She was part of a national security team that was often at war with itself. Her relationship with Mr. Reagan's first secretary of state, the four-star general Alexander M. Haig Jr., "started off bad and got worse over time," Mr. Adelman said in an oral history of the Reagan years. She had something Mr. Haig found that he lacked: the president's ear.

Ms. Kirkpatrick first entered Mr. Reagan's inner circle on the strength of a 10,000-word article she published in the neoconservative magazine Commentary in November 1979. The article, "Dictatorships and Double Standards," drew a bright line between right-wing pro-American governments and left-wing anti-American ones.

"Traditional authoritarian governments," she argued, "are less repressive than revolutionary autocracies." She said it was an historic mistake for the United States to have shied away from dictators like the Somozas in Nicaragua and the Shah of Iran. If they served American interests, she asserted, they were defensible.

Mr. Reagan read the article closely. Richard V. Allen, who later became the first of his six national security advisers, introduced him to Ms. Kirkpatrick. They met at a February 1980 dinner party given by George F. Will, the syndicated columnist.

She recalled that she wondered aloud how she, a Democrat all her life, could join his team. Mr. Reagan confided, "I was a Democrat once, you know." He won her over. After his election a year later, Ms. Kirkpatrick became the United Nations ambassador and "Dictatorships and Double Standards" became an important part of the foreign policy of the United States.

At the United Nations, Ms. Kirkpatrick was the target of barbs and backstabbing. Sometimes she was aware of the source, sometimes not.

She knew she was "a kind of special target for the Soviets — disinformation target," she said at a 2003 foreign policy roundtable convened by the Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. In 1982, the K.G.B. forged a letter to discredit her and fobbed it off on the Washington correspondent for The New Statesman, a leftist British weekly, which reprinted it. The phony letter was a note of "best regards and gratitude" from the intelligence chief of the apartheid South African government.

"But I felt there was as much disinformation aimed at me from inside our own government, frankly, as from the Soviet Union," Ms. Kirkpatrick said. "That's a shocking thing to say, but it is no exaggeration."

Role as Adviser Blocked

In 1983, Ms. Kirkpatrick was a strong candidate to become President Reagan's third national security adviser. She had support from the director of central intelligence, William J. Casey, and Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger. But her new boss, Secretary of State George P. Shultz, opposed her.

"I respected her intelligence, but she was not well suited to the job," Mr. Shultz wrote. "Her strength was in her capacity for passionate advocacy," and the post, he added, demanded a "dispassionate broker."

Ms. Kirkpatrick was at the June 1984 National Security Planning Group meeting that began the secret initiative that later became known as the Iran-contra affair. Congress had cut off funds for the contras. Mr. Casey wanted to obtain money from foreign countries in defiance of the ban.

Ms. Kirkpatrick was in favor. "We should make the maximum effort to find the money," she said. Mr. Shultz was opposed. "It is an impeachable offense," he said. President Reagan warned that if the story leaked, "we'll all be hanging by our thumbs in front of the White House."

Secret Arms Sales Exposed

Over the next two years, millions skimmed from secret arms sales to Iran went to the contras. The story did leak, as Mr. Reagan feared, and his Administration was shaken by Congressional investigations and criminal charges. Robert C. McFarlane, who had won the national security slot over Ms. Kirkpatrick, pleaded guilty to misinforming Congress.

Mr. McFarlane said he should have stood up against the secret initiative to support the contras. But "if I'd done that," he said, "Bill Casey, Jeane Kirkpatrick and Cap Weinberger would have said I was some kind of commie."

By then Ms. Kirkpatrick had left the government. She stuck to a vow to leave the United Nations at the end of Mr. Reagan's first term and resigned in April 1985. She was succeeded by Vernon A. Walters, a former deputy director of central intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0105160

The next year, as the Iran-contra story began unfolding, Mr. Casey urged the president to make her secretary of state, but Mr. Reagan rejected the idea.

Ms. Kirkpatrick spent the rest of her career commenting on policy instead of making it. She remained among the most highly regarded members of the Republican establishment, and her voice remained one of the strongest echoes of the Reagan era.

Jeane Duane Jordan was born on Nov. 19, 1926, in Duncan, Okla., about 160 miles northwest of Dallas, the daughter of Welcher F. and Leona Jordan. Her father was an oil wildcatter who moved from town to town searching for a gusher that he never hit.

She attended Stephens College in Missouri for two years, then moved to New York, where she earned a bachelor's degree from Barnard College in 1948 and a master's degree from Columbia University in 1950. She went to Washington as a research analyst at the Intelligence and Research Bureau of the State Department, where she met her future husband, Evron Kirkpatrick. Fifteen years her senior, he was a veteran of the wartime Office of Strategic Services, and he soon became the head of the American Political Science Association. They married in 1955 and had three sons — Douglas Jordan, John Evron and Stuart Alan. Douglas died earlier this year. The other sons and five grandchildren survive her. Mr. Kirkpatrick died in 1995.

In 1967, before completing her doctoral dissertation, she was appointed associate professor at Georgetown University. The next year, she earned a doctorate in political science at Columbia University. Georgetown made her a full professor in 1973 and gave her the endowed Leavey Chair five years later.

Ms. Kirkpatrick supported Jimmy Carter in 1976 and came close to being chosen for an ambassadorship in his administration. But she had become deeply disenchanted with her party.

Swept In With 50 Others

She joined the vanguard of the neoconservative movement, the Committee on the Present Danger, which warned throughout the late 1970s of a disastrous downturn in every aspect of American strength, from nuclear warheads to national image. When Mr. Reagan came to office in 1981, 51 of the committee's members won positions of significant power in his administration.

Power, Ms. Kirkpatrick said in a 1996 interview, is based not merely on guns or money but on the strength of personal conviction.

"We were concerned about the weakening of Western will," she said. "We advocated rebuilding Western strength, and we did that with Ronald Reagan, if I may say so."

Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, 1926-2006: U.N. Ambassador Upheld Reagan Doctrine (WP)

By Joe Holley

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, 80, a Georgetown University political science professor who became the first woman to serve as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and who was one of the chief architects of the muscular anti-Communist foreign policy that came to be known as the Reagan doctrine, died Dec. 7 at her home in Bethesda, where she was under hospice care.

Her assistant, Andrea Harrington, said she died in her sleep. The cause of death was not immediately known.

"She defended the cause of freedom at a pivotal time in world history," President Bush said yesterday. "Jeane's powerful intellect helped America win the Cold War."

Praising Kirkpatrick's "commitment to an effective United Nations," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said she was "always ardent and often provocative."

For many years a Cold War liberal, a Democrat in the tradition of senators Hubert H. Humphrey Jr. (Minn.) and Henry M. "Scoop" Jackson (Wash.), Kirkpatrick became a neoconservative in the 1970s and then a Republican Party stalwart. An academic and a public intellectual who never held elective office, she briefly considered seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 1988.

DOJ_NMG_0105161

She came to Ronald Reagan's attention in 1979, when he read an article she had written for the neoconservative magazine Commentary, "Dictatorships and Double Standards." In the article, she accused the Carter administration of abiding totalitarian enemies on the left while holding authoritarian allies in Latin America and elsewhere to a higher standard.

It was difficult, she wrote, to "democratize governments, any time, anywhere, under any circumstances" although "right-wing autocracies do sometimes evolve into democracies" but communist societies never do.

"This is incredible. Who is this person?" Reagan is said to have exclaimed.

The columnist George Will introduced the two at a dinner party at his Georgetown home in 1980, and Kirkpatrick eventually decided to endorse Reagan for president and to campaign for him. When he named her U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, she became the first Democrat to fill a Cabinet-level post in the administration. She was unanimously confirmed by the Senate.

She warned that she would not be "a ventriloquist's dummy" at the United Nations, mouthing administration policy, and there were times when her willingness to speak her mind ruffled feelings not only at the United Nations but within the administration.

Although she arrived at the United Nations with no diplomatic experience, she quickly assumed a high-profile role. Her fellow envoys may have considered her arrogant and condescending, but they knew she had Reagan's ear.

An influential voice in the development of administration policies toward Central America, Kirkpatrick supported the military junta in El Salvador and was an ardent supporter of anti-Sandinista rebels fighting the leftist Sandinista government of Nicaragua. She helped develop the covert plan to provide $19 million in aid to the contras.

She also defended Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the American invasion of Grenada in 1983.

Kirkpatrick, the only woman in President Reagan's National Security Council, told Time magazine in 1982 that her gender could have been the cause of her difficulties with Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig and other administration officials. The author of "Political Women" (1974), a major study of the role of women in modern politics, she acknowledged that a woman in high office is "intrinsically controversial."

"Many people think a woman shouldn't be in high office," she told Time. "Kissinger is described as 'professorial.' I am described as 'schoolmarmish.' Brzezinski is called 'Doctor.' I am called "Mrs.' I am depicted as a witch or a scold in editorial cartoons -- and the speed with which these stereotypes have been used shows how close these feelings are to the surface. It is much worse than I ever dreamed it would be. My feelings are hurt."

With her closely cropped gray hair, utilitarian clothes and blunt speaking style, the public Jeane Kirkpatrick seemed humorless and austere. "Raised eyebrows give her an expression of sustained skepticism, as if she lives on the verge of some crucial debate the rest of us do not hear," James Conaway observed in a 1981 Washington Post Magazine article.

Friends of Kirkpatrick's told Conaway that she was much more charming in private; Peter Arnold, a former colleague at the American Enterprise Institute, said she had a "remarkable sense of humor." Her great passion, she once said, was listening to the pianist Glenn Gould play Bach.

In 1985, the Washington Post editorial page, describing Kirkpatrick as "a highly articulate and intellectual Democrat who cares deeply about ideas in politics," praised her for her plain speaking about the penchant of some Third World countries to blame Israel and the United States for everything.

She was born Jeane Duane Jordan in Duncan, Okla., the daughter of an oil field wildcatter who moved his family to a succession of small towns in Oklahoma and Illinois seeking the elusive big strike.

She received an associate's degree from Stephens College in Columbia, Mo., in 1946, and a bachelor's degree in 1950 from Barnard College, where she considered herself a socialist.

While working on a master's degree in political science from Columbia University, she became a resolute anti-Stalinist as a result of stories that had begun to emerge about the horrors of the Nazi and Soviet concentration camps.

After receiving a master's degree in 1950, Kirkpatrick worked briefly as a research analyst in the State Department and then did postgraduate work in 1952-53 at the Institut de Science Politique of the University of Paris.

She moved to Washington after marrying political scientist Evron Kirkpatrick, a deputy director of the State Department's Intelligence Research Bureau; worked on her dissertation; raised three boys and stayed involved in Democratic Party politics.

DOJ_NMG_0105162

After the 1972 Democratic National Convention, she became one of the charter members of the Coalition for a Democratic Majority, a group that included senators Humphrey, Jackson and Daniel Patrick Moynihan (N.Y.), Commentary editor Norman Podhoretz and his wife, neoconservative author Midge Decter. The aim of the CDC was to reclaim the Democratic Party from the McGovernites.

In 1962, she became an assistant professor of political science at Trinity College in the District and in 1967 associate professor of political science at Georgetown University. After finishing her dissertation, "Peronist Politics in Argentina," she received a doctorate from Columbia University in 1968. She became a full professor at Georgetown in 1973.

In 1978, she joined the American Enterprise Institute, which had become an intellectual home for many of her fellow CDC neoconservatives. Kirkpatrick, the only female scholar in residence, was a forceful advocate of American hegemony in a dangerous world.

She finally changed parties in 1985, registering as a Republican in Montgomery County after stepping down as U.N. ambassador. A year earlier, she had energized delegates to the 1984 Republican National Convention with her attacks on "the San Francisco Democrats." As she led delegates in a chant of "they always blame America first," she could look out over the throng and see a number of "Kemp-Kirkpatrick" buttons.

She explained her party conversion by saying she was "tired of swimming against the current in my own party." Democrats, she contended, no longer stood for "growth at home, strength abroad." She did, however, remain true to her Democratic Party heritage on organized labor and most social issues.

She remained active in public life after leaving the United Nations, although she was reportedly disappointed that Reagan did not offer her another Cabinet-level position in his second term.

Back at Georgetown University and at the American Enterprise Institute, she wrote articles and a syndicated column for the Los Angeles Times, spoke regularly on politics and public policy and was a frequent foreign policy adviser to Republicans.

Last year, she was one of seven former U.N. ambassadors who wrote a letter urging lawmakers not to withhold dues as a way to force reform.

Kirkpatrick's husband died in 1995. A son, Douglas Kirkpatrick, died this year.

Survivors include two sons, Stuart Kirkpatrick, known as Traktung Rinpoche, a Buddhist minister in Ann Arbor, Mich., and John Kirkpatrick, a lawyer in Miami.

Former U.N. Ambassador Kirkpatrick Dies (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Jeane Kirkpatrick, an unabashed apostle of Reagan era conservatism and the first woman U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, has died.

The death of the 80-year-old Kirkpatrick, who began her public life as a Hubert Humphrey Democrat, was announced Friday at the senior staff meeting of the U.S. mission to the United Nations.

Spokesman Richard Grenell said that Ambassador John Bolton asked for a moment of silence. An announcement of her death also was posted on the website of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative-oriented think tank here where she was a senior fellow.

Kirkpatrick's assistant, Andrea Harrington, said that she died in her sleep at home in Bethesda, Md. late Thursday. She had been suffering from heart disease, but the cause of death was not immediately known.

Kirkpatrick's health had been in decline recently, Harrington said, adding that she was "basically confined to her house," going to work about once a week "and then less and less."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said that Kirkpatrick, who had a reputation as a blunt and acerbic advocate, "stood up for the interests of America while at the U.N., lent a powerful moral voice to the Reagan foreign policy and has been a source of wise counsel to our nation since leaving the government two decades ago. She will be greatly missed."

Karlyn Bowman, a colleague of Kirkpatrick's at AEI, called her "always insightful. Always interesting. Very thoughtful about modern American politics and foreign policy. A wonderful colleague."

DOJ_NMG_0105163

Bowman also said that Kirkpatrick, who had been elevated to the U.N. post by President Reagan in 1981, had "served with great distinction" at the U.N. "She was a great patriot, a champion of freedom and we will certainly miss her at AEI and the country."

Kirkpatrick was known as a blunt and sometimes acerbic advocate for her causes. She remained involved in public issues even though she'd left government service two decades ago. She joined seven other former U.N. ambassadors in 2005 in writing a letter to Congress telling lawmakers that their plan to withhold dues to force reform at the world body was misguided and would "create resentment, build animosity and actually strengthen opponents of reform."

Kirkpatrick was a political science professor at Georgetown University from 1957 until her appointment to the U.N.

Like many conservatives, she wrote for Commentary Magazine, a liberal publication that gradually turned to conservatism amid liberals' criticism of Israel.

A pivotal article sought to draw a distinction between authoritarian governments and more extreme violators of human rights like the Soviet Union.

In the Reagan years she played a quiet role in cutting off U.S. aid to a leftist government in Nicaragua and supporting a military junta in El Salvador.

Her support for Israel, particularly at the United Nations where the Jewish state often is denounced, was steadfast.

Bill Bennett, a former secretary of education under Reagan, the nation's drug czar under the first President Bush and a leading conservative opinion-maker, called her "very forceful, very strong, a daughter of Oklahoma, great sense of humor. She held her own."

Bennett said the Iraq Study Group so prominently in the news "would have been better with Jeane Kirkpatrick on it ... She had no patience with tyrannies, said they had to be confronted, you couldn't deal with tyrannies, that there were some people you could work with — these people you couldn't."

Kirkpatrick once referred to herself as a "lifelong Democrat."

She actually switched to the GOP in early 1985, four years after Reagan sent her to New York for the U.N. job. She took with her a reputation as a hard-liner on foreign policy. Because of this, she often was a lightning rod for the opposition. In some respects, she was a controversial figure like Bolton, who recently decided to resign when it became clear the Senate would not approve him for the job on a full-time basis.

Said Bolton: "I think she spoke clearly for liberty in the world."

Kirkpatrick considered seeking the Republican presidential nomination that went to George H. W. Bush in 1988. She stopped that process short, however, retreating to the position that she would accept the No. 2 slot if asked. She had played a leading role at the party's convention four years earlier — at a time when she was still a Democrat.

Jeane Kirkpatrick (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Jeane Kirkpatrick, who died yesterday at 80, was that rare thing -- a public intellectual and a public figure. She excelled at both.

Ms. Kirkpatrick is known to the public at large because Ronald Reagan, after defeating Jimmy Carter for the Presidency in 1980, appointed her U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. It is worth mentioning in this context that earlier this week Senate Democrats succeeded finally in driving John Bolton from the U.N. ambassadorship. The mind's eye recalls the televised image in the early 1980s of Ambassador Kirkpatrick, a Democrat then, seated at the U.N. Security Council table and publicly defending U.S. interests against the Soviet Union with an articulate, no-nonsense bluntness that makes Mr. Bolton sound like Little Bo-Peep by comparison. That style -- American interests made perfectly clear -- will be missed.

She knew how to use words as weapons. Her most famous turn of phrase, at the 1984 GOP convention, was "San Francisco Democrats." Ms. Kirkpatrick's "Blame America First" speech marked her most public departure from the Democratic Party.

Explaining in an interview years later why she and other Democratic intellectuals -- yes, they were neoconservatives -- formed the anti-Soviet Committee for the Present Danger and aligned themselves with Ronald Reagan, Ms. Kirkpatrick said: "We were concerned about the weakening of Western will." Incidentally, the antipathy to "the neoconservatives" that one hears so often these days flows back directly to those years and the neocon battles with American liberals.

DOJ_NMG_0105164

No one ever doubted Jeane Kirkpatrick's will or courage. Among those who most appreciated her determination to speak truth to totalitarian power was the celebrated Russian dissident Andrei Sakharov. Exiled by the Soviet government to Gorky, Sakharov said later how important it was to have a person of Jeane Kirkpatrick's stature publicly identify jailed Soviet dissidents by name. For the past 10 years she served on the board of the Center for a Free Cuba, which she helped found.

Jeane Kirkpatrick was born in Duncan, Oklahoma, in 1926. She was an ideologue, and her ideas would have come from Duncan. Their tenet was freedom for the human spirit. She dedicated a public life to protecting that freedom.

The Party Of "Nyet" (WP)

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

VIRGINIA Republicans gathered at a handsome resort the other day to lick their wounds and plot their future. Or rather, some Virginia Republicans did -- namely, the party's right-wing, anti-tax ideologues, who have contributed mightily to devastating back-to-back losses in races for the governorship last year and the U.S. Senate this year. Virginia's more pragmatic Republicans, who are more interested in addressing the state's problems than in upholding the true faith of anti-tax doctrine, did not bother to show up.

And who can blame them? The moderates, although they control the state Senate, have so far failed to nudge their hard-line colleagues in the House of Delegates toward practical solutions for the state's most critical problem: its crumbling, inadequately funded transportation infrastructure. The likely result is further electoral setbacks for Republicans, particularly in Northern Virginia's well-educated, centrist suburbs, and a loosening of their control of the House. With all 140 seats in the General Assembly up for election next year, many in the party are already bracing for the worst.

Having spurned Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's proposals for new taxes to fund major improvements for the state's roads and rails, House Republicans are now warning that they will shoot down one of his signature proposals from his 2005 campaign: universal preschool for the state's 100,000 4-year-olds. Granted, Mr. Kaine has not yet bothered to divulge how he would go about paying for the initiative, which would be very expensive -- at least $300 million over four years to provide for the 80 percent of 4-year-olds who the governor figures would sign up. And there are legitimate reasons to question the wisdom and equity of providing an entitlement program for middle-class parents already willing and able to pay for preschool. But the GOP fundamentalists aren't interested in having that discussion or weighing the governor's ideas dispassionately. They would rather just be the Party of "Nyet" -- nyet to taxes, nyet to new roads, nyet to new preschools.

The new state GOP chairman, Ed Gillespie, is speaking soothing words to the party's warring factions, sensibly urging dialogue and compromise and warning against division. At the same time, though, one of the hard-liners, Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter, who represents Prince William and Fauquier counties, answered Mr. Gillespie with a cold splash of reality. Writing in the Richmond Times-Dispatch, Mr. Lingamfelter, who has voted to block new funding sources for transportation, warned of "liberals" seeking "to craft a socialist solution for you and me." It seems that the Virginia GOP's day of reconciliation is not yet upon us.

The Bloomberg Diet (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

"We're just trying to make food safer," said Mayor Bloomberg, who nixed smoking in bars a few years back. The city's concern for the health of residents is understandable, but trans fats are not E. coli (or even secondhand smoke), and the federal Food and Drug Administration still considers these chemically modified food ingredients perfectly safe for consumption. Could it be that Mayor Mike has been taken in by activist Gotham health czars and national Naderite "watchdog" outfits like Michael Jacobson's Center for Science in the Public Interest, among others pushing a larger agenda?

You wouldn't know it from the media coverage, but the science on the dangers of trans fats is still being debated, which helps explain FDA approval of the ingredient. It also explains why the American Heart Association, while no fan of trans fats, was critical of the New York proposal and fears it may backfire if food outlets revert to even less healthy alternatives.

DOJ_NMG_0105165

The food nannies insist that trans fats raise cholesterol and cause heart disease. The problem, says Steven Milloy of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, is that the studies purporting to show this link are inconclusive at best. "People cite lab studies that show transient changes in blood lipids when people consume trans fats, but that's a long way from heart attacks and heart disease," says Mr. Milloy.

Walter Willett of the Harvard School of Public Health is one of the nation's leading trans fat alarmists. Earlier this year he co-authored an article in the New England Journal of Medicine that said trans fats "appear to increase the risk of coronary heart disease more than any other macroingredient." As evidence the article cited three studies. One showed a statistically insignificant correlation between trans fats and heart disease when other risk factors are considered. The other two studies found a link between very high consumption of trans fats and heart trouble, but statistically the association was weak.

Before other cities decide to regulate diets absent a safety issue, they might also consider that some of the same people now pushing for a trans fat ban once recommended the ingredient as a substitute for another health scare: saturated fats. Twenty years ago, Mr. Jacobson's CSPI launched a public relations blitz against fast food joints for using palm oil to cook fries. The group claimed victory when restaurants started using partially hydrogenated oil instead. In 1988, a CSPI newsletter declared that "the charges against trans fat just don't hold up. And by extension, hydrogenated oils seem relatively innocent." Today, Mr. Jacobson is claiming trans fats kill 30,000 people a year. We wonder if he feels guilty.

The ultimate goal of these so-called consumer advocates is to persuade the FDA to turn on trans fats, a move that would serve the food industry up as the next entree on the plaintiff bar's menu. Don't be surprised if the new Democrat Congress helps them pursue this goal, just like Mayor Bloomberg, on the dubious assumption that people can't decide for themselves what and what not to eat.

Uploading American Politics (WP)

By Raul Fernandez

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Technology won the 2006 elections for the Democrats. No, not electronic voting machines, but the power of the Internet, fueled by innovative applications that let citizens create and publish their own content. The Internet not only changed the balance of power in the House and Senate, it also helped sack the secretary of defense. Welcome to viral democracy.

In 1994, the last time the House changed hands, the Internet was mainly a university and military application. AOL, with its first 1 million members, was an up-and-coming player in the emerging online world. Marc Andreessen was just leaving school to start Netscape. And Google, eBay and Amazon.com did not exist, even as business plans.

But in 12 short years the Internet has grown to include more than a billion users worldwide and has empowered ordinary citizens to become engaged, active and highly influential participants in democracy, instead of passive consumers of campaign rhetoric.

These empowered citizens made the difference in the November elections by producing compelling content and distributing it to hundreds of thousands of voters across the country -- almost always without the candidates' consent.

Blogs, YouTube, instant messaging and more played a critical role in many races. YouTube had a direct impact in two of the tight races that decided control of the Senate: Republican incumbent Conrad Burns vs. Democrat Jon Tester in Montana and GOP incumbent George Allen vs. Democrat James Webb in Virginia.

What type of impact? Search "Conrad Burns" on YouTube.com and you get more than 130 videos, most of them unflattering. The most popular is "Conrad Burns' Naptime," set to "Happy Trails." No fancy production values here -- just a straight-on camera shot of the senator falling asleep during a congressional hearing important to Montana. That video alone received more than 100,000 views.

Dozens of other anti-Burns videos, detailing such things as "pay-to-play" allegations and key gaffes, were seen by many thousands of viewers. In a race that was lost by about 3,000 votes, those YouTube creations had an impact. They may well have pushed Tester across the finish line first.

In Virginia, Allen, who lost by 9,000 or so votes, was the subject of more than 400 videos, 75 of which featured damaging remarks he made at a rally to an Indian American videographer working for Webb. Naturally, video of this "macaca" gaffe almost immediately found its way onto YouTube and the computer screens of people across the country, not to mention into headlines. The top video had nearly 300,000 views, while another, "Allen Staffer Attacks Man," had more than 180,000. Again, when the vote is that close, every impression can make a difference.

DOJ_NMG_0105166

The immediate, viral nature of the Internet hurls these missteps onto the all-news networks and out to the world with such velocity that it outpaces a campaign's ability to do damage control. An official campaign response in some morning paper is often immediately undermined by additional discoveries that are researched, posted and disseminated by dozens of partisan bloggers who can have hundreds of thousands of daily visitors to their Web sites.

Instant messaging, another technology not widely available in 1994, brought us the graphic details of inappropriate chats between Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and male congressional pages. For many voters, these IMs personalized a growing list of morally corrupt members of Congress, stoking outrage nationally. And despite immediately resigning and checking himself into a rehab facility, Foley "starred" in more than 450 YouTube videos.

In modern American political history, perhaps only the coming of the television age has had as big an impact on our national elections as the Internet has. But the effect of the Internet may be better for the long-term health of our democracy. For while TV emphasizes perception, control and centralization, Internet-driven politics is about transparency, distribution of effort and, most important, empowerment and participation -- at whatever level of engagement the consumer wants.

It's unclear what the impact of technology on elections will be over the next 12 years. But one lesson should already be clear to politicians: In a world where cellphones are cameras and video recorders, every word that you utter (or text), and every nap you take, can and will be used against you on YouTube.

The writer is chief executive of the software firm ObjectVideo and co-owner of the Washington Capitals.

Anti-Americans On The March (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

AYTAROUN, LEBANON -- Ibrahim Sayid was raised a Muslim, but he put his faith in class struggle, not Allah. He joined the Lebanese Communist Party at the age of 16. As a medical student in the Soviet Union in the 1980s, he cursed Mikhail Gorbachev as a "traitor" for jettisoning Marxism.

Today, back in his home village just a few hundred yards from Israel, Dr. Sayid, 44, still has little time for Islam. He is married to a Christian and shuns the local mosque, badly damaged when Israeli troops stormed into Lebanon this summer.

Instead of communism, he has embraced a new cause: Hezbollah, the militia and social movement rooted in Shiite Islam. The Party of God, as it is translated into English, is led by turbaned clerics and aided by the Islamic Republic of Iran, which has ruthlessly persecuted communists.

"We all have the same goals," explains Dr. Sayid, who now works in a Hezbollah clinic. The first of these goals is "resistance" against Israel, which during the summer war battled Hezbollah militiamen just outside Dr. Sayid's village. He says resistance also has a broader target: America, its allies in the Arab world and beyond, and global capitalism.

When the Cold War ended a decade and a half ago with the collapse of the Soviet Union, Mr. Sayid and others like him around the world mourned the apparent triumph of U.S. military, economic and ideological might. Many Americans rejoiced, with some embracing the theory that the demise of Marxism marked "the end of history," a period when ideological conflicts would give way to a world united in acceptance of a model typified by the U.S.

Al Qaeda's attacks on New York and Washington in September 2001 didn't fundamentally alter this conviction. Political Islam was seen as a grave threat but seemed limited in its appeal by its dependence on religious zeal. Such assumptions are now under strain as secular rebels, antiglobalization militants and other strains of revolt rally to the banner of "resistance" offered by Islamist groups such as Hezbollah.

Religion, excoriated by Karl Marx as the "opiate of the masses," has become a great mobilizing force -- even for zealous atheists. The phenomenon extends beyond the Middle East to Europe, Latin America and Africa, too. Causes that a few years ago seemed moribund or at least passé -- socialism, Third World solidarity, strident anti-Americanism -- have been injected with the fervor, though rarely the actual faith, of Islamic radicalism.

DOJ_NMG_0105167

FELLOW TRAVELERS

Western leftists, rightists and secularists have had a long and checkered relationship with Islamists. See a timeline2 of historical highlights.

"We are all here to fight American hegemony," Naim Qassem, Hezbollah's deputy chief, told hundreds of secular activists from around the world who gathered last month in a Beirut conference center. They were there to celebrate his Islamic movement's "divine victory" over Israel this summer and cheer a broader battle against America's vision for the world. Mr. Qassem was dressed in flowing robes and a cleric's turban. Many in his audience wore T-shirts or badges featuring portraits of Che Guevara, clenched fists and other emblems of secular radical chic.

Adding to its revolutionary cachet, Hezbollah is now battling to oust Lebanon's pro-American government. Along with assorted allies, the Islamist group staged a huge peaceful rally in central Beirut Dec. 1 and is the driving force behind a mass sit-in near the offices of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, a pro-business former banker. The protesters, encamped in tents for a week now, vow to stay until the government falls. Stoking fears the showdown may spiral into serious violence, Hezbollah has called for another mass demonstration Sunday.

Some of Hezbollah's biggest fans are in Europe. There, the hard left, demoralized by the collapse of communism, has found new energy, siding with Islamist militants in Lebanon, in Iraq and in a wider campaign against what they see as an American plot to impose unrestrained free-market capitalism.

"We are all Hezbollah now," read posters carried through London this summer during an antiwar protest march. Earlier, London Mayor Ken Livingston, once known as "Red Ken," invited a controversial Egyptian cleric to the British capital, arguing that his views have been distorted by the West.

In deeply Roman Catholic Latin America, Hugo Chávez of Venezuela has become the exemplar of a new populism that sees common cause with Iran and Hezbollah. Mr. Chávez, re-elected in a landslide last Sunday, has met Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad several times and this summer was given the Islamic Republic Medal, Iran's highest honor. Amid the rubble of Beirut's southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold, portraits of Mr. Chávez now hang alongside pictures of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah. Hezbollah put them up after Mr. Chávez denounced President Bush as the devil in a September speech to the UN. "Gracias Chávez," they say.

Africa, too, is boarding the bandwagon. A summit of the 53-nation African Union this summer in Gambia featured two special guests: Mr. Chavez and Mr. Ahmadinejad. Back in Tehran, Mr. Ahmadinejad in November hosted Zimbabwe's authoritarian Prime Minister Robert Mugabe, an erstwhile devotee of Mao Zedong. Fulminating against President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Mugabe said likeminded countries must "fight against these evil men and their evil systems."

In the U.S., the principal target for both Islamist and leftist anger, there has been little sign of any ideological realignment of the kind seen elsewhere. The anti-American movement overseas poses scant immediate threat to U.S. pre-eminence. Still, it could complicate American diplomacy, particularly in the Middle East, where the Iraq Study Group and others are urging Washington to reach out to Iran and Syria, both vocal foes. It also risks emboldening America's many critics in Europe and Latin America, aggravating friction on a host of issues from the Israel-Palestine dispute to trade.

With America's reputation badly blemished across much of the globe, widespread anger at Washington's foreign policy is fusing with local grievances in an unstable mix of discontent. The result is a motley assemblage rife with contradictions and competing agendas. The Islamist-led protest movement has none of the central organization once provided by the Comintern, the body set up by Vladimir Lenin to coordinate global communism. Nonetheless, it is giving voice and a sense of common cause to those opposed to America's plans.

Leading the way in embracing it are mostly fringe groups with names redolent of the 1960s: The Global Peace and Justice Coalition, The Socialist Workers Party, The League for the Fifth International. While such outfits are quirky, they "magnify trends in the mainstream," says Nick Cohen, a British writer who is publishing a book next year about the alliance between Islamists and leftists, "What's Left?" Karl Marx, he says, would be horrified.

"The sight of Godless communists in alliance with Islamo-fascists is one of the wonders of the modern world," Mr. Cohen says.

DOJ_NMG_0105168

Mainstream left-of-center parties still generally shun Islamists but chunks of their support base don't. Mr. Blair in Britain, for example, has come under fire within his own Labour Party for supporting President Bush's troubled Middle East policy, which critics say demonizes Islamist groups. In Spain, the socialist prime minister, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, has reached out to Muslims, propounding what he calls "an alliance of civilizations" and voicing sympathy for Hamas and Hezbollah. He has good relations with Mr. Chávez, Fidel Castro of Cuba and Bolivia's populist leader, Evo Morales.

At the Beirut conference last month, a Mexican Marxist denounced America for "colonizing" New Mexico. A South Korean foe of free trade raged against American beef. A Turk fumed about American military bases. A Frenchman denounced American genetically engineered foods and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. There were even a few Americans. One thundered against big business, another against the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

A big part of Hezbollah's appeal is simply that, unlike other tarnished icons of revolt, it can point to successes. It has defied Israel's military, by far the region's most powerful. It prodded Israel to end its 18-year occupation of southern Lebanon in 2000 and unexpectedly bloodied Israeli troops in clashes this summer.

Hezbollah shows that "resistance," whether fuelled by religion or secular zeal, "can break governments and roll back the American project," says John Rees, a former editor of the journal International Socialism and a leader of Britain's anti-Iraq war movement. Hezbollah, he says, isn't a terrorist outfit but a social movement seeking better living conditions for its supporters. "It is better to think of it as an AFL-CIO with guns," he says.

An American who traveled to Beirut in November to cheer Hezbollah, who identified himself as Bill Cecil, summed up the appeal of Islamism to non-Muslims: "Your enemy is our enemy; your victory is our victory," he told a conference. Mr. Cecil, an activist for a radical group in New York, later appeared as a guest on the breakfast show of Hezbollah's television station, al-Manar. America, he told a veiled female presenter, is "not a democracy ... but a dictatorship of giant corporations." America "needs a government that provides for the people like Hezbollah helps people here."

Nowhere is the Islamist-leftist axis more potent than in Lebanon. The three-day Beirut jamboree, which featured fiery anti-American oratory and field trips to buildings bombed by Israel, was hosted jointly by Hezbollah and the Lebanese Communist Party, once-bitter enemies now united by what they proclaim as common goals.

Sitting beneath a portrait of Argentine revolutionary Che Guevara in his Beirut office, Khaled Hadadeh, the general secretary of the Lebanese communists, admits that Hezbollah and the Communist Party hated each other for years. "We started out in blood," says Mr. Hadadeh, a Sunni Muslim by birth but now a firm atheist. Che Guevara, he says, "is our symbol, like Jesus Christ or Mohammed."

Hostility to Israel and the U.S. now trumps past differences. The Communist Party disbanded its own armed wing at the end of Lebanon's civil war in 1990, but 12 of its members died fighting alongside Hezbollah this summer, Mr. Hadadeh says. Piled in the corner of his office are trophies of this summer's war: an Israeli army helmet, an Israeli rifle and a Hebrew newspaper.

Mr. Hadadeh says he has met Mr. Nasrallah 15 times and admires him greatly. At their most recent meeting in a secret location this fall, he says, they discussed not just the recent war with Israel but also the need to develop "a counter-project to the neo-liberal model," the free-market policies backed by Washington.

Responsible for working out what this might mean is Ali Fayad, a political science lecturer and head of Hezbollah's in-house think-tank, the Consultative Center for Studies and Documentation. Mr. Fayad, who joined Hezbollah in the 1980s while still a student, now sits on the politburo of an organization that mimics the rigidly hierarchical structure of the Soviet Communist Party. Israeli bombs destroyed Mr. Fayad's offices, so his center now works from new premises in a half-built apartment block. Well-versed in Western economic and political theory, he runs a staff of more than a dozen researchers and has led the militant group's outreach to foreign supporters.

Part of Hezbollah's appeal lies in its tactical flexibility. Unlike many Sunni Muslim radical groups such as al Qaeda, which denounce non-Muslims and even many fellow Muslims as heretics who must be shunned or punished, Hezbollah's Shiite leadership doesn't care if its allies include atheists, Mr. Fayad says. "That is their problem not ours," he says, so long as "we have the same political position."

DOJ_NMG_0105169

The friction between the two branches of Islam surfaced at the recent Beirut meeting. A Sunni Muslim from Jordan had to be ejected from the hall after he started cursing Iran -- Hezbollah's main sponsor -- for aiding Shiite militias in Iraq. Hezbollah's foreign fans watched in dismay as Shiite and Sunni attendees screamed at each other.

Despite such volatile tensions, Mr. Fayad still sees Islam derailing America's ambitions. Hezbollah's success in Lebanon, the debacle in Iraq and the victories of populist anti-American politicians in Latin America, he says, show that "it is now the end of 'the end of history.' " A recent article by Richard Haass, former director of policy planning at the U.S. State Department, has strengthened his conviction that America is in retreat, Mr. Fayed says. Writing in the U.S. foreign-policy journal Foreign Affairs, Mr. Haass declares that America's post-Cold War hopes for the Middle East have failed and that the region's "American era...has ended." Mr. Fayad is in no doubt about what comes next: "It is an Islamic era in the Middle East."

Among those grappling with this new perception of reality is Joseph Samaha, a secular Christian, former radical socialist and one of Lebanon's most-thoughtful intellectuals. Over the summer he became editor in chief of Al Akhbar, a new newspaper sympathetic to Hezbollah. He scoffs at Westerners who cheer radical Islam as "naïve." But he concedes that Islamists now represent the only viable alternative to corrupt, authoritarian regimes in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere. "It is sad, but it is like that," he says.

The ideological reshuffling marks a curious reprise: Russia's early Bolshevik leaders, many of them Jewish, worked hard to cultivate Muslims, seeing them as a useful ally against Britain and other European colonial powers then ruling over large Muslim populations, notably in India and Indonesia. The alliance led to doctrinal gymnastics as Soviet theorists sought to reconcile atheism with the Quran. Some even argued that the Prophet Mohammed was a precursor of Karl Marx.

For much of the 20th century, however, the left and Islam were bitter enemies. Spain's right-wing dictator, Gen. Francisco Franco, recruited Moroccan Muslims to fight Soviet-backed foes in the Spanish Civil War in the 1930s. In 1962, Saudi Arabia, worried by Egypt's tilt toward Moscow, created the Muslim World League to rally Islam against communism. Three years later, Islamic groups in Indonesia joined in an army-led mass slaughter of communists. Anticommunist fervor reached its peak in the 1980s, when thousands of Muslims flocked to Afghanistan to battle the Soviet occupiers.

Much the same enmity existed in Lebanon. When Dr. Sayid, the surgeon, first joined the Lebanese Communist Party in the late 1970s, Mr. Nasrallah, now Hezbollah's leader, also was getting into politics -- partly out of disgust at the spread of atheistic communism.

In an autobiographical account of his early years published in an Iranian newspaper, Mr. Nasrallah recounts how his own village was "turning into an area for the activity of intellectuals, Marxists and especially supporters of the Lebanese Communist Party." He left the village and joined a group called Amal, a Shiite organization.

Iran's Islamic revolution of February 1979 and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan at the end of that year soured communist-Islamist relations further, provoking often-bloody clashes in Lebanon and elsewhere.

Iran's new Islamic government launched a brutal crackdown on the Soviet-backed Tudeh party, a leftist group that had helped topple the American-backed Shah. And Iran sent Revolutionary Guard zealots to Lebanon to help set up Hezbollah and injected the new group with their own fierce enmity to atheism and communism.

Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 accelerated the rise of Islamist groups. It uprooted Yasser Arafat's secular Palestine Liberation Organization, which had bases in Lebanon, and left Hezbollah as the main force of "resistance."

Dr. Sayid moved to Minsk in the then-Soviet republic of Belarus to study medicine. He says he went there as a true believer and was appalled when Mr. Gorbachev began his program of "perestroika," or economic restructuring, and the Soviet system started to unravel. The reforms, he says, were a "counter-revolution."

In Lebanon, meanwhile, a vicious civil war raged. Moscow put its weight behind the nominally socialist and mostly secular forces of Walid Jumblatt, leader of the country's small Druze sect, an offshoot of Islam. In Dr. Sayid's village and other areas of southern Lebanon, previously strong support for the Lebanese Communist Party wilted as Hezbollah became the dominant force. Hezbollah's reputation was boosted by its fierce resistance to Israel and its provision of medical care and other services.

In its first public manifesto issued in 1985, Hezbollah declared itself hostile to "both the USSR and the U.S., both capitalism and communism, for both are incapable of laying the foundations for a just society." Though focused on the struggle with Israel, the manifesto also sought a wider audience, addressed to "all the Oppressed of Lebanon and the World." Eventually the Lebanese Communists began cooperating with Hezbollah, attracted mainly by its power but also finding common cause in its emphasis on championing the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0105170

Amid the unraveling of the Soviet Union, few outside Lebanon paid much attention to the global pretensions of Hezbollah. Then came the al Qaeda attacks on America of 2001. Washington, traumatized, launched a "war on terror" against what it viewed as a small group of homicidal religious zealots.

As anger at the U.S. mounted in 2003 ahead of the invasion in Iraq, the snowballing antiwar movement took on a curious aspect, particularly in Europe: an alliance of forces that previously loathed each other.

Mr. Rees, the British radical who attended last month's Beirut conference, played a big role, allying his own organization, the Socialist Workers Party, with the Muslim Association of Britain, a group that says it wants to bridge Muslim and non-Muslim communities yet is accused by critics of siding with radical Islamic groups. The two organizations spearheaded the antiwar campaign in Britain. Today, Mr. Rees says he has reservations about some of his Islamic allies' views, particularly those regarding women and homosexuals.

"If there were a level playing field, I might choose different allies," he says. But he says America's own policies left him with no choice: "I find myself on the same side as Hezbollah, as Chávez. I didn't choose them. America did."

At a big Islamic festival this summer supported by London's mayor, Mr. Livingston, Islamist activists and left-wing politicians declared their solidarity. "Muslims and the left must and can come together, because we face the same enemies -- imperialism, colonialism and racism," said Redmond O'Neill, a senior aide to Mr. Livingston.

In Aytaroun, the Lebanese village near the border with Israel, Dr. Sayid, the Soviet-trained physician, has abandoned the socialist dreams of his youth. Communism, he concedes, "is not going to take root in this soil."

He has quit the Communist Party and now serves Hezbollah, working at a Hezbollah hospital bedecked with Islamic inscriptions and portraits of Iranian ayatollahs. When the war started this summer, his wife, an Orthodox Christian from Belarus, and three children left for her homeland. Dr. Sayid stayed behind to treat the injured, including Hezbollah fighters.

On a recent afternoon, Dr. Sayid sat with a group of Hezbollah activists in the office of the local mayor, also of Hezbollah. The mayor was wounded in the leg during the war and Mr. Sayid has been treating him.

One of the group showed off pictures of Hezbollah's "divine victory" -- an Israeli tank on its side, an Israeli warship in flames. Dr. Sayid says he is "not fully in agreement" with Hezbollah. But he believes it can succeed where communism failed. "It is strong. People support it." Hezbollah, he says, "shows the world America is wrong."

Rice: 'Freedom Deficit' Harming Mideast (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, December 9, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday a lack of democracy — a "freedom deficit" — is the core problem in the Middle East.

But Rice also said despite a divide between moderates and extremists in the area, she thinks the Bush administration can begin to deliver on its promise of a Palestinian state living in peace alongside Israel.

"No American president has ever dared to say it as a matter of policy," Rice said of President Bush's declaration in 2002 that he would support creation of a Palestinian state.

At a joint news conference with visiting German Foreign Minister Franz-Walter Steinmeier, Rice made it clear the administration would continue to focus on spreading demcoracy and steering clear of extremists while pursuing an Arab-Israeli settlement.

While Amr Moussa, the secretary-general of the Arab League, called on the United States on Thursday to resume the role of "honest broker" between Israel and the Palestinians, Steinmeier stressed peacemaking was a joint effort of the so-called Quartet — the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

Having visited the region recently, the German foreign minister said Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "seem to have an interest in taking further steps."

DOJ_NMG_0105171

And Rice, similarly, said "the Israeli-Palestinian issue is one that has now, perhaps, an opportunity to move the process forward."

She said it was important to get it right in the troubled area.

"The Middle East has suffered for 60 years from a freedom deficit," she said. "It has suffered from the absence of legimitate channels for political expression."

On Thursday, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Rice intends to devote a lot of time on the Middle East and would make a trip to the region early next year to try to promote Mideast peacemaking.

She plans to meet on Saturday with visiting Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who told the Saban Center, a private group that promotes Mideast amity, that "a normal, functioning Palestinian state is not only in the Palestinians' interest but in Israel's."

However, Livni said in a dinner speech, "We have to prevent a future Palestinian state from being a terorrist state" and that Israel could not allow Palestinian refugees to return to the Jewish homeland.

Livni said Israel must strengthen the hand of moderates, such as Abbas, and that the struggle in the region is not between Israel and Arabs but between moderates and extremists.

McCormack said Thursday the absence of a Palestinian partner for Israel to deal with remains a roadblock to a solution. He referred to Hamas, the Palestinian militia with whom Israel and the United States refuse to negotiate.

On Friday, on a visit to Iran, Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister and Hamas leader in Gaza, vowed the Hamas-led Palestinian government will never recognize Israel and will fight for Jerusalem.

Israeli FM Rejects Linking Palestinian Conflict To Wider Mideast Crises (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has rejected suggestions by influential US policymakers that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict lies at the heart of a broader Middle East crisis.

Addressing a gathering of current and former US officials, Livni said Middle East tensions were fueled more by ideology than territory and that moderate Arab leaders had confided privately to her that the greatest threat they faced today was Iranian-backed extremism.

"There is an opportunity to find new alliances in the region" based on a common battle against these radicals, said Livni, who is also Israel's deputy prime minister.

Livni flew into Washington Friday to address the opening dinner of the third annual Saban Forum, a two day meeting of current and former US and Israeli policymakers organised by the Brookings Institution, an influential Washington think tank.

She was scheduled hold informal talks on Saturday with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice before heading back to Israel, an Israeli official said.

Her visit coincides with a major review of Middle East policy by the administration of President George W. Bush prompted by the worsening chaos in Iraq and the recent election setback for his Republican party.

A key element of the policy review was a report issued this week by a high-level bipartisan study group which told Bush that efforts to stabilize Iraq and eventually begin withdrawing the 140,000 US troops mired in the country had to include a new drive to break the deadlock in Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts.

The group, co-chaired by former Republican secretary of state James Baker, argued that Arab and Muslim frustration over the lack of progress towards creating an independent state for the Palestinian people was fueling Islamic extremism across the region and beyond.

Livni rejected the linkage.

"There is a common and mistaken assumption that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the core of the problems in the Middle East," Livni said. "This is wrong."

"The conflict in the Middle East is a consequence of, not a cause of, radicalism and terrorism," she told the group, which included the State Department's top Middle East official, David Welch, and several of his predecessors as well as members of Congress and other prominent policymakers.

DOJ_NMG_0105172

Livni described the main threat in the region as the radical regime in Iran, whose goal, she said, is to export its radical brand of Shia Islam across the region.

"I don't think there is anyone who thinks that if we can solve the Israeli-Palestinian problem, it will change Iran and they will put their ideological vision aside and live in a tranquil Middle East," she said.

Livni said the Palestinian Shiite movement Hamas, which won control of the Palestinian government in elections early this year and has been thwarting efforts by moderate Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas to resume negotiations with Israel, shared the same ideological goals.

"The real conflict in the region is no longer the Arab-Jewish conflict, but the conflict between moderates and extremists," she said.

The Israeli diplomat said she had heard the same message in private from moderate Arab leaders concerned at the growing influence of Iran and the dangers Shiite radicalism posed to their Sunni dominated countries.

"This is something they are willing to express behind closed doors, but unfortunately they are not willing to express it publicly" for fear of a public backlash, she said.

Europeans Limit Scope Of Iran Nuclear Resolution (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 8 — Europeans produced a revised draft of a Security Council resolution on Iran on Friday, and said they would formally introduce it on Monday in the hope of obtaining a speedy vote on much-delayed action to curb Tehran's nuclear program.

The text was drawn up after weeks of meetings in European capitals among the three nations drafting the measure, Britain, France and Germany, in consultation with the United States. It is aimed at meeting persistent objections from China and Russia.

The revised language narrows the scope of prohibition and punishment to activities that are clearly associated with making a nuclear weapon. Iran has argued that it is pursuing nuclear power for peaceful purposes, while the United States and the Europeans have contended that Iran's real purpose is to build bombs.

It also removes restrictions in earlier drafts on the construction, supplying and operation of an $800 million light-water reactor that Russia is building at Bushehr in southern Iran.

Iran ignored an Aug. 31 United Nations deadline to suspend uranium enrichment, which can produce fuel for both nuclear plants and weapons. Since then, the United States and the Europeans have been pressing for sanctions, but China and Russia have stalled action, saying broad punishment would be counterproductive.

Iran has said that a sanctions resolution would be a threat to its national security. The proposed sanctions still include travel restrictions, an asset freeze and bans on providing nuclear program goods, but in the new text they are now more focused on people and material linked to suspected weapons-building activities.

"The new text has two goals," said one European diplomat involved in its preparation. "First, to keep it firm — I think it is a strong text — and at the same time to have the Chinese and Russians on board."

A second European diplomat was asked whether the Europeans planned to drive the matter to a vote, even if China and Russia, both veto-bearing permanent members, continued to object or threatened to abstain. "The intention and the wish is to remain unified and get this agreed," he said. "But it is three months since Iran ignored the deadline, and we are not saying unanimity at any price."

Neither diplomat would speak on the record before the text was officially presented to the members of the Council. In Washington, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said that he sensed that the differences over the resolution "were starting to narrow."

Fresh Drive For Sanctions On Iran (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105173

France, Germany and the UK on Friday launched a new United Nations drive to impose sanctions on Iran, calling all countries to prevent the supply of goods that could help its nuclear enrichment and reprocessing programmes, or the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems.

European diplomats said a draft Security Council resolution, circulated to ambassadors late on Friday, represented a conceptual reversal from earlier proposals that had called for a blanket ban on nuclear-related goods unless specifically exempted.

To meet Russian concerns, the new approach was to specify "proliferation-sensitive" materials that are not allowed, with the implication that less sensitive nuclear trade, such as Russian support for Iran's Bushehr reactor, could continue.

A European diplomat said the text had been developed "in close consultation with the US, Russians and Chinese", and that "it reflects the facts that we have listened very carefully to what the Russians and Chinese have been saying".

The text will be formally introduced to the Security Council on Monday, followed by a meeting between the three European members, the US, Russia and China.

European diplomats say they hope for a decision before Christmas.

Sean McCormack, a spokesman US state department, said: "The sense is that any differences . . . over the text of the resolution are starting to narrow. We remain hopeful that, in the near future, we will be able to get a resolution that everybody can vote for."

But Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, said this week that any sanctions would be considered "a threat to our national interests and security".

The proposal also calls for a travel ban and financial freeze on people engaged in nuclear proliferation, and for countries to "exercise vigilance and prevent specialised teaching" of Iranian nationals in disciplines that could help Iran develop a military nuclear capability.

It says if Iran suspends its activities and complies with International Atomic Energy Agency requirements, a "diplomatic, negotiated solution that guarantees Iran's nuclear programme is for exclusively peaceful purpose" could follow.

U.S. Hints Iran Sanctions Deal Is Near (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 9, 2006

The United States suggested Friday that a deal on imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran is near despite a disappointing round of talks among world powers earlier this week.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack also indicated the United States does not have unlimited patience for what have already been drawn-out negotiations among the U.N. Security Council's permanent members and Germany over Tehran's nuclear program.

"The sense is that any differences ... over the text of the resolution are starting to narrow," McCormack said. "We remain hopeful that, in the near future we will be able to get a resolution that everybody can vote for — that we will be able to maintain unity on the Security Council."

The U.S. and Europeans are pushing for a resolution by the end of the year. The West accuses Iran of hiding plans to build a bomb while developing what it claims is a peaceful program to produce nuclear power.

Iran was on the agenda for a meeting between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Russian national security adviser Igor Ivanov, whose nation has resisted strong sanctions for months. Rice was discussing strategy on Iran later Friday with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

Germany, France and Britain led failed talks with Iran last year that European powers had hoped would avert U.N. sanctions. Europe joined the United States in seeking sanctions early this year, but the process has bogged down repeatedly over objections from Russia and China. Both nations are permanent, veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council that have trade and other ties to Iran.

McCormack described a sanctions resolution with broad support as "the optimal solution."

"We would certainly want that in the best case, but it is also time to start working toward a vote," McCormack said.

DOJ_NMG_0105174

On Wednesday, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy predicted that Iran will face U.N. sanctions for refusing to halt its nuclear program but said major world powers remain divided over their extent.

"The question is about the scope of sanctions but there will be sanctions," he said on RTL radio.

His ministry said Tuesday that closed-door talks in Paris had made "substantive progress" but failed to reach an accord on a resolution to punish Iran for defying demands that it cease enriching uranium.

Iran's hard-line president threatened to downgrade relations with the 25-nation European Union if tough sanctions emerged from the talks among diplomats from the permanent Security Council members — the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia — as well as Germany and the EU.

After months of diplomatic wrangling, the United States and France had hoped Tuesday's talks would produce a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for defying an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to halt enrichment. Western powers accuse Iran of seeking nuclear bombs, while Tehran insists it only wants civilian nuclear energy.

European diplomats said Russia made some concessions at Tuesday's talks, agreeing to a measure prohibiting financial transfers to some Iranians linked to nuclear or ballistic missile programs.

Russia still opposes the broader asset freeze that Britain, France and Germany proposed in a draft U.N. resolution presented in October.

Europeans Circulate Revised Iran Draft (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

In a fresh bid to win Russian and Chinese support, key European nations circulated a revised U.N. resolution Friday narrowing sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment and urging negotiations to resolve the standoff over its nuclear ambitions.

The new draft still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs, but it spells out in much greater detail exactly what items are prohibited. Russia and China — both veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council — had complained that the proposed sanctions in the original draft were too broad.

But the new draft keeps a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs, which Russia opposes.

Britain, France and Germany — who have led negotiations trying to rein in Iran's nuclear program — have been at odds with Russia and China for weeks over the scope of the sanctions. The United States has generally supported the Europeans, though it initially wanted a tougher text.

Russia proposed major changes to the original European text including limiting sanctions solely to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and missiles. Russia's proposed changes also eliminated any travel ban, asset freeze or mention of the nuclear facility being built by the Russians at Bushehr, Iran.

The new European draft drops all mention of Bushehr, which is projected to go on line in late 2007 and would be Iran's first atomic power plant.

But it keeps a range of sanctions and still would limit technical assistance to Iran by the International Atomic Energy Agency and urge countries to prevent Iranian students from studying nuclear-related disciplines.

Whether the new draft goes far enough to meet Russia's concerns remains to be seen. At a meeting in Paris on Tuesday, political directors from the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany failed to reach agreement though they reported "substantive progress."

Council diplomats said ambassadors from the six countries were expected to discuss the new draft early next week, possibly Monday.

Iran maintains its nuclear program is purely peaceful, aimed solely at producing nuclear energy, but the U.S. and the Europeans believe Tehran's enrichment activities are ultimately aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0105175

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed Tuesday to continue the nuclear program, and issued a new threat to downgrade relations with the European Union — Iran's largest trading partner — if European negotiators opted for tough sanctions.

Both Russia and China, which have major commercial ties with Iran, have continued to publicly push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse in October of an EU attempt to entice Iran into talks.

The new European draft emphasizes "the importance of political and diplomatic efforts to find a negotiated solution guaranteeing that Iran's nuclear program is exclusively for peaceful purposes."

It also encourages Iran "to engage" with the proposals put forward by the six countries in June. Their package offered economic incentives and political rewards if Iran agreed to consider a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment and commit to a freeze on enrichment before talks on its nuclear program.

The European draft makes clear that Iran must "without further delay suspend proliferation sensitive nuclear activities" — specifically all enrichment and reprocessing including research and development, and construction of a research reactor moderated by heavy water.

It also increases pressure on Iran to fulfill requirements set by the IAEA board and would expand the powers of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency to monitor Iran's nuclear program, which diplomats said Russia views as a "provocation" to Iran.

Council Given New Draft Over Iran (BBC)

BBC.com, December 8, 2006

France, Germany and the UK have drawn up a new draft of a proposed United Nations Security Council resolution aiming to curb Iran's nuclear efforts.

The draft details which materials Iran would be banned from acquiring under possible Security Council sanctions.

It also threatens Iran with unspecified actions if it does not suspend its enrichment of uranium, but is narrower in scope than previous drafts.

Russia and China both said early drafts were too restrictive on Tehran.

Earlier this week talks in Paris between diplomats from the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany ended with no agreement.

But diplomats, including US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, have suggested that negotiations are making progress.

The new draft still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

But it spells out in much greater detail exactly what items are prohibited.

It is said to retain a travel ban and the freezing of assets of individuals, companies and organizations involved with the Iranian programmes, a measure that was opposed by Russia.

Both Russia and China have direct financial concerns in Iran.

Russia is building a nuclear power station in the country and China has significant oil interests in Iran.

However, European diplomats hope to put this resolution to a vote by Christmas.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has threatened to reconsider relations with those countries who support sanctions.

Lebanese Premier Lashes Out At Hezbollah Leader (NYT)

By Nada Bakri, Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 8 — Lebanon's prime minister, Fouad Siniora, lashed out Friday at Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, in a deeply personal attack in which he dismissed the sheik's political ultimatums for more power, saying, "You are not our Lord and your party is not our Lord."

The prime minister's decision to go head to head with Sheik Nasrallah in a televised address was a risky strategy for Mr. Siniora, whose local and regional standing is nowhere near the outsized image that the Hezbollah leader enjoys. But it also reflected how Lebanon's political crisis had spread beyond the bounds of political differences and entered the highly combustible realm of personal animosities between leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0105176

A day earlier, Sheik Nasrallah appeared in a live video feed on two large screens before thousands of protesters camped out in downtown Beirut, vowing to press on with street protests that have paralyzed the government and the capital city for more than a week. He threatened that if the governing coalition did not soon meet his demand to form what he called a national unity government — in which Hezbollah's alliance would have veto power over all decisions — he would force the collapse of the existing government, call for early parliamentary elections and select a new prime minister from among Hezbollah's allies.

"Sayed Nasrallah's speech was not aptly chosen," Mr. Siniora said in response on Friday, using a title that indicates that Sheik Nasrallah is a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad. "He was trying to stage a coup d'état, or at least threaten to make one."

In striking back, the prime minister challenged the credibility of Sheik Nasrallah and Hezbollah — or the Party of God — a strategy that would have been unheard of in the early days after the war with Israel, from which Hezbollah emerged emboldened and declared "divine victory." But Lebanon is now divided and angry, and its leaders talk about promoting dialogue — while ratcheting up a heated confrontation.

"His threatening rhetoric does not lead anywhere and is not beneficial for the Lebanese," the prime minister said. "It is one of the things that are making the resistance lose its popularity among Arabs and Muslims."

There are generally two sides in this battle. One, the Hezbollah alliance, backed by Iran and Syria, says that the sitting government is illegitimate because six Hezbollah-aligned ministers resigned. The other side, called the March 14 coalition, is backed by the United States and France, and says that Hezbollah and its allies are trying to stage what amounts to a coup.

Each side has accused the other of being an agent of foreign governments; each has accused the other of seeking one-party rule of Lebanon; each has accused the other of refusing to have a dialogue; each has vowed not to give into the other's demands; and with each day, the sides move further and further away from reconciliation.

Saniora Accuses Nasrallah Of Coup Threat (AP)

By Zeina Karam, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

Prime Minister Fuad Saniora on Friday accused Hezbollah's leader of threatening a coup in an unusually harsh exchange between the two rivals that stoked tensions as the Shiite guerrilla group escalated its attempts to oust the government.

Saniora spoke to hundreds of supporters in his fortified office, where he has lived for more than a week. Outside, pro-Hezbollah demonstrators in a nearby square replayed on loudspeakers a Thursday night speech in which their leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, accused the prime minister of siding with Israel during the July-August war.

The prime minister said Nasrallah "is threatening a coup and his statements carry all the seeds of dissension and threat."

Saniora criticized the Hezbollah leader for his attitude in the speech, in which he accused the prime minister of being "stubborn" and said members of the government were responsible for the war, which began after Hezbollah seized two Israeli soldiers.

"Who appointed you to say 'I am right and all else is false'?" the prime minister asked.

Saniora, who has received strong Western and Arab support, repeated that Hezbollah's protests, now in their eighth day, would not force his resignation. The pro-Syrian Hezbollah and its opposition allies have called for a huge demonstration Sunday, saying it will mark an escalation in their attempts to oust the U.S.-backed premier.

Hezbollah and its allies began demonstrating after Saniora rejected their demands for a third of the Cabinet's seats — an effective veto.

Six pro-Hezbollah ministers resigned from the Cabinet last month over Saniora's refusal to accept the demand, depriving the government of any Shiite representation.

The political division has taken dangerous sectarian lines, with most Sunni Muslims supporting the Sunni prime minister and Shiites backing Hezbollah. Christian factions are split between the two camps.

DOJ_NMG_0105177

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak warned Friday the protests could escalate to "very serious confrontations and even lead to the destruction of Lebanon."

"I fear the consequences," Mubarak said in a TV interview on a visit to Paris. "There is also the risk of foreign interference," he added in a veiled reference to Syria and Iran, the sponsors of Hezbollah.

Hezbollah has not said what it plans to do next, but some Lebanese believe it might call for civil disobedience or escalate street protests, disrupting vital utilities such as Beirut airport. So far, however, Nasrallah has stressed that his supporters must demonstrate peacefully.

On Friday, Hezbollah protesters in the square near Saniora's office released red, white and green balloons — the colors of the Lebanese flag — bearing the words "Saniora, out."

Elsewhere in central Beirut, the spiritual leader of Lebanon's Sunnis backed the government and told worshippers Hezbollah's demands would not be met.

"Bringing down the government and prime minister in the street is a red line which we will never allow," Sheik Mohammed Rashid Kabbani said in a sermon at a Sunni mosque.

But another Sunni cleric, Fathi Yakan, who supports Hezbollah, led opposition protesters in prayer in a city square.

"Your sit-in today, with God's help, will defeat the American project," Yakan said, accusing the U.S. of sowing division between Shiites and Sunnis in the Islamic world.

On Thursday, Nasrallah said government officials had asked American envoys to persuade Israel to destroy Hezbollah and claimed that Saniora had ordered the Lebanese army to deprive Hezbollah of weapons.

"Didn't the prime minister of Lebanon work to cut off the supply lines?" Nasrallah asked.

The Lebanese army said Friday that it had received no such orders from the government during the 34-day war, but that troops did confiscate Hezbollah ammunition at one checkpoint.

Hezbollah replied by saying the troops would not have seized the ammunition without a "political decision" and that the army was telling only "half the truth."

Despite the exchange, both leaders have stressed they are willing to negotiate.

"Our hand and heart is open," Saniora said Friday. "We won't dig trenches in Beirut streets, we will build bridges of love among the Lebanese, Christian and Muslim."

Nasrallah and Saniora have welcomed this week's proposal by Lebanon's Maronite Catholic Church to form a new government and hold early presidential elections, saying it could serve as the basis for a settlement.

President Emile Lahoud, a staunch pro-Syrian, has refused to resign. He issued a statement Friday that praised Nasrallah's speech as carrying "responsible and clear positions."

Six-Party Negotiations On N. Korea To Resume (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear program will begin next Saturday morning in Beijing, two months after Pyongyang defied international pressure and conducted its first nuclear test. Such talks have been stalled for more than a year.

"We're going back," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said in an interview. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, said China, the host of the talks, will make a formal announcement this weekend. The first session is expected to last a few days, then take a break before Christmas.

The talks have been stalled in part because of North Korean pique at a U.S. Treasury Department effort to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting. The United States has agreed to set up a working group at the talks to find ways to finalize a Treasury investigation of a Macau bank, provided North Korea takes steps to end its illicit activities.

U.S. officials said all sides have agreed that the talks will seek to implement the joint "statement of principles" issued on Sept. 19, 2005, which was designed to lay out a negotiating road map. That statement, which said North Korea would "abandon" its nuclear programs, is filled with diplomatic ambiguity, with no clear timeline for when the North would give up its programs, or how, or in what sequence. The statement said the steps would take place under the principle of "commitment for commitment, action for action," but now negotiators must agree on which steps will take place first.

DOJ_NMG_0105178

In talks with the North Koreans, Hill has indicated a clear sense of urgency in implementing the agreement. Some Asian diplomats reported that he sought a timeline as short as 18 months, before President Bush completes his term. A U.S. official said Hill and the North Koreans have discussed in general terms how long it would take to implement the 2005 statement.

"There was a discussion about getting the September statement done in a reasonable amount of time," he said. "Eighteen months would be included in a definition of 'reasonable,' but there were lots of time frames given out."

The six-party talks, which also include Japan, South Korea and Russia, began in 2003, after North Korea restarted a nuclear reactor in Yongbyon that had been frozen under a 1994 deal and began to extract weapons-grade plutonium from spent fuel rods. The Bush administration cut off heavy-fuel deliveries promised under the deal after it accused Pyongyang of building a clandestine uranium-enrichment program. Since then the six-party talks have generally taken place only intermittently and have generally made little progress.

U.S. officials said Hill, in bilateral talks in Beijing with his North Korean counterpart on Oct. 31 and Nov. 28, did not offer any enhanced humanitarian or economic benefits if Pyongyang agreed to give up its programs. Instead, Hill reiterated long-standing U.S. proposals, such as joining in providing energy assistance, offering security assurances, outlining a path to negotiating a peace treaty to end the Korean War and normalizing relations.

U.S. officials do not expect North Korea to take any visible steps at the start of the talks, such as shutting down its nuclear reactor, but they want to seek evidence that North Korea is committed to speedy implementation of the 2005 statement.

"They have indicated they are interested in an end to what they call the U.S. 'hostile policy,' " Hill said. "We made very clear to them that we don't have a hostile policy to them. We have a hostile policy to their policies, including and especially their nuclear policies."

Asian diplomats said China believes that the stage is set for progress at the talks. Beijing was embarrassed when North Korea, a longtime client state, gave it only two hours' warning of its nuclear test, and Chinese officials have been eager to repair the diplomatic damage.

Many Korea experts, however, increasingly think that North Korea will never give up its nuclear weapons programs, or at least that the price for giving them up has increased significantly. A group of experts recently returned from meetings there and said they believe that Pyongyang is returning to the talks simply to placate China and has little interest in giving up its nuclear programs.

Officials Hail U.S.-India Nuke Fuel Deal (AP)

By Matthew Rosenberg, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

Officials hailed a U.S.-India civilian nuclear cooperation deal approved by the U.S. House of Representatives Friday as the symbol of a broad shift in relations between the two countries. But the deal also highlights some of the limits of the emerging strategic partnership between India and the United States, who have sought to overcome decades of mutual mistrust.

The bill, which allows the shipment of nuclear fuel and know-how to India, now goes to the U.S. Senate and then must be signed by President Bush. U.S. and Indian officials also need to work out a separate technical nuclear cooperation agreement, expected to be finalized next year.

The nuclear deal "is a major, historic step forward for both our countries," U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told reporters in New Delhi earlier in the day. It "is the symbolic center of this new strategic partnership between India and the United States."

While the new partnership could further open up a huge market for American companies and give India the energy it needs, it is far more fraught politically. India has long had close ties with countries shunned by the U.S., such as Iran and Myanmar. Washington, meanwhile, is tight with India's biggest rival, Pakistan.

DOJ_NMG_0105179

"The two countries will have to sit together and find out how they can promote their respective national interests and work together to promote global peace and security," said Gen. Ashok Mehta, a retired officer and military commentator. "It's not certain they can."

Those potential differences were highlighted in recent days by India's concerns over language in the bill that would require Bush and his successors to determine if New Delhi was cooperating with American efforts to confront Iran about its nuclear ambitions.

Indian officials say they can live with the weakened, nonbinding language that made it into the final bill.

But many here are rankled by suggestions from Washington that New Delhi should support American policy, be it on Iran or China, with whom India is also seeking closer ties.

"We're a sovereign nation — we don't need Washington to decide what is best for us," said one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he needs to work with U.S. officials.

The bill carves out an exemption in American law to allow U.S. civilian nuclear trade with India in exchange for Indian safeguards and inspections at its 14 civilian nuclear plants; eight military plants would remain off-limits.

Congressional action was needed because U.S. law bars nuclear trade with countries such as India that have not submitted to full international inspections.

Critics say the cooperation plan, a deal which American officials insist will not be given to any other country, could boost India's nuclear arsenal and spark a nuclear arms race with Pakistan.

The deal "brings about the qualitative change in relations between India and Washington," said Talat Masood, a Pakistani defense analyst. It "will make Pakistan much more insecure."

Economically, the benefits for India and the U.S. could be huge.

Energy, or lack thereof, is the Achilles heel of India's fast growing economy, and officials here are looking to nuclear power as a potential solution.

But India lacks needed supplies of uranium, and the deal will pave the way for India to get access to the international nuclear fuel market, from which it has been excluded because of its refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

U.S. companies are hoping to cash in on the expected boom in nuclear energy in India — estimates for how much the Indian market could be worth range as a high as $100 billion.

Associated Press Writer Munir Ahmed in Islamabad, Pakistan contributed to this report.

Congress Nears Approval Of Nuclear Deal For India (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress was set to approve a civilian nuclear deal for India late Friday, in a move that could open a torrent of U.S. high-tech trade with the subcontinent.

Both houses of Congress agreed Thursday on language of the bill, which would allow U.S. firms for the first time to sell nuclear technologies to India.

Bush administration officials view it as underpinning an evolving Washington-New Delhi alliance that could help counter China's emergence as a global economic and military power. American companies are set to benefit from potential nuclear-energy deals, worth billions of dollars, and other trade opportunities that are likely to open in the wake of the initiative.

This week, a delegation of more than 200 companies, including about 25 nuclear-oriented companies such as General Electric Co., Bechtel Group Inc. and Westinghouse Electric Co., traveled to New Delhi to learn about India's business regulations and meet with senior Indian officials. Those companies also held discussions with India's principal nuclear energy companies, Nuclear Power Corp. of India and National Thermal Power Corp.

Executives in the delegation said they are attracted to India's skyrocketing demands for energy, which are expected to come from both conventional and nuclear sources. Currently, India has the capacity to produce 3,500 megawatts of power from nuclear reactors, but the government wants to increase this to 60,000 megawatts by 2030.

DOJ_NMG_0105180

Many U.S. officials and business executives hope that progress in opening India's energy markets will translate into greater access to other sectors. India's economy grew more than 9% in the first half, and demand for everything from cellular phones to cars is soaring.

"The feedback we're getting is that India is looking forward to the collaboration" with American companies, said Ron Somers, who took part in the delegation as the president of the U.S.-India Business Council. "Across all the sectors of the Indian economy, the opportunities are limitless."

Some critics of the nuclear deal say it could fuel a broader arms race in South Asia and undermine the global system designed to contain the development of nuclear weapons. They are particularly concerned that India's rival, Pakistan, and other Islamic nations could seek to further develop their own nuclear arsenals in response to India's growing capabilities.

"It's an historic mistake," said Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Edward Markey, who fought the bill's passage Friday on the floor of the House. "The consequences, the domino effect, begin here today."

President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed at a July 2005 summit in Washington to develop a "strategic partnership" resting heavily on the U.S.'s ability to share nuclear technologies with India. Such actions required the Bush administration to amend decades-old laws that prohibit the U.S. from diverting such technologies to non-signatories of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Despite general bipartisan support for the deal, a number of stumbling blocks emerged in recent months. India wanted strict language that guarantees New Delhi would have alternative sources of nuclear fuel should Washington face limitations as a supplier. U.S. lawmakers sought explicit language in the bill that would guard against New Delhi supporting the nuclear programs of other countries, particularly Iran.

Indian officials voiced satisfaction with the final version, saying it is crucial to helping India meet its energy needs without impinging on New Delhi's sovereignty. "No legislation enacted in a foreign country can take away from the sovereign right to conduct foreign policy determined solely by our national interests," India's Foreign Minister spokesman said in a statement.

If the bill passes, it's likely to be at least another six months before American companies can begin selling nuclear technologies, said officials involved in the India initiative. Washington and New Delhi still need to agree to parameters for the types of technologies to be included. And India must reach a new safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency, as well as an agreement with the Nuclear Suppliers Group, the global body controlling the trade of nuclear technologies.

House Passes Deal With India On Sale Of Nuclear Reactors (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — The House of Representatives voted overwhelmingly on Friday to cement closer ties between the United States and India, endorsing President Bush's plan to allow American shipments of civilian nuclear reactors and fuel to India over criticisms that the plan could spark a regional arms race.

The landslide vote handed the White House a major victory at a time when the Bush administration's foreign policy is under fire on multiple fronts, and it was another signal that American lawmakers are looking for concrete steps to counter China's growing influence in Asia.

The bill passed 330-59 in the House, and the Senate had yet to vote. The nuclear agreement, which was negotiated in March by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India, would lift a decades-long ban on nuclear sales to India put in place, in part, because of the country's refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The arrangement requires that the fuel shipments be for civilian use only, yet opponents of the bill said that the deliveries of nuclear fuel would free up India's domestic stocks of nuclear materials for its weapons program.

On Friday, Representative Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who has been one of the most vocal critics of the bill, called the plan a "historic mistake" that will "come back to haunt the United States and the world."

Mr. Markey said that proliferation experts estimate that the new arrangement would allow India to produce as many as 50 nuclear warheads each year.

DOJ_NMG_0105181

Congressional negotiators softened a provision that would have required American presidents to certify that India was participating in efforts to halt Iran's burgeoning nuclear program. New Delhi strongly opposed this provision. The bill now merely requires the president to report annually to Congress on what India is doing to end the Iranian program.

Even after President Bush signs the legislation, India must reach a separate agreement on nuclear inspections with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog. The Nuclear Suppliers Group, a coalition of 45 nations that regulates nuclear trade, must also approve the deal.

Congress OKs Nuclear Pact With India (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Reversing three decades of U.S. policies intended to halt the spread of nuclear weapons, Congress early today approved a long-stalled agreement giving India access to American nuclear technology with limited safeguards to discourage possible proliferation.

The House of Representatives passed the measure, 330 to 59, Friday night, and senators voted unanimously in favor of the deal shortly before 3 a.m. President Bush, who finalized the terms of the agreement during a visit to India in March, is expected to sign it quickly.

The pact would lift a U.S. moratorium on nuclear cooperation with a nation that has developed atomic weapons and has not signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty of 1970. But Bush and supporters of the agreement argue that it marks a crucial advance in restricting nuclear weapons because it permits international inspectors to examine most of India's civilian nuclear reactors for the first time.

In addition, they say that opening India's nuclear industry to $100 billion in potential sales from abroad will help cement a relationship with a developing economic power that may also serve as a hedge against the growing clout of China in Asia.

Critics argued that by allowing India's nuclear arsenal to keep growing and keeping some of its facilities off-limits, the pact establishes a double standard and sets conditions under which treaty violations would be tolerated.

"Such a policy unravels years of successful U.S. diplomatic efforts to convince countries that the benefits of surrendering the right to develop nuclear weapons outweighed the risk of staying outside the treaty and pursuing a nuclear weapons option," said retired Army Lt. Gen. Robert G. Gard Jr., a senior military fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation, a Washington think tank.

The deal now faces at least two additional hurdles. A treaty putting the provisions into effect will require Senate ratification, and the Nuclear Suppliers Group, 45 nations that control exports of nuclear materials, also must approve the pact.

The suppliers group was formed in 1974 after India conducted a nuclear test.

Over months of debate, the measure's proponents were able to turn back fears that the accord would fuel a nuclear arms race in South Asia and that the United States was weakening its hand in seeking to restrict nuclear weapons development in Iran and North Korea.

Though India has been a nuclear power since 1974, its rival, Pakistan, first tested nuclear weapons in 1998.

Pakistan's military said in a statement that it had successfully test-fired a new version of its short-range, nuclear-capable missile today, the Associated Press reported.

Supporters said that rather than fueling arms development, the agreement will promote economic growth in the U.S. and India by easing political tensions and encouraging trade.

"India is a state that should be at the very center of our foreign policy and our attention," Rep. Tom Lantos (D-San Mateo) said in House debate Friday.

Sanjay Puri, chairman of the U.S.-India Political Action Committee, said some estimates had placed the potential economic value of the deal at $30 billion in the United States and India alone, and that it could add 10,000 to 15,000 jobs in the U.S.

Alternatively, the failure of the deal would have "serious repercussions in terms of the political and economic relationship," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105182

The issue of Iran's nuclear ambitions delayed the measure's consideration until the last days of the 109th Congress. Legislators wanted assurances that India would cooperate with U.S. efforts to punish Iran, with sanctions if necessary, for its nuclear program.

But Bush administration officials feared such provisions would alienate India and scuttle the deal.

Ultimately, the two sides agreed on a compromise under which the president would submit reports on India's actions regarding Iran.

Under the agreement passed by Congress, India would be allowed to expand its nuclear weapons arsenal, but for the first time it would allow international inspections of its civilian reactors. However, inspectors would have access only to 14 of 22 reactors. The others, at military installations, would remain off-limits.

At the heart of the debate was the impact the deal would have on the nonproliferation treaty, a cornerstone of U.S. nuclear weapons policy since 1970. The treaty, aimed at preventing nonnuclear nations from acquiring atomic arms, has been signed by more than 180 countries.

Critics of the U.S.-India deal said it would undermine the treaty, encourage violations and lead to the spread of nuclear weapons.

During the debate Friday, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), who had been among the most vocal opponents, said the U.S. was asking the United Nations to pressure Iran, a signatory to the treaty, "not to use civilian nuclear materials in order to create a military nuclear weapon."

At the same time, he said, India was on the verge of gaining U.S. approval of a nuclear fuel agreement although the Indian government had refused to sign the treaty and had engaged in a subcontinent nuclear arms race.

"We are going to provide the nuclear materials for their civilian nuclear program so that it will free up their domestic nuclear materials for their weapons program," he said.

Markey said that the accord would set off a "nuclear weapons domino effect" by encouraging other nations to ignore the nonproliferation treaty, and that Iran and North Korea would be at the top of the list.

Bush, in addition to focusing on the access inspectors would gain to Indian facilities, has argued that with a population of 1.1 billion and a growing economy, India needs to expand its nuclear energy facilities to lessen its need for conventional fuels.

Growing demand for oil and gas, he says, will put price pressure on the world's limited supplies.

Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh set the agreement in motion during a meeting in Washington in July 2005, but negotiators were unable to complete it until March.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, who is visiting India, said ahead of Congress' approval that the deal would lead to an expansion of joint ventures between the countries and accompany increases in mutual counter-terrorism efforts.

US-India Near End Of Nuclear Freeze (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

The US and India were last night approaching an important milestone in their journey towards a new strategic partnership, with the US Congress poised to pass legislation to allow Washington to resume the sale of nuclear technology to New Delhi after a gap of 30 years.

The proposed changes to the US Atomic Energy Act will end a technology-denial regime imposed on India in the wake of its 1974 nuclear test; mark an abrupt shift in US counter-proliferation policy; and open the door to a wide range of commercial opportunities.

In New Delhi, Nicholas Burns, US under-secretary of state, said: “The civil nuclear agreement is in our eyes the symbolic centre of the new strategic partnership between India and the United States.

“We’ve broken with conventional wisdom of the last 30 years that India should be isolated and walled off from the international non-proliferation regime. We’ve made an effort to change our own law and international regulation so India can be welcomed into the non-proliferation regime for the first time in decades.”

DOJ_NMG_0105183

After investing political capital to secure the vexatious agreement, bitterly criticised by non-proliferation campaigners as a reward to a nuclear pariah state outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the Bush administration is expected to drive to secure some commercial objectives in India.

"We're doing this to build a long-term strategic partnership – but India opening up sectors such as financial services and retail would be extremely important to US companies," said an official.

The US has been strongly recommending that foreign direct investment ceilings in the Indian insurance sector should be increased from the 24 per cent permitted at present.

The US has not disguised its desire to ramp up military and defence collaboration between the two countries. It has pushed hard to secure a share of a $6bn order for 126 fighter jets for India.

The painful history of US sanctions, which saw supplies of spares abruptly terminated, has left a legacy of mistrust in the Indian defence establishment that is only slowly dissolving.

India is keen to diversify its sources of defence hardware. These have to date been dominated by Russian equipment. India has recently bought its first important naval platform from the US – the former USS Trenton, an amphibious transport ship.

US officials in Delhi on Friday disclosed India had in November agreed to buy six UH-3H Sikorsky Sea King helicopters for $38m, that will accompany the Trenton, bought in July for $48m, when it sails to India next month.

"People are looking at the relationship and saying: How do we take it beyond civil nuclear?" said a US official. He added that Washington hoped India would play a greater regional role in Afghanistan and west Asia.

Several more vital approvals – including those of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group – are needed before the agreement can take effect. Several countries, notably China, have yet to show their cards. But the odds of a successful conclusion have increased.

Indian Finance Official Expects Pickup In Growth (WSJ)

By Eric Bellman

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India's economic expansion could accelerate to more than 10% annually in the next five years, said the country's finance minister, confirming a trajectory that puts India on a similar growth path as Asia's other star performer: China.

India -- which has clocked gross-domestic-product growth of 9.1% in the first half of this fiscal year -- could see growth climb into the double digits during the period covered by the government's next five-year economic plan, which starts April 1, Finance Minister P. Chidambaram told The Wall Street Journal in an interview.

"We would be happy if the next [five-year] plan started with 9% [growth] and then slowly took the growth up to 10%," he said. The comments echo those of other Indian leaders, who say double-digit growth is within reach, as long as the economy continues to open to private and foreign investment.

Along with China, India's economy has been one of the world's fastest growing recently, expanding an average of around 8% a year for the past three fiscal years. The country's central bank, the Reserve Bank of India, projects that the economy will expand around 8% this year, but some economists think growth could be 8.5% or higher. In comparison, China's GDP grew 10.7% in the January-September period compared with a year earlier.

India needs to expand even faster, though, if it wants to bring more of the hundreds of millions of its citizens out of poverty, economists said.

The finance minister welcomed a recent slowdown in inflation. He said that while he would like to see inflation lower, it is in part a result of India's robust growth and still much lower than it used to be. "We have some mastery over inflation" that the country didn't have 10 years ago, he said. "Only in the last four years the inflation rate has been less than the GDP" growth rate, he added.

Inflation will "moderate" over the next four months, he said, thanks to lower oil prices and government measures to lower the prices of essential commodities. India has restricted the export of sugar to bring down its price, for example, and is importing wheat from Australia to increase wheat supplies.

DOJ_NMG_0105184

In a move aimed at cooling India's growth and inflation rates, the central bank said Friday that it will increase the cash-reserve ratio requirement for banks. The higher requirements will pull about 135 billion rupees, or about $3 billion, out of the banking system, the Reserve Bank said.

India will continue along the path of revamping its economy, Mr. Chidambaram said. More foreign participation will be allowed in the insurance and banking industries, as well as increasing the convertibility of the rupee. He declined to outline what the next overhauls in these areas would be or when they might happen.

Many economists and executives complain that the government isn't going as far as it should to unshackle its economy from government control and ownership. While Mr. Chidambaram is viewed as a business-friendly minister, analysts say his hands are tied from pushing through the more controversial changes because the Congress Party's ruling coalition depends on the support of communist parties to stay in power.

US House Backs Trade With Vietnam (BBC)

BBC.com, December 9, 2006

The US House of Representatives has passed landmark legislation normalising trade relations with Vietnam.

The bill, which now needs to be backed by the Senate before becoming law, was defeated in November ahead of President George W Bush's first visit to Vietnam.

The deal also expanded trade relations with Haiti, and tweaked Washington's trade preferences with several states in Latin America and beyond.

The measures are the final tasks before the Republican-led Congress winds up.

A new-look Congress, with Democrat majorities in both the House and the Senate, will convene in the new year.

Congress' failure to pass the bill normalising trade relations with Hanoi was seen as an embarrassment for Mr Bush before he visited Vietnam for an economic summit in November.

"This legislation is about more than economics," Republican Rob Simmons, a Vietnam veteran, said during the debate.

"This legislation is about working together with Vietnam to heal the wounds of the war."

The trade package also allows the conflict-ridden Caribbean island nation of Haiti will be allowed to increase duty-free exports of clothing and textiles to the US, with some conditions.

Representatives said this should serve as a signal to other nations to trade with Haiti.

But there is opposition to the bill from some senators fearful that the textile deal with Haiti might cost American jobs.

The trade legislation also renews trade preferences with the Andean Community of Nations, namely Peru, Colombia, Bolivia and Ecuador.

But the deal, which is linked to fight against drugs, will be replaced by bilateral agreements from next year. Peru and Colombia have signed bilateral trade deals with the US, but Bolivia and Ecuador have not.

China, Shy Giant, Shows Signs Of Shedding Its False Modesty (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 8 — China's Communist Party has a new agenda: it is encouraging people to discuss what it means to be a major world power and has largely stopped denying that China intends to become one soon.

In the past several weeks China Central Television has broadcast a 12-part series describing the reasons nine nations rose to become great powers. The series was based on research by a team of elite Chinese historians, who also briefed the ruling Politburo about their findings.

Until recently China's rising power remained a delicate topic, and largely unspoken, inside China. Beijing has long followed a dictum laid down by Deng Xiaoping, the paramount leader who died in 1997: "tao guang yang hui," literally to hide its ambitions and disguise its claws.

The prescription was generally taken to mean that China needed to devote its energy to developing economically and should not seek to play a leadership role abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0105185

President Hu Jintao set off an internal squabble two years ago when he began using the term "peaceful rise" to describe his foreign policy goals. He dropped the term in favor of the tamer-sounding "peaceful development."

His use of "rise" risked stoking fears of a "China threat," especially in Japan and the United States, people told about the high-level debate said. Rise implies that others must decline, at least in a relative sense, while development suggests that China's advance can bring others along.

Yet this tradition of modesty has begun to fade, replaced by a growing confidence that China's rise is not fleeting and that the country needs to do more to define its objectives.

With its $1 trillion in foreign exchange reserves, surging military spending and diplomatic initiatives in Asia, Africa and the Middle East, Beijing has begun asserting its interests far beyond its borders. Chinese party leaders are acting as if they intend to start exercising more power abroad rather than just protecting their political power at home.

"Like it or not, China's rise is becoming a reality," says Jia Qingguo, associate dean of the Beijing University School of International Studies. "Wherever Chinese leaders go these days, people pay attention. And they can't just say, 'I don't want to get involved.' "

Itself a major recipient of foreign aid until recently, China this year promised to provide well over $10 billion in low-interest loans and debt relief to Asian, African and Latin American countries over the next two years. It invited 48 African countries to Beijing last month to a conference aimed at promoting closer cooperation and trade.

Beijing agreed to send 1,000 peacekeepers to Lebanon, its first such action in the Middle East. It has sought to become a more substantial player in a region where the United States traditionally holds far more sway.

At the United Nations Security Council, China cast aside its longstanding policy of opposing sanctions against other nations. It voted to impose penalties on North Korea, its neighbor and onetime ally, for testing nuclear weapons.

Officials and leading scholars are becoming a bit less hesitant to discuss what this all might mean. The documentary, on China's main national network, uses the word rise constantly, including its title, "Rise of the Great Powers." It endorses the idea that China should study the experiences of nations and empires it once condemned as aggressors bent on exploitation.

"Our China, the Chinese people, the Chinese race has become revitalized and is again stepping onto the world stage," Qian Chengdan, a professor at Beijing University and the intellectual father of the television series, said in an online dialogue about the documentary on Sina.com, a leading Web site.

"It is extremely important for today's China to be able to draw some lessons from the experiences of others," he said.

The series, which took three years to make, emanated from a Politburo study session in 2003. It is not a jingoistic call to arms. It mentions China only in passing, and it never explicitly addresses the reality that China has already become a big power.

Yet its version of history, which partly tracks the work done by Paul Kennedy in his 1980s bestseller, "The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers," differs markedly from that of the textbooks still in use in many schools.

Its stentorian narrator and epic soundtrack present the emergence of the nine countries, from Portugal in the 15th century to the United States in the 20th, and cites numerous achievements worthy of emulation: Spain had a risk-taking queen; Britain's nimble navy secured vital commodities overseas; the United States regulated markets and fought for national unity.

The documentary also emphasizes historical themes that coincide with policies Chinese leaders promote at home. Social stability, industrial investment, peaceful foreign relations and national unity are presented as more vital than, say, military strength, political liberalization or the rule of law.

In the 90 minutes devoted to examining the rise of the United States, Lincoln is accorded a prominent part for his efforts to "preserve national unity" during the Civil War. China has made reunification with Taiwan a top national priority. Franklin D. Roosevelt wins praise for creating a bigger role for the government in managing the market economy but gets less attention for his wartime leadership.

Government officials minimize the importance of the series. He Yafei, an assistant foreign minister, said in an interview that he had watched only "one or two episodes." He said the documentary should not signal changes in China's thinking about projecting power, saying that colonialism and exploitation "would go nowhere in today's world."

But Mr. He also hinted at a shifting official line. He emphasized China's status as a developing country. But he allowed that others may see things differently.

DOJ_NMG_0105186

"Whether a country is a regional or a world power, it is not for that country to decide alone," he said. "If you say we are a big power, then we are. But we are a responsible big country. We are a maintainer and builder of the international system."

China has in fact emerged as a major power without disrupting the international order, at least so far. It has accepted an invitation by the Bush administration to discuss becoming a "responsible stakeholder" in the American-dominated international system.

Beijing places importance on many world institutions, especially the United Nations, where it holds a veto in the Security Council. It professes a strong commitment to enforcing the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Last month Margaret Chan of Hong Kong became the first Chinese to head a major United Nations agency, the World Health Organization. She vowed to build a "harmonious health world," echoing the slogan of harmony promoted by President Hu.

Yet critics say China is prepared to emerge in a less amicable fashion, if necessary. The Central Intelligence Agency says that China's military spending may be two or three times higher than it acknowledges and that it allocates more to its military than any other country except the United States.

Beijing has cultivated close ties to countries that provide it with commodities and raw materials, regardless of their human rights records. Sudan, Myanmar and Zimbabwe have all escaped international sanctions in large part because of Chinese protection.

China's increasing international engagement has also stimulated a more robust academic discussion about its global role and the potential for tensions with the United States.

Yan Xuetong, a foreign affairs specialist at Qinghua University in Beijing, argued in a scholarly journal this summer that China had already surpassed Japan, Russia, Britain, France, Germany and India in measures of its economic, military and political power. That leaves it second only to the United States, he said.

While the military gap between China and the United States may remain for some time, he argued, China's faster economic growth and increasing political strength may whittle down America's overall advantage.

"China will enjoy the status of a semi-superpower between the United States and the other major powers," Mr. Yan predicted in the article, which appeared in the China Journal of International Politics.

He added, "China's fast growth in political and economic power will dramatically narrow its power gap with the United States."

Taiwan Opposition Party Shows Strength In 2 Largest Cities (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

KAOHSIUNG, Taiwan, Dec. 8 — Like the American South a generation ago, southern Taiwan has been dominated in recent years by a single party: the island's governing Democratic Progressive Party, which got its start here in Kaohsiung, an industrial city known for populism and pro-independence sentiment.

The city lies at the center of a region where protesters awakened Taiwan and the world in the 1970s and 1980s to the brutality and corruption of martial law under the Nationalist Party, sometimes paying with their lives.

Chen Shui-bian, now Taiwan's president, won fame as one of the lawyers who represented those protesters, and he built the Democratic Progressive Party into a force that spread across the island and brought democracy to Taiwan and an end to half a century of Nationalist rule.

So it is a measure of the troubles of President Chen and his party that a mayoral race on Saturday here in Taiwan's second-largest city is at least a tossup.

With some surveys even pointing to a Nationalist victory here, President Chen and Ma Ying-jeou, the popular Nationalist chairman and departing mayor of Taipei, the capital, both came here on Friday to address separate rallies consisting of small seas of flag-waving supporters.

Together with opinion polls predicting a crushing victory for the Nationalist candidate in the Taipei mayoral election, also on Saturday, the hard-fought Kaohsiung race suggests a significant shift in Taiwan's politics.

DOJ_NMG_0105187

Independent experts on Taiwan politics expect Yu Shyi-kun, the chairman of the Democratic Progressive Party, to resign if its candidate for mayor here, Chen Chu, loses. Some experts, like Jing Huang at the Brookings Institution in Washington, predict that Prime Minister Su Tseng-chang will resign as well if Chen Chu loses or even ekes out a narrow win.

Mr. Su is a moderate Democratic Progressive who has been leery of provoking the mainland with talk of independence for Taiwan.

By resigning, Mr. Su could prepare himself for Taiwan's next presidential election, in 2008, and distance himself from President Chen, whose unpopularity has crippled his party after corruption investigations into his activities and his family's.

"Even if they win Kaohsiung, the scare is still too great," for the party to continue in power without significant changes, Mr. Huang said.

The backdrop for the mayoral elections here and in Taipei lies in the larger struggle between Taiwan's two main political parties over relations with the mainland and economic globalization.

The Nationalists want closer relations with mainland China.

Chávez Win Bolsters Cuba Succession Hopes (FT)

By Marc Frank

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

Hugo Chávez's sweeping victory in the Venezuelan presidential election this week could help to ensure political cover and economic support for the emerging leadership in Cuba as Fidel Castro fights for his life somewhere in Havana.

"As long as oil prices stay high, subsidised and bartered oil from Venezuela to Cuba will remain a huge source of support to the island," said Julia Sweig, director of the Latin America programme at the Council of Foreign Relations in Washington. "And precisely because Venezuela is more strategically important to the US than Cuba, if the US-Venezuela relationship stays at its current high-pitch, Raúl Castro will be able to consolidate the succession in the shadow of the larger regional tension."

Fidel Castro said in a 68-word message of congratulations to Mr Chávez: "I shall be brief, lest emotion betrays me. The victory was re-sounding, crushing and without parallel in the history of our America.''

Mr Castro, after missing a military parade and other events in honour of his 80th birthday last week, also failed to meet visitors such as Bolivia's President Evo Morales, or call Mr Chávez after his victory, sparking fresh speculation that his health has deteriorated.

Venezuela and Cuba have found a strong synergy, playing off each country's strength since Mr Chávez won his first election in 1998. Venezuela received an in-stant free healthcare system from Cuba that would have taken years and tens of billions of dollars to build, and education resources to help Mr Chávez keep his promise to teach every citizen to read and write.

Cuba received preferentially-financed oil in return and, after signing an agreement with Venezuela in late 2004, payment for health and other technical assistance that had been provided free, according to Havana.

Cuba's imports totalled $5.5bn in 2004 and non-tourism service income was about $1.5bn, compared with an estimated $10bn (€7.5bn, £5.1bn) of goods imported this year and non-tourism service revenues of more than $5bn. The steady oil supply and billions in revenues from the export of professional services are fuelling an economic boom after more than a decade of crisis.

Most important, Cuba's leaders are now able to point to a way out of the ideological and political debacle that followed European communism's collapse. The lights are back on, decrepit waterworks and transport are being gradually upgraded, new housing built, consumer goods replaced and there is more food on the table.

"Chávez's election was key," a European diplomat said. "Cuba will now be at least partially protected from what happens outside the country as the succession takes place."

Venezuela is using its vast oil wealth and Cuba its human capital to push their anti-US vision of a united, more socially-oriented Latin America at a time of growing restlessness among the region's poor.

US allies in Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua have lost at the polls to men who blame the US for the region's woes and favour a closer relationship with Venezuela, Cuba and their proposed model of local integration against US-centred trade pacts.

Venezuela provides the financing and Cuba the -professionals to jump-start each new leader's social -programmes.

DOJ_NMG_0105188

Thousands of Cuban doctors and other professionals are already at work throughout Bolivia. However, there is some evidence that Cuba's human resources – about 30,000 of 70,000 doctors work abroad – can no longer meet the demand, creating strain on health services and doctor shortages even in Venezuela. Venezuela and Cuba have launched a crash programme to train 100,000 doctors from the region over five years to fill the vacuum.

Most other Caribbean and Latin American countries, though more moderate, are under increasing domestic pressure to meet basic social needs and also favour a regional integration that includes Cuba, as it increasingly provides them with relatively cheap services and educates their youth.

But here the Venezuela relationship is crucial. "God, imagine what would have happened with Fidel sick if he [Mr Chávez] had lost," said a secretary at a Havana day care centre. "We have fewer doctors but, so far, the benefits are worth it."

Federal Raid On Offices In Troubled Mexican State (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 8 — Six days after President Felipe Calderón took office, federal agents raided the prosecutor's office and state police headquarters on Friday in the troubled southern state of Oaxaca, where state law-enforcement authorities have failed to arrest anyone in the killings of at least 11 antigovernment protesters and a New York City journalist.

Around 4:15 p.m., dozens of federal police officers flooded into the offices of the state prosecutor, Lizbeth Caña, and secured the arms cache used by the state judicial police responsible for investigating crimes, according to local news reports.

A police commander, Ardelio Vargas, told the newspaper La Reforma that the federal authorities intended to seize all the police weapons to determine whether they had been used against protesters in recent months. There have been widespread allegations that the local police and municipal officials had abused demonstrators and in some cases killed them.

Since May, Oaxaca has been the scene of an ugly, violent conflict between Gov. Ulises Ruiz and a coalition of left-wing and Indian organizations seeking his ouster. Over several months, protesters barricaded streets, took over the central square, seized radio stations, burned buses, scrawled graffiti and torched several landmark buildings.

The state police did nothing to restore order as the city drifted into anarchy, and pro-government thugs attacked protesters several times, usually at night. At least 13 people were shot to death, but local authorities made an arrest in only one case.

Among the victims was Bradley Roland Will, a 36-year-old independent journalist from New York City, who died of gunshot wounds he received while filming a riot on Oct. 27. That day, journalists photographed several off-duty municipal police and other officials shooting at the rioters. But state prosecutors say forensic evidence suggests that a protester, not the pro-government gunmen, shot Mr. Will at close range.

The next day, federal police invaded the city, dislodged the protesters and restored order. A month later, federal authorities arrested more than 130 protesters after another round of riots in which several landmarks were burned.

The takeover of the prosecutor's office came four days after Mr. Calderón approved the arrest of one of the protest movement's top leaders, Flavio Sosa.

Russian Billionaire's Bitter Feud With Putin A Plot Line In Poisoning (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 8 -- No ordinary billionaire, Boris Berezovsky is a onetime mathematician who travels around London with a posse of bodyguards. He openly taunts Russian President Vladimir Putin and once wore a rubber cartoonish mask of his face. Accustomed to drama, he is now a central figure in the fatal poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko, the most sensational case of international intrigue since the Cold War.

Police found traces of the poison, radioactive polonium-210, in Berezovsky's office in elegant Mayfair in central London. He said Litvinenko came there Nov. 1, the day he began feeling ill.

Berezovsky, 60, had credited Litvinenko with saving him from assassination in the 1990s, and the billionaire helped Litvinenko financially after he fled Russia in 2000 and settled in London. Berezovsky visited the sickened man at the hospital shortly before he died last month and attended his burial Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0105189

As detectives pursue the murder case in Moscow and London, Berezovsky is saying he believes Putin is behind it, while Kremlin supporters see dark emigre conspiracies to smear Russia's reputation by engineering a spectacular murder.

On Friday, Russian news media reported that a third person in the case was suffering radiation illness -- Andrei Lugovoy, a Russian businessman who had met Litvinenko at a London hotel Nov. 1. Like many people in the investigation, Lugovoy had a connection to Berezovsky; he was formerly chief of security at a television network once controlled by the billionaire.

As the investigation widens, the feud between the president and the billionaire remains a prominent story line in the mystery.

"They know each other personally. That adds to the animosity," said Alex Goldfarb, who runs the International Foundation for Civil Liberties, a New York-based organization funded by Berezovsky.

Goldfarb said Berezovsky helped Putin into office "on the assumption that he would continue the democratic reforms" of his predecessor, Boris Yeltsin. But Berezovsky has been horrified that "since Mr. Putin has come to power, there has been a systematic dismantling of democratic institutions," Goldfarb said. "His conflict with Putin has grown to Shakespearean proportions. . . . Mr. Putin hates him."

The stated aim of the civil liberties foundation is to fund democracy-building and civil rights causes in Russia and other former Soviet republics. Berezovsky's detractors say that even if it funds some worthy causes, it is a tool for a scheming Berezovsky with visions of ousting Putin and returning to Russia as a kingmaker.

Berezovsky, trained as a mathematician, became rich during the chaotic birth pangs of Russian capitalism following the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991. Under Yeltsin, the first president of Russia, the state began selling off assets in often dubious privatization deals that left a few people with gigantic piles of cash.

Berezovsky got, among other things, major stakes in the oil company Sibneft, the TV station ORT and Aeroflot. He and other so-called oligarchs wielded enormous political power behind the scenes, and Berezovsky threw his support behind Putin's bid to become president in 2000.

But according to Putin's supporters, Berezovsky unhappily discovered that the new president would not be his puppet.

Sergei Markov, a political consultant with close ties to the Kremlin, said that when Putin took office, he told "all big businessmen that you can do business or you can do politics," not both, and said "that major political resources, such as television, should belong to the state." He added: "Berezovsky resisted, and as a result he began to fight the Kremlin. . . . He has continued this fight from London, and he believes he can overthrow Putin's team and return as an oligarch."

Markov described Berezovsky as a "world-class provocateur . . . a character from Dostoevski because he shows how intensive the dialogue can be between the human soul and the devil."

According to Goldfarb, Berezovsky "thinks of himself as a politician, not as a businessman," and is "a very rare combination of a passionate guy with a cool mind. He struggles between passion and reason." He called Berezovsky "outgoing, mercurial."

Tireless and fast-talking, Berezovsky has employed a well-connected public relations firm in London to handle questions for him. He declined an interview request for this article, although when Litvinenko was dying, Berezovsky said in a telephone interview that he had "no doubt" that his friend had been poisoned on the "order from President Putin."

Tim Bell, who was knighted after helping Britain's then-Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher win three elections, and his Bell Pottinger Group public relations firm have been handling inquiries about Berezovsky and lent help with the Litvinenko case. For example, it helped distribute the photo of a gaunt, bald Litvinenko in a hospital bed just before he died.

Some people in Moscow see Berezovsky's involvement as another campaign to ruin Putin's reputation internationally.

Litvinenko "had close contacts with some of the Russian oligarchs who fell from grace, including Boris Berezovsky, who lost the opportunity to buy off the authorities with his stolen money," Konstantin Kosachyov, chairman of the foreign affairs committee in the lower house of the Russian parliament, told reporters last month. "They did not want to put up with it and could have staged a deliberate action against Russia."

Prosecutors in Russia, meanwhile, had earlier accused Berezovsky of a host of crimes, including fraud and backing a violent overthrow of Putin's government. Berezovsky denies all the allegations.

To the annoyance of those who consider him an outlaw, Berezovsky has been photographed with Neil Bush, President Bush's brother. Bell, the public relations executive in London, said he introduced Berezovsky to Neil Bush in 2003. Berezovsky later became an investor in Ignite! Learning, Bush's educational software company.

DOJ_NMG_0105190

Britain has granted the Russian political asylum; a British judge turned down a Russian request to extradite him, agreeing with Berezovsky that the charges were politically motivated.

After one extradition court appearance in 2003, Berezovsky triumphantly donned a rubber mask of Putin, a gesture that was seen as mocking the man once called his protege. Putin has landed his own punches, too. At a 2001 news conference, when asked about Berezovsky, he replied, "Who's that?"

Litvinenko, a former member of the Federal Security Service, the domestic successor to the KGB, accused the agency of involvement in apartment building bombings in 1999 in which 300 people died. He also said the security service had ordered him to kill Berezovsky.

Litvinenko said at a Moscow news conference in 1998 that a superior told him "that I had not allowed patriots to kill the Jew who had robbed half the country," according to a transcript.

Litvinenko's warning led Berezovsky to credit him "with saving my life."

Before this threat and his feud with Putin, Berezovsky narrowly escaped assassination. In 1994, while he was in a Mercedes 600 sedan, behind his driver and bodyguard, a bomb concealed in a parked car exploded, decapitating the driver. The bodyguard lost an eye, and Berezovsky suffered burns.

Among the many theories floating around the Litvinenko poisoning case is that somebody used his agonizing death to send a message to Berezovsky.

A flower vendor in Mayfair who sees Berezovsky coming and going said that "I have no idea what that man does," but that he is the only one in London who appears to have tighter security than the royal family.

Litvinenko Police Delay Moscow Interview (FT)

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

British police investigating the death of Alexander Litvinenko postponed interviewing a key witness in Moscow on Friday amid signs that they are struggling to unravel the mystery of who may have been responsible for his murder.

More than two weeks after Mr Litvinenko died in a London hospital, Scotland Yard played down suggestions of an imminent breakthrough last night. The investigation is focused on the meetings Mr Litvinenko held in a London hotel the day he fell ill from radioactive poisoning.

“This is a inquiry that can change direction very quickly,” a Scotland Yard spokesman said.

The witness Andrei Lugovoi, a former KGB agent who works for the private sector, has been waiting to be interviewed by police since a team of investigators from Scotland Yard’s anti-terrorist SO15 squad arrived in Moscow at the beginning of the week, according to his lawyer.

Mr Lugovoi was one of at least three Russians who met Mr Litvinenko on November 1 in the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel in London, where it emerged this week that seven employees had tested positive for traces of radiation.

Since returning to Moscow Mr Lugovoi has professed his innocence. He claims he is being framed as a suspect in an attempt to distract police. Andrei Romashov, Mr Lugovoi’s lawyer, said he did not know why the interview with his client had been postponed. There was no explanation from the police. Mr Lugovoi, who was admitted to hospital earlier this week, told a news agency his condition was “stable”.

He said he was waiting for official results of tests into whether he was contaminated with radiation, and urged the media not to speculate on his health or that of Dmitri Kovtun, his business associate who also met Mr Litvinenko in London and who has also denied involvement in the former spy’s death.

Russian prosecutors revealed on Thursday that Mr Kovtun was also contaminated with a radioactive substance, and that they had opened a criminal case into his attempted murder – as well as their own criminal investigation of the Litvinenko case.

Within Whitehall and in western diplomatic circles, there is a growing perception that the police investigation faces formidable obstacles. The Litvin-enko case is embroiled in claims and counter-claims, reflecting the tensions of Russian politics and the murky world inhabited by former and current members of the country’s secret services.

Mr Litvinenko’s funeral in London this week was used by exiled Chechen separatists as a platform from which to point the finger at Moscow.

DOJ_NMG_0105191

Police sources say Moscow appears determined to push ahead with its own investigation into Mr Litvinenko's death, which the Kremlin has linked to a conspiracy organised by opponents of President Vladimir Putin.

Friends of Boris Berezovsky, the exiled London-based Russian billionaire, said they had no doubt that Moscow was preparing a fresh diplomatic offensive to have him extradited.

Yuri Chaika, Russia's prosecutor-general, earlier this week singled out Mr Lugovoi as someone British investigators visiting Moscow wanted to question.

In The Polonium Poison Mystery, An Odd Italian Footnote (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

ROME, Dec. 8 — Mario Scaramella first claimed to have been hit with five times the lethal dose of polonium 210, the radioactive substance that killed the former Russian spy Alexander V. Litvinenko. "I'm not in the best mood," he said in an interview with Italian television from his hospital bed in London last month.

Then two days ago, he walked out of the hospital with minute traces of radioactive poisoning but was otherwise perfectly fine.

It seemed a classic performance for Mr. Scaramella, 36, who has emerged as the oddest footnote in the mystery of Mr. Litvinenko's death.

There are a few sure facts about him. On Nov. 1, the day Mr. Litvinenko is believed to have been poisoned, Mr. Scaramella and the former spy met at a sushi bar in London. And at the moment, Mr. Scaramella is not considered a suspect. Beyond that, it is hard to square his words about himself with whatever the reality might be.

He has claimed to be a professor at the University of Naples, which claims never to have heard of him. He was caught on a tape bragging that Silvio Berlusconi, the former Italian prime minister, was considering him for a top job at the United Nations. He later had to admit that he had never met Mr. Berlusconi.

And so, a slew of news reports about him and his career here — which included trying to prove that top Italian politicians in the center-left, including Prime Minister Romano Prodi, are Russian spies — have invariably included unflattering adjectives. They include: "incurable liar," "wannabe 007," "braggart," "bumbler" and "swindler," not to mention "fool" and "mental case."

Those last two descriptions come from Oleg Gordievski, a high-ranking K.G.B. defector who has known Mr. Scaramella for years. His opinion of Mr. Scaramella is so low that he could not even consider him as a suspect in Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning, even after Mr. Litvinenko himself raised the possibility in a conversation with Mr. Gordievski.

"I said: 'Who poisoned you? Who did you have a meal with?' " Mr. Gordievski recalled in a telephone interview from Britain on Friday. "He said, 'I had a meal with Scaramella. He was very nervous. He was very strange, but he is always strange.'

"I said, 'Sasha, it could not be Scaramella because he has nothing to do with the K.G.B. business,' " Mr. Gordievski said.

He concluded: "He is just a soap bubble. He doesn't know anything."

Repeated attempts to reach Mr. Scaramella, who is still in London and is reportedly cooperating with investigators, were not successful.

He told CNN this week that he had urgently flown to London to warn that he had received e-mail messages from a "source" Mr. Litvinenko had introduced him to earlier, saying that both of them were "under the special attention of hostile people."

The trip seemed very much in character for Mr. Scaramella, who has for years cultivated a reputation as a man with shadowy contacts and friends in high places, with a particular interest in Italy's connection with Russian spying. Several years ago, he wrote a memo alleging that in 1970 a Soviet submarine left 20 nuclear mines in the Bay of Naples.

Though his academic career seems fuzzy, there is no question of his general activity between 2003 and 2006. He worked as a consultant to the Mitrokhin Commission, an Italian parliamentary body set up by center-right politicians to investigate ties between Russian intelligence and Italy. Publicly, the commission looked into a wide array of cases, including the kidnapping and killing of the former Prime Minister Aldo Moro in 1978 by the Communist militant group the Red Brigades, and the assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II in 1981.

DOJ_NMG_0105192

But transcripts of telephone calls between Mr. Scaramella and Senator Paolo Guzzanti, the commission chairman and a member of Mr. Berlusconi's Forza Italia party, show that much of the panel's effort was also spent trying to prove before this year's elections that Mr. Prodi was a K.G.B. agent.

One commission member, Senator Lucio Malan, also of Forza Italia, said there were good reasons to look into the allegations: many top politicians, though not Mr. Prodi, once belonged to Italy's Communist Party.

And Mr. Prodi does have an unusual tie to the Moro kidnapping. In 1978, he and other professors at the University of Bologna held a séance in which a Ouija board spelled the word "Gradoli," which turned out to be the street name in Rome of a Red Brigades safe house.

"There were strange things," Mr. Malan said. "Nothing is strange in receiving news if someone claimed to have it."

He said it was generally useful having someone like Mr. Scaramella as a consultant to the commission. Mr. Malan credited him with a tip that led to the arrest in 2005 of two Ukrainians, now on trial for smuggling two grenades into Italy allegedly to kill Mr. Guzzanti. But he said Mr. Scaramella's allegations were often stronger than his proof.

"He is somebody who is acquainted with this kind of world of double spies," Mr. Malan said. "So one can get much information, if not groundless, unproved. On the other hand, there might have been some information that is very important."

The interest in Mr. Prodi appears to have been the major tie between Mr. Scaramella and Mr. Litvinenko. Both Mr. Litvinenko and Mr. Gordievski have recounted in interviews Mr. Scaramella's deep interest in proving that Mr. Prodi was a K.G.B. agent. Accounts differ, but Mr. Gordievski said Friday that he was present when Mr. Litvinenko, who moved to Britain in 2000, recounted for members of the UK Independence Party a conversation with a sympathetic Russian general about where to go if he defected.

"He said, 'I was speaking to the deputy head of the K.G.B., General Such-and-Such,' " Mr. Gordievski recalled. "And he told me, 'If you intend to go to the West, don't go to Italy because it is full of our agents.' And he said, 'For example, Prodi is our man.' "

The transcripts between Mr. Scaramella and Mr. Guzzanti show a particular interest in this conversation, and Mr. Scaramella repeatedly pressed Mr. Gordievski and Mr. Litvinenko for any further information. Mr. Gordievski said he told Mr. Scaramella that he never heard anything about Mr. Prodi and the K.G.B. — but that Mr. Scaramella later said in an e-mail message that Mr. Gordievski had, in fact, confirmed a link.

"I nearly fell from my chair," he said. "He wrote it in that stupid e-mail to me. I didn't write it. He wrote it as mental aberration in him."

In a 2005 interview with La Repubblica, an Italian daily newspaper, Mr. Litvinenko recounted how he traveled to Naples in 2004 to give a deposition to the commission, taken by Mr. Scaramella, on K.G.B. activity in Italy.

"I said to Mario I had never heard Prodi spoken of," Mr. Litvinenko told La Repubblica.

At the end of several days of depositions, Mr. Litvinenko said, Mr. Scaramella put in his hand some stationery from his private business and several hundred euros.

"I felt humiliated," he told the newspaper. "I told him he was mistaken if he thought Colonel Litvinenko was reduced to selling his information."

Hotel Bar May Be Site Of Ex-spy's Poisoning (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

LONDON — Russian dissident Alexander Litvinenko probably was poisoned at the bar of a hotel here where he met with two other Russians, both of whom now are in hospitals showing symptoms of radiation sickness, health investigators said Friday.

For weeks, investigators had zeroed in on a different location, the Piccadilly Circus sushi restaurant where Litvinenko had lunch, believing that was a likely location for his mysterious poisoning with radioactive polonium-210.

But that theory has been shaken by medical evidence that seven people who worked at the bar of the Millennium Hotel in London's upscale Mayfair district also have been exposed. The bar has been placed under quarantine.

DOJ_NMG_0105193

Police have refused to say where they think the poisoning took place — a crucial question, because it may be the best clue to who did it, and why. One law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said detectives had made no final judgment.

But the medical evidence suggests that the poisoning probably took place at the bar, Dr. Michael Clark of Britain's Health Protection Agency said Friday in an interview.

"The monitoring of the staff in the Millennium bar was done for public health purposes, but it obviously has implications for the police forensic analysis — implications of timing, and possible scenarios for the administration of polonium."

Clark emphasized that he was looking only at medical evidence and not at whatever the police investigation had turned up. But the fact that seven bar employees were exposed was significant, he said, especially since no sushi bar employees, and no hospital employees, have tested positive.

"Given that Mr. Litvinenko had a very significant quantity of polonium-210 administered in some way, there are obvious possibilities that small amounts of that could have been left on, for example, a glass or a table, that subsequently led to employees being exposed. But until there is a proper forensic examination, I really don't want to speculate on that," Clark said.

Contacts also sickened

On Nov. 1, Litvinenko met two Russians at the Millennium's Pine Bar: Andrei Lugovoy, a businessman and former KGB colonel, and a second businessman, Dmitry Kovtun. Russian news organizations reported Friday that Lugovoy, who was a friend of Litvinenko, was in a Russian hospital with apparent radiation damage to several organs. Kovtun is also reported to be seriously ill.

Later that day, Litvinenko went to a London hospital with symptoms of what doctors eventually determined was polonium poisoning. He died Nov. 23.

The former Russian security agent, who had become a critic of the Russian government, told friends he suspected the poisoner could have been one of the two Russians or the man he met at the sushi bar, Italian security consultant Mario Scaramella.

Scaramella also tested positive for exposure to polonium-210, but not in amounts sufficient to sicken him so far. He says he was meeting with Litvinenko to warn him of a possible attempt on his life.

Litvinenko also said he believed the perpetrator, whoever it was, was acting on behalf of the Russian government. Russia has denied that.

A crucial unanswered question is which came first — lunch at the sushi bar or tea at the hotel. Litvinenko told investigators that he went first to the sushi bar, then to the hotel, a law enforcement source told The Times.

Asked how Scaramella could have been exposed if the poisoning happened at the Pine Bar, some analysts said he could have hugged and kissed Litvinenko upon greeting him. That scenario makes sense only if Litvinenko had already been exposed when he went to the sushi restaurant.

But the contamination of the Pine Bar also could have taken place earlier, the law enforcement source said, pointing out that authorities have called on patrons to seek testing if they were in the bar not only on the day Litvinenko was there, but also the day before and the day after.

Lugovoy, who has been described in the Russian media as the main witness in the case, was reportedly a guest at the hotel before the Nov. 1 meeting.

Traces of polonium-210 have been found in guest rooms at the Millennium as well, the police source said. Investigators also have detected polonium on two British Airways jets, one of which, British press reports said, carried Lugovoy and Kovtun to London.

Timeline in question

Lugovoy, in an interview a week ago with Russia's Kommersant newspaper, suggested that Litvinenko could have been poisoned long before Nov. 1. He said he and Kovtun met with Litvinenko Oct. 17, in the London offices of the Erinys security company, one of several locations around London where traces of radiation have been found.

DOJ_NMG_0105194

"Localized reactive contamination" has also been found in "a couple of rooms" at the Parkes Hotel in London's Knightsbridge district, health authorities reported Friday. Lugovoy stayed there Oct. 16, and two other hotels where he has stayed have also shown traces of a radioactive substance, according to several British press reports.

Lugovoy, now considered the main witness in the case, told Interfax news agency in Moscow that his condition was satisfactory.

He also said he had doubts about earlier reports that Kovtun, his business partner, was in critical condition. Lugovoy is scheduled to be interviewed today by law enforcement agents, Interfax said.

Russian authorities pledged to cooperate with British investigators who are in Moscow to conduct the inquiry. Russia has opened its own investigation of Kovtun's poisoning.

Police sources in London said the Russians had not presented more than ordinary obstacles to conducting the investigation.

For New U.N. Chief, A Past Misstep Leads To Opportunity (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAN KI-MOON, the incoming secretary general of the United Nations, got his new job in an unlikely manner for a man known for head-of-the-class performance, devotion to duty and a relentless rise through the ranks.

He got fired.

"I was totally out of work for the first time in my life," Mr. Ban said.

Worse than that, the professional lapse that cost him his high-level position in the South Korean Foreign Ministry required a public apology from the president at the time, Kim Dae-jung. Mr. Ban had accidentally left a positive mention of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty in a joint communiqué with Russia at a time when the Bush administration had decided to abandon it.

"You must understand the political impact in Asia that public apologies have," Mr. Ban said, wincing at the memory.

As it turned out, he survived thanks to another Asian cultural tradition. "I had what we call a 'jeon-hwa-we-bok' experience," he said. The maxim, well known to Koreans, means turning a misfortune into a blessing.

While waiting in Seoul to be shunted off to a remote embassy, as he expected, he was tapped by Han Seung-soo, the General Assembly president for 2001, to come to the United Nations to be his chief of staff.

"Had I been appointed to an ambassadorship somewhere, I simply wouldn't have had this opportunity to be selected secretary general," Mr. Ban said.

The full realization of this reversal of fortune comes this Thursday with his formal swearing-in as the eighth secretary general of the United Nations. He will assume the office on Jan. 1, replacing Kofi Annan, who completes his second five-year term on Dec. 31.

Courtly and deliberate, with an easy smile, Mr. Ban, 62, is an unknown at the United Nations, particularly compared with the high-profile, globetrotting diplomat he is succeeding.

With the exception of his misstep in 2001, Mr. Ban has been almost surpassingly unassuming and inoffensive — noticed, when he is, for his steady record of incremental achievement at the South Korean Foreign Ministry, where he has spent his entire 37-year career.

The elusiveness may be intended.

"When I was the foreign policy adviser to President Roh Moo-hyun, everybody was caught up in controversy with what they said to the media, but I avoided the tricky, sometimes nasty questions," he said. "The press people called me the 'slippery eel' because they could never grab me."

A loyal and dependable company man, he once wrote handwritten letters of apology to 120 Foreign Ministry officials after being promoted ahead of them. "They were very much grateful for my gesture," he said. "With that, I was able to lessen the sorry feelings of my senior colleagues."

His penchant for not stepping on toes and his repeated public expressions of humility during the months that he was campaigning for secretary general have raised doubts about his suitability for the job. How can someone with such a retiring manner lead an organization undergoing a hotly contested reformation, riddled with regional rivalries and subject to competing demands from the great powers and the nations of the developing world?

DOJ_NMG_0105195

ADDRESSING this concern in his acceptance speech to the General Assembly on Oct. 13, he asked that people accept his modest mien as a cultural attribute and not misread it as lack of decisiveness or passion. "Modesty is about demeanor," he said, "not about vision and goals. It does not mean the lack of commitment or leadership."

In campaigning for the job, Mr. Ban presented himself as a "harmonizer and bridge builder" who would try to dispel the widespread mistrust of the United Nations.

With the choice of each secretary general, the question always arises about which part of that title the new person will inhabit. Given Mr. Ban's résumé and style, the prediction now is that he will be more a secretary, less a general.

But the same expectation greeted Mr. Annan 10 years ago, and, to the particular dismay of the Bush administration, he ended up being more general, less secretary.

John R. Bolton, the departing United States ambassador, left no doubt what the American hopes were for Mr. Ban, whom Washington backed vigorously. He repeatedly pointed out that the job of secretary general was described in the United Nations Charter as simply "chief administrative officer."

Mr. Ban was born on June 13, 1944, in Eumseong, a farm village in Japanese-occupied Korea, and raised in Chungju, a nearby town. His family lost its middle-class standard of living when his father's warehouse business went bankrupt, and Mr. Ban was to spend his early years as a diplomat deliberately picking posts where he could save money to send home.

When he was 6, his family had to flee to a remote mountainside to escape the fighting during the Korean War. "We were safe and in a place where neither the South Korean nor North Korean armies would come, but we were poor and hungry," he said. "I could see the fighter jets bombing the towns and cities nearby."

The experience led to his first sighting of Americans. "After the war, the American soldiers would throw biscuits and chocolates and chewing gum to us, and all our clothes were given to us by America," he said.

A later encounter with Western ways occurred when American technicians came to his town in the 1950s to help build a fertilizer factory, and he still recalls it with shock.

"I was startled one summer when I met for the first time one of the daughters, and she was sitting there with hot pants and her two legs stretched out in front of me, a young country boy," he said. "I didn't know where to place my eyes, where to focus. It would have been a matter of shame for any Korean lady at that time."

The eldest of six children, he was a standout student, applying himself with particular zeal to learning English. The method of study was arduous, with students required to write the same English sentences 10 times as a way of memorizing them.

IN 1962, he won an English competition sponsored by the Red Cross and got a chance to visit the United States. The high point of that trip was a meeting at the White House with President John F. Kennedy, which he said first inspired him to become a diplomat.

He married another high achiever, his school's student council president, Yoo Soon-taek, in 1971, a year after he had passed his diplomat's exam.

The couple have two daughters, Seon-yong, 34, who works in Seoul for the Korea Foundation, a nonprofit organization that promotes Korean culture, and Hyun-hee, 30, a field officer for Unicef in Nairobi, Kenya. They also have a son, Woo-hyun, 32, who is studying for an M.B.A. at the University of California, Los Angeles.

Mr. Ban is admittedly all work, no play.

"When you ask about hobbies, that's a question I have difficulty answering," he said. "I regret, looking back at my life, that I have not been able to cultivate any extracurricular activities like playing tennis or soccer or football. The only sport I do is golf, but in the last three or four years, I have played less than 10 times."

In 1956, Mr. Ban was picked by his class to address an appeal to Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold over the Hungarian uprising against the Russians. But whether there is an interesting historical footnote here, Mr. Ban cannot say. "I never found out if they ever sent it," he said.

Annan Decries Failure To Halt Darfur Killings (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0105196

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 8 -- U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan scolded governments Friday for failing to halt mass murder in Darfur, saying that the world has not learned the lessons of Rwanda and Srebrenica, where genocidal killings in the early 1990s defied the global ability to stop it.

"Sixty years after the liberation of the Nazi death camps, and 30 years after the Cambodian killing fields, the promise of 'never again' is ringing hollow," Annan said in his final speech on human rights as the U.N. leader.

Annan said the failure to protect civilians in the Sudanese region marked a low point in recent U.N. history. In a speech organized by Human Rights Watch in honor of International Human Rights Day, he faulted the "shameful passivity of most governments" in the face of a government-backed military campaign that has driven more than 2 million people from their homes and killed hundreds of thousands.

Annan provided a gloomy assessment of the organization's performance in confronting abusers of human rights during his 10-year tenure. He charged that the U.S.-led fight against terrorism has helped erode human rights standards. He said the United Nations needs to pursue an "an anti-terrorism strategy that does not merely pay lip service to the defense of human rights but is built on it."

Human rights activists have credited Annan, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, with advocating human rights more aggressively than any of his predecessors. But his legacy has been clouded by his own failure, as the head of the U.N. peacekeeping department, to promote a tougher response to the mass killings in Rwanda and Srebrenica.

Annan said his tenure has been marked by some important innovations, citing the creation of war crimes courts in Rwanda, the former Yugoslavia, Sierra Leone and Cambodia, as well as the establishment of the International Criminal Court. The Hague-based court is preparing for the possible prosecution of Sudanese perpetrators of the Darfur killings.

But he said the initial work of the new Human Rights Council, established this year by the U.N. General Assembly to hold the world's tyrants and dictators to account, has been discouraging.

The Geneva-based rights body has focused almost all its attention on condemning Israel's human rights record while remaining silent about rights abuses in Darfur, Burma and elsewhere. Annan said he hopes the council will confront Sudan in a special session on Darfur.

"The United Nations has a special stake, and a special responsibility, in promoting respect for human rights worldwide," he said. "I don't need to tell you that the U.N. has often failed to live up to that responsibility."

Annan made clear that he believes the U.N. membership bears the chief responsibility. He reserved some of his harshest criticism for Third World governments that, he said, have mischaracterized the U.N. human rights agenda as "a conspiracy by imperialist powers to take back the hard-won national sovereignty of formerly colonized people."

He also took an indirect swipe at China and Islamic governments that have defended Sudan. China, which relies on Sudan for oil, has repeatedly blocked U.S.-backed efforts to punish Sudan for rights abuses.

"There is more than enough blame to go around," Annan said. "It can be shared among those who value abstract notions of sovereignty more than the lives of real families, those whose reflex of solidarity puts them on the side of governments and not of peoples, and those who fear that action to stop the slaughter would jeopardize their commercial interests."

Annan said two pillars of U.S. counterterrorism strategy -- clandestine prisons and the promotion of tougher interrogation methods -- are playing into the hands of terrorists and ceding the moral high ground. "Secret prisons have no place in our struggle against terrorism," he said.

A U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the United States has an obligation to prosecute the fight against terrorism. "We are doing everything we can to make sure human rights are protected, always," the official said.

U.N. Chief Sees Little Progress On Rights (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105197

NEW YORK — U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan gave a sober assessment Friday of his own shortcomings as he prepared to leave office at the end of the year, and accused the United States of violating human rights in its war on terror.

He also warned Sudan's leaders that they would be held accountable if they didn't halt the violence in Darfur, and urged countries with commercial interests in Sudan to pressure the government in Khartoum.

In an address to mark Human Rights Day, which is Sunday, Annan talked about whether the United Nations had become an effective defender of human rights during his decade as secretary-general.

"I'm not sure how far I have succeeded," he said. "To judge by what is happening in Darfur, our performance has not improved much since the disasters of Bosnia and Rwanda," Annan said.

"Sixty years after the liberation of the Nazi death camps, and 30 years after the Cambodian killing fields, the promise of 'never again' is ringing hollow," he said to an audience of about 500 people invited by Human Rights Watch.

He suggested several ways to improve, starting with living up to an agreement signed by world leaders last year that the world had the "responsibility to protect" people from crimes against humanity, even those perpetrated by their own government.

Darfur, the western region of Sudan, where about 2.5 million people have been displaced and more than 200,000 have died in three years of conflict, is a test case. But countries have not showed enough will to give up commercial interests in the oil-rich country or to overrule its obstinate government, he said.

"There is more than enough blame to go around," he said, referring to China's and Russia's reluctance to impose sanctions, his own impotence and Khartoum's intransigence.

Annan recently pushed Sudan's President Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force to protect civilians in Darfur, but Bashir would accept only a U.N.-funded African Union force. Sudan's leaders say that U.N. soldiers are a spearhead for imperialist powers that want to shatter Sudan and arrest its leaders.

Annan warned that if the Sudanese government did not protect its own people or allow international peacekeepers to do it, "then the government will have to be held accountable, both collectively and individually." The International Criminal Court is expected to announce arrest warrants this month for leaders of systematic killings of civilians.

Annan also sharply criticized the United States, without explicitly naming it, for detaining terrorism suspects in secret prisons and thus undermining its moral authority.

Nations cannot protect people from terrorism by "themselves violating human rights in the process."

"To do so means abandoning the moral high ground and playing into the hands of terrorists," he said. "That is why secret prisons have no place in our struggle against terrorism."

During his leadership of the U.N., Annan has rarely clashed publicly with the United States. But he drew Washington's wrath by calling the Iraq invasion illegal, urging the U.S. to try to co-opt insurgents rather than alienate them, and refusing to significantly commit U.N. agencies to help rebuild Iraq because of security concerns.

On Friday, he said that it was time for a new strategy on Iraq, and that the U.N. could organize a reconstruction conference for Iraq as it did after the Balkan wars and the invasion of Afghanistan.

The Iraq Study Group interviewed him for the report it released Wednesday, and Annan revealed that the panelists had asked him whether he would lead such a conference.

The Agonies Of Zimbabwe (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

One problem with labeling states as pariahs is that it's all too easy to forget about them. Robert Mugabe's Zimbabwe is a prime example: it is under economic sanctions by the United States and the European Union and few tourists go there, so the suffering of its people is largely out of sight and out of mind. Yet things are truly terrible.

The latest indication comes in a United Nations-financed report by Zimbabwe's own social welfare ministry. More than 63 percent of the rural population, and 53 percent of the urban population, couldn't meet "basic food and non-food requirements" in 2003, the last year for which figures were available, and things have gotten far worse since. Malnutrition among children is up 35 percent, people without access to health care is up 35 percent, H.I.V./AIDS afflicts 18.1 percent of the population, unemployment is over 70 percent, life expectancy is down to 36.

DOJ_NMG_0105198

Mr. Mugabe's government blames sanctions, weather, former colonial rule, market conditions. Yet the real culprit is Mr. Mugabe, who has run Zimbabwe since 1980. Now 82, the president is a master at the blame game, accusing the West of colonialism and racism when it criticizes his scheme to redistribute white-owned commercial farms among blacks, or the cruel expulsion of 750,000 slum dwellers from cities, or whatever else he does.

There's not much the West can do; more sanctions would only bring more suffering. But Africans could make a difference, if they joined in condemning Mr. Mugabe. For understandable reasons, African leaders have been reluctant to publicly criticize fellow Africans. But as Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, declared yesterday, "human rights are perhaps more in need of protection in Africa than in any other continent."

The suffering Zimbabwean people are in desperate need of protection, the sooner the better.

Putting Remittances To Work (WP)

By Marcela Sanchez

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

El Salvador has become the first lower-middle-income country to secure a grant from the Millennium Challenge Corp., President Bush's foreign aid program designed to assist well-governed developing nations. With the $461 million grant, the agency is set to join Salvadoran immigrants in sending money south.

The grant might seem small relative to the $2.8 billion in remittances sent by immigrants last year, particularly since it will be spread over five years. But that doesn't mean Salvadorans in the United States don't have some suggestions for the Millennium Corp. and a hope that the program can help them change the way remittances affect their country.

Salvadoran immigrants are frustrated that their cash isn't reaping more development rewards back home. Although remittances have proved to be a lifeline for thousands of families in extreme poverty, immigrant Salvadorans fear that the money is creating a culture of dependency in the home country.

Carlos Castro, a Salvadoran community leader and owner of a Hispanic specialty supermarket in Northern Virginia, is dismayed that El Salvador now has to import workers from other Central American countries because some Salvadorans don't see a need to work and rely instead on monthly checks from relatives abroad. He further laments the consumerism that has Salvadoran immigrants working hard at tough jobs to pay for "a pair of the latest name-brand shoes" demanded by their kids back in El Salvador.

Salvadoran officials heard similar complaints of consumerism and dependency in meetings with Salvadorans across the United States as part of the consultation process to gain public support for their Millennium proposal. According to their records, there was a general sense that "it is time to put an end to that paternalistic mentality" and that their support should generate work, not just money to spend.

In other words, remittances are "neither 'manna from heaven' nor a substitute for sound development policies," a recently released World Bank report concluded. In "Close to Home: The Development Impact of Remittances in Latin America," the World Bank found that if aid flows are consumed rather than invested, they have no impact on economic growth. This is certainly true for El Salvador -- it is the largest per capita recipient of remittances in Central America and has had the region's lowest economic growth for at least four years.

To reverse this trend, governments in recipient countries should, according to the World Bank, provide incentives for investment and promote the development of human capital. The Millennium plan for El Salvador appears to follow this model, aiming to increase incomes in El Salvador's lagging northern zone -- the area of origin for most Salvadorans in this country -- through a combination of investments in education, public services, enterprise development and transportation infrastructure.

What's missing in this equation, say some critics, is a direct connection between the new development plan and the current flow of help. This seems to be a serious oversight and opportunity missed. The $461 million grant will have an effect, to be sure, but imagine the impact if the Millennium Corp. could help leverage the billions sent annually from immigrants in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0105199

According to Manuel Orozco, a remittance expert for the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington-based think tank, the Millennium-sponsored plan might have created investment portfolios for small-scale projects back home that immigrants could contribute to.

To a small degree, this investment has already begun. Such collective or community initiatives, organized through hometown associations, are investing about $3 million annually, mostly in educational and health projects.

Yet some members of hometown associations suspect that Salvadoran officials intentionally locked them out of the Millennium plan. Jaime PeÃ±ate of Comunidades, which represents hometown associations formed by Salvadoran immigrants living in the Los Angeles area, said he was among the dozens invited by the Salvadoran government to hear about the Millennium effort. But then he discovered that other Salvadoran officials were meeting in another room with big investors.

Nevertheless, some Salvadorans here aren't giving up on trying to tap Millennium funds. Luis Felipe Romero, executive director of Comunidades Unidas SalvadoreÃ±as, the Washington area's equivalent of PeÃ±ate's L.A. group, said he reached out to the Salvadoran Foreign Ministry with a proposal to use some Millennium funding to launch a pilot program and is awaiting an answer. "We are going to continue working for El Salvador," he said. "If they take advantage of the opportunity to work with us we will welcome it."

Words Fail Them (NYT)

By Jean-Benoit Nadeau, Julie Barlow

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

STEPHEN HARPER, the prime minister of Canada, stunned the country last month when he proposed a resolution recognizing that the seven million "Québécois form a nation within a united Canada." Anyone who has traveled to Montreal or Quebec City will recognize that Mr. Harper was merely stating the obvious, at least where the term "nation" is concerned. But for Canadians, Mr. Harper's words reopened a long, tortured debate over national identity, and recast it in stronger terms than ever.

The background to his declaration is, of course, Quebec's secessionist movement — strong enough to have monopolized Canadian politics for the last 50 years, but not quite strong enough to actually win a referendum on independence. The struggle has largely been a war of words.

Since the 1940s, Canadians have been looking for the right word — some say formula — to answer the question: "What does Quebec want?" For the last 20 years, the thinking has been to give Quebec some kind of recognition.

In 1990, many believed the Meech Lake accord held the answer to this riddle. Promising constitutional protection for Quebec's efforts to preserve its French language and culture, the accord was an attempt to re-integrate Quebec into the constitutional family (although Canada's Constitution was repatriated from Britain in 1982, making Canada a fully independent country, Quebec has still not signed it). The accord, however, got stuck when a debate started over the significance of two words, "distinct society," a phrase intended to satisfy Quebecers' desire for recognition without alienating everyone else.

When a significant segment of the Canadian population disapproved of the accord, arguing that it gave French Canadians too much power, some provincial governments refused to ratify it, and Canada nearly broke up. In 1995, the separatist Parti Québécois, which controlled Quebec at the time, came up with its own solution: a provincial referendum on separation based on perhaps the wordiest — and most ambiguous — question ever formulated. Separatists lost the vote by only a narrow margin.

In 2000, the national Liberal government rebounded with the Clarity Act, which it thought was a foolproof formula to prevent separatists from taking advantage of an ambiguously worded question to win an independence referendum.

But now, Stephen Harper has created new ambiguity in the question — all the more interesting since he probably thought he was clarifying things. And he was so hasty in pulling this rabbit out of his hat that he didn't even consult his minister of intergovernmental affairs, who later resigned over the issue. Yet Parliament voted resoundingly in favor of his resolution.

This suddenness had a lot more to do with political maneuvering than an awakening to Quebec's aspirations for statehood. Mr. Harper, a Conservative, saw a good opportunity to steal some thunder from the separatist parties and to increase his popularity in Quebec — much reduced by his opposition to same-sex marriage, his refusal to respect the Kyoto accord and his support for Israel during the war in Lebanon last summer.

DOJ_NMG_0105200

Since the “nation” declaration, politicians and columnists have been dissecting and debating the word, and they probably will for decades to come, since French Canadians tend to see Canada as a country made up of two nations, while the English tend to think that “country” and “nation” are one and the same. Mr. Harper used the French term Québécois rather than Quebecer in the English version of the resolution, and everyone is puzzled by the choice and hesitant about its possible implications.

Some critics wonder if the federal government has unwittingly created a new ethnic category. Others point out that if the Scots or the Catalans can be called a nation within Britain or Spain, why not the people of Quebec?

Meanwhile, the Quebec government, led by the very federalist (that is, anti-separatist) Jean Charest, maintains that the territory of Quebec (not Quebecers) constitutes a nation, thereby refusing to associate “nation” with ethnicity. Tribunals, politicians and voters will be called on many times to answer these questions.

Nonetheless, as people living in Quebec, we feel that Mr. Harper has come up with a promising formulation. Most people in Quebec, apart from hard-line separatists, will probably be satisfied by the word nation.

And English Canadians ought to be, too, despite their resistance to the idea that Canada has two founding cultures. The problem is, ever since 1990 English Canadians have been traumatized by the failed attempts to make the Constitution acceptable to Quebec, so they are hesitating, as polls show.

Stephen Harper has created either a new basis for talks about Quebec’s status or contributed a new weapon to a nastier debate. No one has quite figured out which it will be.

DOJ_NMG_0105201

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Former Detainees Argue For Right To Sue Rumsfeld Over Torture (NYT) ... 3
The Oval Intervention (NYT) ... 3
Judge Weighs Torture Claim Vs. Rumsfeld (AP) ... 4
Ex-detainees Seek Right To Sue Rumsfeld In Abuse Case (LAT) ... 5
Court Mulls Torture Lawsuit As Rumsfeld Bids Farewell (NSDY) ... 6

Homeland Response:

Illinois Man Charged With Plot To Wage "Jihad" In Mall (WP) ... 7
Rockford Man Charged In Alleged Terror Plot (CHIT) ... 8
Feds: Man Planned To Blow Up Chicago Mall (AP) ... 8
Feds Arrest Man On Terrorism-related Charges (CHIST) ... 9
Mall Bomb Suspect Wanted To Warn 'Disbelievers,' FBI Says (AP) ... 10
Local Officials Feel Left Out Of Information Loop (ROCKRS) ... 10
Traveler Data Program Defied Ban, Critics Say (WP) ... 11
FEMA Ordered To Restart Katrina Payments (AP) ... 12

War News:

Iraq Strategy Talks Focusing On Three Main Options (WP) ... 13
With 3 Iraq Reports To Come, Bush Plans Week Of Scrutiny (NYT) ... 14
Bush Plans "Policy Adjustments" In Iraq (LAT) ... 15
Bush Targets Iraq Policy Change By Christmas (AFP) ... 17
U.S. Urged To Engage Shiite Clerics (AP) ... 17
Kurds Brand Report "Unrealistic" (BBC) ... 19
A Family's Candid Friend (FT) ... 19
A Father's Tears (WSJ) ... 20
U.S. And Iraqi Accounts Vary Concerning Airstrike That Kills At Least 20 (NYT) ... 21
U.S.-Led Forces Kill 20 Insurgents In Iraq (WP) ... 23
Iraqis Allege Civilians Killed In Raids (AP) ... 24
Al-Zarqawi Said Shiites Most Dangerous (AP) ... 25
Iraq Sunni Clerics To Boycott Reconciliation Talks (AFP) ... 26
US, Iraqi Forces Detain Aide Of Shiite Radical Leader (AFP) ... 26
GOP Senator Calls Iraq Policy "Absurd," Urges Pullout (WP) ... 26
Car Bomb Kills Five Near Iraq Shiite Shrine (AFP) ... 27
Tribal Leaders Detained In Southern Iraqi City (LAT) ... 27
How Syria May Hold Key To Iraq (WSJ) ... 28
Rice Wary Of Seeking Iran, Syria's Help (AP) ... 30
Watchdog Agency For Iraq Projects Survives (NYT) ... 31
Iraqis Near Deal On Distribution Of Oil Revenues (NYT) ... 31
Iraq Bribe Prosecutors Criticised As "lazy" (FT) ... 33
Iraqis Line Up To Put Hussein In The Noose (NYT) ... 33
Afghanistan War Nears "Tipping Point" (LAT) ... 35

Corporate Scandals:

Senate Passes Bill To Criminalize Pretexting (NYT) ... 37
H-P Agrees To Fund Future Pretexting Probes (WSJ) ... 38
HP Investors Unmoved By Spying Suit Deal (WP/AP) ... 40
Cos Seek Federal Privacy Law;Privacy Groups See It As Weak (WSJ/DJ) ... 41
Setbacks Hit Plaintiffs In Two Securities Cases (WSJ) ... 41
Regulation Loosening The Ties That Bind Wall Street (WSJ) ... 42
Specter Bill Would Ban Waiver On Attorney-client Privileges (PPG) ... 43
Regulation Loosening The Ties That Bind Wall Street (WSJ) ... 43
Possible Leak To Lobbyists Gets Attention Of The SEC (WP) ... 44

Criminal Law:

Police Chief's Letter To Polygamist Leader: I Love You (AP) ... 44
Anderson Indicted On Seven Counts (ANCHDN) ... 45
U.S. Indicts Alaska Lawmaker In Bribery (WT) ... 47
McGuire Defends Her Husband (ANCHDN) ... 47
Federal Jury Convicts Ex-Teamsters Leader (HC) ... 48
Child Porn Site Host Guilty (CLARKSLC) ... 48
Clarksville Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges (AP) ... 49
Senator: Illegal Images Must Be Reported (CNET) ... 49

Civil Rights:

Osceola Poised To Accept Order On Voting Districts (ORS) ... 51
Jury Ruling Favors Ex-DEA Agent In Bias Suit (MH) ... 51

Antitrust:

Commissioner Cleared To Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal (AP) ... 52
Another Flight Delay (WSJ) ... 53

Environment:

House OKs Bill To Drill Off Florida (SFC) ... 54
Sickened By Fresh Produce (NYT) ... 55

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mafia Takedowns Win Italian Chief FBI Honors (AP) ... 55
GRAZIE TO ITALIAN 'PIZZA' COP (NYPOST) ... 56
Commute This Sentence (WP) ... 56

Tax:

Actor Pleads Not Guilty In Tax Fraud Case (NYT) 56
Wesley Snipes In Florida Court In Tax Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP) 57

Congress-Administration:

Bush Tanks On War (NYDN) 57
The Vanishing Veep (USNEWS) 58
Rumsfeld Discusses Successes, Failures (WP) 58
Rumsfeld's Farewell Speech (WP) 59
Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (WP) 71
Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (NYT) 73
The Rumsfeld Show's Finale A Classic, By Golly (LAT) 74
Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (AP) 75
Rumsfeld Warns Against Precipitous US Withdrawal From Iraq (AFP) 76
A Still-Serving Rumsfeld Is Set For Mustering Out (NYT) 76
House Winds Down Session By Approving Tax-Cut And Trade Bills (WSJ) 78
Republicans Push Tax Bill Through House (AP) 79
Congress Close To Approving Tax Package (WP) 80
House And Senate Pass Tax And Trade Bill (LAT) 81
As 109th Congress Expires, Jockeying Starts For 110th (NYT) . 83
Gregg Rips GOP For "Hypocrisy" Over Tax Bill Maneuver (RC) 84
Democrats Thwart Congressional Raise (DMN) 84
Incoming Democrats Face Fiscal Minefield (BOS) 85
Sentiment And Jokes At Farewells In The House (NYT) 87
Committee Says GOP Left Foley Unchecked (WP) 88
Ethics Panel Faults GOP Leaders In Foley Case (LAT) 90
Report Finds Negligence In Foley Case (NYT) 91
Foley Report Harshly Criticizes Hastert, Staff (RC) 92
Panel: Republicans Negligent But Broke No Rules In Foley Case (CHIT) 94
The Buck Just Stops (WP) 95
Desperately Seeking Ethics (NYT) 96
Senators To Gather In Closed Meeting (WP) 96
Bipartisan Caucus Proposal Raises Questions About Barring Press (RC) 97
New Senate Schedules Closed Meeting (AP) 97
Filner Captures Veterans' Affairs Gavel (RC) 98
McKinney's Parting Shot: Bill To Impeach Bush (AP) 99
Billions Later, Plan To Remake The Coast Guard Fleet Stumbles (NYT) 99
Federal Budget Tricky Checks And Balances (WSJ) 103
Jobs Data Keep Economic Optimists Smiling (WSJ) 104
Labor Pool Increases, Boosting Joblessness (WP) 104
US Jobs Data Support Bernanke's Optimism (FT) 105
As Oil Stays High, Stocks Can't Get Going (WSJ) 106
The Accidental Inflation Hawk (WSJ) 107
FDA Panel Seeks Warning That Stents May Be Unsafe (WP) . 108
How Doctors Are Rethinking Drug-Coated Stents (WSJ) 109
Panel Urges Caution Concerning Coated Stents (NYT) 111
NIH Scientist Pleads Guilty In Accepting $285,000 From Pfizer (WP) 112
NASA Official Questions Agency's Focus On The Shuttle (NYT)112
Back To The Moon, Permanently (NYT) 113
Mans Stabs Himself In Front Of Longworth, Forces Temporary Shutdown Of Union Station Area (RC) 114
SMU Wins Court Decision Involving Land For Bush Library (AP)114
Bush's Dog Barney Is Back With New Video (AP) 115
Ignore And Appoint (LAT) 115

Other News:

Despite Probe, A Close Race (WP) 116
Romney's Gay Rights Stance Draws Ire (NYT) 117
The Rascals On The Right (NYT) 118
G.O.P. Draws Fire On Senate Race Spending (NYT) 119
Issues Overshadowed By "Distractions," Allen Says (WP) 119
Sekula-Gibbs Has Much To Say (HC) 121
Americans Back Price Negotiations On Medicare Drugs (WP). 122
Jeane Kirkpatrick, Reagan's Forceful Envoy, Dies (NYT) 122
Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, 1926-2006: U.N. Ambassador Upheld Reagan Doctrine (WP) 125
Former U.N. Ambassador Kirkpatrick Dies (AP) 126
Jeane Kirkpatrick (WSJ) 127
The Party Of "Nyet" (WP) 128
The Bloomberg Diet (WSJ) 128
Uploading American Politics (WP) 129
Anti-Americans On The March (WSJ) 130
Rice: 'Freedom Deficit' Harming Mideast (AP) 133
Israeli FM Rejects Linking Palestinian Conflict To Wider Mideast Crises (AFP) 134
Europeans Limit Scope Of Iran Nuclear Resolution (NYT) 135
Fresh Drive For Sanctions On Iran (FT) 135
U.S. Hints Iran Sanctions Deal Is Near (AP) 136
Europeans Circulate Revised Iran Draft (AP) 136
Council Given New Draft Over Iran (BBC) 137
Lebanese Premier Lashes Out At Hezbollah Leader (NYT) 138
Saniora Accuses Nasrallah Of Coup Threat (AP) 138
Six-Party Negotiations On N. Korea To Resume (WP) 139
Officials Hail U.S.-India Nuke Fuel Deal (AP) 140
Congress Nears Approval Of Nuclear Deal For India (WSJ) 141
House Passes Deal With India On Sale Of Nuclear Reactors (NYT) 142
Congress OKs Nuclear Pact With India (LAT) 142
US-India Near End Of Nuclear Freeze (FT) 144
Indian Finance Official Expects Pickup In Growth (WSJ) 144
US House Backs Trade With Vietnam (BBC) 145
China, Shy Giant, Shows Signs Of Shedding Its False Modesty (NYT) 145
Taiwan Opposition Party Shows Strength In 2 Largest Cities (NYT) 147
Chávez Win Bolsters Cuba Succession Hopes (FT) 148
Federal Raid On Offices In Troubled Mexican State (NYT) 148
Russian Billionaire's Bitter Feud With Putin A Plot Line In Poisoning (WP) 149
Litvinenko Police Delay Moscow Interview (FT) 150
In The Polonium Poison Mystery, An Odd Italian Footnote (NYT)151
Hotel Bar May Be Site Of Ex-spy's Poisoning (LAT) 152

DOJ_NMG_0105203

For New U.N. Chief, A Past Misstep Leads To Opportunity (NYT) 154
Annan Decries Failure To Halt Darfur Killings (WP) 155
U.N. Chief Sees Little Progress On Rights (LAT) 156
The Agonies Of Zimbabwe (NYT) 157
Putting Remittances To Work (WP) 157
Words Fail Them (NYT) 158

TERRORISM NEWS:

Former Detainees Argue For Right To Sue Rumsfeld Over Torture (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Lawyers for former detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan argued in federal court on Friday that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was personally responsible, and thus legally liable, for acts of torture inflicted on their clients by American military interrogators.

The nine plaintiffs, Iraqi and Afghan men held at American-run prisons, endured an array of physical and psychological abuse during their confinements in 2003 and 2004, including beatings, mock executions and painful physical restraints, their lawyers said in court papers. All were eventually released without being charged with crimes.

The hearing Friday, before Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan in Federal District Court in Washington, was the first time a federal court had considered whether top administration officials could be liable for the torture of detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But the hearing concerned only questions of jurisdiction and did not delve into whether Mr. Rumsfeld, because he personally approved certain interrogation techniques in 2002 like the use of "stress positions," was legally responsible for specific acts of torture committed in overseas military prisons.

Instead, lawyers from each side argued over whether noncitizens confined in prisons outside the United States had legal standing to sue Mr. Rumsfeld and other American military officials for constitutional violations.

The suit, filed on behalf of the nine plaintiffs last year by the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First, also names as defendants three officials responsible for running military prisons in Iraq and Afghanistan: Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the former top commander in Iraq; Col. Thomas M. Pappas, who was the top military intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, the American-run prison in Iraq; and a former brigadier general, Col. Janis L. Karpinski, who before her demotion to colonel was the military police commander at Abu Ghraib. She was relieved of her command and demoted after abuses at Abu Ghraib came to light.

During the two-and-a-half-hour hearing, Judge Hogan took turns questioning the lawyers. He repeatedly asked lawyers for the former detainees to cite precedents in law that would allow foreigners to sue American officials for what in the United States would be violations of their civil rights.

"How can this work, this theory that nonresident aliens have a right to sue to prevent being tortured?" Judge Hogan asked Lucas Guttentag, the plaintiffs' lead lawyer in the case. What would prevent Osama bin Laden, the judge asked Mr. Guttentag, from taking President Bush to court for authorizing the military to kill him?

Mr. Guttentag, citing several Supreme Court decisions, said that American laws prohibiting torture should apply to foreign civilians under exclusively American control and jurisdiction overseas. He also noted that in Iraq, American military personnel were immune from prosecution under Iraqi laws. "Iraqi law cannot govern, and unless the United States does, nothing else applies."

Rick Beckner, a deputy assistant attorney general representing Mr. Rumsfeld, argued that foreigners held in an American-run prison in foreign territory had no legal standing to sue. "There's never been any finding that the Constitution applies to these plaintiffs," he told Judge Hogan.

Judge Hogan, clearly skeptical of the plaintiffs' attempt to open federal officials to legal liability for actions by troops overseas, said he hoped to make a decision quickly to dismiss the case or allow some or all claims to proceed.

But in his closing remarks, the judge also acknowledged being disturbed by the allegations of detainee abuse and torture. "It is unfortunate, to say the least, that there has to be an argument" about whether the American military tortures foreign citizens.

The Oval Intervention (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

DOJ_NMG_0105204

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

It is not a happy mood in the Oval Office.

Poppy is sobbing, his face in his hands, slumped in one of the yellow-and-blue striped chairs. Laura is screaming the words "Oscar de la Renta" and "rendition" into her cellphone, still seeing red after showing up at a White House gala in the same $8,400 red gown as three other women who did not happen to be first lady.

Bob Gates is grim-faced, but not as grim-faced as Barbara, whose look could freeze not only the Potomac but the Tigris and the Euphrates. Scowcroft is over on the couch, trying to nap while Kissinger drones softly in his ear.

And, of course, there is the Deprogrammer for the Decider, James Baker, perfectly suited in bright green tie and suited perfectly for his spot behind the president's desk.

The Council of Elders had hoped this Apocalypto moment wouldn't be necessary. They had assumed that the scorching Iraq Study Group report would have the same effect on Junior as the bucket of cold water that Mr. Baker's strict father, a lawyer known as "the Warden," used to throw on his face to wake him up as a boy.

But Junior is trying to wriggle away completely, offering a decidedly cool response to the attempt to yank him into the reality-based community. He rallied his last two allies — his English poodle and his Scottish terrier, Blair and Barney.

He is loath to give up his gunslinger pose to go all diplo. He cleaves to the neocon complaint that it is the realists who are now being unrealistic, thinking the administration can bargain with Syria and Iran, or that the Army can train Iraqi security forces (or, as they are known there, death squads) in a matter of months when they haven't been able to do it in years.

The Velvet Hammer is undeterred. He's doing an all-out intervention, locking Junior and Barney in the little study next to the Oval. To stress the seriousness of the situation, they don't give the president his feather pillow.

The group gathers at the door of the study. "My boy," his dad tells him between sobs. "We love you. We're here for you. We're worried about you. You're not just hurting yourself, you're hurting others. This is a safe place. No one's judging you ..."

"What are you talking about, Dad?" Junior snaps. "I just actually read 96 pages of your friends' judging me in that cowpie report." Barney woofs in support.

Barbara can be heard muttering from across the room. "We were right about Jebbie."

Henry the K lumbers up to the door and in a low Teutonic rumble says: "It's time we stopped taking care of you and started caring about you. Would you like a peanut butter and jelly sandwich?"

Junior is getting even more furious. "You all think you're so realist. But you're unrealist. I'm realist. Are you sitting at my desk, Baker? Get out of there! Everyone says you're so Mr. Ride to the Rescue, but none of your surrender monkey ideas would work. Talk about Pretend Land — Israel giving up the Golan Heights? Yeah, right. And they call me delusional."

Baker glides up to the door and says, in his most satiny drawl, "Son, I just threw a few D.O.A. ones in there for you to reject so you could preserve your manhood."

There are sounds of feet stomping. "You say I can't stay the course but I can too stay the course!" Junior yells. "I can! I can! You say I have to put the two trillion dollar war cost in the budget, but I don't! You say we have to cuddle up to evildoers in Iran and Syria. Why do you hate the troops? Where's Condi? I want my Condi!"

Realizing the president is getting hysterical, the group looks at Laura, hoping she can calm him down.

She approaches the door and coos in a soft voice: "Bushie? Listen, now, this is important. How do you get someone audited? Can't we send Oscar de la Loser to Gitmo?"

Baker gently nudges Laura aside. "Now son, hear me out. We've disabled your enablers. Rummy has written his last self-serving memo. Dick's got his hands full explaining his darlin' new grandchild's Two Mommies. Don't bother calling for Condi. She's at the bottom of Foggy Bottom. You've got to know when to hold 'em, know when to fold 'em."

It's not sinking in. "We must achieve our objective," Junior sputters. "Our objective is success. To succeed we must have success. If we don't win, we lose. We are the winners. We can't let the ... we're in an ideological struggle and that's why we have a strategy ... AL QAEDA! We must help democracy in Iraq succeed because ... ISLAMOFASCISTS! ... that is the objective of a successful ..."

Barney scratches at the door, trying to cut and run.

Judge Weighs Torture Claim Vs. Rumsfeld (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo,

AP, December 9, 2006

A federal judge on Friday appeared reluctant to give Donald H. Rumsfeld immunity from torture allegations, yet said it would be unprecedented to let the departing defense secretary face a civil trial.

"What you're asking for has never been done before," U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan told lawyers for the American Civil Liberties Union.

The group is suing on behalf of nine former prisoners in Iraq and Afghanistan. The lawsuit contends the men were beaten, suspended upside down from the ceiling by chains, urinated on, shocked, sexually humiliated, burned, locked inside boxes and subjected to mock executions.

If the suit were to go forward, it could force Rumsfeld and the Pentagon to disclose what officials knew about abuses at prisons such as Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and what was done to stop it.

Rumsfeld, who leaves the Defense Department on Dec. 18, told Pentagon employees and reporters Friday that the day he learned about abuses at Abu Ghraib was his worst day in office.

"I remember being stunned by the news of the abuse at Abu Ghraib," Rumsfeld said. "And then watching so many determined people spend so many months trying to figure out exactly how in the world something like that could have happened, and how to make it right."

Lawyers for the ACLU and Human Rights First, however, argue that Rumsfeld and top military officials disregarded warnings about the abuse and authorized the use of illegal interrogation tactics that violated the constitutional rights of prisoners.

Foreigners outside the United States are not normally afforded the same protections as U.S. citizens, and Hogan said he was wary about extending the Constitution across the globe.

Doing so, he said, might subject government officials to all sorts of political suits. Osama bin Laden could sue, Hogan said, claiming two American presidents threatened to have him murdered.

"How do you control that?" Hogan asked. "Where does it stop? Does it stop at the secretary of defense? Does it stop at the president? How does this work?"

The Justice Department argues that is exactly why government officials generally are immune from suits related to their jobs. By allowing the case to proceed, Hogan would make all future military operations subject to second-guessing by the courts, the government contends.

"We cannot have courts interfering with core military functions," Deputy Assistant Attorney General C. Frederick Beckner III said.

Hogan questioned the scope of that immunity. He said freedom from torture is a basic right accepted by the United States and all civilized nations.

"Would you take the same policy if the argument was one of genocide?" Hogan asked. "Are you saying there could be no inquiry done?"

Beckner said abuse claims should be handled by the military, which has prosecuted more than 100 such cases. In his farewell speech Friday, Rumsfeld said such prosecutions demonstrated "how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing."

Lawyers for the civil rights groups, which have criticized the military's prosecution record, said the government is trying to operate a "rights-free" zone overseas.

"The defendants had a duty to deter and punish acts of torture and they did 180 degrees opposite of that: They encouraged and directed that torture," lawyer Paul Hoffman said.

Hogan said torture is a crime against mankind, but he did not see how the Constitution applied to foreigners held in overseas military prisons.

Hogan said he would rule quickly on whether to dismiss the case; he did not make a decision Friday.

The other officials named in the suit are: retired Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, former Brig. Gen. Janis L. Karpinski and Col. Thomas M. Pappas.

Karpinski, whose Army Reserve unit was in charge of the Abu Ghraib prison, was demoted last year and is the highest-ranking officer punished in the scandal. Sanchez, who commanded U.S. forces in Iraq, retired from the Army last month, calling his career a casualty of the prison scandal.

Pappas, the former top-ranking intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, was granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for testimony about the abuse.

Ex-detainees Seek Right To Sue Rumsfeld In Abuse Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — The debate over abuses in U.S. military prisons in Iraq and Afghanistan flared again Friday, with nine former detainees seeking the right to sue outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and three senior Army leaders for alleged torture.

In U.S. District Court, lawyers for Iraqi and Afghan civilians said that Rumsfeld and the officers, two of whom have retired, violated U.S. and international law and should be held personally responsible for the abuse they say their clients suffered.

The suit is believed to be the first to try to hold U.S. officials accountable for the abuse at prisons. The scandal triggered worldwide outcry and forced an overhaul of U.S. interrogation rules.

U.S. District Judge Thomas F. Hogan indicated he was sympathetic to the former detainees' plight, but he questioned whether they had the right under the U.S. Constitution to sue.

"It's unfortunate, to say the least, that there has to be an argument that U.S. military officials tortured citizens of another country," Hogan said. "That being said, there is substantial difficulty in recognizing claims of noncitizens held in other countries."

The ex-prisoners said in the suit that they were beaten to the point of unconsciousness, mutilated, stabbed and urinated on, and endured mock executions, among other abuses.

They were among the thousands of prisoners held by the U.S. military at Abu Ghraib and other locations in Iraq and Afghanistan, including detention facilities in Kandahar and Bagram.

They asked the court to award unspecified monetary damages and to declare their treatment illegal.

Government lawyers argued that the suit should be dismissed because Rumsfeld was immune from being sued for acting within the course of his official duties. (Rumsfeld has resigned; he gave his farewell speech to Pentagon employees Friday.) The lawyers also said the suit would expand foreign citizens' rights to file lawsuits in U.S. courts far beyond what the Supreme Court has allowed.

The judge himself cited the case of Johnson vs. Eisentrager, decided by the Supreme Court in 1950, which held that enemy aliens being held by military authorities outside the U.S. had no rights under the U.S. Constitution to challenge their detention in civilian court.

"Given Eisentrager, I don't see how the 5th Amendment extends to these individuals," Hogan told an ACLU lawyer, referring to the constitutional right to due process.

Hogan said he was concerned that this suit would open the door to foreigners to file all kinds of lawsuits. "Where does it stop?" he asked.

Lucas Guttentag of the American Civil Liberties Union, lead counsel for the ex-detainees, responded that the case was special because of the United States' unequivocal prohibition on torture and because of an extensive paper trail showing that Rumsfeld and the senior Army officials knew or should have known their policies were leading to torture.

He also said U.S. officials should be held responsible because Iraqi law had been suspended after the U.S. invasion. If officials cannot be held responsible under U.S. law for their actions, he said, the detainees have no legal recourse.

"You have a rights-free zone," Guttentag said. "There is nothing that applies."

"You agree what you're asking for has never been decided by a court before?" Hogan said. Guttentag responded that there had never been allegations of such abuse before either.

The suit alleges not only constitutional violations but also violations of the Geneva Convention's ban on torture.

Hogan questioned whether individuals had the right to sue for violations of their rights under the treaty. He expressed concern that such an interpretation would allow "individuals around the world to sue here in the U.S." for a range of injuries not limited to torture.

Hogan asked the lawyers for Rumsfeld and the other officials whether the immunity they sought was absolute. "Would you take the same position if the claim was one of genocide?" he asked C. Frederick Beckner III, a deputy assistant attorney general.

Beckner acknowledged the seriousness of torture and genocide but said that allowing suits by victims of either one would have the effect of disrupting and "potentially chilling" the military's ability to conduct wartime operations.

He said the military took abuse claims seriously and had prosecuted more than 100 misconduct cases.

Besides Rumsfeld, the suit names as defendants retired Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the one-time commander of U.S. forces in Iraq; former Army Reserve Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, the commander of military police at Abu Ghraib, who was demoted to colonel before retiring; and Col. Thomas M. Pappas, the officer in charge of military intelligence at Abu Ghraib.

Court Mulls Torture Lawsuit As Rumsfeld Bids Farewell (NSDY)

By Tom Brune, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld bid farewell at a Pentagon town hall meeting Friday, human rights attorneys argued in a D.C. federal court that he and three senior Army officers should be held personally responsible for the alleged torture of Afghani and Iraqi detainees.

In a hearing before D.C. District Court Chief Judge Thomas Hogan, attorneys from the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First argued their suit should go forward because records show Rumsfeld tacitly approved of the abuse and didn't try to stop it when he learned it was going on.

DOJ_NMG_0105207

Justice Department attorneys argued for dismissal, saying public officials are immune from such lawsuits, the case would extend U.S. constitutional rights to foreigners, and courts usually defer to the executive on wartime issues.

Hogan questioned both sides about the limits of their positions and arguments.

He told the human rights lawyers their request had never been made before, and asked where it would lead -- to a lawsuit by Osama bin Laden?

And he questioned the scope of the immunity for Rumsfeld. "Would you take the same policy if the argument was one of genocide?" the judge asked. He said he would rule quickly.

For Rumsfeld, a week before he officially leaves, the well-documented abuse was on his mind. "Clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib," he said in response to a question.

Yet after photos of the abuse were disclosed, he said the department "demonstrated to the world how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing."

Lawyers filed a brief that said reported abuse resulted in more than 10 courts-martial, seven of them for Abu Ghraib.

But the ACLU's Lucas Guttentag said, "There must be legal accountability in a court of law for high-ranking government officials who order or allow torture."

The lawsuit, filed in March 2005, seeks damages for five Iraqis and four Afghanis detained and released without charges from 2002 to 2004. The suit says they suffered beatings, sexual humiliation, sleep and sensory deprivation, mock executions and death threats.

In addition to Rumsfeld, the lawsuit names retired Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, former Brig. Gen. Janis L. Karpinski and Col. Thomas M. Pappas.

The lawsuit's biggest hurdle is to show that they knowingly violated laws against torture.

"The question is whether he was pushing the envelope or breaking it," said Hofstra law professor Eric Freedman.

This story was supplemented with Associated Press reports.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Illinois Man Charged With Plot To Wage "Jihad" In Mall (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

An Illinois man was charged yesterday with planning to set off hand grenades in a shopping mall during the holiday rush, part of a professed desire to wage "violent jihad" on U.S. targets, according to a federal criminal complaint filed in Chicago.

Derrick Shareef, 22, was arrested Wednesday in Rockford, Ill., about 90 miles west of Chicago, after meeting with an undercover federal agent in a store parking lot and trading a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades, a handgun and bullets, according to an FBI affidavit.

Shareef -- a U.S. citizen who converted to Islam several years ago -- allegedly prepared for an attack on Rockford's CherryVale Mall by making a "martyrdom" videotape in which he declared that "the time for jihad is now" and that he was "ready to give my life" in the mission.

Authorities said Shareef has no apparent ties to any terrorist group and is believed to have been acting alone. He was charged with attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

The case is the latest terrorism-related sting involving undercover FBI informants and agents to become public. Some of those involved have played active roles in guiding the direction of the cases.

In Shareef's case, for example, the investigation began after an informant told the FBI in September that Shareef had talked about his desire to wage "violent jihad" on U.S. targets. It was the FBI informant who suggested that it might be better to "hit the mall" as a target, after a conversation in which Shareef focused on attacking government buildings instead, according to the affidavit.

Civil liberties advocates and some lawmakers have raised questions about FBI tactics in such cases, including the prosecution of an alleged terror cell in Miami whose members said they wanted to blow up the Sears Tower in Chicago but had no apparent means to do so.

But Daniel L. Byman, director of the Security Studies Program at Georgetown University, said a case like Shareef's "can actually be seen as effective counterterrorism."

"This is a good-news, good-news story: It shows the low capabilities of domestic jihadists and that the FBI appears to be on top of it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105208

The FBI's affidavit alleges that Shareef decided to carry out the attack during the holiday shopping period because crowds would be larger and to place grenades in garbage cans to maximize injuries from shrapnel. Shareef had also considered attacks on synagogues, a city hall and courthouses, saying at one point that he wanted to "smoke a judge," according to tape-recorded conversations recounted by the FBI.

The FBI recorded Shareef's conversations and trailed him as he accompanied the informant on scouting trips through the CherryVale mall. Shareef was arrested Wednesday after he took possession of a lockbox containing the grenades and a 9mm pistol, the affidavit says.

The grenades and ammunition were not operative, and the public was never in any serious danger, officials said. "While these are very serious charges, at no time was the public in any imminent peril as a result of the defendant's activities," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a news release.

Rockford Man Charged In Alleged Terror Plot (CHIT)

By Rudolph Bush And Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, December 9, 2006

Video: Terror plot arrest

A 22-year-old man's alleged plot to stage a deadly terrorist attack in Rockford days before Christmas was marked by violent intentions but no chance of success, according to federal charges released Friday.

A Muslim convert intent on "jihad," Derrick Shareef plotted to use hand grenades and a pistol to kill shoppers at the CherryVale Shopping Center outside of Rockford, authorities charged.

But federal agents and an undercover informant followed him from the plot's outset, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald said Friday. Authorities didn't specify how they originally learned of Shareef.

Many elements of Shareef's alleged plot, including the idea to attack the mall, came from the informant, according to the charges.

Shareef acted alone, and the public was never in any danger, authorities said.

Throughout the plot, he never had any weapons or the money to obtain them, Fitzgerald said.

But he did have violent intent, authorities said.

In a recorded conversation with the informant on Nov. 29, Shareef discussed attacking a courthouse in DeKalb County, according to the complaint.

"I just want to smoke a judge," he allegedly said.

The next day, the informant suggested the mall become the target.

"I mean, all right, we gotta look at it this way, we want to disrupt Christmas," the informant is quoted as saying in the criminal complaint.

Shareef allegedly responded: "Oh hell yeah, the mall is where it's at."

Throughout the plot, Shareef was recorded spewing hatred for Jewish people and the American justice system, authorities allege.

His plan reached its apex when he tried to trade an undercover federal agent a set of stereo speakers for grenades to attack the mall, authorities said.

The exchange, which included dud grenades, took place Wednesday in a store parking lot on Walton Road in Rockford, authorities said.

Shareef was arrested without incident after the exchange and appeared in federal court in Chicago on Friday. His attorney did not issue a statement but said Shareef was aware of his rights and understood the proceedings.

He was held without bail on charges of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction and damage or destroy a building. Under the law, grenades are considered weapons of mass destruction.

If convicted, he faces up to life in prison.

Muslim leaders in Rockford urged the public not to associate the alleged incident with the Islam faith.

"We know of no one who pursues this type of violence," said Imam Shpendim Nadzaku. "This is not what we believe."

Tribune staff reporters Charles Sheehan and Sara Olkon contributed to this report.

rrbush@tribune.com

jcoen@tribune.com

Feds: Man Planned To Blow Up Chicago Mall (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105209

CHICAGO (AP) — A Muslim convert who talked about his desire to wage jihad against civilians was charged Friday in a plot to set off hand grenades at a shopping mall at the height of the Christmas rush, authorities said.

Investigators said Derrick Shareef, 22, an American citizen from Rockford, was acting alone and never actually obtained any grenades. He was arrested Wednesday when he met with an undercover agent in a parking lot to trade a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a gun, authorities said.

"He fixed on a day of December 22nd on Friday ... because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure," said Robert Grant, the agent in charge of the Chicago FBI office.

Authorities said Shareef had been under investigation since September, when he told an acquaintance that "he wanted to commit acts of violent jihad against targets in the United States as well as commit other crimes."

The acquaintance immediately informed the FBI, officials said.

Federal officials said Shareef planned to set off four hand grenades in garbage cans at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford, about 90 miles northwest of Chicago.

Other potential targets that Shareef allegedly discussed included government facilities such as courthouses and city hall, authorities said.

An affidavit quoted him as saying: "I just want to smoke a judge."

Shareef was born in the United States and converted to Islam, officials said. They believe he might have learned about jihad through videos and websites.

"While these are very serious charges, at no time was the public in any imminent peril," U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald said in a statement.

A spiritual leader of Rockford-area Muslims commended authorities for intercepting the alleged plot and reiterated "the Muslim community's condemnation of terrorism in the name of Islam," said Shpendim Nadzaku, imam of the Muslim Association of Greater Rockford.

Asked if he had ever met Shareef, Nadzaku said: "No one in the community has any clue as to who this person is — he's completely anonymous."

The door of a Genoa town home that is the last known address for Shareef went unanswered Friday although a female inside was seen turning off a light as a reporter stood outside.

Shareef appeared briefly before a judge Friday and was ordered held without bond. He was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

Defense attorney Michael Mann declined to comment on the charges.

Shareef and his acquaintance cased the mall on Nov. 30, discussing the layout and spots where they might set off several grenades simultaneously to create more pandemonium, according to an FBI affidavit.

A spokeswoman for the mall said officials were cooperating with the investigation but referred all other questions to the U.S. attorney's office.

Mall customers expressed a mixture of anger and indifference Friday evening.

"I don't think anything is going to stop people from coming to this mall now. It's Christmas," said 27-year-old shopper Jaclyn Gonzalez of Rockford. "You're not going to keep from doing what you have to do just because someone is making ignorant comments."

Feds Arrest Man On Terrorism-related Charges (CHIST)

By Natasha Korecki

Chicago Sun-Times, December 9, 2006

A Rockford man allegedly planned to set off hand grenades in garbage cans at a shopping mall near Rockford as part of his plot to let the world know “the time for jihad is now.”

Derrick Shareef, 22, targeted the Cherry Vale shopping mall, which has about 130 retail stores. But in recorded conversations he said the mall was “just one potential place,” and that he hoped to one day “smoke a judge,” according to the federal charges.

Should he die before the attack, Shareef made a videotape statement to explain his actions.

“I am from America, and this tape is to let you guys know, who disbelieve in Allah, to let the enemies of Islam know, and to let the Muslims alike know that the time for jihad is now...be strong, oh Mujahideen...May Allah protect me on this mission we conduct...so do not cry, do not mourn for me,” he said, according to the FBI affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0105210

Shareef was arrested Wednesday by the Chicago Joint Terrorism Task Force after he met an undercover agent in the mall parking lot and traded a set of stereo speakers for four hand grenades and a hand gun, according to charges. He's also known as Talib Abu Salam Ibn Shareef, court papers say.

Shareef allegedly discussed targeting other local government facilities. He was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction.

Shareef's alleged plot was foiled after he shared his plans with a friend, who cooperated with the FBI. Shareef told the person he wanted to commit "acts of violent jihad" against people and other crimes to obtain funds to further his goals.

He at one point told the informant he wanted to target government facilities.

"I want some type of city hall-type stuff now, federal court houses," Shareef was caught on tape saying, according to an FBI affidavit. "I just want to smoke a judge."

"Once the threat Shareef posed was detected by the Joint Terrorism Task Force, his activities and movements were under constant surveillance and there was no imminent risk to the public," Chicago FBI chief Robert Grant said in a prepared statement.

Shareef is expected to have his initial appearance later today in federal court.

Mall Bomb Suspect Wanted To Warn 'Disbelievers,' FBI Says (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

CHICAGO - A Muslim convert is in custody accused of trying to trade two stereo speakers for a 9 mm pistol and the grenades authorities say he wanted to carry out an attack on holiday shoppers.

The FBI says it was tipped by an acquaintance of Derrick Shareef, then recorded the 22-year-old planning to use hand grenades to blow garbage cans into clouds of flying shrapnel in a crowded mall the Friday before Christmas.

"This is a warning to those who disbelieve," he said, according to an FBI affidavit.

Authorities said he was arrested Wednesday when he tried to make the trade with an undercover agent in a Rockford parking lot. Shareef was charged Friday with crimes that could send him to prison for the rest of his life, and was ordered held without bail.

"He fixed on a day of December 22nd on Friday ... because it was the Friday before Christmas and thought that would be the highest concentration of shoppers that he could kill and injure," said Robert Grant, the agent in charge of the Chicago FBI office.

However, authorities said no one was in danger.

"While these are very serious charges, at no time was the public in any imminent peril," U.S. Attorney Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in a news release.

Defense attorney Michael B. Mann declined to comment.

According to the affidavit, Shareef had been under investigation since September, when he told an acquaintance "he wanted to commit acts of violent jihad against targets in the United States as well as commit other crimes."

The acquaintance immediately informed the FBI, officials said.

Officials said Shareef planned to set off four hand grenades in garbage cans at the CherryVale shopping mall in Rockford, about 90 miles northwest of Chicago, and discussed other potential targets including government facilities such as courthouses and Rockford City Hall.

Rockford Mayor Lawrence Morrissey said Friday that officials would discuss whether security needed to be increased.

The affidavit quoted Shareef as saying: "I just want to smoke a judge."

Shareef and his acquaintance cased the mall Nov. 30, discussing the layout and spots where they might set off several grenades simultaneously to create pandemonium, according to the affidavit.

Shareef was born in the United States and converted to Islam, officials said.

The imam of the Muslim Association of Greater Rockford, Shpendim Nadzaku, commended authorities for intercepting the alleged plot and reiterated "the Muslim community's condemnation of terrorism in the name of Islam."

"No one in the community has any clue as to who this person is -- he's completely anonymous," Nadzaku said.

No one answered a knock at the door Friday at a town house in Genoa, between Chicago and Rockford, that is the last known address for Shareef. A female inside was seen turning off a light as a reporter stood outside.

Shareef was charged with one count of attempting to damage or destroy a building by fire or explosion and one count of attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction. The latter charge carries a maximum sentence of life in prison.

Local Officials Feel Left Out Of Information Loop (ROCKRS)

By Mike Wiser, ROCKFORD REGISTER STAR

Rockford (IL) Register-Star, December 9, 2006

Mayor and others say they learned of Shareef's alleged plans at the same time everyone else did.

ROCKFORD — Everyone was glad — unnerved a little, maybe, but glad — that a man with an apparent jihad complex and a fixation on the Rockford area was discovered and in custody before he could do any damage.

Local officials praised the Justice Department for stopping what federal prosecutors say was a 22-year-old's plan to use hand grenades to bomb CherryVale Mall or local government buildings.

But not everyone was happy with how the notoriously tight-lipped U.S. attorney's office in northern Illinois, led by Patrick Fitzgerald, let everyone else in on the news.

"This morning I'm getting a call from a reporter and on the other line I have the chief of police saying he just had a briefing with the FBI," Mayor Larry Morrissey said.

"If we're all supposed to combat terrorism in cities like New York, Chicago and Rockford ... they need to share information with local law enforcement that this was going on."

Morrissey said he was "extremely disappointed" that local law enforcement was kept out of the loop even though the feds were monitoring Derrick Shareef for months. He added that he is going to try and get some answers from Fitzgerald's office on how things could work differently in the future.

"I'm going to decline comments on his comment," Assistant U.S. Attorney Randall Samborn said.

Police Chief Chet Epperson said he got a call Wednesday that the FBI was involved in something in the Rockford area, but he said he didn't know any of the specifics until Friday, just as the news was breaking across the country.

"I would be disappointed if they had some information about this building and didn't tell me," said Charlie Jackson, head of security for the Winnebago County Courthouse.

Although Shareef's plans specifically identified the CherryVale Mall and the DeKalb County Courthouse, it does not appear they mentioned the Winnebago County Courthouse.

He did, however, want to attack "stuff like courthouses, city hall, government places, government facilities," according to an affidavit attached to the federal complaint.

"At least tell the command staff so they can pass it down to us with a description of someone or what to look out for," Jackson said.

Chief Deputy Kevin Hickey of the DeKalb County Sheriff's Department said his office had no problems with the information it got from the FBI and specifically identified the head of the Rockford office, G.B. Jones, as one who helped keep the lines of communication going.

"He kept us aware and updated as developments arose," Hickey said, although he was not sure when the department and the FBI started talking. "They assured us that there was never an imminent threat."

Cherry Valley Police Chief Gary Maitland said he was first contacted by federal authorities when Shareef was arrested Wednesday, and he didn't get the details until everyone else did Friday.

"I can understand why things like this have to be kept quiet," he said.

Staff writer Mike Wiser can be reached at 815-987-1377 or mwiser@rrstar.com.

Traveler Data Program Defied Ban, Critics Say (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu, Ellen Nakashima

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security violated a congressional funding ban when it continued to develop a computerized program that creates risk assessments of travelers entering and leaving the United States, according to lawmakers and privacy advocates.

Although congressional testimony shows that department officials apparently disclosed some important elements of the controversial Automated Targeting System program to lawmakers in recent months, several key members of Congress said that they were in the dark about the program and that it violated their intentions.

"Clearly the law prohibits testing or development" of such computer programs, said Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.), who wrote the three-year-old prohibition into homeland security funding legislation. "And if they are saying that they just took some system, used it and therefore did not test or develop it, they clearly were not upfront about saying it."

Privacy advocates and members of Congress expressed growing skepticism this week about the legality, scope and effectiveness of the massive data-mining program -- particularly the creation of risk assessments on Americans that would be retained for up to 40 years -- whose existence was first disclosed in detail in a Nov. 2 notice in the Federal Register.

The department announced yesterday that after receiving more than 50 objections to the program, it has extended a public comment period for ATS from Dec. 4 to Dec. 29. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.) and Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.), incoming chairmen of the Senate and House homeland security committees, and others have questioned the effort and called for hearings or additional administration briefings.

Developed to help customs inspectors target narcotics and other contraband, ATS began scrutinizing air travelers entering and leaving the United States in the mid-1990s, said Jayson P. Ahern, assistant commissioner of U.S. Customs and Border Protection. After the 2001 terrorist attacks, it was used to assign risk assessments to cargo and passengers, officials' testimony and a February 2005 DHS report to Congress show.

Two years ago, it was expanded again to a limited but growing number of land border crossers, according to the report and Ahern. About 309 million land crossings and 87 million air crossings of U.S. borders are made each year.

Travelers are not allowed to see their risk assessments and must file Freedom of Information Act requests to view the original records on which the assessment is based.

The Center for Democracy and Technology said the program violated the 1974 Privacy Act because customs officials targeted U.S. travelers and shared their data with other agencies without notifying the public. Homeland Security officials say that notice was implicit in an announcement in 2001 about an older program.

"The lack of a notice at all was clearly illegal for however many years they claim this was in operation," said David Sobel, Electronic Frontier Foundation senior counsel.

"This is everybody's worst nightmare," said Kevin Mitchell, chairman of the Business Travel Coalition, who was angered by the revelation that profiles were being kept without travelers' knowledge.

Homeland Security officials said the funding ban applied only to successor programs to its aborted attempt in 2004 to use commercial databases to assign risk to domestic air passengers -- then known as CAPPS II and renamed Secure Flight -- not to preexisting programs.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff acknowledged that the November notice was an attempt "to be even more transparent and write, in even clearer English, about what we were going to do." But in an interview with the National Journal, he expressed frustration with critics' surprise.

"Otherwise, why are we collecting the data?" he asked. "Just to have it to sit around?"

DHS leaders have described in speeches and congressional hearings their efforts over the years to process data from manifests and airline passenger records on U.S.-bound international flights to "detect anomalies and 'red flags' " for high-risk individuals.

DHS has been more explicit recently about ATS data mining and risk profiling, saying computer algorithms were used to "produce potential matches" of inbound and outbound travelers with "potential . . . connections to terrorist risk factors."

But senior Homeland Security officials made only a few short references in 2004 and 2005 to using the program to assess land travelers. At the time, they cited it only as a future possibility.

"Funding will allow us to develop and implement a version of ATS that, for the first time, will be able to identify potentially high-risk travelers in passenger vehicles," then-Customs and Border Protection Commissioner Robert C. Bonner told Congress.

FEMA Ordered To Restart Katrina Payments (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — For the second time in eight days, a judge ordered the Bush administration to immediately resume making housing payments to thousands of families whose homes were damaged by Hurricane Katrina.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon said last week that the confusing, often contradictory letters to hurricane victims from the Federal Emergency Management Agency didn't explain why rental payments were cut off. He said that violated the Constitution and he ordered the agency to restart the program immediately.

FEMA appealed that ruling and asked Leon not to force the agency to restart the program while that case plays out. Leon refused Friday to do so.

He ordered FEMA to come to court Wednesday to discuss how many evacuees are due housing payments and how the funding will be restored.

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which won last week's ruling, said more than 11,000 families are affected by the case.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, in an interview with CNN, said Friday that FEMA wanted to ensure only eligible people received aid.

"Obviously, we are going to pursue the legal questions where they have to be pursued, but we also want to make sure we're doing the right thing," Chertoff said. "We don't want to have deserving people kicked out, but we also don't want to have people ripping off the program."

DOJ_NMG_0105213

FEMA did not immediately respond to a request for comment. The Justice Department had no immediate response to the order.

WAR NEWS:

Iraq Strategy Talks Focusing On Three Main Options (WP)

By Robin Wright, Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

As pressure mounts for a change of course in Iraq, the Bush administration is groping for a viable new strategy for the president to unveil by Christmas, with deliberations now focused on three main options to redefine the U.S. military and political engagement, according to officials familiar with the debate.

The major alternatives include a short-term surge of 15,000 to 30,000 additional U.S. troops to secure Baghdad and accelerate the training of Iraqi forces. Another strategy would redirect the U.S. military away from the internal strife to focus mainly on hunting terrorists affiliated with al-Qaeda. And the third would concentrate political attention on supporting the majority Shiites and abandon U.S. efforts to reach out to Sunni insurgents.

As President Bush and his advisers rush to complete their crash review and craft a new formula in the next two weeks, some close to the process said the major goal seems to be to stake out alternatives to the plan presented this week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. The White House denied trying to brush off the study group's report and said those recommendations are being considered alongside internal reviews.

But the growing undercurrent of discussions within the administration is shifting responsibility for Iraq's problems to Iraqis. Sources familiar with the deliberations describe fatigue, frustration and a growing desire to disengage from Iraq. The sources spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the deliberations.

"None of us see the situation in Iraq as favorable. We all see it as extremely difficult," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said yesterday.

Bush will devote most of next week to his Iraq review. He plans to visit the State Department on Monday to consult with his foreign policy team, then he will host independent Iraq experts in the Oval Office. The next day, he will hold a videoconference with U.S. military commanders and U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad in Iraq. He will travel to the Pentagon for more consultations on Wednesday.

The crash White House review -- which involves the State Department, the National Security Council, the CIA and the Pentagon -- is tentatively expected to lead to a speech to the nation the week of Dec. 18, officials say.

While one of the options involves a surge of U.S. troops, there is no agreement on what the mission of those forces would be, sources say. Discussions center on accelerating the training of Iraqi forces and helping secure Baghdad before turning it over to the Iraqis. The goal generally could be to improve Iraq's defense capabilities so U.S. combat troops could begin to withdraw faster.

The second idea is the "al-Qaeda option," which would transform the U.S. mission to focus on fighting terrorism and would disengage forces from domestic aspects of the multisided conflict. U.S. troops would take a backseat on the Shiite-Sunni conflict and instead hunt down al-Qaeda operatives, the sources say.

On the ground, for example, that could mean a shift away from operations in Baghdad's volatile Sadr City slum, or from efforts to stop car bombs and sectarian attacks. The administration is increasingly resigned to the fact that it can neither prevent nor intervene in Iraq's sectarian war, which has begun to supersede both the Sunni insurgency and al-Qaeda's operations, the sources say.

The two military options are not necessarily linked. Some in the interagency discussions favor both, while others support the al-Qaeda option but not a military surge, the sources say.

On the political front, the administration is focusing increasingly on variations of a "Shiite tilt," sometimes called an "80 percent solution," that would bolster the political center of Iraq and effectively leave in charge the Shiite and Kurdish parties that account for 80 percent of Iraq's 26 million people and that won elections a year ago.

Vice President Cheney's office has most vigorously argued for the "80 percent solution," in terms of both realities on the ground and the history of U.S. engagement with the Shiites, sources say. A source familiar with the discussions said Cheney argued this week that the United States could not again be seen to abandon the Shiites, Iraq's largest population group, after calling in 1991 for them to rise up against then-President Saddam Hussein and then failing to support them when they did. Thousands were killed in a huge crackdown.

DOJ_NMG_0105214

Of the major proposals under discussion, only the "al-Qaeda option" is reflected in the Iraq Study Group's report. Recommendation 43 calls for the United States to shift priority to "the training, equipping, advising, and support mission and to counterterrorism operations."

The study group says it could support a short-term troop surge but notes that "past experience indicates that the violence would simply rekindle as soon as U.S. forces are moved to another area." The report does not, in the end, recommend more troops.

Senior administration officials caution that the review process is still fluid. "I don't think we're at the stage where we're coalescing around an option," said a top official who declined to speak on the record about internal deliberations. "These are everything's-on-the-table kinds of discussions."

Yet as it changes course, the administration is still struggling to resolve central issues, including how much it trusts Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to tackle the two issues basic to stability: reconciliation and the militias that are fueling the sectarian violence. Despite Bush's public endorsement of Maliki after their meeting in Amman last week, U.S. officials have not yet decided whether he has the will or the capability to take on his brethren Shiites in the name of national reconciliation -- either by dismantling their militias or getting them to embrace the Sunni minority.

Bush aides said the president has been misinterpreted by those who believe he is giving the back of his hand to the Iraq Study Group, led by former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, and they insist that the report's ideas are now part of the administration's review. "There's not a purpose to distinguish or make a distinction from the Baker-Hamilton commission," the senior official said. "In fact, many of their proposals are being seriously considered."

If anything, the official argued, the commission gave Bush some running room by rejecting a rapid troop withdrawal, something some Democrats have advocated. "Nobody's going to go below what they said," the official said, meaning that because the study group set a goal of pulling out combat units by early 2008, that is now the earliest that troops could be withdrawn.

But the stature of commission members means that the White House will have to justify any deviations from their plan. "The onus will be on us to explain why we are doing something they recommended or why not," the official said. "They can't just be jettisoned. They have to be dealt with."

The president, who met yesterday with congressional leaders, vowed to work with Democrats to forge a common strategy. "We talked about the need for a new way forward in Iraq," Bush told reporters. "And we talked about the need to work together on this important subject."

With 3 Iraq Reports To Come, Bush Plans Week Of Scrutiny (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg, Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — President Bush will take part in high-visibility deliberations on Iraq next week, making visits to the Pentagon and State Department as they take part in an administrationwide effort to chart a new course in the war.

Mr. Bush will also meet with a group of academic and policy experts about Iraq on Monday, officials said, and will hold a video teleconference with senior military commanders.

The flurry of conspicuous consultation, officials said, is part of Mr. Bush's effort to come up with a new approach in Iraq under intense pressure to bring the violence there under control or begin reducing the United States' military commitment.

Officials said it was uncertain when the president would present to the nation what he has repeatedly called "a new way forward" in Iraq, though, they said, he still hoped to do so by Christmas.

The White House announced the series of meetings as it continued to face questions about how it planned to address 79 recommendations for Iraq proposed by the Iraq Study Group, whose bipartisan report included a grim analysis of the president's approach to the war.

Tony Snow, the White House press secretary, said Mr. Bush was still awaiting results of three major reviews on Iraq policy from within the administration before announcing his plans — one at the State Department, one at the Department of Defense and one at the National Security Council.

Addressing growing anticipation in Washington for the president's new Iraq policy, Mr. Snow warned reporters on Friday, "What you look for may not be splashiness or boldness, as you may call it, but what you look for is a serious proposal that addresses the real concerns of many Americans about, are we pursuing victory, and if so, how?"

After a meeting with Mr. Bush on Friday, several Democratic leaders said they remained skeptical that he was ready to embrace a substantially different approach.

DOJ_NMG_0105215

"Someone has to get the message to this man that there has to be significant changes," said Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming Democratic majority leader. He said Mr. Bush, through his comments and demeanor at the session, indicated that he was not receptive to the report, which Mr. Reid said was not the work of "do-gooders" but was written by "Democrats and Republicans with wide-ranging experience."

Mr. Reid's top deputy in the Senate starting next year, Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, said Mr. Bush had compared himself in the meeting to President Truman at the start of the cold war. But Mr. Durbin noted that Truman was working with a broad range of NATO allies at the time while keeping negotiations open with the Soviet Union and others — a jab at the administration's decision so far against including Syria and Iran in talks on Iraq.

Mr. Snow said Mr. Bush did indeed refer to Truman in his meeting with the Democrat, but, Mr. Snow said, "The president was really not trying to compare himself to Harry Truman so much as to talk about the duration and nature of the struggle."

The administration has so far preferred to work with allies in the region like Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Turkey, as Mr. Bush showed again Friday by speaking by telephone with the Turkish prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan.

After the meeting, attended by leaders of both parties, Mr. Bush pledged to continue to consult with Congress as "we fashion a new — a new way forward in Iraq."

But Mr. Snow indicated later that in pledging bipartisanship Mr. Bush was only willing to go so far.

"What the president said clearly was that he intends to consult with Congress, and that he — the door is open," Mr. Snow said.

"There's a flip side to that question," Mr. Snow added, "Which is whether those who say, 'Mr. President, as commander in chief, we listen to you,' bend to support him."

Flexing their own muscles, Democratic leaders promised heightened scrutiny of a forthcoming request from the administration for as much as $150 billion in new emergency spending for the war. The Republican majorities in the House and Senate have generally approved the administration's previous requests, though they enforced some changes.

Given the increasing number of employees working for private contractors in Iraq and the federal money flowing to Halliburton, a company Mr. Reid described as the "poster child for what is bad about this war," Mr. Reid said the new Congress would not simply sign off on the request.

Bush Plans "Policy Adjustments" In Iraq (LAT)

By Doyle McManus, Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Friday that he's willing to change U.S. "tactics" in Iraq once he hears recommendations from his military and diplomatic advisors, but he doesn't intend to scale back his basic goals, his spokesman said.

Bush met Friday morning with Republican and Democratic congressional leaders and said the nation needs "a new way forward in Iraq." Aides said the president will receive proposals from the Defense and State departments next week and plans to propose a set of "policy adjustments" in a speech the week before Christmas.

One of the Democrats who met with Bush, Sen. Richard J. Durbin (D-Ill.), said he was disappointed.

"When he talked about his approach to Iraq, there was no indication of a change in basic strategy," Durbin said. "He talked about changing some tactics."

White House spokesman Tony Snow acknowledged that the changes Bush was considering would be limited.

"What the president has said is: 'We need new tactics,' " Snow told reporters. "Now what he will not change is … the goal, stated by the president: an Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself. What is important and is open for wide-ranging reviews is: What's the best way to do it?"

Snow and other senior officials refused to discuss the proposals that would be presented to Bush next week.

"I've been doing some deep thinking on Iraq — which, if you don't mind, I'll share first with the president," said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who is scheduled to discuss the issues with Bush on Monday.

Still, in responding to the recommendations of a bipartisan commission on Iraq this week, officials have suggested the rough outlines of at least some of the measures they are considering.

In some respects, the administration's thinking comes close to the recommendations of the commission led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.); in others, it conflicts.

For example, Pentagon planners have long agreed with the Baker-Hamilton panel that American troops should increasingly focus on training and advising Iraqi units, and gradually withdraw from direct combat in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities.

DOJ_NMG_0105216

"As we transition to Iraqi control and as I hope that we'll see us moving out of some of the major metropolitan areas … I think we could [increase training] a lot faster than many people would believe," Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of U.S. and allied ground forces in Iraq, said in a briefing.

U.S. officials have also sought for months to pressure Prime Minister Nouri Maliki to work on reconciliation among Iraq's Sunni Arab, Shiite Arab and Kurdish communities, including long-stalled measures to strengthen the Iraqi constitution's protection of minority rights and to work out a formula for sharing the country's oil revenue.

The Baker-Hamilton commission proposed that if the Iraqis do not make faster progress, "the United States should reduce its political, military or economic support for the Iraqi government." In public, the Bush administration has refused to deliver a warning that stark, fearing that it could backfire by convincing the Iraqis that U.S. troops are on their way out. But U.S. officials increasingly have talked openly about subjecting the Iraqi government to clear deadlines and benchmarks for achieving political reforms.

"I think that if we set up a series of goals, goals that are tied to dates, of certain critical things that have to be done to make all the Iraqi people believe that this is a government of national unity, that we could regain their confidence," Chiarelli said.

As for the Baker-Hamilton panel's proposal that the United States bring Iran and Syria into discussions of the future of Iraq, administration officials said they still doubt such contacts would do much good. But they said they were open to the idea of Iran and Syria participating in international conferences if the Baghdad government wanted to invite them.

"The Iraqis are very engaged with their neighbors; we will support their diplomacy in ways that they find useful and that we find useful," Rice said, but added: "In both Syria and Iran, you have states that have chosen to be on the side of the divide that is fueling extremism, not moderation. And that is the essential problem."

Putting an unusual spotlight on a normally closed-door process, the White House announced Bush's schedule of policy briefings next week and said he would make public remarks after at least one of the sessions.

National Security Council spokesman Gordon D. Johndroe said Bush would go to the State Department to be briefed by Rice and her aides Monday, would consult with U.S. military commanders in Iraq by videoconference on Tuesday, and would go to the Pentagon to hear the results of a review commissioned by the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, on Wednesday.

The public show of deliberation appeared aimed at making the point that Bush is actively leading the search for new ideas on Iraq, not merely reacting to recommendations from outsiders — or "outsourcing" presidential decisions, as Snow put it.

A major debate in the Pentagon, apparently unresolved, is whether to propose a short-term increase or "surge" in troop strength in Iraq to make one last try at stabilizing Baghdad, as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and some others have urged.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, and some other military officers have argued that while such a surge is possible, it would be costly — and, in any case, that political reforms in Iraq would be more important to achieve.

"I definitely think that this is winnable, but we've got to … convince the Iraqis that it's not just the military alone that will solve the problems that face them," Chiarelli said.

Many military officers say they believe U.S. forces can still quell Iraq's insurgency and ease the sectarian violence, but only if the United States is willing to contribute more troops, more time, more money or all three.

"I think there will be some [troop increases]," said William Nash, a retired major general and analyst at the Council on Foreign Relations. "You can increase the troops by altering the way you rotate troops. You can do it for a little while, but you cannot do it for long."

The easiest way to boost the number of troops, officers said, is to alter their rotation schedule. Although the military has been looking for ways to increase the brigades' time at home to improve their training, it could speed up their deployments.

One of the most likely candidates is the 3rd Infantry Division, which served in Iraq in 2003 and 2005. The division is set to return in 2007, and its deployment conceivably could be moved up.

The military also could draw troops from Asia — Marines in Okinawa or soldiers in South Korea. However, recent threats from North Korea, which has conducted missile tests and nuclear weapons in the past five months, could dissuade generals from considering the move as their first choice.

Still, such temporary increases have caused problems. For substantial, long-term troop increases, the military would need to remobilize the National Guard, experts said — a politically unpopular move for any president. However, Chiarelli signaled commanders are willing to offer tough advice.

"I know I am leaving Iraq in a more uncertain and somewhat more tumultuous state than the last time I left," said Chiarelli, who is reaching the end of his second tour in Iraq. "We should not give in to the defeatist mood that I sometimes see displayed. This mission is the most critical and significant that we've undertaken in perhaps 50 years, and failure, in my opinion, is not an option."

DOJ_NMG_0105217

Bush Targets Iraq Policy Change By Christmas (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, December 9, 2006

President George W. Bush will work on a new approach to Iraq in meetings with top advisors next week, and could announce the strategy before Christmas, the White House said.

Pressure is building on Bush after he distanced himself from several key recommendations put forward by a top bipartisan commission this week, which called for a complete overhaul of US policy to avert Iraq's slide into chaos.

He will frame his decision in talks with his secretaries of state and defense, military commanders and US ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, as well as outside experts.

The White House says Bush carefully studied the Iraq Study Group report, and is awaiting results of several key internal reviews of Iraq policy.

"He's going to take all that information ... and boil that down," for the "new way forward that he wants to have in Iraq, because he knows that that's necessary," said White House deputy spokeswoman Dana Perino.

The goal is for Bush "to be able to give a speech before Christmas (December 25), but it's not set in stone," Perino said.

The Iraq Study Group report, which warns that the situation in Iraq is "grave and deteriorating," called for most US combat troops to be withdrawn by early 2008, talks with Iran and Syria, and for a new Middle East peace effort.

Bush, who admitted on Thursday that "we need a new approach" in Iraq, also discussed the situation there with top congressional leaders Friday.

"We talked about the need for a new way forward in Iraq, and we talked about the need to work together on this important subject," Bush said.

But incoming Democratic speaker of the House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi, was more combative, saying: "the time for change is now and it is apparent to the American people ... hopefully the president has got the message."

The president will visit the State Department on Monday then convene top outside experts on Iraq in the Oval Office. On Tuesday, he will have a video-conference with military commanders and Khalilzad.

Wednesday will see Bush at the Pentagon, Perino said.

Bush has already said that even the commission did not expect him to agree with every recommendation, amid signs that the White House may pick-and-choose ideas which suit it from each review of the conflict.

But James Baker, the former US secretary of state who co-chaired the study group, said Thursday that the report should not be cherry-picked.

"I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say 'I like this, but I don't like that, I like this, but I don't like that,'" Baker said.

"This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we're facing in Iraq."

But White House spokesman Tony Snow said: "Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission made it clear that they don't expect everybody to agree with each and every jot and tittle."

"But also that we do respect the fact that a lot of these issues are interconnected, and ought to be taken seriously as such."

Bush was cool on two key commission proposals -- talks with Iran and Syria, and withdrawing most US combat troops by early 2008.

"I've always said we'd like our troops out as fast as possible," he said, while insisting on the need to be "flexible and realistic" and tying any change in troop level to advice from US military commanders, as he has in the past.

Outgoing US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld warned Friday that a precipitous withdrawal from Iraq would be a "terrible mistake" which would threaten the stability not only of Iraq but the region.

US military commander Lieutenant General Peter Chiarelli, meanwhile said an exit for most combat troops by early 2008 could be possible, if the Iraqi government embraces reconciliation.

"I think that's possible if in fact you have interim steps that are agreed upon and with timelines that are basically going to move us toward reconciliation," he told reporters here via video link from Baghdad.

Bush said Thursday that Damascus and Tehran might be welcome for talks if they renounced support for extremists and pledged support for Baghdad's fledgling government, otherwise "they shouldn't bother to show up."

Bush also reiterated his longstanding condition that Iran freeze sensitive nuclear work before any direct talks.

U.S. Urged To Engage Shiite Clerics (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi,

AP, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105218

The Iraq Study Group is urging Washington to push for direct contacts with two key Shiite clerics who have made clear they want nothing to do with the United States.

Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr, who have vast influence among Iraq's majority Shiites, would lose credibility if they talk to the Americans.

Al-Sistani has steadfastly refused to meet with American officials, but has been a major source of moderation in a country engulfed by violence since 2003. While suspicious of U.S. intentions, he is credited with keeping most Shiites from taking up arms against the Americans.

In contrast, al-Sadr is a tireless advocate of the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq and runs a militia that fought American forces in Baghdad and across central and southern Iraq in 2004. His Mahdi Army militia also is blamed for much of the sectarian violence in Iraq.

The bipartisan U.S. report said the Bush administration "must try to talk directly" to al-Sistani and al-Sadr, as well as militia and insurgent leaders.

But the recommendation appeared to pay little heed to the fine line the clerics must tread to avoid falling victim to the political treachery of today's Iraq, where something as inconsequential as a casual greeting to a U.S. soldier can sometimes mean death at the hands of insurgents.

Iraqis close to both clerics rejected the idea.

"It is impossible, not even in dreams," said Bahaa al-Araji, one of 30 lawmakers loyal to al-Sadr. "We see the Americans as an occupation force."

While the Iranian-born al-Sistani represents the ancient Shiite clerical establishment in the holy city of Najaf, al-Sadr is a revolutionary leader and a master of street politics. Al-Sadr is at odds with al-Sistani and other top clerics over what he sees as their acquiescence to the United States.

The elder cleric, maligned by some Sunni Arabs for his Iranian origins, must strike a delicate balance between his opposition to violence and the deep anti-U.S. sentiments widespread among Shiites and Sunnis alike. Talking directly to Washington would go a long way to disrupt that.

Al-Sistani has been powerless to prevent Shiite death squads targeting Sunni Arabs since a revered Shiite shrine was destroyed by suspected Sunni militants in February. He has appealed for an end to the violence, but that did not stop Sunnis and moderate Shiites from accusing him of not doing enough to stop the bloodshed.

The stakes are even higher for al-Sadr, whose relatively young age and lack of academic pedigree leave his family name and uncompromising anti-U.S. stand among his main assets.

The teachings of his late father, Ayatollah Mohammed Sadiq al-Sadr, remain the ideological mainstay of the Sadrist movement and the basis of the son's following.

The late al-Sadr, assassinated in 1999 by suspected Saddam agents, routinely began his Friday sermons with the chant "No, no to America" — a cry repeated by worshippers today.

Vali Nasr, an expert on Shiite affairs with the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations, said the proposal for a U.S. dialogue with al-Sistani would be beneficial to the Americans.

"Direct contact with him ... would benefit the U.S. by giving the impression to Shiites that their most senior spiritual leader is shoring up American authority in Iraq," Nasr said. "But openly meeting Americans will hurt al-Sistani's stature by giving the impression that he is legitimating U.S. policies, and more generally, that he is openly meddling in politics."

An Iraqi in regular contact with al-Sistani in Najaf said the spiritual leader, who played a key role in charting Iraq's post-Saddam Hussein political course, remained opposed to any dialogue with the United States, adding that he held Washington responsible for much of Iraq's present problems.

"Perhaps when the Americans change their Iraq strategy. Until then, there will be no contact with them, directly or indirectly," said the official, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

While al-Araji, the Sadrist lawmaker, was categorical in his dismissal of the suggestion of direct contact between al-Sadr and the U.S. government, a top al-Sadr aide in Baghdad would not rule it out in the future.

Sheik Abdul-Zahra al-Suwaidaie, a leader of the Sadrist movement in the capital's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City, suggested that any future contacts would only take place if the United States announced a timetable for the withdrawal of its troops.

Al-Sadr "will not abandon the principle of no dialogue with the Americans," he said. "But if the Americans place a timetable for the withdrawal of their troops on the table, then our representatives could be ready to talk."

___

AP writer Qassim Abdul-Zahra in Baghdad contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0105219

Kurds Brand Report "Unrealistic" (BBC)

BBC.com, December 9, 2006

The leader of Iraq's Kurdish region says the US Iraq Study Group report is "unrealistic and inappropriate".

Massoud Barzani was sceptical of plans to involve Iraq's neighbours in peace efforts, and for any weakening down of the Kurds' effective autonomy.

His comments were then echoed by Iraq's Kurdish president, Jalal Talabani, who said he agreed with Mr Barzani.

Earlier, the head of US forces in Iraq said most troops could be withdrawn by early 2008, as recommended.

But the commander, Lt Gen Peter Chiarelli, said such a pullout would only be realistic if Iraq first took significant steps towards political reconciliation.

US President George W Bush has publicly admitted the need for a "new approach" to the conflict in Iraq in the two days since the report was published.

But the president has hinted that he may not accept all of the report's key recommendations.

In the first Kurdish reaction to the Iraq Study Group (ISG) report, Mr Barzani said the Iraq's Kurds were not committed to the report "in any way".

Members of the ISG did not visit Kurdish regions of northern Iraq while compiling their report, Mr Barzani said, calling that a "huge shortcoming".

He was critical of the report's emphasis on strengthening Iraq's central government, apparently "in contrast to the principles of federalism and the constitution, on which the new Iraq is built".

Calling the recommendations "inappropriate", Mr Barzani said: "We do not accept anything that opposes the constitution and the interests of the Iraqi and Kurdistan people."

His stance was backed up shortly afterwards by Iraq's President, Jalal Talabani.

"President Jalal Talabani supports the stand of the president of the Kurdistan region Massoud Barzani on the report," his office said, suggesting some of the reports recommendations ran contrary to Iraqi government policy.

A Family's Candid Friend (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

The day after publication of the Iraq Study Group's report this week, James Baker was asked whether the positive coverage would last. The septuagenarian Texan held up a tabloid front page that screamed "Surrender Monkeys" against a picture of Mr Baker and Lee Hamilton, his co-chairman.

Almost four years into the war, Mr Baker's response struck a rare chord of self-deprecation in a debate that has been dominated by unbending certitudes. On Wednesday, Americans had -reason to hope those bitter divisions might start to narrow with the release of the ISG report.

Whether that transpires, few would dispute Mr Baker was its chief architect. As secretary of state under George H.W. Bush, and as the Bush family's most loyal friend – often described as its consigliere – Mr Baker was the obvious choice to advise George W. Bush on ways out of the Iraqi morass.

Among Democrats, Mr Baker's reputation as a skilled diplomat in an era where diplomacy has been sidelined gave him credibility as someone who could bridge the gap between those who wanted to "stay the course" and those who preferred to "cut and run".

The outcome was unflattering to Mr Baker's best friend's son. Although Mr Bush said the report's 79 recommendations merited "serious consideration", its core message was uncomplimentary to his most cherished principles, even if it was rendered with bipartisan civility.

As Mr Baker, who descends from a line of Houston country club lawyers, wrote in his recent memoirs: "Rank partisanship is undignified. The best way to persuade someone to see things your way is to start by trying to see things his way." The question now is whether he can persuade the US president to see things his way.

Perhaps the toughest advice for Mr Bush would be to talk to America's adversaries, particularly Iran and Syria, which he insists would reward bad behaviour – a view Mr Baker, who talked frequently to Soviet officials, dismisses. "If it doesn't work, you don't lose a darned thing," he said.

Nobody knows better than Mr Baker the frustrations of engaging with the Middle East's authoritarian regimes. Prior to the launch of the Arab-Israeli peace process in late 1991, Mr Baker travelled to Syria 15 times. He showed equal tenacity in helping pave the way for German reunification. Mr Baker was lauded for his ability to make deals.

DOJ_NMG_0105220

"While the rest of us would be going into meetings with talking points setting out what would be desirable, Baker would go in thinking: 'What is doable?' " said James Dobbins a former US diplomat. "He is always on the look out for the deal."

Although Mr Baker's latest role has been portrayed as the return of Bush senior's people to the scene, he has been providing advice to Bush junior since before he became president. In 2000, Mr Baker played a ruthlessly successful role as Mr Bush's lawyer in the controversial Florida recount following the close presidential election.

In 2004, Mr Baker was Mr Bush's negotiator with John Kerry's Democratic campaign over the terms of the presidential debate and he also negotiated on behalf of Dick Cheney – himself a leading figure in Bush senior's administration. George W. Bush also sent Jim Baker as an envoy to the former Soviet state of Georgia.

"The idea that Jim's Iraq role is a proxy for the sudden return of Bush elder is misleading," said an old associate. "Jim was never far away." Congress set up the ISG. But Mr Baker only agreed to lead it after he was asked to do so by the president. Likewise, Mr Baker resisted pressure to publish before last month's mid-term congressional elections, which the Republicans subsequently lost.

Yet there is no disguising that much of the report will be deeply unpalatable to the US president, whose complex motivations for invading Iraq reportedly comprised a burning desire to complete his father's – and Mr Baker's – unfinished business from the first Gulf war in 1991.

It was also driven by the goal of democratising the broader region: "The road to Jerusalem goes through Baghdad," as the saying went. On Wednesday, Mr Baker suggested the opposite when he urged Mr Bush to launch an Arab-Israeli peace effort to help garner support for a stable Iraq.

Nor has Mr Baker made it easy for Mr Bush to ignore his advice, insisting it is not a "fruit salad" from which you can choose the bits you like. Yet changing events on the ground have given Mr Bush greater leeway to cherry-pick – a habit he allegedly got into with intelligence reports.

"The water is now so muddied no one knows where they are," said an associate of Mr Baker. But Mr Baker's report has not received the unmixed acclaim some had expected. The weakest element is perhaps its insistence that Mr Bush should apply strict conditions on future assis- tance to the Iraq government.

Critics say this confuses Baghdad's lack of capacity with lack of will. "It is illogical to shackle a man, throw him into turbulent waters and then tell him to save himself from drowning," says Mohsin Al-Hakim, son of Abdul Al-Hakim, one of Iraq's Shia leaders. Anthony Cordesman, a leading Iraq analyst, says it is like blaming the shop owner for the china the [American] bull has smashed.

Mr Baker has also come under fire for recommending a sharp rise in the number of US trainers "embedded" with Iraqi forces while simultaneously withdrawing combat troops.

This could expose US trainers and risk boosting the sectarian militias that control much of the Iraqi army. "It is easy to teach a soldier how to shoot," says a former official. "But shouldn't you be sure he will shoot the right people?"

Nevertheless, praise for Mr Baker's report still outweighs criticism; and whether Mr Bush agrees with the advice, it suits his purposes to appear to.

As for Mr Baker, his role might not be over. "I don't answer hypothetical questions," he said when asked whether he would become Mr Bush's envoy to lead a Middle East diplomatic offensive.

Were Mr Bush to embrace his advice on the Middle East, Mr Baker would be the obvious person to execute it. "It is impossible to think of anybody better qualified," said Brent Scowcroft, a senior official in Bush elder's administration. The odds must still be against it. Yet as Mr Baker, who has been called upon time and again to pull the Bush family's chestnuts out of the fire, has often observed: "You lose nothing by trying."

A Father's Tears (WSJ)

By Peggy Noonan

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

He stood there at the podium, the kind of podium he'd stood at 5,000 times in a long political life, and talked to the kind of audience he knew well: supporters and loyalists, old friends and new. He knew how to play them, how to use the old jokes and have fun. And suddenly he was sobbing.

He had referred to his son Jeb's first campaign for governor. He had seen some "unfair stuff," but Jeb "didn't whine about it, he didn't complain." The old president began to weep. "The true measure of a man," he then said, "is how you handle victory, and also defeat." And here a sob tore out of him and he could not continue.

It is not fully right, or fully fair, to guess about another's emotions. But no one who knows George H.W. Bush thinks that moment was only about Jeb. It wasn't only about some small defeat a dozen years ago. It would more likely have been about a number of things, and another son, and more than him.

DOJ_NMG_0105221

Age exposes us, if we're lucky enough to be given it. Some say it makes you softer, some tougher, some a mix of both. Some say it just leaves you more so -- whatever you were, you are, only more. I thought of that the other day after I saw the news reports of 41's speech. I went to a private dinner at the old Bush White House once, and the president, as he sprinkled pepper on his food, began to speak of his son Neil and "the pounding" he was taking in congressional investigations on the savings-and-loan scandal. He felt Neil was being abused for political reasons. Tears came to the president's eyes, sudden and unbidden.

Afterwards I thought about the two presidents I had known. Ronald Reagan was emotionally moved by American history and the Founders, by the long sweep of history. Personal issues and relations left him more dry-eyed. His successor was enormously moved by personal relations, by his love for his children and parents and friends. But to him the sweep of history was more abstract; it didn't capture his imagination in the same way. It left him dry-eyed.

Different strokes, different folks.

From what I have seen, growing older can leave you more exposed to the force of whatever it is you're feeling. Defenses erode like a fence worn by time. But what you feel can surprise you.

You're thinking about what was, and suddenly apprehending for the first time how important it was. You think of your son, age 3, on the lawn when you drove up that time. Once that memory touched you in some way you don't fully understand, but now it makes your throat constrict because you realize that of all the things that ever happened to you, none was as important as how he looked on the lawn when you drove up that time.

Age reorders. The order is expressed by the mysterious force of a fragment of a moment. And there you are at the podium, mugged by a memory.

Maybe there was some of those things in what happened the other day at the podium. But think of what a loaded moment in history it was for Bush the elder. Barely more than a day after he spoke, the Iraq Study Group's report would be issued. It was chaired by his old friend, the one with whom he'd discussed serious things years ago only after the kids, George and Jeb and the others, left the room.

Surely Mr. Bush knew -- surely he was first on James Baker's call list -- that the report would not, could not, offer a way out of a national calamity, but only suggestions, hopes, on ways through it. To know his son George had (with the best of intentions!) been wrong in the great decision of his presidency -- stop at Afghanistan or move on to Iraq? -- and was now suffering a defeat made clear by the report; to love that son, and love your country, to hold these thoughts, to have them collide and come together -- this would bring not only tears, but more than tears.

And the younger President Bush, what of his inner world? He has been shorn of much -- his place in the winner's circle, old advisers. A man who worked for Richard Nixon reminded me the other night that when Nixon fired Haldeman and Ehrlichman, "he lost his asbestos suit." He lost his primary protectors and loyalists. President Bush is now without a similar layer. Old staffers gone, Rumsfeld gone, Cheney marginalized, Condi and Karen off representing. And the ISG. And the loss of Congress.

And yet the president presents himself each day in his chesty way, with what seems a jarring peppiness. A person who saw him in the White House a few days ago described him as "perky, seemed happy." At the modest dinner for outgoing U.N. head Kofi Annan -- one participant called it "stinting" -- the president joshingly approached a guest. "I don't see many friendly faces here!" he said, leaving the guest deadpanning later, "He mistook me for a friendly face."

Unlike anguished wartime presidents of old, he seems resolutely un-anguished. Think of the shattered Lincoln of the last Mathew Brady photographs, taken just weeks before he was assassinated. He'd gone from a bounding man of young middle age who awed his secretaries by his ability to hold a heavy ax from his fully outstretched arm, to, four years later, "the old tycoon." Or anguished Lyndon B. Johnson sitting in the cabinet room by himself, literally with his head in his hands. History takes a toll.

But George W. Bush seems, in the day to day, the same as he was. It is part of the Bush conundrum -- a supernal serenity or a confidence born of cluelessness? You decide. Where you stand on the war will likely determine your answer. But I'll tell you, I wonder about it and do not understand it, either what it is or what it means. I'd ask someone in the White House, but they're still stuck in Rote Talking Point Land: The president of course has moments of weariness but is sustained by his knowledge of the ultimate rightness of his course...

If he suffers, they might tell us; it would make him seem more normal, which is always a heartening thing to see in a president.

But maybe there is no suffering.

Maybe he outsources suffering. Maybe he leaves it to his father.

U.S. And Iraqi Accounts Vary Concerning Airstrike That Kills At Least 20 (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

DOJ_NMG_0105222

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — The only thing that was clear from the accounts of Friday's airstrike by American forces north of Baghdad was that at least 20 Iraqis had been killed.

But typical of the fog of war here, American and Iraqi officials disagreed on just about every other point.

The United States military said that 20 people had been killed, including 2 women, and that they were all insurgents tied to Al Qaeda. Iraqi officials gave death tolls that ranged from 22 to 32, and said that the deceased were two extended families that included as many as 10 children.

As the situation in Iraq deteriorates, counting deaths and the numbers of attacks here has become a difficult — and politically charged — business. The Iraqi government temporarily banned the release of casualty figures this fall, and the Iraq Study Group, which issued a report on the war this week in Washington, criticized the American military for what it said was a chronic undercounting of attacks.

But an average day of violence shows just how difficult counting can be here, particularly in rural areas that are hard to reach like the site of Friday's strike, which occurred in Salahuddin, a predominantly Sunni province north of Baghdad.

In a Defense Department teleconference from Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the second highest-ranking military commander in Iraq, said that 2007 would be "absolutely critical" for Iraqis and that an improvement in the situation could be achieved only by giving more Iraqis jobs and getting political leaders to reconcile.

"I happen to believe that we have done everything militarily we possibly can," he said. "I really believe the key to this conflict is to understand that it's going to take more than military action to solve the problems that face Iraq and to pull people together."

When asked about the proposal by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that American troops be drawn down by early 2008, General Chiarelli said he thought it would be possible as long as Iraqis and their political leaders were able to follow a set schedule for reconciliation.

In a nod to American urgings, Iraq's Ministry of National Dialogue said on Friday that a national reconciliation conference, one in a series that began earlier this year, would take place in Baghdad on Dec. 16, Ali Mufeed, a spokesman for the ministry said.

The American military described Friday's attack this way: The strike occurred before dawn, shortly after American soldiers came under fire as they searched buildings. Soldiers fired back, killing two gunmen, but the shooting did not stop, and the Americans called in "close air support," which fired down on the area, killing 18 people. Two of those killed were women.

"Al Qaeda in Iraq has both men and women supporting and facilitating their operations, unfortunately," the military said in a statement. American soldiers found a weapons cache that included machines guns, suicide vests and rocket-propelled grenades, the military said.

A military spokesman, Sgt. Sky Laron, declined to give the name of the village where the battle occurred but said it was 15 miles south of Samarra and 30 miles west of Balad.

That description matches the location of the town of Ishaqi, where local police officials earlier this year accused American soldiers of killing civilians then covering it up with an airstrike. The military investigated and later cleared the soldiers.

Two Iraqi officials — the governor of the province and an official from the administration of the town of Ishaqi — said that the strike had taken place in a village near Ishaqi, and that it had killed members of the extended families of two brothers, Muhammad Hussein al-Jalmood and Mahmood Hussein al-Jalmood.

A senior official in the Salahuddin governor's office said that six children had been killed. Amer Alwan, the official from Ishaqi, put the number at 10.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a military spokesman, said that American forces had entered the site after the strike and that they counted 20 bodies. None of them were children, he said.

An Iraqi satellite channel, Sharqiya, broadcast images from what it said was the scene of the strike, showing the twisted body of one child, who looked to be about 10. It also showed people digging in the rubble of a destroyed building and women crying next to corpses wrapped in colored blankets.

The official in the Salahuddin governor's office acknowledged that a fight appeared to have taken place, as investigators found empty bullet casings sprinkled near the site of the strike. Mr. Alwan said nothing of a battle and contended that all those who were killed were civilians.

"I call on the Americans to protect the lives of the civilians," Hamid al-Qaisi, the governor of the province, said by telephone. He put the death toll at 22.

The American command has tightened the rules by which forces operate in the past year.

General Chiarelli, who championed the changes, said of the strike, "I can promise you that in every one of these incidents that occurs, that it will be fully investigated."

In southern Iraq, the British military said that more than 1,000 British and Danish troops raided villages north of Basra and arrested four Iraqis whom a spokesman identified as members of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia.

Three American soldiers were killed on Thursday, and two marines were wounded, the United States military said. Iraqi authorities said that 18 bodies were found across Baghdad on Friday.

U.S.-Led Forces Kill 20 Insurgents In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 -- U.S.-led coalition forces killed 20 suspected insurgents during a raid targeting al-Qaeda in Iraq fighters northwest of Baghdad on Friday morning, the U.S. military said. Two women were among the suspects killed, the military said.

Acting on intelligence reports, ground forces were searching buildings in a village near Tharthar Lake in Salahuddin province when insurgents fired machine guns at them. The troops fired back, killing two suspects, the military said in a statement. Under attack, the troops called for an airstrike, which killed 18 more suspects, the military said.

Amir Alwan, mayor of Ishaqi, disputed the military's account, saying that 10 men, 4 women and 10 children in his village were killed. News agencies published what they said were photos of dead children at the site. The military denied that civilians and children were killed.

In another raid Friday morning, coalition forces captured seven suspected insurgents near the city of Fallujah in Anbar province and destroyed a building containing a weapons cache, according to the military. Most of the cache, which included materials for making improvised explosive devices, was buried in the floors of the house.

The raids were part of stepped-up U.S. efforts to capture insurgents and their weapons. Much of the focus has been on Baghdad, but fighting continues in Anbar province, another deadly place for American troops.

"We see al-Qaeda conducting operations to kill civilians, and it starts the cycle of sectarian violence all over again," said Lt. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman.

The military announced Friday that two U.S. soldiers were killed the day before by a roadside bomb as they patrolled an area south of Baghdad. Two soldiers were wounded in the attack.

A roadside bomb killed another U.S. soldier in western Baghdad on Thursday, the military said.

A mortar attack Friday evening in the Nahrawan neighborhood of southeast Baghdad killed 12 people and wounded 11, according to an Interior Ministry spokesman, Abdul Karim al-Kinani.

A suicide bomber detonated explosives in his car at an Iraqi army checkpoint in the northern town of Tall Afar, killing 3 civilians and injuring 15, including some Iraqi soldiers, said the city's mayor, Brig. Najim Abdullah.

Controversy erupted over the Tharthar raid.

Ishaqi police Capt. Mohammed Faisal said that two houses belonging to two brothers were destroyed in the bombing. Khalaf Muhammad, 41, a farmer in the Tharthar area, also said that two houses were bombed and that 18 people lived in them. He said neighbors found the bodies of women and children in the rubble.

The Associated Press released a photo of a man holding a dead child at the bombing site. Another news agency, Agence-France Presse, also showed photographs of dead children.

Asked about the photos, Garver said coalition forces who conducted the raid reported that they had found no children.

"We didn't see anything in those photos that specifically link the children to the airstrike," he said. "We weren't sure from these photos what was what."

Garver said that the two women whom troops reported killing were suspected insurgents. "There's nothing to indicate they were non-combatants," he said.

The troops also found AK-47 assault rifles, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, anti-personnel mines, explosives, blasting caps and suicide vests at the site, the military said.

This is not the first time residents of Ishaqi have accused American troops of misconduct. This spring, a U.S. military investigation cleared U.S. soldiers of killing 11 civilians before calling for an airstrike in a March 15 raid on a suspected insurgent hideout.

The military would not disclose the nationalities of the coalition forces involved in Friday's raid, but U.S. troops make up the largest contingent of forces in the country.

Raids also occurred in southern Iraq on Friday, with 1,000 British and Danish troops conducting a pre-dawn sweep of houses to arrest suspects in murders, kidnappings and attacks on coalition forces, according to a statement from the British military. Several suspects were arrested, the military said.

DOJ_NMG_0105224

Iraqis Allege Civilians Killed In Raids (AP)

By Kim Gamel,

AP, December 9, 2006

The U.S. military said 20 insurgents, including two women, were killed in a raid and subsequent airstrike Friday on a predominantly Sunni village northwest of Baghdad, but local officials alleged the dead were civilians — including eight children.

In southern Iraq, British and Danish forces hunted rogue Shiite militiamen blamed for recent attacks, conducting a pre-dawn raid that was described by coalition officials as the largest offensive in the area since the war began.

In the northern battle, U.S.-led coalition forces said they were searching several buildings near Lake Tharthar in Salahuddin province when al-Qaida-linked militants launched an attack. Coalition troops returned fire, killing two insurgents, the U.S. military said.

As the firefight continued, the troops called in airstrikes that killed 18 more fighters, the military said, including two women. "Al-Qaida in Iraq has both men and women supporting and facilitating their operations unfortunately," the U.S. command's statement said.

Amir Fayadh, mayor of the village of Ishaqi east of the lake, and local police disputed the claim that the strike only killed insurgents. The mayor said that 19 civilians were among the dead, including seven women and eight children.

An Associated Press photo showed an Iraqi man in blue garb holding up the dusty head of a boy of about 10, identified by villagers as killed in the attack. The boy lay on a floral print quilt, and his right hand poked out from under a piece of fabric, his fingers curled.

The twin raids capped another bloody week of sectarian violence in Iraq, and came as Washington debated a report urging the gradual shift of coalition forces out of combat and into training roles. The report said this would prepare Iraqi forces to take over security and allow American troops to go home.

Underscoring the deadly nature of the conflict, the military said two soldiers were killed and two were wounded in an explosion south of Baghdad after they left their vehicles to examine a suspected roadside bomb.

In a separate incident, a third U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb Thursday as his patrol conducted joint operations with the Iraqi army in western Baghdad.

At least 2,928 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an AP count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,356 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

At least 47 Iraqis, meanwhile, were killed or found dead Friday, including 25 who died when mortar shells landed in a poor Shiite neighborhood on the outskirts of the capital.

In the clashes near Lake Tharthar, coalition forces say they found and destroyed several weapons caches. The arsenals included AK-47s, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, anti-personnel mines, explosives, blasting caps and suicide vests, the command said.

In Ishaqi in the north, AP Television News gathered horrific video of the scene. The images show more than a dozen charred and bloody bodies, some of which appeared almost mummified. In the video, villagers pulled back colorful wool blankets to reveal several bodies. In some cases, it seemed impossible to guess the sex or age of the dead.

The mayor of Ishaqi initially reported that more than 19 civilians had died, before he lowered the figure. He said he was initially mistaken because a group of visitors had left the area just before the air strike.

This spring, a U.S. military investigation cleared American soldiers of misconduct in a March 15 raid in Ishaqi in which Air Force planes destroyed a building where al-Qaida in Iraq insurgents were thought to be hiding. Villagers claimed the soldiers killed 11 Iraqi civilians before calling for the airstrike.

In southern Iraq on Friday, more than 800 British forces and 200 Danish troops clashed with militia fighters during the large-scale raid in the Hartha area on the outskirts of Basra, coalition officials said.

British Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a spokesman for the coalition in southern Iraq, said five Iraqis were detained. He described them as members of a "rogue, breakaway element" of one of the area's many Shiite militias, and said the suspects were directly involved in several local attacks.

Burbridge called it the largest search and detention operation that coalition forces have conducted in southern Iraq since the war began in March 2003. The coalition said the raid consisted of multiple missions that occurred at the same time.

The Danish soldiers arrived from the north, while British armored vehicles drove in from the south, Burbridge said. Other British forces rode boats to the confluence of the Garmat Ali River and the Shatt al-Arab waterway. The operation was also supported by helicopters and jets, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105225

One of the houses searched is near two large mosques, but the raid ended long before the main Friday services, said Capt. Tane Dunlop, another spokesman for multinational forces in Basra.

In one house, he said, raiders found Katyusha rockets, roadside bombs, rifles and rocket-propelled grenades.

Hans Vedholm, spokesman for Army Operational Command Denmark, said coalition troops were tracking militants believed to be behind attacks on coalition forces. He called the operation a "huge success because no one was harmed."

British troops made the arrests while the Danes served as guides, he said, because the Danes were not allowed to detain people under their mandate in Iraq.

"They found some weapons and small arms, and also heavy weapons and roadside bombs," Vedholm said. Some British reserve forces were attacked by small arms fire, he added, but no casualties were reported.

"It was very calm. They went into the houses, they arrested five people," he said. "We have some evidence against them. It will now be used and they will put on trial in Iraq."

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday:

· Several mortar rounds struck about seven houses in the Nahrawan area in southeastern Baghdad, killing 25 people and wounding 22, including men, women and children.

· A suicide car bomber hit an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing three people and wounding 15, including five children, in Tal Afar. In March, President Bush called the city near the Syrian border an example of progress in securing Iraq.

· A sniper shot to death an Iraqi translator who worked with U.S. troops in Karmah, 50 miles west of Baghdad.

· Police found 18 bullet-riddled bodies in Baghdad neighborhoods. Some were bound, blindfolded and bore evidence of torture.

___

Associated Press writers Thomas Wagner and Sameer N. Yacoub in Baghdad and Karl Ritter in Stockholm, Sweden, contributed to this report.

Al-Zarqawi Said Shiites Most Dangerous (AP)

By Omar Sinan,

AP, December 9, 2006

The slain terror leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi purportedly believed that Iraq's Shiite Muslims were more dangerous than U.S. forces and more evil than dictator Saddam Hussein, according to a posthumous interview published Friday on the Internet.

The 33-page interview, conducted sometime before a U.S. fighter bomber killed the former al-Qaida in Iraq leader in June, could not be immediately authenticated. It was posted on a Web site known to be a clearing-house for al-Qaida material.

The posting, which comes amid ongoing sectarian violence in Iraq, said the interview had been kept in al-Qaida's archive but did not explain why the terror group had decided to release it six months after his death.

In the interview, al-Zarqawi is quoted as saying the leader of Iraq's Shiites, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, is a "satan" who publicly tells Shiites to stay above the violence but secretly tells them to attack.

"Al-Sistani has ordered his followers not to fight the Americans ... and yet they hit Sunnis with assassinations, forcing them to flee their homes and attacking their mosques," said al-Zarqawi, a Sunni from Jordan. "For us, the Shiites are far more dangerous than the Americans."

"The mass graves that Saddam perpetrated, and all his other crimes over the past decades, do not amount to one-tenth of what the Shiites have done in the last three years," al-Zarqawi is quoted as saying.

Earlier this week, a bipartisan commission in the United States warned "the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating" and recommended fundamentally different U.S. policies to combat the sectarian violence roiling the country.

The Iraq Study Group report also concluded that al-Qaida in Iraq is now largely made up of Sunni Arabs. Some 1,300 foreign fighters are believed to support the group or be available to carry out suicide bombings, the study found.

In the interview, Al-Zarqawi condemns the attacks of Iraq's Shiite Muslim militiamen on the country's Sunni Muslim community. Yet it was al-Zarqawi who had fomented Shiite-Sunni strife as the best way to scuttle the U.S. plans to rebuild Iraq as a democratic state after Saddam's overthrow.

Al-Zarqawi, whose real name was Ahmad Fadhil Nazzal al-Khalayleh, was responsible for the most vicious of the wave of attacks that occurred in the first years of the Iraqi insurgency. He is believed to have personally beheaded at least two American hostages. The U.S. had put a $25 million bounty on his head, the same amount as for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

In the interview, al-Zarqawi also rails against the leader of the Lebanese Shiite militant group Hezbollah, implicitly accusing Sheik Hassan Nasrallah of being in league with Israel.

Al-Zarqawi accuses Nasrallah of being two-faced in his opposition to Israel and suggests it is not an accident that Israeli aircraft have not killed him as they have killed several leaders of the Palestinian militant group Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0105226

"Hassan Nasrallah sits for hours at a military parade and Israeli aircraft don't bomb him. Who is he kidding?" al-Zarqawi is quoted as saying.

Iraq Sunni Clerics To Boycott Reconciliation Talks (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

Iraq's leading Sunni clerics' organization will boycott a national reconciliation conference called by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki to end sectarian bloodletting, it has said.

The Muslim Scholars' Association said it had not received an invitation to the meeting, which is to be held on December 16.

"The association will not participate in the reconciliation conference as proposed by the government," said Sheikh Mohammed Bashar al-Faidhi, spokesman of the association, arguing that previous talks had failed.

"We have seen in the past more than once that the government signs some agreements and later goes back on it," he told AFP Saturday, referring to a peace conference in Cairo last year.

"In any case, we have not been invited to the conference," he added.

The head of the association, Sheikh Hareth al-Dhari, is currently outside Iraq. The government has opened a criminal investigation against him for allegedly inciting sectarian violence against Iraq's Shiite majority.

The conference was first due to take place in early 2006 but had been postponed due to an upsurge in the violence plaguing Iraq. On Friday, officials announced it would take place next week.

Iraq's warring Shiite and Sunni communities are locked in brutal tit-for-tat sectarian violence that has left thousands dead since February when a revered Shiite shrine was bombed by Sunni militants.

US, Iraqi Forces Detain Aide Of Shiite Radical Leader (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

US and Iraqi forces arrested Shiite radical leader Moqtada al-Sadr's representative in the central city of Kut and seven of his guards, a security official and a Sadr spokesman has said.

Sheikh Yahya Ahmed al-Khafaji, the head of Sadr's movement in Kut, 175 kilometres (110 miles) southeast of Baghdad, was seized in an early morning swoop on his office, an Iraqi security official said on condition of anonymity.

A Sadr spokesman in Baghdad confirmed the raid.

"We have information that US and Iraqi forces arrested the chief of our office in Kut and his seven guards early today. They also took away office equipment such as computers and other papers," said Sheikh Saleh Hassan Saturday.

He said the Sadr group was planning a protest in front of the provincial governor's office in Kut to demand their release.

"If occupation forces are so active and capable, they should target terrorist hideouts and not escalate violence in peaceful regions like Kut," said Hassan, who is also a member of the Iraqi parliament.

The raid was also confirmed by another Sadr aide from the cleric's main office in the Shiite holy city of Najaf.

The US military has often targeted supporters of Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is accused of killing Sunni Arab civilians amid the sectarian bloodshed gripping Iraq.

GOP Senator Calls Iraq Policy "Absurd," Urges Pullout (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Sen. Gordon Smith, a moderate Oregon Republican, broke sharply with the Bush administration over the war in Iraq in an emotional speech on the Senate floor Thursday night in which he called for a U.S. pullout.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," he said. "That is absurd. It may even be criminal. I cannot support that anymore."

Smith, who has shown some maverick tendencies in the past, such as when he blocked the 2005 budget resolution until his GOP colleagues agreed to add billions of dollars to Medicaid, said that he had "tried to be a good soldier. . . . I have tried to support our president."

He said that Bush "is not guilty of perfidy, but I do believe he is guilty of believing bad intelligence and giving us the same." He said he would not have voted in favor of invading Iraq had he known what he knows now.

The positive events in Iraq, such as its elections and the toppling of the statue of Saddam Hussein, "now . . . seem much like ashes to me."

DOJ_NMG_0105227

Speaking to a largely empty Senate chamber, Smith rejected the Iraq Study Group's key recommendation that the U.S. military reshape its approach to Iraq and focus less on combat operations and more on training and advising Iraqi forces. He said it seemed to him to be a "recipe for retreat," not an immediate withdrawal but rather "cut and walk."

He said he doubts that the bipartisan commission's approach is wise if it would simply delay the inevitable. The U.S. government, he said, should find a way to either "win or bring our troops home."

Car Bomb Kills Five Near Iraq Shiite Shrine (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

A powerful car bomb has killed at least five people and wounded dozens more close to one of Iraq's holiest Shiite shrines in the central city of Karbala.

Salim Khadum, spokesman for Karbala's health department, said that five people had been killed and 44 wounded in the attack, according to an initial toll. A security official confirmed these figures Saturday.

The blast erupted at 11:00 am (0800 GMT) in Al-Abbas street, a few hundred metres (yards) from the Imam al-Abbas mausoleum, the final resting place of the son of the founder of Shiite Islam and one of the sect's early leaders.

Several civilian cars and a row of shops caught fire.

Despite thick smoke and flames, crowds of bystanders converged on the scene but were driven back by police, fearful of a follow-up blasts, a hallmark of attacks by Iraq's insurgent car bomb cells.

Karbala city authorities ordered roads into the city closed to traffic from other towns, allowing only residents to circulate in the popular Shiite pilgrimage destination until the sitaution stabilises.

The attack will probably be blamed on Sunni extremists and came hot on the heels of a call by Shiite Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki for a reconciliation conference to stem raging sectarian violence.

Bomb attacks on Shiite shrines and civilians have been one of the major motors driving the cycle of sectarian revenge attacks which have brought the country to the brink of civil war.

More than 100 Iraqis are killed every day in insurgent and sectarian violence and this week a major report into US strategy described the situation as "grave and deteriorating" and warned it could trigger a regional war.

Maliki has summoned the leaders of Iraq's factions to a national peace conference on December 16 but already on Saturday at least one major Sunni group vowed to stay away.

Shiite leaders have also warned that they will not attend if figures linked to the Baath party of ousted president Saddam Hussein -- some of whom have roles in the insurgency -- are invited.

Tribal Leaders Detained In Southern Iraqi City (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD — About 1,000 British and Danish troops staged a major raid Friday in Basra, Iraq's second-largest city, detaining five tribal leaders with ties to Shiite militias, British officials said.

The operation was the largest in Basra since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein's government, said Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a spokesman for British forces in Basra.

The move was part of an effort by the British, who are in charge of security in Basra, to suppress fighting among Shiite groups and tribes in the area.

Tribes in the Hartha district of Basra, where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers meet, have been clashing for decades, ever since Hussein's draining of the marshy area created disputed territory and simmering "blood feuds," Burbridge said.

Shiite groups, meanwhile, are vying for control of the local government. Basra's political leadership is almost evenly split between the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, which has affiliates in Iran, and Al Fadila al Islamiya, a homegrown party.

The area is also home to a large group of Shiites loyal to Muqtada Sadr, a radical anti-U.S. cleric, and his Al Mahdi army.

'Part of a network'

Burbridge said the five men arrested Friday belong to "a rogue breakaway element of a Shiite militia … part of a network that's operating in Basra." A Sadr official in Basra said at least one of the men was allied with the cleric's army.

The raid began at 3 a.m., with Royal Marine amphibious assault teams creeping up from the river, 800 British troops closing in from the south, 200 Danish troops arriving from the north, and helicopters and jets hovering overhead, Burbridge said.

British troops in the region, who number about 7,300, usually conduct raids in smaller, more nimble groups of about 250, Burbridge said. This time, the 1,000 soldiers split up into groups to seize the five men simultaneously at their homes, preventing them from alerting one another and going into hiding for weeks, said Capt. Tane Dunlop, also a spokesman for the south's multinational forces.

DOJ_NMG_0105228

"These are people who are involved in planning and carrying out terrorist acts in the area," Dunlop said.

British and U.S. authorities would not disclose the detainees' names, but Khalil Maliki, who heads Sadr's Basra office, said they include Kadhum Abid Ali, the mayor of Hartha, who is allied with Sadr's followers.

A witness to the raid, retiree Sami Halfi, 58, said he saw the mayor arrested at his home at dawn. Four months ago, he said, the mayor's son was also detained by British forces.

No civilians or troops were injured in the raid, Burbridge said, and Iraqi army and police forces were not involved, although soldiers from the Iraqi army's 10th Division patrolled the streets afterward.

Friday morning, gunmen from the Garamsha and Shaghanba tribes protested the operation, blocking the main road to Baghdad, said Maliki, the Sadr official. By afternoon, they had sent a letter to British regional commanders demanding the release of the five leaders and threatening to overthrow the local government.

The gunmen withdrew at 3 p.m. at the urging of tribal leaders, who are negotiating with city officials to exert pressure on the British to win the detainees' release, Iraqi police Lt. Basim Abdul Nabi said.

At local mosques, clerics used their Friday sermons to appeal for the leaders' release.

"If the British forces don't release the five detainees, then the tribes will break into the governorate [building], since the local government is not being able to protect its own people," said Shiite cleric Abdul Kareem Enzi, who is associated with Sadr.

Ali Khanani, who leads the SCIRI political bureau in Basra, said British troops should let the Iraqi army and police secure the city, rather than "use violence and violation in their raids."

"The best thing the multinational troops could do at this point is hand over security to the Iraqis," he said.

On Friday, at least 29 people died in violence nationwide. During the preceding 24 hours, 18 bodies were found in Baghdad, some shot execution-style.

The U.S. military announced that a roadside bomb killed an American soldier Thursday during a joint patrol with the Iraqi army in west Baghdad, bringing the number of U.S. troops killed this month to 37.

North of Baghdad

Elsewhere in Iraq, U.S. forces conducted a raid north of Baghdad, killing 20 people. Military officials said the dead, including two women, were all armed insurgents with ties to the group Al Qaeda in Iraq. Residents said civilians had been targeted and killed.

The raid began at 12:30 a.m. Friday in the village of Jazeera in the Ishaqi farming region, about 50 miles north of Baghdad. Troops searched homes and traded fire with residents before calling in planes to bomb the area, the military said in a statement.

Eighteen men and two women were killed, two of them during the initial fighting, the military said. Soldiers also destroyed several weapons caches, containing AK-47s, machine guns, rocket-propelled grenades, antipersonnel mines, explosives, blasting caps and suicide vests, it said.

The Interior Ministry said the raid killed 19 — 10 children, five women and four men — and that no weapons were found in the area. Mayor Amer Alwan said troops killed four women, six children and 15 men, all execution-style. Witnesses identified the owners of the two homes targeted as brothers Mohammed and Mahmood Jalmood.

"The American sources say that they were terrorists, but they were a family of two brothers and among them were children and women," said Hamad Kaisi, governor of surrounding Salahuddin province.

Residents later displayed the bodies of five children, wrapped in blankets.

Photographs taken at the bombing site Friday afternoon show a man wrapping a child's bloodied body in a blanket, rows of wrapped bodies, and a gray, rubble-filled crater the size of a small house.

It was the second major raid by U.S. forces on Ishaqi this year. In March, soldiers looking for insurgents fired into the home of a schoolteacher, killing 11 people, including five children.

Military investigators later cleared the soldiers of wrongdoing but acknowledged nine civilian casualties, six more than originally reported.

How Syria May Hold Key To Iraq (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen, Neil King

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration has spent the past six years shaking its fist at Syria because of Damascus's ties to Islamic extremists across the Middle East. But now Iraq's civil war is sparking calls for the U.S. to reach out to Syria, raising the possibility of a U.S. policy shift that could put Washington on a collision course with Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0105229

Members of the Baker-Hamilton commission, backed quietly by a number of senior Bush administration officials, say it is critical for the U.S. to find a way of persuading Syria to abandon its close ties with Iran and drop its support for Hezbollah and other militants. They want the White House to offer Damascus a series of economic and political incentives, including America's help in pressuring Israel to relinquish the disputed Golan Heights.

The approach would be a high-stakes turnaround for the Bush administration that would be certain to anger Washington's closest ally in the Middle East; senior Israeli officials are already publicly objecting to the possibility of new U.S. overtures to Syria. But advocates of greater engagement with Syria argue that there may be no other choice. They say a decision by Syria to use its influence over Iraq's Sunni population to help calm the situation there -- paired with Syrian moves to end support to Islamic-militant groups like Hamas -- could significantly improve conditions in Iraq and across the region.

Securing Syrian assistance would come at a high cost, and so far the Bush administration has reacted coolly to the idea. Senior administration officials question both the intentions and the capabilities of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad, whom they deride as weak and untrustworthy.

These officials argue that Mr. Assad -- who took power in 2000 after the death of his father, strongman leader Hafez -- is unable to control his government or military firmly enough to ensure that a formal Syrian commitment to cut ties to Hezbollah or Hamas would be honored. "He's not his father," one senior official said.

The calls to engage Syria are alarming many Israeli officials, who fear Washington's need to extricate itself from the morass in Iraq may result in new American pressure for Israeli territorial concessions.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert this past week said that his government disagrees with the "attempt to create linkage between the Iraqi issue and the Mideast issue" and that it would be premature to resume peace talks with Syria. Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was scheduled to meet with U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Saturday to relay her government's concerns, Israeli officials said.

Edward Djerejian, a former U.S. ambassador to Syria who drafted a good portion of the Baker-Hamilton commission's report, said that Syria is the key to the regional puzzle and that the U.S. can ill afford to ignore it. The panel, a congressionally funded group of five prominent Democrats and five leading Republicans, said in the report issued this past week that the administration's Iraq policy is failing and called for most U.S. combat troops to leave the country by early 2008.

In an interview, Mr. Djerejian said the aim of any future U.S. negotiations with Syria should be to persuade Damascus to cut off its aid and trans-shipment of Iranian arms to Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories. In addition, Syria should be pressured to cajole Hamas into recognizing Israel's right to exist, a move -- however unlikely -- that could rejuvenate the stalled peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

Mr. Djerejian said talks with Syria would have a second, important goal: driving a wedge between Damascus and Tehran, whose growing political and military alliance is sparking fears of an Iranian-dominated "Shiite crescent" stretching from Iran to Lebanon. The U.S. is already making a broad push to enlist traditional Sunni Arab powers like Egypt in a coalition to offset Shiite Iran's growing regional power, but Mr. Djerejian said the effort is doomed to fail without Syrian involvement. Syria is controlled by members of its Allawite minority, a form of Shiism that is rejected as heretical by some Sunnis.

The heated debate over Syria reflects growing concern in Washington over the dire situation in Iraq, where a civil war has left tens of thousands of Iraqis dead, along with nearly 3,000 American military personnel. The chaos there has sparked fears of a wider, regional conflagration.

When the U.S. invaded Iraq in March 2003, President Bush argued that getting rid of Saddam Hussein was the best way to boost the chances for a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Now, the Iraq Study Group is arguing the reverse: that ending the Arab-Israeli conflict, particularly the long-running dispute between Israel and Syria, would do much to improve the odds for success in Iraq.

Critics in the U.S., in Israel and among some Arab allies have questioned that assertion. They say the approach recommended by the commission co-chairmen, former Secretary of State James Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton, risks further empowering Damascus and Tehran, with slim chance of getting anything in return.

Dennis Ross, a former Mideast envoy in the Clinton and first Bush administrations, said he favors greater engagement with Syria provided that Washington first tells the Assad government that it would pay a price for choosing not to cooperate. He said the administration could threaten to fully enforce the Syria Accountability Act, legislation enacted in 2003 that imposes travel and economic sanctions on the country, or impose other punitive measures. The U.S. could also make clear that it could make a new push for a Syrian-Israeli peace accord if Damascus drops its support for Hamas and Hezbollah.

"It's important to not convince Syria that we need them more than they need us," Mr. Ross said. "You have to concentrate their minds with what they will lose by not cooperating before you can get them to change their behavior."

Israeli officials and their congressional supporters question the Iran Study Group's recommendation that the U.S. convene a new round of Mideast peace talks with an eye toward cajoling Israel to return the Golan Heights to Syria. The group said in its report that the strategically important plateau, which Israel seized in the 1967 Six Day War, is the biggest incentive that could be offered to Syria. The Clinton administration during its last year in office tried to broker an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for security guarantees and a full peace accord with Syria, but the talks broke down in 2000 and haven't resumed.

DOJ_NMG_0105230

Dore Gold, a former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations, said in a critique of the Baker report that "it is particularly disturbing" that the panel "does not call for the complete dismantling of international terrorist organizations in Syria as a precondition for the Israeli-Syrian agreement it foresees."

Messrs. Baker and Hamilton have said they are hopeful that Syria might be open to cooperating over Iraq, a confidence they don't share vis-à-vis Iran.

Mr. Baker said he isn't making Israel a pawn in a plan to rescue the U.S. in Iraq. "The road to peace in Iraq lies through Baghdad," he said this past week. "The road to Arab-Israeli peace lies through Jerusalem. We are not linking the two, but there is a relationship."

Rice Wary Of Seeking Iran, Syria's Help (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 9, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice voiced skepticism on Friday over a bipartisan panel's recommendation that the United States seek Iran and Syria's help to stabilize Iraq, saying they should want to take such steps on their own.

If those two nations truly want to help, "they will act on that because it's in their interest," Rice said.

"Let's remember that the issue here is behavior. Can you change the behavior of these states?" she asked at a news conference at the State Department with the German foreign minister.

Rice also said the United States is making progress toward a deal on imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program although "we're not there yet" after a disappointing round of talks among world powers this week.

Rice was asked about recommendations issued on Wednesday by a panel headed by Republican James A. Baker III and Democrat Lee Hamilton calling for withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops from Iraq by early 2008. The panel also called for overtures to Iran and Syria, a course the Bush administration has thus far rejected.

The report cited a grave and deteriorating situation in Iraq.

"None of us see the situation in Iraq as favorable. We all see it as extremely difficult," Rice said.

She said the situation in Iraq and the broader Middle East was high on the agenda of her talks with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

As to the effort to impose sanctions on Iran for refusing to abandon the enrichment of uranium, Rice said, "I think we're making some progress on the resolution in the Security Council. We're not there yet, but I do think we're making some progress."

Of the Baker-Hamilton report, Rice said it was "a very good report by people that I admire. I think they have done a great service in pointing out, through analysis and recommendations, how they see the situation in Iraq."

She said the U.S. needs to give Iraq "better tools, particularly on the security side," as the report suggests.

"I've been doing some deep thinking on Iraq, which if you don't mind I'll share first with the president as he begins to think about what new course we need," Rice said.

President Bush is expected to deliver a speech outlining his latest strategy proposal for Iraq before Christmas. He has said he will draw not only from the Baker-Hamilton report, but from ongoing studies by the Pentagon, the National Security Agency and the State Department.

Rice said that if Iran and Syria, which the United States accuses of fomenting terrorism in the Middle East, really wanted to help bring peace to Iraq, they would do so.

She noted that the Iraqi government has contacts with both countries and is capable of engaging in its own diplomacy.

She added that if Iran and Syria are "looking for compensation to stop helping destabilize Iraq, that's another matter altogether."

The Bush administration is leery of contacts with Iran that would allow the Shiite clerical leaders to try to avoid or lessen U.N. punishment in return for help in Iraq. Iran has influence among Iraqi Shiites, and the two countries share both a complicated history and a porous border.

The U.S. and Europeans are pushing for a U.N. sanctions resolution by the end of the year. The West accuses Iran of hiding plans to build a bomb while developing what it claims is a peaceful program to produce nuclear power.

Iran was on the agenda for a meeting Rice held earlier Friday with Russian national security adviser Igor Ivanov, whose nation has resisted strong sanctions for months.

DOJ_NMG_0105231

Germany, France and Britain led failed talks with Iran last year that European powers had hoped would avert U.N. sanctions. Europe joined the United States in seeking sanctions early this year, but the process has bogged down repeatedly over objections from Russia and China. Both nations are permanent, veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council that have trade and other ties to Iran.

Watchdog Agency For Iraq Projects Survives (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — After weeks of legislative maneuvering, the House passed a bill on Friday extending the life of a federal oversight agency that will now have the authority to examine $32 billion in American taxpayer expenditures on reconstruction in Iraq through approximately 2008.

A spokeswoman at the White House, Emily A. Lawrimore, said President Bush intended to sign the bill, which had been introduced in the House by Representative Ike Skelton, Democrat of Missouri. On Wednesday, the Senate passed an identical bill, sponsored by Senator Susan Collins, a Maine Republican, and by a bipartisan group of legislative allies.

Mr. Skelton suggested that after Congress reconvened in January, he might seek to expand the authority still further, possibly going beyond physical and institutional reconstruction projects to money being used to train and equip Iraqi security forces.

"More work must be done to ensure the oversight of all taxpayer dollars invested in Iraq," Mr. Skelton said in a statement.

The financial authority of the oversight agency, called the Office of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, had already been expanded in October. But in a provision backed by Representative Duncan Hunter, Republican of California, the office would have been forced to begin shutting down soon and handing its duties over to offices at the Pentagon and the State Department.

Opponents of that move doubted that Bush administration agencies would be sufficiently motivated to investigate themselves, a contention that Pentagon and State officials dismissed. But after the bipartisan Iraq Study Group recommended Wednesday that the special inspector general be maintained for as long as American financial assistance was flowing to Iraq, there was swift action on the new House and Senate bills.

The special inspector general's office, run by Stuart W. Bowen Jr., also has the authority to look at about $20 billion in reconstruction directed by American officials but paid for with Iraqi oil proceeds and assets seized from Saddam Hussein's government. That authority is unchanged by the new legislation.

Iraqis Near Deal On Distribution Of Oil Revenues (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — Iraqi officials are near agreement on a national oil law that would give the central government the power to distribute current and future oil revenues to the provinces or regions, based on their population, Iraqi and American officials say.

If enacted, the measure, drafted by a committee of politicians and ministers, could help resolve a highly divisive issue that has consistently blocked efforts to reconcile the country's feuding ethnic and sectarian factions. Sunni Arabs, who lead the insurgency, have opposed the idea of regional autonomy for fear that they would be deprived of a fair share of the country's oil wealth, which is concentrated in the Shiite south and Kurdish north.

The Iraq Study Group report stressed that an oil law guaranteeing an equitable distribution of revenues was crucial to the process of national reconciliation, and thus to ending the war.

Without such a law, it would also be impossible for Iraq to attract the foreign investment it desperately needs to bolster its oil industry.

Officials cautioned that this was only a draft agreement, and that it could still be undermined by the ethnic and sectarian squabbling that has jeopardized other political talks. The Iraqi Constitution, for example, was stalled for weeks over small wording conflicts, and its measures are often meaningless in the chaos and violence in Iraq today.

But a deal on the oil law could be reached within days, according to officials involved in the drafting. It would then go to the cabinet and Parliament for approval.

The major remaining stumbling block, officials said, concerns the issuing of contracts for developing future oil fields. The Kurds are insisting that the regions reserve final approval over such contracts, fearing that if that power were given to a Shiite-dominated central government, it could ignore proposed contracts in the Kurdish north while permitting them in the Shiite south, American and Iraqi officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0105232

The national oil law lies at the heart of debates about the future of Iraq, particularly the issue of a strong central government versus robust regional governments. The oil question has also inflamed ethnic and sectarian tensions. Sunni Arabs, who preside over areas of the country that apparently have little or no oil, are adamant about the equitable distribution of oil revenues by the central government.

On the drafting committee, Sunni Arabs have allied with the Shiites against the Kurds, who have sought to maintain as much regional control as possible over the oil industry in their autonomous northern enclave. Iraqi Kurdistan has enjoyed de facto independence since 1991, when the American military established a no-flight zone above the mountainous region to prevent raids by Saddam Hussein.

Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander here, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, have urged Iraqi politicians to put the oil law at the top of their agendas, saying it must be passed before the year's end.

The drafting committee is made up of ministers and politicians from the main Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish blocs in government. They began talks months ago, but the pace picked up recently, said an American official tracking the negotiations, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he did not want to give the appearance of Western interference in sovereign Iraqi matters.

At the start of the talks, the Kurds fought to ensure that regional governments have the power to collect and distribute revenues from future fields, Iraqi and American officials said. They also proposed that revenues be shared among the regions based on both population and crimes committed against the people under Mr. Hussein's rule. That would have given the Kurds and Shiites a share of the oil wealth larger than the proportions of their populations.

But the Kurds dropped those demands, said Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister who is a Kurd and the chairman of the committee.

"Revenue sharing is an accepted principle by all the constituent elements of the Iraqi government, including the Kurds, and that is the unifying element that we're all hoping for in the oil law," Mr. Salih said in an interview.

The American official said the Kurds were willing to make concessions because a national oil law could attract more foreign oil companies to exploration and development in Kurdistan. A large foreign oil company would have more confidence in signing a contract with the Kurds if it were to operate under the law of a sovereign country rather than just the law of an autonomous region.

Some Kurdish leaders also believe that the concessions are a worthwhile price to pay for having a stake in the much larger revenue pool of the country's oil industry, the American official said. The southern fields accounted for 85 percent of total Iraqi crude production last year, partly because northern production was hampered by insurgent sabotage. The south has an estimated 65 percent of the country's 115 billion barrels of proven reserves.

But the Kurds are still holding out on the issue of oil contracts, arguing that the Constitution guarantees the regions absolute rights in those matters. The Kurds recently discovered two new oil fields after signing exploration contracts with a Turkish company and a Norwegian company.

"There are those among us who say we cannot go back to the former days of centralization, which were not conducive to good business practice and to the idea of federalism that is enshrined in the Constitution," Mr. Salih said.

In its recommendations released Wednesday, the Iraq Study Group took the opposite tack, to the anger of the Kurds. The report said that "no formula that gives control over revenues from future fields to the regions or gives control of oil fields to the regions is compatible with national reconciliation." Though the Kurds have ceded their position on the issue of future revenues, they are fighting for control over the development of future fields.

The drafting committee met Thursday night to try to resolve the contract issue, but could not reach an agreement.

Distributing revenues by population could be a difficult matter without a reliable census, which Iraq lacks. Sunni Arabs often claim they are at least 60 percent of the population, not the 20 percent that is commonly cited. The Shiites are generally estimated to be 60 percent of the population, and the Kurds 20 percent. The American official said a national census expected to be taken next year should determine the share of revenue that goes to each province or region.

If doing a census next year is too politically fraught, or if security conditions prevent it, then revenues could be distributed to provincial or regional governments according to the household counts used by Mr. Hussein's government to distribute rations in the 1990s.

The Kurds have insisted that revenues collected by the central government should be put into an account that automatically redistributes the money into sub-accounts dedicated to the provinces or regions. This approach could be written into the national oil law or into a separate law, the American official said.

The working draft of the oil law re-establishes the state-run Iraq National Oil Company, which was founded in 1964 to oversee oil production but was shut down by Mr. Hussein in 1987. The company would operate using a business model and not through a government budget process. Iraqi and American officials say that would make management of oil production more efficient and separate it from the Oil Ministry, which has been rife with corruption.

DOJ_NMG_0105233

The North and South Oil Companies, which currently manage production in their regions, would fall under the umbrella of the Iraq National Oil Company. Any exports would still be sold through a state marketing company.

The law also sets production thresholds for creating new regional companies. A province or region, for example, might have to show it can produce 100,000 barrels a day before a company can be created there. Officials in Maysan Province in the south have already said they want to start a company.

Iraq Bribe Prosecutors Criticised As "lazy" (FT)

By Hugh Williamson, Adam Jones

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

State prosecutors are dragging their feet investigating corruption in the Iraq oil-for-food programme, according to one of the authors of last year's United Nations report on one of the world's largest bribery scandals.

Mark Pieth, a Switzerland-based lawyer who wrote the report with Paul Volcker, former chairman of the US Federal Reserve, told the Financial Times that prosecutors in many countries were too career-minded, too unwilling to enter new legal terrain "and sometimes simply lazy".

In spite of high-profile investigations in Australia, France and elsewhere, few cases have led to charges being laid in the 13 months since the report was published. Mr Pieth said he was "astonished" the report's conclusions had not led to organisational changes in the UN, which was accused of mishandling the oil-for-food programme.

He welcomed the October decision by a Paris judge working on the oil-for-food scandal to charge with corruption Christophe de Margerie, head of exploration and production at Total, the French oil and gas group.

Mr Pieth said the "spectacular" case meant there were "many doubts" that Mr de Margerie, would, as planned, become chief executive next year. He added that this relatively rare breakthrough was because of France's handful of "very stubborn" anti-graft prosecutors. Total said yesterday Mr de Margerie would take up the post as planned in February. It has previously denied violating the UN embargo in place against Iraq until 2002.

Prosecutors in various countries have complained of the unclear legal basis for prosecuting the 2,200 companies named as law-breakers in the Volcker report. But Mr Pieth said the investigations were "straightforward legal work".

"As a prosecutor you rarely get promoted for such work, so many are not interested in it," said Mr Pieth, chair of the Basel Institute on Governance and adviser to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

He accused governments of failing to provide enough support to identify companies that allegedly paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime to gain contracts.

Mr Pieth said an Australian inquiry that last month confirmed evidence of corruption in the Australian Wheat Board's involvement in the UN programme was important because it showed "the AWB knew even more [about corruption in Iraq] than it was willing to admit" to the Volcker inquiry.

Iraqis Line Up To Put Hussein In The Noose (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 8 — One of the most coveted jobs in Iraq does not yet exist: the executioner for Saddam Hussein. The death sentence against Mr. Hussein is still under review by an appeals court, but hundreds of people have already started lobbying the prime minister's office for the position.

They have sent messages through cabinet officials and their assistants, and by way of government guards and clerical workers. One candidate, an Iraqi Shiite living in London whose brother was killed by Mr. Hussein, telephoned an aide to the prime minister to say he was prepared to drop everything and fly to Baghdad to execute the former ruler.

"One of the hardest tasks will be to determine who gets to be the hangman because so many people want revenge for the loss of their loved ones," said Basam Ridha, an adviser to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki.

Mr. Hussein and two of his top associates, Barzan Ibrahim al-Tikriti and Awad al-Bandar, were sentenced to "death by hanging" on Nov. 5 for their involvement in the arrest and killings of 148 men and boys after an assassination attempt against him in the town of Dujail in 1982. The nine-judge appeals bench has no time limit to issue its ruling, but if it upholds the death sentence, Mr. Hussein's execution must be carried out within 30 days.

Iraqi judicial officials said they expected that the appeals process would be completed in a matter of weeks and, if the sentence is upheld, that Mr. Hussein's hanging would take place between mid-January and mid-March.

DOJ_NMG_0105234

The Shiite-led government has argued for a swift execution, saying that as long as Mr. Hussein is alive, he remains a powerful source of motivation for elements of the Sunni Arab insurgency fighting to restore him to power.

There are other critical issues the government will need to decide should the appeals court uphold the death sentence against Mr. Hussein, including where he will be executed.

Officials have considered staging a public hanging in Baghdad's largest sports arena, Shaab Stadium, and filling the place with tens of thousands of spectators, according to a high-ranking government official involved in the executions process, who agreed to discuss the subject on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about it on the record.

But while such a spectacle might satisfy a communal need for closure, the authorities have rejected the idea for security reasons. A target that big, they say, would be highly vulnerable to attack by Sunni insurgents who might try to lob a few mortar shells into the crowd or ambush spectators on their way to and from the event.

Government hangings are now conducted in a prison complex in eastern Baghdad. Mr. Hussein, who is being held at Camp Cropper, an American military prison near Baghdad International Airport, could be transported to those gallows by helicopter. But officials worry that the trip would present an unnecessary opportunity for a rescue attempt by his sympathizers.

Most likely, officials say, Mr. Hussein will be hanged at gallows specially built for him at Camp Cropper.

The death penalty in Iraq, which applies to a range of crimes including terrorism and certain categories of murder, was suspended in 2003 by the American occupation authorities but reinstated in August 2004. Since then, 51 people — men and several women — have been hanged and about 170 are currently on death row awaiting execution or the outcome of their appeal, according to Hashim al-Shibli, Iraq's justice minister.

Those are the official numbers. The high-ranking government official involved in the executions process said the actual number of hangings was far higher, though fewer than 100, because of three sets of hangings that took place between December 2005 and March 2006 and were never publicized.

Human rights groups have questioned the transparency of the criminal justice system in Iraq and the ability of defendants to get a fair trial. And the United Nations has requested that the Iraqi government commute the sentences of all the prisoners on Iraq's death row. But Iraqi leaders have rebuffed calls for the abolishment of the death penalty, arguing that it serves as a deterrent to crimes.

"Maliki wants to show decisiveness that people should be punished," said Mr. Ridha, Mr. Maliki's adviser. "He is very anxious that these executions take place in a timely manner." He added, "The number of executions that have taken place is not a great number compared to the number of insurgents in the country."

The gallows are in a concrete building within a heavily guarded prison complex in eastern Baghdad, near the headquarters of the Interior Ministry. Two scaffolds made of steel sit side by side in an otherwise unadorned room, according to the high-ranking government official, who has attended hangings there. (The Justice Ministry and the Maliki administration denied requests to visit the prison and, citing security concerns, refused to give the precise location of the site.)

The government prefers to conduct several hangings in a day for the sake of efficiency. Men condemned to death are held on Iraq's death row — a wing of rudimentary cells, separated from other inmates in the prison compound. Condemned women are held at a women's prison in Khadamiya, a neighborhood in northern Baghdad.

The prisoners are told they will be hanged on the morning of their executions, officials said. They are led out of their cells in single file, dressed in orange jumpsuits, their ankles and wrists manacled, and taken to a room off the gallows chambers, where they are allowed to sit on floor cushions. There, they are permitted to pray. They can eat a last meal if they request it, or smoke a cigarette. They are given an opportunity to compose a last will and testament. Then, two by two and hooded, they are taken to the gallows.

The victims are led up a set of steel stairs to a platform, about 15 feet above the ground, and nooses fashioned from one-and-a-quarter-inch-thick hemp ropes are slipped over their necks. The executioners are different each time, drawn from among employees of the Justice Ministry who volunteer for the job. Many have lost relatives or friends in insurgent attacks, officials said.

With a tug of two large levers, the steel trapdoors drop open and the victims fall through. The doors make a loud clanging sound as they slam against the apparatus, according to people who have witnessed hangings. The jarring noise echoes off the cold, unadorned concrete walls.

Death is supposed to come instantly — a doctor is on hand to certify it — and the bodies are removed to a cooler where they are held before being handed over to the victims' families. The entire process is recorded by a photographer and a video cameraman and the images are stored in a government archive.

But the hangings have not always gone smoothly.

Until the new gallows were built, the Iraqi government used an apparatus and an old rope left over from Mr. Hussein's government, said the high-ranking government official. The rope had become so elastic that it would sometimes take as much as eight minutes to kill the convicted person.

DOJ_NMG_0105235

On Sept. 6, the Iraqi authorities planned to hang 27 people. On the 13th hanging, according to an official who was there, the rope snapped and the convicted man plummeted 15 feet through the trap door onto the concrete floor. “God saved me!” the man cried. “God is great! I did not deserve this!” For an hour, he lay on the ground praying and shouting while prison guards and the executioner debated whether this constituted divine intervention and, if so, whether the man’s life should be spared. Once a new rope was rigged, however, the man was forced up the stairs once again and successfully hanged. The incident was first reported in Time magazine of Nov. 20.

The executions are conducted in secrecy to avert insurgent attacks. On March 9, a government convoy carrying a representative from the administration of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari was ambushed on its way to the gallows. It was an unsuccessful effort to stop the representative from observing the day’s hangings, including the execution of Shukair Farid, a murderous former police officer whom the government had nicknamed “the butcher of Mosul.”

On another execution day, word leaked out and insurgents pelted the prison facility with mortar shells. The Iraqi subcontractors who built the new gallows, under the auspices of an American contractor, were forced to interrupt work several times because of threats by insurgents, officials said.

The current hanging procedures are an improvement over the methods used by Mr. Hussein, who conducted mass executions in a hangarlike building at Abu Ghraib prison. According to human rights groups, hundreds of prisoners were executed in a span of a few weeks in the 1990s to address prison overcrowding.

Mr. Hussein himself asked the court to execute him by firing squad, the method used for soldiers sentenced to death. He said it was his right because he was commander in chief of Iraq’s armed forces at the time of the events in Dujail. His request was denied.

The protocols for his hanging have not yet been determined, including who will get to attend, Maliki administration officials said. In a standard Iraqi hanging, the attendance is limited to representatives from the Justice Ministry, the Interior Ministry and the prime minister’s office, and a doctor. Mr. Shibli, the justice minister, said the convict’s lawyer was allowed to attend, as well as a member of the clergy of the victim’s choice, though in practice they rarely do.

The usual videographer and photographer will probably be on hand, as well, to record the hanging, officials said, and excerpts of the event may be shown later on national television. Mr. Ridha says the Iraqi people will want to see it.

Afghanistan War Nears "Tipping Point" (LAT)

By Laura King, David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — The conflict in Afghanistan has entered a dangerous phase, and the next three to six months could prove crucial in determining whether the United States and its NATO partners can suppress a revitalized enemy — or will be dragged into another drawn-out and costly fight with an Islamic insurgency, according to senior military and security officials and diplomats.

"I think we are approaching a tipping point, perhaps early in the new year," said a Western diplomat in the region, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the situation publicly.

Popular support for the central government is faltering, and Western military allies are deeply divided over how best to combat the insurgency.

On the other side of the fight, the Taliban has regained the strength to dominate large swaths of Afghanistan; government control is tenuous at best in at least 20% of the country, according to several Western diplomats and Afghan officials.

Militants have built a network of bases in the tribal hinterlands that straddle the frontier with Pakistan. Over the last year, a growing number of mobile encampments on the Afghan side of the border have given the insurgents greater self-sufficiency, military officials say, although the guerrillas still draw heavily on logistical support and weaponry funneled from the Pakistani side.

"They can come and go pretty much undetected," acknowledged U.S. Army Brig. Gen. Michael T. Harrison Sr., who is overseeing the training and equipping of the struggling Afghan national army.

Observers point to an inexorable upward trend in violence that includes suicide attacks, roadside bombs and border clashes. "We have a bona fide war going on," Harrison said.

A widely cited recent report by the Joint Coordination and Monitoring Board, a panel of Afghan and foreign officials, said such attacks had increased fourfold from last year, killing at least 3,700 people so far in 2006.

A military spokesman in Kabul, the capital, for NATO's International Security Assistance Force, U.S. Army Maj. Luke Knittig, said he did not believe the report accurately reflected long-term trends. But a number of outside experts tracking the trajectory of the conflict supported the panel's assessment of a growing threat.

At stake for the U.S. and its allies with the North Atlantic Treaty Organization is not an outright battlefield defeat by the Taliban and other insurgent groups.

DOJ_NMG_0105236

"We should be careful that we don't overstate this militarily unconventional challenge," U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, NATO's supreme allied commander, told reporters last week in Riga, Latvia, where the alliance's leaders were meeting. "We will not be defeated militarily by the Taliban." NATO has 32,000 troops in the country, backed by formidable airpower.

But the patchwork of militant groups battling the Western allies has its own arsenal of strengths.

Insurgent attacks, whose low-tech tactics echo those used against U.S. forces in Iraq, are often ineffectual. But inevitably, some hit home. On Wednesday, for example, two American civilian contractors were killed in a suicide bombing in Kandahar, the sixth such attack in 10 days. Nearly 180 NATO and allied troops have been killed in fighting this year in Afghanistan.

The number of casualties has been enough to ignite public debate over the Afghan mission in several NATO countries, including Canada, which has more than 2,000 troops deployed, mostly in the violent south, the traditional seat of Taliban power.

Within Afghanistan, civilians increasingly bear the brunt not only of insurgent attacks, but NATO's offensive against the militants. In October, a NATO airstrike in the south killed more than 30 civilians, most thought to be nomadic herders. Civilian deaths account for about one-quarter of the fatalities this year and heighten Afghans' resentment of the foreign military forces while feeding a gnawing sense of insecurity.

In terms of casualties, the conflict is a lopsided one. The number of insurgent fatalities over the last year could be as high as 7,000, according to some independent estimates. But the Taliban and its allies draw on what appears to be an almost inexhaustible supply of potential foot soldiers.

"Recruitment is not a problem for them — not a problem at all," said Ayesha Siddiqa, an independent security analyst in Pakistan.

The allies are well aware that simply killing large numbers of insurgents will not constitute a victory. Western officials say they need to prevent the militants from seizing and holding more territory, establish reasonably secure conditions in the capital and the hinterlands, choke off infiltration across the porous Pakistani border and mend fences with restive tribal leaders.

All those tasks are proving difficult.

The insurgents include remnants of the Taliban, the austere Islamist movement that ruled Afghanistan for five years and gave shelter to Osama bin Laden and other members of his Al Qaeda terrorist network. The volatile brew also includes competing warlords, part-time fighters, recruits from the growing ranks of the poor and unemployed, and disaffected youth, often graduates of Talibaninspired religious seminaries.

Viktor Korgun, an analyst with the Russian Academy of Sciences who has had long experience in Afghan affairs, describes the insurgents as "a fresh new generation … copying the skills and ways of the armed resistance groups in Iraq."

"Their support network has improved, and in some areas they've been able to operate and control roads and villages and the like," said Seth Jones, a counterinsurgency expert at the Rand Corp. who was recently in Afghanistan for field research. "The Taliban have created a shadow government in a number of provinces — people going to Taliban governors rather than centrally appointed governors on rule-of-law issues."

The Taliban holds sway in much of the border province of Zabol, several Afghan and Western officials say. And in other provinces, including Kandahar and Helmand, the insurgents operate freely outside major cities and towns.

A number of interlocking factors have contributed to the insurgent comeback:

The U.S.-backed government of President Hamid Karzai has been slow in asserting itself throughout the country.

Afghanistan's drug trade has also revived at an explosive rate. Opium cultivation rose this year by nearly 60%, according to the United Nations drug agency and the World Bank, and officials say drug money has become a driving force behind the insurgency.

In much of the country, the lack of security has severely stunted development projects, which in turn has fostered widespread disillusionment. Particularly in dirt-poor rural areas, many Afghans believe their daily lot has improved little since Taliban times, and tend to cast the blame on the same Americans they once hailed as liberators.

"People previously were repelled by the fanaticism of the Taliban, but anger at Americans is growing," said Talat Masood, a retired Pakistani general who is now an independent analyst. "And ultimately, they would prefer that their lives be secure. It's a survival instinct."

A European security official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said that for insurgents, fomenting even low-level instability carries big payoffs.

"People have lived through 20-odd years of war at varying levels of intensity. Frankly, they're not going to get fazed … by a few IEDs," or improvised explosive devices, he said. "But they are concerned that the base level of their lives is not improved, and that's the challenge that the insurgency provides — delaying the ability of the government to be able to deliver, by keeping certain areas unstable."

Senior NATO generals have publicly aired disagreements over battle tactics, troop strength and rules that largely exempt some member countries' troops from the most dangerous duty. But the alliance's political leadership appears in agreement that the Afghanistan fight is one the West cannot afford to lose. British Prime Minister Tony Blair declared in advance of the Riga meeting that "NATO's credibility is at stake," and President Bush called Afghanistan "NATO's most important military operation."

DOJ_NMG_0105237

In recent weeks, senior U.S. officials have spoken more frankly about the alliance's attempts to come to terms with an unexpectedly resilient foe.

"There's certainly concern … about the fact that they've been able to come out this year with more intensity, more organization than we might have expected," U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Boucher recently told reporters in New Delhi.

"You do have to understand, there are people that are bound and determined to kill us," he said.

"For those people, we're going to have to shoot back."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senate Passes Bill To Criminalize Pretexting (NYT)

By Brad Stone And Matt Richtel

The New York Times, December 11, 2006

The Senate passed legislation last night that would make it a federal crime to obtain a person's telephone records without permission, an act known as pretexting.

The measure, which was approved by unanimous consent last night and is similar to a bill passed earlier in the House, imposes a fine of up to $250,000 and imprisonment of up to 10 years for duping telephone companies into divulging the calling records of private individuals. The penalties can go up under special circumstances, like cases involving domestic abuse.

The support for the legislation comes in the aftermath of the spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard, the computer giant. The company, eager to ferret out purported leaks to journalists from within its board, used private detective firms to retrieve phone records of directors, managers and journalists.

Companies convicted under the Senate legislation face fines of up to $500,000.

The legislation includes penalties and a prison sentence of up to 10 years for individuals who sell or buy phone records knowing the lists were obtained through deceptive means. Passage, which came just days before the conclusion of the Republican-led Congress, is a victory for privacy advocates and regular phone users concerned about the confidentiality of their records.

"The fraudulent acquisition of phone records is now clearly and unequivocally illegal," said Jon Leibowitz, a commissioner at the Federal Trade Commission, an agency charged with combating unfair and deceptive business practices, including pretexting.

"Just having the statute on the books will help reduce the number of bad actors out there," Mr. Leibowitz said.

But some privacy advocates say the legislation does not go far enough.

"Given the amount of attention Congress has given to this issue, we should have a better bill," said Marc Rotenberg, the executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center.

Mr. Rotenberg said he would like to see Congress force companies to protect their customers' personal information. Mr. Rotenberg also expressed concern over an exemption in the legislation for law enforcement agencies that could allow them to hire private detectives or others to obtain individuals' calling records.

The bill passed the House on a unanimous 409-0 vote in April. But it remained stalled in the Senate Judiciary Committee for months, largely because of competition with a more complex pretexting bill in the Senate Commerce Committee, which would have required phone companies to ensure that personal records were being given only to the appropriate person.

After the Hewlett-Packard pretexting scandal made national headlines, House Republicans sent a letter to the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, invoking the saga and urging prompt action on the stronger bill pending in the judiciary committee.

Consumer advocates plan to propose broader legislation in a session of Congress next year that would also make it illegal to try to fraudulently obtain other kinds of personal information, like utility, TV and Internet service provider records.

At Hewlett-Packard, regulatory filings this summer revealed that the company chairwoman, Patricia C. Dunn, had authorized a broad investigation into the source of embarrassing boardroom leaks to the news media. On Thursday, the company said it would pay $14.5 million to settle a civil lawsuit brought by the California attorney general, Bill Lockyer.

Detectives hired by the company employed pretexting techniques to obtain the phone records of company board members, employees and at least nine journalists who covered the company.

DOJ_NMG_0105238

Ms. Dunn resigned from the company in September and in October was charged by Mr. Lockyer with identity theft and conspiracy. Privacy advocates say that even before the new law was passed, the attention the case was getting was pushing pretexters further underground.

Rob Douglas, who testified about pretexting on Capitol Hill and runs the Web site PrivacyToday.com, says the major test will be whether federal prosecutors back up the bill with aggressive enforcement. “If the Department of Justice doesn’t take the issue seriously and prosecute individuals,” he said, “it will be taken by the underground information community that they have carte blanche to continue the practice.”

H-P Agrees To Fund Future Pretexting Probes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

The Morning Brief, a look at the day's biggest news, is emailed to subscribers by 7 a.m. every business day. Sign up for the e-mail here1.

Hewlett-Packard may have admitted no wrongdoing, but the technology giant's settlement with the state of California is all about recognizing the unscrupulous nature of pretexting.

To settle the state's civil suit over its use of investigators to improperly obtain the phone records of board members, some employees and journalists, H-P agreed to pay $14.5 million -- and $13.5 million of that goes to fund state and local investigations2 of similar fraudulent practices, as the San Jose Mercury News reports. The attorney general's office will get $350,000 as reimbursement for its investigative costs in the case, and actual civil penalties from the suit come to just $650,000. By comparison, H-P has reported $91.7 billion in revenue for the 2006 fiscal year, as the New York Times points out, meaning the settlement is the equivalent of what H-P brings in about every 83 minutes3. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer, whose aggressive pursuit of the company brought him national prominence and may have helped get him elected as state treasurer last month, said the company deserves credit for not stonewalling. "Fortunately, H-P is not Enron," he said.

H-P now looks set to avoid criminal prosecution for the pretexting -- the practice of calling a phone company to get a customer's information under the pretext of representing that customer. What the settlement doesn't do is help the five H-P executives and alleged outside abettors charged with identity theft and various forms of fraud for the pretexting, including ousted Chairman Patricia Dunn. And H-P could still face civil claims from people whose privacy was violated4, the Los Angeles Times notes. Still, the accord goes a long way toward helping H-P put the scandal behind it. H-P has already taken steps to comply with the ethical strictures placed on the company by the settlement, including the designation of an independent director "responsible for reviewing and reporting to the board H-P's legal and ethical requirements5 as it relates to future investigations," as The Wall Street Journal notes.

* * *

BofA's Possible Courtship of Barclays

Merrill Lynch has issued a research report saying Bank of America is "very interested" in buying the U.K. bank Barclays, provoking a 1.2% increase in Barclays stock6 during midmorning trading in London. Barclays would bring the huge American lender a large international presence in bond investment and trading operations, derivatives activities and the leading U.K. credit-card business, as well as other assets, Merrill points out. And "Bank of America has previously indicated that the next phase of its expansion is to become a leading global commercial and investment bank," Merrill says, according to MarketWatch. "In order to achieve that goal, we believe Bank of America is very interested in acquiring Barclays."

* * *

Mystery Deepens Over Russian Spy Death

Former Kremlin spy Alexander Litvinenko was buried yesterday, and news emerged that Dmitry Kovtun, one of the Russian businessmen he met in London on the day he is believed to have been poisoned, may have fallen into a coma. The increasingly mysterious events surrounding Mr. Litvinenko's death now center on the Pine Bar in the Millennium Hotel, where Mr. Litvinenko met Mr. Kovtun, and Andrei Lugovoy, a former KGB colonel, on Nov. 1. All seven bar staff have tested positive7 for polonium-210, the rare radioactive poison that killed Mr. Litvinenko, and an official at the U.K. Health Protection Agency said there was no short-term danger to the bar staff, but acknowledged there was a "very small" long-term risk of cancer, the Times of London reports. Officials are now trying to contact 250 customers who visited the bar on the same day. Results by the HPA also suggest that the polonium-210 may have been smuggled into the U.K. as early as two weeks before the poisoning, and it could have been dissolved in liquid before being slipped to Mr. Litvinenko8. "If it was some sort of liquid, it could have been -- as in James Bond -- a little magic capsule," Dr. Michael Clark of the HPA tells the Guardian. As technicians follow the "radioactive trail" left by the poison across London and Moscow, as the Washington Post calls it, attention is focusing on Mr. Lugovoy. He was scheduled to speak with U.K. and Russian investigators yesterday, but the meeting was postponed9 for what Russian investigators tell state media were "technical reasons," the Post adds.

Mr. Litvinenko was a Kremlin critic investigating the death of journalist Anna Politkovskaya, who herself was a fierce Putin critic. Ms. Politkovskaya, who was shot dead two months ago, was the third journalist at Russian newspaper Novaya Gazeta to die mysteriously in the past six years. And The Wall Street Journal notes that if Russia is one of the most dangerous places in the world to be a journalist, Novaya -- one of the last outposts of free speech left in the country -- may be the most dangerous media outlet to work for10.

* * *

Also of Note…

New York Times: The Environmental Protection Agency has changed the way it sets standards to control dangerous air pollutants like lead, ozone and tiny particles of soot, enhancing the role of the agency's political appointees in scientific assessments11 and postponing the required review by independent scientific experts, in a move that largely tracks the suggestions of the American Petroleum Institute.

Wall Street Journal: Eager to adjourn, Republicans are pressing for quick congressional approval of a $45.1 billion tax-and-trade package12 after late-night bargaining affecting timber, energy and health-care industries. The House today considers the massive package in two pieces, one focused on the trade provisions and the second dealing with taxes, offshore oil drilling and an adjustment in payment rates for physicians under Medicare.

Washington Post: Despite an intensified campaign against poverty, World Bank programs have failed to lift incomes13 in many poor countries over the past decade, leaving tens of millions of people suffering stagnating or declining living standards, according to a report released Thursday by the bank's autonomous assessment arm.

BBC: The leader of Hezbollah has vowed to continue mass protests calling for Lebanon's Western-backed government, led by Fouad Siniora, to resign. Thousands of Hezbollah followers have been protesting14 in central Beirut for a week, with sporadic clashes between government and antigovernment supporters.

Legal Times: In an attempt to pressure the Justice Department to alter the way it investigates corporate fraud, a key member of the Senate Judiciary Committee formally introduced legislation aimed at preventing prosecutors from forcing companies15 to waive the attorney-client privilege in order to avoid indictment.

Ad Age: Wal-Mart Stores will reopen bidding for its $580 million creative-advertising and media account16 following the ouster of Julie Roehm, the Wal-Mart executive in charge of the recent decision to make DraftFCB the company's agency of record last month. And DraftFCB won't be eligible this time around.

Atlanta Journal-Constitution: Coca-Cola promoted Muhtar Kent17, a man known as a take-charge global operator and masterful diplomat, to its second-highest post, filling a critical job that has been vacant for two years.

Nature: A controversial theory of how we smell, which claims that our fine sense of odor depends on quantum mechanics, has been given the thumbs up by a team of physicists, which showed that the idea that we smell odor molecules by sensing their molecular vibrations18 makes sense in terms of the physics involved.

Times of London: Gunther Verheugen, vice president of the European Commission and the commissioner for Enterprise and Industry, was fighting to save his political career19 after German media published pictures showing him naked on a beach with his newly promoted chief of staff.

* * *

Quotes of the Day

"Some reports are issued and just gather dust. And truth of the matter is, a lot of reports in Washington are never read by anybody. To show you how important this one is, I read it, and our guest read it. The prime minister read -- read a report prepared by a commission. And this is important. And there are some -- I don't think Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton expect us to accept every recommendation20. I expect them -- I think -- I know they expect us to consider every recommendation, Jim. We ought to pay close attention to what they advise. And I told them yesterday at our meeting that we would pay close attention, and would seriously consider every recommendation. We've discussed some of their recommendations here at this press conference. And we are -- we will spend a lot of time on it," President Bush said yesterday during an appearance with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, when asked how much consideration he would give to the Iraq Study Group's report. Asked if in light of the report he would admit to making failed decisions in the past, Mr. Bush acknowledged that "I thought we would succeed quicker than we did, and I am disappointed by the pace of success."

"I hope we don't treat this like a fruit salad and say, 'I like this, but I don't like that. I like this, but I don't like that.' This is a comprehensive strategy designed to deal with this problem we're facing in Iraq, but also designed to deal with other problems that we face in the region, and to restore America's standing and credibility in that part of the world," Mr. Baker told the Senate Armed Services Committee when asked how the ISG recommendations should be treated.

"They start from completely different places. … Baker approaches everything with a negotiator's mindset. That doesn't mean every negotiation leads to a deal, but you engage your adversaries and use your leverage to change their behavior. This administration has never had a negotiator's mind-set. It divides the world into friends and foes21, and the foes are incorrigible and not redeemable. There has been more of an instinct toward regime change than to changing regime behavior," Dennis Ross, a State Department point man for the Middle East during the Clinton and first Bush presidency who left the government early in the current Bush administration, tells the New York Times in seeking to explain the divergent points of view.

DOJ_NMG_0105240

"Of course, the report had been written from the U.S. view, and we respect that. But it does not represent our own point of view22," Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, one of the leading Shiite politicians in Iraq and a major power broker, tells the NewsHour with Jim Lehrer.

Barbara Chai contributed to this column.

Write to Joseph Schuman at joseph.schuman@wsj.com23

HP Investors Unmoved By Spying Suit Deal (WP/AP)

By Jordan Robertson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. -- Investors have largely shrugged off Hewlett-Packard Co.'s boardroom spying scandal, dismissing the brouhaha surrounding the company as immaterial to its day-to-day operations and stellar earnings growth in recent months.

That was true again on Thursday, when HP's stock price remained largely unmoved after the company and the state Attorney General Bill Lockyer announced that HP would pay $14.5 million to settle a civil claim centered on the dicey tactics used in the investigation.

HP's stock, which has actually gained around 9 percent since the probe was disclosed in a regulatory filing, fell just 24 cents to $39.62 in morning trading on the New York Stock Exchange on Friday. Details of the agreement were announced after the market closed.

Analysts said the penalty was relatively minor and would go a long way toward assuaging fears among skittish investors.

"It looks like they got off pretty easy, and that this is actually going to be a good thing for HP," said Roger Kay, who follows the company as president of market research firm Endpoint Technologies Associates. "It looks like they're in control of their destiny and have put at least some of this behind them."

The lawsuit accused the company of unfair business practices in its crusade to unmask the source of boardroom leaks to the news media.

The vast majority of the settlement _ $13.5 million _ will fund state and local investigations into privacy rights and intellectual property violations, according to the lawsuit and settlement filed simultaneously in Santa Clara County Superior Court.

The lawsuit marks the first civil case brought by authorities against Palo Alto-based HP for the scandal that erupted in September and led to criminal charges against former chairwoman Patricia Dunn and four others.

"Fortunately, Hewlett-Packard is not Enron," Lockyer said. "I commend the firm for cooperating instead of stonewalling, for taking instead of shirking responsibility, and for working with my office to expeditiously craft a creative resolution."

The state likely would have recovered far less if the case were taken to court, based on the limited penalties it could claim for each phone number that was illegally accessed during the leak probe, Lockyer said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"It's a good example of the HP that we all grew up with, the old HP of Hewlett and Packard, the ethics and principles of corporate responsibility and good management practices," he said. "We see those re-emerging in the way they dealt with this matter."

The remainder of the settlement amount consists of $650,000 in civil penalties and $350,000 to cover the state's investigation and other costs.

HP has also agreed to various governance reforms to be in place for five years, which Lockyer said will help protect privacy rights during any future HP investigations. Some of those reforms include the appointment of an independent director to monitor HP's compliance with privacy guidelines, and additional training for investigative staff.

HP CEO Mark Hurd said in a statement that the company is "committed to ensuring that HP regains its standing as a global leader in corporate ethics and responsibility." The agreement did not include a finding of liability against HP.

Prosecutors said the company hired outside detectives who tricked phone companies into disclosing the private phone records of directors, journalists and others so the company could track the source of news leaks.

Those spied on included Hurd, various directors including former board member George Keyworth II, who was identified as the anonymous source in a CNet story, along with HP staffers and journalists.

Revelations of the probe, disclosed in a regulatory filing, led to an exodus from the board, criminal charges, a congressional investigation, and ongoing federal probes by the FBI, the Securities and Exchange Commission, federal prosecutors and other agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0105241

Dunn, who was ousted over the incident, former ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker and three outside investigators, Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner, have pleaded not guilty in Santa Clara County Superior Court to charges of identity theft and fraud for their roles.

The company's stock price has been relatively unaffected by the scandal, buoyed by strong earnings growth under CEO Mark Hurd and the belief that the turmoil had little affect on operations.

Cos Seek Federal Privacy Law;Privacy Groups See It As Weak (WSJ/DJ)

Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP)--Microsoft Corp. (MSFT), Hewlett-Packard Co. (HPQ) and other high-tech companies are preparing to push for data-privacy legislation next year to replace what they consider an outdated patchwork of state and federal laws that are inconsistent and burdensome.

"We think the time has come for a comprehensive privacy bill that would protect consumers' personal information while still allowing the flow of information needed for commerce online," Ira Rubinstein, a Microsoft lawyer, said this week.

Several recent high-profile breaches of consumers' personal information have made consideration of privacy proposals more likely, Rubinstein said. The Social Security numbers and medical data of approximately 930,000 people were compromised this June, for example, when computer equipment belonging to insurance provider American International Group Inc. was stolen.

Microsoft, H-P and eBay Inc. (EBAY) earlier this year formed the Consumer Privacy Legislative Forum to lobby for privacy legislation. Google Inc. (GOOG), Intel Corp. (INTC), Oracle Corp. (ORCL) and other companies later joined.

The forum supports legislation that would set standards for what notice must be given to consumers about personal information collected on them and how it will be used, Rubinstein said. The companies are aiming for a law that would override any existing state laws and standardize privacy rules across industries.

The group's efforts will likely face some opposition, however.

Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a consumer advocacy group, said the proposals, if adopted, would amount to an industry drafting its own regulations.

Rotenberg also argued that the notices to consumers preferred by Microsoft and other companies are insufficient to protect online privacy. Instead, consumers should have access to the data that companies have on them and have more control over how they are used, he said, similar to the way consumers can currently access their credit reports.

Rotenberg also opposes the pre-emption of state laws, which he said in many cases have better protections than federal rules. Many anti-spam experts complained when Congress in 2003 approved a measure that did not let individuals sue spammers and that pre-empted most state laws that did.

Meanwhile, Stuart Ingis, a partner at the law firm Venable LLP, said that a broad privacy measure is unnecessary.

"Comprehensive privacy legislation already exists in this country," he said, citing existing laws and regulations governing financial and health-care privacy.

Those rules took decades to develop and provide strong protections for consumers, said Ingis, whose firm represents several companies and trade groups that track privacy issues.

Although high-tech companies have been seeking comprehensive federal privacy legislation, Congress has focused on the steps companies should take to protect data and when companies should notify consumers of data security breaches.

But several data security bills failed to pass during the soon-to-end congressional session, largely because of jurisdictional struggles between different congressional committees, said Steve Adamske, spokesman for Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass.

Frank, incoming chairman of the House Financial Services Committee, said Wednesday that he plans to consider the issue of data security next year. To avoid a repeat of the jurisdictional struggle, Frank says he plans to propose to incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that she appoint a task force of members from committees with oversight on privacy matters to work on the issue.

Setbacks Hit Plaintiffs In Two Securities Cases (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Fiji Yields Bargain Bonds After Political Discord

The plaintiffs' securities bar was dealt several blows in the past few days.

Tuesday, plaintiff's attorneys were thwarted in their efforts to win class-action status in a suit alleging fraud among investment banks in underwriting new stock offerings.

Then on Thursday the Supreme Court agreed to consider overturning a plaintiff-friendly ruling out of the New York appeals court that Wall Street underwriters could be subject to private antitrust lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0105242

The court cases are related: Both involve allegations of bad behavior in IPOs during the dot-com bubble. The Tuesday case accuses 55 Wall Street firms of requiring investors who got shares of hot IPOs to buy more shares once trading began. The practice allegedly inflated stock prices of more than 300 companies, mainly tech outfits.

The Thursday antitrust case takes issue with some of the same public offerings and alleges investment banks and institutional investors conspired to inflate stock prices in secondary-market trading.

Neither of these decisions was good news for Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP. Melvyn Weiss leads the six-firm plaintiffs executive committee in the IPO securities litigation and serves as vice-chair of the executive committee in the IPO antitrust litigation. Early in the week, Mr. Weiss said he would appeal the ruling in the securities case. As for the antitrust issue, he voiced disappointment that the Supreme Court decided to review it.

"We think that the [lower] court got it right," says Mr. Weiss.

Milberg Weiss had a rough week on other fronts.

Steven Schulman on Friday announced his resignation from Milberg Weiss. Mr. Schulman, along with Milberg partner David Bershad and the Milberg Weiss law firm, were indicted earlier this year on fraud charges based on allegations of improperly sharing legal fees with clients. The firm and the lawyers have pleaded not guilty and are fighting the charges. Mr. Bershad has been on a leave of absence from the firm. Starting Jan. 1, it will be called Milberg Weiss & Bershad LLP.

Going Tropical

Investors looking to escape wintry weather may want to visit Fiji: The islands feature tropical breezes, untouched beaches...and bargain bonds. At a recent conference held in New York for investors who focus on emerging-market debt, J.P. Morgan named Fiji as an "out of the box" pick for the asset class.

Careful newspaper readers may have noted that on Dec. 5, soldiers ousted the elected prime minister of the South Pacific nation (population: 900,000) in the country's fourth military coup of the past 20 years, which sent Fiji bonds plunging and their yields higher.

Earlier this year, the democratically elected government issued $150 million worth of bonds, due in 2011, with a coupon of 6.875% of the face value of the bonds. The issue was 10 times oversubscribed, according to the Reserve Bank of Fiji.

It's unclear if democracy may return to Fiji, or when. Joyce Chang, global head of emerging-markets research at J.P. Morgan, said her first reaction to the suggestion to "buy Fiji on the coup" was disbelief. Not anymore. "We actually have a pretty benign interpretation of the recent political events," she said. "We believe the bonds have been oversold and present a decent buying opportunity."

The bonds, which don't trade very often, yielded roughly 9% at last check.

Tasty Secrets

Judging from the way share prices and debt instruments have been moving before big deals have been announced, Wall Street doesn't seem to be doing a very good job of keeping secrets this year. But that hasn't stopped some investment bankers from cooking up surreptitious code names for their deals.

Consider the planned tie-up of Bank of New York Co. with Mellon Financial Corp., a $16.5 billion merger announced last month.

Investment bankers at Goldman Sachs working on the deal developed the code name "Project Cider" to keep the proposed deal secret.

The logic behind the name? To make cider you need apples and some kind of liquid. Behind the scenes, Bank of New York was known as "Apple" since it is headquartered in the Big Apple...New York. The Pittsburgh-based Mellon was referred to as "Water-Mellon." Apple and water makes cider.

--With contributions from Nathan Koppel, Joanna Slater and Clint Riley

Regulation Loosening The Ties That Bind Wall Street (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Amid cries from Wall Street, the Treasury and business executives that onerous regulations are blunting the U.S.'s competitive edge in the face of threats from European and Asian financial markets, the Securities and Exchange Commission is poised to unveil Wednesday two initiatives aimed at easing those fears. The moves aren't likely to be the last.

The first change will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 law passed in response to corporate-accounting scandals. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox, a former Republican congressman from California, has fought attempts by lawmakers to alter the law itself. But he has promised "significant changes" to Section 404, which sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review.

DOJ_NMG_0105243

Under Section 404, management must review internal controls, and outside auditors are required to test them, a step business complains is too expensive. Mr. Cox says the commission's guidance and a new accounting standard (due Dec. 19 from the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the accounting industry's overseer) will make 404 more focused on big issues than tiny ones.

The second initiative will make it easier for foreign companies whose stocks and bonds trade here to "deregister" from U.S. reporting requirements. Mr. Cox's idea is that, if there is an easier exit, foreign companies will be less wary of listing here -- an important consideration as U.S. exchanges have lost large foreign initial public offerings to other markets in recent years.

A year ago, the SEC said large non-U.S. companies could cease filing annual and quarterly reports if fewer than 10% of their shares were held by U.S. residents and trading volume in the U.S. was less than 5% of that in their home market. The SEC is now scrapping that standard in favor of an easier one that relies strictly on a yet-to-be-released percentage of trading volume.

Both steps are likely to be cheered by those worried about the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets, but the pressure won't abate. With a thick set of recommendations from a private commission already on the table, a McKinsey study commissioned by Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, a Democrat, and Republican New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg coming soon, and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson pushing the issue, the campaign to further ease regulation and make life better for Wall Street is sure to continue.

Specter Bill Would Ban Waiver On Attorney-client Privileges (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter yesterday introduced legislation that would prohibit the Justice Department from pressuring companies and their employees to waive their attorney-client privileges during government investigations.

His bill has support from a wide range of groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the American Bar Association. They fear that the federal government has become too aggressive in its prosecutions of corporate wrongdoing following scandals at Enron and WorldCom.

In 2003, then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson issued a memorandum that gave federal prosecutors the option of taking a softer approach with companies that reveal information on internal discussions between attorneys and executives. But the memo prompted outcries among companies and legal groups who feared a dilution of a basic constitutional right.

"It's a very, very chilling effect," Mr. Specter said yesterday. "If you can't talk freely to your lawyer, you're in deep trouble."

He was joined by Dick Thornburgh, a former U.S. attorney general and Pennsylvania governor, who was representing the American Bar Association.

"The attorney-client privilege is one of the oldest privileges in the law. It dates back to Elizabethan times," he said. He argued that the Justice Department's policy may unintentionally weaken federal prosecutions of corporate crime by dissuading employees from seeking confidential legal advice.

Brian Roehrkasse, a spokesman for the Justice Department, said the department's strategies had netted more than 1,100 corporate fraud convictions in the last four years. He emphasized that federal prosecutors take the preservation of the attorney-client privilege seriously.

"We have met with a number of individuals and organizations who have raised concerns or suggestions about our current guidance for investigating corporate fraud," he said in an e-mail message. "We are also reviewing the newly introduced legislation. Currently, we have not made any final decisions to amend our guidance"

Mr. Specter said his legislation wouldn't prohibit companies from voluntarily coming forward with information .

He acknowledged that the provisions, if passed by Congress, could create some more work for prosecutors.

"The Department of Justice can handle it," he said. "That's a small price to pay for preserving a constitutional right."

Regulation Loosening The Ties That Bind Wall Street (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Amid cries from Wall Street, the Treasury and business executives that onerous regulations are blunting the U.S.'s competitive edge in the face of threats from European and Asian financial markets, the Securities and Exchange Commission is poised to unveil Wednesday two initiatives aimed at easing those fears. The moves aren't likely to be the last.

The first change will tweak the rules that firms must follow to obey a provision in Sarbanes-Oxley, the 2002 law passed in response to corporate-accounting scandals. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox, a former Republican congressman from California, has fought attempts by lawmakers to alter the law itself. But he has promised "significant changes" to Section 404, which sets standards for internal corporate controls, with the goal of reducing compliance costs while enhancing the benefit of review.

Under Section 404, management must review internal controls, and outside auditors are required to test them, a step business complains is too expensive. Mr. Cox says the commission's guidance and a new accounting standard (due Dec. 19 from the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, the accounting industry's overseer) will make 404 more focused on big issues than tiny ones.

The second initiative will make it easier for foreign companies whose stocks and bonds trade here to "deregister" from U.S. reporting requirements. Mr. Cox's idea is that, if there is an easier exit, foreign companies will be less wary of listing here -- an important consideration as U.S. exchanges have lost large foreign initial public offerings to other markets in recent years.

A year ago, the SEC said large non-U.S. companies could cease filing annual and quarterly reports if fewer than 10% of their shares were held by U.S. residents and trading volume in the U.S. was less than 5% of that in their home market. The SEC is now scrapping that standard in favor of an easier one that relies strictly on a yet-to-be-released percentage of trading volume.

Both steps are likely to be cheered by those worried about the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets, but the pressure won't abate. With a thick set of recommendations from a private commission already on the table, a McKinsey study commissioned by Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, a Democrat, and Republican New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg coming soon, and Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson pushing the issue, the campaign to further ease regulation and make life better for Wall Street is sure to continue.

Possible Leak To Lobbyists Gets Attention Of The SEC (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has looked into whether lobbyists provided hedge funds with potentially market-moving information about a pending congressional speech.

The SEC earlier this year questioned the office of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) about a possible insider leak to lobbyists about a speech Frist was to give on asbestos legislation, a Frist spokeswoman said.

SEC officials also said they had looked informally into whether hedge funds, in turn, bought shares in companies that would be affected if Congress approved the bill, which would have settled asbestos civil suits.

But the SEC officials said that no charges were imminent and that it was unclear whether providing congressional information could be considered improper or illegal under insider trading laws.

Employees of public companies are barred from disclosing material information about their companies' plans. But lawmakers and their staff in Congress do not face similar restrictions on the information they can provide about legislative actions. Congressional ethics rules prohibit such disclosures only when aides or lawmakers profit from the information.

Few lobbyists reached yesterday expressed worry that their information-sharing might be restricted anytime soon. But Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, said he would think twice about taking on a hedge fund client until the SEC gave more guidance about the propriety of selling rarified information to hedge funds.

The Frist incident, which was first reported by the Wall Street Journal, points up a growing business among lobbyists: the selling of information and analysis to hedge funds. As hedge funds have proliferated, lobbyists have increasingly supplemented their incomes by advising these big-money investors about Washington trends as an adjunct to their basic task of trying to influence legislation and regulation.

"The advisory business to hedge funds has been growing," said Paul A. Equale, a prominent lobbyist. "But in my experience it is almost a benign exchange of ideas and perspectives. It's more explaining how Washington works."

Intelligence collecting and legislative prognostication has long been a staple of lobbyists. "Information gathering is part of the daily lifeblood of what lobbyists do for their clients," said Frederick D. McClure, a lobbyist with Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal.

In addition, various types of companies -- including lobbying/law firms and capital-based research organizations -- have long sold their best guesses about the Washington outlook to investment houses and their clients. Many investment houses have for years had their own Washington offices to churn out the same kinds of reports.

But the SEC was concerned enough about the upward movement of a few stocks prior to Frist's November 2005 speech, which pledged a Senate vote on the asbestos bill, that it posed some questions to the lawmaker's office. Those questions were referred to the Senate's legal counsel, a Frist spokeswoman said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Chief's Letter To Polygamist Leader: I Love You (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0105245

AP, December 9, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah (AP) -- The chief law enforcer in two Utah-Arizona border towns is accused of misconduct for pledging allegiance to the leader of a polygamous sect who was on the FBI's most wanted list.

"I love you and ... know that you have the right to rule in all aspects of my life," Fred Barlow wrote in an October 2005 letter to Warren Jeffs. "Without priesthood I am nothing."

Barlow warmly addressed Jeffs as "Uncle Warren" and closed the letter by referring to himself as Jeffs' "servant."

Barlow is the police chief of a joint department serving Colorado City, Arizona, and Hildale, Utah. Jeffs is the leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, which has 10,000 followers in those two towns.

The FLDS church practices polygamy and congregants revere Jeffs as a prophet and are taught to be obedient, including marrying at his behest.

Jeffs was arrested near Las Vegas on August 28. A judge will decide next Thursday whether he will stand trial in Utah on charges of rape as an accomplice for forcing a teenage girl to marry an older cousin. He also faces similar charges in Arizona.

"I am praying for you to be protected and yearn to be with you again," Barlow wrote. "I and all of the other officers have expressed our desire to stand with you and the priesthood."

The Arizona Peace Officer Standards and Training Board is using the letter as evidence in one of three misconduct charges against Barlow, who could lose his certification. The Salt Lake Tribune obtained the letter and published it Friday.

Separately, the Utah Peace Officer Standards and Training Council this week voted to conduct its own probe of the police force, whose officers are accused of being too loyal to Jeffs.

Barlow even consulted Jeffs on a personnel matter in the letter. He named a police academy graduate he planned to hire -- "unless you would like us to do something different."

Federal authorities obtained the missive on October 28, 2005, when Jeffs' brother, Seth Jeffs, was arrested in Colorado with correspondence, money and other supplies believed to be intended for Warren Jeffs.

Barlow did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment Friday. In an interview with Arizona regulators on August 10, Barlow said he does not get daily advice from Jeffs, but "we may ask for some advice on some things if we can get it."

Anderson Indicted On Seven Counts (ANCHDN)

By RICHARD MAUER, LISA DEMER And TOM KIZZIA, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News, December 9, 2006

Federal bribery case centers on link to prison firm lobbyist

State Rep. Tom Anderson pleaded not guilty Friday to a series of federal charges accusing him of selling his legislative office for $12,828 in bribes from a lobbyist representing private prison interests.

Anderson, a 39-year-old Republican who has represented Muldoon's District 19 since he was elected in 2002, was ordered freed Friday by U.S. Magistrate Judge John Roberts on an unsecured $10,000 bond after his arrest Thursday by FBI agents. Roberts said Anderson could travel to Mexico on a previously scheduled vacation next week with his wife, Republican state Rep. Lesil McGuire, who was elected to the state Senate in November, and their infant son.

TWO YEARS IN THE MAKING

The 18-page indictment against Anderson said the lobbyist was secretly recorded July 21, 2004, boasting that for a price, Anderson would be "our boy in Juneau."

A week later, the same lobbyist was recorded telling a confidential informant, "If I was a Soviet spy and I was looking for a legislator to recruit, (Anderson) would be the one I'd get." Anderson "needs the money," the lobbyist said.

The government didn't charge the lobbyist. He is identified only by the letter "A," but the facts in the case point to Bill Bobrick of Anchorage, who represented Cornell Companies, a private prison firm Outside. Bobrick didn't return messages left on his home and cell phones Friday, and his business number wasn't working.

On Thursday, before Anderson's arrest, Bobrick said in an interview that he was getting out of the lobbying business and was in the process of handing off his clients. He cited "health issues" as the reason.

Anderson, who did not seek re-election this year and formally leaves office next month, is the first legislator charged with corruption in office since two state senators faced charges in the early 1980s. One, George Hohman, was convicted of bribery in 1981, while the other, Ed Dankworth, successfully appealed his 1982 conflict-of-interest charges and never faced trial.

Anderson's seven-count indictment accuses him of going into league with Lobbyist A to promote a private prison somewhere in Alaska and a private juvenile treatment facility in Anchorage.

In return for the money, it said Anderson got himself appointed to legislative committees with jurisdiction over prisons and treatment, lobbied other elected officials, agreed to align his votes with the correction company's interests, wrote letters and publicly spoke on behalf of company projects.

Anderson disguised the source of the money in his reports to the Alaska Public Offices Commission, the indictment charged.

A GOVERNMENT SOURCE

A second private prison advocate secretly worked with the government to record conversations of the lobbyist and Anderson. The informant, identified only as "CS-1," used money provided by the FBI in the payoffs.

The private prison company was identified only as "Corrections Company" in the charges, but the facts squarely match Cornell Companies Inc. of Houston, Texas, a publicly traded corporation with facilities in 17 states. Cornell operates six halfway houses in Alaska from its buyout of Anchorage-based Allvest Corp. With partners Veco and Allvest founder Bill Weimer, Cornell failed to win public support for private prison proposals in Anchorage, Delta Junction, Kenai and Whittier.

The proposals were all highly controversial in the communities, though they often sailed through legislative committees. During a House Finance Committee hearing May 9, 2004, Rep. Eric Croft, D-Anchorage, said the effort was corrupting the state.

"What I see, over and over, is repeated sole-source, pre-arranged, heavy-money deals that go to specific contractors. ... It's never been a clean, competitive proposal," Croft said at the time, the only member of the committee to object. "We are going to see somebody indicted and probably imprisoned over this series of proposals."

A prepared statement from the Justice Department released Friday said the corrections company was never told about the payments to Anderson "due to the undercover nature of the operation." It said the company "was not implicated in the corrupt activities that are alleged in the indictment."

Christine Parker, a spokeswoman for Cornell in Houston, said, "There's nothing that we knew of, or were aware of, until this indictment was issued."

Anderson arrived for his arraignment in federal court Friday wearing a bright yellow jumpsuit with the word "PRISONER" across his back. His legs were shackled as he rose for the judge alongside his defense attorney, Jeffrey Feldman of Anchorage. The hearing lasted 19 minutes. His trial was set for Feb. 12.

If the government was making a point to other potential defendants in its ongoing investigation into corruption, the message was tough. Nicholas Marsh, a trial attorney from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., told the court the charges carried penalties ranging from a maximum of five years and a $250,000 fine for conspiracy to a maximum of 20 years and $500,000 for each of three money laundering charges. Anderson was also accused of two counts of extortion (20 years and $250,000) and one count of bribery (10 years and $250,000).

The activities alleged in the indictment took place long before the coordinated raids of Aug. 31, when the FBI searched the offices of 10 percent of the 60-member Legislature. Anderson's office wasn't among them, and it's unclear how his case is related. Marsh, assistant U.S. attorney Joseph Bottini and FBI agent Mary Beth Kepner, a leader of the corruption probe, left quickly after the arraignment and declined to answer questions.

CALLS WERE RECORDED

The conspiracy alleged in the indictment began in July 2004 and continued through the following March. It said that Lobbyist A set up a shell company called Pacific Publishing that existed solely to launder money to Anderson. The company would pay Anderson to write articles about politics that would be published on its Web site, but Anderson was paid without ever scribbling a line.

CS-1 paid Lobbyist A $24,000 in three payments. The cover story was that the money was for advertising on the Web site, but they agreed the money was really for Anderson's pocket, with "A" taking a sizable cut.

The indictment said CS-1 had worked for the corrections company as a lobbyist "at various times." The identity closely matches Frank Prewitt, a former Alaska corrections commissioner appointed by Gov. Wally Hickel and who later went to work for Cornell.

In an e-mail exchange with the Daily News on Friday, Prewitt suggested he was the source, though he stopped short of confirming it.

"At this time it is inappropriate for me to talk about the voluntary role that I and others may have played in the Anderson investigation," Prewitt wrote. "Over the next year I believe you will find that this was only the beginning of the end of a sad, but healthy chapter in Alaska history. My prayers are with Representative Anderson and his family during this difficult time for all."

The first recorded conversation cited in the indictment occurred July 16, 2004, when the lobbyist suggested to the confidential source that they "try with (Cornell) to help out Tom Anderson." Five days later, the lobbyist told the source that Cornell should hire Anderson through him.

Rather than report Cornell, with its interest in legislation and other government action, as the source of the money, Anderson said he was paid for writing for the Pacific Publishing Web site.

Anderson himself was recorded Aug. 17, 2004, telling the confidential source: "APOC only needs to know (Bobrick) pays me and then we're all safe."

DOJ_NMG_0105247

The source paid the lobbyist the first $8,000 Aug. 19, 2004, the indictment charged. Out of that, Anderson received $3,328, which he deposited Aug. 23 into the account of his personal consulting firm, Alaska Strategic Consultants.

In a recorded call Oct. 20, 2004, the source told Anderson he had prepared the next $8,000 payment and planned to pass it on to the lobbyist.

"Awesome. Awesome. I appreciate it," Anderson is quoted as saying.

Anderson received a $3,500 advance from that payment, the indictment charged.

The source made his last $8,000 payment on Dec. 21, 2004. Anderson got $4,000.

But late in the scheme, the indictment alleged, Anderson was showing signs of unhappiness over splitting the money with the lobbyist. According to excerpts of recordings, the confidential source appeared at first to encourage the disaffection, saying it wasn't the lobbyist who was speaking out and voting for Cornell, but rather Anderson.

"I know," Anderson said.

But then the source suggested the lobbyist might become "estranged" if he were cut out of the deal. The source thought that he could make a separate payment direct to Anderson.

"If there's a way you can think of that, that would be nice," Anderson replied.

The source obliged, handing Anderson a $2,000 check Dec. 21, 2004. The indictment said the check was made payable to Tom Anderson.

Daily News reporter Richard Mauer can be reached at rmauer@adn.com or 257-4345. Reporter Lisa Demer can be reached at ldemer@adn.com. Reporter Tom Kizzia can be reached at tkizzia@adn.com.

U.S. Indicts Alaska Lawmaker In Bribery (WT)

By Jerry Seper, THE WASHINGTON TIMES

The Washington Times, December 9, 2006

A federal grand jury in Alaska yesterday indicted Thomas T. Anderson, a member of the Alaska State House of Representatives, on charges of extortion, conspiracy, bribery and money laundering.

The indictment, handed up in U.S. District Court in Anchorage, accuses Mr. Anderson of soliciting and receiving money from an FBI confidential source in exchange for his agreement to perform official acts to further the source's business interest.

Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's Criminal Division, said the seven-count indictment returned Wednesday charges Mr. Anderson with two counts of extortion, one count of bribery, one count of conspiracy, and three counts of money laundering in connection with the use of a sham corporation to hide the source of the bribery payments.

The indictment also said that from July 2004 to March 2005, Mr. Anderson, along with another person identified as "Lobbyist A," solicited and received $26,000 in payments from an FBI confidential source, in exchange for Mr. Anderson's agreement to take official acts as a member of the Alaska Legislature.

According to the indictment, Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A participated in the creation of a sham corporation to conceal the existence and true origin of the payments, and used the sham corporation to funnel a portion of the $26,000 to Mr. Anderson.

The indictment said the FBI confidential source was a consultant for a private corrections company located outside the state of Alaska, and Mr. Anderson and Lobbyist A initiated contact with the FBI confidential source in order to solicit bribery payments.

The FBI confidential source, however, never communicated those solicitations or any other information to the corrections company because of the undercover nature of the operation, the indictment said. The corrections company was not implicated in the corrupt activities that are charged in the indictment.

If convicted, Mr. Anderson faces a maximum penalty of 20 years and a $250,000 fine on the extortion counts; a maximum penalty of 20 years and a $500,000 fine on each of the money-laundering counts; a maximum penalty of 10 years and a $250,000 fine on the bribery count; and a maximum penalty of five years and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy count.

The case is being prosecuted by trial attorneys Nicholas A. Marsh and Edward P. Sullivan of the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which is headed by Acting Chief Edward C. Nucci, as well as Assistant U.S. Attorneys Joseph W. Bottini and James A. Goeke in Alaska.

McGuire Defends Her Husband (ANCHDN)

Anchorage Daily News, December 9, 2006

Anchorage Sen.-elect Lesil McGuire said Friday that her husband is innocent of bribery and other charges, while noting the things he's accused of happened before they married.

"I am not and have not been a target of any investigation," she said in a statement issued to the media.

McGuire, a state representative from South Anchorage who was recently elected to the Senate, married Rep. Tom Anderson more than a year ago.

"He is a good man," McGuire told The Associated Press. "I've been beside him through many battles in the Legislature and have watched him. I'm devastated."

McGuire told The AP that the accusations against her husband don't involve her at all and that Anderson has stopped working as a lobbyist before the city. Anderson did not run for re-election and his term is about to run out.

McGuire did not return repeated calls from the Daily News on Friday.

In her written statement to the media, she asked that the public withhold judgment of her indicted husband "until the judicial process has run its course."

"As you can imagine, my family and I are devastated by the events that occurred yesterday," she wrote.

Federal Jury Convicts Ex-Teamsters Leader (HC)

By Harvey Rice, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 9, 2006

Crawley is found guilty of rigging union election and accepting kickback

A federal jury convicted on Friday a former president of Houston's largest Teamsters local on all counts alleging that he rigged a union election and accepted a kickback from a vendor.

Charles "Chuck" Crawley was taken from the downtown courtroom immediately after the verdict was announced.

U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon scheduled a March 23 hearing, when Crawley could be sentenced up to 30 years in prison.

"I think he's in shock," defense attorney Ned Barnett said.

He added that his client "was convicted on testimony of witnesses who have told a lot of lies in the past," referring to union officials who were given immunity in return for testimony.

Jurors had heard four days of testimony in Crawley's trial on one count of mail fraud, two counts of embezzlement and one count of falsifying records. He is the fourth Teamsters president in Houston to be convicted on federal charges since 1992, Assistant U.S. Attorney Edward Gallagher said.

Crawley was elected as a reformer in 1997 after his predecessor, Richard Hammond, was removed by a trustee from the international union in 1995. Hammond was sentenced to four years in federal prison in 1998 after his conviction for embezzling union funds.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Wright said Friday that Crawley betrayed union members' trust for his own gain.

The verdict came after a prosecutor told jurors in closing arguments that Crawley had assured a union vendor that he would have the winning bid in return for a $20,000 kickback.

Justice Department trial attorney Vincent Falvo said Crawley told the vendor who installed the telephone system in a new union hall, "There will be no other bids. This is my union hall."

By convicting Crawley of accepting the kickback and rigging a 2002 union election, "You will tell Mr. Crawley, 'No, it is the members' union,' " Falvo told jurors.

Barnett countered that prosecutors unfairly targeted his client and that prosecution witnesses lied to save themselves or because they feared the government.

"They wanted Mr. Crawley. They had their minds made up" before evidence was gathered, Barnett said. "He's the prize. He's the trophy."

Wright called that allegation absurd.

Crawley, 56, was indicted in June after a three-year probe into allegations that he rigged the 2002 election to stay in office.

An investigation by the International Brotherhood of Teamsters led to his ouster in 2003 as head of Local 988.

That same year, he gained national attention by using non-union labor to build the local's $1.7 million union hall, causing international President James P. Hoffa to cancel his appearance at the opening.

Crawley was accused of mailing 362 phony absentee ballots in the names of union members he thought would not vote.

But 36 did vote, raising suspicions that led to an investigation, prosecutors said.

Falvo said an FBI lab found Crawley's fingerprints on one of the phony ballots, and another union official testified that he helped Crawley stuff the phony ballots into envelopes.

A vendor testified that he offered to sell the union a phone system for $32,000, but Crawley asked him to add $20,000.

Child Porn Site Host Guilty (CLARKSLC)

By Thomya Hogan, The Leaf-Chronicle

Clarksville (TN) Leaf-Chronicle, December 9, 2006

Clarksville man makes plea, faces 5- to 150-year sentence

A Clarksville man who hosted an Internet chat room called "Kiddiepics & Kiddievids" that was at the center of an international child pornography investigation pleaded guilty in federal court Thursday.

Royal Raymond Weller, 49, who lived in Hunter Chase Apartments on Madison Street at the time of his arrest, admitted to eight counts of conspiracy to distribute child pornography, distribution of child pornography, receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography.

After making his plea in U.S. District Court in Nashville Thursday, Weller now faces between 5 and 150 years in federal prison and will be sentenced in March.

According to a news release from the Justice Department, Weller, under the user name "G.O.D.," hosted chats shaped around users' preferences and included promoting the trade of child pornography and evading detection by law enforcement.

Many of the users and administrators of the site had conversations about their involvement in sexual molestation, and the chat included discussion of sexually explicit conduct involving prepubescent children, bondage and bestiality. Some of the children depicted were infants.

When sharing child pornography, Weller used a different identity, "Devil666" and often had more than 1,000 images and videos available for trade. The Justice Department said Weller also had about 10,000 child pornography files on his computer and hard drives.

Weller ran his chat rooms and traded child porn for at least 2 1/2 years. He admitted to being attracted to young girls going through puberty and told investigators he had secretly taken photographs of children in public locations.

"There are few if any crimes more revolting than those involving the sexual exploitation of vulnerable young children," said U.S. attorney Craig Morford in the release. "These crimes rob our children of their innocence and leave a wake of victims scarred, both physically and emotionally, for life. It is no accident that this defendant called himself 'Devil666' and it will take nothing short of a dedicated effort on the part of all segments of society — our communities, our schools, our families, our law enforcement agencies and our courts — to stop the spread of this cancer."

Weller's March 6 arrest and subsequent conviction were the result of an investigation that involved the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and law enforcement officers in other countries. He was one of 27 people charged in a ring that spanned 10 states and Canada, Australia and Great Britain.

Thomya Hogan can be reached at 245-0282 or by e-mail at thomyahogan@theleafchronicle.com.

Clarksville Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Charges (AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn.- A Clarksville man pleaded guilty Friday to charges related to running an Internet chat room for child pornography that was shut down in international investigation.

Royal Raymond Weller, 49, an appliance repairman, was at the center of an international Internet child pornography chat room known as Kiddypics & Kiddyvids.

Weller pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court in Nashville to eight counts of conspiracy to distribute child pornography, distribution of child pornography, receipt of child pornography and possession of child pornography, The Leaf-Chronicle reported.

Weller will be sentenced in March and could face between five and 150 years in federal prison.

He was arrested in March after an investigation involving the Immigration and Customs Enforcement Agency and law enforcement officers in other countries.

He was one of 27 people charged in the ring operating in 10 states and Canada, Australia and Great Britain.

The U.S. Justice Department said Weller had about 10,000 child pornography files on his computer and hard drives.

Senator: Illegal Images Must Be Reported (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, December 9, 2006

John McCain proposes law to force Web sites to report unlawful activity and delete posts by sex offenders.

Millions of commercial Web sites and personal blogs would be required to report illegal images or videos posted by their users or pay fines of up to $300,000, if a new proposal in the U.S. Senate came into law.

The legislation, drafted by Sen. John McCain and obtained by CNET News.com, would also require Web sites that offer user profiles to delete pages posted by sex offenders.

In a speech on the Senate floor this week, the Arizona Republican and former presidential candidate warned that "technology has contributed to the greater distribution and availability, and, some believe, desire for child pornography." McCain scored 31 of 100 points on a 2006 election guide scoring technology-related votes.

After child pornography or some forms of "obscenity" are found and reported, the Web site must retain any "information relating to the facts or circumstances" of the incident for at least six months. Webmasters would be immune from civil and criminal liability if they followed the specified procedures exactly.

McCain's proposal, called the "Stop the Online Exploitation of Our Children Act" (click for PDF), requires that reports be submitted to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, which in turn will forward to the relevant police agency. (The organization received $32.6 million in tax dollars in 2005, according to its financial disclosure documents.)

Internet service providers already must follow those reporting requirements. But McCain's proposal is liable to be controversial because it levies the same regulatory scheme--and even stiffer penalties--on even individual bloggers who offer discussion areas on their Web sites.

"This constitutionally dubious proposal is being made apparently mostly based on fear or political considerations rather than on the facts," said Kevin Bankston, an attorney with the Electronic Frontier Foundation in San Francisco.

According to the proposed legislation, these types of individuals or businesses would be required to file reports: any Web site with a message board; any chat room; any social-networking site; any e-mail service; any instant-messaging service; any Internet content hosting service; any domain name registration service; any Internet search service; any electronic communication service; and any image or video-sharing service.

Kate Dean of the U.S. Internet Service Provider Association said her members appreciated McCain's efforts to rewrite the current procedures for reporting illegal images, which currently are less than clear.

McCain's proposal comes as concern about protecting children online has reached nearly a fever pitch in Washington. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales gave two speeches this week on the topic, including one on Friday in which he said "we must do all that we can to protect our children from these cowardly villains who hide in the shadows of the Internet."

But the reporting rules could prove problematic for individuals and smaller Web sites because the definitions of child pornography have become relatively broad.

The U.S. Justice Department, for instance, indicted an Alabama man named Jeff Pierson last week on child pornography charges because he took modeling photographs of clothed minors with their parents' consent. The images were overly "provocative," a prosecutor claimed.

Deleting sex offenders' posts

The other section of McCain's legislation targets convicted sex offenders. It would create a federal registry of "any e-mail address, instant-message address, or other similar Internet identifier" they use, and punish sex offenders with up to 10 years in prison if they don't supply it.

Then, any social-networking site must take "effective measures" to remove any Web page that's "associated" with a sex offender.

Because "social-networking site" isn't defined, it could encompass far more than just MySpace.com, Friendster and similar sites. The list could include Slashdot, which permits public profiles; Amazon.com, which permits author profiles and personal lists; blogs like RedState.com that show public profiles. In addition, media companies like News.com publisher CNET Networks permit users to create profiles of favorite games, gadgets and music.

"I think there is an irrational hysteria surrounding these social-networking sites and the threat to youngsters on these sites, so I don't see these measures being justified," said EFF's Bankston.

A McCain aide, who did not want to be identified by name, said on Friday that the measure was targeted at any Web site that "you'd have to join up or become a member of to use." No payment would be necessary to qualify, the aide added.

In this political climate, members of Congress may not worry much about precise definitions. Another bill also vaguely targeting social-networking sites was approved by the U.S. House of Representatives in a 410-15 vote.

And in July, for instance, Congress overwhelmingly approved a bill that made it a federal felony for Webmasters to use innocent words like "Barbie" or "Furby" to trick minors into visiting their sites and viewing sexually explicit material.

Next year, Gonzales and the FBI are expected to resume their push for mandatory data retention, which will force Internet service providers to keep records on what their customers are doing online. An aide to Rep. Diana DeGette, a Colorado Democrat, said Friday that she's planning to introduce such legislation when the new Congress convenes.

Cathy Milhoan, an FBI spokeswoman, said on Friday that the FBI "continues to support data retention. We see it as crucial in advancing our cyber investigations to include online sexual exploitation of children."

In addition, Sen. Chuck Schumer, a New York Democrat, and McCain said this week that they'll introduce similar legislation dealing with sex offenders and social-networking sites in January.

CNET News.com's Anne Broache contributed to this report

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Osceola Poised To Accept Order On Voting Districts (ORS)

By Mark Pino, Sentinel Staff Writer

The Orlando Sentinel, December 9, 2006

After spending nearly a year and a half and about $2 million fighting a federal voting-rights suit, Osceola County commissioners appear ready to abide by a federal judge's order Friday that will implement single-member voting in pending elections.

If commissioners vote to accept the ruling, a special election for two commission seats could be held this spring. A private strategy meeting is expected early next week, commissioners said.

Two commissioners questioned the wisdom of continuing the fight Friday, and two others expressed doubts about an appeal but wanted to wait to hear from the county's attorneys. A fifth commissioner did not return phone calls.

"I don't see much effort in doing that," Commissioner Tom Franklin said of an appeal. "At one point or another, you have to decide if it is worth the battle. It is something we have no control over. You don't keep fighting against windmills."

U.S. District Judge Gregory A. Presnell tossed out an Osceola proposal that would have created a hybrid system with five single-member and two at-large commission seats.

"As this court has already found, Hispanics in Osceola County have no reasonable opportunity to elect members in an at-large election. Therefore, given the high degree of historically polarized voting, the extra two at-large seats are completely out of the reach of the Hispanic community," Presnell wrote in a ruling released less than 24 hours after a hearing Thursday.

The judge accepted district boundaries drawn by the U.S. Department of Justice and approved by the county earlier this week. He also accepted a proposal for which seats would be on the ballot and how elections would proceed.

Under the plan, an open seat for a new Hispanic-majority district that includes Buenaventura Lakes will be up for election as well as a district seat for which Commissioner Ken Smith is the incumbent.

Commission Chairman Ken Shipley said an executive session was likely for Tuesday to discuss options. Like all commissioners contacted, he was disappointed with the ruling. But he said he thought the chances of a reversal on appeal were slim.

"I don't think it is winnable right now. It is only going to delay the inevitable," Shipley said. "I would have loved for it to be different. I think the board has done everything it could in protecting the charter and what voters voted on years ago," he added in reference to a 1996 referendum in which voters opted to switch back to countywide election of commissioners from a single-member-district format.

Presnell ruled in October that the "racially polarized" county's at-large voting system penalizes Hispanics in violation of the U.S. Voting Rights Act.

"Moving forward with elections next spring under a lawful plan is an important victory for all the residents of Osceola County," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, "and particularly for its Hispanic citizens who have been denied the right guaranteed by the Voting Rights Act to full and equal participation in the democratic process in county government."

About 38 percent of the county's population is Hispanic. Only one Hispanic has been elected to countywide office, but that was in 1996 during the county's brief experiment with single-member voting.

Commissioner Paul Owen thought expanding the board with two at-large seats was a fair compromise.

He said he was waiting for the meeting next week to decide whether an appeal was appropriate.

"I will definitely give weight to what our attorneys have to say on our chances of winning an appeal," Owen said.

Smith reiterated his firm belief in at-large voting, saying: "You should have a right to vote for anyone who has a say-so on taxing your property. I think having a county perspective as opposed to a district perspective is something that is needed."

Mark Pino can be reached at mpino@orlandosentinel.com or 407-931-5935.

Jury Ruling Favors Ex-DEA Agent In Bias Suit (MH)

By Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, December 9, 2006

A former high-ranking federal drug agent in Miami said a "great feeling" swelled up inside him on Friday when he won a 4-year-old discrimination lawsuit against the U.S. government.

DOJ_NMG_0105252

A federal jury in Miami found the Drug Enforcement Administration discriminated against Sandalio Gonzalez, the former second-in-command of the DEA's South Florida field office, by retaliating against him with a transfer to another management job in Texas in 2001.

The racially mixed, nine-person jury awarded $85,000 in damages to Gonzalez, 55, of Doral, who had been the DEA's top-ranking Cuban-American administrator. The victory under U.S. law allows his attorneys to obtain legal fees, which could total hundreds of thousands of dollars.

For Gonzalez -- who stirred controversy in 2000 when he blew the whistle on a Miami drug bust in which 10 kilos of cocaine went missing -- the court triumph was sweet vindication. He had stood up for not only himself, but also other Hispanic and black DEA agents in the Miami field office over issues of discrimination, his lawyers said.

"I don't think it's sunk in yet," said the 27-year DEA veteran, now retired. ``It's just a great feeling to see the system work."

The Department of Justice, named as a defendant in the suit, could appeal the verdict. The Drug Enforcement Administration, which is part of the Justice Department, declined to comment Friday.

Gonzalez was among 16 top-level agency executives sent transfer orders on Jan. 18, 2001 -- just before a four-month freeze on such moves was instituted by President George W. Bush's incoming administration. Gonzalez, who supervised about 300 agents in Miami, was ordered to move to El Paso, Texas, where he was the top DEA administrator in charge of 150 agents. Gonzalez, who made $142,000 annually, retired last year and returned to Miami.

Top DEA officials, who testified at the week-long trial before U.S. District Judge Federico Moreno, described the transfer as a ``promotion."

But Gonzalez and several others on the transfer list had complained that DEA Administrator Donnie R. Marshall's actions were meant to punish perceived troublemakers and reward his friends before his successor was appointed by the Bush administration.

"Believe me, this was the last thing I wanted to do," Gonzalez told The Miami Herald after filing a complaint to stop the transfer in March 2001. ``Of course I'm sad about it, but they have left me no choice."

Gonzalez accused Miami DEA agents, supervisors and high-level federal prosecutors of covering up the disappearance of 10 kilos of cocaine from a 1998 search of a drug suspect's stash house in Miami. Internal investigators found no wrongdoing.

Gonzalez alleged unfair treatment of Hispanic agents in the DEA's Miami field office -- a claim central to his discrimination suit.

His attorneys, Richard Diaz and Donald Appignani, rejoiced over the victory, saying their client showed courage in standing up to the government on such an important principle.

"While the amount of money awarded to Sandy does not match the harm the government did to him," Diaz said, ``what is more important is he has been vindicated after four years in the court system."

ANTITRUST:

Commissioner Cleared To Vote On AT&T-BellSouth Deal (AP)

By John Dunbar

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) top lawyer on Friday authorized one of its members to vote on the proposed buyout of BellSouth by AT&T, despite an apparent conflict of interest. The move could break a deadlock on the deal.

The decision came a week after FCC Chairman Kevin Martin declared an impasse in the proceeding and asked General Counsel Sam Feder to determine whether Commissioner Robert McDowell, a former lobbyist, should be allowed to vote on the $84 billion acquisition.

The deal would be the biggest in U.S. telecommunications history.

Feder's action increases the likelihood that AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, will win conditional approval from the FCC within the next two months and overcome the acquisition's final regulatory hurdle, said Paul Glenchur, an analyst at Stanford Washington Research Group.

McDowell, one of three Republicans on the five-member commission, has sat out of negotiations because of his past work as a lobbyist.

"There's still a decent chance it will be wrapped up this year," Glenchur said.

The next open meeting for the agency is Dec. 20, but Martin said Friday night that he does not anticipate putting the issue up for a vote then. It would not give McDowell enough time to get "up to speed" on the issues, Martin said.

DOJ_NMG_0105253

In Feder's eight-page opinion, he argued that McDowell should be allowed to vote because he had not participated in the merger proceeding as a lobbyist, did not stand to gain financially from his vote, and that it would be impossible for someone else to take his place in the proceeding.

But Feder was also clearly torn, noting that Robert Cusick, director of the Office of Government Ethics, had said the decision was a close call on which reasonable people could differ and that Cusick said he would decide against authorization but that "the FCC could reasonably come out the other way."

Martin and AT&T are betting that McDowell, despite his history, will vote to approve the merger.

In a statement, McDowell did not indicate whether he had made up his mind, saying only that he was reviewing Feder's opinion.

McDowell also noted that the incoming chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., had written the commission posing questions about its precedents for recusals and other issues.

"I look forward to receiving a copy of Mr. Feder's response," McDowell said, adding that in the meantime he hoped the other four commissioners would resolve their differences and reach an agreement.

Dingell questioned the circumstances surrounding the decision, including the comments of the director of Office of Government Ethics, saying they raised "serious questions of both ethics and propriety."

McDowell is one of three Republicans on the five-member commission. He has not participated in the merger because he thinks a vote would violate conflict of interest rules.

Without McDowell, Martin has declined to schedule a vote because it has appeared the result would be a 2-2 deadlock, with Martin and another Republican appointee favoring the deal and the two Democrats opposing it.

Commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein have asked AT&T to agree to further concessions, including assurances the giant company would not discriminate against Internet traffic, an issue known as network neutrality.

Martin confirmed that the key sticking point revolved around the "network neutrality" issue.

The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department cleared the deal Oct. 11, declaring there were no competitive concerns and opting not to require the combined company to divest assets or make any other concessions.

The proposed takeover has been approved by regulators in 18 states, leaving the FCC as the final hurdle.

Last week, Martin wrote a letter to several members of Congress who oversee the FCC, saying in part: "Despite working for months to reach consensus with my colleagues, three attempts over the past six weeks to have this item considered at an open meeting, and countless hours of internal deliberations, the commission has reached an impasse."

Both Democrats criticized the move then.

Copps said allowing McDowell to vote would create more problems than it resolves. It also would "short-circuit discussions, and very likely shortchange consumers," he said. Adelstein echoed those comments.

McDowell once worked for the trade association Comptel, which represents companies that compete with AT&T and the other regional Bell phone companies.

Material from Bloomberg News is used in this report.

Another Flight Delay (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Well, that's the end of that. The Transportation Department announced this week that it's giving up its effort to liberalize the antiquated laws governing ownership of U.S. airlines. Congressional protectionism, 1; common sense 0.

For more than 60 years, U.S. law has barred foreign entities from owning more than 49% of an American carrier, and has restricted foreign "control" to 25%. In theory this keeps a national-security asset in American hands. In practice it stifles investment and competition at a time when American carriers are experiencing heavy turbulence.

Enter former Transportation Secretary Norm Mineta, who proposed allowing foreign investors more latitude to guide fleet composition, route structure and marketing even while safety and security would still rest with American citizens. Alas, 'twas not to be, thanks to a little labor activism and a lot of Congressional territory-marking. Mr. Mineta's successor, Mary Peters, has thrown in the towel, saying the Department "needs to do more to inform the public, labor groups and Congress about the benefits" of the proposal.

Unions already know the benefits, but they fear that a little opening today might pave the way to more competition -- and less generous contracts for American workers -- tomorrow. Imagine Big Labor's delight, then, when feathers started to ruffle on Capitol Hill as Mr. Mineta opted to go the rule-making route instead of seeking legislation. Then the panic hit over a Dubai company investing in U.S. ports. Republicans were only too happy to seize the airline ownership rule as an opportunity to show their independence from the Bush Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0105254

It didn't help that some legacy airlines both at home and abroad viewed the proposal as a front in the broader battle of a U.S.-European Union open skies agreement. The EU had made easing the U.S. ownership rules a prerequisite for such an agreement. Carriers split in reaction to the ownership rule depending on whether they thought they'd win or lose from open skies. Continental Airlines, for example, opposed the ownership rule for fear that it would lose out in a new battle for access to London's Heathrow airport under the EU deal. Continental and other domestic carriers, incidentally, have also been trying to use the ownership rules to block an attempt by Richard Branson's Virgin brand to enter the U.S. market as a low-cost carrier.

The foreign ownership limits are a protectionist vestige from an age when airlines were treated like national totems. That day has long passed, and the rules now serve mainly to protect industry and labor special interests. With AFL-CIO favorite James Oberstar of Minnesota about to take over the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, change is even less likely. Air travelers out for better service and lower prices face yet another delay.

ENVIRONMENT:

House OKs Bill To Drill Off Florida (SFC)

By Zachary Coile

San Francisco Chronicle, December 9, 2006

Washington -- The House approved a bill Friday to open 8.3 million acres of federal waters west of the Florida coast to oil and gas drilling, a victory for business interests who lobbied for the bill and four Gulf Coast states that would receive billions in new oil and gas royalties.

But even drilling supporters admitted it was just a tiny fraction of the publicly owned area they had hoped to open during 12 years of Republican rule of Congress. Efforts to drill in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge and off the Pacific and Atlantic coasts were defeated and are likely to be mothballed in the new Democratic Congress.

"When it comes to passing important legislation around here, you learn to shoot for the stars in the hope that you might land on the moon," Rep. John Peterson, R-Pa., a key drilling supporter, said after Friday's House vote. The measure still faced Senate consideration in a probable weekend session.

The oil and gas industry already is worried about Democrats' plans, shortly after they take control in the new Congress, to revoke billions of dollars in subsidies approved in recent years. Environmentalists will push for a permanent moratorium on offshore drilling for California and other coastal states that oppose development.

Another sign the winds are changing: The soon-to-be chairman of the House Resources Committee, Rep. Nick Rahall, D-W.Va., announced Friday he will change the name of his panel to the Natural Resources Committee -- the title it had before Republicans took power in 1994.

Rahall told reporters Friday that his agenda next year is "not to engage in the wholesale destruction of pristine federal lands, sacrificing them on the altar of energy development," but to "protect those resources which Americans cherish as places to recreate, hunt and fish."

The vote on offshore drilling was the end of a contentious debate sparked last year when the current House Resources Committee chairman, Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Tracy, introduced a bill to end the 25-year-old ban on drilling and offer states a share of oil and gas royalties if they agreed to allow oil and gas exploration off their shores. The bill also would have opened areas beyond 100 miles offshore to drilling regardless of whether states wanted it.

Pombo's drilling bill passed the House easily last June, but the Senate approved a much narrower measure to allow drilling only in an 8.3 million-acre swath of the Gulf of Mexico known as Lease Area 181, which Democratic President Bill Clinton had first proposed for oil and gas development. The Senate bill also created a "buffer zone" off the Florida coast where no drilling could occur, but only through the year 2022.

The election losses suffered by Republicans on Nov. 7 -- including Pombo's defeat -- reinforced the notion that the House drilling bill was dead.

So industry groups, led by the National Association of Manufacturers, the American Chemistry Council and the American Gas Association, began pressuring the White House and Republican House leaders to accept the Senate bill to secure some new energy supplies before Democrats took power.

Gulf Coast lawmakers, especially Louisiana Democratic Sen. Mary Landrieu, who's been on a crusade to get more oil and gas revenue for her hurricane-stricken state, also aggressively pushed for the bill. She enlisted Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid to back her cause. Reid helped persuade House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco not to whip up Democratic opposition to the drilling measure.

DOJ_NMG_0105255

In the end, the measure narrowly survived. The House, on a 207-205 vote, rejected an amendment by Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., to require oil companies to repay royalties owed on leases from the 1990s before they could bid on any new leases. The Senate has no time to change it, so the change would have killed the drilling provision.

The offshore measure was ultimately passed as part of a 367-45 vote on a massive bill to extend $45 billion in popular tax breaks.

The clear winners in the bill -- should the Senate approve it as part of the overall tax measure -- are the states of Louisiana, Texas, Mississippi and Alabama, which soon would start collecting 37.5 percent of all federal royalties on oil and gas leases. Louisiana would get almost half of the new revenues. Together, the states would get several hundred million dollars a year as the pumping begins and tens of billions of dollars more once they start sharing in royalties from all Gulf of Mexico leases beginning in 2017.

Opponents said the measure would be a boondoggle for the Gulf Coast states, robbing as much as $170 billion over the next 60 years from the federal treasury, which could have paid for education, health care or cutting down the national debt.

"It's a great deal for these four states, and I can certainly understand why they would support it. But what I can't understand is why my colleagues from the other 46 states would agree to it," said Rep. Lois Capps, D-Santa Barbara. "This country has record deficits as far as the eye can see, and it's simply irresponsible to add billions more in new debt."

Environmentalists were disappointed by Friday's vote but still pleased they had prevented Pombo's bill from becoming law. They plan to go on the offense next year, pressuring their Democratic allies in key committee positions to permanently ban drilling off much or all of the West and East coasts.

"California's coastline remains at extreme risk until we are able to secure permanent protection," said Richard Charter, chairman of the National Outer Continental Shelf Coalition, a group opposing drilling. "The lesson we saw today was that even in the last 12 hours in the waning days of a lame-duck session, a state can lose its coastline in a heartbeat. That's what happened to much of the Florida coast today."

Sickened By Fresh Produce (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

The expanding outbreak of E. coli poisonings in New York, New Jersey and several other states underscores the need for more rigorous regulation of the whole supply chain for fresh produce, from the growing fields to the customer. It is outrageous that fresh vegetables, typically deemed a vital component of a healthy diet, have become a menace because of contamination in their handling.

Although most of the victims had eaten at Taco Bell restaurants, where green onions, or scallions, were found to be contaminated, the real culprit probably lies farther up the supply chain, either at the growing farm or packaging plant or distribution warehouse. Investigators have yet to pinpoint the source, but suspicion seems to be pointing to a farm in California, whose green onions were also involved in a hepatitis outbreak in 2003. Only when the source of bacterial contamination is identified, if indeed it is ever identified, will we know better how this outbreak might have been prevented.

What’s troubling is the recurrence of such outbreaks in recent years. Contaminated meat used to be deemed the big threat, but strict regulation and strong industrial efforts have reduced that risk considerably. Now produce has become a bigger problem than meat or poultry. There have been three multistate outbreaks from produce in the past three months, including an E. coli outbreak linked to spinach and a salmonella outbreak linked to tomatoes. Surely it is time to give government regulators the power and resources they need to ensure the safety of fresh fruits and vegetables.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mafia Takedowns Win Italian Chief FBI Honors (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON- The FBI gave one of its highest honors Friday to Italy's national police chief for working a quarter-century with the U.S. to bring down an estimated 1,000 Mafia and other organized crime leaders in both countries.

Prefetto Giovanni "Gianni" De Gennaro, who at times put sandbags on his windows to shield his family from snipers and whose organized crime officers slept at police stations to remain safe, was awarded the FBI Medal for Meritorious Achievement. The ceremony at FBI headquarters marked the first time the honor was given to an official outside of the FBI's ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0105256

De Gennaro, chief of the Italian National Police, said he worked so closely with the FBI and federal prosecutors that "sometimes I even woke up wondering if i was in Rome or in New York," he told an auditorium packed with current and former top FBI and Justice Department officials.

He said such international cooperation was valuable to help law enforcement face down threats "whether it appeared as a mobster or as a terrorist."

Former FBI Director Louis Freeh, who as a federal prosecutor in New York worked closely with De Gennaro on a number of Mafia cases in the 1980s, said that the U.S-Italy investigative bond "has really changed the face of organized crime.

"It has allowed the law enforcement infrastructure in both counties to really dismantle the command and control of the Mafia," Freeh said.

GRAZIE TO ITALIAN 'PIZZA' COP (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, December 9, 2006

December 9, 2006 -- Italy's mob-busting chief of police was honored by the FBI yesterday for his "visionary" approach to international crime fighting that began with New York's famous "Pizza Connection" case.

FBI Director Robert Mueller credited Giovanni De Gennaro - the first foreign official to receive the Medal of Meritorious Achievement - with forging a bond with the United States that grew into a worldwide intelligence network now used to combat terrorism.

De Gennaro first teamed up with the FBI in the 1980s to crack a massive mob-run heroin-trafficking operation involving Sicilian gangsters and their American Bonanno counterparts, who used pizza parlors as fronts.

The probe led to a 17-month trial in Manhattan federal court beginning in 1987, during which one defendant was murdered and another shot before the jury could return its verdict.

More than 20 years later the mob has been devastated by thousands of arrests that De Gennaro said came out of "a deep feeling of friendship [with the FBI] and commitment to fight a common enemy, whether he appeared as a mobster or a terrorist."

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Commute This Sentence (WP)

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

THE SUPREME Court this week declined to review the case of Weldon Angelos, leaving in place his obscene sentence of 55 years in prison for small-time marijuana and gun charges. The high court's move is no surprise; the justices have tended to uphold draconian sentences against constitutional challenge. But it confronts President Bush with a question he will have to address: Is there any sentence so unfair that he would exert himself to correct it?

So far, Mr. Bush hasn't found one. He has commuted only two sentences, both of inmates who were about to be released anyway. Mr. Angelos, by contrast, is a young man and a first-time offender who is now likely to spend the rest of his life in prison. His crime? He sold $350 in marijuana to a government informant three times -- and carried, but did not display, a gun on two of those occasions. Police found other guns and pot at his house. The U.S. district judge who sentenced him in Utah, Paul G. Cassell, declared the mandatory sentence in this case "unjust, cruel, and even irrational." He noted that it is "far in excess of the sentence imposed for such serious crimes as aircraft hijacking, second degree murder, espionage, kidnapping, aggravated assault, and rape." And in an extraordinary act, he explicitly called on Mr. Bush to use his clemency powers to offer what he as a judge could not: justice. Judge Cassell recommended that Mr. Bush commute the sentence to 18 years, which he described as "the average sentence recommended by the jury that heard this case."

Mr. Bush put Judge Cassell on the bench. As a law professor before that, he was a staunch advocate of tough justice; his chief claim to fame, in fact, was having pressed the Supreme Court to overturn its landmark Miranda decision requiring police to read criminal suspects their constitutional rights. His exceptional discomfort with this case -- and his passionate plea for presidential mercy -- ought to carry weight even with a president so disinclined to use the powers the Constitution gives him to remedy injustices.

TAX:

Actor Pleads Not Guilty In Tax Fraud Case (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105257

The actor Wesley Snipes, a fugitive for the last two months while shooting a movie in Namibia, surrendered to federal officials in Florida yesterday and pleaded not guilty to charges of tax fraud and conspiracy.

According to his indictment, by a federal grand jury in Tampa, Fla., Mr. Snipes, 44, failed to file tax returns from 1999 to 2004, and falsely claimed almost $12 million in refunds for 1996 and 1997.

He arrived in Orlando, Fla., yesterday and was arraigned in Ocala, according to the office of the United States attorney for Central Florida.

Mr. Snipes was freed on $1 million in bail. Magistrate Judge Gary R. Jones ordered him released pending trial, and gave him permission to return to Africa to finish his new movie, “Gallowwalker.” A trial is set for March, and Mr. Snipes is required to return to the United States and surrender his passport by Jan. 10.

“I look forward to clearing my name and resolving this issue posthaste,” he said after the hearing, The Associated Press reported.

A federal warrant was issued for Mr. Snipes’s arrest in October. Two Florida men, Eddie R. Kahn and Douglas P. Rosile, were indicted along with Mr. Snipes, on charges of conspiracy and of preparing fraudulent tax returns.

Wesley Snipes In Florida Court In Tax Fraud Case (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, December 9, 2006

(AP) - ORLANDO, Florida-Actor Wesley Snipes surrendered to authorities to face federal tax fraud charges and was released on $1 million (â‚¬750,000) bond Friday, two months after he was indicted in central Florida.

The actor in the "Blade" trilogy, "Major League" and "Jungle Fever" did not speak at a court appearance. He went there after arriving on a private jet Friday from the African nation of Namibia, where he was filming a cowboy movie called "Gallow Walker," his publicist said.

"I look forward to clearing my name and resolving this issue post haste," Snipes said after the hearing. He did not comment further on the case.

Snipes, 44, was charged in October with fraudulently claiming refunds totaling nearly $12 million in 1996 and 1997 on income taxes already paid. He was also charged with failure to file returns from 1999 through 2004.

He will be allowed to return to Namibia to finish his film, but he must return to his home in California on or before Jan. 10, U.S. Magistrate Gary Jones ruled.

After that, Snipes will be required to surrender his U.S. passport.

According to the indictment, Snipes had his taxes prepared by accountants with a history of filing false returns to reap payments for their clients. The firm American Rights Litigators would receive 20 percent of refunds from clients, according to the indictment.

Snipes has said he is a scapegoat and was unfairly targeted by prosecutors, and has suggested he was taken advantage of.

"We believe the evidence in the case will show he has been the victim of unscrupulous tax advice. And this trial will help vindicate him," said Billy Martin, Snipes' lawyer.

If convicted, he faces up to 16 years in prison.

Martin said Snipes left the United States to film the movie long before the indictment.

"We want to make it clear that he did not avoid returning to the United States. He's always been ready to return," Martin said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Tanks On War (NYDN)

By Kenneth R. Bazinet

New York Daily News, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON - More Americans than ever say President Bush is doing a pitiful job with the war, and an almost equally overwhelming number of people think Iraq won't turn out to be a stable democracy, a new poll showed yesterday.

A whopping 71% of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of the war, while only 27% say he's done a good job, according to the AP-Ipsos poll.

Just 9% of Americans believe the U.S. will end up with a clear-cut victory in Iraq, the poll indicated, while 63% said they don't think the country will become a stable democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0105258

The public opinion was so lousy that even Bush's go-to issue - the economy - took a hit in the latest poll. His oversight of the economy sank to a 38% approval rating from last month's 43%.

The cratering of support for Bush's conduct of the war was evident on the floor of the Senate, where an emotional Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.) ripped the strategy and tactics in Iraq.

"I, for one, am at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day," Smith said.

"That is absurd. It may even be criminal," added Smith, who voted for the resolution to go to war but said he had changed course after some soul-searching.

Some lawmakers who spent time in meetings yesterday with Bush described him as being in denial and clueless about the American people's desire to see U.S. forces return home from Iraq.

"He has yet to get the message the American people sent him on Nov. 7," said Rep. Joe Crowley (D-Queens), referring to the watershed midterm elections that ended GOP control of Congress.

Crowley, one of eight centrist Democrats who met with Bush in the Oval Office, said the President is going to "cherry-pick" certain recommendations from the Iraq Study Group's report and ignore others.

Incoming Senate Democratic Whip Richard Durbin of Illinois said it was much of the same at an earlier meeting between Bush and the bipartisan leaders of Congress.

"The President did not endorse the Iraq Study Group at this meeting, and his statements leave me questioning whether or not he is ever going to support their conclusions," Durbin said.

Bush will have a series of briefings next week with Pentagon, State Department, National Security Council and outside experts. He is then expected to decide what steps he can take to try to reverse the deadly course that the Iraq war has taken for U.S. forces.

When Bush makes up his mind, he plans to deliver a speech to the nation before Christmas.

The Vanishing Veep (USNEWS)

By John W. Mashek

US News and World Report, December 8, 2006

The forgotten man in the Bush administration is Vice President Cheney. He brought most of it on himself.

His standing is plunging with members of Congress as a whole, Democrats, some Republicans, and even zealots on the Christian right.

For the next two years, it appears he will be struggling to play any kind of significant role in Bush's lame-duck term. He has burned too many bridges to be really effective as a voice in Washington.

Consider these problems:

—Cheney is the first vice president in recent history who is not gearing up to succeed his president and run on his own. Think of Gore, Bush 41, Mondale, Humphrey–the list goes on. If Cheney reversed course, his candidacy would be laughable.

—Cheney's influence in the public domain has hit rock bottom in the past few months. He was unable to save buddy Don Rumsfeld's job as secretary of defense. He raised money for GOP candidates in the fall, but many of them lost.

—Cheney's lesbian daughter, Mary, is pregnant. That development is news only because Cheney's party is so outspoken against same-sex marriage or same-sex parents. In the 2000 campaign, the Bush-Cheney backers railed against same-sex marriage. No one doubts Cheney's sincere love for his daughter, but the Republican Party's hypocrisy here is unmistakable.

—Cheney's voice on the war in Iraq lacks credibility. He has been wrong on virtually all his predictions when he rarely ventures out for interviews. His penchant for being secretive has been evident for six years as aides shield him except for favored folks in the media.

For reporters who covered the Ford administration, as I did, we are puzzled and even dismayed at the change in Cheney. As the top presidential aide to President Ford, he was a hardworking, helpful, and even cheerful individual. He was a big asset to a struggling, accidental president. With Cheney's help, Ford almost pulled an upset in his race with Jimmy Carter.

That man no longer exists.

Cheney was picked as Bush's running mate in 2000 only after Cheney, who directed the selection process, didn't produce a name to the Texas governor's liking. The suspicion was that Bush's father was instrumental in finally going to Cheney.

A number of fellow GOP governors had come in fawning tribute to Bush in Austin, probably figuring they might land on the ticket. But Cheney got the nod, and most were delighted with the choice.

Cheney's downward slide has continued steadily since then.

Rumsfeld Discusses Successes, Failures (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0105259

By Ann Scott Tyson
The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Departing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said yesterday that his most difficult moment on the job was when he learned of the abuses at the Abu Ghraib prison. His best moment, he said, may come the day later this month when he leaves office.

In his final town hall meeting with Pentagon employees, Rumsfeld ranged from serious and emotional to humorous and sarcastic as he mused about his legacy as one of the nation's longest-serving defense secretaries.

On Iraq, Rumsfeld warned of "the dire consequences, were we to fail there," saying the divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslims could spill over into the entire Middle East. He said it would be "a terrible mistake" for the United States "to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into . . . that region."

"We have every chance in the world of succeeding" in Iraq and Afghanistan, "but only if we have the patience and only if we have the staying power," Rumsfeld said.

When asked about his best and worst days in office, Rumsfeld chose not to cite any missteps in Iraq or U.S. troop casualties. Instead, he pointed to his shock and disappointment over the events at Abu Ghraib.

"Clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," Rumsfeld said of the abuse of Iraqi detainees by U.S. troops uncovered in early 2004. He said the news "stunned him," calling the mistreatment of Iraqi detainees "egregious wrongdoing."

The incident prompted Rumsfeld twice to offer his resignation to President Bush -- the only times he has acknowledged doing so until Nov. 8, when Rumsfeld announced he was stepping down in the aftermath of Democrats winning Congress in the midterm elections.

"I guess my best day, I don't know, maybe a week from Monday," Rumsfeld quipped. Dec. 18 is when his successor, former CIA chief Robert M. Gates, will be sworn into office in a formal ceremony at the Pentagon.

Rumsfeld, 74, said he has met twice with Gates in preparation for the transition and has "every confidence that he will do a terrific job." Asked what advice he would offer his successor, Rumsfeld received some prodding from the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, who stood beside him on the Pentagon stage.

Pace whispered something to Rumsfeld, who then told the crowd, "The advice should be: He should listen to the chairman."

Both men defended the defense secretary against an accusation lodged by several generals, both active-duty and retired, that Rumsfeld tended to brush aside their advice. Pace called Rumsfeld "demanding" but said he also took the blame for subordinates and was careful to present their dissenting viewpoints.

Rumsfeld pointed to his decision to set up a senior leadership group, including the Joint Chiefs of Staff and combatant commanders, to "engage them at the beginning of the process" of making decisions.

As for his legacy, Rumsfeld deflected some questions with humor, saying he hopes that history will judge him "better than the local press."

Over time, he said, he hopes that most of his decisions will turn out to have been "the right ones."

Rumsfeld gave the Pentagon moderately good marks on one of his top priorities, the transformation of the military from a Cold War organization to a more agile and adaptive force. While people's attitudes have changed markedly, he suggested, concrete progress has been harder to achieve.

But he gave the military and the government overall a "D-plus" in their efforts to counter extremist ideologies overseas. He defended the controversial decision of U.S. commanders in Iraq to pay a contractor to place positive news articles in Iraqi newspapers but acknowledged that "there's always that line where you begin to propagandize. And you have to be careful."

As he prepares to leave office, Rumsfeld sounded two of his deepest and most long-held beliefs, saying he feels much the same as he did upon leaving the Pentagon the last time, in 1977, after serving as the country's youngest defense secretary.

"America's leadership in the world is not just useful, but . . . urgently needed," he said, repeating a worldview he first embraced as a Princeton University student in the late 1950s. "Ours is a troubled and very dangerous world, and we must not forget it," he cautioned, citing another core belief. The Pentagon today, he said, is in the midst of the most challenging period of its 59-year history.

Rumsfeld did not divulge his future plans, but some people in the audience urged him to write a book. "I always thought I was too young to write a book. I can't use that anymore," he said, drawing laughter. "I might. I might."

Rumsfeld's Farewell Speech (WP)

Cq Transcripts Wire
The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105260

DECEMBER 8, 2006
SPEAKERS: DONALD H. RUMSFELD, U.S. SECRETARY OF DEFENSE
GENERAL PETER PACE (USMC), CHAIRMAN, JOINT CHIEFS OF STAFF
[*]

PACE: Mr. Secretary, and everyone in this audience, this is our last opportunity to get together (inaudible), so let me just take minute to thank you all for all you do and to wish you and your families a very blessed and peaceful holiday season. And thanks for all you do to bring peace around the world.

And second, as you know, this is our last town hall meeting with our secretary. And although I'll get a chance to say a few more words next Friday at the departure ceremony, I'd be remiss if I didn't take this opportunity, amongst our family, to say just a few things about Secretary Rumsfeld.

PACE: This man's work ethic is incredible. Is he demanding? You bet.

RUMSFELD: No.

(LAUGHTER)

I've been on my best behavior.

PACE: If you don't have -- if you haven't done your homework when you walk into the secretary's office, you're not going to have a good day.

(LAUGHTER)

But he's most demanding on himself. And we have benefited enormously from the drive and energy that he has instilled in this organization from top to bottom, starting with his own daily work ethic and how he does his job.

Second, I have come, over almost 40 years now, to appreciate two kinds of courage. Courage number one is the kind we are most familiar with in the military, which is courage in combat. But in my five years, now, in Washington, I've also come to appreciate the courage it takes to speak your mind.

And in the meetings that our secretary attends, there are no shrinking violets. And everyone is -- correctly so -- a very special, unique, capable person. And I've watched many times when the conversations amongst groups have been going in a direction and the secretary has had the temerity to say, "I see it differently. Here is why," and to change the course of the conversation and quite literally the course that our country has taken.

That kind of courage is rare. And we who serve in the military and in this department have benefited enormously through the courage that our secretary has shown in those meetings.

PACE: Third, this is a man of very strong loyalty.

It's easy and correct and proper to be loyal up the chain. I am talking about a secretary of defense who is loyal down the chain to his family.

There are 2.4 million American service men and women, active, Guard and Reserve. At any given moment, some one of them is doing something stupid.

(LAUGHTER)

The rest are doing great things.

(LAUGHTER)

But somebody's out there doing something they shouldn't be doing, on occasion, that has had strategic negative impact. And it has been the result of things that the chain of command should have known and taken care of.

Not once -- not once -- when folks have laid at the feet of our secretary the blame for something that has gone wrong, not once has he done anything other than accept the responsibility. He has never tried to deflect that to any subordinate, even though it was a subordinate's responsibility.

Lastly, I admire his integrity. Not only does he speak his mind, but he has been particularly careful to ensure that, when he knew that what he was saying was different from what I or any of the chiefs or any of his subordinate commanders thought about the problem, he always made sure that he said, to whoever he was talking, "General So-and-So sees it differently; this is what he or she thinks," in a way that always had all the facets of the issue on the table.

It takes enormous integrity to have the kind of strength of conviction that the secretary has to drive to the conclusion that he believes is correct and, at the same time, ensure that the decision- maker has in front of him or her all of the information and all of the various ideas.

PACE: For those reasons and so many more, it is my distinct privilege to introduce once again to you our secretary of defense, Secretary Rumsfeld.

(APPLAUSE)

RUMSFELD: Thank you very much.

Pete, thank you.

It has really been a privilege to be able to work with this outstanding human being, the first Marine ever to serve as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

I have valued your counsel. I have valued your candor. And I've enjoyed your sense of humor.

And the American people are well-served by having this enormously talented individual willing to make a career in the military.

So thank you very much, Pete.

(APPLAUSE)

I'm told that we not only have the folks in this room, but we have a bunch of folks out in different locations with monitors, plus we have the Pentagon Channel that is carrying this town hall, I suppose, most way around the world.

Is that not right, Allison (ph)?

STAFF: That's correct.

RUMSFELD: Yes.

I'm also told that this is my 42nd town hall since I began this second tour as secretary of defense about six years ago. Thirteen of them have been here in the Pentagon and some 28 have been with troops stationed in countries all across the world.

RUMSFELD: These sessions, I suspect, are among the very few occasions when everybody -- civilian, military, contractor, folks from all branches of the services from all levels -- can gather with the senior leadership of the department with a microphone in your hand, ask a question and speak your mind.

It is a chance for everyone to be heard, to ask questions. And goodness knows there've been a great many questions asked over these 42 town halls.

I certainly remember the fellow who used to sit in the back over here somewhere and ask about whether we're going to move the Metro entrance.

(LAUGHTER)

Are you here today?

(LAUGHTER)

Stand up and be recognized.

(LAUGHTER)

Well, merry Christmas, wherever you are.

As we've seen, when you're willing to have an open exchange like this, every once in a while, a question gets asked or an answer is given that generates a bit of a fuss, depending on how it's reported.

That's happened. So be it.

I think each of you, and, indeed, all of the uniformed and civilian folks in the Department of Defense, deserve this opportunity.

So, I've done it an unprecedented 42 times. And I can tell you I have benefited from hearing your questions and hearing your views and I thank you for engaging as you have.

I suspect this will be among my last public remarks as secretary of defense, so I'd like to take a few minutes to talk a bit about our time together these past years.

Every day, in one way or another, I've seen the strength of men and women in uniform and the dedication of the many thousands who serve here, military and civilian, who do their jobs, knowing that theirs is the essential business of protecting a nation, protecting a people.

RUMSFELD: You do so knowing that you contribute directly to the safety of millions of Americans, people you'll never meet, whose names you'll never know.

And I leave office very proud to have served with you, inspired by your dedication, by your patriotism and by your sacrifice. And we recognize that sacrifice.

I also leave office proud to have served with you, and of the accomplishments that this institution's been able to achieve. I can't think of a more challenging period -- I'm sure there must have been -- but in the 59-year history of this department than these past years.

I have a few words to say about the Pentagon press corps.

(LAUGHTER)

No, it's not what you think.

(LAUGHTER)

As a group, they may well be, year to year, the most professional press corps in the Washington, D.C., area. Now, considering the competition...

(LAUGHTER)

DOJ_NMG_0105262

... I'll leave it to you to determine exactly what kind of a compliment that is.

(LAUGHTER)

But the Defense Department press corps is an important part of the fabric of this institution. Some braved the smoke and fire of September 11th. Some came back to work later that night and the next morning in a still-burning building. And a number have risked their lives to report from war zones. And to them, I say thank you for that.

As hard as it may be to believe, I even miss our press conferences. I think I will. The stakeouts, the briefings. I'm told it was something like 613 over six years, all across the globe.

Now, you know we've not always seen eye to eye, I haven't, with the press, but I still hold out hope that over time they'll get it close to right.

(LAUGHTER)

RUMSFELD: When I think about these past years, there are a number of moments that stand out.

I think of those proud Afghan girls that were sitting in the front row at President Karzai's inauguration in Kabul, when he became president -- the first president elected by the people in the 5,000- year history of that country.

They were standing there, and then they sang. And, of course, under the Taliban rule, it was against the law to sing.

And the reports of the Afghan children flying kites that day. And, of course, it had been against the law to fly kites.

I think of the Iraqis who, through it all, believe that their future is bright and who are working to forge something that they've never had before: a free country, a representative country.

And I do -- as Pete Pace suggested, I remember being stunned by the news of the abuse at Abu Ghraib. And then watching so many determined people spend so many months trying to figure out exactly how in the world something like that could have happened, and how to make it right. And then seeing how the department eventually demonstrated to the world how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing.

And, yes, I remember the irresponsible comments by some who tried to sully the image of the courageous and dedicated men and women in uniform who keep the American people safe.

I remember the literally hundreds of military families I met in Alaska, and a gracious woman who at the end of the meeting came over and asked me to take a bracelet -- it's this green woven thing. And I told her I'd wear it until the 172nd Stryker Brigade came home. That was the group that we had to extend I think up to 120 days. After they had done a great job up north, they were heading to Kuwait and they were diverted into Baghdad, when General Casey determined that he needed additional assistance there.

And I of course remember the American heroes, the Medal of Honor recipients, Paul Ray Smith and, soon, Jason Dunham, and countless others whose names are now part of history.

RUMSFELD: If there's one thing I wish that could be more widely known, it's the miracles that the men and women of this department really perform every day.

Supporting the campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan while putting pressure on terrorists all across the globe is an enormous challenge.

But at the same time, quite beyond that challenge -- and it is an enormous challenge -- the folks in this department have stepped forward to deliver aid to millions affected by the greatest national (sic) disasters in recent memory: the tsunami in the Indian Ocean, tragic earthquakes in Pakistan, here at home Hurricane Katrina.

They evacuated thousands of Americans from Lebanon -- literally the size of a city -- and doing it while a war was going on.

Training counterterrorism forces in the Philippines and in the Horn of Africa.

Put in place an initial missile defense system to protect the American people from rogue states.

Established the new Northern Command to better protect the homeland.

Established a camp and stood guard in Guantanamo over some of the world's most dangerous terrorists, while suffering grossly uninformed and irresponsible charges in the media from almost every quarter.

GONZALES: Oversee the largest domestic base realignment and base closure in the history of this department.

Implement the most significant changes since World War II in our nation's global posture -- force posture across the globe, away from the static defensive orientation that was left over from the Cold War and toward arrangements that are much more appropriate to this 21st century.

Put in place a new civilian national security personnel system to provide the urgently needed flexibility in hiring and in assignments and with a linking of pay to performance.

Expand our very talented special operations forces to meet the new demands in this global struggle against violent extremists.

Transition from a division-based Army, the approach that dated back to World War I, to a considerably more agile, vastly more capable combat brigade force.

And so much more.

Each of you here in this room and listening through the Pentagon Channel have played a part in one or more of these accomplishments, these endeavors. And you can look at what you've done here this past period with great pride.

I wish I could say that everything we've done here has gone perfectly, but that's not how life works, regrettably. When thousands of people make dozens of difficult decisions on hundreds of pressing issues, for the most part matters that are new and unfamiliar, where there's no road map, no guidebook that says, "Here's exactly how you should do something," the hope has to be not perfection but that most decisions, with the perspective of time, will turn out to be the right ones and that the perspective of history will judge the overwhelming majority of those decisions favorably.

When we reflect back on these past years, each of you will likely have some different memories. Some memories will no doubt be of hard work and grueling times, working long days, months, even years on critical tasks that really are never noted in headline or in a news story -- at least never favorably noted.

(LAUGHTER)

But let there be no doubt, each of you and the future generations of Americans, as well as future generations of Iraqis and Afghans, will be able to look back on these past years as a time of enormous challenge, of historic consequence and of solid accomplishment.

Today's a time to look forward. The institution is important, well beyond those who temporarily serve here. We come and go. Some of us come and go more than once.

(LAUGHTER)

But what remains is this great institution's mission and its cause: the challenge of defending this nation and the ideals that this nation represents.

RUMSFELD: It's been three decades since I left the Pentagon at the end of my first tour.

Our country was then engaged in a long struggle, the Cold War, a conflict that seemed costly, and it was; that seemed unlimited in duration, and it was; and seemed unclear in its course and its outcome, which was the case.

In fact, many then believed and indeed acted as though it was the United States that was the cause of the world's troubles. We even see a little bit of that today.

And yet, despite the tumult of the times, I left this post in 1977 believing strongly that America was a force for good in the world, that the vast majority of the American people were wise and decent people, and that America would continue to be the principled leader in the free world.

That has been proven right. And I can say that as I leave at the end of my second and, the good Lord willing, my last...

(LAUGHTER)

... I do leave believing, as I did 30 years ago, that America is a truly great nation, that the American people are wise and decent, and that America's leadership in the world is not just useful, but that it is urgently needed.

And let there be no doubt: Despite the fact that we have been successful in preventing attacks since September 11th, years without an attack in this country, ours is a troubled and very dangerous world, and we must not forget it.

I've been asked recently what I've taken away from public life over these, I guess, 50-plus years. I suppose what I feel most is gratitude.

Gratitude to the folks here in this department, the men and women in uniform, the civilians, the contractors.

Gratitude to the American people, who continue to serve as a guide for the dreams and the hopes and the aspirations of so many millions of people who live all across the globe, but who seek opportunity and a better life for themselves and see in what we've done in this country a model that they hope for and wish for.

RUMSFELD: Now, I'd be happy to respond to some questions. And as always, if they're too tough, Pete Pace is going to come up and join me.

(LAUGHTER)

Come on up here, Pete.

(LAUGHTER)

All right. There's some microphones around, I'm told. And there's a hand, though I still always worry about the first hand.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, I'm wondering what books you read while you were secretary that you found most useful and edifying.

RUMSFELD: Well, I've read a great many books. They're all history books; a number about the Revolutionary War and about George Washington and John Adams and others, Jefferson.

DOJ_NMG_0105264

I started reading a number of books about the Civil War. And one particularly good one was a book on Ulysses S. Grant. But I stopped. I found the struggle going on -- gosh, those years, there were so many people killed and wounded, and they were all Americans, except for the foreign fighters who came over from Germany and Poland and elsewhere.

So I turned away from that and read a great deal about World War II. And that has been basically what I've been reading.

So that's where I ran across that quote by Winston Churchill that I mentioned in the Oval Office when we were announcing my departure.

RUMSFELD: I think Churchill said something to the effect that, "I have benefited greatly from the criticism I've received, and I've never suffered from a lack thereof."

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, this is not a question. It's simply a chance to say thank you.

Three years ago, my daughter brought her performing troupe here on September 11th, 2003. You took the time to come over, not just to say howdy, but to actually talk to a group of young people.

These 30 young people -- of those 30, five of them are now members of the military. You have had a profound effect on the young members of that troupe and on our country.

And for that I thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

RUMSFELD: Thanks very much. And do thank that young lady and give her a merry Christmas.

QUESTION: Hello, Mr. Secretary. I certainly don't want to put you on the spot, but I'm going to...

RUMSFELD: Then why?

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

RUMSFELD: I mean, just suck it up and go home.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

I'm just kidding. I want to hear what you have to say.

QUESTION: I'm still going to take advantage of this time...

(CROSSTALK)

RUMSFELD: ... accurate, though.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: ... and that is that I really am hoping that you plan on writing about your second tour in the Pentagon. Is there any chance that will happen?

RUMSFELD: Oh my gosh, my wife's after me to do that.

(LAUGHTER)

I suppose there is a chance. I've never written a book. I always thought I was too young to write a book.

(LAUGHTER)

I can't use that anymore.

I might. I might. I'll have to think about it.

But I've decided I'm not going to make any decisions about what I'll do next for a couple of months, and just let a little time go over it.

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, how do you want history to remember you?

RUMSFELD: My goodness.

(LAUGHTER)

Better than the local press.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: Hello, Mr. Secretary. Thank you for your leadership during this really difficult time in our country's history.

My question is, as the U.S. supports democracies throughout the world, one of the great things about democracy is that it brings freedom of intellectual exchange and technological developments.

QUESTION: While those two things bring about great things for humanity, it also brings about conflict within people. And you have a lot of dissent and people becoming enemies.

How do you think we can stop our world from becoming chaotic and just becoming a bunch of individuals and small groups who think of everyone else as being their enemy?

DOJ_NMG_0105265

RUMSFELD: That's a tough, tough thing to answer. Except if one goes back through history and thinks of the deep divisions that can exist, the reality is that people, over time, observe and they see what works and what doesn't work.

And if we were able to be on Mars and look down on Earth, for example, we would find that those societies where conflict is continuous lose.

I have this wonderful picture of the Korean Peninsula on my desk. It shows the same people, North and South; the same resources North and South; but it shows the satellite shot at night and it shows all the electricity and the energy and the opportunity and the success south of the Demilitarized Zone.

They have a free political system and a free economic system. And now they are the 10th or 12th economy on the face of the Earth.

And in the North, there's no light except the pinprick of light in Pyongyang. The country in the North has a command economy that doesn't work and it has a repressive political system where people don't have free choice.

And if you look down from Mars on the world, you'd see that the countries that are succeeding and doing well, where the people have opportunity and are able to make free choice, indicates that free choice on the part of people in the economic realm and in the political realm works vastly better than the decisions by a few.

RUMSFELD: As Winston Churchill said, "Democracy is the worst form of government accept for every other that's ever been tried." And it is. It's untidy. And there's debate and partisanship and people make mistakes, but it works and it works very well, and it works better than any other form.

And I think that we have to have confidence in people that the -- that things that work will be seen by intelligent people and they'll gravitate to that. I mean, it's not an accident that people line up to come to this country every year to work, to visit and to live, because they see that here is a land of opportunity.

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, with respect to your second tour of duty here in the Puzzle Palace, what are some of the things that you wish you could have accomplished -- like transformation items -- that you didn't get a chance to get to this time?

RUMSFELD: One day we were sitting in the Oval Office with the president and the president turned to Pete and to me and said, "Give me a report on how transformation's going." And before I could even think, out of General Pace's mouth he said something like, "With respect to attitude and culture, an 8 on a scale of 10. And with respect to progress, a 4."

Is that what you said?

(LAUGHTER)

PACE: Yes, sir.

RUMSFELD: Yes. And I think that was probably about right. That was about a year ago. I think I'd give it a 5 today.

But I think the important thing is that there have been -- there's been a change in people's approach, a recognition that in this 21st century the way we did things in the 20th century isn't good enough and we're simply going to have to be wiser and more agile and more skillful, and we're going to have to be able to do different things.

RUMSFELD: We're not engaged in major land battles or air battles or sea battles at the present time. We're being challenged asymmetrically by irregular warfare, by people who operate totally differently than the way people operated in World War II.

And that is a challenge. It's a task. And it's still not well understood in our country. It's unfamiliar.

But I think the major sign of progress is the fact that the senior people in this department today are overwhelmingly people who understand that and who are attracting people in their activities who also understand it, and that that energy and that impetus will give the prospects of continuing a transforming process -- is a better word than "transformation," I suppose; "transformation" leads you to believe you started untransformed and suddenly you're transformed, which isn't the case, because the world's not static, it's dynamic, it's changing. And we need to continue to transform as we go along.

And I think that Pete's 8 for that is important and indeed is the driver.

You know, when you think about words, I have felt just an enormous sense of urgency these years. Some of you may have noticed it.

(LAUGHTER)

I do.

Anyone who lives through September 11th, and then sees in their mind's eye the prospects of a September 11th times two or three or four, six months out, has to ask themselves, "What ought we be doing today to prevent that coming September 11th six months from now? What can we do to prevent it from happening? What can we do to mitigate its effects were it to happen?"

RUMSFELD: And so, I have felt a tremendous sense of urgency.

Conversely, if there's anything that the Cold War required, it was patience; just seemingly the opposite of urgency.

And this is a long struggle. This is not -- what we're engaged in today, this struggle against violent extremism, is going to take a long time. And that's going to require patience. And it's going to require perspective.

DOJ_NMG_0105266

And I do hope people will read more history and understand and be able to help our fellow citizens have a perspective on what's taking place.

I read the other day somebody was comparing the length of time we've been in Iraq to the length of World War II, totally ignoring the period after World War II where the German government didn't even have a government, I don't think, until 1949.

And trying to compare what we're in today -- just take Iraq or Afghanistan. The military can't lose. They can't lose a battle, let alone a war over there.

But they also can't win, because it is not a conventional conflict. There isn't an army or a navy or an air force to go defeat.

It takes political and economic activity, and you need that three-legged stool for success to be achieved. And that takes patience. And we have to understand that as a society, as a people, and not be impatient.

I mean, I -- and I'll tell you that people over there in uniform get it. They really do.

I was in Walter Reed the other day, and a fellow had just come in with multiple wounds. And he was on his back. And he had a tube in his nose. And he looked up, and he said, "If only the American people will give us the time, we can do this. We're getting it done."

And it's a fact. It will take patience. And it will take understanding.

And yet it takes that sense of urgency on the part of the people here, as we know, because we have such an important responsibility.

QUESTION: The needs are urgent. Leaders make decisions. Yet our national security apparatus, consisting of several departments and agencies, are very slow and unresponsive. And I'm just wondering, in a world war of significant duration, if we can continue to have the significant staffing levels we have. I think the numbers of people that we have, which are greater than several years ago, are part of the problem.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: No pink slip.

PACE: No. This is great.

I think our government does a really good job of teeing up decisions for the national leadership.

But once the decisions are made, we tend to go back into our stovepipes: DOD takes our piece, State takes theirs, Treasury takes theirs, et cetera. And we go on about our business and try to do the best we can inside of our own stovepipes.

And we cannot continue to function that way and be successful against an enemy that is going to be moving much more quickly than that.

PACE: So we do need and we are looking at the -- our government's looking at as a government, the administration, the Congress is looking at and outsiders are looking at ways that we can take the national security apparatus and bring it into the 21st century and empower those below the president with the capacity and responsibility to make decisions inside of a chain that's responsive to the president's lead.

So we do need to do that much better and much more efficiently.

RUMSFELD: Pete's exactly right. That is a question that comes up every time we meet with the combatant commanders and the chiefs and the senior leadership of the department is a level of concern that the institutions that exist are basically 20th century institutions.

And that's true within our government. It's true in terms of the international institutions. Most of them were formed in the aftermath of World War II for a very different world and a very different set of circumstances.

This first conflict of the 21st century is so different, just enormously different from the World War II conflict. And yet the institutions, the committees of Congress, the subcommittee system in Congress, the turf fights over jurisdiction that exist and the micromanagement of the bureaucracy in so many instances leads to a situation where the bureaucracy can't respond.

We're well behind in Afghanistan and Iraq in terms of the development of the police in those two countries. Why? Well, because there was no line item for the Department of Defense to do anything about police. It was over in the State Department. And they didn't have the people to do it.

And the Congress didn't authorize the money to do it. And they're at least, what, two years behind -- the police from the military? And that's harmful. That's costly. And yet it's because the federal government has not had a Goldwater-Nichols, in a sense.

RUMSFELD: They haven't decided that, in this different era, we have to have different arrangements among the various departments and agencies, and greater flexibility to move rapidly to try to avoid problems rather than to wrestle with them well after the case.

DOJ_NMG_0105267

We're still having trouble getting the kinds of funds and the kinds of support to build partner capacity on the part of other countries. And if you're trying to fight a war against people who are in countries that you're not at war with, your solution is to build their capacity, the capacity of those other countries, so that they can better govern their own space, so that they can better deal with their terrorist problems, and that terrorist aren't allowed safe havens to plan attacks against the United States and other nations.

And the cost-benefit of investing money to build the military and anti/counterterrorism capability of other countries is so much cheaper than our doing it and our having to deploy people to do those things. And their language facility is vastly better. And their respect for their own sovereignty is not infringed on.

I mean, there's just every reason in the world for us to have that as a very high priority. And yet, as I say, even today it's difficult to get the Congress responsive to that. And it just takes time.

Question?

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, thank you for your service, sir.

As you depart and Dr. Gates prepares to take on the next phase of his public service, what advice or guidance have you given him or would you like to give him as he takes over your responsibilities?

RUMSFELD: Pardon me?

PACE: Listen to the chairman, sir.

(LAUGHTER)

RUMSFELD: I said I liked his humor. Pete just whispered in my ear, "The advice should be: 'He should listen to the chairman'."

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

I've had two meetings with him, and we've had a good discussion on a variety of things. The senior folks in the department have been briefing him.

And, you know, each person is different. Each person comes in with various strengths or weaknesses. And he'll do a good job. He'll come in and he'll find a way to begin the process of serving as secretary of defense in a way that fits his background and the needs of the current time. And I've got every confidence that he'll do a terrific job.

But the short answer is, any advice I give him I'll give him in private.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: Mr. Secretary, first of all I'd like to thank you for your leadership over the last six years. It's meant a lot to us to have a steady hand on the helm here.

But I'd like to ask you your thoughts on strategic communications, or what I might call that. We're fighting an enemy that is using the media as a weapon, and doing it very well. We don't to that. In a free society, we shouldn't. But we're losing the war on that front in my opinion, sir.

Can you give us your thoughts on how we might better attack that problem?

RUMSFELD: Well, thank you. It is a central question. If they don't have an army to go out and destroy or a navy or an air force, and they do exactly what you say, they're very skillful. They have media committees. They plan their attacks for their maximum of drama and impact, designed to weaken the will of their enemies.

We have to do better.

I was asked one day what kind of a grade I'd give us, and I guess I said D+, as to how well we are combating and engaging in that struggle for ideas.

And we have to do a better job to make everything for them more difficult. Harder for them to raise money. Harder for them to recruit people. Harder for them to talk people into becoming suicide bombers. Harder for them to get across borders. Everything has to be harder for them.

And a good deal of pressure has been put on around the globe with a 90-nation coalition. The dilemma, obviously is -- I mean, take General Casey. General Casey's getting people killed over there, every day.

And we all know that if people are positive and leaning forward to be helpful, that things are easier, and that's true in Iraq.

And to the extent people are friendly and feel positive about the coalition forces and the Iraqi security forces, they're more likely to give tips as to where the IEDs are being placed or where the caches are and call up the local police or the Iraqi army or the coalition forces and say: Look, there's some bad guys in this house, and you ought to do it, take care of them.

To the extent people are hostile, they don't do that. And Casey knows exactly all the things that are being done.

RUMSFELD: My goodness, the stock market's open, their free press is there, they've got television, they've got radio, they've got schools that are open, the businesses are open, hospitals are open, there are new textbooks.

I mean, if you just watched what's happening every time there's a bomb going off in Baghdad, you'd think the whole country's aflame. But you fly over it, and that's just simply not the case. There are people out in the fields working, and there's cars in the gas lines waiting to get fuel.

Casey decided he wanted people to know that -- the truth, mind you. So he said, "Let's get that in the local papers." I don't know, there's over 100 papers in the new free press there. They didn't even have a free press before. Even the American folks who were over there were restricted in what they could do.

The first thing that happened is they did that. They gave some people some money and said, "Get this -- these true facts about hospitals and schools and goodness knows what else -- get them in the local papers. And, by golly, there'll be a more positive feeling if people are aware of that, because the lies from the enemy go on day after day after day."

He did it. And, of course, there was just a big outcry here in the United States, in the Congress, in the press. "Oh my goodness, isn't that terrible? He's trying to reduce the number of people getting killed over there by asking people to print the truth and paying them to do that."

Well, it goes right to the point you make. We've got to be careful. There are multiple audiences. And every time we invest our time and effort trying to do a better job communicating -- strategic communications, what's going on truthfully -- not only do the Iraqi people hear it, but so, too, do our people hear it.

And there's always that line where you begin to propagandize. And you have to be careful.

So it is a dilemma. We've not solved it.

RUMSFELD: We have to do better. And we've not made much progress.

QUESTION: I have two questions for you.

The first: For purposes of this question, if terrorism is the greatest threat against America today, what, in your opinion, is the second and the third greatest threats?

And, also, what was your greatest day or most satisfying day while in office and, opposite, your worst?

(LAUGHTER)

RUMSFELD: You plan to go in the media?

(LAUGHTER)

She'd fit right in.

(LAUGHTER)

I would not agree with the premise of your question in this sense: I don't think terrorism is the greatest threat.

I think that terrorism is a weapon of choice for violent extremists. And violent extremism is, in my view, the threat.

It is that conviction that they want to destabilize moderate, mainstream Muslim regimes and establish a caliphate and have a handful of clerics determine what everyone in that country can do, and then spread that across the globe, from Indonesia to the Middle East, through North Africa and southern Europe. This is what they say on the Internet. You can read it. That's their goal.

That's the threat.

And it can be manifested in a variety of ways. At present time, we've used the phrase "global war against terror," which I find not perfect.

I think that it is really a long struggle, as opposed to a war, which implies armies, navies, air forces and marines contesting each other.

It is irregular. It's asymmetric. And it is not against terrorism, per se, it is against these violent extremists who use terrorism, but they also could use other things.

RUMSFELD: And a second thing that I worry about is the kinds of damage that can be done to a society through weapons of mass destruction, even through cyberattacks, can be -- but I mean, a biological attack is something that could be -- it could be used to terrorize.

Of course, the purpose of terrorism is to terrorize. It's not to kill people, it's to alter people's behavior. And you can do that using a variety of different techniques.

You know, clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened.

And I guess my best day, I don't know, maybe a week from Monday.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: Sir, first off, again, let me say thank you.

And then, second, looking back over your time as secretary of defense, and if you can't be convinced to write the book, if there was one anecdote you could share that would, sort of, capture your time in office, what would it be?

RUMSFELD: Wouldn't you think that's what would sell my book?

DOJ_NMG_0105269

(LAUGHTER)

My goodness gracious.

You know, the days are so full, and you feel so fortunate to be engaged in the challenges -- the enormously difficult challenges that our country faces, that I've been just really fortunate to feel each day that there was an opportunity to contribute, to serve and to learn, particularly from the folks here in this department who've invested much of their lives in these important subjects.

RUMSFELD: But I do; I think I'll save it for my book.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Good morning, Mr. Secretary. I guess I'm a little nervous.

(LAUGHTER)

I wanted to know, if you could walk away with one memory or one accomplishment during your second tour, what would that be and why?

RUMSFELD: Well, I suppose it'll sound strange and somewhat pedestrian, and I'd be interested in Pete's view, because there's practically nothing that I've done that I haven't -- unless you're a Mozart or an Einstein, who goes off in a room and does something brilliant and then comes out and reveals it, all the rest of us, at least this guy, anything we accomplish we do it with other people.

We do it through a process of talking and discussing and thinking and probing and trying and failing and trying and succeeding.

And this institution is so big and so complex that there isn't any way in the world anyone can lead it by command. It's led by persuasion, and it's led through a process of discussion and interaction.

And I think probably the thing that has been the most important, at least for me, not being an Einstein or a Mozart, is the fact that when I came in, we made a conscience decision that we would engage the military not at the end of a process, asking for their advice, but we would engage them at the beginning of the process.

And General Myers and General Shelton and General Pace have been involved in -- there is not a single important decision of any magnitude at all that the chairman and the Joint Staff and the combatant commanders, where appropriate, and the services, where appropriate, have not been involved. And they have not been involved, as I say, at the end; they've been involved at the beginning, and at every step along the way.

We created something called the Senior Level Review Group. It's call the SLRG.

(LAUGHTER)

Not very nice.

(LAUGHTER)

But it has the secretary and the deputy, the chairman and the vice, the undersecretaries and the service secretaries and the service chiefs.

We then expanded it and created a second group that included the combatant commanders for those things that were appropriate in that case.

There's almost nothing of any major importance that hasn't been thoroughly discussed, digested, masticated by the SLRG, and in many cases with the combatant commanders as well. They've chewed it, they've discussed it.

We've gotten them to the point where they talk about not just their own service, which was the case when I arrived -- you go down in the tank and the service secretary, they wouldn't want -- service chief -- they'd want to talk about their service. They did not want to talk about the department and the joint efforts that are required here.

Today they do. Today they participate fully in everybody else's business.

Why? Because there isn't anyone smart enough to figure these things out. We simply have to do it that way.

And I would say, if there's anything that's been accomplished here, it is a monumental effort to try to knit together the services, to knit together the organize, train and equip group with the combatant commanders and the senior civilians in a way that they developed ownership, investment, they have an investment in the decision, because they all know of certain knowledge that they were involved in it, they had a chance to affect it.

RUMSFELD: And, by golly, this department isn't worth anything if all the services are going off in every different direction, working their own little projects and harming the other services.

And I've been around when that's happened in this department, where it wasn't joint, where people were working their own agendas and, "We're going to the contractors and getting the contractors to do such and so," and "We're going up to Capitol Hill and trying to get Capitol Hill to sabotage what was decided in the department," because they didn't agree with them, they didn't like it, they didn't feel they had a stake in it, they didn't feel they had a voice in it.

DOJ_NMG_0105270

Well, by golly, (inaudible) there's no one at a senior level of this department who can say they haven't been involved in the decisions in this department, because they have.

And, as a result, we have had a period of a substantial degree of unity, where people are all pulling their oars in the same direction instead of popping around and going off in 18 directions and damaging themselves, damaging the department, damaging the men and women in uniform and damaging the country.

And that's not happened. And that's an enormous accomplishment.

Pete, you want to...

PACE: The only thing I would add to that, Mr. Secretary, is that the secretary and his team have spent an enormous amount of time in picking leaders, civilian and military, to be on this team, and with a special focus on 10, 15, 20 years from now, if you want to have a certain type of individual be a general or an admiral, how many of those kind of individuals do you have in your population right now?

So, if you want to have more women be admirals and generals, where's the population from which they're going to come? More minorities?

A lot of focus on, not only picking the right leaders for today, but for putting your seed corn where you need it to be able to grow and have available to the nation a diverse leadership population in the future.

STAFF: We have time for one last question, sir.

RUMSFELD: I'll decide if it's last.

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

It depends on how good it is.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Sir, (inaudible) on your book a bit. I think, for great Americans like yourself, sir, it is a duty, and you will cheat future generations if you don't provide...

(LAUGHTER)

(APPLAUSE)

... the experience, the background and the knowledge you've gained over the past years.

And to continue in that line a little bit, 10 other great Americans just recently wrote a book. I would like to know if you've read any excerpts from that or if you'd like to provide any of your impressions from that book, sir.

RUMSFELD: This is the commission...

QUESTION: Yes, sir.

RUMSFELD: ... the Iraq Study Group?

I know all those folks pretty well. And you have to be appreciative of the fact that they invested their time and thought and experiences in undertaking that project.

I have not read the entire book. I do think that it would be helpful if I, kind of, explained where the president is on all of this, because I know there's been a lot in the press and so forth.

The president asked General Pace to work with the chiefs and put forward some views that they feel would be appropriate.

He asked me and General Pace to work with the combatant commander, John Abizaid and General Casey and the folks in CENTCOM, to put forward some views.

He asked the Baker-Hamilton commission to offer their ideas.

He's been meeting with outside academics and people, so-called experts, from time to time, I think as recently as earlier this week.

RUMSFELD: He just had a session with Tony Blair.

We have offered up our department's views that have been well scrubbed.

And what he plans to do is to take into account all of those things, including the Baker report, and then probably make some decisions with respect to it during this period between now and the end of the year.

I look at the problem this way. And I'd rather say what I think about the situation.

There is an impatience in the United States and in the Congress, and there's nobody who sees people being killed and wounded and doesn't feel a sense of urgency about getting it right and doing the right thing and seeing that their loss of life is as minimal as it possibly can be.

The other thing we have to think about, though, is the dire consequences were we to fail there.

And it is not just an Iraq problem, it is a regional problem. There is a major divide between the Shia and the Sunni community and that part of the world, and the risks to instability are significant. And that what's taking place in Iraq is, in effect, a microcosm of what's taking place in that region.

This power struggle, partly religious, partly economic, certainly political, for power, but in a very real sense, not terribly military in its nature.

Violence is not military necessarily. I mean, it doesn't seem -- I mean, I don't describe someone strapping on a suicide vest and going in and blowing up 20, 30, 40 civilians in Baghdad as a military operation myself. But that's the kind of thing that's taking place.

I think that our country has to be able to, obviously, constantly recognize that the situation's not static; it's dynamic. The enemies have a brain, they watch what we do, they make adjustments. We have to keep changing our tactics, our techniques, our procedures.

We have invested at whale of a lot in the Afghan situation and in the Iraqi situation. And those countries have made considerable strides toward governing themselves. They are not there yet.

And to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there in that country, in that region, I believe would be a terrible mistake.

And we simply, as a society, have to recognize that it's not the -- the military people are doing everything that can be done from a military standpoint.

But they can't "win" this, quote, unquote, militarily.

RUMSFELD: It has to be won by the Iraqi people. It has to be run through a reconciliation process and through a political process. And it is those diplomatic and economic and political things that have to move forward in that country.

And our goal is to keep training and equipping and preparing the Iraqi security forces so that they can create an environment within which that can happen.

And it makes a big difference to us, to our safety here in this country.

And I think that while everyone feels it's not going fast enough, everyone feels it's not going well enough, everyone's looking for the kinds of things that might be done to improve that process -- political process, economic process, diplomatic process.

And there are some people who say, "Well, you should do this or that or the other thing." And I can tell you, I can't think of a thing that anyone's thought of that General Pace and General Abizaid and those folks have not been working on and analyzing and studying and adjusting to over time.

And we have every chance in the world of succeeding in both those countries, but only if we have the patience and only if we have the staying power.

There have been -- in every conflict in our country's history, there have been those who said, "Toss in the towel; it isn't working."

The Revolutionary War, by golly, George Washington almost got fired. He didn't win a battle that I can recall for a whale of a long time.

You think of the beginning of World War II and all the battles that were lost.

You think of the Cold War, when Euro-communism was in fashion and millions of people -- hundreds of thousands of people were demonstrating not against the Soviet Union, against the United States, saying we were the ones in the wrong.

But, by golly, something important isn't easy. And this isn't easy. And, by golly, it's important and we better do it right.

That is the last question. God bless you all.

(APPLAUSE)

END

.ETX

Dec 08, 2006 12:27 ET .EOF

Source: CQ Transcriptions

Â© 2006, Congressional Quarterly Inc., All Rights Reserved

Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (WP)

By William Branigin,

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, addressing Pentagon employees as he nears the end of his nearly six years in office, said today that the war in Iraq cannot be won "militarily," but he asserted that U.S. policy there can succeed "if we have the patience."

Speaking in a town hall-style meeting at the Pentagon, Rumsfeld warned that U.S. failure in Iraq would have "dire consequences" in that country and the broader Middle East, and he said pulling out U.S. troops "precipitously" would be "a terrible mistake."

In a farewell speech that became emotional at times, Rumsfeld, 74, listed a series of Defense Department accomplishments during his tenure, ranging from fighting "terrorists all across the globe" to aiding millions of victims of natural disasters. He said the Pentagon has established a new Northern Command and "an initial missile defense system," overseen the largest domestic base closure and realignment plan in U.S. history, implemented a transformation of U.S. forces away from a "static defensive" posture left over from the Cold War and moved the longstanding "division-based Army" toward a "more agile, vastly more capable combat brigade force."

Answering employees' questions after the speech, Rumsfeld said his worst day in office was when he learned in early 2004 of the prisoner abuse perpetrated by U.S. guards at the Abu Ghraib prison outside Baghdad. He said early last year that he had twice offered President Bush his resignation over the scandal but that Bush wanted him to stay on.

"You know, clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," Rumsfeld said today.

As for his best day in office, he said, "I don't know, maybe a week from Monday." He referred to the day -- Dec. 18 -- when his successor, Robert M. Gates, is scheduled to take office. Bush announced Rumsfeld's resignation on Nov. 8, a day after midterm elections gave control of Congress to Democrats. Gates, a former CIA director, was confirmed by the Senate yesterday as the new defense secretary.

Asked in the question-and-answer session about a bipartisan panel's report outlining a "new approach" in Iraq, Rumsfeld said Bush has also asked him and Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to work with military commanders and other top officers to "put forward some views that they feel would be appropriate." Among those involved have been Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East; Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq; other officers at the Central Command and the chiefs of the military services, Rumsfeld said.

Bush plans to take into account the Pentagon's report, as well as studies by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and other panels, "and then probably make some decisions with respect to it during this period between now and the end of the year," Rumsfeld said.

In his own view, he said, "There is an impatience in the United States and in the Congress, and there's nobody who sees people being killed and wounded and doesn't feel a sense of urgency about getting it right" and minimizing the loss of life.

"We have to keep changing our tactics, our techniques, our procedures," he said.

He added: "We have invested a whale of a lot in the Afghan situation and in the Iraqi situation, and those countries have made considerable strides towards governing themselves. They are not there yet, and to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there, in that country and in that region, I believe would be a terrible mistake."

Americans must recognize that "the military people are doing everything that can be done from a military standpoint. But they can't win this . . . 'militarily.' It has to be won by the Iraqi people. It has to be won through a reconciliation process and through a political process. . . ."

Although the process is "not going fast enough" or "well enough," Rumsfeld said, "we have every chance in the world of succeeding in both those countries, but only if we have the patience, and only if we have the staying power."

In Iraq and Afghanistan, he said, "The military can't lose. They can't lose a battle, let alone a war over there. But they also can't win, because it is not a conventional conflict. There isn't an army or a navy or an air force to go defeat. It takes political and economic activity. . . . And that takes patience. And we have to understand that as a society, as a people, and not be impatient."

Rumsfeld praised the Pentagon press corps as "an important part of the fabric of this institution," but he also took a few shots at the news media.

Among the Defense Department's accomplishments, he said, is that it "established a camp and stood guard in Guantanamo over some of the world's most dangerous terrorists, while suffering grossly uninformed and irresponsible charges in the media from almost every quarter."

He said later, "I remember being stunned by the news of the abuse at Abu Ghraib. And then watching so many determined people spend so many months trying to figure out exactly how in the world something like that could have happened, and how to make it right. And then seeing how the department eventually demonstrated to the world how our democracy deals openly and decisively with such egregious wrongdoing. And, yes, I remember the irresponsible comments by some who tried to sully the image of the courageous and dedicated men and women in uniform who keep the American people safe."

Rumsfeld said in response to a service member's question that he may write a book about his experiences at the Pentagon. "My wife's after me to do that," he said. "I suppose there is a chance. I've never written a book. I always thought I was too young to write a book. I can't use that anymore. . . . I'll have to think about it. But I've decided I'm not going to make any decisions about what I'll do next for a couple of months."

Asked how he wanted history to remember him, he said, "Better than the local press."

DOJ_NMG_0105273

The meeting with Pentagon employees reflected none of the criticism that has been directed at Rumsfeld during his term, notably over his handling of the war in Iraq. Critics have charged that he ignored advice to send in a force large enough to pacify the country and assure security once the regime of Saddam Hussein was toppled, and that he failed to plan adequately for the occupation period. The result was rampant looting of government buildings and arms depots, followed soon afterward by the start of an insurgency.

Earlier this year, several retired generals called for Rumsfeld's resignation, charging that he was incompetent and intolerant of opposing views. One leading critic, retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, who formerly commanded the Army's 1st Infantry Division in Iraq, described Rumsfeld as "arrogant" and "abusive" and said he disregarded 10 years of war planning on Iraq by the U.S. Central Command before the March 2003 invasion.

Rumsfeld promptly dismissed his critics as "two or three or four retired people" out of "thousands and thousands of admirals and generals." He said that "if every time two or three people disagreed we changed the secretary of defense of the United States, it would be like a merry-go-round."

Pace strongly defended Rumsfeld at today's farewell gathering. "There are 2.4 million American service men and women, active, Guard and Reserve," the Marine general said. "At any given moment, some one of them is doing something stupid." Yet, whenever something has gone wrong and Rumsfeld has been blamed, "not once has he done anything other than accept the responsibility," Pace said. "He has never tried to deflect that to any subordinate, even though it was a subordinate's responsibility."

Said Rumsfeld, "I wish I could say that everything we've done here has gone perfectly, but that's not how life works, regrettably. When thousands of people make dozens of difficult decisions on hundreds of pressing issues, for the most part matters that are new and unfamiliar, where there's no road map, no guidebook . . . the hope has to be not perfection but that most decisions, with the perspective of time, will turn out to be the right ones. . . ."

Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 -- Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld bade farewell to Pentagon employees today in his familiar style, fencing with his questioners and voicing deep faith in the American people.

“Every day, in one way or another, I’ve seen the strength of men and women in uniform, and the dedication of the many thousands who serve here, military and civilian, who do their jobs knowing that theirs is the essential business of protecting a nation and protecting a people,” Mr. Rumsfeld said at what was probably his last meeting with Defense Department employees.

“You do so knowing that you contribute directly to the safety of millions of Americans — people you’ll never meet, whose names you’ll never know,” Mr. Rumsfeld said. “I leave office very proud to have served with you, inspired by your dedication, by your patriotism, and by your sacrifice.”

Mr. Rumsfeld, who will be succeeded by Robert M. Gates on Dec. 18, has a unique place in Pentagon history. He is the only person to have been defense secretary twice, having held the post for a little over a year under President Gerald R. Ford. He was the youngest defense secretary then, and now, at 74, he is the oldest.

“It’s been three decades since I left the Pentagon at the end of my first tour,” Mr. Rumsfeld said. “Our country was then engaged in a long struggle — the Cold War, a conflict that seemed costly, and it was. It seemed unlimited in duration, and it was, and seemed unclear in its course and its outcome, which was the case. In fact, many then believed and indeed acted as though it was the United States that was the cause of the world’s troubles. We even see a little bit of that today.

“And yet despite the tumult of the times, I left this post in 1977 believing strongly that America was a force for good in the world, that the vast majority of the American people were wise and decent people, and that America would continue to be the principal leader in the free world. That has been proven right.”

As he prepares to leave office again, Mr. Rumsfeld said he believes as he did three decades ago “that America is a truly great nation, that the American people are wise and decent, that America’s leadership in the world is not just useful, but that it is urgently needed.

“And let there be no doubt, despite the fact that we have been successful in preventing attacks since Sept. 11, years without an attack in this country, ours is a troubled and very dangerous world, and we must not forget it.”

Famous for his marathon work days and his demanding style, Mr. Rumsfeld came to the Pentagon in 2001 determined to streamline the military bureaucracy, and he said today he thought he and his aides had succeeded, up to a point.

“There’s been a change in people’s approach, a recognition that in this 21st century, the way we did things in the 20th century isn’t good enough, and we’re simply going to have to be wiser and more agile and more skillful, and we’re going to have to be able to do different things,” Mr. Rumsfeld said.

DOJ_NMG_0105274

The questions from department employees at today's "town hall" session were gentle ones, in contrast to the news conferences at which Mr. Rumsfeld never bothered to hide his disdain for interrogators he considered ill-informed, cynical, or naïve. But even in today's friendly setting, Mr. Rumsfeld was in form. When asked what advice he had for Mr. Gates, he replied, "Any advice I give him, I'll give him in private."

Mr. Rumsfeld said he would miss his jousting with reporters. "I think I will," he said. "The stakeouts, the briefings. I'm told it was something like 613 over six years, all across the globe. Now, you know, we've not always seen eye to eye, I haven't, with the press, but I still hold out hope that over time, they'll get it close to right."

That line was one of several that drew laughter. But he closed on a serious note, offering his belief that the struggles in Iraq and Afghanistan will, in time, be worth it, and that the United States is on the right side of history in both theaters.

"God bless you all," he said, exiting to applause.

The Rumsfeld Show's Finale A Classic, By Golly (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — For much of the last six years, a question-and-answer session with Donald H. Rumsfeld was the best show in town. The combative Defense secretary's bristling self-assurance made the Pentagon Briefing Room one of the hottest seats in Washington.

The Bush administration's erstwhile rock star delivered his last major performance Friday, as feisty and quotable as when he began. At a Pentagon town hall, Rumsfeld delivered with style, gamely teasing questioners, popping off trademark "by gollys," and quoting Churchill, invoking George Washington and expounding on "eurocommunism" of the 1970s.

Although the Senate has confirmed Robert M. Gates — a decidedly more measured and reserved public speaker — to serve as the next secretary of Defense, he will not be sworn in for nine more days. For a little while yet, Rumsfeld remains in the building and in charge.

But he is not due to appear before Congress again, and his public affairs staff says there will be no goodbye news conferences. Rumsfeld said Friday's town hall, his 42nd such appearance answering questions from military personnel during his second Pentagon stint, would be one of his last public appearances.

In some respects his last town hall was a greatest-hits collection. Rumsfeld managed to riff on many of his favorite topics: the electricity supply in North Korea, the fashionableness of "eurocommunism," the near-sacking of George Washington, the media strategy of insurgents and the failure of the American press to chronicle the good news from Iraq.

As unrelated as those topics may seem, Rumsfeld routinely evokes them to defend the war in Iraq or his own leadership.

North Korea's lack of electric light, his favorite set piece, is his example of what happens to those who reject democracy. People who thought eurocommunism offered a good economic system during the Cold War, Rumsfeld suggests, were as misguided as opponents of Iraq policy.

Critics may question America's war leaders, but Rumsfeld wants people to remember they also questioned the father of the country at the beginning of the revolution. And when the news media report on insurgent attacks against civilians, it is — in the Pentagon's view — helping the enemy try to weaken the will of the American people.

The public's doubts about Iraq and the need for America to maintain its support for the war have been a regular theme of Rumsfeld's public appearances for much of this year. And Friday, he used the stage to plead for more time in Iraq. He said there was "an impatience in the United States and Congress." But, he said, the larger fight against violent extremism, in Iraq and elsewhere, was going to take patience and perspective.

"We have invested a whale of a lot in the Afghan situation and the Iraqi situation," he said. "And to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there, in that country and that region, I believe would be a terrible mistake."

By his own count, Rumsfeld has held 613 news conferences. And although on Friday he criticized coverage of Iraq, as usual, he also singled out the Pentagon reporters for praise.

"As hard as it may be to believe," Rumsfeld said Friday, "I even miss our press conferences."

Actually, it's not hard to believe at all. From the start, Rumsfeld seemed to relish his time in front of reporters. The news conferences during the beginning of the Afghanistan war, where Rumsfeld jumped all over any perceived skepticism in a question, made him a household name.

But as the Iraq conflict evolved from a decisive march to Baghdad into a grinding civil war, more of the public began to view Rumsfeld's act as stale. To them, the unchecked confidence seemed ill-suited for an honest discussion of what was happening in Iraq — less a sign of strength than a signal that he did not want to listen to critics.

DOJ_NMG_0105275

By the end, his piques at the press were often viewed as attacks on all war skeptics. On Oct. 26, his last formal Pentagon news briefing, Rumsfeld told a reporter asking about benchmarks for the Iraq government "to just back off, take a look at it, relax, understand that it's complicated, it's difficult."

A comment he made at one of the military town halls may have been the beginning of his decline in the public's eye. On Dec. 8, 2004, while addressing a group of soldiers in Kuwait preparing to deploy into Iraq, he was asked about the Pentagon's failure to provide armored vehicles. Rumsfeld said armor was being manufactured as quickly as possible. Then he added, "As you know, you go to war with the Army you have. They're not the Army you might want or wish to have at a later time."

It was a typical Rumsfeld construction: sharp, insightful and perhaps a touch callous.

For his part, Rumsfeld was not fessing up to many mistakes on Friday. He did say the abuses by American soldiers at Abu Ghraib had led to his worst day on the job. He avoided directly commenting on the Iraq Study Group and its dire assessment of the situation in Iraq, using one of his favorite tactics of claiming he had not read "the entire book."

As is his usual practice, Rumsfeld dodged an explicit question about how history would judge him. But he did, in his opening remarks, express hope that "the perspective of history" would view his choices of the last six years favorably.

"I wish I could say that everything we've done here has gone perfectly, but that is not how life works, regrettably," he said. "The hope has to be not perfection, but that most decisions, with the perspective of time, will turn out to be the right ones."

Rumsfeld Bids Farewell To Pentagon (AP)

By Robert Burns,

AP, December 9, 2006

In an emotional farewell at the Pentagon, Donald H. Rumsfeld said Friday the worst day of his nearly six years as secretary of defense occurred when he learned of the Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse.

Speaking to a gathering of employees 10 days before he is to leave office, Rumsfeld defended his record on Iraq and Afghanistan and warned of "dire consequences were we to fail" in the war.

He also said he might write a book about his tenure at the Pentagon, and he predicted that his successor, Robert Gates, would do a good job. He declined to say what advice he had offered Gates, who was confirmed by the Senate this week.

Rumsfeld choked up briefly while recalling a woman in Alaska giving him a bracelet last August as a reminder of the sacrifices by soldiers of the Army's 172nd Stryker Brigade, whose year-long tour in Iraq was extended by four months to help try to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad. Showing it on his wrist, Rumsfeld recalled that he told the woman he would wear the green bracelet until the 172nd came home.

In a question-and-answer session billed as a "town hall meeting," he was asked what were his best day and his worst day.

"Clearly, the worst day was Abu Ghraib, seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," he said without hesitation. The scandal in the spring of 2004 involving an Iraq prison triggered worldwide condemnation and prompted Rumsfeld to twice offer his resignation to President Bush. Bush rejected those offers.

"I guess my best day, I don't know, may be a week from Monday," he said with a grin, referring to the day Gates takes over.

Asked how he wants history to remember him, he said simply, "Better than the local press."

He spoke at length about his hopes that the United States not let Iraq and Afghanistan collapse.

"We have every chance in the world of succeeding in both those countries, but only if we have the patience and only if we have the staying power," he said. Asked about the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's recommendations for a change in approach to the Iraq war, Rumsfeld said none of the suggestions were new.

He said the Pentagon had sent its advice to the White House on possible new approaches in Iraq.

With troops from each military service and a few civilian Pentagon employees seated behind him on stage in the Pentagon's main auditorium, Rumsfeld spoke to an audience of several hundred people. With a big smile, he strode into the room to a cascade of applause and a few approving yelps.

"I suspect this will be among my last public remarks as secretary of defense," he said. His last full day will be Dec. 17.

It was one of the few public appearances he has made since Bush announced on Nov. 8 at the White House that he was replacing Rumsfeld with Gates to get a "fresh perspective" on the Iraq war. Rumsfeld applauded the work and dedication of Pentagon employees and said he was proud to have been associated with them.

"Each of you and future generations of Americans, as well as future generations of Iraqis and Afghans, will be able to look on these past years as a time of enormous challenge and historic consequence," he said.

He was introduced by Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who lauded Rumsfeld as a man of courage, integrity and vision.

DOJ_NMG_0105276

"This man's work ethic is incredible," Pace said. "Is he demanding? You bet." Rumsfeld then interrupted, saying with a laugh, "No! I've been on my best behavior."

Rumsfeld, 74, is one of the longest-serving defense secretaries in U.S. history and is the only person to have held the position twice. His first stint was from November 1975 to January 1977, when he held the distinction of being the youngest defense secretary in history.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., who will become chairman of the House Armed Services Committee when Congress returns in January, said Friday that the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan will define Rumsfeld's legacy.

"The early efforts in Afghanistan were very successful, and he should be given credit for that," Skelton said in an interview taped for C-SPAN's "Newsmakers" program. "He should also be remembered as one who attempted to transform or modernize the military. Of course, it's pretty hard to do that in the middle of two wars. But he did begin that effort."

Rumsfeld Warns Against Precipitous US Withdrawal From Iraq (AFP)

By Jim Mannion

AFP, December 9, 2006

US Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld warned that a precipitous US withdrawal from Iraq would be a "terrible mistake" which would threaten the stability not only of Iraq but the region.

Rumsfeld, in a farewell "town hall" meeting with Pentagon employees, urged Americans to show patience with the war in Iraq, saying there would be "dire consequences were we to fail here."

Iraq and Afghanistan have made considerable strides, he said, but "those countries are not there yet."

"To pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there in that country, and in that region, I think would be a terrible mistake," he said.

His comments come in the midst of an intense debate over a new course in Iraq and recommendations by a bipartisan panel that the onus of security and political reconciliation be shifted to Iraqis.

The panel headed by former secretary of state James Baker and former representative Lee Hamilton said most US combat forces could be withdrawn from Iraq by early 2008 while shifting the US military's mission to one of training and advising Iraqis.

Rumsfeld was asked about the report but did not specifically address its recommendations.

Instead he emphasized the stakes involved for a region with a Sunni-Shia divide that mirrors the sides to the sectarian conflict in Iraq.

"And the risks to its stability are significant," he said.

Iraq, he said, "is in fact a microcosm of what is taking place in that region: power struggle -- partly religious, partly economic, certainly political, ... but in a very real sense not terribly military in its nature."

He said the US military was doing all it could, but the conflict in Iraq could only be "won" by Iraqis through political reconciliation.

Rumsfeld, who resigned last month after a Republic defeat in mid-term elections, also expressed concern about "impatience in the United States and in the Congress."

"We have every chance of the world of succeeding in both of those countries, but only if we have the patience, only if we have the staying power," he said.

Rumsfeld's appearance was his last at an assembly of Pentagon employees before turning over the Defense Department to Robert Gates, the former CIA chief who replaces him December 18.

An overflow crowd of several hundred people packed a Pentagon auditorium and gave him a standing ovation as he entered the room with General Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Peppered with friendly questions about his six year tenure, Rumsfeld defended his accomplishments, said he was thinking of writing a book, and hoped history would remember him "better than the local press."

"You know, clearly the worst day was Abu Ghraib and seeing what went on there and feeling so deeply sorry that that happened," he said.

Photographs of US soldiers abusing and sexually humiliating Iraqi prisoners touched off a devastating scandal that blackened the US image in the world and nearly cost Rumsfeld his job in 2004. He is still the target of lawsuits in the case accusing him of war crimes.

Asked his best day in office, Rumsfeld said, "I don't know, maybe a week from Monday" when he leaves office.

A Still-Serving Rumsfeld Is Set For Mustering Out (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105277

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — As Donald H. Rumsfeld might say, you change strategy in Iraq with the defense secretary you have, not the one you might like.

It was a month ago that Mr. Rumsfeld announced his resignation, cast out by the White House to signal a course correction in Iraq. His successor, Robert M. Gates, has already been overwhelmingly confirmed by the Senate.

Yet when President Bush comes to the Pentagon on Wednesday, Mr. Rumsfeld will preside in the secure conference room known as "the Tank" when he and the Joint Chiefs brief Mr. Bush on the department's recommendations for a new way forward.

Mr. Gates is not scheduled to be sworn in until Dec. 18, though he has a temporary office on the Pentagon's third floor, and administration officials said that he will be involved in meetings and consult on the strategy shift.

How much influence Mr. Rumsfeld is exerting in the interim is somewhat unclear. Two of his top aides, Peter W. Rodman and Stephen A. Cambone, have already announced their resignations. He has told other senior officials at the department that they should hold off any major decisions to give Mr. Gates a chance to review them after he takes office.

Aides say that Mr. Rumsfeld has remained on the job not from any desire to cling to power, but because President Bush specifically asked him to stay until his successor was in place. He has spoken with Mr. Gates twice, he said Friday.

It is the second time in his career that Mr. Rumsfeld, who also served as defense secretary during the Ford administration, has stepped down from the job, and he leaves 11 days shy of breaking Robert S. McNamara's record as the longest serving defense secretary.

Taking questions Friday at an hourlong farewell to Pentagon employees, Mr. Rumsfeld became emotional and wiped his nose as he reviewed his tenure and accomplishments.

"I wish I could say that everything we have done here had gone perfectly, but that's not how life works, regrettably," he said.

In private, too, Mr. Rumsfeld has also seemed at times wistful about giving up the vast resources of his office. Shortly after announcing his resignation, the 73-year-old Mr. Rumsfeld, who dictated his memos into a recorder to be transcribed and disdained e-mail correspondence, told his aides: "I guess I'm going to have to get a computer."

He was not surprised by President Bush's decision to replace him the day after the midterm elections, several current and former aides said. He and Mr. Bush had talked several times about whether Mr. Rumsfeld could still operate effectively, especially if the Democrats took control of both the House and Senate, they said.

But the way the White House handled the departure remains a source of bitterness to some in Mr. Rumsfeld's inner circle. The choice of Mr. Gates after Mr. Bush had said in the week before Election Day that he wanted Mr. Rumsfeld to stay until the end of his term made it seem as if the change had been made abruptly, one Rumsfeld adviser said.

And it led some Republicans, bitter over their losses in the election, to wonder why Mr. Bush had not replaced him before the election when it might have helped their fortunes, the Rumsfeld adviser said.

"The way it was handled turned out to be unsatisfactory to all, except the Democrats," the adviser said.

As the disclosure this month of a memo Mr. Rumsfeld wrote outlining options for switching course in Iraq makes clear, the secretary has his own ideas about what should be done in Iraq.

Lawrence Di Rita, who served as a top Pentagon aide until resigning last year, said that the memo, which listed 21 options — many of them calling for reducing the American presence in Iraq — revealed Mr. Rumsfeld's willingness to offer up completely different ways of thinking. "Nothing was sacred to him," Mr. Di Rita said.

But when he met on Friday with employees at the Pentagon, Mr. Rumsfeld counseled patience in Iraq, warning that "to pull out precipitously and inject that instability into the situation there" would be "a terrible mistake."

The session also featured moments of vintage Rumsfeld, when he was not the battered figure who has become a symbol of a strategy gone wrong in Iraq, but the jaunty defense secretary whose verbal sparring once made his news conferences Washington's most entertaining show.

When a young military aide interrupted the proceedings to say there was time for one more question, Mr. Rumsfeld was having none of it. "I'll decide if it's the last question," he said.

In his final days, Mr. Rumsfeld still appears engaged, department officials say. He is still issuing "snowflakes," the memos that waft down to the bureaucracy from Mr. Rumsfeld himself and that are used to ask questions, stimulate debate and shape policy.

Nor has Mr. Rumsfeld given up on some of his favorite projects. Last week, his aides were still hoping to win White House approval to create a new regional command covering Africa, which is now under the purview of the United States European Command, based in Stuttgart, Germany.

Mr. Rumsfeld is still convening morning "roundtables," when a rotating cast of officials is called to his conference room to hash out issues. In the last week, he told a senior military officer that he was not satisfied with a briefing and told the officer to come back in January for another try.

DOJ_NMG_0105278

Left unstated was that Mr. Rumsfeld would not be around to hear it.

His sometimes brusque treatment of high-ranking military officers accounts for the private glee with which some Pentagon officers view his departure.

Even the Iraq Study Group, the independent panel that issued recommendations for changing strategy in Iraq this week, felt compelled to call on Mr. Gates to create "an environment in which the senior military feel free to offer independent advice."

In a more jocular way, Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, seemed to say much the same thing while standing next to Mr. Rumsfeld at the Pentagon forum on Friday.

When a questioner asked what advice Mr. Rumsfeld would have for his successor, General Pace immediately jumped in with his own answer. "Listen to the chairman," he said.

House Winds Down Session By Approving Tax-Cut And Trade Bills (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Major tax and trade bills neared final passage as Republicans began turning out the lights on the 109th Congress and 12 years of their party's dominance in the Capitol.

Working past midnight, departing lawmakers sent President Bush a third, stopgap spending bill required to keep the government operating through Feb. 15. And spurred by the Hewlett-Packard Co. scandal, the Senate called up and quickly approved a House-passed bill that would make it a federal crime to obtain someone's telephone records without his or her approval.

"Stealing someone's private phone records is a criminal act that can now be prosecuted," said Sen. Charles Schumer (D., N.Y.) one of the leading proponents. "Phone information and call logs should be protected with the same safeguards as financial data or medical records." (See related story1.)

The $45.1 billion tax cut measure, which includes provisions benefiting oil, coal and health-care interests, passed the House 367-45 late Friday after Democrats narrowly failed 207-205 in a last attempt to disrupt passage with an amendment to the oil provisions.

The intricate trade package, which most impacts Vietnam, Haiti and developing nations in Africa and South America, cleared the House hours later 212-184 with prominent Democrats joining in support.

The Senate next took up both measures as a single package, and eager to go home, senators agreed to expedite debate in hopes of sending the tax and trade provisions Mr. Bush for his signature.

"God should be so good to the people of Haiti that their exports could be a threat to the United States of America. That's not going to happen," said Rep. Charles Rangel (D., N.Y.), the incoming chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. And even among Southern Republicans allied with the textile industry, resistance appeared to be crumbling in the Senate.

The tax package itself renews scores of popular, non-controversial expired tax breaks, most notably a deduction for college tuition, a deduction for state and local sales taxes in states without income taxes, and the corporate tax credit for research. But fiscal conservatives complained bitterly of costly add-ons and the backroom horse-trading in which some departing leaders won concessions for their home-state interests. And the stopgap spending bill -- covering more than $463 billion in annual appropriation -- dramatizes a major collapse in the budget process for the current fiscal year.

"It is a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times," said Rep. David Obey (D., Wis.), the incoming chairman of the House Appropriations Committee. And the current chairman, Rep. Jerry Lewis (R., Cal.) was equally scathing in his personal criticism of Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) for contributing to the failure.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), the departing chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, took the floor and warned his party it was ignoring the lesson of Republican losses in the midterm elections last month.

"The American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Congress," Mr. Gregg said, in large part because "they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal responsibility."

"It would appear that their concerns are justified…You just have to ask yourself how we as a party got to this point, where we have a leadership that is going to ram down the throats of our party the biggest budget buster in the history of Congress under Republican leadership…The American people figured it out and I'm sorry we haven't figured it out yet."

Together with the tax-cut extensions, the $45.1 billion package opens millions of acres in the Gulf of Mexico to offshore oil and gas exploration, and includes a provision to prevent a 5% cut in payment rates to physicians under Medicare, the federal health-care program for the elderly and disabled.

Over Mr. Gregg's objections, coal-state senators won a $4.9 billion provision to lift federal spending for retired miners' health benefits and abandoned mine reclamation. At the same time, New York was a big loser when tax credits to help financing for a proposed rail connection between lower Manhattan and John F. Kennedy International Airport were killed, together with a $477 million tax break for the timber industry, important to companies like Weyerhaeuser Co.

DOJ_NMG_0105279

New tax language was added to promote the use of health savings accounts, a priority for the departing Republican leadership seeking to give individuals more control over their health care.

And both Mr. Frist, who is retiring at the end of this Congress, and Speaker Dennis Hastert (R., Ill.), who will be giving up his speakership, used their position to win concessions for home-state interests in federal health programs.

Tennessee, for example, will benefit from an estimated $30 million payment under Medicaid to help support hospitals in the state that handle a large number of low-income patients. And Mr. Hastert added language expanding the enrollment period for private health plans, providing coverage within Medicare.

Chicago-based Aon Corp., which provides private fee-for-service coverage through its subsidiary Sterling Life Insurance Co., pushed for the change that would allow qualified plans to enroll beneficiaries all year if they aren't participating in the prescription drug benefit.

Mr. Hastert's office said the language mirrors past enrollment provisions that expired last summer and Aon declined to comment. But critics argued that the landscape has changed with the advent of the prescription drug benefit, and to create different enrollment rules for plans, based on whether they participate or not, introduces inequities.

Before adopting the stopgap spending bill, Republicans made two modifications in a concession to critics. Lawmakers agreed to dock their own pay by delaying a planned cost-of-living increase -- due to take effect with the new year -- until Feb. 16, after the stopgap bill expires. And they gave the Veterans Administration expanded authority to move almost $684 million from other accounts in its budget to avoid a threatened shortfall in medical-care funds.

Opposition to the trade provisions has focused chiefly on those benefiting Haiti by allowing companies on the island to use fabric from third countries, such as China, in duty-free apparel destined for the American market.

A key force is Sen. Elizabeth Dole, the North Carolina Republican. Antitrade sentiments ran especially strong in her state in the 2006 congressional election, contributing to the defeat of one House Republican, Rep. Charles Taylor, and nearly knocking off another, Rep. Robin Hayes.

Republicans Push Tax Bill Through House (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rejected by voters and limping off stage, the Republican-led House on Friday passed a sweeping bill reviving expired tax breaks and protecting doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments.

But they dumped an unfinished budget on the Democrats about to take power, passing by a 320-70 vote a stopgap spending bill putting the government on autopilot until Feb. 15. The Senate planned a pre-midnight vote to avoid a government shutdown.

The failure to pass budget bills for domestic agencies, said Rep. David Obey, D-Wis., amounted to "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

Working into the night, the House also passed a package of trade bills and debated a measure to keep the government running into next February. Under a complicated procedural pirouette, the tax and trade legislation — along with a plan to open 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling — was to be bundled together and sent to the Senate, where a handful of Republicans threatened delay.

A weekend Senate session loomed as Republican budget hawks bridled at the measure's cost and textile state senators objected to trade provisions benefiting Haiti. The House passed the trade bill by a 212-184 vote.

The 367-45 vote on the tax bill reflected widespread bipartisan support for extending expired tax breaks, including the research and development tax credit for businesses, sales tax deductions for people in states without income taxes, the tax deduction on college tuition, a tax credit for hiring welfare recipients and others facing difficulties finding jobs and tax credits for alternative energy producers and purchases of solar energy equipment by homeowners and businesses.

All told, the tax cuts would cost $38 billion over five years.

Also driving the massive bill forward was an effort to prevent a 5% cut in Medicare payments to doctors scheduled to take effect Jan. 1 under a complicated government funding formula. But the GOP-crafted solution to the problem was criticized as an accounting gimmick since it would double the cost of fixing the problem again next year.

Lawmakers faced a midnight deadline to send President Bush a bill to keep domestic federal agencies from shutting down. With work unfinished of nine of 11 spending bills, a stopgap funding bill would put 13 Cabinet departments on autopilot through Feb. 15 frozen at or slightly below current levels.

Democrats face difficult choices and weeks of work on the leftover budget mess, which totals $463 billion and must be passed at Bush's strict budget limits.

DOJ_NMG_0105280

"They are leaving us with a tremendous mess," Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., told reporters. "We have alternatives, none of which are very good."

Democrats made good on a promise to block an automatic congressional pay raise until the minimum wage is increased. Under pressure from future House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Reid, GOP leaders added language to the stopgap funding bill language stopping the pay raise slated for Jan. 1 until Feb. 16.

Now, if the pay raise goes into effect Feb. 16, members would lose some $320 of their anticipated $2,800 annual increase. That raise would be $3,300 if Congress acts to boost the cost-of-living allowances for all federal employees in 2007. Currently, rank-and-file members get $165,200.

The House also approved, 330-59, an agreement to allow U.S. shipments of civilian nuclear fuel to India, an administration priority that is opposed by some because India, which has nuclear weapons, has not submitted to full international inspections.

The House approved by a voice vote a bill to keep open a special investigative office that has unearthed millions of dollars in waste and fraud in the rebuilding of Iraq. The office, which was set to end operations by October 2007, would stay open for an extra year under the bill, passed earlier by the Senate.

As is often the case at the end of the session, congressional leaders tried to lump popular items — extending the expired or expiring tax breaks — with other more contentious measures. Conservatives griped that the popular bills attracted costly add-ons benefiting retiring Republicans such as Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee, who obtained $30 million in concessions for hospitals in his state that treat large numbers of low-income patients.

The trade portion establishes permanent normal trade relations with Vietnam, which is generally supported, with the extension of trade benefits for sub-Saharan Africa, Haiti and Andean nations. The Haiti provisions in particular raised red flags with lawmakers trying to protect home state textile industries.

Eight GOP senators from North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Kentucky on Thursday wrote congressional leaders saying 100,000 textile jobs in their region had already been lost due to trade agreements and they would oppose "as forcefully as possible" the Haiti measure.

Then there was Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg, R-N.H., who gave an extraordinary floor speech lambasting his party for losing its way on fiscal discipline and his leadership for jamming it past rank-and-file Republicans opposing the massive measure.

Gregg particularly objected to a provision tucked into the tax bill to expand federal funding for the health benefits of retired coal miners at a cost of some $5 billion over 10 years.

"You just have to ask yourself how we, as a party, got to this point, where we have a leadership which is going to ram down the throats of our party the biggest budget buster in the history of the Congress under Republican leadership," Gregg said.

Congress Close To Approving Tax Package (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The House voted overwhelmingly to expand offshore oil drilling and preserve a variety of popular tax breaks for families and businesses, and the Senate was poised early this morning to approve the package after lawmakers angry about trade provisions and the bill's $50 billion cost agreed to let the measure move forward.

Eight senators from textile-manufacturing states had sent a letter to Senate leaders yesterday threatening to block the bill unless they removed a proposal to lift tariffs on clothing manufactured in Haiti. And Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H) delivered a blistering condemnation of the decision by Republican leaders to push the unwieldy collection of tax, trade, health and energy measures through Congress as a single package at the last minute, with few opportunities for debate or objection.

In a speech on the Senate floor, Gregg blasted the package as "arguably the largest budget-buster ever brought forward by the Republican Congress."

But the objecting senators could only delay the bill; they did not have the votes to kill it. As midnight approached and the futility of their efforts became clear, they signaled their intention to give up and let their colleagues go home.

In both chambers, lawmakers rushed to finish critical business before calling the 109th Congress to a close. Among the most important pieces of legislation: a resolution that will keep the government running through Feb. 15, which won final approval just before midnight. Because the Republican Congress failed to pass nine of 11 spending bills needed to fund government operations, the unfinished budget will be dumped onto incoming Democratic leaders, who take control when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

At the request of incoming House speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the resolution contains a provision to end the long-standing tradition of granting lawmakers automatic pay raises.

DOJ_NMG_0105281

Throughout the day yesterday, negotiations over the tax-and-trade package consumed lawmakers, particularly in the Senate. With the trade measures under assault, House leaders delayed a vote on that portion of the package and focused first on the more popular tax provisions. By 367 to 45, the House voted to extend for two years nearly two dozen tax breaks, most of which expired in December 2005. They include a credit for research and development critical to many businesses, a reward for employers that hire former welfare recipients and a deduction for state and local sales taxes paid by people in states without income taxes.

If Congress had left town without extending the breaks, more than 19 million taxpayers would have faced higher taxes when they filed in April, said Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

The package also would repeal a $5,450 limit on contributions to health savings accounts, allowing taxpayers to shelter an unlimited amount of money as long as they choose certain insurance plans with high deductibles. It would stave off a scheduled 5.1 percent cut in payments to doctors who treat Medicare payments, and it would open 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration.

The House approved the trade portion of the package by 212 to 184. That measure would grant permanent normal trading status to Vietnam and extend trade relations with some African and Andean countries, as well as some other developing nations. The measure also would allow some types of clothing made in Haiti to be imported duty-free. Supporters call the proposal a form of aid to one of the world's poorest countries, while opponents say it would destroy U.S. textile jobs by opening a tax-free door to Haitian goods manufactured with yarn and fabric from China.

Debate in the House was peppered with references to the imminent power shift in Congress. At one point, House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Calif.) complained that Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) had not delivered a copy of a Democratic amendment on oil leases.

"You may not have received the amendment, but you received our best wishes on your birthday," Rangel said.

"That was two days ago. What have you done for me lately?" Thomas replied.

Rangel grinned. "We're saying goodbye."

Once through the House, the package was sent to the Senate, where an alarm briefly went up when Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) discovered that negotiators had failed to make good on a promise to include a provision that would save hundreds of Alaskan timber jobs. A separate bill was quickly drafted, approved by the Senate and shipped to the House.

Gregg made one last stand against the tax package, arguing that it does "grievous harm to the deficit." But he acknowledged that he did not have enough support to block the measure. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn) said the package was headed for a vote to halt debate and "ultimately, passage."

House And Senate Pass Tax And Trade Bill (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Nearing the end of an era of Republican rule, Congress early today sent to President Bush energy, tax and trade legislation as it prepared to hand over the reins of power to Democrats.

In a final burst of activity, lawmakers approved $38 billion in tax breaks and a Vietnam trade measure and voted to open a large section of the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling.

The House approved the measures Thursday night, and the Senate followed suit after midnight as the lame-duck session wound down.

But the GOP leadership was almost denied its last legislative victories, not by Democrats but by Republicans.

Some Senate Republicans objected to costly provisions of the tax bill, from a tax break for songwriters to funding for health benefits for former coal miners, saying they showed the party had yet to learn the lessons of the election that ousted it from power.

"The American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Party … because they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal discipline," Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) protested.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) warned colleagues that if they left town without renewing expired or expiring tax breaks, millions of taxpayers would face tax increases.

"I never thought I'd hear a Republican advocating that we ought to have a tax increase," said Grassley, who is chairman of the tax-writing Senate Finance Committee.

The final hours of the lame-duck session were overshadowed by the release of an investigative report on the congressional page scandal — perhaps fitting, given that the 109th Congress may well be remembered for its political scandals.

The day was marked by partisan bickering. Democrats complained that Republicans were rushing through big and complex bills without giving lawmakers time to read them.

DOJ_NMG_0105282

Later, however, the retiring speaker, J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), received a hug on the House floor from the incoming speaker, Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco).

In a speech on the House floor, Hastert looked back on the GOP legacy and wished his Democratic successor well. Pelosi saluted the longest-serving Republican speaker and then joked "long may that record stand."

The tax bill that passed the House, 367-45, included a provision that would open to exploration about 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico, an area thought to contain more than 1.2 billion barrels of oil and 5.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas.

Rep. Lois Capps (D-Santa Barbara), who opposed the drilling provision, warned that it would "bring the 25-year-old bipartisan moratorium against new drilling off America's coasts one step closer to an end."

But Rep. K. Michael Conaway (R-Texas), who supported the provision, argued that it would lead to "greater economic and national security."

The bill includes renewal of a number of popular tax breaks, including the research-and-development credit important to California's high-tech industry.

Lawmakers worked several healthcare measures into the tax bill, including legislation to cancel a scheduled 5% cut in payments to doctors who treat elderly Medicare recipients, and changes that would allow individuals to put more money into tax-sheltered health savings accounts, a new type of medical insurance favored by many Republicans.

Separately, the tax bill also addressed some unintended consequences of legislation that Congress passed last year to keep illegal immigrants from getting healthcare benefits through the Medicaid program for the poor. Hundreds of thousands of people who were legally entitled to benefits were inadvertently subjected to new requirements that they provide documents proving their citizenship. Some were frail seniors who had never been issued a birth certificate.

The changes will exempt several groups from the documentation rule, including federally assisted foster children, certain disabled people waiting for the starting date of their Medicare coverage and individuals receiving low-income Social Security assistance.

Rolling back the scheduled cut in doctors' fees had widespread bipartisan support. The cut had been called for under a budget formula that Congress had waived in past years. With time running out on the 109th Congress, the American Medical Assn. mounted an all-out lobbying campaign to head off the cuts.

Lawmakers instead agreed to freeze payments at this year's levels, while providing a modest increase for doctors who agree to participate in a new Medicare effort to improve the quality of clinical care.

However, Democrats bitterly criticized the provisions that would expand health-savings accounts. Many individuals use the tax-sheltered accounts to pay for routine bills while carrying low-cost "catastrophic" insurance for major medical problems.

Under the legislation, individuals would be able to contribute more money to the accounts, known as HSAs, and roll over limited amounts from Individual Retirement Accounts and other sources.

Some Democrats say the accounts provide a way for upper-income individuals to shelter more of their wealth from taxes and could undermine traditional insurance.

The trade bill, which included a Bush-backed provision establishing normal trade relations with Vietnam, passed the House, 212-184.

But the bill drew objections from Republican senators from Southern textile states because of a provision that would allow Haiti to export more apparel to the U.S.

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-San Jose) opposed the bill, saying it "does not do anything" to improve human rights conditions in Vietnam.

But Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (R-Bakersfield), who helped draft the bill, said it represented a "significant milestone in our efforts to mend the wounds of one of the most divisive conflicts in our nation's history."

The tax and trade bills were combined into a single package after they left the House and won Senate approval on a vote of 79 to 9.

In a sign of the Democrats' new clout, the House and Senate voted to put off until at least Feb. 16 a congressional pay raise scheduled to take effect Jan. 1. Currently, rank-and-file lawmakers receive $165,200 a year.

Pelosi had said that lawmakers should not receive a pay raise until Congress votes to raise the federal minimum wage, set at $5.15 an hour since 1997.

The provision was contained in a stopgap measure funding the government through Feb. 15. That measure is necessary because Congress has yet to enact most of the spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1.

A number of Republicans described the mood among their members as somber.

Complaining about the raft of unfinished business, Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.) said, "We're quietly going out of town on a bunt rather than a grand slam."

But Democrats were just as eager for the session to wrap up.

DOJ_NMG_0105283

"Enough of this Congress," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Los Angeles). "I've had it."

As 109th Congress Expires, Jockeying Starts For 110th (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 9 — The 109th Congress stumbled toward an angry close early Saturday as the Republican majority used its last hours of power to try to enact broad tax and trade legislation while Democrats accused Republicans of saddling them with a fiscal mess to clean up when they take control next month.

With minutes to spare before a midnight deadline on Friday, Congress approved a stop-gap measure to keep money flowing to federal agencies at current or reduced levels through Feb. 15, because this Congress has not passed regular annual spending bills.

The failure to dispose of the most basic Congressional work sparked recriminations over who was to blame as leaders of the House Appropriations Committee lashed out at the Senate. Representative David R. Obey of Wisconsin, the senior Democrat on the spending panel, called the temporary financing "a blatant admission of abject failure by the most useless Congress in modern times."

As a result of the spending impasse, Democrats will be forced to deal with the leftover money issues as soon as the new Congress convenes in January.

"It is not just that they turned out the lights — they took the light bulb," said Senator Patty Murray of Washington, who will join the Democratic leadership in the next Congress.

Even as the 109th Congress was expiring, the parties were maneuvering for the 110th. During the midterm election campaign, Democrats pounded Republicans for taking pay increases while not increasing the federal minimum wage, and they had planned to take action Friday to block the next Congressional raise. But Republicans added to the stop-gap measure a provision to block any Congressional raise until Feb. 15.

Throughout the day, House and Senate leaders put most of their energy behind legislation to normalize trade with Vietnam, grant trade benefits to Haiti and Andean countries, restore about $38 billion in popular tax breaks, block a cut in Medicare payments to doctors and open a stretch of the eastern Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas exploration.

While the House approved the tax and trade legislation, Senate opposition threatened speedy acceptance. A few critics raised objections to the Vietnam trade proposal, the prospect of cheaper textile imports from Haiti and the overall costs. The leadership was trying to ease those complaints and send lawmakers home.

Senator Judd Gregg, Republican of New Hampshire and the chairman of the Budget Committee, said the trade and tax measures represented the sort of fiscal management that caused voters to turn out Republicans in the House and the Senate in last month's elections.

"They did so, I think in large part, because they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal responsibility," Mr. Gregg said, citing the inclusion of such special-interest provisions as more than $4 billion to clean up abandoned coal mines. "It would appear that their concerns are justified."

Some frustrated lawmakers said the chaotic ending of the session was fitting, with major legislation assembled behind closed doors by senior lawmakers and then rushed to the floor. That was typical, they said, of how business had been done in a highly partisan atmosphere. "This is another example of how not to legislate," said Representative Sander M. Levin, Democrat of Michigan.

The incoming Senate Democratic and Republican leaders said Friday that they would try to set a new tone, beginning the new session on Jan. 4 with a joint closed caucus to explore ways to work together.

"Senate Republicans intend to be as cooperative as possible to help the Senate get off to a good start next year," said Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the incoming Republican leader, who agreed to the meeting proposed by Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

The legislation approved Friday was full of incentives to attract enough support to get it over the finish line. The tax measure, for instance, passed the House on a 367-45 vote. It extends a research and development tax credit sought by the business community, renews an income tax deduction for college tuition costs, allows taxpayers in states without income taxes to deduct sales taxes on their returns and allows teachers to deduct up to $250 for supplies bought with their own money.

The trade portion of the legislation drew more opposition in both the House and the Senate, particularly the push to establish normal trade relations with Vietnam and grant trade benefits for Haiti and the South American nations of Peru, Bolivia, Colombia and Ecuador. It passed the House on a 212-to-184 vote and was shipped to the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0105284

The Bush administration sought the normal trade status with Vietnam, saying it would allow American companies to take advantage of that nation's entry into the World Trade Organization and its booming economy. But some lawmakers questioned Vietnam's record on human rights and raised issues dating back to the Vietnam War.

Representative Nathan Deal, Republican of Georgia, said the trade recognition would reward the communist government of Vietnam, which he said continued to resist efforts by Americans to seek the remains of family members lost in the conflict. But Representative Rob Simmons, a Connecticut Republican and Vietnam veteran, said the trade pact could help improve relations.

Democrats and some Republicans said the stop-gap spending bill could potentially reduce government services by holding spending in many agencies at or below current levels. In response to criticism that veterans might have to wait for care, the legislation allows the Department of Veterans Affairs to shift up to $684 million within its budget to cover health care.

As the House moved toward adjournment, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, the Illinois Republican who will lose his post when the Democrats take over, gave his farewell speech.

"On January 4, I will be privileged to rejoin you on these benches where my heart is, here on the floor of the House," Mr. Hastert said.

Gregg Rips GOP For "Hypocrisy" Over Tax Bill Maneuver (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

Senate Budget Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) tore into his GOP colleagues Friday, accusing the party of being hypocritical when it claims the mantle of fiscal responsibility.

Gregg's angry floor speech came after a decision by House and Senate leaders to move a $39 billion tax package using procedural tactics that will shield it from a filibuster.

In the speech, Gregg accused Senate GOP leaders of using procedural rules "against the Republican membership" to block criticism of the bill and efforts by conservatives to change it.

Under a deal struck between House and Senate leaders on both sides of the aisle, the Senate this week included trade language and provisions to extend tax credits, among other things, as a "technical correction" to a House-passed tax bill that had not been moved. The House passed that package, then transmitted the new bill to the Senate as a "message." Doing so makes the measure "privileged" under the chamber's rules, essentially blocking Gregg and other conservatives from using budgetary points of order to filibuster the bill.

A senior GOP Senate aide said today that leaders decided to use the procedure last weekend when it became clear that there would not be enough time to move the bill under regular rules. The aide also explained that Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) worked with Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), who agreed to the move.

Because of the procedural move, the Senate will likely now remain in session until at least Sunday, though Gregg could force the Senate to remain in town until late Monday or Tuesday if he does not agree to allowing the bill to move forward.

Reciting a litany of tax cuts and extensions benefiting special interests or specific states, such as a cut for the music industry and other language that could benefit Frist's home state of Tennessee, Gregg launched a blistering attack on his party's leadership, accusing them of hypocrisy and of failing to learn the lessons of last month's election.

"The American people took the reins of government away from the Republican Party. ... They did so, I think, in large part because they were tired of our hypocrisy as a party on the issue of fiscal responsibility. And it would appear that their concerns are justified," Gregg said.

Gregg said this is the first time that Congress has used a "Message from the House" to move tax legislation. Although House and Senate leaders have said the tax measure would be narrow, it includes billions in additional provisions. Beyond the state-specific tax cuts and music industry provisions criticized by Gregg, the bill also includes ethanol tax provisions, as well as an extension on an ethanol tariff that is favored by corn-state lawmakers to protect farmers.

Gregg placed the blame squarely on the shoulders of his party's leaders in his floor speech.

"We have a leadership which is going to ram down the throats of our party the biggest budget-buster in the history of the Congress under Republican leadership. Well, anyway, the American people figured it out, and I'm sorry we haven't," Gregg said.

Democrats Thwart Congressional Raise (DMN)

By Todd J. Gillman

The Dallas Morning News, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON – Democrats stalled a congressional pay raise Friday, demanding a minimum wage hike first – a move derided even by Texas Republicans willing to freeze lawmakers' salaries.

DOJ_NMG_0105285

"I have voted for some, and I've voted against some. I would be inclined to vote against it this year," said Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, expressing annoyance that Democrats were trying to link the issues. "I think they are politically posturing."

House and Senate Democratic leaders threatened to block a last-minute flurry of legislation unless both chambers agreed to avert a 2 percent raise that would take effect Jan. 1. Republican leaders agreed to insert the provision in a stopgap budget that keeps the government running through Feb. 15.

Since 1989, Congress has gotten automatic raises pegged to inflation. A special vote is needed to block an annual raise. The next hike would have boosted pay $3,300, from $165,200 to $168,500.

Friday's move was largely symbolic. The freeze will expire with the stopgap budget – a six-week delay that will cost each lawmaker just $380, though the new Congress could vote to freeze pay for all of 2007.

"It is kind of a gimmick on their part," said Marc Short, spokesman for Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, adding that despite that, she also supported a pay freeze.

The temporary budget and pay freeze passed the House on Friday night. Senate action was expected by today.

Democrats argued that Congress doesn't deserve a raise because it hasn't been working hard enough, and because it's unfair until Congress boosts the minimum wage, which has been $5.15 per hour since 1997.

Democrats have vowed to raise that to $7.25 as soon as they take control in January.

Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Waco, dismissed Republican complaints, noting that inflation has left purchasing power at a 50-year low for minimum wage earners.

"I don't think it's just politics," he said. "I don't think Congress should be giving itself a $3,000-a-year pay raise when people working hard, moms and dads, for 10 years on minimum wage have not seen a single pay raise."

But Rep. Jeb Hensarling, R-Dallas, the new chairman of a conservative bloc called the Republican Study Committee, noted that he's voted against every congressional pay raise in his four-year tenure, unlike incoming Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi. "She's a little late to the cause," he said.

That said, he added, "It's probably the hardest vote anybody has to make. ... Some of my colleagues contribute so little they are vastly overpaid and some on both sides of the aisle contribute so much to America they're vastly underpaid."

He conceded that lawmakers are well-paid but added that "Congress gets a bad rap on how many days you spend in Washington. Voting in Washington is no more important than me going to the Palestine Rotary Club and listening to how people would like me to vote."

Democrats have accused Republicans of running a "do-nothing Congress," deriding the GOP leadership for keeping them in session just 103 days. They underscored the point Friday by releasing the 2007 schedule, which will boost the typical House workweek from three days to five, and drastically cut vacation time. Assuming a 10-hour day, the 103-day year yields an hourly rate of about $160, though that hardly accounts for all the time lawmakers spend on the job.

"We work every day. We have plenty of committee meetings. We have to go to our districts. I don't know anybody that stays elected that isn't giving it all they can give," said Rep. Eddie Bernice Johnson, D-Dallas, who said she would happily defer a raise for a higher minimum wage.

Incoming Democrats Face Fiscal Minefield (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The outgoing Republican Congress has placed a political time bomb for incoming Democrats: Nearly all domestic programs paid for by the federal government are level funded through mid-February with no adjustments for inflation, a situation that probably will trigger cuts or reductions in such popular areas as veterans' affairs, children's healthcare, housing vouchers, and low-income fuel assistance.

Democrats, who take control of Congress in January, will therefore have to immediately choose between restoring any lost services and their campaign pledge to control government spending. The clash could expose tensions within the party in the crucial first weeks of Democrats' leadership -- and the party's agenda could get sidetracked in a pitched battle over spending priorities.

"As the Republicans leave their control of Congress, they've decided to blow up the room," said Senator Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, the assistant Democratic leader. "They're leaving behind a disaster for us to deal with."

Republicans will adjourn the 2006 congressional term today without passing nine of the 11 annual appropriations bills, which cover thousands of government programs and nearly half a trillion dollars in domestic spending. Instead, Congress passed a stopgap measure that will keep government operating at a bare-bones level through mid-February -- more than a quarter of the way into fiscal 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0105286

The minimum level is determined by picking the lowest of three budget figures for each agency: the amount the Senate or the House appropriated in separate votes or the amount the agency received last year. In most cases, that will be last year's budget for the program or agency.

The typical effects of level funding include delays in an agency's hiring or expansion plans, or inflation-related cuts in services. Democrats and social service groups predict a range of dire consequences: shuttered Social Security offices, a hiring freeze for FBI agents, thousands of children losing access to federally sponsored healthcare.

The Department of Veterans' Affairs budget will be particularly hard hit. The House and Senate budgeted $36.5 billion for the department in fiscal 2007, but Congress' failure to act on the spending bills will leave it funded at last year's level of $34.26 billion -- even as costs and the number of people it treats continues to rise.

That means thousands of battle-wounded soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan may have to wait longer for VA medical treatment.

Advocates for social service programs are already sounding alarms and promise to lobby Democrats to fix what the Republicans left behind.

"This is just intolerable, where things are right now," said Charles Loveless, legislative director for the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees.

Republicans initially said they would complete work on the appropriations bills during the post election congressional session. But fiscal conservatives, opposed to the thousands of earmarked pet projects stuffed into the measures, stalled the bills, and efforts to dislodge the projects failed amid squabbling between GOP House and Senate leaders.

Conservative Republicans in the House and Senate cheered that result. On its way out the door, the GOP finally succeeded in restraining federal spending -- and did so in a way that will force Democrats to make politically tough budget choices or break their campaign promises, said Representative Jeff Flake, an Arizona Republican.

"We will know very quickly next year whether they were serious about their promises," Flake said. "This is hardly a starvation diet. Most agencies will be fine."

Yet some Democrats say they would not be shy about pushing for more funding. Representative James P. McGovern, a Worcester Democrat, said the public expects his party to recognize their constituents need such federal programs as Head Start and healthcare for veterans.

"We're going to try to fix the damage they're doing," McGovern said. "People expect government to provide for certain needs. . . . I'm not worried about being labeled as a big spender."

But other Democrats are. On the campaign trail before last month's elections, Democrats promised to reduce the budget deficit and institute "pay-as-you-go" budget rules -- that is, increase spending for a program only if lawmakers can find a way to pay for it. Those goals would have to be sidelined if Democrats seek to boost spending early next year.

Representative Mike Ross, an Arkansas Democrat, said voters placed Democrats in control of Congress in large part because of runaway spending and the proliferation of pet projects under Republican rule. Democrats must try to balance the budget, Ross said.

"We have to put the country on a path toward fiscal responsibility," said Ross, co chairman of the conservative Blue Dog Coalition. "It's about priorities. These are decisions we have to be prepared to make."

Republicans' failure to finish their work has Democrats seething as they anticipate difficult budget votes in January and February. Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, called it a "tremendous mess" that leaves his party with few palatable options.

"We have alternatives -- none of which are very good," said Reid. "One could get mad, but I'm going to try not to."

Representative David R. Obey, who is set to become chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, declined to say how Democrats would handle the situation.

But he said that Republicans' foot dragging would hurt President Bush since Congress will have to spend time solving the problem, leaving legislators less time to review the president's upcoming budget proposal.

In the meantime, he said, Republicans cannot blame Democrats for anything they do with the fiscal 2007 budget, since the GOP failed to act.

"If the Republicans are not willing to exercise their responsibility while they are in control, they lose all right to criticize in any way, shape, or form the matter in which we go about trying to clean up their mess," said Obey, a Wisconsin Democrat.

But some Republicans said they have granted Democrats a golden opportunity to show voters their fiscal discipline and bipartisanship. If Democrats are serious about curbing earmarks and balancing the budget, they will find plenty of Republicans who want to help, said Senator Jim DeMint, a South Carolina Republican.

"I have a bunch of senators who would like to work with them on that," DeMint said. "I don't care if they get the credit for doing it or not, it just needs to get done."

DOJ_NMG_0105287

Sentiment And Jokes At Farewells In The House (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Representative Charles B. Rangel tried to do something graceful on Friday. He wished a very public happy birthday to his longtime nemesis, Representative Bill Thomas, the departing chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

In an exchange on the House floor, Mr. Thomas, Republican of California, informed Mr. Rangel, Democrat of New York, that his birthday was a few days ago and asked what Mr. Rangel had done for him lately.

"We're saying goodbye," Mr. Rangel said with a smile, drawing out his words and waving farewell.

In bursts of giddiness and remorse, members of Congress went through not just the end of the 109th Congress this week, but also 12 years of Republican control. It was the end of an era, and Republicans left Capitol Hill with spasms of amusement, anger and humiliation, at times visibly stunned that power and its trappings had vanished so fast.

They cleared out their belongings, leaving the hallways full of broken furniture and overflowing trash bins. They gave emotional farewell speeches on the floor.

They tried — rather unsuccessfully — to wrap up business, displaying a lack of legislative discipline that was a sharp contrast to the machinelike efficiency of their early years in charge.

Some lawmakers, like Senator Conrad Burns, Republican of Montana, walked off in a huff.

Representative Charles Bass, Republican of New Hampshire, paused to ruminate about his party's descent as he descended to the temporary quarters allocated to incumbents who lost on Nov. 7, a cluster of cubicles in the basement of a House office building.

"When I was elected in 1994, there were seven of us," Mr. Bass said, referring to the cadre of New England Republicans who long made up the moderate wing of his party. "It's been downhill ever since. And now we're down to one."

Indeed, the end of the current Congress means the departure of all House Republicans from New England except for Representative Christopher Shays of Connecticut. For the first time since 1976, there will be no one named Chafee representing Rhode Island in the Senate.

Nearly 12 Republican retirements and almost 24 defeats of incumbent means the loss of some of the best known, and most colorful, characters of recent decades.

Representative Henry J. Hyde of Illinois, the longtime House Judiciary Committee chairman, will be gone. So will Representative Katherine Harris, famous or infamous for her role as secretary of state in Florida in the 2000 presidential election. As will Representative J. D. Hayworth of Arizona, a formerly brazen member of the new Republican breed elected in 1994.

Representative Jim Leach of Iowa, a 30-year veteran of the House and a moderate Republican who lost his seat, lamented that "the great center of American politics" was no longer represented in Congress.

"If you think of American history, the best and the brightest gravitated to politics," Mr. Leach said recently after addressing the House. "Today, that is less the case."

He said he believed that he was leaving a Congress far more dysfunctional than when he arrived, adding, "The public swings from being slightly left of center to slightly right of center, but the politics are well to the right of center to well to the left of center."

The final moments of the week should have presented a last-dash opportunity for Republicans to consider core items of the conservative agenda, the chance to put in a parting word, however symbolic, on issues like abortion.

Instead, the 12 years of Republican discipline began to wither. House Republicans failed to pass an antiabortion measure, struggled to approve a package extending popular tax breaks and decided not even to bother trying to find a solution for the spending bills. Atmospherically, the place began to look like a sprawling rummage sale, as members departed and others swapped spaces.

A few dozen gold-embossed books, commemorating the Congressional tributes on Ronald Reagan's death in 2004, were tossed into the heap next to the office of E. Clay Shaw Jr., a Florida Republican who was defeated. When word spread about the books, young Republican aides began scooping them from the garbage.

Other scavengers, some with backpacks and some in business suits, traipsed up and down the hallways of the House office buildings. Cleaning crews moved from empty suite to empty suite, confronting years' worth of debris.

In the basement of the Rayburn building, the more than 20 Republicans who involuntarily lost their seats crammed into a single office, for some of them the closest they would come to having space in the most vaunted House office building.

DOJ_NMG_0105288

"I finally got a Rayburn office, but it's in the basement," said Representative Chris Chocola, Republican of Indiana. On the other side of the Capitol, Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania met with his successor, Bob Casey, for nearly an hour on Thursday, their longest encounter apart from their televised debates.

But Mr. Santorum, a Republican whose once-steady rise in politics ended with a resounding defeat, refused to be photographed with Mr. Casey, and brushed past reporters in his closing days in the Capitol.

In a departing act as House majority leader, John A. Boehner of Ohio sent a memorandum to Republican members of Congress. He waxed nostalgic over the close of the session, saying the Contract With America had ended.

"Chastened and humbled by our defeat at the ballot box, Republicans have taken a critical look inward," Mr. Boehner wrote. "We've looked back at our greatest success, in search of lessons to guide us as we move ahead."

He warned members that life would change considerably.

"I'm not looking forward to serving in the minority during the next two years," Mr. Boehner said.

But he added that it would be a good lesson and motivation to regain control of the House in two years and end any feeling of complacency from their 12-year run.

"If such an entitlement mentality did creep in, it should now be dead and gone," Mr. Boehner wrote. "And the humbling conditions Republicans face during the first few months of 2007 will stamp out any trace that remains.

"The end of our Republican majority was not inevitable. Nor is the return of our majority two years from now. Our fate is in our own hands, and that of the American people we were elected to serve."

Committee Says GOP Left Foley Unchecked (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

The House ethics committee concluded yesterday that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top staff probably knew for months, if not years, of then-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contact with former House pages but did nothing to protect the teenagers.

Top GOP House leaders also "failed to exercise appropriate diligence" in the matter, the committee's report found, and tried "to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of Foley's conduct." The ensuing scandal contributed to the Republicans' losses in the midterm elections. The report speculated that some officials were reluctant to act too aggressively for fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality or for political reasons.

But the ethics panel, officially known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, decided against taking any action against the leaders, aides or House officials involved in the saga, declining even to describe their actions as bringing ill repute on the House.

"The requirement that Members and staff act at all times in a manner that reflects creditably on the House does not mean that every error in judgment or failure to exercise appropriate oversight and sufficient diligence establishes a violation" of House rules, the long-awaited report concluded.

The committee's bipartisan probe was launched two months ago after reports by ABC News that Foley, a Florida Republican, had sent sexually explicit online messages to male former House pages. The 89-page report is sharply critical of Hastert and his chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid.

The report also chides House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) for not showing sufficient curiosity in the matter, and retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) is criticized for failing to divulge Foley's actions, both years before they were exposed and after they came to light.

Democratic aides are also criticized, for shopping around inappropriate Foley e-mails to media outlets as far back as November 2005, apparently for political gain.

To critics of Congress, the report's release in the final hours of the session is a fitting end to a Congress tainted by scandal, indictments and resignations. Next month, Hastert will take a seat in a new, Democratic-controlled House as a back-bench member of the minority.

"It is unfathomable that the ethics committee has held no member or staff member individually accountable for the manner in which the Foley scandal was handled in the House," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group.

Two former pages whose revelations added to the scandal expressed disappointment with the committee's decision not to discipline those who knew about Foley's behavior. One of the pages, involved in providing the first questionable e-mails to the media, said, "I'm surprised they aren't doing anything, but it's not shocking, given the lack of real accountability we've seen in Congress in general."

The other former page, whom Foley propositioned after the boy had left the page program, said, "My fear is that by not holding anyone accountable it sets a precedent that political fallout is more important than young people's safety."

DOJ_NMG_0105289

Committee members of both parties defended their conclusions. "This is not the jerry-rigged result of a series of compromises," said Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), the committee's ranking Democrat.

Hastert issued a statement late yesterday stressing that the investigation had uncovered no evidence that any House member, officer or employee, or any member of the media, knew of the overtly sexual instant messages that led to Foley's sudden resignation.

Much about Foley's courting of male pages has been made public, but the committee's report breaks new ground. As far back as 1995, the year Foley took office as part of the Republican takeover, Jeff Trandahl, then assistant clerk of the House, saw Foley as a nuisance for lavishing inordinate attention on pages. Trandahl, who would be elected clerk in 1999, testified that he thought of Kolbe, an openly gay House Republican who is retiring this year, the same way.

Peggy Sampson, the Republicans' chief page supervisor, said Foley's behavior gave her a "creepy feeling" for years. Evidence emerged that on two separate occasions, Foley went to the page dormitory late at night. In the first incident, before 2000, he was suspected of being intoxicated and was turned away by Capitol Police. In another incident, in June 2000, he reportedly appeared in his convertible during the pages' end-of-semester "all-night party" and sped off with at least two pages before supervising staff could react.

Perhaps the biggest revelations involved Kolbe. The Washington Post reported in October that one of his former pages had received a sexually explicit instant message from Foley, which the former page had shown to Kolbe as long ago as 2000. After the story appeared, Kolbe said that the contact was with his staff, not him, that he did not see it and that he was unaware it was explicit.

Kolbe's assistant, Patrick Baugh, told the committee that the former page had contacted Kolbe directly and that the former page revealed the explicit nature of the message.

Moreover, after the Foley matter exploded in the media, the former page contacted Kolbe again to ask whether he should divulge the instant message. He testified that Kolbe responded: "It is best that you don't even bring this up with anybody. . . . There is no good that can come from it if you actually talk about this."

In a statement, Kolbe said, "The report demonstrates that members of my office and I took prompt action in 2001 to address the complaint," by a college student from his district who had previously served as a House page. "I did not review a copy of the communication Congressman Foley sent . . . and I never knew whether or not it was sexually explicit," Kolbe said. "The simple fact that Foley had made the student feel uncomfortable was enough for me to take action by, among other things, notifying the Clerk of the House."

Another incident was also brought to light in the report. After the Foley matter became public on Sept. 29, The Post quoted Boehner saying that he had told Hastert that spring of concerns about Foley and that Hastert had said the matter was being taken care of. When the story appeared on The Post's Web site that night, Palmer, Hastert's chief of staff, contacted Boehner's chief of staff to discuss what the report called "the perceived inconsistency" between Boehner's story and Hastert's statement denying all knowledge of the concerns.

That led to a late-night strategy session of House GOP leaders in Boehner's office, which some members at the time feared was inappropriate because the case had been referred to the ethics committee.

Democrats receive their share of scrutiny in the report. In August 2005, a former page of Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) sent Alexander aide Danielle Savoy e-mails he had received from Foley asking him for a picture and asking what he wanted for his birthday. Savoy passed them on to a friend, who showed them to her boyfriend, Justin Field, who worked for the House Democratic Caucus.

Democratic Caucus communications director Matt Miller saw the e-mails as inappropriate, but rather than taking them to authorities, he shopped them to the press, first to the Miami Herald and the St. Petersburg Times that November, then to the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call. He also gave the e-mails to the communications director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, a point apparently validating Republican charges that senior Democrats were behind the revelation of Foley's conduct.

On the central question of Hastert's involvement, the committee firmly sided with Trandahl and former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who testified that they brought Foley's behavior to the attention of Palmer and of Hastert counsel Van Der Meid years ago. Fordham also testified that Palmer assured him he had brought the issue directly to the speaker in late 2002 or early 2003.

Trandahl said Palmer had told him: "I've talked to Kirk Fordham. I understand the problem. I'm on it." He said he remembered it "vividly."

Palmer testified repeatedly that he remembered no such meeting, and Hastert said he did not remember learning anything of the Foley matter.

DOJ_NMG_0105290

But the committee found "the weight of the evidence supports" Fordham and Trandahl. Moreover, "the weight of the evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails" by Boehner and Reynolds in spring 2006.

Ethics Panel Faults GOP Leaders In Foley Case (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a coda to a year of political disasters for Republicans, the House Ethics Committee said Friday that GOP lawmakers and staff members for years remained "willfully ignorant" that former Rep. Mark Foley was making sexual advances toward male congressional pages.

Driven by political considerations and fear of exposing Foley's homosexuality, they failed in their duty to protect the teenagers, the committee concluded in its report on the scandal. And, the panel said, congressional officials ignored evidence of predatory behavior by the Florida Republican that began emerging more than 10 years ago.

Despite these criticisms, the bipartisan ethics panel found that no House rules were broken in the handling of the Foley case. And though it noted that senior advisors to outgoing House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) were among those who were warned years ago of Foley's improprieties, the committee did not determine there had been a systematic cover-up of the matter.

The report's lack of sanctions drew quick condemnation from government reform groups, which characterized the committee's nine-week investigation as a sham.

"It's just unfathomable how you can reach the conclusion that wrongdoing occurred … but no one did it," said Fred Wertheimer, president of the independent watchdog group Democracy 21. "This is a classic demonstration of one of the fundamental ethics problems [in Congress]. They don't have a real system for enforcement."

Hastert issued a brief statement in which he praised the panel's work and said he was "glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any member or staff."

Nonetheless, the report's harsh critique was another black mark on the GOP, whose losses in last month's midterm election cost it control of the House and Senate and capped a period of scandals and failed legislative initiatives. Along with Foley, four GOP lawmakers — including onetime House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas — have resigned amid scandal since 2005. On the legislative front, the party stalemated this year on a number of key issues, including immigration overhaul and controlling federal spending.

Growing public discontent with the war in Iraq created an especially tough political environment for Republicans in this year's campaign. And in the eyes of many political experts and strategists in both parties, the Foley scandal was the final blow that crushed GOP hopes of retaining its congressional majorities.

The Ethics Committee probe began after news reports in late September of sexually explicit messages between Foley, 52, and a former House page, revelations that caused the 12-year House member to immediately resign his seat.

Although the committee did not call for any penalties against any of those linked to the controversy, it also did not find much honor in the way a succession of congressional officials responded as questions arose about Foley's actions.

As far back as the mid-1990s, the investigation found, House officials learned of warning signs that Foley had an inappropriate interest in pages.

Foley tried to visit the pages' residence hall after curfew on at least two occasions, once while he may have been intoxicated, according to the report.

In 2001, a former page who had been sponsored by Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) complained to Kolbe that Foley had sent him a sexually explicit message. And in 2002, Foley used frequent-flier miles to bring a former page to Washington to visit him.

But each time, officials who knew of Foley's behavior seemed to do little more than suggest to him that he be more careful.

The committee's report is particularly critical of Kolbe, who, according to the former page, later told the page not to share information about Foley's message. Kolbe denied to the committee that he tried to silence the former page.

Also pointedly criticized for their inaction were two of Hastert's chief lieutenants: his longtime chief of staff, Scott Palmer, and his chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl — who told the committee that he confronted Foley about 10 times over the years about his behavior — said he repeatedly raised his concerns with Van Der Meid.

Trandahl and former Foley Chief of Staff Kirk Fordham said they brought their concerns to Palmer in 2002 or 2003. Yet no official action was taken. Palmer said he did not recall meeting with Fordham.

Even in 2005, when a series of suggestive e-mails from Foley to a former page in Louisiana prompted more complaints, House leaders did little but ask Foley to stop the communications, the committee found.

The committee reported that it could not "determine conclusively" why officials had not acted more aggressively.

DOJ_NMG_0105291

"Some may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Rep. Foley's homosexuality, which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically," the panel concluded.

It also noted that "there is some evidence that political considerations played a role."

Although the committee did not detail what those may have been, the GOP's majority during its 12 years of controlling the House always has been relatively slim, and party leaders were focused on retaining seats.

Addressing conflicting reports about when Hastert was alerted to Foley's communications with the former Louisiana page, the committee wrote: "The weight of the evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails" months before Foley resigned.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), head of the party's congressional campaign committee, contradicted Hastert's account. Boehner and Reynolds said they alerted Hastert early this year.

Rep. Howard L. Berman of Valley Village, the committee's ranking Democrat, said the investigation's "most important contribution" would be "to tell the story of what happened."

But the panel's decision not to recommend any punishment for any official threatens to weaken its effect at a time when Democrats are promising to treat ethics more seriously than did the departing GOP majority.

The committee could have officially rebuked those involved in the case. It also has the power to recommend expulsion of lawmakers. The full House would vote on such a recommendation.

The Justice Department is conducting a criminal probe into the handling of the Foley case.

The committee report was released just a few hours before Hastert took to the House floor to reflect fondly upon his service as speaker since 1999. His remarks were greeted with a standing ovation from Republicans and Democrats.

Report Finds Negligence In Foley Case (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — The House ethics committee said Friday that a nine-week investigation into former Representative Mark Foley's conduct had found that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republican leaders were negligent in not shielding teenagers from inappropriate advances by Mr. Foley.

But the panel also concluded that neither Mr. Hastert nor other officers of the House had violated any House rules, and recommended no sanctions for their failure to stop Mr. Foley's conduct.

The bipartisan report, released in the waning hours of the Congressional session, concluded that "political considerations played a role" in some of the decisions made by lawmakers or their aides after learning about Mr. Foley's contacts with former Congressional pages.

"A pattern of conduct was exhibited among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences" of Mr. Foley's untoward behavior, the report said. "The failure to exhaust all reasonable efforts to call attention to potential misconduct involving a member and House page is not merely the exercise of poor judgment, it is a present danger to House pages and to the integrity of the institution of the House."

The members of the investigating subcommittee, two Republicans and two Democrats, declined to take questions on Friday or respond to critics who said the case of Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, underscored a need to reform how Congress policed itself. The findings were presented in a two-inch-thick document, including volumes of sexually graphic instant messages Mr. Foley sent to former pages.

Mr. Foley refused to testify, the report said, citing pending criminal investigations against him in Florida as well as his right not to incriminate himself. He has been beyond the jurisdiction of the House since resigning on Sept. 29. Had he remained in Congress, the report said, he "almost certainly" would have been disciplined.

The revelations about Mr. Foley shook the midterm election campaign, played a role in Republicans losing control of the House and damaged the political leadership of Mr. Hastert. The committee said "the weight of the evidence" showed that Mr. Hastert knew about e-mail messages Mr. Foley had sent a former page from Louisiana and that his circle of senior advisers for years had been aware of other concerns.

The committee found that there was "a disconcerting unwillingness to take responsibility for resolving issues regarding Representative Foley's conduct." Those in the chain of command, the report said, "did far too little, while attempting to pass the responsibility for acting to others."

The committee said it could not conclusively say why Republicans failed to address Mr. Foley's conduct. But the investigation found that Republicans "may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Representative Foley's homosexuality, which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically."

DOJ_NMG_0105292

After his resignation, Mr. Foley checked himself into an alcohol treatment program and announced, through his lawyer, that he is gay. He has since been released from the program, but has not spoken publicly about his behavior.

After hearing testimony from more than 50 witnesses, the committee concluded that Mr. Foley employed a familiar pattern to become acquainted with pages. The report said the congressman would get page e-mail addresses at the end of their time in Washington, and begin contacting them with "messages that could be read as sexual solicitation."

"Such conduct is an abuse of power and an abuse of trust of the pages, their parents or guardians and the Congress itself," the report said. "Behavior of this kind cannot be excused or tolerated, as it undermines the integrity of the House."

In a written statement on Friday, Mr. Hastert noted that the investigation found no evidence that anyone knew about the sexually charged instant messages that led to Mr. Foley's resignation. "I am glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any member or staff," he added.

Still, the investigation concluded that the speaker's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, first learned of Mr. Foley's conduct with pages in 2002 or 2003. And the speaker's chief counsel, Ted Van Der Meid, had been aware of concerns about Mr. Foley's behavior for nearly a decade.

The committee's findings validated the accounts of Kirk Fordham, Mr. Foley's former chief of staff, and Jeff Trandahl, then the House clerk, both of whom testified that they repeatedly warned the speaker's office about Mr. Foley, described in the report as a "ticking time bomb." The concerns heightened in November, 2005, when a former page sent e-mail messages he had received from Mr. Foley to the office of Representative Rodney Alexander, a Louisiana Republican. It was this exchange, in which Mr. Foley asked for the teenager's photograph, that prompted Republican leaders to confront Mr. Foley.

While there was much discussion about the initial e-mail messages, few people had seen transcripts. Republicans said the family of the Louisiana page was adamant about privacy and had objected to messages being disclosed, but the report released Friday said the page's father had testified that he had made no such request.

The demand for privacy became a "convenient justification for failing to pursue the matter," the report said. "The family's desire for privacy could have been accommodated while still investigating more aggressively."

The inquiry was led by Representative Doc Hastings, Republican of Washington, and Howard L. Berman, Democrat of California.

Foley Report Harshly Criticizes Hastert, Staff (RC)

By John Bresnahan, Susan Davis

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

After a nine-week investigation, the House ethics committee has concluded that Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and his top aides knew that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had inappropriate e-mail contacts with former House pages but failed to take adequate steps to stop those contacts, according to a report released by the panel on Friday.

The committee's findings — which did not include any formal violations of House ethics rules — are in direct contrast with public statements made by Hastert and Scott Palmer, his chief of staff. Both men denied being told by Members or staff of any concerns about Foley's behavior or speaking to the ex-lawmaker or Foley's staff about the matter. Ted Van Der Meid, Hastert's counsel, was slammed by the ethics panel for "an inexplicable lack of interest" in the Foley e-mails or attempts to resolve the matter.

Retiring Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz,), who is under investigation by federal authorities over his own interactions with House pages, also drew harsh criticism from the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct for failing to follow up concerns raised by an ex-page regarding a sexually explicit Foley e-mail. The committee said Kolbe should have done more in October 2001 to determine exactly what Foley had said to the former page.

But the ethics committee did not find that any current Member or aide had violated House rules or standards, and the panel will take no further action on the scandal, despite the failure by House GOP leaders and senior aides to address the Foley matter before it was revealed by ABC News in late September. Foley resigned from the House on Sept. 29, and he is under investigation by both federal and Florida officials over his dealings with the former pages, including sexually explicit electronic exchanges he had with several male teens.

An investigative subcommittee led by Reps. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) and Howard Berman (D-Calif.), chairman and ranking member of the full ethics committee, found "a significant number of instances where Members, officers or employees failed to exercise appropriate diligence and oversight, or should have exercised greater diligence and oversight, regarding issues arising from the interaction between former Rep. Mark Foley and current or former House pages."

In the panel's report, which was publicly released this afternoon, the committee also noted "a disconcerting unwillingness to take responsibility" for Foley's actions among lawmakers and staff or for stopping it once they were aware of the behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0105293

"Rather than addressing the issues fully, some witnesses did far too little, while attempting to pass the responsibility for acting to others," the report stated. "Some relied on unreasonably fine distinctions regarding their defined responsibilities. Almost no one followed up adequately on the limited actions they did take."

The ethics panel blamed several factors for the GOP leadership's failure to rein in Foley, including the fact that Foley was gay but closeted, as well as the potential political fallout if that fact were publicly revealed.

"Some may have been concerned that raising the issue too aggressively might have risked exposing Rep. Foley's homosexuality, ... which could have adversely affected him both personally and politically," the subcommittee found. "There is some evidence that political considerations played a role in decisions that were made by people in both political parties."

In a statement, Hastert emphasized that the panel concluded that no House Member or staffer was aware of the more sexually explicit messages that surfaced after the Foley scandal became public.

"I asked the Committee to do this tough job promptly, and they have," Hastert said. "I want to thank them for their diligent and hard work in preparing a thorough and final report. My staff and I voluntarily and fully cooperated with this investigation. I am glad the committee made clear that there was no violation of any House rules by any Member or staff."

Hastert told the investigative subcommittee that he could not recall being told by House Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Rep. Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) about inappropriate e-mails that Foley was sending to a former page. Both lawmakers testified that they had warned Hastert about the e-mails earlier this year.

The investigative subcommittee "finds that the weight of evidence supports the conclusion that Speaker Hastert was told, at least in passing, about the e-mails" by both Boehner and Reynolds, the report stated. "Neither the Majority Leader nor Rep. Reynolds asked the Speaker to to take any action in response to the information each provided to him, and there is no evidence that the Speaker took any action."

The ethics committee apparently did not believe Palmer's denial of any knowledge of the Foley e-mails, and it disputed Palmer's claim that he did not meet privately with Foley or his former chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, to discuss the matter.

"The weight of evidence supports a conclusion that Kirk Fordham talked to Scott Palmer about Fordham's concerns about Rep. Foley's conduct, and that Palmer later talked to Rep. Foley," the report stated.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, a key figure in the investigation, testified that he had been aware of Foley's behavior as early as the mid-1990s and had "repeatedly confronted" Foley personally about his behavior.

Trandahl said he raised the matter "a lot more than 10 times" with Fordham, who was Foley's chief of staff at the time. The report indicates that Trandahl and Fordham worked in conjunction over the years to curb Foley's interaction with pages and to warn him about the appearance of impropriety.

According to the report, Trandahl said he raised the issue with Van Der Meid on "a number of occasions." Van Der Meid testified that he never informed anyone else in the Speaker's office because he believed Trandahl and Fordham were in control of the matter. Trandahl "had never asked me to take any other action," Van Der Meid testified.

Trandahl offered key testimony contradicting Palmer's insistence that he has no recollection of a conversation that took place in late 2002 or early 2003 in which Trandahl and Fordham agreed to go to Palmer directly, and Fordham spoke with him directly. Palmer flatly denied any recollection or knowledge that such a meeting took place.

Trandahl said that over the years, he also raised the matter with Kolbe, and staff associated with the Page Board.

The committee concluded that Trandahl was not guilty of any misconduct and that his actions were "reasonable" in the Foley matter. "In fact, the evidence shows that both Fordham and Trandahl took steps to bring their concerns about Rep. Foley's conduct to the attention of others who they thoughts might be able to help address their concerns."

At a press conference Friday, Hastings and Berman declined to take questions regarding the investigation in order to "let the report speak for itself."

According to Hastings, the panel did more than 100 hours of interviews producing more than 3000 pages of written testimony. He said that while the panel originally authorized over four-dozen subpoenas, most individuals co-operated willingly and "only a handful" of subpoenas had to be served.

"We were pleased by the cooperation received by the overwhelming majority of those we interviewed both inside and outside the House," Hastings said.

Hastings and Berman maintained that the committee fulfilled its Oct. 5 commitment to a quick and thorough investigation. "Promise made, promise kept," Berman told reporters.

"I've never seen the process work better than it has on this particular occasion," Berman said, lauding the staff of the investigative panel but noting that the investigation saw rare and intense Member participation by the chairman and ranking member, as well as Reps. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio.), who also sat on the investigative subcommittee.

DOJ_NMG_0105294

Speaking broadly to the Foley matter, Hastings took the opportunity to reiterate that "Members, officers and staff alike" have an obligation to "speak up and to seek appropriate action and then to follow up to ensure that the concern has been properly addressed."

Hastings added, "If there is a positive to take away from all of this, I hope there will be a renewed determination on the part of everyone here in the House to spare no Member when it comes to ensuring the safety of our young men and women who come from all over the country to serve us as our pages."

Panel: Republicans Negligent But Broke No Rules In Foley Case (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning, Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Republican congressional leaders and their staffs were "willfully ignorant" in responding to early warnings of improper advances toward underage male pages by then-Rep. Mark Foley of Florida but did not violate any House rules, the House ethics committee concluded Friday.

The committee's 89-page investigative report described numerous warning signs of inappropriate behavior stretching back more than a decade, including two nighttime visits by Foley to the dormitory where the high school-age House pages lived. On one occasion, the Republican congressman was turned away because it was after curfew and he appeared intoxicated. Another time, Foley sped off in his convertible with two male pages, the committee was told.

Though the panel did not reprimand or otherwise sanction House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) or any other member of Congress, it cast doubt on Hastert's public insistence that he was unaware of a complaint about inappropriate e-mail messages Foley sent to a former page last year.

The speaker declined to discuss the committee's findings on the scandal, which undermined public confidence in his leadership of the House and stoked criticism that Republican leaders were, at best, indifferent to abuses of power. Political analysts say the Foley scandal contributed to the Democrats winning control of Congress in last month's midterm elections.

"The committee did their work," Hastert said Friday. "We went through a process and stuck with the process. We have a report that addresses all of that."

Overall, the ethics panel found "a pattern of conduct ... among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences" of Foley's conduct toward pages.

The committee's report also concluded that "the weight of the evidence does not support" denials from Hastert Chief of Staff Scott Palmer that Palmer was warned years earlier of alarming behavior by Foley. Efforts to reach Palmer were unsuccessful.

The panel blasted another senior Hastert aide, counsel Ted Van Der Meid, for "an inexplicable lack of interest" when he received a complaint about the Foley e-mails. Van Der Meid had been repeatedly warned previously of inappropriate contacts with pages, including at least one of Foley's visits to the page dorm, the panel found.

In the e-mail exchange with a 16-year-old former page from Louisiana, Foley requested a photo of the Louisiana boy, asked what he would like as a birthday gift and commented on the handsome physique of another former male page. Once that e-mail exchange was disclosed in September by ABC News, other former pages came forward with numerous sexually graphic electronic messages that Foley had sent to teenagers over the years. The congressman then resigned.

The ethics committee criticized the House Page Board chairman, Rep. John Shimkus (R-Ill.), who handled the complaint about the e-mails with a private warning to Foley to cease contact with pages; the panel said Shimkus failed to consult other members of the page board or investigate further. The House employee responsible for supervising the page program testified that he warned Shimkus at the time that Foley was "a ticking time bomb" who had been confronted a number of times about inappropriate behavior with pages.

The other Republican member of the page board, Rep. Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia, testified that Shimkus later told her he did not take the matter to the page board in part to avoid informing its Democratic member, Rep. Dale Kildee of Michigan. Capito said Shimkus told her he feared the matter "would be blown out of proportion" by Kildee.

Shimkus said Friday he takes the committee's rebuke seriously but maintained that he had acted in good faith. "I think I walk away from this maybe having made a bad decision," he said, "but with my integrity and my honor intact."

Rep. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.), a member of the ethics panel, defended the decision not to take disciplinary action.

Nonetheless, Biggert said it was "disappointing that people along the way didn't take it as seriously as they might have…. I think that has to do with the subject matter. People are uncomfortable talking about this kind of thing."

After a nine-week investigation, the ethics committee released its report on the closing day of the congressional session and the end of 12 years of Republican control of the House—controlwon and now lost in large part because of voter anger over abuses of congressional power.

DOJ_NMG_0105295

The 1994 Republican Revolution led by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich wrested control of Congress from Democrats on promises to clean up the institution following scandals, including exposure of a cozy arrangement at the House Bank that allowed members to repeatedly bounce checks without penalty.

But the disclosure of Foley's electronic communications and the House leadership's slow-footed response to early warnings about the congressman culminated a series of recent Republican scandals that also included charges of bribery and influence-peddling against several members of Congress.

The ethics committee also showed that a Democratic political operative was instrumental in bringing to light the Louisiana boy's 2005 complaint about Foley's e-mails. Still, the report found no evidence that operatives for either party or anyone in Congress other than Foley were aware in advance of the sexually explicit communications.

The former page from Louisiana initially complained about the e-mails in August 2005 to a junior aide to the page's congressional sponsor, Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.). The aide was rebuffed when she raised the matter with a superior. She then forwarded the e-mail to a friend and the e-mail eventually reached a Democratic operative who passed it on to Florida newspapers. Alexander's office alerted Hastert's staff when reporters began to call in November 2005.

The ethics committee found numerous others ignored warnings about Foley's behavior that dated "from the beginning of his tenure" in the House in January 1995.

Former House Clerk Jeff Trandahl, who supervised the page program, became concerned by the mid-1990s. He said he confronted Foley "approximately 10 times" about his frequent fraternizing with pages and confronted Foley's chief of staff "a lot more than 10 times."

Trandahl also testified he raised the concerns "pretty often" with Hastert's counsel, Van Der Meid, who was his contact in the speaker's office.

The Buck Just Stops (WP)

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

WHAT, ONE HAS to wonder, would it take for the House ethics committee to hold a lawmaker or a staff member accountable?

A special investigative subcommittee convened to examine responses to Mark Foley's inappropriate contacts with congressional pages found "a significant number of instances where Members, officers or employees failed to exercise appropriate diligence and oversight." It found "a disconcerting unwillingness to take responsibility for resolving issues regarding Rep. Foley's conduct." And it found "a pattern of conduct . . . among many individuals to remain willfully ignorant of the potential consequences of former Representative Foley's conduct with respect to House pages."

The sum total of disciplinary actions the panel is recommending as a result? Zero.

In a report released yesterday, the panel did a good job laying out the disturbing facts of the case: how the Florida Republican's inappropriate interest in pages manifested itself from his first days on the job and how lawmakers and staff failed to do nearly enough to find out about or fix the problem. It ably described the stakes involved: "The failure to exhaust all reasonable efforts to call attention to potential misconduct involving a Member and House page is not merely the exercise of poor judgment; it is a present danger to House pages and to the integrity of the institution of the House." Then, all too characteristically, the committee declined to hold even a single individual responsible for any misstep.

It's true, as the report said, that not "every error in judgment" is a violation of House rules. It's also true that those who failed to stop Mr. Foley weren't aware at the time of his most egregious conduct, the sexually explicit instant messages he sent to a former page. But if not every error in judgment is a violation, the ethics committee's approach seems to be that no error, however egregious, is.

The report chronicled errors of omission and commission -- and episodes of inexplicable forgetfulness -- that are widespread and bipartisan. It concluded that "the weight of the evidence" is that House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was warned about Mr. Foley's "overly friendly" e-mails and that Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, his denials notwithstanding, had confronted Mr. Foley about his behavior years earlier. It described how Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) didn't respond forcefully enough when told by a former page in 2000 that Mr. Foley had sent the page a sexually graphic instant message; once the scandal broke and the page asked Mr. Kolbe what he should do if questioned by authorities, Mr. Kolbe told him that "it is best that you don't even bring this up."

The committee found that the e-mails were treated -- by operatives on both sides -- as a potential political issue, not as one of moral responsibility. Assessing the conduct of Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) and House campaign committee chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), the panel found, "Like too many others, neither the Majority Leader nor Rep. Reynolds showed any curiosity regarding why a young former page would have been made uncomfortable by e-mails from Rep. Foley."

DOJ_NMG_0105296

And Democrats who obtained the e-mails, notably Democratic Caucus communications director Matt Miller, saw them as a political weapon, trying to sell the story to wary reporters.

The ethics committee concluded that none of this rose to the level of conduct that, in the words of the relevant rule, failed to reflect creditably on the House. This conclusion fails to reflect creditably on the ethics committee.

Desperately Seeking Ethics (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Watching our elected leaders in action, it's not surprising that Americans wonder if there is any limit to the crass misbehavior that members of Congress are willing to tolerate from their colleagues to protect their privileges and hold on to their own jobs. The House ethics committee answered that question yesterday with a resounding "No."

Sixty-four days after it promised to find out who knew about Representative Mark Foley's wildly inappropriate, sexually predatory behavior with teenage House pages, and why they failed to stop it, the bipartisan committee produced a report yesterday that was a 91-page exercise in cowardice.

The report's authors were clearly more concerned about protecting the members of the House than the young men and women under their charge in the page program. And they made absolutely no effort to define the high standard of behavior that should be required of all members of Congress and their staffs.

The report concludes that evidence of Mr. Foley's "creepy" interest in young male pages dated back to 1999. One woman who worked with the pages took to shadowing Mr. Foley when he was around them. The report makes clear that Mr. Foley's misconduct became known to an ever-widening circle of his colleagues and their aides, including Speaker Dennis Hastert. But no one made any serious attempt to stop Mr. Foley or reveal his misdeeds. A few urged him to cut it out, for political reasons, but did not follow up.

The committee concluded that other people preferred to remain willfully ignorant — to protect Mr. Foley's secret homosexuality, to avoid partisan embarrassment or for other political reasons.

But even after all that, the report said that none of this amounted to the sort of behavior that might discredit the House of Representatives and thus violate ethics rules. The committee, which never heard from Mr. Foley, did not call for disciplinary action against current members of the House or their staffs. The committee said those who have already left, like Mr. Foley, were no longer its problem.

The panel's justification for inaction is a breathtaking exercise in sophistry: "the requirement that House members and staff act at all times in a manner that reflects creditably on the House does not mean that every error in judgment or failure to exercise greater oversight or diligence" is a violation.

No, not every error or failure should be a violation, but certainly the ones that lead to an elected official's sexually stalking teenage boys while his colleagues turn a blind eye or cover it up should be. We'd set the bar at least there. Apparently, it's too high for the House.

Senators To Gather In Closed Meeting (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Senate Democrats, who campaigned on a pledge of more openness in government, will kick off the 110th Congress with a closed meeting of all 100 senators in the Capitol.

Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), who will be the majority leader when the new Congress convenes Jan. 4, announced yesterday "a joint caucus meeting" for senators only, to be held that morning in the old Senate chamber, a cozy, seldom-used room.

The gathering "will allow senators an opportunity to meet before the Senate is in session and before any official legislative business is considered," Reid's office said. "The American people made clear they are tired of partisanship and gridlock in Washington."

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.), who will be the minority leader, endorsed the plan.

The Senate's Democratic and Republican caucuses often meet separately and in private for lunches and meetings throughout the congressional session. But meetings of the full Senate that exclude the news media and the public are relatively rare, and most often involve matters of national security or impeachments.

Last year, Senate Democrats used a parliamentary tactic to force a brief closed session to protest delays in the intelligence committee's report on the use of classified information leading to the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0105297

Reid's staff said that the planned joint caucus will not amount to a legislative session because no business will be conducted and that it will probably occur before the new Congress officially opens. But Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, called it a bad precedent.

"When you get all 100 members of the Senate in a room, that's no longer a caucus. That's the Senate," she said. "I think the American people will see through that. I think the only way to restore public trust in what the Congress is up to is to have more transparency than less."

In their fall campaigns, which resulted in the takeover of the House and the Senate, Democrats said Republicans were insufficiently transparent in their legislative activities, and they vowed to do better. "I think it's very important we have openness," Reid said on CBS News's "Face the Nation" on Nov. 12. He called for greater congressional oversight, which "means finding out what government is doing."

Reid spokesman Jim Manley said yesterday: "All we're trying to do is establish a dialogue as we start the next Congress. . . . It's obvious from recent years that the current system is not working. We need to foster some different ways to make this place work."

Dalglish said: "If they set a precedent, it becomes easier and easier. Then they say, 'If you want us to get along and be efficient, we have to meet in secret.' "

Bipartisan Caucus Proposal Raises Questions About Barring Press (RC)

By John Stanton, Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

Incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) have proposed opening the next session of Congress with an unprecedented "caucus" meeting of the entire Senate in order to discuss areas of common agreement and a renewed bipartisan spirit, but without the eye of the public or the press.

Although Reid and McConnell came up with the idea of a bipartisan caucus meeting as a way to bring about a greater sense of bipartisanship in the Senate, it has raised questions about the appropriateness of barring the press from a meeting of the entire Senate during which lawmakers could essentially map out the year's legislative activities for the year in advance.

In recent years, Congressional leaders have come under scrutiny for putting pressure on their colleagues to vote a certain way or to drop their objections in informal meetings away from public watch — mostly notably the House Medicare vote during which GOP leaders arm-twisted conservatives on the House floor to back the bill during and the hours-long vote.

The proposed meeting appears to differ significantly from formal closed sessions of the Senate, according to two September Congressional Research Service reports. For instance, while closed-door meetings of the Senate generally occur in order to discuss either impeachment proceedings or national security issues, the bipartisan caucus meeting would involve a wide range of issues and could touch on virtually any aspect of next year's legislative work.

Additionally, closed-door sessions require that members and staff be sworn to secrecy — a requirement that spokesmen for McConnell and Reid both said would not be made during the Caucus meeting.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley rejected any possibility of impropriety and said that lawmakers would not engage in legislative negotiations. "All it is, is a chance for Members to discuss the hopes and desires to work on a bipartisan basis. Nothing more, nothing less," Manley said. He also rejected the notion that any effort to coordinate a pre-determined outcome to debates could occur during the meetings, saying, "Given the way Washington has worked in recent years, to it highly unlikely would be charitable. The fact is, it ain't going to happen."

A McConnell spokesman agreed, arguing that, "it's not an opportunity to craft legislation. It's an opportunity to get together and realize they don't all hate each other." The spokesman also pointed out that if Members were to attend a Senators-only dinner it is unlikely the same questions would be raised. "I don't think anybody would be concerned about them having a giant Senators-only dinner."

New Senate Schedules Closed Meeting (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The first thing the new, Democratic-led Senate will do next year is meet in a closed "bipartisan caucus" to help set a more pleasant tone than the relentless backbiting of the Congress now heading home, party leaders said Friday.

Far from lawmakers conducting business in secret -- as open-government advocates warn -- the meeting would serve only to sweep away grudges and smooth the way for more action, the leaders said.

DOJ_NMG_0105298

"We won't always agree but can sit down, side by side, and forge consensus on the issues important to the American people," incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in a joint statement with his Republican counterpart, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

McConnell said, "Republicans intend to be as cooperative as possible to help the Senate get off to a good start next year."

Spokesmen for the lawmakers said the meeting would not amount to a closed session of the Senate under the chamber's rules.

However, any meeting of 100 senators with rules of any kind is by definition a meeting of the Senate, said Brian Darling, director of Senate relations for The Heritage Foundation.

"It would be a de facto meeting of the Senate and although they want to call it something else, it is," Darling said.

"To set up something and to plan something between the leaders is very unusual and should be subject to open government rules," he added. "Their intentions are good, but the results of what they're doing will be not good for the American people."

The Jan. 4 meeting, to be held in the hours before the new Democratic majority formally opens the 110th Congress, will take place in the Old Senate Chamber. It would be the first meeting of the full Senate in the historic room since President Clinton's 1999 impeachment trial.

The plans were disclosed Friday, as a Congress still under Republican control was being accused by Democrats of being a "do-nothing" institution.

The gathering could establish a precedent expanding the kinds of "executive sessions" that up to now have been relatively rare.

Still, McConnell spokesman Don Stewart likened the proposal to closed weekly policy lunches that the Republican and Democratic caucuses hold separately.

"We won't be transacting legislative business," Stewart said.

The Senate met in private until 1794 in the belief that its role providing counsel to the executive branch compelled closed proceedings.

Since 1929, the Senate has held 54 closed sessions, generally for reasons of national security, according to a Sept. 27 report of the Congressional Research Service. Democrats last year forced a closed session of the Senate to discuss Iraq war intelligence.

Closed sessions of the Senate are held periodically to discuss specific, sensitive business, such as impeachment deliberations, matters of national security and sensitive communications from the president, according to the report by the Congressional Research Service.

Members and staff who attend the meetings have been prohibited from divulging details, and transcripts have not been published unless the chamber votes to release them.

Filner Captures Veterans' Affairs Gavel (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

After successfully beating back a challenge from Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine) on Friday, Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.) will become chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in the 110th Congress.

The full Democratic Caucus confirmed Filner to the post in a 112-69 vote following a brief meeting in the House Rayburn Office Building.

The Democratic Steering and Policy Committee heard from both lawmakers Thursday and voted 24-20 in favor of Filner. But the close split allowed for the full Caucus, which must ratify Steering's recommendations, to nominate candidates from the floor.

Rep. Barbara Lee (D-Calif.), who seconded Filner's nomination, cited his long service on the Veterans' Affairs panel, where he has served since his election in 1992.

"He has a passion and a sense of justice for our veterans," Lee said.

As the second-most senior member of the committee, Filner had been widely considered the obvious choice to succeed retiring Rep. Lane Evans (D-Ill). Although the Steering panel considers a variety of factors when selecting chairmen, seniority is seen widely as playing a significant role in those decisions.

Democrats have elevated the majority of their current ranking members to chairmanships in the next Congress — only the Veterans' Affairs challenge prompted a formal competition — and incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is expected to name chairmen to the House Administration Committee, Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and the Joint Committee on Taxation next week.

DOJ_NMG_0105299

McKinney's Parting Shot: Bill To Impeach Bush (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- In what was likely her final legislative act in Congress, outgoing Georgia Rep. Cynthia McKinney announced a bill Friday to impeach President Bush.

The legislation has no chance of passing and serves as a symbolic parting shot not only at Bush but also at Democratic leaders. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-California, has made clear that she will not entertain proposals to sanction Bush and has warned the liberal wing of her party against making political hay of impeachment.

McKinney, a Democrat who drew national headlines in March when she struck a Capitol police officer, has long said that Bush was never legitimately elected. In introducing her legislation in the final hours of the current Congress, she said Bush had violated his oath of office to defend the Constitution and the nation's laws.

In the bill, she accused Bush of misleading Congress on the war in Iraq and violating privacy laws with his domestic spying program.

McKinney has made no secret of her frustration with Democratic leaders since voters ousted her from office in the Democratic primary this summer. In a speech Monday at George Washington University, she accused party leaders of kowtowing to Republicans on the war in Iraq and on military mistreatment of prisoners.

McKinney, who has not discussed her career plans, has increasingly embraced her image as a controversial figure.

She has served as host for numerous panels on September 11 conspiracy theories and suggested that Bush had prior knowledge of the terrorist attacks but kept quiet about it to allow friends to profit from the aftermath. She introduced legislation to establish a permanent collection of rapper Tupac Shakur's recordings at the National Archives and calling for a federal investigation into his killing.

But it was her scuffle with a Capitol police officer that drew the most attention. McKinney struck the officer when he tried to stop her from entering a congressional office building. The officer did not recognize McKinney, who was not wearing her member lapel pin.

A grand jury in Washington declined to indict McKinney over the clash, but she eventually apologized before the House.

Billions Later, Plan To Remake The Coast Guard Fleet Stumbles (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Four years after the Coast Guard began an effort to replace nearly its entire fleet of ships, planes and helicopters, the modernization program heralded as a model of government innovation is foundering.

The initial venture — converting rusting 110-foot patrol boats, the workhorses of the Coast Guard, into more versatile 123-foot cutters — has been canceled after hull cracks and engine failures made the first eight boats unseaworthy.

Plans to build a new class of 147-foot ships with an innovative hull have been halted after the design was found to be flawed.

And the first completed new ship — a $564 million behemoth christened last month — has structural weaknesses that some Coast Guard engineers believe may threaten its safety and limit its life span, unless costly repairs are made.

The problems have helped swell the costs of the fleet-building program to a projected $24 billion, from $17 billion, and delayed the arrival of any new ships or aircraft.

That has compromised the Coast Guard's ability to fulfill its mission, which greatly expanded after the 2001 attacks to include guarding the nation's shores against terrorists. The service has been forced to cut back on patrols and, at times, ignore tips from other federal agencies about drug smugglers. The difficulties will only grow more acute in the next few years as old boats fail and replacements are not ready.

Adm. Thad W. Allen, who took over as Coast Guard commandant in May, acknowledged that the program had been troubled and said that he had begun to address the problems. "You will see changes shortly in the Coast Guard in our acquisition organization," Admiral Allen said. "It will be significantly different than we have done in the past."

The modernization effort was a bold experiment, called Deepwater, to build the equivalent of a modest navy — 91 new ships, 124 small boats, 195 new or rebuilt helicopters and planes and 49 unmanned aerial vehicles.

Instead of doing it piecemeal, the Coast Guard decided to package everything, in hopes that the fleet would be better integrated and its multibillion price would command attention from a Congress and White House traditionally more focused on other military branches. And instead of managing the project itself, the Coast Guard hired Lockheed Martin and Northrop Grumman, two of the nation's largest military contractors, to plan, supervise and deliver the new vessels and helicopters.

DOJ_NMG_0105300

Many retired Coast Guard officials, former company executives and government auditors fault that privatization model, saying it allowed the contractors at times to put their interests ahead of the Guard's.

"This is the fleecing of America," said Anthony D'Armiento, a systems engineer who has worked for Northrop and the Coast Guard on the project. "It is the worst contract arrangement I've seen in all my 20 plus years in naval engineering."

Insufficient oversight by the Coast Guard resulted in the service buying some equipment it did not want and ignoring repeated warnings from its own engineers that the boats and ships were poorly designed and perhaps unsafe, the agency acknowledged. The Deepwater program's few Congressional skeptics were outmatched by lawmakers who became enthusiastic supporters, mobilized by an aggressive lobbying campaign financed by Lockheed and Northrop.

And the contractors failed to fulfill their obligation to make sure the government got the best price, frequently steering work to their subsidiaries or business partners instead of competitors, according to government auditors and people affiliated with the program.

Even some of the smaller Deepwater projects raise questions about management. The radios placed in small, open boats were not waterproof and immediately shorted out, for example. Electronics equipment costing millions of dollars is still being installed in the new cutter, even though it will be ripped out because the Coast Guard does not want it. An order of eight small, inflatable boats cost an extra half-million dollars because the purchase passed through four layers of contractors.

For the Department of Homeland Security, which took over responsibility for the Coast Guard in 2003, Deepwater joins its already long list of troubled programs, including its airport checkpoint measures, its biodefense efforts and its widely condemned handling of the response to Hurricane Katrina.

The Homeland Security Department's inspector general has warned that the department cannot repeat this experience as it begins a $7 billion plan to tighten the border. The department is taking a similar management approach with that plan, relying on the Boeing Corporation to develop, supervise and execute the strategy.

Spokesmen for Northrop and Lockheed, and the partnership they formed to run Deepwater, declined repeated requests for interviews, saying they would leave it to the Coast Guard to discuss the project. The companies also declined to respond to written questions.

Admiral Allen said the Coast Guard engineers and procurement staff team would now play a much larger role in overseeing the project in an effort to rein in its private sector partners, adding that the mistakes made were unacceptable.

"Our people are demoralized by it, they don't deserve it, and it really impedes our ability to execute our mission," he said.

Early Warnings

On a clear, calm morning in Key West, Fla., one day last month — perfect weather for running drugs and migrants — six of the eight converted Coast Guard patrol boats were broken down or out of service. Their crews had little to do but shine the ships' already gleaming bells and clean its guns.

The Deepwater plan called for transforming the 110-foot boats into larger, more versatile cutters with rebuilt hulls, new communications and surveillance gear and a 13-foot extension to make room for a small boat launch ramp.

Even before the refurbishing began in 2003, though, Coast Guard engineers expressed doubts that the boats could bear the extra weight the changes would impose. "You could have buckling of the structure of the ship," Chris Cleary, of the Engineering Logistics Center at the Coast Guard, said he recalls pointing out. But Bollinger Shipyards, a business partner of Northrop and Lockheed, insisted the conversion would succeed.

As the work got under way, the Coast Guard provided only limited oversight. It did not fill dozens of its seats on joint management teams set up for the project. And the Coast Guard assigned seven inspectors to monitor the work, compared with 20 on a similar-size job.

"In theory, we were going drive a 110-foot cutter up to the pier, drop it off and come back in 34 weeks to pick up a 123-foot cutter," said Lt. Benjamin Fleming, the Coast Guard's representative at the shipyard in Lockport, La. "We were putting a lot of trust and faith in our partners."

Michael De Kort, a former Lockheed project manager, said the results quickly became apparent.

The VHF radio on the small launch would be exposed to the elements but was not waterproof, Mr. De Kort said. The classified communications equipment had not been properly shielded to protect messages from eavesdropping. Cameras intended to provide 360-degree surveillance had two large blind spots.

Mr. De Kort said he had repeatedly warned his Lockheed supervisors of the problems, but was rebuffed. "We have an approved design and we aren't going to change it," Mr. De Kort said he was told. He was later laid off from the company. Lockheed officials declined to comment.

In September 2004, more serious flaws in the boat conversion program became obvious after the first one, the Matagorda, was launched. As it traveled in relatively heavy seas from Key West to Miami, large cracks appeared in the hull and deck.

DOJ_NMG_0105301

Giant steel straps that looked like Band-Aids were affixed to the side of the boats, and the vessels were barred from venturing out in rough water. But cracks and bulges continued to scar the Matagorda and other converted ships, followed by a series of mechanical problems.

Bollinger, it turned out, had overestimated how much stress the modified boats could handle, a miscalculation it cannot fully explain. “The computer broke for some reason,” said T. R. Hamlin, a senior Bollinger manager. “Whether it was a power surge or something, who knows?” The cursory oversight by the Coast Guard meant the mistake was not caught in time.

After spending about $100 million on the first eight boats, the Coast Guard suspended the conversion plan. Last week, Admiral Allen ordered the boats taken out of service, citing concerns about crew safety.

Facing a shortage of patrol boats, the contractors and the Coast Guard decided to speed development of a larger ship, the Fast Response Cutter. The hull was to be built from glass-reinforced plastic, known as a composite, something never tried on a large American military ship.

While acknowledging that it might cost much more to build the 58 planned cutters with composite hulls instead of steel, Northrop and Lockheed claimed the boats would last longer and require less maintenance, saving money over the long run.

Coast Guard engineers again were doubtful that Northrop’s design would work, citing concerns about weight, hull shape and fuel consumption. The Coast Guard also found inconsistencies in the cost data Northrop used to justify the new hull.

One former Northrop executive said the company was pushing the plan not because it was in the best interest of the Coast Guard, but because Northrop had just spent $64 million to turn its shipyard in Gulfport, Miss., into the country’s first large-scale composite hull manufacturing plant for military ships.

“It was a pure business decision,” said the former executive, who disagreed with the plan and would speak only anonymously for fear of retribution. “And it was the wrong one.”

That became clear when a scale model of the Fast Response Cutter was placed in a tank of water — and flunked the test. After three years and $38 million, Northrop Grumman’s plan was suspended.

Financial Aid

The Coast Guard recognized from the start that it might need help financing a project as big as Deepwater, and that was part of the reason it turned to Lockheed and Northrop.

“They have armies of lobbyists, they can help get dollars to get the job done,” explained Jim McEntire, a retired captain who had served as a senior Coast Guard budget official. “The White House and Congress listen to big industrial concerns.”

That assistance would prove valuable. Just months after the contract was awarded in June 2002 through a competitive bidding process, the Coast Guard began to study whether the $17 billion Deepwater budget would be inadequate, given additional costs for antiterrorism equipment. In 2005, the service informed Congress that the program would cost $24 billion over 20 years and that the annual allocation would need to double, to $1 billion.

By then, though, the patrol boat conversion had been halted. Deepwater’s costs were ballooning, but the Coast Guard was having a hard time explaining exactly how it would spend more money. Government auditors were starting to churn out reports warning of serious management weaknesses.

That record disturbed some members of Congress. In May 2005, the House Appropriations Committee slashed the program’s annual budget request nearly in half to register its frustration.

At a hearing two months later, Representative Harold Rogers, a Kentucky Republican who oversees the Homeland Security budget, instructed the Coast Guard to fix its problems and restrain costs. “You simply took the most expensive, all-inclusive Cadillac Seville and we’re going to have to, with our limited funds, fit you into something a bit more appropriate,” Mr. Rogers said. “I hope it’s more than a Chevrolet.”

To fight back, the Coast Guard and contractors relied on Congressional allies, led by Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine, Representative Frank A. LoBiondo, Republican of New Jersey, and Representative Gene Taylor, Democrat of Mississippi.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. LoBiondo had formed a group called the Congressional Coast Guard Caucus. It began in the late 1990s with 4 members and today has more than 75.

The enthusiasm of the three leaders for the Deepwater project was not simply about meeting the Coast Guard’s needs. Maine is home to Bath Iron Works, a major ship builder that Ms. Snowe said might benefit from increased Deepwater spending. While that was a factor, she said it was not her primary motivation.

Ms. Snowe and Mr. LoBiondo, the leaders of the Senate and House panels that oversee the Coast Guard, said they pushed for more spending only after the service’s leaders reassured them during hearings that they were addressing the program’s problems. They both also said they were convinced that the Coast Guard desperately needed Deepwater because its helicopter engines were routinely breaking down and the hulls of old ships were failing.

DOJ_NMG_0105302

"We don't want to waste money; we don't want ineffective programs," Ms. Snowe said in an interview. "At the same time, we can't allow the Coast Guard to languish."

Mr. Taylor's district is home to Northrop Grumman's shipyard in Pascagoula, Miss., which is building the Coast Guard's largest ship, and Northrop and its employees are one of his biggest sources of campaign contributions. He worked along with two key Republicans in Mississippi — Senator Trent Lott, whose father was once a pipe fitter at the Pascagoula shipyard, and Senator Thad Cochran, the chairman of the Senate appropriations committee — to win more money.

Mr. LoBiondo's district is home to the Coast Guard's national training center, and Lockheed Martin built its Deepwater equipment testing center just outside his district. He is also one of the top Congressional recipients of Lockheed contributions.

The contractors ran advertisements aimed at lawmakers in Washington publications, delivering ominous messages about the need to stop terrorists before they reach American shores. The Navy League, a nonprofit group partly financed by Lockheed and Northrop, orchestrated telephone calls, letters and visits to lawmakers, reminding them that hundreds of contractors across the country were already working as suppliers on the project.

And the Coast Guard got an important boost when it was widely praised for its helicopter rescues after Hurricane Katrina.

The lobbying effort paid off. In September 2005, Congress agreed to increase the annual financing for Deepwater to nearly $1 billion.

Late Scramble

If there was a single ship that could prove to skeptics that the Coast Guard and its contractors could get the job done right, it would be the National Security Cutter, a ship unlike anything the Coast Guard had ever built. Bigger than any existing cutter, it was more like a warship, designed to patrol with Navy vessels.

It would carry sophisticated weapons systems, surveillance equipment, a helicopter and two unmanned aerial vehicles, all vital in its effort to intercept boats suspected of carrying terrorists, drug dealers or illegal immigrants. It was designed to monitor 56,000 square miles a day, an area four times as large as that covered by any other Coast Guard ship.

Because the ship was so expensive — each was expected to cost about $300 million — the Coast Guard decided to build only 8 to replace its fleet of 12 large cutters.

There was just one catch. Even before the cutter began taking form at the Pascagoula shipyard on the Gulf of Mexico, familiar problems cropped up.

The Coast Guard's engineers believed the design proposed by Northrop and Lockheed had serious structural flaws that could result in the hull collapsing or premature cracking of the hull and deck, according to Mr. Cleary and his boss, Rubin Sheinberg, chief of the Coast Guard's naval architecture branch.

When they alerted the contractors and Coast Guard officials, they were largely brushed off, the men said. In March 2004, their supervisor protested, saying the Coast Guard should delay construction.

"Significant problems persist with the structural design," Rear Adm. Erroll M. Brown wrote to the Deepwater project director. "Several of these problems compromise the safety and the viability of the hull, possibly resulting in structural failure and unacceptable hull vibration."

The Coast Guard decided to move ahead anyway, figuring it would be less disruptive to fix any problems later. As the shipbuilding progressed, other Coast Guard officials began to openly complain that some decisions by the contractors appeared to be motivated by a drive to increase profits, not to best serve the Coast Guard.

Lockheed, for example, ordered computerized consoles for the ship that it had developed for a Navy aircraft carrier. But they were too big for the cutter, said Jay A. Creech, a retired Coast Guard captain working as a contractor on Deepwater.

A consultant hired by the Coast Guard to review Northrop and Lockheed's purchasing decisions found that of $210 million worth of contracts awarded in 2004, just 30 percent involved a formal competitive process. Northrop in particular was faulted for failing to aggressively seek bids to ensure the best price.

Northrop and Lockheed "lack the independence needed to make objective decisions in the best interests of the Coast Guard," an August 2006 report by the Homeland Security inspector general said.

Others say that giving the contractors so much authority was a mistake from the start. "A contractor with a profit motive is never a trusted agent," said Joe Ryan, a Coast Guard consultant who has helped with the Deepwater project. "They are the vendor, and they are selling you something."

Problems began to accumulate elsewhere. In Texas, a prototype of the unmanned aerial vehicle that was to be placed on the ship's deck crashed this year. After the crash, the project, by Bell Helicopter, also faced a money crunch and was put on hold, pushing delivery back to at least 2013, six years after the first national security cutter is scheduled for active duty. Without the two aerial vehicles, the cutter's surveillance range is reduced by more than half.

DOJ_NMG_0105303

By the time the ship was christened last month, its price had grown to $564 million, nearly twice its original cost. (The average price for the eight ships is expected to be $431 million.) And by then, Coast Guard officials had conceded that the ship had structural flaws. Navy experts had evaluated the ship and confirmed many of the earlier warnings.

Admiral Allen said he had been given assurances that the ship was not at risk of a catastrophic hull failure and would not pose a safety threat to its crew. But the Coast Guard has decided to make structural modifications to the vessel and require design changes for the third cutter. Work is too far along to change course on the second cutter.

Four years into the Deepwater project, the Coast Guard, according to its original plan, was supposed to have 26 new or rebuilt ships, 12 new planes and 8 unmanned vehicles, but none are available. Now, officials are scrambling to find an off-the-shelf design for a new cutter and make modest repairs to keep their aging patrol boats operable.

"We don't have the ships we need, and we don't have a way to get them anytime soon," said Representative David R. Obey, Democrat of Wisconsin, who will take over the House Appropriations Committee next month. "It's inexcusable."

The Coast Guard, which would not disclose the management fees it has paid Northrop and Lockheed, is renegotiating the contract to ensure that the companies honor a commitment to open the work to competition and deliver what they promise.

And Admiral Allen and other Coast Guard officials say the Coast Guard's engineers are being given more power to supervise the work. Admiral Allen is also creating a division to oversee the procurement and maintenance of its ships and airplanes. "That is the main gap that needs to be closed," he said.

The Deepwater experiment, one contracting expert said, underscores the need for the Coast Guard to be a smart buyer, even if it has hired high-priced advice.

"The government still needs to be in there so they know what decisions are being made and if the decisions are in their best interest," said Michele Mackin, an assistant director at the Government Accountability Office. "It is still their money. And they are going to be flying the planes and running the ships."

Federal Budget Tricky Checks And Balances (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Bush administration officials have begun grappling with one of the toughest tasks they face over the next two years: How to both protect the president's tax cuts and put the federal budget deficit on a sustainable path.

They will get a new measure of just how hard that will be on Tuesday, when the Treasury Department releases its latest budget tally. The numbers likely will show little progress in shrinking the deficit despite a growing economy. For the first two months of the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, the government is expected to show a deficit of about $122 billion -- $9 billion less than the same period last year.

Showing progress on the deficit is crucial as the White House heads toward early February. That is when it is due to release the budget for fiscal-year 2008, which begins Oct. 1, 2007. Its big challenge will be to squeeze in spending for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the rising costs of Medicare and the expanding, Bush-backed tax cuts -- without making the previously projected deficit of $188 billion for 2008 look worse.

With Democrats in control, President Bush is both on the defensive in making his tax cuts permanent and facing pressure from his fellow Republicans to show a path toward spending restraint. "This will be the tightest budget the president proposes, as well as the most difficult Congress he will face in passing a budget," says Brian Riedl of the conservative Heritage Foundation.

The White House has to decide which tax breaks to throw in the budget and which to leave out on the assumption that Congress will deal with them. The budget will assume that the tax cuts, which expire in 2009 and 2010, will become permanent, though nothing needs to happen during the crucial 2008 election year to ensure that. Extending tax breaks next year will be tougher than in the past if Democrats stick to their pledge to offset the cost with other tax increases or spending cuts.

Some moves have bipartisan support, such as preventing the alternative minimum tax -- a backstop designed to stop the rich from avoiding any taxes -- from taking ever-bigger bites out of the wallets of middle-class taxpayers. But the Bush budget likely will be silent, again, on how to resolve that permanently.

Spending on Iraq and Afghanistan is particularly thorny. So far, those costs haven't been part of the regular budget process, haven't been fully reflected in White House budgets or deficit projections and have been funded through special appropriations bills. But Democrats are expected to demand that Mr. Bush change that. They got a boost this past week from the report by the Baker-Hamilton commission, which said "the normal budget process should not be circumvented" and urged the White House to include Iraq funding in the 2008 budget.

"It's going to be tough for them," says Douglas Holtz-Eakin, a former Congressional Budget Office director who recently enlisted with Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign. But with Democrats in control, he notes, the White House also has the time-honored option of sending up a budget that would essentially be "dead on arrival."

DOJ_NMG_0105304

Jobs Data Keep Economic Optimists Smiling (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Solid hiring and an unemployment rate still near a five-year low reinforced the upbeat view of optimists, including the Federal Reserve, that the economy is weathering the downturn in the housing and automotive sectors.

Payrolls outside agriculture rose by 132,000 jobs last month, and revisions added 42,000 jobs to previous payroll estimates for September and October, so monthly gains in the past three months have remained near this year's average of 149,000. The unemployment rate edged up slightly to 4.5% in November from 4.4%. Unrounded, the increase was even smaller: from 4.42% to 4.47%.

Layoffs in construction and manufacturing -- in particular, the auto industry -- were more than offset by gains in business services, health care and tourism, the Labor Department said.

"This just confirms what the Fed's been thinking," said Drew Matus, senior economist at Lehman Brothers in New York. "The economy is currently experiencing weakness in two specific sectors, and the weakness hasn't spread."

Mr. Matus expects the current slowdown, with economic growth of an annualized 2% to 3%, slightly below its normal range, to continue well into next year, as the housing and auto sectors slowly recover.

Futures markets have priced in a total of three-quarters of a percentage point in rate cuts in the next year on the view the Fed will have to come to the rescue of a weakening economy. But Joshua Shapiro, chief U.S. economist at MFR Inc., said Friday's "goldilocks" report would make the Fed "increasingly comfortable" with keeping the federal-funds rate at 5.25% -- charged on overnight loans between banks -- when it meets next week. Indeed, investors trimmed the odds of rate cuts a bit Friday.

Until recently, economists widely assumed a normally expanding economy would need to create 150,000 jobs a month to keep up with the increase in the working-age population. Growth above that would push the unemployment rate lower, and growth below that would push it higher.

But with population growth slowing, the work force aging, and women entering the labor market at a slower pace, Fed economists now think monthly job growth of only about 110,000 is sufficient to keep unemployment stable.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke last month cited "tight" labor markets as a potential inflation threat. November's healthy job growth and an unemployment rate still below where Fed officials expected it to be at this point mean those concerns are unlikely to ease soon.

Indeed, a tight labor market is still pushing up wages. Average hourly earnings rose 0.2% in November, and were 4.1% higher than a year ago, giving a boost to "real," or inflation-adjusted, wages.

Roger Taylor, vice president of strategic staffing for insurer MetLife Inc., said wages of new hires in many auditing, actuarial and management positions are up between 8% and 10% from a year ago. "It's been a bit harder to find the quality of skills we're looking for in the available labor pool," Mr. Taylor said. "It's costing us more to get the talent we're looking for."

In recent years, Mr. Taylor said the company has typically hired around 4,000 people for nonsales positions. This year it is on track to bring on 5,000 new hires.

Business and professional services -- such as accountants, management consultants and architects -- added 43,000 jobs last month and more than 400,000 in the past year. The auditing firm Deloitte & Touche USA has added 10,000 workers in the past year, and plans to do the same in the year ahead. Among the positions it is filling are managers and senior managers for its consulting and tax practices.

By contrast, manufacturers cut 15,000 jobs last month, and construction companies pared 29,000 workers from their payrolls. Zoltan Pozsar, an economist with Moody's Economy.com, estimates that there have been roughly 126,000 housing-related jobs lost since June, but that the economy has added nearly one million nonhousing-related positions in that period.

Meanwhile, the University of Michigan's survey of consumer sentiment declined slightly to 90.2 in early December from 92.1 in November. Assessments of current conditions improved, but the outlook for the economy down the road worsened. Economists said they still expect consumers to keep spending enough to keep the economy expanding, particularly if the labor market continues to lift incomes.

Labor Pool Increases, Boosting Joblessness (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Sometimes, an uptick in unemployment can be good news.

DOJ_NMG_0105305

The jobless rate edged up to 4.5 percent in November from 4.4 percent in October -- but not primarily because of layoffs. The rate rose as hundreds of thousands of Americans who had previously dropped out of the labor force poured back in, drawn by brightening employment prospects. Most of them found work.

So the number of unemployed workers rose, but the number with jobs grew by more than twice as much, the Labor Department reported yesterday.

There was bad news last month for many workers. Home builders and manufacturers cut thousands of jobs, reflecting primarily the slumps in real estate and automobile production. But those losses were more than offset by the number of jobs gained in retailing, health care, education, finance and other service industries.

Employers added a net 132,000 workers to their payrolls last month, compared with a gain of 79,000 the month before. Wages for most workers rose modestly.

Yesterday's figures added to other recent signs that the economy is slowing because of the auto and housing industries, but their problems have not spilled over into other industries, analysts said. "The rest of the economy remains incredibly strong," said Eugenio J. AlemÃ¡n, senior economist at Wells Fargo.

Other analysts were more skeptical, saying the labor market is bound to weaken as the economy slows. "The shake-out in housing-related employment is likely to get a lot worse in the coming months," said Paul Ashworth, senior economist with Capital Economics.

Stock prices rose yesterday on hopes that a solid job market will fuel steady increases in consumer spending and profits. The employment report also strengthened many investors' expectations that the Federal Reserve will leave short-term interest rates unchanged when policymakers meet Tuesday.

Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said last month that the central bank remained concerned about rising labor costs and would consider raising interest rates again if necessary to tame inflation.

Bernanke's worries should ease somewhat. Workers' wages rose more slowly in November than in October, analysts said. Average hourly earnings rose 0.2 percent in November, to $16.94, and were 4.1 percent higher last month than a year earlier.

The combination of rising wages and plentiful jobs helped lure more people to the U.S. labor force last month. The labor force includes all those who hold jobs or who are actively looking for work.

That share of the adult population in the labor force -- called the participation rate -- rose in November to 66.3 percent, the highest since mid-2003. The record, 67.3 percent, was reached in early 2000, at the crest of the stock-market bubble.

The participation rate tends to rise in good times and fall in bad times, when workers get discouraged about their prospects and give up looking for work.

The unemployment rate -- the share of the labor force without jobs -- remains low by historical standards, but many analysts expect it to rise in coming months because of slowing economic growth.

US Jobs Data Support Bernanke's Optimism (FT)

By Krishna Guha, Eoin Callan, Tony Tassell

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

Ben Bernanke's optimism that the US economy is heading for a soft landing received a lift on Friday as data showing strong job creation last month forced more pessimistic bond investors into retreat.

The figures showed employers added more staff to payrolls than expected as 132,000 jobs were created, in spite of a slowdown in sectors such as construction.

The Fed thinks the market has over-reacted to recent negative data, and Friday's figures will encourage Mr Bernanke in his view that the economy overall remains reasonably robust, in spite of the drag from housing and some weakness in manufacturing.

Meanwhile, Hank Paulson hardened his rhetoric on China's currency ahead of leading a delegation of top US economic policymakers including Mr Bernanke to Beijing next week.

The Treasury secretary told CNBC "the rest of the world is not going to tolerate China taking too long to make the sort of adjustments in the currency that need to be made".

The dollar closed higher against the euro and the yen, with traders citing the strong jobs data and Mr Paulson's remarks on China.

The tougher talk from the Treasury secretary follows fresh pressure this week from Democrats in Congress and US manufacturers not to soft-pedal on the currency at next week's talks.

Mr Paulson advocates a long term strategic approach to dealing with China, but aides say he understands the need to show this approach is delivering results.

A Treasury official said on Friday that the currency would be a "key element" of next week's talks.

DOJ_NMG_0105306

However, he said the dialogue would cover a wider range of long term issues relating to the rebalancing of China's economy and its integration with the world economy.

The official hinted that the summit could commission high-level bilateral working groups to look at issues such as energy security and the environment.

Intellectual property, financial sector liberalisation and cross-border investment flows will also be on the agenda, with China worried about opposition to its acquisition of US assets.

Analysts said the US labour market data, which also gave some evidence of rising cost pressures, will prompt hawks on the Fed to argue that inflation remains a greater risk to the economy than a sharp slowdown.

The Fed is expected to keep interest rates on hold at its next policy meeting on Tuesday.

Bond markets have been pricing in a harder downturn than the Fed expects, betting it will be forced to cut rates in the first half of next year.

But more pessimistic investors scaled back their expectations of an imminent rate cut in the light of the new data. Futures markets were on Friday pricing in a 28 per cent chance of a quarter-point cut in the Fed funds rate by April, down from 45 per cent the day before.

Quincy Krosby, strategist for the Hartford financial services group, said the data shows "a gently slowing economy but not one that is falling off a cliff."

As Oil Stays High, Stocks Can't Get Going (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

As oil spigots flow freely, cash often pours into the stock market.

Both have dried up a bit lately. An October production cut by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries has worked surprisingly well to prop up the commodity's price and stocks haven't moved ahead of recent highs.

The price of crude oil has jumped 5.2% since the Dow Jones Industrial Average hit a record on Nov. 17, as weekly reports from the federal Energy Information Administration have shown drawdowns in U.S. stockpiles of crude and fuels refined from it. On Friday, crude futures jumped $1.16 in morning trading, but finished the day off 46 cents, or 0.7%, at $62.03 a barrel, up 1.6% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"A year ago, no one thought oil prices would be above $60 at this point," said energy analyst Fadel Gheit, of brokerage firm Oppenheimer & Co. "But what OPEC has done is demonstrate to the market that it is not bluffing, that it won't allow a repeat of 1998," when crude prices crashed.

Meanwhile, the Dow hasn't been able to push through its peak close, after setting a series of new records starting in early October. Although the blue-chip average rose 29.08 points, or 0.2% Friday, to 12307.49, it was hobbled in part by traders placing bets ahead of Thursday's meeting of the OPEC, which may announce another output cut. The Dow ended the week up 0.9%, but 35.07 points below its record.

With winter-energy demand likely to pick up in the U.S. and concerns lingering about war and political wrangling in major oil-producing countries, many commodity analysts don't see much room for prices to head significantly lower, as stock investors might hope. Higher energy prices tend to hurt stocks because higher costs for things like home heating oil and gasoline cut into consumers' purchasing power and, in turn, corporate profits.

Still, major market measures are up solidly for the year, with the Dow ahead nearly 15%, the S&P 500 up almost 13% and Nasdaq up nearly 11%. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 2.55 points, or 0.2% Friday, to end at 1409.84, up 0.9% on the week. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.4%, or 9.67 points, to 2437.36, up 1% on the week.

Energy prices are an important piece of an economic puzzle that will help determine the Federal Reserve's next move on interest rates, something else stock investors are watching closely because higher borrowing costs hit both consumers and businesses. As investors have tried to guess the central bank's likelihood of raising its benchmark rate target to keep inflation in check or cutting it to encourage growth, they have been confounded lately by mixed data on economic growth and manufacturing activity.

Jobs data released by the Labor Department on Friday were surprisingly strong. For November, nonfarm payrolls rose by 132,000 jobs, exceeding Wall Street's expectation for a rise of 110,000 jobs. The unemployment rate rose to 4.5% from 4.4%, in line with expectations.

The data confirmed many investors' belief that while economic growth is slowing, the decline in growth is gradual, which will minimize trauma to everyday workers and consumers and could encourage the Fed to keep rates stable. The rise in unemployment, obviously, is bad news for most people. But the total increase in jobs was good news.

DOJ_NMG_0105307

Some think the economic data mean good news for stocks going forward. "There's still a lot of uncertainty about the economy ahead," said strategist Douglas Peta of investment-management firm J&W Seligman.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 1.4 billion shares, as 711 million advanced and 622 million declined.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year note fell 18/32 point, or $5.63 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.56%. The 30-year bond fell 29/32 to yield 4.67%.

The dollar strengthened. It rose to 116.35 yen, compared with 115.25 yen Thursday. The euro fell to $1.3204 from $1.3286.

The Accidental Inflation Hawk (WSJ)

By Marc Sumerlin

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

There are no Gentlemen C's in central banking. The costs of monetary policy mistakes are so large that you tend to be right or wrong. With this in mind, Ben Bernanke deserves an A for his first year as chairman of the Federal Reserve. The Bernanke Fed hasn't always been graceful or elegant, but it has been mostly right.

Mr. Bernanke started off with a stumble last April, testifying awkwardly that he might choose to stop raising rates even if inflation were at risk of accelerating. This statement, combined with his past fretting about deflation, led markets to question his fortitude on preventing inflation. Long-term inflation expectations promptly rose by 20 basis points. The chairman regained his footing with a hawkish speech two weeks later and two more rate hikes on the Federal Funds rate in May and June, bringing the rate to 5.25%. The hike in June wasn't an obvious one given the fragility in global financial markets, which had lost $5 trillion in value over the preceding seven weeks, due in part to diminished confidence in the new Fed chairman. But markets digested the last rate hike with only a bit of consternation and no more genuine turmoil.

At this point, it would have been tempting to go for another rate hike in August. A legitimate strategy for a new chairman is to build up inflation-fighting capital early in his term so that he can spend it when needed. In fact, a risk-weighted analysis of Mr. Bernanke's personal survival would have argued for hiking in August and cutting later if needed. But Mr. Bernanke appears to make fact-based decisions rather than strategy-based decisions. In this, the facts were slightly on the side of a pause. A seasoned chairman with ample credibility would surely have taken a break to see how the lagged impact of past rate increases was working.

By the August FOMC meeting, it was clear that the housing sector had rolled over. It was also clear from the size of the housing bubble, from an examination of historic corrections, and from collecting anecdotes, that the housing slide was going to be with us for years not months. In effect, the desired growth slowdown had been accomplished, likely with the move to a 5% federal-funds rate in May. Mr. Bernanke had gone one further, but a modest overshoot is almost always needed from a practical standpoint.

Still, the decision to pause was not obvious. While economic growth was decelerating, there were no signs at that point that inflation was coming under control. In fact, wages were accelerating according to the available data, which usually gives a central bank more room to tighten. What is most amazing in retrospect is that the first Fed chairman ever to advocate inflation targeting was pausing as inflation was high and possibly accelerating. A key critique of inflation targeting -- one to which I still subscribe -- is that the target could in practice lessen the Fed's ability to look far down the road. But in this case, Mr. Bernanke was not a slave to the latest figures and bet that inflation would subside. So while a belief in inflation targeting has not added value to the decision-making process, it hasn't done any harm so far.

At the time, many bond market participants were not impressed with the pause and started to question Mr. Bernanke's resilience again. The behind-the-back whispers were perceptible. Then a curious and unpredictable thing happened. Inflation stopped accelerating. After four months of hot data, prices started to behave better. Spot oil prices plunged after a gratefully mundane hurricane season, taking some pressure off headline inflation. I'm not sure if Mr. Bernanke is also a skilled weather forecaster, but he may be the first person to simultaneously predict the weather and the economy accurately. It's still not clear why prices outside of energy stopped accelerating -- the tightness of the labor markets and other facts in early August pointed to continued inflation trouble. But whether Mr. Bernanke was lucky or not is now beside the point for workers and investors who benefited from his call. Global equities started another long rally that more than made up for the springtime losses.

The upcoming December FOMC meeting will mark the fourth straight gathering without a change in monetary policy. That is proof in and of itself that Mr. Bernanke's decision to pause was reasonable. It is not, however, proof that Fed policy is correctly calibrated going forward.

DOJ_NMG_0105308

Since the August pause, the housing and domestic auto industries have fallen into recession, and importantly, wage gains have been revised down. The bond market, the stock market and the currency markets are all betting that the Fed's next rate move will be down, even though the Fed tries to tell markets at every chance that a hike is more likely. The disconnect with the bond market is so large that Mr. Bernanke could wrap up his first full year with as much as a 100-basis-point inversion in the yield curve. Yet the tightening of policy relative to reality has created a stance sufficiently hawkish to rebuild inflation-fighting capital -- a welcome strategic development. In a sense, Mr. Bernanke has become an accidental hawk. This fortuitously earned capital is especially timely with the economy below its long-run sustainable growth rate. After all, a central banker never knows when he will need to cash in some chips.

Mr. Sumerlin is managing director of the Lindsey Group.

FDA Panel Seeks Warning That Stents May Be Unsafe (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

New drug-oozing stents widely used to prop open clogged arteries are associated with an increased risk of blood clots, heart attacks and death for the majority of patients receiving the devices, an expert panel concluded yesterday.

Based on the finding, the special 21-member Food and Drug Administration panel recommended that the agency issue new warnings to doctors and patients that the devices' safety has not been established except for relatively low-risk patients, for whom the stents were originally tested and approved.

"If you use the device outside that indication, you're going to have a higher incidence of complications," said William H. Maisel of the Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, who chaired the panel.

The panel stressed that the tiny metal-lattice struts, known as drug-eluting stents, offer advantages over older bare-metal versions for some patients, with the benefits outweighing the risks for the relatively healthy patients for whom the devices have been tested.

It remains unclear whether the devices are causing the complications in other patients; the side effects could be occurring because these patients tend to be sicker. But panel members concluded that until that question can be answered, doctors and patients should be alerted about the potential risks. Several members said they hoped that would make doctors more cautious about using the devices.

"Let's be more judicious about this. Let's be less indiscriminate," said Eric J. Topol of the Scripps Clinic in San Diego.

The panel also recommended that patients who have the stents take anti-clotting drugs for at least a year.

More than 6 million people worldwide have gotten the drug-coated devices, including perhaps 3 million in the United States. At least 800,000 new patients get them each year, making the stents the most common device used to treat heart disease and one of the most common medical procedures of any kind. The panel's recommendations apply to at least 60 percent of those patients.

The FDA is not bound to follow the recommendations, but an official said the agency would respond rapidly.

"There may be things that can be done relatively quickly," the FDA's Daniel G. Schultz said, noting that the warning could take the form of changes in the devices' labels and letters to doctors and patients.

The recommendations came on the second day of a sometimes contentious two-day meeting the FDA urgently convened to determine whether the risks of the devices outweigh the benefits.

The panel concluded that although the devices, compared with older bare-metal versions, may increase the risk of blood clots, drug-eluting stents do not appear to increase the overall risk of heart attacks and strokes when used in the kind of patients for whom they were originally intended. But a majority of patients get them "off-label," or not as intended, and tend to be sicker and have more-complicated conditions, such as diabetes, multiple blockages and blockages in narrower arteries.

In a packed hotel room in Gaithersburg yesterday, the panel listened to presentations from researchers from California, Illinois, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Washington and elsewhere who analyzed the latest data from large registries of patients who had received the stents since they were introduced three years ago. Although the results were mixed, several analyses found an increased risk of blood clots, deaths and heart attacks.

"Do we have evidence that the safety-efficacy balance might be different in the off-label? I think we've heard enough to suggest that that's the case," said Steven Nissen of the Cleveland Clinic.

More than 1 million U.S. heart patients undergo procedures every year to have blocked arteries opened with tiny balloons, after which stents are implanted to keep the vessels open. Scar tissue often grows around the stents, however, narrowing the arteries again and requiring patients to undergo the procedure repeatedly or to have bypass surgery.

DOJ_NMG_0105309

The newer stents are coated with a polymer impregnated with drugs that are released slowly, inhibiting scar-tissue growth. Because the devices were shown to be highly effective, they were hailed as a major advance and quickly replaced bare-metal versions for most patients, though the newer stents were tested on and approved for only low-risk patients.

The FDA called for the meeting after studies looking at patients outside tightly controlled clinical trials indicated that a year or more after implantation, patients with drug-coated stents faced increased risks compared with those with bare-metal models. Some researchers have estimated the newer devices might be causing thousands of heart attacks and deaths a year.

Some researchers, along with Boston Scientific Corp. and Johnson & Johnson, which make the two drug-eluting stents sold domestically, say any risks from the devices are offset by the reduced need for repeated procedures and bypass surgery, which carry their own risks.

Patients who get the stents had been advised to take aspirin and the drug Plavix for three to six months to reduce the risk of blood clots. Recent studies have indicated that patients may need to take the drugs longer, perhaps indefinitely. But Plavix is expensive and increases the risk of serious bleeding.

How Doctors Are Rethinking Drug-Coated Stents (WSJ)

By Ron Winslow, Anna Wilde Mathews

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Heart experts examining popular drug-coated stents in federal hearings this week concluded that safety concerns so far don't warrant restrictions in their use. But cardiologists already are changing the way they treat patients, rethinking when to use the devices and how to alter follow-up care.

Enthusiasm for the stents, small mesh tubes that prop open diseased arteries, was so immediate that within a year of their introduction in 2003, they had taken the place of their more-established bare-metal predecessors in 80% of an estimated one million stent patients. Unlike bare-metal stents, they prevent reclogging.

The vast majority of patients who have a coated stent won't experience a problem. But in recent months, long-term studies and real-world experience have yielded evidence that in rare instances the newer devices may trigger potentially fatal blood clots, years after they are implanted. That prompted the Food and Drug Administration to convene a panel of experts, which after two days of hearings stopped short of calling for major changes in how doctors use the devices.

It has become a common tension in medicine: New treatments -- especially those featuring advanced technology -- are rapidly adopted for their benefits before their risks are fully understood.

More doctors already say they are looking closer at heart patients, and in some cases going back to bare-metal stents, which are more likely to result in reclogged arteries that often require more stents or even bypass surgery. Doctors also are asking patients to take the blood-thinner Plavix for much longer than the three-to-six months currently recommended, in order to keep clots from forming in the weeks after the devices are implanted. But prolonged medication carries risks of its own.

"I wouldn't see necessarily a big shift away from using drug-eluting stents," said Christopher Cannon, a cardiologist at Brigham & Women's Hospital and Harvard Medical School in Boston. "But a more thoughtful and discriminate approach does seem useful."

The FDA panel seemed satisfied after this week's hearings that, based on data available, the risk of heart attack and death with the drug-coated stents isn't significantly higher than with the bare-metal devices -- at least when used in accordance with their FDA-approved instructions. Those cover only patients with relatively simple conditions, involving a single arterial blockage without complications such as a heart attack.

Friday, the committee signaled far more concern about patients who don't fit that profile -- at least 60% of those receiving drug-coated stents, by the FDA's estimate. For these "off label" patients, with more complicated problems such as multiple blockages, several committee members said they worried there isn't enough evidence to be sure when the benefits of the stents outweighed their potential risks.

"I don't think we have enough data at all to say that the other [off-label] reasons for putting in a drug-eluting stent are safe and effective," said Norman Kato, a committee member who is a doctor in the Cardiac Care Medical Group in Encino, Calif.

Other committee members disagreed. Some called for stronger warning language against the wider use, and others, arguing there is no concrete reason to stop using the stents in particular types of patients, suggested milder options.

In a news conference concluding the two days of meetings, William Maisel, the panel's chairman and a doctor at Beth Israel Deaconess Medical Center in Boston, suggested the FDA should put language into the stents' labels warning that their use in such "off label" situations may be associated with a higher risk of clotting, heart attacks and death compared with the simpler, on-label situations.

The agency's next step isn't completely clear in this case because the panel's views on regulatory actions were vague and somewhat divided. Daniel Schultz, head of the agency's device center, said the FDA understands it needs "to do a better job...communicating to patients and communicating to doctors the best and the latest information that we know," but it isn't clear what combination of label changes, letters or other means it would use. The agency also will consider panel members' call for more-complete data on the stents in examining the designs of approval studies, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105310

Bare-metal stents transformed treatment of heart patients when they were introduced in 1994, but their tendency to reclog with scar tissue left 15% to 30% of patients needing additional procedures or even bypass surgery to relieve chest pain and help avoid heart attacks.

The two drug-coated versions in the U.S., marketed by Johnson & Johnson and Boston Scientific Corp., significantly stanch the growth of scar tissue and reduce the need for repeat procedures to less than 3% -- a result that led to their rapid adoption by cardiologists.

"Overall, the drug-eluting stents are very effective," says William O'Neill, executive dean for clinical affairs at University of Miami School of Medicine and an interventional cardiologist. "But there's no free lunch."

After the FDA panel's meeting, Boston Scientific Chief Medical and Scientific Officer Donald Baim said that while the company's data show "more adverse events in more complex patients," it believes the drug-coated stent "still compares favorably to alternative treatment options such as bypass surgery." Johnson & Johnson's Cordis unit said it believes the evidence it presented "supports the efficacy and safety" of its stent, and the company will continue to support clinical trials.

The FDA advisory panel stopped short of recommending extended use of Plavix and aspirin to 12 months or longer to prevent clots for routine cases but generally endorsed recommendations for that strategy for off-label uses.

Cardiologists say that making sure patients withstand or afford such a regimen for a year or longer is a critical factor in determining whether to treat them with a drug-coated stent.

"If you can't take [Plavix and aspirin] or if you can't pay for it, the bare-metal stent should be the chief option," said Robert Califf, head of Duke University's Duke Translational Medicine Institute in Durham, N.C. "That's abundantly clear."

It isn't clear how long patients need to stay on the drug to maintain protection against a clot, and there are other important concerns -- including the cost of the drug -- associated with its long-term use.

Kevin Graham, director of preventive cardiology at Minneapolis Heart Institute in Minnesota, said a patient in his practice stopped taking Plavix three-and-a-half years after getting a drug-coated stent and within a month, she had suffered a heart attack from a clot in the device.

A large observational study of nearly 4,700 patients, published online by the Journal of the American Medical Association this week, showed patients who got a drug-coated stent and stayed on Plavix had the lowest risk of death, heart attack or procedures to clear obstructed arteries, while those with the drug-coated stent who stopped taking the drug had the highest risk. Patients with bare-metal stents came in the middle.

While the study has limitations and isn't definitive, it is enough to convince Dr. Califf, its principal author, that patients with drug-coated stents should stay on the Plavix indefinitely -- or until additional research offers better guidance.

Brigham & Women's Dr. Cannon says there are four categories of patients who should consider bare-metal rather than drug-coated stents: people who have a history or risk of bleeding, such as ulcers or hemorrhages; who aren't likely to be able to stay on Plavix indefinitely; who can't afford the medicine; and who already take other blood thinners to manage an irregular heart-beat condition called atrial fibrillation.

Last week, John Brush, a cardiologist in private practice in Norfolk, Va., used a bare-metal stent to treat a heart-attack patient. A couple of months ago, he says, he would have put in a drug-coated device, "but I got subtle signals the patient was noncompliant."

Another issue is cost. In Minneapolis, Dr. Graham said he recently saw an elderly woman who already had a drug-coated stent and was on Plavix, at $6 a day, and a host of other medicines typical of a regimen for heart patients. She told him her monthly prescription bill was $436, while her social-security check was just over $900. "She was literally crying," Dr. Graham says. She had hit the "donut hole," a gap in Medicare drug coverage when patients have to pay the full cost of their medications themselves.

He reluctantly took her off the drug, and so far, she is okay, he says. "In those scenarios, people have to decide whether to pay the rent, pay their lights bills, buy food or buy the drugs."

Another important issue is the need for other medical procedures. Dentists, surgeons and other doctors often ask patients to stop taking the blood thinner before undergoing dental surgery, colonoscopies or orthopedic procedures such as knee replacements. The University of Miami's Dr. O'Neill said he has had three patients end up in the emergency room with heart attacks because they temporarily stopped taking Plavix on the advice of other doctors.

"It's essential that patients not stop the Plavix unless they consult with the cardiologist that put the stent in," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0105311

Many patients treated under the prevailing three-to-six-month guidelines for the blood thinner have been off the medicine for some time. At Duke, the recommendation is that patients discuss with their physicians whether they should resume taking the drug.

Elsewhere, doctors aren't convinced it is necessary. At the Ochsner Health System in New Orleans, J.P. Reilly, associate director of the cardiac catheterization laboratory, said he recently advised a patient not to go back on Plavix. "It's a difficult question to answer because of the costs associated with Plavix and the risks of bleeding," he says. But the patient's disease seemed well confined, a factor the doctor took into account in considering the question.

Then there is the surgery option. Drug-coated stents have prompted many cardiologists to take on patients who in previous years they would have referred to surgeons. At this week's hearing, some surgeons urged the FDA panel to prod patients and doctors to consider bypass surgery again.

These procedures are far more difficult than implanting a stent -- and they carry a higher risk of dying in the 30 days after treatment than procedures to implant stents. The surgeons argued they may be safer in the long term for certain patients with complicated problems such as blockages in multiple arteries.

Panel Urges Caution Concerning Coated Stents (NYT)

By Barnaby J. Feder

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

GAITHERSBURG, Md., Dec. 8 — A panel of experts recommended Friday that doctors and patients be given stronger warnings about the dangers associated with the use of drug-coated stents in high-risk patients.

The panelists also recommended that the Food and Drug Administration warn doctors that if possible, such patients should remain on aspirin and Plavix, an anticlotting drug, for at least a year after a drug-coated stent implant.

The label on the Cypher stent, from Johnson & Johnson, approved for sale in the United States in 2003, calls for the anticlotting therapy for just three months. The label on the Taxus stent, from Boston Scientific, approved the next year, calls for six months on the drug.

At the end of the two-day hearing here, the panelists struggled to reach a consensus on most of the questions posed to it by the F.D.A. about whether it should restrict the use of the tiny devices, which are implanted to prop open heart arteries.

As the session ended, Daniel Schult, head of the drug agency's Center for Devices and Radiological Health, said it was too soon to discuss what specific actions the F.D.A. might take. "What I heard loud and clear is that we need to do a better job communicating to doctors and patients the best and latest information," Dr. Schult said.

The challenge the agency faces is that most of the stents — over 60 percent by the F.D.A.'s estimates — are being implanted in patients with more complex cardiovascular problems than those of the patients the devices were tested on.

The experts told F.D.A. officials that there was little reliable research comparing the risks associated with such "off label" use to the outcomes with drug treatment or surgery. And what research there is suggests that the risks of clotting, heart attack and death are higher for such high-risk patients than for those who were in clinical trial groups.

The stent market grew so explosively after the drug-coated devices were introduced in 2003 that regulators and consumers were caught with too little data. About one million Americans annually get stents — often more than one. Stents are implanted after tiny balloons have been inflated in clogged arteries to reopen blood flow, a procedure known as angioplasty.

The first stents were bare metal devices. The drug-coated products sharply reduced the frequency with which new blockages formed at the implant site, thus reducing the number of follow-up procedures. In the last year, though, it was discovered that the formation of potentially deadly clots long after implantation was slightly more common with the drug-coated stents than with bare-metal stents.

Doctors today commonly give the drug-coated stents without F.D.A. clearance to diabetics, people with weakened hearts or kidneys, and those with plaque blockages in three or more coronary arteries who hope the stenting will allow them to avoid bypass surgery.

Three medical societies, including the American Heart Association, have recommended that patients stay on anticlotting drugs for a year.

How the F.D.A. may address the issue is unclear. It cannot require the companies to recommend a drug program on their labels for an unapproved use of the device. And Bristol-Myers, which makes Plavix, is not allowed to market the drug for off-label stent use.

Many doctors are already recommending extended or even indefinite use of anticlotting drugs for stent patients. But the panelists pointed out Friday that no one knows the optimal length of time to take the drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0105312

The anticlotting drugs can lead to excessive bleeding when a patient is in an accident and must be stopped if surgery or dental work is needed. Doctors also worry about whether patients will remember to take them every day and whether poorer patients can afford Plavix, which costs $1,400 annually for a daily dose.

"I haven't heard anything today that's going to change my practice when I go back to it Monday," said Dr. Christopher J. White, a cardiologist on the panel from the Ochsner Medical Center in New Orleans. After a moment's thought, though, he said he might cut back on the use of drug-coated stents where arteries branch since data showed clotting rates were higher where patients had overlapping stents.

Surgeons told the panel that a way to reduce risks was to cut back on the use of stents in most patients with blockages in three or more vessels or in the left main coronary artery — both cases in which data indicates survival rates are better for patients who undergo bypass surgery.

NIH Scientist Pleads Guilty In Accepting $285,000 From Pfizer (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

A senior government scientist who was a focus of a congressional probe into conflicts of interest in medical research admitted in federal court yesterday that he improperly failed to disclose payments of $285,000 he received as a consultant for the pharmaceutical manufacturer Pfizer Inc.

Pearson "Trey" Sunderland III, who was chief of the Geriatric Psychiatry Branch of the National Institute of Mental Health, pleaded guilty in Baltimore to a misdemeanor charge of violating conflict-of-interest rules.

Under the terms of the plea agreement, the Chevy Chase resident must forfeit $300,000 -- the payments plus expenses for which he was reimbursed. At the Dec. 22 sentencing, prosecutors have said that they will recommend that he be placed on probation for two years.

Sunderland, 55, admitted to entering consulting agreements with the drugmaker beginning in 1998 without receiving the required approval in advance or disclosing his income after the fact. Sunderland was paid as a consultant on two projects in which his department was collaborating with Pfizer on research to identify chemical warning signs of Alzheimer's disease.

The criminal prosecution of a researcher for violating conflict-of-interest rules is a rarity. But Sunderland's consulting arrangements, which first surfaced in 2004, were among the most egregious of the possible conflicts detailed during the probe by a congressional subcommittee.

U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein said the case should send a message to other government researchers. "Dr. Sunderland violated the fundamental rule that government employees cannot accept payment from interested private parties without the permission of their supervisors," Rosenstein said in a statement.

But members of Congress said yesterday that they found it disturbing that even after his guilty plea, Sunderland remains in his federal job, where he is a member of the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps.

"The question now becomes: Will the National Institutes of Health and the Commissioned Corps finally move to terminate Dr. Sunderland's assignment?" Rep. Bart Stupak (D-Mich.) asked in a statement. "Is a criminal guilty plea enough to, at long last, remove Dr. Sunderland from NIH?"

NIH spokesman Don Ralbovsky and Robert F. Muse, an attorney for Sunderland, declined to comment.

According to court documents, Sunderland initiated discussions with Pfizer in 1998 that led to his being paid as a consultant on a collaborative project involving Pfizer and NIMH. He was ultimately paid a $25,000 retainer each year for five years as well as $35,000 to attend 14 meetings at Pfizer locations. He negotiated similar terms later in 1998 as a consultant on a second effort.

In neither case did he disclose the income in annual reports, nor did he receive approval in advance from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, as required.

Adil E. Shamoo, founder and editor-in-chief of the journal Accountability in Research, which deals extensively with medical ethics, said he considered probation and the forfeiture to be appropriate punishment for Sunderland's misconduct.

"Pleading guilty in a court of law, a man of his caliber as a researcher -- it's really disappointing, and hopefully it will be a deterrent," Shamoo said. "It should be very embarrassing to him."

As a result of concerns over possible conflicts of interest, NIH officials began administrative actions against 34 scientists and referred 10 others, including Sunderland, to the Office of the Inspector General for possible prosecution. In August 2005, the NIH imposed rules that bar employees from working for, or owning stock in, drug companies.

NASA Official Questions Agency's Focus On The Shuttle (NYT)

By John Schwartz

DOJ_NMG_0105313

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla., Dec. 8 — NASA's administrator, Michael D. Griffin, says the current period of space exploration will come to be seen as a mistake.

"Viewed from the point of history several decades out," he said in an interview, "the period where the United States retreated from the Moon and quite deliberately focused only on low Earth orbit will be seen, to me, a mistake."

Mr. Griffin has made similar comments before, notably a year ago in an interview with USA Today. This time, his remarks came as he waited for Thursday's down-to-the-wire effort to launch the shuttle on a 12-day mission to rewire the International Space Station. The liftoff was scrubbed at the last minute because of weather concerns.

Mission managers decided not to try to launch on Friday, when weather conditions were predicted to be too cloudy and windy for a safe launching. They expect to try again at 8:47 p.m. on Saturday, though the decision about whether to proceed will not be made until weather officers give their prediction early that morning.

Launching opportunities extend to Dec. 26, though space agency officials hope to get the shuttle to orbit long before then.

Mr. Griffin was appointed to head the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in 2005, a year after President Bush announced his "vision for space exploration," which calls for returning astronauts to the Moon by 2020 and then moving on to send humans to Mars. Mr. Griffin has from the start been an enthusiastic proponent of that plan.

But it has put him in a delicate situation, as he has shifted NASA financing to the Moon initiative, while moving to complete the space station and shut down the shuttle program by 2010, and cutting back on its science activities. And in doing so, he has occasionally expressed doubts about the wisdom underlying the nation's decision to build the shuttle and the station.

After his remarks a year ago, he issued an apologetic memorandum to NASA employees.

But if there was any discomfort in expressing such opinions once again at the Kennedy Space Center in the midst of preparations for launching, Mr. Griffin showed none. He said in the interview that his comments had been broadly misconstrued as a slap against the people who build and maintain the shuttle and space station, and emphasized that he admired the people of NASA who took on enormous challenges to create the shuttle and station.

The fault is not NASA's, he said, adding: "The space shuttle is a response to a policy mistake — it isn't the mistake. The mistake was tearing up all the infrastructure that we built for Apollo and saying, 'let's just focus on low Earth orbit.' "

The plan to return to the Moon by 2020 has been met with some skepticism, especially among those who doubt that the space agency can take on such a daunting project within its $17 billion annual budget. Dr. Griffin said that NASA could do the job — and could reach the moon even more quickly, with more money.

"I'm tempted to say, 'Why the skepticism?' " he said, adding, "but in fairness, NASA's recent history has not had the on-time, on-budget performance characteristic of the Apollo era. And I'm trying to restore that."

The fact that Democrats won the majority of seats in Congress in the November election, and other political changes that will occur over time, should have little effect on the plan, he said.

"Unless you believe that a future U.S. president or a future U.S. Congress actually wants to cancel the U.S. spaceflight program, then I actually do not perceive a big threat from changing administrations and changing Congresses," he said. "I think the country wants to have a manned spaceflight program, and a substantial one."

Roger D. Launius, the chairman of the division of space history at the Smithsonian National Air and Space Museum, expressed surprise that Mr. Griffin would repeat his statement about the judgment of history after the controversy that erupted a year ago.

"Here we've got a guy who speaks his mind," Mr. Launius said. "That's not always the case, certainly in Washington, and it certainly hasn't been the case at NASA."

Still, while some of the criticism is justified, Mr. Launius said, the shuttle "turned out better than it had any right to," and stands today as something of an engineering marvel.

Representative Bart Gordon, Democrat of Tennessee and the incoming head of the House Committee on Science, declined to address Mr. Griffin's comments about the history of the space effort, saying through a spokeswoman: "I would rather focus on where we go from here. I support human exploration beyond low Earth orbit. However, it's got to be paid for."

Back To The Moon, Permanently (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Three years after President Bush announced an ambitious long-term goal to return astronauts to the Moon and then send them on to Mars, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has finally put some flesh on his nebulous aspirations. This week, the agency announced plans to establish a permanent base on the Moon by 2024, explained why we should want to send astronauts back to a world they visited repeatedly more than three decades ago, and described what they might do when they get there. It was belated justification for a decision that the Bush administration and Congress have already made. But the payoff is distant and the likely future costs very high, leaving it unclear how realistic these aspirations will prove to be.

DOJ_NMG_0105314

The agency has done a commendably thorough job by consulting some 1,000 experts and 13 other space agencies in fashioning its plans. Such a costly and difficult venture should ideally be pursued cooperatively with other nations, to share the costs and the risks. It would be especially desirable to have multiple ways of reaching the Moon in case the American program runs into problems like those that grounded the shuttles.

What's worrisome about the new plans is their lack of focus. The agency cites six major reasons for returning to the Moon. The most persuasive is to use the Moon as a base to test technologies and operating techniques to be used on future missions to Mars, a more compelling target. It makes sense to first try "living off the land" on the Moon, where astronauts are only days away from home should something go wrong, before taking the long leap to Mars. The venture is also justified on scientific, economic, educational and global partnership grounds, and as a step toward eventual settlements on the Moon.

The wide sweep of these rationales is reminiscent of the extravagant promises for the space station, which was sold to Congress as a steppingstone to the planets, a scientific and economic bonanza, and a stimulus for students but is still limping along, half finished and far over budget, with greatly diminished expectations for what it can accomplish.

An even more expansive document — listing some 180 objectives that the astronauts might pursue on the Moon — is essentially a wish list compiled after consulting virtually every expert in the world who might have an opinion. The list puts the lie to criticisms that there is almost nothing useful to do on the Moon. But some of the objectives have a pie-in-the-sky quality, like exporting power from the Moon for use on Earth, while others, like observatories on the Moon, might not prove feasible or affordable for decades. The objectives will need to be winnowed and focused if they are to serve as useful guides in pursuing the program.

If this nation is to continue a human space flight program it makes sense to pick a more exciting destination than a space station circling endlessly in low Earth orbit. Our main concern is that the political proponents of the Moon-Mars adventure will not provide money commensurate with the task. NASA's crowning scientific achievements have come from its unmanned probes to distant worlds and its orbiting observatories. It would be a shame if an underfinanced program to return to the Moon on a permanent basis and then venture on to Mars forced reductions in research programs of higher scientific value.

Mans Stabs Himself In Front Of Longworth, Forces Temporary Shutdown Of Union Station Area (RC)

By John McArdle, John Bresnahan

Roll Call, December 8, 2006

At 12:55 p.m. today, a 19-year-old man walked up to the main entrance of the Longworth House Office Building and proceeded to stab himself at least once in the chest in front of Capitol Police officers.

After arresting the man, officers found something in a backpack he was carrying that led them to shut down streets near Union Station to search for a suspicious package that he had mailed earlier in the day.

By 5:30 p.m., the package had been found and was deemed safe by Capitol Police and Metropolitan Police, and investigators and the man remained at George Washington Hospital under police arrest.

A Capitol Police spokeswoman, Sgt. Kimberly Schneider, said Friday night that detectives were still investigating a motive for the incident.

Schneider said the man is not a D.C. resident and that he is not believed to be an employee of Congress.

She also noted that after the man was subdued and transported to the hospital, his belongings were taken to a Capitol Police facility in the Fairchild Building. Once inside, officers discovered a suspicious substance in the man's backpack and briefly evacuated the building. That substance later was deemed safe, but evidence in the backpack eventually led police to believe the man had mailed a package earlier in the day.

After shutting down the Union Station area for an hour and a half, officers eventually found that package inside a nearby postal service truck and deemed it safe.

"It's to early to say what charges he will face or what his motive was, said Schneider. "We have a lot of investigating to do."

SMU Wins Court Decision Involving Land For Bush Library (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

DALLAS — Southern Methodist University has won a court ruling that could boost its bid to host the George W. Bush Presidential Library.

Federal District Judge Jerry Buchmeyer ruled Thursday that SMU has clear title to a condominium complex that university officials have considered for the library. SMU and two other colleges are bidding for the library.

DOJ_NMG_0105315

Leon Bennett, SMU's vice president for legal affairs, said the university plans to evict the remaining residents this month and begin tearing down the condominiums.

Two condo owners — a dentist who moved out and a lawyer who still lives there — claimed the university used unfair tactics to buy out owners at low prices.

The university denied the charges, and the judge wrote that the plaintiffs didn't prove SMU broke the University Gardens Condominiums bylaws.

The plaintiffs said they plan to appeal.

The two men filed the lawsuit last year in state court. The case was moved to federal court last month. It has been delayed many times, including when one of the plaintiffs filed for bankruptcy protection.

SMU officials have declined to discuss details of their bid for the presidential library, including its precise location.

SMU is considered a front-runner for the library. First lady Laura Bush graduated from the university and serves on its board of trustees, and the school's location near downtown Dallas is seen as a better draw for tourists.

The other bidders are Baylor University in Waco and the University of Dallas, which is in suburban Irving. Texas Tech University in Lubbock was eliminated. A decision is expected early next year.

Bush's Dog Barney Is Back With New Video (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON — Just in time for the holidays, America's best-known Scottish terrier is back with a new video on the White House Web site.

It's "Barney's Holiday Extravaganza," a production that follows Barney around the White House as he plans a holiday show, runs into trouble developing a plot and then wrangles over his budget with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Budget Director Rob Portman.

The supporting cast includes President Bush, his wife, Laura, entertainer Dolly Parton, three-time Super Bowl champion and "Dancing with the Stars" winner Emmitt Smith, political strategist Karl Rove, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Press Secretary Tony Snow and others.

Miss Beazley, the Bushes' other Scottish terrier, and the first cat, Willie, also make appearances.

Ignore And Appoint (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WHATEVER YOU thought of Ambassador John R. Bolton as U.S. representative at the United Nations — and we thought he was too confrontational — his tenure was clouded from the beginning by the fact that his appointment was never confirmed by the Senate. President Bush installed him at the U.N. with a "recess appointment" while the Senate was out of session.

Bush and his would-be successors — Democratic and Republican — should resolve that Bolton is the last major official to serve under this disability. Recess appointments are allowed by the letter of the Constitution, but they violate its spirit.

Bolton, who resigned this week when it became clear that he couldn't be confirmed even by the lame-duck Republican Senate, served for 16 months in what is arguably the most important diplomatic post after secretary of State. Yet his appointment never received the "advice and consent" the Senate is authorized by the Constitution to bestow on — or withhold from — proposed "ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court and all other officers of the United States."

Bush installed Bolton under another part of the Constitution that empowers the president to "fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Unlike the requirement for advice and consent, this provision is not central to the constitutional balance of powers between the executive and legislative branches. Rather, it's a quaint vestige of the 18th century — an era of stagecoaches, when it could take weeks for enough senators to travel to Washington to fill a quorum.

Since the 1950s, presidents have refrained from making recess appointments to the Supreme Court. But both Bill Clinton and George W. Bush have made such appointments to federal appeals courts, as well as to important executive branch positions, such as Bolton's, that should be subject to Senate confirmation.

With a new Democratic majority in the Senate capable of sustaining a filibuster, Bush may be tempted to resort to recess appointments — perhaps even to the Supreme Court — as payback for what he would see as obstructionism. He should resist the temptation.

We would gladly do away with filibusters of judicial nominations (and of legislation, for that matter). But neither filibusters nor other procedural obstacles that senators may erect to the confirmation process justify the greater evil of judges and ambassadors who have not been confirmed by the Senate. The "way forward" on this issue is for Bush and his successors to honor the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution.

DOJ_NMG_0105316

OTHER NEWS:

Despite Probe, A Close Race (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) was given up for dead politically after the FBI found $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, and he barely survived a Nov. 7 primary election, garnering 30 percent of the vote in a crowded field of 12 challengers.

Now he is locked in a tough runoff with a well-funded Democratic challenger who is using poetry and schoolchildren to highlight Jefferson's ethical woes. Many of Jefferson's House colleagues are privately rooting for him to lose today so his troubles do not tarnish the new Democratic-controlled Congress. But while scandals cost the GOP 12 House seats last month, the eight-term Democrat is proving surprisingly resilient, and experts say the special election could go either way.

Jefferson has scooped up high-profile endorsements from New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin and state Sen. Derrick Shepherd, who finished third in the primary, while attacking opponent Karen Carter, who finished second with 22 percent of the vote, as too liberal. In one ad, Jefferson declares "I have never taken a bribe" and dismisses Carter, a 37-year-old lawyer and state representative, as "an ambitious young woman." The national Democratic Party has steered clear of the race.

Brian J. Brox, a political scientist at Tulane University, described the race as heated and hard to predict. "It looks like a fairly negative and nasty affair," he said.

A low-key lawmaker with a scholarly demeanor, Jefferson had his world turned upside down in August 2005, when federal investigators raided his homes in Washington and New Orleans as part of a corruption investigation related to African business activities. Sources familiar with the probe said Jefferson is certain to be indicted, probably sometime in the first half of 2007.

Jefferson has strongly denied engaging in illegal activity, and to the surprise and alarm of some of his Democratic colleagues, he has forged ahead with his reelection campaign. He argues that his flood-ravaged city needs an experienced hand in the House to usher through recovery-related legislation. "Now is not the time for an unproven person to go to Washington and try to fight for our recovery," he warned in one campaign ad.

But in June, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and other leaders stripped Jefferson of his coveted seat on the Ways and Means Committee, a humiliating slap meant to send an election-year signal that Democrats do not tolerate ethical lapses. In October, the Louisiana Democratic Party voted to endorse Carter, who has matched Jefferson in fundraising. Both candidates have raised about $900,000, according to Federal Election Commission reports.

Pelosi has had little to say about Jefferson's reelection bid. "It is up to the people of New Orleans to decide who they want to represent them," she said this week. A Pelosi spokeswoman noted that there is no guarantee Jefferson would secure a committee assignment in the new Congress, should he win reelection.

Throughout the campaign, Jefferson has attempted to portray Carter as a left-wing fringe figure who supports late-term abortions, same-sex marriage and human cloning. Carter has hit back; one of her ads shows a children's spelling bee in which contestants spell "hypocrite" and "corruption." A radio ad contrasts Carter's Katrina response with reports that Jefferson used a National Guard detail to survey damage to his home. The congressman has insisted that he was not allowed to enter the area unescorted.

The radio message is delivered in the poetic style of " 'Twas the Night Before Christmas":

Karen Carter made headlines, pleading for buses and gas

To help desperate people in the Dome and on the Claiborne overpass.

In the meantime, Bill Jefferson couldn't be found.

Oh, that's right, two Humvees and a chopper had taken him Uptown.

The FBI is also investigating Jefferson's wife and other family members. The probe began in March 2005 with an undercover sting spurred by a Northern Virginia woman, Lori Mody. She had approached the FBI, concerned that Jefferson and some of his business associates were trying to swindle her.

Two of Jefferson's associates pleaded guilty this year to bribing the congressman. Investigators are examining about a dozen business schemes in the United States and in Africa in which Jefferson allegedly used his official position in exchange for financial gain, according to court documents and sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case.

DOJ_NMG_0105317

Given the volume of evidence that federal investigators are thought to possess, indictments in the case were expected months ago. But the probe has been slowed by legal wrangling over documents seized during a controversial FBI raid of Jefferson's House office in May.

Romney's Gay Rights Stance Draws Ire (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney, David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Gov. Mitt Romney, the Massachusetts Republican who has built a presidential campaign on a broad appeal for conservative support, is drawing sharply increased criticism from conservative activists for his advocacy of gay rights in a 1994 letter.

Mr. Romney's standing among conservatives is being hurt by a letter he sent to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts saying that he would be a stronger advocate for gay rights than Senator Edward M. Kennedy, his opponent in a Senate race, in a position that stands in contrast to his current role as a champion of a state constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage.

"We must make equality for gays and lesbians a mainstream concern," Mr. Romney wrote in a detailed plea for the support of the club, a gay Republican organization.

The circulation of the letter by gay rights groups in recent weeks has set off a storm of outrage among social conservatives, and by Friday was looming as a serious complication to Mr. Romney's hopes.

Aides to Mr. Romney, who did not dispute the letter's legitimacy, said that the governor's opinions on gay issues had not changed. They said Mr. Romney had always been an opponent of same-sex marriage, had always opposed discrimination against gay men and lesbians and had been consistent in his views about allowing them to serve in the military.

"Governor Romney believes Americans should be respectful of all people," said Eric Fehrnstrom, his spokesman. "However, over the past four years as governor, Mitt Romney has not advocated or supported any change in the military's policies and he has not implemented new or special rights in this area."

Mr. Fehrnstrom, echoing the language that Mr. Romney has frequently used on the campaign trail, said Mr. Romney had been "a champion of traditional marriage" and "fought the efforts of activist judges who seek to redefine marriage."

Nonetheless, the breadth of the letter's language and the specificity of many of the pledges stunned conservative leaders. Many of them had turned to Mr. Romney as a conservative alternative to Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, whose position on issues like abortion had been considered suspect.

"This is quite disturbing," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, who had praised Mr. Romney as a champion of traditional values at the group's conference in late September. "This type of information is going to create a lot of problems for Governor Romney. He is going to have a hard time overcoming this."

Paul Weyrich, a founder of the modern conservative movement, said: "Unless he comes out with an abject repudiation of this, I think it makes him out to be a hypocrite. And if he totally repudiates this, you have to ask, on what grounds?"

The letter, and Mr. Romney's effort to reconcile it with the way he had presented himself on the campaign trail, reflects what has been one of the central challenges facing him in his campaign: how to move from winning an election in one of the most liberal states in the union to becoming the presidential candidate of a party whose nominating process is dominated by social conservatives.

As it is, he has shifted his position on abortion rights. Last year, Mr. Romney wrote an op-ed article for The Boston Globe saying that his views had "evolved and deepened," and that he opposed abortion and thought decisions on its legality should be left to states.

The 1994 letter followed a meeting with the Log Cabin Club. Mr. Romney wrote, "I am not unaware of my opponent's considerable record in the area of civil rights.

"For some voters, it might be enough to simply match my opponent's record in this area," he said. "But I believe we can and must do better. If we are to achieve the goals we share, we must make equality for gays and lesbians a mainstream concern. My opponent cannot do this. I can and will."

Mr. Romney, recounting in the letter the promises he made in the meeting with the club, said he had agreed to help sponsor a bill barring discrimination against gay men and lesbians if he was elected to the Senate and to broaden it to include protections for housing and credit.

He said he supported the "don't ask, don't tell" military policy created by former President Bill Clinton, and described it as "the first in a number of steps that will ultimately lead to gays' and lesbians' being able to serve openly and honestly in our nation's military."

DOJ_NMG_0105318

Rich Tafel, who was the executive director of the club at the time, said he was stunned by what he described as the contrast between how Mr. Romney came across in their meeting and how he appeared on the campaign trail now.

"I've never seen anybody change like this," he said. "It really does concern me."

Viewed from some angles, Mr. Romney's positions on gay rights seem consistent. He still says he opposes discrimination against gay men and lesbians and he always said he opposed same-sex marriage.

But his emphasis has shifted in the last two years. As he moves into this new phase of his career, Mr. Romney rarely talks about the need to protect gay men and lesbians from bias, instead presenting himself as a conservative stalwart in the fight against same-sex marriage, arguing that legally recognizing same-sex unions endangers the cultural support for heterosexual families.

The doubts being raised could improve the prospects of two fellow Republicans who have been seeking conservative support in bids for the presidential election: Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas.

The Rascals On The Right (NYT)

By Thomas B. Edsall

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Washington

The early jockeying for the Republican presidential nomination reveals a split in the G.O.P. between sociocultural conservatives and the economy/ national defense wing, a split likely either to expand Democratic opportunities in 2008 or to produce an exceptionally viable Republican nominee.

The most significant development at this stage of the race is the failure of any G.O.P. candidate to emerge as the consensus conservative, uniting white evangelicals, family-values traditionalists, defense hawks, and opponents of the tax and regulatory state. "There is a vacuum in the field," says the Republican pollster Tony Fabrizio, "a big, gaping hole."

The two Republican candidates leading in polls, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, both fail the consensus test. Each stands to the left of the party — well to the left in Giuliani's case — on the "traditional values" issues: sexual mores, family structure, reproductive choice, gay rights, embryonic stem cell research, and so forth.

While religious leaders and social conservatives have claimed veto power over Republican presidential candidates, there are at least three reasons to doubt this will take place:

First, the G.O.P. has a long history of sticking with front-runners. Second, socially conservative political activists in key primary and caucus states are under intense pressure to choose now, accepting the field as it is. McCain has picked up the support of one of Iowa's top Christian power brokers, Marlys Popma, despite his denunciation six years ago of Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell as "agents of intolerance" who "shame our faith, our party and our country." Third, states such as Michigan, Florida, New Jersey and California are considering advancing their primaries to an early date, Feb. 5. This would weaken the leverage of religious and cultural conservatives who are strongest in the South, and would strengthen the hand of Republicans who are enthusiastic about right-libertarians like McCain and Giuliani.

Where once party leaders and institutional forces screened candidates for moral rectitude — or the semblance of it — the top four candidates in this Republican crop head into the race with nine marriages, five divorces and unknown numbers of extramarital affairs. Among them, only Mitt Romney is viewed as squeaky clean.

Public Opinion Strategies, a highly respected Republican polling firm, noted in an election post-mortem that the impact of personal scandal "on the Republican Party has been understated." Bill McInturff, a senior partner in the firm, presented data showing that in the closing weeks of the last election, Mark Foley, the Florida Republican who resigned after disclosures that he sent sexually suggestive messages to teenage House pages, had become a better-recognized figure than either Dennis Hastert, the former House speaker, or Nancy Pelosi, his Democratic successor. In October 2006, Foley achieved the dubious distinction of a 69 percent negative rating among respondents, seven points higher than O. J. Simpson and nearly as high as Yasir Arafat.

Although Romney has evidently led an uneventful private life, he is trying to forcibly reinvent himself from his incarnation as a Massachusetts governor who favored abortion rights and gay rights — almost as hard a history to surmount in the G.O.P. as the multiple marriages and divorces of McCain, Giuliani, and Newt Gingrich. (Gingrich set a new standard in nerviness by conducting an affair with a House staffer while leading the drive to impeach President Bill Clinton.)

Social-moral conflicts of the sort surfacing in the Republican Party should help the Democrats, if they choose a candidate who can capitalize on Republican disarray. Sexual mores aside, Democrats have been hampered by a long line of candidates who, no matter how virtuous (or not), have been perceived by swing voters as moralizing, elitist, egg-headed, puritanical, do-good scolds — from Adlai Stevenson to Walter Mondale to Michael Dukakis to Al Gore.

Unless the Democratic Party can suppress its inclination to pick such nominees, or can find a way to focus public attention on the opportunistic and grandstanding nature of its opponents, the weakness of social conservatives could turn out to be a Republican strength. The nomination of a McCain, or a Giuliani, could result in the selection of a candidate whose macho posture and rascal charm make for a viable general election nominee.

DOJ_NMG_0105319

G.O.P. Draws Fire On Senate Race Spending (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Campaign finance reports filed this week have led to second-guessing about whether the National Republican Senatorial Committee borrowed too little for its final all-out push for its candidates.

At least two Republican Senate candidates lost by just a few thousand votes, and reversing just one defeat would have enabled the Republicans to hold the Senate.

As of Nov. 27, the Republican senatorial committee had raised $87 million since the election cycle began in 2005 and ended up about $1.2 million in debt.

By comparison, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which lacked the inherent fund-raising advantage of controlling the Senate, raised $119 million in this election cycle and ended up $5.4 million in debt.

Candidates and parties routinely borrow at the end of close races and then pay down the debt after the election. The final figures, and especially the low debts, left some Republicans grumbling privately that their Senate committee's leader, Senator Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina, had failed to give it her all.

"Obviously, Elizabeth Dole did not get great reviews for her performance at the committee," said Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan political analyst. "Nobody is saying she did a great job. You would have to be in a coma not to realize that a $30 million fund-raising advantage for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee is astounding."

But the staff of the Republican senatorial committee provided analysis to show that their candidates in close races had outspent Democrats but lost anyway. They were incumbents, who enjoyed a considerable fund-raising edge. What's more, the Republican Party raised and spent far more than the Democrats did.

Thanks in part to a $12 million transfer from President Bush's leftover campaign funds, the Republican Party raised more than $200 million since the beginning of 2005 and ended up $3 million "in deficit" because of spending commitments made during the campaign, said Tracey Schmitt, a spokeswoman for the party.

The party reported $6.2 million in cash on hand and no loans. Ms. Schmitt said it had $9.2 million in other obligations.

The Democratic Party raised about $129.3 million since the beginning of 2005, and ended November with about $4 million on hand and about $4.7 million in bank debt.

The National Republican Congressional Committee also outraised and outborrowed the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

According to the filings, the Republican committee raised $176 million since the beginning of 2005 and ended November with $1.4 million in cash and $13 million in debt. Its Democratic counterpart raised $137 million and ended November with $2.3 million in cash and $10 million in debt.

Although both Congressional committees have deep debts, the Democrats will have an easier time repaying theirs because the election gave them control of the House, ensuring more donations from influence-seekers.

"People are going to be clamoring to give to the Democrats," Mr. Rothenberg said. "For the Republicans, it is going to be pulling teeth, especially with a presidential race coming up" and its competition for contributions, he said.

Of the main presidential contenders who filed reports this week, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York remains the best financed. Ms. Clinton's campaign reported $14.4 million in cash on hand and $1.2 million in debts.

Although she lacked a serious challenger, her campaign was one of the biggest fund-raisers and spenders. She raised about $50 million since the beginning of 2005 and spent more than $30 million on operating expenses.

Issues Overshadowed By "Distractions," Allen Says (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) calls them his "distractions."

They started when he called a Democratic aide "macaca" and continued throughout the fall, with allegations about his character and accusations that dated back to his days in high school, college and law school.

As Allen campaigned unsuccessfully for a second term in the U.S. Senate, the distractions formed a dark, unattractive narrative of his life that he said crowded out everything else he was trying to say.

DOJ_NMG_0105320

"You have these cheap shots coming at you, but you still need to move forward," Allen said yesterday in one of his first interviews since losing to Democrat James Webb by 9,329 votes out of a total of 2.4 million cast last month. "Obviously, when people are spreading falsehoods and lying about your character and who you are, it's much more aggravating."

"It allowed the portrayal -- and this is what's frustrating -- portrayal of the campaign to be away from actual issues, real solutions that matter," Allen said.

He declined to talk specifically about the controversies that turned what was supposed to be his warm-up for a presidential campaign into a losing bid to hold on to his Senate seat. "You can't brood and dwell" on the loss, he said.

But it's clear -- especially from the football analogies he uses frequently to describe the sudden turn in his political life -- that Allen regrets the mistakes he and his campaign staff made during the past several months.

"In the event that you lost a game by three or four touchdowns, people say, 'Gosh, it's a blowout,' " Allen said as movers packed up boxes and removed pictures from Room 204 in the Russell Senate Office Building. "If you lose by one point in a game, you can look back on every single play of the game."

Looking back, he continued, one "can say, 'gosh darn, if we only had made that block, if we only didn't jump off-sides, if we only had recovered that fumble, if we hadn't thrown that interception. If the referees didn't screw us on that play.' "

Who are the referees in that analogy? He doesn't say.

There's a lot that Allen won't talk about. He will not discuss his immediate plans, saying he is focused on "doing the people's business" until he leaves his Senate office Jan. 3. He will not say what job offers he is considering but says he has "some really exciting opportunities" to pursue.

And he politely declines to discuss any political future he might have in Virginia.

Advisers say he has abandoned any hope of running for president, a prospect that seemed all but certain this summer. Before the fall campaign, Allen was considered by Washington insiders to be a leading contender for the GOP presidential nomination.

Now, his friends and political observers say, Allen is likely to bide his time before attempting a possible comeback, perhaps as governor in 2009.

For his service as a state delegate, U.S. representative, governor and senator, Allen will receive about $35,000 a year in combined state and federal pensions once he reaches retirement age, aides and Virginia officials estimated.

As nearly two decades in elective office come to a close, Allen prefers to talk about what he predicts will be the legacies from his time in office.

He mentions the school standards and welfare reform he helped push through a Democratic General Assembly as governor in the mid-1990s. He talks with pride about abolishing the "lenient, dishonest sentencing system" of parole. "That's going to endure," he said.

Allen talks less about his six years in the Senate, reflecting the very public admission that he enjoyed being governor far more than being a senator.

"There's a great deal of worship of process," he says with disdain, echoing comments he made early this year that he was tired of the slow pace in the Senate. "It's too slow for me," he said then.

That comment, printed in the New York Times, was the first sign of danger for Allen. Democrats pounced, dubbing him "Bored George." But it wasn't until he was caught on tape calling a Democratic aide of Indian descent "macaca" in early August that his Senate seat was in any real jeopardy. Macaca is a genus of monkey and a racial slur in some cultures.

For Allen, the razor-thin margin of his loss to Webb calls up memories of nail-biter games between the Dallas Cowboys and his father's Washington Redskins.

But Allen is gracious when it comes to Webb, a former Navy secretary for President Ronald Reagan.

"I wish him well because I think it's good for the people of Virginia to have strong leadership for Virginia," he said.

Throughout the campaign, Allen and his pollsters saw data that suggested it would be a close race, in part because of the difficult environment for Republicans this year.

"I knew that, first and foremost, the national Democrats had no love for me. We needed to be prepared," he recalled.

Were they?

"You could throw that in," he said, with a shrug that seemed to acknowledge a certain complacency in his campaign. "Folks have brought that one up, too."

On election night, Allen said, Tampa Bay Buccaneers Coach Jon Gruden, a friend, called him as results were still coming in.

"He said, 'Did you do everything you could? Did you work as hard as you could?' I said, 'Oh, sure, gosh,' " Allen said.

He then added:

"Maybe not everything was perfect in it. That's for sure."

DOJ_NMG_0105321

Sekula-Gibbs Has Much To Say (HC)

By Eun Kyung Kim

Houston Chronicle, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — She marched into Congress determined to help cut taxes and reform immigration despite the fact that she was only serving out a lame-duck term.

But after two weeks of legislative business on Capitol Hill, Rep. Shelley Sekula-Gibbs learned what being a lame duck really means: She could give speeches but not deliver all of the goods.

The Houston Republican spent the past week — Friday was her last official day on the Hill — delivering one speech after another on the House floor.

Her soliloquies, aimed at the House television camera as the chamber was virtually deserted, could have been judged plentiful even in a place where performance art often passes for good politics.

Beside casting one of the 367 votes in favor of a tax bill that would, among other things, extend the sales-tax deduction on itemized federal income tax returns for Texans and residents of six other states, Sekula-Gibbs leaves a legacy mainly of C-SPAN video.

"District 22 had been without a representative for many months and it was important to have a voice on the floor of the House of Representatives again," she said.

She indeed held forth on Medicare and immigration (a subject that eluded agreement by Congress) but didn't confine herself to the major issues of the day. Among her other topics:

· A welcome to the first lady of Azerbaijan during her visit to Washington.

· Giving nonprofit athletic organizations immunity from being sued.

· Declaring the first week in April "Plan Ahead with an Advance Directive Week."

· Requiring abortion providers to give women the option of receiving anesthesia for the fetus.

Sekula-Gibbs started her term last month as little more than a political footnote.

Democrat Nick Lampson defeated her in the Nov. 7 election to succeed Rep. Tom DeLay, who resigned. She was forced to run as a write-in candidate after courts ruled that DeLay's resignation deprived the Republican Party of the right to select a replacement candidate on the ballot. Lampson takes office in January.

But Sekula-Gibbs won the election that day to finish the last two months of DeLay's term. Lampson was not on the ballot in that contest.

Sekula-Gibbs, a dermatologist and former Houston councilwoman, wasted no time making headlines.

The seven employees she inherited from DeLay resigned the day after she was sworn in, charging that she mistreated them. She denied it and then accused them of deleting files from office computers.

The House chief administrative office investigated, at her request. She said she has not received any findings yet.

Praise from a fellow TexanAfter the Thanksgiving holiday, Congress reconvened only for this week and Sekula-Gibbs instantly became a regular speaker on the House floor.

Ruby Cubley, outgoing president of Bay Area Republican Women, said Sekula-Gibbs did a good job raising her profile and the profile of her district.

"The best she could do was getting her name out there, on the board, if you will," Cubley said.

Rep. Kevin Brady, R-The Woodlands, applauded the way Sekula-Gibbs handled herself.

"It's been difficult just because of the briefness of the term and our transition to the minority and just the circumstances of how she got in," he said.

He acknowledged that though "the staff brouhaha is damaging," he fully expects Sekula-Gibbs to run for office again.

"She's determined to return to Congress (after the) next term," he said.

Sekula-Gibbs remains mum on the topic, although she has made it clear in the past that she plans to run again for the seat in 2008.

"My whole focus has to be on working for the district until I hand over the reins," she said.

Sekula-Gibbs pointed out that although her time in the legislative session ended, she still has weeks left in her term, which she will finish from her district office.

Cubley said Republicans are intent on coming up with a candidate who can win back the seat from Lampson in 2008.

"I don't know who that person will be, but we will be backing whoever that candidate is," she said. "This is a Republican district, and we will take it back."

For her part, Sekula-Gibbs said she was satisfied with her congressional run.

DOJ_NMG_0105322

"Everything has been incredibly valuable, very valuable," she said. "The opportunity to participate in Congress is an experience I'll value my entire life."

Americans Back Price Negotiations On Medicare Drugs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

A new poll shows that the overwhelming majority of Americans favor allowing the government to negotiate prescription drug prices for the Medicare program, suggesting there will be considerable political pressure on the next Congress to do so.

Eight-five percent of the 1,867 adults polled in the Kaiser Family Foundation survey released yesterday said they favored such negotiations, including majorities of Republicans, Democrats and independents.

For weeks, House Democrats have pledged to use their majority control of the next Congress to repeal a provision in the 2003 Medicare drug benefit law that prevents the government from engaging in drug price negotiations. Yesterday, a top aide to House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Democrats would pass legislation in the first 100 hours directing the Bush administration to use its bargaining power. The White House opposes the move.

"Given the administration's opposition to doing anything, I think there was a feeling we had to go a little bit further," said Wendell Primus, Pelosi's adviser on health issues. "It will be very simple language. We do not think that Congress needs to hammer out all the details. There are a lot of smart people in the administration that can look at how we're buying drugs . . . and figure out the best way of negotiating better prices with drug companies."

Coming up with a more comprehensive plan for how negotiations would work will take more time, Primus said. Any plan would have to win approval by the Senate and President Bush.

Under the current program, which enrolled 22.5 million people this year, its first, dozens of private insurers offer Medicare drug plans in each state, competing on monthly premiums, choice of drugs and access to pharmacies. The financial pressure is on insurers, through their pharmacy benefit managers, to negotiate the best prices they can with drug companies and pharmacies, say proponents of the system.

Getting the government involved could be logistically difficult and would not necessarily lower drug prices, they argue. Because one way to win discounts is to favor some drugs over others, opponents add, beneficiaries could face a more limited choice of medications and lobbyists might influence which drugs are available. And if the government succeeds in holding down prices, the pharmaceutical industry has argued, that could discourage the development of new drugs.

Julie L. Goon, special assistant to Bush for economic policy, said that Medicare beneficiaries are saving an average of $1,200 a year on drugs and that the existing program is popular and efficient.

"The government doesn't do a particularly good job of negotiation," Goon said. "I think it would be a mistake to open up the political process to what particular prices are available for drugs."

Critics of the current system say the Department of Veterans Affairs, which by law receives a mandatory discount on drugs, also negotiates effectively to secure better prices for the 4.4 million veterans who use its drug benefit. They argue that, with a pool of as many as 43 million beneficiaries, Medicare would have considerable muscle to force price concessions.

Jeane Kirkpatrick, Reagan's Forceful Envoy, Dies (NYT)

By Tim Weiner

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, the Reagan administration's first United Nations ambassador and a beacon of neoconservative thought who helped guide American military, diplomatic and covert action from 1981 to 1985, died Thursday at her home in Bethesda, Md. She was 80.

Her death was announced yesterday by the American Enterprise Institute in Washington, where she was a senior fellow. The cause was congestive heart failure, said her personal assistant, Tammy Jagyur.

Ms. Kirkpatrick was the first American woman to serve as United Nations ambassador. She was the only woman, and the only Democrat, in President Ronald Reagan's National Security Council. No woman had ever been so close to the center of presidential power without actually residing in the White House.

"When she put her feet under the desk of the Oval Office, the president listened," said William P. Clark Jr., Mr. Reagan's national security adviser during 1982 and 1983. "And he usually agreed with her."

President Reagan brought her into his innermost foreign policy circle, the National Security Planning Group. There she weighed the risks and rewards of clandestine warfare in Central America, covert operations against Libya, the disastrous deployment of American marines in Lebanon, the invasion of Grenada and support for rebel forces in Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0105323

Her public diplomacy made her a national political figure. She was a star performer at the 1984 Republican national convention, deriding the Democrats as the "blame America first" party.

She changed her political affiliation after leaving the Reagan administration and thought hard about seeking the Republican nomination for president.

"So many people talked to me about it so much that they finally persuaded me to consider it," she said in October 1987. But she decided against it, fearing she would split the conservative vote and help elect Vice President George H. W. Bush. Though he won, she thought him too moderate to inherit the Reagan legacy.

Fifteen years later, in March 2003, President Bush recalled Ambassador Kirkpatrick to active duty and sent her to Geneva, said Alan Gerson, who had served as her general counsel at the United Nations. The secret mission, previously undisclosed, was to head off a diplomatic uprising against the imminent war against Iraq. Arab ministers wanted to condemn it as an act of aggression.

"The marching orders we received were to argue that pre-emptive war is legitimate," Mr. Gerson said. "She said: 'No one will buy it. If that's the position, count me out.' "

Instead, she argued that the attack was justified by Saddam Hussein's violations of United Nations resolutions dating from the 1991 war against Iraq. The foreign ministers found her position convincing and their resolve against the war faded, Mr. Gerson said.

Ms. Kirkpatrick was a political science professor with no diplomatic experience when she arrived at the United Nations in February 1981. Her mission was to wage rhetorical warfare against Moscow and its allies. She sought to restore the international standing of the United States after its defeat in Vietnam and the captivity of Americans in Iran.

Her high-profile performance at the United Nations made her President Reagan's favorite envoy. "You're taking off that big sign that we used to wear that said, 'Kick Me,' " the president told her. He admired her strong diplomatic stands and her undiplomatic language. In a letter to 40 third world ambassadors in October 1981, for example, she accused them of spreading "base lies" and making "malicious attacks upon the good name of the United States."

When nations opposed American foreign policy, she sent their voting records to Congress. The threat was tacit but clear: to stand against the United States meant to risk losing its foreign aid. Her deputy at the United Nations, Kenneth L. Adelman, said she enjoyed such close combat.

"We were like Davy Crockett at the Alamo," he said.

Said She Hated U.N. Job

She professed to detest the United Nations. She compared it to "death and taxes." But she endured it for four years.

At the United Nations, she defended Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the American invasion of Grenada in 1983. She argued for El Salvador's right-wing junta and against Nicaragua's left-wing ruling council, the Sandinistas.

In private, she supported American efforts to sustain the contras, the rebel group that tried to overthrow the Sandinistas with help from the Central Intelligence Agency She was a crucial participant in a March 1981 National Security Planning Group meeting that produced a $19 million covert action plan to make the contras a fighting force.

She was part of a national security team that was often at war with itself. Her relationship with Mr. Reagan's first secretary of state, the four-star general Alexander M. Haig Jr., "started off bad and got worse over time," Mr. Adelman said in an oral history of the Reagan years. She had something Mr. Haig found that he lacked: the president's ear.

Ms. Kirkpatrick first entered Mr. Reagan's inner circle on the strength of a 10,000-word article she published in the neoconservative magazine Commentary in November 1979. The article, "Dictatorships and Double Standards," drew a bright line between right-wing pro-American governments and left-wing anti-American ones.

"Traditional authoritarian governments," she argued, "are less repressive than revolutionary autocracies." She said it was an historic mistake for the United States to have shied away from dictators like the Somozas in Nicaragua and the Shah of Iran. If they served American interests, she asserted, they were defensible.

Mr. Reagan read the article closely. Richard V. Allen, who later became the first of his six national security advisers, introduced him to Ms. Kirkpatrick. They met at a February 1980 dinner party given by George F. Will, the syndicated columnist.

She recalled that she wondered aloud how she, a Democrat all her life, could join his team. Mr. Reagan confided, "I was a Democrat once, you know." He won her over. After his election a year later, Ms. Kirkpatrick became the United Nations ambassador and "Dictatorships and Double Standards" became an important part of the foreign policy of the United States.

At the United Nations, Ms. Kirkpatrick was the target of barbs and backstabbing. Sometimes she was aware of the source, sometimes not.

She knew she was "a kind of special target for the Soviets — disinformation target," she said at a 2003 foreign policy roundtable convened by the Miller Center of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia. In 1982, the K.G.B. forged a letter to discredit her and fobbed it off on the Washington correspondent for The New Statesman, a leftist British weekly, which reprinted it. The phony letter was a note of "best regards and gratitude" from the intelligence chief of the apartheid South African government.

DOJ_NMG_0105324

"But I felt there was as much disinformation aimed at me from inside our own government, frankly, as from the Soviet Union," Ms. Kirkpatrick said. "That's a shocking thing to say, but it is no exaggeration."

Role as Adviser Blocked

In 1983, Ms. Kirkpatrick was a strong candidate to become President Reagan's third national security adviser. She had support from the director of central intelligence, William J. Casey, and Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger. But her new boss, Secretary of State George P. Shultz, opposed her.

"I respected her intelligence, but she was not well suited to the job," Mr. Shultz wrote. "Her strength was in her capacity for passionate advocacy," and the post, he added, demanded a "dispassionate broker."

Ms. Kirkpatrick was at the June 1984 National Security Planning Group meeting that began the secret initiative that later became known as the Iran-contra affair. Congress had cut off funds for the contras. Mr. Casey wanted to obtain money from foreign countries in defiance of the ban.

Ms. Kirkpatrick was in favor. "We should make the maximum effort to find the money," she said. Mr. Shultz was opposed. "It is an impeachable offense," he said. President Reagan warned that if the story leaked, "we'll all be hanging by our thumbs in front of the White House."

Secret Arms Sales Exposed

Over the next two years, millions skimmed from secret arms sales to Iran went to the contras. The story did leak, as Mr. Reagan feared, and his Administration was shaken by Congressional investigations and criminal charges. Robert C. McFarlane, who had won the national security slot over Ms. Kirkpatrick, pleaded guilty to misinforming Congress.

Mr. McFarlane said he should have stood up against the secret initiative to support the contras. But "if I'd done that," he said, "Bill Casey, Jeane Kirkpatrick and Cap Weinberger would have said I was some kind of commie."

By then Ms. Kirkpatrick had left the government. She stuck to a vow to leave the United Nations at the end of Mr. Reagan's first term and resigned in April 1985. She was succeeded by Vernon A. Walters, a former deputy director of central intelligence. The next year, as the Iran-contra story began unfolding, Mr. Casey urged the president to make her secretary of state, but Mr. Reagan rejected the idea.

Ms. Kirkpatrick spent the rest of her career commenting on policy instead of making it. She remained among the most highly regarded members of the Republican establishment, and her voice remained one of the strongest echoes of the Reagan era.

Jeane Duane Jordan was born on Nov. 19, 1926, in Duncan, Okla., about 160 miles northwest of Dallas, the daughter of Welcher F. and Leona Jordan. Her father was an oil wildcatter who moved from town to town searching for a gusher that he never hit.

She attended Stephens College in Missouri for two years, then moved to New York, where she earned a bachelor's degree from Barnard College in 1948 and a master's degree from Columbia University in 1950. She went to Washington as a research analyst at the Intelligence and Research Bureau of the State Department, where she met her future husband, Evron Kirkpatrick. Fifteen years her senior, he was a veteran of the wartime Office of Strategic Services, and he soon became the head of the American Political Science Association. They married in 1955 and had three sons — Douglas Jordan, John Evron and Stuart Alan. Douglas died earlier this year. The other sons and five grandchildren survive her. Mr. Kirkpatrick died in 1995.

In 1967, before completing her doctoral dissertation, she was appointed associate professor at Georgetown University. The next year, she earned a doctorate in political science at Columbia University. Georgetown made her a full professor in 1973 and gave her the endowed Leavey Chair five years later.

Ms. Kirkpatrick supported Jimmy Carter in 1976 and came close to being chosen for an ambassadorship in his administration. But she had become deeply disenchanted with her party.

Swept In With 50 Others

She joined the vanguard of the neoconservative movement, the Committee on the Present Danger, which warned throughout the late 1970s of a disastrous downturn in every aspect of American strength, from nuclear warheads to national image. When Mr. Reagan came to office in 1981, 51 of the committee's members won positions of significant power in his administration.

Power, Ms. Kirkpatrick said in a 1996 interview, is based not merely on guns or money but on the strength of personal conviction.

"We were concerned about the weakening of Western will," she said. "We advocated rebuilding Western strength, and we did that with Ronald Reagan, if I may say so."

DOJ_NMG_0105325

Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, 1926-2006: U.N. Ambassador Upheld Reagan Doctrine (WP)

By Joe Holley

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, 80, a Georgetown University political science professor who became the first woman to serve as U.S. ambassador to the United Nations and who was one of the chief architects of the muscular anti-Communist foreign policy that came to be known as the Reagan doctrine, died Dec. 7 at her home in Bethesda, where she was under hospice care.

Her assistant, Andrea Harrington, said she died in her sleep. The cause of death was not immediately known.

"She defended the cause of freedom at a pivotal time in world history," President Bush said yesterday. "Jeane's powerful intellect helped America win the Cold War."

Praising Kirkpatrick's "commitment to an effective United Nations," U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan said she was "always ardent and often provocative."

For many years a Cold War liberal, a Democrat in the tradition of senators Hubert H. Humphrey Jr. (Minn.) and Henry M. "Scoop" Jackson (Wash.), Kirkpatrick became a neoconservative in the 1970s and then a Republican Party stalwart. An academic and a public intellectual who never held elective office, she briefly considered seeking the Republican presidential nomination in 1988.

She came to Ronald Reagan's attention in 1979, when he read an article she had written for the neoconservative magazine Commentary, "Dictatorships and Double Standards." In the article, she accused the Carter administration of abiding totalitarian enemies on the left while holding authoritarian allies in Latin America and elsewhere to a higher standard.

It was difficult, she wrote, to "democratize governments, any time, anywhere, under any circumstances" although "right-wing autocracies do sometimes evolve into democracies" but communist societies never do.

"This is incredible. Who is this person?" Reagan is said to have exclaimed.

The columnist George Will introduced the two at a dinner party at his Georgetown home in 1980, and Kirkpatrick eventually decided to endorse Reagan for president and to campaign for him. When he named her U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, she became the first Democrat to fill a Cabinet-level post in the administration. She was unanimously confirmed by the Senate.

She warned that she would not be "a ventriloquist's dummy" at the United Nations, mouthing administration policy, and there were times when her willingness to speak her mind ruffled feelings not only at the United Nations but within the administration.

Although she arrived at the United Nations with no diplomatic experience, she quickly assumed a high-profile role. Her fellow envoys may have considered her arrogant and condescending, but they knew she had Reagan's ear.

An influential voice in the development of administration policies toward Central America, Kirkpatrick supported the military junta in El Salvador and was an ardent supporter of anti-Sandinista rebels fighting the leftist Sandinista government of Nicaragua. She helped develop the covert plan to provide $19 million in aid to the contras.

She also defended Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 and the American invasion of Grenada in 1983.

Kirkpatrick, the only woman in President Reagan's National Security Council, told Time magazine in 1982 that her gender could have been the cause of her difficulties with Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig and other administration officials. The author of "Political Women" (1974), a major study of the role of women in modern politics, she acknowledged that a woman in high office is "intrinsically controversial."

"Many people think a woman shouldn't be in high office," she told Time. "Kissinger is described as 'professorial.' I am described as 'schoolmarmish.' Brzezinski is called 'Doctor.' I am called "Mrs.' I am depicted as a witch or a scold in editorial cartoons -- and the speed with which these stereotypes have been used shows how close these feelings are to the surface. It is much worse than I ever dreamed it would be. My feelings are hurt."

With her closely cropped gray hair, utilitarian clothes and blunt speaking style, the public Jeane Kirkpatrick seemed humorless and austere. "Raised eyebrows give her an expression of sustained skepticism, as if she lives on the verge of some crucial debate the rest of us do not hear," James Conaway observed in a 1981 Washington Post Magazine article.

Friends of Kirkpatrick's told Conaway that she was much more charming in private; Peter Arnold, a former colleague at the American Enterprise Institute, said she had a "remarkable sense of humor." Her great passion, she once said, was listening to the pianist Glenn Gould play Bach.

In 1985, the Washington Post editorial page, describing Kirkpatrick as "a highly articulate and intellectual Democrat who cares deeply about ideas in politics," praised her for her plain speaking about the penchant of some Third World countries to blame Israel and the United States for everything.

She was born Jeane Duane Jordan in Duncan, Okla., the daughter of an oil field wildcatter who moved his family to a succession of small towns in Oklahoma and Illinois seeking the elusive big strike.

DOJ_NMG_0105326

She received an associate's degree from Stephens College in Columbia, Mo., in 1946, and a bachelor's degree in 1950 from Barnard College, where she considered herself a socialist.

While working on a master's degree in political science from Columbia University, she became a resolute anti-Stalinist as a result of stories that had begun to emerge about the horrors of the Nazi and Soviet concentration camps.

After receiving a master's degree in 1950, Kirkpatrick worked briefly as a research analyst in the State Department and then did postgraduate work in 1952-53 at the Institut de Science Politique of the University of Paris.

She moved to Washington after marrying political scientist Evron Kirkpatrick, a deputy director of the State Department's Intelligence Research Bureau; worked on her dissertation; raised three boys and stayed involved in Democratic Party politics.

After the 1972 Democratic National Convention, she became one of the charter members of the Coalition for a Democratic Majority, a group that included senators Humphrey, Jackson and Daniel Patrick Moynihan (N.Y.), Commentary editor Norman Podhoretz and his wife, neoconservative author Midge Decter. The aim of the CDC was to reclaim the Democratic Party from the McGovernites.

In 1962, she became an assistant professor of political science at Trinity College in the District and in 1967 associate professor of political science at Georgetown University. After finishing her dissertation, "Peronist Politics in Argentina," she received a doctorate from Columbia University in 1968. She became a full professor at Georgetown in 1973.

In 1978, she joined the American Enterprise Institute, which had become an intellectual home for many of her fellow CDC neoconservatives. Kirkpatrick, the only female scholar in residence, was a forceful advocate of American hegemony in a dangerous world.

She finally changed parties in 1985, registering as a Republican in Montgomery County after stepping down as U.N. ambassador. A year earlier, she had energized delegates to the 1984 Republican National Convention with her attacks on "the San Francisco Democrats." As she led delegates in a chant of "they always blame America first," she could look out over the throng and see a number of "Kemp-Kirkpatrick" buttons.

She explained her party conversion by saying she was "tired of swimming against the current in my own party." Democrats, she contended, no longer stood for "growth at home, strength abroad." She did, however, remain true to her Democratic Party heritage on organized labor and most social issues.

She remained active in public life after leaving the United Nations, although she was reportedly disappointed that Reagan did not offer her another Cabinet-level position in his second term.

Back at Georgetown University and at the American Enterprise Institute, she wrote articles and a syndicated column for the Los Angeles Times, spoke regularly on politics and public policy and was a frequent foreign policy adviser to Republicans.

Last year, she was one of seven former U.N. ambassadors who wrote a letter urging lawmakers not to withhold dues as a way to force reform.

Kirkpatrick's husband died in 1995. A son, Douglas Kirkpatrick, died this year.

Survivors include two sons, Stuart Kirkpatrick, known as Traktung Rinpoche, a Buddhist minister in Ann Arbor, Mich., and John Kirkpatrick, a lawyer in Miami.

Former U.N. Ambassador Kirkpatrick Dies (AP)

AP, December 8, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Jeane Kirkpatrick, an unabashed apostle of Reagan era conservatism and the first woman U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, has died.

The death of the 80-year-old Kirkpatrick, who began her public life as a Hubert Humphrey Democrat, was announced Friday at the senior staff meeting of the U.S. mission to the United Nations.

Spokesman Richard Grenell said that Ambassador John Bolton asked for a moment of silence. An announcement of her death also was posted on the website of the American Enterprise Institute, a conservative-oriented think tank here where she was a senior fellow.

Kirkpatrick's assistant, Andrea Harrington, said that she died in her sleep at home in Bethesda, Md. late Thursday. She had been suffering from heart disease, but the cause of death was not immediately known.

Kirkpatrick's health had been in decline recently, Harrington said, adding that she was "basically confined to her house," going to work about once a week "and then less and less."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said that Kirkpatrick, who had a reputation as a blunt and acerbic advocate, "stood up for the interests of America while at the U.N., lent a powerful moral voice to the Reagan foreign policy and has been a source of wise counsel to our nation since leaving the government two decades ago. She will be greatly missed."

Karlyn Bowman, a colleague of Kirkpatrick's at AEI, called her "always insightful. Always interesting. Very thoughtful about modern American politics and foreign policy. A wonderful colleague."

DOJ_NMG_0105327

Bowman also said that Kirkpatrick, who had been elevated to the U.N. post by President Reagan in 1981, had "served with great distinction" at the U.N. "She was a great patriot, a champion of freedom and we will certainly miss her at AEI and the country."

Kirkpatrick was known as a blunt and sometimes acerbic advocate for her causes. She remained involved in public issues even though she'd left government service two decades ago. She joined seven other former U.N. ambassadors in 2005 in writing a letter to Congress telling lawmakers that their plan to withhold dues to force reform at the world body was misguided and would "create resentment, build animosity and actually strengthen opponents of reform."

Kirkpatrick was a political science professor at Georgetown University from 1957 until her appointment to the U.N.

Like many conservatives, she wrote for Commentary Magazine, a liberal publication that gradually turned to conservatism amid liberals' criticism of Israel.

A pivotal article sought to draw a distinction between authoritarian governments and more extreme violators of human rights like the Soviet Union.

In the Reagan years she played a quiet role in cutting off U.S. aid to a leftist government in Nicaragua and supporting a military junta in El Salvador.

Her support for Israel, particularly at the United Nations where the Jewish state often is denounced, was steadfast.

Bill Bennett, a former secretary of education under Reagan, the nation's drug czar under the first President Bush and a leading conservative opinion-maker, called her "very forceful, very strong, a daughter of Oklahoma, great sense of humor. She held her own."

Bennett said the Iraq Study Group so prominently in the news "would have been better with Jeane Kirkpatrick on it ... She had no patience with tyrannies, said they had to be confronted, you couldn't deal with tyrannies, that there were some people you could work with — these people you couldn't."

Kirkpatrick once referred to herself as a "lifelong Democrat."

She actually switched to the GOP in early 1985, four years after Reagan sent her to New York for the U.N. job. She took with her a reputation as a hard-liner on foreign policy. Because of this, she often was a lightning rod for the opposition. In some respects, she was a controversial figure like Bolton, who recently decided to resign when it became clear the Senate would not approve him for the job on a full-time basis.

Said Bolton: "I think she spoke clearly for liberty in the world."

Kirkpatrick considered seeking the Republican presidential nomination that went to George H. W. Bush in 1988. She stopped that process short, however, retreating to the position that she would accept the No. 2 slot if asked. She had played a leading role at the party's convention four years earlier — at a time when she was still a Democrat.

Jeane Kirkpatrick (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

Jeane Kirkpatrick, who died yesterday at 80, was that rare thing -- a public intellectual and a public figure. She excelled at both.

Ms. Kirkpatrick is known to the public at large because Ronald Reagan, after defeating Jimmy Carter for the Presidency in 1980, appointed her U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. It is worth mentioning in this context that earlier this week Senate Democrats succeeded finally in driving John Bolton from the U.N. ambassadorship. The mind's eye recalls the televised image in the early 1980s of Ambassador Kirkpatrick, a Democrat then, seated at the U.N. Security Council table and publicly defending U.S. interests against the Soviet Union with an articulate, no-nonsense bluntness that makes Mr. Bolton sound like Little Bo-Peep by comparison. That style -- American interests made perfectly clear -- will be missed.

She knew how to use words as weapons. Her most famous turn of phrase, at the 1984 GOP convention, was "San Francisco Democrats." Ms. Kirkpatrick's "Blame America First" speech marked her most public departure from the Democratic Party.

Explaining in an interview years later why she and other Democratic intellectuals -- yes, they were neoconservatives -- formed the anti-Soviet Committee for the Present Danger and aligned themselves with Ronald Reagan, Ms. Kirkpatrick said: "We were concerned about the weakening of Western will." Incidentally, the antipathy to "the neoconservatives" that one hears so often these days flows back directly to those years and the neocon battles with American liberals.

No one ever doubted Jeane Kirkpatrick's will or courage. Among those who most appreciated her determination to speak truth to totalitarian power was the celebrated Russian dissident Andrei Sakharov. Exiled by the Soviet government to Gorky, Sakharov said later how important it was to have a person of Jeane Kirkpatrick's stature publicly identify jailed Soviet dissidents by name. For the past 10 years she served on the board of the Center for a Free Cuba, which she helped found.

DOJ_NMG_0105328

Jeane Kirkpatrick was born in Duncan, Oklahoma, in 1926. She was an ideologue, and her ideas would have come from Duncan. Their tenet was freedom for the human spirit. She dedicated a public life to protecting that freedom.

The Party Of "Nyet" (WP)

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

VIRGINIA Republicans gathered at a handsome resort the other day to lick their wounds and plot their future. Or rather, some Virginia Republicans did -- namely, the party's right-wing, anti-tax ideologues, who have contributed mightily to devastating back-to-back losses in races for the governorship last year and the U.S. Senate this year. Virginia's more pragmatic Republicans, who are more interested in addressing the state's problems than in upholding the true faith of anti-tax doctrine, did not bother to show up.

And who can blame them? The moderates, although they control the state Senate, have so far failed to nudge their hard-line colleagues in the House of Delegates toward practical solutions for the state's most critical problem: its crumbling, inadequately funded transportation infrastructure. The likely result is further electoral setbacks for Republicans, particularly in Northern Virginia's well-educated, centrist suburbs, and a loosening of their control of the House. With all 140 seats in the General Assembly up for election next year, many in the party are already bracing for the worst.

Having spurned Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's proposals for new taxes to fund major improvements for the state's roads and rails, House Republicans are now warning that they will shoot down one of his signature proposals from his 2005 campaign: universal preschool for the state's 100,000 4-year-olds. Granted, Mr. Kaine has not yet bothered to divulge how he would go about paying for the initiative, which would be very expensive -- at least $300 million over four years to provide for the 80 percent of 4-year-olds who the governor figures would sign up. And there are legitimate reasons to question the wisdom and equity of providing an entitlement program for middle-class parents already willing and able to pay for preschool. But the GOP fundamentalists aren't interested in having that discussion or weighing the governor's ideas dispassionately. They would rather just be the Party of "Nyet" -- nyet to taxes, nyet to new roads, nyet to new preschools.

The new state GOP chairman, Ed Gillespie, is speaking soothing words to the party's warring factions, sensibly urging dialogue and compromise and warning against division. At the same time, though, one of the hard-liners, Del. L. Scott Lingamfelter, who represents Prince William and Fauquier counties, answered Mr. Gillespie with a cold splash of reality. Writing in the Richmond Times-Dispatch, Mr. Lingamfelter, who has voted to block new funding sources for transportation, warned of "liberals" seeking "to craft a socialist solution for you and me." It seems that the Virginia GOP's day of reconciliation is not yet upon us.

The Bloomberg Diet (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

"We're just trying to make food safer," said Mayor Bloomberg, who nixed smoking in bars a few years back. The city's concern for the health of residents is understandable, but trans fats are not E. coli (or even secondhand smoke), and the federal Food and Drug Administration still considers these chemically modified food ingredients perfectly safe for consumption. Could it be that Mayor Mike has been taken in by activist Gotham health czars and national Naderite "watchdog" outfits like Michael Jacobson's Center for Science in the Public Interest, among others pushing a larger agenda?

You wouldn't know it from the media coverage, but the science on the dangers of trans fats is still being debated, which helps explain FDA approval of the ingredient. It also explains why the American Heart Association, while no fan of trans fats, was critical of the New York proposal and fears it may backfire if food outlets revert to even less healthy alternatives.

The food nannies insist that trans fats raise cholesterol and cause heart disease. The problem, says Steven Milloy of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, is that the studies purporting to show this link are inconclusive at best. "People cite lab studies that show transient changes in blood lipids when people consume trans fats, but that's a long way from heart attacks and heart disease," says Mr. Milloy.

Walter Willett of the Harvard School of Public Health is one of the nation's leading trans fat alarmists. Earlier this year he co-authored an article in the New England Journal of Medicine that said trans fats "appear to increase the risk of coronary heart disease more than any other macroingredient." As evidence the article cited three studies. One showed a statistically insignificant correlation between trans fats and heart disease when other risk factors are considered. The other two studies found a link between very high consumption of trans fats and heart trouble, but statistically the association was weak.

Before other cities decide to regulate diets absent a safety issue, they might also consider that some of the same people now pushing for a trans fat ban once recommended the ingredient as a substitute for another health scare: saturated fats. Twenty years ago, Mr. Jacobson's CSPI launched a public relations blitz against fast food joints for using palm oil to cook fries. The group claimed victory when restaurants started using partially hydrogenated oil instead. In 1988, a CSPI newsletter declared that "the charges against trans fat just don't hold up. And by extension, hydrogenated oils seem relatively innocent." Today, Mr. Jacobson is claiming trans fats kill 30,000 people a year. We wonder if he feels guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0105329

The ultimate goal of these so-called consumer advocates is to persuade the FDA to turn on trans fats, a move that would serve the food industry up as the next entree on the plaintiff bar's menu. Don't be surprised if the new Democrat Congress helps them pursue this goal, just like Mayor Bloomberg, on the dubious assumption that people can't decide for themselves what and what not to eat.

Uploading American Politics (WP)

By Raul Fernandez

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Technology won the 2006 elections for the Democrats. No, not electronic voting machines, but the power of the Internet, fueled by innovative applications that let citizens create and publish their own content. The Internet not only changed the balance of power in the House and Senate, it also helped sack the secretary of defense. Welcome to viral democracy.

In 1994, the last time the House changed hands, the Internet was mainly a university and military application. AOL, with its first 1 million members, was an up-and-coming player in the emerging online world. Marc Andreessen was just leaving school to start Netscape. And Google, eBay and Amazon.com did not exist, even as business plans.

But in 12 short years the Internet has grown to include more than a billion users worldwide and has empowered ordinary citizens to become engaged, active and highly influential participants in democracy, instead of passive consumers of campaign rhetoric.

These empowered citizens made the difference in the November elections by producing compelling content and distributing it to hundreds of thousands of voters across the country -- almost always without the candidates' consent.

Blogs, YouTube, instant messaging and more played a critical role in many races. YouTube had a direct impact in two of the tight races that decided control of the Senate: Republican incumbent Conrad Burns vs. Democrat Jon Tester in Montana and GOP incumbent George Allen vs. Democrat James Webb in Virginia.

What type of impact? Search "Conrad Burns" on YouTube.com and you get more than 130 videos, most of them unflattering. The most popular is "Conrad Burns' Naptime," set to "Happy Trails." No fancy production values here -- just a straight-on camera shot of the senator falling asleep during a congressional hearing important to Montana. That video alone received more than 100,000 views.

Dozens of other anti-Burns videos, detailing such things as "pay-to-play" allegations and key gaffes, were seen by many thousands of viewers. In a race that was lost by about 3,000 votes, those YouTube creations had an impact. They may well have pushed Tester across the finish line first.

In Virginia, Allen, who lost by 9,000 or so votes, was the subject of more than 400 videos, 75 of which featured damaging remarks he made at a rally to an Indian American videographer working for Webb. Naturally, video of this "macaca" gaffe almost immediately found its way onto YouTube and the computer screens of people across the country, not to mention into headlines. The top video had nearly 300,000 views, while another, "Allen Staffer Attacks Man," had more than 180,000. Again, when the vote is that close, every impression can make a difference.

The immediate, viral nature of the Internet hurls these missteps onto the all-news networks and out to the world with such velocity that it outpaces a campaign's ability to do damage control. An official campaign response in some morning paper is often immediately undermined by additional discoveries that are researched, posted and disseminated by dozens of partisan bloggers who can have hundreds of thousands of daily visitors to their Web sites.

Instant messaging, another technology not widely available in 1994, brought us the graphic details of inappropriate chats between Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and male congressional pages. For many voters, these IMs personalized a growing list of morally corrupt members of Congress, stoking outrage nationally. And despite immediately resigning and checking himself into a rehab facility, Foley "starred" in more than 450 YouTube videos.

In modern American political history, perhaps only the coming of the television age has had as big an impact on our national elections as the Internet has. But the effect of the Internet may be better for the long-term health of our democracy. For while TV emphasizes perception, control and centralization, Internet-driven politics is about transparency, distribution of effort and, most important, empowerment and participation -- at whatever level of engagement the consumer wants.

It's unclear what the impact of technology on elections will be over the next 12 years. But one lesson should already be clear to politicians: In a world where cellphones are cameras and video recorders, every word that you utter (or text), and every nap you take, can and will be used against you on YouTube.

The writer is chief executive of the software firm ObjectVideo and co-owner of the Washington Capitals.

DOJ_NMG_0105330

Anti-Americans On The March (WSJ)

By Andrew Higgins

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

AYTAROUN, LEBANON -- Ibrahim Sayid was raised a Muslim, but he put his faith in class struggle, not Allah. He joined the Lebanese Communist Party at the age of 16. As a medical student in the Soviet Union in the 1980s, he cursed Mikhail Gorbachev as a "traitor" for jettisoning Marxism.

Today, back in his home village just a few hundred yards from Israel, Dr. Sayid, 44, still has little time for Islam. He is married to a Christian and shuns the local mosque, badly damaged when Israeli troops stormed into Lebanon this summer.

Instead of communism, he has embraced a new cause: Hezbollah, the militia and social movement rooted in Shiite Islam. The Party of God, as it is translated into English, is led by turbaned clerics and aided by the Islamic Republic of Iran, which has ruthlessly persecuted communists.

"We all have the same goals," explains Dr. Sayid, who now works in a Hezbollah clinic. The first of these goals is "resistance" against Israel, which during the summer war battled Hezbollah militiamen just outside Dr. Sayid's village. He says resistance also has a broader target: America, its allies in the Arab world and beyond, and global capitalism.

When the Cold War ended a decade and a half ago with the collapse of the Soviet Union, Mr. Sayid and others like him around the world mourned the apparent triumph of U.S. military, economic and ideological might. Many Americans rejoiced, with some embracing the theory that the demise of Marxism marked "the end of history," a period when ideological conflicts would give way to a world united in acceptance of a model typified by the U.S.

Al Qaeda's attacks on New York and Washington in September 2001 didn't fundamentally alter this conviction. Political Islam was seen as a grave threat but seemed limited in its appeal by its dependence on religious zeal. Such assumptions are now under strain as secular rebels, antiglobalization militants and other strains of revolt rally to the banner of "resistance" offered by Islamist groups such as Hezbollah.

Religion, excoriated by Karl Marx as the "opiate of the masses," has become a great mobilizing force -- even for zealous atheists. The phenomenon extends beyond the Middle East to Europe, Latin America and Africa, too. Causes that a few years ago seemed moribund or at least passé -- socialism, Third World solidarity, strident anti-Americanism -- have been injected with the fervor, though rarely the actual faith, of Islamic radicalism.

FELLOW TRAVELERS

Western leftists, rightists and secularists have had a long and checkered relationship with Islamists. See a timeline2 of historical highlights.

"We are all here to fight American hegemony," Naim Qassem, Hezbollah's deputy chief, told hundreds of secular activists from around the world who gathered last month in a Beirut conference center. They were there to celebrate his Islamic movement's "divine victory" over Israel this summer and cheer a broader battle against America's vision for the world. Mr. Qassem was dressed in flowing robes and a cleric's turban. Many in his audience wore T-shirts or badges featuring portraits of Che Guevara, clenched fists and other emblems of secular radical chic.

Adding to its revolutionary cachet, Hezbollah is now battling to oust Lebanon's pro-American government. Along with assorted allies, the Islamist group staged a huge peaceful rally in central Beirut Dec. 1 and is the driving force behind a mass sit-in near the offices of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, a pro-business former banker. The protesters, encamped in tents for a week now, vow to stay until the government falls. Stoking fears the showdown may spiral into serious violence, Hezbollah has called for another mass demonstration Sunday.

Some of Hezbollah's biggest fans are in Europe. There, the hard left, demoralized by the collapse of communism, has found new energy, siding with Islamist militants in Lebanon, in Iraq and in a wider campaign against what they see as an American plot to impose unrestrained free-market capitalism.

"We are all Hezbollah now," read posters carried through London this summer during an antiwar protest march. Earlier, London Mayor Ken Livingston, once known as "Red Ken," invited a controversial Egyptian cleric to the British capital, arguing that his views have been distorted by the West.

In deeply Roman Catholic Latin America, Hugo Chávez of Venezuela has become the exemplar of a new populism that sees common cause with Iran and Hezbollah. Mr. Chávez, re-elected in a landslide last Sunday, has met Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad several times and this summer was given the Islamic Republic Medal, Iran's highest honor. Amid the rubble of Beirut's southern suburbs, a Hezbollah stronghold, portraits of Mr. Chávez now hang alongside pictures of Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah. Hezbollah put them up after Mr. Chávez denounced President Bush as the devil in a September speech to the UN. "Gracias Chávez," they say.

DOJ_NMG_0105331

Africa, too, is boarding the bandwagon. A summit of the 53-nation African Union this summer in Gambia featured two special guests: Mr. Chavez and Mr. Ahmadinejad. Back in Tehran, Mr. Ahmadinejad in November hosted Zimbabwe's authoritarian Prime Minister Robert Mugabe, an erstwhile devotee of Mao Zedong. Fulminating against President Bush and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, Mr. Mugabe said likeminded countries must "fight against these evil men and their evil systems."

In the U.S., the principal target for both Islamist and leftist anger, there has been little sign of any ideological realignment of the kind seen elsewhere. The anti-American movement overseas poses scant immediate threat to U.S. pre-eminence. Still, it could complicate American diplomacy, particularly in the Middle East, where the Iraq Study Group and others are urging Washington to reach out to Iran and Syria, both vocal foes. It also risks emboldening America's many critics in Europe and Latin America, aggravating friction on a host of issues from the Israel-Palestine dispute to trade.

With America's reputation badly blemished across much of the globe, widespread anger at Washington's foreign policy is fusing with local grievances in an unstable mix of discontent. The result is a motley assemblage rife with contradictions and competing agendas. The Islamist-led protest movement has none of the central organization once provided by the Comintern, the body set up by Vladimir Lenin to coordinate global communism. Nonetheless, it is giving voice and a sense of common cause to those opposed to America's plans.

Leading the way in embracing it are mostly fringe groups with names redolent of the 1960s: The Global Peace and Justice Coalition, The Socialist Workers Party, The League for the Fifth International. While such outfits are quirky, they "magnify trends in the mainstream," says Nick Cohen, a British writer who is publishing a book next year about the alliance between Islamists and leftists, "What's Left?" Karl Marx, he says, would be horrified.

"The sight of Godless communists in alliance with Islamo-fascists is one of the wonders of the modern world," Mr. Cohen says.

Mainstream left-of-center parties still generally shun Islamists but chunks of their support base don't. Mr. Blair in Britain, for example, has come under fire within his own Labour Party for supporting President Bush's troubled Middle East policy, which critics say demonizes Islamist groups. In Spain, the socialist prime minister, José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, has reached out to Muslims, propounding what he calls "an alliance of civilizations" and voicing sympathy for Hamas and Hezbollah. He has good relations with Mr. Chávez, Fidel Castro of Cuba and Bolivia's populist leader, Evo Morales.

At the Beirut conference last month, a Mexican Marxist denounced America for "colonizing" New Mexico. A South Korean foe of free trade raged against American beef. A Turk fumed about American military bases. A Frenchman denounced American genetically engineered foods and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. There were even a few Americans. One thundered against big business, another against the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

A big part of Hezbollah's appeal is simply that, unlike other tarnished icons of revolt, it can point to successes. It has defied Israel's military, by far the region's most powerful. It prodded Israel to end its 18-year occupation of southern Lebanon in 2000 and unexpectedly bloodied Israeli troops in clashes this summer.

Hezbollah shows that "resistance," whether fuelled by religion or secular zeal, "can break governments and roll back the American project," says John Rees, a former editor of the journal International Socialism and a leader of Britain's anti-Iraq war movement. Hezbollah, he says, isn't a terrorist outfit but a social movement seeking better living conditions for its supporters. "It is better to think of it as an AFL-CIO with guns," he says.

An American who traveled to Beirut in November to cheer Hezbollah, who identified himself as Bill Cecil, summed up the appeal of Islamism to non-Muslims: "Your enemy is our enemy; your victory is our victory," he told a conference. Mr. Cecil, an activist for a radical group in New York, later appeared as a guest on the breakfast show of Hezbollah's television station, al-Manar. America, he told a veiled female presenter, is "not a democracy ... but a dictatorship of giant corporations." America "needs a government that provides for the people like Hezbollah helps people here."

Nowhere is the Islamist-leftist axis more potent than in Lebanon. The three-day Beirut jamboree, which featured fiery anti-American oratory and field trips to buildings bombed by Israel, was hosted jointly by Hezbollah and the Lebanese Communist Party, once-bitter enemies now united by what they proclaim as common goals.

Sitting beneath a portrait of Argentine revolutionary Che Guevara in his Beirut office, Khaled Hadadeh, the general secretary of the Lebanese communists, admits that Hezbollah and the Communist Party hated each other for years. "We started out in blood," says Mr. Hadadeh, a Sunni Muslim by birth but now a firm atheist. Che Guevara, he says, "is our symbol, like Jesus Christ or Mohammed."

Hostility to Israel and the U.S. now trumps past differences. The Communist Party disbanded its own armed wing at the end of Lebanon's civil war in 1990, but 12 of its members died fighting alongside Hezbollah this summer, Mr. Hadadeh says. Piled in the corner of his office are trophies of this summer's war: an Israeli army helmet, an Israeli rifle and a Hebrew newspaper.

DOJ_NMG_0105332

Mr. Hadadeh says he has met Mr. Nasrallah 15 times and admires him greatly. At their most recent meeting in a secret location this fall, he says, they discussed not just the recent war with Israel but also the need to develop "a counter-project to the neo-liberal model," the free-market policies backed by Washington.

Responsible for working out what this might mean is Ali Fayad, a political science lecturer and head of Hezbollah's in-house think-tank, the Consultative Center for Studies and Documentation. Mr. Fayad, who joined Hezbollah in the 1980s while still a student, now sits on the politburo of an organization that mimics the rigidly hierarchical structure of the Soviet Communist Party. Israeli bombs destroyed Mr. Fayad's offices, so his center now works from new premises in a half-built apartment block. Well-versed in Western economic and political theory, he runs a staff of more than a dozen researchers and has led the militant group's outreach to foreign supporters.

Part of Hezbollah's appeal lies in its tactical flexibility. Unlike many Sunni Muslim radical groups such as al Qaeda, which denounce non-Muslims and even many fellow Muslims as heretics who must be shunned or punished, Hezbollah's Shiite leadership doesn't care if its allies include atheists, Mr. Fayad says. "That is their problem not ours," he says, so long as "we have the same political position."

The friction between the two branches of Islam surfaced at the recent Beirut meeting. A Sunni Muslim from Jordan had to be ejected from the hall after he started cursing Iran -- Hezbollah's main sponsor -- for aiding Shiite militias in Iraq. Hezbollah's foreign fans watched in dismay as Shiite and Sunni attendees screamed at each other.

Despite such volatile tensions, Mr. Fayad still sees Islam derailing America's ambitions. Hezbollah's success in Lebanon, the debacle in Iraq and the victories of populist anti-American politicians in Latin America, he says, show that "it is now the end of 'the end of history.' " A recent article by Richard Haass, former director of policy planning at the U.S. State Department, has strengthened his conviction that America is in retreat, Mr. Fayed says. Writing in the U.S. foreign-policy journal Foreign Affairs, Mr. Haass declares that America's post-Cold War hopes for the Middle East have failed and that the region's "American era...has ended." Mr. Fayad is in no doubt about what comes next: "It is an Islamic era in the Middle East."

Among those grappling with this new perception of reality is Joseph Samaha, a secular Christian, former radical socialist and one of Lebanon's most-thoughtful intellectuals. Over the summer he became editor in chief of Al Akhbar, a new newspaper sympathetic to Hezbollah. He scoffs at Westerners who cheer radical Islam as "naïve." But he concedes that Islamists now represent the only viable alternative to corrupt, authoritarian regimes in Egypt, Saudi Arabia and elsewhere. "It is sad, but it is like that," he says.

The ideological reshuffling marks a curious reprise: Russia's early Bolshevik leaders, many of them Jewish, worked hard to cultivate Muslims, seeing them as a useful ally against Britain and other European colonial powers then ruling over large Muslim populations, notably in India and Indonesia. The alliance led to doctrinal gymnastics as Soviet theorists sought to reconcile atheism with the Quran. Some even argued that the Prophet Mohammed was a precursor of Karl Marx.

For much of the 20th century, however, the left and Islam were bitter enemies. Spain's right-wing dictator, Gen. Francisco Franco, recruited Moroccan Muslims to fight Soviet-backed foes in the Spanish Civil War in the 1930s. In 1962, Saudi Arabia, worried by Egypt's tilt toward Moscow, created the Muslim World League to rally Islam against communism. Three years later, Islamic groups in Indonesia joined in an army-led mass slaughter of communists. Anticommunist fervor reached its peak in the 1980s, when thousands of Muslims flocked to Afghanistan to battle the Soviet occupiers.

Much the same enmity existed in Lebanon. When Dr. Sayid, the surgeon, first joined the Lebanese Communist Party in the late 1970s, Mr. Nasrallah, now Hezbollah's leader, also was getting into politics -- partly out of disgust at the spread of atheistic communism.

In an autobiographical account of his early years published in an Iranian newspaper, Mr. Nasrallah recounts how his own village was "turning into an area for the activity of intellectuals, Marxists and especially supporters of the Lebanese Communist Party." He left the village and joined a group called Amal, a Shiite organization.

Iran's Islamic revolution of February 1979 and the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan at the end of that year soured communist-Islamist relations further, provoking often-bloody clashes in Lebanon and elsewhere.

Iran's new Islamic government launched a brutal crackdown on the Soviet-backed Tudeh party, a leftist group that had helped topple the American-backed Shah. And Iran sent Revolutionary Guard zealots to Lebanon to help set up Hezbollah and injected the new group with their own fierce enmity to atheism and communism.

Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 accelerated the rise of Islamist groups. It uprooted Yasser Arafat's secular Palestine Liberation Organization, which had bases in Lebanon, and left Hezbollah as the main force of "resistance."

Dr. Sayid moved to Minsk in the then-Soviet republic of Belarus to study medicine. He says he went there as a true believer and was appalled when Mr. Gorbachev began his program of "perestroika," or economic restructuring, and the Soviet system started to unravel. The reforms, he says, were a "counter-revolution."

DOJ_NMG_0105333

In Lebanon, meanwhile, a vicious civil war raged. Moscow put its weight behind the nominally socialist and mostly secular forces of Walid Jumblatt, leader of the country's small Druze sect, an offshoot of Islam. In Dr. Sayid's village and other areas of southern Lebanon, previously strong support for the Lebanese Communist Party wilted as Hezbollah became the dominant force. Hezbollah's reputation was boosted by its fierce resistance to Israel and its provision of medical care and other services.

In its first public manifesto issued in 1985, Hezbollah declared itself hostile to "both the USSR and the U.S., both capitalism and communism, for both are incapable of laying the foundations for a just society." Though focused on the struggle with Israel, the manifesto also sought a wider audience, addressed to "all the Oppressed of Lebanon and the World." Eventually the Lebanese Communists began cooperating with Hezbollah, attracted mainly by its power but also finding common cause in its emphasis on championing the poor.

Amid the unraveling of the Soviet Union, few outside Lebanon paid much attention to the global pretensions of Hezbollah. Then came the al Qaeda attacks on America of 2001. Washington, traumatized, launched a "war on terror" against what it viewed as a small group of homicidal religious zealots.

As anger at the U.S. mounted in 2003 ahead of the invasion in Iraq, the snowballing antiwar movement took on a curious aspect, particularly in Europe: an alliance of forces that previously loathed each other.

Mr. Rees, the British radical who attended last month's Beirut conference, played a big role, allying his own organization, the Socialist Workers Party, with the Muslim Association of Britain, a group that says it wants to bridge Muslim and non-Muslim communities yet is accused by critics of siding with radical Islamic groups. The two organizations spearheaded the antiwar campaign in Britain. Today, Mr. Rees says he has reservations about some of his Islamic allies' views, particularly those regarding women and homosexuals.

"If there were a level playing field, I might choose different allies," he says. But he says America's own policies left him with no choice: "I find myself on the same side as Hezbollah, as Chávez. I didn't choose them. America did."

At a big Islamic festival this summer supported by London's mayor, Mr. Livingston, Islamist activists and left-wing politicians declared their solidarity. "Muslims and the left must and can come together, because we face the same enemies -- imperialism, colonialism and racism," said Redmond O'Neill, a senior aide to Mr. Livingston.

In Aytaroun, the Lebanese village near the border with Israel, Dr. Sayid, the Soviet-trained physician, has abandoned the socialist dreams of his youth. Communism, he concedes, "is not going to take root in this soil."

He has quit the Communist Party and now serves Hezbollah, working at a Hezbollah hospital bedecked with Islamic inscriptions and portraits of Iranian ayatollahs. When the war started this summer, his wife, an Orthodox Christian from Belarus, and three children left for her homeland. Dr. Sayid stayed behind to treat the injured, including Hezbollah fighters.

On a recent afternoon, Dr. Sayid sat with a group of Hezbollah activists in the office of the local mayor, also of Hezbollah. The mayor was wounded in the leg during the war and Mr. Sayid has been treating him.

One of the group showed off pictures of Hezbollah's "divine victory" -- an Israeli tank on its side, an Israeli warship in flames. Dr. Sayid says he is "not fully in agreement" with Hezbollah. But he believes it can succeed where communism failed. "It is strong. People support it." Hezbollah, he says, "shows the world America is wrong."

Rice: 'Freedom Deficit' Harming Mideast (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, December 9, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday a lack of democracy — a "freedom deficit" — is the core problem in the Middle East.

But Rice also said despite a divide between moderates and extremists in the area, she thinks the Bush administration can begin to deliver on its promise of a Palestinian state living in peace alongside Israel.

"No American president has ever dared to say it as a matter of policy," Rice said of President Bush's declaration in 2002 that he would support creation of a Palestinian state.

At a joint news conference with visiting German Foreign Minister Franz-Walter Steinmeier, Rice made it clear the administration would continue to focus on spreading demcoracy and steering clear of extremists while pursuing an Arab-Israeli settlement.

While Amr Moussa, the secretary-general of the Arab League, called on the United States on Thursday to resume the role of "honest broker" between Israel and the Palestinians, Steinmeier stressed peacemaking was a joint effort of the so-called Quartet — the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

Having visited the region recently, the German foreign minister said Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "seem to have an interest in taking further steps."

DOJ_NMG_0105334

And Rice, similarly, said "the Israeli-Palestinian issue is one that has now, perhaps, an opportunity to move the process forward."

She said it was important to get it right in the troubled area.

"The Middle East has suffered for 60 years from a freedom deficit," she said. "It has suffered from the absence of legimitate channels for political expression."

On Thursday, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said Rice intends to devote a lot of time on the Middle East and would make a trip to the region early next year to try to promote Mideast peacemaking.

She plans to meet on Saturday with visiting Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who told the Saban Center, a private group that promotes Mideast amity, that "a normal, functioning Palestinian state is not only in the Palestinians' interest but in Israel's."

However, Livni said in a dinner speech, "We have to prevent a future Palestinian state from being a terorrist state" and that Israel could not allow Palestinian refugees to return to the Jewish homeland.

Livni said Israel must strengthen the hand of moderates, such as Abbas, and that the struggle in the region is not between Israel and Arabs but between moderates and extremists.

McCormack said Thursday the absence of a Palestinian partner for Israel to deal with remains a roadblock to a solution. He referred to Hamas, the Palestinian militia with whom Israel and the United States refuse to negotiate.

On Friday, on a visit to Iran, Ismail Haniyeh, the Palestinian prime minister and Hamas leader in Gaza, vowed the Hamas-led Palestinian government will never recognize Israel and will fight for Jerusalem.

Israeli FM Rejects Linking Palestinian Conflict To Wider Mideast Crises (AFP)

AFP, December 9, 2006

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has rejected suggestions by influential US policymakers that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict lies at the heart of a broader Middle East crisis.

Addressing a gathering of current and former US officials, Livni said Middle East tensions were fueled more by ideology than territory and that moderate Arab leaders had confided privately to her that the greatest threat they faced today was Iranian-backed extremism.

"There is an opportunity to find new alliances in the region" based on a common battle against these radicals, said Livni, who is also Israel's deputy prime minister.

Livni flew into Washington Friday to address the opening dinner of the third annual Saban Forum, a two day meeting of current and former US and Israeli policymakers organised by the Brookings Institution, an influential Washington think tank.

She was scheduled hold informal talks on Saturday with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice before heading back to Israel, an Israeli official said.

Her visit coincides with a major review of Middle East policy by the administration of President George W. Bush prompted by the worsening chaos in Iraq and the recent election setback for his Republican party.

A key element of the policy review was a report issued this week by a high-level bipartisan study group which told Bush that efforts to stabilize Iraq and eventually begin withdrawing the 140,000 US troops mired in the country had to include a new drive to break the deadlock in Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts.

The group, co-chaired by former Republican secretary of state James Baker, argued that Arab and Muslim frustration over the lack of progress towards creating an independent state for the Palestinian people was fueling Islamic extremism across the region and beyond.

Livni rejected the linkage.

"There is a common and mistaken assumption that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the core of the problems in the Middle East," Livni said. "This is wrong."

"The conflict in the Middle East is a consequence of, not a cause of, radicalism and terrorism," she told the group, which included the State Department's top Middle East official, David Welch, and several of his predecessors as well as members of Congress and other prominent policymakers.

Livni described the main threat in the region as the radical regime in Iran, whose goal, she said, is to export its radical brand of Shia Islam across the region.

"I don't think there is anyone who thinks that if we can solve the Israeli-Palestinian problem, it will change Iran and they will put their ideological vision aside and live in a tranquil Middle East," she said.

Livni said the Palestinian Shiite movement Hamas, which won control of the Palestinian government in elections early this year and has been thwarting efforts by moderate Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas to resume negotiations with Israel, shared the same ideological goals.

DOJ_NMG_0105335

"The real conflict in the region is no longer the Arab-Jewish conflict, but the conflict between moderates and extremists," she said.

The Israeli diplomat said she had heard the same message in private from moderate Arab leaders concerned at the growing influence of Iran and the dangers Shiite radicalism posed to their Sunni dominated countries.

"This is something they are willing to express behind closed doors, but unfortunately they are not willing to express it publicly" for fear of a public backlash, she said.

Europeans Limit Scope Of Iran Nuclear Resolution (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 8 — Europeans produced a revised draft of a Security Council resolution on Iran on Friday, and said they would formally introduce it on Monday in the hope of obtaining a speedy vote on much-delayed action to curb Tehran's nuclear program.

The text was drawn up after weeks of meetings in European capitals among the three nations drafting the measure, Britain, France and Germany, in consultation with the United States. It is aimed at meeting persistent objections from China and Russia.

The revised language narrows the scope of prohibition and punishment to activities that are clearly associated with making a nuclear weapon. Iran has argued that it is pursuing nuclear power for peaceful purposes, while the United States and the Europeans have contended that Iran's real purpose is to build bombs.

It also removes restrictions in earlier drafts on the construction, supplying and operation of an $800 million light-water reactor that Russia is building at Bushehr in southern Iran.

Iran ignored an Aug. 31 United Nations deadline to suspend uranium enrichment, which can produce fuel for both nuclear plants and weapons. Since then, the United States and the Europeans have been pressing for sanctions, but China and Russia have stalled action, saying broad punishment would be counterproductive.

Iran has said that a sanctions resolution would be a threat to its national security. The proposed sanctions still include travel restrictions, an asset freeze and bans on providing nuclear program goods, but in the new text they are now more focused on people and material linked to suspected weapons-building activities.

"The new text has two goals," said one European diplomat involved in its preparation. "First, to keep it firm — I think it is a strong text — and at the same time to have the Chinese and Russians on board."

A second European diplomat was asked whether the Europeans planned to drive the matter to a vote, even if China and Russia, both veto-bearing permanent members, continued to object or threatened to abstain. "The intention and the wish is to remain unified and get this agreed," he said. "But it is three months since Iran ignored the deadline, and we are not saying unanimity at any price."

Neither diplomat would speak on the record before the text was officially presented to the members of the Council. In Washington, Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said that he sensed that the differences over the resolution "were starting to narrow."

Fresh Drive For Sanctions On Iran (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

France, Germany and the UK on Friday launched a new United Nations drive to impose sanctions on Iran, calling all countries to prevent the supply of goods that could help its nuclear enrichment and reprocessing programmes, or the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems.

European diplomats said a draft Security Council resolution, circulated to ambassadors late on Friday, represented a conceptual reversal from earlier proposals that had called for a blanket ban on nuclear-related goods unless specifically exempted.

To meet Russian concerns, the new approach was to specify "proliferation-sensitive" materials that are not allowed, with the implication that less sensitive nuclear trade, such as Russian support for Iran's Bushehr reactor, could continue.

A European diplomat said the text had been developed "in close consultation with the US, Russians and Chinese", and that "it reflects the facts that we have listened very carefully to what the Russians and Chinese have been saying".

The text will be formally introduced to the Security Council on Monday, followed by a meeting between the three European members, the US, Russia and China.

European diplomats say they hope for a decision before Christmas.

DOJ_NMG_0105336

Sean McCormack, a spokesman US state department, said: “The sense is that any differences . . . over the text of the resolution are starting to narrow. We remain hopeful that, in the near future, we will be able to get a resolution that everybody can vote for.”

But Iran’s foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, said this week that any sanctions would be considered “a threat to our national interests and security”.

The proposal also calls for a travel ban and financial freeze on people engaged in nuclear proliferation, and for countries to “exercise vigilance and prevent specialised teaching” of Iranian nationals in disciplines that could help Iran develop a military nuclear capability.

It says if Iran suspends its activities and complies with International Atomic Energy Agency requirements, a “diplomatic, negotiated solution that guarantees Iran’s nuclear programme is for exclusively peaceful purpose” could follow.

U.S. Hints Iran Sanctions Deal Is Near (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 9, 2006

The United States suggested Friday that a deal on imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran is near despite a disappointing round of talks among world powers earlier this week.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack also indicated the United States does not have unlimited patience for what have already been drawn-out negotiations among the U.N. Security Council's permanent members and Germany over Tehran's nuclear program.

"The sense is that any differences ... over the text of the resolution are starting to narrow," McCormack said. "We remain hopeful that, in the near future we will be able to get a resolution that everybody can vote for — that we will be able to maintain unity on the Security Council."

The U.S. and Europeans are pushing for a resolution by the end of the year. The West accuses Iran of hiding plans to build a bomb while developing what it claims is a peaceful program to produce nuclear power.

Iran was on the agenda for a meeting between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Russian national security adviser Igor Ivanov, whose nation has resisted strong sanctions for months. Rice was discussing strategy on Iran later Friday with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier.

Germany, France and Britain led failed talks with Iran last year that European powers had hoped would avert U.N. sanctions. Europe joined the United States in seeking sanctions early this year, but the process has bogged down repeatedly over objections from Russia and China. Both nations are permanent, veto-holding members of the U.N. Security Council that have trade and other ties to Iran.

McCormack described a sanctions resolution with broad support as "the optimal solution."

"We would certainly want that in the best case, but it is also time to start working toward a vote," McCormack said.

On Wednesday, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy predicted that Iran will face U.N. sanctions for refusing to halt its nuclear program but said major world powers remain divided over their extent.

"The question is about the scope of sanctions but there will be sanctions," he said on RTL radio.

His ministry said Tuesday that closed-door talks in Paris had made "substantive progress" but failed to reach an accord on a resolution to punish Iran for defying demands that it cease enriching uranium.

Iran's hard-line president threatened to downgrade relations with the 25-nation European Union if tough sanctions emerged from the talks among diplomats from the permanent Security Council members — the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia — as well as Germany and the EU.

After months of diplomatic wrangling, the United States and France had hoped Tuesday's talks would produce a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran for defying an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to halt enrichment. Western powers accuse Iran of seeking nuclear bombs, while Tehran insists it only wants civilian nuclear energy.

European diplomats said Russia made some concessions at Tuesday's talks, agreeing to a measure prohibiting financial transfers to some Iranians linked to nuclear or ballistic missile programs.

Russia still opposes the broader asset freeze that Britain, France and Germany proposed in a draft U.N. resolution presented in October.

Europeans Circulate Revised Iran Draft (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105337

In a fresh bid to win Russian and Chinese support, key European nations circulated a revised U.N. resolution Friday narrowing sanctions on Iran for refusing to suspend uranium enrichment and urging negotiations to resolve the standoff over its nuclear ambitions.

The new draft still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs, but it spells out in much greater detail exactly what items are prohibited. Russia and China — both veto-wielding members of the U.N. Security Council — had complained that the proposed sanctions in the original draft were too broad.

But the new draft keeps a travel ban and asset freeze on companies, individuals and organizations involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs, which Russia opposes.

Britain, France and Germany — who have led negotiations trying to rein in Iran's nuclear program — have been at odds with Russia and China for weeks over the scope of the sanctions. The United States has generally supported the Europeans, though it initially wanted a tougher text.

Russia proposed major changes to the original European text including limiting sanctions solely to measures that would keep Iran from developing nuclear weapons and missiles. Russia's proposed changes also eliminated any travel ban, asset freeze or mention of the nuclear facility being built by the Russians at Bushehr, Iran.

The new European draft drops all mention of Bushehr, which is projected to go on line in late 2007 and would be Iran's first atomic power plant.

But it keeps a range of sanctions and still would limit technical assistance to Iran by the International Atomic Energy Agency and urge countries to prevent Iranian students from studying nuclear-related disciplines.

Whether the new draft goes far enough to meet Russia's concerns remains to be seen. At a meeting in Paris on Tuesday, political directors from the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany failed to reach agreement though they reported "substantive progress."

Council diplomats said ambassadors from the six countries were expected to discuss the new draft early next week, possibly Monday.

Iran maintains its nuclear program is purely peaceful, aimed solely at producing nuclear energy, but the U.S. and the Europeans believe Tehran's enrichment activities are ultimately aimed at producing nuclear weapons.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed Tuesday to continue the nuclear program, and issued a new threat to downgrade relations with the European Union — Iran's largest trading partner — if European negotiators opted for tough sanctions.

Both Russia and China, which have major commercial ties with Iran, have continued to publicly push for dialogue instead of U.N. punishment, despite the collapse in October of an EU attempt to entice Iran into talks.

The new European draft emphasizes "the importance of political and diplomatic efforts to find a negotiated solution guaranteeing that Iran's nuclear program is exclusively for peaceful purposes."

It also encourages Iran "to engage" with the proposals put forward by the six countries in June. Their package offered economic incentives and political rewards if Iran agreed to consider a long-term moratorium on uranium enrichment and commit to a freeze on enrichment before talks on its nuclear program.

The European draft makes clear that Iran must "without further delay suspend proliferation sensitive nuclear activities" — specifically all enrichment and reprocessing including research and development, and construction of a research reactor moderated by heavy water.

It also increases pressure on Iran to fulfill requirements set by the IAEA board and would expand the powers of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency to monitor Iran's nuclear program, which diplomats said Russia views as a "provocation" to Iran.

Council Given New Draft Over Iran (BBC)

BBC.com, December 8, 2006

France, Germany and the UK have drawn up a new draft of a proposed United Nations Security Council resolution aiming to curb Iran's nuclear efforts.

The draft details which materials Iran would be banned from acquiring under possible Security Council sanctions.

It also threatens Iran with unspecified actions if it does not suspend its enrichment of uranium, but is narrower in scope than previous drafts.

Russia and China both said early drafts were too restrictive on Tehran.

Earlier this week talks in Paris between diplomats from the five permanent UN Security Council members and Germany ended with no agreement.

But diplomats, including US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, have suggested that negotiations are making progress.

DOJ_NMG_0105338

The new draft still would ban the supply of materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

But it spells out in much greater detail exactly what items are prohibited.

It is said to retain a travel ban and the freezing of assets of individuals, companies and organizations involved with the Iranian programmes, a measure that was opposed by Russia.

Both Russia and China have direct financial concerns in Iran.

Russia is building a nuclear power station in the country and China has significant oil interests in Iran.

However, European diplomats hope to put this resolution to a vote by Christmas.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has threatened to reconsider relations with those countries who support sanctions.

Lebanese Premier Lashes Out At Hezbollah Leader (NYT)

By Nada Bakri, Michael Slackman

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Dec. 8 — Lebanon's prime minister, Fouad Siniora, lashed out Friday at Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, in a deeply personal attack in which he dismissed the sheik's political ultimatums for more power, saying, "You are not our Lord and your party is not our Lord."

The prime minister's decision to go head to head with Sheik Nasrallah in a televised address was a risky strategy for Mr. Siniora, whose local and regional standing is nowhere near the outsized image that the Hezbollah leader enjoys. But it also reflected how Lebanon's political crisis had spread beyond the bounds of political differences and entered the highly combustible realm of personal animosities between leaders.

A day earlier, Sheik Nasrallah appeared in a live video feed on two large screens before thousands of protesters camped out in downtown Beirut, vowing to press on with street protests that have paralyzed the government and the capital city for more than a week. He threatened that if the governing coalition did not soon meet his demand to form what he called a national unity government — in which Hezbollah's alliance would have veto power over all decisions — he would force the collapse of the existing government, call for early parliamentary elections and select a new prime minister from among Hezbollah's allies.

"Sayed Nasrallah's speech was not aptly chosen," Mr. Siniora said in response on Friday, using a title that indicates that Sheik Nasrallah is a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad. "He was trying to stage a coup d'état, or at least threaten to make one."

In striking back, the prime minister challenged the credibility of Sheik Nasrallah and Hezbollah — or the Party of God — a strategy that would have been unheard of in the early days after the war with Israel, from which Hezbollah emerged emboldened and declared "divine victory." But Lebanon is now divided and angry, and its leaders talk about promoting dialogue — while ratcheting up a heated confrontation.

"His threatening rhetoric does not lead anywhere and is not beneficial for the Lebanese," the prime minister said. "It is one of the things that are making the resistance lose its popularity among Arabs and Muslims."

There are generally two sides in this battle. One, the Hezbollah alliance, backed by Iran and Syria, says that the sitting government is illegitimate because six Hezbollah-aligned ministers resigned. The other side, called the March 14 coalition, is backed by the United States and France, and says that Hezbollah and its allies are trying to stage what amounts to a coup.

Each side has accused the other of being an agent of foreign governments; each has accused the other of seeking one-party rule of Lebanon; each has accused the other of refusing to have a dialogue; each has vowed not to give into the other's demands; and with each day, the sides move further and further away from reconciliation.

Saniora Accuses Nasrallah Of Coup Threat (AP)

By Zeina Karam, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

Prime Minister Fuad Saniora on Friday accused Hezbollah's leader of threatening a coup in an unusually harsh exchange between the two rivals that stoked tensions as the Shiite guerrilla group escalated its attempts to oust the government.

Saniora spoke to hundreds of supporters in his fortified office, where he has lived for more than a week. Outside, pro-Hezbollah demonstrators in a nearby square replayed on loudspeakers a Thursday night speech in which their leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, accused the prime minister of siding with Israel during the July-August war.

The prime minister said Nasrallah "is threatening a coup and his statements carry all the seeds of dissension and threat."

DOJ_NMG_0105339

Saniora criticized the Hezbollah leader for his attitude in the speech, in which he accused the prime minister of being "stubborn" and said members of the government were responsible for the war, which began after Hezbollah seized two Israeli soldiers.

"Who appointed you to say 'I am right and all else is false'?" the prime minister asked.

Saniora, who has received strong Western and Arab support, repeated that Hezbollah's protests, now in their eighth day, would not force his resignation. The pro-Syrian Hezbollah and its opposition allies have called for a huge demonstration Sunday, saying it will mark an escalation in their attempts to oust the U.S.-backed premier.

Hezbollah and its allies began demonstrating after Saniora rejected their demands for a third of the Cabinet's seats — an effective veto.

Six pro-Hezbollah ministers resigned from the Cabinet last month over Saniora's refusal to accept the demand, depriving the government of any Shiite representation.

The political division has taken dangerous sectarian lines, with most Sunni Muslims supporting the Sunni prime minister and Shiites backing Hezbollah. Christian factions are split between the two camps.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak warned Friday the protests could escalate to "very serious confrontations and even lead to the destruction of Lebanon."

"I fear the consequences," Mubarak said in a TV interview on a visit to Paris. "There is also the risk of foreign interference," he added in a veiled reference to Syria and Iran, the sponsors of Hezbollah.

Hezbollah has not said what it plans to do next, but some Lebanese believe it might call for civil disobedience or escalate street protests, disrupting vital utilities such as Beirut airport. So far, however, Nasrallah has stressed that his supporters must demonstrate peacefully.

On Friday, Hezbollah protesters in the square near Saniora's office released red, white and green balloons — the colors of the Lebanese flag — bearing the words "Saniora, out."

Elsewhere in central Beirut, the spiritual leader of Lebanon's Sunnis backed the government and told worshippers Hezbollah's demands would not be met.

"Bringing down the government and prime minister in the street is a red line which we will never allow," Sheik Mohammed Rashid Kabbani said in a sermon at a Sunni mosque.

But another Sunni cleric, Fathi Yakan, who supports Hezbollah, led opposition protesters in prayer in a city square.

"Your sit-in today, with God's help, will defeat the American project," Yakan said, accusing the U.S. of sowing division between Shiites and Sunnis in the Islamic world.

On Thursday, Nasrallah said government officials had asked American envoys to persuade Israel to destroy Hezbollah and claimed that Saniora had ordered the Lebanese army to deprive Hezbollah of weapons.

"Didn't the prime minister of Lebanon work to cut off the supply lines?" Nasrallah asked.

The Lebanese army said Friday that it had received no such orders from the government during the 34-day war, but that troops did confiscate Hezbollah ammunition at one checkpoint.

Hezbollah replied by saying the troops would not have seized the ammunition without a "political decision" and that the army was telling only "half the truth."

Despite the exchange, both leaders have stressed they are willing to negotiate.

"Our hand and heart is open," Saniora said Friday. "We won't dig trenches in Beirut streets, we will build bridges of love among the Lebanese, Christian and Muslim."

Nasrallah and Saniora have welcomed this week's proposal by Lebanon's Maronite Catholic Church to form a new government and hold early presidential elections, saying it could serve as the basis for a settlement.

President Emile Lahoud, a staunch pro-Syrian, has refused to resign. He issued a statement Friday that praised Nasrallah's speech as carrying "responsible and clear positions."

Six-Party Negotiations On N. Korea To Resume (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

Six-nation talks on ending North Korea's nuclear program will begin next Saturday morning in Beijing, two months after Pyongyang defied international pressure and conducted its first nuclear test. Such talks have been stalled for more than a year.

"We're going back," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill said in an interview. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, said China, the host of the talks, will make a formal announcement this weekend. The first session is expected to last a few days, then take a break before Christmas.

DOJ_NMG_0105340

The talks have been stalled in part because of North Korean pique at a U.S. Treasury Department effort to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting. The United States has agreed to set up a working group at the talks to find ways to finalize a Treasury investigation of a Macau bank, provided North Korea takes steps to end its illicit activities.

U.S. officials said all sides have agreed that the talks will seek to implement the joint "statement of principles" issued on Sept. 19, 2005, which was designed to lay out a negotiating road map. That statement, which said North Korea would "abandon" its nuclear programs, is filled with diplomatic ambiguity, with no clear timeline for when the North would give up its programs, or how, or in what sequence. The statement said the steps would take place under the principle of "commitment for commitment, action for action," but now negotiators must agree on which steps will take place first.

In talks with the North Koreans, Hill has indicated a clear sense of urgency in implementing the agreement. Some Asian diplomats reported that he sought a timeline as short as 18 months, before President Bush completes his term. A U.S. official said Hill and the North Koreans have discussed in general terms how long it would take to implement the 2005 statement.

"There was a discussion about getting the September statement done in a reasonable amount of time," he said. "Eighteen months would be included in a definition of 'reasonable,' but there were lots of time frames given out."

The six-party talks, which also include Japan, South Korea and Russia, began in 2003, after North Korea restarted a nuclear reactor in Yongbyon that had been frozen under a 1994 deal and began to extract weapons-grade plutonium from spent fuel rods. The Bush administration cut off heavy-fuel deliveries promised under the deal after it accused Pyongyang of building a clandestine uranium-enrichment program. Since then the six-party talks have generally taken place only intermittently and have generally made little progress.

U.S. officials said Hill, in bilateral talks in Beijing with his North Korean counterpart on Oct. 31 and Nov. 28, did not offer any enhanced humanitarian or economic benefits if Pyongyang agreed to give up its programs. Instead, Hill reiterated long-standing U.S. proposals, such as joining in providing energy assistance, offering security assurances, outlining a path to negotiating a peace treaty to end the Korean War and normalizing relations.

U.S. officials do not expect North Korea to take any visible steps at the start of the talks, such as shutting down its nuclear reactor, but they want to seek evidence that North Korea is committed to speedy implementation of the 2005 statement.

"They have indicated they are interested in an end to what they call the U.S. 'hostile policy,' " Hill said. "We made very clear to them that we don't have a hostile policy to them. We have a hostile policy to their policies, including and especially their nuclear policies."

Asian diplomats said China believes that the stage is set for progress at the talks. Beijing was embarrassed when North Korea, a longtime client state, gave it only two hours' warning of its nuclear test, and Chinese officials have been eager to repair the diplomatic damage.

Many Korea experts, however, increasingly think that North Korea will never give up its nuclear weapons programs, or at least that the price for giving them up has increased significantly. A group of experts recently returned from meetings there and said they believe that Pyongyang is returning to the talks simply to placate China and has little interest in giving up its nuclear programs.

Officials Hail U.S.-India Nuke Fuel Deal (AP)

By Matthew Rosenberg, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 9, 2006

Officials hailed a U.S.-India civilian nuclear cooperation deal approved by the U.S. House of Representatives Friday as the symbol of a broad shift in relations between the two countries. But the deal also highlights some of the limits of the emerging strategic partnership between India and the United States, who have sought to overcome decades of mutual mistrust.

The bill, which allows the shipment of nuclear fuel and know-how to India, now goes to the U.S. Senate and then must be signed by President Bush. U.S. and Indian officials also need to work out a separate technical nuclear cooperation agreement, expected to be finalized next year.

The nuclear deal "is a major, historic step forward for both our countries," U.S. Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns told reporters in New Delhi earlier in the day. It "is the symbolic center of this new strategic partnership between India and the United States."

While the new partnership could further open up a huge market for American companies and give India the energy it needs, it is far more fraught politically. India has long had close ties with countries shunned by the U.S., such as Iran and Myanmar. Washington, meanwhile, is tight with India's biggest rival, Pakistan.

"The two countries will have to sit together and find out how they can promote their respective national interests and work together to promote global peace and security," said Gen. Ashok Mehta, a retired officer and military commentator. "It's not certain they can."

DOJ_NMG_0105341

Those potential differences were highlighted in recent days by India's concerns over language in the bill that would require Bush and his successors to determine if New Delhi was cooperating with American efforts to confront Iran about its nuclear ambitions.

Indian officials say they can live with the weakened, nonbinding language that made it into the final bill.

But many here are rankled by suggestions from Washington that New Delhi should support American policy, be it on Iran or China, with whom India is also seeking closer ties.

"We're a sovereign nation — we don't need Washington to decide what is best for us," said one official who spoke on condition of anonymity because he needs to work with U.S. officials.

The bill carves out an exemption in American law to allow U.S. civilian nuclear trade with India in exchange for Indian safeguards and inspections at its 14 civilian nuclear plants; eight military plants would remain off-limits.

Congressional action was needed because U.S. law bars nuclear trade with countries such as India that have not submitted to full international inspections.

Critics say the cooperation plan, a deal which American officials insist will not be given to any other country, could boost India's nuclear arsenal and spark a nuclear arms race with Pakistan.

The deal "brings about the qualitative change in relations between India and Washington," said Talat Masood, a Pakistani defense analyst. It "will make Pakistan much more insecure."

Economically, the benefits for India and the U.S. could be huge.

Energy, or lack thereof, is the Achilles heel of India's fast growing economy, and officials here are looking to nuclear power as a potential solution.

But India lacks needed supplies of uranium, and the deal will pave the way for India to get access to the international nuclear fuel market, from which it has been excluded because of its refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

U.S. companies are hoping to cash in on the expected boom in nuclear energy in India — estimates for how much the Indian market could be worth range as a high as $100 billion.

Associated Press Writer Munir Ahmed in Islamabad, Pakistan contributed to this report.

Congress Nears Approval Of Nuclear Deal For India (WSJ)

By Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Congress was set to approve a civilian nuclear deal for India late Friday, in a move that could open a torrent of U.S. high-tech trade with the subcontinent.

Both houses of Congress agreed Thursday on language of the bill, which would allow U.S. firms for the first time to sell nuclear technologies to India.

Bush administration officials view it as underpinning an evolving Washington-New Delhi alliance that could help counter China's emergence as a global economic and military power. American companies are set to benefit from potential nuclear-energy deals, worth billions of dollars, and other trade opportunities that are likely to open in the wake of the initiative.

This week, a delegation of more than 200 companies, including about 25 nuclear-oriented companies such as General Electric Co., Bechtel Group Inc. and Westinghouse Electric Co., traveled to New Delhi to learn about India's business regulations and meet with senior Indian officials. Those companies also held discussions with India's principal nuclear energy companies, Nuclear Power Corp. of India and National Thermal Power Corp.

Executives in the delegation said they are attracted to India's skyrocketing demands for energy, which are expected to come from both conventional and nuclear sources. Currently, India has the capacity to produce 3,500 megawatts of power from nuclear reactors, but the government wants to increase this to 60,000 megawatts by 2030.

Many U.S. officials and business executives hope that progress in opening India's energy markets will translate into greater access to other sectors. India's economy grew more than 9% in the first half, and demand for everything from cellular phones to cars is soaring.

"The feedback we're getting is that India is looking forward to the collaboration" with American companies, said Ron Somers, who took part in the delegation as the president of the U.S.-India Business Council. "Across all the sectors of the Indian economy, the opportunities are limitless."

Some critics of the nuclear deal say it could fuel a broader arms race in South Asia and undermine the global system designed to contain the development of nuclear weapons. They are particularly concerned that India's rival, Pakistan, and other Islamic nations could seek to further develop their own nuclear arsenals in response to India's growing capabilities.

"It's an historic mistake," said Massachusetts Democratic Rep. Edward Markey, who fought the bill's passage Friday on the floor of the House. "The consequences, the domino effect, begin here today."

DOJ_NMG_0105342

President Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh agreed at a July 2005 summit in Washington to develop a "strategic partnership" resting heavily on the U.S.'s ability to share nuclear technologies with India. Such actions required the Bush administration to amend decades-old laws that prohibit the U.S. from diverting such technologies to non-signatories of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Despite general bipartisan support for the deal, a number of stumbling blocks emerged in recent months. India wanted strict language that guarantees New Delhi would have alternative sources of nuclear fuel should Washington face limitations as a supplier. U.S. lawmakers sought explicit language in the bill that would guard against New Delhi supporting the nuclear programs of other countries, particularly Iran.

Indian officials voiced satisfaction with the final version, saying it is crucial to helping India meet its energy needs without impinging on New Delhi's sovereignty. "No legislation enacted in a foreign country can take away from the sovereign right to conduct foreign policy determined solely by our national interests," India's Foreign Minister spokesman said in a statement.

If the bill passes, it's likely to be at least another six months before American companies can begin selling nuclear technologies, said officials involved in the India initiative. Washington and New Delhi still need to agree to parameters for the types of technologies to be included. And India must reach a new safeguards agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency, as well as an agreement with the Nuclear Suppliers Group, the global body controlling the trade of nuclear technologies.

House Passes Deal With India On Sale Of Nuclear Reactors (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — The House of Representatives voted overwhelmingly on Friday to cement closer ties between the United States and India, endorsing President Bush's plan to allow American shipments of civilian nuclear reactors and fuel to India over criticisms that the plan could spark a regional arms race.

The landslide vote handed the White House a major victory at a time when the Bush administration's foreign policy is under fire on multiple fronts, and it was another signal that American lawmakers are looking for concrete steps to counter China's growing influence in Asia.

The bill passed 330-59 in the House, and the Senate had yet to vote. The nuclear agreement, which was negotiated in March by President Bush and Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India, would lift a decades-long ban on nuclear sales to India put in place, in part, because of the country's refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

The arrangement requires that the fuel shipments be for civilian use only, yet opponents of the bill said that the deliveries of nuclear fuel would free up India's domestic stocks of nuclear materials for its weapons program.

On Friday, Representative Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who has been one of the most vocal critics of the bill, called the plan a "historic mistake" that will "come back to haunt the United States and the world."

Mr. Markey said that proliferation experts estimate that the new arrangement would allow India to produce as many as 50 nuclear warheads each year.

Congressional negotiators softened a provision that would have required American presidents to certify that India was participating in efforts to halt Iran's burgeoning nuclear program. New Delhi strongly opposed this provision. The bill now merely requires the president to report annually to Congress on what India is doing to end the Iranian program.

Even after President Bush signs the legislation, India must reach a separate agreement on nuclear inspections with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog. The Nuclear Suppliers Group, a coalition of 45 nations that regulates nuclear trade, must also approve the deal.

Congress OKs Nuclear Pact With India (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Reversing three decades of U.S. policies intended to halt the spread of nuclear weapons, Congress early today approved a long-stalled agreement giving India access to American nuclear technology with limited safeguards to discourage possible proliferation.

The House of Representatives passed the measure, 330 to 59, Friday night, and senators voted unanimously in favor of the deal shortly before 3 a.m. President Bush, who finalized the terms of the agreement during a visit to India in March, is expected to sign it quickly.

The pact would lift a U.S. moratorium on nuclear cooperation with a nation that has developed atomic weapons and has not signed the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty of 1970. But Bush and supporters of the agreement argue that it marks a crucial advance in restricting nuclear weapons because it permits international inspectors to examine most of India's civilian nuclear reactors for the first time.

DOJ_NMG_0105343

In addition, they say that opening India's nuclear industry to $100 billion in potential sales from abroad will help cement a relationship with a developing economic power that may also serve as a hedge against the growing clout of China in Asia.

Critics argued that by allowing India's nuclear arsenal to keep growing and keeping some of its facilities off-limits, the pact establishes a double standard and sets conditions under which treaty violations would be tolerated.

"Such a policy unravels years of successful U.S. diplomatic efforts to convince countries that the benefits of surrendering the right to develop nuclear weapons outweighed the risk of staying outside the treaty and pursuing a nuclear weapons option," said retired Army Lt. Gen. Robert G. Gard Jr., a senior military fellow at the Center for Arms Control and Non-Proliferation, a Washington think tank.

The deal now faces at least two additional hurdles. A treaty putting the provisions into effect will require Senate ratification, and the Nuclear Suppliers Group, 45 nations that control exports of nuclear materials, also must approve the pact.

The suppliers group was formed in 1974 after India conducted a nuclear test.

Over months of debate, the measure's proponents were able to turn back fears that the accord would fuel a nuclear arms race in South Asia and that the United States was weakening its hand in seeking to restrict nuclear weapons development in Iran and North Korea.

Though India has been a nuclear power since 1974, its rival, Pakistan, first tested nuclear weapons in 1998.

Pakistan's military said in a statement that it had successfully test-fired a new version of its short-range, nuclear-capable missile today, the Associated Press reported.

Supporters said that rather than fueling arms development, the agreement will promote economic growth in the U.S. and India by easing political tensions and encouraging trade.

"India is a state that should be at the very center of our foreign policy and our attention," Rep. Tom Lantos (D-San Mateo) said in House debate Friday.

Sanjay Puri, chairman of the U.S.-India Political Action Committee, said some estimates had placed the potential economic value of the deal at $30 billion in the United States and India alone, and that it could add 10,000 to 15,000 jobs in the U.S.

Alternatively, the failure of the deal would have "serious repercussions in terms of the political and economic relationship," he said.

The issue of Iran's nuclear ambitions delayed the measure's consideration until the last days of the 109th Congress. Legislators wanted assurances that India would cooperate with U.S. efforts to punish Iran, with sanctions if necessary, for its nuclear program.

But Bush administration officials feared such provisions would alienate India and scuttle the deal.

Ultimately, the two sides agreed on a compromise under which the president would submit reports on India's actions regarding Iran.

Under the agreement passed by Congress, India would be allowed to expand its nuclear weapons arsenal, but for the first time it would allow international inspections of its civilian reactors. However, inspectors would have access only to 14 of 22 reactors. The others, at military installations, would remain off-limits.

At the heart of the debate was the impact the deal would have on the nonproliferation treaty, a cornerstone of U.S. nuclear weapons policy since 1970. The treaty, aimed at preventing nonnuclear nations from acquiring atomic arms, has been signed by more than 180 countries.

Critics of the U.S.-India deal said it would undermine the treaty, encourage violations and lead to the spread of nuclear weapons.

During the debate Friday, Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), who had been among the most vocal opponents, said the U.S. was asking the United Nations to pressure Iran, a signatory to the treaty, "not to use civilian nuclear materials in order to create a military nuclear weapon."

At the same time, he said, India was on the verge of gaining U.S. approval of a nuclear fuel agreement although the Indian government had refused to sign the treaty and had engaged in a subcontinent nuclear arms race.

"We are going to provide the nuclear materials for their civilian nuclear program so that it will free up their domestic nuclear materials for their weapons program," he said.

Markey said that the accord would set off a "nuclear weapons domino effect" by encouraging other nations to ignore the nonproliferation treaty, and that Iran and North Korea would be at the top of the list.

Bush, in addition to focusing on the access inspectors would gain to Indian facilities, has argued that with a population of 1.1 billion and a growing economy, India needs to expand its nuclear energy facilities to lessen its need for conventional fuels.

Growing demand for oil and gas, he says, will put price pressure on the world's limited supplies.

DOJ_NMG_0105344

Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh set the agreement in motion during a meeting in Washington in July 2005, but negotiators were unable to complete it until March.

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns, who is visiting India, said ahead of Congress' approval that the deal would lead to an expansion of joint ventures between the countries and accompany increases in mutual counter-terrorism efforts.

US-India Near End Of Nuclear Freeze (FT)

By Jo Johnson

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

The US and India were last night approaching an important milestone in their journey towards a new strategic partnership, with the US Congress poised to pass legislation to allow Washington to resume the sale of nuclear technology to New Delhi after a gap of 30 years.

The proposed changes to the US Atomic Energy Act will end a technology-denial regime imposed on India in the wake of its 1974 nuclear test; mark an abrupt shift in US counter-proliferation policy; and open the door to a wide range of commercial opportunities.

In New Delhi, Nicholas Burns, US under-secretary of state, said: "The civil nuclear agreement is in our eyes the symbolic centre of the new strategic partnership between India and the United States.

"We've broken with conventional wisdom of the last 30 years that India should be isolated and walled off from the international non-proliferation regime. We've made an effort to change our own law and international regulation so India can be welcomed into the non-proliferation regime for the first time in decades."

After investing political capital to secure the vexatious agreement, bitterly criticised by non-proliferation campaigners as a reward to a nuclear pariah state outside the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the Bush administration is expected to drive to secure some commercial objectives in India.

"We're doing this to build a long-term strategic partnership – but India opening up sectors such as financial services and retail would be extremely important to US companies," said an official.

The US has been strongly recommending that foreign direct investment ceilings in the Indian insurance sector should be increased from the 24 per cent permitted at present.

The US has not disguised its desire to ramp up military and defence collaboration between the two countries. It has pushed hard to secure a share of a $6bn order for 126 fighter jets for India.

The painful history of US sanctions, which saw supplies of spares abruptly terminated, has left a legacy of mistrust in the Indian defence establishment that is only slowly dissolving.

India is keen to diversify its sources of defence hardware. These have to date been dominated by Russian equipment. India has recently bought its first important naval platform from the US – the former USS Trenton, an amphibious transport ship.

US officials in Delhi on Friday disclosed India had in November agreed to buy six UH-3H Sikorsky Sea King helicopters for $38m, that will accompany the Trenton, bought in July for $48m, when it sails to India next month.

"People are looking at the relationship and saying: How do we take it beyond civil nuclear?" said a US official. He added that Washington hoped India would play a greater regional role in Afghanistan and west Asia.

Several more vital approvals – including those of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the 45-nation Nuclear Suppliers Group – are needed before the agreement can take effect. Several countries, notably China, have yet to show their cards. But the odds of a successful conclusion have increased.

Indian Finance Official Expects Pickup In Growth (WSJ)

By Eric Bellman

The Wall Street Journal, December 9, 2006

NEW DELHI -- India's economic expansion could accelerate to more than 10% annually in the next five years, said the country's finance minister, confirming a trajectory that puts India on a similar growth path as Asia's other star performer: China.

India -- which has clocked gross-domestic-product growth of 9.1% in the first half of this fiscal year -- could see growth climb into the double digits during the period covered by the government's next five-year economic plan, which starts April 1, Finance Minister P. Chidambaram told The Wall Street Journal in an interview.

"We would be happy if the next [five-year] plan started with 9% [growth] and then slowly took the growth up to 10%," he said. The comments echo those of other Indian leaders, who say double-digit growth is within reach, as long as the economy continues to open to private and foreign investment.

Along with China, India's economy has been one of the world's fastest growing recently, expanding an average of around 8% a year for the past three fiscal years. The country's central bank, the Reserve Bank of India, projects that the economy will expand around 8% this year, but some economists think growth could be 8.5% or higher. In comparison, China's GDP grew 10.7% in the January-September period compared with a year earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0105345

India needs to expand even faster, though, if it wants to bring more of the hundreds of millions of its citizens out of poverty, economists said.

The finance minister welcomed a recent slowdown in inflation. He said that while he would like to see inflation lower, it is in part a result of India's robust growth and still much lower than it used to be. "We have some mastery over inflation" that the country didn't have 10 years ago, he said. "Only in the last four years the inflation rate has been less than the GDP" growth rate, he added.

Inflation will "moderate" over the next four months, he said, thanks to lower oil prices and government measures to lower the prices of essential commodities. India has restricted the export of sugar to bring down its price, for example, and is importing wheat from Australia to increase wheat supplies.

In a move aimed at cooling India's growth and inflation rates, the central bank said Friday that it will increase the cash-reserve ratio requirement for banks. The higher requirements will pull about 135 billion rupees, or about $3 billion, out of the banking system, the Reserve Bank said.

India will continue along the path of revamping its economy, Mr. Chidambaram said. More foreign participation will be allowed in the insurance and banking industries, as well as increasing the convertibility of the rupee. He declined to outline what the next overhauls in these areas would be or when they might happen.

Many economists and executives complain that the government isn't going as far as it should to unshackle its economy from government control and ownership. While Mr. Chidambaram is viewed as a business-friendly minister, analysts say his hands are tied from pushing through the more controversial changes because the Congress Party's ruling coalition depends on the support of communist parties to stay in power.

US House Backs Trade With Vietnam (BBC)

BBC.com, December 9, 2006

The US House of Representatives has passed landmark legislation normalising trade relations with Vietnam.

The bill, which now needs to be backed by the Senate before becoming law, was defeated in November ahead of President George W Bush's first visit to Vietnam.

The deal also expanded trade relations with Haiti, and tweaked Washington's trade preferences with several states in Latin America and beyond.

The measures are the final tasks before the Republican-led Congress winds up.

A new-look Congress, with Democrat majorities in both the House and the Senate, will convene in the new year.

Congress' failure to pass the bill normalising trade relations with Hanoi was seen as an embarrassment for Mr Bush before he visited Vietnam for an economic summit in November.

"This legislation is about more than economics," Republican Rob Simmons, a Vietnam veteran, said during the debate.

"This legislation is about working together with Vietnam to heal the wounds of the war."

The trade package also allows the conflict-ridden Caribbean island nation of Haiti will be allowed to increase duty-free exports of clothing and textiles to the US, with some conditions.

Representatives said this should serve as a signal to other nations to trade with Haiti.

But there is opposition to the bill from some senators fearful that the textile deal with Haiti might cost American jobs.

The trade legislation also renews trade preferences with the Andean Community of Nations, namely Peru, Colombia, Bolivia and Ecuador.

But the deal, which is linked to fight against drugs, will be replaced by bilateral agreements from next year. Peru and Colombia have signed bilateral trade deals with the US, but Bolivia and Ecuador have not.

China, Shy Giant, Shows Signs Of Shedding Its False Modesty (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 8 — China's Communist Party has a new agenda: it is encouraging people to discuss what it means to be a major world power and has largely stopped denying that China intends to become one soon.

In the past several weeks China Central Television has broadcast a 12-part series describing the reasons nine nations rose to become great powers. The series was based on research by a team of elite Chinese historians, who also briefed the ruling Politburo about their findings.

DOJ_NMG_0105346

Until recently China's rising power remained a delicate topic, and largely unspoken, inside China. Beijing has long followed a dictum laid down by Deng Xiaoping, the paramount leader who died in 1997: "tao guang yang hui," literally to hide its ambitions and disguise its claws.

The prescription was generally taken to mean that China needed to devote its energy to developing economically and should not seek to play a leadership role abroad.

President Hu Jintao set off an internal squabble two years ago when he began using the term "peaceful rise" to describe his foreign policy goals. He dropped the term in favor of the tamer-sounding "peaceful development."

His use of "rise" risked stoking fears of a "China threat," especially in Japan and the United States, people told about the high-level debate said. Rise implies that others must decline, at least in a relative sense, while development suggests that China's advance can bring others along.

Yet this tradition of modesty has begun to fade, replaced by a growing confidence that China's rise is not fleeting and that the country needs to do more to define its objectives.

With its $1 trillion in foreign exchange reserves, surging military spending and diplomatic initiatives in Asia, Africa and the Middle East, Beijing has begun asserting its interests far beyond its borders. Chinese party leaders are acting as if they intend to start exercising more power abroad rather than just protecting their political power at home.

"Like it or not, China's rise is becoming a reality," says Jia Qingguo, associate dean of the Beijing University School of International Studies. "Wherever Chinese leaders go these days, people pay attention. And they can't just say, 'I don't want to get involved.' "

Itself a major recipient of foreign aid until recently, China this year promised to provide well over $10 billion in low-interest loans and debt relief to Asian, African and Latin American countries over the next two years. It invited 48 African countries to Beijing last month to a conference aimed at promoting closer cooperation and trade.

Beijing agreed to send 1,000 peacekeepers to Lebanon, its first such action in the Middle East. It has sought to become a more substantial player in a region where the United States traditionally holds far more sway.

At the United Nations Security Council, China cast aside its longstanding policy of opposing sanctions against other nations. It voted to impose penalties on North Korea, its neighbor and onetime ally, for testing nuclear weapons.

Officials and leading scholars are becoming a bit less hesitant to discuss what this all might mean. The documentary, on China's main national network, uses the word rise constantly, including its title, "Rise of the Great Powers." It endorses the idea that China should study the experiences of nations and empires it once condemned as aggressors bent on exploitation.

"Our China, the Chinese people, the Chinese race has become revitalized and is again stepping onto the world stage," Qian Chengdan, a professor at Beijing University and the intellectual father of the television series, said in an online dialogue about the documentary on Sina.com, a leading Web site.

"It is extremely important for today's China to be able to draw some lessons from the experiences of others," he said.

The series, which took three years to make, emanated from a Politburo study session in 2003. It is not a jingoistic call to arms. It mentions China only in passing, and it never explicitly addresses the reality that China has already become a big power.

Yet its version of history, which partly tracks the work done by Paul Kennedy in his 1980s bestseller, "The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers," differs markedly from that of the textbooks still in use in many schools.

Its stentorian narrator and epic soundtrack present the emergence of the nine countries, from Portugal in the 15th century to the United States in the 20th, and cites numerous achievements worthy of emulation: Spain had a risk-taking queen; Britain's nimble navy secured vital commodities overseas; the United States regulated markets and fought for national unity.

The documentary also emphasizes historical themes that coincide with policies Chinese leaders promote at home. Social stability, industrial investment, peaceful foreign relations and national unity are presented as more vital than, say, military strength, political liberalization or the rule of law.

In the 90 minutes devoted to examining the rise of the United States, Lincoln is accorded a prominent part for his efforts to "preserve national unity" during the Civil War. China has made reunification with Taiwan a top national priority. Franklin D. Roosevelt wins praise for creating a bigger role for the government in managing the market economy but gets less attention for his wartime leadership.

Government officials minimize the importance of the series. He Yafei, an assistant foreign minister, said in an interview that he had watched only "one or two episodes." He said the documentary should not signal changes in China's thinking about projecting power, saying that colonialism and exploitation "would go nowhere in today's world."

But Mr. He also hinted at a shifting official line. He emphasized China's status as a developing country. But he allowed that others may see things differently.

"Whether a country is a regional or a world power, it is not for that country to decide alone," he said. "If you say we are a big power, then we are. But we are a responsible big country. We are a maintainer and builder of the international system."

DOJ_NMG_0105347

China has in fact emerged as a major power without disrupting the international order, at least so far. It has accepted an invitation by the Bush administration to discuss becoming a "responsible stakeholder" in the American-dominated international system.

Beijing places importance on many world institutions, especially the United Nations, where it holds a veto in the Security Council. It professes a strong commitment to enforcing the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Last month Margaret Chan of Hong Kong became the first Chinese to head a major United Nations agency, the World Health Organization. She vowed to build a "harmonious health world," echoing the slogan of harmony promoted by President Hu.

Yet critics say China is prepared to emerge in a less amicable fashion, if necessary. The Central Intelligence Agency says that China's military spending may be two or three times higher than it acknowledges and that it allocates more to its military than any other country except the United States.

Beijing has cultivated close ties to countries that provide it with commodities and raw materials, regardless of their human rights records. Sudan, Myanmar and Zimbabwe have all escaped international sanctions in large part because of Chinese protection.

China's increasing international engagement has also stimulated a more robust academic discussion about its global role and the potential for tensions with the United States.

Yan Xuetong, a foreign affairs specialist at Qinghua University in Beijing, argued in a scholarly journal this summer that China had already surpassed Japan, Russia, Britain, France, Germany and India in measures of its economic, military and political power. That leaves it second only to the United States, he said.

While the military gap between China and the United States may remain for some time, he argued, China's faster economic growth and increasing political strength may whittle down America's overall advantage.

"China will enjoy the status of a semi-superpower between the United States and the other major powers," Mr. Yan predicted in the article, which appeared in the China Journal of International Politics.

He added, "China's fast growth in political and economic power will dramatically narrow its power gap with the United States."

Taiwan Opposition Party Shows Strength In 2 Largest Cities (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

KAOHSIUNG, Taiwan, Dec. 8 — Like the American South a generation ago, southern Taiwan has been dominated in recent years by a single party: the island's governing Democratic Progressive Party, which got its start here in Kaohsiung, an industrial city known for populism and pro-independence sentiment.

The city lies at the center of a region where protesters awakened Taiwan and the world in the 1970s and 1980s to the brutality and corruption of martial law under the Nationalist Party, sometimes paying with their lives.

Chen Shui-bian, now Taiwan's president, won fame as one of the lawyers who represented those protesters, and he built the Democratic Progressive Party into a force that spread across the island and brought democracy to Taiwan and an end to half a century of Nationalist rule.

So it is a measure of the troubles of President Chen and his party that a mayoral race on Saturday here in Taiwan's second-largest city is at least a tossup.

With some surveys even pointing to a Nationalist victory here, President Chen and Ma Ying-jeou, the popular Nationalist chairman and departing mayor of Taipei, the capital, both came here on Friday to address separate rallies consisting of small seas of flag-waving supporters.

Together with opinion polls predicting a crushing victory for the Nationalist candidate in the Taipei mayoral election, also on Saturday, the hard-fought Kaohsiung race suggests a significant shift in Taiwan's politics.

Independent experts on Taiwan politics expect Yu Shyi-kun, the chairman of the Democratic Progressive Party, to resign if its candidate for mayor here, Chen Chu, loses. Some experts, like Jing Huang at the Brookings Institution in Washington, predict that Prime Minister Su Tseng-chang will resign as well if Chen Chu loses or even ekes out a narrow win.

Mr. Su is a moderate Democratic Progressive who has been leery of provoking the mainland with talk of independence for Taiwan.

By resigning, Mr. Su could prepare himself for Taiwan's next presidential election, in 2008, and distance himself from President Chen, whose unpopularity has crippled his party after corruption investigations into his activities and his family's.

"Even if they win Kaohsiung, the scare is still too great," for the party to continue in power without significant changes, Mr. Huang said.

DOJ_NMG_0105348

The backdrop for the mayoral elections here and in Taipei lies in the larger struggle between Taiwan's two main political parties over relations with the mainland and economic globalization.

The Nationalists want closer relations with mainland China.

Chávez Win Bolsters Cuba Succession Hopes (FT)

By Marc Frank

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

Hugo Chávez's sweeping victory in the Venezuelan presidential election this week could help to ensure political cover and economic support for the emerging leadership in Cuba as Fidel Castro fights for his life somewhere in Havana.

"As long as oil prices stay high, subsidised and bartered oil from Venezuela to Cuba will remain a huge source of support to the island," said Julia Sweig, director of the Latin America programme at the Council of Foreign Relations in Washington. "And precisely because Venezuela is more strategically important to the US than Cuba, if the US-Venezuela relationship stays at its current high-pitch, Raúl Castro will be able to consolidate the succession in the shadow of the larger regional tension."

Fidel Castro said in a 68-word message of congratulations to Mr Chávez: "I shall be brief, lest emotion betrays me. The victory was re-sounding, crushing and without parallel in the history of our America.''

Mr Castro, after missing a military parade and other events in honour of his 80th birthday last week, also failed to meet visitors such as Bolivia's President Evo Morales, or call Mr Chávez after his victory, sparking fresh speculation that his health has deteriorated.

Venezuela and Cuba have found a strong synergy, playing off each country's strength since Mr Chávez won his first election in 1998. Venezuela received an in-stant free healthcare system from Cuba that would have taken years and tens of billions of dollars to build, and education resources to help Mr Chávez keep his promise to teach every citizen to read and write.

Cuba received preferentially-financed oil in return and, after signing an agreement with Venezuela in late 2004, payment for health and other technical assistance that had been provided free, according to Havana.

Cuba's imports totalled $5.5bn in 2004 and non-tourism service income was about $1.5bn, compared with an estimated $10bn (€7.5bn, £5.1bn) of goods imported this year and non-tourism service revenues of more than $5bn. The steady oil supply and billions in revenues from the export of professional services are fuelling an economic boom after more than a decade of crisis.

Most important, Cuba's leaders are now able to point to a way out of the ideological and political debacle that followed European communism's collapse. The lights are back on, decrepit waterworks and transport are being gradually upgraded, new housing built, consumer goods replaced and there is more food on the table.

"Chávez's election was key," a European diplomat said. "Cuba will now be at least partially protected from what happens outside the country as the succession takes place."

Venezuela is using its vast oil wealth and Cuba its human capital to push their anti-US vision of a united, more socially-oriented Latin America at a time of growing restlessness among the region's poor.

US allies in Bolivia, Ecuador and Nicaragua have lost at the polls to men who blame the US for the region's woes and favour a closer relationship with Venezuela, Cuba and their proposed model of local integration against US-centred trade pacts.

Venezuela provides the financing and Cuba the -professionals to jump-start each new leader's social -programmes.

Thousands of Cuban doctors and other professionals are already at work throughout Bolivia. However, there is some evidence that Cuba's human resources – about 30,000 of 70,000 doctors work abroad – can no longer meet the demand, creating strain on health services and doctor shortages even in Venezuela. Venezuela and Cuba have launched a crash programme to train 100,000 doctors from the region over five years to fill the vacuum.

Most other Caribbean and Latin American countries, though more moderate, are under increasing domestic pressure to meet basic social needs and also favour a regional integration that includes Cuba, as it increasingly provides them with relatively cheap services and educates their youth.

But here the Venezuela relationship is crucial. "God, imagine what would have happened with Fidel sick if he [Mr Chávez] had lost," said a secretary at a Havana day care centre. "We have fewer doctors but, so far, the benefits are worth it."

Federal Raid On Offices In Troubled Mexican State (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 8 — Six days after President Felipe Calderón took office, federal agents raided the prosecutor's office and state police headquarters on Friday in the troubled southern state of Oaxaca, where state law-enforcement authorities have failed to arrest anyone in the killings of at least 11 antigovernment protesters and a New York City journalist.

DOJ_NMG_0105349

Around 4:15 p.m., dozens of federal police officers flooded into the offices of the state prosecutor, Lizbeth Caña, and secured the arms cache used by the state judicial police responsible for investigating crimes, according to local news reports.

A police commander, Ardelio Vargas, told the newspaper La Reforma that the federal authorities intended to seize all the police weapons to determine whether they had been used against protesters in recent months. There have been widespread allegations that the local police and municipal officials had abused demonstrators and in some cases killed them.

Since May, Oaxaca has been the scene of an ugly, violent conflict between Gov. Ulises Ruiz and a coalition of left-wing and Indian organizations seeking his ouster. Over several months, protesters barricaded streets, took over the central square, seized radio stations, burned buses, scrawled graffiti and torched several landmark buildings.

The state police did nothing to restore order as the city drifted into anarchy, and pro-government thugs attacked protesters several times, usually at night. At least 13 people were shot to death, but local authorities made an arrest in only one case.

Among the victims was Bradley Roland Will, a 36-year-old independent journalist from New York City, who died of gunshot wounds he received while filming a riot on Oct. 27. That day, journalists photographed several off-duty municipal police and other officials shooting at the rioters. But state prosecutors say forensic evidence suggests that a protester, not the pro-government gunmen, shot Mr. Will at close range.

The next day, federal police invaded the city, dislodged the protesters and restored order. A month later, federal authorities arrested more than 130 protesters after another round of riots in which several landmarks were burned.

The takeover of the prosecutor's office came four days after Mr. Calderón approved the arrest of one of the protest movement's top leaders, Flavio Sosa.

Russian Billionaire's Bitter Feud With Putin A Plot Line In Poisoning (WP)

By Mary Jordan, Peter Finn

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 8 -- No ordinary billionaire, Boris Berezovsky is a onetime mathematician who travels around London with a posse of bodyguards. He openly taunts Russian President Vladimir Putin and once wore a rubber cartoonish mask of his face. Accustomed to drama, he is now a central figure in the fatal poisoning of Alexander Litvinenko, the most sensational case of international intrigue since the Cold War.

Police found traces of the poison, radioactive polonium-210, in Berezovsky's office in elegant Mayfair in central London. He said Litvinenko came there Nov. 1, the day he began feeling ill.

Berezovsky, 60, had credited Litvinenko with saving him from assassination in the 1990s, and the billionaire helped Litvinenko financially after he fled Russia in 2000 and settled in London. Berezovsky visited the sickened man at the hospital shortly before he died last month and attended his burial Thursday.

As detectives pursue the murder case in Moscow and London, Berezovsky is saying he believes Putin is behind it, while Kremlin supporters see dark emigre conspiracies to smear Russia's reputation by engineering a spectacular murder.

On Friday, Russian news media reported that a third person in the case was suffering radiation illness -- Andrei Lugovoy, a Russian businessman who had met Litvinenko at a London hotel Nov. 1. Like many people in the investigation, Lugovoy had a connection to Berezovsky; he was formerly chief of security at a television network once controlled by the billionaire.

As the investigation widens, the feud between the president and the billionaire remains a prominent story line in the mystery.

"They know each other personally. That adds to the animosity," said Alex Goldfarb, who runs the International Foundation for Civil Liberties, a New York-based organization funded by Berezovsky.

Goldfarb said Berezovsky helped Putin into office "on the assumption that he would continue the democratic reforms" of his predecessor, Boris Yeltsin. But Berezovsky has been horrified that "since Mr. Putin has come to power, there has been a systematic dismantling of democratic institutions," Goldfarb said. "His conflict with Putin has grown to Shakespearean proportions. . . . Mr. Putin hates him."

The stated aim of the civil liberties foundation is to fund democracy-building and civil rights causes in Russia and other former Soviet republics. Berezovsky's detractors say that even if it funds some worthy causes, it is a tool for a scheming Berezovsky with visions of ousting Putin and returning to Russia as a kingmaker.

Berezovsky, trained as a mathematician, became rich during the chaotic birth pangs of Russian capitalism following the breakup of the Soviet Union in 1991. Under Yeltsin, the first president of Russia, the state began selling off assets in often dubious privatization deals that left a few people with gigantic piles of cash.

Berezovsky got, among other things, major stakes in the oil company Sibneft, the TV station ORT and Aeroflot. He and other so-called oligarchs wielded enormous political power behind the scenes, and Berezovsky threw his support behind Putin's bid to become president in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0105350

But according to Putin's supporters, Berezovsky unhappily discovered that the new president would not be his puppet.

Sergei Markov, a political consultant with close ties to the Kremlin, said that when Putin took office, he told "all big businessmen that you can do business or you can do politics," not both, and said "that major political resources, such as television, should belong to the state." He added: "Berezovsky resisted, and as a result he began to fight the Kremlin. . . . He has continued this fight from London, and he believes he can overthrow Putin's team and return as an oligarch."

Markov described Berezovsky as a "world-class provocateur . . . a character from Dostoevski because he shows how intensive the dialogue can be between the human soul and the devil."

According to Goldfarb, Berezovsky "thinks of himself as a politician, not as a businessman," and is "a very rare combination of a passionate guy with a cool mind. He struggles between passion and reason." He called Berezovsky "outgoing, mercurial."

Tireless and fast-talking, Berezovsky has employed a well-connected public relations firm in London to handle questions for him. He declined an interview request for this article, although when Litvinenko was dying, Berezovsky said in a telephone interview that he had "no doubt" that his friend had been poisoned on the "order from President Putin."

Tim Bell, who was knighted after helping Britain's then-Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher win three elections, and his Bell Pottinger Group public relations firm have been handling inquiries about Berezovsky and lent help with the Litvinenko case. For example, it helped distribute the photo of a gaunt, bald Litvinenko in a hospital bed just before he died.

Some people in Moscow see Berezovsky's involvement as another campaign to ruin Putin's reputation internationally.

Litvinenko "had close contacts with some of the Russian oligarchs who fell from grace, including Boris Berezovsky, who lost the opportunity to buy off the authorities with his stolen money," Konstantin Kosachyov, chairman of the foreign affairs committee in the lower house of the Russian parliament, told reporters last month. "They did not want to put up with it and could have staged a deliberate action against Russia."

Prosecutors in Russia, meanwhile, had earlier accused Berezovsky of a host of crimes, including fraud and backing a violent overthrow of Putin's government. Berezovsky denies all the allegations.

To the annoyance of those who consider him an outlaw, Berezovsky has been photographed with Neil Bush, President Bush's brother. Bell, the public relations executive in London, said he introduced Berezovsky to Neil Bush in 2003. Berezovsky later became an investor in Ignite! Learning, Bush's educational software company.

Britain has granted the Russian political asylum; a British judge turned down a Russian request to extradite him, agreeing with Berezovsky that the charges were politically motivated.

After one extradition court appearance in 2003, Berezovsky triumphantly donned a rubber mask of Putin, a gesture that was seen as mocking the man once called his protege. Putin has landed his own punches, too. At a 2001 news conference, when asked about Berezovsky, he replied, "Who's that?"

Litvinenko, a former member of the Federal Security Service, the domestic successor to the KGB, accused the agency of involvement in apartment building bombings in 1999 in which 300 people died. He also said the security service had ordered him to kill Berezovsky.

Litvinenko said at a Moscow news conference in 1998 that a superior told him "that I had not allowed patriots to kill the Jew who had robbed half the country," according to a transcript.

Litvinenko's warning led Berezovsky to credit him "with saving my life."

Before this threat and his feud with Putin, Berezovsky narrowly escaped assassination. In 1994, while he was in a Mercedes 600 sedan, behind his driver and bodyguard, a bomb concealed in a parked car exploded, decapitating the driver. The bodyguard lost an eye, and Berezovsky suffered burns.

Among the many theories floating around the Litvinenko poisoning case is that somebody used his agonizing death to send a message to Berezovsky.

A flower vendor in Mayfair who sees Berezovsky coming and going said that "I have no idea what that man does," but that he is the only one in London who appears to have tighter security than the royal family.

Litvinenko Police Delay Moscow Interview (FT)

Financial Times, December 9, 2006

British police investigating the death of Alexander Litvinenko postponed interviewing a key witness in Moscow on Friday amid signs that they are struggling to unravel the mystery of who may have been responsible for his murder.

More than two weeks after Mr Litvinenko died in a London hospital, Scotland Yard played down suggestions of an imminent breakthrough last night. The investigation is focused on the meetings Mr Litvinenko held in a London hotel the day he fell ill from radioactive poisoning.

“This is a inquiry that can change direction very quickly,” a Scotland Yard spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0105351

The witness Andrei Lugovoi, a former KGB agent who works for the private sector, has been waiting to be interviewed by police since a team of investigators from Scotland Yard's anti-terrorist SO15 squad arrived in Moscow at the beginning of the week, according to his lawyer.

Mr Lugovoi was one of at least three Russians who met Mr Litvinenko on November 1 in the Pine Bar of the Millennium Hotel in London, where it emerged this week that seven employees had tested positive for traces of radiation.

Since returning to Moscow Mr Lugovoi has professed his innocence. He claims he is being framed as a suspect in an attempt to distract police. Andrei Romashov, Mr Lugovoi's lawyer, said he did not know why the interview with his client had been postponed. There was no explanation from the police. Mr Lugovoi, who was admitted to hospital earlier this week, told a news agency his condition was "stable".

He said he was waiting for official results of tests into whether he was contaminated with radiation, and urged the media not to speculate on his health or that of Dmitri Kovtun, his business associate who also met Mr Litvinenko in London and who has also denied involvement in the former spy's death.

Russian prosecutors revealed on Thursday that Mr Kovtun was also contaminated with a radioactive substance, and that they had opened a criminal case into his attempted murder – as well as their own criminal investigation of the Litvinenko case.

Within Whitehall and in western diplomatic circles, there is a growing perception that the police investigation faces formidable obstacles. The Litvin-enko case is embroiled in claims and counter-claims, reflecting the tensions of Russian politics and the murky world inhabited by former and current members of the country's secret services.

Mr Litvinenko's funeral in London this week was used by exiled Chechen separatists as a platform from which to point the finger at Moscow.

Police sources say Moscow appears determined to push ahead with its own investigation into Mr Litvinenko's death, which the Kremlin has linked to a conspiracy organised by opponents of President Vladimir Putin.

Friends of Boris Berezovsky, the exiled London-based Russian billionaire, said they had no doubt that Moscow was preparing a fresh diplomatic offensive to have him extradited.

Yuri Chaika, Russia's prosecutor-general, earlier this week singled out Mr Lugovoi as someone British investigators visiting Moscow wanted to question.

In The Polonium Poison Mystery, An Odd Italian Footnote (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

ROME, Dec. 8 — Mario Scaramella first claimed to have been hit with five times the lethal dose of polonium 210, the radioactive substance that killed the former Russian spy Alexander V. Litvinenko. "I'm not in the best mood," he said in an interview with Italian television from his hospital bed in London last month.

Then two days ago, he walked out of the hospital with minute traces of radioactive poisoning but was otherwise perfectly fine.

It seemed a classic performance for Mr. Scaramella, 36, who has emerged as the oddest footnote in the mystery of Mr. Litvinenko's death.

There are a few sure facts about him. On Nov. 1, the day Mr. Litvinenko is believed to have been poisoned, Mr. Scaramella and the former spy met at a sushi bar in London. And at the moment, Mr. Scaramella is not considered a suspect. Beyond that, it is hard to square his words about himself with whatever the reality might be.

He has claimed to be a professor at the University of Naples, which claims never to have heard of him. He was caught on a tape bragging that Silvio Berlusconi, the former Italian prime minister, was considering him for a top job at the United Nations. He later had to admit that he had never met Mr. Berlusconi.

And so, a slew of news reports about him and his career here — which included trying to prove that top Italian politicians in the center-left, including Prime Minister Romano Prodi, are Russian spies — have invariably included unflattering adjectives. They include: "incurable liar," "wannabe 007," "braggart," "bumbler" and "swindler," not to mention "fool" and "mental case."

Those last two descriptions come from Oleg Gordievski, a high-ranking K.G.B. defector who has known Mr. Scaramella for years. His opinion of Mr. Scaramella is so low that he could not even consider him as a suspect in Mr. Litvinenko's poisoning, even after Mr. Litvinenko himself raised the possibility in a conversation with Mr. Gordievski.

"I said: 'Who poisoned you? Who did you have a meal with?' " Mr. Gordievski recalled in a telephone interview from Britain on Friday. "He said, 'I had a meal with Scaramella. He was very nervous. He was very strange, but he is always strange.'

"I said, 'Sasha, it could not be Scaramella because he has nothing to do with the K.G.B. business,' " Mr. Gordievski said.

He concluded: "He is just a soap bubble. He doesn't know anything."

DOJ_NMG_0105352

Repeated attempts to reach Mr. Scaramella, who is still in London and is reportedly cooperating with investigators, were not successful.

He told CNN this week that he had urgently flown to London to warn that he had received e-mail messages from a "source" Mr. Litvinenko had introduced him to earlier, saying that both of them were "under the special attention of hostile people."

The trip seemed very much in character for Mr. Scaramella, who has for years cultivated a reputation as a man with shadowy contacts and friends in high places, with a particular interest in Italy's connection with Russian spying. Several years ago, he wrote a memo alleging that in 1970 a Soviet submarine left 20 nuclear mines in the Bay of Naples.

Though his academic career seems fuzzy, there is no question of his general activity between 2003 and 2006. He worked as a consultant to the Mitrokhin Commission, an Italian parliamentary body set up by center-right politicians to investigate ties between Russian intelligence and Italy. Publicly, the commission looked into a wide array of cases, including the kidnapping and killing of the former Prime Minister Aldo Moro in 1978 by the Communist militant group the Red Brigades, and the assassination attempt against Pope John Paul II in 1981.

But transcripts of telephone calls between Mr. Scaramella and Senator Paolo Guzzanti, the commission chairman and a member of Mr. Berlusconi's Forza Italia party, show that much of the panel's effort was also spent trying to prove before this year's elections that Mr. Prodi was a K.G.B. agent.

One commission member, Senator Lucio Malan, also of Forza Italia, said there were good reasons to look into the allegations: many top politicians, though not Mr. Prodi, once belonged to Italy's Communist Party.

And Mr. Prodi does have an unusual tie to the Moro kidnapping. In 1978, he and other professors at the University of Bologna held a séance in which a Ouija board spelled the word "Gradoli," which turned out to be the street name in Rome of a Red Brigades safe house.

"There were strange things," Mr. Malan said. "Nothing is strange in receiving news if someone claimed to have it."

He said it was generally useful having someone like Mr. Scaramella as a consultant to the commission. Mr. Malan credited him with a tip that led to the arrest in 2005 of two Ukrainians, now on trial for smuggling two grenades into Italy allegedly to kill Mr. Guzzanti. But he said Mr. Scaramella's allegations were often stronger than his proof.

"He is somebody who is acquainted with this kind of world of double spies," Mr. Malan said. "So one can get much information, if not groundless, unproved. On the other hand, there might have been some information that is very important."

The interest in Mr. Prodi appears to have been the major tie between Mr. Scaramella and Mr. Litvinenko. Both Mr. Litvinenko and Mr. Gordievski have recounted in interviews Mr. Scaramella's deep interest in proving that Mr. Prodi was a K.G.B. agent. Accounts differ, but Mr. Gordievski said Friday that he was present when Mr. Litvinenko, who moved to Britain in 2000, recounted for members of the UK Independence Party a conversation with a sympathetic Russian general about where to go if he defected.

"He said, 'I was speaking to the deputy head of the K.G.B., General Such-and-Such,' " Mr. Gordievski recalled. "And he told me, 'If you intend to go to the West, don't go to Italy because it is full of our agents.' And he said, 'For example, Prodi is our man.' "

The transcripts between Mr. Scaramella and Mr. Guzzanti show a particular interest in this conversation, and Mr. Scaramella repeatedly pressed Mr. Gordievski and Mr. Litvinenko for any further information. Mr. Gordievski said he told Mr. Scaramella that he never heard anything about Mr. Prodi and the K.G.B. — but that Mr. Scaramella later said in an e-mail message that Mr. Gordievski had, in fact, confirmed a link.

"I nearly fell from my chair," he said. "He wrote it in that stupid e-mail to me. I didn't write it. He wrote it as mental aberration in him."

In a 2005 interview with La Repubblica, an Italian daily newspaper, Mr. Litvinenko recounted how he traveled to Naples in 2004 to give a deposition to the commission, taken by Mr. Scaramella, on K.G.B. activity in Italy.

"I said to Mario I had never heard Prodi spoken of," Mr. Litvinenko told La Repubblica.

At the end of several days of depositions, Mr. Litvinenko said, Mr. Scaramella put in his hand some stationery from his private business and several hundred euros.

"I felt humiliated," he told the newspaper. "I told him he was mistaken if he thought Colonel Litvinenko was reduced to selling his information."

Hotel Bar May Be Site Of Ex-spy's Poisoning (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

LONDON — Russian dissident Alexander Litvinenko probably was poisoned at the bar of a hotel here where he met with two other Russians, both of whom now are in hospitals showing symptoms of radiation sickness, health investigators said Friday.

For weeks, investigators had zeroed in on a different location, the Piccadilly Circus sushi restaurant where Litvinenko had lunch, believing that was a likely location for his mysterious poisoning with radioactive polonium-210.

But that theory has been shaken by medical evidence that seven people who worked at the bar of the Millennium Hotel in London's upscale Mayfair district also have been exposed. The bar has been placed under quarantine.

Police have refused to say where they think the poisoning took place — a crucial question, because it may be the best clue to who did it, and why. One law enforcement official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said detectives had made no final judgment.

But the medical evidence suggests that the poisoning probably took place at the bar, Dr. Michael Clark of Britain's Health Protection Agency said Friday in an interview.

"The monitoring of the staff in the Millennium bar was done for public health purposes, but it obviously has implications for the police forensic analysis — implications of timing, and possible scenarios for the administration of polonium."

Clark emphasized that he was looking only at medical evidence and not at whatever the police investigation had turned up. But the fact that seven bar employees were exposed was significant, he said, especially since no sushi bar employees, and no hospital employees, have tested positive.

"Given that Mr. Litvinenko had a very significant quantity of polonium-210 administered in some way, there are obvious possibilities that small amounts of that could have been left on, for example, a glass or a table, that subsequently led to employees being exposed. But until there is a proper forensic examination, I really don't want to speculate on that," Clark said.

Contacts also sickened

On Nov. 1, Litvinenko met two Russians at the Millennium's Pine Bar: Andrei Lugovoy, a businessman and former KGB colonel, and a second businessman, Dmitry Kovtun. Russian news organizations reported Friday that Lugovoy, who was a friend of Litvinenko, was in a Russian hospital with apparent radiation damage to several organs. Kovtun is also reported to be seriously ill.

Later that day, Litvinenko went to a London hospital with symptoms of what doctors eventually determined was polonium poisoning. He died Nov. 23.

The former Russian security agent, who had become a critic of the Russian government, told friends he suspected the poisoner could have been one of the two Russians or the man he met at the sushi bar, Italian security consultant Mario Scaramella.

Scaramella also tested positive for exposure to polonium-210, but not in amounts sufficient to sicken him so far. He says he was meeting with Litvinenko to warn him of a possible attempt on his life.

Litvinenko also said he believed the perpetrator, whoever it was, was acting on behalf of the Russian government. Russia has denied that.

A crucial unanswered question is which came first — lunch at the sushi bar or tea at the hotel. Litvinenko told investigators that he went first to the sushi bar, then to the hotel, a law enforcement source told The Times.

Asked how Scaramella could have been exposed if the poisoning happened at the Pine Bar, some analysts said he could have hugged and kissed Litvinenko upon greeting him. That scenario makes sense only if Litvinenko had already been exposed when he went to the sushi restaurant.

But the contamination of the Pine Bar also could have taken place earlier, the law enforcement source said, pointing out that authorities have called on patrons to seek testing if they were in the bar not only on the day Litvinenko was there, but also the day before and the day after.

Lugovoy, who has been described in the Russian media as the main witness in the case, was reportedly a guest at the hotel before the Nov. 1 meeting.

Traces of polonium-210 have been found in guest rooms at the Millennium as well, the police source said. Investigators also have detected polonium on two British Airways jets, one of which, British press reports said, carried Lugovoy and Kovtun to London.

Timeline in question

Lugovoy, in an interview a week ago with Russia's Kommersant newspaper, suggested that Litvinenko could have been poisoned long before Nov. 1. He said he and Kovtun met with Litvinenko Oct. 17, in the London offices of the Erinys security company, one of several locations around London where traces of radiation have been found.

"Localized reactive contamination" has also been found in "a couple of rooms" at the Parkes Hotel in London's Knightsbridge district, health authorities reported Friday. Lugovoy stayed there Oct. 16, and two other hotels where he has stayed have also shown traces of a radioactive substance, according to several British press reports.

Lugovoy, now considered the main witness in the case, told Interfax news agency in Moscow that his condition was satisfactory.

DOJ_NMG_0105354

He also said he had doubts about earlier reports that Kovtun, his business partner, was in critical condition. Lugovoy is scheduled to be interviewed today by law enforcement agents, Interfax said.

Russian authorities pledged to cooperate with British investigators who are in Moscow to conduct the inquiry. Russia has opened its own investigation of Kovtun's poisoning.

Police sources in London said the Russians had not presented more than ordinary obstacles to conducting the investigation.

For New U.N. Chief, A Past Misstep Leads To Opportunity (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

BAN KI-MOON, the incoming secretary general of the United Nations, got his new job in an unlikely manner for a man known for head-of-the-class performance, devotion to duty and a relentless rise through the ranks.

He got fired.

"I was totally out of work for the first time in my life," Mr. Ban said.

Worse than that, the professional lapse that cost him his high-level position in the South Korean Foreign Ministry required a public apology from the president at the time, Kim Dae-jung. Mr. Ban had accidentally left a positive mention of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty in a joint communiqué with Russia at a time when the Bush administration had decided to abandon it.

"You must understand the political impact in Asia that public apologies have," Mr. Ban said, wincing at the memory.

As it turned out, he survived thanks to another Asian cultural tradition. "I had what we call a 'jeon-hwa-we-bok' experience," he said. The maxim, well known to Koreans, means turning a misfortune into a blessing.

While waiting in Seoul to be shunted off to a remote embassy, as he expected, he was tapped by Han Seung-soo, the General Assembly president for 2001, to come to the United Nations to be his chief of staff.

"Had I been appointed to an ambassadorship somewhere, I simply wouldn't have had this opportunity to be selected secretary general," Mr. Ban said.

The full realization of this reversal of fortune comes this Thursday with his formal swearing-in as the eighth secretary general of the United Nations. He will assume the office on Jan. 1, replacing Kofi Annan, who completes his second five-year term on Dec. 31.

Courtly and deliberate, with an easy smile, Mr. Ban, 62, is an unknown at the United Nations, particularly compared with the high-profile, globetrotting diplomat he is succeeding.

With the exception of his misstep in 2001, Mr. Ban has been almost surpassingly unassuming and inoffensive — noticed, when he is, for his steady record of incremental achievement at the South Korean Foreign Ministry, where he has spent his entire 37-year career.

The elusiveness may be intended.

"When I was the foreign policy adviser to President Roh Moo-hyun, everybody was caught up in controversy with what they said to the media, but I avoided the tricky, sometimes nasty questions," he said. "The press people called me the 'slippery eel' because they could never grab me."

A loyal and dependable company man, he once wrote handwritten letters of apology to 120 Foreign Ministry officials after being promoted ahead of them. "They were very much grateful for my gesture," he said. "With that, I was able to lessen the sorry feelings of my senior colleagues."

His penchant for not stepping on toes and his repeated public expressions of humility during the months that he was campaigning for secretary general have raised doubts about his suitability for the job. How can someone with such a retiring manner lead an organization undergoing a hotly contested reformation, riddled with regional rivalries and subject to competing demands from the great powers and the nations of the developing world?

ADDRESSING this concern in his acceptance speech to the General Assembly on Oct. 13, he asked that people accept his modest mien as a cultural attribute and not misread it as lack of decisiveness or passion. "Modesty is about demeanor," he said, "not about vision and goals. It does not mean the lack of commitment or leadership."

In campaigning for the job, Mr. Ban presented himself as a "harmonizer and bridge builder" who would try to dispel the widespread mistrust of the United Nations.

With the choice of each secretary general, the question always arises about which part of that title the new person will inhabit. Given Mr. Ban's résumé and style, the prediction now is that he will be more a secretary, less a general.

But the same expectation greeted Mr. Annan 10 years ago, and, to the particular dismay of the Bush administration, he ended up being more general, less secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0105355

John R. Bolton, the departing United States ambassador, left no doubt what the American hopes were for Mr. Ban, whom Washington backed vigorously. He repeatedly pointed out that the job of secretary general was described in the United Nations Charter as simply "chief administrative officer."

Mr. Ban was born on June 13, 1944, in Eumseong, a farm village in Japanese-occupied Korea, and raised in Chungju, a nearby town. His family lost its middle-class standard of living when his father's warehouse business went bankrupt, and Mr. Ban was to spend his early years as a diplomat deliberately picking posts where he could save money to send home.

When he was 6, his family had to flee to a remote mountainside to escape the fighting during the Korean War. "We were safe and in a place where neither the South Korean nor North Korean armies would come, but we were poor and hungry," he said. "I could see the fighter jets bombing the towns and cities nearby."

The experience led to his first sighting of Americans. "After the war, the American soldiers would throw biscuits and chocolates and chewing gum to us, and all our clothes were given to us by America," he said.

A later encounter with Western ways occurred when American technicians came to his town in the 1950s to help build a fertilizer factory, and he still recalls it with shock.

"I was startled one summer when I met for the first time one of the daughters, and she was sitting there with hot pants and her two legs stretched out in front of me, a young country boy," he said. "I didn't know where to place my eyes, where to focus. It would have been a matter of shame for any Korean lady at that time."

The eldest of six children, he was a standout student, applying himself with particular zeal to learning English. The method of study was arduous, with students required to write the same English sentences 10 times as a way of memorizing them.

IN 1962, he won an English competition sponsored by the Red Cross and got a chance to visit the United States. The high point of that trip was a meeting at the White House with President John F. Kennedy, which he said first inspired him to become a diplomat.

He married another high achiever, his school's student council president, Yoo Soon-taek, in 1971, a year after he had passed his diplomat's exam.

The couple have two daughters, Seon-yong, 34, who works in Seoul for the Korea Foundation, a nonprofit organization that promotes Korean culture, and Hyun-hee, 30, a field officer for Unicef in Nairobi, Kenya. They also have a son, Woo-hyun, 32, who is studying for an M.B.A. at the University of California, Los Angeles.

Mr. Ban is admittedly all work, no play.

"When you ask about hobbies, that's a question I have difficulty answering," he said. "I regret, looking back at my life, that I have not been able to cultivate any extracurricular activities like playing tennis or soccer or football. The only sport I do is golf, but in the last three or four years, I have played less than 10 times."

In 1956, Mr. Ban was picked by his class to address an appeal to Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold over the Hungarian uprising against the Russians. But whether there is an interesting historical footnote here, Mr. Ban cannot say. "I never found out if they ever sent it," he said.

Annan Decries Failure To Halt Darfur Killings (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 8 -- U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan scolded governments Friday for failing to halt mass murder in Darfur, saying that the world has not learned the lessons of Rwanda and Srebrenica, where genocidal killings in the early 1990s defied the global ability to stop it.

"Sixty years after the liberation of the Nazi death camps, and 30 years after the Cambodian killing fields, the promise of 'never again' is ringing hollow," Annan said in his final speech on human rights as the U.N. leader.

Annan said the failure to protect civilians in the Sudanese region marked a low point in recent U.N. history. In a speech organized by Human Rights Watch in honor of International Human Rights Day, he faulted the "shameful passivity of most governments" in the face of a government-backed military campaign that has driven more than 2 million people from their homes and killed hundreds of thousands.

Annan provided a gloomy assessment of the organization's performance in confronting abusers of human rights during his 10-year tenure. He charged that the U.S.-led fight against terrorism has helped erode human rights standards. He said the United Nations needs to pursue an "an anti-terrorism strategy that does not merely pay lip service to the defense of human rights but is built on it."

Human rights activists have credited Annan, a Nobel Peace Prize laureate, with advocating human rights more aggressively than any of his predecessors. But his legacy has been clouded by his own failure, as the head of the U.N. peacekeeping department, to promote a tougher response to the mass killings in Rwanda and Srebrenica.

DOJ_NMG_0105356

Annan said his tenure has been marked by some important innovations, citing the creation of war crimes courts in Rwanda, the former Yugoslavia, Sierra Leone and Cambodia, as well as the establishment of the International Criminal Court. The Hague-based court is preparing for the possible prosecution of Sudanese perpetrators of the Darfur killings.

But he said the initial work of the new Human Rights Council, established this year by the U.N. General Assembly to hold the world's tyrants and dictators to account, has been discouraging.

The Geneva-based rights body has focused almost all its attention on condemning Israel's human rights record while remaining silent about rights abuses in Darfur, Burma and elsewhere. Annan said he hopes the council will confront Sudan in a special session on Darfur.

"The United Nations has a special stake, and a special responsibility, in promoting respect for human rights worldwide," he said. "I don't need to tell you that the U.N. has often failed to live up to that responsibility."

Annan made clear that he believes the U.N. membership bears the chief responsibility. He reserved some of his harshest criticism for Third World governments that, he said, have mischaracterized the U.N. human rights agenda as "a conspiracy by imperialist powers to take back the hard-won national sovereignty of formerly colonized people."

He also took an indirect swipe at China and Islamic governments that have defended Sudan. China, which relies on Sudan for oil, has repeatedly blocked U.S.-backed efforts to punish Sudan for rights abuses.

"There is more than enough blame to go around," Annan said. "It can be shared among those who value abstract notions of sovereignty more than the lives of real families, those whose reflex of solidarity puts them on the side of governments and not of peoples, and those who fear that action to stop the slaughter would jeopardize their commercial interests."

Annan said two pillars of U.S. counterterrorism strategy -- clandestine prisons and the promotion of tougher interrogation methods -- are playing into the hands of terrorists and ceding the moral high ground. "Secret prisons have no place in our struggle against terrorism," he said.

A U.S. official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said the United States has an obligation to prosecute the fight against terrorism. "We are doing everything we can to make sure human rights are protected, always," the official said.

U.N. Chief Sees Little Progress On Rights (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, December 9, 2006

NEW YORK — U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan gave a sober assessment Friday of his own shortcomings as he prepared to leave office at the end of the year, and accused the United States of violating human rights in its war on terror.

He also warned Sudan's leaders that they would be held accountable if they didn't halt the violence in Darfur, and urged countries with commercial interests in Sudan to pressure the government in Khartoum.

In an address to mark Human Rights Day, which is Sunday, Annan talked about whether the United Nations had become an effective defender of human rights during his decade as secretary-general.

"I'm not sure how far I have succeeded," he said. "To judge by what is happening in Darfur, our performance has not improved much since the disasters of Bosnia and Rwanda," Annan said.

"Sixty years after the liberation of the Nazi death camps, and 30 years after the Cambodian killing fields, the promise of 'never again' is ringing hollow," he said to an audience of about 500 people invited by Human Rights Watch.

He suggested several ways to improve, starting with living up to an agreement signed by world leaders last year that the world had the "responsibility to protect" people from crimes against humanity, even those perpetrated by their own government.

Darfur, the western region of Sudan, where about 2.5 million people have been displaced and more than 200,000 have died in three years of conflict, is a test case. But countries have not showed enough will to give up commercial interests in the oil-rich country or to overrule its obstinate government, he said.

"There is more than enough blame to go around," he said, referring to China's and Russia's reluctance to impose sanctions, his own impotence and Khartoum's intransigence.

Annan recently pushed Sudan's President Omar Hassan Ahmed Bashir to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force to protect civilians in Darfur, but Bashir would accept only a U.N.-funded African Union force. Sudan's leaders say that U.N. soldiers are a spearhead for imperialist powers that want to shatter Sudan and arrest its leaders.

Annan warned that if the Sudanese government did not protect its own people or allow international peacekeepers to do it, "then the government will have to be held accountable, both collectively and individually." The International Criminal Court is expected to announce arrest warrants this month for leaders of systematic killings of civilians.

Annan also sharply criticized the United States, without explicitly naming it, for detaining terrorism suspects in secret prisons and thus undermining its moral authority.

Nations cannot protect people from terrorism by "themselves violating human rights in the process."

DOJ_NMG_0105357

"To do so means abandoning the moral high ground and playing into the hands of terrorists," he said. "That is why secret prisons have no place in our struggle against terrorism."

During his leadership of the U.N., Annan has rarely clashed publicly with the United States. But he drew Washington's wrath by calling the Iraq invasion illegal, urging the U.S. to try to co-opt insurgents rather than alienate them, and refusing to significantly commit U.N. agencies to help rebuild Iraq because of security concerns.

On Friday, he said that it was time for a new strategy on Iraq, and that the U.N. could organize a reconstruction conference for Iraq as it did after the Balkan wars and the invasion of Afghanistan.

The Iraq Study Group interviewed him for the report it released Wednesday, and Annan revealed that the panelists had asked him whether he would lead such a conference.

The Agonies Of Zimbabwe (NYT)

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

One problem with labeling states as pariahs is that it's all too easy to forget about them. Robert Mugabe's Zimbabwe is a prime example: it is under economic sanctions by the United States and the European Union and few tourists go there, so the suffering of its people is largely out of sight and out of mind. Yet things are truly terrible.

The latest indication comes in a United Nations-financed report by Zimbabwe's own social welfare ministry. More than 63 percent of the rural population, and 53 percent of the urban population, couldn't meet "basic food and non-food requirements" in 2003, the last year for which figures were available, and things have gotten far worse since. Malnutrition among children is up 35 percent, people without access to health care is up 35 percent, H.I.V./AIDS afflicts 18.1 percent of the population, unemployment is over 70 percent, life expectancy is down to 36.

Mr. Mugabe's government blames sanctions, weather, former colonial rule, market conditions. Yet the real culprit is Mr. Mugabe, who has run Zimbabwe since 1980. Now 82, the president is a master at the blame game, accusing the West of colonialism and racism when it criticizes his scheme to redistribute white-owned commercial farms among blacks, or the cruel expulsion of 750,000 slum dwellers from cities, or whatever else he does.

There's not much the West can do; more sanctions would only bring more suffering. But Africans could make a difference, if they joined in condemning Mr. Mugabe. For understandable reasons, African leaders have been reluctant to publicly criticize fellow Africans. But as Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, declared yesterday, "human rights are perhaps more in need of protection in Africa than in any other continent."

The suffering Zimbabwean people are in desperate need of protection, the sooner the better.

Putting Remittances To Work (WP)

By Marcela Sanchez

The Washington Post, December 9, 2006

El Salvador has become the first lower-middle-income country to secure a grant from the Millennium Challenge Corp., President Bush's foreign aid program designed to assist well-governed developing nations. With the $461 million grant, the agency is set to join Salvadoran immigrants in sending money south.

The grant might seem small relative to the $2.8 billion in remittances sent by immigrants last year, particularly since it will be spread over five years. But that doesn't mean Salvadorans in the United States don't have some suggestions for the Millennium Corp. and a hope that the program can help them change the way remittances affect their country.

Salvadoran immigrants are frustrated that their cash isn't reaping more development rewards back home. Although remittances have proved to be a lifeline for thousands of families in extreme poverty, immigrant Salvadorans fear that the money is creating a culture of dependency in the home country.

Carlos Castro, a Salvadoran community leader and owner of a Hispanic specialty supermarket in Northern Virginia, is dismayed that El Salvador now has to import workers from other Central American countries because some Salvadorans don't see a need to work and rely instead on monthly checks from relatives abroad. He further laments the consumerism that has Salvadoran immigrants working hard at tough jobs to pay for "a pair of the latest name-brand shoes" demanded by their kids back in El Salvador.

Salvadoran officials heard similar complaints of consumerism and dependency in meetings with Salvadorans across the United States as part of the consultation process to gain public support for their Millennium proposal. According to their records, there was a general sense that "it is time to put an end to that paternalistic mentality" and that their support should generate work, not just money to spend.

In other words, remittances are "neither 'manna from heaven' nor a substitute for sound development policies," a recently released World Bank report concluded. In "Close to Home: The Development Impact of Remittances in Latin America," the World

DOJ_NMG_0105358

Bank found that if aid flows are consumed rather than invested, they have no impact on economic growth. This is certainly true for El Salvador -- it is the largest per capita recipient of remittances in Central America and has had the region's lowest economic growth for at least four years.

To reverse this trend, governments in recipient countries should, according to the World Bank, provide incentives for investment and promote the development of human capital. The Millennium plan for El Salvador appears to follow this model, aiming to increase incomes in El Salvador's lagging northern zone -- the area of origin for most Salvadorans in this country -- through a combination of investments in education, public services, enterprise development and transportation infrastructure.

What's missing in this equation, say some critics, is a direct connection between the new development plan and the current flow of help. This seems to be a serious oversight and opportunity missed. The $461 million grant will have an effect, to be sure, but imagine the impact if the Millennium Corp. could help leverage the billions sent annually from immigrants in the United States.

According to Manuel Orozco, a remittance expert for the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington-based think tank, the Millennium-sponsored plan might have created investment portfolios for small-scale projects back home that immigrants could contribute to.

To a small degree, this investment has already begun. Such collective or community initiatives, organized through hometown associations, are investing about $3 million annually, mostly in educational and health projects.

Yet some members of hometown associations suspect that Salvadoran officials intentionally locked them out of the Millennium plan. Jaime PeÃ±ate of Comunidades, which represents hometown associations formed by Salvadoran immigrants living in the Los Angeles area, said he was among the dozens invited by the Salvadoran government to hear about the Millennium effort. But then he discovered that other Salvadoran officials were meeting in another room with big investors.

Nevertheless, some Salvadorans here aren't giving up on trying to tap Millennium funds. Luis Felipe Romero, executive director of Comunidades Unidas SalvadoreÃ±as, the Washington area's equivalent of PeÃ±ate's L.A. group, said he reached out to the Salvadoran Foreign Ministry with a proposal to use some Millennium funding to launch a pilot program and is awaiting an answer. "We are going to continue working for El Salvador," he said. "If they take advantage of the opportunity to work with us we will welcome it."

Words Fail Them (NYT)

By Jean-Benoit Nadeau, Julie Barlow

The New York Times, December 9, 2006

STEPHEN HARPER, the prime minister of Canada, stunned the country last month when he proposed a resolution recognizing that the seven million "Québécois form a nation within a united Canada." Anyone who has traveled to Montreal or Quebec City will recognize that Mr. Harper was merely stating the obvious, at least where the term "nation" is concerned. But for Canadians, Mr. Harper's words reopened a long, tortured debate over national identity, and recast it in stronger terms than ever.

The background to his declaration is, of course, Quebec's secessionist movement — strong enough to have monopolized Canadian politics for the last 50 years, but not quite strong enough to actually win a referendum on independence. The struggle has largely been a war of words.

Since the 1940s, Canadians have been looking for the right word — some say formula — to answer the question: "What does Quebec want?" For the last 20 years, the thinking has been to give Quebec some kind of recognition.

In 1990, many believed the Meech Lake accord held the answer to this riddle. Promising constitutional protection for Quebec's efforts to preserve its French language and culture, the accord was an attempt to re-integrate Quebec into the constitutional family (although Canada's Constitution was repatriated from Britain in 1982, making Canada a fully independent country, Quebec has still not signed it). The accord, however, got stuck when a debate started over the significance of two words, "distinct society," a phrase intended to satisfy Quebecers' desire for recognition without alienating everyone else.

When a significant segment of the Canadian population disapproved of the accord, arguing that it gave French Canadians too much power, some provincial governments refused to ratify it, and Canada nearly broke up. In 1995, the separatist Parti Québécois, which controlled Quebec at the time, came up with its own solution: a provincial referendum on separation based on perhaps the wordiest — and most ambiguous — question ever formulated. Separatists lost the vote by only a narrow margin.

In 2000, the national Liberal government rebounded with the Clarity Act, which it thought was a foolproof formula to prevent separatists from taking advantage of an ambiguously worded question to win an independence referendum.

But now, Stephen Harper has created new ambiguity in the question — all the more interesting since he probably thought he was clarifying things. And he was so hasty in pulling this rabbit out of his hat that he didn't even consult his minister of intergovernmental affairs, who later resigned over the issue. Yet Parliament voted resoundingly in favor of his resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0105359

This suddenness had a lot more to do with political maneuvering than an awakening to Quebec's aspirations for statehood. Mr. Harper, a Conservative, saw a good opportunity to steal some thunder from the separatist parties and to increase his popularity in Quebec — much reduced by his opposition to same-sex marriage, his refusal to respect the Kyoto accord and his support for Israel during the war in Lebanon last summer.

Since the "nation" declaration, politicians and columnists have been dissecting and debating the word, and they probably will for decades to come, since French Canadians tend to see Canada as a country made up of two nations, while the English tend to think that "country" and "nation" are one and the same. Mr. Harper used the French term Québécois rather than Quebecer in the English version of the resolution, and everyone is puzzled by the choice and hesitant about its possible implications.

Some critics wonder if the federal government has unwittingly created a new ethnic category. Others point out that if the Scots or the Catalans can be called a nation within Britain or Spain, why not the people of Quebec?

Meanwhile, the Quebec government, led by the very federalist (that is, anti-separatist) Jean Charest, maintains that the territory of Quebec (not Quebecers) constitutes a nation, thereby refusing to associate "nation" with ethnicity. Tribunals, politicians and voters will be called on many times to answer these questions.

Nonetheless, as people living in Quebec, we feel that Mr. Harper has come up with a promising formulation. Most people in Quebec, apart from hard-line separatists, will probably be satisfied by the word nation.

And English Canadians ought to be, too, despite their resistance to the idea that Canada has two founding cultures. The problem is, ever since 1990 English Canadians have been traumatized by the failed attempts to make the Constitution acceptable to Quebec, so they are hesitating, as polls show.

Stephen Harper has created either a new basis for talks about Quebec's status or contributed a new weapon to a nastier debate. No one has quite figured out which it will be.

DOJ_NMG_0105360

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Monday, December 11, 2006 10:52 AM
To: Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M. (CIV); Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Senger, Jeffrey M; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 12/11/06 Civil Division News

Former Detainees Argue for Right to Sue Rumsfeld Over Torture

DAVID HICKS Father says he holds no false hope `Put Ruddock, governments, on trial instead'

Government wants Hamdan case dismissed

FEMA loses bid to withhold payments / Agency must tell judge how it will resume housing aid for some evacuees

Court to hear appeals Monday on ruling against Pentagon personnel rules

FBI files about '75 shootout sought; Lawyers hope information will clear Indian activist Leonard Peltier

Haitian immigrant stripped of U.S. citizenship is man without a country

Judge dismisses couple's federal peyote suit

A fight for freedom: Iranian couple struggled to clear name

Did DEA Administrator Tandy duck day in court over House of Death?

Editorial: Court ruling on paper money not best way to help blind; Policy makers - not a federal judge - should decide whether paper currency should change

New York Times

December 9, 2006

Former Detainees Argue for Right to Sue Rumsfeld Over Torture

By PAUL von ZIELBAUER

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8 — Lawyers for former detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan argued in federal court on Friday that Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld was personally responsible, and thus legally liable, for acts of torture inflicted on their clients by American military interrogators.

The nine plaintiffs, Iraqi and Afghan men held at American-run prisons, endured an array of physical and psychological abuse during their confinements in 2003 and 2004, including beatings, mock executions and painful physical restraints, their lawyers said in court papers. All were eventually released without being charged with crimes.

The hearing Friday, before Chief Judge Thomas F. Hogan in Federal District Court in Washington, was the first time a federal court had considered whether top administration officials could be liable for the torture of detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But the hearing concerned only questions of jurisdiction and did not delve into whether Mr. Rumsfeld, because he personally approved certain interrogation techniques in 2002 like the use of "stress positions," was legally responsible for specific acts of torture committed in overseas military prisons.

Instead, lawyers from each side argued over whether noncitizens confined in prisons outside the United States had legal standing to sue Mr. Rumsfeld and other American military officials for constitutional violations.

The suit, filed on behalf of the nine plaintiffs last year by the American Civil Liberties Union and Human Rights First, also names as defendants three officials responsible for running military prisons in Iraq and Afghanistan: Lt. Gen. Ricardo S. Sanchez, the former top commander in Iraq; Col. Thomas M. Pappas, who was the top military intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, the American-run prison in Iraq; and a former brigadier general, Col. Janis L. Karpinski, who before her demotion to colonel was the military police commander at Abu Ghraib. She was relieved of her command and demoted after abuses at Abu Ghraib came to light.

During the two-and-a-half-hour hearing, Judge Hogan took turns questioning the lawyers. He repeatedly asked lawyers for the former detainees to cite precedents in law that would allow foreigners to sue American officials for what in the United States would be violations of their civil rights.

"How can this work, this theory that nonresident aliens have a right to sue to prevent being tortured?" Judge Hogan asked Lucas Guttentag, the plaintiffs' lead lawyer in the case. What would prevent Osama bin Laden, the judge asked Mr. Guttentag, from taking President Bush to court for authorizing the military to kill him?

Mr. Guttentag, citing several Supreme Court decisions, said that American laws prohibiting torture should apply to foreign civilians under exclusively American control and jurisdiction overseas. He also noted that in Iraq, American military personnel were immune from prosecution under Iraqi laws. "Iraqi law cannot govern, and unless the United States does, nothing else applies."

Rick Beckner, a deputy assistant attorney general representing Mr. Rumsfeld, argued that foreigners held in an American-run prison in foreign territory had no legal standing to sue. "There's never been any finding that the Constitution applies to these plaintiffs," he told Judge Hogan.

Judge Hogan, clearly skeptical of the plaintiffs' attempt to open federal officials to legal liability for actions by troops overseas, said he hoped to make a decision quickly to dismiss the case or allow some or all claims to proceed.

But in his closing remarks, the judge also acknowledged being disturbed by the allegations of detainee abuse and torture. “It is unfortunate, to say the least, that there has to be an argument” about whether the American military tortures foreign citizens.

END

Advertiser (Australia)

December 11, 2006

DAVID HICKS Father says he holds no false hope `Put Ruddock, governments, on trial instead'

KARA PHILLIPS, POLITICAL REPORTER

THE father of terrorist suspect David Hicks remains sceptical formal charges would be brought against his son early next year, accusing the Federal Government of yet more ``political spin''.

Terry Hicks's comments came as a second rally in Adelaide in as many days was held yesterday to call for his son's release from a maximum security prison at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

Hundreds of people wearing orange T-shirts converged on Parliament House to mark Human Rights Day.

The march followed news that Hicks, from South Australia and detained since 2001, was likely to be charged early next year.

Hicks' father yesterday said dates had been set before and he no longer trusted the Australian Government.

``Mr Ruddock has been no help to David's cause - the American and Australian governments should be the ones facing court,'' Mr Hicks said.

``He should be brought home and charged and tried or be set free. Mr Ruddock needs to pin down an exact date, otherwise it's just the same old political spin.'' Attorney General Philip Ruddock said Hicks was likely to be charged sometime after January 17, when new regulations for the U.S. military commission, expected to try him, come into effect.

Unlike other military tribunals, the new commission allows the right of appeal to a civilian court.

Amnesty International Australia spokeswoman Katie Wood said Human Rights Day commemorated the day the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948.

``We are calling on the Australian Government to bring David home and let him face an Australian court,'' she said.

Saturday marked the fifth anniversary of Hicks's detention after he was captured in Afghanistan in late 2001.

The Muslim convert had pleaded not guilty to charges of conspiracy, attempted murder and aiding the enemy.

However, the charges were dropped after the U.S. Supreme Court in June declared the military tribunals set up to try Hicks and other inmates were illegal.

He remains in detention without charge.

END

SctousBlog

Friday, December 08, 2006

Government wants Hamdan case dismissed

Posted by Lyle Denniston at 07:58 PM

This is another in a continuing series of reports on the lower court impact of the Supreme Court's ruling last June in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, striking down the Bush Administration's initial plan for war crimes tribunals of detainees at the war-on-terrorism camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The Justice Department on Friday urged a federal judge in Washington, D.C., to put an end to a habeas challenge by a Yemeni national, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, and to wipe out an earlier order that barred his trial by a U.S. military war crimes tribunal. Arguing that Hamdan has no constitutional rights he can assert in federal court, the Department suggested that he could pursue a limited appeal in D.C. Circuit Court if he is ever convicted of war crimes by a "military commission" or an even more limited challenge there to his detention.

The government's 56-page brief, found here, sets the stage for the first -- or one of the first -- federal court rulings on the constitutionality of the new Military Commissions Act. Congress passed that measure (Public Law 109-366) in October in the wake of the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan's case last Term. Hamdan's lawyers have raised a variety of constitutional challenges to his detention and to his potential trial before a military tribunal. The briefing is now completed on those arguments, as well as on the government's move to dismiss Hamdan's case altogether, and thus U.S. District Judge James Robertson could rule at any time. In yesterday's brief, the Justice Department sought to refute every one of Hamdan's constitutional claims, and suggested that he had no right (no "standing:) to raise most of them.

Most of the same challenges to U.S. policies of detention of foreign nationals during the war on terrorism are also being weighed now by the D.C.Circuit Court. While briefing is also complete there, there is no indication when it will rule. The government, by implication, urged Robertson to hold off until after the Circuit Court acts, since it said the coming ruling there would impact Hamdan's case, too. But, in the meantime, the government contended that Robertson should wipe out his November 8, 2004, order that barred a military commission trial of Hamdan on a conspiracy charge.

The 2004 order, the federal brief said, only applied to the militiary commission system that existed before it was nullified by the Supreme Court. The new system authorized by Congress in October is not yet operating, and Hamdan has not been charged anew, the brief noted. Thus, his claims against a military war crimes trial are premature. At most, it suggested, Judge Robertson should transfer Hamdan's case to the D.C. Circuit Court to weigh his claim that he has not been properly designated as an "enemy combatant" by a military status tribunal at Guantanamo.

Aside from comments the government brief made specific to Hamdan's case, its legal arguments closely paralleled those it has made in several other pending detainee cases: the detainees have no constitutional rights to assert in U.S. courts, Congress has taken away any right they had before to challenge their detention or potential prosecution, that withdrawal does not viiolate the Constitution's bar on suspending habeas because Congress has set up an adequate review alternative in D.C. Circuit, and that there is no merit in the argument of detainees' lawyers that Congress did not intend in its October legislation to keep alive any pending habeas cases.

END

Houston Chronicle

December 9, 2006

FEMA loses bid to withhold payments / Agency must tell judge how it will resume housing aid for some evacuees

MIKE SNYDER

A judge ordered the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Friday to explain how it intends to comply with his ruling that the agency must resume paying rent and make back payments to thousands of evacuees from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon in Washington denied FEMA's request for a stay of his Nov. 29 order. He instructed lawyers for FEMA and for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which sued the federal agency, to answer a series of questions and attend a conference in his courtroom Wednesday to discuss compliance plans.

Notices were called vague

Robert Doggett, an attorney with Texas RioGrande Legal Aid in Austin representing evacuees, said Friday's order shows that "the judge has not changed his mind and is insisting that FEMA comply."

Leon ruled that notices FEMA sent to evacuees it deemed ineligible for continued housing assistance were so vague and confusing that they provided no basis for the families to appeal the denials or correct the problems that made the families ineligible.

He ordered the agency to immediately resume paying rent for an estimated 11,000 households around the country, including about 2,600 in Houston, and to pay these families three months of back rent.

FEMA appealed the decision on Tuesday. Representatives of the agency did not respond to a request for comment on Friday. Doggett said he expects FEMA to ask an appeals court for the stay that Leon denied. But it's unlikely the court would act before Wednesday's conference with Leon, Doggett said.

FEMA warns of `burden'

In its motion asking Leon to stay his order pending the appeal, FEMA argued that Leon had granted relief to an entire class of people even though the lawsuit was not a class action.

The federal law authorizing the housing assistance, FEMA's lawyers said, grants the agency "absolute discretion" over how to administer it.

"The time, expense, and administrative burden that FEMA will be put through if it has to comply with the order will substantially interfere with its ability to carry out the emergency assistance duties that are its primary function during major disasters," the motion states.

END

Federal Times

Court to hear appeals Monday on ruling against Pentagon personnel rules

By Tim Kauffman_

Government and union lawyers will argue before an appeals court Monday in a case that could decide whether the Defense Department can proceed with contentious changes to personnel rules affecting 650,000 employees.

Thirteen federal employee unions will defend their joint lawsuit against the Pentagon's National Security Personnel System (NSPS), filed in November 2005, arguing chiefly that the new system fails to protect employees' rights to bargain collectively.

Lawyers representing the department likely will attempt to distance NSPS from the Homeland Security Department's failed personnel reforms, which were struck down by the same appeals court in June. Based on arguments filed in advance of Monday's hearing, federal lawyers will contend that the law authorizing NSPS gave the Pentagon greater authority than Homeland Security had to redefine collective bargaining.

The 2003 law authorizing the creation of NSPS "makes clear that the agencies must 'ensure' collective bargaining, only insofar as the collective bargaining system does not conflict with other authorities granted to DoD," federal attorneys wrote in an August brief to the appeals court.

Unions refuted this claim in their own September brief to the court, saying the law essentially gave the Pentagon the same authority as Homeland Security to waive portions of Title 5 governing labor relations. As the court held in the Homeland Security case, the ability to waive those rules "does not include the power to rewrite the core meaning of collective bargaining," the unions said.

The unions will argue before the appeals court that NSPS should be struck down for the same reasons Homeland Security's personnel system was deemed illegal, said Mark Roth, general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, a member of the union coalition that brought the lawsuit.

"Our position has been clear from day one," Roth said. "The [DoD and DHS] statutes are much more similar than they are different."

The appeals court hearing follows a ruling in February by Judge Emmett Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, who ruled against the Pentagon. Sullivan said NSPS infringes on employees' collective bargaining rights, fails to provide an independent third-party review of labor-management disputes, and lacks a fair process to resolve appeals of adverse management actions.

The government appealed the ruling to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, where a three-judge panel will hear oral arguments from both sides Monday.

Attorneys from both sides will have 20 minutes to present their arguments. The appeals court decision is expected sometime in the spring.

END

AP

December 10, 2006

FBI files about '75 shootout sought; Lawyers hope information will clear Indian activist Leonard Peltier

BY PAT MILTON
Associated Press

Attorneys for an American Indian activist convicted of killing two FBI agents in a shootout on a South Dakota reservation in 1975 are taking their fight to free the imprisoned man to a court in New York.

The attorneys for Leonard Peltier argued last week for the release of all FBI files stemming from the three-decade-old case. Appearing before a three-judge panel of the U.S. Appeals Court in Manhattan, they contended the documents should have been turned over to them for the 1977 trial.

They are now seeking release of the documents under the Freedom of Information Act, hoping the withheld information will lead to Peltier's exoneration.

"The FBI cannot use exemptions under FOIA to shield unauthorized, illegal tactics in this case," Peltier's attorney, Michael Kuzma, told the panel. Kuzma claimed investigators coerced witnesses and withheld evidence in building a case against Peltier.

Justice Department attorney H. Thomas Byron III told the court that unfettered release of the documents would compromise confidentiality of witnesses. He said the witnesses were guaranteed confidentiality, either expressed or implied.

"The circumstances of this case make it clear that anyone who provided information would have reason to have concern for their well-being," Byron argued.

The FBI in Buffalo, N.Y., released 797 pages of material in 2004. But it withheld some 15 pages and redacted large portions of the released pages, citing exemptions allowed under FOIA for national security concerns and to protect the identity of agents, witnesses and informants.

The judges reserved a decision on whether to overturn a Buffalo federal court's ruling last February and order the release of the 15 withheld documents and grant unfettered access to those with redactions. The federal court in Buffalo had found the FBI could keep the handful of documents secret.

Peltier, 60, is serving two life sentences at the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pa.

He was a leader of the American Indian Movement in the 1970s and convicted in 1977 in North Dakota of the killings of the two agents during a shootout on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota. His supporters have been trying to get his conviction overturned for years, saying he was wrongfully targeted because of his activism.

Kuzma said outside court that any ruling against Peltier would be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Kuzma said the defense team is seeking more than 140,000 pages of FBI documents from field offices nationwide.

More than two dozen Peltier supporters filled rear benches in the courtroom during the 30-minute hearing.

"They needed someone to blame for the crime and they got him," said Peltier supporter Jerry Sevitz, of Manhattan.

END

AP

December 10, 2006

Haitian immigrant stripped of U.S. citizenship is man without a country

By JENNIFER KAY

Associated Press Writer

MIAMI_Lionel Jean-Baptiste waits on a bench at a federal detention center with his legs outstretched, the last three digits of his detainee number scrawled on the toes of his slip-on shoes.

His orange uniform further identifies him as the responsibility of U.S. immigration officials. They want to deport the former Miami restaurant owner convicted of federal drug trafficking charges after he became an American citizen, but are having trouble finding a place to send him because he is, in effect, a man without a country.

An immigration judge revoked his citizenship and ordered him deported in September _ the first time since 1962 that the U.S. government ordered a naturalized citizen deported after a drug conviction. But this is only the latest example of applying toughter standards on immigrants following the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Jean-Baptiste served seven years in prison on a conviction for conspiring to distribute crack cocaine _ a crime he still denies he committed. But his lawyer, Andre Pierre, says Jean-Baptiste has given up fighting U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement over his citizenship because prolonging the battle could lead to his spending more time in detention.

His current legal tactic is waiting out the agency, pending an administrative review of his case, scheduled for Tuesday. One factor in his favor could be a U.S. Supreme Court ruling that foreigners who cannot be deported cannot be held indefinitely, and set a six-month detention maximum. Jean-Baptiste has been held at Krome Detention Center in Miami since June.

Pierre has suggested his client may be freed and escape deportation because no nation will take Jean-Baptiste, who is no longer a citizen of any country. His native Haiti refused to take him because he gave up his citizenship there a decade ago to become an American; France has declined on grounds he never lived in France.

"They have nothing really to hold him but his criminal record. The guy has been a model citizen for the last 25 years," said Pierre.

Government attorneys have disagreed, arguing he did not have "good moral character" before he became a citizen. That determination allows officials to strip naturalized Americans of their citizenship.

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals concurred in January 2005, ruling that while the conviction alone was not enough to revoke his citizenship, committing a crime showed he lacked the required good character. The Supreme Court declined to hear Jean-Baptiste's appeal 10 months later.

"The case is still under review. Our obligation as a law enforcement agency is to carry out orders of removal as issued by immigration judges," Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Barbara Gonzalez said in a statement.

Late last month in a spare computer room at Krome, Jean-Baptiste, 59, could only shrug at his attempts to get the government to hear his side of the story. "The government is an elephant and my lawyer is a little cat. He does whatever he can," he said.

Jean-Baptiste became a U.S. citizen in April 1996, after answering no to questions about whether he had ever been arrested, charged, fined or convicted for breaking any law except traffic violations. What apparently never came up was the day in March 1995 when he says a woman walked into his Little Haiti restaurant and asked if he could sell her 2 ounces of crack cocaine.

Federal authorities at the time alleged that Jean-Baptiste was an upper-level manager of a crack cocaine ring in the impoverished Miami neighborhood.

Jean-Baptiste has persistently denied the allegations. He says he told the woman, an undercover police officer, that drugs were not sold in his restaurant but added _ just to be helpful _ that they would probably not be hard to find up the street.

He was indicted in October 1996 on charges of possessing, selling and conspiring to sell crack cocaine; he was only convicted of conspiracy. The undercover officer testified that Jean-Baptiste specifically directed her to his supplier _ a claim she could not substantiate with a recording because her wire had failed to pick up their conversation.

Jean-Baptiste could have fought deportation on grounds that naturalized immigrants cannot be deported for convictions while they are citizens, Pierre said, but feared he'd have to spend years in detention during an appeal.

Some immigrant advocates ask why so many federal resources have been spent prosecuting Jean-Baptiste.

"It does seem like in this case the government is going through quite a lot of expense for someone convicted of a crime that is relatively common," said Kerri Sherlock, a director for the Washington-based Rights Working Group.

Sherlock said immigrants get punished twice, in criminal and immigration court, with no regard for their long-standing ties to the community.

"They deserve to be treated with dignity and fairness and have the same basic rights as other Americans and shouldn't be punished over and over again for minor offenses," she said.

Federal prosecutors have said in court filings that no extenuating circumstances in Jean-Baptiste's life offset his criminal record and establish good moral character.

He arrived in the U.S. after being rescued from an overloaded wooden boat sinking off Florida's coast and was detained at Krome for several weeks in 1980. He went on to gain permanent residency and worked odd jobs until he earned enough to buy his restaurant, then the building and two other properties. He brought his wife and three sons from Port-au-Prince, Haiti; two daughters were born here.

Jean-Baptiste punctuates his story with terse exclamations of "Why?"

"When you do something, you have to pay for it. When you don't do nothing, you have to be angry," he said.

"Why it happen to me? Because I'm from the Caribbean, or what? Because I'm black?" he said. "If they find something in my past that wasn't in my records, they can revoke my citizenship. Or if I conspire against the United States, they can revoke my citizenship. I didn't do nothing like that."

END

Deseret Morning News

December 11, 2006

Judge dismisses couple's federal peyote suit

Associated Press

A federal judge has dismissed a lawsuit filed by a Utah County couple who claimed the government infringed on their constitutional right to use peyote in religious ceremonies.

U.S. District Judge David Sam ruled that James "Flaming Eagle" Mooney and Linda Mooney have no basis to sue Utah County. The judge also threw out the Mooneys' claims against the United States and the state of Utah.

The Mooneys are the leaders of the Oklevueha Earth Walks Native American Church of Utah.

James Mooney said he was repeatedly prosecuted for violating drug laws by providing peyote to worshippers in the church he founded. He and his wife filed the federal lawsuit in May.

The couple pleaded not guilty to charges of distributing the hallucinogen drug and claimed they only used it in American Indian religious services. Federal prosecutors claimed Mooney broke federal laws by fraudulently claiming to be a member of an American Indian tribe.

In February, federal prosecutors dropped charges of illegally distributing peyote that had been filed against the couple last year. The U.S. Supreme Court ruled the day before in an unrelated case involving a hallucinogenic tea. The ruling said the government cannot hinder religious practices without proof of a "compelling" need to do so.

The federal charges were brought after the Mooneys' convictions in state court were voided. They were charged in 2000 in Utah's 4th District Court for providing peyote to non-Indians visiting the church.

The Mooneys sued last spring, alleging the conduct of state and federal prosecutors interfered with their religious practices.

In a ruling issued this past week, Sam wrote that "there is no fact from which this court could infer or find that Utah County has an official policy that infringes upon plaintiffs' right to use peyote, as that right has been explicitly defined by the Utah Supreme Court."

Sam also ruled that the United States and the state of Utah have sovereign immunity against the lawsuit.

END

Charleston, WV, Gazette

December 10, 2006

A fight for freedom: Iranian couple struggled to clear name

By Scott Finn
Staff writer

MORGANTOWN — For 18 years, Ali and Shahla Afshari did everything America asks immigrants to do. The couple educated themselves and their three children. They served their new country through research to prevent workplace diseases.

None of that mattered on May 5, 2004 — what Ali Afshari calls “the worst day of our lives.” With no warning or explanation, both were fired from their positions at the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health in Morgantown.

Afshari remembers being escorted out of the building on that day. His wife already was standing next to their car, crying uncontrollably. Inside his chest rose a feeling of humiliation, rage and powerlessness.

“It’s my fault,” he told her. “I’m sorry I ever brought you here.”

More than two years later, the Iranian natives say they still don’t know why they were fired from the jobs they had held for years, except that they “failed to pass a background check.”

But since then, they’ve learned some things, thanks to a lawsuit filed by Morgantown lawyer Al Karlin and several others:

A government official has recanted her sworn testimony about the couple. The official once said she received a briefing from security officials and then recommended their termination. Now, she says that her earlier sworn testimony was “not consistent” with her current “recollection of matters.” Long before they were fired, the Federal Bureau of Investigation had conducted a routine check on the couple, decided they were not a security threat and closed their file. The government officials in Atlanta who recommended their firing never interviewed their neighbors, co-workers or supervisors in Morgantown.

The Afsharis’ work had nothing to do with state secrets or national security. For example, Ali Afshari helped design experiments to test how asphalt fumes hurt the lungs.

The Afsharis are asking to be reinstated to their jobs. They are seeking damages to cover attorneys’ fees and more than two years of lost income. Karlin said he was hopeful that the federal government would settle the lawsuit soon.

But no settlement could make up for what they have suffered, Ali Afshari says. That day shook the family to its very core, he said. It shook their faith in themselves and in the United States but did not destroy it, he said. For even as the U.S. government fought them in court, they decided to start the process to become permanent citizens.

“The foundation of this country is strong,” he said. “What a few individuals did, that does not undermine what this country is.

“Freedom is not an easy thing,” he added. “Sometimes we must fight for it.”

All-American family

Spend some time with the Afshari family and you’ll understand why so many people have come to their defense.

Ali Afshari is gregarious and enthusiastic, whether he is talking about the U.S. Constitution or his work as an industrial engineer.

When scientists at NIOSH want to test an idea, they turn to him. He has designed laboratories to measure the effects of cotton dust and asphalt fumes on workers. He has built a “cough machine” that can tell what disease a person has by the sound of their cough.

Shahla Afshari is more reserved than her husband, but equally passionate about her work and her family. She speaks English fluently with only a hint of an accent. At NIOSH, she helped conduct research on sensitivity to chemicals in the workplace.

They live in an attractive subdivision outside Morgantown. Their younger son, 14-year-old Amin, loves basketball and is already 6-foot-3. He once spotted a fire in a neighbor’s house, called 911, and went knocking on his neighbor’s doors to warn them. Later, the family helped raise money for their burned-out neighbor.

Their other two children are recent West Virginia University graduates and self-described Mountaineers. Their older son Hamed, 23, and daughter Azadeh, 24, each served as president of the student health advisory board.

Azadeh Afshari was a member of WVU's homecoming court. Hamed was a residence hall adviser on campus, where younger students described him as being "like a father" to them.

All three children speak flawless Farsi, the language spoken by most Iranians, as well as English, which is no surprise. Amin was born in Morgantown, while Hamed and Azadeh have lived there since they were toddlers.

Ali and Shahla Afshari came to America in 1986 to complete their education. They had lived through the horrific Iran-Iraq war, which killed hundreds of thousands on both sides. Ali Afshari's brother was killed by mustard gas during the fighting.

"Some people don't have legs, they cannot walk, so I wanted to study how to help the handicapped," he said.

He began working on developing better prosthetic limbs for amputees, and then moved on to working on holograms that can replace the need for expensive X-rays on injured patients.

At first they lived in Los Angeles, but the couple wanted to raise their family someplace safer and quieter. That's why they moved to Morgantown in 1987.

In the early 1990s, Ali Afshari started to work at NIOSH. His wife started there in 1997. They both became "service fellows," part of a program for foreign nationals to help with research.

'Hit with a big stone'

The first sign that anything was wrong came in the spring of 2004. Their daughter Azadeh was a senior at WVU completing an internship at the NIOSH wellness clinic.

On April 15, 2004, she was barred from entering the NIOSH building. She was never told why, though the family now believes that a NIOSH official realized that she was a foreign national and may have barred her for that reason alone. Before that, she had been asked for her passport by a security guard, and later she provided them with something she thought was better, her "green card."

Two weeks later, Ali Afshari tried to enter his workplace, but his swipe card no longer worked. He was concerned, but his co-workers said it was probably a computer error.

"I remember joking with them. I said, 'The way things are going nowadays, I wouldn't be surprised if I was told not to come to work,'" Ali Afshari said. Everyone laughed.

On May 5, 2004, he and his wife were pulled separately from their offices. A supervisor read them a faxed statement from the Atlanta headquarters of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the parent agency of NIOSH.

The letter said they were fired because they failed to "satisfactorily pass a required background investigation."

They were escorted out of the building. Guards followed them as they gathered their personal belongings and went to their car.

"It's like being hit in the head with a big stone," Shahla Afshari said. "For a couple of days, I was not sure what I was thinking. I was numb, angry. I could not stop crying."

Their co-workers were stunned, too. In the days after the incident, two dozen of them wrote letters backing the couple.

But not everyone was supportive. Azadeh Afshari was forwarded an instant message from a fellow student who she thought was a friend. The message said that the Afsharis must have been guilty of something or they wouldn't have been fired.

Azadeh Afshari says she can't blame her friend entirely. Before this happened to her family, she might have believed the same thing.

"I never thought this could happen. I thought that if something like this happened, the government would have to be sure," she said.

Ali Afshari could not find work when he told prospective employers he had been fired for security reasons. The only offer he received was from an oil company in a violence-torn part of Nigeria. His family begged him not to go, so he didn't.

They quickly burned through their savings. Shahla Afshari began going to dental school, in part to occupy herself, and in part because the student loans helped pay the bills.

Azadeh Afshari was going to dental school also, but had to repeat her first year because of the stress of her job and the uncertainty surrounding her parents.

Ali Afshari also worried about his family's safety. What if some vigilante decided to strike out at them?

So, unbeknownst to his family, the engineer rigged up a security system that would alert him if someone came onto their property.

'The beauty of America'

They also worried about being arrested or deported.

It was that fear that led them to Karlin, not any desire for money, Ali Afshari said. Karlin has been joined by others: Sophia Zdatny from Karlin's law firm, WVU law professor Bob Bastress and a lawyer from the American Civil Liberties Union.

Their federal lawsuit pried information from the federal government about the Afsharis' dismissal. The details are still murky, but Karlin said he believes a series of innocent connections may have led an overzealous federal official to overreact:

The Afsharis took their children to an Iranian cultural program in Washington. Ali Afshari went to visit an Iranian student in detention who had overstayed his visa after dropping out of West Virginia University. He says he was just trying to help. The FBI had opened a case on Ali Afshari in the 1990s, not because he did anything himself but because he was mentioned in a conversation with another FBI source who was Iranian.

The FBI had closed its file on Ali Afshari before officials at the CDC and NIOSH decided to fire the couple, according to a deposition by FBI agent Gary Stoops and a redacted copy of Ali Afshari's FBI file obtained by their lawyers.

Many of the government officials involved in the Afsharis' case never saw the supposed evidence against them. One man who did and who recommended their termination was William Porter, director of the Office of Security and Emergency Preparedness at the CDC in Atlanta.

His wife is Diane Porter, who was deputy director for management at NIOSH. At first, Diane Porter said she was very involved in the decision to fire the Afsharis. In a sworn statement, she said she recommended to NIOSH Director John Howard that they be terminated.

Howard himself did not have the security clearance to see the information being used to justify their firing, so he testified that he relied on Diane Porter's advice.

But in a later sworn statement to the court, Diane Porter took back much of her previous testimony. She said that she couldn't remember whether she had that conversation with Howard.

When asked for an explanation, CDC spokesman Tom Skinner declined to answer questions about the case and referred a reporter to the lawsuit.

The Afsharis and their lawyers don't want to dwell on how the couple was fired. They want them to be reinstated to their old jobs so they can regain their reputation.

Ali Afshari may continue his work at NIOSH, although Shahla plans to complete dental school.

In the meantime, Ali, Shahla, Azadeh and Hamed are applying for U.S. citizenship. After 20 years in the country, they are finally eligible to take that last step.

Azadeh Afshari said this experience has been a test of the best ideals of America. If her family can receive justice, then she will believe ideals such as due process and freedom of religion are more than just words on a piece of paper.

Ali Afshari remains hopeful about the future of his adopted country. He said his family's ordeal has led him to appreciate the true strength of America.

"The beauty of this country is not its land. The beauty of this country is not its wealth," he said. "The beauty of America is our Constitution and the laws we have."

END

Narco News
December 11, 2006

Did DEA Administrator Tandy duck day in court over House of Death?

Karen Tandy, the administrator of the DEA, was a no-show in federal court earlier this week in Miami where she had been slated to testify in the employment discrimination trial of DEA whistleblower Sandalio Gonzalez.

Tandy had earlier provided a deposition in Gonzalez' lawsuit, but also was scheduled to testify at the trial itself, which got underway on Monday, Dec. 4. But at the last minute, she decided not to show up to testify.

Gonzalez, former special agent in charge of DEA's El Paso field division, in February 2004 wrote a heartfelt letter to his counterpart at U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) in El Paso. In that letter, Gonzalez expressed his outrage at the role ICE and a U.S. prosecutor in El Paso had played in enabling a government informant to participate in multiple murders at the House of Death in Ciudad Juarez.

Gonzalez claimed in his pleadings in his legal case that DEA had retaliated against him for a variety of reasons, including his participation in activities exposing DEA's discrimination against Hispanics within its ranks, for his letter exposing the House of Death cover-up and for an earlier act of whistleblowing on his part in which he raised too many questions about a missing 10 kilos of cocaine.

All of those areas would have been fair game in Tandy's scheduled appearance at the Miami trial that concluded earlier this week, except, importantly, for the House of Death, since the judge had earlier ordered that all matters related to the Juarez murders could not be introduced at the trial.

But did Tandy know something that the judge and Gonzalez's attorneys did not know? Was it possible that Tandy had reason to fear that if she took the stand, under oath, that she might be forced to disclose the “whole truth and nothing but the truth” about the House of Death mass murder?

Missing coke

Gonzalez’ problems at DEA date back to the late 1990s, when he demanded that agency officials tell the truth about the Bover case.

Following a November 1998 search of a suburban Miami house, a joint DEA/Miami-Dade Police team came up short on a stash of cocaine. Prior surveillance of the house indicated there should have been about 32 kilograms of cocaine on the premises, but the total amount accounted for after the search fell 10 kilos short of that mark.

Enrique Bover and his wife, Gisel, who each had prior drug convictions, were the targets of the raid. After their arrest, the Bovers agreed to become confidential informants in a play for leniency in their case. Their cooperation did lead to several arrests.

The Bovers assert that they informed DEA agents about the missing cocaine immediately after their arrest and that the information was ignored. Months later, the Bovers found themselves being accused of taking the 10 kilos of coke.

However, Gonzalez, who was then associate special agent in charge of DEA’s Miami field office, suspected a set-up. He says the same Miami-Dade Police team involved in the Bover raid was responsible for “compromising three prior drug cases.”

“I took a stand on the missing 10 kilos of cocaine, and insisted that that they (DEA) do an investigation,” Gonzalez told Narco News in an earlier interview about the case. “And that was it.

“…The missing cocaine is definitely the catalyst of my problems,” he added. “The cover-up [since then] has been amazing. They [Gonzalez’ superiors] look at you blank-face and then look the other way.”

In the wake of that incident, Gonzalez was transferred in 2001 to a less-prestigious post in the much smaller DEA outpost in El Paso. After that, until he retired in 2005, DEA refused all his requests for transfer or promotions, which Gonzalez claimed in his litigation was retaliation for his acts of exposing the alleged wrongdoing in the Bover and House of Death cases.

Tandy came into the picture in July 2003, when she was confirmed as the administrator of DEA. At that point, Gonzalez had been on the job in El Paso for 27 months, and again let it be known through the chain of command that he was interested in being transferred to a new post within DEA.

END

PORTLAND, ME, PRESS HERALD

December 11, 2006

Editorial: Court ruling on paper money not best way to help blind; Policy makers - not a federal judge - should decide whether paper currency should change.

It might be good public policy for the U.S. government to come up with a way to help people who are blind be able to tell a $20 bill from a dollar bill. It's just that a recent court decision mandating that Treasury Department do that is not the best way to go about it.

A U.S . District Court judge ordered the government to make changes in the nation's paper money - alterations in its size or texture, for example - so that the visually impaired can tell various bills apart.

The judge said the paper bills violate the federal Rehabilitation Act, which prohibits discrimination based on disability in government programs. However, the judge's ruling goes beyond the "reasonable accommodation" standard in these types of laws.

It would be better to have Congress or the government explore authorizing changes in paper money as a matter of public policy.

The judge made some good points. "Of the more than 180 countries that issue paper currency, only the United States prints bills that are identical in size and color in all their denominations," he wrote. He said more than 100 countries vary the size of their bills, and "every other issuer includes at least some features that help the visually impaired."

Blind people testified that electronic aids to distinguish bills are slow, costly and unreliable. Instead, they must resort to folding their money in complex ways to differentiate bills and trust that they are being handed the right change.

The government argued that changing the size or texture of bills could make counterfeiting easier. Perhaps other methods could be used, such as adding a raised number to bills.

Such a change would add less than 5 percent to the cost of printing bills over the last decade, the judge said. It could be a wise public investment as baby boomers age and increasingly face vision problems.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 12, 2006 8:05 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, December 12, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061212.pdf; agnb061212.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Muslim Charity Sues Treasury Seeking Dismissal Of Terrorism Charges 4

LATimes Sees Little Likelihood Of Congressional Oversight Of NSA....4

Patriot Act:

Bank's Closure Of Charity's Account Draws Fire....4

Homeland Response:

New York Man Charged With Bomb Hoax To Protest US "Illegal Surveillance." 5

FBI Investigating Possible Link Between 2003 Ricin Letter, Recent Hoaxes....5

DPW To Sell US Port Operations 5

BioShield Revamp Legislation Ready For Bush's Signature 6

New Orleans Courts Reviewing Cases Lost In Wake Of Katrina 6

War News:

Bush Meets With State Officials, Says "Success" In Iraq Crucial To US Security 6

Rumsfeld Defends White House Conduct Of War On Terror 10

Democrats To Circulate "Phase Two" Portion Of Report On Prewar Intelligence 10

Annan Takes "Parting Shot" At Bush, US Policies....10

Iraqi Politicians Seek Coalition To Counter Sadr Influence ...11

Pentagon Task Force Looks To Create Jobs In Iraq....11

2 Bombs Kill 57 In Baghdad....12

Marines Contend With Fallujah's Challenges....12

Taliban Regroups In Pakistan....12

UK Officials To Stop Using Phrase "War On Terror." 12

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ To Announce Changes To Corporate Probe Policy....13

No End In Sight For Federal Stock Option Probes....13

5th Circuit Delays Skilling's Prison Check-In Pending Bail Ruling 14

Federal Prosecutors Lay Out Case Against Conrad Black 14

SEC Sanctions Two Over PNC Accounting Problems 15

Criminal Law:

Judge Resolves Dispute Over Classified Information For Libby....15

FBI Affidavit Unsealed In Prince George's Bribery Probe 15

New York Federal Prosecutors Suffer Through Losing Streak16

Judge Seeks Answers On Internal DOJ Probe Of Mafia Case Prosecutor....16

Probe Of Amtrak Legal Procedures Gathers Steam 17

Raids In Five Cities Nab 19 Bosnian Serbs Charged With War Crimes....17

Sheehan Convicted Of Trespassing At UN 17

In 9-0 Decision, Supreme Court Reinstates Murder Conviction 17

Oregon Doctor Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Botox Scam....18

Oregon Lawyer Sentenced To Year In Prison For Loan Fraud....18

Three Convicted Of Defrauding Microsoft In Discount Software Scam....19

Results Are Mixed On Banks' Efforts To Identity Theft Victims19

Small Stores Account For Most Food Stamp Fraud 20

NYTimes Says Drug Companies Must Increase Efforts To Combat Fraud....20

Civil Law:

DC Circuit Hears Appeal Of DOD Labor Relations Rules....21

Massachusetts DA Testifies At Wrongful Prosecution Civil Trial....21

Civil Rights:

Report Offers Details Of New York City Police Shooting 22

Federal Judge Gives California Six Months To Fix Prison Overcrowding....23

Louisiana School Board Sues To Cancel September Election 23
Christian Group Says DOD Gave Permission For Officers' Video 23

Antitrust:

DOJ Takes Municipal Bond Probe To Grand Jury 24
Critics Urge Close DOJ Review Of Monsanto Deal 24
Delta Board Mulls US Air Offer 24
LG Philips Shares Suffer On News Of DOJ Probe Of LCD Industry 25
Microsoft Lays Out Defense In Iowa Antitrust Trial 25

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Justices Rule Against BP In Royalties Case 25
California Oil Company Charged With Pollution 26
Opponents Say Offshore Drilling Legislation Gives Too Much To Gulf States 26
Proposals For Carbon Dioxide Limits Gather Momentum 27
Fuel Economy Ratings To Drop Under New EPA Testing Procedures 27
LATimes Says Administration Politicizing Science At EPA 27
FWS Pulls Bison Range Management Agreement With Tribes 28
US Joins Chippewa Tribe In Land Suit Against Michigan 28

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alleged Mexican Drug Cartel Leader May Face Federal Death Penalty 28
Nine Plead Guilty To Roles In Drug-Trafficking Organization 29
Personal Trainer In Maryland Accused Of Importing Illicit Muscle Enhancers 29
DEA Agent Says Mexican Drug Cartels Bringing More Potent Meth Into Tennessee 29
Mexico's New President Takes Action Against Drug Gangs . 29
ATF Cannot Trace Gun In Fatal New York Shooting 30
Former Mayor Of Missouri Town Faces Federal Arson Charge 30
Marshals Nab Fugitive At Philadelphia Library Computer 30
Arlington, VA, Awarded DOJ Grant To Fight Gang Activity 31

Tax:

Former Ohio Major Charged With Tax, Mail Fraud 31
DOJ Seeks To Ban California Accountant's Tax Scheme 31
IRS Paid At Least $200 Million In Bogus Refunds Due To Computer Failure 31
Federal Judges Get Tax Break On Stocks Sold Because Of Conflicts 32

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Plan Streamlined Omnibus Spending Bill 32
House Democrats To Push For Government-Negotiated Drug Prices 33
Congress Links Doctors' Medicare Pay, Performance 33
Congress Raises Income Limit On DC Voucher Program 33
Pelosi Pledges Additional Protection For House Pages 33
Ethics Scandals Erode Regard For Members Of Congress .. 33
House Panel Says McDermott Violated Ethics Standards 34
California Republican Said To Mix Public Actions, Private Business 34
Mollahan Under Investigation For Real Estate Deal 34
House Democratic Leaders May Assign Jefferson To Lesser Committee 35
Portman Will Be Key White House Link To Congressional Democrats 35
Reid Seen As Tenacious Opponent For Bush, GOP 35
Supreme Court Library Closed For Renovations 36
State Department Seeks To Overhaul Foreign Service Exam 36
New SNL Cast Member Portrays Bush 36
NYTimes Says Congress Should Give FDA More Funding For Produce Inspection 37

Other News:

Fed Expected To Keep Rates Steady 37
Plagiarism Case Against Novelist Examined 38
Recount Confirms Pryce Victory In OH15 38
Obama's New Hampshire Visit Continues To Make Waves .. 38
Clinton Plans Announcement After New Year 40
Kucinich To Announce Bid For White House In Cleveland Tuesday 40
Vilsack Says Democrats Need To Reach Out To Pro-Life Community 41
Kennedy Says He Won't Wait "Indefinitely" For Kerry Decision On Presidential Bid 41
Gingrich Decision On 2008 To Come In September 41
Romney Hired Elizabeth Smart For Fundraiser 41
Lesser-Known Conservatives See Chance To Make Splash In '08 GOP Race 42
Daley Launches Campaign For Sixth Term As Chicago Mayor 42
DeLay Launches New Venture As Blogger 42
New York Congregation To Demolish Church, Build Senior Apartments 43
Both Clintons To Attend Book Parities For McAuliffe 43
Rice Seeks Denuclearized North Korea Within 24 Months 43
Rice, Gates To Participate In Security Talks With Japan 43

DOJ_NMG_0105379

Rice Says Washington Backs New European Resolution On Iran Sanctions 43
Iran Hosts Conference On Holocaust 44
Rice Warns Syria, Iran Over Lebanon 45
Olmert Appears To Confirm Israel Has Nuclear Arsenal 45
Killing Of Three Palestinian Children Could Spark Civil War 46
Saudi Ambassador Abruptly Resigns, Leaves Washington 46
Somali Islamic Militiamen Advancing On Ethiopian Border 46
Congressional Study Finds Continuing Delays In Delivering Darfur Aid 47
US, UK Move Toward Resolving Fighter Jet Dispute 47
UK Nuclear Plans Highlight "Urgent Need" To Reform Global Framework 47
Western Companies Embrace Turkey 47
US Report Delivers "Rebuke" To China Ahead Of Officials' Visit 47
Administration Seeks To Revive Momentum For Doha Trade Deal 48
Probe Of Litvinenko Poisoning Leads To Hamburg 49
Role Of FSB Expanding Under Putin 49
Pinochet's Death Reopens Chilean Wounds 50
NSA Denies Monitoring Princess Diana's Calls 51
Kristof Urges Bush To Make Issue Of Child Slavery 51

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 51

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 52

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0105380

TERRORISM NEWS:

Muslim Charity Sues Treasury Seeking Dismissal Of Terrorism Charges. The New York Times (12/12, MacFarquhar) reports from San Francisco, "In a new challenge to Washington over its closing several American Muslim charities that it has accused of aiding terrorism, the largest such group sued on Monday seeking dismissal of many of the charges." The Times continues, "Lawyers for the group, the Holy Land Foundation of Richardson, Tex., filed suit in Federal District Court in Dallas two weeks after a federal judge in California called into question a crucial provision in designating terrorist supporters. Since December 2001, the Treasury Department has designated Holy Land and five other Muslim charities in the United States as terrorist supporters, seizing millions of dollars in assets and halting their activities. … No accused charity or any senior officer have been convicted on a charge of terrorism. Some charities have faced no criminal charges." The Times adds, "In a separate case against a Georgia man whom the prosecution identified as a fund-raiser for Holy Land, the defendant pleaded guilty this year to sending money to Hamas, the Islamist Palestinian political party that Washington first designated as a terrorist organization in 1995. … The foundation denies that the man had an official post." The Times notes, "The government has accused the foundation of having been the American fund-raising arm of Hamas. The charity and five officers are expected to go on trial in July on charges of financing a foreign terrorist organization, money laundering and tax fraud. … A spokesman for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra, said he could not comment on the Holy Land motion because it was too new. As a matter of procedure, Mr. Sierra said, prosecution does not automatically follow the designation of a charity as a terrorist organization. … 'Not every case is a criminal case,' he said. 'It's a question of can you come up with enough evidence to prosecute based on a violation of the statutes of material support for terrorism.'"

LATimes Sees Little Likelihood Of Congressional Oversight Of NSA. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K) editorializes, "Almost a year after President Bush confirmed that the National Security Agency had been eavesdropping on some Americans without a court order, expressions of outrage in Congress have yet to be translated into law. What little scrutiny the so-called Terrorist Surveillance Program has received has come from the Justice Department, whose inspector general is looking into how information gathered by the program has been used. Surely, you say, Congress will be more assertive under Democratic control. Don't count on it." The Times adds, "Democratic victories in midterm elections should mean that Congress will be more interested in regulating the NSA program. But inertia is a strong force. Moreover, many Democrats -- especially newcomers from Republican-leaning states -- will be reluctant to counter the administration's propagandistic argument that only Americans who regularly call Al Qaeda need to worry about the program."

PATRIOT ACT:

Bank's Closure Of Charity's Account Draws Fire. The Detroit Free Press (12/12, Warikoo) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice may defend the Patriot Act in a case involving Comerica Bank and a Muslim charity based in Southfield, according to court documents the department filed in Detroit." The Free Press continues, "Comerica officials have told Life for Relief and Development that it intends to close its accounts. … The bank's move came after the charity was raided by federal agents in September. The government has not said what the raid was about, but charity officials say it may be related to work the charity did in Iraq." The Free Press adds, "In response, the charity sued Comerica, saying the bank violated its civil rights. … The suit, filed last month, challenges the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act that allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity." The Free Press notes, "On Dec. 1, Justice Department attorneys filed a notice in U.S. District Court in Detroit that said it may 'intervene in this action to defend the constitutionality' of the section under question. … Some Arab Americans and Muslims charge the bank is discriminating against the charity because it is operated by Arab-American Muslims."

DOJ_NMG_0105381

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Man Charged With Bomb Hoax To Protest US "Illegal Surveillance." The AP (12/12) reports Paul Cortina of Somers, N.Y., "was charged Monday with carrying out a bomb hoax to protest what he called the government's 'illegal surveillance,' federal prosecutors said. … He was arrested Nov. 29 after FBI agents seized what appeared to be a bomb from his home, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said. … The device, however, contained no explosive material." The AP notes, "In the e-mail to the AP, Cortina identified himself by name and gave his telephone number. The AP notified the FBI, and an agent called the number and visited Cortina at his home. He admitted sending the e-mail, the FBI said."

FBI Investigating Possible Link Between 2003 Ricin Letter, Recent Hoaxes. McClatchy (12/12, Douglas) reports, "Federal investigators are looking into a possible link between recent hoax letters, each containing a white powder and believed to have been sent by a Texas prison inmate, to determine whether they are related to a small shipment of the poison ricin to a mailing center in South Carolina in 2003. Someone calling himself the Fallen Angel signed at least one of the six recent letters…and the ricin letter…an FBI alert said. The high priority alert, dated late last month, said the U.S. Clerk's Office in Buffalo on Nov. 20 received one of the letters, which was signed 'Fallen Angel' and contained a nontoxic powder." McClatchy notes, "The earlier letter, the alert said, made reference to the Department of Transportation and was signed, 'Fallen Angel.' Lori Bailey, spokeswoman for the FBI in Dallas, declined to comment."

DPW To Sell US Port Operations. The AP (12/12, Barrett) reports, "Dubai Ports World, the company whose planned takeover of major US port operations ignited a political firestorm earlier this year, has agreed to sell those operations to AIG Global Investment Group." BP "announced the deal Monday. The US operations at six major U.S. seaports in New York/New Jersey, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Miami, Tampa and New Orleans were valued at approximately $700 million, but DP World did not disclose the sales price." The deal also "involves stevedoring operations in 16 locations along the eastern seaboard and Gulf Coast and a passenger terminal in New York City." The AP adds, "One of the loudest critics of the original deal said he was pleased and expected the deal to clear the few regulatory hurdles that remain. 'This is an appropriate final chapter to the book on the Dubai Ports World deal,' said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. 'This is very likely to receive broad support in Washington and throughout America.'" The Wall Street Journal (12/12, King, Hitt, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Panel Reviews Foreign Business Deals With Eye Toward Security. The AP (12/12, Bridis) reports, "In the same year that public furor derailed a Dubai-owned company's plans to buy and run operations at major American ports, the number of foreign business deals reviewed by the Bush administration for U.S. security risks surged to nearly 100, up from 65 reviews last year." The AP continues, "A few anxious companies in deals pending with foreigners have sought the Bush administration's approval even for sales that do not raise obvious security questions, said lawyers and federal officials involved in these cases. … They attributed the jump largely to a busy year for international mergers and broader awareness of such reviews after the political uproar that scuttled the Dubai ports deal. The government's reviews included the $11.6 billion sale of Lucent Technologies Inc. to Alcatel SA of France; Toshiba Corp.'s $5.4 billion purchase of nuclear power-plant manufacturer Westinghouse Electric Co.; and smaller deals involving seismic surveys, a gas utility, military parts, voting machines and even anti-hacker software. … 'The numbers are up. A company will file even though they don't think it's a national security concern,' said Clay Lowery, an assistant secretary at the Treasury Department." The AP adds, "Most of the reviews this year, however, raised legitimate concerns, said Christopher Padilla, an assistant secretary at the Commerce Department. 'Of the increases we've seen, only one or two cases didn't have national security issues that needed to be raised,' he said. 'These transactions are getting the scrutiny that's called for.'" The AP notes, "The secretive panel that conducted nearly 100 reviews also completed seven full-blown investigations this year reflecting broader concerns over proposed deals. That is equal to the combined number over the previous five years. … The 12-member Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States is led by the Treasury Department. It hired a new deputy to oversee reviews; tripled to six the number of people who work on such reviews; and now requires deals to be approved by one of the department's presidential appointees."

DOJ_NMG_0105382

WPost Notes DHS Work With DPW. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/12, A26, 690K) writes about "a depressing outbreak of anti-Arab hysteria in Congress and elsewhere" which "doomed an effort by a company called Dubai Ports World to take over the management of some American ports." The Post adds, " Last week, the Department of Homeland Security announced that it will work with several port authorities abroad to scan cargo before it is loaded onto ships bound for the United States. Among the facilities identified to host this Secure Freight Initiative is Britain's bustling Southampton seaport, operated by, yes, Dubai Ports World. So far, even the loudest objectors in Congress to the earlier deal haven't publicly questioned Homeland Security's choice to inaugurate a major security initiative in a facility operated by the once-controversial United Arab Emirates-based firm. That's encouraging as well as telling. … A successful partnership would…demonstrate that Americans have little to fear from Dubai Ports World and firms like it -- and that they shouldn't single out Arab-owned companies for suspicion without good reason."

BioShield Revamp Legislation Ready For Bush's Signature. The Washington Post (12/12, A15, Merle, 690K) reports the House and Senate have passed legislation to revamp "the two-year-old Project BioShield, which has been marked by delays and operational problems." Sen. Richard Burr, one of the bill's "principal backers," said he thinks it has "already made a difference. We have more people, more companies, more academic institutions, that have looked at this legislation and planned how they can plug into it." The Post added that the legislation, which President Bush intends to sign, "allocates $1 billion over three years for research not funded by a Project BioShield contract or the National Institutes of Health and attempts to pump more government money into the private sector sooner."

New Orleans Courts Reviewing Cases Lost In Wake Of Katrina. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Simmons, 850K) reports New Orleans' indigent defense system, long "plagued by negligent attorneys who provide haphazard and deficient representation," spun "into chaos" in the months following Hurricane Katrina: "Funding plummeted; 15 lawyers quit the already thin legal staff; documents and evidence were lost or destroyed." Pamela R. Metzger, director of Tulane University's Criminal Law Clinic, "has helped to form the Katrina-Gideon Interview Project, a national coalition of law students and law professors" who "are reviewing about 1,800 pre- and post-Katrina cases. They include people who have been imprisoned well beyond any sentence they might receive for such charges as probation violation, failure to pay a fine or prostitution."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With State Officials, Says "Success" In Iraq Crucial To US Security. The AP (12/12, Ben Feller) notes that President Bush yesterday met with Secretary Rice "and her senior advisers on Iraq, and with diplomats who serve as leaders of US joint civilian-military units called provincial reconstruction teams." Ambassador Khalilzad also participated by videoconference. Afterwards, Assistant Secretary McCormack said the meeting was "a good give and take," noting that "the president had questions throughout the entire set of briefings."

The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Gerstenzang, 850K) says the President, launching his " highly visible round of consultations…reiterated Monday that 'success' there was crucial to the long-term protection of the United States and said Iraq's regional neighbors have a responsibility to help the country's fledgling government." The Times adds, "In the aftermath of last week's sharply critical report by the Iraq Study Group, the White House is eager to draw the spotlight to other ideas and options more in keeping with Bush's goals." Fox News' Special Report (Baier) noted the President said "success…is an Iraq that can sustain, defend and govern itself and is an ally in the war on terror." But CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Dobbs) said Bush "did not use the word victory, a word he has used frequently in the past. The President's consultations come amid signs the Iraqi government is rapidly losing support among its own supporters."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Rirchits) later reported that in remarks yesterday, the President called Iraq "a central component, instead of what he has said over and over, the central front in the war on terror. A White House spokesman Tony Snow quickly insisted it was not a change, raising questions about whether the President has a dramatic new approach or are these internal reviews by the State and Defense departments really just an attempt to give him political cover, to ignore the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group?" The White House, added CNN, "did not sound ready for big change." Likewise, NBC Nightly

DOJ_NMG_0105383

News (12/11, lead story, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported the White House's "message" yesterday "seemed to be, 'Don't expect much of a change.'" NBC (Gregory) added, "And yet all this raises expectations for a major change in policy toward Iraq. At the same time it is becoming clear that the White House is not about to embrace the Baker-Hamilton study recommendations." A similar piece in today's Newsday (12/12, Gordon) reports that Bush's "early comments suggest he is in no mood for the sweeping changes sought by the study group."

All three networks led with Bush's meetings – which were presented as a White House PR effort to help him regain his footing on the Iraq issue after the release of the Iraq Study Group's report. The CBS Evening News (12/11, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Today's trip to the State Department was a highly public visit designed to show the President's at least listening to other opinions about a new course." Bush was shown saying, "Like most Americans, this Administration wants to succeed in Iraq."

ABC World News (12/11, lead story, 2:40, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "the President has spent the last year talking over and over again about his strategy for victory in Iraq. But this week, he says, he's listening." Yesterday afternoon, after his meetings at State, "a panel of five scholars and retired generals briefed the President for more than an hour. … What the people in the room were known for is their withering criticism of the Baker/Hamilton report released last week." Michael Green, former National Security Council aide, told ABC News, "By meeting with them, it's a clear demonstration from the White House, that the Iraq study group is part of this conversation. But not the answer in itself."

NBC Nightly News (12/11, lead story, 2:55, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The President's optimistic talk of success and democracy in Iraq appeared to be an attempt to rebut the Baker-Hamilton report's grim conclusions that the situation is 'grave and deteriorating.' Mr. Bush may be emboldened by a new round of attacks on the Iraq study group by conservative supporters of the war." David Frum, conservative activist: "I think the report throughout has a complete failure of imagination about what an American failure in Iraq would look like." Conservative "hawks lampooned Baker and Hamilton as 'surrender monkeys' in the 'New York Post.' Others have dismissed the call for a new diplomatic offensive and pushed for more, not fewer troops in Iraq to salvage victory." At the White House, the President also "consulted some military and foreign affairs experts who have been critical of the report."

Under the headline "Experts Advise Bush Not To Reduce Troops," the Washington Post (12/12, A1, Fletcher, Ricks, 690K) reports Bush heard "a blunt and dismal assessment of his handling of Iraq from a group of military experts yesterday, but the advisers shared the White House's skeptical view of the recommendations made last week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, sources said." The three retired generals and two academics "disagreed in particular with the study group's plans to reduce the number of US combat troops in Iraq and to reach out for help to Iran and Syria, according to sources familiar with the meeting."

NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 2, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed retired US Army Generals and NBC News military analysts Barry McCaffrey and Wayne Downing." Asked, "What did the President ask of you," McCaffrey said, "I think each one of these people were asked to give their own view point. They were widely divergent. Clearly the big issues are -- should we reinforce with more US combat units? I think my answer clearly is no. I argued for economic reconstruction aid, $10 billion a year for clearly downplaying the direct US combat role. Get US troops out of the city in the coming two years and the second issue was, how about embedded trainers? Do we actually want 20,000 US Sergeants and captains at company level in Iraqi army police? I argued no. You want less people who speak Arabic who are Special Forces who come from elite active duty units. This isn't numbers, it's quality." Williams: "And General Downing, same question. Were these mostly points that have been brought to the public debate as a result of the Iraq Study Group?" General Wayne Downing: "I think they were. They were widely divergent. I made the point of no more US forces but I also believed that the key to this thing is going to be the Iraqi security forces. My comment to the President was, we've got to look at this long war on terrorism, this ideological struggle we're in, with Al Qaeda, radical Islam through the prism of Iraq. We can't just look at Iraq and Afghanistan. We've got to look beyond that. And the last point I made was the perception of the American people."

The Wall Street Journal (12/12, Pulizzi, 2.04M) reports Bush also said yesterday, "We believe that most of the countries understand that a mainstream society, a society that is a functioning democracy, is in their interests. … And it's up to us to help focus their attention and focus their efforts on helping the Iraqis succeed." The President "didn't name any countries, however, one of the Iraq Study Group's main proposals was for enhanced regional engagement, including with Syria and Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0105384

The New York Times (12/12, A14, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports that Monday's meeting with Rice was part of Bush's "listening tour" and mentions that Vice President Cheney also attended the meeting. After the meeting, Bush "said they had discussed the roles Iraq's neighbors could play in stabilizing Iraq. … But Mr. Bush continued to make it clear he did not believe Syria or Iran would play such roles."

USA Today (12/12, Jackson, 2.27M) notes "scheduled today: an Oval Office meeting with Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni vice president in Iraq's coalition government." Tomorrow, Bush "will go to the Pentagon to meet with military officials about the increasingly unpopular war, which helped cost Republicans control of Congress in the elections in November." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Bush hopes to outline his Iraq plans before Christmas, but 'it's not locked down.'" Added Snow, "It's something we would like to see, but I'm not going to promise it,."

Polls Show Record Disapproval Of Bush On Iraq. The CBS Evening News (12/11, lead story, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In a CBS News poll out tonight, a record 71% said the war is going badly. More than half say it's unlikely the United States will win. And a record number say the war is the most pressing problem America is facing right now." CBS (Axelrod) added "an all-time high of 75% now disapprove of the President's handling of Iraq and despite this and despite last week's high-profile push from the Baker-Hamilton commission, the President still is not ready to announce a policy shift on Iraq." CBS also reported that "by a margin of almost to one, those polled say they trust Democrats in Congress more than the President to make the right decisions in Iraq."

On the CBS Evening News (12/11, story 2, 2:35, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said, "if you were George Bush, I have to say it just does not get any worse than this and the more you get into this poll, the more you understand just how deeply this opposition to the war is now running. Only 21% now approve of the President's handling of the war, but look at why: Because he is now losing his own base, Republicans and conservatives. Just last month, even after the election that cost them control of Congress, 70% of Republicans still approved the President's handling of the war. Now that has dropped 23 points in a month. This is opposition that is taking on historic proportions."

USA Today (12/12, Page, 2.27M) reports on a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday. By 76%-22%, "those surveyed say Iraq is in a civil war. The White House disputes that characterization, calling the conflict part of a global battle against terrorism. … While 55% of Americans want most U.S. troops withdrawn within a year, only 18% think that will happen. More than 4 in 10 predict American troops will be deployed in Iraq for more than two years, though just 14% endorse that idea." USA Today adds, "In a question asked of a half-sample, a record high 62% of Americans say the war in Iraq isn't 'worth it,' and a record low 16% say the United States is winning. That's less than half the 40% who held that view a year ago. Now, nearly two-thirds say neither side is winning. … Looking ahead, 35% predict the United States eventually will win the war, also a new low. … On the long-term consequences of the war in Iraq: 38%, of those surveyed predict people in Iraq will be better off because of the war; 35% say they will be worse off." In an analysis piece, USA Today (12/12, Page, Risser, 2.27M) says "most Americans are convinced of two things: It's important that the United States succeed in Iraq. Eight in 10 of those surveyed in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll over the weekend agree with President Bush about that. Important, perhaps, but not worth the price. By nearly 2-1, they also say the costs of succeeding in Iraq outweigh the benefits."

Rumsfeld Questions Diplomacy With Iran. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (12/11, Hannity), Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he hadn't read the Iraq Study Group report in detail, but on the subject of diplomacy with Iran, he said, "They have been contributing to the violence in Iraq. They have been unhelpful.. They have agents operating and they're using funding in this country to not allow it to be successful. We are one to decide they want to talk to somebody -- they must first understand, why is it that we would want to talk to them? Is there some reason that they would want to have commonality of interest?"

DeLay Derides "Iraq Surrender Group." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/11, Barnicle), former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay opined that the Iraq Study Group should be called the "Iraq Surrender Group" and panned the Iraq Study Group's world view, saying, "[I]t's the same world view that had the attitude that the enemy of my enemy is my friend, and back when they were negotiating with Saddam Hussein against Iran, empowered him. He invaded Kuwait, we had to go to war. We didn't finish that war because of diplomatic issues, the same group that went and negotiated with Syria, empowered Assad to go into Lebanon and killed thousands of people in Lebanon, the same group that considered Arafat their partner in peace. I mean, sometime you have to understand that the enemy of my enemy just might be my enemy."

DOJ_NMG_0105385

Republicans Criticize Bush Iraq Strategy. Fox News' Special Report (12/11, Hume) noted recent comments by Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith (R), who said he was "at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets, in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day, that is obscured," and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R), who said, "[T]he country has been pretty patient on Iraq, but now it's time to move things forward." NPR contributor Mara Liasson said, "I think it's possible this could be the beginning of something more if the president's Iraq policy, whatever it turns into after his speech, before Christmas, doesn't begin to show results. I think that's the impatience and frustration that Gordon Smith and Sam Brownback are voicing, not that they're ready to get out in four to six months, as some Democrats say, but just that that they feel that this either has to show results, look like it's succeeding or else they're through." Fred Barnes, Weekly Standard: "Brownback said he wasn't bailing out on Bush, but that's exactly what he was doing, bailing out, completely. You know, so there are just a lot of Republicans who don't want to defend this war anymore. On the other hand the same hand there are -- actually on the same hand, there area Republicans who are deeply resentful of Bush for harming them, they blame Bush because of the war, and that's why they lost these seats."

More Commentary. GOP consultant Mike Murphy writes in the Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K), "Bush should spend less time worrying about the tangled politics of Iraq and more time mastering the equally fractured politics of Washington. The war in Iraq has become partisan -- and partisan wars are impossible to fight successfully." The "chief result of last week's report from" the ISG report "has been to corner an already weakened president by proposing a general strategy of retreat and withdrawal." Bush "likes to move boldly and preemptively. He would be well advised to do so right now by adopting a strategy that he would find immensely painful but that is the best option he has. He should trump the Baker commission by extending its bipartisan spirit to make the Democrats an offer no patriot can refuse: He should establish a bipartisan war council made up of his national security team and the Democratic leaders of the key national security committees in Congress. Under the president's leadership, this council would conduct the Iraq war, becoming the key coordinating vehicle for Iraqi policy. The president would not cede his authority as commander in chief, but he would work with this group -- which would include such leaders as Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Reps. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) and Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) -- to develop a consensus policy for Iraq." The Times adds, "The president could, in one statesmanlike gesture, end the paralysis in Washington, force Democratic maturity, reestablish his leadership and show our enemies American unity and resolve at a critical time for our nation. The public would reward it, and the national interest demands it."

Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, 2.04M), "What matters more than the fate of the ISG report…are the political symptoms it betrays. The report is surely right that there is 'no magic formula to solve the problems of Iraq.' Yet if the US faces a terror problem today, it is not because it is an obnoxious hyperpower or a rapacious globalizer, but because of the deep suspicion that it is not too ashamed to betray its friends or cut a deal with its enemies -- in short, that it lacks a sense of honor. In this sense, the Iraq Study Group has already inflicted its damage, no matter where it goes from here."

DeWayne Wickham, in USA Today (12/12, 21A, 2.27M), "Refusing to hold direct talks with its most troubling adversaries is a defining principle of Bush's foreign policy. It is one that might make his administration the most impolitic since this country took a commanding position on the world stage -- and the most dangerous. … With two years left in his presidency, Bush still has time to open a meaningful dialogue with the leaders of the nations he has refused to talk to. He still has time to realize that talking directly to his adversaries is a sign of strength -- not weakness."

Eugene Gholz, a professor of public affairs at the University of Texas, and Daryl G. Press and Benjamin Valentino, who teach government at Dartmouth, write in the New York Times (12/12, 1.16M), "The Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the United States withdraw its combat forces from Iraq reflects a growing national consensus that our military cannot quell the violence there and may even be making matters worse. Although many are hailing this recommendation as a bold new course, it is not bold enough. America will best serve its interests in the Persian Gulf by withdrawing its ground-based military forces not only from Iraq, but from the entire region." The Iraq war "is now a painful failure for the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0105386

In the Financial Times (12/12) columnist Edward Luce contends, "As…Bush agonises over [the ISG report], another consensus is emerging in Washington on how to handle the situation: blame the Iraqis. ... Leading Republican and Democratic politicians in the US are increasingly blaming the friable coalition government of Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, for a lack of progress. ... But it is not a view that is widely shared by those with extensive direct experience of Iraq."

Rumsfeld Defends White House Conduct Of War On Terror. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (12/11, Hannity), Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said, "I think that history has to look at this period as a period that is new, where there is no roadmap, no guidebook that said, 'This is how you do this,' and an awful lot of right decisions were made." He added, "There is no way to defend every location against every conceivable technique. It cannot be done. You have no choice but to go after them where they are. You cannot wait to be hit. That concept is central to the present position and it is the right one."

Democrats To Circulate "Phase Two" Portion Of Report On Prewar Intelligence. The Hill (12/12, Schor) reports that West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, who will chair the Senate Intelligence Committee, told The Hill that the "three unreleased sections of the Senate Intelligence Committee's controversial 'Phase Two' report on the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence are headed for circulation next year." The Hill adds, "Democrats have repeatedly protested the lack of progress on the Phase Two investigation, which was split by outgoing Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) to allow some portions to become public before the midterm elections. Democrats pulled the Senate into a rare closed session in November 2005 to revive the inquiry, which began in 2003 with Phase One's look at the intelligence community and was later expanded."

Annan Takes "Parting Shot" At Bush, US Policies. Multiple major outlets are reporting that in a speech at the Truman Center in Independence, Missouri, departing UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan criticized the Bush administration's unilateralism and its policies in Iraq. USA Today (12/12, Slavin, 2.27M) calls the speech "unusual for a UN secretary-general concluding his tenure." The AP (12/12, Stafford) notes that after the speech, the secretary-general "said he was appealing for cooperation and leadership, not criticizing the United States."

ABC World News (12/11, story 3, 0:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The outgoing United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan took a parting shot at President Bush today. In his final speech before stepping down, Annan said the US must not sacrifice its principles in the name of fighting terrorism." Kofi Annan, United Nations Secretary General: "This country has historically been in the vanguard of global human rights movement. When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

The New York Times (12/12, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration had a subdued reaction to the speech. 'We work well with Secretary General Annan on a number of different issues,' said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman. 'There are some issues on which we disagree. That is to be expected.'"

Fox News' Special Report (12/11, Rosin) reported, "Kofi Annan told a crowd at the Truman library the world is in a sorry state and suggested, without naming names, that the Bush Administration is partly to blame. First, Annan noted the US has historically maintained a lead in human rights. … Seconds later, Annan seemed to suggest the invasion of Iraq was unlawful." Fox News added, "Released ahead of time, his remarks were widely seen as an attack on the Bush administration, but fielding questions after his speech, Annan said nothing could be further from the truth."

Meanwhile, commentators appearing on Fox News were critical of Annan's speech. On Fox News' Your World (12/11, Cavuto), syndicated columnist Claudia Rosett said, "The real question here is how much is Kofi Annan going to collect for his future ventures from anti-American well-heeled characters who wanted that speech, who love that speech. And I make of it that it's of a piece with his administration. And the fact that a man whose own performance after a career as a manager at the U.N. was judged substandard, mediocre, in fact desperately lacking even by the U.N.'s own investigation into oil-for- food, makes it really laughable that he is there now lecturing the American people on principles and governance." Also on Fox News Your World (12/11, Cavuto), former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said, "There are many things he could say about member states, a number of whom, frankly, should have their membership suspended, starting with Iran. … But he's not going to say any of those things. And the fascinating problem…is that politeness allows hypocrisy, corruption and, frankly, sometimes evil to parade in front of the world with legitimacy and authority. … I think tragic in the case of Annan who was a failure, but who is treated as though he is a success, because, after all, it would be so impolite to treat him as the failure that he's been."

DOJ_NMG_0105387

USA Today (12/12, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "In a farewell speech on U.S. soil today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan delivered a tough critique of President Bush's policies. He accused the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support." USA Today characterizes the Annan's speech as "among his toughest" and "unusual for a UN secretary-general concluding his tenure." USA Today elucidates, "In the 61-year history of the U.N., no secretary-general has ended his tenure by criticizing U.S. policies so sharply, said Stanley Meisler, a historian of the United Nations and author of a new biography of Annan."

The AP (12/12, Stafford) reports, "In the hometown of President Harry Truman, who helped found the United Nations, Annan said 'human rights and the rule of law are vital to global security and prosperity.' When the U.S. 'appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused,' Annan told a packed audience at the Truman Presidential Museum and Library." The AP notes, "Annan never mentioned President Bush by name in his speech but drew clear contrasts with the Truman administration."

The New York Times (12/12, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "Having infuriated the Bush administration two years ago by labeling the Iraq war 'illegal,' [Annan] said that while observing international law could be "inconvenient," it was essential. In a clear reference to the lack of international support for the American action in Iraq, he said: 'No state can make its own actions legitimate in the eyes of others. When power, especially military force, is used, the world will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose — for broadly shared aims — in accordance with broadly accepted norms.'

In a report that was also syndicated to other McClatchy newspapers, The Kansas City (MO) Star (12/12, Burnes) reports, "In his farewell address on Monday in front of about 200 invited guests and reporters at the Truman Museum in Independence, Annan emphasized the U.N.'s importance, saying that 'more than ever today, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system through which the world's peoples can face global challenges together.'" The Star adds, "The future success of the United Nations depends on America's appropriate use of that power, he said, along with the organization's adherence to five core principles: shared responsibility, global prosperity, rule of law, mutual accountability and multilateralism." In a separate editorial, the Kansas City (MO) Star (12/12) opines, "Annan's address betrayed little recognition that on his watch, the U.N.'s stature sank.. … [I]t was a bit jarring to hear Annan once again focus on U.S. faults"

The Guardian (UK) (12/12, Goldenberg) reports, "After three years of increasingly vocal opposition to the war on Iraq, Mr Annan's speech yesterday amounted to a broad condemnation of the neoconservative ideology guiding America's foreign policy under George Bush - a clear break with protocol for a departing UN chief. … The broadside is merely the latest sign of Mr Annan's anger at the administration since US forces invaded Iraq in March 2003 without the approval of the security council."

Iraqi Politicians Seek Coalition To Counter Sadr Influence. The New York Times (12/12, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "After discussions with the Bush administration, several of Iraq's major political parties," including the "two main Kurdish groups, the most influential Sunni Arab party and an Iranian-backed Shiite party that has long sought to lead the government," are now "in talks to form a coalition whose aim is to break the powerful influence of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr within the government, senior Iraqi officials say." The Times adds, "The Americans, frustrated with Mr. Maliki's political dependence on Mr. Sadr, appear to be working hard to help build the new coalition. President Bush met last week in the White House with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Iranian-backed Shiite party, and is to meet on Tuesday with Tariq al-Hashemi, leader of the Sunni Arab party."

Pentagon Task Force Looks To Create Jobs In Iraq. The Washington Post (12/12, A1, White, Witte, 690K) reports, "Members of a small Pentagon task force have gone to the most dangerous areas of Iraq over the past six months to bring life to nearly 200 state-owned factories abandoned by the Coalition Provisional Authority after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Their goal is to employ tens of thousands of Iraqis in coming months, part of a plan to reduce soaring unemployment and lessen the violence that has crippled progress." The Post adds, "The CPA initially hoped private investors would buy or lease the state factories, but that did not happen as security faltered and much of Iraq became inaccessible. As privatization hopes failed, the factories languished; some were in pristine form and others had been looted when the Pentagon task force examined them this fall."

DOJ_NMG_0105388

2 Bombs Kill 57 In Baghdad. The AP (12/12, Bashir) reports, "Suspected insurgents set off two bombs in a main square of central Baghdad where scores of Iraqis were waiting for jobs as day laborers on Tuesday, killing at least 57 people and wounding 151, police said." The "carefully coordinated" bombing "involved a parked car bomb and a suicide attacker who drove up in a minibus." The bomb site, "Tayaran Square, is located near several government ministries and a bridge that crosses the Tigris River to the heavily fortified Green Zone."

Shiite, Sunni Families Suffer Similar Fates In Violence. The Washington Post (12/12, A20, Trejos, 690K) reports, "Twenty armed men entered the Subhi family home in southern Kirkuk at dawn Monday, killing a 12-year-old boy, his 13-year-old sister and their pregnant mother, police said. The al-Jubori family met a similar fate on Sunday when gunmen opened fire on their minibus in Muqdadiyah, northeast of Baghdad. ... The Subhi family is Shiite. The Jubori family is Sunni. Both families were warned by their neighbors to leave their homes because they were not of the desired sect, according to police. The Jubori family left. The Subhi family did not." After "last month's car bombings in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City and this past weekend's purging of Sunnis from the Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah, members of both sects say they are gripped by fear."

Marines Contend With Fallujah's Challenges. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Peterson, 59K) reports in a bleak article, "The wariness that greeted this [Marine] civil affairs unit two weeks ago points to the difficulty faced by US forces as they search for a balance between rebuilding and bringing security to a city where insurgent attacks are on the rise. ... For two years, strategic rebuilding has been complicated by frequent rotation of Marine units. Today, it is made more difficult by increasing violence and insurgent numbers - Iraqi contractors and workers are frequently killed - and a Marine presence that has shrunk to less than 300. ... the challenge is to spread US money in Fallujah to win goodwill in a way that does not further endanger Iraqis willing to help." Meanwhile, "lavishing funds on cities like Fallujah drew criticism from outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld in a memo dated Nov. 6, two days before his resignation."

Taliban Regroups In Pakistan. Following yesterday's New York Times account of growing Taliban strength in northern Pakistan, the AP (12/12, Pennington) reports, "A peace deal between Pakistan's government and Islamic militants in the northwestern tribal region of North Waziristan has created a virtual Taliban mini-state where mullahs dispense justice and fighters are launching cross-border attacks into neighboring Afghanistan, a think tank reported Monday." The International Crisis Group cited "reports of pro-Taliban militants attacking music, video and CD stores, closing barber shops, imposing taxes and establishing courts to impose summary justice" in North Waziristan. Its "grim assessment came against the backdrop of an alarming surge in violence in southern and eastern Afghanistan this year that has killed close to 4,000 people." The Pakistani government rejected the ICG's "baseless allegations."

US Expresses "Concern" Over Taliban Havens In Waziristan. AFP (12/12) reports, "The United States said it was concerned over safe havens being established by Islamic militants in northern Pakistan's tribal areas bordering Afghanistan. The concerns stemmed from reports [by the New York Times] Monday that Pakistan's peace deals with militants in its tribal areas are helping to fuel Taliban's regrouping." State Department spokesman Eric McCormack said, "Having safe havens and areas where these extremists can operate from is a real concern for us."

UK Officials To Stop Using Phrase "War On Terror." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Dobbs) reported, "The British government tonight is apparently dropping the phrase 'the war on terror.' the British foreign office has reportedly told government officials to stop using the expression because it believes the phrase could anger Muslims. However, many radical Islamists in Britain have no hesitation about their support of terrorism. A top British official yesterday said the security services are monitoring 30 conspiracies and a terrorist attack in Britain over the Christmas holiday is, according to the British government officials, highly likely."

DOJ_NMG_0105389

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ To Announce Changes To Corporate Probe Policy. The Financial Times (12/12, Masters) reports, "The US Department of Justice will announce Tuesday that it plans to make it easier for companies under investigation to cooperate with prosecutors and avoid criminal indictment, the Financial Times has learned. … Specifically, field prosecutors will no longer have blanket authority to demand that a company waive its attorney-client confidentiality privileges and instead will have to seek higher-level approval in Washington before making such a request, according to a Department of Justice official who asked not to be identified." The Times continues, "The new policy, to be announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, also addresses the controversial practice of requiring companies to cease paying legal fees for employees implicated in matters under investigation." The Times adds, "The revisions come after months of criticism from defense attorneys, the business community and some members of Congress of the cooperation policy set forth in a 2003 memo by Larry Thompson, then the deputy attorney general. Critics of the Thompson memo have argued that prosecutors gained too much power after the collapse of Enron and WorldCom and needed to be reined in. … Senator Arlen Specter has introduced legislation that would prevent prosecutors from requiring waiver of attorney-client privilege. A federal judge in New York hearing a major tax fraud case has harshly criticized the Justice Department for requiring accounting firm KPMG to stop paying attorneys fees for its former employees as part of its cooperation agreement. The judge, Lewis Kaplan, ordered KPMG in June to resume paying the fees. That case is on appeal."

No End In Sight For Federal Stock Option Probes. The AP (12/12, Gordon) reports, "Eighteen CEOs swept out. More than a hundred public companies under federal investigation and over $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc." The AP continues, "The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives." The AP adds, "Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings. Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports. … The Justice Department will 'continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out,' U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. 'The final chapter hasn't been written yet.'" The AP notes, "Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era. The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference. … Among the wide swath of companies caught up in internal or government investigations: Apple Computer Inc., Barnes & Noble Inc., Caremark Rx Inc., Costco Wholesale Corp., Gap Inc., The Home Depot Inc., McAfee Inc., Monster Worldwide Inc., Restoration Hardware Inc., Staples Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc."

Backdated Options Can Yield Hefty Tax Bills. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, B1, Francis) reports, "Many of the hundred-plus companies under investigation over backdated stock options -- and the individuals who received those options -- are scrambling to protect themselves from another potential consequence: stiff tax bills. For individuals, the tax bill and penalties could prove steep, even if the shares become worthless. Companies, too, could face a hefty bill and potential penalties for unpaid income and payroll taxes." The Journal continues, "Options generally give an employee a future right to buy an employer's shares at a specified price. If the stock rises, the employee makes money. And if the company cheats, backdating an option grant to a period when the stock was lower than the day it was actually granted, the recipient benefits financially even more." The Journal adds, "Ordinarily, top executives owe income taxes on any gains from exercising their options at the time of exercise. Lower-level employees often receive another kind of stock option that is typically taxed only when the underlying shares are actually sold (although they can be taxed sooner under the Alternative Minimum Tax). But under tax rules for deferred compensation adopted in 2004, improperly priced options of either kind can trigger a 20% surtax on top of ordinary income tax -- totaling as much as 60% of any gain, once state and local taxes are taken into account. … Moreover, under the 2004 rules, the taxes and penalties come due in the year an executive is first allowed to exercise the options -- in other words, when the options vest -- even if he or she exercises them later. Tax experts say taxes are still due if the option subsequently loses value before exercise or even goes unexercised. In addition, more taxes are due if the underlying shares continue to gain value before the options are exercised. (On the flip side, options that expire while under water can't be used to offset other taxable income, tax experts say.) The IRS also charges penalty interest -- currently about 9% -- for late payment."

DOJ_NMG_0105390

5th Circuit Delays Skilling's Prison Check-In Pending Bail Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A12, Emshwiller) reports, "Former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling's decades-long date with a prison cell, scheduled to start today, has been temporarily delayed by a federal appeals court." The Journal continues, "Late yesterday, Mr. Skilling's lead criminal defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, said he received notice that the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals had ordered a delay in his client's scheduled report date to a federal prison in Waseca, Minn., where he was to begin serving a more-than-24-year prison sentence. Mr. Skilling received that sentence as the result of being convicted earlier this year in a Houston federal court on 19 criminal counts, including conspiracy and fraud, arising from Enron's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy. Mr. Skilling, who has consistently maintained his innocence, had been planning to fly to Minnesota this morning to report to the prison, Mr. Petrocelli said."

The Washington Post (12/12, D1, Johnson) reports, "Skilling, 53, had been preparing to turn himself in today and begin serving a prison term of 24 years and six months at a federal facility in Waseca, Minn. But a brief order from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, issued yesterday evening, means the brash former corporate executive will enjoy at least a few more days of freedom." The Post adds, "Skilling's lawyers are attacking a theory that the appeals court had invalidated last summer in another case tied to the Houston energy trading company. The appeals court ruling granted Skilling an undetermined delay "solely to allow this court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal," the order said." The Post notes, "Legal analysts said the court could ultimately force Skilling to report to the 1,070-inmate prison 75 miles south of Minneapolis within days -- or the judges could take even more time to consider the issue. To stay free pending a months- or years-long appeal, Skilling would need to show a substantial chance that he would succeed."

The Houston Chronicle (12/12, Hays, Fowler) reports, "The last-minute reprieve was a possibility up to Skilling's deadline of 2 p.m. Tuesday to report to the prison in Waseca, about 75 miles south of Minneapolis. Skilling will await word from the 5th Circuit on whether he can pursue his appeal inside or outside of prison. His appeal is expected to be filed next month." The Chronicle adds, "The appellate court's decision is somewhat unusual, said Brian Wice, a Houston lawyer who specializes in appeals. … 'It's rare to see a panel decide to stay a prison sentence so they can carefully consider his motion to remain free. Usually it's just a one-sentence summary denial,' Wice said." Bloomberg (12/12) also reports this story.

Federal Prosecutors Lay Out Case Against Conrad Black. Bloomberg (12/12, Harris) reports, "Former Hollinger International Inc. Chairman Conrad Black, indicted for fraud and accused of abusing company perks, compared himself to embattled French nobility in defending his actions, according to U.S. prosecutors in a filing." Bloomberg continues, "The 81-page document, filed today, lays out the prosecutors' case against Black, Peter Atkinson, a former Hollinger vice president and general counsel, and two other defendants. … 'I am not prepared to re-enact the French Revolutionary renunciation of the rights of nobility,' Black told Atkinson in a 2002 e-mail, according to the filing." Bloomberg adds, "Black, Atkinson, former Hollinger Chief Financial Officer John Boultbee, and ex-general counsel Mark Kipnis were each indicted last year on charges that they stripped Hollinger of its U.S. holdings while reaping millions for themselves through unauthorized non-competition agreements. … Black's Toronto lawyer, Edward Greenspan, said he had read the filing but wasn't prepared to comment on it immediately, citing the document's length. … Jury selection for the trial of Black and the other defendants is set for March 7. Black, Atkinson, Boultbee and Kipnis have pleaded innocent. Former Chicago Sun-Times publisher F. David Radler, who was also indicted, pleaded guilty last year and is cooperating with authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0105391

SEC Sanctions Two Over PNC Accounting Problems. The AP (12/12) reports, "An accounting executive at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. and an outside auditor were sanctioned by federal regulators Monday for their alleged roles in the regional bank's faulty accounting in 2001, said to have inflated earnings by concealing $762 million in potential liabilities." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission announced the settlements with Thomas Garbe, who was PNC's director of accounting policy at the time, and Michael Joseph, a former partner with the major accounting firm Ernst & Young, which reviewed the transaction at issue. Garbe and Joseph neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but agreed to refrain from future violations of the securities laws. … In addition, Joseph was barred for three years from acting as an accountant for any public company. … Garbe 'failed to inquire adequately about facts and circumstances, and was a cause of PNC's violations of the ... federal securities laws,' the SEC said in its order." The AP adds, "The agency had previously alleged that Pittsburgh-based PNC tried to conceal $762 million in sour corporate loans in 2001 by selling them to three partnerships it created expressly for that purpose with insurance giant American International Group Inc."

Bloomberg (12/12, Bilodeau) reports, "American International Group Inc., the world's biggest insurer, hired Joseph to help develop and market a financing arrangement that PNC used to shift $762 million in bad loans and investments off its books in 2001, according to the SEC. Ernst & Young, the second-biggest U.S. accounting firm, also was the auditor that year for PNC, a Pittsburgh-based bank. … Joseph, a 'nationally recognized expert' on accounting for off-balance-sheet financing, drafted an expert-opinion letter for AIG approving the transaction, the SEC in its order today. Then Joseph gave the same letter to the Ernst & Young team auditing the way PNC accounted for it. The Ernst & Young auditors adopted Joseph's guidance letter 'virtually verbatim,' the SEC said. … 'Joseph was invested both financially and reputationally in the success' of the arrangement, the regulator said. As a result, he had a conflict of interest when he 'evaluated' PNC's accounting for a product he had helped create. 'Joseph was on both sides of the PNC transactions,' the SEC said."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Resolves Dispute Over Classified Information For Libby. The AP (12/12, Apuzzo) reports US District Judge Reggie B. Walton "all but resolved the protracted legal fight over classified information in the CIA leak case Monday, helping ensure the dispute would not derail former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's perjury and obstruction trial." Libby is "accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding a CIA operative. He says he had more pressing issues on his mind and wants to discuss classified intelligence about terrorist threats and foreign nuclear programs to bolster that argument." Walton, "who rankled Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald last month by ruling that Libby must be allowed to discuss intelligence on Iraq, Iran, Pakistan, terrorism and other issues at trial, accepted Fitzgerald's proposal to limit the details Libby and his attorneys can discuss. The details of those limitations are sealed but, because it was Fitzgerald's proposal, it's unlikely he would come back to court later this month and argue that the limitations did not go far enough to protect government secrecy."

FBI Affidavit Unsealed In Prince George's Bribery Probe. Under the headline "FBI Tape Shows Hornsby Accepting Money," the Washington Post (12/12, B2, Rich, 690K) reports, "As soon as he walked into the hotel room, Andre J. Hornsby talked to his longtime associate about the possibility he had been followed. … They talked about purging Hornsby's e-mails from school system computers, and then the associate -- who was secretly cooperating in an investigation of Hornsby -- handed over $1,000." The Post adds, "Details of the videotaped meeting at the end of 2004 were among the key disclosures in an FBI affidavit unsealed yesterday at U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. The affidavit and related documents contain a raft of new information about the corruption case prosecutors have assembled against Hornsby," the former Prince George's County schools superintendent.

The AP (12/12) also notes that the affidavit "claims Hornsby took great pains to conceal his schemes…checking for possible phone taps, and trying to shake what he correctly suspected were FBI agents following him. Hornsby was indicted in August and pleaded not guilty to charges of mail fraud, wire fraud, witness and evidence tampering, and obstruction of justice. His attorney, Robert Bonsib says he expects the matter to go to court and be hard fought."

DOJ_NMG_0105392

New York Federal Prosecutors Suffer Through Losing Streak. The AP (12/12, Neumeister) reports, "These are happy times for defense lawyers in Manhattan federal court. … A string of recent acquittals, in cases involving everything from organized crime to Wall Street misdeeds to terrorism, has eroded the patina of invincibility from prosecutors in an office where high-profile convictions once seemed inevitable." The AP continues, "The defeats -- just two years after the government successfully prosecuted home maven Martha Stewart -- were capped off when prosecutors announced just before Thanksgiving that they were dropping one-third of the 15 cases brought against floor specialists at the New York Stock Exchange." The AP adds, "The prosecution, meant to show specialists were cheating investors by improperly trading for their companies ahead of orders for their customers, had already suffered huge hits with two acquittals and dropped charges in two cases -- although they did notch five convictions. … The latest charges were dropped just days after a jury acquitted a California man on charges that he lied about his association with one of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers, ending a case the government relentlessly pursued for five years. … Just weeks earlier, a third jury deadlocked on racketeering charges against John A. 'Junior' Gotti, leading prosecutors to abandon their case against the admitted one-time Gambino crime family boss. … And that came only weeks after prosecutors agreed to drop charges against technology banker Frank Quattrone, letting him resume a career that once paid him as much as $120 million a year." The AP notes, "In civil and criminal cases, prosecutors in Manhattan's U.S. District Court have endured a variety of setbacks -- including decisions forcing them to divulge the identities of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and to turn over pictures of prisoner abuse in Iraq. … Even a big victory _ the conviction of lawyer Lynne Stewart on a charge of providing material support to terrorists _ soured when a judge sentenced her to a little over two years in prison rather than the 30 years the government had sought. … U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, who took the job last year when the soon-to-be stymied prosecutions were already in full swing, told The Associated Press that the setbacks were cyclical. … The results, he said, can happen when 'the stars line up badly in a bunch of cases ... It's crazy to say that it's the quality of the lawyering here.' Garcia said prosecutors stream to his office after a win or a loss -- and the losses hit hard. … He said losses attract more attention than the vast majority of criminal cases that end in convictions. He cited the successful prosecution of South Korean businessman Tongsun Park, who was convicted by a jury that took only hours to find he conspired to accept at least $2 million to act as a secret Iraqi agent to influence the United Nations' oil-for-food program."

Judge Seeks Answers On Internal DOJ Probe Of Mafia Case Prosecutor. The Boston Globe (12/12, Mishra, Murphy) reports, "The chief federal judge in Boston is urging the US Justice Department to find out and tell him what happened to an internal investigation of a federal prosecutor accused of withholding evidence in a high-profile Mafia case." The Globe continues, "The unusual request, which was filed in court yesterday, stems from a botched racketeering case in which two reputed mobsters were released early from prison after Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf determined that prosecutor Jeffrey Auerhahn improperly and possibly illegally manipulated evidence." The Globe adds, "Three years ago, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan told Wolf that he would get to the bottom of the alleged misconduct. But in a letter sent Friday to Sullivan's boss, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Wolf wrote that 'no information on the status or any results' of the investigation into Auerhahn had been reported to him. … 'The apparent inaction of the Department of Justice regarding Mr. Auerhahn has generated considerable concern about the administration of justice in the District of Massachusetts,' Wolf wrote." The Globe notes, "Citing Justice Department rules protecting employees' privacy, Sullivan said yesterday he could not comment on the results of the investigation of Auerhahn or whether any action had been taken against him. … Sullivan said he would look into whether prosecutors could somehow share the results of the investigation with Wolf without violating Auerhahn's privacy. … 'Obviously the court has raised some legitimate concerns as it relates to a matter that was before the court, and there should be an avenue to be able to respond to the court on the outcome of any inquiry that was launched as a result of the court's findings or conclusions,' Sullivan said."

DOJ_NMG_0105393

Probe Of Amtrak Legal Procedures Gathers Steam. The Legal Times (12/12, Palmer) reports, "A House committee broadened its investigation into government-subsidized train operator Amtrak's legal department and its outside legal counsel last week, calling for the Justice Department to investigate possible illegal activities." The Times continues, "In a Dec. 4 letter obtained by Legal Times, outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and committee member Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., requested that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales review 'what may constitute unlawful conduct' between Amtrak's legal team and outside law firms. It's the second letter the lawmakers have sent regarding potential mismanagement on the part of Amtrak and its outside law firms." The Times adds, "In a separate letter sent Nov. 17 to Amtrak Inspector General Fred Weiderhold Jr., the congressmen singled out Manatt, Phelps & Phillips for its billing of support staff and expenses. The letter asked Weiderhold to review specific instances regarding Manatt's work on the Northeast Corridor electrification project to see if they were 'appropriate, justified, documented, and accurate.' … 'The Times notes, "The lawmakers' overtures come after a recent probe into Amtrak's legal department by the Department of Transportation's inspector general and Weiderhold, which came at the request of the transportation committee. The investigation found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal fees from June 2002 to June 2005. The inspector generals' report, released in October, found that Amtrak's outside legal counsel rarely turned in receipts and used block billing, the term for billing different tasks under one invoice entry, which is prohibited by Amtrak's guidelines for dealing with outside counsel. … The letter to the Justice Department, which does not name any specific law firms, addresses four areas in which Amtrak employees and outside legal counsel may have broken federal law by bill padding and possible collusion among Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel to use side agreements benefiting the outside law firms."

Raids In Five Cities Nab 19 Bosnian Serbs Charged With War Crimes. Long Island Newsday (12/12, Mcallester) reports from Tampa, FL, "Federal agents raided homes in five cities Monday, arresting 19 Bosnian Serbs whose units allegedly participated in the Bosnian war's Srebrenica massacre, sources told Newsday. …. The murder of more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica was the worst war crime in Europe since World War II." Newsday continues, "Monday's arrests follow one in Milwaukee during the weekend. The investigation is continuing, the sources said, and is expected to net more Srebrenica suspects than any other operation to date worldwide. … The total number of Srebrenica suspects arrested in the past two years on immigration violations in the United States is approaching 50. At least three have been deported to Bosnia from Arizona and two are in custody in Sarajevo as prosecutors there investigate them for war crimes." Newsday adds, "Agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement arrested eight men in Tampa Monday. Others were arrested in nearby Orlando and in Denver, Detroit and Chicago. The government alleges that all of them lied on their immigration applications, deliberately omitting mention of their service in the Bosnian Serb Army." Newsday notes, "At the federal courthouse in downtown Tampa Monday afternoon, five of the men arrested Monday were arraigned before Judge Thomas McCoun. … While investigators and prosecutors do not consider any of the men a present danger, the underlying theme of the operation that led to their arrest is that they were, not so long ago, a mortal danger to thousands."

Sheehan Convicted Of Trespassing At UN. The AP (12/12, Maull) reports, "Peace activist Cindy Sheehan and three other women were convicted of trespassing Monday for trying to deliver an anti-Iraq war petition to the U.S. Mission to the United Nations." A Manhattan Criminal Court judge "sentenced them immediately to conditional discharge, which means they could face some form of penalty if they are arrested in the next six months, and ordered them to pay $95 in court surcharges." Sheehan and "about 100 other members of a group called Global Exchange were rebuffed last March when they attempted to take a petition with some 72,000 signatures to the U.S. Mission's headquarters across a street from the United Nations. After Monday's sentencing, the women returned to the Mission; this time, their petition was accepted."

In 9-0 Decision, Supreme Court Reinstates Murder Conviction. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Savage, 850K) reports, "The Supreme Court reversed the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals today and restored a California murder conviction that had been thrown out because a small photo of the victim had been worn by his family during the trial. In a 9-0 decision, the justices said the appeals court had overstepped its bounds when it held that this display violated the defendant's right to a fair trial."

DOJ_NMG_0105394

USA Today (12/12, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The justices did not rule on whether the display of such buttons should be permitted at trials. Rather, they said in a unanimous decision that a lower court was wrong to find that the buttons may have prejudiced the jury and that the defendant should be able to make his case to a federal judge." However, "in an opinion by Justice Clarence Thomas, the high court said it had no precedent against such conduct by spectators, so the 9th Circuit should not have ruled that the defendant, Mathew Musladin, could make a claim in federal court. The fundamental question in the case focused on the standards state prisoners must meet to challenge their cases in federal court." The New York Times (12/12, Stout, 1.16M) also says the ruling "was hardly an endorsement of personal, emotional expressions in a trial courtroom. On the contrary, the key issue was whether the Ninth Circuit went too far."

The Legal Times (12/12, Mauro) reports, "When Mathew Musladin went on trial in Santa Clara, Calif., for the 1994 murder of Tom Studer, his estranged wife's fiance, the victim's family showed support for Studer in an unusual way. … Sitting silently near the jury, family members wore buttons bearing a photo of Studer's face every day of the trial. Musladin's lawyer asked the trial judge to order the buttons removed, asserting they would prejudice the jury against his client. The judge denied the motion." The Times continues, "On Monday the Supreme Court ruled in Carey v. Musladin that the Studer family's actions did not violate any firmly established federal rule and there was thus no reason to reverse Musladin's conviction. … The unanimous ruling did not endorse the practice, and Justice David Souter wrote separately that spectators wearing buttons 'can raise a risk of improper considerations.' But under federal habeas corpus rules, a state conviction can be reversed only if the state court's ruling upholding the conviction misapplies 'clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court.' … Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the Court, said it is clearly established by Court precedent that certain actions by the state at trial -- such as forcing a defendant to wear prison garb or surrounding the defendant with uniformed state troopers -- are inherently prejudicial enough to cause the reversal of convictions."

The AP (12/12, Yost) reports, "It was the first time the justices had ruled on whether the conduct of courtroom spectators deprived a defendant of a fair trial, which in this instance resulted in a conviction that an appeals court reversed."

LATimes Criticizes 9th Circuit Court. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K) says "critics of the US 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, such as outgoing California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, are celebrating that liberal-leaning court's latest rebuff by the Supreme Court. … This page, which strongly opposes capital punishment, is nevertheless glad to see the 9th Circuit's wrist slapped for improperly applying the law as it is written." The Times says the High Court's ruling "might seem like a technical argument between courts, but it points to something more pervasive and troubling: that the 9th Circuit seems predisposed to second-guess state courts, especially in death penalty cases -- even to the point of usurping the high court's role. The 9th Circuit's image problem is easy grist for conservatives, but it should be troubling to liberals and moderates as well."

Oregon Doctor Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Botox Scam. KGW-TV Portland (12/11) reported on its Web site, "A doctor who injected cosmetic patients in Tigard and Salem with a Botox substitute was sentenced to 18 months in Federal prison Monday. Dr. Jerome Lentini was also ordered, along with his office nurse Catherine Garcia, to pay restitution of $330,306.76. … Federal officials think Lentini and Garcia injected more than 800 patients with unapproved drugs in a 13-month span, according to records." KGW noted, "Two of Lentini's employees, knowing of the Florida cases, became concerned when they witnessed Lentini drawing on what they believed to be large stocks of a non-FDA approved drug. One of the employees contacted the Oregon Board of Medical Examiners and the FBI, triggering the investigation." The Salem Statesman Journal (12/12) and Tigard Times (12/12) also report on the sentence.

Oregon Lawyer Sentenced To Year In Prison For Loan Fraud. The Salem Statesman-Journal (12/8, Liao) reported, "Thomas Knapp, a former Salem lawyer who pleaded guilty this year to a money-laundering charge, was sentenced Thursday to a year in federal prison and ordered to pay about $313,000 restitution, officials said. Knapp was involved in an international loan scam from September 2000 and February 2005, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani. Knapp bought a Mercedes and financed a building on Commercial Street SE where he ran his law practice using money from the scam."

DOJ_NMG_0105395

Three Convicted Of Defrauding Microsoft In Discount Software Scam. Bay City Newswire (12/8) reported, "The U.S. attorney's office reported that three people have been convicted of devising a scheme to defraud Microsoft Corp. by obtaining discounted software under false pretenses. Prosecutors say the scheme involved buying more than $29 million worth of software that was steeply discounted for academic institutions, and selling it to non-academic entities, in violation of the Microsoft agreement. Microsoft estimates that it lost more than $60 million as a result of the defendants' criminal acts, according to prosecutors." BCN noted, "The convictions resulted from 'Operation Cyberstorm,' a two-year undercover investigation into software piracy and related crimes conducted by agents from Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation unit and the REACT Task Force."

Puget Sound Business Journal (12/8) added, "According to the U.S. Department of Justice, Mirza Ali, his wife, Sameena Ali, and Keith Griffen were convicted on Nov. 28 for trying to defraud the Redmond software giant by 'obtaining discounted software under false pretenses.' … Microsoft said it estimates it lost more than $60 million in the scheme that investigators called 'Operation Cyberstorm.' 'Microsoft applauds the...conviction of three individuals involved. The conviction of these individuals is a significant victory for the software industry, its partners and customers, and all who value fair and ethical business practices,' said Bonnie MacNaughton, senior attorney for Microsoft, in a statement."

Results Are Mixed On Banks' Efforts To Identity Theft Victims. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, D2, Mincer) reports, "A small but increasing number of banks now offer to protect clients when an identity thief has been snooping around. … The institutions offer help from generic advice on correcting credit records to personalized help when someone has misused a client's account. MetLife Bank, a unit of MetLife Inc., announced last week that it would provide customers free assistance even if the identity theft doesn't involve a MetLife account." The Journal continues, "Unlike credit-card theft, which consumers can resolve with a quick call and, at most, a $50 expense, repairing damage after someone has used your personal information to take over or open bank and other consumer accounts could involve thousands of dollars in personal losses and months of effort. … In 2005, there were 8.9 million identity-fraud victims in the U.S., costing $56.6 billion, according to Javelin Strategy & Research, an independent research firm in Pleasanton, Calif. The average fraud amount per victim was $6,383; the average consumer cost was $422. On average, resolving the problem took 40 hours. The median time for resolution -- meaning half of the incidents took longer and half took less time -- was five hours." The Journal adds, "Financial institutions are concerned not only because of the cost but also because their customers are worried about becoming victims. … While banks are responsible for helping customers to investigate activity on an account at that institution, some are providing assistance on accounts outside."

The New York Times (12/12, Dash) reports, "Melody Millett was shocked when her car loan company asked her if she was the wife of Abundio Perez, who had applied for 26 credit cards, financed several cars and taken out a home mortgage using a Social Security number belonging to her actual husband. … Beyond her shock, Mrs. Millett was angry. Five months earlier, the Milletts had subscribed to a $79.99-a-year service from Equifax, a big financial data warehouse, that promised to monitor any access to her credit records. But it never reported the credit activity that might have signaled that they were victims of identity theft. … 'I feel like the whole thing is a sham,' said Mrs. Millett, a 37-year-old information-technology manager from Overland Park, Kan. 'You feel completely violated because here are the people who know the industry. They hold all the data.' The services, she contends, are oversold." The Times continues, "It is not just criminals who are profiting from identity theft; financial institutions are making money, too. Fear of identity theft has helped give rise to a nearly billion-dollar business in credit-monitoring services sold by the major credit bureaus — companies like Equifax, Experian and TransUnion — as well as direct marketers and banks. … Javelin Strategy and Research, which analyzes the credit-monitoring market, says more than 12 million Americans are now subscribers. The services alert them when lenders have requested their credit files, usually an indication a credit application has been made in their name." The Times notes, "Credit monitoring has quickly gained traction with consumers through aggressive advertising that often promotes its value in protecting against identity theft. But its abilities are far more limited than is commonly perceived. .. .In the meantime, measures that could stem fraud from identity theft — like legislation empowering consumers to block access to their credit records, making it impossible to extend new credit — have faced stiff resistance from industry groups."

DOJ_NMG_0105396

Ameriprise Settles With Massachusetts Over Loss Of Company's Laptop. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, Levitz) reports, "In what may be the first regulatory action against a company for losing sensitive customer data, Massachusetts securities regulators reached a settlement with Ameriprise Financial Inc. over the company's loss of a laptop computer last year." The Journal continues, "Under an agreement with the office of Massachusetts Secretary of State William Galvin, Ameriprise agreed to hire an independent consultant within 60 days to review its policies and procedures for employees' and contractors' use of laptop computers that contain personal or financial information on Ameriprise customers. … The Minneapolis-based financial-advisory firm didn't admit any wrongdoing or liability under the settlement." The Journal adds, "The regulatory action is unusual, said Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a San Diego consumer group. More typically when companies lose laptops, customers are typically told to monitor their credit for a certain period. … Over the past nine months, Ms. Givens's organization has cited more than 60 cases of security breaches involving missing laptops at companies, universities, and government agencies. … Ameriprise disclosed in January that it had notified thousands of people that their names and other personal data were stored on a laptop that was stolen from an employee's car on Christmas Eve 2005 while the employee was on vacation in the Midwest. The laptop contained the names and account numbers of 158,000 Ameriprise clients, and the names and Social Security numbers of 67,000 current and former financial advisers. The lost data included information on thousands of Massachusetts residents, among others."

Hackers Access Personal Data Of 800,00 UCLA Employees, Students, Alumni. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Trounson, 850K) reports, "In what appears to be one of the largest computer security breaches ever at an American university, one or more hackers have gained access to a UCLA database containing personal information on about 800,000 of the university's current and former students, faculty and staff members, among others. UCLA officials said the attack on a central campus database exposed records containing the names, Social Security numbers and birth dates…for at least some of those affected. The attempts to break into the database began in October 2005 and ended Nov. 21, when the suspicious activity was detected and blocked, the officials said." Acting Chancellor Norman Abrams said that "the university had no evidence that any of the information had been misused." The Times notes, "Laura Eimiller, spokeswoman for the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the agency was investigating the breach, but said she could not comment further."

Small Stores Account For Most Food Stamp Fraud. USA Today (12/12, 2A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports efforts to "reduce the illegal use of food stamps have kept millions of dollars in benefits from going to waste during the past five years, but small convenience and grocery stores in low-income areas continue to be hotbeds for fraud, according to the Government Accountability Office." The GAO is "recommending that the Department of Agriculture intensify its focus on finding stores that violate federal rules and increase penalties for trafficking in misused stamps. The GAO's recommendations, in a report released in October, come as Congress is preparing to revisit the $29 billion-a-year food stamp program next year as part of a giant farm bill." The GAO "is urging the Food and Nutrition Service (FNS) — the agency within the Agriculture Department that runs the food stamp program — to review the 160,000 stores authorized to receive stamps to determine which are most likely to engage in fraud and to target them for enforcement."

NYTimes Says Drug Companies Must Increase Efforts To Combat Fraud. The New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Tempted to buy cheap medicines from a pharmacy Web site? Think twice. If the Web site shows no verifiable street address for the pharmacy, there is a 50 percent chance the drugs are counterfeit." The WHO has "recently set up a task force that brings together many groups that work on counterfeit drugs. It is a start. Multinational drug companies — which have been reluctant to report fakes lest they erode consumer confidence in all drugs — need to do more. An international convention is also needed to establish stiffer penalties for counterfeiting drugs, and marshal more funds and support to fight this deadly crime."

DOJ_NMG_0105397

CIVIL LAW:

DC Circuit Hears Appeal Of DOD Labor Relations Rules. Government Executive (12/12, Rutzick) reports, "A panel of appeals court judges heard arguments Monday over the legality of the Defense Department's proposed labor relations system for civilian employees." GE continues, "After losing in a lower court in February -- and following two losses for the Homeland Security Department's similar system -- government lawyers continued to argue that Congress gave the Pentagon authority to make far-reaching changes to collective bargaining. … In the 2004 Defense authorization bill, Congress granted the department authority to create a new human resources system, based on the notion that the current system was too rigid and outdated to allow the department to respond with agility to modern threats of terrorism." GE adds, "Pentagon officials said they have the authority to override collective bargaining agreements after they are reached and the ability to narrow the items that can be bargained over as much as they want. But a coalition of federal labor unions sued the department to say the rules effectively eliminate collective bargaining."

The Federal Times (12/12, Kauffman) reports, "Three years ago, Congress gave the Defense Department authority to craft a new labor relations system outside existing rules governing collective bargaining. At the same time, Congress said the department couldn't remove an employee's right to organize and bargain collectively. … These two seemingly contradictory statements are at the heart of a legal dispute that could decide whether the department can proceed with changes to personnel rules affecting 650,000 civilian employees. … 'The question is: Has the department reasonably interpreted the phrase 'collective bargaining'?' Judge David Tatel said Dec. 11, effectively summarizing the case before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit." The Times continues, "The answer is up to Tatel and two other appellate judges to decide. … The three-judge panel heard oral arguments Dec. 11 from attorneys representing the government and unions, who sued the department in November 2005 for creating a system that failed to protect employees' rights to bargain collectively. … The hearing lasted twice as long as the 40 minutes initially set aside for arguments, as the judges peppered the lawyers with detailed questions concerning what specific sections of the 2003 law meant." The Times notes, "Joe Goldberg, the attorney who argued on behalf of the 13 federal employee unions that filed the lawsuit, said provisions allowing the department to create a labor relations system outside Chapter 71 apply only to the mechanics of creating the system, not what is bargained under the system. … William Kanter, a Justice Department attorney who argued the NSPS case on behalf of the government, said that unlike with Homeland Security, Congress gave the Pentagon specific authority to craft a labor relations system outside Title 5 rules."

In his "Federal Diary" column for the Washington Post (12/12), Stephen Barr writes, "At times yesterday, the courtroom debate about the law that created a new civil service system for the Defense Department sounded like the judges and lawyers were playing Battleship, the game where opponents use a grid to target and sink ships. … The debate, before a three-judge federal appeals panel, focused on seemingly conflicting provisions in the 2003 law that permitted the Pentagon to issue regulations aimed at overhauling workplace rules and installing a pay-for-performance system." Barr continues, "William Kanter a Justice Department lawyer representing the Pentagon, contended that Congress defined what issues had to be put on the table for bargaining with unions, put limits on those rights and gave power to the defense secretary to throw out contracts. Certain phrases in the NSPS law makes it different from the Homeland Security statute and the rules blocked by the courts, he argued. … Joseph Goldberg, a lawyer with the American Federation of Government Employees, disagreed, saying that no matter how the government reads various provisions, it must take into account that the law provides for collective bargaining, as guaranteed in current law, and does not clearly eliminate the right of unions to bargain over the 'impact and implementation' of management decisions."

Massachusetts DA Testifies At Wrongful Prosecution Civil Trial. The Boston Globe (12/ Murphy, 413K) reports, "Jack I. Zalkind thought he did everything he could to make sure that Mafia hitman Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza was telling the truth when he implicated six men in a 1965 gangland killing, the former assistant Suffolk district attorney testified yesterday. But Zalkind said he prosecuted the case without knowing that the FBI had secret reports that indicated Barboza was lying and had falsely implicated four of the six. … Yesterday, Zalkind was the first live witness to testify in a federal civil trial that began last month, seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government." The Globe notes, "Two other men convicted in Deegan's slaying were not exonerated. Ronald Cassesso died in prison and Wilfred Roy French was later released. Yesterday, Cassesso's lawyer, Ronald J. Chisholm, testified that FBI agent H. Paul Rico had promised Cassesso that he would not do prison time for Deegan's slaying if he agreed to testify against the others and back up Barboza's version of events. But, Chisholm said, Cassesso told him he had rejected Rico's offer, telling the agent, 'I'm not going to frame innocent men.'"

DOJ_NMG_0105398

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Report Offers Details Of New York City Police Shooting. The AP (12/12) reports, "Witnesses interviewed for a preliminary report on the police shooting of three men - including a groom on his wedding day - did not mention a fourth, possibly armed man who police say may have been present before officers opened fire, a newspaper reported Monday." The AP continues, "The New York Times obtained a copy of the police department's 23-page preliminary report of the shooting, a detailed look at what happened on Nov. 25 when Sean Bell, 23, and his two friends were caught in a barrage of 50 bullets after a bachelor party at a strip club in Queens. Bell's friends were wounded; all three men were unarmed." The AP adds, "Police have suggested a fourth man may have had a gun and fled when the plainclothes officers opened fire, but the report made no mention of such a man, whom the surviving victims have said does not exist. Some in the community claim the officers invented the man to justify the shooting. … The report also contains no indication that police were searching after the shooting for a fourth man, the paper said."

The New York Times (12/11, Rashbaum, Baker) reports, "When the shooting stopped, the police lieutenant edged toward the gray Nissan Altima with his gun drawn. He ordered the men inside to show their hands. The lieutenant had not fired his weapon, and as he neared the car, according to police records, one of the bloodied men inside complied and stuck his hands out the window. The other did not move. … A police sergeant who arrived seconds later described the scene this way: The Nissan had crashed into a van in the middle of the street. Smoke was coming from its radiator. The man in the driver's seat was slumped back. His passenger was lying across his lap with his arms hanging outside the driver's window." The Times continues, "The sergeant, Michael Wheeler, later told investigators that both men appeared seriously injured and likely to die, according to the records. A plainclothes officer stood close by, his pistol still trained on the two men in the car. A third man lay on the street nearby. … Minutes later, the shooting scene on Liverpool Street in Jamaica, Queens, was choked with patrol cars and the scrum of officials that follows a police shooting. A captain ordered another uniformed sergeant, Donald Kipp, to locate and inspect the weapons of the men involved in the shooting. In all, five plainclothes officers had fired a total of 50 bullets. .. .But one after another, in conversations with Sergeant Kipp or Sergeant Wheeler, the men said they could not say how many shots they had fired. Two said they were unsure whether they had even fired at all, including a detective who investigators later learned had fired 31 shots, emptying his 9-millimeter Sig Sauer pistol, reloading and emptying it again during the frenzied barrage." The Times notes, "The accounts of the lieutenant and the two sergeants are included in the Police Department's preliminary report of the shooting early on Nov. 25 that left the car's driver, Sean Bell, 23, dead on his wedding day and two of his friends wounded, one seriously. The men were part of a larger group that had just attended Mr. Bell's bachelor party in a strip club down the block. … The 23-page document prepared in the days after the shooting, and obtained by The New York Times, does not include the accounts of the four detectives and one police officer who fired their weapons. They are the subjects of an investigation by the office of the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, and it is not clear if they will submit to interviews with prosecutors or testify before a grand jury."

Diallo Case May Offer Prosecutorial Blueprint. The AP (12/12, Hays) reports, "Before there were 50 shots and Sean Bell, there were 41 shots and Amadou Diallo. … The deadly 41-shot barrage fired by four police officers at the unarmed Diallo seven years ago sparked angry demands that the shooters face criminal charges - a scene replayed in the recent police shooting of Bell in a hail of 50 bullets." The AP continues, "Firepower and community outrage aside, the Diallo case serves as a reminder of the hard realities of prosecuting officers who are paid to carry guns and sometimes use them in dangerous situations. It also suggests the ultimate result of the latest case could be a civil settlement for the victims' families and a quiet demise of the careers of the officers involved. … 'Police officers are privileged to use deadly force,' said Ian Weinstein, a criminal law professor at Fordham Law School. 'The case will turn on whether the officers reasonably believed their lives were in danger, or that deadly force was justified.'" The AP adds, "Lawyers say the officers in the Bell case will have to decide - probably after Christmas - whether to tell a grand jury their side of the story in a bid to dissuade jurors from voting to indict them. The lawyer for the undercover officer has said his client is eager to testify; another defense attorney on the case, Stephen Worth, was noncommittal. … In the Diallo case, the officers chose not to go before a grand jury - a decision prosecutors said left them with no choice but to pursue charges of intentional murder, rather than manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide."

DOJ_NMG_0105399

Federal Judge Gives California Six Months To Fix Prison Overcrowding. The AP (12/12, Thompson) reports, "A federal judge on Monday gave California officials six months to ease crowding in the state's overstuffed prison system, warning that potential remedies include capping the inmate population and releasing some prisoners early." The AP continues, "The state is scrambling to find solutions for a prison system that houses 173,000 inmates, 70 percent more than its capacity. Officials with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's administration and inmate attorneys agree the crowding is causing myriad problems, including inmate deaths and dangerous conditions for guards. … 'Common sense suggests the state is being overwhelmed by the numbers,' U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton said." The AP adds, "Schwarzenegger declared a state of emergency in October after failing to persuade state lawmakers to spend billions on a prison building program. He is now seeking to transfer 2,260 inmates to other states as a partial solution. … California sent 80 inmates to a private prison in Tennessee in early November and plans more transfers this month to private prisons in Arizona, Indiana, Oklahoma and Tennessee. … Even if the transfers survive pending court challenges, officials predict California's prisons will run out of room by spring 2008." The AP notes, "Federal law permits early release of inmates only if a three-judge panel determines that all other options have been exhausted. That hasn't happened in any state since the law took effect 10 years ago, said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's National Prison Project."

Louisiana School Board Sues To Cancel September Election. The Baton Rouge Advocate (12/12, Lussier) reports, "The Baker School Board filed a lawsuit in federal court Monday that seeks to cancel the Sept. 30 election in which District 1 voters ousted incumbent President Elaine Davis." The Advocate continues, "The lawsuit covers some of the same ground as Davis' already rejected election challenge, filed in state court. There, Davis unsuccessfully sought to overturn the vote that she lost to challenger Pam Malveaux by 20 votes. … Also listed as plaintiffs in the new federal lawsuit are three board members, Davis, Calvin Dees and Dana Carpenter." The Advocate adds, "Those three voted 3-2 last month to file the litigation, saying the school district's precise boundaries need to be established clearly. They did so over the objections of members George Gallman and Jane Freudenberger, neither of whom are listed individually as defendants. The School Board hired the Metairie law firm, Leblanc Butler LLC, to handle the case. … The lawsuit names as defendants the City of Baker, the East Baton Rouge Parish School Board, as well as parish Registrar of Voters Elaine Lamb and the parish's board of election supervisors." The Advocate notes, "n the state case, Davis, wife of former Baker Mayor Leroy Davis, challenged the votes of 21 voters, most of them living in Oak Glen Terrace trailer park on Thomas Road. … The new federal case alleges that up to 100 people voted improperly. … As evidence, the lawsuit claims that 'on information and belief' the children of these improper voters do not attend Baker public schools, but rather attend East Baton Rouge Parish public schools. … The crux of the litigation is that a small number of voters who live within the city limits of Baker, but not within the boundaries of the school district were illegally allowed to vote Sept. 30. … At issue are a couple of areas, including the Oak Glen Terrace trailer park, which the city annexed before June 1997, but for which the city did not receive approval, or preclearance, from the U.S. Justice Department until later. State courts found that the late date of these preclearances did not matter and that those contested areas are part of the Baker school district."

Christian Group Says DOD Gave Permission For Officers' Video. USA Today/AP (12/12, 11A) reports an evangelical Christian group, "under fire for a promotional video featuring active-duty military officers praising the organization, said Monday that the Defense Department gave it permission to record the video." The video "prompted a religious freedom watchdog group to ask the Pentagon to investigate whether the tape violated regulations and possibly the Constitution." Robert Varney, "executive director of the Christian Embassy, which produced the video, said the group is adding a note to tell viewers that the content does not represent the military or any government agency." Service regulations "in general prohibit active-duty officers from lobbying for political causes while on duty or wearing uniforms. The issue of religion is trickier."

DOJ_NMG_0105400

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Takes Municipal Bond Probe To Grand Jury. Bloomberg (12/12, Hurtado) reports, "Prosecutors investigating bid-rigging in the municipal bond market have brought their case to a federal grand jury in New York, a person with knowledge of the case said." Bloomberg continues, "Ralph Giordano, chief of the New York office of the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division, and Rebecca Meiklejohn, a trial attorney, are leading the criminal investigation, the person said. Also participating in the probe are agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New York office as well as the Internal Revenue Service, according to the person." Bloomberg adds, "Giordano, 69, and his staff won the conviction of former Sotheby's Holdings Inc. Chairman A. Alfred Taubman, found guilty in 2001 of plotting with archrival Christie's International Plc to fix sellers' fees. Meiklejohn has prosecuted anti-competitive practices in the advertising industry. .. .'It's a very big deal that this is now a criminal investigation, it ratchets up the stakes,' said David Gourevitch, a former U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission enforcement attorney who now has his own practice in New York." Bloomberg notes, "Prosecutors are probing whether banks, financial firms and brokers conspired to rig bids on contracts bought by local governments when they invest money from bond sales. The municipalities invest the money until it is needed to pay for schools, roads and other projects. … The investigation grew out of an IRS inquiry that found dozens of municipal bond deals failed to pay $100 million in taxes. It is the broadest criminal probe of the industry. The Justice Department has subpoenaed more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided three brokers in a search for evidence of bid rigging in the market where state and local governments nationwide raised more than $400 billion last year."

Critics Urge Close DOJ Review Of Monsanto Deal. The AP (12/12, Leonard) reports, "Congress will press federal regulators to closely scrutinize Monsanto Co.'s plan to buy cottonseed king Delta & Pine Land Co., but analysts and investors don't seem worried the deal will fall through." The AP continues, "U.S. Rep. Bob Inglis, R-S.C., plans to send a letter to the U.S. Justice Department asking for a careful review of the deal to make sure it complies with antitrust laws. … Inglis said he's not opposed to the deal. But he thinks it deserves a close look because it would give Monsanto more control over the U.S. seed market." The AP adds, "Monsanto agreed to purchase Scott, Miss.-based Delta & Pine Land in August for $1.5 billion in cash. The deal is already under Justice Department investigation to make sure it doesn't violate antitrust law. If approved, the sale should close early next year. … Analysts estimate the deal would give Monsanto control of about 60 percent of the U.S. cottonseed market. .. .That could be bad news for Monsanto's competitors in the multibillion dollar market for genetically engineered seeds. Monsanto has had a corner on the technology since introducing biotech corn and soybean seeds in the 1990s. DuPont Co. and Syngenta AG are trying to catch up by developing their own strains. … DuPont Co. is also fueling opposition to the Delta & Pine Land acquisition."

Delta Board Mulls US Air Offer. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A11, Dade, Trottman) reports, "The board of Delta Air Lines Inc. met by conference call to discuss US Airways Group Inc.'s $8.5 billion hostile bid, but the directors aren't expected to issue a formal position on the offer for several days, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The meeting came as executives at Delta and its major creditors prepared for a new round of talks regarding the US Airways bid scheduled for tomorrow in New York. US Airways presented details of its offer, consisting of $4 billion in cash and about $4.5 billion in stock, nearly two weeks ago, in a session marked by occasionally tense exchanges between executives from the airlines." The Journal adds, "Delta, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in September 2005, is expected to release early next week its reorganization plan for exiting from bankruptcy as a stand-alone company. Coming one month after US Airways launched the hostile offer, the Delta plan effectively will be the company's counterproposal aimed at persuading its creditors not to support the US Airways bid. .. The board vote is largely a formality, since there is nearly no possibility that Delta's board would endorse the US Airways offer, according to people familiar with the situation. Delta officials, including Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein, have made repeated public assertions that the deal isn't right for the Atlanta airline. Mr. Grinstein has insisted that Delta should emerge independently from bankruptcy early next year. He has resisted US Airways' request for access to Delta financial records to perform due diligence on the offer."

DOJ_NMG_0105401

LG Philips Shares Suffer On News Of DOJ Probe Of LCD Industry. Bloomberg (12/12, Cho) reports, "Shares of LG.Philips LCD Co., the world's second-largest liquid-crystal display maker, fell after the company said it was questioned by officials in South Korea, the U.S. and Japan in an antitrust probe of the industry." Bloomberg continues, "Samsung Electronics Co., its bigger rival, was also subpoenaed by South Korea's Fair Trade Commission, company spokeswoman Cho Sung In said today. Officials from the Korean watchdog visited LG.Philips' Seoul headquarters on Dec. 8 because of 'possible anticompetitive conduct in the LCD industry,' the company said yesterday, without identifying the other companies." Bloomberg adds, "LG.Philips shares dropped as much as 7.6 percent, leading declines among LCD makers, on concern the investigation may damage earnings after the company posted two straight quarterly losses. A four-year U.S. federal probe into price fixing in the computer-memory chip market resulted in four companies, including Samsung Electronics, and 16 individuals being fined $731 million. … The investigation may be about price fixing in the industry, Maeil Business Newspaper reported today, citing unidentified industry officials. … Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman at the U.S. Department of Justice, declined to comment. The department issued a subpoena to LG.Philips' San Jose office, while Japan's Fair Trade Commission issued a notice to LG.Philips in Tokyo, according to yesterday's statement."

The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones Newswires (12/12, B4) reports, "In a statement, the South Korea-based LCD maker said it received a subpoena from the U.S. Department of Justice last Friday. In addition, the company said officials from the Fair Trade Commission in Korea visited its headquarters while the Japanese Fair Trade Commission issued a notice to its offices in Tokyo. … 'LG.Philips LCD takes this matter very seriously and will cooperate fully with regulatory authorities,' the company said in the statement. 'While these investigations continue, LG.Philips LCD is committed to running its business as usual, supplying its global customer base.'"

Microsoft Lays Out Defense In Iowa Antitrust Trial. Bloomberg (12/12, Van Voris) reports, "Microsoft Corp. didn't overcharge Iowa consumers for Windows, Word and Excel, a lawyer told jurors in Des Moines, as the company outlined its defense in an antitrust trial. … 'No one in Iowa has been harmed by anything that the plaintiffs can show that Microsoft has done,' Microsoft lawyer David Tulchin told the Iowa state court jury of seven men and five women Monday afternoon. 'The evidence will show that the price was not too high, that there is no overcharge.'" Bloomberg continues, "Tulchin began Microsoft's opening statement in a class-action suit by Iowa consumers who claim they were overcharged by $329 million since 1994. Tulchin's statement began after a lawyer for the consumers concluded his side's opening statement after almost six days. … The lawsuit is one of only two similar cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. Any jury award may be tripled under Iowa law." Bloomberg adds, "The Iowa case and one in Mississippi are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers after an antitrust suit against Microsoft brought by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998. … Microsoft denies that it violated Iowa antitrust law."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices Rule Against BP In Royalties Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, 2.04M) reports, "The Supreme Court ruled against the oil and gas industry Monday in a dispute over how far back the government can reach to collect on leases for federal land. In a 7-0 decision, the court refused to limit the number of years the government can reach back to collect unpaid royalties." The case "involves two units of BP that had sued over lease royalties oil and gas companies must pay for coal bed methane removed from federal land. That dispute concerned questions of at what stage of production the levy should be paid."

The AP (12/12, Yost) reports, "At issue is whether a federal law imposing a six-year time limit for the government to file lawsuits based on federal contracts also applies to administrative orders. … Ten years ago, the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service ordered BP America Production Co. and ARCO to pay $4.1 million and

DOJ_NMG_0105402

$780,000 respectively to cover royalty deficiencies on coalbed methane. The companies pumped the natural gas from wells in the San Juan Basin, which is in northwest New Mexico and southwest Colorado. … The government's administrative claim was based on royalties allegedly owed going back more than eight years from the time the Interior Department demanded the money. BP and ARCO say the limit should be six years, which would reduce the amount of royalties the Interior Department is able to claim."

Review Finds BP Officials Worried Cost Cutting Led To Fatal Blast. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A3, Cummins) reports, "Some top BP PLC executives worried that cost cutting at a Texas refinery may have contributed to the plant's poor state of safety and equipment, according to an internal BP review that is likely to turn up the heat on the company over a deadly explosion at the site." The Journal continues, "Documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal also quote a former senior BP safety executive saying that BP Chief Executive John Browne 'showed little interest' in safety issues." The Journal adds, "The March 2005 accident at BP's Texas City, Texas, refinery killed 15 people and injured 180. BP faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims. The accident, along with a series of other safety and environmental incidents, has undercut BP's efforts to promote itself as a socially responsible energy company that is 'Beyond Petroleum.' High profits from surging oil and gasoline prices over the past three years have added to public pressure. … BP officials have said they believe budgetary decisions didn't play a critical role in the accident, caused when workers restarted a small gasoline-processing unit. A BP spokesman defended Lord Browne's safety record and repeated yesterday that the company determined in its own investigations into the accident that spending wasn't an issue in the blast. … In a series of internal interviews, however, BP executives painted a more complicated picture. Their thinking is laid out in notes and interview summaries that were collected this year as part of an internal BP review of the refinery accident. The interviews were conducted as part of a wide-ranging 'accountability' review, designed to determine what led to the accident, according to a BP spokesman."

California Oil Company Charged With Pollution. The Lompoc (CA) Record (12/12, Yale) reports, "An energy company with local operations is facing more trouble. .. The state attorney general's office has filed four misdemeanor counts of state water pollution against Greka Oil and Gas Inc." The Record continues, "The alleged violations of the California Fish and Game Code were filed in Santa Barbara County Superior Court in Santa Maria Wednesday. The Department of Fish and Game was the investigating agency, according to the attorney general's office. … The complaint alleged that Greka 'unlawfully deposited in, or permitted petroleum or other deleterious substance to pass into, the state waters of California.' … Greka allegedly committed these violations Dec. 7, 2005, at 5017 Zaca Station Road in Los Olivos; May 4 and May 16 at 3851 Telephone Road in Santa Maria; and Aug. 10 at 6572 Dominion Road in Santa Maria, according to the complaint." The Record adds, "According to reports from the Governor's Office of Emergency Services, the Los Olivos incident was caused by tank failure, and the spill went into an unnamed seasonal creek before it was contained. … The Santa Maria spill on May 4 was a pipeline leak, according to the report, and the petroleum went into an unnamed dry creek. The May 16 spill at the same location was reported by a caller as caused by a ruptured flow line, but it did not go into a waterway." The Record notes, "The corporation settled last month the remainder of a civil lawsuit filed in 2004 by the Santa Barbara County District Attorney's Office, which accused it of more than 100 safety and environmental violations. Greka agreed to pay a total $675,000 to the county and the county Air Pollution Control District in the settlements, according to a prosecutor in that case. … The U.S. Attorney's office began an investigation late last year into possible criminal acts committed by Greka, but there have been no public developments in that investigation since it began, U.S. Justice Department spokesman Thom Mrozek said Monday."

Opponents Say Offshore Drilling Legislation Gives Too Much To Gulf States. The Washington Post (12/12, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports that the last bill passed by the 109th Congress "opens about 8 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling, and U.S. industrial consumers of natural gas hope it will boost supplies and moderate prices. But the bill's landmark aspect was a deal that diverts 37.5 percent of federal royalties from future drilling to the four Gulf of Mexico states." The "accord could ultimately be worth $650 million a year for Louisiana, the biggest beneficiary." The Post adds, "Foes of the legislation fear it will lure states opposed to offshore drilling such as California, Virginia, Florida and North and South Carolina into supporting exploration off their shorelines in return for a gusher of new revenue." Moreover, "[o]pponents of the bill call it fiscally irresponsible and say that any royalties from drilling in federal waters, which begin three miles from shore and extend up to 200 miles out, belong to the federal government."

DOJ_NMG_0105403

Proposals For Carbon Dioxide Limits Gather Momentum. The New York Times (12/12, Lohr, 1.16M) reports that "James E. Rogers, chief executive of Duke Energy, a coal-burning utility in the Midwest and the Southeast, has emerged as an unexpected advocate of federal regulation that would for the first time impose a cost for emitting carbon dioxide." His stance "is far from universal within the power industry, but it has surprising support, particularly from those, like him, who also produce electricity from carbon-free nuclear reactors. And despite the Bush administration's adamant opposition to any limits on fossil fuel emissions, the idea is beginning to pick up momentum in the American political arena as well." The Times analyses possible measures to curb warming, including a federal tax on carbon dioxide waste and a 'cap and trade' regulatory system.

USA Today (12/12, 3B, Davidson, 2.27M) reports, "The rising temperature of Earth's atmosphere may be breeding growing distress and sparking sales of hybrid cars, but most utility executives aren't exactly losing sleep over the problem. In fact, many electric companies are forging ahead with plans for traditional coal-fired power plants,...despite expectations that federal limits will eventually be placed on carbon dioxide emissions. That prospect grows more likely with Congress' new Democratic majority." USA Today adds, "Uncertainty about how restrictive any limits might be has left utilities with a dilemma: build traditional coal plants that are cheaper and generally deemed more reliable or 'clean-coal' facilities that may be less expensive in the long run?"

Highly-Efficient Superconductors Breaking Into Commercial Market. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Clayton, 59K) reports, "Twenty years after their much ballyhooed discovery, high-tech materials capable of delivering 150 times the electricity of conventional wire are starting to push into the commercial market. They promise to make generators, industrial motors, and even power lines far more efficient as the technology becomes more affordable." The Monitor adds, "At least eight new cable projects already are under way in the United States, Europe, China, South Korea, Japan, and Mexico. This month, a leading US innovator in the field will shove out the factory door its first commercial product using the technology, which will help the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) keep its grid stable."

Fuel Economy Ratings To Drop Under New EPA Testing Procedures. USA Today (12/11, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Fuel economy ratings of cars and trucks will drop significantly starting with 2008 models, some of which will go on sale early next year. The declines are because the Environmental Protection Agency is using more-realistic conditions to estimate the mileage cars and trucks will get." USA Today adds, "Fuel-saving gasoline electric hybrids will see the biggest drops in the mileage numbers posted on their window stickers — as much as 30% worse in city driving, 20% worse on the highway, the EPA said after issuing new testing procedures." The new tests do not affect calculations for CAFÉ, which "is overseen by the Department of Transportation, not by EPA."

The New York Times (12/12, Wald, 1.16M) says the EPA "rewrote one of the great fictions of American life on Monday by changing the formula for calculating miles-per-gallon numbers on the window stickers of new cars, to take account of higher speeds, more aggressive driving, more air-conditioning use and other factors not in the old system." Congress "ordered the change 18 months ago because of widespread dissatisfaction with the accuracy of the old numbers."

The AP (12/12, Thomas) says, "Highly fuel-efficient vehicles are expected to see the largest slide, with ratings for city driving dropping by as much as 30 percent and highway driving estimates falling 25 percent from current levels." The "changes respond to consumer complaints that fuel economy estimates are frequently less than advertised."

LATimes Says Administration Politicizing Science At EPA. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K) says in an editorial, "The Environmental Protection Agency has been rightly criticized under the Bush administration for repeatedly allowing political appointees to run roughshod over scientists, ignoring their findings and crafting regulations that please industry but fail to protect the public. Now the agency is making the practice official." Under a "new policy announced last week, scientists will be shuffled to the margins when the agency resets its all-important air-quality standards. Up to now, the process of drawing up new standards began with two sets of scientists — EPA staffers and an independent panel — conducting reviews of how pollution affects public health, then making recommendations to agency managers. Now the managers, who are usually political appointees, will work with staff scientists from the start, and the first review paper will be about policy, not science." Normally, the Administration "has broad leeway to interpret law into regulations. But when it changes the process to subvert the law's protective intent, Congress should reluctantly step in to spell out the obvious: Environmental policy is, first and foremost, about science."

DOJ_NMG_0105404

FWS Pulls Bison Range Management Agreement With Tribes. The Missoula (MT) Missoulian (12/12, Backus) reports, "The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service officially pulled its controversial agreement with the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes for shared management of the National Bison Range on Monday, saying the tribes have failed to live up to their responsibilities and have created an unacceptable workplace environment." The Missoulian continues, "Tribal officials said the announcement was unexpected and denied the allegations contained in FWS Regional Director Mitch King's letter. … 'It's taken us off guard. We were in the middle of something and trying to make it work,' said CSKT Tribal Council Chairman James Steele Jr." The Missoulian adds, "King's letter said the agency was terminating negotiations for future annual funding agreements. … The letter ordered the tribes to immediately stop performing any activities at the Bison Range, return all FWS equipment, and withdraw all CSKT employees, contractors and volunteers from the refuge by the end of the workday Tuesday." The Missoulian notes, "The decision marked the end of months of negotiations between the tribes and the Fish and Wildlife Service over future management of the National Bison Range. … The two entered into an agreement in 2004 that split management duties beginning in 2006. King's letter said the FWS wanted to continue that agreement into 2007 with some minor revisions, but the tribes argued for more management control. … After the 2006 agreement expired Sept. 30, the FWS agreed to extend it while negotiations continued. … The tribes sought a phased takeover of the refuge, which sits in the heart of the Flathead Indian Reservation, under provisions of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act. The legislation allows tribes to apply to manage certain federal public lands where they can show a cultural, historical or geographic connection."

US Joins Chippewa Tribe In Land Suit Against Michigan. The AP (12/12) reports from Bay City, MI, "The U.S. Justice Department has joined a lawsuit filed by the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe against the state that seeks sovereignty over parts of central Michigan's Isabella County, based on treaties from 1855 and 1864." The AP continues, "Court documents show the federal government joined the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Bay City as an additional plaintiff on Nov. 29, the Morning Sun of Mount Pleasant reported Monday. … The tribe sued in 2005, asking a federal judge to declare that all or part of seven townships in Isabella County are Indian country as defined by federal law." The AP adds, "Earlier this year, the tribe amended its complaint to ask for an injunction to bar the governor, attorney general and state treasurer from exerting criminal or civil jurisdiction over the tribe or its members "in a manner not allowed in Indian country." … In the filing, Assistant U.S. Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge noted that the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction to prosecute major crimes committed on the reservation, and has other relationships with the tribe." The AP notes, "In response, Michigan Assistant Attorney General Todd Adams said the predecessors to the Saginaw Chippewas gave up all their land in a series of treaties, ending with the 1836 Treaty of Saginaw. … He said the 1855 and 1864 treaties 'merely provided a designated area from which they could choose land like any other individual citizen of Michigan and the United States pursuant to United States law.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alleged Mexican Drug Cartel Leader May Face Federal Death Penalty. The San Diego Union-Tribune (12/12, Soto) reports, "New charges are expected to be filed this week that could lead to the death penalty against the man prosecutors say is the leader of the Arellano Félix Mexican drug cartel." The Union-Tribune continues, "The charges against Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, who was captured at sea in August, will accuse him of additional criminal activity over the past three years, prosecutors said. … Their comments came during a brief hearing before San Diego federal judge Larry Alan Burns set a May 15 trial date for Arellano, though prosecutors and defense lawyers said they didn't think they could be ready by then. … 'This is far too soon to be going to trial,' said defense lawyer Mark Adams." The Union-Tribune adds, "Arellano is accused of racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering in a decades-long conspiracy that prosecutors say moved tons of drugs into the United States and that resulted in numerous killings on both sides of the border. … The charges, originally filed in 1997, were last updated in 2003. The evidence includes tens of thousands of pages of case files and more than 550,000 intercepted radio transmissions. … Burns said he would consider rescheduling the trial once the new indictment is unsealed but only under extraordinary circumstances. He also suggested that the case be split into two parts so some of it could go to trial quickly." The Union-Tribune notes, "The new indictment would be the formal start of a death-penalty process that typically takes about four months and leads to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announcing whether prosecutors will seek a defendant's execution. … Authorities say the new indictment also will include charges against another man, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who was captured aboard Arellano's fishing boat by the U.S. Coast Guard off Baja California Sur. He is accused of being a member of the cartel."

DOJ_NMG_0105405

DEA Agent Says Mexican Drug Cartels Bringing More Potent Meth Into Tennessee. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (12/12, Satterfield) reports there are fewer makeshift meth labs in East Tennessee. However, Mexican drug cartels "have stepped in to fill the void with an even more potent version of the addictive drug. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Michael Templeton offered that assessment of the state of the meth scourge on Monday during testimony against Richard 'Dairy Man' Milburn." Milburn "is the lone defendant left standing in a massive marijuana and methamphetamine case involving more than 13 suspects, some eight tons of drugs, tractor-trailers, a dairy farm, horseback-riding buddies and Rubbermaid containers stuffed with cash. … The trial continues today."

Nine Plead Guilty To Roles In Drug-Trafficking Organization. The West Fargo Pioneer (12/11) reported nine Minnesota and North Dakota defendants "pleaded guilty for their participation in a drug-trafficking enterprise. … Assistant United States Attorney Chris Myers said this organization was involved in the distribution of more than 50 kilograms (100 lbs.) of cocaine, 10 kilograms (20 lbs.) of methamphetamine and nearly a ton (200 lbs.) of marijuana. The drugs were transported from the Laredo, Texas, area to the Fargo-Moorhead and Grafton area." The Pioneer notes the DEA's involvement in the investigation.

Personal Trainer In Maryland Accused Of Importing Illicit Muscle Enhancers. The AP (12/11) reported federal authorities "say a personal trainer at a Glen Burnie fitness club imported thousands of vials and tablets of illicit muscle enhancers from overseas and sold them throughout the Baltimore region and on the Internet. Michael Schlanger, 47, of Catonsville, was indicted in federal court in September on conspiracy to distribute to distribute anabolic steroids." Court documents "allege Schlanger, an employee at Bally Total Fitness in Glen Burnie, imported tens of thousands of vials and tablets of the muscle-building drugs through the mail for resale. The conspiracy came to light in July when customs agents at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York intercepted packages of steroids addressed to 'County Crafts.' One package was from China, another was from Great Britain."

DEA Agent Says Mexican Drug Cartels Bringing More Potent Meth Into Tennessee. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (12/12, Satterfield) reports there are fewer makeshift meth labs in East Tennessee. However, Mexican drug cartels "have stepped in to fill the void with an even more potent version of the addictive drug. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Michael Templeton offered that assessment of the state of the meth scourge on Monday during testimony against Richard 'Dairy Man' Milburn." Milburn "is the lone defendant left standing in a massive marijuana and methamphetamine case involving more than 13 suspects, some eight tons of drugs, tractor-trailers, a dairy farm, horseback-riding buddies and Rubbermaid containers stuffed with cash. … The trial continues today."

Mexico's New President Takes Action Against Drug Gangs. The AP (12/12) reports Mexico's new government "announced Monday that it was sending more than 6,500 soldiers, marines and federal police to the western state of Michoacan to crack down on a wave of execution-style killings and beheadings that have left hundreds dead. The operation is the first major offensive against drug gangs by President Felipe Calderon, who was sworn in on Dec. 1 after narrowly winning election on a law-and-order platform. … Federal investigators say the violence in Michoacan, Calderon's home state, stems from a turf war between a local gang called Los Valencia and the northern Mexico Gulf cartel, whose bloody enforcers are known as the Zetas, a group of ex-Mexican army operatives turned hit men." Investigators "say about half of Michoacan's more than 500 killings this year are linked to the turf war."

DOJ_NMG_0105406

The Washington Post (12/12, A23, Roig-Franzia) reports more than 5,000 Mexican soldiers and federal police officers "swept into the troubled state of Michoacan on Monday hoping to quell a long, barbaric war between rival drug cartels. … Federal forces, backed by dozens of military aircraft, arrested at least 13 alleged drug traffickers in the first hours of the operation and discovered more than 1,000 marijuana plants." Officials "have been under increasing pressure from the United States to contain cartels whose influence stretches across the border." Mexican forces also "are investigating whether Oaxacan police officers may be responsible for the killings of more than a dozen protesters and Brad Will, an American freelance journalist and activist."

ATF Cannot Trace Gun In Fatal New York Shooting. The New York Journal News (12/12, Golding) reports from New Castle, NY, "Federal authorities were unable to trace a handgun found near the reported scene of an unsolved roadside shooting that killed a neighbor of Bill and Hillary Clinton's." The News continues, "Jim Needles of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms said there was no serial number on the weapon, which meant it was probably manufactured before 1968, when gun makers began marking their products with identifying numbers. .. .Needles, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF's New York Field Division, said U.S. Justice Department regulations prohibited him from releasing any details about the handgun, although he said that because of its age it was most likely a revolver." The News adds, "State police found the gun while searching Echo Lake after the Nov. 18 shootings of Carlos and Peggy Perez-Olivo of Chappqua, who live three doors away from the Clintons' home. … Peggy Perez-Olivo, an elementary teacher's assistant, was shot in the head and died two days later. Carlos Perez-Olivo, a disbarred criminal defense lawyer, was shot in the side but survived."

Former Mayor Of Missouri Town Faces Federal Arson Charge. The AP (12/12) reports from St. Louis, "The former mayor of Kirksville (MO) has been indicted on federal arson charges for a fire that damaged a restaurant and bar she owned in the northeast Missouri town, U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said Monday." The AP continues, "Deborah Masten, 52, could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted. She did not have a listed telephone number. … Masten and her husband, Steve, owned Too Talls Two Eatery and Spirits when the fire broke out early New Year's Day 2005. The Missouri State Highway Patrol and state fire marshal's office determined the blaze was suspicious, prompting an investigation by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. … 'Despite the sadness of having to announce an indictment against a former public official, ATF is pleased to have been able to lend its investigative expertise with arson to this case,' ATF special agent Michael Boxler said." The AP adds, "The fire was reported at 2:23 a.m. Jan. 1, 2005. Investigators announced a few weeks later it was intentionally set. The Kirksville Daily Express reported that investigators found a pile of trash out of place, and an accelerant had been used. The Mastens offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the person responsible for the fire. … But on March 3, 2005, ATF investigators named Deborah Masten as the suspect in the fire, the Daily Express reported. She maintained her innocence."

Marshals Nab Fugitive At Philadelphia Library Computer. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/12, Lipka) reports, "The man in the Donovan McNabb jersey got to the Philadelphia Free Library's main branch at 9 a.m., as usual, and was seated at a public computer terminal, tapping away at his MySpace.com page, as usual. … So he did not notice that 15 armed officers were quietly converging on him." The Inquirer continues, "That, authorities say, is how a fugitive wanted in Georgia and Massachusetts was captured last Thursday without a fight. They say they figured out that he had been going to the library regularly to update his MySpace page. … Darren Bates, 35, was using one of the library's computers about 9:15 a.m. Thursday when 15 plainclothes members of a fugitive task force converged on him as other patrons tapped away on nearby keyboards, officials said yesterday. … 'He was busy on the computer and we were able to walk right up to him from several directions without him seeing us,' said John Patrignani, supervisory deputy of the U.S. Marshals Service Violent Crimes Fugitive Task Force. 'He was very much surprised.'" The Inquirer adds,

DOJ_NMG_0105407

"Bates, who was wearing a McNabb jersey, was taken into custody without incident, Patrignani said. He was being held yesterday in a city jail cell pending extradition to Georgia. … Patrignani said task force members in Massachusetts had determined Bates was going to the Central Library at 1901 Vine St. about the same time every day - when the library opened at 9."

Arlington, VA, Awarded DOJ Grant To Fight Gang Activity. The Arlington (VA) Connection (12/11, Rosen) reports, "The Justice Department has given a $172,000 grant to three Arlington nonprofit organizations to continue funding a series of programs that aim to keep students out of gangs." The Connection continues, "The initiatives — administered by the Hispanic Committe of Virginia and run by Barrios Unidos and the Greenbrier Learning Center — provide leadership training, mentoring services and tutoring to mostly Latino middle and high school students. Up to 400 Arlington teenagers are expected to participate in at least one of the programs this school year." The Connection adds, "Providing students with a plethora of after-school activities and positive role models is the best way to ensure they will not fall prey to the lure of gang life, said U.S. Rep. Jim Moran, who helped secure the grant from the Justice Department. … These programs 'are a great way to help our children avoid the pitfalls of violence and gang activity, and attain the American dream of prosperity and a life free of fear,' Moran said during a Dec. 4 press conference in the Arlington County Board room. … The Greenbrier Learning Center will use the federal funding to continue to operate its after-school tutoring sessions at Kenmore Middle School. Every weekday counselors help students who are having trouble at school, or have been identified as vulnerable to joining a gang, complete their homework assignments."

TAX:

Former Ohio Major Charged With Tax, Mail Fraud. The Akron Beacon Journal (12/12, Armon, 125K) reports, "The former mayor of Ravenna was charged in federal court Monday with tax and mail fraud for allegedly concealing his role in running a local lawn care and snow removal business, authorities said. Paul Jones, who abruptly resigned in midterm a year ago and moved to Florida, is accused of not disclosing the family-owned business in state ethics forms and filing false tax returns." Ravenna City Councilman Joseph Bica praised the indictment and "said he hopes the investigation continues." The Beacon Journal notes, "FBI spokesman Scott Wilson declined to talk about the case, including when or how it began. … 'We continue to focus on this case closely right now,' Wilson said when asked if the probe was continuing. 'We'll take a look at any other transactions while (Jones) was mayor in the city of Ravenna.'"

DOJ Seeks To Ban California Accountant's Tax Scheme. The North Platte (NE) Bulletin (12/5, Graham) reports, "The alleged tax fraud scheme of a California accountant and numerous North Platte doctors and other medical personnel is unraveling with the latest court filing." The Bulletin continues, "U.S. Attorney Jacqueline Brown is seeking an immediate injunction against Lowell Baisden to prevent him from promoting an unlawful tax avoidance scheme and from preparing federal tax returns for others. … Brown filed the motion for an injunction in U.S. District Court in California Dec. 1." The Bulletin adds, "The U.S. Attorney's office and the IRS claim that Baisden set up dummy corporations in Nevada and Wyoming for doctors and other professionals in Nebraska and California. … Baisden's customers were the doctors and other professionals. … Baisden funneled his customer's personal income through the corporation to allegedly hide it from tax liability. The sham corporations then paid each customer a small salary and the rest of their living expenses through corporate accounts. … Baisden's customers paid him a monthly fee for the various money laundering transactions and he prepared both their corporate and individual tax returns." The Bulletin notes, "The scheme, which is now being investigated by the Justice Department and the IRS, has allegedly been going on for at least seven years, since 1999, and could involve as many as eight North Platte doctors, according to court records."

IRS Paid At Least $200 Million In Bogus Refunds Due To Computer Failure. ABC World News (12/11, story 8, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on what one "what one report called one of the most embarrassing episodes in the recent history of the Internal Revenue Service. First, the IRS paid hundreds of millions of dollars in refunds to those who did not deserve them. And then, the agency found, they cannot get the money back. And it's 'Your Money.'" ABC (Cochran) added, "At the Internal Revenue Service there are a lot of red faces after they admitted that they paid out $200 million in bogus refunds." Sen. Charles Grassley: "They royally screwed up. And it's going to cost the honest taxpayer a lot of money." Cochran: "Treasury investigators say the amount lost is actually more than $300 million." Michael Phillips, Deputy Inspector General, Treasury Department: "It was sort of the worst-case scenario. What could go wrong did go wrong. And yes, some money is lost and cannot be regained." Cochran: "All because the IRS paid $20 million for a new computer system that failed, big-time." Peter Sepp, National Taxpayers Union: "The IRS and computers mix like oil and water. You can put them together, but eventually, everything falls apart." Cochran: "The IRS hoped the new computers would easily spot tax frauds. People, for example, who claim suspiciously high deductions for things like gifts to charity and medical expenses. But last year the company developing the new system warned the IRS, it might not be ready come tax season. And sure enough, it wasn't. And to make matters worse, the IRS had shut down its backup system."

DOJ_NMG_0105408

Federal Judges Get Tax Break On Stocks Sold Because Of Conflicts. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A6, 2.04M) reports Federal judges "received a long-sought break when Congress extended to them the same exemption from capital-gains taxes that executive-branch officials receive when selling stock for conflict-of-interest reasons." Under ethics rules, judges "are disqualified from ruling in matters where they have a financial interest, such as owning stock in a company that is party to a lawsuit. The issue typically comes up in complex litigation, when, months or years into a case, a judge could suddenly find himself or herself conflicted because of the late joining of a party or a merger of a party into a company where he or she owns shares." That has "forced some judges either to step aside from a case or sell stock that potentially could bring a big capital- gains-tax bill." But Congress "turned a deaf ear to the judges' request for a pay raise."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Plan Streamlined Omnibus Spending Bill. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A2, Rogers, 2.04M) reports the "new Democratic majority in Congress wants to keep the government operating under a streamlined funding resolution for the rest of the fiscal year and not attempt to complete the individual spending bills abandoned by the outgoing Republican leadership." Democrats, "fearing a political trap…want to avoid becoming bogged down and sacrificing their own agenda by devoting weeks to passing an omnibus measure combining the unfinished bills. The path outlined now offers a speedier alternative, but never in modern memory has it been attempted on such a large scale." The announcement "was made last night by the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees," Rep. David Obey and Sen. Robert Byrd, " who also said they would impose a moratorium on new congressional earmarks, targeted appropriations for special projects in members' home districts. None would be part of the proposed funding resolution, killing hundreds that are pending in the unfinished spending bills." House and Senate Democratic leaders "gave their endorsement, but the White House, which could be the big loser, is clearly uncomfortable."

The Hill (12/12, Schor) reports Byrd and Obey "issued a statement yesterday laying blame at the feet of departing GOP leaders for failing to pass nine of the 11 fiscal year 2007 appropriations bills, a criticism leveled by several Republicans in the waning days of the lame-duck session." Democrats "faced an already crowded winter schedule, headlined by the president's budget in early February and a hefty war supplemental expected to approach $150 billion for the military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, that made even an omnibus nearly impossible to achieve on time. Producing a continuing resolution scrubbed of earmarks is likely to present its own partisan pitfalls for the new leadership, as members on both sides of the aisle grapple with district projects planned for but no longer paid for."

The Washington Post (12/12, A3, Murray, Weisman, 690K) reports Democratic leaders "declared a temporary moratorium on special-interest provisions known as earmarks as they attempt to cope with a budget crisis left by the outgoing Republican-led 109th Congress." The "unfinished bills account for about $463 billion in annual spending and include just about every domestic program other than defense and homeland security. The announcement appears to be a victory for conservative budget reformers, such as Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Tom Price (R-Ga.), who circulated a petition last week calling for a resolution that would extend funding through the rest of the year, but without earmarks." That petition, "however, called for all domestic programs to be funded at the lowest levels called for in either the House or Senate versions." In contrast, Obey and Byrd "indicated that they would seek adjustments in spending levels to satisfy Democrats and moderate Republicans who were upset by the austere funding bills passed by the House Appropriations Committee. In particular, the measure to fund labor, health and education programs fell billions of dollars short of the Senate-approved levels, and the levels that even many House Republicans said were acceptable."

DOJ_NMG_0105409

The New York Times (12/12, Hulse, 1.16M) reports the "unfinished bills loomed as a potential major distraction for Democrats as they prepare to take power in January, a fact not lost on the Republicans who chose not to try to complete the work." Rep. Obey and Sen. Byrd "made clear that they would rather concentrate on the first budget under their party's leadership while giving close scrutiny to the president's own spending plan and his request for war spending."

House Democrats To Push For Government-Negotiated Drug Prices. The AP (12/12, Werner) reports Rep. Pete Stark said House Democrats will "take the middle ground on the Medicare drug benefit, pushing for government-negotiated prices but stopping short of creating a federal plan to compete with private insurers." Stark said "a government-run plan would save money but is too ambitious for immediate action." Stark, the "liberal in line to chair the House Ways and Means Committee's health subcommittee," said, "That might draw a veto and then get us accused — which I don't mind, but most of my colleagues do — of price-setting and all that. ... There's a hesitancy to seem too radical." The AP adds incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has included Medicare drug negotiation in her agenda for the party's first 100 legislative hours, but she hasn't offered many details."

Congress Links Doctors' Medicare Pay, Performance. The New York Times (12/12, Pear, 1.16M) reports that after "years of trying to rein in the runaway cost of the Medicare program, Congress has decided to use a carrot instead of a stick to change doctors' behavior." Doctors had been "fearing a pay cut under Medicare, the health care program for 43 million elderly and disabled, but Congress instead has offered doctors a small bonus with big strings attached. To get the money, doctors will have to report how often they provide quality care, as defined by the government." Lawmakers "approved the change as one of their final acts before adjourning early Saturday morning, and proponents said it would improve the quality of medical care. But the plan immediately raised concerns among some doctors and lawmakers who specialize in health issues." The critics "said they worried that it could be a step toward cookbook medicine and could erode the professional autonomy of doctors." Doctors had "been facing a 5 percent cut in Medicare payments in 2007," but the now "can qualify for a 1.5 percent bonus in the second half of 2007 if they report data on the quality of their care, using measures specified by the government."

Congress Raises Income Limit On DC Voucher Program. The Washington Post (12/12, B4, Haynes, 690K) reports, "Congress has increased the income guidelines for" students first "enrolled in the District's federally funded school voucher program" in 2004-2005 from "200 to 300 percent of the federal poverty line" in "an effort aimed at preventing hundreds of students from being forced out of the program before it is evaluated." It is estimated that "more than 300" of the 1,800 enrolled "would have been forced out of the program under the original income guidelines."

Pelosi Pledges Additional Protection For House Pages. The AP (12/12, Abrams) reports incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "said Monday she will take legislative steps to better protect House pages after the scandal involving a congressman sending salacious e-mails to former male pages." Pelosi "said legislation would be introduced early in the new Congress to increase oversight of the page program, require regular meetings of the page board and add a parent of a current and a former page on that board."

Report Suggests Hastert Was Told Of Questionable Foley Emails. The Hill (12/12, Cusack) reports the House ethics committee "report on the page scandal, released on Friday, did not come to any definitive conclusions on whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was informed of the questionable e-mails that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to pages." But lawmakers "on the ethics committee suggested that they believe Hastert was told about them. Reps. John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) testified that they informed the Speaker of the e-mails, but Hastert said he has no recollection of those conversations."

Ethics Scandals Erode Regard For Members Of Congress. USA Today (12/12, Koch, 2.27M) reports only "15% of 1,009 adults in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday gave US senators high or very high marks for honesty and ethical standards. Only 14% did so for U.S. representatives." Members of both houses "are down from 25% in 2001, when members of Congress got their best score since the survey began in 1976." Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, said, "Congressmen can take heart. They're a few points higher than car salesmen."

DOJ_NMG_0105410

Reports Show Americans Don't Trust Government To Spend Funds Wisely. USA Today (12/12, 10A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "Americans are open to tax increases and benefit cuts to preserve Social Security and Medicare, but they don't trust the government to spend their money wisely, two reports being released today show." The reports "contend that Americans would consider such measures as scaling back end-of-life care and extending the retirement age as ways to avoid bankrupting the Social Security and Medicare systems. Their mistrust of government is so deep, however, that political leaders must convince them their money won't be wasted." Stuart Butler of the Heritage Foundation said, "They really are very skeptical about what happens when you send money to Washington. They think that money is going to be stolen by somebody to build a bridge somewhere." USA adds those "are the major findings of the reports by Public Agenda and Viewpoint Learning. Those two public policy groups, left- and right-leaning think tanks and groups favoring deficit reduction have spent the past year working to educate the public and seek feedback about the nation's fiscal condition."

House Panel Says McDermott Violated Ethics Standards. The AP (12/12, Daly) reports the House ethics committee said Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., "violated ethics standards by giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving Republican leaders a decade ago." McDermott, who "at the time was the panel's senior Democrat, failed to meet his obligations as a committee leader, said a report released two days after Congress adjourned for the year. The panel took no action other than the report." The ethics complaint "stems from a tape recording made by a Florida couple, who gave it to McDermott in January 1997. The tape recorded then-Speaker Gingrich, R-Ga., in a December 1996 conference call with GOP leaders regarding a separate ethics investigation of Gingrich." McDermott "leaked the tape to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution and The New York Times, which published stories on the case in January 1997." A "three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled against McDermott in a related civil case in March. The 2-1 opinion upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott had violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, who was heard on the 1996 call. Boehner, then a Gingrich lieutenant, is now House majority leader." The "full nine-member appeals court vacated the three-judge ruling this spring and heard new arguments in the case in October. A ruling is expected next year."

The Hill (12/12, Crabtree) reports the House ethics committee found that Rep. McDermott's "1997 leaking of a secretly taped phone call to the media" was "'inconsistent with the spirit of the applicable [House] rules.' The panel, however, did not punish McDermott."

California Republican Said To Mix Public Actions, Private Business. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Heisel, 850K) reports that in 2000, Republican Rep. Gary Miller "implored Monrovia City Council members to purchase 165 acres he owned in the foothills and turn the land into a wilderness preserve. Earlier that day, Miller asked one of his staff members to find a way to place one of the councilmen -- a pawnshop owner with no parks experience -- on the National Park System Advisory Board. The aide was told to 'make it a priority.'" But even after "staff members warned him that trying to secure the park board seat for the councilman could appear to be a bribe attempt, Miller continued to push for the councilman's appointment, according to internal memos, interviews with former Miller staff members and official correspondence reviewed by the Los Angeles Times." The move "was one of many that Miller has made over the years in which he brought his congressional muscle to bear on personal and private business matters, according to the staffers and correspondence from Miller's office -- hand-written notes, letters on Miller's congressional letterhead and e-mails."

Mollahan Under Investigation For Real Estate Deal. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Sylvester) reported, "[W]we saw former Congressman Bob Ney and former congressman Duke Cunningham -- both lawmakers are now disgraced and out of office. But it's not just Republicans. Now there are allegations of wrongdoing involving a Democrat from West Virginia." CNN reported that WV1 Alan Mollohan (D) and a staffer, Laura Kuhms, "bought real estate investments along the Carolina coast.." Then, Mollohan "tapped the same congressional aide to head up one of five nonprofit organizations he set up in his West Virginia district. In the last five years, Mollohan, who sits on the Appropriations Committee, helped channel more than $150 million in taxpayer money to keep these economic development nonprofits thriving. The National Legal and Policy Center filed a 500-page complaint with the Justice Department this year detailing Mollohan's business arrangements. But in a strange twist, Mollohan may end up chairing the very subcommittee that has jurisdiction over the Justice Department's budget." CNN added, "A spokesman for Mollohan said, 'The allegations and suggestions of wrongdoing made by the NLPC are utterly false,' and added that the congressman made his fortune from an inheritance that he reinvested in a booming real estate market."

DOJ_NMG_0105411

House Democratic Leaders May Assign Jefferson To Lesser Committee. The Washington Post (12/12, A6, Babington, Lengel, 690K) reports House Democratic leaders, "who have vowed to run a more ethical Congress, are struggling with how to respond to the reelection of Rep. William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat whose Washington home freezer once held $90,000 in alleged bribe money." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "stripped Jefferson of his seat on the influential Ways and Means Committee in June and has hinted that she may place him on no committee when the 110th Congress convenes next month. But a source close to Pelosi said yesterday that she is more likely to place him on a lower-profile committee and hope the controversy dies down." The source "familiar with Pelosi's thinking said that the incoming speaker wants to distance herself and her caucus from Jefferson and legal problems but that she thinks she cannot ignore that voters returned him to office when details of the investigation were well known." Sources "familiar with the probe said Jefferson will be indicted, probably in the first half of 2007. The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case, said investigators have been looking at about a dozen business deals in the United States and Africa in which Jefferson allegedly used his official position for financial gain."

CBC To Press For Jefferson's Reinstatement To Ways And Means. The Hill (12/12, Bolton) reports the Congressional Black Caucus is "planning to press Democratic leaders to reinstate Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) to the Ways and Means Committee, raising the thorny question of how leaders will handle the fate of Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), who has also come under ethical scrutiny." If Pelosi "and fellow leaders decide to keep Jefferson off Ways and Means, they could open themselves to charges of following a double standard by allowing Mollohan to become chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee, as he is now poised to do." Top Democrats are "dealing with questions regarding what to do about Jefferson and Mollohan at the same time that they must decide how to reward lawmakers who have raised tens of thousands of dollars for the party but find themselves with less seniority than stingier colleagues on subcommittees."

Portman Will Be Key White House Link To Congressional Democrats. The Washington Post (12/12, A25, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Hired in the spring of 2006 to direct the Office of Management and Budget," former Rep. Rob Portman "was hailed as a man who could improve ties between a sometimes imperial president and an increasingly cranky Congress, then in Republican hands. On Nov. 7, his job changed dramatically. Now the six-term congressman from Ohio has to sell the fiscal policies of a weakened and unpopular president to a bunch of bitter and distrustful Democrats." The Post adds that in "many ways, Bush could not have picked a better person for the job. The boyish and earnest Portman seems to be as widely admired among his former Democratic colleagues as he is by Republicans." House Democrats "describe him as a reasonable guy, a committed problem-solver and an honest broker. After six years of presidential neglect, Democrats say Portman is one of the few members of the administration who has established a record of trust with the newly empowered Democratic Party." But "just because Democrats return Portman's phone calls does not mean they are ready to help him tame the projected growth of Social Security and federal health-care programs, which serve millions of Americans and threaten to consume a sharply escalating share of the nation's economic output as the population ages."

Reid Seen As Tenacious Opponent For Bush, GOP. USA Today (12/12, Welch, 2.27M) reports Sen. Harry Reid "takes over as majority leader in January and becomes the man" President Bush "will have to deal with if he hopes to win legislation in his remaining two years in office. The Republicans' 49-seat minority leaves them with power to block Democratic initiatives, but his majority will allow Reid to control what issues the Senate considers — and determine whether Bush's proposals and nominations even get an airing." In Reid, "Bush and his party face an opposition leader who has earned a reputation for toughness." Reid "sometimes seems an oddity, a quiet, soft-spoken Mormon who represents gambling and a city, Las Vegas, that has become a world-class destination by marketing sin. He doesn't gamble, he says." In the "aftermath of last month's elections, which propelled Reid into the majority, Bush told Reid he wanted to work together." Reid said, "I said, 'Mr. President, that's what you said two years ago. I hope it works out better.'" USA adds Reid "hasn't talked with Bush since their White House meeting in early November, but he is encouraged by contacts from Bush's top aides." Reid said, "The president has to realize he has 25% of his presidency left. That's it. The first 75% has been squandered. And I would hope he realizes, as I do, that if he's getting anything accomplished he has to work with me. If I'm getting anything done, I have to work with him."

DOJ_NMG_0105412

Supreme Court Library Closed For Renovations. USA Today (12/12, Biskupic) reports, "For the past 18 months, the elaborate oak-paneled library at the (US Supreme Court) has been closed to the public. It's a casualty of a protracted, $122 million overall modernization project at the marble-columned building across the street from the U.S. Capitol. … Most of the library's 600,000 volumes are being stored in offices five blocks away." USA continues," The library, with its looming arches, intricate carvings and glass chandeliers, was scheduled to reopen to the public this fall. However, construction delays have led the court to put off its reopening until at least 2008. … Lawyers who are members of the Supreme Court bar still can work in the magnificent reading room, but their access to the volumes comes only through a twice-daily courier service to the library's temporary storage facility at a nearby office building named after the late Justice Thurgood Marshall. … 'We regret any inconvenience to the public,' court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg says, 'but when the library reopens, researchers will find better working facilities and improved access to the records and briefs.'" USA adds, "The overall renovation project — which included replacing the original electrical and mechanical systems in the 71-year-old building — initially was projected for completion in summer 2008. The target date now is December 2009, Arberg says. … The delays have been caused by a series of unforeseen situations, she says." USA notes, "All the commotion, however, has created an unusual sense of disorder at the normally dignified structure that houses the nation's highest court. The nine justices have been able to stay in their chambers, but news reporters and clerks and other administrative personnel have been uprooted from their offices by the construction. They are working in trailers. … In a grand, Corinthian-style building rife with architectural detail, the library stands out. Elaborate woodcarvings fill every nook and cranny, reflecting traits such as wisdom and depicting ancient lawgivers such as Justinian. … 'It's calming, yet inspiring,' says Washington lawyer Seth Waxman, a former U.S. solicitor general, who says he has found refuge in the library for more than 20 years. 'I personally find that working there helps give me a sense of the majesty … of judicial review.'"

State Department Seeks To Overhaul Foreign Service Exam. The Washington Post (12/12, A1, Williamson, 690K) reports, "In a proposed overhaul of its hiring process slated for next year and to be announced to employees in coming days, the State Department would weigh resumes, references and intangibles such as 'team-building skills' in choosing who represents the United States abroad, according to three people involved in the process." The written test would "survive, but in a shortened form that would not be treated as the key first hurdle it has been for more than 70 years." State Department Director General George M. Staples said the goal of the new "Total Candidate" approach -- which "has the support of Secretary…Rice" -- is to 'improve our ability to find the best...compete more effectively with the private sector to attract the best, and…make our process faster in hiring the best," according to a draft cable to employees. However, "some career officers and foreign policy types worry that the new hiring process could dumb down or politicize the Foreign Service, whose reputation for selectivity helps make it one of government's most desirable career paths." According to the Post, the revamp is "slated for next year, if the department secures the money needed to pursue it."

New SNL Cast Member Portrays Bush. The New York Times (12/12, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports Washington is "watching closely to see whether President Bush will change much when he faces a new, Democratic Congress. But his character on 'Saturday Night Live' already has." Previously played "by Will Forte, Mr. Bush is now being played by Jason Sudeikis. Lorne Michaels, the NBC television show's executive producer, said that where Mr. Forte played Mr. Bush as whiny and beleaguered, Mr. Sudeikis, below, is playing him as having 'absolute confidence and buoyancy.' But in a sign that the world is starting to look past Mr. Bush's tenure, Mr. Michaels said he was freeing up Mr. Forte to play a new political role eventually: that of one of the 2008 contenders."

DOJ_NMG_0105413

NYTimes Says Congress Should Give FDA More Funding For Produce Inspection. The New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The linkage is troubling. There are sharp cuts in the budget and staff for the federal agency charged with keeping the nation's supply of fresh produce safe — and soon we are faced with repeated cases of food poisoning from vegetables and fruits." The outbreaks of "bacterial poisoning from fresh produce…raise doubts about the Food and Drug Administration's ability to inspect and monitor conditions on the nation's farms and in the plants that package and process their produce." At "a minimum, Congress needs to provide the F.D.A. with more money and more inspectors to monitor the safety of fresh produce all the way from field to consumer."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Expected To Keep Rates Steady. The Financial Times (12/12, Guha) reports, "With the Federal Reserve almost certain to keep interest rates on hold at 5.25 per cent at its policy meeting on Tuesday, attention will focus on whether its statement concedes any ground to the market's belief that the outlook for growth has deteriorated and interest rate cuts will ultimately have to follow. … While there are some signs that the level of mortgage applications and home sale turnover may be levelling out, high levels of unsold homes suggest that there remain downside risks to home construction and house prices." The economy "as a whole still seems to be in reasonable shape, with activity in the services sector buoyant and continued strong employment gains. Weakness in manufacturing may be no more than an inventory correction that will unwind early next year."

Survey Finds Worsening Job Picture In US. The Financial Times (12/12, Cameron) reports, "US employers are expected to tighten their hiring plans in key sectors, such as finance and durable goods, for the second consecutive quarter, according to the latest survey by Manpower, the world's largest temporary employment group. The quarterly review, out on Tuesday, reveals accelerated hiring plans in most of Europe and Asia, including the most buoyant expectations in Germany and Japan since the survey started and will add weight to hopes of a soft landing for the US -economy." Jeff Joerres, Manpower's chairman and chief executive, "said there had been a 'subtle downward shift' in the US in spite of two years of steady expansion that had seen about 150,000 staff added to payrolls a month."

Number Of Homes For Sale Decline In Top Metro Areas. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, D2, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "The number of homes listed for sale in 18 major US metropolitan areas at the end of November was down 4% from a month earlier, according to data compiled by ZipRealty Inc., a national real-estate brokerage firm in Emeryville, Calif." The decline is "an encouraging sign for home sellers. Prices have been falling in recent months in many areas, largely because of a glut of unsold homes, and are unlikely to rise again until inventories come down." The Journal adds, "Inventories of previously occupied homes typically decline modestly in November in most parts of the country, as the approach of the holidays prompts some sellers to take their homes off the market until the new year. During the past 20 years, national inventories have declined by an average of about 2% in November from October, according to Credit Suisse Group."

Stocks Up Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished on the upside. The Dow gained a just under 21 points [to close at 12,328.48]. NASDAQ was up 5 and a half points [to close at 2,442.86] on the day." USA Today (12/12, 5B, Krantz, 2.27M) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 3.20 points to 1413.04, extending its gains last week." The Wall Street Journal (12/12, C1, McKay, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

NYTimes Says "Income Inequality" Threatens US Economy. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) writes, "Conservative economists often argue that wage stagnation and income inequality are not as big a threat to Americans' standard of living as they've been made out to be. In their view, how much one buys -- rather than how much one makes -- is a better measure of economic well-being. … Why make a fuss over other grim economic statistics if everyone manages to keep buying things? Here's why. The assertion -- that the middle class has out-consumed the 'upper crust' during the Bush years -- is false, the result of rosy assumptions that turned out to be wrong. …. It would be nice if by some magic Americans could spend their way out of today's economic woes. But the gathering evidence shows that growing income inequality has fostered consumption inequality as well. It's time for policy makers to acknowledge that such inequality is an economic and social ill -- and to start finding cures."

DOJ_NMG_0105414

Plagiarism Case Against Novelist Examined.

In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18), UCLA law professor Eugene Volokh writes, "Two nurses, both aspiring novelists, helped tend British soldiers during World War II. Briony, the protagonist of Ian McEwan's award-winning novel 'Atonement,' is fictional. The late Lucilla Andrews is real: She became an author, pioneering romantic 'hospital fiction,' and also wrote a memoir of her war years. Therein lies the latest plagiarism scandalette to hit the news, sparked by an article in the British press. To be a credible character in a historical novel, Briony had to do the things wartime nurses did, and see the things they saw. It is no surprise that Mr. McEwan read Andrews's book when researching his own; and several passages from his book strongly resemble passages from her memoir. … Plagiarism? Legally actionable? Ethically reprehensible? Bad manners? Or good research, needed to produce accurate historical fiction?" Volokh continues, "Plagiarism is easy to condemn but often hard to define. This is partly because the legal rules differ sharply from the ethical ones, and the ethical rules in scholarship, journalism and fiction differ from each other. And it is partly because the rules for using the facts uncovered by writers of history -- whether memoirists, historians or contemporaneous journalists -- must be different from the rules for using the original phrases that the writers created." Volokh adds, "Novelists are similar to journalists, but they do have space at the end of the book to briefly acknowledge the historical works on which they rely, without distracting from the novel's flow. If you've relied substantially on another's work, acknowledging this is the kind thing to do. Omitting the acknowledgment probably isn't unethical; it's not a lie, or the denial of the credit needed for success in the original author's profession. But it isn't very nice. … Yet what about copying not just facts, but also another author's words, either literally or in a close paraphrase? Would a general acknowledgment at the end of the book be enough to justify this? Or is such copying impermissible, at least unless you expressly note it using quotation marks, or by writing 'as Lucilla Andrews said'? In academic work, the answer is simple: Quote the original, and insert a footnote at the place you quote it. But what about a novel?" Volokh concludes, "So where does this leave Mr. McEwan? Likely not guilty on any of the counts, if the account in the newspaper that first broke the story (the Nov. 26 Daily Mail) is thorough. Mr. McEwan borrowed facts, and those words that accurately described the facts. He is not guilty of copyright infringement, or of taking another's original expression without specific notation. And while he did rely on Andrews's autobiography, his acknowledgments page noted being 'indebted' to Andrews and her book. Any such acknowledgment could always be made more prominent; but it appears to have been prominent enough."

Recount Confirms Pryce Victory In OH15.

The AP (12/12, Smyth) reports the Ohio 15th CD race, which was "so close it triggered an automatic recount…finally wrapped up Monday with officials confirming Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce had won." Pryce "ended Election Night 1,055 votes ahead of Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy, but the difference was within a half-percentage point, which requires an automatic recount under Ohio law." The recount numbers, "released Monday, showed Pryce had gained 7 more votes, to win with 110,739 votes to 109,677 for Kilroy." The "close margin of victory was not lost on Pryce. She said that, while she was gratified to retain the seat, she got a clear message from her constituents." Pryce said, "There was a lot of disenchantment with government as it was. We all went through this election process. We'll take that message back."

Obama's New Hampshire Visit Continues To Make Waves.

Barack Obama's trip to New Hampshire over the weekend continued to reverberate on Monday, with each of the networks running full segments on the significance of the Illinois Senator's possible bid for the Democratic nomination in 2008. The phenomenon – labeled by some commentators as "Obama-mania" – also drew coverage in a variety of cable and print sources, and comparisons with another photogenic Democratic Senator and later President, John F. Kennedy. The commentary on and analysis of Obama's prospects also continued to draw largely favorable comparisons with those of Sen. Hillary Clinton's.

DOJ_NMG_0105415

NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 5, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Barack Obama is officially testing the water, as they say, and in doing so, he packed the house this weekend with citizens, with news media and the next thing we knew, one New Hampshire legislator said he hasn't seen anything like what happened there this weekend since John F. Kennedy. And all of this is forcing some other presidential hopefuls to change there strategy." NBC (Reid) added that "on his first trip to New Hampshire," Obama "was adored and mobbed. A phenomenon that insiders call Obama-mania." Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana "was also in New Hampshire this weekend but the national media barely noticed, too busy tracking Obama's every move. Analysts say even front-runner Hillary Clinton is feeling the Obama effect, accelerating the pace, though today she insists she's still undecided."

ABC World News (12/11, story 6, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For some time, many have thought Hillary Clinton to be a prohibitive favorite for the Democratic nomination. Then, came the prospect of a Barack Obama candidacy, a prospect that seemed ever more likely when the Illinois Senator traveled to New Hamphsire this weekend. It is high political drama in the making." ABC (Tapper) added, "Capping off his whirlwind tour of New Hampshire, Senator Barack Obama tonight will appear in the opening of ESPN's 'Monday Night Football.'" Sen. Barack Obama: "Tonight, I would like to put all the doubts to rest. I would like to announce to my hometown of Chicago and all of America that I am ready. For the Bears to go all the way, baby!" Tapper: "Obama's potential candidacy may affect Clinton more than anyone. A big reason for that -- she has such strong support among black voters who are key in Democratic primaries." Rep. Charles Rangel: "There is a sense of racial pride in having an African-American candidate. The same way, I assume, the Irish were overwhelmed when Jack Kennedy was a candidate."

The CBS Evening News (12/11, story 8, 2:55, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "Maybe the Democrats are just looking for a fresh face. Only two years ago, Obama was an Illinois state senator who had just won his first term in the US Senate. He's short on national security credentials, although some Democrats like that fact that he was against the war in Iraq early on. His newest message: The politics of inclusion." But "maybe most of all, Obama is not Hillary Clinton, whom some Democrats worry is just too much of a lightning rod to win the election."

Fox News Special Report (12/11, Hume) reported the "hoopla" surrounding Obama's recent visit to New Hampshire "has nearly overshadowed speculation about Hillary Clinton's plans." Fox News (Cameron) noted Clinton (D) "has kept her husband's political machine at a distance for six years , but this weekend reached out to the original leaders" of former President Clinton's "comeback kid" New Hampshire campaign in 1992." Meanwhile, Obama "brought Obamamania" to New Hampshire in an "unprecedented appearance" that "literally stopped traffic."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "So what's driving Obama-mania? It isn't a single set of issues such as the war or the economy. Rather, the attraction seems to be a mix of Obama's own compelling personal narrative and many voters' desire for a less caustic brand of politics." Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University, said, "It's the sense that you're in the presence of someone who is touched with the gift of grace." Baker adds Obama "exemplifies the hope that there's some way to triumph over the intense polarization of American politics."

Buchanan Says Obama Should Prepare For Scrutiny. On MSNBC's Tucker (12/11, Carlson), commentator Pat Buchanan said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "has virtually put himself into this race. And I hope he is prepared for what is coming, because Hillary has been vetted to a T. There is nothing more we can learn about her. We don't know anything about this guy."

Liasson Calls Obama Appearance "Extraordinary." On Fox News' Special Report (12/11, Hume), NPR contributor Mara Liasson, who was in New Hampshire during Obama's visit, said, "They sold 1,500 tickets and then had to open up another room so they could shoehorn 200 more people. So he was speaking to 2,200 people. You heard the Kennedyesque flourishes in the speeches, and that's how people -- oh, many people made the association. I haven't felt this since John F. Kennedy. People just went ga-ga over him. I mean, it was really extraordinary."

Obama Visit Shows Granite State Retains Clout In Race For White House. CQ Politics (12/12, Blinkhorn) reports, "The New Hampshire primary campaign appears undiminished as a rite of passage for presidential candidates, despite a breakthrough by political activists in other states who have long sought to water down the Granite State's influence as host of the first-in-the-nation primary. This was underscored Sunday, when" Obama "appeared as guest speaker at what amounted to a victory rally for the resurgent New Hampshire Democratic Party." Obama's "appearance raised the tally to at least 58 visits to New Hampshire by 13 official, exploring and thinking-about-it Democratic presidential candidates since June 2005."

DOJ_NMG_0105416

"Seismic Shift" Forecast If Obama Or Clinton Wins. Fox News' Big Story (12/11, Kennedy) reported, "Americans have elected 43 chief executives. … And not one has been a woman, or anything other than white. Historians agree, if Hillary or Barack's going to become the nation's top dog, it will be with a seismic shift."

Clinton Plans Announcement After New Year. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "said Monday she won't make a decision about running for president until after the first of the year." During a visit "to an aircraft maintenance facility at the former Griffiss Air Base, Clinton confirmed she is talking to people in New York and across the country about a possible run for president in 2008. It was the first time Clinton publicly confirmed what her aides and fellow Democrats have been saying about a possible presidential run." Clinton said, "I'm talking to people who have opinions about what our country needs to do going forward and whether or not I make any decisions, I can't really confront until after the first of the year." The AP adds Clinton "said she had not yet decided whether to form a presidential exploratory committee, but that technical requirements of federal election law might require her to do so if she continues to consider a presidential run." Regarding Sen. Barack Obama, "a possible rival for the Democratic nomination, Clinton said the warm reception Obama has been getting around the country, including a stop in New Hampshire on Sunday, is 'terrific.'"

In his New York Times column (12/12), Thomas Edsall says Clinton is "the Democratic establishment's anti-establishment candidate. She is simultaneously an insurgent, seeking to end a 220-year reign of men, and the heir apparent — dominant in cash ($14.4 million in the bank), in the polls and in the colossal reach of her machine." Clinton's "most visible challenger, Barack Obama, is similarly an insurgent, but without the former first lady's resources. He is seeking to capitalize on his ranking as an underdog, entering the fray as David battling the Clinton Goliath."

Obama Challenge Seen As Positive For Clinton. In his Washington Post column (12/12, A27), E.J. Dionne says Sen. Clinton "faces a maddening challenge. Many of the people who like and admire her, who believe she has good values and would make an excellent president, are not sure they are for her because they don't think she can win. Many of these same people, as one prominent Democrat told me, actually feel guilty that they harbor these doubts, partly because the specter that haunts Clinton has little to do with anything she has said or done herself." The doubters "are ashamed to say what really worries them: that Americans don't want to relive the supposed psychodramas of the Bill Clinton years; that her association with her husband will mobilize his enemies more than it will energize his friends; that their relationship is just too complex for those critical swing voters to understand or accept." No matter "how unfair, misguided or even dimwitted Sen. Clinton's supporters may find the catalogue of doubts, she will have to deal with them if she is to win over all the guilt-ridden skeptics." And that "is why the prospect of Barack Obama's presidential candidacy is not only good for the Democratic Party but also good for Clinton herself. Without Obama in the race, the Democratic primaries would boil down to Hillary and those vying to be the anti-Hillary. She might well win a battle of attrition, but without quelling the doubts." A "Clinton-Obama contest would require Clinton to shed some of her caution. It would create enormous popular interest in the Democratic Party. And if she were to beat Obama -- this assumes, as I expect, that Obama will look just as formidable a year from now as he does today -- Clinton would prove her mettle, which might finally put the doubts to rest."

Kucinich To Announce Bid For White House In Cleveland Tuesday. Fox News Special Report (12/11, Cameron) reported, "The politics of an Obama-Clinton rivalry in this race may discourage some candidates from ultimately getting in, but not so Ohio Congressman Dennis Kucinich. He ran in 2004, and tomorrow, in his hometown of Cleveland, he will announce that he is going to try again in 2008. Look out Hillary and Barack Obama."

The AP (12/12, Mabin) reports, "The liberal, anti-war congressman said he was inspired to run because he disagrees with the way some of his fellow Democrats are handling the war, including approval of a proposal to spend $160 billion more on the conflict. 'Democrats were swept into power on Nov. 7 because of widespread voter discontent with the war in Iraq,' Kucinich said. 'Instead of heeding those concerns and responding with a strong and immediate change in policies and direction, the Democratic congressional leadership seems inclined to continue funding the perpetuation of the war.'

DOJ_NMG_0105417

The New York Times (12/12, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports, "In the midst of a brief chat in his office last week," Kucinich "mentioned that, oh, by the way, he planned to run for president again in 2008. 'Yes, I am,' Mr. Kucinich…said in response to a reporter's question about a possible encore to his bid in 2004. Mr. Kucinich's wife, Elizabeth Harper, who was seated next to him, arched her eyebrows in apparent surprise. Asked if he had told anyone this yet, Mr. Kucinich said no. 'You just happened to ask,' he said. Then he walked out of his office and informed his press aide. The news from Mr. Kucinich…underscores the 'What the heck?' sensibility that seems to be governing some entries into what may be the most crowded presidential field in history."

The Hill (12/12, Blake) notes that Kucinich "garnered 1 to 2 percent in most early states in 2004, going on to take 16 percent in Maine, 17 percent in Minnesota and 26 percent in Hawaii and Alaska."

Vilsack Says Democrats Need To Reach Out To Pro-Life Community. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack "said Monday that while he's a pro-choice Democrat, members of his party need to promote life by encouraging adoption and providing programs for prenatal care and family planning." Vilsack said, "When you phrase it that way, you send a message to the life community that you respect but don't necessarily always agree with their position. And you begin to have a conversation about issues where there might be consensus as opposed to division." The AP adds Vilsack "spoke to a group of about 100 Democrats in Florida, a critical swing state in the election."

Kennedy Says He Won't Wait "Indefinitely" For Kerry Decision On Presidential Bid. The Boston Globe (12/12, Klein, 413K) reports that Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy (D) on Monday "dropped his public commitment to support" fellow Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) "in a 2008 presidential race, saying that he won't wait 'indefinitely' for Kerry to declare his intentions while the Democratic primary field takes shape. Hours later, Kerry aides promised that the senator would make a decision 'shortly after the turn of the year,' despite recent signals that Kerry could wait until late spring before deciding. A Kennedy spokeswoman said Kennedy would continue to support Kerry if the junior senator jumps into the race on that time line." However, Kennedy, in an interview "offered strong praise for two of Kerry's possible presidential rivals: senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, calling them 'formidable figures' who are connecting with rank-and-file Democrats. Kennedy said his oft-stated commitment to support Kerry -- made repeatedly after the 2004 election -- was based on the assumption that Kerry would state his intentions by early 2007. Since Kerry pushed back his decision following an election-eve 'botched joke' that damaged his public standing, Kennedy said he has informed Kerry that he may get behind another Democrat for president. 'I was under more of the impression before that he was going to run and was waiting in time [to declare his candidacy], but now he's deferred that decision,' Kennedy said. 'I have no plans of supporting anyone else at this juncture. I'm also not going to just wait indefinitely until he's made a judgment or a decision.'"

Gingrich Decision On 2008 To Come In September. On Fox News' Your World (12/11, Cavuto), former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R) said, "I'll tell you in September what I decide to do but, for the moment, we're looking for American solutions that we're going to work with members of both parties to try to actually solve problems for the coming year." After Neil Cavuto pressed him for more information, Gingrich responded, "John F. Kennedy announced on January 30, in the election year. Ronald Reagan announced in late November of 1975. We are a long, long way from serious, normal people being involved in politics."

Romney Hired Elizabeth Smart For Fundraiser. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports Gov. Mitt Romney "paid $500 to Elizabeth Smart, the Utah teen who survived a kidnapping by a religious zealot, after she played harp at one of his fundraisers, according to a campaign finance report that highlights his preparations for a likely presidential run." Smart, "a fellow Mormon who was freed in 2003 after a nine-month abduction, received the money in April, according to the 166-page report, which outlines donations and expenditures through Nov. 27 for Romney's Commonwealth PAC. Romney has been using the political action committee to travel and build chits for a campaign, which he is expected to announce early next year."

DOJ_NMG_0105418

Lesser-Known Conservatives See Chance To Make Splash In '08 GOP Race. The New York Times (12/12, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "The blast of conservative criticism aimed at Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts for backing gay rights in 1994 has shaken his position as the social conservatives' favored challenger to" Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) for the GOP "presidential nomination. … The two immediate beneficiaries? Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas. 'The governor of Massachusetts is going to have a problem explaining the variety of positions he's taken on various issues,' said Rob Wasinger, the chairman of Mr. Brownback's exploratory committee." Huckabee, meanwhile, referring to outgoing Sens. Bill Frist (R) and George Allen (R), who had been viewed as potential '08 presidential candidates, "said, 'There is going to be a real look for a fresh face now.' Whether or not these two men have the skills to take advantage of it, the opening is there. 'Social conservatives have some reason to be a little skeptical of the four top-tier candidates: Romney, McCain, Giuliani and Gingrich,' said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review, the conservative magazine."

Daley Launches Campaign For Sixth Term As Chicago Mayor. USA Today/AP (12/12, 8A, Bellandi) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley announced Monday he will run for a sixth term, a move that could put him in office longer than his legendary father." The mayor "will be facing some tough questions this time around, including dealing with the fallout from federal investigations into allegations of illegal political patronage and payoffs at City Hall." Daley "has not been accused of any wrongdoing. His former patronage chief, however, faces almost four years in prison for engineering a scheme to hide politics-based hiring by city offices. Other city workers have been caught up in bid-rigging and bribery scandals."

The Chicago Tribune (12/12, Washburn, Mihalopoulos, 617K) says "things are a little different this time around for the mayor. Since the 2003 election, the mayor's loyal political street organizations have suffered at the hands of an ongoing federal investigation into illegal hiring that rewarded campaign workers." Still, "polls have shown that Daley's popularity is high despite City Hall scandals, and most political experts consider him the clear favorite to win re-election."

The New York Times (12/12, Saulny, 1.16M) reports that yesterday, Daley "briefly acknowledged concerns about the abuse of power on his watch, highlighting new fund-raising rules for his campaign and a reworking of the city's hiring and contracting systems. 'The best way to show responsibility is to address the problems directly, so the mistakes of the past won't be repeated,' he said. 'And that's what I've tried to do.'"

DeLay Launches New Venture As Blogger. USA Today (12/12, Kiely, 2.27M) reports former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is "re-entering the political fray, this time as an Internet commentator and community organizer." DeLay, whose "outspoken conservatism and take-no-prisoners legislative style made him a favorite target of Democrats before he resigned from the House in June, launched himself in the blogosphere Monday. He said he hopes to use his new website, www.tomdelay.com, to create a grassroots political organization for conservatives." DeLay said, "Over time and the long term, we hope to drive legislation through Congress. I know how to do that." USA adds that as a House leader, DeLay "helped push much of President Bush's agenda through Congress, including tax cuts, energy bills and the Medicare prescription-drug plan. He named some of his chief goals as ending abortion, supporting Israel and winning the war on terrorism." DeLay's "reinvention of himself, a month after his party lost its House majority, elicited sharply polarized responses. Comments on his first blog entry were largely ecstatic, although DeLay admitted editing out 'vulgar' posts, which he said came from Democrats. Longtime political opponents were acerbic."

The Hill (12/12, Kucinich) reports DeLay "began the long haul to restore the GOP to power and to repair his personal reputation following a year of scandal and bruising electoral defeat. His vehicle for both is a blog and grassroots political organization hosted at www.tomdelay.com." DeLay said, "I've got the election behind me and I'm looking forward to the future and I'm very excited about the opportunities that having a Democratic majority offers to conservatives." The Hill adds, "Sitting forward in an attitude of calm determination, in a conference room adorned with mementos and pictures from his tenure in Congress, DeLay explained how his blog was aimed at improving Internet communication between conservatives. And he acknowledged that Democrats were well ahead in this area."

DOJ_NMG_0105419

DeLay Complains Of "Rogue District Attorney." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/11, Barnicle), former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said, 'I still have that rogue district attorney in Texas, Ronnie Earle, who's using the process to drag this on. I'm trying to get to trial. I want to go to trial. I've been wanting to go to trial the day I was indicted. … I've been indicted on laws that don't exist in Texas. Yes."

New York Congregation To Demolish Church, Build Senior Apartments. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Marks, 59K) reports that in 1922, "when the First Presbyterian Church of Astoria moved to the wilderness that is now Queens, it was on the cutting edge of community development. Today, the congregation is leading a new kind of church renewal, one that entails downsizing physically as it expands its mission spiritually." Today, "like many urban churches, Astoria's First Presbyterian has a dwindling number of parishioners - less than 50 on the books. The church operates in the red, its grand buildings are decaying, and the Rev. Donald Olinger spends much time just figuring out how to keep the doors open." Rev. Olinger and "his flock knew it was time for something radical. In an emotional decision, they have agreed to tear down the elegant old buildings and replace them with more than 90 units of affordable housing for senior citizens." The church "will end up with a sanctuary room in the new building for its Sunday services, as well as a $4 million endowment that it can use to expand its spiritual mission."

Both Clintons To Attend Book Parities For McAuliffe. The New York Times (12/12, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports it "may not go down as a literary classic, but the coming memoir from Terry McAuliffe, the former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, will come with a one-two wallop of book parties that few first-time authors can match." McAuliffe, "whose proficiency as a Democratic fund-raiser is rivaled only by his allegiance to Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton, will see his devotion repaid with not one, but two parties given by the former first couple early next year. Befitting their shuttle marriage, Mr. Clinton will have his party in New York (Jan. 22, the Four Seasons restaurant) and Mrs. Clinton will hold hers in Washington (Feb. 8, Park Hyatt Hotel)."

Rice Seeks Denuclearized North Korea Within 24 Months. In an exclusive interview with AFP (12/12), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that she "wanted quick results in North Korean disarmament talks that resume next week, setting a two-year time frame to dismantle Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program." Rice told AFP she was "delighted the talks are going to start again, but they have to start to show results pretty soon." The Secretary said Washington was "ready to offer North Korea economic aid, energy assistance and improved political relations" if it abandon the development of nuclear weapons. However, she "declined to provide details of specific incentives being put on the table by Washington ahead of the talks." Meanwhile, Rice said, "I think that everyone is looking, in the next round or so, for the North Koreans to do something that demonstrates that they are in fact committed to denuclearization." Rice said her goal was to have Pyongyang complete irreversible steps to dismantle its nuclear arms program before the end of President George W. Bush's term in January 2009.

Rice, Gates To Participate In Security Talks With Japan. The AP (12/12) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates will meet with Japanese officials on Jan. 13 "to bolster cooperation in missile defense and discuss the ongoing realignment of US troops in Japan." The nation's Kyodo News agency reported that Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and Defense Agency chief Fumio Kyuma will meet Rice and Gates in Washington.

Rice Says Washington Backs New European Resolution On Iran Sanctions. In an exclusive interview with AFP (12/12), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that Washington "has finally signed on to a European draft resolution imposing sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program and is optimistic it will quickly pass" through the UNSC. Speaking after the revised draft was submitted to the UN, Rice said it is "a good resolution" and that she was "optimistic" it would pass soon, "though she stopped short of predicting a final vote before the end of the year." The Secretary said the latest version "would make very clear to the Iranians that they are not going to be able to pursue this program and remain integrated into the international system and I would hope would give them pause so they might consider coming back to negotiations."

Russian Concerns About Iran Resolution Eased. The Washington Post (12/12, A22, Lynch, 690K) reports

DOJ_NMG_0105420

senior Russian officials Monday said that European negotiators have "overcome many of their objections" to the draft resolution and that an agreement "may be in sight." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "praised" the draft, saying it echoed Moscow's preference for pursuing a diplomatic strategy that encourages Iran "to sit down at the negotiating table." He said it was "carefully" drafted to ban "only those sensitive nuclear activities, including the enrichment and reprocessing of uranium, that the council was seeking to stop," and "does not provide for blanket sanctions." The AP (12/12, Bergman) notes that Russia's U.N. ambassador also "praised" the draft resolution, saying his country's concerns "had been taken into account as negotiators met behind closed doors Monday to discuss the text."

McCain Says Iran Threatens Israel's Existence. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports that in New York, "Israel and the world are threatened by a 'possibly deranged and surely dangerous regime' in Iran, White House hopeful Sen. John McCain told a Jewish audience." As the "world's 'chief state sponsor of international terrorism,' Iran defines itself by its hostility to the Jewish state and its chief ally, the United States, the Arizona Republican said in a speech for a Hanukkah dinner at Yeshiva University on Sunday." He "noted that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called the Holocaust a 'myth,' urged that Israel be 'wiped off the map' and defied international demands and incentives to end a drive to gain nuclear weapons capability."

Iranian Students Protest Ahmadinejad Speech. ABC World News (12/11, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iran, today, an extraordinary sight: a demonstration against President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Dozens of students shouted 'death to the dictator' as he spoke at a university. They burned photographs of the president. His supporters shouted down the demonstrators. There were no reports of arrests."

The New York Times (12/12, A3, Fathi, 1.16M) says the protests "disrupted" a speech by Ahmadinejad "at a major university in Tehran," marking "the first major public protest" against Ahmadinejad since his election more than a year ago. The students also "demanded the resignation of Alireza Rahai, a conservative and the chancellor of the institution, Amirkabir University," the Iranian Student News Agency reported. The AP (12/12, Karimi) says Ahmadinejad "responded calmly" to the demonstration.

Iran Hosts Conference On Holocaust. NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "An unusual gathering got underway today in Tehran in Iran where those who question, and even outright deny that the Nazi Holocaust ever took place, are getting together to discuss their theories on whether six million Jews really were killed by Hitler's followers." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Iran's President Ahmadinejad, who has long called the Holocaust a myth, organized today's conference, challenging one of history's most documented events." NBC noted that the "fringe group included white supremacist David Duke, who praised Iran's President for his courage," and "a radical group of Orthodox Jews were among delegates from 30 countries."

The Financial Times (12/12, Smyth) says the event "has been billed as an objective examination of historical fact, although interest has fed off the international furor sparked by president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's verbal attacks on Israel by and his questioning of the Holocaust." For his part, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the conference showed "the depth of hatred and the radical fundamentalism within the Iranian government," while a State Department spokesman said the conference was "yet another disgraceful act on this particular subject by the regime in Tehran."

The New York Times (12/12, A3, Fathi, 1.16M) notes that "among those representing the United States was the former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, whose prepared remarks, issued by the Iranian Foreign Ministry, said the gas chambers in which millions perished actually did not exist." Duke also suggested that "depicting Jews as the overwhelming victims of the Holocaust gave the moral high ground to the Allies as victors of the war and allowed Jews to establish a state on the occupied land of Palestine."

Columnist Says Conference Shows Importance Of Holocaust Education. Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K) Anne Applebaum writes that in response, "Europe, the United States and Israel expressed official outrage. The German government, to its credit, organized a counter-conference. Still, many have held their distance, refusing to be shocked or even especially interested." Applebaum notes that although "we all know what happened," Iran's denial "is serious -- or at least Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is deadly serious: Holocaust denial is his personal passion, not just a way of taunting Israel, and it's based on his personal interpretation of history." Therefore, she says that "it seems the archives, the photographs and the endless rebuttals will go on being necessary, long beyond the lifetime of the last survivor."

DOJ_NMG_0105421

Iran's Jewish Community Fears Worsening Conditions. In a report on Iran's Jewish community, the CBS Evening News (12/11, story 9, 2:45, Palmer, 7.66M) reported that since the Iranian revolution "half of Iran's Jews fled the country. Now those who stayed behind hope they're not heading for a new crisis. But the signs are ominous. Iran's hard-line President has denied Hitler's Holocaust and said Israel should be wiped off the map. And Israel refuses to rule out a strike on Iran's nuclear installations."

Iranian Opposition Group Cites Importance Of Resistance Movement. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A19, 2.04M), Shahin Gobadi, a spokesman for the National Council of Resistance of Iran, writes that the Journal's front page article, "Iranian Imbroglio Gives New Boost to Odd Exile Group," (Nov. 29) "asserted that most American officials dispute claims of the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran," the main Iranian resistance movement, of "having a mass following in Iran, stressing that many Iranians despise the organization." However, Gobadi says "believing this would lead one to wonder why a 'terrorist' labeling of such an 'isolated' organization should be such a big deal for the clerical regime." Gobadi notes that the Washington-based Iran Policy Committee established in a 2006 study that Tehran "paid five times more attention to the PMOI than to all other internal and external opposition groups combined." He also notes that the AP reported last week that the Iranian regime has blocked access to YouTube.com "mainly because videos from the PMOI have been posted on this site."

Rice Warns Syria, Iran Over Lebanon. In an exclusive interview with AFP (12/12), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Monday "warned" Syria and Iran that the "future of Lebanon is not an issue for negotiation." Rice also "rejected mounting calls to deal directly with Damascus and Tehran as part of efforts to end the crisis in Iraq and said the two states should have no doubts about Washington's commitment to the embattled government of Lebanon." The Secretary told AFP, "In no way is the US going to get into a situation where it is even a conceivable notion on the part of Syria or Iran that the future of Lebanon would somehow be compromised for other interests of the US." Rice said she wanted to "make it very clear that the future of Lebanon is not an issue for negotiation with anybody."

Ignatius Says White House Has Done Little To Back Siniora. Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K) columnist David Ignatius writes that Washington's response to the protests against Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government "unfortunately has been as feckless here as elsewhere in the region. Despite American promises to bolster Siniora by getting a map of Israeli land mines in southern Lebanon, or exploring Lebanese claims to a disputed, Israeli-occupied territory known as Shebaa Farms, the Bush administration has done little."

Olmert Appears To Confirm Israel Has Nuclear Arsenal. The New York Times (12/12, A5, Myre, 1.16M) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "appeared to acknowledge inadvertently during a TV interview shown Monday that Israel has nuclear weapons, an issue on which the Jewish state has sought to maintain ambiguity for decades." However, Olmert's aides said later that there was "no change in Israel's policy of refusing to confirm or deny whether it has nuclear weapons." In an interview with the N24 cable news channel in Germany, Olmert said, "Iran openly, explicitly and publicly threatens to wipe Israel off the map. Can you say that this is the same level, when they are aspiring to have nuclear weapons as America, France, Israel, Russia?"

Israel Boosts Warplanes' Range In Response To "Distant Threats." USA Today (12/12, 16A, For, 2.27M) reports Israel's air force plans to "enhance its air-refueling capabilities, increasing the range of its warplanes," as Iran "emerges as an increasing threat." Air Force Brig. Gen. Yohanan Loker has said the program would help Israel meet "emerging distant threats," though he did not mention Iran by name. One option the Israeli air force is considering is "the purchase and development of drones, or unmanned aerial vehicles, to serve as refueling tankers for attack jets and other aircraft used in long-range missions."

Kinsley Criticizes Carter's Use Of "Apartheid." Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K) columnist Michael Kinsley writes that former President Jimmy Carter, in his new book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," does not make "clear what he means by using the loaded word 'apartheid,'…but the only reasonable interpretation is that Carter is comparing Israel to the former white racist government of South Africa." Kinsley calls this "a foolish and unfair comparison, unworthy of the man who won -- and deserved -- the Nobel Peace Prize for bringing Israel and Egypt together in the Camp David Accords, and who has lent such luster to the imaginary office of former president."

DOJ_NMG_0105422

Killing Of Three Palestinian Children Could Spark Civil War. ABC World News (12/11, story 5, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "in Gaza, where there has been so much violence over the years, an attack today that stood out for its savagery. Gunmen killed three young boys, ages three, six, and nine years old, whose father helped to crack down on Hamas militants a decade ago. Tonight, there are fears the killings could trigger new violence between Palestinian factions." ABC (Sciutto) added, "Today's attack was the latest and most brutal in an escalating struggle between the main political factions here, Fatah and Hamas. … For all the real concern about the conflict between the Palestinians and Israelis, the worsening infighting between Fatah and Hamas is raising the frightening prospect of civil war."

NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 4, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) called the killings "a shocking act of murder" in "a part of the world where violence is common, but not like this." The New York Times (12/12, A14, Myre, 1.16M) says the killings "further inflamed an already tense situation among Palestinian factions locked in a political power struggle." Although no group claimed responsibility for the shooting, their father Baha Balousha, a colonel in the General Intelligence service, was "regarded as one of the figures involved in a Palestinian Authority crackdown on Hamas members a decade ago and has long been at odds with the group, Palestinians said." The Times notes that "while Palestinian factions have frequently battled in recent years," the deaths of the three boys "outraged many Palestinians and heightened fears that they could cause revenge attacks."

The AP (12/12, Lavie) says the killings are "threatening to ignite a Palestinian civil war" and have "jeopardized Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's efforts to restart long-stalled peace talks." The Washington Post (12/12, A22, Wilson, 690K) and Financial Times (12/12, Devi) also report briefly on the killings.

Iran Pledges $250 Million In Aid To Palestinians. The AP (12/12, El Deeb) reports Iran has pledged $250 million in aid "to the cash-strapped Hamas-led Palestinian government, the latest sign of increasingly close ties between the Islamic group and Tehran," Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Monday. Haniyeh's office announced the donation at the end of a four-day visit by the prime minister to Tehran. Also Monday, the European Commission "proposed a three-month extension of a special aid deal for the Palestinians that bypasses the government."

Saudi Ambassador Abruptly Resigns, Leaves Washington. The Washington Post (12/12, A23, Wright, 690K) reports Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal "flew out of Washington yesterday after informing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and his staff that he would be leaving the post after only 15 months on the job, according to US officials and foreign envoys." The Post notes that the ambassador's exit -- "without the fanfare, parties and tributes that normally accompany a leading envoy's departure, much less a public statement -- comes as his brother, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the highly influential Saudi foreign minister, is ailing." As Saud's health has declined, Turki has "increasingly been rumored as a possible replacement for his older brother," it notes.

Somali Islamic Militiamen Advancing On Ethiopian Border. The AP (12/12, Hassan) reports Islamic militiamen "were moving on an Ethiopian border town to try to seal the 1,000-mile frontier and keep out any advancing Ethiopian troops while trapping those already in Somalia," an Islamic movement official said Monday. Mohamed Ibrahim Bilaal, an Islamic movement official, told the AP by telephone that forces will "go to all border towns in our country to deprive our enemy of a route to enter into our country. Also we don't want the enemy inside Somalia to get an exit route to flee from it when the jihad starts." The latest military buildup "further raises fears of intensified conflict in Somalia," the AP notes.

The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Baldauf, 59K) reports, "A new front in the global struggle for Islamist rule is emerging in Africa. And there are worrisome signs that battles between Somalia's rising Union of Islamic Courts (IUC) and the country's foundering Western-backed government might soon engulf the entire Horn of Africa in a regional war. ... neighboring Ethiopia isn't waiting for the UN. As the Islamists continue to take town after town away from Somalia's transitional government, and to march closer to its border, Ethiopia is gearing up for all-out war. Meanwhile, Eritrea, Djibouti, and Sudan are eyeing the conflict and taking sides." The Monitor continues, "Many Ethiopian officials and experts say that they have no choice but to fight. The looming war in Somalia is part of the unfinished business of Ethiopia's two-year border war with Eritrea, which ended in exhaustion rather than a negotiated peace treaty. Ethiopian officials allege that the rise of Somalia's Islamists was made possible by Eritrean logistical support, and a UN Monitoring Group report has charged that Eritrea, Egypt, Djibouti, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Libya, and Sudan have all contributed funds, arms, and technical support to help Somalia's Islamists take control."

DOJ_NMG_0105423

Somali Floods Heighten National Crisis. The New York Times (12/12, A6, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports the people of Somali are suffering after floodwaters "drowned their animals, submerged their crops and swept away their homes." The Times says they "are slowly starving, unable to sustain themselves on unripe fruit and filthy water." The floods here are "yet another installment of a nation in crisis. At a time when Somalia seems inexorably close to an all-out war with Ethiopia, with a destructive potential that could dwarf the countless deaths from the last 15 years of anarchy, a deluge has arrived, plunging Somalia's breadbasket underwater, creating the conditions for an extended famine and taking the area's woes to a whole new level."

Congressional Study Finds Continuing Delays In Delivering Darfur Aid. The AP (12/12, Flaherty) reports US humanitarian aid to Darfur "continues to be hampered by a lack of security in the region, restrictions by the Sudanese government and delays in international aid," according to a report released Monday by the Government Accountability Office. The office said in its report that the "nearly $1 billion in US aid and efforts by the international community have helped improve a dire situation," but "nongovernmental organizations and the UN still face serious problems in aiding the nearly 4 million people who require assistance, including frequent attacks on aid convoys."

US, UK Move Toward Resolving Fighter Jet Dispute. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A8, Karp, Michaels, 2.04M) reports that as Lockheed Martin Corp. "prepares its newest fighter jet for its maiden flight this week, the US and Britain are moving toward resolving disputes, raising the likelihood Britain will stay in the $276 billion program, a person familiar with the matter said." A formal agreement committing Britain to buy the jet, known as the Joint Strike Fighter, "could be announced as soon as today after Pentagon talks between senior US and British defense officials," the source said. An agreement with Britain would remove "a shadow over" the program, which has been in development for a decade and is billed as "a model of international cooperation."

UK Nuclear Plans Highlight "Urgent Need" To Reform Global Framework. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Rice-Oxley, 59K) reports that British Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement last week that Britain plans to spend around £20 billion ($39 billion) to replace its submarine-based missile deterrent known as Trident "has divided opinion, but experts on both sides agree that the decision highlights the urgent need to revive some form of global nuclear weapons framework." The alternative, they say, is "to risk a new arms race with many more powers than before and a heightened risk that a warhead might actually be used." The Monitor says that "for a few years, it seemed that all five recognized nuclear powers - Russia, the US, France, China, and Britain - would embrace the new spirit of disarmament," but "now, major nuclear deals like the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) appear to be coming apart at the seams."

Anti-Nuclear Protest Staged In House Of Commons. AFP (12/12) reports "two anti-nuclear campaigners were ejected from the House of Commons and 28 were arrested elsewhere as protesters voiced anger at government plans to renew Britain's nuclear deterrent."

Western Companies Embrace Turkey. The Washington Post (12/12, A24, Moore, 690K) reports, "While opposition to Turkey's proposed membership in the European Union is growing among governments and voters in Europe, Western businesses…are embracing a nation of eager consumers armed with newly accessible credit cards. … Across the hills of the city once known as Constantinople, sleek new office towers are rising as rapidly as the slender spires of new mosques in a country where both Western capitalism and Islamic sentiments are on the march." The Post also reports, "At a time when European relations with the Muslim world are at a low, Western governments are becoming increasingly estranged from the country that has long been considered a political bridge between the secular democracies of the West and the Islamic nations of the East."

US Report Delivers "Rebuke" To China Ahead Of Officials' Visit. The New York Times (12/12, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "In a rebuke to China on the eve of a high-level visit by American officials, the Bush administration formally accused Chinese leaders on Monday of failing to meet commitments to open the nation's economy and crack down on piracy of foreign goods." The criticism came in a 100-page report to Congress by USTR Susan Schwab. While "praising" China for "making progress in some areas," the report said that the country's efforts in 'other crucial areas had recently stalled, despite repeated promises from Beijing." It cited continued limits by China on sales of financial services by foreign banks, including credit cards, and limits on some sales of farm goods. It also accused China of "engaging in counterfeiting or piracy of software, videos, pharmaceuticals and other goods, sometimes with open encouragement of Chinese officials, and of failing to stiffen punishments on those engaging in these practices." The Times says the report was "likely to roil the atmosphere this week as Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. engages in a high-level effort to get China to cooperate on these issues."

DOJ_NMG_0105424

Under the headline "US Vocal In Run Up To China Trade Talks," the Financial Times (12/12, McGregor, Guha) reports, "For a forum meant to allow Washington and Beijing quietly to sort out long-term problems, the run-up to the first US-China Strategic Economic Dialogue starting on Thursday has already featured some traditional high-decibel diplomacy." In recent days Treasury Secretary Paulson and USTR Schwab have "both made statements admonishing China over its trade, economic and currency policies." According to the Times, the Chinese "have so far been much more restrained, in public at least." However, it notes that "despite the tenor of some of the US statements, the planned twice-yearly dialogue, as presently structured, will not be anything like a bilateral trade negotiation," noting that "just the size of the US delegation…makes this encounter different."

China's Impact On US Economy Noted. USA Today (12/12, 1B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "China's WTO membership sparked far-reaching domestic reforms in the still-nominally-communist nation, leading to an economic flowering as well as greater personal freedom for individual Chinese. It's also meant hefty profits for U.S. corporations operating in China, such as General Motors." But "marrying 1.3 billion Chinese to the global economy" also "has left its mark on the United States. Tens of thousands of jobs in textile plants in states such as North Carolina have been wiped out by low-age Chinese competition even as US consumers enjoy lower-priced clothes, toys and furniture made in Chinese factories. Through massive purchases of US Treasury bonds, the Chinese government effectively finances Americans' consumption-heavy lifestyles."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M) writes, "This week's trip to Beijing by Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson is being hyped as the biggest economic expedition since Marco Polo's. We suspect that's a tad oversold, but in the meantime it's too bad Mr. Paulson cajoled Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke into risking his credibility by joining him." Paulson's trip "is transparently political, with the goal most leaked to the press being to persuade China to let the yuan appreciate further against the dollar. … This is supposed to appease U.S. mercantilists, both political and commercial, and thus give the former Goldman Sachs executive his first big political win. This is at best a risky exercise, so why is Mr. Bernanke going along for the ride?" Bernanke "is or ought to be politically independent, and the perception of that independence is crucial to his credibility."

Author Andy Kessler writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M) that Paulson, Bernanke "and other polished cabinetry are visiting China later this week. They'll see fields of skyscrapers, traffic jams of new cars and designer couture replacing the old Maoist uniform with five buttons and too-long sleeves. In other words, we've got the Chinese right where we want 'em. … Adolescents eventually grow up. China is growing in spurts. They've got jobs and piles of debt. They need to keep working to pay it off. I actually think the US, with its immense wealth, is the main banker, not the Chinese floating our hopefully shrinking budget deficits. We are the ones with the leverage. S tick with the currency peg and make China open up their markets to competition and real outside financial scrutiny."

Administration Seeks To Revive Momentum For Doha Trade Deal. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A4, Hitt, 2.04M) reports the Doha round of "global trade talks stalled after hitting numerous roadblocks over the summer. Now the White House is working to revive negotiations, even as a new barrier looms: a Congress much more skeptical of free trade." Administration officials have "stepped up the campaign to win support for its plan," and US Trade Representative Susan Schwab, "who spent years as an aide on Capitol Hill, is wooing the incoming trade czars of the new Democratic Congress." Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "is rallying support for Doha around the globe. In London, he said Doha remains the administration's 'top trade priority,' even with the change in control of Congress next year." The Administration is "banking that all the political maneuvering will help inject some momentum back into the talks by the spring. The goal isn't necessarily to finish a deal then, but to show enough progress to persuade skeptics in Congress to extend the president's trade-negotiating authority beyond June, when it is set to expire."

DOJ_NMG_0105425

AFL-CIO President Says Trade Deals Must Account For Human Rights, US Workers. In a USA Today op-ed (12/12, 20A), John J. Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, says, "The new Congress will face a daunting array of challenges and choices with respect to trade policy when it convenes in January. Our country is running an annual trade deficit of almost $800 billion, real wages are stagnant or falling for most American workers, the number of people in poverty is growing, the manufacturing sector is in recession, and our health care and retirement security systems are eroding rapidly." The "only way the Bush administration is going to begin negotiating fair agreements is if Congress takes a stand against these flawed deals, starting with Peru and Colombia. We face enormous challenges, but politically viable solutions are within reach. No single action will get us out of the hole we're in, but we can start by rejecting the failed trade policies of the past and charting a new course, one that puts human rights, good jobs and sustainable development at the center of our trade policy."

Probe Of Litvinenko Poisoning Leads To Hamburg. The CBS Evening News (12/11, story 3, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported on "the poisoning death of the former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko. From London to Moscow, the radiation trail has now led investigators to Hamburg, Germany." CBS (Roth) added, "While German police were following the latest tracks in the radioactive trail of poison polonium, British investigators were at a Moscow hospital spending three hours with Andrei Lugovoi, a key figure in the case of the poisoned spy. He's one of the Russians who met former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko at a London hotel November 1. Within hours, Alexander Litvinenko was ill. Three weeks later he was dead. Officials now think polonium that killed him may have been put in his tea cup. But who put it there and where it came from are part of a mystery mapped out in radioactive hot spots still to be connected. From London where Litvinenko or his Russian contacts left traces of radiation in at least a dozen places to British airways jets at Heathrow Airport and to Moscow. The radiation just found in Hamburg, though, might fill in some blanks in the chain of events. It was left by Dmitry Kovtun, who stopped in Hamburg before joining the London meeting with Livinenko and who's now hospitalized in Moscow with radiation poisoning."

The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Holley, Fleishman, 850K) reports German police "said Kovtun is under criminal investigation for bringing the radioactive element into the country. 'He appeared to have been in contact with polonium. We are considering him as a suspect,' Hamburg state prosecutor Martin Koehnke said. 'We have to establish whether he was poisoned himself or carried the polonium into the country." He added that there was a "reasonable basis for suspicion that he may not just be a victim but could also be a perpetrator.'" The New York Times (12/12, Landler, Myers, 1.16M) says "four people who had contact here with a business associate of…Litvinenko were hospitalized Monday, on suspicion they had been contaminated by polonium 210." The Washington Post (12/12, A16, Jordan, Smiley, 690K) runs a similar story.

WSJournal Calls Kremlin Move Against Shell "Economic Version Of Polonium 210." The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "The authoritarian drift of Russia continues apace. Yesterday the Kremlin managed to pull the rug out from under the largest foreign investment in the country, Royal Dutch Shell's $20 billion oil and gas project off the Pacific island of Sakhalin. You might call it the economic version of Polonium 210." It "is a measure of the West's fatalism about Russia that the Kremlin-engineered campaign to force Shell to hand Sakhalin to state-owned Gazprom came as no surprise. KGB man Vladimir Putin has been anything but subtle in his mission to put natural resources in the hands of his cronies." The Journal concludes by asking, "what's [Russia] doing in the G-8 club of the world's leading industrialized democracies?"

Role Of FSB Expanding Under Putin. The Washington Post (12/12, A1, Finn, 690K) reports in a front page article that Russia's Federal Security Service, known by its Russian initials FSB, "has emerged as one of the country's most powerful and secretive forces, with an increasingly international mission." According to the Post, the "widening reach of Russia's national security apparatus is part of the general centralization of power under [Russian President Vladimir] Putin and a more assertive and self-confident foreign policy backed by vast energy resources." A spokesman for the FSB declined to discuss its functions, but

DOJ_NMG_0105426

"in interviews with the Russian news media, senior FSB officials have defended the agency's increasing power as a necessary and natural response to a terrorist threat." However, critics say that heightened state security, "while ostensibly a response to terrorism, is also seen by the Putin establishment as essential to its own political preservation."

Eastern Europe Struggles To Purge Soviet-Era Security Services. On its front page, the New York Times (12/12, A1, Smith, 1.16M) reports, "Communism is gone and democracy is well implanted in the countries of the old Warsaw Pact, but the Soviet era's security services are still sending shudders through the region nearly two decades after the fall of the Berlin Wall." Some members of the Soviet-era secret police "remain in place," while "others took advantage of the state-asset fire sale that came with the dismantling of centrally planned economies and are now quietly powerful players." However, the Times says "a renewed effort is under way across the former Soviet bloc to expose the continued role of the security services and to root out former police agents and collaborators."

Pinochet's Death Reopens Chilean Wounds.

The New York Times (12/12, Rohter, 1.16M) reports, "Chile seemed calmer on Monday, with the general's few remaining admirers filing by his coffin at the military academy here and the rest of the country going about its normal workday activities. But the timing of his death has not only brought back to the surface many of the divisions he created but has also left a host of troubling legal and political questions unresolved." The Times adds, "Victims of the general's human rights abuses, for instance, expressed frustration that he had died 'without paying his enormous debt to justice' or even standing trial, in the words of Lorena Pizarro, director of the Relatives of the Detained and Disappeared Group. … Human rights advocates want those cases to proceed, if only to undermine the more extravagant claims of the general's apologists and make the historical record clear." The Washington Post (12/12, C1, Constable, 690K) runs a long "Essay" titled "Chile's Gen. Pinochet, The Strongman Who Tore Apart His Country."

The Washington Post (12/12, 690K) editorializes, "It's hard not to notice, however, that the evil dictator leaves behind the most successful country in Latin America. ... Like it or not, Mr. Pinochet had something to do with this success. ... By way of contrast, Fidel Castro ... will leave behind an economically ruined and freedomless country with his approaching death. ... [Jeane] Kirkpatrick argued that right-wing dictators such as Mr. Pinochet were ultimately less malign than communist rulers, in part because their regimes were more likely to pave the way for liberal democracies. ... by now it should be obvious: She was right." Eugene Robinson, also in the Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K), writes, "I'll leave it to others to 'balance' the commentary on Gen. Augusto Pinochet's death with praise for his free-market economic reforms." Pinochet "was a despot, a murderer and a fraud."

The Wall Street Journal (12/12, 2.04M) editorializes, "Pinochet's legacy is a paradox -- a long string of them. He took power in a coup in 1973, but ultimately he created an environment where democratic institutions would prevail. He is responsible for the death and torture that occurred on his watch, but had Salvador Allende succeeded in turning Chile into another Cuba, many more might have died. ... Pinochet proved the truth of Jeane Kirkpatrick's Cold War distinction between authoritarian and totalitarian regimes, with the former far more likely to evolve into freer places."

Novelist Maria Vargas Llosa, meanwhile, compares Pinochet and Fidel Castro in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M), "The difference between the two men," he writes, "is that Castro, who has been in power almost three times longer than Pinochet and has committed even more crimes, continues to have some supporters around the world while Pinochet was one of the most reviled men on Earth. Why was Pinochet more hated than every other dictator? Probably because he gave a bad conscience to almost everybody across the political spectrum. For the left, he symbolized the tragic consequences of the Third World's socialist utopia. For the right, he embodied the diabolical temptation to dispose with the rule of law when the political institutions of democracy are tested to the limit. For Latin American democrats of the left and of the right, he was a walking reminder of their own failure to bring about economic prosperity."

Author Ariel Dorfman, in the New York Times (12/12, 1.16M), writes, "Though there can be no doubt that his body has been proven to indeed be mortal, I fear that his spirit may live on interminably in the Chile he misruled from 1973 to 1990 and then continued to terrorize as commander in chief of the army for eight more years. In order to truly exorcise him from our existence it would have been necessary that he stand trial, that he defend himself from the accusations of murder and torture, kidnapping and grand larceny, which have been brought against him in innumerable court cases in Santiago."

DOJ_NMG_0105427

NSA Denies Monitoring Princess Diana's Calls. The CBS Evening News (12/11, story 4, 2:40, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "An official British investigation into Diana's death has found that when she walked through the door of the Ritz hotel in the last night of her life, she was under surveillance by a US intelligence agency. British newspaper reports now say that on the night she died, Diana was being bugged by the US without the approval of British security services. The US has refused to release the files, but investigators have been told the highly classified documents shed no new light on her death." However, NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 9, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "US intelligence sources tell NBC News Diana's phone was not tapped."

The Washington Post (12/12, A22, Sullivan, Pincus, 690K) notes that "in a rare public comment on its intelligence operations," the NSA said Monday that it "had 39 documents containing references to the late Princess Diana but had never targeted her telephone communications for monitoring." The officials have reportedly "assured Scotland Yard investigators working on a pending report that 39 classified documents about her final conversations revealed no sign that her death was anything but an accident."

Kristof Urges Bush To Make Issue Of Child Slavery. New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) columnist Nicholas Kristof writes about child slavery in Cambodia, which he says "President Bush has done a much better job than his predecessors in pressing this issue; his State Department office on trafficking is one of his few diplomatic successes. And the issue enjoys bipartisan support, with leadership coming from conservative Republicans like Senator Sam Brownback and liberal Democrats like Representative Carolyn Maloney." However, Nicholas urges President Bush to use his "last two years to make this issue an international priority." A "nudge" in Bush's next State of the Union address "could jump-start a new Abolitionist movement, so as to free children now dying slowly from rape and AIDS because they did something as simple as accepting ice cream from a neighbor."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Ex-aides Allege Abuse Of Power."
"Does This Debase Debate?"
"Killings Put Gaza On Edge."
"Justice On Katrina Time."
"Major Breach of UCLA's Computer Files."
"Vehicle Mileage Estimates Get Real."

USA Today:

"Poll: Rising pessimism on Iraq war."
"Long hospital shifts, lack of sleep can kill, study says."
"To The Point Of Nodding Off."
"Need A Parking Place? Good Luck."

New York Times:

"A Dead Indian Language Is Brought Back to Life."
"Iraqis Consider Ways to Reduce Power of Cleric."
"In Twist on Tuition Game, Popularity Rises With Price."
"Eastern Europe Struggles to Purge Security Services."
"Protectors, Too, Gather Profits From ID Theft."
"Gay and Evangelical, Seeking Paths of Acceptance."
"Medicare Links Doctors' Pay to Practices."

Washington Post:

"Experts Advise Bush Not To Reduce Troops."
"To Stem Iraqi Violence, U.S. Aims To Create Jobs."
"Mega churches Are Migrating To Charles."
"In Russia, A Secretive Force Widens."
"Foreign Service Hiring Gets A Re-Exam."
"A Dead Indian Language Is Brought Back to Life."

Detroit Free Press:

"Buyout Offers Swirl At Ford."
"Universities Want Some More Time On Prop 2."
"New Lead In Child Deaths."
"Downtown Winter Blast Coming Back."
"Inmate Finds Peace: 'I'm Ready To Die'."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Marta Train Traffic Jumps."
"Hope Drives Jon Benet's Dad To Forge New Life But Slowly."
"Timely Push To take The Bottle Home."
"Lawmaker Vote To Pad Allowance."
"DeKalb Ready To Overhaul School District."

Houston Chronicle:

"90-Year Sentence For Pipe Assault."

DOJ_NMG_0105428

"No Vince, Few Wins And Even Less Hope."
"Skilling Prison date Postponed."
"E. Coli Cases Defy Federal Assurances."
"Iraq Parties May Unite To Reduce Al-Sadr's Clout."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Bush Meets With Advisors; Iraq's Future; Kofi Annan Speech; Protest In Iran; Fatah & Hamas Violence; Campaign 2008; Child Labor-Congo; IRS Screw Up; Space Shuttle Docks; Holiday Decoration Wars.

CBS: Bush Meets With Advisors; Bush Poll Numbers-Analysis; Litvinenko Investigation; Diana Bugging Investigation; Security Breach; Sago Mine Explosion; Cruise Ship In Port; Obama Visits New Hampshire; Jews In Iran; Blood Diamond Trade; Space Shuttle Docks.

NBC: Bush Meets With Advisors; Bush Meetings-Analysis; Iran & Jews; Fatah & Hamas Violence; Campaign 2008; Stock Market; Alzheimer's Hits The Young; Space Shuttle Docks; Diana Investigation; Baby Boom Advertisements.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Baghdad-Suicide Car Bombing; Bush-Iraq Meetings; NC-Missing Couple Found Dead In Car; Seattle-Tacoma International Airport-Christmas Trees Put Back Up; Wall Street; OR-Missing Climbers; Online Holiday Shopping-Discounts Offered; Hot Selling Christmas Gifts; Grinch Musical; Survey-Many Companies Plan On Hiring In New Year.

CBS: Baghdad-Suicide Car Bombing; CBS Poll-Bush's Approval, Support For Iraq War Down; OR-Missing Climbers; Space Shuttle Docks At Space Station; Atlantic Records Founder in Coma.

NPR: Baghdad-Suicide Car Bombing; Bush-Iraq Meetings; Space Shuttle Docks At Space Station; Kucinich To Run For Presidency Again In 2008; Tokyo Stock Market; Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Portland Reaches Settlement In Sexual Abuse Case; FDA-Taco Bell E. Coli Outbreak; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a video teleconference with military commanders and the Ambassador to Iraq, Roosevelt Room, closed press; meets with the Vice President of Iraq, Oval Office.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: ACCOUNTANTS-SEC _ The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants holds its 2006 AICPA National Conference on Current Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) Developments. Highlights: 9:50 a.m. FASB Chairman's Address, Robert H. Herz, Norwalk, Conn. 10:20 a.m. FASB Vice Chairman's Address, Michael Crooch, Norwalk, Conn. Location: Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

NO CHILD LEFT BEHIND _ 8 a.m. - 5 p.m. The Fordham Institute holds a symposium on the compression of school curricula in the No Child Left Behind law into little more than math and reading and maybe some science. Participants include Dana Gioia, Chairman, National Endowment for the Arts; Kati Haycock, Director, Education Trust; Diane Ravitch, Brookings Institution; E.D. Hirsch, Jr., Chairman, Core Knowledge Foundation; Sidney Harman, CEO, Harman International Industries, Inc.; Toni Cortese, Executive Vice President, American Federation of Teachers. Location: Hotel Washington, 515 15th St. NW.

RACE-INEQUALITY _ 8:30 a.m. - 6:30 p.m. The Eisenhower Foundation holds a forum with columnists, academies and journalists on media coverage of race, inequality and the impact on the policy discussion. Participants include: Ray Suarez, Terrence Smith The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer; Washington Post columnists Eugene Robinson, Colby King , Harold Meyerson (American Prospect Magazine); Newsweek columnist Ellis Cose; Amy Goodman, Democracy Now!; Shaila Dewan, The New York Times; Gary Younge, The Guardian; Gregory Kane, The Baltimore Sun; Gregory Stanford, The Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel; DeWayne Wickham, USA Today; Washington Post reporters Kevin Merida, Mike Fletcher. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a discussion on carbon to liquid technologies that allow solid fuels to be used in the transportation sector. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

IRAN ELECTIONS _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a panel, ``Elections in Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0105429

Panelists: Mohebat Ahdiyyih, Open Source Center; Mehdi Khalaji, Washington Institute for Near East Policy; and A. William Samii, Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty. Moderator: Danielle Pletka, AEI. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

NATIONAL FINANCES _ 9:30 a.m. The Concord Coalition holds a briefing to release two new polls on the public's attitudes toward the nation's long term fiscal challenges. Location: National Press Club.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL _ 10 a.m. Amnesty International (AIUSA) sponsors a breakfast briefing to discuss crises in Sri Lanka, Iran and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, written about in the just-released Winter 06 Amnesty International magazine. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

CLIMATE CONFERENCE _ 10 a.m. Platts Energy Podium hosts Dr. Harlan Watson, senior climate negotiator at the State Department, discussing the recent UN climate conference in Nairobi. Location: Platts, 10th floor, 1200 G St. NW.

RENTAL HOUSING _ 10 a.m. The National Low Income Housing Coalition holds a telephone briefing to release its annual report, which shows affordable rental housing father out of reach in 2006, with Rep. Barney Frank, NLIHC President Sheila Crowley, others. Notes: Callin number: 877-811-4716; passcode: 3837558.

ROLLOVER CRASHES _ 10 a.m. Press conference to showcase the newly developed Jordan Rollover System, a test device for analyzing rollover crash protection under dynamic conditions, with Public Citizen President Joan Claybrook, Clarence Ditlow of the Center for Auto Safety, others. Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW.

TERRORISM PREPAREDNESS _ 10 a.m. Trust for America's Health organization holds a telephone briefing to release a report on the preparedness of states for bioterror, bird flu and other health emergencies. Contacts: Nicole Speulda, 202-223-9870 ext 273.

ARABS/MUSLIMS-IRAQ _ 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) will host a panel discussion to give the Arab and Muslim perspective on recommendations contained in the report issued this week by the Iraq Study Group. Panelists: Imad Moustapha, Ambassador of the Syrian Arab Republic; Shibley Telhami, Anwar Sadat Professor at the University of Maryland; Senator Larry Shaw, North Carolina General Assembly; and Parvez Ahmed, CAIR Board Chairman. Location: National Press Club Ballroom.

HARKIN-AGRICULTURE _ 10:30 a.m. Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, incoming Chairman of the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee; and Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanns hold a media availability to discuss their plans to work together to move Americas agriculture and rural communities forward during the 110th Congress. Location: Room 328, Russell Senate Office Building.

TURKEY _ 10:30 a.m. The Economic Policy Institute and the Global Policy Network hold a briefing with Turkish economist Erinc Yeldan on the challenges to Turkey's economy. Location: EPI offices, 3rd floor, East Tower, 1333 H St. NW.

MALARIA SUMMIT _ 11 a.m. The White House holds an off-camera, on-the-record briefing on the White House Summit on Malaria. Location: Room 450, Eisenhower EOB. Notes: Media should gather on the driveway in front of the Brady Briefing Room at 10:40 a.m. for an escort.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD _ 11 a.m. The Family Research Council holds an event with author Chuck Donovan on the social history of Planned Parenthood. Location: 801 G St. NW.

US-AUSTRALIA _ 11 a.m. Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England will attend the US- Australian Ministerial Meetings at the State Department. He and Minister of Defense Nelson of Australia will sign the Joint Strike Fighter Memorandum of Understanding. Location: Treaty Room, State Department. Notes: Media may attend, but the event is a photo-op only. At 2:45 p.m., Secretary of State Rice and her counterpart, Minister Downer, will hold a media availability. England and Nelson also will be in attendance.

CEO ECONOMIC OUTLOOK _ 12 p.m. The Business Roundtable, an association of 160 CEOs of leading US companies, holds a teleconference to release the results of its fourth Quarter CEO Economic Outlook Survey. Contacts: Jennifer Handt, 202-496-3288. Notes: Dial-in telephone number is 800-553-0318. Host: Business Roundtable. Callers will be asked for their name and media outlet before being admitted to the call. If you encounter any problems, please call 202-872-1260.

TRADE _ 12:15 p.m. Customs and Border Protection Commissioner Ralph Basham gives keynote remarks at the Trade Support Network Conference. Location: Westin Arlington Gateway, 801 N. Glebe Rd., Arlington.

DOJ_NMG_0105430

CHILDREN'S INSURANCE _ 1 p.m. Organizations representing pediatricians, children's hospitals and consumers release recommendations for strengthening the State Children's Health Insurance Program. Location: National Press Club.

MILLER-EDUCATION COMMITTEE _ 1 p.m. Incoming House Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman George Miller holds a news conference to discuss the committee's agenda in the 110th Congress. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

TERRORIST FINANCING _ 3:15 p.m. Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser participates in a panel discussion on U.S. policy toward defeating terrorism and insurgencies. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT-ENERGY _ 6 p.m. - 8:30 p.m. The Department of Defense Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics and the Office of Force Transformation hosts ``Energy: A Conversation About Our National Addiction: Winning the Oil End Game," featuring Amory Lovins, whose latest book, latest book, ``Winning the Oil End Game" offers a strategy for ending U.S. oil dependence through proven technologies by 2040. The conversation will be the ninth such gathering where experts in their respective fields meet to learn, share, and collaborate in creating an energy future free from our dependence on fossil fuels. Location: Doubletree Hotel, 300 Army Navy Drive, Arlinton, Va.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Muslim Charity Sues Treasury Seeking Dismissal Of Terrorism Charges ... 3
LATimes Sees Little Likelihood Of Congressional Oversight Of NSA ... 3

Patriot Act:

Bank's Closure Of Charity's Account Draws Fire ... 3

Homeland Response:

New York Man Charged With Bomb Hoax To Protest US "Illegal Surveillance." ... 3
FBI Investigating Possible Link Between 2003 Ricin Letter, Recent Hoaxes ... 4
DPW To Sell US Port Operations ... 4
BioShield Revamp Legislation Ready For Bush's Signature ... 4
New Orleans Courts Reviewing Cases Lost In Wake Of Katrina .. 5

War News:

Bush Meets With State Officials, Says "Success" In Iraq Crucial To US Security ... 5
Rumsfeld Defends White House Conduct Of War On Terror ... 8
Democrats To Circulate "Phase Two" Portion Of Report On Prewar Intelligence ... 8
Annan Takes "Parting Shot" At Bush, US Policies ... 8
Iraqi Politicians Seek Coalition To Counter Sadr Influence ... 9
Pentagon Task Force Looks To Create Jobs In Iraq ... 9
2 Bombs Kill 57 In Baghdad ... 10
Marines Contend With Fallujah's Challenges ... 10
Taliban Regroups In Pakistan ... 10
UK Officials To Stop Using Phrase "War On Terror." ... 10

Corporate Scandals:

DOJ To Announce Changes To Corporate Probe Policy ... 10
No End In Sight For Federal Stock Option Probes ... 11
5th Circuit Delays Skilling's Prison Check-In Pending Bail Ruling 11
Federal Prosecutors Lay Out Case Against Conrad Black ... 12
SEC Sanctions Two Over PNC Accounting Problems ... 12

Criminal Law:

Judge Resolves Dispute Over Classified Information For Libby . 13
FBI Affidavit Unsealed In Prince George's Bribery Probe ... 13
New York Federal Prosecutors Suffer Through Losing Streak ... 13
Judge Seeks Answers On Internal DOJ Probe Of Mafia Case Prosecutor ... 14
Probe Of Amtrak Legal Procedures Gathers Steam ... 14
Raids In Five Cities Nab 19 Bosnian Serbs Charged With War Crimes ... 14
Sheehan Convicted Of Trespassing At UN ... 15
In 9-0 Decision, Supreme Court Reinstates Murder Conviction .. 15
Oregon Doctor Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Botox Scam ... 15
Oregon Lawyer Sentenced To Year In Prison For Loan Fraud ... 16
Three Convicted Of Defrauding Microsoft In Discount Software Scam ... 16
Results Are Mixed On Banks' Efforts To Identity Theft Victims ... 16
Small Stores Account For Most Food Stamp Fraud ... 17
NYTimes Says Drug Companies Must Increase Efforts To Combat Fraud ... 17

Civil Law:

DC Circuit Hears Appeal Of DOD Labor Relations Rules ... 17
Massachusetts DA Testifies At Wrongful Prosecution Civil Trial. 18

Civil Rights:

Report Offers Details Of New York City Police Shooting ... 18
Federal Judge Gives California Six Months To Fix Prison Overcrowding ... 19
Louisiana School Board Sues To Cancel September Election ... 20
Christian Group Says DOD Gave Permission For Officers' Video 20

Antitrust:

DOJ Takes Municipal Bond Probe To Grand Jury ... 20
Critics Urge Close DOJ Review Of Monsanto Deal ... 21
Delta Board Mulls US Air Offer ... 21
LG Philips Shares Suffer On News Of DOJ Probe Of LCD Industry ... 21
Microsoft Lays Out Defense In Iowa Antitrust Trial ... 21

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Justices Rule Against BP In Royalties Case ... 22
California Oil Company Charged With Pollution ... 22
Opponents Say Offshore Drilling Legislation Gives Too Much To Gulf States ... 23
Proposals For Carbon Dioxide Limits Gather Momentum ... 23
Fuel Economy Ratings To Drop Under New EPA Testing Procedures ... 23

LATimes Says Administration Politicizing Science At EPA 23
FWS Pulls Bison Range Management Agreement With Tribes .. 24
US Joins Chippewa Tribe In Land Suit Against Michigan 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alleged Mexican Drug Cartel Leader May Face Federal Death Penalty 24
Nine Plead Guilty To Roles In Drug-Trafficking Organization 25
Personal Trainer In Maryland Accused Of Importing Illicit Muscle Enhancers 25
DEA Agent Says Mexican Drug Cartels Bringing More Potent Meth Into Tennessee 25
Mexico's New President Takes Action Against Drug Gangs 25
ATF Cannot Trace Gun In Fatal New York Shooting 26
Former Mayor Of Missouri Town Faces Federal Arson Charge . 26
Marshals Nab Fugitive At Philadelphia Library Computer 26
Arlington, VA, Awarded DOJ Grant To Fight Gang Activity 26

Tax:

Former Ohio Major Charged With Tax, Mail Fraud 27
DOJ Seeks To Ban California Accountant's Tax Scheme 27
IRS Paid At Least $200 Million In Bogus Refunds Due To Computer Failure 27
Federal Judges Get Tax Break On Stocks Sold Because Of Conflicts 27

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Plan Streamlined Omnibus Spending Bill 28
House Democrats To Push For Government-Negotiated Drug Prices 28
Congress Links Doctors' Medicare Pay, Performance 28
Congress Raises Income Limit On DC Voucher Program 29
Pelosi Pledges Additional Protection For House Pages 29
Ethics Scandals Erode Regard For Members Of Congress 29
House Panel Says McDermott Violated Ethics Standards 29
California Republican Said To Mix Public Actions, Private Business 30
Mollahan Under Investigation For Real Estate Deal 30
House Democratic Leaders May Assign Jefferson To Lesser Committee 30
Portman Will Be Key White House Link To Congressional Democrats 30
Reid Seen As Tenacious Opponent For Bush, GOP 31
Supreme Court Library Closed For Renovations 31
State Department Seeks To Overhaul Foreign Service Exam 31
New SNL Cast Member Portrays Bush 32
NYTimes Says Congress Should Give FDA More Funding For Produce Inspection 32

Other News:

Fed Expected To Keep Rates Steady 32
Plagiarism Case Against Novelist Examined 33
Recount Confirms Pryce Victory In OH15 33
Obama's New Hampshire Visit Continues To Make Waves 33
Clinton Plans Announcement After New Year 34
Kucinich To Announce Bid For White House In Cleveland Tuesday 35
Vilsack Says Democrats Need To Reach Out To Pro-Life Community 35
Kennedy Says He Won't Wait "Indefinitely" For Kerry Decision On Presidential Bid 35
Gingrich Decision On 2008 To Come In September 36
Romney Hired Elizabeth Smart For Fundraiser 36
Lesser-Known Conservatives See Chance To Make Splash In '08 GOP Race 36
Daley Launches Campaign For Sixth Term As Chicago Mayor .. 36
DeLay Launches New Venture As Blogger 36
New York Congregation To Demolish Church, Build Senior Apartments 37
Both Clintons To Attend Book Parities For McAuliffe 37
Rice Seeks Denuclearized North Korea Within 24 Months 37
Rice, Gates To Participate In Security Talks With Japan 37
Rice Says Washington Backs New European Resolution On Iran Sanctions 38
Iran Hosts Conference On Holocaust 38
Rice Warns Syria, Iran Over Lebanon 39
Olmert Appears To Confirm Israel Has Nuclear Arsenal 39
Killing Of Three Palestinian Children Could Spark Civil War 39
Saudi Ambassador Abruptly Resigns, Leaves Washington 40
Somali Islamic Militiamen Advancing On Ethiopian Border 40
Congressional Study Finds Continuing Delays In Delivering Darfur Aid 41
US, UK Move Toward Resolving Fighter Jet Dispute 41
UK Nuclear Plans Highlight "Urgent Need" To Reform Global Framework 41
Western Companies Embrace Turkey 41
US Report Delivers "Rebuke" To China Ahead Of Officials' Visit 41
Administration Seeks To Revive Momentum For Doha Trade Deal 42
Probe Of Litvinenko Poisoning Leads To Hamburg 42
Role Of FSB Expanding Under Putin 43
Pinochet's Death Reopens Chilean Wounds 43
NSA Denies Monitoring Princess Diana's Calls 44
Kristof Urges Bush To Make Issue Of Child Slavery 44

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 44

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 45

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0105433

TERRORISM NEWS:

Muslim Charity Sues Treasury Seeking Dismissal Of Terrorism Charges. The New York Times (12/12, MacFarquhar) reports from San Francisco, "In a new challenge to Washington over its closing several American Muslim charities that it has accused of aiding terrorism, the largest such group sued on Monday seeking dismissal of many of the charges." The Times continues, "Lawyers for the group, the Holy Land Foundation of Richardson, Tex., filed suit in Federal District Court in Dallas two weeks after a federal judge in California called into question a crucial provision in designating terrorist supporters. Since December 2001, the Treasury Department has designated Holy Land and five other Muslim charities in the United States as terrorist supporters, seizing millions of dollars in assets and halting their activities. … No accused charity or any senior officer have been convicted on a charge of terrorism. Some charities have faced no criminal charges." The Times adds, "In a separate case against a Georgia man whom the prosecution identified as a fund-raiser for Holy Land, the defendant pleaded guilty this year to sending money to Hamas, the Islamist Palestinian political party that Washington first designated as a terrorist organization in 1995. … The foundation denies that the man had an official post." The Times notes, "The government has accused the foundation of having been the American fund-raising arm of Hamas. The charity and five officers are expected to go on trial in July on charges of financing a foreign terrorist organization, money laundering and tax fraud. … A spokesman for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra, said he could not comment on the Holy Land motion because it was too new. As a matter of procedure, Mr. Sierra said, prosecution does not automatically follow the designation of a charity as a terrorist organization. … 'Not every case is a criminal case,' he said. 'It's a question of can you come up with enough evidence to prosecute based on a violation of the statutes of material support for terrorism.'"

LATimes Sees Little Likelihood Of Congressional Oversight Of NSA. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K) editorializes, "Almost a year after President Bush confirmed that the National Security Agency had been eavesdropping on some Americans without a court order, expressions of outrage in Congress have yet to be translated into law. What little scrutiny the so-called Terrorist Surveillance Program has received has come from the Justice Department, whose inspector general is looking into how information gathered by the program has been used. Surely, you say, Congress will be more assertive under Democratic control. Don't count on it." The Times adds, "Democratic victories in midterm elections should mean that Congress will be more interested in regulating the NSA program. But inertia is a strong force. Moreover, many Democrats -- especially newcomers from Republican-leaning states -- will be reluctant to counter the administration's propagandistic argument that only Americans who regularly call Al Qaeda need to worry about the program."

PATRIOT ACT:

Bank's Closure Of Charity's Account Draws Fire. The Detroit Free Press (12/12, Warikoo) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice may defend the Patriot Act in a case involving Comerica Bank and a Muslim charity based in Southfield, according to court documents the department filed in Detroit." The Free Press continues, "Comerica officials have told Life for Relief and Development that it intends to close its accounts. … The bank's move came after the charity was raided by federal agents in September. The government has not said what the raid was about, but charity officials say it may be related to work the charity did in Iraq." The Free Press adds, "In response, the charity sued Comerica, saying the bank violated its civil rights. … The suit, filed last month, challenges the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act that allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity." The Free Press notes, "On Dec. 1, Justice Department attorneys filed a notice in U.S. District Court in Detroit that said it may 'intervene in this action to defend the constitutionality' of the section under question. … Some Arab Americans and Muslims charge the bank is discriminating against the charity because it is operated by Arab-American Muslims."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New York Man Charged With Bomb Hoax To Protest US "Illegal Surveillance." The AP (12/12) reports Paul Cortina of Somers, N.Y., "was charged Monday with carrying out a bomb hoax to protest what he called the government's 'illegal surveillance,' federal prosecutors said. … He was arrested Nov. 29 after FBI agents seized what appeared to be a bomb from his home, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said. … The device, however, contained no explosive material." The AP notes, "In the e-mail to the AP, Cortina identified himself by name and gave his telephone number. The AP notified the FBI, and an agent called the number and visited Cortina at his home. He admitted sending the e-mail, the FBI said."

DOJ_NMG_0105434

FBI Investigating Possible Link Between 2003 Ricin Letter, Recent Hoaxes. McClatchy (12/12, Douglas) reports, "Federal investigators are looking into a possible link between recent hoax letters, each containing a white powder and believed to have been sent by a Texas prison inmate, to determine whether they are related to a small shipment of the poison ricin to a mailing center in South Carolina in 2003. Someone calling himself the Fallen Angel signed at least one of the six recent letters…and the ricin letter…an FBI alert said. The high priority alert, dated late last month, said the U.S. Clerk's Office in Buffalo on Nov. 20 received one of the letters, which was signed 'Fallen Angel' and contained a nontoxic powder." McClatchy notes, "The earlier letter, the alert said, made reference to the Department of Transportation and was signed, 'Fallen Angel.' Lori Bailey, spokeswoman for the FBI in Dallas, declined to comment."

DPW To Sell US Port Operations. The AP (12/12, Barrett) reports, "Dubai Ports World, the company whose planned takeover of major US port operations ignited a political firestorm earlier this year, has agreed to sell those operations to AIG Global Investment Group." BP "announced the deal Monday. The US operations at six major U.S. seaports in New York/New Jersey, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Miami, Tampa and New Orleans were valued at approximately $700 million, but DP World did not disclose the sales price." The deal also "involves stevedoring operations in 16 locations along the eastern seaboard and Gulf Coast and a passenger terminal in New York City." The AP adds, "One of the loudest critics of the original deal said he was pleased and expected the deal to clear the few regulatory hurdles that remain. 'This is an appropriate final chapter to the book on the Dubai Ports World deal,' said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. 'This is very likely to receive broad support in Washington and throughout America.'" The Wall Street Journal (12/12, King, Hitt, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the story.

Panel Reviews Foreign Business Deals With Eye Toward Security. The AP (12/12, Bridis) reports, "In the same year that public furor derailed a Dubai-owned company's plans to buy and run operations at major American ports, the number of foreign business deals reviewed by the Bush administration for U.S. security risks surged to nearly 100, up from 65 reviews last year." The AP continues, "A few anxious companies in deals pending with foreigners have sought the Bush administration's approval even for sales that do not raise obvious security questions, said lawyers and federal officials involved in these cases. … They attributed the jump largely to a busy year for international mergers and broader awareness of such reviews after the political uproar that scuttled the Dubai ports deal. The government's reviews included the $11.6 billion sale of Lucent Technologies Inc. to Alcatel SA of France; Toshiba Corp.'s $5.4 billion purchase of nuclear power-plant manufacturer Westinghouse Electric Co.; and smaller deals involving seismic surveys, a gas utility, military parts, voting machines and even anti-hacker software. … 'The numbers are up. A company will file even though they don't think it's a national security concern,' said Clay Lowery, an assistant secretary at the Treasury Department." The AP adds, "Most of the reviews this year, however, raised legitimate concerns, said Christopher Padilla, an assistant secretary at the Commerce Department. 'Of the increases we've seen, only one or two cases didn't have national security issues that needed to be raised,' he said. 'These transactions are getting the scrutiny that's called for.'" The AP notes, "The secretive panel that conducted nearly 100 reviews also completed seven full-blown investigations this year reflecting broader concerns over proposed deals. That is equal to the combined number over the previous five years. … The 12-member Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States is led by the Treasury Department. It hired a new deputy to oversee reviews; tripled to six the number of people who work on such reviews; and now requires deals to be approved by one of the department's presidential appointees."

WPost Notes DHS Work With DPW. In an editorial, the Washington Post (12/12, A26, 690K) writes about "a depressing outbreak of anti-Arab hysteria in Congress and elsewhere" which "doomed an effort by a company called Dubai Ports World to take over the management of some American ports." The Post adds, " Last week, the Department of Homeland Security announced that it will work with several port authorities abroad to scan cargo before it is loaded onto ships bound for the United States. Among the facilities identified to host this Secure Freight Initiative is Britain's bustling Southampton seaport, operated by, yes, Dubai Ports World. So far, even the loudest objectors in Congress to the earlier deal haven't publicly questioned Homeland Security's choice to inaugurate a major security initiative in a facility operated by the once-controversial United Arab Emirates-based firm. That's encouraging as well as telling. … A successful partnership would…demonstrate that Americans have little to fear from Dubai Ports World and firms like it -- and that they shouldn't single out Arab-owned companies for suspicion without good reason."

BioShield Revamp Legislation Ready For Bush's Signature. The Washington Post (12/12, A15, Merle, 690K) reports the House and Senate have passed legislation to revamp "the two-year-old Project BioShield, which has been marked by delays and operational problems."

DOJ_NMG_0105435

Sen. Richard Burr, one of the bill's "principal backers," said he thinks it has "already made a difference. We have more people, more companies, more academic institutions, that have looked at this legislation and planned how they can plug into it." The Post added that the legislation, which President Bush intends to sign, "allocates $1 billion over three years for research not funded by a Project BioShield contract or the National Institutes of Health and attempts to pump more government money into the private sector sooner."

New Orleans Courts Reviewing Cases Lost In Wake Of Katrina. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Simmons, 850K) reports New Orleans' indigent defense system, long "plagued by negligent attorneys who provide haphazard and deficient representation," spun "into chaos" in the months following Hurricane Katrina: "Funding plummeted; 15 lawyers quit the already thin legal staff; documents and evidence were lost or destroyed." Pamela R. Metzger, director of Tulane University's Criminal Law Clinic, "has helped to form the Katrina-Gideon Interview Project, a national coalition of law students and law professors" who "are reviewing about 1,800 pre- and post-Katrina cases. They include people who have been imprisoned well beyond any sentence they might receive for such charges as probation violation, failure to pay a fine or prostitution."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With State Officials, Says "Success" In Iraq Crucial To US Security. The AP (12/12, Ben Feller) notes that President Bush yesterday met with Secretary Rice "and her senior advisers on Iraq, and with diplomats who serve as leaders of US joint civilian-military units called provincial reconstruction teams." Ambassador Khalilzad also participated by videoconference. Afterwards, Assistant Secretary McCormack said the meeting was "a good give and take," noting that "the president had questions throughout the entire set of briefings."

The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Gerstenzang, 850K) says the President, launching his " highly visible round of consultations…reiterated Monday that 'success' there was crucial to the long-term protection of the United States and said Iraq's regional neighbors have a responsibility to help the country's fledgling government." The Times adds, "In the aftermath of last week's sharply critical report by the Iraq Study Group, the White House is eager to draw the spotlight to other ideas and options more in keeping with Bush's goals." Fox News' Special Report (Baier) noted the President said "success…is an Iraq that can sustain, defend and govern itself and is an ally in the war on terror." But CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Dobbs) said Bush "did not use the word victory, a word he has used frequently in the past. The President's consultations come amid signs the Iraqi government is rapidly losing support among its own supporters."

CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Rirchits) later reported that in remarks yesterday, the President called Iraq "a central component, instead of what he has said over and over, the central front in the war on terror. A White House spokesman Tony Snow quickly insisted it was not a change, raising questions about whether the President has a dramatic new approach or are these internal reviews by the State and Defense departments really just an attempt to give him political cover, to ignore the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group?" The White House, added CNN, "did not sound ready for big change." Likewise, NBC Nightly News (12/11, lead story, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported the White House's "message" yesterday "seemed to be, 'Don't expect much of a change.'" NBC (Gregory) added, "And yet all this raises expectations for a major change in policy toward Iraq. At the same time it is becoming clear that the White House is not about to embrace the Baker-Hamilton study recommendations." A similar piece in today's Newsday (12/12, Gordon) reports that Bush's "early comments suggest he is in no mood for the sweeping changes sought by the study group."

All three networks led with Bush's meetings – which were presented as a White House PR effort to help him regain his footing on the Iraq issue after the release of the Iraq Study Group's report. The CBS Evening News (12/11, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Today's trip to the State Department was a highly public visit designed to show the President's at least listening to other opinions about a new course." Bush was shown saying, "Like most Americans, this Administration wants to succeed in Iraq."

ABC World News (12/11, lead story, 2:40, Raddatz, 8.78M) reported "the President has spent the last year talking over and over again about his strategy for victory in Iraq. But this week, he says, he's listening." Yesterday afternoon, after his meetings at State, "a panel of five scholars and retired generals briefed the President for more than an hour. … What the people in the room were known for is their withering criticism of the Baker/Hamilton report released last week." Michael Green, former National Security Council aide, told ABC News, "By meeting with them, it's a clear demonstration from the White House, that the Iraq study group is part of this conversation. But not the answer in itself."

NBC Nightly News (12/11, lead story, 2:55, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "The President's optimistic talk of success and democracy in Iraq appeared to be an attempt to rebut the Baker-Hamilton report's grim conclusions that the situation is 'grave and deteriorating.' Mr. Bush may be emboldened by a new round of attacks on the Iraq study group by conservative supporters of the war." David Frum, conservative activist: "I think the report throughout has a complete failure of imagination about what an American failure in Iraq would look like." Conservative "hawks lampooned Baker and Hamilton as 'surrender monkeys' in the 'New York Post.' Others have dismissed the call for a new diplomatic offensive and pushed for more, not fewer troops in Iraq to salvage victory." At the White House, the President also "consulted some military and foreign affairs experts who have been critical of the report."

DOJ_NMG_0105436

Under the headline "Experts Advise Bush Not To Reduce Troops," the Washington Post (12/12, A1, Fletcher, Ricks, 690K) reports Bush heard "a blunt and dismal assessment of his handling of Iraq from a group of military experts yesterday, but the advisers shared the White House's skeptical view of the recommendations made last week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, sources said." The three retired generals and two academics "disagreed in particular with the study group's plans to reduce the number of US combat troops in Iraq and to reach out for help to Iran and Syria, according to sources familiar with the meeting."

NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 2, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) interviewed retired US Army Generals and NBC News military analysts Barry McCaffrey and Wayne Downing." Asked, "What did the President ask of you," McCaffrey said, "I think each one of these people were asked to give their own view point. They were widely divergent. Clearly the big issues are -- should we reinforce with more US combat units? I think my answer clearly is no. I argued for economic reconstruction aid, $10 billion a year for clearly downplaying the direct US combat role. Get US troops out of the city in the coming two years and the second issue was, how about embedded trainers? Do we actually want 20,000 US Sergeants and captains at company level in Iraqi army police? I argued no. You want less people who speak Arabic who are Special Forces who come from elite active duty units. This isn't numbers, it's quality." Williams: "And General Downing, same question. Were these mostly points that have been brought to the public debate as a result of the Iraq Study Group?" General Wayne Downing: "I think they were. They were widely divergent. I made the point of no more US forces but I also believed that the key to this thing is going to be the Iraqi security forces. My comment to the President was, we've got to look at this long war on terrorism, this ideological struggle we're in, with Al Qaeda, radical Islam through the prism of Iraq. We can't just look at Iraq and Afghanistan. We've got to look beyond that. And the last point I made was the perception of the American people."

The Wall Street Journal (12/12, Pulizzi, 2.04M) reports Bush also said yesterday, "We believe that most of the countries understand that a mainstream society, a society that is a functioning democracy, is in their interests. … And it's up to us to help focus their attention and focus their efforts on helping the Iraqis succeed." The President "didn't name any countries, however, one of the Iraq Study Group's main proposals was for enhanced regional engagement, including with Syria and Iran."

The New York Times (12/12, A14, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports that Monday's meeting with Rice was part of Bush's "listening tour" and mentions that Vice President Cheney also attended the meeting. After the meeting, Bush "said they had discussed the roles Iraq's neighbors could play in stabilizing Iraq. … But Mr. Bush continued to make it clear he did not believe Syria or Iran would play such roles."

USA Today (12/12, Jackson, 2.27M) notes "scheduled today: an Oval Office meeting with Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni vice president in Iraq's coalition government." Tomorrow, Bush "will go to the Pentagon to meet with military officials about the increasingly unpopular war, which helped cost Republicans control of Congress in the elections in November." White House spokesman Tony Snow "said Bush hopes to outline his Iraq plans before Christmas, but 'it's not locked down.'" Added Snow, "It's something we would like to see, but I'm not going to promise it,."

Polls Show Record Disapproval Of Bush On Iraq. The CBS Evening News (12/11, lead story, 2:45, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In a CBS News poll out tonight, a record 71% said the war is going badly. More than half say it's unlikely the United States will win. And a record number say the war is the most pressing problem America is facing right now." CBS (Axelrod) added "an all-time high of 75% now disapprove of the President's handling of Iraq and despite this and despite last week's high-profile push from the Baker-Hamilton commission, the President still is not ready to announce a policy shift on Iraq." CBS also reported that "by a margin of almost to one, those polled say they trust Democrats in Congress more than the President to make the right decisions in Iraq."

On the CBS Evening News (12/11, story 2, 2:35, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said, "if you were George Bush, I have to say it just does not get any worse than this and the more you get into this poll, the more you understand just how deeply this opposition to the war is now running. Only 21% now approve of the President's handling of the war, but look at why: Because he is now losing his own base, Republicans and conservatives. Just last month, even after the election that cost them control of Congress, 70% of Republicans still approved the President's handling of the war. Now that has dropped 23 points in a month. This is opposition that is taking on historic proportions."

USA Today (12/12, Page, 2.27M) reports on a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday. By 76%-22%, "those surveyed say Iraq is in a civil war. The White House disputes that characterization, calling the conflict part of a global battle against terrorism. … While 55% of Americans want most U.S. troops withdrawn within a year, only 18% think that will happen. More than 4 in 10 predict American troops will be deployed in Iraq for more than two years, though just 14% endorse that idea." USA Today adds, "In a question asked of a half-sample, a record high 62% of Americans say the war in Iraq isn't 'worth it,' and a record low 16% say the United States is winning. That's less than half the 40% who held that view a year ago. Now, nearly two-thirds say neither side is winning. … Looking ahead, 35% predict the United States eventually will win the war, also a new low. … On the long-term consequences of the war in Iraq: 38%, of those surveyed predict people in Iraq will be better off because of the war; 35% say they will be worse off." In an analysis piece, USA Today (12/12, Page, Risser, 2.27M) says "most Americans are convinced of two things: It's important that the United States succeed in Iraq. Eight in 10 of those surveyed in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll over the weekend agree with President Bush about that. Important, perhaps, but not worth the price. By nearly 2-1, they also say the costs of succeeding in Iraq outweigh the benefits."

DOJ_NMG_0105437

Rumsfeld Questions Diplomacy With Iran. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (12/11, Hannity), Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said he hadn't read the Iraq Study Group report in detail, but on the subject of diplomacy with Iran, he said, "They have been contributing to the violence in Iraq. They have been unhelpful.. They have agents operating and they're using funding in this country to not allow it to be successful. We are one to decide they want to talk to somebody -- they must first understand, why is it that we would want to talk to them? Is there some reason that they would want to have commonality of interest?"

DeLay Derides "Iraq Surrender Group." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/11, Barnicle), former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay opined that the Iraq Study Group should be called the "Iraq Surrender Group" and panned the Iraq Study Group's world view, saying, "[I]t's the same world view that had the attitude that the enemy of my enemy is my friend, and back when they were negotiating with Saddam Hussein against Iran, empowered him. He invaded Kuwait, we had to go to war. We didn't finish that war because of diplomatic issues, the same group that went and negotiated with Syria, empowered Assad to go into Lebanon and killed thousands of people in Lebanon, the same group that considered Arafat their partner in peace. I mean, sometime you have to understand that the enemy of my enemy just might be my enemy."

Republicans Criticize Bush Iraq Strategy. Fox News' Special Report (12/11, Hume) noted recent comments by Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith (R), who said he was "at the end of my rope when it comes to supporting a policy that has our soldiers patrolling the same streets, in the same way, being blown up by the same bombs day after day, that is obscured," and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback (R), who said, "[T]he country has been pretty patient on Iraq, but now it's time to move things forward." NPR contributor Mara Liasson said, "I think it's possible this could be the beginning of something more if the president's Iraq policy, whatever it turns into after his speech, before Christmas, doesn't begin to show results. I think that's the impatience and frustration that Gordon Smith and Sam Brownback are voicing, not that they're ready to get out in four to six months, as some Democrats say, but just that that they feel that this either has to show results, look like it's succeeding or else they're through." Fred Barnes, Weekly Standard: "Brownback said he wasn't bailing out on Bush, but that's exactly what he was doing, bailing out, completely. You know, so there are just a lot of Republicans who don't want to defend this war anymore. On the other hand the same hand there are -- actually on the same hand, there area Republicans who are deeply resentful of Bush for harming them, they blame Bush because of the war, and that's why they lost these seats."

More Commentary. GOP consultant Mike Murphy writes in the Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K), "Bush should spend less time worrying about the tangled politics of Iraq and more time mastering the equally fractured politics of Washington. The war in Iraq has become partisan -- and partisan wars are impossible to fight successfully." The "chief result of last week's report from" the ISG report "has been to corner an already weakened president by proposing a general strategy of retreat and withdrawal." Bush "likes to move boldly and preemptively. He would be well advised to do so right now by adopting a strategy that he would find immensely painful but that is the best option he has. He should trump the Baker commission by extending its bipartisan spirit to make the Democrats an offer no patriot can refuse: He should establish a bipartisan war council made up of his national security team and the Democratic leaders of the key national security committees in Congress. Under the president's leadership, this council would conduct the Iraq war, becoming the key coordinating vehicle for Iraqi policy. The president would not cede his authority as commander in chief, but he would work with this group -- which would include such leaders as Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Reps. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) and Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) -- to develop a consensus policy for Iraq." The Times adds, "The president could, in one statesmanlike gesture, end the paralysis in Washington, force Democratic maturity, reestablish his leadership and show our enemies American unity and resolve at a critical time for our nation. The public would reward it, and the national interest demands it."

Bret Stephens writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, 2.04M), "What matters more than the fate of the ISG report…are the political symptoms it betrays. The report is surely right that there is 'no magic formula to solve the problems of Iraq.' Yet if the US faces a terror problem today, it is not because it is an obnoxious hyperpower or a rapacious globalizer, but because of the deep suspicion that it is not too ashamed to betray its friends or cut a deal with its enemies -- in short, that it lacks a sense of honor. In this sense, the Iraq Study Group has already inflicted its damage, no matter where it goes from here."

DOJ_NMG_0105438

DeWayne Wickham, in USA Today (12/12, 21A, 2.27M), "Refusing to hold direct talks with its most troubling adversaries is a defining principle of Bush's foreign policy. It is one that might make his administration the most impolitic since this country took a commanding position on the world stage -- and the most dangerous. … With two years left in his presidency, Bush still has time to open a meaningful dialogue with the leaders of the nations he has refused to talk to. He still has time to realize that talking directly to his adversaries is a sign of strength -- not weakness."

Eugene Gholz, a professor of public affairs at the University of Texas, and Daryl G. Press and Benjamin Valentino, who teach government at Dartmouth, write in the New York Times (12/12, 1.16M), "The Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the United States withdraw its combat forces from Iraq reflects a growing national consensus that our military cannot quell the violence there and may even be making matters worse. Although many are hailing this recommendation as a bold new course, it is not bold enough. America will best serve its interests in the Persian Gulf by withdrawing its ground-based military forces not only from Iraq, but from the entire region." The Iraq war "is now a painful failure for the United States."

In the Financial Times (12/12) columnist Edward Luce contends, "As…Bush agonises over [the ISG report], another consensus is emerging in Washington on how to handle the situation: blame the Iraqis. ... Leading Republican and Democratic politicians in the US are increasingly blaming the friable coalition government of Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, for a lack of progress. ... But it is not a view that is widely shared by those with extensive direct experience of Iraq."

Rumsfeld Defends White House Conduct Of War On Terror. On Fox News' Hannity & Colmes (12/11, Hannity), Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said, "I think that history has to look at this period as a period that is new, where there is no roadmap, no guidebook that said, 'This is how you do this,' and an awful lot of right decisions were made." He added, "There is no way to defend every location against every conceivable technique. It cannot be done. You have no choice but to go after them where they are. You cannot wait to be hit. That concept is central to the present position and it is the right one."

Democrats To Circulate "Phase Two" Portion Of Report On Prewar Intelligence. The Hill (12/12, Schor) reports that West Virginia Sen. Jay Rockefeller, who will chair the Senate Intelligence Committee, told The Hill that the "three unreleased sections of the Senate Intelligence Committee's controversial 'Phase Two' report on the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence are headed for circulation next year." The Hill adds, "Democrats have repeatedly protested the lack of progress on the Phase Two investigation, which was split by outgoing Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) to allow some portions to become public before the midterm elections. Democrats pulled the Senate into a rare closed session in November 2005 to revive the inquiry, which began in 2003 with Phase One's look at the intelligence community and was later expanded."

Annan Takes "Parting Shot" At Bush, US Policies. Multiple major outlets are reporting that in a speech at the Truman Center in Independence, Missouri, departing UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan criticized the Bush administration's unilateralism and its policies in Iraq. USA Today (12/12, Slavin, 2.27M) calls the speech "unusual for a UN secretary-general concluding his tenure." The AP (12/12, Stafford) notes that after the speech, the secretary-general "said he was appealing for cooperation and leadership, not criticizing the United States."

ABC World News (12/11, story 3, 0:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The outgoing United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan took a parting shot at President Bush today. In his final speech before stepping down, Annan said the US must not sacrifice its principles in the name of fighting terrorism." Kofi Annan, United Nations Secretary General: "This country has historically been in the vanguard of global human rights movement. When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

The New York Times (12/12, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "The Bush administration had a subdued reaction to the speech. 'We work well with Secretary General Annan on a number of different issues,' said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman. 'There are some issues on which we disagree. That is to be expected.'"

Fox News' Special Report (12/11, Rosin) reported, "Kofi Annan told a crowd at the Truman library the world is in a sorry state and suggested, without naming names, that the Bush Administration is partly to blame. First, Annan noted the US has historically maintained a lead in human rights. … Seconds later, Annan seemed to suggest the invasion of Iraq was unlawful." Fox News added, "Released ahead of time, his remarks were widely seen as an attack on the Bush administration, but fielding questions after his speech, Annan said nothing could be further from the truth."

Meanwhile, commentators appearing on Fox News were critical of Annan's speech. On Fox News' Your World (12/11, Cavuto), syndicated columnist Claudia Rosett said, "The real question here is how much is Kofi Annan going to collect for his future ventures from anti-American well-heeled characters who wanted that speech, who love that speech. And I make of it that it's of a piece with his administration. And the fact that a man whose own performance after a career as a manager at the U.N. was judged substandard, mediocre, in fact desperately lacking even by the U.N.'s own investigation into oil-for- food, makes it really laughable that he is there now lecturing the American people on principles and governance." Also on Fox News Your World (12/11, Cavuto), former House Speaker Newt Gingrich said, "There are many things he could say about member states, a number of whom, frankly, should have their membership suspended, starting with Iran. … But he's not going to say any of those things. And the fascinating problem…is that politeness allows hypocrisy, corruption and, frankly, sometimes evil to parade in front of the world with legitimacy and authority. … I think tragic in the case of Annan who was a failure, but who is treated as though he is a success, because, after all, it would be so impolite to treat him as the failure that he's been."

DOJ_NMG_0105439

USA Today (12/12, Slavin, 2.27M) reports, "In a farewell speech on U.S. soil today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan delivered a tough critique of President Bush's policies. He accused the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support." USA Today characterizes the Annan's speech as "among his toughest" and "unusual for a UN secretary-general concluding his tenure." USA Today elucidates, "In the 61-year history of the U.N., no secretary-general has ended his tenure by criticizing U.S. policies so sharply, said Stanley Meisler, a historian of the United Nations and author of a new biography of Annan."

The AP (12/12, Stafford) reports, "In the hometown of President Harry Truman, who helped found the United Nations, Annan said 'human rights and the rule of law are vital to global security and prosperity.' When the U.S. 'appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused,' Annan told a packed audience at the Truman Presidential Museum and Library." The AP notes, "Annan never mentioned President Bush by name in his speech but drew clear contrasts with the Truman administration."

The New York Times (12/12, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "Having infuriated the Bush administration two years ago by labeling the Iraq war 'illegal,' [Annan] said that while observing international law could be "inconvenient," it was essential. In a clear reference to the lack of international support for the American action in Iraq, he said: 'No state can make its own actions legitimate in the eyes of others. When power, especially military force, is used, the world will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose — for broadly shared aims — in accordance with broadly accepted norms.'

In a report that was also syndicated to other McClatchy newspapers, The Kansas City (MO) Star (12/12, Burnes) reports, "In his farewell address on Monday in front of about 200 invited guests and reporters at the Truman Museum in Independence, Annan emphasized the U.N.'s importance, saying that 'more than ever today, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system through which the world's peoples can face global challenges together.'" The Star adds, "The future success of the United Nations depends on America's appropriate use of that power, he said, along with the organization's adherence to five core principles: shared responsibility, global prosperity, rule of law, mutual accountability and multilateralism." In a separate editorial, the Kansas City (MO) Star (12/12) opines, "Annan's address betrayed little recognition that on his watch, the U.N.'s stature sank.. … [I]t was a bit jarring to hear Annan once again focus on U.S. faults"

The Guardian (UK) (12/12, Goldenberg) reports, "After three years of increasingly vocal opposition to the war on Iraq, Mr Annan's speech yesterday amounted to a broad condemnation of the neoconservative ideology guiding America's foreign policy under George Bush - a clear break with protocol for a departing UN chief. … The broadside is merely the latest sign of Mr Annan's anger at the administration since US forces invaded Iraq in March 2003 without the approval of the security council."

Iraqi Politicians Seek Coalition To Counter Sadr Influence. The New York Times (12/12, Wong, 1.16M) reports, "After discussions with the Bush administration, several of Iraq's major political parties," including the "two main Kurdish groups, the most influential Sunni Arab party and an Iranian-backed Shiite party that has long sought to lead the government," are now "in talks to form a coalition whose aim is to break the powerful influence of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr within the government, senior Iraqi officials say." The Times adds, "The Americans, frustrated with Mr. Maliki's political dependence on Mr. Sadr, appear to be working hard to help build the new coalition. President Bush met last week in the White House with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Iranian-backed Shiite party, and is to meet on Tuesday with Tariq al-Hashemi, leader of the Sunni Arab party."

Pentagon Task Force Looks To Create Jobs In Iraq. The Washington Post (12/12, A1, White, Witte, 690K) reports, "Members of a small Pentagon task force have gone to the most dangerous areas of Iraq over the past six months to bring life to nearly 200 state-owned factories abandoned by the Coalition Provisional Authority after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Their goal is to employ tens of thousands of Iraqis in coming months, part of a plan to reduce soaring unemployment and lessen the violence that has crippled progress." The Post adds, "The CPA initially hoped private investors would buy or lease the state factories, but that did not happen as security faltered and much of Iraq became inaccessible. As privatization hopes failed, the factories languished; some were in pristine form and others had been looted when the Pentagon task force examined them this fall."

DOJ_NMG_0105440

2 Bombs Kill 57 In Baghdad. The AP (12/12, Bashir) reports, "Suspected insurgents set off two bombs in a main square of central Baghdad where scores of Iraqis were waiting for jobs as day laborers on Tuesday, killing at least 57 people and wounding 151, police said." The "carefully coordinated" bombing "involved a parked car bomb and a suicide attacker who drove up in a minibus." The bomb site, "Tayaran Square, is located near several government ministries and a bridge that crosses the Tigris River to the heavily fortified Green Zone."

Shiite, Sunni Families Suffer Similar Fates In Violence. The Washington Post (12/12, A20, Trejos, 690K) reports, "Twenty armed men entered the Subhi family home in southern Kirkuk at dawn Monday, killing a 12-year-old boy, his 13-year-old sister and their pregnant mother, police said. The al-Jubori family met a similar fate on Sunday when gunmen opened fire on their minibus in Muqdadiyah, northeast of Baghdad. ... The Subhi family is Shiite. The Jubori family is Sunni. Both families were warned by their neighbors to leave their homes because they were not of the desired sect, according to police. The Jubori family left. The Subhi family did not." After "last month's car bombings in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City and this past weekend's purging of Sunnis from the Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah, members of both sects say they are gripped by fear."

Marines Contend With Fallujah's Challenges. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Peterson, 59K) reports in a bleak article, "The wariness that greeted this [Marine] civil affairs unit two weeks ago points to the difficulty faced by US forces as they search for a balance between rebuilding and bringing security to a city where insurgent attacks are on the rise. ... For two years, strategic rebuilding has been complicated by frequent rotation of Marine units. Today, it is made more difficult by increasing violence and insurgent numbers - Iraqi contractors and workers are frequently killed - and a Marine presence that has shrunk to less than 300. ... the challenge is to spread US money in Fallujah to win goodwill in a way that does not further endanger Iraqis willing to help." Meanwhile, "lavishing funds on cities like Fallujah drew criticism from outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld in a memo dated Nov. 6, two days before his resignation."

Taliban Regroups In Pakistan. Following yesterday's New York Times account of growing Taliban strength in northern Pakistan, the AP (12/12, Pennington) reports, "A peace deal between Pakistan's government and Islamic militants in the northwestern tribal region of North Waziristan has created a virtual Taliban mini-state where mullahs dispense justice and fighters are launching cross-border attacks into neighboring Afghanistan, a think tank reported Monday." The International Crisis Group cited "reports of pro-Taliban militants attacking music, video and CD stores, closing barber shops, imposing taxes and establishing courts to impose summary justice" in North Waziristan. Its "grim assessment came against the backdrop of an alarming surge in violence in southern and eastern Afghanistan this year that has killed close to 4,000 people." The Pakistani government rejected the ICG's "baseless allegations."

US Expresses "Concern" Over Taliban Havens In Waziristan. AFP (12/12) reports, "The United States said it was concerned over safe havens being established by Islamic militants in northern Pakistan's tribal areas bordering Afghanistan. The concerns stemmed from reports [by the New York Times] Monday that Pakistan's peace deals with militants in its tribal areas are helping to fuel Taliban's regrouping." State Department spokesman Eric McCormack said, "Having safe havens and areas where these extremists can operate from is a real concern for us."

UK Officials To Stop Using Phrase "War On Terror." CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Dobbs) reported, "The British government tonight is apparently dropping the phrase 'the war on terror.' the British foreign office has reportedly told government officials to stop using the expression because it believes the phrase could anger Muslims. However, many radical Islamists in Britain have no hesitation about their support of terrorism. A top British official yesterday said the security services are monitoring 30 conspiracies and a terrorist attack in Britain over the Christmas holiday is, according to the British government officials, highly likely."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ To Announce Changes To Corporate Probe Policy. The Financial Times (12/12, Masters) reports, "The US Department of Justice will announce Tuesday that it plans to make it easier for companies under investigation to cooperate with prosecutors and avoid criminal indictment, the Financial Times has learned. … Specifically, field prosecutors will no longer have blanket authority to demand that a company waive its attorney-client confidentiality privileges and instead will have to seek higher-level approval in Washington before making such a request, according to a Department of Justice official who asked not to be identified." The Times continues, "The new policy, to be announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, also addresses the controversial practice of requiring companies to cease paying legal fees for employees implicated in matters under investigation." The Times adds, "The revisions come after months of criticism from defense attorneys, the business community and some members of Congress of the cooperation policy set forth in a 2003 memo by Larry Thompson, then the deputy attorney general. Critics of the Thompson memo have argued that prosecutors gained too much power after the collapse of Enron and WorldCom and needed to be reined in. … Senator Arlen Specter has introduced legislation that would prevent prosecutors from requiring waiver of attorney-client privilege. A federal judge in New York hearing a major tax fraud case has harshly criticized the Justice Department for requiring accounting firm KPMG to stop paying attorneys fees for its former employees as part of its cooperation agreement. The judge, Lewis Kaplan, ordered KPMG in June to resume paying the fees. That case is on appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0105441

No End In Sight For Federal Stock Option Probes. The AP (12/12, Gordon) reports, "Eighteen CEOs swept out. More than a hundred public companies under federal investigation and over $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc." The AP continues, "The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives." The AP adds, "Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings. Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports. … The Justice Department will 'continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out,' U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. 'The final chapter hasn't been written yet.'" The AP notes, "Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era. The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference. … Among the wide swath of companies caught up in internal or government investigations: Apple Computer Inc., Barnes & Noble Inc., Caremark Rx Inc., Costco Wholesale Corp., Gap Inc., The Home Depot Inc., McAfee Inc., Monster Worldwide Inc., Restoration Hardware Inc., Staples Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc."

Backdated Options Can Yield Hefty Tax Bills. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, B1, Francis) reports, "Many of the hundred-plus companies under investigation over backdated stock options -- and the individuals who received those options -- are scrambling to protect themselves from another potential consequence: stiff tax bills. For individuals, the tax bill and penalties could prove steep, even if the shares become worthless. Companies, too, could face a hefty bill and potential penalties for unpaid income and payroll taxes." The Journal continues, "Options generally give an employee a future right to buy an employer's shares at a specified price. If the stock rises, the employee makes money. And if the company cheats, backdating an option grant to a period when the stock was lower than the day it was actually granted, the recipient benefits financially even more." The Journal adds, "Ordinarily, top executives owe income taxes on any gains from exercising their options at the time of exercise. Lower-level employees often receive another kind of stock option that is typically taxed only when the underlying shares are actually sold (although they can be taxed sooner under the Alternative Minimum Tax). But under tax rules for deferred compensation adopted in 2004, improperly priced options of either kind can trigger a 20% surtax on top of ordinary income tax -- totaling as much as 60% of any gain, once state and local taxes are taken into account. … Moreover, under the 2004 rules, the taxes and penalties come due in the year an executive is first allowed to exercise the options -- in other words, when the options vest -- even if he or she exercises them later. Tax experts say taxes are still due if the option subsequently loses value before exercise or even goes unexercised. In addition, more taxes are due if the underlying shares continue to gain value before the options are exercised. (On the flip side, options that expire while under water can't be used to offset other taxable income, tax experts say.) The IRS also charges penalty interest -- currently about 9% -- for late payment."

5th Circuit Delays Skilling's Prison Check-In Pending Bail Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A12, Emshwiller) reports, "Former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling's decades-long date with a prison cell, scheduled to start today, has been temporarily delayed by a federal appeals court." The Journal continues, "Late yesterday, Mr. Skilling's lead criminal defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, said he received notice that the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals had ordered a delay in his client's scheduled report date to a federal prison in Waseca, Minn., where he was to begin serving a more-than-24-year prison sentence. Mr. Skilling received that sentence as the result of being convicted earlier this year in a Houston federal court on 19 criminal counts, including conspiracy and fraud, arising from Enron's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy. Mr. Skilling, who has consistently maintained his innocence, had been planning to fly to Minnesota this morning to report to the prison, Mr. Petrocelli said."

DOJ_NMG_0105442

The Washington Post (12/12, D1, Johnson) reports, "Skilling, 53, had been preparing to turn himself in today and begin serving a prison term of 24 years and six months at a federal facility in Waseca, Minn. But a brief order from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, issued yesterday evening, means the brash former corporate executive will enjoy at least a few more days of freedom." The Post adds, "Skilling's lawyers are attacking a theory that the appeals court had invalidated last summer in another case tied to the Houston energy trading company. The appeals court ruling granted Skilling an undetermined delay "solely to allow this court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal," the order said." The Post notes, "Legal analysts said the court could ultimately force Skilling to report to the 1,070-inmate prison 75 miles south of Minneapolis within days -- or the judges could take even more time to consider the issue. To stay free pending a months- or years-long appeal, Skilling would need to show a substantial chance that he would succeed."

The Houston Chronicle (12/12, Hays, Fowler) reports, "The last-minute reprieve was a possibility up to Skilling's deadline of 2 p.m. Tuesday to report to the prison in Waseca, about 75 miles south of Minneapolis. Skilling will await word from the 5th Circuit on whether he can pursue his appeal inside or outside of prison. His appeal is expected to be filed next month." The Chronicle adds, "The appellate court's decision is somewhat unusual, said Brian Wice, a Houston lawyer who specializes in appeals. … 'It's rare to see a panel decide to stay a prison sentence so they can carefully consider his motion to remain free. Usually it's just a one-sentence summary denial,' Wice said." Bloomberg (12/12) also reports this story.

Federal Prosecutors Lay Out Case Against Conrad Black. Bloomberg (12/12, Harris) reports, "Former Hollinger International Inc. Chairman Conrad Black, indicted for fraud and accused of abusing company perks, compared himself to embattled French nobility in defending his actions, according to U.S. prosecutors in a filing." Bloomberg continues, "The 81-page document, filed today, lays out the prosecutors' case against Black, Peter Atkinson, a former Hollinger vice president and general counsel, and two other defendants. … 'I am not prepared to re-enact the French Revolutionary renunciation of the rights of nobility,' Black told Atkinson in a 2002 e-mail, according to the filing." Bloomberg adds, "Black, Atkinson, former Hollinger Chief Financial Officer John Boultbee, and ex-general counsel Mark Kipnis were each indicted last year on charges that they stripped Hollinger of its U.S. holdings while reaping millions for themselves through unauthorized non-competition agreements. … Black's Toronto lawyer, Edward Greenspan, said he had read the filing but wasn't prepared to comment on it immediately, citing the document's length. … Jury selection for the trial of Black and the other defendants is set for March 7. Black, Atkinson, Boultbee and Kipnis have pleaded innocent. Former Chicago Sun-Times publisher F. David Radler, who was also indicted, pleaded guilty last year and is cooperating with authorities."

SEC Sanctions Two Over PNC Accounting Problems. The AP (12/12) reports, "An accounting executive at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. and an outside auditor were sanctioned by federal regulators Monday for their alleged roles in the regional bank's faulty accounting in 2001, said to have inflated earnings by concealing $762 million in potential liabilities." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission announced the settlements with Thomas Garbe, who was PNC's director of accounting policy at the time, and Michael Joseph, a former partner with the major accounting firm Ernst & Young, which reviewed the transaction at issue. Garbe and Joseph neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but agreed to refrain from future violations of the securities laws. … In addition, Joseph was barred for three years from acting as an accountant for any public company. … Garbe 'failed to inquire adequately about facts and circumstances, and was a cause of PNC's violations of the ... federal securities laws,' the SEC said in its order." The AP adds, "The agency had previously alleged that Pittsburgh-based PNC tried to conceal $762 million in sour corporate loans in 2001 by selling them to three partnerships it created expressly for that purpose with insurance giant American International Group Inc."

Bloomberg (12/12, Bilodeau) reports, "American International Group Inc., the world's biggest insurer, hired Joseph to help develop and market a financing arrangement that PNC used to shift $762 million in bad loans and investments off its books in 2001, according to the SEC. Ernst & Young, the second-biggest U.S. accounting firm, also was the auditor that year for PNC, a Pittsburgh-based bank. … Joseph, a 'nationally recognized expert' on accounting for off-balance-sheet financing, drafted an expert-opinion letter for AIG approving the transaction, the SEC in its order today. Then Joseph gave the same letter to the Ernst & Young team auditing the way PNC accounted for it. The Ernst & Young auditors adopted Joseph's guidance letter 'virtually verbatim,' the SEC said. … 'Joseph was invested both financially and reputationally in the success' of the arrangement, the regulator said. As a result, he had a conflict of interest when he 'evaluated' PNC's accounting for a product he had helped create. 'Joseph was on both sides of the PNC transactions,' the SEC said."

DOJ_NMG_0105443

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Resolves Dispute Over Classified Information For Libby. The AP (12/12, Apuzzo) reports US District Judge Reggie B. Walton "all but resolved the protracted legal fight over classified information in the CIA leak case Monday, helping ensure the dispute would not derail former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby's perjury and obstruction trial." Libby is "accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding a CIA operative. He says he had more pressing issues on his mind and wants to discuss classified intelligence about terrorist threats and foreign nuclear programs to bolster that argument." Walton, "who rankled Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald last month by ruling that Libby must be allowed to discuss intelligence on Iraq, Iran, Pakistan, terrorism and other issues at trial, accepted Fitzgerald's proposal to limit the details Libby and his attorneys can discuss. The details of those limitations are sealed but, because it was Fitzgerald's proposal, it's unlikely he would come back to court later this month and argue that the limitations did not go far enough to protect government secrecy."

FBI Affidavit Unsealed In Prince George's Bribery Probe. Under the headline "FBI Tape Shows Hornsby Accepting Money," the Washington Post (12/12, B2, Rich, 690K) reports, "As soon as he walked into the hotel room, Andre J. Hornsby talked to his longtime associate about the possibility he had been followed. … They talked about purging Hornsby's e-mails from school system computers, and then the associate -- who was secretly cooperating in an investigation of Hornsby -- handed over $1,000." The Post adds, "Details of the videotaped meeting at the end of 2004 were among the key disclosures in an FBI affidavit unsealed yesterday at U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. The affidavit and related documents contain a raft of new information about the corruption case prosecutors have assembled against Hornsby," the former Prince George's County schools superintendent.

The AP (12/12) also notes that the affidavit "claims Hornsby took great pains to conceal his schemes…checking for possible phone taps, and trying to shake what he correctly suspected were FBI agents following him. Hornsby was indicted in August and pleaded not guilty to charges of mail fraud, wire fraud, witness and evidence tampering, and obstruction of justice. His attorney, Robert Bonsib says he expects the matter to go to court and be hard fought."

New York Federal Prosecutors Suffer Through Losing Streak. The AP (12/12, Neumeister) reports, "These are happy times for defense lawyers in Manhattan federal court. … A string of recent acquittals, in cases involving everything from organized crime to Wall Street misdeeds to terrorism, has eroded the patina of invincibility from prosecutors in an office where high-profile convictions once seemed inevitable." The AP continues, "The defeats -- just two years after the government successfully prosecuted home maven Martha Stewart -- were capped off when prosecutors announced just before Thanksgiving that they were dropping one-third of the 15 cases brought against floor specialists at the New York Stock Exchange." The AP adds, "The prosecution, meant to show specialists were cheating investors by improperly trading for their companies ahead of orders for their customers, had already suffered huge hits with two acquittals and dropped charges in two cases -- although they did notch five convictions. … The latest charges were dropped just days after a jury acquitted a California man on charges that he lied about his association with one of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers, ending a case the government relentlessly pursued for five years. … Just weeks earlier, a third jury deadlocked on racketeering charges against John A. 'Junior' Gotti, leading prosecutors to abandon their case against the admitted one-time Gambino crime family boss. … And that came only weeks after prosecutors agreed to drop charges against technology banker Frank Quattrone, letting him resume a career that once paid him as much as $120 million a year." The AP notes, "In civil and criminal cases, prosecutors in Manhattan's U.S. District Court have endured a variety of setbacks -- including decisions forcing them to divulge the identities of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and to turn over pictures of prisoner abuse in Iraq. … Even a big victory _ the conviction of lawyer Lynne Stewart on a charge of providing material support to terrorists _ soured when a judge sentenced her to a little over two years in prison rather than the 30 years the government had sought. … U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, who took the job last year when the soon-to-be stymied prosecutions were already in full swing, told The Associated Press that the setbacks were cyclical. … The results, he said, can happen when 'the stars line up badly in a bunch of cases ... It's crazy to say that it's the quality of the lawyering here.' Garcia said prosecutors stream to his office after a win or a loss -- and the losses hit hard. … He said losses attract more attention than the vast majority of criminal cases that end in convictions. He cited the successful prosecution of South Korean businessman Tongsun Park, who was convicted by a jury that took only hours to find he conspired to accept at least $2 million to act as a secret Iraqi agent to influence the United Nations' oil-for-food program."

DOJ_NMG_0105444

Judge Seeks Answers On Internal DOJ Probe Of Mafia Case Prosecutor. The Boston Globe (12/12, Mishra, Murphy) reports, "The chief federal judge in Boston is urging the US Justice Department to find out and tell him what happened to an internal investigation of a federal prosecutor accused of withholding evidence in a high-profile Mafia case." The Globe continues, "The unusual request, which was filed in court yesterday, stems from a botched racketeering case in which two reputed mobsters were released early from prison after Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf determined that prosecutor Jeffrey Auerhahn improperly and possibly illegally manipulated evidence." The Globe adds, "Three years ago, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan told Wolf that he would get to the bottom of the alleged misconduct. But in a letter sent Friday to Sullivan's boss, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Wolf wrote that 'no information on the status or any results' of the investigation into Auerhahn had been reported to him. … 'The apparent inaction of the Department of Justice regarding Mr. Auerhahn has generated considerable concern about the administration of justice in the District of Massachusetts,' Wolf wrote." The Globe notes, "Citing Justice Department rules protecting employees' privacy, Sullivan said yesterday he could not comment on the results of the investigation of Auerhahn or whether any action had been taken against him. … Sullivan said he would look into whether prosecutors could somehow share the results of the investigation with Wolf without violating Auerhahn's privacy. … 'Obviously the court has raised some legitimate concerns as it relates to a matter that was before the court, and there should be an avenue to be able to respond to the court on the outcome of any inquiry that was launched as a result of the court's findings or conclusions,' Sullivan said."

Probe Of Amtrak Legal Procedures Gathers Steam. The Legal Times (12/12, Palmer) reports, "A House committee broadened its investigation into government-subsidized train operator Amtrak's legal department and its outside legal counsel last week, calling for the Justice Department to investigate possible illegal activities." The Times continues, "In a Dec. 4 letter obtained by Legal Times, outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and committee member Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., requested that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales review 'what may constitute unlawful conduct' between Amtrak's legal team and outside law firms. It's the second letter the lawmakers have sent regarding potential mismanagement on the part of Amtrak and its outside law firms." The Times adds, "In a separate letter sent Nov. 17 to Amtrak Inspector General Fred Weiderhold Jr., the congressmen singled out Manatt, Phelps & Phillips for its billing of support staff and expenses. The letter asked Weiderhold to review specific instances regarding Manatt's work on the Northeast Corridor electrification project to see if they were 'appropriate, justified, documented, and accurate.' … 'The Times notes, "The lawmakers' overtures come after a recent probe into Amtrak's legal department by the Department of Transportation's inspector general and Weiderhold, which came at the request of the transportation committee. The investigation found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal fees from June 2002 to June 2005. The inspector generals' report, released in October, found that Amtrak's outside legal counsel rarely turned in receipts and used block billing, the term for billing different tasks under one invoice entry, which is prohibited by Amtrak's guidelines for dealing with outside counsel. … The letter to the Justice Department, which does not name any specific law firms, addresses four areas in which Amtrak employees and outside legal counsel may have broken federal law by bill padding and possible collusion among Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel to use side agreements benefiting the outside law firms."

Raids In Five Cities Nab 19 Bosnian Serbs Charged With War Crimes. Long Island Newsday (12/12, Mcallester) reports from Tampa, FL, "Federal agents raided homes in five cities Monday, arresting 19 Bosnian Serbs whose units allegedly participated in the Bosnian war's Srebrenica massacre, sources told Newsday. …. The murder of more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica was the worst war crime in Europe since World War II." Newsday continues, "Monday's arrests follow one in Milwaukee during the weekend. The investigation is continuing, the sources said, and is expected to net more Srebrenica suspects than any other operation to date worldwide. … The total number of Srebrenica suspects arrested in the past two years on immigration violations in the United States is approaching 50. At least three have been deported to Bosnia from Arizona and two are in custody in Sarajevo as prosecutors there investigate them for war crimes." Newsday adds, "Agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement arrested eight men in Tampa Monday. Others were arrested in nearby Orlando and in Denver, Detroit and Chicago. The government alleges that all of them lied on their immigration applications, deliberately omitting mention of their service in the Bosnian Serb Army." Newsday notes, "At the federal courthouse in downtown Tampa Monday afternoon, five of the men arrested Monday were arraigned before Judge Thomas McCoun. … While investigators and prosecutors do not consider any of the men a present danger, the underlying theme of the operation that led to their arrest is that they were, not so long ago, a mortal danger to thousands."

DOJ_NMG_0105445

Sheehan Convicted Of Trespassing At UN. The AP (12/12, Maull) reports, "Peace activist Cindy Sheehan and three other women were convicted of trespassing Monday for trying to deliver an anti-Iraq war petition to the U.S. Mission to the United Nations." A Manhattan Criminal Court judge "sentenced them immediately to conditional discharge, which means they could face some form of penalty if they are arrested in the next six months, and ordered them to pay $95 in court surcharges." Sheehan and "about 100 other members of a group called Global Exchange were rebuffed last March when they attempted to take a petition with some 72,000 signatures to the U.S. Mission's headquarters across a street from the United Nations. After Monday's sentencing, the women returned to the Mission; this time, their petition was accepted."

In 9-0 Decision, Supreme Court Reinstates Murder Conviction. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Savage, 850K) reports, "The Supreme Court reversed the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals today and restored a California murder conviction that had been thrown out because a small photo of the victim had been worn by his family during the trial. In a 9-0 decision, the justices said the appeals court had overstepped its bounds when it held that this display violated the defendant's right to a fair trial."

USA Today (12/12, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The justices did not rule on whether the display of such buttons should be permitted at trials. Rather, they said in a unanimous decision that a lower court was wrong to find that the buttons may have prejudiced the jury and that the defendant should be able to make his case to a federal judge." However, "in an opinion by Justice Clarence Thomas, the high court said it had no precedent against such conduct by spectators, so the 9th Circuit should not have ruled that the defendant, Mathew Musladin, could make a claim in federal court. The fundamental question in the case focused on the standards state prisoners must meet to challenge their cases in federal court." The New York Times (12/12, Stout, 1.16M) also says the ruling "was hardly an endorsement of personal, emotional expressions in a trial courtroom. On the contrary, the key issue was whether the Ninth Circuit went too far."

The Legal Times (12/12, Mauro) reports, "When Mathew Musladin went on trial in Santa Clara, Calif., for the 1994 murder of Tom Studer, his estranged wife's fiance, the victim's family showed support for Studer in an unusual way. … Sitting silently near the jury, family members wore buttons bearing a photo of Studer's face every day of the trial. Musladin's lawyer asked the trial judge to order the buttons removed, asserting they would prejudice the jury against his client. The judge denied the motion." The Times continues, "On Monday the Supreme Court ruled in Carey v. Musladin that the Studer family's actions did not violate any firmly established federal rule and there was thus no reason to reverse Musladin's conviction. … The unanimous ruling did not endorse the practice, and Justice David Souter wrote separately that spectators wearing buttons 'can raise a risk of improper considerations.' But under federal habeas corpus rules, a state conviction can be reversed only if the state court's ruling upholding the conviction misapplies 'clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court.' … Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the Court, said it is clearly established by Court precedent that certain actions by the state at trial -- such as forcing a defendant to wear prison garb or surrounding the defendant with uniformed state troopers -- are inherently prejudicial enough to cause the reversal of convictions."

The AP (12/12, Yost) reports, "It was the first time the justices had ruled on whether the conduct of courtroom spectators deprived a defendant of a fair trial, which in this instance resulted in a conviction that an appeals court reversed."

LATimes Criticizes 9th Circuit Court. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K) says "critics of the US 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, such as outgoing California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, are celebrating that liberal-leaning court's latest rebuff by the Supreme Court. … This page, which strongly opposes capital punishment, is nevertheless glad to see the 9th Circuit's wrist slapped for improperly applying the law as it is written." The Times says the High Court's ruling "might seem like a technical argument between courts, but it points to something more pervasive and troubling: that the 9th Circuit seems predisposed to second-guess state courts, especially in death penalty cases -- even to the point of usurping the high court's role. The 9th Circuit's image problem is easy grist for conservatives, but it should be troubling to liberals and moderates as well."

Oregon Doctor Sentenced To 18 Months In Prison For Botox Scam. KGW-TV Portland (12/11) reported on its Web site, "A doctor who injected cosmetic patients in Tigard and Salem with a Botox substitute was sentenced to 18 months in Federal prison Monday. Dr. Jerome Lentini was also ordered, along with his office nurse

DOJ_NMG_0105446

Catherine Garcia, to pay restitution of $330,306.76. … Federal officials think Lentini and Garcia injected more than 800 patients with unapproved drugs in a 13-month span, according to records." KGW noted, "Two of Lentini's employees, knowing of the Florida cases, became concerned when they witnessed Lentini drawing on what they believed to be large stocks of a non-FDA approved drug. One of the employees contacted the Oregon Board of Medical Examiners and the FBI, triggering the investigation." The Salem Statesman Journal (12/12) and Tigard Times (12/12) also report on the sentence.

Oregon Lawyer Sentenced To Year In Prison For Loan Fraud. The Salem Statesman-Journal (12/8, Liao) reported, "Thomas Knapp, a former Salem lawyer who pleaded guilty this year to a money-laundering charge, was sentenced Thursday to a year in federal prison and ordered to pay about $313,000 restitution, officials said. Knapp was involved in an international loan scam from September 2000 and February 2005, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani. Knapp bought a Mercedes and financed a building on Commercial Street SE where he ran his law practice using money from the scam."

Three Convicted Of Defrauding Microsoft In Discount Software Scam. Bay City Newswire (12/8) reported, "The U.S. attorney's office reported that three people have been convicted of devising a scheme to defraud Microsoft Corp. by obtaining discounted software under false pretenses. Prosecutors say the scheme involved buying more than $29 million worth of software that was steeply discounted for academic institutions, and selling it to non-academic entities, in violation of the Microsoft agreement. Microsoft estimates that it lost more than $60 million as a result of the defendants' criminal acts, according to prosecutors." BCN noted, "The convictions resulted from 'Operation Cyberstorm,' a two-year undercover investigation into software piracy and related crimes conducted by agents from Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation unit and the REACT Task Force."

Puget Sound Business Journal (12/8) added, "According to the U.S. Department of Justice, Mirza Ali, his wife, Sameena Ali, and Keith Griffen were convicted on Nov. 28 for trying to defraud the Redmond software giant by 'obtaining discounted software under false pretenses.' … Microsoft said it estimates it lost more than $60 million in the scheme that investigators called 'Operation Cyberstorm.' 'Microsoft applauds the...conviction of three individuals involved. The conviction of these individuals is a significant victory for the software industry, its partners and customers, and all who value fair and ethical business practices,' said Bonnie MacNaughton, senior attorney for Microsoft, in a statement."

Results Are Mixed On Banks' Efforts To Identity Theft Victims. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, D2, Mincer) reports, "A small but increasing number of banks now offer to protect clients when an identity thief has been snooping around. … The institutions offer help from generic advice on correcting credit records to personalized help when someone has misused a client's account. MetLife Bank, a unit of MetLife Inc., announced last week that it would provide customers free assistance even if the identity theft doesn't involve a MetLife account." The Journal continues, "Unlike credit-card theft, which consumers can resolve with a quick call and, at most, a $50 expense, repairing damage after someone has used your personal information to take over or open bank and other consumer accounts could involve thousands of dollars in personal losses and months of effort. … In 2005, there were 8.9 million identity-fraud victims in the U.S., costing $56.6 billion, according to Javelin Strategy & Research, an independent research firm in Pleasanton, Calif. The average fraud amount per victim was $6,383; the average consumer cost was $422. On average, resolving the problem took 40 hours. The median time for resolution -- meaning half of the incidents took longer and half took less time -- was five hours." The Journal adds, "Financial institutions are concerned not only because of the cost but also because their customers are worried about becoming victims. … While banks are responsible for helping customers to investigate activity on an account at that institution, some are providing assistance on accounts outside."

The New York Times (12/12, Dash) reports, "Melody Millett was shocked when her car loan company asked her if she was the wife of Abundio Perez, who had applied for 26 credit cards, financed several cars and taken out a home mortgage using a Social Security number belonging to her actual husband. … Beyond her shock, Mrs. Millett was angry. Five months earlier, the Milletts had subscribed to a $79.99-a-year service from Equifax, a big financial data warehouse, that promised to monitor any access to her credit records. But it never reported the credit activity that might have signaled that they were victims of identity theft. … 'I feel like the whole thing is a sham,' said Mrs. Millett, a 37-year-old information-technology manager from Overland Park, Kan. 'You feel completely violated because here are the people who know the industry. They hold all the data.' The services, she contends, are oversold." The Times continues, "It is not just criminals who are profiting from identity theft; financial institutions are making money, too. Fear of identity theft has helped give rise to a nearly billion-dollar business in credit-monitoring services sold by the major credit bureaus — companies like Equifax, Experian and TransUnion — as well as direct marketers and banks. … Javelin Strategy and Research, which analyzes the credit-monitoring market, says more than 12 million Americans are now subscribers. The services alert them when lenders have requested their credit files, usually an indication a credit application has been made in their name." The Times notes, "Credit monitoring has quickly gained traction with consumers through aggressive advertising that often promotes its value in protecting against identity theft. But its abilities are far more limited than is commonly perceived. .. .In the meantime, measures that could stem fraud from identity theft — like legislation empowering consumers to block access to their credit records, making it impossible to extend new credit — have faced stiff resistance from industry groups."

DOJ_NMG_0105447

Ameriprise Settles With Massachusetts Over Loss Of Company's Laptop. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, Levitz) reports, "In what may be the first regulatory action against a company for losing sensitive customer data, Massachusetts securities regulators reached a settlement with Ameriprise Financial Inc. over the company's loss of a laptop computer last year." The Journal continues, "Under an agreement with the office of Massachusetts Secretary of State William Galvin, Ameriprise agreed to hire an independent consultant within 60 days to review its policies and procedures for employees' and contractors' use of laptop computers that contain personal or financial information on Ameriprise customers. … The Minneapolis-based financial-advisory firm didn't admit any wrongdoing or liability under the settlement." The Journal adds, "The regulatory action is unusual, said Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a San Diego consumer group. More typically when companies lose laptops, customers are typically told to monitor their credit for a certain period. … Over the past nine months, Ms. Givens's organization has cited more than 60 cases of security breaches involving missing laptops at companies, universities, and government agencies. … Ameriprise disclosed in January that it had notified thousands of people that their names and other personal data were stored on a laptop that was stolen from an employee's car on Christmas Eve 2005 while the employee was on vacation in the Midwest. The laptop contained the names and account numbers of 158,000 Ameriprise clients, and the names and Social Security numbers of 67,000 current and former financial advisers. The lost data included information on thousands of Massachusetts residents, among others."

Hackers Access Personal Data Of 800,00 UCLA Employees, Students, Alumni. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Trounson, 850K) reports, "In what appears to be one of the largest computer security breaches ever at an American university, one or more hackers have gained access to a UCLA database containing personal information on about 800,000 of the university's current and former students, faculty and staff members, among others. UCLA officials said the attack on a central campus database exposed records containing the names, Social Security numbers and birth dates…for at least some of those affected. The attempts to break into the database began in October 2005 and ended Nov. 21, when the suspicious activity was detected and blocked, the officials said." Acting Chancellor Norman Abrams said that "the university had no evidence that any of the information had been misused." The Times notes, "Laura Eimiller, spokeswoman for the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the agency was investigating the breach, but said she could not comment further."

Small Stores Account For Most Food Stamp Fraud. USA Today (12/12, 2A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports efforts to "reduce the illegal use of food stamps have kept millions of dollars in benefits from going to waste during the past five years, but small convenience and grocery stores in low-income areas continue to be hotbeds for fraud, according to the Government Accountability Office." The GAO is "recommending that the Department of Agriculture intensify its focus on finding stores that violate federal rules and increase penalties for trafficking in misused stamps. The GAO's recommendations, in a report released in October, come as Congress is preparing to revisit the $29 billion-a-year food stamp program next year as part of a giant farm bill." The GAO "is urging the Food and Nutrition Service (FNS) — the agency within the Agriculture Department that runs the food stamp program — to review the 160,000 stores authorized to receive stamps to determine which are most likely to engage in fraud and to target them for enforcement."

NYTimes Says Drug Companies Must Increase Efforts To Combat Fraud. The New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Tempted to buy cheap medicines from a pharmacy Web site? Think twice. If the Web site shows no verifiable street address for the pharmacy, there is a 50 percent chance the drugs are counterfeit." The WHO has "recently set up a task force that brings together many groups that work on counterfeit drugs. It is a start. Multinational drug companies — which have been reluctant to report fakes lest they erode consumer confidence in all drugs — need to do more. An international convention is also needed to establish stiffer penalties for counterfeiting drugs, and marshal more funds and support to fight this deadly crime."

CIVIL LAW:

DC Circuit Hears Appeal Of DOD Labor Relations Rules. Government Executive (12/12, Rutzick) reports, "A panel of appeals court judges heard arguments

DOJ_NMG_0105448

Monday over the legality of the Defense Department's proposed labor relations system for civilian employees." GE continues, "After losing in a lower court in February -- and following two losses for the Homeland Security Department's similar system -- government lawyers continued to argue that Congress gave the Pentagon authority to make far-reaching changes to collective bargaining. … In the 2004 Defense authorization bill, Congress granted the department authority to create a new human resources system, based on the notion that the current system was too rigid and outdated to allow the department to respond with agility to modern threats of terrorism." GE adds, "Pentagon officials said they have the authority to override collective bargaining agreements after they are reached and the ability to narrow the items that can be bargained over as much as they want. But a coalition of federal labor unions sued the department to say the rules effectively eliminate collective bargaining."

The Federal Times (12/12, Kauffman) reports, "Three years ago, Congress gave the Defense Department authority to craft a new labor relations system outside existing rules governing collective bargaining. At the same time, Congress said the department couldn't remove an employee's right to organize and bargain collectively. … These two seemingly contradictory statements are at the heart of a legal dispute that could decide whether the department can proceed with changes to personnel rules affecting 650,000 civilian employees. … 'The question is: Has the department reasonably interpreted the phrase 'collective bargaining'?' Judge David Tatel said Dec. 11, effectively summarizing the case before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit." The Times continues, "The answer is up to Tatel and two other appellate judges to decide. … The three-judge panel heard oral arguments Dec. 11 from attorneys representing the government and unions, who sued the department in November 2005 for creating a system that failed to protect employees' rights to bargain collectively. … The hearing lasted twice as long as the 40 minutes initially set aside for arguments, as the judges peppered the lawyers with detailed questions concerning what specific sections of the 2003 law meant." The Times notes, "Joe Goldberg, the attorney who argued on behalf of the 13 federal employee unions that filed the lawsuit, said provisions allowing the department to create a labor relations system outside Chapter 71 apply only to the mechanics of creating the system, not what is bargained under the system. … William Kanter, a Justice Department attorney who argued the NSPS case on behalf of the government, said that unlike with Homeland Security, Congress gave the Pentagon specific authority to craft a labor relations system outside Title 5 rules."

In his "Federal Diary" column for the Washington Post (12/12), Stephen Barr writes, "At times yesterday, the courtroom debate about the law that created a new civil service system for the Defense Department sounded like the judges and lawyers were playing Battleship, the game where opponents use a grid to target and sink ships. … The debate, before a three-judge federal appeals panel, focused on seemingly conflicting provisions in the 2003 law that permitted the Pentagon to issue regulations aimed at overhauling workplace rules and installing a pay-for-performance system." Barr continues, "William Kanter a Justice Department lawyer representing the Pentagon, contended that Congress defined what issues had to be put on the table for bargaining with unions, put limits on those rights and gave power to the defense secretary to throw out contracts. Certain phrases in the NSPS law makes it different from the Homeland Security statute and the rules blocked by the courts, he argued. … Joseph Goldberg, a lawyer with the American Federation of Government Employees, disagreed, saying that no matter how the government reads various provisions, it must take into account that the law provides for collective bargaining, as guaranteed in current law, and does not clearly eliminate the right of unions to bargain over the 'impact and implementation' of management decisions."

Massachusetts DA Testifies At Wrongful Prosecution Civil Trial. The Boston Globe (12/ Murphy, 413K) reports, "Jack I. Zalkind thought he did everything he could to make sure that Mafia hitman Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza was telling the truth when he implicated six men in a 1965 gangland killing, the former assistant Suffolk district attorney testified yesterday. But Zalkind said he prosecuted the case without knowing that the FBI had secret reports that indicated Barboza was lying and had falsely implicated four of the six. … Yesterday, Zalkind was the first live witness to testify in a federal civil trial that began last month, seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government." The Globe notes, "Two other men convicted in Deegan's slaying were not exonerated. Ronald Cassesso died in prison and Wilfred Roy French was later released. Yesterday, Cassesso's lawyer, Ronald J. Chisholm, testified that FBI agent H. Paul Rico had promised Cassesso that he would not do prison time for Deegan's slaying if he agreed to testify against the others and back up Barboza's version of events. But, Chisholm said, Cassesso told him he had rejected Rico's offer, telling the agent, 'I'm not going to frame innocent men.'"

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Report Offers Details Of New York City Police Shooting. The AP (12/12) reports, "Witnesses interviewed for a preliminary report on the police shooting of three men - including a groom on his wedding day - did not mention a fourth, possibly armed man who police say may have been present before officers opened fire, a newspaper reported Monday." The AP continues, "The New York Times obtained a copy of the police department's 23-page preliminary report of the shooting, a detailed look at what happened on Nov. 25 when Sean Bell, 23, and his two friends were caught in a barrage of 50 bullets after a bachelor party at a strip club in Queens. Bell's friends were wounded; all three men were unarmed." The AP adds, "Police have suggested a fourth man may have had a gun and fled when the plainclothes officers opened fire, but the report made no mention of such a man, whom the surviving victims have said does not exist. Some in the community claim the officers invented the man to justify the shooting. … The report also contains no indication that police were searching after the shooting for a fourth man, the paper said."

DOJ_NMG_0105449

The New York Times (12/11, Rashbaum, Baker) reports, "When the shooting stopped, the police lieutenant edged toward the gray Nissan Altima with his gun drawn. He ordered the men inside to show their hands. The lieutenant had not fired his weapon, and as he neared the car, according to police records, one of the bloodied men inside complied and stuck his hands out the window. The other did not move. … A police sergeant who arrived seconds later described the scene this way: The Nissan had crashed into a van in the middle of the street. Smoke was coming from its radiator. The man in the driver's seat was slumped back. His passenger was lying across his lap with his arms hanging outside the driver's window." The Times continues, "The sergeant, Michael Wheeler, later told investigators that both men appeared seriously injured and likely to die, according to the records. A plainclothes officer stood close by, his pistol still trained on the two men in the car. A third man lay on the street nearby. … Minutes later, the shooting scene on Liverpool Street in Jamaica, Queens, was choked with patrol cars and the scrum of officials that follows a police shooting. A captain ordered another uniformed sergeant, Donald Kipp, to locate and inspect the weapons of the men involved in the shooting. In all, five plainclothes officers had fired a total of 50 bullets. .. .But one after another, in conversations with Sergeant Kipp or Sergeant Wheeler, the men said they could not say how many shots they had fired. Two said they were unsure whether they had even fired at all, including a detective who investigators later learned had fired 31 shots, emptying his 9-millimeter Sig Sauer pistol, reloading and emptying it again during the frenzied barrage." The Times notes, "The accounts of the lieutenant and the two sergeants are included in the Police Department's preliminary report of the shooting early on Nov. 25 that left the car's driver, Sean Bell, 23, dead on his wedding day and two of his friends wounded, one seriously. The men were part of a larger group that had just attended Mr. Bell's bachelor party in a strip club down the block. … The 23-page document prepared in the days after the shooting, and obtained by The New York Times, does not include the accounts of the four detectives and one police officer who fired their weapons. They are the subjects of an investigation by the office of the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, and it is not clear if they will submit to interviews with prosecutors or testify before a grand jury."

Diallo Case May Offer Prosecutorial Blueprint. The AP (12/12, Hays) reports, "Before there were 50 shots and Sean Bell, there were 41 shots and Amadou Diallo. … The deadly 41-shot barrage fired by four police officers at the unarmed Diallo seven years ago sparked angry demands that the shooters face criminal charges - a scene replayed in the recent police shooting of Bell in a hail of 50 bullets." The AP continues, "Firepower and community outrage aside, the Diallo case serves as a reminder of the hard realities of prosecuting officers who are paid to carry guns and sometimes use them in dangerous situations. It also suggests the ultimate result of the latest case could be a civil settlement for the victims' families and a quiet demise of the careers of the officers involved. … 'Police officers are privileged to use deadly force,' said Ian Weinstein, a criminal law professor at Fordham Law School. 'The case will turn on whether the officers reasonably believed their lives were in danger, or that deadly force was justified.'" The AP adds, "Lawyers say the officers in the Bell case will have to decide - probably after Christmas - whether to tell a grand jury their side of the story in a bid to dissuade jurors from voting to indict them. The lawyer for the undercover officer has said his client is eager to testify; another defense attorney on the case, Stephen Worth, was noncommittal. … In the Diallo case, the officers chose not to go before a grand jury - a decision prosecutors said left them with no choice but to pursue charges of intentional murder, rather than manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide."

Federal Judge Gives California Six Months To Fix Prison Overcrowding. The AP (12/12, Thompson) reports, "A federal judge on Monday gave California officials six months to ease crowding in the state's overstuffed prison system, warning that potential remedies include capping the inmate population and releasing some prisoners early." The AP continues, "The state is scrambling to find solutions for a prison system that houses 173,000 inmates, 70 percent more than its capacity. Officials with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's administration and inmate attorneys agree the crowding is causing myriad problems, including inmate deaths and dangerous conditions for guards. … 'Common sense suggests the state is being overwhelmed by the numbers,' U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton said." The AP adds, "Schwarzenegger declared a state of emergency in October after failing to persuade state lawmakers to spend billions on a prison building program. He is now seeking to transfer 2,260 inmates to other states as a partial solution. … California sent 80 inmates to a private prison in Tennessee in early November and plans more transfers this month to private prisons in Arizona, Indiana, Oklahoma and Tennessee. … Even if the transfers survive pending court challenges, officials predict California's prisons will run out of room by spring 2008." The AP notes, "Federal law permits early release of inmates only if a three-judge panel determines that all other options have been exhausted. That hasn't happened in any state since the law took effect 10 years ago, said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's National Prison Project."

DOJ_NMG_0105450

Louisiana School Board Sues To Cancel September Election. The Baton Rouge Advocate (12/12, Lussier) reports, "The Baker School Board filed a lawsuit in federal court Monday that seeks to cancel the Sept. 30 election in which District 1 voters ousted incumbent President Elaine Davis." The Advocate continues, "The lawsuit covers some of the same ground as Davis' already rejected election challenge, filed in state court. There, Davis unsuccessfully sought to overturn the vote that she lost to challenger Pam Malveaux by 20 votes. … Also listed as plaintiffs in the new federal lawsuit are three board members, Davis, Calvin Dees and Dana Carpenter." The Advocate adds, "Those three voted 3-2 last month to file the litigation, saying the school district's precise boundaries need to be established clearly. They did so over the objections of members George Gallman and Jane Freudenberger, neither of whom are listed individually as defendants. The School Board hired the Metairie law firm, Leblanc Butler LLC, to handle the case. … The lawsuit names as defendants the City of Baker, the East Baton Rouge Parish School Board, as well as parish Registrar of Voters Elaine Lamb and the parish's board of election supervisors." The Advocate notes, "n the state case, Davis, wife of former Baker Mayor Leroy Davis, challenged the votes of 21 voters, most of them living in Oak Glen Terrace trailer park on Thomas Road. … The new federal case alleges that up to 100 people voted improperly. … As evidence, the lawsuit claims that 'on information and belief' the children of these improper voters do not attend Baker public schools, but rather attend East Baton Rouge Parish public schools. … The crux of the litigation is that a small number of voters who live within the city limits of Baker, but not within the boundaries of the school district were illegally allowed to vote Sept. 30. … At issue are a couple of areas, including the Oak Glen Terrace trailer park, which the city annexed before June 1997, but for which the city did not receive approval, or preclearance, from the U.S. Justice Department until later. State courts found that the late date of these preclearances did not matter and that those contested areas are part of the Baker school district."

Christian Group Says DOD Gave Permission For Officers' Video. USA Today/AP (12/12, 11A) reports an evangelical Christian group, "under fire for a promotional video featuring active-duty military officers praising the organization, said Monday that the Defense Department gave it permission to record the video." The video "prompted a religious freedom watchdog group to ask the Pentagon to investigate whether the tape violated regulations and possibly the Constitution." Robert Varney, "executive director of the Christian Embassy, which produced the video, said the group is adding a note to tell viewers that the content does not represent the military or any government agency." Service regulations "in general prohibit active-duty officers from lobbying for political causes while on duty or wearing uniforms. The issue of religion is trickier."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Takes Municipal Bond Probe To Grand Jury. Bloomberg (12/12, Hurtado) reports, "Prosecutors investigating bid-rigging in the municipal bond market have brought their case to a federal grand jury in New York, a person with knowledge of the case said." Bloomberg continues, "Ralph Giordano, chief of the New York office of the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division, and Rebecca Meiklejohn, a trial attorney, are leading the criminal investigation, the person said. Also participating in the probe are agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New York office as well as the Internal Revenue Service, according to the person." Bloomberg adds, "Giordano, 69, and his staff won the conviction of former Sotheby's Holdings Inc. Chairman A. Alfred Taubman, found guilty in 2001 of plotting with archrival Christie's International Plc to fix sellers' fees. Meiklejohn has prosecuted anti-competitive practices in the advertising industry. .. .'It's a very big deal that this is now a criminal investigation, it ratchets up the stakes,' said David Gourevitch, a former U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission enforcement attorney who now has his own practice in New York." Bloomberg notes, "Prosecutors are probing whether banks, financial firms and brokers conspired to rig bids on contracts bought by local governments when they invest money from bond sales. The municipalities invest the money until it is needed to pay for schools, roads and other projects. … The investigation grew out of an IRS inquiry that found dozens of municipal bond deals failed to pay $100 million in taxes. It is the broadest criminal probe of the industry. The Justice Department has subpoenaed more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided three brokers in a search for evidence of bid rigging in the market where state and local governments nationwide raised more than $400 billion last year."

DOJ_NMG_0105451

Critics Urge Close DOJ Review Of Monsanto Deal. The AP (12/12, Leonard) reports, "Congress will press federal regulators to closely scrutinize Monsanto Co.'s plan to buy cottonseed king Delta & Pine Land Co., but analysts and investors don't seem worried the deal will fall through." The AP continues, "U.S. Rep. Bob Inglis, R-S.C., plans to send a letter to the U.S. Justice Department asking for a careful review of the deal to make sure it complies with antitrust laws. … Inglis said he's not opposed to the deal. But he thinks it deserves a close look because it would give Monsanto more control over the U.S. seed market." The AP adds, "Monsanto agreed to purchase Scott, Miss.-based Delta & Pine Land in August for $1.5 billion in cash. The deal is already under Justice Department investigation to make sure it doesn't violate antitrust law. If approved, the sale should close early next year. … Analysts estimate the deal would give Monsanto control of about 60 percent of the U.S. cottonseed market. .. .That could be bad news for Monsanto's competitors in the multibillion dollar market for genetically engineered seeds. Monsanto has had a corner on the technology since introducing biotech corn and soybean seeds in the 1990s. DuPont Co. and Syngenta AG are trying to catch up by developing their own strains. … DuPont Co. is also fueling opposition to the Delta & Pine Land acquisition."

Delta Board Mulls US Air Offer. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A11, Dade, Trottman) reports, "The board of Delta Air Lines Inc. met by conference call to discuss US Airways Group Inc.'s $8.5 billion hostile bid, but the directors aren't expected to issue a formal position on the offer for several days, according to people familiar with the matter." The Journal continues, "The meeting came as executives at Delta and its major creditors prepared for a new round of talks regarding the US Airways bid scheduled for tomorrow in New York. US Airways presented details of its offer, consisting of $4 billion in cash and about $4.5 billion in stock, nearly two weeks ago, in a session marked by occasionally tense exchanges between executives from the airlines." The Journal adds, "Delta, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in September 2005, is expected to release early next week its reorganization plan for exiting from bankruptcy as a stand-alone company. Coming one month after US Airways launched the hostile offer, the Delta plan effectively will be the company's counterproposal aimed at persuading its creditors not to support the US Airways bid. .. The board vote is largely a formality, since there is nearly no possibility that Delta's board would endorse the US Airways offer, according to people familiar with the situation. Delta officials, including Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein, have made repeated public assertions that the deal isn't right for the Atlanta airline. Mr. Grinstein has insisted that Delta should emerge independently from bankruptcy early next year. He has resisted US Airways' request for access to Delta financial records to perform due diligence on the offer."

LG Philips Shares Suffer On News Of DOJ Probe Of LCD Industry. Bloomberg (12/12, Cho) reports, "Shares of LG.Philips LCD Co., the world's second-largest liquid-crystal display maker, fell after the company said it was questioned by officials in South Korea, the U.S. and Japan in an antitrust probe of the industry." Bloomberg continues, "Samsung Electronics Co., its bigger rival, was also subpoenaed by South Korea's Fair Trade Commission, company spokeswoman Cho Sung In said today. Officials from the Korean watchdog visited LG.Philips' Seoul headquarters on Dec. 8 because of 'possible anticompetitive conduct in the LCD industry,' the company said yesterday, without identifying the other companies." Bloomberg adds, "LG.Philips shares dropped as much as 7.6 percent, leading declines among LCD makers, on concern the investigation may damage earnings after the company posted two straight quarterly losses. A four-year U.S. federal probe into price fixing in the computer-memory chip market resulted in four companies, including Samsung Electronics, and 16 individuals being fined $731 million. … The investigation may be about price fixing in the industry, Maeil Business Newspaper reported today, citing unidentified industry officials. … Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman at the U.S. Department of Justice, declined to comment. The department issued a subpoena to LG.Philips' San Jose office, while Japan's Fair Trade Commission issued a notice to LG.Philips in Tokyo, according to yesterday's statement."

The Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones Newswires (12/12, B4) reports, "In a statement, the South Korea-based LCD maker said it received a subpoena from the U.S. Department of Justice last Friday. In addition, the company said officials from the Fair Trade Commission in Korea visited its headquarters while the Japanese Fair Trade Commission issued a notice to its offices in Tokyo. … 'LG.Philips LCD takes this matter very seriously and will cooperate fully with regulatory authorities,' the company said in the statement. 'While these investigations continue, LG.Philips LCD is committed to running its business as usual, supplying its global customer base.'"

Microsoft Lays Out Defense In Iowa Antitrust Trial. Bloomberg (12/12, Van Voris) reports, "Microsoft Corp. didn't overcharge Iowa consumers for Windows, Word and Excel, a lawyer told jurors in Des Moines, as the company outlined its defense in an antitrust trial. … 'No one in Iowa has been harmed by anything that the plaintiffs can show that Microsoft has done,' Microsoft lawyer David Tulchin told the Iowa state court jury of seven men and five women Monday afternoon. 'The evidence will show that the price was not too high, that there is no overcharge.'" Bloomberg continues, "Tulchin began Microsoft's opening statement in a class-action suit by Iowa consumers who claim they were overcharged by $329 million since 1994. Tulchin's statement began after a lawyer for the consumers concluded his side's opening statement after almost six days. … The lawsuit is one of only two similar cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. Any jury award may be tripled under Iowa law." Bloomberg adds, "The Iowa case and one in Mississippi are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers after an antitrust suit against Microsoft brought by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998. … Microsoft denies that it violated Iowa antitrust law."

DOJ_NMG_0105452

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Justices Rule Against BP In Royalties Case. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, 2.04M) reports, "The Supreme Court ruled against the oil and gas industry Monday in a dispute over how far back the government can reach to collect on leases for federal land. In a 7-0 decision, the court refused to limit the number of years the government can reach back to collect unpaid royalties." The case "involves two units of BP that had sued over lease royalties oil and gas companies must pay for coal bed methane removed from federal land. That dispute concerned questions of at what stage of production the levy should be paid."

The AP (12/12, Yost) reports, "At issue is whether a federal law imposing a six-year time limit for the government to file lawsuits based on federal contracts also applies to administrative orders. … Ten years ago, the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service ordered BP America Production Co. and ARCO to pay $4.1 million and $780,000 respectively to cover royalty deficiencies on coalbed methane. The companies pumped the natural gas from wells in the San Juan Basin, which is in northwest New Mexico and southwest Colorado. … The government's administrative claim was based on royalties allegedly owed going back more than eight years from the time the Interior Department demanded the money. BP and ARCO say the limit should be six years, which would reduce the amount of royalties the Interior Department is able to claim."

Review Finds BP Officials Worried Cost Cutting Led To Fatal Blast. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A3, Cummins) reports, "Some top BP PLC executives worried that cost cutting at a Texas refinery may have contributed to the plant's poor state of safety and equipment, according to an internal BP review that is likely to turn up the heat on the company over a deadly explosion at the site." The Journal continues, "Documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal also quote a former senior BP safety executive saying that BP Chief Executive John Browne 'showed little interest' in safety issues." The Journal adds, "The March 2005 accident at BP's Texas City, Texas, refinery killed 15 people and injured 180. BP faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims. The accident, along with a series of other safety and environmental incidents, has undercut BP's efforts to promote itself as a socially responsible energy company that is 'Beyond Petroleum.' High profits from surging oil and gasoline prices over the past three years have added to public pressure. … BP officials have said they believe budgetary decisions didn't play a critical role in the accident, caused when workers restarted a small gasoline-processing unit. A BP spokesman defended Lord Browne's safety record and repeated yesterday that the company determined in its own investigations into the accident that spending wasn't an issue in the blast. … In a series of internal interviews, however, BP executives painted a more complicated picture. Their thinking is laid out in notes and interview summaries that were collected this year as part of an internal BP review of the refinery accident. The interviews were conducted as part of a wide-ranging 'accountability' review, designed to determine what led to the accident, according to a BP spokesman."

California Oil Company Charged With Pollution. The Lompoc (CA) Record (12/12, Yale) reports, "An energy company with local operations is facing more trouble. .. The state attorney general's office has filed four misdemeanor counts of state water pollution against Greka Oil and Gas Inc." The Record continues, "The alleged violations of the California Fish and Game Code were filed in Santa Barbara County Superior Court in Santa Maria Wednesday. The Department of Fish and Game was the investigating agency, according to the attorney general's office. … The complaint alleged that Greka 'unlawfully deposited in, or permitted petroleum or other deleterious substance to pass into, the state waters of California.' … Greka allegedly committed these violations Dec. 7, 2005, at 5017 Zaca Station Road in Los Olivos; May 4 and May 16 at 3851 Telephone Road in Santa Maria; and Aug. 10 at 6572 Dominion Road in Santa Maria, according to the complaint." The Record adds, "According to reports from the Governor's Office of Emergency Services, the Los Olivos incident was caused by tank failure, and the spill went into an unnamed seasonal creek before it was contained. … The Santa Maria spill on May 4 was a pipeline leak, according to the report, and the petroleum went into an unnamed dry creek. The May 16 spill at the same location was reported by a caller as caused by a ruptured flow line, but it did not go into a waterway." The Record notes, "The corporation settled last month the remainder of a civil lawsuit filed in 2004 by the Santa Barbara County District Attorney's Office, which accused it of more than 100 safety and environmental violations. Greka agreed to pay a total $675,000 to the county and the county Air Pollution Control District in the settlements, according to a prosecutor in that case. … The U.S. Attorney's office began an investigation late last year into possible criminal acts committed by Greka, but there have been no public developments in that investigation since it began, U.S. Justice Department spokesman Thom Mrozek said Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0105453

Opponents Say Offshore Drilling Legislation Gives Too Much To Gulf States. The Washington Post (12/12, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports that the last bill passed by the 109th Congress "opens about 8 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling, and U.S. industrial consumers of natural gas hope it will boost supplies and moderate prices. But the bill's landmark aspect was a deal that diverts 37.5 percent of federal royalties from future drilling to the four Gulf of Mexico states." The "accord could ultimately be worth $650 million a year for Louisiana, the biggest beneficiary." The Post adds, "Foes of the legislation fear it will lure states opposed to offshore drilling such as California, Virginia, Florida and North and South Carolina into supporting exploration off their shorelines in return for a gusher of new revenue." Moreover, "[o]pponents of the bill call it fiscally irresponsible and say that any royalties from drilling in federal waters, which begin three miles from shore and extend up to 200 miles out, belong to the federal government."

Proposals For Carbon Dioxide Limits Gather Momentum. The New York Times (12/12, Lohr, 1.16M) reports that "James E. Rogers, chief executive of Duke Energy, a coal-burning utility in the Midwest and the Southeast, has emerged as an unexpected advocate of federal regulation that would for the first time impose a cost for emitting carbon dioxide." His stance "is far from universal within the power industry, but it has surprising support, particularly from those, like him, who also produce electricity from carbon-free nuclear reactors. And despite the Bush administration's adamant opposition to any limits on fossil fuel emissions, the idea is beginning to pick up momentum in the American political arena as well." The Times analyses possible measures to curb warming, including a federal tax on carbon dioxide waste and a 'cap and trade' regulatory system.

USA Today (12/12, 3B, Davidson, 2.27M) reports, "The rising temperature of Earth's atmosphere may be breeding growing distress and sparking sales of hybrid cars, but most utility executives aren't exactly losing sleep over the problem. In fact, many electric companies are forging ahead with plans for traditional coal-fired power plants,...despite expectations that federal limits will eventually be placed on carbon dioxide emissions. That prospect grows more likely with Congress' new Democratic majority." USA Today adds, "Uncertainty about how restrictive any limits might be has left utilities with a dilemma: build traditional coal plants that are cheaper and generally deemed more reliable or 'clean-coal' facilities that may be less expensive in the long run?"

Highly-Efficient Superconductors Breaking Into Commercial Market. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Clayton, 59K) reports, "Twenty years after their much ballyhooed discovery, high-tech materials capable of delivering 150 times the electricity of conventional wire are starting to push into the commercial market. They promise to make generators, industrial motors, and even power lines far more efficient as the technology becomes more affordable." The Monitor adds, "At least eight new cable projects already are under way in the United States, Europe, China, South Korea, Japan, and Mexico. This month, a leading US innovator in the field will shove out the factory door its first commercial product using the technology, which will help the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) keep its grid stable."

Fuel Economy Ratings To Drop Under New EPA Testing Procedures. USA Today (12/11, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Fuel economy ratings of cars and trucks will drop significantly starting with 2008 models, some of which will go on sale early next year. The declines are because the Environmental Protection Agency is using more-realistic conditions to estimate the mileage cars and trucks will get." USA Today adds, "Fuel-saving gasoline electric hybrids will see the biggest drops in the mileage numbers posted on their window stickers — as much as 30% worse in city driving, 20% worse on the highway, the EPA said after issuing new testing procedures." The new tests do not affect calculations for CAFÉ, which "is overseen by the Department of Transportation, not by EPA."

The New York Times (12/12, Wald, 1.16M) says the EPA "rewrote one of the great fictions of American life on Monday by changing the formula for calculating miles-per-gallon numbers on the window stickers of new cars, to take account of higher speeds, more aggressive driving, more air-conditioning use and other factors not in the old system." Congress "ordered the change 18 months ago because of widespread dissatisfaction with the accuracy of the old numbers."

The AP (12/12, Thomas) says, "Highly fuel-efficient vehicles are expected to see the largest slide, with ratings for city driving dropping by as much as 30 percent and highway driving estimates falling 25 percent from current levels." The "changes respond to consumer complaints that fuel economy estimates are frequently less than advertised."

LATimes Says Administration Politicizing Science At EPA. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, 850K) says in an editorial, "The Environmental Protection Agency has been rightly criticized under the Bush administration for repeatedly allowing political appointees to run roughshod over scientists, ignoring their findings and crafting regulations that please industry but fail to protect the public. Now the agency is making the practice official." Under a "new policy announced last week, scientists will be shuffled to the margins when the agency resets its all-important air-quality standards. Up to now, the process of drawing up new standards began with two sets of scientists — EPA staffers and an independent panel — conducting reviews of how pollution affects public health, then making recommendations to agency managers. Now the managers, who are usually political appointees, will work with staff scientists from the start, and the first review paper will be about policy, not science." Normally, the Administration "has broad leeway to interpret law into regulations. But when it changes the process to subvert the law's protective intent, Congress should reluctantly step in to spell out the obvious: Environmental policy is, first and foremost, about science."

DOJ_NMG_0105454

FWS Pulls Bison Range Management Agreement With Tribes. The Missoula (MT) Missoulian (12/12, Backus) reports, "The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service officially pulled its controversial agreement with the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes for shared management of the National Bison Range on Monday, saying the tribes have failed to live up to their responsibilities and have created an unacceptable workplace environment." The Missoulian continues, "Tribal officials said the announcement was unexpected and denied the allegations contained in FWS Regional Director Mitch King's letter. … 'It's taken us off guard. We were in the middle of something and trying to make it work,' said CSKT Tribal Council Chairman James Steele Jr." The Missoulian adds, "King's letter said the agency was terminating negotiations for future annual funding agreements. … The letter ordered the tribes to immediately stop performing any activities at the Bison Range, return all FWS equipment, and withdraw all CSKT employees, contractors and volunteers from the refuge by the end of the workday Tuesday." The Missoulian notes, "The decision marked the end of months of negotiations between the tribes and the Fish and Wildlife Service over future management of the National Bison Range. … The two entered into an agreement in 2004 that split management duties beginning in 2006. King's letter said the FWS wanted to continue that agreement into 2007 with some minor revisions, but the tribes argued for more management control. … After the 2006 agreement expired Sept. 30, the FWS agreed to extend it while negotiations continued. … The tribes sought a phased takeover of the refuge, which sits in the heart of the Flathead Indian Reservation, under provisions of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act. The legislation allows tribes to apply to manage certain federal public lands where they can show a cultural, historical or geographic connection."

US Joins Chippewa Tribe In Land Suit Against Michigan. The AP (12/12) reports from Bay City, MI, "The U.S. Justice Department has joined a lawsuit filed by the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe against the state that seeks sovereignty over parts of central Michigan's Isabella County, based on treaties from 1855 and 1864." The AP continues, "Court documents show the federal government joined the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Bay City as an additional plaintiff on Nov. 29, the Morning Sun of Mount Pleasant reported Monday. … The tribe sued in 2005, asking a federal judge to declare that all or part of seven townships in Isabella County are Indian country as defined by federal law." The AP adds, "Earlier this year, the tribe amended its complaint to ask for an injunction to bar the governor, attorney general and state treasurer from exerting criminal or civil jurisdiction over the tribe or its members "in a manner not allowed in Indian country." … In the filing, Assistant U.S. Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge noted that the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction to prosecute major crimes committed on the reservation, and has other relationships with the tribe." The AP notes, "In response, Michigan Assistant Attorney General Todd Adams said the predecessors to the Saginaw Chippewas gave up all their land in a series of treaties, ending with the 1836 Treaty of Saginaw. … He said the 1855 and 1864 treaties 'merely provided a designated area from which they could choose land like any other individual citizen of Michigan and the United States pursuant to United States law.'"

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Alleged Mexican Drug Cartel Leader May Face Federal Death Penalty. The San Diego Union-Tribune (12/12, Soto) reports, "New charges are expected to be filed this week that could lead to the death penalty against the man prosecutors say is the leader of the Arellano Félix Mexican drug cartel." The Union-Tribune continues, "The charges against Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, who was captured at sea in August, will accuse him of additional criminal activity over the past three years, prosecutors said. … Their comments came during a brief hearing before San Diego federal judge Larry Alan Burns set a May 15 trial date for Arellano, though prosecutors and defense lawyers said they didn't think they could be ready by then. … 'This is far too soon to be going to trial,' said defense lawyer Mark Adams." The Union-Tribune adds, "Arellano is accused of racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering in a decades-long conspiracy that prosecutors say moved tons of drugs into the United States and that resulted in numerous killings on both sides of the border. … The charges, originally filed in 1997, were last updated in 2003. The evidence includes tens of thousands of pages of case files and more than 550,000 intercepted radio transmissions. … Burns said he would consider rescheduling the trial once the new indictment is unsealed but only under extraordinary circumstances. He also suggested that the case be split into two parts so some of it could go to trial quickly." The Union-Tribune notes, "The new indictment would be the formal start of a death-penalty process that typically takes about four months and leads to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announcing whether prosecutors will seek a defendant's execution. … Authorities say the new indictment also will include charges against another man, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who was captured aboard Arellano's fishing boat by the U.S. Coast Guard off Baja California Sur. He is accused of being a member of the cartel."

DOJ_NMG_0105455

DEA Agent Says Mexican Drug Cartels Bringing More Potent Meth Into Tennessee. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (12/12, Satterfield) reports there are fewer makeshift meth labs in East Tennessee. However, Mexican drug cartels "have stepped in to fill the void with an even more potent version of the addictive drug. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Michael Templeton offered that assessment of the state of the meth scourge on Monday during testimony against Richard 'Dairy Man' Milburn." Milburn "is the lone defendant left standing in a massive marijuana and methamphetamine case involving more than 13 suspects, some eight tons of drugs, tractor-trailers, a dairy farm, horseback-riding buddies and Rubbermaid containers stuffed with cash. … The trial continues today."

Nine Plead Guilty To Roles In Drug-Trafficking Organization. The West Fargo Pioneer (12/11) reported nine Minnesota and North Dakota defendants "pleaded guilty for their participation in a drug-trafficking enterprise. … Assistant United States Attorney Chris Myers said this organization was involved in the distribution of more than 50 kilograms (100 lbs.) of cocaine, 10 kilograms (20 lbs.) of methamphetamine and nearly a ton (200 lbs.) of marijuana. The drugs were transported from the Laredo, Texas, area to the Fargo-Moorhead and Grafton area." The Pioneer notes the DEA's involvement in the investigation.

Personal Trainer In Maryland Accused Of Importing Illicit Muscle Enhancers. The AP (12/11) reported federal authorities "say a personal trainer at a Glen Burnie fitness club imported thousands of vials and tablets of illicit muscle enhancers from overseas and sold them throughout the Baltimore region and on the Internet. Michael Schlanger, 47, of Catonsville, was indicted in federal court in September on conspiracy to distribute to distribute anabolic steroids." Court documents "allege Schlanger, an employee at Bally Total Fitness in Glen Burnie, imported tens of thousands of vials and tablets of the muscle-building drugs through the mail for resale. The conspiracy came to light in July when customs agents at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York intercepted packages of steroids addressed to 'County Crafts.' One package was from China, another was from Great Britain."

DEA Agent Says Mexican Drug Cartels Bringing More Potent Meth Into Tennessee. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (12/12, Satterfield) reports there are fewer makeshift meth labs in East Tennessee. However, Mexican drug cartels "have stepped in to fill the void with an even more potent version of the addictive drug. U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration agent Michael Templeton offered that assessment of the state of the meth scourge on Monday during testimony against Richard 'Dairy Man' Milburn." Milburn "is the lone defendant left standing in a massive marijuana and methamphetamine case involving more than 13 suspects, some eight tons of drugs, tractor-trailers, a dairy farm, horseback-riding buddies and Rubbermaid containers stuffed with cash. … The trial continues today."

Mexico's New President Takes Action Against Drug Gangs. The AP (12/12) reports Mexico's new government "announced Monday that it was sending more than 6,500 soldiers, marines and federal police to the western state of Michoacan to crack down on a wave of execution-style killings and beheadings that have left hundreds dead. The operation is the first major offensive against drug gangs by President Felipe Calderon, who was sworn in on Dec. 1 after narrowly winning election on a law-and-order platform. … Federal investigators say the violence in Michoacan, Calderon's home state, stems from a turf war between a local gang called Los Valencia and the northern Mexico Gulf cartel, whose bloody enforcers are known as the Zetas, a group of ex-Mexican army operatives turned hit men." Investigators "say about half of Michoacan's more than 500 killings this year are linked to the turf war."

The Washington Post (12/12, A23, Roig-Franzia) reports more than 5,000 Mexican soldiers and federal police officers "swept into the troubled state of Michoacan on Monday hoping to quell a long, barbaric war between rival drug cartels. … Federal forces, backed by dozens of military aircraft, arrested at least 13 alleged drug traffickers in the first hours of the operation and discovered more than 1,000 marijuana plants." Officials "have been under increasing pressure from the United States to contain cartels whose influence stretches across the border." Mexican forces also "are investigating whether Oaxacan police officers may be responsible for the killings of more than a dozen protesters and Brad Will, an American freelance journalist and activist."

DOJ_NMG_0105456

ATF Cannot Trace Gun In Fatal New York Shooting. The New York Journal News (12/12, Golding) reports from New Castle, NY, "Federal authorities were unable to trace a handgun found near the reported scene of an unsolved roadside shooting that killed a neighbor of Bill and Hillary Clinton's." The News continues, "Jim Needles of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms said there was no serial number on the weapon, which meant it was probably manufactured before 1968, when gun makers began marking their products with identifying numbers. .. .Needles, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF's New York Field Division, said U.S. Justice Department regulations prohibited him from releasing any details about the handgun, although he said that because of its age it was most likely a revolver." The News adds, "State police found the gun while searching Echo Lake after the Nov. 18 shootings of Carlos and Peggy Perez-Olivo of Chappqua, who live three doors away from the Clintons' home. … Peggy Perez-Olivo, an elementary teacher's assistant, was shot in the head and died two days later. Carlos Perez-Olivo, a disbarred criminal defense lawyer, was shot in the side but survived."

Former Mayor Of Missouri Town Faces Federal Arson Charge. The AP (12/12) reports from St. Louis, "The former mayor of Kirksville (MO) has been indicted on federal arson charges for a fire that damaged a restaurant and bar she owned in the northeast Missouri town, U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said Monday." The AP continues, "Deborah Masten, 52, could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted. She did not have a listed telephone number. … Masten and her husband, Steve, owned Too Talls Two Eatery and Spirits when the fire broke out early New Year's Day 2005. The Missouri State Highway Patrol and state fire marshal's office determined the blaze was suspicious, prompting an investigation by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. … 'Despite the sadness of having to announce an indictment against a former public official, ATF is pleased to have been able to lend its investigative expertise with arson to this case,' ATF special agent Michael Boxler said." The AP adds, "The fire was reported at 2:23 a.m. Jan. 1, 2005. Investigators announced a few weeks later it was intentionally set. The Kirksville Daily Express reported that investigators found a pile of trash out of place, and an accelerant had been used. The Mastens offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the person responsible for the fire. … But on March 3, 2005, ATF investigators named Deborah Masten as the suspect in the fire, the Daily Express reported. She maintained her innocence."

Marshals Nab Fugitive At Philadelphia Library Computer. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/12, Lipka) reports, "The man in the Donovan McNabb jersey got to the Philadelphia Free Library's main branch at 9 a.m., as usual, and was seated at a public computer terminal, tapping away at his MySpace.com page, as usual. … So he did not notice that 15 armed officers were quietly converging on him." The Inquirer continues, "That, authorities say, is how a fugitive wanted in Georgia and Massachusetts was captured last Thursday without a fight. They say they figured out that he had been going to the library regularly to update his MySpace page. … Darren Bates, 35, was using one of the library's computers about 9:15 a.m. Thursday when 15 plainclothes members of a fugitive task force converged on him as other patrons tapped away on nearby keyboards, officials said yesterday. … 'He was busy on the computer and we were able to walk right up to him from several directions without him seeing us,' said John Patrignani, supervisory deputy of the U.S. Marshals Service Violent Crimes Fugitive Task Force. 'He was very much surprised.'" The Inquirer adds, "Bates, who was wearing a McNabb jersey, was taken into custody without incident, Patrignani said. He was being held yesterday in a city jail cell pending extradition to Georgia. … Patrignani said task force members in Massachusetts had determined Bates was going to the Central Library at 1901 Vine St. about the same time every day - when the library opened at 9."

Arlington, VA, Awarded DOJ Grant To Fight Gang Activity. The Arlington (VA) Connection (12/11, Rosen) reports, "The Justice Department has given a $172,000 grant to three Arlington nonprofit organizations to continue funding a series of programs that aim to keep students out of gangs." The Connection continues, "The initiatives — administered by the Hispanic Committe of Virginia and run by Barrios Unidos and the Greenbrier Learning Center — provide leadership training, mentoring services and tutoring to mostly Latino middle and high school students. Up to 400 Arlington teenagers are expected to participate in at least one of the programs this school year." The Connection adds, "Providing students with a plethora of after-school activities and positive role models is the best way to ensure they will not fall prey to the lure of gang life, said U.S. Rep. Jim Moran, who helped secure the grant from the Justice Department. … These programs 'are a great way to help our children avoid the pitfalls of violence and gang activity, and attain the American dream of prosperity and a life free of fear,' Moran said during a Dec. 4 press conference in the Arlington County Board room. … The Greenbrier Learning Center will use the federal funding to continue to operate its after-school tutoring sessions at Kenmore Middle School. Every weekday counselors help students who are having trouble at school, or have been identified as vulnerable to joining a gang, complete their homework assignments."

DOJ_NMG_0105457

TAX:

Former Ohio Major Charged With Tax, Mail Fraud. The Akron Beacon Journal (12/12, Armon, 125K) reports, "The former mayor of Ravenna was charged in federal court Monday with tax and mail fraud for allegedly concealing his role in running a local lawn care and snow removal business, authorities said. Paul Jones, who abruptly resigned in midterm a year ago and moved to Florida, is accused of not disclosing the family-owned business in state ethics forms and filing false tax returns." Ravenna City Councilman Joseph Bica praised the indictment and "said he hopes the investigation continues." The Beacon Journal notes, "FBI spokesman Scott Wilson declined to talk about the case, including when or how it began. … 'We continue to focus on this case closely right now,' Wilson said when asked if the probe was continuing. 'We'll take a look at any other transactions while (Jones) was mayor in the city of Ravenna.'"

DOJ Seeks To Ban California Accountant's Tax Scheme. The North Platte (NE) Bulletin (12/5, Graham) reports, "The alleged tax fraud scheme of a California accountant and numerous North Platte doctors and other medical personnel is unraveling with the latest court filing." The Bulletin continues, "U.S. Attorney Jacqueline Brown is seeking an immediate injunction against Lowell Baisden to prevent him from promoting an unlawful tax avoidance scheme and from preparing federal tax returns for others. … Brown filed the motion for an injunction in U.S. District Court in California Dec. 1." The Bulletin adds, "The U.S. Attorney's office and the IRS claim that Baisden set up dummy corporations in Nevada and Wyoming for doctors and other professionals in Nebraska and California. … Baisden's customers were the doctors and other professionals. … Baisden funneled his customer's personal income through the corporation to allegedly hide it from tax liability. The sham corporations then paid each customer a small salary and the rest of their living expenses through corporate accounts. … Baisden's customers paid him a monthly fee for the various money laundering transactions and he prepared both their corporate and individual tax returns." The Bulletin notes, "The scheme, which is now being investigated by the Justice Department and the IRS, has allegedly been going on for at least seven years, since 1999, and could involve as many as eight North Platte doctors, according to court records."

IRS Paid At Least $200 Million In Bogus Refunds Due To Computer Failure. ABC World News (12/11, story 8, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on what one "what one report called one of the most embarrassing episodes in the recent history of the Internal Revenue Service. First, the IRS paid hundreds of millions of dollars in refunds to those who did not deserve them. And then, the agency found, they cannot get the money back. And it's 'Your Money.'" ABC (Cochran) added, "At the Internal Revenue Service there are a lot of red faces after they admitted that they paid out $200 million in bogus refunds." Sen. Charles Grassley: "They royally screwed up. And it's going to cost the honest taxpayer a lot of money." Cochran: "Treasury investigators say the amount lost is actually more than $300 million." Michael Phillips, Deputy Inspector General, Treasury Department: "It was sort of the worst-case scenario. What could go wrong did go wrong. And yes, some money is lost and cannot be regained." Cochran: "All because the IRS paid $20 million for a new computer system that failed, big-time." Peter Sepp, National Taxpayers Union: "The IRS and computers mix like oil and water. You can put them together, but eventually, everything falls apart." Cochran: "The IRS hoped the new computers would easily spot tax frauds. People, for example, who claim suspiciously high deductions for things like gifts to charity and medical expenses. But last year the company developing the new system warned the IRS, it might not be ready come tax season. And sure enough, it wasn't. And to make matters worse, the IRS had shut down its backup system."

Federal Judges Get Tax Break On Stocks Sold Because Of Conflicts. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A6, 2.04M) reports Federal judges "received a long-sought break when Congress extended to them the same exemption from capital-gains taxes that executive-branch officials receive when selling stock for conflict-of-interest reasons." Under ethics rules, judges "are disqualified from ruling in matters where they have a financial interest, such as owning stock in a company that is party to a lawsuit. The issue typically comes up in complex litigation, when, months or years into a case, a judge could suddenly find himself or herself conflicted because of the late joining of a party or a merger of a party into a company where he or she owns shares." That has "forced some judges either to step aside from a case or sell stock that potentially could bring a big capital- gains-tax bill." But Congress "turned a deaf ear to the judges' request for a pay raise."

DOJ_NMG_0105458

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Plan Streamlined Omnibus Spending Bill. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A2, Rogers, 2.04M) reports the "new Democratic majority in Congress wants to keep the government operating under a streamlined funding resolution for the rest of the fiscal year and not attempt to complete the individual spending bills abandoned by the outgoing Republican leadership." Democrats, "fearing a political trap…want to avoid becoming bogged down and sacrificing their own agenda by devoting weeks to passing an omnibus measure combining the unfinished bills. The path outlined now offers a speedier alternative, but never in modern memory has it been attempted on such a large scale." The announcement "was made last night by the incoming chairmen of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees," Rep. David Obey and Sen. Robert Byrd, " who also said they would impose a moratorium on new congressional earmarks, targeted appropriations for special projects in members' home districts. None would be part of the proposed funding resolution, killing hundreds that are pending in the unfinished spending bills." House and Senate Democratic leaders "gave their endorsement, but the White House, which could be the big loser, is clearly uncomfortable."

The Hill (12/12, Schor) reports Byrd and Obey "issued a statement yesterday laying blame at the feet of departing GOP leaders for failing to pass nine of the 11 fiscal year 2007 appropriations bills, a criticism leveled by several Republicans in the waning days of the lame-duck session." Democrats "faced an already crowded winter schedule, headlined by the president's budget in early February and a hefty war supplemental expected to approach $150 billion for the military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, that made even an omnibus nearly impossible to achieve on time. Producing a continuing resolution scrubbed of earmarks is likely to present its own partisan pitfalls for the new leadership, as members on both sides of the aisle grapple with district projects planned for but no longer paid for."

The Washington Post (12/12, A3, Murray, Weisman, 690K) reports Democratic leaders "declared a temporary moratorium on special-interest provisions known as earmarks as they attempt to cope with a budget crisis left by the outgoing Republican-led 109th Congress." The "unfinished bills account for about $463 billion in annual spending and include just about every domestic program other than defense and homeland security. The announcement appears to be a victory for conservative budget reformers, such as Reps. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Tom Price (R-Ga.), who circulated a petition last week calling for a resolution that would extend funding through the rest of the year, but without earmarks." That petition, "however, called for all domestic programs to be funded at the lowest levels called for in either the House or Senate versions." In contrast, Obey and Byrd "indicated that they would seek adjustments in spending levels to satisfy Democrats and moderate Republicans who were upset by the austere funding bills passed by the House Appropriations Committee. In particular, the measure to fund labor, health and education programs fell billions of dollars short of the Senate-approved levels, and the levels that even many House Republicans said were acceptable."

The New York Times (12/12, Hulse, 1.16M) reports the "unfinished bills loomed as a potential major distraction for Democrats as they prepare to take power in January, a fact not lost on the Republicans who chose not to try to complete the work." Rep. Obey and Sen. Byrd "made clear that they would rather concentrate on the first budget under their party's leadership while giving close scrutiny to the president's own spending plan and his request for war spending."

House Democrats To Push For Government-Negotiated Drug Prices. The AP (12/12, Werner) reports Rep. Pete Stark said House Democrats will "take the middle ground on the Medicare drug benefit, pushing for government-negotiated prices but stopping short of creating a federal plan to compete with private insurers." Stark said "a government-run plan would save money but is too ambitious for immediate action." Stark, the "liberal in line to chair the House Ways and Means Committee's health subcommittee," said, "That might draw a veto and then get us accused — which I don't mind, but most of my colleagues do — of price-setting and all that. ... There's a hesitancy to seem too radical." The AP adds incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has included Medicare drug negotiation in her agenda for the party's first 100 legislative hours, but she hasn't offered many details."

Congress Links Doctors' Medicare Pay, Performance. The New York Times (12/12, Pear, 1.16M) reports that after "years of trying to rein in the runaway cost of the Medicare program, Congress has decided to use a carrot instead of a stick to change doctors' behavior." Doctors had been "fearing a pay cut under Medicare, the health care program for 43 million elderly and disabled, but Congress instead has offered doctors a small bonus with big strings attached. To get the money, doctors will have to report how often they provide quality care, as defined by the government." Lawmakers "approved the change as one of their final acts before adjourning early Saturday morning, and proponents said it would improve the quality of medical care. But the plan immediately raised concerns among some doctors and lawmakers who specialize in health issues." The critics "said they worried that it could be a step toward cookbook medicine and could erode the professional autonomy of doctors." Doctors had "been facing a 5 percent cut in Medicare payments in 2007," but the now "can qualify for a 1.5 percent bonus in the second half of 2007 if they report data on the quality of their care, using measures specified by the government."

DOJ_NMG_0105459

Congress Raises Income Limit On DC Voucher Program. The Washington Post (12/12, B4, Haynes, 690K) reports, "Congress has increased the income guidelines for" students first "enrolled in the District's federally funded school voucher program" in 2004-2005 from "200 to 300 percent of the federal poverty line" in "an effort aimed at preventing hundreds of students from being forced out of the program before it is evaluated." It is estimated that "more than 300" of the 1,800 enrolled "would have been forced out of the program under the original income guidelines."

Pelosi Pledges Additional Protection For House Pages. The AP (12/12, Abrams) reports incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "said Monday she will take legislative steps to better protect House pages after the scandal involving a congressman sending salacious e-mails to former male pages." Pelosi "said legislation would be introduced early in the new Congress to increase oversight of the page program, require regular meetings of the page board and add a parent of a current and a former page on that board."

Report Suggests Hastert Was Told Of Questionable Foley Emails. The Hill (12/12, Cusack) reports the House ethics committee "report on the page scandal, released on Friday, did not come to any definitive conclusions on whether House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) was informed of the questionable e-mails that former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) sent to pages." But lawmakers "on the ethics committee suggested that they believe Hastert was told about them. Reps. John Boehner (R-Ohio) and Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) testified that they informed the Speaker of the e-mails, but Hastert said he has no recollection of those conversations."

Ethics Scandals Erode Regard For Members Of Congress. USA Today (12/12, Koch, 2.27M) reports only "15% of 1,009 adults in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday gave US senators high or very high marks for honesty and ethical standards. Only 14% did so for U.S. representatives." Members of both houses "are down from 25% in 2001, when members of Congress got their best score since the survey began in 1976." Frank Newport, editor in chief of the Gallup Poll, said, "Congressmen can take heart. They're a few points higher than car salesmen."

Reports Show Americans Don't Trust Government To Spend Funds Wisely. USA Today (12/12, 10A, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "Americans are open to tax increases and benefit cuts to preserve Social Security and Medicare, but they don't trust the government to spend their money wisely, two reports being released today show." The reports "contend that Americans would consider such measures as scaling back end-of-life care and extending the retirement age as ways to avoid bankrupting the Social Security and Medicare systems. Their mistrust of government is so deep, however, that political leaders must convince them their money won't be wasted." Stuart Butler of the Heritage Foundation said, "They really are very skeptical about what happens when you send money to Washington. They think that money is going to be stolen by somebody to build a bridge somewhere." USA adds those "are the major findings of the reports by Public Agenda and Viewpoint Learning. Those two public policy groups, left- and right-leaning think tanks and groups favoring deficit reduction have spent the past year working to educate the public and seek feedback about the nation's fiscal condition."

House Panel Says McDermott Violated Ethics Standards. The AP (12/12, Daly) reports the House ethics committee said Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., "violated ethics standards by giving reporters access to an illegally taped telephone call involving Republican leaders a decade ago." McDermott, who "at the time was the panel's senior Democrat, failed to meet his obligations as a committee leader, said a report released two days after Congress adjourned for the year. The panel took no action other than the report." The ethics complaint "stems from a tape recording made by a Florida couple, who gave it to McDermott in January 1997. The tape recorded then-Speaker Gingrich, R-Ga., in a December 1996 conference call with GOP leaders regarding a separate ethics investigation of Gingrich." McDermott "leaked the tape to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution and The New York Times, which published stories on the case in January 1997." A "three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled against McDermott in a related civil case in March. The 2-1 opinion upheld a lower court ruling that McDermott had violated the rights of Rep. John Boehner, R-Ohio, who was heard on the 1996 call. Boehner, then a Gingrich lieutenant, is now House majority leader." The "full nine-member appeals court vacated the three-judge ruling this spring and heard new arguments in the case in October. A ruling is expected next year."

The Hill (12/12, Crabtree) reports the House ethics committee found that Rep. McDermott's "1997 leaking of a secretly taped phone call to the media" was "'inconsistent with the spirit of the applicable [House] rules.' The panel, however, did not punish McDermott."

DOJ_NMG_0105460

California Republican Said To Mix Public Actions, Private Business. The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Heisel, 850K) reports that in 2000, Republican Rep. Gary Miller "implored Monrovia City Council members to purchase 165 acres he owned in the foothills and turn the land into a wilderness preserve. Earlier that day, Miller asked one of his staff members to find a way to place one of the councilmen -- a pawnshop owner with no parks experience -- on the National Park System Advisory Board. The aide was told to 'make it a priority.'" But even after "staff members warned him that trying to secure the park board seat for the councilman could appear to be a bribe attempt, Miller continued to push for the councilman's appointment, according to internal memos, interviews with former Miller staff members and official correspondence reviewed by the Los Angeles Times." The move "was one of many that Miller has made over the years in which he brought his congressional muscle to bear on personal and private business matters, according to the staffers and correspondence from Miller's office -- hand-written notes, letters on Miller's congressional letterhead and e-mails."

Mollahan Under Investigation For Real Estate Deal. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (12/11, Sylvester) reported, "[W]we saw former Congressman Bob Ney and former congressman Duke Cunningham -- both lawmakers are now disgraced and out of office. But it's not just Republicans. Now there are allegations of wrongdoing involving a Democrat from West Virginia." CNN reported that WV1 Alan Mollohan (D) and a staffer, Laura Kuhms, "bought real estate investments along the Carolina coast.." Then, Mollohan "tapped the same congressional aide to head up one of five nonprofit organizations he set up in his West Virginia district. In the last five years, Mollohan, who sits on the Appropriations Committee, helped channel more than $150 million in taxpayer money to keep these economic development nonprofits thriving. The National Legal and Policy Center filed a 500-page complaint with the Justice Department this year detailing Mollohan's business arrangements. But in a strange twist, Mollohan may end up chairing the very subcommittee that has jurisdiction over the Justice Department's budget." CNN added, "A spokesman for Mollohan said, 'The allegations and suggestions of wrongdoing made by the NLPC are utterly false,' and added that the congressman made his fortune from an inheritance that he reinvested in a booming real estate market."

House Democratic Leaders May Assign Jefferson To Lesser Committee. The Washington Post (12/12, A6, Babington, Lengel, 690K) reports House Democratic leaders, "who have vowed to run a more ethical Congress, are struggling with how to respond to the reelection of Rep. William J. Jefferson, the Louisiana Democrat whose Washington home freezer once held $90,000 in alleged bribe money." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "stripped Jefferson of his seat on the influential Ways and Means Committee in June and has hinted that she may place him on no committee when the 110th Congress convenes next month. But a source close to Pelosi said yesterday that she is more likely to place him on a lower-profile committee and hope the controversy dies down." The source "familiar with Pelosi's thinking said that the incoming speaker wants to distance herself and her caucus from Jefferson and legal problems but that she thinks she cannot ignore that voters returned him to office when details of the investigation were well known." Sources "familiar with the probe said Jefferson will be indicted, probably in the first half of 2007. The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the case, said investigators have been looking at about a dozen business deals in the United States and Africa in which Jefferson allegedly used his official position for financial gain."

CBC To Press For Jefferson's Reinstatement To Ways And Means. The Hill (12/12, Bolton) reports the Congressional Black Caucus is "planning to press Democratic leaders to reinstate Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) to the Ways and Means Committee, raising the thorny question of how leaders will handle the fate of Rep. Alan Mollohan (D-W.Va.), who has also come under ethical scrutiny." If Pelosi "and fellow leaders decide to keep Jefferson off Ways and Means, they could open themselves to charges of following a double standard by allowing Mollohan to become chairman of an Appropriations subcommittee, as he is now poised to do." Top Democrats are "dealing with questions regarding what to do about Jefferson and Mollohan at the same time that they must decide how to reward lawmakers who have raised tens of thousands of dollars for the party but find themselves with less seniority than stingier colleagues on subcommittees."

Portman Will Be Key White House Link To Congressional Democrats. The Washington Post (12/12, A25, Montgomery, 690K) reports, "Hired in the spring of 2006 to direct the Office of Management and Budget," former Rep. Rob Portman "was hailed as a man who could improve ties between a sometimes imperial president and an increasingly cranky Congress, then in Republican hands. On Nov. 7, his job changed dramatically. Now the six-term congressman from Ohio has to sell the fiscal policies of a weakened and unpopular president to a bunch of bitter and distrustful Democrats." The Post adds that in "many ways, Bush could not have picked a better person for the job. The boyish and earnest Portman seems to be as widely admired among his former Democratic colleagues as he is by Republicans." House Democrats "describe him as a reasonable guy, a committed problem-solver and an honest broker. After six years of presidential neglect, Democrats say Portman is one of the few members of the administration who has established a record of trust with the newly empowered Democratic Party." But "just because Democrats return Portman's phone calls does not mean they are ready to help him tame the projected growth of Social Security and federal health-care programs, which serve millions of Americans and threaten to consume a sharply escalating share of the nation's economic output as the population ages."

DOJ_NMG_0105461

Reid Seen As Tenacious Opponent For Bush, GOP. USA Today (12/12, Welch, 2.27M) reports Sen. Harry Reid "takes over as majority leader in January and becomes the man" President Bush "will have to deal with if he hopes to win legislation in his remaining two years in office. The Republicans' 49-seat minority leaves them with power to block Democratic initiatives, but his majority will allow Reid to control what issues the Senate considers — and determine whether Bush's proposals and nominations even get an airing." In Reid, "Bush and his party face an opposition leader who has earned a reputation for toughness." Reid "sometimes seems an oddity, a quiet, soft-spoken Mormon who represents gambling and a city, Las Vegas, that has become a world-class destination by marketing sin. He doesn't gamble, he says." In the "aftermath of last month's elections, which propelled Reid into the majority, Bush told Reid he wanted to work together." Reid said, "I said, 'Mr. President, that's what you said two years ago. I hope it works out better.'" USA adds Reid "hasn't talked with Bush since their White House meeting in early November, but he is encouraged by contacts from Bush's top aides." Reid said, "The president has to realize he has 25% of his presidency left. That's it. The first 75% has been squandered. And I would hope he realizes, as I do, that if he's getting anything accomplished he has to work with me. If I'm getting anything done, I have to work with him."

Supreme Court Library Closed For Renovations. USA Today (12/12, Biskupic) reports, "For the past 18 months, the elaborate oak-paneled library at the (US Supreme Court) has been closed to the public. It's a casualty of a protracted, $122 million overall modernization project at the marble-columned building across the street from the U.S. Capitol. … Most of the library's 600,000 volumes are being stored in offices five blocks away." USA continues," The library, with its looming arches, intricate carvings and glass chandeliers, was scheduled to reopen to the public this fall. However, construction delays have led the court to put off its reopening until at least 2008. … Lawyers who are members of the Supreme Court bar still can work in the magnificent reading room, but their access to the volumes comes only through a twice-daily courier service to the library's temporary storage facility at a nearby office building named after the late Justice Thurgood Marshall. … 'We regret any inconvenience to the public,' court spokeswoman Kathy Arberg says, 'but when the library reopens, researchers will find better working facilities and improved access to the records and briefs.'" USA adds, "The overall renovation project — which included replacing the original electrical and mechanical systems in the 71-year-old building — initially was projected for completion in summer 2008. The target date now is December 2009, Arberg says. … The delays have been caused by a series of unforeseen situations, she says." USA notes, "All the commotion, however, has created an unusual sense of disorder at the normally dignified structure that houses the nation's highest court. The nine justices have been able to stay in their chambers, but news reporters and clerks and other administrative personnel have been uprooted from their offices by the construction. They are working in trailers. … In a grand, Corinthian-style building rife with architectural detail, the library stands out. Elaborate woodcarvings fill every nook and cranny, reflecting traits such as wisdom and depicting ancient lawgivers such as Justinian. … 'It's calming, yet inspiring,' says Washington lawyer Seth Waxman, a former U.S. solicitor general, who says he has found refuge in the library for more than 20 years. 'I personally find that working there helps give me a sense of the majesty … of judicial review.'"

State Department Seeks To Overhaul Foreign Service Exam. The Washington Post (12/12, A1, Williamson, 690K) reports, "In a proposed overhaul of its hiring process slated for next year and to be announced to employees in coming days, the State Department would weigh resumes, references and intangibles such as 'team-building skills' in choosing who represents the United States abroad, according to three people involved in the process." The written test would "survive, but in a shortened form that would not be treated as the key first hurdle it has been for more than 70 years." State Department Director General George M. Staples said the goal of the new "Total Candidate" approach -- which "has the support of Secretary…Rice" -- is to 'improve our ability to find the best...compete more effectively with the private sector to attract the best, and…make our process faster in hiring the best," according to a draft cable to employees. However, "some career officers and foreign policy types worry that the new hiring process could dumb down or politicize the Foreign Service, whose reputation for selectivity helps make it one of government's most desirable career paths." According to the Post, the revamp is "slated for next year, if the department secures the money needed to pursue it."

DOJ_NMG_0105462

New SNL Cast Member Portrays Bush. The New York Times (12/12, Rutenberg, 1.16M) reports Washington is "watching closely to see whether President Bush will change much when he faces a new, Democratic Congress. But his character on 'Saturday Night Live' already has." Previously played "by Will Forte, Mr. Bush is now being played by Jason Sudeikis. Lorne Michaels, the NBC television show's executive producer, said that where Mr. Forte played Mr. Bush as whiny and beleaguered, Mr. Sudeikis, below, is playing him as having 'absolute confidence and buoyancy.' But in a sign that the world is starting to look past Mr. Bush's tenure, Mr. Michaels said he was freeing up Mr. Forte to play a new political role eventually: that of one of the 2008 contenders."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Give FDA More Funding For Produce Inspection. The New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "The linkage is troubling. There are sharp cuts in the budget and staff for the federal agency charged with keeping the nation's supply of fresh produce safe — and soon we are faced with repeated cases of food poisoning from vegetables and fruits." The outbreaks of "bacterial poisoning from fresh produce…raise doubts about the Food and Drug Administration's ability to inspect and monitor conditions on the nation's farms and in the plants that package and process their produce." At "a minimum, Congress needs to provide the F.D.A. with more money and more inspectors to monitor the safety of fresh produce all the way from field to consumer."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Expected To Keep Rates Steady. The Financial Times (12/12, Guha) reports, "With the Federal Reserve almost certain to keep interest rates on hold at 5.25 per cent at its policy meeting on Tuesday, attention will focus on whether its statement concedes any ground to the market's belief that the outlook for growth has deteriorated and interest rate cuts will ultimately have to follow. … While there are some signs that the level of mortgage applications and home sale turnover may be levelling out, high levels of unsold homes suggest that there remain downside risks to home construction and house prices." The economy "as a whole still seems to be in reasonable shape, with activity in the services sector buoyant and continued strong employment gains. Weakness in manufacturing may be no more than an inventory correction that will unwind early next year."

Survey Finds Worsening Job Picture In US. The Financial Times (12/12, Cameron) reports, "US employers are expected to tighten their hiring plans in key sectors, such as finance and durable goods, for the second consecutive quarter, according to the latest survey by Manpower, the world's largest temporary employment group. The quarterly review, out on Tuesday, reveals accelerated hiring plans in most of Europe and Asia, including the most buoyant expectations in Germany and Japan since the survey started and will add weight to hopes of a soft landing for the US -economy." Jeff Joerres, Manpower's chairman and chief executive, "said there had been a 'subtle downward shift' in the US in spite of two years of steady expansion that had seen about 150,000 staff added to payrolls a month."

Number Of Homes For Sale Decline In Top Metro Areas. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, D2, Hagerty, 2.04M) reports, "The number of homes listed for sale in 18 major US metropolitan areas at the end of November was down 4% from a month earlier, according to data compiled by ZipRealty Inc., a national real-estate brokerage firm in Emeryville, Calif." The decline is "an encouraging sign for home sellers. Prices have been falling in recent months in many areas, largely because of a glut of unsold homes, and are unlikely to rise again until inventories come down." The Journal adds, "Inventories of previously occupied homes typically decline modestly in November in most parts of the country, as the approach of the holidays prompts some sellers to take their homes off the market until the new year. During the past 20 years, national inventories have declined by an average of about 2% in November from October, according to Credit Suisse Group."

Stocks Up Yesterday. NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 6, 0:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished on the upside. The Dow gained a just under 21 points [to close at 12,328.48]. NASDAQ was up 5 and a half points [to close at 2,442.86] on the day." USA Today (12/12, 5B, Krantz, 2.27M) notes "the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 3.20 points to 1413.04, extending its gains last week." The Wall Street Journal (12/12, C1, McKay, 2.04M), among other newspapers, also reports the stock numbers.

NYTimes Says "Income Inequality" Threatens US Economy. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) writes, "Conservative economists often argue that wage stagnation and income inequality are not as big a threat to Americans' standard of living as they've been made out to be. In their view, how much one buys -- rather than how much one makes -- is a better measure of economic well-being. … Why make a fuss over other grim economic statistics if everyone manages to keep buying things? Here's why. The assertion -- that the middle class has out-consumed the 'upper crust' during the Bush years -- is false, the result of rosy assumptions that turned out to be wrong. …. It would be nice if by some magic Americans could spend their way out of today's economic woes. But the gathering evidence shows that growing income inequality has fostered consumption inequality as well. It's time for policy makers to acknowledge that such inequality is an economic and social ill -- and to start finding cures."

DOJ_NMG_0105463

Plagiarism Case Against Novelist Examined. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18), UCLA law professor Eugene Volokh writes, "Two nurses, both aspiring novelists, helped tend British soldiers during World War II. Briony, the protagonist of Ian McEwan's award-winning novel 'Atonement,' is fictional. The late Lucilla Andrews is real: She became an author, pioneering romantic 'hospital fiction,' and also wrote a memoir of her war years. Therein lies the latest plagiarism scandalette to hit the news, sparked by an article in the British press. To be a credible character in a historical novel, Briony had to do the things wartime nurses did, and see the things they saw. It is no surprise that Mr. McEwan read Andrews's book when researching his own; and several passages from his book strongly resemble passages from her memoir. … Plagiarism? Legally actionable? Ethically reprehensible? Bad manners? Or good research, needed to produce accurate historical fiction?" Volokh continues, "Plagiarism is easy to condemn but often hard to define. This is partly because the legal rules differ sharply from the ethical ones, and the ethical rules in scholarship, journalism and fiction differ from each other. And it is partly because the rules for using the facts uncovered by writers of history -- whether memoirists, historians or contemporaneous journalists -- must be different from the rules for using the original phrases that the writers created." Volokh adds, "Novelists are similar to journalists, but they do have space at the end of the book to briefly acknowledge the historical works on which they rely, without distracting from the novel's flow. If you've relied substantially on another's work, acknowledging this is the kind thing to do. Omitting the acknowledgment probably isn't unethical; it's not a lie, or the denial of the credit needed for success in the original author's profession. But it isn't very nice. … Yet what about copying not just facts, but also another author's words, either literally or in a close paraphrase? Would a general acknowledgment at the end of the book be enough to justify this? Or is such copying impermissible, at least unless you expressly note it using quotation marks, or by writing 'as Lucilla Andrews said'? In academic work, the answer is simple: Quote the original, and insert a footnote at the place you quote it. But what about a novel?" Volokh concludes, "So where does this leave Mr. McEwan? Likely not guilty on any of the counts, if the account in the newspaper that first broke the story (the Nov. 26 Daily Mail) is thorough. Mr. McEwan borrowed facts, and those words that accurately described the facts. He is not guilty of copyright infringement, or of taking another's original expression without specific notation. And while he did rely on Andrews's autobiography, his acknowledgments page noted being 'indebted' to Andrews and her book. Any such acknowledgment could always be made more prominent; but it appears to have been prominent enough."

Recount Confirms Pryce Victory In OH15. The AP (12/12, Smyth) reports the Ohio 15th CD race, which was "so close it triggered an automatic recount…finally wrapped up Monday with officials confirming Republican Rep. Deborah Pryce had won." Pryce "ended Election Night 1,055 votes ahead of Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy, but the difference was within a half-percentage point, which requires an automatic recount under Ohio law." The recount numbers, "released Monday, showed Pryce had gained 7 more votes, to win with 110,739 votes to 109,677 for Kilroy." The "close margin of victory was not lost on Pryce. She said that, while she was gratified to retain the seat, she got a clear message from her constituents." Pryce said, "There was a lot of disenchantment with government as it was. We all went through this election process. We'll take that message back."

Obama's New Hampshire Visit Continues To Make Waves. Barack Obama's trip to New Hampshire over the weekend continued to reverberate on Monday, with each of the networks running full segments on the significance of the Illinois Senator's possible bid for the Democratic nomination in 2008. The phenomenon – labeled by some commentators as "Obama-mania" – also drew coverage in a variety of cable and print sources, and comparisons with another photogenic Democratic Senator and later President, John F. Kennedy. The commentary on and analysis of Obama's prospects also continued to draw largely favorable comparisons with those of Sen. Hillary Clinton's.

NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 5, 2:50, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Barack Obama is officially testing the water, as they say, and in doing so, he packed the house this weekend with citizens, with news media and the next thing we knew, one New Hampshire legislator said he hasn't seen anything like what happened there this weekend since John F. Kennedy. And all of this is forcing some other presidential hopefuls to change there strategy." NBC (Reid) added that "on his first trip to New Hampshire," Obama "was adored and mobbed. A phenomenon that insiders call Obama-mania." Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana "was also in New Hampshire this weekend but the national media barely noticed, too busy tracking Obama's every move. Analysts say even front-runner Hillary Clinton is feeling the Obama effect, accelerating the pace, though today she insists she's still undecided."

DOJ_NMG_0105464

ABC World News (12/11, story 6, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For some time, many have thought Hillary Clinton to be a prohibitive favorite for the Democratic nomination. Then, came the prospect of a Barack Obama candidacy, a prospect that seemed ever more likely when the Illinois Senator traveled to New Hamphsire this weekend. It is high political drama in the making." ABC (Tapper) added, "Capping off his whirlwind tour of New Hampshire, Senator Barack Obama tonight will appear in the opening of ESPN's 'Monday Night Football.'" Sen. Barack Obama: "Tonight, I would like to put all the doubts to rest. I would like to announce to my hometown of Chicago and all of America that I am ready. For the Bears to go all the way, baby!" Tapper: "Obama's potential candidacy may affect Clinton more than anyone. A big reason for that -- she has such strong support among black voters who are key in Democratic primaries." Rep. Charles Rangel: "There is a sense of racial pride in having an African-American candidate. The same way, I assume, the Irish were overwhelmed when Jack Kennedy was a candidate."

The CBS Evening News (12/11, story 8, 2:55, Borger, 7.66M) reported, "Maybe the Democrats are just looking for a fresh face. Only two years ago, Obama was an Illinois state senator who had just won his first term in the US Senate. He's short on national security credentials, although some Democrats like that fact that he was against the war in Iraq early on. His newest message: The politics of inclusion." But "maybe most of all, Obama is not Hillary Clinton, whom some Democrats worry is just too much of a lightning rod to win the election."

Fox News Special Report (12/11, Hume) reported the "hoopla" surrounding Obama's recent visit to New Hampshire "has nearly overshadowed speculation about Hillary Clinton's plans." Fox News (Cameron) noted Clinton (D) "has kept her husband's political machine at a distance for six years , but this weekend reached out to the original leaders" of former President Clinton's "comeback kid" New Hampshire campaign in 1992." Meanwhile, Obama "brought Obamamania" to New Hampshire in an "unprecedented appearance" that "literally stopped traffic."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Chaddock, 59K) reports, "So what's driving Obama-mania? It isn't a single set of issues such as the war or the economy. Rather, the attraction seems to be a mix of Obama's own compelling personal narrative and many voters' desire for a less caustic brand of politics." Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University, said, "It's the sense that you're in the presence of someone who is touched with the gift of grace." Baker adds Obama "exemplifies the hope that there's some way to triumph over the intense polarization of American politics."

Buchanan Says Obama Should Prepare For Scrutiny. On MSNBC's Tucker (12/11, Carlson), commentator Pat Buchanan said Illinois Sen. Barack Obama (D) "has virtually put himself into this race. And I hope he is prepared for what is coming, because Hillary has been vetted to a T. There is nothing more we can learn about her. We don't know anything about this guy."

Liasson Calls Obama Appearance "Extraordinary." On Fox News' Special Report (12/11, Hume), NPR contributor Mara Liasson, who was in New Hampshire during Obama's visit, said, "They sold 1,500 tickets and then had to open up another room so they could shoehorn 200 more people. So he was speaking to 2,200 people. You heard the Kennedyesque flourishes in the speeches, and that's how people -- oh, many people made the association. I haven't felt this since John F. Kennedy. People just went ga-ga over him. I mean, it was really extraordinary."

Obama Visit Shows Granite State Retains Clout In Race For White House. CQ Politics (12/12, Blinkhorn) reports, "The New Hampshire primary campaign appears undiminished as a rite of passage for presidential candidates, despite a breakthrough by political activists in other states who have long sought to water down the Granite State's influence as host of the first-in-the-nation primary. This was underscored Sunday, when" Obama "appeared as guest speaker at what amounted to a victory rally for the resurgent New Hampshire Democratic Party." Obama's "appearance raised the tally to at least 58 visits to New Hampshire by 13 official, exploring and thinking-about-it Democratic presidential candidates since June 2005."

"Seismic Shift" Forecast If Obama Or Clinton Wins. Fox News' Big Story (12/11, Kennedy) reported, "Americans have elected 43 chief executives. … And not one has been a woman, or anything other than white. Historians agree, if Hillary or Barack's going to become the nation's top dog, it will be with a seismic shift."

Clinton Plans Announcement After New Year.

The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "said Monday she won't make a decision about running for president until after the first of the year." During a visit "to an aircraft maintenance facility at the former Griffiss Air Base, Clinton confirmed she is talking to people in New York and across the country about a possible run for president in 2008. It was the first time Clinton publicly confirmed what her aides and fellow Democrats have been saying about a possible presidential run." Clinton said, "I'm talking to people who have opinions about what our country needs to do going forward and whether or not I make any decisions, I can't really confront until after the first of the year." The AP adds Clinton "said she had not yet decided whether to form a presidential exploratory committee, but that technical requirements of federal election law might require her to do so if she continues to consider a presidential run." Regarding Sen. Barack Obama, "a possible rival for the Democratic nomination, Clinton said the warm reception Obama has been getting around the country, including a stop in New Hampshire on Sunday, is 'terrific.'"

DOJ_NMG_0105465

In his New York Times column (12/12), Thomas Edsall says Clinton is "the Democratic establishment's anti-establishment candidate. She is simultaneously an insurgent, seeking to end a 220-year reign of men, and the heir apparent — dominant in cash ($14.4 million in the bank), in the polls and in the colossal reach of her machine." Clinton's "most visible challenger, Barack Obama, is similarly an insurgent, but without the former first lady's resources. He is seeking to capitalize on his ranking as an underdog, entering the fray as David battling the Clinton Goliath."

Obama Challenge Seen As Positive For Clinton. In his Washington Post column (12/12, A27), E.J. Dionne says Sen. Clinton "faces a maddening challenge. Many of the people who like and admire her, who believe she has good values and would make an excellent president, are not sure they are for her because they don't think she can win. Many of these same people, as one prominent Democrat told me, actually feel guilty that they harbor these doubts, partly because the specter that haunts Clinton has little to do with anything she has said or done herself." The doubters "are ashamed to say what really worries them: that Americans don't want to relive the supposed psychodramas of the Bill Clinton years; that her association with her husband will mobilize his enemies more than it will energize his friends; that their relationship is just too complex for those critical swing voters to understand or accept." No matter "how unfair, misguided or even dimwitted Sen. Clinton's supporters may find the catalogue of doubts, she will have to deal with them if she is to win over all the guilt-ridden skeptics." And that "is why the prospect of Barack Obama's presidential candidacy is not only good for the Democratic Party but also good for Clinton herself. Without Obama in the race, the Democratic primaries would boil down to Hillary and those vying to be the anti-Hillary. She might well win a battle of attrition, but without quelling the doubts." A "Clinton-Obama contest would require Clinton to shed some of her caution. It would create enormous popular interest in the Democratic Party. And if she were to beat Obama -- this assumes, as I expect, that Obama will look just as formidable a year from now as he does today -- Clinton would prove her mettle, which might finally put the doubts to rest."

Kucinich To Announce Bid For White House In Cleveland Tuesday. Fox News Special Report (12/11, Cameron) reported, "The politics of an Obama-Clinton rivalry in this race may discourage some candidates from ultimately getting in, but not so Ohio Congressman Dennis Kucinich. He ran in 2004, and tomorrow, in his hometown of Cleveland, he will announce that he is going to try again in 2008. Look out Hillary and Barack Obama."

The AP (12/12, Mabin) reports, "The liberal, anti-war congressman said he was inspired to run because he disagrees with the way some of his fellow Democrats are handling the war, including approval of a proposal to spend $160 billion more on the conflict. 'Democrats were swept into power on Nov. 7 because of widespread voter discontent with the war in Iraq,' Kucinich said. 'Instead of heeding those concerns and responding with a strong and immediate change in policies and direction, the Democratic congressional leadership seems inclined to continue funding the perpetuation of the war.'

The New York Times (12/12, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports, "In the midst of a brief chat in his office last week," Kucinich "mentioned that, oh, by the way, he planned to run for president again in 2008. 'Yes, I am,' Mr. Kucinich…said in response to a reporter's question about a possible encore to his bid in 2004. Mr. Kucinich's wife, Elizabeth Harper, who was seated next to him, arched her eyebrows in apparent surprise. Asked if he had told anyone this yet, Mr. Kucinich said no. 'You just happened to ask,' he said. Then he walked out of his office and informed his press aide. The news from Mr. Kucinich…underscores the 'What the heck?' sensibility that seems to be governing some entries into what may be the most crowded presidential field in history."

The Hill (12/12, Blake) notes that Kucinich "garnered 1 to 2 percent in most early states in 2004, going on to take 16 percent in Maine, 17 percent in Minnesota and 26 percent in Hawaii and Alaska."

Vilsack Says Democrats Need To Reach Out To Pro-Life Community. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack "said Monday that while he's a pro-choice Democrat, members of his party need to promote life by encouraging adoption and providing programs for prenatal care and family planning." Vilsack said, "When you phrase it that way, you send a message to the life community that you respect but don't necessarily always agree with their position. And you begin to have a conversation about issues where there might be consensus as opposed to division." The AP adds Vilsack "spoke to a group of about 100 Democrats in Florida, a critical swing state in the election."

Kennedy Says He Won't Wait "Indefinitely" For Kerry Decision On Presidential Bid. The Boston Globe (12/12, Klein, 413K) reports that Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy (D) on Monday "dropped his public commitment to support" fellow Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry (D) "in a 2008 presidential race, saying that he won't wait 'indefinitely' for Kerry to declare his intentions while the Democratic primary field takes shape. Hours later, Kerry aides promised that the senator would make a decision 'shortly after the turn of the year,' despite recent signals that Kerry could wait until late spring before deciding. A Kennedy spokeswoman said Kennedy would continue to support Kerry if the junior senator jumps into the race on that time line." However, Kennedy, in an interview "offered strong praise for two of Kerry's possible presidential rivals: senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, calling them 'formidable figures' who are connecting with rank-and-file Democrats. Kennedy said his oft-stated commitment to support Kerry -- made repeatedly after the 2004 election -- was based on the assumption that Kerry would state his intentions by early 2007. Since Kerry pushed back his decision following an election-eve 'botched joke' that damaged his public standing, Kennedy said he has informed Kerry that he may get behind another Democrat for president. 'I was under more of the impression before that he was going to run and was waiting in time [to declare his candidacy], but now he's deferred that decision,' Kennedy said. 'I have no plans of supporting anyone else at this juncture. I'm also not going to just wait indefinitely until he's made a judgment or a decision.'"

DOJ_NMG_0105466

Gingrich Decision On 2008 To Come In September. On Fox News' Your World (12/11, Cavuto), former House Speaker Newt Gingrich (R) said, "I'll tell you in September what I decide to do but, for the moment, we're looking for American solutions that we're going to work with members of both parties to try to actually solve problems for the coming year." After Neil Cavuto pressed him for more information, Gingrich responded, "John F. Kennedy announced on January 30, in the election year. Ronald Reagan announced in late November of 1975. We are a long, long way from serious, normal people being involved in politics."

Romney Hired Elizabeth Smart For Fundraiser. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports Gov. Mitt Romney "paid $500 to Elizabeth Smart, the Utah teen who survived a kidnapping by a religious zealot, after she played harp at one of his fundraisers, according to a campaign finance report that highlights his preparations for a likely presidential run." Smart, "a fellow Mormon who was freed in 2003 after a nine-month abduction, received the money in April, according to the 166-page report, which outlines donations and expenditures through Nov. 27 for Romney's Commonwealth PAC. Romney has been using the political action committee to travel and build chits for a campaign, which he is expected to announce early next year."

Lesser-Known Conservatives See Chance To Make Splash In '08 GOP Race. The New York Times (12/12, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "The blast of conservative criticism aimed at Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts for backing gay rights in 1994 has shaken his position as the social conservatives' favored challenger to" Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) for the GOP "presidential nomination. … The two immediate beneficiaries? Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas and Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas. 'The governor of Massachusetts is going to have a problem explaining the variety of positions he's taken on various issues,' said Rob Wasinger, the chairman of Mr. Brownback's exploratory committee." Huckabee, meanwhile, referring to outgoing Sens. Bill Frist (R) and George Allen (R), who had been viewed as potential '08 presidential candidates, "said, 'There is going to be a real look for a fresh face now.' Whether or not these two men have the skills to take advantage of it, the opening is there. 'Social conservatives have some reason to be a little skeptical of the four top-tier candidates: Romney, McCain, Giuliani and Gingrich,' said Rich Lowry, editor of National Review, the conservative magazine."

Daley Launches Campaign For Sixth Term As Chicago Mayor. USA Today/AP (12/12, 8A, Bellandi) reports, "Mayor Richard Daley announced Monday he will run for a sixth term, a move that could put him in office longer than his legendary father." The mayor "will be facing some tough questions this time around, including dealing with the fallout from federal investigations into allegations of illegal political patronage and payoffs at City Hall." Daley "has not been accused of any wrongdoing. His former patronage chief, however, faces almost four years in prison for engineering a scheme to hide politics-based hiring by city offices. Other city workers have been caught up in bid-rigging and bribery scandals."

The Chicago Tribune (12/12, Washburn, Mihalopoulos, 617K) says "things are a little different this time around for the mayor. Since the 2003 election, the mayor's loyal political street organizations have suffered at the hands of an ongoing federal investigation into illegal hiring that rewarded campaign workers." Still, "polls have shown that Daley's popularity is high despite City Hall scandals, and most political experts consider him the clear favorite to win re-election."

The New York Times (12/12, Saulny, 1.16M) reports that yesterday, Daley "briefly acknowledged concerns about the abuse of power on his watch, highlighting new fund-raising rules for his campaign and a reworking of the city's hiring and contracting systems. 'The best way to show responsibility is to address the problems directly, so the mistakes of the past won't be repeated,' he said. 'And that's what I've tried to do.'"

DeLay Launches New Venture As Blogger. USA Today (12/12, Kiely, 2.27M) reports former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay is "re-entering the political fray, this time as an Internet commentator and community organizer." DeLay, whose "outspoken conservatism and take-no-prisoners legislative style made him a favorite target of Democrats before he resigned from the House in June, launched himself in the blogosphere Monday. He said he hopes to use his new website, www.tomdelay.com, to create a grassroots political organization for conservatives." DeLay said, "Over time and the long term, we hope to drive legislation through Congress. I know how to do that." USA adds that as a House leader, DeLay "helped push much of President Bush's agenda through Congress, including tax cuts, energy bills and the Medicare prescription-drug plan. He named some of his chief goals as ending abortion, supporting Israel and winning the war on terrorism." DeLay's "reinvention of himself, a month after his party lost its House majority, elicited sharply polarized responses. Comments on his first blog entry were largely ecstatic, although DeLay admitted editing out 'vulgar' posts, which he said came from Democrats. Longtime political opponents were acerbic."

DOJ_NMG_0105467

The Hill (12/12, Kucinich) reports DeLay "began the long haul to restore the GOP to power and to repair his personal reputation following a year of scandal and bruising electoral defeat. His vehicle for both is a blog and grassroots political organization hosted at www.tomdelay.com." DeLay said, "I've got the election behind me and I'm looking forward to the future and I'm very excited about the opportunities that having a Democratic majority offers to conservatives." The Hill adds, "Sitting forward in an attitude of calm determination, in a conference room adorned with mementos and pictures from his tenure in Congress, DeLay explained how his blog was aimed at improving Internet communication between conservatives. And he acknowledged that Democrats were well ahead in this area."

DeLay Complains Of "Rogue District Attorney." On MSNBC's Hardball (12/11, Barnicle), former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay said, 'I still have that rogue district attorney in Texas, Ronnie Earle, who's using the process to drag this on. I'm trying to get to trial. I want to go to trial. I've been wanting to go to trial the day I was indicted. … I've been indicted on laws that don't exist in Texas. Yes."

New York Congregation To Demolish Church, Build Senior Apartments. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Marks, 59K) reports that in 1922, "when the First Presbyterian Church of Astoria moved to the wilderness that is now Queens, it was on the cutting edge of community development. Today, the congregation is leading a new kind of church renewal, one that entails downsizing physically as it expands its mission spiritually." Today, "like many urban churches, Astoria's First Presbyterian has a dwindling number of parishioners - less than 50 on the books. The church operates in the red, its grand buildings are decaying, and the Rev. Donald Olinger spends much time just figuring out how to keep the doors open." Rev. Olinger and "his flock knew it was time for something radical. In an emotional decision, they have agreed to tear down the elegant old buildings and replace them with more than 90 units of affordable housing for senior citizens." The church "will end up with a sanctuary room in the new building for its Sunday services, as well as a $4 million endowment that it can use to expand its spiritual mission."

Both Clintons To Attend Book Parities For McAuliffe. The New York Times (12/12, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports it "may not go down as a literary classic, but the coming memoir from Terry McAuliffe, the former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, will come with a one-two wallop of book parties that few first-time authors can match." McAuliffe, "whose proficiency as a Democratic fund-raiser is rivaled only by his allegiance to Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton, will see his devotion repaid with not one, but two parties given by the former first couple early next year. Befitting their shuttle marriage, Mr. Clinton will have his party in New York (Jan. 22, the Four Seasons restaurant) and Mrs. Clinton will hold hers in Washington (Feb. 8, Park Hyatt Hotel)."

Rice Seeks Denuclearized North Korea Within 24 Months. In an exclusive interview with AFP (12/12), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that she "wanted quick results in North Korean disarmament talks that resume next week, setting a two-year time frame to dismantle Pyongyang's nuclear weapons program." Rice told AFP she was "delighted the talks are going to start again, but they have to start to show results pretty soon." The Secretary said Washington was "ready to offer North Korea economic aid, energy assistance and improved political relations" if it abandon the development of nuclear weapons. However, she "declined to provide details of specific incentives being put on the table by Washington ahead of the talks." Meanwhile, Rice said, "I think that everyone is looking, in the next round or so, for the North Koreans to do something that demonstrates that they are in fact committed to denuclearization." Rice said her goal was to have Pyongyang complete irreversible steps to dismantle its nuclear arms program before the end of President George W. Bush's term in January 2009.

Rice, Gates To Participate In Security Talks With Japan. The AP (12/12) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary-designate Robert Gates will meet with Japanese officials on Jan. 13 "to bolster cooperation in missile defense and discuss the ongoing realignment of US troops in Japan." The nation's Kyodo News agency reported that Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso and Defense Agency chief Fumio Kyuma will meet Rice and Gates in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0105468

Rice Says Washington Backs New European Resolution On Iran Sanctions. In an exclusive interview with AFP (12/12), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday that Washington "has finally signed on to a European draft resolution imposing sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program and is optimistic it will quickly pass" through the UNSC. Speaking after the revised draft was submitted to the UN, Rice said it is "a good resolution" and that she was "optimistic" it would pass soon, "though she stopped short of predicting a final vote before the end of the year." The Secretary said the latest version "would make very clear to the Iranians that they are not going to be able to pursue this program and remain integrated into the international system and I would hope would give them pause so they might consider coming back to negotiations."

Russian Concerns About Iran Resolution Eased. The Washington Post (12/12, A22, Lynch, 690K) reports senior Russian officials Monday said that European negotiators have "overcome many of their objections" to the draft resolution and that an agreement "may be in sight." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "praised" the draft, saying it echoed Moscow's preference for pursuing a diplomatic strategy that encourages Iran "to sit down at the negotiating table." He said it was "carefully" drafted to ban "only those sensitive nuclear activities, including the enrichment and reprocessing of uranium, that the council was seeking to stop," and "does not provide for blanket sanctions." The AP (12/12, Bergman) notes that Russia's U.N. ambassador also "praised" the draft resolution, saying his country's concerns "had been taken into account as negotiators met behind closed doors Monday to discuss the text."

McCain Says Iran Threatens Israel's Existence. The AP (12/12, Humbert) reports that in New York, "Israel and the world are threatened by a 'possibly deranged and surely dangerous regime' in Iran, White House hopeful Sen. John McCain told a Jewish audience." As the "world's 'chief state sponsor of international terrorism,' Iran defines itself by its hostility to the Jewish state and its chief ally, the United States, the Arizona Republican said in a speech for a Hanukkah dinner at Yeshiva University on Sunday." He "noted that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has called the Holocaust a 'myth,' urged that Israel be 'wiped off the map' and defied international demands and incentives to end a drive to gain nuclear weapons capability."

Iranian Students Protest Ahmadinejad Speech. ABC World News (12/11, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iran, today, an extraordinary sight: a demonstration against President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Dozens of students shouted 'death to the dictator' as he spoke at a university. They burned photographs of the president. His supporters shouted down the demonstrators. There were no reports of arrests."

The New York Times (12/12, A3, Fathi, 1.16M) says the protests "disrupted" a speech by Ahmadinejad "at a major university in Tehran," marking "the first major public protest" against Ahmadinejad since his election more than a year ago. The students also "demanded the resignation of Alireza Rahai, a conservative and the chancellor of the institution, Amirkabir University," the Iranian Student News Agency reported. The AP (12/12, Karimi) says Ahmadinejad "responded calmly" to the demonstration.

Iran Hosts Conference On Holocaust. NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 3, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "An unusual gathering got underway today in Tehran in Iran where those who question, and even outright deny that the Nazi Holocaust ever took place, are getting together to discuss their theories on whether six million Jews really were killed by Hitler's followers." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Iran's President Ahmadinejad, who has long called the Holocaust a myth, organized today's conference, challenging one of history's most documented events." NBC noted that the "fringe group included white supremacist David Duke, who praised Iran's President for his courage," and "a radical group of Orthodox Jews were among delegates from 30 countries."

The Financial Times (12/12, Smyth) says the event "has been billed as an objective examination of historical fact, although interest has fed off the international furor sparked by president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's verbal attacks on Israel by and his questioning of the Holocaust." For his part, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the conference showed "the depth of hatred and the radical fundamentalism within the Iranian government," while a State Department spokesman said the conference was "yet another disgraceful act on this particular subject by the regime in Tehran."

The New York Times (12/12, A3, Fathi, 1.16M) notes that "among those representing the United States was the former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, whose prepared remarks, issued by the Iranian Foreign Ministry, said the gas chambers in which millions perished actually did not exist." Duke also suggested that "depicting Jews as the overwhelming victims of the Holocaust gave the moral high ground to the Allies as victors of the war and allowed Jews to establish a state on the occupied land of Palestine."

Columnist Says Conference Shows Importance Of Holocaust Education. Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K) Anne Applebaum writes that in response, "Europe, the United States and Israel expressed official outrage. The German government, to its credit, organized a counter-conference. Still, many have held their distance, refusing to be shocked or even especially interested." Applebaum notes that although "we all know what happened," Iran's denial "is serious -- or at least Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is deadly serious: Holocaust denial is his personal passion, not just a way of taunting Israel, and it's based on his personal interpretation of history." Therefore, she says that "it seems the archives, the photographs and the endless rebuttals will go on being necessary, long beyond the lifetime of the last survivor."

DOJ_NMG_0105469

Iran's Jewish Community Fears Worsening Conditions. In a report on Iran's Jewish community, the CBS Evening News (12/11, story 9, 2:45, Palmer, 7.66M) reported that since the Iranian revolution "half of Iran's Jews fled the country. Now those who stayed behind hope they're not heading for a new crisis. But the signs are ominous. Iran's hard-line President has denied Hitler's Holocaust and said Israel should be wiped off the map. And Israel refuses to rule out a strike on Iran's nuclear installations."

Iranian Opposition Group Cites Importance Of Resistance Movement. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A19, 2.04M), Shahin Gobadi, a spokesman for the National Council of Resistance of Iran, writes that the Journal's front page article, "Iranian Imbroglio Gives New Boost to Odd Exile Group," (Nov. 29) "asserted that most American officials dispute claims of the People's Mojahedin Organization of Iran," the main Iranian resistance movement, of "having a mass following in Iran, stressing that many Iranians despise the organization." However, Gobadi says "believing this would lead one to wonder why a 'terrorist' labeling of such an 'isolated' organization should be such a big deal for the clerical regime." Gobadi notes that the Washington-based Iran Policy Committee established in a 2006 study that Tehran "paid five times more attention to the PMOI than to all other internal and external opposition groups combined." He also notes that the AP reported last week that the Iranian regime has blocked access to YouTube.com "mainly because videos from the PMOI have been posted on this site."

Rice Warns Syria, Iran Over Lebanon. In an exclusive interview with AFP (12/12), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Monday "warned" Syria and Iran that the "future of Lebanon is not an issue for negotiation." Rice also "rejected mounting calls to deal directly with Damascus and Tehran as part of efforts to end the crisis in Iraq and said the two states should have no doubts about Washington's commitment to the embattled government of Lebanon." The Secretary told AFP, "In no way is the US going to get into a situation where it is even a conceivable notion on the part of Syria or Iran that the future of Lebanon would somehow be compromised for other interests of the US." Rice said she wanted to "make it very clear that the future of Lebanon is not an issue for negotiation with anybody."

Ignatius Says White House Has Done Little To Back Siniora. Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K) columnist David Ignatius writes that Washington's response to the protests against Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora's government "unfortunately has been as feckless here as elsewhere in the region. Despite American promises to bolster Siniora by getting a map of Israeli land mines in southern Lebanon, or exploring Lebanese claims to a disputed, Israeli-occupied territory known as Shebaa Farms, the Bush administration has done little."

Olmert Appears To Confirm Israel Has Nuclear Arsenal. The New York Times (12/12, A5, Myre, 1.16M) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "appeared to acknowledge inadvertently during a TV interview shown Monday that Israel has nuclear weapons, an issue on which the Jewish state has sought to maintain ambiguity for decades." However, Olmert's aides said later that there was "no change in Israel's policy of refusing to confirm or deny whether it has nuclear weapons." In an interview with the N24 cable news channel in Germany, Olmert said, "Iran openly, explicitly and publicly threatens to wipe Israel off the map. Can you say that this is the same level, when they are aspiring to have nuclear weapons as America, France, Israel, Russia?"

Israel Boosts Warplanes' Range In Response To "Distant Threats." USA Today (12/12, 16A, For, 2.27M) reports Israel's air force plans to "enhance its air-refueling capabilities, increasing the range of its warplanes," as Iran "emerges as an increasing threat." Air Force Brig. Gen. Yohanan Loker has said the program would help Israel meet "emerging distant threats," though he did not mention Iran by name. One option the Israeli air force is considering is "the purchase and development of drones, or unmanned aerial vehicles, to serve as refueling tankers for attack jets and other aircraft used in long-range missions."

Kinsley Criticizes Carter's Use Of "Apartheid." Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K) columnist Michael Kinsley writes that former President Jimmy Carter, in his new book "Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid," does not make "clear what he means by using the loaded word 'apartheid,'…but the only reasonable interpretation is that Carter is comparing Israel to the former white racist government of South Africa." Kinsley calls this "a foolish and unfair comparison, unworthy of the man who won -- and deserved -- the Nobel Peace Prize for bringing Israel and Egypt together in the Camp David Accords, and who has lent such luster to the imaginary office of former president."

Killing Of Three Palestinian Children Could Spark Civil War. ABC World News (12/11, story 5, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported that "in Gaza, where there has been so much violence over the years, an attack today that stood out for its savagery. Gunmen killed three young boys, ages three, six, and nine years old, whose father helped to crack down on Hamas militants a decade ago. Tonight, there are fears the killings could trigger new violence between Palestinian factions." ABC (Sciutto) added, "Today's attack was the latest and most brutal in an escalating struggle between the main political factions here, Fatah and Hamas. … For all the real concern about the conflict between the Palestinians and Israelis, the worsening infighting between Fatah and Hamas is raising the frightening prospect of civil war."

DOJ_NMG_0105470

NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 4, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) called the killings "a shocking act of murder" in "a part of the world where violence is common, but not like this." The New York Times (12/12, A14, Myre, 1.16M) says the killings "further inflamed an already tense situation among Palestinian factions locked in a political power struggle." Although no group claimed responsibility for the shooting, their father Baha Balousha, a colonel in the General Intelligence service, was "regarded as one of the figures involved in a Palestinian Authority crackdown on Hamas members a decade ago and has long been at odds with the group, Palestinians said." The Times notes that "while Palestinian factions have frequently battled in recent years," the deaths of the three boys "outraged many Palestinians and heightened fears that they could cause revenge attacks."

The AP (12/12, Lavie) says the killings are "threatening to ignite a Palestinian civil war" and have "jeopardized Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's efforts to restart long-stalled peace talks." The Washington Post (12/12, A22, Wilson, 690K) and Financial Times (12/12, Devi) also report briefly on the killings.

Iran Pledges $250 Million In Aid To Palestinians. The AP (12/12, El Deeb) reports Iran has pledged $250 million in aid "to the cash-strapped Hamas-led Palestinian government, the latest sign of increasingly close ties between the Islamic group and Tehran," Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said Monday. Haniyeh's office announced the donation at the end of a four-day visit by the prime minister to Tehran. Also Monday, the European Commission "proposed a three-month extension of a special aid deal for the Palestinians that bypasses the government."

Saudi Ambassador Abruptly Resigns, Leaves Washington. The Washington Post (12/12, A23, Wright, 690K) reports Saudi Ambassador Prince Turki al-Faisal "flew out of Washington yesterday after informing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and his staff that he would be leaving the post after only 15 months on the job, according to US officials and foreign envoys." The Post notes that the ambassador's exit -- "without the fanfare, parties and tributes that normally accompany a leading envoy's departure, much less a public statement -- comes as his brother, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the highly influential Saudi foreign minister, is ailing." As Saud's health has declined, Turki has "increasingly been rumored as a possible replacement for his older brother," it notes.

Somali Islamic Militiamen Advancing On Ethiopian Border. The AP (12/12, Hassan) reports Islamic militiamen "were moving on an Ethiopian border town to try to seal the 1,000-mile frontier and keep out any advancing Ethiopian troops while trapping those already in Somalia," an Islamic movement official said Monday. Mohamed Ibrahim Bilaal, an Islamic movement official, told the AP by telephone that forces will "go to all border towns in our country to deprive our enemy of a route to enter into our country. Also we don't want the enemy inside Somalia to get an exit route to flee from it when the jihad starts." The latest military buildup "further raises fears of intensified conflict in Somalia," the AP notes.

The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Baldauf, 59K) reports, "A new front in the global struggle for Islamist rule is emerging in Africa. And there are worrisome signs that battles between Somalia's rising Union of Islamic Courts (IUC) and the country's foundering Western-backed government might soon engulf the entire Horn of Africa in a regional war. ... neighboring Ethiopia isn't waiting for the UN. As the Islamists continue to take town after town away from Somalia's transitional government, and to march closer to its border, Ethiopia is gearing up for all-out war. Meanwhile, Eritrea, Djibouti, and Sudan are eyeing the conflict and taking sides." The Monitor continues, "Many Ethiopian officials and experts say that they have no choice but to fight. The looming war in Somalia is part of the unfinished business of Ethiopia's two-year border war with Eritrea, which ended in exhaustion rather than a negotiated peace treaty. Ethiopian officials allege that the rise of Somalia's Islamists was made possible by Eritrean logistical support, and a UN Monitoring Group report has charged that Eritrea, Egypt, Djibouti, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Libya, and Sudan have all contributed funds, arms, and technical support to help Somalia's Islamists take control."

Somali Floods Heighten National Crisis. The New York Times (12/12, A6, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports the people of Somali are suffering after floodwaters "drowned their animals, submerged their crops and swept away their homes." The Times says they "are slowly starving, unable to sustain themselves on unripe fruit and filthy water." The floods here are "yet another installment of a nation in crisis. At a time when Somalia seems inexorably close to an all-out war with Ethiopia, with a destructive potential that could dwarf the countless deaths from the last 15 years of anarchy, a deluge has arrived, plunging Somalia's breadbasket underwater, creating the conditions for an extended famine and taking the area's woes to a whole new level."

DOJ_NMG_0105471

Congressional Study Finds Continuing Delays In Delivering Darfur Aid. The AP (12/12, Flaherty) reports US humanitarian aid to Darfur "continues to be hampered by a lack of security in the region, restrictions by the Sudanese government and delays in international aid," according to a report released Monday by the Government Accountability Office. The office said in its report that the "nearly $1 billion in US aid and efforts by the international community have helped improve a dire situation," but "nongovernmental organizations and the UN still face serious problems in aiding the nearly 4 million people who require assistance, including frequent attacks on aid convoys."

US, UK Move Toward Resolving Fighter Jet Dispute. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A8, Karp, Michaels, 2.04M) reports that as Lockheed Martin Corp. "prepares its newest fighter jet for its maiden flight this week, the US and Britain are moving toward resolving disputes, raising the likelihood Britain will stay in the $276 billion program, a person familiar with the matter said." A formal agreement committing Britain to buy the jet, known as the Joint Strike Fighter, "could be announced as soon as today after Pentagon talks between senior US and British defense officials," the source said. An agreement with Britain would remove "a shadow over" the program, which has been in development for a decade and is billed as "a model of international cooperation."

UK Nuclear Plans Highlight "Urgent Need" To Reform Global Framework. The Christian Science Monitor (12/12, Rice-Oxley, 59K) reports that British Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement last week that Britain plans to spend around £20 billion ($39 billion) to replace its submarine-based missile deterrent known as Trident "has divided opinion, but experts on both sides agree that the decision highlights the urgent need to revive some form of global nuclear weapons framework." The alternative, they say, is "to risk a new arms race with many more powers than before and a heightened risk that a warhead might actually be used." The Monitor says that "for a few years, it seemed that all five recognized nuclear powers - Russia, the US, France, China, and Britain - would embrace the new spirit of disarmament," but "now, major nuclear deals like the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) appear to be coming apart at the seams."

Anti-Nuclear Protest Staged In House Of Commons. AFP (12/12) reports "two anti-nuclear campaigners were ejected from the House of Commons and 28 were arrested elsewhere as protesters voiced anger at government plans to renew Britain's nuclear deterrent."

Western Companies Embrace Turkey. The Washington Post (12/12, A24, Moore, 690K) reports, "While opposition to Turkey's proposed membership in the European Union is growing among governments and voters in Europe, Western businesses…are embracing a nation of eager consumers armed with newly accessible credit cards. … Across the hills of the city once known as Constantinople, sleek new office towers are rising as rapidly as the slender spires of new mosques in a country where both Western capitalism and Islamic sentiments are on the march." The Post also reports, "At a time when European relations with the Muslim world are at a low, Western governments are becoming increasingly estranged from the country that has long been considered a political bridge between the secular democracies of the West and the Islamic nations of the East."

US Report Delivers "Rebuke" To China Ahead Of Officials' Visit. The New York Times (12/12, Weisman, 1.16M) reports, "In a rebuke to China on the eve of a high-level visit by American officials, the Bush administration formally accused Chinese leaders on Monday of failing to meet commitments to open the nation's economy and crack down on piracy of foreign goods." The criticism came in a 100-page report to Congress by USTR Susan Schwab. While "praising" China for "making progress in some areas," the report said that the country's efforts in 'other crucial areas had recently stalled, despite repeated promises from Beijing." It cited continued limits by China on sales of financial services by foreign banks, including credit cards, and limits on some sales of farm goods. It also accused China of "engaging in counterfeiting or piracy of software, videos, pharmaceuticals and other goods, sometimes with open encouragement of Chinese officials, and of failing to stiffen punishments on those engaging in these practices." The Times says the report was "likely to roil the atmosphere this week as Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. engages in a high-level effort to get China to cooperate on these issues."

Under the headline "US Vocal In Run Up To China Trade Talks," the Financial Times (12/12, McGregor, Guha) reports, "For a forum meant to allow Washington and Beijing quietly to sort out long-term problems, the run-up to the first US-China Strategic Economic Dialogue starting on Thursday has already featured some traditional high-decibel diplomacy." In recent days Treasury Secretary Paulson and USTR Schwab have "both made statements admonishing China over its trade, economic and currency policies." According to the Times, the Chinese "have so far been much more restrained, in public at least." However, it notes that "despite the tenor of some of the US statements, the planned twice-yearly dialogue, as presently structured, will not be anything like a bilateral trade negotiation," noting that "just the size of the US delegation…makes this encounter different."

DOJ_NMG_0105472

China's Impact On US Economy Noted. USA Today (12/12, 1B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports, "China's WTO membership sparked far-reaching domestic reforms in the still-nominally-communist nation, leading to an economic flowering as well as greater personal freedom for individual Chinese. It's also meant hefty profits for U.S. corporations operating in China, such as General Motors." But "marrying 1.3 billion Chinese to the global economy" also "has left its mark on the United States. Tens of thousands of jobs in textile plants in states such as North Carolina have been wiped out by low-age Chinese competition even as US consumers enjoy lower-priced clothes, toys and furniture made in Chinese factories. Through massive purchases of US Treasury bonds, the Chinese government effectively finances Americans' consumption-heavy lifestyles."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M) writes, "This week's trip to Beijing by Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson is being hyped as the biggest economic expedition since Marco Polo's. We suspect that's a tad oversold, but in the meantime it's too bad Mr. Paulson cajoled Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke into risking his credibility by joining him." Paulson's trip "is transparently political, with the goal most leaked to the press being to persuade China to let the yuan appreciate further against the dollar. … This is supposed to appease U.S. mercantilists, both political and commercial, and thus give the former Goldman Sachs executive his first big political win. This is at best a risky exercise, so why is Mr. Bernanke going along for the ride?" Bernanke "is or ought to be politically independent, and the perception of that independence is crucial to his credibility."

Author Andy Kessler writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M) that Paulson, Bernanke "and other polished cabinetry are visiting China later this week. They'll see fields of skyscrapers, traffic jams of new cars and designer couture replacing the old Maoist uniform with five buttons and too-long sleeves. In other words, we've got the Chinese right where we want 'em. … Adolescents eventually grow up. China is growing in spurts. They've got jobs and piles of debt. They need to keep working to pay it off. I actually think the US, with its immense wealth, is the main banker, not the Chinese floating our hopefully shrinking budget deficits. We are the ones with the leverage. S tick with the currency peg and make China open up their markets to competition and real outside financial scrutiny."

Administration Seeks To Revive Momentum For Doha Trade Deal. The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A4, Hitt, 2.04M) reports the Doha round of "global trade talks stalled after hitting numerous roadblocks over the summer. Now the White House is working to revive negotiations, even as a new barrier looms: a Congress much more skeptical of free trade." Administration officials have "stepped up the campaign to win support for its plan," and US Trade Representative Susan Schwab, "who spent years as an aide on Capitol Hill, is wooing the incoming trade czars of the new Democratic Congress." Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson "is rallying support for Doha around the globe. In London, he said Doha remains the administration's 'top trade priority,' even with the change in control of Congress next year." The Administration is "banking that all the political maneuvering will help inject some momentum back into the talks by the spring. The goal isn't necessarily to finish a deal then, but to show enough progress to persuade skeptics in Congress to extend the president's trade-negotiating authority beyond June, when it is set to expire."

AFL-CIO President Says Trade Deals Must Account For Human Rights, US Workers. In a USA Today op-ed (12/12, 20A), John J. Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO, says, "The new Congress will face a daunting array of challenges and choices with respect to trade policy when it convenes in January. Our country is running an annual trade deficit of almost $800 billion, real wages are stagnant or falling for most American workers, the number of people in poverty is growing, the manufacturing sector is in recession, and our health care and retirement security systems are eroding rapidly." The "only way the Bush administration is going to begin negotiating fair agreements is if Congress takes a stand against these flawed deals, starting with Peru and Colombia. We face enormous challenges, but politically viable solutions are within reach. No single action will get us out of the hole we're in, but we can start by rejecting the failed trade policies of the past and charting a new course, one that puts human rights, good jobs and sustainable development at the center of our trade policy."

Probe Of Litvinenko Poisoning Leads To Hamburg. The CBS Evening News (12/11, story 3, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported on "the poisoning death of the former Russian spy Alexander Litvinenko. From London to Moscow, the radiation trail has now led investigators to Hamburg, Germany." CBS (Roth) added, "While German police were following the latest tracks in the radioactive trail of poison polonium, British investigators were at a Moscow hospital spending three hours with Andrei Lugovoi, a key figure in the case of the poisoned spy. He's one of the Russians who met former KGB agent Alexander Litvinenko at a London hotel November 1. Within hours, Alexander Litvinenko was ill. Three weeks later he was dead. Officials now think polonium that killed him may have been put in his tea cup. But who put it there and where it came from are part of a mystery mapped out in radioactive hot spots still to be connected. From London where Litvinenko or his Russian contacts left traces of radiation in at least a dozen places to British airways jets at Heathrow Airport and to Moscow. The radiation just found in Hamburg, though, might fill in some blanks in the chain of events. It was left by Dmitry Kovtun, who stopped in Hamburg before joining the London meeting with Livinenko and who's now hospitalized in Moscow with radiation poisoning."

DOJ_NMG_0105473

The Los Angeles Times (12/12, Holley, Fleishman, 850K) reports German police "said Kovtun is under criminal investigation for bringing the radioactive element into the country. 'He appeared to have been in contact with polonium. We are considering him as a suspect,' Hamburg state prosecutor Martin Koehnke said. 'We have to establish whether he was poisoned himself or carried the polonium into the country." He added that there was a "reasonable basis for suspicion that he may not just be a victim but could also be a perpetrator.'" The New York Times (12/12, Landler, Myers, 1.16M) says "four people who had contact here with a business associate of…Litvinenko were hospitalized Monday, on suspicion they had been contaminated by polonium 210." The Washington Post (12/12, A16, Jordan, Smiley, 690K) runs a similar story.

WSJournal Calls Kremlin Move Against Shell "Economic Version Of Polonium 210." The Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "The authoritarian drift of Russia continues apace. Yesterday the Kremlin managed to pull the rug out from under the largest foreign investment in the country, Royal Dutch Shell's $20 billion oil and gas project off the Pacific island of Sakhalin. You might call it the economic version of Polonium 210." It "is a measure of the West's fatalism about Russia that the Kremlin-engineered campaign to force Shell to hand Sakhalin to state-owned Gazprom came as no surprise. KGB man Vladimir Putin has been anything but subtle in his mission to put natural resources in the hands of his cronies." The Journal concludes by asking, "what's [Russia] doing in the G-8 club of the world's leading industrialized democracies?"

Role Of FSB Expanding Under Putin. The Washington Post (12/12, A1, Finn, 690K) reports in a front page article that Russia's Federal Security Service, known by its Russian initials FSB, "has emerged as one of the country's most powerful and secretive forces, with an increasingly international mission." According to the Post, the "widening reach of Russia's national security apparatus is part of the general centralization of power under [Russian President Vladimir] Putin and a more assertive and self-confident foreign policy backed by vast energy resources." A spokesman for the FSB declined to discuss its functions, but "in interviews with the Russian news media, senior FSB officials have defended the agency's increasing power as a necessary and natural response to a terrorist threat." However, critics say that heightened state security, "while ostensibly a response to terrorism, is also seen by the Putin establishment as essential to its own political preservation."

Eastern Europe Struggles To Purge Soviet-Era Security Services. On its front page, the New York Times (12/12, A1, Smith, 1.16M) reports, "Communism is gone and democracy is well implanted in the countries of the old Warsaw Pact, but the Soviet era's security services are still sending shudders through the region nearly two decades after the fall of the Berlin Wall." Some members of the Soviet-era secret police "remain in place," while "others took advantage of the state-asset fire sale that came with the dismantling of centrally planned economies and are now quietly powerful players." However, the Times says "a renewed effort is under way across the former Soviet bloc to expose the continued role of the security services and to root out former police agents and collaborators."

Pinochet's Death Reopens Chilean Wounds. The New York Times (12/12, Rohter, 1.16M) reports, "Chile seemed calmer on Monday, with the general's few remaining admirers filing by his coffin at the military academy here and the rest of the country going about its normal workday activities. But the timing of his death has not only brought back to the surface many of the divisions he created but has also left a host of troubling legal and political questions unresolved." The Times adds, "Victims of the general's human rights abuses, for instance, expressed frustration that he had died 'without paying his enormous debt to justice' or even standing trial, in the words of Lorena Pizarro, director of the Relatives of the Detained and Disappeared Group. … Human rights advocates want those cases to proceed, if only to undermine the more extravagant claims of the general's apologists and make the historical record clear." The Washington Post (12/12, C1, Constable, 690K) runs a long "Essay" titled "Chile's Gen. Pinochet, The Strongman Who Tore Apart His Country."

The Washington Post (12/12, 690K) editorializes, "It's hard not to notice, however, that the evil dictator leaves behind the most successful country in Latin America. ... Like it or not, Mr. Pinochet had something to do with this success. ... By way of contrast, Fidel Castro ... will leave behind an economically ruined and freedomless country with his approaching death. ... [Jeane] Kirkpatrick argued that right-wing dictators such as Mr. Pinochet were ultimately less malign than communist rulers, in part because their regimes were more likely to pave the way for liberal democracies. ... by now it should be obvious: She was right." Eugene Robinson, also in the Washington Post (12/12, A27, 690K), writes, "I'll leave it to others to 'balance' the commentary on Gen. Augusto Pinochet's death with praise for his free-market economic reforms." Pinochet "was a despot, a murderer and a fraud."

DOJ_NMG_0105474

The Wall Street Journal (12/12, 2.04M) editorializes, "Pinochet's legacy is a paradox -- a long string of them. He took power in a coup in 1973, but ultimately he created an environment where democratic institutions would prevail. He is responsible for the death and torture that occurred on his watch, but had Salvador Allende succeeded in turning Chile into another Cuba, many more might have died. ... Pinochet proved the truth of Jeane Kirkpatrick's Cold War distinction between authoritarian and totalitarian regimes, with the former far more likely to evolve into freer places."

Novelist Maria Vargas Llosa, meanwhile, compares Pinochet and Fidel Castro in the Wall Street Journal (12/12, A18, 2.04M), "The difference between the two men," he writes, "is that Castro, who has been in power almost three times longer than Pinochet and has committed even more crimes, continues to have some supporters around the world while Pinochet was one of the most reviled men on Earth. Why was Pinochet more hated than every other dictator? Probably because he gave a bad conscience to almost everybody across the political spectrum. For the left, he symbolized the tragic consequences of the Third World's socialist utopia. For the right, he embodied the diabolical temptation to dispose with the rule of law when the political institutions of democracy are tested to the limit. For Latin American democrats of the left and of the right, he was a walking reminder of their own failure to bring about economic prosperity."

Author Ariel Dorfman, in the New York Times (12/12, 1.16M), writes, "Though there can be no doubt that his body has been proven to indeed be mortal, I fear that his spirit may live on interminably in the Chile he misruled from 1973 to 1990 and then continued to terrorize as commander in chief of the army for eight more years. In order to truly exorcise him from our existence it would have been necessary that he stand trial, that he defend himself from the accusations of murder and torture, kidnapping and grand larceny, which have been brought against him in innumerable court cases in Santiago."

NSA Denies Monitoring Princess Diana's Calls. The CBS Evening News (12/11, story 4, 2:40, MacVicar, 7.66M) reported, "An official British investigation into Diana's death has found that when she walked through the door of the Ritz hotel in the last night of her life, she was under surveillance by a US intelligence agency. British newspaper reports now say that on the night she died, Diana was being bugged by the US without the approval of British security services. The US has refused to release the files, but investigators have been told the highly classified documents shed no new light on her death." However, NBC Nightly News (12/11, story 9, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "US intelligence sources tell NBC News Diana's phone was not tapped."

The Washington Post (12/12, A22, Sullivan, Pincus, 690K) notes that "in a rare public comment on its intelligence operations," the NSA said Monday that it "had 39 documents containing references to the late Princess Diana but had never targeted her telephone communications for monitoring." The officials have reportedly "assured Scotland Yard investigators working on a pending report that 39 classified documents about her final conversations revealed no sign that her death was anything but an accident."

Kristof Urges Bush To Make Issue Of Child Slavery. New York Times (12/12, 1.16M) columnist Nicholas Kristof writes about child slavery in Cambodia, which he says "President Bush has done a much better job than his predecessors in pressing this issue; his State Department office on trafficking is one of his few diplomatic successes. And the issue enjoys bipartisan support, with leadership coming from conservative Republicans like Senator Sam Brownback and liberal Democrats like Representative Carolyn Maloney." However, Nicholas urges President Bush to use his "last two years to make this issue an international priority." A "nudge" in Bush's next State of the Union address "could jump-start a new Abolitionist movement, so as to free children now dying slowly from rape and AIDS because they did something as simple as accepting ice cream from a neighbor."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Ex-aides Allege Abuse Of Power."
"Does This Debase Debate?"
"Killings Put Gaza On Edge."
"Justice On Katrina Time."
"Major Breach of UCLA's Computer Files."
"Vehicle Mileage Estimates Get Real."

USA Today:
"Poll: Rising pessimism on Iraq war."
"Long hospital shifts, lack of sleep can kill, study says."
"To The Point Of Nodding Off."
"Need A Parking Place? Good Luck."

New York Times:
"A Dead Indian Language Is Brought Back to Life."
"Iraqis Consider Ways to Reduce Power of Cleric."
"In Twist on Tuition Game, Popularity Rises With Price."
"Eastern Europe Struggles to Purge Security Services."
"Protectors, Too, Gather Profits From ID Theft."
"Gay and Evangelical, Seeking Paths of Acceptance."
"Medicare Links Doctors' Pay to Practices."

DOJ_NMG_0105475

Washington Post:
"Experts Advise Bush Not To Reduce Troops."
"To Stem Iraqi Violence, U.S. Aims To Create Jobs."
"Mega churches Are Migrating To Charles."
"In Russia, A Secretive Force Widens."
"Foreign Service Hiring Gets A Re-Exam."
"A Dead Indian Language Is Brought Back to Life."

Detroit Free Press:
"Buyout Offers Swirl At Ford."
"Universities Want Some More Time On Prop 2."
"New Lead In Child Deaths."
"Downtown Winter Blast Coming Back."
"Inmate Finds Peace: 'I'm Ready To Die'."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Marta Train Traffic Jumps."
"Hope Drives Jon Benet's Dad To Forge New Life But Slowly."
"Timely Push To take The Bottle Home."
"Lawmaker Vote To Pad Allowance."
"DeKalb Ready To Overhaul School District."

Houston Chronicle:
"90-Year Sentence For Pipe Assault."
"No Vince, Few Wins And Even Less Hope."
"Skilling Prison date Postponed."
"E. Coli Cases Defy Federal Assurances."
"Iraq Parties May Unite To Reduce Al-Sadr's Clout."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush Meets With Advisors; Iraq's Future; Kofi Annan Speech; Protest In Iran; Fatah & Hamas Violence; Campaign 2008; Child Labor-Congo; IRS Screw Up; Space Shuttle Docks; Holiday Decoration Wars.
CBS: Bush Meets With Advisors; Bush Poll Numbers-Analysis; Litvinenko Investigation; Diana Bugging Investigation; Security Breach; Sago Mine Explosion; Cruise Ship In Port; Obama Visits New Hampshire; Jews In Iran; Blood Diamond Trade; Space Shuttle Docks.
NBC: Bush Meets With Advisors; Bush Meetings-Analysis; Iran & Jews; Fatah & Hamas Violence; Campaign 2008; Stock Market; Alzheimer's Hits The Young; Space Shuttle Docks; Diana Investigation; Baby Boom Advertisements.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Baghdad-Suicide Car Bombing; Bush-Iraq Meetings; NC-Missing Couple Found Dead In Car; Seattle-Tacoma International Airport-Christmas Trees Put Back Up; Wall Street; OR-Missing Climbers; Online Holiday Shopping-Discounts Offered; Hot Selling Christmas Gifts; Grinch Musical; Survey-Many Companies Plan On Hiring In New Year.
CBS: Baghdad-Suicide Car Bombing; CBS Poll-Bush's Approval, Support For Iraq War Down; OR-Missing Climbers; Space Shuttle Docks At Space Station; Atlantic Records Founder in Coma.
NPR: Baghdad-Suicide Car Bombing; Bush-Iraq Meetings; Space Shuttle Docks At Space Station; Kucinich To Run For Presidency Again In 2008; Tokyo Stock Market; Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Portland Reaches Settlement In Sexual Abuse Case; FDA-Taco Bell E. Coli Outbreak; Wall Street.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Participates in a video teleconference with military commanders and the Ambassador to Iraq, Roosevelt Room, closed press; meets with the Vice President of Iraq, Oval Office.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: ACCOUNTANTS-SEC _ The American Institute of Certified Public Accountants holds its 2006 AICPA National Conference on Current Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) and Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB) Developments. Highlights: 9:50 a.m. FASB Chairman's Address, Robert H. Herz, Norwalk, Conn. 10:20 a.m. FASB Vice Chairman's Address, Michael Crooch, Norwalk, Conn. Location: Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

NO CHILD LEFT BEHIND _ 8 a.m. - 5 p.m. The Fordham Institute holds a symposium on the compression of school curricula in the No Child Left Behind law into little more than math and reading and maybe some science. Participants include Dana Gioia, Chairman, National Endowment for the Arts; Kati Haycock, Director, Education Trust; Diane Ravitch, Brookings Institution; E.D. Hirsch, Jr., Chairman, Core Knowledge Foundation; Sidney Harman, CEO, Harman International Industries, Inc.; Toni Cortese, Executive Vice President, American Federation of Teachers. Location: Hotel Washington, 515 15th St. NW.

RACE-INEQUALITY _ 8:30 a.m. - 6:30 p.m. The Eisenhower Foundation holds a forum with columnists, academies and journalists on media coverage of race, inequality and the impact on the policy discussion. Participants include: Ray Suarez, Terrence Smith The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer; Washington Post columnists Eugene Robinson, Colby King , Harold Meyerson (American Prospect Magazine); Newsweek columnist Ellis Cose; Amy Goodman, Democracy Now!; Shaila Dewan, The New York Times; Gary Younge, The Guardian; Gregory Kane, The Baltimore Sun; Gregory Stanford, The Milwaukee Journal-

DOJ_NMG_0105476

Sentinel; DeWayne Wickham, USA Today; Washington Post reporters Kevin Merida, Mike Fletcher. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW.

ALTERNATIVE FUELS _ 9 a.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies holds a discussion on carbon to liquid technologies that allow solid fuels to be used in the transportation sector. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

IRAN ELECTIONS _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. The American Enterprise Institute hosts a panel, ``Elections in Iran.'' Panelists: Mohebat Ahdiyyih, Open Source Center; Mehdi Khalaji, Washington Institute for Near East Policy; and A. William Samii, Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty. Moderator: Danielle Pletka, AEI. Location: AEI's Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, 1150 17th St. NW.

NATIONAL FINANCES _ 9:30 a.m. The Concord Coalition holds a briefing to release two new polls on the public's attitudes toward the nation's long term fiscal challenges. Location: National Press Club.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL _ 10 a.m. Amnesty International (AIUSA) sponsors a breakfast briefing to discuss crises in Sri Lanka, Iran and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, written about in the just-released Winter 06 Amnesty International magazine. Location: National Press Club, Zenger Room.

CLIMATE CONFERENCE _ 10 a.m. Platts Energy Podium hosts Dr. Harlan Watson, senior climate negotiator at the State Department, discussing the recent UN climate conference in Nairobi. Location: Platts, 10th floor, 1200 G St. NW.

RENTAL HOUSING _ 10 a.m. The National Low Income Housing Coalition holds a telephone briefing to release its annual report, which shows affordable rental housing father out of reach in 2006, with Rep. Barney Frank, NLIHC President Sheila Crowley, others. Notes: Callin number: 877-811-4716; passcode: 3837558.

ROLLOVER CRASHES _ 10 a.m. Press conference to showcase the newly developed Jordan Rollover System, a test device for analyzing rollover crash protection under dynamic conditions, with Public Citizen President Joan Claybrook, Clarence Ditlow of the Center for Auto Safety, others. Location: Morton Auditorium, 805 21st St. NW.

TERRORISM PREPAREDNESS _ 10 a.m. Trust for America's Health organization holds a telephone briefing to release a report on the preparedness of states for bioterror, bird flu and other health emergencies. Contacts: Nicole Speulda, 202-223-9870 ext 273.

ARABS/MUSLIMS-IRAQ _ 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR) will host a panel discussion to give the Arab and Muslim perspective on recommendations contained in the report issued this week by the Iraq Study Group. Panelists: Imad Moustapha, Ambassador of the Syrian Arab Republic; Shibley Telhami, Anwar Sadat Professor at the University of Maryland; Senator Larry Shaw, North Carolina General Assembly; and Parvez Ahmed, CAIR Board Chairman. Location: National Press Club Ballroom.

HARKIN-AGRICULTURE _ 10:30 a.m. Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, incoming Chairman of the Senate Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee; and Secretary of Agriculture Mike Johanns hold a media availability to discuss their plans to work together to move Americas agriculture and rural communities forward during the 110th Congress. Location: Room 328, Russell Senate Office Building.

TURKEY _ 10:30 a.m. The Economic Policy Institute and the Global Policy Network hold a briefing with Turkish economist Erinc Yeldan on the challenges to Turkey's economy. Location: EPI offices, 3rd floor, East Tower, 1333 H St. NW.

MALARIA SUMMIT _ 11 a.m. The White House holds an off-camera, on-the-record briefing on the White House Summit on Malaria. Location: Room 450, Eisenhower EOB. Notes: Media should gather on the driveway in front of the Brady Briefing Room at 10:40 a.m. for an escort.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD _ 11 a.m. The Family Research Council holds an event with author Chuck Donovan on the social history of Planned Parenthood. Location: 801 G St. NW.

US-AUSTRALIA _ 11 a.m. Deputy Secretary of Defense Gordon England will attend the US- Australian Ministerial Meetings at the State Department. He and Minister of Defense Nelson of Australia will sign the Joint Strike Fighter Memorandum of Understanding. Location: Treaty Room, State Department. Notes: Media may attend, but the event is a photo-op only. At 2:45 p.m., Secretary of State Rice and her counterpart, Minister Downer, will hold a media availability. England and Nelson also will be in attendance.

CEO ECONOMIC OUTLOOK _ 12 p.m. The Business Roundtable, an association of 160 CEOs of leading US companies, holds a teleconference to release the results of its fourth Quarter CEO Economic Outlook Survey. Contacts: Jennifer Handt, 202-496-3288. Notes: Dial-in telephone number is 800-553-0318. Host: Business Roundtable. Callers will be asked for their name and media outlet before being admitted to the call. If you encounter any problems, please call 202-872-1260.

TRADE _ 12:15 p.m. Customs and Border Protection Commissioner Ralph Basham gives keynote remarks at the Trade Support Network Conference. Location: Westin Arlington Gateway, 801 N. Glebe Rd., Arlington.

CHILDREN'S INSURANCE _ 1 p.m. Organizations representing pediatricians, children's hospitals and consumers release recommendations for strengthening the State Children's Health Insurance Program. Location: National Press Club.

DOJ_NMG_0105477

MILLER-EDUCATION COMMITTEE _ 1 p.m. Incoming House Education and the Workforce Committee Chairman George Miller holds a news conference to discuss the committee's agenda in the 110th Congress. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

TERRORIST FINANCING _ 3:15 p.m. Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Daniel Glaser participates in a panel discussion on U.S. policy toward defeating terrorism and insurgencies. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DEFENSE DEPARTMENT-ENERGY _ 6 p.m. - 8:30 p.m. The Department of Defense Under Secretary for Acquisition, Technology and Logistics and the Office of Force Transformation hosts ``Energy: A Conversation About Our National Addiction: Winning the Oil End Game," featuring Amory Lovins, whose latest book, latest book, ``Winning the Oil End Game" offers a strategy for ending U.S. oil dependence through proven technologies by 2040. The conversation will be the ninth such gathering where experts in their respective fields meet to learn, share, and collaborate in creating an energy future free from our dependence on fossil fuels. Location: Doubletree Hotel, 300 Army Navy Drive, Arlinton, Va.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 12, 2006 8:05 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, December 12, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061212.pdf; dojclips061212.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Muslim Charity Sues Treasury Dept. And Seeks Dismissal Of Charges Of Terrorism (NYT) 4
NSA Still Needs More Oversight (LAT) 6

Patriot Act:

Furor Grows Over Bank Closure Of Charity Account (FREEP) 6

Homeland Response:

NY Man Charged In Federal Court With Carrying Out Bomb Hoax (AP) 7
Link Sought Between Hoax Letters And Ricin (MACT/MCT) 7
DP World To Sell U.S. Port Operations (AP) 8
Dubai Ports World Sells U.S. Assets (WSJ) 9
Secretive U.S. Panel Busy Reviewing Foreign Business Deals (FINDLAW/AP) 9
After Opportunism (WP) 11
Law Passes Retooling Effort On Bioterror (WP) 11
Post-Katrina Justice In Slow Motion (LAT) 12

War News:

Bush Reviews Options On Iraq Policy (AP) 14
Bush Prepares To Launch New Iraq Strategy (LAT) 15
Bush Keeping All Options Open (NSDY) 16
Experts Advise Bush Not To Reduce Troops (WP) 17
Bush Urges Iraq's Neighbors To Help Bring Stability (WSJ) 18
In Advance Of Speech, Bush Seeks Iraq Advice (NYT) 19
President Discusses Strategy This Week With Military, Diplomatic, Iraqi Leaders (USAT) 20
USA More Pessimistic On Iraq War (USAT) 21
Americans Conflicted About Iraq War's Course (USAT) 22
Draft Democrats To Help Run Iraq (LAT) 23
Honor Killing (WSJ) 24
Bush Can't Keep Giving Foes Silent Treatment (USAT) 25
Time To Offshore Our Troops (NYT) 26
Washington Looks To 'Blame Iraqis And Run' (FT) 27
Intelligence Panel's 'Phase Two' To Be Completed Next Year: Rockefeller (HILL) 28
Annan Blasts U.S. In Farewell (USAT) 29
No Kudos For Bush In Annan's Farewell (AP) 30
Annan Urges U.S. To Reject Unilateralism (NYT) 30
ANNAN URGES AMERICA TO USE POWER WISELY (KCS) 32
United Nations Faltered Under Annan's Shortcomings (KCS) 33
Annan Bows Out Of UN With Attack On Bush (TG) 34
Iraqis Consider Ways To Reduce Power Of Cleric (NYT) 35
To Stem Iraqi Violence, U.S. Aims To Create Jobs (WP) 36
Car Bomb Kills At Least 23 In Baghdad (AP) 38
Two Families From Different Sects Meet Similar, Violent Fates In Iraq (WP) 38
In Fallujah, Marines Bring Goodwill, But Trouble Can Follow (CSM) 39
Report: Taliban Regrouping In Pakistan (AP) 42
US Concerned Over "Extremist" Safe Havens In Pakistan (AFP) 43

Corporate Scandals:

US DoJ To Announce New Policy On Probes (FT) 44
Stock Option Scandal Will Go On In '07 (AP) 44
Another Consequence Of Backdated Options: Stiff Tax Bills (WSJ) 45
Skilling's Check-In To Prison Delayed Over Bail Request (WSJ) 47
Skilling's Arrival In Prison Delayed (WP) 47
Skilling Prison Date Postponed (HC) 48
Skilling Wins Delay Of Sentence (BLOOM) 49
Black's Prosecutors Lay Out Case Against Him In 81-Page Filing (BLOOM) 50
2 Sanctioned By SEC Over PNC Accounting (AP) 51
SEC Bars Ex-Ernst & Young Partner For Role In PNC-AIG Fraud (BLOOM) 51

Criminal Law:

Judge Settles Fight Over Classified Info (AP) 52
FBI Tape Shows Hornsby Accepting Money (WP) 53
Court Documents Detail Alleged Hornsby Schemes (AP) 54
N.Y. Federal Prosecutors Losing Cases (HC/AP) 54
Judge Seeks Details On Probe Of Prosecutor In Botched Mafia Case (BOS) 55
Investigation Into Amtrak Law Department And Outside Counsel Builds Steam (LAW) 56
Raid On 19 Bosnian Serb War Criminals In U.S. (NSDY) 58
'Peace Mom' Convicted Of Trespassing (AP) 59
Supreme Court Says Buttons Did Not Bias Jury Against Killer (LAT) 59
Murder Conviction Stands In Supreme Court Case (USAT) .. 60
Buttons At Trial Didn't Bias Jury, Justices Say (NYT) 61
High Court Says Buttons Didn't Bias Jury In Murder Case (LAW) 62
U.S. Supreme Court Says Buttons At Murder Trial Did Not Bias Jury Against Defendant (FINDLAW/AP) 63
The 9th Circuit's Deserved Slap (LAT) 63
Dr. Who Injected Fake Botox Imprisoned (KGW) 64
Editors' Blog (SSJ) 65
Tigard Clinic Owner Dr. Jerome Lentini Sentenced (TIGTIMES) 65
Lawyer Gets Prison For Money Scam (SSJ) 65
East Bay Trio Convicted Of Defrauding Microsoft (BAYCN) ... 66
Microsoft 'applauds' Fraud Convictions (PUGSBIZ) 66
Identity-Theft Protection Expands (WSJ) 67
Protectors, Too, Gather Profits From ID Theft (NYT) 67
Ameriprise, Massachusetts Settle Over Company's Loss Of Laptop (WSJ) 70
Major Breach Of UCLA's Computer Files (LAT) 70
Small Grocery Stores Hotbeds For Food Stamp Fraud (USAT) 72
Fighting Drug Fakes (NYT) 74

Civil Law:

Appeals Panel Hears Arguments On Defense Labor Relations Rules (GOVEXEC) 75
Court Hears Appeals On Ruling Against Pentagon Personnel System (FEDTIMES) 75
FEDERAL DIARY: The New Defense Work Rules, At War With One Another (WP) 77
Former Assistant DA Testifies In Civil Trial (BOS) 78

Civil Rights:

Report Details NYC Police Shooting (FINDLAW/AP) 78
50 Bullets, One Dead, And Many Questions (NYT) 79
Diallo Case Could Be Road Map For DA (FINDLAW/AP) 83
Federal Court Gives California Six Months To Fix Prison Crowding (AP) 84
School Board Files Lawsuit Over Election (BRADV) 85
Christian Group Says Pentagon OK'd Video (USAT/AP) 86

Antitrust:

Municipal Bond Antitrust Case Probed By Grand Jury (Update2) (BLOOM) 86
Critics Decry Monsanto Deal, Analysts Think It Will Proceed (AP) 87
Delta Board Weighs US Air's Offer (WSJ) 88
LG.Philips Shares Fall On LCD Antitrust Investigation (Update3) (BLOOM) 89
LG.Philips LCD Gets Subpoena For Anticompetitive Practices (WSJ/DJ) 90
Microsoft Lays Out Defense In Iowa Case (BLOOM) 90

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Top Court Rules 7-0 Against BP In Case Over Lease Royalties (WSJ) 91
U.S. Supreme Court Rules Against Oil And Gas Industry In Royalties Case (FINDLAW/AP) 93
BP Review Of Blast Cites Worry Over Cost Cuts (WSJ) 93
Oil Company Charged With Pollution (LOMPOCR) 95
Gulf States Hit Pay Dirt Offshore (WP) 96
The Cost Of An Overheated Planet (NYT) 97
Utilities Stuck In Clean-air Quandary (USAT) 100
Electric Breakthrough Goes Commercial (CSM) 102
New-car Miles-per-gallon Estimates Will Drop Next Year (USAT) 103
E.P.A. Revises Its Formula To Calculate Auto Mileage (NYT) 104
New Rules Will Lower Fuel Economy Estimates (AP) 105
More Politicized Science At The EPA (LAT) 106
FWS Pulls National Bison Range Pact (MISSOUL) 106
U.S. Joins Chippewas In Suing Michigan (AP) 107

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Arellano To Face Additional Charges (SDUT) 108
DEA: Mom-and-pop Meth Lab Numbers Decreasing (KNOXNS) 109
Drug Traffickers Sentenced (WFP) 109
Authorities Uncover Steroid Drug Dealing Conspiracy (AP) .. 110
Mexico Cracking Down On Drug Violence (NYT/AP) 111
Troops, Police Dispatched To Drug-Plagued Mexican State (WP) 111
Feds Unable To Trace Gun In Fatal Shooting (NYJN) 112

DOJ_NMG_0105481

Former Kirksville Mayor Faces Federal Arson Charge (AP) 112
Fugitive Caught Updating MySpace (PHI) 113
Gang Prevention Programs Gain Federal Funding (ARLCONN) 114

Tax:

RAVENNA'S JONES ACCUSED OF HIDING LAWN-CARE INCOME (ABJ) 115
Doctors' Tax Scheme Unravels With New Court Filings (NOPLBULL) 116
Gains Exemption Extended To Judges In Conflict Cases (WSJ) 121

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Seek To Freeze Most Federal Spending (WSJ) 122
Dems Plan Joint Resolution, No Earmarks (HILL) 122
Democrats Freeze Earmarks For Now (WP) 124
Democrats Decline To Take Up Unfinished Spending Bills (NYT) 125
Dems Take Middle Ground On Drug Plan (AP) 126
Medicare Links Doctors' Pay To Practices (NYT) 126
Congress Lifts Income Limit For Students In Evaluation (WP) 128
Pelosi Promises Steps To Protect Pages (AP) 129
Stumbling In September: Panel Reveals GOP Missteps (HILL) 129
Poll: Washington Scandals Eating Away Public Trust (USAT) 130
Taxpayers Distrust How The Government Spends Their Dollars, Reports Say (USAT) 131
Panel: Leaked Gingrich Call Broke Rules (AP) 131
McDermott Broke 'spirit' Of Rules But Faces No Punishment (HILL) 132
GOP House Member Muscles His Way To Success (LAT) 133
Pelosi May Give Jefferson A Lesser Committee Assignment (WP) 135
CBC Wants Jefferson's Seat Restored (HILL) 136
Budget Chief Seeks Hill Allies (WP) 138
In Reid, Bush Faces A Tenacious Force In The Senate (USAT) 139
High Court's Majestic Library Off Limits (USAT) 141
Foreign Service Hiring Gets A Re-Exam (WP) 142
It's A New Mr. Bush, At Least On TV (NYT) 143
Reckless With Food Safety (NYT) 143

Other News:

Fed Expected To Keep Interest Rates On Hold (FT) 144
US Employers Set To Tighten Hiring Plans (FT) 145
Homes For Sale In Metro Areas Fall (WSJ) 145
Stocks Step Up On Eve Of Fed Meeting (USAT) 146
Consumption Gap (NYT) 147
Plagiarism And 'Atonement' (WSJ) 147
Recount Confirms Pryce Won Re-election (AP) 149
What's Driving Obama-mania? (CSM) 150
Obama Visit Shows All Eyes Are Still On New Hampshire (CQ) 151
Sen. Clinton Delays Decision On 2008 Bid (AP) 153
The Early Show (NYT) 154
A Battle Hillary Clinton Should Relish (WP) 155
Democratic Congressman Plans Another Presidential Bid (CCT) 156
Just Ask: Kucinich Answers, 'Yes, I Am' (NYT) 157
Kucinich Runs Again (HILL) 158
Kennedy Wants Sign Of Kerry's Plans For '08 (BOS) 158
Low-Profile Republicans Sense Opportunity (NYT) 160
Daley Announces He'll Seek 6th Term As Chicago's Mayor (USAT/AP) 160
Daley Says He Has 'More To Give' (CHIT) 161
Daley, In Shadow Of Inquiry, Will Seek 6th Term As Mayor Of Chicago (NYT) 163
DeLay Taking On New Identity As Internet Blogger (USAT) 163
Tom DeLay Launches Comeback (HILL) 164
A Congregation Tears Down Its Church To Expand Its Mission (CSM) 166
A Book Tour Unlike Any Other (NYT) 167
US Backs New European Resolution On Iran Sanctions (AFP) 167
Report: Japan, US To Hold Security Talks (AP) 168
Russian Concerns About Iran Resolution Eased (WP) 168
Russian Envoy Praises U.N. Iran Draft (AP) 169
Students Cry 'Death To The Dictator' As Iranian Leader Speaks (NYT) 170
Iran Students Disrupt President's Speech (AP) 171
Iran Conference Questions Holocaust (FT) 171
Iran Opens Conference On Holocaust (NYT) 172
Tehran's Holocaust Lesson (WP) 174
Iranian Resistance Group Worries Tehran Officials (WSJ) 175
Siniora Stands Fast (WP) 175
In A Slip, Israel's Leader Seems To Confirm Its Nuclear Arsenal (NYT) 176
'Distant Threats' Push Israel To Boost Warplanes' Range (USAT) 177
It's Not Apartheid (WP) 178
Killing Of 3 Young Children Worsens Palestinian Tension (NYT) 179
Deaths Of 3 Children Threaten Gaza Peace (AP) 180

DOJ_NMG_0105482

Three Children Of Palestinian Intelligence Official Slain (WP) 181
Fatah Official's Sons Shot Dead In Gaza (FT) 181
Haniyeh: Iran Pledges $250M In Aid (AP) 182
Saudi Ambassador Abruptly Resigns, Leaves Washington (WP) 183
Islamic Militiamen Said Advancing (AP) 184
Global Jihad's New Front In Africa (CSM) 185
Perils Of Somali Flood: Hunger And Beasts (NYT) 186
Study: Security, Delays Slow Darfur Aid (AP) 187
U.S., U.K. Are Likely To End Clash That's Marred Fighter-Jet Project (WSJ) 188
Why Britain Wants New Nukes (CSM) 188
Two Ejected From Parliament, 28 Arrested In British Anti-nuke Protest (AFP) 190
Western Businesses Embrace Turkey As E.U.'s Resistance Grows (WP) 190
Before Visit To China, A Rebuke (NYT) 192
US Vocal In Run Up To China Trade Talks (FT) 193
Force Of China's Impact Grows In USA (USAT) 194
Bernanke In Beijing (WSJ) 197
Beijing Duck (WSJ) 197
If Revived, Doha Talks Face Higher Bar (WSJ) 198
Reject Flawed Trade Deals (USAT) 200
More Tested For Exposure As Poisoning Probe Narrows (LAT) 201
Hospitalizations In Hamburg Tied To Radiation (NYT) 202
Four Hospitalized In Germany As Part Of Radiation Inquiry (WP) 203
Shell Gets Poloniumed (WSJ) 204
In Russia, A Secretive Force Widens (WP) 204
Eastern Europe Struggles To Purge Security Services (NYT) 206
A Bitter Legacy Of Division Survives Pinochet (NYT) 209
Chile's Gen. Pinochet, The Strongman Who Tore Apart His Country (WP) 210
A Dictator's Double Standard (WP) 211
Thief Of State (WP) 212
The Pinochet Paradox (WSJ) 213
Pinochet (WSJ) 214
The Half-Life Of A Despot (NYT) 215
NSA Denies Monitoring Calls Of Princess Diana (WP) 216
A Cambodian Girl's Tragedy: Being Young And Pretty (NYT) 217

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Muslim Charity Sues Treasury Dept. And Seeks Dismissal Of Charges Of Terrorism (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar
The New York Times, December 12, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 11 — In a new challenge to Washington over its closing several American Muslim charities that it has accused of aiding terrorism, the largest such group sued on Monday seeking dismissal of many of the charges.

Lawyers for the group, the Holy Land Foundation of Richardson, Tex., filed suit in Federal District Court in Dallas two weeks after a federal judge in California called into question a crucial provision in designating terrorist supporters. Since December 2001, the Treasury Department has designated Holy Land and five other Muslim charities in the United States as terrorist supporters, seizing millions of dollars in assets and halting their activities.

No accused charity or any senior officer have been convicted on a charge of terrorism. Some charities have faced no criminal charges.

In a separate case against a Georgia man whom the prosecution identified as a fund-raiser for Holy Land, the defendant pleaded guilty this year to sending money to Hamas, the Islamist Palestinian political party that Washington first designated as a terrorist organization in 1995.

The foundation denies that the man had an official post.

The government has accused the foundation of having been the American fund-raising arm of Hamas. The charity and five officers are expected to go on trial in July on charges of financing a foreign terrorist organization, money laundering and tax fraud.

DOJ_NMG_0105483

In October, Ghassan Elashi, a founder and former chairman of the charity, was sentenced to more than six years in prison after he and four brothers were convicted of violating export laws by shipping computers to Syria and Libya, both once on the United States list of terrorism sponsors. Libya was removed this year.

Last year, Mr. Elashi and two brothers were convicted of helping a Hamas leader launder money.

The Treasury Department's repeated refusal to unfreeze charities' assets so they can be sent abroad has provoked alarm and frustration in the philanthropic world.

"The question is not whether the individual nonprofits are guilty as organizations," said Kay Guinane of OMB Watch, a Washington group advocating government transparency.

"The issue is whether there is a fair process to determine that and how to protect the charitable dollars so they are used for the intended purposes," Ms. Guinane said. "What Treasury has done is treat charities the same way they treat the criminal process. It has really hurt the U.S. image in the places where the aid was expected and where people were depending on it."

Early last month, philanthropic groups from across the nation sent Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulsen Jr. a letter asking that he find a way to release the assets to their intended recipients. Mr. Paulsen has not responded, Ms. Guinane said.

A spokeswoman for the department, Molly Millerwise, said courts, citing national security, had repeatedly upheld the government's use of secret evidence to freeze assets of charitable organizations.

"These institutions have been designated because they are financing terrorism," Ms. Millerwise said. "We have to make sure that the money is kept in place and does not go to illicit ends."

Critics say the law prevents the airing of secret evidence in such cases. "When Treasury says the courts have upheld its action, they are saying the courts found its action was not arbitrary and capricious," Ms. Guinane said. "Not that the court made any kind of independent determination of the merits or factual accuracy."

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Bryan Sierra, said he could not comment on the Holy Land motion because it was too new. As a matter of procedure, Mr. Sierra said, prosecution does not automatically follow the designation of a charity as a terrorist organization.

"Not every case is a criminal case," he said. "It's a question of can you come up with enough evidence to prosecute based on a violation of the statutes of material support for terrorism."

Charitable giving is one of the five pillars of Islam, and the closing of Muslim charities has become a major source of American Muslims' distrust of the federal government.

Many American Muslims accuse the government of, at best, acting out of fear and ignorance to tamp contributions. At worst, they say the Bush administration focuses on Arab and Muslim groups critical of United States policy in the Middle East, particularly charities that aid poor Palestinians in the territories occupied by Israel.

"That was a valve that does not put the Palestinian population under pressure," Hatem Bazian, a professor of Near Eastern studies at the University of California, Berkeley, said. "If you starve them, they will take the deal the least acceptable to them."

The government says just Muslim charities have been designated because they are the ones that terrorist groups have penetrated.

"The sad truth is that we have seen groups like Hamas and Al Qaeda infiltrate the charitable community, and specifically the Arab and Muslim charitable community," Ms. Millerwise said. "When we do find evidence that any group is providing material or financial support, we have a responsibility to act against them and designate them and put the world on notice that this group is facilitating terrorists."

Holy Land was once the largest American Muslim charity, receiving more than $57 million in contributions, gifts and grants from 1992 to 2001, the indictment says. It seeks to have more than half the charges in the 42-count indictment dismissed, based on the ruling last month by Judge Audrey B. Collins in Federal District Court in Los Angeles.

Judge Collins said an executive order used to identify organizations and individuals as "specially designated global terrorists" violated the Constitution because it was too vague. Other districts are not bound by the ruling. Congress has largely ignored the question.

Lawyers for two other charities said they expected to file similar motions. Lawyers for two others said they were defunct, left bankrupt by challenging terrorism designations.

DOJ_NMG_0105484

American Muslim organizations acknowledge that Islamic charities overseas funneled money and arms to support Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups. But they say guilt by association rather than hard evidence has become a judicial standard for them in the United States.

"The government's claim of national security is a way to conceal government misconduct rather than state secrets," said Matthew J. Piers, the lawyer for the Benevolence International Foundation, a defunct charity that had been in Illinois.

Charity officials say the United States is shooting itself in the foot. Rather than spending millions on failed advertising to improve its image, the officials say, Washington should let the charities work where it is not welcome.

"People are saying that this is not about this or that charity, it's about Islam," said Khalil Jassemm, who helped found Life for Relief and Development, a charity in Michigan. "We could be a humanitarian bridge to the Muslim world, but nobody thinks about that."

NSA Still Needs More Oversight (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

ALMOST A YEAR after President Bush confirmed that the National Security Agency had been eavesdropping on some Americans without a court order, expressions of outrage in Congress have yet to be translated into law. What little scrutiny the so-called Terrorist Surveillance Program has received has come from the Justice Department, whose inspector general is looking into how information gathered by the program has been used.

Surely, you say, Congress will be more assertive under Democratic control. Don't count on it.

True, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) warned FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III the other day that the new Congress will take a fresh look at the administration's surveillance programs, which he said the White House had gone to "unprecedented lengths" to hide from the public. But Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who will hand over the Judiciary Committee gavel to Leahy, is pessimistic that a change of party control will make a big difference. Specter, who has sponsored no fewer than three bills to provide a legal framework for the program, said last month he had "grave reservations" that any legislation will be approved. The impediment, he said, was less a lack of consensus in Congress than the White House's unwillingness to share "secrets" about how the NSA program operates.

Of the three Specter-endorsed bills, the best is a measure he co-sponsored with Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). It would reaffirm that NSA surveillance is covered by the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which requires an order from a special court before electronic surveillance may be conducted on a U.S. citizen. But it would make it easier for surveillance to be conducted without a warrant in a terrorist emergency.

Feinstein, a member of the Intelligence Committee as well as the Judiciary Committee, has been briefed on the NSA program, as has incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). Unfortunately, Feinstein must ask colleagues to take on faith her assurances that the program's objectives can be accomplished within a slightly relaxed FISA framework.

The administration hasn't made Feinstein's job any easier by refusing to offer a meaningful explanation of why it felt it necessary to bypass FISA in the first place. That made it difficult to win support in the Senate for any of Specter's proposals.

Democratic victories in midterm elections should mean that Congress will be more interested in regulating the NSA program. But inertia is a strong force. Moreover, many Democrats — especially newcomers from Republican-leaning states — will be reluctant to counter the administration's propagandistic argument that only Americans who regularly call Al Qaeda need to worry about the program. In fact, one of the main purposes of judicial oversight would be to ensure that this claim is true.

Overcoming that inertia — with the help of Republicans like Specter — should be at the top of the new majority's agenda.

PATRIOT ACT:

Furor Grows Over Bank Closure Of Charity Account (FREEP)

By Niraj Warikoo, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105485

The U.S. Department of Justice may defend the Patriot Act in a case involving Comerica Bank and a Muslim charity based in Southfield, according to court documents the department filed in Detroit.

Comerica officials have told Life for Relief and Development that it intends to close its accounts.

The bank's move came after the charity was raided by federal agents in September. The government has not said what the raid was about, but charity officials say it may be related to work the charity did in Iraq.

In response, the charity sued Comerica, saying the bank violated its civil rights.

The suit, filed last month, challenges the constitutionality of a section of the Patriot Act that allows financial institutions to share information about suspected money laundering or terrorist activity.

On Dec. 1, Justice Department attorneys filed a notice in U.S. District Court in Detroit that said it may "intervene in this action to defend the constitutionality" of the section under question.

Some Arab Americans and Muslims charge the bank is discriminating against the charity because it is operated by Arab-American Muslims.

Protests are planned for Friday and Saturday outside Comerica branches in Dearborn, Detroit, Canton and Ann Arbor.

Organized as the Charity Without Fear Coalition, groups against the bank's move include the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, the Muslim American Society and the Council on American-Islamic Relations.

Some Arab Americans and Muslims say they plan to close their accounts with Comerica in protest.

"People see this as an example that could be repeated," said Imad Hamad, regional director of the committee, who plans to close his account.

Kathy Pitton, a vice president with Comerica Bank, said in an e-mail Monday that the bank "has had a strong partnership with the Arab-American community for many years" and has a "record of supporting the Arab-American community."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

NY Man Charged In Federal Court With Carrying Out Bomb Hoax (AP)

The AP, December 11, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A man was charged Monday with carrying out a bomb hoax to protest what he called the government's "illegal surveillance," federal prosecutors said.

Paul Cortina, 33, of Somers, N.Y., was charged in U.S. District Court with making a false bomb threat after he allegedly sent an e-mail to The Associated Press in late November claiming he had built "a bomb to protest the government's involvement in illegal surveillance."

He was arrested Nov. 29 after FBI agents seized what appeared to be a bomb from his home, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said.

Prosecutors said it was later revealed in court documents and proceedings that Cortina had placed a grenade shell inside a backpack and run wires from the pin of the grenade shell to the backpack's zipper. The device, however, contained no explosive material.

Prosecutors said Cortina admitted he used the Internet to obtain instructions on how to build a bomb.

In the e-mail to the AP, Cortina identified himself by name and gave his telephone number. The AP notified the FBI, and an agent called the number and visited Cortina at his home. He admitted sending the e-mail, the FBI said.

If convicted, he could face up to five years in prison.

Richard Boulware, a lawyer for Cortina, did not immediately return a telephone message for comment.

Cortina is out on $100,000 bail with electronic monitoring and a requirement that he not use the Internet.

Link Sought Between Hoax Letters And Ricin (MACT/MCT)

By Jack Douglas Jr.

The Macon Telegraph, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105486

WASHINGTON - Federal investigators are looking into a possible link between recent hoax letters, each containing a white powder and believed to have been sent by a Texas prison inmate, to determine whether they are related to a small shipment of the poison ricin to a mailing center in South Carolina in 2003.

Someone calling himself the Fallen Angel signed at least one of the six recent letters - sent to government officials in Washington, Baltimore and Buffalo, N.Y. - and the ricin letter, which was received at a mail-processing facility in Greenville, S.C., in October 2003, an FBI alert said.

The high priority alert, dated late last month, said the U.S. Clerk's Office in Buffalo on Nov. 20 received one of the letters, which was signed "Fallen Angel" and contained a nontoxic powder.

The letter "included references to anthrax and threats to the President," and its sender is believed to be an inmate who is serving life in prison for "use of weapons of mass destruction," the alert said.

The prisoner, who was not identified, is at the Montford state prison unit in Lubbock, Texas, and will be transferred to a federal prison, the alert said.

"This particular inmate has a history of sending threatening hoax letters to public officials using the names and inmate numbers of other inmates at his prison," the alert said. "Letters similar to the one sent to Buffalo were also mailed from the same prison to public offices and officials in the Washington, D.C., and Baltimore areas within the last three months."

While the white powder in the recent letters all tested negative for toxins, the alert said their sender may have a connection to the ricin delivery to the South Carolina mailing center six years ago.

The earlier letter, the alert said, made reference to the Department of Transportation and was signed, "Fallen Angel."

Lori Bailey, spokeswoman for the FBI in Dallas, declined to comment.

DP World To Sell U.S. Port Operations (AP)

By Devlin Barrett

AP, December 12, 2006

Dubai Ports World, the company whose planned takeover of major U.S. port operations ignited a political firestorm earlier this year, has agreed to sell those operations to AIG Global Investment Group.

The company announced the deal Monday. The U.S. operations at six major U.S. seaports in New York/New Jersey, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Miami, Tampa and New Orleans were valued at approximately $700 million, but DP World did not disclose the sales price.

The deal also involves stevedoring operations in 16 locations along the eastern seaboard and Gulf Coast and a passenger terminal in New York City.

"While we are disappointed to be exiting the U.S. market, the price we received was fair," Sultan Ahmed Bin Sulayem, the chairman of DP World, said in a statement announcing the deal.

One of the loudest critics of the original deal said he was pleased and expected the deal to clear the few regulatory hurdles that remain.

"This is an appropriate final chapter to the book on the Dubai Ports World deal," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y. "This is very likely to receive broad support in Washington and throughout America."

AIG Global Investment Group is an asset management firm with more than $635 billion in assets. Its parent company is the New York-based insurance firm, American International Group Inc. AIG's managing director Christopher Lee said the company is "very committed to ensuring that it continues to be one of the industry leaders in setting standards for port security."

DP World is based in the United Arab Emirates and is the largest marine terminal operator with 51 terminals in 24 countries.

The sale still requires regulatory approval from several port authorities, including New York and New Jersey. The sale is expected to close in the next few months, DP World said.

The Bush administration had agreed last January to allow DP World to acquire the U.S. port operations, but as soon as the deal became public they were fiercely attacked by members of both political parties.

DOJ_NMG_0105487

Critics of DP World cited the UAE's history, noting that some of the money that financed the Sept. 11 terror attacks moved through their banking system, and the government's past support of Afghanistan's Taliban government before the 2001 attacks.

As a result of the public pressure, DP World ultimately agreed to sell off the U.S. assets.

The Department of Homeland Security, which had tried to defend the initial DP World acquisition, had no comment Monday, agency spokesman Russ Knocke said.

Massachusetts Democrat Ed Markey, who sits on the House Homeland Security Committee, pledged his party would keep a closer eye on such deals in the future by conducting "the type of oversight that has been completely absent during the Republican Congress."

Dubai Ports World Sells U.S. Assets (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As Democrats pledged to reconsider rules governing foreign acquisition of certain U.S. assets, a sale Monday resolved the transaction that sparked a furor on the subject.

The Dubai-based ports company that gave rise to debate over foreign investment and national security earlier this year sold its U.S. assets to a unit of American International Group Inc.

Dubai Ports World sold the port contracts for an undisclosed sum to AIG Global Investment Group, a New York-based asset management company with $683 billion in assets but no experience in port operations. The new owner said it plans to run the ports of New York/New Jersey, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Miami, Tampa and New Orleans at arms length and will make no changes in day-to-day operations.

"The people who are running the ports now will continue to run them," said AIG spokesman Chris Winans.

Mohammed Sharaf, chief executive of Dubai Ports World, declined to disclose the price of the sale, but said in an interview Monday that the overall terms were "compelling." The sale covers the six marine terminal concessions on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, several stevedoring operations at other locations and a passenger terminal facility in New York City.

DP World, which is owned by the Persian Gulf emirate of Dubai in the United Arab Emirates, took over the facilities when it acquired Britain's Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. in February, becoming the world's third-largest container-port operator.

Though the transaction won approval from the interagency Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., it provoked a bipartisan outcry on Capitol Hill. Lawmakers raised alarms about the potential security risks of giving an Arab-owned company access to U.S. port facilities. With Congress poised to nullify the deal, DP World agreed in March to voluntarily shed the controversial assets.

The backlash against the deal in Congress and across the U.S. provoked concern in the Arab world and among investors elsewhere that the U.S. was turning against foreign investment, especially in sectors that involved security concerns. "There is a risk that the Cfius process can discourage foreign investment and really chill the foreign investor community," said Daniel Price, who heads the international practice at law firm Sidley Austin LLP.

Mr. Sharaf said there were "no bitter feelings" over the thwarted purchase, but acknowledged regrets. "It is sad that we aren't there anymore and couldn't be there. It has been a difficult experience for everyone," he said. Mr. Sharaf said DP World would like to return to the U.S. market once Congress and the Bush administration work out modifications to foreign-investment rules.

The furor over the DP World deal led to pushes in Congress to tighten the rules governing foreign acquisitions of U.S. assets in sensitive sectors. But legislation didn't win approval during the last session of Congress. A number of Democrats say they plan to push through revised legislation when they take over next month.

Secretive U.S. Panel Busy Reviewing Foreign Business Deals (FINDLAW/AP)

By Ted Bridis, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105488

(AP) - WASHINGTON-In the same year that public furor derailed a Dubai-owned company's plans to buy and run operations at major American ports, the number of foreign business deals reviewed by the Bush administration for U.S. security risks surged to nearly 100, up from 65 reviews last year.

A few anxious companies in deals pending with foreigners have sought the Bush administration's approval even for sales that do not raise obvious security questions, said lawyers and federal officials involved in these cases.

They attributed the jump largely to a busy year for international mergers and broader awareness of such reviews after the political uproar that scuttled the Dubai ports deal. The government's reviews included the $11.6 billion (â‚¬8.74 billion) sale of Lucent Technologies Inc. to Alcatel SA of France; Toshiba Corp.'s $5.4 billion (â‚¬4.07 billion) purchase of nuclear power-plant manufacturer Westinghouse Electric Co.; and smaller deals involving seismic surveys, a gas utility, military parts, voting machines and even anti-hacker software.

"The numbers are up. A company will file even though they don't think it's a national security concern," said Clay Lowery, an assistant secretary at the Treasury Department.

Most of the reviews this year, however, raised legitimate concerns, said Christopher Padilla, an assistant secretary at the Commerce Department. "Of the increases we've seen, only one or two cases didn't have national security issues that needed to be raised," he said. "These transactions are getting the scrutiny that's called for."

The secretive panel that conducted nearly 100 reviews also completed seven full-blown investigations this year reflecting broader concerns over proposed deals. That is equal to the combined number over the previous five years.

Foreign companies announced plans to buy 909 U.S. businesses this year for a value of $198 billion (â‚¬149.14 billion), a slight drop in sales from 2005 but up significantly from 2003 and 2004, according to Dealogic Holdings, a British company that tracks global mergers.

"There are definitely more filings by clients who feel the political environment is so uncertain that they are uncomfortable not filing," said John B. Reynolds, a Washington lawyer who regularly negotiates business deals with the U.S. panel.

Congress ended its work for the year without making promised changes to how the government reviews deals.

Lawmakers' reluctance to send a bill to President George W. Bush contrasts markedly with their attention to the subject after the administration in February approved Dubai-based DP World's takeover of significant operations at six major U.S. seaports.

The company abandoned the effort weeks later amid intense national criticism and is nearly finished selling all $700 million (â‚¬527.27 million) worth of its U.S. port operations to an American buyer.

The political uproar over the ports deal ranked among political stories that generated the most news interest in the last two decades, according to a poll by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press.

In oversight hearings, lawmakers complained that such deals deserved more scrutiny and they promised to rewrite government rules for considering when investments by foreigners may threaten U.S. security.

The administration said it has changed how it conducts such reviews. It has added employees to investigate deals, imposed more conditions on companies and sought approval for deals at higher levels within government agencies.

Meetings among senior officials who consider such deals were once scheduled every few months now occur weekly.

The 12-member Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States is led by the Treasury Department. It hired a new deputy to oversee reviews; tripled to six the number of people who work on such reviews; and now requires deals to be approved by one of the department's presidential appointees.

The Homeland Security Department also hired a new director to oversee reviews and increased the number of employees who work on such cases to 12. It has imposed conditions in 12 deals so far this year, such as requiring companies to keep sensitive equipment or business records inside the United States even after the sale.

"Congress started out quite determined to make a lot of changes," said Stewart Baker, the department's assistant secretary who helped negotiate approval for the Dubai ports deal. "The administration took very seriously the criticism, and we've launched a number of reforms."

In the aftermath of the ports dispute, lawmakers introduced more than 20 bills to block the Dubai sale or change how such deals are reviewed. None passed both the House and Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0105489

A House bill that passed 424-0 in July would have broadened the types of deals reviewed to include those affecting homeland security and would have covered sales involving power and water plants.

It would have made it tougher for companies to withdraw proposed business deals from government scrutiny. Also, the president or members of the review panel could have reinvestigated cases if companies failed to obey conditions the government had set to approve a deal.

The Senate bill, which passed by voice vote the same day as the House version, would have required the administration to tell Congress within 10 days about each business deal it was reviewing; forced foreign governments to seek U.S. approval to buy American companies; and made it tougher for companies to withdraw from pending scrutiny.

On the Net:

Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States: http://www.treas.gov/offices/international-affairs/exon-florio/

After Opportunism (WP)

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

EARLIER THIS year a depressing outbreak of anti-Arab hysteria in Congress and elsewhere doomed an effort by a company called Dubai Ports World to take over the management of some American ports. Last week, the Department of Homeland Security announced that it will work with several port authorities abroad to scan cargo before it is loaded onto ships bound for the United States. Among the facilities identified to host this Secure Freight Initiative is Britain's bustling Southampton seaport, operated by, yes, Dubai Ports World.

So far, even the loudest objectors in Congress to the earlier deal haven't publicly questioned Homeland Security's choice to inaugurate a major security initiative in a facility operated by the once-controversial United Arab Emirates-based firm. That's encouraging as well as telling.

The program aims to identify dangerous materials before they have a chance to reach U.S. soil, where, eventually, another layer of scans and checks would stop anything that slips through that initial screen. The plan isn't perfect -- Homeland Security should prepare to rapidly replace the scanners it sends to foreign ports once better technology becomes widely available, for example. But if Homeland Security manages to start the program on schedule (a fair question given its past performance on ports), it could be a relatively inexpensive way to reduce the danger of nuclear or radiological weapons entering the country in a container otherwise filled with T-shirts or tennis shoes.

A successful partnership would also demonstrate that Americans have little to fear from Dubai Ports World and firms like it -- and that they shouldn't single out Arab-owned companies for suspicion without good reason. As the world, particularly the world of business, becomes more interconnected across borders, companies owned in part or in full by foreigners face many of the same pressures, incentives and regulations that American companies do. They will therefore behave in similar ways, and in most cases they should be judged by the same metrics. Giving in to unwarranted fears stoked by opportunist politicians will only discourage foreign firms from doing business in the United States, complicate the sorts of relationships the Department of Homeland Security is attempting to forge and alienate foreigners whose friendship this nation sorely needs.

Law Passes Retooling Effort On Bioterror (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

The House and Senate have passed legislation that will revamp the Bush administration's $5.6 billion effort to counter bioterrorism threats, reorganizing management of the program and providing struggling companies with periodic cash infusions to help fund their research and testing.

"It's a relief," Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), one of the measure's principal backers, said yesterday. "We're a little further ahead of the fear of bioterrorism and pandemic because we've got a solid plan in place."

The House passed the legislation early Saturday morning and it passed the Senate last Tuesday. President Bush intends to sign the legislation, but a date has not been set, according to the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0105490

More than a year in the making, the legislation was considered by many to be an effort to salvage the two-year-old Project BioShield, which has been marked by delays and operational problems. Sen. Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming majority leader, listed it among his priorities for Congress's lame-duck session.

"I think it's already made a difference," Burr said of the legislation, which was also pushed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). "We have more people, more companies, more academic institutions, that have looked at this legislation and planned how they can plug into it. It has brought more people to the table interested" in the program.

The legislation creates the Biomedical Advanced Research and Development Authority, within the Health and Human Services Department, to manage the effort. It also allocates $1 billion over three years for research not funded by a Project BioShield contract or the National Institutes of Health and attempts to pump more government money into the private sector sooner.

Under current law, participating companies are not paid until they deliver the drugs. The legislation would speed up the development cycle by allowing Health and Human Services to pay companies up to 5 percent of their contract's value when they reach certain milestones.

The legislation "complements important work that HHS has already begun to improve the BioShield program," Christina Pearson, an HHS spokeswoman, said in a statement. "Passage [of] this bipartisan legislation supports much needed late-stage research-and-development funding. . . . It also supports our efforts to improve coordination of preparedness and response programs across the department."

The program's most significant investment, a nearly $1 billion effort by VaxGen to develop an anthrax vaccine, has been in limbo since the Food and Drug Administration held up human testing last month because of concerns about the drug's reliability. After threatening to end its contract, HHS gave the firm until Dec. 18 to resolve the concerns and begin human testing.

"It is regrettable that we have been unable to engage HHS in a productive discussion regarding how to ensure that this program moves forward," said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president for corporate affairs. "We need to engage in a true partnership or we risk losing all the work on this vaccine and undermining our nation's biodefense programs."

Post-Katrina Justice In Slow Motion (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

In October 2005, less than two months after Hurricane Katrina struck, Pedro Parra-Sanchez was arrested for allegedly stabbing a man with a broken bottle during a fight. With the city's prison damaged by flooding, he was taken to a makeshift jail at the Greyhound bus station, then transferred to a correctional facility some 70 miles away, and later to a prison in southwest Louisiana.

That's where Parra-Sanchez sat for more than a year — never seeing a lawyer or setting foot in a courtroom. At the time of the fight, he had been in New Orleans only six days: He'd left his family in Bakersfield, Calif., and come to help with the storm clean-up effort.

By law, the district attorney should have brought Parra-Sanchez to court to formally charge him within 60 days. Instead, "he disappeared," said Pamela R. Metzger, director of Tulane University's Criminal Law Clinic. "The system failed."

Parra-Sanchez's case is not unique in post-Katrina New Orleans. An untold number of people got "lost" in the prison system in the weeks immediately after the storm, Metzger said. Many are still among the 3,000 active criminal court cases. At least 85% of them qualify for representation by a public defender from the Orleans Parish Indigent Defender program.

The city's indigent defense system has long been plagued by negligent attorneys who provide haphazard and deficient representation. But in the months after Katrina struck the Gulf Coast, the program spiraled into chaos: Funding plummeted; 15 lawyers quit the already thin legal staff; documents and evidence were lost or destroyed.

"None of the functioning institutions of government were there," Metzger said. Now, "the public defenders office is dealing with a massive influx of new arrests, and cannot go back to other cases."

Parra-Sanchez at least should have had access to a lawyer from the public defenders office, Metzger said.

DOJ_NMG_0105491

She has helped to form the Katrina-Gideon Interview Project, a national coalition of law students and law professors. Led by the Tulane law clinic and the Student Hurricane Network, the project aims to free indigent "Katrina prisoners" — people who have served time but remain in jail because they haven't had legal representation.

The students and lawyers are reviewing about 1,800 pre- and post-Katrina cases. They include people who have been imprisoned well beyond any sentence they might receive for such charges as probation violation, failure to pay a fine or prostitution.

Tulane law clinic students helped indigent clients without attorneys before Katrina, but since the storm they've gone into overdrive. The Katrina-Gideon team's permanent members consist of Metzger, another full-time attorney and three law students. Attorneys from around the country have come to do pro bono stints.

They learned of Parra-Sanchez's case from other inmates: His name didn't appear on the sheriff's list of prisoners in custody because of a booking error.

Katrina-Gideon team member and student lawyer Sara Johnson, 23, says she sometimes becomes so outraged over the system's inefficiencies, and the treatment of indigent clients, that "some days, you want to throw something ... you want to go into the jail and just leave with them."

Leah Shaver, a woman in her 50s, is another of the team's cases. She has been in jail since July 2005 on prostitution and drug-possession charges. She was arraigned a week after her arrest. Two status hearings were called in her case earlier this year, but no public defender brought her to court until May — nine months after her arrest. She is still incarcerated.

Iben O'Neal was charged with possession of heroin in October 2004 and was out on bail until spring 2005, when the court revoked his bond in error. In June of that year, O'Neal had a pretrial hearing. An August 2005 trial date came and went. His case was scheduled on the court calendar several times, but he was never brought to court. Instead, he spent another 14 months in jail without seeing a lawyer or a judge.

The public defenders office had no file on O'Neal, Metzger said, "not a scrap of paper" since 2004. Her team secured O'Neal's release on Oct. 31, 16 months after his last court appearance.

The first time Parra-Sanchez spoke with a lawyer was on Nov. 17, when Metzger interviewed him in jail.

Parra-Sanchez, a legal U.S. resident from Mexico, initially had volunteered with a hurricane-relief effort sponsored by his church, according to court documents. But his limited English skills disqualified him for volunteer work; instead, he signed on as a paid laborer with a tree-removal company. Less than a week later, he was in jail.

Johnson and fellow Tulane law senior Alex Wells wrote the motion for Parra-Sanchez's arraignment..

Before the hearing, Wells, a 29-year-old former political consultant turned attorney, Johnson, Metzger, Parra-Sanchez and the court-appointed interpreter rehearsed and did role-playing in the hallway outside the courtroom of Judge Darryl Derbigny. Then Wells took his place at Metzger's side to question Parra-Sanchez about what he described as "a human tragedy."

Speaking through the courtroom interpreter, Parra-Sanchez said he repeatedly asked prison guards and a prison psychologist when he would be brought to trial. His wife, Alma, tried to call the public defender, but the office phone was not working, Wells said.

When Parra-Sanchez did not show up in court for arraignment in May, Derbigny issued a warrant for his arrest, even though he was already in jail.

The father of four wept as he spoke of the hardships his imprisonment had had on his family.

His wife was forced to move from a rented house to a trailer park. She sold her husband's tools to pay bills and depleted the family's savings. The bank repossessed Parra-Sanchez's truck. And his eldest daughter left home to help alleviate some of the family's financial burden.

"It was very difficult mentally," Parra-Sanchez told the court as he dabbed his eyes with a tissue.

"I asked for help, but nobody would give me" any, he added in later testimony.

Assistant Dist. Atty. Greg Thompson called the Parra-Sanchez case "a snafu" and, during the defendant's arraignment, formally apologized on behalf of the state for his "prolonged incarceration."

DOJ_NMG_0105492

A judge freed Parra-Sanchez the Friday before Thanksgiving. His arraignment finally took place on Nov. 28, and a local synagogue donated money for Parra-Sanchez's train journey home to Bakersfield on Nov. 29. He has since consulted Bakersfield attorney Daniel Rodriguez about possible civil rights litigation against law enforcement agencies in New Orleans.

Later this month, Derbigny will hear a defense motion to drop Parra-Sanchez's case, on the grounds that his constitutional right to a speedy trial has been violated.

"I have no idea whether this man is guilty or innocent," said Metzger. "What I do know for sure is that the state is guilty for depriving this man of his bill of rights for the last 13 months."

Stephen Singer, a professor at Loyola University New Orleans law school and the lead trial counsel for the public defenders office, said his agency welcomes input from the Katrina-Gideon group because "we can use all the help we can get." But he said indigent defense needs more than the spot treatment the Katrina team provides.

"That helps individual clients, but it doesn't help us solve the problem," Singer said. "What we really need to do is fix the public defenders office."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Reviews Options On Iraq Policy (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 12, 2006

President Bush, eager to show he can take advice on Iraq, embarked on a round of public outreach Monday and promised Americans the unpopular war eventually would make their lives safer.

Preparing for a major speech on the war's future, Bush took the short trip to the State Department to review options with advisers there, then hosted a handful of experts on Iraq policy in the Oval Office.

"Like most Americans, this administration wants to succeed in Iraq because we understand success in Iraq would help protect the United States in the long run," Bush said after his State Department briefing.

The White House remained tightlipped on how Bush is likely to change strategy, saying the president is awaiting reports from his national security team before announcing a plan to the nation. That is expected to happen before Christmas.

The president said his aim is to coordinate advice from his diplomatic and military advisers "so that when I do speak to the American people, they will know that I've listened to all aspects of government."

Indeed, the administration's "new way forward" includes a visible attempt to show an openness to ideas.

On Tuesday, Bush will meet via video conference with senior military commanders, then talk with Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni leader, in the Oval Office. Bush met last week with the leader of the largest Shiite bloc in Iraq's parliament, Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim.

On Wednesday, Bush will confer with senior defense officials at the Pentagon.

Since the election, lawmakers of both parties have been to the White House to discuss the war with Bush.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said he saw no "gigantic difference" in the pace of public strategy sessions on the president's schedule. But he added that Bush's travels to the State Department and the Pentagon sent a message.

"It's important that the American people be aware both of his consultation and his level of concern about getting it right," Snow said.

More than 2,900 U.S. military members have died in Iraq. The war has weighed down the Bush presidency and helped shift control of Congress to the Democrats, who have long accused Bush of being stubborn and isolated.

The administration has rejected calls for troop withdrawals until Iraq can govern and defend itself, warning that retreat could create a haven for terrorists and kill a fledgling democracy.

"I don't think he's looking for an easy answer. He's looking for the right answer. And the right answer isn't one person's idea," said Republican strategist Ron Kaufman, who worked in the White House under Bush's father.

"If some retired general or some historian can add to the final solution, then he's doing the right thing," Kaufman said.

DOJ_NMG_0105493

At the State Department, Bush met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her senior advisers on Iraq, and with diplomats who serve as leaders of U.S. joint civilian-military units called provincial reconstruction teams.

The U.S. ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, participated by videoconference. "It was a good give and take," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. "The president had questions throughout the entire set of briefings."

Afterward, Bush delivered a statement but took no questions in the Treaty Room, with Rice and Vice President Dick Cheney standing behind him. Looming behind them all were portraits of two former secretaries of state, James A. Baker III and Lawrence Eagleburger — both members of a bipartisan commission that has bluntly told Bush his Iraq policy is not working.

Bush's public remarks echoed his previous statements and gave no indication of any change of strategy.

Later, he sought advice from Stephen Biddle of the Council of Foreign Relations, Eliot Cohen of the School of Advanced International Studies and three retired Army generals: Wayne Downing, Jack Keane and Barry McCaffrey.

Snow said Bush hoped to be able to announce his decisions by Christmas but that the timing could slip. "It's something that we would like to see, but I'm not going to promise it," Snow said.

___

AP Diplomatic Writer Anne Gearan contributed to this story.

Bush Prepares To Launch New Iraq Strategy (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Launching a highly visible round of consultations as he seeks to reshape the U.S. role in Iraq, President Bush reiterated Monday that "success" there was crucial to the long-term protection of the United States and said Iraq's regional neighbors have a responsibility to help the country's fledgling government.

Bush met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and State Department officials and then with three retired Army generals and two outside policy experts, opening a week of conferences before announcing a new direction in Iraq in 2007.

In the aftermath of last week's sharply critical report by the Iraq Study Group, the White House is eager to draw the spotlight to other ideas and options more in keeping with Bush's goals. The Iraq Study Group was led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a Republican, and former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat.

Bush continues his policy review Tuesday and Wednesday, with meetings and teleconferences with U.S. military commanders and Iraqi officials, including Iraqi Vice President Tariq Hashimi, the head of the largest party representing Iraq's Sunni Arab minority, and a briefing at the Pentagon on military options.

The in-depth review follows the report by the Iraq Study Group, a commission originally blessed by the White House. The panel concluded that conditions in Iraq were "grave and deteriorating," recommending action to hand over more responsibilities to the Iraqis and withdraw most U.S. combat forces by 2008.

Bush last week voiced antipathy toward the key Iraq Study Group recommendations, which also included talks with Iran and Syria, and leaning on the Iraqi government to settle political squabbles. He then announced this week's battery of meetings as part of "extensive consultations" with experts inside and outside the government.

Speaking with reporters at the State Department after the meetings there, Bush said that he and the advisers talked about "the neighborhood -- the countries that surround Iraq and the responsibilities that they have." That group includes not only Kuwait, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Turkey, but also Iran and Syria.

At lower levels, officials at the State Department are divided over whether talks with Iran and Syria could significantly stabilize Iraq, as the Baker-Hamilton panel argued. But at the top level, Rice and her aides are vigorously skeptical about the idea.

Friday, Rice told reporters: "In both Syria and Iran, you have states that have chosen to be on the side of the divide that is fueling extremism, not moderation. And that is the essential problem."

The Iraq Study Group recommended that the administration talk to Iran and Syria; Bush has opposed such a course.

Bush is aiming to outline a "way forward" in Iraq in a national address, possibly before Christmas, White House officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0105494

The president said the goal of this week's consultations was to assure the American people "that I've listened to all aspects of government" as he seeks to determine a route that will "achieve our objective: to succeed in Iraq."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush and the State Department officials did not specifically discuss the recommendations of the Baker-Hamilton commission, and that the meetings the president is conducting this week were not "a reaction to Baker-Hamilton."

He also said the president, in describing Iraq as "a central component of defeating the extremists" -- not as "the central front" of the terror war -- was not shifting his view but rather varying "the phraseology."

During the afternoon, Bush met privately with five experts on Iraq and the military: Stephen Biddle, a former professor at the U.S. Army War College and fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations; Eliot A. Cohen, an expert on military strategy at the School for Advanced International Studies in Washington, and three retired Army generals: Wayne Downing, Jack Keane and Barry McCaffrey.

"There were a variety of views expressed, and they seemed very interested, it was an engaging session," Biddle said following the White House session. "The president asked lots of questions. Everybody got to make our pitch about what we needed to tell him and react to others and react to the president. It was fairly interactive."

Times staff writers Julian E. Barnes and Doyle McManus contributed to this report.

Bush Keeping All Options Open (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon, Newsday Washington Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 12, 2006

After stiff-arming the Iraq Study Group report last week, President George W. Bush tried to retake the initiative Monday by launching three days of high-profile consultations to chart his own way forward.

WASHINGTON -- Now it's the president's turn.

After stiff-arming the Iraq Study Group report last week, President George W. Bush tried to retake the initiative Monday by launching three days of high-profile consultations to chart his own way forward.

Bush's message: There are a lot of voices out there, not just one blue-ribbon panel, and I'm listening to them all as I decide how much to change course.

Bush hopes to give a speech laying out his decision before Christmas, but his early comments suggest he is in no mood for the sweeping changes sought by the study group, which called for seeking talks with Iran and Syria and bringing combat troops out by early 2008.

Yet the stakes couldn't be higher, amid deepening public dissatisfaction with the war and Bush's handling of it. Facing growing violence and dwindling options, Bush is embarking on what could be his last major effort to turn around the war that will define his presidency.

His first stop Monday was at the State Department, where he said he would meld advice from top military and diplomatic officials "so that when I do speak to the American people, they will know that I've listened to all aspects of government."

"Like most Americans, this administration wants to succeed in Iraq, because we understand success in Iraq would help protect the United States in the long run," Bush said.

But Bush dropped his calls for victory and seemed to rely on the narrower version of the mission used by the Iraq Study Group in discussing his goals -- a free-standing Iraq that can survive largely free of U.S. help.

After the State Department, Bush heard from five outside experts, including several who criticized the Iraq Study Group findings. Eliot Cohen, a professor at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies, called some of the group's ideas "sheer fantasy."

Today, Bush consults with military commanders in Iraq by teleconference and hosts an Oval Office meeting with a Sunni vice president in the Iraqi government. Tomorrow, he travels to the Pentagon, where he will get a briefing by outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, ousted the day after Democrats retook Congress.

Rumsfeld expressed disappointment to be leaving, telling Fox News Monday that "I hate to not be doing what I've been doing," but that he believed history would show "an awful lot of right decisions were made."

The one-two punch of a Democratic election sweep and the release of the Iraq report have forced Bush to confront previously rejected shifts in his strategy. In addition, a Newsweek poll out this week showed that the public supports setting a timeline for bringing troops home by almost 2-to-1 -- a move Bush has steadfastly resisted.

Spokesman Tony Snow said Bush is shooting for a pre-Christmas address to the nation but is awaiting the results of three in-house reviews, so the timing could slip until after the holidays.

Experts Advise Bush Not To Reduce Troops (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

President Bush heard a blunt and dismal assessment of his handling of Iraq from a group of military experts yesterday, but the advisers shared the White House's skeptical view of the recommendations made last week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, sources said.

The three retired generals and two academics disagreed in particular with the study group's plans to reduce the number of U.S. combat troops in Iraq and to reach out for help to Iran and Syria, according to sources familiar with the meeting, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the session was private.

The White House gathering was part of a series of high-profile meetings Bush is holding to search for "a new way forward" amid the increasing chaos and carnage in Iraq. Earlier in the day, Bush met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other high-ranking officials at the State Department, where he was briefed on reconstruction and regional diplomatic efforts in Iraq.

The military experts met with Bush, Vice President Cheney and about a dozen aides for more than an hour. The visitors told the officials that the situation in Iraq is as dire as the study group had indicated but that alternative approaches must be considered, said one participant in the meeting. In addition, the experts agreed that the president should review his national security team, which several characterized as part of the problem.

"I don't think there is any doubt in his mind about how bad it is," the source said.

The group disagreed on the key issue of whether to send more troops to Iraq, with retired Gen. John M. Keane arguing that several thousand additional soldiers could be used to improve security in Baghdad, and others expressing doubt about that proposal, according to sources at the meeting. But the five agreed in telling Bush that the Army and Marine Corps both need to be bigger, and also need bigger budgets.

The group suggested the president shake up his national security team. "All of us said they have failed, that you need a new team," said one participant. That recommendation is likely to fuel Pentagon rumors that Bush and his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, may decide to replace Marine Gen. Peter Pace as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

White House officials emphasized that although the experts gave a bleak assessment, they still believe the situation in Iraq is "winnable."

"I appreciate the advice I got from those folks in the field," Bush said after emerging from the morning session. "And that advice is . . . an important component of putting together a new way forward in Iraq."

The carefully choreographed meetings are coming on the heels of the release last week of the Iraq Study Group's report, which pronounced the situation in Iraq "grave" and recommended fundamental shifts in how the Bush administration handles the war. To stem the deteriorating situation in Iraq, the report said, the administration should shift the focus of its military mission from direct combat to training Iraqi troops, while pressing harder for a diplomatic solution by engaging Iran and Syria -- something Bush has pointedly refused to do.

Yesterday's meetings are to be followed today by a videoconference with military commanders before Bush receives Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi at the White House. On Wednesday, Bush is scheduled to meet with his outgoing defense secretary, Donald H. Rumsfeld, and another group of military experts.

Coming amid growing public discontent with the war and the defeat of his party in last month's congressional elections, the president's very public review of his Iraq policy is expected to culminate in a major address in which he will lay out what the administration has billed as a "new way forward" in the nearly four-year-old conflict. Press secretary Tony Snow said the administration is hoping for the president to deliver the speech before Christmas, although he said the timing has not been nailed down.

DOJ_NMG_0105496

Even as the president has been reviewing his approach to the war, he has not backed off his position that victory in Iraq is crucial to victory in a larger fight against terrorism. Bush also calls it essential for Iraq to be stabilized as a functioning democracy -- a sweeping goal on which the Iraq Study Group's report was notably silent.

"Iraq is a central component of defeating the extremists who want to establish safe haven in the Middle East, extremists who would use their safe haven from which to attack the United States," Bush said. "This is really the calling of our time, that is, to defeat the extremists and radicals."

When the White House review began, the interagency group debated whether to try to beat the Iraqi Study Group's report or let it play out and then look "bigger and better" by doing a report later, said an official familiar with the discussions. It was agreed to wait. But the emphasis throughout the month-long process has been to produce a strategy that would be deliberately distinct, the official added.

The White House review does not have the depth or scope of the Iraq Study Group's, according to officials familiar with the deliberations. "There's a lack of thinking on other big issues -- oil, the economy, infrastructure and jobs," said one source who was briefed on the interagency discussions and requested anonymity because talks are ongoing.

During yesterday's White House meeting, Bush asked all the questions, except for one at the end from Cheney, a source said. But Cheney took copious notes throughout, filling several pages, he said. "They didn't really reveal their own views" in their questions, said retired Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, one of the five participants.

As a whole, the group of retired generals and academics who met Bush tend to be skeptical of the Iraq Study Group's proposals, and so were able to give him additional reasons to reject its recommendations.

The first to speak was Eliot A. Cohen, an expert in military strategy at Johns Hopkins University, who has criticized the study group's findings, particularly on engaging Iran and Syria and on decreasing combat troops. He was followed by Keane, McCaffrey and Wayne A. Downing, all retired four-star Army generals. Two have told friends they are skeptical of the study group's recommendation to cut U.S. combat forces over the next year while quadrupling the size of the training and advisory effort, which currently numbers around 4,000.

Staff writer Robin Wright contributed to this report.

Bush Urges Iraq's Neighbors To Help Bring Stability (WSJ)

By Henry J. Pulizzi

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON – President Bush on Monday opened three days of intensive consultations on Iraq, saying the U.S. and countries across the Middle East have a vital stake in helping the government in Baghdad succeed.

"We believe that most of the countries understand that a mainstream society, a society that is a functioning democracy, is in their interests," Mr. Bush said after meeting with State Department officials on Iraq. "And it's up to us to help focus their attention and focus their efforts on helping the Iraqis succeed." (Bush statement1)

The president, flanked by Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, didn't name any countries, however, one of the Iraq Study Group's main proposals was for enhanced regional engagement, including with Syria and Iran.

Mr. Bush's meeting at the State Department is one of many he is having this week in the process of weighing his strategy options on Iraq. In addition to the Iraq Study Group's recommendations, a series of internal administration reviews are in process. The president, who will meet with outside experts on Iraq later in the day, hopes to update the nation on his Iraq plans by the end of the year.

On Tuesday, Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet via video conference with senior military commanders and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, and then host Iraqi Vice President Tariq al Hashemi in the Oval Office. On Wednesday, he meets with officials at the Pentagon.

"I am looking forward to continuing my deliberations with the military," Mr. Bush said at the State Department. "There's no question we have to make sure that the State Department and the Defense Department, the efforts and their recommendations, are closely coordinated so that when I do speak to the American people, they will know that I've listened to all aspects of government and that the way forward is the way forward to achieve our objective to succeed to Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0105497

Mr. Bush said he was briefed from Baghdad and by a civilian "provincial reconstruction team" leader in Washington. "I appreciate the advice I got from those folks in the field," he said. "That advice is an important component of putting together a new way forward in Iraq."

Administration officials are weighing options, including a short-term buildup of troops and a revamped approach to dealing with Iraq's warring factions. Heading toward the new year, Mr. Bush is awaiting reports from the Pentagon, the State Department and the National Security Council.

Last week, Bush met separately with Shiite political leader Abdul-Aziz al Hakim, members of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, British Prime Minister Tony Blair, plus lawmakers from the armed services, intelligence and foreign relations committees.

In Advance Of Speech, Bush Seeks Iraq Advice (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11 — President Bush on Monday began an Iraq war listening tour that will last much of this week, as he and his war cabinet work urgently toward a new strategy he can present to the public before Christmas.

The internal administration debate is focusing acutely on whether — and how — the United States should press the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, to take more aggressive steps to crack down on militias, among other issues, following a specified timeline.

That course was among those recommended last week by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, which called on the United States to link continued political and military support for Mr. Maliki's government to benchmarks it would have to meet.

The administration has been generally opposed to putting overt pressure on Mr. Maliki, but on Monday Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, left open the possibility that the United States would seek a way to get Mr. Maliki's government to achieve stability faster and get American troops home.

"There are going to be the best efforts to succeed as quickly as possible," Mr. Snow said. "The president has made it clear to Iraqis and to the United States that we want to have this succeed, and we want it to succeed as quickly as possible."

Mr. Snow refused to say whether the president remained firmly opposed to establishing timetables for American withdrawal — which would presumably coincide with Iraqis' reaching certain benchmarks in securing the country. However, he indicated during his regular afternoon briefing with reporters that the president would address the issue during an expected speech laying out his plan. He later said he had meant to imply only that the president was open to various options.

The White House said Mr. Bush used meetings on Monday at the State Department with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in the morning and in the Oval Office with a group of military and Iraq policy experts in the afternoon to review political and military options in Iraq as he attempts to chart what he has called "a new way forward."

As the administration grapples with how to reconcile sparring Sunni and Shiite factions in Iraq, Mr. Bush is to meet Tuesday with the Iraqi vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, the leader of the most powerful Sunni Arab party in Iraq. That meeting is to follow a video teleconference between Mr. Bush and several American commanders, the departing secretary of defense, Donald H. Rumsfeld, and Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador to Iraq.

Aides said that through this week's meetings Mr. Bush was "approaching the conclusion" of his deliberations. But officials said the semipublic nature of the meetings — which were put on Mr. Bush's schedule last week — were also in part intended to show that he is urgently working on a solution to the worsening instability of Iraq at a time of heavy public pressure to show progress there.

That pressure has mounted from the incoming Democratic-led Congress, from some Republicans, and from the Iraq Study Group, whose report last week prescribed 79 recommendations to help reverse what it called a "grave and deteriorating" situation in Iraq.

A poll released by CBS News on Monday showed Mr. Bush had his lowest approval rating ever on the war, with just 21 percent of those surveyed saying they approve of his handling of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0105498

But after a weekend in which members of the neoconservative wing of his party blasted the report for proposing what they considered to be veiled retreat, and in which administration officials described some suggestions as unrealistic and impractical, the White House said the report did not play a large role in Monday's discussions.

Asked if the report came up at the State Department meeting, Mr. Snow said, "not really." And, he said, he did not expect the panel of experts to discuss it much during the Oval Office session either, saying they were not going to the White House to present "a book review."

In another indication that the White House is distancing itself from the report, four of the five experts at the Oval Office — retired four-star generals Barry McCaffrey and Jack Keane, and Eliot A. Cohen of Johns Hopkins University and Stephen Biddle of the Council on Foreign Relations — have already publicly questioned the practicality of certain suggestions by the study group.

Still, the administration's discussions center on many of the same issues the study group addressed. A senior official has said that among the most complicated questions facing the president is how to get Mr. Maliki, a Shiite, to move more aggressively against Shiite militias — including the one led by one of his most powerful patrons, Moktada al-Sadr — and to provide basic services more quickly.

The report has suggested threatening Mr. Maliki and his government with a loss of United States support should the prime minister fail to meet a set of milestones. That would differ from the president's fundamental resistance to bringing United States troops home before the Iraqi government can "sustain, govern and defend" itself.

Officials investigated reports from Baghdad that some of Mr. Maliki's fellow Shiites were plotting to push him from office and said that they were false.

And, after his meeting with Ms. Rice — which Vice President Dick Cheney attended as well — Mr. Bush said they had discussed the roles Iraq's neighbors could play in stabilizing Iraq, which is a central suggestion of the study group's report. But Mr. Bush continued to make it clear he did not believe Syria or Iran would play such roles.

"We believe that most of the countries understand that a mainstream society, a society that is a functioning democracy, is in their interests," Mr. Bush said.

President Discusses Strategy This Week With Military, Diplomatic, Iraqi Leaders (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush holds a videoconference today with military leaders in Iraq, part of a series of high-level meetings to help him develop "a new way forward" on the war that could be announced as early as next week.

Bush's discussions about Iraq come after a bipartisan commission delivered its recommendations on the war last week, including a withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops by 2008, conditions permitting. The president opposes a timetable for withdrawal until the Iraqi government can sustain itself.

On Monday, Bush's version of an in-house listening tour began with a discussion of diplomatic initiatives at the State Department.

"When I do speak to the American people, they will know that I've listened to all aspects of government," Bush said after the meeting, which included Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Vice President Cheney.

Also scheduled today: an Oval Office meeting with Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni vice president in Iraq's coalition government.

On Wednesday, Bush will go to the Pentagon to meet with military officials about the increasingly unpopular war, which helped cost Republicans control of Congress in the elections in November.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Bush hopes to outline his Iraq plans before Christmas, but "it's not locked down."

"It's something we would like to see, but I'm not going to promise it," Snow said.

Bush's meetings are part of an internal administration review of Iraq policy, Snow said. The National Security Council is coordinating the effort.

Bush repeated Monday that success in Iraq would "help protect the United States in the long run" by denying safe haven to "extremists and radicals." He defined success as a nation that governs and defends itself and "serves as an ally in this war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0105499

Some of Bush's fellow Republicans have been offering their own ideas about Iraq.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a likely presidential candidate, wants to increase the number of troops in Iraq. Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., who voted to give Bush the authority to invade Iraq, says he doesn't want U.S. troops caught in the middle of sectarian strife. He has suggested the United States "reposition" its forces to curb weapons that come into Iraq from Syria, Saudi Arabia and Iran.

Bush also met Monday in the Oval Office with three retired Army generals: Wayne Downing, Jack Keane and Barry McCaffrey. Also at the meeting were Stephen Biddle with the Council on Foreign Relations and Eliot Cohen, who teaches at Johns Hopkins University.

The Iraq Study Group, led by former secretary of State James Baker and former congressman Lee Hamilton of Indiana, recommended a new diplomatic offensive that includes talks with Iran and Syria. The Bush administration has declined to talk with either nation, citing Iran's uranium-enrichment program and Syria's efforts to destabilize the Lebanese government.

In his brief remarks at the State Department, Bush did not cite Iran and Syria by name. He said he discussed with Rice and other State officials "the neighborhood, the countries that surround Iraq and the responsibilities that they have to help this young Iraqi democracy survive."

USA More Pessimistic On Iraq War (USAT)

By Susan Page, Usa Today

USA Today, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — As President Bush weighs changing course in Iraq, Americans are increasingly pessimistic about the war and want most U.S. troops withdrawn within a year, a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Friday through Sunday says. Three of four support the major recommendations unveiled by the Iraq Study Group last week.

Most predict the administration won't implement the bipartisan commission's proposals, however. And fewer than 1 in 5 have "a great deal" of trust in Bush to "recommend the right thing" for the United States to do in Iraq.

Confidence in Democratic congressional leaders to chart the proper course is even lower, at 14%.

"October and November were very bad months for casualties in Iraq, and people are asking, after so much sacrifice, why hasn't there been any progress?" says Richard Eichenberg, a political scientist at Tufts who studies public opinion toward war. He calls Americans' conclusion that Iraq is enmeshed in a civil war "a threshold event" that erodes backing for the mission.

"To the extent that the American people think they are defending themselves and their security, they're fairly supportive of using military force," Eichenberg says. In a civil war, though, the conflict is seen as an intractable one that demands a political solution, not a military one.

By 76%-22%, those surveyed say Iraq is in a civil war. The White House disputes that characterization, calling the conflict part of a global battle against terrorism.

STAY THE COURSE?: Most say costs outweigh benefits | Poll results

The public's impatience with developments in Iraq and its enthusiasm for the Iraq Study Group's plan doesn't ensure that Bush will take their advice, cautions Edward Walker, a former assistant secretary of State and U.S. ambassador to Israel and Egypt.

"There is very little leverage anyone has over presidents in a war-time situation," says Walker, who teaches global politics at Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y. He sees some similarities to the Vietnam War, when Lyndon Johnson long resisted anti-war pressures and protests that eventually undermined his presidency.

Bush is making a round of consultations with Pentagon generals, State Department strategists and historians to chart a new direction in Iraq. He plans to deliver an address to the American people before Christmas about his plan.

While 55% of Americans want most U.S. troops withdrawn within a year, only 18% think that will happen. More than 4 in 10 predict American troops will be deployed in Iraq for more than two years, though just 14% endorse that idea.

The president's job-approval rating is 38%, up 5 percentage points from the survey taken immediately after congressional elections last month. Opposition to the war and Bush's leadership of it contributed to a Democratic takeover of the House and Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0105500

The poll's margin of error is +/—3 percentage points for full sample.

Among the findings:

• In a question asked of a half-sample, a record high 62% of Americans say the war in Iraq isn't "worth it," and a record low 16% say the United States is winning. That's less than half the 40% who held that view a year ago. Now, nearly two-thirds say neither side is winning.

Looking ahead, 35% predict the United States eventually will win the war, also a new low.

• About three of four support each of three major recommendations by the Iraq Study Group: Negotiating directly with Iran and Syria, jumpstarting peace talks aimed at resolving the Israel-Palestinian conflict, and withdrawing most U.S. combat troops by March 2008.

• On the long-term consequences of the war in Iraq: 38%, of those surveyed predict people in Iraq will be better off because of the war; 35% say they will be worse off.

However, pluralities say people in the USA will be worse off and that the war on terrorism and stability in the Middle East will be hurt. Sixty percent say the image of the United States around the world will be damaged.

Americans Conflicted About Iraq War's Course (USAT)

By Susan Page And William Risser, Usa Today

USA Today, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Most Americans are convinced of two things: It's important that the United States succeed in Iraq. Eight in 10 of those surveyed in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll over the weekend agree with President Bush about that.

Important, perhaps, but not worth the price. By nearly 2-1, they also say the costs of succeeding in Iraq outweigh the benefits. Eight in 10 want most U.S. troops withdrawn within two years. Nearly a third want them home within six months.

"There's got to be a change of direction," says Lorne Eustis, 79, a retired truck driver from Ogdensburg, N.Y., and a Republican who was among those surveyed. "I don't care what it is but something has got to be done. GI's are getting killed over there for nothing."

The poll of 1,009 adults, taken Friday through Sunday, finds an American public that is deeply conflicted. Most worry not only about the costs of staying in Iraq but also about the consequences of pulling out. While 60% say the United States could win the war, 61% say the United States won't.

"You don't find a majority support for immediate withdrawal, but they're definitely looking for a way out," says Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland, which has surveyed American and Iraqi public opinion on the war. "They don't believe that you're going to leave an ideal 'City-on-the-Hill' democracy behind" but also think that pulling out amid chaos would create its own problems.

"They are looking for ways to mitigate the consequences of disengagement," Kull says.

The survey finds a sharp partisan divide on the war. Sixty-three percent of Republicans say the benefits of the war outweigh its costs, compared with 28% of independents of just 12% of Democrats.

"I think we've been there long enough and it's a mess," says Amy Lantz, 38, a homemaker from Wilmington, Del., and an independent voter. "I'd love to see them come home today," she says of U.S. troops, "but if we did pull out today it would just blow up. It just seems like complete chaos right now."

Most of those surveyed say they're following closely the recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, unveiled last week. While most say they don't know enough about the group's recommendations to judge whether the Bush administration should implement them, those with an opinion support the proposals by nearly 5 to 1.

"I don't know what it contained but it wouldn't hurt to look at it a different way because we're not getting anywhere right now," says Estel Aleshire, 76, a retired autoworker from Portage County, Ohio, who twice voted for Bush.

Americans overwhelmingly endorse specific proposals advanced by the commission.

Many support the idea of pushing Iraqis to take more responsibility for security operations and political progress. "Anything that takes responsibility off of us and puts it over there is fine with me," says Catherine Ostrowski, 32, of Amherst, N.Y. She wants Bush to "stop sending new troops over" and bring the troops there home within a year.

DOJ_NMG_0105501

Patti Nickels, 45, a Republican from Bristol, Pa., says negotiating with Iran and Syria just makes common sense. "Sure, husbands and wives don't get along, boyfriends and girlfriends don't get along," she says. "You have to have some type of communication."

She's not sure about the commission's recommendation that most U.S. combat troops withdraw by March 2008, though. "Finish the job," she says. "If we pull out now, what was the sense of us going over there in the first place?"

Robert Jondal, 59, of Two Harbors, Minn., wants most U.S. troops withdrawn sooner. A Democratic-leaning voter, he says the party's leaders aren't responding fast enough to the message sent in last month's elections. "I don't think we're going to do that much good sticking around longer," he says.

Tina Rinkert, 25, a Democrat from Taylorsville, Utah, agrees. "The sooner they get out of there, the better," she says. "I'd like there to be peace, but I'd also like them to be home with their families."

Draft Democrats To Help Run Iraq (LAT)

By Mike Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

PRESIDENT BUSH should spend less time worrying about the tangled politics of Iraq and more time mastering the equally fractured politics of Washington. The war in Iraq has become partisan — and partisan wars are impossible to fight successfully. The grim truth is that between the "thumping" his party took at the ballot box in November and the intrusive help of the Baker commission, the president has lost so much power at home that he can no longer maneuver successfully in Iraq.

How can he or his subordinates successfully negotiate with the bitter factions inside Iraq when his administration is seen as hobbled and when his ability to do much beyond withdrawing American forces is doubted? Indeed, the chief result of last week's report from former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and his squadron of wise men has been to corner an already weakened president by proposing a general strategy of retreat and withdrawal, while remaining maddeningly opaque about how to go about it without delivering Iraq into the hands of its many budding civil-war makers.

War, as we all know, is an extension of politics, and before he can achieve anything in Iraq, the president must first quickly reestablish his political authority in Washington. Otherwise, his position will decline even further as the Democrats attempt to seize more control of Iraq policy. The squabbling and paralysis that would ensue is certain to send a very dangerous message of American weakness to the exactly the wrong people — not just in Baghdad and Fallouja but in Tehran and Pyongyang as well.

Bush likes to move boldly and preemptively. He would be well advised to do so right now by adopting a strategy that he would find immensely painful but that is the best option he has. He should trump the Baker commission by extending its bipartisan spirit to make the Democrats an offer no patriot can refuse: He should establish a bipartisan war council made up of his national security team and the Democratic leaders of the key national security committees in Congress.

Under the president's leadership, this council would conduct the Iraq war, becoming the key coordinating vehicle for Iraqi policy. The president would not cede his authority as commander in chief, but he would work with this group — which would include such leaders as Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and Reps. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) and Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas) — to develop a consensus policy for Iraq.

Developing compromise inside such a war council would not be easy. The president would find ceding power a very bitter pill to swallow, and his Democratic critics would find that the Iraq war is much easier to criticize than to manage.

But only legitimate bipartisanship can give the president back the authority he needs to move diplomatically and militarily.

For example, most experts believe that the quickly deteriorating situation in Iraq needs to be immediately stabilized before a full-scale civil war overtakes events. Stabilization would probably require the direct application of military force against both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militia forces in a blunt assertion of U.S. power. It might even require a buildup of more U.S. troops in the short term. But undertaking any such offensive moves in Iraq would be impossible without at least some bipartisan support — and the Democrats are unlikely to grant that support without a true role in policymaking.

Some in the White House might argue that a power-sharing deal on Iraq with the Democrats is unnecessary. After all, the president — not the nagging Democrats on Capitol Hill — is the commander in chief. Winston Churchill, they might argue, would never have surrendered such control during the darkest days of World War II to shortsighted and defeatist critics.

DOJ_NMG_0105502

Perhaps. But it's worth remembering that Churchill, Britain's determined prime minister, ran his war with a coalition war cabinet made up of leaders from all parties. He knew that successful war-waging and partisanship cannot coexist.

If the situation in Iraq continues to decline and the Democrats, excluded from participation, are allowed instead to rage along in an irresponsible campaign mode, the destructive gridlock over Iraq will get even worse.

Promises made by the Democratic majorities in Congress that they will not interfere with war appropriations are meaningless. Democrats now have congressional power, and they will use it. Far better for Bush to demand a partnership in the national interest, even if painful concessions are the necessary price. Far better to force the Democrats to accept the sober responsibilities that come with power than to keep them on the sidelines and become engulfed in a domestic political civil war over Iraq that the president no longer has the power to win.

The president could, in one statesmanlike gesture, end the paralysis in Washington, force Democratic maturity, reestablish his leadership and show our enemies American unity and resolve at a critical time for our nation. The public would reward it, and the national interest demands it.

Honor Killing (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

Alexis de Tocqueville observed that in America morals count for a lot while honor counts for relatively little. Reading the lamentable report of the Iraq Study Group, it shows.

The operative word in the ISG report is "should," which is what grammarians call a defective verb. The report easily contains more than 100 shoulds, varying tonally from hectoring to plaintive to nitpicking. The report's ninth recommendation, for instance, stresses that "Iran should be asked to assume its responsibility to participate in the Support Group" while the 23rd says "the President should restate that the United States does not seek to control Iraq's oil." Only rarely do the ISG authors employ different language, such as when they say "there must be a renewed and sustained commitment by the United States to a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace." Like an editorial in the New York Times, this is an exercise in homiletics, not persuasion.

By contrast, the word "honor" appears just once: "We also honor the many Iraqis who have sacrificed on behalf of their country," write ISG co-chairmen James Baker and Lee Hamilton, who also put in a kind word for our Coalition allies.

But honor isn't simply a sentimental verb. It is a decisive principle of action in all foreign policy, never more so than in the honor-obsessed Middle East. It is not about good intentions, wisdom or virtue, but about appearances and perception: "Honor acts solely for the public eye," wrote Tocqueville. In practice, it means standing by one's friends and defying one's enemies, whatever the price. During the 1973 Yom Kippur War Richard Nixon ordered the military resupply of Israel in its hour of need not because he was sympathetic to Jews -- he wasn't -- but because he understood that the U.S. could not be seen to let a client down. Nine months later, he was accorded a ticker-tape parade through the streets of Cairo.

How does the ISG report meet the test of honor? Mainly by failing it. The report is chiefly notable for declaring in its first sentence that "the situation in Iraq is grave and deteriorating." This statement of fact is being celebrated by sundry commentators as a bold and necessary act of speaking truth to power. This may be true in Washington, but what does it actually achieve in Iraq? The invaluable translation service Memri offers a clue in the form of a response to the ISG report on Islamist Web sites connected to the Iraqi insurgents: "Now that its wager on the Shi'ite government [of Iraq] has failed [to pay off]," goes the message, "the American administration [is striving] to foil . . . any attempt to [establish] . . . an Islamic State in the form of a Caliphate in Iraq . . ."

Next there is the report's repeated calls for "national reconciliation," by which the authors mean that the Iraqi government "must send a clear signal to Sunnis that there is a place for them in national life." This is unobjectionable, insofar as it involves purely economic questions such as oil-revenue sharing, though this is itself highly controversial.

Yet the recommendation becomes something else entirely when it demands that the Iraqi government accommodate the very people who have been at the forefront of the insurgency's mass-murder campaign. That isn't likely to appease the Sunnis, whose track record of the past 40 months offers scant hope that they are seriously prepared to behave as a responsible minority in a predominantly Shiite country. But it is likely to alienate the one constituency the U.S. cannot afford to lose -- the government of

DOJ_NMG_0105503

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and particularly President Jalal Talabani, who wasted no time denouncing the ISG report as "dangerous" and "an insult to the people of Iraq."

Having thus emboldened terrorists and alienated friends, the report proceeds to the suggestion that the U.S. seek the cooperation of Syria and Iran, its two principal enemies in the region, on the theory that neither country wants chaos on its border. It's an interesting idea, given that sowing chaos on their borders is precisely what both countries have been doing in Iraq, and elsewhere, for years.

But the larger question isn't whether Iran and Syria will cooperate in the "New Diplomatic Initiative" and "International Support Group" grandiosely envisaged by the report. It is what the announced willingness to parley says about America's long-term interests in, and intentions for, the region. The Bush administration overthrew the regime of Saddam Hussein largely as a way of "signaling" that it was no longer prepared to countenance a Middle East of terrorism-sponsoring regimes. Now the ISG announces that not only is the U.S. prepared to deal with those regimes, but that it will do the bidding of one of them, Syria, by again putting maximum pressure on Israel to abandon the Golan Heights. In this, at least, it does so on the plausible theory that unlike Iraq's Shiites our Israeli friends cannot betray us because they have nowhere else to turn.

All this can variously be described as wishful or foolish or wrong, and President Bush seems to have received it with a beady eye. With luck, it will find its place on the shelf between Kofi Annan's plan for U.N. reform and Robert Pozen's Social Security reform proposals.

What matters more than the fate of the ISG report, however, are the political symptoms it betrays. The report is surely right that there is "no magic formula to solve the problems of Iraq." Yet if the U.S. faces a terror problem today, it is not because it is an obnoxious hyperpower or a rapacious globalizer, but because of the deep suspicion that it is not too ashamed to betray its friends or cut a deal with its enemies -- in short, that it lacks a sense of honor. In this sense, the Iraq Study Group has already inflicted its damage, no matter where it goes from here.

Bush Can't Keep Giving Foes Silent Treatment (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, December 12, 2006

Shortly before the Iraq Study Group called for direct talks between the Bush administration and the governments of Syria and Iran, Cuba extended an olive branch to the White House.

"We take this opportunity to once again state that we are willing to resolve at the negotiating table the long-standing dispute between the United States and Cuba," acting President Raul Castro said. It was an offer that José Miguel Insulza, secretary general of the Organization of American States, urged President Bush to accept.

But instead of treating the Cuban call for dialogue as a diplomatic breakthrough, the Bush administration saw it as an outrage.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said there will be no talks with the younger Castro, who became the island's acting president when his brother, long-time Cuban leader Fidel Castro, fell ill. The Bush administration doesn't want to talk to a "dictator-in-waiting," McCormack said.

Refusing to hold direct talks with its most troubling adversaries is a defining principle of Bush's foreign policy. It is one that might make his administration the most impolitic since this country took a commanding position on the world stage — and the most dangerous.

Less than a week after the State Department rebuffed Raul Castro's overture, Bush appeared to reject the Iraq Study Group's call for unconditional talks with Iran and Syria to help end the fighting in Iraq. That won't happen, he said during a news conference, unless Iran agrees to "verifiably" suspend its nuclear enrichment program and Syria stops "destabilizing" Lebanon's government.

"I hope he doesn't mean that. I hope he's just posturing," says Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., who chairs the 73-member "Out of Iraq" congressional caucus.

"These are not little people that you can just stare at and frighten," Waters says of the leaders of North Korea, Iran, Syria and Cuba. "That's not the world we live in anymore."

DOJ_NMG_0105504

No, but it is the diplomatic world in which the Bush administration is stuck. The president doesn't seem to understand that it is not hawkish intransigence but steady diplomacy that has the best chance of keeping this nation out of shooting wars — or decades of political trench warfare, as is the case with Cuba.

Bush's characterization of North Korea, Iran and Iraq as an "axis of evil" — and the war he subsequently launched to topple Saddam Hussein — probably pushed Kim Jong Il's government to launch its first test of a nuclear weapon earlier this year. Since 2003, the Bush administration has taken part in six-party talks (with North Korea, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea) to reduce tensions on the Korean Peninsula. The next session is Saturday.

But those on-again, off-again talks are a poor substitute for the kind of focused discussions needed to normalize relations between the United States and North Korea, and broker a long-overdue peace treaty to replace the armistice that ended the Korean War.

"It's a stupid foreign policy," says Dennis Jett, dean of the University of Florida International Center. "The president is trapped by his own rhetoric when he goes around painting people as evil. It's not to say that they are nice people, but it isn't productive not to talk to them."

Jett is not surprised Syria, North Korea, Iran and Cuba have rejected the preconditions that Bush demands in return for bilateral talks. "He's effectively saying to them, 'If you capitulate, then we'll talk about negotiating the details of your capitulation,' " says Jett, a former career diplomat and ambassador to Peru and Mozambique.

That kind of gunboat diplomacy won't work. With two years left in his presidency, Bush still has time to open a meaningful dialogue with the leaders of the nations he has refused to talk to. He still has time to realize that talking directly to his adversaries is a sign of strength — not weakness.

DeWayne Wickham writes weekly for USA TODAY.

Time To Offshore Our Troops (NYT)

By Eugene Gholz, Daryl G. Press And Benjamin Valentino

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

THE Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the United States withdraw its combat forces from Iraq reflects a growing national consensus that our military cannot quell the violence there and may even be making matters worse. Although many are hailing this recommendation as a bold new course, it is not bold enough. America will best serve its interests in the Persian Gulf by withdrawing its ground-based military forces not only from Iraq, but from the entire region.

Critics of the report continue to debate the wisdom and details of a drawdown in Iraq, but there has been no debate about America's broader strategy in the gulf. Policymakers and analysts from across the political spectrum assume that the United States must maintain a robust military presence there.

The bipartisan authors of the report, for example, advocate maintaining "a considerable military presence in the region" including "powerful air, ground and naval deployments in Kuwait, Bahrain and Qatar" even after the last American combat troops leave Iraq. Others — including Donald Rumsfeld and Hillary Clinton — go further and consider strengthening our forces around the gulf by shifting some troops from Iraq to neighboring countries.

Maintaining a large military presence in the region has been the cornerstone of American policy since the 1991 Persian Gulf war, and remains so today. With the Iraq war, we now have tens of thousands of troops elsewhere in the neighborhood.

But this strategy is flawed. In fact, many of the same considerations that led the Iraq Study Group to call for withdrawal of combat forces from Iraq suggest that the United States should withdraw its troops from neighboring states as well — leaving only naval forces offshore in international waters. As in Iraq, a large United States military footprint on the ground undermines American interests more than it protects them.

Just as our troops on Iraqi streets have provided a rallying point for the insurgency, the United States military presence throughout the region has been a key element in Al Qaeda's recruitment campaign and propaganda. If America withdrew from Iraq but left behind substantial forces in neighboring states, Al Qaeda would refocus its attacks on American troops in those countries — remember the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia?

DOJ_NMG_0105505

Worse, the continued presence of our military personnel across the region will continue to incite extremists to attack American cities. Osama bin Ladin repeatedly stated that the presence of American forces on the holy ground of the Arabian Peninsula was a primary reason for 9/11.

Our presence also destabilizes our important regional allies. Not only do American bases make these countries a target for terrorists, but many of their citizens bristle at the sight of United States bases on their soil. Indeed, the most serious near-term threat to our energy interests is the overthrow of friendly governments by domestic Islamic extremists, a danger that is increased by the presence of our troops.

The good news is that the United States does not need to station military forces on the ground in Persian Gulf countries to protect its allies or to secure its vital oil interests. For nearly 30 years, Pentagon planners have focused on two principal threats in the gulf: the conquest of major oil reserves (by the Soviet Union or a regional power like Iraq or Iran) and interference with shipping through Persian Gulf waters, particularly through the Strait of Hormuz. Forces stationed "over the horizon" — afloat in the Indian Ocean and at bases outside the Middle East — can address both threats.

By maintaining a strong naval presence in the Indian Ocean, along with some naval forces in the international waters of the Persian Gulf itself, the United States would be able to thwart an invasion of any gulf oil producer. Long-range American aircraft stationed at Diego Garcia, an island in the Indian Ocean, could contribute as well. Should more substantial threats arise, those air and naval forces would buy time for ground forces and land-based aircraft to return to bases in the region.

This is the same strategy that the United States used to defend the Persian Gulf during the later years of the cold war. It would be even more effective now. Today's adversaries have considerably less offensive military power than 15 years ago: the Soviet Union is gone; two wars with the United States have destroyed Iraq's offensive capacity; and Iran's poorly trained and ill-equippedground forces have grown even more obsolete.

While the threats have withered, new technology has vastly increased American military capabilities. Today, aircraft carrier strike groups can carry hundreds of precision land-attack cruise missiles in addition to their complement of aircraft (which also drop precision weapons). And long-range Air Force bombers are now far more lethal against ground targets, particularly targets advancing across highways and open desert.

Yes, there are limits to our military might. America's vast firepower is ill suited for policing the streets of Baghdad, or forcing Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to get along in Iraq. But our modern weapons could easily halt an Iraqi or Iranian invasion in its tracks.

Protecting the flow of oil through narrow shipping lanes in the gulf is a more difficult mission. But responding to Iranian mines or cruise-missile attacks on oil tankers would not require ground forces or land-based aircraft to be stationed in the Persian Gulf during peacetime. In fact, in a war in the Strait of Hormuz, American operations would be carried out largely by submarines, surface ships and naval aircraft — all of which could be stationed in the Indian Ocean during peacetime.

There are, of course, other threats to American interests in the region. Terrorists could damage key oil fields and ports, or friendly governments in the gulf could be toppled by anti-American extremists. These concerns, however, do not justify peacetime forward deployment. United States allies play the primary role defending their own oil fields and safeguarding their internal security, and their forces are better suited for the job. If anything, the presence of "infidel" soldiers nearby increases the likelihood of terrorist attacks and political upheaval.

This does not mean the United States can withdraw all its military power from the region tomorrow. As the Iraq Study Group persuasively argued, forces will be needed in Iraq during a transition to train Iraqi troops, to guard against threats to topple the government in Baghdad, and to strike at any newly discovered Al Qaeda threats. But these missions can be conducted from a small number of temporary Iraqi bases in remote parts of the country, where the American soldiers would be less visible and less vulnerable.

The Iraq war is now a painful failure for the United States. One silver lining brightens that gray backdrop. The Iraq debacle creates an opportunity to reassess longstanding policies that would otherwise be too difficult to change and prompts us to rethink the premises of United States military policy toward the Persian Gulf region. The best way to increase our security and the stability of that troubled region is, paradoxically, to drastically reduce our military presence there.

Washington Looks To 'Blame Iraqis And Run' (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0105506

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, December 12, 2006

As George W. Bush agonises over which bits of last week's Baker-Hamilton re-port to adopt for his forthcoming "new way forward in Iraq" announcement, an-other consensus is emerging in Washington on how to handle the situation: blame the Iraqis.

Although informed observers say that the writ of the Iraqi government stops at the perimeter of the Green Zone - the heavily fortified enclave in the centre of Baghdad - leading Republican and Democratic politicians in the US are increasingly blaming the friable coalition government of Nouri al-Maliki, Iraqi prime minister, for a lack of progress.

It is a consensus that was crystallised last week by the Iraq Study Group, which called on Mr Bush to withhold US assistance from Baghdad unless it made progress on fulfilling a long list of US-imposed "milestones". It is also shared by many senior officials in the Bush administration, which had already drawn up an earlier list of milestones for Mr Maliki.

"You could call it 'blame and run' ", said Zbigniew Bzrezinski, a former national security adviser now at the Centre for Strategic and International Studies. "It is based on a pervasive illusion that there is such a thing as an Iraqi government.

"The more we blame it for doing things it cannot do, the more impotent it will become. 'Blame and run' is self-fulfilling."

Strobe Talbott, head of the bipartisan Brookings Institution, agrees. In a speech last week he criticised the view that Baghdad could be pressed to make changes such as disarming the sectarian militias by threatening to withhold military, political or economic aid. The ISG report states that Baghdad must prove that it "deserves" future aid.

"The logic of that pressure tactic - that is, why it should work with the Iraqis - is not clear, since most of them want us out [of Iraq]," said Mr Talbott. "The logic on our own side, however, is very clear indeed: having pre-emptively invaded their country, let's pre-emptively blame them for the mess we've made of it."

The breadth of support for such a line is striking. In a leaked memo last week, Donald Rumsfeld, the outgoing defence secretary, said the Iraqis needed "to pull their socks up".

In a recent speech, Senator Barack Obama, the Democratic presidential hopeful who opposed the Iraq invasion, implied that Baghdad was suffering from welfare dependency. "No more coddling, no more equivocation," he said.

"Our best hope for success is to pressure the Iraqi leadership to finally come to a political agreement between the warring factions that can create some sense of stability in the country and bring this conflict under control."

Likewise, Senator Hillary Clinton, the Democratic frontrunner, said America's credibility was being held hostage by the Iraqi government. "We need to press consistently, privately and publicly the Iraqis to become serious about achieving an in-ternal reconciliation and po--litical solution, and pre-sent real consequences for their failing to do so," she said.

But it is not a view that is widely shared by those with extensive direct experience of Iraq. Among the 10 members of the ISG, only Chuck Robb, a former Democratic senator, travelled outside the Green Zone when the group was in Baghdad last August. Among those who have travelled extensively around the country, there is a fear that blaming Baghdad for lack of progress will reduce its capacity to act even further.

"The more we blame the Iraqis, the less political space Mr Maliki will have to act," said a former senior administration official. "He cannot be seen to be implementing a long shopping list of items out of Washington."

On Sunday, Jalal Talabani, the president of Iraq and normally a moderate pro-western voice, bitterly at-tacked the ISG reportand said its criticisms of Baghdad were "unjust and unfair and contains some dangerous articles which reduce the sovereignty of Iraq and its constitution".

However, the ISG report is broadly in line with American public opinion. A poll conducted by Newsweek after the report's publication showed that 65 per cent of Americans agreed with its call for strict conditions on the disbursement of future aid to Baghdad.

Intelligence Panel's 'Phase Two' To Be Completed Next Year: Rockefeller (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105507

The three unreleased sections of the Senate Intelligence Committee's controversial "Phase Two" report on the Bush administration's use of prewar intelligence are headed for circulation next year, incoming Chairman Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.) told The Hill late last week.

"One does not want to spend all one's time looking back, but the history of all this evolution of the war has to be brought to full accountability," Rockefeller said in a Friday interview.

Democrats have repeatedly protested the lack of progress on the Phase Two investigation, which was split by outgoing Chairman Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) to allow some portions to become public before the midterm elections. Democrats pulled the Senate into a rare closed session in November 2005 to revive the inquiry, which began in 2003 with Phase One's look at the intelligence community and was later expanded.

Rockefeller said much of the work is done on one of the three remaining elements of Phase Two, though he declined to reveal which section was close to completion. Still yet to receive a committee vote are sections dealing with prewar intelligence on the war's aftermath, whether existing intelligence backed up U.S. officials' public comments on Iraq, and the role of a Pentagon office headed by Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith.

Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), who will keep his seat on Intelligence as he takes over as Armed Services chairman next year, said last month that completing Phase Two is a high priority for him, although any new movement "will be a Rockefeller decision."

The two portions of Phase Two already made public compared prewar data on Iraq's weapons capability with inspectors' postwar findings and examined the role of an Iraqi exile group in influencing U.S. intelligence. Roberts could step down from Intelligence when Senate Republican committee assignments are finalized this week.

Annan Blasts U.S. In Farewell (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, December 12, 2006

In a farewell speech on U.S. soil today, retiring United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan delivered a tough critique of President Bush's policies. He accused the administration of trying to secure the United States from terrorism in part by dominating other nations through force, committing what he termed human rights abuses and taking military action without broad international support.

ON DEADLINE: Read the speech, share your thoughts

Though Annan has long been a critic of the war in Iraq and other Bush foreign policies, the speech, delivered at the presidential library of the late Harry Truman in Independence, Mo., was among his toughest and was unusual for a U.N. secretary-general concluding his tenure.

Annan's remarks listed principles for international relations, among them "respect for human rights and the rule of law."

VOTE: Do you agree or disagree with Annan?

These ideas can be advanced only "if America remains true to its principles, including in the struggle against terrorism," Annan said. "When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

In the 61-year history of the U.N., no secretary-general has ended his tenure by criticizing U.S. policies so sharply, said Stanley Meisler, a historian of the United Nations and author of a new biography of Annan.

In his speech, Annan referred to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq. When "military force is used, the world at large will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose … in accordance with broadly accepted norms."

Annan continued that "governments must be accountable for their actions in the international arena, as well as in the domestic one."

The speech contrasted Truman's support for the United Nations with the Bush administration's unilateral actions.

Annan acknowledged terrorism and other global threats but cautions against nations acting alone. "Against such threats as these, no nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others," he said.

Annan leaves office Dec. 31 and will be replaced by former South Korean foreign minister Ban Ki Moon.

DOJ_NMG_0105508

Annan's predecessor, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, developed a personal hostility toward then-U.S. ambassador to the U.N. Madeleine Albright, but saved his anger for a book after he left office, Meisler said.

The United States supported Annan for the job 10 years ago, when it blocked Boutros-Ghali from serving a second five-year term. Annan has worked with the United States on a number of issues, including U.N. reform, said Lee Feinstein, a U.N. expert at the Council on Foreign Relations.

Critics of Annan in Congress, including Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., faulted the Ghana-born, U.S.-educated diplomat for lax management of the $64 billion U.N. oil-for-food program. The 1996-2003 effort was tainted by $1.5 billion in kickbacks to the regime of Saddam Hussein.

"Annan's legacy will be one of missed opportunity and failed leadership," said Coleman, who urged Annan to resign last year.

No Kudos For Bush In Annan's Farewell (AP)

By Margaret Stafford, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan took his criticism of the Bush administration to the nation's heartland Monday, saying America must not sacrifice its democratic ideals while waging war against terrorism.

In the hometown of President Harry Truman, who helped found the United Nations, Annan said "human rights and the rule of law are vital to global security and prosperity."

When the U.S. "appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused," Annan told a packed audience at the Truman Presidential Museum and Library.

Annan also said the U.N. Security Council should be expanded to better reflect today's world.

Annan, an increasingly vocal critic of the war in Iraq, leaves the United Nations on Dec. 31 after 10 years as secretary-general. He chose the Truman museum for his final major speech in part because it is dedicated to a president who was instrumental in the organization's founding.

In response to a question after his remarks, Annan said he was appealing for cooperation and leadership, not criticizing the United States.

"What I am saying here is that when the U.S. works with other countries in a multilateral system, we do extremely well," Annan said.

The U.S. has a special responsibility to the world because it continues to have extraordinary power, he said.

In Washington, the State Department was reserved in its reaction to Annan's remarks.

"There's no secretary general of the United Nations that's going to be in lockstep with the United States or any other country with regard to its policies," spokesman Sean McCormack said. "It's not that person's job."

Annan said last week's report by the Iraq Study Group clarified many issues, but he said the world first needs to find a way to get Iraqis to reconcile with one another.

"We need to be as active on the political front as we are on the military front," he said.

Annan said it was also important to get nearby countries, including Iran and Syria, involved in finding a solution to regional problems.

Annan never mentioned President Bush by name in his speech but drew clear contrasts with the Truman administration.

Truman "believed strongly that henceforth security must be collective and indivisible. That was why, for instance, that he insisted when faced with aggression by North Korea against the South in 1950, on bringing the issue to the United Nations," Annan said.

"Against such threats as these, no nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others," he added.

Annan also called for expanding the Security Council by adding members from parts of the world with less of a voice. He said today's makeup "still reflects the reality of 1945," when the United Nations was founded.

Annan Urges U.S. To Reject Unilateralism (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

DOJ_NMG_0105509

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

Kofi Annan, the departing secretary general of the United Nations, challenged the Bush administration yesterday to shun go-it-alone diplomacy and remain committed to observing human rights as it acts to forestall terrorism.

In a speech delivered at the Truman Presidential Museum and Library in Independence, Mo., billed as his last address to an American audience as secretary general, Mr. Annan said, "You Americans did so much, in the last century, to build an effective multilateral system, with the United Nations at its heart. Do you need it less today, and does it need you less than 60 years ago?"

Mr. Annan did not directly cite the Bush administration, with which he has had a fraught relationship, but he made his rebuke of current American foreign policy clear by urging a return to "far-sighted American leadership, in the Truman tradition."

President Harry S. Truman was instrumental in creating the United Nations after the death of President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1945.

Mr. Annan noted that the United States was "in the vanguard of the global human rights movement," but said "that lead can only be maintained if America remains true to its principles, including in the struggle against terrorism."

"When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives," he added, "its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

Mr. Annan will step down Dec. 31 after completing his second five-year term, to be succeeded by Ban Ki-moon of South Korea.

Mr. Annan has often been at odds with the Bush administration, particularly since the United States invaded Iraq in 2003 without obtaining a go-ahead from the United Nations.

Having infuriated the Bush administration two years ago by labeling the Iraq war "illegal," he said that while observing international law could be "inconvenient," it was essential.

In a clear reference to the lack of international support for the American action in Iraq, he said: "No state can make its own actions legitimate in the eyes of others. When power, especially military force, is used, the world will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose — for broadly shared aims — in accordance with broadly accepted norms."

He said the United States was a model democracy "in which everyone, including the most powerful, is subject to legal restraint."

"Its current moment of world supremacy gives it a priceless opportunity to entrench the same principles at the global level," he continued.

He reminded his audience that Mr. Truman had once said, "We all have to recognize, no matter how great our strength, that we must deny ourselves the license to do always as we please."

Mr. Annan also cited President Truman's statement that "the responsibility of great states is to serve and not dominate the peoples of the world," and noted approvingly how Mr. Truman had used American power to face down a threat to international order during his administration.

"He believed strongly that henceforth security must be collective and indivisible," Mr. Annan said. "That was why, for instance, that he insisted, when faced with aggression by North Korea against the South in 1950, on bringing the issue to the United Nations and placing U.S. troops under the U.N. flag, at the head of a multinational force."

The Bush administration had a subdued reaction to the speech. "We work well with Secretary General Annan on a number of different issues," said Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman. "There are some issues on which we disagree. That is to be expected."

Mr. Annan paid his final visit to Washington as secretary general last Tuesday when President Bush gave a dinner in his honor at the White House. One of the guests was John R. Bolton, the American ambassador who had frequently criticized the secretary general and who had announced the day before that he was resigning.

Asked the next morning at the United Nations whether he and Mr. Annan had made peace at the farewell event, Mr. Bolton said, "Nobody sang 'Kumbaya.' " The reference was to a song celebrating fellowship.

Told of Mr. Bolton's comment, Mr. Annan said, "But does he know how to sing it?"

DOJ_NMG_0105510

ANNAN URGES AMERICA TO USE POWER WISELY (KCS)

By Brian Burnes

The Kansas City Star, December 12, 2006

U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan challenged the United States to exercise international leadership much as it did when Harry Truman helped establish the United Nations following World War II.

In his farewell address on Monday in front of about 200 invited guests and reporters at the Truman Museum in Independence, Annan emphasized the U.N.'s importance, saying that "more than ever today, Americans, like the rest of humanity, need a functioning global system through which the world's peoples can face global challenges together.

"And, in order to function, the system still cries out for farsighted American leadership in the Truman tradition," he said. It was one of a dozen references to the 33rd president, including quoting Truman's belief that "the responsibility of the great states is to serve and not dominate the peoples of the world."

Annan's visit was his opportunity to reflect on a litany of challenges he and the U.N. faced during the 10 years of his leadership, which is to conclude at the end of the month. It was also a chance for Annan to restate key principles he believes must guide new leaders of the world body.

The United States shoulders a unique role in global affairs as the world's lone superpower, he said.

The future success of the United Nations depends on America's appropriate use of that power, he said, along with the organization's adherence to five core principles: shared responsibility, global prosperity, rule of law, mutual accountability and multilateralism.

He did not specifically address the war in Iraq, a topic that both U.S. Reps. Dennis Moore and Emanuel Cleaver pursued afterward in a question-and-answer session. Previously Annan has called the war illegal.

In reference to the recent report by the Iraq Study Group, Annan supported including Syria and Iran as possible players in future diplomatic efforts, saying both nations "should be made part of the solution."

"I was very pleased to hear that was something that he thought was not only appropriate but necessary," Cleaver said later. "That fits with the attitudes of many members of Congress, both Republican and Democrat."

In his speech, Annan said the United States had historically been in "the vanguard of the global human-rights movement." However, he added, "that lead can only be maintained if America remains true to its principles, including in the struggle against terrorism.

"When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused."

Annan disagreed with CNN correspondent Zain Verjee, who led off the question-and-answer session by suggesting that the speech represented an attack on American policies, as did some other broadcast and newspaper reports.

"Nothing could be further than the truth," Annan said, prompting applause.

Before the speech, John Ruggie, special representative of the secretary-general, characterized such descriptions of Annan's remarks as "considerable exaggeration." Advance copies of the speech were made available to some officials and news organizations.

"I think the secretary-general, being here at the Truman Library, wanted to refer back to the long tradition in American foreign policy of engagement with the world and engagement with the United Nations," he added. "In a sense, it was a tribute to Truman as much as it was anything else."

During a reception later in the museum's east lobby, some thought Annan's remarks represented subtle criticism.

"The speech implied that he was disappointed in American foreign policy," said Bryan Luttrell, a graduate student at the University of Kansas

But Bill Nelson, chairman of the George K. Baum asset-management group and chairman of the Truman Library Institute's board, heard the speech as an exhortation.

"Unlike some representations in the media, his speech was not an attack on the United States, but a challenge to us to re-engage with the rest of the world, particularly those parts of the world that disagree with us," Nelson said.

Cleaver thought he discerned a disconnect between the national media's portrayal of the speech and the way it was heard in the Truman Museum auditorium.

DOJ_NMG_0105511

"About 95 percent of the audience agreed with the secretary-general that there was nothing related to an attack in his words," said Cleaver.

In Washington, The Associated Press quoted a State Department spokesman as saying Annan "is entitled to his opinion.

"There's no secretary-general of the United Nations that's going to be in lockstep with the United States or any other country with regard to its policies," said Sean McCormack, the department spokesman. "It's not that person's job."

Ultimately, Annan's presence in Independence was a compliment to Truman's foresight, said Chris Elmore, faculty member and coordinator of Rockhurst High School's student United Nations program.

"I kept thinking of Winston Churchill coming to Westminster" College, said Elmore, referring to the 1946 "Iron Curtain" speech delivered by the former British prime minister in Fulton, Mo. "Annan was subtly reminding us of our own history."

Other portions of Annan's address resonated with audience members.

"I did appreciate how he included the concept of multilateralism," added Madhu Singh, a law student at the University of Kansas. Annan urged vigilance to the virtues of multilateralism, in which the weakest countries can add their voices to those of the strong, he said.

Another audience member listened for comments regarding reform of the U.N.'s most powerful body, the 15-member Security Council. Its membership, Annan said, "reflects the reality of 1945, not of today's world."

Kaori Wakabayashi, a Japanese student at Johnson County Community College, was pleased to hear that. Japan is not a current member of the Security Council.

"We lost in World War II, but we have contributed so much to the world since," she said.

Like Wakabayashi, Annan studied in the U.S. as a foreign student. In 1961 he graduated from Macalester College in St. Paul, Minn.; he is a native of Ghana.

Annan arrived at the Truman Museum about 10:45 a.m. After his speech, he walked to the library's research room, where he met board members of the library institute, the facility's nonprofit support group. From there, he went to the reception in the east lobby, standing for photographs in front of the oversized table on which the U.N. charter was signed in 1945.

He later sat down with Mike Wallace of CBS News, whose interview is scheduled to be broadcast Sunday, possibly as part of "60 Minutes."

The secretary-general left the museum about 3:45 p.m.

By early afternoon, about 15 protesters remained standing behind yellow police tape in an open field west of the Truman Museum. Although they shared the space, they did not share the same sentiments.

Some thought the United Nations not worthy of its headquarters in New York. "If there is no U.S., there would be no U.N.," said Jay Beyerink.

"The U.N. is no longer taking care of business, like the people in Darfur," he added.

Phil Lindsey of Independence, however, showed support for Annan.

"… I'm here to let Mr. Annan know that we appreciate him and that this is a fine place for him to end his career," he said.

ANNAN ON TRUMAN:

•"Truman's name will forever be associated with the memory of farsighted American leadership in a great global endeavor."

•"As Harry Truman said, 'We all have to recognize, no matter how great our strength, that we must deny ourselves the license to do always as we please.' "

United Nations Faltered Under Annan's Shortcomings (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, December 12, 2006

The farewell address of outgoing U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan was a plea for shared global values and multilateralism — sentiments with which few would quibble. Agreed: The world needs an effective world body to mitigate problems and negotiate disputes.

Annan's address drew welcome international attention to the Truman Presidential Museum and Library where it was delivered. Annan chose the library in Independence because of Truman's major role in the founding of the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0105512

President Bush was never mentioned in the secretary-general's text, but Truman was praised frequently for his far-sighted leadership and his attention to international concerns.

Yet Annan's address betrayed little recognition that on his watch, the U.N.'s stature sank.

In the face of major challenges such as terrorism, genocide in Sudan and the threat of nuclear-weapons development in Iran, Annan has been weak and inept. On his watch, even the U.N.'s own employee union adopted a resolution of no confidence in senior management.

He should have resigned for the management failures that allowed the massive oil-for-food scandal, by which Saddam Hussein corrupted a program aimed at providing Iraqis with food and medicine.

Annan mentioned perhaps the U.N.'s finest moment: When it authorized a military response to North Korea's invasion of the South. Yet that action took place only because the Soviet delegate was not present to cast the expected veto.

Russia remains a problem today as the international community tries to address concerns like dangerous Iranian weapons programs. China, France and other prominent members of the United Nations also routinely undermine effective international action.

So it was a bit jarring to hear Annan once again focus on U.S. faults. He said that when the United States "appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused." Answering questions later, he denied he was criticizing Washington, but the message was clear enough.

Annan leaves office Dec. 31 with the institution he served more tarnished than when he took the job. For the good of the U.N., it is to be hoped his successor, Ban Ki-moon of South Korea, enjoys far greater success.

Annan Bows Out Of UN With Attack On Bush (TG)

By Suzanne Goldenberg

Guardian, December 12, 2006

Kofi Annan yesterday used his final speech as the United Nations secretary general to deliver a parting shot at the Bush administration, accusing the US of committing human rights abuses in the name of fighting terror.

After three years of increasingly vocal opposition to the war on Iraq, Mr Annan's speech yesterday amounted to a broad condemnation of the neoconservative ideology guiding America's foreign policy under George Bush - a clear break with protocol for a departing UN chief.

Article continues

In his most explicit rebuke, Mr Annan said America had sacrificed its global leadership on human rights because of its methods in the war on terror. "When it appears to abandon its own ideals and objectives, its friends abroad are naturally troubled and confused," Mr Annan said, according to a prepared text of his remarks released by the UN.

The broadside is merely the latest sign of Mr Annan's anger at the administration since US forces invaded Iraq in March 2003 without the approval of the security council. Earlier this month, he upset the White House by saying that many Iraqis believe they were better off under Saddam Hussein, and he has said he does not believe the country can rebuild on its own.

Mr Annan has also had an antagonistic relationship with the US ambassador, John Bolton, who has been a vociferous promoter of the idea that Washington should use the UN mainly to promote its national interests. Mr Bolton is also leaving his post, expecting that he would not be confirmed by a Democratic Congress.

Mr Annan hands over to the South Korean diplomat Ban Ki-moon on December 31 after 10 years at the UN, and his speech was a sermon on the importance of multilateral institutions. He offered his critique in the guise of a primer on international affairs, speaking on global responsibility, the rule of law, and mutual accountability for rich and poor nations.

The Mr Annan's speech was delivered during a visit at the Harry Truman presidential library in Independence, Missouri.

"When power, especially military force, is used, the world will consider it legitimate only when convinced that it is being used for the right purpose - for broadly shared aims in accordance with broadly accepted norms," Mr Annan said.

He said the security council was not a platform to act out national interests, but a management system for the world community, and said it was folly to believe security rested solely on military strength. "No nation can make itself secure by seeking supremacy over all others." He also called for expansion of the security council - which Washington opposes.

DOJ_NMG_0105513

It is unlikely that Mr Bush will take kindly to the advice. Although Mr Annan was given a farewell dinner at the White House last week, Mr Bolton told reporters that "nobody sang 'Kumbaya'".

Iraqis Consider Ways To Reduce Power Of Cleric (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 11 — After discussions with the Bush administration, several of Iraq's major political parties are in talks to form a coalition whose aim is to break the powerful influence of the radical Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr within the government, senior Iraqi officials say.

The talks are taking place among the two main Kurdish groups, the most influential Sunni Arab party and an Iranian-backed Shiite party that has long sought to lead the government. They have invited Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to join them. But Mr. Maliki, a conservative Shiite who has close ties to Mr. Sadr, has held back for fear that the parties might be seeking to oust him, a Shiite legislator close to Mr. Maliki said.

Officials involved in the talks say their aim is not to undermine Mr. Maliki, but to isolate Mr. Sadr as well as firebrand Sunni Arab politicians inside the government. Mr. Sadr controls a militia with an estimated 60,000 fighters that has rebelled twice against the American military and is accused of widening the sectarian war with reprisal killings of Sunni Arabs.

The Americans, frustrated with Mr. Maliki's political dependence on Mr. Sadr, appear to be working hard to help build the new coalition. President Bush met last week in the White House with Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the leader of the Iranian-backed Shiite party, and is to meet on Tuesday with Tariq al-Hashemi, leader of the Sunni Arab party. In late November, Mr. Bush and his top aides met with leaders from Sunni countries in the Middle East to urge them to press moderate Sunni Arab Iraqis to support Mr. Maliki.

The White House visits by Mr. Hakim and Mr. Hashemi are directly related to their effort to form a new alliance, a senior Iraqi official said.

Last month, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, wrote in a classified memo that the Americans should press Sunni Arab and Shiite leaders, especially Mr. Hakim, to support Mr. Maliki if he sought to build "an alternative political base." The memo noted that Americans could provide "monetary support to moderate groups."

Iraqi officials involved in the talks said they had conceived of the coalition themselves after growing frustrated with militant politicians.

"A number of key political parties, across the sectarian-ethnic divide, recognize the gravity of the situation and have become increasingly aware that their fate, and that of the country, cannot be held hostage by the whims of the extreme fringe within their communities," said Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister and senior member of one of the major Kurdish parties.

Mr. Sadr's relationship with Mr. Maliki has shown signs of strain. On Nov. 30, Mr. Sadr withdrew his 30 loyalists in Parliament and 6 cabinet ministers from the government. Mr. Maliki called for them to return, but they said they would do so only if Mr. Maliki and the Americans set a timetable for the withdrawal of American troops. Mr. Sadr reiterated the demand with a fiery message on Sunday.

Any plan to form a political alliance across sectarian lines that isolates Mr. Sadr and Sunni Arab extremists carries enormous risks. American and Iraqi officials have worked to try to persuade Mr. Sadr to use political power instead of force of arms to effect change. Though it is unclear whether Mr. Sadr has total control over his militia, if he thinks he is being marginalized within the government, he could ignite another rebellion like the two he led in 2004.

Some senior American commanders say that the efforts to make peace with Mr. Sadr through politics may have failed, and that a military assault on Sadr strongholds may be inevitable.

Falah Shanshal, a legislator aligned with Mr. Sadr, on Monday denounced the idea of a new coalition. "We're against any new bloc, new front or new alliance," he said. "We have to make unity between us, to be one front against terrorism and to liberate the country from the occupation."

Iraqi officials say that the other main risk is a potential backlash against the parties involved in the talks from other leaders in their own ethnic or sectarian populations.

DOJ_NMG_0105514

For Mr. Hakim and Mr. Maliki, any bid to join Sunni Arabs in an alliance against Mr. Sadr could invoke the wrath of Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the most powerful Shiite cleric in Iraq. Since the toppling of Saddam Hussein, the ayatollah has worked hard to bring various feuding Shiite factions into one greater Shiite coalition to rule Iraq. That coalition, including Mr. Sadr's allies, is the dominant bloc in the 275-member Parliament.

Mr. Hashemi, the Sunni Arab leader, risks alienating other members of the main Sunni bloc in Parliament. Sunni Arab insurgents could also decide to step up violence against Mr. Hashemi and his Iraqi Islamic Party. Three of Mr. Hashemi's siblings have already been killed.

Sunni Arab politicians not involved in the talks said they were furious at the proposed alliance.

Because of those risks, Iraqi officials are still debating whether to try to create the alliance within Parliament or to do so outside Parliament, so that the existing coalitions would be preserved in name. An alliance formed outside Parliament might work with Mr. Maliki's cabinet to make policy and bypass the legislature on important decisions.

"There's no changing of blocs in the Parliament," said Sheik Jalaladin al-Saghir, a senior Shiite legislator and cleric who is one of Mr. Hakim's deputies. "We're talking about political forces rallying in the street to support the political process."

The parties involved in the talks fall short of being able to muster a two-thirds vote in Parliament to oust Mr. Maliki and install a new government, as required by the Constitution. If they pulled in other groups, like the centrist secular party headed by Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister, they might be able to get the required votes — a possibility, since they describe themselves as moderates.

If the parties move to replace Mr. Maliki as prime minister, one possible candidate would be Mr. Hakim's deputy, Adel Abdul Mehdi, who was favored by the White House last spring to take the top job. He lost out when Mr. Sadr, whose family has long feuded with Mr. Hakim's, threw his support behind Mr. Maliki's group, the Islamic Dawa Party, in a vote within the Shiite coalition.

The parties trying to form the new alliance approached Mr. Maliki a couple of days ago to ask him to join them, said the Shiite legislator who is close to the prime minister. Senior officials in the Islamic Dawa Party balked, saying that such a move would break the Shiite coalition, anger Ayatollah Sistani and possibly pave the way for Mr. Hakim to push Mr. Maliki from his job in favor of Mr. Abdul Mehdi.

"Everyone knows Hakim wants Adel to be prime minister; it's no secret," said the legislator, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss Mr. Maliki's deliberations. "Saying you want to pull Maliki away from the extremists might just be a beautiful cover for the real goal of dropping him."

The political jockeying unfolded as violence continued in Iraq. The country's largest oil refinery, in the town of Bayji, remained shut because of insurgent threats to workers. At least 46 bodies were discovered Monday across Baghdad, an Interior Ministry official said. At least eight Iraqis were killed and more than a dozen wounded in other violent incidents. The American military announced that three soldiers had been killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad on Sunday.

Also in the capital, 20 gunmen wearing Iraqi Army uniforms robbed a bank truck carrying the equivalent of $1 million.

To Stem Iraqi Violence, U.S. Aims To Create Jobs (WP)

By Josh White And Griff Witte

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

As Iraq descends further into violence and disarray, the Pentagon is turning to a weapon some believe should have been used years ago: jobs.

Members of a small Pentagon task force have gone to the most dangerous areas of Iraq over the past six months to bring life to nearly 200 state-owned factories abandoned by the Coalition Provisional Authority after the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Their goal is to employ tens of thousands of Iraqis in coming months, part of a plan to reduce soaring unemployment and lessen the violence that has crippled progress.

Defense officials and military commanders say that festering unemployment -- at 70 percent in some areas -- is leading Iraqi men to take cash from insurgents to place bombs on roads or take shots at U.S. troops. Other Iraqis are joining sectarian attacks because their quality of life has slipped dramatically, officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0105515

Army Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the top U.S. field commander in Iraq, said that tackling unemployment could do far more good than adding U.S. combat troops or more aggressively pursuing an elusive enemy. He said the project to open the factories and stimulate local economies is long overdue and was born "of desperation."

"We need to put the angry young men to work," Chiarelli said in a phone interview from Baghdad. "One of the key hindrances to us establishing stability in Iraq is the failure to get the economy going. A relatively small decrease in unemployment would have a very serious effect on the level of sectarian killing going on."

The CPA initially hoped private investors would buy or lease the state factories, but that did not happen as security faltered and much of Iraq became inaccessible. As privatization hopes failed, the factories languished; some were in pristine form and others had been looted when the Pentagon task force examined them this fall. The tens of thousands of Iraqis who used to make them run -- the country's second-largest employment group, after the army -- remained out of work.

Pentagon officials say the vast majority of former Iraqi factory workers are still unemployed and are bringing in no pay. A small portion of the workforce receives government stipends, akin to welfare, but the pay system is badly flawed and provides about 20 percent of what the workers would make if fully employed, the officials said.

Economic development is a departure from the military's usual missions, but officials think the Defense Department's heft as a consumer of goods and services can boost the effort. The department has been reaching out to U.S. companies that can place large orders for products from Iraq.

Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England set the task force in motion in June after Paul A. Brinkley, deputy undersecretary of defense, returned from a visit to Iraq the month before.

Brinkley, who returned last night from a trip to Iraq with his team, said thousands of Iraqis lost their jobs and the ability to support their families when CPA projections dimmed. Unrest followed the absence of work.

"After three years of unemployment in excess of 50 percent, there are no people in the world that wouldn't be undergoing violence and militias," Brinkley said. "That's human nature. And I think we have to do whatever we have to do to alleviate that problem if we are going to create stability."

So far, members of the task force have visited 26 factories in some of the worst areas of the country, traveling to Baghdad, Fallujah, Mosul, Najaf and Ramadi to inspect facilities that make cement, tile, rubber and textiles. They have identified 10 factories -- their "hot list" of facilities in both Sunni and Shiite areas -- that they think could be open and employing more than 11,000 Iraqis within the next month.

The task force hopes to have a rolling system of factory openings spanning 2007. Part of that effort, its members said, is to reevaluate how the Defense Department spends nearly $4 billion each year to support troops in Iraq.

Brinkley said he hopes that at least 25 percent of that total -- about $1 billion -- could be spent on orders from Iraqi companies that previously have gone to firms in neighboring countries, such as Jordan and Kuwait. "We're not seeking to invest in Iraq, but to buy from Iraq," Brinkley said.

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., the special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, whose office has been critical of the rebuilding effort, said that defense officials are "right on target in pushing this."

"It's about stimulating interest and getting contracts going between U.S. firms and Iraqi firms. That's the goal," he said. "The solution in Iraq is not primarily a military one. It is primarily an economic and political solution."

Bowen said defense officials recently met with about two dozen key business leaders at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to gauge private industry's interest in the program. He acknowledged that corruption and lack of security remain major obstacles to U.S. commercial investment in Iraq but said he is impressed that business leaders "recognize that and are still interested in moving forward."

Caterpillar Inc., a $36 billion construction equipment firm, is one of the first U.S. companies to show interest. Gerald L. Shaheen, a Caterpillar group president and chairman of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, said he probably would be looking for low-tech supplies, such as hinges, but said the program dovetails with the company's interest in expanding opportunities in the Middle East.

"But I can't look at this solely as a business proposition. I've already got suppliers," Shaheen said. "I'm doing this because I think there's a social responsibility not only to the Iraqi people but to our troops."

DOJ_NMG_0105516

Dow Chemical Co., a $46 billion firm that sells plastics and other products in more than 175 countries, is also considering what supplies it can purchase from Iraq.

"We see this as a positive initiative and very much hope that we can find the appropriate opportunities to support business activity in the country," a Dow spokesman said.

U.S. businesses were looking at Iraq as a significant opportunity before the war began. With vast oil resources, an underserved population and a strategic location, that nation had all the markings of a place for U.S firms to expand. But few have found success there.

Major American companies that went into Iraq on U.S. government contracts, including Bechtel, Parsons and Halliburton subsidiary KBR, had hoped reconstruction work would serve as a natural bridge to private-sector deals in Iraq. Instead, they found rampant violence, with many U.S.-funded projects coming under attack and workers being targeted. The firms also received bad publicity when projects did not go as planned.

Now, with their contracts expiring, Parsons and Bechtel are closing up shop in Iraq and returning home. KBR is doing the same with its reconstruction work, though it continues to hold a major contract supporting the U.S. Army.

"We're pleading with the companies to give Iraq a second or third look," said retired Lt. Gen. Daniel Christman, senior vice president for international affairs at the Chamber of Commerce. "This is very different from asking that they go into Fallujah and build a plant. That's not the intent."

Rep. William D. Delahunt (D-Mass.), incoming chairman of the oversight and investigations subcommittee of the House International Relations Committee, said part of the CPA "disaster" was that obvious ideas, such as creating employment for Iraqis, were ignored.

"It's a concept that common sense would dictate to pursue," Delahunt said. "I think the key question is: Is it too late?"

Chiarelli said unemployment is daunting because many working Iraqis support up to 13 family members, meaning unemployment has exponential effects on the country.

"There's no doubt in my mind that it has the potential to turn the tide," he said. "I find it unbelievable after four years that we haven't come to that realization. . . . To me, it's huge. It's as important as just about any other part of the campaign plan."

Car Bomb Kills At Least 23 In Baghdad (AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

A suicide car bomb exploded in a main square of central Baghdad on Tuesday morning, killing at least 23 people and wounding 94, police said. The attack occurred in Tayaran Square at 7 a.m. and appeared to target a police patrol and a crowd of Iraqis gathering to apply for jobs as day laborers on construction sites, police Lt. Bilal Ali.

Gunfire could be heard right after the explosion, but it was not immediately clear if it involved police or insurgents involved in a carefully coordinated attack.

The square is located near several government ministries and a bridge that crosses the Tigris River to the heavily fortified Green Zone, where Iraq's parliament and the U.S. and British embassies are located.

Ali said at least 23 people were killed and 94 wounded, including policemen and civilians.

Two Families From Different Sects Meet Similar, Violent Fates In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 11 -- Twenty armed men entered the Subhi family home in southern Kirkuk at dawn Monday, killing a 12-year-old boy, his 13-year-old sister and their pregnant mother, police said.

The al-Jubori family met a similar fate on Sunday when gunmen opened fire on their minibus in Muqdadiyah, northeast of Baghdad. Among the dead were two children, ages 3 and 4, police and two relatives said.

The Subhi family is Shiite. The Jubori family is Sunni.

Both families were warned by their neighbors to leave their homes because they were not of the desired sect, according to police. The Jubori family left. The Subhi family did not.

DOJ_NMG_0105517

In the wake of last month's car bombings in the Shiite stronghold of Sadr City and this past weekend's purging of Sunnis from the Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah, members of both sects say they are gripped by fear.

"We sacrificed everything," said Ghalib Ibrahim, 50, a retired army officer whose sister was one of the Sunnis attacked in Muqdadiyah. "We left the house and we left the town that we lived in all our lives just to stay away from troubles."

"Now since they are after us and they do not and will not leave us alone, now I'm going to look for them and I'm going to hold my gun and get revenge and kill those who killed my family," Ibrahim said.

The Iraqi government on Monday said it had achieved some success in thwarting sectarian violence. Iraqi army soldiers rescued 27 people snatched at a fake checkpoint in the mixed Ghazaliya district of western Baghdad, said Iraqi army Brig. Gen. Abdul Jalil Kalaf. The soldiers surrounded a house in which the kidnappers were hiding out, killed one, injured two and arrested four.

The U.S. military offered more details about the mission, but said 23 Iraqis had been kidnapped and six kidnappers arrested.

A military statement said that Iraqi soldiers followed a suspicious car to a house. A search of the car turned up two kidnapped Iraqis. They found 20 more hostages in the house.

Later on at a checkpoint, the Iraqi soldiers, with the help of American troops, saw suspected insurgents in two vehicles stop a bus and try to abduct its passengers. The soldiers killed one kidnapper in a car, wounded two, and found another hostage in the trunk, the statement said.

Elsewhere, the violence continued. In the mostly Sunni Mansour district in western Baghdad, a car bomb exploded near Mahmoun College Monday afternoon. The explosion killed three people and injured five, according to an Interior Ministry official.

National police patrols found five bodies across the capital, one of them beheaded, the official said.

North of Baghdad, the site of heavy sectarian fighting in October, four teachers at an elementary school in the Sunni district of Yathrib were kidnapped by armed men in two cars, a Balad police captain said. In retaliation, an armed group from the predominantly Shiite city of Balad kidnapped eight farmers. The captain added that tribal sheiks were trying to resolve the problem through negotiations.

In north Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed three U.S. soldiers and wounded two others Sunday as they conducted a late-night combat patrol, the U.S. military said Monday.

In western Anbar province, a Marine CH-53E Super Stallion helicopter assigned to the 3rd Marine Aircraft Wing made an emergency landing about noon while conducting a routine flight, the U.S. military said. Of the 21 people aboard, 18 were injured. Nine of them were treated for minor injuries and returned to duty. The military said the incident did not appear to be the result of enemy action.

The Jubori family lived in the Shiite town of Abu Sayda, northeast of Baqubah in Diyala province. After receiving threats from neighbors, the family decided to flee to Muqdadiyah, on the eastern fringe of the Sunni Triangle, relatives said.

On Monday, 10 members of the extended family loaded their furniture into a minibus for their journey. Five died and five were injured in the attack in Muqdadiyah, said a police lieutenant in Diyala province.

In the Sunni village of Yenja in southern Kirkuk, Abbas Subhi had received a letter last week saying he would be in danger if he did not leave the village, a Kirkuk police official said.

The gunmen killed his wife and two children and wounded two other daughters, but left him alive because they did not see him, the official said.

In a case that seemed less about sectarian violence and more about graft, armed men wearing police uniforms in cars resembling those used by the Interior Ministry intercepted a vehicle belonging to the Central Bank of Iraq and stole $1 million, the Interior Ministry official said.

Special correspondents Naseer Mehdawi and Naseer Nouri in Baghdad and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

In Fallujah, Marines Bring Goodwill, But Trouble Can Follow (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

DOJ_NMG_0105518

The Christian Science Monitor, December 12, 2006

FALLUJAH, IRAQ

While their weapons were ready, this was a mission about charity. The US Marines weren't entering a hospital in downtown Fallujah to root out insurgents, they were going there simply to help.

But any interaction with American forces can prove deadly for Iraqis, and these marines received an uneasy welcome.

Death threats - and increasingly murder - are common against anyone seen to be cooperating with the US. And already, the presence of a Marine observation post, built adjacent to hospital grounds just days before the mission, had cut the number of patients coming to the hospital from 35 a day to just five.

The wariness that greeted this civil affairs unit two weeks ago points to the difficulty faced by US forces as they search for a balance between rebuilding and bringing security to a city where insurgent attacks are on the rise.

"Our being here today, will it cause trouble for you?" asks US Navy Capt. Lee White, there to get a list of any needed medical supplies.

"I am sorry to tell you, yes. I'm so sorry," says Talib al-Janabi, owner of the private hospital. When marines last entered here, a few months back, they had been hit by a roadside bomb not too far away. They broke hospital doors as they searched for suspects and later, Dr. Janabi says, rejected claims for compensation.

"We came here to help," says Marine Capt. Jason Brezler, head of the civil affairs team, sending a translator to check out the damage to assist with a new claim.

"I appreciate your situation, but for them," says Janabi, motioning toward a handful of patients struck silent by the military presence in the lobby. "There are too many kinds of trouble. Threats, and talking.... I'm in a bad situation. I am stuck in a sandwich."

Like most of the 300,000 or more people of Fallujah, who saw their city virtually razed in November 2004 by Marine-led US forces that sealed off the city to hunt down insurgents, the return of militant violence is creating a dangerous dilemma.

In a bid to convince the majority to side with coalition troops - as well as the fledgling local government and Iraqi Army and police units in the city - the US military has committed $200 million through more than 60 reconstruction projects.

This small civil-affairs team is on the sharp end of buying security, of finding those projects, paying the cash, and checking up on the work. The dangerous city has claimed 10 marines' lives in a month from snipers and roadside bombs.

"Reconstruction provides a way of influencing the population, of shaping the battlespace nonkinetically, so you don't have to put bullets down range," says Captain Brezler, a reservist from the Bronx whose usual job is New York firefighter.

In a daily ritual before moving into Fallujah, Brezler pulls from his pocket a thick piece of glass from the World Trade Center buildings, says a quick prayer, and passes it around to every member of the convoy. Rebuilding to build loyalty

Spending the money to rebuild Fallujah can be tricky business for a host of projects that range from a few thousand dollars for school and athletic supplies to complex multimillion-dollar electricity and sewer efforts.

For two years, strategic rebuilding has been complicated by frequent rotation of Marine units. Today, it is made more difficult by increasing violence and insurgent numbers - Iraqi contractors and workers are frequently killed - and a Marine presence that has shrunk to less than 300.

Still, orders since the 2004 offensive - the largest urban assault for the Marine Corps since the Vietnam War - have been to rebuild Fallujah to demonstrate the benefits to Iraqis of backing the coalition over the insurgents.

Col. Lawrence Nicholson spelled out the options of US help the first time he addressed the Fallujah City Council last February. It was a "tough love" speech, he says, that left their "eyes popping."

"We're not going to be here forever, so you have two choices," Colonel Nicholson recalls telling the council. "We can help you rebuild, and jumpstart your businesses. Or you can call us occupiers, and we call you terrorists, and we'll still leave and nothing will be done."

City elders have opted for rebuilding, and cash has flowed as projects and Iraqi contractors have been identified. Civil-affairs units host a weekly reconstruction meeting with engineers and contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0105519

But the challenge is to spread US money in Fallujah to win goodwill in a way that does not further endanger Iraqis willing to help. Several moderate imams have been assassinated after being seen to be working with the Americans; mosques in this Sunni city now are largely run by younger, more radical clerics.

This civil-affairs team still visits the worst parts of Fallujah, with Brezler speaking like a proud father as he does his rounds, checking out everything from a $150,000 project to build a wall around a large cemetery for a local mosque - with an eye toward easing anti-US rhetoric - to a large local clinic, completely rebuilt with $2 million from the US.

The clinic received a setback a few weeks ago when three trucks carrying medical equipment, all paid for by the US military, were attacked. One British and three Iraqi security contractors died.

"As marines pull out of the city, our [civil affairs] ability to move around will be limited," says Brezler, who is on his second Iraq tour. Beside running their own projects, with a $500,000 ceiling, his team from the 4th Civil Affairs Group, attached to the 1st Battalion 24th Marines, keeps an eye on the projects of the US Army Corps of Engineers, contracted out to Iraqis.

But little runs smoothly in Fallujah. Contractors can take off with the cash without paying subcontractors, or they are intimidated into stopping. Quality of work can be poor and delays are chronic. Any interest shown by the Americans can be a death sentence, to the point that, sometimes, marines pretend they are doing a security check on workers as they really check out progress on a project. Risk continues to rise

The agenda for one weekly contractors' meeting hosted by the Marines showed that two drivers of gravel trucks had been killed on Nov. 17. The next day, two brothers - both contractors - were taken from their home by men in a black BMW. As "consistently some of the best contractors" in Fallujah, the notes remarked, "their potential kidnapping or murder would have considerably adverse effects on reconstruction."

Grappling with such pitfalls is daily fare for civil-affairs officers in Fallujah, where the definition of success fluctuates with the violence. Trash cleanup contracts are awarded - three in one week - to clear the roads of garbage, and of easy places to hide bombs.

After a series of lethal blasts in previous weeks, some sections of unpaved roads are scheduled for repaving to once again minimize the risk to US and Iraqi forces of roadside bombs.

More unconventional steps are taken as well. Hoping to meet the imam of one mosque, where the cemetery wall was built, Brezler disarms, leaving his assault rifle and pistol with a marine translator at the gate. The imam is not there, so he meets the mosque manager.

He seems unaware that the Marines paid the contractor to build the cemetery wall and do tile work inside the mosque. He is grateful to learn the source of the money, but asks that the Americans limit their help to paying for projects and not giving cash.

"It's a very good project; all the people came out to help," says Haji Mohamed, at the mosque. But when asked who had paid, he said some "contractor from Baghdad."

"We wanted to put an Iraqi face on it, so the contractors could work free of intimidation," Brezler spells out.

"The imam is afraid to tell you everything," admits the mosque manager, about the likely dangers that stem even from this short visit. "I'm sure a lot of people are watching us and when they see you leave will come and ask what the Americans wanted here."

"Even if we can keep these people neutral, that's good enough for me," Brezler explains later. "If Friday prayers are not anti-coalition, then there will be greater tolerance, which helps us further secure the city." Rewarding bad behavior?

Despite the problems, the US continues to pump reconstruction funds into Fallujah. Congress approved funding in October for the next year for commanders' discretionary funds.

And after the 2004 invasion, the US State Department earmarked $98 million to rebuild houses and commercial property. So far, 78 percent of that - two disbursements out of three - has been paid. The Iraqi government in 2004 also pledged, and partially paid, tens of millions of dollars for rebuilding.

"We're trying to withdraw our security forces, but continue to inject reconstruction forces," says Lt. Col. Bryan Salas.

But lavishing funds on cities like Fallujah drew criticism from outgoing Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld in a memo dated Nov. 6, two days before his resignation.

DOJ_NMG_0105520

Among new options in Iraq: "Stop rewarding bad behavior, as was done in Fallujah when they pushed in reconstruction funds, and start rewarding good behavior," Mr. Rumsfeld wrote. "No more reconstruction assistance in areas where there is violence."

After the invasion, angry residents returned to a wasteland, their hopes for the future pinned on promises from the US and Iraqi governments of a massive rebuilding effort. Today, many houses have been refurbished. But those freshly painted front walls and newly placed glass panes stand in stark contrast to the many houses and buildings that remain ruins.

And some larger projects may never be completed, officers say, as the Marines begin to withdraw. Finishing steps - such as connecting the sewer mains to houses - may also be beyond the capacity of local officials.

Marines aren't sure yet how much of what they are building will be sustainable, or how much the rising violence will poison their efforts.

"The fact of the matter is: These people are never going to like us. They are never going to want us here," Brezler tells his civil-affairs team, after a long day in Fallujah. "In terms of an embrace, they did that for five minutes in April 2003 [when US forces toppled Saddam Hussein], and that was it."

Report: Taliban Regrouping In Pakistan (AP)

By Matthew Pennington

AP, December 12, 2006

A peace deal between Pakistan's government and Islamic militants in the northwestern tribal region of North Waziristan has created a virtual Taliban mini-state where mullahs dispense justice and fighters are launching cross-border attacks into neighboring Afghanistan, a think tank reported Monday.

The U.S. military confirmed that attacks have risen sharply since the deal was reached earlier this year despite concerns it would give a freer hand to Taliban and al-Qaida-linked militants who fled to Pakistan after the fall of the hard-line regime in Afghanistan in 2001.

"Over the past five years, the (President Gen. Pervez) Musharraf government has tried first brute force, then appeasement. Both have failed," said Samina Ahmed of the International Crisis Group that published the report. "Islamabad's tactics have only emboldened the pro-Taliban militants."

That grim assessment came against the backdrop of an alarming surge in violence in southern and eastern Afghanistan this year that has killed close to 4,000 people, threatening the Western-backed project to rebuild the country and establish democracy.

Government policy has allowed militants "to establish a virtual mini-Taliban-style state," the Crisis Group said, citing reports of pro-Taliban militants attacking music, video and CD stores, closing barber shops, imposing taxes and establishing courts to impose summary justice.

The Pakistani government rejected the Brussels-based group's report as "baseless allegations" and described the violence across the border as Afghanistan's internal problem.

"There are no camps or centers where terrorists are being trained in the tribal areas," said Arbab Mohammed Arif Khan, secretary for law and order in Pakistan's semiautonomous tribal regions.

Pakistan, a key U.S. anti-terror ally, has deployed about 80,000 forces at the Afghan border and launched numerous military operations against al-Qaida-linked militants in the past five years, but with mixed results. In North Waziristan, heavy-handed offensives this year left hundreds dead and stoked local anger and support for pro-Taliban religious leaders.

The peace deal, inked in September after a June cease-fire, capped the fighting in Pakistan. But the Crisis Group reported "increasingly severe cross-border attacks on Afghan and international military personnel, with the support and active involvement of Pakistani militants." It said the ambivalent approach of the Musharraf government was "destabilizing Afghanistan."

A senior tribal elder confirmed the Taliban had gained sway in North Waziristan. Tribesmen were bypassing the government and traditional tribal leaders and approaching their pro-Taliban leaders in the towns of Miran Shah and Mir Ali to settle land and money disputes. Religious students were even helping to direct traffic, he told The Associated Press.

The elder requested anonymity because he had been threatened by militants for meeting government leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0105521

Access to the heavily Pashtun tribal regions, a possible hiding place for Osama bin Laden, is restricted. Foreign journalists are not permitted there unless under government or army escort, and reports of militant activities are often difficult to verify.

In Afghanistan, U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Paul Fitzpatrick said U.S. and Afghan security posts along the eastern border with Pakistan had seen a spike in attacks from 17 in May to 50 in August and 57 in October. Most of the attacks were in Paktika province, which lies opposite North and South Waziristan.

Attacks leveled off to about one a day in November, possibly because of winter weather settling in, Fitzpatrick said.

He said the data were not conclusive but that the increase could have been influenced by the North Waziristan peace deal or by U.S. military operations forcing more militants to operate close to the Pakistan border.

___

Associated Press writers Jason Straziuso in Kabul, Afghanistan, and Riaz Khan in Peshawar, Pakistan, contributed to this report.

US Concerned Over "Extremist" Safe Havens In Pakistan (AFP)

AFP, December 12, 2006

The United States said it was concerned over safe havens being established by Islamic militants in northern Pakistan's tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

The concerns stemmed from reports Monday that Pakistan's peace deals with militants in its tribal areas are helping to fuel Taliban's regrouping.

The militants are consolidating their hold in northern Pakistan and vastly expanding their training of suicide bombers and other recruits and fortifying alliances with Al-Qaeda and foreign fighters, the New York Times reported Monday.

Their new strength has led to "virtually a Taliban mini-state" and portends an "even bloodier year for Afghanistan in 2007," the report warned, quoting diplomats and intelligence officials from several nations.

Many Taliban guerillas fled to Pakistan's tribal zone after the US-led invasion of Afghanistan in the wake of the September 11, 2001 attacks. The Taliban's subsequent insurgency has spiked in 2006 with almost 4,000 deaths.

"Clearly, you still do have cross-border infiltration and I know that that is a concern for the Pakistanis and the Afghans," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, commenting on the Times report.

"But having safe havens and areas where these extremists can operate from is a real concern for us," he said.

The peace deals were signed by the Pakistani government in the semi-autonomous tribal regions of North Waziristan in September 2006 and neighbouring South Waziristan in April 2004.

Since the September accord, NATO officials say cross-border attacks by Pakistani and Afghan Taliban and their foreign allies have increased, the Times reported.

US President George W. Bush hosted talks between Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf and Afghanistan President Hamid Karzai at the White House in September to help ease the border tensions.

McCormack said Monday it was "too early to tell" whether the peace programs were succeeding.

But the International Crisis Group, a think tank, said in a report Monday that the peace deals had allowed the Taliban, once backed by Pakistan, to regroup and sparked increasingly deadly attacks on foreign troops in Afghanistan.

President Musharraf's policy of "appeasing" insurgents after the failure of army offensives has merely fuelled radicalism along the border and throughout Pakistan, it said.

"Using the region to regroup, reorganise and rearm, they are launching increasingly severe cross-border attacks on Afghan and international military personnel," the think tank report said.

"The Musharraf government's ambivalent approach and failure to take effective action is destabilising Afghanistan," it added.

Pakistan says it has 80,000 troops along the border tackling the problem.

NATO is battling a tough Taliban-led insurgency, particularly in southern Afghanistan, and it fears that if reconstruction does not happen quickly enough people may turn back to the fundamentalist militia.

DOJ_NMG_0105522

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US DoJ To Announce New Policy On Probes (FT)

By Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, December 12, 2006

The US Department of Justice will announce Tuesday that it plans to make it easier for companies under investigation to cooperate with prosecutors and avoid criminal indictment, the Financial Times has learned.

Specifically, field prosecutors will no longer have blanket authority to demand that a company waive its attorney-client confidentiality privileges and instead will have to seek higher-level approval in Washington before making such a request, according to a Department of Justice official who asked not to be identified.

The new policy, to be announced by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, also addresses the controversial practice of requiring companies to cease paying legal fees for employees implicated in matters under investigation.

The revisions come after months of criticism from defense attorneys, the business community and some members of Congress of the cooperation policy set forth in a 2003 memo by Larry Thompson, then the deputy attorney general. Critics of the Thompson memo have argued that prosecutors gained too much power after the collapse of Enron and WorldCom and needed to be reined in.

Senator Arlen Specter has introduced legislation that would prevent prosecutors from requiring waiver of attorney-client privilege. A federal judge in New York hearing a major tax fraud case has harshly criticized the Justice Department for requiring accounting firm KPMG to stop paying attorneys fees for its former employees as part of its cooperation agreement. The judge, Lewis Kaplan, ordered KPMG in June to resume paying the fees. That case is on appeal

The changes are not universally popular at DoJ and are seen by some line prosecutors as caving in to business interests.

Stock Option Scandal Will Go On In '07 (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

Toll of Options Timing Scandal Heavy in 2006; More Cases Expected Next Year

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Eighteen CEOs swept out. More than a hundred public companies under federal investigation and over $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc.

The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives.

Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings. Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports.

The Justice Department will "continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. "The final chapter hasn't been written yet."

Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era. The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference.

Among the wide swath of companies caught up in internal or government investigations: Apple Computer Inc., Barnes & Noble Inc., Caremark Rx Inc., Costco Wholesale Corp., Gap Inc., The Home Depot Inc., McAfee Inc., Monster Worldwide Inc., Restoration Hardware Inc., Staples Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0105523

Some prominent executives at blue-chip companies have lost their jobs in the affair, including former UnitedHealth CEO William McGuire, who engineered the company's ascent from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest. A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square, with the scandal claiming at least 59 senior executives or board directors at 32 companies so far.

Will there be more? Just over 2,000 public companies, or 29 percent of those in the United States that give stock options to executives, have timing issues, according to Erik Lie, an associate professor of finance at the University of Iowa, and Randall Heron, an Indiana University associate finance professor. Their research last year helped focus attention on a widespread pattern of conduct.

"I suspect the number of companies will continue to grow, but I don't expect at the end of the day we're going to see that many enforcement actions" by federal authorities, said Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant of the Securities and Exchange Commission. "You just can't do something this big with the same amount of resources."

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has pledged vigorous pursuit of cases and said recently that new charges will be brought in the near future. The agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents. Cox said there have been an "unprecedented" number of companies that have voluntarily reported irregularities -- cooperation that will be taken into account in determining sanctions.

Ryan, too, said: "We're trying to drill down on them and prioritize."

At the same time, officials at the Justice Department are discussing whether to ease some of its harsher guidelines for prosecuting companies, crafted in the aftermath of the corporate scandals that included Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. Some officials believe the guidelines may have led prosecutors to overreach when targeting some companies and pressuring them to cooperate in investigations of wrongdoing by executives.

Shareholders were hurt by an average loss in market value of 8 percent, or $500 million, for each affected company from the negative publicity of being under government investigation, researchers at the University of Michigan found in a study.

The potentially suspicious timing comes in with a practice known as backdating. Stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, so recipients can sell their shares at higher market prices.

Some investor advocates and irate shareholders liken it to betting on a horse race after its finish, with top executives guaranteed to be "in the money." The University of Michigan study found that corporate executives gained an average of $600,000 a year each from backdating of stock options between 2000 and 2004.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can falsely inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

The Internal Revenue Service is conducting its own investigation of companies for possible tax-law violations.

Backdating is at issue in many of the options investigations by federal prosecutors and the SEC. To date, at least 190 companies have disclosed Justice Department, SEC or internal inquiries, according to an Associated Press review.

Not all the backdating of options was illegal, and in some cases the evidence is insufficient for the government to make a case.

The scandal also shone a light on Silicon Valley's tightly knit network, where technology business leaders have long served on each other's boards and shared ideas. The unfortunate innovation of options backdating apparently spread like a virus in the market-boom late 1990s: At least 28 of the northern California companies with options timing issues share a common director with one other company wrestling a similar problem, according to a recent analysis.

AP Investigative Researcher Randy Herschaft contributed to this report from New York.

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Securities and Exchange Commission: http://www.sec.gov

Another Consequence Of Backdated Options: Stiff Tax Bills (WSJ)

By Theo Francis

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105524

Many of the hundred-plus companies under investigation over backdated stock options -- and the individuals who received those options -- are scrambling to protect themselves from another potential consequence: stiff tax bills. For individuals, the tax bill and penalties could prove steep, even if the shares become worthless. Companies, too, could face a hefty bill and potential penalties for unpaid income and payroll taxes.

"It's a mushroom cloud for the executives," says Robert Salwen, a compensation attorney in Scarsdale, N.Y.

Options generally give an employee a future right to buy an employer's shares at a specified price. If the stock rises, the employee makes money. And if the company cheats, backdating an option grant to a period when the stock was lower than the day it was actually granted, the recipient benefits financially even more.

MORE ON OPTIONS

• Options Scorecard: Companies under scrutiny1

• Perfect Payday: Complete coverage2

Ordinarily, top executives owe income taxes on any gains from exercising their options at the time of exercise. Lower-level employees often receive another kind of stock option that is typically taxed only when the underlying shares are actually sold (although they can be taxed sooner under the Alternative Minimum Tax). But under tax rules for deferred compensation adopted in 2004, improperly priced options of either kind can trigger a 20% surtax on top of ordinary income tax -- totaling as much as 60% of any gain, once state and local taxes are taken into account.

Moreover, under the 2004 rules, the taxes and penalties come due in the year an executive is first allowed to exercise the options -- in other words, when the options vest -- even if he or she exercises them later. Tax experts say taxes are still due if the option subsequently loses value before exercise or even goes unexercised. In addition, more taxes are due if the underlying shares continue to gain value before the options are exercised. (On the flip side, options that expire while under water can't be used to offset other taxable income, tax experts say.) The IRS also charges penalty interest -- currently about 9% -- for late payment.

Softening the blow, the new rules apply only to options that vested after 2004, and because the rules were new, the IRS waived penalties for 2005. Still, for top officers, the dollar amounts could be large.

For example, former UnitedHealth Group Inc. Chairman and Chief Executive William McGuire received a 650,000-share option grant in early 2002, with a quarter of the grant vesting each winter through January 2006. Tax and penalties on the shares vesting this year alone would total $13.7 million.

After an internal review, UnitedHealth concluded that many of the stock options it granted over more than a decade likely had been backdated. UnitedHealth, like other companies under scrutiny for options pricing, has suspended stock-option transactions until it restates its financials.

But some executives holding questionable options may be able to ease the sting if they act before year end. "There are ways to get out of this," says S. James DiBernardo, a partner at Morgan, Lewis & Bockius LLP specializing in compensation.

The Situation: Executives and companies could face stiff tax bills over backdated options.

The Background: More than a hundred companies face scrutiny over whether they fudged the grant date of options.

The Details: New deferred-compensation rules mean some executives could end up owing 60% of a grant's value, even before exercising the options.

The Remedy: The IRS offers two ways out, but a Dec. 31 deadline looms.

First, under the 2004 regulation's transition rules, companies can replace improperly priced options with properly priced ones. For top officers, this must be done by Dec. 31 at the latest; for other employees, companies have until year-end 2007.

This is essentially what Dr. McGuire has done. He earlier agreed to reprice options at the highest share price for the year in which they were granted. He has also said he would give up about $200 million of stock-option gains. A UnitedHealth spokesman said repricing the options removed the tax risk for Dr. McGuire.

Alternatively, executives can simply set a schedule for when they will exercise their options, specifying in advance how many to exercise in each year. That, too, will allow executives to escape the deferred-compensation penalties, tax experts say. However, these fixes apply only to unexercised options. For executives who have already exercised improperly priced options this year, "the $64 question" is whether there's a way to dodge the penalties at all, Mr. DiBernardo says. "No one is entirely clear as to how you fix that."

DOJ_NMG_0105525

Companies, too, can be penalized for failing to withhold the executive's unpaid taxes. That carries interest of about 8% a year at current rates, plus a penalty of up to 15%, and an additional 20% penalty if the failure to withhold is negligent, Mr. Salwen says. For companies with clearcut backdating problems, "I think this is a case where it might be more than negligent -- that might be the position the [IRS] takes," Mr. Salwen adds. Plus, if executives can't pay their own tax bills, the IRS could collect from their employers instead.

Companies may have their own tax worries for some kinds of options, even if they aren't on the hook for their executives' tax bills. That's because federal law requires employers to collect payroll taxes -- chiefly a 2.9% tax for Medicare, evenly split between employee and employer -- if so-called incentive stock options don't meet certain conditions. And backdated options don't, says Rebecca Miller, a tax specialist at Minneapolis accounting firm McGladrey & Pullen. In this case, the tax is owed on the value of the options when they are exercised, rather than when they vest.

Here, companies have to pay the bill and then try to collect the employee's half from them if they choose, Ms. Miller says. What's more, unpaid Medicare taxes come with a stiff penalty: up to 100%, potentially doubling the cost to 5.8% of the executive's potential stock-option gains, she adds.

Skilling's Check-In To Prison Delayed Over Bail Request (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

Former Enron Corp. President Jeffrey Skilling's decades-long date with a prison cell, scheduled to start today, has been temporarily delayed by a federal appeals court.

Late yesterday, Mr. Skilling's lead criminal defense attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, said he received notice that the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals had ordered a delay in his client's scheduled report date to a federal prison in Waseca, Minn., where he was to begin serving a more-than-24-year prison sentence. Mr. Skilling received that sentence as the result of being convicted earlier this year in a Houston federal court on 19 criminal counts, including conspiracy and fraud, arising from Enron's December 2001 collapse into bankruptcy. Mr. Skilling, who has consistently maintained his innocence, had been planning to fly to Minnesota this morning to report to the prison, Mr. Petrocelli said.

The Skilling attorney said that the notice he received said that the appellate court had granted the stay "solely to allow this court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal." Granting bail would allow Mr. Skilling to stay out of prison pending his appeal, which could take a year or more for the appellate court to consider.

"We are heartened that the court of appeals is taking the time necessary to decide this important motion," said Mr. Petrocelli.

A Justice Department spokesman said he hadn't heard about the decision and couldn't comment.

Skilling's Arrival In Prison Delayed (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

Former Enron chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling received at least a brief reprieve from prison yesterday after a federal appeals court said it needed more time to consider whether he should remain free pending appeal.

Skilling, 53, had been preparing to turn himself in today and begin serving a prison term of 24 years and six months at a federal facility in Waseca, Minn. But a brief order from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit, issued yesterday evening, means the brash former corporate executive will enjoy at least a few more days of freedom.

Skilling's lawyers are attacking a theory that the appeals court had invalidated last summer in another case tied to the Houston energy trading company. The appeals court ruling granted Skilling an undetermined delay "solely to allow this court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal," the order said.

DOJ_NMG_0105526

Legal analysts said the court could ultimately force Skilling to report to the 1,070-inmate prison 75 miles south of Minneapolis within days -- or the judges could take even more time to consider the issue. To stay free pending a months- or years-long appeal, Skilling would need to show a substantial chance that he would succeed.

Defense lawyers have criticized the trial judge's jury instructions and the decision to hold the trial in Houston, where thousands of people lost jobs and retirement savings when Enron sought bankruptcy protection five years ago.

"We are glad to hear that the court of appeals is taking the necessary time to consider this matter, which is vital to Jeff Skilling's immediate future," Skilling's lawyer, Daniel M. Petrocelli, said in a telephone interview yesterday.

A Houston jury convicted Skilling in May of 19 counts of conspiracy, making false statements, insider trading and securities fraud.

Under the legal theory the defense team has advanced, the conspiracy charge ultimately could be erased, perhaps along with the securities fraud convictions. But it is less clear that the charges of insider trading and making false statements to auditors would be affected, the legal experts said.

Barry Pollack, a defense lawyer at Kelley Drye Collier Shannon in the District, said Skilling should be "heartened" by the move.

"It at a minimum suggests the 5th Circuit thinks there are legitimate issues that shouldn't be given the back of the hand," said Pollack, who won acquittal for another Enron official earlier this year.

Skilling Prison Date Postponed (HC)

By Kristen Hays And Tom Fowler, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, December 12, 2006

5th Circuit asks time for 'careful consideration' of his bail request, sets no timetable

WASECA, MINN. — Jeff Skilling won't be calling this southern Minnesota town home just yet.

Late Monday, the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals issued an order postponing the ex-Enron CEO's Tuesday report date to a low-security federal prison until the panel gives "careful consideration" to his request for bail while he appeals his convictions on 19 criminal counts.

"This order is entered solely to allow this court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal," the court said.

The last-minute reprieve was a possibility up to Skilling's deadline of 2 p.m. Tuesday to report to the prison in Waseca, about 75 miles south of Minneapolis. Skilling will await word from the 5th Circuit on whether he can pursue his appeal inside or outside of prison. His appeal is expected to be filed next month.

"I am innocent of every one of these charges," Skilling told U.S. District Judge Sim Lake at his sentencing in October.

Lake rejected Skilling's request to remain free on bail pending appeal in October when he sentenced the ex-CEO to 24 years and four months in prison. Skilling challenged that order last month.

"We are heartened that the court is taking the necessary time to consider such an important matter," his attorney, Daniel Petrocelli, said Monday.

Bryan Sierra, a Justice Department spokesman, didn't return a call for comment.

The appellate court's decision is somewhat unusual, said Brian Wice, a Houston lawyer who specializes in appeals.

"It's rare to see a panel decide to stay a prison sentence so they can carefully consider his motion to remain free. Usually it's just a one-sentence summary denial," Wice said.

It doesn't carry the same weight as the court granting a request to remain free pending appeal, however. In the 5th Circuit, in particular, such a ruling is generally seen as a sign the court will overturn the case in favor of a defendant, Wice said.

That was the case with four former Merrill Lynch executives who were found guilty of fraud for helping Enron improperly boost its earnings in what was known as the Nigerian barge case.

In March, the 5th Circuit granted a former Merrill executive's motion to remain free pending appeal, while requests from two co-defendants were granted several months later.

DOJ_NMG_0105527

Not 'a walk-off home run'To meet the standard for release on bail pending appeal a defendant has to show there is a substantial chance of a reversal in the case. So it wasn't a surprise when in August, a three-judge panel of the appeals court overturned the convictions.

Skilling's win isn't quite as dramatic, but it keeps his hopes for a successful appeal alive, Wice said.

"When you're in a situation like Skilling, with hours left before you head off to jail it's always the bottom of the ninth," Wice said. "This isn't a walk-off home run, but at least it's a couple of men on base."

Houston trial lawyer David Berg called the 5th Circuit's decision "dramatic and unusual" and "somewhat encouraging" for Skilling.

"If they had been able to look at the issues in his appeal and dismiss them out of hand, as happens so often, they never would have made this order," Berg said.

Skilling, 53, was convicted last May of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors and received the most severe punishment of anyone convicted of committing Enron-related crimes.

The ex-CEO staunchly maintains he is innocent.

Bad memories for retireesStill, Skilling's potential arrival in Waseca generated a lot of chatter earlier Monday at The Daily Grind, an upscale coffee shop along the old-fashioned downtown strip a few miles from the prison complex.

"It's been conversation A-1," said Carol Musel, an interior decorator in the town of nearly 10,000. "The majority of people are interested in how it unfolds from here."

For Dennis and Bette Friesen, a retired couple who once owned an industrial-machine repair business, the Skilling talk conjured memories of how they were victimized by a fraud.

Dennis Friesen said Monday that several years ago a man claiming to have investors in tow wanted to buy his business, which was in Iowa. The man, Andrew Armstrong, joined Friesen's business ostensibly to learn how it worked, but instead skimmed from the employee 401(k) retirement plan.

Armstrong is serving 6 1/2 years at a federal lockup in Texarkana for embezzlement and failure to account for and pay employment taxes.

"I guess we were just from the old school that a man's word is good," Dennis Friesen said. "It does sharpen your understanding of Enron. I'm sensitive to the people at Enron and what they lost."

The bureau opened the prison in 1996. Musel said she and many other residents have toured the prison at the bureau's invitation. She described the facility as clean and respectful of inmate needs. The prison offers a horticulture program and has a factory where 200 inmates make textiles such as uniforms and mattresses.

"If he's got it rough, it isn't here," Musel said.

Skilling Wins Delay Of Sentence (BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

Bloomberg, December 12, 2006

Jeffrey K. Skilling, the former Enron chief executive who was sentenced to 24 years in prison for his role in a fraud that destroyed the company, won a last-minute delay of his sentence, scheduled to begin Tuesday.

The United States Court of Appeals in New Orleans issued on Monday a delay of the order requiring Mr. Skilling, 53, who was convicted in May of securities fraud and conspiracy, to report to federal prison, according to court records.

“This order is entered solely to allow court to give careful consideration to the request for bail pending appeal,” the court said. Mr. Skilling was to arrive at the low-security Federal Correctional Institution in Waseca, Minn., Tuesday afternoon. A Justice Department spokeswoman, Jaclyn Lesch, did not immediately return after-hours calls seeking comment.

Mr. Skilling, who said he was made a scapegoat, is seeking to remain free on bail while he appeals his conviction. Enron’s founder, Kenneth L. Lay, was convicted along with Mr. Skilling but died in July before he could be sentenced.

“We are glad the court is taking the necessary time to consider our motion,” Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling’s lead trial lawyer, said in an e-mail message.

Mr. Skilling is under house arrest in his 9,215-square-foot Mediterranean mansion in Houston’s River Oaks section.

The house, valued on tax rolls at more than $5 million, will be sold to help him pay $45 million in court-ordered restitution to his victims. He can give half the proceeds from the sale to his three children.

Black's Prosecutors Lay Out Case Against Him In 81-Page Filing (BLOOM)

By Andrew Harris

Bloomberg, December 12, 2006

Dec. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Former Hollinger International Inc. Chairman Conrad Black, indicted for fraud and accused of abusing company perks, compared himself to embattled French nobility in defending his actions, according to U.S. prosecutors in a filing.

The 81-page document, filed today, lays out the prosecutors' case against Black, Peter Atkinson, a former Hollinger vice president and general counsel, and two other defendants.

``I am not prepared to re-enact the French Revolutionary renunciation of the rights of nobility," Black told Atkinson in a 2002 e-mail, according to the filing.

Black, Atkinson, former Hollinger Chief Financial Officer John Boultbee, and ex-general counsel Mark Kipnis were each indicted last year on charges that they stripped Hollinger of its U.S. holdings while reaping millions for themselves through unauthorized non-competition agreements.

Black's Toronto lawyer, Edward Greenspan, said he had read the filing but wasn't prepared to comment on it immediately, citing the document's length.

``We're entitled to respond to the document in writing, and we will begin preparing the response tomorrow," he said in a telephone interview this evening.

Trial Date

Jury selection for the trial of Black and the other defendants is set for March 7. Black, Atkinson, Boultbee and Kipnis have pleaded innocent. Former Chicago Sun-Times publisher F. David Radler, who was also indicted, pleaded guilty last year and is cooperating with authorities.

Once one of the largest publishers of English-language newspapers, Black's companies produced the Sun-Times, Canada's National Post, the United Kingdom's Daily Telegraph, the Jerusalem Post and scores of smaller community newspapers.

Black, 62, led Hollinger International for eight years as chairman and chief executive officer before being forced from the latter post in 2003 and the former a year later. He also was chairman of Hollinger Inc., a position he relinquished in 2004 after 13 years.

Earlier this year, Hollinger International changed its name to the Sun-Times Media Group.

Non-Compete Agreements

Black in 1998 first raised the issue of receiving non- competition payments in connection with the sale of two magazines, American Trucker and Mine and Quarry Trader, which were owned by a Hollinger International affiliate, according to today's Justice Department filing.

From that sale, Black arranged for $2 million to be wired to Hollinger Inc., which held controlling interest in International and which, in turn, was controlled by Black and Boultbee's privately held Ravelston Corp Ltd. Within two years, Hollinger International sold off virtually all of its U.S. community newspapers, prosecutors said.

During this time, Black and Boultbee agreed that for each sale, Hollinger International would receive 75 percent of any non-competition payments, while Hollinger Inc., would receive 25 percent. This split would be ``the template for future deals," prosecutors said.

Black is also accused of charging the company for two-thirds of a $54,000 birthday party thrown for his wife, Barbara Amiel Black, at the Manhattan restaurant La Grenouille. He's also accused of using the Hollinger jet to fly the couple from Toronto, to Bora Bora, to Seattle for a Wagner opera, then back to Toronto at a cost of more than C$565,000 ($492,000), according to authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0105529

``We have to find a balance between an unfair taxation on the company and a reasonable treatment of the founder-builder-managers," Black reportedly told Atkinson after a company comptroller criticized Black's liberal use of Hollinger's corporate jet, according to today's filing.

``We are proprietors after all, beleaguered though we may be," according to the document.

The case is U.S. v. Black, 05cr727, in the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division (Chicago).

2 Sanctioned By SEC Over PNC Accounting (AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

PNC Executive, Outside Auditor Sanctioned by SEC Over 2001 Accounting

WASHINGTON (AP) -- An accounting executive at PNC Financial Services Group Inc. and an outside auditor were sanctioned by federal regulators Monday for their alleged roles in the regional bank's faulty accounting in 2001, said to have inflated earnings by concealing $762 million in potential liabilities.

The Securities and Exchange Commission announced the settlements with Thomas Garbe, who was PNC's director of accounting policy at the time, and Michael Joseph, a former partner with the major accounting firm Ernst & Young, which reviewed the transaction at issue. Garbe and Joseph neither admitted nor denied the SEC's allegations but agreed to refrain from future violations of the securities laws.

In addition, Joseph was barred for three years from acting as an accountant for any public company.

Garbe "failed to inquire adequately about facts and circumstances, and was a cause of PNC's violations of the ... federal securities laws," the SEC said in its order.

The agency had previously alleged that Pittsburgh-based PNC tried to conceal $762 million in sour corporate loans in 2001 by selling them to three partnerships it created expressly for that purpose with insurance giant American International Group Inc.

For a fee, AIG offered to establish special-purpose entities to which PNC could transfer the troubled assets, but there was no actual transfer of risk from the bank to the insurer, according to the SEC.

In a July 2002 settlement of the issue, PNC was not fined but agreed to give the SEC and the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland greater access to company records. New York-based AIG signed agreements with the SEC and the Justice Department in late 2004 in which it agreed to pay $126 million to settle allegations of aiding flawed accounting by PNC and Brightpoint Inc.

More recently, AIG agreed last February to pay a record $1.64 billion in a settlement with the SEC and New York state authorities, and apologized for having deceived investors and regulators with misleading accounting practices. AIG was alleged to have taken part in bid-rigging schemes, paid secret commissions to insurance brokers to steer business to it, used phony insurance deals to burnish its earnings and misstated the amounts of workers' compensation premiums it had collected.

Securities and Exchange Commission: http://www.sec.gov

PNC Financial Services Inc.: http://www.pncbank.com

SEC Bars Ex-Ernst & Young Partner For Role In PNC-AIG Fraud (BLOOM)

By Otis Bilodeau

Bloomberg, December 12, 2006

Dec. 11 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission sanctioned a former Ernst & Young LLP accountant for designing and then helping to audit a financial product PNC Financial Services Group Inc. used to overstate profit in 2001.

Michael Joseph, who left Ernst & Young last year, agreed to be barred from auditing public-company books and otherwise representing clients before the SEC for three years, the agency said in a statement today. Joseph, 55, didn't admit or deny wrongdoing.

American International Group Inc., the world's biggest insurer, hired Joseph to help develop and market a financing arrangement that PNC used to shift $762 million in bad loans and investments off its books in 2001, according to the SEC. Ernst & Young, the second-biggest U.S. accounting firm, also was the auditor that year for PNC, a Pittsburgh-based bank.

Joseph, a ``nationally recognized expert'' on accounting for off-balance-sheet financing, drafted an expert-opinion letter for AIG approving the transaction, the SEC in its order today. Then Joseph gave the same letter to the Ernst & Young team auditing the way PNC accounted for it. The Ernst & Young auditors adopted Joseph's guidance letter ``virtually verbatim,'' the SEC said.

``Joseph was invested both financially and reputationally in the success'' of the arrangement, the regulator said. As a result, he had a conflict of interest when he ``evaluated'' PNC's accounting for a product he had helped create. ``Joseph was on both sides of the PNC transactions,'' the SEC said.

Fed Order

The Federal Reserve in January 2002 ordered PNC to reverse the accounting, and PNC announced that month it would restate its financial statements from the prior year, cutting previously reported earnings.

New York-based AIG and PNC have since settled regulatory probes. AIG agreed in Nov. 2004 to pay $126 million to the SEC and Justice Department in connection with the case. As part of a $115 million settlement with Justice in 2003, a PNC subsidiary ``acknowledged'' that the transactions Joseph worked on violated accounting rules. Neither company admitted wrongdoing. Ernst & Young hasn't been accused of violating any rules in the case.

Joseph ``neither agreed nor disagreed with any of the SEC's allegations,'' according to his lawyer, Lawrence Robbins, of Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner in Washington. ``He is grateful for the opportunity to move on.''

The SEC today also faulted Thomas Garbe, the director of PNC's accounting policy department, for failing to question the propriety of the AIG transactions before signing off on them. The SEC ordered Garbe, 54, not to violate securities laws in the future. He didn't admit or deny wrongdoing. His lawyer, Peter Kolker of Zuckerman Spaeder in Washington, declined to comment.

Ernst & Young has faced SEC scrutiny over other potential conflicts. In April 2004, the agency banned the firm from accepting new public-company audit clients for six months, after finding it violated conflict-of-interest rules while auditing PeopleSoft Inc. Five months later, Ernst & Young told regulators it might also have broken rules while performing tax work in China for about 100 U.S. audit clients, including Sun Microsystems Inc.

Ernst & Young spokesman Charles Perkins declined to comment.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Judge Settles Fight Over Classified Info (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 12, 2006

A federal judge all but resolved the protracted legal fight over classified information in the CIA leak case Monday, helping ensure the dispute would not derail former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury and obstruction trial.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding a CIA operative. He says he had more pressing issues on his mind and wants to discuss classified intelligence about terrorist threats and foreign nuclear programs to bolster that argument.

Prosecutors had accused Libby of demanding so much sensitive information that the government could not safely release it — leading to a dismissal — but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton appears to have resolved that dispute.

Walton, who rankled Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald last month by ruling that Libby must be allowed to discuss intelligence on Iraq, Iran, Pakistan, terrorism and other issues at trial, accepted Fitzgerald's proposal to limit the details Libby and his attorneys can discuss.

The details of those limitations are sealed but, because it was Fitzgerald's proposal, it's unlikely he would come back to court later this month and argue that the limitations did not go far enough to protect government secrecy.

Neither Fitzgerald's office not Libby's attorneys would comment Monday.

The ruling helps keep the trial on track for next month. That could still be delayed, however, if Vice President Dick Cheney and Bush aide Karl Rove claim they cannot testify because of separation-of-powers issues.

DOJ_NMG_0105531

While the case hinges on whether Libby knowingly lied about his conversation regarding CIA operative Valerie Plame, testimony could offer a behind-the-scenes look at how the Bush administration handled intelligence and criticism in its march to war.

Plame believes the administration leaked her name to reporters as retribution for her husband's criticism of prewar intelligence. Nobody has been charged with the leak.

FBI Tape Shows Hornsby Accepting Money (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

As soon as he walked into the hotel room, Andre J. Hornsby talked to his longtime associate about the possibility he had been followed. Hornsby, then the Prince George's County schools chief, said he had driven a circuitous route to shake any possible tail and had made a mental note of the make, model and color of cars in the parking lot.

They talked about purging Hornsby's e-mails from school system computers, and then the associate -- who was secretly cooperating in an investigation of Hornsby -- handed over $1,000. As FBI cameras rolled, Hornsby tucked the bills into his shirt pocket.

Details of the videotaped meeting at the end of 2004 were among the key disclosures in an FBI affidavit unsealed yesterday at U.S. District Court in Greenbelt. The affidavit and related documents contain a raft of new information about the corruption case prosecutors have assembled against Hornsby, who was removed from his post in Prince George's last year and indicted in August.

Hornsby's attorney, Robert C. Bonsib, declined to comment on the meeting or other specifics from the affidavit. "Dr. Hornsby maintains his innocence, and, as he has throughout, intends to vigorously defend against the allegations in a court of law," Bonsib said.

The indictment accuses Hornsby of steering a contract to a consulting company linked to the associate and of arranging for a $1 million purchase from the software company LeapFrog SchoolHouse, where his then-girlfriend was a saleswoman. In both cases, it alleges, Hornsby demanded and received kickbacks in return.

The former girlfriend, Sienna Owens, who was a sales representative for Virginia, has pleaded guilty to a tax offense and is cooperating with prosecutors. Owens said in court that she collected $20,000 from the commission on the purchase, a sum she said she split with Hornsby.

The affidavit, signed by FBI Special Agent John M. Sheridan, does not identify the female associate at the hotel, but in the context of the events it describes, she appears to be Cynthia Joffrion, who worked with Hornsby in Yonkers, N.Y., and in Houston before that. Joffrion has previously declined to comment and did not respond to a message left at her home yesterday.

According to the affidavit, the associate appears to have been a reluctant participant in Hornsby's alleged misconduct. In fact, Sheridan wrote, the associate approached the district attorney's office in Westchester County, N.Y., in 1999 to complain about Hornsby, triggering a previously undisclosed criminal investigation in which dozens of meetings or phone calls with Hornsby were taped.

A spokeswoman with the district attorney's office said the status of that investigation could not be quickly determined yesterday.

According to the associate, when Hornsby was negotiating with Apple Computer Inc. over a possible purchase by the Yonkers school system, he required the company to donate computers to the National Alliance of Black School Educators, of which he was president, for the deal to be consummated, Sheridan wrote. Two other vendors were also required to financially support the educators group to win contracts with Yonkers, the agent wrote.

The associate also said that Hornsby ordered her to send computers that belonged to the Yonkers school system to Hornsby's relatives and that he threatened to fire her if she did not do so, Sheridan wrote in the affidavit.

Hornsby hired the associate again after he arrived in Prince George's, Sheridan wrote, ultimately involving her in the consulting contract to help secure funds under a federal program known as E-Rate. Hornsby once told the associate that he expected a kickback of $150,000 in the arrangement, the affidavit says.

DOJ_NMG_0105532

In late 2004, in the weeks leading to the meeting at the Bowie hotel, Hornsby had a series of cryptic conversations -- on a recorded line -- with the associate, who by then had contacted the FBI, the affidavit says.

On Nov. 9, it says, several days after reports circulated that the FBI was investigating, Hornsby instructed the associate not to withdraw more than $4,000 at a time from a bank account and then said: "Let's not talk. Have you read the [news]papers?"

On Dec. 3, the associate asked how much money she should bring to pay him. Hornsby replied, "I like my birthday," in an apparent reference to the number seven, the date of his birth, meaning $7,000, Sheridan wrote.

They met at the hotel Dec. 20. At that videotaped meeting, the affidavit says, Hornsby and the associate decided that $144,000 with a down payment of $1,000 was appropriate payment to Hornsby for arranging for the contract award.

Court Documents Detail Alleged Hornsby Schemes (AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

COLLEGE PARK, Md. (AP) - New details about what federal officials say were carefully orchestrated plans by former Prince George's County school chief Andre Hornsby to reap roughly 150-thousand in kickbacks.

A search warrant affidavit unsealed today in U-S District Court also claims Hornsby took great pains to conceal his schemes, erasing computer and e-mail records, checking for possible phone taps, and trying to shake what he correctly suspected were F-B-I agents following him.

Hornsby was indicted in August and pleaded not guilty to charges of mail fraud, wire fraud, witness and evidence tampering, and obstruction of justice. His attorney, Robert Bonsib says he expects the matter to go to court and be hard fought.

N.Y. Federal Prosecutors Losing Cases (HC/AP)

By Larry Neumeister Associated Press Writer, The Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 12, 2006

NEW YORK — These are happy times for defense lawyers in Manhattan federal court.

A string of recent acquittals, in cases involving everything from organized crime to Wall Street misdeeds to terrorism, has eroded the patina of invincibility from prosecutors in an office where high-profile convictions once seemed inevitable.

The defeats _ just two years after the government successfully prosecuted home maven Martha Stewart _ were capped off when prosecutors announced just before Thanksgiving that they were dropping one-third of the 15 cases brought against floor specialists at the New York Stock Exchange.

The prosecution, meant to show specialists were cheating investors by improperly trading for their companies ahead of orders for their customers, had already suffered huge hits with two acquittals and dropped charges in two cases _ although they did notch five convictions.

The latest charges were dropped just days after a jury acquitted a California man on charges that he lied about his association with one of the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackers, ending a case the government relentlessly pursued for five years.

Just weeks earlier, a third jury deadlocked on racketeering charges against John A. "Junior" Gotti, leading prosecutors to abandon their case against the admitted one-time Gambino crime family boss.

And that came only weeks after prosecutors agreed to drop charges against technology banker Frank Quattrone, letting him resume a career that once paid him as much as $120 million a year.

In civil and criminal cases, prosecutors in Manhattan's U.S. District Court have endured a variety of setbacks _ including decisions forcing them to divulge the identities of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, and to turn over pictures of prisoner abuse in Iraq.

Their prosecution of 19 people in what the government called the largest criminal tax case in U.S. history _ a tax shelter scheme for rich people _ became bogged down over claims the government pressured a company not to pay defense lawyers for its indicted employees.

Even a big victory _ the conviction of lawyer Lynne Stewart on a charge of providing material support to terrorists _ soured when a judge sentenced her to a little over two years in prison rather than the 30 years the government had sought.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, who took the job last year when the soon-to-be stymied prosecutions were already in full swing, told The Associated Press that the setbacks were cyclical.

The results, he said, can happen when "the stars line up badly in a bunch of cases ... It's crazy to say that it's the quality of the lawyering here." Garcia said prosecutors stream to his office after a win or a loss _ and the losses hit hard.

"They're down because they've invested so much and you believe in what you're doing," he said. "It's a bad thing. You take it hard. But it can't last. ... I know they know they left it on the field, and win-loss record doesn't mean anything here."

He said losses attract more attention than the vast majority of criminal cases that end in convictions. He cited the successful prosecution of South Korean businessman Tongsun Park, who was convicted by a jury that took only hours to find he conspired to accept at least $2 million to act as a secret Iraqi agent to influence the United Nations' oil-for-food program.

He said prosecutors, who are aware "we sit right next door to Wall Street," raise novel legal issues to prosecute financial crimes just as he and others did in the early 1990s when they created new tactics to prosecute terrorists.

"With more novel legal issues, you might not be successful in a ratio people are used to seeing from this office," he said.

Some longtime defense lawyers, though, say there might be something behind the shift of luck in a courthouse where young prosecutors often sharpen their trial skills before taking lucrative jobs at some of the nation's most prestigious law firms.

"It's a different time than it was three or four years ago. People are not as enamored with the government and its view of things," said Gerald Lefcourt, past president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys.

"There's a general pendulum swing in the country which is obvious," said Lefcourt, who has defended clients ranging from actor Russell Crowe to the "Chicago Seven" _ seven Vietnam War protest leaders accused of conspiring to start a riot at the 1968 Democratic National Convention.

Lefcourt said defense lawyers are feeling good.

"There's not as much doom and gloom. I don't think that people perceive things as hopeless as they used to," he said

Carl Tobias, a professor of law at the University of Richmond, said prosecutors may be suffering the effects of their own aggressiveness, especially after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Sometimes you can hardly blame the government because the last thing they want is another terrorist attack," Tobias said. "So they tend to pull out all the stops and a lot of people are sympathetic to that. Sometimes innocent people are caught in the crosshairs."

He said white collar prosecutions are sometimes difficult because wealthy defendants can hire the best attorneys, many of them former Manhattan federal prosecutors.

Marc Mukasey, who was a federal prosecutor in Manhattan until a year ago, said "the line between what's a crime and what isn't is grayer and foggier than it's ever been and therefore juries are demanding more proof and prosecutors are being put to the test."

Still, he said, the U.S. attorney's office in Manhattan remains "the gold standard for prosecutorial offices."

Judge Seeks Details On Probe Of Prosecutor In Botched Mafia Case (BOS)

By Raja Mishra And Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 12, 2006

The chief federal judge in Boston is urging the US Justice Department to find out and tell him what happened to an internal investigation of a federal prosecutor accused of withholding evidence in a high-profile Mafia case.

The unusual request, which was filed in court yesterday, stems from a botched racketeering case in which two reputed mobsters were released early from prison after Chief US District Judge Mark L. Wolf determined that prosecutor Jeffrey Auerhahn improperly and possibly illegally manipulated evidence.

Three years ago, US Attorney Michael J. Sullivan told Wolf that he would get to the bottom of the alleged misconduct. But in a letter sent Friday to Sullivan's boss, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Wolf wrote that "no information on the status or any results" of the investigation into Auerhahn had been reported to him.

"The apparent inaction of the Department of Justice regarding Mr. Auerhahn has generated considerable concern about the administration of justice in the District of Massachusetts," Wolf wrote.

Auerhahn, who could not be reached for comment yesterday, currently works on antiterrorism cases and recently prosecuted a Bosnian war criminal.

Citing Justice Department rules protecting employees' privacy, Sullivan said yesterday he could not comment on the results of the investigation of Auerhahn or whether any action had been taken against him.

Sullivan said he would look into whether prosecutors could somehow share the results of the investigation with Wolf without violating Auerhahn's privacy.

"Obviously the court has raised some legitimate concerns as it relates to a matter that was before the court, and there should be an avenue to be able to respond to the court on the outcome of any inquiry that was launched as a result of the court's findings or conclusions," Sullivan said.

A Justice Department spokeswoman in Washington said the agency would not comment on the matter and would direct any response to Wolf.

In 2003, Wolf found that Auerhahn failed to tell defense lawyers that a key witness had recanted his testimony about the 1985 murder of Vincent Limoli in the North End. That led Wolf to release mobster Pasquale Barone and, two years later, to free Mafia captain Vincent Ferrara, whose convictions he deemed tainted.

"The misconduct by Mr. Auerhahn that resulted in the release of Barone and Ferrara was part of a pattern of similar misconduct by him," Wolf wrote Gonzales.

Earlier this year, a federal appeals court called Auerhahn's conduct "outrageous."

"No one can give Barone back the 10 years that he spent on an unlawful conviction," Bernard M. Grossberg, who represented Barone, said yesterday.

Wolf wrote that he thought Auerhahn's actions "may have been perjurious." He wrote that he held off on probing Auerhahn on his own because Sullivan "urged me" not to do so and that Sullivan promised a thorough probe.

Wolf compared Auerhahn's misconduct to an ongoing terrorism case in Detroit in which the federal government said a new trial against alleged members of a jihadist sleeper cell was necessary because a prosecutor withheld evidence. That prosecutor is now facing trial himself in the alleged misconduct.

Investigation Into Amtrak Law Department And Outside Counsel Builds Steam (LAW)

By Anna Palmer, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 12, 2006

A House committee broadened its investigation into government-subsidized train operator Amtrak's legal department and its outside legal counsel last week, calling for the Justice Department to investigate possible illegal activities.

In a Dec. 4 letter obtained by Legal Times, outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and committee member Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., requested that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales review "what may constitute unlawful conduct" between Amtrak's legal team and outside law firms. It's the second letter the lawmakers have sent regarding potential mismanagement on the part of Amtrak and its outside law firms.

In a separate letter sent Nov. 17 to Amtrak Inspector General Fred Weiderhold Jr., the congressmen singled out Manatt, Phelps & Phillips for its billing of support staff and expenses. The letter asked Weiderhold to review specific instances regarding Manatt's work on the Northeast Corridor electrification project to see if they were "appropriate, justified, documented, and accurate."

"Manatt is proud of the work that we have done for Amtrak, and of the significant accomplishments that have resulted from that work," the firm said in a statement to Legal Times. "We have fully cooperated with the [inspector general's] review of Amtrak legal services. Any issue that has been brought to our attention has been addressed, and if there are further questions, we will provide any information requested."

The lawmakers' overtures come after a recent probe into Amtrak's legal department by the Department of Transportation's inspector general and Weiderhold, which came at the request of the transportation committee. The investigation found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal fees from June 2002 to June 2005. The inspector generals' report, released in October, found that Amtrak's outside legal counsel rarely turned in receipts and used block billing, the term for billing different tasks under one invoice entry, which is prohibited by Amtrak's guidelines for dealing with outside counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0105535

The letter to the Justice Department, which does not name any specific law firms, addresses four areas in which Amtrak employees and outside legal counsel may have broken federal law by bill padding and possible collusion among Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel to use side agreements benefiting the outside law firms. The letter also indicates that Amtrak's in-house lawyers and outside legal counsel may have offered or solicited improper gifts and travel in exchange for legal work. And the lawmakers point to possible false statements to investigators and backdating of documents by Amtrak in an attempt to obstruct the probe.

"We don't believe the allegations have merit or that they warrant review by the Justice Department, but we stand ready to cooperate and provide information as it is requested, as we have done with the committee," Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black said in an e-mail statement.

Mica and Young's offices did not return calls for comment.

One lawyer familiar with Amtrak's in-house legal department was surprised by the ongoing investigation.

"There was never an issue raised about the Amtrak law department by Congress when I was there," says James Lloyd, a former Amtrak general counsel who left in January 2002. "I really don't believe that the Amtrak law department would just turn lawyers loose. ... I don't think there is any more cost-conscious group of lawyers than I saw at Amtrak."

RAIL SPLITTING

Manatt first came under scrutiny in an unredacted copy of legal-audit expert John Toothman's report, obtained by Legal Times in early November. (A redacted copy was released by the committee in October). Toothman's report found that Manatt's billing was "overall, the worst observed, with heavy staffing, attempts to pass off clerical/overhead as billable, failure to follow basic guidelines and heavy expenses." The firm also benefited after one of its former partners, Marylin Milner, went to work in Amtrak's general counsel's office. As associate general counsel, she directly supervised her former firm's Amtrak work. Milner, now general counsel at petroleum company Gilbarco Veeder-Root, declined to comment.

Young and Mica's letter to Weiderhold specifies several discrepancies with Manatt's bills related to nonlegal work, miscellaneous billing and large copying expenses.

"Our office policy is not to confirm or deny any potential ongoing investigations," says Hamilton Peterson, the lead investigator for the legal audit by Amtrak's inspector general.

Audit expert Toothman says he had substantial concern about the use and timing of Manatt's side agreements and how legal work was transferred to the firm.

"Manatt also had some pretty unusual terms [for] expenses that they were not limited to actual cost on expenses, but whatever they defined as a standard expense," says Toothman.

For nine months of work by a paralegal between 2004 and 2005, Manatt billed Amtrak for "1,877 hours, or $313,000 billed for three-fourths of a year's work, with much of this work appearing to be clerical in nature or non-legal, construction work," according to the lawmakers' letter. In a different two-month sample of bills, the congressmen say their review found billings of $90,000 for 561 hours in two months in 2004, or what constitutes a billing pace of over 3,000 billable hours per year for the paralegal. In another two-month sample in 2003, the same paralegal billed $69,000 for 430 hours with "multiple double entries of time on the same date for the same work," according to the letter.

Manatt disputes the letter's allegations about billing a paralegal for clerical work, however. The firm says experts from both sides of an ongoing arbitration were required to be on the railroad 10 to 12 hours a day, monitoring the work of experts in order to create an evidentiary record in a foundation dispute involving the Northeast Corridor electrification project.

The lawmakers also want the inspector general to investigate Manatt's miscellaneous expenditures and copying costs. According to the letter, the committee's preliminary review of "four sample monthly invoices from 2003 and 2004" found about $14,000 in nonitemized miscellaneous expenses. It also noted a single $15,900 expense for copying.

Manatt, however, says the costs were justified because of the arbitration it was handling for Amtrak. The $14,000 in nonitemized bills were for hotel facilities, conference space, court transcripts and other related costs, according to the firm.

The firm also denies that the high copying costs were out of line because, it says, the firm was required to produce eight copies of every document for arbitration.

DOJ_NMG_0105536

With Democrats in control of Congress, the future of the Amtrak investigation is uncertain. Incoming Transportation Committee Chairman James Oberstar, D-Minn., takes a much different view of Amtrak from his predecessor Young. Historically, Oberstar has championed Amtrak successes and has called it "chronically underfunded." Rep. Corrine Brown, D-Fla., who is likely to head the Railroads Subcommittee, is also supportive of the passenger railroad.

A spokesman for Oberstar says the congressman hasn't yet set the committee's agenda for the next Congress.

But just because the Democrats will be running the show doesn't mean Rep. Mica won't keep the heat on Amtrak. Last week he was picked as ranking Republican member of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee.

Raid On 19 Bosnian Serb War Criminals In U.S. (NSDY)

By Matthew Mcallester, Newsday Staff Correspondent

Long Island Newsday, December 12, 2006

TAMPA, Fla. -- Federal agents raided homes in five cities Monday, arresting 19 Bosnian Serbs whose units allegedly participated in the Bosnian war's Srebrenica massacre, sources told Newsday.

The murder of more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica was the worst war crime in Europe since World War II.

Monday's arrests follow one in Milwaukee during the weekend. The investigation is continuing, the sources said, and is expected to net more Srebrenica suspects than any other operation to date worldwide.

The total number of Srebrenica suspects arrested in the past two years on immigration violations in the United States is approaching 50. At least three have been deported to Bosnia from Arizona and two are in custody in Sarajevo as prosecutors there investigate them for war crimes.

Agents from Immigration and Customs Enforcement arrested eight men in Tampa Monday. Others were arrested in nearby Orlando and in Denver, Detroit and Chicago. The government alleges that all of them lied on their immigration applications, deliberately omitting mention of their service in the Bosnian Serb Army.

At the federal courthouse in downtown Tampa Monday afternoon, five of the men arrested Monday were arraigned before Judge Thomas McCoun.

Incredulous over arrests

"It's all nonsense," one of the men, Strahinja Krsmanovic, told one of two public defenders representing the men. He and the other four Bosnian Serbs sat in the dock with their ankles bound together by chains.

The men looked slightly stunned at the proceedings, shrugging and even laughing in incredulity when the question of their being at risk of flight, or a danger to the public, was raised.

While investigators and prosecutors do not consider any of the men a present danger, the underlying theme of the operation that led to their arrest is that they were, not so long ago, a mortal danger to thousands.

In July 1995, the Bosnian Serb Army's Bratunac and Zvornik Brigades took control of the besieged town of Srebrenica, a UN-designated "safe area" that was home to tens of thousands of Bosnian Muslims. Soldiers systematically separated men and boys from women and children. In various locations around Srebrenica, the Serb soldiers tortured and executed at least 7,000 men and boys over several days.

The Srebrenica investigation in the United States started when the UN tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in The Hague gave federal investigators a database of names of soldiers the tribunal's prosecutors believed participated in the Srebrenica massacre.

Living quietly in America

An analyst with Immigration and Customs Enforcement cross-referenced the data with immigration databases and has continually uncovered men -- and in at least one case, a woman -- living quiet American lives.

It is very common, investigators say, for the perpetrators of war crimes to enter the United States in the flow of refugees and immigrants who often come from countries wracked with war.

It is hard for prosecutors to prove what individual soldiers were doing during a period of several days more than a decade ago in a distant country.

DOJ_NMG_0105537

The only federal law that can really be used against people living in the United States who have committed war crimes overseas is the torture statute. Just last week prosecutors in Miami, with the approval of Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, brought the first torture case in U.S. history.

The paucity of strong war crimes laws in the United States leaves prosecutors with little option than to use immigration law to pursue suspects -- and ultimately deport them.

That is the fate that possibly awaits the five who appeared in court here Monday. They spoke mostly in Serbo-Croatian, with the aid of two interpreters, about their jobs and finances.

Most of the five seemed to have settled well in the United States, with jobs and homes that they own. Krsmanovic, for example, told the court he worked at a company called Compulink and owned a home. He makes $8.50 an hour, he told the judge, who was trying to decide if each man needed a public defender or could afford his own attorney.

McCoun set a hearing for today to determine terms of release for the men. Sources told Newsday at least four other Bosnian Serb suspects fled the country this month after immigration agents interviewed them.

'Peace Mom' Convicted Of Trespassing (AP)

By Samuel Maull

AP, December 12, 2006

Peace activist Cindy Sheehan and three other women were convicted of trespassing Monday for trying to deliver an anti-Iraq war petition to the U.S. Mission to the United Nations.

A Manhattan Criminal Court judge sentenced them immediately to conditional discharge, which means they could face some form of penalty if they are arrested in the next six months, and ordered them to pay $95 in court surcharges.

Sheehan and about 100 other members of a group called Global Exchange were rebuffed last March when they attempted to take a petition with some 72,000 signatures to the U.S. Mission's headquarters across a street from the United Nations.

After Monday's sentencing, the women returned to the Mission; this time, their petition was accepted.

Prosecutors said they were arrested in March after ignoring police orders to disperse.

The four were acquitted of disorderly conduct, resisting arrest and obstructing government administration. They had faced up to a year in jail if convicted of all counts.

"We should never have been on trial in the first place," Sheehan said in a statement after the verdict. "It's George Bush and his cronies who should be on trial, not peaceful women trying to stop this devastating war. This verdict, however, will not stop us from continuing to work tirelessly to bring our troops home."

Sheehan, 49, of Vacaville, Calif., lost her 24-year-old son Casey in Iraq on April 4, 2004. She has since emerged as one of the most vocal and high-profile opponents of the war, drawing international attention when she camped outside President Bush's Texas ranch to protest the war.

The women, calling their campaign "Women Say No To War," had hoped to give the petition to Peggy Kerry, the mission's liaison for non-governmental organizations and sister of Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., as they had in 2005.

Kerry refused to meet with the women in the presence of Sheehan and the news media. She testified during the trial that the presentation seemed like a publicity stunt.

The women ignored police orders to leave and were reading it aloud on the sidewalk when officers arrested them. The women sat on the sidewalk and were carried to patrol wagons.

Following Monday's court session, the women returned to the U.S. Mission to ask for an apology and resubmit the petition.

They were met by Richard A. Grenell, the mission's director of external affairs, but didn't have the petitions with them. After obtaining copies of the petition, they went back a second time and handed them over to Kerry and Grenell in the building's lobby.

Grenell did not explain why the petitions were accepted this time.

Sheehan's co-defendants were Melissa Beattie, 57, of New York; Susan "Medea" Benjamin, 54, of San Francisco; and Patricia Ackerman, 48, of Nyack, N.Y.

Supreme Court Says Buttons Did Not Bias Jury Against Killer (LAT)

By David Savage

DOJ_NMG_0105538

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court reversed the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals today and restored a California murder conviction that had been thrown out because a small photo of the victim had been worn by his family during the trial.

In a 9-0 decision, the justices said the appeals court had overstepped its bounds when it held that this display violated the defendant's right to a fair trial.

But the court's opinion dealt more with the powers of federal judges than with what spectators can say and do in the courtroom.

Under a 10-year-old law adopted by Congress, U.S. judges are authorized to reverse state criminal convictions only if they spot a violation of "clearly established federal law" as set by the high court.

The 9th Circuit pointed to that provision when it overturned the murder conviction of Mathew Musladin who, in 1994, shot and killed Tom Studer in the driveway of his estranged wife's home in San Jose.

Musladin admitted to shooting Studer, but said he acted in self-defense.

A jury did not believe Musladin and found him guilty of first-degree murder and attempted murder. His conviction was upheld by the California courts.

Two years ago, the 9th Circuit said the trial judge violated clearly established law when he permitted three members of Studer's family — his parents and his younger brother Jim — to wear a small, button-sized photo of the murder victim while sitting in the spectator section of the courtroom.

Judge Stephen Reinhardt said these photos "conveyed the message the defendant was guilty" and violated his right to a fair trial.

In today's opinion, the Supreme Court said it had never ruled that "spectator conduct" in the courtroom violated a defendant's right to a fair trial, except for an early 20th century case involving a "mob dominated" trial.

Justice Clarence Thomas pointed out that the court's only decisions in this area dealt with "government-sponsored practices," such as requiring the defendant to wear prison clothes at his trial. That is unfair and "inherently prejudicial," the justices said in 1976.

Because the high court had not set a clear rule against spectators wearing photos during a trial, the 9th Circuit had no basis for invoking such a rule, Thomas said in Carey vs. Musladin.

The decision was a victory for California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer and several victims rights groups that had urged the justices to reverse the 9th Circuit decision.

Murder Conviction Stands In Supreme Court Case (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court restored a California man's murder conviction Monday, spurning arguments that his trial was unfair because spectators in the courtroom were allowed to wear buttons showing a picture of the victim.

The justices did not rule on whether the display of such buttons should be permitted at trials. Rather, they said in a unanimous decision that a lower court was wrong to find that the buttons may have prejudiced the jury and that the defendant should be able to make his case to a federal judge.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit had said the "message conveyed" by the buttons was that the defendant was guilty. The 9th Circuit concluded that prior rulings by the Supreme Court on unfair trials covered spectators' courtroom conduct.

However, in an opinion by Justice Clarence Thomas, the high court said it had no precedent against such conduct by spectators, so the 9th Circuit should not have ruled that the defendant, Mathew Musladin, could make a claim in federal court. The fundamental question in the case focused on the standards state prisoners must meet to challenge their cases in federal court.

Thomas, joined by five other justices, said there is nothing in existing law that would have made it improper for spectators at Musladin's trial to wear buttons displaying the face of Tom Studer, whom Musladin fatally shot. Thomas said the 9th Circuit wrongly had extended decisions related to "state-sponsored" courtroom practices, such as defendants being forced to wear prison garb, to the private spectators' buttons.

DOJ_NMG_0105539

Three justices, John Paul Stevens, Anthony Kennedy and David Souter, joined only the bottom-line judgment and wrote concurring statements that raised concerns about the potential risks of allowing such buttons in the courtroom.

Questions involving spectator conduct often arise in state trials. In the mid-1990s, U.S. District Court Judge Richard Matsch, handling the Oklahoma City bombing cases of Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols, forbade the wearing in the courtroom of buttons, jewelry or other items connected to the fatal bombing.

Other trial judges have allowed buttons. Most appeals courts hearing such cases have let convictions stand, the justices noted.

Monday's case traced to 1994, when Musladin killed Studer, the fiancé of Musladin's estranged wife. Musladin claimed he did it in self-defense.

Relatives of Studer came to the trial wearing buttons depicting Studer's face and sat in the front row of the spectators' section.

Musladin's lawyer asked the trial judge to bar the buttons; the judge declined. A California appeals court upheld the murder conviction of Musladin, who was sentenced to 32 years to life in prison. The appeals court said wearing such buttons should be discouraged but said jurors in this case probably considered them merely a sign of grief.

Buttons At Trial Didn't Bias Jury, Justices Say (NYT)

By David Stout

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11 — The Supreme Court today unanimously upheld the conviction of a California man who had contended that he was denied a fair trial because people sitting in the courtroom were wearing pictures of the man he killed.

The justices ruled, in a case that addressed the relationship between federal and state courts as well as the conduct of courtroom spectators, that Mathew Musladin was not entitled to a new trial in the 1994 slaying of Tom Studer outside the San Jose home of Mr. Musladin's estranged wife, Pamela.

Mr. Musladin admitted that he shot Mr. Studer to death, but he claimed that he did so in self-defense. After a two-week trial in which some of Mr. Studer's relatives sat behind prosecutors while wearing small pictures of the victim, the jury found Mr. Musladin guilty. He was sentenced to more than 30 years in prison.

In today's ruling, the justices overturned a finding by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, which had held that the California state courts and a federal district court erred in rejecting Mr. Musladin's bid for a new trial. Today's ruling revolved around the 1996 Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, by which Congress curbed the power of federal judges to grant habeas corpus petitions to review state court convictions.

But today's ruling was hardly an endorsement of personal, emotional expressions in a trial courtroom. On the contrary, the key issue was whether the Ninth Circuit went too far. Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the Supreme Court that the circuit had indeed overreached in holding that the lower court decisions were contrary to, or unreasonably applied, "clearly established federal law."

While the Supreme Court has in years past handed down decisions addressing whether the rights of a defendant are prejudiced if he appears before the jury in handcuffs or shackles, or in the presence of several police officers, it had not ruled on whether a murder victim's relatives should be allowed to sit in court wearing buttons with the dead person's picture.

And today's decision may not be the last word on the issue of spectator conduct, to judge by the words of Justice David H. Souter, one of three justices who wrote separate opinions concurring in today's judgment. From a defendant's standpoint, Justice Souter wrote, it does not matter if the issue is official conduct — putting a defendant in shackles or prison garb, for instance — or personal behavior, like wearing pictures of the victim.

"Either way, the trial judge has an affirmative obligation to control the courtroom and keep it free of improper influence," Justice Souter wrote, adding that "one could not seriously deny that allowing spectators to wear visible buttons with the victim's photo can raise a risk of improper considerations."

DOJ_NMG_0105540

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who also wrote a separate opinion, recalled instances in which defendants' rights were compromised, notably the case of Dr. Samuel Sheppard, whose 1954 conviction in the killing of his wife was accompanied by a circus-like courtroom atmosphere.

But, Justice Kennedy wrote, "in the case before us there is no indication the atmosphere" of the trial was "one of coercion or intimidation to the severe extent demonstrated" in the Sheppard case and others.

Justice John Paul Stevens also wrote a separate concurring opinion.

Justice Thomas's opinion was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Stephen G. Breyer and Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The case was Carey v. Musladin, No. 05-785. Thomas L. Carey is the warden of a California state prison at Solano.

High Court Says Buttons Didn't Bias Jury In Murder Case (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, December 12, 2006

When Mathew Musladin went on trial in Santa Clara, Calif., for the 1994 murder of Tom Studer, his estranged wife's fiance, the victim's family showed support for Studer in an unusual way.

Sitting silently near the jury, family members wore buttons bearing a photo of Studer's face every day of the trial. Musladin's lawyer asked the trial judge to order the buttons removed, asserting they would prejudice the jury against his client. The judge denied the motion.

On Monday the Supreme Court ruled in Carey v. Musladin that the Studer family's actions did not violate any firmly established federal rule and there was thus no reason to reverse Musladin's conviction.

The unanimous ruling did not endorse the practice, and Justice David Souter wrote separately that spectators wearing buttons "can raise a risk of improper considerations." But under federal habeas corpus rules, a state conviction can be reversed only if the state court's ruling upholding the conviction misapplies "clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court."

Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for the Court, said it is clearly established by Court precedent that certain actions by the state at trial -- such as forcing a defendant to wear prison garb or surrounding the defendant with uniformed state troopers -- are inherently prejudicial enough to cause the reversal of convictions.

But, Thomas said, the conduct at issue in Musladin's case was "spectator conduct" that is not covered by those precedents. "The Court has never addressed a claim that such private-actor courtroom conduct was so inherently prejudicial that it deprived a defendant of a fair trial," wrote Thomas.

Justice Anthony Kennedy wrote separately in disagreement with Thomas, noting that some Court precedents -- such as those that discouraged cameras in the courtroom -- cover prejudicial actions by nonstate actors. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which was reversed Monday, had also found that high court precedent created a clear rule about spectators' courtroom conduct.

Kennedy said that someday, he could envision a general rule against wearing buttons "to preserve the calm and dignity of a court." But because no such rule exists, and because there was no showing that damage to Musladin's fair-trial rights was "severe," Kennedy agreed that his conviction should not be reversed.

Souter also pointed toward further development of rules on the issue, suggesting that the First Amendment rights of victims' families might also be involved. Justice John Paul Stevens countered in a separate writing that "there is no merit whatsoever" to Souter's suggestion that spectators might have a First Amendment right to engage in "actual or symbolic speech" during a trial.

Jonathan Hacker, who wrote a brief against the button display for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said the decision should not be read as a license for trial judges to allow jurors to wear buttons or make other displays in support of victims in the future. "There are no expressed votes endorsing this practice," said Hacker, a partner at O'Melveny & Myers in D.C. "The justices want the lower courts to look closely at the issue and establish a rule."

DOJ_NMG_0105541

Hacker also criticized the high court decision for making a distinction between conduct by the state and by spectators that might affect the fairness of a trial. "The state provides the courtroom and is responsible for establishing the conditions of the trial," said Hacker. "I hope the lower courts will quickly realize that is not a valid distinction."

U.S. Supreme Court Says Buttons At Murder Trial Did Not Bias Jury Against Defendant (FINDLAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The U.S. Supreme Court, in a first-of-its-kind ruling, concluded unanimously Monday that murder trial spectators were free to wear buttons with a picture of the victim in front of the jury that convicted the defendant.

The justices ruled in favor of California prosecutors who said the buttons were a harmless expression of grief by family members at Mathew Musladin's trial.

It was the first time the justices had ruled on whether the conduct of courtroom spectators deprived a defendant of a fair trial, which in this instance resulted in a conviction that an appeals court reversed.

Musladin had successfully challenged his conviction in the 1994 shooting death of Tom Studer, the fiance of Musladin's estranged wife. Musladin is serving a sentence of 32 years to life in prison.

Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for five of his colleagues, said the buttons "did not deny (Musladin) his right to a fair trial," although he said the question remains open whether spectators' conduct could be prejudicial. The other three justices also concurred with the court's judgment but did not join Thomas' opinion.

Three members of Studer's family wore buttons with a photo of the victim throughout the trial over the objections of Musladin's lawyer. The request prior to trial to preclude the family members from wearing the buttons was rejected by the judge, who said he saw "no possible prejudice to the defendant."

But the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals ordered a new trial. The appeals panel said the buttons "essentially argue that Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty." The dissenting judge in the 2-1 decision said the buttons were a symbol of a family's grief.

The case turned on a 1996 law, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, limiting the circumstances under which federal judges may grant habeas corpus petitions in state court cases.

In order for a federal judge to step in, says the law, the state court decision must be "contrary to" or an "unreasonable application" of clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court.

The appeals court said the state court decision was contrary to Supreme Court holdings. But Thomas said, "We hold that it was not."

Justice David Souter, who wrote a concurring opinion, said there can be little doubt that allowing the buttons at a murder trial "can raise a risk of improper consideration." But he also said he could not conclude that the state court acted unreasonably.

The closest case to Musladin's came six years before the death penalty act, when the San Francisco-based appeals court tossed out a rape conviction on grounds that jurors might have been prejudiced because some trial observers wore pins that read "Women Against Rape."

The justices have ruled on prejudicial impact involving defendants, but never about spectators wearing buttons.

The court has forbidden the use of visible shackles for defendants in front of juries unless the use is justified by an essential state interest such as courtroom security. The court also has forbidden having defendants wear prison clothes in front of juries in most instances.

The state of California argued that Musladin's conviction did not violate clearly established law and was not an unreasonable application of the law.

The 9th Circuit's Deserved Slap (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0105542

CRITICS OF THE U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, such as outgoing California Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, are celebrating that liberal-leaning court's latest rebuff by the Supreme Court. By a 9-0 vote, the justices on Monday overturned a finding by the 9th Circuit in a San Jose case that a convicted murderer had been denied a fair trial because relatives of the victim came to court wearing small buttons bearing the dead man's photograph.

This page, which strongly opposes capital punishment, is nevertheless glad to see the 9th Circuit's wrist slapped for improperly applying the law as it is written.

According to the Supreme Court, that is what the 9th Circuit did when it ruled that Mathew Musladin, who was convicted of killing his ex-wife's fiance in 1994, should be granted a new trial because three relatives of the victim, Tom Studer, displayed his image on buttons.

Strictly speaking, the Supreme Court did not rule that the display was harmless to Musladin's chances of a fair trial. Rather, the issue was whether the 9th Circuit was correct to conclude that a state court decision affirming Musladin's conviction involved an "unreasonable application" of federal law as defined by the U.S. Supreme Court.

In an opinion by Judge Stephen Reinhardt, the 9th Circuit found in 2005 that Musladin's conviction ran afoul of Supreme Court rulings that prejudicial displays by the prosecution — such as forcing a defendant to wear prison clothes and shackles in court — could jeopardize a fair trial. Reinhardt also cited a 9th Circuit precedent involving female spectators who wore "Women Against Rape" buttons, seeing it as a natural extension of the prison-garb decision.

Not so, said Justice Clarence Thomas in Monday's majority opinion. The Supreme Court's previous decisions about prejudicial displays concerned only "state-sponsored courtroom practices," not the conduct of spectators, which, Thomas said, was "an open question in our jurisprudence."

In a separate opinion, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy suggested that in the future the court might want to prohibit the wearing of buttons and similar symbols as "a preventative measure" even though, in this case, there was no indication that the buttons created an atmosphere of intimidation. But Kennedy agreed with Thomas — as did all four liberal justices — that the 9th Circuit essentially jumped the gun by acting as though the Supreme Court had settled the issue.

This might seem like a technical argument between courts, but it points to something more pervasive and troubling: that the 9th Circuit seems predisposed to second-guess state courts, especially in death penalty cases — even to the point of usurping the high court's role. The 9th Circuit's image problem is easy grist for conservatives, but it should be troubling to liberals and moderates as well.

Dr. Who Injected Fake Botox Imprisoned (KGW)

By Kgw.com And AP Staff

KGW-TV, December 12, 2006

A doctor who injected cosmetic patients in Tigard and Salem with a Botox substitute was sentenced to 18 months in Federal prison Monday.

Dr. Jerome Lentini was also ordered, along with his office nurse Catherine Garcia, to pay restitution of $330,306.76.

Lentini was ordered to turn himself in on January 25th, 2007. He was also sentenced to one year of post-prison supervision.

Lentini ran the "A Younger You" clinics until January of 2005, when FBI officials began investigating complaints.

A federal grand jury handed down an indictment last summer, charging Lentini and Garcia with more than 50 charges ranging from mail fraud to misbranding drugs.

According to the indictment, Lentini and Garcia injected patients with a form of botulinum toxin that has not been approved for use on humans by the federal Food and Drug Administration.

Federal officials think Lentini and Garcia injected more than 800 patients with unapproved drugs in a 13-month span, according to records.

"Lentini and Garcia made repeated material misrepresentations and omissions intended to mislead patients into believing they were being treated with an FDA-approved toxin when in fact they were being injected with non-FDA approved (drugs)," read the indictment. Four people in Florida who were injected with the unapproved drug in 2004 contracted botulism.

DOJ_NMG_0105543

Federal investigators in those cases concluded that the botulism was caused by the same nonapproved forms of drug allegedly used by Lentini.

In past statements, Lentini has said he stopped using the anti-wrinkle product because of its poor performance. He said he made that decision before the product was linked to the botulism cases in Florida. Lentini also claimed he did not know that the substitute had not been approved for use by the FDA.

The doctor said he started using the substitute after hearing it praised at a medical conference at the University of Kentucky Medical School.

Two of Lentini's employees, knowing of the Florida cases, became concerned when they witnessed Lentini drawing on what they believed to be large stocks of a non-FDA approved drug. One of the employees contacted the Oregon Board of Medical Examiners and the FBI, triggering the investigation.

Editors' Blog (SSJ)

Salem Statesman Journal, December 12, 2006

— Dr. Jerome Lentini, who ran Salem and Tigard cosmetic clinics called A Younger You, was sentenced in federal court Monday morning for selling the animal form of what patients thought was Botox. Lentini's nurse was sentenced to a year in prison earlier for her mislabeling the drug. State officials say they can't remember the last time a doctor was sent to prison for malpractice reasons.

Tigard Clinic Owner Dr. Jerome Lentini Sentenced (TIGTIMES)

Tigard Times, December 12, 2006

He must serve 18 months in jail and pay restitution to patients for injecting them with illegal drugs

Today in federal court, Dr. Jerome Nicholas Lentini was sentenced to 18 months imprisonment and ordered to pay restitution of approximately $330,000 to more than 800 victims.

Lentini pled guilty to injecting patients with drugs that had not been approved for use on humans by the Food and Drug Administration although he told patients that he was using an FDA-approved drug.

Lentini operated two clinics in Tigard and Salem that offered what Lentini called "anti-aging" treatments. Botulinum toxin injections, intended to smooth facial wrinkles, accounted for the bulk of the treatments provided by the clinics.

Lentini operated the clinics together with a nurse, Cathryn Lyn Garcia. Instead of using FDA-approved BOTOX Cosmetic, Lentini and Garcia used drugs manufactured in the Peoples Republic of China and research-grade drugs manufactured in the United States that were labeled, "Not for human use."

The investigation into Lentini was launched after four people were critically injured in Florida after ingesting non-FDA approved botulinum toxin. The evidence showed that even after learning of the injuries, Lentini and Garcia ordered more of the Chinese toxins from an Internet source based in Turkey.

The Honorable Ancer L. Haggerty, chief judge of the United States District Court for the District of Oregon in Portland sentenced Lentini.

Garcia, who was Lentini's co-defendant, was sentenced to 12 months imprisonment, which she is currently serving at Dublin Federal Correctional Institute in Dublin, Calif.

"Our relationship with our doctor is a relationship of trust," said Karin J. Immergut, United States attorney. "Dr. Lentini violated that trust and deserved severe punishment."

Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Food and Drug Administration conducted the investigation. Assistant United States Attorney Dwight C. Holton led the prosecution of Lentini.

Lawyer Gets Prison For Money Scam (SSJ)

By Ruth Liao

Salem Statesman-Journal, December 12, 2006

Thomas Knapp, a former Salem lawyer who pleaded guilty this year to a money-laundering charge, was sentenced Thursday to a year in federal prison and ordered to pay about $313,000 restitution, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0105544

Knapp was involved in an international loan scam from September 2000 and February 2005, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani. Knapp bought a Mercedes and financed a building on Commercial Street SE where he ran his law practice using money from the scam.

Knapp has 90 days to report to prison. Knapp likely will serve his time at the federal prison in Sheridan, Cardani said.

East Bay Trio Convicted Of Defrauding Microsoft (BAYCN)

Bay City Newswire, December 12, 2006

The U.S. attorney's office reported that three people have been convicted of devising a scheme to defraud Microsoft Corp. by obtaining discounted software under false pretenses.

Prosecutors say the scheme involved buying more than $29 million worth of software that was steeply discounted for academic institutions, and selling it to non-academic entities, in violation of the Microsoft agreement.

Microsoft estimates that it lost more than $60 million as a result of the defendants' criminal acts, according to prosecutors.

In a statement, U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan said, "The perpetrators of this scheme abused a program that offered deeply discounted software to academic institutions."

Ryan said, "These convictions, the result of a collaborative effort by federal and local investigators, show the consequences for engaging in schemes to defraud."

According to prosecutors, Mirza Ali, 59, and his wife, 52-year-old Sameena Ali, 52, both of Fremont, the former owners of Samtech Research Inc., were convicted in a non-jury trial that ended on Nov. 28 of 30 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud, and money laundering.

Keith Griffen, 55, of Oregon City, Ore., was convicted of nine counts of conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud.

According to the evidence in the case, the Alis and Griffen, in the names of others, bought small companies throughout the U.S. that held Microsoft Authorized Education Reseller (AER) licensing agreements and thereafter continued to purchase academic software products.

The AER program provides Microsoft software at steeply discounted prices for resale to academic institutions only.

Using the nominee entities, the Alis and their co-conspirators purchased more than $29 million worth of AER software from Microsoft and sold it to non-academic entities, in violation of their Microsoft agreement, prosecutors said.

The Alis were also convicted of laundering the proceeds of the scheme, including buying property in the name of their college age son and wiring more than $300,000 of the proceeds from the illegal sales of the Microsoft educational software to Pakistan, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

The convictions resulted from "Operation Cyberstorm," a two-year undercover investigation into software piracy and related crimes conducted by agents from Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation unit and the REACT Task Force.

The Alis and Griffen are scheduled to be sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge Claudia Wilken on March 12.

Microsoft 'applauds' Fraud Convictions (PUGSBIZ)

Puget Sound Business Journal, December 12, 2006

Three people were convicted last week by a U.S. District Court judge in Oakland, Calif., for trying to defraud Microsoft Corp.

According to the U.S. Department of Justice, Mirza Ali, his wife, Sameena Ali, and Keith Griffen were convicted on Nov. 28 for trying to defraud the Redmond software giant (NASDAQ: MSFT) by "obtaining discounted software under false pretenses."

The government said that the Alis, of Fremont, Calif., were convicted of 30 counts of conspiracy, mail fraud, wire fraud and money laundering. Griffen, of Oregon City, Ore., was convicted on nine counts of conspiracy, mail fraud and wire fraud.

Justice Department officials said the three people formed corporations that bought $29 million in Microsoft software, which was supposed to be sold to schools and universities at deeply discounted prices. But instead of selling the software to schools, they sold the software to nonacademic entities, the officials said.

Microsoft said it estimates it lost more than $60 million in the scheme that investigators called "Operation Cyberstorm."

DOJ_NMG_0105545

"Microsoft applauds the ... conviction of three individuals involved. The conviction of these individuals is a significant victory for the software industry, its partners and customers, and all who value fair and ethical business practices," said Bonnie MacNaughton, senior attorney for Microsoft, in a statement.

The Alis and Griffen are scheduled to be sentenced in March by U.S. District Court Judge Claudia Wilkin.

Identity-Theft Protection Expands (WSJ)

By Jilian Mincer

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

A small but increasing number of banks now offer to protect clients when an identity thief has been snooping around.

The institutions offer help from generic advice on correcting credit records to personalized help when someone has misused a client's account. MetLife Bank, a unit of MetLife Inc., announced last week that it would provide customers free assistance even if the identity theft doesn't involve a MetLife account.

Unlike credit-card theft, which consumers can resolve with a quick call and, at most, a $50 expense, repairing damage after someone has used your personal information to take over or open bank and other consumer accounts could involve thousands of dollars in personal losses and months of effort.

In 2005, there were 8.9 million identity-fraud victims in the U.S., costing $56.6 billion, according to Javelin Strategy & Research, an independent research firm in Pleasanton, Calif. The average fraud amount per victim was $6,383; the average consumer cost was $422. On average, resolving the problem took 40 hours. The median time for resolution -- meaning half of the incidents took longer and half took less time -- was five hours.

Financial institutions are concerned not only because of the cost but also because their customers are worried about becoming victims. "People count on us to not only protect their cash but their personal information," said John Hall, an American Bankers Association spokesman.

While banks are responsible for helping customers to investigate activity on an account at that institution, some are providing assistance on accounts outside.

Citi Identity Theft Solutions, a unit of Citigroup Inc., provides free identity-theft support for Citi Cards and Citibank customers to recover their identity and to re-establish credit history, said Gina Doynow, an executive vice president at Citi Cards.

When necessary, she said, a specialist helps a customer contact the credit bureaus, put a "fraud alert" on files and close accounts at other financial institutions.

A number of financial institutions collaborated on the Identity Theft Assistance Center in Washington, D.C. Member businesses can refer clients who worry they may be identity-theft victims. ITAC helps customers pull their credit report and walks them through it to see whether they have accounts that have been tampered.

The center has served 11,000 individuals since opening in August 2004. About 60% of its clients are scammed by someone they know.

"It's a service that is valuable because the more we can solve, the more we can prosecute," said Stan Ommen, president and chief executive officer of State Farm Bank, an affiliated company within the State Farm Group that participates in the ITAC program. Part of the problem is that "a lot of personal information is readily available."

MetLife already offers free identity-theft-resolution services to insurance customers in states where it is approved. MetLife Bank said it decided to offer the service because client surveys indicated that the issue was important to them.

"Our customers told us what they fear most is dealing with identity fraud, and all it entails to get your good name back," said Joe Madden, a spokesman for MetLife Bank, based in Bridgewater, N.J. The online bank has grown to about $7.3 billion in assets since it opened in late 2002. The company contracts with Identity Theft 911 LLC, based in Scottsdale, Ariz., to help customers recover from identity theft.

Offering help to victims of identity theft is "a consumer-friendly move," said Tena Friery, research director at the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a nonprofit consumer organization in San Diego. "A lot of financial companies denied for years that there was identity theft at all."

Protectors, Too, Gather Profits From ID Theft (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

Melody Millett was shocked when her car loan company asked her if she was the wife of Abundio Perez, who had applied for 26 credit cards, financed several cars and taken out a home mortgage using a Social Security number belonging to her actual husband.

Beyond her shock, Mrs. Millett was angry. Five months earlier, the Milletts had subscribed to a $79.99-a-year service from Equifax, a big financial data warehouse, that promised to monitor any access to her credit records. But it never reported the credit activity that might have signaled that they were victims of identity theft.

"I feel like the whole thing is a sham," said Mrs. Millett, a 37-year-old information-technology manager from Overland Park, Kan. "You feel completely violated because here are the people who know the industry. They hold all the data." The services, she contends, are oversold.

It is not just criminals who are profiting from identity theft; financial institutions are making money, too. Fear of identity theft has helped give rise to a nearly billion-dollar business in credit-monitoring services sold by the major credit bureaus — companies like Equifax, Experian and TransUnion — as well as direct marketers and banks.

Javelin Strategy and Research, which analyzes the credit-monitoring market, says more than 12 million Americans are now subscribers. The services alert them when lenders have requested their credit files, usually an indication a credit application has been made in their name.

Credit monitoring has quickly gained traction with consumers through aggressive advertising that often promotes its value in protecting against identity theft. But its abilities are far more limited than is commonly perceived.

In the meantime, measures that could stem fraud from identity theft — like legislation empowering consumers to block access to their credit records, making it impossible to extend new credit — have faced stiff resistance from industry groups.

"Identity theft has essentially become a business — not just for bad guys but for good guys, too," said Robert Gellman, a privacy consultant in Washington. "A lot of the people that are involved in profiting legally from identity theft are direct participants in the whole credit system that doesn't have the protections in place to prevent identity theft in the first place."

Some criticism has been aimed at banks, which tolerate a certain amount of fraud as a cost of doing business. But the biggest beneficiaries from identity theft have been the three credit bureaus.

Banks and other lenders have long bought information like a person's payment history or debt load to assess a loan's risk. But credit monitoring turned the system on its head and helped create a new, consumer-focused financial data industry.

In addition to selling files to lenders in bulk, the bureaus now market largely the same records to individuals, including entries that reflect applications for credit, new accounts or balance changes. While the data is sold to a big financial institution for 20 cents to $1 a report, according to analysts and industry executives, it can be repackaged and sold to consumers in the form of credit monitoring for $3 to $16 a month.

Persuading customers to sign up can be costly. But today, Wall Street analysts estimate credit monitoring alone to be a $900 million category, growing 20 percent a year or more.

"It's a pretty big market considering that 10 years ago it didn't exist," said J. Bradford Eichler, a consumer data company analyst at Stephens.

Peace of Mind, at a Price

Representatives of Equifax, Experian and TransUnion, whose consumer affiliates are being sued by the Milletts, would not comment on the couple's specific contentions because of the continuing litigation. But they say credit monitoring is a valuable tool.

"Our products give consumers an early warning system so they can limit the damage and take care of the problem right away," said John Danaher, president of TransUnion's online consumer services arm.

And indeed, many consumers speak glowingly of their experiences with credit monitoring. Wendy Barrington, a 36-year-old Houston woman, recalled the annoyance a friend faced for months after her financial information was stolen.

"I am not about to risk something I have worked so hard on," said Ms. Barrington, who pays about $15 a month for TransUnion's credit-monitoring service. "All it takes is one person stealing your information and you are in a world of hurt."

Still, some consumer advocates caution that people may be overpaying for that peace of mind.

For one thing, Americans can essentially create their own credit-monitoring service by taking advantage of a federal law that guarantees access to one free credit report a year from each of the three bureaus. And thanks to so-called zero liability policies, the cost of fraud is generally absorbed by the credit card companies, merchants and banks.

At the same time, credit monitoring may fail to detect that a credit request was even made. For example, a fraud artist may use someone else's personal identification information — like a Social Security number — but take out a loan in his or her own name. The data mismatch can cause the bureau's computer systems to route the loan request to a separate file so that a credit-monitoring service never picks it up.

That is what Melody and Steven Millett, the Kansas couple, say happened to them.

In late January 2003, Mrs. Millett found something was wrong when a Ford Motor Credit computer system refused to let her set up an online account to pay off an auto loan. When she called the lender, Mrs. Millett said, she was told that an account had already been set up with Mr. Millett's Social Security number but a different name: Abundio Perez.

She later learned of at least 26 cases in which Mr. Millett's personal information had been used in credit applications by Mr. Perez since 1989, according to a lawsuit filed by the Milletts against the credit bureaus, data providers and several creditors in June 2004 in federal court in Kansas City, Kan.

The previous August, Mrs. Millett had bought a credit-monitoring subscription from Equifax. Soon after the Ford Motor Credit incident, she also signed up for credit monitoring with Experian and TransUnion.

At least one credit application using Mr. Millett's Social Security number came after the Milletts obtained their credit-monitoring subscriptions, according to their lawyer, Joyce Yeager. But not once, Mrs. Millett said, did the couple receive notice of unusual access to their credit records or the misuse of Mr. Millett's data. Quite the contrary, the bureaus sent them a succession of reassuring e-mail messages suggesting that their information was safe and offering congratulations.

In their legal claims, which have been separated into several class-action lawsuits, the Milletts say that the bureaus' monitoring services do not work as advertised.

"The core identifier is your Social Security number," Mrs. Millett said in an interview. "You use it for work, for taxes. You would think that identifier would be covered by someone advertising they protect you from identity theft. To think that they are not is just flabbergasting."

Donald Girard, an Experian spokesman, acknowledged that his company's credit-monitoring products could not detect cases in which a credit applicant used someone else's Social Security number but his or her own name because those records were stored separately. He added, however, that in such cases consumers are "not harmed" financially.

Protection vs. Prevention

Initially, the credit bureaus sold monitoring as a way for consumers to understand and manage their credit scores before taking out big loans. But since a wave of data breaches in 2004 heightened consumer fears, a security message appears to have moved toward center stage.

"It is advertised as monitoring for identity-theft protection," said Michael R. Stanfield, chief executive of Intersections, a direct-marketing company that offers credit monitoring through big banks and card companies. But he said consumers hear protection "and don't understand if it is prevention or detection."

"What is needed in the marketplace are products that are going to help you protect your information, monitor it when it is in the process of getting used in a financial fraud, and catch those financial frauds when they are about to occur," he added.

Privacy advocates have suggested providing more fraud-prevention tools to consumers by allowing them to freeze access to credit records if they think they have been identity-theft victims — or as a precaution.

Beginning with California in 2003, such laws have passed in 26 states, including New York last month. But of roughly 148 million credit-eligible customers in those states, Experian estimates 30,000 have elected to freeze their files.

Financial and retailing lobbying groups have generally opposed such legislation at the state and federal levels since it could hinder a retailer in issuing a store-branded credit card — or a bank in extending a loan — to a legitimate customer, who must first unfreeze the credit file. It can also restrict the bureaus from selling consumer credit files.

DOJ_NMG_0105548

The big credit bureaus, after initially opposing tougher legislation, are taking a wait-and-see approach. “It may be that we evolve to that at some point,” said Maxine Sweet, Experian’s vice president for consumer education. “We have to make sure that we are not interfering with what is a very important part of the whole consumer credit economy.”

Such a freeze might not have helped the Milletts, since the problematic files were kept under another name. Mrs. Millett is still using a credit-monitoring service, but she would not recommend it to a friend.

“I still have credit monitoring because of the simple fact that it is the best tool available at this time,” she said. “It is not ideal, it is broken, and it is not as advertised.”

Ameriprise, Massachusetts Settle Over Company's Loss Of Laptop (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

In what may be the first regulatory action against a company for losing sensitive customer data, Massachusetts securities regulators reached a settlement with Ameriprise Financial Inc. over the company's loss of a laptop computer last year.

Under an agreement with the office of Massachusetts Secretary of State William Galvin, Ameriprise agreed to hire an independent consultant within 60 days to review its policies and procedures for employees' and contractors' use of laptop computers that contain personal or financial information on Ameriprise customers.

The Minneapolis-based financial-advisory firm didn't admit any wrongdoing or liability under the settlement.

Steven Connolly, spokesman for Ameriprise, said: "We have been working closely with the commonwealth and are pleased to resolve this matter."

The regulatory action is unusual, said Beth Givens, director of the Privacy Rights Clearinghouse, a San Diego consumer group. More typically when companies lose laptops, customers are typically told to monitor their credit for a certain period. "That of course does not address the situation that existed in the company, that caused the breach to happen," she says.

Over the past nine months, Ms. Givens's organization has cited more than 60 cases of security breaches involving missing laptops at companies, universities, and government agencies.

Ameriprise disclosed in January that it had notified thousands of people that their names and other personal data were stored on a laptop that was stolen from an employee's car on Christmas Eve 2005 while the employee was on vacation in the Midwest. The laptop contained the names and account numbers of 158,000 Ameriprise clients, and the names and Social Security numbers of 67,000 current and former financial advisers. The lost data included information on thousands of Massachusetts residents, among others.

Mr. Galvin's office is also investigating a similar incident involving Fidelity Investments, said a person familiar with the matter. In March, a Fidelity employee left a laptop containing personal information, including Social Security numbers, on 196,000 current and former Hewlett-Packard Co. workers in a parked sport-utility vehicle in Palo Alto, Calif. The laptop was stolen. Fidelity reported the loss to customers.

Fidelity spokesman Vincent Loporchio says the company has cooperated fully with Massachusetts regulators. The company has also increased encryption of its data, he says. Encryption is a procedure through which data are encoded so they can be read only with a special code.

Major Breach Of UCLA's Computer Files (LAT)

By Rebecca Trounson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

Personal information on 800,000 students, alumni and others is exposed. Attacks lasted a year, the school says.

In what appears to be one of the largest computer security breaches ever at an American university, one or more hackers have gained access to a UCLA database containing personal information on about 800,000 of the university's current and former students, faculty and staff members, among others.

UCLA officials said the attack on a central campus database exposed records containing the names, Social Security numbers and birth dates — the key elements of identity theft — for at least some of those affected. The attempts to break into the database began in October 2005 and ended Nov. 21, when the suspicious activity was detected and blocked, the officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0105549

In a letter scheduled to be sent today to potential victims of the breach, acting Chancellor Norman Abrams said that although some Social Security numbers were obtained by the hackers, the university had no evidence that any of the information had been misused.

"We take our responsibility to safeguard personal information very seriously," Abrams said in the letter, which was scheduled to be mailed or e-mailed overnight to those whose records were compromised. "My primary concern is to make sure this does not happen again" and to provide information to try to minimize the risk of identity theft for those affected, he said.

Abrams urged those whose records might have been accessed to monitor their consumer credit files and consider fraud alerts and other precautions.

The UCLA incident is the latest in a series of computer security breaches affecting private organizations, financial institutions, government agencies and other large employers. Partly because of their tradition of openness, universities are proving to be a favorite — and often vulnerable — target, several experts in the field said Monday.

"Universities tend to have a lot of information floating around in a lot of different places," said Jay Foley, executive director of the Identity Theft Resource Center, a San Diego-based nonprofit. "They are places we send our children to share ideas, and it's hard to mix the open sharing of ideas with the need to tighten down on security."

In 2003, for example, a hacker at San Diego State used an outdated computer network in the drama department to find a way into the financial aid system. The Social Security numbers of more than 200,000 people were exposed.

Foley and others interviewed said that although there was no evidence of any fraudulent or illegal use of the information, the UCLA breach, in the sheer number of people affected, appeared to be among the largest at an American college or university.

"To my knowledge, it's absolutely one of the largest," said Rodney Petersen, security task force coordinator for Educause, a nonprofit higher education association that focuses on technology issues. He said most problems at universities have involved breaches of departmental or other, smaller databases.

Comprehensive statistics on computer break-ins at colleges do not exist. But in the first six months of this year alone, there were at least 29 security failures at colleges nationwide, jeopardizing the records of 845,000 people. Both private and public institutions have been hit. In 2005, a database at USC was hacked, exposing the records of 270,000 individuals.

Petersen said that in a survey released by Educause in October, about a quarter of 400 colleges said that over the previous 12 months, they had experienced a security incident in which confidential information was compromised.

At UCLA, officials said Monday that the targeted database included records for the university's current and former students, faculty and staff, in some cases dating to the early 1990s. Others potentially affected included some applicants during the last five years who did not enroll at the university, as well as some parents of students or applicants who had applied for financial aid.

About 3,200 of those being notified are current or former staff and faculty of UC Merced and current or former staff of UC's Oakland headquarters. UCLA handles administrative processing for both groups.

Besides names, Social Security numbers and birth dates of those affected, the database includes home addresses and contact information, officials said. It does not contain driver's license numbers or credit card or banking information.

Jim Davis, UCLA's associate vice chancellor for information technology, described the attack as sophisticated, saying it used a program designed to exploit a flaw in a single software application among the many hundreds used throughout the Westwood campus.

"An attacker found one small vulnerability and was able to exploit it, and then cover their tracks," Davis said.

He said the problem was spotted when computer security technicians noticed an unusually high number of suspicious queries to the database. It took several days for investigators to be sure that it was an attack and to learn that Social Security numbers were the target, he said.

Davis said the investigation was continuing, but that university officials had decided to notify potential victims now.

"UCLA and its community are the victims of this, and despite the great deal of effort we put into security, this really is a breach of trust with our community," he said. "Given that we saw intent in this, we needed to let people know."

UCLA has established a website to provide information and answer questions about the incident at http://www.identityalert.ucla.eduand a toll-free call center, (877) 533-8082.

DOJ_NMG_0105550

Laura Eimiller, spokeswoman for the FBI's Los Angeles office, said the agency was investigating the breach, but said she could not comment further.

*

rebecca.trounson@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Hacked files

Here are some large computer security breaches involving public agencies and U.S. companies:

CardSystems Solutions Inc.

Disclosed: June 2005

Number of records: 40 million

How: Hackers infiltrated computers at a credit card processing center.

--

U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs

Disclosed: May 2006

Number of records: 26.5 million

How: A burglar stole electronic data on veterans from the home of a federal employee.

--

Citigroup

Disclosed: June 2005

Number of records: 3.9 million

How: United Parcel Service lost computer tapes containing account and payment history data.

--

DSW Shoe Warehouse

Disclosed: April 2005

Number of records: 1.4 million

How: Hackers accessed a database of customers and credit card numbers.

--

Bank of America

Disclosed: February 2005

Number of records: 1.2 million

How: The company lost computer tapes containing personal information for credit cards used by federal employees.

--

Ohio Secretary of State

Disclosed: April 2006

Number of records: "Millions"

How: The office distributed 20 copies of registered voter lists that accidentally included Social Security numbers.

Times research by Scott Wilson

Small Grocery Stores Hotbeds For Food Stamp Fraud (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, December 12, 2006

Efforts to reduce the illegal use of food stamps have kept millions of dollars in benefits from going to waste during the past five years, but small convenience and grocery stores in low-income areas continue to be hotbeds for fraud, according to the Government Accountability Office.

DOJ_NMG_0105551

The GAO is recommending that the Department of Agriculture intensify its focus on finding stores that violate federal rules and increase penalties for trafficking in misused stamps. The GAO's recommendations, in a report released in October, come as Congress is preparing to revisit the $29 billion-a-year food stamp program next year as part of a giant farm bill.

Among other things, the GAO is urging the Food and Nutrition Service (FNS) — the agency within the Agriculture Department that runs the food stamp program — to review the 160,000 stores authorized to receive stamps to determine which are most likely to engage in fraud and to target them for enforcement.

FNS Deputy Administrator Clarence Carter says the agency will take some cues from the GAO report when it proposes changes in the program to Congress.

Households qualify for food stamps if their gross monthly income is 130% or less of the federal poverty level, or less than about $1,799 a month for a family of three.

Food stamp recipients who want to use their benefits to buy something other than food have found many ways to get cash out of the system. Typically, a grocer or store owner willing to take part in such a scheme will pay a food stamp recipient about 50 cents in exchange for $1 in stamp payments, the GAO has found. The retailer then can claim that the $1 was used for groceries and seek reimbursement from the government.

Some small retailers intending to scam the government will stock only the minimum amount of food required to qualify for the program and may let their stock dwindle after they are accepted, figuring inspectors won't return, the GAO said.

The selling of food benefits for cash at small groceries and convenience stores is 38 times the rate of fraud at large supermarkets, where less than a penny per dollar is lost to fraud, the GAO found.

About $241 million in food stamp benefits were stolen in 2005, according to the FNS, which reported that small stores redeemed less than 15% of the food stamp benefits last year but accounted for $190 million of the fraud.

Despite the problems at smaller stores, FNS officials have told GAO investigators that they allow stores that stock a bare minimum of groceries to enter the food stamp program so that stamp clients in neighborhoods without supermarkets will have places to shop.

Carter says the FNS is intensifying its review of food stamp transactions and sending undercover agents to inspect stores.

"It's a stickier problem than with large supermarkets," he says. "The number of small convenience store retailers outnumbers the large retailers."

Groups that work to expand low-income residents' access to nutritional food say that while more enforcement is necessary, encouraging full-service supermarkets — and their relatively low fraud rates — to open more outlets in urban neighborhoods could be key to ending food stamp fraud.

"Folks would rather buy food than end up with 50 cents on the dollar," says Yael Lehmann, executive director of the The Food Trust in Philadelphia, which helps establish full-service supermarkets, farmers markets and other outlets for healthy food in low-income and inner-city areas. "If there is any solution, it really is on the access piece of this puzzle."

Many supermarket chains, however, are reluctant to build in urban areas, where large plots of land can be expensive and rare, Lehmann says. Buildings may be older and in need of costly renovations, she says, and security also may be a concern.

Giant Food LLC, which has built several full-service supermarkets in urban neighborhoods in Baltimore and Washington, D.C., needs at least 5 acres and $5 million to $7 million to build its standard store, says Barry Scher, Giant's vice president for public affairs.

"You don't go into the worst areas and just hope for the best," he says. "We have to make sure the population is going to produce a successful store."

The amount stolen from the food stamp program through fraud has declined dramatically since 1993, when the program lost about $812 million, according to the GAO. Increased enforcement has helped, as has the Electronic Benefits Transfer (EBT) system, which eliminated the easier-to-trade paper benefit coupons.

In 2002, food stamp recipients began receiving benefits through an electronic transfer into a personal account that can be accessed with an electronic debit card and a PIN number, much like an ATM card. Since then, food stamp fraud has decreased from 2.5 cents for every dollar of benefits to 1 cent per dollar, FNS says.

DOJ_NMG_0105552

"We are very pleased that there has been a pretty dramatic reduction" in trafficking, Carter says. "But we can never act as if we've solved the problem, because it's ongoing every single day."

Fraud cases based on analyzing the EBT data now account for more than half of the instances in which stores have been booted from the program, the GAO report said.

Even so, Carter acknowledges that more needs to be done to combat fraud at smaller stores. More fraud takes place in such stores because such businesses are run by individuals and they often do not have inventory control systems or multiple layers of management, the GAO found.

The government prosecutes dozens of cases of food stamp fraud each year and disqualified 841 retailers in 2005, but the GAO report said the civil penalties aren't tough enough to deter traffickers.

Criminal penalties for individuals convicted of food stamp fraud are more severe. A Dearborn, Mich., man pleaded guilty last month to committing more than $380,000 in food stamp fraud over 20 months. Wissam Salameh, 32, manager of a BP gas station and convenience store in Detroit, was convicted of trading cash for food stamp benefits. Salameh, who will be sentenced in February, faces a maximum sentence of 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Kate Coler, deputy undersecretary for USDA's Food, Nutrition and Consumer Services, says the 2007 farm bill "is the perfect opportunity" for Congress and the Bush administration to strengthen the anti-fraud provisions in the food stamp program.

Bush's 2007 budget plan calls for $160 million to fund the FNS office, $18 million more than 2006. The request includes a $4 million increase for "program integrity," which enforces food stamp rules, but it does not include a specific plan for attacking fraud at small grocers.

"One of the keys to addressing this problem will be more resources," says Tom Reynolds, spokesman for Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, who will become chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee in January.

Fighting Drug Fakes (NYT)

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

Tempted to buy cheap medicines from a pharmacy Web site? Think twice. If the Web site shows no verifiable street address for the pharmacy, there is a 50 percent chance the drugs are counterfeit.

In rich countries, fake medicines mainly come from virtual stores. Elsewhere, they are on the pharmacy shelves. In much of the former Soviet Union, 20 percent of the drugs on sale are fakes. In parts of Africa, Asia and Latin America, 30 percent are counterfeit. The culprits range from mom-and-pop operations processing chalk in their garages to organized-crime networks that buy the complicity of regulators, customs officials and pharmacists.

In Panama, dozens of people died after taking counterfeit drugs made with an industrial solvent. Often counterfeiters put in real ingredients for their smell or taste, but heavily diluted. This has sped the emergence of resistant strains of infections, and is probably a big reason some malaria drugs and antibiotics have lost their power.

Drug counterfeiting can be fought. Five years ago, the majority of Nigeria's drugs were fakes, and the country was a major source of counterfeits abroad. When the Nigerian government donated 88,000 doses of meningitis vaccine to Niger during an epidemic in 1995, the vaccine turned out to be a fake — causing more than 2,500 children to die.

Now the possibility that a drug is fake in Nigeria has dropped to 17 percent, according to the World Health Organization. The country's drug control agency is informing people through radio and TV jingles about fake medicines. It has also fired corrupt officials, hired a fleet of inspectors to drop in on pharmacies, banned imports from some 30 companies, and begun prosecuting counterfeiters.

One of the problems Nigeria still faces is that the penalty for counterfeiting medicine is as little as a $70 fine — a small price to pay for a crime that can reap a fortune. All over the developing world, governments treat falsifying medicines as a mere copyright infringement, rather than potential murder.

The W.H.O. has recently set up a task force that brings together many groups that work on counterfeit drugs. It is a start. Multinational drug companies — which have been reluctant to report fakes lest they erode consumer confidence in all drugs — need to do more. An international convention is also needed to establish stiffer penalties for counterfeiting drugs, and marshal more funds and support to fight this deadly crime.

DOJ_NMG_0105553

CIVIL LAW:

Appeals Panel Hears Arguments On Defense Labor Relations Rules (GOVEXEC)

By Karen Rutzick

Government Executive, December 12, 2006

A panel of appeals court judges heard arguments Monday over the legality of the Defense Department's proposed labor relations system for civilian employees.

After losing in a lower court in February -- and following two losses for the Homeland Security Department's similar system -- government lawyers continued to argue that Congress gave the Pentagon authority to make far-reaching changes to collective bargaining.

In the 2004 Defense authorization bill, Congress granted the department authority to create a new human resources system, based on the notion that the current system was too rigid and outdated to allow the department to respond with agility to modern threats of terrorism.

Pentagon officials said they have the authority to override collective bargaining agreements after they are reached and the ability to narrow the items that can be bargained over as much as they want. But a coalition of federal labor unions sued the department to say the rules effectively eliminate collective bargaining.

Judges Brett Kavanaugh, David Tatel and Stephen Williams of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia heard an hour and a half of arguments Monday, but they could take until the summer to issue an opinion. Either side could then appeal to the full court of appeals, the Supreme Court or both.

Justice Department lawyer William Kanter, representing the Defense Department, argued that Congress included a sunset provision -- all labor relations changes revert to the old system in 2009 unless Congress actively votes to make them permanent -- to allow experimentation.

"It tells you that Congress knew it was charting a new course," Kanter said.

Tatel, a Clinton appointee and the lone Democrat on the panel, said, however, that there are many time-limited statutes that are decided on by the courts, and the sunset clause might not supersede the need for a system that is legal.

Congress said in its legislation that the Pentagon could remake labor relations rules, but had to ensure collective bargaining. Kanter argued that the Pentagon could define collective bargaining as it sees fit, but union lawyers asked the judges to look to the decision in the Homeland Security Department's case for a definition.

In that decision, appellate judge Harry Edwards said the proposed rules "effectively eliminate all meaningful bargaining over fundamental working conditions. In no sense can such a limited scope of bargaining be viewed as consistent with [Congress'] mandate that DHS 'ensure' collective bargaining rights for its employees."

Kavanaugh -- who President Bush appointed in May 2006 and who served in the White House as legal counsel and then staff secretary for Bush from 2001 until the president appointed him to his current position -- pushed union lawyer Joe Goldberg on the Pentagon's authority to create a new labor system.

Kavanaugh pointed out that Congress included a qualifier in the language that ensured collective bargaining: "subject to the provisions of this chapter and any exclusion from coverage or limitation on negotiability established pursuant to law." There is no qualifying language in the part of the law giving the secretary authority to create a new system to fit Defense's national security mission.

The judges also pressed Kanter on the department's proposal to create a new internal labor relations board, which would investigate and decide on labor-management disputes in place of the governmentwide Federal Labor Relations Authority.

The judges questioned whether the National Security Labor Relations Board, whose members would be appointed by the Defense secretary, would be sufficiently independent, as Congress required.

The third judge on the appeals panel, Williams, is a Reagan appointee who became a senior judge in 2001.

Court Hears Appeals On Ruling Against Pentagon Personnel System (FEDTIMES)

By Tim Kauffman

DOJ_NMG_0105554

Federal Times, December 12, 2006

Three years ago, Congress gave the Defense Department authority to craft a new labor relations system outside existing rules governing collective bargaining. At the same time, Congress said the department couldn't remove an employee's right to organize and bargain collectively.

These two seemingly contradictory statements are at the heart of a legal dispute that could decide whether the department can proceed with changes to personnel rules affecting 650,000 civilian employees.

"The question is: Has the department reasonably interpreted the phrase 'collective bargaining'?" Judge David Tatel said Dec. 11, effectively summarizing the case before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

The answer is up to Tatel and two other appellate judges to decide.

The three-judge panel heard oral arguments Dec. 11 from attorneys representing the government and unions, who sued the department in November 2005 for creating a system that failed to protect employees' rights to bargain collectively.

The hearing lasted twice as long as the 40 minutes initially set aside for arguments, as the judges peppered the lawyers with detailed questions concerning what specific sections of the 2003 law meant.

Judge Brett Kavanaugh said two provisions in the law authorizing the Pentagon's National Security Personnel System (NSPS) provide "strong support" to the union's arguments: one section that gives employees the right to organize and bargain collectively, and another section that prohibits the department from waiving Chapter 71 of Title 5 governing labor relations.

However, two other provisions seem to support the government's case: one section that allows the department to ignore Chapter 71 when writing personnel management rules, and another that allows the department to create a labor relations system without regard to Chapter 71.

Joe Goldberg, the attorney who argued on behalf of the 13 federal employee unions that filed the lawsuit, said provisions allowing the department to create a labor relations system outside Chapter 71 apply only to the mechanics of creating the system, not what is bargained under the system.

Goldberg, assistant general counsel at the American Federation of Government Employees, said Congress clearly required collective bargaining under NSPS. However, the department created a system that provided nothing close to collective bargaining, he argued.

It's "a classic case of rule-making overreach," Goldberg said.

A lower court agreed. In February, Judge Emmett Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia said NSPS infringes on employees' collective bargaining rights, fails to provide an independent third-party review of labor-management disputes, and lacks a fair process to resolve appeals of adverse management actions.

The government appealed the ruling to the appeals court, which is expected to issue its decision this spring.

Judge Sullivan's ruling was rife with references to an earlier case involving the Homeland Security Department. In that case, the same appeals court currently debating NSPS ruled that Homeland Security's authority to waive portions of Title 5 governing labor relations "does not include the power to rewrite the core meaning of collective bargaining,"

William Kanter, a Justice Department attorney who argued the NSPS case on behalf of the government, said that unlike with Homeland Security, Congress gave the Pentagon specific authority to craft a labor relations system outside Title 5 rules.

There are other differences between the statutes related to Homeland Security and Defense, Kanter said. The collective bargaining system created under NSPS will expire in November 2009 unless Congress decides otherwise. If the new system expires, the department must revert to following the labor relations rules outlined in Chapter 71.

This sunset provision shows that Congress gave Defense much more latitude to deviate from existing collective bargaining rules than Homeland Security, where changes were more restrictive yet permanent, he said.

"This project is in essence akin to an experimental one," Kanter said.

Bolstering the government's case, Kavanaugh said the sunset provision seems to suggest that Congress didn't intend for Chapter 71 to apply to the collective bargaining system created under NSPS, since it specifically stated that Chapter 71 would apply if the NSPS system expires.

DOJ_NMG_0105555

But the sunset provision seemed to backfire on Kanter at one point, when the judges questioned the department's authority to use so-called implementing issuances to override collective bargaining agreements. In response, Kanter referred to the sunset clause.

"If we're not doing it right, Congress can tell us that in two years," Kanter said.

"You mean we should just wait for that to happen?" responded Tatel.

FEDERAL DIARY: The New Defense Work Rules, At War With One Another (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, December 12, 2006

B-4, D-2, K-1, M-1, M-8.

At times yesterday, the courtroom debate about the law that created a new civil service system for the Defense Department sounded like the judges and lawyers were playing Battleship, the game where opponents use a grid to target and sink ships.

The debate, before a three-judge federal appeals panel, focused on seemingly conflicting provisions in the 2003 law that permitted the Pentagon to issue regulations aimed at overhauling workplace rules and installing a pay-for-performance system.

The law's B-4 provision, for example, ensures that Defense civil service employees may join unions and bargain over their working conditions, but the M-1 and M-8 provisions permit the secretary of defense to modify labor rules and override union contracts.

Congress gave the Pentagon a green light to overhaul the personnel rules that apply to Defense civil service employees after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Pentagon officials said changes were needed to streamline labor relations and make the department more effective in the fight against terrorism. Unions have claimed that the rules were designed by the Bush administration to gut their rights rather than improve national security.

The courts have mostly sided with the unions, faulting those parts of the new National Security Personnel System that would permit the secretary of defense to put issues off limits for contract talks and break contracts normally considered to be binding on both parties.

In February, U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan blocked the Pentagon from launching the new NSPS workplace rules, finding that they failed to ensure collective-bargaining rights and did not provide for an independent, third-party review of labor-management disputes.

The government asked the appeals panel yesterday to reverse Sullivan and allow the NSPS labor rules to go forward. But the government's task has been made more difficult by a separate case involving the Department of Homeland Security. U.S. District Judge Rosemary M. Collyer faulted a similar plan for Homeland Security, and a subsequent appeal also went against the department. The Homeland Security rules are back on the drawing board.

With that backdrop, Judges David S. Tatel, Stephen F. Williams and Brett M. Kavanaugh, on the bench at the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, yesterday tried to sort out the NSPS law and how the government has interpreted it.

William Kanter a Justice Department lawyer representing the Pentagon, contended that Congress defined what issues had to be put on the table for bargaining with unions, put limits on those rights and gave power to the defense secretary to throw out contracts. Certain phrases in the NSPS law makes it different from the Homeland Security statute and the rules blocked by the courts, he argued.

Joseph Goldberg, a lawyer with the American Federation of Government Employees, disagreed, saying that no matter how the government reads various provisions, it must take into account that the law provides for collective bargaining, as guaranteed in current law, and does not clearly eliminate the right of unions to bargain over the "impact and implementation" of management decisions.

Kavanaugh, perhaps in an effort to cut through apparent conflicting provisions, pointed out that NSPS sections K and M -- which curb union rights -- were not passed by the House and Senate but came from closed-door negotiations among lawmakers.

In making that observation, he raised the notion that the addition of two provisions late in the legislative process could be a sign that Congress intended to cancel out other provisions in the NSPS law stipulating employee rights to bargain collectively.

DOJ_NMG_0105556

Former Assistant DA Testifies In Civil Trial (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, December 12, 2006

He was unaware of lie in slay case

Jack I. Zalkind thought he did everything he could to make sure that Mafia hitman Joseph "The Animal" Barboza was telling the truth when he implicated six men in a 1965 gangland killing, the former assistant Suffolk district attorney testified yesterday.

But Zalkind said he prosecuted the case without knowing that the FBI had secret reports that indicated Barboza was lying and had falsely implicated four of the six.

"I have no memory of seeing any FBI reports prior to the trial," said Zalkind, who helped convict Joseph Salvati, Peter Limone, Louis Greco, and Henry Tameleo for the slaying of petty thief Edward "Teddy" Deegan in a Chelsea alley.

All four men were exonerated when the FBI reports surfaced five years ago.

Yesterday, Zalkind was the first live witness to testify in a federal civil trial that began last month, seeking more than $100 million in damages from the federal government for Limone, 72, and Salvati, 74, who spent more than 30 years in prison each, and the families of Tameleo and Greco, who both died in prison.

Recounting Barboza's version of Deegan's slaying, Zalkind said the hitman-turned-government witness said that Limone offered him $7,500 to kill Deegan. Tameleo, the alleged second in command of the New England Mafia, had sanctioned the slaying. Barboza said Salvati and Greco helped carry out the murder.

Zalkind said he had warned Barboza, "God forbid if you're putting someone there who wasn't there," but he said Barboza insisted, "I'm not lying."

Zalkind said he also confronted Barboza about whether his close friend, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, was one of the killers. But, he said Barboza's statement that he did not involve Flemmi because he used drugs and was hot-tempered "seemed rational to me."

The civil suit alleges that the FBI knew that Barboza was lying to protect Flemmi, who was an FBI informant and the brother of another FBI informant, Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

The FBI recruited Barboza as a witness and used him in an earlier trial.

But Zalkind testified that he did his own work to corroborate Barboza's testimony before the Deegan murder trial and said the FBI "had nothing to do with the preparation of the case."

Barboza, who admitted to participating in Deegan's slaying and was given leniency for his cooperation, was shot to death in 1976 in San Francisco.

Two other men convicted in Deegan's slaying were not exonerated. Ronald Cassesso died in prison and Wilfred Roy French was later released.

Yesterday, Cassesso's lawyer, Ronald J. Chisholm, testified that FBI agent H. Paul Rico had promised Cassesso that he would not do prison time for Deegan's slaying if he agreed to testify against the others and back up Barboza's version of events.

But, Chisholm said, Cassesso told him he had rejected Rico's offer, telling the agent, "I'm not going to frame innocent men."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Report Details NYC Police Shooting (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Witnesses interviewed for a preliminary report on the police shooting of three men - including a groom on his wedding day - did not mention a fourth, possibly armed man who police say may have been present before officers opened fire, a newspaper reported Monday.

The New York Times obtained a copy of the police department's 23-page preliminary report of the shooting, a detailed look at what happened on Nov. 25 when Sean Bell, 23, and his two friends were caught in a barrage of 50 bullets after a bachelor party at a strip club in Queens. Bell's friends were wounded; all three men were unarmed.

Police have suggested a fourth man may have had a gun and fled when the plainclothes officers opened fire, but the report made no mention of such a man, whom the surviving victims have said does not exist. Some in the community claim the officers invented the man to justify the shooting.

The report also contains no indication that police were searching after the shooting for a fourth man, the paper said.

The preliminary report includes summaries of interviews with Lt. Gary Napoli, who was supervising a team conducting an undercover operation at the strip club on the night of the shooting, two sergeants who responded after the gunfire began and 10 other officers, according to The Times. Also included are synopses of accounts by three civilian witnesses, including one of the victims, Trent Benefield.

Police investigators did not interview the five shooters in deference to an investigation by the Queens district attorney probe that could result in criminal charges.

In his statement to police, Benefield said Bell repeatedly drove forward and in reverse after officers opened fire, the newspaper reported. His account contradicts police statements that the detective opened fire after being hit by Bell's car.

The report reveals that none of the witnesses recalled hearing anything close to 50 rounds, The Times said. The sergeants who arrived after the shooting told investigators that two of the plainsclothes officers said they were unsure whether they had even fired at all, the newspaper reported.

The report also emphasizes that Napoli and his team were concerned that men outside the club could have been armed before the shooting, The Times said.

A police spokesman said early Monday no senior official would be available to comment on the report's findings until later in the day.

50 Bullets, One Dead, And Many Questions (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum And Al Baker

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

When the shooting stopped, the police lieutenant edged toward the gray Nissan Altima with his gun drawn. He ordered the men inside to show their hands. The lieutenant had not fired his weapon, and as he neared the car, according to police records, one of the bloodied men inside complied and stuck his hands out the window. The other did not move.

A police sergeant who arrived seconds later described the scene this way: The Nissan had crashed into a van in the middle of the street. Smoke was coming from its radiator. The man in the driver's seat was slumped back. His passenger was lying across his lap with his arms hanging outside the driver's window.

The sergeant, Michael Wheeler, later told investigators that both men appeared seriously injured and likely to die, according to the records. A plainclothes officer stood close by, his pistol still trained on the two men in the car. A third man lay on the street nearby.

Minutes later, the shooting scene on Liverpool Street in Jamaica, Queens, was choked with patrol cars and the scrum of officials that follows a police shooting. A captain ordered another uniformed sergeant, Donald Kipp, to locate and inspect the weapons of the men involved in the shooting. In all, five plainclothes officers had fired a total of 50 bullets.

But one after another, in conversations with Sergeant Kipp or Sergeant Wheeler, the men said they could not say how many shots they had fired. Two said they were unsure whether they had even fired at all, including a detective who investigators later learned had fired 31 shots, emptying his 9-millimeter Sig Sauer pistol, reloading and emptying it again during the frenzied barrage.

The accounts of the lieutenant and the two sergeants are included in the Police Department's preliminary report of the shooting early on Nov. 25 that left the car's driver, Sean Bell, 23, dead on his wedding day and two of his friends wounded, one seriously. The men were part of a larger group that had just attended Mr. Bell's bachelor party in a strip club down the block.

The 23-page document prepared in the days after the shooting, and obtained by The New York Times, does not include the accounts of the four detectives and one police officer who fired their weapons. They are the subjects of an investigation by the office of the Queens district attorney, Richard A. Brown, and it is not clear if they will submit to interviews with prosecutors or testify before a grand jury.

DOJ_NMG_0105558

But the report provides the most detailed account, and the best chronology made public to date, of the shooting itself, the events that led up to it and what people saw and heard.

It summarizes the first interviews with the lieutenant, Gary Napoli, who was supervising the five members of the Club Enforcement Team who fired their weapons, the two sergeants who responded after the gunfire broke out, and 10 other officers — including three team members who were close by, but not present at the scene. It also includes synopses of the preliminary interviews of three civilian witnesses, including one of the victims, Trent Benefield.

Mr. Brown, who has said his investigation is in its earliest stages, has noted that the report raises as many questions as it answers and will serve simply as a starting point for his inquiry, in which he will present evidence to a grand jury, which will determine whether a crime was committed.

Yet the report undeniably provides insights into what happened that night. Among the notable aspects:

¶It includes no meaningful discussion of a fourth man, a mysterious figure who some in the Police Department have suggested may have been present along with the three men who were shot. None of the witnesses whose accounts are in the report speaks of someone who may have fled — perhaps possessing a gun — and there are no indications that the police at the time were seeking anyone who may have left the scene.

¶The undercover detective who fired the first shot — and fired a total of 11 rounds — emptied his gun, a Glock Model 26, which holds 10 rounds in the magazine and 1 in the chamber. He was not wearing his bulletproof vest or carrying his gun during the undercover operation; going without the vest and the gun is routine procedure. He retrieved his gun but did not put on his vest — as another detective did — and remained vulnerable as the group of officers scrambled to deal with what they feared was an imminent eruption of violence.

¶Mr. Bell, mortally wounded and not speaking, and Joseph Guzman, despite wounds from his head to his feet, were put in handcuffs after the gunfire ceased.

¶None of the witnesses — police or civilians — whose accounts are detailed in the report recall hearing anything close to 50 rounds. One detective says she heard eight shots fired with no pause. Another detective heard shots in three rapid successions, but the report includes no number. A third detective heard "numerous" shots. The report also refers to 31 "ear-witnesses" whose statements have been taken, but does not describe what they said. Mr. Benefield recalls eight or nine shots being fired.

¶Mr. Benefield said a man he had not seen before stood in front of Mr. Bell's car and simply opened fire, striking Mr. Guzman once, and that Mr. Bell then repeatedly drove forward and in reverse and collided with other vehicles in an attempt to drive away. His account differs from the accounts of some police officers that the detective opened fire after Mr. Bell's car had struck him, crashed into a police van, and then nearly hit him a second time.

¶The interviews make it clear that the officers were concerned about men with guns in the minutes leading up to the shooting. One man, they thought, had a gun inside the club. They came to suspect that another man standing outside the club might have had a gun. Yet another, identified as Mr. Guzman, shouted for someone to get his gun outside the club. The officers talked about their concerns over their cellphones, over their radios and, in at least one instance, among themselves as the undercover detective grabbed his weapon from an unmarked police car.

¶Lieutenant Napoli's account makes clear that he believed the men in Mr. Bell's car knew he was a police officer because he had made eye contact with one of them. The report says Lieutenant Napoli could not articulate why he believed that. Lawyers representing Mr. Guzman and Mr. Benefield have declared that they had no idea the men they encountered that night on Liverpool Street were the police.

¶The report lists the arrest records of the three men shot that night. Each had been arrested in crimes involving firearms, though no specifics of those crimes are given. Nor is the final disposition of those cases included in the report.

An Uneventful Start

The nine members of the team all started work that night about 9:30 p.m. They were well into a relatively uneventful eight-and-a-half-hour shift when they gathered in an office in a squat modern brick police building on Manhattan's Lower East Side.

The building, the Seventh Precinct station house, is also home to the department's Club Enforcement Initiative. There, about 11 p.m., Lieutenant Napoli, a 22-year veteran, led a meeting to map out their night's work.

DOJ_NMG_0105559

According to his own account, the lieutenant told the team of six men and two women, a racially mixed group drawn from narcotics and vice units, that their goal was to hit Club Kalua, a topless bar at 143-08 94th Avenue in Jamaica. The team had been working together since August, when the initiative began in response to the murder of a woman who was kidnapped and killed in July after leaving a club in Chelsea.

The Club Kalua was on the department's "problem list." The officers knew it because they had been there before: a week and a half earlier they had arrested two people inside on drug and prostitution charges. The lieutenant was looking for more arrests, according to the report, so the department could seek to close the club as a nuisance.

After the meeting, the team set out for Queens in three nondescript rental cars, a gray Toyota Camry, a green Mitsubishi Galant and a green Ford Freestar minivan.

When the team members arrived near Club Kalua, nestled on a street with several homes and another, far more prosperous-looking strip club just south of the Port Authority AirTrain terminal, they chose several strategic vantage points and parked their cars.

Getting Into Position

Lieutenant Napoli said he selected a spot in the AirTrain Terminal parking lot and maneuvered the Camry in so the car was directly across 94th Avenue from the club entrance, providing an observation post with an unobstructed view of the entrance for him and Detectives Paul Headley and Marc Cooper.

Detective Rasheda Edness, a female undercover detective, and two male undercover detectives were in the Mitsubishi and parked at 95th Avenue and Allendale Street. Detective Michael Oliver and Officer Michael Carey positioned the minivan — which they intended to use to transport anyone arrested in the operation — along 95th Avenue.

The operation, according to the lieutenant's account, began in earnest about 1 a.m., when the two male undercover detectives left the Mitsubishi and walked into the club, several minutes apart. They were followed about an hour later by Detective Cooper.

One of the undercover detectives was seeking to talk with women about sex for money, while the second undercover man and Detective Cooper served as "ghosts," shadowing the first undercover detective to provide backup and gather intelligence.

The undercover detectives and Detective Cooper stayed in touch with Lieutenant Napoli via cellphone, and the other members of the team were linked by radio, according to the report.

Over the next two and a half hours, the three officers mixed with about 40 patrons and drank beer to keep their cover, according to the report. The undercover detective serving as one of the ghosts had two Heinekens, according to his own account, but could not say what the other undercover officer or Detective Cooper drank, or how much. The crowd was rowdy, and several people were thrown out by club security, according to his account.

The officers made conversation with the topless dancers, trying to arrange sex for money — the kind of transactions that would lead to arrests. But their efforts failed and, in progress reports he made via cellphone to Lieutenant Napoli every half-hour, there were no reports of significant developments.

About 3:30 a.m., one undercover detective who had been serving as a ghost lost sight of the other undercover detective and Detective Cooper and presumed they had left the bar, according to his account.

He walked outside and found the other undercover man on the sidewalk. His colleague, a six-year veteran, told him that a man in the club wearing a white baseball cap with a White Sox insignia had gestured to his waistband in a way that led him to believe the man was armed, according to his account.

The other undercover detective said to his partner that he had told Lieutenant Napoli that the man might be armed. He then told his partner that he had retrieved his gun and shield from the Mitsubishi, where he had left them before going into the club. (Because bouncers were searching some patrons, the three men who went inside left their guns, shields and bulletproof vests in the cars, according to the report.)

According to the report, in the brief moment when he retrieved his gun and shield from the Mitsubishi's glove compartment, the undercover detective told the detectives in the car that there was a dispute in the club and that guns might be involved.

DOJ_NMG_0105560

At that time, Lieutenant Napoli relayed the information about the gun to the other members of his team. Detective Cooper got his gun and badge and sat in the lieutenant's car. The first undercover detective went back inside the club to look for the armed man, but he had no success and emerged about 15 or 20 minutes later, according to his own account.

Anger Outside the Club

When he reached the sidewalk outside, the scene was becoming volatile.

A group of about eight men stood on the sidewalk. They were arguing with a man dressed all in black standing next to a black truck with shiny, spinning rims, possibly a Lincoln Navigator, according to the undercover detective's account. The dispute was about a woman who had indicated she would not have sex with all the men. Tensions flared. The man dressed in black kept his right hand inside his jacket pocket, as if he were armed.

Mr. Guzman said, "Yo, get my gun, get my gun," and Mr. Bell told his friends they should beat up the man dressed in black, according to the undercover detective's account.

The eight men broke into two groups of four and started walking east along 94th Avenue, toward Liverpool Street, with Mr. Bell and Mr. Guzman in the trailing group. The second group then hesitated, walked back to the man dressed in black, argued some more and then turned and headed again toward Liverpool.

As he had several times that morning, the first undercover detective called Lieutenant Napoli, and handed the cellphone to the second undercover detective as he then followed Mr. Bell and his friends. The first undercover detective then struck up a conversation with a woman in a blue top who had left the club, apparently feeling the situation was under control enough for him to seek out a prostitution arrest. But his partner told the lieutenant it was, according to the report, "getting hot on Liverpool, for real; I think there's a gun."

The lieutenant got on the radio and told the team to move in and stop the group, shifting the team away from its earlier mission of making prostitution and drug arrests.

Mr. Bell got into the driver's side of his 1999 Nissan, with Mr. Guzman next to him and Mr. Benefield in the rear passenger seat. The Nissan faced north on the east side of Liverpool Street, about 60 feet from 94th Avenue.

Still on his cellphone, Lieutenant Napoli made eye contact with one of the men in the Nissan as he passed, and then his undercover detective, who nodded in the direction of Mr. Bell's car. This was the point in his interview when Lieutenant Napoli said he believed the men knew he was a police officer, though he did not give his rationale. Behind Lieutenant Napoli's Camry was the minivan carrying Detective Oliver and Officer Carey.

What happened in the next few seconds, and precisely how it occurred, remains unclear but for the outcome: 50 police bullets were fired. Mr. Bell was killed. Mr. Guzman was struck in the face, the shoulder, the buttocks, the thigh and the ankle. Mr. Benefield, hit in the leg and buttocks, scrambled out of the car and moved south on Liverpool Street, collapsing about half a block away.

Lieutenant Napoli crouched for safety, approaching the Nissan after the final shots.

One civilian witness, according to the report, was awakened by the shots — she thought there were 10 to 12 — and looked out her window. She saw one man pointing a handgun at a second man on Liverpool Street, saying, "I will kill you," according to the report. There were no more shots, and when the woman looked again, she saw one of the officers standing over Mr. Benefield.

A horde of police descended on the scene. They were met with adrenaline-filled confusion: Five officers had fired, but some were not even sure they had. There were conflicting reports about whether shields were displayed. And at least one of those who fired said he believed the men in the car, who turned out to be unarmed, were shooting at the police.

Four of the men who fired clustered down the block around Mr. Benefield. The fifth, Detective Cooper, was pointing his weapon at the men in the car, according to the report.

Sergeant Wheeler, a patrol supervisor at the 103rd Precinct, was one of the first uniformed officers to arrive, having heard radio reports of gunshots and officers in danger. He immediately ordered Detective Cooper to holster his weapon.

According to the sergeant's account, he called for an ambulance over his police radio and then tried to open the driver's side door of the Nissan, but could not. He directed another officer to put handcuffs on Mr. Guzman's outstretched hands.

DOJ_NMG_0105561

Sergeant Wheeler's driver that night, Officer Steven Muhlenbruck, said in his account that the sergeant also ordered Mr. Bell handcuffed.

When Sergeant Wheeler asked Detective Cooper if he was a police officer, the detective said he was, with a club enforcement team. Asked if he had fired his weapon, he said he had but could not say how many rounds. The sergeant asked about the rest of his team, and the detective pointed down the block, where the other men stood around Mr. Benefield. The sergeant helped one of the detectives handcuff Mr. Benefield, and then asked Detective Headley and the undercover detective if they had fired. Both said they had, but were unsure how many rounds.

The female undercover detective, who was not at the scene until after the gunfire had subsided, said in her account that once she arrived on the scene, she did not hear anyone make any statements about the shooting and that she did not "recall any members of her team displaying their shields."

But Police Officer Robert Maloney, who also arrived at the scene shortly after the shooting, said he saw a plainclothes black officer with his shield hanging around his neck who said, "They were shooting at us." His partner, Derek Braithwaite, also saw a black officer wearing a shield, but it was unclear who it was, and whether it was the same man cited by Officer Maloney.

The detective who had fired first, according to a person who has been briefed on his version, has said that he had his shield out, identified himself as a police officer and ordered the men in the car to show their hands before he fired.

Officer Maloney said he pulled Mr. Bell from the car and cuffed his bloody hands. He then escorted an ambulance that carried him to Jamaica Hospital Medical Center and stayed with Mr. Bell until he was relieved. Mr. Bell, who was pronounced dead at 4:56 a.m., never said a word, Officer Maloney said.

Diallo Case Could Be Road Map For DA (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-Before there were 50 shots and Sean Bell, there were 41 shots and Amadou Diallo.

The deadly 41-shot barrage fired by four police officers at the unarmed Diallo seven years ago sparked angry demands that the shooters face criminal charges - a scene replayed in the recent police shooting of Bell in a hail of 50 bullets.

Firepower and community outrage aside, the Diallo case serves as a reminder of the hard realities of prosecuting officers who are paid to carry guns and sometimes use them in dangerous situations. It also suggests the ultimate result of the latest case could be a civil settlement for the victims' families and a quiet demise of the careers of the officers involved.

"Police officers are privileged to use deadly force," said Ian Weinstein, a criminal law professor at Fordham Law School. "The case will turn on whether the officers reasonably believed their lives were in danger, or that deadly force was justified."

Bell, 23, was killed and two unarmed companions were wounded on Nov. 25 after a bachelor party at a strip club in Queens that police had targeted for an undercover operation.

The five shooters involved haven't spoken publicly about the incident now under investigation by the Queens district attorney. But statements by union officials and defense lawyers suggest a state-of-mind defense is in the works: The first officer to open fire, they say, was convinced there was a weapon in a car where none was found.

The officer, who had been posing as a club patron, became suspicious after overhearing one of Bell's companions talking about retrieving a gun to settle a dispute, police said. When the officer approached the men, they tried to flee in the car.

As the car bumped the officer and smashed into an unmarked police van, the officer said he spotted one of the companions make a sudden move before he began firing at the car at close range. A confusing chorus of gunfire followed.

Police have since investigated whether a fourth man may have fled the scene with a weapon - a theory the survivors deny. But the fact that so far no gun has been recovered doesn't mean the shooting was criminal, said attorney John Patten, who defended one of the officers in the Diallo case.

"My view on the whole thing is that, no matter how many shots, the benefit of the doubt should always go to the officers," he said. "It's just a terrible mistake."

DOJ_NMG_0105562

Lawyers say the officers in the Bell case will have to decide - probably after Christmas - whether to tell a grand jury their side of the story in a bid to dissuade jurors from voting to indict them. The lawyer for the undercover officer has said his client is eager to testify; another defense attorney on the case, Stephen Worth, was noncommittal.

"We'll watch the investigation closely and keep our options open," he said.

In the Diallo case, the officers chose not to go before a grand jury - a decision prosecutors said left them with no choice but to pursue charges of intentional murder, rather than manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide.

"Having exercised that right, they cannot then say, `We're police officers, therefore what we did was OK,'" District Attorney Robert Johnson said at the time.

Though indicted, the four Diallo defendants - Sean Carroll, Edward McMellon, Kenneth Boss and Richard Murphy - won a reprieve when an appeals court took the unusual step of moving the case to Albany. The court ruled that pretrial publicity had tainted the jury pool.

At trial in 2000, Carroll wept on the witness stand as he described the events of Feb. 4, 1999. He testified that he and the other plainclothes officers cornered Diallo in the vestibule of his Bronx apartment building, believing he fit the description of a wanted rapist.

Carroll told jurors he opened fire after seeing a black object emerge from the West African immigrant's pocket - an account backed by testimony of the other officers. Before they realized the object was a wallet, 19 bullets had struck the victim.

The jury acquitted the officers, but police officials never returned their guns or restored them to full duty. Boss remains on the payroll, but Carroll has retired; McMellon and Murphy both quit the force and became firefighters. Attempts to reach them were unsuccessful.

In 2004, the city agreed to pay $3 million to settle a lawsuit brought by Diallo's family.

Weinstein, the law professor, predicted indictments in the Bell case. Convictions, as the Diallo case shows, are another matter, he added.

"The Diallo case gave us one road map for this case - indictment, followed by a hard-fought trial in which prosecutors can't climb the very steep slope of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, followed by a very significant civil judgment," he said.

Federal Court Gives California Six Months To Fix Prison Crowding (AP)

By Don Thompson, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

SACRAMENTO -- A federal judge on Monday gave California officials six months to ease crowding in the state's overstuffed prison system, warning that potential remedies include capping the inmate population and releasing some prisoners early.

The state is scrambling to find solutions for a prison system that houses 173,000 inmates, 70 percent more than its capacity. Officials with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's administration and inmate attorneys agree the crowding is causing myriad problems, including inmate deaths and dangerous conditions for guards.

"Common sense suggests the state is being overwhelmed by the numbers," U.S. District Judge Lawrence Karlton said.

Schwarzenegger declared a state of emergency in October after failing to persuade state lawmakers to spend billions on a prison building program. He is now seeking to transfer 2,260 inmates to other states as a partial solution.

California sent 80 inmates to a private prison in Tennessee in early November and plans more transfers this month to private prisons in Arizona, Indiana, Oklahoma and Tennessee.

Even if the transfers survive pending court challenges, officials predict California's prisons will run out of room by spring 2008.

Karlton can order creation of a three-judge panel that would recommend options. On Monday, he delayed that decision until June 4, saying he has seen progress during Schwarzenegger's tenure.

"The plaintiffs want the court to run the prison system, and that is too serious a step to be taken lightly," Karlton said.

Federal law permits early release of inmates only if a three-judge panel determines that all other options have been exhausted. That hasn't happened in any state since the law took effect 10 years ago, said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's National Prison Project.

DOJ_NMG_0105563

"Waiting six months is just postponing the inevitable and causing more injury and death," said Donald Specter, director of the nonprofit San Francisco-based Prison Law Office, which wants Karlton to create the three-judge panel.

Specter and attorney Michael Bien said the state won't be able to ease crowding by June no matter how hard it tries.

The Prison Law Office and Bien's private law firm filed identical requests with two other federal judges in ongoing cases in which they represent inmates' interests. In each of the three cases, the attorneys argue that crowding is affecting inmates' well-being.

Hearings in the other two cases are set for Dec. 22 in Oakland and Jan. 8 in San Francisco.

Schwarzenegger convened a special session of the Legislature last summer to address prison overcrowding, in part proposing a $6 billion building program. The session ended with lawmakers taking no action on the governor's plan.

Schwarzenegger plans to introduce a similar proposal in January, said Bill Sessa, a spokesman for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation. Solving overcrowding by adding more prison beds will take years, he said, leaving out-of-state inmate transfers as the only short-term solution.

"We are encouraged that the judge gave us time to carry out the plan," Sessa said.

The alternative, a population limit, "is certainly going to put people out on the street who don't belong there," he said.

School Board Files Lawsuit Over Election (BRADV)

By Charles Lussier, Advocate staff writer

Baton Rouge Advocate, December 12, 2006

The Baker School Board filed a lawsuit in federal court Monday that seeks to cancel the Sept. 30 election in which District 1 voters ousted incumbent President Elaine Davis.

The lawsuit covers some of the same ground as Davis' already rejected election challenge, filed in state court. There, Davis unsuccessfully sought to overturn the vote that she lost to challenger Pam Malveaux by 20 votes.

Also listed as plaintiffs in the new federal lawsuit are three board members, Davis, Calvin Dees and Dana Carpenter.

Those three voted 3-2 last month to file the litigation, saying the school district's precise boundaries need to be established clearly. They did so over the objections of members George Gallman and Jane Freudenberger, neither of whom are listed individually as defendants. The School Board hired the Metairie law firm, Leblanc Butler LLC, to handle the case.

The lawsuit names as defendants the City of Baker, the East Baton Rouge Parish School Board, as well as parish Registrar of Voters Elaine Lamb and the parish's board of election supervisors.

In the state case, Davis, wife of former Baker Mayor Leroy Davis, challenged the votes of 21 voters, most of them living in Oak Glen Terrace trailer park on Thomas Road.

The new federal case alleges that up to 100 people voted improperly.

As evidence, the lawsuit claims that "on information and belief" the children of these improper voters do not attend Baker public schools, but rather attend East Baton Rouge Parish public schools.

"Thus, the participation of ineligible voters directly and unfairly affected the outcome of the District 1 election," according to the suit.

Reached at home Monday, Baker Superintendent Lester Klotz said he has not seen what was filed Monday, but said he is most concerned about the children who may be, wrongly, attending schools outside Baker. For instance, children living in Oak Glen Terrace attend parish public schools, he said.

"They're not going to our schools and never have," Klotz said.

The crux of the litigation is that a small number of voters who live within the city limits of Baker, but not within the boundaries of the school district were illegally allowed to vote Sept. 30.

The school district boundaries mirror the city lines as of June 1, 1997.

Since then, the city has annexed new territory, while the school district, which finally began operating in 2003, has maintained its 1997 boundaries.

DOJ_NMG_0105564

At issue are a couple of areas, including the Oak Glen Terrace trailer park, which the city annexed before June 1997, but for which the city did not receive approval, or preclearance, from the U.S. Justice Department until later. State courts found that the late date of these preclearances did not matter and that those contested areas are part of the Baker school district.

Christian Group Says Pentagon OK'd Video (USAT/AP)

USA Today, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — An evangelical Christian group, under fire for a promotional video featuring active-duty military officers praising the organization, said Monday that the Defense Department gave it permission to record the video.

The video prompted a religious freedom watchdog group to ask the Pentagon to investigate whether the tape violated regulations and possibly the Constitution.

Robert Varney, executive director of the Christian Embassy, which produced the video, said the group is adding a note to tell viewers that the content does not represent the military or any government agency.

"We don't think we did anything in violation," Varney said. "The Pentagon gave us permission to film the video, and I don't think they'd give us permission if it were in violation of the regulations."

The Christian Embassy was established 31 years ago to promote prayer groups and Christian values among government officials.

The 10-minute video features military officers speaking on the group's behalf while in uniform. Much of it was recorded inside the Pentagon.

Service regulations in general prohibit active-duty officers from lobbying for political causes while on duty or wearing uniforms. The issue of religion is trickier. Regulations seek to uphold religious freedom and protect members from proselytizing.

In letters released Monday, the Military Religious Freedom Foundation asked that the Defense Department's inspector general investigate the matter and that any documents authorizing officers' involvement in the video be released.

Mikey Weinstein, founder of the group, said he hoped the footage would serve as "a testament to systemic problems of religious bias and constitutional neglect that continue to occur within the United States armed forces."

The Pentagon said it needs more time to determine whether the latest incident warrants an investigation. "The Department of Defense does not endorse any particular religious faith, but we do provide servicemembers with the ability to practice their religion," said a spokesman, Maj. Stewart Upton.

ANTITRUST:

Municipal Bond Antitrust Case Probed By Grand Jury (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Patricia Hurtado

Bloomberg, December 12, 2006

Dec. 11 (Bloomberg) -- Prosecutors investigating bid-rigging in the municipal bond market have brought their case to a federal grand jury in New York, a person with knowledge of the case said.

Ralph Giordano, chief of the New York office of the U.S. Justice Department's Antitrust Division, and Rebecca Meiklejohn, a trial attorney, are leading the criminal investigation, the person said. Also participating in the probe are agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New York office as well as the Internal Revenue Service, according to the person.

Giordano, 69, and his staff won the conviction of former Sotheby's Holdings Inc. Chairman A. Alfred Taubman, found guilty in 2001 of plotting with archrival Christie's International Plc to fix sellers' fees. Meiklejohn has prosecuted anti-competitive practices in the advertising industry.

``It's a very big deal that this is now a criminal investigation, it ratchets up the stakes," said David Gourevitch, a former U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission enforcement attorney who now has his own practice in New York.

Prosecutors are probing whether banks, financial firms and brokers conspired to rig bids on contracts bought by local governments when they invest money from bond sales. The municipalities invest the money until it is needed to pay for schools, roads and other projects.

DOJ_NMG_0105565

Raising the Stakes

The investigation grew out of an IRS inquiry that found dozens of municipal bond deals failed to pay $100 million in taxes. It is the broadest criminal probe of the industry. The Justice Department has subpoenaed more than a dozen banks and insurers and raided three brokers in a search for evidence of bid rigging in the market where state and local governments nationwide raised more than $400 billion last year.

XL Capital Ltd., a Bermuda-based insurer, last month said a unit received a subpoena from a federal grand jury in New York's Southern District drafted by the Antitrust Division ``seeking documents in connection with an investigation into the municipal guaranteed investment contract market and related products."

Giordano declined comment, referring questions to Justice Department officials in Washington. Meiklejohn, 56, couldn't be reached for comment. Kathleen Blomquist, a Justice Department spokeswoman, would only say she is authorized to confirm the government is conducting an ``investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal bond industry."

Bid-Rigging in Advertising

Giordano and Meiklejohn are ``up to the job," said Gourevitch. ``At the end of the day, depending on the outcome of the prosecution, it may be a life-altering deal for some individual."

Taubman was convicted by a federal jury in New York and sentenced to serve a year and a day in jail and fined $7.5 million. His lawyers had asked the sentencing judge to spare him a prison term, saying he was in poor health. JPMorgan Chase & Co. banker Charles LeCroy was sentenced to three months in jail and fined $50,000 last year after pleading guilty to federal fraud charges in a municipal finance corruption scandal in Philadelphia.

Meiklejohn has prosecuted executives in the advertising industry for anti-competitive bidding in a federal probe that also involved the IRS and FBI.

She also led a case that delved into the relationship between some advertising agencies and printers. Mitchell Mosallem, a former executive with New York-based Grey Global Group Inc., and 10 others were convicted in 2003 in the investigation, which uncovered bid-rigging, bribery and fraud in the advertising, printing and graphics industry.

`Around for Awhile'

Meiklejohn also successfully prosecuted Michele Komack, a former executive at New York-based Home Box Office Inc. who pleaded guilty in 2004 to bid-rigging, antitrust-conspiracy and tax charges. In that case, Meiklejohn said Komack received about $439,000 in kickbacks from vendors to whom she steered business. Evidence showed Komack obtained free designer shoes, foreign trips and parties at the Plaza Hotel in Manhattan as part of the scheme.

George Stamboulidis, a former federal prosecutor who is monitoring Merrill Lynch & Co.'s and Bank of New York Co.'s compliance with U.S. government settlements, said the investigation is going to have long-lasting repercussions.

``It is something that's going to be around for awhile and affect a lot of firms and banks," said Stamboulidis, now a partner at Baker & Hostetler in New York. ``Banks are going to be scrutinizing more of their deals and there will be more scrutiny on all financial institutions. There are some serious allegations about a lack of transparency in the market."

Merrill Lynch is a passive minority investor in Bloomberg LP, the parent company of Bloomberg News.

Critics Decry Monsanto Deal, Analysts Think It Will Proceed (AP)

By Christopher Leonard

AP, December 12, 2006

ST. LOUIS - Congress will press federal regulators to closely scrutinize Monsanto Co.'s plan to buy cottonseed king Delta & Pine Land Co., but analysts and investors don't seem worried the deal will fall through.

U.S. Rep. Bob Inglis, R-S.C., plans to send a letter to the U.S. Justice Department asking for a careful review of the deal to make sure it complies with antitrust laws.

Inglis said he's not opposed to the deal. But he thinks it deserves a close look because it would give Monsanto more control over the U.S. seed market.

DOJ_NMG_0105566

Monsanto agreed to purchase Scott, Miss.-based Delta & Pine Land in August for $1.5 billion in cash. The deal is already under Justice Department investigation to make sure it doesn't violate antitrust law. If approved, the sale should close early next year.

Analysts estimate the deal would give Monsanto control of about 60 percent of the U.S. cottonseed market.

That could be bad news for Monsanto's competitors in the multibillion dollar market for genetically engineered seeds. Monsanto has had a corner on the technology since introducing biotech corn and soybean seeds in the 1990s. DuPont Co. and Syngenta AG are trying to catch up by developing their own strains.

DuPont Co. is also fueling opposition to the Delta & Pine Land acquisition.

Inglis said he first became aware of the deal when DuPont representatives visited his office with Tim Hutchinson, a former Arkansas senator. Inglis, who sits on the House Judiciary Committee, said he's circulating a letter to other House members urging close review of the deal and plans to send it to the Justice Department within days.

"We should make real sure that it's consistent with antitrust principles," Inglis said.

DuPont spokesman Doyle Karr, who works for the company's Pioneer Hi-Bred seed division, said the company opposes the deal.

"We think it's anticompetitive," Karr said. "We have concerns about what it will mean to farmers and their access to technology."

Monsanto spokeswoman Lori Fisher said the Justice Department review should go on without interference.

"We're disappointed that our competitors would use this kind of tactic to gin up the opposition," Fisher said.

The criticism isn't likely to have much bearing on whether the deal is approved by regulators, said Kevin McCarthy, an analyst with Bank of America in New York.

"When the MON-DLP deal was announced, we anticipated staunch opposition from competitors DuPont and Syngenta," McCarthy wrote in an e-mail, using Wall Street shorthand for Monsanto and Delta & Pine Land.

McCarthy said investors are betting chances of the deal going through are about 80 percent, with risks of failure reflected in the companies' stock prices. The odds haven't changed with DuPont and Syngenta's opposition, he said.

The deal is likely to be approved because it won't change the overall market concentration of cotton seed companies, Credit Suisse analyst William Young wrote in an August report.

If it buys Delta & Pine Land, Monsanto has agreed to sell off its own Stoneville cottonseed brand which controls about 14 percent of the market, Young wrote. That means Monsanto would only have the 50 percent to 55 percent market share that Delta & Pine Land already commands, he said.

Young noted there are also more competitors in the cottonseed market today than there were in 1998, when Monsanto signed its first agreement to buy Delta & Pine Land.

Monsanto backed out of that deal in 2000 and Delta & Pine Land sued over the breach of contract. The legal action is still tied up in court in Mississippi, but the current deal includes a clause to settle all legal disputes from the first merger attempts.

Monsanto faces a $600 million "break-up fee" if the current deal falls through, McCarthy said. That would translate to about $1.09 per share before taxes. The fee would prevent any further litigation.

Monsanto and Delta & Pine Land stocks didn't see any big movement during Monday trading.

Monsanto's stock dropped 28 cents, less than 1 percent, to close at $47.80 on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta & Pine Land dropped 25 cents, also less than 1 percent, to close at $40.39 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Delta's stock jumped 10 percent when the deal was announced in August, while Monsanto's stayed virtually unchanged.

Delta Board Weighs US Air's Offer (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

Airline and Creditors to Meet On $8.5 Billion Hostile Bid; A Push for Financial Records

The board of Delta Air Lines Inc. met by conference call to discuss US Airways Group Inc.'s $8.5 billion hostile bid, but the directors aren't expected to issue a formal position on the offer for several days, according to people familiar with the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0105567

The meeting came as executives at Delta and its major creditors prepared for a new round of talks regarding the US Airways bid scheduled for tomorrow in New York. US Airways presented details of its offer, consisting of $4 billion in cash and about $4.5 billion in stock, nearly two weeks ago, in a session marked by occasionally tense exchanges between executives from the airlines.

Delta, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in September 2005, is expected to release early next week its reorganization plan for exiting from bankruptcy as a stand-alone company. Coming one month after US Airways launched the hostile offer, the Delta plan effectively will be the company's counterproposal aimed at persuading its creditors not to support the US Airways bid.

The board vote is largely a formality, since there is nearly no possibility that Delta's board would endorse the US Airways offer, according to people familiar with the situation. Delta officials, including Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein, have made repeated public assertions that the deal isn't right for the Atlanta airline. Mr. Grinstein has insisted that Delta should emerge independently from bankruptcy early next year. He has resisted US Airways' request for access to Delta financial records to perform due diligence on the offer.

Tomorrow's meeting of creditors could increase pressure on Delta to open its books. The group of nine major creditors, who represent unsecured-claim holders in Delta's bankruptcy-court proceedings, is scheduled to hear presentations from their own advisers hired to evaluate the US Airways bid and an analysis of the offer by Delta. Main topics include the deal's financial aspects, antitrust risks and labor implications, among other issues. No major Delta creditors have publicly embraced the US Airways bid, and one of the largest creditors, the Air Line Pilots Association unit that represents Delta pilots, has repeatedly attacked the proposal.

Despite long business relationships with Delta and its management, some major creditors such as Boeing Co., whose Boeing Capital Corp. unit leads the committee and holds claims in excess of $117.5 million, may feel obligated to insist on a full hearing of the offer, say people familiar with the situation. That could force the creditors committee to demand that Delta open its financial records and enter into full due diligence with US Airways, of Tempe, Ariz.

Delta has lobbied the Chicago aircraft maker for its support in warding off US Airways. People familiar with the discussions said Boeing has decided to remain neutral while the offer is being evaluated.

Separately, a federal judge upheld a bankruptcy judge's decision permitting Delta to terminate its pension plan for its pilots. A group of 223 retired pilots had appealed the bankruptcy-court decision issued in September. The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. now becomes trustee of the plan and reached a deal with Delta last week in which it receives a $2.2 billion unsecured claim against the airline and $225 million in unsecured notes.

Write to Corey Dade at corey.dade@wsj.com1 and Melanie Trottman at melanie.trottman@wsj.com2

LG.Philips Shares Fall On LCD Antitrust Investigation (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Kevin Cho

Bloomberg, December 12, 2006

Dec. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Shares of LG.Philips LCD Co., the world's second-largest liquid-crystal display maker, fell after the company said it was questioned by officials in South Korea, the U.S. and Japan in an antitrust probe of the industry.

Samsung Electronics Co., its bigger rival, was also subpoenaed by South Korea's Fair Trade Commission, company spokeswoman Cho Sung In said today. Officials from the Korean watchdog visited LG.Philips' Seoul headquarters on Dec. 8 because of ``possible anticompetitive conduct in the LCD industry,'' the company said yesterday, without identifying the other companies.

LG.Philips shares dropped as much as 7.6 percent, leading declines among LCD makers, on concern the investigation may damage earnings after the company posted two straight quarterly losses. A four-year U.S. federal probe into price fixing in the computer-memory chip market resulted in four companies, including Samsung Electronics, and 16 individuals being fined $731 million.

``The news is weakening people's sentiment on LG.Philips,'' said Kim Hyung Chan, who manages about $600 million in equities at KTB Asset Management Co. in Seoul. ``Earnings weren't showing signs of improving, and now this.''

DOJ_NMG_0105568

Shares of LG.Philips fell 4.6 percent to 25,750 as of 12:35 p.m. in Seoul. In Taiwan, AU Optronics Corp. declined 2.4 percent, Chi Mei Optoelectronics Corp. dropped 3.3 percent and Chunghwa Picture Tubes Ltd. slid 2.3 percent. Suwon, South Korea-based Samsung, which generates more than 90 percent of its operating profit from products other than LCDs, fell 0.2 percent.

AU Optronics spokeswoman Hsiao Ya-wen said she couldn't comment on whether the company is part of the LCD investigation.

LG.Philips units in Tokyo and San Jose, California are also being investigated, the company said. Spokesman Lee Bang Soo declined to comment beyond yesterday's statement.

Samsung's Cho also said that its overseas subsidiaries in the U.S. and Japan were also served similar subpoenas.

Price Fixing?

The investigation may be about price fixing in the industry, Maeil Business Newspaper reported today, citing unidentified industry officials.

Jeong Joong Weon, who heads the cartel policy team at Korea's Fair Trade Commission, confirmed the regulator is investigating LG.Philips. He declined to provide further details.

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman at the U.S. Department of Justice, declined to comment. The department issued a subpoena to LG.Philips' San Jose office, while Japan's Fair Trade Commission issued a notice to LG.Philips in Tokyo, according to yesterday's statement.

``We are now investigating LG.Philips," Akinori Yamada, a director of management and planning at the Japanese antitrust commission, said in Tokyo today. ``We cannot comment on the names or number of the other companies involved in the probe."

Chips Probe

Price fixing of computer chips known as dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, led to top producer Samsung Electronics being fined $300 million, the second-largest criminal antitrust penalty in U.S. history. Korea's Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Germany's Infineon Technologies AG agreed to pay a combined $345 million in fines because of the investigation.

LG.Philips, formed in 1999 as a venture between South Korea's LG Electronics Inc. and Royal Philips Electronics NV of the Netherlands, said last month that the company may continue posting losses until the second quarter of next year because of falling panel prices.

``The news is another blow to LG.Philips as this kind of probe was totally unexpected," said Jeff Kim, an analyst at Hyundai Securities Co. in Seoul, who has a ``market perform" rating on the stock.

LG.Philips LCD Gets Subpoena For Anticompetitive Practices (WSJ/DJ)

By Dow Jones Newswires

The Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

HONG KONG -- LG.Philips LCD Co. said Monday it is being investigated by authorities in the U.S., Korea and Japan for alleged anticompetitive practices in the liquid-crystal display market.

In a statement, the South Korea-based LCD maker said it received a subpoena from the U.S. Department of Justice last Friday. In addition, the company said officials from the Fair Trade Commission in Korea visited its headquarters while the Japanese Fair Trade Commission issued a notice to its offices in Tokyo.

"LG.Philips LCD takes this matter very seriously and will cooperate fully with regulatory authorities," the company said in the statement. "While these investigations continue, LG.Philips LCD is committed to running its business as usual, supplying its global customer base."

LG.Philips LCD spokesman Lee Bang Soo declined to comment further when asked about the details of the investigation.

Microsoft Lays Out Defense In Iowa Case (BLOOM)

By Bob Van Voris, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg, December 12, 2006

Company didn't overcharge, lawyer says

Microsoft Corp. didn't overcharge Iowa consumers for Windows, Word and Excel, a lawyer told jurors in Des Moines, as the company outlined its defense in an antitrust trial.

"No one in Iowa has been harmed by anything that the plaintiffs can show that Microsoft has done," Microsoft lawyer David Tulchin told the Iowa state court jury of seven men and five women Monday afternoon. "The evidence will show that the price was not too high, that there is no overcharge."

Tulchin began Microsoft's opening statement in a class-action suit by Iowa consumers who claim they were overcharged by $329 million since 1994. Tulchin's statement began after a lawyer for the consumers concluded his side's opening statement after almost six days.

The lawsuit is one of only two similar cases Microsoft hasn't settled or persuaded judges to dismiss. Any jury award may be tripled under Iowa law.

The Iowa case and one in Mississippi are the last of dozens filed by groups of consumers after an antitrust suit against Microsoft brought by the U.S. government and several states, including Iowa, in 1998.

Microsoft denies that it violated Iowa antitrust law.

"Microsoft's success, in every case, is attributable to pro-competitive conduct," including good business decisions, good products and low prices, said Tulchin.

Earlier Monday, Minneapolis lawyer Richard Hagstrom outlined three different models he said an expert for the plaintiffs used to calculate the amount that Iowans paid for Microsoft products compared with the amount they would have paid in a competitive marketplace.

The consumers' opening statement began Dec. 1 when Des Moines lawyer Roxanne Conlin outlined claims that Microsoft used its monopoly position to manipulate prices and force competitors out of business.

The case was filed in 2000 by Joe Comes, a Des Moines businessman.

It was certified in 2003 as a class-action suit on behalf of indirect buyers of Microsoft software from May 1994 to June 2006 -- people and businesses that bought computers with Microsoft software already installed or that bought the programs from sources other than the company.

Lawyers said the trial may take six months.

The case is Comes v. Microsoft Corp., CL 82311, Iowa District Court, Polk County (Des Moines).

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Top Court Rules 7-0 Against BP In Case Over Lease Royalties (WSJ)

Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court ruled against the oil and gas industry Monday in a dispute over how far back the government can reach to collect on leases for federal land.

In a 7-0 decision, the court refused to limit the number of years the government can reach back to collect unpaid royalties.

The case involves two units of BP that had sued over lease royalties oil and gas companies must pay for coal bed methane removed from federal land. That dispute concerned questions of at what stage of production the levy should be paid.

Read the Supreme Court's opinions in Carey v. Musladin1 and BP America Production Co. v. Watson2, courtesy of FindLaw3.

The Department of the Interior had ordered the companies to pay a higher rate based on refinement of the methane before it is marketed and sold. The BP subsidiaries had argued that the government was entitled to royalties on the value of methane gas at the time it was extracted and before carbon dioxide is removed from the methane. Federal law generally requires lease payments be made on gas in a "marketable condition."

Justice Samuel Alito wrote the majority opinion, which said a 6-year statute-of-limitations cited by the companies applies to court proceedings and not agency administrative proceedings. The statute of limitations dispute arises from aspects of a 1996 law limiting government financial-damages suits.

DOJ_NMG_0105570

Last week the U.S. Minerals Management Service sent BP a $32 million bill for unpaid royalties in a separate case. The company at the time said the outcome of the Supreme Court's statute-of-limitations decision won't impact the size of that bill but could have an impact on separate royalty fee matters.

When the dispute between the Interior Department and the companies began a decade ago, it involved Amoco Production Co., Atlantic Richfield Co. and Vastar Resources, ARCO/Vastar, according to court papers filed in the case. In 2001, Amoco Production Co. and Vastar Resources Inc. merged and formed BP America Production Co. Atlantic Richfield Co. is wholly owned by BP America Inc.

Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. -- who had participated in the case when he was still a federal appeals court judge -- and Justice Stephen Breyer, recused themselves from the appeal.

Court Says Trial Spectators Can Wear Buttons

The Supreme Court, in a first-of-its-kind ruling, concluded unanimously Monday that murder trial spectators were free to wear buttons with a picture of the victim in front of the jury that convicted the defendant.

The justices ruled in favor of California prosecutors who said the buttons were a harmless expression of grief by family members at the trial of Mathew Musladin.

It was the first time the justices ruled on whether the conduct of courtroom spectators deprived a defendant of a fair trial, which in this instance resulted in a conviction that was reversed by an appeals court.

Mr. Musladin had successfully challenged his conviction in the 1994 shooting death of Tom Studer, the fiancé of Mr. Musladin's estranged wife. Mr. Musladin is serving a sentence of 32 years to life in prison.

Justice Clarence Thomas, writing for five of his colleagues, said the buttons "did not deny [Musladin] his right to a fair trial," although he said the question remains open whether spectators' conduct could be prejudicial. The other three justices also concurred with the court's judgment, but did not join Justice Thomas's opinion.

Three members of Mr. Studer's family wore a button with a photo of the victim throughout the trial over the objections of Mr. Musladin's lawyer. The request prior to trial to preclude the family members from wearing the buttons was rejected by the judge, who said he saw "no possible prejudice to the defendant."

But the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals ordered a new trial. The appeals panel said the buttons "essentially argue that Mr. Studer was the innocent party and that the defendant was necessarily guilty." The dissenting judge in the 2-1 decision said the buttons were a symbol of a family's grief.

The case turned on a 1996 law, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act, limiting the circumstances under which federal judges may grant habeas corpus petitions in state court cases. In order for a federal judge to step in, says the law, the state court decision must be "contrary to" or an "unreasonable application" of clearly established federal law as determined by the Supreme Court.

The appeals court said the state court decision was contrary to Supreme Court holdings. But Justice Thomas said, "We hold that it was not."

Justice David Souter, who wrote a concurring opinion, said there can be little doubt that allowing the buttons at a murder trial "can raise a risk of improper consideration." But he also said he could not conclude that the state court acted unreasonably.

The closest case to Mr. Musladin's came six years before the death penalty act, when the San Francisco-based appeals court tossed out a rape conviction on grounds that jurors might have been prejudiced because some trial observers wore pins that read "Women Against Rape."

The justices have ruled on prejudicial impact involving defendants, but never about spectators wearing buttons.

The court has forbidden the use of visible shackles for defendants in front of juries unless the use is justified by an essential state interest such as courtroom security. The court also has forbidden having defendants wear prison garb in front of juries in most instances.

The case is Carey v. Musladin.

Separately, the high court refused to consider a bankruptcy dispute between Wachovia Corp. and Eastman Kodak Co., a decision that allows the $30 million case to proceed in lower federal courts.

DOJ_NMG_0105571

At issue is whether Kodak can press a claim against Charlotte, N.C.-based Wachovia stemming from the bankruptcy of a camera retailer, Wolf Camera Inc., located in Atlanta, Ga. The fight stems from a $30 million loan Kodak make to Wolf Camera in March 2000, which required the approval of Wachovia, Wolf's leading creditor. Kodak later claimed that Wachovia encouraged Kodak to make the loan but did not disclose that Wolf would be required to use the $30 million to repay some of its debts to Wachovia. Kodak also said that Wachovia withheld Wolf's dire financial condition.

Kodak sued Wachovia in New York, seeking damages, while Wolf's bankruptcy proceeding was settled in a bankruptcy court in Georgia. Wachovia argued that Kodak should have pursued its claims in the bankruptcy court, and once the bankruptcy court reached a settlement between Wolf Camera and its creditors and resolved several other issues, further litigation should be barred.

With the Supreme Court's refusal to consider Wachovia's appeal, Kodak's case will now proceed in U.S. District Court in the Western District of New York.

The case is Wachovia Bank N.A. v. Eastman Kodak Co.

U.S. Supreme Court Rules Against Oil And Gas Industry In Royalties Case (FINDLAW/AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 12, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Supreme Court ruled against the oil and gas industry Monday in a dispute over how many years into the past the government can reach to collect money for leases on federal land.

In a 7-0 decision, the court refused to limit the number of years the government can reach back to collect unpaid royalties. The ruling applies to administrative proceedings the Interior Department brought against two companies.

At issue is whether a federal law imposing a six-year time limit for the government to file lawsuits based on federal contracts also applies to administrative orders.

Ten years ago, the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service ordered BP America Production Co. and ARCO to pay $4.1 million (â,¬3.1 million) and $780,000 (â,¬591,940) respectively to cover royalty deficiencies on coalbed methane. The companies pumped the natural gas from wells in the San Juan Basin, which is in northwest New Mexico and southwest Colorado.

The government's administrative claim was based on royalties allegedly owed going back more than eight years from the time the Interior Department demanded the money. BP and ARCO say the limit should be six years, which would reduce the amount of royalties the Interior Department is able to claim.

BP and ARCO say unfavorable rulings in lower courts on the issue would add hundreds of millions of dollars to the royalty obligations of the oil and gas industry over the life of existing leases.

The industry's arguments "are insufficient to overcome the plain meaning" of federal law, said the decision by Justice Samuel Alito.

The justices normally do not publicly disclose the reason for not participating in cases, though Chief Justice John Roberts participated in the case as a federal appeals court judge.

When the dispute between the Interior Department and the companies began a decade ago, it involved Amoco Production Co., Atlantic Richfield Co. and Vastar Resources, ARCO/Vastar, according to court papers filed in the case.

In 2001, Amoco Production Co. and Vastar Resources Inc. merged and formed BP America Production Co. Atlantic Richfield Co. is wholly owned by BP America Inc.

The case is BP America v. Watson, 05-669.

BP Review Of Blast Cites Worry Over Cost Cuts (WSJ)

By Chip Cummins

Wall Street Journal, December 12, 2006

Some Top Officers See Link To '05 Refinery Accident; Outside Report Is to Come

DOJ_NMG_0105572

Some top BP PLC executives worried that cost cutting at a Texas refinery may have contributed to the plant's poor state of safety and equipment, according to an internal BP review that is likely to turn up the heat on the company over a deadly explosion at the site.

Documents reviewed by The Wall Street Journal also quote a former senior BP safety executive saying that BP Chief Executive John Browne "showed little interest" in safety issues.

The March 2005 accident at BP's Texas City, Texas, refinery killed 15 people and injured 180. BP faces a criminal probe into the accident as well as civil claims from victims. The accident, along with a series of other safety and environmental incidents, has undercut BP's efforts to promote itself as a socially responsible energy company that is "Beyond Petroleum." High profits from surging oil and gasoline prices over the past three years have added to public pressure.

BP officials have said they believe budgetary decisions didn't play a critical role in the accident, caused when workers restarted a small gasoline-processing unit. A BP spokesman defended Lord Browne's safety record and repeated yesterday that the company determined in its own investigations into the accident that spending wasn't an issue in the blast.

In a series of internal interviews, however, BP executives painted a more complicated picture. Their thinking is laid out in notes and interview summaries that were collected this year as part of an internal BP review of the refinery accident. The interviews were conducted as part of a wide-ranging "accountability" review, designed to determine what led to the accident, according to a BP spokesman.

The documents, which haven't previously been made public, also show some BP executives laying blame for safety shortfalls with one another and with BP's management structure.

In several public reports, BP acknowledged wide-ranging safety and management shortfalls. It initially fired a handful of low-level workers and supervisors and reassigned the refinery manager, Don Parus. BP also restructured its health-and-safety organization and replaced the head of U.S. operations after the accident.

Current and former workers at the plant, in interviews with the Journal last year, blamed cost cutting for reducing safety and causing equipment problems at the refinery. In October, the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board said it believed cost cutting by senior managers contributed to the explosion. The federal agency cited a 25% cut in fixed costs at the plant between 1998 and 2000. BP bought the Texas City refinery as part of its 1998 acquisition of Amoco Corp.

Insight into the BP review comes as an independent panel of experts led by former Secretary of State James Baker III plans to release in coming weeks a report expected to detail problems with safety processes at BP's American refinery operations.

In a July interview as part of the accountability review, John Manzoni, BP's global chief executive of refining and marketing, said he agreed with another executive that "fixed-cost reduction" partly contributed to the "situation" at Texas City, according to notes from the interview. At one point in late 2005, after the accident, Mr. Manzoni said he questioned himself, according to the interview notes: "Have we been underspending?"

The BP spokesman said of Mr. Manzoni's comments, "It's a perfectly reasonable and common-sense question to have asked under the circumstance." But, he added, "The answer was, no, we didn't underspend." BP has said that from 2001 to 2004, it sharply increased spending at the plant, including more than doubling the annual average maintenance and turnaround spending at the refinery, to about $115 million a year in 2004 from $40 million a year in 2001.

However, Mr. Parus, who was relieved of his duties as refinery manager immediately after the accident, said he had been ordered to cut costs by 25% as recently as 2005, according to notes of an interview conducted Oct. 12.

He said he had given a slide show to Mr. Manzoni during a visit by the executive in July 2004 showing BP and Amoco had "underinvested" at Texas City for the previous 10 years, according to the interview notes. He said he pleaded for additional funds, citing problem areas such as the poor condition of equipment, and he said he had "exhausted every avenue he had to get the funds and it remained a no," according to the notes.

An attorney for Mr. Parus said his client stands by what he said in the interviews but wasn't available to comment.

Ross Pillari, who stepped down as chief executive of BP's U.S. operations this year, said Texas City had been neglected, according to a BP interview on April 27. Senior BP-Amoco executives at the time of the merger "tried to squeeze as much out of [Texas City], so maintenance was neglected. The directive was to keep expenditures low because of 10 years of lousy refinery margins," according to a summary of his interview. Refinery margins are an industry measure of profitability. Mr. Pillari declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0105573

Some executives said they disagreed with the suggestion that cost cutting contributed to safety problems, according to the notes. Pat Gower, vice president of North American refining, told interviewers in April that he didn't think the accident occurred because of budget restraints. And Mike Hoffman, a vice president of global refining, told interviewers he had never heard a request for funds from Mr. Parus at Texas City: "Don can't claim that I held back money from him," he said, according to the notes.

The interview notes also paint a picture of uncertain reporting lines inside BP's North American operations. Some executives said in their interviews that contributed to a lack of accountability for Texas City's problems. The BP spokesman said yesterday that the plant's new management "has simplified the organization, clarified accountabilities."

In addition to BP's management structure, one executive also cited Lord Browne's attitude toward safety. In an interview conducted on June 21, Greg Coleman, who was vice president of BP's health, safety and environmental programs before he left the company, said Lord Browne "showed little interest" in safety and demonstrated "no passion, no curiosity, no interest" in safety issues, according to his interview notes.

Mr. Coleman couldn't be reached for comment.

The BP spokesman said: "It is certainly not true that Lord Browne showed little interest in safety. The safety of staff featured prominently in his many messages to the organization." Safety also was underscored in the company's code of conduct, the spokesman said.

"The company had achieved a 70% reduction in workplace injury rates at the plant," the spokesman said. "This significant fall led the company to believe that conditions at the refinery were improving."

Lord Browne transformed BP into an oil giant through a series of big acquisitions, including the Amoco purchase, in recent years. He also fostered a reputation as an environmental leader, becoming the first oil-industry chief to acknowledge the threat of global warming. BP's advertising campaign highlighted the company's alternative-energy projects, like solar and wind.

But BP has faced big setbacks in the U.S. Oil spills and wide-scale corrosion partly shut down BP's vast Alaska field at Prudhoe Bay over the summer and triggered a federal criminal probe. U.S. officials accused the company of manipulating propane markets, a charge the company denies. The company says it is cooperating with all investigations.

Separately, the Supreme Court ruled 7-0 against BP in a lease-royalty dispute with the government.

The case involves two units of BP that had sued over federal lease-royalty rates that oil and natural-gas companies must pay for coal-bed methane removed from federal land. At issue were whether Interior Department royalty calculations -- through administrative actions -- ordered the companies to pay a higher rate based on refinement of the methane before it is marketed and sold. The ruling determined that Interior Department royalty orders aren't subject to a statute of limitations.

(BP America Production Co. v. Watson)

Oil Company Charged With Pollution (LOMPOCR)

By Samantha Yale, staff writer

Lompoc (CA) Record, December 12, 2006

An energy company with local operations is facing more trouble.

The state attorney general's office has filed four misdemeanor counts of state water pollution against Greka Oil and Gas Inc.

The alleged violations of the California Fish and Game Code were filed in Santa Barbara County Superior Court in Santa Maria Wednesday. The Department of Fish and Game was the investigating agency, according to the attorney general's office.

The complaint alleged that Greka “unlawfully deposited in, or permitted petroleum or other deleterious substance to pass into, the state waters of California.”

Greka allegedly committed these violations Dec. 7, 2005, at 5017 Zaca Station Road in Los Olivos; May 4 and May 16 at 3851 Telephone Road in Santa Maria; and Aug. 10 at 6572 Dominion Road in Santa Maria, according to the complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0105574

According to reports from the Governor's Office of Emergency Services, the Los Olivos incident was caused by tank failure, and the spill went into an unnamed seasonal creek before it was contained.

The Santa Maria spill on May 4 was a pipeline leak, according to the report, and the petroleum went into an unnamed dry creek. The May 16 spill at the same location was reported by a caller as caused by a ruptured flow line, but it did not go into a waterway.

The Santa Maria spill Aug. 10 was due to old pipe repair and the petroleum went into a seasonal creek with a spring, according to the hazardous materials spill report.

In all but the May 16 Santa Maria incident, for which there is no indication either way, drinking water was not affected.

The case is due back in court Jan. 4.

The prosecutor in the case, Deputy Attorney General Christopher Crook, declined Monday to discuss the allegations.

Steve Martarano, spokesman for the Department of Fish and Game, said his department does not discuss cases they investigate once they are handed over to prosecutors.

The attorney representing Greka in the case, Steve Cochran, could not be reached for comment Monday.

Greka Energy is familiar with legal battles.

The corporation settled last month the remainder of a civil lawsuit filed in 2004 by the Santa Barbara County District Attorney's Office, which accused it of more than 100 safety and environmental violations. Greka agreed to pay a total $675,000 to the county and the county Air Pollution Control District in the settlements, according to a prosecutor in that case.

The U.S. Attorney's office began an investigation late last year into possible criminal acts committed by Greka, but there have been no public developments in that investigation since it began, U.S. Justice Department spokesman Thom Mrozek said Monday.

Samantha Yale can be reached at 739-2159 or syale@lompoc

Gulf States Hit Pay Dirt Offshore (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, December 12, 2006

Back in June, former Louisiana senator John Breaux warned Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) not to get greedy in lobbying to get their state a big chunk of oil and gas royalties from federal waters.

"Harry Truman offered us almost half, and we ended up with nothing," he said.

Breaux was recalling that in 1949, Gov. Earl Long was so determined to get all of the oil and gas royalties from drilling off his state's shores that he turned down an offer from Truman that would have put a portion of that revenue into Louisiana's coffers. Louisiana ended up with nothing, and since then the Treasury has collected $160 billion from offshore oil and gas production all over the United States.

The last bill passed by the 109th Congress, early Saturday morning, ended up giving Louisiana, Texas, Alabama and Mississippi a good bit of what was turned down half a century ago.

The legislation opens about 8 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling, and U.S. industrial consumers of natural gas hope it will boost supplies and moderate prices.

But the bill's landmark aspect was a deal that diverts 37.5 percent of federal royalties from future drilling to the four Gulf of Mexico states -- the same percentage Truman offered Long. The accord could ultimately be worth $650 million a year for Louisiana, the biggest beneficiary.

"This was the best Christmas present I could ever, ever have gotten or that the state of Louisiana could have gotten," Landrieu said in an interview yesterday.

Foes of the legislation fear it will lure states opposed to offshore drilling such as California, Virginia, Florida and North and South Carolina into supporting exploration off their shorelines in return for a gusher of new revenue. "A lot of folks don't want the revenue sharing because they're afraid that people won't be as opposed" to offshore drilling, Breaux said in June.

DOJ_NMG_0105575

Landrieu says the legislation will help Louisiana restore coastal wetlands and take measures to protect such energy infrastructure as ports, pipelines and oil refineries. To ease congressional concerns that Louisiana will treat the royalties as a windfall for general spending, the state has amended its constitution to restrict use of the money to those purposes.

Unlike Long, who asserted state ownership over waters up to 37 miles from shore, Landrieu merely asserted state "partnership" with the federal government. While she initially sought half of federal royalties, she later agreed to put 12.5 percent of federal royalties into a conservation fund to be used for all 50 states, a move that was designed to blunt environmental objections to new drilling.

Opponents of the bill call it fiscally irresponsible and say that any royalties from drilling in federal waters, which begin three miles from shore and extend up to 200 miles out, belong to the federal government. Those are the boundaries Congress drew in 1953 and the Supreme Court affirmed. Given the size of the federal budget deficit and future Social Security and Medicare obligations, many lawmakers say the federal government is in no position to give away big revenue streams.

"According to estimates, the bill will drain $170 billion from the federal treasury over the next 60 years," said Rep. Lois Capps (D-Calif.), a member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, during last week's floor debate. "This is a great deal for these four states, and I certainly understand why they support it. What I don't understand is why my colleagues from the other 46 states would agree to it."

Capps added that "the offshore waters of the Gulf Coast belong to all Americans, as do the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, the Great Lakes and other public lands. Mr. Speaker, we have record deficits as far as the eye can see, and it is simply irresponsible to add billions more in new debt through legislation like this."

Environmentalists have also fought the measure. "We believe that tying coastal restoration funding to money derived from new offshore drilling . . . would simply exacerbate the problem," said Carl Pope, executive director of the Sierra Club. "There is agreement that oil and gas drilling in the Gulf of Mexico has contributed to the destruction and loss of Louisiana wetlands. Thus, we don't see the logic in funding restoration when the trade-off is incentives for new drilling that would jeopardize other coastal areas."

In marshaling arguments for the legislation, Landrieu bridged the gap between proponents of unlimited offshore drilling and foes of all offshore drilling.

She noted that the federal government gives states 50 percent of royalties for minerals, oil and gas taken from federal land. And she argued that the Gulf Coast states suffered environmental degradation from serving as a base for the petroleum industry. After hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit the region in 2005, the Gulf Coast states were also able to tap into sympathy and concerns over the country's energy infrastructure.

Because of the way legislation is scored for budgetary purposes, the money diverted from the Treasury does not show up in the bill's cost estimates. Moreover, because the states get a share of future drilling revenue, their big payday doesn't come for more than 10 years, beyond the window used by congressional budgeteers.

Instead, because it opens up new areas for drilling, the measure is scored as a plus for federal revenue. That helped cover other giveaways in the tax extender bill the drilling measure was attached to. Some of those were energy-related. One example: the ability to depreciate 50 percent of the cost of a cellulosic ethanol plant in its first year of operation. Despite all the talk about this potential energy source, technological and financing issues remain. Judging from the scoring of this item -- $17 million over the next five years -- lawmakers don't expect more than one plant to be built before the end of 2012.

In the end, House and Senate Democratic leaders did not attempt to rally their party caucuses against the offshore drilling measure despite fiscal and environmental objections. That was, in part, out of deference to Landrieu, the only Democratic senator in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana or Texas.

"There were a lot of Democrats who voted against this," Landrieu conceded. But she said "millions" of jobs for middle-class Americans depended on continued natural gas supplies. She said party leaders realized "when there are places in the country willing to drill that Democrats should be in favor. It is not good to stick your head in the sand and pretend we don't need oil and gas."

The Cost Of An Overheated Planet (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0105576

By Steve Lohr

New York Times, December 12, 2006

The iconic culprit in global warming is the coal-fired power plant. It burns the dirtiest, most carbon-laden of fuels, and its smokestacks belch millions of tons of carbon dioxide, the main global warming gas.

So it is something of a surprise that James E. Rogers, chief executive of Duke Energy, a coal-burning utility in the Midwest and the Southeast, has emerged as an unexpected advocate of federal regulation that would for the first time impose a cost for emitting carbon dioxide. But he has his reasons.

"Climate change is real, and we clearly believe we are on a route to mandatory controls on carbon dioxide," Mr. Rogers said. "And we need to start now because the longer we wait, the more difficult and expensive this is going to be."

Global warming is not only an environmental hazard, but also a great challenge for economic policy. Without economic incentives, analysts say, the needed investments in industrial cleanup, innovative low-carbon technologies, fuel-efficient cars and other ways of reducing energy waste will not occur.

Mr. Rogers's stance is far from universal within the power industry, but it has surprising support, particularly from those, like him, who also produce electricity from carbon-free nuclear reactors.

And despite the Bush administration's adamant opposition to any limits on fossil fuel emissions, the idea is beginning to pick up momentum in the American political arena as well. Already, California has adopted a policy aimed at reducing the state's contribution to global warming by 25 percent in the next 14 years.

In Washington, several influential lawmakers, including Senator John McCain, a leading Republican contender for president in 2008, have introduced legislation intended to limit the nation's carbon dioxide output.

But how would those goals be achieved? Global warming can be seen as a classic "market failure," and many economists, environmental experts and policy makers agree that the single largest cause of that failure is that in most of the world, there is no price placed on spewing carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

Yet it is increasingly clear that there is a considerable cost to carbon dioxide emissions, especially to future generations, as climate specialists warn of declines in farm output in poor tropical countries, fiercer hurricanes and coastal floods that could make many people refugees.

Price List for Polluting

"Setting a real price on carbon emissions is the single most important policy step to take," said Robert N. Stavins, director of the environmental economics program at Harvard University. "Pricing is the way you get both the short-term gains through efficiency and the longer-term gains from investments in research and switching to cleaner fuels."

Some academics see an analogy between a global warming policy and the pursuit of national security in the cold war. In the late 1950s, American military spending reached as high as 10 percent of the gross domestic product and averaged about 4 percent, far higher than in any previous peacetime era. A Soviet nuclear attack was a danger but hardly a certainty, just as the predicted catastrophes from global warming are threats but not certainties.

"The issues are similar in that you pay now so things are less risky in the future — it's an insurance policy," said Richard Cooper, a Harvard economist. "And in the cold war, we taxed ourselves fairly highly to mitigate that threat."

What makes such a view more than a conceptual argument is that executives like Mr. Rogers, who is also chairman of the Edison Electric Institute, a utility trade group whose members provide 60 percent of the nation's electric power, are also pushing for a carbon dioxide-pricing policy to reduce the risk to their companies.

They say that only with some sort of federal policy in place — which would probably take the form of a tax on carbon dioxide waste from any source, or a "cap and trade" regulatory system — will it become clear what carbon cleanup or fuel-switching moves their companies may have to make, and on what sort of timetable.

Investors in alternative energy projects also emphasize the need to set policy priorities.

"We need a policy framework for the long term," said Vinod Khosla, a leading environment-oriented venture capitalist. "Fifteen years is the minimum horizon of stability that we need."

Beyond incentives for business, a national global warming policy should include increased federal spending on research on futuristic technologies to curb carbon emissions, advocates say.

DOJ_NMG_0105577

Combating global warming, they say, will require over-the-horizon breakthroughs involving safe nuclear energy, hydrogen power and advanced carbon sequestration — or technologies that have not yet been imagined.

But even today, there are sizable opportunities, by insisting on more efficient energy use, that are not being seized, according to the McKinsey Global Institute. In a new report, the institute, a business-oriented research group that is part of McKinsey & Company consultants, estimated that the yearly growth in worldwide energy demand could be cut by more than half through 2020 — to an annual rate of 0.6 percent from a forecast 2.2 percent, using current technology alone.

Available steps that would yield a more productive, and efficient, use of energy include compact fluorescent lighting, improved insulation on new buildings, reduced standby power requirements and an accelerated push for appliance-efficiency standards.

All these moves, McKinsey said, would save money for consumers and businesses. "We were really surprised by these huge straightforward opportunities that are not being taken," said Diana Farrell, the McKinsey Global Institute's director. "In some senses, there is a big market failure."

Energy efficiency can help slow the pace at which the risk from global warming risk increases, but it cannot reverse the trend alone. In the very long term, environmental experts say, the world's economy needs a technological transformation, from deriving 90 percent of its energy from fossil fuels today to being largely free of emissions from fossil fuels by 2100, through cleanup steps or alternative energy sources.

Science and Uncertainty

Given all the uncertainties, the scientists and economists who design and run simulations of global warming policy acknowledge that their work is at best a tool for thinking about climate change issues.

Still, they tend to agree that over the next 50 years, the cost of slowing and eventually reversing carbon emissions growth will be 1 to 2 percent of global economic output. They assume the focus over those years will be mainly on efficiency and cleaning up electricity generation.

In later years, their cost projections become more varied, ranging from 1 percent to as high as 16 percent of global output, depending on assumptions about how difficult it will be to wean the world's vehicle fleet from fossil fuels, and to make other technological leaps.

"Going past 2050, the cleverness really has to kick in," said John M. Reilly, an economist at the M.I.T. Joint Program on the Science and Policy of Global Change.

A global warming policy would be shaped first by science and social values, before economics. A sensible goal, according to many environmental specialists, is to try to avert a doubling or more of atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide in this century.

"This is not something that goes on inside a computer, but a grand political calculation," said Stephen H. Schneider, a climate expert at Stanford University.

Yet even in realms of social policy, where uncertainty is high, there is an implicit calculation of costs and benefits. In the case of global warming, the cost of society's insurance policy may well be worth it, measured in the damage averted.

But it will not be cheap. Take the experts' consensus estimate that curbing carbon dioxide emissions over the next 50 years will, on average, cost about 1 percent of global economic activity annually.

It seems a modest figure. Yet in today's terms, 1 percent of the United States economy is more than $120 billion a year, or $400 a person.

Put another way, $120 billion is about equal to the Bush administration's tax cuts in 2001; it is also roughly the amount spent on the Iraq and Afghanistan wars this year.

"There's no easy way around the fact that if global warming is a serious risk, there will be serious costs," said W. David Montgomery, an economist at Charles River Associates, a consulting group.

A price on carbon dioxide emissions, most economists agree, would be the most efficient way to combat global warming. And the price, they say, should start small to give industries time to adapt, then ratchet up over the years to encourage long-term investments in energy saving, carbon cleanup and new technology.

DOJ_NMG_0105578

The two methods of pricing carbon are to charge a tax on each ton of carbon dioxide emitted into the air, or to place a cap on total emissions and then let polluters trade permits to emit a ton of carbon dioxide.

Economists like William D. Nordhaus of Yale and Mr. Cooper of Harvard advocate a tax as the clearest price signal to the energy marketplace, and less susceptible to political tampering and market manipulation than a cap-and-trade system. It could also be used to raise revenue to offset other taxes.

In a recent paper, Mr. Cooper suggested an initial tax around $14 a ton of carbon dioxide emitted, which he calculated would translate roughly into a 100 percent tax on coal and add 12 cents to each gallon of gasoline. Such a tax would raise as much as $80 billion a year in the United States.

"There's nothing sacred about the number," he said, "but you need to get a significant price into the system to create the incentive for people to go out and look for solutions."

A Quota or a Tax?

Economically, a cap-and-trade system has the same goal as a tax, putting a price on carbon dioxide emissions, but goes about it differently. A limit would be placed on overall emissions, with polluters allocated permits. Then, companies able to go below their emission targets would be allowed to sell their unused "permits to pollute" to companies that could not.

A cap-and-trade system also has some political advantages. It can deflect the anger over higher costs and enable governments to use their allocations to essentially buy political support, since permits are the equivalent of cash. Big polluters, who will have to invest most to clean up, could be granted extra allowances in the early years of the program to subsidize their investments.

In the United States, caps and trading have a record of success in combating acid rain, which is caused by sulfur dioxide emissions from fossil fuel power plants.

"People said it was a crazy idea, too complicated and too regulatory," said Richard L. Schmalensee, an M.I.T. economist who was an economic adviser to the first President Bush when the sulfur emissions program was designed. "But the lesson learned was that a cap-and-trade system can work."

The global warming legislative proposals before Congress — including one sponsored by Senator McCain and Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, and another by Senator Jeff Bingaman of New Mexico — envision cap-and-trade systems.

But the challenge of controlling carbon emissions is far greater than sulfur. Carbon dioxide is a pervasive byproduct of the economy, and the polluters are many and varied. Once emitted, carbon dioxide is vexingly long-lived in the environment.

The early struggles of the European Union's carbon emission trading system, set up last year, point to the administrative and political difficulties. The European governments, responding to lobbying by domestic businesses, handed out permits that exceeded the emissions that most companies were already putting into the air. When that became clear in April, the market price of carbon dioxide emissions fell by half.

Senator Barbara Boxer of California, who will soon take the chair of the Senate environment committee, has pledged to push Congress to impose a price on carbon dioxide emissions, as the Europeans have done.

Yet without coordinated international action, even if the United States — the largest source of carbon emissions — reined them in, this would have only limited effect on global warming. China is on track to surpass the United States as the leading emitter of carbon dioxide by 2009, according to a recent report by the International Energy Agency.

"Unless China and India are brought in, it won't matter much what the developed world does," said Scott Barrett, a professor of environmental economics at the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University.

But developing nations like China and India, energy specialists say, would certainly avoid joining any international effort on global warming without an emphatic move by the United States.

"Every year we delay, we contribute to another year of delay in China, India and elsewhere," said Jason S. Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, a bipartisan group of energy experts. "The ecological and economic imperative is to start now."

Utilities Stuck In Clean-air Quandary (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

DOJ_NMG_0105579

USA Today, December 12, 2006

Global warming? What global warming?

The rising temperature of Earth's atmosphere may be breeding growing distress and sparking sales of hybrid cars, but most utility executives aren't exactly losing sleep over the problem.

In fact, many electric companies are forging ahead with plans for traditional coal-fired power plants, the single biggest source of global warming, despite expectations that federal limits will eventually be placed on carbon dioxide emissions. That prospect grows more likely with Congress' new Democratic majority.

A much smaller group of utilities are building a new type of coal "gasification" plant that emits fewer pollutants and can be more easily retrofitted with equipment to trap carbon dioxide before it's released. Of roughly 150 coal-fired plants being proposed by utilities — what would be the biggest wave since the 1970s — only about a dozen are cleaner gasification plants.

Uncertainty about how restrictive any limits might be has left utilities with a dilemma: build traditional coal plants that are cheaper and generally deemed more reliable or "clean-coal" facilities that may be less expensive in the long run?

Traditional-coal proponents "are putting their head in the sand and saying (a carbon constraint) is not going to happen," says Peter Fusaro, chairman of consulting group Global Change Associates.

All agree new generation is needed. Power demand is projected to jump 19% over the next decade, yet generating capacity is slated to rise just 6%, says the North American Electric Reliability Council.

Coal remains the fuel of choice for most power companies, producing just over half of the USA's electricity. Natural gas prices are highly volatile. Nuclear plants, though gaining favor, still face public opposition. And wind turbines and solar panels operate too intermittently to constitute the bulk of a utility's portfolio.

Coal is cheap and plentiful. There's enough in the USA to meet demand for the next 250 years. Yet coal plants produce a third of U.S. carbon dioxide emissions, the main culprit in global warming, which is blamed for rising sea levels and more virulent hurricanes, floods and droughts. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger last month signed legislation to reduce emissions of greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by 2020. And eight Northeastern states are taking part in a regional initiative to cap discharges.

Standard pulverized-coal plants turn coal into tiny bits that are burned in a boiler. The carbon dioxide produced is released through a smokestack. Technology to capture the carbon dioxide and store it underground — or use it to help extract more oil from existing reserves — would add up to 80% to the cost of the plant, says Ed Rubin, environmental engineering professor at Carnegie Mellon University.

Gasification plants turn coal into gases, filtering out carbon dioxide before the gases are burned, a much simpler process that also removes pollutants, such as sulfur and mercury, more efficiently. A gasification plant costs about 20% more to build than a typical $1 billion pulverized-coal plant. But it will be cheaper to add carbon-capture to gasification plants, Rubin says.

Bottom line: Gasification is about 20% cheaper than pulverized coal if both plants add carbon-capture. Equipment to trap and store carbon for both types of generators should be ready in five to 10 years.

Faced with hazy rules and technology, many utilities are sticking with pulverized coal. In Texas, TXU is spending $10 billion to build 11 pulverized-coal plants by 2010, citing population growth. If all are built, TXU would become the fourth-largest carbon emitter, up from No. 10, says environmental group Natural Resources Defense Council.

"We certainly understand the growing concern in society about carbon," says TXU spokeswoman Kimberly Morgan. "But the only absolute thing we know right now is that Texas needs more power, and we are offering up a solution."

She says gasification is unreliable, noting the country's only two gasification plants, operated by Tampa Electric in Florida and by PSI and Dynegy in Wabash, Ind., have been plagued by periodic shutdowns. Also, it's unclear if and when Congress will impose a cap on carbon dioxide emissions. "It would be awfully risky of us to base a $10 billion business decision on rules … that may or may not be in existence 10 or 20 years down the road," Morgan says.

Howard Herzog of MIT's energy lab agrees, saying, "It makes no sense" for utilities beholden to shareholders to build anything other than standard coal plants.

Another drawback, Morgan says, is that it's tough to get guarantees from equipment manufacturers for plants that use the kind of lower-grade coal prevalent in Western states, including Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0105580

But critics contend TXU and others are rushing to build an armada of old-style coal generators in the belief Congress will grandfather those underway before carbon caps are set. Under a cap-and-trade system, utilities would have to buy allowances to spew carbon, but older plants might get more free allowances.

"I'm a little leery about any strategy that appears to be racing to the finish to grandfather before carbon limits are set up," says Richard Sedano of the Regulatory Assistance Project, a consulting group. Morgan disputes the claim.

Daniel Lashof of the defense council predicts carbon limits will come "sooner rather than later," saddling utilities with huge allowance costs. Shareholder resolutions filed last week voice concerns about TXU's plans.

Others utilities, such as NRG and Duke Energy, mindful of possible carbon caps, are building gasification plants. American Electric Power, the nation's biggest consumer of coal, is planning two gasifiers in Ohio and West Virginia. And while AEP also plans two pulverized-coal facilities, CEO Mike Morris says, it will transition its stable of new coal plants to gasification.

"I think it's clear that you're going to have to address the global warming issue," he says.

Ohio let AEP recover from customers its preconstruction costs for the gasification facility. But Wisconsin nixed a proposed gasifier, declining to pass higher costs to consumers while there's no carbon cap. Morris says AEP will build the plants only in states that permit cost recovery.

Congress could settle the uncertainty by moving quickly to curb carbon emissions. Democrats' new majority increases the odds legislation will be passed in the next two years, Lashof says. But the party's narrow margin of control still makes passage an uphill climb, says Tim Vandenberg of Washington Analysis. And the White House opposes carbon caps, which likely wouldn't take effect for at least five years.

To muster Republican votes, Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M., who chairs the Energy committee, and incoming Chairman Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., are proposing initially modest limits that would set emissions at 2013 levels by 2020 and allowances at $7 per ton of carbon — far below the $30 experts say is needed to coax utilities into cutting carbon discharges.

Electric Breakthrough Goes Commercial (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, December 12, 2006

WESTBOROUGH, MASS.

Twenty years after their much ballyhooed discovery, high-tech materials capable of delivering 150 times the electricity of conventional wire are starting to push into the commercial market.

They promise to make generators, industrial motors, and even power lines far more efficient as the technology becomes more affordable. At least eight new cable projects already are under way in the United States, Europe, China, South Korea, Japan, and Mexico. This month, a leading US innovator in the field will shove out the factory door its first commercial product using the technology, which will help the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) keep its grid stable.

"It's been a long time coming, a real marathon, but it's exciting because we're seeing the promise become reality," says the firm's president, Greg Yurek, of American Superconductor Corp. in Westborough, Mass.

Only about a dozen companies worldwide specialize in the technology - high-temperature superconductors (HTS) that can deliver electricity with nearly no resistance to the current. Besides ASC, two are based in the US: SuperPower Inc., a subsidiary of Royal Philips Electronics, and MetOx.

"It's not just R&D anymore," says Trudy Lehner, a spokeswoman for SuperPower. "It's clearly moving into a commercial stage."

This year, ASC has seen orders soar for its HTS wire. In September, a Korean research institute ordered 22,000 meters of it. Later this month, ASC will send the US Navy in Philadelphia a superconducting motor made with HTS wire for its newest warship - a motor less than half the size and one-third the weight of a copper-based motor.

"The market right now is much more poised for this type of technology than what we would have seen just a few years ago," says Neal Elliott, industrial program director for the American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy, a Washington advocacy group.

DOJ_NMG_0105581

Domestically, HTS wire has been featured in demonstration projects in Columbus, Ohio, and Albany, N.Y. In March, a half-mile of ASC's HTS wire is expected to be installed by the Long Island Power Authority. With the US electric-power industry poised for long-term growth, tens of billions of dollars will be spent to improve grid reliability - including more HTS products, industry analysts say.

Scientists have known since 1911 that some materials became superconductors when cooled to a certain temperature. But to gain such efficiencies, they had to cool them to nearly the lowest known temperature in the universe - hardly practical outside the lab. In 1986, two IBM researchers in Switzerland discovered a ceramic oxide material that was superconductive at much higher temperatures (a still chilly -395 degrees). The high-temperature superconductor was born.

Instead of requiring costly liquid helium for cooling, the breakthrough led to materials that could be cooled with far more common and cheaper liquid nitrogen. Superconductors moved out of the physics lab and into other applications.

Now Dr. Elliott and others say superconductors may be poised to finally leap from high-cost experimental projects into products with wide appeal to industry.

Driven by the use of computers, the Internet, and telecommunications, the nation is increasingly shifting toward electricity as its energy of choice. In 1970, it accounted for 25 percent of US power use; today, it accounts for 40 percent, says the Electric Power Research Institute.

At the same time, however, an increasingly creaky electric grid infrastructure has not kept up. After the Northeast blackout of Aug. 14, 2003, it was determined that high demand had drained a little known but critical element called "reactive power" from the grid, making it unstable.

ASC's new SuperVAR machine - which is being shipped to the TVA this month - is more efficient than traditional capacitors at smoothing out power surges and filling the demand for reactive power. The growth of wind power, which generates electricity intermittently depending on the wind, appears to be a hot growth market for superconducting voltage regulators.

"The future for superconductors is good, but really looks like more of a niche market in the utility industry," says Alison Silverstein, an independent utility industry consultant. "You're going to see these devices in specific applications, where reactive power is needed at substations, or in urban applications where utility tunnels are really crowded - or to help regulate wind power."

That may change if the economics improve. On the basis of cost per unit of power transmitted, first-generation HTS wire is twice to three times as expensive as copper cable, depending on the application. By 2010, Yurek claims ASC's second-generation wire should have roughly the same price performance as copper.

New-car Miles-per-gallon Estimates Will Drop Next Year (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, December 11, 2006

WASHINGTON — Fuel economy ratings of cars and trucks will drop significantly starting with 2008 models, some of which will go on sale early next year.

The declines are because the Environmental Protection Agency is using more-realistic conditions to estimate the mileage cars and trucks will get. The vehicles themselves, in most cases, haven't changed, only the formula used to assign fuel economy numbers.

Fuel-saving gasoline electric hybrids will see the biggest drops in the mileage numbers posted on their window stickers — as much as 30% worse in city driving, 20% worse on the highway, the EPA said after issuing new testing procedures.

Averaged over all vehicles of all types, city mileage ratings will drop 12% and highway numbers will fall 8%.

GREEN VEHICLE GUIDE: Find a fuel-effcient car.

Big changes to the 30-plus-year-old tests:

•Temperature: The new tests start with the car at 20 degrees Fahrenheit. The old tests started at 75 degrees. A cold vehicle uses more energy than a warm one. Cold temperatures are especially hard on the batteries that power hybrids, which is partly why those vehicles take such a big hit in the new ratings.

DOJ_NMG_0105582

•Speed: The new tests use a maximum speed of 80 mph during the highway cycle instead of 60 mph in the old test, and 55 mph during the city portion instead of 56 mph. The city test always has been and continues to be closer to suburban driving conditions than true stop-and-go urban conditions.

The new test includes hard acceleration. The old test used gentle acceleration.

That's another reason hybrids suffer. Hard acceleration requires full use of the gasoline engine and little or no participation by the fuel-saving electric engine. "It's not acting as a hybrid when you're accelerating like that," says Bill Wehrum, acting assistant administrator of EPA's office of air and radiation, the office in charge of the testing that generates the fuel economy numbers.

•Air conditioning: The new test assumes it is used 13% of the time. The old test didn't use air conditioning at all.

Air conditioning puts a drag on the engine and causes it to use more fuel. Wehrum says 13% is a high-enough figure because "some people don't use it at all."

The EPA and automakers refused to provide numbers for specific vehicles. But, for example, a 30% drop would cut the Toyota Prius hybrid's city rating to 42 miles per gallon from the current 60 mpg. A 20% drop would slice the highway number to 41 from today's 51.

If the Honda Civic hybrid was hit with the maximum decline, its city rating would fall to 34 mpg from the current 49 mpg, and highway mileage would drop to 41 mpg from today's 51 mpg.

Automakers will be allowed to include, through June, a line on the new window stickers saying what the mileage ratings would have been under the previous test.

In what could be helpful to pickup and SUV shoppers, the new EPA rules require fuel economy numbers to be posted on medium-duty vehicles — those with a gross vehicle weight rating of 8.500 to 10,000 pounds — starting with 2011 models. Such vehicles, also known as three-quarter-ton and one-ton models, aren't currently required to post mileage numbers.

The auto industry, through its Washington trade group the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, said: "The new mileage labels reflect how we drive today…but even with the new labels, your mileage will vary. In fact, EPA says how you drive is the most important factor."

The new fuel economy tests are a long time coming. Despite years of complaints that the EPA numbers were unrealistic, the agency didn't begin seriously considering a change until 2004, spurred by a petition filed in 2002 by the environmental group Bluewater Network of San Francisco, Calif. The group, part of the larger Friends of the Earth, normally concerns itself with marine issues. The mileage challenge was a detour for it.

Bluewater cheered the changes. "The era of inflated fuel mileage labeling is over. The EPA did an excellent job with these revisions, which will save motorists money while also reducing global warming pollution," Russell Long, Bluewater vice president, said in a statement.

Travel organization AAA also applauded. "Any time you provide consumers with more accurate information in their buying decisions, that's a positive thing," said Mantill Williams, spokesman in AAA's Washington, D.C., office.

EPA's Wehrum insisted the agency would have updated the tests even without complaints from motorists and the Bluewater petition: "Yes, definitely. The price of oil has gone up, the price of gas has gone up and people are more concerned than ever about fuel economy."

Ironically, EPA has for years been conducting tests along the lines of the new fuel economy tests. But it was doing so only to gather emissions information and wasn't sure it could simply use the data for fuel economy estimates without Congressional approval.

The new mileage tests don't affect calculations for what's known as CAFE, corporate average fuel economy, or the average mileage of all vehicles sold by an automaker. Averaged together, all cars an automaker sells must hit 27.5 miles per gallon or the car company has to pay a penalty to the government. Trucks must hit 21.6 mpg.

That program is overseen by the Department of Transportation, not by EPA, and it involves different calculations.

E.P.A. Revises Its Formula To Calculate Auto Mileage (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

DOJ_NMG_0105583

New York Times, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 11 — The Environmental Protection Agency rewrote one of the great fictions of American life on Monday by changing the formula for calculating miles-per-gallon numbers on the window stickers of new cars, to take account of higher speeds, more aggressive driving, more air-conditioning use and other factors not in the old system.

The rules cover 2008 models, some of which will be on sale next month. It does not change the actual mileage, only the advice to consumers. Congress ordered the change 18 months ago because of widespread dissatisfaction with the accuracy of the old numbers.

The system was last adjusted in 1984, when the E.P.A. cut the city values by 10 percent and the highway values by 22 percent. This one cuts the estimate of highway mileage another 8 percent, on average, and city mileage up to another 25 percent beyond the 1984 cut. Generally, the new formula narrows the gap between small cars and bigger vehicles, with small-car fuel economy estimates falling by more than the estimates for sport utility vehicles and other larger vehicles.

Hybrid vehicles will take some of the biggest hits, according to the agency, because the new standards include use of heaters and air-conditioners. Most gas-electric hybrids shut down their engines at low speeds, and run on electric batteries, but if the vehicle occupants have turned on the air-conditioner or heater, the engine may not shut down.

At Consumers Union, the nonprofit group that publishes Consumer Reports, Ann Wright, a senior policy analyst, said the new stickers would move the government estimates closer to reality. Consumer Reports does road tests on vehicles and its mileage results are generally much lower than the E.P.A.'s.

At the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, a trade group, officials also praised the new standard and said it would cut fuel economy estimates by 8 to 10 percent on average. The alliance had fought to make sure that the formula was used only on the sticker, and not on the Corporate Average Fuel Economy standard, the one that manufacturers must meet or pay a penalty.

At the Bluewater Network, an environmental group that petitioned the E.P.A. in 2002 to recalculate the numbers, Russell Long, the executive director, said he had been told that the agency was also working on a new sticker for "flexfuel" vehicles, which can run on ethanol mixtures as high as 85 percent, known as E85. Those get about 30 percent fewer miles a gallon of E85 than on gasoline.

When the E.P.A. began estimating mileage in the 1970s, the test covered speeds up to 60 miles an hour, and it expected that when drivers wanted to go faster, they increased their speeds by 3.3 miles per hour each second. But about 28 percent of driving is done above 60 miles per hour, the agency said, and actual acceleration rates are often 10 or 12 miles per hour each second.

Earlier this year when it proposed the new standard, the E.P.A. said its test "omitted many critical driving modes."

The fuel economy rating system is an afterthought to treadmill tests done by the E.P.A. to measure pollutants that cause smog and acid rain.

The redesigned sticker puts the annual estimated fuel cost in big type in the center of the label, and locates the vehicle with an arrow on a horizontal bar, to show its position relative to competitors, as is done with refrigerators and air-conditioners.

For most of 2007, both stickers, and both formulas, will be in use, the new ones on the cars designated as 2008 models, and the old ones on the 2007 models.

Despite the changes, the EPA's label retains a phrase that has become a cliché: "Actual mileage will vary."

New Rules Will Lower Fuel Economy Estimates (AP)

By Ken Thomas

AP, December 12, 2006

WASHINGTON — Car buyers will be facing a new form of sticker shock when they browse dealer lots starting next year.

The Environmental Protection Agency today issued new testing procedures that will cause fuel economy estimates on the stickers of new vehicles to drop an average of 12 percent for city driving on most 2008 model year vehicles, and 8 percent for highway driving.

Highly fuel-efficient vehicles are expected to see the largest slide, with ratings for city driving dropping by as much as 30 percent and highway driving estimates falling 25 percent from current levels.

DOJ_NMG_0105584

Mileage estimates for gas-electric hybrids likely will be 20 percent to 30 percent lower for city driving and about 10 percent to 20 percent lower on the highway, the agency said.

The changes respond to consumer complaints that fuel economy estimates are frequently less than advertised. EPA's new system will take into account data from vehicle tests designed to more accurately assess high-speed driving, rapid acceleration, the use of air conditioning and driving in cold temperatures.

"EPA's new fuel economy sticker ensures American motorists won't be stuck with higher than anticipated charges at the pump," said EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson in a statement.

More Politicized Science At The EPA (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 12, 2006

THE ENVIRONMENTAL Protection Agency has been rightly criticized under the Bush administration for repeatedly allowing political appointees to run roughshod over scientists, ignoring their findings and crafting regulations that please industry but fail to protect the public. Now the agency is making the practice official.

Under a new policy announced last week, scientists will be shuffled to the margins when the agency resets its all-important air-quality standards. Up to now, the process of drawing up new standards began with two sets of scientists — EPA staffers and an independent panel — conducting reviews of how pollution affects public health, then making recommendations to agency managers. Now the managers, who are usually political appointees, will work with staff scientists from the start, and the first review paper will be about policy, not science.

Only after the policy assessment is published in the Federal Register, when it is less likely to be changed significantly, will independent experts have any say at all.

The ostensible reason for the change is to streamline the regulatory process — a reasonable goal. Both industry and environmentalists have criticized the EPA for failing to meet legal deadlines for updating air standards. But there are better ways to make the EPA run more efficiently than by converting a scientific process into a political one.

In a way, the new policy is more honest — politicians were already brushing aside research that didn't fit their ideology. Last year, for example, the EPA's inspector general reported that the agency ignored scientific findings to come up with softer regulations on mercury, which is produced largely by coal-burning plants. Three years before, it held up the release of a report on mercury levels in women, for no good reason, until it was leaked nine months later. Now it won't have to pretend to pay much attention to scientists at all.

Normally, the administration has broad leeway to interpret law into regulations. But when it changes the process to subvert the law's protective intent, Congress should reluctantly step in to spell out the obvious: Environmental policy is, first and foremost, about science.

FWS Pulls National Bison Range Pact (MISSOUL)

By Perry Backus, of the Missoulian

Missoula (MT) Missoulian, December 12, 2006

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service officially pulled its controversial agreement with the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes for shared management of the National Bison Range on Monday, saying the tribes have failed to live up to their responsibilities and have created an unacceptable workplace environment.

Tribal officials said the announcement was unexpected and denied the allegations contained in FWS Regional Director Mitch King's letter.

“It's taken us off guard. We were in the middle of something and trying to make it work,” said CSKT Tribal Council Chairman James Steele Jr.

King's letter said the agency was terminating negotiations for future annual funding agreements.

The letter ordered the tribes to immediately stop performing any activities at the Bison Range, return all FWS equipment, and withdraw all CSKT employees, contractors and volunteers from the refuge by the end of the workday Tuesday.

The decision marked the end of months of negotiations between the tribes and the Fish and Wildlife Service over future management of the National Bison Range.

DOJ_NMG_0105585

The two entered into an agreement in 2004 that split management duties beginning in 2006. King's letter said the FWS wanted to continue that agreement into 2007 with some minor revisions, but the tribes argued for more management control.

After the 2006 agreement expired Sept. 30, the FWS agreed to extend it while negotiations continued.

The tribes sought a phased takeover of the refuge, which sits in the heart of the Flathead Indian Reservation, under provisions of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act. The legislation allows tribes to apply to manage certain federal public lands where they can show a cultural, historical or geographic connection.

Matt Kales, a regional FWS spokesperson from Denver, said the legislation allows the government to sign annual funding agreements with tribes to manage selected federal lands.

While there are similar arrangements in other parts of the country, this agreement was the most far reaching, he said.

A report last summer indicated the tribes weren't satisfactorily accomplishing the work that had been agreed upon. The tribes vehemently disagreed with that report.

Kales said the FWS attempted to provide some leeway because this was the first year of the program, but the situation at the refuge continued to deteriorate. After a lengthy review, Kales said the tribes were not meeting management obligations and were creating a hostile work environment for FWS employees.

King's letter said the work environment was characterized by "harassing, offensive, intimidating and oppressive behavior on the part of the employees of the CSKT, including obscenity, fighting words and threats of violence and retaliation directed at employees of the Service."

The decision was made at the "highest level" of the FWS that dual management of the refuge was not tenable, Kales said.

"This wasn't a hasty or whimsical decision," he said.

Steele said the tribes don't agree with the Fish and Wildlife Service's reasons for terminating the agreement. This was the first time that anyone in the tribes had seen some of the allegations in King's letter, he said.

The FWS should have attempted to work within the guidelines established in the annual funding agreement to address the management issues with the tribes, he said.

"The AFA spells out ways of doing that," Steele said. "There were ways to notify us and allow us to sit down and talk about these issues."

The tribes are in the process of putting together a response to the allegations, and will appeal the decision, Steele said. In the short term, the tribes will attempt to find other work for the employees displaced by the federal government's action.

Steele said it's ironic that the FWS has decided the tribes are unable to manage the bison at the National Bison Range since the herd is descended from the Pablo-Allard herd cared for 100 years ago by tribal members.

"For the Fish and Wildlife Service to say to us that the Salish and Kootenai people do not know how to handle bison is just an ironic statement," Steele said. "If it wasn't for the tribal connection, this herd likely wouldn't have been here in the first place."

Tribal council member Steve Lozar said he grew up in Dixon in the "shadow of the Bison Range. I was one of those little kids who went over to see Big Medicine (a famous white bison) after school. When I see what's happening here, it absolutely hurts my heart. It's just wrong."

The refuge management change was opposed by 129 refuge managers, by nearly 50 different environmental groups, and by Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility.

PEER's refuge keeper, Grady Hocutt, was a wildlife refuge manager for 30 years.

He says the agreement was a poor idea pushed by political appointees under duress and could have set a precedent harmful to the entire national wildlife refuge system.

Still, Hocutt didn't see the government's decision to pull the agreement as a victory. Too many people have been hurt, and it's going to take time for that to heal, he said.

There are other avenues for the tribes to be involved with management of those lands, including cooperative agreements and contracting, Hocutt said.

Reporter Perry Backus can be reached at 523-5259 or at pbackus@missoulian.com

U.S. Joins Chippewas In Suing Michigan (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0105586

By The Associated Press

AP, December 12, 2006

BAY CITY, Mich. -- The U.S. Justice Department has joined a lawsuit filed by the Saginaw Chippewa Indian Tribe against the state that seeks sovereignty over parts of central Michigan's Isabella County, based on treaties from 1855 and 1864.

Court documents show the federal government joined the lawsuit in U.S. District Court in Bay City as an additional plaintiff on Nov. 29, the Morning Sun of Mount Pleasant reported Monday.

The tribe sued in 2005, asking a federal judge to declare that all or part of seven townships in Isabella County are Indian country as defined by federal law.

Earlier this year, the tribe amended its complaint to ask for an injunction to bar the governor, attorney general and state treasurer from exerting criminal or civil jurisdiction over the tribe or its members "in a manner not allowed in Indian country."

In the filing, Assistant U.S. Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge noted that the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction to prosecute major crimes committed on the reservation, and has other relationships with the tribe.

In response, Michigan Assistant Attorney General Todd Adams said the predecessors to the Saginaw Chippewas gave up all their land in a series of treaties, ending with the 1836 Treaty of Saginaw.

He said the 1855 and 1864 treaties "merely provided a designated area from which they could choose land like any other individual citizen of Michigan and the United States pursuant to United States law."

Adams said the only land that is truly Indian country is the little more than 800 acres held in trust for the Tribe by the federal government. The state said that even on that land, it had the right to enforce laws if activities there affected land outside of the reservation's boundaries.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Arellano To Face Additional Charges (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 12, 2006

New charges are expected to be filed this week that could lead to the death penalty against the man prosecutors say is the leader of the Arellano Félix Mexican drug cartel.

The charges against Francisco Javier Arellano Félix, who was captured at sea in August, will accuse him of additional criminal activity over the past three years, prosecutors said.

Their comments came during a brief hearing before San Diego federal judge Larry Alan Burns set a May 15 trial date for Arellano, though prosecutors and defense lawyers said they didn't think they could be ready by then.

“This is far too soon to be going to trial,” said defense lawyer Mark Adams.

Arellano is accused of racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering in a decades-long conspiracy that prosecutors say moved tons of drugs into the United States and that resulted in numerous killings on both sides of the border.

The charges, originally filed in 1997, were last updated in 2003. The evidence includes tens of thousands of pages of case files and more than 550,000 intercepted radio transmissions.

Burns said he would consider rescheduling the trial once the new indictment is unsealed but only under extraordinary circumstances. He also suggested that the case be split into two parts so some of it could go to trial quickly.

The new indictment would be the formal start of a death-penalty process that typically takes about four months and leads to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announcing whether prosecutors will seek a defendant's execution.

Authorities say the new indictment also will include charges against another man, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who was captured aboard Arellano's fishing boat by the U.S. Coast Guard off Baja California Sur. He is accused of being a member of the cartel.

Although Burns has found the case complex enough to let Arellano waive the right to a speedy trial, he said he wanted the trial to begin in the spring.

DOJ_NMG_0105587

Prosecutors said they were still evaluating evidence, and hadn't gotten all the case files on killings in Mexico that have been attributed to the cartel.

The judge told them he would not delay the trial only for that reason.

“Decide what evidence you're going to use,” he said. “This could go on forever.”

Onell Soto: (619) 293-1280; onell.soto@uniontrib.com

DEA: Mom-and-pop Meth Lab Numbers Decreasing (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), December 12, 2006

But dairy farmer allegedly was getting crystal meth from growing drug cartels

GREENEVILLE - The good news is there are far fewer makeshift methamphetamine laboratories in East Tennessee.

The bad news is Mexican drug cartels have stepped in to fill the void with an even more potent version of the addictive drug.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Michael Templeton offered that assessment of the state of the meth scourge on Monday during testimony against Richard "Dairy Man" Milburn.

Milburn is the lone defendant left standing in a massive marijuana and methamphetamine case involving more than 13 suspects, some eight tons of drugs, tractor-trailers, a dairy farm, horseback-riding buddies and Rubbermaid containers stuffed with cash.

Milburn has twice been nabbed with a cache of meth and money, including a December 2005 sting overseen by Templeton in which the Greene County dairy farmer allegedly supplied more than $34,000 to buy two pounds of the powerful stimulant.

But this was no hotplate-version of meth, according to Templeton. The stuff admitted supplier Thomas Turner delivered to Milburn and his horseback-riding pal and admitted pot pusher Mark A. Saults was an icy-looking batch of stuff known as crystal meth.

It was produced in a warehouse somewhere in California and peddled by a Mexican drug cartel.

"Two years ago, predominantly in East Tennessee, you had a lot of amateur methamphetamine labs," Templeton said. "The final product of which would not be high in quality and the purity level would be low."

Then Tennessee, like many states grappling with a rash of homemade meth labs and rural users, passed a law regulating the key ingredient in the drug - ephedrine. Many over-the-counter medications contain ephedrine. Meth-makers bought it by the boxes.

Under the new law, buyers of ephedrine products could only buy a bit of the medication at a time and had to fill out a form identifying themselves. The law, Templeton testified, worked.

"Ever since Tennessee passed the law requiring stores to put ephedrine behind the counter, it has drastically reduced what we call mom-and-pop meth stores," Templeton said.

But that success came with a high price.

"Drug cartels fill that vacuum," he testified. "(Crystal meth) is high in purity."

Federal prosecutors Robert Reeves and Nancy Harr contend Milburn was no mild-mannered dairy farmer but was instead a major drug pusher who used his Greene County farm as a base of operation and routinely went armed.

"He had all the tools of the trade for a drug dealer," Reeves told jurors in U.S. District Court in a trial presided over by senior federal Judge Leon Jordan.

Defense attorney William Louis Ricker countered that Milburn was a farmer with a habit.

"What you will see and hear is Richard Milburn was a successful farmer," Ricker said, adding that Milburn was hurt when struck by a car while on horseback. "Richard Milburn used methamphetamine to ease the pain."

The trial continues today.

Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

Drug Traffickers Sentenced (WFP)

DOJ_NMG_0105588

West Fargo Pioneer, December 11, 2006

Nine Minnesota and North Dakota defendants pleaded guilty for their participation in a drug trafficking enterprise.

Jose "Pepe" Sanchez, 31, St. Thomas, N.D., pleaded guilty to continuing criminal enterprise and to being the organizer, leader and manager of the enterprise. He faces a minimum-mandatory 20 and up to life imprisonment.

Adan Martinez, 41, Grafton, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory 20 years and up to life imprisonment.

Abdon Sanchez, 41, Grafton, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory life sentence.

Catarino Surita, 31, Grafton, pleaded guilty to distributing controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory five years and up to 40 years' imprisonment.

Reynaldo Garcia, Sr., 45, Glyndon, Minn., pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory 10 years and up to life imprisonment.

Reynaldo Garcia, Jr., 27, Glyndon, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory 20 years and up to life imprisonment.

Ricky Garcia, 23, Glydon, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a maximum of 20 years' imprisonment.

Kraig Komrosky, 19, Moorhead, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory 15 years and up to life imprisonment.

William Satrang, 57, Fargo, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to distribute controlled substances. He faces a minimum-mandatory five years up to 40 years imprisonment.

Assistant United States Attorney Chris Myers said this organization was involved in the distribution of more than 50 kilograms (100 lbs.) of cocaine, 10 kilograms (20 lbs.) of methamphetamine and nearly a ton (200 lbs.) of marijuana. The drugs were transported from the Laredo, Texas, area to the Fargo-Moorhead and Grafton area.

"This organization was dismantled by the superior undercover efforts of Special Agent Ron Wollever from the Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension. Special Agent Woolever made numerous undercover buys from members of the organization," he said.

The case was investigated by a number of agencies, including the Drug Enforcement Administration - Fargo, Minnesota Bureau of Criminal Apprehension, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, ND Bureau of Criminal Investigation, Grand Forks Narcotics Task Force, Glyndon, Moorhead, and Hallock, Minn., Police Departments, Fargo Police Department and the Kittson County, Minn., Sheriff's Office.

Authorities Uncover Steroid Drug Dealing Conspiracy (AP)

AP, December 11, 2006

CATONSVILLE, Md. -- Federal authorities say a personal trainer at a Glen Burnie fitness club imported thousands of vials and tablets of illicit muscle enhancers from overseas and sold them throughout the Baltimore region and on the Internet.

Michael Schlanger, 47, of Catonsville, was indicted in federal court in September on conspiracy to distribute to distribute anabolic steroids. Authorities said he could face up to five years in prison and $250,000 in fines if convicted.

The break in the case occurred this summer when officials seized shipments at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York and found a stash of about 40,000 vials and tablets of anabolic steroids from a storage locker in the suburban Baltimore.

Federal officials said the stash was one of the largest found in the region.

"It's unprecedented, as far as we're concerned," said Floyd Pond, deputy director of the Washington-Baltimore High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area task force program.

Ed Marcinko, a spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Baltimore, agreed.

Andrew Alperstein, Schlanger's defense lawyer, said Friday that he and his client had no comment on the charges. Schlanger has been released pending trial, Alperstein said. A trial date has not been set.

DOJ_NMG_0105589

Court documents allege Schlanger, an employee at Bally Total Fitness in Glen Burnie, imported tens of thousands of vials and tablets of the muscle-building drugs through the mail for resale.

The conspiracy came to light in July when customs agents at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York intercepted packages of steroids addressed to "County Crafts." One package was from China, another was from Great Britain.

Assisted by Anne Arundel County police, federal authorities set up a "controlled delivery" of the packages at a UPS store in Severna Park, arresting Pierre R. Gumucio and his girlfriend, Rachael Ann Martin when they arrived to retrieve the packages, officials said.

Inside their car were bags of clear glass vials of suspected steroids, orange pills and a book marked "ANABOLIC," court documents showed.

Gumucio told investigators that he worked for Schlanger, receiving two to three packages a week for him from China over the past couple of years and wiring overseas payments for the drugs on Schlanger's behalf, court documents said.

Mexico Cracking Down On Drug Violence (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 12, 2006

Filed at 10:31 p.m. ET

MEXICO CITY (AP) -- Mexico's new government announced Monday that it was sending more than 6,500 soldiers, marines and federal police to the western state of Michoacan to crack down on a wave of execution-style killings and beheadings that have left hundreds dead.

The operation is the first major offensive against drug gangs by President Felipe Calderon, who was sworn in on Dec. 1 after narrowly winning election on a law-and-order platform.

"The battle against organized crime has just begun," said Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna, flanked by the attorney general and heads of the army, navy and federal police.

Federal investigators say the violence in Michoacan, Calderon's home state, stems from a turf war between a local gang called Los Valencia and the northern Mexico Gulf cartel, whose bloody enforcers are known as the Zetas, a group of ex-Mexican army operatives turned hit men.

About half of Michoacan's more than 500 killings this year are linked to the turf war, investigators say.

In apparent attempts to terrorize those that oppose them, the gangs have carried out a wave of decapitations, placing the severed heads on public display with threatening notes including one that read, "See. Hear. Shut Up. If you want to stay alive."

In the most gruesome case, gunmen burst into a nightclub and rolled five heads onto the dance floor. In another, a pair of heads were planted in front of a car dealership in Zitacuaro, a town best known until now as a nesting ground for monarch butterflies.

Security officials said police and soldiers will arrest drug traffickers, mount checkpoints and burn crops of marijuana and opium poppies grown in Michoacan's rugged mountains.

Naval ships also will seal off the state's small Pacific coast, along which smugglers carry drugs on their way north to the United States.

Across Mexico, there have been more than 2,000 drug-related killings this year, including several police chiefs, journalists, town mayors and at least one judge.

Many security experts say it will take more than just brute force to defeat the cartels, who are heavily armed and well financed, making billions of dollars smuggling marijuana, heroin, methamphetamine and cocaine into the United States.

Calderon's predecessor, Vicente Fox, promised the "mother of all battles" against organized crime, sending in thousands of soldiers and federal police to some drug embattled towns and arresting several major drug kingpins.

But the arrests appeared to spark more violence as up-and-coming gangsters battled to take over the smuggling routes of those killed or arrested.

Troops, Police Dispatched To Drug-Plagued Mexican State (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

DOJ_NMG_0105590

The Washington Post, December 12, 2006

MEXICO CITY, Dec. 11 -- More than 5,000 Mexican soldiers and federal police officers swept into the troubled state of Michoacan on Monday hoping to quell a long, barbaric war between rival drug cartels.

The crackdown was ordered by new Mexican President Felipe CalderÃ³n, who took office Dec. 1 with promises that he would get tough on cartels suspected of more than 2,000 killings this year, including a series of gruesome beheadings in Michoacan, CalderÃ³n's home state.

Federal forces, backed by dozens of military aircraft, arrested at least 13 alleged drug traffickers in the first hours of the operation and discovered more than 1,000 marijuana plants.

"The battle against organized crime is just beginning," CalderÃ³n's interior minister, Francisco RamÃ-rez AcuÃ±a, said Monday during a news conference. "It is a fight that will take time."

The crackdown in the western state has been dubbed "Joint Operation Michoacan" because it involves federal police, troops from the Mexican navy and army, federal investigative agents and federal prosecutors.

Mexico's drug problems have risen to crisis levels as the country's cartels have grown in size and strength in the past five years. Officials here have been under increasing pressure from the United States to contain cartels whose influence stretches across the border. CalderÃ³n also is under pressure to restore order and the rule of law after several bombings in Mexico City and months of gridlock-producing protests organized by his election opponent, AndrÃ©s Manuel LÃ³pez Obrador, who has accused CalderÃ³n of electoral fraud.

The president is now waging two major military-style battles. In addition to the operation in Michoacan, he is overseeing the occupation of the southern city of Oaxaca, where protesters have been demanding the ouster of the state governor for the past six months.

CalderÃ³n's predecessor, Vicente Fox, sent federal police to Oaxaca in October. But CalderÃ³n has proved even more aggressive there. Last week, federal agents arrested the top protest leader, Flavio Sosa, a move that drew sharp criticism from human rights activists.

Mexican forces also have raided the offices of local police in Oaxaca. They are investigating whether Oaxacan police officers may be responsible for the killings of more than a dozen protesters and Brad Will, an American freelance journalist and activist.

Feds Unable To Trace Gun In Fatal Shooting (NYJN)

By Bruce Golding, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, December 12, 2006

NEW CASTLE - Federal authorities were unable to trace a handgun found near the reported scene of an unsolved roadside shooting that killed a neighbor of Bill and Hillary Clinton's.

Jim Needles of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms said there was no serial number on the weapon, which meant it was probably manufactured before 1968, when gun makers began marking their products with identifying numbers.

Needles, assistant special agent in charge of the ATF's New York Field Division, said U.S. Justice Department regulations prohibited him from releasing any details about the handgun, although he said that because of its age it was most likely a revolver.

State police found the gun while searching Echo Lake after the Nov. 18 shootings of Carlos and Peggy Perez-Olivo of Chappqua, who live three doors away from the Clintons' home.

Peggy Perez-Olivo, an elementary teacher's assistant, was shot in the head and died two days later. Carlos Perez-Olivo, a disbarred criminal defense lawyer, was shot in the side but survived.

Reach Bruce Golding at bgolding@lohud.com or 914-694-5012.

Former Kirksville Mayor Faces Federal Arson Charge (AP)

AP, December 12, 2006

ST. LOUIS (AP) -- The former mayor of Kirksville has been indicted on federal arson charges for a fire that damaged a restaurant and bar she owned in the northeast Missouri town, U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway said Monday.

Deborah Masten, 52, could face up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted. She did not have a listed telephone number. Her attorney, Doug Forsyth, did not return a phone call seeking comment.

Masten and her husband, Steve, owned Too Talls Two Eatery and Spirits when the fire broke out early New Year's Day 2005. The Missouri State Highway Patrol and state fire marshal's office determined the blaze was suspicious, prompting an investigation by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

"Despite the sadness of having to announce an indictment against a former public official, ATF is pleased to have been able to lend its investigative expertise with arson to this case," ATF special agent Michael Boxler said.

The fire was reported at 2:23 a.m. Jan. 1, 2005. Investigators announced a few weeks later it was intentionally set. The Kirksville Daily Express reported that investigators found a pile of trash out of place, and an accelerant had been used. The Mastens offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the person responsible for the fire.

But on March 3, 2005, ATF investigators named Deborah Masten as the suspect in the fire, the Daily Express reported. She maintained her innocence.

The building was badly damaged, but the gathering place, popular among students at Truman State University, was able to reopen.

Masten sold the restaurant/bar and resigned as mayor in August 2005, saying she planned to move out of Kirksville to pursue other opportunities. Her term would have expired in April 2006.

Masten was elected to the city council in April 2003 and became mayor a year later in a 3-2 vote by the council. The town's city council selects the mayor each year from among its members.

Kirksville, with 17,000 residents, is about 180 miles northwest of St. Louis.

Fugitive Caught Updating MySpace (PHI)

By Mitch Lipka

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 12, 2006

The man in the Donovan McNabb jersey got to the Philadelphia Free Library's main branch at 9 a.m., as usual, and was seated at a public computer terminal, tapping away at his MySpace.com page, as usual.

So he did not notice that 15 armed officers were quietly converging on him.

That, authorities say, is how a fugitive wanted in Georgia and Massachusetts was captured last Thursday without a fight. They say they figured out that he had been going to the library regularly to update his MySpace page.

Darren Bates, 35, was using one of the library's computers about 9:15 a.m. Thursday when 15 plainclothes members of a fugitive task force converged on him as other patrons tapped away on nearby keyboards, officials said yesterday.

"He was busy on the computer and we were able to walk right up to him from several directions without him seeing us," said John Patrignani, supervisory deputy of the U.S. Marshals Service Violent Crimes Fugitive Task Force. "He was very much surprised."

Bates, who was wearing a McNabb jersey, was taken into custody without incident, Patrignani said. He was being held yesterday in a city jail cell pending extradition to Georgia.

Patrignani said task force members in Massachusetts had determined Bates was going to the Central Library at 1901 Vine St. about the same time every day - when the library opened at 9.

He said marshals found Bates the first day they went to see if he was there visiting MySpace, a popular site for social networking.

MySpace officials could not immediately be reached for comment, and a spokeswoman for the library said she did not know what role the institution may have played in the arrest.

Various law enforcement officials said yesterday they either did not know or could not say how they had tracked Bates to the MySpace site or to the library.

Patrignani and a Georgia officer involved in pursuing Bates said they did not know what was on Bates' MySpace page. Marshals said he went by the name Anthony Watson on the site.

DOJ_NMG_0105592

