDowell -- are scheduled for this week. Still, consumer groups are likely to push for other anti-competitive concessions like net neutrality, which would prevent AT&T/BellSouth from providing faster Internet connections for certain premium services to people willing to pay for it. We don't know if providing these so-called "fast lanes" on the Web is a viable business model, but that's for the market to decide, not the regulators.

A bigger hurdle might be the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, which is likely to receive pressure from Democrats on Capitol Hill aligned with consumer activists. Typical was the response from Massachusetts Democrat Ed Markey, a senior Member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who said "Twenty years after the government broke up Ma Bell, this deal represents a mother-and-child reunion."

But the child has grown up and the mother has changed, even if Mr. Markey's rhetoric hasn't. Consolidation is being driven, as it should, by changing technologies, and by all manner of competition in a telecom world that Ma Bell wouldn't recognize.

Let There Be Bandwidth (WSJ)

By Bret Swanson

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Ma Bell's back: Run for your lives! -- or at least to the halls of Congress. That, it seems, is the overheated conventional wisdom. But the $170 billion combination of AT&T and BellSouth into the world's largest telecom company is a perfectly natural progression of business and technology. The merger will rationalize a market beset by decades of political mismanagement.

Some 22 years ago, Judge Harold Greene famously ruled that AT&T violated antitrust law and broke up the company along two axes. First, he divided the telecom market into local and long-distance. But just 15 years later, fiber optics and mobile phones obliterated long-distance as a meaningful market, replacing it with fixed-price, anywhere-in-America bundles, which are now under assault from voice over IP. Judge Greene's other 1984 ruling, which split Ma Bell's local operations into eight regional companies, was even more arbitrary from the outset. Because they were fixed by geography, more local companies did not yield more local competition, only diseconomies of smaller scale. So by the late 1990s, after the 1996 Telecom Act acknowledged some of these problems (but created still others), the regional companies began an inevitable reintegration into Verizon, AT&T (née SBC) and USQwest, which will likely soon be gobbled up as well. * * *

Although this latest reintegration will not reduce the number of competitors in the marketplace, it is sure to supercharge the ever-present denunciations of monopoly that are behind every effort to regulate telecom. This time around, the main agent is the colossus Google. Exactly one decade after the disastrous 1996 act set us on a path for the telecom crash and a plunge to 16th in world broadband rankings, Google is leading an alliance of politicians, lobbyists and interested companies under the aegis of "net neutrality." If enacted, it will repeat the most basic mistakes of earlier legislation.

Net neutrality supposedly seeks the modest goal of stopping the cable TV or telecom companies from "blocking" or "degrading" the content or services of online companies like Google, Vonage or AOL, which are invading traditional voice and video businesses. But the interwoven issues of content and conduit pervade the entire information economy, including the systems of Google itself. Barely recovering from the FCC's "open access" mandates that chopped up and assigned ownership rights and prices to the physical infrastructure -- the hardware -- of the Net, we now face the prospect of rigid reassignment of content, applications, services and protocols, too.

Blocking and degrading Internet access would quite simply be business suicide for incumbent service providers. Compared to cable's other content operations like basic and premium TV channels, its broadband cable modem services are more than 50 times as profitable per unit of bandwidth consumed. This means that with just a tiny sliver of the usable bandwidth in its pipes, cable's Internet services supply about 20% of the revenue and the majority of their net income. Does anyone really think the bandwidth providers are going to kill their golden goose?

The continuing advance of semiconductor and fiber-optic technologies will inexorably push cable and telecom operators to dedicate more and more of their networks to open Internet access. In such a highly volatile market, how much of service providers' capacity will be used for Internet access and how much will go for integrated products like high-definition video programming and video conferencing services is a tough business question. With the millions of competing enterprises involved, this is a complex and rapidly evolving system far beyond the capacity of Congress or the courts to micromanage.

A net neutrality regime would invite endless litigation among service providers, hardware and software vendors, and content and applications dot-coms. Who gets access, when, and on what terms, to the other's network, the other's operating system, the other's platform? These questions -- the very ones that have stifled innovation in telecom for the last two decades -- should be left to business competition and, if all else fails, to common law and antitrust. Congress and the FCC cannot be the arbiters of every connection, interface and transaction. And if such laws somehow only targeted the incumbent bandwidth service providers, then they would turn out to be merely malicious political tools for business rivals, decidedly not "neutral" and unlikely to survive the scrutiny of the courts.

DOJ_NMG_0016376

The solution to all this is rather simple -- more bandwidth. Abundant bandwidth means the vast majority of online services, such as Web pages, email and voice, won't pose any congestion problems and will thus easily reach end-users. It also means bandwidth cheap enough that content companies won't mind paying for access. Across the network, different carriers have always charged different prices for varying amounts and qualities. Abundant bandwidth also gives the cable and telecom service providers the flexibility they need to manage this transition from a world of 200 dedicated channels to one with millions of open channels.

Abundant bandwidth will reverse America's communications decline and transcend monopoly worries or any need for complex net-neutrality regulation. But it will take more than $100 billion of massive and risky new investment, which cannot be made under the current regulatory caprice. Telecom deregulation begun by Michael Powell and continued by current FCC chairman Kevin Martin must be accelerated. Most importantly, we should banish the decades-old local video franchising process.

Since granting monopolies to local cable TV broadcasters some four decades ago, video franchising is obsolete. Yet the prospect of new broadband service providers haggling with some 30,000 mayors and city councils for the privilege of serving new customers is now America's chief obstacle to real broadband. Texas and Indiana have passed statewide franchises, which grant quick, simple and almost automatic licenses for the whole state, and they are already reaping a broadband investment harvest. Around $1 billion worth of new fiber optic bandwidth has already been announced in Texas. The other 48 states should follow suit, or Congress should adopt a simple national franchise without any "shot-clocks" or "build-out" baggage that invite litigation and discourage investment.

In the metro New York area, one of the few places where Verizon has won a video franchise and built its advanced optical network, competitor Cablevision has increased its basic cable modem service to 15 megabits per second and is offering premium services of 30 and 50 megabits. Where it exists, real competition between cable and telecom -- not faux competition among distinct telecom brand names -- is thus already yielding networks and speeds on par with the most advanced countries in the world.

AT&T's biggest challenge may be branding itself to a new generation of voracious communications consumers who are oblivious to "long-distance" and only know a world of no-distance chats, texts and blogs. It would be far better if Washington listened to these teeny-bopper baby belles instead of basing its merger, net neutrality and franchising policies on a Great Grandma Bell world that no longer exists.

Ma Bell Revives; Watch Her With A Very Wary Eye (USAT)

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Recent years have not been good to the businesses formerly known as phone companies. They got off to a slower start than cable in rolling out broadband service. And they lost core customers who signed up with Internet telephony services, or opted to go wireless.

But, not to worry, this is an industry with a plan: Bring back Ma Bell — the AT&T monopoly that once ruled the wired world, throttling competition.

While other industries have decided to race forward to keep pace with innovation, this one sees a bright future in turning back the clock. Maybe there is even a black, rotary-dial telephone in our future.

Sunday's announced merger between AT&T and BellSouth would reunite five of the eight companies created when an antitrust suit splintered the phone monopoly in 1984, igniting a communications revolution. (AT&T had already been merged with three of its offspring: Pacific Telesis, Ameritech and Southwestern Bell.)

DOJ_NMG_0016377

Given the current, accommodating state of antitrust policy and the arrival of cable as a competitor in broadband and telephony, this deal might well be approved by federal regulators. It might even create economies of scale that would make the combination more efficient than the sum of its parts.

But it also should raise red flags for Congress and federal regulators. For all the talk of robust competition between cable and telephone, the reality has been less impressive. The most intense competition and the fastest roll-outs of new services have been largely limited to affluent areas.

Reassembling the old Bell system would hardly provide companies with greater incentives to do what they are not doing already. If anything, it would give this new behemoth greater market strength with which to dictate prices and services.

What's more, the merger raises questions about the future of the Internet and digital entertainment. Even before Sunday, AT&T was vocal in its determination to impose limits on the Internet. The company envisions charging high-flying Internet companies such as Google and Yahoo for the privilege of flowing quickly through its high-speed pipes. It argues that because it invested in new lines, it deserves a greater piece of the action.

This merger might well increase its power to bring about such an unfortunate reality. With its massive customer base and ability to offer telephone, wireless telephone, broadband and video, it could bring enormous pressure to bear on Internet companies to pay its ransom, regardless of what its cable competitors do.

For that reason, lawmakers and members of the Federal Communications Commission should take a long, hard look at where the Internet is headed and what might be done to prevent a handful of companies from gaining a chokehold over an evolving medium that is one of history's great innovations.

Such an outcome would not only punish innovative companies, but in its most extreme form it would also make decisions for consumers on where they shop online, how they conduct their searches and which social networking sites they should use.

More broadly, Washington policymakers might want to examine the state of competition almost 10 years after the passage of a massive telecommunications law that partially deregulated the industry. If a company such as AT&T is able to erect tollbooths on the Internet, and if competition on price and service in many parts of the country remains anemic, then the law and subsequent court rulings further deregulating the industry are not having their desired effect.

Telephone and cable companies were freed of their regulatory shackles on the premise they would compete aggressively with each other. Progress on that front has been, at best, mixed.

Now the public is being asked to believe that putting the Bell system back together is going to stimulate competition and help consumers. It's hard to believe there is much progress to be made by going backward.

Competition Calling (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

Reports of Ma Bell's death were greatly exaggerated. AT&T, which lost its independence (and almost its name) when it was purchased by SBC in November, now finds itself at the center of one of the largest mergers in business history. And concerns about the dangers of the deal are exaggerated as well.

This time, the newly reconstituted AT&T, formerly known as SBC, has agreed to buy BellSouth, the dominant local phone company in the South, in a stock swap worth about $67 billion. The merger, which must be approved by the companies' shareholders and federal regulators, would combine the erstwhile Ma Bell's market-leading long-distance business with local phone companies serving 22 states, or about 40% of the country's phone lines.

The numbers may be eye-popping, but the new Ma Bell is unlikely to be as powerful — or as dangerous — as the old Ma Bell. AT&T competes halfheartedly today for business customers in a few cities served by BellSouth, and BellSouth doesn't even try to compete with AT&T on the latter's home turf. And rather than operating rival wireless networks, AT&T and BellSouth jointly own one — Cingular.

As a consequence, the merger would have practically no immediate effect on BellSouth's or AT&T's market. Customers would neither gain nor lose any options for phone, high-speed Internet or wireless services.

Some critics argue that AT&T's chairman, Edward E. Whitacre Jr., is trying to reassemble the phone monopoly that the federal government broke up in 1984. As head of SBC, Whitacre has already gobbled up two of the regional Bells (Pacific Telesis and Ameritech) and last year acquired the struggling AT&T for $16 billion. The phone market is fundamentally different now, however. Cable TV companies sell phone and high-speed Internet service over their networks; mobile phones have become an increasingly affordable alternative to a home phone line; and numerous Web-based companies let users make calls through the Internet for little or no charge.

DOJ_NMG_0016378

Meanwhile, phone companies such as AT&T and Verizon are starting to offer video services through high-speed Internet lines that can compete with cable and satellite TV operators. The proposed merger could actually promote that competition. Offering video through broadband connections also could serve as the Trojan horse that pushes high-speed Internet service into more homes.

Still, regulators shouldn't just wave the merger through. In much of the country, there isn't very much competition among high-speed Internet networks. So AT&T could be tempted to soak customers or extract extra fees from Web-based companies. And Whitacre has made some troubling comments about companies such as Google having to pay to use "his" pipes.

AT&T says it merely wants to charge websites for delivering faster service to users. Rather than trusting the company not to hamper the Internet or play favorites, regulators should require it to pledge to preserve a level playing field for all websites, programmers and services as a condition of the BellSouth deal. Customers and websites shouldn't have to pay twice to connect to each other, nor should AT&T or any other network operator be able to give any site or service an unfair advantage over its competitors.

Hybrid Program Key To NYSE Group's Future (AP)

By MICHAEL J. MARTINEZ, AP Business Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - When the New York Stock Exchange transforms into a publicly traded company Tuesday, its agenda - staying competitive with faster all-electronic markets - will remain in place even as its corporate structure changes.

The NYSE's 214-year existence as a non-for-profit institution will end when it closes its $9 billion acquisition of all-electronic rival Archipelago Holdings Inc. On Wednesday, the combined company, called NYSE Group Inc., will begin trading on the floor of the Big Board under the symbol NYX.

Unfettered from the NYSE's seat holder leadership structure, in which the owners of 1,366 seats had a strong say in the direction of the Big Board, NYSE Group Chief Executive John Thain has big plans for the exchange, including trading options and corporate bonds, the possibility of extended trading hours and acquisitions of other exchanges and companies.

But as the $9 billion acquisition closes, the exchange can't look too far ahead, nor too quickly. The linchpin of its future is not new products or acquisitions, but its core business of trading stocks. And with the Nasdaq Stock Market's electronic trading platform slowly eating away at the NYSE's market share, the NYSE's new "hybrid" program - the merging of electronic trading with traditional floor auctions - must be a fast and sure success.

"I would say that getting hybrid in place, up and running, is the absolute most important thing they have to do," said Michael Pagano, assistant professor of economics at Villanova University's College of Commerce and Finance. "If they don't get hybrid right, all their competitors can come and pick them off."

The hybrid is the result of a new Securities and Exchange Commission rule due to take effect this summer. Under that rule, the NYSE must move to electronic trading in order to be considered a "fast market" and thus compete with the Nasdaq and other electronic markets for orders. However, for its entire history, the Big Board has been a human-driven system, with specialists serving as auctioneers to buy and sell stocks and maintain orderly markets by keeping prices reasonable.

To attain fast-market status, the NYSE plans to create a system it hopes will combine the speed of electronic trading with the market-management skills of humans. It's a tricky balance - if the human element proves too slow, more orders will head to the Nasdaq or elsewhere.

But if the floor system is minimized too much, the NYSE loses a key asset that differentiates it from other exchanges.

"If they get this balance right, their market share and trading volume can really take off," Pagano said. "If they don't, all the acquisitions and other products won't help them. They have to get this right, right off the bat."

DOJ_NMG_0016379

The NYSE has repeatedly said a pilot hybrid program is in place, involving 147 stocks as of March 1, and will continue to be implemented as the summer deadline approaches.

At least one NYSE customer is pleased with the effort thus far.

"They've made a lot of the technology pretty transparent to us, and we've had good conversations with folks there to see what that's going to look like for us," said Vincent Phillips, CEO of the active trading service CyberTrader, a Schwab Corp. subsidiary. "Given the things they have on their plate, I think things have gone surprisingly well."

Thain has expressed confidence in the hybrid program and appears to be poised to take advantage of the exchange's newfound independence from its seat holders. The former Goldman Sachs president hopes to expand the NYSE's offerings to include derivatives trading, including equity options side-by-side with sales of the stocks themselves, as well as corporate bond trading.

Trading could also expand as Thain works to integrate Archipelago's trading system with that of the rest of the NYSE. In the future, it's possible that floor traders could not only trade NYSE-listed stocks, but also those listed on the Nasdaq. With NYSE-listed stocks already electronically traded on Nasdaq, as well as Archipelago, the NYSE could not only retain some of its own market share, but also eat into Nasdaq's.

Thain has also said he is still considering expanding the NYSE's operating hours in order to compete with European markets, though that has run into some resistance from traders on the West Coast, who are already up at 6:30 a.m. Pacific time for the opening bell.

And of course, Thain has previously said he's interested in using his newfound equity capital for acquisitions. The London Stock Exchange, currently on the block, is a favored target of speculation, though there are smaller exchanges in the U.S., including the American Stock Exchange and a number of regional exchanges, that could become tempting targets.

Alternatively, the NYSE could go after the Chicago Board of Options Exchange or the International Securities Exchange in order to get a bigger piece of the options and derivatives trade.

"Whatever they do, they're going to be in a good position," Philips said. "We can't wait until Thursday to see what the new world looks like."

Blackstone To Acquire CarrAmerica For $5.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Blackstone Group agreed to acquire CarrAmerica Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust with office properties across the U.S., for $5.6 billion.

The deal is the largest in a string of transactions in which publicly traded real-estate companies have been bought by private or institutional investors willing to pay a premium for companies they believe are undervalued by Wall Street.

Blackstone, a New York-based private-equity firm, has been aggressive in acquiring real-estate companies but has focused on the hotel sector. Two weeks ago, it said it would acquire MeriStar Hospitality Corp., a hotel REIT, for $940 million, plus debt, in a deal valued at $2.6 billion. The decision to grab a large office REIT is seen as an endorsement of the improving office market.

"Whenever you see a smart, well-capitalized private-equity firm entering into a transaction like this, to my mind, it's a stamp of approval on the sector," said Jim Sullivan, senior REIT analyst for Green Street Advisors, a real-estate research and trading firm.

CarrAmerica, based in Washington, D.C., holds about 26 million square feet of office space in markets including Los Angeles, Dallas and Denver.

Under the terms announced yesterday, Blackstone will acquire all of the outstanding common stock of CarrAmerica for $44.75 a share. The purchase price represents an 18.4% premium over CarrAmerica's closing stock price on Feb. 16, the day news began to circulate about a possible deal. Blackstone will also assume a limited amount of debt, although the precise figure wasn't disclosed. CarrAmerica shares rose $3.45, or 8.4%, to $44.53 yesterday in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0016380

Credit-rating service Fitch Ratings said late yesterday it has placed CarrAmerica on "rating watch negative" in anticipation of a possible downgrade based on the likelihood that Blackstone could increase CarrAmerica's leverage.

"The bottom line is we were offered an extremely attractive price from Blackstone," said CarrAmerica Chief Executive Thomas Carr.

Jonathan Gray, Blackstone's senior managing director, said in a prepared statement that CarrAmerica "will provide us with a valuable platform for future investments in the office sector." The deal is expected to close in the second quarter.

A year ago, a REIT as large as CarrAmerica wouldn't have been considered a likely candidate for privatization or acquisition. That changed in December when General Electric Co. agreed to pay $3.2 billion and assume $1.6 billion in debt for Arden Realty, an office REIT.

"The entire REIT universe seems to be fair game at this point," said Paul Adornato, senior analyst for REIT research at Harris Nesbitt, the U.S. research and investment-banking subsidiary of Toronto-based BMO Financial Group.

J.P. Morgan To Buy Kohl's Card Unit For $1.5 Billion (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to buy the credit-card operations of department-store chain Kohl's Corp. for $1.5 billion, reflecting the bank's push into the lucrative "private-label" business.

It is the latest in a flurry of deals in which retailers have shed their in-house card businesses to concentrate on core operations. Last year, for example, Federated Department Stores Inc. sold its private-label business to Citigroup Inc.

And British bank HSBC Holdings PLC recently snapped up the private-label portfolio of Neiman Marcus Group Inc.

For banks, the private-label portfolios are attractive at a time when profit growth has been slowing for general-purpose cards -- those branded by card-issuing financial institutions and card associations such as Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard International Inc.

J.P. Morgan executives have repeatedly said they want to acquire more private-label portfolios; both Citigroup and General Electric Co. already have large presences in this area.

In the past two years, J.P. Morgan has bought the in-house card businesses of Circuit City Stores Inc. and Sears Canada Inc.

The Kohl's portfolio includes 13 million accounts with approximately $1.5 billion in outstanding balances. The deal is expected to close in 90 days. Kohl's is based in Menomonee Falls, Wis.

As part of the transaction, the two companies will coordinate programs aimed at spurring Kohl's sales and card use. Kohl's will continue to manage customer service, advertising and marketing for the cards.

Linde Raises Bid For BOC, Likely Clinching A Deal (WSJ)

By Jan Hromadko And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

German industrial conglomerate Linde AG raised its takeover bid for U.K.-based gas company BOC Group PLC to £16 ($28.06) a share, likely clinching a deal that will create the world's largest industrial-gas company in terms of sales.

Linde said it intends to fund the deal -- which values BOC at £8.2 billion ($14.4 billion) -- with a fresh issue of equity and debt.

The transaction would create a leading world-wide industrial-gas and engineering group with combined sales of €11.9 billion ($14.3 billion), said Linde, based in Wiesbaden, Germany. The supplier of industrial gases, engineering services and forklift trucks said the BOC management board intends to recommend that its shareholders accept the offer. The bid represents a 39% premium to BOC's share price prior to Linde's offer in January.

BOC Chief Executive Tony Isaac said in an interview that Linde's bid "is a very good offer for shareholders, and significantly 'derisked' compared with the one we turned down in January."

DOJ_NMG_0016381

On Jan. 24, BOC revealed that Linde had made an unsolicited approach for £15 a share. BOC's board unanimously rejected the offer on grounds it undervalued the bigger company and had too many conditions, including financing, antitrust approval and due diligence.

A combination of Linde and BOC would create a company with some 22% of global sales within the industrial-gas market. BOC and Linde, the current No. 2 and No. 5 globally, hold a 13% and 9% market share, respectively.

Shares of BOC fell 0.1% to £15.43 in London. In Frankfurt, Linde shares rose 7.5% to €70.45.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Senate Democrats Oppose ANWR Oil Drilling In Budget (REU-Y2)

By Tom Doggett

Reuters, March 6, 2006

Democratic lawmakers on the U.S. Senate Budget Committee said on Monday they opposed putting in the 2007 budget bill language assuming the government will raise billions of dollars in oil drilling leasing fees from Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

In its budget proposal to Congress, the Bush administration said it expected $7 billion would be raised by allowing oil drilling in the Alaskan refuge, and the Congressional Budget Office puts the figure at $6 billion.

No matter what the number, most Senate and House Democrats are against opening the refuge to oil companies.

"It is irresponsible to base the country's budget on highly speculative and dubious projections of lease revenues for the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge," all nine Democrats on the budget panel said in a letter to the committee's Republican chairman, Judd Gregg.

Putting the ANWR leasing revenues in the budget bill is a way to get around a threatened filibuster of any legislation that would open to refuge to oil drilling, because budget bills can't be filibustered.

"We encourage you to reject any requests that are intended to misuse the budget process to open the refuge to oil and gas drilling and exploration," the Democratic lawmakers said.

The Senate Budget Committee is scheduled to vote Wednesday on whether to include the ANWR leasing revenue in the government's 2007 budget.

Last week, 24 House Republicans sent a letter to House Budget Committee chairman, Republican Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record), urging him to keep Arctic refuge drilling out of the 2007 budget bill.

The administration has failed every year to convince Congress to give energy companies access to the refuge, which is a key part of the White House's national energy plan.

The refuge, which is home to a variety of wildlife such as polar bears and migratory birds, stretches across 19 million acres in the northeast corner of Alaska. But the White House only wants to offer 1.5 million acres in the refuge's coastal plain for oil and natural gas exploration leases.

The Interior Department estimates the refuge could hold between 5.7 billion and 16 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

If the refuge was opened to drilling, it would take about eight years before the area reached full production of around 800,000 to 1 million barrels per day, according to the Energy Department.

The Face That Helped Alter Nation's Flu Policy (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

As he waited his turn at the microphone, in an Atlanta auditorium filled with doctors and scientists, Gary Stein wondered whether what he had to say would make much difference. These were the experts, he realized, the people who spend a lifetime studying viruses and vaccines. They already knew all the facts, the statistics.

Still, they didn't know 4-year-old Jessica.

DOJ_NMG_0016382

So Stein began talking, as a father who once had a little girl with hair the color and shimmer of champagne, a child who loved dress-up and Barbies and who was as healthy as they come until the day in January 2002 when she caught the flu. Less than 72 hours later, she was dead. Stein thought he could get through the main points of his remarks without stumbling. But as he stood before the federal Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, explaining how his Falls Church family had been devastated, he choked up.

"Nothing and no one will ever fill the void left by Jessica," Stein told the gathering.

"It hit me pretty hard," he admitted later. It may have hit the experts hard, too.

The next morning, the 15-member committee voted for a surprise revision in national policy: It unanimously recommended that starting this fall, all children between 2 and 5 years old be vaccinated annually against influenza.

The previous recommendation only advised flu shots for children ages 6 months to 23 months and those 6 months and older with chronic illnesses. As long as they are generally healthy, children older than toddlers tend to just get sick from the flu. They go to doctor's offices or outpatient clinics but are seldom admitted to the hospital.

Children still suffer a "substantial" amount of influenza, however, said Raymond A. Strikas, an associate director at the National Immunization Program, which is part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. And that was the major impetus for the committee's decision late last month. Its expanded coverage even includes parents and older siblings, because they also suffer by getting sick themselves or taking time off work to care for ailing youngsters.

All told, nearly 17 million additional people now will be urged to get protection against the flu, bringing the total to more than 120 million men, women and children across the United States.

"We're saying, 'This is the standard of care,' " Strikas said. "This is what you should be doing."

For Jessica Stein's parents, the new recommendation brings some comfort.

"If there are other kids that will get vaccinated," explained Doris Stein, the words hanging in the air without elaboration. The inference was clear: Other parents won't have to bury a child.

In this country, influenza is a serious public health problem that many health officials complain does not get the respect it deserves. It kills more than 36,000 Americans a year, of whom most are very young or very old or suffering from conditions or diseases that compromise their body's ability to fight the virus.

Children do die, however. During the 2003-04 flu season, when the new guideline was first broached, a particularly nasty strain struck earlier than usual and began killing healthy children -- more than 70 by the final count. One of its victims was 3-year-old Emily Lastinger. Her father traveled from Texas to Atlanta to address the advisory committee with Stein.

"It took great courage," said Gregory A. Poland, an internist at the Mayo Clinic who specializes in immunology and vaccine development. As a committee member, he has pushed for a recommendation to make universal coverage the national standard. Others support incremental progress, worrying that vaccine supplies could never meet demand otherwise. Any disruption to yearly production of flu vaccine would only worsen the problem, they fear.

"It's absolutely heart-wrenching to me to hear these stories and have people die of something so preventable," Poland said. "It's as if each person, each generation, each community has to learn the hard way."

This influenza season has seen few aberrations and no unusual virulence. As of mid-February, the CDC reported that just a dozen children had died. But each of those is an individual tragedy, stress the Steins, who recently began venturing into advocacy, connecting with other parents through a nonprofit organization called Families Fighting Flu. "It's very therapeutic," Doris Stein said.

Jessica is rarely out of sight in her family's home. Photos remain on the refrigerator, on a kitchen counter. On one end of the living room mantel is a picture of her, her parents and her younger brother, Eric, taken the Christmas before her death. At the mantel's other end is a more recent shot, of Doris and Gary, Eric and Johnny and Katie, the children born after Jessica died.

"It's like we have two different families," Doris said quietly as Katie, a 15-month-old burst of energy, took off across the room. Her older sister would be 8 now and in third grade, and "not a day goes by that you don't think about what she would be doing, what she would be like," Gary said.

Neither parent had any time to prepare emotionally when Jessica got sick. A virus had been going around her preschool, and both she and Eric caught it and then both got better. More than a week later, Jessica had a play date, and only after that did her mother notice that she seemed more tired than normal. By morning, all symptoms pointed to the flu, but Jessica was still eating well, her energy was no worse and she had no fever.

DOJ_NMG_0016383

The third day was different. Jessica's hands were icy cold, and by evening her breathing seemed somewhat labored. Her mother called the pediatrician, who suggested they "walk -- don't run" to the hospital to check for dehydration. The next several hours replayed for a long time in her parents' minds: their daughter suddenly having trouble breathing, Doris being asked to step out of the room, Gary rushing over from home, a doctor saying Jessica had been stabilized. Five minutes later, an entire medical team emerged. The virus had fatally attacked Jessica's heart.

No one in the family had gotten a flu shot that year.

But no one in the family will ever again go without.

Whales In The Way Of Sonar (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The debate over whether the Navy's use of sonar to detect submarines is harming whales and other sound-sensitive species is back again. This time the battleground is the waters off the southeastern United States, where the Navy hopes to establish a training area for sailors who need to practice their sonar skills in a shallow ocean environment. The plan has aroused justifiable concern not only from environmental groups, but also from the federal and state agencies responsible for protecting marine life. If these concerns cannot be allayed, the project should be denied a permit to proceed as now planned.

The Navy's favored site is an area off the coast of North Carolina — 500 square nautical miles — but the Navy would settle for backup sites off Virginia or Florida if its first choice is rejected. In a draft environmental impact statement, the Navy argues that the training sites would have negligible impacts on marine life, but that judgment looks far too rosy.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration has expressed "significant concerns" about the proposed sonar activity, including its potential to injure or kill beaked whales, which are especially sensitive, and its possible adverse impact on right whales, a highly endangered species. The agency also contends that the sound thresholds the Navy deems acceptable are well above the levels known to disrupt marine mammal behavior in the wild. Florida's fish and wildlife agency went so far as to urge that the project be abandoned, and North Carolina's marine and wildlife agencies weighed in with their own concerns.

No one can deny that the Navy needs to conduct sonar training in shallow waters, where sound propagates differently than in the deep ocean. But at a time when evidence is mounting that sonar has been responsible for at least some of the whale strandings around the world — and when we do not yet know what caused a large stranding last year in North Carolina — it behooves the Navy to move with extreme caution.

The three sites favored by the Navy were chosen for practical reasons: they were close to home ports, air stations and federal shore facilities; had appropriate water depths; and had a satisfactory climate. Whales were at best an afterthought, but they deserve to be a priority.

Sixteen Arrested In Drug Bust On Pine Ridge (ICT)

Indian Country Today, March 7, 2006

RAPID CITY, S.D. - Sixteen people on the Pine Ridge Reservation have been charged with possession of cocaine and marijuana and with the intent to distribute the drugs.

The arrests, which came days after national news organizations ran stories about drug trafficking on American Indian reservations, were not intended to coincide with those articles, according to Paul McCabe, FBI spokesman from the Minneapolis regional office.

Twelve were arrested in the village of Pine Ridge without incident. The other four were already in federal or state custody.

Arrested were Geraldine Blue Bird; her son, Clarence Behan; Travis Elk Boy; Colin Spotted Elk; Dawnee Frogg; Howard Blue Bird; Thomas Spotted Bear; Flint Thomas Red Feather; Justin Hawk Wing; Sage Richards; Norton Richards; Wenona Richards; Jody Richards; Jay Dee Spotted Elk; Joe Garcia and Rusty Richards.

In December 2005, authorities were called to a Rapid City hotel to investigate a complaint that the aroma of marijuana was coming from one or two rooms.

DOJ_NMG_0016384

When federal authorities and an officer from the Rapid City Police Department arrived, they were given permission to enter the hotel room, where they smelled marijuana smoke. They then observed a clear plastic baggie of marijuana, according to court documents.

Blue Bird, who rented the room, was determined to have outstanding arrest warrants. She also admitted to having cocaine in a jacket pocket, telling officers it belonged to her son. When the officers let her in the room, another woman, Jody Richards, picked up a sweater to put on and the officers noticed a Tupperware container with a white substance on the bed. They then sought a warrant.

In an adjoining room were two other people in Blue Bird's party, Norton Richards and Wenona Richards. All four were arrested at the scene.

Authorities recovered more than $16,000 and one and one-half pounds of cocaine from the rooms. Also confiscated were three revolvers and ammunition, including an assault rifle magazine, according to court documents.

Blue Bird was charged with possession of a firearm in connection with a drug trafficking crime and seven other counts of drug-related offenses. Two others, part of the dozen who were arrested, were also charged with possession of a rifle in the act of drug trafficking.

All 16 defendants appeared in federal court in Rapid City and entered not guilty pleas. No trial dates have been set.

Authorities said the shooting death of a 16-year-old in December 2005 at Blue Bird's residence expedited the investigation.

Blue Bird became somewhat famous during President Clinton's visit to Pine Ridge in 2000. She lived in a home in Pine Ridge with an attached trailer that housed 28 people. Clinton sat on her porch and discussed jobs, housing and other issues with her and family members.

She later received a new double-wide home, the result of a generous out-of-state donor who read about her in the national media.

If convicted, she and the others could receive up to life in prison and a $4 million fine. They will all be required to forfeit any drug-related funds and property.

The arrests at Pine Ridge brought praise for the arresting officers. McCabe said many stopped in a local restaurant and were greeted by locals with pats on the back and congratulatory praise, thanking them and saying, "We appreciate it - get them out of here." He added that the case is still under investigation and people may come forward with more information as long as it remains open.

The national media has placed great emphasis on methamphetamine use and distribution. In South Dakota, the drug has been a major source of concern and discussion in the state Legislature, among local communities and law enforcement agencies.

The arrests on Pine Ridge, however, did not involve crystal meth, McCabe said.

"Meth is a problem. We've seen meth increase, but any drug is considered a problem. Since meth is on the rise, not too many years ago, there has been an increase in the traffic of any kind of drug," he said.

The Pine Ridge law enforcement is currently understaffed, with one officer for every 1,000 people. At the end of March, a Community Oriented Policing Services grant will expire and the force will be cut by 58 offices - roughly in half. That will leave one officer for every 2,000 people.

In order to investigate and carry out any type of arrest, a "force multiplier" is put into place, McCabe said. That means other agencies work together to create a greater number of officers and agencies to aid in the investigations.

"Law enforcement in general, throughout the country, is under a budget constraint. That's why the force multiplier is used to bring in all the expertise and intelligence together. That's an important piece for maintaining safety, on or off the reservations.

"Indian country matters are a high priority. A great deal of the manpower in Minneapolis involved crimes on reservations," he said.

The FBI; Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Unified Narcotics Enforcement Team; the Rapid City Police Department; the Northern Plains Safe Trails Task Force; and the Oglala Sioux Tribe Department of Public Safety cooperated in the investigation and arrests.

DOJ_NMG_0016385

The U.S. Marshals Service, the Department of Homeland Security and the Drug Enforcement Administration assisted in the arrests.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Israel Extradites Alleged Drug Trafficker To United States (FINDLAW)

By ARON HELLER, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

(AP) - JERUSALEM-A suspected Israeli mob boss, described by U.S. prosecutors as one of the world's most wanted drug traffickers, was extradited to the United States on Monday, police said.

Zeev Rosenstein, suspected of involvement in distributing more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the United States, mostly in New York and Miami, was handed over to U.S. marshals at Ben Gurion International Airport near Tel Aviv arport and taken aboard a direct El Al flight to Miami, where he will face the drug charges, police spokesman Mickey Rosenfeld said.

The target of numerous gangland assassination attemps in the past, Rosenstein was driven to the airport in an undercover police car accompanied by several motorcycles, Israeli radios reported.

"It was a carefully-planned operation, under sensitive circumstances, designed to ensure that he arrived at the airport in peace and quiet, without any disturbance to public order," Rosenfeld said.

He said the extradition was the result of a long investigation conducted in coordination with U.S. law enforcement agencies.

Israeli police, acting on an international arrest warrant, arrested Rosenstein more than a year ago for allegedly smuggling drugs from Europe to the United States.

A U.S. extradition request, submitted in December 2004, said Rosenstein was involved in distributing more than 1 million pills of Ecstasy, court documents said.

In November, Israel's Supreme Court ruled he could be extradited, a decision later endorsed by the Israeli justice minister.

In one shipment, Rosenstein allegedly planned distribution of 700,000 Ecstasy pills that were seized in a Manhattan apartment along with $187,000 in July 2001, according to the extradition request. The drugs, which originated in Europe, were seized after they were offered for sale to an undercover Miami-Dade County police informant. The informant also worked for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The investigation leading to Rosenstein's arrest spanned three years and several countries.

Rosenstein, 51, has long been accused of being one of Israel's top mob leaders, but aside from a five-year stint in prison for armed robbery in the 1970s, he had eluded authorities.

In December 2003, a bomb attack in Tel Aviv targeted Rosenstein - the seventh attempt on his life - leaving him with scratches but killing three passers-by and wounding 18 others. The attack was believed to have been ordered by rival mob bosses.

Rosenstein has been charged in the United States with conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance and conspiracy to import a controlled substance into the United States. The maximum penalty under American law is 20 years in prison, or more if the drugs sold caused death or serious injury.

In an interview, published Friday in the Yediot Ahronot daily, Rosenstein said he was a victim of a conspiracy orchestrated by Israeli police.

"I'm not the head of a crime family, and I don't have soldiers," he said.

According to the extradition agreement between Israel and the United States, Rosenstein could serve any prison sentence he receives in Israel.

Fugitive Extradited From Caribbean On Drug Charges (AP)

AP, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016386

ROCHESTER, N.Y. Federal officials say a man accused of importing cocaine has been extradited from his native Saint Kitts in the Caribbean.Noel Heath was one of the top ten fugitives of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York field division.He was indicted in 1995 on charges of conspiring to import more than eleven pounds of cocaine in the Rochester area. If convicted, he could get up to life in prison and be fined up to 4 (m) million dollars.

Atlanta Federal Agent Charged With Embezzlement (DBCH)

Atlanta Business Chronicle, March 6, 2006

A DEA agent who worked at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport has been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of embezzling money as a federal officer, embezzling public money and money laundering.

Gregory Campion, 44, of Orlando, Fla., is expected to be arraigned before U.S. Magistrate Judge Alan J. Baverman on March 8.

A federal grand jury returned an indictment against Campion on March 1. The indictment charges that on seven occasions in 2004 and 2005, Campion, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration assigned to the Atlanta Airport Task Force, allegedly stole cash from the secure storage vault maintained by the Task Force. These funds had been seized by law enforcement agents as currency involved in federal narcotics offenses and were subject to forfeiture to the United States.

The indictment also charges that Campion allegedly engaged in two transactions in excess of $10,000 with the proceeds of these thefts to buy real estate in Orlando. The indictment seeks forfeiture of that real estate.

Campion, who now lives in Florida, has been suspended without pay from his position at the DEA.

"We have no tolerance for criminal conduct by law enforcement officers sworn to uphold the law, particularly federal agents," said U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. "We will thoroughly investigate and vigorously prosecute alleged lawbreaking by law enforcers."

Feds Arrest Manteca Man For Impersonating DEA (AP)

AP, March 6, 2006

(AP) MANTECA Federal authorities arrested a Manteca man today for impersonating a Drug Enforcement Administration agent by flashing a phony badge as he entered a courtroom.

Thirty-seven-year-old John D. Cohen picked the wrong courthouse security officer to try to dupe -- a retired DEA special agent. The officer told the U-S Marshal's Service the badge looked suspicious.

Federal agents who later raided Cohen's home found guns, DEA apparel, a police uniform, handcuffs, bulletproof vests and forged law enforcement training certificates. They also found what they believe is several small bags of marijuana.

Cohen could face up to three years in prison if convicted of impersonating an agent, and five years if convicted of making false statements to federal authorities.

Man Charged With Presenting Fake DEA Badge At Federal Courthouse (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, March 6, 2006

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration announced Monday it has arrested a Manteca man who presented a fake DEA badge to security officers at the Sacramento federal courthouse last week.

John D. Cohen, 37, was arrested on suspicion of impersonating a DEA special agent. After searching Cohen's home, officials seized two handguns, a shotgun, DEA apparel, an Oakland Police Department uniform, and other police gear, the DEA said in a statement. Several small bags of what officials believe to be marijuana were also found.

"Impersonating a DEA Agent is a very serious offense because it undermines the public trust necessary for DEA agents to safely do their jobs," said Gordon D. Taylor, special agent in charge of the agency's Sacramento office. "This guy wanted to be on the inside. Well, he'll get that opportunity when real DEA agents take him to jail and put him behind bars."

The investigation into Cohen began last Monday, when authorities said he falsely identified himself to a U.S. Marshal security officer at the Sacramento federal courthouse. A retired DEA agent, the security officer alerted the U.S. Marshal's office to a possible imposter.

DOJ_NMG_0016387

DEA Accuses Pleasanton Broker Of Impersonating Agent (CCT)

By Karl Fischer

The Contra Costa Times, March 6, 2006

Federal authorities say a Pleasanton mortgage broker posing as a narcotics agent entered a secure portion of Coast Guard Island in Alameda last month and sold guards a Ford Crown Victoria he claimed was a retired police car.

That breach was the first of two in February that attracted real agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency. On Monday, they visited the Manteca home of 37-year-old John Cohen and seized a cache of weapons and law enforcement paraphernalia, along with Cohen himself.

"Impersonating a DEA agent is, of course, a very serious crime," DEA special agent Casey McEnry said. "And he did it multiple times."

On Feb. 27, the week after the Coast Guard Island incident, Cohen showed a counterfeit DEA badge to a U.S. Marshal Service security agent while entering a federal building in Sacramento, authorities said. The agent, who was a retired DEA agent, became suspicious. Security detained Cohen minutes after he entered.

"Cohen stated he was given the badge and ID card from his commander when he was discharged from the U.S. Navy, as a token of his service," according to the affidavit written by Special Agent Gary Cummings.

DEA agents interviewed Cohen, who admitted the badge was a fake, but they let him go, according to an affidavit filed by the agency in federal court.

"As Cohen was departing, (he) stated if we ever needed someone to go undercover to call him," according to the affidavit. "Cohen also stated he had wanted to be a DEA special agent all of his life."

Two days later, agents learned that Cohen had met a private guard from King Security, the firm that serves Coast Guard Island, on Feb. 22 and sold him a 2000 Ford Crown Victoria outfitted with police lights the following day.

Cohen appeared at the gate of Coast Guard Island at least once, on the day of the sale, wearing a jacket emblazoned with the letters "DEA" and with DEA identification.

"My understanding is that he impersonated a DEA agent" to gain access to the facility, said U.S. Coast Guard spokeswoman Amy Thomas. "As far as I know, nothing was compromised. Our security people were suspicious and reported the contact soon after the visit."

Authorities searching Cohen's home Monday found two handguns, a shotgun, an Oakland Police Department uniform, apparel from the DEA and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, police equipment including red and blue car lights, forged law enforcement training certificates and several small bags of marijuana, according to a DEA press release.

They booked Cohen into Sacramento County Jail on suspicion of several federal offenses, including impersonating a federal agent.

Cohen works for Hilltop Financial Mortgage Inc. in Pleasanton. A woman who answered his cell phone Monday evening declined comment.

Judge Puts Upcoming Executions On Hold (THTS)

By Karin Grunden, The Tribune-Star

Terre Haute Tribune Star, March 7, 2006

Three federal death row inmates who contend in a lawsuit that lethal injections are painful have been granted a stay of execution, court records show.

U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle ordered a preliminary injunction Feb. 24, barring the Bureau of Prisons from executing James H. Roane Jr., Richard Tipton and Cory Johnson.

The three co-defendants had been scheduled to die in May at the Federal Correctional Complex in Terre Haute, home to the nation's federal death row. The trio were sentenced to die after being convicted in a string of drug-related murders in Richmond, Va.

"Any news like this is good," said Stephen Northup, an attorney who represents Tipton. But "it's really just temporary relief."

A spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons confirmed the delay Monday, and declined further comment.

DOJ_NMG_0016388

This case marks at least the sixth since January in which executions have been delayed after inmates have raised legal challenges about the lethal injection process, according to information on Death Penalty Information Center's Web site.

At least six other men, included one from Indiana, have been executed in the same time period.

The injunction in the federal death case is indefinite, until further order of the court. In her ruling, Huvelle also stayed the three men's federal lawsuit on the constitutionality of lethal injections, pending a decision by the U.S. Supreme Court in a Florida case.

In that case, death row inmate Clarence Edward Hill is suing the state of Florida, alleging that lethal injection would violate his constitutional protection from cruel and unusual punishment.

In a court document, Hill's attorney claims that a succession of the three chemicals commonly used in used in lethal injection — sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride — could inflict pain "contrary to the contemporary standards of decency."

The document cites a study published last year in a British medical journal. In the study, which appeared in The Lancet, the authors found that toxicology reports of 49 executed inmates showed 43 had post-mortem concentrations of thiopental lower than required in surgery. In addition, 21 of the 49 inmates had concentrations consistent with awareness, according to the study.

The Supreme Court has agreed to hear the Florida case, to determine whether Hill's civil suit falls within federal appeals, as lower courts have ruled, or is a legitimate challenge to the conditions of a condemned inmate's death sentence.

Separately, attorneys for Roane, Tipton and Johnson also are alleging in a federal lawsuit that lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment. They filed the suit in December in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

The defendants in the case are U.S. Attorney Alberto Gonzales, DEA Administrator Karen Tandy, Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, Bureau Medical Director Newton E. Kendig II, penitentiary Warden Mark Bezy, and penitentiary Clinical Director Dr. Thomas Webster. The list of defendants also includes "John Does I-V," a reference to the unknown people charged with carrying out the execution.

In the complaint, attorneys for the three death row inmates claim while sodium pentothal "supposedly will render the plaintiffs insensible to the pain of their deaths, it in fact can and will merely cast a 'chemical veil' over this excruciating pain, leaving plaintiffs conscious but trapped in a paralyzed body wracked with the pain of suffocation and heart attack.

"At the same time, this 'cocktail' will make it impossible for those observing the execution – including witnesses to it … to recognize and prevent the gratuitous pain and suffering being inflicted upon the plaintiffs."

While the attorneys await the outcome of the Florida case, they have filed paperwork asking President Bush to grant clemency to their clients, Northup said.

Karin Grunden can be reached at (812) 231-4257 or karin.grunden@tribstar.com.

A look at the crimes

--Richard Tipton, 35, Cory Johnson, 37, and James H. Roane Jr., 40, were gang leaders in a crack-cocaine ring in Richmond, Va.

--The three were tied to nine slayings of suspected informants, competitors and underlings. One man was stabbed 84 times for mishandling a drug transaction, according to a U.S. Court of Appeals brief. Three other people were critically injured during the series of killings, which happened over a month in early 1992, court records show.

--Tipton, Johnson and Roane were sentenced under the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, which includes federal execution as a sentence. The three have exhausted all appeals.

Medical-marijuana Clubs Fear New Raids By Feds (SDUT)

By Jeff Mcdonald, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, March 6, 2006

December searches yield no arrests yet

Nearly three months after federal agents raided 13 medical marijuana dispensaries in San Diego County, the government has yet to make any arrests or file any criminal charges.

DOJ_NMG_0016389

Most of the pot clubs that closed during the high-profile searches reopened days later. Meanwhile, at least 10 new dispensaries, cooperatives and delivery services have set up shop.

Even though it appears to be business as usual within the close-knit medical marijuana community, an uneasy cloud hovers over the dispensaries and their customers.

The operators worry that federal agents will show up any minute, guns drawn and warrants in hand; patients are afraid they may be arrested or that another sweep would force the clubs to close for good.

Few dispensary operators are willing to speak publicly, even though the names, addresses and telephone numbers of their organizations are easily found on the Internet. Instead, they lie low and hope for the best.

“There's a lot of trepidation out there,” said Dale Gieringer of California NORML, a San Francisco group working to reform marijuana laws. “A lot of the patients are concerned and wondering how long the clubs are going to last down there.”

Law enforcement officers converged on most of the county's medical marijuana dispensaries Dec. 12, confiscating about 50 pounds of marijuana and related products, computers, patient records and other materials.

The government insisted the records would remain confidential and legitimate patients would not be prosecuted.

The sweep was organized by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, with assistance from county sheriff's deputies and San Diego and other local police agencies after six months of surveillance and investigation.

Although dispensaries are legal under California law, the federal government does not recognize medicinal benefits of marijuana, which remains illegal under national drug laws.

The conflicting laws have left patients, police and local officials in a lurch for the past 10 years.

San Diego County supervisors voted to sue the state over the legality of its marijuana laws, a move that prompted the American Civil Liberties Union and other advocacy groups to petition the court to intervene in the case. Activists launched a bid to impose term limits on county supervisors.

The U.S. Attorney's Office did not return telephone calls seeking comment last week. The investigation remains active, a DEA spokesman said.

“We're being diligent in the evidence that we're collecting,” Special Agent Misha Piastro said. “The proliferation of the dispensaries does concern us.”

Damon Mosler, who runs the narcotics unit of the District Attorney's Office, said he expected criminal charges would be filed against some dispensary operators as soon as next month.

Mosler said he does not know whether cases would be presented in state court, where the permissive medical-marijuana laws apply, or in federal court, which does not allow any medical-necessity defense.

“They're using federal resources for the investigation, but it will be both agencies making the decision at the same time,” he said.

Reaction to the raids, one of the largest medical-marijuana sweeps ever conducted by the DEA, has varied dramatically among dispensary operators.

Some shops closed altogether. One changed its name and removed a colorful sign above its North Park storefront. Another expanded into plush new office space. At least 10 new operations opened, according to California NORML, which posts the services on its Web site.

Steph Sherer of Americans for Safe Access, an Oakland group that promotes legal access to medical marijuana, said the rising number of dispensaries would prompt more cities to pass ordinances that accommodate the clubs.

“The patient community is standing up for itself,” said Sherer, whose organization is among those planning to fight the county's lawsuit against the state. “Voters of California are saying, 'This is not what we think the federal government should be doing.' ”

Jon Sullivan, who closed his local dispensaries after the December raids, said San Diego is the nation's main battleground pitting federal drug laws against states' rights to permit medical marijuana.

Sullivan said he expects to be arrested at some point despite the allowances under California law but looks forward to the case being put before a jury.

"We need to end this 10-year battle. It's just plain wrong," Sullivan said. "They gave us rules, we followed the rules and they come in and steal all our stuff."

Prosecutor Mosler said resolving the conflict between state and federal law, or at least adopting guidelines each side could agreed to, would benefit patients and law enforcement officials.

People "need to get their elected officials to create some more certainties," he said. "That is the best route to have access to medicine."

Bush Budget Faulted In Drug-war Setback (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

A Bush administration decision to divert money for Colombian drug interdiction and eradication programs to the war on terrorism has opened up the southern U.S. border to a new flood of heroin and cocaine, say senior congressional and Colombian officials.

Some members of Congress, angry that appeals by Colombian President Alvaro Uribe for help in rebuilding his depleted and aging fleet of surveillance and interdiction aircraft have been ignored, plan to bypass the White House by dipping into a $72.4 billion supplemental appropriation for the war on terrorism to fund $99.4 million in military and police aid to Colombia.

An amendment to the pending emergency supplemental bill likely will be offered by Republican Reps. Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, chairman of the House International Relations Committee, and Dan Burton of Indiana, a member of the House Government Reform Committee. It would pay for three DC-3 marine patrol aircraft for the Colombian navy and two UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters and 10 Huey II helicopters for the Colombian national police.

Colombia is the source for about 90 percent of the cocaine that ends up each year in the U.S., along with a majority of the heroin.

"After seven years of work on anti-narcotics efforts in the Andean region, we are now seeing the fruits of our labors in the drug war in Colombia and making great progress with our Colombian security partners in preventing drugs from reaching the United States," Mr. Hyde said in a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Colombian President Alvaro Uribe often finds himself standing alone with us in our common goals of a democratic, secure and drug-and-terrorism-free Andean region. We must continue our support for him," he said. "We cannot assume we need do no more in order to continue the success we have been seeing."

Colombian officials said escalating violence along the U.S.-Mexico border, called "overwhelming" last week by Texas sheriffs during a Senate hearing, was being fueled by the increase in drugs from Colombia and the illicit profits they generate.

"These smugglers have the latest equipment, most expensive weapons and they are more willing to shoot it out with us and our U.S. counterparts," one Colombian official said. "We're asking the U.S. for help, and by helping us, you help yourself."

The officials said that because of aircraft and equipment shortages, if Colombian smugglers can get their product to the coast -- either the Pacific Ocean on the south or the Caribbean in the north -- there is a 65 percent probability it will find its way through Mexico and into the U.S.

Using airplanes, cruise vessels, freighters, and fishing and patrol boats, they said, the smugglers elude a rapidly thinning line of Colombian ships and aircraft, handing off their drugs to Mexican dealers for shipment into this country.

In the past three years, said a senior congressional aide, homeland security demands in the United States have resulted in a 70 percent reduction in the aircraft available to the Colombian and U.S. navies for interdiction efforts. Many of the surveillance planes were grounded because of wing-structure problems and another 22 aircraft, including spray planes and helicopters, were either shot down by smugglers or crashed.

In November, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) questioned the government's ability to sustain interdiction operations in the transit zone, saying the availability of aircraft and other key assets was declining. A report said interdiction flight hours in the transit zone declined from 6,860 in 2000 to 6,500 in 2002, but dropped more rapidly to 2,940 hours in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0016391

For two years, Mr. Uribe has asked the administration for funds to replace spray planes and for assistance in rebuilding his military and police in the war against narcoterrorists, which last year claimed more than 250 Colombian police officers. His requests were not included in the 2006 foreign aid funding bill and do not appear in the administration's 2007 aid request.

DEA Nets Meth 'superlab' (UPI/ WT)

United Press International, March 6, 2006

ATLANTA, March 6 (UPI) -- U.S. federal drug agents said they have broken up a methamphetamine "superlab" in Smyrna, Ga., and confiscated more than 12 pounds of the drug.

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency said they arrested three men -- all illegal aliens from Mexico -- and that on Monday two of the defendants pleaded guilty to charges that include manufacturing methamphetamine. The third man is to go on trial this month.

A release Monday from the DEA said the raid on a house in a residential neighborhood of Smyrna, near Atlanta, resulted in them finding 12.4 pounds of methamphetamine in the house and another pound in a nearby vehicle. In addition they said 24 large trash bags were found filled with emptied pseudoephedrine tablet boxes and contained holding 35 pounds of pure d-psuedophredrine hydrochloride, key ingredients in the production of methamphetamines.

U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said: "The dismantling of this superlab represents a significant blow to methamphetamine traffickers in George. At the same time, the discovery of such a large lab here in Atlanta reveals the growing threat that methamphetamine poses to our citizens."

ATF Investigating Pompano Warehouse Fire (MH)

By Ashley Fantz

The Miami Herald, March 7, 2006

An investigative team from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms will begin examining what's left of a Pompano Beach warehouse gutted by an unrelenting inferno that began at 8 p.m. Friday and raged throughout the night.

Officials who tried to stamp out the blaze at Pallet Consultant Corp. on Southwest 12th Avenue reported flames reaching 100 feet into the air. The blaze could be seen two miles away.

Sandra King, spokeswoman for the Pompano Beach Fire-Rescue, said one of the 120 firefighters from North Lauderdale, Fort Lauderdale, Lighthouse Point, Margate, and Broward Fire-Rescue was injured when a loaded water hose slammed into his stomach. He was treated and released Friday from North Ridge Medical Center in Fort Lauderdale.

"It was huge," King said. ``We had six cities pitching in to help us."

King said ATF and explosive experts will help discern the cause of the blaze because propane tanks inside hundreds of pallets exploded. Damage is estimated to be $10 million to three businesses within the six-acre property.

IMMIGRATION:

Uncommon Weapon In Immigration Fight (LAT)

An Idaho County Tries A Racketeering Law Against Employers Who Hire Illegal Workers. By Nicole Gaoue

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

CALDWELL, Idaho — Like many communities, this fast-growing agricultural pocket of southwestern Idaho is paying a high tab for illegal immigration.

When an illegal worker gave birth to a premature baby, Canyon County wound up with a $174,000 hospital bill. County officials say the jail spent thousands to house another illegal immigrant at a motel, after his tuberculosis threatened to infect fellow inmates.

But where others have merely chafed at paying costs like these, officials in Canyon County are trying a novel approach: The all-Republican county commission has filed a racketeering lawsuit against four big businesses in the area, charging that they deliberately hire illegal workers.

DOJ_NMG_0016392

The spectacle of the county's political leaders taking its businesses to court has touched off a bitter local debate. But it has also put Canyon County, a largely Republican community of about 160,000, at the forefront of an emerging national effort to use racketeering laws to crack down on illegal immigration by seeking damages from employers.

So far, a handful of workers and businesses around the country have filed civil lawsuits under the RICO statute, known formally as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. The targets are companies that, the lawsuits say, have unfairly used illegal labor to cut wage levels or prices.

In Washington state, workers who filed a civil suit against their employer, a fruit company, won a $1.3-million settlement in January. The Supreme Court has agreed to hear another of the immigration-related RICO cases this year.

But Canyon County is the first municipality to bring a suit of this kind against employers. The lawsuit was dismissed by a federal district court but has been appealed to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. If it succeeds, it could touch off similar actions, says the county's lawyer, Howard Foster.

"There are other county officials who are looking at this, who have called me," said Foster, an advocate of tougher immigration controls, who is behind most of the other RICO lawsuits.

In Canyon County, where working farms sit cheek-by-jowl against new residential developments, locals have traditionally welcomed the Latino immigrants who moved in seasonally to take agricultural jobs. But since the early 1990s, many immigrants have been finding year-round work in other industries, leaving some long-time residents struggling to adjust to permanent neighbors with different customs.

Even though the Senate aims to pass immigration legislation by early next month and the House has already produced an enforcement-only bill, people here are angry that the federal government has not done more to stop the influx.

Yet even some who want an immigration crackdown say the county commissioners stepped over the line when they went to court against two local seed companies, a meatpacker and large cheese-making operation.

"I think they should shut down the border and end services" to illegal immigrants, said Joel Bettancourt, a grocery store owner in Caldwell, Idaho, who described himself as Mexican American. "But to do the RICO Act — that's too far. Who knows who they're going to go after next?"

But some people say they are so fed up with changes they attribute to immigration — increasing gang violence, competition for manual labor jobs, and more services devoted to immigrants — that they hope the lawsuit succeeds. Letters to the local paper appear to be running slightly in favor of the commissioners.

"We have young guys, white and Hispanic, in here legally who want [construction] jobs — but companies give them to people who they can pay half the going wage," said Joyce Yelm, who grew up pulling beets alongside migrant farm laborers but has hardened after watching her old neighborhood become, in her words, a largely Spanish-speaking "shanty town."

Much of the controversy also centers on the man who has been the primary force behind the lawsuit — County Commissioner Robert Vasquez. A former radio commentator and veteran who was wounded in Vietnam, Vasquez, 57, has long been a provocative force in the immigration debate.

The grandson of legal Mexican immigrants, Vasquez was elected to the county commission in 2002 and soon after sent the Mexican government a $2-million bill for services he said his county had provided to illegal immigrants. He has asked Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne to declare the county a disaster area because of illegal immigration and to grant it emergency funds. And he has proposed unsuccessful state legislation that would have denied welfare payments to illegal immigrants.

"For every dollar for an illegal alien, it's one less dollar in my constituents' pocket," said Vasquez, who is running for Congress. In 2005, Vasquez heard about Howard Foster.

The Chicago lawyer has largely spearheaded the use of RICO statutes as a tool against illegal immigration. A member of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group that advocates immigration restrictions, Foster took note when Congress toughened immigration laws in 1996 and amended the RICO statute to make knowing employment of illegal immigrants a violation.

"For the first time ever in the country, it became possible for a person to bring a private lawsuit against an employer … for violating immigration laws," Foster said.

DOJ_NMG_0016393

RICO targets a person or group for crimes committed systematically as part of an ongoing enterprise. It carries tough criminal penalties. Its civil component, which the immigration suits fall under, allows plaintiffs to sue for triple damages.

In four RICO suits since 1998, Foster has alleged that companies have knowingly and repeatedly conspired with labor contractors over a period of years to hire illegal immigrants.

His first case, in 2000, was on behalf of a Connecticut cleaning company that sued a competitor for hiring illegal immigrants. That case settled.

His other cases have been on behalf of employees, alleging that companies have kept wages low by hiring illegal workers. In 2001, he sued the Washington state fruit company, leading to the $1.3-million settlement. A suit he brought against Tyson Foods Inc. is scheduled to be heard next year.

In 2004, he filed suit against Mohawk Industries Inc., based in Calhoun, Ga., the country's second largest carpet maker. That case will be heard by the Supreme Court in April, potentially shaping the use of RICO as a weapon in the immigration wars.

Other lawyers besides Foster are also trying the RICO strategy. In 2003, the RICO statute was used to file suit on behalf of contract janitors against Wal-Mart Stores Inc. A court dismissed the RICO portion of the case, but that is now under appeal.

In Canyon County, after speaking with Foster, Vasquez and the two other commissioners filed suit in July, charging that Syngenta Seeds Inc., a Swiss company, and Harris Moran Seed Co., of Hayward, Calif., knowingly hired illegal immigrants for many years through a local farm labor contractor, Roberto Corral. The suit alleges that the seed companies knew most of Corral's recruits were illegal immigrants, but they used the contractor as a "front company" to distance themselves from their criminal activity.

"Many of these illegal immigrants have committed crimes resulting in criminal justice expenses to the county. Others have become public charges by seeking medical services, which the county has had to pay," the lawsuit states. It does not detail what those costs have been.

The lawsuit made similar claims against meatpacker Swift & Co., of Greeley, Colo., and Sorrento Lactalis Inc., a cheese company based in Buffalo, N.Y.

In December, a federal district court in Idaho dismissed the case on a legal principle that prohibits municipalities from suing to recoup the cost of services they provide in the normal course of business. The case is now before the 9th Circuit, where Foster successfully settled his case against the Washington fruit company.

A Syngenta representative dismissed the lawsuit as "baseless." At Swift, spokesman Sean McHugh said: "We believe the suit is without merit." Spokesmen for Sorrento Lactalis and Harris Moran declined to comment, citing the ongoing lawsuit.

Thomas G. Walker, a lawyer for the labor contractor Corral, said his client "didn't do anything wrong. He fulfills all of the requirements under the immigration statutes."

About a month after the suit was filed, Swift told its 408 Canyon County workers that the local facility, in operation since 1916, would be shut down. It said the closure was due to restrictions on Canadian beef imports. But many residents see the lawsuit as the last straw for the company.

"It's a horrible lawsuit," said Maurice Clements, a former state legislator and farmer. "Swift closed their plant, the other three companies — God, I hope they don't leave. They provide a huge market for farmers in this area."

The companies named in the suit generate almost $700,000 a year in tax revenue for the county and pay millions to local growers, according to the Canyon County Farm Bureau.

Syngenta has been in Idaho for 90 years and produces one-third of the world's sweet corn seed there. "Those four companies are a huge part of our agricultural base and therefore our economic base," said Terri Ottens, the farm bureau's executive secretary.

The commissioners counter by citing the costs of illegal immigration. Idaho law mandates that the county cover hospital fees for anyone who has lived there for more than six months and is unable to pay. That leads to bills such as the $1.25-million tab to care for an illegal immigrant who was left a quadriplegic because of a car accident.

Vasquez said also that a recently completed welfare analysis showed that from 1999 to 2005, claims by illegal immigrants totaled $1.2 million.

DOJ_NMG_0016394

But Ottens, of the farm bureau, is skeptical of the commissioners' claims. Her group says much of the cost of jailing illegal immigrants is often reimbursed by the state.

"We found the amount of money the county pays out is minimal compared to what these companies [being sued] pay in property tax," Ottens said.

Yet many residents are deeply grateful to Vasquez for taking a stand against illegal immigration.

Construction company owner Brad Tracy, who says he refuses to hire under the table, said it was almost impossible to compete against businesses that use illegal labor.

"I've got to pay workman's comp, health insurance, fuel costs, property tax," he said. "Then I've got to compete against people who say they have no employees, just contract labor at $10 an hour."

*

(BEGIN TEXT OF INFOBOX)

Canyon County snapshot

The issue of how to deal with illegal immigrants is taking an unusual path in Canyon County, Idaho, a predominantly white area with a substantial Latino population:

Canyon County, Idaho
Population: 160,540
Growth, 2000-05: 22%
--
Race/Ethnicity
White: 76%
Latino: 20%
All other: 4%
--
Age Median age: 31
--
Education Median household income: $40,338
--
Occupation
Blue collar: 31%
White collar: 50
Service/farm: 19
--
Income by household*
White: $36,772
Black: 46,964
Asian: 37,273
Latino: 30,800
--
Place of birth
United States: 91%
Foreign: 9
--
Foreign-born home
Latin America: 83%
Europe: 8%
Asia: 6%

DOJ_NMG_0016395

All other: 3%

Note: Unless otherwise stated, all data are 2005 estimates

* Median by race/ethnicity of head of household, 2000

 2000 census data

Sources: U.S. Census Bureau, Claritas Inc.

Specter's Proposal Seeks Compromise On Immigration Reform (BSH)

By Dave Montgomery

Biloxi Sun Herald, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate's main immigration bill would enable most illegal immigrants now in the United States to remain indefinitely as long as they stay employed, but it wouldn't put them on a glide path to U.S. citizenship.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will begin debating the measure Wednesday under a three-week timetable aimed at producing a final version for the full Senate by March 27.

Sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, the legislation is designed to strike a middle course between a bill passed by the House of Representatives calling for tougher immigration enforcement and pro-immigration advocates who call for permanent legal status - and eventual citizenship - for the estimated 11 million aliens now in the country illegally.

President Bush, defying objections from conservatives, has called for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws and the creation of a temporary guest-worker program to ensure a steady source of labor for U.S. business. Under Bush's plan, qualified workers, including residents now here illegally, could stay in jobs for up to six years, then would be required to return home.

Senate Judiciary Committee staff members who explained key provisions of Specter's bill on Monday said that the measure would create a "gold card" program for illegal immigrants who entered the United States before Jan. 4, 2004. It also would create a guest-worker program to bring in more foreign laborers.

Applicants for the gold card would undergo a background check by the Department of Homeland Security, then be eligible for two-year work visas that could be renewed indefinitely, committee aides said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging their boss. The workers wouldn't participate in the Social Security system but would contribute to future savings through worker investment accounts.

One top committee staffer described the "gold-card" proposal as "a reasonable compromise" in dealing with illegal immigrants, many of whom have lived in the country for decades. The undesirable alternative, he said, would be an unworkable massive roundup, which administration officials have said would cost billions of dollars.

Unlike other proposals, Specter's bill wouldn't require the immigrants to pay a fine to step forward, aides said. They also said that the proposal wasn't a form of amnesty since it wouldn't offer an automatic track toward citizenship. However, they noted that the measure wouldn't preclude applicants from eventual citizenship.

Under the separate guest-worker program, which would be based on U.S. labor needs, foreign applicants could work for three years, then could apply to work for another three years before returning home. They'd be required to remain in their home country for a year before reapplying.

Advocates on both sides of the immigration debate criticized Specter's proposal as an inadequate attempt to placate opposing groups.

"Some people are going to say it's amnesty, and others are going to say it creates a second-class caste of workers," said Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute, a New York-based think tank that leans right. "It's a non-starter for both sides."

Tensions between opposing groups escalated on the eve of the committee's deliberations, underscoring the passions surrounding the immigration issue. The National Capital Immigration Coalition announced plans for a Capitol Hill rally on Tuesday afternoon to demand eventual citizenship for illegal immigrants.

Specter's 305-page bill included elements from two other major bills, one co-sponsored by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., the other by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

DOJ_NMG_0016396

Many pro-immigrant groups, as well as a number of business organizations, have lined up behind McCain-Kennedy, which has a guest-worker program that would put undocumented residents on a path to eventual citizenship.

The Cornyn-Kyl bill also creates a guest-worker program, but illegal aliens would first be required to return to their home countries following a five-year grace period before they could participate.

Local Officials Seek Help From U.S. On Immigration (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — Gather 100 local officials from 30 states — Democrats and Republicans from big states and little ones — and there are probably few issues on which all will agree. But President Bush's record on illegal immigration apparently is one.

"It is a failure," said Mark D. Boughton, speaking on Monday at a gathering of those officials here. Mr. Boughton, the mayor of Danbury, Conn., created a stir last year when he sought, unsuccessfully, to have State Police troopers deputized as immigration control agents.

"A terrible hardship for my taxpayers," said Gloria D. Whisenhunt, chairwoman of the Forsyth County board of commissioners, in Winston-Salem, N.C. The schools there are crammed with the children of illegal immigrants, she said.

"Enough is enough," said Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive and co-organizer of the event. Mr. Levy became a sort of guiding light among local officials around the country after he decided last summer to help shut down boarding houses in Farmingville, N.Y., where hundreds of illegal immigrants lived in crowded conditions.

"The federal government has to adopt a sane immigration policy," Mr. Levy said.

The gathering, organized and convened here under the banner of the Coalition of Mayors and County Executives for Immigration Reform, called for border security and, most urgently, reimbursement to localities for the cost of dealing with a problem its members say the federal government has ignored.

"In recent polls, 88 percent of the people said that illegal immigration is a serious or 'somewhat serious' problem," Mr. Levy said. "Yet there just seems to be a disconnect between that and what the Congress and the media think."

In the contentious national debate over what is called immigration reform, there are a half-dozen factions at odds, factions representing the interests of business, of labor, of immigrant advocates and opponents, of Republican presidential hopefuls and Democratic partisans.

For good measure, because most illegal immigrants are Hispanic, the issue is loaded with racial and ethnic overtones, a reality that Mr. Levy had to face last summer when immigrant advocates in Suffolk County labeled his boarding house sweeps as racist.

"But this group has nothing to do with racism or bigotry," said Robert Vasquez, a county commissioner from Canyon County, Idaho. "We are here because we are elected United States officials, and it's our duty to uphold the laws."

Major bills under review in the House and Senate promote an array of conflicting responses to the question of how to define the issue, and how to deal with the reality of 11 million illegal aliens in the United States. Among the suggested solutions are amnesty, deportation, temporary worker status, permanent guest work status and an impermeable wall at the Mexican border.

But Monday's assembly of local officials introduced a new faction into the fray. This one, its members say, is composed of officials who must deal every day with the realities of illegal immigration as they intersect with taxpayers.

The officials raised many questions for the federal government. Who pays for the shuttering of boarding houses like those in Farmingville? Who pays for the extra classroom space, the unreimbursed cost of medical care, the cost of police and fire protection for the additional human lives? Where will they be housed?

The White House did not ignore the meeting, but at the last minute downgraded the rank of its representative. In place of Ruben Barrales, a deputy assistant to the president and White House director of intergovernmental affairs, who was originally scheduled to attend, the White House sent a liaison to city officials, Toby Burke.

DOJ_NMG_0016397

Mr. Burke, who listened respectfully, at one point said the president was seeking "a comprehensive, not a piecemeal, solution" to the problem of illegal immigration. He said the president's proposal to create guest worker status for some or all illegal aliens would not constitute an amnesty.

Then, while the officials vented for two hours with what seemed like the relief of troubled individuals finding their first support group, Mr. Burke said little else.

TAX:

Federal Prosecutors Sue Nevada Tax Preparers For Fraud (AP)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 7, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The U.S. Justice Department filed suit today to stop four people from operating what it claims is a tax fraud scheme.

The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas says the scheme cost the government at least 31 million dollars.

The government accuses the Las Vegas-based group of funneling income from clients through trusts in the Caribbean to help them avoid paying taxes.

It says the group returned the money through phony gifts or loans to the customers, their friends or family members.

The government names Reinhold Sommerstedt and Daniel Young of Las Vegas; Lynn Lakers, a Boulder City tax-return preparer; and Stephen Nestor, a former Internal Revenue Service officer, in the suit.

Justice Wants 3 Hillsdale Residents To Stop Preparing Returns (AP)

By JAMES PRICHARD, The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. (AP) — The U.S. Department of Justice has asked a federal court to prohibit three Hillsdale residents from preparing federal income tax returns for others, claiming the trio has cost the Treasury more than $25 million.

The government filed a complaint Monday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids against Joyce M. Stone, Charles J. Freed and Julie Shaffer.

Stone is Freed's mother, and together they own and operate an unincorporated tax-preparation business from their home, the department said Monday. The business also is a defendant in the lawsuit.

The complaint alleges that the defendants prepared customers' returns claiming improper deductions, including some for fictitious or inflated charitable contributions and employee expenses.

Contacted Monday at their homes, all three denied any wrongdoing. Stone said she had been contacted by her lawyer about some questions involving some of her returns but believed the matter had been resolved.

"I thought we got that straightened out," she said.

Shaffer, a friend of Stone, said she was unaware of the complaint until a reporter told her about it.

"This is news to me," she said.

The government said Stone and Freed, acting either individually or through their business, prepared income tax returns for about 1,000 clients. Shaffer prepared returns for more than 1,000 clients and also assisted in the e-filing of returns prepared by Stone or Freed.

The returns that Stone, Freed or Shaffer prepared for the 2000 through 2003 tax years may have cost the U.S. Treasury more than $25 million, based on projections made from 115 audited returns, according to the complaint.

The government also sought an order directing the defendants to provide prosecutors with their customers' names, telephone and Social Security numbers, and mailing and e-mail addresses.

"The Justice Department is working vigorously to stop the preparation and filing of the false or fraudulent returns that unfairly shift the tax burden to honest American taxpayers," Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Tax Division, said in a written statement.

DOJ_NMG_0016398

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Proposes Law To Give The President Line-Item Veto Power (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Seeking to reassert his party's scuffed reputation for fiscal conservatism, President Bush yesterday proposed a law giving him authority to veto individual items in legislation as a way to curb fast-growing federal spending.

Bush, who has never exercised his veto power in more than five years as president, said the line-item veto would give him authority to clamp down on special-interest items, known on Capitol Hill as earmarks, increasingly slipped into legislation to benefit the home districts of lawmakers.

"Too many bills passed by Congress include unnecessary spending," Bush said at a White House ceremony to swear in Edward Lazear as chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. "These earmarks reflect special interests instead of the people's interests."

The proposal, scheduled to be introduced today by Republican Sens. Bill Frist (Tenn.), John McCain (Ariz.) and Mitch McConnell (Ky.), would allow the president to identify items he wants to strike from larger legislation and return the bill to Congress, which would have 10 days to vote on the proposed cuts.

Congress passed legislation authorizing the line-item veto in 1996, but the Supreme Court struck it down as an unconstitutional abridgement of the separation of powers shortly after it was enacted by President Bill Clinton. By requiring that the cuts made by the president be approved by Congress, the White House believes it will avoid any constitutional problems with the new legislation.

"Congress gave the president a line-item veto in 1996, but because of problems with the way the law was written, the Supreme Court struck it down," Bush said. "That should not be the end of the story."

Bush has asked for the line-item veto in years past as part of his overall budget requests. But he has never before offered specific legislation seeking the authority. White House aides said the proposal is timely because of growing outrage over the widening budget deficit and the growth of legislative earmarks, which has threatened to undermine the image of Republicans as proponents of small government. Some conservatives said Bush's own credibility on the issue is open to question.

"Under President Bush, the government has expanded by 45 percent in five years," said Brian Riedl, a federal budget analyst with the conservative Heritage Foundation. While he praised the line-item veto as a good "common-sense" tool, Riedl said that "there is no substitute for vetoing expensive spending bills."

Since the Republicans took control of Congress in 1994, the number of home-district earmarks has jumped from 4,155 valued at about $29 billion in 1994 to 14,211 worth nearly $53 billion 10 years later, according to the Congressional Research Service. Meanwhile, the Bush administration has forecast a record budget deficit for 2007 of $439 billion.

"Now seems like a very good time to move," Joshua B. Bolten, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, said of the line-item veto proposal. Bolten said the measure gives "the president a scalpel to reduce unnecessary or wasteful spending," while creating a mechanism to increase public and legislative scrutiny of earmarks.

At first blush, Bush's proposal is being received with bipartisan approval in Congress. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who proposed similar legislation during his 2004 presidential campaign, called the measure overdue. He introduced his own version of the measure yesterday, which his office said appears to be no different from Bush's proposal.

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto," he said.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) also praised the bill. "I have always supported giving the president the authority to exercise the line-item veto as a means to help rein in wasteful spending," he said.

Bush Seeks To Slim Down 'Pork' Projects (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016399

Seeking new power to weed hometown projects from legislation passed by Congress, President Bush on Monday asked lawmakers to give him a modified version of the line-item veto struck down by the Supreme Court eight years ago.

Like presidents dating back to Ulysses S. Grant, Bush wants the power to strike individual items from a bill without having to veto the entire measure.

President Clinton got that wish in 1996, when the new Republican majority in the House pushed through a line-item veto law that allowed him to kill individual spending projects and special-interest tax breaks.

Two years later, the Supreme Court declared the law — one of the key planks of the House GOP's "Contract With America" — unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress.

Bush is now pressing for a modified, weaker version. Instead of being able to strike items from bills, he would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote. Present law permits Congress to ignore these proposed rescissions, but under the Bush proposal lawmakers would have to vote on them. If majorities in both the House and the Senate agreed with the president, the cuts would take effect.

"Forty-three governors have this line-item veto in their states," Bush said. "Now it's time to bring this important tool of fiscal discipline to Washington, D.C."

Bush has not vetoed any legislation during five years in office, but he said the modified line-item proposal would help "reduce wasteful spending, reduce the budget deficit and ensure that taxpayer dollars are spent wisely."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., issued statements supporting Bush, as did several conservative lawmakers.

And Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who promoted a similar approach in his presidential campaign against Bush in 2004, immediately jumped on board.

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto," Kerry said. "I'm going to introduce this legislation, Congress should immediately pass it, and I want to see President Bush use this veto pen to get tough on wasteful spending."

"Giving the president line-item veto authority is essential to enforcing the budget and restoring fiscal sanity in Washington," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas.

The proposal may be helped along by the drive on Capitol Hill for so-called "earmark reform."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he was opposed to the idea even though he supported a similar plan in 1995 when offered as a weaker alternative to the GOP version.

The earlier version of the line-item veto was used by Clinton in 1997 against about 80 parochial projects and a handful of special-interest tax breaks. Lawmakers' enthusiasm for the earlier veto power waned sharply, leading lawmakers like Sen. Robert Bennett (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah, to change their minds and oppose the idea.

Congress, by a huge margin, overturned Clinton's vetoes of 38 military construction projects.

Bush's version was actually pushed by Democrats in the 1990s — including Sen. Robert C. Byrd (news, bio, voting record) of West Virginia, who filed suit against the 1996 law.

Still, a proposal similar to Bush's veto plan was actually voted down by the House two years ago on a 237-174 vote, with three out of four Democrats voting "nay." Some 89 Republicans, including then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., also opposed the measure.

Lawmakers opposed to the line-item veto idea say that Congress should carefully guard its power of the purse and that presidents could use the expanded power against their political enemies.

Supporters say the practice of larding legislation with hometown projects and special-interest tax breaks has gotten out of control. Too often, a president has to accept such "pork" as the price of adopting legislation that he has little choice but to sign.

___

On the Net:

The White House: http://www.whitehouse.gov

House Conservatives Prepare Austere Alternative Budget (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0016400

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — With Congress heading into a politically perilous budget season, influential House conservatives plan this week to propose an austere alternative spending plan that would pare more than $650 billion over five years, balance the budget and drastically shrink three cabinet agencies.

The legislation, part of a push by some Republicans to re-establish themselves as champions of fiscal restraint, was taking shape as President Bush struck a similar theme on Monday by asking Congress to grant him line-item veto power to eliminate federal spending that he might judge wasteful.

"We can't be all things to all people when it comes to spending the taxpayers' money," Mr. Bush said at a ceremony installing a new chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

But House conservative leaders would go far beyond the president's own budget proposal, illustrating the difficulty the White House and the Republican leadership have had in persuading the caucus to speak with one voice on the matter.

Senior aides say the conservatives' plan would wring about $350 billion from Medicare, Medicaid and other social programs and save $300 billion partly through a major reorganization of the Education, Commerce and Energy Departments.

"We are putting our money where our mouth is," said one of the officials, who would discuss the proposal only without being identified because it was still being prepared for release Wednesday by leaders of the Republican Study Committee.

The officials said it was particularly important for conservatives to lay down a marker because the Senate is facing an imminent vote on whether to increase the statutory debt limit, which will remind the public of the increasing deficits under the Bush administration.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow warned Congress on Monday that the federal government risked default without an increase in the debt limit and that the Republican-controlled Congress would soon be forced to address that issue.

Conservatives contend that voters are disillusioned with Republicans over spending and that without a bold statement, the party faces potential losses in November. But some moderate Republicans are anxious about additional spending reductions, particularly after Congress enacted nearly $40 billion in cuts last year after a difficult fight.

The new budget proposal is certain to be assailed by Democrats who accuse Republicans of forging ahead with tax cuts that benefit the affluent and add to the deficit while reducing support for those most in need.

"This president will have piled up more debt than all of the presidents preceding him," Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the senior Democrat on the Budget Committee, said Monday as he joined other Democrats in accusing Republicans of shortchanging domestic security.

The budget debate could be the first big challenge for Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, who won his position last month with help from House conservatives who will now be looking to him to help hold down spending.

Under the proposal, expected to be introduced by Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, and Representative Jeb Hensarling, Republican of Texas, military spending would continue to rise, administration tax cuts would be protected and Social Security would be spared. But many other programs and foreign aid would be greatly scaled back.

The authors of the proposal describe it as a sequel to the Contract With America, which helped catapult Republicans to power in 1994. An outline of the plan says the proposals require "tough choices, but members have expressed a serious desire to do the hard things to save America."

Mr. Bush's push for the line-item veto could benefit from the current scrutiny over the growing practice by lawmakers of inserting spending for pet projects into legislation — a practice that has figured into continuing corruption scandals.

Congress gave President Bill Clinton line-item veto authority in 1996, but the Supreme Court overturned the law, saying it violated the Constitution by giving the president the power to amend legislation. Under the new proposal, the president would be able to identify objectionable projects and then send them back to Capitol Hill for an up-or-down vote without requiring a veto of the entire bill.

Though members of Congress are typically reluctant to cede too much power over spending to the executive branch, several lawmakers gave initial expressions of support, including House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, and Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts.

DOJ_NMG_0016401

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much," Mr. Kerry said, "but I fully support giving him the line-item veto."

But Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, had an opposite view, calling the line-item veto "old hat."

"I don't think this Congress is ready for line-item veto," Mr. Reid said, adding, "I just think it's an effort by President Bush to divert attention from real issues this country has."

Bush Calls For Line-item Veto (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

President Bush yesterday demanded that Congress give him a line-item veto power and sent a bill to Capitol Hill that he said satisfies the constitutional concerns that sunk the last version a decade ago.

Wading into the congressional spending debate, Mr. Bush took a hard line on the practice of earmarks, which critics call pork-barrel spending, and promised to be the sheriff who will enforce discipline.

"Too many bills passed by Congress include unnecessary spending," Mr. Bush said.

"Today, I'm sending Congress legislation that will meet [constitutional] standards and give me the authority to strip special spending and earmarks out of a bill, and then send them back to Congress for an up-or-down vote," he said.

The move thrilled conservative Republicans on Capitol Hill, but Democratic leaders said Mr. Bush was ducking responsibility for budget deficits.

"If the president were really serious about the deficit, he would begin by submitting a balanced budget," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "Instead, President Bush has presided over the largest fiscal turnaround in our nation's history, turning a projected $5.6 trillion surplus to a deficit of $3.3 trillion."

White House officials said Mr. Bush, who has never vetoed a bill, needs a more finely tuned scalpel to deal with wasteful spending.

The proposal is not technically a "veto" under the Constitution, because it doesn't require a two-thirds vote to overturn it.

Under Mr. Bush's plan, the president could cull items from a bill and send the cut items back in a rescission package to Congress, which would have 10 days to vote on the whole package. The president could eliminate targeted tax cuts as well as spending.

"To see him putting the full weight of his office behind a specific proposal to create a constitutional line-item veto is thrilling to those of us who know when it comes to federal spending, it's not so much bad people as bad process," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and chairman of the Republican Study Committee, the conservative caucus in the House.

Mr. Pence said Mr. Bush would use the line-item veto because the "stakes are so much lower" in targeting individual spending than blocking an entire bill passed by a Republican Congress.

"There is no single reform that would do more to put our fiscal house in order than the line-item veto. The problem with federal spending is no one's in charge, so everyone is," he said.

House Republican leaders said they support the concept, and Senate Republican leaders went further. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, is sponsoring the Senate version of the bill, along with Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration thinks the time is ripe, given the interest on spending cuts on Capitol Hill. He said the fight against wasteful spending is bipartisan, so he predicted the line-item veto proposal would attract bipartisan support.

Although Mrs. Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, have opposed line-item authority, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat and Mr. Bush's opponent in the 2004 election, said he supports the concept and will introduce his own proposal.

Congress passed a line-item veto in 1996, but in 1998, the Supreme Court ruled 6-3 that it was unconstitutional because it gave the president the power to amend a law after it had been passed by Congress. The majority ruled that sort of change must come through constitutional amendment, not law.

DOJ_NMG_0016402

Under that system, the president had five days after he signed a bill to make line-item cuts. Congress could only reinstate the cuts by passing a separate bill, subject to a regular presidential veto and requiring a two-thirds vote of each chamber to overturn it.

Bush administration officials said their version doesn't violate the Constitution because it doesn't give the president unilateral authority. Instead, it sets up a process to push Congress to act on his recommendations.

Bush Asks Congress For "Line-item Veto" Power (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, March 6, 2006

President George W. Bush, who has never vetoed a spending bill, asked the U.S. Congress on Monday to give him a line-item veto that would allow him to propose canceling specific spending projects.

But Bush's proposal faces hurdles because an earlier version that Congress passed under former President Bill Clinton was rejected by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional.

Bush said the 1998 court decision "should not be the end of the story" and said his proposal was crafted in a way to satisfy the court's concerns.

"By passing this version of the line-item veto, the administration will work with the Congress to reduce wasteful spending, reduce the budget deficit and ensure that taxpayer dollars are spent wisely," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said he would introduce the legislation.

In striking down the Clinton-era line-item veto by a vote of 6-3, the Supreme Court said Congress was not authorized under the Constitution to hand the president that power.

But White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the Bush proposal would differ from that 1996 law, which allowed the president to pencil out specific spending items only after a bill was passed by Congress.

Under the Bush proposal, the president would identify areas in a spending bill he considered wasteful and then send the package back to Congress. Congress would have 10 days to hold an up or down vote on the package.

Democrats, who have criticized Bush's tax cuts as fiscally reckless, said the line-item veto was not a panacea for record budget deficits.

"The Bush administration has spent us into record deficits and piled mountains of debt onto our children," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California. But she added, "Budget experts agree that the line-item veto would do little to control deficits."

However, Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, who ran against Bush in the 2004, supported the line-item veto proposal, which mirrored one Kerry had previously proposed.

"Billions of dollars are being wasted on things like research to enhance the flavor of roasted peanuts and the infamous 'bridge to nowhere,'" Kerry said.

Announcing the line-item veto proposal at a swearing-in ceremony for Ed Lazear, his new chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, Bush said it would allow him to take aim at "special-interest spending."

'BRIDGE TO NOWHERE'

A major congressional lobbying scandal involving Jack Abramoff and the conviction of former California Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham on bribery charges have put a spotlight on pet projects that lawmakers often add to bills to please constituents in their home states.

Bush has been criticized by many conservatives for the surge in federal spending on his watch.

One example of a pet project critics often cite was a bridge proposal in Alaska ridiculed as the "Bridge to Nowhere" because it would have served a very small population.

The bridge was part of $287-billion transportation bill that many conservatives had urged Bush to veto. Bush signed the transportation bill and hailed it as a job-creating measure.

Spending on the Alaska bridge was later canceled, but the state received the money anyway in its general transportation funds.

DOJ_NMG_0016403

Republicans worry that big deficits could hurt them in this year's midterm election in which Democrats are seeking to regain control of both houses of Congress.

The Bush administration has forecast a fiscal 2006 budget deficit of $423 billion, an all-time high.

Bush Seeks To Restore 'pork-barrel Spending' Veto (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

The White House sought on Monday to restore the president's power to veto specific spending measures, a move that could sharply increase his authority to block items deemed wasteful, "pork barrel" spending.

President George W. Bush proposed legislation that would be designed "to meet Supreme Court standards" and would "give me the authority to strip special-interest spending and earmarks out of a bill and then send them back to Congress for an up-or-down vote".

The Republican-controlled Congress gave the White House a line-item veto in 1996, but it was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, with six of the nine justices ruling that it overstepped the president's constitutional authority.

Mr Bush's effort to restore the veto comes at a time of growing concern about Washington's apparent inability to restrain the growth in government spending. The Congressional Budget Office said last week that the budget deficit would rise to $371bn this year, from $318bn in 2005, in spite of record tax revenues.

While most of the spending growth has come from the military and homeland security, and from entitlement programmes such as Medicare and Social Security, it has been exacerbated by the growth of so-called "earmarks" – specific spending measures targeted at constituencies favoured by members of Congress.

Circumventing the Supreme Court's judgment on the line-item veto may not be easy. The 1996 bill allowed the president to strip out specific spending items and required a two-thirds majority vote by Congress to reinstate them.

Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the majority on the court, said Congress could alter the president's role in determining the final text of a law only through a constitutional amendment. The White House proposal would allow the president to split out spending items and send them back to the Congress.

Congress would be required to consider the spending within 10 days for an up or down vote. The president could be defeated by a simple majority rather than a two thirds majority required to defeat a normal veto. But the measure could not be filibustered.

Dan Coats, the former US senator who sponsored the line-item veto in the 1990s, said the law would need to be carefully drafted. "They will need to find some way that does not violate the separation of powers, unless they are just trying to score political points," he said.

Joshua Bolten, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, said that the legislation would be "air tight" in constitutional terms. The bill will be sponsored in the Senate by Bill Frist, majority leader, and John McCain, a Republican fiscal conservative.

President Bill Clinton used the budget-cutting tool 82 times in 1997, saving $2bn over five years.

But Chris Edwards, head of tax studies at Cato, a libertarian think-tank, while supportive of a line-item veto, said it would not get to the heart of America's fiscal problems.

"There has been a broad failure to keep spending under control and earmarks have just been a small part of this," he said.

Bush Wants Modified Line-item Veto Power (USAT)

USA Today, March 7, 2006

President Bush asked Congress on Monday to give him a line-item veto power that would allow him to propose canceling specific spending projects without having to veto an entire bill. The Supreme Court struck down a similar law eight years ago, but Bush said his version is crafted to satisfy the court's concerns.

He said 43 governors have line-item veto power, and "it's time to bring this important tool of fiscal discipline to Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0016404

President Clinton was given line-item veto power in 1996, but the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress. Under the Bush proposal, instead of being able to strike items from bills, the president would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote.

Treasury chief asks for higher debt ceiling

Treasury Secretary John Snow notified Congress that the administration has now taken "all prudent and legal actions," including tapping certain government retirement funds, to keep from hitting the $8.2 trillion national debt limit. Snow urged lawmakers to pass a new debt ceiling to avoid the nation's first-ever default on its obligations. Treasury officials have said the current limit will be surpassed sometime during the week of March 20.

An actual default on the debt, a situation when the government misses making payments to current bondholders, is a doomsday scenario that would severely damage the government's credit rating.

Army Corps defends levee reconstruction

The Army Corps of Engineers defended the quality of materials being used to rebuild the levees around New Orleans. Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, head of the Army Corps, said he told President Bush that 100 miles of the 169 miles of levees damaged by Hurricane Katrina have been restored.

Strock took issue with findings from two teams of independent experts who said the corps was taking shortcuts and using substandard materials, leaving large sections of the system substantially weaker than before the Aug. 29 storm.

Bush Seeks Limited Veto Power On Spending (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush asked Congress on Monday to give him limited authority to veto individual items in spending measures, resurrecting a top priority of fiscal conservatives.

Expressing optimism that the measure would win congressional approval and pass court tests, the White House said its proposal took into account objections the Supreme Court had raised in 1998 when it ruled that a similar provision signed two years earlier by President Clinton was unconstitutional.

In Congress, however, the outcome was less certain than the White House suggested.

Democratic leaders in the House and the Senate objected to the plan, but it probably will benefit from the momentum building to rein in "earmarks" — the practice of inserting into legislation specific spending measures that benefit only individual projects or communities.

Referring to the court's rejection of the law eight years ago, Bush said: "That should not be the end of the story."

He said his proposed measure would give him "the authority to strip special spending and earmarks out of a bill, and then send them back to Congress for an up-or-down vote."

The president has frequently expressed his interest in obtaining the line-item veto — an authority granted to 43 of 50 U.S. governors — but he has not made a concerted push to gain congressional approval for it and had not sent a specific proposal to Congress until Monday. As Democrats frequently point out, the budget has gone from healthy surplus to spiraling deficit during his five years in office, while Bush has failed to veto any legislation.

But "fertile ground … exists now in Congress," said Josh Bolten, the director of the Office of Management and Budget — referring to the growing pressure in the House and the Senate to limit earmarks.

Under Bush's formula, unlike the one ruled unconstitutional eight years ago, Congress would retain the last word.

If the president opposes certain provisions in a spending bill, the proposal would allow him to sign the legislation but defer spending the disputed money.

Congress would then be asked to approve a second measure killing the offending provisions. It would have 10 days to comply, and would not be allowed to amend it or delay a vote by filibuster. If Congress did not support the president's request, the targeted spending would have to proceed.

Under the Constitution, the House and Senate must pass a bill, and the president must sign it, for legislation to become law. In a 6-3 decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the Line Item Veto Act amended that process by giving the president new power to cancel some parts of a bill.

DOJ_NMG_0016405

By White House count, presidents as far back as Ulysses S. Grant, who served from 1869 to 1877, have sought the line-item veto — and Congress has objected, because it allows a president to pick and choose among spending items that Congress sends to the White House.

Although details of the proposal remained sketchy, some Supreme Court experts said the new measure might get around judicial objections.

"This might work," said Mark V. Tushnet, an expert on constitutional law at Georgetown University Law Center.

Walter Dellinger, who as acting solicitor general argued on behalf of the Clinton administration in favor of the measure the court struck down, was more certain.

"This is unquestionably constitutional," he said. "It is possible to construct a constitutionally defensible provision under which Congress would be required to cast a recorded vote on particular items."

Besides, he said, the president would likely be playing a strong hand by asking Congress to hold back on specific spending.

It would be politically costly for Congress to vote to override a line-item veto, Dellinger said.

In striking down the 1996 legislation, the court voted along non-ideological lines. The conservative chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, voted with the majority; while frequent swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor, liberal Stephen G. Breyer and conservative Antonin Scalia formed the minority.

Supreme Court experts said there was no suggestion how the current court — with John G. Roberts Jr. replacing Rehnquist and Samuel A. Alito Jr. replacing O'Connor — would receive any challenge to the legislation.

The politics of the line-item veto makes for unusual teammates.

In 2004, Congress rejected a provision that would have done what Bush says he wants to do: require Congress to vote on recommendations to eliminate specific projects from appropriations bills. The vote was 237-174, with 89 Republicans joining the 147 Democrats and one independent who voted against it.

Bolten was happy to point out Monday that during the 2004 presidential campaign, Sen. John F. Kerry, the Democratic candidate, proposed a measure similar to that advanced by the White House.

On Monday, the Massachusetts senator said: "It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto." He said he would introduce such legislation.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) objected to Bush's plan, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said: "President Bush has presided over the largest fiscal turnaround in our nation's history, turning a projected $5.6 trillion surplus [over 10 years] to a deficit of $3.3 trillion.

"The line-item veto would do little to control deficits," she said.

And Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), while supporting the line-item veto, pointed out that if Bush wanted to curtail earmarks, he could simply refuse to fund many of them.

This is because many earmarks are not in legislation, but in the congressional committee report accompanying the bill. Thus, he said, the appropriations bill this year that funds the science agencies and the Departments of State, Justice and Commerce contains 2,394 earmarks — 228 of which are in the text of the law.

Reconciliation A Tough Sell In 2006 (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

In what may be more of a face-saving effort than any real attempt to reduce the deficit this year, both the House and Senate Budget panels are looking at including less than $10 billion in savings or mandatory spending cuts in their versions of the budget resolution this year.

Snow Says U.S. Has Taken 'All Steps' To Avoid Debt Limit (WSJ)

A Wall Street Journal Online News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016406

Treasury Secretary John Snow notified Congress on Monday that the administration has now taken "all prudent and legal actions" to keep from hitting the $8.2 trillion national debt limit.

In a letter to Congressional leaders, Mr. Snow urged lawmakers to pass a new debt ceiling immediately to avoid the nation's first-ever default on its obligations. "I know that you share the president's and my commitment to maintaining the full faith and credit of the U.S. government," Mr. Snow wrote.

Treasury officials, briefing congressional aides last week, said that the government will run out of maneuvering room to keep from exceeding the current limit sometime during the week of March 20.

Mr. Snow said government debt managers are starting to use the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund to stay below the current limit. Mr. Snow said he has declared a "debt issuance suspension period," a technical designation that lets Treasury suspend new investments for the civil-service fund and redeem some of that fund's investments, "as authorized by law."

The Treasury secretary said "it is important to understand" that this maneuver "provides only a few days of additional borrowing capacity, which we expect will be exhausted by mid-March."

Treasury officials also announced that on Friday they had used the $15 billion in the Exchange Stabilization Fund, a reserve the Treasury secretary has that is normally used to smooth out volatile movements in the value of the dollar in currency markets.

Treasury has also been taking investments out of a $65.3 billion government pension fund known as the G-fund. Officials have said that once the debt limit is raised, the investments taken out of the pension funds would be replaced and any lost interest payments would be made up. The formal title for the G-fund is the Government Securities Investment Fund of the Federal Employees Retirement System.

An actual default on the debt, a situation when the government misses making payments to current bondholders, is a doomsday scenario considered highly unlikely given what it would do to the government's credit rating.

It is expected that Congress will approve an increase in the current $8.18 trillion debt limit by perhaps $781 billion. Mr. Snow will be meeting privately this week with U.S. lawmakers to discuss the importance of raising the debt limit, Treasury spokesman Tony Fratto said at a routine press briefing on Monday.

Senate Democrats have asked the Republican leadership for extended debate before raising the debt limit. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) has said he wants to amend debt limit-increase legislation "to reduce the need for further debt increases in the future."

Whatever concerns Congress may have about the longer-term budget outlook, "we cannot hold hostage the full faith and credit of the United States of America," Mr. Fratto said Monday. Any indication from lawmakers that they can't support an increase is "not appropriate and certainly not sustainable," he said. "At the end of the day, the debt ceiling needs to be raised."

Congress has put off a debt-limit increase until "the eleventh hour" several times during President Bush's administration, but "we cannot take it for granted" that putting off the increase this time won't be problematic, Mr. Fratto said.

The administration has sent Congress a budget that on paper would cut the deficit in half by 2009, the year Mr. Bush leaves office. But Democrats contend the administration met its deficit-reduction goal only by leaving out major spending items such as the full costs of the Iraq war. They say the deficit won't improve unless Mr. Bush abandons his effort to make his first-term tax cuts permanent.

Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.) said last week that under Mr. Bush the total of the deficits has increased by $3 trillion, a 40% increase from where the national debt, the total of previous deficits, stood when Mr. Bush took office in January 2001.

Will D.C. Circuit Nominee's Conservative Credentials Be His Undoing? (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 7, 2006

Most nights a line snakes out the door at Lauriol Plaza, the trendy Mexican restaurant on 18th Street in Dupont Circle that draws a cross section of the Washington, D.C., cognoscenti, many of whom come as much to make the scene as to sample the cuisine.

DOJ_NMG_0016407

On one such evening about two years ago, James Brochin, a New York lawyer, was waiting to be seated with a few buddies from Yale Law School, including Brett Kavanaugh, staff secretary for President George W. Bush.

Nearby, Jeff Berman, then counsel to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on the Senate Judiciary Committee, caught Kavanaugh's eye and walked over. Kavanaugh was in the midst of a bitter confirmation battle over his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, but the staffer still wanted to trade a few friendly words before heading out the door.

"I was struck at the time by the irony that this guy's boss was spending a great deal of energy trying to shoot Brett down, yet he was still good friends with this staffer," recalls Brochin, a partner at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison.

It might seem unusual, but the story is emblematic of the complex politics and loyalties often just behind the scenes of the judicial nomination process. It also illustrates the challenge Democrats have facing off against this 41-year-old Maryland native, whose stalled nomination is expected to come before the Senate Judiciary Committee again as early as next month.

Kavanaugh's conservative credentials are etched indelibly into his résumé. In fact, he's something of the Zelig of young Republican lawyers. A protégé of independent counsel Kenneth Starr, he was a key figure in the Whitewater investigation. In the recount fight after the 2000 election, he served as a foot soldier in the legal army that descended on Florida and gave Bush his presidency. As a lawyer for Bush in the White House counsel's office, he shepherded most of the administration's contentious federal court nominees, including Miguel Estrada and Priscilla Owen.

But whether his right-wing bona fides will incite enough Democratic opposition to keep him off the bench remains an open question.

THE LONG AND WINDING ROAD

Kavanaugh was first nominated to the D.C. Circuit in July 2003, but faced sharp opposition at his hearing the following April, where Senate Democrats lambasted him for his youth, lack of judicial experience and partisanship. Although the American Bar Association rated him "well qualified," Schumer bluntly labeled Kavanaugh's nomination "payment for political services rendered."

Attention shifted, however, to the 2004 presidential election, and Kavanaugh's nomination was marooned in committee. He was then left out of the "Gang of 14" deal last summer, which allowed three previously controversial nominees to be voted on in the Senate, and that seemed to signal nobody was interested in a brawl over him. Then came more than six months of bruising Supreme Court confirmation fights, during which Kavanaugh remained buried.

But when the Senate moved to hold over all nominees at the end of the last congressional session, Kavanaugh was again left out because of Democratic opposition. So the White House renominated him in January, sending the message that it won't allow Kavanaugh to be forgotten.

Now he's back at the front of the confirmation line. And while Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has made Kavanaugh a priority this session, his path looks just as rocky as it did two years ago. Just last Friday, Senate Democrats renewed their call for another hearing on Kavanaugh. The D.C. Circuit -- often called the second-most-important court in the country because of its jurisdiction over federal government agencies -- has been fertile ground for past confirmation fights. Exhibit A: the controversy over Miguel Estrada, so nasty that it led him to withdraw in September 2003.

Senate Democrats are girding for a similar knock-down, drag-out fight over Kavanaugh, and that fight looms as the latest test of Democrats' clout on future federal court confirmations.

"If the Democrats weren't able to stop [Samuel] Alito," says Sheldon Goldman, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, "the question that is being asked now is, How can they stop anyone who is as professionally qualified as Brett Kavanaugh?"

MAKING A MODEL CONSERVATIVE

Politics have always threaded through Kavanaugh's life. Raised in Bethesda, Md., he was the only child in a tight-knit family of lawyers. His mother, Martha, was a prosecutor in the state attorney's office and later worked as a criminal defense lawyer. She was nominated to the Montgomery County Circuit Court in 1995, where she served until retiring, nearly five years ago.

Kavanaugh's father, Edward, was a prominent figure inside the Beltway. As head of the Cosmetic, Toiletry and Fragrance Association for 22 years, he was friends with congressional heavyweights including the late Speaker of the House Thomas "Tip" O'Neill, D-Mass., and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. (Indeed, Hatch gave him a special welcome at his son's nomination hearing.)

DOJ_NMG_0016408

Bright, hard working and unflappable, Kavanaugh attended all-boys Catholic schools, first at Mater Dei and then at Georgetown Preparatory High School, where he excelled both in class and in sports, playing on the basketball and football teams. Friends also recall him being infused with a sense of religious faith that remains important to him today.

From an early age, Kavanaugh seems to have been drawn to the law. Growing up, he sat in on some of his mother's cases and spent a few summers interning on Capitol Hill. But unlike many children of well-connected Washingtonians, Kavanaugh didn't come off to others as arrogant or transparently ambitious. "Brett's a chess player," says Steve Ochs, Kavanaugh's high school history teacher. "He always sees moves ahead without having guile."

That sense of reserve carried over to Yale University, where friends recall him as more of a sports guy than a campus partisan involved in student politics. Kavanaugh's more liberal friends certainly knew he was conservative but say he based friendships on shared interests rather than shared politics.

Kavanaugh went directly to Yale Law School, graduating in 1990. While there he wrote an article in the Yale Law Journal analyzing the 1986 Supreme Court case Batson v. Kentucky, which restricted the use of peremptory challenges to strike jurors on the basis of race. Kavanaugh argued that the decision still left the exact enforcement procedures to the lower courts, but advocated a defendant's right to be present during any hearing on the proper use of peremptory challenges.

After law school, Kavanaugh spent two years clerking in federal appeals courts, first for Judge Walter Stapleton on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and then for 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski (an icon for many legal conservatives, but something of an iconoclast himself).

Kozinski's clerkships are notoriously demanding, a kind of boot camp for young lawyers with Federalist Society credentials. A perfectionist and an outspoken conservative on a liberal court, Kozinski routinely cycles through dozens of drafts on opinions. To meet the workload, Kavanaugh and his fellow clerks worked in shifts. Mark Perry, now co-chair of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's D.C. office, recalls that when he clerked alongside Kavanaugh, he took the early shift, which started at 6 a.m., while Kavanaugh had the "late" one, which began at 8 a.m. -- and ran until 9 or 10 at night, six days a week.

In Kozinski, Kavanaugh found a mentor and an intellectual sparring partner. "He's not one to sort of jump to conclusions. He weighs and he considers and goes back and forth," Kozinski recalls of their legal debates. "I think we sort of reinforce each other." Kozinski likens Kavanaugh's legal philosophy to that of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Alito. "The question is what he would do in close cases," he says. "I think in close cases he would offer the conservative-libertarian result."

From Kozinski's chambers, Kavanaugh moved to a yearlong fellowship in the solicitor general's office under Starr. There he worked alongside conservative luminaries such as Roberts and Maureen Mahoney and had a chance to argue his first appeals court case. In 1993, Kavanaugh moved up the clerkship ladder again, this time into the chambers of Justice Anthony Kennedy on the Supreme Court.

PLUNGING INTO WHITEWATER

As Kavanaugh's Kennedy clerkship was ending in the summer of 1994, Starr was tapped to replace Robert Fiske as independent counsel in the Whitewater investigation. One of his first moves was to bring Kavanaugh on board.

It was a watershed moment for the 29-year-old lawyer, one that would earn him both acclaim and lasting enemies. One of his initial duties was to lead the probe into the apparent suicide of White House counsel Vincent Foster, a close personal friend of President Bill Clinton and first lady Hillary and a former colleague of Hillary's at the Rose Law Firm in Arkansas -- which Kavanaugh also investigated. Though Starr closed these investigations without prosecuting, Kavanaugh did not make any friends in the Clinton White House. Now-Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., in particular took bitter exception to Kavanaugh's investigatory tactics, which she viewed as a partisan witch hunt meant to destroy her and her husband.

In 1997, Kavanaugh briefly retreated into private practice, joining Kirkland & Ellis, Starr's old firm. But after less than a year, Starr asked him to return to the independent counsel's office to argue a case stemming from the Foster investigation that had been granted certiorari by the Supreme Court.

The case, Swidler & Berlin v. United States, led to an important decision on the scope of attorney-client privilege -- but not one in Kavanaugh's favor. The issue was whether attorney James Hamilton was required to turn over notes to Starr on a conversation he had with his now-deceased client, Foster. Kavanaugh argued that lower court precedent, particularly in criminal cases, suggested that the attorney-client privilege did not survive the death of the client. Many attorneys found the position controversial because it encroached on a well-established privilege.

DOJ_NMG_0016409

Hamilton, who argued the case himself, says despite the loss, Kavanaugh was impressive. "Brett is obviously a very talented lawyer. Although he lost the Swidler case -- to the benefit of both clients and the profession -- he did well with a most difficult position."

According to Bob Woodward's book "Shadow: Five Presidents and the Legacy of Watergate," Kavanaugh was also something of a moderating force in the office. He was among those who encouraged Starr to seek direct testimony from White House intern Monica Lewinsky and Clinton about their affair rather than simply write the report based on secondhand accounts. He questioned whether Starr needed to hand over the narrative section of the final report to Congress. And though he helped assemble the 11 possible legal violations laid out in the report, he was opposed to Congress' decision to release the report to the public.

Even after he left Starr's office, Kavanaugh continued to express concerns over the power afforded the independent counsel, going so far as to write an article for the Georgetown Law Journal arguing that Congress should change the statute to limit the politicization of the independent counsel position.

Yet Kavanaugh's tenure with Starr continues to enrage Democrats, who note that he has defended the former independent counsel's work in newspaper editorials. In one such piece for The Washington Post, Kavanaugh said that subsequent congressional action, such as the vote by the House of Representatives to impeach Clinton, fully vindicated Starr's investigation.

THE PRESIDENT'S LAW FIRM

In 1999, Kavanaugh returned to Kirkland, where he mostly handled appellate cases for corporate clients such as Verizon Communications Inc., America Online Inc., and General Motors Corp.

Even in private practice, Kavanaugh managed to get involved in charged cases. For instance, he and a colleague joined the last-ditch appeal of Elian Gonzalez's deportation back to Cuba after a panel on the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that it did not have jurisdiction to overturn the Department of Justice's decision. The Supreme Court denied cert.

Kavanaugh also filed an amicus brief in the 1999 case Santa Fe School District v. Jane Doe, in which he represented two Republican congressmen who were supporting a school district's policy that allowed student-initiated prayer at football games. The Supreme Court ruled that the policy violated the Constitution's establishment clause.

But Kavanaugh's true return to politics came in 2000, when he joined the Bush recount team in Florida, overseeing Volusia County. After the election he was offered a spot in the White House counsel's office, then headed by Alberto Gonzales, where he joined an A-list of top conservative lawyers, including Rachel Brand, now assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Counsel; Stuart Bowen, now special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction; and Courtney Elwood, the current deputy chief of staff for Gonzales.

That office, however, has come under scrutiny recently for its role in drafting memos justifying the use of torture in questioning terrorism suspects and validating the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program. Although he worked in the office at the time, Kavanaugh hasn't been directly tied to those controversial policies.

He was, however, at the forefront of other divisive issues, most notably serving as a chief architect of the administration's judicial selection process. He helped vet candidates and worked as a liaison between the White House and Capitol Hill, coordinating hearings with Republican staffers.

Along with judicial nominations, Kavanaugh pushed tort reform legislation on issues including asbestos, class actions and terrorism risk insurance. He was also the main author of a controversial executive memo that allows presidents and their families to limit the release of presidential documents.

Once again in a place known for grueling hours, Kavanaugh stood out. He became a fast favorite of Gonzales, who put him forward as a candidate for a seat on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Maryland senators objected because they wanted a nominee who had practiced in their home state.

Meanwhile, Kavanaugh replaced Harriet Miers as staff secretary, a little-known but powerful post in the Executive Office of the President. It's more a political than a policy job, but lawyers often hold it because it requires reviewing every piece of paper before it lands on the president's desk. Kavanaugh's position has brought him close to Bush, with whom he has traveled around the globe. The president even made a special appearance at Kavanaugh's 2004 wedding to Bush's personal secretary, Ashley Estes, held at Georgetown's Christ Episcopal Church.

DOJ_NMG_0016410

The close association with the president has only fanned Democratic furor over Kavanaugh's nomination. Democrats especially want to question him on whether he had a role in approving the NSA wiretapping program. "He doesn't have the legal philosophy that ought to be had for that position," says Elliot Mincberg, legal director of the liberal People For the American Way. "Most of his career has been spent as a far-right advocate." Maybe so, but Democrats have few options to derail Kavanaugh, without resorting to a filibuster.

In the meantime, in his West Wing office, Kavanaugh remains busy serving the president he helped put in the White House. In that office three large photographs adorn the front wall.

In the first, the president appears at his Oval Office desk with Kavanaugh and now-Chief Justice Roberts. To the right is a picture of Bush greeting the late Pope John Paul II at the Vatican. The third shot shows the president, behind a wooden podium, introducing his first crop of judicial nominees from the spring of 2001, a group that included Roberts, Estrada and Owen.

It's a display befitting of a presidential aide, no doubt. But nervous Democrats might wonder how they would look in a judge's chambers.

How Do You Get To The Supreme Court? Practice, Practice, Practice (LAW)

By Alyson M. Palmer, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, March 7, 2006

When R. Jonathan Hart stepped up to the microphone before the country's nine most powerful jurists on March 1, he joined a small, eclectic club of Georgia attorneys who have argued before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Chatham County Attorney sought to convince the high court to uphold the decision of a Savannah, Ga., federal judge, affirmed by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, that the county is immune from suit for damages arising from an accident involving a drawbridge maintained by the county.

In preparing for the argument and drafting the county's brief, Hart got the assistance of, among others, a law school professor who has argued before the high court several times. But rather than have the professor, David J. Bederman of Emory University, argue the case, Hart decided to handle the case himself.

"You only get to do this every once in a while in your lifetime," he said.

Unless you are someone like Miguel A. Estrada, Hart's opposing counsel last Wednesday.

Estrada, a former nominee to a federal appeals court, has argued at least 16 times before the high court, according to his profile on Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's Web site. Before joining Gibson, Dunn, Estrada served as an assistant to the U.S. solicitor general from 1992 to 1997.

But for many non-government attorneys, the Supreme Court is usually a one-time gig. The 80 or so cases that the Supreme Court agrees to hear each year means that the Court entertains oral argument in a handful of cases coming out of Georgia federal and state courts in a given term.

Hart said that his time in the marbled courtroom was "certainly something that I would do again."

Indeed, David F. Walbert, an Atlanta lawyer who has argued before the Supreme Court several times in his career, called it "as much fun as you can have if you're not intimidated."

Walbert and other Georgia attorneys who have participated in Supreme Court oral argument are not short on stories about their experiences -- or advice for a first-timer.

Walbert said he did not participate in moot court arguments before his first Supreme Court argument in 1982 or a redistricting case that he argued in 2003.

PRACTICE RUNS

But several other local litigators with Supreme Court experience said that such practice runs are essential.

Hart prepared for his argument by coming up to Atlanta for a moot court session with Bederman and other attorneys and law students. That exercise was so helpful, said Hart, "if I had to do it over again, I would have done two of them."

DOJ_NMG_0016411

W. Warren Plowden Jr. of Macon, Ga., said that before he represented Monroe County in a school sexual harassment case at the Supreme Court in 1999, he participated in a moot argument that included now-Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

Roberts was tough, but Plowden did not mind, saying, "That's the point of the whole thing."

Attorneys emphasized basics such as knowing the case law and facts inside and out but said that rehearsing a 30-minute presentation was a waste of time -- or worse.

"I'm a real believer since my 9th grade speech class," said Walbert, "that if you have a prepared spiel, you're dead."

Atlanta attorney Michael K. Wolensky, who argued a securities case two terms ago, agreed. He said that he needed his notes but had no occasion to use any prepared remarks, encountering his first question approximately 18 seconds into his time.

"Preparing a presentation is useless," said Wolensky. "It's a trap you want to avoid."

Experienced Supreme Court practitioners give the same advice of mothers and grandmothers -- be on time, arriving in Washington preferably several days before the big day.

Hart visited the Supreme Court a day early but found that he had to fight his way through the crowd of onlookers hoping to get a glimpse of former Playboy playmate Anna Nicole Smith, whose inheritance from her late husband was the subject of arguments heard Feb. 28. He said he couldn't get a seat for that argument but managed to secure a spot for another case.

He said that preview allowed him to get familiar with the courtroom and the justices' voices, noting that because the justices' voices are projected through a central sound system, it is sometimes hard to tell from which seat a question is posed.

IN THE SPOTLIGHT

Another attorney said that she had to fight her way through the crowds to get to her own argument.

Paula K. Smith, a senior assistant attorney general, last fall represented the state of Georgia in a case over whether police violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched a home against a defendant's protests but with his wife's consent.

She said that intense interest in that case made the argument all the more difficult.

"Knowing that you're in that kind of spotlight ... it just adds to the pressure, and you have to be careful that you don't let it divert you from the case and the job that you have to do," said Smith.

Fewer eyes were on Hart when he stepped up to the microphone. The courtroom was packed for a prior argument on state tax incentives for corporations but cleared out afterward. But he said that he still felt the pressure.

By some measures, Hart got off easy, not facing any obviously off-the-wall questions or a series of bizarre hypothetical situations justices sometimes pose.

Walbert said that he was told before his first argument that a key challenge was to get past the then-Chief Justice Warren E. Burger's first question.

"It was almost always irrelevant," Walbert said he was told.

Sure enough, Burger posed the first question as Walbert rose to defend a district court opinion that ruled in favor of his clients' voter discrimination claim.

Burger asked, "Well, how many women governors are there in the country, counselor?" recalled Walbert.

Laurie Webb Daniel, who heads Holland & Knight's appellate practice group, was in her early 30s when she argued before the high court. Despite her youth, she said that only Justice Antonin Scalia's questions caught her off guard.

"He is just dogged in his approach," she said. "And he would ask a hypothetical that I was ready for, and I would answer, and he wouldn't let go."

"Every time I gave him an answer, he would change the facts, because he didn't want me to give him an answer," continued Daniel.

After Justice John Paul Stephens had tested Plowden with a series of hypotheticals "that were getting worse and worse," according to Plowden, Stevens stopped and got a laugh. "He looked over and smiled and said, 'I guess you have to keep saying no, don't you,' and I said, 'Yes sir.'"

"They tell you not to make any jokes," continued Plowden, "but everybody laughed."

Perhaps most important, Hart avoided perhaps the biggest pitfall a litigant can face before the bench of nine justices -- calling a justice by the wrong name, a mistake that has tripped up Supreme Court experts such as Theodore Olson, Walter Dellinger and Laurence Tribe.

DOJ_NMG_0016412

(During the 2000 arguments over the presidential election, Miami lawyer Joseph Klock Jr., representing Florida Secretary of State Katherine Harris, addressed Justice John Paul Stevens as "Justice Brennan" and misidentified Justice David Souter as "Justice Breyer.")

Hart decided to keep it simple with "your honor."

"The one thing I was scared about was calling them 'judge,' and that's a big no-no," he said.

Hart kept his wits about him, though, remembering to collect the quills that lawyers appearing before the high court are permitted to take from counsel table as a memento.

Worried that she would be distracted, Daniel told her attorney husband, who sat as her co-counsel, how he could help. "I told him, "Remember to grab the pens.'"

Get On Your Phone Cheney Receives Warm Welcome During Naples Speech (NDN)

By Larry Hannan

Naples Daily News, March 7, 2006

He is one of the most unpopular politicians in America right now. But Vice President Dick Cheney received a hero's welcome tonight when he came to Southwest Florida.

Cheney, who became an object of derision upon shooting a friend on a hunting trip last month, spoke tonight to an adoring crowd of about 400 Collier County Republicans as part of "Victory 2006" at the Naples Beach Hotel and Golf Club.

The event was sponsored by the Collier County Republican Party.

For a few hours Cheney was able to put his approval ratings, 18 percent in a recent CBS poll, out of his mind and speak to a crowd that thinks he's doing a great job.

"It's good to be back in Naples again," Cheney said. "I see a lot of old friends here."

There was no mention of the February shooting during his speech. Cheney accidentally shot Harry Whittington, 78, a lawyer and acquaintance on a quail hunting trip in Corpus Christi, Texas. Whittington spent several days in the hospital and the vice president later apologized.

Monday's event cost $500 per person for dinner and a photo with Cheney. The cost was $150 for a person who didn't want their picture with the vice president.

Carla Dean, chairwoman of the Collier GOP, declined to say how much money was raised at the event. Dean said the money would go toward the grass-roots Republican movement.

This was Cheney's first appearance in Southwest Florida since during his re-election bid in October 2004. Earlier in the day he stumped for GOP candidates in Boca Raton.

The vice president's Naples speech on Monday sounded like the beginning of the campaign for the 2006 congressional elections. It included a strong defense of President George W. Bush, and a call to elect Republicans to the House and Senate.

"We're grateful to our friends in Collier County and throughout Florida," Cheney said. "A great grass-roots campaign helped elect us in 2004 and it will help us again in 2006."

Cheney, who is the president of the Senate, said he was looking forward to swearing in a Republican senator from Florida in January.

That person would have to defeat incumbent Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson. Rep. Katherine Harris is the only Republican currently running against Nelson, but recent speculation has more people entering the race.

Harris was in the Naples crowd Monday night.

Cheney also defended the administration on the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and the decision to launch a wiretapping program within American to fight terrorism.

For years terrorists could strike America without fearing reprisals. Now that has changed, Cheney said.

"In the last two years we have brought freedom to Iraq," Cheney said. "With each successive election there has been less violence and a greater (voter) turnout."

Bill Barton, a former GOP state committeeman from Collier County, said he felt Cheney was speaking from his heart about protecting America from another terrorist attack.

DOJ_NMG_0016413

"He works at it every day. What could be more important?" Barton said.

The wiretapping program, which has been heavily criticized by Democrats and some Republicans, is needed, Cheney said.

"The president authorized a terrorist surveillance program," Cheney said. "Our critics call this a domestic surveillance program but that is inaccurate."

The wiretapping program is not a threat to civil liberties. It only attempts to monitor people in the United States who are communicating with terrorists, Cheney said.

Despite Cheney not mentioning his hunting mishap, U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Miami, whose district includes parts of Collier, lauded Cheney for not avoiding controversial issues such as the surveillance program.

"The vice president, as he always does, calls it as he sees it," Diaz-Balart said.

The vice president also said tax cuts enacted by Congress in the last five years should be made permanent. Comments

This site does not necessarily agree with comments posted below — responsibility lies with the relevant reader alone. Read our blog agreement.

2 of 3 people found this comment useful.

Posted by neoconnot (anonymous) at 10:32 p.m. on March 6, 2006 (Suggest removal)

Obviously an early report, but where is the mention of the peaceful protest against this criminal, Cheney? How the supposed "conservatives" in Collier County fall for this neocon crook is beyond me. "Country Club" Republicans, I guess--caught in la-la land. Clean the fog off your goggles or cataracts, as the case may be, and see how this band of neocons travels from Democrat to Republican circles pushing for endless war. Iran is next as the reason for being in Iraq in the first place was to establish the bases we need to attack Iran. Ol' Rummy, Richard Perle, Wolfowitz, Cheney and the gang have been pushing for this since the sordid Clinton era.

Cheney Delivers GOP Pep Talk (NEP)

By Betty Parker

News Press, March 7, 2006

NAPLES — Vice President Dick Cheney urged party faithful to work hard for Republicans in the fall elections and pressure Congress for tax cuts in a speech to Collier County Republicans on Monday night.

Brought to Naples because of his 30-year friendship with Collier state committeeman Al Abrams of Naples, Cheney reiterated many of the themes President Bush stressed in his state of the union speech.

Cheney spoke for about 20 minutes at the start of the 6:30 p.m. event at the Naples Beach Hotel and Golf Club — before the meal was served — and left immediately for Southwest Florida International Airport, causing slight delays on Interstate 75 after landing at 3:45 p.m. and on departure.

Dinner and a photo $500

Cynthia Odierna and a group of protesters demonstrate against Vice President Cheney outside the Naples Beach Hotel and Golf Club on Monday. About 425 people attended, paying $500 for a photo with the vice president and the dinner, and $150 for dinner and speech.

The crowd in Collier's GOP stronghold was clearly enthusiastic about Cheney and Bush, with many sporting campaign buttons from past races.

"I'm so excited to hear him in person," said Bobbie Dusek of Naples, who came attired in red, white and blue.

"He's a such an eloquent speaker with such a great mind. It's thrilling just to sit in the same room with him."

A group of about 20 protesters kept a block away was far outnumbered, but not deterred. Several carried peace signs and war protests.

John Riccio of Naples wore a T-shirt that said, "Don't Shoot Me, I'm Not A Quail."

He also had a sign saying, "How many more must die?" to show his opposition to the war in Iraq.

"I'm a veteran myself, and I know what it is to be a soldier," said Riccio, adding that he has two sons who recently returned home after serving in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0016414

"They don't always agree with me, but this is not a just war. We went under false pretenses."

Hunting mishap ignored

Cheney made no reference to the recent shooting incident in Texas when he accidentally peppered a hunter with birdshot.

But he praised America's strong economy, and said that tax cuts under Bush have left $880 billion in citizens' hands that otherwise would have gone to the government.

"Congress needs to make the Bush tax cuts permanent," he said.

Congress also needs to work on changing the way they do the national budget, Cheney said, "and we look forward to working with responsible members on the Hill for budget reform."

Many of his comments, however, dealt with the battle against terrorists.

"There's still hard work ahead on the war on terror," he said, adding that "the war on terror involves the home front as well. The Patriot Act is vital to protecting the American public."

Debate over the administration's watchdog actions at home has caused some to wrongly criticize the administration actions as "domestic surveillance,"

Cheney said. "That is not accurate."

In actuality, he said, "one end is the United States, and one end, we believe, is connected to al-Qaida."

Although critics say it's gone too far, he said, "this program has helped prevent terrorist attacks."

The packed crowd at the club included numerous party leaders and elected officials, including U.S. Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fort Myers, who introduced the vice president; Florida Republican Party Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan; GOP gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist; U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Miami, whose district includes part of Collier; and U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Sarasota, and the party's leading candidate in the U.S. Senate race against Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson.

Harris rode back to Washington on Monday night in Cheney's jet.

"It's not often you get to spend that much time with the vice president talking about the campaign and the needs of the district," Harris said.

Cheney Touts Shaw, Harris (MH)

By Beth Reinhard

The Miami Herald, March 7, 2006

BOCA RATON - Vice President Dick Cheney helped raise about $300,000 for Republican U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw at a luncheon Monday and declared that his administration was fulfilling its most important duty -- ``protecting the American people and winning the war on terror."

Yet even some members of Cheney's own party have recently questioned his national security policies, the Bush administration's biggest selling point since the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Some Republicans -- including Shaw -- have disagreed with Bush's approval of a United Arab Emirates-owned company running commercial operations at six seaports, including the Port of Miami. Shaw is co-sponsoring a bill that would ban foreign government-owned companies from operating American ports.

Still, Shaw's reelection opponent, Democratic state Sen. Ron Klein, described the 25-year congressman as an "alter-ego" of Cheney and Bush. Klein, who spoke at a senior center in an event organized to contrast with Cheney's appearance at the posh Boca Raton Resort & Club, is seeking to link Shaw with the administration's drooping poll numbers.

Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson used the same tactic Monday against his reelection rival, U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, sending out a fundraising appeal that mocked her Monday evening appearance with Cheney at a Collier County Republican Party fundraiser. Cheney did not mention her by name in Boca Raton but said that he looks forward to swearing in another Republican senator from Florida.

While Harris' role as Florida Secretary of State during the 2000 presidential recount makes her a villain to many Democrats, Shaw is harder to demonize. In a sign of his reputation for bipartisanship, the heavily Democratic Broward County Commission plans to honor him and Democratic U.S. Rep. Alcee Hastings today for securing federal aid for security and other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0016415

Also on Monday, Shaw affirmed his bid to lead the Ways and Means Committee after Chairman Bill Thomas officially announced his plans to retire. Shaw's competitors include Republicans Jim McCrery of Louisiana and Nancy L. Johnson of Connecticut.

U.S. Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, noted Shaw's chairmanship hopes at a meeting with reporters Monday at the Biltmore Hotel in Coral Gables. With U.S. Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart as vice chairman of the rules committee, and U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen vying for chairmanship of the international relations committee, South Florida's delegation has "tremendous opportunities," he said.

"There is not any place I can think of, or a region of the country, that has more of that opportunity right here, right now than South Florida," Reynolds said.

In Boca Raton, Cheney addressed about 250 people who had donated at least $500 each to Shaw's reelection campaign.

He urged Congress to continue the president's tax cuts, commended the recent Supreme Court appointments of Samuel Alito and John Roberts, and said withdrawing troops from Iraq would not be on an "artificial timetable set by politicians in Washington, D.C." He also defended the government's surveillance of suspected terrorists without court warrants.

"Our national security has been protected by more than just luck," he said. ``The enemy is weak and fractured, yet still evil and willing to hurt Americans."

Outside the hotel, about a dozen protesters chanted through Cheney's visit. Their straw hats and flowery skirts contrasted with stoic, dark-suited security detail.

Just a few miles away at the Mae Volen Senior Center, Klein criticized the Republican-sponsored prescription drug plan as a "sham." He said the program is is too confusing and not cost-effective.

"Mr. Shaw continues to apologize for it, and Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney are unwilling to fix it," Klein told about 50 seniors. Later he added: ``This plan is going to be a campaign issue throughout the country, especially in competitive districts."

The race in the senior-rich congressional district promises to be one of the most expensive in the country. The 22nd congressional district runs along the coast from Fort Lauderdale to Jupiter and takes in parts of Coral Springs, Parkland and Plantation.

Shaw issued a press release Monday noting that 53 percent of his district has enrolled in the prescription drug plan.

He has held several public workshops led by Medicare experts.

"The program is working, and it has proven to be a very real benefit for a large number of my constituents," Shaw said in the statement.

No Mention Of Harris Fuels Rumors (FLSUNSEN)

By Anthony Man

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, March 7, 2006

The political buzz among several of those at Vice President Dick Cheney's fund-raiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fort Lauderdale, was more about how U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' Senate campaign may be unraveling.

Cheney even provided some fuel when he said he was looking forward to swearing in a Republican replacement for Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson -- but didn't mention Harris by name.

"As vice president I look forward to the opportunity to swear in a new Republican senator to serve next to Mel Martinez in the United States Senate," Cheney said.

Morgan Dobbs, Harris' campaign press secretary, said her boss wasn't dropping out.

"We are continuing to move forward to charge ahead in the campaign," she said.

Dobbs didn't have any reaction to Cheney's failure to mention her boss' name. "I can't really comment on an event I wasn't at," she said.

If Harris doesn't run, the biggest potential candidate is Gov. Jeb Bush.

The hometown favorite for Palm Beach County Republicans is U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fort Pierce, who got his political start in the county and still represents part of the area in Congress.

Foley ran for the 2004 Senate nomination, but eventually dropped out of the race.

DOJ_NMG_0016416

Foley said Monday speculation about his running was premature.

"Nothing's really changed in my life because she's still the candidate," he said, adding that if Harris leaves the race, "then I'd have to make a decision."

Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party, also said discussion about Harris dropping out is "all highly speculative."

Foley would be a good candidate, Dinerstein said.

"Would he do it? There's a downside. He loves being a congressman, and the race would be a difficult one."

Bush Weaves Rug Story Into Many An Occasion (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Nothing says power like the Oval Office. The paintings of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. The bust of Dwight D. Eisenhower. The desk used by both Roosevelts.

And then there's the rug. Don't forget the rug. President Bush never does.

For whatever reason, Bush seems fixated on his rug. Virtually all visitors to the Oval Office find him regaling them about how it was chosen and what it represents. Turns out, he always says, the first decision any president makes is what carpet he wants in his office. As a take-charge leader, he then explains, he of course made a command decision -- he delegated the decision to Laura Bush, who chose a yellow sunbeam design.

Elizabeth Vargas, the ABC News anchor, was the latest to get the treatment. She went by last week to interview Bush before his trip to Afghanistan, India and Pakistan. Sure enough, she wasn't in the room but a minute or two before he started telling her about the carpet.

"You know an interesting story about the rug?" he asked. "Laura designed the rug."

"She did?" Vargas said.

"Yeah, she did. Presidents are able to pick their own rugs or design their own rugs."

Bush went on: "The interesting thing about this rug and why I like it in here is 'cause I told Laura one thing. I said, 'Look, I can't pick the colors and all that. But make it say 'optimistic person.' "

The oval-shaped carpet covers most of the world's most famous office, first occupied in 1909 by William Howard Taft, who found a checkerboard floor made out of mahajua wood from the Philippines. Subsequent presidents have chosen one design or another, but the consistent theme has been the seal in the center with the American eagle holding olive branches in one claw and arrows in the other. In a fit of postwar symbolism, Harry S. Truman changed the seal so that the eagle would face toward the olive branches, not the arrows.

Many presidents have added their own tastes to the Oval Office. "They use the office's imagery," said Fred I. Greenstein, a professor emeritus at Princeton University who has written on presidential leadership. He recalled John F. Kennedy's son John peeking out from under the desk, an image that conveyed youth and family. Lyndon B. Johnson, who was obsessed with breaking news, kept a ticker-tape machine and three television sets in his Oval Office. Ronald Reagan's aide Michael K. Deaver revamped the lighting to make it better for television addresses.

"Ford very deliberately changed the Oval Office to get rid of some of the imperial presidency image," Greenstein recalled of Gerald R. Ford. After the trauma of Watergate, he said, Ford replaced portraits of dour-faced Calvin Coolidge and Woodrow Wilson with paintings of the unpretentious Truman and Lincoln.

Bush has his own touches in the Oval Office -- some Western-themed paintings and an on-loan bust of Winston Churchill courtesy of British Prime Minister Tony Blair. But it is the rug that animates the president.

"He loves his rug," said Nicolle Wallace, the White House communications director. "I've heard him describe it countless times."

Sometimes Bush describes it as a metaphor for leadership. Sometimes he relates how Russian President Vladimir Putin admired the carpet. Sometimes he seems most taken by the lighting qualities.

DOJ_NMG_0016417

"When you're giving a tour of the Oval Office, you're trying to point to things that emphasize what you're trying to do" Wallace said. "For him, the optimism is very symbolic of what he wants his presidency to be about."

Not only does the president describe the rug to journalists and foreign leaders, he does so to virtual visitors. During "An Oval Office Tour With President George W. Bush" on the White House site (http://www.whitehouse.gov), he wastes no time pointing out the carpet. "It helps make this room an open and optimistic place," Bush tells viewers.

Some visitors have the impression that the rug story is revealing. In his new book, "Rebel-in-Chief," Fred Barnes recounts how Bush told him about the carpet: "His job, he told me, is to 'stay out of minutiae, keep the big picture in mind, but also make sure that I know enough about what's going on to get the best information possible.' To stress the point, during our interview in the Oval Office Bush called my attention to the rug."

Barnes notes that Bush delegated to the first lady. "Typical of his governing style, though, he gave a clear principle as guidance: he wanted the rug to express the view that an 'optimistic person comes here,' " Barnes reports. "The rug she designed is sunshine yellow."

But if Barnes or other visitors had the idea that Bush was sharing an intimacy just with them, they should listen to his speeches. Bush doesn't need the Oval Office to talk about the Oval Office carpet. Lately he's been taking the story on the road, sharing it with workers at a moving company in Sterling on Jan. 19, then with students at Kansas State University on Jan. 23, and again with supporters at Nashville's Grand Ole Opry on Feb. 1.

"If you walk in that Oval Office," Bush said in Sterling, "I think you're going to say, just like you know it, 'This guy's optimistic.' "

When it came her turn last week, Vargas expressed dutiful admiration for the rug and then tried to move on to more serious issues. Noting that Bush has two daughters in their twenties, she asked, "Any chances of a White House wedding for either of them, do you think?"

"All I can tell you is this," Bush answered. "If a suitor shows up and asks for their hand, he's going to get to come here to the Oval Office and give me an explanation."

Sounds as though he'll be called on the carpet.

Americans Lack Confidence In Health Reform, Poll Finds (WSJ)

By The Wall Street Journal Online

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

A majority of U.S. adults lack confidence in the Bush administration's ability to reform the nation's health-care system, a new Wall Street Journal Online/Harris Interactive health-care poll shows.

About three-quarters of those polled in the online survey of 2,426 U.S. adults say they aren't confident President Bush will be able to effectively make changes such as slowing the increase in health-care costs for the U.S. as a whole or reducing out-of-pocket health-care costs.

But Americans are divided along party lines about the president's ability to improve health-care, the poll shows. For example, about 5% of Democrats polled say they are confident in his ability to reduce out-of-pocket costs, compared with 40% of Republicans.

Overall, about 30% of those surveyed say they trust the Bush administration's ability to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system. But Americans aren't much more confident in Republicans (31%), Democrats (45%) and Sen. Hillary Clinton (41%) to reform the health-care system.

About 80% of Democrats surveyed say they trust their own party to come up with good health-care policies, compared with 67% of Republicans who have confidence in Republican-led initiatives.

See full results of the poll:

--Beckey Bright "How much do you trust each of the following to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system?"

Base: All Adults * * * "How much do you trust each of the following to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system?" Summary of A Great Deal/To Some Extent

DOJ_NMG_0016418

Base: All Adults * * * "In his State of the Union speech this past January, the President referred briefly to his plans for health care. Since then the White House has provided more details on his proposals. How familiar are you with Bush's new health-care proposals?"

Base: All Adults

Note: Percentages may not add up exactly to 100% due to rounding. * * * "Even if you are not sure what his proposals are, how confident are you that President Bush can do the following?"

Base: All Adults

Note: Percentages may not add up exactly to 100% due to rounding. * * * "…How confident are you that President Bush can do the following?" Summary of Very/Somewhat Confident

Base: All Adults * * * "…How confident are you that President Bush can do the following?" Summary of Not Very/Not At All Confident

Base: All Adults

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Feb. 23-27, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,426 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of =/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. Sampling error for the sub-samples of Republicans (729), Democrats (663) and Independents (614) is higher and varies. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Harris Interactive is a world-wide market research and consulting firm, best known for The Harris Poll and its use of the Internet to conduct scientifically accurate market research. For more information, see www.harrisinteractive.com1. To become a participant in The Harris Poll Online and join future online surveys, see www.harrispollonline.com2.

HSAs Won't Benefit Those Who Need Insurance Most (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Your Feb. 21 editorial "Big Health-Care Ideas" noted that the impact of President Bush's proposed health-care reforms would be "profound." You're not whistling "Dixie." Health Savings Accounts would profoundly increase healthcare costs for many consumers, lead others to ration necessary care, and increase the number of uninsured.

Unlike President Bush, your editorial at least acknowledges that fully equalizing the tax treatment for health insurance purchases would undermine employer-sponsored health care. Much as corporations used 401(k)s and IRAs as an excuse to stop providing pensions, employers will use HSAs as an excuse to cease paying for health care.

The beneficiaries of the president's proposals will be corporations and wealthy individuals rather than working families. While the richest among us can afford to deposit more than $10,000 a year in an HSA, few middle-income Americans have even $1,000 a year to spare.

Republicans theorize that high-deductible "catastrophic" policies will motivate cost-conscious consumers to rein in health-care spending. But the information necessary to compare the cost and quality of health-care procedures does not exist. Even if it did, many medical interventions require immediate attention. A patient in an ambulance, for example, shouldn't be asked -- and would often be unable -- to choose between emergency rooms.

Rep. Pete Stark (D., Calif.)

Ranking Member

Ways and Means Health Subcommittee

Washington

Arkansas Set To Undertake A Novel Effort In Health Care (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016419

WASHINGTON, March 6 — The Bush administration is poised to approve an innovative health insurance program, proposed by Arkansas, for 80,000 low-income uninsured people in the state, officials said Monday.

Arkansas will carry out the program, to be announced on Tuesday, under a waiver allowing the state to receive federal Medicaid money for coverage that does not meet the usual Medicaid standards for eligibility and benefits.

The employer-based program is novel in two ways. The benefit package is extremely limited, much more austere than Medicaid's. In addition, if an employer wants to participate, it must guarantee that all its employees, regardless of income or other factors, will be covered.

"Everyone in the employment pool has to have coverage," Mike Huckabee, governor of Arkansas, said in an interview. "Employers cannot cherry-pick the employees who get coverage."

Under the plan, to be approved by Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, the state expects to enroll at least 50,000 workers with incomes less than twice the federal poverty level and 30,000 workers with higher incomes. The poverty level this year is $9,800 for an individual, $13,200 for a couple.

Mr. Huckabee, a second-term Republican, said the new program would help small businesses that currently offer no health insurance. That help will enable them to compete better for workers with larger companies that do provide benefits.

"Forty-six percent of all workers in our state are in companies that have fewer than 100 employees," the governor said. "Only 26 percent of companies with fewer than 50 workers offer any health benefit."

Federal officials said the Arkansas program could be a model for other states that want to expand coverage without substantially increasing costs.

People who sign up for the program will receive a basic benefit package covering six doctor visits a year, seven days of inpatient hospital care a year, two outpatient hospital procedures or emergency room visits a year and two prescription drugs a month.

Beneficiaries will have to pay an annual deductible of $100 and 15 percent of the cost of each service, with a maximum out-of-pocket cost of $1,000 a year, state officials said.

In its application to the government, Arkansas said the new program would "cover most basic health needs" of the intended beneficiaries.

"It won't be an elaborate or upscale model," Mr. Huckabee said in the interview. "It will be very basic coverage."

Mr. Huckabee said participating employers would have to contribute $15 a month for each employee with income less than twice the poverty level and $100 a month for higher-income workers. Julie R. Munsell, a spokeswoman for the Arkansas Department of Health and Human Services, said employers could require workers to pay some or all of these fees.

But Dr. Joseph W. Thompson, who helped devise the program as director of the Arkansas Center for Health Improvement, an independent health policy institute, said: "In reality, employers will have to pay most or all of the premiums for their employees. If a single employee says, 'I don't want to participate,' the employer becomes ineligible for the program. The employer could not get the benefit for any of its employees."

David Johnson, a Democratic member of the Arkansas House who worked on legislation for the new program, predicted that it would be attractive to small businesses.

"Employers will get more bang for the buck from this program than from private health insurance," Mr. Johnson said. "They can insure employees for a predictable, modest amount, which is less than they would have to pay to private insurers."

Mr. Johnson said the state would help pay for the new benefits with proceeds of the multistate settlement negotiated with tobacco companies in 1998.

Other states have subsidized or supplemented health insurance provided by employers. But Dr. Thompson said this was not an option in Arkansas because most small employers provided no coverage.

"Small businesses have money in their pockets, and they want to offer some health insurance," he said, "but they cannot afford the products on the market."

Senate Report Faults Medicare's Handling Of Complaints (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul

DOJ_NMG_0016420

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Medicare's process for investigating complaints about bad care is "broken," leaves patients in the dark, and is of "no benefit to improving the overall quality" of medical care received by millions of elderly and disabled beneficiaries, Senate investigators have found.

The ongoing probe by the Senate Finance Committee determined that the number of complaints investigated by Medicare appears "disproportionately low," Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the committee chairman, wrote in a five-page letter sent to Medicare officials Friday. Grassley called on federal officials to consider major reforms, including redesigning the program and re-bidding contracts.

Medicare pays private contractors known as Quality Improvement Organizations about $300 million a year to work with hospitals, doctors and nursing homes to improve care and investigate complaints in the giant health insurance program. There are 53 QIOs -- one in each state plus one each in the District, Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands. Most are set up as nonprofits.

As the QIOs come under increased scrutiny from Congress, the prestigious Institute of Medicine is scheduled on Thursday to release findings of its 18-month review of the groups. Yesterday, the QIO trade group issued its own call to improve the beneficiary-complaint process, agreeing that it was broken.

Under the existing system, QIOs that investigate patients' complaints and find serious breaches are supposed to refer their findings to the Office of Inspector General for possible discipline of doctors and hospitals. A Washington Post investigation last July found that QIOs rarely make referrals and treat complaint investigations as a low priority.

In 2004, the contractors investigated 3,100 complaints for 43 million Medicare patients. Even then, patients had only a 1 in 4 chance of having their complaints upheld, and the findings often were not shared with patients, The Post found.

The Post also documented lavish salaries and perks paid to some QIO executives and directors, and it reported that the physician-dominated boards included few consumers.

In August, Grassley's committee began a probe of the QIOs, requesting a broad range of documents covering their finances and policies. He expanded the probe to look at salaries, potential conflicts of interest, travel by some QIO executives and Medicare's oversight of the contractors.

In his letter last week to Mark B. McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, Grassley noted that his committee's preliminary review raised "a number of concerns regarding questionable expenditures, board member and executive staff conflicts of interest and the quality and effectiveness of QIO services."

Grassley noted that little of the money paid to the QIOs is based on their performance, and he questioned why so few contracts are subject to competitive bids. In the most recent three-year contract cycle, six contracts were bid, and of the six only one was not renewed. Yet at the same time, Grassley wrote, "There is sparse evidence to suggest that QIOs are effective."

Grassley noted in his letter that some QIO board members appeared to be paid "exorbitant" amounts compared with other nonprofit groups. For example, he wrote, one QIO paid its trustees an average of $25,000 in 2003. According to the Washington-based group BoardSource, most charities do not pay board members.

Grassley wrote that some QIO trustees have traveled to expensive retreats at resorts in Colorado Springs; Cape Cod, Mass.; and Stowe, Vt. In addition, "it appears that some QIOs have financial arrangements or relationships" with board members that "appear to pose conflicts of interest," he wrote.

One QIO trustee was paid $37,000 annually as a consultant. A government audit concluded that the arrangement could "cause a loss of objectivity . . . or otherwise interfere with free exercise of his or her judgment," Grassley wrote.

Medicare officials said yesterday that they are reviewing the letter from the Senate committee, adding in a statement that the QIO program "is improving the quality of American health care."

In a statement yesterday, the American Health Quality Association, the QIO trade group, said Congress should rewrite a two-decades-old law barring contractors from sharing the results of their investigations with patients without first obtaining the permission of the doctors being investigated. The association said findings should be given to patients "along with information about actions taken to prevent the problem from recurring."

DOJ_NMG_0016421

The trade group also said Medicare should allow QIOs to publish annual quality reports for each state, including data on the performance of hospitals, doctors and nursing homes, in addition to releasing the names of providers who have been referred for enforcement actions.

Late last year, the association announced what it called a "new code of conduct" to ensure that QIOs conform to the "highest standards for business practices, governance and public accountability."

Among other things, the code called for increased consumer representation on QIO boards. Two-thirds of the 53 QIOs have adopted the code, the trade group said.

Senate Begins Consideration Of Lobby Reform (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, March 6, 2006

The U.S. Senate began consideration of legislation on Monday that would require lobbyists to disclose more about their activities and ban gifts by lobbyists to members of Congress and staff.

The measure, which has strong bipartisan support in the wake of scandals that rocked the Republican-led Congress, would also impose stiff fines for violation of lobbying curbs.

The Senate hopes to complete action after voting on a long list of possible amendments later this week. They include one that would deny congressional pensions to lawmakers convicted of accepting bribes.

That proposal was inspired largely by the case of former Republican U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, who was sentenced last week to eight years and four months in jail for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

Ethics reform became a top priority after lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty in January in a wide-ranging public corruption case. He is now cooperating with prosecutors and the probe may reach a number of lawmakers.

Members on both sides of the political aisle have demanded reform, saying lawmakers need to clean up Congress and reverse polls that show declining confidence in political leaders.

But some Democrats have blamed much of the recent ethical woes on a Republican "culture of corruption," and hope to use it to gain advantage in the November congressional elections.

"America deserves a government as good as its people," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said, "The American people expect us to work together to develop meaningful bipartisan solutions."

"We are obligated to protect the integrity of this great institution, and, most importantly, to represent the genuine interests of the voters who sent us here," Frist said.

The legislation before the Senate is the product of bills produced last week on bipartisan votes by two committees.

The Republican-led House of Representatives is expected to produce legislation of its own in coming weeks.

Senate Takes Up Bill On Lobbying Ethics (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

Legislation to curb excesses of both lobbyists and lawmakers reached the Senate floor Monday as leaders from both parties warned that the integrity of Congress is at stake.

The legislation, which would require lobbyists to be more open about the meals they buy and the trips they arrange for members of Congress, is a response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that hit Washington with details of millions of dollars from Abramoff's clients going to win friends and buy influence on Capitol Hill.

It also comes just three days after former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was sentenced to more than eight years in federal prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

"It is time for us to re-examine the rules so that bad apples are exposed before they spoil the whole lot," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said in opening debate.

DOJ_NMG_0016422

The Senate bill, which combines measures produced by two Senate committees last week, has already come under fire from advocacy groups and some lawmakers who say the proposed changes, the first to lobbying laws in 11 years, are mainly cosmetic.

The measure would require senators to reveal more information on their privately funded trips, but would not ban such trips as sought by some. The Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee last week also rejected a provision to set up an independent ethics investigator to oversee lobbying and ethics questions.

"Overall, this measure is insufficient because it focuses on disclosing corruption, rather than deterring it," Public Citizen's Joan Claybrook said of that committee's bill.

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., while blaming the recent scandals on "a Republican culture that has distorted government priorities," defended the Senate bill. "Maybe there are some outside groups who think we haven't done enough. We've done a lot." he said.

The section of the bill prepared by the Rules Committee deals with a major source of criticism of Congress: the special projects or earmarks that lawmakers insert in larger bills, often with little or no debate.

Under the measure, a senator could raise a point of order, stripping out any earmark inserted when the House and Senate negotiate the final version of a bill. It would take a 60-vote majority to waive that point of order.

The Rules Committee portion also would require lawmakers to post on their Web sites within 15 days any meals or drinks they receive from lobbyists and within 30 days details of privately funded trips. Gifts and travel directly paid for by lobbyists would continue to be banned.

Relatives of a senator who are registered lobbyists could not have official contact with the senator's staff, and senators could not pressure lobbying firms to hire people based on their political affiliation.

The Homeland Security panel's bill would require that retiring members of Congress wait two years before taking jobs lobbying Congress, and it would oblige lobbyists to reveal information about grass-roots lobbying, helping clients to encourage the general public — through mass mailings or advertising — to contact federal officials.

Lobbyists also would have to file reports quarterly, rather than the current rule of twice a year, on their contacts with lawmakers and their fundraising and political contribution activities.

Frist said he hoped to finish work on the bill by the end of the week. The House is also working on the lobbying issue, but GOP leaders there have yet to develop a specific plan.

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

Senators Eye Lobbying Bill As Ready Vehicle For Pet Causes (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rank-and-file senators are eyeing a lobbying-disclosure measure as a vehicle for a host of pet causes — issues ranging from budget-process reform to the controversial Dubai Ports World deal — as Republican and Democratic leaders try to shepherd the politically imperative bill through the chamber without turning it into a legislative Christmas tree.

“Let’s keep amendments on the issue that is at hand, amendments surrounding lobbying,” Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) pleaded yesterday on the floor. “Tying up with other amendments, what we call non-germane amendments, is not going to be in anybody’s best interests.”

Conservatives, eager to find the means to cut government spending, may try to insert the president’s new line-item-veto proposal or legislation establishing biennial budgeting, according to a Senate Republican aide.

A powerful new weapon for earmark foes is already included in the committee-approved lobbying-reform bill. The most significant institutional change in the measure would allow rank-and-file lawmakers to strike conference provisions — in any legislation, spending or otherwise — on a point of order without killing the conference report. A 60-vote supermajority would be needed to overcome the objection.

DOJ_NMG_0016423

While many lawmakers have been preoccupied with the more parochial issues of a stricter gift ban and increased disclosure for lobbyists and grassroots groups, some congressional aides recognize the reach of the new point of order.

"It's like the Holy Grail of process reform," said a senior House Republican aide who likes the idea but doubts that the Senate will ultimately adopt it. "The Senate's doing a little window-dressing and hoping it will fall out in conference," the aide said.

"I haven't addressed it yet," Frist said when asked how aggressively the Republican leadership would push for adoption.

A similar procedure was used — under a bipartisan agreement — to keep last year's Pentagon spending measure alive after lawmakers voted to strip out arctic-drilling provisions.

Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) expressed support for the new point of order yesterday, despite ceding ground on his original 50-vote threshold because of a committee amendment by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.).

Still, he cautioned, "I hope it's not abused."

Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a longtime critic of pork-barrel spending, also is getting behind the new point of order.

"Sunshine is the best disinfectant. If we subject earmarks to a budget point of order, it will force members to justify earmarks to other senators and the American people," DeMint said through a spokesman.

The point of order was included in a package approved by the Rules Committee that would increase disclosure on privately funded congressional travel, restrict floor access for lawmakers who have become lobbyists, ban non-meal gifts and change the rules that govern how members and their aides are allowed to transition into lobbying jobs.

That bill is being combined with a measure approved by the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that increases disclosure requirements for lobbyists and grassroots organizations. Democrats are likely to offer the text of their alternative lobbying-reform legislation as an amendment, according to a Democratic leadership aide.

That legislation would prohibit privately funded congressional travel, ban gifts from lobbyists, attach criminal penalties for efforts to exert partisan influence on private-sector hiring, adopt increased disclosure for lobbyists, and extend a waiting period on lobbying by former members and high-level staff from one year to two years.

Democrats are also considering a variety of piecemeal amendments targeted at those issues and others, the aide said.

Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) said yesterday that he would sponsor or support several amendments. That could include a second effort to establish an Office of Public Integrity to act as a clearinghouse for disclosures and investigate ethics complaints, a proposal that was rejected during Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs consideration of the bill.

Republican and Democratic leaders want to limit the scope of amendments adopted on the floor, hoping to prevent the measure from losing its focus on lobbying.

Lawmakers, aides and outside groups are watching closely to see if anyone opens up the politically sensitive issue of campaign-finance reform, which cuts across party lines. Any changes to current law could give one party or the other a leg up in future elections.

Lott said yesterday that if anyone raises a campaign-finance amendment he is ready to offer a second-degree amendment addressing largely unregulated "527" groups. The House GOP version of the lobbying-reform bill, which likely will be unveiled this week, contains a provision aimed at cracking down 527 activities.

Lott also warned yesterday that it is easy to "lose control emotionally" and become overzealous when Congress looks at its own operations.

But skeptics in the lobbying community are quick to point out that lawmakers are paying more attention to them than congressional operations.

"They certainly aren't ratcheting down your ability to deliver a [campaign] check," said one Republican lobbyist.

Congressional aides said yesterday that they expect the amendment picture to become clearer after lawmakers meet for lunch today.

It was not clear whether leading critics of Dubai's involvement with American ports would offer an amendment. Israel Klein, a spokesman for Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), declined to rule out that possibility.

"We're obviously exploring all the options," Klein said.

DOJ_NMG_0016424

House GOP To Include 527 Language In Its Bill (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, March 7, 2006

House Republican leaders have told their Senate counterparts that legislation curtailing the activity of so-called 527 soft-money groups will be included in the House lobbying-reform bill that leaders intend for conference negotiations, according to knowledgeable sources.

The provisions affecting the 527 groups are expected to hew closely to a proposal crafted by Federal Election Commission (FEC) Chairman Michael Toner and former Commissioner Scott Thomas. Toner and Thomas unveiled the proposal in 2004 when Thomas was chairman of the agency, but it failed to muster enough support among their fellow commissioners to pass.

Restricting the activity of 527 groups, which generally are not subject to the campaign-finance regulations governing federal parties and candidates, is a high priority for Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. Including 527 language in the lobbying bill, however, would put Democrats in a politically difficult position.

Democrats have staked their campaign-year political message on cleaning up corruption in Washington, but they are so opposed to restricting 527 activity that many of them would vote against a bill that includes language affecting the groups.

Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Rules Committee, which has jurisdiction over lobbying reform, took to the floor yesterday to speak against linking lobbying reform with campaign-finance reform.

"There is a real risk of weighing down this bill with so many campaign-finance amendments that we will effectively kill it," Dodd said. "I hope that does not happen, and I urge my colleagues to withhold campaign-finance-related amendments until we get to a more appropriate vehicle for them to offer their ideas."

Democrats in general strongly oppose 527 restrictions because they have derived much more benefit from the groups than Republicans. Über-rich liberal donors such as George Soros and Peter Lewis poured tens of millions of dollars of their own money into 527 groups that campaigned for Democrats during the 2004 election cycle. The GOP has struggled to find conservative donors with pockets deep enough to counter them.

Lawmakers are considering lobbying reform on the Senate floor this week.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom his colleagues consider the leading voice on campaign-finance reform in the Senate and who is also active in Senate negotiations over lobbying reform, said the issue of what to do with 527 groups has yet to be settled.

"We haven't sorted that out," he said about linking 527 with lobbying legislation, though he noted that Mehlman has been outspoken on the need to curb soft-money groups.

McCain said he had discussed the issue with Senate colleagues but not with House leaders. He also said that he did not believe that all Democrats are opposed to 527 restrictions, citing as an example his ally on campaign-finance issues, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.).

The FEC has set spending regulations for 527 groups that register with the agency as political committees, but it has failed to answer the crucial question of what types of 527s must register. The failure to answer that question opened a gaping loophole in the regulation of 527s. Groups can avoid regulation simply by not registering with the FEC.

The Toner-Thomas proposal would require all 527 groups spending money for the purpose of influencing federal elections to register as political committees, said Don Simon, a lawyer with Sonosky Chambers Sachse Endeson and Perry, who closely follows 527 regulation proposals. Simon said he was not aware that House leaders had committed to linking 527 and lobby reform.

Simon said that if 527 groups are required to register as political committees they would be subject to spending limits. Any 527-funded ads that mention a federal candidate would have to be paid for with hard money. Hard money can only be raised in limited increments, in contrast to soft money, which can be raised in unlimited-size donations.

Requiring 527 groups to fund their activities with hard money would dramatically erode their political effectiveness. Republican leaders fear that if the law remains unchanged, 527s will soon rival the national parties in political power and ability.

DOJ_NMG_0016425

If required to register with the FEC, 527s would also have to fund 50 percent of their generic voter-mobilization activity with hard money, Simon said. 527s that air ads mentioning federal and nonfederal candidates would have to pay for the activity with a mix of hard and soft money based on how the ads divided time and space between the candidates, he said.

A senior House Republican aide said he did not know when leaders would unveil their lobbying-reform bill, which Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has worked on alongside Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.).

Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said that Republicans should work on a bipartisan basis with Democrats on lobbying reform.

She referred questions about linking 527 and lobbying reform to Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.), who has sponsored legislation regulating 527s.

"[Meehan] believes that real lobbying reform must be clean and straightforward and should not encompass other issues, be it 527 reform or anything else," said his spokeswoman, Sandra Salstrom.

How Congress Benefits From Corporate Flights (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — It was a busy weekend last November for the flight crew of BellSouth's corporate jet. Over three days, they crisscrossed the Southeast, ferrying six U.S. senators, two of their wives, a trio of political consultants and two of the company's Washington lobbyists to Republican and Democratic fundraising events.

To charter a comparable Cessna Citation for that three-day itinerary would have cost $40,800, not including food and drinks. The two parties' campaign committees reimbursed BellSouth $8,364.94 for the flights, in line with campaign-finance rules that call for the equivalent of first-class commercial airfare for each traveler.

For members of Congress — its top leaders, in particular — the service is an accepted convenience of immense value in their whirlwind schedules, worth far more than the reimbursements the rules require. They can skip security lines, ignore airline schedules and stretch out in roomy leather seats. For corporations that provide the service, it's a chance to do favors for the powerful and gain influence unavailable to those without air fleets.

Public records and internal company documents obtained by USA TODAY show that over the past four years, BellSouth has flown federal government officials on such political trips about 100 times. The internal records offer rare detail about who goes on the trips and why — information that lawmakers and companies aren't now required to reveal.

This perk for lawmakers is under scrutiny this week as the Senate seeks to rewrite the rules of the influence game in the midst of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., are pushing to curb the cut-rate travel service.

BellSouth's internal documents, covering 2002 through 2005, were provided by Vicki Taylor, who has worked for 15 years as a secretary in BellSouth's Washington lobbying office. Taylor, 53, said she sought out reporters because she was concerned about company practices she believed violated internal expense-account rules. She is now on paid administrative leave pending an internal investigation.

BellSouth spokesman Bill McCloskey acknowledged the documents were authentic.

Top travelers with the regional telephone company include House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Democratic Sens. Tom Daschle of South Dakota and John Breaux of Louisiana, both now retired.

The lawmakers' campaign committees or the political parties routinely reimbursed the company for first-class airfare — normally a fraction of the market value of the trips — but neither they nor the company are required to disclose anything else. Campaign funds can be used to pay political expenses or costs associated with lawmakers' official duties, such as meetings with constituents, says Kenneth Gross, a campaign-finance lawyer.

BellSouth is one of dozens of large corporations with intense lobbying agendas in Washington that use their corporate jets to curry favor with key lawmakers. BellSouth has agreed to be acquired by AT&T, which was recently purchased by another telecommunications company, SBC. Neither SBC nor AT&T has provided the same level of service on its corporate jets.

DOJ_NMG_0016426

FedEx, U.S. Tobacco, Union Pacific, the Texas plaintiff's law firm of Baron & Budd, Burlington Northern Santa Fe, R.J. Reynolds and generic-drug maker Barr Laboratories are among those companies that most frequently whisk members of Congress around the country upon request, according to figures released Monday by PoliticalMoneyLine, which compiles data on money and politics.

In the past five years, federal politicians and political parties reimbursed 286 corporations $3.7 million for 2,154 trips, according to the PoliticalMoneyLine figures.

"You can sit down and have a cocktail and talk casually about a matter, rather than rushing in between meetings on Capitol Hill," says Wright Andrews, a veteran Washington lobbyist. "You are a heavy hitter if you've got a jet."

BellSouth's McCloskey said providing transportation to federal officials "gives us an opportunity to form relationships, to have a long stretch of time to explain issues that are technical and complicated. If it wasn't useful, we wouldn't do it." The company lobbies Congress on issues ranging from broadband to copyrights, international trade and excise taxes on phone service.

Advocates of an ethics overhaul, including McCain and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., have called for requiring lawmakers to reimburse companies for the full cost of a charter flight when they hop aboard their jets. That would make the practice so costly it would be tantamount to banning it, says Fred Wertheimer, president of the ethics watchdog group Democracy 21.

McCain and Lieberman plan to offer an amendment during Senate debate that would require politicians to reimburse the full charter rate and disclose details of corporate plane trips. The current rule "provides an end-run of limitations on what corporations can contribute or give as gifts," Lieberman said Monday.

A poll in January found strong public support for ending cut-rate travel by lawmakers on corporate planes. The Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg Poll found 72% of Americans support banning the practice, and 21% oppose a ban.

Details about corporate plane use are not normally disclosed. The only way the public can find out about the trips is by combing through campaign-finance reports. That reveals nothing about who went on the trip, where they went or the purpose of the travel.

The practice was spotlighted in the case of Randy "Duke" Cunningham, a California Republican who resigned his House seat Nov. 28 after pleading guilty to taking at least $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Brent Wilkes, founder of the defense company ADCS, flew Cunningham to an Idaho hunting trip on Group W Transportation, his private Lear jet, according to campaign-finance records.

"It's a big perk for members of Congress, which I can assure you is not available to the general public," Wertheimer says. "There is no legitimate rationale for it."

On Friday, Nov. 11, BellSouth's Cessna 560 XL, tail number N404SB, left its Atlanta base and flew to Washington's Dulles Airport to pick up Republican Sens. Bob Bennett of Utah, Mike Crapo of Idaho and Kit Bond of Missouri. Two of the senators' wives and Ward White, a BellSouth lobbyist, were along for the trip, according to a company flight manifest. The trip was arranged by the GOP Senate campaign committee, which like its Democratic counterpart keeps a list of companies that make their planes available.

The group flew to St. Simons Island, Ga., for a weekend retreat at the sumptuous Sea Island resort with members of the party's Senate Council, a club for corporate donors whose political action committees have given at least $5,000. (BellSouth's PAC gave $12,500 to the Republican Senate committee last year.) The party included White in a private dinner Nov. 11 with Bond and Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John Warner of Virginia.

While the senators joined contributors and their lobbyists for a weekend of briefings, golf, tennis, skeet and trap shooting, and a guided nature walk, the corporate jet headed back to Washington on Nov. 12 to pick up more senators.

This time, according to the company documents, it was Democrats: Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Maria Cantwell of Washington, headed for a party fundraising event near Orlando. They were accompanied by BellSouth lobbyist Broderick Johnson. After dropping them off, the BellSouth jet returned to Georgia, where on Sunday, it picked up Bennett, Crapo and Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and lobbyist White for the trip to Washington.

Reid and Cantwell turned to another special interest for the rest of their trip: the Texas law firm of Mikal Watts, which flew them on to Oxford, Miss., for another party fundraiser, according to campaign-finance records. Cantwell took a commercial flight back to Washington, while Reid continued to Dallas on the Watts plane for another money event, then returned to Washington aboard the plane of the Baron & Budd law firm. The law firms did not respond to requests for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0016427

Campaign-finance records show the Democratic Senate committee reimbursed Watts $4,510.10 and Baron & Budd $2,836.80. The Texas law firms lobby Congress against limiting the liability lawsuits that are their primary business.

Lawmakers asked about the travel defended their use of corporate planes as a necessity in the fast-paced world of politics.

Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said the practice is essential for top congressional leaders. “It would be impossible to keep the kind of schedule that he does on these trips throughout the country without being able to use these jets every once in a while,” Manley said.

Hastert did not respond to calls for comment. As the No. 3 House GOP leader, Blunt has responsibilities to help Republicans get elected and preserve the party's House majority, said spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger. “Private travel enabled him to reach multiple campaign events — many times in remote locations — often in a single day,” she wrote in an e-mail response to questions.

Bond's spokesman, Rob Ostrander, said the senator believes that “as long as the practice is not abused and there is appropriate reimbursement, it should remain an option.”

Attending political fundraisers was the most common purpose for congressional travelers aboard BellSouth's jet, but not the only purpose. In 2004, the company flew Rep. Dick Gephardt and Sen. John Edwards as part of their presidential campaigns; shuttled Sen. John Breaux, D-La., home from his party's convention in Boston; and took Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton from New York to the Kennedy family clambake in Hyannis, Mass., the company's records show.

BellSouth also flew Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, to a U.S. Telecom Association meeting in Denver in 2003. Barton is chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which controls telecommunications policy. Lott flew home or to Washington with the company on at least four occasions. Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., caught a ride to give a speech and attend the Kentucky Derby in 2003.

The most frequent flier with BellSouth in 2002-04 was Hastert, who traveled aboard the company's planes nine times, company documents show. Blunt, the No. 3 House leader, flew eight times, and Lott, who was Senate majority leader in 2002, was aboard six times during that period. A company lobbyist was aboard each time.

The rules that require reimbursement at the first-class commercial ticket rate date back two decades or more, says Scott Thomas, a former member of the Federal Election Commission who advises legal clients on ethics issues. At the time, “there wasn't any good way to track what the actual fair-market charter rate would be,” he says, so the commission adopted the rule requiring reimbursement at the first-class rate.

That rationale was made obsolete by the Internet, which makes it easy to look up the cost of a charter flight, Thomas says, but the rules haven't kept up. “It's ripe for reconsideration,” he says. At a minimum, there should be greater disclosure of trips, Thomas says.

The demand for convenient travel apparently drives the practice at least as much as corporations' desire to gain a lobbying advantage.

As often as BellSouth transported lawmakers, it turned down even more requests. A company document shows that in 2004, its planes took 28 trips for members of the House and Senate — 18 for Republicans, 10 for Democrats. It turned down requests for an additional 109 trips because planes weren't available.

Two senators turned down for requested trips in 2004 — McCain and Democrat Barack Obama of Illinois — have since emerged as spokesmen for sweeping ethics changes and have voluntarily imposed limits on their own use of corporate planes.

McCain, a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, decided late last year to abandon the practice entirely, instead using charter flights when needed. Obama announced in January that he would reimburse the full market value of such flights.

Robo-caller Thrives Amid Talk Of Change (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, March 7, 2006

As the Senate today begins debating proposed disclosure requirements for grassroots lobbying activity, a Democratic-leaning grassroots lobbying firm is helping to hit as many as 20 House Republicans with prerecorded, in-district phone calls attacking their records on port security.

The calls are funded by American Family Voices (AFV), a nonprofit group led by Clinton administration veteran Mike Lux and allied with Lux's firm Progressive Strategies. According to its website, the firm promotes "extensive experience in grassroots organizing and politics."

While Lux declined to reveal the identities of the House Republicans targeted for calls, Reps. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Bob Ney (R-Ohio) have reacted angrily to the calls taking place in their districts, charging AFV with capitalizing on the Dubai ports-management controversy for political gain.

Lux founded AFV in 2000 after leaving the lobbying team at People for the American Way, adding a 527 group called MainStreet USA to his arsenal during the 2004 election cycle. Lux said the main advantage of AFV's grassroots push on port security, which Democrats have begun seizing on as a winning issue for this November's midterms, is the ability to keep his donors and expenses secret.

"This is all a game of chess," Lux said, and if your opponent knows where you're moving "you kind of lose your advantage.

"Frankly, that's one advantage of calls over ads — we can do this and send a shot across their bow without the other side knowing exactly where we're going."

But AFV and other nonprofits engaging in grassroots lobbying soon could be forced to reveal political strategies and financial backers under an amendment attached to one of the Senate's two pending lobbying-reform bills.

The amendment, sponsored by Sens. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), would require grassroots lobbyists such as Lux to register with the clerk of the House and disclose their spending within 45 days after starting an initiative.

Conservative nonprofit groups last month assembled a coalition called LobbySense to help bring down the Senate's original grassroots lobbying-disclosure provision, authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) but replaced with the Lieberman-Levin language at last week's markup in the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

LobbySense members include Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform, Tom McClusky of the Family Research Council and Tom Schatz of Citizens Against Government Waste. Spokeswoman Kerri Houston said the coalition plans to recruit liberal partners if the new grassroots disclosure rules spring up in any future House lobbying-reform bills.

While critical of AFV's political stance, Houston defended the group's right to run the phone calls against Republican lawmakers without having to reveal its supporters.

"From an ideological perspective, I wish they would go away because I completely disagree with them, but I'd defend to the death their right to say things I disagree with," Houston said. Echoing Lux's argument in favor of preserving secrecy for grassroots-issue campaigns, Houston added that under the Lieberman-Levin provision, "you're now explaining to your competition what your plans are."

House Republicans on the receiving end of the AFV automated phone messages, a style known as "robo calls" for their robotic narration, were loath to condone AFV's right to operate in secret.

"What we're seeing in our district is part of a coordination of Democrat groups to use front groups" such as AFV as political messengers, Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said. "It's the pot calling the kettle black. They say one thing in Washington [about lobbying reform], then they turn around in the districts" and run robo-call operations.

Walsh pointed out Ney's quick opposition to the White House's approval of the Dubai ports-management deal, cleared for national security risks in January but sharply criticized in recent weeks by Republicans and Democrats alike. Ney also has signed on to a bill written by Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, that would give Congress ultimate veto power over the Dubai deal.

In a statement issued last week, DeLay campaign spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty defended the former House majority leader against AFV's robo calls.

"As everyone who has picked up a newspaper in the last week knows, Congressman DeLay said he disagreed with the president on the Dubai ports deal," said Flaherty, who played up AFV's past support from the Association of Trial Lawyers of America and Lux's experience in the Clinton administration.

Senators supporting the Lieberman-Levin provision argue that transparency will make grassroots lobbying operations more accountable without having a chilling effect. But AFV, which uses its Campaign for a Cleaner Congress affiliate to help marshal support for lobbying-reform legislation, greatly benefits from the current lack of reporting restrictions.

"My whole goal is to work in close connection with the rest of the progressive community and have our organization be a free safety that can move on a dime, plug holes, work on issues that come up all of a sudden and go where other people aren't going to provide some political muscle," Lux said. AFV's role model, he added, is the conservative nonprofit Progress for America, well-known for its potent grassroots lobbying on Supreme Court nominations.

Although Lux blasted House Republicans for shooting down a Democratic parliamentary maneuver to force consideration of a bill similar to King's, he said the calls were aimed more at embarrassing Republicans than scoring on port security.

"We want to win on the issue … but from a political point of view, exposing the other side as hypocrites is always a good thing to do," Lux said.

Simmons has long crusaded against the national do-not-call registry's exemption for political robo calls, sponsoring three bills that would crack down on prerecorded messages from AFV and other groups. Stealing a page from Lux's playbook, Simmons's office urged constituents to call AFV and complain about the calls.

"For the past two years, stealthy partisan organizations led by American Family Voices have used robo calls to bother, harass and annoy while disseminating false information about me and my voting record," said Simmons, who is also co-sponsoring the King port-security legislation.

'I Will Not Seek Reelection' (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Bob Cusack

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), the fiery chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, announced yesterday that he will not seek reelection this year, ending the congressional tenure of one of Capitol Hill's most polarizing but effective figures.

Forced to relinquish the Ways and Means gavel at the end of this Congress because of GOP term limits on the post, Thomas announced the decision from his district office in Bakersfield, Calif., with his wife, Sharon, at his side.

"Today, I am announcing that I will not seek reelection to the United States Congress," Thomas said, according to a release from his office.

During his tenure, Thomas passed a number of President Bush's legislative priorities, including a series of large tax cuts, trade-promotion authority for the administration to negotiate trade deals and the controversial Medicare prescription-drug plan.

However, the 64-year-old lawmaker did not get an opportunity to enact Social Security reform, Bush's top legislative initiative in 2005. Before Thomas could introduce his retirement-savings package, political momentum for a Social Security revamp plummeted.

Thomas declined to say what he intends to do after leaving Congress at the end of this term, and he hinted yesterday that he would still like to reform the country's tax code before leaving office.

His announcement sparked fawning praise from Republicans throughout Washington.

"Chairman Bill Thomas is one of America's finest servants and one of the most thoughtful, determined members of the House of Representatives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said in a statement. "I'm sorry to see him go."

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) hinted that Thomas's life in public service may not be over: "I wish him the best and look forward to working with him for the rest of this Congress and again in the future."

There has been speculation that Thomas could join the Bush administration next year, possibly as treasury secretary. Thomas did not rule out the possibility of joining the administration down the road, before adding that he is "taking it one step at a time."

Bush said Thomas "is a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader."

Thomas kept his retirement decision a closely held secret right up until yesterday's announcement. The Californian told Hastert late last week about his decision to retire, a senior GOP leadership aide said, but he never told National Republican

DOJ_NMG_0016430

Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), a spokesman said, and was typically tight-lipped with his closest supporters in California.

Rep. Devin Nunes (Calif.), a second-term Republican representing a neighboring district, said that he has known of Thomas's decision to retire for a few weeks but that Thomas never explicitly told him his plans. Instead, he laid out the scenario for what would happen if he chose to retire, tipping Nunes and others off to the decision announced yesterday.

"I don't think there is any talking Bill out of it," Nunes said of his occasional mentor. "I would be surprised if he doesn't go down as the best Ways and Means chairman … or at least at the top of the list."

Unable to get a waiver for that chairmanship, some believed that Thomas would become the next chairman of the House Budget Committee if he chose to remain in Congress. He has opted to pursue a life off Capitol Hill after an almost-28-year congressional career.

Thomas has a rare institutional acumen that has allowed him to pass a number of controversial bills through the House. He has also proved to be a partisan battler who has stoked the ire of his Democratic colleagues.

The combative Republican once called the Capitol Police to remove committee Democrats from a Ways and Means library during panel deliberations on pension reform. He later broke into tears on the House floor while apologizing for the move.

As chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health in from 1995-2000, Thomas conducted rigorous oversight of the Clinton administration. During one such hearing, Thomas admonished a Clinton administration official for mentioning a Medicare website without referring to the "www" prefix.

Thomas also regularly clashed with his counterpart in the upper chamber, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), over a range of legislative matters.

Grassley yesterday said, "Chairman Thomas has another nine months as chairman. He's not a lame-duck type. … The media like to make a lot of the so-called differences between Chairman Thomas and me. In reality, we have a lot more in common than people might think."

In an interview on C-SPAN last month, Thomas promised to unveil major bills on tax, trade and healthcare in the coming weeks.

"I'm not walking away into the sunset. I'm going to work," he said yesterday.

Thomas has been a forceful member of the Republican Conference during its 11-plus years in the majority. He often reminds members who are wavering on legislation how much harder life was as a member of the minority, imploring them to rally around their leaders and cast difficult votes.

He has also caused fits for Republican leaders in both chambers. He was reluctant to share details of his Social Security reform plan with Hastert and other leaders in the House and Senate. More recently, he opposed an appropriations bill late last fall because a provision in the legislation had the potential to undermine the Medicare prescription-drug benefit he helped craft.

He and then-Education and the Workforce Chairman Boehner late last year went around leadership to pass a House version of pension-reform legislation after acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) suggested the bill did not have sufficient support to bring to the floor.

Thomas subsequently gave Boehner's nominating speech during his successful campaign to be majority leader.

He has been grooming Republican state Sen. Kevin McCarthy to replace him in Washington, but a fellow GOP state senator, Roy Ashburn, who lost his race to unseat Rep. Jim Costa (D-Calif.) last cycle, might challenge McCarthy for the seat.

The district is staunchly Republican, but Democratic state Sen. Dean Florez has also been mentioned as a possible candidate. The registration deadline is Friday.

Highlights of the career of REP. Bill thomas (R-Calif.)

1978 — Wins election to Congress

1995 — Becomes chairman of the House Administration Committee and the Ways and Means Health Subcommittee

1997 — Plays key role in passing the Balanced Budget Act of 1997

2001 — Is appointed chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and subsequently pushes through President Bush's $1.3 billion tax-cut package

DOJ_NMG_0016431

2003 — Apologizes on the House floor for ordering his staff to call the Capitol Police after Democrats refused to leave the Ways and Means Committee library

2003 — Crafts the Medicare prescription-drug bill, which narrowly clears Congress

2006 — Gives the nominating speech for Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) to become majority leader

2006 — Announces his retirement

Ways And Means Chairman Thomas To Retire (AP-Y2)

By Mary Dalrymple, Ap Tax Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

President Bush lost the congressional engineer who turned many of his campaign promises for tax cuts, free trade and prescription drugs into reality with the retirement of Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas.

The former college professor, a Republican from California, announced Monday that he will retire from Congress at the end of the year, when GOP rules force him to step down as chairman. The committee, Thomas said from his hometown in Bakersfield, Calif., "has the most impact on every American's life."

Since 2001, when Bush took office and Thomas took the helm of the panel, he steered several major tax cuts into law that lowered tax rates on most wage earners and shrank tax bills on investment income. He turned a long-promised Medicare prescription drug subsidy for the elderly into law, and eased the president's ability to pass trade pacts negotiated with other nations.

Bush called Thomas "a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader," praising him in a statement for helping pass legislation that led to strong job creation, economic growth, improved health care and free and fair trade.

One failure proved the rule. Thomas could not muster the support needed to transform the Social Security retirement and disability benefits program. He recently called it "a personal failure and very disappointing" that he could not spark a debate over the government's support programs for health care and retirement, which grow automatically each year.

He's rumored to be a future contender for Treasury secretary, but Thomas said Monday he will wait until the end of the year to make plans for his life after lawmaking. He's the 14th House Republican to retire this year, compared with only five Democrats.

The Republican next in line on the panel — Rep. Clay Shaw of Florida — immediately spoke up to say he's ready to fill Thomas' shoes. "As Ways and Means chairman, I intend to move legislation that makes our tax code more fair and efficient," Shaw said in a statement.

Next in line after Shaw, Rep. Nancy Johnson (news, bio, voting record), R-Conn., said in an interview that she would be comfortable with Shaw taking the helm, but added, "If it becomes an open race, then I am a candidate."

Rep. Jim McCrery (news, bio, voting record), R-La., who has a very close working relationship with Thomas and is most mentioned as his replacement, remained mum regarding the panel's future leadership. He issued a statement calling Thomas "one of the most capable and successful chairmen in the 204-year history of the House Ways and Means Committee."

Lawmakers and others attribute Thomas' success to a rare ability to master the intricacies of policy while keeping an accurate pulse on the lawmakers he needs to vote for his bills.

"He understood the policy extremely well, and he also understood how to legislate," said Mark Weinberger, Bush's first assistant secretary for tax policy at the Treasury Department. "You need both."

In more than a quarter century in Congress, Thomas displayed an impatience and fiery streak that sometimes led to conflict with other lawmakers, often Democrats. Three years ago, he called the Capitol Police to break up a meeting of committee Democrats, then expressed teary regrets on the House floor.

Jim DeMint, R-S.C., once a House lawmaker and now a senator, criticized Thomas for not listening to some in the GOP during a debate over contentious legislation giving the president fast-track authority to negotiate global trade agreements.

"Bill Thomas has kept us in the dark," DeMint said at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0016432

That's a criticism echoed by the Ways and Means Committee's top Democrat, Rep. Charles Rangel (news, bio, voting record) of New York, who said Thomas was so successful because he exercised nearly complete control over legislation, circumventing the traditional collaborative process.

It was "more like a poker game where the hands were already dealt out before you sat at the table," Rangel said in an interview.

Despite their repeated political and legislative clashes on the committee, Rangel said he and the chairman never had any personal conflicts. If Thomas might sometimes be too abrasive, Rangel said, it's balanced by the fact that "he's probably one of the brightest members in the House of Representatives."

"God doesn't give you everything," he said.

House Ways And Means Chairman Says He's Retiring (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Richard Wolf

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — One of the most powerful Republicans on Capitol Hill, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas of California, announced Monday that he will not seek re-election in November, when his party will be fighting to retain its majority.

Thomas, 64, has headed the tax-writing committee since 2001. He played a key role in winning passage of President Bush's tax-cut proposals, the Medicare prescription-drug plan and free trade agreements. Sixty-eight percent of his district voted for President Bush in 2004, so his decision to retire may not pose any immediate opportunities for Democrats.

All 435 House seats are up for election this year. Democrats need to pick up an additional 15 to win a majority. So far, only a few of the seats being vacated seem likely to be competitive.

“I would say the open seats at this point haven't yielded for Democrats what they need,” says Stu Rothenberg, editor of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report.

Even so, some analysts believe that Thomas' decision to step down represents a troubling trend of experienced Republicans leaving.

Thomas is one of 17 Republican and eight Democratic House members who have decided not to run for re-election this fall. Five of the Republicans are losing their powerful committee posts because of term limits imposed by the caucus. They are Thomas; Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, chairman of the Budget Committee; Henry Hyde, R-Ill., chairman of the International Relations Committee; Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, chairman of the Financial Services Committee; and Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that funds the nation's overseas operations.

Under rules adopted after Republicans won control of the House in 1994, committee chairs must give up their posts after six years. The idea was to prevent the development of political fiefdoms by rotating power among members.

Other retirements are possible. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., who loses his post as House Science Committee chairman at the end of the year, has said he'll announce his re-election plans this month. His district may be competitive.

Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, says it has also created a problem in the Republican ranks. Term limits for chairmen have resulted in “an acceleration of retirements, often from among the most able members,” he says.

Thomas' decision also may indicate that ambitious policymakers don't see many opportunities in the next session of Congress, Rothenberg says. “The last two years of the Bush administration are not going to be a good time for doing big, important things,” he says.

In a news conference at his California district office, Thomas quoted Los Angeles Dodger pitching star Sandy Koufax, who retired at the peak of his career. “I could pitch another game, but why?” he said.

One of Congress' memorable personalities, Thomas once called Capitol Hill police to round up Democrats for a committee vote, then burst into tears during an apology on the House floor. GOP colleagues hailed him as a skilled strategist. “He's the best I've ever seen at developing a legislative strategy to get important pieces of legislation passed,” said Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., a leading candidate to replace Thomas as Ways and Means chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0016433

Democrats said Thomas ignored them. “Picking up one or two Democratic votes was his idea of bipartisanship,” said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., top Ways and Means Democrat.

A Powerful House Republican Plans To Retire (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — Representative Bill Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee and a chief legislative architect of the Medicare prescription drug law and the Bush administration's tax cut agenda, announced Monday that he would retire at the end of this year.

Mr. Thomas is in the final year of his term as chairman, under Republican House rules limiting chairmanships to six years, and his announcement was not unexpected.

A member of the House since 1978, when Republicans were in the minority, Mr. Thomas waited a long time for power and relished his job as chairman of a committee with sweeping influence over tax policy, health care, trade and the economy. Many had found it hard to imagine Mr. Thomas, a proud and mercurial man, remaining in Congress without that job.

"At a time when my party controlled the House, the Senate and the presidency, it was my privilege to chair the committee that I believe has the most impact on every American's life," Mr. Thomas said Monday, according to a transcript of a news conference held in his Congressional district in Bakersfield, Calif.

Mr. Thomas invoked the example of the Dodgers pitcher Sandy Koufax retiring at his peak: "I admired him when he said, 'I could pitch another game, but why?' "

Democrats quickly cited Mr. Thomas's retirement as an example of Republican incumbents' "sensing the winds of change blowing at gale force," as Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, put it. "It says they have a sense of what's out there, politically, this year," said Mr. Emanuel, who predicts a Democratic wave in this fall's elections.

But whatever the national outlook, political strategists expect Mr. Thomas's district to remain Republican; it gave 68 percent of its vote to President Bush in 2004. "We'll easily retain it," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Mr. Thomas's successor as committee chairman will be chosen by the House Republican steering committee, which is dominated by the leadership, and then ratified by the full Republican conference. The maneuvering for the job quickly intensified. Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida is next in line by virtue of seniority, and quickly signaled his interest. But House Republicans do not always follow strict seniority rules.

Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, who ranks below Mr. Shaw, is also considered a leading candidate. And Representative Nancy L. Johnson of Connecticut, who ranks between them, indicated Monday that she would defer to Mr. Shaw, but that "if it becomes an open race," she would jump in.

Mr. Thomas's retirement will mean the passing of one of the most effective — and polarizing — legislators. Nowhere was his legislative power more apparent than on the 2003 overhaul of Medicare, which offered the nation's retirees and disabled a long-promised prescription drug benefit and created a sweeping new role for private health plans in the government insurance program.

Democrats said they were essentially shut out of the legislative conference that produced the final bill — part of what they asserted was a long pattern by Mr. Thomas. And while Mr. Thomas and his fellow Republicans succeeded in passing the Medicare law, the partisan and ideological fights it spawned continue.

Mr. Thomas, who had served 16 years under a Democratic majority, said that the Democrats simply could not accept their life in the minority, and that they viewed power as "their birthright."

While acknowledging that he had shortcomings, Mr. Thomas argued in an interview in 2002 that his personality was ideally suited for pushing through his party's economic agenda with what was often a razor-thin majority.

"Why did Eisenhower give Patton the job of moving across Germany at lighting speed?" he asked. "Because he knew Patton would do it. Sometimes hills just need to be captured."

DOJ_NMG_0016434

In fact, even his enemies rarely disputed Mr. Thomas's effectiveness or his command of sprawling, complex programs like Medicare. In Mr. Bush's second term, however, the president's agenda has proved a far harder sell, and Mr. Thomas was unable to move the administration's proposal to create private accounts in Social Security.

In his news conference Monday, Mr. Thomas noted that he still had about nine months left in his term and a full agenda on tax cuts, trade and pension restructuring.

"Rather than read my headstone now, let's see if I can't carve a few more things in it before you retire me," said Mr. Thomas, a 64-year-old former political science professor.

There was speculation in political circles that Mr. Thomas might end up with a job in the Bush administration, and Mr. Bush praised him effusively on Monday as "a friend and a man of great accomplishment." But Mr. Thomas was coy about his future.

"I've got nine months still to go," he said. "I'm not walking away into the sunset. I'm going to work."

Ways And Means Chairman To Step Down (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), the irascible House Ways and Means Committee chairman who helped shepherd through President Bush's biggest domestic policy initiatives, announced yesterday that he will retire at the end of the year.

House Republican term limits would have forced Thomas, 64, to give up his perch on the powerful committee before the next Congress, a prospect that pushed the 14-term lawmaker toward his decision. His is the highest-profile in a string of retirement announcements that brings the total of seats being vacated to 26, 16 of them by Republicans.

"Ever since I was first elected to Congress in 1978, I set a goal to study the issues and become as effective a legislator as I could be to promote the interests of my constituents, the state of California and our nation," Thomas said from his office in Bakersfield, Calif. "In doing so, I have been extremely grateful to the voters who have returned me to office over the past four decades, and I hope, through legislation, advocacy and constituent service, that I have returned that appreciation."

"Congressman Bill Thomas is a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader in the House of Representatives," Bush said.

Thomas will leave an impressive record of legislative accomplishment that includes passage of six tax cuts in the past five years, a Medicare prescription drug benefit that was the most significant expansion of the program since its inception, and a slew of hard-fought free trade agreements. Still within reach is a major restructuring of the nation's private pension system.

"Thomas was terrific," said Mark Weinberger, who was assistant Treasury secretary for tax policy during the 2001 tax cut fight. "Not only did he understand the policy of arcane trade, tax and health care issues, but he knew how to legislate. And when you have both of those things, you become a very formidable negotiator."

But Thomas's reputation as a shrewd legislative tactician has a dark side: He has shown himself willing to bully friends and adversaries alike if his arguments do not prove persuasive.

"There's no question the chairman rubs people the wrong way with his brusqueness and his irascible countenance. He doesn't suffer fools well, and that gets him into trouble," said Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), who is widely seen as the front-runner to succeed Thomas if Republicans maintain control of the House. "But if he didn't have something like that, he'd be darned near perfect."

In July 2003, GOP leaders forced him to deliver a tearful apology on the House floor for summoning the Capitol Police to evict committee Democrats from a Ways and Means library. He also apologized to Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) after accusing her of taking a stance on medical malpractice legislation because she faced reelection, which she was not.

Democrats may have a hard time forgiving him for the imperial way he ran his committee. Thomas held only a few perfunctory hearings, keeping even Republicans largely in the dark as he drafted legislation, then giving committee members just hours to digest complex, voluminous bills before slamming them through on party-line votes, said Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), the Ways and Means Committee's ranking Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0016435

"I really think the methods he used to accomplish his goals have done severe damage to the legislative process . . . and really damaged relations between the parties," Rangel said.

Thomas is likely to retire without one marquee law that is seen as his masterwork. Bush had hoped last year that Thomas could rescue his foundering Social Security restructuring by folding it into a broader, more popular retirement security initiative. But even Bush aides say Thomas was brought into the process too late to save it.

But in little more than five years as chairman, Thomas left a mark. He leapfrogged over a more senior committee member, former representative Phil Crane (R-Ill.), to become chairman.

That year, Thomas folded provisions to entice more retirement and pension savings into the president's 2001 tax cut. Then, against the wishes of the White House, he broke the 10-year, $1.35 trillion tax reduction into small pieces that passed Congress with unexpected ease.

In 2003, he rejected Bush's complex proposal to end taxation of dividends from fully taxed corporate earnings, replacing it with a simpler 15-percent tax rate on dividends and capital gains.

Rep. Thomas Announces Retirement From Congress (REU-Y2)

Reuters, March 6, 2006

U.S. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas said on Monday he would retire from the House of Representatives at the end of his current term, leaving open to speculation the future for the veteran lawmaker.

The California Republican, who was instrumental in helping President George W. Bush win passage of his tax cut proposals, would have stepped down as chairman of the powerful tax writing committee after this year anyway because of term limits set by House Republicans.

"Over the next nine months, I intend to continue to work hard and finish my congressional term with the same vigor as the first," Thomas said in a statement. He made the announcement at a news conference in Bakersfield, California, in his home district.

"Challenges lie ahead, and I intend to work hard to tackle the problems caused by our outdated entitlement programs and our currently flawed income tax structure," he added.

Known for his sharp wit and sometimes sharp tongue, Thomas, 65, was first elected to Congress in 1978. He took over chairmanship of Ways and Means in January 2001.

Thomas' grasp of details and knowledge of the Medicare prescription drug plan for the elderly proved valuable in helping get that complex legislation through Congress in 2003.

He has been mentioned by some Republican sources as among those being considered by the White House to eventually replace Treasury Secretary John Snow. It is widely believed that Snow may not stay through the end of Bush's term.

Thomas Leaves On Top (RC)

By David M. Drucker and Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

Fourteen-term Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) announced Monday that he will retire at the end of this Congress, leaving a notable legislative and institutional stamp on the House and heated races to replace him atop the Ways and Means Committee and in California's 22nd district.

Thomas' former district director, state Assembly Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R), is hoping to succeed his old boss. McCarthy's most likely challenger in the June 6 Republican primary is another former Thomas aide, state Sen. Roy Ashburn (R), although he had a previous falling out with the incumbent.

"McCarthy is going to have the support of Washington because of Thomas and myself, so I don't see how Ashburn can make much of a race of it," said Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.), who holds the district adjacent to the 22nd after Thomas helped him survive a tough GOP primary in 2002.

Nunes said McCarthy has nailed down commitments from most donors and secured the endorsements of almost all of the local elected officials in Bakersfield and San Luis Obispo County.

DOJ_NMG_0016436

"I'm not trying to skew this thing. The political reality of it is, it's not going to be a race if Ashburn runs, and I think he knows that," Nunes said.

Thomas last year was one of the very few Republicans in California's Congressional delegation to support Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's (R) failed effort to inject competition into California's redistricting process and overhaul how House and legislative seats are drawn. Not coincidentally, McCarthy was one of the most ardent proponents of the effort, carrying the primary legislative vehicle for the reform in the state Assembly.

In explaining his decision to retire, Thomas said he hoped to spend more time with his wife and grandchildren, and that he no longer relished the thought of spending eight hours on an airplane twice a week at the age of 65.

"Twenty-eight years of that probably should be enough for anyone, don't you think?" Thomas said.

And while he is still young enough to do the work, Thomas — a longtime Los Angeles Dodgers fan — cited the example of one of his heroes who retired at the top of his game.

"I've used as an analogy Sandy Koufax," Thomas said. "He was one of my favorites on the Dodgers, and I admired him when he said, 'I could pitch another game, but why?'"

The 22nd district, stretching from Bakersfield to the San Luis Obispo County Coast, gave President Bush 68 percent of the vote in 2004 and Thomas ran unopposed in that election, and it should be won without a problem by the victor in the Republican primary.

Knowledgeable Republican sources say McCarthy has been preparing for weeks to run to succeed Thomas, and confirm Nunes account that he has secured the key endorsements and fundraising commitments from throughout the district.

When Thomas does endorse McCarthy, he will most assuredly be able to connect the Assemblyman to the business-based fundraising pipeline that has long backed his campaigns, something he was able to do for Nunes in 2002. Still, an Ashburn aide confirmed Monday that the state Senator is planning to forgo re-election to his safe legislative seat to run in the GOP primary.

The deadline to file to run for Congress in California is Friday, with some Republicans speculating that Ashburn ultimately won't run, as he has already filed to run for re-election to his state Senate seat. McCarthy, though he had claimed not to be aware of Thomas' plans, never filed to run for re-election to the Assembly.

McCarthy said Monday he would publicize his future plans at 3 p.m. EST today at a news conference in Bakersfield. Beyond that, he did not want to intrude on a day that he said belonged to Thomas.

"He's done a great job for his community, his state and his country," McCarthy said. Thomas, when asked by reporters Monday, declined to endorse any candidates, saying he would wait to see who files to run for his seat.

Thomas has long engendered mixed feelings in his colleagues.

Lawmakers from both parties have complained over the years about the Californian's stubbornness and condescending attitude. His relationship with Ways and Means Democrats has been particularly rough, especially since he called the Capitol Police in 2003 to remove Democrats from a committee room during a contentious markup.

At the same time, Thomas' fellow Republicans have come to appreciate him for his policy acumen and his ability to shepherd difficult, complex pieces of legislation to passage.

While retiring lawmakers usually garner praise from the leadership, Thomas' announcement brought forth an unusual amount of hyperbole.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said Thomas was "one of America's finest servants and one of the most thoughtful, determined Members of the House of Representatives."

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the work Thomas "has accomplished on behalf of the American people, whether to lower taxes, provide quality health care, or create new jobs, has quite frankly been extraordinary. He has been one of the most effective and successful legislators Congress has seen in years."

(Boehner has particular reason to be grateful. On Feb. 2, Thomas gave the Ohioan's nominating speech before the vote to elect a new Majority Leader. Some observers suggested afterwards that Thomas' forceful endorsement of Boehner may have helped swing some undecided votes his way.)

Praise also came from the other side of the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0016437

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) called Thomas "smart, tenacious, hard-driving and steeped in the traditions and subtle nuances of the House," while Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) pointed out that Thomas "has another nine months as chairman. He's not a lame duck type. I know we'll get at least one more major tax bill done and probably more legislation in the next nine months."

Over the years, Grassley and Thomas have clashed repeatedly both in public and in private on several different issues. With Thomas on his way out, however, Grassley played down those squabbles.

"The media like to make a lot of the so-called differences between Chairman Thomas and me," Grassley said. "In reality, we have a lot more in common than people might think. ... I think we both know it's important to not only have strongly held views, but also to do the homework to back them up."

Thomas' departure, meanwhile, prompted more attention to be focused on the race to replace him on Ways and Means, where his gavel tenure would have ended anyway due to term limits.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), Thomas' closest ally on the committee, is seen as the frontrunner for that position over Reps. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) and Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.). But Shaw is not conceding anything.

In a long statement issued Monday, Shaw devoted a few words to Thomas' legacy and several paragraphs outlining his own vision for the Ways and Means chairmanship.

While Thomas is best known among current lawmakers for his work on Ways and Means passing tax cuts, free trade measures and the Medicare prescription drug bill, he has also made a permanent impact on the House as an institution.

As chairman of the House Administration Committee from 1995 to 2001, Thomas oversaw a wide range of reforms that transformed the way the chamber operates. Thomas implemented yearly independent audits of House finances, which had been in shambles, and also helped end Members perks such as daily ice deliveries to House offices.

Thomas won the Ways and Means gavel in 2001, beating out more senior then-Rep. Phil Crane (R-Ill.) in a heated contest. Since then he has had a broad impact on everything from trade to taxes to health care, though he has not been able to accomplish two of his most desired reform goals — overhauling Social Security and the tax code.

While neither of those issues appears likely to be on the House calendar this year, Thomas cautioned against closing the books on his service too soon.

"I'm not walking away into the sunset, I'm going to work," Thomas said.

GOP's Bill Thomas Announces Retirement (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, one of the most powerful lawmakers and colorful characters on Capitol Hill, announced yesterday that he will not seek re-election to his California seat.

The 14-term Republican -- widely loved and loathed for his bombastic nature and detailed grasp of the federal government's most complex issues -- is credited with guiding through Congress President Bush's tax cuts and writing legislation on Medicare and Social Security.

Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, called Mr. Thomas "one of the most effective and successful legislators Congress has seen in years."

"Bill's devotion to the issues that matter and passion for seeing them through will be sorely missed," he said.

Mr. Bush called Mr. Thomas "a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader in the House of Representatives," citing "legislation that has brought about strong job creation and economic growth, improved health care for people of all ages, and ensured that America continues to benefit from free and fair trade."

Mr. Thomas, who is 64 and has been chairman of the House's lead tax committee since 2001, had been expected to retire because Republican term limit rules would have prohibited him from serving another term as committee chairman.

Other panel Republicans are jockeying to succeed him. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida issued a statement immediately after Mr. Thomas' announcement, saying: "As Ways and Means chairman, I intend to move legislation that makes our tax code more fair and efficient."

DOJ_NMG_0016438

Announcing his decision in Bakersfield, Calif., Mr. Thomas listed among his accomplishments tax cuts and prescription drug benefits for Americans and greater authority for the president to engage in foreign trade.

"We passed over $2 trillion in tax relief for hardworking American families; we provided the president with trade promotion authority so that he could seek freer and fairer trade markets; and we approved a long-overdue voluntary prescription drug benefit in Medicare for the first time in the program's history," he said.

His mastery of the federal tax code, Medicare and Social Security matters will be sorely missed by Republican leaders.

"His retirement will create a void in the Congress," said Rep. David Dreier, California Republican and chairman of the influential Rules Committee. "He is a very skilled legislator who recognizes the importance of cutting taxes and opening up new markets to benefit American workers and consumers. He will leave a legacy of strong economic growth."

But Mr. Thomas likely will not be missed by Democrats, with whom he has clashed bitterly. Most notably, Mr. Thomas in 2003 called Capitol Police to a room in which Democrats on his committee were meeting and ordered them removed. He later gave a tearful apology on the House floor.

Still, Democrats have little hope of capturing the open seat, which is in one of California's most heavily Republican districts.

Mr. Bush has won the district twice with at least 64 percent of the vote. In 2002, Mr. Thomas defeated his Democratic challenger with 73 percent of the vote. In 2004, he ran unopposed.

House Ways And Means Chief To Retire (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Bill Thomas, a California Republican who helped to craft President Bush's tax cuts, said he will retire from Congress this term.

Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee that oversees tax, trade, Social Security and Medicare legislation, Mr. Thomas must give up the post under House Republican term-limit rules. At a press briefing at his district office in Bakersfield, he said he still intends to press ahead with significant tax, health and trade legislation during the rest of the year.

"Over the next nine months, I intend to continue to work hard and finish my congressional term with the same vigor as my first," Mr. Thomas said in a statement. He didn't discuss his plans.

Mr. Thomas, 64 years old, had many legislative successes but he was unable to advance Mr. Bush's top domestic priority last year, overhaul of the Social Security system. His strategy was to broaden the discussion to encompass retirement security and health reform, but he never advanced a comprehensive bill.

The announcement clears the way for a Thomas protégé, Rep. Jim McCrery (R.,-La.), to assume the committee chair next year. Tax analysts and lobbyists have said Mr. McCrery, chairman of the Social Security subcommittee, is the front-runner for the chairmanship. Rep. Clay Shaw (R., Fla.), chairman of the trade subcommittee, is also seeking the post.

Government Smart-Card Project Hits Snags On Fingerprints, Costs (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The government's smart-card project appears at risk of falling behind schedule.

Federal agencies are supposed to begin issuing government-wide identification cards that can vouch for the identity of federal employees and most contractors in October, but the Government Accountability Office warns that setting up and testing new ID systems may not be completed within deadlines set by the Bush administration.

The GAO reviewed the progress of six agencies in developing smart-card systems and found differences in implementation plans, which could hamper efforts to create a government-wide ID card accepted by all agencies. The congressional watchdog agency also found a lack of reliable information about the costs of buying cards and equipment and modifying software systems.

"We acknowledge much more work must be done in order to be successful," the Office of Management and Budget said in a letter accompanying the GAO report. The letter was signed by Karen S. Evans , who is in charge of technology policy at the Office of Management and Budget.

DOJ_NMG_0016439

President Bush launched the smart-card project in August 2004, calling for more secure and reliable forms of identification for government workers as part of a broader effort to keep terrorists, criminals and other unauthorized people from getting into federal buildings or hacking into computer systems.

Federal employees are issued a variety of ID cards, and many can be easily forged or altered to gain access to federal buildings. Some agencies, such as the departments of Defense and State, have developed versions of smart cards for many of their employees.

Smart cards, which resemble plastic credit cards, are embedded with a computer chip that permits an exchange of data with another system. The card can store biometric information, such as fingerprints, and can track where a person goes, based on clearances through security checkpoints. In addition to building access, smart cards can be used to supplement passwords for logging onto computers, with users inserting the card into readers on their desktops.

Under the federal project, cards must display the name of the government employee or contractor, a photograph, the name of their agency or affiliation, a serial number, and an expiration date.

There is no estimate of how many smart cards will be handed out across government (although the Defense Department has said it plans to issue 3.6 million cards to the military, civil service, contractor and other employee groups).

The administration's timetable requires agencies to start issuing cards Oct. 27 and to verify or complete background investigations on employees and contractors in 2007 and 2008.

But the project has hit some snags. The original guidelines called for the cards to carry electronic representations of two fingerprints, but the GAO said agency officials have objected because reading two fingerprint images will require a large amount of computer memory.

The GAO report said it could take 30 seconds to read the fingerprints, "a length of time that would likely cause unacceptable delays in admitting individuals to federal buildings."

Some agency officials prefer to store only details of the ridges in a fingertip, which would cut the transmission time between the cards and card readers to less than 10 seconds. But GAO said that the partial images are of "questionable reliability" and that vendors use techniques that are "proprietary and incompatible." Efforts are underway to resolve the matter, GAO said.

The cost of converting ID systems, however, may be one of the largest problems facing the government. The GAO said some agencies may find it difficult to cover conversion costs out of existing budgets.

"Agencies have been faced with having to potentially make substantial new investments in smart card technology systems with little time to adequately plan and budget for such investments and little cost information about products they will need to acquire," the GAO said.

Clinton Cover-ups (WT)

By Mark Goodman

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Lost in the tumult over Islamic port deals and Katrina video capers is the recently released -- and willfully ignored -- Barrett Report. David Barrett, you'll recall, is the independent counsel appointed in 1995 to investigate allegations of impropriety against President Clinton's Department of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Henry Cisneros.

Mr. Barrett found his path mined by the Justice Department, the Internal Revenue Service and President Clinton's attorneys, even after Mr. Clinton departed the White House. He prepared 18 felony indictments against Mr. Cisneros but had to settle for a guilty plea on a misdemeanor charge (lying to the FBI about his mistress, a poor choice for a tax write-off). He sought to prosecute Mr. Cisneros for tax fraud over a period of years but was thwarted by Attorney General Janet Reno. Ultimately Mr. Cisneros resigned his post, whereupon President Clinton, constitutionally bound to men who lie about their mistresses, pardoned him.

Worse, Mr. Barrett's investigations led him into bleak wilds where unnumbered Clinton misdeeds allegedly lay beneath bureaucratic camouflage. These findings comprised a full 120 pages of his 684-page report -- but you won't find them in the final document published on January 19. That's because congressional Democrats, led by Sens. Byron Dorgan, Dick Durbin and John Kerry, used an appropriations bill to leverage a deal redacting the potentially lethal 120 pages.

DOJ_NMG_0016440

A frustrated Mr. Barrett released this statement: "An accurate title for the report could be, 'What We Were Prevented From Investigating.'" He added: "After a thorough reading of the report it would not be unreasonable to conclude as I have that there was a cover-up at high levels of our government and it appears to have been substantial and coordinated. The question is why? And that question will regrettably go unanswered. Unlike some other cover-ups, this one succeeded." Just so.

The media in the main treated Mr. Barrett as if he had spent the past ten years chasing ambulances down Pennsylvania Avenue. The New York Times, in self-imposed redaction, nimbly sidestepped the issue of the missing pages. NBC and CBS ignored the report entirely, while ABC cited unnamed critics as branding the study "incompetent, wasteful and without merit." Objection. One witness may be questionable testimony, but two witnesses are corroborating evidence.

I'm an avowed liberal and a registered Democrat, but I can appreciate Mr. Barrett's ordeal like no other because for nine years I've been negotiating a parallel minefield. Herewith, the redacted portion of my life: In 1997, attending to dark rumors, I contracted with a Washington financial investigator -- I'll call him "Deep" for originality's sake -- to run a background check on Norman Pearlstine, former editor of The Wall Street Journal, who'd been hired by his crony, Time Warner CEO Gerry Levin, as Time Inc's editor-in-chief.

Sure enough, Deep reported that Mr. Pearlstine was living far beyond his evident means -- for instance, he had three lavish houses plus a Manhattan co-op. On request, I turned the report over to the chief of the IRS Criminal Investigation Division in Newark, N.J. Two weeks later, Deep's main IRS contact told him Mr. Pearlstine's tax returns "did not remotely match" his assets and that the agency had assigned two top criminal investigators to the case.

Deep lost the Pearlstine trail, then picked it up again in 2001. "Gerry Levin went to his pal Bill Clinton to get The White House to quash the investigation," he told me. "The two agents assigned to the case were transferred to less sensitive jobs and told to keep their mouths shut or lose their pensions." (Deep pleaded for anonymity; a confidential experience in his NSA years left him in mortal fear of the Clintons.) Whoa.

I suddenly felt like some hapless Hitchcock non-hero who opens the wrong drawing-room door and finds a den filled with opulent thieves, in white tie and tails. Time Warner had already harassed me out of a retaliation suit with the injudicious assistance of Justice Miriam Cedarbaum (Yes, the Martha Stewart judge and my own private Janet Reno).The Justice Department and the FBI then stonewalled me. Fool that I am, I actually thought my colleagues would pounce on such a story. Wrong. Media Blue Wall Law says: No rummaging in the backstage dressing-room of a diva Manhattan editor, especially not with Bill Clinton squinting in the loge.

Surreally, the IRS rang in to threaten me, the whistleblower, with criminal investigation. I accused them of conspiring with Time Warner and the Clinton camp to keep me barefoot and button-lipped. The agency not only backed off, but the Secretary of the Treasury, John Snow, ordered a second inquiry. I'm currently cooperating with CID agents. But I suspect that, not unlike David Barrett, I've been invited on a snipe hunt.

So: We have here twin cautionary tales of fraud, corruption, obstruction and cover-up converging on -- surprise! -- Bill Clinton. It's the Barrett Report, of course, which begs the most disturbing question: What evil lurks in those 120 pages that made the Democratic congressmen press so hard for redaction? My money says, a den filled with opulent thieves, in white tie and tails.

Mark Goodman, who is currently writing his professional memoir, is the author of "Hurrah for the Next Man Who Dies."

Part-Time Congress (WP)

By Norman Ornstein

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The House of Representatives returns this week to an overloaded agenda. A promise of aggressive oversight of the deal with Dubai to manage U.S. ports will compete with the following:

Renewal of the Patriot Act; the conflict with the White House over electronic surveillance; the need to hammer out a budget by the beginning of April; health care and pension reform (highlighted by the desire to find a fix for the bumpy rollout of the Medicare prescription drug law); Katrina relief and repair of a dysfunctional Department of Homeland Security; lobbying and ethics reform; and a host of other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0016441

The House should be well-rested to take on its daunting workload, after a generous recess (known officially as a "district work period") over President's Day. That was preceded by a recess for the entire month of January and by a February in which voting was done on all of three days (along with another three days with no votes before 6:30 p.m.). And members had better be rested, because if their published schedule for the year ahead is followed, they'll have to compress their work into a tiny number of days. The House schedule for 2006, the second session of the 109th Congress, has a grand total of 71 days when votes are scheduled to take place, along with an additional 26 when no votes will occur before 6:30 p.m. The total of 97 calendar days, counted generously, is the smallest number in 60 years and the days of what Harry Truman derided as that "do-nothing 80th Congress."

During the 1960s and '70s, the average Congress was in session 323 days. In the 1980s and '90s, the average declined to 278. The days in session have plummeted since; it's likely that the average per two-year Congress for the first six years of the Bush presidency will be below 250.

Of course, days in session and days voting don't give a full picture of Congress and its work. Committees and subcommittees hold hearings, do oversight and mark up bills. Still, the average Congress in the 1960s and '70s had 5,372 committee and subcommittee meetings; in the 1980s and 1990s, the average was 4,793. In the last Congress, the 108th, the number was 2,135. We do not have final figures yet for 2005, but they are likely to be lower yet, and with oversight practically nonexistent.

When I came to Washington in 1969, I became familiar with what was called the "Tuesday-to-Thursday Club," the band of members, mostly from the Northeast and regions near Washington, who would try to limit their time in the capital to three days a week. They would leave late Thursday evening or early Friday morning to go home and return here late Monday night or early Tuesday. Those club members were in the minority; most legislators spent the full workweek in Washington and were here two or three weekends a month as well when Congress was in session.

Today the "Tuesday-to-Thursday Club" includes nearly all members, with one distinction from the earlier era: They get back into Washington late Tuesday night, or even early Wednesday, and head out again early Thursday afternoon, having spent just one full day and parts of two others on Capitol Hill.

Why the change? One reason is that most lawmakers now leave their families back in the district instead of having them live in Washington. Another is the explosion in the number of flights from area airports, making it easier for lawmakers from all over the country, including even Alaska and Hawaii, to go back and forth.

But there are other, more important reasons. One is the drive for members to get out and raise money, both for their own campaigns and for those of their current and prospective party colleagues. Many members now have "leadership PACs," which are required for those who want to become subcommittee or committee chairmen or to move up in party leadership. These PACs raise hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions over and above a member's own needs, in order to help "the team." Another is the visceral distaste of current members, especially the majority Republicans who set the schedule, for Washington. Service in Congress is not a privilege and an experience to be savored so much as it is like taking castor oil -- an unpleasant necessity, and one indulged in as little as possible.

Then there is the strategy of the majority leadership. Getting bills passed, keeping party discipline and satisfying interest groups means folding legislation into a small number of huge omnibus bills, bringing them up with little notice and less debate, structuring the votes around restrictive rules that limit or forbid amendments, and demanding party fealty on the votes that take place by labeling them "procedural." The less time the members spend in hearings, floor debate and generally poking around the Hill, the easier it is for the leaders to get their way without scrutiny or challenge.

Mention the part-time nature of this Congress to many people, and the reaction is, "Good, the less time they're in session, the less the danger to the country." Wrong. Congress does not do less -- it has its full impact on society -- it just does things in a shoddier way.

A part-time Congress in a country with a $13 trillion economy and federal budget near $3 trillion, in a globalized, technologically sophisticated world, is itself a danger to the checks and balances built into American democracy, and to high-quality, careful policymaking and oversight. It's not too much to ask Congress to commit to spending at least half the year -- 26 weeks -- working full-time, five days a week, thus providing at least a measure of the deliberation and attention to detail that are so lacking now.

DOJ_NMG_0016442

The Business Of Government (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

There are any number of object lessons in the downfall of former Representative Randy Cunningham, the greedy politician, dubbed Duke, who took millions of dollars in bribes in return for doling out scores of millions in sweetheart defense contracts. Mr. Cunningham, a Republican, was sentenced to eight years in prison. His ill-gained riches included a Rolls-Royce, a yacht and a Louis-Philippe commode. For all that, far more stunning dimensions of influence peddling in Washington came to light recently when Mitchell Wade, the contractor who bribed Mr. Cunningham, also confessed to providing jobs to the son of a Pentagon official charged with oversight of his business and, later, to that official.

Mr. Wade, seeking more than one friend in Congress, also admitted he had made illegal campaign donations to two lawmakers while pressing them to earmark more defense appropriations to keep his company growing. Earmarks are one of the scandalous goodies in Congress's quid pro quo culture — the secretive doling out, beyond public notice, of millions in favors in the rushed passage of budget bills.

One of the solicited representatives, Virgil Goode Jr., a Virginia Republican, received $46,000 in illegal donations while successfully earmarking $9 million in taxpayer money as Mr. Wade talked of more jobs for the lawmaker's district. The other, Katherine Harris, the Florida Republican, received $32,000 of Wade money, illegally disguised as smaller contributions from Wade employees. A $10 million earmark for the Wade company was requested but not delivered by Ms. Harris.

Justice officials say there is no evidence of criminal violations by the two lawmakers. Once the scandal broke, they forwarded the illegal donations to charity. Proclaiming her innocence, Ms. Harris insists that she was duped in the "perils of a process in which candidates are sometimes asked to determine the intent of a contributor." Mr. Wade's intent, however, was hardly murky because the investigation established that he had taken Ms. Harris to dinner and that the two had discussed the possibility of further political contributions, of earmarked government money for Mr. Wade's company and of a company branch in her district.

So goes licit political business these days in Washington. The prosecutor, Kenneth Wainstein, noted that Mr. Wade's company had been perceived as a classic "American success story" — garnering $150 million in government contracts in just three years — but was actually a model for spreading political corruption from Capitol Hill to the Pentagon.

Charities On The Hill (WP)

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

PENNSYLVANIA Sen. Rick Santorum created his charity, "Operation Good Neighbor," when the Republican National Convention was going to Philadelphia in 2000. "I thought: 'Wouldn't it be a great thing to leave something positive behind other than a bunch of parties and a bunch of garbage,' " Mr. Santorum told the Philadelphia Inquirer at the time. But in the years since, Mr. Santorum's charity appears to have done a lot to help his political allies -- and less than it might have in its stated mission of combating poverty, teen pregnancy and other social ills.

According to reports by the American Prospect magazine and the Associated Press, Mr. Santorum's charity spent $1.25 million between 2001 and 2004, but it devoted just 40 percent of that to charity. (A letter from the charity's treasurer, who also serves as treasurer of Mr. Santorum's political action committee, explains that fundraising expenses alone are "close to 37% of expenditures, as these fundraising events are recreational outings such as golf tournaments.")

Meanwhile, a Santorum campaign fundraiser, Maria Diesel, received nearly $200,000 in fundraising fees from Operation Good Neighbor; another Santorum campaign fundraiser, Rob Bickhart, received $75,000 in salary from the charity since 2001, and Mr. Bickhart's business, Capitol Resource Group, rents office space to the charity.

The Santorum story highlights a largely unexplored area of congressional ethics: lawmakers' involvement with charitable organizations. According to a 2004 review of Internal Revenue Service records by the research group PoliticalMoneyLine, 48 members of Congress are connected to charitable foundations. These groups may do good works, but they also present opportunities for misuse -- to bolster members' political operations, for example, or to underwrite swank parties at political conventions.

DOJ_NMG_0016443

Politicians and their spouses hit up companies and lobbyists that have interests before them to contribute to their pet charities, personal and otherwise, often dangling the lure of access to themselves and colleagues. Christine DeLay, the wife of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), was remarkably straightforward about this phenomenon in a recent interview with Post columnist George F. Will that touched on the DeLays' charitable efforts on behalf of foster children. "I hated to lose the leadership position because it helps me to raise money for those kids," she said. And this all takes place outside public view, since, unlike political contributions, charitable donations aren't publicly reported -- though lawmakers obviously know who's kicking in to help their cause.

We're all for altruism, but that's not necessarily what's going on here. There is an inevitable element of extortion whenever politicians get involved in soliciting charitable donations. And when lawmakers have a personal interest in the charity, the opportunities for abuse are greatly magnified. Provisions contained in an ethics measure approved by the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs last week, and parallel language offered by House Democrats, would require that lobbyists report donations they make or arrange to lawmakers' charities, or gifts they make to other charities in recognition of politicians. That would shed some valuable light on a now-dark corner of money and politics.

Union War Rules (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

In drafting the U.S. Constitution, the Founders entrusted national security largely to the President. But to protect the Republic today, the executive branch must first comply with something James Madison never imagined -- union work rules.

In a decision last week, federal Judge Emmet Sullivan sided with union plaintiffs and tossed out the Pentagon's new personnel system, which the Defense Secretary and White House say they need to safeguard the nation. His decision comes after federal Judge Rosemary Collyer threw out a similar personnel system at the Department of Homeland Security in August. (That case is under appeal.) The danger here is that the collective bargaining rights of 650,000 civilian workers will trump the collective right we all have to a military organized to confront 21st-century threats.

Five years ago Donald Rumsfeld returned to the Pentagon to find that its personnel system was even more outdated than GM's. He was forced to negotiate with some 1,300 unions and operate under rules that rewarded seniority over initiative and prevented managers from redirecting civilian workers to more pressing assignments.

This is especially dangerous in wartime, when the Defense Department is forced to put uniformed troops in administrative jobs that need to be filled quickly even though they might be put to better use in Iraq or elsewhere. Not so incidentally, this also encourages the best civilian employees to quit for private-sector jobs that will pay them better. So the Administration pushed for basing pay on performance, allowing the Pentagon to shift employees to meet emerging threats and allowing the new rules to go into effect even if the American Federation of Government Employees and other unions didn't agree to them.

Congress passed legislation in 2003 calling for a "flexible" and "contemporary" personnel system. But thanks in large part to Republican Senators Susan Collins (Maine) and George Voinovich (Ohio), the bill also said that employees were allowed to "bargain collectively" through their unions. It was on this hook that Judge Sullivan hung his decision, arguing that the new regulations would undermine agreements with union officials. So the Defense Department can have a new personnel system, but only if it's identical to the old system.

We doubt this is what Congress had in mind in authorizing the Pentagon to "establish and from time to time adjust a labor relations system . . . to address the unique role that the Department's civilian workforce plays in supporting the Department's national security mission." It also glosses over the fact that, even under the new system, Defense officials will continue to negotiate with unions over pay and benefits and will have every incentive to use their new flexibility in a way that doesn't produce labor tension.

The Pentagon hasn't decided what its next step will be, but we hope the Administration will appeal. It's hard to see how Mr. Rumsfeld's drive to use his uniformed soldiers more effectively can proceed if he doesn't gain the flexibility to better use his civilian workforce. Improving Defense's "tooth-to-tail ratio" requires getting the civilian tail out from under union work rules.

DOJ_NMG_0016444

OTHER NEWS:

Factory Orders Slid 4.5% In January (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Factory orders took their steepest drop in more than five years in January, pulled down by a sharp decline in orders for airplanes. Excluding aircraft, however, factory orders were robust.

New orders for manufactured goods in January fell 4.5% from the previous month, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. That was the sharpest decline since an 8.7% drop in July 2000, and largely reflected a 31% decline in orders for transportation products and equipment, such as autos and airplanes.

Because of the volatility of aircraft orders, economists often look at factory orders excluding transportation, to better gauge the economy's underlying health. That indicator posted 1.6% growth in January, the biggest gain in five months. And an important barometer of business spending -- orders for nondefense capital goods excluding aircraft -- rose 0.1% in January and was up 7.5% from a year earlier.

Overall orders for durable goods, including electronic equipment, were off 9.9%, also the sharpest decline since July 2000. Durable goods are big-ticket items expected to last at least three years.

Yesterday's data "confirm that underlying manufacturing conditions remain upbeat," said Conrad DeQuadros, a senior economist at Bear Stearns Cos. "Businesses are fairly confident that this [economic expansion] is sustainable. They feel further business investment is necessary" to keep up with demand in coming months, which will stimulate additional spending, he said.

Mr. DeQuadros projects that spending on business equipment in the first quarter will rise roughly 10% from the fourth quarter, and that the steady demand should help the economy offset the effects of a softening housing market this year.

Last month, an Indian airline ordered 68 planes from Boeing Co. in a deal valued at around $11 billion. That will likely push February's aircraft orders sharply higher when they are reported next month. Moreover, U.S. companies hope that the Indian air force will buy about 125 fighter jets in the near future.

Separately, data released yesterday by the National Association of Realtors showed the housing market continued to slow in January. The trade group reported that its index of pending sales of existing homes, which includes single-family units, condos and co-ops, fell 1.1% in January from December and was down 4.8% from a year earlier. After peaking in August the index fell an average of nearly three percentage points a month through December. The current index is based on contracts signed in January, which typically close within two months.

David Lereah, NAR's chief economist, points to January's 1.1% decline, after sharper drops in preceding months, as evidence that the housing market is "plateauing." He adds: "We're at a more sustainable level of home sales right now. Demand is still strong but we're seeing a transition from a seller's market to a buyer's market. This is a soft landing scenario."

Still, other analysts warn that the slowdown could be painful, at least for sellers. Daniel Oppenheim, a housing analyst at Bank of America Corp., reported last week that his monthly survey of real-estate agents in February showed flat or lower prices in 13 of 20 major metropolitan areas.

Bond Yields Weigh On Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Utility stocks were the first to fall. Small companies followed. By afternoon, most stocks were mired in the red as a jump in Treasury yields raised concerns about the health of corporate profits, housing and the stability of stock prices.

One group that escaped Monday's downward spiral: telecom stocks, which rose in the wake of the announced tie-up between AT&T and BellSouth.

Stocks regained some territory in the final hour of trading. The Dow Jones Industrial Average, off more than 90 points earlier, finished down by 63 points to 10958.59. Alcoa, Caterpillar and Honeywell International all lost about 2%, as did AT&T.

DOJ_NMG_0016445

General Motors was a standout, gaining 3.1% after it said it could get about $2 billion after selling most of its stake1 in Japan's Suzuki Motors.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 8.97 to 1278.26 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 16.57 to 2286.03.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.742%, its highest level since June 2004, when the Federal Reserve first started lifting rates. The decline by Treasury bonds continued a trend that began last week after the European Central Bank raised a benchmark refinancing rate to 2.5%. "It certainly looks like a breakout on the yield of the 10-year Treasury," said Robert Pavlik, chief investment officer at Oaktree Asset Management.

The bond market is likely signaling that the Fed may raise rates higher than equity investors hope, said Owen Fitzpatrick, managing director at Deutsche Bank Private Wealth Management. "There's definitely more concern that the Fed could be planning more than just one or two more rate hikes," he said, possibly boosting the overnight bank-lending rate to as high as 5.5%.

The bond carnage spilled over into the utility sector. Utility companies, which offer high dividend yields, often compete against bonds for investor dollars. The Dow Jones Utility Average, which tracks 15 utility stocks such as Williams and Consolidated Edison, shed 2.7%.

Higher yields make it more expensive for companies and consumers to do business, which can hurt corporate profits. Housing stocks also suffer from higher yields, which make mortgages more costly. The Philadelphia Housing Sector Index fell 1%. Small companies, generally more sensitive to interest rates, since they generally rely more on loans to finance their businesses, also suffered. The Russell 2000 index of small-cap stocks fell 1%.

Light, sweet crude-oil prices fell $1.26 to $62.41 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange amid expectations that the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will leave its output quotas unchanged after meeting later this week. Comex gold prices slid $11.20 to $556.80 on the Nymex.

Meanwhile, investors weighed AT&T's agreement to buy9 smaller rival BellSouth in a $67 billion stock deal that would create the largest telecommunications company in the world with a market capitalization of as much as $170 billion. The announced deal, the fifth-biggest ever, comes after several blockbusters in the industry last year, including combinations between SBC Communications and AT&T and Verizon Communications and MCI.

Shares of AT&T fell 3.5%, and BellSouth's jumped 9.7%. Investors often unload shares of an acquiring company and purchase the stock of the company being acquired, though concerns about whether the deal will survive regulatory scrutiny are also playing a role in the stock action.

Talk of other potential deals in the business boosted the sector: Verizon gained nearly 1%; European telecom operator Vodafone Group, Verizon's partner in Verizon Wireless, gained 4.3%; Sprint Nextel rose 4.6%; and Qwest Communications International was up 3.8%.

In major market action:

Stocks declined10. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,008 stocks rose and 2,351 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.2 billion shares traded, 1,123 rose and 1,933 declined.

Bonds dipped11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 14/32, or $4.38 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.742%. The 30-year bond fell 1 2/32 to yield 4.728%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar rose.12 It traded at 117.58 yen, up from 116.39 yen late Friday, while the euro fell to $1.2020 from $1.2037.

DeLay To Spend Primary Night As Star Guest Of Lobbyists (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay, whose association with lobbyist Jack Abramoff has left him politically vulnerable, is spending Texas' primary night tonight at a Washington fundraiser hosted by two lobbyists.

DeLay has three opponents in the Republican primary and could face a serious challenge in the general election after leaving his job as House majority leader amid campaign finance scandals.

DOJ_NMG_0016446

The fundraiser is being held by lobbyists Bill Paxon and Susan Molinari, both former members of Congress from New York. The event will raise money for DeLay's re-election campaign.

DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said DeLay would be in Washington for votes and has other events on his schedule including the fundraiser. She said he was unavailable for an interview.

DeLay's toughest primary challenger, attorney Tom Campbell, criticized the congressman's plans. "I think it's amazingly ironic and callous he would be spending election night with a group of lobbyists," he said.

DeLay is awaiting trial in Texas on charges of money laundering. DeLay has denied wrongdoing and has labeled the Texas investigation a witch hunt.

The former House majority leader has been behind in the fundraising race against the Democrat he would oppose if he wins today. In reports filed with the Federal Election Commission late last month, DeLay had raised about $153,000 between Jan. 1 and Feb. 15, compared with $248,000 for Nick Lampson, a former congressman. DeLay had about $1.3 million in cash as of Feb. 15, while Lampson had $1.4 million.

In the state's gubernatorial primary election today, two Democrats are competing for the chance to challenge Republican Gov. Rick Perry. Chris Bell, a former one-term congressman from Houston, has raised more than three times as much money as his opponent, former Texas Supreme Court justice Bob Gammage.

The general election could also include two independents: the state comptroller, who calls herself "one tough grandma," and a cigar-chomping comedian. Texas Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn and humorist Kinky Friedman have to collect 45,540 signatures each from voters who did not cast ballots in the primary to make the November ballot as independents.

Texas Voters Have Their Say (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

Voters in Texas go to the polls today to decide the fate of embattled Rep. Tom DeLay (R) and others running in contentious Lone Star State primaries, with the national spotlight shining on the former Majority Leader and how he fares with his constituents.

Democrats will be closely watching the rematch between Rep. Henry Cuellar and the man he ousted two years ago, ex-Rep. Ciro Rodriguez.

DeLay is expected to beat the three challengers opposing him in the Republican primary, but the extent to which he can avoid a runoff by securing more than 50 percent of the vote in the suburban Houston 22nd district — and by how much, if he does — could be telling for Democrats, who hope to ride their "Culture of Corruption" slogan to a House takeover in November.

Attorney Tom Campbell (R), seen as most likely to give DeLay trouble in today's vote if anyone does, maintains that DeLay's constituents are tired of behavior Campbell describes as unseemly and unethical (DeLay has been indicted for violating Texas election law by a Democratic district attorney and has ties to disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff).

But the DeLay camp insists voters realize such attacks are the result of angry Democrats who have impugned the Congressman's integrity because they couldn't defeat Republicans at the polls. Signaling his confidence in the outcome of today's vote, DeLay is scheduled to be in Washington, D.C., today for House business and to hold a fundraiser.

"We've put together a sophisticated and effective campaign organization that's not only prepared for [today], but ready to topple [former Democratic Rep.] Nick Lampson in November," DeLay campaign spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said. "We've identified our supporters and now we just need to get them out to vote."

Despite the volatility and national attention on a race featuring the former House Majority Leader, the shenanigans in the primary have been fairly tame. The Free Enterprise Fund, based in D.C., has been running ads touting DeLay, with the latest ad attacking liberal politicians and their supporters.

Opposing DeLay, a group calling itself American Family Voices has lobbed pre-recorded phone calls into the district accusing the Congressman of being weak on port security. Lampson, DeLay's presumed Democratic opponent in the general election, also has been hitting DeLay on the port security issue.

DOJ_NMG_0016447

The wild card, Flaherty said, is the behavior of Democratic voters, who are allowed to vote in either the Democratic or Republican primary under Texas' open primary system. Flaherty said Democratic voters in Harris County have been more active in this Republican primary than in past GOP primaries, with some anecdotal evidence showing that they may be turning out to vote against DeLay.

"With early voting we're seeing low turnout in some areas of the district, and even Democrat crossover that can swing any election," Flaherty said.

Campbell spokesman Michael Stanley believes voters have tired of DeLay, and said Monday it is highly likely there will be a runoff, which would occur on April 11 if no candidate in the four-way race manages to secure more than 50 percent of the vote.

"It's going very well," Stanley said.

Two other primaries that have seen negative campaigning take hold as today's elections have approached are the 28th district Democratic primary and the 17th district Republican primary.

In 28th district, which encompasses much of San Antonio and Laredo, Cuellar and Rodriguez have been trading ethics charges in the press and via their campaign advertisements.

Third-party groups also have entered the fray, with the Lone Star Project on Friday sending out a news release that questions Cuellar's use of campaign funds in his 2002 Congressional race and charges he misused state funds while still Texas secretary of state, which is an appointed position.

The Cuellar campaign has capitalized on a private investigator suing Rodriguez to collect a campaign debt he claims is unpaid, calling him a "Deadbeat Candidate," and accused him of using his position while in Congress to go on lobbyist-paid junkets that betray his supposed concern for the working people of the 28th district.

Both sides were claiming on Monday to be the victims of false, unfair attacks.

"We intend to win without a runoff and send a strong message that the last-minute special interest mudslinging can't overcome good old-fashioned hard work," Cuellar campaign spokesman Colin Strother said. "These are the same folks who we beat in 2004 and we feel supremely confident that voters will rebel against the lies and the venom some of these groups are spewing."

Cuellar has had a significant fundraising advantage, but Rodriguez narrowed the gap in recent weeks with help from donations from Democratic House members, liberal interest groups and solicitations for small donations by left-wing Web logs.

Cuellar is the incumbent, but many Democratic leaders would love to see Rodriguez beat him because they feel he is too conservative and too friendly with President Bush.

"I think that Mr. Cuellar and his campaign took us for granted, and now they're struggling and bringing all kinds of dirty stuff, but in end voters will decide," Rodriguez campaign spokesman Oscar Sanchez said. "We feel very confident that we're going to show really great numbers tomorrow and we're counting on a victory."

But there is a third candidate in the race, which means an April runoff is possible.

Perhaps the muddiest primary fight — though it has gotten less attention outside Texas — has been waged in Rep. Chet Edwards' (D) 17th district, where two Republicans are battling for the right to run against the Congressman in a district drawn for the GOP but won by the veteran Democrat in 2004.

Iraq war combat veteran and wealthy businessman Van Taylor (R) has been sparring with attorney and former Congressional aide Tucker Anderson (R), with the accusations becoming increasingly nasty as today's election approached. Taylor, endorsed late last week by Gov. Rick Perry (R), claims Anderson is using "liberal Democrats and anti-Christian activists" to attack him, while in another slam insinuates wrongdoing by asking whether his opponent "pays property taxes on the home in which he lives."

Anderson, whose former boss, Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Texas), recorded phone calls encouraging voters to elect his old employee, has sent out a mailer featuring a letter to the editor of a local newspaper that highlights this excerpt:

"Van Taylor ... refused to answer the question and instead gave a long-winded answer that left me with no idea what he believed in. I thought I was listening to" Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

The Taylor campaign claims it tracked down the letter writer and discovered she is an Edwards supporter masquerading as a Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0016448

Both sides claim they are responding to negative attacks initiated by the other. “We continue to want to have a positive issue-based campaign, and for several months had stayed on that same message, even though we were taking hits on daily basis,” Taylor campaign spokesman Mike Spellings said. “Mr. Anderson finally crossed the line.”

Anderson has served the Taylor campaign with legal papers accusing his political operation of slander and libel. In one news release, he says Taylor should “stop slandering my good name in an attempt to save his failing candidacy,” while, in another release, encourages voters to call him directly if they have any questions.

“I have nothing to hide,” Anderson said. “If anyone wants to know where I stand on any issue, call me directly.”

The negative campaigning from both sides indicates a close race, with Anderson leading in newspaper endorsements and Taylor leading in money. Anderson said Monday he feels “very good” about his chances.

Facing Primary Challenge, DeLay Touts Clout, Pork (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

SUGAR LAND, Texas -- Rep. Tom DeLay faces the first hurdle to re-election today in the Republican primary, but the 11-term congressman has been campaigning since his indictment last year cost him the House majority leader post.

The former powerhouse behind House Republicans' conservative agenda is running a retail political campaign in his suburban Houston district, touting his political clout --and the federal money he has guided home.

In one recent handout, Mr. DeLay boasts of securing more than $1 billion in federal money for Houston-area transportation projects, NASA, area universities, the port and various law-enforcement entities.

"You can't be replaced without hurting Houston or Texas," Houston lawyer Joe Slovacek told Mr. DeLay when introducing him recently to more than 200 Realtors and other businessmen.

Mr. DeLay is expected to defeat his three Republican opponents in the primary, setting up what political observers predict will be a tough general election race in November.

Since last year, he has been dogged by an indictment, secured by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, charging him with illegally funneling campaign money to Republican candidates to help the GOP take control of the Texas Legislature in 2002. That case is in limbo, pending the outcome of appeals before the state Supreme Court.

Mr. DeLay has also been the subject of news stories linking him to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to felony fraud and bribery charges, and though Mr. DeLay denies wrongdoing in both situations, the charges have damaged him.

"Getting beat up by the national media and the Chronicle [Houston's daily newspaper] has taken its toll," said Mr. DeLay at one stop.

"It's polarized my district. You either love me or hate me. Thank God there are more that love me."

Mr. DeLay doesn't mention the indictment on the campaign trail unless somebody asks him about it, said his spokeswoman, Shannon Flaherty. She also said one of eight mailers the campaign had sent out included one where Mr. DeLay explained the entire matter.

The DeLay camp exudes confidence even though most polls indicate the congressman's negatives are the highest in his political history and he actually trails his Democratic challenger, Nick Lampson.

Mr. Lampson, a four-time congressman before DeLay-led state redistricting rendered him virtually unelectable in his Beaumont-area district two years ago, has solid financial backing. Another ex-congressman, Steve Stockman, indicates he might run as an independent in November.

The three Republican candidates -- schoolteacher Pat Baig and lawyers Tom Campbell and Michael Fjetland -- probably won't spend one-tenth as much in the race all together as the well-heeled DeLay campaign, and since none are well-known, most political watchers think it's Mr. DeLay's to lose.

It's the first race for Mrs. Baig and Mr. Campbell. Mr. Fjetland has run unsuccessfully thrice before.

Mr. DeLay has singled out the candidate he figures is the strongest challenger and has attacked him in several venues: Mr. Campbell, the DeLay campaign says, doesn't represent conservative issues and has seldom even voted in Republican primaries.

"He isn't qualified to be a precinct chairman, let alone a congressman," said Miss Flaherty.

DOJ_NMG_0016449

Mr. Campbell's campaign manager, Michael Stanley, says his candidate is not a career politician like Mr. DeLay, which he considers a plus, considering Mr. DeLay's current legal troubles.

Mr. Campbell stresses a "return to integrity" in his campaign ads on cable TV and in persistent public appearances.

"If I wasn't hurting him, he wouldn't be attacking me," he said of Mr. DeLay.

DeLay Cash May Prove Record High (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas) is urging members of the National Rifle Association (NRA) and supporters of Texas Right to Life to dig deep into their pockets to help him retain his seat this year.

The outreach is part of a broad direct-mail and telemarketing campaign to attract new donors and volunteers for the former majority leader's reelection.

It also marks a fundraising shift for DeLay this election cycle from a PAC-heavy strategy in which the once-powerful Republican doled out lobbyist dollars to his congressional colleagues to one in which DeLay and his team are primarily focused on his own reelection bid.

The former majority leader faces his first real test in today's Texas primary, but he has been gearing up for this fight since late fall, after he was forced to step aside as leader following his indictment by a Texas grand jury in a controversial campaign-finance-related case.

The outreach has three aims, said Shannon Flaherty, a spokeswoman for the campaign: get information directly to voters in the district, ask those voters to volunteer or donate money to the campaign and continue building a database of local and national supporters to contact between now and the November election.

"Most of the mail is for donors and volunteers," Flaherty said.

DeLay's prominence and the expected flood of outside money from national Democrats could make this race one of the most expensive in House history.

The DeLay campaign recently mailed a series of pieces to district voters to boost turnout among potential supporters during the early voting period for today's primary, according to three such pieces. They do not refer to DeLay's three Republican challengers but instead to former Democratic Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas), who lost reelection last cycle to current Rep. Ted Poe (R-Texas) after his district was redrawn. Lampson is challenging DeLay this year.

The purpose of this early mailing, which was conducted both locally and nationally, was to identify likely supporters in and out of the district with an eye on the general election.

"We're working on a list that will take us to November," Flaherty said. "We're already at the point where most campaigns are [at the end of the race]."

Flaherty said the campaign would not release the number of donors or supporters on its list, but she suggested a sizable increase in donors and volunteers.

One casualty of DeLay's newfound focus on his own reelection is his leadership PAC, Americans for a Republican Majority, or ARMPAC.

The PAC raised $3.7 million last cycle, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, but has only raised $962,827 this cycle and took in a modest $17,065 during the first month of this year. In addition, ARMPAC requested to file quarterly reports with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) instead of monthly reports, as it had throughout each of the past four years.

"It stands to reason that the campaign continues to be the focal point of what we do this year," said ARMPAC director Jim Ellis, who does not hold an official role with DeLay's reelection campaign. "The emphasis has to be on the reelect."

Ellis said that the request to file quarterly reports was simply an accounting decision and that the PAC will return to form when DeLay is cleared of his legal troubles and wins in November.

"We'll be back," Ellis said.

Because the FEC limits PAC donations, the most a candidate can raise during a particular cycle is around $2.5 million, a number of GOP fundraisers said. DeLay's associates have hinted the congressman hopes to raise somewhere in the neighborhood of $8 million to $9 million this cycle. Direct mail and telemarketing are the most effective ways to reach a sizable enough donor pool to make up that difference, but it can be a costly process.

DOJ_NMG_0016450

The DeLay campaign has contracted with the telemarketing firm Feather, Larson and Synhorst of Phoenix and the direct-mail firm Olsen Shuvalov of Austin, Texas, to conduct this outreach campaign, according to FEC filings from the past six months.

The campaign committee paid Feather, Larson and Synhorst more than $150,000 last year and has paid Olsen Shuvalov almost $300,000 since the beginning of last July, according to FEC records.

The campaign has also rented member information from the NRA, the Right to Life PAC of Houston and ARMPAC. FEC rules require members to separate their leadership PACs from their reelection campaigns, preventing them from sharing information directly.

Campaign officials sift through those lists for potential supporters in and out of the district and then send preliminary mailings hoping to attract volunteers and donors and get information out about their candidate. About 3 to 5 percent of the recipients typically contribute time or money with the first mailer, but that number can get as high as 8 percent if the information is more specific, fundraisers said.

The NRA mailer sent out by the DeLay campaign includes a historical comparison of DeLay and Lampson done by the Gun Owners of America, in which DeLay earned an A to Lampson's C, and a statement from NRA Executive Vice President Wayne LaPierre praising DeLay's advocacy on behalf of gun owners.

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, documentary filmmaker Michael Moore and Jane Fonda are on the cover of all three early-voting mail pieces, positioned above a panoramic shot of the Hollywood sign.

In addition, DeLay must raise money for that run from outside the current leadership, without a clear path to return, and without a chairmanship within his group.

"Tom DeLay is an experienced guy," National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) said during a retreat of House Republicans last month. "He knows exactly what he has to do to win an election."

Asked how much money the committee would spend on DeLay's race, Reynolds said, "If he asks for something, he's an incumbent Republican and we'll do that."

In the most expensive House race to date, former Rep. Jim Rogan (R-Calif.) raised $6.6 million in his unsuccessful reelection fight against Rep. Adam Schiff (D-Calif.) in 2000. Rogan was one of the three House prosecutors of then-President Bill Clinton during the impeachment fight and was the only one in a competitive seat.

Expecting a tough reelection fight, Schiff's campaign manager, Jason Roe, did a single direct-mail piece to start building a donor list in the fall of 1999 with the hopes of just breaking even. Rogan's name identification was so high among conservative Republicans that the campaign tripled its money on the first mailing, Roe said. It built its list of supporters from 4,000 names to 70,000 by the end of the campaign.

Rogan's name identification was responsible for the success of that fundraising campaign. DeLay's own notoriety suggests that he could have similar success raising money from a national direct-mail campaign.

"DeLay's situation is ready-made," Roe said. "Martyrs are the best guys."

Opponents Of DeLay Make Use Of A Film (NYT)

By David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

LOS ANGELES, March 6 — A documentary about the Texas criminal investigation that led to the indictment of Representative Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader, on campaign fund-raising charges is being put to use by Mr. DeLay's political opponents in an attempt to unseat him.

The film, "The Big Buy: How Tom DeLay Stole Congress," will be distributed this spring by the Hollywood producer and liberal provocateur Robert Greenwald, whose last release was a scathing attack on Wal-Mart sponsored by a variety of labor unions and other groups critical of the retailing giant.

A host of liberal organizations in Texas and nationwide, including People for the American Way, Democracy for America and the Pacifica radio station in Houston, are expected to sponsor the film's release. It will not follow a traditional theatrical rollout but will instead open in a few cities before being made widely available on DVD, as was the Wal-Mart movie, Mr. Greenwald said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0016451

An important aspect of the release plan is to organize hundreds, if not thousands, of house parties in May and June at which the movie will be shown, Mr. Greenwald said. The distribution strategy is to be detailed on Tuesday — primary day in Texas — as a "welcoming gift" to Mr. DeLay, he said.

Mr. DeLay's lawyer, Dick DeGuerin, called the movie, an early version of which he had seen, a "hatchet job," and said he had refused to sit down with the filmmakers for an interview. (Mr. DeGuerin appears on camera in public question-and-answer sessions with the news media.)

The filmmakers, Mark Birnbaum and Jim Schermbeck, spent three years and about $100,000 following what began as a nasty state legislative battle over Mr. DeLay's push to redraw Congressional districts in Texas in 2002, and mushroomed into a nationally watched partisan standoff, complete with Democratic lawmakers fleeing across state lines. It ultimately wound up as a criminal case, with Mr. DeLay and his allies coming into the cross hairs of Ronnie Earle, the Democratic district attorney of Travis County, Tex.

It was Mr. Earle's argument, in the indictment last September, that Mr. DeLay had engineered the Republican takeover of the Texas legislature in 2002 by breaking a state law banning companies from donating to individual candidates, essentially laundering tens of thousands of dollars in contributions through the Republican National Committee.

It is the film's argument that Mr. DeLay had a grander purpose in mind: using the newly Republican-run legislature to redraw the state's Congressional map, erasing five seats held by Democrats despite Republican majorities, causing a 10-vote shift in the House, and thereby giving Republicans a solid majority with which to enact corporate-friendly federal legislation. All of which, the film asserts, worked like a charm.

Mr. Birnbaum, 57, of Dallas, a veteran documentary maker who started out in public television, and Mr. Schermbeck, 47, of Lubbock, Tex., a longtime community organizer, said in a telephone interview that they had tried mightily but failed to get Mr. DeLay to return their calls, while the district attorney, Mr. Earle, made himself readily available. Nonetheless, they said, they had strived for an evenhanded approach, one they had used in their only previous collaboration, a 2003 film for the PBS series "P.O.V." about high school drug testing in Lockney, Tex. They edited a version of "The Big Buy" in which Mr. DeLay was not so central to the story, and showed it at a Dallas film festival in August.

Then came the indictment of Mr. DeLay.

Quickly, the congressman and his aides used the existence of the film to attack the prosecutor, saying Mr. Earle's cooperation with Mr. Birnbaum and Mr. Schermbeck was proof that he was merely chasing headlines. When Mr. Earle was quoted insisting he had said and done nothing unusual or inappropriate — "I'm just doing my job" — Mr. DeLay went on a Houston talk-radio show and retorted: "Oh yeah, he's just doing his job. He's just doing his job. He's got a film crew that has been following him around for two years to document how he's going to get Tom DeLay."

Mr. DeGuerin maintained in a telephone interview Monday that the movie "puts the lie to Ronnie Earle's protestations for a year, before the indictment came down on DeLay, that DeLay was not a target." He added, "In truth, all the time he was cooperating with the moviemakers."

But Mr. DeGuerin said that he had not followed through on a threat to subpoena the filmmakers' outtakes, and that he doubted the movie would become a factor at trial.

Mr. Birnbaum and Mr. Schermbeck insist that Mr. Earle had shared no secrets with them, and that they acted and were treated no differently from any journalists covering the case.

In California last fall, Mr. Greenwald watched the coverage of the DeLay indictment unfold and wondered if there wasn't a good documentary in it. "Then somebody told me these two Texas guys had done one," he said in an interview.

The Sundance Film Festival had already expressed interest in "The Big Buy," and Mr. Birnbaum and Mr. Schermbeck were mulling whether to go the festival route, which could take the film a year or more to get into theaters. But Mr. Greenwald had just distributed his Wal-Mart movie through a grass-roots campaign of house parties and internet sales of DVD's — and scored a huge publicity coup when Wal-Mart attacked him — so he proposed a similar strategy for the DeLay film. It is to have its premiere either in Houston or Austin, he said, before opening in a few other cities and being offered for sale on the Internet for $14.95.

DOJ_NMG_0016452

Now, of course, the two Texans' supposedly balanced movie is being distributed by the man behind "Outfoxed," a stalwart of the partisan left. Yet they say the net effect will be negligible.

"With Tom DeLay you're either in his camp or you're not," Mr. Schermbeck said. "It wouldn't matter what distributor we chose. You could broadcast this on 'Masterpiece Theater,' and we'd still be Satan's messengers to Tom DeLay and his friends."

Mr. Schermbeck insisted the documentary was fair to Mr. DeLay; it includes comments by three of the congressman's lawyers and some of Mr. DeLay's Republican allies, for example. But he made clear he had no pretensions to neutrality.

"Timing was everything," he said, explaining the choice of Mr. Greenwald's company, Brave New Films. "It was important to get this out as soon as possible, given the trial, the Supreme Court and, frankly, given the elections this November."

Added Mr. Greenwald: "With Wal-Mart, 4,000 groups took it on. I'm assuming there are going to be people all over the country gleeful and joyous to have a tool that they can use for organizing, fund-raising, issue work, all of that."

Mr. Schermbeck suggested the film could well prove to have bipartisan utility. "I'm sure Tom DeLay will use this for fund-raising," he said. "Will it be a great fund-raising tool? It remains to be seen. But I'm hoping to make some money back myself after three years of labor that haven't been compensated."

Two Little-Known Dems Seek Texas Gov. Seat (AP-Y2)

By Kelley Shannon

AP2, March 6, 2006

AUSTIN, Texas — Two Democrats with long resumes but little name recognition are competing in Texas' gubernatorial primary election Tuesday for the chance to challenge popular GOP Gov. Rick Perry.

The general election could also include two independents — the comptroller who calls herself "one tough grandma" and a cigar-chomping comedian.

Chris Bell, a former one-term Houston congressman, has raised more than three times as much money as his Democratic opponent, former Texas Supreme Court Justice Bob Gammage.

The two campaigns tried to stir last-minute voter interest Monday. In the two weeks of early voting, just 3.3 percent of registered voters from both parties cast ballots. The state elections chief predicts a 13-percent overall turnout.

Texas Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn and humorist Kinky Friedman hope to capitalize on low turnout among Republicans and Democrats. They have to collect 45,540 signatures each from voters who did not cast ballots in the primary to make the November ballot as independents.

Strayhorn, elected to her current job as a Republican, wanted to avoid a costly and uphill primary battle against Perry, who was heavily favored to win re-election. Two of her four sons hold high-ranking jobs in President Bush's administration, including White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

Friedman is a musician, author and comedian who once toured with his band called the Texas Jewboys. He is rarely seen without his signature black cowboy hat and cigar and has the same political consultant former pro wrestler Jesse Ventura hired to help capture the governorship of Minnesota.

If Strayhorn and Friedman get on the ballot, Perry could face a four-way race in November against two candidates with political charisma and a Democrat hoping to break the Republicans Party's hold on all the statewide offices in Texas.

"It's great for the people of Texas. It means we're going to have a choice," said Mike Lavigne, former chief of staff for the state Democratic Party. "I think you're going to have everybody focused on Rick Perry. You'll have attacks there."

Perry portrays himself as being above the political fray and busy governing the state. He faces minor opposition against three primary opponents.

Bell, 46, gained notice as a freshman congressman for filing the first House ethics complaint against former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He made the complaint shortly after the Texas redistricting engineered by DeLay caused Bell to lose his re-election bid.

A former broadcast reporter and lawyer, Bell served as chairman of the Houston City Council's ethics committee and came in last in a three-way contest for Houston mayor in 2001. He has said as governor he wants to improve Texas' standing nationally on several fronts.

DOJ_NMG_0016453

"My motive for running is to get Texas out of the 'Thank God for Mississippi' club," Bell said, referring to national figures on uninsured children and teen pregnancies in which Texas often ranks just above lowest-ranking Mississippi. He also said he wants to restore bipartisanship to the Legislature after gridlock stymied efforts to change Texas' public school finance system.

Gammage, 67, once represented the same suburban Houston district in Congress now served by DeLay. He also served in the state Legislature and on the Texas Supreme Court, but retired from public life 11 years ago.

In the early 1970s, Gammage was part of a group of legislators who rallied against the speaker of the Texas House and other officials. The speaker, Gus Mutscher, was later convicted and sentenced to five years' probation for conspiring to accept a bribe.

He said recent corruption scandals in Washington and Texas brought him out of retirement.

"My ego doesn't need this," he said. "I don't need the title 'governor.' I care about getting the job done."

GOP Faces Tough Climate, The NRSC's Dole Concedes (HILL)

By Peter Savodnik

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Senate Republicans face a stormy "atmosphere" but will "retain a strong Republican majority" in November, says Sen. Elizabeth Dole (N.C.), the chairwoman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC).

In an hour-long interview with The Hill, Dole repeatedly noted that despite the political climate — made worse by White House communications flops and GOP scandals — Republican challengers are mounting viable bids in Michigan, West Virginia and elsewhere.

But she acknowledged that President Bush could have done a better job handling the Dubai ports deal, which has given Democrats an opportunity to look tougher on terrorism than Republicans, and that the president's poll numbers are less than optimal.

"There are highs and lows for any president," Dole said, "and I think that you'll see things change, and it's still a long way, light-years away, from the election. But the bottom line is races are really run and won at the local and state levels."

Other campaign-committee chairmen strike a more pugnacious pose than Dole. Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), Dole's counterpart at the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee (DSCC), is viewed as a Brooklyn street fighter unafraid of making tough, politically savvy calls. Last year, for instance, Schumer elbowed aside a more liberal candidate in Pennsylvania to make room for state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., an abortion-rights foe challenging Sen. Rick Santorum (R).

Similarly, Rep. Tom Reynolds (N.Y.), the chairman of the National Republican Campaign Committee (NRCC), when asked at a press conference if he fears losing seats this cycle, pounded on the table in front of him, booming: "Combat!" Sen. George Allen (R-Va.), Dole's predecessor at the NRSC, is known for his football analogies and aggressive politicking. In 2004, the former University of Virginia quarterback led the GOP to pick up four Senate seats.

Dole, the only woman to run any of the campaign committees this cycle, is also the oldest committee head. This year, she turns 70. Unlike many politicians, who go off the record to trash their rivals, Dole goes off the record to pay compliments.

While Republicans have privately voiced concerns about NRSC fundraising — the committee ended 2005 with $9.2 million in the bank versus the DSCC's $22.4 million — Dole was quick to point out that the Republicans outpaced Democrats in January.

In the first month of the year, the NRSC raised $4.3 million, compared to the DSCC's $2.1 million. Dole said she and her former Senate campaign manager, Mark Stephens, now NRSC executive director, had replicated her strategy back home, "prospecting" for small donors. "Two million of that $4.3 million was people giving $200 or less," she said.

Dole added that GOP senators are being asked to pitch in to campaigns more than in previous cycles. She conceded that Democrats have been more successful at getting their members to help struggling Senate campaigns.

Republicans have also had trouble recruiting candidates in such GOP-leaning states as North Dakota, where Sen. Kent Conrad (D) is up for reelection; Florida, where Sen. Bill Nelson (D) is seeking a second term; and New Mexico, where Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D) is running for a fifth term. Republicans have been unable to find a viable contender to take on Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

DOJ_NMG_0016454

Dole stressed that the NRSC does not take sides in Republican primaries — this has not always been the case — but did single out certain Republican candidates who, she said, are running strong races, including Oakland County Sheriff Mike Bouchard in Michigan and former Ameritrade executive Pete Ricketts in Nebraska. Both Bouchard and Ricketts face primary opponents.

"Despite the atmosphere, these outstanding people have declared that they want to run, and it's been our privilege to work with them," Dole said.

Dole also praised media mogul John Raese, a West Virginia Republican running against Sen. Robert Byrd (D). The senator won his eighth term in 2000 with 78 percent of the vote.

Echoing her communications department, Dole sought to play up the roles played by liberal interest groups and bloggers such as MoveOn.org and DailyKos in boosting Democratic candidates.

The senator, the first woman to head the NRSC, also said the committee is trolling for female donors, particularly in the business world, who might run for office themselves one day.

And she suggested that the NRSC would be following the campaign strategy mapped out earlier this year by White House political adviser Karl Rove and Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman.

Rove and Mehlman, addressing Republican state party leaders at a meeting in Washington earlier this year, highlighted Democrats' vulnerability when it came to national security, indicating 2006 would be something of a replay of 2002 and 2004.

Dole, in the interview, observed that Democratic leaders had fought the recently reauthorized Patriot Act and that, in Washington and in liberal bastions across the country, Democrats had skewered Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) for backing the Iraq war.

Dole declined to make any predictions about how the balance of power might shift after the elections. "I don't really put any numbers down, but let me put it this way," she said. "When I came into this position, I knew that midterms are tougher. There is no question that midterms are tougher."

Excerpts from Dole interview

Let's talk about fundraising [at the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC)].

Dole: We had about 120,000 brand-new donors, people that had never given to the NRSC, and we're going to continue down this path for some months here.

And the Women's Majority Network is one that I would love to tell you about. Our senators have gotten very much interested in this.

The network is really an outreach of women business owners or CEOs or opinion leaders or community leaders that have not been so involved in the political arena. So the overall idea is to get women more involved in the political process, and hopefully as they help us learn more about what happens, learn more in the senatorial committee, they'll become more interested in having a place at the policy table.

Why was January so good for fundraising, but 2005 — not so good?

Dole: [Senate Majority Leader] Bill Frist [R-Tenn.] was down in Florida, and he met all these women who were coming to a Majority Makers event who were all passionate and excited and into it. … Each one of them is going out to tap their networks because they all have networks of people and get them involved … and my view is that we will institutionalize this and once I'm gone after this year there will be a Women's Majority Network that remains a permanent part of the National Republican Senatorial Committee. So people have noticed this in various parts of the country that these women are very passionate and enthusiastic.

Did Republicans hurt themselves by coming out so strongly against the Dubai project?

Dole: There has been a lot of miscommunication, a lot of confusion, a lot of misinformation there. … My feeling is that a better foundation could have been laid. I mean, that's just the way I see it.

I think that 45 days provides a time to get all the facts out. … I really think that this will resolve itself. We really need all the information on the table to understand everything about it, which is really important.

The Medicare prescription-drug plan — do you think by the end of the year that will be an asset to Republicans?

DOJ_NMG_0016455

Dole: For so many [years], Democrats have talked about getting prescription drugs for seniors, and we [got it passed]. … When you've got such a massive change for the first time in 40 years, you're going to [have a] problem, but I think … they're doing everything to straighten out where the problems have been, and I'm hearing that we're making real progress there.

Democrats Struggle To Seize Opportunity (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

News about GOP political corruption, inept hurricane response and chaos in Iraq has lifted Democrats' hopes of winning control of Congress this fall. But seizing the opportunity has not been easy, as they found when they tried to unveil an agenda of their own.

Democratic leaders had set a goal of issuing their legislative manifesto by November 2005 to give voters a full year to digest their proposals. But some Democrats protested that the release date was too early, so they put it off until January. The new date slipped twice again, and now House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) says the document will be unveiled in "a matter of weeks."

Some Democrats fear that the hesitant handling is symbolic of larger problems facing the party in trying to seize control of the House and Senate after more than a decade of almost unbroken minority status. Lawmakers and strategists have complained about erratic or uncertain leadership and repeated delays in resolving important issues.

The conflict goes well beyond Capitol Hill. The failure of congressional leaders to deliver a clear message has left some Democratic governors deeply frustrated and at odds with Washington Democrats over strategy.

Party leaders, for example, have yet to decide whether Democrats should focus on a sharply negative campaign against President Bush and the Republicans, by jumping on debacles such as the administration's handling of the Dubai port deal -- or stress their own priorities and values.

There is no agreement on whether to try to nationalize the congressional campaign with a blueprint or "contract" with voters, as the Republicans did successfully in 1994, or to keep the races more local in tone. And the party is still divided over the war in Iraq: Some Democrats, including Pelosi, call for a phased withdrawal; many others back a longer-term military and economic commitment.

"It could be a great year for Democrats," said Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), but the party must present a more moderate face and distinguish itself more clearly from the GOP on issues such as ethics. "The comment I hear is 'I'd really like to vote for you guys, but I can't stand the folks I see on TV,' " Cooper said in a telephone interview from Nashville.

On issues such as explaining that former lobbyist Jack Abramoff's work "was a 110 percent Republican operation," Cooper said, "we're not making nearly as much headway as we should." Abramoff has pleaded guilty in a corruption scandal.

The Democratic leaders in Congress -- Pelosi and Sen. Harry M. Reid (Nev.) -- are the party's chief strategists and architects of the agenda, which they view as a way to market party ideas on energy, health care, education and other issues. They have held countless meetings to construct the right list, consulting with governors, mayors and just about every Democratic adviser in town.

"By the time the election rolls around, people are going to know where Democrats stand," Reid said.

But many in the party have their doubts. On Feb. 27, Reid and Pelosi appeared before the Democratic Governors Association. At one point in the conversation, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, noting that the two leaders had talked about a variety of themes and ideas, asked for help. Could they reduce the message to just two or three core ideas that governors could echo in the states?

According to multiple accounts from those in the room, Reid said they had narrowed the list to six and proceeded to talk about them. Pelosi then offered her six -- not all the same as Reid's. Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski said later: "One of the other governors said 'What do you think?' and I said 'You know what I think? I don't think we have a message.' "

Others, including Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.) and Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) -- who head the Senate and House campaign efforts -- believe the November election will turn mainly on how voters view Republicans. Schumer is leading the Democratic attack on the port deal, excoriating the administration for jeopardizing national security -- a realm in which Republicans have held the advantage with voters.

DOJ_NMG_0016456

He and Emanuel have sought to delay the agenda's release to allow Democratic attacks to hold the stage with minimum distraction. "When you're in the opposition, you both propose and oppose," Emanuel said. "But fundamentally, this is going to be a referendum on [Republican] stewardship."

Also dividing Democratic strategists is the question of what lessons to take from the Republican landslide of 1994, when the GOP won the Senate and picked up 54 House seats, wiping out 40 years of Democratic rule. Some Democrats associate that breakthrough with the House Republicans' "Contract With America," a list of proposals on policy and government.

"We should take a page from their book" and have "an overarching theme" similar to the 1994 contract, said Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.).

Many of his colleagues agree, but not Reid. "We're not going to do a 'Contract With America,' " Reid said in an interview. He noted that the GOP document received scant attention when it was presented a few weeks before the 1994 election, and political historians say it played a minor role in the outcome. "There's a great mythology about the contract," Reid said.

Even the party's five-word 2006 motto has preoccupied congressional Democrats for months. "We had meetings where senators offered suggestions," Reid said. "We had focus groups. We worked hard on that. . . . It's a long, slow, arduous process."

That slogan -- "Together, America Can Do Better" -- was revived from the 2004 presidential campaign of Sen. John F. Kerry. It was the last line of Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's response to President Bush's State of the Union address, and Reid, Pelosi and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean have used it in speeches. But there is an effort afoot to drop the word "together." It tests well in focus groups and audiences, Democratic sources said, but it makes the syntax incorrect.

Governors privately scoff at the slogan. They also say the message coming from congressional leaders has been too relentlessly negative. "They want to coordinate. They want to collaborate. That's all good," said one Democratic governor who declined to be identified in order to talk candidly about a closed-door meeting. "The question is: Coordinate or collaborate on what? People need to know not just what we're against but what we're for. That's the kind of message the governors are interested in developing at the national level."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said congressional Democrats have spent the past year redefining the debates over terrorism and Iraq and have prepared the ground for a shift to a more positive message that will focus on energy, health care and homeland security, all areas in which the governors would concur, he predicted. "We've had an unprecedented level of cooperation," he said.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly added: "At the end of the day, I think everyone will be on board."

Perhaps the Democrats' greatest dilemma is how to respond to the Iraq war. It looms as the biggest question mark over Bush's administration and the Republican lawmakers who have backed him on the conflict almost without question.

Congressional Democrats have been split over the war since 2002, when many voted to authorize military action. The ground shifted last November when Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), a leading Democratic voice on military matters, called for U.S. troops to be withdrawn as soon as possible. Two weeks later, Pelosi endorsed his stance.

Although Pelosi said she was not speaking for her caucus, some colleagues complained that she was handing Republicans a gift by enabling them to tag Democrats as soft on terrorism and forcing Democratic candidates to explain whether they agreed with their House leader.

There is little question that the political landscape looks promising for Democrats. A Feb. 9 poll by the Pew Research Center found that Democrats lead Republicans 50 to 41 percent in a generic ballot.

But congressional Democrats have some key deficiencies. For instance, they lack the hard-charging, charismatic figurehead that Gingrich represented for the House GOP in 1994. But the Democrats have an abundance of presidential hopefuls, and their agendas sometimes differ from those of Reid, Schumer, Pelosi and Emanuel.

For instance, Sen. Russell Feingold (Wis.) tried to filibuster the renewal of the USA Patriot Act, a move opposed by most of his Senate colleagues, including Reid. Kerry (Mass.) led an unsuccessful filibuster attempt against Samuel A. Alito Jr.'s confirmation as a Supreme Court justice. The best-known Democrat is Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), whose plans for a 2008 presidential bid leave many of her colleagues wary of how her famous but divisive presence might affect them.

DOJ_NMG_0016457

"There are lots of skeptics," Schumer conceded. But the polls look better and better, he stressed. "There may be some inside-the-Beltway babble, but it's not affecting the voters," said Schumer, who wants the agenda delayed again -- until summer.

The Democrats' Real Problem (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

It is now an ingrained journalistic habit: After a period of bad news for President Bush, media outlets invariably devote time and space to "balancing" stories that all say more or less: "Yes, the Republicans are in trouble, but the Democrats have no alternatives, no plans," etc.

The pattern began to fall in place this weekend in the wake of two truly miserable weeks for Bush.

The stories about the Democrats are by no means flatly false -- Democrats don't yet have a fully worked-out alternative program -- but they are based on a false premise, and they underestimate what I'll call the positive power of negative thinking.

The false premise is that oppositions win midterm elections by offering a clear program, such as the Republicans' 1994 Contract With America. I've been testing this idea with such architects of the 1994 "Republican revolution" as former representative Vin Weber and Tony Blankley, who was Newt Gingrich's top communications adviser and now edits the Washington Times editorial page.

Both said the main contribution of the contract was to give inexperienced Republican candidates something to say once the political tide started moving the GOP's way. But both insisted that it was disaffection with Bill Clinton, not the contract, that created the Republicans' opportunity -- something Bob Dole said at the time.

The Democrats' real problem is that they have failed to show how their critique of the Republican status quo is the essential first step toward the alternative program they will owe the voters in the presidential year of 2008.

This failure has made it easier for Republicans to cast anti-Bush feeling (aka, "Bush hatred") as a psychological disorder. The GOP shrewdly makes the president's critics look crazed and suggests that opposition to Bush is of no more significance than, say, the loathing that many watchers of "American Idol" love to express toward Simon Cowell, the meanest of the show's judges.

The president's critics need to identify precisely why they oppose him, not only so they can make clear that they are not psycho basket cases but also to convey the idea that they know what needs to be put right.

Bush critics will almost always point first to the administration's arrogance, a word used recently not by some left-wing Bush hater but by the loyal conservative writer Byron York. In the New Republic, York chose the A-word to explain why Republicans are turning on the White House's "we-know-best approach."

The cure for an arrogant government that doesn't take critics seriously is accountability. Divided government never looked so good. That's especially true at a moment when polls suggest that a majority is yearning for more competence and greater moderation.

For example, moderates and liberals alike are mystified by budget policies saddling our kids with debt tomorrow to pay for tax cuts for the wealthy today. Moderating this radical fiscal approach is something the voters clearly could accomplish with their ballots this fall.

But Democrats have no good answer to Iraq. True. And neither does Bush, who started the war and should be held accountable for where we are now.

The philosophical man who owns our neighborhood Chinese restaurant recently shared with me a brilliant aphorism to describe how to build a good business. "You have to do the right thing," he said, "and you have to do the thing right."

That summarizes what unites Bush's Iraq critics. Many Americans opposed the war in the first place, but many who supported it are aghast that the administration did the thing so badly. It did not dispatch enough troops to achieve order at the outset, and it failed to plan for the inevitable conflicts that would arise among the country's ethnic and religious groups.

What comes from this is not isolationism but an awareness that even a very powerful country needs to be a careful steward of its power. It should never go into a war without considering the probability of unintended consequences and planning for the worst case and not just the best one.

DOJ_NMG_0016458

This is the basis for a saner foreign policy in the long run. As for Iraq, the voters should let the president know that he can no longer keep repeating his rah-rah mantras about standing down when the Iraqis stand up. Presidents deserve to be punished for insulting our intelligence.

Thus the shortcoming of Democratic leaders is not that they don't have a program but that they have not yet convinced opinion makers that fighting bad policies is actually constructive -- and that, between presidential elections, keeping matters from getting worse is sometimes the most positive alternative on offer.

Sen. Clinton Says Wear 'Anger' As Honor (AP-Y2)

By Beth Fouhy

AP2, March 6, 2006

Responding to Republican claims that she may be too angry to win national office, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton told an audience Monday to wear such criticism as "a badge of honor" and suggested that gender played a role in the attacks.

Democrats, particularly Democratic woman, who run for public office are "going to draw some unfriendly fire," Clinton said at a breakfast fundraiser hosted by black and Hispanic women supporters. "People will be attacking you instead of your ideas, they may impugn your patriotism, they may even say you're angry."

"If they do that, wear it as a badge of honor, because you know what? There are lots of things that we should be angry and outraged about these days," she said.

She cited, among other things, the federal budget deficit, lobbying scandals in Washington, and the government's slow response in the Hurricane Katrina disaster.

It was the latest volley in a rhetorical back-and-forth between Clinton and leading GOP strategists that began last month, when Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said Clinton "seems to have a lot of anger" and that American voters tend not to elect angry candidates.

Mehlman pointed to comments Clinton made on Martin Luther King Day, when she called the Bush administration "one of the worst" in history, and compared the Republican-controlled House to a plantation.

Top White House strategist Karl Rove later echoed Mehlman's view, telling a Washington Times reporter in a new book that Clinton could have trouble winning the White House because there is a "brittleness about her."

Clinton, who has not yet said whether she's considering a presidential run in 2008, first called the attacks a diversion from Republican "failures and shortcomings."

Then, last week, she said, "Karl Rove spends a lot of time obsessing about me," suggesting he spends more time thinking about her political future than she does.

Until now, Clinton had not said she considered the criticisms gender-based, although many observers have done so. New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd said Republicans are casting Clinton "as an Angry Woman, a she-monster melding images of Medea, the Furies, harpies, a knife-wielding Glenn Close in 'Fatal Attraction.'"

Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University, said he agreed with Clinton's assessment but questioned whether she should have said anything.

"I think she's right, but whether or not it was prudent to acknowledge it this way is another thing," Baker said. "I think another politician might have dealt with it more humorously, to defuse its influence."

Republican National Committee spokeswoman Tara Wall declined to address the suggestion that gender played a role in the attacks.

"When you vote to consistently raise people's taxes, vote against common sense judicial nominees and use Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday to divide Americans along racial lines, you're likely to encourage criticism of both your ideas and temperament," she said.

Ex-Pentagon Aide Seeks To Unseat Clinton (AP-Y2)

By Marc Humbert

AP2, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016459

A former Pentagon official under President Reagan said Monday she will seek the Republican nomination to challenge Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's re-election bid this year.

"I am running to be my party's nominee for the United States Senate from the state of New York," Kathleen Troia "KT" McFarland wrote in a letter to supporters. "Toward that end, I have formed an exploratory committee, which I expect to upgrade to a full Senate campaign committee in the coming days."

The move by the political neophyte could put her into a September primary against former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer, already endorsed by top state Conservative Party leaders. No Republican has won statewide office in New York without Conservative Party support since 1974.

Clinton, asked Friday about a possible challenge from McFarland, said: "I am going to remain focused on my job and my race. I will leave it to the other side to sort out their own candidacies."

Polls have shown Clinton far ahead of her potential Senate challengers and leading among possible candidates for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

McFarland, a former National Security Council staffer, has never run for public office and has been out of the public sector since she left her job as a deputy assistant secretary of defense for public affairs in 1985, a post she had held for three years, to raise a family.

Spencer's supporters have in the past dismissed McFarland, a supporter of abortion rights, as an "elitist liberal."

"I don't know what this woman is thinking, I really don't," Spencer said Monday, arguing that McFarland's candidacy would be "divisive (and) I guess helpful to Clinton."

"I'm the only one who can unite the Republican and Conservative parties, which I am doing," he added.

McFarland, in a telephone interview with The Associated Press, refused to address Spencer's criticisms, but said she would "go after every party."

"This is about so much more than that," she said. "This is about offering a candidate who will run an issues-oriented, substantive campaign."

McFarland said she plans to stress her expertise in defense and security issues.

"We are confronted with a dangerous and determined enemy abroad and political divisions at home that are eroding our national spirit," she wrote. "At a time when Americans should be working most closely together, we are being pulled apart by partisan rancor and counterproductive 'gotcha' politics."

She declined to discuss differences with Clinton and said she didn't know how she would have voted on legislation to authorize President Bush to go to war in Iraq. "The important thing now is to move forward and to get it right," she said.

State Republican leaders originally settled on Jeanine Pirro as their Clinton challenger, but Pirro, then Westchester County district attorney, pulled out of the race in December, unable to raise much money or interest in her candidacy.

Ohio: Chabot Had 49 Percent In Democrat's New Poll (RC)

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

A new Democratic poll taken in the 1st district race showed Rep. Steve Chabot (R) leading Cincinnati City Councilman John Cranley (D) by a margin of 49 percent to 40 percent.

N.Y. Gov. Pataki Leaves Hospital (AP-Y2)

By Adam Goldman

AP2, March 7, 2006

Gov. George Pataki was released from a hospital Monday after 18 days of treatment for appendicitis and complications that followed surgery.

"It's great to feel the fresh air and sunshine," Pataki said as he walked out of New York-Prebyterian Hospital/Columbia University Medical School.

"I'm not 100 percent but I'm a lot better than I was a few days ago," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0016460

The New York Republican, who is weighing a run for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, was hospitalized in Westchester County on Feb. 16 and had his appendix removed. He was transferred to the Manhattan hospital on Feb. 21 and was operated on later that day to deal with a blockage of his intestine.

Pataki told reporters last week he was "chomping at the bit" to go home and have a pizza and a cold beer.

"I'm still waiting for that pizza and hamburger, but it's still a few days off," he said outside the hospital Monday.

Pataki, 60, has been in generally good health during his three terms as governor.

"He will still require some intravenous antibiotics at home," said his doctor, Spencer Amory. "There is still a small possibility ... of infection later."

18 Days After Burst Appendix, Smiling Governor Goes Home (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Eighteen days after suffering a burst appendix, Gov. George E. Pataki left the hospital and went home at last yesterday, walking slowly but smiling and saying, "I never thought I'd enjoy the fresh air as much as I do today."

Mr. Pataki is able to digest enough food so that he no longer needs intravenous nutrition, and he has no signs of fever, said his doctors at NewYork-Presbyterian/Columbia hospital. Even so, they said, to ensure that there is no return of a dangerous abdominal infection, he will continue to receive intravenous antibiotics for a week or more.

The governor, who is doing some of his official work by phone, will have to rest at his home in Garrison, in the Hudson Valley, for at least a week, with care from a visiting nurse, his doctors said. He also remains on a restricted diet and will have to keep an intravenous tube in his arm until doctors say he can do without antibiotics. But such limitations did not appear to dampen his good cheer and relief yesterday.

"It's great to feel the fresh air and the sunshine, and I am going home," he told reporters under a sunny, hazy sky outside the hospital, in the Washington Heights section of Manhattan. "I have to tell you, I'm so, so pleased and happy to be doing that."

Mr. Pataki, who ordinarily might spend a brisk winter morning running, hiking or snowshoeing in the Hudson Highlands, has chafed at being kept in the hospital, suggesting that he misses even the official drudgery of Albany. When asked about negotiations with leaders of the Legislature on a state budget, he said with a grin, "I never looked forward with such excitement to sitting down with the leaders and talking about the budget as I do today."

Last week, the governor said that he looked forward to the next time he could have pizza and beer. But yesterday, he acknowledged that such food was still "a few days off."

Though the most obvious sign of infection — his fever — has gone, Mr. Pataki will continue to have antibiotic treatment, to clean up whatever residual infection might remain, said Dr. Spencer E. Amory, one of the surgeons who treated him. He added, "There is still a small possibility that there can be exacerbation of infection again there."

Mr. Pataki began suffering abdominal pain on Feb. 15, and in the middle of the night, he went to Hudson Valley Hospital Center in Cortlandt Manor, near his home, where he had an appendectomy on the morning of the 16th.

Five days later, he was transferred to the Manhattan hospital, where he had surgery to correct an intestinal blockage, a common complication but one that does not often require surgery. Abdominal surgery often causes the intestine to stop its regular contractions for several days, bringing digestion to a halt, but last week, doctors said Mr. Pataki's intestinal function was gradually returning.

In his first week at Columbia, the governor's doctors there and his aides said little publicly about his condition. Then, last Tuesday, the doctors revealed that when he arrived there, Mr. Pataki had suffered from peritonitis — an inflammation of the abdominal lining — and abscesses, or pockets of infection, and that he continued to run an intermittent fever. Abscesses and peritonitis, both potentially very serious conditions, are also common side effects from a burst appendix.

Doctors not involved in the case said that both the complications he suffered and the amount of time he was in hospitals were a bit worse than average but well within the normal range. His aides have bristled at some of the news coverage of the governor's illness, objecting to statements that he was in danger or that his recovery was slow, and to assertions that they had not been open about his condition.

DOJ_NMG_0016461

Mr. Pataki is in his 12th and last year as governor, and is mulling a run for president in 2008; his appendicitis forced him to cancel a trip to New Hampshire.

Giuliani Tops Poll For Political Favorability (BOS)

The Boston Globe, March 7, 2006

HAMDEN, Conn. --Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is the most popular person in national politics, according to a national poll released Monday by Quinnipiac University.

Giuliani, a Republican who is considered a possible candidate for president in 2008, edged out U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The Quinnipiac poll asked voters to rate politicians on a scale of 0 to 100, with higher numbers representing more favorable opinions. Giuliani's mean score was 63.5, according to the poll.

Obama averaged 59.9, McCain 59.7 and Rice 57.1.

"Not only do Mayor Giuliani and Sen. McCain get the best ratings, but their numbers are uniform across the country," said Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

President Bush's average rating was 44.1 and Vice President Dick Cheney's was 41.

Four Democrats who are considered potential presidential candidates were also mentioned in the poll's top 10: Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards received a 50.8 average, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner scored 50.7, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton averaged 50.4 and Sen. Russ Feingold of Wisconsin scored 49.

The telephone poll of 1,892 registered voters nationwide was conducted February 21-28 and has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 2.3 percentage points.

Giuliani Is 'Hot' Stuff in New Poll (NYPOST)

By Deborah Orin

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- WASHINGTON - America loves Rudy Giuliani. A new poll shows "America's Mayor" inspiring the warmest feelings nationwide among 2008 presidential contenders.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice were close behind - but not so Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

The Quinnipiac University poll asked some 1,900 voters to rate 15 political leaders on a "feeling thermometer" from 0 to 100, the higher numbers reflecting "warmer" feelings. Giuliani's 63.5 was followed by McCain's 59.7 and Rice's 57.1.

Actually, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, at 59.9, came in second, but more than half of the voters admitted to not knowing enough about him to rank him.

"Giuliani's ratings are uniform in all states," said assistant polling director Peter Brown. "[He] is seen as the mayor of New York [during 9/11], and being a strong leader is the single strongest characteristic desired by voters in a presidential election."

Clinton got a 50.4 but exhibited little crossover appeal, getting a 24.7 from Republicans. President Bush, meanwhile, scored 23.9 with Democrats - but just 44.1 overall. Giuliani and McCain each scored 58.0 among Democrats.

And former President Bill Clinton scored 55.9 with women and 56.5 with men - to his wife's 54.3 and 46.0, respectively.

Prominent Ties Among Comcast Hires (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Eric Rich

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

For more than a year, Maryland first lady Kendel S. Ehrlich has been executive producer and star of a largely unnoticed half-hour television talk show about drug and alcohol abuse.

Comcast Cable Communications Inc. paid her an undisclosed sum to host 16 episodes of "Live Right: Straight Talk on Substance Abuse," which can be seen only in the cable provider's on-demand library.

DOJ_NMG_0016462

Ehrlich's day job represents more than an abrupt change in career path for the governor's wife, a lawyer by training. It also illustrates the reach of Comcast, the state's dominant cable provider with more than 1 million subscribers, as it has repeatedly given work to prominent public officials, their relatives or their friends.

Those hired by Comcast and its affiliates have included two members of the University System of Maryland Board of Regents, two sons of a key General Assembly committee chairman and former county executives from Prince George's and Harford counties.

Responsible for most of that hiring was Stephen A. Burch, who until recently served as president of Comcast's Atlantic Division, according to one former and one current senior Comcast official and some of the workers. The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity out of fear of reprisal, said that within the company, the recruits were known informally as "FOBs" -- Friends of Burch.

None of these politically connected workers has been accused of wrongdoing, and those who could be reached said they were hired on merit.

Still, dual roles such as these raise questions about possible ethics violations and conflicts of interest. Such hires also illustrate a discreet way that some corporations can seek influence with decision makers, not just in Maryland but on Capitol Hill and elsewhere.

"Comcast has to go before every governing body in the state for something," said Bobbie Walton, executive director of Common Cause Maryland. "If they're giving jobs to people because of who they are, it looks a lot like payola."

It is, said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), "quite clearly a conflict of interest."

In some cases, Comcast's personnel moves in Maryland came amid public policy debates affecting the company's bottom line. For instance, Comcast hired then-Sen. Thomas L. Bromwell's two sons shortly after the Baltimore County Democrat championed legislation that has enabled cable companies to collect millions in late fees.

Ehrlich was first hired as a lawyer by Comcast when her husband, Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), sat on the House of Representatives' telecommunications subcommittee. She was brought back as a producer in 2004 -- as the cable giant began facing competition over franchises from Verizon Communications. That battle has not come before regulators in Maryland, as it has in some states.

Comcast spokesmen said the company has no reason to suspect that Burch's hiring decisions violated company policy but added that, because he has left to lead a British company, they would neither discuss nor defend his actions.

"Steve Burch is no longer employed by Comcast," said Jim Gordon, a company spokesman. "We are not in a position to comment on decisions made by or relationships entered into by former employees."

Burch responded in an e-mail that said: "To the extent I was involved in these decisions, my actions were appropriate, known to Comcast, and in compliance with Comcast policies."

Comcast's affiliation with Bromwell, the former chairman of the finance committee, has drawn scrutiny from federal investigators. The company received a subpoena in 2003 in connection with the probe that led to Bromwell's indictment in October on corruption and fraud charges, Comcast officials said. They said the company has been assured it is not a target of any probe.

Public officials working on the Comcast payroll say they have been careful to recuse themselves from votes involving the company.

That was the case in 2000, when Comcast was involved in talks with the University of Maryland, seeking a long-term contract to provide cable service in student residences and negotiating for naming rights to a basketball arena. At the same time, the company had a contract with the public relations firm run by David H. Nevins, a member of the board that oversees the university system.

A year after the $20 million deal for naming rights was struck, Comcast tapped Nevins to be president of its newly acquired regional sports network, Comcast SportsNet. He held that post until 2004.

Nevins, who now chairs the Board of Regents, has recused himself from votes related to Comcast, according to ethics filings.

DOJ_NMG_0016463

His decision to accept the job at the sports network, though, might violate state ethics law. Ethics Commission Executive Director Suzanne S. Fox said she could not comment on specific cases but noted that the law says a regent "may not have a financial interest in or be employed by an entity having or negotiating a contract with" the university, unless that relationship existed prior to his appointment.

Nevins said his conduct was proper because his initial contract with Comcast predated his joining the board. "While I took on an additional role with them, it did not change my responsibility to continue to recuse myself from those Board matters, which I always did," he said in an e-mail.

Even so, at a time when Nevins headed the regents' finance committee, his public relations firm continued to represent Comcast in its dealings with College Park, negotiating placement of signs and logos at the arena, Nevins said. "Recusal means from the U of M board, not from my own business," he said.

Another regent, lawyer Leronia A. Josey, found an unusual way to satisfy the ethics requirement when Burch contacted her about a job in 2000, one year after she had joined the board.

"I had to resign, and then I was reappointed," Josey said, describing the maneuver that allowed her to become a regional director of government and community relations. The former regent, who now consults with Comcast, said she did not even miss a meeting.

Josey said she was hired solely for her skills and experience. "They were looking for somebody who knew people and could help them establish a local presence."

The Comcast employee with access to the highest-ranking politician in Maryland, though, is Kendel Ehrlich.

The first lady, a former prosecutor and public defender, has worked for Comcast in a variety of capacities since her husband served in Congress. Shortly after the couple came to Annapolis, she moved from Comcast's legal office to a Comcast job described in disclosure forms as "education liaison."

In June 2003, when the governor vetoed a bill that would have stopped Comcast and other companies from shifting the state tax burden to Delaware holding companies, the advocacy group Progressive Maryland publicly questioned whether the first lady's job posed a conflict. The governor's office dismissed the allegation.

Soon after, a pregnant Kendel Ehrlich announced she was leaving Comcast to have her second son. There was no public announcement when she returned, but her salaried job as a "production manager" reappears on her husband's disclosure forms for 2004. She is not required to disclose how much she is being paid and would not say, when asked.

Her return came as Verizon was beginning to offer cable television over its fiber optic phone lines. In Indiana, Missouri and elsewhere, Comcast has tried to block Verizon by appealing to state officials.

In Virginia's legislature this year, Comcast and other cable companies have lobbied furiously against a bill that would give Verizon short cuts around local franchise rules. Verizon officials said that battle will come to Maryland inevitably.

Kendel Ehrlich declined through her spokesman to be interviewed about her show, but each segment opens with an explanation of her motivation.

"I got involved in this project because I'm a mom," she says. "I have a 5- and a 1-year-old, and I'm trying to guide them through life. It's not easy. In fact, it's pretty scary."

In each episode, she interviews people about addiction. She talks with the wife of the Colombian ambassador, whom she asks, "Coming from a supplier nation, what is it like?" Talking about drugs with a group of Anne Arundel Community College students, she asks: "It's all about instant gratification, right?" In the final episode, she reenacts the cross-examination of a drunk driver. "That was a fatal decision, wasn't it?" she presses.

In the credits, she directs special thanks to Burch.

Burch, 55, is a University of Maryland graduate who has served on bank boards and with charitable organizations in the Baltimore area and has become friendly with many of the state's power brokers.

"He's a very affable, capable, well-spoken and likable figure in the business community and in all of the corridors of Maryland politics," said Wayne K. Curry (D), a former Prince George's county executive.

Late in 2000, Burch hired Eric M. Bromwell, a son of the Baltimore County Democrat who was then a state senator. Within a few weeks, brother Thomas L. Bromwell Jr. was also on the payroll.

DOJ_NMG_0016464

Earlier that year, their father sponsored a bill that had a dramatic impact on Comcast revenue. The state's highest court had capped late fees and ordered that millions in refunds be paid to subscribers. Bromwell's bill lifted the cap.

A court later struck down a retroactive provision in the legislation, and Comcast was forced to pay the refunds. But the lasting impact of the bill was to restore a revenue stream for Comcast and other cable providers.

The former senator said in an interview that his sons got their work on their own, and he said any suggestion that the jobs came in response to his legislative work would be ridiculous. "I heard they were hiring, and they went through the process," he said.

Eric Bromwell, who now serves in the House of Delegates, said he recuses himself from any debate that touches on Comcast.

Because cable franchises are granted by counties or municipalities, Comcast's business is often negotiated with local officials. In 2001, the company faced an assault on its monopoly in Prince George's when rival Starpower Communications sought a franchise there.

Curry's administration initially reached an agreement with Starpower. But after the County Council approved it, the administration insisted that Starpower pay for an additional $400,000 in technological improvements. Faced with the new demand, Starpower dropped out.

"We're at a loss to explain why additional requirements were proposed after the fact," a Starpower spokeswoman, Patricia MacEwan, said at the time.

In February 2003, three months after Curry left office, Comcast hired him as a "general business consultant," a position he still holds, the company said.

Curry said any suggestion his job was a reward would be "absurd" and added, "the Comcast people were angry with me," because of the initial contract. Curry said he believes Starpower dropped out because of financial troubles and added he "would never have had even the slightest inkling of a detail that trivial in the transaction."

Gordon, Comcast's spokesman, said, "It's not really uncommon for past elected officials to become consultants." Hiring such officials as Eileen M. Rehrmann, a former Harford County executive and Democratic candidate for governor, "can add value to our in-house workforce," he said. Rehrmann did not return calls for comment.

Comcast announced in December that Burch was leaving the company to become chief executive of NTL International, a British telecommunications company. In January, Comcast announced a restructuring that could result in 125 layoffs.

Eric Bromwell said he is among those whose jobs are in jeopardy. He worked directly for Burch and called him "the best boss I ever had."

Peace Activist Sheehan Arrested In NY Protest (REU-Y2)

By Irwin Arieff

Reuters, March 6, 2006

Cindy Sheehan, the anti-war activist whose son was killed in the Iraq war, was arrested with three other protesters in New York on Monday after a rally with women from Iraq.

Sheehan became a central figure in the U.S. anti-war movement last summer after she camped outside President George W. Bush's Texas ranch and has been arrested at least two other times at protests.

On Monday, she had joined a delegation of women from Iraq at the rally at the United Nations, urging the United Nations to help prevent civil war in Iraq.

About 20 protesters went to the U.S. mission to the United Nations to deliver a petition with 60,000 signatures seeking an end to the war. Nobody from the mission received them so Sheehan and three other American women sat down in front of the building, refused to leave, and were arrested.

A police spokesman said they were expected to be released later on Monday.

The Iraqi women plan to deliver a petition to the White House on Wednesday. Earlier they held a news conference at U.N. headquarters calling for the United States to withdraw its forces.

DOJ_NMG_0016465

Entisar Mohammad Ariabi, a pharmacist at Baghdad's Yarmook Teaching Hospital, wept as she told reporters of the hardships experienced by Iraqi women.

"U.S. occupation has destroyed our country, made it into a prison," she said. "Schools are bombed, hospitals are bombed."

"We thank you, Mr. Bush, for liberating our country from Saddam. But now, go out! Please go out!" she said.

Chief Of Atomic Agency Sounds Optimistic On Iran (NYT)

By Christine Hauser

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, the nuclear watchdog for the United Nations, said today that he hoped an agreement could be reached with Iran on its nuclear program.

Mohamed ElBaradei spoke before a meeting of the nuclear agency's board of governors in Vienna. The board, which is reviewing Dr. ElBaradei's latest report on Iran this week, voted in February to refer Iran's nuclear case to the United Nations Security Council amid growing suspicions that Iran is determined to develop nuclear weapons.

The United States and the Europeans are certain to use Dr. ElBaradei's most recent report to push for a resolution critical of Iran during the agency's board meeting.

In the past three years, Dr. ElBaradei noted today, the agency has been conducting intensive investigations of Iran's nuclear program to provide assurances about its peaceful nature.

"During these investigations, the agency has not seen indications of diversion of nuclear material to nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices," he said. "Regrettably, however, after three years of intensive verification, there remain uncertainties with regard to both the scope and the nature of Iran's nuclear program."

He said there were still questions about "the past and current direction" of the program.

"I am still very much hopeful that in the next week or so, an agreement could be reached," Dr. ElBaradei said in televised remarks to reporters.

Iran agreed with Britain, France and Germany in November 2004 to voluntarily freeze all of its uranium conversion, enrichment and reprocessing activities. But when promised economic and political rewards were not forthcoming, Iran broke the agreement. It restarted uranium conversion last August and then began tests of enriching uranium on Feb. 11.

Last week, Dr. ElBaradei released an 11-page report that said Iran has accelerated its nuclear fuel enrichment activities and rejected demands of international inspectors to explain evidence that had raised suspicions of a nuclear weapons program. That assessment could make it easier for the United States and its European partners to seek punitive action in the Security Council.

The report made no definitive judgment about whether the nuclear program was peaceful, or intended to create the capacity to produce weapons.

Dr. ElBaradei today also mentioned a surge of diplomacy in which Iran has offered not to pursue industrial-scale uranium enrichment for up to two years. The Reuters news agency quoted an unnamed diplomat close to the talks between Iran and the European Union as saying that Iran may agree to extend that moratorium if it is permitted to run a small-scale enrichment research program.

Iran says that it has the right to develop a program for power.

The deputy secretary of Iran's national security council, Javad Vaeedi, told Reuters in Vienna that enrichment "research and development" in Iran was irreversible.

U.N. Agency Chief Hopes For Deal With Iran (AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

The head of the U.N. atomic watchdog agency said Monday a deal on Iran's suspect nuclear program could be only a few days away, making U.N. Security Council action unneeded.

DOJ_NMG_0016466

Mohamed ElBaradei's optimism was believed to be linked to a confidential Russian proposal to allow Iran to enrich some uranium domestically, diplomats said. But the plan was expected to meet strong resistance from the U.S., which opposes any enrichment on Iranian soil.

"It's been a core element of our view and the view of the European three, and certainly of the Russian Federation that no enrichment in Iran is permissible," John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said in New York.

He said "even small so-called research enrichment programs could give Iran the possibility of mastering the technical deficiencies that it's currently encountering in its program" and translate them into large-scale enrichment later. The United States uranium enriched in Iran could be misused to make nuclear weapons.

ElBaradei, without elaborating, nonetheless said he hoped "that in the next week, an agreement could be reached."

The Russian proposal would allow Tehran to conduct small-scale enrichment and ask the IAEA to set the parameters of such activity to minimize the chances of abuse, according to the diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to divulge details of the plan.

In return, the diplomats said Iran would be asked to recommit to in-depth IAEA probes of its program on short notice — something Tehran canceled last month after the agency's 35-nation board voted Feb. 4 to alert the Security Council by passing on Iran's nuclear dossier resulting from almost three years of agency investigations.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov planned to discuss the plan with officials in Washington.

Russia and China, which both have economic and strategic ties with Iran, voted with the majority of IAEA board members but insisted the council do nothing until after this week's IAEA meeting in Vienna.

Moscow, with the support of the United States and other countries, has offered to enrich Iran's uranium in Russia, which would ensure greater oversight. But Tehran, insisting its goals are peaceful, has said it should be free to carry out some enrichment domestically.

The Russian proposal was driving a wedge into what had been a relatively united front on uranium enrichment, with Germany cautiously supportive and France and Britain opposed and backing the United States.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns underlined U.S. determination, saying in Washington that "unless Iran does a dramatic about-face," he expected the issue to be taken up by the Security Council.

Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, also downplayed the latest twist in the Russian proposal.

"You can't be just a little pregnant," Casey said of the U.S. attitude toward small-scale uranium work by Iran.

France, Britain and Germany broke off negotiations on behalf of the European Union with Iran last year after it resumed enrichment-related activities, which can make both nuclear fuel and the fissile core of warheads. Since then, those three countries, as well as the United States, Canada, Australia and Japan, have been at the forefront of efforts to have the Security Council take up the issue.

The diplomats said negotiations continued on the sidelines of a board meeting of the IAEA, which began Monday and would focus on Iran later in the week.

A senior European diplomat the deal would likely stand or fall "on the response Lavrov gets in Washington" in a meeting later Monday with Secretary of State Conzoleezza Rice and other senior administration officials.

But he said all involved — whether or not they supported allowing Iran some control of enrichment — were firm on the need for Tehran to first return to a freeze of all such activities for a prolonged time "to re-establish confidence."

He said the Russians had proposed eight years — something unlikely to be accepted by the Iranians who publicly reject calls for a return to a freeze. A State Department official, who also demanded anonymity, refused to specify a length but said in response to a question that two years would be too short.

The meeting is scheduled to hear a report by ElBaradei focusing on Iran's nuclear program, including its decision to deny information requested by U.N. inspectors on diagrams related to nuclear weapons and other issues and ongoing enrichment plans that include setting up thousands of uranium-enriching centrifuges later this year.

"We have not seen indication of diversion of ... material to nuclear weapons or other explosive devices," ElBaradei said. "However, there are still a number of important uncertainties that need to be clarified.

DOJ_NMG_0016467

"Unfortunately, the picture is not very clear as to the scope of the program and as to the nature of the program," he said, alluding to documents, past experiments and activities that could be used to develop nuclear arms.

The last board meeting sent the complete Iran file to the Security Council. This week's meeting is scheduled to pass the ElBaradei report to the council, which then can decide whether to take action. The board was not likely to discuss Iran until Tuesday or Wednesday.

___

Associated Press Writers Edith Lederer at the United Nations, Barry Schweid in Washington and Palma Benczenleitner in Vienna contributed to this report.

U.S. Dismisses Talk Of Compromise On Iran (AP)

By Barry Schweid, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

Unless Iran executes a dramatic about-face and suspends all its nuclear activities, the U.N. Security Council will intervene "quite actively," a senior State Department official said Monday.

The message to Iran is that it has "crossed the international red line" and engaged in unacceptable enrichment activity "and there must be a U.N. Security Council process to deal with that," Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said.

Burns did not say what the United States would ask the Security Council to do. While the Bush administration takes a stern line toward Tehran it might not be able to persuade other nations to impose economic or other penalties on Iran.

The U.N. nuclear watchdog agency, which voted to refer the dispute to the Security Council, will reaffirm its stance this week in Vienna, Austria, "unless Iran does a dramatic about-face and suspends all of its nuclear activities," Burns said at the Heritage Foundation, a private research group.

His remarks followed a State Department spokesman's dismissal of reports an eleventh-hour compromise might be struck over Iran's nuclear program.

Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency, said at his agency's Vienna headquarters on Monday that the council might not have to consider Iran's actions. Talks between Moscow and Tehran have focused on shifting Iran's fuel enrichment activities to Russia.

Later, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned ElBaradei "to reiterate the U.S. position that Iran should cease all enrichment-related activity." In response, ElBaradei agreed that Iran must not be allowed to have enrichment activity on its territory, said a U.S. official who spoke on condition of anonymity beause he was not in position to speak for the IAEA.

The United States has long spearheaded a campaign to haul Iran before the Security Council, which has the power to impose economic or other sanctions. There was no hint of optimism at the State Department about the latest efforts to defuse the issue, which ElBaradei said he hoped could produce a resolution in a week.

"I am not aware of any specific proposals or any specific ideas that would require or force any kind of delay in Security Council action," spokesman Casey said.

Casey also downplayed a new twist to the Russian proposal that diplomats described to The Associated Press. Under it, the U.N. atomic watchdog agency would set a level of small-scale uranium enrichment that Iran would be allowed to conduct on its own soil as part of an attempt to keep Iran from using the fuel for nuclear weapons, said the diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"You can't be just a little pregnant," Casey said of the U.S. attitude toward small-scale uranium work by Iran.

The U.N.'s atomic energy agency voted last month to refer the Iran dispute to the Security Council. "There is no obstacle to that discussion being taken up and we certainly believe that will happen shortly," Casey said.

North Korea took a civilian nuclear program and quickly turned it into a bomb-making program, Casey said.

The process of bringing Iran before the Security Council has been delayed several times. The European Union attempted to negotiate with Iran with the aim of halting the program in exchange for economic concessions. Then Russia came up with its enrichment proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0016468

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov had dinner in Washington on Monday evening with Rice, and was due to meet with her and President Bush and Rice.

On Wednesday, Lavrov is due to meet in New York with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

On his way to Washington, Lavrov stopped in Ottawa for talks with Canadian officials. Russian news agencies quoted him as saying Russia's proposal to shift Iran's uranium enrichment to Russia remains on the negotiating table but Iran must suspend enrichment on Iranian territory.

In Vienna, headquarters for the nuclear watchdog group, ElBaradei said the Council might not have to explore Iran's actions. "I am still very much hopeful that in the next week an agreement could be reached," he said.

___

Associated Press Writer Foster Klug contributed to this story.

Iran Deal Still Feasible: ElBaradei (REU-Y2)

By Mark Heinrich And Parisa Hafezi

Reuters, March 6, 2006

The International Atomic Energy Agency chief said on Monday a deal to defuse a standoff over Iran's nuclear aims was still feasible and diplomats outlined a compromise that would let Tehran pursue limited atomic research.

Mohamed ElBaradei cited a surge of diplomacy in which Iran has offered not to pursue industrial-scale uranium enrichment for up to two years. He was speaking before debate on Iran at an IAEA board meeting that could presage U.N. Security Council action.

Iran may agree to extend that moratorium if it is permitted to run a small-scale enrichment research program, said a diplomat close to talks between Iran and the European Union.

Iran's insistence on doing enrichment research has been a red line for the West, eager to ensure Tehran does not acquire technology that can be used for atom bombs. The Islamic Republic says it seeks only nuclear-generated electricity, not weapons.

"I am still very much hopeful that in the next week or so an agreement could be reached," ElBaradei said, while acknowledging that Russia's proposal to enrich uranium for Iran had snagged on Tehran's determination to purify nuclear fuel itself.

Javad Vaeedi, deputy secretary of Iran's national security council, highlighted that obstacle when he told Reuters that enrichment "research and development" in Iran was irreversible.

"Iran is ready to compromise on the period of suspension (of large-scale enrichment) if it can keep its nuclear research activities," the diplomat close to the Iran-EU talks said.

But the United States dismissed the possibility that Iran might be allowed to continue small-scale nuclear enrichment and said the council would likely take up Iran's case.

"You can't have the regime pursuing enrichment on any scale, because ... (it would allow) them to master the technology, complete the fuel cycle -- and then that technology can easily be applied to a clandestine program for making nuclear weapons," said U.S. State Department spokesman Tom Casey.

SMALL-SCALE ENRICHMENT

On Friday, Iran said it could delay industrial-scale enrichment for up to two years but the EU countered with a demand for a 10-year moratorium on all enrichment activity.

"The (IAEA) board of governors, EU3 and Russia have made clear that there needs to be a suspension of these enrichment capabilities and ... a prolonged period of time necessary to restore confidence. Two years is not a prolonged period of time," a U.S. State Department official said.

A senior official close to the IAEA, who asked not be named, said trying to distinguish between research work and productive enrichment was like "trying to draw a line in water."

However, EU diplomats said Russia and ElBaradei are pushing the West to let Iran continue small-scale enrichment research under IAEA surveillance as a face-saving solution.

DOJ_NMG_0016469

The Security Council could desist from any action for the time being if the proposal won agreement, one diplomat said.

Of the three leading European powers, Germany is the one that "could most live with a pilot enrichment plant in Iran," said a European diplomat close to the talks with Iran.

But he said Germany would not break ranks with its EU partners France and Britain over the issue.

"We are not in the Security Council, unlike Britain or France. So one should not over-estimate Germany's position. Paris and London seem to be much more skeptical," said another EU3 diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Aliasghar Soltanieh, Iran's envoy to the IAEA, told Reuters there was a good chance of agreement with EU powers and Russia.

In defying calls to suspend all enrichment-related work, Iran seems to be counting on divisions in the Security Council over whether to resort to sanctions mooted by the United States.

Wielding vetoes in the council, Russia and China could block sanctions that would disrupt their trade ties to Iran.

Iran's past secrecy over its nuclear program, its failure to satisfy IAEA inspectors and its public calls for Israel's destruction have stoked Western suspicions about its intentions.

But Iran's chief nuclear negotiator denied the country was seeking nuclear weapons and said it was no threat to Israel since Tehran sought only democratic change in the region.

"The national security doctrine of Iran has no place for an atomic bomb," Ali Larijani said in an interview with Britain's Channel Four news. "You cannot destroy a country or wipe it off the map through democratic means," he said with reference to Israel.

HARDLINERS

ElBaradei believes U.N. intervention could close diplomatic avenues and bolster Iranian hardliners, diplomats say. Tehran has warned it could bolt a nuclear safeguards treaty if pushed.

"Confrontation (between the West and Iran) could be counterproductive and would not (give) us a durable solution," said ElBaradei, calling for verbal restraint on all sides.

"There is universal recognition that the Iran issue has serious implications for international security. Everyone understands that escalation is not going to help a situation that is highly, highly volatile in the Middle East," he said.

The IAEA's 35-member board reported Iran to the Security Council a month ago. It urged Iran to heed resolutions to halt uranium enrichment work and stop stonewalling IAEA inquiries.

On Tuesday the IAEA board will consider ElBaradei's latest report before it is sent to the council, which might eventually consider sanctions if diplomacy fails.

Tehran has complained of double standards -- India, Israel and Pakistan enjoy good ties with the West although they built atom bombs in secret -- and President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned of unspecified consequences if Tehran faces a U.N. crackdown.

ElBaradei's report said Iran plans to begin installing 3,000 centrifuges this year. Iran denies this implies industrial scale fuel production, an assertion the West says is not credible.

Around 1,500 centrifuges running optimally for a year could yield enough highly-enriched uranium for a bomb, experts say.

The Security Council's first step would probably be to urge Iran to heed IAEA resolutions. It might also consider endowing the IAEA with more intrusive, short-notice inspection powers.

Enacting sanctions will be much harder given international reluctance to isolate the world's fourth biggest oil exporter.

New Calls Emerge For Nuclear Deal With Tehran (WSJ)

By David Crawford And Alan Cullison

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Russian officials and United Nations nuclear inspectors renewed calls for a compromise on Iran's nuclear plans before the U.N. Security Council takes up the issue, a move in conflict with U.S. and European goals.

Speaking before a meeting of the U.N.'s International Atomic Energy Agency Board of Governors in Vienna, IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei said he is "cautiously optimistic" a compromise is possible this week.

DOJ_NMG_0016470

That statement is at odds with U.S. determination to refer Iran swiftly to the Security Council, with U.S. and EU officials citing inspectors' evidence that Iran's program includes elements that would only be aimed toward producing weapons, not energy.

The IAEA's board agreed Feb. 4 to pass the matter on so the Security Council could consider sanctions or other measures against Iran -- but with the unusual proviso that the Security Council not take it up until after this week's meeting in Vienna. That left the way open for continued efforts at compromise. Since then, Russia has held frequent but rocky talks with the Iranians aimed at defusing the standoff. EU officials also held renewed talks but said they went nowhere.

Russia, which helped build Iran's nuclear program, has been interested in a deal in which Russia would be paid to enrich uranium on Iran's behalf, while Iran would agree to a moratorium on enriching uranium itself. Iran's announcement in December that it intended to end its compliance with voluntary inspections and enrich uranium led to the current crisis.

Yesterday, diplomats were debating the possibility of letting Iran continue to experiment with enrichment in 20 centrifuges. Diplomats close to the IAEA say that Iran would likely do those experiments anyway if there is no compromise but noted an agreement would allow the return of IAEA inspectors. U.S. and EU officials have been resistant to the Russian plan on enrichment, even before the additional compromise on Iranian centrifuges was unveiled. A U.S. State Department official and EU diplomat each said yesterday that the operation of even 20 centrifuges would give Iran valuable experience it needs for an advanced enrichment program.

Hopes that Iran will strike a deal that would avert U.N. action against its nuclear program helped push down oil prices yesterday. (See related article7.)

The continued conflicts among major powers over how to handle the situation renewed questions over what the Security Council, with many of the same members as the IAEA board, could agree to do in that forum. Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov was due to meet U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice over dinner in Washington last night. On Sunday, U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. John Bolton warned of "tangible and painful consequences" for Iran if it doesn't give up its plans to enrich uranium. But as recently as Friday, Mr. Lavrov warned against referring Iran to the Security Council, saying it would lead to "escalation of the situation."

Part of what bothers Russia is its previous experience with the Security Council over Iraq. After Moscow backed a Security Council resolution demanding Saddam Hussein cooperate with weapons inspectors, the U.S. later used noncompliance with the resolution as a justification for military force -- something the Russians said they never intended.

Speaking to a group of Western reporters in Moscow before departing for Washington, Mr. Lavrov said, "I know how the Security Council works -- you start with soft reminder -- then you demand, then you threaten," he said. "It will become a self-propelling function."

On Sunday Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, repeated warnings that Iran would resume large-scale uranium enrichment if Iran's nuclear dossier is referred to the Security Council. It hasn't agreed to the moratorium proposed by Russia, though it has expressed interest in Russia's joint-venture plan.

Iranian Embassy spokesman Ali Esmaili said key talks were under way in Vienna, but described the discussions as difficult. "The positions on both sides are very hard," Mr. Esmaili said. A top Russian involved in negotiations said hope was scarce for an agreement with the Iranians, but that if one were reached it would come "at the last possible moment."

Until recently, the Russians haven't spoken openly about any proposal to allow limited enrichment on Iranian soil. But the idea is presumably something the Iranians have been pushing all along as a deadlock breaker, said Ivan Safranchuk, head of the Moscow office of the World Security Institute.

"That's the position I would expect everyone to lean toward," said Mr. Safranchuk. "It's clearly a position the U.S. would be disappointed in, because the Iranians will be suspected of enlarging enrichment operations. They tend to push everything to the limit, and so this will probably only postpone the confrontation."

Russia And West Split On Iran Nuclear Issue (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016471

VIENNA, March 6 — A serious rift emerged Monday when Russia split with the United States and Europe over Iran's nuclear program after the Russians floated a last-minute proposal to allow Iran to make small quantities of nuclear fuel, according to European officials.

The reports of the proposal prompted Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to call Mohamed ElBaradei, the director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, and according to an administration official who was briefed on the conversation, "she said the United States cannot support this."

Ms. Rice's call came after Dr. ElBaradei suggested to reporters that the standoff with Iran could be resolved in a week or so, apparently an allusion to the Russian proposal. Washington's strategy is to get past the meeting of the I.A.E.A. that opened Monday and, under a resolution passed by the agency's board in February, have the issue turned over to the United Nations Security Council immediately. But officials clearly fear that the Russian proposal is intended to slow that process.

American officials said they had been assured by the Russians that there was no formal proposal on the table. The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, had dinner in Washington on Monday evening with Ms. Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen Hadley, and he is scheduled to meet President Bush in the Oval Office on Tuesday.

Under the Russian proposal, Iran would temporarily suspend all uranium enrichment activities at its facility at Natanz but then be allowed to do what Russia describes as "limited research activities" in Iran's uranium enrichment program, said the European officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity under normal diplomatic rules.

Iran would have to agree to a moratorium on production of enriched uranium on an industrial scale for between seven to nine years, ratify additional measures that let the nuclear agency conduct intrusive inspections of its nuclear facilities and create a joint venture with Russia on the production of enriched uranium on Russian soil, the officials said. The proposal, which has not been made public, spurred Dr. ElBaradei to give an upbeat assessment about a possible swift resolution of the impasse over Iran's program, an official familiar with his thinking said.

In a tonal shift, Dr. ElBaradei said Iran had made concessions on some issues. Calling Iran's activities at its uranium enrichment plant at Natanz "the sticking point," he added, "That issue is still being discussed this week, and I still hope that in the next week or so that agreement could still be reached."

In an interview on Monday evening, R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for political affairs, said the administration would reject any proposal that did not require the Iranians to stop domestic nuclear enrichment and reprocessing activities. "The United States will not support any halfway measures," he said. "That means full suspension of all nuclear activities, and a return to negotiations on that basis."

Ms. Rice told Dr. ElBaradei that Washington wanted to see Iran's case before the Security Council as soon as this week's agency board meeting was over; that the United States would seek a presidential statement, which does not carry the weight of a resolution, noting Iran's past failures to comply with its international commitments; and that Iran's case would then be sent back to the nuclear agency for further review, according to an official with knowledge of the conversation.

The Russian proposal is a reversal of its previous stance and seemed motivated by its determination to protect Iran from judgment by the Security Council.

Russia — and even China — had joined the United States and the Europeans in demanding that Iran resume a freeze of uranium enrichment activities at Natanz, reflecting mounting global suspicion that Iran's nuclear program is intended to produce weapons.

The Russian proposal surfaced late last week, when Sergei Kisliak, Russia's chief nuclear negotiator, presented it to officials of Britain, France and Germany.

He said Iran would have to resume full suspension of all enrichment-related activities, including what it calls its small-scale "research and development" while the agreement on the package was negotiated. Once there was an agreement, however, Iran would be allowed to conduct limited uranium enrichment research activities under a pilot program as agreed with the I.A.E.A.

As soon as Iran and the agency agreed on the small-scale enrichment, Iran's Parliament would ratify the "Additional Protocol" to Iran's nuclear agreement. That protocol gives the nuclear agency's inspectors the right to ask for exceptional access to Iran's nuclear facilities. When one of the Europeans asked Mr. Kisliak for his definition of a pilot program, he said there was no real definition, one official said.

DOJ_NMG_0016472

A moratorium on industrial-scale enrichment and reprocessing activities would last two to three years while the nuclear agency carried out an investigation of Iran's past nuclear activities and five to six years more until trust with Iran could be rebuilt.

Mr. Kisliak conceded that a major risk of such a package was that Iran would inch closer to mastering the technology for a small cascade of centrifuges that turn uranium gas into enriched uranium that can be used to produce electricity or to make bombs. He added that it would shorten the period needed for Iran to "manufacture a weapon" by a number of months, one official familiar with the briefing said.

Iran has always contended its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes, although Russia, like the United States and the Europeans, is convinced it intends to make nuclear weapons.

Mr. Kisliak speculated that Iran was unlikely to accept the proposal, in part because of the long-term constraints on its industrial-scale enrichment program. The proposal threatened to derail a carefully formulated, but fragile strategy to send Iran's case to the Security Council. Last month's resolution by the nuclear agency board demanded that no action be taken in the Council until after the current board meeting, a way to give Iran one last chance to comply with agency demands.

Even though there is no specific timetable to seek economic sanctions on Iran, both Russia and China are opposed to sanctions. There is no need for another resolution to be passed by the agency board this time for the Security Council to act. Certainly, Dr. ElBaradei is looking for a negotiated solution to the Iran impasse even if it means giving Iran a significant concession on making nuclear fuel.

In a conversation with the German and French foreign ministers, a senior British Foreign Office envoy and the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, in Vienna last Friday, Dr. ElBaradei expressed the view that Iran needed to continue some uranium enrichment work as a face-saving measure, a European official said. The Europeans, who met earlier with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, replied that it was not a question of saving face but of maintaining both the credibility of the nuclear agency and a firm position toward Iran.

The crucial issue for Iran is mastering the fuel cycle by enriching uranium. Indeed, in Tehran on Sunday, Mr. Larijani reiterated Iran's position that it would not freeze small-scale production of nuclear fuel even if its case came before the Security Council.

Russia Presses US And EU On Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

Russia is seeking to convince the US and the European Union to allow Iran to continue limited uranium enrichment, the process that can create weapons grade material.

But the idea has already been rejected by the US and the EU's big powers, and western diplomats said it could disrupt the uneasy common front on Iran between the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

Yesterday, Mohamed ElBaradei, director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, called for both Iran and the west to soften their "hard positions" on enrichment. "I still hope that in the next week or so . . . agreement could still be reached."

Moscow argues that there is little danger if Tehran restricts its activity to the 20 centrifuges it has been operating since last month, since thousands of centrifuges would be necessary to develop nuclear weapons. Dan Dombey, Brussels

Iran Said To Step Up Plans For Shahab Missiles (REU-Y2)

By Louis Charbonneau

Reuters, March 6, 2006

As Iran pursues a nuclear program the West fears is aimed at producing bombs, Tehran also appears to be stepping up development of missiles capable of carrying atomic warheads, diplomats citing intelligence say.

According to an intelligence report given to Reuters by a non-U.S. diplomat, a covert Iranian program run by people closely linked to Iran's military includes plans to arm its Shahab-3 missiles, which experts believe have a maximum range of around 2,000 km (1,240 miles), with nuclear warheads.

The report, which could not be independently confirmed, surfaced as the United States and its allies seek to highlight the potential security dangers of a nuclear-armed Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0016473

The report said it was code-named Project 111 and that the "aim is arming Shahab-3 missiles with nuclear warheads."

An Iranian official, who asked not to be named, denied the charge.

The assessment that Iran has nuclear ambitions for the Shahab-3 is shared by the European Union, Washington and Israel, said an EU diplomat who asked not to be named.

Tehran says it only wants nuclear power stations, not bombs. After three years of inquiries, U.N. inspectors have been unable to verify that Tehran's nuclear program is purely peaceful.

An Iranian exile who has reported accurately on Tehran's nuclear program in the past said Iran had significantly increased production of Shahab-3 missiles.

The International Atomic Energy Agency's board of governors met in Vienna on Monday to consider the latest IAEA report on Iran's nuclear program. It will be sent to the U.N. Security Council, which could impose sanctions on Iran.

Project 111 was first mentioned last month in a report by the Washington Post, which described it as "a nuclear research effort that includes work on missile development." The Post said U.S. officials believe it is the successor of Project 110, which they believe is the military arm of Iran's atomic program.

GERMANY WARNS COMPANIES

German intelligence officials believe Iran has stepped up covert efforts to procure missile technology, said a German government official, who asked not to be named.

The intelligence officials are sending "early-warning letters" to German firms, urging them to be alert for Iranian agents hunting for missile technology, he said.

German authorities have detained several Germans and at least one foreigner as part of a series of investigations of suspected attempts to purchase missile and other arms technology in Germany on behalf of Iranian intelligence, the official said.

Iran has repeatedly warned it would not hesitate to deploy the Shahab-3 missiles, which can reach Israel and U.S. military bases in the Gulf, if it comes under attack.

Material recovered by U.S. intelligence from a stolen laptop computer also suggests Iranian missile experts have been trying to develop a missile re-entry vehicle capable of carrying a relatively small nuclear warhead, EU diplomats have said.

But David Albright, a former U.N. weapons inspector and head of a U.S.-based think-tank, cautioned that however credible, all this intelligence is based on assessments, not certainty.

"I don't think any of the available intelligence represents a smoking gun," Albright said.

His Institute for Science and International Security estimates that Iran could not produce a bomb before 2009.

Alireza Jafarzadeh, an Iranian exile who heads a think-tank in Washington, told Reuters Tehran had sharply accelerated production of Shahab-3 missiles to around 90 a year from 15-20.

Jafarzadeh, formerly a spokesman for the National Council of Resistance in Iran (NCRI), listed by Washington as a terrorist organization, revealed the existence of Iran's secret uranium enrichment plant at Natanz and other sites in August 2002.

North Korea has also been key to Iran's missile development.

Last month a German diplomat, citing his country's intelligence, confirmed a German newspaper report from December that said Iran had purchased 18 disassembled BM-25 mobile missiles with a range of around 2,500 km from North Korea.

The NCRI said at a news conference in London on Monday that Iran was also working on developing so-called Ghadr missiles, with a range of up to 3,000 km. Unlike the Shahab, which is based on North Korean Nodong missile technology, the Ghadr missile is based neither on North Korean or Russian designs.

No comment from Iran was immediately available.

India Nuclear Deal Pushed (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

The proposed U.S.-India nuclear deal will not open the door for Iran and other rogue states to acquire atomic weapons and technology, the Bush administration's lead negotiator insisted yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0016474

"We don't see the connection between what Iran is doing and what India seeks to do," Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said at the Heritage Foundation.

The administration has begun selling the India deal in earnest on Capitol Hill, where several top lawmakers are either cool to the accord or openly skeptical.

Mr. Burns, speaking five days after helping nail down the deal in New Delhi, rejected critics' assertions that bending the rules for India -- which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) -- will make it more difficult to rally opposition against Tehran.

Mr. Burns said Iran's Islamic regime was an "autocratic state" that hid its nuclear programs from international inspectors for nearly two decades. Iran enjoys "no trust in the international community."

India, however, is a peaceful democracy that, under theagreement, would place 14 of its 22 nuclear reactors under monitoring and inspection by the United Nations.

"We think these are two countries that are going in diametrically opposed directions," he said. "India in the responsible one; Iran is the irresponsible one."

South Korean analysts also have warned that the India agreement could complicate the multilateral effort to pressure North Korea to abandon its nuclear programs.

Administration officials conceded they have a major selling job to do on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers complained that they had been given little notice when the agreement was floated in the summer.

Key Republican lawmakers such as Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G. Lugar of Indiana and House International Relations Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde of Illinois have taken a wait-and-see stance, saying they needed to examine the details of the New Delhi deal.

House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, said sharing U.S. nuclear expertise would help train a generation of researchers in India who could help the country's military nuclear programs -- which are not covered by the accord.

"This thing has to be looked at very, very carefully," he told ABC's "This Week" Sunday. "I'm very, very skeptical."

The administration is scheduling briefings for members and staff on Capitol Hill. Congress must amend several U.S. nonproliferation statutes to implement the accord.

Mr. Burns did not rule out a parliamentary maneuver in which the agreement would go into effect unless the House and Senate voted to kill it.

"We're very open to Congress on how to proceed," he said, adding that the process could take several months.

Although more than a third of India's nuclear reactors will not be subject to U.N. oversight under the accord, Mr. Burns said India had agreed that all future nuclear sites devoted to civilian power also would be automatically covered and monitored. U.S. officials had been told that the "great majority" of India's nuclear activity in the coming years will be on the civilian side.

The percentage of India's nuclear work subject to international controls will be "much broader by the year 2020," he said.

But India insisted on the right to designate which of its sites would be for civilian and which for military uses. That, critics say, allows India to build so-called fast-breeder nuclear reactors that could accelerate the country's bomb-making potential and upset the military balance with rival Pakistan.

In New Delhi yesterday, Indian officials pressed visiting Australian Prime Minister John Howard to end a ban on sales of uranium to India in the wake of the U.S. deal. Australia has the world's largest uranium deposits but does not sell to countries that have not signed the NPT.

Mr. Howard called the U.S.-India accord "very significant" but said his government "was not going to suddenly change" its policy on uranium exports.

Judicious Double Standards (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016475

Back behind my high school one day, we all assembled to watch a fistfight. To my immense pleasure, a bully was being bested by his victim. Then the bully's friend stepped in and ended matters with a swift kick to the other guy's midsection. It was an unfair ending to what was supposed to be a fair fight, but it taught me a valuable lesson: You treat your friends differently than you do your enemies.

This elemental principle of life, love and other matters seems utterly lost on so many critics of George Bush's agreement to provide India with civilian nuclear technology. In doing so, we are told, he has done something truly awful -- established a double standard. Well, duh -- yes. India is our friend and Iran, just to pick an example, is not.

The cry of "double standard" is a bit silly. It asks us not to recognize certain realities -- the difference between friends and enemies, for instance, or good and bad democracies, to give another example. In the case of the nuclear agreement, we are somehow supposed to believe that by favoring India, Bush has made it much harder to put pressure on Iran to abandon its apparent weapons program and become a "good guy" nation. This overlooks the fact that Iran is governed by a zealot who has pledged to eradicate Israel and who firmly believes in the inherent evil of the United States of America. As Bush once said about himself, the Iranians do not do nuance.

Reality imposes its own rules -- and they have nothing to do with double standards. North Korea probably already has a nuclear weapon. Iran is going that way, and it is going to happen no matter what the United States and its allies do. For Iran, going nuclear has been a national goal ever since the shah headed the government. Now this is even more the case, especially since the United States, which lumped Iran along with Iraq into the "axis of evil," invaded Iraq. It would hardly be the height of paranoia for Iran to think it is next.

The invocation of the term "double standard" is often applied where Israel is concerned. Israel is presumed to have a nuclear arsenal. Why should the United States look the other way at Israel's bomb and go nuts over Iran's effort to get one? The answer ought to be clear: Because Israel has not threatened to blow Iran off the map; because it is vastly outnumbered in a tough, belligerent neighborhood; and because it is the lone real democracy in a region run mostly by thugs.

The same accusation of a double standard is made with regard to the effort to discriminate between election outcomes. We are supposed to treat the victory of Hamas in Palestine as we would that of the Labor Party in Britain. But the outcome of one democratic election is not threatening and the other is, and we ought to be able to say so -- and do something about it. If, for instance, we are supposed to continue aiding a Palestinian government that has now fallen into the hands of religious fanatics and proponents of a virulent brand of anti-Semitism, then we have lost our minds. It will not matter to some poor Israeli that the terrorist who kills him represented a democratically elected government.

The "double standard" accusation has a schoolyard quality to it. Why a boycott of Cuba and not of China? Because you can with one and not with the other. Why attack Saddam Hussein and not all the other vile dictators? Because you do what you can. Why not ask why you leave your estate to your kids and not strangers? Because your kids are your kids. It is the ultimate double standard.

It is true, of course, that Bush has upended 30 years of American nuclear policy -- and there will be consequences. Maybe, as some of the critics say, he has made it easier for India to increase its nuclear arsenal. But India will make all the weapons it feels it needs -- no matter what the United States does. America is a superpower, but not even a superpower is all-powerful.

The Israeli bomb threatens nobody. An Iranian bomb does. India has transferred its nuclear technology to no one. Pakistan has. No one worries about India or Israel making the technology available to terrorists. Everyone worries about Iran doing that. These are distinctions with great differences. They are, as critics charge, double standards, but to apply a single standard to both friend and enemy, while it might be fair, would be singularly stupid.

Mr. Bush's Asian Road Trip (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

There is a lot of good a president can do on a visit to another country: negotiate treaties that enhance American security, shore up a shaky alliance, generate good will in important parts of the world. Unfortunately, President Bush didn't do any of those good things on his just-completed visit to Pakistan and India and may have done some real harm.

DOJ_NMG_0016476

The spectacularly misconceived trip may have inflicted serious damage to American goals in two vital areas, namely, mobilizing international diplomacy against the spread of nuclear weapons and encouraging Pakistan to take more effective action against the Taliban and Al Qaeda fighters operating from its territory.

The nuclear deal that Mr. Bush concluded with India threatens to blast a bomb-size loophole through the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. It would have been bad enough on its own, and disastrously ill timed, because it undercuts some of the most powerful arguments Washington can make to try to galvanize international opposition to Iran's nuclear adventurism.

But the most immediate damage was done on Mr. Bush's next stop, Pakistan. Washington is trying to persuade Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the Pakistani military dictator, to defy nationalist and Islamic objections and move more aggressively against Pakistani-based terrorists. This is no small issue because both Osama bin Laden and the Taliban's leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, are now believed to operate from Pakistani soil.

But sticking Mr. Musharraf with the unwelcome task of explaining to Pakistanis why his friend and ally, Mr. Bush, had granted favorable nuclear terms to Pakistan's archrival, India, while withholding them from Pakistan left him less likely to do Washington any special, and politically unpopular, favors on the terrorism front.

It's just baffling why Mr. Bush traveled halfway around the world to stand right next to one of his most important allies against terrorists — and embarrass him. India and Pakistan are military rivals that have fought each other repeatedly. They have both developed nuclear weapons outside the nonproliferation treaty, which both refuse to sign. When India exploded its first acknowledged nuclear weapons eight years ago, Pakistan felt obliged to follow suit within weeks.

So when Mr. Bush agreed to carve out an exception to global nonproliferation rules for India, it should have been obvious that Pakistani opinion would demand the same privileged treatment, and that Mr. Musharraf would be embarrassed by Mr. Bush's explicit refusal to provide it.

Mr. Bush was right to say no to Pakistan. It would be an unthinkably bad idea to grant a loophole to a country whose top nuclear scientist helped transfer nuclear technology to leading rogue states. Granting India a loophole that damages a vital treaty and lets New Delhi accelerate production of nuclear bombs makes no sense either.

Mr. Bush should have just stayed home.

Energy, Iran Spur Turkey's Revival Of Nuclear Plans (WP)

By Karl Vick

Washington Post, March 7, 2006

ISTANBUL -- Turkey is reviving its long-deferred quest for nuclear power, pressed both by serious energy shortfalls within its own borders and by strident nuclear ambitions in neighboring Iran that threaten to upset a regional balance of power.

"The rise in oil prices and the need for multiple sources of energy make our need for nuclear energy an utmost priority," Energy Minister Hilmi Guler said last month in announcing plans to build as many as five atomic energy plants. The first, to be located on the Black Sea at Sinop, would come on line in 2012 and ease Turkey's costly dependence on natural gas, 90 percent of which arrives by pipeline from Russia and Iran.

With a rapidly expanding economy, a population of 70 million and scarce petroleum deposits, Turkey appears to be a logical candidate for nuclear power. Guler, who made his remarks while visiting a nuclear plant in Virginia, said the new Turkish reactors could provide about a tenth of the 54,000 megawatts the country expects to need over the next two decades.

"Turkey is a very poor country in respect to power. This has made the country very vulnerable," said Fatih Birol, chief international economist at the energy agency of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, a cooperative of 30 countries that fosters good governance. Birol said that after briefing Turkey's foreign and energy ministers in recent weeks, "I think this government is rather determined to go ahead."

Neighboring Iran's nuclear program, which the United States and other countries have called a cover for developing nuclear weapons, also looms over the revival of Turkey's program, which has had numerous false starts since the early 1960s. Iran and Turkey are almost identical in population and economy and regard each other roughly as equals in a famously combustible region with no dominant power.

DOJ_NMG_0016477

"Iran with nuclear production will be the dominant power," said Ozdem Sanberk, a former ambassador to Washington who heads the Turkish Economic and Social Studies research group in Istanbul. "There will be an asymmetrical relationship."

Sanberk has argued recently that Turkey has no choice but to pursue a nuclear program of its own under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

"If we want to leave an independent country to our future generations, we do not have the luxury to delay," Sanberk wrote.

U.S. officials are trying to use Turkey's unease over developments in Iran as part of international efforts to persuade Tehran to suspend its nuclear program. Last month, the U.S. ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency, Greg Schulte, spent two days in Ankara for what the U.S. Embassy described as "intense dialogue and cooperation" on the Iranian question. Senior officials of Turkey's ruling Justice and Development Party, whose roots in Islam afford some entree with Tehran, lately have turned up the volume. Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said Turkey was "saddened by Iran's restarting uranium enrichment."

Any Turkish move toward a nuclear weapons program would mark a dramatic departure from long-standing foreign policy and military doctrine. Guided by the slogan of the country's founder, Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, "Peace at home, peace in the world," Turkish diplomats and the powerful general staff have invested heavily in international institutions, deploying troops repeatedly to Afghanistan and ratifying the most stringent additions to the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

"Turkey's state policy is always: Play the game within the rules," said Mustafa Kibaroglu, a nuclear proliferation expert at Bilkent University in Ankara. But "if Iran goes nuclear, then who knows?"

In the past, Kibaroglu saw merit in a domestic nuclear industry for Turkey. In a recent interview, however, he argued for alternatives, including improvements to the electrical grid, which leaks as much as a quarter of the power it produces.

"I'm not supporting Turkey's nuclear energy program anymore," he said, "because I'm not clear about what the real intention is. Let's put it that way."

Hamas Revokes Abbas's Wider Powers (FT/REU)

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

Hamas legislators voted on Monday to revoke all decisions made by the previous Palestinian parliament at its final session last month, including laws that gave President Mahmoud Abbas wider powers to appoint some judges.

The move was seen as a challenge to Abbas, whose once-dominant Fatah faction suffered a resounding defeat at the hands of Hamas in parliamentary elections on Jan. 25.

A senior Abbas aide accused Hamas of attempting to oust the Palestinian president.

"We see this as a coup attempt to change the regime and they (Hamas) have to seriously reconsider their decisions," said Tayeb Abdel-Rahim.

In the final session of the previous parliament on Feb. 13, majority Fatah members pushed through an amendment to an existing law, giving Abbas power to appoint judges to a constitutional court without seeking legislative approval.

The judges could be asked to decide whether laws approved by the new parliament are constitutional. Hamas has said the move would effectively give Abbas veto power over new laws.

In the first parliamentary session since being sworn in, Hamas lawmakers -- who dominate the 132-seat parliament, nullified all decisions taken in the session.

"The law is very clear. It gives us the right to endorse or reject the resolutions or the decisions of that session," senior Hamas lawmaker Mahmoud Ramahi told Reuters before the annulment vote was taken.

Fatah members had earlier walked out of the first working session of the new parliament on Monday in protest after Hamas began steps to revoke the previous decisions. © Reuters Limited Click for restrictions

Hamas Legislators Strip Palestinian President Of Wider Powers (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 6 — In the first working session of the new Palestinian parliament, Hamas lawmakers voted overwhelmingly on Monday to strip the president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, of the expanded powers he had been granted by the legislature before Hamas took control of it.

Shortly after the session began, it degenerated into shouting matches between the rival Hamas and Fatah factions, with Fatah legislators ultimately storming out. After the walkout, lawmakers from Hamas, the radical Islamic faction, voted to nullify all actions taken last month in the final session of the previous legislature, including the decision to give Mr. Abbas additional authority.

In violence on Monday, an Israeli airstrike on a vehicle killed five people in Gaza City: two Islamic Jihad members, who were the targets, and three young bystanders, Palestinian witnesses and medical workers said.

As for the discord in parliament, Azzam al-Ahmed, the head of the Fatah bloc, said, "We have tried through dialogue and contacts with Hamas to resolve this issue, but they are insisting on domination."

Dr. Mahmoud Zahar, a senior Hamas leader, said, "Every time we present an important point, Azzam al-Ahmed stands up and tries to disrupt our work."

For the most part, Hamas and Fatah have spoken of each other in respectful tones since the Hamas election victory in January, which toppled Fatah, the secular nationalist movement that dominated Palestinian politics for decades. Hamas won 74 of the 132 seats; Fatah captured only 45.

Hamas has invited Fatah and other factions to join the cabinet. But Monday's stormy session pointed to the likelihood of a tense, confrontational relationship, and seemed to rule out the already remote prospect that Fatah might take part.

Monday's events also did not augur well for Mr. Abbas, the Fatah leader, who remains president and will have to work with the Hamas-led cabinet.

On Feb. 13, more than two weeks after the election and only five days before the new parliament was sworn in, Fatah lawmakers in the departing parliament gave additional authority to Mr. Abbas.

The most controversial move formed a nine-judge constitutional court, to be appointed by the president. The court would have the power to strike down laws judged to violate the Basic Law, which effectively serves as the constitution for the Palestinian Authority. Mr. Abbas would then be able to work through the court to veto laws passed by Hamas legislators, according to Hamas.

Fatah lawmakers argued Monday that the session last month was legitimate. But in the view of Hamas, the measures passed in the final session were not valid because many lawmakers had already been voted out of office.

Because Israel has barred many legislators from traveling, those from the Gaza Strip gathered in Gaza City, while West Bank legislators met in Ramallah. They were connected in a video conference, which has become the norm for such sessions.

At Monday's session, 20 of the 132 Palestinian lawmakers were absent. Some are wanted by Israel and are in hiding; others are in Israeli jails. Large portraits of a dozen imprisoned lawmakers were placed in their vacant seats.

Aziz Dweik, the speaker of parliament and a Hamas member, opened Monday's session by saying: "The Palestinian people will be our leaders, and we will want to follow the path of the great Palestinian people, who have showed us how to resist. Our main guide will be the teachings of God and of Muhammad."

In the streets of Gaza City, about a dozen Fatah gunmen walked near the parliament building while the legislature was in session and fired their automatic rifles into the air. After a short time, they left the area.

Israel said the airstrike was aimed at Islamic Jihad, which has been behind many recent attacks against Israel.

The dead were identified by Agence France-Presse as Munir Sukar, 25, and Ashraf Shalluf, 24. Three bystanders also died: Raed al-Batsh, 10; his brother Ala al-Batsh, 14; and Ahmed Sousi, 17, according to Palestinian reports.

Israel's military confirmed that it had carried out the airstrike but said it had no information on casualties.

Also on Monday, two Palestinian teenage brothers were killed in a blast in central Gaza that was caused by a bomb that apparently went off accidentally while they were handling it, the Palestinians said.

Hamas Picks A First-Day Fight (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 6 -- In its first working session, the Hamas-controlled Palestinian legislature swiftly asserted its new political clout Monday by nullifying a law approved by the previous parliament that gave new powers to Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas, leader of the rival Fatah movement.

DOJ_NMG_0016479

The law was passed on the final day of the lame-duck legislature dominated by Fatah, the secular-nationalist movement that Hamas trounced in the Jan. 25 parliamentary elections. Fatah lawmakers called the Hamas vote to void the law illegal and stormed out of parliament in protest.

The measure gave Abbas, president of the Palestinian Authority, power to name members of a constitutional court without parliamentary approval. The panel rules on the legality of legislation, meaning that Hamas's program could have been blocked if Abbas had packed the court with Fatah members.

The incoming Hamas lawmakers had vowed to reverse the law, which they denounced as an illegitimate attempt to strengthen Abbas's power before its new majority took office.

But in fulfilling that pledge Monday, as the parliament met simultaneously in the West Bank city of Ramallah and the Gaza Strip through a video feed, Hamas infuriated Fatah lawmakers whom they are courting to join a coalition cabinet.

"They got beaten in the first round," said Ahmed al-Hajj Ali, a Hamas legislator. "This is the first day of the victory of law that has been absent from the Palestinian arena for many, many years."

Hamas, formally known as the Islamic Resistance Movement, is designated a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union for its declared war against Israel. The party controls 74 of parliament's 132 seats. But it is seeking to bring Fatah into the cabinet to assuage international concern over its political agenda, which has jeopardized the government's lifeblood foreign aid.

Hamas rejects a negotiated two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the approach endorsed by Fatah. The new cabinet is due to be installed by March 28, but so far, Fatah leaders have said they would rather see Hamas fail on its own than join the cabinet.

Saeb Erekat, a Fatah legislator, said Hamas's decision to void legislation passed by a previous parliament was "absolutely unconstitutional." After meeting with Abbas on Monday evening, Erekat said Fatah would ask the Palestinian High Court on Tuesday to overturn the vote nullifying the law.

"This is a new day in the parliament, a whole new ballgame," Erekat said. "We have a government, an opposition, and Hamas in the driver's seat. If we can manage this, we will be doing a great job. But the question is how do we manage it."

In the Gaza Strip, meanwhile, an Israeli airstrike Monday killed five Palestinians and wounded eight others. Israeli military aircraft fired on a car carrying two senior members of the radical Islamic Jihad movement, the group chiefly responsible for the daily rocket fire from Gaza into southern Israel.

Three bystanders were also killed, including an 8-year-old boy, identified as Raed al-Batesh, and Ahmed al-Sousi, 17.

Hamas Strips Abbas' Powers (WT/AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Hamas headed into a full-blown confrontation with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas yesterday, voting to strip him of powers that he was awarded hastily by his Fatah party in the last session of the outgoing parliament.

The Hamas-Fatah conflict has been simmering since Hamas swept Fatah out of office in the Jan. 25 parliamentary elections, ending four decades of unchallenged rule by the party of the late Yasser Arafat.

Hamas has 74 seats in the new parliament and Fatah has 45. The first order of business for Hamas was to cancel the powers the outgoing parliament gave Mr. Abbas, the Fatah leader, authorizing him to cancel laws passed by the new parliament and appointing Fatah officials to key positions.

In the West Bank administrative capital of Ramallah, Fatah delegates walked out, accusing Hamas of twisting the rules to weaken Mr. Abbas' authority.

About 15 Fatah gunmen marched on parliament in Gaza City, firing into the air. The gunmen eventually headed to a Fatah meeting, where they demanded that their party stay out of the government that Hamas is setting up and threatened to kill any Fatah official who joined.

DOJ_NMG_0016480

With its absolute majority, Hamas can set up a government by itself, but Hamas leaders prefer to bring in other parties, partly to deflect international criticism and threatened economic sanctions because of Hamas' record of violence and refusal to recognize Israel.

Israel, which considers Hamas a terror group, refuses to allow members of the Palestinian parliament to travel from Gaza to the West Bank, so the two buildings were linked by teleconferencing equipment to allow the session to take place.

In the final session of the previous parliament on Feb. 13, majority Fatah members pushed through an amendment that gave Mr. Abbas power to appoint judges to a constitutional court without seeking legislative approval.

Yesterday, Hamas easily passed legislation to rescind Mr. Abbas' new powers, but some analysts said Mr. Abbas has the authority to cancel the resolution, perpetuating the standoff.

Fatah complained that the Hamas action yesterday "undermines the basis of dialogue and partnership in any institution with Hamas." A Fatah legislator said the decisions would be appealed to the Palestinian supreme court.

Hamas lawmaker Mushir al-Masri ridiculed the Fatah reaction.

"It is obvious that some people until now have not understood the rules of the democratic game," he said.

Mr. Abbas was elected president of the Palestinian Authority in January 2005, and his term has three years remaining, regardless of the makeup of parliament.

Although Mr. Abbas is seen as a moderate and remains in power, Israel has reacted to the Hamas victory by cutting off transfer of vital tax money to the Palestinian Authority, charging that it now is controlled by terrorists.

As parliament was wrapping up its session yesterday, the Israeli air force targeted an ice-cream truck in Gaza City, killing two Islamic Jihad militants and three bystanders, two of them children, the military and Palestinian officials said.

A spokesman for the group who gave his name as Abu Dajana vowed retaliation.

"God willing, we are going to get revenge for the honorable bloodshed today," he told reporters outside a morgue at the Shifa hospital in Gaza, where angry Palestinians chanted, "Death to Israel."

Mr. Abbas appealed for international intervention to stop Israeli attacks.

"These aggressive actions threaten the exerted efforts to maintain the truce," he said. "Achieving security would come only through negotiations, not unilateral action and aggression."

The "unilateral action" reference came as Israeli security officials outlined plans for Israel to cut itself off further from the Gaza Strip, after the summer withdrawal of soldiers and settlers. The security chiefs are expected to present the plan after Israel's March 28 election.

Hamas Undoes New Powers Given To Palestinian President (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

JERUSALEM — In a sharp challenge to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, the Hamas-dominated parliament Monday annulled a series of measures by the outgoing legislature aimed at strengthening the president's powers.

Hours later, tensions were stoked when an Israeli airstrike in Gaza City killed two Palestinian militants and three passersby, one of them an 8-year-old boy. Israel acknowledged having carried out the "targeted killing" of an Islamic Jihad field operative it said was responsible for a number of attacks against Israelis. It expressed regret over any civilian casualties.

The confrontation in the Palestinian parliament raised fears that Hamas, the militant movement that decisively won January's legislative elections, was turning its back on the notion of compromise and conciliation with Abbas' Fatah, the more moderate and secular faction it defeated.

Fatah lawmakers walked out in protest just before the annulment vote, which took place during the parliament's first full working session. The new legislature had met just once previously, on Feb. 18, for a ceremonial swearing-in.

Monday's stormy six-hour session was held at separate parliament buildings in the West Bank town of Ramallah and in Gaza City, which were connected by a video link. Many lawmakers from Gaza, including the seaside territory's entire Hamas contingent, are prevented by Israel from traveling to the West Bank.

The distance did little to paper over the clear animosity between the two sides. Fatah stalwart Mohammed Dahlan told the Hamas lawmakers that seeking to annul decisions by the previous parliament was "a dangerous precedent." Mahmoud Zahar, the majority leader and a senior Hamas figure, visibly glowered as he accused Fatah of trying to disrupt the new parliament's work.

DOJ_NMG_0016481

"This is something we will not accept," he said.

The annulled measures would have given Abbas the power to appoint a constitutional court with the authority to rule on any dispute between the executive branch and lawmakers, or between the president and the new Cabinet that Hamas is expected to put forth in coming weeks.

The nine-member court also would have had the power to veto laws deemed in violation of the Palestinians' quasi-constitutional Basic Law.

Hamas lawmakers also overturned five appointments to senior posts, all of them Fatah members, which were approved by the previous parliament.

As has often been the case since Hamas' upset victory, the threat of violence hung over the gathering.

Fatah gunmen, who have gone on shooting rampages to protest the loss of government privileges, strode up and down outside the parliament building in Gaza City.

The parliamentary quarrel makes it even more unlikely that Fatah will agree to enter into a governing coalition with Hamas. Fatah's senior leaders as well as the rank and file have brushed aside the prospect of such an alliance.

In Gaza City, an angry crowd gathered outside the main Shifa Hospital, where the bodies of those killed and injured in the Israeli airstrike had been brought. Doctors said eight people were wounded in the explosion in the city's Shajaiyeh district, which came as many people were heading home from work or shopping for evening meals.

A spokesman for Islamic Jihad's military wing promised to take revenge for what he confirmed to be the deaths of two of the group's fighters.

"We will escalate our attacks at the Zionist enemy," said the spokesman, who goes by the name of Abu Hamza. "We will strike at the heart of Israel…. We call on the Zionists to get some coffins ready."

The Israeli army said in a statement that the raid had targeted Munir Mahmed Mahmed Sukhar, a 30-year-old Islamic Jihad operative it said was responsible for rocket attacks against Israel and the attempted smuggling of would-be suicide bombers and explosives into Israel from Egypt.

Islamic Jihad, which has rejected a truce that is largely being adhered to by Hamas, was responsible for all six suicide bombings in Israel last year. Hamas halted its campaign of suicide bombings when it entered politics a year ago.

In recent months, Israel has steadily been targeting Islamic Jihad militants, often with airstrikes like Monday's in urban areas.

A witness, Zohir Maarouf, said he and other onlookers rushed to help the injured after the massive explosion rocked his busy street.

"I grabbed a woman who was hurt and bleeding and carried her to my car and rushed to the hospital," he said.

In an unrelated incident, two teenage Palestinian brothers were killed in an explosion on the outskirts of the Bureij refugee camp in the central Gaza Strip.

The camp's mayor, Kamal Bughdadi, said the boys, ages 14 and 15, were thought to have been playing with unexploded Israeli ordnance, perhaps a tank shell.

Special correspondents Maher Abukhater in Ramallah and Rushdie abu Alouf in Gaza City contributed to this report.

Hamas Leaders Not Immune From Targeted Killing, Israeli Defense Chief Says (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

JERUSALEM – Israel's defense minister warned that Hamas leaders, including incoming Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, will not be immune from pinpointed Israeli killings if the Islamic militant group were to resume its attacks on Israel.

The defense minister, Shaul Mofaz, spoke a day after an Israeli air strike against an ice-cream truck killed two Islamic Jihad militants and three bystanders, including two children, in Gaza City.

DOJ_NMG_0016482

Hamas, which is sworn to Israel's destruction, swept January parliamentary elections and is in the process of forming a cabinet. It has rejected international calls to renounce its violent, anti-Israel ideology, but has maintained a year-old moratorium on suicide bombings.

Mr. Mofaz told Israel's Army Radio Tuesday that Israel's policy of targeted killings has proven to be effective, and will continue. "There is no question about its efficacy," Mr. Mofaz said. "Look what happened to Hamas in the years it conducted an untrammeled suicide bombing war against us. When we started the targeted killings, the situation changed, he said.

"We will continue the targeted killings at this pace," Mr. Mofaz added. "No one will be immune."

Asked if Mr. Haniyeh would be a target if Hamas were to resume attacks, Mr. Mofaz replied: "If Hamas, a terror organization that doesn't recognize agreements with us and isn't willing to renounce violence, presents us with the challenge of having to confront a terror organization, then no one there will be immune. Not just Ismail Haniyeh. No one will be immune."

Salah al-Bardawil, a Hamas spokesman, denounced Mr. Mofaz's comments. "This statement and Israeli practices on the ground reflect the bloody, inhumane and inflammatory character of the Zionist enemy," Mr. Bardawil said. "We are not seeking immunity or mercy from Israel. We are in a confrontation. The side that is most steadfast is the side that will survive," he said.

Hamas headed into a domestic confrontation on Monday by stripping Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of powers his then-ruling Fatah Party granted him in its last session. Fatah delegates walked out of parliament in protest, charging that Hamas was twisting the rules to nullify Mr. Abbas's additional authority. They plan to extend their protest Tuesday by boycotting the parliamentary session, a Fatah official said.

The Hamas-Fatah conflict has been simmering since Hamas swept Fatah out of office in January, winning 74 seats in the new parliament to Fatah's 45. Azzam al-Ahmed, Fatah's parliamentary faction leader, said Tuesday that Fatah would file suit against Hamas in the Palestinian Supreme Court in the course of the day. "They used their majority to infringe the law on behalf of their interests, and we are resorting now to the judiciary to help us protect the law," Mr. Ahmed said.

Some legal experts say Mr. Abbas has the authority to cancel Hamas's action on Monday, a move that would perpetuate the standoff. Mr. Abbas was elected president of the Palestinian Authority in an election in January 2005, and his term has three years to run, regardless of the makeup of the parliament.

US Says Door Remains Open To N.Korea Nuclear Talks (REU-Y2)

By Paul Eckert

Reuters, March 7, 2006

North Korea should return to six-country nuclear talks regardless of the outcome of discussions on the U.S. financial crackdown on Pyongyang over money laundering, the State Department said on Monday.

Senior North Korean diplomat Ri Gun was due in New York on Tuesday for a briefing from a U.S. team led by the Treasury Department on measures imposed to combat Pyongyang's suspected money laundering and counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

State Department spokesman Tom Casey took pains to separate the technical explanation of the financial penalties from efforts to get North Korea to rejoin nuclear talks with the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

"It's not related to the six-party talks," Casey said.

"We think that regardless of this briefing, and regardless of anything else, that the North Koreans ought to come back to those talks as soon as is possible," he told reporters.

North Korea has denied involvement in any illegal activities and has boycotted the talks since November, arguing that the crackdown was an attempt to topple its leadership.

But the visit to New York by Ri, the North's deputy envoy to the six-party talks, has raised hopes that the North may be poised to return to negotiations hosted by China.

The meeting in New York is "an opportunity for us to explain to the North Koreans simply how our law works and the kind of actions that we took," said Casey, who reiterated Washington's stance on the nuclear talks.

"The door is not closed to the resumption of the six-party talks. We're ready to go back today," he said.

NORTH TO COOPERATE?

DOJ_NMG_0016483

The six countries agreed in principle in September that the North would dismantle its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and better diplomatic ties. But their last session in November ended without progress.

Japan's Kyodo news agency quoted Ri as saying in Beijing at the weekend that North Korea was a "victim" of money laundering. "We plan to convey our readiness to cooperate in international efforts" to tackle financial crime, Ri said.

In September, the Treasury Department branded Banco Delta Asia -- a bank in Macau that did business with North Korean firms -- a "willing pawn" in Pyongyang's illicit financial activities. The bank denied the allegations, but said in February that it had stopped dealing with North Korea.

The State Department's International Narcotics Control Strategy Report issued on March 1 cited "compelling evidence" that North Korea was involved in a wide range of criminal activities, including trafficking in counterfeit cigarettes and high-quality counterfeit U.S. currency.

Estimates of North Korea's illicit earnings from trafficking and counterfeiting range as high as $1 billion a year. Some U.S. officials have said Pyongyang has enough paper and ink to make $2 billion in counterfeit American money.

The Institute for International Economics' Marcus Noland, a leading expert on the North's economy, said North Korea probably makes only a fraction of the face value of the fake currency it sells to criminal groups in bulk.

S.Korea, U.S. To Start Free Trade Talks In June (REU-Y2)

By Jack Kim

Reuters, March 6, 2006

The United States and South Korea agreed on Monday to start a formal round of free trade talks in June, dealing a blow to farmers and unionists demonstrating against the plans.

A group of about 40 rallied on Monday in Seoul as trade negotiators from the two countries agreed to hold their first official talks, aimed at bringing down trade barriers, on June 5 to June 9 in Washington.

South Korea's chief negotiator, Kim Jong-hoon, told reporters four additional rounds of talks were planned in alternate capitals for this year to open up trade between the two countries that in 2004 totaled more than $70 billion.

"I believe we should finish this job once we start it," he said, adding the two sides had not set a date for when the talks should be finalized.

"We have not set a deadline for the talks," he said.

Kim and the U.S. chief negotiator Assistant Trade Representative Wendy Cutler met at South Korea's Foreign Ministry.

However, Korean opponents, fearing free trade will spark a flood of cheap imports from the United States that could ruin their livelihoods, promised fierce demonstrations against the government of President Roh Moo-hyun to try to prevent a deal going ahead.

"The Roh Moo-hyun government will never be excused," said Moon Kyung-sik, the head of the Korea Peasants' League. "We will be fighting stronger battles than we did last year."

Two members of the Korea Peasants' League were killed last year in clashes with riot police when they demonstrated against a multi-lateral agreement by South Korea to gradually raise rice imports.

Rice will be one contentious area in the talks between Seoul and Washington. South Korea insists rice will not be part of a free trade deal, while the United States says it must be included in the talks.

Another contentious area is likely to be exports of South Korea autos to the United States. U.S. car makers are already feeling the heat as they lose market share to Asian producers.

South Korea's service sector could also create bottlenecks in the talks because of large state involvement or restrictions on foreign ownership in such fields as telecommunications.

"Opening agriculture is definitely a big barrier, but opening (South Korean) services will also be important," said Daniella Markheim, a trade economist at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

Kim said the talks will be open-ended even though White House authority to negotiate a trade pact that can not be amended by Congress runs out in July next year.

DOJ_NMG_0016484

President Roh said last month reaching a free trade deal with the United States would be one of the top priorities in the remainder of his term that runs to February 2008.

The United States, which has the world's biggest economy, ran a trade deficit with South Korea, which has the world's 11th biggest economy, of $19.8 billion in 2004.

For OPEC, New Talks On Output (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

VIENNA, March 6 — Strange as it may seem, some OPEC oil ministers are feeling sorry for themselves.

For the last three months, a few of OPEC's top representatives have argued that their oil-producing cartel, which pumps nearly 4 of every 10 barrels of oil produced around the world, needs to trim output to avert a potential oil glut and a — highly hypothetical — price collapse.

The current argument for cutting output first came up when the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries met in December in Kuwait. It resurfaced at a meeting in Vienna the following month and it is likely to top the agenda this week when the group meets here again to consider its production levels.

It almost certainly will not happen. For one thing, Saudi Arabia, by far the most powerful OPEC producer, is opposed. For another, such a decision would probably boomerang.

That is because oil prices, rather than falling as some OPEC ministers had feared, remain so high that any action to limit supply while oil still costs more than $60 a barrel would inevitably lead to a political reaction in oil-consuming countries.

"Many oil ministers are itching for a cut," said Frédéric Lasserre, the head of commodity research at Société Générale in Paris. "But politically a decision to cut supplies would be impossible to explain. They would just look greedy."

So far, oil producers have the best of all worlds: high prices and high demand. After Hurricane Katrina, OPEC waived its traditional country-by-country quota system and said it would keep its oil taps fully open. That policy is still in effect.

But because demand for some oil products typically slows in the second quarter, allowing refiners to build up stocks of gasoline, some of OPEC's harder-line ministers have argued that the group should pare its output to avoid a sharp price drop.

Venezuela's oil minister, Rafael Ramírez, said on Thursday that he would propose a production cut of 500,000 to a million barrels a day. "It's our proposal and we're going to discuss it," he told reporters in Caracas.

In January, a similar proposal was briefly floated by Iran, another of the cartel's price hawks.

The group's current president, Edmund Daukoru of Nigeria, who was in Washington last week to meet with Bush administration officials, also expressed some concerns about the level of commercial inventory held in the United States. Too much oil in stock, he implied, could push prices down.

"Currently we believe there is an overhang," Mr. Daukoru said, according to Bloomberg News. "When there's a huge buildup of stocks, it can swing prices drastically. You can get even a drop of up to $4 on a single day."

That view strikes many oil traders as at odds with market reality. If anything, they say, the greater risk is that prices will rise even further because of domestic turmoil in Mr. Daukoru's backyard and elsewhere.

Rebels seeking a greater share of Nigeria's oil wealth have attacked oil pipelines and production platforms, kidnapped foreign workers and threatened to disrupt exports.

Their campaign has forced Nigeria to cut production by nearly 20 percent, or about 450,000 barrels a day. The country is the biggest oil producer in Africa and the fifth-largest exporter to the United States.

Elsewhere, a drop in Iraq's production, the diplomatic dance surrounding Iran's nuclear program and the failed attacks against the world's largest oil-processing operation in Saudi Arabia have also stoked fears of supply disruptions. Some analysts have argued that the supply cuts from Nigeria and other areas amounted to a de facto cut by OPEC.

All of this has kept oil traders on edge and oil prices between $60 and $70 a barrel. On the New York Mercantile Exchange, crude oil futures closed at $62.41 a barrel Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0016485

Given the volatile market and the lack of much spare capacity, not every producer sees the need for a production cut from OPEC anytime soon. Last month, Saudi Arabia's oil minister, Ali al-Naimi, said OPEC was unlikely to cut production for the rest of the year.

"The Saudis understand the current vulnerability in the market," said Lawrence J. Goldstein, the president of the New York-based Petroleum Industry Research Foundation. "They want to make sure the market is well supplied."

One thing producers can count on is strong demand, particularly from China. This year, oil demand is forecast to grow by 2.2 percent, to 85 million barrels a day, according to the International Energy Agency. Last year, oil consumption rose 1.1 percent and in 2004, it jumped a staggering 3.8 percent, more than twice the last decade's average pace.

Given that longer-term pressure, industry experts see little reason for OPEC to worry about today's inventory levels, which stood on Feb. 24 at 328.3 million barrels, up from 300.9 million barrels a year earlier.

"The market is tenuously balanced because inventories aren't high enough to cover tomorrow's surprises," Mr. Goldstein said. "OPEC has used product seasonality as an excuse but it's not a valid argument."

Much of OPEC's anxiety has less to do with the level of consumer-held oil stocks held than by the price the group will seek to defend. The price of the so-called OPEC basket, a composite of the types of oil sold by OPEC members, was $56 a barrel last week. Most analysts argue that oil ministers will consider action if the OPEC basket price falls to $50.

While little change is actually expected, the talk does serve OPEC's interests.

"Before each meeting, ministers come out and say all sorts of things and create confusion in the market," said Yasser Elguindi, a senior managing director at Medley Global Advisers, a consulting firm for hedge funds. "We call it the 'OPEC kabuki.' "

Saudi Minister Doesn't Want Cut To OPEC Output (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal News Roundup

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Saudi Arabia's oil minister was reported as saying the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries shouldn't trim oil output at this week's meeting. In an interview with pan-Arab daily newspaper Al Hayat, published Monday, Ali Naimi also said fears stemming from threats to oil supplies were the main factor behind prices of more than $60 a barrel.

Mr. Naimi said it wasn't likely an extraordinary OPEC conference would convene before June 11, when the 11-member producer group meets in Venezuela.

"OPEC should not take any decision to decrease production because any such decision would be the main reason for price hikes," Mr. Naimi said. He said oil supply was "stable" while the main reason for high prices were fears of supply disruptions caused by political instability in Nigeria, Venezuela, Iran, Iraq and a failed suicide attempt in Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Naimi said OPEC member states should focus on trying to offset shortages caused by the decrease in supply of 450,000 barrels a day in Nigeria, and 500,000 b/d from the effects of hurricane Katrina in the U.S.

Mr. Naimi was reported as saying state-owned Saudi Arabian Oil Co., or Aramco, and Total SA of France were in advanced talks to build an oil refinery in the Persian Gulf city of Al Jubail. London-based Al Hayat said the refinery, a joint venture between Aramco and Total, would have a production capacity of 400,000 barrels a day and cost $4 billion to $5 billion to build.

Sunday, Mr. Naimi met with French Minister of Economy, Finance and Industry Thierry Breton and Total Chief Executive Thierry Desmarest, who were visiting the country as part of a delegation accompanying French President Jacques Chirac. In Riyadh, Mr. Desmarest said "discussions have been going on for several months." There were a number of options on economic and technical issues being considered, he said.

China Exercises Restraint With Taiwan (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, March 7, 2006

HONG KONG — Not so long ago, China would have been lobbing missiles across the Taiwan Strait, mobilizing troops and issuing bloodcurdling threats in response to any Taiwanese move toward independence.

DOJ_NMG_0016486

Times have changed: The mainland calculates that restraint, not retaliation, is the best response to Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian's provocative decision to scrap a neglected but symbolically important council dedicated to the reunification of China and Taiwan.

"They prefer to keep a low profile," says Andrew Yang, executive director of the Chinese Council of Advanced Policy Studies, a think tank in the Taiwanese capital Taipei.

Symbols are everything when it comes to the prickly relationship between China and Taiwan, an island just off the Chinese mainland. Chen took a sledgehammer to one symbol Feb. 27 when he announced he was shutting down the Taiwanese government's National Unification Council. The 16-year-old council hadn't met since Chen took office in 2000, but it represented Taiwan's willingness to consider eventual reunification with the mainland.

Chen's Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) advocates independence, but he promised not to abolish the council in his inaugural address in 2000.

China and Taiwan have been separate since 1949 when the communists seized power on the mainland and Chiang Kai-shek's vanquished Nationalists fled across the Taiwan Strait to set up a rival government. Mainland China has never relinquished its claim to the island of 23 million, threatening to resort to force if necessary to reunite.

More than 87% of Taiwanese responding to a National Chengchi University poll in November want to maintain the status quo, at least for now: real but undeclared independence. Taiwanese don't want to provoke China to war by declaring independence outright.

In 1996, the Chinese fired missiles across the Taiwan Strait in an attempt to intimidate Taiwanese voters into rejecting pro-independence presidential candidate Lee Teng-hui. In response, the United States sent warships to the waters off Taiwan. Four years later, the Chinese threatened to attack Taiwan if voters picked Chen.

After Chen's move last week, China ratcheted up the rhetoric. On Monday, the official Xinhua News Agency quoted Guo Boxiong, vice chairman of the Central Military Commission, as saying the closing of the council was a "grave provocation" that would undermine peace. "We … will never allow 'Taiwan independence' secessionist forces to make Taiwan secede from China," he said. Despite the warning, a more-serious Chinese response is not likely. Reasons:

•Threats haven't worked. The bombast of 1996 and 2000 backfired. Both times, Taiwanese voters defied China, electing first Lee and then Chen. "Beijing learned a serious lesson: that Chinese coercive policies are counterproductive in Taiwan," Chen-yuan Tung, a political analyst at National Chengchi University, wrote last year in the academic journal Asian Survey. China has tried to butter up the Taiwanese public instead. Beijing has encouraged Taiwanese businesses to invest and sell their products on the mainland, welcomed visits by opposition Taiwanese politicians and offered to send pandas to the Taipei Zoo.

•Chinese officials prefer to stand back and let Chen's behavior drive a wedge between Taiwan and its No. 1 ally, the United States. Washington is required by law to help Taiwan defend itself, but the United States opposes Taiwanese independence and wants to prevent a cross-strait military conflict.

"They've decided it's more efficient for Washington to tell Taiwan what to do and what not to do," says Philip Yang, a political scientist at National Taiwan University. It doesn't always work perfectly: The United States warned Chen against shuttering the reunification council. Taipei decided to cease activity at the council but did not abolish it when Chen took office.

•China has other priorities. Conflict probably would jeopardize economic growth, spoil President Hu Jintao's summit in April in Washington and sabotage the 2008 Olympics in Beijing.

Despite its conciliatory approach to the Taiwanese public, China passed an anti-secession law last year. That created a legal basis for attacking if the island declares independence. The mainland still has more than 700 missiles pointed at Taiwan.

Chen is using political brinkmanship with China to rejuvenate his party's pro-independence base after big losses in local elections in December, says National Taiwan University's Philip Yang. "Chen wants to return to center stage in Taiwanese politics," he says.

Last week, Chen told The Daily Yomiuri, a Tokyo newspaper, that he wanted to draft a Taiwanese constitution, a move China probably would view as a precursor to a declaration of independence.

"The termination of the reunification council is a signal that Taiwan will take a more antagonistic approach toward China," Tung says. "There will be trouble among the three parties" — China, Taiwan and the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0016487

WTO Finds Mexico Violated Trade Rules In Soft-Drink Case (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

GENEVA -- The World Trade Organization ruled that Mexico violated global trade rules in a soft-drink dispute with the U.S.

A WTO panel rejected a Mexican appeal, supporting U.S. claims that Mexico was in breach of international law in imposing a 20% tax on drinks that are sweetened with anything other than cane sugar grown in Mexico.

Mexico was a top market for high-fructose corn syrup from the U.S. before the tax was imposed in 2002. The tax made it too expensive to use the corn sweetener in soft drinks, and today, the U.S. share of the market is about 6% of pretax levels, according to the U.S. trade representative's office.

The dispute over sugar and corn sweetener has cost U.S. corn refiners $944 million annually, according to the Washington-based Corn Refiners Association.

Separately, officials signed an agreement that will boost shipments of Mexican cement into the U.S., resolving a 16-year trade fight.

The agreement, which will take effect on April 3, will allow imports of Mexican cement to rise to three million tons annually until April 2009, at which point Mexico will be allowed unlimited shipments. U.S. contractors estimate the U.S. imported 2.2 million tons of Mexican cement last year. Penalty tariffs on the cement will drop from $26 a ton to $3 a ton and are scheduled to end completely in April 2009.

'Color' Revolutions Wane (CSM)

By Fred Weir

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

MOSCOW - Two key former Soviet states - Belarus and Ukraine - head into elections this month amid dramatic accusations of planned coups, state coercion, and vote-fixing.

But Moscow isn't worried.

Instead, there is a sense of calm and fresh confidence here that contrasts sharply with the Kremlin's panicky reactions to the surge of "colored revolts" that swept through the region in recent years. That revolutionary wave - which began with Georgia's 2003 Rose Revolution and continued with Ukraine's Orange Revolution - seemed unstoppable just a year ago, when Krygyz President Askar Akayev was overthrown.

But the inability of new leaders to fulfill revolutionary pledges, together with the failure of popular pressure to effect change in other Soviet satellite states, has opened the way for Moscow to reassert its influence in the region.

"Those upsurges were the response of people to bad governance and worsening conditions, and the new leaders that came in have shown themselves unable to offer improvements," says Gennady Chuffrin, deputy director of the official Institute of World Economy and International Relations in Moscow. "Ukraine could even see a reversal of what happened a year ago. Obviously the Kremlin would like to see a weakening of [Ukrainian President Viktor] Yushchenko, and I think that's what's going to happen."

Ukraine's economic decline and disillusionment have propelled the pro-Moscow opposition party into first place in opinion surveys for parliamentary elections on March 26. In an ironic twist, the opposition leader Mr. Yanukovych, who was forced out of power after being accused of rigging Ukraine's 2004 presidential election in his favor, claims the authorities are preparing to steal the polls. "The orange team can only remain in power through massive falsifications, and this is what they are doing," he said last week.

According to a survey conducted last week by the Institute of Social and Political Psychology in Kiev, Ukraine, Yanukovych's Party of Regions leads with 27 percent support, followed by former prime minister Yulia Tymoshenko's Bloc with 19 percent and Mr. Yushchenko's Our Ukraine movement with 17 percent.

If the elections bring in a deeply split parliament, it could lead to an extended political crisis that would play into Moscow's hands. A January gas blockade by Russia appears to have deepened Ukraine's economic slump while strengthening the hand of the pro-Moscow Yanukovych.

DOJ_NMG_0016488

"We can make Ukraine strong and rich, because democracy is impossible in a poor country," Yanukovych told his campaign workers last week. "Unlike the present leadership, we will not build our strategy to the detriment of relations with Russia."

In Belarus, good relations with Russia are not an issue. The Kremlin will try to put the best face on President Alexander Lukashenko's almost certain third-term victory in polls slated for March 19. But even Russian experts who support the Belarussian leader refrain from calling the election process democratic.

Two candidates running against Lukashenko, Alexander Kozulin and Alexander Milinkevich, have been all but barred from media and their rallies have been broken up by force. Last Thursday, Mr. Kozulin was arrested and allegedly beaten by police after he attempted to stage an impromptu press conference at the Palace of the Republic, Belarus' parliament, in Minsk. "I wanted to tell the truth about the dictatorship that we live in," Kozulin told journalists.

Lukashenko, a former collective farm chairman who has maintained a strict, state-controlled economy, can point to healthy growth rates, low unemployment and stable, if meager, living standards.

"Lukashenko, for all his lack of democracy, has the support of his people and is pursuing sensible policies," says Mikhail Delyagin, director of the independent Globalization Institute in Moscow. "He may be the devil incarnate to the West, but Belarussians regard him as their legitimate leader."

But at least a few Belarussians apparently have other ideas. Last week, the chief of Belarus's KGB security service accused an allegedly foreign-funded opposition group of planning to stage an election-day coup after publishing faked voting results.

Opposition leaders deny the allegations. Mr. Milinkevich has called for peaceful protests if vote-rigging occurs. But all election-day demonstrations were banned by government decree last week. "These elections are being held under conditions of total falsification and persecution of the opposition," Milinkevich told journalists Friday.

The turmoil prompted US Deputy Secretary of State David Kramer to warn Belarussian leaders that "there will be consequences" for incidents like Kozulin's arrest. "We are paying very close attention to those who are involved in activities that promote either fraudulent elections or promote violence," he said.

Many Russian experts worry that the perceived rivalry between Moscow and Washington for influence in the post-Soviet arena, as played out through these events, is accelerating a chill between the two countries. A US Council on Foreign Relations report released over the weekend noted a "downward trajectory" in US-Russian ties, in part due to Moscow's alleged meddling in the affairs of its neighbors, through energy squeezes and political pressure. "Russia's relations with other post-Soviet states have become a source of significantly heightened US-Russian friction," the report said.

That view is mirrored in Moscow. "Unfortunately, the [wave of revolutions] was perceived in Russia as a kind of conspiracy against Russian interests," mainly promoted by the US, says Irina Zvigelskaya, an analyst with the independent Center for Strategic and International Studies in Moscow. She says the problem results from poor communication over each other's policies in the region. "The US has been obsessed with the notion of democracy, while we have been obsessed with the notion of stability," she says. "It's a deeply fraught misunderstanding"

Russian Panel Backs Pipeline Near Baikal (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

MOSCOW, March 6 — A Russian regulatory panel reviewing plans to build an oil pipeline that would pass along the shoreline of Lake Baikal, the world's most voluminous fresh-water lake, announced Monday that it had approved the proposal over objections from scientists and environmental groups.

The announcement, by the Federal Environmental, Technological and Nuclear Oversight Service, will allow Transneft, the state-owned pipeline monopoly, to proceed with plans to build a pipeline to ship Siberian oil eastward to Asian markets.

The project, roughly 2,500 miles long and known as the East Siberia-Pacific Ocean pipeline, would pass within 900 yards of Lake Baikal's northern shore.

Lake Baikal is a chasm more than a mile deep formed tens of millions of years ago by a crack in the earth's crust.

DOJ_NMG_0016489

Nearly 400 miles long and 30 miles wide, it holds more than 20 percent of the world's unfrozen fresh water, and is widely regarded as one of Russia's unique natural gems. Much of its plant and animal life lives nowhere else, and the United Nations has placed the lake on the World Heritage list, a designation it shares with the Serengeti and the Great Barrier Reef.

Scientists have warned that because the region remains seismically active and the lake is still expanding, earthquakes could sever any pipeline, causing its contents to flow into the lake. They also say that because Transneft's planned route will require crossing many of the lake's tributaries, the project will cause erosion and send dirt and pollution into the lake's nearly pristine water.

"It looks very bleak for the environment," said Michiel Hotte of the Zoological Society of London, who has campaigned against the pipeline plan.

The decision announced Monday followed months of maneuvering.

Russia's prime minister, Mikhail Y. Fradkov, signed a resolution late in 2004 detailing the plan, under which Russia, the world's second largest oil exporter, would build the pipeline and diversify its oil sales. President Vladimir V. Putin has signaled his approval.

Opponents of the plan said such powerful support doomed a chance for a genuine environmental review.

They noted that even though a commission of Russian experts working for the oversight service rejected Transneft's planned route on environmental grounds, the ruling was not accepted. Instead, a new commission, with additional members, was ordered to review the project again.

Greenpeace Russia, which has also campaigned against the plan, said that the new commission was under intense pressure, and that its decision was all but a foregone conclusion. Signs of the pressure appeared evident last month, when Transneft's leadership threatened to sue the oversight body and seek financial damages against experts who blocked or delayed the pipe's construction.

Greenpeace Russia said it planned to file a lawsuit against the decision. It was not hopeful about its prospects. "Suing a state-owned business with close ties to the Kremlin is quite a tricky thing," said Roman Vazhenkov, the campaign coordinator. "But we have to try."

During months of meetings and quarrels, environmentalists had proposed another path for the pipeline that would have swung north and east away from the lake and its watershed before joining another section of the route.

The idea never gained traction with Transneft, whose route follows the course of existing railway lines, making development less expensive. "This is a classic conflict between the cost and the environment," Mr. Hotte said. "It is just a matter of convenience."

A spokesman for Transneft declined Monday to comment about the decision. Company officials have previously played down the environmental concerns, saying the pipeline will be constructed to high standards and noting that trains carrying oil and petroleum products already pass by the lake on the railway each day.

In an interview last month with the state-owned newspaper Rossiskaya Gazeta, Simon Vainshtok, Transneft's president, also suggested that Greenpeace was a tool used by unidentified international interests to prevent Russia from opening Asian and Pacific oil markets.

Transneft has said it hopes to have the pipeline completed within three years at a cost of $11.5 billion. Environmentalists said that even without delays from lawsuits, that schedule was optimistic.

Russia Approves Divisive Pipeline Plan (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Critics Cite Threat to Lake Baikal, Political Pressure on Panel

MOSCOW, March 6 -- A controversial plan to build a major oil pipeline passing within half a mile of Siberia's Lake Baikal, the world's largest freshwater lake, was approved by a Russian government regulatory agency Monday.

The decision followed a review process that environmentalists and some Russian experts involved in assessing the route say was marked by manipulation of an expert panel and political pressure on dissenting scientists.

DOJ_NMG_0016490

"Even if billions of dollars are at stake, the Russian government cannot put Lake Baikal at risk," Andrei Poyarkov, a member of the expert panel and a biologist at the Institute of Ecology and Evolution in the Russian Academy of Sciences, said at a news conference in Moscow. "They do not have the right."

The head of Rostekhnadzor, the Federal Service for Environmental, Technological and Nuclear Oversight, signed a decree Monday accepting the vote of an expert commission last week to give the project the green light, according to the Russian news agency Interfax.

The expert panel's vote overturned one last month by the same group to reject the route on grounds that a pipeline rupture in the earthquake-prone area could send thousands of tons of crude oil into the lake, a Russian natural treasure. UNESCO designated the lake a World Heritage Site 10 years ago.

Transneft, the state-controlled pipeline operator, is set to build the 2,500-mile pipeline, which would run from Taishet in eastern Siberia to the Pacific coast. With an annual capacity of 80 million tons of crude, it would allow Russia to increase its oil exports to China, Japan and other Asia-Pacific economies.

The $11.5 billion project is a strategic goal of President Vladimir Putin's government, which wants to diversify the country's export network and build Russia into an energy superpower.

Officials at Transneft argue that rerouting the pipeline would add hundreds of millions of dollars to the project's costs and cause major delays in starting construction. They also insist that the project will not endanger the lake.

"Transneft will take all the requisite precautions for Baikal to stay safe," said Simon Vainshtok, president of the company, in an interview last month with the government newspaper Rossiyskaya Gazeta. "For instance, the average thickness of the pipe we use across Russia is 9 millimeters, whereas in the vicinity of Baikal it is 27 millimeters." Those measurements are equivalent to about 0.35 inches and 1.1 inches.

The project has a history of rejection, then acceptance by official bodies. Last September, the Natural Resources Ministry turned down the proposal for the route near Lake Baikal but reversed itself two months later under what Russian news reports have called pressure from the Kremlin.

In a vote last month, 46 of 52 members of an expert panel that Rostekhnadzor had appointed to study the project rejected the route.

After that vote, Rostekhnadzor added 34 experts to the group, all of whom favored the proposed route, according to Gennady Chegasov, a dissenting member of the panel. Chegasov said group members who voted to reject the pipeline came under strong pressure. People were told, "If you vote against construction, it will be the end of your scientific career," he said.

Supporters of the plan still had trouble mustering the two-thirds majority necessary to approve construction, Chegasov said. In the end, 58 members of the expanded commission voted for the project, with 27 against.

"I remember the Communist Party and the meetings of the party were not like this," said Stanislav Tronin, another member of the panel and a chemist at the Institute for Emergency Situations.

Last week, Putin was presented with a petition signed by 14,000 Russians asking him to take measures to change the route.

A spokesman for Rostekhnadzor could not be reached Monday. In the past week, the agency has declined to comment on allegations that it manipulated the process.

Roman Vazhenkov, the Baikal Campaign coordinator for Greenpeace, said opponents would appeal to the Russian courts and seek to influence international lenders not to finance the pipeline. He said his organization had already written to major banks in the United States, Europe and Japan.

Greenpeace and other opponents of the project said they recognized the need for a pipeline and objected only to the route.

Vainshtok, Transneft's president, told Rossiyskaya Gazeta that Greenpeace and other environmental groups were being manipulated by "puppet masters" outside Russia who do not want China to grow in strength by importing more Russian oil.

Serb Who Aided Hague Tribunal Called A Suicide (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016491

PARIS, March 6 — Milan Babic, a wartime Serbian leader who was closely cooperating with prosecutors, committed suicide in a prison cell of the war crimes tribunal in The Hague, the court said Monday.

Mr. Babic, 50, was found dead in his cell on Sunday evening, the court said in a statement. A senior court official said he had hanged himself, but the court spokeswoman would not confirm that. The official requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the subject.

Mr. Babic's death deprives the prosecution of one of its valuable insider witnesses, a onetime close ally of the former Serbian president, Slobodan Milosevic. He was one of the leaders of an ethnic Serbs' rebellion in Croatia in 1991, and was in close contact with the top of the Serb government in Belgrade.

But he later said he had been deceived by Belgrade and turned himself in and pleaded guilty to crimes against humanity. Since then, he has testified against three senior fellow Serbian politicians, including Mr. Milosevic, and he was to give evidence in three more trials.

"He was a star witness for the prosecution, a key insider, no question," said Edgar Chen, a lawyer who monitors trials at the tribunal for the Coalition for International Justice.

One crucial question, Mr. Chen said, was whether Mr. Babic's past testimony would remain part of the record. Court officials said it was up to the judges in each trial to decide.

Among Serbs, Mr. Babic was widely seen as a turncoat, and tribunal officials had been so concerned for his safety that they would not disclose where he was serving his 13-year sentence.

He was brought back to the Netherlands in February to testify against another Croatian Serb and former comrade, Milan Martic. His testimony was to finish Monday.

It was the second suicide at the prison. Another Croatian Serb, Slavko Dokmanovic, hanged himself with his tie in 1998.

In recent weeks, Mr. Babic described how the rebellion of Croatian Serbs had been run from Serbia and led by Mr. Milosevic.

At various times, Mr. Babic and Mr. Milosevic shouted insults at each other across the courtroom. At one point, Mr. Babic told his former ally: "You dragged the Serbian people into war. You brought shame upon the Serbian people. You brought misfortune on the Croatian people, on the Muslim people."

Where Killers Roam, The Poison Spreads (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

ALONG THE CHAD-SUDAN BORDER

For more than two years, the world has pretty much ignored the genocide unfolding in the Darfur region of Sudan, just as it turned away from the slaughter of Armenians, Jews, Cambodians and Rwandans in earlier decades.

And now, apparently encouraged by the world's acquiescence, Sudan is sending its proxy forces to invade neighboring Chad and kill and rape members of the same African tribes that have already been ethnically cleansed in Darfur itself.

I've spent the last three days along the Chad-Sudan border, where this brutal war is unfolding. But "war" doesn't feel like the right term, for that implies combat between armies.

What is happening here is more like what happens in a stockyard. Militias backed by Sudan race on camels and pickup trucks into Chadian villages and use machine guns to mow down farming families, whose only offense is that they belong to the wrong tribes and have black skin.

I found it eerie to drive on the dirt track along the border because countless villages have been torched or abandoned. Many tens of thousands of peasants have fled their villages, and you can drive for mile after mile and see no sign of life — except for the smoke of the villages or fields being burned by the Sudan-armed janjaweed militia.

In some places the janjaweed, made up of nomadic Arab tribes that persecute several black African tribes, have turned villages into grazing lands for the livestock they have stolen. At one point, my vehicle got stuck in the sand, and a group of janjaweed children materialized and helped push me out. The children were watching a huge herd of cattle with many different brands. Their fathers were presumably off killing people.

DOJ_NMG_0016492

This is my sixth trip to the Darfur region, and I've often seen burned villages within Darfur itself, but now the cancer has spread to Chad.

One young man, Haroun Ismael, returned with me — very nervously — to the edge of his village of Karmadodo, between the towns of Adré and Adé. Eleven days earlier, Sudanese military aircraft and a force of several hundred janjaweed had suddenly attacked the village. Mr. Haroun and his wife had run for their lives, with his wife carrying their 3-month-old baby, Ahmed.

The janjaweed raiders overtook Mr. Haroun's wife and beat her so badly that she is still unconscious. They also grabbed Ahmed from her arms.

"They looked at the baby," Mr. Haroun added, "and since he was a boy, they shot him."

Sudan is also arming and equipping a proxy army of Chadian rebels under a commander named Muhammad Nour. The rebels were repulsed when they tried to invade Chad in late December, and now they are regrouping for another attempt.

Sudan's aim seems to be to overthrow Chad's president and install a pawn in his place, in part because this would allow Sudan's Army to attack rebels in Darfur from both directions.

Regardless of whether the rebels succeed in overthrowing Chad's government, they could ignite a new civil war in Chad. Much will depend on whether the French will use their military base in Chad to fight any Sudanese-sponsored invasion; the French aren't saying what they'll do.

Chad's army is too small to defend its border, so it tries to defend potential invasion routes. That leaves villages in other areas defenseless.

"See that smoke over there?" asked Ali Muhammad in the market town of Borota. "The janjaweed are burning our fields today."

"Most people here have fled," he added, "but I have old family members to look after, so I can't leave."

These areas are too insecure for the United Nations and most international aid workers, who are already doing a heroic and dangerous job in Darfur and Chad. So Mr. Ali and others left behind get no food aid and go hungry.

In the last few weeks, President Bush has shown an increased willingness to address the slaughter in Darfur. He should now encourage the French to use their forces to defend Chad from proxy invasions, make a presidential speech to spotlight the issue, attend a donor conference for Darfur, encourage the use of a NATO bridging force until U.N. peacekeepers can arrive, enforce a no-fly zone and open a new initiative for peace talks among the sheiks of Darfur.

The present Western policy of playing down genocide and hoping it will peter out has proved to be bankrupt practically as well as morally. Granted, there are no neat solutions in Darfur. But ignoring brutality has only magnified it, and it's just shameful to pretend not to notice the terrified villagers here, huddling with their children each night and wondering when they are going to be massacred.

U.S. Pushes Foolish Policy Of 'Baseball, Sí, Academics, No' (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, March 7, 2006

HAVANA — How insane is this?

Digna Castañeda, a frail and aging professor of Caribbean history and philosophy at the University of Havana, cannot go to Puerto Rico next week to attend the International Congress of the Latin American Studies Association.

She is one of 59 Cuban academics who have been denied visas to enter the U.S. commonwealth to take part in LASA's meeting because the Bush administration says it would be "detrimental to the interests of the United States" to permit them to do so.

On Wednesday, however, Cuba's national baseball team will take the field in San Juan's Hiram Bithorn Stadium to play its first game in the World Baseball Classic, a competition among 16 nations. While a group of young, brawny, bat-wielding Cuban men can get visas (admittedly after some strong protests of the U.S. government's initial refusal), a diminutive Havana college professor cannot.

This "baseball si, academics no" policy severely limits the kind of personal contacts and intellectual exchanges between Cubans and Americans that could be the taproot of improved diplomatic relations. One of the workshops scheduled to be held at this year's LASA meeting is titled, "The Never-Ending Cold War: The United States, Cuba, and LASA's Battle for Academic Freedom."

DOJ_NMG_0016493

Visas denied

The academics were denied visas pursuant to a 1985 Cold War-era presidential proclamation that "suspends entry into the U.S. of officers and employees of the Cuban government and Communist Party," says the State Department's Justin Higgins. "Cuban academic institutions are state-run, and the Cuban government tightly controls the activities of its academic researchers."

But this rule wasn't always broadly applied. In 2000, '01 and '03, Cuban academics were allowed to attend LASA meetings. Then in October '04 — three months after the Bush administration stepped up its effort to topple the Castro government — more than 60 Cuban scholars were refused visas to attend LASA's meeting in Las Vegas.

Castañeda, who has visited 22 U.S. universities during her 42-year career, is miffed by the denial of her visa. But I am not surprised. The Bush administration has been unwavering in its refusal to let Cuban academics participate in the LASA conference because it's easier to demonize the Castro regime when people-to-people contact is cut off.

Castro the real target

Shielding Americans from some of Cuba's best and brightest people makes it easier for neo-conservatives to portray this island nation as a place that is driven by the thinking of just one man: Fidel Castro.

"Castro has stated publicly that the universities (in Cuba) are available only to those who share his revolutionary beliefs," Higgins says in explaining why the Cuban academics were denied visas.

Apparently, the Bush administration doesn't want Americans to think that saving the lives of impoverished children might be one of Castro's "revolutionary beliefs." Last year, the State Department refused to permit scientist Vicente Verez-Bencomo into the country. He had been invited by California's Tech Museum of Innovation, which wanted to honor him for leading a team of researchers that developed a low-cost synthetic vaccine to keep children from getting meningitis and pneumonia. Each year, these diseases take the lives of up to 700,000 children, many living in countries where regular mass immunizations are too costly. The vaccine Verez-Bencomo helped develop might save millions of lives, Science magazine said.

Cuba is no utopia. It's a communist state struggling to find the right mix of social programs to safeguard its people and joint ventures with foreign capitalists to fuel its sputtering economy.

Cuba is also a nation that is besieged by policies of the Bush administration that are arbitrary, capricious and simpleminded.

DOJ_NMG_0016494

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, MARCH 7, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Gonzales May Be Recalled On Eavesdropping (AP) 4
GOP Lawmakers Work To Limit Probe Of Domestic Spying Program (KRT) 4
Prosecutor Urges Death For Concealing Sept. 11 Plot (NYT) 5
Moussaoui's Lies Led To 9/11, Jury Told (WP) 7
Prosecutor: Moussaoui Did His Part For 9/11 (AP-Y2) 8
Moussaoui Chose Not To Stop 9/11, Jury Told (USAT)..... 9
Sept. 11 Families Watch Moussaoui Trial (AP-Y2) 10
Let Moussaoui Live (USAT) 11
AP Sues For Access To Lindh's Petitions To Cut His Prison Sentence (AP)..... 12
Tending To Muslim Hearts And Islam's Future (NYT)..... 12

Patriot Act:

A Tame End To Patriot Act Debate (WP) 16
Patriot Act Includes Crackdown On Meth Use (AP) 17

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says U.S. Ports Takeover Would Tighten Grip On Security (WSJ)..... 18
April Vote Expected On Port Security (WT)..... 19
Lieberman Calls For More US Port Security Funds (REU-Y2).... 20
Hunter Readies Ports Bill (HILL)..... 21
British Court Allows Dubai Deal To Proceed (AP-Y2) 21
U.S. Firm Loses Appeal Of P& O Sale (WP)..... 22
Mideast Investment Up In U.S. (WP)..... 22
Report Questions Homeland Security Plans (AP) 24
Washington Wire (WSJ)..... 25
Guards Fault Homeland Security Protection (WP) 26
Driver At UNC Cites Vengeance For Muslims (WP/AP)..... 27
UNC Grad Driven To Kill (WT)..... 28
White House Defends Levee Reconstruction (AP-Y2)..... 28
Clarification (WP) 29
FCC, Others Face Katrina Phone Problems (AP-Y2) 29
Members Struck By Gulf Devastation (RC) 30

War News:

U.S. Envoy Offers Bleak View Of Situation In Iraq (LAT)..... 30
U.S. Is Seeking Better Balance In Iraqi Police (NYT)..... 31
Majority In U.S. Fears Iraq Civil War (WP) 33
Iraqi President Loses Try For Parliament (AP)..... 35
Iraqi Leadership Crisis Grows (CSM) 36
Leaders Consider Al-Jaafari Future (WT)..... 37
18 Killed As Iraqi Parliament Prepares To Meet (LAT)..... 38
Senior Iraqi General Killed In Ambush (WP) 39
11 Including An Iraqi General Are Killed In Baghdad Attacks; Army Says A G.I. Died Sunday (NYT)..... 40
Two Car Bombs Explode In Iraqi City (WP/AP)..... 41
Iraqi Tribes Strike Back At Insurgents (WP) 41
Iraq's Talabani Summons Parliament (REU-Y2) 42
Germans Set To Investigate Help To U.S. In Iraq Invasion (NYT)43
Opposition Parties Press For Iraq Probe (WT)..... 44
Iraq Reconstruction Plan Draws Criticism Following Delays (USAT)..... 44
Amnesty Report On 14,000 Finds Prisoner Abuse Continues In Iraq (NYT) 45
Lurking In Saddam's Old Tent? (WT) 46
Pro-Taliban Rebel Holdouts Give Pakistanis A Fierce Fight (WP/REU) 47
2 Leaders Trade Barbs Over Fight Against Taliban (NYT)..... 48
NATO Commander Downplays Afghan Insurgency Threat (REU-Y2) 48
NATO Commander: Drug Trade Is The Greatest Threat To Afghanistan (KRT) 49
NATO Shrugs Off Afghan Violence (WT) 50
Afghan Threat Played Down (WP)..... 50
US Envoy Vows Commitment To Calm Afghan Fears (FT)..... 51
Fewer Troops Desert Since 9/11 (USAT)..... 52
Decades Later, Marines Hunt Vietnam-era Deserters (USAT) ... 52

Corporate Scandals:

Lawyer Defends Skilling's Enron Comment As Sarcasm (REU). 53
Star Witness Fastow To Take Stage Today (USAT)..... 54
Fastow Looms Large At Enron Trial (WP)..... 54
Lawyer For Scrushy Sees Skilling, Lay As 'doomed' (USAT) 56
DaimlerChrysler Suspends Employees In Bribery Inquiry (NYT) 57
DaimlerChrysler Finds Improper Payments (AP) 58
$1.5 Trillion Of Debt (WSJ) 58

Criminal Law:

Prosecutors Slam Ryan, Call Him Shameless (CHIT)..... 59
Ill. Ex-governor's Trial Nearing Its End (AP) 61
Campbell, Eager To Talk, Won't Testify (AJC) 61
Campbell Will Not Testify (WXIA-TV) 62
Metro Briefing (NYT) 63

Labor Leader Brian McLaughlin Is Target Of Probe Into Bid-Rigging On Contracts. (NYDN) ... 64
TOUGH JOB FOR LABOR (NYPOST) ... 64
Brothel Owner In Nevada Faces Federal Corruption Charge (AP) ... 65
FBI Probes Use Of Funds By Ex-FEC Aide (RC) ... 66
Amid AIPAC's Big Show, Straight Talk With A Noticeable Silence (WP) ... 66
Junior Gotti Was 'Sick Of This Life,' Radio Show Host Kuby Says (NSDY/AP) ... 67
Sliwa's Radio Co-Host Testifies For Gotti (WCBS-TV) ... 67
KUBY'S TESTIMONY RADIO-ACTIVE (NYPOST) ... 68
Sliwa Says Radio Partner 'Judas' (NYDN) ... 69
Peter Outs Dead Dad On Stand (NYDN) ... 69
Trial Begins Of NY Cops Charged As Mafia Hit Men (REU) ... 70
BQE Jam Holds Up Cop Trial (NSDY) ... 71
'MAFIA' COP IN A JAM (NYPOST) ... 71
'Mafia Cop' Angers Judge, But Dodges Jail With Quick Excuse (NYDN) ... 72
Take 1 Trial. Add The Mob. Yield: 4-5 Books And A Film. (NYT) 72
Bulger Brother To Lose Pension For Lying (LAT/AP) ... 73
Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing (WP/AP) ... 73
Shooter Now Denies Killing Ga. Socialite (WP) ... 74
Alleged Hitman In Sullivan Trial Blames Another Admits To Being Paid $25,000 To Kill Buckhead Woman (AJC) ... 75
Accused Hit Man And Star Witness Denies Shooting Millionaire's Wife (COURTTV) ... 76
Hit Man: James Sullivan Hired Me (WXIA-TV) ... 77
Alleged Hitman's Ex Cross-examined At Sullivan Trial (PALMBEACHP) ... 77
Official Indicted For Fraud, Bribery (ARMYTIME) ... 78
US Snubs Britain Over Sex Criminals (TIMES) ... 78
Prosecutors Target White Supremacist Gang (FINDLAW/AP) ... 79
Lemon Grove Medical Clinic Shut Down In Alleged Fraud Conspiracy (SDUT) ... 80
Feds Expand Dearborn Credit Fraud Case With Indictments (DEN) ... 81
Sniper Lists Complaints To Judge (WT/AP) ... 82
Grand Jury Decries 'Arrests Without Merit' (BSUN) ... 82
Crackdown On Animal-rights Activists (CSM) ... 83

Civil Law:

Court Upholds Campus Military Recruiting (AP-Y2) ... 84
Supreme Court Sides With Military On Recruiters' Access To Campuses (KRT) ... 85
U.S. Wins Ruling Over Recruiting At Universities (NYT) ... 87
Justices Back Military Recruiting At Colleges Taking Federal Aid (WSJ) ... 88
Military Ban On Campus Rejected (WT) ... 89
Supreme Court Sides With Military Recruiters (LAW) ... 90
Supreme Court Upholds Campus Military Recruiting (LAT) ... 91
Court Upholds Military Recruiting Law (USAT) ... 92
Justices Side With Military Recruiters (CSM) ... 93
A Victory For Military Recruiters (WP) ... 94
Army 8, Yale 0 (WSJ) ... 95
Now Repeal The Ban (WP) ... 96
Justice Department V. Google Court Date Postponed Again (CNET) ... 96

Civil Rights:

Mandalay Bay Undergoes ADA Scrutiny (LVBIZ) ... 96
Judicial Bias Claims Reach Calif. High Court (LAW) ... 98
Unnatural Selection (NYT) ... 99
S.D. Enacts Ban On Nearly All Abortions (WP/AP) ... 100
South Dakota Bans Abortion, Setting Up A Battle (NYT) ... 101
Abortion Battle Gains New Intensity With Ban In S.D. (USAT) . 102
Some Abortion Foes Balk At S.D. Law (USAT) ... 103
South Dakota Governor Signs Abortion Ban (LAT) ... 103
Sun Belt, Suburbs Get More Diverse (USAT) ... 104
Whites To Be Minority In New York Area Soon, Data Show (NYT) ... 105

Antitrust:

Phone Merger's Approval Is Likely (AAS) ... 106
UPDATE: Few Antitrust Hurdles Seen For AT&T Deal (DOW). 106
US Officials To Closely Review AT&T-BellSouth (REU) ... 107
UPDATE:AT&T-BellSouth Deal Draws Scrutiny On Capitol Hill (DOW) ... 107
AT&T Plans 10,000 Job Cuts After BellSouth Purchase (Update4) (BLOOM) ... 108
AT&T's BellSouth Call May Ring At Vodafone (WSJ) ... 111
Merger Pressure Rises After AT&T Deal (FT) ... 112
The Titans Of Telecom Face Off (WP) ... 112
Qwest May Get A Buyout Nibble (USAT) ... 114
Revival Of The Fittest (WP) ... 114
Monopoly Concerns Resurface With Re-forming Of AT&T (SCRIPPS) ... 115
What The AT&T Deal Means For Consumers (WSJ) ... 116
The Telecoms Strike Back (CSM) ... 117
AT& T Deal Puts Focus On Net Fees (USAT) ... 118
Battle Lines For Cable Giants, AT&T Deal Is One More Reason To Worry (WSJ) ... 119
Consumer Groups To Oppose AT&T Purchase (AP) ... 121
Is Antitrust No Longer The Issue? (NYT) ... 122
Next Step In Phone Deal: P.R. (WSJ) ... 123
Two Young Men Likely To Play Big Roles In Telecom Giant (WSJ) ... 125
Not Your Ma's Bell (WSJ) ... 126
Let There Be Bandwidth (WSJ) ... 127
Ma Bell Revives; Watch Her With A Very Wary Eye (USAT) ... 128
Competition Calling (LAT) ... 129
Hybrid Program Key To NYSE Group's Future (AP) ... 129
Blackstone To Acquire CarrAmerica For $5.6 Billion (WSJ) ... 130
J.P. Morgan To Buy Kohl's Card Unit For $1.5 Billion (WSJ) ... 131
Linde Raises Bid For BOC, Likely Clinching A Deal (WSJ) ... 131

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Senate Democrats Oppose ANWR Oil Drilling In Budget (REU-Y2) ... 132
The Face That Helped Alter Nation's Flu Policy (WP) ... 132
Whales In The Way Of Sonar (NYT) ... 134

DOJ_NMG_0016496

Sixteen Arrested In Drug Bust On Pine Ridge (ICT) 134

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Israel Extradites Alleged Drug Trafficker To United States (FINDLAW) 135
Fugitive Extradited From Caribbean On Drug Charges (AP) 136
Atlanta Federal Agent Charged With Embezzlement (DBCH) .. 136
Feds Arrest Manteca Man For Impersonating DEA (AP) 136
Man Charged With Presenting Fake DEA Badge At Federal Courthouse (SACBEE) 137
DEA Accuses Pleasanton Broker Of Impersonating Agent (CCT)137
Judge Puts Upcoming Executions On Hold (THTS)..... 138
Medical-marijuana Clubs Fear New Raids By Feds (SDUT)..... 139
Bush Budget Faulted In Drug-war Setback (WT) 140
DEA Nets Meth 'superlab' (UPI/ WT)..... 140
ATF Investigating Pompano Warehouse Fire (MH)..... 141

Immigration:

Uncommon Weapon In Immigration Fight (LAT)..... 141
Specter's Proposal Seeks Compromise On Immigration Reform (BSH) 144
Local Officials Seek Help From U.S. On Immigration (NYT)..... 145

Tax:

Federal Prosecutors Sue Nevada Tax Preparers For Fraud (AP)146
Justice Wants 3 Hillsdale Residents To Stop Preparing Returns (AP)..... 146

Congress-Administration:

Bush Proposes Law To Give The President Line-Item Veto Power (WP)..... 147
Bush Seeks To Slim Down 'Pork' Projects (AP-Y2) 147
House Conservatives Prepare Austere Alternative Budget (NYT)148
Bush Calls For Line-item Veto (WT) 149
Bush Asks Congress For "Line-item Veto" Power (REU-Y2) 150
Bush Seeks To Restore 'pork-barrel Spending' Veto (FT) 151
Bush Wants Modified Line-item Veto Power (USAT) 152
Bush Seeks Limited Veto Power On Spending (LAT) 152
Reconciliation A Tough Sell In 2006 (RC) 153
Snow Says U.S. Has Taken 'All Steps' To Avoid Debt Limit (WSJ) 153
Will D.C. Circuit Nominee's Conservative Credentials Be His Undoing? (LAW) 154
How Do You Get To The Supreme Court? Practice, Practice, Practice (LAW)..... 157
Get On Your Phone Cheney Receives Warm Welcome During Naples Speech (NDN) 159
Cheney Delivers GOP Pep Talk (NEP) 160
Cheney Touts Shaw, Harris (MH)..... 161
No Mention Of Harris Fuels Rumors (FLSUNSEN)..... 162
Bush Weaves Rug Story Into Many An Occasion (WP)..... 162
Americans Lack Confidence In Health Reform, Poll Finds (WSJ)164
HSAs Won't Benefit Those Who Need Insurance Most (WSJ) . 164
Arkansas Set To Undertake A Novel Effort In Health Care (NYT)165
Senate Report Faults Medicare's Handling Of Complaints (WP)166
Senate Begins Consideration Of Lobby Reform (REU-Y2)..... 167
Senate Takes Up Bill On Lobbying Ethics (AP-Y2) 167
Senators Eye Lobbying Bill As Ready Vehicle For Pet Causes (HILL) 168
House GOP To Include 527 Language In Its Bill (HILL)..... 169
How Congress Benefits From Corporate Flights (USAT)..... 170
Robo-caller Thrives Amid Talk Of Change (HILL) 173
'I Will Not Seek Reelection' (HILL)..... 174
Ways And Means Chairman Thomas To Retire (AP-Y2)..... 175
House Ways And Means Chairman Says He's Retiring (USAT)176
A Powerful House Republican Plans To Retire (NYT) 177
Ways And Means Chairman To Step Down (WP)..... 178
Rep. Thomas Announces Retirement From Congress (REU-Y2)179
Thomas Leaves On Top (RC)..... 179
GOP's Bill Thomas Announces Retirement (WT)..... 181
House Ways And Means Chief To Retire (WSJ)..... 182
Government Smart-Card Project Hits Snags On Fingerprints, Costs (WP)..... 182
Clinton Cover-ups (WT) 183
Part-Time Congress (WP)..... 184
The Business Of Government (NYT)..... 185
Charities On The Hill (WP)..... 186
Union War Rules (WSJ)..... 186

Other News:

Factory Orders Slid 4.5% In January (WSJ)..... 187
Bond Yields Weigh On Stocks (WSJ)..... 187
DeLay To Spend Primary Night As Star Guest Of Lobbyists (USAT/AP) 188
Texas Voters Have Their Say (RC) 189
Facing Primary Challenge, DeLay Touts Clout, Pork (WT)..... 190
DeLay Cash May Prove Record High (HILL)..... 191
Opponents Of DeLay Make Use Of A Film (NYT)..... 193
Two Little-Known Dems Seek Texas Gov. Seat (AP-Y2)..... 194
GOP Faces Tough Climate, The NRSC's Dole Concedes (HILL)195
Democrats Struggle To Seize Opportunity (WP)..... 196
The Democrats' Real Problem (WP) 198
Sen. Clinton Says Wear 'Anger' As Honor (AP-Y2)..... 199
Ex-Pentagon Aide Seeks To Unseat Clinton (AP-Y2)..... 200
Ohio: Chabot Had 49 Percent In Democrat's New Poll (RC) 200
N.Y. Gov. Pataki Leaves Hospital (AP-Y2)..... 201
18 Days After Burst Appendix, Smiling Governor Goes Home (NYT) 201
Giuliani Tops Poll For Political Favorability (BOS)..... 202
Giuliani Is 'Hot' Stuff in New Poll (NYPOST) 202
Prominent Ties Among Comcast Hires (WP) 202
Peace Activist Sheehan Arrested In NY Protest (REU-Y2)..... 205
Chief Of Atomic Agency Sounds Optimistic On Iran (NYT)..... 205
U.N. Agency Chief Hopes For Deal With Iran (AP) 206
U.S. Dismisses Talk Of Compromise On Iran (AP)..... 207
Iran Deal Still Feasible: ElBaradei (REU-Y2)..... 208
New Calls Emerge For Nuclear Deal With Tehran (WSJ)..... 209
Russia And West Split On Iran Nuclear Issue (NYT) 210
Russia Presses US And EU On Iran (FT) 212
Iran Said To Step Up Plans For Shahab Missiles (REU-Y2)..... 212
India Nuclear Deal Pushed (WT) 213
Judicious Double Standards (WP)..... 214

DOJ_NMG_0016497

Mr. Bush's Asian Road Trip (NYT)..... 215
Energy, Iran Spur Turkey's Revival Of Nuclear Plans (WP)..... 215
Hamas Revokes Abbas's Wider Powers (FT/REU) 216
Hamas Legislators Strip Palestinian President Of Wider Powers (NYT) 216
Hamas Picks A First-Day Fight (WP)..... 217
Hamas Strips Abbas' Powers (WT/AP) 218
Hamas Undoes New Powers Given To Palestinian President (LAT) 219
Hamas Leaders Not Immune From Targeted Killing, Israeli Defense Chief Says (WSJ/AP) 220
US Says Door Remains Open To N.Korea Nuclear Talks (REU-Y2)..... 220
S.Korea, U.S. To Start Free Trade Talks In June (REU-Y2)..... 221
For OPEC, New Talks On Output (NYT) 222
Saudi Minister Doesn't Want Cut To OPEC Output (WSJ) 223
China Exercises Restraint With Taiwan (USAT) 223
WTO Finds Mexico Violated Trade Rules In Soft-Drink Case (WSJ/AP) 224
'Color' Revolutions Wane (CSM) 225
Russian Panel Backs Pipeline Near Baikal (NYT)..... 226
Russia Approves Divisive Pipeline Plan (WP) 227
Serb Who Aided Hague Tribunal Called A Suicide (NYT)..... 228
Where Killers Roam, The Poison Spreads (NYT) 228
U.S. Pushes Foolish Policy Of 'Baseball, Sí, Academics, No' (USAT) 229

TERRORISM NEWS:

Gonzales May Be Recalled On Eavesdropping (AP)

By KATHERINE SHRADER, Associated Press Writer
AP, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' written answers to questions about the Bush administration's eavesdropping program may require him to testify a second time before the Senate Judiciary Committee, the panel's Republican chairman said Monday.

"There is a suggestion in his letter there are other classified intelligence programs that are currently under way," Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., told reporters.

The comments from the moderate Republican come as the Bush administration is trying to quell criticism of its surveillance operations and work with the Senate on legislation that would write the program into law.

In a letter to Specter last week, Gonzales clarified his testimony in a half dozen areas covered in a daylong Senate Judiciary Committee hearing on Feb. 6.

Gonzales said his answers were focused only on President Bush's program granting intelligence officers the power to monitor - without court approval - the international calls and e-mails of U.S. residents, when those officers suspect terrorism may be involved.

"In all of my testimony at the hearing I addressed - with limited exceptions - only the legal underpinnings of the Terrorist Surveillance Program," Gonzales wrote. "I did not and could not address operational aspects of the program or any other classified intelligence activities."

Vermont Sen. Patrick Leahy, the Judiciary Committee's top Democrat, said Monday that Gonzales should come back before the panel to "clear up the confusion he created first by ducking our questions, and later by further clouding the issues with a 'clarifying' letter that substantially revised his unsworn testimony."

Specter's comments suggest he too has concerns about Gonzales' letter. "We may have to have him back before the Judiciary Committee," Specter said.

The Justice Department has not received a formal request to testify, spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said. "As a matter of practice, officials from the department do not discuss, confirm or deny the existence or nonexistence of any classified intelligence programs in public settings," he added.

Specter was one of the first Republicans to break with the White House to question the surveillance program when it was disclosed in December. He's drafting legislation that would require a secret federal intelligence court to conduct regular reviews of the constitutionality of the monitoring.

GOP Lawmakers Work To Limit Probe Of Domestic Spying Program (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn
Knight Ridder, March 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016498

WASHINGTON - Republicans in Congress are trying to limit the scope of any investigation into how President Bush's secret domestic-surveillance program has operated. Some key lawmakers are also working to legalize such spying on U.S. citizens in the future, perhaps with some judicial restrictions.

The dual-track effort is designed to protect the Bush administration from an all-out congressional inquiry into the secret program, while rejecting Bush's argument that he already has full legal authority to order such surveillance.

The Senate Intelligence Committee is scheduled to vote Tuesday on a Democratic plan to conduct a broad investigation into the program. Committee chairman Pat Roberts, R-Kan., is trying to win support for a more limited inquiry. Roberts refused to say Monday whether he had the votes to forestall the Democratic demand for an investigation. Democrats need only one Republican to side with them to order such a probe.

Under Bush's order and without court warrants, the National Security Agency has tracked electronic communications of U.S. residents the administration says are in contact with suspected al-Qaida members abroad. The program was first disclosed by The New York Times and acknowledged by Bush in December. Critics say Bush's action violates the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires warrants from a special secret court to authorize government spying inside the United States.

The partisan clash over the scope of an investigation prompted Senate Republican Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee last week to demand a meeting with Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. He also threatened to restructure the Intelligence Committee in a way that would weaken Democrats.

Reid on Monday dismissed Frist's call for talks.

"Let's have the Intelligence Committee do its work," Reid said. "I believe that we should see if Senator Roberts, who is a man of his word, is going to allow a vote on whether there should be an investigation. So when that' s completed ... I'll be happy to consider a meeting, but until then, what's there to meet about?"

In the Senate, a handful of Republicans has been working to give the president statutory authority to approve the NSA program. The administration argues that the president already has that power under the Constitution and a congressional resolution that gave Bush authority to use force in hunting down terrorists. Most Democrats and some Republicans reject that interpretation.

Republican Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Mike DeWine of Ohio and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina met Friday to discuss DeWine's proposal to legalize the warrantless spying while giving Congress the right regularly to review it. Graham wants a special federal court to have some authority over the program.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is proposing his own legislation that would require the foreign intelligence surveillance court to determine whether the NSA program is constitutional. Specter said Monday that only after such a determination can Congress decide whether and how to restrict the program legislatively.

Meanwhile, Specter said Monday that he wants Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to testify again before his committee about the legal rationale for the NSA program. Specter said he worried that Gonzales' subsequent written responses to the committee suggested that the administration was conducting other secret programs.

"The letter that he sent to clarify his testimony raises a lot more questions," Specter said. "There is a suggestion in his letter that there are other intelligence programs which are currently under way."

The ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, Rep. Jane Harman of California, said last week that Gonzales and White House counsel Harriet Miers assured her by telephone that no broader program exists. Harman's conversation was first reported by The Washington Post on Friday.

Prosecutor Urges Death For Concealing Sept. 11 Plot (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 6 — A federal prosecutor on Monday asked a jury to sentence Zacarias Moussaoui to death, saying his willful decision to conceal his knowledge of the Sept. 11 terrorist plot when he was arrested weeks earlier made him responsible for the thousands of deaths that day.

In response, a court-appointed lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui told jurors they could not order the execution of a man on no more than a supposition: that had he revealed his knowledge of Al Qaeda's interest in flying planes into public buildings, the federal authorities would have prevented the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Mr. Moussaoui, a 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan heritage, is the only person to be charged in the United States justice system with direct involvement in the Sept. 11 attacks. He was in jail on that day, having been arrested three weeks earlier in Minnesota on immigration charges while he was taking flight lessons.

DOJ_NMG_0016499

He has pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts and admitted that he was taking flight training to be available for a Qaeda campaign to fly aircraft into buildings. But he has insisted that he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot and that he does not deserve to die.

Because he has pleaded guilty, the trial that got under way on Monday is solely over whether he is to be executed by lethal injection at a federal prison in Indiana or spend his life in prison.

In their opening statements, lawyers for the government and for Mr. Moussaoui presented starkly different portraits of his importance to Al Qaeda's plans to wage war on the United States.

Robert Spencer, an assistant United States attorney, told the jury that Mr. Moussaoui was "in the thick of the plot" but that because he had been arrested, his contribution to the attacks "in the end was to lie so his Al Qaeda brothers could go forward."

Mr. Spencer said that had Mr. Moussaoui told a Federal Bureau of Investigation agent in August 2001 what he knew about Al Qaeda's plans, the bureau and the Federal Aviation Administration would have gone on full alert and taken steps to hunt down the hijackers and increased security at the nation's airports.

He said documents recovered from Mr. Moussaoui's home after Sept. 11 provided valuable clues that would have led directly to many of the 19 hijackers of that day.

"He killed the 9/11 victims as surely as if he had been at the controls in one of those airplanes," Mr. Spencer said.

Edward J. MacMahon, one of the court-appointed lawyers who is conducting the defense over Mr. Moussaoui's objections, said it was true that his client had proudly proclaimed himself a member of Al Qaeda and said he was planning to fly a plane into the White House at the orders of Osama bin Laden.

But Mr. MacMahon attacked the government's argument that had Mr. Moussaoui spoken truthfully of what he knew when he was arrested it would have prevented the attacks. He cited the official commission that investigated the attacks and found the government had several indications of Al Qaeda's plans before that day. The report found that the authorities never fully appreciated the significance of some of the leads.

"You can't judge him to get revenge for 9/11," Mr. MacMahon said. "You can't make him some substitute for Osama bin Laden. And you can't make him a scapegoat for what government officials did not do" to prevent the attacks.

Even if Mr. Moussaoui had not lied, he said, there is no reason to believe that the authorities would have acted quickly on that information any more than they acted on other leads. What officials would have done is speculative, he said, adding that Mr. Moussaoui was regarded as unreliable even by his Qaeda colleagues.

"No one should be executed on such flimsy evidence, not even a member of Al Qaeda," Mr. MacMahon said.

Throughout it all, Mr. Moussaoui sat back quietly in a chair to the side, slowly stroking his beard, often staring intently at spectators, who included about 10 family members of the attack victims.

The jury was whittled down on Monday to 17 people who will hear the case over the next several weeks. When it comes time to deliberate, 12 of that group will decide Mr. Moussaoui's fate. The jurors, 7 women and 10 men, are all from the Northern Virginia area.

Under the federal death penalty law, the jury's first task is to decide whether the crimes to which Mr. Moussaoui has pleaded to resulted in the death of anybody. If the jury is unanimous on that issue, it will consider aggravating factors, like the severity of the crime, as well as mitigating factors. If it finds the aggravating factors outweigh any mitigating factors, it will vote on whether to recommend the death penalty. If it does so, again unanimously, the judge is obliged to impose it.

Because Mr. Moussaoui pleaded guilty, the arguments that would have been at the heart of a jury trial on the question of his guilt will now get an airing before the newly installed jury, which is to decide his sentence. So the proceedings to come will resemble in almost every way the kind of trial that usually determines guilt or innocence in a capital case, and therefore may last for several weeks.

In addition to arguing that Mr. Moussaoui played no part in the Sept. 11 conspiracy, his lawyers are expected to argue that he is mentally unstable, a potentially mitigating factor. The lawyers have arranged for a psychologist to testify that Mr. Moussaoui's behavior, notably his frequent outbursts in the courtroom during the earlier proceedings, show him to be suffering from a mental disorder, "most likely schizophrenia," that began with his experiencing racism as a youth in France.

The government, for its part, plans to emphasize the losses of the Sept. 11 attacks. Prosecutors have prepared more than 40 family members to testify about the devastating impact on their lives.

The trial will include statements from six Qaeda officials in secret United States custody, including Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the chief planner of the Sept. 11 attacks. But those statements that will be included at the order of Judge Leonie M. Brinkema are likely to be solely about Mr. Moussaoui's role in Al Qaeda and also may not be made public.

Mr. Moussaoui's actual role in the Sept. 11 attacks has remained an intriguing mystery to investigators. The official commission that studied the attacks concluded that Qaeda leaders might have considered using him as "a potential substitute pilot" on Sept. 11 because of friction among other participants, but that his arrest scuttled that possibility. The commission also speculated that he might have been meant to be part of a second wave of attacks and noted that Al Qaeda spent some $50,000 on his training.

DOJ_NMG_0016500

Moussaoui's Lies Led To 9/11, Jury Told (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The Sept. 11, 2001, attacks would have been prevented and nearly 3,000 lives would have been saved if Zacarias Moussaoui had not lied to cover up the terrorist plot, prosecutors said yesterday as they began the long-awaited death penalty trial for the al-Qaeda conspirator.

If Moussaoui had revealed al-Qaeda's plans when he was arrested a month before Sept. 11, investigators would have identified 11 of the 19 hijackers and stopped the attacks, prosecutors said in their opening statements. The government would have tightened airport security and focused on the small knives and box cutters used in the hijackings, the prosecution contended.

"The FBI would have put on an all-out press," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer told a jury in U.S. District Court in Alexandria. "Moussaoui lied and nearly 3,000 people died. . . . His lies killed the Sept. 11 victims as surely as if he had been at the controls of one of those planes."

But defense attorneys turned hindsight back on the government, arguing that investigators ignored warning signs before the attacks and likewise would have failed to act on Moussaoui's information. They portrayed Moussaoui as bumbling and unstable and someone associates called "cuckoo in the head" but implored jurors to give him a fair trial.

"Moussaoui poses the ultimate test for our legal system," attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. told the 12 jurors and five alternates. "You cannot judge him to get revenge for the victims of Sept. 11, or for what happened on 9/11 or as some substitute for Osama bin Laden."

The passionate interchanges marked the beginning of the first -- and probably the only -- trial in the United States that will probe the events that brought down the World Trade Center, damaged the Pentagon and killed 40 people in a field in Pennsylvania when four planes were hijacked and used as missiles. Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the Sept. 11 plot and is the only person charged in this country in connection with the attacks. The trial will determine whether Moussaoui is executed for his role.

The opening statements ended 4 1/2 years of anticipation for many of the victims' families, who crammed the crowded courtroom or watched via closed-circuit television at private satellite locations in New York City, Long Island, New Jersey, Boston, Philadelphia and Alexandria, hoping for a measure of justice and some insight into what happened that day.

What they got yesterday was a glimpse of the man who for many has come to personify the attacks. Although Moussaoui admitted a role in the conspiracy, neither he nor the government has been specific about that role. He has said in court that he was part of a planned second wave of terrorism and was to fly a plane into the White House.

Still, he is a powerful presence for victims' families. When prosecutors began playing an al-Qaeda training video after opening statements, Moussaoui stroked his beard, smiled and sang along in Arabic: "We defend our religion with blood."

The sight evoked strong emotions in Bradley Burlingame, whose brother Charles was the pilot of the plane that crashed into the Pentagon. "I had my little fantasy of crossing the rail and strangling him, but that's not how the American process works," he said.

Burlingame and his sister, Debra, said they hope Moussaoui is executed. "It was quite chilling to be in the courtroom with this man. He epitomized what you think evil will be, and I think he enjoys it," said Bradley Burlingame, who flew in from Los Angeles for the opening statements.

The courthouse itself was under tight security. Snipers patrolled nearby rooftops while officers checked the identification -- twice -- of everyone who entered the building.

Yet the proceedings lacked some of the more theatrical elements that have come to characterize the case since Moussaoui was first charged in December 2001. Moussaoui, who is known for his courtroom outbursts and was repeatedly ejected by the judge during jury selection, sat quietly at his own table in the corner yesterday.

The day began with prosecutors and defense attorneys winnowing a group of more than 80 prospective jurors to the final 17 through peremptory, or unexplained, challenges. Eighteen jurors were initially chosen, but after they were seated and sworn in, one woman asked to be excused and was allowed to leave without explanation.

The 10 men and seven women -- all Northern Virginia residents -- cover a range of private-sector and government jobs. They include a woman whose brother-in-law works for the New York Police Department and was a rescuer at the World Trade Center, a man who served on a Navy ship in the Persian Gulf War and a Muslim woman born in Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0016501

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema told the jurors that they will be exposed to classified national security information that they are never to disclose to others.

Prosecutors focused their argument on how Moussaoui lied to the FBI when he was arrested in Minnesota while training on a Boeing 747 simulator. He told agents he was only a tourist with a "dream" to fly, Spencer said, but later admitted when he pleaded guilty that he had lied to allow al-Qaeda to go forward with the plot.

Spencer began by evoking the emotion of Sept. 11, recalling a crisp fall day that dawned clear and blue, with workers at the World Trade Center sitting at their desks checking e-mail and passengers on the four hijacked planes sipping coffee.

"It started as an utterly normal day," Spencer said. "But a day that started so normally and with such promise soon became a day of abject horror."

Turning to face Moussaoui, Spencer pointed and said: "One of the people in that plan, one of the people in the conspiracy, is among us still. That man is the defendant, Zacarias Moussaoui." Spencer portrayed Moussaoui as "a loyal al-Qaeda soldier. . . . Moussaoui stands before you today, an admitted terrorist, a convicted terrorist, a proud and unrepentant terrorist."

Spencer also began outlining the details of the government's case for the death penalty. He told jurors that al-Qaeda wired $14,000 to Moussaoui. If Moussaoui had told the FBI of the money, agents would have traced it to the man in the United Arab Emirates who sent it. That man's cell phone number would have led them to a number of the hijackers, he said. In addition, others would have been traced through a list of flight schools later found in Moussaoui's belongings.

Prosecutors did not address the controversy over the failure to search Moussaoui's belongings before Sept. 11. The independent commission that investigated the attacks sketched a series of government missteps that led officials at FBI headquarters to believe that they could not gain a warrant. But if Moussaoui had revealed all he knew, prosecutors said yesterday, the belongings would have been searched in time.

"This man, the terrorist Moussaoui, did his part," Spencer said. "Moussaoui lied so that murders followed. He intended to kill Americans, and he did."

MacMahon sketched a different portrait. The real Moussaoui, he said, was a bumbler who couldn't even fly a single-engine plane, a man so inconsequential that even his terrorist overseers dismissed him: "Moussaoui was totally useless to al-Qaeda, a headache, totally obnoxious."

Defense attorneys honed in on the failure to stop the attacks, playing videos of former attorney general John D. Ashcroft and then-National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice speaking about how the attacks revealed problems with the nation's intelligence structure that went back years.

"The government case for death is predicated on the unlikely pretense that the government would have carried out a flawless investigation" if Moussaoui had told the truth, MacMahon said. "You cannot look at this through post-9/11 glasses."

Prosecutor: Moussaoui Did His Part For 9/11 (AP-Y2)

By Michael J. Sniffen

AP2, March 6, 2006

Opening its argument for executing al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, the government said Monday he "lied so that murders could follow" on Sept. 11, 2001.

But the defense portrayed Moussaoui as a buffoon isolated even by al-Qaida and urged jurors to deny him the martyrdom of a death sentence.

In a heavily guarded courthouse just miles from the Pentagon, where some of the 2,972 victims of Sept. 11 died, prosecutor Rob Spencer opened his case by telling the jury that "even though he was in jail on Sept. 11, he did his part as a loyal al-Qaida soldier."

"Had he not lied to agents in 2001, the U.S. government would have stopped those deaths, or at least some of them," Spencer asserted.

Court-appointed defense attorney Edward MacMahon scoffed at that idea. He termed Moussaoui's dreams of being a terrorist "sound and fury signifying nothing."

Considered a headache and even called "cuckoo in the head" by one al-Qaida leader, Moussaoui "was intentionally isolated from the real hijackers in the United States," MacMahon argued. "Nothing Moussaoui did or said — even a lie — caused anyone to die that day."

Now Moussaoui yearns for martyrdom, MacMahon asserted. "The only way he can appear as a smiling face on an al-Qaida recruiting poster is by your verdict," MacMahon told jurors. "Please don't make him a hero. He doesn't deserve it."

The 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent, who faces either execution or life in prison without release, stroked his beard and intently studied the faces of jurors and the audience during opening statements.

Empaneled hours earlier, 10 men and seven women listened from the jury box. Across the hall, watching on closed circuit TV, Moussaoui's mother, Aicha, wept quietly when he entered court. One floor above, families of the Sept. 11 victims also watched on TV. Outside, snipers clad in black fatigues guarded the building.

Wearing a green prison jumpsuit and a white knit cap, Moussaoui remained quiet during proceedings, but as he left for a recess he told the lawyers, "All your stories, all your American creations have nothing to do with me."

Prosecutor Spencer said Moussaoui, the only man charged in this country in the Sept. 11 plot, should be held responsible for not stopping it after the FBI arrested him Aug. 16, 2001, while he was training in Eagan, Minn., to fly jetliners.

Moussaoui, Spencer said, was such an inexperienced pilot that the FBI suspected he might be a terrorist, but Moussaoui told them he was a tourist pursing a dream. That lie made him responsible for the deaths "as surely as if he had been at the controls of one of the planes" that al-Qaida hijacked and flew into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a field in Pennsylvania, the prosecutor said.

If Moussaoui had told the FBI the same plot details he described last April when he pleaded guilty to six conspiracy counts, that would have been "all the government needed to know to stop 9/11," Spencer said.

Moussaoui himself says he conspired with al-Qaida to fly planes into U.S. buildings but he wasn't part of the Sept. 11 planning. Instead, he says, he was training instead to fly into the White House as part of a possible later attack.

If Moussaoui had come clean in 2001, Spencer said, the FBI would have been able to use his records to locate 11 of the 19 Sept. 11 hijackers, including all four pilots. He also said the government would have keep those conspirators off airplanes and would have altered airport screeners to confiscate small knives and boxcutters.

MacMahon argued that Moussaoui knew less about the Sept. 11 plot than the government did. The inept government handling of the intelligence it had, he said, shows it would never have mounted the flawless probe Spencer described. "What the government wants you to believe is only a dream."

MacMahon said the U.S. government was told in 1995 that al-Qaida terrorists in the Philippines who had participated in the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center were discussing hijacking a commercial jet and flying it into CIA headquarters, but they never changed their aviation security to prevent that.

He pointed out that the government knew two of the hijackers were in the United States for months before Sept. 11 and never put them on a no-fly list.

"Nothing they were told by some Muslim loner in Minnesota would have changed that" response by the government, MacMahon said.

He said the Sept. 11 hijackers traveled in teams and trained together, but Moussaoui traveled alone, didn't train with them and was never in the presence of a real hijacker.

He played videotapes of then-Attorney General John Ashcroft describing how the FBI and CIA didn't share information before the attacks, and of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice saying any way to prevent Sept. 11 would have had to have been in place years earlier.

The 17 jurors included a high school math teacher who has traveled widely in the Middle East, a Navy veteran of the first Gulf War and an Iranian-born Sunni Muslim woman. The judge will later designate five as alternates.

The final group included only two of 21 prospective jurors who had some connection to the Sept. 11 attacks or victims.

One was a woman whose brother-in-law works for the New York City Police Department and helped with rescue at the World Trade Center. The math teacher had a more remote connection: The fathers of two of her pupils are firefighters who responded to the crash at the Pentagon. She helped freshmen make a quilt to give to the fire department.

One woman who was seated said earlier that she would tend to assume an al-Qaida member is evil. Jurors also included a mental health researcher, a man whose father retired from the CIA just before Sept. 11, a man who serves in the military reserves and a federal government employee who said he thought there was a lack of communication between the FBI and CIA before the attacks.

Outside the courthouse, D. Hamilton Peterson of Bethesda, Md., who lost his father, Donald, and stepmother, Jean, on the hijacked plane that crashed in Pennsylvania, declared, "I want accountability."

"I believe Moussaoui is an excellent candidate for the death penalty," he said outside the courtroom. "He is nothing less than a mass murderer."

Moussaoui Chose Not To Stop 9/11, Jury Told (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, March 7, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — The U.S. government opened its case for the execution of al-Qaeda operative Zacarias Moussaoui on Monday, charging that the French citizen withheld critical information that would have exposed the Sept. 11 plot.

"This man knew there was a ticking bomb in the United States," prosecutor Robert Spencer told a federal jury. "He lied so his brothers could go forward with this," he said. "He caused the deaths of nearly 3,000 people; he rejoiced in the death and destruction."

Moussaoui, 37, is the only person charged in the USA in the 2001 attacks in which hijacked airliners crashed into the Pentagon, the World Trade Center and a field in rural Pennsylvania.

A Muslim of Moroccan descent, Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to six counts of conspiracy. The hearing, which continues today, is to allow a 12-member jury to determine whether he should be executed or spend the rest of his life in prison.

Execution hinges on whether prosecutors prove that Moussaoui lied or withheld from federal agents critical information that could have been used to prevent some of the 9/11 deaths.

Moussaoui was arrested Aug. 16, 2001, on immigration violations while enrolled at a flight school in Eagan, Minn. Instructors alerted authorities to Moussaoui because he lacked experience piloting planes but wanted training to fly a 747.

In pleading guilty, Moussaoui acknowledged he was aware of a planned attack against the United States but said he was not part of the Sept. 11 plot. He told authorities he was part of a separate plan to fly a plane into the White House sometime after Sept. 11.

Defense lawyers dismissed the government's claims Monday as "entirely speculative." Edward McMahon, one of Moussaoui's lawyers, said the government's assertion that it could have unraveled the Sept. 11 plot with Moussaoui's cooperation in the 25 days before the attacks defied "common sense."

McMahon said Moussaoui never had specific knowledge of the Sept. 11 plot. He said he could not have known the date for the attacks because the 19 suicide hijackers did not begin buying their airline tickets until Aug. 25, after Moussaoui was arrested.

Describing his client as a "strange Muslim loner," McMahon said that even Moussaoui's associates in al-Qaeda — the radical Islamic group that carried out the attacks — regarded him as "a headache" and "cuckoo in the head." McMahon said Moussaoui never had contact with any of the hijackers before the attacks.

"There is little evidence that Moussaoui had the means or opportunity to anything," McMahon said.

Moussaoui has captured much attention for his frequent outbursts in court, where he has been reprimanded repeatedly by U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema. The judge revoked his right to defend himself because of his misbehavior and appointed a defense team to represent him.

Moussaoui, dressed in a green inmate jumpsuit and white knit skullcap, sat quietly for the most part. He stroked his beard as lawyers he rarely has communicated with made their arguments to spare his life.

McMahon suggested a death sentence would make his client a hero for the terrorist cause.

"The only way to achieve that dream of martyrdom is by your verdict," McMahon said. "Please don't make him a hero, ladies and gentlemen. He just doesn't deserve it."

Among the victims' family members were Brad and Debra Burlingame, siblings of Charles Burlingame, the pilot of American Airlines Flight 77, the jet that hijackers crashed into the Pentagon.

"This is a very bad, bad evil man," Debra Burlingame said of Moussaoui. "I would feel very comfortable with saying goodbye to Mr. Moussaoui for good."

In an interview Monday with CNN, Moussaoui's mother, Aicha El Waifi, said she doubted her son could receive a fair hearing. "The only thing that I do hope is that my son will not be used as a scapegoat," she said.

Sept. 11 Families Watch Moussaoui Trial (AP-Y2)

By David B. Caruso

AP2, March 7, 2006

Relatives of Sept. 11 victims gathered Monday at a courthouse near the site of the World Trade Center to watch a broadcast of the only man charged in the terrorist attacks as he stood before a judge to begin a sentencing trial.

The trial for Zacarias Moussaoui is taking place in Virginia, but victims' families watched via closed-circuit television at federal courthouses in New York City, Boston, Central Islip, N.Y., Newark, N.J. and Philadelphia.

The trial will determine whether Moussaoui, 37, is executed or serves life in prison for conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack planes and commit other crimes.

The families gathered at the courthouse just a few blocks from where the World Trade center once stood, some carrying photographs or buttons with images of their loved ones. Many also held scarves or other items emblazoned with the American flag.

"After 4 1/2 long years, this is our only attempt to get a scintilla of justice," said Sally Regenhard, whose son, firefighter Christian Regenhard, died in the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0016504

"What does accountability feel like? That's what eluded the families of the victims," she said. "They all got away with murder, so we only have him left."

Christie Coombs of Massachusetts, who lost her husband in the attack, said Moussaoui murdered him "as much as if he had the controls in his hands and flown the plane into the building, which is what his intent was."

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April. To obtain the death penalty, prosecutors must first prove a direct link between him and the Sept. 11 attacks. Moussaoui denies any connection to 9/11, but says he was training for a possible future attack.

Barry Zelman, whose brother Kenneth died on the 99th floor of the Oracle Corp., said some part of him wanted to see Moussaoui on trial in person. He said, "He's al Qaida in the flesh."

Zelman said he expects watching the trial to be difficult. He and others said it was ridiculous to think the trial would bring families a sense of closure or justice.

"There's going to be a lot of anger, a lot of emotion," he said.

Mindy Kleinberg of New Jersey, whose husband, Alan, died in the trade center, said she hopes the trial will yield answers to questions about Sept. 11.

"We had a lot of questions that weren't answered because of this trial," she said.

Joyce Woods, of Pearl River, whose 26-year-old son, James Woods, worked for Cantor Fitzgerald, said she came "because we need to know that our government is protecting us."

But, she said, she anguished over whether to come. She said, "I'm afraid of his ranting," referring to Moussaoui's frequent courtroom outbursts.

Let Moussaoui Live (USAT)

By Carie Lemack

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Arguments begin this week in the sentencing trial of a man accused of conspiracy in my mother's murder. The U.S. government wants to put the confessed terrorist to death. But I want him to live. And I think Mom would, too.

The accused, Zacarias Moussaoui, has admitted he is a member of al-Qaeda and has publicly pledged allegiance to Osama bin Laden. Last April, he pleaded guilty to the six terrorism conspiracy charges, admitting his intent to commit terrorism and aircraft piracy, and to use weapons of mass destruction. His admission earns him life in prison. The reason for the trial is to put him to death, thereby doing to him what he was willing to do to himself.

My mom, Judy Larocque, was murdered by madmen who yearned to die in their crazed belief that slamming the plane she had the misfortune to board into the World Trade Center in New York would bring them everlasting paradise. As a passenger on American Airlines Flight 11 on Sept. 11, 2001, Mom was granted neither a trial nor justice when she unwittingly became part of their evil plan.

Now, the government wants to put to death a man who it says had foreknowledge of the plot that killed my mom and 2,971 others. This man says that he was not supposed to be part of the 9/11 plan, but that he was going to "martyr" himself at a later date by crashing a plane into the White House. This man wants to die. So why is the government fighting to give him what he wants? A U.S. attorney close to the investigation denied that that was the government's intent. He explained that Moussaoui does not want to die at the hands of American officials and American courts.

Moussaoui's forum

But I disagree. Moussaoui wanted to tear the bonds that hold our country together — in the case of 9/11, literally limb by limb. His ongoing antics and sporadic outbursts in the courtroom, sometimes leading to his removal, have done just that, making a mockery of the trial.

The U.S. government should not give him a forum. He pleaded guilty to crimes that require life in prison. Let's give it to him. Take him away, so we don't have to hear from him again.

My opposition to his execution does not stem from compassion. Quite the contrary. Rather, it stems from two thoughts — one rational, the other pure emotion.

First, it costs more to put Moussaoui to death, according to several state studies cited by the non-profit Death Penalty Information Center, a group that opposes capital punishment.

In Moussaoui's case, there wouldn't even have to be a trial if U.S. officials agreed that life in prison was enough for the terrorist. They don't, and are prepared to spend millions arguing the case.

I prefer to see that money spent on almost anything else rather than on Moussaoui. Give it to the families of soldiers fighting Moussaoui's allies in Afghanistan, give it to New York City firefighters to buy walkie-talkies that work, but don't give it to a confessed terrorist seeking an audience.

DOJ_NMG_0016505

The second reason is embarrassing to admit but true. I want Moussaoui to die a slow, painful death. I do not want to give him the dignity of a planned execution, time to say his goodbyes, eat his last meal. His comrades did not give that to my mother. Let him sit in a cold, dirty cell alone for the rest of his long days, unable to direct his rants at anyone.

True to Mom

I know that some 9/11 families will not agree with me, and I respect their views.

If I learned anything after Mom's murder, it is that we all grieve differently. But I also know that I have to be true to myself, and to Mom. This realization hit me when I was standing in my shower last week and the song on the radio made me cry.

"She's gone so long. What can I do? Where could she be? ... Don't know what I'm gonna do

"I gotta get back to you."

Sweet Talkin' Woman by '70s rock sensation Electric Light Orchestra was my favorite song when I was2 years old. At my insistence, my mom played the record over and over as I danced in circles, screaming the words at the top of my lungs. But now those words have another meaning, one I did not fully understand until Mom's murder.

Getting back to Mom means getting back to living as she would want me to, dancing as I did when I was 2. But I cannot enjoy my life with the heavy conscience of someone who has been involved in taking one.

I would rather spend my energy getting back to living a life Mom would be proud of. Because, as the song's final line reminded me when I stood sobbing in the shower, it's so sad if that's the way it's over.

AP Sues For Access To Lindh's Petitions To Cut His Prison Sentence (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, The Associated Press

AP, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Associated Press sued the Justice Department on Monday for access to American-born Taliban soldier John Walker Lindh's petitions to have his 20-year federal prison sentence shortened.

The federal Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in New York, said the government has improperly refused to turn over Lindh's pleas to have his sentence reduced on the grounds that doing so would be an unwarranted invasion of his privacy.

AP's lawyers, in letters to the Justice Department and the lawsuit, however, said Lindh "is a 'high-profile public figure' whose 'privacy interest in his petition is low to nonexistent.'"

Lindh's lawyer, James Brosnahan, also has told the news cooperative that he would have turned over the documents himself, but he can't under the terms of Lindh's imprisonment.

The Justice Department did not immediately comment on the lawsuit.

Lindh, 25, was captured in Afghanistan in November 2001 in the U.S.-led effort to topple the Taliban following the Sept. 11 attacks. Lindh grew up in Marin County, Calif.

Prosecutors charged him with conspiring to kill Americans and supporting terrorists. He pleaded guilty to lesser offenses in 2002, including carrying weapons against U.S. forces. He avoided a potential life sentence and agreed to withdraw claims that he had been abused or tortured in U.S. custody.

The AP said it believes Lindh "contends in his petition that he was prosecuted and convicted unfairly in the immediate wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks, and that he was not, in fact, knowingly fighting the United States in Afghanistan."

The president decides whether to commute sentences or pardon people who have been convicted of crimes and have completed their sentences, usually on the recommendation of the department's Pardon Attorney.

Lindh, who is held at the medium security federal penitentiary in Victorville, Calif., first applied for clemency in September 2004, following up on his request 15 months later. Justice officials told him it would be at least a year before any decision is made.

AP first sought the records on Jan. 4. Nine days later, the department replied it could only release the documents with Lindh's written consent, according to the lawsuit. But Lindh is barred from making any public comment on the matter, including consenting to the release, under the terms of his plea agreement, the suit said.

A similar privacy issue is at the center of a long dispute between AP and the government over access to information about detainees at the U.S. military facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. U.S. District Judge Jed S. Rakoff last month ordered the Pentagon to release the identities of hundreds of detainees.

Tending To Muslim Hearts And Islam's Future (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The young Egyptian professional could pass for any New York bachelor.

Dressed in a crisp polo shirt and swathed in cologne, he races his Nissan Maxima through the rain-slicked streets of Manhattan, late for a date with a tall brunette. At red lights, he fusses with his hair.

What sets the bachelor apart from other young men on the make is the chaperon sitting next to him — a tall, bearded man in a white robe and stiff embroidered hat.

"I pray that Allah will bring this couple together," the man, Sheik Reda Shata, says, clutching his seat belt and urging the bachelor to slow down.

Christian singles have coffee hour. Young Jews have JDate. But many Muslims believe that it is forbidden for an unmarried man and woman to meet in private. In predominantly Muslim countries, the job of making introductions and even arranging marriages typically falls to a vast network of family and friends.

In Brooklyn, there is Mr. Shata.

Week after week, Muslims embark on dates with him in tow. Mr. Shata, the imam of a Bay Ridge mosque, juggles some 550 "marriage candidates," from a gold-toothed electrician to a professor at Columbia University. The meetings often unfold on the green velour couch of his office, or over a meal at his favorite Yemeni restaurant on Atlantic Avenue.

The bookish Egyptian came to America in 2002 to lead prayers, not to dabble in matchmaking. He was far more conversant in Islamic jurisprudence than in matters of the heart. But American imams must wear many hats, none of which come tailor-made.

Whether issuing American-inspired fatwas or counseling the homesick, fielding questions from the F.B.I. or mediating neighborhood spats, Mr. Shata walks an endless labyrinth of problems.

If anything seems conquerable, it is the solitude of Muslim singles. Nothing brings the imam more joy than guiding them to marriage. It is his way of fashioning a future for his faith. It is his most heartfelt effort — by turns graceful and comedic, vexing and hopeful — to make Islam work in America.

Word of the imam's talents has traveled far, eliciting lonely calls from Muslims in Chicago and Los Angeles, or from meddlesome parents in Cairo and Damascus.

From an estimated 250 chaperoned dates, Mr. Shata has produced 10 marriages.

"The prophet said whoever brings a man and woman together, it is as if he has worshiped for an entire year," said Mr. Shata, 37, speaking through an Arabic translator.

The task is not easy. In a country of plentiful options, Muslim immigrants can become picky, even rude, the imam complains.

During one date, a woman studied the red-circled eyes of a prospective husband and asked, "Have you brought me an alcoholic?"

On another occasion, an Egyptian man stared at the flat chest of a pleasant young Moroccan woman and announced, "She looks like a log!" the imam recalled.

"This would never happen in Egypt," said Mr. Shata, turning red at the memory. "Never, never. If I knew this boy had no manners I never would have let him into my office."

The Imam's Little Black Book

The concept of proper courtship in Islam, like much about the faith, is open to interpretation.

Islamic law specifies that a man and woman who are unmarried may not be alone in closed quarters. Some Muslims reject any mingling before marriage. Others freely date. Many fall somewhere in between, meeting in groups, getting engaged and spending time alone before the wedding, while their parents look the other way.

For one Syrian in New York, a date at Starbucks is acceptable if it begins and ends on the premises: The public is his chaperon.

Mr. Shata is a traditionalist. There were few strangers in his rural town of birth, Kafr al Battikh, in northeastern Egypt. Men and women often agreed to marry the day they met, and a few made the deal sight unseen. It was rare to meet anyone from a distant province, let alone another country.

New York is not only the capital of the world, imams often joke, but also the crossroads of Islam, a human sampling more diverse than anywhere save Mecca during the annual pilgrimage known as the Hajj. Beyond the city's five boroughs, Muslim immigrants have formed Islamic hubs in California, Illinois, Michigan and Texas.

At the center of these hubs stands a familiar sight in a foreign land, the mosque. What was a place of worship in Pakistan or Algeria becomes, in Houston or Detroit, a social haven. But inside, the sexes remain largely apart.

A growing number of Muslim Web sites advertise marriage candidates, and housewives often double as matchmakers. One mosque in Princeton, N.J., plays host to a closely supervised version of speed dating. And so many singles worship at the Islamic Society of Boston that a committee was formed to match them up.

DOJ_NMG_0016507

Fearing a potential surplus of single Muslim women, one Brooklyn imam reportedly urged his wealthier male congregants during a Ramadan sermon last year to take two wives. When a woman complained about the sermon to Mr. Shata, he laughed.

"You know that preacher who said Hugo Chávez should be shot?" he asked. "We have our idiots, too."

More than a matchmaker, Mr. Shata sees himself as a surrogate elder to young Muslims, many of whom live far from their parents. In America, only an imam is thought to have the connections, wisdom and respect to step into the role.

Mr. Shata began the service three months after arriving in Brooklyn in 2002, recruited to lead the Islamic Society of Bay Ridge, a mosque on Fifth Avenue.

Dates chaperoned by Mr. Shata — or "meetings between candidates," as the imam prefers to call them — often take place in his distinctly unromantic office, amid rows of Islamic texts. As a couple get acquainted, the imam sits quietly at his desk, writing a sermon or surfing the Arabic Web sites of CNN and the BBC.

If there is an awkward silence, the imam perks up and asks a question ("So tell me, Ilham, how many siblings do you have?") and the conversation is moving again.

Candidates are vetted carefully, and those without personal references need not apply. But instinct is Mr. Shata's best guide. He refused to help a Saudi from California because the man would consider only a teenage wife. Others have shown an all-too-keen interest in a green card.

Those who pass initial inspection are listed in the imam's version of a little black book — their names, phone numbers, specifications and desires. Some prefer "silky hair," others "a virgin." Nearly all candidates, men and women alike, want a mate with devotion to Islam, decent looks and legal immigration status.

Scanning the book, the imam makes his pitch with the precision of a car salesman.

"There is a girl, an American convert, Dominican, looks a little Egyptian. Skin-wise, not white, not dark. Wheat-colored. She's 19, studies accounting," Mr. Shata told a 24-year-old Palestinian man one afternoon.

"This is my only choice?" replied the man, Yamal Othman, who lives in Queens.

Such questions annoy Mr. Shata. An imam, he says, should be trusted to select the best candidate. Often, though, his recommendations are met with skepticism.

"It's harder than choosing a diamond," said Mr. Shata.

Sometimes, on the imam's three-legged dates, no one seems more excited than Mr. Shata himself. He makes hurried, hearty introductions and then steps back to watch, as if mixing chemicals in a lab experiment. Love is rarely ignited, but the imam remains awed by its promise.

Mr. Shata discovered love 15 years ago, when he walked into the living room of the most stately house in Kafr al Battikh.

The imam was tall, 22, a rising star at the local mosque. For months, Omyma Elshabrawy knew only his voice. She would listen to his thunderous sermons from the women's section, out of view. Then, one evening, he appeared at her home, presented as a prospective groom to her father, a distinguished reciter of the Koran.

The young woman, then 20, walked toward Mr. Shata carrying a tray of lemonade.

"She entered my heart," said the imam.

After serving the drinks, she disappeared. Right then, Mr. Shata asked her father for her hand in marriage. The older man paused. His daughter was the town beauty, an English student with marriage offers from doctors. The imam was penniless.

But before Mr. Elshabrawy could respond, a sugary voice interrupted. "I accept," his daughter said from behind a door.

"I loved him from the moment I saw him," Ms. Elshabrawy said.

They now have four children.

The family posed last year for a Sears-style portrait, taken by a woman in Bay Ridge who photographs Muslim families in her basement. A blue sky and white picket fence adorn the background. The imam sits at center, with the baby, Mohammed, in his lap, his three daughters smiling, his wife wrapped in a lime-green hijab.

Mr. Shata carries the picture in the breast pocket of his robe. It is as close as most people get to his family. At the mosque, they are a mystery. His wife has been there twice.

Their years in America have come with great hardship, a subject the imam rarely discusses. The trouble is the illness of his 7-year-old daughter, Rawda, who is severely epileptic. She has dozens of seizures every day and rarely leaves home. No combination of medicine seems to help.

"Rawda is the wound in my heart," the imam said.

Mr. Shata offers long, stubborn theories about the value of marriage, but to observe him at home is to understand the commitment he seeks to foster in other Muslims.

The family lives in a spare, dimly lighted apartment two blocks from the mosque. Headscarves are piled over Pokémon cards. The gold-painted words "Allah is Great" are framed over a threadbare couch. In the next room, an "I {sheart} New York" bumper sticker is slapped on the wall.

DOJ_NMG_0016508

Mr. Shata spends long hours away from his family, lecturing at mosques, settling disputes, whispering the call to prayer in the ears of newborn babies. On his walk home at night, he shops for groceries, never forgetting the Honey Nut Cheerios, a favorite American discovery of his children.

When he walks in the door, his face softens. Loud kisses are planted on tender cheeks. Mohammed squeals, the girls smile, sweet laughter echoes.

But then there is Rawda.

"My beautiful girl," the imam says softly one evening, holding his limp daughter in his lap after a seizure has passed. He places one pill in Rawda's mouth, then another. She looks at him weakly.

"There we go," he whispers. "Inshallah."

Her lids close with sleep. He lays her in bed and shuts off the light.

Hardship, the imam believes — like marriage, like life — is a test from God.

Foreign and Familiar

It is proof of the imam's uncommon popularity among women that he is trusted with roughly 300 female marriage candidates.

The mosque on Fifth Avenue is a decidedly male place. Men occupy every position on the board of directors. They crowd the sidewalk after prayer. Only they may enter the mosque's central room of worship. Only men, they often point out, are required to attend the Friday prayer.

One floor below is the cramped room where the women worship. On Fridays, they sit pressed together, their headscarves itching with heat. They must watch their imam on a closed-circuit television that no one seems to have adjusted in years.

But they listen devotedly. Teenage girls often roll their eyes at foreign imams, who seem to them like extraterrestrials. Their immigrant mothers often find these clerics too strict, an uncomfortable reminder of their conservative homelands.

Mr. Shata is both foreign and familiar. He presides over a patriarchal world, sometimes upholding it, and other times challenging it. In one sermon, he said that a man was in charge of his home and had the right to "choose his wife's friends."

Another day, to the consternation of his male congregants, he invited a female Arab social worker to lecture on domestic violence. The women were allowed to sit next to the men in the main section of the mosque.

The imam frowns at career women who remain single in their 30's, but boasts of their accomplishments to interest marriage candidates. He employs his own brand of feminism, vetting marriage contracts closely to ensure brides receive a fair dowry and fighting for them when they don't.

Far more than is customary, he spends hours listening to women: to their worries and confessions, their intimate secrets and frank questions about everything from menstruation to infidelity. They line up outside his office and call his home at all hours, often referring to him as "my brother" or "father." He can summon the details of their lives with the same encyclopedic discipline he once used to memorize the Koran.

"Are you separated yet?" Mr. Shata asked a woman he encountered at Lutheran Medical Center one day last July. She nodded. "May God make it easier for you," he said.

A Chaperoned Date

By most standards, the Egyptian bachelor was a catch. He had broad shoulders and a playful smile. He was witty. He earned a comfortable salary as an engineer, and came from what he called "a good family."

But the imam saw him differently, as a young man in danger of losing his faith. The right match might save him.

The bachelor, who is 33, came to Brooklyn from Alexandria, Egypt, six years earlier. He craved a better salary, and freedom from controlling parents. He asked that his name not be printed for fear of causing embarrassment to his family.

America was not like Egypt, where his family's connections could secure a good job. In Brooklyn, he found work as a busboy. He traded the plush comfort of his parents' home for an apartment crowded with other Egyptian immigrants. His nights were lonely. Temptation was abundant.

Women covered far less of their bodies. Bare limbs, it seemed, were everywhere. In Islam, men are instructed to lower their gaze to avoid falling into sin.

"In the summertime, it's a disaster for us," said the bachelor. "Especially a guy like me, who's looking all the time."

Curiosity lured him into bars, clubs and the occasional one-night stand.

But with freedom came guilt, he said. After drifting from his faith, he visited Mr. Shata's mosque during Ramadan in 2004.

The imam struck him as oddly disarming. He made jokes, and explained Islam in simple, passionate paragraphs. The bachelor soon began praying daily, attending weekly lectures and reading the Koran. By then, he had his own apartment and a consulting job.

Now he wanted a Muslim wife.

DOJ_NMG_0016509

If the bachelor had been in Egypt, his parents would offer a stream of marriage candidates. The distance had not stopped them entirely. His mother sent him a video of his brother's wedding, directing him to footage of a female guest. He was unimpressed.

"I'm a handsome guy," he explained one evening as he sped toward Manhattan. It was his second date with Mr. Shata in attendance. "I have a standard in beauty."

From the passenger seat, the imam flipped open the glove compartment to find an assortment of pricey colognes. He inspected a bottle of Gio and, with a nod from the bachelor, spritzed it over his robe.

The imam and the bachelor were at odds over the material world, but on one thing they agreed: it is a Muslim duty to smell good. The religion's founder, the Prophet Muhammad, was said to wear musk.

The car slowed before a brick high-rise on Second Avenue. Soon the pair rode up in the elevator. The bachelor took a breath and rang the doorbell. An older woman answered. Behind her stood a slender, fetching woman with a shy smile.

The young woman, Engy Abdelkader, had been presented to the imam by another matchmaker. A woman of striking beauty and poise, Ms. Abdelkader is less timid than she first seems. She works as an immigration and human rights lawyer, and speaks in forceful, eloquent bursts. She is proud of her faith, and lectures publicly on Islam and civil liberties.

She was not always so outspoken. The daughter of Egyptian immigrants, Ms. Abdelkader, 30, was raised in suburban Howell, N.J., where she longed to fit in. Though she grew up praying, in high school she chose not to wear a hijab, the head scarf donned by Muslim girls when they reach puberty.

But Sept. 11 awakened her, Ms. Abdelkader said. For her and other Muslims, the terrorist attacks prompted a return to the faith, driven by what she said was a need to reclaim Islam from terrorists and a vilifying media. Headscarves became a statement, equal parts political and religious.

"There's nothing oppressive about it," said Ms. Abdelkader. "As a Muslim woman I am asking people to pay attention to the content of my character rather than my physical appearance."

The pair sat on a couch, awkwardly sipping tea. They began by talking, in English, about their professions. The bachelor was put off by the fact that Ms. Abdelkader had a law degree, yet earned a modest salary.

"Why go to law school and not make money?" he asked later.

Ms. Abdelkader's mother and a female friend who lived in the apartment sat listening nearby until the imam mercifully distracted them. The first hint of trouble came soon after.

It was his dream, the engineer told Ms. Abdelkader, to buy a half-million-dollar house. But he was uncertain that the mortgage he would need is lawful in Islam.

Ms. Abdelkader straightened her back and replied, "I would rather have eternal bliss in the hereafter than live in a house or apartment with a mortgage."

An argument ensued. Voices rose. Ms. Abdelkader's mother took her daughter's side. The friend wavered. The bachelor held his ground. The imam tried to mediate.

Indeed, he was puzzled. Here was a woman who had grown up amid tended lawns and new cars, yet she rejected materialism. And here was a man raised by Muslim hands, yet he was rebelliously moderate.

After the date, the bachelor told the imam, "I want a woman, not a sheik."

Months later, he married another immigrant; she was not especially devoted to Islam but she made him laugh, he said. They met through friends in New York.

Ms. Abdelkader remains single. The imam still believes she was the perfect match.

That evening, the imam stood on the sidewalk outside. Rain fell in stinging drops.

"I never wanted to be a sheik," he said. "I used to think that a religious person is very extreme and never smiles. And I love to smile. I love to laugh. I used to think that religious people were isolated and I love to be among people."

The rain soaked the imam's robe and began to pool in his sandals. A moment later, he ducked inside the building.

"The surprise for me was that the qualities I thought would not make a good sheik — simplicity and humor and being close to people — those are the most important qualities. People love those who smile and laugh. They need someone who lives among them and knows their pain."

"I know them," said Mr. Shata. "Like a brother."

PATRIOT ACT:

A Tame End To Patriot Act Debate (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

DOJ_NMG_0016510

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

For a legislative fight that has stretched on for months, pitting the House against the Senate and the White House against members of the president's party, the battle to renew the USA Patriot Act will likely end very quietly this week.

Between three post office renamings and a measure to clamp down on the counterfeiting of manufactured goods, the House will give its final assent today on the Patriot Act's reauthorization. Republican leaders are so confident in its passage that they have scheduled the vote on the fast-track "suspension calendar," where approval takes the vote of two-thirds of the House. Just after they pass the Patriot Act, House members will vote to support the goals and ideals of National Engineers Week.

Passed after the 2001 terrorist attacks, the law made it easier for federal agents to secretly tap phones, obtain library and bank records, and search homes of terrorism suspects. Complaints by civil libertarians, librarians and others prompted lawmakers last year to insist on adding safeguards to the act before renewing it.

Some of the revisions affect National Security Letters, which are subpoenas for financial and electronic records that do not require a judge's approval. Libraries functioning "in their traditional capacity" will no longer be subject to such letters. Also modified is "Section 215 subpoenas," which are granted by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act Court. Recipients now will have the explicit right to challenge the subpoenas' nondisclosure or "gag order" requirements.

Some civil liberties groups, however, say the law is written in a way that will make it very difficult for a targeted individual to prevail in such an appeal.Less Call for Sweeping Lobbying Reform?

As the Patriot Act battle ends with a whimper, the fight over the rules governing lobbying will begin. But just as the Patriot Act fight started with promises of major changes and ended largely with the status quo, the push for sweeping lobbying reform may be losing steam.

The Senate is scheduled to take up ethics and lobbying legislation this week. But first, Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) hopes to merge two bills on the subject passed last week by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, and the Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs.

Senate aides do not expect much trouble accomplishing the combination. The rules bill deals basically with lawmakers' actions, and the governmental affairs bill involves mostly demands on lobbyists. Together they would represent the Senate's response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandals.

The bills lean heavily toward expanding disclosure requirements on both lawmakers and lobbyists. In addition, one pending proposal would make it harder for lawmakers to pass narrowly targeted spending measures called earmarks. The bill would also double to two years the time that former lawmakers must wait before they can lobby their ex-colleagues on Capitol Hill.

Senators have said they expect debate on a variety of measures on the floor including a plan, once rejected in committee, to establish an independent office of public integrity. Some senators also plan to offer an amendment that would force lawmakers to pay charter fares for their private airplane trips rather than the first-class rates allowed under current law.Food Bill No Longer Small Potatoes

The biggest rhetorical battle in Congress may be a food fight. Tomorrow or Thursday, the House is scheduled to vote on the National Uniformity for Food Act, a measure to establish a federal system of food warnings that would replace the patchwork regulations of the states.

The measure has bipartisan support and was expected to pass with little controversy. But in recent days, the protests of state government officials and environmental groups have changed the equation. State attorneys general say the legislation will federalize a regulatory issue that has been handled at the state level and could replace some tough state standards with weaker federal rules.

The Natural Resources Defense Council hand-delivered bottles of Pepto-Bismol to House members and their staff with a special label warning that "H.R. 4167 side effects may include vomiting, diarrhea, birth defects, cancer and worse." A bipartisan group of attorneys general will protest the measure today at a news conference near the Capitol.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Mich.), the bill's author, said yesterday that his measure is the victim of a disinformation campaign.

"The uniformity in food warnings under the bill will enhance food safety and public health," he said. "Contrary to the assertions of the attorneys general, H.R. 4167 is sound public policy that provides protection for all citizens of all states."

Patriot Act Includes Crackdown On Meth Use (AP)

By LAURIE KELLMAN, The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Suffer from springtime allergies? You could be among the first affected by the USA Patriot Act poised for final congressional passage this week.

DOJ_NMG_0016511

Besides terrorism, the bill takes aim at the production of methamphetamine, a highly addictive drug that cannot be manufactured without a key ingredient of everyday cold and allergy medicines. The bill would impose new limits next month for how much relief a person can buy over the counter.

And beginning Sept. 30, it'll take a flash of ID to buy that medication.

The legislation sponsored by Sens. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif. and Jim Talent, R-Mo., would blanket the nation with one policy that would put medicines containing pseudoephedrine behind the counter and out of the reach of meth cooks.

"If we leave it up to local jurisdiction, we're simply going to move the problem from one jurisdiction to another without addressing the root cause," said Fresno, Calif., Police Chief Jerry Dyer.

Pass a state or local law cracking down on methamphetamine production, set off a cycle that goes something like this:

The black market price of cold tablets needed to make the drug skyrockets, driving the meth makers to the jurisdiction next door. There, they buy it in bulk — legally, cheaply, anonymously.

That is, until that state or city gets tough on meth with new laws of its own.

Rather than wait for localities to stitch together a patchwork of anti meth policies, the provision of the Patriot Act would leave meth producers nowhere to run but out of the country. It takes aim at the meth trade's weakest point — the supply of pseudoephedrine.

Beginning 30 days after President Bush signs the law, expected sometime this week, purchase limits go into effect. One person would be limited to buying 300, 30-mg pills in a month or 120 such pills in a day. The measure would make an exception for "single-use" sales — individually packaged pseudoephedrine products.

Many retailers, such as Kmart, Walgreens, Target and Wal-Mart, have already adopted guidelines to limit customer access to cold products or to limit their sales.

Similar state and local restrictions have caused seizures of meth labs to plunge by double-digit percentages in such states as Arkansas, Oregon and Missouri.

At the same time, drug agents began finding more meth from Mexican cartels on the street.

Still, closing down domestic meth labs is of unique urgency to public health and safety, law enforcement officials said.

The drug is made in clandestine labs with battery acid, drain cleaner or other chemicals that help turn the cold and allergy medicine into powder.

One quart of ether, another ingredient, holds the explosive power of several sticks of dynamite, said Sgt. Jason Grellner of the Franklin County, Mo., Narcotics Enforcement Unit, which has seized 600 meth labs since 1998 in a jurisdiction of 100,000 people.

Wading into the toxic soup of a meth lab puts officers in situations for which they are not necessarily trained, Grellner said.

"They have to know the job of a hazardous-waste chemist. They have to have the mindset of a firefighter. They have to be a natural-resources worker," Grellner said. "Wearing that many hats is a safety concern."

And an abandoned lab becomes an environmental hazard, pointed out Dyer.

"They were leaving the chemicals and equipment out in the open and vacating the property," Dyer said. "They found out that we started to trace down suspects with that equipment. Now they are burying these same items underground."

Oklahoma provides evidence that driving out meth labs doesn't mean getting rid of meth. Oklahoma's meth lab seizures have fallen 90 percent since April 2004, when it became the first state to ban over-the-counter sales of everyday cold and allergy medications.

At the same time, seizures of smokeable Mexican meth known as "crystal ice" rose nearly fivefold, from 384 cases in the 15 months before the law to 1,875 since.

"We're going to see trafficking by Mexican cartel organizations, on a much larger scale," Grellner said.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says U.S. Ports Takeover Would Tighten Grip On Security (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday said the proposed takeover of terminal operations at five U.S. ports by a Dubai company would give U.S. law enforcement a better handle on security at U.S. terminal operations.

DOJ_NMG_0016512

But the unprecedented access that the Department of Homeland Security and other federal agencies would have to monitor the United Arab Emirates shipping company's personnel and business records would "evaporate" if Congress stopped the deal from proceeding, he warned.

Mr. Chertoff has said on many occasions that he didn't consider Dubai Ports World's proposed $6.8 billion buyout of London's Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. a security threat to the U.S. However, his statements to a group of Wall Street Journal reporters marked the first time that he has said that Homeland Security had something to lose if the deal fell through.

"We are in a position now where we can and, assuming this deal goes through, we intend to have a deep look into their practices, certainly in the U.S. ports," Mr. Chertoff said.

Mr. Chertoff also denied rumors he had any intention of resigning following criticism of how his department handled the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. On the contrary, he said that as the hurricane season approaches, he intends to remake the Federal Emergency Management Agency. He said he will recommend not just a new FEMA director, but an entire management team to head the agency, which has been without a director since Michael Brown resigned 10 days after Hurricane Katrina struck the Gulf Coast.

On the ports issue, Mr. Chertoff said his department was beginning to review and inspect P&O's current operations in the U.S. Members of Congress and governors from both parties were outraged at the prospect of an Arab government operating U.S. port terminals, and are angry that the White House didn't consult them before approving the deal.

Mr. Chertoff said DP World has committed to continue its participation in U.S.-sponsored port-security initiatives at all its overseas operations and to "assist and support federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies" as part of conditions for approving the acquisition.

According to the letter to the Homeland Security Department containing DP World's agreement, the company agreed to provide U.S. law enforcement, if asked, with information about its U.S. operations, facilities and personnel. It also agreed to provide federal agencies with any records in the U.S. involving its foreign operations. Since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, federal law-enforcement and intelligence agencies have been trying to get inside information about global shipping operations, long seen as a potential conduit for smuggling terrorists and weapons around the globe.

Mr. Chertoff described the arrangement as a template for other foreign-owned port-terminal operators. "This actually gives us a better opportunity to raise the baseline of security, first with this set of terminal operators, but eventually, hopefully, unless Congress says you can't have foreign companies own or run terminal operations, we'll be able to raise the level for all them too," he said.

DP World has agreed to an additional 45-day review of the deal, but lawmakers are considering legislation that would bar it. If that happened, Mr. Chertoff said, the U.S. would lose the ability it would gain through the deal to more closely scrutinize terminal operations. "Obviously if the deal doesn't go through, these assurances evaporate."

Mr. Chertoff, who took over from the department's first secretary, Tom Ridge, just over a year ago, also said that some lawmakers still aren't completely committed to the Department of Homeland Security, and would like to see it broken up. He said the hope was destructive and hampered his agency's effectiveness.

After the federal government's initial response to Hurricane Katrina, there are calls on Capitol Hill to break FEMA out of Homeland Security, a move Mr. Chertoff said would be a mistake. Mr. Chertoff said he hoped to have an emergency team in place along with supply contracts from companies that can track shipments of relief commodities like water, food and ice, before the hurricane season starts June 1.

April Vote Expected On Port Security (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Senate homeland security panel Chairman Susan Collins said her committee will vote next month on legislation to improve America's port security and thinks the concern over a Dubai company running some U.S. port operations may give the bill new momentum.

"My hope is that the silver lining of the controversy over the Dubai transaction is that it will prompt Congress once and for all to pass comprehensive legislation to deal with the broader underlying issue of port security," said Miss Collins, Maine Republican.

The administration is conducting a new 45-day review of DP World's $6.8 billion bid to purchase terminal operations at several key U.S. ports from a British company.

The deal is moving forward, however. Yesterday, Britain's Court of Appeal dismissed a Miami firm's objection to it. The takeover is now set to become effective tomorrow, the British company said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0016513

Meanwhile, Miss Collins plans to move a ports security bill she wrote last year with Sen. Patty Murray, Washington Democrat. The two are also working with House Homeland Security Chairman Peter T. King, New York Republican, and Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat, on a similar House bill.

Miss Collins' measure would authorize $835 million each year for five years to improve current port security programs. It would create an office of cargo security policy, and set new requirements for examination of all inbound cargo.

Miss Collins said the Homeland Security Department is taking far too long to implement some security steps, like minimum standards for mechanical seals on cargo and identity cards for transportation workers.

"We want to make this a priority for the department, set clear deadlines, set clear standards, and I think it will make a real difference," she said.

The bill would create a program to entice private importers to enact top security standards for cargo in exchange for special treatment, like fewer searches. And it also would direct the department to come up with a detailed plan of how trade would resume after an attack at a U.S. port. There is no such plan in place now.

Mrs. Murray said an attack on one port would require all ports to be shut down for perhaps as long as four months, with devastating consequences.

"People in the Midwest who think they have nothing to do with ports would soon not have anything on the shelves of their grocery stores or Wal-Marts," she said.

Miss Collins also plans to introduce a new bill later this week with Sen. Joe Lieberman, the ranking Democrat on the homeland security panel. It would move the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS) -- which approved the DP World takeover deal -- under the purview of the Homeland Security Department, as opposed to the Treasury, as is now the case.

Lieberman Calls For More US Port Security Funds (REU-Y2)

By Richard Cowan

Reuters, March 6, 2006

The Bush administration's plan for securing America's ports is inadequate and funding should be nearly double the White House's budget request for next year, a key Senate Democrat said on Monday.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman (news, bio, voting record) of Connecticut, the senior Democrat on the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, called for spending more than $1 billion on port security in fiscal 2007.

In remarks to reporters, Lieberman noted that the Bush administration budget only calls for $551 million for port security in the fiscal year starting on October 1.

"This budget fails to address the damage that terrorists can do to us with weapons of mass destruction or dirty bombs in containers shipped into this country," Lieberman said.

Democrats' criticism of the administration's spending priorities came amid an uproar over White House approval of a state-owned Arab company's plan to manage six American ports.

The plan for Dubai Ports World to buy British port operator P&O is under a 45-day review and some Republicans in Congress have vowed to block it.

Separately, a White House spokesman expressed confidence that lawmakers would ultimately support the $6.85 billion Dubai Ports World deal.

"We're confident that at the end of this review process that more members will be comfortable with this transaction moving forward," said spokesman Scott McClellan.

However, the Republican chairman of the House Armed Services Committee planned to introduce a bill on Tuesday that would block the Dubai deal, his spokesman said.

The legislation being prepared by Rep. Duncan Hunter (news, bio, voting record) of California and Republican Rep. Jim Saxton (news, bio, voting record) of New Jersey would also force foreign owners of U.S. ports, electricity plants and other "critical" infrastructure to sell their holdings and require inspection of all cargo.

Other details of the bill were not yet available, a Hunter spokesman said.

Later this week, the Senate Budget Committee is expected to craft a budget blueprint for next year and Lieberman has urged the panel to beef up domestic security by spending $8 billion more than President George W. Bush has proposed.

Besides port security, the added money would fund Coast Guard operations, emergency health preparedness, first responders and other Department of Homeland Security activities.

The Democrat's demand for more domestic security funds comes as the Republican-controlled Congress tries to find ways to control massive federal budget deficits. Next year's deficit is expected to come in around $355 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0016514

Sen. Kent Conrad (news, bio, voting record) of North Dakota, the senior Democrat on the budget committee, said he would pay for more domestic security spending by improving tax collection. Government experts have testified that about $350 billion in taxes due are not being collected by the Internal Revenue Service each year.

"It has been more than three years since the Coast Guard estimated more than $7 billion would be needed just to provide basic physical security at all U.S. ports" and to implement a 2002 maritime transportation security law, Lieberman said.

He added that Congress so far has appropriated about $750 million. "Much more clearly remains to be done," Lieberman told the Senate Budget Committee.

Hunter Readies Ports Bill (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), who has promised to try to sink the Dubai Ports World deal, started circulating a "Dear Colleague" letter yesterday to attract co-sponsors for legislation he plans to introduce today.

In the letter, co-signed by Rep. Jim Saxton (R-N.J.), Hunter outlined several provisions of the legislation, which would halt the Dubai takeover of management at some U.S. port terminals. It would also require any corporation that owns, manages or operates "national defense critical infrastructure to be majority-owned by American citizens."

The secretaries of defense and homeland security would have to prepare and maintain and a national defense critical infrastructure list, the letter says.

Hunter and Saxton also call for reforming the interagency Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States by mandating a 45-day investigation into transactions that may have national-security implications. The legislation would, additionally, require the president to provide regulations that mandate written notification to the administration of mergers, acquisitions and takeovers that may be subject to investigation by the committee.

British Court Allows Dubai Deal To Proceed (AP-Y2)

By Jane Wardell

AP2, March 6, 2006

The controversial takeover of British shipping company P&O by Dubai's state-owned DP World received the green light Monday when Britain's Court of Appeal dismissed a Miami firm's objection to the deal.

The Court of Appeal declined to hear an appeal from Miami-based Eller & Co., which had tried to have the deal barred on technical grounds, arguing that U.S. concerns about a United Arab Emirates company owning significant operations at six major U.S. seaports could harm its business.

The lower High Court had already approved the 3.9 billion pound ($6.8 billion) acquisition of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. and Monday's unanimous decision by the three judges of the Court of Appeal means that the deal is now free to proceed through the final regulatory stages.

In a statement following the decision, P&O said the takeover will now become effective on March 8 and that the shipping company's shares will be delisted from the London, Sydney and Tokyo stock exchanges on March 9.

The deal was originally due to be closed last Thursday, but Eller's last-minute petition resulted in an extended three-day hearing in the High Court — which must give approval for the takeover to go ahead.

Justice Nicholas Warren gave that approval on Thursday, but placed a hold on his ruling to allow Eller to take the case to the higher court.

Justices Anthony Lloyd, David Neuberger and Martin Moore-Bick lifted the hold order Monday as they ruled that Eller had no case on four technical grounds, including an argument that hundreds of shareholders in Australia were not given adequate notice of a vote on the deal because of a mailing problem.

Eller said after the ruling that it was disappointed by the decision, but it did not intend to appeal the judgment. However, it said it would continue to pursue legal action in the U.S. courts in Florida.

"We are not alone in opposing this deal — many elected politicians in the U.S. and indeed the American public, share many of our concerns about the takeover," the company said in a statement.

"We will continue to fight to protect our business and the livelihood of thousands of our staff and subcontractors," it added.

P&O runs shipping terminals in New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia — a fact that has caused unease among some lawmakers and businesses in the United States who have cited security concerns about an Arab company taking over the ports.

DP World has attempted to defuse some of the tension by saying the U.S. ports will remain separate to the overall deal and submitting itself to a second 45-day investigation by the U.S. government, despite already receiving regulatory approval.

DOJ_NMG_0016515

Chief Executive Mohammed Sharaf said Sunday he expected the deal to be completed.

"All the authorities are comfortable with the security measures that we take," he said. "As far as we are concerned, the deal is going to go through, and the British government has approved it."

"There are big consequences for the British market if it doesn't go through because investors are waiting for the money," he said on CNN's "Late Edition."

Lawyers for DP World warned last week that a delay beyond Friday meant that the company will not be able to access the money it needs to pay shareholders on time. Lawyers for P&O said they will pursue Eller for the costs of the British legislation.

President Bush has supported the takeover deal and lawmakers that were initially opposed seem to have softened slightly, tempering calls for an immediate vote to block the takeover. Many said the new probe reassured them and negated the need for legislation for now.

A U.S. federal judge has also ruled against a request by New Jersey to order an investigation into the takeover.

The High Court's Warren said in his ruling last week that U.S. concerns about port security and threats of port authorities withdrawing business were partly fueled by Eller and he did not find them credible.

U.S. Firm Loses Appeal Of P& O Sale (WP)

By Jane Wardell

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

LONDON, March 6 -- A British appeals court on Monday declined to hear a Miami firm's objection to the takeover of British shipping company P&O Group by Dubai's state-owned Dubai Ports World, giving the go-ahead to a deal that has caused an uproar in the United States over port security.

Miami-based Eller & Co. had argued that U.S. concerns about a United Arab Emirates company managing significant operations at six major U.S. seaports could harm its business. Eller had tried to have the deal barred on technical grounds.

Eller said that it will continue to pursue legal action in the U.S. courts in Florida. "We will continue to fight to protect our business and the livelihood of thousands of our staff and subcontractors," it said.

The $6.8 billion acquisition of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co. was given the required approval by the High Court last week. But High Court Justice Nicholas Warren placed a hold on his ruling to allow Eller to take the case to the higher court.

The rejection of the appeal means that P&O can now list the deal at the British registry Companies House, the final regulatory stage of the transaction.

Mideast Investment Up In U.S. (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Middle Eastern investment in the United States is once again picking up steam, showing big gains since the tense period following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. And while some takeovers are triggering alarm -- most famously, the purchase by a Dubai-owned company of a seaports management firm -- others are evoking warm welcomes.

Spearheading the trend is Dubai's Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktum (popularly known as "Sheik Mo"), ruler of the freewheeling city-state, which is part of the United Arab Emirates. The ports deal is just one of a series of recent purchases by companies he controls.

Other acquisitions include a $1 billion portfolio of 21,000 apartments in U.S. Sun Belt cities; a 2.2 percent stake in the automotive giant DaimlerChrysler AG that cost another $1 billion; and a Manhattan landmark building, 230 Park Ave. The emirate also made major purchases in other countries over the past year, notably a $1.5 billion takeover of Britain's Tussauds Group, which owns the famous waxworks, along with theme parks, roller coasters and other entertainment-oriented businesses.

On Thursday came news that yet another Dubai acquisition is drawing Bush administration scrutiny because of the national security risks -- this time of plants in Georgia and Connecticut that make precision components used in engines for military aircraft and tanks.

But an entirely different reaction greeted the disclosure several months ago that Dubai Investment Group had acquired the Essex House hotel in Manhattan and promised to sink $50 million into renovating it.

That announcement prompted New York City Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg to exult: "Another iconic hotel overlooking Central Park will be preserved and its unionized workforce protected. This is excellent news for New York's tourism and hospitality industries."

Behind such transactions are two powerful forces. One, of course, is the high price of energy, which has left several oil-producing Arab countries swimming in cash. The other is the burgeoning U.S. trade deficit -- $726 billion last year -- which means that the United States needs foreign capital; a country that imports more than it exports must cover the gap with money from abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0016516

Until now, investments in the United States from Europe and other parts of Asia have dwarfed those from the Middle East. But an increasing share of the foreign money required to fuel the U.S. economy is likely to come from places that, like Dubai, trigger visceral reactions among Americans seared by memories of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"The price of oil is going only one way -- up -- for the next five years, because it is going to take at least that long for alternatives to kick in," said Youssef M. Ibrahim, managing director of the Strategic Energy Investment Group, a consulting firm based in Dubai. "So there is no question in my mind that billions of dollars will continue flowing this way, and people cannot handle all of that kind of money here. You've got to circulate the money, and the United States is still the biggest market."

Already, the list of U.S. businesses owned by Arab investors -- not just from Dubai -- includes some well-known names. Among them are Caribou Coffee Co., the fast-growing rival to Starbucks Corp.; Church's Chicken, a fast-food concern; Loehmann's, a specialty retailer; TLC Health Care Services Inc., a provider of home nursing and hospice care; and even several financial publications, including the American Banker.

Such "direct" investment in hard assets -- companies, factories and real estate -- is generally preferable for the U.S. economy, in the view of most economists, to foreign investment in bonds, stocks and other financial assets. One advantage of direct investments is that they cannot be dumped in a panic the way that, say, a Treasury bond can. Moreover, they often involve high-wage jobs. Average annual compensation per worker at U.S. subsidiaries of foreign companies is about $60,500, 34 percent higher than the rate at all U.S. companies, according to the Organization for International Investment.

The main drawback of a direct investment is that it involves foreign control, which can raise national security concerns. That is why an interagency government panel, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, reviews many foreign takeovers. That process may be revamped by Congress due to indignation over the panel's decision to approve the purchase by Dubai Ports World of Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co., a British firm that manages container terminals on the East Coast.

Arab direct investments would probably be more extensive were it not for the political and legal atmosphere in the post-Sept. 11 era. "Middle Eastern investors are still a little skittish about investing in the United States," said James A. Fetgatter, chief executive of the Association of Foreign Investors in Real Estate.

To some extent, Arab investors think U.S. property is overpriced, so they are putting more of their overseas bets in Asia, said Gary Sheehan, an executive with Sentinel Real Estate Corp. in New York. But an additional factor is their fear about what might befall their holdings at the hands of U.S. authorities.

"I was in Bahrain the week before last and had a meeting at a bank where they said they would love to invest in the States," Sheehan said. "But they said: 'Syrian interests own 12 percent of our bank. So we know that if push comes to shove' " -- that is, a serious confrontation between Washington and Damascus -- " 'our assets will be frozen.' "

Such negativity toward investing in the United States could well deepen as a result of the controversy over the Dubai ports deal, some in the region warn. Sheikha Lubna al-Qassimi, the UAE economy minister, told the Financial Times last week that the United States will become less attractive if investment decisions are subject to political interference. "There are other countries that are competing for [our] money," she said.

But worries about a drying-up of Arab investment are overblown, according to others, including C. MacLaine Kenan, an executive in the Atlanta office of Arcapita Inc., one of the biggest firms serving as a conduit for foreign Arab investors in U.S. businesses.

Arcapita has raised billions of dollars from investors in the UAE, Saudi Arabia, Qatar and neighboring countries and has invested the majority of it in the United States, where it owns Caribou Coffee, Church's Chicken and other companies, as well as real estate. The investments have to conform with sharia, or Islamic law, which means that they cannot involve businesses that traffic in alcohol, pork, pornography or gambling and that they have to use special types of financing to avoid violating Muslim rules against charging interest.

"Our investors will spend some time complaining about U.S. politics, but at the end of the day, they're pretty shrewd in divorcing the economic opportunity from the political issue," Kenan said. "And they generally know the political problems will in most cases blow over. So every now and again, we get people saying: 'I wish this [U.S.] administration would do better. But by the way, how's this investment going?' "

The typical Middle Eastern investor is "a pretty happy camper," Kenan added, because markets in the region have soared along with oil prices. "So they have more appetite for investment abroad, and they know the United States is a place a smart investor needs to have some money."

Whatever Arab investors abroad finally do, their clout is relatively small -- at least for now. At the end of 2004, investors from Arab countries held just $4 billion in direct investment in the United States, according to Commerce Department data.

DOJ_NMG_0016517

British investors, by contrast, held $252 billion, Japanese investors held $177 billion, Dutch investors held $167 billion and German investors held $163 billion. Their holdings span industries often deemed "critical," such as telecommunications (Finland's Nokia Corp. and Sweden's Ericsson Inc.), energy (British Petroleum PLC and Royal Dutch Shell PLC) and utilities (E.On AG of Germany, which controls much of the gas and electricity distribution in Kentucky).

Although foreign investors are far from controlling the U.S. economy -- their payrolls constitute an estimated 3.5 percent of the nation's workforce -- the United States is growing increasingly dependent on them as the trade gap widens. To obtain the money necessary to pay for imports, the United States this year will probably need to attract foreign capital at the rate of about $20 billion a week, which is equal to selling three companies the size of the maritime firm purchased by Dubai Ports World, noted Brad Setser, an economist with Roubini Global Economics LLC in New York.

To be sure, most of the money flowing into the United States comes in the form of Treasury bonds and other financial assets rather than corporate acquisitions. Foreigners held roughly $9 trillion of U.S. financial assets at the end of 2004, according to government data. Middle Eastern oil exporters held a modest percentage of that, including about $121 billion in U.S. government securities, the data show.

But the oil revenue flooding into the Mideast means that the region's financial strength is rising apace. The cumulative trade surplus of Middle Eastern oil exporters, which was $500 billion from 2000 to 2005, will come close to $800 billion by year-end, Setser wrote recently.

"Which is just to say," he said, "that there are a lot more Dubai Ports Worlds out there."

Report Questions Homeland Security Plans (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Associated Press, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Homeland Security Department still spends money on U.S. port projects that aren't considered national security priorities even though it has made some corrections, a new report says.

In a report to be made public Tuesday, Homeland Security Inspector General Richard L. Skinner praises the agency for overhauling the Port Security Grant Program in 2005 to award money based on risk and to make only the 66 most vulnerable ports eligible.

However, Skinner said, the agency still has not entirely fixed the problems that led the inspector general's office in January 2005 to issue a dozen recommendations for improving design, management and oversight of the program.

This time, Skinner said, "We identified 20 projects that reviewers determined did not meet national security priorities but were funded nonetheless."

His office studied the fifth and most recent round of port security grants, which awarded $142 million for 132 projects. Of those, the 20 projects Skinner's report said scored low on the agency's threat scale received about 20 percent of the money awarded, or $29.3 million.

The report did not say where those projects were located. In one example, a grant applicant proposed installing card readers on critical buildings and upgrading current software for controlling access to the facility. The project received no score as a national security priority threat but received funding anyway.

Marc Short, a Homeland Security spokesman, defended the grant program. "Despite the scoring, the results are absolutely in accord with our risk assessment," he said.

The new report comes amid increased attention in Congress on port security as Dubai-owned DP World seeks to takeover significant operations at six U.S. ports. Republicans and Democrats alike oppose the deal and have introduced legislation to block it.

Although dated February 2006, Skinner's report is being made public Tuesday. The Associated Press obtained an advanced copy.

In October, Congress, at the behest of Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., ordered a review of the steps the agency has taken to comply with recommendations in the January 2005 report.

"It's been more than four years since 9/11, and the government still can't get port security right," Kerry said in a statement.

Since its inception, the grant program has awarded more than $700 million to make U.S. ports less vulnerable to terrorist attacks.

Because of that investment, Skinner's report said, the agency has "raised the overall bar of preparedness but it is not clear that DHS knows now much actual risk reduction has been achieved."

__

On the Net:

Homeland Security Department: http://www.dhs.gov/

DOJ_NMG_0016518

Washington Wire (WSJ)

By John R. Wilke, June Kronholz, Gary Fields, And Greg Jaffe

Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

March 6, 2006, 4:13 pm Smooth Sailing Predicted for AT&T Deal

Philip Verveer, who filed the lawsuit that led to the 1984 breakup of the Bell System monopoly, said he doesn't expect the Justice Department to block AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion buyout of BellSouth Corp.

"This is a reassembly of many of the pieces we worked to take apart," said Verveer, who led the first Justice Department team that prosecuted the AT&T case. "But the circumstances are completely different today."

The wave of technological innovation that followed the breakup has fundamentally changed the game, said Verveer, now a partner at Willkie Farr & Gallagher in Washington, where he represents communications companies including cable and satellite firms. Antitrust enforcers have already allowed the former Bells to buy their local-phone rivals and last year were permitted to take over long-distance providers AT&T and MCI, he noted. As a result, "there is simply not enough to block or significantly reconfigure this deal."

Verveer, who left Justice before the case was settled to become a top FCC regulator, said the broader concern is whether the Bells and others will continue to compete and innovate in providing broadband Internet-access service.

Verveer, now 62 years old, said he expects the FCC to require that AT&T accept the "net neutrality" nondiscrimination principles that it adopted last fall. "The critical issue for society and the economy is whether there will be a workably competitive environment for broadband," he said. "It's an essential service, and if it's not competitive, then inevitably there will be calls for new regulation."

Read more about the deal. Compare telecom titans AT&T, Verizon, read the transcript of AT&T's conference call and see a graphic on the new telecom sector. Plus, should regulators approve the deal?

March 6, 2006, 4:12 pm Chertoff Focuses on Chinese Illegals

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff plans a trip to China later this month to convince Beijing to take back illegal immigrants picked up by U.S. immigration authorities.

Chertoff has been pushing a catch-and-return policy on illegal immigrants from China and elsewhere since taking office last year. In an interview with Wall Street Journal reporters and editors, he said many Latin American countries are starting to streamline their repatriation programs, particularly Honduras and Guatemala. But China remains a problem that could grow over time, he said.

Chertoff estimated that U.S. authorities hold 19,000 Chinese illegal immigrants who the Chinese government hasn't repatriated for reasons it hasn't explained. He also said the problem is brewing with India, too. If left unchecked, it could become a major problem as more Chinese and Indian illegals make their way to the U.S. and the U.S. authorities run out of detention space. "How much is bureaucracy and how much is other motives" he said he can't tell. But governments move fast when they want to, he added.

March 6, 2006, 2:46 pm Police to Walk the Washington Beat

Top police executives from around the country are arriving in Washington Monday and Tuesday to ask Congress to restore cuts in law enforcement spending contained in the Bush budget plan.

The International Association of Chiefs of Police, which represents 18,000 law enforcement police chiefs and executives, is leading the effort. An IACP analysis of the budget for fiscal 2007 shows that assistance to local law enforcement agencies would be reduced to $1.535 billion from $2.609 billion in fiscal 2006. Community Oriented Policing for instance, was cut to $102 million from $478 million and local block grant programs for law enforcement has been zeroed out altogether from $416 million in the current year.

March 6, 2006, 11:40 am An Army of Enough

The Army hit its recruiting goals for February — the ninth month in a row that it has made its recruiting numbers, senior Army officials said. The service plans to announce that it reached its goal later this week. The active-duty Army, Army National Guard and reserves all missed their recruiting goals last year.

This year, the Army's numbers have been buoyed by the presence of more recruiters and bigger enlistment bonuses. It's still not clear that the Army will make its recruiting numbers for the year. Typically the summer months, following high school graduations, are the most crucial. But service officials are optimistic they can make both the active duty and National Guard numbers for the year — a big change from this time last year when the Army was struggling to meet its goals for the winter months.

The Supreme Court's 8-0 ruling Monday on university recruiting isn't expected to have much effect on the military's numbers. The court decided that in order to retain federal funding, universities must allow military recruiters on campus even though their ban on homosexuals violates the schools' equal-employment policies. The opinion by Chief Justice Roberts found no First Amendment violation by the Solomon Amendment, the law requiring that the military have access equal to other employers recruiting on campus, in part because the schools remain free to express their opposition to the military's antigay policies.

DOJ_NMG_0016519

Guards Fault Homeland Security Protection (WP)

By Larry Margasak

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Guards at the Department of Homeland Security say the agency mishandled a potential anthrax attack on its headquarters, one of several incidents that led two senators to request an investigation of the agency's own security.

The private guards complained that inadequate training led to confusion in handling bomb and biological threats and failure to stop test vehicles that were sent to checkpoints with improper identification.

"I wouldn't feel safe nowhere on this compound as an officer," former guard Derrick Daniels told The Associated Press. Daniels was employed until last fall by Wackenhut Services Inc., the private firm that protects a Homeland Security complex that includes sensitive, classified information.

An envelope with suspicious powder was opened last fall at the headquarters. Daniels and other current and former guards said they were shocked when superiors carried it past the office of Secretary Michael Chertoff, took it outside and then shook it outside Chertoff's window without evacuating people nearby.

The scare, caused by white powder that proved to be harmless, "stands as one glaring example" of the agency's security problems, Daniels said. "I had never previously been given training ... describing how to respond to a possible chemical attack."

"If the allegations brought forward by the whistleblowers are correct, they represent both a security threat and a waste of taxpayer dollars," Democratic Sens. Byron Dorgan of North Dakota and Ron Wyden of Oregon wrote to the agency's inspector general, seeking an investigation.

"It would be ironic, to say the least, if DHS were unable to secure its own headquarters," they wrote.

The IG's office had no immediate response to the request.

Homeland Security spokesman Brian Doyle said Wackenhut guards are still operating under a contract signed with the Navy, and the agency has little control over their training. A soon-to-be-implemented replacement contract will impose new requirements on security guards, he said.

Daniels, saying he was among the first guards to respond to the white powder incident, said the area where the powder was found wasn't evacuated for more than an hour. Available biohazard face shields went unused. When a belated order was given to evacuate the area, employees had already gone to lunch and had to be rounded up and quarantined.

Doyle, the Homeland spokesman, said the concerns were overblown because all mail going to the Homeland Security complex is irradiated to kill anthrax. "The incident was resolved before anything was moved," he said.

Daniels now works security for another company at another federal building. He is among 14 current and former Wackenhut employees _ mostly guards _ who were interviewed by The Associated Press or submitted written statements to Congress that were obtained by AP.

Wackenhut President Dave Foley disputed the allegations, saying officers have a minimum of one year's security experience, proper security clearances and training in vehicle screening, identification of personnel, handling of suspicious items and emergency response.

"In short, we believe our security personnel have been properly trained, have responded correctly to the various incidents that have occurred ... and that this facility is secure," Foley said. He declined, however, to discuss any of the current or former employees who have become whistleblowers.

A litany of problems were listed by the guards, whose pay ranges from $15.60 to $23 an hour based on their position and level of security clearance. Among their examples of lax security:

_They have no training in responding to attacks with weapons of mass destruction.

_Chemical-sniffing dogs have been replaced with ineffective equipment that falsely indicates the presence of explosives.

_Vehicle entrances to Homeland Security's complex are lightly guarded.

_Guards with radios have trouble hearing each other, or have no radios, no batons and no pepper spray, leaving them with few options beyond lethal force with their handguns.

Wackenhut is no stranger to criticism.

Over the last two years, the Energy Department inspector general concluded that Wackenhut guards had thwarted simulated terrorist attacks at a nuclear lab only after they were tipped off to the test; and that guards had improperly handled the transport of nuclear and conventional weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0016520

Homeland Security is based at a gated, former Navy campus near American University _ several miles from the heavily trafficked streets that house the FBI, Capitol, Treasury Department and White House.

Former guard Bryan Adams recognized his inadequate training one day last August, when an employee reported a suspicious bag in the parking lot.

"I didn't have a clue about what to do," he said.

Adams said he closed the vehicle checkpoint with a cone, walked over to the bag and called superiors. Nobody cordoned off the area. Eventually, someone called a federal bomb squad, which arrived more than an hour after the discovery.

"If the bag had, in fact, contained the explosive device that was anticipated, the bomb could have detonated several times over in the hour that the bag sat there," Adams said.

The bag, it turned out, contained gym clothes.

Doyle, the Homeland spokesman, responded to several allegations raised by the guards. He said dogs were replaced because "if you overuse them, their effectiveness drops." The detection equipment that substitutes for the dogs is a better method for detecting explosives, he said.

Guards who used the equipment said it was no match for the reliability of the dogs.

The AP videotaped two vehicle entrances at Homeland headquarters with light security.

One is guarded only during morning and evening rush hours. Movable metal barriers and an unmanned security vehicle only partially blocked the driveway, leaving enough room for a small car or motorcycle to drive through.

Another entrance was guarded with a manned vehicle with two guards but no other barriers.

Doyle said the vehicle entrances were adequate because, in all cases, a 10-foot fence topped with barbed wire separates vehicles from all buildings.

Some guards who continue to work at Homeland, who would speak only on condition of anonymity because of fear of losing their jobs, said they knew of two instances in which individuals without identification got into the sensitive complex.

Another described how guards flunked a test by the Secret Service, which sent vehicles into the compound with dummy government identification tags hanging from inside mirrors. Guards cleared such vehicles through on two occasions, this guard said, and one officer even copied down the false information without realizing it was supposed to match information on the employee's government badge.

Doyle, the agency spokesman, said such tests are conducted routinely. "I can assure you that if people fail the test they are let go," he said.

Marixa Farrar, a former guard, said two guards always should have been stationed inside the main building where Chertoff had his office, but she often was on duty alone.

One day last fall a fire alarm rang. As employees walked by Farrar, they asked if this was a fire or a test.

"There were no radios, so I couldn't figure out if it was a serious alarm," she said.

There was no fire.

Driver At UNC Cites Vengeance For Muslims (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

CHAPEL HILL, N.C., March 6 -- A University of North Carolina graduate from Iran, accused of running down nine people on campus to avenge the treatment of Muslims, said at a hearing Monday that he was "thankful for the opportunity to spread the will of Allah."

Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar was accused of driving a sport-utility vehicle through the Pit, a popular campus gathering spot, injuring nine people Friday. None of the victims was seriously hurt.

University Police Chief Derek Poarch said Taheri-azar told investigators he intentionally hit people to "avenge the deaths of Muslims around the world." In a 911 call after the incident, Taheri-azar said he wanted to "punish the government of the United States for their actions around the world."

Taheri-azar, 22, appeared in Orange County District Court on nine counts of attempted murder and nine counts of assault.

His bail was set at $5.5 million and he was assigned a public defender, but he said after the hearing: "The truth is my lawyer."

Taheri-azar graduated from North Carolina in December after studying psychology and philosophy. Investigators believe he has spent most of his life in the United States.

On campus, UNC students held what they called an "anti-terrorism" rally. "We don't want terrorism here, and we're not going to stand for that where we live and where we go to school," said Kris Wampler, a student at UNC and member of the College Republicans, which helped organize the rally.

DOJ_NMG_0016521

About 50 students attended the rally, including several Muslim students who debated with organizers and said Taheri-azar had not been linked to any terrorist group.

"When you think in terms of a global context, this was an isolated incident," said student Khurram Bilal Tariq, 22.

Stephen Mann, an 18-year-old freshman, said he was not singling out Islam with his call to label Friday's incident terrorism. He said a member of any religion who did what Taheri-azar is accused of doing should be called a terrorist.

"If you try to hurt someone in the name of a cause, that's terrorism," he said.

UNC Grad Driven To Kill (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

An Iranian native and recent University of North Carolina graduate admitted that his motive for driving a rental car across the UNC campus was to kill people.

Friday afternoon, Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar, 22, admittedly drove his rented Jeep Cherokee through a heavily trafficked section of the UNC campus known as "the Pit," injuring nine.

When asked by reporters if he was trying to kill his victims, Mr. Taheri-azar said, "Yes."

No one was seriously hurt in the vehicular ambush, and some are loathe to call it an act of terror. However, Mr. Taheri-azar apparently disagrees. After turning himself in Friday, he told authorities his attack was designed to "avenge the deaths of Muslims around the world," according to a statement from police Chief Derek Poarch.

The UNC's Department of Public Safety charged Mr. Taheri-azar with nine counts of attempted murder and "nine counts of assault with a deadly weapon inflicting serious injury with intent to kill."

Mr. Taheri-azar could, if convicted, face more than 100 years in prison. He is being held on $5.5 million bail.

When asked by The Washington Times as to why Mr. Taheri-azar was not charged with terrorism, Chief Poarch's office said the investigation is ongoing and additional charges may yet be filed.

When asked by Orange County District Court Judge Patricia Devine if he had any questions, Mr. Taheri-azar said, "I actually don't have any questions. I am thankful you are going to hear this trial to learn more about the will of Allah, the creator."

After leaving court, Mr. Taheri-azar said his attack was, "the will of Allah, the creator."

He said he intends to defend himself at his scheduled March 16 hearing.

But was it a terrorist attack?

"I think we are edging closer to that," said UNC professor Cori Dauber, "It's clear that he was trying to kill people." She hopes the FBI and the terrorism task force will release details about what was found inside Mr. Taheri-azar's apartment during their investigation and whether he received training from terrorist Web sites.

The question of terrorism is already sparking a debate on campus. UNC senior Kris Wampler organized an anti-terrorism protest on campus yesterday that attracted dozens of students. "The university is very pro-Islamic, and it's been that way the whole time I've been here," Mr. Wampler said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Wampler thinks Mr. Taheri-azar's comments add fuel to the terrorist angle. "I think it really does justify what we're saying," Mr. Wampler said. "I hope he keeps talking. He's just building the case."

UNC's Muslim student association said Mr. Taheri-azar was not a member of the group and denounced his actions on its Web site Friday.

"Regardless of what his intentions prove to be, we wholeheartedly deplore this action," the group said on its site.

A statement from University Chancellor James Moeser described the attack as a "contemptible act of violence," but stopped short of calling it terrorism.

White House Defends Levee Reconstruction (AP-Y2)

By Nedra Pickler

AP2, March 6, 2006

The White House on Monday defended the quality of materials being used to rebuild the levees around New Orleans, as President Bush got assurances from the Army Corps of Engineers that it was on track to restore the system by the start of hurricane season.

Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, head of the Army Corps, told Bush in a private briefing that 100 miles of the 169 miles of levees damaged by the Aug. 29 hurricane have been restored. He repeated the briefing later for reporters at the White House.

Strock took issue with findings from two teams of independent experts who said the Corps was taking shortcuts and using substandard materials, leaving large sections of the system substantially weaker than before the hurricane.

"We are using the right kind of materials," Strock said. "There is no question about that."

DOJ_NMG_0016522

The findings, first reported Monday in The Washington Post, were made by engineers on a National Science Foundation-funded panel and by a Louisiana team appointed to monitor the rebuilding.

Strock said the Corps had yet to see the findings or information on where the teams took their samples. He suggested the monitors may have been testing the wrong soil. He said the Corps is trucking in clay from Mississippi to rebuild the system because the local soil does not meet quality standards.

Strock acknowledged that the levees will not be able to protect low-lying areas in the event of another Katrina-like storm this year.

"If we were going to have another Katrina-like event, I think I can say with a high level of confidence you wouldn't see the catastrophic flooding that we saw in the first event," Strock said. "You would see overtopping, though, of levees. You would see flooding in low-lying areas."

Strock said the president, who is visiting the Gulf Coast Wednesday, told him he appreciated the Corps' work and that it was meeting the commitments that he made to restore the levees in time for the next hurricane season.

"He expressed confidence that we're doing that," Strock said. "So I think that he's comfortable with where we are."

White House press secretary Scott McClellan also rejected allegations of inferior rebuilding.

"The Corps of Engineers is using modern design and construction methods, which have greatly improved the last 40 years, which is the time when those levees were originally built," McClellan said.

The White House also defended Bush on Monday against fresh criticism that he was disengaged and uninformed in the run-up to Katrina's landfall.

Last week's reports about Federal Emergency Management Agency briefings, particularly before Katrina hit, prompted fresh criticism by lawmakers who said the government should have been better prepared for the storm that flooded New Orleans and killed more than 1,300 people. A video of an Aug. 28 briefing showed officials warning Bush and others that the storm might overtop levees, put lives at risk in the Superdome and overwhelm rescuers.

McClellan said the criticism of Bush for not asking questions during the video ignores the fact that before the videoconference he had been on the phone with governors in the region and received updates from then-FEMA chief Michael Brown and his own staff. Bush got on the videoconference to boost morale, not collect information, McClellan said, and he left before it ended for a previously scheduled press event at which he made a statement on the hurricane.

"Some have twisted the facts to fit a story line," McClellan said. "He was not there to participate in the full briefing. He was there for that purpose: to lift their spirits."

McClellan also said that referring to Bush's statement four days after the storm that "I don't think anybody anticipated the breach of the levees," ignores the explanations given by the White House and Bush himself about what he meant.

"What the president was referring to was the sense that, after the storm had initially passed, that there was a sense that that worst-case scenario had not happened," McClellan said. "Some have taken it out of context to suggest he was referring to any predictions before the hurricane hit."

Clarification (WP)

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

In the March 4 editorial "Caught on Tape," on the leaked video of a White House briefing before Hurricane Katrina made landfall, we wrote that there was no evidence President Bush, after being briefed on the predicted damage, had asked follow-up questions. In fact, the full transcript shows that after Mr. Bush left the conference, some of his advisers, including Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, did ask about the involvement of the military and other preparedness issues.

FCC, Others Face Katrina Phone Problems (AP-Y2)

By Holbrook Mohr

AP2, March 6, 2006

Downed telephone lines and damaged cellular towers left emergency crews confused and isolated in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, experts told federal regulators Monday.

Julliette Saussy, director of Emergency Medical Service of New Orleans, said communications eroded as the waters rose and only got worse.

"Surrounded by water and stranded ourselves, our worst fears were realized," Saussy told members of an independent panel gathering information to be presented to the FCC in June.

"We had no way to communicate except by line of sight. Our radios were not operable, most land lines and cell phones were useless and our communications centers were under water. When help arrived we could not communicate with them either," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0016523

Some 3 million telephone lines were knocked out as the violent storm hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said.

At least 38 911 call centers went down, and more than 1,000 cellular towers were out of service. As many as 20,000 calls failed to go through the day after the storm, and about 100 TV and radio stations were knocked off the air, he said.

Martin said he hopes the panel's work will help strengthen communications throughout the nation, especially in areas vulnerable to natural disasters.

Harlin McEwen, chairman of the Communications and Technology Committee of the International Association of Police Chiefs, described Katrina's destruction as overwhelming.

"Usually, what happens is you have other resources surrounding where the incident occurred to come to the aid of those that are in need," McEwen said. "When you have an issue like Katrina, that affects three states and where much of the public safety infrastructure was wiped out ... that's a different issue."

In Jackson County, Miss., many first responders lacked the training in using backup systems such as satellite phones, said 911 director George Sholl.

Keith Parker, director of the National Association of Emergency Medical Service Officials, said the Mississippi Department of Health couldn't even reach local EMS agencies during the storm.

"The lack of communication created times of confusion and chaos," he said. "There will always be catastrophic events, the question is will we be better prepared for the next one."

Members Struck By Gulf Devastation (RC)

By Suzanne Nelson

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

NEW ORLEANS — By almost any measure, what awaited the 34 House Members on last week's Congressional delegation as their bus approached the Royal Senesta Hotel on Bourbon Street was poor preparation for the rest of their trip.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Envoy Offers Bleak View Of Situation In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The top U.S. envoy to Iraq said Monday that the 2003 toppling of Saddam Hussein's regime had opened a "Pandora's box" of volatile ethnic and sectarian tensions that could engulf the region in all-out war and disrupt the global economy if America were to extricate itself from the country too soon.

In remarks that were among the frankest and bleakest public assessments of the Iraqi situation by a high-level American official, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said the "potential is there" for sectarian violence to become all-out civil war, but that Iraq for now had pulled back from that prospect after the wave of sectarian reprisals for the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

"If another incident (occurs), Iraq is really vulnerable to it at this time, in my judgment," Khalilzad said, in an interview with correspondents of the Los Angeles Times Baghdad bureau and a visiting editor.

Abandoning Iraq in the way the U.S. disengaged from civil wars in Lebanon, Afghanistan and Somalia could have dramatic global repercussions, he said.

"We have opened the Pandora's Box and the question is, what is the way forward?" Khalilzad said. The way forward, in my view, is an effort to build bridges across these communities."

Khalilzad's central message of maintaining a U.S. presence in Iraq jibed with Bush administration policy. But he offered a far gloomier justification for it than assessments made in recent days by U.S. military spokesmen.

On Sunday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said in a televised interview that things in Iraq are "going very, very well, from everything you look at."

Khalilzad's comments came just before key U.S. decisions are expected on whether the situation in Iraq has improved enough to allow for a reduction of U.S. forces this year.

Army Gens. John P. Abizaid and George W. Casey, the top U.S. commanders in Iraq, plan to meet with President Bush as early as this week to make troop levels recommendations

Military officials must decide this month whether to cancel scheduled deployments of several Army combat brigades -- a decision that would lead to a reduction in the total number of U.S. troops in Iraq by mid-year from about 130,000 to about 100,000. For nearly a year, Gen. Casey has said that a "substantial reduction" of U.S. troops could occur in 2006, and pointed to spring as the time when the critical decisions would be made.

DOJ_NMG_0016524

A reduction would signal the Bush administration's confidence in progress in the country. On Friday, however, Casey said that war planners factoring the recent violence is "certainly something that we will consider in our decisions."

Without touching on the issue of troop-reduction, Khalilzad described a highly flammable atmosphere in Iraq that dates at least to the highly polarizing Dec. 15 elections that handed Shiites a dominant share of authority.

"Right now there's a vacuum of authority, and there's a lot of distrust," said the diplomat, who is among the architects of the U.S. plan to reshape the political balance of the Middle East following the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

The Samarra bombing and the subsequent outbreak of violent reprisals by Shiites against Sunnis demonstrated that insurgents fully understand Iraq's fragility and will seek to exploit it, he said.

"Khalilzad, who actively and publicly is involved in government talks, repeated his weeks-long assertion that the best way to prevent civil war or large-scale sectarian violence is to form a government of national unity drawing from all of Iraq's disparate groups as a way "to build trust and narrow the fault line that exists" between Shiite and Sunni.

In any case, Khalilzad said the U.S. has little choice but to maintain a strong presence in Iraq, or risk a regional conflict with Arabs siding with Sunnis and Iranians backing Shiite co-religionists in what could be a more-encompassing version of the 1980s Iran-Iraq war, which left as many as 1 million people dead. He described a worst-case scenario in which religious extremists could take over sections of Iraq and begin to expand outward.

"That would make Taliban Afghanistan look like child's play," said Khalilzad, an American of Afghan descent who served as U.S. envoy to Kabul, the Afghan capital, before taking on the post in Baghdad.

"What we've described reflects the aspirations of the people," he said. "If we were at variance with the aspirations of the people we'd be in trouble."

Khalilzad said U.S. officials have tried to enlist the support of governments of neighboring countries, even exploring "modalities of setting up a meeting" with Iran, which he said had been unhelpful in securing Iraq.

On Monday, Iraqi politicians continued to wrangle over the composition of a new government. President Jalal Talabani announced a decision to convene parliament on Sunday, only to be quickly countered by Shiite political leaders who asked him to postpone the session.

Shiites have nominated interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to serve a full term. Kurds have pushed to derail his candidacy.

Khalilzad described such day-to-day political jousting as healthy. "They are bargaining; They are shadow-boxing," he said. "This is a much better way than with guns."

Still, the politics of the gun spoke loudly Monday.

Violence, much of it with sectarian overtones, left at least 18 Iraqis dead across the country as multiple car bombs exploded across the capital. One U.S. soldier was reported killed in a combat incident in western Iraq.

Maj. Gen. Mubdir Hatam Jabouri, commander of the Iraqi Army in Baghdad, was killed by a single bullet to the neck while driving through western Baghdad in a lengthy vehicle convoy shortly after 5 p.m., said Mohammed Askari, an adviser to the Defense Ministry.

Jabouri, a Sunni Arab, commanded a force that is seen by many as a counterweight to those of the Interior Ministry, whose Shiite Muslim-dominated police and commando units have been accused of extrajudicial killings.

The U.S. military reported Monday that a U.S. soldier had died Sunday as a result of "enemy action." The soldier was killed in rural western Iraq, but much of the insurgent violence in the country has shifted to religiously diverse urban areas, said a U.S. official who requested anonymity.

On Monday, a car bomb in a crowded market of downtown Baqubah, a religiously mixed provincial capital 45 miles northeast of the capital, killed at least six people, including two children, and injured 21. The bomb exploded as police and passersby gathered near a murder scene, one of three fatal shootings reported in Baqubah.

Gunmen killed three Shiite laborers in the Sunni town of Hawija, near the northern city of Kirkuk. A roadside bomb targeting a U.S. patrol in Mosul killed one Iraqi civilian bystander.

At least two car bombs and sporadic mortar fire shook the capital. A car bomb near a bank killed one person and injured five in the Dora district, a religiously mixed area on Baghdad's southern edge.

Gunmen kidnapped a prominent university professor. Dr. Ali Hussein Khafaji, dean of the Engineering College at Mustansirya University, was abducted by two carloads of men as he left his home.

U.S. Is Seeking Better Balance In Iraqi Police (NYT)

By Edward Wong

DOJ_NMG_0016525

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 6 — As the threat of full-scale sectarian strife looms, the American military is scrambling to try to weed out ethnic or religious partisans from the Iraqi security forces.

The United States faces the possibility that it has been arming one side in a prospective civil war. Early on, Americans ceded operational control of the police to the Iraqi government. Now, the police forces are overseen at the highest levels by religious Shiite parties with militias, and reports of uniformed death squads have risen sharply in the past year.

The American military is trying an array of possible solutions, including quotas to increase the number of Sunni Arab recruits in police academies, firing Shiite police commanders who appear to tolerate militias, and sending 200 training teams composed of military police officers or former civilian police officers to Iraqi stations, even in remote and risky locations.

There is no quick or painless fix. The efforts risk alienating Shiite politicians, who have fiercely resisted attempts to wrest away their control of the security forces. The moves may appeal, though, to recalcitrant Sunni Arabs, whom the Americans want to draw into the political process.

Trying to reform the police forces could take years, because sectarian loyalties have become entrenched, and police officers are rooted in their communities, senior military officials acknowledge. Critics say American efforts to train the Iraqi police also continue to be hampered by a shortage of troops and civilian advisers.

Several of the initiatives, such as enrolling more Sunni Arab students in police academies, have been going on for months. Others, such as the deployment of the new police training teams, are just beginning on a large scale. The wave of sectarian violence that followed the bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22 has heightened the urgency of the measures.

After the bombing, mobs led by Shiite militiamen attacked dozens of Sunni mosques and left hundreds dead. Many police units stood aside, either out of confusion or sectarian loyalties, according to Iraqi witnesses. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top American commander in Iraq, said Friday that police officers had allowed militiamen through checkpoints in eastern Baghdad, where much of the violence occurred.

The Iraqi Army poses less of a problem than the police, because the American military has direct operational control over it, and because the Americans took more care in building it up. Kurdish militiamen, though, make up a significant part of it.

The military's efforts to revamp the police are taking place alongside a strong push by the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, to press Iraqi politicians who are forming the new government to appoint a nonsectarian figure as head of the Interior Ministry, which controls the police.

"When you're forming a government, you can't form it with any kind of sectarian element," said Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, commander of the Fourth Infantry Division, charged with controlling Baghdad. "That's got to be put aside, particularly with military forces." The attempts to erase sectarianism dovetail with a broader American initiative to strengthen police training this year by diverting more resources away from mentoring the Iraqi Army. The military hopes to have 200,000 Iraqi police officers in place by early 2007.

The development of the police is in some ways more crucial than that of the army, because the Americans want the police to handle all security inside Iraq.

The units believed to be most plagued by militia recruitment and sectarian loyalties are the police paramilitary forces, which have a total of 17,500 members, the American military says. The regular blue-uniformed police force numbers 89,000, and the border force totals 20,000. But there are serious doubts about whether anyone has an accurate overall tally.

The paramilitary forces are divided three ways — the commandos, the public order brigades and a mechanized brigade that will soon be shifted to the army. Matthew Sherman, a former Interior Ministry adviser, said Shiite parties were especially keen to seize control of those forces because they can operate anywhere in the country and have great autonomy.

The Interior Ministry is accused of sponsoring death squads in police or paramilitary uniforms. Mr. Khalilzad has been outspoken in his criticism of the interior minister, Bayan Jabr, and hinted last month that the Americans may withhold financing if sectarianism continues to dominate the security forces.

Officials at the most powerful Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, which oversees the Interior Ministry, have lashed out at the Americans, arguing that the majority Shiites had every right to control security, because Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated government had used the army and the police to abduct, torture and kill Shiites.

"The Shiites were beheaded by the security forces before, and we are not ready to be beheaded again," said Hadi al-Amiri, the head of the Badr Organization, the Supreme Council's Iranian-trained militia. "We can relinquish any part of the government except for the security forces."

American commanders say they have recently learned that virtually all the members of the 7,700-member public order brigades, which do light infantry duty, were Shiites. The brigades were founded in 2004, and were expanded after the Supreme Council took control of the Interior Ministry in early 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0016526

"When we stood them up, we didn't ask, 'Are you Sunni or are you Shia?' " Maj. Gen. Joseph D. Peterson, in charge of police training, said in an interview at a base in Taji, north of Baghdad, as he was visiting soldiers newly assigned to the Iraqi police. "They ended up being 99 percent Shia. Now, when we look at that, we say, 'They do not reflect the population of Iraq.' "

No accurate census of Iraq exists, but the country is believed to be about 60 percent Shiite Arab, 20 percent Sunni Arab and 20 percent Kurdish (most Kurds are Sunni.)

Americans officials have pushed the Interior Ministry to diversify the forces. All recruits in the public order brigades have to go through a six- or seven-week training course, with 1,200 in each class.

The Americans ensured that the last three classes enrolled greater numbers of Sunni Arabs: The first of those was 42 percent Sunni Arab, the second 92 percent Sunni and the third, just starting, was virtually all Sunni, General Peterson said.

American officers say that when they try to talk to Iraqi commanders about the religious or ethnic breakdown of the forces, the commanders tend to shy away from those conversations, as most Iraqis do, saying they prefer to think of themselves as one people rather than in terms of sect.

Col. Gordon B. Davis, the top adviser to the public order brigades, said the senior commander of that force, a Shiite Arab from the old Iraqi Army, addressed the issue only with much reluctance. " 'You shouldn't be talking like this,' he tells us," the colonel said in an interview at the Iraqi command base in Baghdad's Kadhimiya neighborhood.

Colonel Davis said his advisers had no qualms about removing Iraqi commanders if it became evident they have sectarian loyalties.

For much of last year, the Second Public Order Brigade had a particularly bad reputation. It was accused by many Iraqis, especially Sunni Arabs, of detainee torture and illegal killings. Its ranks were filled with men recruited from eastern Baghdad who were loyal to Moktada al-Sadr, the firebrand Shiite cleric who had led two rebellions against the Americans.

The head of the brigade was the former police chief of Nasiriya, a southern city under the sway of hard-line Shiite parties, and was "rumored to tolerate" militias, Colonel Davis said. The Americans replaced him with a Sunni Arab commander in December, who then fired 160 people below him, presumably because those men had suspected militia ties, the colonel said. Since then, he added, officers have removed images of Mr. Sadr from gunstocks and vehicles.

In contrast to the public order brigades, the police commandos, an 8,300-member force that was founded in 2004 under a Sunni-led Interior Ministry, are more diverse, American commanders said. Many came from the old Iraqi Army, which had an officer corps dominated by Sunni Arabs, and from the domestic security services, which Saddam Hussein used to terrorize the population.

The commandos and the public order brigades essentially perform the same job, and will soon be combined as members of the "national police."

Mr. Sherman, though, said the commandos also have significant numbers of Shiites loyal to the Supreme Council. Maj. Gen. Adnan Thabit, a Sunni Arab, is the head of the commandos in name only, he said, having ceded control to Shiite partisans. "They've just taken a more kind of political bent over the past 10 months or so," said Mr. Sherman, the former Interior Ministry adviser.

The Americans hope that new mentorship programs this year will result in greater oversight of the police. For the last year, the police paramilitary units have had 11-member American military adviser teams assigned to them at the division, brigade and battalion command levels. That program will soon be bolstered by sending regular American troops into the field with the police.

"It's a huge difference, because now you've got a battalion partnering with another battalion," General Peterson said. "Instead of just 11 guys, you have that entire battalion, 500 or 600 guys."

In addition, the American command is reorganizing thousands of members of the American military police and former civilian police officers who are currently working with the Iraqi police in Iraq. Most are now based at police academies or high-level headquarters.

Under the new plan, they will be sent across the country to smaller police stations, some in remote areas. There are a total of 200 teams, with the first already dispatched to more volatile areas like Baquba, northeast of Baghdad.

A senior American officer, who works with the Iraqi police and army units, said that, in handling the surge in violence after the shrine bombing, Iraqi units with American trainers attached generally performed better than those without. But many police units still lack American advisers, in part because finding experienced trainers willing to spend long periods attached to police units has been hard.

"It should be obvious that the presence of our embedded advisory teams in the army and police forces were an important stabilizing influence," said the officer, who was not authorized to speak publicly on this matter. "The question becomes how long that stabilizing influence is necessary."

Majority In U.S. Fears Iraq Civil War (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0016527

By Richard Morin

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

An overwhelming majority of Americans believe that fighting between Sunni and Shiite Muslims in Iraq will lead to civil war, and half say the United States should begin withdrawing its forces from that violence-torn country, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll.

The survey found that 80 percent believe that recent sectarian violence makes civil war in Iraq likely, and more than a third say such a conflict is "very likely" to occur. These expectations extend beyond party lines: More than seven in 10 Republicans and eight in 10 Democrats and political independents say they believe such a conflict is coming.

In the face of continuing violence, half -- 52 percent -- of those surveyed said the United States should begin withdrawing forces. One in six favors immediate withdrawal of all troops, however, while about one-third prefer a more gradual return.

The survey also found growing doubt that the Bush administration has a strategy in Iraq. Two-thirds of those interviewed said they do not think the president has a clear plan for handling the Iraq situation, the highest level of doubt recorded since the question was first asked three years ago. But an even larger share -- 70 percent -- questions whether Democrats in Congress have a plan for dealing with Iraq, suggesting Americans see neither party as offering a coherent exit strategy.

The survey highlights how support for the war in Iraq dissolved since the first months after the U.S. invasion. At the end of 2003, nearly six in 10 -- 59 percent -- said the conflict was worth the cost; today, 42 percent share that view. In the past nine months, the proportion in Post-ABC polls who say the United States should begin withdrawing its troops has increased from 38 percent to a 52 percent majority.

Recent U.S. reversals in Iraq have not dramatically reduced overall support for President Bush, in contrast to some other national polls. His overall job approval rating stood at 41 percent, essentially unchanged from January. Nearly six in 10 disapproved of his job performance, the 11th consecutive survey since last April in which at least half the country has been critical of Bush's leadership.

In only one area -- terrorism -- does more than half of the public see Bush positively, and even here 46 percent disapprove while 52 percent approve. On every other issue tested in the poll -- including the economy, international affairs and health care -- Bush received negative marks.

Americans also expressed disappointment with Congress, which is now controlled by Republicans. Slightly more than a third -- 36 percent -- said they approve of the way Congress is doing its job, down seven percentage points in the past five weeks and the lowest marks for the legislative branch since October 1997.

But the survey showed Democrats slipping also. Asked which party they trust to deal with the country's biggest problems, 42 percent said the Democratic Party and 40 percent said the GOP. Barely five weeks ago, Democrats held a 14-point advantage.

Americans continue to fault the administration's performance in Iraq. Well under half -- 40 percent -- think Bush is doing a good job there, unchanged from late January but still down six points from December. Nearly six in 10 -- 57 percent -- said the war was not worth fighting, marking the 12th consecutive poll since December 2004 in which a majority said invading Iraq was a mistake.

In question after question, the new survey reflected a sharp decline in optimism, perhaps sparked by the sectarian violence that has flared in Iraq after the bombings of a revered Shiite mosque two weeks ago. Since then, deadly confrontations have occurred between Shiites and Sunnis, who are a minority in Iraq but were favored under Saddam Hussein's regime.

The poll found that 56 percent think the United States is not making significant progress toward restoring civil order in Iraq, while 43 percent think that stability is being reestablished -- a 17-point drop in optimism since December and the most pessimistic reading on this question since it was first asked in June 2004.

The nation is split down the middle over whether the United States is moving ahead toward establishing a democratic government in Iraq. About half, 49 percent, say the United States is making progress on the political front, with 48 percent saying the nation and its allies are not gaining ground. Shortly after the December elections, almost two in three Americans said the country was making significant progress toward democracy.

Over the weekend, pressure mounted on Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari to give up his bid for a new term, a move that would add to the political turmoil engulfing Iraq.

Although news from Iraq has not been good, the survey suggests Bush has been helped somewhat by improving perceptions of the U.S. economy. Forty-three percent believe the economy is either excellent or good, up from 35 percent four months ago. And nearly half -- 48 percent -- of the country approve of the way Bush is handling the economy, 12 points higher than in November. Still, slightly more than half (51 percent) disapprove.

Bush's standing in other areas is mixed as well. More than six in 10 disapprove of the way he handled Hurricane Katrina, a nine-point increase since early September. A growing majority (58 percent) also disapproves of the way he is dealing with the prescription drug issue. But his overall approval ratings on terrorism (52 percent), health care (38 percent), international affairs (44 percent) and ethics in government (40 percent) remain basically unchanged from recent Post-ABC polls.

DOJ_NMG_0016528

Perceptions of Democrats, who have struggled to take advantage of Bush's lack of popularity, declined on several measures. In late January, Democrats held a clear advantage over Republicans -- 55 to 37 percent -- on which party could best handle the economy. In the new poll, Democrats still led, but by 49 to 40 percent.

The survey found a similar shift on Iraq. In January, Democrats had an advantage of 47 to 40 percent on which party could better handle the situation there, but the new poll found Americans evenly divided -- 42 percent on each side -- on that question.

A total of 1,000 randomly selected Americans were interviewed March 2 to 5. The margin of sampling error for the overall results is plus or minus three percentage points.

Assistant polling director Claudia Deane and staff writer Dan Balz contributed to this report.

Iraqi President Loses Try For Parliament (AP)

By Bassem Mroue, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

Iraq's president failed in a bid Monday to order parliament into session by March 12, further delaying formation of a government and raising questions whether the political process can withstand the unrelenting violence or disintegrate into civil war.

The deadlock came as snipers assassinated Maj. Gen. Mibder Hatim al-Dulaimi, the Sunni Arab in charge of Iraqi forces protecting the capital. A torrent of bombings and shootings killed 25 more Iraqis on Monday, ending a relative lull in violence. Officials also found four bodies.

At the heart of the dispute is a controversy over the second-term candidacy of the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose most powerful supporter is the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

The Sunni Arab minority blames al-Jaafari for failing to control the Shiite militiamen who attacked Sunni mosques and clerics after the Feb. 22 shrine bombing in Samarra. Kurds are angry because they believe al-Jaafari is holding up resolution of their claims to control the oil-rich city of Kirkuk.

In a bid to force a showdown in the dispute, President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, announced he would order parliament to convene Sunday for the first time since the elections in December and the ratification of the results on Feb. 12.

Such a meeting would have started a 60-day countdown for the legislators to elect a president, approve al-Jaafari's nomination as prime minister and sign off on his Cabinet.

Talabani was mistakenly counting on the signature of Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite, who lost his own bid for the prime minister's nomination by one vote to al-Jaafari. Talabani had in hand a power of attorney from the other vice president, Ghazi al-Yawer, a Sunni, who was out of the country.

The Shiite bloc closed ranks and Abdul-Mahdi declined to sign, at least for now. In an emergency meeting with Talabani on Monday, seven Shiite leaders rejected the president's demand for them to abandon al-Jaafari's nomination.

It remained unclear when parliament might convene, despite the constitutional directive that set Sunday as the deadline. Nor was it clear how the disagreement over al-Jaafari might be settled.

The president first issued the challenge Wednesday in concert with Sunni Arab and some secular politicians.

"We want a prime minister who can gather all the political blocs around him, so that the government would be one of national unity," Talabani told reporters in Baghdad around midday Monday.

Leaders of all Iraq's major political factions scheduled a meeting Tuesday evening in an attempt to untangle the religious and sectarian differences behind the crisis, deeply compounded by continuing violence.

The attacks underscore the dangerous leadership vacuum and fresh political infighting that have torn apart many tenuous political bonds among the country's many religious and ethnic factions.

There also were increasing signs of a split in the Shiite factions, even though they managed to come together Monday night to reject the move to dump al-Jaafari.

Nevertheless, al-Sadr, the firebrand cleric whose backing had insured al-Jaafari's nomination at the Shiite caucus last month, predicted a "quick solution" on approving a government.

There were reports that al-Sadr had threatened to order parliamentarians loyal to him to boycott a Sunday session if Abdul-Mahdi, the Shiite vice president, had signed the Talabani order to convene the legislature.

"All obstacles to forming a national unity government soon will be resolved," al-Sadr said after meeting with Deputy Prime Minister and acting Oil Minister Ahmad Chalabi in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

Many of Monday's attacks targeted the country's Shiite-led security forces, accused by Sunni Arabs of repeated abuses against them under the cover of fighting the Sunni-driven insurgency. The government denies the accusations.

DOJ_NMG_0016529

In Baqouba, a car bomb targeting an Iraqi police patrol exploded near the mayor's office and a market, killing six people and wounding 23, including four patrolmen, police said. Piles of charred, twisted wreckage and pools of blood marked the site.

Elsewhere, two bombs went off in Baghdad's notorious southern Dora neighborhood. One targeted an Interior Ministry patrol, killing six Iraqis. A second exploded as a U.S. patrol was passing, wounding five policemen who were guarding a bank and two civilians.

A U.S. soldier was also killed Sunday in insurgency-plagued western Anbar province, the military announced, bringing to 2,300 the number of U.S. service members who have died in Iraq since the war began three years ago, according to an Associated Press count.

Al-Dulaimi, the Sunni in charge patrolling Baghdad with his 6th army division, was killed when gunmen fired at his convoy.

The U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey, sent condolences to "his family, tribe, and the Iraqi Army during this tragic loss."

"This tragic incident will neither impede the 6th Iraqi Army Division from continuing its mission of securing Baghdad nor derail the formation of the government of Iraq," Casey said in a statement.

Iraqi Leadership Crisis Grows (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD - Pushing the legal deadline to the limit, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani Monday declared that Iraq's new parliament will convene for the first time on March 12.

But an event that was expected to bring a glimmer of hope - and the formation of a US-backed unity government - is instead being overshadowed by a perfect political storm. While Iraq's leaders are battling over the post of prime minister, sectarian bloodshed has left more than 500 dead over the past two weeks. Party militias are exerting more control over the streets, and Iraqis are fed up with a weak government and collapsing services.

The political crisis revolves around the decision by the main Shiite bloc to extend the rule of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. He edged out his rival by just one vote with the support of anti-US Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Last week, an alliance of Sunni Arabs, Kurds, and others called for Mr. Jaafari to step down and a new candidate to come forward. The call for a new premier followed shortly after the deadly bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra sparked a rash of the sectarian violence between Shiites and Sunni Arabs, sliding Iraq further into civil conflict.

"The most likely scenario is the worst," says Toby Dodge, an Iraq expert at Queen Mary, University of London. "[Jaafari] staggers through, with Kurds and Sunnis and others undermining him. So you get a vastly weaker prime minister, backed by radicals."

The crisis has laid bare a deepening divide within Iraq's majority Shiite community. The other contender was Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi, backed by the faction of Sadr rival Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who has portrayed himself as a technocrat and centrist who can get the job done.

Forming a stable government is seen by US officials as a key step to enabling the start of any military withdrawal. A more distant goal, but one required before any US exit, is to ensure that Iraqi police and security forces are 2capable of halting sectarian violence and coping with the insurgency.

Jaafari has been widely blamed in Iraq for permitting the violence to erupt out of control - yielding a week of sectarian killings and attacks on mosques that mostly targeted Sunni Arabs - after the gold roof of the Askariya Shrine in Samarra was destroyed on Feb. 22.

Days of curfew finally brought relative calm. But insurgent violence continued Monday, with eight car bombs - five of them in Baghdad alone - that took at least 28 lives, according to news agencies. One morning blast struck a packed market in Baquba, 40 miles northeast of Baghdad, killing six, including two children. Two of the car bombs, one driven by a suicide bomber, struck at Mahmudiyah, 25 miles south of the capital.

Sunni Arabs blame the lethal result on Jaafari's inability to control Shiite militias and Shiite-dominated security forces, as well as a strategic inability to come to grips with the insurgency. Kurds further took issue with Jaafari's trip to Ankara, Turkey, without cabinet approval, which has strained relations with Iraqi Kurds.

Jaafari's entourage included no Iraqi Kurds, who hold top government positions in Baghdad, but some minority Iraqi Turkomen who are often at odds with ethnic Kurds, but have close ties to Turkey.

"The Jaafari government has a long history of failure," says Mustafa Alani, head of the Security and Terrorism program at the Gulf Research Center in Dubai. "Everything has deteriorated: security, basic services, corruption. There is no major achievement."

DOJ_NMG_0016530

"Weak government contributes [to the violence], state infrastructure is disintegrating gradually, and militias are taking over," says Mr. Alani. "Those people [militiamen] are becoming more loyal to their parties than the state. I don't see how this can be changed."

The convening of parliament begins a 60-day period in which a new head of state must be elected, and a new prime minister and cabinet agreed upon. Lobbying has been fierce for weeks. On Sunday, President Talabani increased pressure against Jaafari, by sending an adviser to push the case with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's preeminent Shiite cleric, in Najaf.

"We reject Jaafari because we believe that Iraq needs a government of national unity and new faces," said envoy Barham Saleh, who is also planning minister, after the meetings.

Sunni Arab leaders have found unlikely champions in US diplomats, trying to ensure their place at the table of a unity government.

They have also been most recent targets of apparent revenge attacks. Gunmen on Sunday killed the nephew and cousin of Sheikh Harith al-Dari, leader of the main Sunni Arab religious group, the Muslim Clerics Association.

Last Thursday, Adnan al-Dulaimi, leader of the Iraqi Accordance Front, part of the Sunni parliamentary bloc trying to oust Jaafari, survived an assassination attempt on his convoy that killed one guard and wounded five others.

In a separate incident the same day, a convoy of bodyguards for Defense Minister Saadoun al-Dulaimi, also a Sunni Arab, was attacked, killing one guard and wounding others.

"You can argue that Iraq has been without a government since the fall of the [Hussein] regime, and after three years we are in a very messy situation," says Hassan Bazaaz, an aide to Adnan al-Dulaimi. "We are on the brink of a civil war; in fact, we are in a civil war. The reason is because there is no government."

The December national election was meant to usher in Iraq's first postinvasion permanent government. But the hopes of Iraqis expressed on election day - almost as vociferous and hopeful as they had been when they first went to the polls in January 2005 - have faded with the passing of time, and amid political deadlock.

The result is growing, popular exasperation.

"What difference does [a new government] make?" asks an Iraqi political analyst who asked not to be named. "The real crisis is the daily killing of Iraqis, which no one writes about. This is because of the US occupation. Whether Jaafari gets back in is of no concern to Iraqis. Who is going to stop [the violence]?"

Any hope of effective rule will require real change, regardless of who holds the PM post.

"A new government along the old line will be weak, and divided on the sectarian side; they are only concerned about how much they can steal," says the Iraqi analyst. "The ministries of Interior and Defense tell you everything is fine and under control. If you listen to the minister of electricity, you would think people live in a state of full electric power. The minister of oil says Iraqis are living with everything."

That sentiment echoes Khalaf al-Olayan, another Sunni leader in parliament, who wrote on the Iraqi Accordance Front website that Iraq has gone from "bad to worse" with Jaafari.

"Jaafari's government failed to solve the chaos that followed the Samarra explosions and did not take any measures to solve the security crisis that could have pushed the country into civil war," wrote Mr. Olayan.

Another Jaafari government would mean "much more of the same - a many headed hydra, without the power to nail down the [pro-Shiite and abuse] problems in the Ministry of Interior," says Mr. Dodge at Queen Mary.

Sadr supports Jaafari "not because of who he is, but who he is not," says Dodge. "They would nominate anyone, to get around Abdul Mahdi getting it."

Leaders Consider Al-Jaafari Future (WT)

By Sharon Behn

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Iraqi party leaders, deadlocked over whether Ibrahim al-Jaafari should serve another term as prime minister, are considering a plan that would allow him to serve for six months to a year and then review his performance.

The behind-the-scenes wrangling occurred as several bomb attacks around Iraq killed at least nine persons, including children.

"There is no power, there is no government; the country is really in a vacuum," said a source close to the political negotiations, speaking on the condition of anonymity.

The Kurds think that Mr. al-Jaafari has not supported their bid for the northern city of Kirkuk, the Sunnis are trying to weaken the Shi'ite-led United Iraqi Alliance (UIA) -- which they think wants to wipe out the Sunni minority -- and both are coming together in a political marriage of convenience to put pressure on the UIA, the source said.

DOJ_NMG_0016531

For its part, the Shi'ite alliance -- with such powerful figures as Abdel Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), and nationalist cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who backed Mr. al-Jaafari -- is refusing to back down on its nomination.

If the talks collapse, some party leaders are ready to punt the issue over to the 275-seat National Assembly and put the question of the country's prime minister to a vote -- forcing the political infighting into the open.

"In the coming days, we will see many dramatic political actions ... in which we will reach an agreement -- or if we cannot reach an agreement with the other slates, we will transfer the whole situation to the parliamentary council," said Karim al-Musawi, SCIRI's spokesman in Washington.

President Jalal Talabani said yesterday that he would convene the National Assembly in six days, but there were conflicting reports over whether he had received the required backing of other leaders for the session to proceed.

A Kurdish official familiar with the negotiations said there were two options on the table: taking Mr. al-Jaafari's nomination to parliament and face the possibility of it being rejected, or have the UIA propose a new candidate for the post of prime minister.

"We want a candidate who can work with all of us and not treat the government as his own," said the Kurdish official, who described the ongoing talks in Baghdad as "intense."

But none of the major political slates currently holds the necessary two-thirds majority in the National Assembly to approve any candidate.

"They have to compromise," the source said.

One suggestion, he said, was to "give Jaafari a chance, then have a six-month or one-year review."

In violence yesterday, six bombs in Baghdad killed at least nine persons, including two children. A sniper also fatally shot one of Iraq's most senior army officers, Maj. Gen. Mubdar Hatim al-Dulaimi, as he drove through west Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

In London, newspapers quoted the top British commander in Iraq as saying that Britain's 8,000 troops could be withdrawn from Iraq by summer 2008, with the first drawdown expected within weeks.

But Lt. Gen. Nick Houghton told the London Daily Telegraph the timetable was "reversible" if Iraq's political leaders failed to create a stable central government and curb sectarian violence.

18 Killed As Iraqi Parliament Prepares To Meet (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD — A sniper shot and killed the Iraqi officer commanding army forces in the capital today as officials reported that bombings and other violence had killed at least 16 Iraqis and a U.S. soldier.

Maj. Gen. Mubdir Hatam Jabouri was killed by a single bullet to the neck while driving through western Baghdad in a lengthy convoy shortly after 5 p.m., said Mohammed Askari, an advisor to the Defense Ministry.

"He was such a dedicated and good-disciplined veteran officer of the Iraqi army," said Askari.

Jabouri, a Sunni Arab, was a commander of troops seen by many as a counterweight to the increasingly powerful forces of the Interior Ministry, whose Shiite Muslim-dominated police and commando units allegedly have been involved in extrajudicial killings.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military reported that a U.S. soldier in western Iraq died Sunday as a result of "enemy action."

Sporadic sectarian violence continued to erupt in the wake of the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra and reprisal attacks on Sunnis. Iraqi and U.S. officials hope a broad-based government drawing on Iraq's majority Shiites, Sunnis and Kurdish minority might cool sectarian tempters. But political talks have become bogged down.

Officials have announced that the newly elected parliament will meet next Sunday, an important step in the process of building a new government.

Meanwhile, much of the insurgent violence in the country has shifted to religiously diverse urban areas, said a U.S. official who requested anonymity.

A car bomb in a crowded market of downtown Baqubah, a religiously mixed provincial capital 45 miles northeast of the capital, killed at least six, including two children, and injured 21. The bomb exploded as police and passersby gathered near a murder scene, one of three reported fatal shootings in Baqubah today.

Gunmen killed three Shiite laborers in the Sunni town of Hawija, in northern Iraq near the city of Kirkuk.

At least two car bombs and sporadic mortar fire shook the capital. A car bomb near a bank killed one person and injured five in the Dora district, a religiously mixed area on Baghdad's southern edge.

A car bomb explosion on the road to the Ministry of Industry compound injured five. Another car bomb struck a police commando patrol in the Mustansirya district, though there were no reports of injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0016532

Yarmuk hospital officials reported receiving at least three unidentified corpses from Sunni Arab neighborhoods.

Gunmen kidnapped a prominent university professor. Dr. Ali Hussein Khafaji, dean of the Engineering College at Mustansirya University, was abducted by two carloads of men as he left his home.

Senior Iraqi General Killed In Ambush (WP)

By John Ward Anderson And Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 6 -- The top commander of the Iraqi army division in Baghdad was killed Monday when his car came under small-arms fire while traveling through the capital, the U.S. military said.

Maj. Gen. Mubdar Hatim Hazya al-Dulaimi was one of the highest-ranking members of the new Iraqi army to be killed in insurgent violence. Under his leadership, the 6th Iraqi Army Division has been gradually assuming control of parts of the capital from U.S. forces.

His killing could set back security efforts in Baghdad, particularly following the recent outbreak of sectarian violence, according to a senior U.S. commander who worked closely with him.

"It could be a blow that takes a long time to overcome," said Maj. Gen. William G. Webster Jr., commander of the Army's 3rd Infantry Division, who oversaw U.S. troops in Baghdad for a year ending in January. "Losing a strong commander for even a little while in Baghdad could cause a further power shift toward what looks like the Shia control of the city."

Still, Dulaimi strove to cultivate strong subordinates, which could help the transition, Webster said. The Defense Ministry is expected to select Dulaimi's replacement.

The attack was one of the violent incidents across Iraq on Monday that left more than 20 people dead after a relative lull in bloodshed over the weekend.

President Jalal Talabani, meanwhile, announced that the country's new parliament, which was elected Dec. 15, would hold its first meeting on Sunday, the deadline set by the constitution for its first session. Lawmakers and political parties have been unable to agree on the composition of a new government, delaying the opening of parliament.

Dulaimi was killed about 4:35 p.m. in the western part of the capital when his convoy was attacked, a U.S. military statement said.

"Mubdar had been visiting his soldiers in Kadamiyah and was returning to his headquarters when his convoy came under small-arms fire attack," the statement said. It was not clear whether anyone else had been killed or injured in the incident.

"General Mubdar was a true Iraqi patriot," Maj. Gen. J.D. Thurman, commander of the Multi-National Division in Baghdad, said in a statement. "He leaves behind a professional and capable fighting force that will continue the fight for Iraqi freedom."

U.S. officials training the new Iraqi army hope it will take over combat operations in Iraq, enabling an eventual withdrawal of U.S. troops. Iraqi forces are currently in charge of security in about 60 percent of Baghdad. Only two weeks ago, Dulaimi had predicted that insurgent activity would decline because of the Iraqi army's operations.

"Because of the bravery of our armed forces that sacrifice themselves on a daily basis, the amount of insurgent activity will continue to decrease," Dulaimi was quoted as saying in a U.S. military statement.

The Iraqi general, in his mid-fifties, was an aggressive, inspirational leader and rising star within the army, Webster said. A Sunni Arab sheik from southern Baghdad, Dulaimi led a division under Saddam Hussein during the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s, and since Hussein's fall had commanded two other divisions before being selected by the Defense Ministry for the critical job in Baghdad. "He was certainly destined to be a senior leader of all the armed forces," Webster said.

But Dulaimi's hands-on style and unusual drive to lead from the front -- as well as his habit of shunning body armor -- also put him in greater danger. "He knew he had to be out with his soldiers for them to trust him," Webster said. "He put himself at more risk than his predecessors."

Elsewhere in the capital on Monday, at least four car bombs exploded, killing four people and injuring 24, police said. Another four people were killed and 10 wounded when three car bombs detonated in the town of Mahmudiyah, about 15 miles south of the capital, security officials said.

In the worst attack of the day, seven people, including five children, were killed and 17 were injured when a car bomb exploded in a crowded market in central Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, police said.

A U.S. military statement said the explosion occurred near the office of the mayor, who was meeting with community leaders at the time to discuss ways to improve security. The statement blamed the attack on insurgent attempts to "incite sectarian violence within the community."

Five policemen who rushed to the scene were reportedly injured in a secondary bombing that targeted them.

The U.S. military reported the death of a U.S. soldier "due to enemy action" in the western province of Anbar on Sunday. Additional details were not available.

DOJ_NMG_0016533

The bodies of a father and two of his sons were found Monday in the city of Hawijah, about 35 miles southwest of the northern city of Kirkuk, according to police. They said the victims were Shiite Muslims who appeared to have been shot execution-style, presumably by the Sunni-led insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

An offshoot of the group recently distributed leaflets in the town demanding the expulsion of Shiites in retaliation after Sunnis fled their communities around Baghdad.

Fearing sectarian violence, some Sunni families abandoned their homes following the destruction of a revered Shiite mosque in Samarra on Feb. 22. Attracted by the rich agricultural land around Hawijah, many Shiites had moved to the area during the rule of Hussein, residents said.

Residents of the town were "shocked by these leaflets, because many of these families who work in agriculture and cattle raising, as well as other jobs, have intermarried and lived here for many years without any problem," said local police Capt. Emad Khider.

11 Including An Iraqi General Are Killed In Baghdad Attacks; Army Says A G.I. Died Sunday (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 6 — A series of guerrilla attacks in and around Baghdad killed at least 11 people on Monday, including an Iraqi general, and wounded at least 58, officials said. The American military announced that an American soldier had been killed in Anbar Province, the western desert region that has become a wellspring of the insurgency.

The eruption of violence came as the country's sclerotic political process inched forward with an announcement by President Jalal Talabani that he would convene the newly elected Parliament on Sunday.

Maj. Gen. Mubdar Hatim Hazya al-Duleimi, the commander of the Sixth Division of the Iraqi Army, was fatally shot by a sniper on Monday afternoon while driving in western Baghdad, according to American and Iraqi officials. General Duleimi was the highest-ranking Iraqi military officer to be killed since the American-led invasion in 2003.

For more than a year the Sixth Division has been gradually assuming control of sectors of the capital from American forces.

In the deadliest attack of the day, a car bomb exploded in a marketplace in Baquba, just north of the capital, killing 7 people, including 2 young girls, and wounding 23, including 5 children, Diyala Province officials and hospital workers in Baquba said. The attack was one of at least seven on Monday involving car bombs.

The American military offered no further information on the American casualty in Anbar, except to say the soldier was killed Sunday and had been assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7, which is under Marine command.

Against this violent backdrop, Iraq's political leaders continued to jockey over the choice of a prime minister, the government's most powerful executive. The main Shiite bloc is backing Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, who has held the post since a transitional government was formed last April, but he is opposed by a coalition of Sunni Arab, Kurdish and some secular politicians.

Although the Shiite bloc won 130 of the 275 parliamentary seats, the Iraqi Constitution effectively requires a two-thirds majority to choose the prime minister, giving the Kurdish, Sunni and secular parties, with about 140 seats among them, a de facto veto.

Ahmad Chalabi, a secular Shiite politician and former Pentagon favorite, met Monday with Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's most revered Shiite leader, to discuss the issue. Mr. Chalabi also met with Moktada al-Sadr, the militant Shiite cleric whose power has grown as Mr. Chalabi's has faded. Mr. Sadr's bloc, the largest within the Shiite Alliance, has been backing Mr. Jaafari for the nomination.

"Mr. Jaafari must be given a chance to work on forming a government," Mr. Chalabi told reporters as he emerged from his meetings in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

For his part, Mr. Sadr predicted a "quick solution" to the impasse.

Ayatollah Sistani, who opposes a direct clerical role in government, made no statement.

American officials have been putting pressure on their Iraqi counterparts to pull together a broadbased coalition in the hope that widespread political representation would help unify the country and defuse the insurgency.

According to the Iraqi Constitution, the legislature must first approve a president by a two-thirds vote. The president must then pick a prime minister within 15 days. The prime minister has another 15 days to select a cabinet.

The selection of the prime minister and cabinet must be approved by a majority of Parliament, or the cycle is renewed with a new 15-day deadline for the president to choose a new prime minister.

But the expectation is that the politicians will have negotiated the package of president, prime minister and cabinet before the legislature announces its presidential choice.

DOJ_NMG_0016534

Two Car Bombs Explode In Iraqi City (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

HILLAH, Iraq -- Two car bombs exploded almost simultaneously at separate sites in this mostly Shiite city early Tuesday, wounding at least three people, police said.

The blasts were detonated by remote control and were about five minutes apart, said police Capt. Muthana Khalid.

The first went off on a road on the northern side of the city, hurting no one, Khalid said.

Five minutes later, the second car bomb exploded at a bustling market, injuring at least three people, Khalid said.

Hillah, 60 miles south of Baghdad, has suffered repeated attacks. It is also the site of the single deadliest attack in the two-year insurgency, a suicide car bombing outside a medical clinic on Feb. 28, 2005 that killed 110 people.

Also Tuesday, police said four Iraqi officers were killed in two separate attacks on police patrols in Baqouba and Beiji, north of Baghdad. The assailants were not identified.

Iraqi Tribes Strike Back At Insurgents (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 6 -- First they killed the chief of the Naim tribe and his son. Then they killed a top tribal sheik who headed the Fallujah city council. Then they assassinated the leader of the al-Jubur tribe.

And now the reported killers of all these men -- al-Qaeda in Iraq, the insurgent group of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi -- have a powerful new enemy.

Tribal chiefs in Iraq's western Anbar province and in an area near the northern city of Kirkuk, two regions teeming with insurgents, are vowing to strike back at al-Qaeda in Iraq, a Sunni Arab-led group that is waging war against Sunni tribal leaders who are cooperating with the Iraqi government and the U.S. military. Anbar tribes have formed a militia that has killed 20 insurgents from al-Qaeda in Iraq, leaders said.

Separately, more than 300 tribal chiefs, politicians, clerics, security officials and other community leaders met last week in Hawijah, about 35 miles southwest of Kirkuk, and "declared war" on al-Qaeda in Iraq. In a communique, the participants vowed "the shedding of blood" of anyone involved in "sabotage, killings, kidnappings, targeting police and army, attacking the oil and gas pipelines and their transporters, assassinating the religious and tribal figures, technicians, and doctors."

"Hawijah was never a hideout for terrorists and fugitives," the statement added. "Anyone who provides refuge to terrorists will be considered and dealt with like a criminal and terrorist."

Last month at a briefing in Baghdad, Maj. Gen Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman, said Zarqawi "finds these tribal leaders who have opted to embrace the democratic process . . . and he works to assassinate" them.

"What we're finding is indeed the people of al-Anbar -- Fallujah and Ramadi, specifically -- have decided to turn against terrorists and foreign fighters," he said. "The tribal leaders, if you will, said, 'Okay, that's enough, let's take out Zarqawi and his network and get them out of our cities.' " Lynch said "local insurgents" had killed six Zarqawi deputies in Ramadi since September.

Anbar province is a center of the insurgency and the deadliest region of the country outside of Baghdad for Iraqi civilians and U.S. forces. Tribal chiefs there said their militia, the al-Anbar Revolutionaries, has killed 20 foreign fighters from al-Qaeda in Iraq and 33 Iraqi sympathizers who aided the insurgents with arms and money in the past two months.

"Forming the group did not come from nothing," said Khalaf al-Fahdawi, a leader of the Sunni Albu Fahd tribe in Anbar. "It came from a need to destroy al-Qaeda, which we thought the Marines might have been able to do. We were wrong, since these armed men became stronger and raped other cities."

Leaders in Anbar and south of Kirkuk said they opposed both Zarqawi and the American military occupation of Iraq, describing them as feeding off each other to the detriment of the country.

"We are a group of the Anbar people who want to get rid of Zarqawi . . . because this is the only way to make the Americans withdraw from Ramadi or Iraq in general," said Ahmed Abu Ilaf, 30, a welder and member of the new Anbar militia from Ramadi, about 60 miles west of the capital.

"We are against Zarqawi and his followers because they aim to extend the presence of the occupation and hurt our forces to make them weak," said Hussein Ali al-Jubouri, a Sunni tribal leader and Hawijah city council member.

Hawijah leaders said they, too, wanted to create a militia to enforce their threats, but that U.S. military officials were opposed to the idea. For the time being, they said, they would intensify their cooperation with Iraqi military and police units.

DOJ_NMG_0016535

Members of the Anbar militia said the group comprised about 100 people who have had relatives slain by al-Qaeda in Iraq. The group is led by Ahmed Ftaikhan, a former Iraqi intelligence officer from the now-disbanded Iraqi army who lives in Ramadi.

Fahdawi, the sheik from the Albu Fahd tribe, said the militia was forged in a series of secret meetings among tribal leaders, each of whom was asked to help form the group. Some contributed men, some money, Fahdawi said. U.S. military officers attended some of the meetings, he said, and helped "with "all kinds of financial support."

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, denied that American forces were funding the militia.

"All military activity is conducted through the legitimate structures of the Iraqi government and security forces," he said in an e-mail. "We are working hard to ensure these structures function properly, and funding a program such as this would only undermine that process."

A fighter in Zarqawi's group, calling himself Abu Azzam, said the al-Anbar Revolutionaries "are collaborators and dogs for America. They kill the mujaheddin to get money from the American crusaders. They are cowards and we have killed a lot of them. . . . All the people here support us and our jihad against the Americans and their followers."

Fahdawi said, "I cannot say that all the people in Ramadi support us, but I can say 80 percent of them do."

Ilaf, the militia member and welder from Ramadi, said the group has had real success.

"We have killed a number of the Arabs, including Saudis, Egyptians, Syrians, Kuwaitis, Syrians and Jordanians," he said. "We were also able to foil an attack by Zarqawi's men who were trying to attack an oil pipeline outside Ramadi. We killed four Iraqis trying to plant the bomb under the pipeline."

Iraq's Talabani Summons Parliament (REU-Y2)

By Nick Olivari And Faris Al-mehdawi

Reuters, March 6, 2006

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said on Monday he would convene parliament in six days, but political wrangling means a government of national unity is unlikely to be formed any time soon.

As Talabani met a constitutional requirement to summon parliament after elections in December, a car bomb north of Baghdad killed six people, including two children. Five other car bombs exploded in the capital, killing three police officers and wounding at least 24 people.

Nearly three months after the election, Iraq's political leaders are still fighting over the post of prime minister. The row is unlikely to end soon, meaning parliament may only get as far as naming a speaker in its first session.

"I will call today for parliament to hold the first session on the 12th of the current month since it is the last day that the constitution allows," Talabani said.

According to the Transitional Administrative Law, the U.S.-sponsored interim constitution still in force, lawmakers must first elect a speaker of parliament and then a president and two deputies, who in turn will name a prime minister to form a new government within two weeks.

But there is no timeframe for these posts to be filled. The new constitution, approved in a referendum last October, does give a timetable, but it will take effect only after the country's first four-year government is formed.

JAAFARI OPPOSED

Sunnis, Kurds and others are opposed to the nomination of Shi'ite Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and are calling for the Shi'ite Alliance, parliament's biggest bloc, to replace him.

The dispute has delayed the formation of the grand coalition government that Washington promoted in the hope of fostering stability and allowing U.S. troops to begin withdrawing.

Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Chalabi, a secular Shi'ite whose list failed to win a single seat in parliament, said an "urgent and radical solution" would be found to break the impasse.

Hussein Falluji, a Sunni politician, said there were three options, none of which included Jaafari.

The Shi'ite Alliance could change Jaafari and the political process could resume, he said, a new alliance could form a bigger bloc and name a new prime minister, or parliament could veto Jaafari by not giving him the two-thirds majority he needs.

Tarek al-Hashemi, a leading Sunni politician and a contender for speaker when the new parliament opens on Sunday, accused Iran of fostering instability in Iraq, partly through militias loyal to Shi'ite parties, in a bid to divert U.S. pressure over Tehran's nuclear program.

"The main player in Iraq is Iran," Hashemi said in an interview in Jordan. "It wants to create chaos for America in Iraq as part of the conflict over the nuclear issue."

Iran denies interfering in Iraqi affairs but Hashemi's views, typical of Sunni leaders, signal future tension for both Iraqi unity and potentially between Baghdad and Tehran.

DEATH TOLL RISES

DOJ_NMG_0016536

Sectarian violence that has killed hundreds since the February 22 bombing of Samarra's Golden Mosque claimed more lives on Monday.

A bomb in Baquba killed six people, two of whom were girls aged three and four, and wounded 23 in what the U.S. military said was an attack aimed at sowing sectarian bloodshed.

It exploded near a market, packed with women and children, after police arrived to check a separate incident in which one person had been killed. Five policemen were wounded.

The blast shattered windows and wrecked stalls. Sandals and broken spectacles lay amid body parts in pools of blood.

"What did these people do to be killed by this bomb," said a distraught man at the scene. "They targeted innocent civilians."

The religiously mixed city of Baquba, 65 km (40 miles) northeast of Baghdad, has been the scene of several sectarian attacks since the Samarra bombing.

Sunni insurgents battling the Shi'ite-led government frequently launch attacks against U.S.-trained Iraqi security forces. Five separate car bombs around Baghdad killed three police officers, wounded five other policeman and at least 19 civilians. One other civilian was wounded in a mortar attack.

Two other car bombs, one of them driven by a suicide bomber, killed three people, including two Iraqi soldiers, and wounded five, in Mahmudiya, some 40 km south of Baghdad on Monday, police said.

The two blasts occurred 10 minutes apart with one targeting an Iraqi army checkpoint.

Human rights in Iraq were also at the forefront on Monday when Amnesty International condemned the detention of 14,000 prisoners without charge or trial, saying the lessons of the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal had not been learned.

U.S. officials did not respond to a request for comment.

Germans Set To Investigate Help To U.S. In Iraq Invasion (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

BERLIN, March 6 — A German opposition party said Monday that it would vote for a formal parliamentary investigation into allegations that the German intelligence service provided help to the United States during the invasion of Iraq, which the government vehemently opposed.

An official of the Free Democratic Party, which has 61 seats in Parliament, said the party favored an investigation. Because the two other opposition parties, the leftist Greens and the new Left Party, have already declared their support, the Free Democrats' decision seems to ensure a formal investigation.

Germany's government, in which power is shared between the main left-of-center and right-of-center parties, has made vigorous efforts to head off an investigation, saying it could harm the functioning of Germany's intelligence service and efforts under way to improve relations with the United States.

Earlier the government had furnished a report on the allegation that two agents of the country's intelligence service were posted to Iraq starting shortly before the American military mounted the invasion.

That report was released some 10 days ago, but some in the opposition criticized it as falling short of a full, detailed disclosure of what the government may have been doing behind the scenes to support American policy.

In a full parliamentary investigation, rare in Germany, members of the Parliament would very likely publicly interrogate former and current members of the government under oath. In their comments on Monday, leaders of the Free Democrats said they wanted to investigate the roles of figures like Gerhard Schröder, the former chancellor; Joschka Fischer, the former foreign minister; and Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the current foreign minister, who was Mr. Schröder's chief of staff at the time of the invasion.

The likelihood of a full parliamentary investigation promises to breathe new life into a political scandal that has ebbed and flowed in Germany since January, when the German press first reported that German agents in Iraq gave information to the United States during the war, including information in choosing targets for the air and land combat.

The government conceded that intelligence agents did operate in Baghdad, but denied that they provided information about military targets.

The report to Parliament issued last month acknowledged exchanges of intelligence with the United States, but said none of the information would have helped the United States in the combat. After the government report appeared, new disclosures in the press — including articles in The New York Times, vehemently denied by the government, that Germany provided the United States with Iraq's secret plan for the defense of Baghdad — had the effect of intensifying the opposition's calls for an investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0016537

"This was not sufficient in our eyes," Wolfgang Gerhardt, the Free Democrats' parliamentary leader said in a telephone interview on Monday, referring to the earlier government report. "It did not deliver the necessary information on the rendition of a German citizen, on C.I.A. flights and even not on the question of the political leadership in the former government.

"Our main question is not, 'What did the security service do?' Our main question is, 'What was the aim of the former Red-Green government to declare openly to be against the Iraq invasion and to treat the work of the security service without political leadership?' " The phrase Red-Green denotes the former coalition government of Social Democrats and the Green Party.

Opposition Parties Press For Iraq Probe (WT)

By David Crossland

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

BERLIN -- German opposition parties have joined forces to require a parliamentary inquiry into whether German spies helped the U.S. military in the 2003 Iraq war, in a move that could hurt Berlin's efforts to mend fences with the United States.

The liberal Free Democrats voted among themselves yesterday to demand the investigation, providing enough votes in the Bundestag to compel a probe into reports that German agents handed over sensitive documents detailing Saddam Hussein's defense strategy to the Americans.

The claim, first reported in the New York Times last week, exposed the former government of Gerhard Schroeder to accusations that it publicly opposed the war to gain popularity while privately helping the Americans to wage it.

Officials have warned that a probe, in which current and former officials would have to testify under oath, will put the spotlight on the Bundesnachrichtendienst (BND) foreign-intelligence service in coming months and thereby hamper its activities.

The inquiry also could hurt Chancellor Angela Merkel's government, even though she only took over last November, because her Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier was chief of staff to Mr. Schroeder at the time of the war.

Lengthy debate about the Iraq war and Germany's role in it could also put further strain on U.S.-German relations at a time when Mrs. Merkel is trying hard to repair the damage done by Mr. Schroeder's opposition to the war.

Yesterday's move by the FDP ends weeks of uncertainty about whether the Bundestag, or lower house of the German parliament, will launch an inquiry.

The other two opposition parties, the Left Wing Party and the Greens, had already called for a probe. The FDP's support gives the combined opposition sufficient votes to force an investigation.

The question now is what terms of reference the inquiry will be given. The FDP and Left Wing party want it to include the previous government's entire policy during the Iraq war. That would put the inquiry on course to look at some sensitive German-U.S. security issues.

These include the purported abduction of a German national to Afghanistan by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, as well as revelations that German security officials accepted a U.S. invitation to question two inmates at the Guantanamo Bay detention camp for terrorism suspects in Cuba.

The Greens, who were a junior coalition partner in Mr. Schroeder's government, want a narrower investigation focusing on the activities of the BND.

The German press has speculated that the various leaks to U.S. newspapers in recent months about German cooperation with U.S. agencies may have been deliberately planted by U.S. authorities to get back at Germany for not supporting the Iraq war and to tarnish Mr. Schroeder's image.

FDP domestic-policy specialist Max Stadler said: "We don't want an investigating committee against the BND; instead, we want a debate about the political responsibility for all that happened and what conclusions to draw from it."

The German government has admitted that its spies passed on information about locations of Saddam Hussein's Republican Guards and of an Iraqi secret-service base to the U.S. government.

But Mr. Steinmeier reiterated his denial yesterday of the New York Times claim that the BND handed the Americans a sketch of Iraqi defense installations around Baghdad in 2003.

Mr. Steinmeier told the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung that the BND had found no trace of the sketch despite making an intense search. "So I can and must assume that it wasn't passed on by the BND," he told the paper.

Germany has so far confirmed that two BND agents were in Baghdad at the start of the U.S. invasion in March 2003 and has acknowledged that they provided some descriptions of the police and military presence in Baghdad.

Iraq Reconstruction Plan Draws Criticism Following Delays (USAT)

By Steven Komarow

USA Today, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016538

A key program for helping Iraq's new government succeed and thus speed withdrawal of U.S. troops is still mostly dormant nearly four months after it was announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The plan calls for sending teams of experts to help the fledgling governments in Iraq's 18 provinces establish democratic institutions, improve security and manage reconstruction. That combination of military, State Department and other government personnel is critical to Iraq's future, Rice said during a November visit to Iraq.

However, after the first three of 16 teams were created in Mosul, Kirkuk and Hillah in conjunction with her visit, no more have been launched. Tom Casey, a State Department spokesman, said time was needed to work out security procedures and other needs, and more teams will be formed this year.

That pace is “a huge problem” and means the United States is blowing its chance “to quickly seize the momentum” as Iraq forms a permanent government based on December's elections, said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. “We need action,” said Reed, who met with Provincial Reconstruction Team (PRT) members in Iraq last month.

Reed says the delays are emblematic of bureaucratic snags that have hurt U.S. efforts in Iraq since the beginning. It's taken more than three years to adopt the PRT concept, even though similar teams have been operating in Afghanistan and have been credited by the U.S. Institute for Peace with improving conditions and governance in Afghanistan's provinces.

Zalmay Khalilzad, who became U.S. ambassador to Iraq last summer, helped create and mobilize the teams while he was the ambassador to Afghanistan and advocated them for Iraq. The embassy plan calls for 16 teams, one for each province except for a single team handling the three provinces in the semi-autonomous Kurdish region of northeast Iraq.

Complaints about delays are off base, said Daniel Speckhard, who is Khalilzad's top aide overseeing Iraqi reconstruction. He said several new teams would be announced soon, based on the experience of the first three. They'll include a U.S.-led team in Baghdad. Great Britain and Italy also plan to sponsor teams, he said. NATO allies have sponsored many of the PRTs in Afghanistan.

“I actually feel pretty good about it,” Speckhard said. “We're moving at an incredibly rapid pace for how significant the initiative is.”

While the Afghan teams were mostly military, those in Iraq will include people from the State and Justice departments and the U.S. Agency for International Development and other agencies. They'll be led by a diplomat, not a military officer, and have about 100 members.

The Iraq insurgency has left the State Department and civilian agencies struggling to fill positions even in the relative safety of Baghdad's Green Zone. They don't have built-in, military-style units that can surge into the field for duty on PRTs. “It takes us 60 to 90 days to fill positions like that … we're looking for real expertise,” Speckhard said.

There also have been bureaucratic delays. It wasn't until two weeks after Rice's visit that the Defense Department on Nov. 28 issued a directive that commits forces to supporting PRTs and similar efforts. The White House on Dec. 7 issued a new directive, giving the secretary of State clear authority to lead the multiagency efforts in Iraq and elsewhere. Those directives only began discussions between the agencies over who was responsible for security and other support for the teams.

“Setting these up requires careful planning, and we're moving forward with the logistical arrangements for them now,” Casey said. “There is no delay in that.”

He also said the State Department has enough qualified volunteers to fill the positions.

However, the government isn't backing up its plans with enough money for training and staff, said Anthony Holmes, president of the American Foreign Service Association, an organization of diplomats and other government officials who represent the United States overseas. A major problem is a shortage of Arabic-speaking officials to meet demand, Holmes said. The State Department doesn't have ready-to-go teams of diplomats for such missions, Holmes said, or the security people to protect them.

While the teams have their roots in similar units used during the Vietnam War, the concept gained new momentum after the U.S. involvement in Bosnia in the mid-1990s.

Along with the teams in Afghanistan and Iraq, the Pentagon's Joint Forces Command is developing exercises to streamline the creation of civilian-military teams and eliminate the delays holding up the Iraqi PRTs.

“There is an intense effort underway to fix this problem,” says retired Army colonel Paul Hughes of the U.S. Institute for Peace, who worked in the U.S. occupational government in Iraq in 2003. The teams, Hughes said, can make a big difference in Iraq, and it's critical they work quickly to stop Iraqi insurgents from gaining more influence.

“That is what insurgencies are all about,” he said. The enemy doesn't have to accomplish anything positive, yet insurgents can win if they “show the people the government can't meet the peoples' expectations.”

Amnesty Report On 14,000 Finds Prisoner Abuse Continues In Iraq (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

LONDON, March 6 — Amnesty International accused the United States and its allies on Monday of committing widespread abuses in Iraq, including torture and the continued detention of thousands of prisoners without charge or trial.

The accusations could fuel the debate over the treatment of detainees that flared after the publication of graphic photographs showing prisoners at Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad being mistreated by American guards. More recently, British forces in Iraq have been criticized after videotapes showed British soldiers beating Iraqi youths after demonstrations in southern Iraq.

In its report, "Beyond Abu Ghraib: Detention and Torture in Iraq," Amnesty International also said the level of abuse by Iraqi forces since the transfer of power in June 2004 was increasing.

The United States and its allies, the report said, have "established procedures which deprive detainees of human rights guaranteed in international law and standards."

"The record of these forces, including U.S. forces and their United Kingdom allies, is an unpalatable one," it said. In particular, coalition forces deny "detainees their right to challenge the lawfulness of their detention before a court."

Hassiba Hadj-Sahraoui, the deputy director of the group's Middle East and North Africa program, described the way prisoners are detained as "arbitrary and a recipe for possible abuse."

At the end of November 2005, the report said, quoting coalition figures, more than 14,000 prisoners were held in Iraq: about 4,850 in Baghdad, 7,365 at Camp Bucca (near Basra, in southern Iraq), and more than 1,100 in the north, at Sulaimaniya.

Responding to the report, the United States military said all its detainees were treated in accordance with international conventions and Iraqi law, The Associated Press reported.

A British Foreign Office spokesman, speaking in return for anonymity under departmental rules, also denied the allegations. He said British forces in Iraq were currently holding 43 Iraqi prisoners under United Nations resolutions permitting detention of people deemed threatening to the security of coalition or Iraqi personnel.

All 43 were visited by the Red Cross and by Iraqi government officials, had their cases reviewed every month and had access to their lawyers and families, the spokesman said. Britain has some 8,000 soldiers in Iraq, mainly in the south. The Amnesty International report took particular issue with conditions in detention facilities run by Iraqis.

"Many cases of torture and ill treatment of detainees held in facilities controlled by the Iraqi authorities have been reported since the handover of power in June 2004," the report said. "Among other methods, victims have been subjected to electric shocks or have been beaten with plastic cable. The picture that is emerging is one in which the Iraqi authorities are systematically violating the rights of detainees in breach of guarantees contained both in Iraqi legislation and in international law and standards."

Lurking In Saddam's Old Tent? (WT)

By Michael Barone

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

The issue is historical now, but still worth exploring. Why, for two distinct groups of Americans, has it become a matter of conviction held with religious intensity that there cannot have been any relationship between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq?

One group consists of Democratic politicians who oppose the Bush administration's policy in Iraq. The Minnesota Democratic Party recently protested as "un-American" an ad showing military veterans and their families supporting the president's policies for saying, "Our enemy in Iraq is al Qaeda -- the same terrorists who killed 3,000 Americans on September 11, the same terrorists from the first World Trade Center bombing, the USS Cole, Madrid, London and many more."

The Democrats, unfactually, say these words "make a connection between Iraq and the September 11 [2001] terrorist attacks and suggest the war in Iraq will prevent an attack by al Qaeda in America."

But of course, the ad is factually correct: Al Qaeda is attacking Americans in Iraq. And the Minnesota Democratic Party is in no position to guarantee al Qaeda will not attack America.

The other group consists of intelligence and other career government professionals, many of them Arabists. Case in point: Paul Pillar, CIA national intelligence officer for the Near East and South Asia, 2000-2005, now retired, writing in the most recent Foreign Affairs magazine. The "greatest discrepancy between the administration's public statements and the intelligence community's judgments concerned not WMD (there was indeed a broad consensus that such programs existed), but the relationship between Saddam and al Qaeda. The enormous attention devoted to this subject did not reflect any judgment by intelligence officials that there was or was likely to be anything like the 'alliance' the administration said existed." But the Senate

DOJ_NMG_0016540

Intelligence Committee report showed the CIA did obtain evidence of an al Qaeda-Saddam relationship from foreign intelligence and open sources.

That's not surprising. CIA Director George Tenet in October 2002 told Congress of "growing indications of a relationship with al Qaeda." And of course evidence of contacts between al Qaeda and Saddam's regime went back to the 1990s and were cited, without murmur of dissent, by President Bill Clinton.

So why do these Democrats and these government professionals seem to be so convinced there must have been no collaboration between al Qaeda and Saddam? The Democrats fear more Americans would support Mr. Bush and the war effort if they believed there was.

The career professionals, with their many years of training in the subtleties of the Middle East, have developed a vested interest in the notion that religious Wahhabis like al Qaeda could never collaborate with a secular tyrant like Saddam. If alliances could be formed across religious lines, what use would all their learning be?

The Minnesota Democrats cite the September 11 commission's report finding of no evidence of "operational" cooperation between al Qaeda and Iraq, although it did find evidence of many contacts. But, as Donald Rumsfeld likes to say, absence of evidence is not evidence of absence.

Neither al Qaeda nor Saddam operated under a Freedom of Information Act. Any collaboration between them on September 11 would have been kept very secret -- al Qaeda did not want to leave a return address. We do not know there was such collaboration. Nor do we know there was not.

Going back to the days before our military action in Iraq, it would have been irresponsible for any president to have assumed there was no relationship between al Qaeda and Iraq, given previous contacts between them and their proven hostility to the United States. President Clinton, responsibly, did not assume that, and neither did President Bush. Nor was there any indication intelligence could have been acquired that could have assured us, with 100 percent certainty, there was no such relationship.

Light on the Saddam regime's collaboration with terrorists will almost certainly be shed by analysis of some 2 million documents captured in Iraq. But, as the intrepid Stephen Hayes of the Weekly Standard has noted, almost none of those documents has been translated or released either to the public or to the congressional intelligence committees. It appears career professionals and, perhaps, political appointees have been blocking release of these documents.

Why do their superiors not order them released? Many Americans cling with religious intensity to the notion that Saddam somehow had no terrorist ties -- a notion used to delegitimize our war effort. We should bring the truth, or as much of it as is available, out into the open.

Pro-Taliban Rebel Holdouts Give Pakistanis A Fierce Fight (WP/REU)

By Reuters

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Toll Among Militants Exceeds 120, Military Says

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 6 -- Pakistani security forces battled pro-Taliban rebels holding out in a town near the Afghan border on Monday, killing 19 of them as the toll from three days of clashes rose to more than 120, the military said.

The rebels launched attacks on government positions in Miran Shah on Saturday as President Bush met Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in the capital. The fighting has raged since.

"Helicopter gunships have been pounding militant positions around Miran Shah," said a resident of the town that serves as the administrative capital of North Waziristan, a tribal region. "The situation is very tense."

The semiautonomous ethnic Pashtun lands along the Afghan border are Pakistan's front line in the war on terrorism.

After U.S. and Afghan opposition forces ousted the Taliban in late 2001, many al-Qaeda militants fled to the area, which was awash in weapons. Taliban supporters among the Pashtun clans offered al-Qaeda a refuge.

Hundreds of people have been killed since late 2004 as Pakistani forces have been trying to clear foreign militants from the border area and subdue their Pakistani allies.

Government forces faced stiff resistance as they tried to remove the last of the rebels from Miran Shah on Monday, said a military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Shaukat Sultan.

Militants launched attacks and seized government buildings Saturday in Miran Shah in revenge for a government attack Wednesday that killed 45 fighters.

The toll from the first day of fighting rose from 46 to more than 100 militants as more detailed reports arrived, Sultan said. Two militants were killed Sunday.

Five troops were killed and two wounded over the three days, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0016541

Thousands had left Miran Shah since last week's violence and the exodus was continuing Monday, said the resident, who spoke on condition of anonymity for fear of reprisals.

Violence targeting the U.S.-backed Afghan government and foreign troops has strained relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan. On Sunday, Musharraf derided Afghan accusations that the Taliban leader, Mohammad Omar, was in Pakistan.

A U.S. military spokesman in Afghanistan welcomed the Pakistani action in Waziristan.

"We see this as a very positive move," Col. Jim Yonts said. "This issue in Waziristan is an example that they are fighting the war on terrorism."

2 Leaders Trade Barbs Over Fight Against Taliban (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, March 6 — President Pervez Musharraf lashed out Monday at President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan for "bad-mouthing" Pakistan in recent weeks and casting doubt on its commitment to fight terrorism.

In a speech to Pakistani journalists in Rawalpindi that was broadcast on state television, Mr. Musharraf accused India of feeding false information to Afghan officials suggesting that the Pakistani intelligence agency was training terrorists.

He dismissed the allegation, and he described as "nonsense" a list of Taliban members, including the leader, Mullah Muhammad Omar, who Mr. Karzai said were operating in Pakistan.

The comments, echoing a message Mr. Musharraf has delivered in recent interviews, point not just to a new low in relations between Afghanistan and Pakistan, but also to difficulties with the United States.

President Bush visited Afghanistan and Pakistan last week, and Mr. Musharraf said he had sought to discredit the Afghan allegations in his meeting with Mr. Bush.

"The bad-mouthing against Pakistan is a deliberate, articulated conspiracy," Mr. Musharraf said. The Karzai administration, after several years of careful diplomacy with Pakistan, has become increasingly outspoken as violence has increased, including suicide bombings, beheadings and roadside bombs. Mr. Karzai came to Islamabad two weeks ago, and handed over what he said were intelligence files on Taliban members and others who, he said, were operating in Pakistan.

Mr. Musharraf said much of that information was outdated or wrong. He said, for example, that Pakistani officials found "decent people" living at an address given for Mr. Omar.

Mr. Musharraf faces increasing international pressure to stem the infiltration of insurgents into Afghanistan and to prevent the recruitment and training of suicide bombers, which the Afghans say takes place in Pakistan, Western diplomats said.

President Musharraf's spokesman, Maj. Gen. Sahukat Sultan, said fierce fighting against militants in North Waziristan over the weekend was proof of Pakistan's commitment. More than 100 people, including five soldiers, have been killed.

NATO Commander Downplays Afghan Insurgency Threat (REU-Y2)

By Will Dunham

Reuters, March 6, 2006

NATO's top commander said on Monday he doubted Taliban and al Qaeda forces were capable of posing a serious insurgent threat as the alliance expands its Afghanistan operations, calling narcotics the top worry.

NATO Supreme Allied Commander Europe Gen. James Jones also said the 26-nation alliance remained 25 percent short of the troops and equipment envisioned for its rapid-reaction force, and expressed renewed doubt he will be able to declare it fully operational as planned on October 1.

U.S.-led forces in 2001 overthrew Afghanistan's Taliban rulers who had harbored the al Qaeda network responsible for the September 11 attacks, and 23,000 U.S. troops currently are targeting Taliban and al Qaeda forces.

A wave of suicide bombings in recent months has killed dozens of people, part of an intensified insurgency that has killed more than 1,500 people since the start of last year. It has been the bloodiest period since the Taliban's overthrow, and the U.S. military warned of stepped up militant activity this spring.

"I think they are remnants," Jones said of the Taliban and al Qaeda at a Pentagon briefing. "... And I think that the upticks in violence are, in part, attributable to the fact that we're actually going to more places and taking the engagement to the enemy."

"My take on the situation in Afghanistan is that the Taliban and al Qaeda are not in a position to where they can restart an insurgency of any size and major scope," said Jones, a U.S. Marine Corps general.

Afghanistan, he said, was "fighting some internal demons."

"And one is certainly the narcotics culture and the dependence of the economy on narcotics -- which, from my standpoint, is probably the most serious problem facing the restructuring and the new path that Afghanistan would like to go on."

HEADING SOUTH

DOJ_NMG_0016542

NATO is preparing to expand its International Security Assistance Force mission -- already in the north, west and the capital Kabul -- to the more volatile south, going from 9,000 to 16,000 troops, and ultimately the east. Jones sees the southward expansion by July.

The State Department last week said opium production and trafficking make up a third of Afghanistan's economy. Afghanistan produces 90 percent of the world's opium poppies and is the largest heroin-producing and trafficking country.

Jones said concerted international action was needed.

"NATO's role in it is not to be an active participant, for example, in destroying crops and eradication. NATO does have a responsibility to be supportive and helpful, but in the more passive areas -- in other words, in the intelligence-gathering, oversight, overwatch, security," Jones said.

"Ninety percent of the harvest in Afghanistan is bought on the streets of Europe and translated back into supporting terrorist activities in Europe. So there's a real reason that we should all be concerned about this."

The NATO Response Force, proposed by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld in 2002, was supposed to have 25,000 troops deployable to distant trouble spots with five days' notice.

"At this point, we have not generated the force in sufficient numbers for me to be comfortable with standing up here and saying we will be successful," Jones said. "... We have generated about 75 percent of the requirement. So we're about 25 percent short."

Jones said he was "hopeful" but added, "As of right now, if this were 1 October today, I would not be standing here saying that we're fully operationally capable."

Jones said last month NATO was scaling back the force's first major maneuvers set for June.

NATO Commander: Drug Trade Is The Greatest Threat To Afghanistan (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, March 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -The top military commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization said Monday that the narcotics trade poses a greater threat to Afghanistan than a rekindled insurgency by Taliban and al-Qaida fighters.

Marine Corps Gen. James Jones, NATO's supreme commander, said he doesn't think that Taliban and al-Qaida remnants can "restart an insurgency of any size or major scope," but that they're part of a "wider span of problems" that includes the opium trade and rampant criminality.

Last week, however, Defense Intelligence Agency chief Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples said that attacks by Taliban and al-Qaida forces had increased by 20 percent in the last year.

Maples told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the insurgents represent a greater threat to Afghanistan now "than at any point since 2001," when U.S. troops and Afghan Northern Alliance rebels ousted the fundamentalist Taliban regime.

A total of 129 soldiers from the United States and its allies died in Afghanistan last year, more coalition deaths than in any other year since the Taliban were ousted in 2001, according to icasualties.org, a Web site that tracks U.S. and allied casualties. Of those, 99 were Americans. Those fatalities included combat deaths and deaths resulting from accidents and other non-combat related causes.

Jones said Monday that a 20 percent increase in attacks "is statistically not very significant" because the average number of daily attacks by Taliban and al-Qaida fighters had been "quite low."

"I don't think we're heading towards a revitalized insurgency," Jones told reporters at the Pentagon. "And I think that the upticks in violence are in part attributable to the fact that we're actually going to more places and taking the engagement to the enemy."

About 21,000 NATO troops from 36 countries are preparing to take over stability and security operations in southern and eastern Afghanistan in coming months. NATO will very likely take over stability operations throughout Afghanistan by the end of 2006, Jones said.

Some U.S. troops will be included in the NATO force, but that number hasn't been determined. Most U.S. troops, however, will concentrate on areas in eastern Afghanistan along the Pakistan border, where Taliban, al-Qaida and other anti-government groups remain active and where Osama bin Laden is believed to be hiding. Those soldiers will operate under a separate authority that reports to U.S. Central Command. There currently are about 23,000 U.S. troops in the country.

Jones said NATO's primary mission will be to assist in extending the authority of Afghan President Hamid Karzai's government across the country. Much of Afghanistan has never known central government rule and has been under the sway of powerful warlords since the Taliban's ouster.

DOJ_NMG_0016543

Many of those figures are close U.S. allies, but some are believed to have profited immensely from the opium trade, which was nearly wiped out by the Taliban, but has exploded since its collapse. U.S. intelligence officials believe the Taliban, al-Qaida and other anti-government groups are financing their insurgency in part through the narcotics trade.

Karzai's government undertook an opium eradication program in 2004, and last year Afghanistan experienced a 21 percent decline in land devoted to poppy cultivation, the first since 2001. But opium production is likely to rise again this year, according to a U.N. report issued Monday.

The U.N. report, based on a survey carried out in December and January, said poppy cultivation is increasing in 13 Afghan provinces, remaining the same in 16 and decreasing in three.

Despite last year's decrease in overall land devoted to poppies, good weather and a low incidence of plant disease yielded a bumper crop of opium, the U.N. reported in November.

Last year, Afghanistan produced an estimated 4,100 tons of opium, the main ingredient in heroin, about 87 percent of the world's supply, the U.N. reported.

Most of the resulting heroin ended up in Europe, which is partly why NATO member countries have a keen interest in the Afghanistan mission, Jones said. He said that NATO troops won't participate directly in eradication, but will provide intelligence-gathering and surveillance.

NATO Shrugs Off Afghan Violence (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

NATO's supreme allied commander downplayed yesterday press reports of a rejuvenated insurgency in Afghanistan, saying some of the violence stems from the drug trade and simple criminality, and not attacks by the ousted Taliban or al Qaeda.

"My take on the situation in Afghanistan is that the Taliban and al Qaeda are not in a position to where they can restart an insurgency of any size and major scope," said Marine Corps Gen. James Jones, whose NATO command is scheduled to take over the Afghanistan military and reconstruction mission later this year.

"Afghanistan is on the way to recovery, but is also fighting some internal demons," he said.

Since U.S.-led forces routed the harsh Taliban regime in December 2001, Afghanistan has held two nearly violence-free national elections that selected President Hamid Karzai and a new parliament. Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden planned the September 11, 2001, attacks from Afghanistan, where he built an army, terror training camps and a finance network.

Last year, there was an uptick in attacks as new Taliban and al Qaeda recruits organized in neighboring Pakistan and slipped across the border to Afghanistan to plant deadly improvised explosive devices and ambush security patrols.

Still, Afghanistan is far more peaceful than Iraq, the site of another al Qaeda-fed insurgency. And Gen. Jones seemed to signal that the Taliban-al Qaeda alliance is short-lived. He said one reason attacks are up percentagewise is that there were so few in 2004 that any increase seems significant.

He also said the emerging Afghan army is now operating in places it dare not go to a few years ago. "So the hiding places and the areas that were previously off-limits are now not off-limits," he said.

Gen. Jones has a keen interest in Afghanistan, even though it falls within the operational responsibility of U.S. Central Command, led by Army Gen. John Abizaid.

A major component in Afghanistan is NATO's International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), a group of European security forces who are training the Afghans, reconstructing public services, running the international airport and conducting counterinsurgency missions.

The ISAF is slated to take over the military mission, providing NATO with its first combat operation command far outside its traditional boundaries.

"At the end of the day, when ISAF takes over in Afghanistan, it will be roughly a 21,000-man force from 36 different nations," Gen. Jones said. There are 10,000 ISAF troops and 20,000 U.S. forces in Afghanistan. More than doubling the ISAF presence could mean that some of the U.S. troops will come home.

Central Command will continue to head the offensive counterterrorism mission, which includes the hunt for bin Laden, who is thought to be in the tribal areas of western Pakistan.

Defense and congressional officials say Afghanistan will not become a fully stable democracy until it rids itself of an embedded opium and heroin trade that corrupts the government and finances the insurgency.

Afghan Threat Played Down (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016544

The commander of NATO forces said yesterday that rising attacks in Afghanistan will test NATO troops as the alliance expands into volatile southern regions of the country this summer, but he stressed that al-Qaeda and Taliban rebels lack the ability to reignite a major insurgency.

Marine Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, played down an increase in violence more than four years after the U.S.-led military campaign ousted the Taliban from power in 2001. He said remnants of al-Qaeda and the Taliban in pockets of the country cannot "restart an insurgency of any size and major scope."

Instead, Jones cited the growing cultivation and trade of opium poppies as the "most serious problem" facing the central Asian nation today. A field survey released yesterday by the Afghan government and the United Nations predicted an increase in poppy cultivation in 2006 in 13 provinces and a decrease in three, with 16 others remaining unchanged.

"Afghanistan is on the way to recovery but is also fighting some internal demons. And one is certainly the narcotics culture and the dependence of the economy on narcotics," Jones said at a Pentagon news briefing. He said the military will play a supporting role in counternarcotics efforts, supplying intelligence and security while the Afghan government takes the lead in destroying crops.

Jones's assessment of the Afghan insurgency differed slightly in tone from that given last week by a senior military intelligence official. Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, testified before the Senate that "the Taliban-dominated insurgency remains capable and resilient." Attacks by the Taliban and other "anti-coalition" groups had increased by 20 percent in 2005, he said, including more suicide bombings and a doubling of strikes by improvised explosive devices.

"We judge that the insurgency appears emboldened by perceived tactical successes and will be active this spring," Maples said.

Jones also said violence is likely to grow this spring -- often a time of insurgent offensives in Afghanistan. "I think you're going to see more testing, more attacks," he said. "NATO, when it comes into the southern part, will be tested."

NATO plans by July to expand its military presence from the north and west and send several thousand more troops into the former Taliban stronghold of southern Afghanistan. That will leave the main mission of U.S. military forces as the eastern region along the Pakistan border, where much of the fighting takes place. Ultimately, Jones said, a 21,000-strong force from the 26 NATO member states and 10 other countries will assume the overall security mission in Afghanistan, although the U.S. military will continue to lead counter-terrorist operations under a distinct chain of command.

US Envoy Vows Commitment To Calm Afghan Fears (FT)

By Rachel Morarjee In Kabul

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

Ronald Neumann, the US ambassador to Afghanistan, said America's commitment to Afghanistan would not be compromised when Nato troops take command of the country's restive south later this year.

Mr Neumann said the US was the lead nation in Nato and the success of the Nato mission in southern Afghanistan had ramifications far beyond the country's borders. "This is the biggest mission Nato has taken on and it is a defining opportunity for the future of Nato," he said in an interview with the Financial Times.

His comments follow President George W. Bush's unscheduled stopover in Afghanistan last Wednesday on his way to India and Pakistan, where he reaffirmed US commitment to the war-torn nation.

Canada will take over command of the fight against the insurgency in southern Afghanistan as 6,000 British, Dutch and other Nato troops are deployed across the region in coming months.

Mr Neumann's remarks come as Afghan officials become increasingly nervous that the withdrawal of about 3,000 US troops after the handover to Nato command will signal to the Taliban that American forces are gradually pulling out of the country.

"Troops from the Dutch, the Romanians, the Canadian and the British may be very good, but their differing missions will result in confusion that militants will be able to exploit," a top Af-ghan government official said. With escalating tensions between Afghanistan and Pakistan, where Afghan intelligence officials believe militants are training and picking up supplies before launching attacks in Afghanistan, a major US troop presence is seen as a deterrent.

"Our neighbours have a history of hostile interference in Afghanistan, and only the US is strong enough to act as a bulwark against them," the Afghan official added.

Mr Neumann said the US would remain the lead nation of Nato and continue to provide air and logistical support, and troops in southern Afghanistan as well as leading the fight against the Taliban in the east.

"It is not acceptable for us to go away. We are a part of Nato," he said ahead of a meeting in Washington to discuss the details of a long-term strategic partnership between Afghanistan and the US later this month.

DOJ_NMG_0016545

US training of the Afghan national army would also continue.

Mr Neumann said it would ensure a sizeable US presence across the country. “The idea that we would leave those people out there on their own without support is a political fallacy.”

Fewer Troops Desert Since 9/11 (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — At least 8,000 members of the all-volunteer U.S. military have deserted since the Iraq war began, Pentagon records show, although the overall desertion rate has plunged since the Sept. 11 attacks in 2001.

Since fall 2003, 4,387 Army soldiers, 3,454 Navy sailors and 82 Air Force personnel have deserted. The Marine Corps does not track the number of desertions each year but listed 1,455 Marines in desertion status last September, the end of fiscal 2005, says Capt. Jay Delarosa, a Marine Corps spokesman.

Desertion records are kept by fiscal year, so there are no figures from the beginning of the war in March 2003 until that fall.

Some lawyers who represent deserters say the war in Iraq is driving more soldiers to question their service and that the Pentagon is cracking down on deserters to discourage anti-war sentiment.

“The last thing (Pentagon officials) want is for people to think … that this is like Vietnam,” says Tod Ensign, head of Citizen Soldier, an anti-war group that offers legal aid to deserters.

Desertion numbers have dropped since 9/11. The Army, Navy and Air Force reported 7,978 desertions in 2001, compared with 3,456 in 2005. The Marines showed 1,603 deserters in 2001. That declined by 148 in 2005.

The desertion rate was much higher during the Vietnam era. The Army saw a high of 33,094 deserters in 1971 — 3.4% of the Army force. But there was a draft and the active-duty force was 2.7 million.

Desertions in 2005 represent 0.24% of the 1.4 million U.S. forces.

Opposition to the war prompts a small fraction of desertions, says Army spokeswoman Maj. Elizabeth Robbins. “People always desert, and most do it because they don't adapt well to the military,” she says. The majority of desertions happen inside the USA, Robbins says. There is only one known case of desertion in Iraq.

Most deserters return without coercion. Commander Randy Lescault, spokesman for the Naval Personnel Command, says that between 2001 and 2005, 58% of Navy deserters walked back in. Of the rest, most are apprehended during traffic stops.

Penalties range from other-than-honorable discharges to death for desertion during wartime.

Decades Later, Marines Hunt Vietnam-era Deserters (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — In the summer of 1965, Marine Cpl. Jerry Texiero quietly disappeared from his California base, plagued by personal demons and a mounting opposition to the Vietnam War.

Forty years later, in the summer of 2005, Texiero — now known as Gerome Conti — was taken into custody by police in Tarpon Springs, Fla., after the Marine Corps tracked him down.

Three decades after the war ended, hundreds of Vietnam-era deserters are still on the loose. Conti's attorneys, Louis Font and Tod Ensign, say the Pentagon, and the Marine Corps in particular, are cracking down on long-term cases in an effort to warn current-day troops in Iraq against deserting.

“My view is that the Marines are trying to send a message to people in the ranks today that they, too, will be required to participate in a war, whether they think it's illegal or immoral,” Font says.

Marine spokesman Capt. Jay Delarosa says there was nothing unusual about the treatment of Conti.

However, the Marine official in charge of bringing in deserters said after Conti's arrest that his office was being more aggressive.

Chief Warrant Officer James Averhart, who has commanded the Marine Corps Absentee Collection Center since September 2004, told the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times that he had ordered cold cases reopened and that his squad had caught 27 deserters in his first 11 months on the job, a rate he suggested was higher than those of his predecessors. The Corps last month updated that number to 33 cases.

“I have a different leadership style than the guys who have had this job. My job is to catch deserters. And that's what I do,” Averhart told the newspaper.

Delarosa said Averhart would not answer questions from USA TODAY. Asked whether the Marine Corps stands by Averhart's comments, Delarosa said, “I wasn't involved in that particular interview with CWO Averhart.” He added that the Marine Corps has “discouraged most requests for interviews because CWO Averhart has been frequently misquoted.”

DOJ_NMG_0016546

Will Van Sant, who wrote the Times article, says the Marines never contacted him after it appeared.

Conti, 65, says he was surprised. “I thought they couldn't possibly be looking for me anymore. I would think they would have stopped looking for anybody who had been gone as long as I had.”

Conti was held for five months — four in solitary confinement — then given an other-than-honorable discharge in January. If he had been court-martialed and convicted, he could have faced three years in the brig and a dishonorable discharge.

Another long-term Marine deserter, Ernest “Buck” McQueen, was arrested in Fort Worth in January. McQueen was Ernest Johnson Jr. when he left Camp Lejeune, N.C., in November 1969 because of concerns about going to Vietnam. McQueen, 55, was discharged without disciplinary action.

McQueen says he didn't take a new name to hide. His Social Security card says “McQueen.” He says he was born Ernest Johnson Jr., but when his biological father left, his mother raised her son by her married name, McQueen. When he joined the Marines, he says, they insisted he go by Ernest Johnson Jr.

The government drafted men for the armed forces during wartime from the Civil War until 1973. Conti and McQueen enlisted.

In 1974, President Ford offered clemency to Vietnam draft resisters and deserters. Only 27,000 of 350,000 eligible applied. The offer expired on April 1, 1975. In 1977, President Carter pardoned those who dodged the war by not registering or fleeing the country. Neither Conti nor McQueen applied for the Ford pardon. Both spent decades hiding their past from families and employers. McQueen kept his military experience from two wives and two children, and even Conti's best friend in Florida, Elaine Smith, knew nothing of his history with the Marines.

McQueen says he had been in the Marines for nearly two years when he learned of the My Lai massacre in 1968, when hundreds of Vietnamese civilians were killed by U.S. soldiers. “I saw photos of guys with ears on their chains. I lost my desire to be a part of it.”

Conti says his decision to desert was a combination of lingering emotional scars from a childhood lived in foster homes and concerns about stories he also was hearing about Vietnam.

Special Agent Tom Lorang of the Air Force Office of Special Investigations (OSI) says most older desertion cases are filed away after an initial investigation is completed, although some are re-examined.

Except for the Marine Corps, military officials say long-term cases normally are closed when deserters voluntarily come back in or are stopped by civilian law officials, not through efforts to track them down.

That's not Conti's or McQueen's story. Conti says he was told his file was reopened and his fingerprints were run through a national database. He was in the database because he had been convicted of fraud and theft in 1998. He was on probation and paying restitution when the Marines caught up with him.

McQueen, a carpenter, says his former brother-in-law was called by Marine investigators, and he told them where to find him. “This kind of … put me in a financial bind,” says McQueen, who had been doing carpentry for a church when he was seized.

Conti has returned to his job selling boats, which his employer kept open for him while he was locked up.

“They just need to declare amnesty for everybody from a certain time back or from certain conflicts,” says Elaine Smith, Conti's friend. “These guys … just had issues, as we all did back in the '60s.”

Military officials maintain that those who deserted the service are liable under law, no matter how unpopular a war was. “We actively investigate all cases of desertion,” says Fred Hall, a spokesman for the Naval Personnel Command. “For each of the active deserters we have on our rolls — 1,190 as of 31 Jan. '06 — there is a federal warrant out for their arrest.”

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Lawyer Defends Skilling's Enron Comment As Sarcasm (REU)

By Matt Daily

Reuters, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON (Reuters) - Former Enron Corp. CEO Jeffrey Skilling was using sarcasm when he told several top executives in 2001 "they're on to us," his lawyer suggested on Monday at the trial of Skilling and ex-CEO Ken Lay.

The lawyer, Mark Holscher, sought to sow doubts about the comment that a witness, former executive Kevin Hannon, told the jury last week he heard Skilling say in reaction to a May 2001 analyst report that was sharply critical of Enron.

Hannon had said he took Skilling's comment at the meeting to mean that investors were "starting to understand how Enron made money," and appeared to link Skilling to efforts to cover up the decaying state of Enron's finances.

"Can you tell this jury whether (Skilling's voice) was dripping with sarcasm when he said 'they're onto us?'" Holscher asked Hannon.

DOJ_NMG_0016547

"Anything's possible," replied Hannon in the clipped manner he used throughout the day's cross examination. Hannon was formerly chief operating officer of Enron's Internet unit Enron Broadband Services.

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, are on trial for conspiracy and fraud charges linked to the collapse of Enron into bankruptcy in December 2001.

That filing, the largest U.S. bankruptcy until then, was the first of a wave of corporate scandals that rocked Wall Street and prompted tighter financial disclosure laws.

Skilling also faces insider trading charges.

Hannon, 45, is the latest in a string of former top Enron executives to testify against Lay and Skilling. Hannon has pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit securities and wire fraud and could face up to five years in prison -- a sentence that could be reduced by helping prosecutors.

All attention on Tuesday will be focused on the prosecutors' star witness, Andrew Fastow, the company's former chief financial officer who operated the off-balance-sheet partnerships the company used to hide billions of dollars in debt while inflating earnings.

Lay and Skilling have blamed Fastow and his theft of tens of millions of dollars from his illicit side deals as the cause of a "run on the bank" that lead to the company's demise.

Fastow, 44, pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and will forfeit nearly $24 million and spend 10 years in prison. His wife, Lea, served a one-year sentence in jail for filing a false tax return in a case that was an outcropping of his.

Fastow arrived at the federal courthouse in downtown Houston on Monday morning and had to be ushered by marshals through a horde of photographers awaiting his appearance. He remained behind closed doors inside the courthouse, awaiting the end of Hannon's time on the witness stand.

Star Witness Fastow To Take Stage Today (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON — Finally, four years after Enron's spectacular collapse, the moment everyone's been waiting for has arrived: Andrew Fastow, the company's disgraced former chief financial officer, is expected to tell his side of the story in court here today.

While the government's trial of former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling has been going on for more than five weeks, testimony from the first 10 witnesses has focused largely on the abysmal financial condition of two business units — Enron Broadband Services and Enron Energy Services. Several have said that Lay and Skilling made misleading statements about the units to the investing public.

But with Fastow, who pleaded guilty to two felonies, prosecutors are expected to zero in on what Lay and Skilling knew about the overall financial condition of Enron, and when they knew it. More than any other witness so far, the former CFO was in a position to know whether the defendants — particularly Skilling — were lying to investors or simply painting an optimistic, and legal, picture of Enron in 2000 and 2001.

Enron collapsed in fall 2001 after the public learned it met earnings targets by selling assets to private partnerships controlled by Fastow. That shook investor confidence, but when they also learned that Fastow had diverted more than $30 million from those transactions into his own pocket, people were outraged.

With Lay and Skilling, he was vilified as a symbol of executive greed. Unlike Lay and Skilling, who vocally defended themselves even before they were indicted, Fastow has been silent the past four years. So excitement surrounds what he'll say in court this week.

“We're about to find out if he operated with a wink and a nod with Mr. Lay and Mr. Skilling,” says Philip Hilder, a Houston attorney who represents Enron internal whistle-blower Sherron Watkins and several other former employees.

But Hilder doesn't think Fastow's testimony will be explosive. “Andy Fastow is a single witness, but I don't think he's a make-it-or-break-it witness,” he says. “The government has been putting on a steady stream of witnesses that corroborate the actions Fastow will talk about.”

In fact, the prosecution should keep its questioning of Fastow narrowly focused on conversations with Skilling and Lay, says law professor John Coffee at Columbia University. “I don't think they'll let Mr. Fastow get anywhere near the exotic accounting techniques used by Enron,” he says. “From the prosecution standpoint, they don't want him to be Hamlet, the brooding prince of Denmark. They want him to be Rosencrantz or Guildenstern, just a minor character.”

Fastow Looms Large At Enron Trial (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON, March 6 -- For five weeks, the shadow of former Enron Corp. finance chief Andrew S. Fastow has hovered over the fraud trial of his onetime bosses.

Jurors have heard lawyers for former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling and chairman Kenneth L. Lay denounce Fastow for "stealing Enron's good name." They caught a glimpse of Fastow promoting secretive business partnerships that enriched him by more than $45 million at the company's expense. And they listened last week to testimony that Fastow called the structures "a good deal for me" in the presence of both defendants, leaving Enron employees at that meeting in a "stunned silence."

As early as Tuesday, Fastow will take center stage as the trial's most highly anticipated witness -- and one of its most unpredictable. His presence is expected to electrify the federal courthouse here, where court officials are preparing for an onslaught of bystanders eager to hear Fastow speak publicly for the first time since his January 2004 guilty plea.

Both the Justice Department's Enron Task Force and the defense team have plenty of reasons to fear Fastow and the impact of his testimony. Government lawyers have signaled that they hope to limit their questioning to a day or less, given the liabilities he brings with him -- admissions that he improperly pocketed millions of dollars during his tenure. Defense lawyers intend to keep him on the witness stand for days trying to tear apart his account.

On one point, however, both sides agree: Fastow, 44, remains the most elusive and demonized character in a story that has come to symbolize an era of corporate malfeasance.

To hear former Enron employees tell it, Fastow is far from likable. Under hostile fire at Enron, Fastow did not hesitate to wield his power to cow subordinates and bully investment bankers. The son of a New Jersey salesman, he exuded confidence in his own abilities and punished analysts who dared to cross him. Fastow and the prosecutors will probably try to keep that side of his personality off display.

But defense lawyers must walk a fine line as they seek to discredit Fastow as a liar and a thief. For years, he was the company's go-to man, an award-winning finance chief lauded for his ability to devise clever financial structures. Top executives compensated him handsomely, they said later, because they feared he might defect.

Skilling handpicked Fastow to ascend to the job of chief financial officer, took him on motorcycle races and vested him with tremendous responsibility. Lay insisted for months that Fastow had his "complete confidence" during warnings about his behavior, only to fire him abruptly in late October 2001 after reporters and analysts requested information about his private partnerships.

If Fastow was motivated by greed and the desire for validation, Enron's leaders and its board of directors did little to rein him in. According to congressional testimony, no one at Enron bothered to inquire exactly how much Fastow was making from the deals, which helped the company generate cash flow and move billions of dollars in underperforming assets off its books. When the answer finally came in the fall of 2001, then-board member Charles A. LeMaistre jotted down the word "incredible" on his notepad. Within days, Fastow was gone.

After Enron filed for bankruptcy protection in December 2001 and investigators pounced, Fastow's lawyer at the time took the unusual step of holding a news conference to quash rumors that Fastow had fled to Israel. Fastow steadfastly denied requests to testify before Congress and other investigative bodies, telling lawyers for the company's board the following January that he acted to help Enron and did nothing without the approval of his superiors, accountants and lawyers.

But a former colleague, Jordan Mintz, later told investigators that Fastow had said Skilling would fire him if the chief executive knew the scale of Fastow's profit from the partnerships.

People close to Fastow say he is furious about attempts to portray him as the fall guy for Enron's collapse. The company's downfall carried powerful consequences not only for Fastow, whose black hair has since turned gray, but also for his family.

His wife, Lea W. Fastow, heiress to a Texas real estate and grocery fortune, emerged from a halfway house in July. She spent most of her one-year sentence in an 8-by-10-foot cell in downtown Houston's Federal Detention Center alongside drug offenders and women awaiting trial on violent crime charges. She pleaded guilty to a single misdemeanor tax count for failing to report $141,000 in income from her husband's partnerships. At the time of her plea, she told the judge she was taking prescription drugs often used to treat depression and anxiety.

Andrew S. Fastow pleaded guilty to two conspiracy charges that will send him to prison for 10 years -- agreeing to the deal only when his wife was on the verge of heading to trial. Their sons, Jeffrey and Michael, will be in high school and college by the time Fastow returns from prison. Because parole has been abolished in the federal system, Fastow must serve at least 85 percent of his sentence -- more than eight years.

Fastow's lawyer, David Gerger, declined to comment, as did many of Fastow's friends. Fastow mostly has been keeping out of the public eye, working with government lawyers to decode Enron's byzantine accounting practices. He occasionally walks through a local park and dines with his family at local restaurants in the neighborhood surrounding Rice University, near the city's finest museums and his immaculately maintained, ivy-covered home assessed at $690,000 in 2003.

As part of his deal with the government, Fastow turned over $24 million in cash and assets, including his unfinished $3.4 million dream house in another tony Houston neighborhood, waterfront property in Galveston, Tex., and 68 acres in Norwich, Vt.

Prosecutors sandwiched Fastow in the middle of their case in a strategic attempt not to leave jurors with any lasting, negative impressions. The witness scheduled to follow Fastow on the stand is Chris Loehr, a young analyst trainee who went to work for the Fastow-operated partnership LJM, named after the first initials of Fastow's wife and two sons. Loehr has never been charged with a crime, and he has cooperated with investigators for nearly four years -- making him a more difficult target for defense lawyers to sully. Former Enron treasurer Ben F. Glisan Jr., who is serving a five-year prison sentence for his work on some of the partnerships, also will testify for the government.

Lawyer For Scrushy Sees Skilling, Lay As 'doomed' (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, March 7, 2006

HOUSTON — As if former Enron CEOs Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling don't have enough to worry about with the government's star witness expected to begin testifying against them today, a prominent defense lawyer who helped win an acquittal for another embattled CEO says the two men are already toast, at least in the courtroom.

Donald Watkins, a civil rights lawyer and businessman who last year helped former HealthSouth CEO Richard Scrushy beat charges that he masterminded a $2.7 billion fraud, said in an interview Friday that Lay and Skilling are "doomed."

"There comes a time when you can forecast the outcome of a contest," said Watkins, who has not attended the trial but has followed it closely in the media. "In this contest, these guys have lost."

The reason, according to Watkins, is that the two men settled on the wrong defense strategy. In their opening arguments, lawyers for the two men told the jury that Enron was a solid company done in by a loss of confidence among investors and trading partners after the disclosure that former chief financial officer Andrew Fastow had diverted tens of millions of dollars into his own pocket.

Watkins says this defense — that Enron was fundamentally a healthy company — is a non-starter. "Nobody's going to buy that," he says. Further, the tactics used so far by the defense — vigorous cross-examinations of cooperating witnesses who have already pleaded guilty — "lacks imagination."

"These types of trials involve not only legal issues, but political and social issues. You have to address all of that. They have ignored the political and social angles. When you do that, you lose every time. They never put the government on trial."

"Lay and Skilling are the poster boys for Sarbanes-Oxley," says Watkins, referring to the law passed after the exposure of accounting problems drove Enron and WorldCom into bankruptcy. "They're part of a Justice Department campaign to clean up accounting in Corporate America. The defense is treating it like it is a regular white-collar criminal case."

Watkins says the Lay-Skilling defense would have been better off putting the government itself on trial, digging into the process by which prosecutors built their case. In the Scrushy trial last year in Birmingham, Ala., Watkins and his legal team challenged the prosecution at every turn, forcing the government to put FBI agents on the stand to testify about how secret recordings of the defendant were made and handled.

"There are certain things that resonate with jurors," Watkins says. "They will not tolerate government misconduct, period. Every juror scans the courtroom and wonders privately, 'If I were sitting there, would they be coming after me, too?' You have to address these thoughts and make them think, 'Yes, they would steamroll me, too.' "

Lay's attorney, Mike Ramsey, respectfully disagreed with Watkins, saying, "It's very hard to handicap a case without being in the middle of it." But he did concede that so far, at least, "There have not been a lot of over-the-top attacks on people in the courtroom."

But after five weeks, Ramsey says, "I'm very happy with the position we're in right now. It's hard to know in the middle of a fight, in the fog of battle, whether you're winning. We're probably in better shape now than we thought."

As for the prosecution, Watkins says it is doing a good job pacing the trial. For the first two weeks, jurors listened to testimony from Mark Koenig, Enron's former head of investor relations. Koenig, who pleaded guilty to one count of aiding and abetting securities fraud, was a minor player in the fraud that Lay and Skilling are alleged to have covered up at Enron, but he came across as credible and set the table for a number of issues that subsequent witnesses addressed.

Since Koenig stepped down, nine others have testified about accounting problems at Enron or other related issues. Today, prosecutors will call Fastow, and he is expected to implicate Lay and Skilling in the conspiracy to prop up Enron's earnings.

"In Scrushy's case, the government couldn't wait to trot out their big cooperators," Watkins says. The Enron prosecutors brought out "their more credible witnesses first" and put their biggest witness in a position where the entire case doesn't ride on his credibility.

DOJ_NMG_0016550

According to Watkins' rules for managing white-collar criminal cases, there is some hope. In the Scrushy trial, the primary defense lawyer, Jim Parkman, emerged as a folksy, likable character who frequently got jurors and the judge to laugh.

"If the jury is not laughing with you, you are losing," Watkins says. In the Scrushy trial, "They bonded with Parkman. I have never seen jurors convict a defendant when they're laughing with a defendant. If there's no smiles, no laughter, those guys are doomed."

That's good news for Skilling. His lead attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, has emerged as the star of the trial, cracking up jurors with unscripted remarks and amusing U.S. District Judge Sim Lake with lively banter.

As for Watkins, Ramsey suggested he travel to Houston this week "to watch us work over Mr. Fastow."

DaimlerChrysler Suspends Employees In Bribery Inquiry (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

FRANKFURT, March 6 — DaimlerChrysler has dismissed or suspended several employees after an internal investigation uncovered evidence that its executives paid bribes in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

In a report filed Monday with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the company said it had "determined that improper payments were made in a number of jurisdictions." The payments, it said, could violate both German law and the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act in the United States.

The Justice Department and the S.E.C. have been investigating accusations of bribery at DaimlerChrysler since last year. The company has cooperated with the investigations, and these latest disclosures shed more light on the far-flung corruption inquiry.

The filing, however, does not answer a crucial question: whether senior Mercedes managers knew about the payments. It does not identify the countries where bribes were paid, or say how many people were involved.

A spokesman for DaimlerChrysler, Thomas Fröhlich, declined to comment beyond the facts in the filing. But he said, "Dieter Zetsche and Bodo Uebber are keen to take action on this."

Mr. Zetsche is DaimlerChrysler's chief executive, and Mr. Uebber is the chief financial officer.

Last October, a report on the United Nations oil-for-food scandal said DaimlerChrysler paid a kickback of 6,950 euros ($8,372) to Iraqi officials in return for a contract from the government of Saddam Hussein. The Justice Department and the S.E.C. are investigating this as well.

Bribery of foreign officials used to be fairly common in the auto industry. As recently as 1997, bribes paid to foreigners by German companies were tax-deductible in Germany. Now, foreign corruption is illegal in the European Union, as it is in the United States.

The investigation is a distraction for Mr. Zetsche, as he begins to turn around the company's flagship Mercedes-Benz division. The brand has been tarnished by quality problems in recent years, but sales of the Mercedes car group rose 16 percent in February, the company said Monday.

DaimlerChrysler painted an optimistic picture of sales at Mercedes and Chrysler, as both divisions roll out new models. It warned, however, that sales at its truck division would suffer because of a downturn in the market and stricter emissions standards in the United States and Japan.

With DaimlerChrysler's performance improving, analysts have not paid much attention to the scandal. They prefer to focus on other issues, like DaimlerChrysler's effort to fix its ailing Smart minicar division. Mercedes will also update the design of its best-selling E-class sedan this year.

"The make or break for Mercedes will be the face-lift of the E-class," said Arndt Ellinghorst, an analyst at Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein, adding, "I have confidence in Dieter Zetsche."

Still, the bribery payments took a bite out of DaimlerChrysler's bottom line. It said it reduced its 2005 operating profit by 16 million euros ($17.2 million) and its net income by 64 million euros ($76.8 million).

To reflect improper payments made from 1994 to 2002, DaimlerChrysler said it had reduced the balance of stockholders' equity, as of Jan. 1, 2003, by 222 million euros ($266 million).

DaimlerChrysler's practices came to light in 2004 in a lawsuit filed by a former Chrysler accountant, David J. Bazzetta, who said the company had maintained secret bank accounts to bribe foreign government officials. Mr. Bazzetta sued after being fired from his job.

In its filing, DaimlerChrysler said it had set up a global compliance organization to review its policies and practices.

"We have initiated improvements in our business processes as well as in compliance, control and training activities in order to foster a culture defined by openness and honesty," the company said.

DOJ_NMG_0016551

DaimlerChrysler Finds Improper Payments (AP)

By MATT MOORE, AP BUSINESS WRITER

AP, March 7, 2006

FRANKFURT, Germany -- Automaker DaimlerChrysler AG said Monday that an internal investigation of bribery claims found evidence of "improper payments" in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe. It said several employees had been dismissed or suspended.

The company disclosed the findings in a filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission on Monday.

The German-American automaker is still under investigation by the SEC and the Department of Justice over whether it violated U.S. anti-bribery laws.

"We have determined that improper payments were made in a number of jurisdictions, primarily in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe," the company said in its filing. "These payments raise concerns under the U.S. FCPA, German law, and the laws of other jurisdictions."

"In connection with our internal investigation, we have identified and self-reported potential tax liabilities to tax authorities in several jurisdictions," it added. "These tax liabilities of DaimlerChrysler AG and certain foreign affiliates result from misclassifications of, or the failure to record, commissions and other payments and expenses."

The filing did not specify how many employees were dismissed or suspended, and did not identify them.

The U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act prohibits the payment of bribes to foreign officials.

DaimlerChrysler disclosed the investigation last year in a similar filing with the SEC.

The U.S. Justice Department said in August 2005 that it was investigating whether DaimlerChrysler had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations.

That criminal investigation is tied to an inquiry opened in 2004 by the SEC after an employee fired by the automaker said he was dismissed for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials.

DaimlerChrysler said then, and reiterated Monday, that it was cooperating with the investigations, sharing with both agencies information from its internal probe.

Company spokesman Thomas Froehlich told The Associated Press that both Chief Executive Dieter Zetsche and Chief Financial Officer Bodo Uebber had taken steps to ensure the company operates in a transparent and ethical manner.

"(They) are very much committed to taking action," he said.

The filing also said that because of the bribery claims, the company "recognized charges in our 2005 consolidated statement of income to correct misstatements relating to the years 2003 and 2004 which had the effect of reducing 2005 operating profit by 16 million euros and reducing 2005 net income by 64 million euros."

$1.5 Trillion Of Debt (WSJ)

By Peter J. Wallison

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

The Rudman Report on Fannie Mae recites facts eerily similar to what we now know about Enron. According to the report, the CFO of Fannie misled the board (and possibly the CEO) about the financial position of the company. The CEO, head of the corporate governance committee of the powerful Business Roundtable, regularly misled Wall Street and the board, but may not have understood the accounting. The auditors (this time not Arthur Andersen) failed to stand up to the management or didn't understand what was happening. The board, primarily made up of independent directors, and the audit committee, made up entirely of independent directors, were unable to penetrate the scam and remained clueless as earnings were manipulated. In Fannie's case there was also a regulator, but the regulator did not begin to look into any problems until it had been surprised by similar wrongdoing at Fannie's smaller sibling, Freddie Mac.

What we should learn from this -- much of which occurred after the adoption of Sarbanes-Oxley -- is that a board made up primarily of independent directors, an audit committee made up entirely of independent directors, a Big Four accounting firm alerted to the dangers of accounting fraud, and a regulator that claimed to be fully on top of what was happening, could not prevent senior management from fudging the accounting and misleading the board and investors. No surprise there. Many observers were saying, both before and after the enactment of SOX, that a management determined to defraud or mislead could evade the scrutiny of all the gatekeepers.

This has important implications for the legislation now before Congress to reform the regulation of Fannie and Freddie and limit the size of their portfolios. Since dishonesty and incompetence are an unavoidable fact of life, and gatekeepers are unreliable, investors must protect themselves by diversifying their investments. But there is good reason to believe that diversification would not be available if dishonesty or incompetence at Fannie or Freddie in the future resulted in the collapse or financial incapacity of either.

DOJ_NMG_0016552

Fannie and Freddie are not ordinary companies. They have almost $1.5 trillion of debt outstanding, which they borrowed to buy and carry portfolios of mortgages and mortgage-backed securities; these portfolios expose both companies to enormous interest-rate and prepayment risk. To hedge this risk, Fannie and Freddie are parties to derivatives transactions with notional values in the trillions, in which the counterparties are some of the largest financial institutions; any failure of Fannie or Freddie to meet its obligations would expose these institutions to substantial losses. Fannie and Freddie debt is also held widely by banks and other financial institutions, in some cases accounting for more than 100% of their capital; a decline in the value of that debt would seriously weaken these organizations and reduce their capacity to lend.

Finally, both companies are central to the real-estate financing market. If either of them could not function normally, that market -- amounting to almost a third of the economy -- would freeze up. As Alan Greenspan has pointed out for years, the risks inherent in the portfolios carried by Fannie and Freddie add up to huge systemic risk -- the danger that a failure at either company will spread to the economy as a whole.

So here is the key difference between Enron and either Fannie or Freddie. Dishonesty or incompetence in Enron's management hurt shareholders and employees, both of whom could have protected themselves through diversification of investments. Dishonesty or incompetence in Fannie's or Freddie's managements could throw the economy into chaos, and from that catastrophe diversification provides no shelter. Faith in boards, audit committees, auditors and even regulators has been shown to be misplaced. Sure, Congress would likely come in and bail them out -- but immediately, without extended debate, and with trillions of taxpayer dollars potentially at risk? Not a chance. And the damage in the meantime would be devastating.

As reform legislation languishes in the Senate, Congress should consider the lessons of Enron, Fannie and Freddie: Despite our best efforts, error and fraud will occur. That's why it's important to make sure -- by reducing the size of Fannie and Freddie's portfolios -- that no future management failure at either company will threaten the stability of the economy.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutors Slam Ryan, Call Him Shameless (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, March 7, 2006

Closing arguments began in former Gov. George Ryan's trial Monday with prosecutors blasting him as a shameless, greedy politician at the center of a series of dirty deals that enriched cronies who kicked back cash and gifts to Ryan and his family.

"You've heard of 12 days of Christmas. This was 12 years of Christmas," Assistant U.S. Atty. Joel Levin said of Ryan's four years as governor and eight years as secretary of state.

In nearly five hours of arguments, prosecutors portrayed Ryan as a two-faced, serial liar who publicly claimed he did all he could to eliminate fraud at licensing facilities but privately gutted corruption-fighting efforts to keep his political fundraising machine humming along.

Early in his years as secretary of state, Ryan received two warnings about questionable conduct by co-defendant Lawrence Warner, prosecutors said, but Ryan ran interference for his friend rather than demand a halt to the wrongdoing.

Prosecutors spoke of compelling circumstantial evidence that Ryan pocketed cash from Warner and lobbyist Arthur "Ron" Swanson, pointing out Ryan had scant known sources of cash for almost a decade, yet gambled thousands of dollars. After he left the governor's office, Ryan regularly took out cash from personal bank accounts, in sharp contrast to his few withdrawals when he was an officeholder, they said.

"When this 12 years of Christmas fun comes to an end, what you find is he starts withdrawing cash on a regular basis like everybody else," Levin said.

After more than five months of testimony, jurors listened intently on the first day of what is expected to be at least four days of closing arguments. Levin shared his duties with Assistant U.S. Atty. Laurie Barsella, who is set to wrap up her remarks Tuesday before Dan Webb, Ryan's lead lawyer, delivers his closing argument. Warner's lawyer, Edward Genson, could argue beginning Wednesday.

The closing arguments played out in a packed courtroom. Ryan, wife Lura Lynn and their five adult children showed little reaction to the prosecution arguments.

Also in the courtroom for the fourth time during the trial were Rev. Duane "Scott" and Janet Willis, whose six children were killed in a 1994 crash caused by defective equipment that fell off a truck whose driver paid a bribe for his license.

DOJ_NMG_0016553

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer has limited details of that accident in a bid to try to keep jurors from figuring out that it was the horrific crash that has come to symbolize the tragic consequences of Illinois' licenses-for-bribes scandal.

But Monday Ryan's lawyers sought a mistrial after the prosecution displayed to jurors a document on the accident that referred to a "mudflap frame," the heavy part that fell from the truck. Prosecutors disputed the reference would trigger a connection by jurors to the Willis tragedy.

Pallmeyer has rejected numerous previous defense requests for mistrial, and the success of one this late in the trial would seem highly unlikely. Pallmeyer appeared displeased at the timing of the motion.

"I myself have this job for life, and I would be happy to start this case over on Monday morning," she said, her voice dripping with sarcasm.

Levin told jurors that Ryan's fingerprints were all over a series of crooked contracts and lease deals that went to Warner, Swanson and Harry Klein, another friend.

Klein played host to Ryan for 10 years at his Jamaican villa, where the two entered a corrupt arrangement to create a paper trail showing Ryan paid for the trips when, in fact, Klein reimbursed Ryan in cash for the cost of the stays, a combined $13,500 over the decade, Levin said.

In return, prosecutors allege Klein, a currency exchange operator, got a sweetheart lease on a building in South Holland and benefited from a Ryan-approved rate hike on the amount exchanges charge for selling state license plate stickers.

Even after Ryan allegedly lied to the FBI about his cash-back arrangement with Klein, the then-governor continued to travel to Klein's Jamaican villa every year, Levin said.

Ryan also steered another deal—the move of a secretary of state department to a Springfield complex represented by Swanson—on the heels of a Cancun vacation in which Ryan stayed at Swanson's time-share condominium, Ryan said.

Barsella said Warner "hit the jackpot" after Ryan was elected secretary of state in 1990.

For years, Warner had been an insurance adjuster. But after Ryan took office, Warner suddenly became a lobbyist, striking deals with vendors that brought him about $3 million even though he concealed his role, she said.

The benefits went to Ryan's family as well as himself, the prosecution contended.

Warner secretly funded loans of $145,000 to Comguard, a failing business owned by Ryan's brother, former Kankakee Mayor Tom Ryan.

Warner also lent Ryan's son-in-law Michael Fairman $5,000 and invested $6,000 in the cigar business of his son, George "Homer" Ryan. And he footed the $3,185 cost for the band at the wedding of Ryan's daughter, Jeanette Schneider.

"If your last name was Ryan, you knew you didn't have to repay these loans," Levin said.

Ryan was "like a walking conflict of interest" because he accepted gifts and benefits from friends who were doing business with his office, Levin said.

Early in his term in office, Ryan was warned by lobbyist Robert Cook about a shakedown by Warner and Donald Udstuen, a close Ryan political adviser, but Ryan tried to make it appear that Cook had misinterpreted their actions, Barsella said.

In addition, James Covert, a high-ranking secretary of state official, raised concerns with Ryan about Warner's access to the office. Ryan insisted Covert continue to work with Warner, Barsella said.

Prosecutors alleged that Ryan's few cash withdrawals—only $6,703 from his bank from early 1993 through late 2002—were strong circumstantial evidence that Ryan's cash came from kickbacks from Warner and Swanson.

"Something is wrong with this picture," Levin said. "This man had another source of cash."

Swanson's bank records show numerous large cash withdrawals a day or two before meetings with Ryan, often on his birthday, the prosecution said.

Prosecutors also alleged that Ryan knew that Scott Fawell, his top political operative, often diverted state resources to election campaigns of Ryan and political allies. For Ryan's re-election as secretary of state in 1994, Fawell ran the campaign in his government office a few feet from Ryan, Levin said.

"Was it any secret how Scott Fawell was conducting business? No, it wasn't," Levin told jurors. "Ryan gave the keys to his political future to Fawell. Never once was Fawell reined in."

The prosecution also hit hard at fundraising among secretary of state employees by Ryan's political operation, saying it fueled the license-selling at driver's facilities.

Ryan's handpicked inspector general, called "a political hack" by Levin, scuttled investigations that threatened to expose the link between fundraising and license-selling, he said. With Ryan's support, the department was reorganized and many of the investigators were laid off, Levin said.

Ryan "sacrificed public safety and integrity" to ensure the fundraising pipeline kept flowing, the prosecutor said.

"Citizens for Ryan was for all intents and purposes George Ryan's pot of gold," Levin said. "He used the inspector general's office to protect that pot of gold."

DOJ_NMG_0016554

mo'connor@tribune.com
rrbush@tribune.com

Ill. Ex-governor's Trial Nearing Its End (AP)

By Mike Robinson
AP, March 7, 2006

CHICAGO - Former Gov. George Ryan presided over payoffs and fundraising abuses so bad he "might as well have put up a `For Sale' sign over his office," a federal prosecutor said Monday at the close of his racketeering and fraud trial.

"You've heard of the 12 days of Christmas? This was 12 years of Christmas for Mr. Ryan, his family and his friends," prosecutor Joel R. Levin said.

The 72-year-old Republican who served one term as governor practiced concealment, deception and lies on a regular basis to cover up dirty deals in which he steered state contracts and leases, Levin said.

Ryan and longtime friend Larry Warner, 67, a lobbyist, were charged in a 22-count indictment with racketeering, mail fraud and other offenses. Testimony began more than five months ago, with as many as 22 hours of closing arguments scheduled to continue through Thursday.

As secretary of state for eight years in the 1990s and as governor for one term, beginning in 1999, Ryan allegedly steered state leases and contracts to Warner and other friends. In return, he was rewarded with free vacations, loans for his brother's business and even money to pay the band at his daughter's wedding reception, prosecutors say.

Ryan and Warner say they did nothing illegal.

Defense attorney Bradley E. Lerman moved for a mistrial Monday in a dispute over a presentation Levin was making to the jury. Lerman said it included material concerning a 1994 crash that killed six children and had been ruled out as so emotional it could prejudice the jurors. The crash was part of the initial investigation that later turned to corruption in state government.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca R. Pallmeyer did not rule immediately on the motion.

Sitting solemn-faced in the spectator seats were the Rev. Scott Willis and his wife, Janet, whose six children were killed in the fiery accident involving a truck driver whose drivers license allegedly was obtained with payoff money from a woman raising Ryan campaign funds.

Ryan's chief defense attorney, Dan K. Webb, who is expected to address the jury on Tuesday, has said that the former governor's decisions in awarding state leases and contracts were made in good faith and had nothing to do with his friendship with Warner and other political figures.

But Levin said that Ryan had "sold his office."

"He might as well have put up a 'For Sale' sign over his office," Levin said.

Levin saved some of his richest sarcasm for his description of the Citizens for Ryan campaign fund, which he claimed financed his lifestyle.

On the visual display screen he projected a photo of Ryan with his arm around a woman who went to prison for selling licenses to unqualified truck drivers - including, prosecutors say, the one involved in the Willis case - and putting much of the cash into Ryan's campaign fund.

Levin said that Ryan appointed his old friend, Dean Bauer, as the inspector general in the secretary of state's office not to root out corruption but to protect the campaign fundraising operation which he described as "the goose that laid the golden egg."

Campbell, Eager To Talk, Won't Testify (AJC)

By Jeffry Scott , Beth Warren, The Atlanta Journal-constitution
The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 7, 2006

Bill Campbell has told his story on radio, television, in newspapers and before church congregations. But he won't tell it to the jury.

Despite his frequent expressions of willingness — if not eagerness — to tell his story in court, the former Atlanta mayor said Monday that he will not take the witness stand in his own defense at his federal corruption trial.

Outside the courtroom, Campbell said he reached the decision after the prosecutors refused to agree not to ask him about his personal life.

"I desperately wanted to testify," said Campbell, who has met nearly daily with reporters to give his assessment of the trial. "I wanted to tell the jury my story. They wanted to continue the character assassination, but I am not going to subject my family to further damage."

The ex-mayor is on trial in federal court on charges that he used his office to extract bribes from contractors seeking business with the city.

DOJ_NMG_0016555

Campbell's criticism of the prosecutors apparently struck a nerve. For the first time since the trial began seven weeks ago, U.S. Attorney David Nahmias summoned reporters to respond to comments by the former mayor.

"We will not make any special exceptions for this defendant," Nahmias said, reading a statement. "All of our questions would be relevant to the alleged criminal offenses."

The prosecution maintains that Campbell's personal life is fair game because his alleged crimes are inseparable from his personal life. They have called two women they portrayed as Campbell's girlfriends to testify about romantic getaways with the mayor purportedly bankrolled with cash bribes.

Campbell has acknowledged that there was corruption in his administration, but he blames a few of his underlings for abusing his trust by soliciting and keeping the bribes themselves. He insists that he is innocent of the federal charges of racketeering, tax fraud and bribery.

Throughout the trial, Campbell has indicated that he wanted to testify. On Monday, U.S. District Judge Richard Story demanded that his legal team say once and for all whether it intended to put the ex-mayor on the witness stand.

After the jury was sent home for the day, Story asked Campbell to stand as he reviewed Campbell's rights regarding testimony.

"You'd be subject to cross-examination just like any other witnesses," the judge said. "You also have a right not to testify. It is your decision."

The judge noted that Campbell himself is a lawyer but advised him to consult with his defense team.

"I would actually like a little more time," Campbell responded.

Story told Campbell that he could have a few more minutes to continue discussing the issue with his defense team. Instead, Campbell replied, "It's my inclination not to testify. If I change my mind, I would e-mail lawyers."

The judge urged Campbell to be certain about his answer, because the prosecutors would need time to prepare their cross-examination.

"Based on your consultation with counsel, you have elected not to testify?" he asked.

"Yes," Campbell answered.

This is the seventh, and possibly final, week of Campbell's trial. The government's case stretched out over five weeks, while the defense team took five days to bring in witnesses to dispute the allegations. Unless Campbell has a change of heart today, the defense is expected to rest its case, and the government will be ready in the morning to call rebuttal witnesses.

Lawyers asked for some free time Wednesday to craft closing arguments, which probably will be heard Thursday morning.

Speculation over whether Campbell would testify has added a touch of tension to the already lively testimony.

Ron Carlson, a University of Georgia professor of criminal law who has observed testimony in the trial, expressed surprise at the decision not to testify.

"The defense could be thinking, 'We've got a good shot at winning this thing without Bill taking the stand,' " Carlson said.

Jurors aren't supposed to consider whether a defendant testifies or not, but it is human nature to question why defendants who talk publicly balk at facing cross-examination, Carlson said.

"He has announced he wanted to take this opportunity and clear his name," the professor said. "The jury will wonder, 'Why didn't he testify?' "

Campbell Will Not Testify (WXIA-TV)

WXIA-TV, March 7, 2006

Bill Campbell will not testify in his federal corruption trial. For days, Campbell has said he wanted to testify, but on Monday, he blamed federal prosecutors for keeping him from the witness stand.

Campbell left the door open, albeit slightly, as he suggested that he might change his mind overnight. However, it appears the jury will not hear from the one man who says he wants to tell his story.

“I absolutely want to testify,” Campbell said. “Every fiber of my being wants to testify.”

Campbell said he would be happy to testify -- if federal prosecutors would stay away from questions about his private life, including asking about two former extramarital girlfriends, both of whom were previously called to the witness stand. The women talked about travel and spending.

When told that he would be queried about the women and the money spent, Campbell said that for the sake of his family that he would not testify.

“The prosecution is not interested in the allegations in the indictment. They simply want to delve into my private life and that’s unfortunate, and that’s regrettable. And I’m not going to allow any more damage to be done to my family,” Campbell said.

Late on Monday, US Attorney David Nahmias said any questions to Campbell about his private life would be relevant to the case, and no one can dictate what prosecutors ask and don’t ask.

It is expected the jury would get the case late Thursday or Friday.

Metro Briefing (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK

POTENTIAL OPPONENT FOR CLINTON K. T. McFarland, left, a former spokeswoman for the Reagan Defense Department, formed an exploratory committee yesterday to raise money to challenge Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in this year's Senate race. A stay-at-home mother for the last 21 years, Ms. McFarland, a Manhattan Republican, also set about raising her national profile. She appeared on MSNBC's "Hardball," and in response to questions, said that a nuclear Iran was "the single biggest national security situation we face." Ms. McFarland would oppose John Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers and a favorite of conservatives, for the Republican nomination.PATRICK HEALY (NYT)

UNION LEADER TO FORM SPECIAL COMMITTEE The president of the New York State A.F.L.-C.I.O., Denis M. Hughes, announced yesterday that he would appoint a special committee to handle matters at the New York City Central Labor Council regarding a federal investigation of the council and its president, Brian M. McLaughlin. Mr. Hughes said that Mr. McLaughlin, a Democratic assemblyman from Queens, would remain in charge of the council, but would not have a voice in decisions regarding the investigation. Last Thursday, F.B.I. agents raided the council's offices and Mr. McLaughlin's Queens office as part of an investigation into accusations of bid rigging for city contracts for street and traffic lights. Carolyn Daly, Mr. McLaughlin's spokeswoman, said yesterday that Mr. McLaughlin insisted he was innocent.STEVEN GREENHOUSE (NYT)

MANHATTAN: ANTIWAR PROTESTERS ARRESTED Protesters demanding the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq marched from the United Nations to the United States Mission yesterday, where four of them, including Cindy Sheehan — a Californian who became an antiwar activist after her son was killed in Iraq — were arrested, the police said. The group Women Say No to War, which helped organize the march, said that the protesters were arrested while trying to deliver a petition. Richard Grenell, a spokesman for the mission, said that Ms. Sheehan and a few others were invited in but that they declined because reporters could not go with them. Detective Kevin Czartoryski said the protesters had criminally trespassed and resisted arrest.(AP)

SUOZZI REJECTS RUNNING ON REPUBLICAN LINE The Nassau County executive, Thomas R. Suozzi, a Democrat running for governor, has ruled out the possibility of running on the Republican line. Mr. Suozzi, who is running in a primary against Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, said yesterday that he had received support from Republicans in local races, but dismissed speculation that he would run on that line. Joseph L. Bruno, the Republican leader of the state Senate, said in a television interview on Sunday that there was speculation about "the possibility of crossover," but yesterday, he said he would not pursue the idea.JENNIFER MEDINA (NYT)

PROPERTY TAX REBATES OFFSET INCREASES The city finance commissioner, Martha E. Stark, said yesterday that the $400 annual property-tax rebate approved in 2004 largely offset the effect of higher property-tax rates that took effect in 2003. Ms. Stark said that the average increase in taxes for one-, two- and three-family houses totaled $743 in the last three years, while most owners received two rebates totaling $800. The figure, presented at a City Council hearing, surprised several lawmakers and the city comptroller, William C. Thompson Jr. An assistant finance commissioner, Sam Miller, said taxes increased far more slowly than market values because of state-mandated assessment capsSEWELL CHAN (NYT)

SLEEPY HOLLOW: BOY DIES IN ICY POND A 6-year-old boy died after he fell into a pond while walking his neighbor's dog last evening, the police said. The boy, Julian Geach, left home about 5:30 p.m. with the dog, which his family was caring for. About 6:15 p.m., when the boy had not returned, his parents called the police. The dog was found near Fremont Pond, about a half-mile from the boy's home. A team of divers broke through the thin sheet of ice and slush on the pond's surface and recovered the boy's body, about 30 feet from the shore. He was taken to Phelps Memorial Hospital Center in Sleepy Hollow, where he was declared dead at 10 p.m.JENNIFER 8. LEE (NYT)

ANTHRAX PATIENT IMPROVES Vado Diomande, the New York City musician and drummer who contracted inhalation anthrax last month from making drums with untreated animal skins, was upgraded from serious to fair condition yesterday, the first change since Feb. 24, when his condition was downgraded from stable to serious. "He is breathing without assistance and eating solid food," said Alexander Harman, Mr. Diomande's brother-in-law. "He has his voice back." Mr. Diomande has been hospitalized in Pennsylvania since he collapsed after a musical performance there on Feb. 16. Meanwhile, workers continued to clean an eight-story Brooklyn warehouse where Mr. Diomande worked on the skins. The third and sixth floors of the warehouse, which house commercial lofts used by about 30 tenants, remained sealed yesterday.SEWELL CHAN (NYT)

MANHATTAN: WOMAN DIES IN FALL An elderly woman died from a suspicious fall in the stairwell of her East Side apartment building yesterday afternoon, the police said. The woman, Phyllis Weiner, 89, was taken to NewYork-Presbyterian/Weill Cornell hospital about 2:20 p.m., where she was pronounced dead on arrival. Ms. Weiner lived in an 11th-floor apartment at 157 East 57th Street. It is an elevator building, but her body was found on the 10th-floor landing. Investigators said it was unlikely that she had entered the stairwell by herself because she used a walker, which was found on the 11th floor. Ms. Weiner's purse was missing and a nephew, Michael Zerin, said she had gone to the bank earlier in the day. The police said they had no suspects.JENNIFER 8. LEE (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0016557

Compiled by John Sullivan

Labor Leader Brian McLaughlin Is Target Of Probe Into Bid- Rigging On Contracts. (NYDN)

By Juan Gonzalez

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

Council Prez McLaughlin may be asked to curtail his leadership responsibility

Brian McLaughlin - a target of a federal probe into possible bid-rigging of city street-lighting contracts - may be asked to curtail his role as president of the city's Central Labor Council.

Under a plan fashioned by Denis Hughes, president of the New York State AFL-CIO, McLaughlin would continue to serve as president, but Ed Ott, a top staff person, would assume some of the public functions normally handled by the president.

At the same time, the labor council, whose headquarters was raided by more than 20 FBI agents last week, would create a small "rapid-response team" of about a dozen city labor leaders to handle the federal probe without any involvement from McLaughlin, a Queens assemblyman. The council also would hire its own independent attorney to deal with the feds.

"Brian hasn't been accused of any crime and we have to be careful about a presumption ofinnocence," Hughes told me yesterday. "But this is the beginning and I don't know where it [the investigation] is going to go."

Hughes' goal is to keep McLaughlin's legal problems separate from the day-to-day work of the council, the powerful umbrella group that represents the city's 1 million union members.

All day yesterday, Hughes feverishly worked the telephones to win support for his plan from key city labor leaders. He is expected to hold an emergency meeting of the council's leadership this week to win formal approval for the plan.

"I spoke with Brian today and he understands what has to be done," Hughes said, adding that he also consulted with top officials at the AFL-CIO in Washington this weekend.

Hughes is perhaps the only labor official with enough influence over all sectors of the city's normally fractious labor movement to secure quick agreement on a strategy.

He is well-regarded by both the big municipal and service sector union leaders as well as by the construction trades, the group that has historically controlled the Central Labor Council.

With the federal investigation of McLaughlin likely to take months, Hughes and other top union leaders have reluctantly concluded that the council can't risk being paralyzed until the results are known. "Denis has stepped in and taken charge and the national is onboard," a labor source said.

Several union leaders told me yesterday they were troubled by McLaughlin's failure to speak out or even to contact many of his fellow union leaders. He has not been seen in public since Thursday morning's FBI raid on the council's W. 15th St. headquarters. He did report to work at the headquarters yesterday, but did not return phone calls for comment.

Late Friday, his lawyer, Paul Driscoll, issued a short statement that McLaughlin "denies all allegations against him."

Many union leaders are furious at the FBI's high-profile raid on Central Labor Council headquarters, given that there is no suggestion of any wrongdoing by the council itself. "This is a fishing expedition by the feds," said Arthur Cheliotes, president of Local 1180. "Until anyone proves otherwise, I'm with Brian and supporting him completely."

"Brian's been with us in very tough fights and many of us on a personal level are rooting for him," said Randi Weingarten, president of the teachers union and one of McLaughlin's closest allies in the labor movement.

As for Ott, who may soon assume many of McLaughlin's functions, he is currently the director of public policy and worker education for the council and is known as a fiery orator. Before coming to the council, he was a staff member at both Local 1180 and the Public Employees Federation.

TOUGH JOB FOR LABOR (NYPOST)

By CARL CAMPANILE

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- The New York state AFL-CIO went into crisis mode yesterday to respond to a federal probe linking powerful labor boss and Queens Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin to alleged bid rigging of city street-lighting contracts.

State AFL-CIO President Denis Hughes announced that the New York City Central Labor Council will hire its own lawyer to comply with questions from the feds about the scandal. McLaughlin is head of the CLC, which is part of the AFL-CIO.

DOJ_NMG_0016558

About a half-dozen city labor leaders - all executive board members - will also be put on a special panel to help make rapid decisions about the probe and CLC business, sources said.

"We're going to do this in a upfront, aboveboard way," Hughes said.

Hughes also said McLaughlin will remain CLC president - for the time being - because he has not been charged with a crime.

Hughes said he informed McLaughlin of the planned actions.

The action plan, which has been cleared by the leadership of the national AFL-CIO, shows how concerned the labor leaders are about the McLaughlin probe and the possibility that he might be charged with a crime.

Meanwhile, the federal probe received a thumbs-up from former city transportation boss Wilbur Chapman.

"Thank God - finally," Chapman told The Post. "I'm happy that someone from the outside is looking at the process."

Chapman confirmed yesterday's Post report that when he was transportation boss, he questioned why just two firms - Petrocelli Electric and Welsbach Electric - continued to be awarded all the street- and traffic-light repair contracts throughout the five boroughs year after year, even after the DOT switched to new light-emitting diode technology in 1999.

"There has to be more than one or two companies to provide street lighting. I have trouble with that," Chapman said yesterday. "General Motors doesn't have a monopoly on selling cars in America."

Brothel Owner In Nevada Faces Federal Corruption Charge (AP)

By KEN RITTER, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 7, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The owner of three southern Nevada brothels was charged Monday with trying to bribe a county commissioner to relax laws affecting bordellos.

Joseph Maynard Richards, 72, is accused of funneling $5,000 to a commissioner in rural Nye County in return for support for a law to let brothels be built closer to county roads and highways. He could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted.

Richards told a judge he understood the wire fraud corruption charge on which he was arrested Saturday. Richards will plead not guilty, his lawyer said outside court.

"I'm surprised they brought the case, from what they have in the complaint," lawyer Leo Flangas said.

The 16-page complaint describes video and audiotaped conversations between Richards and an unnamed commissioner from June to November 2005.

Commission Chairwoman Candice Trummell, a Republican from Pahrump, confirmed for The Associated Press that she was the cooperating witness.

"I was told I never was a target of the investigation," the 27-year-old commissioner said, describing how she rewrote an ordinance "with Mr. Richards' interests in mind in exchange for the money."

"This was done in cooperation with the FBI," Trummell added, describing the FBI probe as an ongoing public corruption investigation that began before she was elected to the five-member commission in 2003.

Nye County ordinances require that brothels be 300 yards from a road or highway. Richards owns a property on which the complaint alleges he is prevented from building a brothel because of the rule.

No vote was ever taken on revising 300-yard limit, Trummell said.

Trummell said her discussions with Richards involved using the money to pay law school tuition at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. She has not enrolled.

Flangas noted that the complaint describes a signed document under which Richards transferred the money to Trummell through his Richards Family Trust.

"I don't know if it was a loan or a gift," Flangas said. "But it was done aboveboard. It was not a quid pro quo."

Nye, which has seven brothels, is one of 10 rural counties in which prostitution is legal under county and state oversight. Prostitution is illegal in Nevada's most populous areas, including Las Vegas and surrounding Clark County, and Reno and surrounding Washoe County.

Richards owns the Mabel's Ranch, Cherry Patch Ranch and Cherry Patch II Ranch brothels, plus two massage salons and a striptease club in the Pahrump area about 60 miles west of Las Vegas.

U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Peggy Leen freed Richards without bail but with electronic home monitoring pending a March 22 preliminary hearing.

Chief Assistant U.S. Attorney Steven Myhre had asked Leen to set a $1 million bail. Although he offered no proof, Myhre said Richards had been in contact with Nevada's most notorious fugitive brothel owner, Joseph Conforte.

DOJ_NMG_0016559

Conforte, who used to own the Mustang Ranch brothel east of Reno, was accused of owing $13 million in back taxes when the IRS seized the property in 1990. Conforte reportedly fled to Brazil, where his lawyer has said courts wouldn't let him be extradited to the U.S.

Myhre said Richards is a multimillionaire who has passports and cash buried in an ammunition can in the desert that he would use to flee before he is prosecuted.

Richards shook his head no, causing his long mane of silver hair to brush the shoulders of his orange jail jump suit.

Flangas told the judge that Richards had no contact with Conforte.

Trial in an unrelated case in which a Las Vegas striptease club owner is accused of funneling money to Clark County commissioners in return for their support for laws benefiting his business is due to begin next week.

FBI Probes Use Of Funds By Ex-FEC Aide (RC)

By Paul Kane

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

The FBI is investigating allegations that a former top official at the Federal Election Commission tried to settle a sexual harassment complaint from a female staffer by attempting to misappropriate $100,000 in taxpayer funds last fall.

Amid AIPAC's Big Show, Straight Talk With A Noticeable Silence (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Words are seldom minced at the annual meeting of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

During a luncheon speech yesterday at the convention center, Daniel Gillerman, the Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, shouted a barnyard obscenity involving a bull when he dismissed the theory that Iran and Hamas might soften their anti-Israel views. The audience gave Gillerman a standing ovation.

The undiplomatic diplomat went on to describe a war on radical Islam: "While it may be true -- and probably is -- that not all Muslims are terrorists, it also happens to be true that nearly all terrorists are Muslim."

But ask people at this week's gathering about Steve Rosen, the father of modern AIPAC, who goes on trial next month for disseminating classified information, and you get the sort of look you'd expect if you inquired about an embarrassing medical condition.

"I'm not the person to ask about that," says Nathan Diament, a Washington representative for Orthodox Jews.

"Who?" responds Neil Cooper, a delegate from the Philadelphia area.

"Rosen? Which one is he?" answers a charity executive, with a smile.

"I need to read more about it," demurs Etan Cohen, a college student.

AIPAC staff members note that, with Iran and the Palestinians to worry about, the indictments of Rosen and former deputy Keith Weissman have not been mentioned in any of the group's public meetings so far. And they say the pro-Israel lobby, unharmed by the Rosen flap, is putting on its biggest and best show ever this week: 4,500 participants, including more than 1,000 students, paying visits to at least 450 House and Senate offices.

Indeed, the scandal doesn't seem to have slowed down the group. At last night's dinner, AIPAC set aside 27 minutes for the reading of its annual "Roll Call" of lawmakers, diplomats and administration officials attending the gathering. As of midday yesterday, RSVPs had come in from 57 embassies, from Burundi to Turkey; a score of Bush administration officials; a majority of the Senate; and a quarter of the House. Even the ambassadors of Pakistan and Oman supped at AIPAC's table.

Any talk of Rosen is confined to private donor meetings and hallway conversations -- where opinions are split on AIPAC's decision to turn its back on Rosen and Weissman.

"I don't like the way AIPAC handled it, hanging them out to dry," said one West Coast delegate, after delivering an on-the-record no comment. "They didn't do anything different from what everybody else does in this town every day."

Rosen and Weissman are the first nongovernment officials to be prosecuted under the all-but-forgotten Espionage Act of 1917. The law, amended in 1950, makes it a crime for an unauthorized person even to have classified information knowingly; if Rosen broke that law, so do hundreds of other lobbyists and journalists as part of their normal course of business.

The New Yorker magazine reported last year that AIPAC's lawyer, Nathan Lewin, recommended that the two officials be fired after he heard from prosecutors about an FBI-recorded telephone call between Rosen, Weissman and The Washington Post's Glenn Kessler, in which Rosen observed that "at least we have no Official Secrets Act." Lewin and the prosecutors may not have realized that the line -- referring to a British law about publishing classified information -- was a stock joke Rosen used in conversations with Kessler and other reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0016560

AIPAC at first defended Rosen vigorously, then dismissed him in April over unspecified conduct "beneath the standards AIPAC sets for its employees." The group has advised members that it has not taken a position on whether Rosen acted legally.

That nuance was understandably lost on most of the attendees asked about the matter at yesterday's session. "AIPAC doesn't support passing of state secrets to Israel, and that's my view, too," said Daniel Rathauser, a high school senior from New Jersey.

Max Newman, from Michigan, had no complaints, either. "I respect the way the organization handled it," he said. "What they did was against the policy of AIPAC."

Exactly what they did should come out in next month's trial. In the meantime, AIPAC is clamping down on what information it lets out.

Luncheon speeches by former House speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and former Virginia governor Mark Warner (D) were declared off the record. At another speech yesterday by Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman, reporters were turned away at the door; an AIPAC spokeswoman went through the room making sure no journalists had infiltrated.

At the public sessions, the message was uniform: AIPAC is strong, and getting stronger. "Thank God for AIPAC," Gillerman told the participants. "This is for us the greatest guarantee and insurance policy for the survival of Israel," he added. "Please don't ever change."

As Rosen and Weissman have learned, it already has.

Junior Gotti Was 'Sick Of This Life,' Radio Show Host Kuby Says (NSDY/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- John "Junior" Gotti said in 1998 that he was "sick of this life" and would plead guilty to criminal charges, a lawyer who co-hosts a radio show with Guardian Angels founder Curtis Sliwa testified Monday at Gotti's mob trial.

The testimony by Ron Kuby, a veteran civil rights attorney, was intended by defense lawyers to boost Gotti's argument that he had rejected life in the Gambino crime family when he pleaded guilty in 1999 to racketeering charges. On that front, they got mixed results.

Kuby, who had represented a Gotti co-defendant, testified that Gotti said he "wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this," but the lawyer could not be more specific.

"He told me he was sick of this life," Kuby said. "He wanted this to be over."

Outside court, Kuby said he never asked Gotti what he was referring to when he said he wanted out.

"I was functioning as a lawyer, not a priest," Kuby said. "He did not elaborate. I did not ask."

He said he assumed Gotti meant he was "tired of being a criminal, tired of being a defendant, tired of being in prison, tired of being away from family."

The government last year brought a new racketeering case against Gotti related to crimes not covered in his April 1999 plea deal. Prosecutors said Gotti continued to do mob business from prison after claiming he had quit the Mafia.

The testimony by Kuby put the radio personality in an odd position with Sliwa, who prosecutors say was shot twice in 1992 after Gotti ordered him kidnapped and beaten because of on-air rants against Gotti's father, John Gotti. The elder Gotti was convicted of racketeering in 1992 and died in prison a decade later.

Junior Gotti insists he had nothing to do with the attack on Sliwa.

Sliwa testified about the shooting during the current trial and another trial last September that ended with a hung jury.

On their radio show Monday morning before Kuby testified, Sliwa poked fun at his co-host, calling the liberal counterpoint to Sliwa's conservative viewpoints a Judas.

"Maybe you should be doing a radio show with John Gotti Jr.," Sliwa said.

Kuby said Sliwa had nothing to fear.

"I don't have a dog in this fight, outside of my allegiance to the truth," he said.

Final arguments in the case were scheduled for Tuesday.

Sliwa's Radio Co-Host Testifies For Gotti (WCBS-TV)

By Pablo Guzman

WCBS-TV, March 7, 2006

(CBS) NEW YORK “Curtis & Kuby” are a well-known WABC radio morning team. Partners. “Curtis”, of course, is Guardian Angels co-founder Curtis Sliwa. In 1992, someone shot him after he got into a cab. From inside the cab. The Feds say that was done on the orders of John Gotti, who wanted to teach Sliwa a lesson for badmouthing his father on their radio show. And for that, Gotti is on trial.

DOJ_NMG_0016561

"Kuby" is Ron Kuby, the activist lawyer who came of age with William Kunstler. Sliwa took the stand last Monday to, as he put it, "stare Gotti down." But now that it's the turn of the Gotti defense, his lawyer Charles Carnesi called Kuby to the stand. A rather interesting turn of events in a trial that has seen the government use the re-direct of their star witness, "Mikey Scars" DiLeonardo, to bring out that young Gotti and "Mikey Scars" allegedly took girlfriends (behind their wives' backs) to party on a yacht Gotti supposedly hired for "Scars' " 40th birthday; and, to reveal that Gotti's father had a mistress. And a daughter in that illicit relationship. Or so it's alleged.

This, with the Gotti family --- particularly, the women and young Gotti's father-in-law --- in court.

In turn, one of the first witnesses Gotti's lawyer called was DiLeonardo's ex-wife. To say how embarrassed their son was about both the father being a rat AND putting his mistress up in a house on Staten Island near theirs.

It's been that kind of trial.

Enter Ron Kuby.

Part of Gotti's case revolves around his contention that by 1998, he became disillusioned with "this life of ours." That he was ready to do one last prison time, if it would settle the books with the government. So he could walk out of the slammer, and just be with his wife and five kids (that wife, by the way, Kim, expecting their sixth child, was in court today for the first time).

Kuby testified on the stand that while representing Gotti in 1998 (in the case alleging a Gambino shakedown of the strip joint "Scores"), that Gotti approached him "and he told me he was willing to plead to time in jail, so he could put all this behind him." By "this", I asked Kuby, did he mean "this mob life?" "I took it to mean that he wanted to put criminal life behind him. That he was tired of being in jail, tired of being in court, tired of being away from his family. That he wanted that life to end."

Now, at the end of the trial, the government will probably tell the jury to ignore whatever anyone says about Mr. Gotti wanting out of the Mafia after 1998. Because the time covered in the trial is a shooting of Curtis Sliwa in 1992. When, the Feds say, Mr. Gotti was very much a prince of the mob.

But that is not really Mr. Gotti's and his lawyer, Mr. Carnesi's, point. They are hoping that the jury interprets Kuby's testimony as another hole in what the government's star witness, Michael DiLeonardo --- "Mikey Scars" --- said on the witness stand. He said no one leaves the mob. Who will the jury believe? Kuby, the radio host, who said Gotti told him he wanted out? Or "Scars"? Who said, no one gets out. Not alive, anyhow.

Because if "Mikey Scars" is lying about that, then --- could he also be lying about something else? And if a couple of jurors begin to have doubts about the government's case, then --- could it affect the verdict?

The jury should start discussing just that within a couple of days.

KUBY'S TESTIMONY RADIO-ACTIVE (NYPOST)

By DAN MANGAN

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- John "Junior" Gotti's defense yesterday received an unexpected boost from Curtis Sliwa's radio partner, who testified that the ex-mob boss declared eight years ago he was leaving organized crime because he wanted to go legit.

"He told me he was sick of this life," criminal-defense and civil-rights lawyer Ron Kuby testified. "He wanted to get out of this life, to do real prison time . . . He wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this. He wanted this to be over."

Kuby, who co-hosts a WABC radio show with Sliwa, said he was representing Gotti's co-defendant in a racketeering case in 1998 when Junior made the confession.

Kuby's testimony in Manhattan federal court put the radio personality at odds with Sliwa, who prosecutors say was shot twice in 1992 after Gotti ordered him kidnapped and beaten because he was blasting his "Dapper Don" father on the air.

Yesterday's explosive testimony saying Gotti had left the mob in 1998 backed the defense's claim that the five-year statute of limitations had run out on Junior's alleged racketeering before he was indicted in 2004.

Kuby said the conversation occurred when Junior asked him to approach the feds to discuss a plea bargain for everyone involved in the earlier racketeering case.

Under cross-examination, Kuby said he had no knowledge that Junior later stopped earning money from the mob - and said Gotti never admitted to him he was in the mob.

Outside court, Kuby said he never asked Gotti what he was referring to when he said he wanted out.

"I was functioning as a lawyer, not a priest," he said. "He did not elaborate. I did not ask."

On their radio show earlier yesterday, Sliwa took aim at Kuby's willingness to testify.

"Maybe you should be doing a radio show with John Gotti Jr.," Sliwa said.

Two of Gotti's cousins also claimed Gotti left the mob by 1998.

Michael DiGiorgio said he visited his brother John, a Gambino crime-family associate, in federal prison in Miami, where he met John's cellmate, Gambino captain Tony Morelli.

Morelli asked Michael DiGiorgio to pass a message to Gotti that his family was having money trouble.

"Tony had complained to me that he felt abandoned . . . financially, that his wife was in financial straits," Michael testified.

When Michael, 43, relayed the message during a visit to Gotti in his Westchester County jail in 1998, Junior wasn't receptive, he said.

"John told me to tell Tony that he was out of that life . . . but there was nothing he could do to help him," Michael said.

Michael claimed he relayed the message to Morelli.

"I know what it meant - that [Junior] was no longer involved in the Mafia," he said.

Outside the presence of the jury, John DiGiorgio, 50, said Gotti's message meant "he threw in the towel. He was finished."

Also yesterday, Gotti's younger brother, Peter, testified about how criminal prosecutions had disrupted his family's life.

On cross-examination, prosecutor Michael McGovern asked him what his father, the Teflon Don, did for a living. Peter Gotti, 31, paused, then smiled.

"Boss," he said.

After a chuckle, he added, "I have no idea, Mr. McGovern."

Asked whether he was aware of his brother's role in the mob, he said, "I assumed he was definitely, you know, in a family."

Sliwa Says Radio Partner 'Judas' (NYDN)

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

"The Curtis & Kuby Show" played on the radio - and in court - yesterday as Curtis Sliwa called his on-air partner Ron Kuby a "Judas" for testifying on behalf of John A. (Junior) Gotti.

Kuby, a lawyer, bolstered Gotti's defense against claims the mobster sent two thugs to beat Sliwa for his on-air attacks against the Dapper Don John Gotti in 1992.

Gotti contends that he left the mob in 1998.

"He told me he was sick of this life," Kuby testified. "He wanted this to be over. He wanted to rejoin his family and be done with this." Kuby said the spring 1998 chat occurred while Gotti and dozens of others were under indictment for a loansharking and extortion scheme that involved the Manhattan strip club Scores.

"John Gotti . . . specifically asked me if I would do him a favor," Kuby testified.

Gotti, 42, wanted Kuby, then representing co-defendant Stephen Sergio, to approach federal prosecutors and discuss a plea deal for everyone involved.

Outside court, Kuby said he didn't question Gotti further about ending his mob life.

"I was functioning as a lawyer, not a priest," he said. "He did not elaborate. I did not ask."

Kuby gave a preview of his testimony on his morning WABC radio show yesterday - prompting Sliwa to call his decade-long radio partner "Judas."

"Curtis, you should have nothing to fear from the truth," Kuby said.

Sliwa was shot near his East Village apartment after he hailed a cab carrying two men prosecutors say were sent by Gotti.

The issue of Gotti's pre-1999 withdrawal from the mob is key because prosecutors must show at least one crime in the long-running conspiracy case occurred within five years of his 2004 indictment.

Gotti's attorneys want to play for jurors a recording of a prison visit with his father that they say will feature the Mafia scion using coded language to say he wants out of the mob.

Peter Outs Dead Dad On Stand (NYDN)

By THOMAS ZAMBITO, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

Dapper Don called 'Boss'

Peter Gotti (in September photo) testified his father, John (Dapper Don) Gotti, 'probably' was Gambino crime family head.

As he entered the witness stand yesterday, the youngest son of John (Dapper Don) Gotti made family history - then cemented his place in it with a one-word answer.

"Boss," Peter Gotti said.

That's how the Dapper Don's 31-year-old son described what his father did for a living, saying in a second what prosecutors spent a decade trying to prove.

No Gotti family member has ever testified at a criminal trial until yesterday, when Peter Gotti took the stand in his brother John A. (Junior) Gotti's defense to federal kidnapping and extortion charges in Manhattan.

Then again, Peter Gotti never had much to hide.

DOJ_NMG_0016563

He was the one son of the Dapper Don who didn't embrace the life of a mobster, staying out of the headlines and living a trouble-free life - aside from a few gambling debts.

Heavyset, he bore just a slight resemblance to his late father. He wore an all-black outfit and his accent was rooted in the Howard Beach, Queens, neighborhood where he was reared.

After taking the oath and promising to tell the whole truth, Gotti started nervously.

But as he scrolled through family photos, he seemed more at ease, joking with his brother's attorney, Charles Carnesi, and making cracks about his brother's hair.

By using old family snapshots, Carnesi was trying to counter prosecutors' claims that several men were his brother's criminal associates - suggesting they were longtime childhood pals.

There was a photo of Junior Gotti, wearing the number 71 for his peewee football team in Howard Beach. "That's him with the Afro," Gotti joked.

And there were childhood photos that included the late Frankie Gotti, killed after being hit by a car near the family's Howard Beach home.

Mother Victoria Gotti, seated in the audience, appeared to look away when the photo appeared on a courtroom screen.

But after he did his brother's bidding, federal prosecutor Michael McGovern made things interesting.

"Do you know what your father did for a living?" McGovern asked.

The question startled Gotti, as he shifted uneasily in his chair for several seconds before finally answering sheepishly.

"Boss," he said.

Asked if he knew his father was the head of the Gambino crime family, Gotti responded:

"I have no idea, Mr. McGovern," Gotti said. "I would probably say he was."

Under the old Mafia rules, such an admission could have merited a death sentence.

But Junior Gotti has admitted his mob membership, saying he quit the life by 1999, hoping to spare his children from the legacy of crime he inherited.

Asked whether he knew that his father was responsible for the deaths of former Gambino mob boss Paul Castellano and his bodyguard in a bloody takeover of the Gambino family, he said: "That's what I've read. I've heard."

McGovern peppered Gotti with questions, asking him if he knew that his brother, several uncles and a former brother-in-law - sister Victoria's ex Carmine Agnello - were in the mob. He said he had no direct knowledge but after 20 years of reading media accounts, he assumed they were.

"I'm in a bubble, not in a cave," he said. He added: "It's not my business. I don't really care."

He was shown surveillance photographs of himself with his uncle Peter Gotti outside his father's Queens headquarters, the Bergin Hunt and Fish Club. "I was at the Bergin as a young kid," he said. "My uncle was just another guy who was there."

Gotti was called to refute allegations made by mob snitch Michael (Mikey Scars) DiLeonardo that he acted as the go-between for $50,000 in mob cash belonging to his brother.

"Never," Gotti said when asked if he'd ever picked up money for his brother.

He said his brother wouldn't have allowed it since he was well aware of his gambling habits. "He simply didn't trust me with money," he said.

McGovern will continue his cross-examination today and Gotti promised he'll be ready.

"I'm gonna rack 'em up again tomorrow," he said.

Trial Begins Of NY Cops Charged As Mafia Hit Men (REU)

By Ransdell Pierson

Reuters, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK (Reuters) - Jury selection began on Monday in the federal trial of two former New York detectives accused of having been hit men for the mob in a case the judge predicts will captivate the jurors.

Defendants Stephen Caracappa, 64, and Louis Eppolito, 57, were charged early last year with secretly working for the Luchese crime family while employed as police officers and involvement in 11 murders or attempted murders.

The charges, which also include kidnapping and other crimes, set the stage for a colorful and closely watched trial. Both defendants had served on the force more than 20 years.

Brooklyn U.S. District Court Judge Jack Weinstein set opening arguments for March 13 and assured hundreds of potential jurors assembled in his courtroom the case "will be one of the most interesting experiences of your life." Twelve jurors and six alternates will be selected.

When Eppolito showed up in court 75 minutes late, Weinstein ordered that he be rearrested and that his $5 million bail be revoked until a good explanation was provided.

DOJ_NMG_0016564

Weinstein, an 85-year-old former Columbia Law School professor known for toughness, set Eppolito free again after defense lawyer Bruce Cutler explained that his client had been seriously delayed by a "trailer accident" on the highway.

In the courtroom, the tall and overweight defendant seemed at ease, embracing Cutler and trading smiles and pleasantries with Caracappa and his co-defendant's high-profile lawyer, Edward Hayes.

Cutler, best known for his successful defense of the late Gambino crime family boss John Gotti in several trials, said it will be tougher to defend Eppolito because federal prosecutors plan to have at least four Mafia informants and turncoats testify against him.

"The federal government is making sweetheart deals with all kinds of people -- including (crime family) acting bosses -- that will say what the government wants to hear," Cutler said in a telephone interview.

After retiring, Eppolito played a bit role as "Fat Andy" in the mob movie "Goodfellas" and played character roles in several other Hollywood productions.

BQE Jam Holds Up Cop Trial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 7, 2006

You think you have traffic problems?

Yesterday's huge jam on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway almost sent one of the "Mafia Cops" to jail before his racketeering trial even began after he was late to federal court for the start of jury selection.

Louis Eppolito, 57, who is living under house arrest with relatives in Plainview, walked into Brooklyn federal court about 90 minutes late after stewing in traffic on the BQE for nearly as long. When Eppolito finally arrived at the Cadman Plaza courthouse, an angry Judge Jack Weinstein ordered him arrested by federal marshals and his $5 million bail revoked.

But after defense attorney Bruce Cutler explained to Weinstein that two disabled tractor-trailers had shut down the roadway, Weinstein reinstated bail and revoked the arrest.

Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, 64, former New York City police detectives, are accused of being paid assassins for the mob in the late 1980s and early 1990s. Both have denied wrongdoing and are under house arrest.

Outside court, Eppolito told Newsday that he had left the home of his brother and sister-in-law at around 7:40 a.m. After an uneventful ride westbound on the Long Island Expressway, the trip suddenly turned chaotic when his car exited for the BQE, said Eppolito. Under the terms of his bail he is not allowed to have a cell phone, so Eppolito said he could not call the court.

Opening statements are set for March 13.

'MAFIA' COP IN A JAM (NYPOST)

By ZACH HABERMAN

The New York Post, March 7, 2006

March 7, 2006 -- A traffic jam almost landed reputed mob cop Louis Eppolito back in prison yesterday.

The ex-NYPD detective, accused along with his partner, Stephen Caracappa, of being paid hit men for the Mafia, arrived at Brooklyn federal court over an hour late - holding up the start of jury selection.

"Did you arrest him like I ordered?" a fuming Judge Jack Weinstein asked a courtroom marshall after Eppolito finally arrived.

While he was placed in their custody, a shaken Eppolito - who had been free on $5 million bail - was neither handcuffed nor had his arrest processed. The judge called off the guards after Eppolito explained he was not jumping bail - he was simply stuck in bumper-to-bumper traffic on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway.

"It was beyond my control," Eppolito, 57, said outside court. "I just sat in traffic in the car."

One of Eppolito's bail restrictions prevents him from having a cellphone, so he had no way of contacting the court or his attorney.

His lawyer, Bruce Cutler, was apparently so concerned by the unexplained absence he almost called Nassau County cops to check the Plainview, L.I., home where Eppolito is staying while awaiting trial.

Two hundred potential jurors in the hotly anticipated police-corruption trial filled out questionnaires yesterday, while Weinstein promised the trial would be "the most interesting experience of your life."

Caracappa, 64, and Eppolito are accused of using their positions within the department to leak sensitive NYPD intelligence to the Luchese crime family, information allegedly used to commit eight gangland slayings.

The 42-page questionnaire asked a range of questions such as whether potential jurors had ever read Eppolito's autobiography, "Mafia Cop."

DOJ_NMG_0016565

They were also asked if they recognized the names of well-known wiseguys, such as the late Gambino boss John Gotti, his whacked predecessor Paul Castellano, and turncoat Salvatore "Sammy Bull" Gravano.

The trial is set to get under way on Monday.

'Mafia Cop' Angers Judge, But Dodges Jail With Quick Excuse (NYDN)

By JOHN MARZULLI, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 7, 2006

Saved by gridlock! Blames BQE for missing court

Here's not the best way to start off your trial: Reputed Mafia cop Louis Eppolito got himself arrested briefly yesterday when he ticked off the judge by showing up late.

The portly ex-NYPD detective, accused of being a hit man for the mob, waddled into Brooklyn Federal Court more than an hour late, incurring the wrath of Judge Jack Weinstein.

After 140 prospective jurors had filled out a lengthy questionnaire in another room, Weinstein called an impromptu courtroom conference.

"Is he under arrest?" Weinstein asked a U.S. marshal, causing the color to drain from Eppolito's face.

When the lawman indicated Eppolito was not, Weinstein barked: "He's now under arrest and bail has been revoked."

Defense lawyer Bruce Cutler explained his client wasn't AWOL - he had been stuck in a traffic jam on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway caused by an overturned tractor-trailer.

The judge accepted the explanation and reinstated Eppolito's $5 million bail.

"I just sat in traffic in the car. It was beyond my control," Eppolito said outside court.

Eppolito and his former NYPD partner Thomas Caracappa are accused of leaking information about confidential informants and investigations to the Luchese crime family for years. Eppolito is charged with participating in eight gangland murders and Caracappa seven.

Prospective jurors answered 77 questions, including whether they had read Eppolito's autobiography, "Mafia Cop," or watched the defense lawyers' "Cutler and Hayes Show" on Court TV.

"For many of you [the trial] will be one of the most interesting experiences of your life," Weinstein told the jurors.

Take 1 Trial. Add The Mob. Yield: 4-5 Books And A Film. (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Depending on whom you ask, when you ask them and how honest they are, there are four books and a movie, five books and a movie, four books but no movie or five books but no movie about the federal racketeering trial of Louis J. Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa in the works.

The trial, which began yesterday with jury selection in Federal District Court in Brooklyn, has become the latest scoop for the disheveled band of newspaper reporters who write about the courts and has led, in at least two cases, to a literary luncheon and a book deal. It has also served as a midcareer change of pace for two investigators on the case who have cashed in on their inside knowledge, signing book deals of their own.

Almost from the day last March when Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64, two former New York police detectives, were slapped in handcuffs over dinner in Las Vegas, literary agents and Hollywood types have descended on the case. There were articles in Playboy and Vanity Fair, not to mention the city's newspapers. At a pretrial hearing in September, Mr. Caracappa's lawyer, Edward Hayes, mused aloud that every member of the prosecution team, except the two chief prosecutors, seemed to have a book deal.

But five books and (possibly) a movie? Without a doubt, the charges in the case are fairly spectacular, revolving around the accusation that the two men betrayed their badges in the 1980's and early 90's by helping to kill at least eight people while working for the mob. But the charges are also fairly old — some 20 years old. And dramatic as they are, they are not entirely surprising: the police and F.B.I. investigated the pair in 1994, but were unable to make a case.

It is true that a gallery of "characters" will emerge at trial, including Burton Kaplan, a drug smuggler and wholesale clothier expected to testify that he served as the liaison between the two men and their Mafia overlord, Anthony Casso, who has the chilling nickname Gaspipe. Then there is Mr. Eppolito, who after his retirement, appeared in several movies, playing bit roles of the sort that one could easily miss while bending down to set one's popcorn on the floor.

It is also true, however, that the case does not really touch upon the larger sorts of issues that usually make a criminal trial— even a police-corruption trial — of interest. It does not, for instance, have the broader theme of cover-up, as did the Abner Louima case, in which one officer was charged with sodomizing Mr. Louima with a broomstick while others were charged with erecting a "blue wall of silence" to protect him. Nor does it have the bitter racial tensions of the Amadou Diallo case, in which white officers killed Mr. Diallo, a black man, in a hail of 41 shots.

DOJ_NMG_0016566

United States v. Eppolito and Caracappa is a mob case, which is to say, a case with "color" — and therein lies the interest. On Feb. 9, USA Today ran a story deciding that it and other Mafia trials "have the ruthlessness, and the color, that America has come to expect from the mob." A subhead proclaimed: "A lot more colorful than ... Enron."

"This case has allure," said Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, who has been known to wax poetic on America's "psychological obsession" with the mob. "It's a throwback to an atavistic, bygone age."

In a time, and in a city, where it sometimes seems as if all the grit has packed up and moved away, "Mafia cops," as everyone calls the case, will offer glimpses of a salty, old-time Brooklyn. Testimony will include the tale of Eddie Lino, a Gambino family captain shot to death in his Mercedes on the Belt Parkway, and the story of Nicholas Guido, an innocent man killed in a case of mistaken identity because he shared a mobster's name.

"People like these trials for the same reason they're captivated by car accidents," said James Walden, a lawyer who spent six years in the United States attorney's office in Brooklyn prosecuting mobsters. "It's awful, it's degrading and all the characters are vile, but there's something in the theater of it that people can't seem to get enough of."

It helps, of course, when the theater allows catharsis without danger — when, morally speaking, the seats are free of charge.

"If you live a nonmob life, there's no reason to be threatened by the mob," said Gerald L. Shargel, a lawyer whose clients have included John J. Gotti, the late Gambino family don. "You can watch the stories unfold from a safe perch."

The safe perch in this case was the next-to-last row of the second-floor courtroom, where reporters, including three with book deals, sat to watch the trial begin. Not much happened: the jurors received a questionnaire asking if they had ever seen Mr. Hayes and Mr. Cutler on their show on Court TV. Mr. Eppolito, explaining that a tractor-trailer accident on the Brooklyn-Queens Expressway delayed him, was late.

Mr. Cutler is an operatic presence, gruff and voluble and built like a tugboat. Mr. Hayes, by contrast, is lean and adrenal, with the quick wit of a bookie and a closetful of alligator shoes.

The prosecutors, Robert Henoch and Mitra Hormozi, are less prone to flaunt their personalities, but even Judge Jack B. Weinstein, as sober as they come, seemed to acknowledge that the trial would be a drama marked by courtroom flair.

"It will be an interesting trial," he told the jurors. "For many of you, it will be the most interesting experience of your life."

Bulger Brother To Lose Pension For Lying (LAT/AP)

By Ken Maguire, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

BOSTON — The state's highest court ruled Monday that a brother of fugitive mobster James "Whitey" Bulger must forfeit his $65,000-a-year state pension because he lied to grand juries investigating the gangster's disappearance.

Lawyers for John "Jackie" Bulger, a retired court clerk magistrate, had argued that his crimes were based on family loyalty and didn't affect his job.

But the Supreme Judicial Court ruled that he had an "unwavering obligation to tell the truth" to grand juries investigating his brother's disappearance.

John Bulger, 67, pleaded guilty to perjury and obstruction of justice in 2003 for lying to two federal grand juries. He admitted that he lied when he testified he had not heard from his brother since he fled in 1995. He also admitted lying to a grand jury in 1996 when he said had no knowledge about a deposit box owned by his brother.

Because his crimes were committed while in office, John Bulger may have to repay $243,000 in pension money he has already received. The state had not yet decided whether to seek repayment.

It's not the only Bulger pension dispute.

The state is appealing a Superior Court's November ruling that gave another brother, former University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, $29,000 more than what he was awarded by the state's pension system. William Bulger's annual pension is now $208,000.

Whitey Bulger, 76, the oldest of the brothers, is wanted in connection with 21 murders and is on the FBI's "Ten Most Wanted" list. Prosecutors say he ran the Winter Hill Gang and was an FBI informant who ratted out his competitors in the 1970s and '80s.

Paul T. Hynes, attorney for John Bulger, did not immediately return a call to comment. A phone listing in South Boston for Bulger was temporarily disconnected Monday.

Judge Refuses To Delay Abramoff Sentencing (WP/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0016567

By Associated Press
The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

MIAMI, March 6 -- A federal judge refused Monday to allow a lengthy delay in the sentencing of lobbyist Jack Abramoff, even though lawyers for both sides said the move could jeopardize a federal corruption investigation involving Congress and the Bush administration.

Abramoff attorney Abbe Lowell warned that the defense would disclose information about the ongoing corruption investigation to demonstrate the level of Abramoff's cooperation, something that could affect his sentence in the fraud case.

"We will name names," Lowell said by telephone at a hearing before U.S. District Judge Paul C. Huck. "That is not a good thing for law enforcement."

The judge agreed to delay sentencing from March 16 to March 29, but he rejected a joint motion by federal prosecutors and attorneys for Abramoff and co-defendant Adam Kidan to hold off for at least 90 days.

"I just don't want to get involved in a situation where it just goes on and on and on," Huck said. "I don't see any reason for postponing the sentencing."

Huck said the government can always request a reduction in Abramoff's sentence later and that he probably would allow both Abramoff and Kidan to remain free for a reasonable amount of time after they are sentenced.

Abramoff pleaded guilty Jan. 4 to charges that he and Kidan fabricated a wire transfer to make it appear they were putting a sizable chunk of their own money into the $147.5 million purchase of the SunCruz Casinos gambling fleet in 2000. Kidan pleaded guilty late last year.

Abramoff also pleaded guilty in January to charges stemming from an investigation into his ties to members of Congress and the Bush administration.

Shooter Now Denies Killing Ga. Socialite (WP)

By Harry R. Weber
The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

ATLANTA -- In a stunning about-face, the admitted triggerman in the slaying of an Atlanta socialite denied Monday that he had ever seen the victim in person or that he killed her on orders from the woman's estranged husband.

Testifying at the murder trial of millionaire James Sullivan, Phillip Harwood also denied having any intention to take part in the January 1987 murder of Lita Sullivan at her upscale town house.

The denials came even though Harwood is serving a 20-year sentence for manslaughter after pleading guilty to killing Lita Sullivan. As part of the plea, he agreed to testify against James Sullivan.

"Have you ever laid eyes on her face before today," prosecutor Clint Rucker asked Harwood.

"Other than on the news, no," Harwood responded.

"Did you agree to participate in the death of Lita Sullivan?" Rucker asked.

After a long pause, Harwood turned toward the judge and responded, "Well, your honor, I'd have to answer no. I did not agree to murder Lita Sullivan. The agreement was to take care of her. That was what was spoken to me. As far as participating, my intention was never to participate."

Sullivan, 64, was captured in Thailand in 2002. He's accused of paying Harwood $25,000 to kill his 35-year-old second wife. She was shot by a man carrying a dozen roses and posing as a flower delivery man.

Prosecutors, who are seeking the death penalty, say Sullivan feared losing money and his Palm Beach, Fla., mansion in the divorce.

Harwood said he was in a getaway car nearby when the murder was committed by a man named "John" who worked as a bartender at a topless bar. He said he met the man through a stripper friend of his. Harwood didn't give the man's last name.

"I heard two shots. He came running back and I drove off," Harwood said.

He admitted to the jurors that he bought the flowers that were delivered to the victim.

Harwood also testified that Sullivan had approached him a few months before the slaying and inquired whether he knew anyone who could "take care of" Lita Sullivan. Harwood said he took that to mean one of two things, "either to kill her or to take care of her."

He testified that Sullivan mentioned that bringing his wife flowers would be a good way to get her to come to the door, and said he told Sullivan it might cost him $25,000 to fix his problem.

Harwood confirmed for jurors that he accepted two payments from Sullivan: a pair of cashier's checks for about $12,500 before Lita Sullivan was killed and an envelope filled with cash after she was dead. He said he met with Sullivan in a restaurant in Florida, where he was given the final payment.

Asked by the prosecutor why he took the money, Harwood said he did so because he was scared.

"What's he gonna think if I didn't take the last part of the money?" Harwood said. "He paid me to have somebody kill his wife. Don't you think he might want to take care of loose ends?"

Harwoods' denials put the prosecutor in the unusual position of having to aggressively cross-examine his own witness.

"Do you bear any responsibility Mr. Harwood as you sit here?" Rucker said.

"I guess I do by proxy," Harwood responded, though he didn't clarify what he meant by that.

Rucker pressed Harwood about a claim that he wanted to warn Lita Sullivan three days before the murder.

"Didn't you have her phone number? Why didn't you just call her?" Rucker asked.

"I never thought about it," Harwood responded.

Rucker also questioned Harwood's other claims.

"Would you admit that that story by you is unbelievable?" Rucker asked.

"No, I wouldn't admit that," Harwood responded.

"Look at these jurors in the eyes and tell them you did not kill Lita Sullivan," Rucker asked.

"I did not shoot and kill Lita Sullivan," Harwood said.

Alleged Hitman In Sullivan Trial Blames Another Admits To Being Paid $25,000 To Kill Buckhead Woman (AJC)

By Bill Montgomery, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 7, 2006

The man serving time for the 1987 killing of Buckhead resident Lita McClinton testified Monday that he wasn't the triggerman.

Phillip Anthony "Tony" Harwood said that although millionaire murder for hire defendant James Vincent Sullivan paid him $25,000 to kill his estranged wife, she was killed by a man he knew only as "John the bartender."

Harwood said on Jan. 13, he, John, and a woman he described as a hooker, travelled from North Carolina to the Atlanta area and checked into a hotel.

On the morning of Jan. 16, Harwood said he drove John to McClinton's Buckhead townhome. Harwood said he sat in the car while John left the car. He heard two gunshots "a heartbeat apart" and when John returned he had blood on his face, Harwood testified.

Harwood said he then drove to a Suwanee reststop and called Sullivan, informing him of the hit.

Harwood, 55, pleaded guilty in 2003 to voluntary manslaughter in McClinton's death and received a 20-year prison sentence, avoiding the death penalty, in return for a pledge to testify against Sullivan.

When prosecutor Clint Rucker asked Harwood if he agreed to kill Lita Sullivan, Harwood replied, "To be honest, I have to answer no. The agreement was to 'take care of her' but my intention was never to participate."

"What do you think Sullivan meant by 'take care of her,'" asked Rucker.

"I figured he meant to kill her, you don't pay $25,000 to scare nobody," said Harwood.

Harwood said Sullivan first broached the subject at Sullivan's Palm Beach mansion on Nov. 24, 1986, nearly two months before the murder. Harwood had just moved Sullivan's furniture from Macon to Palm Beach, Fla.

"Mr. Sullivan told me he was having problems with his soon-to-be ex-wife —- she was going to take him for everything he's got. He asked me if I knew of anyone who could take care of his problem," Harwood testified.

"I recognize shoe shuffling and BS-ing when I hear it. I think he was jiving me. He was angry and I didn't take nothing serious," he said.

Rucker asked Harwood when he knew Sullivan was no longer joking.

"When I got $12,500 in the mail," the witness said.

Earlier Monday, Harwood's former girlfriend was questioned for more than three hours by defense attorneys.

Belinda Trahan once again pointed out millionaire James Vincent Sullivan as the man she saw hand Harwood $25,000 in a Florida diner for the contract killing.

Defense attorney Ed Garland was questioning Trahan on the relatively short amount of time she had been in Sullivan's presence, when, in a voice bordering on anger, Trahan said, "I know what I saw and you can't take that from me no matter what you do."

Trahan didn't hesitate on the witness stand last week when she was asked to point out the person who gave her boyfriend money not long after the murder.

"He's right there," Trahan said, pointing to Sullivan. "Glasses. Blue suit. White hair."

Sullivan, 64, showed no reaction to Trahan's identification.

DOJ_NMG_0016569

One of the most compelling witnesses in the trial to date, Trahan, 47, who now lives in Texas, spent almost two hours testifying for the prosecution Friday. Prosecutors are seeking the death penalty for Sullivan.

Trahan came forward about the murder in 1998, after hearing of a television show about the unsolved killing. Employed by Texas attorney Ed Lieck, she told him she recalled being with Harwood when he met a man she later learned was Sullivan at a Florida diner.

Trahan testified Harwood, then living in Albemarle, N.C., had told her right before the slaying, " 'Some white guy wanted to take out his black wife.' They were in a divorce and he didn't want her to have anything."

Sullivan is white; Lita Sullivan was black.

Defense attorney Ed Garland questioned Trahan on details of the clothing she said Sullivan had worn in the diner. Under cross-examination, she admitted she had never heard Sullivan's name until she had heard it from Lieck.

Accused Hit Man And Star Witness Denies Shooting Millionaire's Wife (COURTTV)

By Emanuella Grinberg, Court TV

Court TV, March 7, 2006

ATLANTA — Prosecutors have cast convicted felon Phillip Anthony Harwood as the key to their 19-year-old case against a millionaire they believe took out a hit on his wife.

But less than 10 minutes into his testimony in James Sullivan's capital murder trial Tuesday, the former truck driver turned jailhouse lawyer emerged as a wild card for both the defense and the state, implicating Sullivan one instant while denying being the shooter.

"Did you agree to participate in the death of Lita Sullivan?" Fulton County Assistant District Attorney Clint Rucker asked Harwood, 55, who is serving a 20-year sentence for voluntary manslaughter in exchange for his testimony.

"To be honest, I'd have to answer no. I didn't directly agree to murder Lita Sullivan," the tall, lanky witness answered after a long pause, setting the tone for his largely unapologetic testimony.

Story continues

advertisement

To the contrary, Harwood cast himself as an unwitting pawn in James Sullivan's plot despite numerous good intentions, from an attempt to withdraw from the plot to his plan to tell Lita Sullivan of the hit and turn the tables on her husband.

Harwood was unwavering in his story that, with the help of a topless dancer named Tracy, he enlisted a man simply known as John the bartender to gun down Lita Sullivan in her upscale Buckhead townhouse the morning of Jan. 16, 1987.

"Do you bear any responsibility, Mr. Harwood?" Rucker asked, his own tone incredulous at time of his witness.

"I guess I do, by what you may call proxy," said Harwood, whose jeans and beige shirt concealed a remote-controlled restraining mechanism. "I believe we're all accountable for our own acts, but I guess if you got down to the brass tax of it, it all began with Mr. Sullivan."

Prosecutors entered into evidence a piece of paper on which Tony Harwood had written James Sullivan's phone number.

Harwood testified James Sullivan asked him for help in November 1986, after the trucker hauled the wealthy investor's furniture from his home in Macon, Ga., to his Palm Beach mansion. Sullivan was living alone in the midst of an acrimonious divorce from his estranged wife, who was 10 years younger.

"He kind of goes, 'I've got this wife in Atlanta, and she's just trying to take me for everything I've got, do you know anyone who can take care of my problem?'" Harwood testified as he rubbed his forehead and flailed his arms in an attempt to imitate Sullivan.

Harwood said he tried to brush off the request. Even so, a few weeks later, he received a down payment of $12,500 in the form of two certified checks from Sullivan.

"I didn't take him seriously but then, when checks came, I thought what am I going to do now?" he testified.

Ultimately, Harwood testified he decided to keep the money out of fear for what might happen should he refuse it.

After the group's first trip to Atlanta to warn Lita Sullivan of the plot, according to Harwood, they returned a second time at John the bartender's behest, perhaps to see if they could persuade Lita to contract a similar hit on her husband.

With a picture of Lita Sullivan holding a bouquet of flowers projected behind him, the witness testified that he purchased the box of flowers that John the bartender carried to Lita's doorstep at the recommendation of James Sullivan, who said his wife adored flowers.

Even so, Harwood insisted he remained in the car, and expressed shock when his crony came running out of the complex after two gunshots rang out, his face spattered with Lita Sullivan's blood.

James Sullivan listened to the testimony Monday.

The sequestered jury panel of 13 women and three men appeared skeptical of Harwood's claims, taking notes mostly when his version of events contradicted those testified to by previous trial witnesses.

His story clashed most with that of his ex-girlfriend, Belinda Trahan, who spent two days on the stand describing how she finally came to realize her boyfriend was involved in Lita Sullivan's murder.

Nearly 11 years after Lita Sullivan's death, Trahan's tip to authorities finally enabled them to connect the dots between the defendant and his wife's death.

While Trahan testified that she saw Sullivan pass her boyfriend a newspaper concealing an envelope of cash at a restaurant table, Harwood insisted that the trade-off occurred in the bathroom.

Trahan also claimed that the meeting occurred days, maybe weeks, after the January shooting, while Harwood said they made the trip to Florida in August 1987.

Even so, Harwood said he bore no animus toward the woman he referred to as his common-law wife of three years.

"I worshipped the ground she walked on," Harwood said. "Belinda was everything I had ever dreamed of. She was kind, considerate, a kid at heart, a good mother... she'd make any man proud."

"How do you feel about her today?" Rucker asked as Lita Sullivan's parents and relatives listened intently from the gallery.

"I'm glad she had more courage than I had," he said, referring to her decision to turn him in.

The prosecutor's questioning of his own witness grew increasingly testy as Harwood refused to acknowledge he was the shooter.

"Mr. Harwood, this is an opportunity for you to tell these jurors the whole truth," Rucker said, as Lita McClinton's father, Emory, wiped a tear from under his eyeglasses. "Can you look at these jurors and tell them you did not shoot and kill Lita Sullivan?"

"I did not shoot and kill Lita Sullivan," Harwood said as he turned his chair to face the panel.

Lawyers for James Sullivan will cross-examine the witness Tuesday.

Hit Man: James Sullivan Hired Me (WXIA-TV)

WXIA-TV, March 7, 2006

Tony Harwood points to James Sullivan.

The convicted hit man in the murder-for-hire trial of Palm Beach, Fla. millionaire James Sullivan took the stand as the state's star witness Monday afternoon.

Under questioning by Fulton County prosecutor Clint Rucker, Phillip Anthony Harwood said he first met the defendant when he delivered furniture to him from Sullivan's former home in Macon, Ga. Harwood said Sullivan started to hint around about needing help dealing with his estranged wife in Atlanta who was "trying to take everything he has."

When Rucker asked Harwood how he knew Sullivan wasn't joking about having his wife killed, Harwood responded, "When I received $12,500 in the mail." Harwood said Sullivan suggested he could "get to her by delivering flowers because she liked flowers." Harwood said he named his price at $25,000.

Lita Sullivan was shot and killed at her Buckhead condominium in January 1987 by a man posing as a flower deliveryman. Harwood avoided a death penalty trial in deal to testify at Sullivan's death penalty trial in Atlanta. Harwood has changed a part of his confession and claims he did not actually fire the shots that killed Lita Sullivan. He said in court that he hired his own hitman to carry out the job.

When asked to point out the man who paid him to kill Lita Sullivan, Harwood said, "Mr. Sullivan's sitting right over there," pointing at the defendant. When asked if Sullivan looked any different than when they met 20 years earlier, Harwood said he looked a lot older.

Earlier Monday, the woman Harwood described as his former common law wife, wrapped up her testimony. Belinda Trahan told jurors that James Sullivan was the man who sat down at a diner with her and Harwood and that Sullivan pushed a newspaper full of money toward Harwood as payment for killing Lita Sullivan.

During cross examination, Sullivan's attorney, Ed Garland, said Trahan's motive for testifying against Sullivan is greed. She responded, "Like I said before, I'm not interested in any reward so can we move on?"

While Garland tried to shake Trahan, he attacked her memory as faulty and her identification of James Sullivan as uncertain and unreliable.

"I know what I saw and you can't take that from me no matter what you do," said Trahan.

Alleged Hitman's Ex Cross-examined At Sullivan Trial (PALMBEACHP)

By Larry Keller, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016571

ATLANTA — Belinda Trahan finished a grueling cross-examination from James Sullivan's attorney Monday by insisting he is the man she saw pass an envelope full of money to her then-boyfriend as payment for killing Sullivan's second wife 19 years ago.

"I'm absolutely sure of the man I saw," Trahan, 47, said, her voice rising. Then, as she did on Friday, Trahan stood in the witness box and pointed at Sullivan seated at the defense table, "looking down again, not looking at me." Trahan was questioned for more than five hours on Friday and Monday, and about three hours of that was an interrogation by Ed Garland, one of Sullivan's attorneys. Item by item, point by point, he showed inconsistencies and contradictions in Trahan's trial testimony and earlier statements she has made to authorities.

By his questions, Garland suggested Trahan was motivated to come forward with her story in 1998 in order to collect a reward that still has not been paid, and that her story was influenced by news accounts she had read.

Trahan says that Philip "Tony" Harwood told her he had participated in the 1987 slaying of Lita Sullivan, who was about to divorce James Sullivan, a millionaire who lived in Palm Beach at the time.

Harwood was subsequently arrested and told police that Sullivan paid him $25,000 for the job. Some evidence points to Harwood as being the man who delivered a dozen roses to Lita Sullivan, then shot her in the head. He has denied being the shooter.

Garland had Trahan refer to a synopsis of events that she typed in 1998, and to statements she made to police that year. She said back then that "I really wasn't paying attention" at the meeting with Sullivan and Harwood at a restaurant, and that "I didn't look at (Sullivan) real good." She also said she had never seen Harwood with a gun, but she testified that he always kept a 9 mm pistol in the moving van he drove. Lita Sullivan was killed with a 9 mm pistol.

Trahan denied having read about Lita Sullivan's murder prior to talking to police in 1998. Where did you get the information you gave them, prosecutor Kellie Stevens Hill asked.

"From real life," the earthy Trahan replied.

Harwood's much-anticipated testimony is expected this afternoon.

Sullivan, 64, was indicted for his wife's murder by a Fulton County grand jury in 1998. He was arrested in Thailand in 2002, and finally extradited to Atlanta in 2004.

Official Indicted For Fraud, Bribery (ARMYTIME)

By Michelle Tan, Times staff writer

Army Times, March 6, 2006

An official at Army Test and Evaluation Command was indicted March 1 for fraud and bribery, according to the U.S. Justice Department.

Jeffrey H. Stayton, chief of aviation for ATEC was charged with two counts of honest services fraud, one count of bribery and one count of obstruction of justice after an indictment was returned by a federal grand jury in the Middle District of Alabama.

The grand jury in Montgomery, Ala., also indicted William Curtis Childree, a private contractor based in Enterprise, Ala. Childree, 67, is charged with two counts of honest services fraud and one count of bribery.

According to the indictment, in or about November 2001, Maverick Aviation, a business owned and run by Childree that buys and distributes helicopters for its clients, was chosen to produce and modify two helicopters for use by the U.S. government. The contract was worth about $4.7 million.

Stayton, 55, is accused of taking actions that favored Maverick's selection to get thecontract and misleading government officials about Maverick's performance under the contract , according to the Justice Department.

The indictment against the men also states that in exchange for Stayton's actions, Childree secretly wired to a third party $61,071.75 from a Maverick bank account to pay off Stayton's mortgage in Spotsylvania County, Va.

Stayton didn't disclose receipt of the payment to other ATEC or Army personnel or in his financial disclosure statements, according to the Justice Department.

The indictment goes on to say that in or around June 2005, after the grand jury investigation had begun, Stayton appeared before the grand jury and falsely testified that Childree's $61,000 payment was a loan.

ATEC plans and conducts tests and evaluations of weapons and equipment . Its headquarters is in Alexandria, Va.

The fraud charge carries up to 20 years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000 or both. If found guilty of bribery, the men could face up to 15 years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000 or both. And if Stayton is found guilty of obstruction of justice he could be given up to 10 more years in prison, a fine of up to $250,000 or both.

The case was investigated by Army Criminal Investigation Command and the FBI.

US Snubs Britain Over Sex Criminals (TIMES)

By Tom Baldwin in Washington
London Times, March 7, 2006

BRITAIN and the United States were locked in a deepening diplomatic dispute last night over Washington's failure to implement a mutual extradition agreement that Parliament approved three years ago.

Congress's refusal to ratify the deal means that Britain cannot prosecute criminals residing in the US, including sex offenders and paedophiles.

America has sought the extradition of 44 alleged offenders since 2003, and 12 have already been sent to the US. The extradition of several others has been approved but is awaiting appeal. In contrast, Britain extradited only five suspects from the US in the same period under the previous thirty-year-old extradition treaty, including just one in 2005.

Ministers have repeatedly raised the issue with their US counterparts, and Charles Clarke, the Home Secretary, protested again when he met Alberto Gonzales, the US Attorney-General, in London yesterday.

Diplomats led by Sir David Manning, Ambassador to the US, have also held about 30 meetings on the issue on Capitol Hill in recent months. But pleas have fallen on deaf ears. Indeed, America's failure to abide by its side of the deal is fast becoming a political embarrassment for a British government often accused of showing undue deference to Washington.

A total of 145 MPs, including many Labour backbenchers, have signed a Commons motion demanding that extraditions to the US be halted until the Senate ratifies the treaty.

A Home Office spokeswoman confirmed that it was encountering obstacles in extraditing suspects, particularly sex offenders, from the US. This is because the existing treaty, dating to 1972 and listing a schedule of extraditable offences, "was drawn up before the internet was invented". She said: "There are people we want who are successfully evading justice."

A senior US official told The Times yesterday that the Administration was sympathetic to Britain's concerns and hinted that a fresh attempt to force the treaty through the Senate would be made within weeks.

The official said that the problem had been caused by the influential Irish-American lobby, which is worried that the treaty could be used to pursue IRA suspects. Senators are worried about alienating any section of voters before November's congressional elections. British diplomats have emphasised that, after the Good Friday agreement, Britain has little interest in pursuing IRA suspects.

Those currently facing extradition to the US under the 2003 deal include the "Nat West Three" who face up to 35 years in prison if convicted of Enron-related fraud charges. Their lawyers, who are appealing to the House of Lords, claim they are victims of an unequal law.

Another Briton extradited to the US for financial offences is Nigel Potter, former chief executive of Wembley plc, who will today begin an appeal against a three-year sentence for fraud.

Potter was convicted of conspiring to bribe a US politician so that his company could install fruit machines at an American greyhound track. No bribes were paid, however, and Potter was acquitted of all but three charges of wire fraud.

In contrast to the white collar suspects being sent to the US, Britain is being prevented from bringing to justice US suppliers of computer child pornography, including some of those related to Operation Ore two years ago, which discovered 6,000 Britons using an American website.

The 1972 treaty also contains a statute of limitations which does not allow extradition for offences that took place more than six years ago. Officials say this is a particular problem in child abuse cases because victims often do not come foward until they are adults.

Since the new treaty was agreed in March 2003, countries such as Lithuania, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia and Peru have had extradition deals ratified by Congress. John Ashcroft, the US AttorneyGeneral in 2003, said that the new treaty "should serve as a model to the world for successful and efficient co-operation."

Prosecutors Target White Supremacist Gang (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer
AP, March 7, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ANA, Calif.-The inmates had to heat the letter to draw out the message, written in invisible ink. When they did, their orders were clear.

Within hours, prosecutors say, members of the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang sneaked into a nearby cellblock and killed two black inmates with handmade shanks as part of an order to "go to war" with blacks.

The deaths are two of the 32 murders and attempted murders detailed by federal prosecutors in a sweeping case against the Aryan Brotherhood, a violent white supremacist prison gang that has infiltrated nearly every federal and state prison since its beginnings in San Quentin in 1964.

DOJ_NMG_0016573

Prosecutors hope to dismantle the gang - nicknamed the "Brand" - in a series of trials that together make up what's believed to be the biggest capital murder case in U.S. history. Of the 40 men initially charged, as many as 16 could face the death penalty for crimes that reach back 30 years.

Prosecutors are pursuing the highly organized gang with a racketeering law originally passed to target Mafia leaders - a tactic recently used with some success against other prison gangs in California and Texas.

"We're looking at this huge list of charges, and I'm unaware of any other case that's even close to this," said Dean Steward, attorney for Barry "The Baron" Mills, a lead defendant.

Opening statements in the trial of Mills and three others are scheduled to begin March 14 in federal court in Santa Ana. Mills and another alleged ringleader, Tyler "The Hulk" Bingham, face the death penalty in what could be a nine-month trial.

Four more defendants are set to go on trial in Los Angeles in October; court dates in California are pending for the remaining men. Nineteen of the 40 defendants struck plea bargains, and one has died.

The 140-page indictment against the gang alleges a web of conspiracies to murder fellow inmates who offended gang members, cheated them on drug deals, failed to comply with the orders of leaders or snitched to prison authorities. Prosecutors, who declined to be interviewed, spent six years compiling evidence and relied on informants for much of their case.

Court documents suggest that patient gang members waited months to carry out the violent tasks ordered by their leaders, passing information from prison to prison and member to member using friends and spouses on the outside, corrupt prison guards and notes written with invisible ink.

In one case, for example, members of the Aryan Brotherhood allegedly spent a year planning the murder of Richard Barnes, the father of a fellow gang member who had testified against the gang. Members funneled his address and firearms to someone on the outside, who shot him in the head in 1983, according to court documents.

"This has the potential of being incredibly damaging to the brotherhood," said Joanna Mendelson, an investigative researcher with the Anti-Defamation League, which tracks the Aryan Brotherhood. "They rank among the most organized, systematic gangs in all the prison system."

Mills, who faces a number of charges in the current case, has already been convicted of luring another inmate into a recreation shack at a federal lockup in Atlanta in 1979 with the promise that he would get a new tattoo.

Instead, Mills nearly decapitated the man with a handmade knife - his punishment for cheating the brotherhood on a drug deal, according to court documents.

Mills, now 57, went on to become a founder of a three-member group that prosecutors say ordered and approved murders carried out by gang members or aspiring members. He is currently serving two life terms for the 1979 murder, which is detailed in the indictment as part of the government's racketeering case.

Mills, Bingham and the others going to trial have pleaded not guilty.

"The reality is, federal penitentiaries are violent and dangerous places and all of these guys - white guys - are a small minority and they're just trying to survive," Steward said.

Civil rights groups that monitor the Aryan Brotherhood say highly disciplined gang members managed to communicate frequently, despite 23 hours a day in solitary confinement.

Accused members often acted as their own attorneys and subpoenaed other brotherhood members to testify, allowing them to pass messages in court through hand signals and code words or slip messages into legal files, said Melissa Carr, an expert on the gang with the Anti-Defamation League.

Some gang members write messages to outside helpers using coded alphabets or invisible ink made with their own urine, she said, while others pass tiny messages on a string, called "kites," from one cell to another when guards aren't looking.

Experts say prosecutors will face challenges in their push for death penalties - particularly because nearly all the victims were convicted felons and many defendants are already serving long prison terms.

"The jury says, 'Well, these people are in prison already and if they kill other prison inmates, who cares?'" said William McGuigan, a defense attorney who has worked on several Mexican Mafia cases. "They aren't outraged like they are if the victims are ordinary citizens."

Lemon Grove Medical Clinic Shut Down In Alleged Fraud Conspiracy (SDUT)

By Angelica Martinez, UNION-TRIBUNE BREAKING NEWS TEAM

The San Diego Union-Tribune, March 7, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A Lemon Grove medical clinic was shut down after its owners and employees were charged with defrauding Medi-Cal out of more than $2 million, authorities said Monday.

Nine people, including the owners and a doctor who worked at a medical clinic on Golden Avenue east of Lemon Grove Avenue, were indicted last week on 47 counts that included conspiracy; insurance fraud; capping, or illegally referring patients; tax evasion; grand theft and operating a business without workers' compensation insurance, the District Attorney's Office announced.

DOJ_NMG_0016574

During the course of a 15-month investigation, the clinic billed Medi-Cal more than $2 million for services patients did not receive, said District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis.

“This was a tremendous amount of money and they were targeting vulnerable people,” Dumanis said.

FBI agents first learned about the clinic in November 2004 when patients complained that they were being billed for treatment that they did not receive, said Daniel R. Dzwilewski, special agent in charge of the San Diego FBI office.

Dumanis said the scheme targeted patients who are elderly and speak poor English. She said they were recruited at casinos, trolley stops and senior citizen homes.

The services the clinic billed Medi-Cal for but did not perform included nerve conduction studies, elaborate dizziness testing and other tests.

“The clinic was like a cash register,” said Rita Hanscom, a deputy district attorney.

Several of the employees also did not report the fraudulent income they earned from Medi-Cal and did not file related employment taxes, officials said. They said the clinic also did not have workers' compensation insurance.

One of those charged, Dr. Arthur Vallejo, wrote repetitive or useless prescriptions that cost Medi-Cal more than $53,000, officials said.

Vallejo, 46, and his wife, Cynthia, 28, both of Downey, were indicted along with clinic owners Anush Manukyan, 45, and her husband, Rafik, 50, both of Van Nuys.

Others indicted were Tommie L. Williams Jr., 52, of La Mesa; Marites Ramano Dioso, 34, of National City; Fernando C. Lantano, 40, and Alicia Musa Leonardo, 72, both of San Diego and Erlinda Solon Cabungcal, 62, of National City.

Patients told investigators they were paid to go to the clinic by Cabungcal, Dioso, Lantana and Leonardo.

Authorities said a North Hollywood clinic owned by the Manukyans was also under investigation.

Feds Expand Dearborn Credit Fraud Case With Indictments (DEN)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, March 7, 2006

What started with two brothers now has 17 more people; racketeering, conspiracy are alleged.

DEARBORN -- What began as an investigation into whether two Dearborn brothers committed credit card fraud has grown into a money-laundering indictment charging the pair and 17 of their business associates and relatives.

Defense attorneys now say prosecutors threatened to indict the suspects' family members unless they agreed to plead guilty. They also accuse government investigators of improperly obtaining secret wiretaps in the investigation of Dearborn perfume distributor Ali Abdul Karim Farhat and his brother, Hassan Farhat.

When plea negotiations with some suspects failed, a federal grand jury in recent months charged additional people with bankruptcy fraud, conspiracy, false statements, mail fraud, bank fraud, money laundering and racketeering. In total, the indictments allege that the ring defrauded banks of $1.7 million.

At the same time, hundreds of pages of secret wiretap records recently made public show that the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force went to great lengths in its investigation of the Farhats -- installing a secret surveillance camera outside a Dearborn business, stealing a suspect's trash and having an undercover agent pose as a businessman seated next to a suspect on an airplane flight.

In January 2004, the two brothers were charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and held without bond for two weeks. Their arrest came largely on the basis of testimony from Myron Strong, a longtime FBI informant who later pleaded guilty to inventing evidence and conning the FBI out of $240,000. Strong is serving a 10-year-prison sentence.

The Farhats also were accused of supporting Hezbollah, the Lebanese terror group -- a claim withdrawn in February 2004 when, based on the unreliability of Strong's testimony, government prosecutors also dismissed the drug charge.

In April 2004, a federal grand jury indicted Ali Farhat and his brother, along with eight other people. In two later indictments, the grand jury added nine additional suspects.

The group was charged with running a "credit card bust-out scheme" that involved obtaining credit cards, racking up large balances and defaulting on the loans.

Defense lawyers say that by December 2004, the U.S. attorney's office began circulating plea agreements contingent on all defendants pleading guilty. At the time, 12 people had been indicted.

Defense lawyers say the plea offers were coercive.

"The government made threats and used intimidation in an attempt to coerce guilty pleas from the defendants," said a filing signed by eight defense lawyers and written by Philip J. Thomas, a lawyer for Abdul Halim Berro, one of the defendants.

"It is beyond comprehension how a federal prosecutor could be allowed to engage in bribe tactics in order to induce a guilty plea," Thomas wrote.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Cathleen Corken, the lead prosecutor, said the government would respond to the defense motions by March 8 -- Wednesday. A U.S. district judge set a March 30 hearing.

Sniper Lists Complaints To Judge (WT/AP)

By Stephen Manning

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Convicted sniper mastermind John Allen Muhammad appeared in Montgomery County Circuit Court in Rockville yesterday with a list of complaints, including charges that jailers have restricted his access to court documents in his trial for six Washington-area sniper shootings.

He also complained about disagreements with his attorneys over legal filings and that he had been denied long underwear to wear in court.

Muhammad also lost a pair of pretrial motions during yesterday's hearing in advance of his scheduled May 1 trial. He was transferred to Montgomery County last summer from Virginia, where he has been sentenced to death.

Circuit Judge John Ryan granted a request from county prosecutors to present evidence of other shootings Muhammad and accomplice Lee Boyd Malvo are accused of carrying out before and during the three-week October 2002 shooting rampage in the Washington region.

Judge Ryan also blocked a request by Muhammad's attorneys to hold separate trials for some of the six murders that occurred in Montgomery County, the first on Oct. 2 and the last on Oct. 22, 2002.

When the motion was first presented in court, Muhammad cut short his court-appointed attorney, saying he never agreed to filing the motion.

"I ask for that motion not to be put in," he said before the motion was heard. "I disagree with it 100 percent, Your Honor."

Throughout a legal process that began with his 2003 murder trial, conviction and death sentence in Virginia, Muhammad has actively inserted himself into his defense.

Shortly before his first trial began, he briefly dismissed his attorneys and handled his own case, making an opening statement and questioning some witnesses. He eventually allowed his attorneys to return.

In court yesterday, Montgomery corrections officials testified that Muhammad has seven boxes of legal documents that he brought with him from Virginia.

He worked out an agreement with his jailers that gives him access to the material, but he complained that prison officials only give him limited records at a time. He said he needed to review much of it at the same time.

"I asked for access to all the material," he said. "All of the quote-unquote crimes that I committed occurred together."

Robert Green, warden of the Montgomery County jail, testified that Muhammad has adequate access to his records. Judge Ryan agreed after hearing both arguments.

Prosecutors say Muhammad and Malvo tried to extort $10 million from local governments during their spree. In all, they are accused of killing 10 persons and wounding three in Maryland, Virginia and the District in October 2002. They have been linked to earlier killings in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Washington state.

Malvo was also convicted in Virginia and sentenced to life in prison. He is scheduled to go on trial in Montgomery County in the fall for the six murders.

Malvo is not eligible for a death sentence because he was 17 when the murders occurred, and prosecutors said last week that they will not seek a death sentence for Muhammad in Maryland.

Grand Jury Decries 'Arrests Without Merit' (BSUN)

By Julie Bykowicz

The Baltimore Sun, March 7, 2006

A Baltimore grand jury is calling for the number of city arrests that fail to result in criminal charges to be cut in half, saying such arrests erode public confidence in the Police Department, according to a report released Monday.

"If the staggering number of arrests is to be validated, the percentage of arrests without merit must be drastically reduced," the report says. The jurors also said that frequent police stops of residents is an approach "bordering on violating a person's constitutional rights."

The panel of 23 grand jurors that met from September to January was asked by a Baltimore Circuit Court judge to "address the lack of confidence that exists between many members of the public and law enforcement."

DOJ_NMG_0016576

The grand jury appears to have done its research by reviewing media reports and arrest statistics, as well as speaking with each other and with "several" residents, though the report does not say how many. Grand jurors talked to one person from the Police Department, the head of education and training.

The report gives about two dozen recommendations, but few are specific. One example: "Improve the quality of narcotics arrests." One recommendation was to reduce "arrests without merit" -- an apparent reference to arrests that don't result in charges -- by at least 50 percent before the end of this year.

The report cites a state Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services report that 21,721 African-Americans in Baltimore were arrested but not charged between April 2004 and March 2005. Grand jurors said this number shows that "countless people have been harassed."

Lt. Paul M. Blair Jr., president of the city police union, had not read the report, but he said that the recommendation to make fewer arrests conflicts with what officers hear at neighborhood meetings where residents complain about quality-of-life issues.

"Can they tell us which neighborhoods we should stop making arrests in?" Blair asked. "It sounds like it was a waste of paper if that's all they came out with."

Matt Jablow, a Police Department spokesman, said the phrase "without merit" does not make sense. "Officers are not allowed to make arrests without merit," he said. "There has to be probable cause, and that is merit."

If the grand jury is referring to reducing the number of arrests that fail to result in criminal charges, Jablow said, "we share that sentiment." He said the department has taken steps to improve training and report-writing.

The percentage of arrests that fail to generate charges has decreased from 23 percent in December to 14 percent last month, said Kristen Mahoney, chief of technical services for the city Police Department, referring to public safety statistics.

The main function of a grand jury is to decide which criminal cases warrant indictments. Among the cases handled by this grand jury were the indictments of three Southwestern District officers. One officer is accused of raping a woman brought to the station house in handcuffs, and the other two are accused of doing nothing to stop it.

The grand jury is forbidden to discuss individual cases it hears, so those indictments are not mentioned in its report, nor is a public hearing in early January at which the police commissioner and mayor were criticized for what residents called aggressive tactics.

Circuit Judge Joseph P. McCurdy assigned the topic in September, on the heels of a Sun report about two judges saying in open court that they didn't believe police officers who were testifying in two particular cases.

"This is something the community as a whole needs to address," McCurdy said at the time.

Five years ago, another judge assigned a grand jury to study whether the public was losing confidence in the Police Department. This latest grand jury report was intended to build on those findings, which found distrust, McCurdy said. The judge did not return phone calls Monday.

The jurors -- 21 women and two men -- devoted 20 pages of its report to McCurdy's topic, touching on everything from media coverage to the number of arrests. Several recommendations were made for each topic.

Some examples:

Police officers should be "retrained to use better judgment and common sense in determining if an individual is actually involved in criminal activity."

Increase neighborhood patrols and build relationships by having officers participate in programs such as the Police Athletic League and school programs.

Create a public service announcement "emphasizing the progress that the [Police Department] has made."

Jablow, the police spokesman, said the report would be "a useful tool" in the department's efforts to build relationships. "We'll do whatever it takes to make this a safer city and to improve relations with citizens," he said.

Crackdown On Animal-rights Activists (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

Animal-rights activists around the country - at least the most extreme - are becoming increasingly militant. And law enforcement officials and lawmakers are stepping up efforts to combat those who break the law.

These interconnected trends came to a head in New Jersey last week when an animal rights group and six of its members were convicted of inciting violence in their campaign to shut down a company that uses animals to test drugs and other consumer products.

The group, Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC), claims its actions constitute free speech. But federal prosecutors and the jury in a Trenton, N.J., courtroom called it harassment, stalking, and conspiracy - the first such conviction under the 1992

DOJ_NMG_0016577

Animal Enterprise Protection Act. The lab, Huntingdon Life Sciences (HLS), the largest of its kind in the world, is based in Britain and New Jersey.

Antivivisectionists and other animal-rights proponents have been organized in the US since at least the mid-19th century. But recently, their most extreme members have become more aggressive.

Much of the focus for animal-rights supporters is on companies that produce animal products (mainly meat and fur). In their sights, too, are universities, hospitals, and other institutions that kill animals for medical research or product development. And they have been targeting anyone who does business with animal testers - financial institutions, contractors, and service providers, some with only a tenuous connection.

Activists' tactics include vandalism, personal warnings by e-mail and phone message, and other threats directed at family members - what's called "tertiary targeting."

"There really isn't a week that goes by that I don't hear about an incident," says Jacquie Calnan, president of Americans for Medical Progress in Alexandria, Va., which represents universities, pharmaceutical and biomedical corporations, and research organizations.

Most of those engaged in medical science say animal testing is crucial to find cures for disease and new devices meant to keep people healthy.

"Virtually every human being in the country has benefited from animal research," says John Young, a lab animal veterinarian and director of comparative medicine at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center in Los Angeles.

For example, recent research (including the human genome project) established that mice and humans are virtually identical in their genetic makeup. Specially bred mice are used to investigate ways to treat human diseases.

US research facilities use more than 1 million animals every year: dogs, cats, guinea pigs, hamsters, monkeys, sheep, and other farm animals. Add in mice and rats (more than 90 percent of all lab animals), and the total jumps to nearly 30 million, according to the US Department of Agriculture.

While most such animals eventually are killed, supporters of such research say avoiding animal suffering is a major consideration in their work.

"I don't know of a scientist or veterinarian who is not committed to the welfare of the animals," says Dr. Young.

Members of SHAC, the Animal Liberation Front (ALF), and People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), strongly disagree. In some cases, they've infiltrated research labs to produce photos and videos that show otherwise.

"It's clear that if you look at the science we have much better ways of testing drugs to see whether they're going to be toxic or helpful in human beings," says Jerry Vlasak, a trauma surgeon in Canoga Park, Calif.

"Unfortunately ... the FDA [US Food and Drug Administration] is still requiring animal testing, but they're way behind the science on this issue," says Dr. Vlasak, who's also a spokesman for radical animal rights activists that often announce their "direct actions" anonymously. "The scientific alternatives are out there."

That's a minority view in the medical community, and it is one that many lawmakers oppose.

Members of the US House and Senate are sponsoring the "Animal Enterprise Terrorism Act." It would toughen the 1992 Animal Enterprise Protection Act by imposing penalties for veiled threats to individuals and families, economic disruption or damage, and "tertiary targeting."

Along with the recent indictment of ALF activists charged with arson and other crimes in Oregon and other parts of the West, the convictions in New Jersey are a setback for extremist animal-rights activists.

Still, the crackdown by the FBI and other police agencies has not slowed activists' efforts. One anonymous group just launched a website listing the home addresses of 2,000 employees from 30 companies doing business with Huntingdon Life Sciences.

"From CEOs to lowly sales reps, from Alabama to Hawaii, we've sniffed them out," activists are told. "Visit them often, and make the message clear: when you contract with HLS... you get us!"

CIVIL LAW:

Court Upholds Campus Military Recruiting (AP-Y2)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday that the government can force colleges to open their campuses to military recruiters despite university objections to the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays.

DOJ_NMG_0016578

Justices rejected a free-speech challenge from law schools and professors who claimed they should not have to associate with military recruiters or promote their campus appearances.

The decision was a setback for universities that had become the latest battleground over the military policy allowing gay men and women to serve only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

The ruling does not, however, answer broader questions about the policy itself. Challenges are pending in courts in Boston and Los Angeles that could eventually reach the high court.

Justices seemed swayed by the Bush administration's arguments that after the terrorist attacks, and during the war in Iraq, the government had a responsibility to bolster its recruitment.

Chief Justice John Roberts said that campus visits are an effective recruiting tool. And, he said, "a military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message."

The 8-0 decision upheld a federal law that says universities must give the military the same access as other recruiters or forfeit federal money.

Justices ruled even more broadly, saying that Congress could directly demand military access on campus without linking the requirement to federal money.

"When you're in the middle of war, even if it's not a terribly popular one, courts are hesitant to tie the hands of the military," said Jon Davidson, legal director of gay rights group Lambda Legal.

Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, called the decision "an important victory for the military and ultimately for our national security."

The military's policy had put college leaders in a thorny situation because of campus rules that forbid participation of recruiters representing agencies or private companies that have discriminatory policies.

Most college leaders have said they could not afford to lose federal help, some $35 billion a year.

Roberts, writing his third decision since joining the court last fall, said there are other less drastic options for protesting the policy. "Students and faculty are free to associate to voice their disapproval of the military's message," he wrote.

Joshua Rosenkranz, the attorney for the challengers of the law, said that the case called attention to the military policy. "A silver lining to the Supreme Court's opinion is the court made it clear," he said, "law schools are free to organize protests."

Geoffrey Shields, dean of Vermont Law School, said the school since 1999 has given up some federal money and will continue to bar recruiters "as a symbol of the importance of fair treatment of all people."

"We've stuck to our guns and I anticipate we'll continue to stick to our guns," he said.

Roberts' decision carefully sidestepped taking a stand on the policy itself, although he explained in a footnote that under don't ask, don't tell, "a person generally may not serve in the Armed Forces if he has engaged in homosexual acts, stated that he is a homosexual, or married a person of the same sex."

The court roundly rejected arguments that the policy raised important First Amendment free-speech issues for school leaders.

"Compelling a law school that sends scheduling e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance, or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display the motto 'Live Free or Die,'" Roberts wrote.

Roberts filed the only opinion, which was joined by every justice but Samuel Alito. Alito did not participate because he was not on the bench when the case was argued three months ago.

Congress passed the law, known as the Solomon Amendment after its first congressional sponsor, in 1994 — the same year that the "don't ask, don't tell" law took effect. Since then, an estimated 10,000 people have been discharged.

Air Force Lt. Col. Ellen Krenke, a Pentagon spokeswoman, said Monday that "equal access to law school, and all schools for that matter, for our recruiters is crucial to ensuring we attract a diverse and highly qualified pool of applicants."

"The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything," the chief justice said.

The case is Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, 04-1152.

___

On the Net:

Supreme Court: http://www.supremecourtus.gov/

Supreme Court Sides With Military On Recruiters' Access To Campuses (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, March 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016579

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court said Monday that Congress isn't trampling free speech by threatening to withhold federal funding from universities that kick military recruiters off campus because the Pentagon's "don't ask, don't tell" policy on gays conflicts with the schools' anti-discrimination practices.

In a unanimous 8-0 ruling, the justices said Congress isn't stopping the universities from protesting the policy, nor is it asking the schools to endorse the policy by granting military recruiters the same access they give other employers.

Congress' Solomon Amendment merely seeks to regulate what universities "must do - afford equal access to military recruiters - not what they may or may not say," Chief Justice John G. Roberts wrote for the court.

The ruling is a big boost to the military and a blow to 36 law schools that joined forces to fight what they'd described as overreaching by Congress. The schools will now face a choice: Grant military recruiters full access to their campuses, or forfeit what in some cases is hundreds of millions of dollars.

"It's an untenable choice, there's just no question about it," said E. Joshua Rosenkranz, the attorney for the schools. "But this is a skirmish in a much bigger war about equality and human dignity. That's a war we're winning."

The case ends a dispute that dates back decades but intensified in 2002, when lawmakers eager to boost military recruiting in the wake of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks got tough on universities.

In essence, they tied federal funding for universities to the hospitality they extend to military recruiters. Schools that treated the military like other employers would get their money. Those that chose to express their displeasure with the military's policy on gays by sending recruiters off campus or denying them the kind of reception that other employers received would have to forfeit their funds.

Since 1994, the military's policy of "don't ask, don't tell" has allowed gay men and women to serve as long as they didn't disclose their sexual preference or perform blatant homosexual acts in public.

Many law schools have stringent anti-discrimination policies that include protections for homosexuals; they give the same chilly welcome to recruiters from all employers that they feel discriminate.

A group of law schools objected to the new rules, saying Congress' edict was a violation of their free speech rights. They argued that it not only slapped down their protest, but also forced them to "associate" with the military's message by facilitating their recruitment efforts.

A federal district court rejected their arguments, but the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia sided with the schools, saying Congress' action was likely unconstitutional.

At the Supreme Court last fall, it seemed clear that the justices weren't buying the schools' argument. Several justices said it was within Congress' power to tie funding to access.

Roberts asked several times why, if the law schools felt so strongly about the policy, they didn't forgo the federal money.

In his opinion on Monday, he outlined how First Amendment protections of free speech and association weren't jeopardized by what Congress did.

"The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything," Roberts wrote. "Law schools remain free under the statute to express whatever views they may have on the military's congressionally mandated employment policy, all the while retaining eligibility for federal funds."

He noted that the law might require schools to send e-mails or post notices about military recruiters because they do it for other businesses. But he said such "compelled speech" was only incidental to the requirement that military recruiters be treated equally.

Comparing that situation to similar ones the court has faced, Roberts wrote: "Compelling a law school that sends scheduling e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance, or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display the motto `Live Free or Die.'" He said it "trivializes" constitutional protections to suggest that the law schools face similar burdens.

Roberts said law schools aren't "speaking" when they aid students in the recruitment process.

"Unlike a parade organizer's choice of parade contingents, a law school's decision to allow recruiters on campus is not inherently expressive," Roberts wrote. "Law schools facilitate recruiting to assist their students in obtaining jobs. A law school's recruiting services lack the expressive quality of a parade, a newsletter, or the editorial page of a newspaper."

Rosenkranz, picking up on the court's insistence that the law didn't prohibit law schools from opposing the military's policy, said some might respond with more aggressive protests.

"Imagine signs over interview rooms saying: `Danger: Discriminating employer inside.' Or imagine school-sponsored protests when military recruiters come," he said. "You haven't even seen protests until now."

The court's 8-0 ruling reflects the absence of Justice Samuel Alito, who hadn't been confirmed to the court when the case was argued and thus didn't vote.

DOJ_NMG_0016580

U.S. Wins Ruling Over Recruiting At Universities (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — The Supreme Court on Monday upheld a law that cuts federal financing for universities if they do not give military recruiters the same access to students that other potential employers receive. The court ruled that the law does not violate the free-speech rights of universities that object to the military's exclusion of gay men and lesbians who are open about their sexual orientation.

The opinion by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. was unanimous.

It was a setback, although hardly an unexpected one, to a coalition of law schools that brought the constitutional challenge, as well as to the Association of American Law Schools, which represents nearly all accredited law schools and since 1991 has required adherence to a nondiscrimination policy on sexual orientation as a condition of membership.

Many law schools initially chose to comply with the association's policy by barring military recruiters or by taking such steps as refusing to help the recruiters schedule appointments or relegating them to less favorable locations for meeting with students.

Congress responded with a series of increasingly punitive measures, all known as the Solomon Amendment, culminating in the 2004 statute at issue in the case. It requires access for military recruiters "that is at least equal in quality and scope" to access for other employers, on pain of forfeiting grants to the entire university from eight federal agencies, including the Departments of Defense, Education, and Health and Human Services.

With hundreds of millions of dollars at stake, all but a handful of law schools yielded. Nearly three dozen banded together as the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights and turned to the courts.

Carl C. Monk, executive director of the law school association, said in an interview on Monday that the group would continue to require its member schools to engage in "significant" activities to counter the impact of the Solomon Amendment, such as organizing faculty forums at which the military's policy could be analyzed and challenged.

The plaintiffs had persuaded the federal appeals court in Philadelphia that the Solomon Amendment imposed an "unconstitutional condition" on the universities' receipt of federal money by requiring them to surrender their First Amendment rights and become involuntary carriers of the government's anti-gay message.

But Chief Justice Roberts said on Monday that the plaintiffs' theory of the case, as well as the opinion by the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, was based on a fundamental misperception about what the Solomon Amendment was imposing.

"As a general matter, the Solomon Amendment regulates conduct, not speech," the chief justice said. "It affects what law schools must do — afford equal access to military recruiters — not what they may or may not say."

Pointing out that law schools remained free to disavow the military's policy, to denounce it or even to help students organize protests, Chief Justice Roberts said that "the Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

Citing a 1990 Supreme Court decision that upheld an equal-access requirement for student religious clubs in high schools, he continued: "We have held that high school students can appreciate the difference between speech a school sponsors and speech the school permits because legally required to do so. Surely students have not lost that ability by the time they get to law school."

To the extent that speech is involved when a military recruiter visits a campus, the chief justice said, the speech is "clearly" the government's, not the law school's. He said that placing the incidental assistance that universities must provide to military recruiters on the same plane as compelling students to recite the Pledge of Allegiance "trivializes the freedom protected" by a 1943 Supreme Court decision holding that the Pledge may not be required.

While the conclusion that the Solomon Amendment does not directly infringe on the law schools' free-speech rights was at the heart of the court's analysis, the opinion contained several other important threads.

One was the conclusion that allowing military recruiters on campus was not an "inherently expressive" activity. Therefore, Chief Justice Roberts said, the case was not governed by two Supreme Court precedents dealing with freedom of expression. One of them declared unconstitutional a Florida law that required newspapers to grant a "right of reply." The other allowed organizers of the St. Patrick's Day parade in Boston to exclude a gay-pride group despite a nondiscrimination ordinance.

The difference, the chief justice said, was that both the newspaper and the parade organizers were engaged in expression with which the government could not constitutionally interfere, while law schools "are not speaking when they host interviews and recruiting receptions."

Another conclusion was that the Solomon Amendment did not interfere with another interest protected by the First Amendment, the law schools' freedom of association. The appeals court had found a violation of this freedom by analogy to a

DOJ_NMG_0016581

Supreme Court decision in 2000 that gave the Boy Scouts the right to exclude a gay scoutmaster despite a New Jersey nondiscrimination law.

The analogy was incorrect, Chief Justice Roberts said. Unlike Boy Scout leaders who become part of the organization, "recruiters are, by definition, outsiders who come onto campus for the limited purpose of trying to hire students — not to become members of the school's expressive association," he said, adding, "This distinction is critical."

The court also rejected an alternative theory of the case put forward by groups of professors from Harvard and Columbia Law Schools. Under their theory, the Solomon Amendment's mandate for equal access could be met by a school that simply excluded all employers who did not attest to a nondiscrimination policy. "That is rather clearly not what Congress had in mind," Chief Justice Roberts said, adding that this interpretation of the Solomon Amendment "would render it a largely meaningless exercise."

The constitutional power of Congress to "raise and support armies" was another significant thread in the opinion. Chief Justice Roberts said that in exercising that power, Congress could have directly required universities to admit military recruiters, instead of taking the more indirect approach of making access a condition of federal financing. "It is clear that a funding condition cannot be unconstitutional if it could be constitutionally imposed directly," he said.

The military interviews about 2,500 law students each year and hires about 400 for its Judge Advocate General's Corps, said Ellen Krenke, a spokeswoman for the Defense Department. The court's decision will not change the actual practice on most campuses because all but a few are in compliance with the amendment, she said.

The decision, Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, No. 04-1152, was announced on a day when, coincidentally, some four dozen uniformed Army lawyers were in the courtroom to be sworn in as members of the Supreme Court bar.

Paula C. Johnson, a named plaintiff in the lawsuit who is a law professor at Syracuse University and a visiting professor this semester at the City University of New York's law school, said that it was too early to talk about what campuses might do, but that she expected "things will begin to happen" as opponents of the military's policy had time to better organize.

"This could be a very important galvanizing measure," she said.

Mr. Monk, of the law school association, said in the interview that law schools retained the obligation to "create a welcoming environment for all their students." He added, "Ultimately, our hope is that gay and lesbian students who want to serve their country by becoming military attorneys will be able to do so."

Justices Back Military Recruiting At Colleges Taking Federal Aid (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And John Hechinger

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Universities must give the military equal standing with other employers in on-campus recruiting or lose federal funding, the Supreme Court ruled.

The unanimous decision, written by Chief Justice John Roberts, addresses a protest waged by many law schools against the military's policy of excluding homosexuals, but is unlikely to end it.

Chai R. Feldblum, a professor at Georgetown University Law Center, said the decision would mean that law professors and students would now rechannel their efforts. The Supreme Court decision said schools were free to protest military recruiters, and Prof. Feldblum said she expected those protests to intensify and proliferate.

"I see that as a gauntlet thrown down by the Supreme Court, and I hope and expect that the law schools will pick it up," said Prof. Feldblum, a founding member of the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, or FAIR, the group of 36 law schools and faculties mounting the challenge. Prof. Feldblum said she also believed law schools would support legal challenges to the constitutionality of the military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy, as well as efforts in Congress to change the law.

The schools had sought to deny military recruiters access to job fairs and other placement activities, citing the policy of the institutions' governing body, the American Association of Law Schools. Since 1990, the group has included sexual orientation along with race, religion, sex and other characteristics for which discrimination is forbidden. The schools required employers participating in placement activities to pledge that they didn't discriminate on such grounds.

Although the schools said they were holding the military to the same standard as other employers, the practice outraged many in Congress, which voted to require the schools to admit recruiters or lose federal funding. The Solomon Amendment, named for its sponsor, the late Rep. Gerald Solomon (R., N.Y.), imposed the following penalty: a cutoff in funding for the entire university, not just its law school, from all federal agencies. Individual students, however, wouldn't lose financial aid, and schools with "a longstanding policy of pacifism based on historical religious affiliation" were exempt.

DOJ_NMG_0016582

FAIR sued to block the Solomon Amendment, claiming it violated First Amendment freedoms of speech and association. A federal appeals court in Philadelphia agreed, pointedly citing Supreme Court freedom-of-association precedents that allowed the Boy Scouts to bar gay scoutmasters and the Boston St. Patrick's Day parade to keep a gay group from marching.

But at oral arguments in December, the justices sounded skeptical of the argument that schools were being forced to endorse a message of antipathy to homosexuals. The government's lawyer, Solicitor General Paul Clement, said schools remain free to express their views of military policy in other ways. "They could put signs on the bulletin board next to the door, they could engage in speech, they could help organize student protests," he said.

Not all law students and professors oppose the Solomon Amendment, however. At various points in the litigation, a group of law students and professors, including several well-known conservative academics, filed a brief supporting the government's position, as did a group of law students who are veterans or currently serve in the military reserves.

In yesterday's opinion, the chief justice wrote that the military stands apart from other institutions, as the Constitution grants Congress power to "provide for the common defense" and to "raise and support armies."

The military's legal branch, the Judge Advocate General's Corps, annually visits about 200 law schools, at which recruiters interview approximately 2,500 students. Ultimately, about 1,000 of that number seek to join and 400 are accepted, said Pentagon spokeswoman, Lt. Col. Ellen Krenke.

Yale Law School's dean, Harold Hongju Koh, said a separate challenge to the Solomon Amendment he and several faculty members filed remains before a lower court. He said that the Supreme Court's "decision is clearly an invitation for law schools to engage in more speech, not less, in the months ahead. Many of us here at Yale Law School plan to accept that invitation."

Billions of dollars were at stake in the dispute. At Yale alone, $300 million in annual federal funding was in jeopardy because of the university's stance, according to the Yale faculty's lawsuit.

Dean Larry Kramer of Stanford Law School said that his administration would continue to endorse student demonstrations against military recruiters. But he said that the issue largely was symbolic. "For what it's worth, there's very little interest among our students in going into the JAG Corps, quite apart" from the military's antigay policies, Mr. Kramer said.

Michael Armini, a spokesman for Harvard Law School, said the decision wouldn't affect military recruiting on campus because the school already was in compliance with the Solomon Amendment.

Military Ban On Campus Rejected (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday ruled against universities that had prohibited military recruiters on campus.

The justices unanimously upheld a 1996 federal law that permits the government to withhold funds from universities that deny military recruiters the same access to students that is allowed other potential employers.

"Recruiters are, by definition, outsiders who come onto campus for the limited purpose of trying to hire students," Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. wrote for the court in his third opinion since being confirmed six months ago.

Several universities had banned military recruiters to protest the Pentagon's policy against open homosexuality in the armed forces.

The ruling arrives as the Pentagon struggles to achieve recruiting goals for an all-volunteer military force facing the strain of prolonged deployments required by the ongoing war on terrorism.

The case grew from a suit brought by a coalition of law schools and professors, who argued that their First Amendment right of free expression was violated by the 1996 law on grounds that it forced them to associate with and promote the activities of military recruiters.

Chief Justice Roberts rejected that argument, saying, "A military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message."

The chief justice said that the legal core of the case had nothing to do with the "don't ask, don't tell" policy and that allowing military recruiters at universities is paramount to attracting talent to the armed forces -- particularly to the ranks of military lawyers.

Because he was not on the court in December when the case was argued, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. abstained from the ruling, which drew mixed reactions from court observers yesterday.

"This decision is particularly important given that our nation is at war," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, who added the ruling "leaves no doubt that the United States military will continue to have equal access to all segments of our population ... and will be able to recruit the best and brightest that America has to offer."

DOJ_NMG_0016583

The American Civil Liberties Union had filed a brief supporting the law schools, and ACLU legal director Steven R. Shapiro said universities "should not be punished by the loss of their federal funding merely because they apply the same nondiscrimination policies to the military that they apply to every other employer that seeks to recruit on campus."

Nationwide, universities and colleges receive about $35 billion in federal funding annually.

Various universities have moved to bar military recruiters in the past, most notably during widespread demonstrations against the Vietnam War in the late 1960s and early 1970s. But campus outcry took a new turn in 1993, when President Clinton signed the "don't ask, don't tell" policy into law.

The policy allows homosexuals to serve in the military, but warrants their dismissal if they announce their orientation to others.

By the mid-1990s, several university law schools began barring military recruiters, along with those of any employer who could not promise that it would not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation, from operating on campus.

Congress responded with a law to block Defense Department funding to universities that refused to allow military recruiters. The law was later amended to block all federal funding, with the exception of student loan money, to any university that took such action

It was not clear yesterday what the Supreme Court's ruling may mean for the future of the "don't ask, don't tell policy."

Mr. Shapiro asserted that nothing in the ruling "endorses the military's 'don't ask, don't tell' policy or any other form of discrimination against gay people."

Joseph Zengerle of George Mason University School of Law -- the only law school to publicly side with the government in the case -- said the ruling fits within a high court pattern of giving "great deference to the military and how it organizes itself and handles its policies."

Citing the ongoing war on terror, Mr. Zengerle, a Vietnam veteran who heads a clinic giving free legal assistance to military personnel and their families, added, "The closer you are to a hot war, the more deference the court is going to give the executive branch and Congress in handling national security matters."

In other action yesterday, the Supreme Court:

c Agreed to clarify when inmates can file civil rights lawsuits contesting prison conditions.

c Refused to consider whether a top judge in Illinois improperly voted to throw out a $1 billion judgment against State Farm after accepting campaign donations from company lawyers and executives.

·Declined to consider making it harder for grandparents to win visitation rights.

·Refused to hear a challenge to a statue at a Kansas college depicting a clergyman with a bishop's headdress that angered some Roman Catholics because of its phallic appearance.

Supreme Court Sides With Military Recruiters (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 7, 2006

Rejecting the views of some of the nation's top law schools and professors, the Supreme Court on Monday upheld the so-called Solomon Amendment, which requires universities receiving federal funds to give equal access to military recruiters on campus.

The unanimous decision was a sharp rebuke of the legal academe, many of whose members objected on First Amendment grounds to hosting military recruiters, because of the armed forces' policies against allowing open homosexuals in their ranks.

Writing for the 8-0 Court, Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. said the academics' arguments "trivialize" some of the Court's First Amendment precedents while "exaggerating" others. Justice Samuel Alito Jr. did not participate in the ruling.

"This decision will force our schools to carve out an exception to our nondiscrimination policies for the military, and that is unfortunate," said Carl Monk, executive director of the Association of American Law Schools, which has opposed discrimination in legal education on the basis of sex since 1970. But he said law schools will obey what is now "the law of the land." Monk expressed the hope that "the day is not far off when gays and lesbians will be able to serve as military lawyers."

The challenge to the Solomon Amendment was brought by the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, which includes the law school faculties of Stanford, Georgetown, George Washington, New York and other universities. The AALS also joined the challenge, but not as a lead plaintiff.

Georgetown law professor Mark Tushnet, a former president of the AALS, predicted that the ruling would lead to an increase in "the number and intensity of protests against military recruiting in the fall."

DOJ_NMG_0016584

Roberts wrote that the law, first passed by Congress in 1994, bears no resemblance to the compelled speech the Court has struck down in other cases, such as West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette and Wooley v. Maynard, which said states could not require students to recite the Pledge of Allegiance or force drivers to display a state motto on their license plates.

"There is nothing in this case approaching a Government-mandated pledge or motto that the school must endorse," wrote Roberts. Law schools argued that to give military recruiters equal access, they would be forced to distribute fliers or send e-mails to students that would convey an unwanted government message, but Roberts said those actions are "plainly incidental."

The ruling came as little surprise after oral arguments last December when justices showed little sympathy for the law schools' argument, especially after Solicitor General Paul Clement said law schools were free to show their disapproval of military recruiters in a variety of ways, including organizing student protests against them.

Referring to Clement's statement at oral arguments, Roberts wrote, "The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything." Roberts added, "As a general matter, the Solomon Amendment regulates conduct, not speech. It affects what law schools must do -- afford equal access to military recruiters -- not what they may or may not say."

Roberts also rejected an argument made by former acting Solicitor General Walter Dellinger III on behalf of a group of Harvard Law School professors that includes Dean Elena Kagan (in her capacity as a professor), Laurence Tribe, Lani Guinier, Randall Kennedy, and Robert Clark (a former dean).

They argued that by giving military recruiters disfavored treatment, Harvard and other law schools were, in fact, abiding by the Solomon Amendment because they would treat any other employer who violated their nondiscrimination policies in the same disfavored way.

But Roberts, a Harvard Law School alumnus, rejected the argument, asserting that the federal law looks to the actual access military recruiters are given, not to the policy that leads to that access. "It is insufficient for a law school to treat the military as it treats all other employers who violate its nondiscrimination policy," Roberts wrote. "Under the statute, military recruiters must be given the same access as recruiters who comply with the policy."

The law was also attacked as an unconstitutional condition on federal funding, but the Court rejected that argument, too. Roberts said that because Congress has "broad authority" in the area of military recruiting, it could have imposed the access requirement on universities directly, rather than making it a condition of federal funding. "Because the First Amendment would not prevent Congress from directly imposing the Solomon Amendment's access requirement, the statute does not place an unconstitutional condition on the receipt of federal funds," Roberts wrote.

The ruling was Roberts' third majority opinion, and all have been without dissents or separate concurrences. Some critics of the military-recruiting decision took solace in that fact Monday, suggesting it means that the Court was not announcing a sweeping new doctrine.

"The unanimity of today's decision strongly suggests that the Court did not think it was changing any existing constitutional rules," said Steve Shapiro, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Certainly, nothing in today's decision endorses the military's 'Don't ask, don't tell' policy or any other form of discrimination against gay people."

Supreme Court Upholds Campus Military Recruiting (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The military has a right to recruit on college campuses and at law schools nationwide, the Supreme Court ruled Monday, despite the Pentagon's policy of excluding openly gay men and women from its ranks.

The justices unanimously rejected a free speech claim brought by some law schools and professors who said they should not be forced to aid an employer who discriminates against job applicants because of their sexual orientation.

In his first major opinion for the court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. called this legal claim a stretch. The decision upheld the Solomon Amendment, in which Congress said that colleges and universities that take federal money must give the Pentagon the same right to recruit on campus as other employers.

"The Solomon Amendment regulates conduct, not speech," Roberts said. "It affects what law schools must do — afford equal access to military recruiters — not what they may or may not say. ..(It) neither limits what the law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

Monday's case did not arise from campus opposition to the Iraq war, nor have there been major protests over military recruiting. Unlike the Vietnam era, campuses are not centers of widespread protests these days, nor have military recruiters been barred from entering campus grounds.

DOJ_NMG_0016585

Nonetheless, several law schools have carried on a mostly symbolic protest against the Pentagon's refusal to change its policy against gays. Since the 1960s, the Association of American Law Schools had a policy of refusing to aid recruiting by employers who had discriminatory hiring practices. In 1990, this policy was amended to include sexual orientation.

To enforce this policy, some law schools refused to post information on recruiters for the armed forces who planned to visit, nor would they make rooms available where they could meet with students who were interested in becoming military lawyers.

"No one was denying them access. We just withheld affirmative support," said Stanford Law School dean Larry Kramer, who was a New York University law professor when the case began.

Lawmakers in Congress objected to what they saw as second-class treatment for military recruiters. In 1995, they adopted an amendment sponsored by the late Rep. Gerald Solomon (R-N.Y.) that threatened a cutoff of federal funds to a college or university that prevents the armed forces from recruiting on campus. In recent years, Congress has strengthened this amendment to say the military must be given full equal treatment when its recruiters visit a campus.

Colleges and universities did not challenge the law. They had $35 billion a year in federal aid at stake.

"We are in a war, whether properly declared or not, and during a war, 1st Amendment rights nearly always retract," said Matthew Spitzer, dean at the USC law school. "The idea the Supreme Court would tell the federal government it could not attach a condition to the receipt of federal funds is unthinkable."

However, the law faculty at several dozen schools, including Stanford, NYU, Georgetown and the University of San Francisco, joined a lawsuit to challenge the measure as unconstitutional.

They relied in part on a Supreme Court ruling that was seen as a major setback for gays six years ago. The court in a 5-4 decision said the Boy Scouts of America had a free speech right to expel an openly gay Scout master because his presence conflicted with their message of "morally straight" behavior.

The challengers to the Solomon Amendment said the same logic should work in reverse. They said they had a free speech right to exclude anti-gay employers — including the Pentagon — because their presence would conflict with their message of tolerance and nondiscrimination.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in Philadelphia agreed and said the Solomon Amendment was unconstitutional because it "compels law schools to propagate the military's message," including its bias against gays.

The Bush administration appealed that ruling on behalf of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, and the Supreme Court had no troubling in reversing it Monday in Rumsfeld vs. FAIR.

The chief justice said the law posed no free speech problems. First, the law schools and the faculty are not required to speak in favor of the military. Second, they may speak openly against the military without losing federal money. And third, he said, students will not be fooled into thinking the law school agrees with the Pentagon because it has permitted the Pentagon to recruit on campus.

"We have held that high school students can appreciate the difference between speech a school sponsors and speech the school permits," he wrote, referring to a decision that allowed a Bible study group to meet on campus at a high school. "Surely students have not lost that ability by the time they get to law school," Roberts said.

All the justices signed his opinion except for new Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who did not participate.

"I am obviously disappointed. There is no sensitivity in this opinion to the important concern the law schools have," said Duke Law professor Erwin Chemerinsky, who joined the lawsuit.

At USC, the protests over the Solomon Amendment have been low-key. "We have had students sign up for an interview with a military recruiter, and they demand to know why the 'don't ask, don't tell' policy hasn't been changed," Spitzer said.

UCLA Law School dean Michael Schill said the University of California system has a policy that required giving military recruiters access to the campus. "Even if the Solomon Amendment had been struck down, we would have had our own policy that allowed them to be here," he said.

While some faculty members and students oppose the Pentagon's policy, "it has not generated a large amount of controversy in the 18 months that I've been here," he said.

Gay rights advocates said they hoped school officials would make use of their free speech rights. The court's opinion "leaves room for students and universities themselves to speak out ... and show their abhorrence of the military's policy that discriminates against gay and lesbian people," said Jon Davidson, legal director of Lambda Legal.

Court Upholds Military Recruiting Law (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. government can withhold funds from universities that protest the Pentagon's ban on gay men and lesbians by denying military recruiters access to campuses and students, the Supreme Court ruled Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0016586

In a unanimous opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts, the court rejected arguments from a group of law schools that claimed a federal law that allows the government to withhold funding in such situations violates colleges' First Amendment rights of free speech and free association.

The law, known as the Solomon Amendment for its original sponsor in 1994, U.S. Rep. Gerald Solomon, R-N.Y., allows the U.S. government to deny funding to colleges that do not give military recruiters the same access and campus privileges that are given to other recruiters.

Most law schools that host recruiters insist that they sign a statement saying they do not discriminate based on sexual orientation. The law school consortium that brought the case, the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights, said requiring schools to accept military recruiters undermined their opposition to bias and forced them to adopt a message they oppose. The military's "don't ask, don't tell" policy bars anyone who reveals his or her homosexuality from serving in the armed forces.

The case was not a test of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy. It drew attention in part because it became part of the national debate over gay civil rights and arrived at the court as the Pentagon was becoming increasingly aggressive in its wartime recruiting.

The American Association of University Professors, the American Civil Liberties Union and several universities filed briefs urging the justices to uphold a lower-court ruling that said the Solomon Amendment wrongly compelled schools to send, and subsidize, a message of discrimination.

In his first major opinion since becoming chief justice last fall, Roberts wrote, "Accommodating the military's message does not affect the law schools' speech, because the schools are not speaking when they host interviews and recruiting receptions."

Roberts said the basic communications required of colleges were bulletin board notices and e-mails. The chief justice said they hardly could be compared to the kind of "compelled" government speech that has been invalidated through the years, such as a West Virginia law that required schoolchildren to recite the Pledge of Allegiance and to salute the American flag, or a New Hampshire law that ordered the state motto — "Live Free or Die" — to be on license plates.

Joshua Rosenkranz, who represented the law schools challenging the law, said he did not expect universities to decline federal funds so they could block military recruiters. However, he said he expects faculty members and students will accelerate their public opposition to "don't ask, don't tell."

"Schools are not going to give up the money," Rosenkranz said, noting that billions in college funding are at stake. "But there are other ways to get the message across. You are going to see banners over military interview rooms and signs that say, 'Danger: Discriminating recruiters inside.' "

New Justice Samuel Alito did not participate in the case; he had not yet joined the court when the case was heard in December.

Justices Side With Military Recruiters (CSM)

By Stacy A. Teicher

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

Military officials might have to run a bigger gantlet of protesters as they search for recruits on America's university campuses. But they no longer have to worry that they'll be shut out altogether because of the "don't ask, don't tell" policy related to gay members of the armed forces.

The Supreme Court ruled unanimously Monday that military recruiters must have the same kind of access as other employers coming onto campus to give out information and conduct job interviews, if the campus receives federal money. Most campuses rely on some share of the $35 billion the government channels each year to higher education.

An association of law schools and professors, the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights (FAIR), filed suit against Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to challenge the law that ties recruiters' access to federal funding - known as the Solomon Amendment. FAIR argued that campuses should be free to extend their own philosophy of nondiscrimination by requiring recruiters to sign pledges that they would not discriminate before being allowed the use of campus facilities. Under the Pentagon's policy, gay men and women can serve in the military only if they keep their sexual orientation to themselves.

"A military recruiter's mere presence on campus does not violate a law school's right to associate, regardless of how repugnant the law school considers the recruiter's message," wrote Chief Justice John Roberts. "The Solomon Amendment neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

Supporters of the law schools' position were undeterred. "We're disappointed with the legal outcome of the case ... but this unanimous opinion is a call to arms to the law school administrations across the country," says Chai Feldblum, a law professor at Georgetown University and a board member of FAIR. The organization hopes "to see every single law school helping students to organize protests" against military recruiters on campus, "because the Supreme Court has told us that the way to exercise our First Amendment beliefs is by speaking out more."

DOJ_NMG_0016587

The decision will come as welcome news for the armed services, which have worked diligently to overcome shortfalls in recruiting nationwide. In the last recruiting year, which ended in September, the Army missed its year-long goal for the first time since 1999, falling short of its target by 6,627 recruits. It represented the largest deficit since 1979.

At a time when the Pentagon is relying heavily on the Army in Iraq, recruiting is a matter of crucial importance to the military. Though higher-than-expected reenlistment rates have forestalled fears of a "broken Army," the Pentagon has made recruiting a top priority in recent months, approving enlistment bonuses of up to $40,000 and additional bonuses of $1,000 for soldiers who refer new recruits. It has also added more recruiters to the beat.

But with only a tiny fraction of recruits coming from law schools, some see the case as having a more symbolic significance.

"This was a very challenging case in some ways because, as the opinion makes clear, if you go too far in saying that allowing recruitment efforts you don't like violates your First Amendment rights, that might allow employment agencies to refuse to provide services on the basis of race, or religion, or national origin. There has to be some limit there," says Jon Davidson, legal director at Lambda Legal, a gay-rights advocacy group. Despite those intricate issues, the organization joined an amicus brief with the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of FAIR.

Now that the campus-recruitment issue has been resolved, "the next real piece of the fight will go directly to 'don't ask, don't tell' itself," Ms. Feldblum says. She adds that cases challenging the military policy are already under way in Massachusetts and California, and a bill has been proposed in the US Congress to replace the policy with a nondiscrimination clause that includes sexual orientation.

A Victory For Military Recruiters (WP)

By Fred Barbash And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The Supreme Court yesterday unanimously upheld a federal law that forces colleges and universities to permit military recruiting on campus, despite the schools' objections to the Pentagon ban on openly gay people serving in the armed forces.

By a vote of 8 to 0, the court upheld the Solomon Amendment, which permits the denial of federal funding to schools that do not allow military recruiters the same access given to all other job recruiters. But in ruling that schools must provide the military the same access to students as they would for any other recruiters, the justices noted that schools are still free to protest their presence on campus.

The Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights (FAIR) -- a coalition of law schools and professors that formed to sue the government -- had said the law "compelled speech" that made it appear schools were endorsing the government's exclusion of acknowledged gays in the military, thus violating the schools' right to free speech under the First Amendment.

But in writing for the court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said that Solomon "neither limits what law schools may say nor requires them to say anything."

"Law schools remain free under the statute to express whatever views they may have on the military's congressionally mandated employment policy. . . . Nothing about recruiting suggests that law schools agree with any speech by recruiters and nothing in the Solomon Amendment restricts what the law schools may say about the military's policies," Roberts wrote.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., the newest member of the court, did not take part in the case.

Though a federal district court had sided with the government, an appeals court in Philadelphia reversed that decision, ruling in favor of FAIR last year and blocking enforcement of Solomon. But yesterday's Supreme Court opinion rejected each argument that had been advanced on FAIR's behalf.

"In this case, FAIR has attempted to stretch a number of First Amendment doctrines well beyond the sort of activities these doctrines protect," Roberts wrote.

So thorough was the court's rejection of FAIR's arguments that it ruled Congress could have achieved equal access not only indirectly, by threatening a funding cutoff, but also directly, through legislation based on its constitutional power to raise military forces. In fact, the court suggested in passing, even colleges and universities that do not receive any federal funding could be compelled by Congress to allow military recruiters.

"Congress's power in this area is broad and sweeping," Roberts wrote, "and there is no dispute in this cases that it includes the authority to require campus access to military recruiters."

So far, however, the government has chosen the more indirect approach of the Solomon Amendment. With yesterday's decision, many universities will now have to choose between their law schools' anti-discrimination principles and their dependence on federal money.

DOJ_NMG_0016588

Most schools have made it clear that they could not afford to lose federal aid, which totals about $35 billion a year. Only a few schools -- including the law schools of New York University and George Washington University -- allowed their names to be publicly attached to the lawsuit.

Geoffrey Shields, dean of Vermont Law School, told the Associated Press yesterday that since 1999 his school has given up some federal money and will continue to bar recruiters "as a symbol of the importance of fair treatment of all people."

"We've stuck to our guns, and I anticipate we'll continue to stick to our guns," he said.

Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.), who had called the appellate court's decision in favor of FAIR an "insult" to the military, said in a statement yesterday that "this decision will ensure that the military will continue to be comprised of our nation's finest -- men and women who know how to defend our country in a manner consistent with our values and principles."

Supporters of FAIR took solace in passages of the opinion that noted students and others would still be free to protest military recruiters. Tensions between Congress and academia over university efforts to restrict military recruitment date to the Vietnam War and campus protests against it.

"The court affirmed the idea of a vigorous public forum and that's what's refreshing," said Michael Tigar, a law professor at American University and an opponent of Solomon. "The opinion sounds these First Amendment themes. The message is: If you don't like something, there is always more speech."

Joshua Rosencranz, a New York lawyer who represented FAIR in the case, said the schools always saw the suit as a "scrimmage in a broader war" about equality.

"We brought the suit in part because there are those saying 'How dare you let protesters on campus when the recruiters were there?' " he said. "Well, this opinion makes clear that those rights are still in tact. It forced the government to state what the line was."

Attaching various strings to federal funding is itself standard practice, used most famously to secure equal treatment for women in athletic programs. It's been upheld by the courts in part because the educational institutions are free to reject the money if they object to the strings.

The decision, while closely watched, was unsurprising after the oral arguments in the case, during which the justices expressed great skepticism about equating the recruiting with protected expression. Roberts wrote that although the court held in 1977 that New Hampshire motorists cannot be compelled to display the state motto -- "Live Free or Die" -- on license plates, in this case the government "does not require any similar expression by law schools" and "does not dictate the content of speech at all."

"Compelling a law school that sends scheduling e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance, or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display the motto 'Live Free or Die,' " Roberts wrote.

Army 8, Yale 0 (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Yesterday the Supreme Court upheld a provision of a law called the Solomon Amendment, which conditions federal funding for colleges and universities on their providing military recruiters the same access they grant to other employers. The decision was no Solomonic compromise but a complete rout of the other-worldly professors who had challenged the law.

Those professors, opponents of the Clinton-era law barring open homosexuals from military service, had claimed the Solomon Amendment violated their First Amendment rights by forcing them, as the Yale faculty put it in a friend-of-the-court brief, "to assist the military in telling some Yale Law students that they are not fit to serve in our country's armed forces because of their sexual orientation."

Chief Justice John Roberts, in an 8-0 decision (Justice Samuel Alito joined too late to participate), laughed the free-speech claim out of court: "Congress, for example, can prohibit employers from discriminating in hiring on the basis of race. The fact that this will require an employer to take down a sign reading 'White Applicants Only' hardly means that the law should be analyzed as one regulating the employer's speech rather than conduct."

And of course anti-military professors, unlike racist employers, are completely free to speak their minds on the subject. Yale can even show its disagreement with mainstream America, as it recently did, by admitting as a student a former senior official of Afghanistan's Taliban, a regime that treated homosexuals far more harshly than the U.S. military ever has.

The Solomon Amendment only denies federal funding to schools that discriminate against the military, but the High Court went one step further: It held that Congress, under its Constitutional authority to "provide for the common Defence," "to raise and support Armies" and "to provide and maintain a Navy," could mandate that colleges and universities permit military recruiters on campus, whether they accept federal money or not.

DOJ_NMG_0016589

We hope Congress does not do so. If those who run America's institutions of higher education really have principled objections to the military's presence, let them take a stand by declining taxpayer money. Then the rest of us can find out how much their principles are worth.

Now Repeal The Ban (WP)

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

THE SUPREME Court's unanimous decision yesterday upholding the Solomon Amendment is no surprise. It offers the correct answer to the legal question the case posed: Can the government deny federal money to universities that, in protest of the military's discrimination against homosexual service members, bar military recruiters from campus or grant them access on terms less welcoming than those given to other employers? As the court ruled, the universities don't have a right to that money. But the Pentagon's legal win should not obscure the indefensible nature of the policy that underlies the dispute. The gay ban still needs to be repealed.

The Solomon Amendment, named for the late representative Gerald B.H. Solomon (R-N.Y.), is bad policy, but it's not unconstitutional. The threat to withhold federal money leaves law schools with an uncomfortable choice between forsaking federal support and violating their own anti-discrimination policies. But the First Amendment does not prohibit the government from attaching conditions to its largess. Universities remain free to oppose U.S. policy as vocally as they like. They just can't frustrate military recruiting efforts while accepting federal dollars. As Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. put it for the court, "Compelling a law school that sends e-mails for other recruiters to send one for a military recruiter is simply not the same as forcing a student to pledge allegiance to the flag . . . or forcing a Jehovah's Witness to display a particular motto on his license plate" -- forms of compelled speech the court has struck down. It "trivializes the freedom protected in [those cases] to suggest that it is."

It also trivializes the plight of gays in the military to focus on the ancillary consequences of the gay ban for American law schools. Universities are not the primary victim here. The real problem, which this litigation has tended to obscure, is that the military, even while fighting two wars, continues to root out Americans who wish to help by maintaining a policy that bars anyone who is openly gay. It robs itself of much-needed talent by way of their humiliation and exposure while forcing those in uniform to hide who they are.

This would be distasteful even if their presence in the military posed some real problem. But there's no evidence of that. A combination of bigotry and inertia keeps the gay ban in place. Now that the military has proved it can constitutionally exempt itself from university nondiscrimination rules, Congress should decide whether it really wants a military that requires such an exemption.

Justice Department V. Google Court Date Postponed Again (CNET)

CNET News, March 7, 2006

Google's courtroom date with the U.S. Justice Department has been delayed a second time.

U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, Calif. on Friday postponed the hearing from March 13 to March 14 at 9:00 a.m PT.

The outcome will determine whether the Bush administration will prevail in its fight to force Google to help it defend an anti-pornography law in a trial in Philadelphia this fall.

Although the Justice Department also demanded that Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online hand over similar records, Google was the only recipient that chose to fight the subpoena in court.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mandalay Bay Undergoes ADA Scrutiny (LVBIZ)

By VALERIE MILLER, BUSINESS PRESS

Las Vegas Business Press, March 7, 2006

Hotel says it is working with DOJ 'to resolve issues in timely manner'

Sixteen years after the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act, the issue of hotel-casinos' compliance with the law's accessibility guidelines is again emerging as a hot-button issue. Numerous private complaints have been lodged against an assortment of casinos, and the Department of Justice told the Business Press that it is in the midst of a probe involving ADA compliance and Mandalay Bay Resort.

DOJ_NMG_0016590

"It's an ongoing, active investigation. It is the resort in general," said DOJ spokesman Eric Holland, who couldn't comment further because of the investigation. He added that policy investigations must go through a preliminary review first, then, if warranted, an active investigation will be launched by the Justice Department.

MGM Mirage, which now owns Mandalay Bay, acknowledged the DOJ was looking into issues at the property prior to its absorption of the Mandalay Resort Group, which owned Mandalay Bay. That merger was completed last April. "The Department of Justice had made that company aware of certain areas of concerns," said MGM Mirage spokesperson Yvette Monet. "We are working with the Department of Justice to resolve the issues in a timely manner." Mandalay Bay's hotel does comply with the ADA's disable accessible room standards, according to information supplied by MGM Mirage.

Department of Justice is investigating whether Mandalay Bay Resort is ADA-compliant.

Two other MGM Mirage-owned properties -- the MGM Grand and New York-New York -- have reached separate settlements with the Justice Department in the past. The agreements, last revised in 2001, called for both resorts to provide more access to disabled people.

While casinos are not specifically mentioned in the Americans with Disabilities Act, it does distinguish between hotels as either "newly constructed" or "existing." Although the act was passed in 1990, the cut-off for "existing facility" status depended on whether all building permit applications and extensions were certified as complete prior to Jan. 26, 1992. Besides offering accessible restaurants, pathways and assembly areas (including convention centers, arenas, movie theaters and showrooms), the newer hotels are required to have a certain number of disabled-accessible parking spaces and rooms for wheelchair users. That room count can go as high as 4 percent of the total room inventory, but the percentage decreases as more rooms are added. A smaller number of rooms must be made available to the hearing impaired.

Existing hotels only have to do what's "readily achievable" to comply with the ADA, unless they are being renovated and are thus considered "new." "They (hotels) only have to do what can be 'easily accomplished and can be carried out without much expense,' " UNLV Boyd Law School Professor and Chair Ann McGinley said, quoting the law. "It's just when it is expensive that they don't have to do it."

She noted that while mom-and-pop shops may find it tough to become accessible for the disabled, Las Vegas resorts might have a hard time making that case. "So much is readily achievable," she said. "When you see casinos ... they make so much money, and they can't move a toilet seat?"

VENETIAN UNDER SCRUTINY

One recently constructed Las Vegas resort isn't passing muster with Nevadans for Equal Access, a disability rights group. The Venetian Resort, according to the group's president, Paul Martin, has failed to comply with the ADA requirements by making its main bridge over its lagoon too steep for wheelchairs.

"The (Rialto) Bridge from the (Venetian's) shopping center to the (Campanile) clock tower is totally inaccessible to anybody using a wheelchair," stated the complaint sent by Nevadans for Equal Access' attorneys at the Clark County Legal Services Program to the Department of Justice in late August 2001. The Venetian was also notified, Martin said, but neither the resort nor the department ever responded. DOJ's Holland said the department never received the complaint, and surmised it was lost as a part of the mail disruption after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. The Venetian did not respond to the Business Press inquiries at press time.

While Nevadans for Equal Access had sued Binion's Horseshoe, the Plaza and the then-Showboat hotels and casinos in the mid-1990s, forcing the properties to make the needed upgrades, Martin said his group doesn't have the wherewithal to take on the behemoth Venetian without the help of the DOJ. "It would use up all the resources of Clark County Legal."

Despite the complaints, Las Vegas hotels received high marks from one disability travel resource, Emerging Horizons. The California newspaper's editor, Candy Harrington, ranked Las Vegas above cities like Orlando when it came to meeting the needs of the disabled. Most of the complaints Harrington receives about Las Vegas concerns disabled-access rooms not being available because of previous reservations.

By the Business Press' count, most hotels have either met or exceeded ADA standards. However, a source familiar with the MGM Mirage-owned Luxor, which was built on the bubble in 1993, said the property was in the midst of trying to reach an ADA-required 51 wheelchair-accessible rooms and had 38 as of a month ago. MGM Mirage's Monet maintained all of its properties are compliant with the disability act, including the Luxor, which she said had 91 accessible rooms. "I cannot comment on information from an unofficial source," she said.

The properties of the MGM Mirage go the extra mile in trying to accommodate guests with disabilities, Monet added. That includes putting in necessities such as ceiling track bars (to hoist them out of bed) in some rooms at the Mirage Resort. "If they are going to that level, they are going way beyond what the government requires," ADA consultant Thomas Schmokel, who is wheelchair-bound, said. "I never see that in hotels. Tell me who they are and I'll put them in for an award."

WYNN RESORT EARNS KUDOS

Wynn Las Vegas has installed ceiling lifts with slings in some rooms, according to Richard Cotter, Wynn's executive vice president for hotel and food and beverage. He added that all table games are accessible for wheelchair customers and that the resort in the short time it has been open received an award from a group of disabled veterans.

"I'm sure you can find non-compliance, but most of the large properties are in compliance," said Tom Jones, a UNLV professor of hotel administration, who teaches accessibility requirements.

If a lawsuit is filed against a Nevada hotel or casino because of non-ADA compliance, monetary compensation is not awarded. Salt Lake City attorney Richard Armknecht, however, believes the Nevada law can be interpreted in a way to award damages. He successfully sued the Coast Resorts' Orleans Hotel and Casino in 2001, forcing it to renovate more than 800 rooms. The attorney currently represents a woman who said she was denied public accommodations at the Tropicana's Tiffany Theater. The casino denied the charge, saying an employee gave incorrect information.

"The whole enforcement of the ADA is through the courts," added UNLV professor Jones. "Somebody might not be in compliance for years, but if nobody brings a suit, then it may never come to light."

Judicial Bias Claims Reach Calif. High Court (LAW)

By Mike Mckee, The Recorder

California Recorder, March 7, 2006

Attorneys arguing that Alameda County, Calif., prosecutors routinely excluded Jews from death penalty juries have been asked a tricky question: Does it matter if the court record doesn't establish that any of the excused jurors were actually Jewish?

The justices of the California Supreme Court posed that question in a death row inmate's habeas case last month, and they're going to want answers during oral arguments Wednesday in San Francisco.

They also want to know whether there was actual wrongdoing if a prosecutor had a separate, valid reason for removing a juror.

The last-minute queries throw a new wrinkle into a case that has fascinated the Bay Area legal community since July 2004. That's when the high court in the habeas corpus case of death row inmate Fred Freeman ordered an investigation into whether the Alameda County district attorney's office -- in collusion with now-deceased Superior Court Judge Stanley Golde -- intentionally purged Jews from capital juries because of a perception that they wouldn't sentence someone to death.

Former Alameda County prosecutor John "Jack" Quatman, who prosecuted Freeman, raised the allegations, but wound up being branded a "dishonest and unethical" man by a Santa Clara County Superior Court judge who presided over a weeklong evidentiary hearing 11 months ago.

Judge Kevin Murphy ruled that Freeman got a fair trial and that there was ample evidence Quatman fabricated his claims to embarrass Alameda County DA Tom Orloff, who took Quatman off capital cases in 1993.

The latest questions by the Supreme Court seem to indicate that the justices could be leaning toward deciding the case on a narrow issue, possibly whether jurors were let go simply because they appeared Jewish or that their surnames -- Mishell, Peisker and Laput -- sounded Jewish.

"The whole point here is that the court is not going to be focusing on the law," said Dennis Maio, a former Supreme Court research attorney who's now of counsel in Reed Smith's San Francisco office. "The question is, was this person a member of a cognizable group and if so, did the prosecutor strike this person for that reason?"

The court's questions also seem to put a heavier burden on Freeman's attorneys at San Francisco's Habeas Corpus Resource Center -- namely, to show that prosecutors discriminated during jury selection in violation of the standards set out in People v. Wheeler, 22 Cal.3d 258, and Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, even though the record apparently doesn't establish who, if anyone, was Jewish.

Wheeler, issued by the state Supreme Court in 1978, and Batson, handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1986, are the guidepost decisions on jury selection bias.

Neither Gary Sowards, Freeman's HCRC lawyer, nor Morris Lenk, the San Francisco deputy attorney general handling the state's case, returned calls seeking comment.

But both laid out their positions in papers filed exactly two weeks after the Supreme Court's Feb. 14 order for supplemental briefing. Predictably, they offered diametrically opposite views.

Sowards argued that the high court's own case law in 1985's People v. Motton, 39 Cal.3d 596, holds that litigants need not know the "self-reported race or ethnicity" of a juror to violate anti-discrimination standards.

"Whether or not the prospective jurors excused by the prosecutor in this case actually were Jewish," he wrote, "is irrelevant to the question of whether the prosecutor exercised his peremptory challenges with the intent to systematically exclude a cognizable class from [Freeman's] jury.

DOJ_NMG_0016592

"The prosecutor," he continued, "exercised his peremptory challenges against jurors who were Jewish or that he believed were Jewish."

Sowards noted that such exclusions result in an "error of constitutional magnitude requiring reversal."

In response, Lenk pointed to the high court's own 2002 decision in People v. Gutierrez, 28 Cal.4th 1083, which involved a prospective juror who acquired her Hispanic surname through marriage.

"Absent proof that any prospective jurors excluded by a prosecutor's peremptory challenges were, in fact, members of a cognizable group, no Wheeler violation has been stated," he wrote. "In other words, the right to trial by a representative jury is not violated unless it is established that the prosecutor has excluded a person who actually is a member of a constitutionally protected group."

Lenk and Sowards also butted heads on the court's second question, which asked whether prosecutors violate Wheeler or Batson if they not only excuse a juror for the improper reason of religious faith, but at the same time for a valid reason, such as a juror being unwilling to impose the death penalty.

Sowards argued that other reasons would be irrelevant and that "discrimination based on race or religion cannot have a place in a prosecutor's decision to strike jurors from a criminal case."

But Lenk contended that the court itself has "repeatedly declared" that prospective jurors cannot be excluded solely on the presumption they are biased because of race, religion and ethnicity. He also pointed out that the evidentiary hearing judge concluded that Quatman had lied when he claimed he had excluded jurors based on religion.

Although it's not clear what prompted the high court's questions, Stephen Barnett, a professor emeritus at Boalt Hall School of Law, speculated the justices could be reacting to the U.S. Supreme Court's Jan. 18 ruling in Rice v. Collins, 126 S.Ct. 969.

In that decision, the court held that a Los Angeles prosecutor who dismissed a black woman from a jury pool to achieve gender balance in a cocaine possession case had "a number of other permissible and plausible race-neutral reasons." Among them, the woman was young, lacked community ties and had rolled her eyes in apparent disrespect when answering a voir dire question.

"It could be that the California [Supreme] Court just wants to make sure it's up to date," Barnett said in an e-mail response. "Rice doesn't necessarily present the issues raised by the court's questions, but it can be read as doing so."

Justice Carol Corrigan, who was a witness in the underlying evidentiary hearing, will not participate in Wednesday's arguments in In re Freeman, S122590. Justice Ming Chin has also recused himself.

Subbing for them will be Justices Paul Boland, of Los Angeles' 2nd District Court of Appeal, and Judith Haller, of San Diego's 4th District.

Unnatural Selection (NYT)

By Morris B. Hoffman

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Denver

THE side show of jury selection all too often takes over the circus in American trials. And the central culprit in that takeover is the peremptory challenge, a practice by which lawyers may exclude a certain number of prospective jurors without having to prove, or even state, a justification. Since peremptory challenges are not mandated by the federal or any state constitutions, Congress and state legislatures could abolish them tomorrow. They should.

It took Judge Lance Ito more than a month to pick the O. J. Simpson criminal jury. Selection of the Martha Stewart jury took a full week. When Judge Sim Lake of the Federal District Court in Houston spent just one day picking the jury that is hearing the criminal case against two former Enron executives, Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, he drew scorn from some defense lawyers, who seem to presume that fairness and inefficiency are inseparable bedfellows.

His lightning performance also drew praise from some jury reformers, who have been calling for the application of many of the techniques that Judge Lake used to streamline the selection process, including limiting questioning by lawyers and having prospective jurors fill out questionnaires before selection day.

But this debate has overlooked the real problem behind ponderous and insulting jury selection. Peremptory challenges give trial lawyers the power to manipulate jury membership by rejecting perfectly fair prospective jurors for any reason or none, as long as the rejection does not smack of race, sex or ethnic discrimination.

O. J. Simpson's lawyers and their jury consultants spent weeks poring over, and following up on, the prospective jurors' answers to a questionnaire that included such questions as "What is your political affiliation?" and "Do you have a religious affiliation or preference?" The modern raison d'être of these kinds of questions is not to discover disqualifying prejudice, but quite the opposite: to allow lawyers to discover jurors they think are secretly biased in their clients' favor while using peremptory challenges to disqualify those they imagine are not.

DOJ_NMG_0016593

Under current constitutional limitations, lawyers may strike you from a jury pool because you are an Aries, but not because you are a female. But it is impossible to ferret out the striking lawyers' real motives, in a system that allows them to be completely irrational but not discriminatory. The inquiry itself drives biased lawyers to fabricate non-discriminatory pretexts. It is often difficult, even for the challenging lawyers themselves, let alone trial judges, to know whether some deeply lurking impermissible animus might taint gestalt judgments about particular jurors.

In one famous case, a prosecutor excluded two African-American jurors because they had mustaches and beards that looked "suspicious." Is this perfectly permissible stereotypical nonsense, or unconstitutional stereotypical nonsense?

Even when they are not discriminatorily used, peremptory challenges are inconsistent with the fundamental ideal that trials are about truth detection, not about whose lawyer is the cleverest. The whole notion that lawyers may apply their own home-grown stereotypes to excuse perfectly impartial jurors, as long as those stereotypes do not touch on race, gender and ethnicity, infects the jury system with a profoundly trivializing gamesmanship. How can we expect the results of jury trials to be respected as rational applications of the law to facts found by disinterested citizens, when the process by which those citizens are selected devotes more time and energy to discovering their taste in music than their ability to be impartial?

For these and other reasons, some academics and lower court judges, jury foes and friends alike, have long criticized peremptory challenges. But last year, in a criminal case called Miller-El v. Dretke, Justice Stephen Breyer became just the second sitting Supreme Court justice in history to call formally, in a written case opinion, for the elimination of the peremptory challenge (for the record, he cited my 1977 law review article on the subject).

The first justice to do so was Thurgood Marshall, in a concurrence in Batson v. Kentucky, the 1986 case that first outlawed a prosecutor's discriminatory use of peremptory challenges in a single case (as opposed to a pattern of discrimination over many cases, which had been outlawed since 1965). As Justice Marshall presciently put it: "The decision today will not end the racial discrimination that peremptories inject into the jury-selection process. That goal can be accomplished only by eliminating peremptory challenges entirely."

Some critics of the existing system object not to peremptory challenges per se but to the notion that barring their discriminatory use is either meaningful or lawful. Justice Antonin Scalia, in particular, has been consistent and adamant in opposing extensions of the Batson doctrine — first to civil cases, then to criminal defendants (one might ask in both these circumstances what is unconstitutional about a private civil litigant, or a private criminal defendant, exhibiting racial bias in jury selection?), then to gender and ethnicity. Can religion or sexual orientation be far behind? And if it makes no sense to bar the discriminatory use of peremptory challenges on these grounds, how can we make sense of their use to discriminate on other grounds? The only solution is to get rid of them altogether.

Each extension of the Batson doctrine has subtly, and sometimes not so subtly, shifted the constitutional inquiry from the litigant's right to a fair and impartial jury (a right guaranteed, at least in the criminal arena, by the Sixth Amendment) to the prospective juror's right not to suffer race, sex or ethnic discrimination during jury selection (a right nowhere to be found in the Constitution). Today, almost 20 years after Batson, the problem is not just that racial discrimination continues to haunt jury selection, but also that the methods created to prevent it have overcorrected and now seem to value some disembodied notion of juror diversity over the constitutional command for fair trials.

To those of us who believe that jurors take their oaths seriously, that most jurors can put aside their biases, that strong facts rather than tricky lawyers win cases and that the jury system is an incredibly accurate albeit imperfect truth-finding device, the peremptory challenge system has become an embarrassment. After the latest string of California and New York celebrity trials, with 24-hour pundits constantly barraging us with their tactical and strategic views as if trials were procedural wars unrelated to any underlying truth, Justice Breyer's call for the abolition of the peremptory challenge is a welcome one. Congress and state legislatures, take note.

S.D. Enacts Ban On Nearly All Abortions (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

PIERRE, S.D., March 6 -- Gov. Mike Rounds (R) signed legislation Monday banning nearly all abortions in South Dakota, setting up a court fight aimed at challenging the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide.

The bill would make it a crime for doctors to perform an abortion unless the procedure was necessary to save the woman's life. It would make no exception for cases of rape or incest.

Planned Parenthood, which operates the state's only abortion clinic, in Sioux Falls, has pledged to challenge the measure.

Rounds issued a written statement saying he expects the law to be tied up in court for years and not to take effect unless the Supreme Court upholds it.

DOJ_NMG_0016594

"In the history of the world, the true test of a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society. The sponsors and supporters of this bill believe that abortion is wrong because unborn children are the most vulnerable and most helpless persons in our society. I agree with them," Rounds said in the statement.

The legislature passed the bill last month after supporters argued that the recent appointment of conservatives John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. have made the Supreme Court more likely to overturn Roe v. Wade .

Abortion opponents already are offering money to help the state pay legal bills for the anticipated court challenge, Rounds has said. Lawmakers said an anonymous donor has pledged $1 million to defend the ban, and the legislature set up a special account to accept donations for legal fees.

Under the new law, to go into effect July 1, doctors could be sentenced to up to five years in prison for performing an illegal abortion.

Rounds noted that it was written to make sure existing restrictions would still be enforced during the legal battle. Current state law sets increasingly stringent restrictions on abortions as pregnancy progresses; after the 24th week, the procedure is allowed only to protect the woman's health and safety.

South Dakota Bans Abortion, Setting Up A Battle (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

Gov. Michael Rounds of South Dakota signed into law the nation's most sweeping state abortion ban on Monday, an intentional provocation meant to set up a direct legal challenge to Roe v. Wade, the 1973 United States Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal.

The law makes it a felony to perform any abortion except in a case of a pregnant woman's life being in jeopardy. Though the law is not scheduled to go into effect until July, officials working at the state's only abortion clinic, in Sioux Falls, where about 800 abortions take place each year, said they spent much of the day consoling women.

"This is a very real issue for a lot of people," said Kate Looby, state director of Planned Parenthood. "That's the part I think the legislators don't quite understand."

Mr. Rounds, a Republican, said in a statement after signing the legislation in Pierre that it was the right thing to do. The law will force a legal showdown before it ever comes into effect, an outcome its supporters, eager to overturn Roe, intended.

"In the history of the world, the true test of a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society," the governor said. "The sponsors and supporters of this bill believe that abortion is wrong because unborn children are the most vulnerable and most helpless persons in our society. I agree with them."

Around the country, abortion rights advocates responded with fury, calling the new law "blatantly unconstitutional," dangerous and counter to what a majority of Americans would support. Planned Parenthood, which operates the abortion clinic in South Dakota, pledged to use any means necessary — whether a federal lawsuit or a statewide referendum — to sideline the statute.

Under state law, if opponents collect 16,728 signatures of registered voters in the next three months the law will be delayed and a vote held on the issue in November.

"We're trying to evaluate the timing and the options now, but we're committed to making sure this does not come into effect," Cecile Richards, president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a telephone interview. "It's a sad day for the women of South Dakota. We had really hoped that the governor would weigh women's health as more important than politics."

Leaders on each side of the abortion debate said South Dakota's law had stirred new support and fervor for their causes. Abortion rights advocates reported a flood of donations, volunteers and membership requests since the abortion bill began drawing national attention last month.

Opponents said they, too, had had a flood of calls, including numerous donations to a defense fund to fight what is expected to be expensive litigation on behalf of South Dakota.

Already, the state's move seems to have emboldened legislators opposed to abortion elsewhere. For months, similar bills had been proposed in the statehouses of at least a half-dozen states, including Ohio, Georgia and Tennessee, but some efforts have gained steam in the weeks since the South Dakota Legislature overwhelmingly passed its ban.

"Legislators feel that now is the time to wrestle back their authority from the courts," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, based in Washington. "The courts have overstepped their bounds on issues like gay marriage, and the legislators are speaking up."

In Mississippi, an abortion ban with exceptions for rape, incest and the life of the mother passed the House on Thursday. In Missouri, legislation that would outlaw all abortions except to save the life of the mother was proposed last week.

DOJ_NMG_0016595

But opponents of abortion have split over South Dakota's approach, a fact that Mr. Rounds acknowledged in recent weeks as he weighed whether to sign the legislation.

Some, including those who led efforts to pass the ban in South Dakota, said they considered this the ideal time to return the central question of Roe to the Supreme Court. State Representative Roger Hunt, who sponsored the bill in South Dakota, pointed to the appointments of Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., both conservatives, and what he described as the "strong possibility" of the retirement of Justice John Paul Stevens in the near future and the naming of a conservative as his successor.

"This is our time," Mr. Hunt said on Monday.

Other national anti-abortion groups, though, have quietly disagreed with the timing, pressing instead to cut down on abortions by creating restrictions that may be more palatable to a wider audience, restrictions like parental and spousal notification laws and clinic regulations. If the Supreme Court upholds Roe, they have argued, the damage for those opposed to abortion rights will be grave.

"As much as this isn't the best strategic thing to do, it's there and it's the law of South Dakota now," said Daniel S. McConchie, vice president of Americans United for Life, another group. "We'll defend our position now — which is to oppose abortion."

Cristina Minniti, a spokeswoman for the National Right to Life Committee, said no one from her organization was available to be interviewed on the South Dakota law. Instead, she issued a one paragraph statement which stated, in part: "Currently there are at least five votes, a majority, on the U.S. Supreme Court to uphold Roe v. Wade."

Mr. Rounds, who became governor in 2003 after serving in the South Dakota Senate for a decade, declined to speak with reporters after the signing. In an earlier interview, he said that he personally felt uncertain about the timing of a challenge to Roe, but that he was leaning toward signing the bill, in part because he did not wish to divide the people who, like him, oppose abortion.

In the statement he issued on Monday, Mr. Rounds said he fully expected the law to be challenged, and that it might wind up in the nation's highest court. He compared the possibility of a reversal on Roe to that of the changing legal precedents around segregation.

"The reversal of a Supreme Court opinion is possible," the governor said. "For example, in 1896, the United States Supreme Court ruled in the Plessy vs. Ferguson case that a state could require racial segregation in public facilities if the facilities offered to different races were equal. However, 58 years later, the Supreme Court reconsidered that opinion and reversed itself in Brown vs. Board of Education."

Abortion Battle Gains New Intensity With Ban In S.D. (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, March 7, 2006

The near-total ban on abortion signed into law Monday in South Dakota sets the stage for renewed battles over abortion rights in courts, legislatures and political campaigns.

The new law bans all abortions in the state except to save a woman's life. Under any other circumstances, including rape or incest, performing an abortion would be a crime.

Gov. Mike Rounds said he signed the law because “unborn children are the most vulnerable and helpless persons in our society.” He said he hoped the Supreme Court would overturn the 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade that legalized abortion nationwide, as it had overturned “separate but equal” racial segregation in 1954. “The reversal of a Supreme Court opinion is possible,” he said.

Planned Parenthood Foundation of America, the only abortion provider in South Dakota, vowed to fight the ban in court. Democratic strategist Steve Hildebrand said some South Dakota activists are considering putting the new law before voters in November. He said 17,000 signatures would be required by May 2 to get it on the ballot.

Passions among supporters of the law were also running high. State Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican sponsor of the law, said an unidentified donor has already given $1 million to offset legal costs.

Rounds described the new law as “a direct challenge to … Roe v. Wade,” the ruling that struck down state laws banning abortion. He said lower court action probably will prevent the law from taking effect July 1 as scheduled.

Cecile Richards, president of Planned Parenthood, called the new law “a complete wake-up call” that's already drawn “an enormous influx of new donors.”

Abortion rights groups say similar bans are pending in at least eight states. Three were introduced last week, following passage of the South Dakota bill.

DOJ_NMG_0016596

Some Abortion Foes Balk At S.D. Law (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — South Dakota's new law banning almost all abortions is creating a rift among anti-abortion Republicans during an election year.

The law bars abortions unless they're needed to save a woman's life. The ban has underscored disagreements between the law's supporters and those who favor exceptions for rape and incest. It has also exposed Republican disagreements over how best to reduce abortions when most Americans support keeping them legal.

State Rep. Roger Hunt, the Republican who sponsored the law, says "this is the right time" to tackle the issue head-on. "Every year that goes by, there are more and more unborn children whose lives are being terminated."

Some Republican abortion opponents say they would prefer to continue the incremental approach that has resulted in increasing restrictions on abortion. They worry South Dakota's frontal assault could scare away moderates, light a fire under liberals and even set back the anti-abortion cause.

"I am very purely pro-life, and I would not have undertaken this strategy," Republican pollster Kellyanne Conway says. She says it plays into "somewhat hysterical claims of extremism" by the left and "seems to give a largely dying, discredited (abortion rights) movement a little bit of gas."

Daniel McConchie, vice president of the anti-abortion Americans United for Life, says taxpayers could be burdened with legal fees and state courts could be provoked to create state versions of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision, which legalized abortion nationwide in 1973. "It's a very high-stakes tactic," he says.

Democratic strategist Steve Hildebrand predicts the law will be "a huge benefit" for his party as it wends its way through the courts. He gives a preview of the case abortion rights supporters could make: If a murderer gets out of prison and rapes a woman, she's forced to have his child. If a father brutally rapes his daughter, she is forced to have his child. "You present those arguments to women voters, they are going to be outraged," Hildebrand says.

Two-thirds in a USA TODAY/CNN/Gallup Poll in January said they did not want the Supreme Court to overturn Roe, compared with 25% who said they did.

Many Republicans who oppose abortion, President Bush and Arizona Sen. John McCain among them, favor exceptions for rape and incest as well as when a woman's life is in danger. "There is no consensus in the Republican Party," GOP pollster David Hill says.

That has been apparent as the party's 2008 White House prospects respond to questions on the South Dakota ban. Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and Virginia Sen. George Allen said they would have signed it. McCain said last month on ABC's This Week that "my position has been consistently pro-life but (with exceptions for) rape, incest and the health of the mother." McCain's aides later said he meant to say "life" of the mother, his longtime view and a much narrower exception than "health."

Deirdre McQuade of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops calls the law a chance to end Roe's "stranglehold" on legislatures and "open up the possibility of people's values being reflected in their own state laws."

Hunt says there's "national momentum" for the law he sponsored — similar legislation popping up in other states and the elevation of two new conservative Supreme Court justices, John Roberts and Samuel Alito. He says it's likely liberal Justice John Paul Stevens, 85, will retire within the two to three years he estimates it will take the new law to reach the high court.

South Dakota state Sen. J.P. Duniphan, a self-described "pro-life" Republican, opposed the law. "It is a very unnecessary, expensive challenge. And it is dividing the party."

South Dakota Governor Signs Abortion Ban (LAT)

By Michael Muskal

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

South Dakota Gov. Mike Rounds announced today that he has signed legislation prohibiting nearly all abortions in his state, a move designed to invite a more conservative U.S. Supreme Court to revisit the 1973 decision that established a woman's right to choose.

The governor's action, which had been expected, makes South Dakota the first state to ban most abortions since the high court ruled in Roe vs. Wade. About half a dozen states are considering similar legislation.

"In the history of the world, the true test of a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society," Rounds said in a statement posted on his website. "The sponsors and supporters of this bill believe that abortion is wrong because unborn children are the most vulnerable and most helpless persons in our society.

"I agree with them," stated the governor.

DOJ_NMG_0016597

The ban is scheduled to go into effect in July, but advocates for abortion rights have announced that they will challenge it in the courts.

"This ban is an attack on women's fundamental right of privacy and their ability to make the most intimate and personal choice about when and whether to have a child," Eve Gartner, senior staff attorney for the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a statement released before Rounds announced he had signed the bill. "The U.S. Supreme Court has reaffirmed time and again the constitutional right to make the private choice to have an abortion. South Dakota is entering dangerous territory with this ban."

Planned Parenthood runs the state's only clinic where abortions are performed. About 800 abortions are done each year in South Dakota.

Rounds said he expected the South Dakota law to end up in the courts. He cited another Supreme Court reversal — the 1954 decision to end racial segregation — as a reason for optimism.

The South Dakota law "will give the United States Supreme Court a similar opportunity to reconsider an earlier opinion," he stated.

Since the 1973 ruling, the addition of new justices may have created a 5-4 majority opposed to Roe. Two recent additions, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Associate Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., are believed to have questions about the decision. Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the court.

The South Dakota law eliminates most abortions in the state, but Rounds said that it allows doctors to perform abortions in order to save the life of the mother. Abortion rights advocates question that assertion.

Last month, the Supreme Court announced that it will hear another abortion case dealing with the legality of a 2003 federal law that banned a procedure known as partial birth abortions.

Sun Belt, Suburbs Get More Diverse (USAT)

By Haya El Nasser

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Almost a third of the nation's 361 metropolitan areas have registered declines in their white populations this decade as minorities bring ethnic and racial diversity to vast sections of the USA, according to a Brookings Institution report to be released today.

The influx of immigrants and people moving to the Sun Belt and Western mountain states from other parts of the USA is rearranging the ethnic tapestry of urban centers in an unprecedented way.

Blacks, Hispanics and Asians are going where the jobs are. They're driving population increases in the fastest-growing areas, including Las Vegas, Atlanta and Orlando, says demographer William Frey, author of the report on shifts in populations from 2000 to 2004.

The white population declined in 111 metropolitan areas, including Los Angeles, New York and San Francisco. Aging whites are gravitating toward smaller communities such as St. George, Utah, and Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, Frey says.

The white population still dominates exurbs and “spillover” communities outside large metropolitan centers but minorities also are moving to these areas.

“These minorities are now spilling to parts of the country — the interior Sun Belt, suburbs and exurbs — which were once bastions of middle-class whites,” Frey says. “As a consequence, white-bread America is experiencing diversity firsthand, rather than in magazines or TV images. … Politicians are going to have to figure out how to satisfy both groups.”

Frey's key findings:

·Minorities now constitute a majority of children under age 15 in almost a third of large metropolitan areas, including Chicago, Phoenix and Atlanta.

·The black return migration to the South has gained momentum this decade. But blacks are gravitating less to the “Old South” states of Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama and more to “New South” job hubs in Texas, North Carolina, Georgia and Florida.

·An area's ability to attract and hire immigrants increasingly can make or break it economically.

“The most distressing news is from the Northeast and Midwest,” says Ned Hill, vice president of economic development at Cleveland State University. “White retirement is heading south without a compensating inflow of people and fewer births because of fewer immigrants.” Cleveland registered one of the biggest losses in white population.

·Four of the metropolitan areas showing the fastest growth in Hispanics are in Florida.

Mickey Rosado, 37, is the first Hispanic on the city council in Cape Coral, Fla., near Fort Myers. The area had the nation's biggest jump in Hispanics, up 55.4% from 2000 to 2004. Hispanics are opening small businesses and working in agriculture, he says. Officials have to balance the needs of younger Hispanic families and older white residents. “It's a major issue,” he says.

DOJ_NMG_0016598

Whites To Be Minority In New York Area Soon, Data Show (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The influx of foreigners to New York and its suburbs and the continuing exodus of non-Hispanic whites to other parts of the country have transformed the face of metropolitan New York so profoundly that whites will constitute a minority of the region's population within a few years, demographers say.

The shift would make New York the first large metropolitan area outside the South and West in which whites do not make up a majority, according to an analysis of 2004 Census estimates by the Brookings Institution that was released yesterday.

The analysis also reveals a historic reversal: For the first time since at least the 19th century, the black population of both the city and, to a lesser extent, the region, has declined. In the five boroughs, according to the estimates, the number of blacks declined by about 30,000 since 2000, dipping below 30 percent of the overall population, as the migration of blacks to the suburbs and areas like the South outpaced immigration from the Caribbean and Africa.

In contrast, the analysis found that while the greater New York region over all lost 162,000 non-Hispanic whites and several hundred blacks from 2000 to 2004, the region gained 288,000 Hispanic people and 201,000 Asians — more Asians, in fact, than any other metropolitan area.

Increasingly, the New York region's growing multiracial makeup reflects the changing face of the inner ring of suburbs as many new immigrants bypass the city altogether or migrate from the city to neighboring counties after a generation or less.

What makes the city and the region unusual, though, is that among the nation's 88 metropolitan areas with half a million or more people, New York is one of only three — Houston and Honolulu are the others — where the proportion of blacks, Hispanics and Asians each exceeds their share of the national population.

Whites have been a minority in New York City since the 1980's. But now that shift is extending to the wider metropolitan area, driven by immigration and higher birth rates among immigrants. Already, non-Hispanic whites are a minority of the metropolitan area's population younger than 15.

"New York is still the classic melting pot, with a whole diverse array of immigrants coming in, but the suburbs are now becoming part of this bigger melting pot," said William H. Frey, the Brookings Institution demographer who conducted the analysis. "The suburbs are now tasting this new diversity."

His analysis found that whites declined to 52.2 percent of the population in 2004 from 54.2 percent in 2000 in the census-defined metropolitan area, which includes the city, Long Island, the northern suburbs, northern New Jersey and northeastern Pennsylvania, but not Connecticut.

"We went down 2.1 percent from 2000 to 2004," Dr. Frey said. "If we go another 2 percent before the end of the decade, you're there." He added: "The suburbs are now contributing to this. They've all shown a decline in the percent of whites since 1990."

The approaching statistical milestone in the New York region has not been unexpected by demographers.

"What this shows is that the pattern is spreading out," said Andrew A. Beveridge, a demographer at Queens College of the City University of New York, "and the non-Hispanic white population is continuing to dwindle."

"The New York metropolitan area is becoming more like the city, and the nation's metropolitan areas are becoming more like New York," Dr. Beveridge said.

The trend was foreshadowed in an earlier analysis by New York's Department of City Planning, which found that while the region's ethnic and racial numbers had been driven for several decades by changes in the five boroughs, those changes were also being mirrored in the suburban counties closest to the city.

"The inner-ring suburbs are emulating the city," said Joseph J. Salvo, director of the department's population division.

What's happening in New York has already occurred in metropolitan areas in the West and South, including Los Angeles, Miami, Houston and San Francisco.

The proportion of whites has also dipped to just over a majority in the San Diego, Washington, Dallas and Las Vegas metropolitan regions as Asian and Hispanic people disperse beyond central cities and their suburbs and as blacks migrate to the South. In each of those areas, whites are already a minority of the population under age 15.

Atlanta led large metropolitan areas in black population growth and is poised to overtake Chicago as the region with the second-highest black population in total numbers, after New York.

In 1990, metropolitan Los Angeles and New York accounted for 30 percent of the nation's Hispanic population. By 2004, those two regions were home to only 23 percent of Hispanic people.

DOJ_NMG_0016599

"For immigrant minorities, especially, friendship and family networks have drawn them to traditional ports of entry, even during times when labor market considerations would suggest they move elsewhere," Dr. Frey wrote. "Blacks, as well, have tended to follow well-worn patterns, initially out of the South and, later, to a network of cities across the North and West."

But more recently, he concluded, "many lower-skilled Hispanic migrants are moving to fast-growing areas of the country, in response to retail, service and construction job growth, while higher-skilled minority migrants are following the same professional opportunities that have attracted whites."

ANTITRUST:

Phone Merger's Approval Is Likely (AAS)

By Marilyn Geewax, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, March 7, 2006

FCC might impose some limits on the new AT&T.

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department likely will approve AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. without demanding any major antitrust concessions, analysts said Monday.

But the Federal Communications Commission, which also must review the transaction, may consider restricting the new company from charging new fees for faster delivery of premium Internet services, they predicted.

Together, AT&T and BellSouth would become the nation's No. 1 supplier of local, long-distance, wireless and high-speed-Internet services.

In recent reviews of telecom mergers, however, Justice Department officials decided that size alone could not shield phone companies from competition from cable, satellite and other companies providing telecom services.

As a result, the Justice Department demanded no significant changes in those cases, so "we see no reason why it would treat this case differently," according to an assessment issued by Anna-Maria Kovacs, president of Regulatory Source Associates LLC, a research firm in Cambridge, Mass.

Consumer advocates say they nevertheless will raise objections to hold back the approval process.

Getting regulators and antitrust prosecutors to stop the merger would be "highly unlikely," said Jeff Chester, executive director of the Center for Digital Democracy. "Our job is to slow the deal down and make their lives so miserable that they have to impose safeguards" to protect consumers, he said.

Chester has his work cut out for him. Under the Bush administration, the Justice Department has been highly amenable to mergers.

Supporters of the AT&T-BellSouth transaction will argue that it presents no serious antitrust problems because AT&T's operations are concentrated in the Southwest and Midwest, while BellSouth's are in the Southeast.

The merger could run into bigger speed bumps at the FCC.

Chairman Kevin Martin required few changes in last year's two enormous phone company mergers. But some observers think the two new Republican members — Deborah Taylor Tate and, once he's confirmed, Robert McDowell — might take relatively tough positions on the AT&T-BellSouth merger because of their past experiences. Tate previously worked with state utility commissioners, who often tangled with the regional phone companies over rates and service.

McDowell was assistant general counsel at Comptel, a trade group for smaller phone firms that opposes this transaction.

With Tate and McDowell, the commission may be more likely to block the merged company from charging fees for fast delivery of new Internet services, such as voice and video. Executives at both AT&T and BellSouth have said they want to start doing that.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye, D-Hawaii, co-chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, warned Monday that the merger "will call into question our commitment . . . to preserve fair rules that guarantee nondiscriminatory access to new services."

UPDATE: Few Antitrust Hurdles Seen For AT&T Deal (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (Dow Jones) -- AT&T (T) will face few antitrust hurdles in its $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth (BLS), analysts predicted Monday.

Announced Sunday, the deal follows SBC Communications Inc.'s acquisition of AT&T (T) and the formation of the new AT&T Inc. (T) (T) in November. It also follows Verizon Communications' February 2005 purchase of MCI Corp.

Both those recent deals, observers say, give regulators case histories from which to work.

DOJ_NMG_0016600

"They have a template to look at these things and follow the same framework," said Paul Glenchur of Stanford Washington Research Group.

"I don't think there's going to be a great deal of regulatory resistance," said Jonathan Rubin, a research fellow at the American Antitrust Institute.

Announced Sunday, the acquisition would cement AT&T's (T) position as the country's largest supplier of local, long-distance, wireless and high-speed- Internet services. The combination would serve 70 million local-phone customers, 54 million-plus wireless subscribers and more than 10 million DSL Internet users.

The combined company would likely have to divest some "special access" lines used by businesses to send high volumes of data, analysts said.

Combined with BellSouth (BLS) (BLS) , AT&T (T) would control the local phone market in 22 states, including the most populous areas of the South and Midwest. Rival Verizon would control the East and the much-smaller Qwest most of the less-populated West.

But consumer-activist groups have quickly announced their opposition to the deal, and some suggest the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission have let big telecom mergers go through without proper scrutiny.

"The regulators are permitting these mergers to proceed without installing adequate consumer and competition safeguards," said the antitrust institute's Rubin.

Shares of AT&T (T) were trading lower early Monday afternoon. They were recently off 35 cents to $27.64.

US Officials To Closely Review AT&T-BellSouth (REU)

Reuters, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON (Reuters) - U.S. communications regulators and antitrust authorities on Monday pledged to carefully review AT&T Inc.'s $65 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp..

"We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services," Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement.

The agency must determine whether the deal benefits the public. The transaction must also receive approval from U.S. Justice Department antitrust authorities.

"We're going to look at it closely," the department's antitrust chief Thomas Barnett told reporters while attending a conference of attorneys general.

Analysts said they expect the deal to be approved, likely with similar conditions that were attached to two telecommunications deals given the green light last year, Verizon Communications' purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications acquisition of AT&T Corp. to form AT&T Inc.

Lawmakers also said they plan to review the deal.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Ted Stevens and his staff "will review the AT&T-BellSouth merger during the coming weeks, a process which will include meetings with the involved parties," said panel spokesman Aaron Saunders.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, the ranking Democrat on the committee, issued a statement expressing concern about the consolidation, particularly so soon after the SBC-AT&T deal closed.

"The proposed recombination of two of the remaining four Baby Bells will call into question our commitment to promote competition in the communications marketplace and to preserve fair rules that guarantee nondiscriminatory access to new services," said Inouye of Hawaii.

AT&T shares fell 97 cents, or 3.5 percent, to close at $27.02 while BellSouth shares rose $3.05, or 9.7 percent, to $34.51.

UPDATE:AT&T-BellSouth Deal Draws Scrutiny On Capitol Hill (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -(Dow Jones)- AT&T Inc.'s (T) (T) proposed purchase of BellSouth Corp. (BLS)(BLS) is stirring up some unease on Capitol Hill, where lawmakers and competing telecommunications companies are questioning whether the transaction requires special scrutiny.

The combination would create the world's largest telecommunications company and reunite portions of AT&T (T) that the government broke up in 1984. The new entity would be a behemoth, with customers from California to Florida. It would offer phone and Internet access and roll out new television services, giving customers a new option for bundling services in a single package.

DOJ_NMG_0016601

Concerns hinge in on the size of the deal and on expectations that AT&T's (T)purchase will escalate a trend of consolidation in the telecommunications industry. Just four months ago, regulators approved the takeover of AT&T (T) itself by SBC Communications Inc. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s (VZ) (VZ) purchase of MCI.

"AT&T's (T) proposal to purchase BellSouth (BLS) would remove yet another potential competitor from the communications marketplace and calls into question whether the future of communications policy will be marked by strategies to promote vigorous competition or by further efforts to facilitate new mergers," Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the top Democrat on the Senate Commerce Committee said in a statement.

The transaction comes amid a favorable political climate for mergers, as the Bush administration has been friendly to large combinations. Many observers expect the Federal Communications Commission and antitrust regulators to approve the deal with few conditions even amid concerns the deal would leave companies with too much pricing power and consumers with two few choices.

Mergers are a particular threat for the small phone companies. The small companies are urging regulators to block AT&T's (T) plans to buy BellSouth (BLS), citing the risks of diminished competition.

"There are no benefits in this merger for consumers or the U.S. economy," said Earl Comstock, president of Comptel, a trade group for small phone companies. " This merger continues the anticompetitive resurrection of the old Bell monopoly."

The cable industry is also weighing in, arguing that the transaction undercuts AT&T's (T) efforts to persuade Congress to overhaul laws that require phone companies to get permission from each municipality in which they hope to offer television business.

"My point here is not to question the merger, which will be handled appropriately by the relevant federal agencies and Congressional committees," Kyle McSlarrow, the president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, wrote in a letter Monday to the leaders of the Senate and House committees that oversee the telecommunications industry.

"Rather, it is to suggest how extraordinary it is for an industry, in which one company alone - AT&T (T) - has a market capitalization greater than that of the entire cable industry, not only to ask for special favors from Congress but in fact demand free license to enter the video market while maintaining all current regulation on a much smaller cable industry."

- By Siobhan Hughes, Dow Jones Newswires; 202-862-6654; Siobhan.Hughes@ dowjones.com

AT&T Plans 10,000 Job Cuts After BellSouth Purchase (Update4) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 7, 2006

March 6 (Bloomberg) -- AT&T Inc., the largest U.S. telephone company, plans to eliminate about 10,000 jobs after completing the $67 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp.

The reductions will come in 2007 through 2009, Chief Financial Officer Rick Lindner said on a conference call today with analysts. With BellSouth and Cingular, San Antonio-based AT&T's workforce will rise to 317,000 from 189,000, making AT&T among the top 10 U.S. employers, according to Bloomberg data.

Job cuts, which are about 3 percent of total employment, represent about 50 percent of the planned $18 billion in cost savings AT&T expects to extract from the purchase. The acquisition will cement AT&T's position as the dominant U.S. provider of local, long-distance and wireless calling and enable it to better fend off new competition from cable-television companies and Internet calling companies.

``It's a realization that the world is changing and it's changing faster and faster," AT&T Chief Executive Officer Ed Whitacre said on the call. ``We saw that the sooner we did this, the better off we'd be."

The reductions, which Lindner said will come mostly through attrition, are in addition to the 13,000 jobs that AT&T plans to shed as part of last year's combination between SBC Communications Inc. and AT&T Corp., which created the largest U.S. phone provider. BellSouth and Cingular add 128,000 workers to the payroll.

The combined BellSouth-AT&T will have 70 million local-phone customers in 22 states including four of the largest: Texas, California, Illinois and Florida. Ownership of Cingular Wireless LLC, the largest mobile-phone carrier, will give AT&T 54.1 million wireless subscribers and along with the business segment will make up 72 percent of total revenue.

Profit Booster in 2008

AT&T and BellSouth combined had almost $100 billion in revenue last year and today have a stock market value of more than $160 billion, dwarfing the $98 billion of No. 2. Verizon Communications Inc. Sales at the new company are expected to return to growth in 2007, a year earlier than AT&T forecast on Jan. 31.

The deal, expected to close in early 2007, won't affect profit excluding amortization and merger-related costs in 2007 and will add to profit on that basis starting in 2008, Lindner said.

DOJ_NMG_0016602

``The industry itself has become increasingly competitive," said John Cunningham, who manages $3 billion as the chief investment officer of J&W Seligman & Co. in New York and holds BellSouth shares. ``You need to see these kinds of mergers for these companies to thrive and survive."

BellSouth shares surged 9.7 percent. The company's shareholders will receive AT&T shares worth $37.09 for each BellSouth share, the companies said yesterday in a statement. AT&T will also take on $17 billion of BellSouth debt and plans to buy back $10 billion of shares.

Roll Up

By buying BellSouth, Whitacre is continuing his roll up of the companies formed when AT&T Corp. was split in 1984. Back then, AT&T Corp. dominated local- and long-distance phone services. The company had $150 billion in assets and employed more than 1 million. A year later, the business was split into eight pieces, one long-distance company and local-telephone providers, the Baby Bells. SBC was the smallest.

The combined AT&T-BellSouth will have more than $200 billion in assets, a reflection of both the expansion of the telephone industry into mobile service and fiber-optic lines and the push to automate more functions.

``The old AT&T is practically put together," said Sean Egan, managing director of Egan-Jones Ratings Co. said. ``A big portion of the split-up of the Bells has been reconstituted."

Regulatory Scrutiny

The purchase will help Whitacre, 64, form a company to compete with mobile-phone companies, cable-television operators such as Comcast Corp. and Internet phone-service providers like EBay Inc.'s Skype. As part of his plan, Whitacre bought AT&T Corp., the largest U.S. long-distance provider, for $16.5 billion in November and is preparing to offer television service along fiber-optic lines.

That competition may help AT&T win regulatory approval, analysts said. BellSouth, which operates in nine states, also doesn't compete in AT&T's states.

``The battle with cable is here," said Felix Rohatyn, the former Ambassador to France and Lazard Ltd. partner who advised Whitacre on the bid. ``This deal will make the new AT&T better able to compete, not just with cable and satellite but with all the new technologies that are coming at them."

The U.S. Justice Department, which last year approved SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T and Verizon's acquisition of MCI Inc., is unlikely to raise major antitrust concerns, said Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Blair Levin, a former U.S. Federal Communications Commission chief of staff.

``They looked at those other deals, went through lots of paperwork, and they ultimately decided not that much was required," Levin said.

Shares

Shares of Atlanta-based BellSouth, the No. 3 local-phone company, rose $3.04 to $34.50 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading after earlier reaching $35.25. Before today, the shares had gained 16 percent this year and were trading at their highest in more than four years on speculation AT&T would make a bid. AT&T will pay 1.325 shares for each BellSouth stock.

AT&T shares, up 10 year, fell 97 cents, or 3.5 percent, to $27.02. AT&T will pay BellSouth $1.7 billion if the deal is terminated, according to regulatory filings.

The deal sparked investor speculation that other telecommunications deals may be in the works. Shares of Sprint Nextel Corp., the third-largest wireless services provider, rose $1.10, or 4.5 percent, to $25.30.

Analysts Divided

Analysts were divided on the benefits of the merger. Wachovia Securities raised its rating on AT&T, while Sanford C. Bernstein & Co. cut the shares. JPMorgan called the agreement a ``clear positive" for BellSouth and said the implications for AT&T shareholders are unclear. Credit Suisse said the cost savings AT&T expects from the combination seem high.

Whitacre, who will be Chairman and CEO of the combined company through April 2008, said the most immediate benefits will come from combining Cingular ownership under one roof. AT&T said it will save about $2 billion a year, by merging networks, firing workers and forming one brand under AT&T.

The agreement to buy BellSouth is the biggest in the industry in six years. It caps a spending spree of more than $200 million during his 16 years at the helm of the company formerly known as SBC Communications Inc. AT&T Inc. was formed when SBC bought AT&T Corp. and changed its name.

Shareholders `Rewarded'

``AT&T is going to be a faster-growing, much larger, stronger company," said John Hodulik, an analyst at UBS AG in New York. Hodulik, among the most accurate analysts ranked by StarMine Corp., rates AT&T a ``buy" and has a ``neutral" rating on BellSouth. ``Shareholders will be rewarded for it."

BellSouth CEO Duane Ackerman will leave three months after the deal closes. Ackerman said it's the ``right time'' for the merger. Whitacre and Ackerman pieced the deal together, AT&T Chief Operating Officer Randall Stephenson said in an interview.

``It will benefit customers. It will facilitate the industry's technological evolution. It will allow us reduce costs,'' Ackerman said today.

Cingular Wireless has driven revenue growth at AT&T and BellSouth. In the third quarter last year, for example, SBC's revenue was little changed excluding Atlanta-based Cingular. With the mobile-phone business, SBC revenue was up 21 percent. The wireless provider added a record 1.82 million subscribers. Verizon Wireless, its nearest competitor, added 2 million to 51.3 million.

``Wireless really drove this deal,'' Hodulik said.

AT&T and BellSouth have shared ownership of the business, AT&T with 60 percent and BellSouth with 40 percent, preventing each from reaping the full benefits.

Name Change

``No partnership between two independent companies, no matter how well run, can match the speed, effectiveness, responsiveness and efficiency of a solely owned company,'' Whitacre said.

The structure impeded Cingular's ability to develop services such as Internet access on mobile phones and televisions, Stephenson said. Cingular will change its name to AT&T.

``This really enhances our ability to get these services to market quick,'' Stephenson said.

Whitacre, a 6-foot-4 Texan, completed his first large acquisition in 1997 with the purchase of Pacific Telesis Group. In 1998, SBC bought Southern New England Telecommunications and a year later Whitacre orchestrated the $80.6 billion purchase of Chicago-based Ameritech Corp.

`Surprised the World'

``Whitacre surprised the world,'' said Atlanta-based telecom analyst Jeff Kagan. ``He's taken the smallest Bell and made it the largest Bell. He's done a lot more than anyone thought he could.''

AT&T will pick up BellSouth's phone lines in parts of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee. About 60 percent of AT&T's lines are in California, Texas and Illinois.

Verizon and Denver-based Qwest Communications International Inc. are the only other remaining telephone providers from the breakup. Verizon offers service in 28 states including New York and California, as well as Washington D.C.

Whitacre sought advice from Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc., Evercore Partners, and Rohatyn Associates for the transaction. Citigroup Inc. and Goldman Sachs Group Inc. advised BellSouth.

The banks will be sharing fees for the biggest acquisition in the telecommunications industry since Verizon was created in June 2000 with the $71 billion merger of Bell Atlantic Corp. and GTE Corp., according to data compiled by Bloomberg. The last deal in any industry that was as large was Sanofi-Synthelabo SA's purchase of Aventis SA in France for $73 billion in August 2004.

AT&T-Verizon Battle

The combination sets up a battle between AT&T and Verizon. Until last year, the two companies operated mainly in separate states and barely competed. Since then, SBC Communications bought AT&T and Verizon acquired MCI, enabling them both to expand beyond their local-phone states and tap business customers.

Verizon had been the largest U.S. telephone company until SBC and AT&T combined. Verizon Wireless also lost its spot as the top provider of mobile-phone service when Cingular bought AT&T Wireless Services Inc. in 2004. Verizon is focused on acquiring the 45 percent of Verizon Wireless that it doesn't own from partner Vodafone Group Plc, spokesman Peter Thonis said today.

``It's a priority for us,'' Thonis said in an e-mail. He said Verizon's business plan is unchanged after AT&T's announcement and called the offer ``a logical and predictable move.''

Whitacre's strategy has paid off for him. He received $17.2 million in total compensation last year, a 9.5 percent raise, according to a regulatory filing.

``He's a Texan, and he's winning,'' Kagan said. ``He does what he has to do to make the deals and grow the company. He doesn't take no for an answer. And everybody wins. The companies he acquires, the stockholders.''

(AT&T executives began a call to discuss the purchase today at 10 a.m. New York time. To listen click on {LIVE } or listen on the Internet at http://www.att.com/investor.relations or http://www.bellsouth.com/investor)

To contact the reporters responsible for this story: J. Kyle Foster in New York at kfoster2@bloomberg.net Last Updated: March 6, 2006 16:15 EST

DOJ_NMG_0016604

AT&T's BellSouth Call May Ring At Vodafone (WSJ)

By Cassell Bryan-low And Jason Singer In London And Amol Sharma In New York

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

AT&T INC.'S planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. not only changes the U.S. telecommunications landscape but could cause an unexpected shift in the dynamic between Britain's Vodafone Group PLC and Verizon Communications Inc., the co-owners of Verizon Wireless.

Verizon has long been interested in buying out Vodafone's 45% stake in the venture, but has been holding out for the right terms. For months, Vodafone has been under pressure from investors to do a deal in order to generate cash for the company and pay out dividends to large shareholders. That gave Verizon the upper hand.

But now Verizon needs to get control of the venture more than ever, analysts say, just to keep pace with AT&T, which will take full control of cellular carrier Cingular Wireless and thus increase its exposure to the telecom industry's growth area. The power balance may have shifted in Vodafone's favor.

"In terms of negotiating leverage, I think there's been a slight shift toward more bargaining power for Vodafone," said Andy Belt, a telecom consultant at Adventis Corp., a Boston consulting firm.

The two sides may well find common ground.

Vodafone's stake in Verizon Wireless could be valued at as much as $45 billion, analysts say. Investors seemed to warm to the prospect yesterday of a Verizon buyout, pushing Vodafone's shares in London 2.9% higher to 125 pence ($2.19). In 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, Vodafone's American depositary shares were at $21.90, up 90 cents, or 4.3%.

As the joint venture's name suggests, Verizon has always had greater brand and operational control of the company. That has led some Vodafone investors to ask recently why Vodafone Group's chief executive, Arun Sarin, doesn't bail out of the venture, especially because Verizon Wireless uses a different technology from Vodafone's other operations.

A sale of the Verizon Wireless stake could leave Vodafone, after returning some cash to investors, with enough left over to make acquisitions. One possibility: T-Mobile USA Inc., a unit of Deutsche Telekom AG. While Deutsche Telekom has said it aims to keep its U.S. division, the German company has considered selling in the recent past. T-Mobile USA also faces huge investments for new spectrum licenses in the near future. And it would give Vodafone its own brand name in the U.S. and a network based on the same technology it uses elsewhere.

But that isn't in the cards yet. "We would not be interested" in T-Mobile USA, a Vodafone spokesman said yesterday. T-Mobile USA declined to comment.

Some observers say AT&T's bold strike means Verizon has to respond. Moving more aggressively to purchase all of Verizon Wireless is the most likely option, some say. Owning 100% of Verizon Wireless would help boost Verizon Communications' growth profile as it would be able to reflect all of the wireless carrier's growth.

It would also free Verizon Communications to offer wireless-related discounts and integrate its land line and wireless networks with new service offerings, particularly for business customers. As it stands, Verizon Communications must manage Verizon Wireless in the best interests of the joint venture.

Verizon Communications spokesman Peter Thonis said Verizon has a strong interest in buying out Vodafone, but added, "It isn't because we're reacting or responding in any way to AT&T."

Vodafone appears to be softening its stance on selling its stake. In a recent interview, Mr. Sarin said he wouldn't rule out a sale. "It's not a question of 'no, never, not at any price,'" he said. But, "we're not in a hurry," he added. "Verizon Wireless provides us a very good rate of return on our capital."

Because AT&T's integration of its land line and wireless business could have a negative competitive effect on Verizon Wireless, "the announcement of the deal may nudge Verizon [Communications] and Vodafone closer to each other," says David Barden, an analyst at Banc of America Securities. But, he adds, "It isn't clear it will nudge them enough to close the gap between them." Mr. Barden doesn't own shares in Verizon Communications or Vodafone. Banc of America has an investment-banking relationship with Verizon Communications, but not with Vodafone.

A sale would likely incur a hefty capital-gains tax for Vodafone. One way to mitigate that tax could involve Vodafone Omnitel NV, the Italian carrier in which Verizon Communications owns a 23.1% stake and Vodafone owns the rest. Verizon Communications could swap its holdings in Omnitel in part payment for Vodafone's Verizon Wireless stake.

Vodafone's Mr. Sarin has shown he is willing to quit countries when he thinks the time is right. The company said Friday that it was in talks to sell a majority stake of its Japanese business, which has struggled to stem a loss of customers. Some analysts say Vodafone's consideration of a sale in Japan could ease the pressure on the United Kingdom company to sell its stake in Verizon Wireless in the near term, but that shedding the U.S. business remains a possibility down the road.

DOJ_NMG_0016605

"We view an exit in Japan as the better option than selling out of the U.S. at this stage," wrote Lehman Brothers in a research report yesterday. But, "we believe that the willingness of Vodafone's management to take decisive corporate action could well lead to a U.S. exit over the mid- to long-term."

Merger Pressure Rises After AT&T Deal (FT)

By Paul Taylor, Aline Van Duyn And James Politi In New York

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

The $67bn merger of AT&T and BellSouth to create the world's largest telecoms company on Monday increased the pressure on rivals including Verizon Communications to join an industry-wide consolidation.

Announcing the deal on Monday, Edward Whitacre, AT&T's chairman and chief executive, said the tie-up was "a logical fit" that would enable the enlarged group to offer a full range of fixed line, wireless and advanced IP-based services to consumers and businesses. The merger reflected "a realisation that the world is changing and it's changing faster and faster," he said. "We saw that the sooner we did this, the better off we'd be."

AT&T said it expected to cut 10,000 jobs between 2007 and 2009, as part of plans to eliminate $18bn in costs.

Although the Federal Communications Commission said it would "carefully weigh" the proposed deal, senior company executives were confident it could win regulatory approval and be closed within a year. "As a substantive matter, there are no obvious issues that would allow the government to block the deal; there could be things that we see on later, once the companies file their papers," Michael Powell, a former FCC chairman, told the Financial Times.

Outside experts also expected regulatory scrutiny to be largely a matter of what conditions should be attached.

AT&T said the combined company would be better placed to roll out new services including internet television services and advanced broadband video, in competition with cable companies. Annual savings would average $2bn, starting in 2008.

AT&T said the merger would help position the combined company to roll out new services including IPTV and advanced broadband video services in competition with cable companies. Average annual savings per year would be $2bn starting in 2008.

The BellSouth purchase would also give AT&T sole control of Cingular Wireless, the biggest wireless carrier in the US. As a result, analysts noted, Verizon, its main rival, would be under pressure to buy out Vodafone's 45 per cent stake in Verizon Wireless.

Shares in Vodafone gained 2.9 per cent in London to close at 125 pence. Verizon's shares were up 1.25 per cent at $34 at noon in New York.

"Verizon may be pressured more to improve its business mix by becoming increasingly focused on its attempt to buy out the remaining 45 per cent of Verizon Wireless from Vodafone," said Jason Armstrong of Goldman Sachs in a note to investors.

Verizon acknowledged that getting control of the Vodafone stake – a deal that could be worth up to $50bn – was a priority. It was "working to acquire from Vodafone the remaining 45 percent of Verizon Wireless". Vodafone reacted cautiously, saying its "position has not changed".

Verizon declined to say whether active talks with Vodafone were under way. "This a logical and predictable move by AT&T," said Peter Thonis of Verizon. "This kind of consolidation of assets makes sense, providing new leverage and capabilities as Verizon and AT&T compete against cable."

Arun Sarin, chief executive, has recently signalled the board would consider selling stake in Verizon Wireless although he insisted last month he thought it was a "good idea" to stay in the US.

Mr Sarin has come under pressure from shareholders, unhappy about the group's share price performance and overall strategy, to dispose of the stake in Verizon Wireless because Vodafone has no clear path to control.

Instead, Vodafone is looking at exiting the troubled Japanese market, another bone of contention for investors, after confirming at the end of last week it was in talks with Softbank to sell at least a controlling stake in the Japanese subsidiary.

The Titans Of Telecom Face Off (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

One started out as an engineer in Lubbock, Tex.; the other as a cable-splicer's assistant in the Bronx.

From those humble beginnings, AT&T Inc. Chairman Edward E. Whitacre Jr. and Verizon Communications Inc. Chairman Ivan G. Seidenberg have built the two biggest U.S. telecommunications companies.

With Sunday's announcement of AT&T's agreement to buy BellSouth Corp. for about $67 billion in stock, Whitacre, 64, capped a career that has transformed what was once the smallest of the Baby Bells, Southwestern Bell Corp., into the largest local-phone and wireless company in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0016606

What immediately followed was speculation about what Verizon's Seidenberg, 59, might do next to one-up his biggest competitor for more than a decade. He has already said publicly that he'd like to buy out Vodafone Group PLC's 45 percent stake in Verizon Wireless, the second-largest U.S. mobile phone company.

For years, since Whitacre was the head of Southwestern Bell Corp. and Seidenberg was running Bell Atlantic and before that Nynex, the two have outdone each other through a string of mergers, acquisitions and partnerships.

People who have followed Whitacre's trajectory describe him as unusually aggressive and competitive, fond of the bold stroke and seldom given to self-doubt afterward.

"It's a sport. It's a competition. In this business, scale really matters," said Reed Hundt, a former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission who has dealt with both men over many years. "It's like NFL linemen. You want 'em big, you want 'em fast, but most important, you want 'em big."

The aim of the AT&T-BellSouth merger is to strengthen AT&T for what is shaping up as a battle against the cable companies to sell consumers bundles of video, high-speed Internet, wireless and traditional land-line telephone service. The deal, if approved by regulators, would also give AT&T full control of Cingular Wireless, the nation's largest mobile phone company, which it runs as a joint venture with BellSouth.

San Antonio-based AT&T yesterday said it planned to cut about 10,000 jobs, through attrition where possible, as part of $18 billion in cost savings it projects from the merger with Atlanta-based BellSouth. AT&T's stock price slid 97 cents, to $27.02, as the market digested the merger, while BellSouth's rose $3.04, to $34.50. Verizon shares rose 15 cents, to $33.73.

The AT&T-BellSouth merger, which will give the combined company local-phone service in 22 states in the South, Midwest and West, immediately raised questions whether Verizon would try to buy another Bell.

Michael H. Salsbury, a telecom lawyer with Chadbourne & Parke LLP who was a former top executive at MCI Inc., said Seidenberg would continue with his basic strategy and dismissed speculation he might bid for heavily indebted Qwest Communications International Inc., the main local phone company in much of the West.

"If you had a dollar to invest and you were Ivan Seidenberg, would you invest it in Qwest or in wireless? Where would you get a better return? Wireless." Salsbury said.

Verizon spokesman Peter Thonis declined comment on whether the New York-based company might be interested in Qwest, and he reiterated the company's long-standing position on Vodafone's stake in Verizon Wireless.

While Whitacre has a reputation for boldness, Seidenberg is pursuing what many in the industry regard as a more audacious and costly strategy of running fiber-optic cables right to people's homes to carry what he hopes will be increasing video and high-speed Internet traffic. It is far more expensive to run new fiber-optic cables to customers' homes, but the technology allows for the transmission of more data than traditional copper wires because glass fibers can carry data faster.

Verizon is spending billions of dollars to build out its new all-fiber network, while AT&T is taking a less-costly approach by running fiber-optic cable to neighborhoods and using copper wires from there, which may allow it to offer such services at lower cost, albeit with less bandwidth. Bandwidth is the rate that information can be transmitted along a communications line.

"The risk associated with [Verizon's fiber-optic] build-out is higher. That risk may be acceptable because the returns are so great -- lots more bandwidth," said Ellen Daley, an analyst with Forrester Research Inc. "The risk on the AT&T side is less, and the gain is less as well."

Analysts said that one advantage to AT&T's strategy is that it may be able to build its high-speed network faster than Verizon, allowing it to achieve economies of scale and to negotiate discounts from content providers as it competes directly with cable companies.

Consumer groups said the AT&T-BellSouth merger would probably lead to higher prices, arguing that the telephone companies and the cable companies will effectively be a duopoly with little interest in aggressive competition.

While the consensus view among analysts was that the merger would be approved, the concentration of power could still trip some concerns on Capitol Hill or among regulators, especially when it comes to open access on the Internet.

"These companies were going to compete against each other. Instead, we have just the opposite," and that makes it all the more important to ensure that these companies don't become gatekeepers of the Internet, said Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), the ranking Democrat on the House subcommittee on telecommunications. "The United States needs open networks."

As a condition of approval for both the Verizon-MCI and SBC-AT&T mergers last year, the companies agreed not to impose restrictions on Internet traffic, which in effect would enable some programs to work better than others. That provision sunsets two years after the close of those mergers.

In recent months, Seidenberg, Whitacre and BellSouth chief technology officer Bill Smith have all said they would prefer a system that would allow the carriers to charge to carry some kinds of traffic -- statements that have prompted concern from Internet companies such as Google Inc., which rely on Internet pipes to reach consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0016607

With the latest proposed merger, critics of further consolidation say consumers, regulators and software companies should seek to codify "network neutrality" into law for all carriers.

"This time around, this merger should put media and content providers on high alert," said Jason Oxman, vice president of regulatory affairs for Comptel, an association of competitive carriers. "This could be the end of the line if the Internet community doesn't recognize the threat to the open Internet."

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin J. Martin, who initially opposed the network neutrality provisions in the earlier two mergers but voted for them in the end, did not tip his hand yesterday.

"We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services," he said in a written statement.

Qwest May Get A Buyout Nibble (USAT)

By Edward Iwata And Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 7, 2006

For months, Qwest has been considered anything but a prized acquisition target — mostly because of its heavy debt and its lack of the large-scale wireless and high-speed Internet assets that are the communications industry's engines for growth in coming years.

That view might be changing in the wake of AT&T's proposed $67 billion purchase of BellSouth.

Qwest — as well as Alltel and Sprint Nextel — could become an acquisition target, as Verizon scrambles to keep pace with AT&T, predicts analyst Ken McGee at technology consultant Gartner.

A combined AT&T and BellSouth would knock Verizon from its No. 1 perch in the industry and put it at a disadvantage in both the wireless and large-business markets, possibly forcing it to respond, says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Chris King.

McGee predicts that Qwest will garner Verizon's interest as merger bait. “They're unlikely to remain an orphan,” he says, noting that Qwest CEO Richard Notebaert has kept Qwest from a bankruptcy reorganization and appears to be slowly turning it around. “Qwest must feel awfully lonely sitting there, watching everyone else dance.”

Verizon declined comment. Qwest spokesman Robert Toevs said the company continues “to watch industry consolidation with interest.”

Qwest, which posted a $757 million loss last year, also has been plagued by heavy debt and an accounting scandal that led to shareholder lawsuits and criminal prosecutions of former executives. It tried unsuccessfully last year to buy MCI, later acquired by Verizon.

Qwest and smaller telecoms without wireless assets likely will be victims of corporate Darwinism, predicts Fariborz Ghadar, director of Penn State University's Center for Global Business Studies.

In industries such as telecom that require billions of dollars in capital and new technology, only two or three large players boast enough assets, customers and brand recognition to survive, he says.

“Consumers demand a spectrum of services, and if you can't afford to invest in that spectrum of services, you're going to be bought out,” Ghadar says.

The competition is getting brutal. If the AT&T deal is approved by regulators, Cingular Wireless — now owned jointly by AT&T and BellSouth — would increase AT&T's stock value as the company takes control of the fast-growing asset.

Verizon owns just 55% of the USA's top wireless carrier, Verizon Wireless, and has unsuccessfully tried to buy out its European partner, Vodafone. Verizon's stock would suffer relative to AT&T's if Verizon doesn't snap up the rest of Vodafone, King says. And the British company, which recently considered selling its Japanese wireless assets, might unload all its “far-flung global properties.”

In the large-business market, Verizon's MCI unit now competes head-on with market leader AT&T. AT&T's purchase of BellSouth will give it a further inroad in the corporate market in the Southeast. Robin Diedrich, an analyst at Edward Jones, says that federal antitrust regulators are likely to approve the AT&T-BellSouth deal as well as others in the telecom industry because new Internet and wireless firms are creating enough competition and choices for consumers.

Plus, Diedrich says, growing wireless companies such as Alltel appeal to investors now, as millions of consumers and more businesses favor wireless and Internet phones over old landline telephones.

Revival Of The Fittest (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016608

Just a year ago, the hallowed AT&T Inc. brand appeared to be in its twilight, on the cusp of being merged out of existence. Now, with a proposed $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., the AT&T name is about to retake its place as the biggest brand in telecommunications.

Though it's been hard to track the complicated handoff of the AT&T name in recent years, it's clear that the new AT&T is a far cry from the old "Ma Bell" company that was formed after Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876.

Before the breakup of the monopoly in 1984, there was effectively one company, AT&T, which sold telephones and supplied local and long-distance services. That was before cellular phones and the Internet. After the breakup, AT&T became a long-distance phone company. The company reached its marketing heyday during that time, with its "Reach Out and Touch Someone" advertising campaign, which promoted relatively expensive long-distance calling.

"I think it's still a slogan that people still remember," said Eli M. Noam, professor of finance and economics and director of the Institute for Tele-Information at Columbia University. "What they managed to do was maintain a reasonable market share," even in the face of competition from companies like MCI Communications Inc.

In the late 1990s, AT&T for a brief period had a host of services under its umbrella. In addition to being the largest long-distance provider, it had a wireless operation, offered cable TV services, and sold dial-up and later high-speed Internet services. Over time, the pieces were spun off or sold.

By early last year, all iterations of the AT&T brand seemed headed for the dustbin of history -- again. In 2004, AT&T Wireless was subsumed by Cingular Wireless.

Cingular's parent companies, BellSouth and SBC Communications Inc., had proposed an acquisition of AT&T, leaving no apparent heir to the name. But as marketing experts predicted, after closing its merger last year, SBC ditched its three-letter acronym for the nationally recognized AT&T name, which it now calls "the new AT&T" in its advertisements.

"It is one of the classic American brands," Noam said. "It has clearly lost some of its strength in recent years, but particularly for older Americans, the Ma Bell stands for quality and reliability."

Monopoly Concerns Resurface With Re-forming Of AT&T (SCRIPPS)

By MARY DEIBEL, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, March 7, 2006

AT&T's $67-billion bid for BellSouth seems on the surface to go a long way toward reconstituting the old telephone monopoly, but 24 years after federal trustbusters forced the breakup, it's not your father's Ma Bell anymore.

Today's era of wireless and fiber optics convergence is light years away from the competitive landscape that U.S. District Judge Harold Green confronted when he OK'd the 1982 consent decree that divided AT&T into seven regional Bell operating companies two years later.

At stake now are upstart, low-cost challenges from Internet, cable and wireless competition, telecom analysts say.

To be sure, bringing BellSouth back under the AT&T rubric will reunite four of the original Baby Bells, including SBC, Ameritech and Pacific Telesis. Others are former Bell babies Verizon - a combination of onetime East and West Coast telecom firms Bell Atlantic, Nynex and independent GTE - and the Denver-based Qwest, which is comprised primarily of former Baby Bell U.S. West.

AT&T's BellSouth acquisition also will extend the AT&T brand to No. 1 cell phone company Cingular, a joint venture by the two firms that was central to their negotiations, although growth potential may be limited when more than 80 percent of Americans already have at least one cell phone.

As important are the fiber-optic "pipes" that BellSouth has already run fiber-optic cable to many of the 14 million homes and 5 million businesses it serves in parts of nine Southeast states, including Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, North and South Carolina and Tennessee.

Unlike BellSouth, AT&T is poised to enter the video business big time with Project Lightspeed in competition with cable, broadcast and broadband. With BellSouth's fiber-optic backbone, AT&T will be able speed video, music, Internet and telecom services to customers in 22 states.

These concerns prompted consumer groups to voice opposition to this new step in the consolidation of the telephone industry on grounds the sale will provide fewer choices for customers.

But others counter that, despite the dwindling number of telephone companies, there's increased competition from other firms including onetime local cable TV monopolies and others to "bundle" Internet, video, telecom and the like.

Where there was once a single company - AT&T - offering telecommunications services locally and long-distance, telecom analyst Jeffrey Kagan now points to multiple firms offering Internet, telephone, TV and wireless service.

As for AT&T's impending roll-out of video service nationwide, offering four digital channels simultaneously, Kagan said AT&T's game plan has sent cable companies "back to the drawing board to come up with a better package of services."

DOJ_NMG_0016609

"Customers who make a move to a big telephone company or a big cable operator will do so because they're offering multiple services at a discount, or you can buy a la carte from multiple service providers if one-stop-shopping can't compete on price," Kagan said. "Unlike Ma Bell a quarter-century ago, consumers have a lot more choices today and they're growing."

Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America are not impressed and will urge the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission to reject the deal.

"Despite claims that the merger might foster competition between phone companies and cable giants, cable companies are just now entering the phone market and are not yet positioned to compete with the national phone duopoly that will exist if the merger is approved," the two groups said in a joint statement."

"The only other potential competitor - voice-over-internet phone service (VOIP) which relies on broadband connections - is threatened by the ability of the Bells and cable companies who own broadband wires to disrupt their VOIP transmissions."

Fast-growing VOIP companies including startups Skype and Vonage as well as AT&T's own CallVantage offer local and long-distance calling at cut-rate prices, now reach 4.4 million homes, up from 1 million a year ago. The Telecommunications Industry Association, a trade group of equipment makers, predicted last week that VOIP will expand to 18 million users by 2009.

Meantime, Jeff Chester, founder of the Center for Digital Democracy, worries that AT&T fees could turn the Internet into a "toll road."

"Instead of the Internet reflecting what the federal courts not long ago called 'the most participatory form of mass speech yet developed,' it's now threatened to be reduced to what AT&T called its private pipes," Chester said.

Alternately, Kagan said any attempt to turn the Internet into a toll road could spread competition for wireless Internet beyond neighborhood coffee houses and other Wi-Fi hotspots and into every home.

What The AT&T Deal Means For Consumers (WSJ)

By Shawn Young And Jessica E. Vascellaro

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

The $67 billion merger that will make BellSouth Corp. part of AT&T Inc. is expected to accelerate the battle of the bundles.

The cable industry and the phone companies are aggressively competing to attract new customers by offering attractively priced packages of home phone, Internet, cable and cellphone services. AT&T Chairman and Chief Executive Edward Whitacre has long identified $100 as a potential target price for a package of those four services. While that price hasn't been offered yet, the merger increases the pressure on the phone and cable rivals to deliver more competitive packages as a way to keep competing services from poaching customers.

Prices are already in the $100 range for packages that don't include wireless -- and industry executives expect them to come down. A larger AT&T will be able to compete more aggressively with cable companies and, after cutting costs, will likely be able to reduce prices of service packages.

Comcast Corp. is rolling out a $99 a month Internet, phone and cable bundle. The package -- currently available in parts of New England, the Philadelphia area and a few other markets -- represents about $30 off the price of purchasing each service individually. The package will soon be available elsewhere in the nation.

The basic bundles from Time Warner Inc. include digital cable, high-speed Internet, and home phone service, and range from $99 to $129.95 depending on the city. Packages are available in all 27 of the states Time Warner serves and savings start at roughly $15 a month over a la carte rates.

Bundles do benefit big spenders and those who prize convenience. But they aren't great deals for everyone. People who spend very little on wireless or long-distance might be better off cherry-picking from different companies. And consumer advocates caution that customers shouldn't add services they don't already use just because they are cheaper in a package.

Another issue for consumers: Bundle prices often are introductory rates that will rise after a set amount of time. AT&T, for instance, increases its high-speed Internet price to $30 from $13 a month after the first year. The prices also don't include the taxes and fees that can add 20% or more to the total bill.

Bundling is still something of a novelty for consumers, though it is slowly catching on. In 2004, only 8% of consumers surveyed by Forrester Research, a consulting firm based in Cambridge, Mass., had a package of video, Internet and voice service from their phone or cable company, but by late last year 11% were buying packages.

For the companies that sell bundles, the goal is a more loyal customer and a larger share of that customer's spending. Customers who take several products together are much less likely to defect just because a rival offers a slightly better price. A survey by Yankee Group, a Boston-based consulting firm, found that 84% of households that got a package of Internet and video services from their cable company were satisfied with their carrier, compared with 67% of households without the bundle. Still, the survey found that some customers become willing to switch for savings of $15 a month or more.

DOJ_NMG_0016610

Phone and cable companies have been locked in an intensifying battle as phone companies expand into video and cable companies start to offer phone service. The prize is the potential to provide all of a household's communications services. Bundle offers can be a way for service providers to cut off a competitor's link to the consumer's home altogether.

Cablevision Systems Corp. offers all its subscribers an introductory package of voice, cable and high-speed Internet for $89.85 a month. After a year, the price climbs to around $115. A la carte prices are $44.95 for Internet, $34.95 for voice and roughly $55 for digital cable. Verizon Communications Corp. offers packages that start at around $89.89 for home phone, high-speed Internet and satellite TV service.

AT&T has a four-way deal that includes wireless for $121 a month. The merger could make it easier for AT&T to extend its bundled offers, says company spokesman Michael Coe. The merger will give AT&T full control of the Cingular Wireless venture that is now a joint venture between AT&T and BellSouth.

Packages are convenient and can be good deals for consumers who already spend a lot on communications and entertainment. Bundles that now mostly appeal to consumers on the basis of price and convenience could develop into truly integrated services with features like cellphones that automatically become home-phone extensions when plugged into a base station at home, caller ID that is displayed on the TV screen, or video recorders that can be programmed with a cellphone.

Not all consumers stand to benefit from service packages, however, and many consumer advocates fear that the phone and cable companies will eventually become so large that they essentially can dictate prices. Bill Hardekopf, chief executive of SaveOnPhone.com, a consumer Web site, believes that consumers who spend little on long distance or wireless won't benefit from packages. One of the only alternatives will be through Internet-based phone services. Vonage Holdings Corp. and the Skype Technologies unit of eBay Inc. offer cheaper prices for Internet-based home phone service than most phone or cable companies. Vonage offers unlimited local and long-distance service in the U.S. and Canada for $24.99 a month with minimal taxes and fees. Internet-based services often can't offer full-service 911 and won't work if the power or Internet connection fails. Customers must already have high-speed Internet service.

Some of the current package offers that combine TV, phone and Internet service.

The Telecoms Strike Back (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull And Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, March 7, 2006

BOSTON AND NEW YORK - Changes in the communications industry are spawning vast new choices - but not necessarily lower bills - for American consumers who dial, click, and channel surf.

Cellphones now carry video as well as voice. The Internet can be used for phone calls as well as data downloading. And television is fast becoming a digital medium, where content can be stored and retrieved anytime, not according to a schedule in "TV Guide."

This is the "digital convergence" of communication platforms that telecom and cable companies have long been trying to create. The process holds great promise but means more volatility for consumers and firms.

The latest jolt is this week's announcement by AT&T that it plans to acquire BellSouth Corp. Together, the firms would create the world's biggest telecommunications company in terms of market capitalization and combine many of the pieces of the old "Ma Bell" that in 1984 was broken into eight pieces by an antitrust settlement.

Indeed, for all the new competition, the scale of this $67 billion deal is just one sign of the market clout that telecom and cable companies still retain. The word monopoly no longer applies. But Americans are spending more than ever on communications services, and regulators still have a role to play as guardians of competition, consumer advocates say.

"The average consumer today wakes up with only two choices for full-service broadband communications, which is the future: the telephone company and the cable company," says Mark Cooper of the Consumer Federation of America in Washington. "What we've gone from is a regulated monopoly to an unregulated duopoly."

Other observers argue that, by and large, the marketplace is fulfilling its competitive promise.

What's clear to all, however, is that businesses are adapting quickly - with much of the focus for both companies and regulators now on how traditional phone companies will compete with cable TV providers in offering new services.

For their part, AT&T and BellSouth are positioning their planned merger as a win for consumers - and a way to go head to head with the cable industry.

"Together, we will lead the way into a new era of converged and bundled communications, video, and entertainment services," AT&T chairman Edward Whitacre said in a statement Sunday announcing the deal.

The companies would offer wireless service (through the Cingular brand), Internet, and traditional telephony with a dominant presence throughout the South and Midwest, and increasingly video services as well.

The pattern on prices varies from platform to platform.

DOJ_NMG_0016611

"There's definitely some downward pressure" on prices for traditional phone service, thanks in part to new choices for making calls over the Internet, says Joe Laszlo, a senior analyst at Jupiter Research in New York. Wireless, too, is a "robustly competitive" market, he says, with customers paying less per minute as their usage continues to rise.

Online, the pattern is more subtle, with basic broadband rates steady even while special offers are pitched to new users.

Cable TV, many observers say, is an area where prices have tended to keep rising over the years, making that industry a source of particular scrutiny. One idea under review at the Federal Communications Commission: making companies offer "a la carte" services so customers can buy only the channels they want to watch.

Such plans might cut customer costs, some studies suggest.

But the overall trend is that communications of various sorts have been garnering a growing share of the time and money of the typical consumer. "I don't know how much further that can go," Mr. Laszlo says.

Some say companies will find themselves competing intensely for business.

But consumer advocates argue that regulatory vigilance remains much needed.

In particular, they contend the proposed AT&T-BellSouth merger is anticompetitive and will end up leading to higher prices, fewer choices and less innovation, just what the 1984 breakup of Ma Bell was supposed to prevent.

"They couldn't put Humpty Dumpty back together again, but they're putting Ma Bell back together again," says Edmund Mierzwinski, the consumer program director at US Public Interest Research Group in Washington.

He and other consumer advocates have pledged to fight the deal at the Justice Department, the Federal Trade Commission, and the FCC. They contend that while the merger will not create a monopoly situation for phone service, it will eventually lead to a duopoly with each phone giant controlling a series of services in different parts of the country.

"This one is about the future of communication writ large," Mr. Mierzwinski says. "It's not just about telephone service, it's about the Internet, the delivery of video and about all of the convergences that have been occurring."

Consumers can now watch TV on their cellphones, call a neighbor over their cable line, or hook up to the Internet over the phone lines. In that sense there is more choice. But it doesn't necessarily mean many choices of which company provides the services.

The upshot, some consumer advocates say, is a situation where prices have fallen on some services, but consumers often have to buy a bundle of services from the same company to get the best deals.

"If you're a consumer who can afford to spend $200 or $250 a month on communications services, then maybe your total costs have come down," says Jeannine Kenney, a Consumer's Union analyst in Washington. "The reality is now that competition is all about the bundle of services, and each company has a vested interest in maximizing sales of bundled services within their own territory."

The AT&T-BellSouth deal is hardly the first. AT&T already incorporates other former "Baby Bells" Ameritech and SBC. And consumer groups are keeping a close eye on whether past mergers are resulting in higher or lower prices.

Some consumer groups believe it's too soon to see the effects of mergers on long-distance services. For example, last fall, the Ohio Consumers' Counsel, a residential consumer advocate, argued against the SBC and AT&T merger unless the companies agreed to cap its basic rates for three years and cap the price of such features as call waiting and call forwarding.

"Most of the recommendations were not implemented and we believe residential customers are not getting their share of the benefits," says Ryan Lippe, a spokesman. "Consolidation often means fewer choices for customers."

In fact, Tuesday, the Public Utilities Commission of Ohio is expected to vote on changes of regulation for basic local phone service. "We could be seeing the potential for companies to increase their prices for just a dial tone," says Mr. Lippe. "If the proposed rules go into effect, a company like SBC could come in and become eligible to raise prices by as much as 20 percent per year."

However, it's not a given that a company will get a price hike, he adds. "We could still advocate for consumers."

AT& T Deal Puts Focus On Net Fees (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, March 7, 2006

AT&T's proposed purchase of BellSouth gave fresh ammunition Monday to critics of a push by the big local phone companies to charge websites fees to ensure fast delivery of their content.

Even before the deal, AT&T and BellSouth discussed plans to charge Internet-based phone company Vonage, Google and other Web providers new fees to ensure speedy delivery of their phone calls, video or other content. Though proposals in Congress would bar phone companies from blocking access to rival websites, none would prohibit their offering enhanced services.

DOJ_NMG_0016612

The question of whether an even bigger AT&T should have to comply with Internet non-discrimination principles is expected to take center stage as consumer advocates urge regulators to reject the deal. Some rivals say arguments for such restraints are bolstered by the clout a bigger AT&T customer base would have. “Arguably, there's less competition as a result of these mergers,” says Paul Meisner of Amazon.

Consumer groups also fear the $67 billion deal will hamper competition for wireless and large business customers, driving up prices.

Yet while the proposed merger faces tough regulatory scrutiny, most analysts say the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission will approve it with only minor conditions.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin says the agency will examine “any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits” for new services.

“It'll get through relatively easily with light conditions,” says Stifel Nicolaus analyst Blair Levin.

But there will be fallout. AT&T plans to cut 10,000 jobs, or about 3% of its new workforce, largely through attrition as it achieves more than $2 billion in cost savings.

The merger creates a behemoth with 70 million wire-line customers and 54 million wireless subscribers. Local phone companies such as AT&T now face their biggest competitive threats in residential service from wireless companies, cable companies and Internet-based phone companies.

Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union says the deal gives Cingular Wireless, jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth, even less reason to offer its wireless service as a replacement for home phone service. The new company should have to divest Cingular, he says.

But Levin says it will be tough for regulators to justify tougher conditions than those placed on the SBC-AT&T and Verizon-MCI mergers. So AT&T-BellSouth might have to promise it won't block rival Net-based phone services or websites, among other things. It also will likely have to sell fiber lines serving some businesses, Levin says.

Battle Lines For Cable Giants, AT&T Deal Is One More Reason To Worry (WSJ)

By Peter Grant And Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

The picture just got fuzzier for the cable-TV industry, a once-mighty monopoly now under assault by new technology and corporate mergers.

Even before AT&T Inc.'s planned $67 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp. -- a deal that would create the world's biggest phone company -- cable companies were under growing pressure. Their stocks have steadily declined amid investor alarm at new competition from satellite and phone companies. The explosion of video on the Internet is conjuring up a future when a cable middleman may no longer be necessary. Regulators are pushing the industry on decency issues and pricing policies.

And cable's once-commanding lead in the sale of high-speed Internet connections has eroded as telephone companies have steeply discounted competing offers. Cable used to enjoy a two-thirds market share, but in the past year telephone companies have picked up more new customers than cable operators did.

Comcast Corp., the U.S.'s largest cable operator with more than 21 million subscribers, saw its stock fall 22% in 2005. While it has picked up a little bit of ground this year, it's still down 17% from the beginning of 2004. Mediacom Communications Corp., the No. 7 operator, is down 33% from the beginning of 2004. Charter Communications Inc., No. 4, is down 72%.

Now the AT&T megadeal could create the largest competitor yet for cable operators in the new race to sell packages of phone, TV and Internet services. Among phone companies, AT&T already had the most aggressive plans for pushing into the TV and broadband markets. Adding BellSouth's customers would lift AT&T's annual sales to $120 billion in 22 states, giving the company cash and scale to pursue its strategy nationwide. AT&T already is planning to streamline its operations. It announced yesterday plans to cut 10,000 jobs following its purchase of BellSouth.

The likely result for cable operators: more pressure to cut prices for high-speed Internet and slower growth of price increases for television. Cable companies also may have to increase capital spending to keep up with the new TV technology the phone companies are planning. In November, Comcast's stock fell 5% after it raised its estimated 2005 capital spending to $3.5 billion from an earlier prediction of $3.2 billion to $3.3 billion.

Consolidation in the telephone industry could put pressure on cable operators to get bigger as well. Both Comcast and the cable unit of Time Warner Inc. are expected to bulk up later this year when they divide up the systems of Adelphia Communications Corp., which has been operating under bankruptcy protection. As part of that deal, Time Warner Cable will issue public stock, giving it a currency for future acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0016613

Cable operators are hoping that, at least in the short term, a merger of AT&T and BellSouth would slow AT&T's launch of TV service. They point out that for months, if not years, management's attention will likely be focused on integrating the two companies.

Meanwhile, the cable companies aren't standing still. Comcast has greatly increased its video-on-demand offerings with ambitious plans to offer a library equivalent to 5,000 hours of movies, programs and other features by year's end. Large cable operators are also pushing into a wide range of other new technologies that will give them interactive commercials and many of the other features that AT&T is planning.

"There's not a thing that [phone companies] can offer that we can't offer to our customers as well," Steve Burke, Comcast's chief operating officer, said yesterday after the AT&T deal with BellSouth was announced.

WSJ's Dennis Berman discusses10 the impact of AT&T's $67 billion deal to buy BellSouth. · Plus, WSJ's Almar Latour, Julie Ask of Jupiter Research and Om Malik of Business 2.011 discuss the possible effects of an AT&T-BellSouth merger on the telecoms sector.

The cable industry, like the phone business, has been in upheaval for years, as both try to jam more services through their pipelines into America's homes. While telephone companies have been planning to move into the TV business, cable operators have been racing to offer phone service. Late last year, a venture of Sprint Nextel Corp. and a consortium of cable operators including Comcast, Time Warner and Cox Communications Inc. announced plans to offer wireless phone service together.

The cable guys have notched some victories. While phone giants like AT&T and Verizon Communications Inc. have barely launched television service, cable companies already provide phone service to more than five million U.S. subscribers. The cable-phone business is expected to grow even more this year because Comcast is launching the service on a massive scale.

"Cable operators have been able to prove their ability to compete and adapt to a changing environment," says Michael Willner, chief executive of Insight Communications Co., the country's eighth-largest cable operator. "The cable market is oversold [by Wall Street] because of unwarranted fears."

Cable enjoyed an early lead in the race to sell high-speed Internet connections. By moving faster than phone companies with a more attractive and problem-free product, cable companies dominated the early business.

Aggressive Strategy

But about two years ago, phone companies embarked on an aggressive strategy to grab market share through steep price cuts. Last year was the first full year that telephone companies added more broadband subscribers than cable operators -- 5.2 million vs. 4.4 million -- according to Leichtman Research Group Inc. The market share of the top cable providers has been whittled down to about 57%, according to Leichtman.

Telephone companies also currently enjoy a clear edge in the wireless business. A merger of AT&T and BellSouth would strengthen AT&T's hand in wireless because the companies are co-owners of Cingular Wireless. With a single owner, Cingular will be freed up from the conflicts that occur when a company has to serve two masters.

Meanwhile, the cable industry's wireless venture with Sprint is facing delays. When it was announced late last year, executives predicted that the service would be launched in the first half of 2006; now, they are saying it will be in the second half of the year. A spokeswoman for the venture, Melinda Tiemeyer, pointed out that the venture involves numerous companies and requires "a lot of different areas coming together" like marketing, retail and the actual product.

Satellite continues to pose a formidable threat, with Rupert Murdoch's DirecTV Group Inc. planning to offer more than 150 national high-definition channels by 2007, as well as 1,500 local high-definition channels, surpassing what most cable companies can currently offer. Satellite operators have more than 27 million subscribers, compared with about 66 million cable customers.

Many investors saw a powerful signal when Comcast made its unsuccessful bid to buy Walt Disney Co. in 2004. The message they read: Comcast believed that TV distribution wasn't enough to sustain its growth, and it needed more TV content. While Comcast executives have vehemently denied this, the company's stock has mostly stayed well below $33.93 price it hit the day before it announced the Disney bid. Comcast's shares were down 11 cents at $27.06 in 4 p.m. trading yesterday on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Before AT&T announced its plans to buy BellSouth, the phone giant said it planned to offer its own television service to 18 million homes by the first half of 2008. AT&T also is planning to beef up its alliance with satellite-TV operator EchoStar Communications Corp. by offering consumers a service, named HomeZone, that combines satellite TV with movies, programs and other on-demand content off the Internet.

It is still unclear whether AT&T will be able to execute its TV plans. So far, it is offering its TV service only in San Antonio and some experts are skeptical that the company will be able to move ahead with a broad rollout later this year. AT&T and EchoStar already are months behind in their plans to launch HomeZone.

Starting in the 1970s and 1980s, cable operators shook up the television industry by offering better reception and racier fare than the traditional networks, which are beholden to federal decency standards because their signals travel over government-granted airwaves. The cable industry also benefited from local monopolies, painstakingly negotiated one market at a time across the country.

But in the converging worlds of telecommunications and media, cable's competitors increasingly are the better-connected telephone giants, which have maneuvered through the federal legislative and regulatory landscape for decades.

Since taking over a year ago from Michael Powell, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has ordered several major reviews of the cable business. The commission recently issued a report suggesting consumers would have lower cable bills if cable operators offered channels using an "a la carte" lineup -- selling individual channels rather than a prepackaged bundle. It is also examining whether to cap the cable giants' ability to extend their reach through mergers. FCC action on either of those issues would require congressional action.

An effort to force the cable giants to meet the same decency requirements as broadcasters has failed so far in Congress. But in response, the cable companies have offered new family-friendly packages of programming. The new packages haven't been well-received in Washington because they don't include ESPN or other popular channels. FCC Chairman Martin has continued to keep up pressure on the industry.

Meanwhile, as soon as this week, key House lawmakers could release a draft of a bill that would help clear the way for the Bells to get into the cable-television business. Essentially, the bill is expected to establish national video franchises. That would allow the phone companies to avoid having to seek permission from local governments to offer video service in their communities.

Separately, Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain is planning to introduce a cable "a la carte" bill this month. That legislation may not get very far, but Mr. McCain's presidential aspirations could easily result in the proposal ending up as at least part of any potential campaign platform.

Fighting Back

In the cities where phone giants have invaded cable's turf, cable companies are fighting back with aggressive pricing packages. Cablevision Systems Corp., facing competition in the New York region from Verizon, is offering new customers the first year of phone, cable and high-speed Internet service for about $90 a month. Insight Communications introduced a similar package about a year ago and is still evaluating what to charge customers once their initial discount period burns off. "We're packaging aggressively and getting more customers for it," Mr. Willner says.

In Keller, Texas, the first city where Verizon offered TV service, the local cable operator, Charter Communications, dropped the price of a package of TV and broadband services to $50 a month from $100 for the first year. Verizon recently announced that 23% of the Keller market is now taking its TV service, which charges $39.95 for 180 channels, $34.95 if the subscriber also takes Verizon's broadband service. A Charter spokeswoman said its special offer, which recently was increased by $10 a month, was partly a response to satellite competition.

Cable companies also have come out with new ways to hold on to customers who are about to switch providers. Time Warner Cable typically charges $39.95 a month for its broadband service for subscribers who also take its TV service. If customers call to disconnect their broadband, they're offered a slower service for $29.95 a month.

Time Warner doesn't generally advertise the lower priced service, says Mark Harrad, a company spokesman. "It's a save tactic," he says.

Consumer Groups To Oppose AT&T Purchase (AP)

By EILEEN ALT POWELL, AP Business Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK — Several of the nation's largest consumer groups said Monday they would oppose AT&T's purchase of BellSouth Corp., arguing that the deal will reduce competition and drive up prices in the telecommunications industry.

Consumers Union and the Consumer Federation of America said they would urge the Justice Department to block AT&T Inc.'s $67 billion offer.

The consumer groups also asked their members to contact the Federal Communications Commission, which must approve the acquisition, and to petition their congressmen to try to prevent the deal from going through.

If approved, the combined company would become one of the largest telecommunications operators in the world and include Cingular Wireless LLC, the nation's largest wireless operator. Cingular today is jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth.

The consumer groups warned that increasing consolidation in the telephone industry would boost the prices for local, long-distance and cell phone services. They added that more-limited choices for phone service — along with a similar merger trend in the cable industry — threatened to reduce the variety of broadband Internet services available to consumers.

"If approved, this merger will lead to higher local, long-distance and cell phone prices for consumers across the country," said Gene Kimmelman, a vice president of Consumers Union, which is headquartered in Yonkers, N.Y.

DOJ_NMG_0016615

At the very least, Kimmelman said, federal regulators should "require the merging companies to sell their Cingular wireless business to create more opportunities for competition between wireless and wireline services."

Mark Cooper, director of research for the Consumer Federation of America in Washington, D.C., said consumers should be worried that the promise of broadband Internet technologies was being compromised by consolidation in both the telephone and cable industries. Those companies control the circuits on which data, television and phone communications move.

"We've been through a series of mergers that have reconstructed most of the old Ma Bell system," Cooper said, referring to the historic 1984 government breakup of the old AT&T monopoly into seven "baby bell" telephone providers.

The phone companies have argued that they face growing competition from cable companies, which have been getting into the phone market and offering an increasing array of broadband services, such as high-speed Internet access.

Randall Stephenson, AT&T's chief operating officer, told analysts Monday that AT&T already was feeling competitive pressure, saying the phone company has to tailor its prices to reflect those of local cable companies.

"We're finding that we're having to be far more targeted in our pricing based on who the competitor is in a particular market," he said. "I don't see that effect changing as we bring BellSouth into this equation."

But the CFA's Cooper said consolidation in both the phone and cable industries meant "that when consumers wake up in the morning, they have two choices for a full-service broadband network, telephone and cable."

He called it "an unregulated duopoly" and added: "Every consumer knows that two is not enough for real competition."

Jeff Chester, executive director of the Center for Digital Democracy in Washington, D.C., which promotes democratic access to broadband, fears that companies the size of a merged AT&T-BellSouth will have the heft to become "a virtual toll booth" on the Internet.

That's because the communications industry is moving to broadband, which allows voice, data, video and mobile communications to move over a single wire.

"The cable industry and the phone industry have the same business model, which is to begin charging increasing fees to consumers for using broadband communication," Chester said.

At the same time, he argues, they have the ability to give priority on their circuits to "premium" services or to companies with which they have alliances. This will make it harder for new technologies to emerge, because they will have trouble getting access to the delivery system.

"We need to make a stand today," Chester said. "If we allow them to turn today's Internet into a digital dirt road while only they and their partners can run lightening-fast operations, you won't see competition."

Bill Hardekopf, chief executive of the SaveonPhone.com long-distance search site, said the sheer size of the combined AT&T-BellSouth company was likely to be a red flag to federal regulators.

"This company will have a tremendous amount of market share and say as to what goes on in the industry," Hardekopf said. "To have that much of a share and that much of a voice in one company cannot be healthy for consumers."

In fact, the merged company would have 70 million local-line phone customers, 54.1 million wireless subscribers and nearly 10 million broadband subscribers in nearly two dozen states.

"This is not a done deal," Hardekopf said. "Regulators can still block it for competitive reasons."

Is Antitrust No Longer The Issue? (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — As head of the Federal Communications Commission during the Clinton administration, Reed E. Hundt killed talks about a possible merger in 1997 when he said that a proposed deal between AT&T and SBC would be "unthinkable" under antitrust laws.

Last year those two companies combined with little resistance. And on Monday Mr. Hundt said that AT&T's proposal to buy BellSouth for $67 billion was "eminently thinkable," and that if he were still at the commission, "I would bless the deal."

His statement was a sign of how far the regulatory climate, as well as the marketplace, has traveled in less than a decade, as the cable and phone industries have gotten into each other's businesses and new forms of phone service have grown.

While government officials and industry lobbyists say the AT&T-BellSouth deal faces few regulatory obstacles, those same changes in the marketplace may bring different political headwinds.

The deal threatens to undermine parts of the telephone industry's broader regulatory and legislative agenda by making it more difficult for the industry to claim it badly needs relief from regulators and Congress.

The Bell telephone companies have lobbied hard for the last year to get Congress to adopt a measure that would make it easier for them to offer video services. The phone companies want federal legislation that would pre-empt local authority over such services. (The cable industry has fought equally hard against the measure.) That fight is central to the telephone companies' new strategy of offering video service to compete head-on with cable and satellite companies that offer paid television services.

As Internet service providers, the large phone companies are meanwhile involved in a political fight over whether they must offer equal access to all Web providers, an approach called "Net neutrality." Content providers like Google and Yahoo, and companies providing Internet-based phone service like Vonage, seek legislation to prevent phone companies from favoring their own Web sites and those offered by their partners, over rivals and Internet phone companies.

While the phone companies fight that move, they are also battling legislative efforts to make it easier for municipalities to offer free wireless Internet services.

But the continued consolidation of the telephone industry that the latest deal contemplates gives the phone companies' opponents significant political leverage in all three debates — and for the time being, could make it harder for AT&T and Verizon, the two largest phone companies, to prevail on all fronts.

"The reverberations at first will be subterranean, but they will be of earthquake proportions," Mr. Hundt said.

The cable industry, awaiting regulatory approval of its own major consolidation in which Time Warner and Comcast expect to divide up Adelphia, was quick Monday to point out the perils of a consolidating telephone industry. But Verizon, signaling that it will not raise major objections to the BellSouth deal, issued a statement that called it "logical and predictable." And Kevin J. Martin, the chairman of the F.C.C., issued a noncommittal statement.

"The F.C.C.'s primary responsibility is to determine whether the proposed transaction is in the best interest of consumers," Mr. Martin said. "We will carefully weigh the information presented, examining any allegations of specific harm in individual markets and the potential benefits for the deployment of new services."

The agency will be considering what conditions to impose on the deal in a process that could take as long as a year.

The AT&T-BellSouth deal provides a vehicle for regulators and lawmakers to consider what to do in the "Net neutrality" debate and whether the telephone companies can charge more money for certain content providers. The issue came to national attention in November when Edward E. Whitacre Jr., the blunt-speaking leader of AT&T, complained in an interview in Business Week Online about the current state of affairs.

"We and the cable companies have made an investment, and for Google or Yahoo or Vonage or anybody to expect to use these pipes free is nuts," Mr. Whitacre said.

In the same interview, Mr. Whitacre was asked whether it was possible that his company would ever acquire BellSouth.

"It sure would be nice, but it doesn't have much chance of happening because of market power, size, etc.," he replied. "I think it would be real hard to do. I don't think the regulators would let that happen, in my judgment."

While AT&T seems to have overcome that concern, lobbyists and others in the industry said Monday that there would be pressure on regulators to impose conditions assuring that consumers continue to have unfettered access to the Internet, and precluding discrimination by AT&T against companies like Google and Yahoo.

Any new rules, however, might not prevent phone companies from offering a more expensive tier of service providing faster Internet access for the transfer of video and other large files.

In the case of the video-franchise legislation, the telephone companies in recent weeks had begun to see progress on favorable legislation in the House that could be derailed by the deal.

Wasting no time, the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, the cable industry lobbying and trade organization, sent a letter to top lawmakers on Monday arguing against legislation that would remove local control over the introduction of video services by the Bell companies.

The cable industry, having put together its franchises city by city, contends that the phone companies should face the same hurdles for video delivery.

"It is important to take stock of where we are in 2006," said the letter from Kyle McSlarrow, president and chief executive of the association. "In the last decade, the Bell monopolies have all but wiped out their telephone competitors; they have swallowed their long-distance competitors; and with the announcement of the AT&T-BellSouth merger, they are on the verge of recreating Ma Bell. And only one competitor really stands in their way: the cable industry."

Next Step In Phone Deal: P.R. (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And Anne Marie Squeo

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As AT&T Inc. and BellSouth Corp. make the case for their $67 billion merger, they'll be counting on their vaunted lobbying clout to win over skeptical lawmakers and regulators.

Their efforts could be complicated by two factors: The changing makeup of the Federal Communications Commission and a push to rewrite the landmark 1996 telecommunications law.

DOJ_NMG_0016617

In a statement yesterday, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said the agency would "carefully weigh" the deal. Regulatory experts say that given Mr. Martin's push last year to impose minimal conditions on SBC Communications Inc.'s purchase of AT&T Corp. and Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI, it would be surprising if he reversed his stance.

Mr. Martin, though, represents just one vote on a five-member commission. The two Democrats likely will cast a skeptical eye toward such a transaction, especially given talk by phone companies to charge technology companies extra to guarantee speedy delivery on their networks. And the Bells may not be able to count on Mr. Martin's two Republican colleagues because of a shift in the makeup of the commission.

Deborah Taylor Tate is a Republican commissioner sworn in earlier this year. Ms. Tate is a former Tennessee regulator who remains largely an unknown figure in Washington. Ms. Tate, whose term expires in June 2007, has kept her home in Tennessee and is expected to return there and possibly run for office, so she may not want to adopt a position that is perceived as anticonsumer.

The other Republican seat is vacant. President Bush has nominated veteran telecommunications attorney Robert McDowell to fill that slot. Mr. McDowell is assistant general counsel for Comptel, a group that represents small phone companies that have fought pitched battles with the Bells over access rates and interconnection issues.

It would be unwise to assume Mr. McDowell might automatically side with small companies while considering conditions for the merger, says Earl Comstock, chief executive at Comptel. "He's good at representing his client."

Mr. McDowell faces a confirmation hearing Thursday in the Senate and is expected to be questioned by senators about his thoughts on competition and the need for some sort of "Internet neutrality" legislation, which says consumers can use the Internet as they choose and network owners can't slow or discriminate against rivals' data traffic. If his confirmation drags on and the commission is deadlocked, it can't approve the AT&T-BellSouth transaction.

Another element muddying the waters is the looming rewrite of the nation's telecommunications law. The current laws were written in 1996 when most consumers relied on traditional telephones for local and long-distance calling. Now, wireless phone and Internet phones are taking up a greater share of the market, which has led phone companies to seek new revenue streams, notably pay-TV service, to replace that lost business.

There are all kinds of new issues on the table because of increased reliance on the Internet. The phone companies were looking to Congress to make it easier to launch video services across the country by adopting a national video franchising requirement, which would allow phone companies to avoid seeking permission from local authorities to offer pay-TV services.

Former Rep. Thomas Bliley, one of the key authors of the 1996 Telecom Act, sees competition among traditional phone, wireless and cable as the future. "But right now, the only meaningful choice other than the Verizons and AT&Ts, especially for business customers," are small phone companies, he said. "Many of these companies are spending billions to build their own networks. And if we move too fast, these companies could get shut out and business and residential customers would have less choice."

Business customers protested last year's big deals, saying they would further consolidate the industry and result in higher prices for high-volume data lines. "When I'm at home, I have choices. At least it's a duopoly of phone and cable. In the enterprise market, we don't have any choices," said Brian Moir, a Washington attorney who represents large corporate users of telecom services and wants regulators to impose conditions, as part of the deal, to protect business customers.

Sen. Daniel Inouye (D., Hawaii), the top Democrat on the Senate Commerce Committee yesterday said that the proposed recombination "will call into question our commitment to promote competition in the communications marketplace and to preserve fair rules that guarantee nondiscriminatory access to new services."

In a statement, he said that "coming only 125 days after the FCC's approval of the SBC-AT&T merger, AT&T's proposal to purchase BellSouth would remove yet another potential competitor from the communications marketplace and calls into question whether the future of communications policy will be marked by strategies to promote vigorous competition or by further efforts to facilitate new mergers."

Philip Verveer, who filed the lawsuit that led to the 1984 breakup of the Bell System monopoly, said he doesn't expect the Justice Department to block the deal. "This is a reassembly of many of the pieces we worked to take apart, but the circumstances are completely different today," said Mr. Verveer, now a partner at Willkie Farr & Gallagher in Washington.

Mr. Verveer, though, said he expects the FCC to require that AT&T agree to accept the "net neutrality" nondiscrimination principles pledged to the FCC last fall as a condition of the SBC-AT&T deal.

In the end much will depend on AT&T's government-relations executives. Indeed, lobbyists in town frequently remark that one of the best elements of SBC's purchase of AT&T was its inheritance of AT&T's lobbying shop, which has deep relationships with Republicans and Democrats.

Jim Cicconi, a Texan with close ties to President Bush, was the head of AT&T's Washington office before its acquisition. Afterward, he bypassed SBC's team to become the senior executive vice president of external and legislative affairs for the combined company. He served in both the Reagan and first Bush administrations and is close to James Baker and former President George H.W. Bush.

BellSouth's Washington operation isn't too shabby either. Led by Herschel Abbott Jr., who has been with the company since 1991, BellSouth has been a force in key issues in the telecom industry. Mr. Abbott played a critical role in persuading the White House in mid-2004 not to appeal a court ruling about fees the Bells charged others to lease access to their local-phone networks. Recently, BellSouth tried to persuade lawmakers to launch a narrowly focused telecom rewrite that only addressed the video franchising issue.

Two Young Men Likely To Play Big Roles In Telecom Giant (WSJ)

By Dionne Searcey

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Over the years, AT&T Inc. chairman Edward Whitacre and BellSouth Corp. chief executive Duane Ackerman had talked many times about a deal before they finally agreed to the largest one in the history of the U.S. telecommunications industry.

In two years, though, both likely will be retired.

Before the deal Randall Stephenson, AT&T's chief operating officer, and Mark Feidler, who held the same title at BellSouth, were widely acknowledged to be the heirs apparent of their respective companies once their bosses retire. While it is likely they will play significant leadership roles in the combined company, analysts and investors believe that Mr. Stephenson has the inside track to be chief executive.

"Randall is clearly the anointed one within AT&T and Mark as the No. 2 in BellSouth needs to know that he'll have to be No. 2 or 3 in the new entity," says a consultant who has worked with both companies.

Both men declined to be interviewed yesterday. But people familiar with the situation say that Mr. Stephenson, who has spent his 24-year career with the company mainly overseeing telecom finances, and Mr. Feidler, a former corporate lawyer and investment banker, have both been supporters of a deal between BellSouth and AT&T. The two executives have a good working relationship and already have one deal in common. They both helped negotiate the Cingular Wireless acquisition of AT&T Wireless. BellSouth and AT&T own Cingular in a joint venture.

Mr. Feidler, 49, a graduate of Vanderbilt Law School who joined BellSouth in 1991, is known for getting into the nitty-gritty of the business. Associates say he has an excellent, almost impish sense of humor. He isn't a practical joker but is known for his wit, and he makes it clear he doesn't take himself or his situation too seriously.

"Mark is probably the smartest guy in whatever room he's in. He's a strategic thinker with a giant brain," says a former consultant who has also worked with both companies. "Unfortunately, I don't think he has a shot at the top job."

What has endeared Mr. Stephenson, 45 years old, to Wall Street is a blunt and charismatic style. He has been a patient and competent sideman to Mr. Whitacre and is known for his rapid recall of matters at hand. Like Mr. Whitacre, he is a very hands-on manager and focused on the minutiae of his business. He is known as a gentleman and is popular with the upper-echelon of management at AT&T.

In an era of new regulations, many executives and companies have become tight-lipped and stick to scripts. But Mr. Stephenson, who holds a master's degree in accounting from the University of Oklahoma, always makes an effort to explain issues and to be as forthcoming as possible, analysts who have dealt with him say.

"He's not the kind of executive who says I'll get back to you on that," says one telecom analyst who has met with him frequently.

A loyal lieutenant to Mr. Whitacre, Mr. Stephenson nevertheless pushed the company to change and was a proponent of the Cingular deal with BellSouth, the consultant said. He was also a proponent the decision of AT&T to have a presence in Hollywood near the content providers for its Internet television venture, Project Lightspeed, the consultant said.

Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Feidler are energetic executives approaching the prime of their careers, but they must still answer to and take direction from a chief executive who is for now firmly in charge. Their roots are starkly different from Mr. Whitacre, 64, and Mr. Ackerman, 63, both of whom started at the bottom of the phone business, working on equipment in the field, before ascending through the executive ranks.

And as much as Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Feidler pushed for the deal between AT&T and BellSouth, it was still Mr. Whitacre who finally convinced Mr. Ackerman to sign. "Ed and Duane largely did the deals themselves. The key meetings were those guys one-on-one," said one person familiar with the deal.

Mr. Ackerman and Mr. Whitacre have a great deal of respect for one another and share a cultural affinity for one another's similar telecom backgrounds. After many attempts at a deal through the years Mr. Ackerman finally relented because he found his company in somewhat of a pickle. SBC Communications had acquired AT&T Corp. and all its enterprise assets to become AT&T Inc., and Verizon had taken over the business assets of MCI Inc. Suddenly, BellSouth had two major competitors who could sell a better package of services to companies in its own backyard. The two men met a handful of times to discuss terms of the deal, but there wasn't much wrangling. Their companies' stocks have been trading at roughly similar prices and because they had contemplated a deal for so long there wasn't much to haggle over.

DOJ_NMG_0016619

Mr. Whitacre is known as an operator. He is a master of the deal and a broker who has honed his skills at timing with his many acquisitions through the years. His board members trust him implicitly and he can assemble them rapidly if he wants to move fast on a deal.

It has long been assumed that the gentlemanly, restrained Mr. Ackerman would end his career by finally relinquishing his longstanding caution about the deal-making that has transformed the industry while BellSouth stayed close to its regional roots. Since the late 1990s BellSouth flirted with several deals but always backed away. The company bid unsuccessfully against the former WorldCom Inc. for Sprint Corp. several years ago and later held talks with both MCI and AT&T Corp.

Last year, according to people familiar with the situation, Mr. Ackerman approached Mr. Whitacre about a merger deal that would have split BellSouth into separate directories, landline and wireless businesses. Mr. Whitacre declined, these people say. Officials from neither company could confirm that situation. Mr. Whitacre was unhappy when BellSouth tried to pursue a takeover of AT&T, people familiar with that situation say. Mr. Ackerman backed off, and Mr. Whitacre, then chief executive of SBC Communications Inc., bought AT&T, they added. That deal was only completed five months ago.

It had been expected that Mr. Whitacre would retire close to November, when he turns 65. His associates said he wasn't ready to retire, and, last week AT&T's board extended his contract until spring 2008. Mr. Ackerman has said he would stay on at BellSouth to shepherd the acquisition, which is expected to take about a year to close. If asked to leave, Mr. Ackerman would collect $9 million as well as millions of dollars' worth of restricted stock and options, according to public filings.

Not Your Ma's Bell (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

If the criticism of AT&T's plans to buy BellSouth for $67 billion sounds familiar, it's because the same hyperventilating occurred last year when SBC bought AT&T and Verizon acquired MCI. We're back at the same old stand, and while all this telecom consolidation may or may not pay off for shareholders, the benefits to consumers are clear.

Consumer "activists" and other critics are convinced that these telecom mergers mean fewer competitors and higher prices. But they're using a model of the industry that dates to the break up of Ma Bell in 1984, when cable companies and phone companies didn't provide each others' services and the consumer wireless market was practically nonexistent. So when Mark Cooper of the Consumer Federation of America asks the Justice Department to block the AT&T/BellSouth merger because there won't be "enough competition" for phone service, he's looking for competitors in the wrong places.

Mr. Cooper refuses to acknowledge phone services offered by cable companies, wireless carriers and VOIP providers in today's telecom market. But these mergers are a direct result of competitive pressures from those very technologies. AT&T knows it has more to fear from a cable giant like Comcast than from a fellow phone company like Verizon.

Today's traditional phone companies have been steadily losing lines to wireless providers, and they need the size and synergies to invest in broadband, where cable companies already have a big head start. The most obvious benefit to consumers is the lower prices that result from increased "intermodal" -- or cross-technology -- competition. But another benefit is the faster rollout of new services made possible by economies of scale.

The biggest battle in telecom right now involves Bell companies that want to offer cable programming via Internet protocol television, or IPTV. AT&T and Verizon have been pushing their own version of IPTV to compete with traditional cable service, but BellSouth has not been involved in this effort thus far, mainly because it couldn't afford the investment risks. With the additional resources available through an AT&T merger, BellSouth customers in the Southeast could be getting cable competition sooner than they otherwise would.

Others argue that wireless competition would suffer from a combined AT&T/BellSouth because AT&T would control all of Cingular. But Cingular has been jointly owned and operated by BellSouth and AT&T for some time, which means the merger would do nothing to alter wireless market share. Besides, it would be difficult for Cingular to become a predatory monopolist in a marketplace with Verizon, T-Mobile and other wireless rivals.

Among the regulatory bodies that will vet this deal is the Federal Communications Commission, and Chairman Kevin Martin's record is encouraging. It's true the FCC's approval of the Verizon-MCI merger last year included some bad provisions like a temporary rate freeze and bundling requirements. But Mr. Martin was working without a Republican majority on the five-member panel and had to make concessions to win over the two Democrat commissioners.

He shouldn't have that problem this time around; confirmation hearings for a third GOP appointee -- Robert McDowell -- are scheduled for this week. Still, consumer groups are likely to push for other anti-competitive concessions like net neutrality, which would prevent AT&T/BellSouth from providing faster Internet connections for certain premium services to people willing to pay for it. We don't know if providing these so-called "fast lanes" on the Web is a viable business model, but that's for the market to decide, not the regulators.

A bigger hurdle might be the Department of Justice's Antitrust Division, which is likely to receive pressure from Democrats on Capitol Hill aligned with consumer activists. Typical was the response from Massachusetts Democrat Ed Markey, a senior Member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, who said "Twenty years after the government broke up Ma Bell, this deal represents a mother-and-child reunion."

But the child has grown up and the mother has changed, even if Mr. Markey's rhetoric hasn't. Consolidation is being driven, as it should, by changing technologies, and by all manner of competition in a telecom world that Ma Bell wouldn't recognize.

Let There Be Bandwidth (WSJ)

By Bret Swanson

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Ma Bell's back: Run for your lives! -- or at least to the halls of Congress. That, it seems, is the overheated conventional wisdom. But the $170 billion combination of AT&T and BellSouth into the world's largest telecom company is a perfectly natural progression of business and technology. The merger will rationalize a market beset by decades of political mismanagement.

Some 22 years ago, Judge Harold Greene famously ruled that AT&T violated antitrust law and broke up the company along two axes. First, he divided the telecom market into local and long-distance. But just 15 years later, fiber optics and mobile phones obliterated long-distance as a meaningful market, replacing it with fixed-price, anywhere-in-America bundles, which are now under assault from voice over IP. Judge Greene's other 1984 ruling, which split Ma Bell's local operations into eight regional companies, was even more arbitrary from the outset. Because they were fixed by geography, more local companies did not yield more local competition, only diseconomies of smaller scale. So by the late 1990s, after the 1996 Telecom Act acknowledged some of these problems (but created still others), the regional companies began an inevitable reintegration into Verizon, AT&T (née SBC) and USQwest, which will likely soon be gobbled up as well. * * *

Although this latest reintegration will not reduce the number of competitors in the marketplace, it is sure to supercharge the ever-present denunciations of monopoly that are behind every effort to regulate telecom. This time around, the main agent is the colossus Google. Exactly one decade after the disastrous 1996 act set us on a path for the telecom crash and a plunge to 16th in world broadband rankings, Google is leading an alliance of politicians, lobbyists and interested companies under the aegis of "net neutrality." If enacted, it will repeat the most basic mistakes of earlier legislation.

Net neutrality supposedly seeks the modest goal of stopping the cable TV or telecom companies from "blocking" or "degrading" the content or services of online companies like Google, Vonage or AOL, which are invading traditional voice and video businesses. But the interwoven issues of content and conduit pervade the entire information economy, including the systems of Google itself. Barely recovering from the FCC's "open access" mandates that chopped up and assigned ownership rights and prices to the physical infrastructure -- the hardware -- of the Net, we now face the prospect of rigid reassignment of content, applications, services and protocols, too.

Blocking and degrading Internet access would quite simply be business suicide for incumbent service providers. Compared to cable's other content operations like basic and premium TV channels, its broadband cable modem services are more than 50 times as profitable per unit of bandwidth consumed. This means that with just a tiny sliver of the usable bandwidth in its pipes, cable's Internet services supply about 20% of the revenue and the majority of their net income. Does anyone really think the bandwidth providers are going to kill their golden goose?

The continuing advance of semiconductor and fiber-optic technologies will inexorably push cable and telecom operators to dedicate more and more of their networks to open Internet access. In such a highly volatile market, how much of service providers' capacity will be used for Internet access and how much will go for integrated products like high-definition video programming and video conferencing services is a tough business question. With the millions of competing enterprises involved, this is a complex and rapidly evolving system far beyond the capacity of Congress or the courts to micromanage.

A net neutrality regime would invite endless litigation among service providers, hardware and software vendors, and content and applications dot-coms. Who gets access, when, and on what terms, to the other's network, the other's operating system, the other's platform? These questions -- the very ones that have stifled innovation in telecom for the last two decades -- should be left to business competition and, if all else fails, to common law and antitrust. Congress and the FCC cannot be the arbiters of every connection, interface and transaction. And if such laws somehow only targeted the incumbent bandwidth service providers, then they would turn out to be merely malicious political tools for business rivals, decidedly not "neutral" and unlikely to survive the scrutiny of the courts.

The solution to all this is rather simple -- more bandwidth. Abundant bandwidth means the vast majority of online services, such as Web pages, email and voice, won't pose any congestion problems and will thus easily reach end-users. It also means bandwidth cheap enough that content companies won't mind paying for access. Across the network, different carriers have always charged different prices for varying amounts and qualities. Abundant bandwidth also gives the cable and telecom service providers the flexibility they need to manage this transition from a world of 200 dedicated channels to one with millions of open channels.

DOJ_NMG_0016621

Abundant bandwidth will reverse America's communications decline and transcend monopoly worries or any need for complex net-neutrality regulation. But it will take more than $100 billion of massive and risky new investment, which cannot be made under the current regulatory caprice. Telecom deregulation begun by Michael Powell and continued by current FCC chairman Kevin Martin must be accelerated. Most importantly, we should banish the decades-old local video franchising process.

Since granting monopolies to local cable TV broadcasters some four decades ago, video franchising is obsolete. Yet the prospect of new broadband service providers haggling with some 30,000 mayors and city councils for the privilege of serving new customers is now America's chief obstacle to real broadband. Texas and Indiana have passed statewide franchises, which grant quick, simple and almost automatic licenses for the whole state, and they are already reaping a broadband investment harvest. Around $1 billion worth of new fiber optic bandwidth has already been announced in Texas. The other 48 states should follow suit, or Congress should adopt a simple national franchise without any "shot-clocks" or "build-out" baggage that invite litigation and discourage investment.

In the metro New York area, one of the few places where Verizon has won a video franchise and built its advanced optical network, competitor Cablevision has increased its basic cable modem service to 15 megabits per second and is offering premium services of 30 and 50 megabits. Where it exists, real competition between cable and telecom -- not faux competition among distinct telecom brand names -- is thus already yielding networks and speeds on par with the most advanced countries in the world.

AT&T's biggest challenge may be branding itself to a new generation of voracious communications consumers who are oblivious to "long-distance" and only know a world of no-distance chats, texts and blogs. It would be far better if Washington listened to these teeny-bopper baby belles instead of basing its merger, net neutrality and franchising policies on a Great Grandma Bell world that no longer exists.

Ma Bell Revives; Watch Her With A Very Wary Eye (USAT)

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Recent years have not been good to the businesses formerly known as phone companies. They got off to a slower start than cable in rolling out broadband service. And they lost core customers who signed up with Internet telephony services, or opted to go wireless.

But, not to worry, this is an industry with a plan: Bring back Ma Bell — the AT&T monopoly that once ruled the wired world, throttling competition.

While other industries have decided to race forward to keep pace with innovation, this one sees a bright future in turning back the clock. Maybe there is even a black, rotary-dial telephone in our future.

Sunday's announced merger between AT&T and BellSouth would reunite five of the eight companies created when an antitrust suit splintered the phone monopoly in 1984, igniting a communications revolution. (AT&T had already been merged with three of its offspring: Pacific Telesis, Ameritech and Southwestern Bell.)

Given the current, accommodating state of antitrust policy and the arrival of cable as a competitor in broadband and telephony, this deal might well be approved by federal regulators. It might even create economies of scale that would make the combination more efficient than the sum of its parts.

But it also should raise red flags for Congress and federal regulators. For all the talk of robust competition between cable and telephone, the reality has been less impressive. The most intense competition and the fastest roll-outs of new services have been largely limited to affluent areas.

Reassembling the old Bell system would hardly provide companies with greater incentives to do what they are not doing already. If anything, it would give this new behemoth greater market strength with which to dictate prices and services.

What's more, the merger raises questions about the future of the Internet and digital entertainment. Even before Sunday, AT&T was vocal in its determination to impose limits on the Internet. The company envisions charging high-flying Internet companies such as Google and Yahoo for the privilege of flowing quickly through its high-speed pipes. It argues that because it invested in new lines, it deserves a greater piece of the action.

This merger might well increase its power to bring about such an unfortunate reality. With its massive customer base and ability to offer telephone, wireless telephone, broadband and video, it could bring enormous pressure to bear on Internet companies to pay its ransom, regardless of what its cable competitors do.

DOJ_NMG_0016622

For that reason, lawmakers and members of the Federal Communications Commission should take a long, hard look at where the Internet is headed and what might be done to prevent a handful of companies from gaining a chokehold over an evolving medium that is one of history's great innovations.

Such an outcome would not only punish innovative companies, but in its most extreme form it would also make decisions for consumers on where they shop online, how they conduct their searches and which social networking sites they should use.

More broadly, Washington policymakers might want to examine the state of competition almost 10 years after the passage of a massive telecommunications law that partially deregulated the industry. If a company such as AT&T is able to erect tollbooths on the Internet, and if competition on price and service in many parts of the country remains anemic, then the law and subsequent court rulings further deregulating the industry are not having their desired effect.

Telephone and cable companies were freed of their regulatory shackles on the premise they would compete aggressively with each other. Progress on that front has been, at best, mixed.

Now the public is being asked to believe that putting the Bell system back together is going to stimulate competition and help consumers. It's hard to believe there is much progress to be made by going backward.

Competition Calling (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

Reports of Ma Bell's death were greatly exaggerated. AT&T, which lost its independence (and almost its name) when it was purchased by SBC in November, now finds itself at the center of one of the largest mergers in business history. And concerns about the dangers of the deal are exaggerated as well.

This time, the newly reconstituted AT&T, formerly known as SBC, has agreed to buy BellSouth, the dominant local phone company in the South, in a stock swap worth about $67 billion. The merger, which must be approved by the companies' shareholders and federal regulators, would combine the erstwhile Ma Bell's market-leading long-distance business with local phone companies serving 22 states, or about 40% of the country's phone lines.

The numbers may be eye-popping, but the new Ma Bell is unlikely to be as powerful — or as dangerous — as the old Ma Bell. AT&T competes halfheartedly today for business customers in a few cities served by BellSouth, and BellSouth doesn't even try to compete with AT&T on the latter's home turf. And rather than operating rival wireless networks, AT&T and BellSouth jointly own one — Cingular.

As a consequence, the merger would have practically no immediate effect on BellSouth's or AT&T's market. Customers would neither gain nor lose any options for phone, high-speed Internet or wireless services.

Some critics argue that AT&T's chairman, Edward E. Whitacre Jr., is trying to reassemble the phone monopoly that the federal government broke up in 1984. As head of SBC, Whitacre has already gobbled up two of the regional Bells (Pacific Telesis and Ameritech) and last year acquired the struggling AT&T for $16 billion. The phone market is fundamentally different now, however. Cable TV companies sell phone and high-speed Internet service over their networks; mobile phones have become an increasingly affordable alternative to a home phone line; and numerous Web-based companies let users make calls through the Internet for little or no charge.

Meanwhile, phone companies such as AT&T and Verizon are starting to offer video services through high-speed Internet lines that can compete with cable and satellite TV operators. The proposed merger could actually promote that competition. Offering video through broadband connections also could serve as the Trojan horse that pushes high-speed Internet service into more homes.

Still, regulators shouldn't just wave the merger through. In much of the country, there isn't very much competition among high-speed Internet networks. So AT&T could be tempted to soak customers or extract extra fees from Web-based companies. And Whitacre has made some troubling comments about companies such as Google having to pay to use "his" pipes.

AT&T says it merely wants to charge websites for delivering faster service to users. Rather than trusting the company not to hamper the Internet or play favorites, regulators should require it to pledge to preserve a level playing field for all websites, programmers and services as a condition of the BellSouth deal. Customers and websites shouldn't have to pay twice to connect to each other, nor should AT&T or any other network operator be able to give any site or service an unfair advantage over its competitors.

Hybrid Program Key To NYSE Group's Future (AP)

By MICHAEL J. MARTINEZ, AP Business Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - When the New York Stock Exchange transforms into a publicly traded company Tuesday, its agenda - staying competitive with faster all-electronic markets - will remain in place even as its corporate structure changes.

DOJ_NMG_0016623

The NYSE's 214-year existence as a non-for-profit institution will end when it closes its $9 billion acquisition of all-electronic rival Archipelago Holdings Inc. On Wednesday, the combined company, called NYSE Group Inc., will begin trading on the floor of the Big Board under the symbol NYX.

Unfettered from the NYSE's seat holder leadership structure, in which the owners of 1,366 seats had a strong say in the direction of the Big Board, NYSE Group Chief Executive John Thain has big plans for the exchange, including trading options and corporate bonds, the possibility of extended trading hours and acquisitions of other exchanges and companies.

But as the $9 billion acquisition closes, the exchange can't look too far ahead, nor too quickly. The linchpin of its future is not new products or acquisitions, but its core business of trading stocks. And with the Nasdaq Stock Market's electronic trading platform slowly eating away at the NYSE's market share, the NYSE's new "hybrid" program - the merging of electronic trading with traditional floor auctions - must be a fast and sure success.

"I would say that getting hybrid in place, up and running, is the absolute most important thing they have to do," said Michael Pagano, assistant professor of economics at Villanova University's College of Commerce and Finance. "If they don't get hybrid right, all their competitors can come and pick them off."

The hybrid is the result of a new Securities and Exchange Commission rule due to take effect this summer. Under that rule, the NYSE must move to electronic trading in order to be considered a "fast market" and thus compete with the Nasdaq and other electronic markets for orders. However, for its entire history, the Big Board has been a human-driven system, with specialists serving as auctioneers to buy and sell stocks and maintain orderly markets by keeping prices reasonable.

To attain fast-market status, the NYSE plans to create a system it hopes will combine the speed of electronic trading with the market-management skills of humans. It's a tricky balance - if the human element proves too slow, more orders will head to the Nasdaq or elsewhere.

But if the floor system is minimized too much, the NYSE loses a key assetthat differentiates it from other exchanges.

"If they get this balance right, their market share and trading volume can really take off," Pagano said. "If they don't, all the acquisitions and other products won't help them. They have to get this right, right off the bat."

The NYSE has repeatedly said a pilot hybrid program is in place, involving 147 stocks as of March 1, and will continue to be implemented as the summer deadline approaches.

At least one NYSE customer is pleased with the effort thus far.

"They've made a lot of the technology pretty transparent to us, and we've had good conversations with folks there to see what that's going to look like for us," said Vincent Phillips, CEO of the active trading service CyberTrader, a Schwab Corp. subsidiary. "Given the things they have on their plate, I think things have gone surprisingly well."

Thain has expressed confidence in the hybrid program and appears to be poised to take advantage of the exchange's newfound independence from its seat holders. The former Goldman Sachs president hopes to expand the NYSE's offerings to include derivatives trading, including equity options side-by-side with sales of the stocks themselves, as well as corporate bond trading.

Trading could also expand as Thain works to integrate Archipelago's trading system with that of the rest of the NYSE. In the future, it's possible that floor traders could not only trade NYSE-listed stocks, but also those listed on the Nasdaq. With NYSE-listed stocks already electronically traded on Nasdaq, as well as Archipelago, the NYSE could not only retain some of its own market share, but also eat into Nasdaq's.

Thain has also said he is still considering expanding the NYSE's operating hours in order to compete with European markets, though that has run into some resistance from traders on the West Coast, who are already up at 6:30 a.m. Pacific time for the opening bell.

And of course, Thain has previously said he's interested in using his newfound equity capital for acquisitions. The London Stock Exchange, currently on the block, is a favored target of speculation, though there are smaller exchanges in the U.S., including the American Stock Exchange and a number of regional exchanges, that could become tempting targets.

Alternatively, the NYSE could go after the Chicago Board of Options Exchange or the International Securities Exchange in order to get a bigger piece of the options and derivatives trade.

"Whatever they do, they're going to be in a good position," Philips said. "We can't wait until Thursday to see what the new world looks like."

Blackstone To Acquire CarrAmerica For $5.6 Billion (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Blackstone Group agreed to acquire CarrAmerica Realty Corp., a real-estate investment trust with office properties across the U.S., for $5.6 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0016624

The deal is the largest in a string of transactions in which publicly traded real-estate companies have been bought by private or institutional investors willing to pay a premium for companies they believe are undervalued by Wall Street.

Blackstone, a New York-based private-equity firm, has been aggressive in acquiring real-estate companies but has focused on the hotel sector. Two weeks ago, it said it would acquire MeriStar Hospitality Corp., a hotel REIT, for $940 million, plus debt, in a deal valued at $2.6 billion. The decision to grab a large office REIT is seen as an endorsement of the improving office market.

"Whenever you see a smart, well-capitalized private-equity firm entering into a transaction like this, to my mind, it's a stamp of approval on the sector," said Jim Sullivan, senior REIT analyst for Green Street Advisors, a real-estate research and trading firm.

CarrAmerica, based in Washington, D.C., holds about 26 million square feet of office space in markets including Los Angeles, Dallas and Denver.

Under the terms announced yesterday, Blackstone will acquire all of the outstanding common stock of CarrAmerica for $44.75 a share. The purchase price represents an 18.4% premium over CarrAmerica's closing stock price on Feb. 16, the day news began to circulate about a possible deal. Blackstone will also assume a limited amount of debt, although the precise figure wasn't disclosed. CarrAmerica shares rose $3.45, or 8.4%, to $44.53 yesterday in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Credit-rating service Fitch Ratings said late yesterday it has placed CarrAmerica on "rating watch negative" in anticipation of a possible downgrade based on the likelihood that Blackstone could increase CarrAmerica's leverage.

"The bottom line is we were offered an extremely attractive price from Blackstone," said CarrAmerica Chief Executive Thomas Carr.

Jonathan Gray, Blackstone's senior managing director, said in a prepared statement that CarrAmerica "will provide us with a valuable platform for future investments in the office sector." The deal is expected to close in the second quarter.

A year ago, a REIT as large as CarrAmerica wouldn't have been considered a likely candidate for privatization or acquisition. That changed in December when General Electric Co. agreed to pay $3.2 billion and assume $1.6 billion in debt for Arden Realty, an office REIT.

"The entire REIT universe seems to be fair game at this point," said Paul Adornato, senior analyst for REIT research at Harris Nesbitt, the U.S. research and investment-banking subsidiary of Toronto-based BMO Financial Group.

J.P. Morgan To Buy Kohl's Card Unit For $1.5 Billion (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

NEW YORK -- J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. agreed to buy the credit-card operations of department-store chain Kohl's Corp. for $1.5 billion, reflecting the bank's push into the lucrative "private-label" business.

It is the latest in a flurry of deals in which retailers have shed their in-house card businesses to concentrate on core operations. Last year, for example, Federated Department Stores Inc. sold its private-label business to Citigroup Inc.

And British bank HSBC Holdings PLC recently snapped up the private-label portfolio of Neiman Marcus Group Inc.

For banks, the private-label portfolios are attractive at a time when profit growth has been slowing for general-purpose cards -- those branded by card-issuing financial institutions and card associations such as Visa USA Inc. and MasterCard International Inc.

J.P. Morgan executives have repeatedly said they want to acquire more private-label portfolios; both Citigroup and General Electric Co. already have large presences in this area.

In the past two years, J.P. Morgan has bought the in-house card businesses of Circuit City Stores Inc. and Sears Canada Inc.

The Kohl's portfolio includes 13 million accounts with approximately $1.5 billion in outstanding balances. The deal is expected to close in 90 days. Kohl's is based in Menomonee Falls, Wis.

As part of the transaction, the two companies will coordinate programs aimed at spurring Kohl's sales and card use. Kohl's will continue to manage customer service, advertising and marketing for the cards.

Linde Raises Bid For BOC, Likely Clinching A Deal (WSJ)

By Jan Hromadko And Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

German industrial conglomerate Linde AG raised its takeover bid for U.K.-based gas company BOC Group PLC to £16 ($28.06) a share, likely clinching a deal that will create the world's largest industrial-gas company in terms of sales.

DOJ_NMG_0016625

Linde said it intends to fund the deal -- which values BOC at £8.2 billion ($14.4 billion) -- with a fresh issue of equity and debt.

The transaction would create a leading world-wide industrial-gas and engineering group with combined sales of €11.9 billion ($14.3 billion), said Linde, based in Wiesbaden, Germany. The supplier of industrial gases, engineering services and forklift trucks said the BOC management board intends to recommend that its shareholders accept the offer. The bid represents a 39% premium to BOC's share price prior to Linde's offer in January.

BOC Chief Executive Tony Isaac said in an interview that Linde's bid "is a very good offer for shareholders, and significantly 'derisked' compared with the one we turned down in January."

On Jan. 24, BOC revealed that Linde had made an unsolicited approach for £15 a share. BOC's board unanimously rejected the offer on grounds it undervalued the bigger company and had too many conditions, including financing, antitrust approval and due diligence.

A combination of Linde and BOC would create a company with some 22% of global sales within the industrial-gas market. BOC and Linde, the current No. 2 and No. 5 globally, hold a 13% and 9% market share, respectively.

Shares of BOC fell 0.1% to £15.43 in London. In Frankfurt, Linde shares rose 7.5% to €70.45.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Senate Democrats Oppose ANWR Oil Drilling In Budget (REU-Y2)

By Tom Doggett

Reuters, March 6, 2006

Democratic lawmakers on the U.S. Senate Budget Committee said on Monday they opposed putting in the 2007 budget bill language assuming the government will raise billions of dollars in oil drilling leasing fees from Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

In its budget proposal to Congress, the Bush administration said it expected $7 billion would be raised by allowing oil drilling in the Alaskan refuge, and the Congressional Budget Office puts the figure at $6 billion.

No matter what the number, most Senate and House Democrats are against opening the refuge to oil companies.

"It is irresponsible to base the country's budget on highly speculative and dubious projections of lease revenues for the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge," all nine Democrats on the budget panel said in a letter to the committee's Republican chairman, Judd Gregg.

Putting the ANWR leasing revenues in the budget bill is a way to get around a threatened filibuster of any legislation that would open to refuge to oil drilling, because budget bills can't be filibustered.

"We encourage you to reject any requests that are intended to misuse the budget process to open the refuge to oil and gas drilling and exploration," the Democratic lawmakers said.

The Senate Budget Committee is scheduled to vote Wednesday on whether to include the ANWR leasing revenue in the government's 2007 budget.

Last week, 24 House Republicans sent a letter to House Budget Committee chairman, Republican Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record), urging him to keep Arctic refuge drilling out of the 2007 budget bill.

The administration has failed every year to convince Congress to give energy companies access to the refuge, which is a key part of the White House's national energy plan.

The refuge, which is home to a variety of wildlife such as polar bears and migratory birds, stretches across 19 million acres in the northeast corner of Alaska. But the White House only wants to offer 1.5 million acres in the refuge's coastal plain for oil and natural gas exploration leases.

The Interior Department estimates the refuge could hold between 5.7 billion and 16 billion barrels of recoverable oil.

If the refuge was opened to drilling, it would take about eight years before the area reached full production of around 800,000 to 1 million barrels per day, according to the Energy Department.

The Face That Helped Alter Nation's Flu Policy (WP)

By Susan Levine

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

As he waited his turn at the microphone, in an Atlanta auditorium filled with doctors and scientists, Gary Stein wondered whether what he had to say would make much difference. These were the experts, he realized, the people who spend a lifetime studying viruses and vaccines. They already knew all the facts, the statistics.

DOJ_NMG_0016626

Still, they didn't know 4-year-old Jessica.

So Stein began talking, as a father who once had a little girl with hair the color and shimmer of champagne, a child who loved dress-up and Barbies and who was as healthy as they come until the day in January 2002 when she caught the flu. Less than 72 hours later, she was dead. Stein thought he could get through the main points of his remarks without stumbling. But as he stood before the federal Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, explaining how his Falls Church family had been devastated, he choked up.

"Nothing and no one will ever fill the void left by Jessica," Stein told the gathering.

"It hit me pretty hard," he admitted later. It may have hit the experts hard, too.

The next morning, the 15-member committee voted for a surprise revision in national policy: It unanimously recommended that starting this fall, all children between 2 and 5 years old be vaccinated annually against influenza.

The previous recommendation only advised flu shots for children ages 6 months to 23 months and those 6 months and older with chronic illnesses. As long as they are generally healthy, children older than toddlers tend to just get sick from the flu. They go to doctor's offices or outpatient clinics but are seldom admitted to the hospital.

Children still suffer a "substantial" amount of influenza, however, said Raymond A. Strikas, an associate director at the National Immunization Program, which is part of the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. And that was the major impetus for the committee's decision late last month. Its expanded coverage even includes parents and older siblings, because they also suffer by getting sick themselves or taking time off work to care for ailing youngsters.

All told, nearly 17 million additional people now will be urged to get protection against the flu, bringing the total to more than 120 million men, women and children across the United States.

"We're saying, 'This is the standard of care,' " Strikas said. "This is what you should be doing."

For Jessica Stein's parents, the new recommendation brings some comfort.

"If there are other kids that will get vaccinated," explained Doris Stein, the words hanging in the air without elaboration. The inference was clear: Other parents won't have to bury a child.

In this country, influenza is a serious public health problem that many health officials complain does not get the respect it deserves. It kills more than 36,000 Americans a year, of whom most are very young or very old or suffering from conditions or diseases that compromise their body's ability to fight the virus.

Children do die, however. During the 2003-04 flu season, when the new guideline was first broached, a particularly nasty strain struck earlier than usual and began killing healthy children -- more than 70 by the final count. One of its victims was 3-year-old Emily Lastinger. Her father traveled from Texas to Atlanta to address the advisory committee with Stein.

"It took great courage," said Gregory A. Poland, an internist at the Mayo Clinic who specializes in immunology and vaccine development. As a committee member, he has pushed for a recommendation to make universal coverage the national standard. Others support incremental progress, worrying that vaccine supplies could never meet demand otherwise. Any disruption to yearly production of flu vaccine would only worsen the problem, they fear.

"It's absolutely heart-wrenching to me to hear these stories and have people die of something so preventable," Poland said. "It's as if each person, each generation, each community has to learn the hard way."

This influenza season has seen few aberrations and no unusual virulence. As of mid-February, the CDC reported that just a dozen children had died. But each of those is an individual tragedy, stress the Steins, who recently began venturing into advocacy, connecting with other parents through a nonprofit organization called Families Fighting Flu. "It's very therapeutic," Doris Stein said.

Jessica is rarely out of sight in her family's home. Photos remain on the refrigerator, on a kitchen counter. On one end of the living room mantel is a picture of her, her parents and her younger brother, Eric, taken the Christmas before her death. At the mantel's other end is a more recent shot, of Doris and Gary, Eric and Johnny and Katie, the children born after Jessica died.

"It's like we have two different families," Doris said quietly as Katie, a 15-month-old burst of energy, took off across the room. Her older sister would be 8 now and in third grade, and "not a day goes by that you don't think about what she would be doing, what she would be like," Gary said.

Neither parent had any time to prepare emotionally when Jessica got sick. A virus had been going around her preschool, and both she and Eric caught it and then both got better. More than a week later, Jessica had a play date, and only after that did her mother notice that she seemed more tired than normal. By morning, all symptoms pointed to the flu, but Jessica was still eating well, her energy was no worse and she had no fever.

The third day was different. Jessica's hands were icy cold, and by evening her breathing seemed somewhat labored. Her mother called the pediatrician, who suggested they "walk -- don't run" to the hospital to check for dehydration. The next several hours replayed for a long time in her parents' minds: their daughter suddenly having trouble breathing, Doris being asked to step out of the room, Gary rushing over from home, a doctor saying Jessica had been stabilized. Five minutes later, an entire medical team emerged. The virus had fatally attacked Jessica's heart.

DOJ_NMG_0016627

No one in the family had gotten a flu shot that year.

But no one in the family will ever again go without.

Whales In The Way Of Sonar (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

The debate over whether the Navy's use of sonar to detect submarines is harming whales and other sound-sensitive species is back again. This time the battleground is the waters off the southeastern United States, where the Navy hopes to establish a training area for sailors who need to practice their sonar skills in a shallow ocean environment. The plan has aroused justifiable concern not only from environmental groups, but also from the federal and state agencies responsible for protecting marine life. If these concerns cannot be allayed, the project should be denied a permit to proceed as now planned.

The Navy's favored site is an area off the coast of North Carolina — 500 square nautical miles — but the Navy would settle for backup sites off Virginia or Florida if its first choice is rejected. In a draft environmental impact statement, the Navy argues that the training sites would have negligible impacts on marine life, but that judgment looks far too rosy.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration has expressed "significant concerns" about the proposed sonar activity, including its potential to injure or kill beaked whales, which are especially sensitive, and its possible adverse impact on right whales, a highly endangered species. The agency also contends that the sound thresholds the Navy deems acceptable are well above the levels known to disrupt marine mammal behavior in the wild. Florida's fish and wildlife agency went so far as to urge that the project be abandoned, and North Carolina's marine and wildlife agencies weighed in with their own concerns.

No one can deny that the Navy needs to conduct sonar training in shallow waters, where sound propagates differently than in the deep ocean. But at a time when evidence is mounting that sonar has been responsible for at least some of the whale strandings around the world — and when we do not yet know what caused a large stranding last year in North Carolina — it behooves the Navy to move with extreme caution.

The three sites favored by the Navy were chosen for practical reasons: they were close to home ports, air stations and federal shore facilities; had appropriate water depths; and had a satisfactory climate. Whales were at best an afterthought, but they deserve to be a priority.

Sixteen Arrested In Drug Bust On Pine Ridge (ICT)

Indian Country Today, March 7, 2006

RAPID CITY, S.D. - Sixteen people on the Pine Ridge Reservation have been charged with possession of cocaine and marijuana and with the intent to distribute the drugs.

The arrests, which came days after national news organizations ran stories about drug trafficking on American Indian reservations, were not intended to coincide with those articles, according to Paul McCabe, FBI spokesman from the Minneapolis regional office.

Twelve were arrested in the village of Pine Ridge without incident. The other four were already in federal or state custody.

Arrested were Geraldine Blue Bird; her son, Clarence Behan; Travis Elk Boy; Colin Spotted Elk; Dawnee Frogg; Howard Blue Bird; Thomas Spotted Bear; Flint Thomas Red Feather; Justin Hawk Wing; Sage Richards; Norton Richards; Wenona Richards; Jody Richards; Jay Dee Spotted Elk; Joe Garcia and Rusty Richards.

In December 2005, authorities were called to a Rapid City hotel to investigate a complaint that the aroma of marijuana was coming from one or two rooms.

When federal authorities and an officer from the Rapid City Police Department arrived, they were given permission to enter the hotel room, where they smelled marijuana smoke. They then observed a clear plastic baggie of marijuana, according to court documents.

Blue Bird, who rented the room, was determined to have outstanding arrest warrants. She also admitted to having cocaine in a jacket pocket, telling officers it belonged to her son. When the officers let her in the room, another woman, Jody Richards, picked up a sweater to put on and the officers noticed a Tupperware container with a white substance on the bed. They then sought a warrant.

In an adjoining room were two other people in Blue Bird's party, Norton Richards and Wenona Richards. All four were arrested at the scene.

Authorities recovered more than $16,000 and one and one-half pounds of cocaine from the rooms. Also confiscated were three revolvers and ammunition, including an assault rifle magazine, according to court documents.

DOJ_NMG_0016628

Blue Bird was charged with possession of a firearm in connection with a drug trafficking crime and seven other counts of drug-related offenses. Two others, part of the dozen who were arrested, were also charged with possession of a rifle in the act of drug trafficking.

All 16 defendants appeared in federal court in Rapid City and entered not guilty pleas. No trial dates have been set.

Authorities said the shooting death of a 16-year-old in December 2005 at Blue Bird's residence expedited the investigation.

Blue Bird became somewhat famous during President Clinton's visit to Pine Ridge in 2000. She lived in a home in Pine Ridge with an attached trailer that housed 28 people. Clinton sat on her porch and discussed jobs, housing and other issues with her and family members.

She later received a new double-wide home, the result of a generous out-of-state donor who read about her in the national media.

If convicted, she and the others could receive up to life in prison and a $4 million fine. They will all be required to forfeit any drug-related funds and property.

The arrests at Pine Ridge brought praise for the arresting officers. McCabe said many stopped in a local restaurant and were greeted by locals with pats on the back and congratulatory praise, thanking them and saying, "We appreciate it - get them out of here." He added that the case is still under investigation and people may come forward with more information as long as it remains open.

The national media has placed great emphasis on methamphetamine use and distribution. In South Dakota, the drug has been a major source of concern and discussion in the state Legislature, among local communities and law enforcement agencies.

The arrests on Pine Ridge, however, did not involve crystal meth, McCabe said.

"Meth is a problem. We've seen meth increase, but any drug is considered a problem. Since meth is on the rise, not too many years ago, there has been an increase in the traffic of any kind of drug," he said.

The Pine Ridge law enforcement is currently understaffed, with one officer for every 1,000 people. At the end of March, a Community Oriented Policing Services grant will expire and the force will be cut by 58 offices - roughly in half. That will leave one officer for every 2,000 people.

In order to investigate and carry out any type of arrest, a "force multiplier" is put into place, McCabe said. That means other agencies work together to create a greater number of officers and agencies to aid in the investigations.

"Law enforcement in general, throughout the country, is under a budget constraint. That's why the force multiplier is used to bring in all the expertise and intelligence together. That's an important piece for maintaining safety, on or off the reservations.

"Indian country matters are a high priority. A great deal of the manpower in Minneapolis involved crimes on reservations," he said.

The FBI; Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Unified Narcotics Enforcement Team; the Rapid City Police Department; the Northern Plains Safe Trails Task Force; and the Oglala Sioux Tribe Department of Public Safety cooperated in the investigation and arrests.

The U.S. Marshals Service, the Department of Homeland Security and the Drug Enforcement Administration assisted in the arrests.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Israel Extradites Alleged Drug Trafficker To United States (FINDLAW)

By ARON HELLER, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 7, 2006

(AP) - JERUSALEM-A suspected Israeli mob boss, described by U.S. prosecutors as one of the world's most wanted drug traffickers, was extradited to the United States on Monday, police said.

Zeev Rosenstein, suspected of involvement in distributing more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the United States, mostly in New York and Miami, was handed over to U.S. marshals at Ben Gurion International Airport near Tel Aviv arport and taken aboard a direct El Al flight to Miami, where he will face the drug charges, police spokesman Mickey Rosenfeld said.

The target of numerous gangland assassination attemps in the past, Rosenstein was driven to the airport in an undercover police car accompanied by several motorcycles, Israeli radios reported.

"It was a carefully-planned operation, under sensitive circumstances, designed to ensure that he arrived at the airport in peace and quiet, without any disturbance to public order," Rosenfeld said.

He said the extradition was the result of a long investigation conducted in coordination with U.S. law enforcement agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0016629

Israeli police, acting on an international arrest warrant, arrested Rosenstein more than a year ago for allegedly smuggling drugs from Europe to the United States.

A U.S. extradition request, submitted in December 2004, said Rosenstein was involved in distributing more than 1 million pills of Ecstasy, court documents said.

In November, Israel's Supreme Court ruled he could be extradited, a decision later endorsed by the Israeli justice minister.

In one shipment, Rosenstein allegedly planned distribution of 700,000 Ecstasy pills that were seized in a Manhattan apartment along with $187,000 in July 2001, according to the extradition request. The drugs, which originated in Europe, were seized after they were offered for sale to an undercover Miami-Dade County police informant. The informant also worked for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The investigation leading to Rosenstein's arrest spanned three years and several countries.

Rosenstein, 51, has long been accused of being one of Israel's top mob leaders, but aside from a five-year stint in prison for armed robbery in the 1970s, he had eluded authorities.

In December 2003, a bomb attack in Tel Aviv targeted Rosenstein - the seventh attempt on his life - leaving him with scratches but killing three passers-by and wounding 18 others. The attack was believed to have been ordered by rival mob bosses.

Rosenstein has been charged in the United States with conspiracy to distribute a controlled substance and conspiracy to import a controlled substance into the United States. The maximum penalty under American law is 20 years in prison, or more if the drugs sold caused death or serious injury.

In an interview, published Friday in the Yediot Ahronot daily, Rosenstein said he was a victim of a conspiracy orchestrated by Israeli police.

"I'm not the head of a crime family, and I don't have soldiers," he said.

According to the extradition agreement between Israel and the United States, Rosenstein could serve any prison sentence he receives in Israel.

Fugitive Extradited From Caribbean On Drug Charges (AP)

AP, March 7, 2006

ROCHESTER, N.Y. Federal officials say a man accused of importing cocaine has been extradited from his native Saint Kitts in the Caribbean.Noel Heath was one of the top ten fugitives of the Drug Enforcement Administration's New York field division.He was indicted in 1995 on charges of conspiring to import more than eleven pounds of cocaine in the Rochester area.If convicted, he could get up to life in prison and be fined up to 4 (m) million dollars.

Atlanta Federal Agent Charged With Embezzlement (DBCH)

Atlanta Business Chronicle, March 6, 2006

A DEA agent who worked at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport has been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of embezzling money as a federal officer, embezzling public money and money laundering.

Gregory Campion, 44, of Orlando, Fla., is expected to be arraigned before U.S. Magistrate Judge Alan J. Baverman on March 8.

A federal grand jury returned an indictment against Campion on March 1. The indictment charges that on seven occasions in 2004 and 2005, Campion, a special agent with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration assigned to the Atlanta Airport Task Force, allegedly stole cash from the secure storage vault maintained by the Task Force. These funds had been seized by law enforcement agents as currency involved in federal narcotics offenses and were subject to forfeiture to the United States.

The indictment also charges that Campion allegedly engaged in two transactions in excess of $10,000 with the proceeds of these thefts to buy real estate in Orlando. The indictment seeks forfeiture of that real estate.

Campion, who now lives in Florida, has been suspended without pay from his position at the DEA.

"We have no tolerance for criminal conduct by law enforcement officers sworn to uphold the law, particularly federal agents," said U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. "We will thoroughly investigate and vigorously prosecute alleged lawbreaking by law enforcers."

Feds Arrest Manteca Man For Impersonating DEA (AP)

AP, March 6, 2006

(AP) MANTECA Federal authorities arrested a Manteca man today for impersonating a Drug Enforcement Administration agent by flashing a phony badge as he entered a courtroom.

DOJ_NMG_0016630

Thirty-seven-year-old John D. Cohen picked the wrong courthouse security officer to try to dupe -- a retired DEA special agent. The officer told the U-S Marshal's Service the badge looked suspicious.

Federal agents who later raided Cohen's home found guns, DEA apparel, a police uniform, handcuffs, bulletproof vests and forged law enforcement training certificates. They also found what they believe is several small bags of marijuana.

Cohen could face up to three years in prison if convicted of impersonating an agent, and five years if convicted of making false statements to federal authorities.

Man Charged With Presenting Fake DEA Badge At Federal Courthouse (SACBEE)

The Sacramento Bee, March 6, 2006

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration announced Monday it has arrested a Manteca man who presented a fake DEA badge to security officers at the Sacramento federal courthouse last week.

John D. Cohen, 37, was arrested on suspicion of impersonating a DEA special agent. After searching Cohen's home, officials seized two handguns, a shotgun, DEA apparel, an Oakland Police Department uniform, and other police gear, the DEA said in a statement. Several small bags of what officials believe to be marijuana were also found.

"Impersonating a DEA Agent is a very serious offense because it undermines the public trust necessary for DEA agents to safely do their jobs," said Gordon D. Taylor, special agent in charge of the agency's Sacramento office. "This guy wanted to be on the inside. Well, he'll get that opportunity when real DEA agents take him to jail and put him behind bars."

The investigation into Cohen began last Monday, when authorities said he falsely identified himself to a U.S. Marshal security officer at the Sacramento federal courthouse. A retired DEA agent, the security officer alerted the U.S. Marshal's office to a possible imposter.

DEA Accuses Pleasanton Broker Of Impersonating Agent (CCT)

By Karl Fischer

The Contra Costa Times, March 6, 2006

Federal authorities say a Pleasanton mortgage broker posing as a narcotics agent entered a secure portion of Coast Guard Island in Alameda last month and sold guards a Ford Crown Victoria he claimed was a retired police car.

That breach was the first of two in February that attracted real agents from the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency. On Monday, they visited the Manteca home of 37-year-old John Cohen and seized a cache of weapons and law enforcement paraphernalia, along with Cohen himself.

"Impersonating a DEA agent is, of course, a very serious crime," DEA special agent Casey McEnry said. "And he did it multiple times."

On Feb. 27, the week after the Coast Guard Island incident, Cohen showed a counterfeit DEA badge to a U.S. Marshal Service security agent while entering a federal building in Sacramento, authorities said. The agent, who was a retired DEA agent, became suspicious. Security detained Cohen minutes after he entered.

"Cohen stated he was given the badge and ID card from his commander when he was discharged from the U.S. Navy, as a token of his service," according to the affidavit written by Special Agent Gary Cummings.

DEA agents interviewed Cohen, who admitted the badge was a fake, but they let him go, according to an affidavit filed by the agency in federal court.

"As Cohen was departing, (he) stated if we ever needed someone to go undercover to call him," according to the affidavit. "Cohen also stated he had wanted to be a DEA special agent all of his life."

Two days later, agents learned that Cohen had met a private guard from King Security, the firm that serves Coast Guard Island, on Feb. 22 and sold him a 2000 Ford Crown Victoria outfitted with police lights the following day.

Cohen appeared at the gate of Coast Guard Island at least once, on the day of the sale, wearing a jacket emblazoned with the letters "DEA" and with DEA identification.

"My understanding is that he impersonated a DEA agent" to gain access to the facility, said U.S. Coast Guard spokeswoman Amy Thomas. "As far as I know, nothing was compromised. Our security people were suspicious and reported the contact soon after the visit."

Authorities searching Cohen's home Monday found two handguns, a shotgun, an Oakland Police Department uniform, apparel from the DEA and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, police equipment including red and blue car lights, forged law enforcement training certificates and several small bags of marijuana, according to a DEA press release.

They booked Cohen into Sacramento County Jail on suspicion of several federal offenses, including impersonating a federal agent.

DOJ_NMG_0016631

Cohen works for Hilltop Financial Mortgage Inc. in Pleasanton. A woman who answered his cell phone Monday evening declined comment.

Judge Puts Upcoming Executions On Hold (THTS)

By Karin Grunden, The Tribune-Star

Terre Haute Tribune Star, March 7, 2006

Three federal death row inmates who contend in a lawsuit that lethal injections are painful have been granted a stay of execution, court records show.

U.S. District Court Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle ordered a preliminary injunction Feb. 24, barring the Bureau of Prisons from executing James H. Roane Jr., Richard Tipton and Cory Johnson.

The three co-defendants had been scheduled to die in May at the Federal Correctional Complex in Terre Haute, home to the nation's federal death row. The trio were sentenced to die after being convicted in a string of drug-related murders in Richmond, Va.

"Any news like this is good," said Stephen Northup, an attorney who represents Tipton. But "it's really just temporary relief."

A spokeswoman for the Bureau of Prisons confirmed the delay Monday, and declined further comment.

This case marks at least the sixth since January in which executions have been delayed after inmates have raised legal challenges about the lethal injection process, according to information on Death Penalty Information Center's Web site.

At least six other men, included one from Indiana, have been executed in the same time period.

The injunction in the federal death case is indefinite, until further order of the court. In her ruling, Huvelle also stayed the three men's federal lawsuit on the constitutionality of lethal injections, pending a decision by the U.S. Supreme Court in a Florida case.

In that case, death row inmate Clarence Edward Hill is suing the state of Florida, alleging that lethal injection would violate his constitutional protection from cruel and unusual punishment.

In a court document, Hill's attorney claims that a succession of the three chemicals commonly used in used in lethal injection — sodium pentothal, pancuronium bromide and potassium chloride — could inflict pain "contrary to the contemporary standards of decency."

The document cites a study published last year in a British medical journal. In the study, which appeared in The Lancet, the authors found that toxicology reports of 49 executed inmates showed 43 had post-mortem concentrations of thiopental lower than required in surgery. In addition, 21 of the 49 inmates had concentrations consistent with awareness, according to the study.

The Supreme Court has agreed to hear the Florida case, to determine whether Hill's civil suit falls within federal appeals, as lower courts have ruled, or is a legitimate challenge to the conditions of a condemned inmate's death sentence.

Separately, attorneys for Roane, Tipton and Johnson also are alleging in a federal lawsuit that lethal injection is cruel and unusual punishment. They filed the suit in December in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

The defendants in the case are U.S. Attorney Alberto Gonzales, DEA Administrator Karen Tandy, Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin, Bureau Medical Director Newton E. Kendig II, penitentiary Warden Mark Bezy, and penitentiary Clinical Director Dr. Thomas Webster. The list of defendants also includes "John Does I-V," a reference to the unknown people charged with carrying out the execution.

In the complaint, attorneys for the three death row inmates claim while sodium pentothal "supposedly will render the plaintiffs insensible to the pain of their deaths, it in fact can and will merely cast a 'chemical veil' over this excruciating pain, leaving plaintiffs conscious but trapped in a paralyzed body wracked with the pain of suffocation and heart attack.

"At the same time, this 'cocktail' will make it impossible for those observing the execution – including witnesses to it … to recognize and prevent the gratuitous pain and suffering being inflicted upon the plaintiffs."

While the attorneys await the outcome of the Florida case, they have filed paperwork asking President Bush to grant clemency to their clients, Northup said.

Karin Grunden can be reached at (812) 231-4257 or karin.grunden@tribstar.com.

A look at the crimes

--Richard Tipton, 35, Cory Johnson, 37, and James H. Roane Jr., 40, were gang leaders in a crack-cocaine ring in Richmond, Va.

--The three were tied to nine slayings of suspected informants, competitors and underlings. One man was stabbed 84 times for mishandling a drug transaction, according to a U.S. Court of Appeals brief. Three other people were critically injured during the series of killings, which happened over a month in early 1992, court records show.

--Tipton, Johnson and Roane were sentenced under the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, which includes federal execution as a sentence. The three have exhausted all appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0016632

Medical-marijuana Clubs Fear New Raids By Feds (SDUT)

By Jeff Mcdonald, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, March 6, 2006

December searches yield no arrests yet

Nearly three months after federal agents raided 13 medical marijuana dispensaries in San Diego County, the government has yet to make any arrests or file any criminal charges.

Most of the pot clubs that closed during the high-profile searches reopened days later. Meanwhile, at least 10 new dispensaries, cooperatives and delivery services have set up shop.

Even though it appears to be business as usual within the close-knit medical marijuana community, an uneasy cloud hovers over the dispensaries and their customers.

The operators worry that federal agents will show up any minute, guns drawn and warrants in hand; patients are afraid they may be arrested or that another sweep would force the clubs to close for good.

Few dispensary operators are willing to speak publicly, even though the names, addresses and telephone numbers of their organizations are easily found on the Internet. Instead, they lie low and hope for the best.

“There's a lot of trepidation out there,” said Dale Gieringer of California NORML, a San Francisco group working to reform marijuana laws. “A lot of the patients are concerned and wondering how long the clubs are going to last down there.”

Law enforcement officers converged on most of the county's medical marijuana dispensaries Dec. 12, confiscating about 50 pounds of marijuana and related products, computers, patient records and other materials.

The government insisted the records would remain confidential and legitimate patients would not be prosecuted.

The sweep was organized by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, with assistance from county sheriff's deputies and San Diego and other local police agencies after six months of surveillance and investigation.

Although dispensaries are legal under California law, the federal government does not recognize medicinal benefits of marijuana, which remains illegal under national drug laws.

The conflicting laws have left patients, police and local officials in a lurch for the past 10 years.

San Diego County supervisors voted to sue the state over the legality of its marijuana laws, a move that prompted the American Civil Liberties Union and other advocacy groups to petition the court to intervene in the case. Activists launched a bid to impose term limits on county supervisors.

The U.S. Attorney's Office did not return telephone calls seeking comment last week. The investigation remains active, a DEA spokesman said.

“We're being diligent in the evidence that we're collecting,” Special Agent Misha Piastro said. “The proliferation of the dispensaries does concern us.”

Damon Mosler, who runs the narcotics unit of the District Attorney's Office, said he expected criminal charges would be filed against some dispensary operators as soon as next month.

Mosler said he does not know whether cases would be presented in state court, where the permissive medical-marijuana laws apply, or in federal court, which does not allow any medical-necessity defense.

“They're using federal resources for the investigation, but it will be both agencies making the decision at the same time,” he said.

Reaction to the raids, one of the largest medical-marijuana sweeps ever conducted by the DEA, has varied dramatically among dispensary operators.

Some shops closed altogether. One changed its name and removed a colorful sign above its North Park storefront. Another expanded into plush new office space. At least 10 new operations opened, according to California NORML, which posts the services on its Web site.

Steph Sherer of Americans for Safe Access, an Oakland group that promotes legal access to medical marijuana, said the rising number of dispensaries would prompt more cities to pass ordinances that accommodate the clubs.

“The patient community is standing up for itself,” said Sherer, whose organization is among those planning to fight the county's lawsuit against the state. “Voters of California are saying, 'This is not what we think the federal government should be doing.' ”

Jon Sullivan, who closed his local dispensaries after the December raids, said San Diego is the nation's main battleground pitting federal drug laws against states' rights to permit medical marijuana.

Sullivan said he expects to be arrested at some point despite the allowances under California law but looks forward to the case being put before a jury.

DOJ_NMG_0016633

"We need to end this 10-year battle. It's just plain wrong," Sullivan said. "They gave us rules, we followed the rules and they come in and steal all our stuff."

Prosecutor Mosler said resolving the conflict between state and federal law, or at least adopting guidelines each side could agreed to, would benefit patients and law enforcement officials.

People "need to get their elected officials to create some more certainties," he said. "That is the best route to have access to medicine."

Bush Budget Faulted In Drug-war Setback (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

A Bush administration decision to divert money for Colombian drug interdiction and eradication programs to the war on terrorism has opened up the southern U.S. border to a new flood of heroin and cocaine, say senior congressional and Colombian officials.

Some members of Congress, angry that appeals by Colombian President Alvaro Uribe for help in rebuilding his depleted and aging fleet of surveillance and interdiction aircraft have been ignored, plan to bypass the White House by dipping into a $72.4 billion supplemental appropriation for the war on terrorism to fund $99.4 million in military and police aid to Colombia.

An amendment to the pending emergency supplemental bill likely will be offered by Republican Reps. Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, chairman of the House International Relations Committee, and Dan Burton of Indiana, a member of the House Government Reform Committee. It would pay for three DC-3 marine patrol aircraft for the Colombian navy and two UH-60 Black Hawk helicopters and 10 Huey II helicopters for the Colombian national police.

Colombia is the source for about 90 percent of the cocaine that ends up each year in the U.S., along with a majority of the heroin.

"After seven years of work on anti-narcotics efforts in the Andean region, we are now seeing the fruits of our labors in the drug war in Colombia and making great progress with our Colombian security partners in preventing drugs from reaching the United States," Mr. Hyde said in a letter to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Colombian President Alvaro Uribe often finds himself standing alone with us in our common goals of a democratic, secure and drug-and-terrorism-free Andean region. We must continue our support for him," he said. "We cannot assume we need do no more in order to continue the success we have been seeing."

Colombian officials said escalating violence along the U.S.-Mexico border, called "overwhelming" last week by Texas sheriffs during a Senate hearing, was being fueled by the increase in drugs from Colombia and the illicit profits they generate.

"These smugglers have the latest equipment, most expensive weapons and they are more willing to shoot it out with us and our U.S. counterparts," one Colombian official said. "We're asking the U.S. for help, and by helping us, you help yourself."

The officials said that because of aircraft and equipment shortages, if Colombian smugglers can get their product to the coast -- either the Pacific Ocean on the south or the Caribbean in the north -- there is a 65 percent probability it will find its way through Mexico and into the U.S.

Using airplanes, cruise vessels, freighters, and fishing and patrol boats, they said, the smugglers elude a rapidly thinning line of Colombian ships and aircraft, handing off their drugs to Mexican dealers for shipment into this country.

In the past three years, said a senior congressional aide, homeland security demands in the United States have resulted in a 70 percent reduction in the aircraft available to the Colombian and U.S. navies for interdiction efforts. Many of the surveillance planes were grounded because of wing-structure problems and another 22 aircraft, including spray planes and helicopters, were either shot down by smugglers or crashed.

In November, the Government Accountability Office (GAO) questioned the government's ability to sustain interdiction operations in the transit zone, saying the availability of aircraft and other key assets was declining. A report said interdiction flight hours in the transit zone declined from 6,860 in 2000 to 6,500 in 2002, but dropped more rapidly to 2,940 hours in 2005.

For two years, Mr. Uribe has asked the administration for funds to replace spray planes and for assistance in rebuilding his military and police in the war against narcoterrorists, which last year claimed more than 250 Colombian police officers. His requests were not included in the 2006 foreign aid funding bill and do not appear in the administration's 2007 aid request.

DEA Nets Meth 'superlab' (UPI/ WT)

United Press International, March 6, 2006

ATLANTA, March 6 (UPI) -- U.S. federal drug agents said they have broken up a methamphetamine "superlab" in Smyrna, Ga., and confiscated more than 12 pounds of the drug.

DOJ_NMG_0016634

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency said they arrested three men -- all illegal aliens from Mexico -- and that on Monday two of the defendants pleaded guilty to charges that include manufacturing methamphetamine. The third man is to go on trial this month.

A release Monday from the DEA said the raid on a house in a residential neighborhood of Smyrna, near Atlanta, resulted in them finding 12.4 pounds of methamphetamine in the house and another pound in a nearby vehicle. In addition they said 24 large trash bags were found filled with emptied pseudoephedrine tablet boxes and contained holding 35 pounds of pure d-psuedophredrine hydrochloride, key ingredients in the production of methamphetamines.

U.S. Attorney David Nahmias said: "The dismantling of this superlab represents a significant blow to methamphetamine traffickers in George. At the same time, the discovery of such a large lab here in Atlanta reveals the growing threat that methamphetamine poses to our citizens."

ATF Investigating Pompano Warehouse Fire (MH)

By Ashley Fantz

The Miami Herald, March 7, 2006

An investigative team from the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms will begin examining what's left of a Pompano Beach warehouse gutted by an unrelenting inferno that began at 8 p.m. Friday and raged throughout the night.

Officials who tried to stamp out the blaze at Pallet Consultant Corp. on Southwest 12th Avenue reported flames reaching 100 feet into the air. The blaze could be seen two miles away.

Sandra King, spokeswoman for the Pompano Beach Fire-Rescue, said one of the 120 firefighters from North Lauderdale, Fort Lauderdale, Lighthouse Point, Margate, and Broward Fire-Rescue was injured when a loaded water hose slammed into his stomach. He was treated and released Friday from North Ridge Medical Center in Fort Lauderdale.

"It was huge," King said. ``We had six cities pitching in to help us."

King said ATF and explosive experts will help discern the cause of the blaze because propane tanks inside hundreds of pallets exploded. Damage is estimated to be $10 million to three businesses within the six-acre property.

IMMIGRATION:

Uncommon Weapon In Immigration Fight (LAT)

An Idaho County Tries A Racketeering Law Against Employers Who Hire Illegal Workers. By Nicole Gaoue

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

CALDWELL, Idaho — Like many communities, this fast-growing agricultural pocket of southwestern Idaho is paying a high tab for illegal immigration.

When an illegal worker gave birth to a premature baby, Canyon County wound up with a $174,000 hospital bill. County officials say the jail spent thousands to house another illegal immigrant at a motel, after his tuberculosis threatened to infect fellow inmates.

But where others have merely chafed at paying costs like these, officials in Canyon County are trying a novel approach: The all-Republican county commission has filed a racketeering lawsuit against four big businesses in the area, charging that they deliberately hire illegal workers.

The spectacle of the county's political leaders taking its businesses to court has touched off a bitter local debate. But it has also put Canyon County, a largely Republican community of about 160,000, at the forefront of an emerging national effort to use racketeering laws to crack down on illegal immigration by seeking damages from employers.

So far, a handful of workers and businesses around the country have filed civil lawsuits under the RICO statute, known formally as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act. The targets are companies that, the lawsuits say, have unfairly used illegal labor to cut wage levels or prices.

In Washington state, workers who filed a civil suit against their employer, a fruit company, won a $1.3-million settlement in January. The Supreme Court has agreed to hear another of the immigration-related RICO cases this year.

But Canyon County is the first municipality to bring a suit of this kind against employers. The lawsuit was dismissed by a federal district court but has been appealed to the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. If it succeeds, it could touch off similar actions, says the county's lawyer, Howard Foster.

"There are other county officials who are looking at this, who have called me," said Foster, an advocate of tougher immigration controls, who is behind most of the other RICO lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0016635

In Canyon County, where working farms sit cheek-by-jowl against new residential developments, locals have traditionally welcomed the Latino immigrants who moved in seasonally to take agricultural jobs. But since the early 1990s, many immigrants have been finding year-round work in other industries, leaving some long-time residents struggling to adjust to permanent neighbors with different customs.

Even though the Senate aims to pass immigration legislation by early next month and the House has already produced an enforcement-only bill, people here are angry that the federal government has not done more to stop the influx.

Yet even some who want an immigration crackdown say the county commissioners stepped over the line when they went to court against two local seed companies, a meatpacker and large cheese-making operation.

"I think they should shut down the border and end services" to illegal immigrants, said Joel Bettancourt, a grocery store owner in Caldwell, Idaho, who described himself as Mexican American. "But to do the RICO Act — that's too far. Who knows who they're going to go after next?"

But some people say they are so fed up with changes they attribute to immigration — increasing gang violence, competition for manual labor jobs, and more services devoted to immigrants — that they hope the lawsuit succeeds. Letters to the local paper appear to be running slightly in favor of the commissioners.

"We have young guys, white and Hispanic, in here legally who want [construction] jobs — but companies give them to people who they can pay half the going wage," said Joyce Yelm, who grew up pulling beets alongside migrant farm laborers but has hardened after watching her old neighborhood become, in her words, a largely Spanish-speaking "shanty town."

Much of the controversy also centers on the man who has been the primary force behind the lawsuit — County Commissioner Robert Vasquez. A former radio commentator and veteran who was wounded in Vietnam, Vasquez, 57, has long been a provocative force in the immigration debate.

The grandson of legal Mexican immigrants, Vasquez was elected to the county commission in 2002 and soon after sent the Mexican government a $2-million bill for services he said his county had provided to illegal immigrants. He has asked Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne to declare the county a disaster area because of illegal immigration and to grant it emergency funds. And he has proposed unsuccessful state legislation that would have denied welfare payments to illegal immigrants.

"For every dollar for an illegal alien, it's one less dollar in my constituents' pocket," said Vasquez, who is running for Congress. In 2005, Vasquez heard about Howard Foster.

The Chicago lawyer has largely spearheaded the use of RICO statutes as a tool against illegal immigration. A member of the Federation for American Immigration Reform, a group that advocates immigration restrictions, Foster took note when Congress toughened immigration laws in 1996 and amended the RICO statute to make knowing employment of illegal immigrants a violation.

"For the first time ever in the country, it became possible for a person to bring a private lawsuit against an employer … for violating immigration laws," Foster said.

RICO targets a person or group for crimes committed systematically as part of an ongoing enterprise. It carries tough criminal penalties. Its civil component, which the immigration suits fall under, allows plaintiffs to sue for triple damages.

In four RICO suits since 1998, Foster has alleged that companies have knowingly and repeatedly conspired with labor contractors over a period of years to hire illegal immigrants.

His first case, in 2000, was on behalf of a Connecticut cleaning company that sued a competitor for hiring illegal immigrants. That case settled.

His other cases have been on behalf of employees, alleging that companies have kept wages low by hiring illegal workers. In 2001, he sued the Washington state fruit company, leading to the $1.3-million settlement. A suit he brought against Tyson Foods Inc. is scheduled to be heard next year.

In 2004, he filed suit against Mohawk Industries Inc., based in Calhoun, Ga., the country's second largest carpet maker. That case will be heard by the Supreme Court in April, potentially shaping the use of RICO as a weapon in the immigration wars.

Other lawyers besides Foster are also trying the RICO strategy. In 2003, the RICO statute was used to file suit on behalf of contract janitors against Wal-Mart Stores Inc. A court dismissed the RICO portion of the case, but that is now under appeal.

In Canyon County, after speaking with Foster, Vasquez and the two other commissioners filed suit in July, charging that Syngenta Seeds Inc., a Swiss company, and Harris Moran Seed Co., of Hayward, Calif., knowingly hired illegal immigrants for many years through a local farm labor contractor, Roberto Corral. The suit alleges that the seed companies knew most of Corral's recruits were illegal immigrants, but they used the contractor as a "front company" to distance themselves from their criminal activity.

"Many of these illegal immigrants have committed crimes resulting in criminal justice expenses to the county. Others have become public charges by seeking medical services, which the county has had to pay," the lawsuit states. It does not detail what those costs have been.

DOJ_NMG_0016636

The lawsuit made similar claims against meatpacker Swift & Co., of Greeley, Colo., and Sorrento Lactalis Inc., a cheese company based in Buffalo, N.Y.

In December, a federal district court in Idaho dismissed the case on a legal principle that prohibits municipalities from suing to recoup the cost of services they provide in the normal course of business. The case is now before the 9th Circuit, where Foster successfully settled his case against the Washington fruit company.

A Syngenta representative dismissed the lawsuit as "baseless." At Swift, spokesman Sean McHugh said: "We believe the suit is without merit." Spokesmen for Sorrento Lactalis and Harris Moran declined to comment, citing the ongoing lawsuit.

Thomas G. Walker, a lawyer for the labor contractor Corral, said his client "didn't do anything wrong. He fulfills all of the requirements under the immigration statutes."

About a month after the suit was filed, Swift told its 408 Canyon County workers that the local facility, in operation since 1916, would be shut down. It said the closure was due to restrictions on Canadian beef imports. But many residents see the lawsuit as the last straw for the company.

"It's a horrible lawsuit," said Maurice Clements, a former state legislator and farmer. "Swift closed their plant, the other three companies — God, I hope they don't leave. They provide a huge market for farmers in this area."

The companies named in the suit generate almost $700,000 a year in tax revenue for the county and pay millions to local growers, according to the Canyon County Farm Bureau.

Syngenta has been in Idaho for 90 years and produces one-third of the world's sweet corn seed there. "Those four companies are a huge part of our agricultural base and therefore our economic base," said Terri Ottens, the farm bureau's executive secretary.

The commissioners counter by citing the costs of illegal immigration. Idaho law mandates that the county cover hospital fees for anyone who has lived there for more than six months and is unable to pay. That leads to bills such as the $1.25-million tab to care for an illegal immigrant who was left a quadriplegic because of a car accident.

Vasquez said also that a recently completed welfare analysis showed that from 1999 to 2005, claims by illegal immigrants totaled $1.2 million.

But Ottens, of the farm bureau, is skeptical of the commissioners' claims. Her group says much of the cost of jailing illegal immigrants is often reimbursed by the state.

"We found the amount of money the county pays out is minimal compared to what these companies [being sued] pay in property tax," Ottens said.

Yet many residents are deeply grateful to Vasquez for taking a stand against illegal immigration.

Construction company owner Brad Tracy, who says he refuses to hire under the table, said it was almost impossible to compete against businesses that use illegal labor.

"I've got to pay workman's comp, health insurance, fuel costs, property tax," he said. "Then I've got to compete against people who say they have no employees, just contract labor at $10 an hour."

*

(BEGIN TEXT OF INFOBOX)

Canyon County snapshot

The issue of how to deal with illegal immigrants is taking an unusual path in Canyon County, Idaho, a predominantly white area with a substantial Latino population:

Canyon County, Idaho
Population: 160,540
Growth, 2000-05: 22%
--
Race/Ethnicity
White: 76%
Latino: 20%
All other: 4%
--
Age Median age: 31
--
Education Median household income: $40,338
--
Occupation
Blue collar: 31%

DOJ_NMG_0016637

White collar: 50
Service/farm: 19
--
Income by household*
White: $36,772
Black: 46,964
Asian: 37,273
Latino: 30,800
--
Place of birth
United States: 91%
Foreign: 9
--
Foreign-born home
Latin America: 83%
Europe: 8%
Asia: 6%
All other: 3%
Note: Unless otherwise stated, all data are 2005 estimates
* Median by race/ethnicity of head of household, 2000
 2000 census data
Sources: U.S. Census Bureau, Claritas Inc.

Specter's Proposal Seeks Compromise On Immigration Reform (BSH)

By Dave Montgomery
Biloxi Sun Herald, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate's main immigration bill would enable most illegal immigrants now in the United States to remain indefinitely as long as they stay employed, but it wouldn't put them on a glide path to U.S. citizenship.

The Senate Judiciary Committee will begin debating the measure Wednesday under a three-week timetable aimed at producing a final version for the full Senate by March 27.

Sponsored by Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the committee chairman, the legislation is designed to strike a middle course between a bill passed by the House of Representatives calling for tougher immigration enforcement and pro-immigration advocates who call for permanent legal status - and eventual citizenship - for the estimated 11 million aliens now in the country illegally.

President Bush, defying objections from conservatives, has called for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws and the creation of a temporary guest-worker program to ensure a steady source of labor for U.S. business. Under Bush's plan, qualified workers, including residents now here illegally, could stay in jobs for up to six years, then would be required to return home.

Senate Judiciary Committee staff members who explained key provisions of Specter's bill on Monday said that the measure would create a "gold card" program for illegal immigrants who entered the United States before Jan. 4, 2004. It also would create a guest-worker program to bring in more foreign laborers.

Applicants for the gold card would undergo a background check by the Department of Homeland Security, then be eligible for two-year work visas that could be renewed indefinitely, committee aides said, speaking on the condition of anonymity to avoid upstaging their boss. The workers wouldn't participate in the Social Security system but would contribute to future savings through worker investment accounts.

One top committee staffer described the "gold-card" proposal as "a reasonable compromise" in dealing with illegal immigrants, many of whom have lived in the country for decades. The undesirable alternative, he said, would be an unworkable massive roundup, which administration officials have said would cost billions of dollars.

Unlike other proposals, Specter's bill wouldn't require the immigrants to pay a fine to step forward, aides said. They also said that the proposal wasn't a form of amnesty since it wouldn't offer an automatic track toward citizenship. However, they noted that the measure wouldn't preclude applicants from eventual citizenship.

Under the separate guest-worker program, which would be based on U.S. labor needs, foreign applicants could work for three years, then could apply to work for another three years before returning home. They'd be required to remain in their home country for a year before reapplying.

Advocates on both sides of the immigration debate criticized Specter's proposal as an inadequate attempt to placate opposing groups.

"Some people are going to say it's amnesty, and others are going to say it creates a second-class caste of workers," said Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute, a New York-based think tank that leans right. "It's a non-starter for both sides."

Tensions between opposing groups escalated on the eve of the committee's deliberations, underscoring the passions surrounding the immigration issue. The National Capital Immigration Coalition announced plans for a Capitol Hill rally on Tuesday afternoon to demand eventual citizenship for illegal immigrants.

Specter's 305-page bill included elements from two other major bills, one co-sponsored by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Sen. Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., the other by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Many pro-immigrant groups, as well as a number of business organizations, have lined up behind McCain-Kennedy, which has a guest-worker program that would put undocumented residents on a path to eventual citizenship.

The Cornyn-Kyl bill also creates a guest-worker program, but illegal aliens would first be required to return to their home countries following a five-year grace period before they could participate.

Local Officials Seek Help From U.S. On Immigration (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — Gather 100 local officials from 30 states — Democrats and Republicans from big states and little ones — and there are probably few issues on which all will agree. But President Bush's record on illegal immigration apparently is one.

"It is a failure," said Mark D. Boughton, speaking on Monday at a gathering of those officials here. Mr. Boughton, the mayor of Danbury, Conn., created a stir last year when he sought, unsuccessfully, to have State Police troopers deputized as immigration control agents.

"A terrible hardship for my taxpayers," said Gloria D. Whisenhunt, chairwoman of the Forsyth County board of commissioners, in Winston-Salem, N.C. The schools there are crammed with the children of illegal immigrants, she said.

"Enough is enough," said Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive and co-organizer of the event. Mr. Levy became a sort of guiding light among local officials around the country after he decided last summer to help shut down boarding houses in Farmingville, N.Y., where hundreds of illegal immigrants lived in crowded conditions.

"The federal government has to adopt a sane immigration policy," Mr. Levy said.

The gathering, organized and convened here under the banner of the Coalition of Mayors and County Executives for Immigration Reform, called for border security and, most urgently, reimbursement to localities for the cost of dealing with a problem its members say the federal government has ignored.

"In recent polls, 88 percent of the people said that illegal immigration is a serious or 'somewhat serious' problem," Mr. Levy said. "Yet there just seems to be a disconnect between that and what the Congress and the media think."

In the contentious national debate over what is called immigration reform, there are a half-dozen factions at odds, factions representing the interests of business, of labor, of immigrant advocates and opponents, of Republican presidential hopefuls and Democratic partisans.

For good measure, because most illegal immigrants are Hispanic, the issue is loaded with racial and ethnic overtones, a reality that Mr. Levy had to face last summer when immigrant advocates in Suffolk County labeled his boarding house sweeps as racist.

"But this group has nothing to do with racism or bigotry," said Robert Vasquez, a county commissioner from Canyon County, Idaho. "We are here because we are elected United States officials, and it's our duty to uphold the laws."

Major bills under review in the House and Senate promote an array of conflicting responses to the question of how to define the issue, and how to deal with the reality of 11 million illegal aliens in the United States. Among the suggested solutions are amnesty, deportation, temporary worker status, permanent guest work status and an impermeable wall at the Mexican border.

But Monday's assembly of local officials introduced a new faction into the fray. This one, its members say, is composed of officials who must deal every day with the realities of illegal immigration as they intersect with taxpayers.

The officials raised many questions for the federal government. Who pays for the shuttering of boarding houses like those in Farmingville? Who pays for the extra classroom space, the unreimbursed cost of medical care, the cost of police and fire protection for the additional human lives? Where will they be housed?

DOJ_NMG_0016639

The White House did not ignore the meeting, but at the last minute downgraded the rank of its representative. In place of Ruben Barrales, a deputy assistant to the president and White House director of intergovernmental affairs, who was originally scheduled to attend, the White House sent a liaison to city officials, Toby Burke.

Mr. Burke, who listened respectfully, at one point said the president was seeking "a comprehensive, not a piecemeal, solution" to the problem of illegal immigration. He said the president's proposal to create guest worker status for some or all illegal aliens would not constitute an amnesty.

Then, while the officials vented for two hours with what seemed like the relief of troubled individuals finding their first support group, Mr. Burke said little else.

TAX:

Federal Prosecutors Sue Nevada Tax Preparers For Fraud (AP)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 7, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The U.S. Justice Department filed suit today to stop four people from operating what it claims is a tax fraud scheme.

The suit filed in U.S. District Court in Las Vegas says the scheme cost the government at least 31 million dollars.

The government accuses the Las Vegas-based group of funneling income from clients through trusts in the Caribbean to help them avoid paying taxes.

It says the group returned the money through phony gifts or loans to the customers, their friends or family members.

The government names Reinhold Sommerstedt and Daniel Young of Las Vegas; Lynn Lakers, a Boulder City tax-return preparer; and Stephen Nestor, a former Internal Revenue Service officer, in the suit.

Justice Wants 3 Hillsdale Residents To Stop Preparing Returns (AP)

By JAMES PRICHARD, The Associated Press

AP, March 6, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich. (AP) — The U.S. Department of Justice has asked a federal court to prohibit three Hillsdale residents from preparing federal income tax returns for others, claiming the trio has cost the Treasury more than $25 million.

The government filed a complaint Monday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids against Joyce M. Stone, Charles J. Freed and Julie Shaffer.

Stone is Freed's mother, and together they own and operate an unincorporated tax-preparation business from their home, the department said Monday. The business also is a defendant in the lawsuit.

The complaint alleges that the defendants prepared customers' returns claiming improper deductions, including some for fictitious or inflated charitable contributions and employee expenses.

Contacted Monday at their homes, all three denied any wrongdoing. Stone said she had been contacted by her lawyer about some questions involving some of her returns but believed the matter had been resolved.

"I thought we got that straightened out," she said.

Shaffer, a friend of Stone, said she was unaware of the complaint until a reporter told her about it.

"This is news to me," she said.

The government said Stone and Freed, acting either individually or through their business, prepared income tax returns for about 1,000 clients. Shaffer prepared returns for more than 1,000 clients and also assisted in the e-filing of returns prepared by Stone or Freed.

The returns that Stone, Freed or Shaffer prepared for the 2000 through 2003 tax years may have cost the U.S. Treasury more than $25 million, based on projections made from 115 audited returns, according to the complaint.

The government also sought an order directing the defendants to provide prosecutors with their customers' names, telephone and Social Security numbers, and mailing and e-mail addresses.

"The Justice Department is working vigorously to stop the preparation and filing of the false or fraudulent returns that unfairly shift the tax burden to honest American taxpayers," Eileen J. O'Connor, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Tax Division, said in a written statement.

DOJ_NMG_0016640

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Proposes Law To Give The President Line-Item Veto Power (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Seeking to reassert his party's scuffed reputation for fiscal conservatism, President Bush yesterday proposed a law giving him authority to veto individual items in legislation as a way to curb fast-growing federal spending.

Bush, who has never exercised his veto power in more than five years as president, said the line-item veto would give him authority to clamp down on special-interest items, known on Capitol Hill as earmarks, increasingly slipped into legislation to benefit the home districts of lawmakers.

"Too many bills passed by Congress include unnecessary spending," Bush said at a White House ceremony to swear in Edward Lazear as chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers. "These earmarks reflect special interests instead of the people's interests."

The proposal, scheduled to be introduced today by Republican Sens. Bill Frist (Tenn.), John McCain (Ariz.) and Mitch McConnell (Ky.), would allow the president to identify items he wants to strike from larger legislation and return the bill to Congress, which would have 10 days to vote on the proposed cuts.

Congress passed legislation authorizing the line-item veto in 1996, but the Supreme Court struck it down as an unconstitutional abridgement of the separation of powers shortly after it was enacted by President Bill Clinton. By requiring that the cuts made by the president be approved by Congress, the White House believes it will avoid any constitutional problems with the new legislation.

"Congress gave the president a line-item veto in 1996, but because of problems with the way the law was written, the Supreme Court struck it down," Bush said. "That should not be the end of the story."

Bush has asked for the line-item veto in years past as part of his overall budget requests. But he has never before offered specific legislation seeking the authority. White House aides said the proposal is timely because of growing outrage over the widening budget deficit and the growth of legislative earmarks, which has threatened to undermine the image of Republicans as proponents of small government. Some conservatives said Bush's own credibility on the issue is open to question.

"Under President Bush, the government has expanded by 45 percent in five years," said Brian Riedl, a federal budget analyst with the conservative Heritage Foundation. While he praised the line-item veto as a good "common-sense" tool, Riedl said that "there is no substitute for vetoing expensive spending bills."

Since the Republicans took control of Congress in 1994, the number of home-district earmarks has jumped from 4,155 valued at about $29 billion in 1994 to 14,211 worth nearly $53 billion 10 years later, according to the Congressional Research Service. Meanwhile, the Bush administration has forecast a record budget deficit for 2007 of $439 billion.

"Now seems like a very good time to move," Joshua B. Bolten, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, said of the line-item veto proposal. Bolten said the measure gives "the president a scalpel to reduce unnecessary or wasteful spending," while creating a mechanism to increase public and legislative scrutiny of earmarks.

At first blush, Bush's proposal is being received with bipartisan approval in Congress. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who proposed similar legislation during his 2004 presidential campaign, called the measure overdue. He introduced his own version of the measure yesterday, which his office said appears to be no different from Bush's proposal.

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto," he said.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) also praised the bill. "I have always supported giving the president the authority to exercise the line-item veto as a means to help rein in wasteful spending," he said.

Bush Seeks To Slim Down 'Pork' Projects (AP-Y2)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

Seeking new power to weed hometown projects from legislation passed by Congress, President Bush on Monday asked lawmakers to give him a modified version of the line-item veto struck down by the Supreme Court eight years ago.

Like presidents dating back to Ulysses S. Grant, Bush wants the power to strike individual items from a bill without having to veto the entire measure.

President Clinton got that wish in 1996, when the new Republican majority in the House pushed through a line-item veto law that allowed him to kill individual spending projects and special-interest tax breaks.

DOJ_NMG_0016641

Two years later, the Supreme Court declared the law — one of the key planks of the House GOP's "Contract With America" — unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress.

Bush is now pressing for a modified, weaker version. Instead of being able to strike items from bills, he would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote. Present law permits Congress to ignore these proposed rescissions, but under the Bush proposal lawmakers would have to vote on them. If majorities in both the House and the Senate agreed with the president, the cuts would take effect.

"Forty-three governors have this line-item veto in their states," Bush said. "Now it's time to bring this important tool of fiscal discipline to Washington, D.C."

Bush has not vetoed any legislation during five years in office, but he said the modified line-item proposal would help "reduce wasteful spending, reduce the budget deficit and ensure that taxpayer dollars are spent wisely."

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., issued statements supporting Bush, as did several conservative lawmakers.

And Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who promoted a similar approach in his presidential campaign against Bush in 2004, immediately jumped on board.

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto," Kerry said. "I'm going to introduce this legislation, Congress should immediately pass it, and I want to see President Bush use this veto pen to get tough on wasteful spending."

"Giving the president line-item veto authority is essential to enforcing the budget and restoring fiscal sanity in Washington," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling (news, bio, voting record), R-Texas.

The proposal may be helped along by the drive on Capitol Hill for so-called "earmark reform."

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he was opposed to the idea even though he supported a similar plan in 1995 when offered as a weaker alternative to the GOP version.

The earlier version of the line-item veto was used by Clinton in 1997 against about 80 parochial projects and a handful of special-interest tax breaks. Lawmakers' enthusiasm for the earlier veto power waned sharply, leading lawmakers like Sen. Robert Bennett (news, bio, voting record), R-Utah, to change their minds and oppose the idea.

Congress, by a huge margin, overturned Clinton's vetoes of 38 military construction projects.

Bush's version was actually pushed by Democrats in the 1990s — including Sen. Robert C. Byrd (news, bio, voting record) of West Virginia, who filed suit against the 1996 law.

Still, a proposal similar to Bush's veto plan was actually voted down by the House two years ago on a 237-174 vote, with three out of four Democrats voting "nay." Some 89 Republicans, including then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier, R-Calif., also opposed the measure.

Lawmakers opposed to the line-item veto idea say that Congress should carefully guard its power of the purse and that presidents could use the expanded power against their political enemies.

Supporters say the practice of larding legislation with hometown projects and special-interest tax breaks has gotten out of control. Too often, a president has to accept such "pork" as the price of adopting legislation that he has little choice but to sign.

___

On the Net:

The White House: http://www.whitehouse.gov

House Conservatives Prepare Austere Alternative Budget (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — With Congress heading into a politically perilous budget season, influential House conservatives plan this week to propose an austere alternative spending plan that would pare more than $650 billion over five years, balance the budget and drastically shrink three cabinet agencies.

The legislation, part of a push by some Republicans to re-establish themselves as champions of fiscal restraint, was taking shape as President Bush struck a similar theme on Monday by asking Congress to grant him line-item veto power to eliminate federal spending that he might judge wasteful.

"We can't be all things to all people when it comes to spending the taxpayers' money," Mr. Bush said at a ceremony installing a new chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

But House conservative leaders would go far beyond the president's own budget proposal, illustrating the difficulty the White House and the Republican leadership have had in persuading the caucus to speak with one voice on the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0016642

Senior aides say the conservatives' plan would wring about $350 billion from Medicare, Medicaid and other social programs and save $300 billion partly through a major reorganization of the Education, Commerce and Energy Departments.

"We are putting our money where our mouth is," said one of the officials, who would discuss the proposal only without being identified because it was still being prepared for release Wednesday by leaders of the Republican Study Committee.

The officials said it was particularly important for conservatives to lay down a marker because the Senate is facing an imminent vote on whether to increase the statutory debt limit, which will remind the public of the increasing deficits under the Bush administration.

Treasury Secretary John W. Snow warned Congress on Monday that the federal government risked default without an increase in the debt limit and that the Republican-controlled Congress would soon be forced to address that issue.

Conservatives contend that voters are disillusioned with Republicans over spending and that without a bold statement, the party faces potential losses in November. But some moderate Republicans are anxious about additional spending reductions, particularly after Congress enacted nearly $40 billion in cuts last year after a difficult fight.

The new budget proposal is certain to be assailed by Democrats who accuse Republicans of forging ahead with tax cuts that benefit the affluent and add to the deficit while reducing support for those most in need.

"This president will have piled up more debt than all of the presidents preceding him," Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the senior Democrat on the Budget Committee, said Monday as he joined other Democrats in accusing Republicans of shortchanging domestic security.

The budget debate could be the first big challenge for Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, who won his position last month with help from House conservatives who will now be looking to him to help hold down spending.

Under the proposal, expected to be introduced by Representative Mike Pence, Republican of Indiana, and Representative Jeb Hensarling, Republican of Texas, military spending would continue to rise, administration tax cuts would be protected and Social Security would be spared. But many other programs and foreign aid would be greatly scaled back.

The authors of the proposal describe it as a sequel to the Contract With America, which helped catapult Republicans to power in 1994. An outline of the plan says the proposals require "tough choices, but members have expressed a serious desire to do the hard things to save America."

Mr. Bush's push for the line-item veto could benefit from the current scrutiny over the growing practice by lawmakers of inserting spending for pet projects into legislation — a practice that has figured into continuing corruption scandals.

Congress gave President Bill Clinton line-item veto authority in 1996, but the Supreme Court overturned the law, saying it violated the Constitution by giving the president the power to amend legislation. Under the new proposal, the president would be able to identify objectionable projects and then send them back to Capitol Hill for an up-or-down vote without requiring a veto of the entire bill.

Though members of Congress are typically reluctant to cede too much power over spending to the executive branch, several lawmakers gave initial expressions of support, including House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Republican of Illinois, and Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts.

"It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much," Mr. Kerry said, "but I fully support giving him the line-item veto."

But Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader, had an opposite view, calling the line-item veto "old hat."

"I don't think this Congress is ready for line-item veto," Mr. Reid said, adding, "I just think it's an effort by President Bush to divert attention from real issues this country has."

Bush Calls For Line-item Veto (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

President Bush yesterday demanded that Congress give him a line-item veto power and sent a bill to Capitol Hill that he said satisfies the constitutional concerns that sunk the last version a decade ago.

Wading into the congressional spending debate, Mr. Bush took a hard line on the practice of earmarks, which critics call pork-barrel spending, and promised to be the sheriff who will enforce discipline.

"Too many bills passed by Congress include unnecessary spending," Mr. Bush said.

"Today, I'm sending Congress legislation that will meet [constitutional] standards and give me the authority to strip special spending and earmarks out of a bill, and then send them back to Congress for an up-or-down vote," he said.

The move thrilled conservative Republicans on Capitol Hill, but Democratic leaders said Mr. Bush was ducking responsibility for budget deficits.

DOJ_NMG_0016643

"If the president were really serious about the deficit, he would begin by submitting a balanced budget," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat. "Instead, President Bush has presided over the largest fiscal turnaround in our nation's history, turning a projected $5.6 trillion surplus to a deficit of $3.3 trillion."

White House officials said Mr. Bush, who has never vetoed a bill, needs a more finely tuned scalpel to deal with wasteful spending.

The proposal is not technically a "veto" under the Constitution, because it doesn't require a two-thirds vote to overturn it.

Under Mr. Bush's plan, the president could cull items from a bill and send the cut items back in a rescission package to Congress, which would have 10 days to vote on the whole package. The president could eliminate targeted tax cuts as well as spending.

"To see him putting the full weight of his office behind a specific proposal to create a constitutional line-item veto is thrilling to those of us who know when it comes to federal spending, it's not so much bad people as bad process," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican and chairman of the Republican Study Committee, the conservative caucus in the House.

Mr. Pence said Mr. Bush would use the line-item veto because the "stakes are so much lower" in targeting individual spending than blocking an entire bill passed by a Republican Congress.

"There is no single reform that would do more to put our fiscal house in order than the line-item veto. The problem with federal spending is no one's in charge, so everyone is," he said.

House Republican leaders said they support the concept, and Senate Republican leaders went further. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, is sponsoring the Senate version of the bill, along with Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration thinks the time is ripe, given the interest on spending cuts on Capitol Hill. He said the fight against wasteful spending is bipartisan, so he predicted the line-item veto proposal would attract bipartisan support.

Although Mrs. Pelosi and Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, have opposed line-item authority, Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat and Mr. Bush's opponent in the 2004 election, said he supports the concept and will introduce his own proposal.

Congress passed a line-item veto in 1996, but in 1998, the Supreme Court ruled 6-3 that it was unconstitutional because it gave the president the power to amend a law after it had been passed by Congress. The majority ruled that sort of change must come through constitutional amendment, not law.

Under that system, the president had five days after he signed a bill to make line-item cuts. Congress could only reinstate the cuts by passing a separate bill, subject to a regular presidential veto and requiring a two-thirds vote of each chamber to overturn it.

Bush administration officials said their version doesn't violate the Constitution because it doesn't give the president unilateral authority. Instead, it sets up a process to push Congress to act on his recommendations.

Bush Asks Congress For "Line-item Veto" Power (REU-Y2)

By Caren Bohan

Reuters, March 6, 2006

President George W. Bush, who has never vetoed a spending bill, asked the U.S. Congress on Monday to give him a line-item veto that would allow him to propose canceling specific spending projects.

But Bush's proposal faces hurdles because an earlier version that Congress passed under former President Bill Clinton was rejected by the Supreme Court as unconstitutional.

Bush said the 1998 court decision "should not be the end of the story" and said his proposal was crafted in a way to satisfy the court's concerns.

"By passing this version of the line-item veto, the administration will work with the Congress to reduce wasteful spending, reduce the budget deficit and ensure that taxpayer dollars are spent wisely," he said.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said he would introduce the legislation.

In striking down the Clinton-era line-item veto by a vote of 6-3, the Supreme Court said Congress was not authorized under the Constitution to hand the president that power.

But White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the Bush proposal would differ from that 1996 law, which allowed the president to pencil out specific spending items only after a bill was passed by Congress.

Under the Bush proposal, the president would identify areas in a spending bill he considered wasteful and then send the package back to Congress. Congress would have 10 days to hold an up or down vote on the package.

DOJ_NMG_0016644

Democrats, who have criticized Bush's tax cuts as fiscally reckless, said the line-item veto was not a panacea for record budget deficits.

"The Bush administration has spent us into record deficits and piled mountains of debt onto our children," said House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi of California. But she added, "Budget experts agree that the line-item veto would do little to control deficits."

However, Democratic Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, who ran against Bush in the 2004, supported the line-item veto proposal, which mirrored one Kerry had previously proposed.

"Billions of dollars are being wasted on things like research to enhance the flavor of roasted peanuts and the infamous 'bridge to nowhere,'" Kerry said.

Announcing the line-item veto proposal at a swearing-in ceremony for Ed Lazear, his new chairman of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, Bush said it would allow him to take aim at "special-interest spending."

'BRIDGE TO NOWHERE'

A major congressional lobbying scandal involving Jack Abramoff and the conviction of former California Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham on bribery charges have put a spotlight on pet projects that lawmakers often add to bills to please constituents in their home states.

Bush has been criticized by many conservatives for the surge in federal spending on his watch.

One example of a pet project critics often cite was a bridge proposal in Alaska ridiculed as the "Bridge to Nowhere" because it would have served a very small population.

The bridge was part of $287-billion transportation bill that many conservatives had urged Bush to veto. Bush signed the transportation bill and hailed it as a job-creating measure.

Spending on the Alaska bridge was later canceled, but the state received the money anyway in its general transportation funds.

Republicans worry that big deficits could hurt them in this year's midterm election in which Democrats are seeking to regain control of both houses of Congress.

The Bush administration has forecast a fiscal 2006 budget deficit of $423 billion, an all-time high.

Bush Seeks To Restore 'pork-barrel Spending' Veto (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 7, 2006

The White House sought on Monday to restore the president's power to veto specific spending measures, a move that could sharply increase his authority to block items deemed wasteful, "pork barrel" spending.

President George W. Bush proposed legislation that would be designed "to meet Supreme Court standards" and would "give me the authority to strip special-interest spending and earmarks out of a bill and then send them back to Congress for an up-or-down vote".

The Republican-controlled Congress gave the White House a line-item veto in 1996, but it was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, with six of the nine justices ruling that it overstepped the president's constitutional authority.

Mr Bush's effort to restore the veto comes at a time of growing concern about Washington's apparent inability to restrain the growth in government spending. The Congressional Budget Office said last week that the budget deficit would rise to $371bn this year, from $318bn in 2005, in spite of record tax revenues.

While most of the spending growth has come from the military and homeland security, and from entitlement programmes such as Medicare and Social Security, it has been exacerbated by the growth of so-called "earmarks" – specific spending measures targeted at constituencies favoured by members of Congress.

Circumventing the Supreme Court's judgment on the line-item veto may not be easy. The 1996 bill allowed the president to strip out specific spending items and required a two-thirds majority vote by Congress to reinstate them.

Justice John Paul Stevens, writing for the majority on the court, said Congress could alter the president's role in determining the final text of a law only through a constitutional amendment. The White House proposal would allow the president to split out spending items and send them back to the Congress.

Congress would be required to consider the spending within 10 days for an up or down vote. The president could be defeated by a simple majority rather than a two thirds majority required to defeat a normal veto. But the measure could not be filibustered.

Dan Coats, the former US senator who sponsored the line-item veto in the 1990s, said the law would need to be carefully drafted. "They will need to find some way that does not violate the separation of powers, unless they are just trying to score political points," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0016645

Joshua Bolten, director of the White House Office of Management and Budget, said that the legislation would be "air tight" in constitutional terms. The bill will be sponsored in the Senate by Bill Frist, majority leader, and John McCain, a Republican fiscal conservative.

President Bill Clinton used the budget-cutting tool 82 times in 1997, saving $2bn over five years.

But Chris Edwards, head of tax studies at Cato, a libertarian think-tank, while supportive of a line-item veto, said it would not get to the heart of America's fiscal problems.

"There has been a broad failure to keep spending under control and earmarks have just been a small part of this," he said.

Bush Wants Modified Line-item Veto Power (USAT)

USA Today, March 7, 2006

President Bush asked Congress on Monday to give him a line-item veto power that would allow him to propose canceling specific spending projects without having to veto an entire bill. The Supreme Court struck down a similar law eight years ago, but Bush said his version is crafted to satisfy the court's concerns.

He said 43 governors have line-item veto power, and "it's time to bring this important tool of fiscal discipline to Washington."

President Clinton was given line-item veto power in 1996, but the Supreme Court declared the law unconstitutional because it allowed the president to amend laws passed by Congress. Under the Bush proposal, instead of being able to strike items from bills, the president would send one or more items back to Congress for an up-or-down vote.

Treasury chief asks for higher debt ceiling

Treasury Secretary John Snow notified Congress that the administration has now taken "all prudent and legal actions," including tapping certain government retirement funds, to keep from hitting the $8.2 trillion national debt limit. Snow urged lawmakers to pass a new debt ceiling to avoid the nation's first-ever default on its obligations. Treasury officials have said the current limit will be surpassed sometime during the week of March 20.

An actual default on the debt, a situation when the government misses making payments to current bondholders, is a doomsday scenario that would severely damage the government's credit rating.

Army Corps defends levee reconstruction

The Army Corps of Engineers defended the quality of materials being used to rebuild the levees around New Orleans. Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, head of the Army Corps, said he told President Bush that 100 miles of the 169 miles of levees damaged by Hurricane Katrina have been restored.

Strock took issue with findings from two teams of independent experts who said the corps was taking shortcuts and using substandard materials, leaving large sections of the system substantially weaker than before the Aug. 29 storm.

Bush Seeks Limited Veto Power On Spending (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush asked Congress on Monday to give him limited authority to veto individual items in spending measures, resurrecting a top priority of fiscal conservatives.

Expressing optimism that the measure would win congressional approval and pass court tests, the White House said its proposal took into account objections the Supreme Court had raised in 1998 when it ruled that a similar provision signed two years earlier by President Clinton was unconstitutional.

In Congress, however, the outcome was less certain than the White House suggested.

Democratic leaders in the House and the Senate objected to the plan, but it probably will benefit from the momentum building to rein in "earmarks" — the practice of inserting into legislation specific spending measures that benefit only individual projects or communities.

Referring to the court's rejection of the law eight years ago, Bush said: "That should not be the end of the story."

He said his proposed measure would give him "the authority to strip special spending and earmarks out of a bill, and then send them back to Congress for an up-or-down vote."

The president has frequently expressed his interest in obtaining the line-item veto — an authority granted to 43 of 50 U.S. governors — but he has not made a concerted push to gain congressional approval for it and had not sent a specific proposal to Congress until Monday. As Democrats frequently point out, the budget has gone from healthy surplus to spiraling deficit during his five years in office, while Bush has failed to veto any legislation.

But "fertile ground … exists now in Congress," said Josh Bolten, the director of the Office of Management and Budget — referring to the growing pressure in the House and the Senate to limit earmarks.

Under Bush's formula, unlike the one ruled unconstitutional eight years ago, Congress would retain the last word.

DOJ_NMG_0016646

If the president opposes certain provisions in a spending bill, the proposal would allow him to sign the legislation but defer spending the disputed money.

Congress would then be asked to approve a second measure killing the offending provisions. It would have 10 days to comply, and would not be allowed to amend it or delay a vote by filibuster. If Congress did not support the president's request, the targeted spending would have to proceed.

Under the Constitution, the House and Senate must pass a bill, and the president must sign it, for legislation to become law. In a 6-3 decision, the Supreme Court ruled that the Line Item Veto Act amended that process by giving the president new power to cancel some parts of a bill.

By White House count, presidents as far back as Ulysses S. Grant, who served from 1869 to 1877, have sought the line-item veto — and Congress has objected, because it allows a president to pick and choose among spending items that Congress sends to the White House.

Although details of the proposal remained sketchy, some Supreme Court experts said the new measure might get around judicial objections.

"This might work," said Mark V. Tushnet, an expert on constitutional law at Georgetown University Law Center.

Walter Dellinger, who as acting solicitor general argued on behalf of the Clinton administration in favor of the measure the court struck down, was more certain.

"This is unquestionably constitutional," he said. "It is possible to construct a constitutionally defensible provision under which Congress would be required to cast a recorded vote on particular items."

Besides, he said, the president would likely be playing a strong hand by asking Congress to hold back on specific spending.

It would be politically costly for Congress to vote to override a line-item veto, Dellinger said.

In striking down the 1996 legislation, the court voted along non-ideological lines. The conservative chief justice, William H. Rehnquist, voted with the majority; while frequent swing vote Sandra Day O'Connor, liberal Stephen G. Breyer and conservative Antonin Scalia formed the minority.

Supreme Court experts said there was no suggestion how the current court — with John G. Roberts Jr. replacing Rehnquist and Samuel A. Alito Jr. replacing O'Connor — would receive any challenge to the legislation.

The politics of the line-item veto makes for unusual teammates.

In 2004, Congress rejected a provision that would have done what Bush says he wants to do: require Congress to vote on recommendations to eliminate specific projects from appropriations bills. The vote was 237-174, with 89 Republicans joining the 147 Democrats and one independent who voted against it.

Bolten was happy to point out Monday that during the 2004 presidential campaign, Sen. John F. Kerry, the Democratic candidate, proposed a measure similar to that advanced by the White House.

On Monday, the Massachusetts senator said: "It's no secret that President Bush and I don't agree on much, but I fully support giving him the line-item veto." He said he would introduce such legislation.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) objected to Bush's plan, and House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) said: "President Bush has presided over the largest fiscal turnaround in our nation's history, turning a projected $5.6 trillion surplus [over 10 years] to a deficit of $3.3 trillion.

"The line-item veto would do little to control deficits," she said.

And Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), while supporting the line-item veto, pointed out that if Bush wanted to curtail earmarks, he could simply refuse to fund many of them.

This is because many earmarks are not in legislation, but in the congressional committee report accompanying the bill. Thus, he said, the appropriations bill this year that funds the science agencies and the Departments of State, Justice and Commerce contains 2,394 earmarks — 228 of which are in the text of the law.

Reconciliation A Tough Sell In 2006 (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

In what may be more of a face-saving effort than any real attempt to reduce the deficit this year, both the House and Senate Budget panels are looking at including less than $10 billion in savings or mandatory spending cuts in their versions of the budget resolution this year.

Snow Says U.S. Has Taken 'All Steps' To Avoid Debt Limit (WSJ)

A Wall Street Journal Online News Roundup

DOJ_NMG_0016647

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Treasury Secretary John Snow notified Congress on Monday that the administration has now taken "all prudent and legal actions" to keep from hitting the $8.2 trillion national debt limit.

In a letter to Congressional leaders, Mr. Snow urged lawmakers to pass a new debt ceiling immediately to avoid the nation's first-ever default on its obligations. "I know that you share the president's and my commitment to maintaining the full faith and credit of the U.S. government," Mr. Snow wrote.

Treasury officials, briefing congressional aides last week, said that the government will run out of maneuvering room to keep from exceeding the current limit sometime during the week of March 20.

Mr. Snow said government debt managers are starting to use the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund to stay below the current limit. Mr. Snow said he has declared a "debt issuance suspension period," a technical designation that lets Treasury suspend new investments for the civil-service fund and redeem some of that fund's investments, "as authorized by law."

The Treasury secretary said "it is important to understand" that this maneuver "provides only a few days of additional borrowing capacity, which we expect will be exhausted by mid-March."

Treasury officials also announced that on Friday they had used the $15 billion in the Exchange Stabilization Fund, a reserve the Treasury secretary has that is normally used to smooth out volatile movements in the value of the dollar in currency markets.

Treasury has also been taking investments out of a $65.3 billion government pension fund known as the G-fund. Officials have said that once the debt limit is raised, the investments taken out of the pension funds would be replaced and any lost interest payments would be made up. The formal title for the G-fund is the Government Securities Investment Fund of the Federal Employees Retirement System.

An actual default on the debt, a situation when the government misses making payments to current bondholders, is a doomsday scenario considered highly unlikely given what it would do to the government's credit rating.

It is expected that Congress will approve an increase in the current $8.18 trillion debt limit by perhaps $781 billion. Mr. Snow will be meeting privately this week with U.S. lawmakers to discuss the importance of raising the debt limit, Treasury spokesman Tony Fratto said at a routine press briefing on Monday.

Senate Democrats have asked the Republican leadership for extended debate before raising the debt limit. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) has said he wants to amend debt limit-increase legislation "to reduce the need for further debt increases in the future."

Whatever concerns Congress may have about the longer-term budget outlook, "we cannot hold hostage the full faith and credit of the United States of America," Mr. Fratto said Monday. Any indication from lawmakers that they can't support an increase is "not appropriate and certainly not sustainable," he said. "At the end of the day, the debt ceiling needs to be raised."

Congress has put off a debt-limit increase until "the eleventh hour" several times during President Bush's administration, but "we cannot take it for granted" that putting off the increase this time won't be problematic, Mr. Fratto said.

The administration has sent Congress a budget that on paper would cut the deficit in half by 2009, the year Mr. Bush leaves office. But Democrats contend the administration met its deficit-reduction goal only by leaving out major spending items such as the full costs of the Iraq war. They say the deficit won't improve unless Mr. Bush abandons his effort to make his first-term tax cuts permanent.

Sen. Max Baucus (D., Mont.) said last week that under Mr. Bush the total of the deficits has increased by $3 trillion, a 40% increase from where the national debt, the total of previous deficits, stood when Mr. Bush took office in January 2001.

Will D.C. Circuit Nominee's Conservative Credentials Be His Undoing? (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, March 7, 2006

Most nights a line snakes out the door at Lauriol Plaza, the trendy Mexican restaurant on 18th Street in Dupont Circle that draws a cross section of the Washington, D.C., cognoscenti, many of whom come as much to make the scene as to sample the cuisine.

On one such evening about two years ago, James Brochin, a New York lawyer, was waiting to be seated with a few buddies from Yale Law School, including Brett Kavanaugh, staff secretary for President George W. Bush.

Nearby, Jeff Berman, then counsel to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., on the Senate Judiciary Committee, caught Kavanaugh's eye and walked over. Kavanaugh was in the midst of a bitter confirmation battle over his nomination to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, but the staffer still wanted to trade a few friendly words before heading out the door.

DOJ_NMG_0016648

"I was struck at the time by the irony that this guy's boss was spending a great deal of energy trying to shoot Brett down, yet he was still good friends with this staffer," recalls Brochin, a partner at Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison.

It might seem unusual, but the story is emblematic of the complex politics and loyalties often just behind the scenes of the judicial nomination process. It also illustrates the challenge Democrats have facing off against this 41-year-old Maryland native, whose stalled nomination is expected to come before the Senate Judiciary Committee again as early as next month.

Kavanaugh's conservative credentials are etched indelibly into his résumé. In fact, he's something of the Zelig of young Republican lawyers. A protégé of independent counsel Kenneth Starr, he was a key figure in the Whitewater investigation. In the recount fight after the 2000 election, he served as a foot soldier in the legal army that descended on Florida and gave Bush his presidency. As a lawyer for Bush in the White House counsel's office, he shepherded most of the administration's contentious federal court nominees, including Miguel Estrada and Priscilla Owen.

But whether his right-wing bona fides will incite enough Democratic opposition to keep him off the bench remains an open question.

THE LONG AND WINDING ROAD

Kavanaugh was first nominated to the D.C. Circuit in July 2003, but faced sharp opposition at his hearing the following April, where Senate Democrats lambasted him for his youth, lack of judicial experience and partisanship. Although the American Bar Association rated him "well qualified," Schumer bluntly labeled Kavanaugh's nomination "payment for political services rendered."

Attention shifted, however, to the 2004 presidential election, and Kavanaugh's nomination was marooned in committee. He was then left out of the "Gang of 14" deal last summer, which allowed three previously controversial nominees to be voted on in the Senate, and that seemed to signal nobody was interested in a brawl over him. Then came more than six months of bruising Supreme Court confirmation fights, during which Kavanaugh remained buried.

But when the Senate moved to hold over all nominees at the end of the last congressional session, Kavanaugh was again left out because of Democratic opposition. So the White House renominated him in January, sending the message that it won't allow Kavanaugh to be forgotten.

Now he's back at the front of the confirmation line. And while Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has made Kavanaugh a priority this session, his path looks just as rocky as it did two years ago. Just last Friday, Senate Democrats renewed their call for another hearing on Kavanaugh. The D.C. Circuit -- often called the second-most-important court in the country because of its jurisdiction over federal government agencies -- has been fertile ground for past confirmation fights. Exhibit A: the controversy over Miguel Estrada, so nasty that it led him to withdraw in September 2003.

Senate Democrats are girding for a similar knock-down, drag-out fight over Kavanaugh, and that fight looms as the latest test of Democrats' clout on future federal court confirmations.

"If the Democrats weren't able to stop [Samuel] Alito," says Sheldon Goldman, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, "the question that is being asked now is, How can they stop anyone who is as professionally qualified as Brett Kavanaugh?"

MAKING A MODEL CONSERVATIVE

Politics have always threaded through Kavanaugh's life. Raised in Bethesda, Md., he was the only child in a tight-knit family of lawyers. His mother, Martha, was a prosecutor in the state attorney's office and later worked as a criminal defense lawyer. She was nominated to the Montgomery County Circuit Court in 1995, where she served until retiring, nearly five years ago.

Kavanaugh's father, Edward, was a prominent figure inside the Beltway. As head of the Cosmetic, Toiletry and Fragrance Association for 22 years, he was friends with congressional heavyweights including the late Speaker of the House Thomas "Tip" O'Neill, D-Mass., and Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah. (Indeed, Hatch gave him a special welcome at his son's nomination hearing.)

Bright, hard working and unflappable, Kavanaugh attended all-boys Catholic schools, first at Mater Dei and then at Georgetown Preparatory High School, where he excelled both in class and in sports, playing on the basketball and football teams. Friends also recall him being infused with a sense of religious faith that remains important to him today.

From an early age, Kavanaugh seems to have been drawn to the law. Growing up, he sat in on some of his mother's cases and spent a few summers interning on Capitol Hill. But unlike many children of well-connected Washingtonians, Kavanaugh didn't come off to others as arrogant or transparently ambitious. "Brett's a chess player," says Steve Ochs, Kavanaugh's high school history teacher. "He always sees moves ahead without having guile."

That sense of reserve carried over to Yale University, where friends recall him as more of a sports guy than a campus partisan involved in student politics. Kavanaugh's more liberal friends certainly knew he was conservative but say he based friendships on shared interests rather than shared politics.

DOJ_NMG_0016649

Kavanaugh went directly to Yale Law School, graduating in 1990. While there he wrote an article in the Yale Law Journal analyzing the 1986 Supreme Court case Batson v. Kentucky, which restricted the use of peremptory challenges to strike jurors on the basis of race. Kavanaugh argued that the decision still left the exact enforcement procedures to the lower courts, but advocated a defendant's right to be present during any hearing on the proper use of peremptory challenges.

After law school, Kavanaugh spent two years clerking in federal appeals courts, first for Judge Walter Stapleton on the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals and then for 9th Circuit Judge Alex Kozinski (an icon for many legal conservatives, but something of an iconoclast himself).

Kozinski's clerkships are notoriously demanding, a kind of boot camp for young lawyers with Federalist Society credentials. A perfectionist and an outspoken conservative on a liberal court, Kozinski routinely cycles through dozens of drafts on opinions. To meet the workload, Kavanaugh and his fellow clerks worked in shifts. Mark Perry, now co-chair of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's D.C. office, recalls that when he clerked alongside Kavanaugh, he took the early shift, which started at 6 a.m., while Kavanaugh had the "late" one, which began at 8 a.m. -- and ran until 9 or 10 at night, six days a week.

In Kozinski, Kavanaugh found a mentor and an intellectual sparring partner. "He's not one to sort of jump to conclusions. He weighs and he considers and goes back and forth," Kozinski recalls of their legal debates. "I think we sort of reinforce each other." Kozinski likens Kavanaugh's legal philosophy to that of Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Alito. "The question is what he would do in close cases," he says. "I think in close cases he would offer the conservative-libertarian result."

From Kozinski's chambers, Kavanaugh moved to a yearlong fellowship in the solicitor general's office under Starr. There he worked alongside conservative luminaries such as Roberts and Maureen Mahoney and had a chance to argue his first appeals court case. In 1993, Kavanaugh moved up the clerkship ladder again, this time into the chambers of Justice Anthony Kennedy on the Supreme Court.

PLUNGING INTO WHITEWATER

As Kavanaugh's Kennedy clerkship was ending in the summer of 1994, Starr was tapped to replace Robert Fiske as independent counsel in the Whitewater investigation. One of his first moves was to bring Kavanaugh on board.

It was a watershed moment for the 29-year-old lawyer, one that would earn him both acclaim and lasting enemies. One of his initial duties was to lead the probe into the apparent suicide of White House counsel Vincent Foster, a close personal friend of President Bill Clinton and first lady Hillary and a former colleague of Hillary's at the Rose Law Firm in Arkansas -- which Kavanaugh also investigated. Though Starr closed these investigations without prosecuting, Kavanaugh did not make any friends in the Clinton White House. Now-Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., in particular took bitter exception to Kavanaugh's investigatory tactics, which she viewed as a partisan witch hunt meant to destroy her and her husband.

In 1997, Kavanaugh briefly retreated into private practice, joining Kirkland & Ellis, Starr's old firm. But after less than a year, Starr asked him to return to the independent counsel's office to argue a case stemming from the Foster investigation that had been granted certiorari by the Supreme Court.

The case, Swidler & Berlin v. United States, led to an important decision on the scope of attorney-client privilege -- but not one in Kavanaugh's favor. The issue was whether attorney James Hamilton was required to turn over notes to Starr on a conversation he had with his now-deceased client, Foster. Kavanaugh argued that lower court precedent, particularly in criminal cases, suggested that the attorney-client privilege did not survive the death of the client. Many attorneys found the position controversial because it encroached on a well-established privilege.

Hamilton, who argued the case himself, says despite the loss, Kavanaugh was impressive. "Brett is obviously a very talented lawyer. Although he lost the Swidler case -- to the benefit of both clients and the profession -- he did well with a most difficult position."

According to Bob Woodward's book "Shadow: Five Presidents and the Legacy of Watergate," Kavanaugh was also something of a moderating force in the office. He was among those who encouraged Starr to seek direct testimony from White House intern Monica Lewinsky and Clinton about their affair rather than simply write the report based on secondhand accounts. He questioned whether Starr needed to hand over the narrative section of the final report to Congress. And though he helped assemble the 11 possible legal violations laid out in the report, he was opposed to Congress' decision to release the report to the public.

Even after he left Starr's office, Kavanaugh continued to express concerns over the power afforded the independent counsel, going so far as to write an article for the Georgetown Law Journal arguing that Congress should change the statute to limit the politicization of the independent counsel position.

Yet Kavanaugh's tenure with Starr continues to enrage Democrats, who note that he has defended the former independent counsel's work in newspaper editorials. In one such piece for The Washington Post, Kavanaugh said that subsequent congressional action, such as the vote by the House of Representatives to impeach Clinton, fully vindicated Starr's investigation.

THE PRESIDENT'S LAW FIRM

DOJ_NMG_0016650

In 1999, Kavanaugh returned to Kirkland, where he mostly handled appellate cases for corporate clients such as Verizon Communications Inc., America Online Inc., and General Motors Corp.

Even in private practice, Kavanaugh managed to get involved in charged cases. For instance, he and a colleague joined the last-ditch appeal of Elian Gonzalez's deportation back to Cuba after a panel on the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that it did not have jurisdiction to overturn the Department of Justice's decision. The Supreme Court denied cert.

Kavanaugh also filed an amicus brief in the 1999 case Santa Fe School District v. Jane Doe, in which he represented two Republican congressmen who were supporting a school district's policy that allowed student-initiated prayer at football games. The Supreme Court ruled that the policy violated the Constitution's establishment clause.

But Kavanaugh's true return to politics came in 2000, when he joined the Bush recount team in Florida, overseeing Volusia County. After the election he was offered a spot in the White House counsel's office, then headed by Alberto Gonzales, where he joined an A-list of top conservative lawyers, including Rachel Brand, now assistant attorney general for the Office of Legal Counsel; Stuart Bowen, now special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction; and Courtney Elwood, the current deputy chief of staff for Gonzales.

That office, however, has come under scrutiny recently for its role in drafting memos justifying the use of torture in questioning terrorism suspects and validating the National Security Agency's domestic eavesdropping program. Although he worked in the office at the time, Kavanaugh hasn't been directly tied to those controversial policies.

He was, however, at the forefront of other divisive issues, most notably serving as a chief architect of the administration's judicial selection process. He helped vet candidates and worked as a liaison between the White House and Capitol Hill, coordinating hearings with Republican staffers.

Along with judicial nominations, Kavanaugh pushed tort reform legislation on issues including asbestos, class actions and terrorism risk insurance. He was also the main author of a controversial executive memo that allows presidents and their families to limit the release of presidential documents.

Once again in a place known for grueling hours, Kavanaugh stood out. He became a fast favorite of Gonzales, who put him forward as a candidate for a seat on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Maryland senators objected because they wanted a nominee who had practiced in their home state.

Meanwhile, Kavanaugh replaced Harriet Miers as staff secretary, a little-known but powerful post in the Executive Office of the President. It's more a political than a policy job, but lawyers often hold it because it requires reviewing every piece of paper before it lands on the president's desk. Kavanaugh's position has brought him close to Bush, with whom he has traveled around the globe. The president even made a special appearance at Kavanaugh's 2004 wedding to Bush's personal secretary, Ashley Estes, held at Georgetown's Christ Episcopal Church.

The close association with the president has only fanned Democratic furor over Kavanaugh's nomination. Democrats especially want to question him on whether he had a role in approving the NSA wiretapping program. "He doesn't have the legal philosophy that ought to be had for that position," says Elliot Mincberg, legal director of the liberal People For the American Way. "Most of his career has been spent as a far-right advocate." Maybe so, but Democrats have few options to derail Kavanaugh, without resorting to a filibuster.

In the meantime, in his West Wing office, Kavanaugh remains busy serving the president he helped put in the White House. In that office three large photographs adorn the front wall.

In the first, the president appears at his Oval Office desk with Kavanaugh and now-Chief Justice Roberts. To the right is a picture of Bush greeting the late Pope John Paul II at the Vatican. The third shot shows the president, behind a wooden podium, introducing his first crop of judicial nominees from the spring of 2001, a group that included Roberts, Estrada and Owen.

It's a display befitting of a presidential aide, no doubt. But nervous Democrats might wonder how they would look in a judge's chambers.

How Do You Get To The Supreme Court? Practice, Practice, Practice (LAW)

By Alyson M. Palmer, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County (GA) Daily Report, March 7, 2006

When R. Jonathan Hart stepped up to the microphone before the country's nine most powerful jurists on March 1, he joined a small, eclectic club of Georgia attorneys who have argued before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Chatham County Attorney sought to convince the high court to uphold the decision of a Savannah, Ga., federal judge, affirmed by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, that the county is immune from suit for damages arising from an accident involving a drawbridge maintained by the county.

DOJ_NMG_0016651

In preparing for the argument and drafting the county's brief, Hart got the assistance of, among others, a law school professor who has argued before the high court several times. But rather than have the professor, David J. Bederman of Emory University, argue the case, Hart decided to handle the case himself.

"You only get to do this every once in a while in your lifetime," he said.

Unless you are someone like Miguel A. Estrada, Hart's opposing counsel last Wednesday.

Estrada, a former nominee to a federal appeals court, has argued at least 16 times before the high court, according to his profile on Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher's Web site. Before joining Gibson, Dunn, Estrada served as an assistant to the U.S. solicitor general from 1992 to 1997.

But for many non-government attorneys, the Supreme Court is usually a one-time gig. The 80 or so cases that the Supreme Court agrees to hear each year means that the Court entertains oral argument in a handful of cases coming out of Georgia federal and state courts in a given term.

Hart said that his time in the marbled courtroom was "certainly something that I would do again."

Indeed, David F. Walbert, an Atlanta lawyer who has argued before the Supreme Court several times in his career, called it "as much fun as you can have if you're not intimidated."

Walbert and other Georgia attorneys who have participated in Supreme Court oral argument are not short on stories about their experiences -- or advice for a first-timer.

Walbert said he did not participate in moot court arguments before his first Supreme Court argument in 1982 or a redistricting case that he argued in 2003.

PRACTICE RUNS

But several other local litigators with Supreme Court experience said that such practice runs are essential.

Hart prepared for his argument by coming up to Atlanta for a moot court session with Bederman and other attorneys and law students. That exercise was so helpful, said Hart, "if I had to do it over again, I would have done two of them."

W. Warren Plowden Jr. of Macon, Ga., said that before he represented Monroe County in a school sexual harassment case at the Supreme Court in 1999, he participated in a moot argument that included now-Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr.

Roberts was tough, but Plowden did not mind, saying, "That's the point of the whole thing."

Attorneys emphasized basics such as knowing the case law and facts inside and out but said that rehearsing a 30-minute presentation was a waste of time -- or worse.

"I'm a real believer since my 9th grade speech class," said Walbert, "that if you have a prepared spiel, you're dead."

Atlanta attorney Michael K. Wolensky, who argued a securities case two terms ago, agreed. He said that he needed his notes but had no occasion to use any prepared remarks, encountering his first question approximately 18 seconds into his time.

"Preparing a presentation is useless," said Wolensky. "It's a trap you want to avoid."

Experienced Supreme Court practitioners give the same advice of mothers and grandmothers -- be on time, arriving in Washington preferably several days before the big day.

Hart visited the Supreme Court a day early but found that he had to fight his way through the crowd of onlookers hoping to get a glimpse of former Playboy playmate Anna Nicole Smith, whose inheritance from her late husband was the subject of arguments heard Feb. 28. He said he couldn't get a seat for that argument but managed to secure a spot for another case.

He said that preview allowed him to get familiar with the courtroom and the justices' voices, noting that because the justices' voices are projected through a central sound system, it is sometimes hard to tell from which seat a question is posed.

IN THE SPOTLIGHT

Another attorney said that she had to fight her way through the crowds to get to her own argument.

Paula K. Smith, a senior assistant attorney general, last fall represented the state of Georgia in a case over whether police violated the Fourth Amendment when they searched a home against a defendant's protests but with his wife's consent.

She said that intense interest in that case made the argument all the more difficult.

"Knowing that you're in that kind of spotlight ... it just adds to the pressure, and you have to be careful that you don't let it divert you from the case and the job that you have to do," said Smith.

Fewer eyes were on Hart when he stepped up to the microphone. The courtroom was packed for a prior argument on state tax incentives for corporations but cleared out afterward. But he said that he still felt the pressure.

By some measures, Hart got off easy, not facing any obviously off-the-wall questions or a series of bizarre hypothetical situations justices sometimes pose.

Walbert said that he was told before his first argument that a key challenge was to get past the then-Chief Justice Warren E. Burger's first question.

"It was almost always irrelevant," Walbert said he was told.

DOJ_NMG_0016652

Sure enough, Burger posed the first question as Walbert rose to defend a district court opinion that ruled in favor of his clients' voter discrimination claim.

Burger asked, "Well, how many women governors are there in the country, counselor?" recalled Walbert.

Laurie Webb Daniel, who heads Holland & Knight's appellate practice group, was in her early 30s when she argued before the high court. Despite her youth, she said that only Justice Antonin Scalia's questions caught her off guard.

"He is just dogged in his approach," she said. "And he would ask a hypothetical that I was ready for, and I would answer, and he wouldn't let go."

"Every time I gave him an answer, he would change the facts, because he didn't want me to give him an answer," continued Daniel.

After Justice John Paul Stephens had tested Plowden with a series of hypotheticals "that were getting worse and worse," according to Plowden, Stevens stopped and got a laugh. "He looked over and smiled and said, 'I guess you have to keep saying no, don't you,' and I said, 'Yes sir.'"

"They tell you not to make any jokes," continued Plowden, "but everybody laughed."

Perhaps most important, Hart avoided perhaps the biggest pitfall a litigant can face before the bench of nine justices -- calling a justice by the wrong name, a mistake that has tripped up Supreme Court experts such as Theodore Olson, Walter Dellinger and Laurence Tribe.

(During the 2000 arguments over the presidential election, Miami lawyer Joseph Klock Jr., representing Florida Secretary of State Katherine Harris, addressed Justice John Paul Stevens as "Justice Brennan" and misidentified Justice David Souter as "Justice Breyer.")

Hart decided to keep it simple with "your honor."

"The one thing I was scared about was calling them 'judge,' and that's a big no-no," he said.

Hart kept his wits about him, though, remembering to collect the quills that lawyers appearing before the high court are permitted to take from counsel table as a memento.

Worried that she would be distracted, Daniel told her attorney husband, who sat as her co-counsel, how he could help. "I told him, "Remember to grab the pens.'"

Get On Your Phone Cheney Receives Warm Welcome During Naples Speech (NDN)

By Larry Hannan

Naples Daily News, March 7, 2006

He is one of the most unpopular politicians in America right now. But Vice President Dick Cheney received a hero's welcome tonight when he came to Southwest Florida.

Cheney, who became an object of derision upon shooting a friend on a hunting trip last month, spoke tonight to an adoring crowd of about 400 Collier County Republicans as part of "Victory 2006" at the Naples Beach Hotel and Golf Club.

The event was sponsored by the Collier County Republican Party.

For a few hours Cheney was able to put his approval ratings, 18 percent in a recent CBS poll, out of his mind and speak to a crowd that thinks he's doing a great job.

"It's good to be back in Naples again," Cheney said. "I see a lot of old friends here."

There was no mention of the February shooting during his speech. Cheney accidentally shot Harry Whittington, 78, a lawyer and acquaintance on a quail hunting trip in Corpus Christi, Texas. Whittington spent several days in the hospital and the vice president later apologized.

Monday's event cost $500 per person for dinner and a photo with Cheney. The cost was $150 for a person who didn't want their picture with the vice president.

Carla Dean, chairwoman of the Collier GOP, declined to say how much money was raised at the event. Dean said the money would go toward the grass-roots Republican movement.

This was Cheney's first appearance in Southwest Florida since during his re-election bid in October 2004. Earlier in the day he stumped for GOP candidates in Boca Raton.

The vice president's Naples speech on Monday sounded like the beginning of the campaign for the 2006 congressional elections. It included a strong defense of President George W. Bush, and a call to elect Republicans to the House and Senate.

"We're grateful to our friends in Collier County and throughout Florida," Cheney said. "A great grass-roots campaign helped elect us in 2004 and it will help us again in 2006."

Cheney, who is the president of the Senate, said he was looking forward to swearing in a Republican senator from Florida in January.

DOJ_NMG_0016653

That person would have to defeat incumbent Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson. Rep. Katherine Harris is the only Republican currently running against Nelson, but recent speculation has more people entering the race.

Harris was in the Naples crowd Monday night.

Cheney also defended the administration on the Iraq war, the Patriot Act and the decision to launch a wiretapping program within American to fight terrorism.

For years terrorists could strike America without fearing reprisals. Now that has changed, Cheney said.

"In the last two years we have brought freedom to Iraq," Cheney said. "With each successive election there has been less violence and a greater (voter) turnout."

Bill Barton, a former GOP state committeeman from Collier County, said he felt Cheney was speaking from his heart about protecting America from another terrorist attack.

"He works at it every day. What could be more important?" Barton said.

The wiretapping program, which has been heavily criticized by Democrats and some Republicans, is needed, Cheney said.

"The president authorized a terrorist surveillance program," Cheney said. "Our critics call this a domestic surveillance program but that is inaccurate."

The wiretapping program is not a threat to civil liberties. It only attempts to monitor people in the United States who are communicating with terrorists, Cheney said.

Despite Cheney not mentioning his hunting mishap, U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Miami, whose district includes parts of Collier, lauded Cheney for not avoiding controversial issues such as the surveillance program.

"The vice president, as he always does, calls it as he sees it," Diaz-Balart said.

The vice president also said tax cuts enacted by Congress in the last five years should be made permanent. Comments

This site does not necessarily agree with comments posted below — responsibility lies with the relevant reader alone. Read our blog agreement.

2 of 3 people found this comment useful.

Posted by neoconnot (anonymous) at 10:32 p.m. on March 6, 2006 (Suggest removal)

Obviously an early report, but where is the mention of the peaceful protest against this criminal, Cheney? How the supposed "conservatives" in Collier County fall for this neocon crook is beyond me. "Country Club" Republicans, I guess--caught in la-la land. Clean the fog off your goggles or cataracts, as the case may be, and see how this band of neocons travels from Democrat to Republican circles pushing for endless war. Iran is next as the reason for being in Iraq in the first place was to establish the bases we need to attack Iran. Ol' Rummy, Richard Perle, Wolfowitz, Cheney and the gang have been pushing for this since the sordid Clinton era.

Cheney Delivers GOP Pep Talk (NEP)

By Betty Parker

News Press, March 7, 2006

NAPLES — Vice President Dick Cheney urged party faithful to work hard for Republicans in the fall elections and pressure Congress for tax cuts in a speech to Collier County Republicans on Monday night.

Brought to Naples because of his 30-year friendship with Collier state committeeman Al Abrams of Naples, Cheney reiterated many of the themes President Bush stressed in his state of the union speech.

Cheney spoke for about 20 minutes at the start of the 6:30 p.m. event at the Naples Beach Hotel and Golf Club — before the meal was served — and left immediately for Southwest Florida International Airport, causing slight delays on Interstate 75 after landing at 3:45 p.m. and on departure.

Dinner and a photo $500

Cynthia Odierna and a group of protesters demonstrate against Vice President Cheney outside the Naples Beach Hotel and Golf Club on Monday. About 425 people attended, paying $500 for a photo with the vice president and the dinner, and $150 for dinner and speech.

The crowd in Collier's GOP stronghold was clearly enthusiastic about Cheney and Bush, with many sporting campaign buttons from past races.

"I'm so excited to hear him in person," said Bobbie Dusek of Naples, who came attired in red, white and blue.

"He's a such an eloquent speaker with such a great mind. It's thrilling just to sit in the same room with him."

A group of about 20 protesters kept a block away was far outnumbered, but not deterred. Several carried peace signs and war protests.

John Riccio of Naples wore a T-shirt that said, "Don't Shoot Me, I'm Not A Quail."

He also had a sign saying, "How many more must die?" to show his opposition to the war in Iraq.

"I'm a veteran myself, and I know what it is to be a soldier," said Riccio, adding that he has two sons who recently returned home after serving in Iraq.

"They don't always agree with me, but this is not a just war. We went under false pretenses."

Hunting mishap ignored

Cheney made no reference to the recent shooting incident in Texas when he accidentally peppered a hunter with birdshot.

But he praised America's strong economy, and said that tax cuts under Bush have left $880 billion in citizens' hands that otherwise would have gone to the government.

"Congress needs to make the Bush tax cuts permanent," he said.

Congress also needs to work on changing the way they do the national budget, Cheney said, "and we look forward to working with responsible members on the Hill for budget reform."

Many of his comments, however, dealt with the battle against terrorists.

"There's still hard work ahead on the war on terror," he said, adding that "the war on terror involves the home front as well. The Patriot Act is vital to protecting the American public."

Debate over the administration's watchdog actions at home has caused some to wrongly criticize the administration actions as "domestic surveillance,"

Cheney said. "That is not accurate."

In actuality, he said, "one end is the United States, and one end, we believe, is connected to al-Qaida."

Although critics say it's gone too far, he said, "this program has helped prevent terrorist attacks."

The packed crowd at the club included numerous party leaders and elected officials, including U.S. Rep. Connie Mack, R-Fort Myers, who introduced the vice president; Florida Republican Party Chairwoman Carole Jean Jordan; GOP gubernatorial candidate Charlie Crist; U.S. Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart, R-Miami, whose district includes part of Collier; and U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Sarasota, and the party's leading candidate in the U.S. Senate race against Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson.

Harris rode back to Washington on Monday night in Cheney's jet.

"It's not often you get to spend that much time with the vice president talking about the campaign and the needs of the district," Harris said.

Cheney Touts Shaw, Harris (MH)

By Beth Reinhard

The Miami Herald, March 7, 2006

BOCA RATON - Vice President Dick Cheney helped raise about $300,000 for Republican U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw at a luncheon Monday and declared that his administration was fulfilling its most important duty -- ``protecting the American people and winning the war on terror."

Yet even some members of Cheney's own party have recently questioned his national security policies, the Bush administration's biggest selling point since the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Some Republicans -- including Shaw -- have disagreed with Bush's approval of a United Arab Emirates-owned company running commercial operations at six seaports, including the Port of Miami. Shaw is co-sponsoring a bill that would ban foreign government-owned companies from operating American ports.

Still, Shaw's reelection opponent, Democratic state Sen. Ron Klein, described the 25-year congressman as an "alter-ego" of Cheney and Bush. Klein, who spoke at a senior center in an event organized to contrast with Cheney's appearance at the posh Boca Raton Resort & Club, is seeking to link Shaw with the administration's drooping poll numbers.

Democratic Sen. Bill Nelson used the same tactic Monday against his reelection rival, U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris, sending out a fundraising appeal that mocked her Monday evening appearance with Cheney at a Collier County Republican Party fundraiser. Cheney did not mention her by name in Boca Raton but said that he looks forward to swearing in another Republican senator from Florida.

While Harris' role as Florida Secretary of State during the 2000 presidential recount makes her a villain to many Democrats, Shaw is harder to demonize. In a sign of his reputation for bipartisanship, the heavily Democratic Broward County Commission plans to honor him and Democratic U.S. Rep. Alcee Hastings today for securing federal aid for security and other issues.

Also on Monday, Shaw affirmed his bid to lead the Ways and Means Committee after Chairman Bill Thomas officially announced his plans to retire. Shaw's competitors include Republicans Jim McCrery of Louisiana and Nancy L. Johnson of Connecticut.

U.S. Rep. Tom Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, noted Shaw's chairmanship hopes at a meeting with reporters Monday at the Biltmore Hotel in Coral Gables. With U.S. Rep. Lincoln Diaz-Balart as vice chairman of the rules committee, and U.S. Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen vying for chairmanship of the international relations committee, South Florida's delegation has "tremendous opportunities," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0016655

"There is not any place I can think of, or a region of the country, that has more of that opportunity right here, right now than South Florida," Reynolds said.

In Boca Raton, Cheney addressed about 250 people who had donated at least $500 each to Shaw's reelection campaign.

He urged Congress to continue the president's tax cuts, commended the recent Supreme Court appointments of Samuel Alito and John Roberts, and said withdrawing troops from Iraq would not be on an "artificial timetable set by politicians in Washington, D.C." He also defended the government's surveillance of suspected terrorists without court warrants.

"Our national security has been protected by more than just luck," he said. ``The enemy is weak and fractured, yet still evil and willing to hurt Americans."

Outside the hotel, about a dozen protesters chanted through Cheney's visit. Their straw hats and flowery skirts contrasted with stoic, dark-suited security detail.

Just a few miles away at the Mae Volen Senior Center, Klein criticized the Republican-sponsored prescription drug plan as a "sham." He said the program is is too confusing and not cost-effective.

"Mr. Shaw continues to apologize for it, and Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney are unwilling to fix it," Klein told about 50 seniors. Later he added: ``This plan is going to be a campaign issue throughout the country, especially in competitive districts."

The race in the senior-rich congressional district promises to be one of the most expensive in the country. The 22nd congressional district runs along the coast from Fort Lauderdale to Jupiter and takes in parts of Coral Springs, Parkland and Plantation.

Shaw issued a press release Monday noting that 53 percent of his district has enrolled in the prescription drug plan.

He has held several public workshops led by Medicare experts.

"The program is working, and it has proven to be a very real benefit for a large number of my constituents," Shaw said in the statement.

No Mention Of Harris Fuels Rumors (FLSUNSEN)

By Anthony Man

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, March 7, 2006

The political buzz among several of those at Vice President Dick Cheney's fund-raiser for U.S. Rep. Clay Shaw, R-Fort Lauderdale, was more about how U.S. Rep. Katherine Harris' Senate campaign may be unraveling.

Cheney even provided some fuel when he said he was looking forward to swearing in a Republican replacement for Democratic U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson -- but didn't mention Harris by name.

"As vice president I look forward to the opportunity to swear in a new Republican senator to serve next to Mel Martinez in the United States Senate," Cheney said.

Morgan Dobbs, Harris' campaign press secretary, said her boss wasn't dropping out.

"We are continuing to move forward to charge ahead in the campaign," she said.

Dobbs didn't have any reaction to Cheney's failure to mention her boss' name. "I can't really comment on an event I wasn't at," she said.

If Harris doesn't run, the biggest potential candidate is Gov. Jeb Bush.

The hometown favorite for Palm Beach County Republicans is U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fort Pierce, who got his political start in the county and still represents part of the area in Congress.

Foley ran for the 2004 Senate nomination, but eventually dropped out of the race.

Foley said Monday speculation about his running was premature.

"Nothing's really changed in my life because she's still the candidate," he said, adding that if Harris leaves the race, "then I'd have to make a decision."

Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Palm Beach County Republican Party, also said discussion about Harris dropping out is "all highly speculative."

Foley would be a good candidate, Dinerstein said.

"Would he do it? There's a downside. He loves being a congressman, and the race would be a difficult one."

Bush Weaves Rug Story Into Many An Occasion (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016656

Nothing says power like the Oval Office. The paintings of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. The bust of Dwight D. Eisenhower. The desk used by both Roosevelts.

And then there's the rug. Don't forget the rug. President Bush never does.

For whatever reason, Bush seems fixated on his rug. Virtually all visitors to the Oval Office find him regaling them about how it was chosen and what it represents. Turns out, he always says, the first decision any president makes is what carpet he wants in his office. As a take-charge leader, he then explains, he of course made a command decision -- he delegated the decision to Laura Bush, who chose a yellow sunbeam design.

Elizabeth Vargas, the ABC News anchor, was the latest to get the treatment. She went by last week to interview Bush before his trip to Afghanistan, India and Pakistan. Sure enough, she wasn't in the room but a minute or two before he started telling her about the carpet.

"You know an interesting story about the rug?" he asked. "Laura designed the rug."

"She did?" Vargas said.

"Yeah, she did. Presidents are able to pick their own rugs or design their own rugs."

Bush went on: "The interesting thing about this rug and why I like it in here is 'cause I told Laura one thing. I said, 'Look, I can't pick the colors and all that. But make it say 'optimistic person.' "

The oval-shaped carpet covers most of the world's most famous office, first occupied in 1909 by William Howard Taft, who found a checkerboard floor made out of mahajua wood from the Philippines. Subsequent presidents have chosen one design or another, but the consistent theme has been the seal in the center with the American eagle holding olive branches in one claw and arrows in the other. In a fit of postwar symbolism, Harry S. Truman changed the seal so that the eagle would face toward the olive branches, not the arrows.

Many presidents have added their own tastes to the Oval Office. "They use the office's imagery," said Fred I. Greenstein, a professor emeritus at Princeton University who has written on presidential leadership. He recalled John F. Kennedy's son John peeking out from under the desk, an image that conveyed youth and family. Lyndon B. Johnson, who was obsessed with breaking news, kept a ticker-tape machine and three television sets in his Oval Office. Ronald Reagan's aide Michael K. Deaver revamped the lighting to make it better for television addresses.

"Ford very deliberately changed the Oval Office to get rid of some of the imperial presidency image," Greenstein recalled of Gerald R. Ford. After the trauma of Watergate, he said, Ford replaced portraits of dour-faced Calvin Coolidge and Woodrow Wilson with paintings of the unpretentious Truman and Lincoln.

Bush has his own touches in the Oval Office -- some Western-themed paintings and an on-loan bust of Winston Churchill courtesy of British Prime Minister Tony Blair. But it is the rug that animates the president.

"He loves his rug," said Nicolle Wallace, the White House communications director. "I've heard him describe it countless times."

Sometimes Bush describes it as a metaphor for leadership. Sometimes he relates how Russian President Vladimir Putin admired the carpet. Sometimes he seems most taken by the lighting qualities.

"When you're giving a tour of the Oval Office, you're trying to point to things that emphasize what you're trying to do" Wallace said. "For him, the optimism is very symbolic of what he wants his presidency to be about."

Not only does the president describe the rug to journalists and foreign leaders, he does so to virtual visitors. During "An Oval Office Tour With President George W. Bush" on the White House site (http://www.whitehouse.gov), he wastes no time pointing out the carpet. "It helps make this room an open and optimistic place," Bush tells viewers.

Some visitors have the impression that the rug story is revealing. In his new book, "Rebel-in-Chief," Fred Barnes recounts how Bush told him about the carpet: "His job, he told me, is to 'stay out of minutiae, keep the big picture in mind, but also make sure that I know enough about what's going on to get the best information possible.' To stress the point, during our interview in the Oval Office Bush called my attention to the rug."

Barnes notes that Bush delegated to the first lady. "Typical of his governing style, though, he gave a clear principle as guidance: he wanted the rug to express the view that an 'optimistic person comes here,' " Barnes reports. "The rug she designed is sunshine yellow."

But if Barnes or other visitors had the idea that Bush was sharing an intimacy just with them, they should listen to his speeches. Bush doesn't need the Oval Office to talk about the Oval Office carpet. Lately he's been taking the story on the road, sharing it with workers at a moving company in Sterling on Jan. 19, then with students at Kansas State University on Jan. 23, and again with supporters at Nashville's Grand Ole Opry on Feb. 1.

"If you walk in that Oval Office," Bush said in Sterling, "I think you're going to say, just like you know it, 'This guy's optimistic.' "

DOJ_NMG_0016657

When it came her turn last week, Vargas expressed dutiful admiration for the rug and then tried to move on to more serious issues. Noting that Bush has two daughters in their twenties, she asked, "Any chances of a White House wedding for either of them, do you think?"

"All I can tell you is this," Bush answered. "If a suitor shows up and asks for their hand, he's going to get to come here to the Oval Office and give me an explanation."

Sounds as though he'll be called on the carpet.

Americans Lack Confidence In Health Reform, Poll Finds (WSJ)

By The Wall Street Journal Online

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

A majority of U.S. adults lack confidence in the Bush administration's ability to reform the nation's health-care system, a new Wall Street Journal Online/Harris Interactive health-care poll shows.

About three-quarters of those polled in the online survey of 2,426 U.S. adults say they aren't confident President Bush will be able to effectively make changes such as slowing the increase in health-care costs for the U.S. as a whole or reducing out-of-pocket health-care costs.

But Americans are divided along party lines about the president's ability to improve health-care, the poll shows. For example, about 5% of Democrats polled say they are confident in his ability to reduce out-of-pocket costs, compared with 40% of Republicans.

Overall, about 30% of those surveyed say they trust the Bush administration's ability to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system. But Americans aren't much more confident in Republicans (31%), Democrats (45%) and Sen. Hillary Clinton (41%) to reform the health-care system.

About 80% of Democrats surveyed say they trust their own party to come up with good health-care policies, compared with 67% of Republicans who have confidence in Republican-led initiatives.

See full results of the poll:

--Beckey Bright "How much do you trust each of the following to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system?"

Base: All Adults * * * "How much do you trust each of the following to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system?" Summary of A Great Deal/To Some Extent

Base: All Adults * * * "In his State of the Union speech this past January, the President referred briefly to his plans for health care. Since then the White House has provided more details on his proposals. How familiar are you with Bush's new health-care proposals?"

Base: All Adults

Note: Percentages may not add up exactly to 100% due to rounding. * * * "Even if you are not sure what his proposals are, how confident are you that President Bush can do the following?"

Base: All Adults

Note: Percentages may not add up exactly to 100% due to rounding. * * * "…How confident are you that President Bush can do the following?" Summary of Very/Somewhat Confident

Base: All Adults * * * "…How confident are you that President Bush can do the following?" Summary of Not Very/Not At All Confident

Base: All Adults

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., Feb. 23-27, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,426 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of =/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. Sampling error for the sub-samples of Republicans (729), Democrats (663) and Independents (614) is higher and varies. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Harris Interactive is a world-wide market research and consulting firm, best known for The Harris Poll and its use of the Internet to conduct scientifically accurate market research. For more information, see www.harrisinteractive.com1. To become a participant in The Harris Poll Online and join future online surveys, see www.harrispollonline.com2.

HSAs Won't Benefit Those Who Need Insurance Most (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0016658

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Your Feb. 21 editorial "Big Health-Care Ideas" noted that the impact of President Bush's proposed health-care reforms would be "profound." You're not whistling "Dixie." Health Savings Accounts would profoundly increase healthcare costs for many consumers, lead others to ration necessary care, and increase the number of uninsured.

Unlike President Bush, your editorial at least acknowledges that fully equalizing the tax treatment for health insurance purchases would undermine employer-sponsored health care. Much as corporations used 401(k)s and IRAs as an excuse to stop providing pensions, employers will use HSAs as an excuse to cease paying for health care.

The beneficiaries of the president's proposals will be corporations and wealthy individuals rather than working families. While the richest among us can afford to deposit more than $10,000 a year in an HSA, few middle-income Americans have even $1,000 a year to spare.

Republicans theorize that high-deductible "catastrophic" policies will motivate cost-conscious consumers to rein in health-care spending. But the information necessary to compare the cost and quality of health-care procedures does not exist. Even if it did, many medical interventions require immediate attention. A patient in an ambulance, for example, shouldn't be asked -- and would often be unable -- to choose between emergency rooms.

Rep. Pete Stark (D., Calif.)
Ranking Member
Ways and Means Health Subcommittee
Washington

Arkansas Set To Undertake A Novel Effort In Health Care (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — The Bush administration is poised to approve an innovative health insurance program, proposed by Arkansas, for 80,000 low-income uninsured people in the state, officials said Monday.

Arkansas will carry out the program, to be announced on Tuesday, under a waiver allowing the state to receive federal Medicaid money for coverage that does not meet the usual Medicaid standards for eligibility and benefits.

The employer-based program is novel in two ways. The benefit package is extremely limited, much more austere than Medicaid's. In addition, if an employer wants to participate, it must guarantee that all its employees, regardless of income or other factors, will be covered.

"Everyone in the employment pool has to have coverage," Mike Huckabee, governor of Arkansas, said in an interview. "Employers cannot cherry-pick the employees who get coverage."

Under the plan, to be approved by Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, the state expects to enroll at least 50,000 workers with incomes less than twice the federal poverty level and 30,000 workers with higher incomes. The poverty level this year is $9,800 for an individual, $13,200 for a couple.

Mr. Huckabee, a second-term Republican, said the new program would help small businesses that currently offer no health insurance. That help will enable them to compete better for workers with larger companies that do provide benefits.

"Forty-six percent of all workers in our state are in companies that have fewer than 100 employees," the governor said. "Only 26 percent of companies with fewer than 50 workers offer any health benefit."

Federal officials said the Arkansas program could be a model for other states that want to expand coverage without substantially increasing costs.

People who sign up for the program will receive a basic benefit package covering six doctor visits a year, seven days of inpatient hospital care a year, two outpatient hospital procedures or emergency room visits a year and two prescription drugs a month.

Beneficiaries will have to pay an annual deductible of $100 and 15 percent of the cost of each service, with a maximum out-of-pocket cost of $1,000 a year, state officials said.

In its application to the government, Arkansas said the new program would "cover most basic health needs" of the intended beneficiaries.

"It won't be an elaborate or upscale model," Mr. Huckabee said in the interview. "It will be very basic coverage."

Mr. Huckabee said participating employers would have to contribute $15 a month for each employee with income less than twice the poverty level and $100 a month for higher-income workers. Julie R. Munsell, a spokeswoman for the Arkansas Department of Health and Human Services, said employers could require workers to pay some or all of these fees.

But Dr. Joseph W. Thompson, who helped devise the program as director of the Arkansas Center for Health Improvement, an independent health policy institute, said: "In reality, employers will have to pay most or all of the premiums for their employees. If a single employee says, 'I don't want to participate,' the employer becomes ineligible for the program. The employer could not get the benefit for any of its employees."

DOJ_NMG_0016659

David Johnson, a Democratic member of the Arkansas House who worked on legislation for the new program, predicted that it would be attractive to small businesses.

"Employers will get more bang for the buck from this program than from private health insurance," Mr. Johnson said. "They can insure employees for a predictable, modest amount, which is less than they would have to pay to private insurers."

Mr. Johnson said the state would help pay for the new benefits with proceeds of the multistate settlement negotiated with tobacco companies in 1998.

Other states have subsidized or supplemented health insurance provided by employers. But Dr. Thompson said this was not an option in Arkansas because most small employers provided no coverage.

"Small businesses have money in their pockets, and they want to offer some health insurance," he said, "but they cannot afford the products on the market."

Senate Report Faults Medicare's Handling Of Complaints (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Medicare's process for investigating complaints about bad care is "broken," leaves patients in the dark, and is of "no benefit to improving the overall quality" of medical care received by millions of elderly and disabled beneficiaries, Senate investigators have found.

The ongoing probe by the Senate Finance Committee determined that the number of complaints investigated by Medicare appears "disproportionately low," Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the committee chairman, wrote in a five-page letter sent to Medicare officials Friday. Grassley called on federal officials to consider major reforms, including redesigning the program and re-bidding contracts.

Medicare pays private contractors known as Quality Improvement Organizations about $300 million a year to work with hospitals, doctors and nursing homes to improve care and investigate complaints in the giant health insurance program. There are 53 QIOs -- one in each state plus one each in the District, Puerto Rico and U.S. Virgin Islands. Most are set up as nonprofits.

As the QIOs come under increased scrutiny from Congress, the prestigious Institute of Medicine is scheduled on Thursday to release findings of its 18-month review of the groups. Yesterday, the QIO trade group issued its own call to improve the beneficiary-complaint process, agreeing that it was broken.

Under the existing system, QIOs that investigate patients' complaints and find serious breaches are supposed to refer their findings to the Office of Inspector General for possible discipline of doctors and hospitals. A Washington Post investigation last July found that QIOs rarely make referrals and treat complaint investigations as a low priority.

In 2004, the contractors investigated 3,100 complaints for 43 million Medicare patients. Even then, patients had only a 1 in 4 chance of having their complaints upheld, and the findings often were not shared with patients, The Post found.

The Post also documented lavish salaries and perks paid to some QIO executives and directors, and it reported that the physician-dominated boards included few consumers.

In August, Grassley's committee began a probe of the QIOs, requesting a broad range of documents covering their finances and policies. He expanded the probe to look at salaries, potential conflicts of interest, travel by some QIO executives and Medicare's oversight of the contractors.

In his letter last week to Mark B. McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, Grassley noted that his committee's preliminary review raised "a number of concerns regarding questionable expenditures, board member and executive staff conflicts of interest and the quality and effectiveness of QIO services."

Grassley noted that little of the money paid to the QIOs is based on their performance, and he questioned why so few contracts are subject to competitive bids. In the most recent three-year contract cycle, six contracts were bid, and of the six only one was not renewed. Yet at the same time, Grassley wrote, "There is sparse evidence to suggest that QIOs are effective."

Grassley noted in his letter that some QIO board members appeared to be paid "exorbitant" amounts compared with other nonprofit groups. For example, he wrote, one QIO paid its trustees an average of $25,000 in 2003. According to the Washington-based group BoardSource, most charities do not pay board members.

Grassley wrote that some QIO trustees have traveled to expensive retreats at resorts in Colorado Springs; Cape Cod, Mass.; and Stowe, Vt. In addition, "it appears that some QIOs have financial arrangements or relationships" with board members that "appear to pose conflicts of interest," he wrote.

One QIO trustee was paid $37,000 annually as a consultant. A government audit concluded that the arrangement could "cause a loss of objectivity . . . or otherwise interfere with free exercise of his or her judgment," Grassley wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0016660

Medicare officials said yesterday that they are reviewing the letter from the Senate committee, adding in a statement that the QIO program "is improving the quality of American health care."

In a statement yesterday, the American Health Quality Association, the QIO trade group, said Congress should rewrite a two-decades-old law barring contractors from sharing the results of their investigations with patients without first obtaining the permission of the doctors being investigated. The association said findings should be given to patients "along with information about actions taken to prevent the problem from recurring."

The trade group also said Medicare should allow QIOs to publish annual quality reports for each state, including data on the performance of hospitals, doctors and nursing homes, in addition to releasing the names of providers who have been referred for enforcement actions.

Late last year, the association announced what it called a "new code of conduct" to ensure that QIOs conform to the "highest standards for business practices, governance and public accountability."

Among other things, the code called for increased consumer representation on QIO boards. Two-thirds of the 53 QIOs have adopted the code, the trade group said.

Senate Begins Consideration Of Lobby Reform (REU-Y2)

By Thomas Ferraro

Reuters, March 6, 2006

The U.S. Senate began consideration of legislation on Monday that would require lobbyists to disclose more about their activities and ban gifts by lobbyists to members of Congress and staff.

The measure, which has strong bipartisan support in the wake of scandals that rocked the Republican-led Congress, would also impose stiff fines for violation of lobbying curbs.

The Senate hopes to complete action after voting on a long list of possible amendments later this week. They include one that would deny congressional pensions to lawmakers convicted of accepting bribes.

That proposal was inspired largely by the case of former Republican U.S. Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham of California, who was sentenced last week to eight years and four months in jail for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors.

Ethics reform became a top priority after lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty in January in a wide-ranging public corruption case. He is now cooperating with prosecutors and the probe may reach a number of lawmakers.

Members on both sides of the political aisle have demanded reform, saying lawmakers need to clean up Congress and reverse polls that show declining confidence in political leaders.

But some Democrats have blamed much of the recent ethical woes on a Republican "culture of corruption," and hope to use it to gain advantage in the November congressional elections.

"America deserves a government as good as its people," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, said, "The American people expect us to work together to develop meaningful bipartisan solutions."

"We are obligated to protect the integrity of this great institution, and, most importantly, to represent the genuine interests of the voters who sent us here," Frist said.

The legislation before the Senate is the product of bills produced last week on bipartisan votes by two committees.

The Republican-led House of Representatives is expected to produce legislation of its own in coming weeks.

Senate Takes Up Bill On Lobbying Ethics (AP-Y2)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

Legislation to curb excesses of both lobbyists and lawmakers reached the Senate floor Monday as leaders from both parties warned that the integrity of Congress is at stake.

The legislation, which would require lobbyists to be more open about the meals they buy and the trips they arrange for members of Congress, is a response to the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal that hit Washington with details of millions of dollars from Abramoff's clients going to win friends and buy influence on Capitol Hill.

It also comes just three days after former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., was sentenced to more than eight years in federal prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes.

"It is time for us to re-examine the rules so that bad apples are exposed before they spoil the whole lot," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said in opening debate.

DOJ_NMG_0016661

The Senate bill, which combines measures produced by two Senate committees last week, has already come under fire from advocacy groups and some lawmakers who say the proposed changes, the first to lobbying laws in 11 years, are mainly cosmetic.

The measure would require senators to reveal more information on their privately funded trips, but would not ban such trips as sought by some. The Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee last week also rejected a provision to set up an independent ethics investigator to oversee lobbying and ethics questions.

"Overall, this measure is insufficient because it focuses on disclosing corruption, rather than deterring it," Public Citizen's Joan Claybrook said of that committee's bill.

But Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., while blaming the recent scandals on "a Republican culture that has distorted government priorities," defended the Senate bill. "Maybe there are some outside groups who think we haven't done enough. We've done a lot." he said.

The section of the bill prepared by the Rules Committee deals with a major source of criticism of Congress: the special projects or earmarks that lawmakers insert in larger bills, often with little or no debate.

Under the measure, a senator could raise a point of order, stripping out any earmark inserted when the House and Senate negotiate the final version of a bill. It would take a 60-vote majority to waive that point of order.

The Rules Committee portion also would require lawmakers to post on their Web sites within 15 days any meals or drinks they receive from lobbyists and within 30 days details of privately funded trips. Gifts and travel directly paid for by lobbyists would continue to be banned.

Relatives of a senator who are registered lobbyists could not have official contact with the senator's staff, and senators could not pressure lobbying firms to hire people based on their political affiliation.

The Homeland Security panel's bill would require that retiring members of Congress wait two years before taking jobs lobbying Congress, and it would oblige lobbyists to reveal information about grass-roots lobbying, helping clients to encourage the general public — through mass mailings or advertising — to contact federal officials.

Lobbyists also would have to file reports quarterly, rather than the current rule of twice a year, on their contacts with lawmakers and their fundraising and political contribution activities.

Frist said he hoped to finish work on the bill by the end of the week. The House is also working on the lobbying issue, but GOP leaders there have yet to develop a specific plan.

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

Senators Eye Lobbying Bill As Ready Vehicle For Pet Causes (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rank-and-file senators are eyeing a lobbying-disclosure measure as a vehicle for a host of pet causes — issues ranging from budget-process reform to the controversial Dubai Ports World deal — as Republican and Democratic leaders try to shepherd the politically imperative bill through the chamber without turning it into a legislative Christmas tree.

“Let’s keep amendments on the issue that is at hand, amendments surrounding lobbying,” Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) pleaded yesterday on the floor. “Tying up with other amendments, what we call non-germane amendments, is not going to be in anybody’s best interests.”

Conservatives, eager to find the means to cut government spending, may try to insert the president’s new line-item-veto proposal or legislation establishing biennial budgeting, according to a Senate Republican aide.

A powerful new weapon for earmark foes is already included in the committee-approved lobbying-reform bill. The most significant institutional change in the measure would allow rank-and-file lawmakers to strike conference provisions — in any legislation, spending or otherwise — on a point of order without killing the conference report. A 60-vote supermajority would be needed to overcome the objection.

While many lawmakers have been preoccupied with the more parochial issues of a stricter gift ban and increased disclosure for lobbyists and grassroots groups, some congressional aides recognize the reach of the new point of order.

“It’s like the Holy Grail of process reform,” said a senior House Republican aide who likes the idea but doubts that the Senate will ultimately adopt it. “The Senate’s doing a little window-dressing and hoping it will fall out in conference,” the aide said.

“I haven’t addressed it yet,” Frist said when asked how aggressively the Republican leadership would push for adoption.

A similar procedure was used — under a bipartisan agreement — to keep last year’s Pentagon spending measure alive after lawmakers voted to strip out arctic-drilling provisions.

DOJ_NMG_0016662

Rules Committee Chairman Trent Lott (R-Miss.) expressed support for the new point of order yesterday, despite ceding ground on his original 50-vote threshold because of a committee amendment by Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.).

Still, he cautioned, "I hope it's not abused."

Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), a longtime critic of pork-barrel spending, also is getting behind the new point of order.

"Sunshine is the best disinfectant. If we subject earmarks to a budget point of order, it will force members to justify earmarks to other senators and the American people," DeMint said through a spokesman.

The point of order was included in a package approved by the Rules Committee that would increase disclosure on privately funded congressional travel, restrict floor access for lawmakers who have become lobbyists, ban non-meal gifts and change the rules that govern how members and their aides are allowed to transition into lobbying jobs.

That bill is being combined with a measure approved by the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee that increases disclosure requirements for lobbyists and grassroots organizations. Democrats are likely to offer the text of their alternative lobbying-reform legislation as an amendment, according to a Democratic leadership aide.

That legislation would prohibit privately funded congressional travel, ban gifts from lobbyists, attach criminal penalties for efforts to exert partisan influence on private-sector hiring, adopt increased disclosure for lobbyists, and extend a waiting period on lobbying by former members and high-level staff from one year to two years.

Democrats are also considering a variety of piecemeal amendments targeted at those issues and others, the aide said.

Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) said yesterday that he would sponsor or support several amendments. That could include a second effort to establish an Office of Public Integrity to act as a clearinghouse for disclosures and investigate ethics complaints, a proposal that was rejected during Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs consideration of the bill.

Republican and Democratic leaders want to limit the scope of amendments adopted on the floor, hoping to prevent the measure from losing its focus on lobbying.

Lawmakers, aides and outside groups are watching closely to see if anyone opens up the politically sensitive issue of campaign-finance reform, which cuts across party lines. Any changes to current law could give one party or the other a leg up in future elections.

Lott said yesterday that if anyone raises a campaign-finance amendment he is ready to offer a second-degree amendment addressing largely unregulated "527" groups. The House GOP version of the lobbying-reform bill, which likely will be unveiled this week, contains a provision aimed at cracking down 527 activities.

Lott also warned yesterday that it is easy to "lose control emotionally" and become overzealous when Congress looks at its own operations.

But skeptics in the lobbying community are quick to point out that lawmakers are paying more attention to them than congressional operations.

"They certainly aren't ratcheting down your ability to deliver a [campaign] check," said one Republican lobbyist.

Congressional aides said yesterday that they expect the amendment picture to become clearer after lawmakers meet for lunch today.

It was not clear whether leading critics of Dubai's involvement with American ports would offer an amendment. Israel Klein, a spokesman for Sen. Charles Schumer (D-N.Y.), declined to rule out that possibility.

"We're obviously exploring all the options," Klein said.

House GOP To Include 527 Language In Its Bill (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, March 7, 2006

House Republican leaders have told their Senate counterparts that legislation curtailing the activity of so-called 527 soft-money groups will be included in the House lobbying-reform bill that leaders intend for conference negotiations, according to knowledgeable sources.

The provisions affecting the 527 groups are expected to hew closely to a proposal crafted by Federal Election Commission (FEC) Chairman Michael Toner and former Commissioner Scott Thomas. Toner and Thomas unveiled the proposal in 2004 when Thomas was chairman of the agency, but it failed to muster enough support among their fellow commissioners to pass.

Restricting the activity of 527 groups, which generally are not subject to the campaign-finance regulations governing federal parties and candidates, is a high priority for Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. Including 527 language in the lobbying bill, however, would put Democrats in a politically difficult position.

Democrats have staked their campaign-year political message on cleaning up corruption in Washington, but they are so opposed to restricting 527 activity that many of them would vote against a bill that includes language affecting the groups.

DOJ_NMG_0016663

Sen. Chris Dodd (Conn.), the ranking Democrat on the Senate Rules Committee, which has jurisdiction over lobbying reform, took to the floor yesterday to speak against linking lobbying reform with campaign-finance reform.

"There is a real risk of weighing down this bill with so many campaign-finance amendments that we will effectively kill it," Dodd said. "I hope that does not happen, and I urge my colleagues to withhold campaign-finance-related amendments until we get to a more appropriate vehicle for them to offer their ideas."

Democrats in general strongly oppose 527 restrictions because they have derived much more benefit from the groups than Republicans. Über-rich liberal donors such as George Soros and Peter Lewis poured tens of millions of dollars of their own money into 527 groups that campaigned for Democrats during the 2004 election cycle. The GOP has struggled to find conservative donors with pockets deep enough to counter them.

Lawmakers are considering lobbying reform on the Senate floor this week.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), whom his colleagues consider the leading voice on campaign-finance reform in the Senate and who is also active in Senate negotiations over lobbying reform, said the issue of what to do with 527 groups has yet to be settled.

"We haven't sorted that out," he said about linking 527 with lobbying legislation, though he noted that Mehlman has been outspoken on the need to curb soft-money groups.

McCain said he had discussed the issue with Senate colleagues but not with House leaders. He also said that he did not believe that all Democrats are opposed to 527 restrictions, citing as an example his ally on campaign-finance issues, Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.).

The FEC has set spending regulations for 527 groups that register with the agency as political committees, but it has failed to answer the crucial question of what types of 527s must register. The failure to answer that question opened a gaping loophole in the regulation of 527s. Groups can avoid regulation simply by not registering with the FEC.

The Toner-Thomas proposal would require all 527 groups spending money for the purpose of influencing federal elections to register as political committees, said Don Simon, a lawyer with Sonosky Chambers Sachse Endeson and Perry, who closely follows 527 regulation proposals. Simon said he was not aware that House leaders had committed to linking 527 and lobby reform.

Simon said that if 527 groups are required to register as political committees they would be subject to spending limits. Any 527-funded ads that mention a federal candidate would have to be paid for with hard money. Hard money can only be raised in limited increments, in contrast to soft money, which can be raised in unlimited-size donations.

Requiring 527 groups to fund their activities with hard money would dramatically erode their political effectiveness. Republican leaders fear that if the law remains unchanged, 527s will soon rival the national parties in political power and ability.

If required to register with the FEC, 527s would also have to fund 50 percent of their generic voter-mobilization activity with hard money, Simon said. 527s that air ads mentioning federal and nonfederal candidates would have to pay for the activity with a mix of hard and soft money based on how the ads divided time and space between the candidates, he said.

A senior House Republican aide said he did not know when leaders would unveil their lobbying-reform bill, which Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) has worked on alongside Rules Committee Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.).

Jennifer Crider, spokeswoman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), said that Republicans should work on a bipartisan basis with Democrats on lobbying reform.

She referred questions about linking 527 and lobbying reform to Rep. Marty Meehan (D-Mass.), who has sponsored legislation regulating 527s.

"[Meehan] believes that real lobbying reform must be clean and straightforward and should not encompass other issues, be it 527 reform or anything else," said his spokeswoman, Sandra Salstrom.

How Congress Benefits From Corporate Flights (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — It was a busy weekend last November for the flight crew of BellSouth's corporate jet. Over three days, they crisscrossed the Southeast, ferrying six U.S. senators, two of their wives, a trio of political consultants and two of the company's Washington lobbyists to Republican and Democratic fundraising events.

To charter a comparable Cessna Citation for that three-day itinerary would have cost $40,800, not including food and drinks. The two parties' campaign committees reimbursed BellSouth $8,364.94 for the flights, in line with campaign-finance rules that call for the equivalent of first-class commercial airfare for each traveler.

For members of Congress — its top leaders, in particular — the service is an accepted convenience of immense value in their whirlwind schedules, worth far more than the reimbursements the rules require. They can skip security lines, ignore airline schedules and stretch out in roomy leather seats. For corporations that provide the service, it's a chance to do favors for the powerful and gain influence unavailable to those without air fleets.

DOJ_NMG_0016664

Public records and internal company documents obtained by USA TODAY show that over the past four years, BellSouth has flown federal government officials on such political trips about 100 times. The internal records offer rare detail about who goes on the trips and why — information that lawmakers and companies aren't now required to reveal.

This perk for lawmakers is under scrutiny this week as the Senate seeks to rewrite the rules of the influence game in the midst of the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., are pushing to curb the cut-rate travel service.

BellSouth's internal documents, covering 2002 through 2005, were provided by Vicki Taylor, who has worked for 15 years as a secretary in BellSouth's Washington lobbying office. Taylor, 53, said she sought out reporters because she was concerned about company practices she believed violated internal expense-account rules. She is now on paid administrative leave pending an internal investigation.

BellSouth spokesman Bill McCloskey acknowledged the documents were authentic.

Top travelers with the regional telephone company include House Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois, House Majority Whip Roy Blunt of Missouri, Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., and Democratic Sens. Tom Daschle of South Dakota and John Breaux of Louisiana, both now retired.

The lawmakers' campaign committees or the political parties routinely reimbursed the company for first-class airfare — normally a fraction of the market value of the trips — but neither they nor the company are required to disclose anything else. Campaign funds can be used to pay political expenses or costs associated with lawmakers' official duties, such as meetings with constituents, says Kenneth Gross, a campaign-finance lawyer.

BellSouth is one of dozens of large corporations with intense lobbying agendas in Washington that use their corporate jets to curry favor with key lawmakers. BellSouth has agreed to be acquired by AT&T, which was recently purchased by another telecommunications company, SBC. Neither SBC nor AT&T has provided the same level of service on its corporate jets.

FedEx, U.S. Tobacco, Union Pacific, the Texas plaintiff's law firm of Baron & Budd, Burlington Northern Santa Fe, R.J. Reynolds and generic-drug maker Barr Laboratories are among those companies that most frequently whisk members of Congress around the country upon request, according to figures released Monday by PoliticalMoneyLine, which compiles data on money and politics.

In the past five years, federal politicians and political parties reimbursed 286 corporations $3.7 million for 2,154 trips, according to the PoliticalMoneyLine figures.

“You can sit down and have a cocktail and talk casually about a matter, rather than rushing in between meetings on Capitol Hill,” says Wright Andrews, a veteran Washington lobbyist. “You are a heavy hitter if you've got a jet.”

BellSouth's McCloskey said providing transportation to federal officials “gives us an opportunity to form relationships, to have a long stretch of time to explain issues that are technical and complicated. If it wasn't useful, we wouldn't do it.” The company lobbies Congress on issues ranging from broadband to copyrights, international trade and excise taxes on phone service.

Advocates of an ethics overhaul, including McCain and Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., have called for requiring lawmakers to reimburse companies for the full cost of a charter flight when they hop aboard their jets. That would make the practice so costly it would be tantamount to banning it, says Fred Wertheimer, president of the ethics watchdog group Democracy 21.

McCain and Lieberman plan to offer an amendment during Senate debate that would require politicians to reimburse the full charter rate and disclose details of corporate plane trips. The current rule “provides an end-run of limitations on what corporations can contribute or give as gifts,” Lieberman said Monday.

A poll in January found strong public support for ending cut-rate travel by lawmakers on corporate planes. The Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg Poll found 72% of Americans support banning the practice, and 21% oppose a ban.

Details about corporate plane use are not normally disclosed. The only way the public can find out about the trips is by combing through campaign-finance reports. That reveals nothing about who went on the trip, where they went or the purpose of the travel.

The practice was spotlighted in the case of Randy “Duke” Cunningham, a California Republican who resigned his House seat Nov. 28 after pleading guilty to taking at least $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. Brent Wilkes, founder of the defense company ADCS, flew Cunningham to an Idaho hunting trip on Group W Transportation, his private Lear jet, according to campaign-finance records.

“It's a big perk for members of Congress, which I can assure you is not available to the general public,” Wertheimer says. “There is no legitimate rationale for it.”

DOJ_NMG_0016665

On Friday, Nov. 11, BellSouth's Cessna 560 XL, tail number N404SB, left its Atlanta base and flew to Washington's Dulles Airport to pick up Republican Sens. Bob Bennett of Utah, Mike Crapo of Idaho and Kit Bond of Missouri. Two of the senators' wives and Ward White, a BellSouth lobbyist, were along for the trip, according to a company flight manifest. The trip was arranged by the GOP Senate campaign committee, which like its Democratic counterpart keeps a list of companies that make their planes available.

The group flew to St. Simons Island, Ga., for a weekend retreat at the sumptuous Sea Island resort with members of the party's Senate Council, a club for corporate donors whose political action committees have given at least $5,000. (BellSouth's PAC gave $12,500 to the Republican Senate committee last year.) The party included White in a private dinner Nov. 11 with Bond and Sens. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and John Warner of Virginia.

While the senators joined contributors and their lobbyists for a weekend of briefings, golf, tennis, skeet and trap shooting, and a guided nature walk, the corporate jet headed back to Washington on Nov. 12 to pick up more senators.

This time, according to the company documents, it was Democrats: Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Sen. Maria Cantwell of Washington, headed for a party fundraising event near Orlando. They were accompanied by BellSouth lobbyist Broderick Johnson. After dropping them off, the BellSouth jet returned to Georgia, where on Sunday, it picked up Bennett, Crapo and Sen. Elizabeth Dole, R-N.C., and lobbyist White for the trip to Washington.

Reid and Cantwell turned to another special interest for the rest of their trip: the Texas law firm of Mikal Watts, which flew them on to Oxford, Miss., for another party fundraiser, according to campaign-finance records. Cantwell took a commercial flight back to Washington, while Reid continued to Dallas on the Watts plane for another money event, then returned to Washington aboard the plane of the Baron & Budd law firm. The law firms did not respond to requests for comment.

Campaign-finance records show the Democratic Senate committee reimbursed Watts $4,510.10 and Baron & Budd $2,836.80. The Texas law firms lobby Congress against limiting the liability lawsuits that are their primary business.

Lawmakers asked about the travel defended their use of corporate planes as a necessity in the fast-paced world of politics.

Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley, said the practice is essential for top congressional leaders. “It would be impossible to keep the kind of schedule that he does on these trips throughout the country without being able to use these jets every once in a while,” Manley said.

Hastert did not respond to calls for comment. As the No. 3 House GOP leader, Blunt has responsibilities to help Republicans get elected and preserve the party's House majority, said spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger. “Private travel enabled him to reach multiple campaign events — many times in remote locations — often in a single day,” she wrote in an e-mail response to questions.

Bond's spokesman, Rob Ostrander, said the senator believes that “as long as the practice is not abused and there is appropriate reimbursement, it should remain an option.”

Attending political fundraisers was the most common purpose for congressional travelers aboard BellSouth's jet, but not the only purpose. In 2004, the company flew Rep. Dick Gephardt and Sen. John Edwards as part of their presidential campaigns; shuttled Sen. John Breaux, D-La., home from his party's convention in Boston; and took Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton from New York to the Kennedy family clambake in Hyannis, Mass., the company's records show.

BellSouth also flew Rep. Joe Barton, R-Texas, to a U.S. Telecom Association meeting in Denver in 2003. Barton is chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, which controls telecommunications policy. Lott flew home or to Washington with the company on at least four occasions. Sen. Thad Cochran, R-Miss., caught a ride to give a speech and attend the Kentucky Derby in 2003.

The most frequent flier with BellSouth in 2002-04 was Hastert, who traveled aboard the company's planes nine times, company documents show. Blunt, the No. 3 House leader, flew eight times, and Lott, who was Senate majority leader in 2002, was aboard six times during that period. A company lobbyist was aboard each time.

The rules that require reimbursement at the first-class commercial ticket rate date back two decades or more, says Scott Thomas, a former member of the Federal Election Commission who advises legal clients on ethics issues. At the time, “there wasn't any good way to track what the actual fair-market charter rate would be,” he says, so the commission adopted the rule requiring reimbursement at the first-class rate.

That rationale was made obsolete by the Internet, which makes it easy to look up the cost of a charter flight, Thomas says, but the rules haven't kept up. “It's ripe for reconsideration,” he says. At a minimum, there should be greater disclosure of trips, Thomas says.

The demand for convenient travel apparently drives the practice at least as much as corporations' desire to gain a lobbying advantage.

DOJ_NMG_0016666

As often as BellSouth transported lawmakers, it turned down even more requests. A company document shows that in 2004, its planes took 28 trips for members of the House and Senate — 18 for Republicans, 10 for Democrats. It turned down requests for an additional 109 trips because planes weren't available.

Two senators turned down for requested trips in 2004 — McCain and Democrat Barack Obama of Illinois — have since emerged as spokesmen for sweeping ethics changes and have voluntarily imposed limits on their own use of corporate planes.

McCain, a likely candidate for the Republican presidential nomination, decided late last year to abandon the practice entirely, instead using charter flights when needed. Obama announced in January that he would reimburse the full market value of such flights.

Robo-caller Thrives Amid Talk Of Change (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, March 7, 2006

As the Senate today begins debating proposed disclosure requirements for grassroots lobbying activity, a Democratic-leaning grassroots lobbying firm is helping to hit as many as 20 House Republicans with prerecorded, in-district phone calls attacking their records on port security.

The calls are funded by American Family Voices (AFV), a nonprofit group led by Clinton administration veteran Mike Lux and allied with Lux's firm Progressive Strategies. According to its website, the firm promotes "extensive experience in grassroots organizing and politics."

While Lux declined to reveal the identities of the House Republicans targeted for calls, Reps. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), Tom DeLay (R-Texas) and Bob Ney (R-Ohio) have reacted angrily to the calls taking place in their districts, charging AFV with capitalizing on the Dubai ports-management controversy for political gain.

Lux founded AFV in 2000 after leaving the lobbying team at People for the American Way, adding a 527 group called MainStreet USA to his arsenal during the 2004 election cycle. Lux said the main advantage of AFV's grassroots push on port security, which Democrats have begun seizing on as a winning issue for this November's midterms, is the ability to keep his donors and expenses secret.

"This is all a game of chess," Lux said, and if your opponent knows where you're moving "you kind of lose your advantage.

"Frankly, that's one advantage of calls over ads — we can do this and send a shot across their bow without the other side knowing exactly where we're going."

But AFV and other nonprofits engaging in grassroots lobbying soon could be forced to reveal political strategies and financial backers under an amendment attached to one of the Senate's two pending lobbying-reform bills.

The amendment, sponsored by Sens. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), would require grassroots lobbyists such as Lux to register with the clerk of the House and disclose their spending within 45 days after starting an initiative.

Conservative nonprofit groups last month assembled a coalition called LobbySense to help bring down the Senate's original grassroots lobbying-disclosure provision, authored by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) but replaced with the Lieberman-Levin language at last week's markup in the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

LobbySense members include Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform, Tom McClusky of the Family Research Council and Tom Schatz of Citizens Against Government Waste. Spokeswoman Kerri Houston said the coalition plans to recruit liberal partners if the new grassroots disclosure rules spring up in any future House lobbying-reform bills.

While critical of AFV's political stance, Houston defended the group's right to run the phone calls against Republican lawmakers without having to reveal its supporters.

"From an ideological perspective, I wish they would go away because I completely disagree with them, but I'd defend to the death their right to say things I disagree with," Houston said. Echoing Lux's argument in favor of preserving secrecy for grassroots-issue campaigns, Houston added that under the Lieberman-Levin provision, "you're now explaining to your competition what your plans are."

House Republicans on the receiving end of the AFV automated phone messages, a style known as "robo calls" for their robotic narration, were loath to condone AFV's right to operate in secret.

"What we're seeing in our district is part of a coordination of Democrat groups to use front groups" such as AFV as political messengers, Ney spokesman Brian Walsh said. "It's the pot calling the kettle black. They say one thing in Washington [about lobbying reform], then they turn around in the districts" and run robo-call operations.

Walsh pointed out Ney's quick opposition to the White House's approval of the Dubai ports-management deal, cleared for national security risks in January but sharply criticized in recent weeks by Republicans and Democrats alike. Ney also has signed on to a bill written by Rep. Peter King (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, that would give Congress ultimate veto power over the Dubai deal.

DOJ_NMG_0016667

In a statement issued last week, DeLay campaign spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty defended the former House majority leader against AFV's robo calls.

"As everyone who has picked up a newspaper in the last week knows, Congressman DeLay said he disagreed with the president on the Dubai ports deal," said Flaherty, who played up AFV's past support from the Association of Trial Lawyers of America and Lux's experience in the Clinton administration.

Senators supporting the Lieberman-Levin provision argue that transparency will make grassroots lobbying operations more accountable without having a chilling effect. But AFV, which uses its Campaign for a Cleaner Congress affiliate to help marshal support for lobbying-reform legislation, greatly benefits from the current lack of reporting restrictions.

"My whole goal is to work in close connection with the rest of the progressive community and have our organization be a free safety that can move on a dime, plug holes, work on issues that come up all of a sudden and go where other people aren't going to provide some political muscle," Lux said. AFV's role model, he added, is the conservative nonprofit Progress for America, well-known for its potent grassroots lobbying on Supreme Court nominations.

Although Lux blasted House Republicans for shooting down a Democratic parliamentary maneuver to force consideration of a bill similar to King's, he said the calls were aimed more at embarrassing Republicans than scoring on port security.

"We want to win on the issue … but from a political point of view, exposing the other side as hypocrites is always a good thing to do," Lux said.

Simmons has long crusaded against the national do-not-call registry's exemption for political robo calls, sponsoring three bills that would crack down on prerecorded messages from AFV and other groups. Stealing a page from Lux's playbook, Simmons's office urged constituents to call AFV and complain about the calls.

"For the past two years, stealthy partisan organizations led by American Family Voices have used robo calls to bother, harass and annoy while disseminating false information about me and my voting record," said Simmons, who is also co-sponsoring the King port-security legislation.

'I Will Not Seek Reelection' (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor And Bob Cusack

The Hill, March 7, 2006

Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), the fiery chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, announced yesterday that he will not seek reelection this year, ending the congressional tenure of one of Capitol Hill's most polarizing but effective figures.

Forced to relinquish the Ways and Means gavel at the end of this Congress because of GOP term limits on the post, Thomas announced the decision from his district office in Bakersfield, Calif., with his wife, Sharon, at his side.

"Today, I am announcing that I will not seek reelection to the United States Congress," Thomas said, according to a release from his office.

During his tenure, Thomas passed a number of President Bush's legislative priorities, including a series of large tax cuts, trade-promotion authority for the administration to negotiate trade deals and the controversial Medicare prescription-drug plan.

However, the 64-year-old lawmaker did not get an opportunity to enact Social Security reform, Bush's top legislative initiative in 2005. Before Thomas could introduce his retirement-savings package, political momentum for a Social Security revamp plummeted.

Thomas declined to say what he intends to do after leaving Congress at the end of this term, and he hinted yesterday that he would still like to reform the country's tax code before leaving office.

His announcement sparked fawning praise from Republicans throughout Washington.

"Chairman Bill Thomas is one of America's finest servants and one of the most thoughtful, determined members of the House of Representatives," House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said in a statement. "I'm sorry to see him go."

House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) hinted that Thomas's life in public service may not be over: "I wish him the best and look forward to working with him for the rest of this Congress and again in the future."

There has been speculation that Thomas could join the Bush administration next year, possibly as treasury secretary. Thomas did not rule out the possibility of joining the administration down the road, before adding that he is "taking it one step at a time."

Bush said Thomas "is a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader."

Thomas kept his retirement decision a closely held secret right up until yesterday's announcement. The Californian told Hastert late last week about his decision to retire, a senior GOP leadership aide said, but he never told National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.), a spokesman said, and was typically tight-lipped with his closest supporters in California.

DOJ_NMG_0016668

Rep. Devin Nunes (Calif.), a second-term Republican representing a neighboring district, said that he has known of Thomas's decision to retire for a few weeks but that Thomas never explicitly told him his plans. Instead, he laid out the scenario for what would happen if he chose to retire, tipping Nunes and others off to the decision announced yesterday.

"I don't think there is any talking Bill out of it," Nunes said of his occasional mentor. "I would be surprised if he doesn't go down as the best Ways and Means chairman … or at least at the top of the list."

Unable to get a waiver for that chairmanship, some believed that Thomas would become the next chairman of the House Budget Committee if he chose to remain in Congress. He has opted to pursue a life off Capitol Hill after an almost-28-year congressional career.

Thomas has a rare institutional acumen that has allowed him to pass a number of controversial bills through the House. He has also proved to be a partisan battler who has stoked the ire of his Democratic colleagues.

The combative Republican once called the Capitol Police to remove committee Democrats from a Ways and Means library during panel deliberations on pension reform. He later broke into tears on the House floor while apologizing for the move.

As chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health in from 1995-2000, Thomas conducted rigorous oversight of the Clinton administration. During one such hearing, Thomas admonished a Clinton administration official for mentioning a Medicare website without referring to the "www" prefix.

Thomas also regularly clashed with his counterpart in the upper chamber, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa), over a range of legislative matters.

Grassley yesterday said, "Chairman Thomas has another nine months as chairman. He's not a lame-duck type. … The media like to make a lot of the so-called differences between Chairman Thomas and me. In reality, we have a lot more in common than people might think."

In an interview on C-SPAN last month, Thomas promised to unveil major bills on tax, trade and healthcare in the coming weeks.

"I'm not walking away into the sunset. I'm going to work," he said yesterday.

Thomas has been a forceful member of the Republican Conference during its 11-plus years in the majority. He often reminds members who are wavering on legislation how much harder life was as a member of the minority, imploring them to rally around their leaders and cast difficult votes.

He has also caused fits for Republican leaders in both chambers. He was reluctant to share details of his Social Security reform plan with Hastert and other leaders in the House and Senate. More recently, he opposed an appropriations bill late last fall because a provision in the legislation had the potential to undermine the Medicare prescription-drug benefit he helped craft.

He and then-Education and the Workforce Chairman Boehner late last year went around leadership to pass a House version of pension-reform legislation after acting Majority Leader Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) suggested the bill did not have sufficient support to bring to the floor.

Thomas subsequently gave Boehner's nominating speech during his successful campaign to be majority leader.

He has been grooming Republican state Sen. Kevin McCarthy to replace him in Washington, but a fellow GOP state senator, Roy Ashburn, who lost his race to unseat Rep. Jim Costa (D-Calif.) last cycle, might challenge McCarthy for the seat.

The district is staunchly Republican, but Democratic state Sen. Dean Florez has also been mentioned as a possible candidate. The registration deadline is Friday.

Highlights of the career of REP. Bill thomas (R-Calif.)

1978 — Wins election to Congress

1995 — Becomes chairman of the House Administration Committee and the Ways and Means Health Subcommittee

1997 — Plays key role in passing the Balanced Budget Act of 1997

2001 — Is appointed chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and subsequently pushes through President Bush's $1.3 billion tax-cut package

2003 — Apologizes on the House floor for ordering his staff to call the Capitol Police after Democrats refused to leave the Ways and Means Committee library

2003 — Crafts the Medicare prescription-drug bill, which narrowly clears Congress

2006 — Gives the nominating speech for Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) to become majority leader

2006 — Announces his retirement

Ways And Means Chairman Thomas To Retire (AP-Y2)

By Mary Dalrymple, Ap Tax Writer

AP2, March 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016669

President Bush lost the congressional engineer who turned many of his campaign promises for tax cuts, free trade and prescription drugs into reality with the retirement of Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas.

The former college professor, a Republican from California, announced Monday that he will retire from Congress at the end of the year, when GOP rules force him to step down as chairman. The committee, Thomas said from his hometown in Bakersfield, Calif., "has the most impact on every American's life."

Since 2001, when Bush took office and Thomas took the helm of the panel, he steered several major tax cuts into law that lowered tax rates on most wage earners and shrank tax bills on investment income. He turned a long-promised Medicare prescription drug subsidy for the elderly into law, and eased the president's ability to pass trade pacts negotiated with other nations.

Bush called Thomas "a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader," praising him in a statement for helping pass legislation that led to strong job creation, economic growth, improved health care and free and fair trade.

One failure proved the rule. Thomas could not muster the support needed to transform the Social Security retirement and disability benefits program. He recently called it "a personal failure and very disappointing" that he could not spark a debate over the government's support programs for health care and retirement, which grow automatically each year.

He's rumored to be a future contender for Treasury secretary, but Thomas said Monday he will wait until the end of the year to make plans for his life after lawmaking. He's the 14th House Republican to retire this year, compared with only five Democrats.

The Republican next in line on the panel — Rep. Clay Shaw of Florida — immediately spoke up to say he's ready to fill Thomas' shoes. "As Ways and Means chairman, I intend to move legislation that makes our tax code more fair and efficient," Shaw said in a statement.

Next in line after Shaw, Rep. Nancy Johnson (news, bio, voting record), R-Conn., said in an interview that she would be comfortable with Shaw taking the helm, but added, "If it becomes an open race, then I am a candidate."

Rep. Jim McCrery (news, bio, voting record), R-La., who has a very close working relationship with Thomas and is most mentioned as his replacement, remained mum regarding the panel's future leadership. He issued a statement calling Thomas "one of the most capable and successful chairmen in the 204-year history of the House Ways and Means Committee."

Lawmakers and others attribute Thomas' success to a rare ability to master the intricacies of policy while keeping an accurate pulse on the lawmakers he needs to vote for his bills.

"He understood the policy extremely well, and he also understood how to legislate," said Mark Weinberger, Bush's first assistant secretary for tax policy at the Treasury Department. "You need both."

In more than a quarter century in Congress, Thomas displayed an impatience and fiery streak that sometimes led to conflict with other lawmakers, often Democrats. Three years ago, he called the Capitol Police to break up a meeting of committee Democrats, then expressed teary regrets on the House floor.

Jim DeMint, R-S.C., once a House lawmaker and now a senator, criticized Thomas for not listening to some in the GOP during a debate over contentious legislation giving the president fast-track authority to negotiate global trade agreements.

"Bill Thomas has kept us in the dark," DeMint said at the time.

That's a criticism echoed by the Ways and Means Committee's top Democrat, Rep. Charles Rangel (news, bio, voting record) of New York, who said Thomas was so successful because he exercised nearly complete control over legislation, circumventing the traditional collaborative process.

It was "more like a poker game where the hands were already dealt out before you sat at the table," Rangel said in an interview.

Despite their repeated political and legislative clashes on the committee, Rangel said he and the chairman never had any personal conflicts. If Thomas might sometimes be too abrasive, Rangel said, it's balanced by the fact that "he's probably one of the brightest members in the House of Representatives."

"God doesn't give you everything," he said.

House Ways And Means Chairman Says He's Retiring (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Richard Wolf

USA Today, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON — One of the most powerful Republicans on Capitol Hill, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas of California, announced Monday that he will not seek re-election in November, when his party will be fighting to retain its majority.

DOJ_NMG_0016670

Thomas, 64, has headed the tax-writing committee since 2001. He played a key role in winning passage of President Bush's tax-cut proposals, the Medicare prescription-drug plan and free trade agreements. Sixty-eight percent of his district voted for President Bush in 2004, so his decision to retire may not pose any immediate opportunities for Democrats.

All 435 House seats are up for election this year. Democrats need to pick up an additional 15 to win a majority. So far, only a few of the seats being vacated seem likely to be competitive.

"I would say the open seats at this point haven't yielded for Democrats what they need," says Stu Rothenberg, editor of the non-partisan Rothenberg Political Report.

Even so, some analysts believe that Thomas' decision to step down represents a troubling trend of experienced Republicans leaving.

Thomas is one of 17 Republican and eight Democratic House members who have decided not to run for re-election this fall. Five of the Republicans are losing their powerful committee posts because of term limits imposed by the caucus. They are Thomas; Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, chairman of the Budget Committee; Henry Hyde, R-Ill., chairman of the International Relations Committee; Michael Oxley, R-Ohio, chairman of the Financial Services Committee; and Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., chairman of the Appropriations subcommittee that funds the nation's overseas operations.

Under rules adopted after Republicans won control of the House in 1994, committee chairs must give up their posts after six years. The idea was to prevent the development of political fiefdoms by rotating power among members.

Other retirements are possible. Rep. Sherwood Boehlert, R-N.Y., who loses his post as House Science Committee chairman at the end of the year, has said he'll announce his re-election plans this month. His district may be competitive.

Norman Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, says it has also created a problem in the Republican ranks. Term limits for chairmen have resulted in "an acceleration of retirements, often from among the most able members," he says.

Thomas' decision also may indicate that ambitious policymakers don't see many opportunities in the next session of Congress, Rothenberg says. "The last two years of the Bush administration are not going to be a good time for doing big, important things," he says.

In a news conference at his California district office, Thomas quoted Los Angeles Dodger pitching star Sandy Koufax, who retired at the peak of his career. "I could pitch another game, but why?" he said.

One of Congress' memorable personalities, Thomas once called Capitol Hill police to round up Democrats for a committee vote, then burst into tears during an apology on the House floor. GOP colleagues hailed him as a skilled strategist. "He's the best I've ever seen at developing a legislative strategy to get important pieces of legislation passed," said Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., a leading candidate to replace Thomas as Ways and Means chairman.

Democrats said Thomas ignored them. "Picking up one or two Democratic votes was his idea of bipartisanship," said Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., top Ways and Means Democrat.

A Powerful House Republican Plans To Retire (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 6 — Representative Bill Thomas, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee and a chief legislative architect of the Medicare prescription drug law and the Bush administration's tax cut agenda, announced Monday that he would retire at the end of this year.

Mr. Thomas is in the final year of his term as chairman, under Republican House rules limiting chairmanships to six years, and his announcement was not unexpected.

A member of the House since 1978, when Republicans were in the minority, Mr. Thomas waited a long time for power and relished his job as chairman of a committee with sweeping influence over tax policy, health care, trade and the economy. Many had found it hard to imagine Mr. Thomas, a proud and mercurial man, remaining in Congress without that job.

"At a time when my party controlled the House, the Senate and the presidency, it was my privilege to chair the committee that I believe has the most impact on every American's life," Mr. Thomas said Monday, according to a transcript of a news conference held in his Congressional district in Bakersfield, Calif.

Mr. Thomas invoked the example of the Dodgers pitcher Sandy Koufax retiring at his peak: "I admired him when he said, 'I could pitch another game, but why?' "

Democrats quickly cited Mr. Thomas's retirement as an example of Republican incumbents' "sensing the winds of change blowing at gale force," as Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, put it. "It says they have a sense of what's out there, politically, this year," said Mr. Emanuel, who predicts a Democratic wave in this fall's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0016671

But whatever the national outlook, political strategists expect Mr. Thomas's district to remain Republican; it gave 68 percent of its vote to President Bush in 2004. "We'll easily retain it," said Carl Forti, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Mr. Thomas's successor as committee chairman will be chosen by the House Republican steering committee, which is dominated by the leadership, and then ratified by the full Republican conference. The maneuvering for the job quickly intensified. Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida is next in line by virtue of seniority, and quickly signaled his interest. But House Republicans do not always follow strict seniority rules.

Representative Jim McCrery of Louisiana, who ranks below Mr. Shaw, is also considered a leading candidate. And Representative Nancy L. Johnson of Connecticut, who ranks between them, indicated Monday that she would defer to Mr. Shaw, but that "if it becomes an open race," she would jump in.

Mr. Thomas's retirement will mean the passing of one of the most effective — and polarizing — legislators. Nowhere was his legislative power more apparent than on the 2003 overhaul of Medicare, which offered the nation's retirees and disabled a long-promised prescription drug benefit and created a sweeping new role for private health plans in the government insurance program.

Democrats said they were essentially shut out of the legislative conference that produced the final bill — part of what they asserted was a long pattern by Mr. Thomas. And while Mr. Thomas and his fellow Republicans succeeded in passing the Medicare law, the partisan and ideological fights it spawned continue.

Mr. Thomas, who had served 16 years under a Democratic majority, said that the Democrats simply could not accept their life in the minority, and that they viewed power as "their birthright."

While acknowledging that he had shortcomings, Mr. Thomas argued in an interview in 2002 that his personality was ideally suited for pushing through his party's economic agenda with what was often a razor-thin majority.

"Why did Eisenhower give Patton the job of moving across Germany at lighting speed?" he asked. "Because he knew Patton would do it. Sometimes hills just need to be captured."

In fact, even his enemies rarely disputed Mr. Thomas's effectiveness or his command of sprawling, complex programs like Medicare. In Mr. Bush's second term, however, the president's agenda has proved a far harder sell, and Mr. Thomas was unable to move the administration's proposal to create private accounts in Social Security.

In his news conference Monday, Mr. Thomas noted that he still had about nine months left in his term and a full agenda on tax cuts, trade and pension restructuring.

"Rather than read my headstone now, let's see if I can't carve a few more things in it before you retire me," said Mr. Thomas, a 64-year-old former political science professor.

There was speculation in political circles that Mr. Thomas might end up with a job in the Bush administration, and Mr. Bush praised him effusively on Monday as "a friend and a man of great accomplishment." But Mr. Thomas was coy about his future.

"I've got nine months still to go," he said. "I'm not walking away into the sunset. I'm going to work."

Ways And Means Chairman To Step Down (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), the irascible House Ways and Means Committee chairman who helped shepherd through President Bush's biggest domestic policy initiatives, announced yesterday that he will retire at the end of the year.

House Republican term limits would have forced Thomas, 64, to give up his perch on the powerful committee before the next Congress, a prospect that pushed the 14-term lawmaker toward his decision. His is the highest-profile in a string of retirement announcements that brings the total of seats being vacated to 26, 16 of them by Republicans.

"Ever since I was first elected to Congress in 1978, I set a goal to study the issues and become as effective a legislator as I could be to promote the interests of my constituents, the state of California and our nation," Thomas said from his office in Bakersfield, Calif. "In doing so, I have been extremely grateful to the voters who have returned me to office over the past four decades, and I hope, through legislation, advocacy and constituent service, that I have returned that appreciation."

"Congressman Bill Thomas is a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader in the House of Representatives," Bush said.

Thomas will leave an impressive record of legislative accomplishment that includes passage of six tax cuts in the past five years, a Medicare prescription drug benefit that was the most significant expansion of the program since its inception, and a slew of hard-fought free trade agreements. Still within reach is a major restructuring of the nation's private pension system.

DOJ_NMG_0016672

"Thomas was terrific," said Mark Weinberger, who was assistant Treasury secretary for tax policy during the 2001 tax cut fight. "Not only did he understand the policy of arcane trade, tax and health care issues, but he knew how to legislate. And when you have both of those things, you become a very formidable negotiator."

But Thomas's reputation as a shrewd legislative tactician has a dark side: He has shown himself willing to bully friends and adversaries alike if his arguments do not prove persuasive.

"There's no question the chairman rubs people the wrong way with his brusqueness and his irascible countenance. He doesn't suffer fools well, and that gets him into trouble," said Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), who is widely seen as the front-runner to succeed Thomas if Republicans maintain control of the House. "But if he didn't have something like that, he'd be darned near perfect."

In July 2003, GOP leaders forced him to deliver a tearful apology on the House floor for summoning the Capitol Police to evict committee Democrats from a Ways and Means library. He also apologized to Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) after accusing her of taking a stance on medical malpractice legislation because she faced reelection, which she was not.

Democrats may have a hard time forgiving him for the imperial way he ran his committee. Thomas held only a few perfunctory hearings, keeping even Republicans largely in the dark as he drafted legislation, then giving committee members just hours to digest complex, voluminous bills before slamming them through on party-line votes, said Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), the Ways and Means Committee's ranking Democrat.

"I really think the methods he used to accomplish his goals have done severe damage to the legislative process . . . and really damaged relations between the parties," Rangel said.

Thomas is likely to retire without one marquee law that is seen as his masterwork. Bush had hoped last year that Thomas could rescue his foundering Social Security restructuring by folding it into a broader, more popular retirement security initiative. But even Bush aides say Thomas was brought into the process too late to save it.

But in little more than five years as chairman, Thomas left a mark. He leapfrogged over a more senior committee member, former representative Phil Crane (R-Ill.), to become chairman.

That year, Thomas folded provisions to entice more retirement and pension savings into the president's 2001 tax cut. Then, against the wishes of the White House, he broke the 10-year, $1.35 trillion tax reduction into small pieces that passed Congress with unexpected ease.

In 2003, he rejected Bush's complex proposal to end taxation of dividends from fully taxed corporate earnings, replacing it with a simpler 15-percent tax rate on dividends and capital gains.

Rep. Thomas Announces Retirement From Congress (REU-Y2)

Reuters, March 6, 2006

U.S. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas said on Monday he would retire from the House of Representatives at the end of his current term, leaving open to speculation the future for the veteran lawmaker.

The California Republican, who was instrumental in helping President George W. Bush win passage of his tax cut proposals, would have stepped down as chairman of the powerful tax writing committee after this year anyway because of term limits set by House Republicans.

"Over the next nine months, I intend to continue to work hard and finish my congressional term with the same vigor as the first," Thomas said in a statement. He made the announcement at a news conference in Bakersfield, California, in his home district.

"Challenges lie ahead, and I intend to work hard to tackle the problems caused by our outdated entitlement programs and our currently flawed income tax structure," he added.

Known for his sharp wit and sometimes sharp tongue, Thomas, 65, was first elected to Congress in 1978. He took over chairmanship of Ways and Means in January 2001.

Thomas' grasp of details and knowledge of the Medicare prescription drug plan for the elderly proved valuable in helping get that complex legislation through Congress in 2003.

He has been mentioned by some Republican sources as among those being considered by the White House to eventually replace Treasury Secretary John Snow. It is widely believed that Snow may not stay through the end of Bush's term.

Thomas Leaves On Top (RC)

By David M. Drucker and Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016673

Fourteen-term Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) announced Monday that he will retire at the end of this Congress, leaving a notable legislative and institutional stamp on the House and heated races to replace him atop the Ways and Means Committee and in California's 22nd district.

Thomas' former district director, state Assembly Minority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R), is hoping to succeed his old boss. McCarthy's most likely challenger in the June 6 Republican primary is another former Thomas aide, state Sen. Roy Ashburn (R), although he had a previous falling out with the incumbent.

"McCarthy is going to have the support of Washington because of Thomas and myself, so I don't see how Ashburn can make much of a race of it," said Rep. Devin Nunes (R-Calif.), who holds the district adjacent to the 22nd after Thomas helped him survive a tough GOP primary in 2002.

Nunes said McCarthy has nailed down commitments from most donors and secured the endorsements of almost all of the local elected officials in Bakersfield and San Luis Obispo County.

"I'm not trying to skew this thing. The political reality of it is, it's not going to be a race if Ashburn runs, and I think he knows that," Nunes said.

Thomas last year was one of the very few Republicans in California's Congressional delegation to support Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's (R) failed effort to inject competition into California's redistricting process and overhaul how House and legislative seats are drawn. Not coincidentally, McCarthy was one of the most ardent proponents of the effort, carrying the primary legislative vehicle for the reform in the state Assembly.

In explaining his decision to retire, Thomas said he hoped to spend more time with his wife and grandchildren, and that he no longer relished the thought of spending eight hours on an airplane twice a week at the age of 65.

"Twenty-eight years of that probably should be enough for anyone, don't you think?" Thomas said.

And while he is still young enough to do the work, Thomas — a longtime Los Angeles Dodgers fan — cited the example of one of his heroes who retired at the top of his game.

"I've used as an analogy Sandy Koufax," Thomas said. "He was one of my favorites on the Dodgers, and I admired him when he said, 'I could pitch another game, but why?'"

The 22nd district, stretching from Bakersfield to the San Luis Obispo County Coast, gave President Bush 68 percent of the vote in 2004 and Thomas ran unopposed in that election, and it should be won without a problem by the victor in the Republican primary.

Knowledgeable Republican sources say McCarthy has been preparing for weeks to run to succeed Thomas, and confirm Nunes account that he has secured the key endorsements and fundraising commitments from throughout the district.

When Thomas does endorse McCarthy, he will most assuredly be able to connect the Assemblyman to the business-based fundraising pipeline that has long backed his campaigns, something he was able to do for Nunes in 2002. Still, an Ashburn aide confirmed Monday that the state Senator is planning to forgo re-election to his safe legislative seat to run in the GOP primary.

The deadline to file to run for Congress in California is Friday, with some Republicans speculating that Ashburn ultimately won't run, as he has already filed to run for re-election to his state Senate seat. McCarthy, though he had claimed not to be aware of Thomas' plans, never filed to run for re-election to the Assembly.

McCarthy said Monday he would publicize his future plans at 3 p.m. EST today at a news conference in Bakersfield. Beyond that, he did not want to intrude on a day that he said belonged to Thomas.

"He's done a great job for his community, his state and his country," McCarthy said. Thomas, when asked by reporters Monday, declined to endorse any candidates, saying he would wait to see who files to run for his seat.

Thomas has long engendered mixed feelings in his colleagues.

Lawmakers from both parties have complained over the years about the Californian's stubbornness and condescending attitude. His relationship with Ways and Means Democrats has been particularly rough, especially since he called the Capitol Police in 2003 to remove Democrats from a committee room during a contentious markup.

At the same time, Thomas' fellow Republicans have come to appreciate him for his policy acumen and his ability to shepherd difficult, complex pieces of legislation to passage.

While retiring lawmakers usually garner praise from the leadership, Thomas' announcement brought forth an unusual amount of hyperbole.

Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) said Thomas was "one of America's finest servants and one of the most thoughtful, determined Members of the House of Representatives."

Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) said the work Thomas "has accomplished on behalf of the American people, whether to lower taxes, provide quality health care, or create new jobs, has quite frankly been extraordinary. He has been one of the most effective and successful legislators Congress has seen in years."

DOJ_NMG_0016674

(Boehner has particular reason to be grateful. On Feb. 2, Thomas gave the Ohioan's nominating speech before the vote to elect a new Majority Leader. Some observers suggested afterwards that Thomas' forceful endorsement of Boehner may have helped swing some undecided votes his way.)

Praise also came from the other side of the Capitol.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) called Thomas "smart, tenacious, hard-driving and steeped in the traditions and subtle nuances of the House," while Senate Finance Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) pointed out that Thomas "has another nine months as chairman. He's not a lame duck type. I know we'll get at least one more major tax bill done and probably more legislation in the next nine months."

Over the years, Grassley and Thomas have clashed repeatedly both in public and in private on several different issues. With Thomas on his way out, however, Grassley played down those squabbles.

"The media like to make a lot of the so-called differences between Chairman Thomas and me," Grassley said. "In reality, we have a lot more in common than people might think. ... I think we both know it's important to not only have strongly held views, but also to do the homework to back them up."

Thomas' departure, meanwhile, prompted more attention to be focused on the race to replace him on Ways and Means, where his gavel tenure would have ended anyway due to term limits.

Rep. Jim McCrery (R-La.), Thomas' closest ally on the committee, is seen as the frontrunner for that position over Reps. Clay Shaw (R-Fla.) and Nancy Johnson (R-Conn.). But Shaw is not conceding anything.

In a long statement issued Monday, Shaw devoted a few words to Thomas' legacy and several paragraphs outlining his own vision for the Ways and Means chairmanship.

While Thomas is best known among current lawmakers for his work on Ways and Means passing tax cuts, free trade measures and the Medicare prescription drug bill, he has also made a permanent impact on the House as an institution.

As chairman of the House Administration Committee from 1995 to 2001, Thomas oversaw a wide range of reforms that transformed the way the chamber operates. Thomas implemented yearly independent audits of House finances, which had been in shambles, and also helped end Members perks such as daily ice deliveries to House offices.

Thomas won the Ways and Means gavel in 2001, beating out more senior then-Rep. Phil Crane (R-Ill.) in a heated contest. Since then he has had a broad impact on everything from trade to taxes to health care, though he has not been able to accomplish two of his most desired reform goals — overhauling Social Security and the tax code.

While neither of those issues appears likely to be on the House calendar this year, Thomas cautioned against closing the books on his service too soon.

"I'm not walking away into the sunset, I'm going to work," Thomas said.

GOP's Bill Thomas Announces Retirement (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas, one of the most powerful lawmakers and colorful characters on Capitol Hill, announced yesterday that he will not seek re-election to his California seat.

The 14-term Republican -- widely loved and loathed for his bombastic nature and detailed grasp of the federal government's most complex issues -- is credited with guiding through Congress President Bush's tax cuts and writing legislation on Medicare and Social Security.

Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, called Mr. Thomas "one of the most effective and successful legislators Congress has seen in years."

"Bill's devotion to the issues that matter and passion for seeing them through will be sorely missed," he said.

Mr. Bush called Mr. Thomas "a friend and a man of great accomplishment who has been a very effective leader in the House of Representatives," citing "legislation that has brought about strong job creation and economic growth, improved health care for people of all ages, and ensured that America continues to benefit from free and fair trade."

Mr. Thomas, who is 64 and has been chairman of the House's lead tax committee since 2001, had been expected to retire because Republican term limit rules would have prohibited him from serving another term as committee chairman.

Other panel Republicans are jockeying to succeed him. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. of Florida issued a statement immediately after Mr. Thomas' announcement, saying: "As Ways and Means chairman, I intend to move legislation that makes our tax code more fair and efficient."

Announcing his decision in Bakersfield, Calif., Mr. Thomas listed among his accomplishments tax cuts and prescription drug benefits for Americans and greater authority for the president to engage in foreign trade.

DOJ_NMG_0016675

"We passed over $2 trillion in tax relief for hardworking American families; we provided the president with trade promotion authority so that he could seek freer and fairer trade markets; and we approved a long-overdue voluntary prescription drug benefit in Medicare for the first time in the program's history," he said.

His mastery of the federal tax code, Medicare and Social Security matters will be sorely missed by Republican leaders.

"His retirement will create a void in the Congress," said Rep. David Dreier, California Republican and chairman of the influential Rules Committee. "He is a very skilled legislator who recognizes the importance of cutting taxes and opening up new markets to benefit American workers and consumers. He will leave a legacy of strong economic growth."

But Mr. Thomas likely will not be missed by Democrats, with whom he has clashed bitterly. Most notably, Mr. Thomas in 2003 called Capitol Police to a room in which Democrats on his committee were meeting and ordered them removed. He later gave a tearful apology on the House floor.

Still, Democrats have little hope of capturing the open seat, which is in one of California's most heavily Republican districts.

Mr. Bush has won the district twice with at least 64 percent of the vote. In 2002, Mr. Thomas defeated his Democratic challenger with 73 percent of the vote. In 2004, he ran unopposed.

House Ways And Means Chief To Retire (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Rep. Bill Thomas, a California Republican who helped to craft President Bush's tax cuts, said he will retire from Congress this term.

Chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee that oversees tax, trade, Social Security and Medicare legislation, Mr. Thomas must give up the post under House Republican term-limit rules. At a press briefing at his district office in Bakersfield, he said he still intends to press ahead with significant tax, health and trade legislation during the rest of the year.

"Over the next nine months, I intend to continue to work hard and finish my congressional term with the same vigor as my first," Mr. Thomas said in a statement. He didn't discuss his plans.

Mr. Thomas, 64 years old, had many legislative successes but he was unable to advance Mr. Bush's top domestic priority last year, overhaul of the Social Security system. His strategy was to broaden the discussion to encompass retirement security and health reform, but he never advanced a comprehensive bill.

The announcement clears the way for a Thomas protégé, Rep. Jim McCrery (R.,-La.), to assume the committee chair next year. Tax analysts and lobbyists have said Mr. McCrery, chairman of the Social Security subcommittee, is the front-runner for the chairmanship. Rep. Clay Shaw (R., Fla.), chairman of the trade subcommittee, is also seeking the post.

Government Smart-Card Project Hits Snags On Fingerprints, Costs (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The government's smart-card project appears at risk of falling behind schedule.

Federal agencies are supposed to begin issuing government-wide identification cards that can vouch for the identity of federal employees and most contractors in October, but the Government Accountability Office warns that setting up and testing new ID systems may not be completed within deadlines set by the Bush administration.

The GAO reviewed the progress of six agencies in developing smart-card systems and found differences in implementation plans, which could hamper efforts to create a government-wide ID card accepted by all agencies. The congressional watchdog agency also found a lack of reliable information about the costs of buying cards and equipment and modifying software systems.

"We acknowledge much more work must be done in order to be successful," the Office of Management and Budget said in a letter accompanying the GAO report. The letter was signed by Karen S. Evans , who is in charge of technology policy at the Office of Management and Budget.

President Bush launched the smart-card project in August 2004, calling for more secure and reliable forms of identification for government workers as part of a broader effort to keep terrorists, criminals and other unauthorized people from getting into federal buildings or hacking into computer systems.

Federal employees are issued a variety of ID cards, and many can be easily forged or altered to gain access to federal buildings. Some agencies, such as the departments of Defense and State, have developed versions of smart cards for many of their employees.

Smart cards, which resemble plastic credit cards, are embedded with a computer chip that permits an exchange of data with another system. The card can store biometric information, such as fingerprints, and can track where a person goes, based on clearances through security checkpoints. In addition to building access, smart cards can be used to supplement passwords for logging onto computers, with users inserting the card into readers on their desktops.

DOJ_NMG_0016676

Under the federal project, cards must display the name of the government employee or contractor, a photograph, the name of their agency or affiliation, a serial number, and an expiration date.

There is no estimate of how many smart cards will be handed out across government (although the Defense Department has said it plans to issue 3.6 million cards to the military, civil service, contractor and other employee groups).

The administration's timetable requires agencies to start issuing cards Oct. 27 and to verify or complete background investigations on employees and contractors in 2007 and 2008.

But the project has hit some snags. The original guidelines called for the cards to carry electronic representations of two fingerprints, but the GAO said agency officials have objected because reading two fingerprint images will require a large amount of computer memory.

The GAO report said it could take 30 seconds to read the fingerprints, "a length of time that would likely cause unacceptable delays in admitting individuals to federal buildings."

Some agency officials prefer to store only details of the ridges in a fingertip, which would cut the transmission time between the cards and card readers to less than 10 seconds. But GAO said that the partial images are of "questionable reliability" and that vendors use techniques that are "proprietary and incompatible." Efforts are underway to resolve the matter, GAO said.

The cost of converting ID systems, however, may be one of the largest problems facing the government. The GAO said some agencies may find it difficult to cover conversion costs out of existing budgets.

"Agencies have been faced with having to potentially make substantial new investments in smart card technology systems with little time to adequately plan and budget for such investments and little cost information about products they will need to acquire," the GAO said.

Clinton Cover-ups (WT)

By Mark Goodman

The Washington Times, March 7, 2006

Lost in the tumult over Islamic port deals and Katrina video capers is the recently released -- and willfully ignored -- Barrett Report. David Barrett, you'll recall, is the independent counsel appointed in 1995 to investigate allegations of impropriety against President Clinton's Department of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Henry Cisneros.

Mr. Barrett found his path mined by the Justice Department, the Internal Revenue Service and President Clinton's attorneys, even after Mr. Clinton departed the White House. He prepared 18 felony indictments against Mr. Cisneros but had to settle for a guilty plea on a misdemeanor charge (lying to the FBI about his mistress, a poor choice for a tax write-off). He sought to prosecute Mr. Cisneros for tax fraud over a period of years but was thwarted by Attorney General Janet Reno. Ultimately Mr. Cisneros resigned his post, whereupon President Clinton, constitutionally bound to men who lie about their mistresses, pardoned him.

Worse, Mr. Barrett's investigations led him into bleak wilds where unnumbered Clinton misdeeds allegedly lay beneath bureaucratic camouflage. These findings comprised a full 120 pages of his 684-page report -- but you won't find them in the final document published on January 19. That's because congressional Democrats, led by Sens. Byron Dorgan, Dick Durbin and John Kerry, used an appropriations bill to leverage a deal redacting the potentially lethal 120 pages.

A frustrated Mr. Barrett released this statement: "An accurate title for the report could be, 'What We Were Prevented From Investigating.'" He added: "After a thorough reading of the report it would not be unreasonable to conclude as I have that there was a cover-up at high levels of our government and it appears to have been substantial and coordinated. The question is why? And that question will regrettably go unanswered. Unlike some other cover-ups, this one succeeded." Just so.

The media in the main treated Mr. Barrett as if he had spent the past ten years chasing ambulances down Pennsylvania Avenue. The New York Times, in self-imposed redaction, nimbly sidestepped the issue of the missing pages. NBC and CBS ignored the report entirely, while ABC cited unnamed critics as branding the study "incompetent, wasteful and without merit." Objection. One witness may be questionable testimony, but two witnesses are corroborating evidence.

I'm an avowed liberal and a registered Democrat, but I can appreciate Mr. Barrett's ordeal like no other because for nine years I've been negotiating a parallel minefield. Herewith, the redacted portion of my life: In 1997, attending to dark rumors, I contracted with a Washington financial investigator -- I'll call him "Deep" for originality's sake -- to run a background check on Norman Pearlstine, former editor of The Wall Street Journal, who'd been hired by his crony, Time Warner CEO Gerry Levin, as Time Inc's editor-in-chief.

Sure enough, Deep reported that Mr. Pearlstine was living far beyond his evident means -- for instance, he had three lavish houses plus a Manhattan co-op. On request, I turned the report over to the chief of the IRS Criminal Investigation Division in Newark, N.J. Two weeks later, Deep's main IRS contact told him Mr. Pearlstine's tax returns "did not remotely match" his assets and that the agency had assigned two top criminal investigators to the case.

DOJ_NMG_0016677

Deep lost the Pearlstine trail, then picked it up again in 2001. "Gerry Levin went to his pal Bill Clinton to get The White House to quash the investigation," he told me. "The two agents assigned to the case were transferred to less sensitive jobs and told to keep their mouths shut or lose their pensions." (Deep pleaded for anonymity; a confidential experience in his NSA years left him in mortal fear of the Clintons.) Whoa.

I suddenly felt like some hapless Hitchcock non-hero who opens the wrong drawing-room door and finds a den filled with opulent thieves, in white tie and tails. Time Warner had already harassed me out of a retaliation suit with the injudicious assistance of Justice Miriam Cedarbaum (Yes, the Martha Stewart judge and my own private Janet Reno).The Justice Department and the FBI then stonewalled me. Fool that I am, I actually thought my colleagues would pounce on such a story. Wrong. Media Blue Wall Law says: No rummaging in the backstage dressing-room of a diva Manhattan editor, especially not with Bill Clinton squinting in the loge.

Surreally, the IRS rang in to threaten me, the whistleblower, with criminal investigation. I accused them of conspiring with Time Warner and the Clinton camp to keep me barefoot and button-lipped. The agency not only backed off, but the Secretary of the Treasury, John Snow, ordered a second inquiry. I'm currently cooperating with CID agents. But I suspect that, not unlike David Barrett, I've been invited on a snipe hunt.

So: We have here twin cautionary tales of fraud, corruption, obstruction and cover-up converging on -- surprise! -- Bill Clinton. It's the Barrett Report, of course, which begs the most disturbing question: What evil lurks in those 120 pages that made the Democratic congressmen press so hard for redaction? My money says, a den filled with opulent thieves, in white tie and tails.

Mark Goodman, who is currently writing his professional memoir, is the author of "Hurrah for the Next Man Who Dies."

Part-Time Congress (WP)

By Norman Ornstein

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

The House of Representatives returns this week to an overloaded agenda. A promise of aggressive oversight of the deal with Dubai to manage U.S. ports will compete with the following:

Renewal of the Patriot Act; the conflict with the White House over electronic surveillance; the need to hammer out a budget by the beginning of April; health care and pension reform (highlighted by the desire to find a fix for the bumpy rollout of the Medicare prescription drug law); Katrina relief and repair of a dysfunctional Department of Homeland Security; lobbying and ethics reform; and a host of other issues.

The House should be well-rested to take on its daunting workload, after a generous recess (known officially as a "district work period") over President's Day. That was preceded by a recess for the entire month of January and by a February in which voting was done on all of three days (along with another three days with no votes before 6:30 p.m.). And members had better be rested, because if their published schedule for the year ahead is followed, they'll have to compress their work into a tiny number of days. The House schedule for 2006, the second session of the 109th Congress, has a grand total of 71 days when votes are scheduled to take place, along with an additional 26 when no votes will occur before 6:30 p.m. The total of 97 calendar days, counted generously, is the smallest number in 60 years and the days of what Harry Truman derided as that "do-nothing 80th Congress."

During the 1960s and '70s, the average Congress was in session 323 days. In the 1980s and '90s, the average declined to 278. The days in session have plummeted since; it's likely that the average per two-year Congress for the first six years of the Bush presidency will be below 250.

Of course, days in session and days voting don't give a full picture of Congress and its work. Committees and subcommittees hold hearings, do oversight and mark up bills. Still, the average Congress in the 1960s and '70s had 5,372 committee and subcommittee meetings; in the 1980s and 1990s, the average was 4,793. In the last Congress, the 108th, the number was 2,135. We do not have final figures yet for 2005, but they are likely to be lower yet, and with oversight practically nonexistent.

When I came to Washington in 1969, I became familiar with what was called the "Tuesday-to-Thursday Club," the band of members, mostly from the Northeast and regions near Washington, who would try to limit their time in the capital to three days a week. They would leave late Thursday evening or early Friday morning to go home and return here late Monday night or early Tuesday. Those club members were in the minority; most legislators spent the full workweek in Washington and were here two or three weekends a month as well when Congress was in session.

DOJ_NMG_0016678

Today the "Tuesday-to-Thursday Club" includes nearly all members, with one distinction from the earlier era: They get back into Washington late Tuesday night, or even early Wednesday, and head out again early Thursday afternoon, having spent just one full day and parts of two others on Capitol Hill.

Why the change? One reason is that most lawmakers now leave their families back in the district instead of having them live in Washington. Another is the explosion in the number of flights from area airports, making it easier for lawmakers from all over the country, including even Alaska and Hawaii, to go back and forth.

But there are other, more important reasons. One is the drive for members to get out and raise money, both for their own campaigns and for those of their current and prospective party colleagues. Many members now have "leadership PACs," which are required for those who want to become subcommittee or committee chairmen or to move up in party leadership. These PACs raise hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions over and above a member's own needs, in order to help "the team." Another is the visceral distaste of current members, especially the majority Republicans who set the schedule, for Washington. Service in Congress is not a privilege and an experience to be savored so much as it is like taking castor oil -- an unpleasant necessity, and one indulged in as little as possible.

Then there is the strategy of the majority leadership. Getting bills passed, keeping party discipline and satisfying interest groups means folding legislation into a small number of huge omnibus bills, bringing them up with little notice and less debate, structuring the votes around restrictive rules that limit or forbid amendments, and demanding party fealty on the votes that take place by labeling them "procedural." The less time the members spend in hearings, floor debate and generally poking around the Hill, the easier it is for the leaders to get their way without scrutiny or challenge.

Mention the part-time nature of this Congress to many people, and the reaction is, "Good, the less time they're in session, the less the danger to the country." Wrong. Congress does not do less -- it has its full impact on society -- it just does things in a shoddier way.

A part-time Congress in a country with a $13 trillion economy and federal budget near $3 trillion, in a globalized, technologically sophisticated world, is itself a danger to the checks and balances built into American democracy, and to high-quality, careful policymaking and oversight. It's not too much to ask Congress to commit to spending at least half the year -- 26 weeks -- working full-time, five days a week, thus providing at least a measure of the deliberation and attention to detail that are so lacking now.

The Business Of Government (NYT)

The New York Times, March 7, 2006

There are any number of object lessons in the downfall of former Representative Randy Cunningham, the greedy politician, dubbed Duke, who took millions of dollars in bribes in return for doling out scores of millions in sweetheart defense contracts. Mr. Cunningham, a Republican, was sentenced to eight years in prison. His ill-gained riches included a Rolls-Royce, a yacht and a Louis-Philippe commode. For all that, far more stunning dimensions of influence peddling in Washington came to light recently when Mitchell Wade, the contractor who bribed Mr. Cunningham, also confessed to providing jobs to the son of a Pentagon official charged with oversight of his business and, later, to that official.

Mr. Wade, seeking more than one friend in Congress, also admitted he had made illegal campaign donations to two lawmakers while pressing them to earmark more defense appropriations to keep his company growing. Earmarks are one of the scandalous goodies in Congress's quid pro quo culture — the secretive doling out, beyond public notice, of millions in favors in the rushed passage of budget bills.

One of the solicited representatives, Virgil Goode Jr., a Virginia Republican, received $46,000 in illegal donations while successfully earmarking $9 million in taxpayer money as Mr. Wade talked of more jobs for the lawmaker's district. The other, Katherine Harris, the Florida Republican, received $32,000 of Wade money, illegally disguised as smaller contributions from Wade employees. A $10 million earmark for the Wade company was requested but not delivered by Ms. Harris.

Justice officials say there is no evidence of criminal violations by the two lawmakers. Once the scandal broke, they forwarded the illegal donations to charity. Proclaiming her innocence, Ms. Harris insists that she was duped in the "perils of a process in which candidates are sometimes asked to determine the intent of a contributor." Mr. Wade's intent, however, was hardly murky because the investigation established that he had taken Ms. Harris to dinner and that the two had discussed the possibility of further political contributions, of earmarked government money for Mr. Wade's company and of a company branch in her district.

So goes licit political business these days in Washington. The prosecutor, Kenneth Wainstein, noted that Mr. Wade's company had been perceived as a classic "American success story" — garnering $150 million in government contracts in just three years — but was actually a model for spreading political corruption from Capitol Hill to the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0016679

Charities On The Hill (WP)

The Washington Post, March 7, 2006

PENNSYLVANIA Sen. Rick Santorum created his charity, "Operation Good Neighbor," when the Republican National Convention was going to Philadelphia in 2000. "I thought: 'Wouldn't it be a great thing to leave something positive behind other than a bunch of parties and a bunch of garbage,' " Mr. Santorum told the Philadelphia Inquirer at the time. But in the years since, Mr. Santorum's charity appears to have done a lot to help his political allies -- and less than it might have in its stated mission of combating poverty, teen pregnancy and other social ills.

According to reports by the American Prospect magazine and the Associated Press, Mr. Santorum's charity spent $1.25 million between 2001 and 2004, but it devoted just 40 percent of that to charity. (A letter from the charity's treasurer, who also serves as treasurer of Mr. Santorum's political action committee, explains that fundraising expenses alone are "close to 37% of expenditures, as these fundraising events are recreational outings such as golf tournaments.")

Meanwhile, a Santorum campaign fundraiser, Maria Diesel, received nearly $200,000 in fundraising fees from Operation Good Neighbor; another Santorum campaign fundraiser, Rob Bickhart, received $75,000 in salary from the charity since 2001, and Mr. Bickhart's business, Capitol Resource Group, rents office space to the charity.

The Santorum story highlights a largely unexplored area of congressional ethics: lawmakers' involvement with charitable organizations. According to a 2004 review of Internal Revenue Service records by the research group PoliticalMoneyLine, 48 members of Congress are connected to charitable foundations. These groups may do good works, but they also present opportunities for misuse -- to bolster members' political operations, for example, or to underwrite swank parties at political conventions.

Politicians and their spouses hit up companies and lobbyists that have interests before them to contribute to their pet charities, personal and otherwise, often dangling the lure of access to themselves and colleagues. Christine DeLay, the wife of former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), was remarkably straightforward about this phenomenon in a recent interview with Post columnist George F. Will that touched on the DeLays' charitable efforts on behalf of foster children. "I hated to lose the leadership position because it helps me to raise money for those kids," she said. And this all takes place outside public view, since, unlike political contributions, charitable donations aren't publicly reported -- though lawmakers obviously know who's kicking in to help their cause.

We're all for altruism, but that's not necessarily what's going on here. There is an inevitable element of extortion whenever politicians get involved in soliciting charitable donations. And when lawmakers have a personal interest in the charity, the opportunities for abuse are greatly magnified. Provisions contained in an ethics measure approved by the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs last week, and parallel language offered by House Democrats, would require that lobbyists report donations they make or arrange to lawmakers' charities, or gifts they make to other charities in recognition of politicians. That would shed some valuable light on a now-dark corner of money and politics.

Union War Rules (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

In drafting the U.S. Constitution, the Founders entrusted national security largely to the President. But to protect the Republic today, the executive branch must first comply with something James Madison never imagined -- union work rules.

In a decision last week, federal Judge Emmet Sullivan sided with union plaintiffs and tossed out the Pentagon's new personnel system, which the Defense Secretary and White House say they need to safeguard the nation. His decision comes after federal Judge Rosemary Collyer threw out a similar personnel system at the Department of Homeland Security in August. (That case is under appeal.) The danger here is that the collective bargaining rights of 650,000 civilian workers will trump the collective right we all have to a military organized to confront 21st-century threats.

Five years ago Donald Rumsfeld returned to the Pentagon to find that its personnel system was even more outdated than GM's. He was forced to negotiate with some 1,300 unions and operate under rules that rewarded seniority over initiative and prevented managers from redirecting civilian workers to more pressing assignments.

This is especially dangerous in wartime, when the Defense Department is forced to put uniformed troops in administrative jobs that need to be filled quickly even though they might be put to better use in Iraq or elsewhere. Not so incidentally, this also encourages the best civilian employees to quit for private-sector jobs that will pay them better. So the Administration pushed for basing pay on performance, allowing the Pentagon to shift employees to meet emerging threats and allowing the new rules to go into effect even if the American Federation of Government Employees and other unions didn't agree to them.

Congress passed legislation in 2003 calling for a "flexible" and "contemporary" personnel system. But thanks in large part to Republican Senators Susan Collins (Maine) and George Voinovich (Ohio), the bill also said that employees were allowed to

DOJ_NMG_0016680

"bargain collectively" through their unions. It was on this hook that Judge Sullivan hung his decision, arguing that the new regulations would undermine agreements with union officials. So the Defense Department can have a new personnel system, but only if it's identical to the old system.

We doubt this is what Congress had in mind in authorizing the Pentagon to "establish and from time to time adjust a labor relations system . . . to address the unique role that the Department's civilian workforce plays in supporting the Department's national security mission." It also glosses over the fact that, even under the new system, Defense officials will continue to negotiate with unions over pay and benefits and will have every incentive to use their new flexibility in a way that doesn't produce labor tension.

The Pentagon hasn't decided what its next step will be, but we hope the Administration will appeal. It's hard to see how Mr. Rumsfeld's drive to use his uniformed soldiers more effectively can proceed if he doesn't gain the flexibility to better use his civilian workforce. Improving Defense's "tooth-to-tail ratio" requires getting the civilian tail out from under union work rules.

OTHER NEWS:

Factory Orders Slid 4.5% In January (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

Factory orders took their steepest drop in more than five years in January, pulled down by a sharp decline in orders for airplanes. Excluding aircraft, however, factory orders were robust.

New orders for manufactured goods in January fell 4.5% from the previous month, the Commerce Department reported yesterday. That was the sharpest decline since an 8.7% drop in July 2000, and largely reflected a 31% decline in orders for transportation products and equipment, such as autos and airplanes.

Because of the volatility of aircraft orders, economists often look at factory orders excluding transportation, to better gauge the economy's underlying health. That indicator posted 1.6% growth in January, the biggest gain in five months. And an important barometer of business spending -- orders for nondefense capital goods excluding aircraft -- rose 0.1% in January and was up 7.5% from a year earlier.

Overall orders for durable goods, including electronic equipment, were off 9.9%, also the sharpest decline since July 2000. Durable goods are big-ticket items expected to last at least three years.

Yesterday's data "confirm that underlying manufacturing conditions remain upbeat," said Conrad DeQuadros, a senior economist at Bear Stearns Cos. "Businesses are fairly confident that this [economic expansion] is sustainable. They feel further business investment is necessary" to keep up with demand in coming months, which will stimulate additional spending, he said.

Mr. DeQuadros projects that spending on business equipment in the first quarter will rise roughly 10% from the fourth quarter, and that the steady demand should help the economy offset the effects of a softening housing market this year.

Last month, an Indian airline ordered 68 planes from Boeing Co. in a deal valued at around $11 billion. That will likely push February's aircraft orders sharply higher when they are reported next month. Moreover, U.S. companies hope that the Indian air force will buy about 125 fighter jets in the near future.

Separately, data released yesterday by the National Association of Realtors showed the housing market continued to slow in January. The trade group reported that its index of pending sales of existing homes, which includes single-family units, condos and co-ops, fell 1.1% in January from December and was down 4.8% from a year earlier. After peaking in August the index fell an average of nearly three percentage points a month through December. The current index is based on contracts signed in January, which typically close within two months.

David Lereah, NAR's chief economist, points to January's 1.1% decline, after sharper drops in preceding months, as evidence that the housing market is "plateauing." He adds: "We're at a more sustainable level of home sales right now. Demand is still strong but we're seeing a transition from a seller's market to a buyer's market. This is a soft landing scenario."

Still, other analysts warn that the slowdown could be painful, at least for sellers. Daniel Oppenheim, a housing analyst at Bank of America Corp., reported last week that his monthly survey of real-estate agents in February showed flat or lower prices in 13 of 20 major metropolitan areas.

Bond Yields Weigh On Stocks (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 7, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0016681

Utility stocks were the first to fall. Small companies followed. By afternoon, most stocks were mired in the red as a jump in Treasury yields raised concerns about the health of corporate profits, housing and the stability of stock prices.

One group that escaped Monday's downward spiral: telecom stocks, which rose in the wake of the announced tie-up between AT&T and BellSouth.

Stocks regained some territory in the final hour of trading. The Dow Jones Industrial Average, off more than 90 points earlier, finished down by 63 points to 10958.59. Alcoa, Caterpillar and Honeywell International all lost about 2%, as did AT&T. General Motors was a standout, gaining 3.1% after it said it could get about $2 billion after selling most of its stake1 in Japan's Suzuki Motors.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 8.97 to 1278.26 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell 16.57 to 2286.03.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose to 4.742%, its highest level since June 2004, when the Federal Reserve first started lifting rates. The decline by Treasury bonds continued a trend that began last week after the European Central Bank raised a benchmark refinancing rate to 2.5%. "It certainly looks like a breakout on the yield of the 10-year Treasury," said Robert Pavlik, chief investment officer at Oaktree Asset Management.

The bond market is likely signaling that the Fed may raise rates higher than equity investors hope, said Owen Fitzpatrick, managing director at Deutsche Bank Private Wealth Management. "There's definitely more concern that the Fed could be planning more than just one or two more rate hikes," he said, possibly boosting the overnight bank-lending rate to as high as 5.5%.

The bond carnage spilled over into the utility sector. Utility companies, which offer high dividend yields, often compete against bonds for investor dollars. The Dow Jones Utility Average, which tracks 15 utility stocks such as Williams and Consolidated Edison, shed 2.7%.

Higher yields make it more expensive for companies and consumers to do business, which can hurt corporate profits. Housing stocks also suffer from higher yields, which make mortgages more costly. The Philadelphia Housing Sector Index fell 1%. Small companies, generally more sensitive to interest rates, since they generally rely more on loans to finance their businesses, also suffered. The Russell 2000 index of small-cap stocks fell 1%.

Light, sweet crude-oil prices fell $1.26 to $62.41 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange amid expectations that the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will leave its output quotas unchanged after meeting later this week. Comex gold prices slid $11.20 to $556.80 on the Nymex.

Meanwhile, investors weighed AT&T's agreement to buy9 smaller rival BellSouth in a $67 billion stock deal that would create the largest telecommunications company in the world with a market capitalization of as much as $170 billion. The announced deal, the fifth-biggest ever, comes after several blockbusters in the industry last year, including combinations between SBC Communications and AT&T and Verizon Communications and MCI.

Shares of AT&T fell 3.5%, and BellSouth's jumped 9.7%. Investors often unload shares of an acquiring company and purchase the stock of the company being acquired, though concerns about whether the deal will survive regulatory scrutiny are also playing a role in the stock action.

Talk of other potential deals in the business boosted the sector: Verizon gained nearly 1%; European telecom operator Vodafone Group, Verizon's partner in Verizon Wireless, gained 4.3%; Sprint Nextel rose 4.6%; and Qwest Communications International was up 3.8%.

In major market action:

Stocks declined10. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,008 stocks rose and 2,351 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.2 billion shares traded, 1,123 rose and 1,933 declined.

Bonds dipped11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 14/32, or $4.38 per $1,000 invested, to yield 4.742%. The 30-year bond fell 1 2/32 to yield 4.728%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar rose.12 It traded at 117.58 yen, up from 116.39 yen late Friday, while the euro fell to $1.2020 from $1.2037.

DeLay To Spend Primary Night As Star Guest Of Lobbyists (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 7, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay, whose association with lobbyist Jack Abramoff has left him politically vulnerable, is spending Texas' primary night tonight at a Washington fundraiser hosted by two lobbyists.

DeLay has three opponents in the Republican primary and could face a serious challenge in the general election after leaving his job as House majority leader amid campaign finance scandals.

The fundraiser is being held by lobbyists Bill Paxon and Susan Molinari, both former members of Congress from New York. The event will raise money for DeLay's re-election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0016682

DeLay spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said DeLay would be in Washington for votes and has other events on his schedule including the fundraiser. She said he was unavailable for an interview.

DeLay's toughest primary challenger, attorney Tom Campbell, criticized the congressman's plans. "I think it's amazingly ironic and callous he would be spending election night with a group of lobbyists," he said.

DeLay is awaiting trial in Texas on charges of money laundering. DeLay has denied wrongdoing and has labeled the Texas investigation a witch hunt.

The former House majority leader has been behind in the fundraising race against the Democrat he would oppose if he wins today. In reports filed with the Federal Election Commission late last month, DeLay had raised about $153,000 between Jan. 1 and Feb. 15, compared with $248,000 for Nick Lampson, a former congressman. DeLay had about $1.3 million in cash as of Feb. 15, while Lampson had $1.4 million.

In the state's gubernatorial primary election today, two Democrats are competing for the chance to challenge Republican Gov. Rick Perry. Chris Bell, a former one-term congressman from Houston, has raised more than three times as much money as his opponent, former Texas Supreme Court justice Bob Gammage.

The general election could also include two independents: the state comptroller, who calls herself "one tough grandma," and a cigar-chomping comedian. Texas Comptroller Carole Keeton Strayhorn and humorist Kinky Friedman have to collect 45,540 signatures each from voters who did not cast ballots in the primary to make the November ballot as independents.

Texas Voters Have Their Say (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, March 7, 2006

Voters in Texas go to the polls today to decide the fate of embattled Rep. Tom DeLay (R) and others running in contentious Lone Star State primaries, with the national spotlight shining on the former Majority Leader and how he fares with his constituents.

Democrats will be closely watching the rematch between Rep. Henry Cuellar and the man he ousted two years ago, ex-Rep. Ciro Rodriguez.

DeLay is expected to beat the three challengers opposing him in the Republican primary, but the extent to which he can avoid a runoff by securing more than 50 percent of the vote in the suburban Houston 22nd district — and by how much, if he does — could be telling for Democrats, who hope to ride their "Culture of Corruption" slogan to a House takeover in November.

Attorney Tom Campbell (R), seen as most likely to give DeLay trouble in today's vote if anyone does, maintains that DeLay's constituents are tired of behavior Campbell describes as unseemly and unethical (DeLay has been indicted for violating Texas election law by a Democratic district attorney and has ties to disgraced Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff).

But the DeLay camp insists voters realize such attacks are the result of angry Democrats who have impugned the Congressman's integrity because they couldn't defeat Republicans at the polls. Signaling his confidence in the outcome of today's vote, DeLay is scheduled to be in Washington, D.C., today for House business and to hold a fundraiser.

"We've put together a sophisticated and effective campaign organization that's not only prepared for [today], but ready to topple [former Democratic Rep.] Nick Lampson in November," DeLay campaign spokeswoman Shannon Flaherty said. "We've identified our supporters and now we just need to get them out to vote."

Despite the volatility and national attention on a race featuring the former House Majority Leader, the shenanigans in the primary have been fairly tame. The Free Enterprise Fund, based in D.C., has been running ads touting DeLay, with the latest ad attacking liberal politicians and their supporters.

Opposing DeLay, a group calling itself American Family Voices has lobbed pre-recorded phone calls into the district accusing the Congressman of being weak on port security. Lampson, DeLay's presumed Democratic opponent in the general election, also has been hitting DeLay on the port security issue.

The wild card, Flaherty said, is the behavior of Democratic voters, who are allowed to vote in either the Democratic or Republican primary under Texas' open primary system. Flaherty said Democratic voters in Harris County have been more active in this Republican primary than in past GOP primaries, with some anecdotal evidence showing that they may be turning out to vote against DeLay.

"With early voting we're seeing low turnout in some areas of the district, and even Democrat crossover that can swing any election," Flaherty said.

Campbell spokesman Michael Stanley believes voters have tired of DeLay, and said Monday it is highly likely there will be a runoff, which would occur on April 11 if no candidate in the four-way race manages to secure more than 50 percent of the vote.

"It's going very well," Stanley said.

DOJ_NMG_0016683

Two other primaries that have seen negative campaigning take hold as today's elections have approached are the 28th district Democratic primary and the 17th district Republican primary.

In 28th district, which encompasses much of San Antonio and Laredo, Cuellar and Rodriguez have been trading ethics charges in the press and via their campaign advertisements.

Third-party groups also have entered the fray, with the Lone Star Project on Friday sending out a news release that questions Cuellar's use of campaign funds in his 2002 Congressional race and charges he misused state funds while still Texas secretary of state, which is an appointed position.

The Cuellar campaign has capitalized on a private investigator suing Rodriguez to collect a campaign debt he claims is unpaid, calling him a "Deadbeat Candidate," and accused him of using his position while in Congress to go on lobbyist-paid junkets that betray his supposed concern for the working people of the 28th district.

Both sides were claiming on Monday to be the victims of false, unfair attacks.

"We intend to win without a runoff and send a strong message that the last-minute special interest mudslinging can't overcome good old-fashioned hard work," Cuellar campaign spokesman Colin Strother said. "These are the same folks who we beat in 2004 and we feel supremely confident that voters will rebel against the lies and the venom some of these groups are spewing."

Cuellar has had a significant fundraising advantage, but Rodriguez narrowed the gap in recent weeks with help from donations from Democratic House members, liberal interest groups and solicitations for small donations by left-wing Web logs.

Cuellar is the incumbent, but many Democratic leaders would love to see Rodriguez beat him because they feel he is too conservative and too friendly with President Bush.

"I think that Mr. Cuellar and his campaign took us for granted, and now they're struggling and bringing all kinds of dirty stuff, but in end voters will decide," Rodriguez campaign spokesman Oscar Sanchez said. "We feel very confident that we're going to show really great numbers tomorrow and we're counting on a victory."

But there is a third candidate in the race, which means an April runoff is possible.

Perhaps the muddiest primary fight — though it has gotten less attention outside Texas — has been waged in Rep. Chet Edwards' (D) 17th district, where two Republicans are battling for the right to run against the Congressman in a district drawn for the GOP but won by the veteran Democrat in 2004.

Iraq war combat veteran and wealthy businessman Van Taylor (R) has been sparring with attorney and former Congressional aide Tucker Anderson (R), with the accusations becoming increasingly nasty as today's election approached. Taylor, endorsed late last week by Gov. Rick Perry (R), claims Anderson is using "liberal Democrats and anti-Christian activists" to attack him, while in another slam insinuates wrongdoing by asking whether his opponent "pays property taxes on the home in which he lives."

Anderson, whose former boss, Rep. Pete Sessions (R-Texas), recorded phone calls encouraging voters to elect his old employee, has sent out a mailer featuring a letter to the editor of a local newspaper that highlights this excerpt:

"Van Taylor ... refused to answer the question and instead gave a long-winded answer that left me with no idea what he believed in. I thought I was listening to" Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.).

