The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Serrano, 958K) reports that while "prosecutors will be working from a marked disadvantage, with much of the central part of their case stricken from the trial," they say they will "call one witness to explain" do not fly lists "and how they are used to keep suspected terrorists from boarding commercial aircraft.' This, they said, 'will allow us to present our complete theory of the case, albeit in imperfect form.'" The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/18, 424K) covered this story under the headline "Moussaoui ruling salvages the trial." The Washington Times (3/18, Seper, 90K) and the AP (3/18, Barakat, Sniffen) also covered this story.

Prosecution, Defense At Odds Over When Martin Will Testify. The Los Angeles Times (3/19, Serrano) reports, "With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when" TSA attorney Carla Martin "would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses." Prosecutors want her to appear at "the middle of the week and…testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment," but "defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning."

Specter Introduces Bill For Oversight Of Warrantless Spying. The Washington Times (3/18, Hurt, 90K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced a bill this week to increase congressional oversight of President Bush's warrantless spy program and require a court review of the program for its constitutionality," saying that "rule of law takes precedent even when the nation is at war with a new type of enemy capable of exploiting modern technology."

US Asks Judge To Reconsider Eavesdropping Order In 9/11 Detainee Civil Suit. The New York Times (3/18, Bernstein) reports that in the civil lawsuit by Muslims "swept up" in the post-9/11 US terrorism investigations, US Magistrate Judge Steven M. Gold "ordered the government on March 7 to guarantee in writing that neither the litigation team nor the potential witnesses — who include the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III — were aware" of secret eavesdropping on plaintiffs and their lawyers, "and that no such evidence would be used in the case." But on Friday, asking Gold to reconsider the order, "Stephen E. Handler of the Justice Department wrote in a filing…that if knowledge of such activity were denied in one case, a refusal to confirm or deny it in another case 'could itself tend to reveal classified information.'" NYU law professor Stephen J. Schulhofer said the filing "'is a pretty clear red flag' that eavesdropping occurred in the detainees' case."

Pentagon Hired Company That Bribed Cunningham To Help Collect Data On US Sites. Knight Ridder (3/18, Landay) reports that the Pentagon's Joint Counter-Intelligence Field Activity, CIFA, which "kept files on American anti-war activists hired" MZM Inc., "one of the contractors who bribed former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, R-Calif., to help it collect data on houses of worship, schools, power plants and other locations in the United States."

Foreign Firms Important Pentagon Contractors. The Washington Post (3/18, D1, Mccarthy, 744K) reports, "Foreign-owned companies already help manage some of the nation's most sensitive business, working on classified weapons and information programs and dealing daily with government secrets," and "with joint defense projects among allies common, and the need for the best technology ever more acute, contracting experts say they expect the trend" of granting more foreign companies classified access "to continue." Still, "foreign-owned or controlled companies that work with classified information are subject to a special set of rules."

DOJ_NMG_0019179

US Port Operator May Find Selling Difficult After Ports Controversy. The Financial Times (3/18, Wright) reports, "SSA Marine, the largest US-based container terminal operator, has taken on Citigroup to advise on a possible sale in a move that could reignite controversy about the ownership of US port operations." However, the DP World controversy "is understood to be deterring some of the world's largest terminal operators from looking at SSA's US assets," so "it could prove harder to sell SSA's US assets than its international business since foreign buyers are likely to shy away from entering the market and few domestic operators are large enough to make the purchase."

FBI "Source" Reported Seeing Top Al Qaeda Figures At Lodi Mosque. The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/18, Bohm) reports, "Osama bin Laden's right-hand man isn't the only Taliban member alleged to have once visited Lodi. An FBI 'source who is in a position to testify' told agents that he had seen two wanted terrorists visiting the Lodi Muslim Mosque and raising funds in 1999, according to federal court documents filed late Thursday night. … On Nov. 15, 2001, the source told agents that al-Zawahri was seen" at the Lodi mosque with Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser, charged in the Khobar Towers bombing, and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, charged in the bombings of US embassies in Africa. "Lodi Muslims deny that the Taliban members stayed in Lodi. FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst said Friday that she could not comment because it's an ongoing investigation and the matter is in trial." The Stockton Record (3/18, Hood) notes that the "heavily censored FBI reports" filed Thursday do not identify the source as FBI informant Naseem Khan – who earlier testified to seeing al Zawahri at the mosque – "but prosecutors handed over the documents in response to defense attorneys' demands for information relating to Khan, who is expected to return to the witness stand Tuesday." Hamid Hayat's lawyer, Wazhma Mojaddidi, "wants those blacked-out portions revealed. U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. will hear arguments on the matter Monday."

Lodi Muslims Find Claims Dubious. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, Zamora, Martin) reports, "An FBI informant's claims that three of the world's most-wanted terrorism suspects passed through town in recent years are outrageous and could damage the federal government's case against two local men, residents and legal experts said Friday." Lodi mosque leader Mohammed Shoaib said, "I think the FBI should rely on more-reliable informants. I am an American citizen, and I love this country. They never talked to me." The Chronicle adds that although "the revelations could cause problems for the federal government if the jury feels that Khan's credibility is an issue," former US Attorney Kendall Coffey "and defense lawyer James Brosnahan said the government may be able to counter any credibility problems with Khan if corroborating evidence against the Hayats, including FBI interviews with them, is strong."

Toledo Terror Suspect's Lawyer Seeks Information On Recording Of Conversations. The Toledo Blade (3/18) reports, "An attorney for accused terrorist Mohammad Zaki Amawi has asked a federal judge for assurances that the government will not be recording his conversations with his client." On Friday, public defender Dennis Terez "filed a motion yesterday in U.S. District Court in Toledo asking for comprehensive information about federal agents' use of monitoring attorney-client communications." Attorneys for co-defendants Wassim I. Mazloum and Marwan Othman El-Hindi "said they plan to file similar motions on behalf of their clients very soon."

Bond Denied For Florida Doctor Accused Of Taking Al Qaeda Loyalty Oath. The Miami Herald (3/18, Benn) reports US District Judge Loretta Preska on Friday denied bond for Florida doctor Rafiq A. Sabir, who "will continue to be held in solitary confinement in a New York prison until his trial on charges of conspiring to support Osama bin Laden's terrorist network. … Sabir was arrested at his Palm Beach County home last May, days after investigators claim he recited an oath of loyalty in front of an undercover FBI agent."

Summaries Of FBI Wiretaps Said To Contradict Hammoudeh Indictment. The St. Petersburg Times (3/18, Laughlin) reports the indictment of Sami al Arian codefendant Sameeh Hammoudeh "accused him of 'transferring monies and funds…for the purpose of promoting PIJ activities,'" but "summaries of the wiretapped conversations that the government used to justify this accusation seem to undercut the charges." The Times cites three FBI tech cuts and adds, "federal prosecutors declined to comment on repeated contradictions between information in the indictment and the tech cuts," but "former FBI agent and federal prosecutor Todd Foster didn't." Foster referred to the Aisenberg case in 1997, which also "was built on secret surveillance of the defendants' conversations," calling it "a shocking example of how wiretap information in an indictment can be full of missing statements, statements taken out of context and false statements."

DOJ_NMG_0019180

Administration Seeks Dismissal Of Guantanamo Bay Suits. The AP (3/18) reports, "The Bush administration argued Friday that a newly enacted law wipes out hundreds of pending court cases by detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who are challenging their confinement." However, "lawyers for the detainees say the new law does not cover pre-existing cases filed in U.S. District Courts."

Judge Orders DOJ To Release New York Mosque Material. The Albany Times-Union (3/18, Lyons) reports, "A federal judge has ordered the Justice Department to turn over certain classified materials to attorneys for two members of an Albany mosque who were ensnared in an FBI counterterrorism sting." The Times-Union continues, "The judge's ruling allows prosecutors to withhold some of their top-secret files in the case, and it's not clear what information will be disclosed or how soon it might become public. … The information may provide more details on why the FBI launched a sting three years ago that targeted Yassin Aref, a 35-year-old Kurdish refugee who is being held in jail without bond while awaiting trial on terrorism-related charges." The Times-Union adds, "Federal prosecutors have the option of appealing the order issued late Thursday by U.S. District Court Judge Thomas J. McAvoy, but said they won't. … McAvoy's decision comes after more than 20 meetings between the judge and federal prosecutors in which they had haggled, in private, about what classified information the government must disclose so the men can defend themselves at trial. … 'The government intends to comply with the court's order,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak."

Pakistan's UN Spokesman Affirms Converging Interests. In a letter to the Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M), Mansoor Suhail, press minister at Pakistan's UN mission, writes, "Mahnaz Ispahani's March 3 editorial-page commentary 'Our Man in Pakistan' is based on wrong assumptions and analysis, but, paradoxically, draws the right conclusion: The US must remain engaged with Pakistan. President Pervez Musharraf's government's cooperation with the US is based on the convergence of Pakistan-US interests both tactical and strategic." He continues, "Pakistan is in the frontline of the war on terrorism," and the "US also needs nuclear Pakistan's cooperation to prevent proliferation and ensure peace in South Asia, which is essential to realize US commercial and strategic goals in the region."

NYTimes Praises Bloomberg's Handling Imam's Comments. The New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) editorializes that New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg's response to chief chaplain for the New York City Corrections Department, Imam Umar Abdul-Jalil, saying "the greatest terrorists in the world occupy the White House," was "a Solomonic solution" that "also found his voice on an issue that has challenged his administration in the past: free speech." The Mayor "took wide-ranging swipes at the right and the left for stifling the airing of unpopular or offensive opinions" and "stood up for immigrants, the free press, fair elections and justice" by allowing the Imam to keep his job but adding a suspension "without pay for two weeks for his failure to disclose that he had been speaking as a private citizen, not as a city employee. It was a fair outcome."

Ahern Seeks Information On CIA Rendition Flights. Focusing on a more controversial angle, the AP (3/18, Riechmann) in an article titled "Ahern Asks Bush About CIA Flights Over EU" led its article on Bush's meeting with Ahern reporting Ahern "asked the president for more 'transparency' about CIA flights over Europe." He "said that while Ireland facilitates U.S. troop movements, and is 'happy to do it,' there is public concern over the CIA flights." He said "that it would be easier for him to explain the flights in his country if he knew more about them. 'We are going to continue to look at, perhaps, how we might bring more transparency to that process, if that's possible.'" The Washington Post ran the AP article in its coverage of Bush's meeting with Ahern.

IRA Leader Adams Detained At Reagan National Airport. The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Gerry Adams, leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party in Northern Ireland, was detained at Reagan National Airport after attending a St. Patrick's Day event at the White House, according to" Rep. Brian Higgins. Higgins "had invited Adams to speak in Buffalo, N.Y., said Adams' name appeared on a terrorism watch list, triggering a lengthy inspection. Because of the delay, Adams missed his speaking engagement, Higgins said."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Markey Criticizes TSA For Failure To Screen For Explosives. NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 6, 2:20, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "Four and a half years after 9/11, government investigators got materials for homemade bombs through security at 21 airports, every airport tested." Rep. Ed Markey "says this proves that the Transportation Security Administration has not improved safety nearly enough." Rep. Edward Markey: "TSA is way behind. TSA has put a beware-of-dogs sign on the lawn but not purchased a guard dog." Myers: "Analysts say detecting materials for homemade bombs is not easy because the ingredients themselves aren't dangerous, or explosive, until combined with other materials. TSA says it now considers explosives the number one threat. And today the top official argued that even though bomb materials got through the screeners, there are many other layers of security to keep terrorists with bombs off planes." TSA Director Kip Hawley: "Any one piece can be beatable, but it's the combination of many put together that we believe is very secure." TSA "argues that it needs more money to improve technology and hire more officers."

DOJ_NMG_0019181

The Dallas Morning News (3/18, Mittelstadt) adds, "The head of the Transportation Security Administration, which oversees nearly 43,000 screeners at 429 commercial airports, didn't quarrel with the GAO analysis – and in fact termed it helpful as his agency focuses on its top mission: intercepting improvised explosive devices." However advocates note that "the GAO testing doesn't take into account the many layers of security that occur before passengers reach the screening checkpoint and once they're through."

White House To Host Smallpox Drill. The AP (3/18) reports, "Cabinet secretaries and other top officials are gathering at the White House complex Saturday to act out the roles they would play in a smallpox outbreak." White House spokesman Scott McClellan said the "four-hour drill, designed to test the federal government's smallpox response plans, won't be attended by the president."

WPost Calls For Changes In Real ID Act. The Washington Post (3/18, A20, 744K) editorializes, "When Congress passed the Real ID Act last year, it presumably did not intend to prevent human rights victims all over the world from entering the United States," but "its effects have been cruel to people already oppressed by vile regimes and terrorist groups. The law needs to be changed," as "the legal definitions of terrorism, terrorist organizations and material support are so broad that they include countless people who deserve the United States' protection, not exclusion." While "the problem could be alleviated if the administration would use" its waiver authority "aggressively," it "would address only some of the cases, and only by having the government forgiving 'terrorism' on the part of refugees whom it should not be labeling terrorists in the first place."

Silverstein Offer To Talk On WTC Rebuilding Rebuffed By Port Authority. The New York Times (3/18, Bagli, 1.19M) reports that although talks "abruptly broke off late Tuesday night, "it looked as if the stalled talks over financing and rebuilding at ground zero could resume next week." Developer Larry A. Silverstein, "eager to restart the talks," made a new offer, which the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey rejected. However it "said it would unveil its own proposal for the site next week." The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Frangos, 2.11M) adds that a person close to the talks said "Mr. Silverstein's revised proposal closes the gap between the two sides and contains some new ideas."

WSJournal Criticizes Government For Ground Zero Delays. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) editorializes, "The failure to even begin rebuilding Ground Zero is a disgrace, but it's also a classic display of New York's dysfunctional political culture." New York Governor George Pataki is "the politician with the most responsibility here," and he "knows that when you're in trouble in politics, blame a rich old white guy." In contrast, "Silverstein has the most credibility here, not least because he's the only one who has actually built something downtown since 9/11." Leadership "has been in pathetic and short supply," and "the failure at Ground Zero is a case study in government incompetence and buck-passing. It's no way to revive the economy of Downtown Manhattan, and it's certainly no way to honor the men and women who perished there on September 11."

FEMA To Try To Reclaim Wrongly Distributed Aid. The New York Times (3/18, Lipton, 1.19M) reports, "Acknowledging that it wrongly distributed tens of millions of dollars in hurricane relief last year, the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Friday that it would try to recoup aid from thousands of individuals or families who fraudulently or otherwise wrongly collected money." The "auditors examining the $6.8 billion in disaster assistance distributed last year to 1.7 million households after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma said FEMA was to blame for much of the abuse because of a woefully inadequate accounting system that left it vulnerable to fraud," and "thousands of inappropriate payments were made because people were able to apply for and collect aid repeatedly."

Graft Investigations Growing In Louisiana. In a front page story, the New York Times (3/18, A1, Eaton, 1.19M) reports, "Growing numbers of subpoenas may soon be issued across Louisiana, where local politics remains a blood sport and corruption has been a bad habit," and "new hurricane fraud investigations are being opened 'sometimes by the day,' said Jim Letten, the United States attorney in New Orleans." In Keener, "federal prosecutors in New Orleans began bringing witnesses before a grand jury looking into possible fraud in…municipal contracts that were awarded immediately before and after the hurricane. The mayor and the entire City Council have been subpoenaed to testify, although the government has not made clear its target."

EPA Head Favors Coastal Restorations But Offers No Money Or Specifics. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/18, Brown, 257K) reports, "U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Stephen Johnson said Friday that the Bush administration is committed to rebuilding Louisiana's shattered coastline."

DOJ_NMG_0019182

However, he did not offer "new money for an effort expected to cost up to $14 billion" or "any specifics as to what role his agency would play." Johnson simply "indicated he wanted the EPA to 'get going' on at least a handful of the many coastal restoration projects under consideration."

Katrina Hurt Proctor & Gamble's Coffee Production, Spawned "Gentilly Village." The New York Times (3/18, Rich, 1.19M) reports, "Hurricane Katrina was making a mess of" Procter & Gamble's "coffee business, which got 50 percent of its supply from four sites in New Orleans," and "there are still, as Doug McGraw, the executive in charge of global coffee, put it, 'holes on the shelves' where Folgers and Millstone, Procter's brands, should be." Still after the storm, to help the employees whose homes were damaged, they "created what we call Gentilly Village, which was the trailers, some of which we bought and some of which we got from FEMA, on our parking lot, along with the generators, laundry facilities, a large kitchen and food-service operation, etc."

Blanco Spending Plan Advances In Legislature. The Baton Rouge Advocate (3/18) reports, "Legislators on Friday advanced the biggest part of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's hurricane recovery plan — totaling $6.2 billion — despite gripes about the lack of detail on how the money will be spent," as "the administration outlined the plan for legislators on two pages, not using more than a paragraph to describe each type of expense." Also, "the state must submit a spending plan to the federal government before the funds start flowing," and "the Louisiana Recovery Authority's executive director, Andy Kopplin, said the state is only ready to spend part of the money." The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/18, Scott, 257K) adds there was "a warning shot to the governor's administration that lawmakers need to be better informed and integrated into the process. In response, administration officials expressed concern that the flow of federal money for housing and other recovery programs could be unnecessarily delayed."

Congress Boosts Flood Insurance Program's Borrowing Authority. The AP (3/18, Abrams) reports Congress has "agreed to boost the borrowing power of the federal flood insurance agency, which is fast running out of money needed to meet some 225,000 claims from hurricanes Katrina and Rita." The legislation "allows the National Flood Insurance Program to borrow up to $20.8 billion from the Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $18.5 billion."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Highlight Successes, Acknowledge Mistakes In Iraq Policy. President Bush will continue his campaign to boost public support for the war in Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/17, lead story, 2:40, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The Bush Administration says, given enough time, there is a plan that will work. It will also require enough money. A new report from the Congressional Research Service says US military spending in Iraq and Afghanistan will increase to $9.8 billion a month this year. On Monday, to mark the third anniversary of the war, President Bush will, once again, make his case that the mission can succeed." ABC (Karl) added the White House "says the President will mark the third anniversary of the invasion by touting success, but also acknowledging mistakes that have prompted changes in tactics. As one senior Administration official said today, 'We are learning as we go.' One success the White House is expected to cite is Tal Afar, a one-time insurgent stronghold believed to have been a base for al Qaeda leader Abu Musab al Zarqawi."

Dozens of local television stations reported on the third anniversary of the Iraq war. Major themes included President Bush restating his determination to succeed in Iraq and improving Iraqi military strength as a means to reduce U.S. troop levels. Examples include: WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/17, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "The White House calls Operation Swarmer a show of Iraqi military capability." And Thursday night President Bush, "reiterated that is the key to bringing U.S. troops home. As Iraqis stand up, we will stand down."

KING-TV Seattle-Tacoma (3.17, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush spotlighted the participation of trained Iraqi troops in this relatively complex military operation." The station continued, "Monday the President goes to Cleveland where he will highlight what the government calls concrete examples of real progress being made in Iraq." WTVD-TV Raleigh (3/17, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "President said Monday his aim is to have Iraqis control more territory than coalition forces by year's end." WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/17 11:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush continues to rally support for his strategy in Iraq."

Hadley Says US Making Progress In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 4, 2:00, Schieffer, 7.66M) interviewed National Security Adviser, Stephen Hadley. Asked if it was "possible that Iraqi security forces could control 75% of the country by this summer," Hadley said, "Whether it's 75 by this summer, 75% by the end of the year, we'll have to see, but the point is, it is the objective. We are making progress. We are every month at this point been able to turn over more territory to the Iraqis." Asked when the US would begin drawing down troops in Iraq, Hadley said, "I think you're beginning to see that process occur now. Remember during the period of elections, we were up to over 160,000 troops. We've now come back down to something like over 130,000 troops. As we train Iraqi security forces, as they take greater responsibility for security, we will be able to step back to a training activity and to going after terrorists and we'll be able to both change the composition and reduce the number of those forces. That's clearly where we're headed."

DOJ_NMG_0019183

US Aims To Turn Over 75% Of Country To Iraqi Security Forces. A top US military official in Iraq, Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, said yesterday that the US goal is to turn security responsibilities for over 75% of Iraq to Iraqi forces by the end of the summer. The story was reported in the lead on ABC and early in CBS' lineup. ABC World News Tonight (3/17, lead story, 2:40, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "Currently, Iraqi forces control less than 50% of the country." But "turning over so much area to the Iraqis would set the stage for a significant reduction of the 133,000 US troops in Iraq, but there are major obstacles. As General Chiarelli himself warned, sectarian violence could get much worse."

The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 2, 2:25, Martin, 7.66M) reported that "as evidence of progress in turning the fight over to Iraqi troops," Gen. Chiarelli cited Operation Swarmer "northeast of Samarra in which helicopters dropped 800 American and 700 Iraqi troops into what is believed to be an insurgent staging area." Gen. Chiarelli: "Had we tried to accomplish a mission like this 11 months ago, it would have been primarily US forces."

The AP (3/18, Burns) notes that the turn over "is more ambitious than President Bush's statement on Monday that his aim was to have Iraqis control more territory than the U.S.-led coalition by the end of 2006," and that Chiarelli "repeatedly stressed that he does not believe civil war will break out." In a later version of the article the AP (3/18, Burns) adds, "The Pentagon wants to pull increasing numbers of American troops out of the line of fire in Iraq." However, "three years after the invasion this latest evolution in the U.S. military's mission will depend largely on whether Iraqi security forces can handle it," and "it is not yet clear that the Iraqis will prove ready — politically or militarily — to take on the added responsibility."

US Will Remain In Charge Of Dangerous Convoy Duty. Contrasting with the announcements of Iraqis taking over US military duties, the New Orleans Times-Picayune/Newhouse News (3/18, Wood) reports, "The reality behind President Bush's assertion this week that Iraqi units are increasingly capable of standing on their own is that none can operate without heavy and sustained logistics support from the United States," when means that "no matter how many U.S. combat troops in Iraq eventually are replaced by Iraqis, an especially difficult and risky mission will remain an American responsibility: convoy duty." Thus, US troops "will be exposed to highly dangerous conditions there for the foreseeable future."

Allawi Warns Point Of "No Return" Approaches. In a status report on the approach of the third anniversary of the US invasion of Iraq, the CBS Evening News (3/17, story 3, 2:55, Logan, 7.66M) last night examined the state of security in the country. CBS reported that the current situation is a "long way from where many Americans expected to be after President Bush declared the end of major combat operations back in May 2003." Former Iraqi Prime Minister Iyad Allawi "remains a strong supporter of US involvement in his country. But he warned this week that militias are ruling the streets, and al Qaeda in Iraq has become less foreign and more Iraqi." Allawi: "I personally think that we now are approaching the no return point. If we get there, it's going to be very difficult to bring the country back." Logan: "What's normal, three years on for Iraqis in the capital, is waiting as long as two days for gas and struggling with only four hours of power on Iraqi officials talked about when and how to deceive international authorities about their weapons programs in the mid-1990s average per day. The picture, though, is not entirely dark." US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad: "There are some good things that are happening. The election was a very good thing. The constitution, it's a very good thing. There is freedom of speech. There is freedom of press. There is much more economic activities, interaction with the rest of the world." The Washington Times/AP (3/18, Hanley) also covered these deaths.

Concerns Raised Sectarian Strife Could Disrupt Region. The Dallas Morning News (3/18, Robberson) reports, "The U.S.-led invasion launched three years ago to oust Iraq's dictatorship and eliminate weapons of mass destruction has instead pushed it to the brink of civil war and escalated Iraqi fears of imminent doom at the hands of radical militiamen." While "this was hardly the outcome President Bush envisioned when he ordered the March 19, 2003, assault on Iraq, senior U.S. officials now acknowledge that their plans have gone awry. Iraqi leaders and clerics are urging restraint as they warn that their nation, already split along sectarian and ethnic lines, is close to imploding." Concerns are increasing that sectarian strife "could spark broader conflict around the region, and that Iraq's security void is tempting its neighbors to meddle militarily."

American Iraqis Impatient With Lack Of Progress In Homeland. American Iraqis, who were ecstatic at the fall of Saddam in 2003, are now growing impatient with the situation in Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/17, story 2, 2:25, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Dearborn, Michigan is "home to tens of thousands of Iraqi-Americans. They were out in the street, cheering when US forces led the invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein. Today, almost three years later, the mood is strikingly different." ABC (Reynolds) added that in Dearborn, it "is next to impossible to find anyone with anything good to say about the Bush Administration's handling of the war." Most are Shiites and are "deeply suspicious of the American ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalizad, who is a Sunni. They believe Khalilzad's efforts to draw Sunnis into a government dominated by Shiites is unfair and unwise." There are "calls to return power to the Iraqis, quickly. And they have grown from a request to a demand."

DOJ_NMG_0019184

Senate Democrats To Attack Bush On National Security Issues. The Washington Times (3/18, A1, Scarborough, 90K) in a front page story reports, "Senate Democrats have mapped a political battle plan for the March congressional recess that calls on lawmakers to stage press events with active duty military personnel, veterans and emergency responders to bash President Bush on virtually every one of his national security policies." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's game plan titled "Real Security," calls "for staged town hall events at military bases, weapons factories, National Guard units, fire stations and veterans posts." The DoD "prohibits political events on military bases." Reid's spokesman Jim Manley "said yesterday the planned events are not part of a political campaign. They would involve only incumbent Democratic senators, some of whom are up for re-election, but not Democratic Senate challengers, he said." The Times notes, "In almost every issue in the Reid memo, Democratic lawmakers are called upon to criticize the president for not spending enough federal dollars."

Democrats Seen As Divided On How To Confront Bush Policies. In contrast to the Washington Times report on Reid's plan to target Bush on national security, CQ (3/18, Ota) reports that if Sen. Russ Feingold's "censure resolution (S Res 398) gained little traction, it nonetheless crystallized a long-simmering divide among congressional Democrats over whether to move to the center with party leaders on a range of issues or swing to the left to energize the party's liberal base heading into this fall's elections." Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "and other top Democrats are urging rank-and-file members to take a safer legislative course, emphasizing their opposition to cuts in Medicare and Medicaid, and touting Democratic domestic initiatives." In contrast to former Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle, "Instead of tying the Senate in knots with parliamentary tactics…Reid let regular order prevail for the most part." But Sen. Tom Harkin said, "I don't know that it is getting us anything." An "evolving Democratic agenda includes increased funding for homeland security, stronger guarantees for veterans' benefits and efforts to close the so-called tax gap. … Reid also is likely to seek another vote in the Senate on a proposed increase in the $5.15 per hour federal minimum wage." Yet, "the agenda does not include -- for now -- any frontal attacks on Iraq War funding, a demand for troop withdrawals or resolutions aimed at embarrassing Bush."

Antiwar Activists Seek To Build Support For Referendum Against Iraq War In Wisconsin. The Washington Post (3/18, A3, Slevin, 744K) reports, "In an exercise that one side calls democracy and the other considers a disservice, voters in 30 Wisconsin towns will cast ballots next month on whether the Bush administration should withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq." In cities across Wisconsin, "antiwar activists invoked a 1911 state law to schedule a bring-the-troops-home referendum designed to send a message to Congress and the White House that the war is costing too many lives and too much money." Anti-war activists "have waged counter-recruitment drives at high schools and colleges across the country, pressing to provide information tables or teach-ins about alternatives to military service. Antiwar organizations have scheduled hundreds of protests and other events to mark the war's third anniversary this weekend, yet the national effort to end the war has proved fitful."

Anti-War Activists Struggle To Generate Public Opposition To War. Similarly noting the anti-war activists lack of success in generating public opposition to the war in Iraq, the San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, Garofoli, Writer) in a front page article reports, "Even though polls say a majority of Americans think President Bush has bungled the war in Iraq and now oppose it, anti-war organizers are struggling to get new converts to tell someone besides pollsters that the country needs to change course." Their "focus has shifted in the past couple of years from the street to online organizing and opposing military recruiting in high schools. But anti-war forces are still frustrated that more Americans -- and Congress -- haven't actively opposed the administration's policy."

Feingold Defends Call For Censure. Sen. Russ Feingold in a letter to the editor in the New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) defends his call for censuring President Bush writing, "The president broke the law, and Congress must hold the president accountable." Feingold applauds "Senator Harry Reid's effort to take the Senate into closed session to get answers on the intelligence and policy failures leading up to the Iraq war. But to suggest that such a maneuver is our only recourse now ignores the role the founders expected Congress to play when a president commits such a flagrant abuse of power."

But Eleanor Clift in her column in Newsweek (3/18) writes, "Democrats must have a death wish. Just when the momentum was going against the president, Feingold pops up to toss the GOP a life raft." Clift notes, "It's brilliant strategy for him, a dark horse presidential candidate carving out a niche to the left of Hillary Clinton." But only two other Democratic Senators have signed on "for good reason. The broader public sees it as political extremism."

Pew Poll Suggests Shift In Public Perception Of Bush From "Honest" To "Incompetent." Time (3/18, Cooper) in a short web exclusive article titled "Bush the 'Incompetent'" reports, "Over the last seven years, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press has played a game of word association as part of its regular presidential polling, asking, 'What one word best describes your impression of George W. Bush?" No options or suggestions are offered. The latest results -- from a sample of 710 people done in March -- aren't good for the President. Until this month, the word most associated with President Bush had always been 'honest.' Now the leading answer is 'incompetent' (given by 29 people), followed by 'good', 'idiot' and 'liar.' 'Honest' has slipped to 5th, tied with 'Christian.'" In 2003, "positive descriptions of Bush far outnumbered negative ones. In the past two years, the positive-negative ratio has been more nearly equal. This time, 48% of those polled used a negative word to describe Bush; just 28% picked a positive term; 10% chose neutral language. Six respondents chose a word that everyone could agree on: 'President.'"

DOJ_NMG_0019185

Administration Officials Downplay Prospects Of Talks With Iran. The Administration is taking a cautious approach to possible negotiations with Iran over its intentions in Iraq. NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 4, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) reported US officials said any prospective meeting with Iran "would be only about the future of Iraq, particularly whether Iran is willing to help the US stabilize the country politically as it tries to come up with a unity government that's built around Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds. Iran's foreign minister has indicated a willingness to sit down with the US Ambassador in Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad." US officials "say this would be a chance for the US to confront Iran over what the President has called its meddling in Iraq. Charge one -- that Iran is supplying explosives, IEDs, improvised explosive devices to insurgents. Charge two -- that it's helping Shiite militias in their activities with financing and explosives." But "will such a meeting happen? Well, tonight, White House officials are increasingly skeptical. National Security Advisor Steve Hadley saying the White House now thinks this might be a ploy by Iran to divert attention from all the heat it's getting internationally because of its nuclear ambition."

Similarly stressing the Administration's cautious approach the AP (3/18, Loven) notes, "There was concern Friday in the Bush administration that the Iranian offer could increase the stature of Iran's government in its citizens' eyes, raise Tehran's status in the region and curry broader international sympathy that could undermine the U.N. Security Council efforts." In an interview US ambassador Khalilzad said "that any meeting should be held in Baghdad. He also made clear that discussions would be limited only to issues related to Iraq, not the standoff over Tehran's nuclear activities, and would represent merely a face-to-face forum for the United States to state concerns it has expressed publicly." The Washington Times (3/18, A1, 90K) in a front page reports similar details fro combined wire service dispatches.

The Washington Post (3/18, A15, Knickmeyer, Branigin, 744K) reports, "Khalilzad said he would not describe the proposed talks as 'negotiations' but as a chance to express concerns about what Washington and some in Iraq regard as Iran's alarming activities here." Khalilzad said, "Iraqis will decide their own future…but they have concerns about [Iranian] policy regarding Iraq." He "spoke after the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad issued a statement critical of Iran in response to remarks Thursday by the top Iranian national security official.

Focusing on opposition to the talks by Sunni leaders in Iraq, the New York Times (3/18, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "Sunni Arab political leaders on Friday denounced an agreement between the United States and Iran to hold face-to-face talks about solutions to the unrest in Iraq, saying the conversations would amount to meddling by foreign nations in Iraq's domestic affairs." Meanwhile, White House press secretary Scott McClellan "said the Bush administration would not meet with Iran to negotiate the future of Iraq but rather to voice its concerns about what he called Iran's 'unhelpful role' in Iraq. It remained unclear on Friday whether Iraqi leaders would be invited to the meetings."

Also taking a negative tone, the Los Angeles Times (3/18, Richter, 958K) reports, "A day after raising international hopes by agreeing to hold direct talks about stabilizing Iraq, U.S. and Iranian officials Friday took a decidedly sharper tone toward each other, differing markedly over the purpose of their planned discussions." The Times adds, "As differences between the two sides intensified, fears grew that the longtime adversaries were jeopardizing an opportunity to help stabilize Iraq, an effort in which they both have an important stake."

But the AP (3/18, Schweid) in an analysis titled "Talks With Iran Could Help Bush" reports, "Possible negotiations between the United States and Iran and the convening of the first session of a new Iraqi parliament could give the Bush administration a long-needed lift. The recent inaugural session of Iraq's parliament is a positive step toward the new Iraq that President Bush envisions as he pursues a war that's unpopular with many Americans. Progress toward forging a unity government representing all of Iraq's sects would be a boost for a country that has been veering close to civil war." For the President, "whose dive in the polls reflects Americans' eroding confidence in his Iraq strategy, progress on either front would be welcome relief -- especially with midterm elections for control of Congress just eight months away."

Columnist Says Public Tiring Of Bush Rhetoric On War Against Terrorism. Roger Cohen in his "Globalist" column in the New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) faults President Bush for characterizing the war against terrorism writing "to frame the confrontation with this danger as a 'war'…is a political decision, one of whose effects has been to cast Bush as a 'war president.'" And now "the epithet is tired; Americans have soured on their war president. It's partly the festering situation in Iraq. But the disillusionment runs deeper. With his approval rating at 33 percent, according to a new poll by the Pew Research Center, Bush is in Nixonian territory." Cohen comes to a similar conclusion as Schweid's AP analysis saying, "Bush has a program, but he's increasingly seen as unable to deliver. … Talking to Iran -- the country identified in the new strategy as presenting the greatest challenge to America -- may help more by delivering results in Iraq and elsewhere."

DOJ_NMG_0019186

WPost Warns Of Iran's Ulterior Motives. Echoing the Administration's concerns about negotiations with Iran, the Washington Post (3/18, A20, 744K) editorializes, "By drawing the Bush administration into talks about Iraq, the Iranians give themselves a shot at splintering or distracting the fragile coalition that may be forming in New York. Already Iranian officials are speaking openly about the possibility that any discussions would expand into the broader security dialogue that Tehran has long coveted with the United States. In Iraq -- where American soldiers are dying from Iranian-supplied roadside bombs and sectarian violence by Iranian-supported militias is steadily mounting -- the Islamic regime has a tacit and sinister offer to make: Back down in New York, and the carnage in Baghdad might just drop off. Even the appearance that the Bush administration might be considering such a trade-off would worsen the situation in Iraq and wreck a year of careful and mostly effective anti-proliferation diplomacy."

Iraqi Leaders Discuss Creation Of National Security Council. The New York Times (3/18, Semple, 1.19M) in its article on possible US talks with Iran on Iraq also reports, "The Sunni criticism" of possible talks "came as leaders of Iraq's major political blocs, as well as the American ambassador, gathered…to discuss the formation of a new Iraqi government." Those talks "focused on the proposal to create a national security council composed of leaders of the executive, judicial and legislative branches, as well as representatives of the country's main political blocs. The council would be consulted on pivotal national issues, like the economy, oil policy, public services and security." The Times notes, "Some Sunni leaders wanted the council's decisions to have binding executive authority. But, several participants said, the Shiite leadership and others were insisting that the council have only advisory powers, thereby safeguarding the constitutional powers of the executive."

UN To Seek Higher Profile In Iraq. The Washington Times (3/18, A1, Pisik, 90K) reports in a front page story that Ashraf Qazi, the special representative of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, "said that the United Nations will soon be raising its profile" in Iraq, "acknowledging that its 'perceived absence' has been noticeable since a tragic suicide bombing after the U.S. invasion three years ago."

Iraqi Officials Believe Samarra Ringleader Is In Custody. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Johnson, 958K) reports, "Iraqi military officials said Friday that a continuing offensive targeting insurgents in the hardpan desert northeast of here has resulted in the capture of additional weapons and a man they believe is among those responsible for the recent bombing of a venerated Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra." They are "checking photos and other documents." While "a handful of suspects have been arrested,…authorities have not identified them."

Violence Continues In Iraq. NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 3, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported "though it's not clear whether it's connected to" Operation Swarmer, "the military says an American soldier in Samarra has been shot and killed." The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 2, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "There was scattered violence in Baghdad, and pilgrims headed to the holy city of Karbala for a religious holiday on Monday found themselves caught in a highway of bullets and bombs. 19 people killed or wounded by drive-by shootings, by roadside and bus bombs there, and US forces are now bracing for more bloodshed as the holiday gets closer."

Study Finds Overlap, Resistance In Counterterrorism Efforts. The New York Times (3/18, A1, Shanker, 1.19M) reports, "A classified Pentagon study" ordered by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and conducted by retired four-star Gen. Wayne A. Downing Jr. "analyzing the effectiveness of Special Operations forces has found that the military's counterterrorism effort is hampered by bureaucratic duplication," especially "particular an overlap between" the new Center for Special Operations and the new National Counterterrorism Center. It also found "broad resistance to the Special Operations Command's new counterterrorism role." The study is "viewed as so provocative that the classified report has not been distributed widely."

Documents Show Iraqis Misled Weapons Inspectors. The AP (3/18, Shrader) reports, "Several dozen documents made public Friday by the U.S. government as part of a program allowing researchers, the media and Iraqis comb through millions of pages of documents and audio recordings confiscated since the 2003 invasion," show "Iraqi officials talked about when and how to deceive international authorities about their weapons programs in the mid-1990s."

Documents Suggest Hussein Aware Of Bin Laden Activity. And ABC News (3/17) on its web sight reports that a summary analysis of some documents released shows one dated Sept. 15, 2001 reveals "An Iraqi intelligence service document saying that their Afghani informant, who's only identified by a number, told them that the Afghani Consul Ahmed Dahastani claimed the following in front of him: That OBL and the Taliban are in contact with Iraq and that a group of Taliban and bin Laden group members visited Iraq. That the U.S. has proof the Iraqi government and 'bin Laden's group' agreed to cooperate to attack targets inside America." But in an editor's note, ABC states, "While the assertions contained in this document clearly support the claim," that bin Laden was cooperating with Hussien, "the sourcing is questionable" and "this document is of limited evidentiary value."

DOJ_NMG_0019187

Al Qaeda Recruits Eager For Attacks Against US. The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/18, Ghattas) reports, "Recruits at Osama bin Laden's terrorist training camps in Afghanistan were clamoring for suicide missions against the United States more than a year before the Sept. 11 attacks, according to al-Qaida documents declassified by the U.S. Defense Department. One document published on the Pentagon Web site this week contained rare criticism of bin Laden from an al-Qaida operative, who accused the terrorist leader of monopolizing decision-making and ignoring advice."

Abu Ghraib Detainee Admits He Isn't Man In Photo. In a front page article, the New York Times (3/18, A1, Zernike, 1.19M) reports that Ali Shalal Qaissi a former detainee of Abu Ghraib prison, "now acknowledges he is not the" hooded man hooked up to wires "in the specific photograph he printed and held up in a portrait that accompanied" a Times article about him. However, Qaissi "appears with a hood over his head in some photographs that Army investigators seized from the computer belonging to Specialist Charles Graner, and "he and his lawyers maintain that he was photographed in a similar position and shocked with wires and that he is the one on his business card." The Washington Post (3/18, C1, Kurtz, 744K) adds, "The Times was hardly the only news organization to name Qaissi as the hooded prisoner, although its profile…gave him considerable prominence."

Jury Deliberating On Guilt Of Abu Ghraib Dog Handler's Guilt. The AP (3/18, Dishneau) reports, "A military jury began deliberating Friday in the case against" Sgt. Michael Smith, "an Army dog handler accused of using his barking animal to torment prisoners at Abu Ghraib for his own amusement." His "defense argued that Smith believed he was following orders in a chaotic and confusing environment," and "testimony in the trial revealed conflicting notions among prison workers about how dogs were supposed to be used and what the approval process was."

Military To Investigate Marines For Death Of 15 Iraqis During Firefight. The AP (3/18, Baldor) reports, "The military will investigate allegations of potential misconduct by Marines during a bombing and firefight last November that left 15 Iraqi civilians dead." The criminal investigation "will try to determine whether the Marines followed the international law of armed conflict, including whether they positively identified or tried to identify the enemy and whether they determined there was hostile intent, as they are supposed to do." The Knight Ridder (3/18, Brown) adds, "One official said it's unclear whether the Marines killed the civilians accidentally or whether they fired indiscriminately. It's also unclear whether all the civilians died in the same house or in separate locations."

Brain Damage Said To be "Signature Injury" Of Iraq War. Newsweek (3/18, Riccitiello) reports, "More than 1,700 military personnel wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan in recent years, Marine Cpl. Samuel Reyes Jr. is suffering from traumatic brain injury, known in military jargon as TBI, which leaves survivors unable to perform the most basic cognitive functions." As "TBI affects more than 25 percent of bomb-blast survivors," it is "the signature injury of the Iraq war," and "the increasing number of TBI survivors and the vexing limitations they face has become an enormous challenge for both military medicine and for the Department of Veterans Affairs, which will treat these survivors for life."

Father Of Soldier Doesn't Want Son Redeployed. H. Barry Holt, father of an American soldier, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (3/18, A21, 744K), "I generally accepted the reasons we went to war and worried about terrorism and weapons of mass destruction." However, once his son deployed, lack of information was stressful. "I had persistent nightmares about improvised explosive devices, mortar rounds, snipers and accidents, knowing nothing but fearing the worst." Also, "we were confused and angry at the Army when he asked us to buy ammo pouches and other military accessories that weren't issued to him." U.S Army and Marine parents "have seen far too much for people so young, and I don't want any of them to die. My son is home and alive. He has done his duty and I don't want him to go back."

Experts Discuss Whether Iraq War Was "Worth It." Time (3/18) reports, Time magazine publishes people's opinions on if the Iraq war was worth it. David Kennedy, Professor of History, Stanford University said "No. From the outset the war was a colossally bold and breathtakingly risky gamble. Unfortunately, and unsurprisingly, the United States has failed to beat the odds" when it followed an "extravagant ambition to transform the political culture of the entire Middle East." Hisham Kassem, Egyptian democracy activist, said "it achieved something useful. Parallel to the chaos and bloodshed, there is a political process evolving in Iraq." Also, Lawrence B. Wilkerson, Colonel, U.S. Army (ret.); former chief of staff for Secretary of State Colin Powell, said, "No. I'm principally a strategist and from that perspective the war has been a disaster."

DOJ_NMG_0019188

Taliban Allies With Drug Lords Against Opium Eradication. The Washington Times (3/18, Duparcq, 90K) reports, "Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign." While "in their final two years in power…the Taliban banned opium," today "the Taliban rebels are willing to protect opium crops and farmers against the new administration in Kabul."

DOJ:

Rosenberg Tapped As Northern Virginia US Attorney. The AP (3/18) reports, "Chuck Rosenberg, a veteran Justice Department lawyer serving as the top federal prosecutor in Houston, will take over the high-profile chief prosecutor's job in Alexandria, Va." The AP continues, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday named Rosenberg the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. He replaces Paul McNulty, who was confirmed by the Senate late Thursday as deputy attorney general. … Rosenberg, 45, will be in charge of the office that is seeking the death penalty against Zacarias Moussaoui and has prosecuted other terrorism cases."

The Washington Post (3/18, B5, Markon) reports, "The Alexandria U.S. attorney's job has always been considered a law enforcement plum, and it grew increasingly visible after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as the Justice Department made McNulty's office a central front in terrorism prosecutions. The office won a guilty plea from Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from Sept. 11, and is now trying to convince a jury to execute him." The Post adds, "Other prominent cases in Alexandria have included the prosecutions of John Walker Lindh, a Californian convicted of fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, and of a group of Muslim men convicted of training overseas for holy war against the United States. The office also has been known to handle highly publicized espionage cases such as the Aldrich H. Ames and Robert P. Hanssen cases. … Law enforcement sources have said Rosenberg was the favored candidate to replace McNulty in part because his selection would provide continuity in terrorism prosecutions and national security. A Justice Department news release yesterday said Rosenberg has focused on counterterrorism, counterintelligence and national security matters in recent years."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Pelosi, Other Democrats Praised For Call To Revisit Sarbane-Oxley. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (3/18), Mallory Factor, chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund, says, "Have America's entrepreneurs and corporate leaders found a new voice of regulatory sanity in, of all people, Nancy Pelosi? Apparently so, and that should be a wake-up call to Republicans -- because like everything else in the free market, the free enterprise agenda is up for grabs." In the recent "Innovation Agenda" that the House Minority Leader "and her party unveiled, Ms. Pelosi acknowledges specifically the need to 'ensure Sarbanes-Oxley requirements are not overly burdensome,' and endorses reform. Meanwhile, the scourge of Wall Street, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, is criticizing Sarbanes-Oxley's 'unbelievable burden on small companies' and its possible role in 'preventing some initial public offerings.'" Pelosi and "other Democrats have been quicker to recognize what many traditional champions of free enterprise have been slow to see: the law's disastrous consequences for our nation's ability to compete."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Disputes Libby Effort To Quash Indictment. The AP (3/18) reports Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald "disputed the claim" of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, that he "lacks legal authority to indict him in the CIA leak investigation." Fitzgerald "argued that being allowed to operate outside any control of the Justice Department is constitutional and in accordance with federal law."

Judge Drops Fraud Charges Against Virginia Executive. The Washington Post (3/18, D1, Kang) reports, "Charges have been dropped against Northern Virginia businessman Frank L. Cowles Jr., who was arrested in November on allegations of conspiring to defraud a hedge fund out of $25 million." The Post continues, "A U.S. District Court judge in Chicago dropped criminal charges against Cowles on March 1 after the U.S. attorney's office there filed a motion to dismiss. Cases continue against two men who were charged with Cowles for allegedly defrauding a Chicago-based fund. … Cowles's attorney, Robert D. Luskin of the law firm Patton Boggs in the District, said the complaint against Cowles was a mistake and that his client had been the victim of a scheme that cost him a great financial loss." The Post adds, "The two men still facing prosecution in the case are accused by prosecutors of wire fraud. Richard E. Warren of Fredericksburg, who has pleaded not guilty, was indicted and detained. A complaint against David L. Myatt of Los Banos, Calif., is pending."

DOJ_NMG_0019189

Nearing Halfway Point, Enron Trial May Hinge On Defendants' Testimony. The AP (3/18, Hays) reports, "The fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling is reaching its halfway mark: Seven weeks, 15 prosecution witnesses and more to come. … Yet for all the government's methodical efforts to show through documents, video and audio tapes and those witnesses' memories of how the former corporate titans repeatedly lied about the disgraced company's financial health, the jury's conclusion may hinge on what the defendants say if they testify as expected." The AP continues, "The government has already brought on its highly anticipated witnesses. This past week started with former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow's fourth and last day on the stand. Fastow, an admitted liar and thief, hid none of his own culpability as he said he helped Lay and Skilling lie about Enron's financial health. … The week wrapped with Sherron Watkins, the former vice president hailed as a hero by Congress for warning Lay of impending financial disaster months before the company crashed, denting Lay's claim that he believed the company was strong at the time. … Yet a conviction is far from a foregone conclusion. … 'It's the difference between legitimate spinning and impermissible lying,' Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who has followed the trial, said of what will likely drive the outcome of the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals. … 'In a case like this, if Lay or Skilling or both take the stand, it becomes almost a new trial in the sense that jurors will either believe them or disbelieve them,' Mintz said." The AP notes, "The government's 'brick by brick' approach is living up to expectations of putting together a puzzle without betting all on a single witness, said Michael Wynne, another former federal prosecutor in Houston who has observed much of the trial."

The Washington Post (3/18, D1, Johnson) reports, "Seven weeks into the blockbuster fraud trial of Lay and Skilling, defense lawyers have tried to wear down the government's witnesses with questions tailored to exploit personality quirks, large or small. Cross-examination, after all, is a high-stakes game of endurance and amateur psychology -- a matter of finding a witness's Achilles' heel, that trait most likely to undermine their performances on the witness stand. … And, in this case, the defense has plenty of weapons at its disposal. 'The fact is, the defense does have a somewhat unusual amount of material to cross-examine them with,' said Washington criminal defense lawyer E. Lawrence Barcella Jr. of the Enron investigation, which generated countless articles and voluminous written reports from Congress, a bankruptcy examiner, the company's board and federal regulators. … The defense came out of the gate in February determined to test the endurance of the government's witnesses, many of them former executives who pleaded guilty and agreed to testify in exchange for reduced prison terms. Former investor relations chief Mark E. Koenig, the fraud trial's first witness, remained on the stand for eight days -- including five of protracted cross-examination in which a tired Koenig sometimes appeared to agree with the defense on certain points, if only to shorten his ordeal."

9th Circuit Reverses Death Sentence Of Los Angeles Man. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Suarez) reports, "A federal appeals court on Friday overturned the death sentence of a Los Angeles man who avenged the loss of his therapist by murdering her husband." The Times continues, "The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld William Clark's conviction, which included murder, two counts of attempted murder, rape and arson. But the court said the judge had misled the jury about death penalty law. The court also said the California Supreme Court should have overturned the penalty during its review." The Times adds, "Ava Gawronski was counseling Clark, a 37-year-old Canoga Park underwriter, and his wife, but stopped treating him after he threatened to rape her in her office. … In January 1982, Clark set Gawronski's West Los Angeles house ablaze. His intent, Clark said during his trial, was to chase the family out so he could shoot and kill David Gawronski, a 35-year-old federal job trainer, in front of his wife and infant daughter. … Instead, David Gawronski perished in the fire."

US May Drop Capital Case Against Massachusetts Men. The Boston Herald (3/18, Sweet) reports, "Federal prosecutors may soon drop the controversial death-penalty case against two Dorchester men the federal government wanted to try for murder and gang activity." The Herald continues, "Pending a green light from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, murder and racketeering indictments against Darryl Green and Branden Morris could be dropped as early as next month. … Prosecutor Theodore Heinrich said in court documents 'the likelihood of dismissal is so great' after two co-defendants of Green and Morris who weren't facing capital punishment were acquitted, that it would be futile to go on." The Herald adds, "Green's defense counsel, Randolph Gioia, said, 'The only reason you bring a case like this to federal court is because you want to make an example of these kids.' … In order to successfully prosecute Green, 28, and Morris, 22, in federal court for the 2001 murder of Terrell Gethers, the government had to prove a racketeering case against them. But in January, Judge Nancy Gertner ordered acquittals in the companion case of Jonathan Hart, 24, and Edward Washington, 25, after a jury deadlocked on whether their street-corner crew operated on the same "criminal enterprise" level as the Mafia. … Green and Morris still face federal drug charges and may yet be tried for Gethers' homicide in state court."

DOJ_NMG_0019190

Philadelphia Councilman Convicted Of Corruption. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/18, Shiffman, Schaffer) reports, "Rick Mariano, an electrician who rose from a tough corner of Northeast Philadelphia to become a city councilman, was convicted of corruption charges yesterday and led from a federal courtroom in handcuffs." The Inquirer continues, "Mariano's wife, son and staffers did not flinch at the guilty verdicts, but Susan Mariano and others gasped when U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel ordered the councilman imprisoned immediately. Stengel, citing Mariano's suicide scare at City Hall shortly before last year's indictment, revoked bail pending a psychiatric evaluation." The Inquirer adds, "Mariano, 50, became the first elected city official convicted in 15 years, and under state law he can remain on Council only until he is sentenced, probably by midsummer. Mayor Street, a longtime friend, called on Mariano yesterday to resign immediately. Mariano's top aide vowed the councilman would not step down. … The jury deliberated for about six hours before convicting Mariano of 18 counts, including conspiracy, bribery, money laundering, fraud and tax charges. He was acquitted of four fraud charges." The Philadelphia Daily News (3/18, Brennan, Hinkelman) adds Meehan said that Mariano "had turned his Council post into 'a branch office for businesses that will pay bribes to get things done.' … Mayor Street, in a statement, called on Mariano to resign from Council, saying that was in the 'best interests of the city.' Street, who often joked with Mariano that they were so close they called each other 'cousin,' said Mariano was a close friend but not above the law."

The AP (3/18, Dale) notes, "More than a dozen people have been convicted in the various probes, one of which became public when police discovered an FBI bug in Mayor John F. Street's office in October 2003." UPI (3/18) also briefly reports on the conviction.

Meanwhile, The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/19, Schaffer) reports on Mariano's conviction in light of his political career, noting, "Other crooked Philly pols have reached for the stars, conspiring with mobsters or taking bribes from purported Arab sheikhs. But Mariano, the ultimate neighborhood guy, was felled by just under $30,000 in ill-gotten gains - less than a third of his City Council salary."

Mariano Intends To Keep Council Seat Until Sentencing. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/18, Schaffer) reports Mariano's conviction "throws into question the future of the City Council seat he has held since 1996. Pennsylvania's constitution bars felons from elected office, meaning Mariano must step down. But moments after Mariano's bail was revoked and he was led away to detention, his chief of staff said Mariano intended to stay in office until sentencing, as the law allows. … By declining to step down until his sentencing, Mariano will keep drawing his $102,000 salary." The Philadelphia Daily News (3/18) adds, "Council President Anna Verna said…Mariano must resign when he is sentenced. Verna on Thursday asked City Solicitor Romulo Diaz to issue a legal opinion to back that up. But Verna stopped short of saying if she would call a special election to fill Mariano's post, calling that 'premature.'"

Philadelphia Inquirer Praises Verdict, Calls For Mariano To Resign. In an editorial, The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/18) hails the verdict, saying "this is a big city; crime and corruption are going to happen. You just want to feel that decent people can fight back, can stem the tide. This time, the courts offered hope." The Inquirer also calls for Mariano "to do the right thing, for once: resign his seat, instead of hanging on pointlessly until his sentencing forces the issue. His friends on Council, who vouched for his redeeming qualities at trial, should let him know it's best for him to go now."

Former Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Chicago Tribune (3/18, O'Connor , Bush) reports, "Former Chicago City Clerk James Laski, the highest-ranking city official charged in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program, pleaded guilty Friday to pocketing nearly $50,000 in bribes for steering city business to two trucking companies." Laski's friend and city employee Randy Aderman also pleaded guilty Friday to bribery charges. "According to court records, Frank Cannatello, another Hired Truck defendant who pleaded guilty this month to lying to FBI agents, asked Aderman to help obtain Hired Truck business after Cannatello and a relative started FRC Trucking. Friday's guilty pleas by Laski and Aderman bring to 34 the number of convictions in the Hired Truck probe." The Chicago Sun-Times (3/18, Korecki) adds, "When asked what Laski would tell others in City Hall who thought about taking bribes, his lawyer Jeffrey Steinback responded: 'Don't do it, don't do it.'" The Sun-Times notes, "44 people have been charged in the federal government's investigation of Chicago's Hired Truck Program, including 26 city workers." The AP (3/18, Robinson) and Los Angeles Times (3/18, Huffstutter) also report on Laski's and Aderman's guilty pleas.

Illinois Man Held In Isolation After Being Charged With Child Pornography. The Chicago Sun-Times (3/18, Korecki) reports, "A Bartlett (IL) man indicted this week on charges he molested an infant and broadcast it live over an Internet chatroom is being kept in isolation after his lawyer complained he was receiving threats from other inmates." The Sun-Times continues, "Brian Annoreno, 29, is being held in a Kankakee lockup, but his lawyer, Michael Falconer, said Annoreno also needs to be kept in isolation when he is taken to court appearances in Chicago for his own safety. … 'Regular street criminals hate people who are accused of being child molesters,' Falconer said." The Sun-Times adds, "Falconer said Annoreno was getting threats from inmates and harsh words from jail guards. … Annoreno and two others charged this week with being tied to a child pornography chatroom pleaded not guilty to the charges Friday. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales flew to Chicago on Wednesday to announce that the chatroom was shut down and a worldwide investigation had nabbed 47 people. … Falconer criticized the feds Friday for putting on a 'dog and pony show,' saying Gonzales' news conference was 'deplorable' and over the top. Gonzales said the crimes were particularly disturbing because the chatroom allegedly broadcast video showing young children being molested. But Falconer said the prosecution does not have evidence of those videos except for a witness' testimony."

DOJ_NMG_0019191

Indiana County Launches Cyber Sex Crime Unit. The Indianapolis Star (3/18, Bird) reports, "Johnson County (IN) officials have formed a 'Cyber Sex Crimes Task Force' to protect children from Internet predators." The Star continues, "County Prosecutor Lance Hamner appointed Deputy Prosecutor Paul Felix to spearhead the effort. … Greenwood police Detective Erick Klinkowski, Franklin police Detective Brain Goldfarb and Johnson County Sheriff's Detective Bill Pfifer are the rest of the task force." The Star adds, "A month ago, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Justice Department's Safe Child Initiative to stop sexual exploitation of children through the Internet. … The county team recently returned from Washington, D.C., after getting training on procedures and protocols to use during investigations and prosecutions of Internet predators. … Klinkowski already has conducted two stings that led to arrests and convictions, one a special deputy with the Genesee County (Mich.) Sheriff's Department who traveled to Greenwood to meet a 13-year-old girl, Hamner said."

Judge Sentences California ELF Members To Prison For Ecoterror Arsons. The Sacramento Bee (3/18, B1, Carreon) reports, "A follower of an eco-terrorism group and two other Newcastle residents were sentenced Friday in Sacramento federal court for their roles in attempted firebombings of buildings under construction. Ryan Daniel Lewis, the 22-year-old admitted adherent of the Earth Liberation Front…was sentenced to six years in federal prison for orchestrating arsons in Placer and Amador counties in late 2004 and early 2005." Sisters Lili Marie and Eva Rose Holland "were sentenced to two years each in prison." During the sentencing, US District Judge Edward J. Garcia "chided defense attorneys for misusing the term 'idealism' in explaining their clients' actions," saying, "I consider this type of terrorism most serious crime." The Los Angeles Times (3/18) briefly reports the story under the headline "6-Year Prison Sentence In Series of Arsons," as does the AP (3/18), under the headline "3 Eco-Terrorists Sentenced For Firebombs."

CIVIL LAW:

Google Won't Have To Disclose Web Search Data. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Delaney, 2.11M) reports US District Judge James Ware "ruled Friday that Google Inc. did not have to turn over data about consumer Web search queries that the Department of Justice had requested." Juge Ware "ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. But he denied government lawyers' request for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Gaither, 958K) reports Judge Ware's ruling "was a victory for Google, which argued that handing over the records would violate the privacy of people who might scour the Internet with terms as diverse as 'best-actor nominees,' 'third trimester abortion' or 'pipe bomb.'" Although Ware "required Google to reveal some information about the websites in its database, he ordered the government to reimburse the Mountain View, Calif., company for the time and expense required to comply." Privacy advocates "cheered the decision as a check on the Bush administration's efforts to collect information about people, but noted that the trove of personal data gathered and stored by sites like Google was irresistible to investigators."

The AP (3/18, Liedtke) and Bloomberg (3/18) also report this story.

WSJournal Says Google, Other Net Firms "Innocent Bystanders" In COPA Lawsuit. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) says in an editorial, "This outcome may seem Solomonic, but the precedent is still troubling. The subpoena that started it all emerged from a separate case being tried in Pennsylvania. In that case, the ACLU is challenging the constitutionality of the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, or COPA." The government "wants to use" the "search data" from Google, Yahoo, and MSN "as part of its effort to show that the law is necessary to protect minors from the Internet's seamier side. But these companies are innocent bystanders in the dispute over the constitutionality of COPA."

DOJ_NMG_0019192

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Forges Deal With North Carolina On Overseas Voting. The Charlotte Observer (3/18) reports, "The Justice Department said it had reached an agreement with North Carolina officials that will allow military and other overseas voters to participate in a second primary election, if one is needed this year. … The U.S. District Court in Raleigh still must approve the agreement." The Observer continues, "The agreement was filed at the same time as the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit because of the short amount of time between North Carolina's primary and runoff elections. Federal officials said in a news release Thursday that the four-week break doesn't provide enough time to get runoff ballots to and returned from absentee voters. … Besides other changes, the state and federal governments agreed that all military and overseas voters requesting an absentee ballot for the primary election also will receive a blank write-in ballot for a runoff. They also agreed to allow write-in ballots to be faxed and e-mailed, if necessary." The Observer notes, "The agreement also provides for reporting to the court on the status of the North Carolina Legislature's efforts to find a permanent solution to the timing problem. … 'These measures provide an immediate solution while the Legislature adopts permanent procedures, as we trust they will promptly,' Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general of the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement."

Group Sues Libraries For Blocking Access To Web Site. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (3/18, Shinkle) reports, "The Council of Conservative Citizens, a nationwide group that has been portrayed as racist, is suing four libraries in the St. Louis area for allegedly blocking patrons from viewing its Web site." The Post-Dispatch continues, "Gordon Baum, a lawyer from St. Charles who is the group's chief executive, said the U.S. Constitution protects the public's right to see his Web site. … 'We don't believe we're any more to the right than the NAACP is to the left,' he said, adding that his group does not advocate violence." The Post-Dispatch adds, "The site, cofcc.org, does not feature the racial epithets commonly used by racist groups. It does, however, provide a slate of news stories about crime by blacks or immigrants. It also offers for sale a T-shirt with the words, 'White Pride,' 'Deutschland' and 'Save Our Culture.'" The Post-Dispatch adds, "The Southern Poverty Law Center says that racism 'underlies' the group and that it has long had ties to politicians the law center considers racist. … Baum filed a suit in U.S. District Court on Monday claiming the Maplewood City Library, University City Public Library, Valley Park Community Library and Festus Public Library had violated his constitutional right to free speech by blocking access to the Web site. At least two of the libraries say they now permit patrons to view the site."

Whistleblower Who Allegedly Stole Papers About Voting Machines Faces Charges. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, So) reports, "A whistle-blower to some, a thief to others, Stephen Heller says he's a regular guy, not an activist or a member of any political group. … But charged last month in Los Angeles with three felonies for allegedly stealing damaging documents about voting machine manufacturer Diebold Election Systems, Heller has become a hero to digital rights and political activists who say he helped expose a threat to the election system." The Times continues, "Prosecutors say Heller, a 43-year-old actor and resident of Van Nuys, took more than 500 pages of Diebold-related documents, including memos from the company's attorneys at the Jones Day law firm. The memos suggested that the company might have broken state law by providing Alameda County with voting machines that had not been certified by the state. … 'This case is not about whistle-blowing. It's about theft of attorney-client privileged material from an attorney's office,' Los Angeles County district attorney spokeswoman Sandi Gibbons said. … But activists and bloggers — including the California Voter Foundation; Black Box Voting, an electronic voting group; and the liberal http://www.huffingtonpost.com website — say the purloined documents, some of which turned up on the Oakland Tribune website, helped spur a state crackdown on Diebold."

Alabama Bill Would Make Rights Activists Eligible For Pardon. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Fausset) reports, "Civil rights activists and others convicted under laws that enforced racial discrimination would be eligible for a pardon from the state of Alabama under a bill working its way through the Legislature, the bill's sponsor said Friday." The Times continues, "Rep. Thad McClammy said that his proposed 'Rosa Parks Act' would serve the symbolic purpose of bestowing posthumous pardons on activists like Parks, whose 1955 arrest sparked the 381-day Montgomery bus boycott. … But McClammy, a Democrat, said the pardons also could help living veterans of the segregated South, who still may have trouble explaining away their arrests when applying for jobs or loans." The Times adds, "Some of the most famous arrests of the civil rights era occurred in Alabama in the 1950s and '60s. Parks was convicted of violating Montgomery's municipal code for refusing to move to the back of a city bus. Dozens more were charged under anti-boycott and curfew statutes. … McClammy's bill unanimously passed the Democratic-controlled Alabama House Judiciary Committee this week; House Minority Leader Mike Hubbard predicted that his fellow Republicans probably would support the measure."

DOJ_NMG_0019193

Questions Remain After Second Autopsy In Teen Boot Camp Death. The New York Times (3/18, Goodnough) reports, "Martin Lee Anderson was buried a second time this week, more than two months after he died following a confrontation with guards at a boot camp for teenage offenders in the Florida Panhandle. But questions about his death, and whether the state should close all its boot camps in the aftermath, are very much alive." The Times continues, "After supervising a second autopsy of Martin's body on Monday, a special prosecutor appointed by Gov. Jeb Bush disputed the findings of the original pathologist in the case: that the youth had died from complications of sickle cell trait, an undiagnosed blood disorder. But the prosecutor, Mark Ober, would not say more until his broader investigation of the case was finished." The Times adds, "The guards at Bay Boot Camp in Panama City kneed, kicked and hit Martin, 14, after he stopped running during an orientation drill on Jan. 5. He had been sent to the camp for violating probation after stealing his grandmother's car. In a videotape, which the state released after news organizations sued for it, the boy appears limp throughout the encounter. … He died early on Jan. 6, and when the original autopsy report came out a month later, his parents, lawmakers and civil rights groups expressed outrage. Even after Mr. Ober said through a spokeswoman that Martin 'did not die of sickle cell trait, nor did he die of a natural cause,' the medical examiner who made those findings, Dr. Charles Siebert of Bay County, stood by them."

6th Circuit Panel Allows Tennessee To Issue "Choose Life" License Plates. The AP (3/18, Johnson) reports, "A federal appeals court Friday allowed Tennessee to offer anti-abortion license plates bearing the message 'Choose Life.'" The AP continues, "A three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a lower-court ruling that said the tag illegally promoted only one side of the abortion debate. … 'Although this exercise of government one-sidedness with respect to a very contentious political issue may be ill-advised, we are unable to conclude that the Tennessee statute contravenes the First Amendment,' Judge John M. Rogers said in a 2-1 ruling." The AP adds, "An anti-abortion group, Tennessee Right to Life, declared victory. … 'It's a validation of our position all along that the Legislature had the authority to authorize a plate that favors normal childbirth over the practice of abortion,' said Brian Harris, the group's president." The AP notes, "In a dissenting opinion, Judge Boyce F. Martin Jr. said the plates should be banned because they amount to unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination. … The plaintiffs, the American Civil Liberties Union of Tennessee and Planned Parenthood of Middle and East Tennessee, said they were still reviewing Friday's ruling."

Two New Deaths Linked To RU48. The New York Times (3/18, Harris, 1.19M) reports, "The FDA has now received reports that six women in the United States died after taking RU-486, or Mifeprex." The two recent deaths, "and two of the previous four underwent their procedures at Planned Parenthood clinics, a spokeswoman said. Federal officials do not yet know the cause of the latest two deaths."

The Washington Post (3/18, A6, Kaufman, 744K) reports, "Opponents of abortion quickly described the FDA advisory as another reason to ban the abortion pill, sold as Mifeprex. Sen. Jim DeMint said,"RU-486 is a deadly drug that is killing pregnant women. … This drug should never have been approved, and it must be suspended immediately." The Washington Times (3/18, Price, 90K) and The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Rockoff, 958K) reported a similar stories.

Wal Mart To Carry "Morning After Pill". The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Zimmerman, 2.11M) reports, "On Monday, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. is set to sell for the first time prescription emergency contraceptives commonly referred to as Plan B or the morning-after pill. The move comes after a short but vociferous activist campaign that labeled the world's largest retailer as antiwomen for being the only large pharmacy chain in the country that refused to stock the pills.

Courts Seen As Complicating Abortion Debate. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) James Wilson, an author and professor writes, "Abortion has become the key test for selecting people for high-level judicial offices." But, "abortion is scarcely an issue in most European democracies, not because the people who live there have views radically different from American ones, but because legislatures, not courts, authorized abortions using language that tried to strike a reasonable balance among competing views."

FDA Reconsiders Ban On Gay Blood Donors. The Washington Post (3/18, A6, Stein, 744K) reports the FDA, "is considering revising its policy that bars as a blood donor any man who has had sex with another man since 1977." The change was urged by, "the American Red Cross, the American Association of Blood Banks and America's Blood Centers." The groups recommend, "men be barred from donating for only a year after having had sex with another man, treating them the same as other groups at increased risk for spreading sexually transmitted virus through donated blood."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ May Oppose Maytag-Whirlpool Merger. The AP (3/18, Pitt) reports, "Shares of Maytag Corp. (the parent of North Canton's Hoover Co.) and Whirlpool Corp. fell Friday on speculation that the federal government may challenge their proposed merger." The AP continues, "Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., has proposed a $1.79 billion acquisition of Maytag. … The U.S. Department of Justice antitrust division sought an extension to review the merger last month. The companies have agreed not to close the transaction before March 30." The AP adds, "A leading antitrust lawyer said a decision is likely to come next week. … Steven C. Sunshine, a supervisor of the antitrust division's merger enforcement program from 1993 to 1995, said antitrust attorneys have expected the government to challenge the deal because it concentrates so much power in one company. … The merger would create a company that produces half of the dishwashers in the United States and more than 70 percent of its clothes washers and dryers. Under long-standing federal guidelines, a rise in market concentration of that magnitude would usually draw a court challenge. … Gina Talamona, spokeswoman for the Justice Department, declined to comment Friday, confirming only that the merger is still under review."

DOJ_NMG_0019194

Bloomberg (3/18) reports, "Antitrust enforcers are worried the Whirlpool deal would let the combined company raise prices through control of more than two-thirds of the U.S. market for some appliances, said antitrust lawyers who spoke on condition of anonymity because they aren't authorized to talk about the case. They said the government has questioned such retailers as Lowe's Cos. and Home Depot Inc. and Whirlpool's manufacturing rivals. … The decision on whether to pursue the agency's first court challenge to a takeover in two years will be up to the Bush administration's new antitrust chief, Thomas O. Barnett, 44. It will be the first test of his approach to mergers since he won Senate confirmation Feb. 10 as assistant attorney general. … 'If they don't challenge this merger, Ford and General Motors is next,' said Steven M. Axinn, a New York antitrust lawyer not involved in the transaction. 'Unless someone can argue that Maytag is going out of business, I don't understand how the government can let this deal happen.'"

Four Firms Under DOJ Probe For Alleged Chemical Price-Fixing. The Beaumont (TX) Enterprise (3/18, Wallach) reports, "Four U.S. chemical companies, including two with a major Southeast Texas presence, received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an investigation into possible anti-competitive pricing in certain materials that are used in a variety of consumer goods. … The companies include Huntsman Corp., BASF Corp., Dow Chemical Co., and Lyondell Chemical Co." The Enterprise continues, "The justice department delivered the subpoenas for documents to the companies in mid-February, said publicists for three of the companies contacted Friday by The Enterprise. … A spokeswoman for the justice department acknowledged the investigation but offered little detail. … 'The anti-trust division is investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the polyurethanes industry,' said justice department spokeswoman Gina Talamona."

Experts See No Antitrust Violations In Airline Meetings. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (3/18, Cox) reports, "Officials from American Airlines and Southwest Airlines could negotiate a proposal to resolve the Wright Amendment controversy without running afoul of federal antitrust laws, legal experts said Friday." The Star-Telegram continues, "Legal precedent allows competing businesses 'to petition government' and propose legislation or regulation if they are not conspiring to fix prices or divide up market share, experts said. American says it is reluctant to enter talks with Southwest on Wright for fear of an antitrust inquiry or Justice Department lawsuit." The Star-Telegram adds, "What the legal community calls the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, named for two precedent-setting Supreme Court cases, allows competing companies to work together to influence the legislative or executive branch of government without violating the Sherman Antitrust Act. … 'No violation of the Sherman Act can be predicated upon mere attempts to influence the passage or enforcement of laws, and the Sherman Act, therefore, does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or monopoly,' the court ruled in the 1961 Noerr case. … In the cases, the court ruled that the constitutional guarantee of individuals' and corporations' right to petition government supersedes antitrust laws, designed to preserve competition among businesses."

Merger Mania Builds On Momentum Of Telecom Deal. The New York Times (3/18, Stein) reports, "March madness is not limited to college basketball. Billions of dollars in mergers were announced this week, building on the momentum created when AT&T offered to acquire BellSouth for $67 billion earlier in the month." The Times continues, "The trend even swept up entire stock exchanges, as the Nasdaq Stock Market offered to buy the London Stock Exchange (just as the New York Stock Exchange was weighing a bid of its own), and Euronext, the owner of the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon stock markets, said it was interested in buying Deutsche Börse, the German exchange." The Times adds, "Eager to further diversify its business amid rising interest rates and slowing growth for credit card issuers, Capital One Financial, the big credit card company, agreed to buy the North Fork Bancorporation, a regional bank serving the Northeast, for about $14.6 billion in cash and stock. … After its acquisition last fall of the Hibernia National Bank in New Orleans, Capital One would have deposits of more than $84 billion when its North Fork acquisition is completed. It would have more than 50 million customer accounts and 655 branches from White Plains to Brownsville, Tex."

DOJ_NMG_0019195

ENVIRONMENT:

DC Court Overturns Administration's New Source Review Policy. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit yesterday overturned the Environmental Protection Agency's New Source Review policy, ruling that the Bush Administration's implementation of the Clean Air Act provision failed to square with the statutory language. The story was widely covered by the major dailies this morning; the media consensus is that the ruling is a significant setback to the Administration's environmental policy.

The New York Times (3/18, Janofsky, 1.19M) reports the court "on Friday overturned a clean-air regulation issued by the Bush administration that would have let many power plants, refineries and factories avoid installing costly new pollution controls to help offset any increased emissions caused by repairs and replacements of equipment." Unlike its "ruling last summer, when the court largely upheld the E.P.A.'s approach against challenges from industry, state governments and environmental groups, the new ruling was a defeat for the agency and for industry, and a victory for the states and their environmentalist allies."

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Gerstenzang, 958K) the court's decision dealt "a sharp setback to the Bush administration," ruling that the EPA "had relied on 'Humpty Dumpty' reasoning in arriving at a rule that critics said would have eased enforcement of a law intended to reduce industrial air pollution."

The Washington Post (3/18, A1, Eilperin, 744K) reports in a front page story that the court's ruling blocks the Bush Administration's "four-year effort to loosen emission rules for aging coal-fired power plants, unanimously ruling yesterday that the changes violated the Clean Air Act and that only Congress could authorize such revisions." The court "sided with officials from 14 states, including New York, California and Maryland, who contended that the rule changes -- allowing older power plants, refineries and factories to upgrade their facilities without having to install the most advanced pollution controls -- were illegal and could increase the amount of health-threatening pollution in the atmosphere."

The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Dalton, 2.11M) reports the court "handed environmentalists a victory Friday." State officials "hailed the appeals-court ruling. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who led the states' action, called the ruling 'an enormous victory for clean air and for the enforcement of the law and an overwhelming rejection of the Bush administration's efforts to gut the law.'"

Bloomberg (3/18, Arthur) reported John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, "said the ruling was a 'significant setback to business efficiency and, for that matter, environmental quality.'"

Future Of ANWR Provision Uncertain. The Washington Post (3/18, A5, Weisman, 744K) reports a "last-minute deal to secure the vote of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) on a $2.8 trillion budget plan has given new life to the Republican drive to open Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling." The budget resolution "includes a $10 billion Gulf Coast restoration fund that would be financed from the leasing of arctic refuge drilling rights, revenue from new drilling in the Outer Continental Shelf of the Gulf of Mexico and further sales of the broadcast spectrum." But it is "not clear whether the political equation has shifted at all since December, when moderate Republicans -- led by Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) -- forced their leaders to take arctic drilling out of a 2006 budget-cutting measure to secure their votes."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico Tries To Re-Up Drug Interdiction Program. Knight Ridder (3/18, Root) reports, after the general in charge disappeared and a noticeable increase in border-region drug killings, "Mexican officials, recognizing that the Secure Mexico program had failed, announced a new program this week, dubbed Northern Border. Under the program, 600 to 800 more federal police agents were dispatched to this besieged border city. But few expect that to make much difference, and drug traffickers weren't intimidated: On Thursday, they gunned down four federal police intelligence agents in broad daylight outside a school here. At least 30 shots were fired into the agents' bodies."

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Sponsors Hard Line Immigration Bill. The AP (3/18, Gamboa) reports Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist "sidesteps President Bush's call for giving illegal immigrants temporary work permits in an election-year immigration bill the Tennessee Republican unveiled Friday." Frist "said the Senate will turn to his proposal to tighten borders, punish employers who hire illegal immigrants and provide more visas if the Senate Judiciary Committee doesn't complete a broader bill in the next 10 days." But a "clear majority on the 18-member committee has come out in favor of a 'guest worker' program that would let employed illegal immigrants remain in the U.S. — at least temporarily — rather than be deported."

DOJ_NMG_0019196

NYTimes Praises Specter For Reaching Consensus On Immigration. The New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) says in an editorial that "a bipartisan consensus emerged" in the Senate Judiciary Committee last week as Chairman Arlen Specter "endorsed the principle behind an earlier bill sponsored by Senators John McCain and Edward Kennedy: that illegal immigrants who met strict criteria and paid fines and back taxes should have a path to permanent residency and citizenship." But the "blowback was instantaneous." Majority Leader Bill Frist "announced that he would be putting his own bill forward as an alternative to the committee's. Seventy-one House members signed a letter saying that the Judiciary Committee's actions were 'fundamentally incompatible' with the House's strident vision of immigration reform, which completely rejects the idea of providing illegal immigrants any path to legalization." Specter "often wilts under party pressure like lettuce in a broiler, but he has shown admirable resilience in working to get a comprehensive immigration bill to the Senate floor."

Ahearn Asks Bush To Support Citizenship Bill For Illegal Immigrants. The CBS Evening News (3/17, story 6, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "On this St. Patrick's Day, the visitor at the White House was, who else, the Prime Minister of Ireland, Bertie Ahearn. He told the President he is still committed to the 1998 Northern Ireland peace accord. And he asked the President to support a Senate bill that would allow illegal immigrants from Ireland to stay in this country. Like many people here illegally, thousands of Irish live in daily fear." CBS (Alfonsi) added, "The Irish are urging Washington legislators to open some doors. Senators John McCain and Ted Kennedy are sponsoring a bill that would make it easier for all immigrants in this country illegally to earn legal status."

The Washington Times (3/18, A1, Dinan, 90K) in a front page story notes Ahern "was just the latest in a line of foreign leaders to beg the president to relax immigration rules." The requests by foreign leaders have been common as "some nations, such as Ireland and Mexico, want citizenship for their illegal alien nationals," while "others want the United States to lift the caps for temporary student or worker visas." Speaking with Pakistani reporters before his recent trip to Southeast Asis, "Bush said he is working to loosen visa restrictions." Bush said, "We had a very restrictive visa policy right after 9/11. … Our visa policy was a natural reaction to a terrible event that took place, but it didn't take me long to realize that we were missing a great opportunity to have students from Pakistan see the real America."

TAX:

US Claims $25 Million Lost By Fraudulent Tan Preparation In California. The San Bernardino County (CA) Sun (3/18, Wall) reports, "A firm accused of preparing thousands of fraudulent tax returns costing the government more than $25 million has been barred from doing business by a federal court order." The Sun continues, "N.C.K. Services and its three preparers - sisters Karen and Carla Berry of Rialto and Ivan Johnson of San Bernardino - are set to appear in court March 24 to respond to the civil complaint." The Sun adds, "The three defendants are accused of preparing thousands of tax returns containing false and fraudulent home-mortgage interest deductions since 2001, federal officials said. … The total loss to the government as a result of the understatements of tax on customers' returns exceeds $25 million, according to an IRS audit. … The government claims the defendants systematically claimed fictitious home-mortgage interest deductions for their customers, even in cases where the customers did not own homes. … Justice Department officials said the case is part of the federal government's increased effort to stop tax-fraud schemes. … 'Tax-preparation fraud costs the federal treasury hundreds of millions of dollars every year,' said Eileen O'Connor, the assistant attorney general for the department's tax division. … 'It's important to check the work on the return to make sure the numbers match your financial situation before you send in your return,' said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. 'People ought to be very suspicious and should have a red light go off if you hear you can always get a return if you go to x or y return preparer.'"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Politics Seen As Reason Extra Spending In Senate Budget. The New York Times (3/18, A1, Hulse, 1.19M) reports the "largess demonstrated by the Senate in padding its budget with billions of dollars in additional spending this week showed that lawmakers are no different from many of their constituents: they don't mind pulling out the charge card when money is tight." Forced to "choose between calls for renewed austerity and demands for more money, many Republicans joined Democrats in reaching deeper into the Treasury, leaving the party's push for new fiscal restraint in tatters." Republicans in "some of this year's tightest races — Conrad Burns of Montana, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island — all backed the chief budget-busting provision as they endorsed an extra $7 billion for medical research, education and worker safety."

DOJ_NMG_0019197

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Havemann, Simon, 958K) reports that last weekend in Memphis, "four U.S. senators who hope to carry the Republican banner in the 2008 presidential election pledged allegiance to one of the GOP's most revered principles: fiscal responsibility — never spend taxpayers' money you don't have." Less than "a week later, the Senate's Republican majority overwhelmingly approved billions of dollars in deficit spending. Despite outcry from conservative groups that helped build the GOP majorities in both houses of Congress, the Republican spenders were undeterred, for one reason: They're convinced that voters now care less about big deficits than they do about the things that increased federal spending will buy."

SAT Errors Prompt Testing Critics To Call For Regulation. The New York Times (3/18, Arenson, 1.19M) reports that as the College Board "races to score the final 1,600 exams from its problem-ridden October SAT test, a string of recent testing errors around the country has college and high school officials, testing experts, students and parents asking with rising urgency, Who is watching the testing industry?" With the increase in testing since the passage of the No Child Left Behind law, the "volume is stretching the $2 billion-a-year education testing industry, educators say, taxing its ability to draw up enough tests and score them quickly and reliably. The states are struggling to find experienced officials to provide quality control. The resulting flurry of errors has educators and lawmakers calling for better disclosure and oversight."

Reliance On Testing For Standards Criticized. In a Washington Post op-ed (3/18, A21), Colman McCarthy, director of the Center for Teaching Peace, criticizes the current academic testing trend, saying, "Tests represent fear-based learning, the opposite of learning based on desire. Frightened and fretting with pre-test jitters, students stuff their minds with information they disgorge on exam sheets and sweat out the results. I know of no meaningful evidence that acing tests has anything to do with students' character development or whether their natural instincts for idealism or altruism are nurtured."

Critics Say More Medicare Drug Benefit Confusion Ahead. The AP (3/18, Freking) reports advocacy groups say "many elderly and disabled Americans enrolled for the Medicare drug benefit will face new difficulties in obtaining their medicines on April 1," when "insurers will have more latitude to tell pharmacists that they won't pay for a particular drug. Before that, insurers have been told that they should pay for a prescription even if it's not on the list of drugs they cover."

Leavitt Calls For Reforms To Cut Healthcare Costs. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/18, Snowbeck, 261K) reports Secretary of Health and Human Services Michael Leavitt says "the Pittsburgh region is contributing to health care innovations, but it also is the 13th costliest market in the country for people buying health care services." During a "breakfast talk yesterday with the Pittsburgh Technology Council at the Sheraton Station Square, Mr. Leavitt called for a variety of reforms to help tame health care costs." Leavitt said the "situation in Pittsburgh…exemplifies the broad challenge with health care in the country: No one wants to go without advanced treatments that people rightly regard as 'priceless,' yet health care comes a price -- one that's increasingly difficult for society to afford."

House GOP Seen As Backing Away From Lobbying Reform. Knight Ridder (3/18, Thomma) reports that with "the spotlight turned elsewhere, Republicans this week backed off their vow to crack down on the relationship between lobbyists and Washington politics." House Republicans on Thursday proposed a measure that "would suspend privately financed travel for members of Congress only until this year's congressional elections and would put off a decision on a permanent ban of travel, meals or other gifts until after the elections." All the "proposed new regulations stopped short of those offered weeks earlier when congressional leaders rushed to embrace reform in the wake of the political fallout from the scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff."

Study Says Boehner Frequently Traveled On Privately-Funded Trips. The Washington Post (3/18, A2, Birnbaum, 744K) reports a Center for Public Integrity study shows House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, "who rose to power in the wake of a congressional lobbying scandal, spent the equivalent of nearly six months on privately funded trips over the past six years." The report says Boehner "accepted 42 privately sponsored trips from January 2000 to December 2005. That put him on the road to other countries and 'golfing hotspots,' often with his wife, Debbie, for about half a year, 'only nine days of which he listed as being 'at personal expense,'' the center said." Boehner also "flew at least 45 times on corporate jets owned by companies 'with a financial stake in congressional affairs' from June 2001 through September 2005, the center reported."

Bill Would Preempt States On Credit Report Access. The New York Times (3/18, Darlin, 1.19M) reports legislatures in "a dozen states" have "set up procedures for residents afraid of identity theft to lock and unlock their credit reports." But "credit-reporting agencies are pushing Congress to override the state laws, which could make it harder for Americans to keep their credit information under wraps." Lobbyists for "the big agencies — Equifax, Experian and TransUnion, owned by the Marmon Group — are seeking to add an amendment to the Financial Data Protection Act, a bill being rewritten by the House of Representatives." Consumer groups "are upset that a federal law might supersede what has been done at the state level."

DOJ_NMG_0019198

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Have Banner Week. Positive news on the stock market was highlighted by the media. The CBS Evening News (3/17, lead story, 2:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Lower oil prices and a government report that industrial production is starting to grow again kept the stock market rally going and for the fourth day in a row now, the market set a few five-year high. All the major indexes were up about 2% for the week." CBS (Mason) added, "The stock market had its best week of the year, and suddenly, the Dow is up at levels we haven't seen it at since -- well, since the turn of the century. As the closing bell rang, the Dow was closing in on 11,300." With "red-hot real estate prices cooling, some investors are looking to put their money back in the market. Retail broker Charles Schwab took in over $10 billion in new money in February, nearly 70% more than a year ago."

NBC Nightly News (3/17, story 2, 1:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stocks were up today as they were for the week. The Dow was up more than 26 points in today's trading [to close at 11,279.65]. Nasdaq gained just under 7 [points to close at 2,306.48.] For the week, the blue chip stocks finished up more than 203 points. Nasdaq was up more than 44 points." CNBC's Jim Cramer added, "I think this is a first-class bull market. And I think a lot of it is because people are pulling money out of housing and going back into stocks, first time in six years."

Emphasizing that the positive news on the stock market was an indication of broad economic strength the Wall Street Journal/Dow Jones (3/18, Patterson) says, "Fueled by renewed expectations that the Federal Reserve will ease off the interest-rate brakes, the Dow Jones Industrial Average motored higher this week, nearing a six-year high." The increase "left the average less than 60 points shy of its highest level since January 2000, when the dot-com bubble was in full bloom -- and about to burst. It was also the same month the Dow industrials hit their all-time closing high of 11722.98." Dow Jones notes, "Those airy heights proved fleeting," but experts "say this move is different. Strong gains by financial, energy and basic materials companies -- more resilient than the dot-com babies of the late 1990s -- have driven the latest rally. Indeed, the move up has come from big, blue-chip companies, while the Nasdaq Composite Index, which rose 6.92 points to 2306.48 Friday, has been sluggish."

And the Washington Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Bullish data on inflation and the housing market sent stocks mostly higher yesterday." The stock market "welcomed the latest report from the Labor Department, which showed consumer prices rising just 0.1 percent in February, far less than the 0.7 percent jump in January. Core CPI, with food and fuel prices removed, also rose 0.1 percent, down from 0.2 percent the previous month." In addition to "better-than-expected housing construction in February, investors were reassured that the economy continues to grow while inflation remains in check."

Bloomberg (3/18) notes, "A drop in oil prices helped the Standard & Poor's 500 Index and the Dow Jones Industrial Average advance to their highest levels since May 2001. Boeing Co., the largest U.S. aircraft maker, led the advance on demand for its 787 jetliner."

But the Washington Post/AP (3/18, D2) in an article titled "Oil And Productivity Set A Positive Tone" also notes, "Stocks' gains were limited, however, as the day's news reports did little to address Wall Street's persistent worries about inflation and more interest-rate increases from the Fed, said Ken Tower, chief market strategist for Schwab's CyberTrader."

Industrial Production Report Suggests Economy Healthy. The Wall Street Journal (3/18, Gerena-Morales, 2.11M) reports, "Industrial production expanded at a healthy pace last month, the latest sign that American industry is thriving." A Federal Reserve report showed "industrial production in February at the nation's factories, mines and utilities jumped 0.7% from January, boosted by a surge in production at utility plants. Compared with a year earlier, industrial production was up 3.3%." It "was slightly weaker than economists had expected," yet "economists found lots of positive news in the report, especially in the manufacturing sector, which is seeing year-over-year output expand at double-digit rates for some key sectors that reflect consumer spending and business investment. Overall, manufacturing output was flat last month, but was up 4.2% over the past 12 months."

The Bloomberg (3/18, Torres) notes, "The lack of untapped capacity may cause factories to raise prices, prompting Fed policy makers to boost interest rates one or two more times, economists forecast. Higher borrowing costs and gasoline prices limited consumer confidence this month, a University of Michigan survey showed today." It showed consumer confidence "held at 86.7, reflecting a rise in Americans' perceptions of current conditions and a decline in expectations."

DOJ_NMG_0019199

Recent Gas Prices Up Sharply, But February Declines Help Rein In Inflation. Focusing on recent increases in gas prices, NBC Nightly News (3/17, lead story, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "At the end of a week that saw most of the top oil company executives in this country testify under oath in Washington, the price of gasoline in this country has suddenly spiked. It has gone up by just about the same amount, just about everywhere." NBC (Costello) added that in "the last day alone, gasoline has jumped four cents on average nationwide. And 15 cents in the last month." It's "all about supply and demand." Mary Thompson, CNBC: "Gasoline futures are up 23 cents in the last month because demand here in the US is strong, it's about 2% above last year's levels. And there are fears we could see some supply shortages this summer." NBC cited global instability, fallout from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and new ethanol mix requirements as reasons for the price increase.

But highlighting how a decline in energy prices in February helped slow inflation, the Washington Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Inflation slowed sharply in February as food costs moderated and the price of gasoline, natural gas and other energy products posted big declines." The AP adds, "The Labor Department reported yesterday that its closely watched U.S. Consumer Price Index (CPI) posted a tiny 0.1 percent increase last month after having jumped 0.7 percent in January. The slowdown in price pressures was certain to be welcomed at the Federal Reserve, which has been boosting interest rates since June 2004 to make sure inflation does not get out of control."

Boehlert To Retire From Potentially Competitive Seat. The New York Times (3/18, Hulse, 1.19M) reports moderate Republican Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert, "who became a national advocate of science and a champion of environmental protection, announced Friday that he would not seek re-election." Boehlert, who "under party rules would have had to surrender his chairmanship of the Science Committee at the end of this session, said he believed he had recorded solid accomplishments in his current term and decided after 24 years on Capitol Hill that he was ready to step aside." Boehlert's "departure provides an added opportunity for Democrats who need 15 seats to gain control of the House of Representatives."

The Washington Post (3/18, A2, Babington, 744K) reports Democrats "hope Boehlert's retirement and President Bush's low approval ratings will give them a chance to win the seat, which the GOP has held for decades." Political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said, "It's a difficult opportunity for the Democrats, but nevertheless an opportunity. Democrats are going to need a wave there." The Post adds Democratic activists "expect Michael A. Arcuri, 46, the Oneida County district attorney since 1993, to win the Sept. 12 primary. Republicans are looking to five-term state Sen. Raymond A. Meier, 53, to be their nominee."

Despite Retirement, Sabo's District Seen As Safe For Democrats. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/18, Diaz, Hotakainen, Olson, 424K) reports Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo "is expected to announce his retirement today after 28 years in Congress." Sabo, who "turned 68 last month, has scheduled a noon news conference in his Minneapolis office. His departure is expected to set off a scramble within the DFL party for a replacement." Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, "a professor of justice and peace studies at the University of St. Thomas, already has opened a campaign office and challenged Sabo at last week's precinct caucuses. And Michael Erlandson, Sabo's chief of staff and the former chair of the state DFL party, is expected to run." State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff "also said Friday that they would run." Sabo's 5th CD is "one of the nation's safest Democratic seats. He won his 14th term in 2004 with 70 percent of the vote."

After UN Rights-Council Vote, Some Complain US "Failing To Engage." After losing a vote 170-4 on the creation of a UN Human Rights Council, the Los Angeles Times (3/18, Farley, 958K) reports, "The US is being criticized by many diplomats and human rights representatives here as having never fully engaged in negotiations over the matter and being unwilling to compromise. Some diplomats said that if US Ambassador John R. Bolton had spent as much time lobbying at the United Nations as he did in Washington, the US would have had a better result." An unnamed "diplomat closely involved in the talks" is quoted as saying, "It's not clear that they wanted to move. ... In fact I couldn't tell what they wanted. We offered ideas to Washington to achieve their goals, and nothing happened." Bolton, however, is quoted as saying, "We would rather have nothing than something that falls short of our standards. That was our view all along. ... What we found sad was that some of our central allies gave up on key points. I don't understand it to this day."

Rice Encourages Asian Powers To Improve Relations. The Washington Times (3/18, Kralev, 90K) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday expressed concern over tensions between Japan and China and urged the two Asian powers to find common ground and overcome their differences for the sake of stability in the region. 'We have encouraged good relations between China and Japan, and even though there are difficulties in that relationship, China and Japan also share a lot of interests and, indeed, a lot of trade and commerce and a lot of economic relations,' the secretary said."

DOJ_NMG_0019200

China Appears Ready To Release Imprisoned Journalist. The New York Times (3/18, Yardley, 1.19M) reports, "Chinese authorities on Friday withdrew at least part of the case against a Chinese researcher for The New York Times, in a surprise legal maneuver that left unclear whether he would soon be released as President Hu Jintao prepares to visit the United States next month. Zhao Yan, 44, a researcher in the Beijing office of The Times, has been imprisoned for 18 months on a charge that he disclosed state secrets to the newspaper, as well as a lesser charge of fraud. Mr. Zhao has denied both charges."

The Washington Post (3/18, A16, Pan, 744K) adds, "The move amounts to a rare admission of error by the Chinese government in a criminal prosecution involving national security, and it almost certainly required Hu's approval, because he had endorsed the investigation that led to Zhao's arrest and issued instructions to the officials running it, according to people familiar with the probe." Meanwhile, the Financial Times (3/18, Yeh) notes, "The decision by prosecutors to dismiss charges against Zhao Yan comes ahead of President Hu Jintao's visit to the US in April." The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Magnier, 958K) also covers the story.

German Trial Could Help Unpack Nuclear Black Market. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Fleishman, 958K) reports, "A German engineer accused of belonging to a worldwide nuclear smuggling network went on trial Friday for allegedly providing technology to Libya that could have been used to enrich uranium for weapons. The case, being heard in a Mannheim court, is expected to offer a glimpse of the nuclear black market once masterminded by Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan." According to the Times, "Gotthard Lerch, 63, is charged with violating Germany's weapons control and foreign trade acts. He allegedly was paid $34 million to provide Libya with gas centrifuges and other dual-use technologies." Goetz Neuneck of the Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at the University of Hamburg, is quoted as saying, "The trial is hugely important in strengthening international attention to the problem of illegal proliferation. ... It would be very good for international nonproliferation if the trial were to provide more details and shine more light on dark corners."

Hamas Prepared To Announce Government. The AP (3/18, Barzak) reports, "Hamas said it is ready to announce the formation of its government Saturday, two weeks ahead of a deadline but apparently without coalition partners that might have softened the militants' image. In another possible setback, the Hamas government program is not expected to win the approval of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who is to meet with the group's leaders in Gaza Saturday. Abbas' aides said the Palestinian leader considers the Hamas platform too vague and wants it rewritten." According to the AP, "The new foreign minister will almost definitely be Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas firebrand, according to a preliminary list given to The Associated Press by officials in Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a smaller PLO faction that was considering joining the government. Said Siyam, a Hamas lawmaker from Gaza, has been tapped for the Interior and Civil Affairs Ministries, which control three of the five Palestinian security forces and is responsible for contacts with Israel's security services, said the officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the list was not final."

In earlier coverage, the New York Times (3/18, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, "Abbas may yet reject the new government's agenda, because it does not explicitly acknowledge the validity of past agreements between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, or support negotiations with Israel."

Fatah Officials Calls For Abbas's Resignation. The AP (3/18, Daraghmeh) reports, "Several Fatah officials called on President Mahmoud Abbas to resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority to protest Israel's raid of a West Bank prison earlier this week, party activists said Friday. The raid...was seen as a humiliating blow to Abbas's prestige and raised new questions in his Fatah Party about their president's ability to govern." The AP goes on to report, "The call for Mr. Abbas' resignation and the dissolution of the Palestinian Authority at the Fatah Central Committee late Thursday was the first time such a demand was made. Analysts and Fatah officials said the demands -- raised both in a letter to Mr. Abbas signed by five midlevel Fatah activists and at Thursday's meeting by a senior party official -- are not serious at the moment."

Netanyahu Could Be Primed For A Comeback. The Los Angeles Times (3/18, King, 958K) reports, "Heading into a March 28 parliamentary election, the onetime boy wonder of Israeli politics leads a party that once dominated the electoral landscape, but now is lagging far behind." Still, "many observers believe it would be foolish to count out Netanyahu, a charismatic but divisive politician whose career has been marked by dramatic reversals of fortune." As Likud leader, having assumed the "leadership of Israel's hard right at a time when the country is embracing a more centrist view, Netanyahu now finds himself struggling to broaden his appeal." Political scientist Itzhak Galnoor of Hebrew University is quoted as saying, "Likud has not been able to follow the swing in Israeli public opinion. ... The public generally agrees with the partitioning of the biblical Land of Israel, and the Likud leadership remains stuck in its previous position."

DOJ_NMG_0019201

Sharon's Wall Is Justified, Scholar Writes. In a New York Times (3/18, 1.19M) op-ed piece penned by scholar Irshad Manji writes that Israelis will soon elect a new prime minister, "but I'd bet my last shekel that I'll continue to hear the phrase 'Ariel Sharon's apartheid wall.' It's a phrase spoken — make that spewed — on almost every university campus I visit in North America and Europe." Manji continues, "This barrier, although built by Mr. Sharon, was birthed by "shaheeds," suicide bombers whom Palestinian leaders have glorified as martyrs. Qassam missiles can kill two or three people at a time. Suicide bombers lay waste to many more. Since the barrier went up, suicide attacks have plunged, which means innocent Arab lives have been spared along with Jewish ones. Does a concrete effort to save civilian lives justify the hardship posed by this structure? The humanitarian in me bristles, but ultimately answers yes."

Israeli Turkeys Now Afflicted With Deadly Flu. The Washington Post (3/18, A14, Wilson, 744K) reports, "Israeli health officials announced Friday that they believe more than 1,000 turkeys have died in recent days from bird flu, the first reported cases in the country. Initial test results appeared to confirm that birds being raised on four farms in southern Israel died after being infected by the H5N1 virus, avian influenza's deadly strain. Additional tests recommended by the World Health Organization are being conducted to confirm the findings, but Israeli officials are already taking precautions."

Georgia Gripped By Bird-Flu Fears. The New York Times (3/18, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "In the early morning hours, the cobblestone alleys that wander this city's slopes are normally crowded with schoolchildren, walking in groups with their backpacks and books. But such sights have lately become rare." As fears of avian influenza spread throughout this mountainous former-Soviet republic, "school attendance has dipped to half of normal levels, said Alexander Lomaia, the minister of education. Ambulance calls have soared, reaching 900 a day here, up from slightly more than 600, said Lado Chipashvili, the minister of labor, health and social affairs."

G-8 Energy Chiefs Back A Nuclear Future. The Washington Times/AP (3/18) reports, "Energy ministers from the world's leading industrialized nations called yesterday for major new investments and the development of nuclear power as high oil prices and uncertainty about supplies weigh on the global economy. The ministers from the Group of Eight nations, meeting in the Russian capital to discuss global energy security, said significant investments would be needed in the production, transportation and processing of resources and urged policies to encourage this." According to the G-8 statement, the ministers "recognize that to attract investment it is essential for countries to have open and favorable investment regimes...including stable and predictable regulations, clear tax laws and efficient administration procedures, as well as fair and reciprocal access to markets along the energy value chain."

Kremlin Moves To Shut Down Khodorkovsky NGO. The New York Times (3/18, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "The bank accounts of a foundation led by an imprisoned Russian businessman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, were frozen Friday by court order, the foundation and its bank said, a move that strongly suggests the organization is about to be shut down. The group, the Open Russia Foundation, immediately announced that it was forced to suspend its activities promoting civil society and accused the government of extending its crackdown on private organizations." Open Russia vice chairwoman Irina Yasina is quoted as saying, "It seems that they are trying to stop all of our activities, because of course without money, we can do nothing."

New Belarus Sanctions Could Be In Offing, White House Says. As the people of Belarus prepare to cast their votes in presidential elections this weekend, the Washington Post (3/18, A18, Baker, 744K) reports, "The White House accused the authoritarian president of Belarus yesterday of being 'among the most corrupt leaders in the world,' and administration officials said they will consider new sanctions assuming tomorrow's elections are manipulated as expected. In a report sent to Congress on Thursday night and posted on the Web yesterday, the White House alleged that President Alexander Lukashenko 'has created a repressive dictatorship on the doorstep of the European Union,' sold arms to rogue states and enriched himself at the expense of his people." Press Secretary Scott McClellan is quoted as saying, "We are very concerned about the behavior of the leaders in Belarus. They are not pursuing a democratic course." The Post goes on to cite "two other administration officials who were not authorized to speak on the record [as saying] the US government is studying ways of applying more sanctions against Lukashenko's regime, targeted specifically against him and his cronies."

Pelosi Calls For End To Darfur Conflict. The Washington Times (3/18, Debose, 90K) reports, "House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi yesterday said the warring in the Darfur region of Sudan demands immediate attention, a day after privately urging President Bush to appoint a special envoy to help end what the White House calls a genocide." Pelosi is quoted as saying, "President Bush and I don't agree...well we disagree on almost everything, but on this we do, and he has told us 'not on his watch' and I believe him. ... To do this we must stop the violence, bring the parties to the negotiating table and get humanitarian relief to the people who need it."

DOJ_NMG_0019202

New Liberia Leader Wants Taylor To Stand Trial. The New York Times (3/18, Hoge, 1.19M) reports, "Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the president of Liberia, said Friday that she had asked Nigeria to extradite Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president and guerrilla leader, to face war crimes charges in Sierra Leone. Ms. Johnson Sirleaf told the Security Council that she had made a formal request to President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria, where Mr. Taylor lives in exile." According to the Times, "Even from exile, he has maintained influence in Liberia, with thousands of young combatants still loyal to him, Ms. Johnson Sirleaf said, making her plea 'courageous but risky.'" She is quoted as saying, "Please bear in mind that time is of the essence in this regard. ... Liberia's peace is fragile. There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor, there are many business interests he has. Whatever decision is taken by the African leadership must ensure that the safety of the Liberian people and the stability of our nation is not undermined.'"

In its coverage, the Washington Post (3/18, A17, Lynch, 744K) notes, "Obasanjo has previously resisted international pressure to hand Taylor over, citing the need for a request from a democratically elected Liberian leader. His office said Friday that he is considering sending Taylor back to Liberia, not Sierra Leone, where he is charged. A statement issued by Obasanjo's office cited his 'commitment to give due consideration to any formal request from a democratically elected government of Liberia for the return of former president Charles Taylor.'"

The Los Angeles Times (3/18, Dixon, 958K) and the AP (3/18, Lederer) also cover the story.

Sirleaf Represents Rare New Start For Liberia, WSJ Says. In a staff editorial headlined, "African Hope," the Wall Street Journal (3/18, 2.11M) opines, "Good news out of Africa has been all too rare in recent years. But a major exception was the election last year of Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, who stopped by our offices yesterday after addressing the United Nations." Mrs. Sirleaf "used her time with us to emphasize that Liberia is 'open for business.'" When asked "if she believed the US owes Liberia anything, she said flatly, 'no.' She just wants it to be treated like other countries."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"U.S. Is Denied Google Queries."
"Musicians Still Hear Paris' Call."
"Housing Speculators Relocate To Hotter Spots."
"Obsession And Isolation In A Dictator's Last Days."
"Mayor, Businesses and ACLU Are In Same Camp On Skid Row."
"Smoking Ban Moves Outdoors."
"9/11 Case Prosecutors Granted A Reprieve."

New York Times:
"Judges Overturn Bush Bid To Ease Pollution Rules."
"Politics Drives Money Binge."
"Judges Overturn Bush Bid To Ease Pollution Rules."
"Cited As Symbol of Abu Ghraib, Man Admits He Is Not In Photo."
"In Louisiana, Graft Inquiries Are Increasing."
"Testing Errors Prompt Calls For Oversight."
"A $65 Table, And A Tale To Tell Around It."

Washington Post:
"Looser Emission Rules Rejected."
"Sex Cases Rarely Go To Trial At Academy."
"Moussaoui Prosecutors Get A Break."
"Cooking 101: Add 1 Cup Of Simplicity."
"Africans Lay Traditional Rites To Rest."

Washington Times:
"U.N. To Raise Its Profile In Iraq."
"Political Offensive Targets Bush."
"Ireland Asks Bush For Alien Amnesty."
"U.S. Eyes Baghdad For Talks With Iran."
"Historic Buildings Purged In Moscow Modernization."
"Area Gas Prices Jumped This Week."
"Show Dog Still A No-Show."

Detroit Free Press:
"GM, UAW On Edge Of Delphi Solution."
"Road Money? Plenty Of Takers."
"Nuclear Safety Left Hanging As Crane Dangled Fuel Rods."
"Company, Union Fight Back Together; Can They Do More?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Power Plant Rule Voided."
"Breaking With Tradition."
"Electric Bills Likely To Edge Up."
"Sign-Up Bonus Pumps Re-Enlistments In 48th."
"Past Returns To Haunt Freeman's Chief Of Staff."

Dallas Morning News:
"T.O. On His Way."
"Industry Girds For Special Session."
"She Goes Her Own Way In Legal Fights."
"Civil Strife Fuels Fears Of War, Wider Conflict."

Houston Chronicle:
"Gas At $2.40 A Gallon — And Rising."
"PCs In Council Office Seized."
"Manhunt On For Drug Officers' Assassins."
"They Pass On Champs, But Always Get A Winner."

DOJ_NMG_0019203

"Mumphrey's Pardon Ends 'Miscarriage Of Justice.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Bush-Iraq Anniversary; Dearborn, Michigan Iraqis; Pharmaceutical Trials; Pharmaceutical Trials-Analysis; Big Bang; Avian Flu; Nascar Pit Crews; Child Porn Detectives.
CBS: Stock Markets; Iraq Violence; Iraq Anniversary; Hadley-Iraq Progress; Moussaoui Trial; Illegal Irish Immigrants; Hurricane Katrina Reunion; Milosevic Funeral; College Debate Teams.
NBC: Gas Prices; Stock Markets; Iraq-Operation Swarmer; US-Iran Talks; Moussaoui Trial; Airport Securities-Explosives; Israel-Avian Flu; Vehicle Cameras; Calabasas-Smoking Ban; St. Patrick's Day; Green Companies.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — At Camp David.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: JOURNALISM STUDENTS _ 8:30 a.m. One hundred two high school students from across the United States who are interested in pursuing a career in journalism and have qualities of ``free spirit'' have been selected to participate in the annual Al Neuharth Free Spirit Scholarship and Conference program. Location: Sessions to be held at Freedom Forum, 1101 Wilson Blvd., Arlington, Va., the Watergate Hotel, and at Capitol Hill offices (afternoon visits).

IRAQ WAR-MARCH _ 9 a.m. Local peace activists hold a march to mark the three year anniversary of the war in Iraq and to call for an end to the war. Sponored by the Washington Peace Center; DC Anti-War Network; Code Pink; Neighbors United for Peace and Justice; and others. Highlights: 9 a.m. Pre-march service for the homeless at Canadian Embassy, 501 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. 2 p.m. Convergence to begin march at home of Vice President Dick Cheney, U.S. Naval Observatory, 3450 Massachusetts Ave. NW. March procedes to Dupont Circle. 3 p.m. - 6 p.m. Rally with speeches, music, poetry and a speak-out by local D.C. area residents. Dupont Circle, NW. 3:30 p.m. News conference. Southeast quadrant, Dupont Circle, NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, March 20, 2006 9:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, March 18, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips060318.pdf; dojclips060318.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Gives Prosecutors New Chance In Terror Case (NYT) .3
Moussaoui Prosecutors Get A Break (WP) 5
Moussaoui Ruling Breathes Life Into Prosecution (LAT) 6
Moussaoui Ruling Salvages The Trial (MINNST) 7
Moussaoui Trial Opened To 'Untainted' Witnesses (WT) 8
Judge Admits Evidence In Moussaoui Trial (KCS) 9
Judge In Moussaoui Trial Faces A Delicate Task (LAT) 10
Specter Eyes Oversight Of Spy Program (WT) 11
U.S. Lawyers Keep Silence On Listening In (NYT) 12
Pentagon Hired Contractor To Advise On Collecting Information On Churches, Mosques, Other U.S. Sites (KRT) 12
Foreign Firms A Mainstay Of Pentagon Contracting (WP) 14
Mideast Wrangle May Hit New Port Sale (FT) 15
Unnamed Source Told FBI He Saw Alleged Terrorists In Lodi (LODINS) 16
Witness Outlines Ties To Terror (STOCKREC) 16
LODI Muslims Skeptical About FBI's Informant They Say They'd Know If Terror Suspects Visited (SFC) 18
Attorney Seeks Data On Inmate Privacy (TOLB) 19
Bond Denied To Boca Doctor In Terrorism Case (MH) 19
Was Indictment Misleading? (SPT) 20
Gov't: Some Gitmo Cases Should Be Scuttled (AP) 21
Mosque Material Ordered Released (ALBTU) 22
U.S., Pakistan's Strategic Interests Are Converging (WSJ) 23
The Mayor And The Imam (NYT) 23
Ahern Asks Bush About CIA Flights Over EU (AP) 24
IRA-Allied Politician Detained At Airport From Times Wire Reports (LAT) 25

Homeland Response:

Bomb Material Got Past TSA Screeners (DMN) 25
White House Plans Smallpox Drill (AP) 26
Real Injustice (WP) 27
Port Authority Rejects Silverstein's Offer To Talk (NYT) 27
WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ) 29
Ground Zeroes (WSJ) 29
FEMA Will Try To Recoup Millions Distributed For Hurricane Relief (NYT) 30
In Louisiana, Graft Inquiries Are Increasing (NYT) 31
EPA Chief Backs Coast Restoration (NOTP) 33
A Hurricane And Espresso. What's Next? (NYT) 33
Blanco Plan Passes First Test (BRA) 34
Legislators OK Recovery Plan Grudgingly (NOTP) 36
Congress Boosts Flood Insurance Agency (AP) 37

War News:

Gen. Ambitious On Increasing Iraqi Control (AP) 37
U.S. Wants Fewer Troops In Line Of Fire (AP) 38
Convoy Duty Is Still Task Of U.S. (NOTP) 40
Pilgrims Attacked On Road To Holy City (WT/AP) 41
U.S. Seeks A Way Forward In Iraq (DMN) 41
Political Offensive Targets Bush (WT) 43
Wisconsin Voters Prepare To Weigh In On The War In Iraq (WP) 44
Even As Support For War Shrinks, Few Protest It (SFC) 46
Hold The President Accountable (NYT) 48
Democrats' Dilemma (NSWK) 48
Bush The "Incompetent" (TIME) 50
Bush Adviser Says Iran Bluffing On Iraq (AP) 50
U.S. Eyes Baghdad For Talks With Iran (WT) 51
U.S., Iran Closer To Talks On Iraq (WP) 52
Sunni Leaders Say U.S.-Iran Talks Amount To Meddling (NYT) 53
Iran, U.S. Disagree Over Goal Of Talks (LAT) 54
ANALYSIS: Talks With Iran Could Help Bush (MINNST/AP) ...56
'War' As Epithet: Sound Of Clay Feet Cracking (NYT) 57
Why Iran Wants To Talk (WP) 58
U.N. To Raise Its Profile In Iraq (WT) 59

Ringleader In Custody, Iraqi Officials Say (LAT) 60
Study Is Said To Find Overlap In U.S. Counterterror Effort (NYT) 61
Documents Reveal Iraqis Dodging Inspectors (AP) 63
New Documents From Saddam Hussein's Archives Discuss Bin Laden, WMDs (ABC) 64
Papers Give Glimpse Of Al-Qaida Recruits (LAT/AP) 65
Cited As Symbol Of Abu Ghraib, Man Admits He Is Not In Photo (NYT) 67
Times Says It Misidentified Iraqi As Hooded Prisoner (WP) ... 69
Abu Ghraib Dog Handler Case Goes To Jury (AP) 70
Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqis (AP) 70
U.S. To Investigate Civilian Deaths In Iraq (KRT) 71
Casualty Of War (NSWK) 72
The War Through A Father's Eyes (WP) 74
Was The War Worth It? (TIME) 75
Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT/AFP) 76

DOJ:

Justice Lawyer Named Interim U.S. Attorney (AP-Y2) 76
Alexandria Federal Prosecutor Sworn In (WP) 77

Corporate Scandals:

Two Cheers For Nancy Pelosi (WSJ) 77

Criminal Law:

Prosecutor Opposes Libby Motion To Dismiss (AP) 79
Charges Against Cowles Dropped (WP) 79
Enron Trial Approaches Halfway Point (AP) 80
In Enron Trial, Witnesses' Quirks And Stamina Are On The Stand (WP) 81
Court Reverses Death Sentence Of L.A. Man (LAT) 83
Feds May Drop Capital Case: Dot Men Face Death Penalty In Slay (BOSH) 83
Mariano Guilty Of Corruption Charges (PHI) 84
JURY: MARIANO'S CORRUPT (PHDN) 86
Philly Councilman Found Guilty Of Bribery, Money Laundering (AP) 87
Philly Councilman Guilty In Bribery Case (UPI) 88
Once A Key Political Ally, Now Alone (PHI) 88
Immediate Fate Of Mariano's Council Seat Unclear (PHI) 90
Job, Pension Go When Rick Does (PHDN) 90
Editorial | The Rick Mariano Verdict (PHI) 90
Laski Admits Guilt, Braces For Jail Time (CHIT) 91
Laski Admits Taking Payoffs (CHIST) 92
Former Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Trucking Scandal (AP) 93
Ex-Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty In Trucking Kickback Scheme (LAT) 95
Man Held In Isolation On Child Porn Charges (CHIST) 95
Cyber Sex Crime Unit Begun (INDYSTAR) 96
3 Sentenced In ELF Terror Case (SACBEE) 96
6-Year Prison Sentence In Series Of Arsons (LAT) 98
3 Eco-terrorists Sentenced For Firebombs (MHCA/AP) 98

Civil Law:

Google Doesn't Have To Turn Over Query Data (WSJ) 98
U.S. Is Denied Google Queries (LAT) 99
Google To Reveal Sites, Not Searches (AP) 100
Google Wins Ruling On Turning Over Search Queries To Government (BLOOM) 100
Searching For Google (WSJ) 101

Civil Rights:

N.C., Justice Department Agree On Overseas Voting In 2nd Primary (CO) 102
Group Charges Libraries Filtered Out Web Site (SLPD) 102
Whistle-Blower Or Thief In Diebold Case? (LAT) 103
Putting A Racist Past In The Past (LAT) 105
2nd Autopsy In Youth Boot Camp Death Fails To End Questions (NYT) 105
Federal Appeals Court Allows 'Choose Life' License Plates In Tennessee (FINDLAW/AP) 107
After 2 More Deaths, Planned Parenthood Alters Method For Abortion Pill (NYT) 107
FDA Says 2 More Women Have Died After Taking Abortion Pill (WP) 109
FDA Says Two More Women Dead After Abortion Pill Use (WT) 110
2 More Women Die After Taking Abortion Pills (LAT) 110
Birth Control (WSJ) 111
Abortion Nation (WSJ) 112
FDA To Review Ban On Gay Men Donating Blood (WP) 113

Antitrust:

Maytag, Whirlpool Deal At Risk (AP) 114
Whirlpool's Maytag Purchase May Be Opposed By U.S. (Update7) (BLOOM) 114
4 Companies Under Federal Investigation (BEAUENT) 116
Airlines Can Legally Meet (FWST) 117
That Other Madness This Month: Mergers (NYT) 118

Environment:

Judges Overturn Bush Bid To Ease Pollution Rules (NYT) .. 119
Court Rejects EPA's Loosening Of Air Rule (LAT) 121

DOJ_NMG_0019207

Looser Emission Rules Rejected (WP) 122
Court Overturns Bush Clean Air Act Exemption In Loss For Power Industry (WSJ)....123
U.S. Court Blocks EPA Standard On Modernizing Plants, Factories (BLOOM)....124
Budget Vote Revives Bid For Arctic Oil Drilling (WP) 124

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico's Attempt To Quell Drug Violence Falters (KRT) 125

Immigration:

Frist Immigration Bill Would Target Bosses (AP)....126
An Immigration Breakthrough (NYT)....127
Ireland Asks Bush For Alien Amnesty (WT)....128

Tax:

Judge Ties Up Tax Firm (SBCS)....129

Congress-Administration:

Politics Drives A Senate Spending Spree (NYT)....130
GOP Spenders Think Voters Dismiss Deficits (LAT)....131
Testing Errors Prompt Calls For Oversight (NYT)....133
'Teach To The Test'? What Test? (WP)....134
April May Bring New Medicare Drug Problems (AP)....136
Health Secretary: Costs Too High (PPG)....137
Congress Backs Off From Lobbying Limits (KRT)....137
House GOP Leader Well Traveled (WP)....139
Opening The Door On The Credit Report And Throwing Away The Lock (NYT)....140

Other News:

'A Strong Move Higher' (WSJ)....142
Housing, Inflation Data Give Investors A Boost (WT/AP)....143
U.S. Stocks Rise, Notching Best Week In 2 Months; Boeing Gains (BLOOM)....144
Oil And Productivity Set A Positive Tone (WP/AP)....146
Industrial Output Advanced Briskly Last Month (WSJ)....146
U.S. Economy: Industrial Production Rebounds In Feb. (Update2) (BLOOM)....147
Reduced Gas Price Slows Inflation (WT/AP)....149
New York Congressman Won't Seek 13th Term (NYT)....150
N.Y. Republican Boehlert Won't Seek 13th House Term (WP)....151
Rep. Sabo To End His Long Career In Congress (MINNST)151
U.S. Seen As Failing To Engage In U.N. Process (LAT)....153
Rice Urges Better Japan-China Ties (WT)....155
China May Release Jailed Times Researcher, Lawyer Says (NYT)....156
China Dismisses Journalist's Case (WP)....157
China Dismisses Case Against US Reporter (FT)....159
Chinese Researcher For New York Times To Be Let Out Of Jail (LAT)....159
German Trial Promises A Look Into The Nuclear Black Market (LAT)....160
Hamas Ready To Announce Government (AP)....161
Hamas To Propose Palestinian Cabinet That Excludes Other Parties (NYT)....162
Fatah Officials Call For Abbas To Resign (AP)....163
Netanyahu Angles For Yet Another Comeback (LAT)....164
How I Learned To Love The Wall (NYT)....166
Israel Announces First Cases Of Deadly Bird Flu Strain, In Turkeys (WP)....167
As Spring Thaws The Caucasus, Birds And Fear Are Flying North Through Georgia (NYT)....168
G-8 Countries Back Nuclear Power In Future (WT/AP)....169
Russia Effectively Closes A Political Opponent's Rights Group (NYT)....170
U.S. May Consider New Belarus Sanctions (WP)....171
Pelosi Seeks End To Darfur Violence (WT)....172
Liberian Seeks Extradition Of Predecessor For Atrocities Trial (NYT)....172
Liberia Seeks Trial For Ex-President (WP)....173
Liberia Seeks Extradition Of Indicted Ex-Leader (LAT)....174
Liberia Seeks Handover Of Taylor To Court (AP)....176
African Hope (WSJ)....176

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Gives Prosecutors New Chance In Terror Case (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis
The New York Times, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019208

WASHINGTON, March 17 — The judge in the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui said on Friday that prosecutors could try to find new, untainted aviation-security witnesses to replace those who were barred from testifying because they were improperly coached by a government lawyer.

The ruling effectively allows the government to try to salvage its effort to execute Mr. Moussaoui, the only person charged in a United States courtroom with responsibility for the deaths in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The judge, Leonie M. Brinkema of Federal District Court, declined to undo her earlier decision prohibiting the prosecutors from using any of the aviation officials they originally intended to call as witnesses because they had been coached by Carla J. Martin, a government lawyer who was assisting the prosecutors.

The trial, which is solely about whether Mr. Moussaoui should be executed or jailed for life, was on the brink of falling apart after the judge's ruling on Wednesday struck at the heart of the government's case. The chief prosecutor, Robert J. Spencer, had told the judge there would "be no point in going forward" unless she relented in some manner.

But even as Judge Brinkema denied the prosecutors' request that she reconsider her striking of those witnesses, she accepted a suggestion that they put forward in a court filing: that they be allowed to try to find someone new to present the same testimony.

"The government's proposed alternate remedy of allowing it to call untainted aviation witnesses or otherwise produce evidence not tainted by Ms. Martin has merit," Judge Brinkema wrote.

Tasia Scolinos, the Justice Department's spokeswoman, said in response, "We are pleased to be able to move forward with this important case on behalf of the thousands of victims and their families."

That means the trial, in its second week when it was thrown into turmoil by the disclosure of Ms. Martin's behavior, will resume Monday morning with the cross-examination of an F.B.I. agent who arrested and interviewed Mr. Moussaoui three weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks.

But the question remains as to whether it is possible to find new witnesses who are not only untainted, as the judge has required, but familiar enough with the state of aviation security in August 2001 to help support the government's case.

Mr. Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks after having been arrested for immigration violations in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly a jetliner. The Justice Department has asserted that he is nonetheless responsible for the Sept. 11 deaths because he had lied to investigators and concealed his membership in Al Qaeda and his knowledge of that group's plans to fly planes into buildings.

The government's main aviation-security witness, Lynne Osmus, a senior official of the Federal Aviation Administration in August 2001, was to testify about what steps the agency "could" have taken had Mr. Moussaoui told investigators what he knew about Al Qaeda's plans.

The prosecutors were prepared to have Ms. Osmus, in particular, assert that the agency could have issued a directive putting in place 10 security measures, including a ban on short-blade knives like those used by the Sept. 11 hijackers and also owned by Mr. Moussaoui. The judge has barred aviation witnesses from testifying as to what the government "would" have done, because that would be speculation.

Edward B. MacMahon Jr., the chief defense lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui, said in a court filing that he did not believe it was possible to find any new, untainted witnesses because anyone who had the expertise of Ms. Osmus would by now have been exposed to the coaching suggestions of Ms. Martin through news reports.

Mr. MacMahon said that it was possible that someone familiar with how the aviation agency operated in August 2001 might not have had contact with Ms. Martin, but that it was highly implausible that such people would not have read about her suggestions to the witnesses.

But Justice Department officials said they were confident they could find witnesses who would be deemed authoritative and untainted.

Ms. Martin's name came up in other court proceedings Friday as lawyers defending the airlines against Sept. 11 liability suits denied that they had communicated with her. Lawyers for family members of flight attendants killed in the attacks had raised questions about alleged contacts between Ms. Martin and the airlines' lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0019209

Moussaoui Prosecutors Get A Break (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Judge to Allow Testimony From Untainted Witnesses

A federal judge yesterday revived the Justice Department's death penalty case for Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, accepting a compromise offered by prosecutors to find new aviation security witnesses not tainted by the misconduct of a government lawyer.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema caps an extraordinary week in the terror prosecution and means that Moussaoui's death penalty hearing will resume Monday in Alexandria. The proceeding had been imperiled by Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who violated a court order and improperly contacted witnesses.

"I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors . . . and I agree it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward to some final resolution," Brinkema said in a teleconference with case attorneys, according to a transcript.

The ruling amends an order Brinkema issued Tuesday that shook the sentencing hearing of the only person convicted in the United States on charges stemming from the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. Brinkema barred the testimony of seven witnesses contacted by Martin and banned all other aviation evidence. Immediately after the ruling, prosecutors said it might be pointless to continue, because such evidence is crucial to their case.

But the judge yesterday allowed the government to present aviation evidence through new witnesses untainted by any association with Martin. "We are pleased to be able to move forward with this important case on behalf of the thousands of victims and their families," said Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

The ruling allows the government to present a fuller version of its central argument for why Moussaoui should be executed: that if he had truthfully confessed his knowledge of the Sept. 11 plot, the attacks could have been prevented.

Although the government will continue its case, legal experts said the week's events still leave prosecutors in a tough spot. Martin had worked on the case since at least 2002 and had contact with aviation security experts throughout the government.

"They're going to need to scrounge around pretty hard and find some alternative evidence," said Paul Rothstein, who teaches national security at Georgetown University's law school. "The government is not entirely dead in the water. I think their plans for this case are severely damaged but salvageable."

Prosecutors are left to scramble to find new witnesses for a case they have been building for four years against Moussaoui, 37, who pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the attacks.

"We're working on it, your honor," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer said in the teleconference. He said the government probably will have one or two new witnesses available by late Tuesday or Wednesday.

As the case moved on without Martin, her conduct continued to reverberate yesterday. Moussaoui's attorneys are likely to try to get evidence of her actions before the jury, and yesterday they filed a motion asking Brinkema to summon Martin to court Monday to testify at a special hearing.

"Given the importance of understanding the extent of the taint and the critical impact Ms. Martin's actions have had on this case," the defense filing said, "it is imperative that before any additional 'untainted' aviation witnesses are permitted to testify, the extent of Ms. Martin's actions are explained by the only person in a position to know, Ms. Martin."

Prosecutors said they welcomed the opportunity to question Martin but only if her attorney guaranteed that she would not invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify.

Martin's attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., said he had sent a letter to the two sides and to Brinkema saying Martin would not testify Monday. He said she needs more time to assemble witnesses and documents in defense of her actions. "If she is going to be accused of committing a crime, we want the opportunity to put on a defense," Howard said. "We think it will take more than just her testifying."

Brinkema has not ruled on the defense motion for a hearing.

In e-mails to the seven witnesses, Martin was highly critical of the prosecution's argument that aviation officials could have kept the hijackers' knives from getting onto the planes, and defense attorneys might want jurors to hear of her doubts. But experts said it would be difficult for the defense to persuade Brinkema to allow evidence of Martin's conduct or e-mails. "It shouldn't come in, and I don't see how it would," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "It could poison the minds of the jury."

Jurors are under strict orders not to read news accounts of the trial, and Brinkema is likely to question them about that Monday. When she halted the sentencing hearing, after prosecutors alerted her to Martin's conduct, Brinkema told jurors that the issue involved the misconduct of a government lawyer not on the prosecution team.

Martin violated a standing court order by e-mailing trial transcripts to the seven witnesses and coaching them on their testimony. All those witnesses worked for the government and were experts on aviation security. They would have testified about the government's ability to have stopped the terror attacks had Moussaoui not lied to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001.

Brinkema had ruled earlier that most witnesses could not attend or follow the trial and could not read transcripts. After a hearing Tuesday, Brinkema barred the testimony of the seven witnesses and the aviation evidence. That evidence is key, because about half of the prosecution's case consists of showing that airport security would have been dramatically stepped up if Moussaoui had provided the information.

In her revised order yesterday, Brinkema denied a request from prosecutors that she restore all of the aviation evidence. But she accepted their suggestion that they be allowed to present other aviation witnesses who had no contact with Martin.

Brinkema also said prosecutors could call only aviation witnesses who would testify about what the government could have done to stop the attacks if Moussaoui had confessed his knowledge of the plot. She said the witnesses "may not, however, testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information, as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury."

Staff writer Keith L. Alexander contributed to this report.

Moussaoui Ruling Breathes Life Into Prosecution (LAT)

By Richard Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal judge in the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui refused today to reconsider her ruling banning testimony by aviation witnesses improperly influenced by a government attorney, but did allow prosecutors to use other airport security witnesses who were "untainted" by attorney Carla J. Martin.

With prosecutors unlikely to appeal the issue further, the judge's compromise appeared to put the troubled trial back on track when it is scheduled to resume before the jury Monday morning. But prosecutors will be working from a marked disadvantage, with much of the central part of their case stricken from the trial.

Prosecutors indicated they would use a single witness in place of the six who were improperly coached by government lawyer Martin, calling it an "imperfect" solution.

And U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema added another restriction: any such witness may only testify that aviation officials "could" have prevented the Sept. 11 terror attacks had Moussaoui cooperated with the FBI. She said they would not be allowed to back the prosecution's contention that the Al Qaeda hijackers "would" have been stopped at the airport.

This week, prosecutors said they would have had to abandon efforts to secure the death penalty for the 37-year-old French terrorist if they were not allowed to put on some aviation testimony.

In their opening statements March 6, prosecutors told the jury they would prove that security officials would have stopped the Sept. 11 hijackers at the airports had Moussaoui helped them after his arrest in August 2001.

Moussaoui last year pleaded guilty to plotting with the Sept. 11 hijackers. Jurors are now being asked to decide whether he should be sentenced to death or to life in prison. He was in jail when the attacks occurred, but the government contends that he was responsible for the loss of lives because he failed to alert the FBI to the plot.

The case came near to collapse Monday when the judge learned that Martin, a 15-year government attorney working for the Transportation Security Administration, had violated the court's order against sharing trial transcripts with witnesses and trying to shape their testimony.

Brinkema ordered all aviation witnesses and evidence stricken from the trial. Prosecutors asked her to reconsider, saying that they needed to put some aviation testimony before the jury in order to win a sentence of death for Moussaoui.

The sanction would leave prosecutors "with no way to show what the FBI could have done with information it had obtained about the hijackers. More important … the jury and the public will see only half the picture of what could have happened had the defendant told the truth," the government said.

Prosecutors proposed alternatives to an outright ban on aviation testimony and evidence, which the judge agreed to today. But she warned that the new witnesses "may not testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information" from Moussaoui, "as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury."

The government's new testimony and evidence centers on a "no transport" security directive, commonly called a "no fly list," that prosecutors said security officials would have put in place if they believed a Sept. 11-like attack was imminent.

"This evidence is simple, straightforward, and entirely uncontroversial, consisting mainly of FAA security directives issued over the years," the prosecutors said. "We would call one witness to explain what they are and how they are used to keep suspected terrorists from boarding commercial aircraft."

This, they said, "will allow us to present our complete theory of the case, albeit in imperfect form. We can then carry out our arguments from the FBI through to the FAA transport directive and present to the jury some semblance of what really could have happened had the defendant told the truth upon arrest."

They described this witness as someone who was "easily free of the specter of taint caused by Martin."

"We can readily call a witness who worked at the FAA during August 2001, and who had no contact with Ms. Martin during this prosecution," they said.

Moussaoui's defense attorneys had urged the judge to throw out the death penalty. They told the judge that allowing new, untainted witnesses would be unfair to the defense because Moussaoui's lawyers would not have enough time to investigate their claims and prepare to cross-examine them.

To that end, the judge ordered the government to give the defense the names of the new witnesses and the nature of their testimony at least three days before they are called to testify.

Martin awaits a hearing before the trial judge on possible civil or criminal contempt charges.

Moussaoui Ruling Salvages The Trial (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 18, 2006

The judge agreed to let "untainted" witnesses testify, saving enough of the prosecutors' case to resume trial Monday.

ALEXANDRIA, VA. - A federal judge put the death-penalty trial of confessed Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui back on track Friday, allowing prosecutors to present evidence "untainted" by a government lawyer's improper coaching of witnesses.

But District Judge Leonia Brinkema refused a request from prosecutors to entirely rescind an order earlier in the week barring aviation-related witnesses and evidence.

Brinkema's ruling appears to have allowed the government to salvage enough of its case for the trial to resume on Monday, after a week-long recess.

Prosecutors had told Brinkema their case would collapse without testimony from senior Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) security officials.

"I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors, that we have an excellent jury of 17," Brinkema told lawyers, according to a transcript of their conference call. "And I agree that it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward to some final resolution."

But defense lawyers promptly filed papers asking the judge to reopen an inquiry into Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla Martin's improper contacts with witnesses by calling Martin to testify next week so the full "extent of the taint" can be examined.

The aviation evidence is critical because prosecutors are seeking to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the FBI and FAA would have stopped the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks if Moussaoui had told what he knew about a suicide hijacking plot when he was arrested in the Twin Cities in August, 2001.

'Could,' not 'would'

In her two-page order, Brinkema stressed that the aviation witnesses may testify to what "could" have happened if Moussaoui had been truthful when interrogated in Minnesota.

"The witness, or witnesses, may not, however, testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information, as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury," the judge wrote.

The 17 jurors in the only U.S. criminal prosecution stemming from the terrorist attacks have heard no testimony this week because of the imbroglio over Martin's approaches to seven potential aviation-security witnesses.

During an extraordinary hearing Tuesday, six of the witnesses -- including four tabbed as hostile defense witnesses -- each testified that Martin sent them a transcript of the trial's first day. E-mails showed that she also made suggestions as to how they could adjust their testimony so it meshed better with lead prosecutor Robert Spencer's opening statement.

Brinkema ruled that the witnesses' testimony had been so "tainted" that they must be excluded to protect Moussaoui's constitutional rights.

She said the rights of the 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent also were violated because Martin advised prosecutors that the four government officials sought by the defense would not speak with defense attorneys, even though she had yet to check with them.

'Terribly excessive'

Prosecutors petitioned for reconsideration, arguing that the sanction was "terribly excessive," and came up with a compromise solution in which Brinkema would allow an FAA official who had no contact with Martin to testify as to how the agency's "no fly list" prevents suspected terrorists from boarding aircraft.

Defense lawyers responded that it is "difficult, if not impossible," to imagine that such an untainted witness exists and that "assurances that there is a rock at the FAA under which that person has been found should be greeted with the skepticism it plainly deserves."

Michael Mello, a University of Vermont law professor specializing in capital cases, said he questions whether prosecutors will find any "completely untainted" witnesses.

"If they've been following [the case] as closely as I have, they can't testify," he said. "If they've been reading daily newspapers and watching the news, they're going to know generally what's been happening in the trial, who's been saying what."

Defense lawyers also pointed to a federal law requiring that, in capital cases, the government must identify all witnesses at least three days before a trial begins. Brinkema's order requires the government to notify defense lawyers three days before any new aviation witness is called and to turn over new exhibits as soon as they are available.

Moussaoui Trial Opened To 'Untainted' Witnesses (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

A federal judge in the death penalty trial of admitted al Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui yesterday changed course and said the prosecutors can call "untainted" aviation specialists as witnesses, restoring a major part of the government's case.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema did not overturn her Wednesday ruling to bar witnesses coached by an outside lawyer, but granted prosecutors' request to offer new witnesses and evidence.

In her order, the judge said the new witnesses can only testify to what the U.S. government "could have done to prevent" the September 11 attacks had Moussaoui disclosed during his August 2001 arrest that he was training to attack U.S. targets with planes.

"The witness, or witnesses, may not, however, testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information, as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury," she said.

The ruling was a victory for prosecutors, who had considered abandoning their case when Judge Brinkema banned testimony from Federal Aviation Administration officials because they were given transcripts of the trial in violation of earlier court orders.

Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen of Moroccan descent, pleaded guilty in April to charges of conspiring with al Qaeda terrorists in the September 11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people. The penalty trial is to determine whether he should be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole or receive a lethal injection.

He denied being a part of the initial attack but said he was in training for a second wave of hijacked airplanes to slam into U.S. targets. In his plea, Moussaoui admitted knowing the 19 al Qaeda hijackers were going to fly aircraft into U.S. buildings.

Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who coached the witnesses, has since been placed on paid administrative leave from her $120,000-a-year job as an attorney adviser.

She has been threatened by the judge with criminal and civil contempt and has been labeled by prosecutors as a "miscreant," whose "aberrant and apparently criminal behavior should not be the basis for undoing the good work of so many."

Moussaoui's lawyers argued that it will be difficult to find any witness who has not been following the recent events in the trial.

"The existence of such a person is difficult, if not impossible to imagine and assurances that there is a rock at the FAA under which that person has been found should be greeted with the skepticism it plainly deserves," defense attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said.

In a separate motion, Mr. MacMahon said, "The government should not be given an end-run around its creation of a record simply too riddled with problems."

Judge Brinkema ordered the government to provide "the name or names of such untainted witnesses" to the defense no less than three days before they are to testify.

She also told prosecutors to hand over to defense counsel all appropriate information as well as untainted physical evidence as soon as it is available.

The trial is scheduled to resume at 9:30 a.m. Monday.

Judge Admits Evidence In Moussaoui Trial (KCS)

By Matthew Barakat And Michael J. Sniffen

The Kansas City Star, March 18, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. - The death-penalty trial of al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui is back on track after a judge reversed course and agreed to admit some evidence about aviation security.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema relented Friday from her earlier order barring all such testimony. She had issued that ruling Tuesday as punishment for the alleged misconduct of Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who coached witnesses.

"It would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward to some final resolution," Brinkema told trial attorneys in a telephone conference. Moussaoui is the only person charged in this country in connection with the al-Qaida terror network's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The trial, begun March 6 and suspended for a week to deal with the misconduct, is to resume Monday with the jury back in court.

Late Friday, Moussaoui's lawyers asked Brinkema to further investigate Martin on Monday before allowing any aviation testimony. Prosecutors agreed, if Martin is willing to testify. Brinkema gave no immediate response.

The judge accepted a compromise proposal by the government. It allows prosecutors to present limited testimony about what the government could have done to enhance aviation security before the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had not lied to FBI agents Aug. 16-17, 2001, about his al-Qaida membership and plans to crash a jetliner into the White House.

Prosecutors had told Brinkema their case would be gutted without at least some testimony on aviation security. While they disputed her ruling that the aviation security evidence was contaminated beyond repair by Martin, prosecutors suggested using a new, substitute witness and documents that Martin had no contact with.

Prosecutors said a substitute witness could be found who worked at the Federal Aviation Administration around Sept. 11 and could discuss how government used "no-fly" lists to bar specific terrorist suspects from airplanes.

The testimony is crucial because prosecutors must prove that Moussaoui's actions led directly to at least one death on Sept. 11 to obtain the death penalty. They argue that Moussaoui's lies about his true intentions prevented the FBI from identifying some hijackers in advance and prevented the FAA from taking airport security steps to keep them off airplanes.

Moussaoui's lawyers had urged Brinkema not to reconsider. They said federal law since 1790 has required that the defense be notified of the government's witnesses at least three days before trial in death-penalty cases. Allowing new witnesses mid-trial would leave them unprepared, the defense argued.

Brinkema acknowledged that substitute government witnesses would present problems for the defense, including finding rebuttal witnesses.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaida to crash airplanes into U.S. buildings. But Moussaoui denies any role in 9/11 and says he was training for a possible later attack on the White House. The current trial is to determine whether he is executed or spends life in prison.

A hearing Tuesday revealed that Martin sent current and former FAA employees a transcript of the trial's first day and coached them on how to testify about certain topics to deflect the kinds of attacks the defense mounted that day.

Judge In Moussaoui Trial Faces A Delicate Task (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Deciding when attorney who 'tainted' witnesses will testify while keeping jury intact are her foremost concerns.

WASHINGTON — With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when a government attorney would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses.

The coaching efforts by Carla J. Martin nearly shattered the prosecution's effort to have Moussaoui receive the death penalty for his role in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Defense lawyers want Martin on the stand as soon as Monday in the trial over whether Moussaoui, 37, should be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

Prosecutors want to delay Martin's appearance until the middle of the week and have her testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment against self-incrimination.

"We see no reason" to have Martin take the stand "simply to have [her] invoke her rights," prosecutor Robert A. Spencer said in court papers.

In the middle of the dispute is Judge Leonie M. Brinkema.

Clearly irked by the revelations about Martin early last week, Brinkema has made no secret of her view that the lawyer with the Transportation Security Administration may end up with criminal or civil sanctions for attempting to coach several witnesses.

But Brinkema also is trying to keep together a jury that has been left in the dark over the developments in the case — the only one to be tried in the U.S. that stems from the 2001 attacks.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to plotting with the hijackers. The government contends he should be put to death because he failed to alert the FBI to the plot, which resulted in the deaths of almost 3,000 people.

"I'm fully aware of how important it is for this matter to become resolved," the judge told the prosecution and defense teams in a teleconference session late Friday. "I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors, that we have an excellent jury of 17, and I agree that it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward …."

One week into the trial, Brinkema abruptly stopped it Monday when word surfaced that Martin had attempted to influence witnesses from the transportation agency and the Federal Aviation Administration. Martin briefly appeared in court on Tuesday but declined to testify and was excused until she could find legal representation.

Her newly hired lawyer, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., has since said she was eager to testify but needed some time to prepare.

"She is entitled to a fair opportunity to prepare and present her side and a fair judgment of her intentions, her conduct and the conduct of others," Howard said.

Brinkema first banned from the trial all testimony and evidence about aviation security because of Martin's action. But the judge scaled back her ruling Friday, allowing prosecutors to present one or two witnesses on the issue who were not "tainted" by Martin.

For prosecutors, that decision drew new breath into their case for the death penalty for Moussaoui.

They had told jurors they would prove that, had the French citizen cooperated with the FBI upon his arrest on an immigration violation in August 2001, the government would have tightened airport security across the country. Those measures, prosecutors said, could have prevented hijackers from making it onto the airplanes used in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning, which is where the trial left off when it was postponed.

He said she should be the next witness before the prosecution brought in any "untainted" witnesses on aviation security because her testimony would provide "critical information" about the nature of the witness-tampering effort.

Specter Eyes Oversight Of Spy Program (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced a bill this week to increase congressional oversight of President Bush's warrantless spy program and require a court review of the program for its constitutionality.

The Pennsylvania Republican said rule of law takes precedent even when the nation is at war with a new type of enemy capable of exploiting modern technology.

"Our enemy is the enemy of freedom, and we will not give that enemy the satisfaction of making us give up the very freedom we cherish," Mr. Specter said on the Senate floor.

Under Mr. Specter's bill, the administration would be required to present the program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, the federal panel charged by Congress with granting warrants for wiretaps for gathering foreign intelligence.

The bill also would require that the administration go before the FISA court to renew the program every 45 days. And every six months, an analysis of the program would be submitted to the chairmen and ranking members of the House and Senate intelligence committees.

Both Republicans and Democrats have accused Mr. Bush of circumventing federal law to spy on people in the U.S. The White House says the program has been used selectively and only on calls coming from numbers linked to terrorists from foreign countries.

Mr. Specter's bill comes after four other Republicans introduced a separate bill that would address the spy program.

A bill by Republican Sens. Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine would allow the National Security Agency to use warrantless wiretaps for up to 45 days.

At that point, the proposed legislation would require the Department of Justice to drop the surveillance, get a FISA warrant or seek a bypass from congressional leaders.

Among Democrats, only Sen. Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin has moved yet toward official action in response to the spy program. He introduced a resolution earlier this week to censure Mr. Bush.

While many Democrats have expressed interest in legislation to curb the spying, they haven't shown much support for Mr. Feingold's effort and have yet to introduce any bills.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking member of the Judiciary Committee, did write Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales asking for information about any defendants netted by the program who are challenging their cases in court.

"According to press accounts, several terrorism defendants have filed legal challenges to the President's program of electronic surveillance of Americans without a warrant," wrote Mr. Leahy and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

"The Judiciary Committee is continuing its inquiry into the President's 'Terrorist Surveillance Program,' and we ask that you send for our review a list of every criminal case in which a defendant is alleging that evidence was illegally obtained through this program ... ."

U.S. Lawyers Keep Silence On Listening In (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

Is the government secretly monitoring communications between plaintiffs and their lawyers in a federal class-action lawsuit against former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other top officials? Government lawyers yesterday politely refused a court order that they answer that question, asking instead that the court reconsider the order.

The plaintiffs in the case are Muslim immigrants who were swept up in the New York area after Sept. 11, 2001, detained for months and deported after being cleared of any links to terrorism.

Magistrate Judge Steven M. Gold of United States District Court in Brooklyn ordered the government on March 7 to guarantee in writing that neither the litigation team nor the potential witnesses — who include the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III — were aware of such eavesdropping, and that no such evidence would be used in the case.

But Stephen E. Handler of the Justice Department wrote in a filing yesterday that if knowledge of such activity were denied in one case, a refusal to confirm or deny it in another case "could itself tend to reveal classified information."

A legal scholar said the government's refusal raised new concerns about the scope of a program of electronic interceptions conducted without a warrant by National Security Agency inside and outside the United States under an executive order being challenged in a separate lawsuit.

"This is a pretty clear red flag" that eavesdropping occurred in the detainees' case, said Stephen J. Schulhofer, a professor of law at New York University who is an expert on national security. "The kind of surveillance that the president authorized under the N.S.A. wiretap was very likely deployed against these individuals when one party to the conversation was abroad and one party to the conversation, probably their lawyers, were in this country."

Rachel Meeropol, a lawyer for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the detainees, said she was shocked by the government's stance.

"The implication of this letter is that attorneys defending the United States in civil cases could have access to the confidential communication between their opponents and their opponents' clients," she said. "You can't ethically represent a client if you can't have a conversation with them where you're secure that your opponent can't hear it."

Pentagon Hired Contractor To Advise On Collecting Information On Churches, Mosques, Other U.S. Sites (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Pentagon intelligence agency that kept files on American anti-war activists hired one of the contractors who bribed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., to help it collect data on houses of worship, schools, power plants and other locations in the United States.

MZM Inc., headed by Mitchell Wade, also received three contracts totaling more than $250,000 to provide unspecified "intelligence services" to the White House, according to documents obtained by Knight Ridder. The White House didn't respond to an inquiry about what those intelligence services entailed.

MZM's Pentagon and White House deals were part of tens of millions of dollars in federal government business that Wade's company attracted beginning in 2002.

MZM and Wade, who pleaded guilty last month to bribing Cunningham and unnamed Defense Department officials to steer work to his firm, are the focus of ongoing probes by Pentagon and Department of Justice investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0019217

In February 2003, MZM won a two-month contract worth $503,144.70 to provide technical support to the Pentagon's Joint Counter-Intelligence Field Activity, or CIFA. The top-secret agency was created five months earlier primarily to protect U.S. defense personnel and facilities from foreign terrorists.

The job involved advising CIFA on selecting software and technology designed to ferret out commercial and government data that could be used in what's called a Geospatial Information System. A GIS system inserts information about geographic locations, such as buildings, into digital maps produced from satellite photographs.

According to a "statement of work," the data that CIFA was interested in obtaining included "maps, street addresses, lines of communication, critical infrastructure elements, demographic and other pertinent sources that would support geocoding and multi-level analysis."

Geocoding involves assigning latitudes and longitudes to locations, such as street addresses, so they can be displayed as points on maps. Such tools increasingly are being used by U.S. corporations and law enforcement agencies.

MZM was to "assist the government in identifying and procuring data" on maps, as well as "airports, ports, dams, churches/mosques/synagogues, schools (and) power plants," said the statement of work.

"In many cases, the government already owns such data, and for reasons of economy, government-owned data is preferred," said the statement. It isn't clear why U.S. intelligence agencies couldn't do the work themselves.

Navy Cmdr. Gregory Hicks, a Pentagon spokesman, said MZM began working on the project in October 2002, when the agency was created.

Its job was to help the agency integrate technology into its "information architecture to help CIFA use available (satellite) imagery, which is produced legally by other commercial and government agencies," Hicks said.

"GIS software ... is designed to allow integration of geographic and imagery data with threat information to provide complex analytic products," he said. "Not knowing the location of key infrastructure and points of interest, such as bridges, chemical plants, schools, parks, and even religious facilities, as they relate to threat information, could significantly affect the accuracy of such analysis and plans and lead to disastrous results."

He was unable to discuss further details of CIFA's dealings with MZM, citing the ongoing investigations into Wade's dealings with the Pentagon.

CIFA recently has come under fire following disclosures that it maintained information on individuals and groups involved in peaceful anti-war protests at defense facilities and recruiting offices.

The information was stored in a database that was supposed to be reserved for reports related to potential foreign terrorist activity.

In a March 8 letter to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., a senior Pentagon official said that a review of the Cornerstone database had identified 186 "protest-related reports" containing the names of 43 people that were mistakenly retained in the database.

"These reports have since been removed from the Cornerstone database and refresher training on intelligence oversight and database management is being given to all CI (counter-intelligence) and intelligence personnel," said the letter from Robert W. Rogalski, an acting deputy undersecretary of defense.

The disclosure that CIFA was storing information on anti-war activities added to concerns that the Bush administration may have used its war on terrorism to give government agencies expanded power to monitor Americans' finances, associations, travel and other activities.

The administration's domestic eavesdropping program and FBI monitoring of environmental, animal rights and anti-war groups have also fueled such fears. The administration contends that its programs are legal and insists that they're designed to ensure civil liberties while protecting national security.

A Washington Post story last year contained a brief reference to the White House contracts in a report on the company's dealings with the Pentagon.

Wade, who faces up to 20 years in prison, was one of four men charged in the Cunningham case. Cunningham, who resigned from Congress in November after serving for 15 years, was sentenced to eight years and four months in prison earlier this month.

DOJ_NMG_0019218

Foreign Firms A Mainstay Of Pentagon Contracting (WP)

By Ellen Mccarthy

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Edward Nadworny's bosses at CGI Group Inc. are just up the road in Montreal, but to the U.S. government he still works for a foreign company, which means logging every phone call to Canada, submitting his e-mails for audits, and being supervised by a local board whose members have been approved by the Defense Department.

If he and his colleagues from other parts of the company chat about work at happy hour, they must tell a Pentagon-approved security officer what they discussed. It's inconvenient but a fact of life for the dozens of foreign-owned companies authorized to do high-level security work for the U.S. government.

"I log my calls more frequently than I do my expenses. . . . It's just a way of doing business," says Nadworny, who runs CGI Federal, a subsidiary of the Canadian firm that was set up to win software and other information technology contracts with the U.S. government.

As politicians battled in recent weeks over a Dubai firm's plan to take control of a company that operates U.S. ports, the fight stood in relief to a reality that local government contractors know well: Foreign-owned companies already help manage some of the nation's most sensitive business, working on classified weapons and information programs and dealing daily with government secrets.

At least 98 foreign-owned firms like CGI have agreements with the Pentagon that allow them access to classified government programs, up from 58 a decade ago, according to the Defense Security Service, the office of the Pentagon that oversees companies that do classified work. With joint defense projects among allies common, and the need for the best technology ever more acute, contracting experts say they expect the trend to continue.

"We're in a global technology environment," said Stan Z. Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, a government contracting industry group that includes foreign-owned companies like BAE Systems Inc.

An Italian-owned firm is designing the president's new helicopter; a Paris-owned firm is making the new radios for U.S. Special Operations Forces; at the Chesapeake Innovation Center, an Annapolis incubator for homeland security companies that counts the National Security Agency among its partners, five of the 24 companies it has assisted were based overseas.

"Some of our allies have had more extensive experience in homeland security than the United States," said Mark Sauter, the incubator's chief operating officer. "We can't afford to get into a 'not invented here,' mindset."

The Defense Security Service would not release the names of the foreign-owned companies with access to classified information, though many, like BAE, are well known. But the agency did provide a list of their 18 home nations. The list includes nine nations that are part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, such as France and Britain; all but four -- Australia, Bermuda, Israel and Singapore -- are European.

That in itself indicates a certain caution concerning which companies can get access to sensitive data, said Steve Schooner, a professor of government contracting law at George Washington University Law School.

"The bottom line is: Who are you willing to share your technology with?" Schooner said. "For more developed countries, we have more expectation for rule of law, respect for classified information."

Despite the comparative openness of the U.S. economy -- overseas investors own buildings and businesses throughout the country -- foreign involvement can touch a nerve. The Dubai port deal was ultimately scuttled over security concerns. The purchase of International Business Machine Corp.'s personal computer division by Chinese firm Lenovo Group Ltd. was put through a national security review before being approved. Locally, an Israeli company's proposed takeover of Columbia-based computer security firm Sourcefire Inc. has triggered a review because of Sourcefire's contracts with intelligence agencies.

Foreign-owned or controlled companies that work with classified information are subject to a special set of rules. The firms must set up U.S. subsidiaries with separate boards that include members approved by the Defense Department. The subsidiaries must have their own e-mail systems and network servers and must fully document communications with employees of the parent company -- hence Nadworny's phone logs.

U.S. citizens must be involved in key roles and are the only individuals who can be cleared to have access to classified material, a fact Pentagon officials consider an important protection.

A report published by the Government Accountability Office last July, however, found the system lacking -- understaffed, too dependent on self-reporting by companies, and unable to fully track foreign involvement with high-security U.S. contractors. In one instance, the GAO found that a foreign-owned company had access to classified information for six months before proper safeguards were in place. In another, the GAO found that Pentagon officials were unaware that a company had hired a foreign national as its president until someone spotted the fact on a Web site nine months later.

"Just think of the magnitude, the complexity, of monitoring what 96 companies are doing with access to classified information. Just the potential for letting something slip or get in the way is hugely magnified," said Rep. John Barrow (D-Ga.), a critic of the Dubai ports deal.

Defense Department officials and contracting experts defended the current system.

In a written response to the GAO, Carol A. Haave, deputy undersecretary of defense for counterintelligence and security, said that defense officials vet foreign involvement in contractors carefully, but also keep in mind issues like the "nature and source" of the foreign involvement, the sensitivity of the information, and "the relationship of the foreign source's government with our government."

"If there is any indication of risk to classified information . . . appropriate action is taken."

David Dempsey, a partner with Holland & Knight LLP who helps foreign companies navigate Pentagon regulations, said it can take up to nine months and cost as much as $600,000 to comply. But, he added, the system seems to work.

"I have never seen an intentional breach and I have never seen a serious breach," of security rules, Dempsey said.

Mideast Wrangle May Hit New Port Sale (FT)

By Robert Wright

Financial Times, March 18, 2006

SSA Marine, the largest US-based container terminal operator, has taken on Citigroup to advise on a possible sale in a move that could reignite controversy about the ownership of US port operations.

According to banking and industry sources, other terminal operators have been asked whether they would be interested in purchasing the company, which is based in Seattle and has a powerful position on the US west coast, in Latin America and New Zealand.

The privately held company, which unsuccessfully explored a sale in 2003, is understood to have started re-examining the potential for a sale after Dubai's DP World agreed to pay £3.92bn ($6.85bn) – more than 15 times forecast ebitda – for P&O, the UK container terminals and ferries operator.

Citigroup is understood to be managing the process. It has regularly done work before for SSA and also successfully represented P&O during its sale.

However, any sale could face complications after the controversy over DP World's takeover of P&O's US operations. DP World was last week forced to agree to sell P&O's interests in five US container terminals and other cargo and passenger-handling operations after widespread political protest at the takeover by a state-owned Arab company.

The controversy is understood to be deterring some of the world's largest terminal operators from looking at SSA's US assets.

Among the companies that could face problems is Singapore's PSA, the world number three container terminal operator by throughput. It looks unlikely to pursue SSA because PSA is owned by Temasek, the Singapore government's investment company. During the campaign against DP World's takeover of P&O, critics said it involved a foreign government gaining a presence in US ports.

The controversy could also deter Hong Kong's Hutchison Ports, the world number one. Although Hutchison Whampoa, Hutchison Ports' parent, is a private sector, publicly-listed company, Hutchison is mistrusted on the US nationalist right, which dislikes the alleged links of Li Ka-Shing, the largest shareholder, with the Chinese authorities.

Neither SSA Marine nor Citigroup would comment.

It could prove harder to sell SSA's US assets than its international business since foreign buyers are likely to shy away from entering the market and few domestic operators are large enough to make the purchase.

DOJ_NMG_0019220

Unnamed Source Told FBI He Saw Alleged Terrorists In Lodi (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 18, 2006

Osama bin Laden's right-hand man isn't the only Taliban member alleged to have once visited Lodi. An FBI "source who is in a position to testify" told agents that he had seen two wanted terrorists visiting the Lodi Muslim Mosque and raising funds in 1999, according to federal court documents filed late Thursday night.

The reports do not name the source, but government prosecutors earlier Thursday told a judge that the information pertained to the testimony of informant Naseem Khan. The 32-year-old, who has paid by the FBI to infiltrate Lodi's Muslim community, has been one of the key witnesses in the case against two Lodi men on trial for alleged terror links.

Umer Hayat, 48, and his 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat, are on trial in Sacramento, accused of lying to FBI agents about their alleged knowledge of terror training camps in Pakistan. The younger Hayat is also charged with providing support to terrorists by attending a camp. Both have pleaded not guilty.

Ahmed Ali

Part of the case is built on secretly recorded conversations between Hamid Hayat and Khan, who began working in Lodi in December 2001 and befriended the younger Hayat in summer 2002.

Earlier this week, Khan testified that he had seen Ayman al-Zawahri — second-in-command of al-Qaida and bin Laden's spokesman and physician — coming and going from the Lodi mosque in 1998 and 1999.

In the FBI reports, parts of which were blacked out, agents summarized accounts given them by the source. On Nov. 15, 2001, the source told agents that al-Zawahri was seen with two fellow Taliban members in Lodi in December 1999:

• Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser was indicted in June 2001 in the Eastern District of Virginia for the June 25, 1996, bombing of the Khobar Towers military housing building in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia. A total of 19 U.S. troops and one Saudi died, and another 372 were injured.

• Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali was indicted in December 2000 in the Southern District of New York in relation to the Aug. 7, 1998, bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya, Tanzania and Dar es Salaam. The simultaneous attacks killed more than 200 people and injured at least 4,000. Four men were convicted in May 2001, while others, including Ali, remain at large.

The FBI's source identified the men just five weeks after President Bush and the nation's top leaders announced the formation of the FBI's "Most Wanted Terrorists" list, featuring photos and rewards of 22 terrorists sought by the U.S.

All three men remain on the list. A $25 million reward has been offered for the capture of al-Zawahri (sometimes spelled al-Zawahiri), and $5 million rewards are offered for the other two men.

The FBI reports were made public in a filing by the Hayats' defense attorneys, who want to see the whole reports before Khan resumes the witness stand Tuesday.

Johnny Griffin III, Umer Hayat's attorney, said al-Zawahri was not in Lodi at the times Khan alleged he was, but that he is still investigating the claims about the two additional men who were named. That, he said, is why he needs to see the entire FBI reports.

"I don't want to make assumptions as to the validity of these assertions without knowing the context to which they were made, and whether he was speculating or had knowledge to support it," Griffin said.

Griffin and Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents Hamid Hayat, said in their legal motion that they are entitled to receive the full reports because the information could prove whether Khan is a credible source.

One potential flaw in his story was apparent in the FBI reports: Khan previously testified in court that he began working in Lodi in December 2001. But the FBI reports pertain to dates in November of that year.

In several reports, mention is made of Taliban members who were soliciting funds in Lodi, Stockton and Yuba City. In Lodi, they were seen several times walking between a Central Avenue house and the mosque on Poplar Street.

Lodi Muslims deny that the Taliban members stayed in Lodi. FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst said Friday that she could not comment because it's an ongoing investigation and the matter is in trial.

Witness Outlines Ties To Terror (STOCKREC)

By Jeff Hood, Lodi Bureau Chief

Stockton Record, March 18, 2006

Informant calls Lodi a haven for extremists

LODI - A paid FBI informant told agents as early as October 2001 that Lodi was a haven for Muslim extremists, saying he had seen three of the agency's most-wanted terrorists here in late 1999.

The name of Naseem Khan, the government's key witness in the trial of two Lodi men charged with terrorism-related crimes, does not appear in the heavily censored FBI reports defense attorneys attached to a court filing late Thursday. But prosecutors handed over the documents in response to defense attorneys' demands for information relating to Khan, who is expected to return to the witness stand Tuesday.

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents accused terrorist-in-waiting Hamid Hayat, wants those blacked-out portions revealed. U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. will hear arguments on the matter Monday.

Khan testified Monday that he saw Ayman al-Zawahri - al-Qaida's second-in-command - in Lodi in 1998 and 1999. According to the newly filed papers, Khan told an Oregon-based FBI agent on Oct. 26, 2001, that he saw al-Zawahri in Lodi in 1999. Khan also told the agent that two other terrorists visited the Lodi mosque while he was there: Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser, a Saudi man indicted by a Virginia grand jury for the 1996 bombing of a military housing complex in Saudi Arabia that left 19 U.S. servicemen dead; and Ahmed Mohammad Hamed Ali, an Egyptian wanted in connection with the U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

The FBI's Web page states Ali fled to Pakistan from Kenya on Aug. 2, 1998, five days before the bombings.

Khan also told the FBI that the men - whose names were on a list of the FBI's 22 most-wanted terrorists - visited mosques in Stockton, Yuba City and the Sutter County city of Live Oak in 1999.

Hameed Khan, past president of the Islamic Center of Live Oak's board of directors and a Gridley police detective, dismissed the informant's story.

"I can assure you no one visited," said Hameed Khan, who said he was one of the Live Oak mosque's founders in 1989. "This is the kind of stuff that really upsets me. I'd like to confront this guy. If he's going to be bringing our mosque into this, I'd like to ask him some questions myself."

Likewise, Lodi Muslims say the claims are preposterous and that Naseem Khan needlessly hurt their community.

Naseem Khan testified in Sacramento's U.S. District Court on Feb. 22 that the FBI approached him in Oregon roughly two weeks after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, and asked for his help. Khan, a native of Pakistan who lived in the Lodi area in the late 1990s, told the FBI the following month he believed the owners of ethnic markets in Lodi and Stockton were laundering money for terrorist organizations in the Middle East and that the terrorists had met with top mosque officials.

One of those mosque officials, who asked not to be identified because he fears for his safety, said he figures that's why the FBI wanted to interview him last year, but agents turned down his offer to speak with an attorney present.

The man, who works for a company with government contracts, said Naseem Khan was "making up stories" to land a job with the FBI. The informant, who until then held myriad jobs at fast-food restaurants and convenience stores, was paid more than $200,000 in salary and reimbursements after being hired in November 2001.

"We're going to rely on people who are lying through their teeth to the FBI, and that's supposed to be preventing terrorism?" the Lodi man said. "Come on."

Another Lodi man also said that Muslims in the community have destroyed religious books and pamphlets out of fear the government could consider it incriminating evidence. A government witness testified this week that a prayer found in Hayat's wallet shows he was on a mission to wage a holy war against Islam's enemies, including the United States.

"I know people are concerned the government was trying to prosecute Hamid Hayat for a prayer that's commonly recited," said Basim Elkarra, director of the Council for American-Islamic Relations' Sacramento-based chapter. "Fellow Americans in Lodi are freaked out."

Hayat was indicted by a federal grand jury on a charge of supporting terrorism by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004, and on three charges of lying to the FBI. His father, Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream vendor, faces two charges of lying to federal agents.

LODI Muslims Skeptical About FBI's Informant They Say They'd Know If Terror Suspects Visited (SFC)

By Jim Herron Zamora, Mark Martin, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

Lodi -- An FBI informant's claims that three of the world's most-wanted terrorism suspects passed through town in recent years are outrageous and could damage the federal government's case against two local men, residents and legal experts said Friday.

Members of the city's Islamic community said they had never seen any of the notorious suspects at their mosque or anywhere else, and questioned why federal agents didn't talk to them.

"I think the FBI should rely on more-reliable informants," Mohammed Shoaib said Friday during a prayer session at the yellow ranch-style home that has been converted to a mosque. "I am an American citizen, and I love this country. They never talked to me."

Shoaib, a Pakistani who has lived in Lodi since 1978, has been president of the mosque for the last two years.

In a report filed in federal court Thursday night, the FBI revealed that the man who became the key informant in the Lodi prosecution told investigators in 2001 that he saw Osama bin Laden's chief deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, in Lodi in 1999.

The informant, Naseem Khan, also recalled seeing Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser, a suspect in the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers military housing complex in Saudi Arabia, in Lodi. And he said he had seen Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, a suspect in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, in Stockton in 1999.

Khan, 32, is the key witness against Hamid Hayat, a 23-year-old Lodi man accused of supporting terrorism by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003. Hayat is on trial in U.S. District Court in Sacramento along with his father, who is charged with lying about his son's alleged camp attendance.

The informant's claims run counter to other federal government reports that all three of the wanted terrorists were outside the United States at that time. Khan made the assertions in November 2001 in a series of interviews with the FBI in Bend, Ore. At the time, Khan identified several of the high-profile terrorists based on photographs from their FBI most-wanted posters, the FBI report states.

It is unclear whether the FBI deemed the reports credible at the time, but the government sent Khan, a former fast-food worker who has earned about $250,000 as a paid government informant, back to Lodi to collect information on possible terrorist cells in the valley town's small Islamic community.

The FBI interview documents were released in a heavily redacted version after Khan testified Monday that he had seen al-Zawahiri, whom the FBI calls Osama bin Laden's personal physician and second in command, in Lodi in 1999.

FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst declined to comment on the case on Friday.

But Lodi residents brushed off Khan's claims that wanted terrorists had stopped there.

"The whole community is dumbfounded as to what's going on with this," said Nasim Khan, who was the Lodi mosque's leader from 1998 to 2000 and is no relation to the government informant. "Everything that is coming out, there's no basis into it."

They said all three of the terror suspects, from Arab countries, would have stood out in the tight-knit Muslim community, which includes many Pakistanis and South Asians. The most prominent of the three, al-Zawahiri, is an Egyptian. "A majority of the congregation at the mosque is Pakistani," said Shoaib, the mosque leader. "There's only a half-dozen or so of Arab descent. If he came in on a regular basis, people would remember him. It's a ridiculous claim."

Former prosecutors and veteran defense attorneys said the revelations could cause problems for the federal government if the jury feels that Khan's credibility is an issue.

"The government has a really difficult time getting people who are both in the radical Islamic community and reliable," said Kendall Coffey, the former U.S. attorney in South Florida. "Usually people like this don't come to the government voluntarily, and usually they don't come totally clean. It takes a thief to know a thief."

But Coffey and defense lawyer James Brosnahan said the government may be able to counter any credibility problems with Khan if corroborating evidence against the Hayats, including FBI interviews with them, is strong.

"If a witness has a problem with truthfulness, the question is where is the corroboration," said Brosnahan, who defended John Walker Lindh, the so-called American Taliban, among other high-profile cases. "In drug cases, you often have terrible (prosecution) witnesses, but if there is corroboration in the form of tapes or photographs, these are things that can really sway a jury. "

Much of the prosecution's case against the Hayats is based on secretly recorded conversations they had with Khan and videotaped interviews with the FBI.

In his 2001 FBI interview, Khan also accused the owner of a Lodi store that sells Indian spices and the owner of a market in Lodi of raising and laundering money for terrorist organizations.

The owner of the Pak-India Spices grocery store declined to be interviewed Friday, but one of his cashiers summed up the feeling that many have about Naseem Khan.

"If the FBI gave me half the money they gave him, I'd tell them all kinds of crazy stories, too," said Mumtaz Khan, 58.

Chronicle staff writer Demian Bulwa contributed to this report. E-mail Jim Zamora at jzamora@sfchronicle.com and Mark Martin at markmartin@fchronicle.com.

Page B - 1

Attorney Seeks Data On Inmate Privacy (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), March 18, 2006

Prison recording policy in question

An attorney for accused terrorist Mohammad Zaki Amawi has asked a federal judge for assurances that the government will not be recording his conversations with his client.

Dennis Terez, a public defender appointed to represent Mr. Amawi, filed a motion yesterday in U.S. District Court in Toledo asking for comprehensive information about federal agents' use of monitoring attorney-client communications.

Judge James Carr has scheduled a pretrial hearing in the case for April 10.

Mr. Amawi and two other men, Wassim I. Mazloum and Marwan Othman El-Hindi, are accused of plotting to support the killing or injuring of people in the Middle East. The Toledo area men are being held in a federal prison in Milan, Mich.

Mr. Amawi is also accused of threatening to kill or inflict harm on President Bush.

The assistant U.S. attorneys who are handling the case have provided the attorneys for the defendants with the policy that the U.S. Bureau of Prison uses for recording conversations between attorneys and inmates, both in person while in prison and in phone communications.

But Mr. Terez said the government's response was insufficient and doesn't provide enough detail on what could be recorded. He wants the government to provide "confirmation and clarification" to the court as to what, if any, attorney-client discussions would be monitored.

Stephen Hartman and Jeff Helmick, the respective attorneys for Mr. El-Hindi and Mr. Mazloum, said they plan to file similar motions on behalf of their clients very soon.

"We will be joining in that request [today]," Mr. Hartman said.

Also yesterday, Mr. Hartman and his co-counsel, Charles Boss, filed an initial request asking the government to release the evidence it has on their client.

Bond Denied To Boca Doctor In Terrorism Case (MH)

By Evan S. Benn

The Miami Herald, March 18, 2006

A federal judge on Friday denied a bond request from a Boca Raton doctor accused of pledging an oath of loyalty to al Qaeda.

Dr. Rafiq A. Sabir, 51, will continue to be held in solitary confinement in a New York prison until his trial on charges of conspiring to support Osama bin Laden's terrorist network.

U.S. District Judge Loretta Preska made the ruling at a pretrial hearing Friday in New York after Sabir's attorney asked for his client to be released on bond, according to a spokeswoman at the U.S. Attorney's Office.

HOME SEARCH

Sabir was arrested at his Palm Beach County home last May, days after investigators claim he recited an oath of loyalty in front of an undercover FBI agent.

Prosecutors said a search of Sabir's home after his arrest revealed charred pages of Arabic writing in a backyard grill. Agents also found swords and other martial-arts equipment in his home.

But Sabir's lawyers said at the time that the writing found in the grill may have been from the Koran, Islam's holy book.

Burning tattered or worn pages of the Koran is an acceptable method of disposal, according to Islamic tradition.

And Sabir's defense counsel has said the oath he uttered was a bayat, a traditional and spiritual Islamic oath, and that he did not state or imply a desire to harm Americans.

Also charged with Sabir are Tarik Shah, 42, a jazz musician and martial-arts instructor from Bronx, N.Y.; Abdulrahman Farhane, 51, a bookstore owner from Brooklyn, N.Y.; and Mahmud Brent, 31, a cab driver from Washington, D.C.

FOUR DEFENDANTS

Prosecutors said Shah and Sabir promised to use their skills in martial arts and medicine to train and treat jihadist fighters.

Farhane allegedly discussed a plan with Shah in December 2001 to send money to terrorist fighters in Afghanistan so they could hurt U.S. troops.

Brent is accused of conspiring to support Lashkar-e-Taiba, a Pakistani-based terror group.

The four defendants, all U.S. citizens who are Muslim, have pleaded not guilty to the charges.

They are being held without bail in federal custody and face up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

On Friday, Preska set a date for the defendants' attorneys to file pretrial motions.

The four will return to her court on Oct. 30 for their next hearing.

Was Indictment Misleading? (SPT)

By MEG LAUGHLIN

St. Petersburg Times, March 18, 2006

When the government charged Sameeh Hammoudeh with terrorism-related activities, it used transcripts from wiretaps that may have been unfairly edited.

On that chilly day three years ago when Hammoudeh was arrested, two FBI agents handcuffed him and drove him to FBI headquarters for questioning. Hammoudeh said the agents told him he was not their target, but that they wanted him to aid their investigation. They asked him to provide information about how he helped Sami Al-Arian, a former professor at the University of South Florida, get money to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad after 1994.

The U.S. government has designated the PIJ a terrorist organization. The group has claimed responsibility for the deaths of hundreds of people in Israel and the occupied territories.

In 1995, it became illegal for people in the United States to provide funds, goods or services to the organization. Because Hammoudeh worked with Al-Arian, prosecutors focused on money Hammoudeh was sending to the occupied territories, in an attempt to link Al-Arian to the PIJ after 1994. Hammoudeh's indictment accused him of "transferring monies and funds . . . for the purpose of promoting PIJ activities."

Summaries of the wiretapped conversations that the government used to justify this accusation seem to undercut the charges.

Here are three excerpts, chosen from more than a dozen similar examples in the indictment, that show what the government chose to include from the tech cuts in building a case that Hammoudeh's activities are linked to the PIJ:

From the indictment: "On Dec. 20, 1999, defendant Sameeh Hammoudeh used his residence telephone line to call his father, who is in the occupied territories of Israel. In this conversation, Sameeh Hammoudeh indicated to his father that he raised some money and will be receiving more. He also told his father he will be sending him $1,000 to distribute."

From the FBI tech cut, the source for this Dec. 20, 1999, conversation: "Sameeh told his father, "I would like you to spend, give a thousand and when I get someone traveling to the homeland I will send it to you with him.'"

DOJ_NMG_0019225

"His father said he would "distribute it to the people or give it to the Kaffiat,'" believed to be an institution for the blind and/or disabled in the area.

Hammoudeh replied: "There are orphans in the Family Welfare Organization. Give them. They are also an institution."

A second example from the indictment: "On or about Dec. 29, 1999, Sameeh Hammoudeh called his father who was overseas. Sameeh Hammoudeh asked his father to distribute money, and Sameeh Hammoudeh said he would reimburse him by sending money overseas via courier."

From the tech cut of this same Dec. 29, 1999, conversation: "Hammoudeh asked his father to give the funds to those in need, especially the orphans. His father said that he will give it to the orphans, the family sponsorship society and the disable (sic) and/or blind society."

A third example from the indictment: "On or about Feb. 22, 1995, . . . Sameeh Hammoudeh . . . received a facsimile at WISE (a think tank where he worked that was created by Al-Arian and affiliated with the University of South Florida) . . . from Fathi Shikaki (the head of the PIJ in Damascus, Syria)." From the tech cuts: The receiving phone number is (813) 989-xxxx.

According to the tech cut index, that was the phone number for the Tampa home of Ramadan Shallah, who also worked at WISE. The PIJ faxes were not sent to WISE or to Sameeh Hammoudeh. They were sent from PIJ headquarters to Shallah's home. (Editor's note: We have omitted the last four digits because the number is no longer issued to Shallah, and may belong to someone else.)

Shallah worked at WISE until May 1995. He left Florida and became the leader of the PIJ in October 1995 in Syria after the death of Shikaki.

A year and a half after Hammoudeh was arrested, prosecutors acknowledged the phone number in the faxes was Shallah's and dropped the eight counts associated with the error. But the misinformation, contradicted by the tech cuts, was among the justifications used for arresting Hammoudeh.

Federal prosecutors declined to comment on repeated contradictions between information in the indictment and the tech cuts, the source material for the indictment. But former FBI agent and federal prosecutor Todd Foster didn't.

Foster, now a Tampa criminal defense attorney, was part of the defense team in a high-profile 1997 case, which, like the case against Hammoudeh, was built on secret surveillance of the defendants' conversations.

In the Aisenberg case, a Valrico couple reported their baby girl, Sabrina, missing. Hillsborough County sheriff's investigators planted secret listening devices in the couple's home and based the indictment on their conversations. But a federal judge said many of the surveillance tapes were largely inaudible, and that investigators had misled authorities about what they contained in order to justify arresting the parents. The case crumbled.

Foster called the Aisenberg case "a shocking example of how wiretap information in an indictment can be full of missing statements, statements taken out of context and false statements."

He said, however, that he doesn't think such distortions are common: "But when it happens rarely, that's too often. Whether reckless or deliberate, it's wrong."

Wednesday, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer brought papers to Hammoudeh's cell at the Manatee County Jail. They said, "ICE has made the decision to continue your detention."

Federal prosecutors have a Monday deadline to file documents explaining why. Wednesday, U.S. District Judge James Whittemore will preside over a habeas corpus hearing for Hammoudeh, where his attorneys will argue that his continued incarceration is unconstitutional.

"I am hopeful," Hammoudeh said. "I can't say why after this long nightmare. But I am."

Gov't: Some Gitmo Cases Should Be Scuttled (AP)

AP, March 18, 2006

The Bush administration argued Friday that a newly enacted law wipes out hundreds of pending court cases by detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who are challenging their confinement.

In papers filed with a federal appeals court, the Justice Department said the Detainee Treatment Act signed by President Bush on Dec. 30 restricts detainees' rights to reviews by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia.

DOJ_NMG_0019226

The reviews are limited, said the Justice Department, to the question of whether the detainees have been correctly categorized by the U.S. military as enemy combatants.

The enemy combatant designation enables the U.S. military to hold the detainees indefinitely.

Lawyers for the detainees say the new law does not cover pre-existing cases filed in U.S. District Courts, which deal with a wide range of issues, from allegations of prisoner abuse to assertions that detainees have no ties to terrorism and should be released.

Set up more than four years ago after the war in Afghanistan, the Guantanamo Bay prison camp is holding some 500 detainees. Some have been there since the facility opened.

In 2004, the Supreme Court said the detainees were entitled to file petitions in the federal court system, resulting in more than 200 cases covering over 300 detainees.

At issue is the legislative intent of the Detainee Treatment Act, a compromise reached among Sens. Carl Levin, D-Mich., Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz.

Lawyers for the detainees and Levin say the new law does not cover pending cases. Graham, Kyl and the Bush administration insist that it does.

Mosque Material Ordered Released (ALBTU)

By BRENDAN LYONS, Staff writer

Albany Times-Union, March 18, 2006

Judge says Justice Department must turn over certain classified data to defendants' attorneys

ALBANY -- A federal judge has ordered the Justice Department to turn over certain classified materials to attorneys for two members of an Albany mosque who were ensnared in an FBI counterterrorism sting.

The judge's ruling allows prosecutors to withhold some of their top-secret files in the case, and it's not clear what information will be disclosed or how soon it might become public.

The information may provide more details on why the FBI launched a sting three years ago that targeted Yassin Aref, a 35-year-old Kurdish refugee who is being held in jail without bond while awaiting trial on terrorism-related charges.

Federal prosecutors have the option of appealing the order issued late Thursday by U.S. District Court Judge Thomas J. McAvoy, but said they won't.

McAvoy's decision comes after more than 20 meetings between the judge and federal prosecutors in which they had haggled, in private, about what classified information the government must disclose so the men can defend themselves at trial.

"The government intends to comply with the court's order," said Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak.

Aref's attorney, Terence L. Kindlon, said he can't react to the order until he sees the materials.

It's possible the classified information could provide more background on Aref's alleged ties to overseas terrorist figures that U.S. authorities have said made him a target in the first place.

Aref and Mohammed Hossain, an Albany pizza shop owner, are accused of taking part in a plot to make money from the sale of missile launchers to terrorists. The plot was not real and was created by the FBI, which used an informant to allegedly lure the men into the deal.

Kevin Luibrand, Hossain's attorney, also reserved judgment on the significance of the judge's disclosure order, which comes 18 months after he first requested access to classified materials in the case.

"It would be a guess for us to determine now if they materials they do provide would be helpful," he said.

Federal authorities have long acknowledged that Aref was the "ultimate target" of their investigation, although they have not said why. Two months before the sting was launched, in the summer of 2003, Aref's name, phone number and Albany address were found in a notebook recovered from a bombed-out Iraqi encampment the government contends was occupied by terrorists.

Since then, prosecutors have filed motions accusing Aref of having ties to terrorist organizations in Iraq. But Aref disputes that and his attorney said the assertions were based almost entirely on entries in Aref's personal journal in which he'd recorded meetings with people he'd met, including some the U.S. government labels terrorists.

Officials have not made any similar charges against Hossain.

No timetable was set for when the classified materials must be turned over to the defense.

Brendan Lyons can be reached at 454-5547 or by e-mail at blyons@timesunion.com.

U.S., Pakistan's Strategic Interests Are Converging (WSJ)

By Mansoor Suhail

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Mahnaz Ispahani's March 3 editorial-page commentary "Our Man in Pakistan" is based on wrong assumptions and analysis, but, paradoxically, draws the right conclusion: The U.S. must remain engaged with Pakistan. President Pervez Musharraf's government's cooperation with the U.S. is based on the convergence of Pakistan-U.S. interests both tactical and strategic.

Pakistan is in the frontline of the war on terrorism. More than 600 al Qaeda terrorists have been killed or captured by Pakistan. Success will require Pakistan's continued cooperation. Peace in Afghanistan is threatened not so much by border infiltration as the efforts of some anti-Pakistan elements in Kabul to deny power to the Pashtuns and to blame Pakistan for their failure to control security in Afghanistan.

As Mr. Musharraf and President Bush have agreed, success against terrorism and extremism requires a comprehensive strategy. Pakistan is pursuing a strategy whose aim is to create a modern, democratic Islamic state. This will have a pervasive and positive impact on the entire Islamic world and help improve Washington's strained relations with Muslims.

The U.S. also needs nuclear Pakistan's cooperation to prevent proliferation and ensure peace in South Asia, which is essential to realize U.S. commercial and strategic goals in the region.

Pakistan's economic potential should not be discounted. Pakistan is the second fastest growing economy in Asia; its trade and investment regime is among the most liberal; per-capita foreign investment is much higher than India's. And Pakistan can become the economic hub of three emerging dynamic regions - South Asia, Central Asia and West Asia.

Mansoor Suhail

Minister (Press)

Pakistan Mission to the U.N.

New York

The Mayor And The Imam (NYT)

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

When a government employee says "the greatest terrorists in the world occupy the White House," he is bound to raise some hackles, but should it be a dismissible offense? The chief chaplain for the New York City Corrections Department, Imam Umar Abdul-Jalil, made that remark in a speech last year in Tucson before a group of Muslim students. For good measure, he also took a shot at "Zionists of the media." What made the case seminal was Mayor Michael Bloomberg's response. He arrived at a Solomonic solution and, in the process, also found his voice on an issue that has challenged his administration in the past: free speech.

In an unexpectedly stirring defense of First Amendment rights, Mr. Bloomberg took wide-ranging swipes at the right and the left for stifling the airing of unpopular or offensive opinions. He stood up for immigrants, the free press, fair elections and justice. He rang the bell for intellectual freedom and for the right to criticize the government.

Mr. Abdul-Jalil will keep his $76,600-a-year job, but the mayor announced that he had been suspended without pay for two weeks for his failure to disclose that he had been speaking as a private citizen, not as a city employee. It was a fair outcome. The imam chose his words poorly, at the least. But those comments occupied brief moments in remarks that mostly encouraged Muslims to read the Koran and decried the high levels of incarceration in the United States. And the speech was only one event in a career that Jewish chaplains and other clerics at the Corrections Department have described as exemplary.

For the mayor, however, the moment could be much more significant. Mr. Bloomberg's record on free speech took a beating in his first term after he moved aggressively to limit protests, most notably those surrounding the Republican National Convention in New York two years ago. And as a report in yesterday's Times by Jim Dwyer made clear, the Police Department's willingness to subvert free speech in the name of security appears to have gone beyond that one event to an ongoing strategy that included "proactive arrests" of political demonstrators who were spotted as potential troublemakers.

DOJ_NMG_0019228

When this page endorsed Mr. Bloomberg's re-election, we said we hoped that he would make up for his first-term lapses and make protection of free speech a hallmark of his second term. His decision on the imam can be an excellent beginning.

Ahern Asks Bush About CIA Flights Over EU (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, March 18, 2006

Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern gave President Bush a bowl of shamrocks on Friday and then asked the president for more "transparency" about CIA flights over Europe.

After his St. Patrick's Day meeting with Bush, which lasted for more than two hours, Ahern renewed his commitment to seeing the implementation of Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord and its central goal: power-sharing between the province's British Protestant majority and Irish Catholic minority.

The consensus among Irish Americans and political leaders is that "we just have to move on," Ahern said after meeting with Bush, who also visited with relatives killed in murders linked to the Irish Republican Army.

"We've seen the end of the IRA campaign," Ahern said. "We've seen the end of the arms issue. We're dealing with the criminality issue. We saw the big raids on the border last week. The politicians have to get back to the work that they were elected to, and we have to do that this year."

Gerry Adams, who has spent the past two decades guiding his IRA-allied party into Ireland's political mainstream, was among the Irish visitors to the White House. Last year, Bush barred all Northern Ireland leaders from the St. Patrick's Day event to put pressure on Adams.

Bush administration officials said last year that they withdrew Sinn Fein's White House invitation — for the first time since 1995 — because of the IRA's admission that its members were involved in killing Robert McCartney in Belfast last year and that the outlawed group stole $50 million worth of British pounds from a Belfast bank.

Ahern said he asked Bush if there was a way to bring more "transparency" to the issue of rendition. The European Union is investigating allegations that CIA agents interrogated al-Qaida suspects at secret prisons in eastern Europe and transported some on secret flights that passed through Europe.

Ahern said that while Ireland facilitates U.S. troop movements, and is "happy to do it," there is public concern over the CIA flights.

"We've asked for the president's understanding and cooperation," Ahern said, adding that it would be easier for him to explain the flights in his country if he knew more about them. "We are going to continue to look at, perhaps, how we might bring more transparency to that process, if that's possible."

In the traditional trek to the White House, the prime minister gave the president a glass bowl of shamrocks, a symbol of warm U.S. relations.

"The Census Bureau tells us there are more than 34 million Americans that claim Irish ancestry," said Bush, who wore a pale green tie for the occasion. "On St. Patrick's Day, I suspect that number jumps a little bit."

Bush and the Irish leader talked about Iraq, Iran, Darfur, India and the Middle East. Ahern said he expressed support for immigration legislation that would benefit the estimated 50,000 to 70,000 illegal Irish immigrants in the United States.

Ahern said he backed a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., which would let illegal immigrants stay for six years if they remain employed and pay a $1,000 fine. They would then become eligible for permanent residency.

Much of their discussion focused on the killings of McCartney, who was stabbed in the neck and stomach and bludgeoned with iron bars outside a Belfast pub on Jan. 30, 2005; Joseph Rafferty, who was shot dead outside his home in Dublin on April 12, 2005; and Pat Finucane, a Belfast lawyer who was shot 14 times on Feb. 12, 1989, as he sat down to a Sunday lunch.

Finucane's family and Catholic leaders have demanded a public probe into suspected involvement of British security forces in the assassination.

DOJ_NMG_0019229

Ahern said he was with Bush when they met with Ester Uzell and Bart Little, Rafferty's sister and brother-in-law; and Catherine and Kathleen McCartney and Emily Hamilton, McCartney's sister, mother and aunt.

"The president is very familiar with the cases — extremely familiar — and very well-briefed on all of the cases," Ahern said. "I should say we had quite a long conversation on the Finucane case.

In a speech Thursday night, Ahern said he hoped "all parties and all communities will fully accept and participate the new beginning for policing," a reference to Sinn Fein and its Catholic supporters, which refuse to work with Northern Ireland's mostly Protestant police force.

Sinn Fein boycotts a Catholic-Protestant board that is overseeing a 10-year plan for reshaping the police force, which requires at least 50 percent of recruits to be Catholic. The Bush administration has said it won't allow Adams to raise funds directly in the United States until Sinn Fein takes its seats on the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

The policy means that, while Sinn Fein's U.S. fundraising arm can collect funds from supporters, it can't do this at any events that Adams attends. Adams said this restriction meant the party had to return about $100,000 collected at a Washington breakfast that the Sinn Fein chief attended Thursday.

At that event, Adams took the unusual step of publicly criticizing Bush's special envoy to Northern Ireland. "I don't have any high regard for Mitchell Reiss' input in this process," Adams said. "If it is he who is advising the president, then it's very, very bad advice."

Reiss, however, got high marks from Ahern.

"I warmly applaud the work of your special envoy, Ambassador Mitchell Reiss, as well as (U.S. Ambassador to Ireland) James Kenny."

IRA-Allied Politician Detained At Airport From Times Wire Reports (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Gerry Adams, leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party in Northern Ireland, was detained at Reagan National Airport after attending a St. Patrick's Day event at the White House, according to a congressman.

Rep. Brian Higgins (D-N.Y.), who had invited Adams to speak in Buffalo, N.Y., said Adams' name appeared on a terrorism watch list, triggering a lengthy inspection. Because of the delay, Adams missed his speaking engagement, Higgins said.

Earlier Friday, Adams joined Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern and other Irish visitors at a White House St. Patrick's Day ceremony.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bomb Material Got Past TSA Screeners (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

The Dallas Morning News, March 18, 2006

21 airports failed test; homeland official defends security

WASHINGTON – Despite the multibillion-dollar ramp-up in aviation security since 9/11, congressional investigators were able to sneak homemade bomb components past federal screeners at all 21 airports they targeted in a recent covert exercise.

The General Accountability Office conducted the tests between October and January to determine the vulnerability posed by a would-be suicide bomber carrying easily purchased materials that could be assembled into a bomb once past security.

The GAO findings, first reported by NBC News, are classified, and the airports' identities were not disclosed. The GAO refused to comment Friday on any aspect of its report.

The head of the Transportation Security Administration, which oversees nearly 43,000 screeners at 429 commercial airports, didn't quarrel with the GAO analysis – and in fact termed it helpful as his agency focuses on its top mission: intercepting improvised explosive devices.

But Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Edmund "Kip" Hawley said the GAO testing doesn't take into account the many layers of security that occur before passengers reach the screening checkpoint and once they're through. Among them: checking travelers' names against watch lists; analyzing behavior patterns; making security procedures less predictable; and deploying federal air marshals.

DOJ_NMG_0019230

While deeming the report "interesting," Mr. Hawley said it is "not at all an evaluation of the entire system. It's a data point on that one particular thing."

Speaking to reporters at a Homeland Security Department briefing, he added, "This should not be an alarming report."

His outlook wasn't shared by a pair of House Homeland Security Committee members.

"Half-measures will not prevent the next terrorist disaster – we cannot allow half of the contents traveling on passenger planes to go unscreened, as we continue to do today," said Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., who has long lobbied for tighter aviation security. "How many warnings does this administration need to take action?"

Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the committee's top Democrat, said: "It's like the story of the Trojan horse. TSA has spent so much time telling people to take off their shoes and belts, that they have missed the bomb-making materials."

TSA has adapted its policies, however, to give screeners more time to look for potential bomb components. In a December shift that sparked some controversy, TSA removed small scissors and tools from its list of prohibited items.

The GAO test also occurred as TSA was in the midst of providing explosives-detection training for 18,000 screeners at the nation's biggest airports, Mr. Hawley said. "Certainly, the training had not burned in," he said.

Two thousand additional screeners have been trained since.

The problem is that TSA hasn't been given the resources to deploy technologies that could ferret out explosives, said Douglas Laird, an aviation security consultant who was a former Northwest Airlines security director.

"We don't give the screeners the technology they need to succeed," Mr. Laird said. "It's not that we don't know how to do security, it's that we're not willing to pay for security."

He noted that CTX machines to screen checked baggage for explosives have yet to be deployed at all airports. The machines are at Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport and other major airports. He also said TSA is moving gingerly to test backscatter scanners that can detect explosives and weapons hidden on people – with an X-ray technology that essentially allows scanners to peer through clothing.

The union that has fought for screeners' bargaining rights, the American Federation of Government Employees, agreed that the TSA workers lack the equipment and training to do their jobs properly.

"It is clear that TSA doesn't take this seriously," said John Gage, president of the government employees group. "The agency seems to be more concerned with presenting the public with the appearance of security rather than making sure the appropriate security measures are taken."

While both Mr. Gage and Mr. Laird said the equipment exists to do the job right, Mr. Hawley said technologies to detect all manner of combustibles – many of which can be assembled from household products – remain in development.

Though countless items could be used to assemble a bomb, Mr. Hawley said TSA knows which materials pose the greatest risk, having blown up hundreds of planes in tests.

"We know exactly what it takes and where to bring an airplane down," he said. "We use that information to guide us in our priorities, our technology, and the physical processes that we do to check."

White House Plans Smallpox Drill (AP)

AP, March 18, 2006

Cabinet secretaries and other top officials are gathering at the White House complex Saturday to act out the roles they would play in a smallpox outbreak.

The four-hour drill, designed to test the federal government's smallpox response plans, won't be attended by the president, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Friday.

Officials conducted a similar "tabletop exercise" in December to examine the nation's readiness for pandemic flu. The drills are kept behind closed doors.

"The president directed his Cabinet to conduct a series of such exercises to assess our response efforts to catastrophic attacks," McClellan said.

DOJ_NMG_0019231

The United States ended routine childhood vaccination against smallpox in 1971, and the World Health Organization reported the disease was eradicated in 1980.

But there are fears that smallpox could be used by terrorists as a biological weapon. About 15 months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the U.S. government ordered certain military personnel vaccinated and recommended shots for front-line health care workers.

The president did not attend the pandemic flu drill, and was to be at Camp David, the presidential retreat in the nearby Maryland mountains, during this one.

After the flu drill, conducted around a C-shaped table for four hours, officials said it showed that saving lives and containing the economic damage of a pandemic flu would require more planning in local communities and increased production of vaccines and medications.

Real Injustice (WP)

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

WHEN CONGRESS passed the Real ID Act last year, it presumably did not intend to prevent human rights victims all over the world from entering the United States. Its goal was to keep terrorists and those who support them from resettling in the United States as refugees. The legislative language, however, was irresponsibly broad; its effects have been cruel to people already oppressed by vile regimes and terrorist groups. The law needs to be changed.

Terrorists were excluded from the United States even before the Real ID Act, but the law made substantial changes to keep out donors to terrorist groups or others who provide them "material support." The trouble is that, because of the new law and its interaction with existing provisions, the legal definitions of terrorism, terrorist organizations and material support are so broad that they include countless people who deserve the United States' protection, not exclusion.

The law bars associates of any group that contains "two or more individuals, whether organized or not, [which] engages in, or has a subgroup which engages in" activities as general as using an "explosive, firearm or other weapon or dangerous device." The law contains no exceptions for people who are forced to support a group, or for children, or for tiny contributions, or for contributions that took place decades ago. It does not make any distinction between an al-Qaeda member and an armed combatant against a murderous regime. While the government has waiver authority in some cases, it has not yet used this power.

The results are terrible. According to the office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and to officials and academics who have looked at the issue, here are some people who may be barred from entry to the United States: Colombians who were forced to help the leftist insurgency of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia; thousands of Karen and Chin nationals who suffered brutal repression at the hands of the Burmese military junta; Liberian, Somali and Vietnamese Montagnard victims of terrorism and repression; and some dissident Cubans who aided anti-Castro forces in the 1960s. The administration recently acknowledged in one asylum proceeding that those who fought with or aided the Northern Alliance against the Taliban or who supported the African National Congress against South Africa's apartheid government would be excluded, too.

A spokesman for House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who championed the Real ID Act, says the law's waiver authority gives the government the flexibility it needs to deal with such cases. And the problem could be alleviated if the administration would use that authority aggressively. But that would address only some of the cases, and only by having the government forgiving "terrorism" on the part of refugees whom it should not be labeling terrorists in the first place. This problem can be solved only by Congress. If this mess is not what Mr. Sensenbrenner had in mind, he ought to do something to clean it up.

Port Authority Rejects Silverstein's Offer To Talk (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

Nobody was calling the latest overtures negotiations yesterday, but it looked as if the stalled talks over financing and rebuilding at ground zero could resume next week, at least by mail if not face to face.

The Port Authority rejected a new offer yesterday from the developer Larry A. Silverstein to revive the negotiations and said it would unveil its own proposal for the site next week.

DOJ_NMG_0019232

Talks between Mr. Silverstein, who controls the lease at ground zero, and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the land, abruptly broke off late Tuesday night. The developer had submitted what state officials and Port Authority executives said was a one-sided counterproposal that shifted all the development risks onto the authority, while guaranteeing Mr. Silverstein a profit.

Eager to restart the talks, Mr. Silverstein sent the Port Authority a new proposal yesterday that he had hoped would lead both sides back to the bargaining table. While it may not contain some of the most unacceptable provisions of the old proposal, Port Authority officials said that the overture did not amount to a starting point for a new agreement.

"Silverstein Properties has attempted to provide a revision to their proposal of last Tuesday night," wrote the Port Authority in a tersely worded statement released yesterday evening. "However, many aspects remain unacceptable. Port Authority staff will develop a counterproposal that we believe will work for both parties to get this deal done."

The Port Authority's response drew a rapid retort from the Silverstein camp.

"We're glad the Port Authority has finally decided to produce a counterproposal, which is what we've been asking for since they abruptly broke off talks on Tuesday night," said Bud Perrone, a spokesman for Mr. Silverstein. "We hope it means that they are also prepared to return to the table without further needless delay."

The collapse of the negotiations, an embarrassment to both Mr. Silverstein and Gov. George E. Pataki, is only the latest problem to cast doubt over the future of the ground zero site. Fund-raising for the World Trade Center memorial is going slowly and critics have questioned whether the $2.3 billion Freedom Tower should be built.

The dispute between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority surfaced as state and city officials became concerned about the developer's ability to rebuild the entire site, at an estimated cost of more than $7 billion, when there is only $2.9 billion in insurance money available. Under Mr. Silverstein's lease at the trade center, he has both the right and the obligation to rebuild all the commercial space, at an estimated cost of more than $7 billion.

As a result, state officials and Port Authority executives have sought to fashion a new arrangement at ground zero in which they split the site.

Last Tuesday evening, the two sides appeared to be close to a deal in which the Port Authority would take control of building the Freedom Tower, the most symbolic and least economically viable of the five towers planned for the area. The authority would also have taken over a second building site at Greenwich and Cedar Streets, where the heavily damaged Deutsche Bank building stands.

Mr. Silverstein, in turn, would have retained what everyone regards as the most lucrative sites for three towers on Church Street, next to the $2 billion PATH terminal now under construction.

But the talks foundered over a series of interrelated financial issues, including the allocation of $2.9 billion in insurance money; Mr. Silverstein's rent, which rises to $125.25 million in July; and his share of the infrastructure costs. Although the Silverstein camp insisted that the two sides were close, Charles A. Gargano, vice chairman of the Port Authority and the state's top economic development official, said they were about $1 billion apart on Tuesday night.

But even if Mr. Silverstein adjusts the financial terms of his offer, it remains to be seen if the Port Authority, whose 12 commissioners are appointed by the governors of New York and New Jersey, will revisit the old deal. Some commissioners had agreed on Tuesday only after prodding by Governor Pataki's chief negotiator, John Cahill.

At least two of the six New York commissioners considered the deal discussed last Tuesday to be overly generous to Mr. Silverstein.

"The majority of us, if not all, would prefer a buyout of his development rights," said a New York commissioner who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the board.

Anthony R. Coscia, chairman of the Port Authority, has expressed that he will not agree to a deal that enriches Mr. Silverstein, while leaving the authority with hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars in bills.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is of a similar view. "I thought the deal the governor offered Larry Silverstein was a better deal than I would have offered, I'll tell you that," he said yesterday during his weekly radio show.

The mayor, who has been a frequent critic of Mr. Silverstein, said that ultimately Governor Pataki, Governor John S. Corzine and the Port Authority will lay out a plan telling Mr. Silverstein, "Look this is a fair deal; let's do this one, and Larry will agree."

DOJ_NMG_0019233

WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- Talks to resolve how to rebuild the World Trade Center will restart next week after private developer Larry Silverstein offered a revised proposal Friday for his role in the long-troubled project.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, said it would respond to Mr. Silverstein's proposal.

While calling aspects of Mr. Silverstein's latest proposal "unacceptable," Port Authority spokesman Steve Coleman said the agency "will develop a counter-proposal that we believe will work for both parties to get this deal done."

Negotiations between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority broke down Wednesday after failing to meet a deadline imposed by New York Gov. George E. Pataki. The Port Authority walked out on the talks saying the 74-year-old real estate tycoon was bargaining in "bad faith," a charge he denied.

Mr. Silverstein's revised proposal closes the gap between the two sides and contains some new ideas, according to a person close to the talks. In a statement, Mr. Silverstein said "the sooner we get this done the better."

Before talks failed, the two sides had the broad outlines of a deal in place that would have Mr. Silverstein give up the rights to build two of the five planned towers, including the signature Freedom Tower. The sticking points revolved around how much each side would bear of the $7 billion cost.

Little has been rebuilt 4 1/2 years after the attacks that destroyed the Twin Towers. Gov. Pataki, the Port Authority, which Gov. Pataki controls with New Jersey's governor, and Mr. Silverstein have come under heavy criticism for the lack of progress.

Ground Zeroes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Not long after the 9/11 terror attacks evicted us from our offices across from the World Trade Center, we remember thinking that it might be 10 years before the destroyed site was fully rebuilt. If only. Four and a half years later, Ground Zero remains just that -- a hole in the ground.

The failure to even begin rebuilding Ground Zero is a disgrace, but it's also a classic display of New York's dysfunctional political culture. What was a rare chance to improve lower Manhattan and show the world our ability to bounce back has deteriorated into a familiar squabble among interest groups and politicians assigning blame.

The latest roadblock occurred this week, when private developer Larry Silverstein and the site's owner, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, failed to agree on a financial plan for building the five office towers planned for the site. New York Governor George Pataki, the politician with the most responsibility here, accused Mr. Silverstein of greed and "betray[ing] the public trust" and now wants to oust him from at least part of the project.

Mr. Pataki knows that when you're in trouble in politics, blame a rich old white guy. Mayor Michael Bloomberg, another leadership vanishing act (though with less influence over the WTC site), has adopted the same strategy. The developer counters that he could build commercially viable buildings if only the state and city would get out of the way.

Mr. Silverstein has the most credibility here, not least because he's the only one who has actually built something downtown since 9/11 -- the new 52-story skyscraper adjacent to Ground Zero known as 7 World Trade Center. "I can't tell you why government does what it does," he was quoted as saying in a wire-service report this week, in plaintive understatement. "In the private sector, this doesn't happen."

Much of the squabbling is over the Freedom Tower, the site's signature building, whose design took years to finalize. Mr. Silverstein isn't crazy about the latest version, though he's never trashed it the way his fellow real estate developer, Donald Trump, has. The Donald spoke for many New Yorkers last year when he called it "an egghead design, designed by an egghead, which has no practical application and, which, frankly, doesn't look very good."

We'd just as soon see the 1,776-foot-high tower scrapped in favor of a building less fraught with "symbolism" and more suited to real tenants. Everyone agrees that the iconic Freedom Tower will instantly become Manhattan's No. 1 terrorist target, and for that reason -- along with its size -- it's not an easily rentable property. Rather, it's destined as a home for government tenants, says the Manhattan Institute's Steven Malanga. The plans don't even include some high-tech amenities that corporate clients would demand.

DOJ_NMG_0019234

An even bigger point of contention is the memorial to the September 11 victims, work on which was finally begun on Monday after years of wrangling. A lawsuit to stop the memorial is pending in state court, brought by family members dissatisfied with the design. The sister of a firefighter who was killed on September 11 demonstrated her opposition this week by sleeping in front of the firehouse across from Ground Zero.

The memorial is scheduled to open in 2009 (good luck), but first there's the little matter of money. The partially underground design is so controversial -- some say uninspiring -- that the foundation established to fund it has come up way short of the necessary $500 million. Some $200 million has come from Washington and another $100 million from private donations, but that still leaves $200 million to go.

On the first anniversary of 9/11, when the wreckage had been cleared more quickly than anyone dreamed possible, we expressed hope that a thriving new commercial center would soon rise from the rubble. Everyone expected that someone, the Governor ideally, would step forward to exert some leadership. But that has been in pathetic and short supply.

The failure at Ground Zero is a case study in government incompetence and buck-passing. It's no way to revive the economy of Downtown Manhattan, and it's certainly no way to honor the men and women who perished there on September 11.

FEMA Will Try To Recoup Millions Distributed For Hurricane Relief (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — Acknowledging that it wrongly distributed tens of millions of dollars in hurricane relief last year, the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Friday that it would try to recoup aid from thousands of individuals or families who fraudulently or otherwise wrongly collected money.

Officials at the agency said it was a routine step taken after any disaster because in the rush to distribute emergency aid, benefits were occasionally paid twice to the same family or to people who were ineligible.

"In every disaster there are just some people who are bad apples who attempt to take advantage of the programs," said Donna Dannels, the acting deputy director of disaster recovery at FEMA.

But auditors examining the $6.8 billion in disaster assistance distributed last year to 1.7 million households after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma said FEMA was to blame for much of the abuse because of a woefully inadequate accounting system that left it vulnerable to fraud.

"The right way to do this is to prevent it in the first place," said Gregory D. Kutz, managing director of a unit in the Government Accountability Office that has already found that thousands of people submitted duplicate or invalid Social Security numbers to receive aid. "You will never catch even a fraction of the people who have committed fraud here."

So far, FEMA has sent letters to 1,500 families asking them to return payments, which most frequently came in the form of $2,000 in cash but could legally reach $26,200 per household.

FEMA's requests for repayment came after it conducted its own search for duplicate payments and other irregularities.

The letters that went out this week were just the first wave. FEMA officials said Friday that they would most likely seek the return of aid from 2 percent to 3 percent of approved applicants. They said that they could not estimate how much money they would try to recoup, but that it could be up to $100 million.

In some cases, payments were made to families to cover immediate expenses that have since been reimbursed by private insurance, Ms. Dannels said.

But the inquiry by Mr. Kutz and his staff members, which is still under way, has already shown that thousands and perhaps tens of thousands of inappropriate payments were made because people were able to apply for and collect aid repeatedly.

For example, about 5,000 of the 11,000 victims of Hurricane Katrina who collected FEMA debit cards worth $2,000 that were distributed in Texas also received $2,000 payments in the mail, even though they were eligible for only one so-called expedited assistance payment to buy food, clothing and other emergency supplies.

DOJ_NMG_0019235

Separately, investigators found that thousands of payments for cash aid and rental assistance were sent to people who applied with falsified Social Security numbers or numbers that belonged to people who had died.

The problem, the investigators found, was that when people called FEMA's toll-free registration number, the agency did not try to confirm their identities by using government records to match the applicants' names with the submitted Social Security numbers.

"FEMA provided the fraudsters an opportunity that was very appealing to steal money," Mr. Kutz said. In one case, a person used 15 different Social Security numbers to collect $41,000.

The weaknesses in FEMA's emergency aid system are not new: in 2004, after Hurricane Frances in Florida, it gave out $31 million in aid to more than 12,000 residents of the Miami area that auditors later ruled was largely unjustified because hurricane-force winds never hit the area. FEMA ultimately moved to recoup much of this money as well.

Individuals who receive a letter from FEMA will have a month to repay the requested amount before they will be charged interest. Recipients will have a chance to appeal, but if the appeal is not sustained and the payment is not made, the debt will be turned over to the Treasury Department to collect.

Officials from FEMA and the treasury could not say Friday how successful the government had been at recovering excessive or unjustified payments from past disasters.

R. David Paulison, the acting FEMA director, said the agency was moving to correct some of the problems, including establishing a way to verify applicants' identities when they applied for aid over the phone, a system that would be in place for the next hurricane season.

Ultimately, Mr. Paulison said, there will never be a way to stop all fraud and waste.

"For every instance of an incorrect payment, there are thousands who were genuinely in need of the federal government's help," Mr. Paulison said in a statement Friday. "It is our job to ensure there is not delay in receiving that assistance."

In Louisiana, Graft Inquiries Are Increasing (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

KENNER, La. — Long before this suburb west of New Orleans was shaken by Hurricane Katrina, it was notorious for its fierce political infighting, for name-calling and mudslinging, for charges and countercharges of cronyism and corruption.

But accusations about matters like ticket-fixing are one thing, and allegations involving millions of federal dollars for storm recovery are quite another.

In February, federal prosecutors in New Orleans began bringing witnesses before a grand jury looking into possible fraud in Kenner municipal contracts that were awarded immediately before and after the hurricane. The mayor and the entire City Council have been subpoenaed to testify, although the government has not made clear its target.

Growing numbers of subpoenas may soon be issued across Louisiana, where local politics remains a blood sport and corruption has been a bad habit. That combination has become far more volatile with the addition of millions of dollars in aid beginning to flow from Washington and an army of auditors, investigators and prosecutors determined to make sure that the money is properly spent.

So far, the scrutiny has resulted in several major fraud prosecutions around the state. The government has filed charges against a politician in St. Tammany Parish, north of New Orleans, who is accused of seeking hurricane contract kickbacks, and against several federal workers accused of seeking bribes and a contractor who was paid millions of dollars for work the government says he did not perform at a tent camp.

New hurricane fraud investigations are being opened "sometimes by the day," said Jim Letten, the United States attorney in New Orleans, who was the lead prosecutor in the corruption case against former Gov. Edwin W. Edwards, convicted in 2000 of a scheme to extort money from businessmen seeking gambling boat licenses.

"Additional investigations focus on everything from fake charities to identity theft to contractors behaving fraudulently to public corruption cases," Mr. Letten said.

DOJ_NMG_0019236

Grand jury investigations normally take place in secret, and Mr. Letten said he could not discuss the focus or the scope of the inquiry in Kenner, a city of 70,000 people that is home to New Orleans's airport.

But some information has become public, in part because the mayor and several City Council members have held news conferences on the investigation. Reporters were waiting in the halls of the Hale Boggs Federal Building on March 9 when a contractor and all seven members of the Council trooped up to the fourth floor to testify. And the contracts in question have been a subject of public acrimony between the mayor and the Council, a circumstance that led to a fistfight between a contractor and the brothers of a councilman at a Mardi Gras ball in February.

"Kenner is the home of hardball politics," said Jeff Crouere, a political commentator who is a former executive director of the Louisiana Republican Party. (Almost all the battling politicians in Kenner are Republicans.) But the grand jury inquiry, coming so soon before hotly contested city elections on April 1, "is just an incredible situation," Mr. Crouere said, "where voters are left scratching their heads."

Dominic O. Weilbaecher, a city councilman and former interim mayor, has raised questions about at least $22 million in city spending on debris removal, trailers and public relations.

The spending was approved by the current mayor, Philip L. Capitano, who is running for re-election. A former ally of his, Mr. Weilbaecher contends that Mr. Capitano is now rewarding campaign contributors, overpaying cronies and generally spending taxpayer money without demonstrating that the city is getting anything in return.

"I've been talking to guys from the F.B.I. for two years, just because of the foolishness I've seen from this administration," Mr. Weilbaecher (pronounced WHILE-backer) said in an interview.

What is new, he said, is that federal money is now involved: the city is seeking reimbursement for storm-related expenses from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"My take is, the U.S. attorney wants to send a message that regardless of what's going on with elections or any other thing, you don't mess with the federal government," Mr. Weilbaecher said.

The mayor replied that his efforts after the storm saved the city money, got it up and running quickly, and did not involve any impropriety.

"We did it better, we did it cheaper," he said in an interview. "That's why it's so funny we're being investigated by a grand jury right now, when we were more efficient, cheaper and better than all the surrounding communities."

The mayor later sent along a letter he had received from the University of Chicago Graduate School of Business praising his "bold and intelligent leadership" after the storm.

Randal Perkins, owner of a major debris removal company that worked in Louisiana and Mississippi after the hurricane, said in a phone interview that he believed Kenner was paying less on its cleanup contract than the Army Corps of Engineers was spending on similar work.

"It's politics," Mr. Capitano said of the inquiry. Mr. Weilbaecher and another councilman, Michael McMyne, "are trying to help the guy who ran against me" in the last election.

That guy, Nick Congemi, is the police chief and brother of Mr. Capitano's predecessor as mayor. The chief is among four candidates challenging Mr. Capitano this time.

"I don't think anybody can plot with the U.S. attorney's office," Mr. Congemi said recently. "That accusation is a simple politician's answer to a deep dilemma he's in now."

Whatever is behind the accusations, Mr. Letten, the prosecutor, had no choice but to look into them, said L. Eades Hogue, a former federal prosecutor representing the contractor who has appeared before the grand jury. "It smacks of politics," Mr. Hogue said, "but the U.S. attorney is obligated to investigate allegations such as these."

Even some critics of the mayor do not dispute that this city of about 15 square miles began rebounding from the hurricane faster than many other communities. But they suggest that this had less to do with politicians than with the route of the storm, which struck hardest at points farther east.

"As bad as it was, this city was blessed," said John T. Lavarine III, who like his father before him serves on the City Council. "We were on the western fringes."

DOJ_NMG_0019237

Which is not to say that Kenner escaped unscathed. Driving his Crown Victoria through the city recently, Mr. Lavarine headed north and west to Loyola Drive, where white FEMA trailers line the streets like false teeth in front of damaged houses. Across town, a huge apartment complex that housed mostly Hispanic residents sits moldering, roofs torn off and walls tipped in.

Worried about rebuilding their homes and about the next hurricane, Kenner's residents, some politicians among them, seem embarrassed by the investigation and fed up with the political squabbling.

"The fighting and all has not served the city well," said Edmond J. Muniz, a retired businessman and politician known for founding Endymion, one of the biggest Mardi Gras krewes, or parade groups, who decided at the last minute to run for mayor. "I don't know how to put it. I wouldn't want to say we are a laughingstock, because it isn't funny."

EPA Chief Backs Coast Restoration (NOTP)

By Matthew Brown

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 18, 2006

But he's offering no new money for it

U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Stephen Johnson said Friday that the Bush administration is committed to rebuilding Louisiana's shattered coastline, but offered no new money for an effort expected to cost up to $14 billion.

Nor did he offer any specifics as to what role his agency would play.

"President Bush and EPA are determined to rebuild and rejuvenate our nation's wetlands," Johnson said in a speech at the annual meeting of the National Wildlife Federation in New Orleans. "After Katrina and Rita, the entire world knows how important wetlands are to our lives and our communities. . . . Coastal security and sustainability are about more than levees and concrete."

Participants in a private breakfast meeting with Johnson Friday morning said he indicated he wanted the EPA to "get going" on at least a handful of the many coastal restoration projects under consideration. Some have been stuck on the drawing boards for years.

"They want to identify some projects they can work on collaboratively," said Richard Innes, a Washington conservation lobbyist who sat in on the meeting. "He said let's pick a couple and just get going so we can say the money's there, the bulldozers are on the ground."

Since the 1930s, Louisiana has lost an estimated 1,900 square miles of coastal wetlands to erosion. Despite passage of the Breaux Act by Congress in 1990 in an attempt to stop the losses, land has continued to disappear at the rate of about 24 square miles annually over the past decade.

Adam Kolton, senior director for congressional affairs for the wildlife federation, said he was encouraged by Johnson's broad statements on wetlands issues, but said the administration needs to press Congress to follow up with cash. "Thus far, we haven't gotten what we needed from Congress and, frankly, that's disappointing," Kolton said.

In an earlier address to the wildlife federation, King Milling, president of Whitney National Bank and chairman of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's advisory commission on coastal protection, repeated calls made by Louisiana's elected leaders to give the state a larger share of offshore oil and gas royalties to finance the restoration effort.

Johnson did not address the administration's stand on that proposal, and after his speech declined to answer questions from a reporter.

A Hurricane And Espresso. What's Next? (NYT)

By Laura Rich

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

In its fourth-quarter earnings report, Procter & Gamble had one particularly dark cloud in a generally bright update: Hurricane Katrina was making a mess of its coffee business, which got 50 percent of its supply from four sites in New Orleans.

Though the plants were among the first back in operation after the hurricane struck on Aug. 29, there are still, as Doug McGraw, the executive in charge of global coffee, put it, "holes on the shelves" where Folgers and Millstone, Procter's brands, should be. Mr. McGraw spoke recently about the impact of the hurricane and how the business is doing now. The following are excerpts:

DOJ_NMG_0019238

Q. In the coffee market, regional roasters and the popularity of espresso drinks are changing the market. How are you addressing those new forms of competition?

A. On a macro level, I'd say that the really good thing that's happening in the coffee market right now is that people are becoming more interested in the coffee. The terminology I've used on previous occasions is that "coffee is kind of becoming cool." And that's really good for the industry and it's manifesting itself in a number of ways. One is, there are new, smaller, regional coffee businesses coming online. Obviously, coffee shops are becoming far more prevalent than they were 5 years ago, 10 years ago.

One of the things we're really excited about that we hope we see continue is that consumers are trading up from more kind of mainstream coffees to more gourmet and more expensive coffees as they become more knowledgeable and more sophisticated about what's out there. And certainly, the trend toward espresso-based beverages is partially what's behind that.

Q. Since Folgers is more of a mainstream brand, what are you doing to address the move toward the higher end of the market?

A. One of the things we've done in the last year is, we have a segment of our line called the Folgers Coffehouse Series. It provides more gourmet-like blends and roasts such as French Roast, Gourmet Supreme, Colombian. So we have shifted our emphasis within our product and marketing programs to make Folgers consumers and other coffee drinkers aware that Folgers, too, offers these more gourmet, slightly darker, roasted coffees.

We also have a second brand, Millstone, which is one of the leading national gourmet brands, which we have shifted more of our emphasis to with the hope of capturing additional consumers as they explore what's available in the coffee market.

Q. Is Starbucks a market that's important to crack?

A. No, our primary focus and business model is to sell through retail outlets: grocery stores, mass merchandisers, club stores.

Q. What steps did you take to get back online in New Orleans?

A. For the first several weeks, we were renting helicopters to drop people in during the day, first to assess the damage. Over the course of the recovery, we dug our own well. We were trucking water in from Baton Rouge.

But probably the biggest undertaking that is still in place today — it's just an amazing picture — we have 130-some trailers located on what used to be our employee parking lot, because, as I said, most of our employees had left the area with their families. Since close to two-thirds of them had significant property damage, they didn't have any place to come back to, so we created what we call Gentilly Village, which was the trailers, some of which we bought and some of which we got from FEMA, on our parking lot, along with the generators, laundry facilities, a large kitchen and food-service operation, etc.

Q. How many of the employees who left came back?

A. Upwards of 90 percent. So, over 400 of our 500-some employees have come back.

Q. When do you expect everything will be back to normal?

A. For as good as our operation is running right now, there are some unique challenges associated with operating a business in the New Orleans area right now. The costs of operation have gone up pretty dramatically.

Hopefully as the city infrastructure gets back under control and operating at whatever level it's going to operate at, those will improve. But it's an issue today.

Blanco Plan Passes First Test (BRA)

Baton Rouge Advocate, March 18, 2006

Legislators on Friday advanced the biggest part of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's hurricane recovery plan — totaling $6.2 billion — despite gripes about the lack of detail on how the money will be spent.

The dollars are coming from Congress. The state must submit a spending plan to the federal government before the funds start flowing.

The Louisiana Recovery Authority's executive director, Andy Kopplin, said the state is only ready to spend part of the money.

The Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget approved two plans Friday — a broad outline for spending the $6.2 billion and a more specific plan for using $368.9 million of it. The plan now goes to the full Legislature for approval.

The governor is asking Congress for another $4.2 billion of the same kind of funds, known as Community Development Block Grants. The aid is crucial to the governor's plans because the state decides how to spend the federal money.

Blanco wants to start setting up the mechanism for eventually distributing billions for housing aid to homeowners and renters affected by the hurricanes.

She also wants federal reimbursement for the cost of setting up call centers to gather information from hurricane victims on their housing situations.

Another part of the plan calls for establishing recovery centers to help displaced renters and homeowners.

The administration outlined the plan for legislators on two pages, not using more than a paragraph to describe each type of expense.

Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, found the two-sentence description of the recovery centers to be lacking.

"I couldn't explain to anybody what we're approving," he complained.

Dardenne pointed out that legislation to create recovery centers to counsel hurricane victims on their housing options didn't survive the Legislature's recent special session.

A bill creating the centers was part of the governor's legislative package. It passed the Senate but died in the House because it was never called up for a vote.

"What is a recovery center if the Legislature didn't authorize the creation of it?" Dardenne asked.

Suzie Elkins, director of the Office of Community Development, which is coordinating the funding, said the centers are simply a mechanism to get money into the hands of homeowners.

The centers will determine how much financial assistance a homeowner needs and make sure homes are inspected and appraised, she said.

The centers share the same name as the counseling centers proposed in the legislation, but they are not the same thing, she said.

"Call it whatever you want," Elkins told Dardenne. "You have to have something in place."

Dardenne also asked why banks or housing entities could not handle the distribution of funds.

Kopplin said that may be what happens. He said the state plans to seek bids to pick a firm to manage the money.

Rep. Don Cazayoux, D-New Roads, puzzled over the administration's intention to use a portion of the federal funds to employ staff.

"I thought we were approving an action plan," he said. "What are you talking about hiring people?"

Kopplin said the state has to staff the call centers.

Pressed further about the extent of the hiring, Elkins said the state does intend to start contracting for people to set up the recovery centers.

Rep. Steve Scalise, R-Jefferson, made a motion to remove the recovery centers from the administration's plan.

Kopplin urged against the action, saying it would slow the state's recovery from the hurricanes.

Sen. Francis Heitmeier, D-New Orleans, agreed.

"We don't want to cause roadblocks where we're not getting money to people," he said.

Heitmeier also scolded Kopplin for not providing more information.

"In the future, we need a breakdown of where you going to spend the dollars," he said. "You can't just throw this at us."

In the ends, Scalise's motion to remove the centers failed on a vote of four in favor to 25 against.

The plan now goes to the full Legislature for approval.

Money the Blanco administration is ready to spend so far includes:

$95 million for loans ranging from $5,000 to $100,000 for small businesses in hurricane-affected areas.

$95 million for local governments to provide money required for the federal government to share the cost of rebuilding infrastructure.

$142.5 million to repair state buildings damaged by the hurricanes.

$1 million to design housing programs.

$2 million for a call center to gather information from homeowners in need of housing.

DOJ_NMG_0019240

$9.8 million to establish housing assistance centers for hurricane victims.

$5.1 million to conduct environmental reviews of property in the hurricane-affected areas.

$18.45 million in administrative expenses.

Legislators OK Recovery Plan Grudgingly (NOTP)

By Robert Travis Scott

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 18, 2006

They warn governor to keep them in loop

BATON ROUGE -- A critical portion of the state's plan seeking billions of federal dollars for hurricane recovery passed a legislative panel Friday, but not without a warning shot to the governor's administration that lawmakers need to be better informed and integrated into the process.

In response, administration officials expressed concern that the flow of federal money for housing and other recovery programs could be unnecessarily delayed.

The Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget approved an "action plan" outlining how the state would spend $6.2 billion in federal block grants for storm relief. The plan next will be submitted to the full Legislature soon after it convenes a spring session on March 27, then will go to the Department of Housing and Urban Development for federal approval.

Among the components of the state's plan are $332.5 million for economic development bridge loans, $1.19 billion for local and state government infrastructure and $4.37 billion for housing recovery. The governor's handpicked Louisiana Recovery Authority designed the plan.

The panel approved what for the most part was a proposal for spending, not actual spending. But the request contained several items that would accelerate the state's ability to start spending money to put the plan in place.

Getting the facts

Among those items, several members of the committee raised concerns about a $9.8 million request to begin creating "recovery centers" to assist homeowners applying for loans and grants to repair their damaged properties. Though only a tiny amount of the overall package, the item is a catalyst for getting the housing program started, LRA director Andy Kopplin said.

The money would be used to begin the long process of getting the centers up and running, starting with official state requests for private companies and organizations to submit their proposals for doing the work, Kopplin said.

"Our greatest fear is that we're going to have the money available but the implementation status delayed," Kopplin said.

Panel member Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, criticized the recovery center request for its lack of clarity and wondered whether the state was using the money to hire staff.

"All I have is a piece of paper that says give me $9.8 million for a recovery center," Dardenne said. "We don't have any backup information."

Dardenne said the state might be better off using banks or accountants to implement the program, rather than creating its own bureaucracy. The recovery center request appeared to create a new layer of state administration on the housing issue, an idea the Legislature rejected in the recent special session, he said.

Kopplin said it was too early to know how the recovery centers would operate, because the state will first want to see how financial companies and nonprofit organizations propose to handle the work, and for how much compensation. That will not be known until the contract proposals come in, he said.

Sen. Francis Heitmeier, D-Algiers, who chaired the meeting, said the Legislature cannot do its job properly with such sparse information and short notice.

"We just can't have y'all throwin' numbers at us . . . and not knowing how you're going to use it," Heitmeier told Kopplin.

He said the committee did not want to create roadblocks to people getting their money, but repeatedly warned Kopplin that in the future lawmakers will expect more details.

If HUD approves the plan, the Legislature will once again have a say on budget requests for how to spend the money.

Hospitals feel squeeze

DOJ_NMG_0019241

The panel also heard Friday from representatives of Ochsner Foundation Hospital, West Jefferson Medical Center and East Jefferson General Hospital, which are operating under financial strains brought on by providing care to uninsured patients unable to pay their bills. Prior to Hurricane Katrina, the bulk of such care was provided to patients for free or at low cost by the state-run Charity Hospital, which is shut down.

With mounting costs, difficulty borrowing in the current economic climate and no immediate avenues for federal relief, the hospitals have reached a financial crisis in which they may have to curtail services and let go of staff, they said. And those professionals will be hard to lure back.

Meanwhile, the community needs more hospital beds to keep up with the recovery.

"What we're facing is wanting to do what's right for the community, but opening beds means increasing losses," said Mark Peters, president of East Jefferson General.

"The prudent business thing to do is close," said Patrick Quinlan, chief executive of Ochsner Clinic Foundation, noting that institutions that closed could collect business interruption insurance. "We get lots of sympathy, lots of understanding, but we've gotten zero help."

The health executives asked the Legislature to look for solutions during the upcoming session. On Friday, Rep. Steve Scalise, R-Jefferson, filed House Bills 989 and 1024 to allow non-state hospitals to receive reimbursement through the state for treating uninsured patients.

Congress Boosts Flood Insurance Agency (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, March 18, 2006

Congress has agreed to boost the borrowing power of the federal flood insurance agency, which is fast running out of money needed to meet some 225,000 claims from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

The legislation, passed by voice vote in the Senate late Thursday, allows the National Flood Insurance Program to borrow up to $20.8 billion from the Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $18.5 billion.

A year ago, before last summer's hurricanes, the borrowing limit was set at $1.5 billion.

The measure, approved by the House last month, now goes to the president for his signature.

The NFIP, set up in 1968 to help homeowners in flood-vulnerable areas get flood insurance at a reasonable rate, operates within the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

It has estimated claims liabilities from Katrina and Rita at $24 billion, more than the total of all claims paid in the history of the program. The agency had said that, without congressional action, it would hit its current borrowing ceiling this month and would have to tell insurance companies that administer claims payments to stop all such payments.

The NFIP insures about 4.4 million policyholders in some 20,000 communities across the country. Participating communities must agree to carry out floodplain management and other steps to reduce losses from floods.

Also on Thursday, the House Financial Services Committee approved a bill to improve the financial viability of the NFIP by giving FEMA greater authority to raise rates and increasing fines for non-enforcement of the mandatory purchase requirement. The measure would also increase the program's borrowing authority to $25 billion.

The Senate Banking Committee plans to take up a similar measure in the next few weeks.

That legislation follows on an act passed by Congress in 2004 to crack down on property owners who file repeated claims for flood damage without relocating or floodproofing their homes.

WAR NEWS:

Gen. Ambitious On Increasing Iraqi Control (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019242

The U.S. military's goal is to have Iraqi security forces in control of 75 percent of the country's territory by this summer, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Baghdad said Friday.

That is more ambitious than President Bush's statement on Monday that his aim was to have Iraqis control more territory than the U.S.-led coalition by the end of 2006 — a process that Bush said would free up more American troops to focus on training the Iraqi forces and hunting down the chief terrorists inside Iraq.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commander of Multinational Corps Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon that he had no firm estimate of how much territory the Iraqi forces currently control, but he said it was less than 50 percent.

"By this summer, about 75 percent of Iraq will be ... owned by Iraqi units," he said. Asked to be more specific, he said the plan was to get there by "the end of summer" and added, "All indications, we will make that, but again I don't want to be so precise as to put myself into a box."

Chiarelli did not further define the 75 percent goal, such as saying whether it would include some or all of the most troubled territory such as the area north and west of Baghdad known as the Sunni Triangle. The insurgent violence in Iraq is confined largely to that area and Anbar province west of the capital.

Speaking by videoteleconference from his headquarters, Chiarelli also said that while he believes Iraq is "far away" from civil war, the sectarian tensions created by a Feb. 22 attack on a Shiite shrine in Samarra mean "the possibility of civil war may be higher today than it has in the last three years."

He repeatedly stressed that he does not believe civil war will break out. "There are a vast majority of Iraqis in the middle, who don't see the divisions that are being highlighted" by reports about sectarian attacks, he added.

Chiarelli also said news reports in the weeks following the Feb. 22 mosque bombing have exaggerated the extent of sectarian violence.

The general described this week's heliborne assault on a large expanse of desert northeast of the city of Samarra, dubbed Operation Swarmer, as mainly an effort to flush out "terrorists and foreign fighters" and uncover arms caches in an area that he said was 10 miles by 10 miles in size and largely uninhabited.

Resistance was "very, very light," he said, adding that there would be "more and more" missions like this in the future.

"It really marks a change, and it marks an evolution (in) our ability to get outside many of the large metropolitan areas and conduct operations based intelligence we receive from U.S. sources, from Iraqi sources in areas where we think insurgent networks are operating," he said.

Earlier Friday, retired Gen. Richard Myers said on CBS's "The Early Show" there are many things the military "could have done differently" in Iraq from the start of the conflict three years ago this month.

"I can't single out one thing, but I can assure you that if we had this to do again, we'd look at different ways to do it," he said, adding, "we made mistakes, absolutely."

Myers retired from his post as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff last fall.

U.S. Wants Fewer Troops In Line Of Fire (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, March 18, 2006

The Pentagon wants to pull increasing numbers of American troops out of the line of fire in Iraq, but three years after the invasion this latest evolution in the U.S. military's mission will depend largely on whether Iraqi security forces can handle it.

Whether there will be the first sustained decline in American casualties since the insurgency took hold in late summer 2003 depends on how quickly and fully U.S. troops' roles are changed. So far more than 2,300 American troops have died in the campaign, with more than 17,000 wounded.

Though the stated goal of U.S. officials is to make a substantial withdrawal of troops this year, it is not yet clear that the Iraqis will prove ready — politically or militarily — to take on the added responsibility. A Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine set off sectarian violence that has slowed the process of forming a permanent government in Baghdad, more than three months after December's elections.

DOJ_NMG_0019243

This week the outlook was altered by two developments. The Pentagon announced it was sending 700 more U.S. troops into Iraq from Kuwait, and it launched a large assault on suspected insurgent territory near Samarra, north of Baghdad.

The dispatching of extra troops to Iraq pointed up the problem of relying too much on Iraqi security forces during periods of heightened tension. But the helicopter-led assault near Samarra, which involved large numbers of Iraqi troops, showed that Iraqi forces are taking on bigger responsibilities, top U.S. officers said.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Baghdad, said Friday that the goal is to turn control of 75 percent of the country's territory over to Iraqi forces by the end of summer. That did not necessarily mean the Iraqis would be given areas where the insurgency is strongest, but it did underscore the goal of enlarging their role.

Pentagon officials never expected that the invasion of Iraq, capped by a swift toppling of Saddam Hussein, would be followed by three years of deadly combat with a shadowy and resilient insurgency. Nor did they think it would take so long to get a capable Iraqi army trained and equipped.

"We did not plan three years ago to create more than token Iraqi forces," said Anthony Cordesman, an Iraq expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Now we're at 230,000 roughly, and counting. Our whole strategy is dependent on the success of the Iraqi army and the Iraqi police."

As U.S. commanders place more and more Iraqi territory under the control of local forces, Americans have begun moving to more of a back-seat role — putting the Iraqi army and police in charge. This is happening even with the expectation that at some point the Iraqis will careen off their path and need more U.S. help.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded to this in a Feb. 17 speech at the Council on Foreign Relations, when he said the Pentagon must keep pushing the Iraqis to stand on their own:

"We're going to have to pull out of some pieces of real estate and turn over things to Iraqis. And they're going to drop the ball; I mean, let's face it. And we're going to have to step in, go back in and fix it, and then turn it back over again. And it's going to be three steps forward and one step back."

Cordesman said in an interview that the U.S. military and the Bush administration vastly underestimated the difficulty they would face in stabilizing a conquered Iraq.

"We find ourselves having been able to prevent the insurgency from rising, but not from creating a growing risk of civil war," he said. "We have not by any means lost, but we can't say that we are — at least yet — winning."

Iraqi forces are being given full control of more territory each month, although U.S. soldiers are still operating with them as advisers, trainers and monitors. When an Iraqi army brigade assumed control of areas in central and southern Baghdad from the U.S. Army's 4th Infantry Division on Feb. 21, Col. Michael Beech said 60 percent of the capital was in Iraqi hands.

In a report to Congress on Feb. 24, the Pentagon said it will be possible to consider further U.S. troop reductions beyond the 7,000-troop cut announced by Rumsfeld in December. But it was cautious, noting that while U.S. troops may become less visible, their numbers might have to be increased at some point.

The last time the Pentagon began reducing the U.S. presence, in early 2004, the insurgency suddenly intensified, with a rash of U.S. troop deaths and a near complete breakdown of civil order in the city of Fallujah.

From a low point in January 2004 of just under 110,000, the U.S. troop total grew to about 142,000 four months later and has hovered in the range of 135,000 to 160,000 ever since. That has put an enormous strain on the military, particularly the Army and Marine Corps as the primary U.S. ground forces in Iraq.

The Pentagon says it is making progress in training Iraqi security forces, but officers directly involved acknowledge the task is complicated by language and other cultural gaps between the U.S. and Iraqi soldiers. Few Iraqis have more than a vague notion of what it means to have a professional military.

"They're worried about survival," said Maj. Rodrigo E. Mateo, who led a team of U.S. military advisers in Iraq last year. That can make it hard for the Americans to understand the motives of Iraqi army recruits and how they will react to military discipline, he said.

Mateo and other former Army trainers said in recent interviews that the quality of Iraqi recruits has varied widely.

"A lot of people joined (the Iraqi military) because that's the best opportunity they have to feed their families and to earn a living," said Lt. Col. Reginald E. Allen, a trainer in Iraq in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0019244

"If they get in that situation and the training is too rough for them or not does not adhere to their normal cultural standards where they get a certain amount of time off ... then they're going to jump ship," Allen said.

Convoy Duty Is Still Task Of U.S. (NOTP)

By David Wood, Newhouse News Service

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 18, 2006

Iraqis not trained for dangerous role

WASHINGTON -- No matter how many U.S. combat troops in Iraq eventually are replaced by Iraqis, an especially difficult and risky mission will remain an American responsibility: convoy duty.

The reality behind President Bush's assertion this week that Iraqi units are increasingly capable of standing on their own is that none can operate without heavy and sustained logistics support from the United States, according to military assessments.

This means the American soldiers who drive and guard convoys -- troops drawn mostly from Army Reserve and National Guard units that already have seen hard duty in Iraq -- will be exposed to highly dangerous conditions there for the foreseeable future.

This week, Staff Sgt. Bryan A. Lewis, 32, of Bunkie was killed during a convoy operation north of Rustamiyah on the edge of Baghdad. The Defense Department said the Louisiana man died Monday after an improvised explosive device detonated near his Humvee. Lewis was assigned to the 519th Military Police Battalion, 49th Military Police Brigade, Fort Polk.

Long, imperiled line

Every day, more than 1,000 trucks in long-haul convoys are on Iraq's roads delivering the fuel, spare parts, ammunition, boots, medical supplies, food and water on which both U.S. and Iraqi forces depend. Thousands more keep far-flung American Forward Operating Bases supplied with rations, water and ammunition.

The crawling lines are guarded by military police and soldiers in Humvees and armored combat vehicles, often with attack helicopters overhead. Convoys endure a steady drumbeat of sniper fire, ambushes, suicide vehicle attacks, roadside bombings and other assaults, and bear a major share of U.S. combat deaths and injuries. For security reasons, the Pentagon does not segregate convoy casualty data.

Approaching the third anniversary of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, Bush repeated this week that "as Iraqis stand up, America and our coalition will stand down," his formulation for replacing Americans in combat with Iraqis and bringing the troops home. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, meanwhile, said that "some 100 Iraqi battalions are in the fight against the terrorists, and 49 control their own battle space."

But by the Pentagon's own analysis, there are significant caveats.

In a wide-ranging assessment of the war, mandated by Congress, the Defense Department reported last month on the steadily growing numbers of Iraqi units taking to the field. Deep in the fine print, however, it warned that Iraq's forces remain "largely dependent" on the United States for logistics supply and support.

The problem is not just lack of trucks, drivers and security, but organization up to the defense ministry level, the Pentagon said.

Convoy training

It rated not one unit capable of fully independent operations, and added, "It will take some time before a substantial number of units are assessed as fully independent and requiring no assistance."

And, at present, Iraqis are not being prepared to take over convoy operations, U.S. Army transportation officers say. Instead, the Army is training increasing numbers of its own soldiers for convoy duty, once seen as a relatively soft "support" function and now viewed as a full-fledged combat assignment.

"We typically are the first ones in and the last ones out" of a war zone, said Col. Mike Dooley of the Army Transportation Corps, headquartered at Fort Eustis, Va.

Of Iraq, he added, "We will be there as long as the war goes on."

Dooley said he has urged the Army to begin readying the Iraqis to run their own convoys. "That hasn't happened yet," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0019245

The military freight that must eventually move by truck in Iraq is substantial. About 1,700 truckloads a month come by air to logistics bases in Kuwait or Qatar for onward shipment by air or truck. More tonnage comes by sea. Separately, Air Force C-130 and C-17 cargo planes land about 580 truckloads monthly at airstrips in Iraq, as close to troops as possible.

"By moving more cargo via airlift, we are able to reduce the number of vehicles, drivers and escorts exposed to the risk of enemy attack," said Brig. Gen. Darren McDew, director of mobility forces for U.S. Central Command Air Forces.

But all cargo must move at least some distance by truck. Managing the convoys becomes the responsibility of the thousands of officers and enlisted soldiers graduating from the Army's convoy courses.

Attention to detail

Today every basic trainee is taught convoy combat operations in anticipation of duty in Iraq. "We're sending them out into the wild, wild west, so we've got to prepare them," said Lt. Col. Chris Rizzo, a battalion commander overseeing live-fire convoy training at Fort Jackson, S.C.

At the Army's transportation center at Fort Eustis, Lt. Col. Andrew Peters, 39, chief of officer education, rides his students hard. As they prepare a training convoy, he barks, "Do you have a combat life saver? Have you looked in his bag to see if he's got IV solution?"

"I can't teach them every situation they will run into in Iraq," said Peters, whose elbow was shattered in an attack on his convoy in Iraq in August 2003. "They do need technical know-how -- how to call in a medevac -- but mostly what I teach them is attention to detail."

Pilgrims Attacked On Road To Holy City (WT/AP)

By Charles J. Hanley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

BAGHDAD -- With bombs and drive-by shootings, anti-Shi'ite extremists targeted pilgrims on the road to the holy city of Karbala yesterday, as political leaders remained divided over how to shape a broad-based government to work for peace in Iraq.

In Sunni Arab areas of western Baghdad, gunmen in passing vehicles killed three Shi'ite Muslim pilgrims and wounded five others. To the south, bombs in a minibus and along the pilgrimage road killed two persons and wounded nine.

North of the capital, helicopter-borne U.S. and Iraqi troops pressed their sweep through a 100-square-mile swath of the Sunni Triangle to break up a growing insurgent stronghold, the U.S. military said.

No resistance or casualties were reported as the offensive picked up dozens of insurgent suspects.

The operation was mounted Thursday northeast of the city of Samarra, where an insurgent bombing on Feb. 22 severely damaged a major Shi'ite shrine and ignited days of sectarian bloodshed across Iraq. More than 500 people died.

That spasm of violence deepened the political divide -- between representatives of the Shi'ite majority and Sunni minority -- that is blocking formation of a new government of national unity. An all-party meeting was scheduled for late yesterday to try to move those negotiations forward.

An American soldier was fatally shot Thursday while manning an observation post in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. The soldier was from the 101st Airborne Division's 3rd Brigade Combat Team, part of which is participating in the airborne sweep.

At least 2,312 members of the U.S. military have died since the war in Iraq started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Authorities had feared new attacks as tens of thousands of devout Shi'ites converged on Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad, for Monday's celebration of Arbaeen, a day of mourning for Imam Hussein, the prophet Muhammad's grandson, who was killed at Karbala in 680.

The bloodshed in Baghdad began yesterday as groups of Shi'ite faithful, many of them parents with children in tow, trekked down city streets in the morning, headed for the southbound highway to Karbala.

To help guard against violence in Shi'ite holy cities, the U.S. military earlier this week announced it was dispatching a fresh battalion of the 2nd Brigade, 1st Armored Division, about 700 troops, to Iraq from its base in Kuwait to provide extra security.

U.S. Seeks A Way Forward In Iraq (DMN)

DOJ_NMG_0019246

By Tod Robberson

The Dallas Morning News, March 18, 2006

Officials cite dangers as elements inside and out escalate tensions

LONDON — The U.S.-led invasion launched three years ago to oust Iraq's dictatorship and eliminate weapons of mass destruction has instead pushed it to the brink of civil war and escalated Iraqi fears of imminent doom at the hands of radical militiamen.

Though this was hardly the outcome President Bush envisioned when he ordered the March 19, 2003, assault on Iraq, senior U.S. officials now acknowledge that their plans have gone awry. Iraqi leaders and clerics are urging restraint as they warn that their nation, already split along sectarian and ethnic lines, is close to imploding.

In a region already fraught with decades of war and religious friction, an Iraqi civil conflict has catastrophic implications, according to diplomats and academic researchers. Fears are mounting that fighting between Shiite and Sunni Muslims in Iraq could spark broader conflict around the region, and that Iraq's security void is tempting its neighbors to meddle militarily.

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, underscored the dangers when he warned this month of the regional implications of civil war in Iraq, telling the Los Angeles Times, "We have opened the Pandora's box, and the question is, what is the way forward?"

President Bush stated bluntly in a speech Tuesday, "I wish I could tell you that the violence is waning and that the road ahead will be smooth. It will not. There will be more tough fighting and more days of struggle, and we will see more images of chaos and carnage in the days and months to come."

The State Department's coordinator for Iraq policy, James Jeffrey, expressed "full confidence" in the ability of Iraqi security forces to quell sectarian violence and added in a prepared statement Monday, "While civil war is a possibility, we do not believe that it is likely at this point."

There appears little or nothing that the 157,000 foreign troops, mainly Americans, deployed in Iraq can do to stop the bloodshed, officials and analysts agree.

"There can only be an Iraqi solution to this violence," Mr. Jeffrey stated.

Signs of divisions

Iraqis point to a number of worrying signs that the nation's security forces are dividing along sectarian lines. In Baghdad and the southern city of Basra, Shiite-dominated police forces have engaged in mass roundups of Sunni Muslims, in some cases torturing suspects and holding them without trial in secret jails.

Police this week uncovered a mass grave in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad filled with the bodies of 87 men who appeared to have been shot execution style.

Sunni militants have stepped up a campaign of bombings and mortar attacks aimed at Shiite religious shrines and busy street markets. A Feb. 22 bomb attack that blew up one of Iraq's most sacred Shiite shrines helped spark the current wave of bloodshed that has led to more than 500 deaths so far.

"We hear mortars or bombs almost every night," said Osama Saadoun, a Baghdad resident contacted by telephone. "Nowadays, the conditions are so hard that you cannot leave your house. If you have work, you must leave early in the morning and just hope you get to the office alive. When you get there, you sit down at the desk and say, 'Thanks to God.'

Mr. Saadoun, who described himself as non-Muslim and nonpolitical, said there is a widespread feeling in Iraq that the American military presence is making matters worse, not better.

"There used to be agreement, generally, that it [foreign presence] was good. Now, I think that 90 percent of the people think it's time for the Americans to go out. … Personally, I think Iraq is at a very critical edge."

Elements inside the country appear intent on pushing tensions to the breaking point, said Munir Chalabi, an Iraqi anti-war activist based in London. He said the primary instigators are Iraqi members of the radical Sunni Islamist group al-Qaeda, as well as supporters of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein.

But he also blamed U.S. political decisions in Iraq that helped cause the nation's political system to develop primarily along sectarian and ethnic lines, rather than creating parties with a cross-sectarian membership.

DOJ_NMG_0019247

"The strategy concentrates on dividing the Iraqi people on ethnic and religious grounds. When you divide a society this way, you only increase the possibility of tensions and … civil war," Mr. Chalabi said.

His assertions are backed by poll results released ahead of national parliamentary elections in December in which 34 percent of respondents listed religion as the single most important consideration influencing their vote — double the percentage who listed a candidate's qualifications or a party's platform. The International Republican Institute conducted the poll.

With democratic institutions already split, Mr. Chalabi said, the nation is ripe for provocation, and Sunni Islamists appear intent on exploiting it with bomb attacks on Shiite shrines. Their goal, he said, is a war that would wipe out Islam's minority Shiite sect, which they regard as a heretic offshoot of mainstream Sunni Islam.

Outside help

According to various analysts, Iraq's Sunni militants are receiving support from radical backers in several neighboring countries, including Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

Apparently to counter the Sunni threat, overwhelmingly Shiite Iran has been dispatching intelligence agents and other personnel to advise pro-Iranian Shiite militias in Iraq, according to British and U.S. government reports.

Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. secretary of defense, charged Tuesday that Iran was deliberately trying to destabilize Iraq by sending Revolutionary Guard troops and weapons across the border.

"A 'reasonable man' test would suggest that they're not freelancing, and they're not pilgrims," Mr. Rumsfeld said of the Iranian military infiltration.

On Thursday, Iran invited U.S. officials to meet for talks on stabilizing the situation in Iraq, a development the U.S. welcomed very cautiously.

Turkey has threatened to intervene if Iraq's Kurdish minority takes advantage of civil strife to declare an independent Kurdish state in northern Iraq. Polls in northern Iraq indicate an overwhelming majority of ethnic Kurds favor independence.

Few viable options remain for the Bush administration, said David G. Newton, U.S. ambassador to Iraq from 1984 to 1988 and now adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute in Washington.

After months of haggling since the December election, Iraqi leaders have yet to agree on a permanent government. Elected leaders "are becoming less and less relevant as the … blood lust and the revenge heats up," Mr. Newton said. Under such rapidly deteriorating circumstances, he added, "the pressure to cut and run will be overwhelming" for Mr. Bush.

The final step to civil war would be the breakup of government security forces into opposing sectarian armies. If that happened, there would be little reason for U.S. troops to remain anyway.

"The bottom line is to have some kind of government — friendly or not — that can minimally maintain order," Mr. Newton said. "You can forget about human rights, women's rights, democracy and all of that stuff. If you can't achieve that, then it is a victory for the radicals."

Political Offensive Targets Bush (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

Senate Democrats have mapped a political battle plan for the March congressional recess that calls on lawmakers to stage press events with active duty military personnel, veterans and emergency responders to bash President Bush on virtually every one of his national security policies.

The game plan, devised by the office of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is contained in a six-page memo distributed to Democratic senators on Thursday at a closed-door meeting at the Capitol and provided to The Washington Times by a congressional staffer.

Titled "Real Security," the political document calls for staged town hall events at military bases, weapons factories, National Guard units, fire stations and veterans posts.

"Ensure that you have the proper U.S. and state flags at the event, and consider finding someone to sing the national anthem and lead the group in the Pledge of Allegiance at the start of the event," the battle plan states.

DOJ_NMG_0019248

However, the Defense Department prohibits political events on military bases. The rule states, "commanders will not permit the use of installation facilities by any candidate for political campaign or election events, including public assemblies or town hall meetings. ..."

Jim Manley, Mr. Reid's spokesman, said yesterday the planned events are not part of a political campaign. They would involve only incumbent Democratic senators, some of whom are up for re-election, but not Democratic Senate challengers, he said. Democrats hope to capture Senate control in November's election.

"These are events to highlight the need for increased funding for the troops," Mr. Manley said. "It's an effort to paint the White House and the Republican Congress as having a failed effort on national security issues, which is a direct result of their misplaced priorities and mismanagement."

The Senate plan urges holding town hall events to "draw attention to the security vulnerabilities caused by the Bush budget and explain how Democrats fought to restore programs that keep America safe."

The plan is the latest attempt by Democrats to criticize Mr. Bush on national security issues in the aftermath of the Dubai ports deal dust-up, which Republicans conceded was mishandled by the administration. One of the few areas where Republicans continue to poll well versus Democrats is on fighting terrorists.

In almost every issue in the Reid memo, Democratic lawmakers are called upon to criticize the president for not spending enough federal dollars.

The plan urges the lawmakers to:

•"Hold a town hall meeting with state officials and a local National Guard unit at their armory to discuss the security impact of long deployments. ... Ask National Guard members to offer input on how security and disaster response at home is compromised by long deployments."

•"Hold a town hall meeting with troops at a local military installation. ... When selecting a location at the military installation for the event, make sure to select a space that allows easy press access and clearly conveys the message in the shot. Planes, vehicles, equipment and signage in the background enhance the pictures coming out of your event."

•"Work with [veterans] organizations ... to find recently returned Iraq and Afghanistan veterans willing to discuss the mental effects they or their fellow veterans have experienced."

•"Tour a factory in your state that manufactures military equipment like Humvees or body armor and hold a press availability afterwards with Iraq and Afghanistan veterans on the importance of protective equipment."

•"Visit the home of a military family that has purchased body armor on their own for a family member serving in Iraq or Afghanistan and hold an open press 'conversion' on the issue. ... Ask the family if they would be willing to hold the open press conversation/town hall meeting in their yard, on their front porch or in their home."

As commander in chief, Mr. Bush has made frequent visits to military bases in the United States and abroad. His remarks are generally limited to explaining his war policies and encouraging the troops.

The Democratic memo calls on senators to seek the help of the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA), which is critical of Mr. Bush.

The IAVA political action committee has raised for $100,000 for Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans running for the House. It has endorsed all seven Democrats in that category who are running against House Republicans. An IAVA PAC spokesman said Republican candidates chose not to seek the group's endorsement.

Wisconsin Voters Prepare To Weigh In On The War In Iraq (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Referendum Stirs Passion on Both Sides

WATERTOWN, Wis. -- In an exercise that one side calls democracy and the other considers a disservice, voters in 30 Wisconsin towns will cast ballots next month on whether the Bush administration should withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0019249

From Baraboo and Monona to Madison and La Crosse, antiwar activists invoked a 1911 state law to schedule a bring-the-troops-home referendum designed to send a message to Congress and the White House that the war is costing too many lives and too much money.

Watertown, a conservative city of 23,000 on the Rock River, voted strongly for President Bush in the past two elections, yet war opponents had no trouble gathering nearly 1,000 signatures to put the referendum on the April 4 ballot. The City Council objected, but it was overruled by a local court.

Letters from readers flew into the popular "Voice of the People" section of the Watertown Daily Times. Posters began popping up. Veterans groups, including the American Legion, have been discussing how to turn a referendum they oppose into a victory for U.S. forces.

Meaning and motivation are discussed as heatedly as the referendum itself.

"We got accused of splitting the community," said Penny Eiler, 59, an organizer of the ballot question. "We weren't the ones who split the community. It was split already. All we did was give the people who didn't have a voice a voice."

Nationally, three years after the U.S. invasion, 76 cities have passed resolutions calling for troops to come home, most recently Corvallis, Ore., and Lansdowne, Pa. Among them are Chicago; Berkeley, Calif.; Chapel Hill, N.C.; and Gary, Ind., as well as dozens of towns in Vermont.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll earlier this month found that 57 percent of Americans believe the Iraq war has not been worth fighting, with 52 percent saying U.S. troop levels should be decreased. Among that group, one-third said withdrawal should be immediate.

Peace groups have waged counter-recruitment drives at high schools and colleges across the country, pressing to provide information tables or teach-ins about alternatives to military service. Antiwar organizations have scheduled hundreds of protests and other events to mark the war's third anniversary this weekend, yet the national effort to end the war has proved fitful.

"Attitudes are a little more complicated than thumbs up or thumbs down," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center. "Americans do care about Iraq, but it doesn't have the personal impact that the war in Vietnam had. Secondly, this is a more patriotic time. Even though the public is disillusioned with the war in Iraq, it tends to support the concept of preemptive war at a time when most people feel we're at risk."

Objections to the war in Wisconsin, which has long had twin streaks of activism and iconoclasm, have been growing steadily, to the dismay of Watertown residents such as Steve Gillis, who wears a green T-shirt that says "Army tradition."

The father of a soldier who served recently in Iraq, Gillis spent more than 20 years in the Wisconsin Army National Guard, and he does not like what the referendum is doing to his town or the troops he admires.

"They say they're supporting the troops, but they're not," said Gillis, 53, a city worker who believes that the troops and the mission are inseparable.

Gillis sees in the Wisconsin initiative an echo of the 1960s protests against the Vietnam War in nearby Madison that helped sour a nation on the war and how it was fought. He said: "We gave up before our mission was accomplished, and we turned around and came home. I don't want to see that happen again."

The passion in some quarters in Watertown is as clear as the writing on the window of lawyer Ronald W. Ziwisky's downtown office and the words sent from Iraq by Army Capt. Jim Leslie, who left his City Council post late last year to serve as a chaplain in the 4th Infantry Division.

"Sent to their death by Osama: 2,189," Ziwisky's window read on a recent day, referring to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"Sent to their death by George: 2,296," referring to the number of American casualties since the Iraq war began.

As the council debated the referendum, Leslie wrote from Forward Operating Base Duke to urge them not to permit the April vote. He said "disagreement is an all-American pastime" but also said passing the measure would comfort the enemy and frustrate U.S. soldiers.

"We had five soldiers killed recently here from an IED," Leslie said, referring to an improvised explosive device. "Soldiers hate war. I saw with my own eyes what war does to soldiers, and I hope never to see it again. Please send us an encouraging referendum or don't send one at all."

DOJ_NMG_0019250

The Watertown referendum, like most others in the state, began with the Wisconsin Green Party, which made a pitch to Eiler and her group in October. Drawing on a law from the Progressive Era that sanctioned "direct legislation" in municipalities as a curb on power, activists soon started gathering signatures -- a number equal to 15 percent of the people who voted for governor in the last election.

When the city clerk checked their work, 986 of the 1,000 signatures proved valid, six more than they needed.

The City Council objected, however, voting 5 to 4 that the issue was a federal matter unsuitable for local action. Eiler and fellow members of the Watertown Peace and Democracy Coalition filed suit.

A judge ruled in their favor and ordered the council to approve a resolution on its own or set a referendum. The council approved a citywide vote. But members also voted 8 to 0 to declare their opposition to the referendum.

"Be it resolved," the ballot issue reads, in language that differs slightly among the Wisconsin towns, "the city of Watertown urges the United States to begin an immediate withdrawal of its troops from Iraq, starting with National Guard and Reserves."

Mayor John David said the politics became personal, but he said he mostly hears comments that amount to spoofs, such as the person who collared him at a high school basketball game and said Watertown ought to vote on renaming Minnesota's official state bird, for all the influence the town has over national security policy.

"If it was something that no matter how it turned out, it might do some good, it might be worth discussing," said David, whose office in a Republican town is nonpartisan. "But we're having the discussion, and I'm not sure it's going to do any good. That's the sad part of it."

A number of anti-referendum organizations have established steering committees and Web sites in an effort to defeat the April 4 measures. One site urges "Vote No to Cut and Run" and admonishes readers to "let our troops git 'er done."

Chris Muller, chairman of the La Crosse Republican Party, runs Choosevictory.org, which aims to defeat the antiwar activists at their own game. Like their counterparts to the east, La Crosse council members permitted the referendum but voted 13 to 3 to oppose an immediate troop withdrawal.

"A defeatist attitude is not going to get us anywhere in the world, and it's certainly not going to help our children in the future," Muller said, adding that a yes vote would harm troop morale. "Constantly seeing the negative stuff and not seeing the good that they're doing over there, and having people essentially second-guessing them and their leadership has got to have an effect on them."

That is not how the referendum's supporters see the exercise.

"People always have to lead politicians. Politicians are waiting to see which way the wind is blowing," said Bill Reichertz, who gathered signatures for the petition in Watertown. "The fight is worth it no matter whether we win or lose, because democracy lets people have a vote."

Even As Support For War Shrinks, Few Protest It (SFC)

By Joe Garofoli

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

Even though polls say a majority of Americans think President Bush has bungled the war in Iraq and now oppose it, anti-war organizers are struggling to get new converts to tell someone besides pollsters that the country needs to change course.

Activists say the fear of being labeled unpatriotic or unsupportive of the nation's troops will keep many anti-war newcomers away from today's 11 a.m. demonstration in San Francisco and the hundreds of others around the country marking the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Organizers expect several thousand demonstrators to show up for the downtown march and rally at Civic Center, compared to the tens of thousands who strode down Market Street in the weeks before the war.

The movement's focus has shifted in the past couple of years from the street to online organizing and opposing military recruiting in high schools. But anti-war forces are still frustrated that more Americans -- and Congress -- haven't actively opposed the administration's policy.

DOJ_NMG_0019251

"People get more involved when they see a glimmer of hope in the Iraq story," said Tom Matzzie, the Washington, D.C., director of the 3.3 million-member MoveOn.org. A "positive story" for the left, Matzzie said, such as Cindy Sheehan's vigil last August outside Bush's Texas ranch, excites donors and brings people out for demonstrations.

Another good-news story for the anti-war movement -- Pennsylvania Democratic Rep. John Murtha's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq -- prompted MoveOn members to contribute $350,000 in 48 hours last November after an online fundraising plea. By contrast, members dropped only $90,000 after MoveOn issued an appeal for money when the 2,000th U.S. soldier was killed in Iraq.

Yet Sheehan isn't everyone's cup of activism -- even in her home state. A Field Poll of 680 registered California voters released this month found that 36 percent had an unfavorable rating of Sheehan, and 24 percent saw her favorably. Forty percent had no opinion.

"As an organizer, it can be tricky to find that sweet spot where people want to get involved," Matzzie said.

With that in mind, MoveOn will focus on electing strong anti-war candidates to Congress this year, even if that means opposing incumbent Democrats. Earlier this year, the group raised money for Texas Democrat Ciro Rodriguez for his unsuccessful primary race against Rep. Henry Cuellar, who is seen as supportive of Bush's policies.

Matzzie said 86 percent of MoveOn's members say they want the organization to challenge Democrats who are "consistently wrong" on the issues dear to the liberal membership.

"A lot of people are frustrated because they don't think there's anything they can do," said Karen Dolan, a fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, a liberal think tank in Washington, D.C.

She has been working on a nonbinding resolution to "bring the troops home now," which will be voted on April 4 by 30 cities and towns in Wisconsin. Voters and representatives in 76 cities nationwide -- including San Francisco, Oakland and other Bay Area cities -- have passed similar resolutions.

Dolan says there is value in the symbolic gesture.

"Wisconsin is a swing state," she said. "And aside from Madison, which is very liberal, a lot of those towns (with measures on the ballot) are in conservative parts of the state."

In the months before the invasion, some anti-war leaders pledged to make an extra effort to include more voices from the Latino community in the peace movement, which has traditionally been dominated by white, middle-class activists. But while organizers have printed leaflets and other materials in Spanish and English, those outreach efforts have failed to engage much of the Latino community, which polls show opposes the war.

"Our community is never going to identify with these larger anti-war organizations like United for Peace or Code Pink or International Answer," said Pablo Paredes, who was sentenced to three months of hard labor and busted down to the Navy's lowest rank for refusing to board a ship bound for the Persian Gulf in December 2004. Now he travels the country on behalf of anti-war organizations to oppose military recruiting on high school campuses.

"There was a little bit of communication gap between the big organizations and the community," Paredes said. "The rhetoric was there, but those organizations were always saying, 'Come have a seat at our table,' instead of joining us in our community." Plus, Paredes said that after Sept. 11, many Latino immigrants fear publicly opposing the administration because they don't want to be seen as unpatriotic.

Paredes, along with several other Latino war resisters and activists, began a walk this week from Tijuana to San Francisco's Mission District. Their goal was to rally support for a separate Latino anti-war movement. "We hope to be lighting candles along the way that will lead to something bigger," he said.

Something bigger, like a change in the administration's Iraq policy, is unlikely to happen as long as Congress backs the war and pays for it. Demonstrators at a rally and march at noon today at Palo Alto's Civic Center Plaza had been planning to drop 2,000 handbills outside the office of Rep. Anna Eshoo, D-Atherton, that said, "I urge you to take a stronger stance against the war in Iraq."

But after Eshoo voted Thursday against the latest bill to pay for military operations in Iraq, organizers will encourage marchers to write, "Thanks for voting against the funding" on the cards. The $92 billion spending package -- the sixth since the United States invaded Iraq -- passed the House easily. The Senate is expected to vote on its version in the next month.

DOJ_NMG_0019252

"We're kind of scrambling after she voted that way," said Paul George, a rally organizer who is director of the Peninsula Peace and Justice Center.

Anti-war organizers have been frustrated that the movement hasn't taken root in the suburbs. George is hoping for a crowd of 2,000 people at today's rally. In Walnut Creek, activists are expecting about 1,000 people and are advertising an all-star cast of liberals more commonly found in the big city.

Former San Francisco Supervisor Matt Gonzalez, Bush-bashing media critic Norman Solomon and hip-hop artist Boots Reilly of the Coup will be awaiting marchers meeting at 11 a.m. at the Walnut Creek BART station. Last year's highlight of a much smaller rally in the Contra Costa County city: an oom-pah band.

Co-organizer Mary Alice O'Connor joked that Gonzalez, who is strongly identified with San Francisco's hipster community, might need directions to get to Walnut Creek.

"We want to wake up people in the suburbs," O'Connor said. "There's a lot of people sitting in their homes out here, thinking the same thoughts, but they're afraid that nobody else feels the same way. We want to show people that their neighbor feels the same way."

O'Connor said many suburbanites don't want to go to a San Francisco rally because they are put off by the many causes on display at such events that seemingly have no connection to the Iraq war.

"People don't want to get into the middle of the Israel-Palestine thing," she said. "They say that they feel that people are yelling at them at the rallies."

Rachael Hereford, a youth organizer with International Answer, which is sponsoring the San Francisco demonstration, said suburban rallies are "a long time coming, and it shows that the anti-war movement isn't just the hippie faces that the media shows you all the time."

But anti-war organizing can't stop with a demonstration, she conceded.

"It's easy to get students to come to a demonstration," Hereford said. "But will they bring their friends? And will they start organizing against the war when they go back to school?"

Hold The President Accountable (NYT)

By Senator Russell Feingold

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

To the Editor:

Re "Time for Facts, Not Resolutions" (editorial, March 17):

The president broke the law, and Congress must hold the president accountable.

You are right that the nation deserves to know more details about the National Security Agency's spying program, but there's nothing we could learn that would change the fact that by authorizing the program, the president broke the law.

Member of both parties who have concerns about the legality of the N.S.A.'s program, and there are quite a few, should not try to avoid that central issue while offering proposals to legalize the president's conduct.

I strongly support wiretapping terrorists to protect our national security, which current law allows.

The president needs to follow that law, or inform Congress of any reasons he thinks that law should be changed. He has a responsibility to obey the laws that Congress passes.

There must be no equivocation on that central tenet of our system of government.

I applauded Senator Harry Reid's effort to take the Senate into closed session to get answers on the intelligence and policy failures leading up to the Iraq war. But to suggest that such a maneuver is our only recourse now ignores the role the founders expected Congress to play when a president commits such a flagrant abuse of power.

We don't need a closed session to highlight the president's lawbreaking; we need an open debate and an expression of the Senate's judgment.

Members of Congress do need to "fulfill their sworn duty," as you suggest, and that means censuring a president who so plainly broke the law and violated the trust of the American people.

Democrats' Dilemma (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, March 18, 2006

The Dems must satisfy their base without alienating the rest of the country. Russ Feingold's censure bid isn't the smartest way to do that.

Republicans finally had something to celebrate this week when Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold called for censuring George W. Bush. Democrats must have a death wish. Just when the momentum was going against the president, Feingold pops up to toss the GOP a life raft.

It's brilliant strategy for him, a dark horse presidential candidate carving out a niche to the left of Hillary Clinton. The junior senator from New York is under attack for being too soft on Bush and the war, and most of the non-Hillarys are to her right. There is a vacuum in the heart of the party's base that Feingold fills, but at what cost? His censure proposal looks like a stunt, "the equivalent of calling for a filibuster from Davos," says Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow with the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. To win in '06, he says, "Democrats need to take the Hippocratic Oath: first, do no harm."

Just as John Kerry's belated effort to stop Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation to the Supreme Court failed to rally his fellow Democrats, Feingold's move toward censure has been received like a foul odor, sending Democrats scurrying for the exits. Only two of his colleagues, Iowa's Tom Harkin and California's Barbara Boxer, signed on as cosponsors. And for good reason. The broader public sees it as political extremism. Just when the Republicans looked like they were coming unhinged, the Democrats serve up a refresher course on why they can't be trusted with the keys to the country. Nor could it have come at a better time for a Republican Party still battered by bad news in the polls. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC survey, released earlier this week, shows that Bush's job approval rating at its lowest ever—37 percent—as a majority of Americans lose confidence that the Iraq war will end successfully. The same poll shows a significant uptick in the country's willingness to accept a Democratic Congress, with 50 percent of those questioned saying they would prefer the party to control Congress. Thirty-seven percent say they want it controlled by Republicans.

The Democrats' dilemma is how to satisfy a restive and angry base without losing the rest of the country. "If someone proposed stringing up Bush like they did Mussolini, that would have a lot of support in the base of the party, too," says a Democratic strategist. "But it's not smart." Democrats want the November election to be a plebiscite on Bush's job performance, not a personal vendetta. "Republicans will rally round him if they think it's a personal attack just like we did with Clinton," warns the strategist.

Feingold has a reputation for being a principled politician who often takes positions at odds with his party. He didn't give Senate leader Harry Reid a heads-up about his censure motion, and Democrats were caught off-guard. What the country saw wasn't pretty, Democrats dodging and weaving and Republicans loving the whole sorry spectacle. With everything souring for the Republicans, the only thing that can rescue them is a foil, and Feingold's call for censure offered that, at least for now. Conservative radio hosts were raising the specter of impeachment should the Democrats take over the House in November, a call to arms for the otherwise demoralized GOP base.

The joy among Republicans could only be matched in the blogosphere, where liberal Democrats cheered Feingold—a synergy that prompted the DLC's Wittmann to speculate that the right and left are codependent. But the political mixing and matching provide only a brief respite from the real politics that will determine each party's fortunes in November. Congressional insiders say if the election were held today, the Democrats would capture 18 to 23 seats in the House. They need 15 to regain the majority. Things could get better by November, or worse, depending on your perspective.

There is talk of a possible October surprise to revive the GOP's standing, and the fact that the biggest military air assault in Iraq since the war began came the day after Bush sank to 33 percent in a Pew poll had some Democrats suspicious. "Is it an attempt to prop up his numbers?" asks the Democratic strategist. "It's probably not fair to think that, but it shows where we are in this presidency."

With the war about to enter its fourth year, the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, held a seminar on "Next Steps for U.S. Policy" that featured a keynote address by former national-security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski. "I favor a decision by the U.S. to leave Iraq," Brzezinski declared. "I would ask the Iraqi leaders to ask us to leave," he explained, adding he would talk with them first privately and "treat them as adults, not colonial wards." He sees two parallel wars in Iraq, one is the insurgency, which is consolidating and widening, and the other is the growing sectarian violence. “We are engaged in a war of attrition,” he said, and unless the Bush administration puts in 500,000 troops—the number it would take to crush the opposition—U.S. policymakers need to make “a very cold judgment whether staying the course is likely to be more or less damaging to U.S. interests.”

Brzezinski, a hawk during the Carter administration, has emerged as a hero among progressives frustrated by their party’s unwillingness to take a stand. Democrats have been “silent or evasive” on the war, he said, offering no alternative, which is “a form of political desertion.” If Democrats don’t want to talk about censure, they could change the topic in an instant with a credible exit plan from Iraq.

Bush The "Incompetent" (TIME)

By Matthew Cooper

Time, March 18, 2006

The polls are bad enough. Now the President fails a word-assocation test

Over the last seven years, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press has played a game of word association as part of its regular presidential polling, asking, "What one word best describes your impression of George W. Bush?" No options or suggestions are offered. The latest results — from a sample of 710 people done in March — aren't good for the President. Until this month, the word most associated with President Bush had always been "honest." Now the leading answer is "incompetent" (given by 29 people), followed by "good", "idiot" and "liar." "Honest" has slipped to 5th, tied with "Christian."

Three years ago, positive descriptions of Bush far outnumbered negative ones. In the past two years, the positive-negative ratio has been more nearly equal. This time, 48% of those polled used a negative word to describe Bush; just 28% picked a positive term; 10% chose neutral language. Six respondents chose a word that everyone could agree on: "President."

Bush Adviser Says Iran Bluffing On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, March 18, 2006

President Bush's top foreign policy adviser said Friday that Iran's new willingness to talk about Iraq with the United States is probably a ploy designed to "divert pressure and divert attention" from international concern that Tehran wants a nuclear bomb.

The United States has accused Iran of using a civilian nuclear program as a cover to build atomic weapons, an allegation Tehran denies. The U.N. Security Council is expected to discuss Iran's nuclear program this month, with Washington pressing for penalties.

The Bush administration views Tehran's acceptance of an American offer to talk about Iraq, made months ago, as an indication that Iran is feeling the international heat, national security adviser Steven J. Hadley said.

"What is interesting is that the Iranians would choose now, at this moment, in such a very public way, to embrace this idea and try to expand it to a negotiation about a broader set of issues," Hadley said.

"The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try and divert pressure that they're feeling in New York, to try and drive a wedge between the United States and the other countries with which we are working on the nuclear issue and, if you will, divert pressure and divert attention."

Hadley added: "Obviously, this is something that we and those who are working with us on these issues will not let happen."

The secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, Ali Larijani, said Thursday that Iran would discuss Iraq directly with the United States. Washington has accused Tehran of meddling in Iraqi politics and of supporting armed militias in Iraq by sending men and weapons, including components for increasingly lethal roadside bombs.

There was concern Friday in the Bush administration that the Iranian offer could increase the stature of Iran's government in its citizens' eyes, raise Tehran's status in the region and curry broader international sympathy that could undermine the U.N. Security Council efforts.

For that reason, there was also skepticism that talks would even take place.

"They've made such statements in the past that they would be open to talking about the matters in Iraq," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan. "We'll have to see."

DOJ_NMG_0019255

The administration is proceeding with discussions about a meeting on the chance that it could save lives — as well as out of concern that the administration would be criticized if it didn't try, said a senior administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the diplomatic situation.

Earlier this week, Bush said Iran had supplied components for roadside bombs, which the president called the greatest threats to U.S. troops in Iraq.

But officials made clear that any talks with Iran would be given as low-key a status as possible, in an effort to defuse any broader benefit Iran might gain. The Bush administration is also sensitive to possible criticism that talks with Iran represent negotiating with terrorists.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, in charge of discussions on the talks, said Friday in an interview with The Associated Press that any meeting should be held in Baghdad. He also made clear that discussions would be limited only to issues related to Iraq, not the standoff over Tehran's nuclear activities, and would represent merely a face-to-face forum for the United States to state concerns it has expressed publicly.

"This is not a negotiation by any means," McClellan said.

U.S. Eyes Baghdad For Talks With Iran (WT)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

From combined dispatches

BAGHDAD -- The American ambassador said yesterday he wants to talk with the Iranians -- but not negotiate -- in Baghdad.

"We are not entering into negotiations about Iraq with Iran. The Iraqis will decide the future of Iraq. We have concerns -- and I've spoken about them -- with regard to Iranian policy in Iraq," U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad told the Associated Press in an interview.

In Washington, the Bush administration said any meeting would have to involve Iraqi leaders, and it expressed concern that Iran might use such a meeting to divert attention from its nuclear program.

"The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try to divert pressure that they are feeling in New York," said National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, referring to talks at the U.N. Security Council.

The United States has not decided whether to talk to Iran about its support for armed Shi'ite militias in Iraq, a U.S. official told the AP on the condition of anonymity.

The majority of Iraqis are Shi'ite Muslims. The overwhelming majority of Iranians belong to that sect and are governed by a Shi'ite theocracy.

Many important Shi'ite religious shrines are located in Iraq, meaning that thousands of pilgrims routinely cross the countries' long, common border.

Iraqi Sunnis objected yesterday to any U.S.-Iranian engagement.

"Iran is interfering deeply in Iraqi affairs, and the Iraqi people are afraid that a deal might be settled between Iran and America at the expense of Iraq's independence," said Bashar al-Faydi, a spokesman for the Association of Muslim Scholars.

Mr. Khalilzad said that talks would be limited to Iraq -- not the angry U.S. standoff with Tehran over its nuclear program.

The Afghanistan-born Mr. Khalilzad, who can speak with Iranians in a common language -- his native Dari is a Persian dialect -- insisted there would be no bargaining with Iran.

The 54-year-old ambassador has held talks with Iranians before, when he was envoy to Afghanistan, Iran's neighbor to the east.

"I was authorized by the president of the United States to talk with the Iranians about our concerns about Afghanistan. So I'm doing the same thing now here," he said.

"I think we would assume since these discussions are with regard to our concern with Iranian policies in Iraq that [the talks] should be in Baghdad," Mr. Khalilzad said.

The Iranians said their participation in talks may help Iraqis form a stable government.

DOJ_NMG_0019256

"The Islamic Republic of Iran will hold talks with the United States about Iraq to help the process of building a government there, and to support the Iraqi people," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said in a speech to worshippers who had gathered at Tehran University for Friday prayers.

Meanwhile, at the United Nations in New York, Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said the Security Council should give Iran "four weeks to six weeks" to comply with demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog that it halt all uranium enrichment activities.

Speaking before a formal meeting of the council on the crisis, Mr. Wang said: "We must leave sufficient time for diplomacy and for the [U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency] to work ... at least four weeks to six weeks."

Russia's U.N. ambassador yesterday also spoke in opposition to proposals for the council to demand a quick progress report on Iran's suspect nuclear program.

He said, reportedly only half in jest, that fast action could lead to the bombing of Iran by June.

Andrey Denisov spoke just before a Security Council meeting in which diplomats considered a revised list of British, French and American proposals for a statement on Iran.

A key sticking point for Russia is a proposal asking Mohamed ElBaradei, the chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to deliver a report in two weeks on Iran's progress toward clearing up suspicions about its nuclear program.

U.S., Iran Closer To Talks On Iraq (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And William Branigin

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Concern About Tehran's Role in Country Reopens Channels

BAGHDAD, March 17 -- U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Friday that back-channel discussions were underway with Iran on resuming direct talks about Iraq that broke off shortly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, and he said the talks should be held in Baghdad.

Khalilzad said he would not describe the proposed talks as "negotiations" but as a chance to express concerns about what Washington and some in Iraq regard as Iran's alarming activities here.

"Iraqis will decide their own future," Khalilzad said, "but they have concerns about [Iranian] policy regarding Iraq."

The ambassador spoke after the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad issued a statement critical of Iran in response to remarks Thursday by the top Iranian national security official.

Saying that the embassy had taken note of remarks by Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, the statement said: "The future of Iraq will not be decided by the United States, Iran or any other country. Iraqis will decide the future of Iraq. The United States is concerned about unhelpful Iranian activities in Iraq. These concerns are well known, and we have talked about them."

Khalilzad's comments came a day after Tehran offered to enter into talks with the United States aimed at stabilizing Iraq, following a request to do so by the Shiite Muslim political heavyweight Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who spent years in self-imposed exile in Iran when Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq. Hakim's party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and other members of the Shiite coalition that dominate Iraq's government are closely allied with Iran.

In Baghdad, Jalal al-Sagheer, a cleric and ally of Hakim's, hailed the "diplomatic victory." Sagheer rejected widespread accusations by Sunni Arabs in Iraq that Iran was promoting torture, illegal detention and extrajudicial killing by Shiite militiamen against Iraq's Sunni minority.

"In every case, the sectarian terrorism uses the Iran question as an excuse to slaughter us," Sagheer told worshipers during Friday prayers at Baghdad's Buratha mosque. "This is why we are working on this case and making many contacts to solve the problem between America and Iran, so the Iraqis will not be affected by any problem between them.

"It's not for a specific sect," Sagheer said. "It is for the fate of all Iraqis."

Meanwhile, U.S. and Iraqi troops searched house to house for insurgents for a second day in arid farmland east of Samarra. Forty-eight suspects had been detained, with 17 of them released, Maj. Tom Bryant, public affairs officers with the 3rd Brigade of the Army's 101st Airborne Division, told journalists flown to the area Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0019257

Six weapons caches with a total of about 300 rockets, mortar rounds and other ordnance had been found by late Friday, "a typical number" for weapons caches discovered in the area, said Maj. John Calahan, another public affairs officer with the 3rd Brigade. U.S. and Iraqi forces had made "no contact whatsoever," Calahan added, meaning no shots had been fired or resistance encountered.

The 600 to 800 Iraqi police commandos in the U.S.-Iraqi force deployed Thursday had returned to normal duties by midday Friday, U.S. authorities said.

Roughly 50 Chinook and Black Hawk helicopters had transported the Iraqi and U.S. forces from bases in the surrounding area. The operation, which is continuing, has been good for building the confidence of Iraqi forces and for showing insurgents that the Iraqis, with the help of U.S. air assets, can go anywhere, U.S. officials said.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commanding general of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said that by the end of this summer Iraqi units will take charge in 75 percent of the country's territory, compared with less than 50 percent now. He did not specify whether these areas would include the most violent or populous parts. Other U.S. commanders have said that Iraqi police and army units are now responsible for security in about 60 percent of Baghdad.

Chiarelli, briefing Pentagon reporters via teleconference from Iraq, said the country was closer to civil war than at any time since the U.S. invasion three years ago, but added that such an eventuality remained "a long ways away."

Branigin reported from Washington. Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson in Washington and special correspondent Naseer Nouri in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Sunni Leaders Say U.S.-Iran Talks Amount To Meddling (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 17 — Sunni Arab political leaders on Friday denounced an agreement between the United States and Iran to hold face-to-face talks about solutions to the unrest in Iraq, saying the conversations would amount to meddling by foreign nations in Iraq's domestic affairs.

The Iraqi Consensus Front, the country's main Sunni political bloc, issued a statement calling the agreement "an obvious unjustified interference" and asserted that it was not obligated to comply with any results of the negotiations.

The Sunni leadership has long criticized Tehran's influence over Iraq's powerful Shiite religious parties, and its opposition to the talks could add another obstacle to the grinding efforts by Iraq's political leaders to forge a coalition government.

"The Iraqis in the current government should have these talks with the Iranians and discuss the level of intervention of Iran," Naseer al-Ani, a member of the Sunni Arab bloc, said in a telephone interview. "It's not up to the American ambassador to talk to Iran about Iraq."

The agreement between the United States and Iran was announced Thursday. Ali Larijani, general secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said Iran's participation came at the request of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite party with ties to Iran.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said the Bush administration would not meet with Iran to negotiate the future of Iraq but rather to voice its concerns about what he called Iran's "unhelpful role" in Iraq. It remained unclear on Friday whether Iraqi leaders would be invited to the meetings.

The Sunni criticism came as leaders of Iraq's major political blocs, as well as the American ambassador, gathered in the heavily fortified compound of President Jalal Talabani to discuss the formation of a new Iraqi government.

According to several participants, the discussions focused on the proposal to create a national security council composed of leaders of the executive, judicial and legislative branches, as well as representatives of the country's main political blocs. The council would be consulted on pivotal national issues, like the economy, oil policy, public services and security.

Some Sunni leaders wanted the council's decisions to have binding executive authority. But, several participants said, the Shiite leadership and others were insisting that the council have only advisory powers, thereby safeguarding the constitutional powers of the executive.

DOJ_NMG_0019258

A working group planned to continue the discussions on Saturday and was expected to submit its conclusions to the blocs' political leaders by Sunday, officials said.

In Halabja, Kurdistan, militias loyal to the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the party that governs the eastern part of the autonomous region, began a crackdown after a riot on Thursday in which demonstrators destroyed a museum dedicated to the thousands who perished in a poison gas attack by Saddam Hussein's security forces in 1988.

The riot began as a rally against government corruption but became violent after government guards fired weapons over the protesters' heads.

"The episode is a painful reminder that reforms are needed everywhere in this part of the world," Barham Saleh, Iraq's planning minister and a Kurd, said in an interview on Friday.

Although the riot may have arisen in part from the legitimate grievances of frustrated people, he said, radical Islamists might have taken advantage of the discord to foment violence. "Obviously this has to be investigated thoroughly," he said.

American and Iraqi security forces continued their search for insurgent hide-outs near Samarra on Friday, the second day of an assault in the area, north of Baghdad, though the results appeared to be modest and the American command began to return some troops to their bases.

About 10 people were detained on Friday, bringing the number of suspected insurgents captured during the raid to 47, said Lt. Col. Edward Loomis, a spokesman for the 101st Airborne Division, which is leading the operation. At least 17 have been released after questioning, he said, adding that troops uncovered no new weapons stockpiles on Friday.

The operation has garnered widespread attention, in part because Samarra is where a Shiite shrine was bombed by insurgents last month, setting off a wave of sectarian violence. But the military has not suggested that this assault was a direct response to the bombing.

The American military command described the push as the largest "air assault" since the invasion in 2003. The military defines air assault as the insertion of troops by aircraft. Some television networks erroneously used the term "airstrikes," conjuring images of the "shock and awe" bombing campaign that heralded the invasion.

But there were no reported aerial bombardments during this operation, and Colonel Loomis said Friday that the American and Iraqi forces had encountered no armed resistance and suffered no casualties.

The American military reported that a soldier from the 101st Airborne was shot and killed at an observation post in Samarra on Thursday, but the incident appeared to be unrelated to the operation.

In Baghdad, the authorities recovered two more bodies, both handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head, according to an official in the Interior Ministry. At least 170 bodies, all showing evidence of execution-style killings, have been recovered around Baghdad in the last 10 days, according to Iraqi officials.

Though the motives for most of the killings remain unclear, officials fear that the wave of executions is a continuation of the sectarian reprisals that followed the destruction of the Samarra shrine last month.

Gunmen fired on Shiite pilgrims in several locations on Friday, killing at least one and wounding 12, the ministry official said. An improvised bomb, apparently directed at pilgrims, exploded on the road between Mahmudiya and Karbala, killing one and wounding four, the official said.

Thousands of Shiites are converging on Karbala, in the south, to celebrate the end of the 40-day mourning period commemorating the death of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad.

Iran, U.S. Disagree Over Goal Of Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

America says it wants to discuss Tehran's meddling in Iraq, while the Islamic Republic asserts it wants to work to get foreign troops out.

WASHINGTON — A day after raising international hopes by agreeing to hold direct talks about stabilizing Iraq, U.S. and Iranian officials Friday took a decidedly sharper tone toward each other, differing markedly over the purpose of their planned discussions.

DOJ_NMG_0019259

U.S. officials accused Iran of meddling in Iraq's internal affairs and said the discussions were aimed only at expressing American unhappiness over the interference. In Tehran, a senior official said Iran's goal in meeting with the Americans was to accelerate the U.S. departure from Iraq.

As differences between the two sides intensified, fears grew that the longtime adversaries were jeopardizing an opportunity to help stabilize Iraq, an effort in which they both have an important stake.

U.S. and Iranian officials fueled expectations for improved relations between the two countries Thursday when each said that teams of officials would meet to discuss Iraq. On Friday, U.S. officials said arrangements were being made by unidentified intermediaries to set a date and place for a meeting.

However, differences began to emerge almost immediately. At first, the Iranians suggested the talks could range more widely, encompassing issues other than Iraq. But U.S. officials quickly rejected that possibility, pointing out they had suggested talks last year only as a way to bring peace in Iraq.

Also Thursday, Iran's foreign policy chief, Ali Larijani, said Tehran had accepted "the proposal to help resolve the problems in Iraq and establish an independent government there."

U.S. officials retorted Friday that the talks would be held to discuss "unhelpful Iranian activities in Iraq," including, they alleged, allowing the shipment of components for roadside bombs used in Iraq and sending Iranian military agents into the country.

"These concerns are well known and we have talked about them," the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad said in a statement, adding that "Iraqis will decide the future of Iraq."

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Australia, said the talks would be limited in scope, and cast doubt on whether they would take place.

"We will see if and when those talks take place," she said.

The inability of Washington and Tehran to agree on the subject of the talks gave rise to concerns that any meetings would be fruitless, ending in acrimony and heightening tensions between the two countries.

"If the Americans just plan to yell at them, then this will be about charges and counter-charges, and it won't be particularly productive," said Ray Takeyh, a Middle East specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations. "If this is about their common interests, which they do have, then maybe there will be something to it."

The Iranians can't afford to let Iraq descend into civil war, Takeyh said, because the conflict would spill across their border. In contrast, an Iraqi democracy would give power to a Shiite Muslim majority whose leaders have close ties to Iran. The agreement to meet reflects that, even as they continue to trade harsh denunciations, the two sides have been forced to recognize that they must work together to stabilize Iraq, he said.

But President Bush's national security advisor, Stephen J. Hadley, charged Friday that Iran's agreement to talk about Iraq was probably a ploy intended to head off adverse action by the United Nations Security Council, which is considering ways to address concerns over Tehran's nuclear program.

"What is interesting is that the Iranians would choose now, at this moment, in such a very public way, to embrace this idea and try to expand it to a negotiation about a broader set of issues," Hadley told a group of reporters. "The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try and divert pressure that they're feeling in New York, to try and drive a wedge between the United States and the other countries with which we are working on the nuclear issue and, if you will, divert pressure and divert attention."

Takeyh agreed that talks between U.S. and Iranian officials could ease pressure to act against the Tehran government.

"This could take all the air out of the Security Council effort," he said.

In Tehran, meanwhile, Larijani said Friday that Iran's motivation had nothing to do with the case before the Security Council.

"Iran's motive behind assistance to the Iraqi nation is helping establishment of lasting security in Iraq, and helping it get rid of the occupiers' tyranny … and there is no other hidden issue in that connection," he said, the official news agency IRNA reported. "At present there is no connection between the issue and Iran's nuclear case."

DOJ_NMG_0019260

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, stressed Friday that a stable Iraqi government was a key U.S. goal, but that it would be up to Iraqis to form it — without Iranian interference.

"We won't negotiate with Iran over that," Khalilzad said in an interview on Al Arabiya television. He said any talks would concentrate on U.S. concerns about Iran's involvement in Iraq.

"We'll just express concerns with aspects of Iranian policy destabilizing Iraq," he said. "Iraq can rely on itself. We have serious concerns on aspects of Iranian policy that we will raise."

ANALYSIS: Talks With Iran Could Help Bush (MINNST/AP)

By Barry Schweid, The Associated Press

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 18, 2006

Possible negotiations between the United States and Iran and the convening of the first session of a new Iraqi parliament could give the Bush administration a long-needed lift.

WASHINGTON (AP) - Possible negotiations between the United States and Iran and the convening of the first session of a new Iraqi parliament could give the Bush administration a long-needed lift.

The recent inaugural session of Iraq's parliament is a positive step toward the new Iraq that President Bush envisions as he pursues a war that's unpopular with many Americans. Progress toward forging a unity government representing all of Iraq's sects would be a boost for a country that has been veering close to civil war.

U.S. intelligence strongly suspects Iran has been arming Iraqi Shiite militia and some insurgent groups. If talks with Iran come off, the administration would try persuading Tehran to curb its activities with the argument that instability in Iraq could envelop the area, including Iran.

For Bush, whose dive in the polls reflects Americans' eroding confidence in his Iraq strategy, progress on either front would be welcome relief - especially with midterm elections for control of Congress just eight months away.

There are troublesome developments as well. The eruption of violence among Kurds in northern Iraq poses new security problems for already strained Iraqi forces, particularly if Islamic radicals were behind the outbreak in Halabja.

Indications are the stone-throwing Kurds were registering displeasure with their own leaders and not threatening conflict with other Iraqi groups.

The disorder distracts from an aggressive U.S.-Iraqi military campaign against insurgents in a Sunni Arab-dominated area outside Samarra, where the bombing of a Shiite shrine three weeks ago ignited the most recent siege of violence.

Referring to the volatile situation in the country, U.N. envoy Ashraf Qazi said Friday that it has deteriorated since he took up the post 19 months ago.

Qazi, speaking at the U.S. Institute of Peace in Washington, said Iraq was not on the brink of civil war. But he described the situation as serious and said it "could lead to a breakdown of order" if left unchecked.

Bush administration officials are convinced Iran is playing a mischievous role in Iraq, especially in arming militias with explosives and other weapons.

They said Friday that Tehran's willingness to have face-to-face discussions with U.S. officials about Iraq could be an effort to divert attention from an approaching confrontation at the United Nations over Iran's nuclear program.

"The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try and divert pressure that they're feeling in New York," White House national security adviser Steven Hadley said.

"Obviously, this is something that we and those who are working with us on these issues will not let happen," he added.

Despite the standoff over Iran's nuclear program, the administration has been seeking talks with Tehran narrowly limited to its intervention in Iraq. Despite its skepticism, some in the administration want to try setting up the talks, at the very least to avoid criticism in case Iran turns out to be serious about seeking a solution in Iraq.

Ruled out by U.S. officials is discussion of any attempt by Iran to gain a political foothold in Iraq, and the nuclear dispute, which could soon come before the U.N. Security Council.

DOJ_NMG_0019261

The talks, which would be held in Baghdad, are not the first between the United States and Iran even though the two foes do not have diplomatic relations. They have met in the past for cooperative efforts in stabilizing Afghanistan and countering narcotics, for instance.

The antipathy is immense, however. American officials have denounced Iran repeatedly as the world's No. 1 supporter of terrorism.

'War' As Epithet: Sound Of Clay Feet Cracking (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK 'America is at war." These are the first words of the Bush administration's new national security strategy, a simple declarative sentence open to multiple interpretations and contestations.

That America is at war in Iraq is certainly true, although it's not the war the administration prepared for. Nor is it a war like any other. It's been accompanied by tax cuts; national sacrifice is not the theme of the hour; small-town America and smaller-salary America have borne the brunt.

But the war that President George W. Bush goes on to outline in the strategy, a revised version of the 2002 document whose emphasis on the supremacy of American power and the right to strike pre-emptively caused global unease, is not merely the Mesopotamian mess.

No, this war is of greater scope. "The United States is in the early years of a long struggle, similar to what our country faced in the early years of the Cold War," the document says. "The 20th century witnessed the triumph of freedom over the threats of fascism and communism. Yet a new totalitarian ideology now threatens, an ideology grounded not in secular philosophy but in the perversion of a proud religion."

This is a little pat. Let's leave aside whether the problem is a "perversion" of Islam or merely a certain reading of it. To compare Osama bin Laden and his scattered followers to the divisions of the Soviet empire is a stretch.

To invoke totalitarianism - a system of complete control over certain territory through state-directed terror - in describing a motley bunch of fanatics who control very little also seems fanciful, however vile the jihadists' methods and however ominous their visions of a restored caliphate.

All in all, it's easy enough to see this broader war as a construct that preserves the familiar paradigm of American liberty confronting tyranny, comforts the far-flung garrisons that serve a global American mission, and gives Bush's Republican Party a pivotal issue that plays to its strengths against a Democratic Party still seen as weak on national security.

None of this is meant to suggest that the terrorist threat to the United States is not real. But to frame the confrontation with this danger as a "war" - a war without apparent or possible end, a war without geographical definition, a war without an opposing army - is a political decision, one of whose effects has been to cast Bush as a "war president."

The epithet has played well. It was decisive in delivering the 2004 election to Bush: you don't change commander-in-chiefs in the middle of a war.

It also captured the qualities many Americans thought they liked in Bush: boldness and decisiveness and an unwavering determination. Because they did not see those traits in John Kerry, the Democratic candidate, they rejected him.

But, a little over a year into Bush's second term, the epithet is tired; Americans have soured on their war president. It's partly the festering situation in Iraq. But the disillusionment runs deeper. With his approval rating at 33 percent, according to a new poll by the Pew Research Center, Bush is in Nixonian territory.

The same poll found that where "honesty" had been the single characteristic most closely associated with Bush, the description now most favored was "incompetent." That's a seismic shift - from war leader to clown.

The shift has many roots. The president has never recovered from his administration's hapless distractedness at the time Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans. It was one thing not to have a plan for postwar Baghdad, quite another to have no plan to save a major American city.

The same impression - of hubris and inattention and waywardness - was left by the administration's handling of the aborted takeover of several U.S. port terminals by a Dubai-owned company.

DOJ_NMG_0019262

Having whipped the country into a frenzy over security, Bush favored free trade in this instance, a reasonable position. But he failed to see that he would reap what he had sown: a congressional outcry based in the scurrilous but pervasive notion that all Arabs are dangerous. The absence of preparation for a predictable storm was startling.

Bush's unpopularity is also startling. With the Dow at its highest level in years and the economy growing briskly, his low ratings suggest that links between the economy and a president's popularity are weaker in an era of globalization.

The stock market may be up and profits at investment banks soaring, but companies are cutting back on pensions and health plans to achieve the profits Wall Street likes, and insecurity about jobs is high. Competition is so remorseless that a strong economy is no longer synonymous with the feel-good factor presidents need.

"There is a level of unease about whether you will be able to preserve what you've got," said Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute.

In theory, that's the sort of economic unease the Democrats should be able to pounce on to seize the political initiative as Bush's popularity erodes. With the president's stature on national security issues also falling, the stars seem to be aligning themselves for the Democrats.

Still, it's striking that the nadir of Bush's popularity has not coincided with the emergence of any compelling Democratic message or theme, from Hillary Clinton or anyone else. Attacking the president's incompetence may be enough for the Democrats to secure a House majority in the midterm election in November. But a negative campaign alone will not gain the presidency in 2008.

"The Democrats have still not come up with a coherent national security or homeland security posture," said Ornstein. "Saying no Arabs should run our ports is not a program."

Bush has a program, but he's increasingly seen as unable to deliver. The "war president" aura has crumbled. War talk of decades-long struggles seems unlikely to revive him. Talking to Iran - the country identified in the new strategy as presenting the greatest challenge to America - may help more by delivering results in Iraq and elsewhere.

Why Iran Wants To Talk (WP)

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

IT'S EASY to see the potential advantage to Iran of opening negotiations with the United States on Iraq. The sudden announcement by Iran's national security chief Thursday that Tehran would accept an offer of dialogue made months ago by the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad came as members of the U.N. Security Council were meeting to discuss a council statement about the Iranian nuclear program.

That statement could be the first in an escalating series of steps to force Tehran to give up the enrichment of uranium and fully cooperate with international inspectors. Preventing such diplomatic action has been Iran's main aim since its illegal nuclear program was discovered in 2004; the failure to stop the issue from reaching the Security Council has prompted some visible handwringing and backbiting among the mullahs.

By drawing the Bush administration into talks about Iraq, the Iranians give themselves a shot at splintering or distracting the fragile coalition that may be forming in New York. Already Iranian officials are speaking openly about the possibility that any discussions would expand into the broader security dialogue that Tehran has long coveted with the United States. In Iraq -- where American soldiers are dying from Iranian-supplied roadside bombs and sectarian violence by Iranian-supported militias is steadily mounting -- the Islamic regime has a tacit and sinister offer to make: Back down in New York, and the carnage in Baghdad might just drop off. Even the appearance that the Bush administration might be considering such a trade-off would worsen the situation in Iraq and wreck a year of careful and mostly effective anti-proliferation diplomacy.

The right response to the Iranian initiative is to limit any discussions to short-term U.S. priorities in Iraq and to ensure that the exchange is as open as possible. In theory, the United States and Iran share an interest in preventing an all-out Iraqi civil war, and thus in the establishment of a government that could rein in both the Sunni insurgency and the Shiite militias. But Iran's other objectives in Iraq are mostly inimical: It has promoted the creation of a Shiite ministate in southern Iraq that would control the country's largest oil fields and be dominated by Iran's allies; it hopes that the Sunni insurgency will meanwhile bleed American troops and exhaust U.S. willpower.

DOJ_NMG_0019263

The U.S. goal of a broad and cohesive Iraqi government that would fairly balance Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish interests and be defended by a national Iraqi army would, if achieved, check Iranian ambitions. If Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad can advance that cause through talks with Iran, good. But it will be worth bearing in mind that Tehran has agreed to sit down with him for entirely different reasons.

U.N. To Raise Its Profile In Iraq (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

The senior U.N. official in Iraq yesterday said that the United Nations will soon be raising its profile there, acknowledging that its "perceived absence" has been noticeable since a tragic suicide bombing after the U.S. invasion three years ago.

Ashraf Qazi, the special representative of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, will be in Washington through Monday for meetings at the Pentagon, State Department and National Security Council.

"It is a fact that the United States strongly encourages us to play a more proactive role in a whole range of activities to make an impact on Iraqi lives," Mr. Qazi told editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

He said the organization has been active in many aspects of nation building, assisting Iraqis in drafting a constitution, holding elections and rebuilding infrastructure.

But Mr. Qazi also said that it was time for the 90-member U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq, or UNAMI, to take a higher profile despite security concerns.

"A lot of people are not aware of our contributions," he said, in part because U.N. officials are based inside the heavily fortified Green Zone.

"People ask 'where are you?' because they don't always notice us," said the former Pakistani ambassador to Washington.

"We need to do a better job in terms of enlarging the scale of our activities, being seen and being safe at the same time."

Mr. Qazi's predecessor, Sergio Vieira de Mello of Brazil, and 21 others died in an August 2003 suicide bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad.

Mr. Qazi, told the U.N. Security Council earlier this week that UNAMI needs its own helicopters and small aircraft to transport U.N. staff between the Green Zone base and new offices in Irbil and Basra.

The planes, he said yesterday, would allow the organization to be more active and independent in a country where the roads are dangerous and movement is often curtailed.

Mr. Qazi made it clear that he disagreed with the frequent warnings that Iraq is slipping into a full-scale civil war.

"What is civil war? I wouldn't say it is even a prospect right now, but there is no reason to be complacent," he said, acknowledging serious human rights violations, sectarian violence, little protection for civil servants and an absence of civil services that would make daily life easier for average Iraqis.

For example, he said yesterday, the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last month might have actually been a turning point in the effort to calm sectarian violence that continues to cripple reconstruction efforts.

"The government has managed to keep a lid on it but [sectarian tensions] have to be addressed through a broad-based approach" that includes security, political inclusiveness and restored electricity, transportation, education, health care and other services.

The Iraqi government plans to rebuild the historic Shi'ite mosque, as well as many Christian churches that have been bombed over the past three years.

Mr. Qazi said UNAMI is working with U.N. agencies such as UNESCO and the World Bank to try to raise money and recruit expertise for the project, which he said would also encourage sectarian healing.

Although Mr. Qazi declined to comment on the progress or strength of the U.S.-led multinational forces, he noted that the Iraqi police remain tangled in sectarian and political divisions, even though the Iraqi army seems to be making greater progress.

DOJ_NMG_0019264

This will be one of his messages when he addresses the donors conference, which is likely to be convened this June or July in Istanbul.

About $13 billion has been pledged for Iraq's reconstruction, and more than half of the nearly $1 billion received has already been spent on governance, humanitarian and reconstruction projects.

Mr. Qazi and his team also met yesterday with World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz, who said the bank would soon have a larger presence in Iraq.

Mr. Qazi stressed that he has frequent contact with Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador in Iraq. And he repeatedly made clear that the United Nations is in service to the Iraqi government, rather than dictating to it.

Ringleader In Custody, Iraqi Officials Say (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Military and political leaders say a sweep in the Samarra area has yielded a key figure in last month's divisive mosque attack.

SAMARRA, Iraq — Iraqi military officials said Friday that a continuing offensive targeting insurgents in the hardpan desert northeast of here has resulted in the capture of additional weapons and a man they believe is among those responsible for the recent bombing of a venerated Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra.

Iraqi military and political leaders, speaking at an operations base along the Tigris River about 80 miles northeast of Baghdad, said they were checking photos and other documents to determine if they had captured one of the people they believe planned the bombing of the Golden Mosque and the killing of an Arabic TV journalist.

"One ringleader is in custody," Iraqi Gen. Abdul Jabbar said. "He is a main person in all the attacks that took place."

The Golden Mosque, one of Shiite Islam's holiest places, was stormed Feb. 22 by about 20 men who placed 475 pounds of explosives throughout the building and set them off by remote control. A handful of suspects have been arrested, but authorities have not identified them.

The bombing led to scores of retaliatory attacks on Sunni Islam's holy places and a series of tit-for-tat executions by Sunnis and Shiites. The slaying of Al Arabiya broadcast journalist Atwar Bahjat, a Samarra native who had returned to her hometown to report on the mosque bombing, underscored the deteriorating security situation.

On Thursday, in what U.S. military officials called the largest airborne operation since shortly after the start of the war in March 2003, about 1,500 U.S. and Iraqi troops swooped into the desert area in 50 helicopters.

By late Friday, officials said they had detained more than 50 people and uncovered as many as eight weapons caches, most buried in fields. In a soccer field near Balad, searchers said, they turned up a Soviet antiaircraft gun, four rocket-propelled grenade launchers, 100 pounds of explosives and hand grenades.

U.S. officials on Friday said the scope of the operation was proportionate to the relatively modest amount of weapons uncovered.

They added that the timing was not tied to the impending three-year anniversary of the invasion, which toppled President Saddam Hussein.

The officials said the offensive, called Operation Swarmer, was a show of force in an area teeming with insurgents, and was a symbol of the growing maturity of Iraqi fighting forces.

Much of the planning was done by Iraqis, the officials said. The Iraqis, who make up about half the force, which includes Americans from the Army's 101st Airborne Division, took the lead in searching houses in the sparsely populated region.

"We realize the importance of an Iraqi army being able to take responsibility" in combat missions, said Col. Skip Johnson, standing in the shadow of the ruins of a mosque he said had been destroyed by insurgents three months ago.

Iraq's military capability is also key to Washington's hopes of drawing down U.S. forces in coming months.

Just as important as the planning and execution was the fact that Iraqi intelligence provided the basis for the operation.

"This fight will be won at the intelligence level," Johnson said. "The Iraqis know the culture and they know the people."

DOJ_NMG_0019265

The operation, and the wide television coverage it has been accorded, appeared to have inflamed some Muslim clerics, who accused the Americans of waging sectarian "ethnic cleansing" against Iraq's Sunnis.

Sheik Mohammed Faidhi, a spokesman for the Muslim Scholars Assn., called the operation "a scandal which is bigger than Abu Ghraib," the prison where Iraqi inmates were humiliated and abused by U.S. soldiers.

"Places are raided, innocents are killed and villages are bombed under the pretext of terrorists," he said.

U.S. military officials and local political leaders insisted that there had been no bombing.

The troops searched on foot, they said, adding that there had been no firefights in the first two days, no resistance to the troops and no deaths or injuries.

In Samarra, about 30 miles south of the search area, a soldier from the 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the 101st Airborne was shot and killed Thursday while manning an observation post.

The military said the killing of the soldier was unrelated to the operation.

Two other soldiers from the 101st Airborne were killed Thursday in an "indirect fire attack" on their base northwest of Tikrit, the military announced today.

The names of all three were withheld pending notification of their relatives.

Officials said about 1,500 people live in the remote area where the offensive is taking place.

There are about 150 buildings, mostly simple huts. By evening Friday, about a third of them had been searched.

At a 70-acre okra and wheat farm, Rahma Saleh was making flatbread in an outdoor stove in the 80-degree sunshine while two of her seven children looked on.

"A lot of people came here and searched," she said while pounding out the dough, wetting it and sticking it to the inside of the stove's narrow chimney.

Saleh, who said her husband had been wounded in the Iran-Iraq war and could no longer work, called the soldiers polite and "very respectful." But she insisted: "It's all families here, no insurgents."

The deputy governor of Salahuddin province, Abdullah Hussein, disagreed. He said residents had been complaining of being harassed by insurgents.

"A lot of people have been killed for not cooperating with them," he said.

The bombing of the shrine in Samarra was a factor in the decision to go after the insurgents nearby.

The deputy governor guessed that they numbered about 200; U.S. officers estimated that the number was closer to 100.

Jabbar, a brigade commander with the Iraqi forces, said he was hunting a group called Mohammed's Army, or Takfiris, which was linked to the forces of Jordanian militant Abu Musab Zarqawi.

Their principal target, the Iraqis said, was Hamed Taki, alleged to be the leader of a terrorist cell.

A U.S. military official called Taki "a person of interest that we'd like to catch."

Elsewhere in Iraq, gunmen in Ramadi attacked people headed to Friday prayers, killing one, and fought Iraqi soldiers, killing five, officials said.

In Baghdad, gunmen also attacked worshipers, killing two and injuring 16. A suicide bomber killed himself and the driver of a bus.

Police found six more bodies around Baghdad. Four of the victims had been blindfolded, handcuffed and shot in the head.

*

Times staff writers Asmaa Waguih, Caesar Ahmed, Raheem Salman and Zainab Hussein in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Study Is Said To Find Overlap In U.S. Counterterror Effort (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — A classified Pentagon study analyzing the effectiveness of Special Operations forces has found that the military's counterterrorism effort is hampered by bureaucratic duplication, officials said, citing in particular an overlap between new government centers.

DOJ_NMG_0019266

The study also found evidence of broad resistance to the Special Operations Command's new counterterrorism role, from regional military commands and from other parts of the government's sprawling defense and intelligence apparatus.

The findings were viewed as so provocative that the classified report has not been distributed widely, even among officials with the security clearance needed to read such internal reviews, Pentagon and military officials said. The study was initially ordered by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Pentagon and military officials who have read the study say that the mission of the new Center for Special Operations, a large military headquarters created in Florida in 2003, mirrors the work of the new National Counterterrorism Center, established by executive order in 2004. The military center is intended to bring together elements of the armed services under a three-star general; the intelligence center answers to John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence.

The officials were granted anonymity to discuss the classified report's contents because they were not authorized to speak about it.

The review, conducted by a retired four-star officer, Gen. Wayne A. Downing Jr., grew out of a budget and strategy briefing last October during which Mr. Rumsfeld expressed grave concerns over the readiness of the troops and the effectiveness of the Special Operations Command's counterterrorist operations.

"The Rumsfeld family crest probably says something like, 'More, and faster,' " said a senior Pentagon official involved in the policy debate over the role of the command, known as Socom in military circles. "So what he thinks about Socom is, 'With all this new money and all these extra people and all this wider latitude to maneuver, why haven't you won the war on terror for me yet?' "

The Special Operations Command reports to Mr. Rumsfeld, and falls outside those organizations that report to Mr. Negroponte. The command's new global role in counterterrorism has rankled some officers at the Pentagon and in regional war-fighting commands who previously took charge of that mission.

Some of the command's new efforts, in particular the placement of small teams in American embassies to gather intelligence on terrorists and to prepare for potential missions, has outraged some intelligence officers and career diplomats.

According to Pentagon civilians and military officers who have read the Downing study, the review found "a tremendous duplication of effort" in the government and military that overlaps with assignments given the Special Operations Command.

More broadly, the review found that the government-wide national security bureaucracy still does not respond rapidly and effectively to the new requirements of the counterterrorism campaign. The report said more streamlining was necessary across a broad swath of the civilian bureaucracy and military, including civilians in the policy office that reports to Mr. Rumsfeld and the office of the secretary of defense, the military organization that reports to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the regional combatant commanders and even the National Security Council staff at the White House.

One Pentagon official who read the review said it criticized the Defense Department and National Security Council bureaucracy for not creating ways to answer Socom's real-time needs, forcing the command to navigate plodding bureaucratic channels whenever it wanted to adjust course. The official said this made it difficult to mount the quick action required to single out insurgents or terrorist leaders whose locations may become known only for brief periods of time.

Seeking answers to his concerns, Mr. Rumsfeld asked General Downing, who is known for his blunt, independent style, to conduct the classified review. General Downing, a former Socom commander, led the inquiry into the 1996 bombing at the Khobar Towers housing complex in Saudi Arabia and served as counterterrorism adviser for the first President Bush.

Contacted by telephone and e-mail, General Downing declined to discuss the review, citing the secrecy of the project. But when asked to summarize his personal views of the debate, he said: "Over the years, the inter-agency system has become so lethargic and dysfunctional that it materially inhibits the ability to apply the vast power of the U.S. government on problems. You see this inability to synchronize in our operations in Iraq and in Afghanistan, across our foreign policy and in our response to Katrina."

The Downing study criticizes Pentagon civilians, the military's Joint Staff, the regional war-fighting commanders and the National Security Council staff for not readjusting their organizations to expedite the Special Operations Command's new counterterrorism missions.

Another official who read the review said it took to task senior civilian and military leaders who demanded "responsive, flexible, agile operations around the world, yet tolerate a staff system that gives you exactly the opposite."

DOJ_NMG_0019267

Under a Unified Command Plan signed by President Bush, the Special Operations Command now "leads, plans, synchronizes, and as directed, executes global operations against terrorist networks." But the Special Operations Command, based in Tampa, Fla., "does not have the power to do what it has been assigned," said yet another official in paraphrasing the report.

The report included one radical proposal: It advocated relocating to Washington the headquarters of the Joint Special Operations Command, which runs all of the "special-mission units" that carry out the most secret attacks against terrorists and work to halt the proliferation of unconventional weapons. It proposed that these highly trained units then be put under Mr. Rumsfeld's direct, personal control.

Several readers of the Downing review said they believed the proposal was intended to call the bluff of those at the Pentagon who say these elite counterterrorism teams are not doing enough to find and capture or kill terrorist leaders. The implicit message, the readers said, was that if Pentagon leaders were dissatisfied, then they should try being in charge of planning and executing counterterrorism missions.

That proposal was rejected.

Documents Reveal Iraqis Dodging Inspectors (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, March 18, 2006

Iraqi officials talked about when and how to deceive international authorities about their weapons programs in the mid-1990s, referring at one point to materials imported from the United States for an apparent chemical program.

A transcript of the conversation is one of several dozen documents made public Friday by the U.S. government as part of a program allowing researchers, the media and Iraqis comb through millions of pages of documents and audio recordings confiscated since the 2003 invasion.

In the U.S. government's translation of captured Iraqi audio recordings, an official identified as "Comrade Husayn" talks to Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and other officials about when it would be best to lie to weapons inspectors and U.N. Security Council members and when to be open.

He shows particular concern that outsiders will learn about the importation of material, including some from the U.S., apparently for chemical weapons.

"They have a bigger problem with the chemical program than the biological program," he says. "We have not told them that we used it on Iran, nor have we told them abut the size or kind of chemical weapons that we produced, and we have not told them the truth about the imported material."

He went on to say, "We imported a quantity from America and we imported a quantity from Europe. However, we did not come forth with the quantities."

On the overall question of weapons of mass destruction, he said: "I must say that it is in our best interest not to uncover it, not only in fear of exposing the technology that we have or that we possess or to hide it for future agendas."

The precise date of the conversation was not clear, but clues suggest it came at the end of Rolf Ekeus' leadership of the United Nations Special Commission on Iraq, which he headed from 1991 to 1997.

The documents show debates among Iraq's senior leadership about U.N. sanctions, inspections and resolutions — and how to handle the country's economic and military security. They come in an era when U.S. officials now believe that Saddam's ability to develop weapons of mass destruction was diminishing, under pressure from international sanctions.

Although the Bush administration used the weapons programs as the main justification for the 2003 invasion, U.S. arms inspectors ultimately found no concrete evidence that Iraq produced weapons of mass destruction after 1991.

Yet the Iraqis apparently were far from forthcoming about their actions. Another conversation with Saddam from the mid-1990s indicates that officials knew they had problems with the weapons inspectors.

"On the nuclear file, sir, we are saying we disclosed everything? No, we have uncleared problems in the nuclear field, and I believe that they (the inspectors) know some of them," said a man identified as al-Sahhaf, possibly a reference to the former Iraqi diplomat and Information Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahaf. "Some teams work, and no one knows some of them."

DOJ_NMG_0019268

He then apologized for speaking so clearly. "Everything is over. But, did they know? No, sir, they did not know, not all the methods, not all the means, not all the scientists and not all the places."

He tells Saddam that missing materials and equipment — for biological and nuclear weapons — would be a problem in dealing with the U.N. as it crafted resolutions against Iraq. "Really, sir, we must be frank so that the resolution will be straightforward," al-Sahaf said.

The transcripts also show extensive debates among Saddam's inner circle about how to deal with other governments.

"Comrade Husayn" expressed frustration at Iraq's increasing isolation, venting particularly at the French, who were managing to upset the Americans as well.

He said the French had an "attitude."

"To be truthful before your Excellency, I do not trust the French in their current position. Maybe this will change after the election," said Husayn. "I think that they are more distant than the Chinese are, even though the Chinese are very far also. They (French) appear in the Security Council with a yes one time and a no another time.

"Therefore, sir, my personal belief is that they are layered (two-faced) and possibly in coordination with America and in coordination with the world."

Years later, the U.S. and the French would be at odds over the invasion of Iraq.

There are personal nuggets in the documents, too. "Bring us tea and milk," Saddam would interrupt meetings to order. Attendants would hustle to pour.

Saddam also spoke to his aides about a need to give Iraqis hope in the face of sanctions that were starting to make them suffer.

"We can't just tell the people to be patient," he said. "They need to see and hear results that they consider logical."

___

Associated Press Writer Cal Woodward contributed to this report.

New Documents From Saddam Hussein's Archives Discuss Bin Laden, WMDs (ABC)

ABC News website, March 16, 2006

U.S. Government Releases Papers From Saddam's Reign

March 16, 2006 — Following are the ABC News Investigative Unit's summaries of four of the nine Iraqi documents from Saddam Hussein's government, which were released by the U.S. government Wednesday.

The documents discuss Osama bin Laden, weapons of mass destruction, al Qaeda and more.

The full documents can be found on the U.S. Army Foreign Military Studies Office Web site: http://fmso.leavenworth.army.mil/products-docex.htm.

Note: Document titles were added by ABC News.

"Osama bin Laden and the Taliban"

Document dated Sept. 15, 2001

An Iraqi intelligence service document saying that their Afghani informant, who's only identified by a number, told them that the Afghani Consul Ahmed Dahastani claimed the following in front of him:

That OBL and the Taliban are in contact with Iraq and that a group of Taliban and bin Laden group members visited Iraq.

That the U.S. has proof the Iraqi government and "bin Laden's group" agreed to cooperate to attack targets inside America.

That in case the Taliban and bin Laden's group turn out to be involved in "these destructive operations," the U.S. may strike Iraq and Afghanistan.

That the Afghani consul heard about the issue of Iraq's relationship with "bin Laden's group" while he was in Iran.

At the end, the writer recommends informing "the committee of intentions" about the above-mentioned items. The signature on the document is unclear.

(Editor's Note: The controversial claim that Osama bin Laden was cooperating with Saddam Hussein is an ongoing matter of intense debate. While the assertions contained in this document clearly support the claim, the sourcing is questionable — i.e.

DOJ_NMG_0019269

an unnamed Afghan "informant" reporting on a conversation with another Afghan "consul." The date of the document — four days after 9/11 — is worth noting but without further corroboration, this document is of limited evidentiary value.)

"Election Campaign Laws in France"

Documents dated July-August 1999

Correspondence regarding election campaigns in France. This includes a document from the Iraqi intelligence service classified as "secret," ordering the translation of important parts of a 1997 report about campaign financing laws in France. It also includes a document from the foreign minister's office indicating the report was attached. The attached translated report included very detailed information about all the regulations regarding financing of election campaigns in France. Translation was done by someone called "Salam Abdul Karim Mohammed."

(Editor's Note: This is an intriguing document which suggests Saddam Hussein's regime had a strong interest in the mechanics and legalities of financial contributions to French politicians. Several former French politicians are implicated in receiving oil vouchers from Iraq under the U.N. Oil for Food program.)

"Hiding Docs from the U.N. Team"

Document dated March 23, 1997

A letter from the Iraqi intelligence service to directors and managers advising them to follow certain procedures in case of a search by the U.N. team, including:

Removing correspondence with the atomic energy and military industry departments concerning the prohibited weapons (proposals, research, studies, catalogs, etc.).

Removing prohibited materials and equipment, including documents and catalogs and making sure to clear labs and storages of any traces of chemical or biological materials that were previously used or stored.

Doing so through a committee which will decide whether to destroy the documents.

Removing files from computers.

The letter also advises them on how they should answer questions by U.N. team members. It says the intelligence service should be informed within one week about the progress made in discarding the documents.

(Editor's Note: This document is consistent with the Report of the Special Advisor to the Director of Central Intelligence, which described a pattern of deception and concealment on the part of Saddam Hussein's government towards the U.N. inspectors in the mid to late 90's. Hussein halted all cooperation with those inspectors and expelled them in October 1998.)

"Al Qaeda Presence in Iraq"

Document dated August 2002

A number of correspondences to check rumors that some members of al Qaeda organization have entered Iraq. Three letters say this information cannot be confirmed. The letter on page seven, however, says that information coming from "a trustworthy source" indicates that subjects who are interested in dealing with al Qaeda are in Iraq and have several passports.

The letter seems to be coming from or going to Trebil, a town on the Iraqi-Jordanian border. Follow up on the presence of those subjects is ordered, as well as comparison of their pictures with those of Jordanian subjects living in Iraq. (This may be referring to pictures of Abu Musaab al Zarqawi and another man on pages 4-6) The letter also says tourist areas, including hotels and rented apartments, should be searched.

(Editor's note: This document indicates that the Iraqis were aware of and interested in reports that members of al Qaeda were present in Iraq in 2002. The document does not support allegations that Iraq was colluding with al Qaeda.)

Papers Give Glimpse Of Al-Qaida Recruits (LAT/AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Recruits at Osama bin Laden's terrorist training camps in Afghanistan were clamoring for suicide missions against the United States more than a year before the Sept. 11 attacks, according to al-Qaida documents declassified by the U.S. Defense Department.

DOJ_NMG_0019270

One document published on the Pentagon Web site this week contained rare criticism of bin Laden from an al-Qaida operative, who accused the terrorist leader of monopolizing decision-making and ignoring advice.

"We must completely stop outside operations until we sit down and consider the disaster we have caused," said the operative, who used the name Abdel Halim Adel.

Adel appealed to a friend in the al-Qaida leadership to steer the group away from the policies of bin Laden, whom he referred to as Abu Abdullah.

"Stop foreign operations, stop sending people to detention, and stop planning new operations, whether they are ordered by Abu Abdullah or not," he wrote.

The documents provide a rare glimpse of the mentality and training of recruits at al-Qaida's camps in Afghanistan, where bin Laden was based until late 2001. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, the United States threw its weight behind opponents of the Taliban regime that hosted bin Laden.

While the camps in Afghanistan have been destroyed, many of those who trained there have returned to their home countries, taking al-Qaida's ideology and tactics with them.

The U.S. military said the documents, published Wednesday, were "captured during recent operations." Some were seized in the 2003 invasion of Iraq but many, according to U.S. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, were found in Afghanistan.

"Why have the martyrdom operations against the Americans been delayed?" one recruit wrote on a calendar page dated July 8, 2000.

Another recruit referred to the 1998 suicide attacks on the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, which killed 231 people, saying: "We look forward to martyrdom operations like the ones in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam. What are the characteristics of the man that is required to execute such operations?"

A third recruit asked the leadership why it disapproved of assassination: "Why do you oppose and find it inappropriate, knowing that it cleansed many tyrants?"

The recruits called bin Laden "sheik," a clerical title. But it was not clear whether their questions were addressed to him or to one of his lieutenants.

"Our sheik, you have previously given us lessons and asked the question: 'How do we drive the infidels out of the Arabian Peninsula?'" a recruit said in one document.

He then asked: "Is striking at the origin (America) the priority or is it driving them out (of Saudi Arabia)?"

The documents show al-Qaida members were concerned about their safety and the safety of their families, although they embraced suicide attacks.

Adel, the operative who criticized bin Laden, protests the leadership's posting on the Internet of a letter in which he sent kisses to his children.

"Please quickly take it off because I think the whole world now knows how many kids I have and their names," he wrote.

A recruit said a reconnaissance plane has been spotted over the camp and asked: "Why aren't there enough personal weapons (Kalashnikov rifles) for the self-defense of all the holy warriors, particularly as an attack on the camp by the global infidels is possible anytime?"

Bin Laden is thought to have written one of the documents -- a letter to Taliban leader Mullah Omar. It is not clear whether the letter was written before or after Omar was overthrown.

Bin Laden told Omar that if they continued attacks in the "Islamic republics" -- apparently Muslim-dominated areas of the former Soviet Union -- it will "keep the enemies busy and divert them away from the Afghan issue and ease the pressure."

"It is a fact that the region of the Islamic republics is rich with significant scientific experience in conventional and non-conventional military industries, which will have a great role in future holy war against the enemies of Islam," the letter said. It was not specific about the type of non-conventional armaments, but seemed to refer to biological and chemical warfare.

The letter also addressed the importance of communicating with the media, a matter on which Mullah Omar would have disagreed. The Taliban leader was known for refusing press interviews and avoiding cameras.

"It is obvious that the media war in this century is one of the strongest methods (of struggle). In fact, its ratio may reach 90 percent of the total preparation for battles," bin Laden wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0019271

The release of the documents, which is expected to continue for months, is designed to allow U.S. lawmakers and the public to investigate issues such as what Saddam Hussein's Iraqi regime said about weapons of mass destruction.

The Pentagon cautioned it has made "no determination regarding the authenticity of the documents, validity or factual accuracy."

Cited As Symbol Of Abu Ghraib, Man Admits He Is Not In Photo (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

In the summer of 2004, a group of former detainees of Abu Ghraib prison filed a lawsuit claiming that they had been the victims of the abuse captured in photographs that incited outrage around the world.

One, Ali Shalal Qaissi, soon emerged as their chief representative, appearing in publications and on television in several countries to detail his suffering. His prominence made sense, because he claimed to be the man in the photograph that had become the international icon of the Abu Ghraib scandal: standing on a cardboard box, hooded, with wires attached to his outstretched arms. He had even emblazoned the silhouette of that image on business cards.

The trouble was, the man in the photograph was not Mr. Qaissi. [Editors' Note, Page A2.]

Military investigators had identified the man on the box as a different detainee who had described the episode in a sworn statement immediately after the photographs were discovered in January 2004, but then the man seemed to go silent.

Mr. Qaissi had energetically filled the void, traveling abroad with slide shows to argue that abuse in Iraq continued, as hea d of a group he called the Association of Victims of American Occupation Prisons.

The New York Times profiled him last Saturday in a front-page article; in it, Mr. Qaissi insisted he had never sought the fame of his iconic status. Mr. Qaissi had been interviewed on a number of earlier occasions, including by PBS's "Now," Vanity Fair, Der Spiegel and in the Italian news media as the man on the box.

This week, after the online magazine Salon raised questions about the identity of the man in the photograph, Mr. Qaissi and his lawyers insisted he was telling the truth.

Certainly, he was at Abu Ghraib, and appears with a hood over his head in some photographs that Army investigators seized from the computer belonging to Specialist Charles Graner, the soldier later convicted of being the ringleader of the abuse.

However, he now acknowledges he is not the man in the specific photograph he printed and held up in a portrait that accompanied the Times article. But he and his lawyers maintain that he was photographed in a similar position and shocked with wires and that he is the one on his business card. The Army says it believes only one prisoner was treated in that way.

"I know one thing," Mr. Qaissi said yesterday, breaking down in tears when reached by telephone. "I wore that blanket, I stood on that box, and I was wired up and electrocuted."

Susan Burke, a lawyer in Philadelphia who is representing Mr. Qaissi and other former prisoners in a lawsuit against civilian interrogators and translators at Abu Ghraib, said that Mr. Qaissi had been abused in the same way as the man in the photo. "The sad fact is that there is not only one man on the box," she said.

Using a name that Mr. Qaissi is often called, she said, "Haj Ali is but one of many victims of the torture by Graner and the others."

In the interview for the article, Mr. Qaissi pointed to his deformed hand and said it matched the hand in the photograph. A close look at the photograph, however, is inconclusive.

Whether he was forced to stand on a box and photographed is not clear, but evidence suggests that he adopted the identity of the iconic man on the box, the very symbol of Abu Ghraib, well after he left the prison.

Records confirm that Mr. Qaissi became inmate 151716 sometime after the prison opened in June 2003, but do not give firm dates; Mr. Qaissi, a 43-year-old former Baath Party member and neighborhood mayor in Baghdad, said he arrived at Abu Ghraib in October 2003 and was released in March 2004, two months after the Army began an investigation into the abuse.

And he suffered mistreatment and humiliation at the hands of the same people who photographed the man on the box: photographs investigators seized show him forced into a crouch, identifiable by his mangled hand, with the nickname guards gave him — "The Claw" — scrawled in black marker across his orange jumpsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0019272

But if he was the hooded man on the box, he did not mention it on several key occasions in the first months after the scandal broke.

In the spring of 2004, Mr. Qaissi approached Muhammad Hamid al-Moussawi, the deputy director of the Human Rights Organization of Iraq, and proposed that the men set up a group for prisoners of the occupation, Mr. Moussawi said this week. Yet Mr. Qaissi never claimed at the time that he had been the man in the photograph, Mr. Moussawi recalled.

A journalist who interviewed Mr. Qaissi three times that May and June about what happened at Abu Ghraib similarly said he never mentioned the pose or the photograph. The journalist, Gert Van Langendonck, said Mr. Qaissi mentioned the other cruelties he described in the Times profile.

A lawsuit Mr. Qaissi joined, filed on July 27, 2004, also made no allegation that he was shocked with wires or forced to stand on a box. That allegation appeared only on an amended version of a complaint he later joined, filed last month, which said he had been forced to stand on the box and fell off from the shocks of the electrocution: "They repeated this at least five times."

Another man had already been publicly identified as the man on the box in May 2004, when documents including logbooks and sworn statements from detainees and soldiers were leaked to The Times.

On May 22, 2004, The Times quoted the testimony of a detainee, Abdou Hussain Saad Faleh: "Then a tall black soldier came and put electrical wires on my fingers and toes and on my penis, and I had a bag over my head. Then he was saying, 'Which switch is on for electricity?'"

Specialist Sabrina Harman, one of the soldiers later convicted of abuse, identified the man by his nickname, Gilligan, in her statement.

She left some room to believe that others were subjected to the same treatment. "The wires part," she said, was her idea, but she said Specialist Graner and Staff Sgt. Ivan Frederick II had forced detainees to stand on a box to stay awake, and did so at the request of military intelligence officials. Abu Ghraib photographs show more than one example of a hooded man forced to stand on boxes.

But Chris Grey, a spokesman for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command, said that the military believed that Mr. Faleh had been the only prisoner subjected to the treatment shown in the photo. "To date, and after a very thorough criminal investigation, we have neither credible information, nor reason to believe, that more than one incident of this nature occurred," he said.

Mr. Qaissi's lawyer, Ms. Burke, countered, "We do not trust the torturers."

Mr. Qaissi seems to have first begun identifying himself as the hooded man in the fall of 2004, by which point he had started his prisoners' group out of a politically charged mosque in Baghdad.

In an article in the February 2005 issue of Vanity Fair, Donovan Webster identified Mr. Qaissi as Haj Ali, the likely man on the box, based on an extensive investigation of military records. Soon, Mr. Qaissi was featured in numerous profiles, including in Der Spiegel, reprinted by Salon, as well as on the PBS current affairs program "Now," where he described being shocked: "It felt like my eyeballs were coming out of my sockets."

With his soft voice and occasionally self-deprecating humor, he has impressed interviewers as affable and credible. He told his story with a level of detail that separated it from that of many others.

Most of his assertions and details could be confirmed, Mr. Webster and others stress. In his three-hour interview with The Times, Mr. Qaissi did not veer from reported details and appeared confident in his discussion, punctuating his story with bitter laughter and occasionally, tears. But he never raised the possibility that another man may have also been photographed in the same pose.

Human rights workers were compelled by his story, as well. Reporting the Saturday article, The Times relied in part on their statements that he could well be the hooded man, as well as on prison records and interviews with friends and his lawyers, who say they have Mr. Qaissi's blanket, the same one, they said, draped over the man in the photograph. Army officials at the time refused to confirm or refute Mr. Qaissi's claims, citing privacy protections in the Geneva Convention.

Abdel Jabbar al-Azzawi, who now lives in Baghdad and says he was in the prison with both Mr. Qaissi and the man named Gilligan and has joined the lawsuit, says he saw Mr. Qaissi wearing the blanket fashioned into a poncho depicted in the photograph, though he did not see the photographs being taken.

DOJ_NMG_0019273

Mr. Qaissi's lawyers also stress that the iconic photograph is not the basis of his case. In court papers, he also says he was punched, kicked, hit with a stick and chained to his cell while his captors poured cold water over his naked body.

Meanwhile, it is not clear what happened to the real hooded man, Mr. Faleh. An Army spokesman said he was released from American custody in January 2004. Tribal leaders, and the manager of a brick factory next to the address where prison records say he lived, said they had never heard the name. Besides, they said, detainees often make up identities when they are imprisoned. Mr. Qaissi's attorneys said they have not attempted to search for him.

Times Says It Misidentified Iraqi As Hooded Prisoner (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

It was a dramatic front-page story to match an infamous photo: the chilling shot of an Abu Ghraib prisoner, hooded, standing on a box, electrical wires attached to his outstretched arms.

He is Ali Shalal Qaissi, the New York Times said last Saturday, and the Iraqi told the paper that his wounds are still raw.

But after questions were raised by the online magazine Salon, the Times acknowledged last night that the story was flat wrong. The prisoner in the photograph was not Qaissi, who has belatedly admitted that to the newspaper.

"The Times did not adequately research Mr. Qaissi's insistence that he was the man in the photograph" and "should have been more persistent in seeking comment from the military," the paper said in an editor's note.

Susan Chira, the Times foreign editor, said in an interview earlier this week that Salon had "raised legitimate questions" about the newspaper's story. "Any time you talk to someone like this, you worry: Are they telling you some kind of story?"

In a story published in today's editions, Qaissi is quoted as saying in a tearful telephone interview that he was photographed in a similar position. "I know one thing," Qaissi told the Times. "I wore that blanket, I stood on that box, and I was wired up and electrocuted."

The Army, however, says that only one man was mistreated that way, a prisoner whom guards nicknamed "The Claw," according to the Times report. Further undercutting Qaissi's account, the Times reported, is that he never claimed to have been the man under the hood in the first months after his release from Abu Ghraib or in a July 2004 lawsuit that he joined.

In last Saturday's Times story, written from Amman by staff writer Hassan Fattah, the 43-year-old Qaissi was quoted as saying: "I never wanted to be famous, especially not in this way." The paper reported that Qaissi has a slight limp and a mangled hand -- an old injury that became infected by his shackles -- after his six-month imprisonment at Abu Ghraib in 2003 and 2004, and that he is now a prisoner advocate who uses the hooded image on his business card.

A U.S. military spokesman would not comment to the Times, citing the Geneva Conventions' rules against disclosing the identity of prisoners. But the paper said government records made available by Amnesty International show that Qaissi was in U.S. custody at the time and that the organization, along with Human Rights Watch and attorneys involved in a class-action suit over the abuses at Abu Ghraib, "believe that he is the man in the photograph."

In today's report, however, the Times said: "Evidence suggests that he adopted the identity of the iconic man on the box, the very symbol of Abu Ghraib, well after he left the prison."

Qaissi, who had been a neighborhood official in Saddam Hussein's government, has been touring the Arab world and delivering computer slide shows about the mistreatment of prisoners at Abu Ghraib, the photographs of which became a global embarrassment for the U.S. military after they were obtained by several news organizations.

Days after the Times story was published, Salon reported that Qaissi was not the man in the picture and that it was actually "another detainee, named Saad, whose full name is being withheld by Salon to protect his identity." The magazine cited Army documents and confirmation by a spokesman for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command.

Salon Editor Joan Walsh said her organization raised questions after obtaining 279 photos taken inside Abu Ghraib along with other Army documents. "We thought, gee, let's check and see how this lines up with the documentation we had, and it really didn't," Walsh said. "We knew who the Army said that particular prisoner was," and it was not Qaissi.

DOJ_NMG_0019274

The Times was hardly the only news organization to name Qaissi as the hooded prisoner, although its profile -- headlined "Symbol of Abu Ghraib Seeks to Spare Others His Nightmare" -- gave him considerable prominence. Vanity Fair, the PBS show "Now," Der Spiegel and the Italian news media have all identified Qaissi as "The Claw."

"We did not present this as a scoop," Chira said. After careful checking, "we came up with a lot of people who believed he was this guy" in the photo.

Walsh credited the Times for its response to Salon. "As a Times subscriber, I was happy they moved to at least try to correct the record so quickly," she said.

Abu Ghraib Dog Handler Case Goes To Jury (AP)

By David Dishneau

AP, March 18, 2006

A military jury began deliberating Friday in the case against an Army dog handler accused of using his barking animal to torment prisoners at Abu Ghraib for his own amusement.

Sgt. Michael Smith, 24, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., could get up to 24 1/2 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

The jury met for about six hours before going home. Deliberations were to resume Monday morning.

The government contended Smith and another canine handler competed to make terrified prisoners at the Iraqi prison soil themselves. The defense argued that Smith believed he was following orders in a chaotic and confusing environment.

An Army prosecutor, Maj. Christopher Graveline, said in his closing argument that Smith violated training on treating prisoners humanely and using the minimum amount of force necessary. Graveline showed the jury enlarged photographs from 2003 and 2004 of Smith's black Belgian shepherd menacing cowering detainees.

"American soldiers don't do that," Graveline said. "And we don't do it because we think it's fun. And we don't do it for our laughs. And we don't take pictures of it."

But defense attorney Capt. Mary G. McCarthy countered: "He's on trial for his life for things he did because he thought he was supposed to — things he did because there was a lack of clear guidance."

She said that all Smith's dog did to prisoners was bark at them. One witness' testimony that the dog appeared to have nipped a prisoner's wrist was not corroborated.

Smith told investigators that he and Sgt. Santos A. Cardona used their unmuzzled dogs to help military intelligence interrogators. Cardona, 31, of Fullerton, Calif., is to stand trial May 22.

Testimony in the trial revealed conflicting notions among prison workers about how dogs were supposed to be used and what the approval process was.

Abu Ghraib's former military intelligence chief, Col. Thomas M. Pappas, testified that the dogs were to be used "to assist in setting conditions for interrogations." Pappas said that he approved a one-time use of muzzled dogs inside interrogation booths but later learned he lacked the authority to give such an order.

Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqis (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, March 18, 2006

The military will investigate allegations of potential misconduct by Marines during a bombing and firefight last November that left 15 Iraqi civilians dead, a top U.S. commander in Iraq said Friday.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the number two U.S. commander in Iraq, said that after a preliminary review of the incident he directed a criminal investigation into whether the Marines violated the rules of military engagement.

"We take these allegations of potential misconduct seriously and they will be thoroughly investigated. I really can't comment any further on this incident because of the ongoing investigation," said Chiarelli, who made the first public statements about the investigation Friday while speaking from Iraq to Pentagon reporters.

About a dozen Marines are being investigated for possible war crimes in connection with the November 2005 bombing and subsequent firefight between Marines and insurgents that led to the deaths of the Iraqi citizens. The 15 Iraqi civilians were initially reported killed by a roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0019275

Chiarelli said allegations of possible violations were brought to the attention of the military by a reporter in mid-February. He has referred the matter to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

Fifteen Iraqis, eight insurgents and a Marine were killed during the Nov. 19 firefight, which began when a roadside bomb detonated next to a joint Iraqi-U.S. squad patrolling Haditha, about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad. Immediately after the explosion, insurgents attacked the patrol with small arms.

The Marine killed was assigned to Regimental Combat Team 2 of the 2nd Marine Division; two other Marines were wounded. Defense officials would not identify the unit or Marines involved in the investigation. While several Iraqis were part of the patrol, they are not involved in the investigation, the official said.

Military officials will try to determine whether the Marines followed the international law of armed conflict, including whether they positively identified or tried to identify the enemy and whether they determined there was hostile intent, as they are supposed to do.

The law regulates international military operations, and anyone found in violation can be held liable for war crimes and be court-martialed under the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

It is not uncommon for insurgents to launch attacks from homes, hospitals and other public buildings, where civilians can get caught in the crossfire.

The official said the investigation is not focused on any one individual. About a dozen Marines were involved in the incident.

As the Iraq war ends its third year, estimates vary on civilian casualties. President Bush has said he thinks at least 30,000 Iraqis had been killed as of December, while some researchers put the number at 50,000 or more.

More than 2,300 U.S. military personnel have died, but the Pentagon does not release a tally of civilian or insurgent deaths.

U.S. To Investigate Civilian Deaths In Iraq (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Naval investigators are looking into whether Marines intentionally killed 15 Iraqi civilians - four of them women and five of them children - during fighting last November, defense officials said Friday.

One official said it's unclear whether the Marines killed the civilians accidentally or whether they fired indiscriminately. It's also unclear whether all the civilians died in the same house or in separate locations. Among the dead was a 15-year-old girl, an official said.

The investigation will examine how the Marines determined hostile intent during the firefight and whether they attempted to positively identify their targets before firing, the official said.

Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the ground commander of U.S. and coalition forces in Iraq, said he ordered the investigation to determine what happened during a firefight on Nov. 19, 2005, after insurgents exploded a bomb near a Marine convoy in the insurgent stronghold of Haditha, in western Iraq.

A U.S. military press release issued the next day said that one Marine and 15 Iraqi civilians died in the blast and that eight insurgents were killed in an ensuing firefight.

Chiarelli said he ordered an initial fact-finding investigation on Feb. 14 after a news reporter in Iraq raised allegations of possible wrongdoing by the Marines.

Chiarelli said he ordered the second investigation on March 9. That was after the preliminary inquiry found that the civilians didn't die in the blast, but were killed in the firefight that followed, according to the two defense officials familiar with the investigation.

"We take these allegations of potential misconduct seriously, and they will be thoroughly investigated," Chiarelli said, speaking from Iraq by teleconference to reporters at the Pentagon.

The Navy's Criminal Investigative Service is conducting the probe.

The Navy's investigation will seek to answer whether the Marines killed the civilians accidentally or whether the killings were deliberate, said one of the defense officials. The two officials asked not to be named because they weren't authorized to comment on specifics of the case.

DOJ_NMG_0019276

CNN reported the first details of the investigation late Thursday.

Marines from the 2nd Marine Division's Regimental Combat Team 2 were traveling in a four-Humvee convoy through Haditha on Nov. 19 when an improvised explosive device went off, according to one of the officials. Lance Cpl. Miguel Tarrazas, 20, of El Paso, Texas, was killed in the blast.

The explosion was the first of five blasts and coordinated small-arms attacks that hit the Marines over the next five hours. They stopped only after U.S. warplanes dropped two bombs on suspected insurgents, an official said. Haditha, which is about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad, is an insurgent stronghold and has been the scene of frequent attacks on U.S. troops in the past three years.

After the initial blast, a gun battle developed in which a squad of 12 to 15 Marines pursued the insurgents from house to house, with civilians inside apparently caught in the crossfire.

The incident isn't the first time that U.S. forces have been accused of killing unarmed civilians in Iraq. During the siege of the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah in November 2004, a television cameraman recorded a Marine shooting and killing an unarmed Iraqi who'd been wounded during the fierce fighting. The Marine was later cleared of any wrongdoing.

The two officials who asked not to be identified said that the squad that's under investigation in the present case is from the same unit, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, that was involved in the 2004 incident.

Casualty Of War (NSWK)

By Robina Riccitiello With Martha Brant and Karen Breslau

Newsweek, March 18, 2006

Damaged brains are emerging as the singular injury of the Iraq conflict. A soldier's story.

Sam Reyes remembers nothing of the suicide bomb attack on a highway outside Fallujah that nearly killed him on the morning of Sept. 6, 2004. Perhaps it's just as well. When medics arrived at the site of the attack, which left 12 Marines dead, they found Reyes sprawled on the road in desperate condition: his arms, back and head were pierced by shrapnel; his left arm was ripped open to the muscle; his stomach and spleen had been sliced; his ribs were broken, his face was badly burned and his tongue had been cut in half.

In the helicopter on the way to a military hospital in Baghdad, the medical team had to defibrillate his heart to keep him alive. Over the next 18 months, during an agonizing recovery, the young Marine gunner underwent several operations and lost 45 pounds. Although his physical wounds have largely healed—save for scattered scars across his forehead and his sense of taste, which has yet to return—the bomb blast left Reyes, now 21, with a less visible, but devastating injury to his brain. Like many Iraq vets who survive the concussive force of an improvised explosive device, or IED, Reyes is now sometimes unable to recognize his friends or family, to recall what he just read or heard, to concentrate or to read faster than the average second-grader. " I feel kind of odd when I see people and they say, 'Oh, you don't remember me'," says Reyes. "And I say, 'No, I don't.' They'll say, 'Remember, we did this and that when we were younger.' And I go, 'Oh, yeah.' It kind of makes me feel bad."

Like more than 1,700 military personnel wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan in recent years, Marine Cpl. Samuel Reyes Jr. is suffering from traumatic brain injury, known in military jargon as TBI, which leaves survivors unable to perform the most basic cognitive functions. According to officials at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, TBI affects more than 25 percent of bomb-blast survivors like Sam Reyes, making it the signature injury of the Iraq war. In fact, military officials say that were it not for advances in body armor, helmets and drastically improved battlefield medicine, the majority of survivors being treated for TBI would not have even survived their injuries as recently as the first gulf war 15 years ago. The increasing number of TBI survivors and the vexing limitations they face has become an enormous challenge for both military medicine and for the Department of Veterans Affairs, which will treat these survivors for life. "In the military, the question is 'are you battle ready?'" says Dr. Harriet Zeiner, a clinical neuropsychologist for the VA in Palo Alto, Calif., where Reyes is being treated. "Our criteria at the VA [are], are you going to be able to hold down a job, sustain a relationship, get married, have kids or do you have something that's going to impair you?"

For Reyes, and hundreds of others suffering from TBI, the answers to these questions are still far from clear. The diffuse but debilitating symptoms of traumatic brain injury—which sometimes are not apparent until months after the bomb blast—can leave veterans with festering psychological problems and anger that often lead to failed relationships and careers, substance-abuse problems and the inability to adapt to civilian life. Many TBI patients, like Reyes, are also suffering from posttraumatic stress syndrome (PTSD), a psychological condition affecting many combat veterans and other trauma survivors that is marked by flashbacks, nightmares, anxiety and irritability. The combination of TBI and PTSD, says the VA's Zeiner, "is pretty deadly." Reyes suffered damage to the frontal lobe of his brain, the area that helps a person calm himself after a stressful or frightening experience and where problem-solving takes place. When Reyes becomes anxious, he quickly escalates to a state of agitation. It's not uncommon, says Zeiner, for those suffering from TBI and PTSD to "either drink themselves into a stupor," in an effort to self-medicate, or to become agoraphobic, afraid to go out where they may have to contend with overwhelming stimuli.

DOJ_NMG_0019277

In the months after his injury, Reyes tried over and over again to qualify for combat duty and return to Iraq. The first three times, he wasn't strong enough to run and do the pullups required to demonstrate his fitness for duty. On the last two attempts, Reyes passed the physical tests, but knee pain, stomach problems and the increasing effects of the brain injury kept him confined to barracks at Camp Pendleton, near San Diego. While other members of his unit, the First Marine Division, Second Battalion Fox Company weapons platoon, returned from Iraq in October 2004 and went back to work at Camp Pendleton, Reyes lived in limbo for nearly a year. "I never had to get dressed. I didn't have to go to work," says Reyes. "They wouldn't want me to have a 'brain-injury moment'." He spent his days in the barracks watching movies and playing videogames to make the time pass and seeing a doctor for his memory problems and nightmares. He began to drink heavily. In June 2005, Reyes was examined by a civilian doctor who recognized signs of traumatic brain injury, and he was transferred almost immediately to the VA's specialized brain-injury unit in Palo Alto.

At the Palo Alto center, one of four VA facilities around the country with a specialized TBI unit, Reyes began the frustrating process of retraining the damaged memory center of his brain. All the brain-injury patients in Palo Alto are issued handheld computers, which the staff jokingly calls "brain prosthetics." Reyes sets the alarm on his twice a day in order to remember to check his to-do list. He began keeping a journal to try to spur his memory. Another device, a Franklin electronic dictionary, pronounces words to help rebuild his vocabulary while reading. It recently took Reyes a month and a half to read "Jarhead," the memoir of a Marine sniper. Before his injury, he says would have read the same book in a day or two. In his lighter moments, Reyes, who hopes to attend college on the G.I. bill, quips that Dr. Seuss's "Green Eggs and Ham" is about his speed now.

The brain damage also has painful emotional consequences. His family members were shocked that he often couldn't remember their faces. Sometimes a voice will help him remember. Other times an object can prod his memory. One buddy gave him a football to remind Reyes of his high-school football career in Houston, where he grew up. Tossing the football can bring back specific memories of plays he used to run and hits he made. Other times, it's harder to remember. If a therapist reads him a two-line story about a mom and dad going to the store and the purchases they made, he'll say, "Who went to the store?" Reyes says, "It gets kind of annoying." When he watches movies, he tends to forget by the end what happened in the beginning.

Soon after he arrived at the brain-injury center, Reyes's doctors began trying to convince him to go for treatment at the VA's PTSD center in nearby Menlo Park, where Vietnam veterans work side by side with active-duty Marines and soldiers, trying to find ways to deal with the lingering trauma of their respective wars. At first, Reyes resisted, worried that his fellow Marines might think he was weak. Meeting the other men in the PTSD treatment center had a big impact on him. "Some of them are real tough, big guys, real smart, and that made me feel better. It showed me I wasn't the only one in the whole world who would have it." Reyes says his fellow Marines who haven't gotten help are suffering. "I tried to let some guys know who I thought could use help, and they said, 'Nah, I don't need that. I take sleep medicine and I drink, so I'm doing pretty good'." Although the Marine Corps is sending some mental-health workers into the field, Reyes says he didn't have any discussions about combat-related stress. He got a brochure about PTSD at one point, but says it didn't explain the symptoms. "It scares me that all these guys could be just like me, having the same problems, and they're getting ready to ruin a whole lot of their life."

As the population of wounded Iraq veterans increases, the military is also trying to raise awareness about TBI, especially the less severe cases like Reyes's, which can easily be misdiagnosed or overlooked in the chaos of battlefield medicine. The Defense Department is developing a training course for medics to teach them how to screen for TBI in the field. Any injured combatant who has lost consciousness is a candidate for TBI diagnosis. The military is also making plans to station a TBI expert at medical facility in Germany where the U.S. wounded are first evacuated after leaving Iraq. "I'm sure people do get misdiagnosed , says Dr. Warren Lux, deputy director of the Defense and Veterans Brain Injury Center at Walter Reed. "That is why we are trying to get education out there."

DOJ_NMG_0019278

For now, the 6-foot-3 Reyes fills his days with volleyball and basketball, group-therapy sessions, meditation and recreational therapy at the VA's Residential Rehabilitation Program in Menlo Park. Being so close to the civilian world has exposed him to painful criticism of the war. "It kind of hurts that I lost a lot of friends and I got injured," he says. "I guess that's what freedom of speech is for." Someday, he hopes the Iraqi children who once enthusiastically greeted Reyes and his fellow Marines will appreciate their sacrifices. In the meantime, Reyes is working on putting his own life back together. Later this year, he plans to marry, and before long, to attend college. First though, he wants to learn once again to recognize his family members, especially his beloved 5-year-old brother who dressed up as a Marine for Halloween in honor of the injured big brother who struggles to remember his name.

The War Through A Father's Eyes (WP)

By H. Barry Holt

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

I cannot describe the relief I felt when our oldest son returned from war alive -- for the second time. He is an Army communications specialist, a job designed to support combat units in a mobile war. Although his first deployment to Iraq may have been inevitable, my wife and I were terrified when he received his orders, less than a year after he had enlisted as an uncertain and directionless 18-year-old and less than six months after basic training. Uncertain information from the Army meant we couldn't be there to see him board the plane to war. But we managed to be there the week before, full of parental stoicism and quiet terror demonstrated through hugs and tears.

I generally accepted the reasons we went to war and worried about terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. Like many Americans, I believed that America had a moral duty to protect the oppressed of Iraq. But with my son in that war, my interest became much more parochial. Policy meant less than facts.

At first we heard nothing, then finally one short phone call from Kuwait told us he was safe and bored with waiting. I filled time between infrequent e-mails scouring the Internet for local newspapers showing pictures of his unit's equipment being shrink-wrapped and loaded on transport ships. Think-tank Web sites gave information about bases in western Iraq, where he was headed. I devoured bits of information he gave me through e-mail and telephone calls, and slowly his story unfolded. I shuddered when he described his terrifying 36-hour convoy race from Kuwait to Anbar province. His girlfriend told us (he tried to protect us from such news) about the attack on his convoy and his using his newly minted "expert" qualification on the SAW light machine gun to kill an attacking Iraqi soldier.

I anguished over his descriptions of random mortar attacks on his base, and I chastised him for volunteering for "shotgun" duty on missions conducted by the combat unit he supported. But hearing nothing for long periods was so much worse. I had persistent nightmares about improvised explosive devices, mortar rounds, snipers and accidents, knowing nothing but fearing the worst. Every report of an attack triggered frantic efforts to unearth the latest news, each time followed by guilty relief that my son was not hurt and by shame that I was relieved that someone else had died. But I cried every time I saw lists of casualties as I scoured the names for soldiers and Marines from his home base or our hometown. Now they were my children, too.

My fears escalated when he told me he was slightly wounded during a firefight, and his only reaction was annoyance that there would be no Purple Heart because an investigation revealed the cause was friendly fire. My heart broke when he told me about two friends who died in different accidents and about a sergeant he knew who was killed by a sniper. When he left Anbar on the convoy back to Kuwait, with improvised armor on his vehicle, I worried until he phoned after his safe arrival.

My son came home . . . alive.

Our visit after he returned was emotional and sweet. He had not changed much, but he was moody and uninterested in news about the war. During the next nine months, with another deployment expected, life became more urgent as he married and then fathered our first grandchild. Much of that immediate joy was denied him because he was in northern Iraq when his son was born. But our grandson is beautiful and will grow up proud of his father.

DOJ_NMG_0019279

My son's second tour in Iraq was, in some ways, easier on us than the first. We knew more of what to expect, and my anxiety dulled to a continuous daily ache. He complained to me about boredom -- and I celebrated! "A little boredom is a good thing, enjoy it," I would tell him. But with youthful impatience, he longed for more action.

Although the second deployment generally was less stressful, we were confused and angry at the Army when he asked us to buy ammo pouches and other military accessories that weren't issued to him. His convoy to northern Iraq was nerve-wracking and dangerous, but he made it safely. His base was more developed than it was in Anbar, but mortar and rocket-propelled grenade attacks continued, and some fell perilously close. Our persistent worry resurfaced. But he survived all of that and finally flew back home safely.

My view of the war hasn't changed. I am concerned about mistakes made and whether it will be worth all the bloodshed. I wonder how long the troops will remain -- will my son have to go back? Even though our thoughts are full of visits with son, daughter-in-law and grandson, in the back of my mind the worry persists. Rumors are that his unit will return to Iraq next fall. Will he survive?

Anxiety resurrects itself each time I see casualty lists, and I still cry over each soldier's death. I am one with all the parents who lie sleepless every night worrying over their soldier children. Their children are still my children, and that feeling will never end. We are U.S Army and Marine parents, proud of all our sons and daughters who protect this country. But they have seen far too much for people so young, and I don't want any of them to die.

My son is home and alive. He has done his duty and I don't want him to go back.

The writer lives in Arlington.

Was The War Worth It? (TIME)

By David Kennedy

Time, March 16, 2006

As the third anniversary of the beginning of the Iraq War approaches, TIME asked leading thinkers around the world to weigh in on the question at the heart of the ongoing debate about the controversial conflict.

This is the first installment of a feature that will appear in the forthcoming issue of TIME.

No. From the outset the war was a colossally bold and breathtakingly risky gamble. Unfortunately, and unsurprisingly, the United States has failed to beat the odds. Forget about WMDs and links to al-Queda as rationales for the war. The real purpose for invading Iraq was the extravagant ambition to transform the political culture of the entire Middle East. The Bush administration bet American might and good intentions against the accumulated weight of centuries of religious rivalry, tribal tensions, wanton bloodletting, and authoritarian rule. Even American hyper-power has proved no match for the burden of all that sorry history.

Hisham Kassem, Egyptian democracy activist:

Sadly, I have to say yes. It is difficult to commend such a bloody scene. But it achieved something useful. Parallel to the chaos and bloodshed, there is a political process evolving in Iraq. Bloodshed is the price of the transition from Saddam's psychopathic dictatorship. The losses would have been higher had Saddam stayed on. You could easily see that regime lasting for another 30 years, under his sons and top generals. Negotiating with Iraq was not an option. There had to be a military intervention. You have a block of 22 countries in the Arab world dominated by authoritarianism and dictatorship. It is not a block you could engage politically and pressure for reform. By military intervention, the U.S. is able to pressure the region into the reforms we are beginning to see across the region that might avert many countries from becoming failed states. The world cannot put up with state failure in the back yard of the world's oil fields, Israel and Europe.

Lawrence B. Wilkerson, Colonel, U.S. Army (ret.); former chief of staff for Secretary of State Colin Powell:

No. I'm principally a strategist and from that perspective the war has been a disaster. First, the foremost winner has been Iran: it rid itself of its greatest threat, Saddam Hussein and his military, without firing a shot; won the December 15 Iraq elections; owns the south, particularly Basra; and has felt the freedom to elect Mahmoud Amadinejad who, in turn, has felt the freedom to reclaim leadership of radical Islam, leadership Osama bin Laden claimed on 9/11. Second, the foremost loser, after Iraq itself, has been Israel, whose leaders must now fear more than ever before the new strategic maneuver room afforded Iran by America's ineptitude. Third, the general war against global terrorists has been affected greatly by the failure in Iraq. Recruiting among Muslim ranks has been aided significantly, while America has squandered the upper hand in the world of ideas, which is the real battlefield of this conflict. Lastly, if our failure in Iraq produces regional conflict, we will find ourselves expending far greater blood and treasure to stabilize the situation once it gets completely out of hand. And the odds that it will get completely out of hand if we continue on the present course are quite high.

DOJ_NMG_0019280

Tommy Franks, General, U.S. Army (ret.); as chief of U.S. Central Command, Franks oversaw the invasion and the three months following it, until his retirement on July 7, 2003:

Yes. America remains very proud of, and very thankful to our sons and daughters serving in Iraq and around the world in the cause of freedom. The events of 9-11-01 taught us a valuable lesson.... ignoring terrorism will not make the problem go away. The sacrifices of our military members and their families are giving Iraqis a chance for freedom. And a free Iraq serves not only Iraqis... it will stand as a model in the Middle East. A model that represents to millions of people that there is an alternative to terrorism.

Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT/AFP)

By Emmanuel Duparcq, Agence France-presse

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

LASHKARGAH, Afghanistan -- Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign, officials say.

The campaign to destroy opium poppy fields was begun March 8 in southern Helmand, the producer of most of Afghanistan's opium crop -- which makes up nearly 90 percent of the world total -- and also one of the provinces worst-hit by a Taliban-led insurgency.

"Terrorists and narcotics are very close; they're supporting each other," said Helmand province Gov. Muhammad Daud. "When narcotics production is up, terrorism automatically goes up."

Lt. Col. Henry Worsley of the 3,500 British forces deployed in the province agreed. "Taliban and drugs feed each other. You cannot separate them here."

In their final two years in power, before they were toppled in a U.S.-led invasion in late 2001, the Taliban banned opium and succeeded in drastically slashing its production to 185 tons from 3,300 tons.

Some observers say their motivation was to win international favor. Others say they wanted to push up the price of the raw ingredient of heroin.

Four years later, the Taliban rebels are willing to protect opium crops and farmers against the new administration in Kabul. The United States and other Western countries, which see opium as a source of terrorist funding, are pressuring the government led by President Hamid Karzai to eradicate the crop.

Several anonymous letters attributed to the Taliban have been distributed in the past few months in Helmand and other insurgency-infested provinces that threaten farmers with reprisals if they do not plant opium, residents said.

Some letters also offer protection against government eradication attempts.

"Taliban will try to disrupt the eradication campaign," said the Helmand governor who has vowed to remove all the opium from his province in two months.

"Eradication will cause fighting," said Mohammed Sardar, an official from the nongovernmental group Mercy Corps that is trying to persuade opium farmers to switch to other crops.

"Poor farmers won't fight, but Taliban and smugglers will," he said.

DOJ:

Justice Lawyer Named Interim U.S. Attorney (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 18, 2006

Chuck Rosenberg, a veteran Justice Department lawyer serving as the top federal prosecutor in Houston, will take over the high-profile chief prosecutor's job in Alexandria, Va.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday named Rosenberg the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. He replaces Paul McNulty, who was confirmed by the Senate late Thursday as deputy attorney general.

Rosenberg, 45, will be in charge of the office that is seeking the death penalty against Zacarias Moussaoui and has prosecuted other terrorism cases.

Rosenberg served as the chief of staff to then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey when Comey reportedly raised objections to aspects of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program.

Alexandria Federal Prosecutor Sworn In (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Job Likely to Be Made Permanent

A veteran prosecutor with experience in Northern Virginia was appointed yesterday as interim U.S. attorney in Alexandria, one of the highest-profile federal prosecutor's jobs in the country, the Justice Department announced.

Chuck Rosenberg, 45, was sworn in last night before U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III. President Bush intends to nominate Rosenberg for the job permanently, but it was unclear when that would occur, officials familiar with the selection process said.

Rosenberg, the interim U.S. attorney in Houston and a former federal prosecutor in Alexandria, succeeds Paul J. McNulty, who was sworn in yesterday as deputy attorney general after being confirmed by the U.S. Senate. McNulty had been U.S. attorney in Alexandria since 2001.

The Alexandria U.S. attorney's job has always been considered a law enforcement plum, and it grew increasingly visible after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as the Justice Department made McNulty's office a central front in terrorism prosecutions. The office won a guilty plea from Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from Sept. 11, and is now trying to convince a jury to execute him.

Other prominent cases in Alexandria have included the prosecutions of John Walker Lindh, a Californian convicted of fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, and of a group of Muslim men convicted of training overseas for holy war against the United States. The office also has been known to handle highly publicized espionage cases such as the Aldrich H. Ames and Robert P. Hanssen cases.

Rosenberg declined to comment last night on the selection process.

Law enforcement sources have said Rosenberg was the favored candidate to replace McNulty in part because his selection would provide continuity in terrorism prosecutions and national security. A Justice Department news release yesterday said Rosenberg has focused on counterterrorism, counterintelligence and national security matters in recent years.

He has held the Houston post for nine months and previously served in a variety of high-profile jobs at the Justice Department and the FBI in Washington. They included chief of staff for Deputy Attorney General James B. Comey, counselor to then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and counsel to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

In the 1990s, Rosenberg worked as a prosecutor in Alexandria and Richmond and specialized in financial fraud crimes, violent crimes and espionage cases.

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria serves the eastern half of Virginia, including all of Northern Virginia and Richmond, Norfolk and Newport News.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Two Cheers For Nancy Pelosi (WSJ)

By Mallory Factor

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Have America's entrepreneurs and corporate leaders found a new voice of regulatory sanity in, of all people, Nancy Pelosi? Apparently so, and that should be a wake-up call to Republicans -- because like everything else in the free market, the free enterprise agenda is up for grabs. In the recent "Innovation Agenda" that the House Democratic leader and her party unveiled,

DOJ_NMG_0019282

Ms. Pelosi acknowledges specifically the need to "ensure Sarbanes-Oxley requirements are not overly burdensome," and endorses reform. Meanwhile, the scourge of Wall Street, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, is criticizing Sarbanes-Oxley's "unbelievable burden on small companies" and its possible role in "preventing some initial public offerings."

Ms. Pelosi and other Democrats have been quicker to recognize what many traditional champions of free enterprise have been slow to see: the law's disastrous consequences for our nation's ability to compete. Congress passed this law hastily in 2002 after the egregious accounting frauds at Enron and WorldCom. The intent was to hold publicly held companies and their executives more accountable and weed out bad actors; but that's not been the effect. Four years after passage, it is now evident that the costs of Sarbox clearly outweigh the benefits.

Consider first the costs. Recent estimates from the American Electronic Association, for example, show that U.S. companies are spending $35 billion annually simply to comply with the law as opposed to original federal estimates of $1.2 billion. A University of Nebraska study found that audit fees for Fortune 1000 companies, on average, increased a staggering 103% from 2003 to 2004. The costs of being a U.S. public company are now more than triple what they were before the law passed, according to a study conducted by the Milwaukee-based law firm of Foley & Lardner. Some smaller firms report that they are spending 300% more on Sarbox compliance than on health care for their employees.

Based on a growing body of theoretical and empirical research, the SEC's Advisory Committee on Smaller Public Companies concluded that Sarbox places a disproportionate compliance burden on small public companies, making it more difficult for them to compete with foreign companies and to a lesser extent with larger U.S. companies. Consider the survey by the American Electronics Association, which found that companies with sales of $100 million and under are spending 2.6% of their revenues on Sarbox compliance -- enough to tip many of them from profitability into unprofitability. This makes it something of a challenge for these companies to innovate, compete or grow -- or even survive.

As a result of these burdensome costs, enterprises are deciding not to go public, or else are opting to back out of our capital markets. Explaining his company's absorption into privately held Koch Industries, Peter Correll, the CEO of Georgia-Pacific, said, "There is a lot of time spent by top management on things that are not value-adding, but are simply bureaucratic and are required by a raft of regulation." In fact, the Foley & Lardner study found that 20% of public companies are considering going private just to avoid Sarbox compliance. It's no wonder, then, that the London Stock Exchange -- eager to exploit a competitive advantage -- now promotes itself by reminding companies that by listing on the LSE they are not subject to Sarbox.

Beyond the direct cost of compliance to individual companies, a recent University of Rochester study concluded that the total effect of the law has reduced the stock value of American companies by $1.4 trillion. That is $1.4 trillion that could be invested in infrastructure improvements, jobs, innovative technologies or research and development. As Sun Microsystems CEO Scott McNealy says, Sarbanes-Oxley throws "buckets of sand into the gears of the market economy."

The true beneficiaries of Sarbox are the nation's large auditing firms, which now maintain a regulatory oligarchy composed of a handful of entrenched services corporations. They will continue to champion Sarbox, since it provides a guaranteed market for their services. Surely this law was not intended by its authors to become a full employment act for the same auditing industry which was implicated in the original malfeasance of four or five years ago.

Sarbox highlighted the importance of financial transparency and management integrity. And those in the corporate world who break the law should be punished. They are: Over 700 prosecutions have been launched since 2002 to address corporate crimes. Nevertheless, not one conviction was a result of Sarbox. Meanwhile, Sarbox clearly failed to prevent the massive accounting scandal at Fannie Mae.

On top of everything else, the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB), which is central to the operation of the law, violates the separation of powers principle and the federal Constitution's Appointments Clause -- which is why the Free Enterprise Fund has joined with a team of legal experts to challenge the PCAOB's constitutionality. Since the Sarbanes-Oxley law is not severable, the result would be to throw out the entire law.

The PCAOB performs an executive branch function, but the president does not have the authority to appoint or remove members of the board; they're appointed by the SEC in consultation with the chairman of the Federal Reserve and the secretary of the Treasury, and may be removed only by the SEC. In short, PCAOB is not accountable to any elected official or the citizens. It therefore violates the Appointments Clause (Article II, Section 2) of the U.S. Constitution, which calls for appointment by the president with the "advice and consent" of the Senate -- not the SEC.

DOJ_NMG_0019283

American financial markets have long been at the center of economic growth, innovation and world commerce. Unfortunately, Sarbanes-Oxley is undermining our financial markets; and in its current form it is also unconstitutional. For the sake of the free enterprise system and America's prosperity, I hope that the desires of Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Spitzer to reform this well-intentioned, but misguided attempt at reform will soon be joined by many others in Congress -- and in the Bush administration.

Mr. Factor is the chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Opposes Libby Motion To Dismiss (AP)

AP, March 18, 2006

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald on Friday disputed the claim of Vice President Dick Cheney's former top aide that the prosecutor lacks legal authority to indict him in the CIA leak investigation.

Fitzgerald opposed the move of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby asking a judge to dismiss the five-count indictment against him in the Valerie Plame affair. In court papers, the prosecutor argued that being allowed to operate outside any control of the Justice Department is constitutional and in accordance with federal law.

The prosecutor, who is investigating the disclosure of Plame's CIA undercover status, is not supervised by the Justice Department and he is not required to inform anyone at the department about the investigation's progress.

In a court filing in February, Libby said that only Congress could approve such an arrangement.

"The attorney general may delegate powers but he may not abdicate responsibility," Libby's lawyers wrote.

Fitzgerald replied that the attorney general has been granted broad legal authority by Congress "to delegate any of his functions to other offices of the Department of Justice."

Fitzgerald is the U.S. attorney in Chicago. He was appointed in December 2003 by then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey. John Ashcroft, the attorney general at the time, recused himself from the matter because of a conflict.

Fitzgerald obtained an indictment of Libby on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI.

Charges Against Cowles Dropped (WP)

By Cecilia Kang

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

U.S. Court Clears Local Executive

Charges have been dropped against Northern Virginia businessman Frank L. Cowles Jr., who was arrested in November on allegations of conspiring to defraud a hedge fund out of $25 million.

A U.S. District Court judge in Chicago dropped criminal charges against Cowles on March 1 after the U.S. attorney's office there filed a motion to dismiss. Cases continue against two men who were charged with Cowles for allegedly defrauding a Chicago-based fund.

From his horse farm in Scottsville, Va., Cowles, an attorney and former board chairman of Arlington-based Virginia Commerce Bank, said he was "ebullient" that the charges were dismissed.

"For someone who has been absolutely clean and honorable all my life, the charges came as quite a blow," Cowles, 76, said in a telephone interview.

"The only thing I've ever had on my record is three speeding tickets when I was 18," he said. "After a very, very exhaustive 3 1/2 -month investigation, they came up with the right conclusion."

Cowles's attorney, Robert D. Luskin of the law firm Patton Boggs in the District, said the complaint against Cowles was a mistake and that his client had been the victim of a scheme that cost him a great financial loss.

"This was a mistake," Luskin said. "The person that was thought to be the predator was actually the prey."

DOJ_NMG_0019284

The two men still facing prosecution in the case are accused by prosecutors of wire fraud. Richard E. Warren of Fredericksburg, who has pleaded not guilty, was indicted and detained. A complaint against David L. Myatt of Los Banos, Calif., is pending.

Cowles said he lost "millions of dollars" from his dealings with Warren.

After his arrest, Cowles resigned as a director of Virginia Commerce Bank. He owns two car dealerships in Woodbridge and raises Brangus cattle and Arabian horses on his Scottsville farm. The decision to drop charges against him was reported yesterday by the Washington Business Journal.

Enron Trial Approaches Halfway Point (AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, March 18, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-The fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling is reaching its halfway mark: Seven weeks, 15 prosecution witnesses and more to come.

Yet for all the government's methodical efforts to show through documents, video and audio tapes and those witnesses' memories of how the former corporate titans repeatedly lied about the disgraced company's financial health, the jury's conclusion may hinge on what the defendants say if they testify as expected.

The government has already brought on its highly anticipated witnesses. This past week started with former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow's fourth and last day on the stand. Fastow, an admitted liar and thief, hid none of his own culpability as he said he helped Lay and Skilling lie about Enron's financial health.

The week wrapped with Sherron Watkins, the former vice president hailed as a hero by Congress for warning Lay of impending financial disaster months before the company crashed, denting Lay's claim that he believed the company was strong at the time.

Yet a conviction is far from a foregone conclusion.

"It's the difference between legitimate spinning and impermissible lying," Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who has followed the trial, said of what will likely drive the outcome of the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals.

"In a case like this, if Lay or Skilling or both take the stand, it becomes almost a new trial in the sense that jurors will either believe them or disbelieve them," Mintz said.

The government's "brick by brick" approach is living up to expectations of putting together a puzzle without betting all on a single witness, said Michael Wynne, another former federal prosecutor in Houston who has observed much of the trial.

Even Fastow, who has been vilified for stealing millions and running scams that helped fuel the company's 2001 collapse, isn't the government's linchpin - and his public excoriation through brutal cross-examination provided plenty of drama, Wynne said.

Lay has said repeatedly he will testify - most recently in a speech to Houston business and academic leaders more than a month before the trial commenced. Lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli told jurors during his opening statement his client would do the same.

Both can change their minds, particularly if they decide the government's case is weak and they don't need to subject themselves to bruising cross-examination.

"If they testify, and we've been promised that, it is going to be one for the ages," Wynne said.

The government contends that Lay and Skilling repeatedly spouted ebullient optimism about Enron's financial strength when they allegedly knew accounting tricks propped up weak ventures and hid losses.

The defendants counter that there was no fraud at Enron, they did nothing wrong, and scathing publicity along with diminished market confidence pushed the company into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Prosecutors said they expect to wrap up their case by the last week of March. Then the defense gets its turn, and the government can have the last word with rebuttal witnesses.

DOJ_NMG_0019285

"We'll probably end before the end of April," U.S. District Judge Sim Lake told jurors this past week, indicating that both sides may have severely whittled their cases in a trial that had been expected to last four months or more.

So far, Mintz said, "The government has done a very solid job and the defense has done its job as well.

"The government had its witnesses well prepared, but as with all witnesses, there are certain vulnerabilities that can't be avoided and the defense did an excellent job of highlighting those for the jury. Those who cut deals can't run from those deals. Those who have lied previously can't deny it," he said.

Wynne said both sides "are trying to arm individual jurors who may be leaning their way with arguments or examples to pull out during jury deliberations."

So far, seven ex-Enron executives who pleaded guilty to crimes have testified. Two other cooperators who haven't been charged with crimes - one who paid half a million dollars to settle regulatory allegations of manipulating Enron's books and another who obtained an immunity deal - also spoke from the witness chair.

Of the rest, three were ex-executives who said they unearthed alarming financial problems and voiced concerns to no avail; two were rank-and-file Enron workers who lost their jobs and retirement savings when the company collapsed; and one is an accountant still employed by what is left of Enron who explained how the company once developed spending and profit plans to meet earnings goals.

In the coming week, prosecutors aim to present two former Arthur Andersen LLP accountants who once audited Enron's books; a credit rating analyst for Standard & Poors; and Ben Glisan Jr., the former Enron treasurer who pleaded guilty to conspiracy for creating financial structures to cook the company's books and is serving the five-year maximum prison term for his crime.

The cooperators provide an inside view and admit they participated in string of lies. Those like Watkins who voiced concerns demonstrate that top executives had access to negative financial information that contradicted rosy public statements. The victims provide a human view of what ex-workers lost when the company crumbled.

The ex-Andersen accountants are expected to testify that Enron hid the true nature of transactions to get their approvals, and the credit rating analyst is expected to say Enron's investment grade rating assumed the company's financial disclosures were accurate.

The defense teams have consistently challenged credibility of cooperators, indicating they succumbed to government pressure to plead guilty and hope for a lenient sentence rather than risk a trial. Some were likable, others weren't, but whether jurors believe them is paramount, Wynne said.

"It's not a question of whether you want to bring them home for dinner or if you like them," he said. "It's whether or not they are providing evidence that tends to prove up the counts in the indictment. You've got to put them on the stand and you've got to tell the whole story."

In Enron Trial, Witnesses' Quirks And Stamina Are On The Stand (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

HOUSTON, March 16 -- When former Enron Corp. executive Sherron Watkins took the witness stand Wednesday, she spoke confidently of the failings of her former bosses, chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling and chairman Kenneth L. Lay.

The media-savvy Watkins, who won plaudits from Congress and the public for her warnings that the Houston company would collapse, volunteered opinions about everything from accounting strategy to board members she called inept.

But on cross-examination, defense lawyers took one of Watkins's apparent strengths -- her outspokenness -- and turned it against her.

Ron Woods, a lawyer for Skilling, asked whether Watkins had developed a reputation at Enron for overheated judgments and for failing to listen, and Watkins more or less concurred.

"I found out my nickname was 'Buzzsaw,' " the witness said.

Seven weeks into the blockbuster fraud trial of Lay and Skilling, defense lawyers have tried to wear down the government's witnesses with questions tailored to exploit personality quirks, large or small. Cross-examination, after all, is a high-stakes game of endurance and amateur psychology -- a matter of finding a witness's Achilles' heel, that trait most likely to undermine their performances on the witness stand.

And, in this case, the defense has plenty of weapons at its disposal. "The fact is, the defense does have a somewhat unusual amount of material to cross-examine them with," said Washington criminal defense lawyer E. Lawrence Barcella Jr. of the Enron investigation, which generated countless articles and voluminous written reports from Congress, a bankruptcy examiner, the company's board and federal regulators.

The defense came out of the gate in February determined to test the endurance of the government's witnesses, many of them former executives who pleaded guilty and agreed to testify in exchange for reduced prison terms. Former investor relations chief Mark E. Koenig, the fraud trial's first witness, remained on the stand for eight days -- including five of protracted cross-examination in which a tired Koenig sometimes appeared to agree with the defense on certain points, if only to shorten his ordeal.

Questions to Kevin P. Hannon, a former official in Enron's high-speed-Internet unit who followed Koenig to the stand, appealed to the jury's sense of humor -- and Hannon's apparent lack of one.

Hannon delivered one of the most surprising bits of testimony so far -- saying under oath that Skilling uttered, "They're on to us," in a May 2001 meeting at which high-level executives discussed a research report suggesting that Enron's stock was overvalued. In a prosecution case built on subtle, indirect testimony, that quote resonated.

But Skilling lawyer Mark Holscher managed to diminish its impact. He underscored Hannon's stiff demeanor, repeatedly highlighting the witness's inability to react to a joke. Holscher suggested that Skilling often employed sarcasm to deride investors who bet that Enron's stock price would fall, implying that the "They're on to us" remark was a note of humor that everyone else in the room picked up but Hannon.

"Do you recall Mr. Skilling making reference to the Mr. Bill segment on 'Saturday Night Live'? The gag routine with Mr. Bill, 'Ooooh, noooo, Mr. Bill'?" Holscher asked.

No, Hannon replied solemnly.

"You're a rather tightly wound, intense person aren't you, Mr. Hannon?" the smiling defense lawyer said.

Taking a different tack, Skilling's lawyer Daniel M. Petrocelli hammered away at former investor relations official and corporate secretary Paula H. Rieker last month. Rieker is a controlled, impeccably dressed woman who spent most of her questioning by prosecutors smiling, nodding and speaking directly to the jury in calm tones. But she was rattled and blinked repeatedly after Petrocelli pounded at exhibits in a notebook in front of her and stood directly beside her, invading her space until she asked him, with a chill in her voice, to step back to the podium.

The defense lawyer later turned the moment into a joke, asking the witness rather than the judge if he might "approach." Rieker granted him permission, but she had lost some of the confidence that characterized her earlier performance on the stand.

"Sometimes it's not what you get a witness to say but how you get a jury to perceive a witness," said Chip Lewis, a lawyer for Lay who led the cross-examination of Watkins on Wednesday.

The Enron defendants are following a strategy similar to that of former HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard M. Scrushy, acquitted by a Birmingham jury last year of three dozen criminal charges related to a $2.7 billion accounting fraud. At Scrushy's urging, and armed with his insights about former colleagues, his lawyers vigorously went after five chief financial officers who testified against him. James Parkman, Scrushy's lawyer, goaded the government's star witness, William T. Owens, into demonstrating a formidable ego that once led him to call himself "the smartest man in the world." Jurors later said they discounted his testimony.

Houston trial lawyer Rusty Hardin, whose questions in a successful probate dispute over the estate of billionaire J. Howard Marshall II sparked his widow, model and reality-TV star Anna Nicole Smith, to lose her cool and holler, "Screw you, Rusty!" from the witness stand, has taken a softer approach when circumstances called for it.

For instance, sensing that a key witness did not believe he had really broken the law, the lawyer gently prodded auditor David B. Duncan to raise questions about his own guilt, to which he had pleaded, and by implication, that of his firm, Arthur Andersen LLP, in a 2002 obstruction-of-justice case. Jurors ultimately convicted Andersen, but the Supreme Court tossed out the verdict because of faulty jury instructions that struck at the heart of Hardin's argument: that no one had intended to commit a crime.

DOJ_NMG_0019287

Cross-examination involves walking a delicate line between discrediting a witness and being too harsh and invoking sympathy from the jury, he said.

"You have to stay polite," Hardin said. "I want a jury to like me, because I want 'em to go back there and resolve the close issues in my favor. They're suspicious of lawyers to begin with. You don't want to be in a position of beating up on a cripple."

Despite scoring points on many of the government's 15 witnesses, lawyers for Skilling and Lay, who argued in opening statements that no major fraud occurred at Enron, have yet to get one of prosecutors' cooperating witnesses to recant the way Duncan did in the Andersen trial. And while they have raised questions about the motives and the truthfulness of former executives who pleaded guilty, they have met with less success in shaking them from assertions that at least two of Enron's core business units performed disastrously in the company's final years and that management was aware of the disasters at the same time Lay and Skilling were reassuring investors and employees that all was well.

And even as Skilling lawyer Ron Woods confronted Watkins with the prospect that her lucrative speech-making career could be cut short if jurors acquit the defendants, Watkins got the last word Wednesday afternoon.

"Sir, I speak on leadership failures," she said. "They remain failed business leaders."

Court Reverses Death Sentence Of L.A. Man (LAT)

By Kelly-anne Suarez, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

A federal appeals court on Friday overturned the death sentence of a Los Angeles man who avenged the loss of his therapist by murdering her husband.

The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld William Clark's conviction, which included murder, two counts of attempted murder, rape and arson. But the court said the judge had misled the jury about death penalty law. The court also said the California Supreme Court should have overturned the penalty during its review.

Ava Gawronski was counseling Clark, a 37-year-old Canoga Park underwriter, and his wife, but stopped treating him after he threatened to rape her in her office.

In January 1982, Clark set Gawronski's West Los Angeles house ablaze. His intent, Clark said during his trial, was to chase the family out so he could shoot and kill David Gawronski, a 35-year-old federal job trainer, in front of his wife and infant daughter.

Instead, David Gawronski perished in the fire.

Ava Gawronski, 32, was hospitalized for 10 months and lost her nose and fingers. A neighbor rescued the baby, who was unharmed.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Scott Taryle, who represented the prosecution, called it an "unfortunate decision."

Taryle said Clark initially considered mailing Ava Gawronski severed heads, but decided that wasn't enough.

"The crime itself was a horrible act by a coldblooded murderer," he said.

Attorneys with the federal public defender's office in Los Angeles, who brought the appeal, could not be reached for comment.

Feds May Drop Capital Case: Dot Men Face Death Penalty In Slay (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, March 18, 2006

Federal prosecutors may soon drop the controversial death-penalty case against two Dorchester menthe federal government wanted to try for murder and gang activity.

Pending a green light from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, murder and racketeering indictments against Darryl Green and Branden Morris could be dropped as early as next month.

Prosecutor Theodore Heinrich said in court documents “the likelihood of dismissal is so great” after two co-defendants of Green and Morris who weren’t facing capital punishment were acquitted, that it would be futile to go on.

DOJ_NMG_0019288

Morris is “tremendously relieved,” his attorney, Patricia Garin, said yesterday. “We were all incredulous from the beginning that this case was charged as a death-penalty case and that our client was charged at all.”

Green’s defense counsel, Randolph Gioia, said, “The only reason you bring a case like this to federal court is because you want to make an example of these kids.”

Green, he said, “does feel some bitterness, but he just wants to put it behind him.”

In order to successfully prosecute Green, 28, and Morris, 22, in federal court for the 2001 murder of Terrell Gethers, the government had to prove a racketeering case against them. But in January, Judge Nancy Gertner ordered acquittals in the companion case of Jonathan Hart, 24, and Edward Washington, 25, after a jury deadlocked on whether their street-corner crew operated on the same “criminal enterprise” level as the Mafia.

Green and Morris still face federal drug charges and may yet be tried for Gethers’ homicide in state court. The federal prosecution of Green and Morris angered Suffolk District Attorney Daniel Conley, who said he felt life imprisonment was sufficient, and some members of the black community, who said the defendants were fall guys in a state that outlawed capital punishment. The case also publicly forced U.S. District Court in Boston to question why it seats predominantly white, middle-class juries for black defendants.

Of the 122 federal death-penalty cases pursued nationwide since 1988, the government has dropped charges 28 times before going to trial, according to the Capital Defense Network.

Mariano Guilty Of Corruption Charges (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

Rick Mariano, an electrician who rose from a tough corner of Northeast Philadelphia to become a city councilman, was convicted of corruption charges yesterday and led from a federal courtroom in handcuffs.

Mariano's wife, son and staffers did not flinch at the guilty verdicts, but Susan Mariano and others gasped when U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel ordered the councilman imprisoned immediately. Stengel, citing Mariano's suicide scare at City Hall shortly before last year's indictment, revoked bail pending a psychiatric evaluation.

As a marshal prepared to cuff him in public, Mariano said, "Can we do it back there?" He didn't get his wish and is expected to remain at the Federal Detention Center through the weekend.

Mariano, 50, became the first elected city official convicted in 15 years, and under state law he can remain on Council only until he is sentenced, probably by midsummer. Mayor Street, a longtime friend, called on Mariano yesterday to resign immediately. Mariano's top aide vowed the councilman would not step down.

The jury deliberated for about six hours before convicting Mariano of 18 counts, including conspiracy, bribery, money laundering, fraud and tax charges. He was acquitted of four fraud charges.

"The evidence was so glaring, so overwhelming, we had no choice but to come up with a guilty verdict," said juror Jon Thorpe, a real estate agent from East Norriton, Montgomery County. "The prosecution had a very tight case and the defense did very little to contest the evidence."

Another juror said the paper trail doomed Mariano.

"Regardless of the witnesses' credibility, the checks, the receipts and the bank account were the deciding factor," said Drew Folk, a chemist from Hamburg, Berks County. "None of us felt he was a bad guy, but the evidence speaks for itself."

Jurors found that Mariano accepted nearly $30,000 from businessmen in exchange for regulatory favors, tax breaks, cheap city land, and a suspect schools contract. The crimes cost taxpayers $700,000, prosecutors said.

"When City Council becomes a branch office for those who provide bribes, it becomes a perversion of the process," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said at a news conference with FBI agents.

Mariano likely faces six to 10 years in federal prison. His character is likely to weigh heavily at sentencing. During the trial, witnesses testified to his good deeds and hard work, but also to retaliatory acts against former city aides.

DOJ_NMG_0019289

Mariano's lawyer, Nino V. Tinari, said he would appeal, but his primary focus would be to get the councilman released before sentencing. Everyone in Mariano's camp, including the councilman, was surprised by Stengel's decision, the lawyer told reporters afterward.

"There was no need to have that sort of display but apparently it makes a good media event," Tinari said. He quickly added: "The judge is not playing to media at all. However, it occurred."

Tinari said handcuffing Mariano in front of his family, supporters and reporters - standard procedure in federal court - "was really reprehensible in my mind."

Mariano will be evaluated by a court-approved psychiatrist who will consider Stengel's concern that Mariano could pose a danger to himself or others or is a flight risk.

In ordering Mariano detained, Stengel cited the councilman's highly publicized climb to the top of the City Hall tower on Oct. 20, just days before he was indicted. Mariano was hospitalized and received psychiatric care after that. Tinari said yesterday Mariano's mental health is good.

At City Hall yesterday, Street issued a statement calling Mariano "a good friend for many years," but said it was time for Mariano to step down.

"No city employee or elected official is entitled to misuse a public position for private gain," Street said. "His resignation would be in the best interests of the city."

Council President Anna C. Verna called it "a sad day for this city," but said Mariano should not resign until he is sentenced.

"I guess going up to the tower didn't help him, did it?" Verna said. "If you want to meditate, go to church."

Councilman Juan Ramos said he felt sorry for his friend. Majority Leader Jannie Blackwell, long a Mariano ally, called the news "a shame" and said she would pray for him. She noted that the last two councilmen convicted on corruption charges, Lee Beloff in 1987 and James Tayoun in 1991, had since made comebacks.

Blackwell was among three Council members who testified to Mariano's good character during the two-week trial. Under cross-examination, however, prosecutors got them to acknowledge that the law obligated them to disclose loans and gifts, which Mariano did not do.

Mariano was convicted of taking six bribes - three to pay credit card debts and three to pay for a fancy gym membership.

He took $23,000 from Philip Chartock, who operated a North Philadelphia factory, Erie Steel Ltd. Prosecutors Michael Schwartz and Kenya Mann ridiculed Mariano's assertion that these were loans, not bribes, by noting that two checks were laundered through two businessmen. The two men, Vincent DiPentio and Joseph Pellecchia, have since have pleaded guilty.

In return for the money, the jury found, Mariano helped Erie Steel with tax breaks and city regulatory agencies and Pellecchia with a $225,000 city schools contract. Reinaldo Pastrana, who paid Mariano's gym membership, got help buying city land for 25 percent of its market value.

Most of the evidence in the case was dry paperwork. But there were flashes of drama: retellings of profanity-laced exchanges at City Hall, witnesses calling one another liars, prosecutors alleging a cover-up, and a defense attorney alleging a plot to sabotage a vulnerable man.

And there was always the question of whether Mariano would take the stand. He flirted with the idea at the last moment, but did not.

"It would have helped his case a little, but I don't think it would have changed the outcome," said Thorpe, the juror.

Without Mariano's testimony, jurors had only the version of the councilman presented by his defense. In the end, as the councilman's attorney called forth a parade of character witnesses - a priest, a disabled veteran, a community activist - Mariano began to seem like a wounded character, the focus of a charity project.

Even his physical demeanor was a far cry from the burly, blunt figure he presented for 10 years in Council. Hobbling from recent knee surgery, he carried a cane to court every day.

After Mariano was taken into custody, hands behind his back, relatives and supporters took turns carrying his cane during the long walk from the courthouse.

Contact staff writer John Shiffman at 215-854-2658 or jshiffman@phillynews.com.

Inquirer staff writer Marcia Gelbart contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0019290

The Fallout

What happens next with Mariano's Council seat is uncertain. A6.

A breakdown of the schemes that led to Mariano's conviction. A6.

JURY: MARIANO'S CORRUPT (PHDN)

By Chris Brennan & Michael Hinkelman

Philadelphia Daily News, March 18, 2006

CITY COUNCILMAN Rick Mariano, preparing to enter a federal courtroom yesterday to hear the verdict in his corruption trial, offered this prediction with a smile: "Innocent, as always."

The jury disagreed, convicting Mariano on 18 counts of conspiracy, mail and wire fraud, money laundering, bribery and filing a false tax return. He faces a maximum of close to 10 years in prison. He was cleared on four counts of mail or wire fraud.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Stengel then stunned Mariano and his attorney by quickly revoking Mariano's bail, suggesting that he might be a danger to himself or others. As part of his concern, Stengel cited a suicide scare that Mariano sparked in City Hall in October.

U.S. marshals handcuffed Mariano, dressed in a green suit, shirt and tie for St. Patrick's Day, and whisked him out of the courtroom as his wife watched while wiping away tears.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan hailed the verdict, saying Mariano, 50, had turned his Council post into "a branch office for businesses that will pay bribes to get things done."

Meehan, who has overseen a long-running corruption probe that has targeted several areas in City Hall, called on the business community to "stand up and take control" by refusing to give in to the demands of corrupt officials.

"What surprises you... is that they sell it out for so little," Meehan said. "But the effect is so big because it tears apart the whole future of the city."

Mayor Street, in a statement, called on Mariano to resign from Council, saying that was in the "best interests of the city." Street, who often joked with Mariano that they were so close they called each other "cousin," said Mariano was a close friend but not above the law.

Mariano's one-time political patron, electricians' union president John Dougherty, declined to be interviewed yesterday, issuing a statement through a spokesman that he hopes people will pray for Mariano and his family.

The end of Mariano's freedom and political career began in 2002, when he felt the financial pinch of one marriage ending and another starting as City Council went several months without pay because it had not approved a political redistricting plan.

Erie Steel Co., a business in Mariano's district run by friends, wrote three checks totaling $23,455 to help him pay his credit-card bills.

Mariano asked two friends, who have since pleaded guilty, to launder two of the checks through their businesses and create bogus invoices to make it look like they provided services to Erie Steel.

Mariano asked another friend, who is expected to plead guilty soon, to pay $5,400 for his Center City gym dues.

Erie Steel's owners, Philip Chartock and his father, Lou, are set to go on trial in late April.

Philip Chartock watched most of Mariano's two-week trial but was not in court for yesterday's verdict.

Erie Steel's former office manager, charged with embezzlement in 2004, cut a deal last year to have 95 felony counts reduced to one misdemeanor in exchange for her cooperation against the Chartocks and Mariano.

The office manager, Margaret "Maggie" Greer, testified that Phil Chartock instructed her to write the checks when Mariano was present.

Federal prosecutors spent the last two weeks linking the money Mariano received to a range of services he provided to his friends - helping get speedy service from city agencies, reductions on tax bills and buying city property.

The jurors - two from Philadelphia and 10 from suburban towns as far away as Bethlehem, Millersville and Hamburg - took about 6 ½ hours over two days to convict Mariano.

They declined to be interviewed by reporters after the verdict.

DOJ_NMG_0019291

"We considered the evidence carefully and did what we believed was right," jury forewoman Jennifer Sweeney of Lansdale said.

Mariano's attorney, Nino Tinari, led a bombastic defense based on attacking the credibility of witnesses, especially Greer and three former staffers fired by Mariano late last year.

Tinari repeatedly suggested to the jury that the money Mariano had received had been loans from friends. But he never offered any evidence to support that theory.

Tinari yesterday said he did not think that attacking the witnesses had backfired for Mariano. "We did whatever we felt was best," he said. "Let some other lawyer think of all that later on."

Tinari now is focused on getting Mariano again out on bail until he is sentenced.

Stengel shot down a government request earlier in the case to have Mariano evaluated by a psychiatrist after an October incident in City Hall, just days before he was indicted with his friends.

Mariano had to be talked down from the City Hall tower by Street that day and then spent a weekend in a psychiatric ward. He later said he was just taking pictures with a new camera.

Stengel said he now wanted the psychiatric evaluation, which will probably happen early next week.

"There are a number of felony convictions here and exposure to a lengthy prison sentence," Stengel said, explaining his concern. He did not say when he would sentence Mariano.

Tinari argued in court after the verdict that the evaluation was not necessary. Federal prosecutors had been prepared to allow Mariano to remain free on $250,000 bail.

Tinari later said he would provide Stengel with information about the October incident, including "what motivated it and whether it has anything to do with his state of mind."

Asked what that was, Tinari said the information should be disclosed in a court hearing and raised the possibility that it might be closed to the public.

Tinari was not happy with the rush to put Mariano in handcuffs.

"It was really disturbing to me personally and to his family, of course," Tinari said. "It just appeared there was no need to have that kind of display. Apparently it makes a good media event."

Philly Councilman Found Guilty Of Bribery, Money Laundering (AP)

By MARYCLAIRE DALE, The Associated Press

AP, March 18, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A city councilman was convicted Friday of trading political favors for bribes from friends and businesses, money that he used to pay his credit-card bills and other personal expenses.

A federal jury returned guilty verdicts on 18 of the 22 counts against Councilman Rick Mariano, including bribery, money laundering, filing a false tax return and honest services fraud.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel immediately revoked Mariano's bail, pending a mental health evaluation. Mariano, a former union electrician who earns about $100,000 as a councilman, remains in office.

Five days before he was indicted in October, Mariano caused a suicide scare by taking a solitary trip up to the observation deck of City Hall. He later said he went up to reflect, not harm himself, though Mariano did check himself into a hospital after the incident.

The judge said that the incident was never explained to his satisfaction and he feared Mariano could be a harm to himself and possibly put others at risk.

The jury found Mariano not guilty of two counts each of mail fraud and wire fraud.

Mariano's lawyer had argued that the councilman simply accepted loans when he found himself in financial trouble, and did not provide official favors in return.

But prosecutors say there was a clear quid-pro-quo: Businessmen paid Mariano's credit-card bills and membership dues at a tony gym - worth about $28,500 in all - and Mariano helped them obtain tax breaks, city contracts and properties, they said.

After the verdict, Mayor John Street issued a statement saying it is "in the best interests of the city" for Mariano to resign.

DOJ_NMG_0019292

"No city employee or elected official is entitled to misuse a public position for private gain," Street said. "Such behavior is not only illegal, it erodes public confidence in government."

The case against Mariano, an outspoken member of the council for the past decade, is the latest in a string of federal corruption investigations in the city.

More than a dozen people have been convicted in the various probes, one of which became public when police discovered an FBI bug in Mayor John F. Street's office in October 2003.

The federal investigations have brought down a former city treasurer serving a 10-year prison term for accepting trips and other gifts; two Commerce Bank executives; a prominent Muslim imam with close ties to the mayor; and others.

Street, a Democrat, denies wrongdoing and has not been charged.

Mariano defense lawyer Nino Tinari in closing remarks Thursday compared staff members who testified against Mariano to Brutus and others who betrayed Julius Caesar. But prosecutors spun the analogy to their own end.

"The only thing Mariano has in common with Julius Caesar is that the councilman stabbed the citizens of Philadelphia in the back each time he took a bribe," Assistant U.S. Attorney Kenya Mann said.

Philly Councilman Guilty In Bribery Case (UPI)

United Press International, March 18, 2006

PHILADELPHIA, March 17 (UPI) -- A Philadelphia city councilman was convicted Friday of taking bribes from business owners seeking contracts from the city.

Rick Mariano faces six to 10 years behind bars. A judge ordered his immediate incarceration pending a psychiatric evaluation.

Prosecutors said Mariano received $30,000 from contractors who got about $700,000 in business.

Mariano continued to attend council meetings while he was under indictment, and even after the trial began, when he was able. City officials seemed unsure whether he would be forced out of office immediately or only after he is sentenced.

Mayor John Street suggested Mariano resign immediately.

"A jury has determined the law has been violated. No one is above the law," Street said. "No city employee or elected official is entitled to misuse a public position for private gain."

Once A Key Political Ally, Now Alone (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

In the end, the crimes that ended Rick Mariano's political career were tailor-made for the man who spent a decade representing a struggling swatch of lower Northeast Philadelphia.

Other crooked Philly pols have reached for the stars, conspiring with mobsters or taking bribes from purported Arab sheikhs. But Mariano, the ultimate neighborhood guy, was felled by just under $30,000 in ill-gotten gains - less than a third of his City Council salary.

Mariano's defense strategy, likewise, involved asking the jury to view the case through the same small-time, parochial prism that defined Mariano's politics.

Thus, in defense lawyer Nino V. Tinari's telling, the case against Mariano became just a small-town food fight between estranged political factions. The witnesses against him became jilted liars grubbing for payoffs. And the bribes he took became simple loans between old neighborhood pals who don't bother with fancy uptown formalities such as receipts or IOUs.

The jurors didn't buy it. On Friday, they convicted Mariano, 50, of 18 counts of bribery, fraud and conspiracy. He faces a likely 6 to 10 years in prison.

Mariano, who fashioned himself a tough guy, wound up being swept immediately to jail as a result of his perceived fragility. Recalling last fall's suicide scare atop City Hall Tower, Judge Lawrence F. Stengel revoked his bail until a psychiatric evaluation could be conducted.

He was led away in handcuffs. He was led away alone.

It was a particularly poignant moment for someone who had served as the quintessential foot soldier for many other bigger names in Philadelphia politics.

During his career, Mariano was shrewd about making alliances - belying the bumbling caricature of a man Philadelphia Weekly once named as the city's dumbest politician. In Council, he did little by way of legislation but enthusiastically rattled the chandeliers on behalf of allies.

Many of those whose battles Mariano fought are among the city's most powerful politicians, such as Mayor Street, U.S. Rep. Bob Brady, electricians union leader John Dougherty, and State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, who strongly supported Mariano's first campaign before the two fell out amid Fumo's epic feud with Dougherty.

According to Daniel P. McElhatton, the councilman whom Mariano served as a staffer before ousting him from office in 1995, political Philadelphia didn't have any problem with Mariano's behavior back then.

"They hounded my daughters," McElhatton said of the Mariano campaign, supported by the Democratic establishment. "They had people making threats. There were... goons around to intimidate my poll workers. Had some of that happened in a third-world country, we would have said, 'We won't stand for this.' "

Mariano's campaign denied the allegations at the time.

McElhatton said Mariano's supporters knew just what they were getting.

"He got the support of the party structure, and they got a predictable vote," he said. "You lie down with dogs, you get fleas."

No one was closer to Mariano than Dougherty. Dougherty's union's political fund has given Mariano $452,000 since 1998 - a third of all money he raised - and put him on the payroll when a redistricting dispute held up City Council's paychecks. Union officials also selected top Mariano staffers.

Mariano, meanwhile, beat the drum for top union priorities, such as public funding for new stadiums for the Eagles and Phillies.

The relationship stayed strong through a long run of Mariano miscues - from the 1999 "Cookiegate" incident, when Mariano staffers were caught delivering cookies for his wife's business, to the first anonymous bribery allegations against him last year, after which Dougherty gathered top political aides to plot strategy.

But the pair split after the investigation became public last year. At trial, Tinari repeatedly suggested that Dougherty was behind a shadowy conspiracy to jail Mariano. He never spelled out the details.

Through spokesman Frank Keel - who until last fall spoke for Mariano, as well - Dougherty declined to comment, except to say that he "asks everyone to keep Rick and his children in their prayers."

Street was another Mariano booster, affectionately calling him "Cousin Rick" while Mariano was one of six votes that helped Street sustain key vetoes and battle new ethics legislation.

Unlike Dougherty, Street did not break with Mariano as the feds circled. Over the summer, he regularly sent Mariano religious text messages urging him to keep his spirits up. Street was among those who talked Mariano down from City Hall Tower last fall.

In a statement after the verdict, Street called Mariano "a good friend" but called for him to step down immediately. Under the law, he wouldn't have to do that until sentencing, which could be months away.

Whether Mariano was a dummy who was in way over his head or a ticking time bomb whose enablers should have known better, McElhatton said, the damage to Philadelphia was massive - much bigger than the $700,000 in benefits that Mariano got for the men who bribed him.

Just in the last week, he noted, state lawmakers moved to strip the city of zoning power over casinos, saying Philadelphia was too corrupt to be trusted.

"Imagine businesspeople somewhere, reading about Mariano in the New York Times," he said. "They'll say, 'I was thinking about going back there, starting a business, but look at how corrupt.' That stains us irreparably and immeasurably."

For his part, even before the conviction, the former electrician seemed to wish he had never met Dougherty or Street, or even McElhatton, his first boss in politics.

DOJ_NMG_0019294

"If I knew 20 years ago what I know now, I'd be just getting home, putting my feet up, and watching TV after a day working at some construction site," Mariano said Thursday outside the courtroom as jurors deliberated late into the afternoon. "Instead, I'm sitting here waiting for a bunch of people to decide if I'm going to jail."

Immediate Fate Of Mariano's Council Seat Unclear (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

Rick Mariano's corruption conviction throws into question the future of the City Council seat he has held since 1996.

Pennsylvania's constitution bars felons from elected office, meaning Mariano must step down. But moments after Mariano's bail was revoked and he was led away to detention, his chief of staff said Mariano intended to stay in office until sentencing, as the law allows. That could be several months from now.

"He'll continue to come to Council when permitted," Jay McCalla said. "If for no other reason than to show we have what it takes, we'll continue to push for an agenda that's focused on his district."

By declining to step down until his sentencing, Mariano will keep drawing his $102,000 salary.

In a statement, Mayor Street called on Mariano to resign immediately. But Council President Anna C. Verna said she would not try to dissuade Mariano from coming to Council.

"That's the law," she said.

Verna has asked the city solicitor whether there have been any changes in legal interpretations that could force Mariano from office sooner. She is awaiting a response.

As for the future of Mariano's seat, there is no guarantee that a replacement would be chosen before the next election in 2007.

Under Philadelphia's charter, the power to call a special election rests with Verna. She said it was premature to say whether she would call one.

Verna said the issue was more complicated because Mariano's seat would be the second vacancy on the 17-member Council. Councilman David Cohen died in office last fall.

Special elections differ from ordinary elections in that each party's nominee is chosen not through a primary election but through a closed vote of the party ward leaders. Thus the lead-up to such elections - and the decision about whether to hold one - typically involves considerable political jockeying.

Mariano's district, which includes parts of North and Northeast Philadelphia, is heavily Democratic, giving anyone the party nominates a strong advantage.

Job, Pension Go When Rick Does (PHDN)

Philadelphia Daily News, March 18, 2006

Councilman Rick Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, said yesterday that Mariano would continue to show up for work at City Hall.

But for how long? As a convicted felon, Mariano can't hang onto his elected post, according to the state constitution and the city charter.

Council President Anna Verna said yesterday Mariano must resign when he is sentenced. Verna on Thursday asked City Solicitor Romulo Diaz to issue a legal opinion to back that up.

But Verna stopped short of saying if she would call a special election to fill Mariano's post, calling that "premature."

Mayor Street, a political ally of Mariano's, yesterday called on him to resign.

Mariano, now in the third year of his third four-year term, also faces the loss of his city pension from his time on Council and, before that, as a staffer to Councilmen Dan McElhatton and Jim Kenney.

The city could move to claim some of that forfeited money as repayment for attorney fees paid for Mariano from late March until he was indicted in October.

Editorial | The Rick Mariano Verdict (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

Another day, another verdict that lets you dare think there might be hope for the city.

One day, two thugs get convicted, as they should have, of murdering a little boy in a schoolyard.

The next day, a city councilman gets convicted, as the evidence screamed he should, of betraying the public trust by taking bribes.

You'd rather that little Faheem Thomas-Childs were still alive.

You'd rather that Rick Mariano, bully and cheat, had never been elected to City Council, never been allowed to cost taxpayers $700,000 by exploiting his powers as councilman.

But this is a big city; crime and corruption are going to happen. You just want to feel that decent people can fight back, can stem the tide. This time, the courts offered hope.

In Mariano's case, it's time for him to do the right thing, for once: resign his seat, instead of hanging on pointlessly until his sentencing forces the issue. His friends on Council, who vouched for his redeeming qualities at trial, should let him know it's best for him to go now.

Laski Admits Guilt, Braces For Jail Time (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters. Tribune Staff Reporters Gary Washburn And Todd Lighty Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, March 18, 2006

Ex-clerk admits taking $50,000 to help friends

Former Chicago City Clerk James Laski, the highest-ranking city official charged in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program, pleaded guilty Friday to pocketing nearly $50,000 in bribes for steering city business to two trucking companies.

Laski, 52, who disclosed that he takes anti-anxiety medication, appeared nervous as he stood before U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle, but he spoke in a clear, soft voice as the judge questioned him.

Asked by Norgle if he had done a good job as city clerk, Laski replied, "I thought I did, your honor."

"Until recently?" Norgle asked.

"Until recently," said Laski, who pleaded guilty to one count of bribery.

Laski's wrongdoing, in fact, had nothing directly to do with his city clerk duties.

He solicited bribes totaling about $48,000 from two friends after interceding on their behalf with other city officials and obtaining Hired Truck work for separate trucking companies.

Between 1998 and 2004, Laski pocketed monthly cash bribes of $500 to $1,000 from Michael "Mick" Jones, a top official in the clerk's office who helped operate Get Plowed Inc. Jones pleaded guilty Thursday to bribery.

Laski also acknowledged he took $2,000 a month for 12 months from Randy Aderman, another friend and city employee, after Laski arranged for Hired Truck work for FRC Trucking. Aderman pleaded guilty to bribery Friday.

According to court records, Frank Cannatello, another Hired Truck defendant who pleaded guilty this month to lying to FBI agents, asked Aderman to help obtain Hired Truck business after Cannatello and a relative started FRC Trucking.

Friday's guilty pleas by Laski and Aderman bring to 34 the number of convictions in the Hired Truck probe. Charges are pending against nine others, but the investigation continues.

As city clerk, Laski ranked second to the mayor among the city's elected officials.

Laski's plea agreement does not call for his cooperation with prosecutors, because he had no additional criminal wrongdoing to reveal, according to a source close to Laski.

Laski faces up to 3 years in prison when he is sentenced May 25.

Mayor Richard Daley hasn't tipped his hand on whom he is considering to replace Laski.

Laski's lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, declined to let Laski comment to reporters as the two left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse following his guilty plea.

"I think he especially feels bad about what he's done and how it's affected his office and how he's let down his constituents," Steinback said.

DOJ_NMG_0019296

Laski is "bracing himself" for prison, Steinback said.

Laski's plea marks an ignominious end to the former 23rd Ward alderman's once-promising political career. A onetime protege of former U.S. Rep. William Lipinski (D-Ill.), he was elected city clerk in 1995, a post he held until his resignation last month following his indictment.

According to his plea agreement, Laski asked an undisclosed alderman as well as officials in the Mayor's Office for Intergovernmental Affairs for assistance in obtaining Hired Truck work for Jones' Get Plowed.

A source close to the investigation previously identified the alderman as Patrick Huels from Daley's native 11th Ward. Huels was Daley's City Council floor leader until he resigned in October 1997 after admitting he borrowed $1.25 million from another Daley friend and city contractor, Mike Tadin.

Daley's intergovernmental affairs director until December 2000 was Victor Reyes, who heads the pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization. A top aide to Reyes at the time was Robert Sorich, who is facing charges that he helped rig city personnel decisions to get jobs and promotions for political campaign workers.

With Aderman's introduction, Laski also reached out to Donald Tomczak, the No. 2 official in the city's Department of Water Management who held sway over which trucking companies got coveted Hired Truck work.

Tomczak, who directed work to Get Plowed, pleaded guilty in the federal probe and has cooperated with authorities.

Though prosecutors agreed to drop an obstruction of justice charge against Laski, he admitted he advised Jones' wife, Traci, to lie in a grand-jury appearance.

In October, Laski acknowledged, he called Mick Jones and announced, "Go Cubs," an agreed-on code of his approval for Jones' wife to lie to the grand jury.

Jones by then was cooperating with federal authorities and secretly tape-recorded the conversation.

Laski also admitted that he personally reviewed his campaign records to identify dates on which cash deposits had been made. An intermediary then passed that information on to Jones' wife to bolster her phony claim that the payoffs to Laski were actually campaign contributions.

---

mo'connor@tribune.com

rrbush@tribine.com

Laski Admits Taking Payoffs (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 18, 2006

Former City Clerk James Laski pleaded guilty Friday to taking bribes in return for steering Hired Truck business to friends -- making him the highest-ranking public official convicted in the ongoing probe.

Jail time is nearly certain for Laski, 52, who resigned earlier this year after serving as clerk since 1995. The government says he should go to prison for 30 to 37 months.

When asked what Laski would tell others in City Hall who thought about taking bribes, his lawyer Jeffrey Steinback responded: "Don't do it, don't do it. . . . I think he feels terrible about mistakes he's made and how he's let down his constituents."

CAUGHT IN SCANDAL

44 people have been charged in the federal government's investigation of Chicago's Hired Truck Program, including 26 city workers.

34 of them have pleaded guilty, including 21 city workers.

22 have been sentenced to terms from 3 years of probation to 7 years in prison.

1 former city worker will never stand trial. He died after he was thrown from a horse.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

Laski admitted to taking $48,000 in payoffs. While other charges were dropped in his plea bargain, Laski still admitted to the conduct. That includes obstructing justice at one point by using the coded comment of "Go, Cubs" to try to get a witness to lie to the grand jury.

Case taking its toll

Moments before his plea hearing, Laski nervously paced the courthouse hallway. Earlier that morning, he had downed a tranquilizer and an anti-anxiety pill, along with some orange juice and a Pepsi, he later told U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle. The night before, he had a few beers, he said.

"He's feeling the wear," Steinback said, adding that Laski is battling health issues. Laski has said he has long had stomach problems, which have been exacerbated by his indictment.

When he stepped up to the courtroom lectern, he kept his hands clasped before him, leaned forward, and spoke in a thick Chicago accent.

"I'm unemployed right now," Laski said, smiling at Norgle's question of what he did for a living. "I resigned my position, based on these proceedings."

"Did you do a good job while you were there?" Norgle asked.

"I thought I did, your honor," Laski said.

"Until recently?" Norgle asked.

"Until recently," Laski said, his voice trailing off.

In addition to resigning, Laski relinquished his law license and agreed to pay $48,000 in bribes he said he took -- already having paid $15,400, Steinback said.

Norgle asked if Laski knew what rights he was waiving by pleading guilty.

Laski took a deep breath. "I know exactly what I'm doing, your honor," he said.

"No one pushed or shoved or squeezed you into pleading guilty?" Norgle asked.

"No, your honor," Laski said.

Laski admitted he took money from his longtime friend Michael Jones in return for getting Jones' company, Get Plowed Inc., business with the city's Hired Truck Program. Jones paid Laski $500 a month beginning in 1998, and that went up to $1,000 a month in 2001.

Laski also admitted to taking $2,000 a month for 12 months from Randy Aderman, whom Laski also helped get Hired Truck work. Jones wore a wire on Laski, his boyhood friend.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Manish Shah told Norgle that Laski also admitted to coaching a witness on how to lie to the grand jury and later called him and said, "Go Cubs," as a go-ahead to lie.

Slew of admissions

Laski's plea came a day after Jones admitted giving Laski thousands of dollars in bribe money to retain Hired Truck business. And Aderman also pleaded guilty Friday to bribery. He faces an agreed sentence of 16 months in prison.

Also this week, Robert Mangiamele was sentenced to 18 months in prison after admitting he paid bribes to get business in the Hired Truck program. He pleaded guilty in December.

Jones argues he should keep his pension because the crime was related to his trucking firm -- not his city job as the chief investigator in Laski's office.

Steinback said another lawyer is determining whether Laski could keep his pension.

"We don't want to give it up if we don't have to," Steinback said. "It's his life's work."

Former Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Trucking Scandal (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, March 18, 2006

CHICAGO - Chicago's former city clerk pleaded guilty Friday to taking $48,000 in payoffs to get companies into the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

James J. Laski, 52, became the highest-ranking official convicted in the two-year federal investigation of the scandal-plagued program that was designed to save money by outsourcing the city's hauling work to private truckers but which prosecutors say is awash in corruption.

Laski, who had been city clerk since 1995, admitted he received envelopes of cash from an official in his own office, Michael Jones, who doubled as an operator of a trucking company.

He also admitted to taking payoffs from a former employee of the city water department, Randy Aderman, to help get other trucks into the program.

Forty-four people have been charged thus far in the investigation, which has expanded to include alleged patronage hiring abuses. Laski was the 33rd person convicted.

Unlike many who have pleaded guilty, Laski did not agree to help prosecutors in the ongoing investigation - something that might have lessened his sentence.

He pleaded guilty to one count of bribery. Under advisory sentencing guidelines, he could get 30 to 37 months in federal prison when he is set to be sentenced on May 25.

As he left court, a reporter asked Laski what he had to say to those who elected him.

His attorney, Jeffrey Steinback, stepped forward and said "I think you can tell from the way today's proceedings went that Jim is very sorry."

"I think he feels terrible about the mistakes he made," Steinback said. "He admitted them in open court today and I think he especially feels bad about what he's done and how it has affected his office and how it has affected his constituents."

Laski declined to say anything. "This has been an extremely difficult day for Jim," Steinback said.

In response to questions from U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle Sr., Laski said that on waking up Friday morning he took a mild tranquilizer as well as a separate anti-anxiety drug.

"Do you know what you're doing?" Norgle asked.

"I know exactly what I'm doing," Laski said.

Norgle asked Laski briefly about his political career as city clerk.

"Did you do a good job?" Norgle asked.

"I thought I did, your honor," Laski said, hesitantly.

"Until recently?" Norgle asked.

"Until recently," Laski said.

Laski acknowledged in his plea agreement that starting in 1998, he took $500-a.m.onth envelopes of cash from Jones, who has cooperated with the federal investigation and pleaded guilty to payoff charges on Thursday.

Besides working in the clerk's office, Jones was one of the operators of Get Plowed Inc., which had trucks working in the program. Laski acknowledged that in 2001, the amount was upped to $1,000 a month in return for additional Get Plowed trucks in the program.

Laski also acknowledged he received $2,000 for a year from Aderman to get another trucking company into the program.

He said that at one point he discussed a deal with Donald Tomczak, the retired head of day-to-day operations at the water department. Under that deal, Tomczak would put trucks in the program and Laski would in return give jobs in the clerk's office to individuals that Tomczak recommended.

It was not clear if anything came of the discussion.

Tomczak, a former precinct captain and the unofficial commander of a group of election workers with political patronage jobs, has pleaded guilty to racketeering and tax fraud.

After Laski left Norgle's courtroom Friday, Aderman arrived and pleaded guilty to one count of bribery. Guidelines call for a sentence in the range of 24 to 30 months. Norgle set sentencing for June 21.

Aderman said in his plea agreement that he paid $750 a month to former water department official John Briatta to secure Tomczak's help in getting trucks into the program. Briatta has pleaded guilty to charges in the case. He is the brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley - the mayor's brother.

Still scheduled for trial in April is Laski's former political aide, Sam Gammicchia. The indictment says that Gammicchia advised and coached a witness in the case to mislead a federal grand jury. He has pleaded not guilty and is due for a status hearing on Monday.

Ex-Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty In Trucking Kickback Scheme (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

CHICAGO — James J. Laski Jr., the former city clerk and Chicago's second-highest public official, pleaded guilty Friday to a federal bribery charge and admitted that he had taken cash payoffs in exchange for city trucking contracts.

According to the plea agreement, Laski took $48,000 in kickbacks from 1998 to 2003 from trucking companies eager to participate in the city's Hired Truck Program.

The program, which contracted vehicles from private businesses to assist with public works and construction projects, was promoted by City Hall as a means of helping to cut costs.

But federal investigators found that many of the trucking companies were being paid millions of dollars to do no work, and city workers were seeking bribes in exchange for securing the contracts.

Of the 44 people charged in the investigation, about half are city workers. To date, 34 people have been convicted.

The Hired Truck scandal — though arguably among the widest reaching in City Hall — is only one of a series of corruption woes plaguing Mayor Richard M. Daley, who has said he was completely unaware of such doings.

Among other things, federal investigators have been digging for evidence of alleged fraud in politically based promotions and hiring practices.

Though Daley has had a public approval rating of 56%, according to a Chicago Tribune poll conducted last month, 70% of respondents didn't believe the mayor's claims of ignorance.

Among those convicted in the Hired Truck scandal was a trucking company head who contributed money to political groups to stay in the program organizers' good graces.

The donations included funds sent to the 11th Ward Democratic organization — headed by Cook County Commissioner John Daley, the mayor's brother — and the Committee to Elect John Daley.

"The corruption is just so blatant, and it's very much a growing pain for the mayor," said Paul Green, director of policy studies at Roosevelt University in Chicago.

"It's a constant pinprick in him, and no one knows where the pin's going next."

Laski, 52, resigned his position as city clerk Feb. 6.

On Friday, Laski admitted that the owner of Get Plowed Inc. trucking company had given him monthly installments of cash to get business from various city departments.

An unnamed person "handed [Laski] an envelope containing $500 to $1,000" each month as payoff for getting and staying with the Hired Truck Program, according to the plea agreement.

The bribes stopped in 2003, after federal investigators began to look into the program.

Laski, who has repaid $15,400, faces as much as three years in prison. His sentencing hearing is scheduled for May 25.

The Get Plowed company was run by Laski's friend Michael Jones, 48, who also was an employee at the city clerk's office.

On Thursday, Jones pleaded guilty to one count of bribery.

Man Held In Isolation On Child Porn Charges (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 18, 2006

A Bartlett man indicted this week on charges he molested an infant and broadcast it live over an Internet chatroom is being kept in isolation after his lawyer complained he was receiving threats from other inmates.

Brian Annoreno, 29, is being held in a Kankakee lockup, but his lawyer, Michael Falconer, said Annoreno also needs to be kept in isolation when he is taken to court appearances in Chicago for his own safety.

"Regular street criminals hate people who are accused of being child molesters," Falconer said.

Falconer said Annoreno was getting threats from inmates and harsh words from jail guards.

"They just told him he's the scum of the earth," Falconer said.

Annoreno and two others charged this week with being tied to a child pornography chatroom pleaded not guilty to the charges Friday. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales flew to Chicago on Wednesday to announce that the chatroom was shut down and a worldwide investigation had nabbed 47 people.

Evidence lacking, lawyer says

Falconer criticized the feds Friday for putting on a "dog and pony show," saying Gonzales' news conference was "deplorable" and over the top. Gonzales said the crimes were particularly disturbing because the chatroom allegedly broadcast video showing young children being molested. But Falconer said the prosecution does not have evidence of those videos except for a witness' testimony.

Falconer would not comment on whether Annoreno is cooperating but said he has made "a ton of admissions" to the feds. However, he said Annoreno has a low IQ and may not have known what he was saying. Annoreno has a 22-month-old daughter, whom the Department of Children and Family Services took into custody and placed with a family member.

Cyber Sex Crime Unit Begun (INDYSTAR)

By Paul Bird

The Indianapolis Star, March 18, 2006

Officials hope to protect kids from predators

Johnson County officials have formed a "Cyber Sex Crimes Task Force" to protect children from Internet predators.

County Prosecutor Lance Hamner appointed Deputy Prosecutor Paul Felix to spearhead the effort.

Greenwood police Detective Erick Klinkowski, Franklin police Detective Brain Goldfarb and Johnson County Sheriff's Detective Bill Pfifer are the rest of the task force.

A month ago, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Justice Department's Safe Child Initiative to stop sexual exploitation of children through the Internet.

The county team recently returned from Washington, D.C., after getting training on procedures and protocols to use during investigations and prosecutions of Internet predators.

"With this initiative, sexual predators who prey on children will be relentlessly targeted and prosecuted," Hamner said.

Klinkowski already has conducted two stings that led to arrests and convictions, one a special deputy with the Genesee County (Mich.) Sheriff's Department who traveled to Greenwood to meet a 13-year-old girl, Hamner said.

The man was charged with child exploitation, solicitation of a minor, dissemination of matter harmful to minors and possession of child pornography. In May 2005, he was sentenced to an 18-year prison term, with nine years suspended.

"When the would-be child molester shows up at an arranged location and finds me waiting for him instead of the 13-year-old girl he was expecting, he's going to jail," Klinkowski said. "He won't be able to slither away into the darkness."

Franklin Police Chief John Borges believes Internet child solicitation is a global problem.

"We have had some child pornography cases here," he said.

Greenwood Police Chief Joe Pitcher has purchased equipment to track Internet child pornography.

"We've have equipment that will allow us to look deep into computers and expose kiddie porn," he said. "We are going to set traps and arrest child molesters who travel Johnson County."

3 Sentenced In ELF Terror Case (SACBEE)

By Crystal Carreon, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 18, 2006

Man, sisters pleaded guilty to arson and attempts to torch buildings

A follower of an eco-terrorism group and two other Newcastle residents were sentenced Friday in Sacramento federal court for their roles in attempted firebombings of buildings under construction.

DOJ_NMG_0019301

Ryan Daniel Lewis, the 22-year-old admitted adherent of the Earth Liberation Front - a radical group that targets suburban development - was sentenced to six years in federal prison for orchestrating arsons in Placer and Amador counties in late 2004 and early 2005.

Two of his acquaintances, sisters Lili Marie Holland, 21, and Eva Rose Holland, 26, were sentenced to two years each in prison. In an earlier plea agreement, the women faced three years and three months behind bars.

A fourth person arrested in the case, Jeremiah Colcleasure, 21, also of Newcastle, is scheduled to be sentenced in May. He pleaded guilty to attempted arson earlier this month.

Immediately after U.S. District Judge Edward J. Garcia sentenced Lewis on Friday, the bespectacled Newcastle man - who had been free on bond since November - was remanded into custody and led out of the courtroom past a row of his sobbing relatives.

Garcia called Lewis the ringleader who recruited the Holland sisters and another acquaintance to exact acts of violence on property under misguided ideals. At times, the judge chided defense attorneys for misusing the term "idealism" in explaining their clients' actions.

"I don't understand why you and the other lawyers talk about ideals," Garcia said to Lewis' attorney. "I consider this type of terrorism (a) most serious crime."

Earlier in the day, Garcia had allowed the Holland sisters, who reiterated their remorse before the court, to surrender to authorities April 28. Lewis did not make a statement before the judge.

Friday's sentencing marked the first successful prosecution of ELF activity from the Oregon border to Bakersfield and should serve, authorities said, as a cautionary tale for others influenced to act on behalf of the shadowy organization.

In January, three other followers of ELF were arrested on suspicion of plotting a bombing campaign on local targets, including Nimbus Dam and fish hatchery and a forest genetics lab in Placerville.

"Domestic terrorists mistakenly believe they are on the moral high ground, but their actions are those of cowards," U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott told reporters after the sentences were handed down.

"Let today's sentencings be a warning to idealistic young people that if they make the wrong decisions, they will spend several years in prison."

But Lewis' attorney, Timothy Zindel, said he did not believe the six-year sentence was warranted for a "kid who made a serious mistake."

He said Lewis was not a terrorist.

"I don't agree that the Earth Liberation Front is a terrorist organization; (terrorism) it's a word that is cheapened in how it's thrown around," Zindel said after the sentencing hearing.

Anyone involved in a "protest crime has to watch out ... the federal government is very unforgiving."

The trio, who were arrested last year, admitted conspiracy to plant incendiary devices at an upscale housing development in Lincoln after leaving a Christmas party in 2004.

On Dec. 27, 2004, four homemade incendiary devices with kitchen timers were found in two homes under construction. "ELF" was painted in a cul-de-sac and other graffiti was discovered, including the statements "U will pay" and "Leave."

Lewis also confessed to placing firebombs inside an office building under construction in Auburn and devices inside apartments near completion in the Amador County town of Sutter Creek early last year.

The bombs in Lincoln and Auburn failed to ignite, and sprinkler systems in Sutter Creek managed to abate much of the damage.

However, one device did spark a fire, causing at least $243,000 in damage.

In the original indictment, the defendants faced a minimum of five years and up to 20 years in prison on each charge, including conspiracy to commit arson, attempted arson and additional counts of arson against Lewis.

In October, however, Lewis and the Holland sisters pleaded guilty as part of an agreement reached with the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney R. Steven Lapham.

They were sentenced Friday on charges reached in their plea agreements: two counts of attempted arson and one count of arson against Lewis; one count each of attempted arson for the Holland sisters.

Eva Holland, surrounded by supporters after the hearing, said she was relieved that her legal ordeal was over and expressed hope that officials would house her in the same prison as her younger sister.

"We're just glad to be moving forward with our life," she said moments later, leaving the courthouse with her sister and mother, who declined to comment.

Members of Lewis' family marched out of the courtroom after shaking hands with Zindel. They declined to speak with reporters.

Lewis, his attorney said, will remain at the Sacramento Main Jail for about a month.

He then will be transferred to a federal prison.

6-Year Prison Sentence In Series Of Arsons (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

A 22-year-old man was sentenced Friday to six years in prison for a string of Northern California arsons on behalf of the Earth Liberation Front.

Ryan Daniel Lewis will also have to pay $243,000 in restitution for setting fire in February 2005 to a nearly completed apartment building in Sutter Creek, a Gold Country tourist town.

Lewis also admitted to two earlier arson attempts in nearby Placer County.

Two other defendants, Eva Rose Holland, 26, and Lili Marie Holland, 21, received two-year sentences for joining Lewis in attempting to set fire to several unfinished structures at a housing tract in fast-growing Lincoln.

3 Eco-terrorists Sentenced For Firebombs (MHCA/AP)

Montery (CA) Herald, March 18, 2006

SACRAMENTO (AP) - Three eco-terrorists were sentenced Friday to federal prison for a series of firebombings that put towns in the Sierra foothills on edge.

Ryan Daniel Lewis, 22, the alleged leader of the group, was sentenced to six years, and two sisters -- Eva Rose Holland, 26, and Lili Marie Holland, 21 -- were each handed two-year prison terms.

Prosecutors alleged Lewis recruited the Holland sisters and Jeremiah Dean Colcleasure, 24, on Christmas Eve 2004 to help him burn down two unoccupied upscale homes in Lincoln, a Sacramento suburb, in the name of the Earth Liberation Front.

The four set up incendiary devices in two homes, but the firebombs didn't ignite.

Lewis tried and failed again on Jan. 12, 2005. In a third attempt Feb. 7, 2005, Lewis caused $50,000 damage to an apartment complex in Sutter Creek.

Lewis and the Holland sisters pleaded guilty in October.

CIVIL LAW:

Google Doesn't Have To Turn Over Query Data (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

A federal judge ruled Friday that Google Inc. did not have to turn over data about consumer Web search queries that the Department of Justice had requested.

U.S. District Judge James Ware ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. But he denied government lawyers' request for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses. In addition, Judge Ware said that Google's providing the queries could potentially cost it the trust of some users and expressed concerns about whether "search queries themselves may constitute potentially sensitive information."

The Department of Justice originally requested the information from Google last year to defend the Child Online Protection Act, a law designed to shield minors from sexually explicit materials on the Internet that has been blocked in the courts. Judge

DOJ_NMG_0019303

Ware had said during a public hearing Tuesday that he was leaning toward ordering Google to at least partially respond to a Department of Justice subpoena.

"This is a clear victory for our users," said Google in a statement. "The subpoena has been drastically limited."

U.S. Is Denied Google Queries (LAT)

By Chris Gaither

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Privacy activists hail a federal judge's ruling. But he orders the search engine to reveal some information about websites in its database.

A federal judge Friday denied a Justice Department demand for access to some Internet search queries of Google Inc. users in a closely watched case testing the limits of online privacy.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose was a victory for Google, which argued that handing over the records would violate the privacy of people who might scour the Internet with terms as diverse as "best-actor nominees," "third trimester abortion" or "pipe bomb."

Although Ware required Google to reveal some information about the websites in its database, he ordered the government to reimburse the Mountain View, Calif., company for the time and expense required to comply.

But for Google — a quirky dot-com with the corporate mantra "Don't be evil" — the more important issue was whether it could restrict access to potentially revealing queries.

"We will always be subject to government subpoenas, but the fact that the judge sent a clear message about privacy is reassuring," said Google's associate general counsel, Nicole Wong. "What his ruling means is that neither the government nor anyone else has carte blanche when demanding data from Internet companies."

Privacy advocates cheered the decision as a check on the Bush administration's efforts to collect information about people, but noted that the trove of personal data gathered and stored by sites like Google was irresistible to investigators.

"This issue is going to come up over and over again," said Cindy Cohn, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation. "I don't think this should make anybody very comfortable about the future. Google still has this stuff and people will still try to seek it."

Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales issued subpoenas to Google and three other top Internet companies last year, seeking details of potentially billions of search queries as part of an investigation into online pornography. The Justice Department also demanded a sample of the millions of websites archived in the search engines' databases.

The other companies — Yahoo Inc., Microsoft Corp. and America Online Inc. — complied at least in part. Google executives balked and the case became a test of the government's reach in the Internet Age.

Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online declined to comment after Ware's ruling late Friday.

Those companies have said that the information they provided did not violate users' privacy, because it did not include names or computer addresses. Even so, the disclosure alarmed civil liberties advocates, who feared that the searches could reveal private information and that the government could pass alarming queries to criminal investigators.

"People for too long thought they were anonymous on the Internet," said Andrew Serwin, an attorney specializing in privacy and Internet law. "People now realize they're not."

Justice Department officials could not be reached late Friday.

Federal lawyers earlier this week slashed their Google request to 5,000 randomly selected search terms entered by users and 50,000 website addresses in the company's searchable index. The government previously had requested a week's worth of queries, which could have numbered in the billions, as well as a million indexed Web addresses.

Ware granted the request for the Web addresses but declined to force Google to release the queries. He wrote in his 21-page ruling that he was balancing the government's need to gather data against Google's expectation that it could operate without undue interference or fear that its trade secrets might be revealed. Google lawyers argued at a hearing Tuesday that the company's search engine was popular in part because users trusted that their personal information would be guarded.

"The expectation of privacy by some Google users may not be reasonable, but may nonetheless have an appreciable impact on the way in which Google is perceived, and consequently the frequency with which users use Google," Ware wrote.

Federal laws generally require a search warrant or court order to procure electronic information without a user's permission, not the simple subpoena presented to Google.

Government lawyers had requested the data for an unrelated civil lawsuit regarding the Child Online Protection Act, a 1998 law blocked by a federal court. The Justice Department, seeking to restore the law, said it would use the information from search engines only to test how well Internet filters prevent children from accessing potentially harmful websites.

Deirdre Mulligan, a law profesor at UC Berkeley, called the government's request to Google "a fishing expedition."

"It's the same as going into a medical clinic and saying, 'The last few people who came in, what diseases did they ask you about?' " Mulligan said.

Google To Reveal Sites, Not Searches (AP)

By MICHAEL LIEDTKE, The Associated Press

AP, March 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO – A federal judge on Friday ordered Google Inc. to give the Bush administration a peek inside its search engine, but rebuffed the government's demand for a list of people's search requests – potentially sensitive information the company had fought to protect.

In his 21-page ruling, U.S. District Judge James Ware told Google to provide the U.S. Justice Department by April 3 with the addresses of 50,000 randomly selected Internet sites indexed by its search engine .

The government says it plans to use the data for a study in another case in Pennsylvania, where the Bush administration is trying to revive a law meant to shield children from online pornography.

Ware, though, decided Google won't have to disclose what people have been looking for on its widely used search engine, handing a significant victory to the company and privacy rights advocates.

"We will always be subject to government subpoenas, but the fact that the judge sent a clear message about privacy is reassuring," Google lawyer Nicole Wong wrote on the company's Web site Friday night. "What his ruling means is that neither the government nor anyone else has carte blanche when demanding data from Internet companies."

Attempts to reach a spokesman for the Justice Department late Friday were not immediately successful.

The government had asked for the contents of 5,000 randomly selected search requests, dramatically scaling back its initial demands after Google's vehement protests gained widespread attention.

When the Justice Department first turned to Ware for help in January, the government wanted an entire week's worth of Google search requests — a list that would encompass queries posed by millions of people.

Google Wins Ruling On Turning Over Search Queries To Government (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 18 (Bloomberg) -- Google Inc. won a partial victory in a battle with the government when a federal judge ruled yesterday that the company didn't have to turn over customer search queries to the U.S. Justice Department.

U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, California, refused to make Google, the most-used Internet search engine, give the agency 5,000 search queries as part of an effort to defend a law aimed at keeping children from accessing Internet pornography. Ware did rule Google had to comply with the U.S. demand for 50,000 Web addresses from its index of Web sites.

Google's success in limiting the government's access to customer search records came after a two-month battle that led to concerns that some Web surfers might avoid using Google, which profits by displaying ads next to search results and earning fees when consumers click on the ads.

``This is a victory for Google," said Andrew Serwin, a lawyer in the San Diego office of Foley & Lardner, who has followed the case. Google ``didn't want to give up search terms or anonymous customer data, and they didn't have to."

Ware ordered Google and the Justice Department to come up with a method to randomly select the 50,000 Web addresses in a way that would not force Google to disclose any confidential information. He gave both sides until April 3 to raise any problems with the confidentiality requirement.

1 Million Addresses

The government had originally sought as many as 1 million Web addresses, then agreed at a hearing earlier this week to narrow the data request to 50,000 Web addresses, of which the government would examine 10,000. The government also wanted the 5,000 search queries, of which it would look at 1,000.

``This is a clear victory for our users and for our company," Nicole Wong, associated general Counsel at Google said on the company's Web site. ``We believe that if the government was permitted to require Google to hand over search queries, that could have undermined confidence that our users have in our ability to keep their information private."

The government wants the data to support a lawsuit pending in federal court in Pennsylvania over whether a federal law may prove more effective in limiting minors' access to pornography on the Internet than filtering software.

``The search query data could have shown why filtering software doesn't always work," Serwin said.

The ACLU and other privacy rights organizations have so far successfully sued to block enforcement of the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, or COPA, since it was signed into law in 1998. A trial in the Pennsylvania case challenging COPA is set for Oct. 23 before U.S. District Judge Lowell Reed in Philadelphia, Fine said.

`Significantly Hampered'

Ware said that Google must turn over the Web addresses because they could help the government study the effectiveness of filtering software. Because Google is the biggest search engine, the government's effort could be ``significantly hampered" if it didn't have access to some of the information it sought.

``What the government has not demonstrated, however, is a substantial need for both the information contained in the sample of URLs and the sample of search query text," Ware wrote in a 21-page ruling released yesterday.

Ware said groups challenging the government's anti- pornography law may also seek information from Google that ``may implicate Google's confidential commercial information."

Shares of Mountain View, California-based Google rose $1.02 to $339.72 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading yesterday.

The case is Gonzales v. Google Inc., 5:06-mc-80006, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California (San Jose).

Searching For Google (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Google had its day in court this week in its battle with the Justice Department over a subpoena for data about Web searches and the sites available through Google's search engine. The judge indicated that he was inclined to give both sides something, and Justice later agreed to limit its request to "just" 5,000 sample searches and 50,000 Web addresses.

This outcome may seem Solomonic, but the precedent is still troubling. The subpoena that started it all emerged from a separate case being tried in Pennsylvania. In that case, the ACLU is challenging the constitutionality of the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, or COPA.

That law has never been enforced owing to an injunction and multiple unfavorable rulings, including one from the Supreme Court. But it nonetheless aims to protect minors from "harmful" material on the Internet by making it a crime to allow them to access it. The ACLU suit claims the law is a restriction on free speech. The Supreme Court said it might be, and sent the case back to trial for the government to prove that it wasn't.

Which is where Google, Yahoo and MSN come in. The government wants to use their search data as part of its effort to show that the law is necessary to protect minors from the Internet's seamier side. But these companies are innocent bystanders in the dispute over the constitutionality of COPA. It is one thing when company data are pursued by the government as evidence in a criminal proceeding. Most Americans would probably accept if otherwise private information were turned over to law enforcement in a case where the request is narrowly tailored and probable cause exists.

The COPA trial is different. Tasked by the Supreme Court with justifying COPA's Internet restrictions, the Justice Department has embarked on a fishing expedition for large swathes of data about Internet use. The whole project suggests that the government has little basis for defending the law in the first place, and is hoping it can use the Web sites' data to generate a rationale after the fact.

DOJ_NMG_0019306

But dragging these companies into this litigation is not without risks. The first is the possibility that the data could lead to further inquiries -- possibly under COPA, should it be upheld -- of a criminal nature. Justice has taken pains to emphasize that this case is being handled by the civil division and that there are safeguards to ensure the information does not find its way into any future criminal case. But it's not hard to imagine a legal rationale for securing the data for such a use in the future, once the precedent has been set.

Then there are the ramifications for Google, Yahoo and the rest in the COPA case itself. The ACLU has already argued that if the Web site operators become, in effect, witnesses for the government in this case, the ACLU may be compelled to seek further discovery of the data employed by Justice, the Web sites' means of gathering it, their search methodology, and so on. This is no small intrusion into the business practices and privacy reputations of companies whose stock in trade is information about what is searched for and found on the Web.

All of which highlights the dangers and unintended consequences of the government's conducting wide-ranging market research by subpoena. Two prior incarnations of COPA have already been struck down twice by the Supreme Court. The third time, the Court created a presumption of unconstitutionality but remanded the case for trial. If commandeering such data from private companies against their will is what it takes to defend the law, maybe defending it isn't worth the effort.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

N.C., Justice Department Agree On Overseas Voting In 2nd Primary (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, March 18, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - The Justice Department said it had reached an agreement with North Carolina officials that will allow military and other overseas voters to participate in a second primary election, if one is needed this year.

The U.S. District Court in Raleigh still must approve the agreement.

The agreement was filed at the same time as the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit because of the short amount of time between North Carolina's primary and runoff elections. Federal officials said in a news release Thursday that the four-week break doesn't provide enough time to get runoff ballots to and returned from absentee voters.

Besides other changes, the state and federal governments agreed that all military and overseas voters requesting an absentee ballot for the primary election also will receive a blank write-in ballot for a runoff. They also agreed to allow write-in ballots to be faxed and e-mailed, if necessary.

The agreement also provides for reporting to the court on the status of the North Carolina Legislature's efforts to find a permanent solution to the timing problem.

"These measures provide an immediate solution while the Legislature adopts permanent procedures, as we trust they will promptly," Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general of the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement.

The lawsuit was brought under the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act, which requires states to allow uniformed services voters and other overseas citizens to register to vote and vote absentee for all elections for federal office.

Group Charges Libraries Filtered Out Web Site (SLPD)

By Peter Shinkle, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

The Council of Conservative Citizens, a nationwide group that has been portrayed as racist, is suing four libraries in the St. Louis area for allegedly blocking patrons from viewing its Web site.

Gordon Baum, a lawyer from St. Charles who is the group's chief executive, said the U.S. Constitution protects the public's right to see his Web site.

"We don't believe we're any more to the right than the NAACP is to the left," he said, adding that his group does not advocate violence.

DOJ_NMG_0019307

The site, cofcc.org, does not feature the racial epithets commonly used by racist groups. It does, however, provide a slate of news stories about crime by blacks or immigrants. It also offers for sale a T-shirt with the words, "White Pride," "Deutschland" and "Save Our Culture."

The Southern Poverty Law Center says that racism "underlies" the group and that it has long had ties to politicians the law center considers racist.

Baum filed a suit in U.S. District Court on Monday claiming the Maplewood City Library, University City Public Library, Valley Park Community Library and Festus Public Library had violated his constitutional right to free speech by blocking access to the Web site. At least two of the libraries say they now permit patrons to view the site.

Baum said the suit was filed after the group checked on local libraries and wrote letters complaining to those libraries that blocked access to the group's site.

Maplewood City Library Director Terrence Donnelly sent the group a letter replying that the Internet filter service the library uses had blocked the site after tagging it as being in "the categories of Hate and Discrimination."

On Friday, however, Donnelly said that changed after the library's board discussed the issue on Wednesday and he consulted with a lawyer. Donnelly said the Web site is now accessible at the library.

Federal law requires libraries that use federal money to have an Internet filter that can block out pornography, but it does not require a filter to block hate speech, Donnelly said.

The University City Library stopped blocking the group's Web site after it received a letter from Baum in November, said the library's director, Linda Ballard.

"We have turned off the hate speech filters for the adult machines, but they're still in place for the children's machines," she said.

Both libraries use Morenet, a division of the University of Missouri in Columbia that offers Internet service to 85 libraries across the state. Morenet provides the libraries with the Bess filter system offered by Secure Computing, a software company in San Jose, Calif. Secure Computing's site on the Internet enables users to check on how its filters would categorize a given Web site. A check Friday on cofcc.org showed the site was considered to be "hate speech."

It was unclear whether the two other libraries block the site. Festus Public Library director Lollie Gray declined to comment. Valley Park Community Library director Bonnie Morris could not be reached for comment.

Baum said the group is not like the Ku Klux Klan and includes Jewish members. "We're not a white Supremacist group that insists you have to be a white Christian," he said.

Whistle-Blower Or Thief In Diebold Case? (LAT)

By Hemmy So, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Stephen Heller's alleged theft of papers about the firm's electronic voting machines spurs praise and scorn as he faces felony charges.

A whistle-blower to some, a thief to others, Stephen Heller says he's a regular guy, not an activist or a member of any political group.

But charged last month in Los Angeles with three felonies for allegedly stealing damaging documents about voting machine manufacturer Diebold Election Systems, Heller has become a hero to digital rights and political activists who say he helped expose a threat to the election system.

"My wife would never describe me as someone on the front lines of anything, and I wouldn't either," Heller said in a recent interview. "I'm not politically active except I've voted since I was 18."

Prosecutors say Heller, a 43-year-old actor and resident of Van Nuys, took more than 500 pages of Diebold-related documents, including memos from the company's attorneys at the Jones Day law firm. The memos suggested that the company might have broken state law by providing Alameda County with voting machines that had not been certified by the state.

"This case is not about whistle-blowing. It's about theft of attorney-client privileged material from an attorney's office," Los Angeles County district attorney spokeswoman Sandi Gibbons said.

DOJ_NMG_0019308

But activists and bloggers — including the California Voter Foundation; Black Box Voting, an electronic voting group; and the liberal http://www.huffingtonpost.com website — say the purloined documents, some of which turned up on the Oakland Tribune website, helped spur a state crackdown on Diebold.

"People should be thanking Stephen Heller because ultimately he helped our secretary of state stop illegal acts by Diebold," said Cindy Coen, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a digital rights group based in San Francisco.

Heller has pleaded not guilty to three counts of felony access to computer data, commercial burglary and receiving stolen property.

Although state law protects whistle-blowers from retaliation by employers, it does not preclude criminal prosecution.

On the advice of his lawyer, Heller declined to discuss the facts of his case, but agreed to talk more generally.

Brought up in a small dairy farming town in upstate New York, Heller moved to Los Angeles in 1997 after years of waiting tables and performing in small theaters in Chicago. Heller said he had stopped just short of finishing a theater degree at DePaul University to dedicate himself to an acting career.

In Los Angeles, he managed to land a few small roles on television shows and in commercials. But acting failed to pay the bills and Heller refused to wait any more tables. So he brushed up on his typing skills and found work as a word processor — a decent, less stressful way to make ends meet, he said.

He lives in a quaint, one-story home with his wife, an actress and writer who also works as a word processor. They have three cats and a dog.

Heller began a three-month stint as a temporary worker at the Los Angeles office of Jones Day in December 2003. One of his assignments was transcribing an attorney's tapes on legal issues facing a major client: Diebold.

The name was familiar because of media attention surrounding the company and its new touch-screen voting systems. Heller, a news junkie, said he had had no prior dealings with the company.

Bev Harris, founder of Black Box Voting, told investigators that Heller met her in a park in Ventura County in early 2004 and gave her the documents, which she turned over to the secretary of state and the Oakland Tribune.

"What Stephen did was the best of citizenry," Harris said.

Harris and fellow activist Jim March, later joined by the state attorney general, had already sued Diebold in 2003 for allegedly failing to certify the voting system.

The lawsuit gained traction when Diebold's touch-screen systems failed in March 2004. Because of a battery drain, the screens could not display the proper ballot, and poll workers in San Diego County had to turn away some early voters. Alameda County residents had to use paper ballots.

Diebold eventually settled the suit for $2.6 million. The state banned use of its machines, but the ban was reversed this year and the machines were certified for use in 17 counties.

Gibbons said Heller's alleged theft had nothing to do with the attorney general's suit or a later investigation of Diebold by the secretary of state's office.

Members of a state commission considering the ban on Diebold, however, did question witnesses about the leaked documents.

Jones Day sued the Oakland Tribune over the leak, but later dropped the case and referred the alleged theft to authorities.

Diebold declined to comment on Heller's prosecution. Jones Day officials have said his actions forced them to return $1 million in legal fees to Diebold and damaged the reputation of one of their lawyers.

John Majoras, a partner at Jones Day, said: "As far we are aware, this is a criminal matter. The authorities are taking care of it, and we will watch to see what comes of it."

Heller said he learned that he was under investigation when a team of district attorney investigators and police descended on his Van Nuys home in August 2004 and seized his computer, personal papers and address book.

"For the first few minutes, I thought this is a mistake … just cooperate and they'll find out that I'm not that drug dealer they're looking for," Heller said. "But that wasn't the case."

Heller eventually was fired by the temporary employment agency, and remained jobless for eight months before landing work in a related field. He declined to identify his job for fear that it would be jeopardized by the publicity.

DOJ_NMG_0019309

D.A. spokeswoman Jane Robison said defendants such as Heller, with no criminal record, typically receive probation if convicted.

But Heller's lawyer said he doesn't want to risk a conviction.

"The felony conviction itself will prohibit many kinds of employment for him," attorney Blair Berk said. "He'll lose his right of citizenship to vote."

The Electronic Frontier Foundation and the Assn. of Computing Machinery, an information technology group, are searching for a pro bono attorney to help represent Heller, who said he has exhausted his savings on legal fees.

Black Box Voting has donated $10,000 to the Stephen Heller Legal Defense Fund.

"I'm optimistic that the right thing is going to be done here," Heller said.

"Hopefully, I'll get a chance to properly defend myself and justice will prevail."

Putting A Racist Past In The Past (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

A bill says activists who broke racially biased laws would be eligible for Alabama pardon.

ATLANTA — Civil rights activists and others convicted under laws that enforced racial discrimination would be eligible for a pardon from the state of Alabama under a bill working its way through the Legislature, the bill's sponsor said Friday.

Rep. Thad McClammy said that his proposed "Rosa Parks Act" would serve the symbolic purpose of bestowing posthumous pardons on activists like Parks, whose 1955 arrest sparked the 381-day Montgomery bus boycott.

But McClammy, a Democrat, said the pardons also could help living veterans of the segregated South, who still may have trouble explaining away their arrests when applying for jobs or loans.

"If they do a background check, they say: 'Oh my … this person was arrested five times,' " McClammy said. "It follows you. What we're saying is, not only should individuals be pardoned, but the record should be expunged. These were illegal laws."

Some of the most famous arrests of the civil rights era occurred in Alabama in the 1950s and '60s. Parks was convicted of violating Montgomery's municipal code for refusing to move to the back of a city bus. Dozens more were charged under anti-boycott and curfew statutes.

The early 1960s saw the arrests of "freedom riders" and protesters who engaged in civil disobedience at lunch counter sit-ins. In 1963, about 3,000 children were arrested in Birmingham for taking part in civil rights demonstrations. Horace Huntley of the Birmingham Civil Rights Institute said many of those young people eventually were convicted. "Those [convictions] are still on the books, just as it was in Rosa Parks' case," said Huntley, director of the institute's oral history project.

McClammy's bill unanimously passed the Democratic-controlled Alabama House Judiciary Committee this week; House Minority Leader Mike Hubbard predicted that his fellow Republicans probably would support the measure.

"I guess it's just never occurred to me that there'd be any opposition to it," Hubbard said. "I'm 44 years old, and I've never been a part of any segregation or race problems or whatever."

Alabama has struggled to emerge from the shadows of its racist past. In 2004, voters narrowly rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to strike language requiring separate schools for "white and colored" children. That wording is superseded by federal law.

However, if McClammy's bill becomes law, it will be one of a number of recent steps taken by Alabamians toward reconciliation. In December, Montgomery's predominantly white First Baptist Church kicked off an effort to bridge the gap between black and white churches to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the bus boycott. The church has held prayer vigils and meals with members of predominantly black churches. And the Montgomery library system has named its main branch for Juliette Hampton Morgan, a library research director in the 1950s who was an outspoken white opponent of segregation. Morgan reportedly committed suicide in 1957 after intense public ridicule and threats to the library system by racist whites.

2nd Autopsy In Youth Boot Camp Death Fails To End Questions (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019310

MIAMI, March 17 — Martin Lee Anderson was buried a second time this week, more than two months after he died following a confrontation with guards at a boot camp for teenage offenders in the Florida Panhandle. But questions about his death, and whether the state should close all its boot camps in the aftermath, are very much alive.

After supervising a second autopsy of Martin's body on Monday, a special prosecutor appointed by Gov. Jeb Bush disputed the findings of the original pathologist in the case: that the youth had died from complications of sickle cell trait, an undiagnosed blood disorder. But the prosecutor, Mark Ober, would not say more until his broader investigation of the case was finished.

The guards at Bay Boot Camp in Panama City kneed, kicked and hit Martin, 14, after he stopped running during an orientation drill on Jan. 5. He had been sent to the camp for violating probation after stealing his grandmother's car. In a videotape, which the state released after news organizations sued for it, the boy appears limp throughout the encounter.

He died early on Jan. 6, and when the original autopsy report came out a month later, his parents, lawmakers and civil rights groups expressed outrage. Even after Mr. Ober said through a spokeswoman that Martin "did not die of sickle cell trait, nor did he die of a natural cause," the medical examiner who made those findings, Dr. Charles Siebert of Bay County, stood by them.

"I am appalled at the baseless and mean-spirited accusations from special interest groups with little or no knowledge of the evidence in this case," Dr. Siebert said in a statement on Thursday, "who are calling for everything from the revocation of my license to criminal charges."

Dr. Michael Baden, a pathologist who attended the second autopsy on behalf of Martin's family, told a legislative committee in Tallahassee on Friday that Martin had most likely suffocated during the incident and was brain dead by the time an ambulance carried him away.

"There was a time when there were hands over Anderson's mouth," Dr. Baden said in an interview, noting that the guards held ammonia capsules under the boy's nose several times during the incident. "There may have been ammonia capsules blocking his nose, hands blocking his mouth — that could contribute to asphyxia."

The boot camp, run by the Bay County Sheriff's Office, will close next month. In a letter to state officials, Sheriff W. Frank McKeithen said he was closing it because the program had been "virtually paralyzed" after Martin's death.

The seven guards in the incident remain on the job — though not working with young offenders, who have already been cleared from the camp — while Mr. Ober decides whether they should face criminal charges.

Meanwhile, Governor Bush and his Department of Juvenile Justice are reviewing policies for the state's five other boot camps, as the Legislature debates whether they should remain open. Many states have closed military-style boot camps for teenagers in recent years, but Governor Bush said Thursday that they have "yielded a good result," and Anthony Schembri, his juvenile justice secretary, affirmed that assessment in an interview Friday.

"I think the remainder are good options that we can use for certain kids," Mr. Schembri said of the five surviving boot camps, though he said every camp should have education and therapy components.

Martin's parents, Gina Jones and Robert Anderson, said they were appalled to hear that Dr. Siebert had not changed his assessment of Martin's death after the second autopsy, which he attended. In an interview, they said every guard involved in the incident should be arrested immediately, as should a nurse who stood by during the confrontation.

"My baby passed away from the beating," said Ms. Jones, who said her son was an honor student who liked basketball, chess and video games. "It's not only the guards to blame; it's the sheriff, the doctor, the governor. It's time for the governor to step in."

In an interview, Dr. Siebert said Dr. Baden, a former chief medical examiner for New York City, was biased because Martin's parents had sought his involvement.

"I'm charged with coming to a truthful and unbiased manner of death, and I feel that's what I did in this case," he said. "I have nothing to gain by conspiring with anybody."

During a meeting on Friday of the Criminal Justice Appropriations Committee of the Florida House of Representatives, Mr. Schembri's chief of staff, Chris Caballero, said the Juvenile Justice Department might require young offenders to get electrocardiograms and drug tests before entering boot camps.

Mr. Schembri, who would not discuss the Anderson incident except to call it tragic, said he would also revise use-of-force policies at boot camps, which in Florida are for "moderate risk" young offenders.

DOJ_NMG_0019311

Representative Dan Gelber, a Miami Beach Democrat on the Criminal Justice Appropriations Committee, said the video suggested that guards at the Bay Boot Camp were following an established use-of-force protocol.

"I just was shocked that the officers seemed to think this was what they were supposed to do," he said. "They clearly were inflicting substantial force on somebody who was not threatening them or himself."

Mr. Gelber added: "They knew the camera was there, they knew they were being filmed, they weren't trying to hide anything. But the notion that you could inflict pain to get somebody to run or say, 'Yes, sir' — that is just un-American."

Federal Appeals Court Allows 'Choose Life' License Plates In Tennessee (FINDLAW/AP)

By Lucas L. Johnson Ii, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 18, 2006

(AP) - NASHVILLE, Tennessee-A federal appeals court Friday allowed Tennessee to offer anti-abortion license plates bearing the message "Choose Life."

A three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a lower-court ruling that said the tag illegally promoted only one side of the abortion debate.

"Although this exercise of government one-sidedness with respect to a very contentious political issue may be ill-advised, we are unable to conclude that the Tennessee statute contravenes the First Amendment," Judge John M. Rogers said in a 2-1 ruling.

An anti-abortion group, Tennessee Right to Life, declared victory.

"It's a validation of our position all along that the Legislature had the authority to authorize a plate that favors normal childbirth over the practice of abortion," said Brian Harris, the group's president.

In a dissenting opinion, Judge Boyce F. Martin Jr. said the plates should be banned because they amount to unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination.

The plaintiffs, the American Civil Liberties Union of Tennessee and Planned Parenthood of Middle and East Tennessee, said they were still reviewing Friday's ruling.

Abortion-rights proponents complained the state does not offer those with other political views a similar way to express them. An attempt to create a "Choose Choice" tag failed in the Legislature in 2002.

Federal appeals courts have been divided over whether such license plate programs are constitutional. Last year the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower-court ruling that said similar South Carolina license plates violated the First Amendment.

Drivers will be able to pay an extra fee in Tennessee for the "Choose Life" plate, and some of the proceeds will go to New Life Resources, an anti-abortion group.

Tennessee is the 13th state to offer "Choose Life" plates. The others are Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, Ohio, Oklahoma and South Dakota. Most states donate proceeds to adoption groups, but Alabama, Hawaii, Maryland and Montana donate at least some of the money to anti-abortion groups.

Tennessee has more than 120 specialty plates, most of them saluting uncontroversial subjects such as the Tennessee Titans football team, the Smoky Mountains and the Tennessee Walking Horse.

Gov. Phil Bredesen let the anti-abortion license plates measure become law but declined to sign it, and he urged lawmakers to develop a new approach to deciding which causes would benefit from the sale of specialty plates.

After 2 More Deaths, Planned Parenthood Alters Method For Abortion Pill (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — After receiving reports that two more women died after taking abortion pills, Planned Parenthood, the nation's largest provider of abortion and contraceptive services, announced that it would immediately change the way it gives the medicines.

The change partly resolves a long-running dispute between Planned Parenthood and the Food and Drug Administration over the safest way to provide pill-based abortions.

DOJ_NMG_0019312

The F.D.A. has now received reports that six women in the United States died after taking RU-486, or Mifeprex. A seventh died in Canada. The two most recent deaths and two of the previous four underwent their procedures at Planned Parenthood clinics, a spokeswoman said.

Federal officials do not yet know the cause of the latest two deaths. The previous four resulted from systemic infections with a virulent bacteria, Clostridium sordellii. Planned Parenthood announced in a statement that one of the two recent deaths occurred within days of the victim's undergoing a pill-based abortion, while the other woman died within five weeks.

Mifeprex has been used in more than 560,000 medical abortions in the United States and more than 1.5 million in Europe. The risks of death from infection after using the pill are similar to the risks after surgical abortions or childbirth, drug agency officials said.

When Mifeprex was first approved by the agency in 2000, the standard regimen was to give the drug in a doctor's office followed two days later by an oral dose of a different drug, misoprostol, also in a doctor's office. Women expelled the fetus over the following days or weeks in a process that mimicked a miscarriage. The procedure must begin within 49 days of conception.

Soon after Mifeprex's approval, most Planned Parenthood doctors switched to a different regimen, instructing women to insert misoprostol vaginally at home two to three days after taking Mifeprex. Studies of the new regimen showed that it was effective, and it allowed women to take lower doses of misoprostol. It also meant fewer office visits for Planned Parenthood.

But this regimen was not approved by the drug agency. It is not unusual for doctors to use drugs differently from how they are officially approved. But as reports of deaths among women undergoing the procedure trickled into the F.D.A., government officials issued stern warnings that doctors should stick to the approved regimen.

Until Friday, Planned Parenthood had rejected those warnings.

Dr. Vanessa Cullins, vice president of medical affairs for Planned Parenthood, said in an interview that effective immediately the group would ask patients to take misoprostol orally instead of vaginally. Although the F.D.A. has asked that this be done in doctors' offices, a Planned Parenthood spokeswoman said patients would still be asked to take the second drug at home.

"There is no single reason for the change" in policy by the group, Dr. Cullins said.

"We don't really know all the circumstances surrounding these women's deaths," she said.

Whether the method of drug administration has anything to do with the deaths is not known. The drug agency said it was "investigating all the circumstances associated with these cases." The agency has already added strong warnings to Mifeprex's label regarding the risks of infection.

On Friday, the agency repeated warnings that women who undergo pill-based abortions should be vigilant for signs of trouble. If they suffer from nausea, vomiting or diarrhea and weakness with or without abdominal pain more than a day after taking abortion medicines they should be given antibiotics.

Clostridium sordellii infections are rare and can be difficult to diagnose because they are not always accompanied by fever.

Since reporting drug side effects is voluntary in the United States, it is possible that more women have died and that their deaths have gone unreported because doctors, medical examiners and coroners are not obligated to forward such reports to the F.D.A. Doctors and local officials also may not associate a death with a pill-based abortion, especially if the death occurs weeks later.

The risk of infections could be lowered or eliminated if abortion patients were given antibiotics as a preventative. But antibiotic therapy has its own risks, and officials say that the risk of infection from Clostridium sordellii is so slight that it does not merit such a precaution.

The government has scheduled a scientific conference on May 11 at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to discuss Clostridium sordellii and a related bacteria, Clostridium difficile, that has caused outbreaks of diarrhea and colitis in hospitals and nursing homes.

Both bacteria generally live in the soil and human intestinal tracts. Both thrive in environments with limited oxygen. When these bacteria infect the bloodstream, they can produce a toxin that causes something akin to toxic shock syndrome.

Senators Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, and Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, released a statement Friday calling for the withdrawal of Mifeprex. They have sponsored a bill that would force the F.D.A. to withdraw the drug.

DOJ_NMG_0019313

Monty Patterson, whose 18-year-old daughter, Holly, died on Sept. 17, 2003, from a Clostridium sordellii infection after a medical abortion, has since argued that Mifeprex predisposes women to such infections by suppressing their immune systems.

"How many women have to die needlessly before this drug is removed from the market?" Mr. Patterson asked.

FDA Says 2 More Women Have Died After Taking Abortion Pill (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Agency Is Investigating; 7 Fatalities Now Tied to RU-486

The Food and Drug Administration reported yesterday that two more women have died after taking the RU-486 abortion pill, bringing to seven the number of fatalities associated with the drug since it was approved for use in 2000.

The agency said that it was investigating the new reports, provided by the manufacturer of the drug, but so far was not able to confirm any cause of death. In four earlier fatalities of California women who had undergone medical abortions, the victims died of a form of blood poisoning caused by Clostridium sordellii , a common but rarely fatal bacterium.

Opponents of abortion quickly described the FDA advisory as another reason to ban the abortion pill, sold as Mifeprex.

"RU-486 is a deadly drug that is killing pregnant women," Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), who has co-sponsored a bill to take the drug off the market pending a review, said in a statement. "This drug should never have been approved, and it must be suspended immediately."

But supporters said that the pill, which has been used worldwide for years, remains safe.

"To put this in context . . . 560,000 medication abortions have occurred in the United States. We know of seven reported deaths of women who had medication abortions in North America," Vanessa Cullins, vice president for medical affairs of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a statement. "At this time, none of those deaths have been directly attributed" to the abortion pill, she said.

Though commonly known as RU-486, this medical abortion actually entails taking two pills. The first, an antiprogestin, binds itself to the wall of the uterus, triggering the shedding of the uterine wall and not allowing the embryo to become implanted. One or two days later, the woman takes another drug -- misoprostol -- that causes her cervix to soften and dilate so the embryo can be expelled.

As a precaution, Cullins said, Planned Parenthood is changing its policy on how medical abortions should be administered. In the past, many women received misoprostol vaginally, although the FDA had never reviewed or approved that method. Vaginal use is considered to be more effective and has fewer side effects, but Cullins said that her organization would no longer recommend that method.

In its advisory, the FDA pointedly said that the safety and effectiveness of vaginal use of the second drug "has not been established." It also said that providers of medical abortion and emergency-room staffs should investigate the possibility of blood poisoning whenever women who have taken the drugs come in complaining of nausea, vomiting or weakness unassociated with fever or other signs of infection.

The FDA said yesterday that it did not know whether the clostridium bacteria played any role in the most recent deaths, but the agency did establish that it was present in four earlier fatalities. One other death related to medical abortion was in a woman who had an ectopic pregnancy -- a condition where RU-486 is not considered appropriate.

The issue of clostridium infection will be discussed at a public workshop in May hosted by the FDA and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The bacterium has been associated with a small number of deaths and more hospitalizations involving both medical abortions and skin grafts.

The agency's handling of the seven deaths of women who had undergone medical abortion was criticized by opponents of the drug.

"The FDA has pulled other drugs that have caused fewer deaths and less severe complications than RU-486," Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, said in a statement. "Why the double-standard for an abortion drug that is now linked to the deaths of seven healthy women and over 800 other reported complications?"

DOJ_NMG_0019314

Opponents of medical abortion filed a citizen's petition with the FDA soon after the drug was approved for use, but the FDA has never acted on it. In addition, Rep. Roscoe G. Bartlett (R-Md.) introduced a bill in 2003 -- called Holly's Law, after Holly Patterson, an 18-year-old California woman who died following a medical abortion -- that would ban use of RU-486. The bill has 79 co-sponsors.

Bartlett said yesterday that the maker of Mifeprex, Danco Laboratories LLC, should pull the drug from the market. If it refuses, he said, the FDA should force its withdrawal.

FDA Says Two More Women Dead After Abortion Pill Use (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration disclosed yesterday that two more American women had died after taking the abortion pill, mifepristone or RU-486; bringing to seven the number of mifepristone users who have died in this country since the drug was approved here in 2000.

"At this time, we are investigating all circumstances associated with these cases and are not able to confirm the causes of death," or know whether the abortion pill was a factor, the FDA said in a "public health advisory" posted at its Web site.

Reacting to the two new deaths, Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, and Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, both demanded that sales of mifepristone be suspended immediately.

In addition to the seven deaths potentially linked to the drug, Mr. DeMint said federal records also indicate another 600 women have experienced adverse events following its use. They include 200 women whose complications were "either life-threatening or extremely serious," Mr. DeMint said.

Mifepristone, known under the trade name of Mifeprex, is approved to end pregnancies up to 49 days after the start of a woman's last menstrual cycle. It blocks a hormone needed to sustain a pregnancy. Misoprostol, which should be taken two days after mifepristone, induces labor contractions to end a pregnancy.

In its health advisory yesterday, the FDA presented the regimen it has approved for taking mifepristone and misoprostol. Rather than taking misoprostol orally, as the FDA recommends, four California women who died inserted that drug vaginally.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America Inc. said since 2000, four of the seven women who died, including the latest two, received the pills at affiliated clinics. The organization said it will immediately stop recommending vaginal insertion of the final two tablets.

The FDA yesterday warned doctors to watch for sepsis, a potentially deadly blood infection, that previously killed four California women following medical abortions using mifepristone and misoprostol. The four all tested positive for a rare bacterial infection known as Clostridium sordelli.

"We do not know if these [two] new deaths were caused by sepsis or, if they were, if they were caused by infection with Clostridium sordelli," the FDA said in its notice. But the agency urged physicians to be on the lookout for such infections in women who have used mifepristone and misoprostol to terminate pregnancies.

Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, a pro-life organization, said she was dismayed that the FDA "did not pull" the abortion pill when it announced the two additional deaths.

"The FDA has pulled other drugs that have caused fewer deaths and even some that caused complications but no deaths. Why the double standard for this abortion drug?" Miss Wright asked. The FDA says it cannot prove mifepristone or misoprostol were to blame, but says the rate of fatal sepsis in medical abortions is approximately 1 in 100,000, which is comparable with infection risks in surgical abortions and childbirths.

2 More Women Die After Taking Abortion Pills (LAT)

By Jonathan D. Rockoff, Baltimore Sun

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Federal regulators are looking into whether they had the same infection that killed four California women who also took RU-486.

DOJ_NMG_0019315

WASHINGTON — Two more women who took the abortion pill RU-486 have died, according to federal drug regulators who are investigating whether the same rare infection that caused four earlier deaths was responsible.

In announcing the two additional cases Friday, the Food and Drug Administration issued an alert urging doctors and patients to follow approved directions for the drug — which is used in combination with another medication, misoprostol — and to look for warning signs warranting immediate attention.

The agency did not provide further details about the two deaths, which followed reports that four women in California had died from septic shock since 2003 after undergoing medical abortions, as the procedure for using RU-486 is called.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America said it would immediately alter its procedures for administering the drug. The group had been recommending that women take the misoprostol vaginally, a widespread practice that is generally believed to be more effective but is not what the FDA recommends. The four California women took the drug vaginally.

In a statement, Planned Parenthood said one of the two recent deaths took place weeks after use of the pills, and the second several days after. It emphasized that of 560,000 women who had taken the pills in the U.S., a tiny fraction — seven — had died afterward.

According to the FDA, reports of fatal infections in women taking RU-486 are "very rare" — about 1 in every 100,000 cases.

After learning that the four California women who died had taken the abortion pills, the FDA issued a warning in July but said it did not know whether use of the abortion pills had caused the deaths. In November, it updated its alert to say that the women were infected with the same Clostridium sordellii bacterium.

Controversial even before the FDA approved its sale six years ago, RU-486 has been a flashpoint in the abortion wars. It ends a pregnancy, unlike the "morning after" pill, which prevents one.

Government investigators have said that RU-486 poses a small risk to women and that the infection that killed the four California women could occur in women giving birth as well.

The infections are hard to detect because they do not produce fevers or other signs of infection.

Some groups have called on the FDA to restrict sales, saying hundreds of deaths may not have been reported. Other groups say evidence shows that the drug is safe.

A May 11 workshop by the FDA, the Centers for Disease Control and the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases will review cases of clostridial infections, including the California deaths.

Investigators are trying to determine whether use of RU-486, sold as Mifeprex, makes women more susceptible to infection.

Birth Control (WSJ)

By Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Morning-After Pill Comes to Wal-Mart

On Monday, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. is set to sell for the first time prescription emergency contraceptives commonly referred to as Plan B or the morning-after pill.

The move comes after a short but vociferous activist campaign that labeled the world's largest retailer as antiwomen for being the only large pharmacy chain in the country that refused to stock the pills.

Emergency contraception is in essence a high-dose birth-control pill that works by preventing the ovaries from releasing an egg, blocking the union of sperm and egg, or stopping a fertilized egg from implanting in the uterus. The pill must be taken within five days of sex, but the earlier it is taken, the more effective it is.

That Wal-Mart chose "for business reasons" not to stock the pill was an issue that simmered on the back burner for women's groups for years after the pill was first approved by the Food and Drug Administration in 1997. But with Wal-Mart on the hot seat for a slew of other issues, from a huge gender-discrimination lawsuit to its high-deductible health benefits, activists saw this as an excellent time to hit the issue again.

In February, three women filed suit against the retailer in Massachusetts. A few days later, the board that oversees Massachusetts pharmacies ruled that Wal-Mart stores in that state must fill prescriptions for emergency contraception. Illinois has a similar rule. Within short order, several other states, including Connecticut and New York, were making noise that they would follow suit. The last thing Wal-Mart needed was another state-by-state battle on its hands: More than 20 states are considering legislation that would require Wal-Mart to pay a higher percentage of employee's health-care benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0019316

But Wal-Mart's decision to stock Plan B doesn't mean the pressure is off. The retailer will allow pharmacists who object to the pills for personal reasons to refuse to dispense them, recommending another pharmacy instead if no other Wal-Mart pharmacist on the premises is willing to fill the prescription. With Wal-Mart occasionally the only pharmacy in town, especially in rural areas, some argue that refusing to dispense Plan B could present a real hardship for women. Groups are already starting to send petitions to the company, asking them to rescind the policy.

This will be a tougher fight, as Wal-Mart has more company in this arena. Rite Aid Corp., Target Corp., Walgreen Co. and Winn-Dixie Stores Inc. also allow pharmacists to refuse to dispense the pills, except in the states where it is illegal to do so. Pressure is coming from the other side, too: Sixteen states are considering legislation that would allow pharmacies to refuse to fill prescriptions for any sort of birth control -- Plan B or just everyday birth control.

Abortion Nation (WSJ)

By James Q. Wilson

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

When South Dakota passed a law banning all abortions save those that threaten the physical health of the mother, opponents of abortion were cheered and defenders of it outraged. I think both sides were mistaken.

Roe v. Wade, decided in 1973, did not create abortion, it created a right to an abortion. The decision had few merits on constitutional grounds and it was a disaster on political ones. For nearly a quarter of a century American politics has been convulsed by a polarizing debate. No one can become the Democratic presidential candidate without favoring abortion and (so far) no one can become the Republican candidate without opposing it. This has driven the candidates and parties far apart even though most Americans occupy a middle ground on the issue.

Abortion has become the key test for selecting people for high-level judicial offices. When Sen. Charles Schumer says he favors using "ideology" as a test for judges, the ideology he has in mind is abortion. When other senators oppose a "litmus test" for judges, the test to which they refer is about abortion. We closely watch Supreme Court decisions to see if they will oppose even the slightest restriction on this "right."

By contrast, abortion is scarcely an issue in most European democracies, not because the people who live there have views radically different from American ones, but because legislatures, not courts, authorized abortions using language that tried to strike a reasonable balance among competing views.

When other countries authorized abortions, they did not authorize a right to one. Their laws were designed to give varying degrees of respect to unborn life. (Only in China is there a law as permissive as that conferred by Roe v. Wade.) When Prof. Mary Ann Glendon surveyed abortion laws here and abroad in the late 1980s, she found that in France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland and the U.K. there existed pre-abortion waiting periods, mandatory counseling, time limits of when during a pregnancy an abortion could occur, and a requirement that several physicians agree on the need for an abortion.

Suppose, in response to a lawsuit brought against the South Dakota law, Roe were overturned. Abortion would not disappear. Women would not visit quack doctors or travel to Sweden. Abortion would be legalized in many states (it was legal in five before Roe was decided), but having been made legal by state legislatures, the laws would, as in Europe, accommodate the diverse views of proponents and opponents. Ardent defenders of abortion would realize that, in exchange for a small bus fare, a woman in South Dakota could go to a nearby state where abortions were easy to obtain. Ardent opponents would know that if they wished to live in an abortion-free state, they could move to one.

In making these decisions, the states would be exercising their police powers; that is, their right to pass laws that protect the lives, health and morality of their citizens. The federal government has no such police power; it can only act in ways that can be plausibly derived from the Constitution. The Framers would have never imagined that the national government would pass laws about abortion -- or marriage, or parenting, or private sexual acts.

DOJ_NMG_0019317

There are, of course, checks on the states' police powers. They cannot be used in ways that plainly deprive people of rights guaranteed by state or federal constitutions. A state regulation must be reasonably related to the provision of a public good. But within those limits, states can and do regulate sex, marriage, divorce, parenting and communicable diseases.

The states should also decide about gay marriage. Some conservatives are urging Congress to propose a constitutional amendment banning this, but this would be a mistake. People should vote on this matter and about the conditions of life they wish to experience where they live. Though I oppose gay marriage, voters in some states may approve it. If they do, we will have a chance to learn what it means in practice, with the costs and benefits falling on people who have accepted it.

Moreover, a state-by-state vote on the matter provides an opportunity for gay advocates of this policy to make their case. A constitutional amendment would deny them that opportunity, leaving them perpetually angry. Since feelings run high on this matter, it would be a mistake to let it be decided as the right to abortion was decided. If there were the gay marriage equivalent of Roe v. Wade or a constitutional ban on it, we would infect the nation with the divisive anger that followed Roe and our earlier attempt at alcohol prohibition.

If there is to be a constitutional amendment, it would be better if it said this: "Nothing in this Constitution shall authorize a federal judge to decide that a marriage can be other than between one man and one woman." If I could think of language to bar judges from making other social policy decisions, I would add it, but the words fail me.

The rising demand that every personal preference become a constitutional right is a worrisome disease. People, of course do have rights; the Constitution and the first 10 amendments spell most of them out. That document defines the essential requirements of life and liberty. Adding new invented rights by either a ratified amendment or judicial overreaching is a mistake.

Mr. Wilson has taught at Harvard, UCLA and Pepperdine, and is the author, among other books, of "The Moral Sense" (Free Press, 1997).

FDA To Review Ban On Gay Men Donating Blood (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration is considering revising its policy that bars as a blood donor any man who has had sex with another man since 1977, officials said yesterday.

The change in policy is being recommended by the American Red Cross, the American Association of Blood Banks and America's Blood Centers, which collect virtually all the blood used for transfusions nationwide.

The three groups requested the change at a March 8 workshop the FDA convened to review the latest scientific information about the safety of the blood supply, arguing that current tests and screening methods have improved enough to protect transfusion recipients without the lifetime ban.

Instead, the group recommended that men be barred from donating for only a year after having had sex with another man, treating them the same as other groups at increased risk for spreading sexually transmitted virus through donated blood.

"We strongly support the use of rational, scientifically based deferral policies, and we want them to be applied fairly and consistently," said Ryland Dodge, a Red Cross spokesman.

The FDA implemented the lifetime ban in the mid-1980s when concerns about the spread of the human immunodeficiency virus, which causes AIDS, were running high and many questions remained about the ease with which people could spread the virus and the reliability of screening methods. Since then, the accuracy of testing has improved substantially, as have questionnaires that all donors answer to identify those posing the greatest risk, Dodge said.

"All these things come together to make us much more confident that our layers of safety have improved to the point where they should review the policy," Dodge said.

FDA spokesman Stephen King said the agency would convene a meeting of its Blood Products Advisory Committee to formally reconsider revising the policy, probably later this year.

Agency officials are "definitely interested in hearing all the science, and if there's hard evidence in place that changing the policy would not endanger the blood supply they're definitely open to it," King said.

The current policy has drawn strong criticism from gay rights groups.

DOJ_NMG_0019318

"The blood deferral policy that exists is not based on science. It's based on inertia and in many cases stereotypes," said Jon Givner of the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund. "The FDA should revisit the issue and adopt a deferral policy that is based on actual risk rather than sexual orientation."

ANTITRUST:

Maytag, Whirlpool Deal At Risk (AP)

By David Pitt

AP, March 18, 2006

DES MOINES, IOWA - Shares of Maytag Corp. (the parent of North Canton's Hoover Co.) and Whirlpool Corp. fell Friday on speculation that the federal government may challenge their proposed merger.

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., has proposed a $1.79 billion acquisition of Maytag.

The U.S. Department of Justice antitrust division sought an extension to review the merger last month. The companies have agreed not to close the transaction before March 30.

A leading antitrust lawyer said a decision is likely to come next week.

The heightened speculation drove stock prices for both companies lower Friday. Maytag shares dropped $1.23, or 6.9 percent, to close at $16.71 on the New York Stock Exchange. Whirlpool shares fell $1.29, or 1.5 percent, to $86.25.

Steven C. Sunshine, a supervisor of the antitrust division's merger enforcement program from 1993 to 1995, said antitrust attorneys have expected the government to challenge the deal because it concentrates so much power in one company.

``I think this is a merger that on true antitrust principles raises real concerns," said Sunshine, now head of the antitrust practice at the New York law firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft.

The merger would create a company that produces half of the dishwashers in the United States and more than 70 percent of its clothes washers and dryers. Under long-standing federal guidelines, a rise in market concentration of that magnitude would usually draw a court challenge.

Antitrust attorneys have sought sworn statements from business rivals and customers as they review the deal, which was approved by Maytag's shareholders in December, the Wall Street Journal reported Feb 13.

Gina Talamona, spokeswoman for the Justice Department, declined to comment Friday, confirming only that the merger is still under review.

The Competition Bureau of Canada, an independent law enforcement agency, concluded on Tuesday that it had no grounds to challenge the merger under Canada's Competition Act.

Sunshine said it appears the U.S. Department of Justice antitrust staff has made a recommendation to challenge the merger to Tom Barnett, who heads the division. Barnett will make the final decision about whether the government challenges the merger in court.

If it does, the companies have the option of fighting a lengthy court battle, abandoning the deal or agreeing to sell off parts of the business to allay government concerns.

If Whirlpool chooses to walk away, it must pay Maytag $120 million.

Prudential Equity Group analyst Nicholas Heymann said he believes the Justice Department will oppose the merger ``based on the potential for anticompetitive pricing by the merged entity."

In a March 17 research note to investors, he speculated that the merger makes economic sense for Whirlpool only if the company increases the price of some washers and dryers to help boost profits.

A Whirlpool spokesman didn't immediately return calls for comment. CEO Jeff M. Fettig said Tuesday that the merger ``will result in better products, quality and service, as well as cost efficiencies, which will enhance our ability to succeed in the competitive global home-appliance industry."

A Maytag spokesman declined to comment. Maytag is based in Newton, Iowa.

Whirlpool's Maytag Purchase May Be Opposed By U.S. (Update7) (BLOOM)

DOJ_NMG_0019319

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Justice Department lawyers are gathering evidence for a possible court challenge to Whirlpool Corp.'s proposed $1.68 billion purchase of home appliance rival Maytag Corp., people familiar with the case say.

Antitrust enforcers are worried the Whirlpool deal would let the combined company raise prices through control of more than two-thirds of the U.S. market for some appliances, said antitrust lawyers who spoke on condition of anonymity because they aren't authorized to talk about the case. They said the government has questioned such retailers as Lowe's Cos. and Home Depot Inc. and Whirlpool's manufacturing rivals.

The decision on whether to pursue the agency's first court challenge to a takeover in two years will be up to the Bush administration's new antitrust chief, Thomas O. Barnett, 44. It will be the first test of his approach to mergers since he won Senate confirmation Feb. 10 as assistant attorney general.

``If they don't challenge this merger, Ford and General Motors is next," said Steven M. Axinn, a New York antitrust lawyer not involved in the transaction. ``Unless someone can argue that Maytag is going out of business, I don't understand how the government can let this deal happen."

Maytag shares fell $1.03, or 5.7 percent, to $16.91 as of 1:06 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Whirlpool shares declined 90 cents, or 1 percent, to $86.64.

Maytag Shares

Maytag shares are up about 16 percent and Whirlpool has risen about 26 percent since June when Ripplewood Holdings and Chinese refrigerator maker Haier Group Corp. entered the bidding for Maytag. Haier withdrew from the competition in July.

The difference between Whirlpool's $21 offer for each Maytag share and the current share price widened to almost 25 percent today.

``That suggests that Wall Street does not have confidence this transaction will happen," Axinn said. ``This is not a situation for the faint of heart."

The combination of Whirlpool, which makes stoves, ranges and washing machines, and Maytag, manufacturer of Amana refrigerators and Maytag washers and dryers, would create the world's largest appliance maker. The takeover would give Whirlpool more than 70 percent of the U.S. market for washing machines and dryers and almost half the dishwasher market.

Under Review

``We are still looking at the proposed transaction," said Justice Department spokesman Gina Talamona.

``We are not commenting," said Whirlpool spokesman Christopher Wyse. Maytag spokesman John Daggett declined to comment.

Maytag, which reported a fourth-quarter loss of $75 million, or 93 cents a share, said last month it may sell its Jade commercial business and its Hoover vacuum cleaner unit. In the year-earlier period, the loss was $14.1 million, or 18 cents a share.

Maytag's operating margin, the amount it makes after deducting costs, turned negative last quarter. It reported losing 1.6 cents for every dollar of sales. In 2000, the company made about 14 cents of profit on each dollar of sales. Whirlpool's operating margin was 6.3 percent last quarter, according to Bloomberg data.

Whirlpool and Maytag say their deal would promote competition by cutting costs from closing Maytag factories and consolidating production. They cite increased sales by foreign appliance makers such as Sweden's Electrolux AB, LG Corp. of South Korea and Haier.

Questioned Under Oath

The Justice Department's staff has questioned executives of the companies under oath, a sign the agency is preparing for a possible court challenge, the people familiar with the case said.

Last month, Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Michigan, and Newton, Iowa-based Maytag, agreed to give the department until March 30 to complete its investigation. The company could extend that deadline if the government wants more time.

Before Barnett makes a decision, company officials will get a chance to meet with him and others at the Antitrust Division to argue for the transaction.

Atlanta-based Home Depot, the world's largest home improvement retailer, has told the government the deal would hurt its business, people said. Home Depot, which now sells Maytag products, fears that the combined company would deny it access to the most popular brands and could lead to higher prices for less popular brands made by other companies, one person said.

``We don't comment on vendor transactions," said Home Depot spokesman Jerry Shields.

Losing Battles

The government lost its last two court battles to stop mergers. In 2004, a U.S. judge in San Francisco rejected the Justice Department's request to block software maker Oracle Corp.'s $7.7 billion acquisition of PeopleSoft Inc. The Federal Trade Commission also lost an effort later that year to block Arch Coal Inc.'s $364 million acquisition of Triton Coal Co. in Wyoming's Powder River Basin.

Those defeats have made the government cautious about challenging mergers, according to observers and antitrust experts.

``Justice has been very gun shy about going into court" since the Oracle defeat, said Herb Hovenkamp, who teaches antitrust at the University of Iowa's College of Law in Iowa City.

He predicted ``the tide will turn a little" and the government may be more aggressive in the Whirlpool case because recent Supreme Court decisions show deference to the government on antitrust issues.

Congressional Concerns

Barnett's decision on the Whirlpool case is being watched closely. He became acting head of the antitrust division in June when his former boss, R. Hewitt Pate, left government for private law practice.

Late last year, Republican senators Jon Kyl of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas held up a Senate vote on Barnett's nomination for three months, complaining about his role in pressing for a breakup of the Oracle-PeopleSoft deal.

On Dec. 16, the Wall Street Journal's editorial page praised Kyl and Brownback for ``raising a red flag" about Barnett, and on March 13 the newspaper urged the Justice Department to clear Whirlpool's bid for Maytag. The ``main beneficiary of an antitrust injunction would be foreign companies," the editorial said.

``Mr. Barnett assured Congress during his confirmation hearings that he appreciates the global scope of modern markets," the newspaper said. The Whirlpool case ``will be the first test of his sincerity."

Higher Prices

With just three large U.S. appliance makers, Whirlpool, Maytag and General Electric Co., the Justice Department is trying to determine whether the Whirlpool-Maytag combination would result in higher prices for washers, dryers and dishwashers. Foreign makers such as Electrolux, LG and Haier sell expensive appliances in the U.S., accounting for less than 10 percent of the U.S. market.

Consumers purchasing washing machines priced from $200 to $600 have fewer choices because it is too expensive for foreign makers to ship their cheaper brands to the U.S.

After Whirlpool announced its Maytag offer in July, the company's antitrust lawyer, James F. Rill, argued that increased sales by foreign manufacturers plus the buying power of discount appliance stores such as Home Depot, Lowe's, Best Buy Co. and Sears Holding Corp. would keep the market competitive.

``Synergies and efficiencies" from the combination would also mean cheaper products, Rill said. He also said the government shouldn't consider Whirlpool's production of Sears Kenmore appliances part of its market share.

``Sears owns the Kenmore label. Sears sets the pricing for the Kenmore product," Rill said in a July 18, 2005, interview. Antitrust enforcers have rejected that argument, people familiar with the case said.

4 Companies Under Federal Investigation (BEAUENT)

By Dan Wallach, The Enterprise

Beaumont (TX) Enterprise, March 18, 2006

Four U.S. chemical companies, including two with a major Southeast Texas presence, received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an investigation into possible anti-competitive pricing in certain materials that are used in a variety of consumer goods.

DOJ_NMG_0019321

The companies include Huntsman Corp., BASF Corp., Dow Chemical Co., and Lyondell Chemical Co.

The justice department delivered the subpoenas for documents to the companies in mid-February, said publicists for three of the companies contacted Friday by The Enterprise.

A spokeswoman for the justice department acknowledged the investigation but offered little detail.

"The anti-trust division is investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the polyurethanes industry," said justice department spokeswoman Gina Talamona.

Polyurethanes are made from chemical bases that eventually are used in the production of consumer goods. The material is used in shoe soles, furniture padding, automotive components such as steering wheels and dashboards, particle board used in home construction and as insulation in residential and commercial refrigerators.

Huntsman Corp. spokesman Don Olsen said the subpoena sought documents related to sales and pricing.

"We are cooperating fully," Olsen said. "We don't know the basis of the investigation nor do we know why."

Huntsman does not make any of the material in Jefferson County, Olsen said. The company's largest manufacturing unit for polyurethanes is in Geismar, La.

BASF also does not make the material in Jefferson County, and most of its production also is in Geismar, said Jack Maurer, a BASF spokesman.

"Yes, we were subpoenaed but we're not aware of any violation on the part of BASF," he said.

Susan Moore, a spokeswoman for Houston-based Lyondell, also confirmed the company received a subpoena.

"We believe we haven't violated any antitrust laws," she said.

In 2004, Lyondell acquired the PD Glycol plant in Beaumont, which makes products such as antifreeze, unrelated to the justice department's probe.

A call to Dow Chemical at its headquarters in Midland, Mich., was not returned Friday.

Airlines Can Legally Meet (FWST)

By Bob Cox

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 18, 2006

Officials from American Airlines and Southwest Airlines could negotiate a proposal to resolve the Wright Amendment controversy without running afoul of federal antitrust laws, legal experts said Friday.

Legal precedent allows competing businesses "to petition government" and propose legislation or regulation if they are not conspiring to fix prices or divide up market share, experts said. American says it is reluctant to enter talks with Southwest on Wright for fear of an antitrust inquiry or Justice Department lawsuit.

If American and Southwest "work out a compromise and ask Congress to enact a statute, then they're protected," said George Cohen, a professor at the University of Virginia's law school.

What the legal community calls the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, named for two precedent-setting Supreme Court cases, allows competing companies to work together to influence the legislative or executive branch of government without violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

"No violation of the Sherman Act can be predicated upon mere attempts to influence the passage or enforcement of laws, and the Sherman Act, therefore, does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or monopoly," the court ruled in the 1961 Noerr case.

In the cases, the court ruled that the constitutional guarantee of individuals' and corporations' right to petition government supersedes antitrust laws, designed to preserve competition among businesses.

American and Southwest could offer a compromise to resolve the Wright controversy "no matter how stupid or anticompetitive it might be," said Bruce Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute, a Washington, D.C.-based legal group that works to preserve and enhance business competition.

Cohen and Foer cited the example of tobacco companies working together to propose legislation that allowed the industry to resolve lawsuits brought by states and individuals.

DOJ_NMG_0019322

Still, any law or regulation enacted through the airlines' efforts could still be subject to legal challenges.

Proposing a political compromise would be one thing. But if the two airlines tried to divide up routes between them, Foer said, the legal ramifications "might get dicey."

That Other Madness This Month: Mergers (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

MARCH madness is not limited to college basketball. Billions of dollars in mergers were announced this week, building on the momentum created when AT&T offered to acquire BellSouth for $67 billion earlier in the month.

The trend even swept up entire stock exchanges, as the Nasdaq Stock Market offered to buy the London Stock Exchange (just as the New York Stock Exchange was weighing a bid of its own), and Euronext, the owner of the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon stock markets, said it was interested in buying Deutsche Börse, the German exchange.

BUT FIRST, A CORRECTION Just as investors may have been recovering from General Motors' $8.6 billion loss last year, the company stepped up to say the loss was actually $10.6 billion. It said the added losses more accurately reflected the costs of scaling back its North American operations and of helping its former parts subsidiary, Delphi, restructure while in bankruptcy protection.

G.M. said it would also restate five years of results and delay filing its annual report with the Securities and Exchange Commission while it looks into accounting irregularities at its residential mortgage unit.

CHARGE! Eager to further diversify its business amid rising interest rates and slowing growth for credit card issuers, Capital One Financial, the big credit card company, agreed to buy the North Fork Bancorporation, a regional bank serving the Northeast, for about $14.6 billion in cash and stock.

After its acquisition last fall of the Hibernia National Bank in New Orleans, Capital One would have deposits of more than $84 billion when its North Fork acquisition is completed. It would have more than 50 million customer accounts and 655 branches from White Plains to Brownsville, Tex.

Credit card companies are looking for new ways of financing the debt accumulated by their customers. In the past, card issuers repackaged the debt into bonds. Teaming up with banks also lets them use relatively inexpensive bank deposits to finance card debt.

HEADLINE NEWS The McClatchy Company, a California newspaper publisher, won a one-bid auction for Knight Ridder, offering $4.5 billion in cash and stock for its 32 newspapers, including The Miami Herald, The Star-Telegram of Fort Worth and The Charlotte Observer in North Carolina.

To help finance the deal and head off some antitrust concerns, McClatchy, which is based in Sacramento, immediately put 12 of the papers back up for sale. Among those it plans to sell are The Mercury News in San Jose, Calif., Knight Ridder's hometown; The Akron Beacon Journal in Ohio, which was the first in the chain; and both papers in Philadelphia, The Inquirer and The Daily News.

Gary Pruitt, the chief executive of McClatchy, which already owned The Star Tribune in Minneapolis, The Sacramento Bee and The News & Observer in Raleigh, N.C., said he hoped he could complete both the acquisition and the sale this summer.

DRUG DEAL Even some Europeans got carried away by merger furor: Merck of Germany made a hostile $17.7 billion bid for Schering of Germany, the largest maker of oral contraceptives. The businesses are unaffiliated with similarly named American companies: Merck & Company and Schering-Plough.

A combination of Merck and Schering would create the second-largest drug maker in Germany after Bayer, with annual sales of $13 billion. Midsize pharmaceutical companies are under pressure to buy one another as generics makers eat away at their profit margins and the cost of discovering and developing new drugs rises.

Schering's board rejected the Merck offer, but it may be persuaded by a higher price from a bigger company, including Novartis of Switzerland or GlaxoSmithKline of Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0019323

TAX FIRM SUED The New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, sued H&R Block, the nation's largest tax-preparation service, accusing it of selling retirement-savings plans without disclosing that investors would probably earn less from the plans than they would pay in fees.

Last month, the California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, accused Block of illegally promoting high-cost loans as "instant" tax refunds. The company agreed last year to pay $62.5 million to settle four class-action lawsuits over those refund-anticipation loans.

Perhaps even more embarrassing for the company, Block has said it will need to restate profits for two years because it understated its 2004 state tax liabilities by millions of dollars.

Despite these issues, federal banking regulators have approved H&R Block's plan to start its own savings bank later this year.

DELAY OF GAME In an embarrassing development, Sony pushed back the introduction of its PlayStation 3 video game console to November — months after it originally planned to start selling the consoles and almost a full year after its chief rival, Microsoft, was able to put its latest hardware into stores.

Sony is counting on PlayStation 3 to showcase two new technologies: the Blu-ray high-definition DVD format and the Cell processing chip. Sony had hoped the new PlayStation would help spread the use of the Blu-ray format, which is in a separate battle with a Toshiba technology to become the global standard for next-generation DVD's.

Analysts said Sony would probably try to sell PlayStation 3 for about $500. While that is $100 more than the Microsoft Xbox 360, they said it was probably much less than the actual building cost.

MOST VIEWED Following are the most-viewed business news articles on nytimes.com from March 11 through March 17:

1. A Cancer Drug's Big Price Rise Is Cause for Concern
2. Many Utilities Collect for Taxes They Never Pay
3. As Internet TV Aims at Niche Audiences, the Slivercast Is Born
4. TV Stations Fined Over CBS Show Deemed to Be Indecent
5. Surgical Device Poses a Rare but Serious Peril

ENVIRONMENT:

Judges Overturn Bush Bid To Ease Pollution Rules (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — A federal appeals court on Friday overturned a clean-air regulation issued by the Bush administration that would have let many power plants, refineries and factories avoid installing costly new pollution controls to help offset any increased emissions caused by repairs and replacements of equipment.

Ruling in favor of a coalition of states and environmental advocacy groups, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said the "plain language" of the law required a stricter approach. The court has primary jurisdiction in challenges to federal regulations.

The ruling by a three-judge panel was the court's second decision in less than a year in a pair of closely related cases involving the administration's interpretations of a complex section of the Clean Air Act. Unlike its ruling last summer, when the court largely upheld the E.P.A.'s approach against challenges from industry, state governments and environmental groups, the new ruling was a defeat for the agency and for industry, and a victory for the states and their environmentalist allies.

In the earlier case, a panel including two of the three judges who ruled on Friday decided that the agency had acted reasonably in 2002, when it issued a rule changing how pollution would be measured, effectively loosening the strictures on companies making changes to their equipment and operations.

But on Friday, the court said the agency went too far in 2003 when it issued a separate new rule that opponents said would exempt most equipment changes from environmental reviews — even changes that would result in higher emissions.

DOJ_NMG_0019324

With a wry footnote to Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking Glass," the court said that "only in a Humpty-Dumpty world" could the law be read otherwise.

"We decline such a world view," said their unanimous decision, written by Judge Judith W. Rogers, an appointee of President Bill Clinton. Judges David Tatel, another Clinton appointee, and Janice Rogers Brown, a recent Bush appointee, joined her.

The winners this time —more than a dozen states, including New York and California and a large group of environmental organizations — hailed the decision as one of their most important gains in years of litigation, regulation and legal challenges under the Clean Air Act.

The provision of the law at issue, the "new source review" section, governs the permits required at more than 1,300 coal-fueled power plants around the country and 17,000 factories, refineries and chemical plants that spew millions of tons of pollution into the air each year.

"This is an enormous victory over the concerted efforts by the Bush administration to dismantle the Clean Air Act," Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, whose office led the opposition from the states, said in an interview.

Mr. Spitzer, who is running for governor, said the ruling "shows that the administration's effort to misinterpret and undermine the statute is illegal."

Howard Fox, a lawyer for Earth Justice, which represented six environmental and health groups in the case, called the ruling "a victory for public health," adding, "It makes no sense to allow huge multimillion-dollar projects that drastically increase air pollution without installing up-to-date pollution controls."

The E.P.A. issued only a brief statement, saying: "We are disappointed that the court did not find in favor of the United States. We are reviewing and analyzing the opinion."

The decision is unlikely to be the last word; several circuit courts or appeals courts have considered or decided related cases, and the issue may eventually reach the Supreme Court. Some in Congress say the uncertainty demands an overhaul of the Clean Air Act itself, but there has been no real movement in that direction in recent years.

The new ruling addressed the administration's effort in 2003 to offer relief to energy companies that faced costly settlements of litigation brought by President Clinton's E.P.A. The agency proposed exemptions for companies whenever upgrades to their equipment amounted to less than 20 percent of the replacement cost of the equipment. In effect, that made perennial repairs of old equipment a more attractive alternative in many cases than its outright replacement.

Energy companies said the two rules the administration proposed in 2002 and 2003 would help them expand energy supplies at lower cost to consumers. But environmentalists said the change would result in just the kind of increased pollution that the law was intended to control.

The Clean Air Act calls for companies to build plants with up-to-date control technologies, and the new source provision was a way to ensure that as time goes by, pollution controls must be modernized along with the plants themselves.

Industry groups, which had challenged the first E.P.A. rule last year as not being flexible enough, were aligned with the agency this time. In general, they have been close partners with the Bush administration in environmental matters, pushing for greater economic considerations in the creation of any new policy.

The 20 percent threshold in the overturned rule would have enabled plant operators to make many repairs and upgrades without spending additional tens of millions of dollars for more advanced pollution controls. In settlements under the old rules, some companies faced costs of more than $100 million.

"This is a terrible decision," said Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, a trade organization, arguing that the "any physical change" definition created financial instability for plant operators who spent as much as $800 million for a new boiler.

He and other industry leaders expressed hope that the court ruling might induce Congress to pass new legislation that would include New Source Review, a step that he said would make it easier for plant operators to plan for their future upgrades and investments.

John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, called the ruling "a significant setback to business efficiency" and environmental quality.

DOJ_NMG_0019325

The government has 45 days to decide whether to seek a review of the ruling by the entire appeals court.

Court Rejects EPA's Loosening Of Air Rule (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Dealing a sharp setback to the Bush administration, a federal appeals court Friday threw out a controversial regulation in the federal government's clean-air program that would have allowed older factories, refineries and power plants to install new equipment without using the most modern anti-pollution devices.

The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which decides some of the most far-reaching cases dealing with federal regulations, said the Environmental Protection Agency had relied on "Humpty Dumpty" reasoning in arriving at a rule that critics said would have eased enforcement of a law intended to reduce industrial air pollution.

If the regulation were allowed to take effect, the court said, "a law intended to limit increases in air pollution would allow sources operating below applicable emission limits to increase significantly the pollution they emit without government review."

California and 13 other states had challenged the EPA ruling.

The Clean Air Act requires major industrial sites that modernize their equipment to install the most modern pollution-reducing devices. But in August 2003, the Bush administration altered enforcement of the regulation to allow companies to avoid installing the most expensive new emissions-cutting equipment if the price of the modernization was less than 20% of what it would cost to replace a major component of the plant. In California, whose air pollution rules are among the strictest in the nation, it takes less pollution to count as a major emitter than elsewhere. Many smaller facilities, among them some auto body paint shops, bakeries and small-parts manufacturers, fall into that category and come under the regulation.

Manufacturers, power plant operators and others had worked for years to win the revision in a section of the law known as "new source review." Almost as soon as it was announced, it faced legal challenges. Since then, court actions have chipped away at the administration's relaxation of the landmark 1970 law that has cleaned up some of the nation's worst air pollution. In December 2003, the appeals court here stayed enforcement of the administration's revision.

Last June, the court delivered a divided verdict on the measure. It upheld the rule change itself, but it decided that the EPA had erred in declaring that power plants and other large polluters did not have to keep records of their emissions. It concluded that without the documentation, regulators would not know whether the facilities were breaking clean-air laws.

The case decided Friday, which can be appealed to the Supreme Court, reaches further. Representatives of industry and environmental groups disagreed sharply over the impact.

The National Assn. of Manufacturers said the court was applying unnecessary limits on an EPA effort to ease what proponents of the change consider a burdensome aspect of the clean-air law. John Engler, the association's president, said the clean-air law could "trigger an endless review process for power plants and other stationary sources of air emissions that merely want to repair or upgrade existing facilities."

New York Atty. Gen. Eliot Spitzer, whose office played a leading role in opposing the administration's rule, called the decision "an enormous victory for clean air and for the enforcement of the law, and an overwhelming rejection of the Bush administration's efforts to gut the law."

Spitzer's top environmental lawyer, Peter Lehner, said 800 power plants and up to 17,000 factories nationwide would be affected.

"This is a victory for public health," said Howard Fox, an attorney at Earthjustice, which represented six groups in the case. "It makes no sense to allow huge multimillion-dollar projects that drastically increase air pollution without installing up-to-date pollution controls or even notifying nearby residents."

The case was decided unanimously by a panel made up of two judges appointed by President Clinton — Judith W. Rogers and David S. Tatel — and Judge Janice Rogers Brown, a former California Supreme Court justice, whose nomination to the appeals court by Bush encountered a filibuster by Democrats.

The new-source-review regulation was intended to bring aging facilities, which are responsible for a disproportionate share of the nation's air pollution, up to current standards when their operators modernized for efficiency and profitability. The administration said relaxing the rule would encourage plants to increase their efficiency and provide more affordable energy. Critics said it would make it easier for plants to increase emissions, causing more asthma and premature deaths, and choking cities and national parks with smog.

DOJ_NMG_0019326

That argument continued Friday: Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, said the ruling would "delay efficiency improvements … at the heart of effective emissions control."

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) said the rule was written "to allow polluters to get away with not installing modern pollution controls on upgraded plants," and was "nothing more than a free ride for polluters."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Looser Emission Rules Rejected (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Court Says Changes By EPA Violated Clean Air Act

A federal appeals court blocked the Bush administration's four-year effort to loosen emission rules for aging coal-fired power plants, unanimously ruling yesterday that the changes violated the Clean Air Act and that only Congress could authorize such revisions.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit sided with officials from 14 states, including New York, California and Maryland, who contended that the rule changes -- allowing older power plants, refineries and factories to upgrade their facilities without having to install the most advanced pollution controls -- were illegal and could increase the amount of health-threatening pollution in the atmosphere.

The Environmental Protection Agency's New Source Review policy was formally issued in 2003 but has never taken effect because of legal challenges by state officials and environmental groups. The administration has long argued that the existing standards are too stringent and have discouraged utility plants and other industries from upgrading and expanding their facilities. But opponents have characterized the rule changes as a favor to administration allies in the utility and coal-producing industries that would greatly add to public health problems.

New York Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer, who led the court fight to block the administration's New Source Review policy, called yesterday's ruling "a major victory for clean air and public health" and a "rejection of a flawed policy."

"It will encourage industry to build new and cleaner facilities, instead of prolonging the life of old, dirty plants," Spitzer said.

In a statement, EPA spokesman John Millet said: "We are disappointed that the Court did not find in favor of the United States. We are reviewing and analyzing the opinion and cannot comment further at this time."

Some studies have linked pollution from coal-fired power plants to as many as 20,000 premature deaths in the United States every year. Environmental activists have made curbing this type of pollution one of their most pressing legislative and legal priorities, and yesterday they celebrated the ruling.

"Irish eyes are surely smiling -- and we all will be breathing easier -- with this green court ruling on St. Patrick's Day," said John Walke, director of the clean-air program at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "This is about as thorough a rebuke a court can give."

President Bush took office in 2001 promising to ease regulations on coal-fired power plants as part of a larger energy production initiative. Three successive administrators of the EPA have tried without success to alter the rules and policies adopted during the Clinton administration that cracked down on aging power plants and refineries that were not equipped with modern air pollution equipment when they were upgraded and when their output was expanded.

Under the revised policy that was rejected by the court yesterday, power plants and other industrial polluters would not have to install new pollution technology if they modernized less than 20 percent of their operations.

The central question in the case focused on what constitutes an industrial facility "modification," because that is what triggers the federal requirement to cut down on the smog or soot emitted by utilities, oil refineries, incinerators, chemical plants and manufacturing operations. Previous administrations, including Bill Clinton's, had interpreted that phrase to encompass any physical activity that increases pollution from a given facility, with the exception of routine maintenance.

DOJ_NMG_0019327

EPA officials in the Bush administration sought to broaden this exemption by asserting that "routine maintenance" is any activity that amounts to less than 20 percent of a plant's value. But the ruling, written by Judge Judith W. Rogers, rejected that reasoning as illogical.

"EPA's approach would ostensibly require that the definition of 'modification' include a phrase such as 'regardless of size, cost, frequency, effect,' or other distinguishing characteristic," Rogers wrote. "Only in a Humpty Dumpty world would Congress be required to use superfluous words while an agency could ignore an expansive word that Congress did use. We decline to adopt such a world-view."

The other two judges on the panel were David S. Tatel and Janice Rogers Brown.

The EPA's statement did not indicate whether the administration intends to appeal the ruling. Both Walke and Scott Segal, a lobbyist for the utilities industry, said it would be difficult for the administration to forge ahead in light of the appeals court's strong ruling. Walke said the decision is tantamount to the court "burying the rule six feet under, where before it was just in a casket."

Segal said the ruling will make it more costly for plants to operate. "This is a missed opportunity for reform that would have made it easier to improve power plant efficiency and workplace safety, and that's bad news for consumers and the environment," he said. "We believe it is a step backwards for the protection of air quality in the United States."

Court Overturns Bush Clean Air Act Exemption In Loss For Power Industry (WSJ)

By Matthew Dalton

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

A U.S. appeals court handed environmentalists a victory Friday, overturning a Bush-administration rule that gave power plants and petroleum refineries more leeway to expand facilities without triggering requirements to install expensive pollution-control equipment.

The rule attempted to set a standard for what counts as "routine maintenance" under the New Source Review, or NSR, provisions of the Clean Air Act. Construction projects deemed to be routine maintenance are exempt from pollution-control requirements, and compliance with those requirements can cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

Construction projects valued at less than 20% of a facility's total value were exempt from the Environmental Protection Agency's rule, issued in 2003. But state officials and environmental groups said that exemption was too large and a violation of federal law.

On Friday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia agreed, deciding that the EPA rule "is contrary to the plain language of" the Clean Air Act. In the opinion for the three-judge panel, Judge Judith W. Rogers wrote that, "Although EPA might prefer market-based methods of controlling pollution, Congress has chosen a different course" with the NSR requirements.

State officials hailed the appeals-court ruling. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who led the states' action, called the ruling "an enormous victory for clean air and for the enforcement of the law and an overwhelming rejection of the Bush administration's efforts to gut the law." He said the ruling will encourage industry to build new and cleaner facilities "instead of prolonging the life of old dirty plants." Mr. Spitzer's office estimates that the decision covers about 800 power plants and as many as 17,000 industrial sites nationwide.

The ruling Friday overturns a regulatory change, made by the Bush administration, that was designed to clarify the EPA's requirements for construction projects at power plants and refineries. The Clinton administration had begun suing owners of older, coal-fired plants and oil refineries, alleging that they were secretly overhauling them under the guise of "routine maintenance" and that they were essentially new plants subject to tighter air-emission restrictions.

John Millett, a spokesman for EPA, said: "We are disappointed that the court did not find in favor of the United States. We are reviewing and analyzing the opinion and cannot comment further at this time."

Scott Segal, a lawyer representing a group of coal-fired utilities, called the ruling "a step backward for the protection of air quality in the United States." He noted, however, that the decision doesn't undermine the defense that electric utilities have mounted against the lawsuits brought by the Clinton administration. Several of those cases are still under review by federal courts. The environmental community's victory, Mr. Segal said, amounted to "the ability to place roadblocks in front of energy-efficient projects. This is terrible news."

DOJ_NMG_0019328

Vickie Patton, a lawyer for Environmental Defense, a New York-based environmental group, said the ruling "firmly rejects EPA's attempt to adopt damaging air-pollution loopholes for thousands of industrial sources across the country." She called for new legislation that would "end the parade of loopholes, exemptions and rollbacks."

The rule has been among the most hotly contested regulations of the Bush administration, with environmental groups saying it amounts to a rollback of the Clean Air Act and companies arguing that they needed the rule to give them more certainty on construction projects.

In October 2003, 14 states, a number of cities and environmental groups filed to block the rules from going into effect. The appeals court had issued a stay in December 2003, preventing utilities and industrial facilities from taking advantage of the change.

U.S. Court Blocks EPA Standard On Modernizing Plants, Factories (BLOOM)

By Bill Arthur

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- A U.S. appeals court ruled that the Environmental Protection Agency can't make it easier for power plants, factories and refineries to avoid installing pollution controls when they replace aging equipment.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit sided with 15 states and three cities that said a rule issued by the EPA in 2003 violated the Clean Air Act. The federal law requires plants undergoing ``any physical change" that would increase their pollution discharges to install the best available control technology.

The EPA's rule, which wasn't enforced during the lawsuit, interpreted the law to let plants install new equipment without including pollution-control devices as long as the new installation cost less than 20 percent of the plant's value.

Such an interpretation would produce a ``strange" result in which a law intended to limit increases in air pollution would allow plants ``to increase significantly the pollution they emit without government review," the court ruled today.

``The decision is a major victory for clean air and public health," New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer said in a statement. ``It will encourage industry to build new and cleaner facilities instead of prolonging the life of old, dirty plants." New York was one of the states that sued the EPA over the rule.

John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said the ruling was a ``significant setback to business efficiency and, for that matter, environmental quality."

`Unnecessary' Delays

The EPA exemption would have benefited consumers and businesses by allowing ``power companies and manufacturers to upgrade their facilities and increase efficiency without undergoing unnecessary and costly delays," Engler said in a statement.

EPA spokesman John Millett said in an e-mailed statement that the agency was disappointed in the ruling and had no further comment.

Other states joining the lawsuit were California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin. Cities participating were Washington D.C., New York City and San Francisco.

Budget Vote Revives Bid For Arctic Oil Drilling (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

A last-minute deal to secure the vote of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) on a $2.8 trillion budget plan has given new life to the Republican drive to open Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

The budget blueprint for fiscal 2007, which will begin in October, includes a $10 billion Gulf Coast restoration fund that would be financed from the leasing of arctic refuge drilling rights, revenue from new drilling in the Outer Continental Shelf of the Gulf of Mexico and further sales of the broadcast spectrum. With that provision in hand, Landrieu cast the only Democratic vote for the budget resolution, which squeaked through Thursday night, 51 to 49.

DOJ_NMG_0019329

"It's not easy being alone on anything. I don't relish this position," Landrieu said. "But, at times, it's necessary."

Republicans, who have been trying to open up the refuge for well over a decade, hope that by explicitly linking oil drilling to Gulf Coast restoration, they can prompt some Democrats to drop their opposition. Under the Senate plan, the funds from oil leases could be used for coastal restoration projects in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama that have long been sought by environmentalists. The fund could also be tapped to rebuild levees damaged last year by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But it is not clear whether the political equation has shifted at all since December, when moderate Republicans -- led by Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) -- forced their leaders to take arctic drilling out of a 2006 budget-cutting measure to secure their votes. Bass has warned House budget writers that nothing has changed.

"We are all aware of last year's effort and outcome, and I don't see any reason why this year would be different," Bass told the House Budget Committee last month. Using the budget process to pass drilling "is a gimmick that must be resisted," he said.

The issue of arctic drilling has presented Republican leaders with a quandary for years. Majorities in both the House and the Senate support drilling, but the measure does not have the votes to clear Congress for President Bush's signature.

Lacking the 60 votes to overcome a filibuster, Senate leaders for two years now have tried to attach a drilling measure to a budget resolution. By doing so, subsequent legislation to open the arctic would be protected from a filibuster under congressional budget rules.

In the House, a bipartisan majority favors drilling, but when GOP leaders have attached the issue to a broader budget measure, Democratic supporters have abandoned the cause to oppose the budget.

The 2007 budget, which will be drafted by the House Budget Committee the week of March 27, is not likely to include an arctic drilling provision, but it is also not likely to include significant cuts to popular federal programs, a senior leadership aide said.

If House and Senate negotiators produce a final budget blueprint that includes the Senate drilling plan and excludes deep cuts, a sufficient number of House Democrats may be persuaded to support the budget to overcome moderate Republican opposition, the aide said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico's Attempt To Quell Drug Violence Falters (KRT)

By Jay Root

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico - The general who'd been in charge of Mexico's efforts to quell drug violence on the border with the United States hasn't been seen by officials here in weeks, and the program is in disarray.

Drug killings are on the rise, local news outlets have been cowed into silence, and evidence is mounting that members of two warring drug-trafficking cartels have infiltrated the program's elite anti-drug forces.

U.S. officials are concerned that the violence is crossing the border: Assaults on U.S. Border Patrol agents are up 108 percent this year, according to recent congressional testimony.

Mexican officials, recognizing that the Secure Mexico program had failed, announced a new program this week, dubbed Northern Border. Under the program, 600 to 800 more federal police agents were dispatched to this besieged border city.

But few expect that to make much difference, and drug traffickers weren't intimidated: On Thursday, they gunned down four federal police intelligence agents in broad daylight outside a school here. At least 30 shots were fired into the agents' bodies.

Adding to the confusion is the absence of Gen. Alvaro Moreno Moreno, who'd been in charge of Secure Mexico. Nuevo Laredo city officials and a Mexican diplomat on the U.S. side of the border said they'd had no contact with the general in weeks.

"I couldn't tell you where he is," said Eloy Caloca, a spokesman in Mexico City for the federal Ministry of Public Security, the agency to which Moreno reports. Asked who's in charge in Nuevo Laredo now, Caloca said: "I don't have his name right now."

The deaths of the four agents brought the number of killings laid to drug traffickers in this city so far this year to 50 in less than three months, a rate that outpaces last year's, when about 170 people total died in drug violence.

Statements Friday by Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for President Vicente Fox, suggest that efforts to get rid of corrupt city police officers have failed. He said preliminary evidence indicated that the hit men who killed the four agents were municipal police aligned with one of the cartels.

Experts see no end to the killings as long as the two cartels battle to control the distribution routes that lead into the United States.

"It won't be resolved until this war is over, until one of the cartels wins," said Jorge Chabat, an expert on U.S.-Mexico relations and border security. "It's clear that the (Mexican) federal government doesn't have the capacity to stop this wave of violence."

Mexico's federal authorities launched Secure Mexico last year after Nuevo Laredo's police chief, Alejandro Dominguez, was gunned down by suspected traffickers only hours after he took the job.

The Secure Mexico program was designed to weed out local police corruption and place all levels of law enforcement under the command of a single military official - Gen. Moreno.

But the violence has only become more virulent, often spectacularly so: Suspected drug gang members used a grenade to attack a newspaper newsroom here last month.

The Mexican government's new initiative is supposed to re-establish order. Authorities announced that they were sending up to 800 more agents from Federal Preventative Police, known by its Spanish acronym PFP. There already were hundreds here, but estimates vary wildly on the total number patrolling now.

But few are optimistic. "Last year there were over 170-something murders. I don't think anyone was charged or has been arrested in connection with those murders, and the majority of those were drug-related," said a U.S. official involved in drug enforcement who was granted anonymity because his agency doesn't allow him to speak publicly. "They've had the military employed at different occasions during those spates of murder, and they've continued to happen."

Meanwhile, Mexican media reports and public statements have raised questions about whether the PFP forces sent to restore order under Secure Mexico have been infiltrated by elements of the drug cartels.

In Nuevo Laredo, questions center on a Feb. 2 shootout in which armed bandits, in broad daylight near the police headquarters, attacked a marked PFP vehicle that was carrying a suspect, U.S. citizen Javier Escalera. The American was later handed over to U.S. authorities.

News accounts said two PFP agents were wounded. But since then doubts have been raised about whether one of the wounded men was really a PFP agent. Photos show him wounded, dressed in a PFP uniform.

But the man in the photos, identified as Mario Humberto Rodriguez Castillo, later fled Nuevo Laredo by bus toward the northern Mexico city of Monterrey. Along the way, he was attacked and shot again by armed assailants, according to Rafael Luque, a spokesman for the state of Tamaulipas. He survived, but his whereabouts aren't known.

Daniel Hernandez, Mexico's consul general in Laredo, said it's not unusual for law enforcement agencies to protect the identity and whereabouts of an agent who might be involved in intelligence. He also noted that corruption can be found on both sides of the border, citing the recent indictment of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are accused of taking $300,000 in bribes from smugglers to release immigrants from detention.

The violence has become a problem for Nuevo Laredo's businesses, said Jack Suneson, owner of upscale Marti's jewelry and crafts store in Nuevo Laredo. Noting that many businesses have relocated to the U.S. side of the border, Suneson said he might have to shut his doors after five decades of operation.

"No more promises. I want them to safeguard our city," Suneson said. "I don't know how much longer we can hold out. This is the third year we've taken a nosedive."

Root reports for the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Immigration Bill Would Target Bosses (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa

DOJ_NMG_0019331

AP, March 18, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist sidesteps President Bush's call for giving illegal immigrants temporary work permits in an election-year immigration bill the Tennessee Republican unveiled Friday.

Frist, who is seeking his party's nomination in 2008 to succeed Bush in the White House, said the Senate will turn to his proposal to tighten borders, punish employers who hire illegal immigrants and provide more visas if the Senate Judiciary Committee doesn't complete a broader bill in the next 10 days.

A clear majority on the 18-member committee has come out in favor of a "guest worker" program that would let employed illegal immigrants remain in the U.S. — at least temporarily — rather than be deported. The committee members agreed Friday to try to come up with a substitute for Frist's bill by March 27.

Bush — walking a tightrope between businesses that oppose deporting undocumented workers they've trained, and social conservatives who want all 11 million illegals in the U.S. deported — has called for letting those with jobs stay for up to six years.

The House passed a tough immigration enforcement bill in December that would make it a felony for illegal immigrants to be in the United States, impose new penalties on employers who hire them and erect fencing along a third of the U.S.-Mexico border. But it had no temporary worker program.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., faulted Frist's bill for not addressing what to do with illegal immigrants already in the U.S. "Countless businesses rely heavily on their labor and it's long past time to provide legal avenues to bring this underground economy out of the shadow," he said.

Frist's bill would:

_Require all employers to verify the identity and immigration status of their employees through an electronic system.

_Assess civil penalties of between $500 and $20,000 against employers for each illegal immigrant they hire and criminal penalties of up to $20,000 per illegal immigrant hired and up to six months in jail for engaging in a pattern of employing illegal workers.

_Add 4,400 Border Patrol agents over six years to the 10,000 Congress provided for in the intelligence reform law passed in 2004, and 1,000 more immigrant smuggling investigators over the next five years.

_More than double the number of employment-based green cards, from 140,000 to 290,000, and make more employment based visas available to unskilled workers. It also would free up other visas by exempting immediate relatives of U.S. citizens from being counted in the annual pool of 480,000 visas, and increase country-by-country ceilings on family sponsored and employment-based immigrants.

An Immigration Breakthrough (NYT)

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

The clock was running out on the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, and with it the chances for a meaningful overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. After weeks of work, the committee members faced a rigid deadline to get a bill ready before next week's recess. But about all they had agreed on were various ways to tighten the borders. It was increasingly likely that Congress's message to 12 million illegal immigrants would end up being this: Thanks for the help — now get out.

But in a startling pivot, so sharp you could almost hear it, a bipartisan consensus emerged in the hearing room. Senator Arlen Specter, the committee's chairman, endorsed the principle behind an earlier bill sponsored by Senators John McCain and Edward Kennedy: that illegal immigrants who met strict criteria and paid fines and back taxes should have a path to permanent residency and citizenship.

Mr. Specter said he was all for that, as long as the country first cleared up the backlog of three million foreigners seeking to come here through legal channels. The panel also neared an agreement on a related proposal to allow foreign guest workers to enter legally and earn permanent status. Mr. Specter said he wanted a comprehensive bill ready when Congress reconvened on March 27, the deadline set by the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, who has his own hard-line border-tightening bill waiting in the wings.

The blowback was instantaneous. Mr. Frist announced that he would be putting his own bill forward as an alternative to the committee's. Seventy-one House members signed a letter saying that the Judiciary Committee's actions were "fundamentally incompatible" with the House's strident vision of immigration reform, which completely rejects the idea of providing illegal immigrants any path to legalization.

DOJ_NMG_0019332

Mr. Specter often wilts under party pressure like lettuce in a broiler, but he has shown admirable resilience in working to get a comprehensive immigration bill to the Senate floor. His committee's emergent consensus, fragile but real, has finally pointed to a way out of what has been a bitter struggle between starkly conflicting visions of what America should do about immigration. For too long the debate has been hijacked by stereotypes. The recent waves of newcomers are not all potential terrorists living among us like pod people. Nor is every last one a model-citizen-in-waiting.

The chances of finally fixing the immigration system depend on Congress's recognition and acceptance of what President Bush has said for years: that immigration reform is about far more than border enforcement, and that there is a way to bring order and lawfulness to an unauthorized population without compromising the values and traditions of our robust immigrant nation.

Mr. Specter's compromise has wisely elevated the discussion by endorsing a balanced approach. That means making the borders more secure, trying to match the supply of work visas with the demand, and sending this message to the illegal immigrants who are already here: Come out of the shadows, and join your neighbors in making America a better place.

Ireland Asks Bush For Alien Amnesty (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

When the Irish prime minister urged President Bush yesterday to grant amnesty to illegal Irish aliens in the United States, he was just the latest in a line of foreign leaders to beg the president to relax immigration rules.

Before handing over a bowl of shamrocks in the traditional St. Patrick's Day ceremony involving U.S. and Irish leaders, Prime Minister Bertie Ahern asked Mr. Bush to push for a way for "current Irish immigrants to legalize their status in the United States on a permanent basis."

That sort of lobbying, which comes as Congress is debating what to do about illegal aliens and new temporary workers, has become a standard plea from foreign leaders meeting with Mr. Bush.

While some nations, such as Ireland and Mexico, want citizenship for their illegal alien nationals, others want the United States to lift the caps for temporary student or worker visas.

That was the request Mr. Bush heard earlier this week from the Slovak Republic's prime minister -- a message Mr. Bush told reporters was made "very clear" to him. And two weeks ago, in his joint press conference with the Indian prime minister during a trip to New Delhi, Mr. Bush called for an expansion of skilled worker temporary visas.

Speaking with Pakistani reporters before his trip to India, Pakistan and Afghanistan, Mr. Bush said he is working to loosen visa restrictions.

"We had a very restrictive visa policy right after 9/11," he said. "Our visa policy was a natural reaction to a terrible event that took place, but it didn't take me long to realize that we were missing a great opportunity to have students from Pakistan see the real America."

The issue is coming to a head in Congress. The House voted for an immigration enforcement bill in December. The Senate is preparing for a full-scale debate on creating a new guest-worker program and offering a path to citizenship to illegal aliens already in the United States.

Ireland's government has lined up behind the legalization plan of Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which is expected to receive a vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee in two weeks. It is unclear whether that plan has majority support on the Senate floor, and the plan is unlikely to survive a House-Senate conference because too many House Republicans say it amounts to amnesty.

Mr. Ahern said if the McCain-Kennedy plan fails, Ireland will then ask for specific consideration for Irish nationals, or what he called "an Irish arrangement."

Those calling for immigration restrictions said the amnesty President Reagan signed into law in 1986 was a failure, as it effectively prompted an increase in illegal entries.

DOJ_NMG_0019333

"We certainly have legal channels to get people like the Irish or whomever from any other nation to be residents or legal immigrants, but we learned our mistake in 1986 and it's not something we should be willing to repeat and encourage an even greater problem down the line," said Rikki Horton, who lobbies on immigration for the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

Even as Ireland pushes for more liberal U.S. laws, it is moving the other direction at home, including trying to find and deport aliens whose asylum applications were rejected. Ireland also has passed a referendum ending "birthright citizenship" for children of non-Irish nationals born in Ireland. That issue is proving contentious in the United States.

Also contentious, apparently, is the current U.S. status of Gerry Adams, leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party in Northern Ireland.

A New York congressman said yesterday that Mr. Adams was detained at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport after attending the White House event, the Associated Press reported.

Last year, Mr. Bush barred all Northern Ireland leaders from the St. Patrick's Day event to put pressure on Mr. Adams because of his links to the IRA.

Rep. Brian Higgins, New York Democrat, who had invited Mr. Adams to speak in Buffalo, told his audience last night that Mr. Adams didn't make it on time because he had been detained at Reagan Airport.

A spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration said she could not confirm that Mr. Adams had been detained. Jennifer Peppin said the TSA log showed no record of Mr. Adams' having been detained or subjected to secondary screening.

A Homeland Security official said Mr. Adams had left the Washington area, but he would give no further details.

TAX:

Judge Ties Up Tax Firm (SBCS)

By Stephen Wall, Staff Writer

San Bernardino County (CA) Sun, March 18, 2006

IRS claims $25M lost by fraudulent preparation in Rialto

RIALTO - A firm accused of preparing thousands of fraudulent tax returns costing the government more than $25 million has been barred from doing business by a federal court order.

N.C.K. Services and its three preparers - sisters Karen and Carla Berry of Rialto and Ivan Johnson of San Bernardino - are set to appear in court March 24 to respond to the civil complaint.

The three defendants are accused of preparing thousands of tax returns containing false and fraudulent home-mortgage interest deductions since 2001, federal officials said.

Calls to the firm's office at 2850 W. Foothill Blvd. were not answered Friday.

The total loss to the government as a result of the understatements of tax on customers' returns exceeds $25 million, according to an IRS audit.

The government claims the defendants systematically claimed fictitious home-mortgage interest deductions for their customers, even in cases where the customers did not own homes.

The complaint also states the preparers failed to sign customer returns as required by federal law.

"Immediate and irreparable injury will result" if the preparers are allowed to continue doing business, Judge Virginia Phillips of the U.S. District Court in Riverside wrote in her Wednesday ruling granting the temporary restraining order.

Phillips is scheduled to decide Friday whether a preliminary injunction should be issued against the defendants.

A preliminary injunction would prevent the firm from operating until the case

Advertisement

goes to trial, which is expected July 25.

Justice Department officials said the case is part of the federal government's increased effort to stop tax-fraud schemes.

Since 2001, the department has obtained injunctions against more than 160 tax-scam promoters and preparers of false or fraudulent returns, federal officials said.

"Tax-preparation fraud costs the federal treasury hundreds of millions of dollars every year," said Eileen O'Connor, the assistant attorney general for the department's tax division.

Officials warned customers to carefully review their tax returns and make sure they contain the preparer's signature and identification number.

"It's important to check the work on the return to make sure the numbers match your financial situation before you send in your return," said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. "People ought to be very suspicious and should have a red light go off if you hear you can always get a return if you go to x or y return preparer."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Politics Drives A Senate Spending Spree (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — The largess demonstrated by the Senate in padding its budget with billions of dollars in additional spending this week showed that lawmakers are no different from many of their constituents: they don't mind pulling out the charge card when money is tight.

Just hours after opening a new line of credit through an increase in the federal debt limit, the Senate splurged on a bevy of popular programs before approving a spending plan that was as much a political document as an economic one, its fine print geared to the coming elections.

Forced to choose between calls for renewed austerity and demands for more money, many Republicans joined Democrats in reaching deeper into the Treasury, leaving the party's push for new fiscal restraint in tatters.

Some of their colleagues said it was an open-and-shut case of nervous politicians ducking a tough spending stance to avoid starring in negative campaign commercials. Republicans in some of this year's tightest races — Conrad Burns of Montana, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island — all backed the chief budget-busting provision as they endorsed an extra $7 billion for medical research, education and worker safety.

Lawmakers, analysts and others said the Senate's reluctance to clamp down on spending was a natural result of an approach that fails to recognize a sharply changed reality. In some respects, the administration and Congress act as if the surplus that greeted President Bush when he checked into the White House is still in the bank, rather than recognizing that whatever windfall was available then was eaten up and more by tax cuts.

The reality is that the cuts, plus two wars, new domestic security needs, natural disasters and a big expansion of Medicare have left the government's account badly overdrawn with no prospect of getting it back in balance anytime soon.

The criticisms set out by many Democrats — that no real progress can be made in setting the nation's finances right until Congress proves willing to revisit the tax cuts and that the nation is failing to invest sufficiently in addressing its economic and social ills — do not receive much of a hearing in a Washington where Republicans are in charge.

"I think the critical flaw is the failure to adjust fiscal policy in the face of new circumstances," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan group that advocates reducing the deficit through spending cuts and tax increases.

Mr. Bixby and others say the Republican-controlled Congress and the Bush administration have shown a near total disregard for fiscal discipline, running up new debt.

"The problem we have had on the budget all along is a lack of adult supervision on the part of the White House," said Bruce Bartlett, an economist and author of a new book critical of Mr. Bush's economic record. "You can't blame members of Congress for looking out for their parochial interests. It is the president's responsibility to look out for the national interest."

With the president's influence on Capitol Hill slipping along with his poll numbers, it is unclear how much authority Mr. Bush could exert over lawmakers regardless. Senate Republicans showed no hesitation about bursting through the spending ceiling he set, adding more than $16 billion after eliminating some of his cuts.

DOJ_NMG_0019335

And while the House, which was considering $92 billion in emergency war spending and hurricane aid, rejected most efforts to increase that total, lawmakers did buy a few extras, including $50 million more for peacekeeping in Darfur.

Almost lost in all the budget and spending activity was that House and Senate negotiators continue to try to hammer out an agreement for new tax cuts that could cost an additional $70 billion over five years.

If Republicans in the Senate were motivated by a political calculation that this was not the time to close the fiscal taps, much less cut more deeply into domestic spending, they risked what some conservatives suggested could be a backlash from the right. Many strategists have warned Republicans that their core conservative supporters are demoralized by what they see as the unchecked growth of government.

John Kasich, a former Republican chairman of the House Budget Committee and devotee of balanced budgets who is now an investment adviser and author, said much of Washington had surrendered to the political impulse to please various voter groups with unbridled spending."

Republican leaders see it a bit differently. They point to nearly $40 billion in savings from social insurance programs they produced last year, an effort that took a tremendous amount of political effort. And an across-the-board cut shaved about $8 billion from current agency budgets.

They say they intend to hold spending for most agencies outside of the military and domestic security under this year's tight limits and will try to erase some of the Senate spending additions in negotiations with the House.

To do so, they will have to get around Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, who clamored for the extra $7 billion. Mr. Specter said that spending constraints had cut too deeply into health and education programs and that there was a strong show of support for the money — a majority of Republicans backed it.

Republicans also say they see a proposed line-item veto and new restrictions on pet projects as part of a rehabilitation program to kick their spending habit. While those initiatives may end some suspect practices, most see the savings as chump change in an era of $350 billion annual deficits and $9 trillion in total debt.

Serious fiscal worriers believe the only true fix can come from a bipartisan meeting of the minds that would put all federal programs on the table along with consideration of both spending cuts and tax increases.

"I've concluded this job is so big it can only be done if the two parties work together," said Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the senior Democrat on the Budget Committee.

But Mr. Conrad acknowledged that nothing substantive could get done in the short term, with both parties girding for November. As the Senate deliberations show, frugality is not an election-year budget value.

GOP Spenders Think Voters Dismiss Deficits (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Fiscal conservatives may be upset with increased spending, but Congress just can't say no.

WASHINGTON — For two days they marched past the huge marble fountain and upstairs to the terra-cotta and creamy-gold splendor of the grand ballroom at the historic Peabody Hotel in Memphis. There, flanked by the flags of more than two dozen states, four U.S. senators who hope to carry the Republican banner in the 2008 presidential election pledged allegiance to one of the GOP's most revered principles: fiscal responsibility — never spend taxpayers' money you don't have.

Less than a week later, the Senate's Republican majority overwhelmingly approved billions of dollars in deficit spending. Despite outcry from conservative groups that helped build the GOP majorities in both houses of Congress, the Republican spenders were undeterred, for one reason:

They're convinced that voters now care less about big deficits than they do about the things that increased federal spending will buy.

"Senators are betting that pandering to the public with billions in election-year promises will pay off more than they lose by cutting the fiscal conservatives in their own party off at the knees," said Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

That political calculation was behind congressional Republicans' support for the new Medicare prescription drug entitlement in 2003. And it drove Thursday's votes to raise the debt ceiling and approve more deficit spending.

DOJ_NMG_0019336

There is another reason that many congressional Republicans have drawn back from fiscal discipline: Two other elements in the conservative credo, support for greater spending on national security and determination to cut taxes, have left budget makers with little room to maneuver, and so significant budget cuts have become hard to make.

Some Republicans warned that the GOP could pay a heavy price for yielding to spending pressures.

Former Rep. Patrick J. Toomey (R-Pa.), who now heads the free-market-oriented Club for Growth, warned that "Republican voters are going to ask themselves, 'Why bother having Republicans in office?' " Senate Republicans have shown "absolutely no semblance of discipline on spending," said Toomey, adding that they have also failed to extend President Bush's expiring tax cuts.

"If they can't do either taxes or spending right, how do they expect Republicans to turn out in the fall to reelect Republican majorities?" Toomey said. "I think they're in … for a very rude awakening in November."

Democrats, long vilified by opponents as the tax-and-spend party, think they can turn the tables by calling the Republicans the party of borrow and spend. The federal budget, in surplus when Bush took office in 2001, immediately ran deficits that assumed record proportions.

Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.) told the House on Wednesday that he grew up with three principles: "Live within your means, pay your debts and invest in the future.

"This government under this leadership is doing none of those," he said.

He noted that the House approved a $92-billion emergency spending bill Thursday that provided $68 billion for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and $19 billion for communities struck by Hurricane Katrina. The bill passed handily, 348 to 71, with only 19 Republicans joining 52 Democrats in opposition.

The Senate meanwhile added $16 billion for a host of domestic programs, including health, education and heating assistance for the poor, to the $2.8-trillion budget for fiscal year 2007 that its Budget Committee had recommended. The budget passed on a scant 51 to 49 vote, with a lone Democrat — Mary Landrieu of Louisiana — joining 50 Republicans to form the majority and five Republicans voting no, mostly to protest the budget's call for legislation to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

"When it comes to fiscal discipline," said Executive Director Robert L. Bixby of the Concord Coalition, a budget watchdog group, "the gap between rhetoric and reality on Capitol Hill is as wide as the deficit."

Spending has grown more in Bush's five years in office than it did in President Clinton's eight, even excluding the boom in defense spending under Bush. Altogether, spending rose about 4% a year under Clinton and has risen 9% a year under Bush.

Despite this arithmetic, some Republicans think the Democrats will have a hard time convincing the public that they are the party of spending restraint. "It would be even worse under the Democrats," said Dick Armey, a former House majority leader from Texas who now is chairman of FreedomWorks, a group advocating lower taxes and less government.

And restraint may have lost some of its political appeal. The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, in its annual survey in January of what issues weigh on the public, said 36% of conservative Republicans rated the deficit a "top priority" — well below eduction, jobs, terrorism and illegal immigration.

"The deficit does not have the same resonance that it did through much of the 1990s," said the Pew center's Carroll Doherty.

Paying homage to fiscal responsibility is apparently still mandatory for Republican politicians who aspire to higher office, however.

Among those who vowed to curb spending last weekend when they addressed a combined meeting of the Southern and Midwestern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis were four of the party's leading presidential hopefuls: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Sens. John McCain of Arizona, George Allen of Virginia and Sam Brownback of Kansas.

All four, however, supported the final budget bill.

Some fiscal conservatives in the House were so furious at the absence of spending cuts to offset hurricane relief that they voted against the spending bill despite its defense funding.

DOJ_NMG_0019337

"I strongly support our troops," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas). "Successfully fighting the war on terror is our most important national priority. But another national priority is saving our children from a mountain of debt or unconscionable tax increases."

For other conservative lawmakers, local interests trumped ideology. Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) issued a statement Friday praising his chamber's vote, which made room for $235 million more for rural healthcare.

"While it is important to identify and eliminate wasteful and inefficient programs," Thomas said, "I also believe that we must support policies that work."

Mike Franc, a former House Republican leadership aide now with the conservative Heritage Foundation, said many Republican lawmakers, "as Ricky Ricardo used to say, have some explaining to do."

"It's an uphill battle for many Republicans to explain why, during an era when they control the House, the Senate and the White House, spending has been unleashed as it has," he said.

Testing Errors Prompt Calls For Oversight (NYT)

By Karen W. Arenson

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

As the College Board races to score the final 1,600 exams from its problem-ridden October SAT test, a string of recent testing errors around the country has college and high school officials, testing experts, students and parents asking with rising urgency, Who is watching the testing industry?

Spurred largely by the No Child Left Behind law, testing has exploded in recent years. Educators are now trying to measure factors like whether toddlers in Head Start know their letters and whether elementary and high school students are making progress in reading and math.

The states alone are administering about 45 million tests this school year.

And for students headed to college, there are the Advanced Placement exams, the SAT and the ACT.

The volume is stretching the $2 billion-a-year education testing industry, educators say, taxing its ability to draw up enough tests and score them quickly and reliably. The states are struggling to find experienced officials to provide quality control.

The resulting flurry of errors has educators and lawmakers calling for better disclosure and oversight. Some are even proposing a national agency like the Food and Drug Administration to regulate testing.

"We need accountability," said George F. Madaus, a research professor at the Center for the Study of Testing, Evaluation and Educational Policy at Boston College. "I certainly wouldn't get rid of testing, but we need to be much more aware than we are now about the shortcomings, the limitations and the fallibility of the technology."

The past few weeks have shown the range of the problems. The College Board's disclosure that at least 4,600 students out of 495,000 who took its October SAT test had scoring errors was followed this week by an $11 million settlement by the Educational Testing Service of a case involving scoring errors for 27,000 people on tests that more than half the states use for teacher certification.

The Illinois superintendent of education, Randy J. Dunn, threatened last week to recommend ending the state's $44.5 million five-year contract with Harcourt Assessment because state tests were delivered late with misprints and collating errors. (He later backed away.) And New York State said this week that its seventh- and eighth-grade math tests had several questions that had been in test preparation materials.

"All of these tests have errors," said John Katzman, chairman and founder of the Princeton Review, a test-coaching company that has benefited from the testing boom. "The questions might be flawed in some way. The scoring might be flawed. The administration is often flawed."

A large part of the problem, policy makers and educators say, is that the demand for tests is outstripping the abilities of the industry, and testing and scoring quality have deteriorated. Adding to the pressure, each state has its own specifications.

Robert L. Linn, a professor emeritus at the University of Colorado at Boulder who serves on a College Board advisory committee, said that problems like those with the October SAT were not uncommon in testing.

DOJ_NMG_0019338

"These things happen now and then in a lot of testing programs," Dr. Linn said. "But there are too many now; the industry is stretched pretty thin." He added, "It's pretty clear, I guess, that the quality-control issues need to be looked at again."

In a recent study for EducationSector, a new education research organization, Thomas Toch, the group's co-director, found that the high stakes of the No Child Left Behind law, which sanctions schools that do not improve, had states trying to administer tests as late as possible so children had the most time to prepare. But they still want scoring completed in time for summer school placement, giving companies little turnaround time.

Mr. Toch said states were having trouble recruiting and retaining experts, leaving testing companies largely responsible for their own quality control. Companies, too, are struggling with these demands.

"They get so little money for these contracts that they are hard pressed to hire all the people they need to do this immense amount of work without making mistakes," he said.

Joyce E. Karon, a member of the Illinois State Board of Education, said that although she believed Harcourt was "a reliable company," like other test providers, it was "working at the brink, and when you work at the brink, things happen."

Mrs. Karon said that before the board chose Harcourt, it asked other states whether they had experienced problems. "Almost universally," she said, "they had all had some problems."

Rick Blake, a spokesman for Harcourt Assessment, said the company regretted the hardship that the problems had created for Illinois and was working to ensure that the rest of the testing went "smoothly and without further delay."

Still, as the pressure for more tests intensifies, testing experts and policy makers are beginning to weigh whether more oversight is needed.

One suggestion would require that testing problems be reported publicly. W. James Popham, an emeritus professor at the University of California at Los Angeles, said that more exposure might help. "Frankly, because it is in the best public-relations interest of both the scoring service and the state officials who hire them, many scoring muck-ups are masked," Dr. Popham said.

One step toward disclosure could come from the inspector general of the federal Education Department, who is planning to study what states are doing about errors and whether there is need for federal oversight.

Another approach being suggested by Mr. Toch, Dr. Madaus and others is to have some kind of auditor or oversight board, an independent entity or a federal body. "There are all kinds of things in society that get monitored," Dr. Madaus said. "Nobody is seriously looking over the shoulder of those testing programs."

But some in the industry say regulation is unnecessary and will raise the price of testing. "When something like this occurs, you want to make sure you don't create regulations or ways of doing things that increase costs and don't improve the quality of service," said Gaston Caperton, the College Board president.

Kenneth P. LaValle, the New York State senator responsible for the state's 1979 Truth in Testing law mandating disclosure, said he believed more disclosure of test questions and answers might be needed.

"We are now living in a testing culture," said Mr. LaValle, Republican of Long Island. "We need accuracy and security and all these things."

Some counselors are urging college-bound students to pay extra to obtain answers after a test is administered to check their own performance, and for hand scoring.

Eugene Falik, a computer specialist in Far Rockaway, N.Y., said that after his daughter signed up recently for an Advanced Placement exam, he spotted the hand-scoring option. "The clear implication is that these marked sense sheets, or optical mark readers, are not reliable," Mr. Falik said.

More colleges have stopped requiring the SAT. Joanne V. Creighton, president of Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts, said she felt her college's decision five years ago to make the tests optional was reinforced when she learned of the SAT scoring errors. She said the college had found this made "no measurable difference" in quality.

But others say testing is a crucial tool. Richard P. Mills, education commissioner in New York State, said recent problems had not changed his mind about the usefulness of testing. "It can be done right," Mr. Mills said. "Does that mean it's flawless? No. Errors crop up. No error is acceptable. But testing is indispensable."

'Teach To The Test'? What Test? (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0019339

By Colman Mccarthy

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

From the academic sidelines, where calls to Leave No Child Untested are routinely sounded by quick-fix school reformers, Jay Mathews joins in with his Feb. 20 op-ed column, "Let's Teach to the Test." In well-crafted prose, he reports that "in 23 years of visiting classrooms I have yet to see any teacher preparing kids for exams in ways that were not careful, sensible and likely to produce more learning."

On Mathews's visit to my classroom four years ago -- at School Without Walls, where I have been volunteering since 1982 -- he must not have noticed that not only was I not preparing my 28 students for tests but that I regard tests as educational insults. At School Without Walls and two other high schools where I am a guest teacher -- Wilson High School in the District and Bethesda-Chevy Chase High School in lower Montgomery County -- I have never given a test. I respect my students too much to demean them with exercises in fake knowledge.

Tests represent fear-based learning, the opposite of learning based on desire. Frightened and fretting with pre-test jitters, students stuff their minds with information they disgorge on exam sheets and sweat out the results. I know of no meaningful evidence that acing tests has anything to do with students' character development or whether their natural instincts for idealism or altruism are nurtured.

I have large amounts of evidence that tests promote the opposite: character defects. After having two of my high school classes read Mathews's column, I asked the students: If during a test the opportunity came to cheat, with no fear of being caught, would you? A majority of hands went up. A few students dismissed the question as naive. Not cheat if you could get away with it? Get real. When speaking at high school assemblies, I ask students how many can raise their hands and say with total honesty that they never cheated in school. Few hands go up. If some brave souls do confess to honesty, they are greeted with jeers or calls of "yeah, right."

Standardized tests measure braininess and memory skills. American society has plenty of people who were academic whizzes in high school but were so driven by the lure of a high grade-point average that their spiritual lives remained stunted. I worry about students who make too many A's. What parts of their inner lives are they sacrificing to conform to someone else's notion that doing well in tests means doing well in life? Is any time left over from mastering theoretical knowledge for gaining the kind of experiential knowledge found in community service or volunteering in programs such as Special Olympics or DC Reads?

Desire-based learning happens when teachers deal in combustibles, when fires are lit and students burn to explore ideas that have nothing to do with what testocrats require. Quality teachers who are fire-lighters often find themselves trapped in schools that have been seduced by the Advanced Placement fad. Teachers whose students can't hack the AP final are regarded as failures.

School principals get hammerlocked also. They watch teachers' performance the way teachers watch students' performance. A hierarchy results. Most everyone is fearful of someone in power right above. Students worry about teachers, teachers worry about principals, principals worry about school boards, school boards worry about politicians and politicians worry about the voters.

Before riskily breaking ranks with an innovation or two that might actually eliminate fear in the classroom, a deviator must ask: Will I be whacked by that power-wielder just above me? Caution reigns.

To compensate for my no-testing policy, I assign tons of homework. The assignments? Tell someone you love him or her. Do a favor for someone who won't know you did it. Say a kind word to the workers at the school: the people who clean the toilets, cook the food, drive the buses and heat the buildings. And a warning: If you don't do the homework, you'll fail. You'll fail your better self, you'll fail to make the world better, you'll fail at being a peacemaker.

For 25 years of testing the waters by not testing, I've been telling my students not to worry about answering questions. Be braver and bolder: Question the answers. Which answers? To start, the ones from anyone who champions classroom get-aheadism based on test scores. Throw off your chains, students. You have nothing to lose but your backpacks.

The writer, a former Post columnist, directs the Center for Teaching Peace and teaches nonviolence at three high schools and four universities.

DOJ_NMG_0019340

April May Bring New Medicare Drug Problems (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, March 18, 2006

Many elderly and disabled Americans enrolled for the Medicare drug benefit will face new difficulties in obtaining their medicines on April 1, say advocacy groups familiar with the program.

On that date, insurers will have more latitude to tell pharmacists that they won't pay for a particular drug. Before that, insurers have been told that they should pay for a prescription even if it's not on the list of drugs they cover.

"I think that, after April 1, you're going to see huge problems with access. It's going to be January 1 all over again," said Tom Clark, policy director at the American Society of Consultant Pharmacists. The association represents pharmacists who serve nursing homes.

Government officials said the Medicare drug benefit covers most of the drugs commonly used by seniors and the disabled. They say beneficiaries who take those drugs will have nothing to worry about come April 1.

And, if beneficiaries find that their drugs are not on a plan's list of drugs covered, often referred to as the formulary, then they usually will have access to substitute medicines. The poorest beneficiaries can switch plans at any time.

"What we're requiring is that the formularies all must be broad, all must meet our stricter-than-usual requirements, plus there must be a timely way for beneficiaries to get an exception," said Mark McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

McClellan said he has heard from some insurers who plan to make the transition easier by gradually restricting which drugs customers can get, rather than doing it all at once on April 1. Insurers put in place such restrictions to move patients into safer drugs, as well as cheaper drugs that save the company money.

Many insurers are also sending customers letters to let them know when their drug is not covered, McClellan said.

Still, McClellan was not as resolute in countering the warnings as he had been in December before to the program's startup. Then, he aggressively contested concerns raised by the Government Accountability Office that some poor and disabled beneficiaries would have trouble getting their medicine.

"CMS has significant concerns about the GAO's finding," McClellan had said in his reply to the government's auditors. "These individuals will get effective, comprehensive prescription drug coverage when the new Medicare prescription drug benefit begins."

That did not turn out to be the case for hundreds of thousands of poor senior citizens who were not properly enrolled in the program. They faced delays in getting their medicine or were charged higher out-of-pocket costs than they should have been.

McClellan said the issues now are different. In January, the main problem was getting people enrolled in the program properly. Now, it's about making sure that insurers do what they said they would do in setting up their appeals process.

McClellan said the government would monitor insurers in April to make sure they respond quickly to patients who ask to continue taking a particular drug not covered by a plan.

For urgently needed drugs, plans are required to act within a day. If patients lose that appeal, they can then take their case to an independent reviewer.

"Because we are tracking plan wait times on call lines, because we're tracking complaints, we will take prompt enforcement actions," McClellan said.

Vicki Gottlich, senior policy attorney for the Center for Medicare Advocacy Inc., said she's concerned that the poorest of senior citizens and the disabled would again have the most significant problems on April 1.

Often, those beneficiaries were automatically enrolled into a drug plan, and they will have no idea until next month that their medicine is not covered.

"To be honest, we've been talking to CMS, and I got the sense they thought this was an issue," Gottlich said.

The Center for Medicare Advocacy has been critical of the drug program. Gottlich said the organization has heard stories of clients with numerous drugs not covered by their drug plans.

DOJ_NMG_0019341

Another advocacy group that has criticized the program, the Medicare Rights Center, said it's hearing complaints that people calling to appeal coverage restrictions have been put on hold for more than an hour. In other cases, customer service representatives promise to call back but never do.

"The plans make it difficult for patients and doctors to navigate the appeals process," the group said.

___

On the Net:

Official Medicare site: http://www.medicare.gov

Center for Medicare Advocacy: http://www.medicareadvocacy.org/

Health Secretary: Costs Too High (PPG)

By Christopher Snowbeck

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 18, 2006

The Pittsburgh region is contributing to health care innovations, but it also is the 13th costliest market in the country for people buying health care services, says Michael Leavitt, secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

During a breakfast talk yesterday with the Pittsburgh Technology Council at the Sheraton Station Square, Mr. Leavitt called for a variety of reforms to help tame health care costs. The situation in Pittsburgh, he said, exemplifies the broad challenge with health care in the country: No one wants to go without advanced treatments that people rightly regard as "priceless," yet health care comes a price -- one that's increasingly difficult for society to afford.

"This isn't just about debits and credits, it's about human lives," Mr. Leavitt said. "[But] we've got to find ways to reconcile priceless with pricey."

Speaking to about 100 people, Mr. Leavitt reiterated a pledge made earlier this week to publish the prices Medicare pays for common procedures, which would help individuals shop more smartly for care. The lack of good pricing information is one of the key problems with the move toward high-deductible health plans that feature Health Savings Accounts, another Bush administration initiative.

What's more, the current system is "saturated with inefficiency" and suffers from "poorly-aligned incentives," he said.

A focus on getting more value out of the system is important, he said, because the current rate of growth in health care spending can't be sustained.

Health care currently accounts for 16 percent of the gross domestic product, and its share is expected to increase to 20 percent by 2015. Spending in the Medicare program alone accounts for 3.4 percent of GDP today, Mr. Leavitt said, adding that spending for that single program is projected to consume 14 percent of GDP by 2070.

"It can't happen," Mr. Leavitt said, noting the impact of health care costs on the competitiveness of U.S. businesses. "We'll either change, or we'll have been eliminated from the competition."

Congress Backs Off From Lobbying Limits (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - With the spotlight turned elsewhere, Republicans this week backed off their vow to crack down on the relationship between lobbyists and Washington politics.

A proposal offered by House Republicans late Thursday would suspend privately financed travel for members of Congress only until this year's congressional elections and would put off a decision on a permanent ban of travel, meals or other gifts until after the elections.

It would require lobbyists to disclose their activities more frequently, but offered only occasional audits to ensure compliance with no additional people or resources to enforce the rules.

It wouldn't do anything to limit pork-barrel spending, as some had urged, or ban those lobbyists who are former members of Congress from mingling with current lawmakers on the House floor or in the House gym. And it wouldn't lengthen the period in which former members of Congress or their staffs are prohibited from lobbying their former colleagues.

DOJ_NMG_0019342

All the proposed new regulations stopped short of those offered weeks earlier when congressional leaders rushed to embrace reform in the wake of the political fallout from the scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., who put the proposal together, called it "real reform." Outside analysts said it passed the buck.

"The House is taking baby steps that will be ineffective in preventing future Abramoff-style scandals," said Joan Claybrook, president of the watchdog group Public Citizen.

"Their interest is waning because the public's interest is waning," said Roberta Baskin, executive director of Center for Public Integrity, another Washington watchdog group.

In January, congressional leaders promised aggressive new regulations to assure the public that the government would never be influenced and tarred again by free-spending lobbyists like Abramoff. Republicans, in particular, feared a backlash that could hurt them in the fall elections.

Leading the reform charge, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., urged permanently banning members of Congress from accepting privately financed trips on corporate jets, overseas junkets and gifts worth more than $20, such as meals or tickets to sporting events. It was necessary, he said at the time, "to regain the trust of the American people."

He also wanted to consider banning pork-barrel spending, or "earmarks," and stripping former members of their visiting privileges on the House floor or in the House gym if they became lobbyists.

Since then, however, Hastert has found Republicans and Democrats reluctant to stop all interaction with lobbyists.

First, members privately groused to Hastert that he was going too far. Then, House Republicans elected Rep. John Boehner of Ohio as their new majority leader, rejecting the bid of Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, who promised a tougher crackdown on lobbying.

"This is a very difficult process when you begin to look at changing the rules in terms of the way we do business," Boehner said this week. "You know, the Senate started on it, looked like it was moving pretty well, but they've got their own issues that are bogging them down."

A key reason is that the public's attention has turned elsewhere to stories such as the possible turnover of some U.S. port operations to a foreign company and the vice president's accidental shooting of a friend. That took the heat off of Congress, at least temporarily.

A recent survey by the Pew Research Center found that fewer than one out of five Americans still followed the lobbying scandal story closely.

Yet public interest could rise again. "There will be other indictments. Just stand by," cautioned Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who hopes to offer a bipartisan set of new regulations on lobbyists and politicians.

And if the public tunes back in, it could find at least some of the Washington response to the scandal wanting.

A recent bipartisan survey, the Battleground Poll, found broad public support for many possible new regulations, including one that was offered by the Republicans and many more that weren't proposed:

The deepest support, 87 percent, was for greater disclosure by lobbyists about their work and their contacts with the government. The Republican proposal would require lobbyists to file more detailed reports more frequently.

Other popular reforms weren't in the plan, however, including:

-Broader ban on gifts, supported by 79 percent.

-Lengthening the lobbying ban for former members of Congress or their staffs from one year to two years, supported by 75 percent.

-Banning lobbying on the House floor and in House gym, supported by 67 percent.

-A broader travel ban, supported by 67 percent.

-Ending earmarks, supported by 59 percent.

Even before the proposal was unveiled, Republican pollster Ed Goeas said the survey offered a road map to political success - if it were followed.

But Baskin, of the Center for Public Integrity, noted that Congress has resisted such advice in the past. She recalled that the first proposal to ban members-turned-lobbyists from the House floor was made in 1897 -and that it's been rejected ever since.

DOJ_NMG_0019343

"The way it works in Washington, lobbyists have tremendous power," she said. "And they will continue to as Congress backs off from all the verbiage about cracking down."

House GOP Leader Well Traveled (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Privately Paid Trips Total Half a Year

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio), who rose to power in the wake of a congressional lobbying scandal, spent the equivalent of nearly six months on privately funded trips over the past six years, according to a new study by a nonpartisan research group.

The Center for Public Integrity said that Boehner accepted 42 privately sponsored trips from January 2000 to December 2005. That put him on the road to other countries and "golfing hotspots," often with his wife, Debbie, for about half a year, "only nine days of which he listed as being 'at personal expense,' " the center said.

Boehner also flew at least 45 times on corporate jets owned by companies "with a financial stake in congressional affairs" from June 2001 through September 2005, the center reported. The corporations on whose planes Boehner flew included tobacco companies such as R.J. Reynolds Tobacco (15 times), UST Inc. (seven times) and Swisher International Inc. (seven times).

"Boehner is one of Congress' most frequent corporate fliers," Roberta Baskin, executive director of the center, said, based on a review of other lawmakers' disclosure forms.

The report is the most detailed and comprehensive look at the new majority leader. Boehner, who was elected to the post last month, had been criticized by lawmakers who opposed his elevation for being too close to lobbyists.

Boehner rejected that characterization and offered himself as an agent of change, especially on the issue of congressional ethics. The center concluded, however, that Boehner built "a network of political and business relationships" with corporations and other interests "not unlike" his predecessor, Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), whose tenure in the job was controversial in large part because of his close ties to lobbyists and lobbying groups. DeLay stepped down last year after he was indicted in Texas on charges of political money laundering.

In the early debate over how to crack down on lobbyists -- a byproduct of the guilty plea in January of former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff -- Boehner had been a leading opponent of a ban on privately paid travel. One of his first public pronouncements after winning the second-ranking position in the House leadership was to declare his disagreement with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who wanted to end travel paid for by private interests.

Boehner pushed instead for enhanced disclosure of privately provided benefits including travel, meals and gifts -- the direction the House now appears to be taking in pending legislation. In the meantime, he has accepted a compromise that would ban privately paid travel this year until the House ethics committee devises new rules.

Kevin A. Madden, a Boehner spokesman, defended the lawmaker's trips as legal, proper and educational. He said Boehner's initial enmity toward a ban on privately paid trips was not because he has taken so many of them.

Rather, Madden pointed to the center's report as proof that disclosure works well. Madden said the study was possible because of the thorough disclosures Boehner made through the years and which he now advocates expanding. The center was able to detail Boehner's activities because his trips, "in each and every instance, were promptly and publicly disclosed according to law," Madden said.

"The fact that this report uses publicly available documents underscores Mr. Boehner's commitment to transparency and full disclosure," Madden said. "The entire approach of transparency and disclosure is so that groups like this one [the center] aren't the ultimate judge. The voters are."

Among the places Boehner traveled on privately financed trips were Edinburgh, Scotland; Venice; Brussels; and Barcelona, the center said. Two of his domestic destinations, which the center pointed out are famous for their golf courses, were Boca Raton, Fla., and Scottsdale, Ariz.

DOJ_NMG_0019344

The report said Boehner received more than $160,000 in food, lodging, transportation and other expenditures on his privately paid journeys. His benefactors included the Chicago Board of Trade, the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, CSX Corp. and the Sallie Mae Foundation.

The congressman also "hosted many high-end fundraisers to wine and dine potential donors and Republican colleagues," the center said. Boehner's Freedom Project political action committee, which he used to help fellow Republicans get elected to Congress, paid more than $119,000 for golf-outing fundraisers from March 2003 through the end of 2005, the center said. It also paid $25,000 to Duck Soup, the "unofficial band of the PGA Tour."

The same leadership PAC spent more than $87,000 on food, beverages and fund-raising costs at Sam & Harry's, a D.C. steakhouse popular with lobbyists, from 2001 through August 2005. It also paid more than $40,000 over two nights at Washington's Hard Rock Cafe, the center reported.

Boehner's spokesman said that those kinds of expenditures were commonplace for fundraising events.

Boehner's staff has benefited from corporate-paid travel. The congressman approved trips taken by dozens of his aides from his personal office and the staff of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, which he chaired starting in 2001. Over the past five years, the center said, his staff aides took more than 150 privately paid trips worth more than $200,000 to locations as far-flung as Japan and Europe.

Opening The Door On The Credit Report And Throwing Away The Lock (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

In a dozen states, legislatures have set up procedures for residents afraid of identity theft to lock and unlock their credit reports.

But credit-reporting agencies are pushing Congress to override the state laws, which could make it harder for Americans to keep their credit information under wraps.

Lobbyists for the big agencies — Equifax, Experian and TransUnion, owned by the Marmon Group — are seeking to add an amendment to the Financial Data Protection Act, a bill being rewritten by the House of Representatives. (A similar bill, S 1408, is working its way through the Senate.) While the wording has not been set for the bill, also known as HR3997, lobbyists for the credit agencies are pushing for a law that limits the ability to lock credit reports to victims of identity theft. Moreover, the reports could be unlocked with five days' advance notice.

Once a report is locked, an agency cannot release any of its details.

Consumer groups are upset that a federal law might supersede what has been done at the state level.

"Is Congress going to go soft on crime?" asked Abigail Caplovitz, legislative advocate at the New Jersey Public Interest Research Group. Her group thinks that a law it pushed through the New Jersey Legislature last year cuts down on identity theft because it makes it relatively easy and inexpensive for consumers to lock and unlock their credit reports. "Unless a credit freeze is user-friendly, it is useless because it won't be used," Ms. Caplovitz said.

Even if Congress does nothing, protecting credit information is going to become more complicated and inconvenient as more states pass laws that try to balance protecting consumers and protecting the credit-reporting industry.

Before we get to the advice, let's take a look at what is at stake here. The New Jersey law, which went into effect in January, permits any resident to freeze access to a credit report free. A thaw costs the consumer $5 an agency. The law also calls on the agencies to set up technology allowing credit to be thawed as quickly as 15 minutes after notification. Utah recently passed a bill, as yet unsigned by the governor, that would require the credit agencies, by 2008, to switch a lock on or off in 15 minutes.

The lag time is important because a three- or five-day delay could prevent a person from making a spur-of-the-moment purchase. Merchants may lose sales if they have to wait several days before they can verify a customer's creditworthiness. By then the consumer's urge to buy may pass — which, for some people, might not be such a bad thing.

Getting Americans to spend less and save more is not what the credit-reporting agencies are after. And there is no technological barrier that makes a quick unlock impossible. They are concerned that each state will have different rules and prices. That is already happening. Nevadans pay the most: $15 to lock and $18 to unlock. It is free in Illinois, Texas, Washington and Vermont, but only fraud victims can do it.

DOJ_NMG_0019345

The agencies also dislike laws like New Jersey's because they fear that making it too easy to lock a credit report may ruin their business in the way that the Do Not Call list decimated the phone solicitation business. The companies' main business is selling credit information to potential lenders, insurers and even employers.

The ability to turn credit reports on and off is a "false promise," said Stuart Platt, president of the Consumer Data Industry Association, the trade group that represents the credit reporting industry. He said it could damage an industry that has helped to reduce the cost of credit by helping lenders manage risk.

Locking reports, however, does not stop credit card solicitations. That can already be done by calling 888-5OPTOUT (888-567-8688). The ban lasts five years.

Congress will not take a vote on the full Financial Data Protection Act until fall. In the meantime, the confusion in the current system presents an opportunity for businesses to charge consumers who want to protect themselves. They have already scared Americans with statistics like, nine million Americans were victims of identity theft. Never mind that most cases labeled identity theft are simple fraud resulting from a lost or stolen credit card, according to Federal Trade Commission statistics. A consumer's liability is limited to $50 in those cases.

But the marketing campaigns seem to be working. Ten million Americans already pay about $100 a year to protect their credit information. In other words, it is already a $1 billion industry. Consumers will probably be paying more, though they don't always need to.

There are various levels of protection. Every year, a person can go to annualcreditreport.com for a free copy of all three credit reports or space them out over several months. There is no reason to ever pay for this service. Look it over for errors. (Making sense of credit scores, which determine your rate of interest, may be getting easier. This week, the three agencies said they had created a VantageScore, a single scoring system that each company will use.)

If you are worried about someone opening accounts in your name, you can call or write one of the agencies to put a fraud alert on your account. Each has the responsibility to alert the other two. The protection lasts 90 days. An additional 90 days are available but you will have to write to each credit bureau and ask. You have to keep doing this for as long as you want lenders to double-check with you.

When this fraud alert works correctly, lenders are supposed to take extra precautions before extending credit, but they do not have to do this. It could be a simple as asking for additional identification, but others may want to call you and ask for other information.

One drawback of fraud alert is that you may find it difficult to take advantage of instant-credit offers at stores. (Though this, too, might not be a bad thing. Opening too many lines of credit in a short period of time will harm your credit score.) Sometimes you may be denied credit because the lender does not want to go through the extra verification.

Another drawback is that while it is simple to sign up for a fraud alert, it is difficult to get off the list when you find it more trouble than it is worth. You have to make the request in writing and provide documents attesting to your identity.

An alternative is credit monitoring, but these services will cost you. TransUnion's TrueCredit offers three-bureau credit monitoring for $15 a month, while Equifax's Credit Watch Gold is $13 a month, also for three bureaus. A consumer is notified by e-mail after a new credit card has been issued or when a chunk of a home equity line of credit has been used. But after a while, those messages sound like the little boy who cried wolf and you might start ignoring them.

"They tell you after the fact," says Scott Mitic, vice president for business development at TrustedID, a start-up company that intends to take advantage of the confusion surrounding the protection of credit information. "It is this reactive system that irked us."

Mr. Mitic, a former executive with Fair Isaac, the company that created the formulas for computing credit scores, and Omar Ahmad, chief technology officer at TrustedID, were introduced on what they call an "entrepreneurial blind date." They discovered a shared interest in identity theft and they came up with a way to profit from it.

"No one will confuse the credit bureaus' customer service with Nordstrom's," said Mr. Ahmad, a former chief information officer at Napster.

DOJ_NMG_0019346

TrustedID plans to automate the process of locking and unlocking credit reports. When you want your credit locked or unlocked, for instance, when you intend to buy a car or apply for a mortgage, TrustedID will send the agencies all the paperwork and the fees and charge you $8 a month or $90 a year.

You could do it yourself for far less, especially if you live in one of those states where the service is free. But the company is counting on the process being so onerous that you would pay them to do it instead. Indeed, the notion that people will pay extra for the convenience of protecting their credit reports is so compelling that the company has attracted financing from one of Silicon Valley's top venture capital firms, Draper Fisher Jurvetson.

The bottom line: Those few people who have been victimized by identity thieves — not credit-card thieves — and continue to be vulnerable should take the extra precautions. For everyone else, all these services are just going to be one more hassle.

OTHER NEWS:

'A Strong Move Higher' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

March 17, 2006 4:57 p.m.

Fueled by renewed expectations that the Federal Reserve will ease off the interest-rate brakes, the Dow Jones Industrial Average motored higher this week, nearing a six-year high.

Friday, the Dow industrials rose 26.41 points to 11279.65 Friday, finishing the week with a 203-point gain. That left the average less than 60 points shy of its highest level since January 2000, when the dot-com bubble was in full bloom -- and about to burst. It was also the same month the Dow industrials hit their all-time closing high of 11722.98.

Those airy heights proved fleeting: By Jan. 28, the Dow industrials closed at 10738.87, shedding nearly 1,000 points in two weeks as investors started to doubt the foundation of the powerful move by technology stocks. Another factor that deflated stocks: a rate-lifting campaign by the Fed.

Analysts say this move is different. Strong gains by financial, energy and basic materials companies -- more resilient than the dot-com babies of the late 1990s -- have driven the latest rally. Indeed, the move up has come from big, blue-chip companies, while the Nasdaq Composite Index, which rose 6.92 points to 2306.48 Friday, has been sluggish. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, up six days in a row, added 1.92 to 1307.25.

The relatively solid underpinning of the gains has analysts forecasting more good things to come. "I believe this is the beginning of a strong move higher," said Ned Riley of Riley Asset Management. Investors who've been sitting on the sidelines will get drawn into the market as they see major stock benchmarks such as the Dow hitting multiyear highs, he said.

Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investments, said the market could pull back next week as it consolidates its gains, but thinks the rally could still have legs if economic reports over the next few months show inflation remains under control. "If you don't see evidence that either wages are building up or that there's a continuous buildup in manufacturing prices, the likelihood is that the Fed is going to stop" raising rates soon, he said.

One factor driving stocks Friday was the expiration of four types of futures and options contracts, a quarterly phenomenon known as "quadruple witching." Midday, more than one billion shares changed hands on the New York Stock Exchange -- more than one-half of the average day's total. Volume topped 500 million shares in the first hour of trading.

Treasury bonds declined, sending yields higher. The dollar fell against the euro and yen. Futures prices for light, sweet crude oil, which jumped Thursday amid news of a big military operation in Iraq, fell 75 cents to $62.83 on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Weighing on the Dow industrials Friday was the familiar sight of General Motors hitting the skids. The auto maker shed 4.9% after it said it was increasing its 2005 loss by $2 billion4 and that it intends to restate earnings dating back to 2000. The company also delayed the filing of its 10-K report with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

On the economic front, industrial output rose at a solid pace in February on a surge in utilities production and consumer-goods output. The Federal Reserve said industrial production, which fell 0.3% in January, rose 0.7% in February, better than the 0.2% drop forecast. A confidence measure put out by the University of Michigan came in at 86.7, below the 87.8 reading expected and unchanged from February.

DOJ_NMG_0019347

In major market action:

Stocks rose5. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,939 stocks rose and 1,464 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.6 billion shares traded, 1,581 rose and 1,434 declined.

Bonds fell6. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 8/32, or $2.50 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.674%. The 30-year bond fell 12/32 to yield 4.718%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar declined.7 It traded at 115.85 yen, down from 116.84 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.2196 from $1.2178.

Housing, Inflation Data Give Investors A Boost (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Bullish data on inflation and the housing market sent stocks mostly higher yesterday, with the Dow Jones industrials and Standard & Poor's 500 Index posting nearly five-year highs for the third straight session. A jump in oil prices moderated the gains, however, and the Nasdaq Composite Index finished lower.

Wall Street welcomed the latest report from the Labor Department, which showed consumer prices rising just 0.1 percent in February, far less than the 0.7 percent jump in January. Core CPI, with food and fuel prices removed, also rose 0.1 percent, down from 0.2 percent the previous month.

Combined with better-than-expected housing construction in February, investors were reassured that the economy continues to grow while inflation remains in check.

The Dow rose 43.47, or 0.39 percent, to 11,253.24, its highest close since May 22, 2001, when it finished at 11,257.24.

Broader stock indicators were narrowly mixed. The S&P 500 Index added 2.31, or 0.18 percent, to 1,305.33, its best close since May 22, 2001. The Nasdaq Composite Index slid 12.28, or 0.53 percent, to 2,299.56.

The Russell 2000 Index of smaller companies rose 0.85, or 0.11 percent, to 743.79, an all-time high.

Advancers outnumbered decliners by nearly 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Bonds mounted another strong rally, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.64 percent from 4.73 percent late yesterday. The dollar fell against most major currencies, while gold prices also fell.

Rising crude-oil futures eroded some of the major indexes' earlier gains. A barrel of light crude settled at $63.58, up $1.41, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Fears of a declining housing market eased after the Commerce Department reported an annualized 2.145 million new homes under construction in February, down slightly from 2.216 million in January but a better figure than economists had expected.

First-time unemployment claims rose again, with 309,000 new jobless forms filed last week, up from 304,000 the previous week. The rising trend, while troubling to the labor market, also reassured investors that consumers' spending power would remain moderate, lowering the risk of inflation and, in turn, rate increases from the Fed.

"Once again, we're seeing a reaction to soft economic data," said Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Financial Services Group in Philadelphia. "It seems to be the key to reducing worries about how aggressive the Fed is going to be going forward, which seems to be the catalyst for stocks here."

Ford Motor Co. rose 8 cents, or 1 percent, to $7.93 despite a Citigroup downgrade to "underweight" from "equal weight," or the equivalent of a "sell" rating. Citigroup said Ford was losing market share in sport utility vehicles and is seeing increased competition in pickup trucks.

Bear Stearns Cos. continued the streak of record earnings posted by Wall Street brokerage houses this week. The company's first-quarter profits beat analysts' expectations by 59 cents per share. After the session began, however, regulators announced a $250 million settlement with the company over improper mutual fund trading. Bear Stearns lost 94 cents to $133.27.

DOJ_NMG_0019348

ConAgra Foods Inc. fell 91 cents to $19.50 after the food producer announced a massive restructuring plan that includes the sale of its seafood and cheese businesses and would result in unspecified one-time charges for the rest of the year. The company also cut its quarterly dividend by 34 percent.

Barnes & Noble Inc., the nation's largest bookseller, surged $4.18, or 9.7 percent, to $47.40 after it reported a 6.3 percent profit increase in its fourth quarter, beating Wall Street's expectations, and offered an earnings outlook for the current year that is higher than what Wall Street had expected.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average tumbled 1.37 percent as investors there bid stocks lower in preparation for a possible rise in interest rates there. In Europe, Britain's FTSE 100 closed up 0.47 percent, France's CAC-40 fell 0.04 percent for the session, and Germany's DAX Index slipped 0.01 percent.

That would allow the economy to withstand further interest rate increases from the Federal Reserve, which is expected to approve another quarter percentage point rate rise when it meets March 28.

"The consumer price index rise was very modest. It suggests, as I think many of us have been forecasting, that inflation is in the process of moderating," said Hugh Johnson, chairman and chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors. "The good news is investors can feel somewhat more comfortable about monetary policy."

U.S. Stocks Rise, Notching Best Week In 2 Months; Boeing Gains (BLOOM)

By Hilary Johnson

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rose, closing out their best week in two months amid signs of steady economic growth and tame inflation.

A drop in oil prices helped the Standard & Poor's 500 Index and the Dow Jones Industrial Average advance to their highest levels since May 2001. Boeing Co., the largest U.S. aircraft maker, led the advance on demand for its 787 jetliner.

Stocks this week were aided by the biggest drop in bond yields this year and record profits from Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Bear Stearns Cos. and Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc.

``There's pent up optimism that the next couple of quarters should be OK for corporate America and the economy because the interest-rate environment has stabilized," said Jay Suskind, co-head of capital markets at Ryan Beck & Co. in Florham Park, New Jersey.

The S&P 500 added 1.92, or 0.2 percent, to 1307.25, climbing for a sixth consecutive day. The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 26.41, or 0.2 percent, to 11,279.65. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 6.92, or 0.3 percent, to 2306.48.

Almost four stocks rose for every three that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, the highest since Jan. 26. Trading was heavier than usual because of the expiration of options and futures contracts, known as quadruple witching.

The S&P 500 climbed 2 percent since March 10, the biggest weekly advance since Jan. 6. The Dow average gained 1.8 percent and the Nasdaq is up 2 percent. Data on consumer prices and retail sales, along with a regional business survey from the Federal Reserve, eased concern that inflation will drive the central bank to raise interest rates beyond mid-year.

Bond Yields

The yield on the 10-year Treasury note dropped almost 9 basis points, or 0.09 percent, to 4.67 percent this week, the biggest decrease since December.

Boeing jumped $1.12, or 1.5 percent, to a record $77.85 for the biggest gain in the Dow average. The world's No. 2 commercial-aircraft maker met with its top suppliers on March 14 and 15 to discuss boosting production, said a spokeswoman. Doubling 787 production may mean an extra $12.6 billion in annual revenue, based on top list prices for the plane.

Boeing's gain and a Fed report on industrial production lifted a measure of industrial companies to the best gain among 10 groups in the S&P 500, rising 0.6 percent. United Technologies Corp., the largest maker of elevators and air conditioners, gained 57 cents to $58.80.

Industrial Production

DOJ_NMG_0019349

Production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities increased 0.7 percent last month after decreasing 0.3 percent in January, the Fed said. The proportion of industrial capacity in use rose to 81.2 percent, the highest since September 2000, from 80.8 percent.

A separate report showed the University of Michigan's preliminary index of consumer sentiment for March was unchanged at 86.7 this month. Economists expected an increase to 88.

Crude oil for April delivery fell 1.3 percent to $62.77 a barrel in New York. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries lowered its forecast for world demand amid signs that surging U.S. supplies are sufficient to make up for a possible disruption.

General Motors Corp. weighed on the Dow average, losing $1.09, or 4.9 percent, to $21.13. The world's No. 1 automaker said its 2005 loss will be $10.6 billion, wider than the loss of $8.6 billion it reported. GM cited higher costs to eliminate workers and bail out its bankrupt former unit Delphi Corp.

Wall Street reported record earnings this week on increases in stock trading and takeovers.

Goldman, Lehman

Goldman climbed $2.67 to $150.36 today, extending its weekly gain to 6.2 percent. The second-largest securities firm said quarterly earnings jumped 64 percent to $2.48 billion, greater than it netted in all of fiscal 2002.

Lehman rose 0.5 percent to $142.80 this week. The fifth- biggest securities firm said earnings climbed 24 percent to $1.09 billion. Bear Stearns, the No. 6 securities firm, added 0.5 percent for the week to $132.87. Its quarterly results exceeded the highest analyst estimate in a Thomson survey.

Futures show traders kept bets the Fed will increase its main rate to 4.75 percent this month. The chance of a 5 percent rate at the meeting in May dropped to 73 percent from 90 percent at the beginning of the week, and traders erased bets on any increase in June, from 22 percent odds on March 13.

``We have a tug-of-war going on between earnings, which are reasonably good, versus the Fed, where people are trying to figure out are they still going to tighten or not,'' said Richard Bernstein, chief U.S. strategist for Merrill Lynch & Co. in New York.

Copper and zinc prices rose to records, leading a rally in base metals and boosting shares of Phelps Dodge Corp. and Southern Copper Corp. Phelps Dodge climbed $3.06 to $75.57. Southern Copper $2.38 to $83.89.

Accounting Issues

American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurer that has restated earnings twice in the past year, fell 42 cents to $68.82 today. AIG said fourth-quarter profit before some items was 14 cents a share, less than the 19 cents predicted by Mark Lane, an analyst at William Blair & Co. in Chicago. AIG also said it is trying to fix remaining flaws in its accounting systems by 2007.

Bausch & Lomb Inc. gained after the impact from its accounting problems proved to be less than feared. The maker of contact lenses and eye-care products, which plans to restate results for 2001 to 2005 due to financial misconduct in Brazil, said improper revenue practices at some other overseas units lowered sales during that period by $12.6 million. The adjustments are ``minor,'' said Suey Wong, an analyst at Robert W. Baird & Co. The stock rose $3.81 to $68.87.

Maytag, Sirius

Maytag Corp. fell $1.23, or 6.9 percent, to $16.71 for the steepest drop in the S&P 500. The Justice Department may fight Whirlpool Corp.'s proposed $1.68 billion purchase of its rival, on concern the deal is anticompetitive, people familiar with the case say. Whirlpool spokesman Christopher Wyse and Maytag spokesman John Daggett declined to comment.

Shares of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., the No. 2 pay-radio company, jumped 38 cents to $4.89. The company said it signed an exclusive 5-year agreement for Volkswagen AG to put its receivers in 80 percent of the carmaker's new U.S. cars starting with 2007 models.

Tektronix Inc., a maker of test equipment for electronics manufacturers, climbed $4.11, or 13 percent, to $36.70 for its biggest gain in three years on better-than-expected earnings. Fiscal third-quarter profit, excluding some items, was 37 cents a share, more than the 33 cents average expected in a Thomson Financial survey. Thomson does not provide the parameters of its estimates to Bloomberg News.

DOJ_NMG_0019350

Oil And Productivity Set A Positive Tone (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

NEW YOR -- A rebound in manufacturing activity along with declining oil prices helped Wall Street extend its rally Friday, lifting the Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index to fresh five-year highs for the fourth consecutive session.

The Federal Reserve reported that industrial production grew 0.7 percent in February after sliding 0.3 percent the month before, with the onset of cold weather driving an upswing in utilities output.

Stocks' gains were limited, however, as the day's news reports did little to address Wall Street's persistent worries about inflation and more interest-rate increases from the Fed, said Ken Tower, chief market strategist for Schwab's CyberTrader.

"I think the question the market is struggling with is whether we are concerned about inflation and too strong an economy, or if the Fed is raising interest rates too much and cooling things off," Tower said. "So we have a little pause in the market today as it tries to work this question out."

The Dow rose 26.41, or 0.23 percent, to 11,279.65, its highest level since May 21, 2001.

The S&P rose 1.92, or 0.12 percent, to 1307.25 , its highest close since May 22, 2001. The Nasdaq composite index rose 6.92, or 0.3 percent, to 2306.48.

Bonds cooled following this week's rally, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note edging up to 4.67 percent, from 4.64 percent late Thursday.

Crude oil futures declined slightly after OPEC cut its projected global demand by 110,000 barrels a day.

The market also weighed a mixed assessment of consumers from the University of Michigan. Its consumer-sentiment index for March came in at 86.7, unchanged from February but below economists' prediction of 88.

"One thing worth noting is that we saw several positive pre-announcements from economically sensitive companies," such as DuPont and Union Pacific, Sheldon said.

Analysts also said that while the Dow and the S&P 500 are pressing past multiyear highs, the Nasdaq is still about 30 points off its January record of 2331.36. Whether the tech sector can close that gap and contribute to the market's gains could determine how long this rally will continue, Tower said.Movers Viacom rose 60 cents, to $38.97. It is selling the film library of recently acquired DreamWorks SKG for $900 million.

Google rose $1.02, to $339.79, after saying it expects its 2006 capital expenditures to be significantly greater than the $838.2 million it spent last year.

General Motors fell $1.09, to $21.13, after saying its 2005 loss was $2 billion more than originally reported.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 9.69, to 8271.61.

American Stock Exchange index fell 3.89, to 1927.83.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 2.30, to 746.09.Volume

NYSE: 2.39 billion shares, down from 2.41 billion Thursday. Advancers outnumbered decliners by nearly 2 to 1.

Nasdaq: 2.51 billion shares, up from 2.38 billion. Advancers narrowly outnumbered decliners.Commodities

Crude oil for April delivery: $62.77, down 81 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $554.10 a troy ounce, down from $554.40 on Thursday.

Industrial Output Advanced Briskly Last Month (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Utility-Plant Production Surges to Fuel the Gains; Manufacturing Stays Solid

Industrial production expanded at a healthy pace last month, the latest sign that American industry is thriving.

The Federal Reserve reported Friday that industrial production in February at the nation's factories, mines and utilities jumped 0.7% from January, boosted by a surge in production at utility plants. Compared with a year earlier, industrial production was up 3.3%.

DOJ_NMG_0019351

Read the complete text1 of the Federal Reserve's report on February industrial production and capacity utilization, and analysis2 from Briefing.com.

On the surface, the showing was slightly weaker than economists had expected, due partly to declining auto production. In addition, February's output follows an unusually strong January, when manufacturing output expanded at a 10% annualized rate as factories along the Gulf Coast continued to come back online in the aftermath of last year's hurricanes. January's surge was "due for a pause," said Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI.

But economists found lots of positive news in the report, especially in the manufacturing sector, which is seeing year-over-year output expand at double-digit rates for some key sectors that reflect consumer spending and business investment. Overall, manufacturing output was flat last month, but was up 4.2% over the past 12 months.

"The manufacturing sector is solid," said Joel Naroff, chief economist at Commerce Bancorp. "We're still in the midst of a pretty well-rounded expansion. Consumers have been buying. Businesses have been investing. That's translating into more output" on an annual basis, he said. In February, manufacturing output "was taking a deep breather more than anything else."

The average capacity utilization rate -- which measures how fast industry is running -- rose to 81.2% last month from 80.8% in January. When utilization rates spike, busy factories compete for workers and materials, which could eventually put upward pressure on inflation. For now, though, economists said capacity levels aren't high enough to do so.

Within manufacturing, production was strongest among makers of computers and electronic products, where output rose 19% during the past 12 months and 1.2% last month. Economists pay close attention to computer output because it suggests that businesses are investing in new equipment. When business spending is rising, "it's a suggestion that businesses are doing well and they have a high level of confidence in the U.S. economy," said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Corp. "It shows you there is more breadth in the economic expansion than the consumer alone."

Breach Security Inc., a 38-employee manufacturer of data-security equipment in Carlsbad, Calif., is riding the technology-investment boom. The company's security device -- which sells for as much as $50,000 per unit -- works on computer networks to prevent hackers from penetrating corporate Web sites and also safeguards sensitive information. Last year, Breach Security sold 20 units, but it has ramped up production and manufactured 40 of the 50 units it expects to sell in 2006. Any business "with privileged information on the Web has to protect its customers and employees," said Marc Shinbrood, Breach Security's chief executive officer.

A housing boom has kept factories humming for makers of electrical equipment and appliances. Although the sector declined 1.7% last month following a 2.4% gain in January, production for the group was up 7.3% year over year. The category includes washing machines, refrigerators and dishwashers.

Whirlpool Corp., Benton Harbor, Mich., last month reported that its fourth-quarter net income rose 30% to $126 million. Roy Armes, senior vice president of the program management office, said sales are rising as consumers trade up to higher-quality appliances in new styles that emphasize modern design. Customers are willing to pay more for those goods, which include energy-efficient, front-load washers and stainless-steel refrigerators that resist fingerprints, he said. "We are entering 2006 with strong business momentum," Jeff Fettig, Whirlpool's chairman and CEO, recently told investors.

Last month, utility output increased 7.9% as the weather turned cooler and consumers used more electricity to heat their homes. Natural-gas production rose 12.9%. Spending on business equipment rose 0.1%. Meanwhile, production of cars and parts fell 0.8%, and textile production fell 1.3%, according to the Fed. Excluding autos and parts, manufacturing output rose 0.1% last month.

Separately, the University of Michigan's midmonth report on consumer sentiment for March held steady at 86.7, the same level seen at the end of February.

U.S. Economy: Industrial Production Rebounds In Feb. (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- Industrial production in the U.S. rebounded last month, led by utilities and computer makers, as a record increase in demand for power raised the risk of faster inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0019352

The 0.7 percent increase last month in production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities followed a 0.3 percent decrease in January, the Federal Reserve said in Washington. The proportion of industrial capacity in use rose to 81.2 percent, matching December as the highest since September 2000.

``You can no longer make the argument that there is a lot of excess capacity out there," said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``The bias on inflation is a little bit to the upside and the Fed has to be careful about that."

The lack of untapped capacity may cause factories to raise prices, prompting Fed policy makers to boost interest rates one or two more times, economists forecast. Higher borrowing costs and gasoline prices limited consumer confidence this month, a University of Michigan survey showed today.

The university's index of sentiment held at 86.7, reflecting a rise in Americans' perceptions of current conditions and a decline in expectations.

The Fed's report followed data yesterday that showed consumer price inflation slowed in February from a month earlier, suggesting companies are having limited success passing along higher costs.

The gain in February industrial production was led by a 7.9 percent jump in utility output as people used more electricity and natural gas to heat their homes.

Manufacturing

Manufacturing was unchanged, restrained by a decrease in motor vehicle production. Factories churned out more computers, semiconductors and communications equipment, reflecting an increase in corporate investment that will help drive economic growth.

``The big surprise here, though, is the unchanged manufacturing output, following four straight gains," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, New York. ``This looks like nothing more than a blip. The average gain in manufacturing in January and February is a healthy 0.4 percent."

Economists expected a 0.8 percent increase in industrial production, according to the median of 63 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey, following January's previously reported 0.2 percent decrease. Capacity utilization rose from January's 80.8 percent.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year note rose 3 basis points to 4.67 percent at 4:15 p.m. in New York. Ten-year notes still increased this week by the most since the period ended Dec. 16.

Interest Rate Futures

Interest-rate futures show traders kept bets the Fed will increase its key rate to 4.75 percent this month. The chance of a 5 percent rate at the meeting in May dropped to 73 percent from 90 percent at the beginning of the week, and traders erased bets on any increase in June, from 22 percent odds March 13.

Industries used 81 percent of capacity on average over the last three decades, according to Fed data. Higher-than-average operating rates increase the risk bottlenecks develop in the production process that will cause manufacturers to raise prices.

Work at factories, which accounts for almost 90 percent of industrial production, was unchanged after rising 0.8 percent in January. Production of consumer durable goods, which includes automobiles, furniture and electronics, roes 0.1 percent after increasing 1 percent the previous month.

Vehicle Production

Production of autos and parts fell 0.8 percent after increasing 2.4 percent. Manufacturing production excluding autos rose 0.1 percent after a 0.6 percent increase.

Business equipment production, which includes transportation and information processing equipment, rose 0.1 percent in February after increasing 1.2 percent the previous month. Production of technology equipment, such as computers, communications gear and semiconductors, rose 2.3 percent last month after no change.

Production of non-durable consumer goods, which include food, clothing, and paper products, rose 1 percent in February after falling 1.4 percent the previous month.

DOJ_NMG_0019353

The return of more seasonable temperatures in February also contributed to the production increase. Utility use slumped a record 11.5 percent in January, when the average temperature was the warmest for the month in over a century of record keeping.

Mine production decreased 0.5 percent last month after rising 2.3 percent.

Manufacturing Employment

Factories are hiring and boosting hours to keep up with demand from companies looking to expand operations. Manufacturers added 41,000 workers to their payrolls in the last five months and the workweek rose to 41 hours in February, 30 minutes longer than the average over the last five years, figures from the Labor Department show.

While U.S. automakers are struggling, foreign competitors are among those growing.

Toyota Motor Corp., the world's second-largest automaker, said this week it will build Camry sedans at Fuji Heavy Industries Ltd.'s U.S. Subaru plant, as the company rushes to add capacity to meet rising sales in the biggest auto market.

Toyota plans to make as many as 100,000 Camry automobiles annually at its factory in Lafayette, Indiana, with production to begin in 2007. In turn, Fuji plans to hire 1,000 workers and invest $230 million to upgrade the factory.

Inventories

Low inventories are also giving manufacturers reason to ramp up production. After sales jumped in January, businesses had enough goods on hand to meet 1.24 months' demand at the current pace, a record low, according to a Commerce Department report this week.

``We came into the year on the lean side'' in inventories, Abhi Talwalkar, chief executive officer at LSI Logic Corp., said in an interview March 15. The Milpitas, California-based maker of chips for consumer products and data storage devices had ``pretty strong growth'' in demand last year which is likely to continue in 2006, he said.

Regional surveys suggest factory activity gained momentum this month. Manufacturing in New York unexpectedly accelerated, a report this week from the state's Fed Bank showed. Measures of hiring, sales, and orders all rose. A similar report from the Philadelphia Fed showed total activity in the region slowed even as orders and sales accelerated.

The strength in manufacturing will prompt central bankers to raise interest rates one or two more times, economists forecast. Fed policy makers, when they meet in two weeks, are forecast to raise their target rate to 4.75 percent, according to the median estimate of economists surveyed by Bloomberg News. It would be the 15th consecutive quarter percentage point increase since they began raising the rate in June 2004.

Reduced Gas Price Slows Inflation (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Inflation slowed sharply in February as food costs moderated and the price of gasoline, natural gas and other energy products posted big declines.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that its closely watched U.S. Consumer Price Index (CPI) posted a tiny 0.1 percent increase last month after having jumped 0.7 percent in January. The slowdown in price pressures was certain to be welcomed at the Federal Reserve, which has been boosting interest rates since June 2004 to make sure inflation does not get out of control.

The number of Americans filing claims for unemployment benefits edged up to 309,000 last week, an increase of 5,000 from the previous week. Even with the slight increase, analysts said the level of claims was still signaling a strong labor market.

The third consecutive rise in jobless claims pushed them to the highest point in 11 weeks. However, analysts said they remain at a level that shows the labor market has rebounded from the blows delivered last year by the Gulf Coast hurricanes and surging energy prices.

The government reported last week that 243,000 new jobs were created in February, the strongest gain in three months, as hiring picked up across the country. Analysts are forecasting similar strong job gains in coming months.

DOJ_NMG_0019354

In a third report, the Commerce Department said that construction of new homes and apartments declined by 7.9 percent in February to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.12 million units, another sign that the nation's five-year housing boom is slowing.

Analysts had expected the February slowdown after housing had surged to the fastest pace in more than three decades in January, reflecting unusually warm weather during the month.

The CPI report showed that energy prices dipped by 1.2 percent last month after a big 5 percent increase in January. The moderation reflected a 1 percent drop in gasoline pump prices, a 2.8 percent fall in home heating oil costs and a 4.5 percent drop in the price of natural gas, which was the biggest decline in more than four years.

New York Congressman Won't Seek 13th Term (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert, a moderate Republican from central New York who became a national advocate of science and a champion of environmental protection, announced Friday that he would not seek re-election.

Mr. Boehlert, 69, who under party rules would have had to surrender his chairmanship of the Science Committee at the end of this session, said he believed he had recorded solid accomplishments in his current term and decided after 24 years on Capitol Hill that he was ready to step aside.

"It is just time," Mr. Boehlert said in a telephone interview before he made his decision public at an event in his district, which is centered in Oneida and Cayuga Counties.

"There are other things to challenge my free time," said Mr. Boehlert, a baseball fan who said he wanted to spend some time at the ballpark and more time with his family. "I'm not tired, but I would rather not work 25 hours a day, eight days a week."

Although Mr. Boehlert and Republican leaders say the party will hold onto the seat in November, his departure provides an added opportunity for Democrats who need 15 seats to gain control of the House of Representatives.

Amy Walter, who follows House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, observed that President Bush won the district with about 17,000 votes or 53 percent in 2004 but carried it by only 3,000 votes or 48 percent in 2000. "If this were a normal election year, you would give Republicans a bit of an edge," she said. "But between the reality of a bleak national political environment for Republicans and a weak Republican slate at the top of the ticket in New York, you wonder if Republican voters will be motivated to go the polls."

But Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, a New York colleague who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee, said he was confident that Republicans would keep the 24th District.

"Look, I would like Sherry to stay," Mr. Reynolds said. "But it is a Republican seat, and we will do fine."

Mr. Boehlert said he provided assurances to President Bush that the seat was safely Republican when he rode to New York on Air Force One with the president earlier this week, and he reiterated that view to Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. Mr. Boehlert is the 17th House Republican to retire this year.

A former Congressional staffer, Mr. Boehlert also served as Oneida County executive before he won the House seat. He compiled a liberal voting record for a Republican and has been challenged from the right in recent primaries.

In the House he was known for his willingness to challenge his conservative colleagues on environmental issues like the Endangered Species Act, automobile mileage standards and oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. His frequent breaks with the party would have complicated his efforts to win the chairmanship of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee had he decided to seek another term.

Mr. Boehlert said he believed that he could have captured the post, but that the panel's most important piece of legislation — the highway bill — would not be taken up again until 2009, meaning a decision to run again would have also meant a commitment to seek re-election in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0019355

Mr. Boehlert used his seniority on that panel to steer tens of millions of dollars in highway and transportation money to his district over the years, and he announced his plans on Friday afternoon at the Boehlert Transportation Center in Utica. "Some people outside my district might call it pork," he said, "but to me it is the lifeblood."

He said he considered retiring in 2002 but decided to stay to help prevent the closing of military facilities in his district. As the head of the Science Committee, Mr. Boehlert was a supporter of space exploration and helped lead the Congressional inquiry after the Columbia disaster. But he said he took pride in moving the scope of the panel beyond the space agency into a push for more science education and new energy technology while beefing up the academic credentials of the committee staff.

"We are still No. 1," said Mr. Boehlert, referring to America's standing against its international competitors, "but they are catching up fast."

N.Y. Republican Boehlert Won't Seek 13th House Term (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (N.Y.), a champion of space exploration and environmental causes who remained a moderate Republican as the House shifted rightward, said yesterday that he will not seek a 13th term this fall.

Another House veteran -- 14-term Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.) -- has scheduled a news conference for today to announce his retirement as well, the Minneapolis Star Tribune reported on its Web site yesterday. Democrats have some hope of replacing Boehlert in his Upstate New York district, whereas Sabo's solidly Democratic district is almost surely beyond the GOP's reach.

Republican term limits would have forced Boehlert, 69, to give up his Science Committee chairmanship next year. He had told hundreds of supporters in his home town of Utica that he would retire after 24 years as the representative of his district -- and 15 as a congressional aide to his predecessors.

Democrats hope Boehlert's retirement and President Bush's low approval ratings will give them a chance to win the seat, which the GOP has held for decades. Bush won 53 percent of the district's 2004 presidential votes while John F. Kerry drew 47 percent, and independent analysts say it still leans Republican.

"It's a difficult opportunity for the Democrats, but nevertheless an opportunity," said Stuart Rothenberg, who writes a nonpartisan political newsletter in Washington. "Democrats are going to need a wave there."

Democratic activists expect Michael A. Arcuri, 46, the Oneida County district attorney since 1993, to win the Sept. 12 primary. Republicans are looking to five-term state Sen. Raymond A. Meier, 53, to be their nominee. Rothenberg said Meier could be formidable because, as a mainstream Republican, he might enjoy stronger support from conservatives than did Boehlert, who often irritated his party's right.

In announcing his retirement, Boehlert said: "It is time. I feel like I've done it the right way."

Once a heavy smoker, Boehlert had heart bypass surgery in 2004. But insiders attributed his retirement largely to Republican rules that force most committee chairmen to step aside after six years. Other GOP veterans who have chosen to retire this fall rather than return to rank-and-file status include Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.).

Boehlert has been among the most liberal House Republicans for years. He has voted to raise the minimum wage and against a ban on a late-term abortion procedure. He supports stricter limits on carbon dioxide pollution -- a cause of greenhouse-effect warming -- than the Bush administration and many of his colleagues.

In 2001, Boehlert opposed an administration proposal to reduce the international space station's activities to allow only three astronauts to work there. After the space shuttle Columbia was lost in February 2003, he co-chaired hearings about the space program. He endorsed Bush's call for manned missions to the moon and Mars, but he said people should go into space "on a limited basis, on an as-needed basis."

Sabo, 68, has represented Minneapolis in the House since 1979, and he spent 18 years in the Minnesota House before that. He briefly served as House Budget Committee chairman before the GOP takeover of the chamber, which followed the 1994 elections.

Rep. Sabo To End His Long Career In Congress (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 18, 2006

The Minneapolis Democrat will retire one of the nation's safest seats for an incumbent, setting off a DFL scramble to replace him.

Kevin Diaz, Rob Hotakainen and Rochelle Olson Star Tribune Staff Writers WASHINGTON - Rep. Martin Sabo, a lion of Minneapolis DFL politics for four decades, is expected to announce his retirement today after 28 years in Congress, people familiar with his decision told the Star Tribune on Friday.

Sabo, who turned 68 last month, has scheduled a noon news conference in his Minneapolis office.

His departure is expected to set off a scramble within the DFL party for a replacement. Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, a professor of justice and peace studies at the University of St. Thomas, already has opened a campaign office and challenged Sabo at last week's precinct caucuses. And Michael Erlandson, Sabo's chief of staff and the former chair of the state DFL party, is expected to run.

"If the right situation arose, I've spent 19 years in public service and public policy, and such an opportunity would be the opportunity of a lifetime," Erlandson said Friday.

State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff also said Friday that they would run.

Sabo's departure comes as a big surprise, especially since he could have become a committee chairman next year if Democrats recapture the House in this fall's elections. He had been campaigning for another term. One person familiar with the decision said the congressman's decision had nothing to do with his health or that of his wife, Sylvia, who had breast cancer.

The people who said Sabo would announce his retirement spoke on the condition that they wouldn't be identified, because they did not want to upstage Sabo's official announcement.

Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak said he was stunned and saddened by Sabo's decision.

"There is no other politician who has had more of an impact on the character of Minneapolis, our roads, bridges, parks, schools," he said.

Rybak said that he met with Sabo two days ago in Washington and that Sabo said nothing about his retirement.

"He was the one single bright light in government who was always watching out for the city," Rybak said. "I am in awe of the man. He's one of those very quiet guys who delivers tremendously more than he would ever promise."

Sabo, who always took pride in his ability to deliver projects to his district, has helped Minnesota win tens of millions in dollars for the Twin Cities light-rail system and other transportation projects. Rybak said Sabo has an "enormous grasp of the big picture" and an "ability to get things done."

Minnesota now will have three of its 10 congressional seats open in the November election. Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton is retiring, and Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy is giving up his House seat to run for Dayton's seat. The last time Minnesota had three open seats was 1994.

Elected at age 22

Born in North Dakota, Sabo attended Augsburg College and was elected to the Minnesota House of Representatives in 1960 at age 22. He was elected House speaker at 34. He won a seat in Congress in 1978 and has consistently ranked among its most liberal members, a fit for his district, the staunchest Democratic district in the state.

Sabo, always soft-spoken and low-key, perhaps hit his pinnacle of power in 1993 and 1994, when he chaired the House Budget Committee, earning a reputation as a deficit hawk.

He has been a vocal critic of the Bush administration, consistently voting against the president's tax cuts, saying they were skewed to wealthy Americans. In an open letter to President Bush last month, he reiterated his opposition to the war in Iraq, asking the president how he can justify spending $5.9 billion each month on the effort. Sabo was one of 133 House members who voted against the war.

Even though the idea never went anywhere on Capitol Hill, Sabo vigorously pushed legislation that would cap tax write-offs when the pay for a company's chief executive officer exceeds 25 times the pay of the company's lowest-paid worker. In recent years, Sabo left a mark by promoting civil libertarians' concerns about airline passenger profiling. And Sabo, who was born to Norwegian immigrant parents, founded the Friends of Norway caucus in 1999.

Not fertile for Republicans

Sabo, Minnesota's longest-sitting legislator, has been a popular figure in Minnesota's Fifth District, one of the nation's safest Democratic seats. He won his 14th term in 2004 with 70 percent of the vote.

"Downtown Minneapolis is not fertile Republican territory," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

In Washington, Democrats have no worries about Sabo's seat.

"No matter what Congressman Sabo announces, we are 100 percent confident that Minnesotans will send a Democrat to represent them in Congress this November," said Bill Burton, communications director for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

University of Minnesota political science Prof. Larry Jacobs called Sabo's departure a changing of the guard.

"It really is the last link to the original DFL," Jacobs said. "In another way, it's a big loss for Minnesota because Sabo had so much seniority. If the Democrats ever had the majority again, it would have meant a lot of money for the state."

But Jacobs said it's certainly not a bellwether district: "I think of the Sabo seat as the United Republic of Social Democracy. I think of it as the most liberal seat in Minnesota. I think it will be an interesting scuffle within the party."

Sabo had come under attack from the left side of his party lately, with Nelson-Pallmeyer saying that he was a decent man but that he had failed to press hard enough for an end to the war in Iraq and for other progressive causes.

"I'm confident in the power of our message. ... The people are eager for a different kind of politics," Nelson-Pallmeyer said Friday. He thanked Sabo for his long tenure in Congress and urged him to stay involved: "There are ways for Martin to be helpful to the DFL without returning to Washington for another two years."

His departure will mean changes for the Democrats' baseball team in Washington. A huge baseball fan who follows the Minnesota Twins closely, Sabo had long played for and coached the Democrats in the annual congressional charity baseball game.

Sabo's office declined to say anything about his announcement. "He's holding a press conference and that's all I can say," Erlandson said. "I'm going to leave it at that."

Until Friday, Sabo had been expected to run for another term. He had set up a website, seeking volunteers for the "2006 Sabo team," telling his supporters that he needed help with parades, festivals, door-knocking and literature drops.

"I hope I can count on your support," he wrote on the site. "It would mean a great deal to me." Washington Bureau correspondents Greg Gordon and Aaron Blake contributed to this report.

U.S. Seen As Failing To Engage In U.N. Process (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Bolton shunned most talks on a rights council and his aides refused to negotiate, envoys say.

UNITED NATIONS — After being on the losing end of a 170-4 vote on the creation of a U.N. Human Rights Council, the U.S. is being criticized by many diplomats and human rights representatives here as having never fully engaged in negotiations over the matter and being unwilling to compromise.

Some diplomats said that if U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton had spent as much time lobbying at the United Nations as he did in Washington, the U.S. would have had a better result.

Bolton and other U.S. officials disagreed, saying they talked but that other nations didn't listen, and insisting they were right in trying to hold out for a better plan.

"We would rather have nothing than something that falls short of our standards. That was our view all along," Bolton said Thursday, a day after the lopsided tally in which the U.S. found itself with Palau, the Marshall Islands and Israel.

"What we found sad was that some of our central allies gave up on key points. I don't understand it to this day," he said.

The outcome seems to be a result of mixed messages and mutual miscalculation. But it was rooted in the United States' ambivalence about how deeply to engage at the United Nations on certain issues.

DOJ_NMG_0019358

"It is not clear whether or not they wanted the council to succeed, but it is clear that they were ineffective," said Lawrence Moss,Ö the special counsel for U.N. reform for Human Rights Watch. "The Bush administration was divided about the proposed human rights council, and that was reflected in the way they negotiated. They could have been much more focused and joined with others in Europe and Latin America to press for their goals."

The drive for a new human rights body began last fallÖ after world leaders agreed at a U.N. summit to replace the Human Rights Commission, which Secretary-General Kofi Annan lamented was being used to protect violators from censure more than safeguarding human rights.

There should be no place for human rights violators on the new council, Annan said.

He suggested that new members must win support of two-thirds of the 191-nation General Assembly rather than have seats allocated by region. membership hinge on winning the support of two-thirds of the 191-nation National Assembly rather than on allocation of seats by region. In the past, countries with poor human rights records such as Sudan, Libya and Zimbabwe had been able to gain seats, and the commission could not pass a resolution condemning Sudan in 2004 even after the United States had called deemed the systematic massacres in Darfur genocide.

However, the majority of the General Assembly members, many from Africa and Asia, feared that the new council would be dominated by wealthy countries and be used against them.

When negotiations began in late October, the United States insisted that human rights violators be kept off the new council, and that the panel be able to take effective action against abusers.

"Their bottom lines were not unreasonable," said one of the chairs of the preparatory meetings. "But their inflexibility was. If one formula does not work, if you're serious, you should work to come up with another one. For the most part, they did not do that."

In the end, members who feared they could not win a vote for the 2/3 rule two-thirds support rule agreed that candidates for the council would have to win a majority, or 96 votes, in a direct election in the General Assembly. In addition, each council member's human rights record would be reviewed from time to time, and a systematic violator could be suspended from the council by a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly.

Critics said that instead of negotiating at meetings, the U.S. kept repeating its position. As well, Bolton did not appear at most of the formal sessions, which other ambassadors who did show up took to mean that Washington was not taking the process seriously, diplomats said.

In addition, they said that U.S. negotiators privately acknowledged that the standard could even be used to keep the U.S. off the council in a time when the United States is under scrutiny for its treatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and the detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"Other countries engaged more in the process than the United States did," said Ricardo A. Arias,Ö Panamanian envoy who was one of the chairmen, known in the U.N. parlance as a "facilitators."

"I can not say they were not negotiating constructively," he said, "but they were firm in their position all through the process."

Bolton said that his deputy, Alex Wolf, and other U.S. mission staffers attended the meetings, and represented the United States well.

The negotiations stalled, and on Feb. 1, under pressure to deliver a new council before the existing Human Rights commission convened in early March, the president of the General Assembly and two facilitators sounded out countries to find a middle ground.

On Feb. 27, after many revisions and dozens of meetings, General Assembly President Jan EliassonÖ presented the final proposal. Bolton immediately denounced it because it did not contain the U.S. demands for the two-thirds threshold and a ban on countries under sanctions and called for negotiations to reopen.

"I think in the facilitator process, the United States does not get heard," said Bolton. "I would rather sit down at the table across from other countries with my red pen, and go through it line by line."

The U.S. demand put Eliasson in a quandary. "Opening up negotiations would be a ticket to misery," he said in an interview Friday. "We would end up in a deadlock — or even worse-with a text that was weaker. Every country that gave up something would want to put something back in."

DOJ_NMG_0019359

But it was a situation that seemed familiar. In two other negotiations on U.N. reform in the last six months, Bolton had presented a hard line in New York, only to have Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice ultimately approve a compromise. Eliasson and his aides gambled that the same thing might happen again.

"I certainly made clear to Under-Secretary [Nicholas] Burns that I had my concerns and worries," said Eliasson. "I was glad that they did not appear to close the door."

There was a last-minute scramble to find a way to win U.S. support — or to at least keep it from blowing up the whole thing. To Eliasson, putting the proposal up for further negotiations would not only kill the council, but endanger a whole raft of U.N. reforms yet to be considered.

"It's not clear that they wanted to move," said a diplomat closely involved in the talks. "In fact I couldn't tell what they wanted. We offered ideas to Washington to achieve their goals, and nothing happened."

The diplomat questioned if the U.S. understood the disruptive effect its strategy would have on subsequent talks on human rights and UN reform, and if there was too much playing to the domestic gallery.

If Bolton was not making his message clear at the U.N., it was certainly clear in Washington. The ambassador spent every Friday there in Washington, briefing Congress members and meeting with State Department and White House government officials.

His press secretary, Ric Grenell,Ö arranged calls and meetings with about 70 editorial page editors. In one influential editorial, the New York Times wrote, "John Bolton is right; Secretary General Kofi Annan is wrong."

"We would show up at the facilitator meetings, present our case, and be ignored. When the U.S. is ignored, ignored, ignored, they can't complain when we have to go public to present our case," Grenell said.

Eliasson went ahead and scheduled a meeting of the General Assembly on Wednesday to adopt the proposal.

After the nearly unanimous vote, even the traditionally toughest critics, the human rights groups, praised the result. It may not have had the 62/37threshold that they were pushing for, but it had other measures to keep the worst violators off the council.

Bolton said the U.N. had missed a historic opportunity to help people who are most in need. But he did not carry through on a threat to block funding for the new body.

"It is encouraging to hear that despite voting against the resolution, the U.S. government will cooperate with the council and support it," said Yvonne Terlingen, of Amnesty International. "It's a victory for human rights protection around the world. Now the test is for the U.S. and other countries to join forces to make it work."

While the outcome may have reflected the White House bottom line, the bruising negotiations left bitter feelings among allies at the U.N. — and even within the State Department, said U.N. and U.S. officials. Those sentiments may play into future negotiations, some warn.

"If you don't want to be isolated, you have to willing to work to end the isolation," said the European diplomat. "You have to create conditions to get people to want to help you. So far, we haven't seen that."

Rice Urges Better Japan-China Ties (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday expressed concern over tensions between Japan and China and urged the two Asian powers to find common ground and overcome their differences for the sake of stability in the region.

"We have encouraged good relations between China and Japan, and even though there are difficulties in that relationship, China and Japan also share a lot of interest and, indeed, a lot of trade and commerce and a lot of economic relations," the secretary said.

Miss Rice made her remarks at a press conference with Australian Prime Minister John Howard in Sydney, where she is to participate in an inaugural trilateral forum on the Asia-Pacific region with Australia and Japan today.

Beijing views the meeting as a strategy-plotting session against it, but Miss Rice insisted that the United States had a policy of engagement, not containment, toward the world's most populous country.

DOJ_NMG_0019360

Japan and China often feud over a benign view of Japan's colonial past and a denial by Japanese nationalists that their nation committed atrocities in World War II.

Miss Rice, who visited Indonesia earlier in the week, traveled to the Victoria Barracks in Melbourne, Australia's second-largest city, yesterday to thank Australian troops for their participation in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

"It is always good to have friends, but it is especially good to have steadfast friends when you have difficult fights ahead," she said, noting that Mr. Howard was in Washington on September 11, 2001.

"As we continue to fight the war on terrorism, as we continue to try and supplant that ideology of hatred that has produced terrorism with the hope of democracy and liberty for people around the world, it is wonderful to have a steadfast friend like Australia," she said.

Mr. Howard signaled that he might be willing to change long-standing Australian ban on exports of uranium to nations that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and make an exception for India.

The prime minister visited New Delhi earlier this month, a few days after President Bush, who reached a deal on U.S.-Indian civilian nuclear cooperation. The agreement requires legislation in Congress to exempt India from U.S. proliferation laws similar to those in Australia.

On Thursday, Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said that this is a "good deal and it takes forward this whole process of openness and transparency about at least many aspects of India's nuclear program."

But asked about selling uranium to India, as New Delhi has asked, he said: "We don't have any plans to change our current policy."

Mr. Howard softened that position yesterday, saying that there will not be an "immediate" policy change and added, "You never say never."

China May Release Jailed Times Researcher, Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

BEIJING, March 17 — Chinese authorities on Friday withdrew at least part of the case against a Chinese researcher for The New York Times, in a surprise legal maneuver that left unclear whether he would soon be released as President Hu Jintao prepares to visit the United States next month.

Zhao Yan, 44, a researcher in the Beijing office of The Times, has been imprisoned for 18 months on a charge that he disclosed state secrets to the newspaper, as well as a lesser charge of fraud. Mr. Zhao has denied both charges.

His lawyer, Mo Shaoping, said court officials told him on Friday that the decision meant that both charges against Mr. Zhao were being withdrawn. He said his client could possibly be released within days. But a court order on the matter, issued Friday, made no mention of a release date for Mr. Zhao and gave no definitive statement about his status.

Officials with China's Foreign Ministry, who had failed to respond to earlier calls, said late in the evening that "further information" was needed about the "new developments." The ministry declined to say whether Mr. Zhao would be released.

In Washington, the State Department could not confirm that one or both charges against Mr. Zhao had been dropped, said a spokesman, Tom Casey. He said the embassy in Beijing would continue to press for Mr. Zhao's release, "because the charges against him lack merit."

The uncertainty about Mr. Zhao's fate lies in the unusual legal maneuver invoked by prosecutors. Mr. Zhao was supposed to go on trial no later than Monday, his lawyer said. But prosecutors used a procedural clause to ask the court to withdraw the lesser fraud charge, citing a need for more investigation.

Mr. Mo said prosecutors sometimes use this language to request a delay of the trial date. But, in this instance, Mr. Mo said, prosecutors instead asked to withdraw the case. He said Chinese law held that prosecutors could not indict Mr. Zhao again on the same charges, unless they found new evidence.

"They are clearly looking for a reason to end the case," Mr. Mo said.

The order issued by the Beijing Second Intermediate Court is written in vague language. It defines "the case" as consisting of both charges. It then says the court agrees with the motion by prosecutors to withdraw the case. But, as explanation for the withdrawal, the order said prosecutors wanted more investigation into the lesser fraud charge. It does not refer to any new disposition of the state secrets charge, which carries a prison sentence of at least 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0019361

Mr. Zhao's case has brought heavy criticism against China from human rights groups, the United States government and other nations. President Bush has twice personally raised Mr. Zhao's case with Mr. Hu, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has also criticized the arrest.

Bill Keller, executive editor of The Times, said he hoped that the new developments meant that Mr. Zhao would be released. "The notion that Zhao Yan's work for The Times constituted anything but dogged journalism was wrong from the outset," he said. "If this represents a legal system working the way it is supposed to, that is happy news far beyond the family of The New York Times."

The case against Mr. Zhao was politically delicate because it involved the highest levels of the Chinese leadership, which made the decision to drop any charges all the more remarkable. His arrest was tied to a Sept. 7, 2004, article in The Times, which disclosed that the former president, Jiang Zemin, had unexpectedly offered to give up his final leadership position as head of the military. The article later proved accurate when Mr. Jiang resigned.

The Chinese news media are forbidden to report on the inner workings of the top leadership of the Communist Party. The Times article prompted a high-level investigation to find the sources of the leak, according to a person familiar with the investigation. State security agents apparently quickly focused on Mr. Zhao, who had been an investigative journalist for Chinese publications before joining The Times's Beijing bureau in April 2004.

Mr. Zhao was arrested on Sept. 17, 10 days after the publication of the Times article. The key piece of evidence, later revealed in a confidential state security report, was a photocopy of a handwritten note that Mr. Zhao had written to The Times's Beijing bureau chief, Joseph Kahn, the writer of the Sept. 7 article.

The note, written two months before the publication of the article, was unrelated to Mr. Jiang's resignation plans. Instead, it described maneuvering taking place between Mr. Hu and Mr. Jiang over military appointments. Mr. Kahn later referred to the political jockeying at the end of the Sept. 7 article.

It is still uncertain how state security agents obtained the photocopy. Agents either entered the office without permission or enlisted someone to help them make a copy. Under Chinese law, the note should not have been admissible in court.

Investigators added the fraud charge a few months after Mr. Zhao was arrested. It is unrelated to the state secrets charge and involves allegations involving improper payments that date from Mr. Zhao's work at a Chinese publication, before he joined The Times. Mr. Zhao and a witness disputed the accusation.

John Kamm, a human rights campaigner who negotiates the release of political prisoners in China, urged caution about the new developments in Mr. Zhao's case, but said he was "cautiously optimistic" that the researcher would be released.

Mr. Kamm said he raised the case of Mr. Zhao and others last month in a meeting with Foreign Ministry officials. He said the officials had suggested that China would make "human rights gestures" in advance of Mr. Hu's trip to the United States.

Mr. Mo said the procedural clause used by prosecutors to withdraw the case could allow them to release Mr. Zhao without restraint, or to release him on something similar to bail for up to 12 months. Then prosecutors would decide whether to bring a new case with new evidence, he added.

China Dismisses Journalist's Case (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

N.Y. Times Researcher Was Accused of Leaking State Secrets

BEIJING, March 17 -- Chinese authorities dropped charges Friday against a New York Times researcher accused of leaking state secrets, according to his attorney. The surprise decision could lead to the researcher's release from prison and soften criticism of China's human rights record during President Hu Jintao's upcoming visit to the United States.

Zhao Yan, 44, a Chinese journalist who worked in the newspaper's Beijing bureau, could be freed as early as Monday from the detention center where he has been held by the Ministry of State Security for the past 18 months, according to his attorney, Mo Shaoping, who said he received a formal court notice withdrawing the charges.

DOJ_NMG_0019362

The move amounts to a rare admission of error by the Chinese government in a criminal prosecution involving national security, and it almost certainly required Hu's approval, because he had endorsed the investigation that led to Zhao's arrest and issued instructions to the officials running it, according to people familiar with the probe.

State security agents detained Zhao in September 2004 after the New York Times published an article accurately predicting the retirement of China's former president. Zhao's prolonged detention without trial on vague state secrets charges provoked criticism by human rights groups, and U.S. officials pressed for his release during President Bush's prior two meetings with Hu.

In a written statement, Bill Keller, executive editor of the Times, said: "The apparent end of Zhao Yan's ordeal is thrilling news for all of his colleagues. We are grateful to the many people outside the paper who spoke up on his behalf."

"The notion that Zhao Yan's work for the Times constituted anything but dogged journalism has seemed ridiculous from the outset," he added.

China often releases political prisoners as a gesture of goodwill ahead of high-level meetings with foreign leaders, and the Bush administration had put Zhao's name on a shortlist of prisoners it hoped to see released before Hu's trip to Washington next month.

But another person whose case U.S. officials had raised with the Chinese was jailed last week after spending more than six months confined to his home. Chen Guangcheng, a blind activist who led a legal campaign against the use of forced abortion and sterilization to implement China's one-child policy, was taken away March 11 and has not been heard from since, according to his wife, Yuan Weijing.

Zhao was arrested 10 days after the Times reported that former president Jiang Zemin had agreed to give up his last leadership post as chief of the military. The ruling Communist Party rarely discloses information about the senior leadership's deliberations, and the article prompted an urgent investigation to find the sources of the leak, according to people familiar with the probe.

Investigators focused almost immediately on Zhao, who friends said had been under scrutiny by state security agents even before he joined the Times in April 2004 because of his work as a journalist for Chinese publications and as an advocate for the rural poor.

But after his arrest, both he and the Times denied he was a source for the article. Prosecutors twice returned Zhao's case to state security agents for more evidence before finally indicting him in January on a charge of leaking state secrets and a lesser charge of fraud related to his work as a reporter before joining the Times.

After a series of delays, Zhao was scheduled to go to trial on Monday at the latest. But Mo, his attorney, said he received a notice Friday morning indicating that prosecutors had applied to drop the charges and that the court had reviewed and approved the request.

The notice dropping the case said prosecutors wanted to conduct "additional investigation" into the fraud charge against Zhao but gave no reason for the withdrawal of the state secrets charge, Mo said. It also said nothing about when Zhao might be released.

Under Chinese law, Mo said, "withdrawing an indictment is the equivalent of a verdict of innocence." He said that such decisions are "extremely, extremely uncommon in China" and that he had never heard of it occurring in a case involving state security.

In past cases involving international pressure, the Chinese government has usually released prisoners only after convicting them.

There are no clear procedures for releasing a defendant after prosecutors withdraw charges, but Mo said he expected Zhao to be freed on bail by Monday, the original trial deadline. He added that prosecutors could not indict Zhao again on the same charges unless they found new evidence.

"The key is that Hu Jintao would have faced a lot of questions about this case on his trip," said Jerome A. Cohen, a scholar of Chinese law retained by the Times to assist with Zhao's defense. "If they tried to delay the trial again, people would be asking, 'How can you keep delaying it? What are you afraid of?' "

DOJ_NMG_0019363

But if the government put Zhao on trial, the case would have focused attention on the party's obsession with secrecy and its record of imprisoning journalists, perhaps overshadowing Hu's first state visit to the United States since he became president in 2003.

For example, the authorities would have been challenged to explain how state security agents obtained a key piece of evidence, a photocopy of a note describing rumors of political jockeying over military promotions that Zhao had written by hand for Joseph Kahn, the Beijing bureau chief of the Times. The paper has said it suspects agents entered the office without permission or recruited someone to make a copy of the memo.

China Dismisses Case Against US Reporter (FT)

By Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, March 18, 2006

Chinese authorities have dropped charges against a New York Times news assistant who has been detained for a year and a half without trial on allegations he leaked state secrets.

The decision by prosecutors to dismiss charges against Zhao Yan comes ahead of President Hu Jintao's visit to the US in April.

The case was one of a series involving foreign and domestic journalists that has drawn international concern, amid efforts by China's ruling Communist party to tighten controls on the media – with its at times vague definition of what constitutes a state secret.

"All charges have been withdrawn," said Mo Shao-ping, Mr Zhao's attorney. He expected Mr Zhao to be released in days.

Mr Mo said government prosecutors had submitted a request to a Beijing court to have the charges dismissed and the court had agreed on Friday.

Mr Zhao was accused of revealing state secrets to foreigners and committing fraud.

The case against Mr Zhao was probably prompted by a New York Times story in September 2004 that correctly forecast the retirement of China's former president, Jiang Zemin.

However, a legal expert advising the newspaper has said the evidence against him rests on an internal memo from Mr Zhao about possible personnel changes in the military mentioned in the same story.

China often acts against journalists and intellectuals whose work focuses on the inner workings of the top communist leadership, or those dealing with sensitive topics such as the 1989 Tiananmen massacre.

Since Mr Zhao's arrest, the New York Times has repeatedly denied the allegations against him and lobbied for his release. But the long-time investigative reporter, who may have drawn the government's ire well before the story was published, was indicted last December.

The Bush administration had also raised the case as one of great concern.

Mr Zhao, now in his mid-40s, has been held incommunicado for much of the time since his arrest. He is believed to be in a high-security detention centre south of Beijing.

State security and police agents often closely monitor the activities of foreign media bureaux in China, especially those with a high profile.

``A Chinese court on Friday sentenced a junior high school teacher to 10 years in jail for publishing sensitive material on the internet, Reuters reports from Beijing. Ren Ziyuan, 27, was found guilty of "subversion of state power" for publishing an essay titled "The Road to Democracy" and other papers on the web, his father said.

Mr Ren was sentenced by the Jining Intermediate People's Court in Shandong.

Chinese Researcher For New York Times To Be Let Out Of Jail (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Zhao Yan was held on a charge of revealing state secrets. Beijing's move precedes a U.S. summit.

BEIJING — A Chinese court said Friday that it would drop a high-profile case against a New York Times researcher, a move coming a few weeks before President Hu Jintao is to meet President Bush in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0019364

The decision on Zhao Yan fits China's pattern of releasing token numbers of political or human rights prisoners before major summit meetings.

"I'm so happy," said Zhao Kun, the researcher's sister. "When I heard the news, I felt like a window had opened in my heart. Everything seemed so bright."

Zhao Yan was detained in September 2004 and charged several months later with revealing state secrets. He faced 10 years in prison. The charge came on the heels of an exclusive story by the newspaper that former President Jiang Zemin planned to step down from a government military commission, surrendering his last major post.

China's Communist Party does not view favorably the release of information on its internal workings, particularly by media beyond its direct control.

"The government doesn't accept that journalists can have scoops," said Vincent Brossel, director of the Asia desk of Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based advocacy group. "When a big decision is made inside the party, they won't accept the liberal Chinese media or the foreign media releasing the news."

Zhao's lawyer, Mo Shaoping, said Friday that he hoped his client would be released within the next few days. It was unclear why Zhao was not released immediately, or whether he would face new charges in Beijing No. 2 Intermediate Court or some other court, Mo said.

But the news of the charges being dropped was viewed as a good sign.

"Of course I'm pleased," Mo said.

Human rights groups, attorneys and legal scholars said it was difficult to draw a broader lesson from the case. Authorities might have acted because of the gradual strengthening of the legal system, because of lobbying, or some combination. Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other officials all have raised Zhao's case with Chinese officials. Hu is to visit Washington the last week of April.

But on the same day Zhao's case was reportedly dropped, a court sentenced a 27-year-old teacher, Ren Ziyuan, to 10 years in prison on charges of "subversion of state power" for publishing Internet essays critical of the Chinese government, according to the Reuters news service.

Ren, like most Chinese in trouble for criticizing the government, had no foreign leaders calling for his release.

"On one day there's good news, and then there's bad," Brossel said. "In the long run, I really hope things are changing. But I can't read the implications of Zhao's case."

Media watchdogs also wondered whether the Zhao decision augured well for a related case, that of Singapore reporter Ching Cheong, who was detained on spying charges last year.

For the seventh year in a row, China put more journalists in jail in 2005 than any other nation, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Thirty-two were in prison as of Dec. 1.

Analysts said one result of the court's decision to drop the Zhao case might be to ease the chill on Chinese reporters, some of whom push censorship boundaries at significant personal risk.

"Zhao is a senior reporter," said Wu Ge, director of the Constitution and Human Rights Center at Qinghua University. "Chinese media will be encouraged by this decision."

Zhao's sister, who lives in the northeastern city of Harbin, said she planned to give her brother a big hug when she saw him.

"I've been very worried about him being in jail for the past 18 months," she said. "At the same time, I always believed he'd be OK. He's only a journalist, and I don't think my brother would ever do anything to hurt the country."

*

Yin Lijin of The Times' Beijing Bureau contributed to this report.

German Trial Promises A Look Into The Nuclear Black Market (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

BERLIN — A German engineer accused of belonging to a worldwide nuclear smuggling network went on trial Friday for allegedly providing technology to Libya that could have been used to enrich uranium for weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0019365

The case, being heard in a Mannheim court, is expected to offer a glimpse of the nuclear black market once masterminded by Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan. The trial is likely to focus on Western intelligence information, middlemen, money trails and what role German companies may have played in aiding leaders such as Libyan ruler Moammar Kadafi.

Gotthard Lerch, 63, is charged with violating Germany's weapons control and foreign trade acts. He allegedly was paid $34 million to provide Libya with gas centrifuges and other dual-use technologies.

Lerch had earlier been charged with treason. Prosecutors dropped that charge as part of an agreement with Switzerland, where Lerch had been living, to have him extradited to Germany in 2005.

Lerch has pleaded not guilty. His lawyers argued Friday that they had been denied access to prosecution documents, and they requested that the six judges hearing the case be replaced. Lerch is expected to seek intelligence records from the CIA and other Western spy agencies.

"The trial is hugely important in strengthening international attention to the problem of illegal proliferation," Goetz Neuneck of the Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at the University of Hamburg told German radio. "It would be very good for international nonproliferation if the trial were to provide more details and shine more light on dark corners."

Authorities focused on Lerch after the U.S. and Britain seized a shipment of nuclear-related components from a Libya-bound freighter in October 2003. Under Western pressure to abandon its quest for weapons of mass destruction, Libya cooperated with investigators. The seizure also provided details of Khan's dealings with other countries, including North Korea and Iran.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, told German prosecutors that Lerch was involved in supplying technology to Libya. He was also mentioned in a Malaysian investigation of smuggling.

The Times reported last year that an IAEA investigator had found that rotors for an advanced centrifuge were delivered for the Libyan project to Khan's operations in Dubai.

The alleged sale of such technology led to Lerch's arrest. Investigators fear that other crucial components collected by the Khan network never arrived in Libya and may have been diverted to another country. The father of Pakistan's nuclear program, Khan was humiliated when he confessed in 2004 that his black market had provided technology to Libya and Iran. He is under house arrest.

In the late 1970s, Lerch, working for a German company that produced nuclear technology, was investigated by German trade authorities for selling centrifuges and pumps to Pakistan. He was never charged. He was also investigated, but again never charged, for allegedly smuggling nuclear blueprints into Switzerland in the 1980s.

Hamas Ready To Announce Government (AP)

By IBRAHIM BARZAK

Associated Press, March 18, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip (AP) -- Hamas said it is ready to announce the formation of its government Saturday, two weeks ahead of a deadline but apparently without coalition partners that might have softened the militants' image.

In another possible setback, the Hamas government program is not expected to win the approval of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who is to meet with the group's leaders in Gaza Saturday. Abbas' aides said the Palestinian leader considers the Hamas platform too vague and wants it rewritten.

Hamas cannot present its Cabinet to parliament for approval without backing from the moderate Abbas, who was elected separately and wields considerable authority. However, Abbas cannot impose his own Cabinet lineup on Hamas, which swept January parliament elections and controls an absolute majority in the legislature.

Abbas is expected to put off the approval of a new government until after Israel's March 28 election, but his confidants say he is not ready to force a full-blown political crisis with the Islamic militants.

The new foreign minister will almost definitely be Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas firebrand, according to a preliminary list given to The Associated Press by officials in Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a smaller PLO faction that was considering joining the government.

DOJ_NMG_0019366

Said Siyam, a Hamas lawmaker from Gaza, has been tapped for the Interior and Civil Affairs Ministries, which control three of the five Palestinian security forces and is responsible for contacts with Israel's security services, said the officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the list was not final.

Siyam, considered a relative moderate, was among hundreds of militants deported by Israel to south Lebanon in 1992.

The wrangling over the new government comes at a time when some officials in Abbas' Fatah Party are calling on him to resign and to dissolve the Palestinian Authority, to protest Israel's raid of a West Bank prison earlier this week. The raid, in which troops snatched Ahmed Saadat, the leader of a small PLO faction, and other suspects in the assassination of an Israeli Cabinet minister, was a blow to Abbas' prestige.

If the Palestinian Authority were to be dissolved, Israel - as occupier of the West Bank and Gaza Strip - would be forced to assume responsibility for some 3 million Palestinians living there. The dissolution would also render Hamas' election victory irrelevant.

Abbas said earlier this week he was not ready yet to break up the Palestinian Authority.

In other developments Saturday, Israeli troops left a West Bank village after a failed overnight arrest raid. At the start of the operation late Friday, a 10-year-old Palestinian girl was killed when soldiers fired at a car she was riding in with her older brother and uncle, Palestinian witnesses and Israel Radio said. The witnesses said the soldiers were dressed in civilian clothes and fired without warning. The army declined comment.

After the initial shooting, soldiers surrounded a house where they believed three militants were holed up, and an army bulldozer began demolishing the building. However, the fugitives escaped.

In Gaza City, the designated Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, was to hold a news conference Saturday to announce the formation of the Hamas government, officials in the group said.

Abbas was to travel from the West Bank to Gaza on Saturday for a meeting with Hamas leaders, his office said. In the meeting, Hamas is to present its Cabinet lineup and program. Abbas aides said he was expected to ask for revisions in the Hamas program.

Hamas has rejected demands that it moderate its views, despite threats by the West that it will cut off substantial foreign aid to the Palestinian Authority unless the new government renounces violence, recognizes Israel and promises to honor existing peace agreements.

Hamas To Propose Palestinian Cabinet That Excludes Other Parties (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 17 — Hamas said Friday that it would propose a new Palestinian cabinet consisting of Hamas members and independent figures, but without officials from any other party.

Hamas said it expected to give the list to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, on Saturday. Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction has already said it will not participate in a Hamas-led government. Mr. Abbas may yet reject the new government's agenda, because it does not explicitly acknowledge the validity of past agreements between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, or support negotiations with Israel.

But it is not clear what consequences such a rejection would have in this untested political situation for the Palestinians. Hamas is expected to take the crucial ministries of foreign affairs, finance, education and interior, which controls the police.

An indication of Hamas's position came from its exiled political leader, Khaled Meshal, who said in Damascus on Thursday night that political power for Hamas was only "a means to an end" and is less important than fighting Israel, Reuters reported.

"Our fate is to combine resistance and politics, but resistance remains the basis and politics only a branch," Mr. Meshal said. "Being in power is only a means to an end for Hamas."

Mr. Meshal was speaking at a memorial gathering on Thursday night. "We and the Zionists have a date with destiny," he said. "If they want a war, we are the sons of war," he said, adding, "We have more stamina than Israel and will defeat it, God willing."

DOJ_NMG_0019367

Mr. Abbas was a crucial negotiator for the P.L.O., but Mr. Meshal criticized its agreements with Israel that created the interim Palestinian Authority. "A country can only exist on liberated land," he said.

Mr. Meshal's comments did not suggest that Hamas would soon agree to international demands that a new Palestinian government recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

In Brussels, at a meeting of the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — together known as the quartet — an American assistant secretary of state, David Welch, said, "To this date, I have not seen a positive Hamas reaction in respect to any of these principles." He said the quartet was discussing ways to channel emergency aid to the Palestinians while trying to avoid sending money to a government led by Hamas, which is classified by the United States and the European Union as a terrorist group.

In Israel, the government officially confirmed its first avian cases of the A(H5N1) strain of bird flu, saying the virus had killed thousands of turkeys and chickens in the south. Three people who worked with infected birds have been hospitalized.

The European Union immediately banned the import of Israeli poultry, unless the meat had been heat-treated or the birds were slaughtered before mid-February.

Separately, Israel's Justice Ministry said it was investigating a hospital that reportedly held a newborn baby to ensure that the parents of triplets would pay their hospital bill. The mother, an Israeli Arab, gave birth prematurely two months ago, and the babies required extensive treatment. After the case was written about in the daily newspaper Haaretz, the ministry ordered the release of the child and said it would ensure payment to the hospital.

Beyond that, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, still comatose after a stroke in January, will be moved to a long-term care center outside Tel Aviv after elections this month, The Associated Press reported, citing an Israeli television station.

Fatah Officials Call For Abbas To Resign (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, March 18, 2006

Several Fatah officials called on President Mahmoud Abbas to resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority to protest Israel's raid of a West Bank prison earlier this week, party activists said Friday.

The raid, in which Israel seized six top militants, was seen as a humiliating blow to Abbas' prestige and raised new questions in his Fatah Party about their president's ability to govern, especially following Hamas' landslide victory in a January parliamentary election.

If the Palestinian Authority is dissolved, Israel — as occupier of the West Bank and Gaza Strip — would be forced to assume responsibility for the 3 million Palestinians living there. The dissolution also would render Hamas' election victory irrelevant.

In violence Friday, Israeli soldiers shot and killed a 10-year-old girl during an operation in the West Bank village of Yamoun, the girl's father, Abdul Rahman Zaed, said. The girl was in a car with her uncle, who was shot in the head and arrested, Zaed said.

The army, engaged in a fierce gunbattle with militants in Yamoun, surrounded a house in which three militants were holed up and called on them to surrender, Palestinian security officials said. Later, a 13-year-old boy was wounded in the fighting, officials said.

The call for Abbas' resignation and the dissolution of the Palestinian Authority at the Fatah Central Committee late Thursday was the first time such a demand was made.

Analysts and Fatah officials said the demands — raised both in a letter to Abbas signed by five midlevel Fatah activists and at Thursday's meeting by a senior party official — are not serious at the moment.

However, the idea could gain momentum if a resumption of peace talks becomes increasingly unlikely and the economic situation deteriorates further, said Ghassan Khatib, the outgoing Palestinian planning minister.

Taysir Nasrallah, a Fatah official from the West Bank city of Nablus who signed the letter, said Israel's prison raid showed the Palestinian Authority was useless.

"Israel should pay a heavy price for occupying the Palestinian Authority," Nasrallah told The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0019368

In Thursday's meeting of Fatah's Central Committee, one of the members, Tayeb Abdel Rahim, opened the session by demanding that Abbas resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority, a participant said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media about the closed-door session.

The official quoted Abdel Rahim as saying that the Palestinian Authority is unable to solve Palestinian problems and that it is "time for us to leave."

During a tour of the demolished prison in Jericho a day after Israel's raid, Abbas rejected the idea that he would resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority.

Fatah has been increasingly frustrated with Abbas since Hamas' election victory, and the party is almost certainly not joining the Islamic group's new government.

Abbas is tentatively scheduled to meet Hamas' designated prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, on Saturday.

Hamas spokesman Salah Bardawil said the group would be ready to present its government to Abbas on Saturday. Abbas has the power to veto Hamas' government, forcing it to return with a different program.

Since Hamas' election victory, Israel has tightened its hold on the Palestinians.

It has stopped transferring millions of dollars in tax revenues collected for the Palestinian Authority and has called on the international community to slap economic sanctions on a Hamas government, steps the World Bank says would devastate the already poverty-ridden Palestinian areas.

A closure on Palestinian areas, meant to end Thursday after the Jewish holiday of Purim, has been extended until at least next week, and the army is inclined to continue it until after Israel's March 28 elections.

The closure bars Palestinian laborers from entering Israel and shuts down Gaza's main cargo crossing, Karni. Israel, citing security concerns, has closed Karni on and off for most of the past two months.

Karni's closure led the Palestinian Mill Co., which says it supplies about 60 percent of Gaza's flour, to idle last week because it used up its flour stocks. On Friday, Palestinians flocked to bakeries in Gaza City, fearing a bread shortage.

The Palestinian National Economy Ministry said Friday it expects bakeries to run out of flour within a few days because of the mill's shutdown.

Also Friday, two Palestinians were killed and three wounded in northern Gaza when homemade rockets they were preparing to fire at Israel exploded prematurely, Palestinian security officials said.

Netanyahu Angles For Yet Another Comeback (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Israel's former prime minister, lagging in the run-up to a national election, leads a party whose prospects, like his own, have turned.

TEL HAI, Israel — Benjamin Netanyahu was in his element: a dramatic, wind-whipped overlook at Israel's northern tip, a onetime fortress where 86 years ago, a storied band of beleaguered Jewish pioneers fought and died at the hands of Arab attackers.

Here in Tel Hai, a Zionist touchstone, the 56-year-old candidate for prime minister paid his respects to the fallen — and symbolically linked their lonely struggle to his own.

"Who is going to act against Hamas, for the safety of our children?" he thundered, referring to the Islamist group that swept to victory in January's Palestinian elections. "Who is going to do it? We're talking about our country!"

It wasn't subtle, but neither is Netanyahu's style. And even if it were, subtlety is a luxury he could ill afford these days.

Heading into a March 28 parliamentary election, the onetime boy wonder of Israeli politics leads a party that once dominated the electoral landscape, but now is lagging far behind.

There is no small irony in this turn of events. Netanyahu devoted most of the last three years to trying to wrest control of the conservative Likud Party from his archrival, Ariel Sharon. He achieved that ambition at last, but only after Sharon quit Likud, leaving it a shriveled husk. The centrist Kadima party that Sharon started — now led by Ehud Olmert, who took over after Sharon suffered a massive stroke — is forecast to win at least twice as many seats as Likud.

DOJ_NMG_0019369

Still, many observers believe it would be foolish to count out Netanyahu, a charismatic but divisive politician whose career has been marked by dramatic reversals of fortune.

In the 1996 campaign, six months after the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Netanyahu at one point trailed the dovish Shimon Peres by 20 percentage points. Then Israel was rocked by a devastating series of Palestinian bombings. The attacks killed 67 people in 13 days. Netanyahu emerged the victor by a razor-thin margin. At the age of 46, the U.S.-educated, media-savvy Netanyahu, universally known by his nickname Bibi, became the country's youngest prime minister.

A scant three years later, irate Israeli voters booted him out of office by a humiliatingly large margin.

When Netanyahu reentered politics in 2001 after a hiatus to lick his wounds, he presumed that the aging Sharon would present little obstacle to his claim on the Likud leadership. Instead, the old ex-general went on to become one of the most popular leaders in modern Israeli political history, with his statesmanship likened to such towering figures as David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister.

Having assumed the leadership of Israel's hard right at a time when the country is embracing a more centrist view, Netanyahu now finds himself struggling to broaden his appeal.

"Likud has not been able to follow the swing in Israeli public opinion," said political scientist Itzhak Galnoor of Hebrew University. "The public generally agrees with the partitioning of the biblical Land of Israel, and the Likud leadership remains stuck in its previous position."

Likud's platform opposes the creation of a Palestinian state — something most Israelis now accept as inevitable.

Netanyahu strategists express frustration that voters apparently are giving little weight to his impressive qualifications.

The Israeli economy was a shambles when he took over as finance minister in 2003, but was booming when his tenure ended. Even critics agreed the turnaround was largely due to the rigorous economic reforms Netanyahu championed, though many complained his policies caused hardship to the poor and elderly.

And after years spent in the shadow of one ex-general after another, Netanyahu is finally in a race in which his military credentials, including a stint in the ultra-elite commando unit Sayeret Matkal, are far more solid than those of either of his main opponents, Olmert and Peretz.

Instead, a viewer of the political ads that flicker across the country's TV screens every night might be forgiven for believing Netanyahu was the electoral contest's dominant figure and his character the chief issue.

Kadima has devoted considerable resources to skewering him, playing to the perception that Netanyahu is manipulative and insincere. One much-discussed Kadima ad, apparently aimed at making Netanyahu appear untrustworthy, features nothing but footage of him giving a speech while his eyes continually shift back and forth.

The Israeli electorate's relationship with Netanyahu is a complicated one. He is simultaneously admired and reviled for his smooth public persona, widely remembered for a made-for-television moment during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, in which he suavely donned a gas mask while speaking live on CNN in his perfect colloquial American English.

"He's really a very skilled politician — an extremely good speaker, good at diplomacy, and he works hard and does his homework," said political analyst Gideon Doron of Tel Aviv University. "But his weakness is lack of credibility — the public perception that he lies to those around him, that under pressure he panics."

On the campaign trail, Netanyahu appears to be fighting the stereotype of slickness. He's a man who knows how to carry himself in an expensively tailored suit, but at recent speeches and appearances, he has favored a simple open-collared shirt. At one campaign stop, he ignored the raised platform set up for him and brought a microphone down to crowd level.

Few things irritate Netanyahu more than what he calls "armchair analysis" of his family history, but it looms large in his public persona. Almost every Israeli knows the story of Netanyahu's elder brother, Yonatan, who was killed in the daring 1976 raid at Entebbe airport in Uganda, when Israeli commandos rescued the passengers of a plane held by Palestinian hijackers.

The family was devastated, and hopes of a brilliant future for Yonatan, the favored son, were transferred to the younger Benjamin. Despite protestations that he hates having his character dissected in connection with Yonatan's death, Netanyahu chose to feature footage of Entebbe in his campaign ads.

Netanyahu is adept at cultivating political allies, but appears to have few real friends in Israel's political establishment.

DOJ_NMG_0019370

On a Likud campaign swing through the economically depressed northern town of Kiryat Shemona, Uzi Landau, a prominent Likud member of parliament, stumped energetically for the party in a shopping mall and an open-air produce market, but turned snappish when asked about Netanyahu's leadership attributes.

"I think I would have made a better leader," Landau said.

If asked what quality they associate with Netanyahu, many Israelis mention raw opportunism. Even among Netanyahu's supporters, many noticed that although he railed for months against Sharon's plan to withdraw troops and settlers from the Gaza Strip, he waited until just days before the pullout to give up his Cabinet post in protest.

Among voters, those character traits often outweigh Netanyahu's strengths, including his searching intelligence. Visiting a high-tech factory in the Negev desert town of Sderot, the MIT-schooled candidate sat with computer-circuitry technicians in their white lab coats, peppering them with detailed questions.

"I was surprised — he really knows a lot about this," said 30-year-old technician Alexander Kirzner. But asked whether that was enough to win his vote, he smiled.

"I admire what he's done with the economy, and this is the best-paying job I've ever had," he said.

"But that doesn't mean I trust him with everything to do with our lives."

How I Learned To Love The Wall (NYT)

By Irshad Manji

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

New Haven

ON March 28, Israelis will elect a new prime minister to replace the ailing Ariel Sharon. But I'd bet my last shekel that I'll continue to hear the phrase "Ariel Sharon's apartheid wall." It's a phrase spoken — make that spewed — on almost every university campus I visit in North America and Europe.

Among a new generation of Muslims, this is what Mr. Sharon will be known for long after he leaves office: unilaterally erecting a barrier, most of it a fence, some of it a wall, that cuts Arab villages in half, chokes the movement of ordinary Palestinians, cripples local economies and, ultimately, separates human beings.

The critics have a point — up to a point.

They're right that Palestinians are virtually wailing at "the wall." When I went to see its towering cement slabs in the West Bank town of Abu Dis last year, an Arab man approached me to unload his sadness. "It's no good," he said. "It's hard."

"Why do you think they built it?" I asked.

The man shook his head and repeated, "It's hard." After some silence, he added, "We are not two people. We are one."

"How do you explain that to suicide bombers?" I wondered aloud.

The man smiled. "No understand," he replied. "No English. Thank you. Goodbye."

Was it something I said? Maybe my impolite mention of Palestinian martyrs? Then again, how could I not mention them?

After all, this barrier, although built by Mr. Sharon, was birthed by "shaheeds," suicide bombers whom Palestinian leaders have glorified as martyrs. Qassam missiles can kill two or three people at a time. Suicide bombers lay waste to many more. Since the barrier went up, suicide attacks have plunged, which means innocent Arab lives have been spared along with Jewish ones. Does a concrete effort to save civilian lives justify the hardship posed by this structure? The humanitarian in me bristles, but ultimately answers yes.

That's not to deny or even diminish Arab pain. I had to twist myself like an amateur gymnast when I helped a Palestinian woman carry her grocery bags through a gap in the wall (such gaps, closely watched by Israeli soldiers, do exist). It made me wonder how much more difficult the obstacle course must be for people twice my age, who must travel to one of the wider official checkpoints nearby.

I appreciate that Israel's intent is not to keep Palestinians "in" so much as to keep suicide bombers "out." But in the minds of many Palestinians, Ariel Sharon never adequately acknowledged the humiliation felt by a 60-year-old Arab whose family has harvested the Holy Land for generations when she has to show her identity card to an 18-year-old Ethiopian immigrant in an Israeli Army uniform who's been in the country for eight months. In that context, fences and walls come off as cruelly gratuitous.

DOJ_NMG_0019371

For all the closings, however, Israel is open enough to tolerate lawsuits by civil society groups who despise every mile of the barrier. Mr. Sharon himself agreed to reroute sections of it when the Israel High Court ruled in favor of the complainants. Where else in the Middle East can Arabs and Jews work together so visibly to contest, and change, state policies?

I reflected on this question as I observed an Israeli Army jeep patrol the gap in Abu Dis. The vehicle was crammed with soldiers who, in turn, observed me filming the anti-Israel graffiti scrawled by Western activists — "Scotland hates the blood-sucking Zionists!" I turned my video camera on the soldiers. Nobody ordered me to shut it off or show the tape. My Arab taxi driver stood by, unprotected by a diplomatic license plate or press banner.

Like all Muslims, I look forward to the day when neither the jeep nor the wall is in Abu Dis. So will we tell the self-appointed martyrs of Islam that the people — not just Arabs, but Arabs and Jews — "are one"? That before the barrier, there was the bomber? And that the barrier can be dismantled, but the bomber's victims are gone forever?

Young Muslims, especially those privileged with a good education, cannot walk away from these questions as my interlocutor in Abu Dis did. If we follow in his footsteps, we are only conspiring against ourselves. After all, once the election is over, we won't have Ariel Sharon to kick around anymore.

Israel Announces First Cases Of Deadly Bird Flu Strain, In Turkeys (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 17 -- Israeli health officials announced Friday that they believe more than 1,000 turkeys have died in recent days from bird flu, the first reported cases in the country.

Initial test results appeared to confirm that birds being raised on four farms in southern Israel died after being infected by the H5N1 virus, avian influenza's deadly strain. Additional tests recommended by the World Health Organization are being conducted to confirm the findings, but Israeli officials are already taking precautions.

The Agriculture Ministry began preparations Friday to kill 86,000 birds within a roughly two-mile radius around the farms where, by some unofficial estimates, 11,000 turkeys have died in recent days.

Israel also halted the export of all unprocessed chicken and turkey meat, and health officials sought to assure Israelis that the supply in stores was safe.

"The risk that people will contract the virus is very, very low," said Avi Yisraeli, the Health Ministry's director general.

Nearly 100 people worldwide have died of avian flu, and tens of millions of birds have been slaughtered in efforts to stop its spread.

After it was discovered in Turkey last fall, Israeli health and agriculture officials said it was likely only a matter of time before the first birds here contracted the virus. Yaakov Edri, Israel's health minister, told Army Radio on Friday that there was a "very high chance that this is avian flu."

"But, of course, there are more tests to be done," Edri said.

Last month, the H5N1 virus was detected in poultry in Egypt, Israel's southern neighbor. Because the suspected cases of infection in Israel have so far been concentrated in the south, Agriculture Minister Zeev Boim said the virus may have migrated from Egypt.

Israeli military officials have also asked the Palestinian Authority for blood samples from poultry in the Gaza Strip, seeking to determine if the virus may have come from there. Israel evacuated settlers and military installations in Gaza last year but still maintains control over trade passages into Israel.

Israeli agriculture officials imposed a quarantine on at least three farms in the Negev region of southern Israel while testing is underway. Israeli officials said the results would be ready within two days.

The Haaretz newspaper reported that at least three workers from the farms were being treated for symptoms associated with bird flu, although there has been no confirmation that they are suffering from the virus. One of the men, a Thai immigrant, is being held in isolation at the Soroka Medical Center in the city of Beersheba.

Health officials said they had vaccinations for about half of Israel's roughly 6.2 million people and planned to fly in an additional 4 million doses from the Netherlands in the coming days.

DOJ_NMG_0019372

The Ynet news Web site reported that culling had begun Friday and estimated it would eventually involve more than 200,000 birds. The killing is done by poisoning the birds' drinking water, and Israeli farmers are expressing fears of huge financial losses.

As Spring Thaws The Caucasus, Birds And Fear Are Flying North Through Georgia (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia, March 16 — In the early morning hours, the cobblestone alleys that wander this city's slopes are normally crowded with schoolchildren, walking in groups with their backpacks and books. But such sights have lately become rare.

At School No. 50 on Thursday, the director, Nino Gogsadze, stood in the corridors for the 9 a.m. opening. Only two students were waiting for the day's lessons. Both were her sons.

The school's 822 other children were absent.

"The parents do not let their children go to school," Ms. Gogsadze said. "They are afraid."

Such is the power that avian influenza can hold over the public imagination as the March thaw advances north across the former Soviet Union.

Two girls from School No. 50 died this month of complications related to a strain of common influenza. The deaths were not caused by avian influenza, according to the Georgian government and the World Health Organization, which has reviewed the laboratory results of biological samples taken from the girls.

But clinical facts have hardly mattered, and Tbilisi has succumbed to an outbreak — not of avian influenza, but of fear.

School attendance has dipped to half of normal levels, said Alexander Lomaia, the minister of education. Ambulance calls have soared, reaching 900 a day here, up from slightly more than 600, said Lado Chipashvili, the minister of labor, health and social affairs.

The fear has undermined confidence in the food supply, reducing poultry sales and making it hard to find dishes containing chicken or eggs in restaurants.

Even Mr. Chipashvili has had trouble ordering shkmeruli, the sautéed chicken in garlic-and-cream sauce that is part of Georgia's national cuisine. "Unfortunately, it is impossible," he said.

Only one bird has been identified in Georgia with the avian influenza virus — a wild swan found dead near the coast of the Black Sea on Feb. 23. Domestic birds within a radius of about two miles of the dead swan were promptly culled, about 1,700 birds in all, according to Levan Ramishvili, the coordinator of avian influenza programs at the Ministry of Agriculture.

Georgia has had no human cases of avian influenza, and the World Health Organization said Georgia had monitored bird populations, improved its health system's ability to treat human cases, and educated its public about the virus and how it its transmitted.

"I have the impression that they are doing quite well," said Dr. Bernardus Ganter, the adviser on communicable diseases for the World Health Organization's European region, which includes Georgia. "They are serious about this."

The public reaction, however, has tapped a combination of fears. Georgia borders Turkey and Azerbaijan, which between them have had seven confirmed human deaths from avian influenza this winter.

And as residents of a post-Soviet state, Georgians retain an ingrained distrust of government announcements, even though the current government, which came to power in 2003, has proved much more open than the old.

The sense that official assurances should be treated with skepticism was deepened by the handling of three deaths in recent weeks in Azerbaijan, where government officials alternately said the victims had died from avian influenza and that such diagnoses were "premature."

The World Health Organization, working with Azerbaijani officials, on Tuesday confirmed that the deaths were caused by avian influenza, which is not contagious among humans but can be contracted by people who come in contact with the blood or feces of poultry.

DOJ_NMG_0019373

Georgian officials have embarked anew on a public relations campaign, which has already included public service announcements about the disease on television, and pamphlets for schoolchildren and medical workers. "It is like a panic and we are trying to calm this panic down," Mr. Chipashvili said.

He noted, however, that the spring bird migration is under way, and that as more birds pass through the region, the virus could readily spread to wild and domestic birds.

That has been the case on the other side of the Caucasus ridge, in southwestern Russia, where more than a million birds have been killed by the virus or by the culling of domestic stocks.

As the concerns multiply, Dr. Ganter says the World Health Organization has increased its presence and diagnostic capacity in Azerbaijan, and is getting cooperation from the government there.

If School No. 50 is any indicator, however, restoring public confidence in the Caucasus will be slow. Ms. Gogsadze has invited citizens to examine medical certificates showing that the girls who died did not have avian influenza. The school has been disinfected from end to end. "Every room, every corner, every toilet," Mr. Chipashvili said.

Yet the building stands empty.

"Epidemiologists told me that this school is the cleanest in Georgia," Ms. Gogsadze said. "But fear has emerged."

G-8 Countries Back Nuclear Power In Future (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

MOSCOW (AP) -- Energy ministers from the world's leading industrialized nations called yesterday for major new investments and the development of nuclear power as high oil prices and uncertainty about supplies weigh on the global economy.

The ministers from the Group of Eight nations, meeting in the Russian capital to discuss global energy security, said significant investments would be needed in the production, transportation and processing of resources and urged policies to encourage this.

"We recognize that to attract investment it is essential for countries to have open and favorable investment regimes," they stated, "including stable and predictable regulations, clear tax laws and efficient administration procedures, as well as fair and reciprocal access to markets along the energy value chain."

Though they conceded that fossil fuels "will remain the basis of the world energy industry for at least the first half of the 21st century," the ministers urged a diversification of energy sources, suppliers, consumers, routes and delivery methods as a means of reducing energy security risks. They noted in particular the importance of nuclear energy.

"For those countries that wish, wide-scale development of safe and secure nuclear energy is crucial for long-term, environmentally sustainable diversification of energy supply," they said in a statement released by Russia's Ministry of Industry and Energy.

"We are hopeful for a very substantial worldwide rebirth of the nuclear power industry, which appears to be taking place in various parts of the world," U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said at a press conference.

The ministers called for increasing energy supplies to less-developed countries, and said the development of low-carbon technologies will be "crucial" to long-term global environmental sustainability.

Britain's trade and industry minister, Alan Johnson, emphasized there was no simple solution to easing world's dependence on hydrocarbons -- with fossil fuels likely to continue to provide 80 percent of global energy needs in the first half of this century.

But he said new technologies could reduce the environmental effects.

The ministers also said better communication between energy producers, transit providers and consumer countries was necessary.

Russia is the world's No. 1 gas producer and the biggest oil exporter after Saudi Arabia, but Moscow's recent behavior has raised concern among Western oil companies about investing in Russia and European Union worries about the dependability of supplies from state-controlled monopoly Gazprom.

DOJ_NMG_0019374

Russian President Vladimir Putin promised that in the next few months Russia's parliament will pass a key bill regulating taxes on mineral extraction along with new legislation on using subsoil resources, including with the participation of the foreign capital.

The changes were "aimed at making energy business in Russia as transparent and predictable as possible," Mr. Putin said.

Russian Energy Minister Viktor Khristenko said yesterday that $17 trillion needed to be invested by 2030 "to create an effective global energy system that is resilient to shocks."

Stable legislation, a clear tax regime and flexible administration are key to realizing this goal, Mr. Khristenko said.

Russia Effectively Closes A Political Opponent's Rights Group (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

MOSCOW, March 17 — The bank accounts of a foundation led by an imprisoned Russian businessman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, were frozen Friday by court order, the foundation and its bank said, a move that strongly suggests the organization is about to be shut down.

The group, the Open Russia Foundation, immediately announced that it was forced to suspend its activities promoting civil society and accused the government of extending its crackdown on private organizations.

"It seems that they are trying to stop all of our activities, because of course without money, we can do nothing," said Irina Yasina, the vice chairwoman.

The court action follows a general crackdown in Russia on private nonprofit organizations that receive foreign financing, all of which will be subject next month to a law signed in January restricting their activities.

Although Open Russia is a domestic organization, the new provisions seem tailored to include it, as a clause extends the law's restrictions to organizations founded by citizens convicted of crimes.

Mr. Khodorkovsky, the founder of the Yukos oil company, set up Open Russia in 2001. Once Russia's wealthiest man, he was convicted of fraud and other charges last year, and is serving an eight-year prison term in Siberia. He and his supporters contend that the charges against him were contrived by the Kremlin as punishment for his political activities. Mr. Khodorkovsky remains chairman of Open Russia.

The foundation, which claims to be the country's largest, has advocated for human rights and political freedoms, in part by providing grants to partner organizations throughout Russia. It had planned a budget of $11 million this year and maintained its accounts at Trast Bank, Ms. Yasina said.

Its activities have been the subject of intense government interest, including a raid on its offices here last fall and at least five tax inspections last year, she said. On Friday, much of the suspense about Russia's intentions ended.

Dmitry V. Chukseyev, a spokesman for Trast Bank, said an official from the general prosecutor's office arrived in the morning with a court order stipulating that the accounts had been frozen "in relation to a criminal matter against Khodorkovsky, Lebedev and other unidentified people." Platon Lebedev was a business associate of Mr. Khodorkovsky and was convicted with him.

The order, Mr. Chukseyev said, "immobilizes any movements of money" without the prosecutor's approval. It did not make clear the nature of the criminal activity, he said.

The general prosecutor's office made no public statement about the case.

Mr. Yasina said that the accounts contained several million dollars, and that the assets were frozen on a day that Open Russia had planned to distribute funds to organizations it helps underwrite. She said the move was another example of Russia's backsliding on human rights, even as it holds the rotating chairmanship of the Group of 8 industrialized nations.

Mr. Khodorkovsky's supporters said Friday that he had been sentenced to serve a week in a punitive cell because he had been drinking tea outside an approved prison area. Officials of the prison service could not be reached for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0019375

Almost all aspects of Mr. Khodorkovsky's business and public activities have faced government pressure since his arrest in 2003. His oil company is in ruins, after being drained of assets by enormous tax judgments against it and by having its core business auctioned off by the Russian authorities. Mr. Khodorkovsky himself still has several years to serve on his prison term.

Ms. Yasina said the events on Friday signaled to her that Open Russia, like Yukos, would not survive.

"Now it is absolutely clear," she said. "I had some hope, even today in the morning. Now I understand that we are stopped."

U.S. May Consider New Belarus Sanctions (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

White House Report Calls Leader 'Corrupt'

The White House accused the authoritarian president of Belarus yesterday of being "among the most corrupt leaders in the world," and administration officials said they will consider new sanctions assuming tomorrow's elections are manipulated as expected.

In a report sent to Congress on Thursday night and posted on the Web yesterday, the White House alleged that President Alexander Lukashenko "has created a repressive dictatorship on the doorstep of the European Union," sold arms to rogue states and enriched himself at the expense of his people.

The release of the report just two days before presidential elections in the former Soviet republic was intended as a sharp repudiation of a man often called Europe's last dictator amid a pre-vote crackdown on dissent. Authorities in Belarus, where the KGB retains its Soviet name, have shut down newspapers, raided civil society organizations, stifled anti-government rallies, and beaten and arrested opposition figures, including a candidate running against Lukashenko.

"We are very concerned about the behavior of the leaders in Belarus," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said yesterday. "They are not pursuing a democratic course."

In separate interviews, two other administration officials who were not authorized to speak on the record said the U.S. government is studying ways of applying more sanctions against Lukashenko's regime, targeted specifically against him and his cronies. The United States has already imposed travel restrictions on some high-level Belarusan officials.

Assuming the elections are not deemed free and fair, the administration would consider working with European governments to go after the assets of Lukashenko and his circle, the officials said. "This is something that people at the highest level feel strongly about," said one of the officials. The other said, "It's unacceptable that there's a dictator and a tyrant on the border of NATO and the E.U."

Although Belarus is a small country with 10 million people and little strategic importance, Bush has taken a personal interest as part of his vow to spread democracy. On Feb. 27, he invited to the Oval Office two Belarusan women, Irina Krasovskaya and Svetlana Zavadskaya, who have become important opposition symbols since their husbands disappeared. In the national security strategy he unveiled this week, Bush included Belarus among seven countries deemed "despotic systems."

The new report, drafted in response to the Belarus Democracy Act passed by Congress in 2004, alleges that Belarus sold arms, military equipment and dual-use items to countries such as Iran and Sudan. The money goes into secret funds controlled by Lukashenko, according to the report.

The report says that Lukashenko controls a presidential fund with more than $100 million and quotes him once bragging that it really has $1 billion. "The precise extent of corruption is difficult to determine because of the regime's lack of transparency and the blurring of personal and state property," the report says. Lukashenko gave the U.S. embassy a document reporting his annual income as $16,596.

Much of the information about his finances comes from public statements by Tamara Vinnikova, a former head of the national bank who fled Belarus in 1999. A classified version of the report has other authentication, sources said.

"This gives a very clear picture of this monstrous regime," said Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.), who sponsored the Belarus Democracy Act. "We're not going to give up. As we've seen with every thief and dictator over time -- remember Nicolae Ceausescu? -- there's a long list of people who are no longer there to torture and abuse their people." Ceausescu, the Romanian dictator, was executed in a popular uprising in 1989.

DOJ_NMG_0019376

Belarusan Ambassador Mikhail Khvostov complained that the White House report was filled with "false allegations" and "black PR." Khvostov said Belarus does not hide its arms sales but complies with U.N. regulations. And he said Lukashenko does not use the presidential fund for personal purposes but instead to fund arts and sports.

"In my view, this action on the eve of the election is an attempt of a black intervention into the internal affairs of another country," Khvostov said. "This administration does not like President Lukashenko to win this election."

Pelosi Seeks End To Darfur Violence (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi yesterday said the warring in the Darfur region of Sudan demands immediate attention, a day after privately urging President Bush to appoint a special envoy to help end what the White House calls a genocide.

"President Bush and I don't agree ... well we disagree on almost everything, but on this we do, and he has told us 'not on his watch' and I believe him," Mrs. Pelosi said after a speech to the Center for National Policy.

Mrs. Pelosi and congressional Democrats, who last month visited Darfur, told Mr. Bush in a meeting Thursday that an envoy would signal that peace in Sudan is important to the U.S.

"To do this we must stop the violence, bring the parties to the negotiating table and get humanitarian relief to the people who need it," the California Democrat said in her address.

The war between rebels and government forces and Arab militias has killed an estimated 180,000 people and displaced 2 million more.

Mrs. Pelosi said the congressional delegation found "a mass of death, disease and despair" for the native farmers imposed by both the state-sponsored Janjaweed militia and thieving rebels.

"[Sudanese] Vice President [Ali Osman Mohammed] Taha denied what we had seen with our very eyes," Mrs. Pelosi said.

"After persistent questioning by Congresswoman Maxine Waters, Vice President Taha finally admitted that the Sudan government had supported the Janjaweed in the past," she said.

Congress on Thursday approved more than $350 million in aid to the region, including more than $90 million for United Nations peacekeepers, who have not yet been authorized to enter the African nation.

Mrs. Pelosi said one of the problems with U.N. intervention is that the African Union has not yet requested it, and the Sudanese government fought against it in a meeting held March 10.

A decision has been postponed to give all the parties a chance to reach and sign a peace accord with a deadline of April 30. Sudan yesterday said it expected to meet the deadline.

Mrs. Pelosi said a request for U.N. troops may not come until September: "But that will only allow for more death, disease and genocide to take place."

Part of the reason the conflict has gone on for so long without U.N. intervention is contention over whether the situation classifies as genocide. The U.N. describes the conflict as the world's gravest humanitarian crisis.

Imam Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society Freedom Foundation, said the debate is based on the semantic arguments of a "ridiculously high" standard.

"I am also troubled that during our trips there we were told by numerous officials throughout the country that the U.S. and U.N. have not given the African Union the financial support they need," he said.

An African Union military force has been in the region acting as a peacekeeping force since October 2004, but it only has 7,000 troops to protect hundreds of thousands of displaced families in scattered camps throughout Darfur.

Liberian Seeks Extradition Of Predecessor For Atrocities Trial (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 17 — Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the president of Liberia, said Friday that she had asked Nigeria to extradite Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president and guerrilla leader, to face war crimes charges in Sierra Leone.

DOJ_NMG_0019377

Ms. Johnson Sirleaf told the Security Council that she had made a formal request to President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria, where Mr. Taylor lives in exile.

Mr. Taylor claimed asylum in Nigeria in August 2003 as part of an internationally brokered peace settlement ending 14 years of civil war in Liberia. He was later indicted on 17 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity by a United Nations-backed court in Sierra Leone.

Mr. Taylor, 58, a warlord-turned-president, rampaged through his own country and much of West Africa during the 1990's, unleashing ruthless campaigns of torture, rape and dismemberment.

Even from exile, he has maintained influence in Liberia, with thousands of young combatants still loyal to him, Ms. Johnson Sirleaf said, making her plea "courageous but risky."

"Please bear in mind that time is of the essence in this regard," she said at a news conference. "Liberia's peace is fragile. There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor, there are many business interests he has. Whatever decision is taken by the African leadership must ensure that the safety of the Liberian people and the stability of our nation is not undermined."

She said Mr. Obasanjo would consult African leaders because they had been signatories to the deal that sent Mr. Taylor into exile.

She said she also wanted to "ensure that in any proceedings, there is an environment that protects all, including the accused's, fundamental human rights."

She was not seeking Mr. Taylor's extradition to Liberia, she said, because he was not under indictment there. If he is sent to Liberia, peacekeepers there have been authorized by the Security Council to transfer him to Sierra Leone.

Mr. Obasanjo has been under pressure to act on Mr. Taylor but had said he would await a request from a democratically elected Liberian president. Ms. Johnson Sirleaf was elected in November and inaugurated on Jan. 16.

She complained that the international community should have acted sooner to help Liberia free itself from Mr. Taylor's influence.

"We inherited a problem, we are faced with serious pressure, we are a small country, we have no powers that others have, we have no security forces to protect our people and the safety of our nation, so we are caught in a situation that we have to take a major decision that should have been taken long before, giving us an opportunity to pursue our development agenda," she said.

Corinne Dufka, a senior researcher for Human Rights Watch in Dakar, Senegal, who has followed the Taylor case closely, hailed the move as an "enormous step toward advancing justice in West Africa," but she said she was troubled by Mr. Obasanjo's decision to seek the approval of other African leaders.

"Obasanjo must now play his own part in the fight against impunity in West Africa," she said.

Ms. Johnson Sirleaf, who served five years as an assistant secretary general with the United Nations Development Program, addressed a joint meeting of Congress on Wednesday and will see President Bush in the White House on Tuesday.

She used her appearance before the Council on Friday to thank the United Nations for helping Liberia end its debilitating conflicts and hold the election that put her in office.

The United Nations has a peacekeeping force in Liberia of 16,000 soldiers and police officers, and Ms. Johnson Sirleaf asked the Council to guarantee its continuance.

She was praised in speeches by many of the ambassadors, and her speech was greeted with applause, a rare occurrence in the chamber.

Liberia Seeks Trial For Ex-President (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

New Leader Presses Nigeria and U.N.

UNITED NATIONS, March 17 -- Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf has asked Nigerian leader Olusegun Obasanjo and other African leaders to force Charles Taylor, Liberia's exiled former president, to face trial for war crimes allegedly committed in neighboring Sierra Leone's bloody 10-year-long civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0019378

Johnson-Sirleaf, who was elected president in November, appealed to the U.N. Security Council on Friday to back her government's efforts, noting that "Liberia is still fragile." She asked Obasanjo in a meeting in Abuja last weekend to rally other African leaders to make a formal statement requesting that Taylor be tried by the U.N.-backed Special Court in Sierra Leone.

Taylor resigned and went to exile in Nigeria in August 2003 as part of a U.S.-backed deal to end Liberia's civil war and pave the way for a U.N.-led effort to rebuild the country.

Obasanjo has previously resisted international pressure to hand Taylor over, citing the need for a request from a democratically elected Liberian leader. His office said Friday that he is considering sending Taylor back to Liberia, not Sierra Leone, where he is charged.

A statement issued by Obasanjo's office cited his "commitment to give due consideration to any formal request from a democratically elected government of Liberia for the return of former president Charles Taylor," Reuters reported from Lagos.

The request for a broader African decision on Taylor's fate is aimed at easing political pressure on Liberia's fledgling government, which is struggling to put the country back on its feet after more than a decade of civil war, extreme poverty and misrule.

U.N. prosecutors maintain that Taylor has continued to exercise considerable power in Liberia from his compound in Calabar, Nigeria. They have also accused him of plotting two assassination attempts against Guinea's president, Lansana Conte.

"I have consulted with Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo and asked him that we and the leaders of Africa, particularly those that were involved in the arrangement that took Mr. Taylor to exile now bring this matter to closure," Johnson-Sirleaf told reporters at the United Nations. "And by closure I mean that a decision should be taken that would allow Mr. Taylor to have his case in court."

Johnson-Sirleaf voiced frustration that Nigeria and other African governments that crafted the deal that led to Taylor's resignation left her with the burden of confronting Taylor's legacy. "We have to take a major decision which should have been taken a long time ago," she told reporters after speaking to the council. "The pressure that has been put on Liberia is in a way unfair."

The United States and other Security Council members praised Johnson-Sirleaf's decision to press for Taylor's trial before the war crimes court. "We support President Johnson-Sirleaf's stand on Charles Taylor," said Emyr Jones-Parry, Britain's U.N. ambassador. "She has shown courage in approaching President Obasanjo on what is a difficult issue. Charles Taylor stands accused of the gravest human rights abuses and war crimes. We want to see him face the charges against him at the Sierra Leone Special Court. We hope regional leaders will support President Johnson-Sirleaf."

Taylor pitched Liberia into a civil war in 1989, when he launched an insurgency from his base in Ivory Coast. He was elected president in 1997 and has sponsored rebel movements throughout the region.

Sierra Leone's Special Court, a U.N.-sanctioned court comprised of national and international judges and prosecutors, indicted him on 17 counts of crimes against humanity, including mass murder, rape and the use of child soldiers. The court accused Taylor of training and equipping Sierra Leonean rebels believed responsible for killing, mutilating and terrorizing civilians in their quest to seize power and to control the country's lucrative diamond trade.

Liberia Seeks Extradition Of Indicted Ex-Leader (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Ex-President Charles Taylor, who lives in Nigeria, faces war crimes charges in Sierra Leone.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf has asked Nigeria to extradite her country's former leader, Charles Taylor, to face war crimes charges, a move cheered by human rights advocates that is also laden with risks for her battered West African country.

An international court in Sierra Leone, which borders Liberia, has a cell waiting for Taylor, who has been indicted on 17 counts of war crimes. The United States has been putting intense pressure on Nigeria and Liberia to ensure that Taylor faces trial for his role in Sierra Leone's 10-year civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0019379

In Sierra Leone, Taylor is accused of supporting rebels of the Revolutionary United Front, whose trademark was mutilating civilians and cutting off their limbs, as well as using children as soldiers. He left Liberia in 2003, accepting exile in Nigeria in a move that paved the way for the end of the civil war that racked his country.

Johnson-Sirleaf, a former World Bank official, upset the favored candidate, former soccer star George Weah, in a presidential election last year and took office in January. She has been applauded for her tough stance against corruption, but she also has alienated powerful figures in the country.

In recent months there has been increased speculation about a Taylor trial, and whether it would lead to a border attack on Sierra Leone by his supporters in Liberia or some other destabilizing event. Some have suggested holding the trial outside Africa, but many analysts say that would anger Africans who are highly sensitive to the legacy of colonialism.

President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria confirmed Friday that Liberia had formally sought Taylor's extradition.

Obasanjo has repeatedly promised to hand Taylor over if requested by a democratically elected Liberian president. However, he seemed to be setting new conditions, saying he intends to consult the African Union and West African government leaders.

Johnson-Sirleaf told journalists Friday that the decision would be a collective one involving African leaders. She appealed to the United Nations Security Council to help bring Taylor to justice.

"It is time to bring the Taylor issue to closure," she said.

Nigeria argues that the AU and the Economic Community of West African States, or ECOWAS, must be consulted because they were part of the original deal to exile Taylor. But human rights groups and analysts say that extradition may become bogged down in a long consultation process, or that Taylor may take advantage of the delay and flee.

"The prosecution itself does not necessarily agree that this [consultations with the AU and ECOWAS] is a precondition to the transfer at all," said Harpinder Athwal, special assistant to the prosecution at the Special Court for Sierra Leone. Those groups were involved at a point when Liberia did not have a functioning government, she said.

"Now this is an issue government-to-government and the prosecution doesn't necessarily see that there is a role for the African Union or ECOWAS," she said. "It only takes one spoiler to say 'no' for the whole thing to collapse again and then we're back to square one."

She said prosecution of Taylor would send a powerful message to Sierra Leone, to the region with its complex web of interrelated conflicts and to the world that no one is above the rule of law.

"Often it's seen that the rich and powerful escape the rules that have been set, that there's one rule for one person and another for another," Athwal said.

Johnson-Sirleaf has moved quickly in her first two months in office. She set up a truth and reconciliation commission, fired top officials in the Finance Ministry as part of her anti-corruption drive and barred officials of the former transitional government from traveling abroad until they underwent financial audits.

The transitional government consisted of members of factions from Liberia's 14-year civil war. When they left, there were reports that members stole cars, as well as the furniture, carpets and even the light fixtures in their offices.

The new president promised to give women's issues prominence, saying she had experienced the terror of attempted rape.

Johnson-Sirleaf won enthusiastic applause when she addressed a joint session of the U.S. Congress this week, and won the warm backing of the U.N. Security Council on Friday. But the extradition move is seen as her boldest yet.

"It's a very bold step," said Mike McGovern, West Africa analyst for the International Crisis Group. "It's going to buy her a degree of goodwill because people should recognize that she's taking a risk here for the sake of ending the culture of immunity and moving Liberia into a new era."

Corinne Dufka, West Africa analyst for Human Rights Watch, said there was no reason for Nigeria to balk at Johnson-Sirleaf's request.

"Now Obasanjo will have to move ahead, and do it quickly. We do not think that he needs to get approval from the African Union or from ECOWAS," Dufka said. "He has repeatedly stated that he will surrender former President Taylor after there has been a legitimate election in Liberia. That has happened. President Johnson-Sirleaf has made a request. There is no reason to delay this any further."

DOJ_NMG_0019380

*

Times staff writer Maggie Farley at the United Nations contributed to this report.

Liberia Seeks Handover Of Taylor To Court (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 18, 2006

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said Friday she wants ex-president Charles Taylor handed over to a war crimes tribunal for prosecution for his role in Sierra Leone's civil war, with the agreement of African leaders.

Sirleaf told the U.N. Security Council Liberia "is determined to address issues from our painful past ... so that the country can move ahead."

Taylor was given asylum in Nigeria to help end Liberia's civil war and Sirleaf said she and Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo agreed at a recent meeting to seek African leaders' views before any handover.

"I have consulted with Nigerian president Obasanjo and asked him that we and the leaders of Africa, particularly those that were involved in the arrangements that took Mr. Taylor to exile, now bring this matter to closure — and by closure I mean that that decision should be taken that would allow Mr. Taylor to have his day in court," Sirleaf told a news conference after addressing the Security Council.

Obasanjo, who was credited with helping end Liberia's civil war when he helped arrange Taylor's asylum, is consulting with other African leaders on how to respond to Sirleaf's request, his office said.

Both Nigeria and Liberia have been under heavy international pressure to hand over Taylor to the court.

Obasanjo had said he would consider any request by a democratically elected Liberian leader. Sirleaf became African's first woman president after winning election in January.

Taylor plunged Liberia into years of civil war in 1989 when he led a small rebel band that invaded from neighboring Ivory Coast. He was elected president in 1997 during a lull in fighting.

He has been indicted by a U.N. tribunal in Sierra Leone on charges of committing crimes against humanity while in office by aiding and directing a Sierra Leone rebel movement and trading guns and gems with the insurgents infamous for chopping off the lips, ears and limbs of civilian victims. Fighting ended in 2001 in Sierra Leone.

Taylor has lived in exile in the southern Nigerian city of Calabar since being forced from power under a peace deal brokered in 2003 that ended the rebel assault on the Liberian capital, Monrovia.

The first word of Liberia's move came from Obasanjo's office, which issued a statement earlier on Friday saying Liberia had asked for Taylor's extradition. It said the Nigerian president was consulting with leaders from the African Union and the Economic Community of West African States who helped broker Taylor's exile on how to respond.

When Sirleaf arrived at the United Nations and was asked about Nigeria's statement, she clarified that she wanted African leaders to agree to ask for Taylor's handover.

Sirleaf criticized Obasanjo and the international community for not acting much earlier to bring Taylor to justice.

She said Liberia was taking "a rather courageous but risky" stand because "Liberia's peace is fragile."

"There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor. There are many business interests he has. Whatever decision is taken by the African leadership must ensure that the safety of the Liberian people and the stability of our nation is not undermined," she said.

Sirleaf said she met with Obasanjo in response to the increasing international pressure.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told the Security Council that the United States supported efforts by Sirleaf, Obasanjo "and other African leaders to bring Charles Taylor to justice."

___

Associated Press Writer Bashir Adigun contributed to this story from Abuja, Nigeria.

African Hope (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0019381

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Good news out of Africa has been all too rare in recent years. But a major exception was the election last year of Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, who stopped by our offices yesterday after addressing the United Nations.

Established by former American slaves, Liberia descended into a hellish civil war in the 1990s -- a conflict that ex-Liberian President and fugitive war criminal Charles Taylor helped spread to neighboring countries like Sierra Leone. One of Mrs. Sirleaf's agenda items at Turtle Bay was requesting that Nigeria extradite Mr. Taylor to face charges at an international tribunal in Sierra Leone.

But more important for her country's future, Mrs. Sirleaf used her time with us to emphasize that Liberia is "open for business." She's a former World Bank economist herself, and she brought along a retinue of advisers who seemed to understand that low tax rates and the rule of law are the sine qua non of Liberian hopes for growth and development. What a refreshing difference from some other African leaders, who blame the West for every trouble. Asked if she believed the U.S. owes Liberia anything, she said flatly, "no." She just wants it to be treated like other countries.

Mrs. Sirleaf is the first woman elected as an African head of state, beating out soccer superstar George Weah for the post -- a remarkable sign of political maturity from war-ravaged Liberians. "The fact that I beat a football star is proof that African electorates are looking for someone who can reverse violence, oppression and lack of freedom," she told us. Let's hope so.

DOJ_NMG_0019382

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Judge Gives Prosecutors New Chance In Terror Case (NYT)..... 3
Moussaoui Prosecutors Get A Break (WP) 4
Moussaoui Ruling Breathes Life Into Prosecution (LAT)..... 5
Moussaoui Ruling Salvages The Trial (MINNST)..... 6
Moussaoui Trial Opened To 'Untainted' Witnesses (WT)..... 7
Judge Admits Evidence In Moussaoui Trial (KCS)..... 8
Judge In Moussaoui Trial Faces A Delicate Task (LAT) 9
Specter Eyes Oversight Of Spy Program (WT)..... 9
U.S. Lawyers Keep Silence On Listening In (NYT) 10
Pentagon Hired Contractor To Advise On Collecting Information On Churches, Mosques, Other U.S. Sites (KRT)..... 11
Foreign Firms A Mainstay Of Pentagon Contracting (WP)..... 12
Mideast Wrangle May Hit New Port Sale (FT)..... 13
Unnamed Source Told FBI He Saw Alleged Terrorists In Lodi (LODINS) 14
Witness Outlines Ties To Terror (STOCKREC) 14
LODI Muslims Skeptical About FBI's Informant They Say They'd Know If Terror Suspects Visited (SFC)..... 15
Attorney Seeks Data On Inmate Privacy (TOLB) 16
Bond Denied To Boca Doctor In Terrorism Case (MH)..... 17
Was Indictment Misleading? (SPT) 17
Gov't: Some Gitmo Cases Should Be Scuttled (AP) 19
Mosque Material Ordered Released (ALBTU)..... 19
U.S., Pakistan's Strategic Interests Are Converging (WSJ) 20
The Mayor And The Imam (NYT) 20
Ahern Asks Bush About CIA Flights Over EU (AP)..... 21
IRA-Allied Politician Detained At Airport From Times Wire Reports (LAT) 22

Homeland Response:

Bomb Material Got Past TSA Screeners (DMN) 22
White House Plans Smallpox Drill (AP) 23
Real Injustice (WP) 23
Port Authority Rejects Silverstein's Offer To Talk (NYT) 24
WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ) 25
Ground Zeroes (WSJ)..... 25
FEMA Will Try To Recoup Millions Distributed For Hurricane Relief (NYT) 26
In Louisiana, Graft Inquiries Are Increasing (NYT)..... 27
EPA Chief Backs Coast Restoration (NOTP)..... 29
A Hurricane And Espresso. What's Next? (NYT) 29
Blanco Plan Passes First Test (BRA)..... 30
Legislators OK Recovery Plan Grudgingly (NOTP)..... 31
Congress Boosts Flood Insurance Agency (AP) 32

War News:

Gen. Ambitious On Increasing Iraqi Control (AP)..... 33
U.S. Wants Fewer Troops In Line Of Fire (AP) 33
Convoy Duty Is Still Task Of U.S. (NOTP)..... 35
Pilgrims Attacked On Road To Holy City (WT/AP)..... 36
U.S. Seeks A Way Forward In Iraq (DMN)..... 36
Political Offensive Targets Bush (WT)..... 38
Wisconsin Voters Prepare To Weigh In On The War In Iraq (WP)..... 39
Even As Support For War Shrinks, Few Protest It (SFC)..... 40
Hold The President Accountable (NYT)..... 42
Democrats' Dilemma (NSWK) 42
Bush The "Incompetent" (TIME) 43
Bush Adviser Says Iran Bluffing On Iraq (AP) 44
U.S. Eyes Baghdad For Talks With Iran (WT)..... 44
U.S., Iran Closer To Talks On Iraq (WP) 45
Sunni Leaders Say U.S.-Iran Talks Amount To Meddling (NYT) 46
Iran, U.S. Disagree Over Goal Of Talks (LAT) 47
ANALYSIS: Talks With Iran Could Help Bush (MINNST/AP)..... 49
'War' As Epithet: Sound Of Clay Feet Cracking (NYT)..... 49
Why Iran Wants To Talk (WP) 51
U.N. To Raise Its Profile In Iraq (WT) 51
Ringleader In Custody, Iraqi Officials Say (LAT) 52
Study Is Said To Find Overlap In U.S. Counterterror Effort (NYT)54
Documents Reveal Iraqis Dodging Inspectors (AP) 55
New Documents From Saddam Hussein's Archives Discuss Bin Laden, WMDs (ABC) 56
Papers Give Glimpse Of Al-Qaida Recruits (LAT/AP)..... 57
Cited As Symbol Of Abu Ghraib, Man Admits He Is Not In Photo (NYT) 58
Times Says It Misidentified Iraqi As Hooded Prisoner (WP) 60
Abu Ghraib Dog Handler Case Goes To Jury (AP)..... 61
Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqis (AP) 61
U.S. To Investigate Civilian Deaths In Iraq (KRT) 62
Casualty Of War (NSWK) 63
The War Through A Father's Eyes (WP)..... 64
Was The War Worth It? (TIME) 65
Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT/AFP) 66

DOJ:
Justice Lawyer Named Interim U.S. Attorney (AP-Y2) ... 67
Alexandria Federal Prosecutor Sworn In (WP) ... 67

Corporate Scandals:
Two Cheers For Nancy Pelosi (WSJ) ... 68

Criminal Law:
Prosecutor Opposes Libby Motion To Dismiss (AP) ... 69
Charges Against Cowles Dropped (WP) ... 69
Enron Trial Approaches Halfway Point (AP) ... 70
In Enron Trial, Witnesses' Quirks And Stamina Are On The Stand (WP) ... 71
Court Reverses Death Sentence Of L.A. Man (LAT) ... 72
Feds May Drop Capital Case: Dot Men Face Death Penalty In Slay (BOSH) ... 73
Mariano Guilty Of Corruption Charges (PHI) ... 73
JURY: MARIANO'S CORRUPT (PHDN) ... 75
Philly Councilman Found Guilty Of Bribery, Money Laundering (AP) ... 76
Philly Councilman Guilty In Bribery Case (UPI) ... 77
Once A Key Political Ally, Now Alone (PHI) ... 77
Immediate Fate Of Mariano's Council Seat Unclear (PHI) ... 78
Job, Pension Go When Rick Does (PHDN) ... 79
Editorial | The Rick Mariano Verdict (PHI) ... 79
Laski Admits Guilt, Braces For Jail Time (CHIT) ... 79
Laski Admits Taking Payoffs (CHIST) ... 80
Former Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Trucking Scandal (AP) ... 81
Ex-Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty In Trucking Kickback Scheme (LAT) ... 82
Man Held In Isolation On Child Porn Charges (CHIST) ... 83
Cyber Sex Crime Unit Begun (INDYSTAR) ... 84
3 Sentenced In ELF Terror Case (SACBEE) ... 84
6-Year Prison Sentence In Series Of Arsons (LAT) ... 85
3 Eco-terrorists Sentenced For Firebombs (MHCA/AP) ... 85

Civil Law:
Google Doesn't Have To Turn Over Query Data (WSJ) ... 86
U.S. Is Denied Google Queries (LAT) ... 86
Google To Reveal Sites, Not Searches (AP) ... 87
Google Wins Ruling On Turning Over Search Queries To Government (BLOOM) ... 87
Searching For Google (WSJ) ... 88

Civil Rights:
N.C., Justice Department Agree On Overseas Voting In 2nd Primary (CO) ... 89
Group Charges Libraries Filtered Out Web Site (SLPD) ... 89
Whistle-Blower Or Thief In Diebold Case? (LAT) ... 90
Putting A Racist Past In The Past (LAT) ... 91
2nd Autopsy In Youth Boot Camp Death Fails To End Questions (NYT) ... 92
Federal Appeals Court Allows 'Choose Life' License Plates In Tennessee (FINDLAW/AP) ... 93
After 2 More Deaths, Planned Parenthood Alters Method For Abortion Pill (NYT) ... 94
FDA Says 2 More Women Have Died After Taking Abortion Pill (WP) ... 95
FDA Says Two More Women Dead After Abortion Pill Use (WT) 96
2 More Women Die After Taking Abortion Pills (LAT) ... 96
Birth Control (WSJ) ... 97
Abortion Nation (WSJ) ... 98
FDA To Review Ban On Gay Men Donating Blood (WP) ... 99

Antitrust:
Maytag, Whirlpool Deal At Risk (AP) ... 99
Whirlpool's Maytag Purchase May Be Opposed By U.S. (Update7) (BLOOM) ... 100
4 Companies Under Federal Investigation (BEAUENT) ... 102
Airlines Can Legally Meet (FWST) ... 102
That Other Madness This Month: Mergers (NYT) ... 103

Environment:
Judges Overturn Bush Bid To Ease Pollution Rules (NYT) ... 104
Court Rejects EPA's Loosening Of Air Rule (LAT) ... 105
Looser Emission Rules Rejected (WP) ... 106
Court Overturns Bush Clean Air Act Exemption In Loss For Power Industry (WSJ) ... 107
U.S. Court Blocks EPA Standard On Modernizing Plants, Factories (BLOOM) ... 108
Budget Vote Revives Bid For Arctic Oil Drilling (WP) ... 109

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Mexico's Attempt To Quell Drug Violence Falters (KRT) ... 109

Immigration:
Frist Immigration Bill Would Target Bosses (AP) ... 111
An Immigration Breakthrough (NYT) ... 111
Ireland Asks Bush For Alien Amnesty (WT) ... 112

Tax:
Judge Ties Up Tax Firm (SBCS) ... 113

Congress-Administration:
Politics Drives A Senate Spending Spree (NYT) ... 113
GOP Spenders Think Voters Dismiss Deficits (LAT) ... 115
Testing Errors Prompt Calls For Oversight (NYT) ... 116
'Teach To The Test'? What Test? (WP) ... 118
April May Bring New Medicare Drug Problems (AP) ... 118
Health Secretary: Costs Too High (PPG) ... 119
Congress Backs Off From Lobbying Limits (KRT) ... 120
House GOP Leader Well Traveled (WP) ... 121
Opening The Door On The Credit Report And Throwing Away The Lock (NYT) ... 122

Other News:
'A Strong Move Higher' (WSJ) ... 124
Housing, Inflation Data Give Investors A Boost (WT/AP) ... 125
U.S. Stocks Rise, Notching Best Week In 2 Months; Boeing Gains (BLOOM) ... 126
Oil And Productivity Set A Positive Tone (WP/AP) ... 127
Industrial Output Advanced Briskly Last Month (WSJ) ... 128
U.S. Economy: Industrial Production Rebounds In Feb. (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 129

DOJ_NMG_0019384

Reduced Gas Price Slows Inflation (WT/AP) 130
New York Congressman Won't Seek 13th Term (NYT) 131
N.Y. Republican Boehlert Won't Seek 13th House Term (WP). 132
Rep. Sabo To End His Long Career In Congress (MINNST) 132
U.S. Seen As Failing To Engage In U.N. Process (LAT) 134
Rice Urges Better Japan-China Ties (WT) 136
China May Release Jailed Times Researcher, Lawyer Says (NYT) 136
China Dismisses Journalist's Case (WP)..... 137
China Dismisses Case Against US Reporter (FT)..... 139
Chinese Researcher For New York Times To Be Let Out Of Jail (LAT) 139
German Trial Promises A Look Into The Nuclear Black Market (LAT) 140
Hamas Ready To Announce Government (AP) 141
Hamas To Propose Palestinian Cabinet That Excludes Other Parties (NYT) 142
Fatah Officials Call For Abbas To Resign (AP) 142
Netanyahu Angles For Yet Another Comeback (LAT) 143
How I Learned To Love The Wall (NYT)..... 145
Israel Announces First Cases Of Deadly Bird Flu Strain, In Turkeys (WP) 146
As Spring Thaws The Caucasus, Birds And Fear Are Flying North Through Georgia (NYT) 146
G-8 Countries Back Nuclear Power In Future (WT/AP) 147
Russia Effectively Closes A Political Opponent's Rights Group (NYT) 148
U.S. May Consider New Belarus Sanctions (WP) 149
Pelosi Seeks End To Darfur Violence (WT)..... 150
Liberian Seeks Extradition Of Predecessor For Atrocities Trial (NYT) 151
Liberia Seeks Trial For Ex-President (WP)..... 151
Liberia Seeks Extradition Of Indicted Ex-Leader (LAT)..... 152
Liberia Seeks Handover Of Taylor To Court (AP) 153
African Hope (WSJ) 154

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Gives Prosecutors New Chance In Terror Case (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — The judge in the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui said on Friday that prosecutors could try to find new, untainted aviation-security witnesses to replace those who were barred from testifying because they were improperly coached by a government lawyer.

The ruling effectively allows the government to try to salvage its effort to execute Mr. Moussaoui, the only person charged in a United States courtroom with responsibility for the deaths in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The judge, Leonie M. Brinkema of Federal District Court, declined to undo her earlier decision prohibiting the prosecutors from using any of the aviation officials they originally intended to call as witnesses because they had been coached by Carla J. Martin, a government lawyer who was assisting the prosecutors.

The trial, which is solely about whether Mr. Moussaoui should be executed or jailed for life, was on the brink of falling apart after the judge's ruling on Wednesday struck at the heart of the government's case. The chief prosecutor, Robert J. Spencer, had told the judge there would "be no point in going forward" unless she relented in some manner.

But even as Judge Brinkema denied the prosecutors' request that she reconsider her striking of those witnesses, she accepted a suggestion that they put forward in a court filing: that they be allowed to try to find someone new to present the same testimony.

"The government's proposed alternate remedy of allowing it to call untainted aviation witnesses or otherwise produce evidence not tainted by Ms. Martin has merit," Judge Brinkema wrote.

Tasia Scolinos, the Justice Department's spokeswoman, said in response, "We are pleased to be able to move forward with this important case on behalf of the thousands of victims and their families."

That means the trial, in its second week when it was thrown into turmoil by the disclosure of Ms. Martin's behavior, will resume Monday morning with the cross-examination of an F.B.I. agent who arrested and interviewed Mr. Moussaoui three weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks.

But the question remains as to whether it is possible to find new witnesses who are not only untainted, as the judge has required, but familiar enough with the state of aviation security in August 2001 to help support the government's case.

Mr. Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks after having been arrested for immigration violations in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly a jetliner. The Justice Department has asserted that he is nonetheless responsible for the Sept. 11 deaths because he had lied to investigators and concealed his membership in Al Qaeda and his knowledge of that group's plans to fly planes into buildings.

DOJ_NMG_0019385

The government's main aviation-security witness, Lynne Osmus, a senior official of the Federal Aviation Administration in August 2001, was to testify about what steps the agency "could" have taken had Mr. Moussaoui told investigators what he knew about Al Qaeda's plans.

The prosecutors were prepared to have Ms. Osmus, in particular, assert that the agency could have issued a directive putting in place 10 security measures, including a ban on short-blade knives like those used by the Sept. 11 hijackers and also owned by Mr. Moussaoui. The judge has barred aviation witnesses from testifying as to what the government "would" have done, because that would be speculation.

Edward B. MacMahon Jr., the chief defense lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui, said in a court filing that he did not believe it was possible to find any new, untainted witnesses because anyone who had the expertise of Ms. Osmus would by now have been exposed to the coaching suggestions of Ms. Martin through news reports.

Mr. MacMahon said that it was possible that someone familiar with how the aviation agency operated in August 2001 might not have had contact with Ms. Martin, but that it was highly implausible that such people would not have read about her suggestions to the witnesses.

But Justice Department officials said they were confident they could find witnesses who would be deemed authoritative and untainted.

Ms. Martin's name came up in other court proceedings Friday as lawyers defending the airlines against Sept. 11 liability suits denied that they had communicated with her. Lawyers for family members of flight attendants killed in the attacks had raised questions about alleged contacts between Ms. Martin and the airlines' lawyers.

Moussaoui Prosecutors Get A Break (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Judge to Allow Testimony From Untainted Witnesses

A federal judge yesterday revived the Justice Department's death penalty case for Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, accepting a compromise offered by prosecutors to find new aviation security witnesses not tainted by the misconduct of a government lawyer.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema caps an extraordinary week in the terror prosecution and means that Moussaoui's death penalty hearing will resume Monday in Alexandria. The proceeding had been imperiled by Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who violated a court order and improperly contacted witnesses.

"I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors . . . and I agree it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward to some final resolution," Brinkema said in a teleconference with case attorneys, according to a transcript.

The ruling amends an order Brinkema issued Tuesday that shook the sentencing hearing of the only person convicted in the United States on charges stemming from the attacks on Sept. 11, 2001. Brinkema barred the testimony of seven witnesses contacted by Martin and banned all other aviation evidence. Immediately after the ruling, prosecutors said it might be pointless to continue, because such evidence is crucial to their case.

But the judge yesterday allowed the government to present aviation evidence through new witnesses untainted by any association with Martin. "We are pleased to be able to move forward with this important case on behalf of the thousands of victims and their families," said Tasia Scolinos, a Justice Department spokeswoman.

The ruling allows the government to present a fuller version of its central argument for why Moussaoui should be executed: that if he had truthfully confessed his knowledge of the Sept. 11 plot, the attacks could have been prevented.

Although the government will continue its case, legal experts said the week's events still leave prosecutors in a tough spot. Martin had worked on the case since at least 2002 and had contact with aviation security experts throughout the government.

"They're going to need to scrounge around pretty hard and find some alternative evidence," said Paul Rothstein, who teaches national security at Georgetown University's law school. "The government is not entirely dead in the water. I think their plans for this case are severely damaged but salvageable."

Prosecutors are left to scramble to find new witnesses for a case they have been building for four years against Moussaoui, 37, who pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the attacks.

"We're working on it, your honor," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Spencer said in the teleconference. He said the government probably will have one or two new witnesses available by late Tuesday or Wednesday.

As the case moved on without Martin, her conduct continued to reverberate yesterday. Moussaoui's attorneys are likely to try to get evidence of her actions before the jury, and yesterday they filed a motion asking Brinkema to summon Martin to court Monday to testify at a special hearing.

"Given the importance of understanding the extent of the taint and the critical impact Ms. Martin's actions have had on this case," the defense filing said, "it is imperative that before any additional 'untainted' aviation witnesses are permitted to testify, the extent of Ms. Martin's actions are explained by the only person in a position to know, Ms. Martin."

Prosecutors said they welcomed the opportunity to question Martin but only if her attorney guaranteed that she would not invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify.

Martin's attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., said he had sent a letter to the two sides and to Brinkema saying Martin would not testify Monday. He said she needs more time to assemble witnesses and documents in defense of her actions. "If she is going to be accused of committing a crime, we want the opportunity to put on a defense," Howard said. "We think it will take more than just her testifying."

Brinkema has not ruled on the defense motion for a hearing.

In e-mails to the seven witnesses, Martin was highly critical of the prosecution's argument that aviation officials could have kept the hijackers' knives from getting onto the planes, and defense attorneys might want jurors to hear of her doubts. But experts said it would be difficult for the defense to persuade Brinkema to allow evidence of Martin's conduct or e-mails. "It shouldn't come in, and I don't see how it would," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond. "It could poison the minds of the jury."

Jurors are under strict orders not to read news accounts of the trial, and Brinkema is likely to question them about that Monday. When she halted the sentencing hearing, after prosecutors alerted her to Martin's conduct, Brinkema told jurors that the issue involved the misconduct of a government lawyer not on the prosecution team.

Martin violated a standing court order by e-mailing trial transcripts to the seven witnesses and coaching them on their testimony. All those witnesses worked for the government and were experts on aviation security. They would have testified about the government's ability to have stopped the terror attacks had Moussaoui not lied to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001.

Brinkema had ruled earlier that most witnesses could not attend or follow the trial and could not read transcripts. After a hearing Tuesday, Brinkema barred the testimony of the seven witnesses and the aviation evidence. That evidence is key, because about half of the prosecution's case consists of showing that airport security would have been dramatically stepped up if Moussaoui had provided the information.

In her revised order yesterday, Brinkema denied a request from prosecutors that she restore all of the aviation evidence. But she accepted their suggestion that they be allowed to present other aviation witnesses who had no contact with Martin.

Brinkema also said prosecutors could call only aviation witnesses who would testify about what the government could have done to stop the attacks if Moussaoui had confessed his knowledge of the plot. She said the witnesses "may not, however, testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information, as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury."

Staff writer Keith L. Alexander contributed to this report.

Moussaoui Ruling Breathes Life Into Prosecution (LAT)

By Richard Serrano

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — The federal judge in the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui refused today to reconsider her ruling banning testimony by aviation witnesses improperly influenced by a government attorney, but did allow prosecutors to use other airport security witnesses who were "untainted" by attorney Carla J. Martin.

With prosecutors unlikely to appeal the issue further, the judge's compromise appeared to put the troubled trial back on track when it is scheduled to resume before the jury Monday morning. But prosecutors will be working from a marked disadvantage, with much of the central part of their case stricken from the trial.

Prosecutors indicated they would use a single witness in place of the six who were improperly coached by government lawyer Martin, calling it an "imperfect" solution.

And U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema added another restriction: any such witness may only testify that aviation officials "could" have prevented the Sept. 11 terror attacks had Moussaoui cooperated with the FBI. She said they would not be allowed to back the prosecution's contention that the Al Qaeda hijackers "would" have been stopped at the airport.

This week, prosecutors said they would have had to abandon efforts to secure the death penalty for the 37-year-old French terrorist if they were not allowed to put on some aviation testimony.

In their opening statements March 6, prosecutors told the jury they would prove that security officials would have stopped the Sept. 11 hijackers at the airports had Moussaoui helped them after his arrest in August 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0019387

Moussaoui last year pleaded guilty to plotting with the Sept. 11 hijackers. Jurors are now being asked to decide whether he should be sentenced to death or to life in prison. He was in jail when the attacks occurred, but the government contends that he was responsible for the loss of lives because he failed to alert the FBI to the plot.

The case came near to collapse Monday when the judge learned that Martin, a 15-year government attorney working for the Transportation Security Administration, had violated the court's order against sharing trial transcripts with witnesses and trying to shape their testimony.

Brinkema ordered all aviation witnesses and evidence stricken from the trial. Prosecutors asked her to reconsider, saying that they needed to put some aviation testimony before the jury in order to win a sentence of death for Moussaoui.

The sanction would leave prosecutors "with no way to show what the FBI could have done with information it had obtained about the hijackers. More important … the jury and the public will see only half the picture of what could have happened had the defendant told the truth," the government said.

Prosecutors proposed alternatives to an outright ban on aviation testimony and evidence, which the judge agreed to today. But she warned that the new witnesses "may not testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information" from Moussaoui, "as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury."

The government's new testimony and evidence centers on a "no transport" security directive, commonly called a "no fly list," that prosecutors said security officials would have put in place if they believed a Sept. 11-like attack was imminent.

"This evidence is simple, straightforward, and entirely uncontroversial, consisting mainly of FAA security directives issued over the years," the prosecutors said. "We would call one witness to explain what they are and how they are used to keep suspected terrorists from boarding commercial aircraft."

This, they said, "will allow us to present our complete theory of the case, albeit in imperfect form. We can then carry out our arguments from the FBI through to the FAA transport directive and present to the jury some semblance of what really could have happened had the defendant told the truth upon arrest."

They described this witness as someone who was "easily free of the specter of taint caused by Martin."

"We can readily call a witness who worked at the FAA during August 2001, and who had no contact with Ms. Martin during this prosecution," they said.

Moussaoui's defense attorneys had urged the judge to throw out the death penalty. They told the judge that allowing new, untainted witnesses would be unfair to the defense because Moussaoui's lawyers would not have enough time to investigate their claims and prepare to cross-examine them.

To that end, the judge ordered the government to give the defense the names of the new witnesses and the nature of their testimony at least three days before they are called to testify.

Martin awaits a hearing before the trial judge on possible civil or criminal contempt charges.

Moussaoui Ruling Salvages The Trial (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 18, 2006

The judge agreed to let "untainted" witnesses testify, saving enough of the prosecutors' case to resume trial Monday.

ALEXANDRIA, VA. - A federal judge put the death-penalty trial of confessed Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui back on track Friday, allowing prosecutors to present evidence "untainted" by a government lawyer's improper coaching of witnesses.

But District Judge Leonia Brinkema refused a request from prosecutors to entirely rescind an order earlier in the week barring aviation-related witnesses and evidence.

Brinkema's ruling appears to have allowed the government to salvage enough of its case for the trial to resume on Monday, after a week-long recess.

Prosecutors had told Brinkema their case would collapse without testimony from senior Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) security officials.

"I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors, that we have an excellent jury of 17," Brinkema told lawyers, according to a transcript of their conference call. "And I agree that it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward to some final resolution."

But defense lawyers promptly filed papers asking the judge to reopen an inquiry into Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla Martin's improper contacts with witnesses by calling Martin to testify next week so the full "extent of the taint" can be examined.

DOJ_NMG_0019388

The aviation evidence is critical because prosecutors are seeking to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the FBI and FAA would have stopped the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks if Moussaoui had told what he knew about a suicide hijacking plot when he was arrested in the Twin Cities in August, 2001.

'Could,' not 'would'

In her two-page order, Brinkema stressed that the aviation witnesses may testify to what "could" have happened if Moussaoui had been truthful when interrogated in Minnesota.

"The witness, or witnesses, may not, however, testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information, as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury," the judge wrote.

The 17 jurors in the only U.S. criminal prosecution stemming from the terrorist attacks have heard no testimony this week because of the imbroglio over Martin's approaches to seven potential aviation-security witnesses.

During an extraordinary hearing Tuesday, six of the witnesses -- including four tabbed as hostile defense witnesses -- each testified that Martin sent them a transcript of the trial's first day. E-mails showed that she also made suggestions as to how they could adjust their testimony so it meshed better with lead prosecutor Robert Spencer's opening statement.

Brinkema ruled that the witnesses' testimony had been so "tainted" that they must be excluded to protect Moussaoui's constitutional rights.

She said the rights of the 37-year-old Frenchman of Moroccan descent also were violated because Martin advised prosecutors that the four government officials sought by the defense would not speak with defense attorneys, even though she had yet to check with them.

'Terribly excessive'

Prosecutors petitioned for reconsideration, arguing that the sanction was "terribly excessive," and came up with a compromise solution in which Brinkema would allow an FAA official who had no contact with Martin to testify as to how the agency's "no fly list" prevents suspected terrorists from boarding aircraft.

Defense lawyers responded that it is "difficult, if not impossible," to imagine that such an untainted witness exists and that "assurances that there is a rock at the FAA under which that person has been found should be greeted with the skepticism it plainly deserves."

Michael Mello, a University of Vermont law professor specializing in capital cases, said he questions whether prosecutors will find any "completely untainted" witnesses.

"If they've been following [the case] as closely as I have, they can't testify," he said. "If they've been reading daily newspapers and watching the news, they're going to know generally what's been happening in the trial, who's been saying what."

Defense lawyers also pointed to a federal law requiring that, in capital cases, the government must identify all witnesses at least three days before a trial begins. Brinkema's order requires the government to notify defense lawyers three days before any new aviation witness is called and to turn over new exhibits as soon as they are available.

Moussaoui Trial Opened To 'Untainted' Witnesses (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

A federal judge in the death penalty trial of admitted al Qaeda terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui yesterday changed course and said the prosecutors can call "untainted" aviation specialists as witnesses, restoring a major part of the government's case.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema did not overturn her Wednesday ruling to bar witnesses coached by an outside lawyer, but granted prosecutors' request to offer new witnesses and evidence.

In her order, the judge said the new witnesses can only testify to what the U.S. government "could have done to prevent" the September 11 attacks had Moussaoui disclosed during his August 2001 arrest that he was training to attack U.S. targets with planes.

"The witness, or witnesses, may not, however, testify as to what the United States government 'would' have done with this information, as such testimony would be unduly speculative and misleading to the jury," she said.

The ruling was a victory for prosecutors, who had considered abandoning their case when Judge Brinkema banned testimony from Federal Aviation Administration officials because they were given transcripts of the trial in violation of earlier court orders.

Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen of Moroccan descent, pleaded guilty in April to charges of conspiring with al Qaeda terrorists in the September 11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people. The penalty trial is to determine whether he should be sentenced to life in prison without the possibility of parole or receive a lethal injection.

DOJ_NMG_0019389

He denied being a part of the initial attack but said he was in training for a second wave of hijacked airplanes to slam into U.S. targets. In his plea, Moussaoui admitted knowing the 19 al Qaeda hijackers were going to fly aircraft into U.S. buildings.

Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who coached the witnesses, has since been placed on paid administrative leave from her $120,000-a-year job as an attorney adviser.

She has been threatened by the judge with criminal and civil contempt and has been labeled by prosecutors as a "miscreant," whose "aberrant and apparently criminal behavior should not be the basis for undoing the good work of so many."

Moussaoui's lawyers argued that it will be difficult to find any witness who has not been following the recent events in the trial.

"The existence of such a person is difficult, if not impossible to imagine and assurances that there is a rock at the FAA under which that person has been found should be greeted with the skepticism it plainly deserves," defense attorney Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said.

In a separate motion, Mr. MacMahon said, "The government should not be given an end-run around its creation of a record simply too riddled with problems."

Judge Brinkema ordered the government to provide "the name or names of such untainted witnesses" to the defense no less than three days before they are to testify.

She also told prosecutors to hand over to defense counsel all appropriate information as well as untainted physical evidence as soon as it is available.

The trial is scheduled to resume at 9:30 a.m. Monday.

Judge Admits Evidence In Moussaoui Trial (KCS)

By Matthew Barakat And Michael J. Sniffen

The Kansas City Star, March 18, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. - The death-penalty trial of al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui is back on track after a judge reversed course and agreed to admit some evidence about aviation security.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema relented Friday from her earlier order barring all such testimony. She had issued that ruling Tuesday as punishment for the alleged misconduct of Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla J. Martin, who coached witnesses.

"It would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward to some final resolution," Brinkema told trial attorneys in a telephone conference. Moussaoui is the only person charged in this country in connection with the al-Qaida terror network's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

The trial, begun March 6 and suspended for a week to deal with the misconduct, is to resume Monday with the jury back in court.

Late Friday, Moussaoui's lawyers asked Brinkema to further investigate Martin on Monday before allowing any aviation testimony. Prosecutors agreed, if Martin is willing to testify. Brinkema gave no immediate response.

The judge accepted a compromise proposal by the government. It allows prosecutors to present limited testimony about what the government could have done to enhance aviation security before the Sept. 11 attacks if Moussaoui had not lied to FBI agents Aug. 16-17, 2001, about his al-Qaida membership and plans to crash a jetliner into the White House.

Prosecutors had told Brinkema their case would be gutted without at least some testimony on aviation security. While they disputed her ruling that the aviation security evidence was contaminated beyond repair by Martin, prosecutors suggested using a new, substitute witness and documents that Martin had no contact with.

Prosecutors said a substitute witness could be found who worked at the Federal Aviation Administration around Sept. 11 and could discuss how government used "no-fly" lists to bar specific terrorist suspects from airplanes.

The testimony is crucial because prosecutors must prove that Moussaoui's actions led directly to at least one death on Sept. 11 to obtain the death penalty. They argue that Moussaoui's lies about his true intentions prevented the FBI from identifying some hijackers in advance and prevented the FAA from taking airport security steps to keep them off airplanes.

Moussaoui's lawyers had urged Brinkema not to reconsider. They said federal law since 1790 has required that the defense be notified of the government's witnesses at least three days before trial in death-penalty cases. Allowing new witnesses mid-trial would leave them unprepared, the defense argued.

Brinkema acknowledged that substitute government witnesses would present problems for the defense, including finding rebuttal witnesses.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaida to crash airplanes into U.S. buildings. But Moussaoui denies any role in 9/11 and says he was training for a possible later attack on the White House. The current trial is to determine whether he is executed or spends life in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0019390

A hearing Tuesday revealed that Martin sent current and former FAA employees a transcript of the trial's first day and coached them on how to testify about certain topics to deflect the kinds of attacks the defense mounted that day.

Judge In Moussaoui Trial Faces A Delicate Task (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 19, 2006

Deciding when attorney who 'tainted' witnesses will testify while keeping jury intact are her foremost concerns.

WASHINGTON — With the sentencing trial for Zacarias Moussaoui stumbling forward again, lawyers for the two sides were sharply at odds Saturday over when a government attorney would testify about why she tried to influence witnesses.

The coaching efforts by Carla J. Martin nearly shattered the prosecution's effort to have Moussaoui receive the death penalty for his role in the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

Defense lawyers want Martin on the stand as soon as Monday in the trial over whether Moussaoui, 37, should be executed or sentenced to life in prison.

Prosecutors want to delay Martin's appearance until the middle of the week and have her testify only if she agrees to answer questions about her conduct and not invoke the 5th Amendment against self-incrimination.

"We see no reason" to have Martin take the stand "simply to have [her] invoke her rights," prosecutor Robert A. Spencer said in court papers.

In the middle of the dispute is Judge Leonie M. Brinkema.

Clearly irked by the revelations about Martin early last week, Brinkema has made no secret of her view that the lawyer with the Transportation Security Administration may end up with criminal or civil sanctions for attempting to coach several witnesses.

But Brinkema also is trying to keep together a jury that has been left in the dark over the developments in the case — the only one to be tried in the U.S. that stems from the 2001 attacks.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last year to plotting with the hijackers. The government contends he should be put to death because he failed to alert the FBI to the plot, which resulted in the deaths of almost 3,000 people.

"I'm fully aware of how important it is for this matter to become resolved," the judge told the prosecution and defense teams in a teleconference session late Friday. "I'm fully aware of the huge resources that have been expended on this case, the fact that we summoned 850 jurors, that we have an excellent jury of 17, and I agree that it would be unfortunate if this case could not go forward …. "

One week into the trial, Brinkema abruptly stopped it Monday when word surfaced that Martin had attempted to influence witnesses from the transportation agency and the Federal Aviation Administration. Martin briefly appeared in court on Tuesday but declined to testify and was excused until she could find legal representation.

Her newly hired lawyer, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., has since said she was eager to testify but needed some time to prepare.

"She is entitled to a fair opportunity to prepare and present her side and a fair judgment of her intentions, her conduct and the conduct of others," Howard said.

Brinkema first banned from the trial all testimony and evidence about aviation security because of Martin's action. But the judge scaled back her ruling Friday, allowing prosecutors to present one or two witnesses on the issue who were not "tainted" by Martin.

For prosecutors, that decision drew new breath into their case for the death penalty for Moussaoui.

They had told jurors they would prove that, had the French citizen cooperated with the FBI upon his arrest on an immigration violation in August 2001, the government would have tightened airport security across the country. Those measures, prosecutors said, could have prevented hijackers from making it onto the airplanes used in the Sept. 11 attacks.

Defense lawyer Edward B. MacMahon Jr. said in court papers that he wanted Martin on the stand after he finished cross-examining FBI Special Agent Harry Samit on Monday morning, which is where the trial left off when it was postponed.

He said she should be the next witness before the prosecution brought in any "untainted" witnesses on aviation security because her testimony would provide "critical information" about the nature of the witness-tampering effort.

Specter Eyes Oversight Of Spy Program (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter introduced a bill this week to increase congressional oversight of President Bush's warrantless spy program and require a court review of the program for its constitutionality.

The Pennsylvania Republican said rule of law takes precedent even when the nation is at war with a new type of enemy capable of exploiting modern technology.

DOJ_NMG_0019391

"Our enemy is the enemy of freedom, and we will not give that enemy the satisfaction of making us give up the very freedom we cherish," Mr. Specter said on the Senate floor.

Under Mr. Specter's bill, the administration would be required to present the program to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act (FISA) court, the federal panel charged by Congress with granting warrants for wiretaps for gathering foreign intelligence.

The bill also would require that the administration go before the FISA court to renew the program every 45 days. And every six months, an analysis of the program would be submitted to the chairmen and ranking members of the House and Senate intelligence committees.

Both Republicans and Democrats have accused Mr. Bush of circumventing federal law to spy on people in the U.S. The White House says the program has been used selectively and only on calls coming from numbers linked to terrorists from foreign countries.

Mr. Specter's bill comes after four other Republicans introduced a separate bill that would address the spy program.

A bill by Republican Sens. Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine would allow the National Security Agency to use warrantless wiretaps for up to 45 days.

At that point, the proposed legislation would require the Department of Justice to drop the surveillance, get a FISA warrant or seek a bypass from congressional leaders.

Among Democrats, only Sen. Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin has moved yet toward official action in response to the spy program. He introduced a resolution earlier this week to censure Mr. Bush.

While many Democrats have expressed interest in legislation to curb the spying, they haven't shown much support for Mr. Feingold's effort and have yet to introduce any bills.

Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and ranking member of the Judiciary Committee, did write Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales asking for information about any defendants netted by the program who are challenging their cases in court.

"According to press accounts, several terrorism defendants have filed legal challenges to the President's program of electronic surveillance of Americans without a warrant," wrote Mr. Leahy and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat.

"The Judiciary Committee is continuing its inquiry into the President's 'Terrorist Surveillance Program,' and we ask that you send for our review a list of every criminal case in which a defendant is alleging that evidence was illegally obtained through this program ... ."

U.S. Lawyers Keep Silence On Listening In (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

Is the government secretly monitoring communications between plaintiffs and their lawyers in a federal class-action lawsuit against former Attorney General John Ashcroft and other top officials? Government lawyers yesterday politely refused a court order that they answer that question, asking instead that the court reconsider the order.

The plaintiffs in the case are Muslim immigrants who were swept up in the New York area after Sept. 11, 2001, detained for months and deported after being cleared of any links to terrorism.

Magistrate Judge Steven M. Gold of United States District Court in Brooklyn ordered the government on March 7 to guarantee in writing that neither the litigation team nor the potential witnesses — who include the F.B.I. director, Robert S. Mueller III — were aware of such eavesdropping, and that no such evidence would be used in the case.

But Stephen E. Handler of the Justice Department wrote in a filing yesterday that if knowledge of such activity were denied in one case, a refusal to confirm or deny it in another case "could itself tend to reveal classified information."

A legal scholar said the government's refusal raised new concerns about the scope of a program of electronic interceptions conducted without a warrant by National Security Agency inside and outside the United States under an executive order being challenged in a separate lawsuit.

"This is a pretty clear red flag" that eavesdropping occurred in the detainees' case, said Stephen J. Schulhofer, a professor of law at New York University who is an expert on national security. "The kind of surveillance that the president authorized under the N.S.A. wiretap was very likely deployed against these individuals when one party to the conversation was abroad and one party to the conversation, probably their lawyers, were in this country."

Rachel Meeropol, a lawyer for the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents the detainees, said she was shocked by the government's stance.

DOJ_NMG_0019392

"The implication of this letter is that attorneys defending the United States in civil cases could have access to the confidential communication between their opponents and their opponents' clients," she said. "You can't ethically represent a client if you can't have a conversation with them where you're secure that your opponent can't hear it."

Pentagon Hired Contractor To Advise On Collecting Information On Churches, Mosques, Other U.S. Sites (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Pentagon intelligence agency that kept files on American anti-war activists hired one of the contractors who bribed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, R-Calif., to help it collect data on houses of worship, schools, power plants and other locations in the United States.

MZM Inc., headed by Mitchell Wade, also received three contracts totaling more than $250,000 to provide unspecified "intelligence services" to the White House, according to documents obtained by Knight Ridder. The White House didn't respond to an inquiry about what those intelligence services entailed.

MZM's Pentagon and White House deals were part of tens of millions of dollars in federal government business that Wade's company attracted beginning in 2002.

MZM and Wade, who pleaded guilty last month to bribing Cunningham and unnamed Defense Department officials to steer work to his firm, are the focus of ongoing probes by Pentagon and Department of Justice investigators.

In February 2003, MZM won a two-month contract worth $503,144.70 to provide technical support to the Pentagon's Joint Counter-Intelligence Field Activity, or CIFA. The top-secret agency was created five months earlier primarily to protect U.S. defense personnel and facilities from foreign terrorists.

The job involved advising CIFA on selecting software and technology designed to ferret out commercial and government data that could be used in what's called a Geospatial Information System. A GIS system inserts information about geographic locations, such as buildings, into digital maps produced from satellite photographs.

According to a "statement of work," the data that CIFA was interested in obtaining included "maps, street addresses, lines of communication, critical infrastructure elements, demographic and other pertinent sources that would support geocoding and multi-level analysis."

Geocoding involves assigning latitudes and longitudes to locations, such as street addresses, so they can be displayed as points on maps. Such tools increasingly are being used by U.S. corporations and law enforcement agencies.

MZM was to "assist the government in identifying and procuring data" on maps, as well as "airports, ports, dams, churches/mosques/synagogues, schools (and) power plants," said the statement of work.

"In many cases, the government already owns such data, and for reasons of economy, government-owned data is preferred," said the statement. It isn't clear why U.S. intelligence agencies couldn't do the work themselves.

Navy Cmdr. Gregory Hicks, a Pentagon spokesman, said MZM began working on the project in October 2002, when the agency was created.

Its job was to help the agency integrate technology into its "information architecture to help CIFA use available (satellite) imagery, which is produced legally by other commercial and government agencies," Hicks said.

"GIS software ... is designed to allow integration of geographic and imagery data with threat information to provide complex analytic products," he said. "Not knowing the location of key infrastructure and points of interest, such as bridges, chemical plants, schools, parks, and even religious facilities, as they relate to threat information, could significantly affect the accuracy of such analysis and plans and lead to disastrous results."

He was unable to discuss further details of CIFA's dealings with MZM, citing the ongoing investigations into Wade's dealings with the Pentagon.

CIFA recently has come under fire following disclosures that it maintained information on individuals and groups involved in peaceful anti-war protests at defense facilities and recruiting offices.

The information was stored in a database that was supposed to be reserved for reports related to potential foreign terrorist activity.

In a March 8 letter to Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., a senior Pentagon official said that a review of the Cornerstone database had identified 186 "protest-related reports" containing the names of 43 people that were mistakenly retained in the database.

"These reports have since been removed from the Cornerstone database and refresher training on intelligence oversight and database management is being given to all CI (counter-intelligence) and intelligence personnel," said the letter from Robert W. Rogalski, an acting deputy undersecretary of defense.

DOJ_NMG_0019393

The disclosure that CIFA was storing information on anti-war activities added to concerns that the Bush administration may have used its war on terrorism to give government agencies expanded power to monitor Americans' finances, associations, travel and other activities.

The administration's domestic eavesdropping program and FBI monitoring of environmental, animal rights and anti-war groups have also fueled such fears. The administration contends that its programs are legal and insists that they're designed to ensure civil liberties while protecting national security.

A Washington Post story last year contained a brief reference to the White House contracts in a report on the company's dealings with the Pentagon.

Wade, who faces up to 20 years in prison, was one of four men charged in the Cunningham case. Cunningham, who resigned from Congress in November after serving for 15 years, was sentenced to eight years and four months in prison earlier this month.

Foreign Firms A Mainstay Of Pentagon Contracting (WP)

By Ellen Mccarthy

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Edward Nadworny's bosses at CGI Group Inc. are just up the road in Montreal, but to the U.S. government he still works for a foreign company, which means logging every phone call to Canada, submitting his e-mails for audits, and being supervised by a local board whose members have been approved by the Defense Department.

If he and his colleagues from other parts of the company chat about work at happy hour, they must tell a Pentagon-approved security officer what they discussed. It's inconvenient but a fact of life for the dozens of foreign-owned companies authorized to do high-level security work for the U.S. government.

"I log my calls more frequently than I do my expenses. . . . It's just a way of doing business," says Nadworny, who runs CGI Federal, a subsidiary of the Canadian firm that was set up to win software and other information technology contracts with the U.S. government.

As politicians battled in recent weeks over a Dubai firm's plan to take control of a company that operates U.S. ports, the fight stood in relief to a reality that local government contractors know well: Foreign-owned companies already help manage some of the nation's most sensitive business, working on classified weapons and information programs and dealing daily with government secrets.

At least 98 foreign-owned firms like CGI have agreements with the Pentagon that allow them access to classified government programs, up from 58 a decade ago, according to the Defense Security Service, the office of the Pentagon that oversees companies that do classified work. With joint defense projects among allies common, and the need for the best technology ever more acute, contracting experts say they expect the trend to continue.

"We're in a global technology environment," said Stan Z. Soloway, president of the Professional Services Council, a government contracting industry group that includes foreign-owned companies like BAE Systems Inc.

An Italian-owned firm is designing the president's new helicopter; a Paris-owned firm is making the new radios for U.S. Special Operations Forces; at the Chesapeake Innovation Center, an Annapolis incubator for homeland security companies that counts the National Security Agency among its partners, five of the 24 companies it has assisted were based overseas.

"Some of our allies have had more extensive experience in homeland security than the United States," said Mark Sauter, the incubator's chief operating officer. "We can't afford to get into a 'not invented here,' mindset."

The Defense Security Service would not release the names of the foreign-owned companies with access to classified information, though many, like BAE, are well known. But the agency did provide a list of their 18 home nations. The list includes nine nations that are part of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, such as France and Britain; all but four -- Australia, Bermuda, Israel and Singapore -- are European.

That in itself indicates a certain caution concerning which companies can get access to sensitive data, said Steve Schooner, a professor of government contracting law at George Washington University Law School.

"The bottom line is: Who are you willing to share your technology with?" Schooner said. "For more developed countries, we have more expectation for rule of law, respect for classified information."

Despite the comparative openness of the U.S. economy -- overseas investors own buildings and businesses throughout the country -- foreign involvement can touch a nerve. The Dubai port deal was ultimately scuttled over security concerns. The purchase of International Business Machine Corp.'s personal computer division by Chinese firm Lenovo Group Ltd. was put through a national security review before being approved. Locally, an Israeli company's proposed takeover of Columbia-based computer security firm Sourcefire Inc. has triggered a review because of Sourcefire's contracts with intelligence agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0019394

Foreign-owned or controlled companies that work with classified information are subject to a special set of rules. The firms must set up U.S. subsidiaries with separate boards that include members approved by the Defense Department. The subsidiaries must have their own e-mail systems and network servers and must fully document communications with employees of the parent company -- hence Nadworny's phone logs.

U.S. citizens must be involved in key roles and are the only individuals who can be cleared to have access to classified material, a fact Pentagon officials consider an important protection.

A report published by the Government Accountability Office last July, however, found the system lacking -- understaffed, too dependent on self-reporting by companies, and unable to fully track foreign involvement with high-security U.S. contractors. In one instance, the GAO found that a foreign-owned company had access to classified information for six months before proper safeguards were in place. In another, the GAO found that Pentagon officials were unaware that a company had hired a foreign national as its president until someone spotted the fact on a Web site nine months later.

"Just think of the magnitude, the complexity, of monitoring what 96 companies are doing with access to classified information. Just the potential for letting something slip or get in the way is hugely magnified," said Rep. John Barrow (D-Ga.), a critic of the Dubai ports deal.

Defense Department officials and contracting experts defended the current system.

In a written response to the GAO, Carol A. Haave, deputy undersecretary of defense for counterintelligence and security, said that defense officials vet foreign involvement in contractors carefully, but also keep in mind issues like the "nature and source" of the foreign involvement, the sensitivity of the information, and "the relationship of the foreign source's government with our government."

"If there is any indication of risk to classified information . . . appropriate action is taken."

David Dempsey, a partner with Holland & Knight LLP who helps foreign companies navigate Pentagon regulations, said it can take up to nine months and cost as much as $600,000 to comply. But, he added, the system seems to work.

"I have never seen an intentional breach and I have never seen a serious breach," of security rules, Dempsey said.

Mideast Wrangle May Hit New Port Sale (FT)

By Robert Wright

Financial Times, March 18, 2006

SSA Marine, the largest US-based container terminal operator, has taken on Citigroup to advise on a possible sale in a move that could reignite controversy about the ownership of US port operations.

According to banking and industry sources, other terminal operators have been asked whether they would be interested in purchasing the company, which is based in Seattle and has a powerful position on the US west coast, in Latin America and New Zealand.

The privately held company, which unsuccessfully explored a sale in 2003, is understood to have started re-examining the potential for a sale after Dubai's DP World agreed to pay £3.92bn ($6.85bn) – more than 15 times forecast ebitda – for P&O, the UK container terminals and ferries operator.

Citigroup is understood to be managing the process. It has regularly done work before for SSA and also successfully represented P&O during its sale.

However, any sale could face complications after the controversy over DP World's takeover of P&O's US operations. DP World was last week forced to agree to sell P&O's interests in five US container terminals and other cargo and passenger-handling operations after widespread political protest at the takeover by a state-owned Arab company.

The controversy is understood to be deterring some of the world's largest terminal operators from looking at SSA's US assets.

Among the companies that could face problems is Singapore's PSA, the world number three container terminal operator by throughput. It looks unlikely to pursue SSA because PSA is owned by Temasek, the Singapore government's investment company. During the campaign against DP World's takeover of P&O, critics said it involved a foreign government gaining a presence in US ports.

The controversy could also deter Hong Kong's Hutchison Ports, the world number one. Although Hutchison Whampoa, Hutchison Ports' parent, is a private sector, publicly-listed company, Hutchison is mistrusted on the US nationalist right, which dislikes the alleged links of Li Ka-Shing, the largest shareholder, with the Chinese authorities.

Neither SSA Marine nor Citigroup would comment.

It could prove harder to sell SSA's US assets than its international business since foreign buyers are likely to shy away from entering the market and few domestic operators are large enough to make the purchase.

DOJ_NMG_0019395

Unnamed Source Told FBI He Saw Alleged Terrorists In Lodi (LODINS)

By Layla Bohm, News-Sentinel Staff Writer

Lodi News-Sentinel, March 18, 2006

Osama bin Laden's right-hand man isn't the only Taliban member alleged to have once visited Lodi. An FBI "source who is in a position to testify" told agents that he had seen two wanted terrorists visiting the Lodi Muslim Mosque and raising funds in 1999, according to federal court documents filed late Thursday night.

The reports do not name the source, but government prosecutors earlier Thursday told a judge that the information pertained to the testimony of informant Naseem Khan. The 32-year-old, who has paid by the FBI to infiltrate Lodi's Muslim community, has been one of the key witnesses in the case against two Lodi men on trial for alleged terror links.

Umer Hayat, 48, and his 23-year-old son, Hamid Hayat, are on trial in Sacramento, accused of lying to FBI agents about their alleged knowledge of terror training camps in Pakistan. The younger Hayat is also charged with providing support to terrorists by attending a camp. Both have pleaded not guilty.

Ahmed Ali

Part of the case is built on secretly recorded conversations between Hamid Hayat and Khan, who began working in Lodi in December 2001 and befriended the younger Hayat in summer 2002.

Earlier this week, Khan testified that he had seen Ayman al-Zawahri — second-in-command of al-Qaida and bin Laden's spokesman and physician — coming and going from the Lodi mosque in 1998 and 1999.

In the FBI reports, parts of which were blacked out, agents summarized accounts given them by the source. On Nov. 15, 2001, the source told agents that al-Zawahri was seen with two fellow Taliban members in Lodi in December 1999:

· Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser was indicted in June 2001 in the Eastern District of Virginia for the June 25, 1996, bombing of the Khobar Towers military housing building in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia. A total of 19 U.S. troops and one Saudi died, and another 372 were injured.

· Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali was indicted in December 2000 in the Southern District of New York in relation to the Aug. 7, 1998, bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya, Tanzania and Dar es Salaam. The simultaneous attacks killed more than 200 people and injured at least 4,000. Four men were convicted in May 2001, while others, including Ali, remain at large.

The FBI's source identified the men just five weeks after President Bush and the nation's top leaders announced the formation of the FBI's "Most Wanted Terrorists" list, featuring photos and rewards of 22 terrorists sought by the U.S.

All three men remain on the list. A $25 million reward has been offered for the capture of al-Zawahri (sometimes spelled al-Zawahiri), and $5 million rewards are offered for the other two men.

The FBI reports were made public in a filing by the Hayats' defense attorneys, who want to see the whole reports before Khan resumes the witness stand Tuesday.

Johnny Griffin III, Umer Hayat's attorney, said al-Zawahri was not in Lodi at the times Khan alleged he was, but that he is still investigating the claims about the two additional men who were named. That, he said, is why he needs to see the entire FBI reports.

"I don't want to make assumptions as to the validity of these assertions without knowing the context to which they were made, and whether he was speculating or had knowledge to support it," Griffin said.

Griffin and Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents Hamid Hayat, said in their legal motion that they are entitled to receive the full reports because the information could prove whether Khan is a credible source.

One potential flaw in his story was apparent in the FBI reports: Khan previously testified in court that he began working in Lodi in December 2001. But the FBI reports pertain to dates in November of that year.

In several reports, mention is made of Taliban members who were soliciting funds in Lodi, Stockton and Yuba City. In Lodi, they were seen several times walking between a Central Avenue house and the mosque on Poplar Street.

Lodi Muslims deny that the Taliban members stayed in Lodi. FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst said Friday that she could not comment because it's an ongoing investigation and the matter is in trial.

Witness Outlines Ties To Terror (STOCKREC)

By Jeff Hood, Lodi Bureau Chief

Stockton Record, March 18, 2006

Informant calls Lodi a haven for extremists

LODI - A paid FBI informant told agents as early as October 2001 that Lodi was a haven for Muslim extremists, saying he had seen three of the agency's most-wanted terrorists here in late 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0019396

The name of Naseem Khan, the government's key witness in the trial of two Lodi men charged with terrorism-related crimes, does not appear in the heavily censored FBI reports defense attorneys attached to a court filing late Thursday. But prosecutors handed over the documents in response to defense attorneys' demands for information relating to Khan, who is expected to return to the witness stand Tuesday.

Defense attorney Wazhma Mojaddidi, who represents accused terrorist-in-waiting Hamid Hayat, wants those blacked-out portions revealed. U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. will hear arguments on the matter Monday.

Khan testified Monday that he saw Ayman al-Zawahri - al-Qaida's second-in-command - in Lodi in 1998 and 1999. According to the newly filed papers, Khan told an Oregon-based FBI agent on Oct. 26, 2001, that he saw al-Zawahri in Lodi in 1999. Khan also told the agent that two other terrorists visited the Lodi mosque while he was there: Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed Al-Nasser, a Saudi man indicted by a Virginia grand jury for the 1996 bombing of a military housing complex in Saudi Arabia that left 19 U.S. servicemen dead; and Ahmed Mohammad Hamed Ali, an Egyptian wanted in connection with the U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

The FBI's Web page states Ali fled to Pakistan from Kenya on Aug. 2, 1998, five days before the bombings.

Khan also told the FBI that the men - whose names were on a list of the FBI's 22 most-wanted terrorists - visited mosques in Stockton, Yuba City and the Sutter County city of Live Oak in 1999.

Hameed Khan, past president of the Islamic Center of Live Oak's board of directors and a Gridley police detective, dismissed the informant's story.

"I can assure you no one visited," said Hameed Khan, who said he was one of the Live Oak mosque's founders in 1989. "This is the kind of stuff that really upsets me. I'd like to confront this guy. If he's going to be bringing our mosque into this, I'd like to ask him some questions myself."

Likewise, Lodi Muslims say the claims are preposterous and that Naseem Khan needlessly hurt their community.

Naseem Khan testified in Sacramento's U.S. District Court on Feb. 22 that the FBI approached him in Oregon roughly two weeks after the terrorist attacks on Sept. 11, 2001, and asked for his help. Khan, a native of Pakistan who lived in the Lodi area in the late 1990s, told the FBI the following month he believed the owners of ethnic markets in Lodi and Stockton were laundering money for terrorist organizations in the Middle East and that the terrorists had met with top mosque officials.

One of those mosque officials, who asked not to be identified because he fears for his safety, said he figures that's why the FBI wanted to interview him last year, but agents turned down his offer to speak with an attorney present.

The man, who works for a company with government contracts, said Naseem Khan was "making up stories" to land a job with the FBI. The informant, who until then held myriad jobs at fast-food restaurants and convenience stores, was paid more than $200,000 in salary and reimbursements after being hired in November 2001.

"We're going to rely on people who are lying through their teeth to the FBI, and that's supposed to be preventing terrorism?" the Lodi man said. "Come on."

Another Lodi man also said that Muslims in the community have destroyed religious books and pamphlets out of fear the government could consider it incriminating evidence. A government witness testified this week that a prayer found in Hayat's wallet shows he was on a mission to wage a holy war against Islam's enemies, including the United States.

"I know people are concerned the government was trying to prosecute Hamid Hayat for a prayer that's commonly recited," said Basim Elkarra, director of the Council for American-Islamic Relations' Sacramento-based chapter. "Fellow Americans in Lodi are freaked out."

Hayat was indicted by a federal grand jury on a charge of supporting terrorism by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003 and 2004, and on three charges of lying to the FBI. His father, Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream vendor, faces two charges of lying to federal agents.

LODI Muslims Skeptical About FBI's Informant They Say They'd Know If Terror Suspects Visited (SFC)

By Jim Herron Zamora, Mark Martin, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

Lodi -- An FBI informant's claims that three of the world's most-wanted terrorism suspects passed through town in recent years are outrageous and could damage the federal government's case against two local men, residents and legal experts said Friday.

Members of the city's Islamic community said they had never seen any of the notorious suspects at their mosque or anywhere else, and questioned why federal agents didn't talk to them.

DOJ_NMG_0019397

"I think the FBI should rely on more-reliable informants," Mohammed Shoaib said Friday during a prayer session at the yellow ranch-style home that has been converted to a mosque. "I am an American citizen, and I love this country. They never talked to me."

Shoaib, a Pakistani who has lived in Lodi since 1978, has been president of the mosque for the last two years.

In a report filed in federal court Thursday night, the FBI revealed that the man who became the key informant in the Lodi prosecution told investigators in 2001 that he saw Osama bin Laden's chief deputy, Ayman al-Zawahiri, in Lodi in 1999.

The informant, Naseem Khan, also recalled seeing Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser, a suspect in the 1996 bombing of the Khobar Towers military housing complex in Saudi Arabia, in Lodi. And he said he had seen Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, a suspect in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, in Stockton in 1999.

Khan, 32, is the key witness against Hamid Hayat, a 23-year-old Lodi man accused of supporting terrorism by attending a training camp in Pakistan in 2003. Hayat is on trial in U.S. District Court in Sacramento along with his father, who is charged with lying about his son's alleged camp attendance.

The informant's claims run counter to other federal government reports that all three of the wanted terrorists were outside the United States at that time. Khan made the assertions in November 2001 in a series of interviews with the FBI in Bend, Ore. At the time, Khan identified several of the high-profile terrorists based on photographs from their FBI most-wanted posters, the FBI report states.

It is unclear whether the FBI deemed the reports credible at the time, but the government sent Khan, a former fast-food worker who has earned about $250,000 as a paid government informant, back to Lodi to collect information on possible terrorist cells in the valley town's small Islamic community.

The FBI interview documents were released in a heavily redacted version after Khan testified Monday that he had seen al-Zawahiri, whom the FBI calls Osama bin Laden's personal physician and second in command, in Lodi in 1999.

FBI spokeswoman Karen Ernst declined to comment on the case on Friday.

But Lodi residents brushed off Khan's claims that wanted terrorists had stopped there.

"The whole community is dumbfounded as to what's going on with this," said Nasim Khan, who was the Lodi mosque's leader from 1998 to 2000 and is no relation to the government informant. "Everything that is coming out, there's no basis into it."

They said all three of the terror suspects, from Arab countries, would have stood out in the tight-knit Muslim community, which includes many Pakistanis and South Asians. The most prominent of the three, al-Zawahiri, is an Egyptian. "A majority of the congregation at the mosque is Pakistani," said Shoaib, the mosque leader. "There's only a half-dozen or so of Arab descent. If he came in on a regular basis, people would remember him. It's a ridiculous claim."

Former prosecutors and veteran defense attorneys said the revelations could cause problems for the federal government if the jury feels that Khan's credibility is an issue.

"The government has a really difficult time getting people who are both in the radical Islamic community and reliable," said Kendall Coffey, the former U.S. attorney in South Florida. "Usually people like this don't come to the government voluntarily, and usually they don't come totally clean. It takes a thief to know a thief."

But Coffey and defense lawyer James Brosnahan said the government may be able to counter any credibility problems with Khan if corroborating evidence against the Hayats, including FBI interviews with them, is strong.

"If a witness has a problem with truthfulness, the question is where is the corroboration," said Brosnahan, who defended John Walker Lindh, the so-called American Taliban, among other high-profile cases. "In drug cases, you often have terrible (prosecution) witnesses, but if there is corroboration in the form of tapes or photographs, these are things that can really sway a jury. "

Much of the prosecution's case against the Hayats is based on secretly recorded conversations they had with Khan and videotaped interviews with the FBI.

In his 2001 FBI interview, Khan also accused the owner of a Lodi store that sells Indian spices and the owner of a market in Lodi of raising and laundering money for terrorist organizations.

The owner of the Pak-India Spices grocery store declined to be interviewed Friday, but one of his cashiers summed up the feeling that many have about Naseem Khan.

"If the FBI gave me half the money they gave him, I'd tell them all kinds of crazy stories, too," said Mumtaz Khan, 58.

Chronicle staff writer Demian Bulwa contributed to this report. E-mail Jim Zamora at jzamora@sfchronicle.com and Mark Martin at markmartin@fchronicle.com.

Page B - 1

Attorney Seeks Data On Inmate Privacy (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), March 18, 2006

Prison recording policy in question

An attorney for accused terrorist Mohammad Zaki Amawi has asked a federal judge for assurances that the government will not be recording his conversations with his client.

Dennis Terez, a public defender appointed to represent Mr. Amawi, filed a motion yesterday in U.S. District Court in Toledo asking for comprehensive information about federal agents' use of monitoring attorney-client communications.

Judge James Carr has scheduled a pretrial hearing in the case for April 10.

Mr. Amawi and two other men, Wassim I. Mazloum and Marwan Othman El-Hindi, are accused of plotting to support the killing or injuring of people in the Middle East. The Toledo area men are being held in a federal prison in Milan, Mich.

Mr. Amawi is also accused of threatening to kill or inflict harm on President Bush.

The assistant U.S. attorneys who are handling the case have provided the attorneys for the defendants with the policy that the U.S. Bureau of Prison uses for recording conversations between attorneys and inmates, both in person while in prison and in phone communications.

But Mr. Terez said the government's response was insufficient and doesn't provide enough detail on what could be recorded. He wants the government to provide "confirmation and clarification" to the court as to what, if any, attorney-client discussions would be monitored.

Stephen Hartman and Jeff Helmick, the respective attorneys for Mr. El-Hindi and Mr. Mazloum, said they plan to file similar motions on behalf of their clients very soon.

"We will be joining in that request [today]," Mr. Hartman said.

Also yesterday, Mr. Hartman and his co-counsel, Charles Boss, filed an initial request asking the government to release the evidence it has on their client.

Bond Denied To Boca Doctor In Terrorism Case (MH)

By Evan S. Benn

The Miami Herald, March 18, 2006

A federal judge on Friday denied a bond request from a Boca Raton doctor accused of pledging an oath of loyalty to al Qaeda.

Dr. Rafiq A. Sabir, 51, will continue to be held in solitary confinement in a New York prison until his trial on charges of conspiring to support Osama bin Laden's terrorist network.

U.S. District Judge Loretta Preska made the ruling at a pretrial hearing Friday in New York after Sabir's attorney asked for his client to be released on bond, according to a spokeswoman at the U.S. Attorney's Office.

HOME SEARCH

Sabir was arrested at his Palm Beach County home last May, days after investigators claim he recited an oath of loyalty in front of an undercover FBI agent.

Prosecutors said a search of Sabir's home after his arrest revealed charred pages of Arabic writing in a backyard grill. Agents also found swords and other martial-arts equipment in his home.

But Sabir's lawyers said at the time that the writing found in the grill may have been from the Koran, Islam's holy book.

Burning tattered or worn pages of the Koran is an acceptable method of disposal, according to Islamic tradition.

And Sabir's defense counsel has said the oath he uttered was a bayat, a traditional and spiritual Islamic oath, and that he did not state or imply a desire to harm Americans.

Also charged with Sabir are Tarik Shah, 42, a jazz musician and martial-arts instructor from Bronx, N.Y.; Abdulrahman Farhane, 51, a bookstore owner from Brooklyn, N.Y.; and Mahmud Brent, 31, a cab driver from Washington, D.C.

FOUR DEFENDANTS

Prosecutors said Shah and Sabir promised to use their skills in martial arts and medicine to train and treat jihadist fighters.

Farhane allegedly discussed a plan with Shah in December 2001 to send money to terrorist fighters in Afghanistan so they could hurt U.S. troops.

Brent is accused of conspiring to support Lashkar-e-Taiba, a Pakistani-based terror group.

The four defendants, all U.S. citizens who are Muslim, have pleaded not guilty to the charges.

They are being held without bail in federal custody and face up to 15 years in prison if convicted.

On Friday, Preska set a date for the defendants' attorneys to file pretrial motions.

The four will return to her court on Oct. 30 for their next hearing.

Was Indictment Misleading? (SPT)

By MEG LAUGHLIN

St. Petersburg Times, March 18, 2006

When the government charged Sameeh Hammoudeh with terrorism-related activities, it used transcripts from wiretaps that may have been unfairly edited.

On that chilly day three years ago when Hammoudeh was arrested, two FBI agents handcuffed him and drove him to FBI headquarters for questioning. Hammoudeh said the agents told him he was not their target, but that they wanted him to aid their investigation. They asked him to provide information about how he helped Sami Al-Arian, a former professor at the University of South Florida, get money to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad after 1994.

The U.S. government has designated the PIJ a terrorist organization. The group has claimed responsibility for the deaths of hundreds of people in Israel and the occupied territories.

In 1995, it became illegal for people in the United States to provide funds, goods or services to the organization. Because Hammoudeh worked with Al-Arian, prosecutors focused on money Hammoudeh was sending to the occupied territories, in an attempt to link Al-Arian to the PIJ after 1994. Hammoudeh's indictment accused him of "transferring monies and funds . . . for the purpose of promoting PIJ activities."

Summaries of the wiretapped conversations that the government used to justify this accusation seem to undercut the charges.

Here are three excerpts, chosen from more than a dozen similar examples in the indictment, that show what the government chose to include from the tech cuts in building a case that Hammoudeh's activities are linked to the PIJ:

From the indictment: "On Dec. 20, 1999, defendant Sameeh Hammoudeh used his residence telephone line to call his father, who is in the occupied territories of Israel. In this conversation, Sameeh Hammoudeh indicated to his father that he raised some money and will be receiving more. He also told his father he will be sending him $1,000 to distribute."

From the FBI tech cut, the source for this Dec. 20, 1999, conversation: "Sameeh told his father, "I would like you to spend, give a thousand and when I get someone traveling to the homeland I will send it to you with him.'"

"His father said he would "distribute it to the people or give it to the Kaffiat,'" believed to be an institution for the blind and/or disabled in the area.

Hammoudeh replied: "There are orphans in the Family Welfare Organization. Give them. They are also an institution."

A second example from the indictment: "On or about Dec. 29, 1999, Sameeh Hammoudeh called his father who was overseas. Sameeh Hammoudeh asked his father to distribute money, and Sameeh Hammoudeh said he would reimburse him by sending money overseas via courier."

From the tech cut of this same Dec. 29, 1999, conversation: "Hammoudeh asked his father to give the funds to those in need, especially the orphans. His father said that he will give it to the orphans, the family sponsorship society and the disable (sic) and/or blind society."

A third example from the indictment: "On or about Feb. 22, 1995, . . . Sameeh Hammoudeh . . . received a facsimile at WISE (a think tank where he worked that was created by Al-Arian and affiliated with the University of South Florida) . . . from Fathi Shikaki (the head of the PIJ in Damascus, Syria)." From the tech cuts: The receiving phone number is (813) 989-xxxx.

According to the tech cut index, that was the phone number for the Tampa home of Ramadan Shallah, who also worked at WISE. The PIJ faxes were not sent to WISE or to Sameeh Hammoudeh. They were sent from PIJ headquarters to Shallah's home. (Editor's note: We have omitted the last four digits because the number is no longer issued to Shallah, and may belong to someone else.)

Shallah worked at WISE until May 1995. He left Florida and became the leader of the PIJ in October 1995 in Syria after the death of Shikaki.

A year and a half after Hammoudeh was arrested, prosecutors acknowledged the phone number in the faxes was Shallah's and dropped the eight counts associated with the error. But the misinformation, contradicted by the tech cuts, was among the justifications used for arresting Hammoudeh.

Federal prosecutors declined to comment on repeated contradictions between information in the indictment and the tech cuts, the source material for the indictment. But former FBI agent and federal prosecutor Todd Foster didn't.

Foster, now a Tampa criminal defense attorney, was part of the defense team in a high-profile 1997 case, which, like the case against Hammoudeh, was built on secret surveillance of the defendants' conversations.

In the Aisenberg case, a Valrico couple reported their baby girl, Sabrina, missing. Hillsborough County sheriff's investigators planted secret listening devices in the couple's home and based the indictment on their conversations. But a federal judge said many of the surveillance tapes were largely inaudible, and that investigators had misled authorities about what they contained in order to justify arresting the parents. The case crumbled.

Foster called the Aisenberg case "a shocking example of how wiretap information in an indictment can be full of missing statements, statements taken out of context and false statements."

He said, however, that he doesn't think such distortions are common: "But when it happens rarely, that's too often. Whether reckless or deliberate, it's wrong."

Wednesday, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer brought papers to Hammoudeh's cell at the Manatee County Jail. They said, "ICE has made the decision to continue your detention."

Federal prosecutors have a Monday deadline to file documents explaining why. Wednesday, U.S. District Judge James Whittemore will preside over a habeas corpus hearing for Hammoudeh, where his attorneys will argue that his continued incarceration is unconstitutional.

"I am hopeful," Hammoudeh said. "I can't say why after this long nightmare. But I am."

Gov't: Some Gitmo Cases Should Be Scuttled (AP)

AP, March 18, 2006

The Bush administration argued Friday that a newly enacted law wipes out hundreds of pending court cases by detainees in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, who are challenging their confinement.

In papers filed with a federal appeals court, the Justice Department said the Detainee Treatment Act signed by President Bush on Dec. 30 restricts detainees' rights to reviews by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia.

The reviews are limited, said the Justice Department, to the question of whether the detainees have been correctly categorized by the U.S. military as enemy combatants.

The enemy combatant designation enables the U.S. military to hold the detainees indefinitely.

Lawyers for the detainees say the new law does not cover pre-existing cases filed in U.S. District Courts, which deal with a wide range of issues, from allegations of prisoner abuse to assertions that detainees have no ties to terrorism and should be released.

Set up more than four years ago after the war in Afghanistan, the Guantanamo Bay prison camp is holding some 500 detainees. Some have been there since the facility opened.

In 2004, the Supreme Court said the detainees were entitled to file petitions in the federal court system, resulting in more than 200 cases covering over 300 detainees.

At issue is the legislative intent of the Detainee Treatment Act, a compromise reached among Sens. Carl Levin, D-Mich., Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz.

Lawyers for the detainees and Levin say the new law does not cover pending cases. Graham, Kyl and the Bush administration insist that it does.

Mosque Material Ordered Released (ALBTU)

By BRENDAN LYONS, Staff writer

Albany Times-Union, March 18, 2006

Judge says Justice Department must turn over certain classified data to defendants' attorneys

ALBANY -- A federal judge has ordered the Justice Department to turn over certain classified materials to attorneys for two members of an Albany mosque who were ensnared in an FBI counterterrorism sting.

The judge's ruling allows prosecutors to withhold some of their top-secret files in the case, and it's not clear what information will be disclosed or how soon it might become public.

The information may provide more details on why the FBI launched a sting three years ago that targeted Yassin Aref, a 35-year-old Kurdish refugee who is being held in jail without bond while awaiting trial on terrorism-related charges.

Federal prosecutors have the option of appealing the order issued late Thursday by U.S. District Court Judge Thomas J. McAvoy, but said they won't.

McAvoy's decision comes after more than 20 meetings between the judge and federal prosecutors in which they had haggled, in private, about what classified information the government must disclose so the men can defend themselves at trial.

"The government intends to comply with the court's order," said Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak.

Aref's attorney, Terence L. Kindlon, said he can't react to the order until he sees the materials.

It's possible the classified information could provide more background on Aref's alleged ties to overseas terrorist figures that U.S. authorities have said made him a target in the first place.

Aref and Mohammed Hossain, an Albany pizza shop owner, are accused of taking part in a plot to make money from the sale of missile launchers to terrorists. The plot was not real and was created by the FBI, which used an informant to allegedly lure the men into the deal.

Kevin Luibrand, Hossain's attorney, also reserved judgment on the significance of the judge's disclosure order, which comes 18 months after he first requested access to classified materials in the case.

"It would be a guess for us to determine now if they materials they do provide would be helpful," he said.

Federal authorities have long acknowledged that Aref was the "ultimate target" of their investigation, although they have not said why. Two months before the sting was launched, in the summer of 2003, Aref's name, phone number and Albany address were found in a notebook recovered from a bombed-out Iraqi encampment the government contends was occupied by terrorists.

Since then, prosecutors have filed motions accusing Aref of having ties to terrorist organizations in Iraq. But Aref disputes that and his attorney said the assertions were based almost entirely on entries in Aref's personal journal in which he'd recorded meetings with people he'd met, including some the U.S. government labels terrorists.

Officials have not made any similar charges against Hossain.

No timetable was set for when the classified materials must be turned over to the defense.

Brendan Lyons can be reached at 454-5547 or by e-mail at blyons@timesunion.com.

U.S., Pakistan's Strategic Interests Are Converging (WSJ)

By Mansoor Suhail

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Mahnaz Ispahani's March 3 editorial-page commentary "Our Man in Pakistan" is based on wrong assumptions and analysis, but, paradoxically, draws the right conclusion: The U.S. must remain engaged with Pakistan. President Pervez Musharraf's government's cooperation with the U.S. is based on the convergence of Pakistan-U.S. interests both tactical and strategic.

Pakistan is in the frontline of the war on terrorism. More than 600 al Qaeda terrorists have been killed or captured by Pakistan. Success will require Pakistan's continued cooperation. Peace in Afghanistan is threatened not so much by border infiltration as the efforts of some anti-Pakistan elements in Kabul to deny power to the Pashtuns and to blame Pakistan for their failure to control security in Afghanistan.

As Mr. Musharraf and President Bush have agreed, success against terrorism and extremism requires a comprehensive strategy. Pakistan is pursuing a strategy whose aim is to create a modern, democratic Islamic state. This will have a pervasive and positive impact on the entire Islamic world and help improve Washington's strained relations with Muslims.

The U.S. also needs nuclear Pakistan's cooperation to prevent proliferation and ensure peace in South Asia, which is essential to realize U.S. commercial and strategic goals in the region.

Pakistan's economic potential should not be discounted. Pakistan is the second fastest growing economy in Asia; its trade and investment regime is among the most liberal; per-capita foreign investment is much higher than India's. And Pakistan can become the economic hub of three emerging dynamic regions - South Asia, Central Asia and West Asia.

Mansoor Suhail
Minister (Press)
Pakistan Mission to the U.N.
New York

The Mayor And The Imam (NYT)

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

When a government employee says "the greatest terrorists in the world occupy the White House," he is bound to raise some hackles, but should it be a dismissible offense? The chief chaplain for the New York City Corrections Department, Imam Umar Abdul-Jalil, made that remark in a speech last year in Tucson before a group of Muslim students. For good measure, he also took a shot at "Zionists of the media." What made the case seminal was Mayor Michael Bloomberg's response. He arrived at a Solomonic solution and, in the process, also found his voice on an issue that has challenged his administration in the past: free speech.

In an unexpectedly stirring defense of First Amendment rights, Mr. Bloomberg took wide-ranging swipes at the right and the left for stifling the airing of unpopular or offensive opinions. He stood up for immigrants, the free press, fair elections and justice. He rang the bell for intellectual freedom and for the right to criticize the government.

Mr. Abdul-Jalil will keep his $76,600-a-year job, but the mayor announced that he had been suspended without pay for two weeks for his failure to disclose that he had been speaking as a private citizen, not as a city employee. It was a fair outcome. The imam chose his words poorly, at the least. But those comments occupied brief moments in remarks that mostly encouraged Muslims to read the Koran and decried the high levels of incarceration in the United States. And the speech was only one event in a career that Jewish chaplains and other clerics at the Corrections Department have described as exemplary.

DOJ_NMG_0019402

For the mayor, however, the moment could be much more significant. Mr. Bloomberg's record on free speech took a beating in his first term after he moved aggressively to limit protests, most notably those surrounding the Republican National Convention in New York two years ago. And as a report in yesterday's Times by Jim Dwyer made clear, the Police Department's willingness to subvert free speech in the name of security appears to have gone beyond that one event to an ongoing strategy that included "proactive arrests" of political demonstrators who were spotted as potential troublemakers.

When this page endorsed Mr. Bloomberg's re-election, we said we hoped that he would make up for his first-term lapses and make protection of free speech a hallmark of his second term. His decision on the imam can be an excellent beginning.

Ahern Asks Bush About CIA Flights Over EU (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, March 18, 2006

Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern gave President Bush a bowl of shamrocks on Friday and then asked the president for more "transparency" about CIA flights over Europe.

After his St. Patrick's Day meeting with Bush, which lasted for more than two hours, Ahern renewed his commitment to seeing the implementation of Northern Ireland's 1998 peace accord and its central goal: power-sharing between the province's British Protestant majority and Irish Catholic minority.

The consensus among Irish Americans and political leaders is that "we just have to move on," Ahern said after meeting with Bush, who also visited with relatives killed in murders linked to the Irish Republican Army.

"We've seen the end of the IRA campaign," Ahern said. "We've seen the end of the arms issue. We're dealing with the criminality issue. We saw the big raids on the border last week. The politicians have to get back to the work that they were elected to, and we have to do that this year."

Gerry Adams, who has spent the past two decades guiding his IRA-allied party into Ireland's political mainstream, was among the Irish visitors to the White House. Last year, Bush barred all Northern Ireland leaders from the St. Patrick's Day event to put pressure on Adams.

Bush administration officials said last year that they withdrew Sinn Fein's White House invitation — for the first time since 1995 — because of the IRA's admission that its members were involved in killing Robert McCartney in Belfast last year and that the outlawed group stole $50 million worth of British pounds from a Belfast bank.

Ahern said he asked Bush if there was a way to bring more "transparency" to the issue of rendition. The European Union is investigating allegations that CIA agents interrogated al-Qaida suspects at secret prisons in eastern Europe and transported some on secret flights that passed through Europe.

Ahern said that while Ireland facilitates U.S. troop movements, and is "happy to do it," there is public concern over the CIA flights.

"We've asked for the president's understanding and cooperation," Ahern said, adding that it would be easier for him to explain the flights in his country if he knew more about them. "We are going to continue to look at, perhaps, how we might bring more transparency to that process, if that's possible."

In the traditional trek to the White House, the prime minister gave the president a glass bowl of shamrocks, a symbol of warm U.S. relations.

"The Census Bureau tells us there are more than 34 million Americans that claim Irish ancestry," said Bush, who wore a pale green tie for the occasion. "On St. Patrick's Day, I suspect that number jumps a little bit."

Bush and the Irish leader talked about Iraq, Iran, Darfur, India and the Middle East. Ahern said he expressed support for immigration legislation that would benefit the estimated 50,000 to 70,000 illegal Irish immigrants in the United States.

Ahern said he backed a proposal by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., which would let illegal immigrants stay for six years if they remain employed and pay a $1,000 fine. They would then become eligible for permanent residency.

Much of their discussion focused on the killings of McCartney, who was stabbed in the neck and stomach and bludgeoned with iron bars outside a Belfast pub on Jan. 30, 2005; Joseph Rafferty, who was shot dead outside his home in Dublin on April 12, 2005; and Pat Finucane, a Belfast lawyer who was shot 14 times on Feb. 12, 1989, as he sat down to a Sunday lunch.

Finucane's family and Catholic leaders have demanded a public probe into suspected involvement of British security forces in the assassination.

Ahern said he was with Bush when they met with Ester Uzell and Bart Little, Rafferty's sister and brother-in-law; and Catherine and Kathleen McCartney and Emily Hamilton, McCartney's sister, mother and aunt.

"The president is very familiar with the cases — extremely familiar — and very well-briefed on all of the cases," Ahern said. "I should say we had quite a long conversation on the Finucane case.

In a speech Thursday night, Ahern said he hoped "all parties and all communities will fully accept and participate the new beginning for policing," a reference to Sinn Fein and its Catholic supporters, which refuse to work with Northern Ireland's mostly Protestant police force.

Sinn Fein boycotts a Catholic-Protestant board that is overseeing a 10-year plan for reshaping the police force, which requires at least 50 percent of recruits to be Catholic. The Bush administration has said it won't allow Adams to raise funds directly in the United States until Sinn Fein takes its seats on the Northern Ireland Policing Board.

The policy means that, while Sinn Fein's U.S. fundraising arm can collect funds from supporters, it can't do this at any events that Adams attends. Adams said this restriction meant the party had to return about $100,000 collected at a Washington breakfast that the Sinn Fein chief attended Thursday.

At that event, Adams took the unusual step of publicly criticizing Bush's special envoy to Northern Ireland. "I don't have any high regard for Mitchell Reiss' input in this process," Adams said. "If it is he who is advising the president, then it's very, very bad advice."

Reiss, however, got high marks from Ahern.

"I warmly applaud the work of your special envoy, Ambassador Mitchell Reiss, as well as (U.S. Ambassador to Ireland) James Kenny."

IRA-Allied Politician Detained At Airport From Times Wire Reports (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Gerry Adams, leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party in Northern Ireland, was detained at Reagan National Airport after attending a St. Patrick's Day event at the White House, according to a congressman.

Rep. Brian Higgins (D-N.Y.), who had invited Adams to speak in Buffalo, N.Y., said Adams' name appeared on a terrorism watch list, triggering a lengthy inspection. Because of the delay, Adams missed his speaking engagement, Higgins said.

Earlier Friday, Adams joined Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern and other Irish visitors at a White House St. Patrick's Day ceremony.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bomb Material Got Past TSA Screeners (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

The Dallas Morning News, March 18, 2006

21 airports failed test; homeland official defends security

WASHINGTON – Despite the multibillion-dollar ramp-up in aviation security since 9/11, congressional investigators were able to sneak homemade bomb components past federal screeners at all 21 airports they targeted in a recent covert exercise.

The General Accountability Office conducted the tests between October and January to determine the vulnerability posed by a would-be suicide bomber carrying easily purchased materials that could be assembled into a bomb once past security.

The GAO findings, first reported by NBC News, are classified, and the airports' identities were not disclosed. The GAO refused to comment Friday on any aspect of its report.

The head of the Transportation Security Administration, which oversees nearly 43,000 screeners at 429 commercial airports, didn't quarrel with the GAO analysis – and in fact termed it helpful as his agency focuses on its top mission: intercepting improvised explosive devices.

But Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Edmund "Kip" Hawley said the GAO testing doesn't take into account the many layers of security that occur before passengers reach the screening checkpoint and once they're through. Among them: checking travelers' names against watch lists; analyzing behavior patterns; making security procedures less predictable; and deploying federal air marshals.

While deeming the report "interesting," Mr. Hawley said it is "not at all an evaluation of the entire system. It's a data point on that one particular thing."

Speaking to reporters at a Homeland Security Department briefing, he added, "This should not be an alarming report."

His outlook wasn't shared by a pair of House Homeland Security Committee members.

"Half-measures will not prevent the next terrorist disaster – we cannot allow half of the contents traveling on passenger planes to go unscreened, as we continue to do today," said Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., who has long lobbied for tighter aviation security. "How many warnings does this administration need to take action?"

DOJ_NMG_0019404

Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi, the committee's top Democrat, said: "It's like the story of the Trojan horse. TSA has spent so much time telling people to take off their shoes and belts, that they have missed the bomb-making materials."

TSA has adapted its policies, however, to give screeners more time to look for potential bomb components. In a December shift that sparked some controversy, TSA removed small scissors and tools from its list of prohibited items.

The GAO test also occurred as TSA was in the midst of providing explosives-detection training for 18,000 screeners at the nation's biggest airports, Mr. Hawley said. "Certainly, the training had not burned in," he said.

Two thousand additional screeners have been trained since.

The problem is that TSA hasn't been given the resources to deploy technologies that could ferret out explosives, said Douglas Laird, an aviation security consultant who was a former Northwest Airlines security director.

"We don't give the screeners the technology they need to succeed," Mr. Laird said. "It's not that we don't know how to do security, it's that we're not willing to pay for security."

He noted that CTX machines to screen checked baggage for explosives have yet to be deployed at all airports. The machines are at Dallas/Fort Worth International Airport and other major airports. He also said TSA is moving gingerly to test backscatter scanners that can detect explosives and weapons hidden on people – with an X-ray technology that essentially allows scanners to peer through clothing.

The union that has fought for screeners' bargaining rights, the American Federation of Government Employees, agreed that the TSA workers lack the equipment and training to do their jobs properly.

"It is clear that TSA doesn't take this seriously," said John Gage, president of the government employees group. "The agency seems to be more concerned with presenting the public with the appearance of security rather than making sure the appropriate security measures are taken."

While both Mr. Gage and Mr. Laird said the equipment exists to do the job right, Mr. Hawley said technologies to detect all manner of combustibles – many of which can be assembled from household products – remain in development.

Though countless items could be used to assemble a bomb, Mr. Hawley said TSA knows which materials pose the greatest risk, having blown up hundreds of planes in tests.

"We know exactly what it takes and where to bring an airplane down," he said. "We use that information to guide us in our priorities, our technology, and the physical processes that we do to check."

White House Plans Smallpox Drill (AP)

AP, March 18, 2006

Cabinet secretaries and other top officials are gathering at the White House complex Saturday to act out the roles they would play in a smallpox outbreak.

The four-hour drill, designed to test the federal government's smallpox response plans, won't be attended by the president, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Friday.

Officials conducted a similar "tabletop exercise" in December to examine the nation's readiness for pandemic flu. The drills are kept behind closed doors.

"The president directed his Cabinet to conduct a series of such exercises to assess our response efforts to catastrophic attacks," McClellan said.

The United States ended routine childhood vaccination against smallpox in 1971, and the World Health Organization reported the disease was eradicated in 1980.

But there are fears that smallpox could be used by terrorists as a biological weapon. About 15 months after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the U.S. government ordered certain military personnel vaccinated and recommended shots for front-line health care workers.

The president did not attend the pandemic flu drill, and was to be at Camp David, the presidential retreat in the nearby Maryland mountains, during this one.

After the flu drill, conducted around a C-shaped table for four hours, officials said it showed that saving lives and containing the economic damage of a pandemic flu would require more planning in local communities and increased production of vaccines and medications.

Real Injustice (WP)

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

WHEN CONGRESS passed the Real ID Act last year, it presumably did not intend to prevent human rights victims all over the world from entering the United States. Its goal was to keep terrorists and those who support them from resettling in the United States as refugees. The legislative language, however, was irresponsibly broad; its effects have been cruel to people already oppressed by vile regimes and terrorist groups. The law needs to be changed.

DOJ_NMG_0019405

Terrorists were excluded from the United States even before the Real ID Act, but the law made substantial changes to keep out donors to terrorist groups or others who provide them "material support." The trouble is that, because of the new law and its interaction with existing provisions, the legal definitions of terrorism, terrorist organizations and material support are so broad that they include countless people who deserve the United States' protection, not exclusion.

The law bars associates of any group that contains "two or more individuals, whether organized or not, [which] engages in, or has a subgroup which engages in" activities as general as using an "explosive, firearm or other weapon or dangerous device." The law contains no exceptions for people who are forced to support a group, or for children, or for tiny contributions, or for contributions that took place decades ago. It does not make any distinction between an al-Qaeda member and an armed combatant against a murderous regime. While the government has waiver authority in some cases, it has not yet used this power.

The results are terrible. According to the office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees and to officials and academics who have looked at the issue, here are some people who may be barred from entry to the United States: Colombians who were forced to help the leftist insurgency of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia; thousands of Karen and Chin nationals who suffered brutal repression at the hands of the Burmese military junta; Liberian, Somali and Vietnamese Montagnard victims of terrorism and repression; and some dissident Cubans who aided anti-Castro forces in the 1960s. The administration recently acknowledged in one asylum proceeding that those who fought with or aided the Northern Alliance against the Taliban or who supported the African National Congress against South Africa's apartheid government would be excluded, too.

A spokesman for House Judiciary Committee Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), who championed the Real ID Act, says the law's waiver authority gives the government the flexibility it needs to deal with such cases. And the problem could be alleviated if the administration would use that authority aggressively. But that would address only some of the cases, and only by having the government forgiving "terrorism" on the part of refugees whom it should not be labeling terrorists in the first place. This problem can be solved only by Congress. If this mess is not what Mr. Sensenbrenner had in mind, he ought to do something to clean it up.

Port Authority Rejects Silverstein's Offer To Talk (NYT)

By Charles V. Bagli

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

Nobody was calling the latest overtures negotiations yesterday, but it looked as if the stalled talks over financing and rebuilding at ground zero could resume next week, at least by mail if not face to face.

The Port Authority rejected a new offer yesterday from the developer Larry A. Silverstein to revive the negotiations and said it would unveil its own proposal for the site next week.

Talks between Mr. Silverstein, who controls the lease at ground zero, and the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the land, abruptly broke off late Tuesday night. The developer had submitted what state officials and Port Authority executives said was a one-sided counterproposal that shifted all the development risks onto the authority, while guaranteeing Mr. Silverstein a profit.

Eager to restart the talks, Mr. Silverstein sent the Port Authority a new proposal yesterday that he had hoped would lead both sides back to the bargaining table. While it may not contain some of the most unacceptable provisions of the old proposal, Port Authority officials said that the overture did not amount to a starting point for a new agreement.

"Silverstein Properties has attempted to provide a revision to their proposal of last Tuesday night," wrote the Port Authority in a tersely worded statement released yesterday evening. "However, many aspects remain unacceptable. Port Authority staff will develop a counterproposal that we believe will work for both parties to get this deal done."

The Port Authority's response drew a rapid retort from the Silverstein camp.

"We're glad the Port Authority has finally decided to produce a counterproposal, which is what we've been asking for since they abruptly broke off talks on Tuesday night," said Bud Perrone, a spokesman for Mr. Silverstein. "We hope it means that they are also prepared to return to the table without further needless delay."

The collapse of the negotiations, an embarrassment to both Mr. Silverstein and Gov. George E. Pataki, is only the latest problem to cast doubt over the future of the ground zero site. Fund-raising for the World Trade Center memorial is going slowly and critics have questioned whether the $2.3 billion Freedom Tower should be built.

The dispute between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority surfaced as state and city officials became concerned about the developer's ability to rebuild the entire site, at an estimated cost of more than $7 billion, when there is only $2.9 billion in insurance money available. Under Mr. Silverstein's lease at the trade center, he has both the right and the obligation to rebuild all the commercial space, at an estimated cost of more than $7 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0019406

As a result, state officials and Port Authority executives have sought to fashion a new arrangement at ground zero in which they split the site.

Last Tuesday evening, the two sides appeared to be close to a deal in which the Port Authority would take control of building the Freedom Tower, the most symbolic and least economically viable of the five towers planned for the area. The authority would also have taken over a second building site at Greenwich and Cedar Streets, where the heavily damaged Deutsche Bank building stands.

Mr. Silverstein, in turn, would have retained what everyone regards as the most lucrative sites for three towers on Church Street, next to the $2 billion PATH terminal now under construction.

But the talks foundered over a series of interrelated financial issues, including the allocation of $2.9 billion in insurance money; Mr. Silverstein's rent, which rises to $125.25 million in July; and his share of the infrastructure costs. Although the Silverstein camp insisted that the two sides were close, Charles A. Gargano, vice chairman of the Port Authority and the state's top economic development official, said they were about $1 billion apart on Tuesday night.

But even if Mr. Silverstein adjusts the financial terms of his offer, it remains to be seen if the Port Authority, whose 12 commissioners are appointed by the governors of New York and New Jersey, will revisit the old deal. Some commissioners had agreed on Tuesday only after prodding by Governor Pataki's chief negotiator, John Cahill.

At least two of the six New York commissioners considered the deal discussed last Tuesday to be overly generous to Mr. Silverstein.

"The majority of us, if not all, would prefer a buyout of his development rights," said a New York commissioner who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak for the board.

Anthony R. Coscia, chairman of the Port Authority, has expressed that he will not agree to a deal that enriches Mr. Silverstein, while leaving the authority with hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars in bills.

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is of a similar view. "I thought the deal the governor offered Larry Silverstein was a better deal than I would have offered, I'll tell you that," he said yesterday during his weekly radio show.

The mayor, who has been a frequent critic of Mr. Silverstein, said that ultimately Governor Pataki, Governor John S. Corzine and the Port Authority will lay out a plan telling Mr. Silverstein, "Look this is a fair deal; let's do this one, and Larry will agree."

WTC Talks To Resume Next Week (WSJ)

By Alex Frangos

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK -- Talks to resolve how to rebuild the World Trade Center will restart next week after private developer Larry Silverstein offered a revised proposal Friday for his role in the long-troubled project.

The Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which owns the site, said it would respond to Mr. Silverstein's proposal.

While calling aspects of Mr. Silverstein's latest proposal "unacceptable," Port Authority spokesman Steve Coleman said the agency "will develop a counter-proposal that we believe will work for both parties to get this deal done."

Negotiations between Mr. Silverstein and the Port Authority broke down Wednesday after failing to meet a deadline imposed by New York Gov. George E. Pataki. The Port Authority walked out on the talks saying the 74-year-old real estate tycoon was bargaining in "bad faith," a charge he denied.

Mr. Silverstein's revised proposal closes the gap between the two sides and contains some new ideas, according to a person close to the talks. In a statement, Mr. Silverstein said "the sooner we get this done the better."

Before talks failed, the two sides had the broad outlines of a deal in place that would have Mr. Silverstein give up the rights to build two of the five planned towers, including the signature Freedom Tower. The sticking points revolved around how much each side would bear of the $7 billion cost.

Little has been rebuilt 4 1/2 years after the attacks that destroyed the Twin Towers. Gov. Pataki, the Port Authority, which Gov. Pataki controls with New Jersey's governor, and Mr. Silverstein have come under heavy criticism for the lack of progress.

Ground Zeroes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Not long after the 9/11 terror attacks evicted us from our offices across from the World Trade Center, we remember thinking that it might be 10 years before the destroyed site was fully rebuilt. If only. Four and a half years later, Ground Zero remains just that -- a hole in the ground.

DOJ_NMG_0019407

The failure to even begin rebuilding Ground Zero is a disgrace, but it's also a classic display of New York's dysfunctional political culture. What was a rare chance to improve lower Manhattan and show the world our ability to bounce back has deteriorated into a familiar squabble among interest groups and politicians assigning blame.

The latest roadblock occurred this week, when private developer Larry Silverstein and the site's owner, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, failed to agree on a financial plan for building the five office towers planned for the site. New York Governor George Pataki, the politician with the most responsibility here, accused Mr. Silverstein of greed and "betray[ing] the public trust" and now wants to oust him from at least part of the project.

Mr. Pataki knows that when you're in trouble in politics, blame a rich old white guy. Mayor Michael Bloomberg, another leadership vanishing act (though with less influence over the WTC site), has adopted the same strategy. The developer counters that he could build commercially viable buildings if only the state and city would get out of the way.

Mr. Silverstein has the most credibility here, not least because he's the only one who has actually built something downtown since 9/11 -- the new 52-story skyscraper adjacent to Ground Zero known as 7 World Trade Center. "I can't tell you why government does what it does," he was quoted as saying in a wire-service report this week, in plaintive understatement. "In the private sector, this doesn't happen."

Much of the squabbling is over the Freedom Tower, the site's signature building, whose design took years to finalize. Mr. Silverstein isn't crazy about the latest version, though he's never trashed it the way his fellow real estate developer, Donald Trump, has. The Donald spoke for many New Yorkers last year when he called it "an egghead design, designed by an egghead, which has no practical application and, which, frankly, doesn't look very good."

We'd just as soon see the 1,776-foot-high tower scrapped in favor of a building less fraught with "symbolism" and more suited to real tenants. Everyone agrees that the iconic Freedom Tower will instantly become Manhattan's No. 1 terrorist target, and for that reason -- along with its size -- it's not an easily rentable property. Rather, it's destined as a home for government tenants, says the Manhattan Institute's Steven Malanga. The plans don't even include some high-tech amenities that corporate clients would demand.

An even bigger point of contention is the memorial to the September 11 victims, work on which was finally begun on Monday after years of wrangling. A lawsuit to stop the memorial is pending in state court, brought by family members dissatisfied with the design. The sister of a firefighter who was killed on September 11 demonstrated her opposition this week by sleeping in front of the firehouse across from Ground Zero.

The memorial is scheduled to open in 2009 (good luck), but first there's the little matter of money. The partially underground design is so controversial -- some say uninspiring -- that the foundation established to fund it has come up way short of the necessary $500 million. Some $200 million has come from Washington and another $100 million from private donations, but that still leaves $200 million to go.

On the first anniversary of 9/11, when the wreckage had been cleared more quickly than anyone dreamed possible, we expressed hope that a thriving new commercial center would soon rise from the rubble. Everyone expected that someone, the Governor ideally, would step forward to exert some leadership. But that has been in pathetic and short supply.

The failure at Ground Zero is a case study in government incompetence and buck-passing. It's no way to revive the economy of Downtown Manhattan, and it's certainly no way to honor the men and women who perished there on September 11.

FEMA Will Try To Recoup Millions Distributed For Hurricane Relief (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — Acknowledging that it wrongly distributed tens of millions of dollars in hurricane relief last year, the Federal Emergency Management Agency said Friday that it would try to recoup aid from thousands of individuals or families who fraudulently or otherwise wrongly collected money.

Officials at the agency said it was a routine step taken after any disaster because in the rush to distribute emergency aid, benefits were occasionally paid twice to the same family or to people who were ineligible.

"In every disaster there are just some people who are bad apples who attempt to take advantage of the programs," said Donna Dannels, the acting deputy director of disaster recovery at FEMA.

But auditors examining the $6.8 billion in disaster assistance distributed last year to 1.7 million households after Hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma said FEMA was to blame for much of the abuse because of a woefully inadequate accounting system that left it vulnerable to fraud.

"The right way to do this is to prevent it in the first place," said Gregory D. Kutz, managing director of a unit in the Government Accountability Office that has already found that thousands of people submitted duplicate or invalid Social Security numbers to receive aid. "You will never catch even a fraction of the people who have committed fraud here."

DOJ_NMG_0019408

So far, FEMA has sent letters to 1,500 families asking them to return payments, which most frequently came in the form of $2,000 in cash but could legally reach $26,200 per household.

FEMA's requests for repayment came after it conducted its own search for duplicate payments and other irregularities.

The letters that went out this week were just the first wave. FEMA officials said Friday that they would most likely seek the return of aid from 2 percent to 3 percent of approved applicants. They said that they could not estimate how much money they would try to recoup, but that it could be up to $100 million.

In some cases, payments were made to families to cover immediate expenses that have since been reimbursed by private insurance, Ms. Dannels said.

But the inquiry by Mr. Kutz and his staff members, which is still under way, has already shown that thousands and perhaps tens of thousands of inappropriate payments were made because people were able to apply for and collect aid repeatedly.

For example, about 5,000 of the 11,000 victims of Hurricane Katrina who collected FEMA debit cards worth $2,000 that were distributed in Texas also received $2,000 payments in the mail, even though they were eligible for only one so-called expedited assistance payment to buy food, clothing and other emergency supplies.

Separately, investigators found that thousands of payments for cash aid and rental assistance were sent to people who applied with falsified Social Security numbers or numbers that belonged to people who had died.

The problem, the investigators found, was that when people called FEMA's toll-free registration number, the agency did not try to confirm their identities by using government records to match the applicants' names with the submitted Social Security numbers.

"FEMA provided the fraudsters an opportunity that was very appealing to steal money," Mr. Kutz said. In one case, a person used 15 different Social Security numbers to collect $41,000.

The weaknesses in FEMA's emergency aid system are not new: in 2004, after Hurricane Frances in Florida, it gave out $31 million in aid to more than 12,000 residents of the Miami area that auditors later ruled was largely unjustified because hurricane-force winds never hit the area. FEMA ultimately moved to recoup much of this money as well.

Individuals who receive a letter from FEMA will have a month to repay the requested amount before they will be charged interest. Recipients will have a chance to appeal, but if the appeal is not sustained and the payment is not made, the debt will be turned over to the Treasury Department to collect.

Officials from FEMA and the treasury could not say Friday how successful the government had been at recovering excessive or unjustified payments from past disasters.

R. David Paulison, the acting FEMA director, said the agency was moving to correct some of the problems, including establishing a way to verify applicants' identities when they applied for aid over the phone, a system that would be in place for the next hurricane season.

Ultimately, Mr. Paulison said, there will never be a way to stop all fraud and waste.

"For every instance of an incorrect payment, there are thousands who were genuinely in need of the federal government's help," Mr. Paulison said in a statement Friday. "It is our job to ensure there is not delay in receiving that assistance."

In Louisiana, Graft Inquiries Are Increasing (NYT)

By Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

KENNER, La. — Long before this suburb west of New Orleans was shaken by Hurricane Katrina, it was notorious for its fierce political infighting, for name-calling and mudslinging, for charges and countercharges of cronyism and corruption.

But accusations about matters like ticket-fixing are one thing, and allegations involving millions of federal dollars for storm recovery are quite another.

In February, federal prosecutors in New Orleans began bringing witnesses before a grand jury looking into possible fraud in Kenner municipal contracts that were awarded immediately before and after the hurricane. The mayor and the entire City Council have been subpoenaed to testify, although the government has not made clear its target.

Growing numbers of subpoenas may soon be issued across Louisiana, where local politics remains a blood sport and corruption has been a bad habit. That combination has become far more volatile with the addition of millions of dollars in aid beginning to flow from Washington and an army of auditors, investigators and prosecutors determined to make sure that the money is properly spent.

So far, the scrutiny has resulted in several major fraud prosecutions around the state. The government has filed charges against a politician in St. Tammany Parish, north of New Orleans, who is accused of seeking hurricane contract kickbacks, and against several federal workers accused of seeking bribes and a contractor who was paid millions of dollars for work the government says he did not perform at a tent camp.

New hurricane fraud investigations are being opened "sometimes by the day," said Jim Letten, the United States attorney in New Orleans, who was the lead prosecutor in the corruption case against former Gov. Edwin W. Edwards, convicted in 2000 of a scheme to extort money from businessmen seeking gambling boat licenses.

"Additional investigations focus on everything from fake charities to identity theft to contractors behaving fraudulently to public corruption cases," Mr. Letten said.

Grand jury investigations normally take place in secret, and Mr. Letten said he could not discuss the focus or the scope of the inquiry in Kenner, a city of 70,000 people that is home to New Orleans's airport.

But some information has become public, in part because the mayor and several City Council members have held news conferences on the investigation. Reporters were waiting in the halls of the Hale Boggs Federal Building on March 9 when a contractor and all seven members of the Council trooped up to the fourth floor to testify. And the contracts in question have been a subject of public acrimony between the mayor and the Council, a circumstance that led to a fistfight between a contractor and the brothers of a councilman at a Mardi Gras ball in February.

"Kenner is the home of hardball politics," said Jeff Crouere, a political commentator who is a former executive director of the Louisiana Republican Party. (Almost all the battling politicians in Kenner are Republicans.) But the grand jury inquiry, coming so soon before hotly contested city elections on April 1, "is just an incredible situation," Mr. Crouere said, "where voters are left scratching their heads."

Dominic O. Weilbaecher, a city councilman and former interim mayor, has raised questions about at least $22 million in city spending on debris removal, trailers and public relations.

The spending was approved by the current mayor, Philip L. Capitano, who is running for re-election. A former ally of his, Mr. Weilbaecher contends that Mr. Capitano is now rewarding campaign contributors, overpaying cronies and generally spending taxpayer money without demonstrating that the city is getting anything in return.

"I've been talking to guys from the F.B.I. for two years, just because of the foolishness I've seen from this administration," Mr. Weilbaecher (pronounced WHILE-backer) said in an interview.

What is new, he said, is that federal money is now involved: the city is seeking reimbursement for storm-related expenses from the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"My take is, the U.S. attorney wants to send a message that regardless of what's going on with elections or any other thing, you don't mess with the federal government," Mr. Weilbaecher said.

The mayor replied that his efforts after the storm saved the city money, got it up and running quickly, and did not involve any impropriety.

"We did it better, we did it cheaper," he said in an interview. "That's why it's so funny we're being investigated by a grand jury right now, when we were more efficient, cheaper and better than all the surrounding communities."

The mayor later sent along a letter he had received from the University of Chicago Graduate School of Business praising his "bold and intelligent leadership" after the storm.

Randal Perkins, owner of a major debris removal company that worked in Louisiana and Mississippi after the hurricane, said in a phone interview that he believed Kenner was paying less on its cleanup contract than the Army Corps of Engineers was spending on similar work.

"It's politics," Mr. Capitano said of the inquiry. Mr. Weilbaecher and another councilman, Michael McMyne, "are trying to help the guy who ran against me" in the last election.

That guy, Nick Congemi, is the police chief and brother of Mr. Capitano's predecessor as mayor. The chief is among four candidates challenging Mr. Capitano this time.

"I don't think anybody can plot with the U.S. attorney's office," Mr. Congemi said recently. "That accusation is a simple politician's answer to a deep dilemma he's in now."

Whatever is behind the accusations, Mr. Letten, the prosecutor, had no choice but to look into them, said L. Eades Hogue, a former federal prosecutor representing the contractor who has appeared before the grand jury. "It smacks of politics," Mr. Hogue said, "but the U.S. attorney is obligated to investigate allegations such as these."

Even some critics of the mayor do not dispute that this city of about 15 square miles began rebounding from the hurricane faster than many other communities. But they suggest that this had less to do with politicians than with the route of the storm, which struck hardest at points farther east.

"As bad as it was, this city was blessed," said John T. Lavarine III, who like his father before him serves on the City Council. "We were on the western fringes."

Which is not to say that Kenner escaped unscathed. Driving his Crown Victoria through the city recently, Mr. Lavarine headed north and west to Loyola Drive, where white FEMA trailers line the streets like false teeth in front of damaged houses. Across town, a huge apartment complex that housed mostly Hispanic residents sits moldering, roofs torn off and walls tipped in.

DOJ_NMG_0019410

Worried about rebuilding their homes and about the next hurricane, Kenner's residents, some politicians among them, seem embarrassed by the investigation and fed up with the political squabbling.

"The fighting and all has not served the city well," said Edmond J. Muniz, a retired businessman and politician known for founding Endymion, one of the biggest Mardi Gras krewes, or parade groups, who decided at the last minute to run for mayor. "I don't know how to put it. I wouldn't want to say we are a laughingstock, because it isn't funny."

EPA Chief Backs Coast Restoration (NOTP)

By Matthew Brown

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 18, 2006

But he's offering no new money for it

U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Stephen Johnson said Friday that the Bush administration is committed to rebuilding Louisiana's shattered coastline, but offered no new money for an effort expected to cost up to $14 billion.

Nor did he offer any specifics as to what role his agency would play.

"President Bush and EPA are determined to rebuild and rejuvenate our nation's wetlands," Johnson said in a speech at the annual meeting of the National Wildlife Federation in New Orleans. "After Katrina and Rita, the entire world knows how important wetlands are to our lives and our communities. . . . Coastal security and sustainability are about more than levees and concrete."

Participants in a private breakfast meeting with Johnson Friday morning said he indicated he wanted the EPA to "get going" on at least a handful of the many coastal restoration projects under consideration. Some have been stuck on the drawing boards for years.

"They want to identify some projects they can work on collaboratively," said Richard Innes, a Washington conservation lobbyist who sat in on the meeting. "He said let's pick a couple and just get going so we can say the money's there, the bulldozers are on the ground."

Since the 1930s, Louisiana has lost an estimated 1,900 square miles of coastal wetlands to erosion. Despite passage of the Breaux Act by Congress in 1990 in an attempt to stop the losses, land has continued to disappear at the rate of about 24 square miles annually over the past decade.

Adam Kolton, senior director for congressional affairs for the wildlife federation, said he was encouraged by Johnson's broad statements on wetlands issues, but said the administration needs to press Congress to follow up with cash. "Thus far, we haven't gotten what we needed from Congress and, frankly, that's disappointing," Kolton said.

In an earlier address to the wildlife federation, King Milling, president of Whitney National Bank and chairman of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's advisory commission on coastal protection, repeated calls made by Louisiana's elected leaders to give the state a larger share of offshore oil and gas royalties to finance the restoration effort.

Johnson did not address the administration's stand on that proposal, and after his speech declined to answer questions from a reporter.

A Hurricane And Espresso. What's Next? (NYT)

By Laura Rich

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

In its fourth-quarter earnings report, Procter & Gamble had one particularly dark cloud in a generally bright update: Hurricane Katrina was making a mess of its coffee business, which got 50 percent of its supply from four sites in New Orleans.

Though the plants were among the first back in operation after the hurricane struck on Aug. 29, there are still, as Doug McGraw, the executive in charge of global coffee, put it, "holes on the shelves" where Folgers and Millstone, Procter's brands, should be. Mr. McGraw spoke recently about the impact of the hurricane and how the business is doing now. The following are excerpts:

Q. In the coffee market, regional roasters and the popularity of espresso drinks are changing the market. How are you addressing those new forms of competition?

A. On a macro level, I'd say that the really good thing that's happening in the coffee market right now is that people are becoming more interested in the coffee. The terminology I've used on previous occasions is that "coffee is kind of becoming cool." And that's really good for the industry and it's manifesting itself in a number of ways. One is, there are new, smaller, regional coffee businesses coming online. Obviously, coffee shops are becoming far more prevalent than they were 5 years ago, 10 years ago.

One of the things we're really excited about that we hope we see continue is that consumers are trading up from more kind of mainstream coffees to more gourmet and more expensive coffees as they become more knowledgeable and more sophisticated about what's out there. And certainly, the trend toward espresso-based beverages is partially what's behind that.

DOJ_NMG_0019411

Q. Since Folgers is more of a mainstream brand, what are you doing to address the move toward the higher end of the market?

A. One of the things we've done in the last year is, we have a segment of our line called the Folgers Coffehouse Series. It provides more gourmet-like blends and roasts such as French Roast, Gourmet Supreme, Colombian. So we have shifted our emphasis within our product and marketing programs to make Folgers consumers and other coffee drinkers aware that Folgers, too, offers these more gourmet, slightly darker, roasted coffees.

We also have a second brand, Millstone, which is one of the leading national gourmet brands, which we have shifted more of our emphasis to with the hope of capturing additional consumers as they explore what's available in the coffee market.

Q. Is Starbucks a market that's important to crack?

A. No, our primary focus and business model is to sell through retail outlets: grocery stores, mass merchandisers, club stores.

Q. What steps did you take to get back online in New Orleans?

A. For the first several weeks, we were renting helicopters to drop people in during the day, first to assess the damage. Over the course of the recovery, we dug our own well. We were trucking water in from Baton Rouge.

But probably the biggest undertaking that is still in place today — it's just an amazing picture — we have 130-some trailers located on what used to be our employee parking lot, because, as I said, most of our employees had left the area with their families. Since close to two-thirds of them had significant property damage, they didn't have any place to come back to, so we created what we call Gentilly Village, which was the trailers, some of which we bought and some of which we got from FEMA, on our parking lot, along with the generators, laundry facilities, a large kitchen and food-service operation, etc.

Q. How many of the employees who left came back?

A. Upwards of 90 percent. So, over 400 of our 500-some employees have come back.

Q. When do you expect everything will be back to normal?

A. For as good as our operation is running right now, there are some unique challenges associated with operating a business in the New Orleans area right now. The costs of operation have gone up pretty dramatically.

Hopefully as the city infrastructure gets back under control and operating at whatever level it's going to operate at, those will improve. But it's an issue today.

Blanco Plan Passes First Test (BRA)

Baton Rouge Advocate, March 18, 2006

Legislators on Friday advanced the biggest part of Gov. Kathleen Blanco's hurricane recovery plan — totaling $6.2 billion — despite gripes about the lack of detail on how the money will be spent.

The dollars are coming from Congress. The state must submit a spending plan to the federal government before the funds start flowing.

The Louisiana Recovery Authority's executive director, Andy Kopplin, said the state is only ready to spend part of the money.

The Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget approved two plans Friday — a broad outline for spending the $6.2 billion and a more specific plan for using $368.9 million of it. The plan now goes to the full Legislature for approval.

The governor is asking Congress for another $4.2 billion of the same kind of funds, known as Community Development Block Grants. The aid is crucial to the governor's plans because the state decides how to spend the federal money.

Blanco wants to start setting up the mechanism for eventually distributing billions for housing aid to homeowners and renters affected by the hurricanes.

She also wants federal reimbursement for the cost of setting up call centers to gather information from hurricane victims on their housing situations.

Another part of the plan calls for establishing recovery centers to help displaced renters and homeowners.

The administration outlined the plan for legislators on two pages, not using more than a paragraph to describe each type of expense.

Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, found the two-sentence description of the recovery centers to be lacking.

"I couldn't explain to anybody what we're approving," he complained.

Dardenne pointed out that legislation to create recovery centers to counsel hurricane victims on their housing options didn't survive the Legislature's recent special session.

A bill creating the centers was part of the governor's legislative package. It passed the Senate but died in the House because it was never called up for a vote.

"What is a recovery center if the Legislature didn't authorize the creation of it?" Dardenne asked.

DOJ_NMG_0019412

Suzie Elkins, director of the Office of Community Development, which is coordinating the funding, said the centers are simply a mechanism to get money into the hands of homeowners.

The centers will determine how much financial assistance a homeowner needs and make sure homes are inspected and appraised, she said.

The centers share the same name as the counseling centers proposed in the legislation, but they are not the same thing, she said.

"Call it whatever you want," Elkins told Dardenne. "You have to have something in place."

Dardenne also asked why banks or housing entities could not handle the distribution of funds.

Kopplin said that may be what happens. He said the state plans to seek bids to pick a firm to manage the money.

Rep. Don Cazayoux, D-New Roads, puzzled over the administration's intention to use a portion of the federal funds to employ staff.

"I thought we were approving an action plan," he said. "What are you talking about hiring people?"

Kopplin said the state has to staff the call centers.

Pressed further about the extent of the hiring, Elkins said the state does intend to start contracting for people to set up the recovery centers.

Rep. Steve Scalise, R-Jefferson, made a motion to remove the recovery centers from the administration's plan.

Kopplin urged against the action, saying it would slow the state's recovery from the hurricanes.

Sen. Francis Heitmeier, D-New Orleans, agreed.

"We don't want to cause roadblocks where we're not getting money to people," he said.

Heitmeier also scolded Kopplin for not providing more information.

"In the future, we need a breakdown of where you going to spend the dollars," he said. "You can't just throw this at us."

In the ends, Scalise's motion to remove the centers failed on a vote of four in favor to 25 against.

The plan now goes to the full Legislature for approval.

Money the Blanco administration is ready to spend so far includes:

$95 million for loans ranging from $5,000 to $100,000 for small businesses in hurricane-affected areas.

$95 million for local governments to provide money required for the federal government to share the cost of rebuilding infrastructure.

$142.5 million to repair state buildings damaged by the hurricanes.

$1 million to design housing programs.

$2 million for a call center to gather information from homeowners in need of housing.

$9.8 million to establish housing assistance centers for hurricane victims.

$5.1 million to conduct environmental reviews of property in the hurricane-affected areas.

$18.45 million in administrative expenses.

Legislators OK Recovery Plan Grudgingly (NOTP)

By Robert Travis Scott

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 18, 2006

They warn governor to keep them in loop

BATON ROUGE -- A critical portion of the state's plan seeking billions of federal dollars for hurricane recovery passed a legislative panel Friday, but not without a warning shot to the governor's administration that lawmakers need to be better informed and integrated into the process.

In response, administration officials expressed concern that the flow of federal money for housing and other recovery programs could be unnecessarily delayed.

The Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget approved an "action plan" outlining how the state would spend $6.2 billion in federal block grants for storm relief. The plan next will be submitted to the full Legislature soon after it convenes a spring session on March 27, then will go to the Department of Housing and Urban Development for federal approval.

Among the components of the state's plan are $332.5 million for economic development bridge loans, $1.19 billion for local and state government infrastructure and $4.37 billion for housing recovery. The governor's handpicked Louisiana Recovery Authority designed the plan.

The panel approved what for the most part was a proposal for spending, not actual spending. But the request contained several items that would accelerate the state's ability to start spending money to put the plan in place.

Getting the facts

DOJ_NMG_0019413

Among those items, several members of the committee raised concerns about a $9.8 million request to begin creating "recovery centers" to assist homeowners applying for loans and grants to repair their damaged properties. Though only a tiny amount of the overall package, the item is a catalyst for getting the housing program started, LRA director Andy Kopplin said.

The money would be used to begin the long process of getting the centers up and running, starting with official state requests for private companies and organizations to submit their proposals for doing the work, Kopplin said.

"Our greatest fear is that we're going to have the money available but the implementation status delayed," Kopplin said.

Panel member Sen. Jay Dardenne, R-Baton Rouge, criticized the recovery center request for its lack of clarity and wondered whether the state was using the money to hire staff.

"All I have is a piece of paper that says give me $9.8 million for a recovery center," Dardenne said. "We don't have any backup information."

Dardenne said the state might be better off using banks or accountants to implement the program, rather than creating its own bureaucracy. The recovery center request appeared to create a new layer of state administration on the housing issue, an idea the Legislature rejected in the recent special session, he said.

Kopplin said it was too early to know how the recovery centers would operate, because the state will first want to see how financial companies and nonprofit organizations propose to handle the work, and for how much compensation. That will not be known until the contract proposals come in, he said.

Sen. Francis Heitmeier, D-Algiers, who chaired the meeting, said the Legislature cannot do its job properly with such sparse information and short notice.

"We just can't have y'all throwin' numbers at us . . . and not knowing how you're going to use it," Heitmeier told Kopplin.

He said the committee did not want to create roadblocks to people getting their money, but repeatedly warned Kopplin that in the future lawmakers will expect more details.

If HUD approves the plan, the Legislature will once again have a say on budget requests for how to spend the money.

Hospitals feel squeeze

The panel also heard Friday from representatives of Ochsner Foundation Hospital, West Jefferson Medical Center and East Jefferson General Hospital, which are operating under financial strains brought on by providing care to uninsured patients unable to pay their bills. Prior to Hurricane Katrina, the bulk of such care was provided to patients for free or at low cost by the state-run Charity Hospital, which is shut down.

With mounting costs, difficulty borrowing in the current economic climate and no immediate avenues for federal relief, the hospitals have reached a financial crisis in which they may have to curtail services and let go of staff, they said. And those professionals will be hard to lure back.

Meanwhile, the community needs more hospital beds to keep up with the recovery.

"What we're facing is wanting to do what's right for the community, but opening beds means increasing losses," said Mark Peters, president of East Jefferson General.

"The prudent business thing to do is close," said Patrick Quinlan, chief executive of Ochsner Clinic Foundation, noting that institutions that closed could collect business interruption insurance. "We get lots of sympathy, lots of understanding, but we've gotten zero help."

The health executives asked the Legislature to look for solutions during the upcoming session. On Friday, Rep. Steve Scalise, R-Jefferson, filed House Bills 989 and 1024 to allow non-state hospitals to receive reimbursement through the state for treating uninsured patients.

Congress Boosts Flood Insurance Agency (AP)

By Jim Abrams

AP, March 18, 2006

Congress has agreed to boost the borrowing power of the federal flood insurance agency, which is fast running out of money needed to meet some 225,000 claims from hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

The legislation, passed by voice vote in the Senate late Thursday, allows the National Flood Insurance Program to borrow up to $20.8 billion from the Treasury, up from the current ceiling of $18.5 billion.

A year ago, before last summer's hurricanes, the borrowing limit was set at $1.5 billion.

The measure, approved by the House last month, now goes to the president for his signature.

The NFIP, set up in 1968 to help homeowners in flood-vulnerable areas get flood insurance at a reasonable rate, operates within the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0019414

It has estimated claims liabilities from Katrina and Rita at $24 billion, more than the total of all claims paid in the history of the program. The agency had said that, without congressional action, it would hit its current borrowing ceiling this month and would have to tell insurance companies that administer claims payments to stop all such payments.

The NFIP insures about 4.4 million policyholders in some 20,000 communities across the country. Participating communities must agree to carry out floodplain management and other steps to reduce losses from floods.

Also on Thursday, the House Financial Services Committee approved a bill to improve the financial viability of the NFIP by giving FEMA greater authority to raise rates and increasing fines for non-enforcement of the mandatory purchase requirement. The measure would also increase the program's borrowing authority to $25 billion.

The Senate Banking Committee plans to take up a similar measure in the next few weeks.

That legislation follows on an act passed by Congress in 2004 to crack down on property owners who file repeated claims for flood damage without relocating or floodproofing their homes.

WAR NEWS:

Gen. Ambitious On Increasing Iraqi Control (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, March 18, 2006

The U.S. military's goal is to have Iraqi security forces in control of 75 percent of the country's territory by this summer, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Baghdad said Friday.

That is more ambitious than President Bush's statement on Monday that his aim was to have Iraqis control more territory than the U.S.-led coalition by the end of 2006 — a process that Bush said would free up more American troops to focus on training the Iraqi forces and hunting down the chief terrorists inside Iraq.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commander of Multinational Corps Iraq, told reporters at the Pentagon that he had no firm estimate of how much territory the Iraqi forces currently control, but he said it was less than 50 percent.

"By this summer, about 75 percent of Iraq will be ... owned by Iraqi units," he said. Asked to be more specific, he said the plan was to get there by "the end of summer" and added, "All indications, we will make that, but again I don't want to be so precise as to put myself into a box."

Chiarelli did not further define the 75 percent goal, such as saying whether it would include some or all of the most troubled territory such as the area north and west of Baghdad known as the Sunni Triangle. The insurgent violence in Iraq is confined largely to that area and Anbar province west of the capital.

Speaking by videoteleconference from his headquarters, Chiarelli also said that while he believes Iraq is "far away" from civil war, the sectarian tensions created by a Feb. 22 attack on a Shiite shrine in Samarra mean "the possibility of civil war may be higher today than it has in the last three years."

He repeatedly stressed that he does not believe civil war will break out. "There are a vast majority of Iraqis in the middle, who don't see the divisions that are being highlighted" by reports about sectarian attacks, he added.

Chiarelli also said news reports in the weeks following the Feb. 22 mosque bombing have exaggerated the extent of sectarian violence.

The general described this week's heliborne assault on a large expanse of desert northeast of the city of Samarra, dubbed Operation Swarmer, as mainly an effort to flush out "terrorists and foreign fighters" and uncover arms caches in an area that he said was 10 miles by 10 miles in size and largely uninhabited.

Resistance was "very, very light," he said, adding that there would be "more and more" missions like this in the future.

"It really marks a change, and it marks an evolution (in) our ability to get outside many of the large metropolitan areas and conduct operations based intelligence we receive from U.S. sources, from Iraqi sources in areas where we think insurgent networks are operating," he said.

Earlier Friday, retired Gen. Richard Myers said on CBS's "The Early Show" there are many things the military "could have done differently" in Iraq from the start of the conflict three years ago this month.

"I can't single out one thing, but I can assure you that if we had this to do again, we'd look at different ways to do it," he said, adding, "we made mistakes, absolutely."

Myers retired from his post as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff last fall.

U.S. Wants Fewer Troops In Line Of Fire (AP)

By Robert Burns

DOJ_NMG_0019415

AP, March 18, 2006

The Pentagon wants to pull increasing numbers of American troops out of the line of fire in Iraq, but three years after the invasion this latest evolution in the U.S. military's mission will depend largely on whether Iraqi security forces can handle it.

Whether there will be the first sustained decline in American casualties since the insurgency took hold in late summer 2003 depends on how quickly and fully U.S. troops' roles are changed. So far more than 2,300 American troops have died in the campaign, with more than 17,000 wounded.

Though the stated goal of U.S. officials is to make a substantial withdrawal of troops this year, it is not yet clear that the Iraqis will prove ready — politically or militarily — to take on the added responsibility. A Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine set off sectarian violence that has slowed the process of forming a permanent government in Baghdad, more than three months after December's elections.

This week the outlook was altered by two developments. The Pentagon announced it was sending 700 more U.S. troops into Iraq from Kuwait, and it launched a large assault on suspected insurgent territory near Samarra, north of Baghdad.

The dispatching of extra troops to Iraq pointed up the problem of relying too much on Iraqi security forces during periods of heightened tension. But the helicopter-led assault near Samarra, which involved large numbers of Iraqi troops, showed that Iraqi forces are taking on bigger responsibilities, top U.S. officers said.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Baghdad, said Friday that the goal is to turn control of 75 percent of the country's territory over to Iraqi forces by the end of summer. That did not necessarily mean the Iraqis would be given areas where the insurgency is strongest, but it did underscore the goal of enlarging their role.

Pentagon officials never expected that the invasion of Iraq, capped by a swift toppling of Saddam Hussein, would be followed by three years of deadly combat with a shadowy and resilient insurgency. Nor did they think it would take so long to get a capable Iraqi army trained and equipped.

"We did not plan three years ago to create more than token Iraqi forces," said Anthony Cordesman, an Iraq expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "Now we're at 230,000 roughly, and counting. Our whole strategy is dependent on the success of the Iraqi army and the Iraqi police."

As U.S. commanders place more and more Iraqi territory under the control of local forces, Americans have begun moving to more of a back-seat role — putting the Iraqi army and police in charge. This is happening even with the expectation that at some point the Iraqis will careen off their path and need more U.S. help.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded to this in a Feb. 17 speech at the Council on Foreign Relations, when he said the Pentagon must keep pushing the Iraqis to stand on their own:

"We're going to have to pull out of some pieces of real estate and turn over things to Iraqis. And they're going to drop the ball; I mean, let's face it. And we're going to have to step in, go back in and fix it, and then turn it back over again. And it's going to be three steps forward and one step back."

Cordesman said in an interview that the U.S. military and the Bush administration vastly underestimated the difficulty they would face in stabilizing a conquered Iraq.

"We find ourselves having been able to prevent the insurgency from rising, but not from creating a growing risk of civil war," he said. "We have not by any means lost, but we can't say that we are — at least yet — winning."

Iraqi forces are being given full control of more territory each month, although U.S. soldiers are still operating with them as advisers, trainers and monitors. When an Iraqi army brigade assumed control of areas in central and southern Baghdad from the U.S. Army's 4th Infantry Division on Feb. 21, Col. Michael Beech said 60 percent of the capital was in Iraqi hands.

In a report to Congress on Feb. 24, the Pentagon said it will be possible to consider further U.S. troop reductions beyond the 7,000-troop cut announced by Rumsfeld in December. But it was cautious, noting that while U.S. troops may become less visible, their numbers might have to be increased at some point.

The last time the Pentagon began reducing the U.S. presence, in early 2004, the insurgency suddenly intensified, with a rash of U.S. troop deaths and a near complete breakdown of civil order in the city of Fallujah.

From a low point in January 2004 of just under 110,000, the U.S. troop total grew to about 142,000 four months later and has hovered in the range of 135,000 to 160,000 ever since. That has put an enormous strain on the military, particularly the Army and Marine Corps as the primary U.S. ground forces in Iraq.

The Pentagon says it is making progress in training Iraqi security forces, but officers directly involved acknowledge the task is complicated by language and other cultural gaps between the U.S. and Iraqi soldiers. Few Iraqis have more than a vague notion of what it means to have a professional military.

"They're worried about survival," said Maj. Rodrigo E. Mateo, who led a team of U.S. military advisers in Iraq last year. That can make it hard for the Americans to understand the motives of Iraqi army recruits and how they will react to military discipline, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0019416

Mateo and other former Army trainers said in recent interviews that the quality of Iraqi recruits has varied widely.

"A lot of people joined (the Iraqi military) because that's the best opportunity they have to feed their families and to earn a living," said Lt. Col. Reginald E. Allen, a trainer in Iraq in 2004.

"If they get in that situation and the training is too rough for them or not does not adhere to their normal cultural standards where they get a certain amount of time off ... then they're going to jump ship," Allen said.

Convoy Duty Is Still Task Of U.S. (NOTP)

By David Wood, Newhouse News Service

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 18, 2006

Iraqis not trained for dangerous role

WASHINGTON -- No matter how many U.S. combat troops in Iraq eventually are replaced by Iraqis, an especially difficult and risky mission will remain an American responsibility: convoy duty.

The reality behind President Bush's assertion this week that Iraqi units are increasingly capable of standing on their own is that none can operate without heavy and sustained logistics support from the United States, according to military assessments.

This means the American soldiers who drive and guard convoys -- troops drawn mostly from Army Reserve and National Guard units that already have seen hard duty in Iraq -- will be exposed to highly dangerous conditions there for the foreseeable future.

This week, Staff Sgt. Bryan A. Lewis, 32, of Bunkie was killed during a convoy operation north of Rustamiyah on the edge of Baghdad. The Defense Department said the Louisiana man died Monday after an improvised explosive device detonated near his Humvee. Lewis was assigned to the 519th Military Police Battalion, 49th Military Police Brigade, Fort Polk.

Long, imperiled line

Every day, more than 1,000 trucks in long-haul convoys are on Iraq's roads delivering the fuel, spare parts, ammunition, boots, medical supplies, food and water on which both U.S. and Iraqi forces depend. Thousands more keep far-flung American Forward Operating Bases supplied with rations, water and ammunition.

The crawling lines are guarded by military police and soldiers in Humvees and armored combat vehicles, often with attack helicopters overhead. Convoys endure a steady drumbeat of sniper fire, ambushes, suicide vehicle attacks, roadside bombings and other assaults, and bear a major share of U.S. combat deaths and injuries. For security reasons, the Pentagon does not segregate convoy casualty data.

Approaching the third anniversary of the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, Bush repeated this week that "as Iraqis stand up, America and our coalition will stand down," his formulation for replacing Americans in combat with Iraqis and bringing the troops home. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, meanwhile, said that "some 100 Iraqi battalions are in the fight against the terrorists, and 49 control their own battle space."

But by the Pentagon's own analysis, there are significant caveats.

In a wide-ranging assessment of the war, mandated by Congress, the Defense Department reported last month on the steadily growing numbers of Iraqi units taking to the field. Deep in the fine print, however, it warned that Iraq's forces remain "largely dependent" on the United States for logistics supply and support.

The problem is not just lack of trucks, drivers and security, but organization up to the defense ministry level, the Pentagon said.

Convoy training

It rated not one unit capable of fully independent operations, and added, "It will take some time before a substantial number of units are assessed as fully independent and requiring no assistance."

And, at present, Iraqis are not being prepared to take over convoy operations, U.S. Army transportation officers say. Instead, the Army is training increasing numbers of its own soldiers for convoy duty, once seen as a relatively soft "support" function and now viewed as a full-fledged combat assignment.

"We typically are the first ones in and the last ones out" of a war zone, said Col. Mike Dooley of the Army Transportation Corps, headquartered at Fort Eustis, Va.

Of Iraq, he added, "We will be there as long as the war goes on."

Dooley said he has urged the Army to begin readying the Iraqis to run their own convoys. "That hasn't happened yet," he said.

The military freight that must eventually move by truck in Iraq is substantial. About 1,700 truckloads a month come by air to logistics bases in Kuwait or Qatar for onward shipment by air or truck. More tonnage comes by sea. Separately, Air Force C-130 and C-17 cargo planes land about 580 truckloads monthly at airstrips in Iraq, as close to troops as possible.

DOJ_NMG_0019417

"By moving more cargo via airlift, we are able to reduce the number of vehicles, drivers and escorts exposed to the risk of enemy attack," said Brig. Gen. Darren McDew, director of mobility forces for U.S. Central Command Air Forces.

But all cargo must move at least some distance by truck. Managing the convoys becomes the responsibility of the thousands of officers and enlisted soldiers graduating from the Army's convoy courses.

Attention to detail

Today every basic trainee is taught convoy combat operations in anticipation of duty in Iraq. "We're sending them out into the wild, wild west, so we've got to prepare them," said Lt. Col. Chris Rizzo, a battalion commander overseeing live-fire convoy training at Fort Jackson, S.C.

At the Army's transportation center at Fort Eustis, Lt. Col. Andrew Peters, 39, chief of officer education, rides his students hard. As they prepare a training convoy, he barks, "Do you have a combat life saver? Have you looked in his bag to see if he's got IV solution?"

"I can't teach them every situation they will run into in Iraq," said Peters, whose elbow was shattered in an attack on his convoy in Iraq in August 2003. "They do need technical know-how -- how to call in a medevac -- but mostly what I teach them is attention to detail."

Pilgrims Attacked On Road To Holy City (WT/AP)

By Charles J. Hanley, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

BAGHDAD -- With bombs and drive-by shootings, anti-Shi'ite extremists targeted pilgrims on the road to the holy city of Karbala yesterday, as political leaders remained divided over how to shape a broad-based government to work for peace in Iraq.

In Sunni Arab areas of western Baghdad, gunmen in passing vehicles killed three Shi'ite Muslim pilgrims and wounded five others. To the south, bombs in a minibus and along the pilgrimage road killed two persons and wounded nine.

North of the capital, helicopter-borne U.S. and Iraqi troops pressed their sweep through a 100-square-mile swath of the Sunni Triangle to break up a growing insurgent stronghold, the U.S. military said.

No resistance or casualties were reported as the offensive picked up dozens of insurgent suspects.

The operation was mounted Thursday northeast of the city of Samarra, where an insurgent bombing on Feb. 22 severely damaged a major Shi'ite shrine and ignited days of sectarian bloodshed across Iraq. More than 500 people died.

That spasm of violence deepened the political divide -- between representatives of the Shi'ite majority and Sunni minority -- that is blocking formation of a new government of national unity. An all-party meeting was scheduled for late yesterday to try to move those negotiations forward.

An American soldier was fatally shot Thursday while manning an observation post in Samarra, 60 miles north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. The soldier was from the 101st Airborne Division's 3rd Brigade Combat Team, part of which is participating in the airborne sweep.

At least 2,312 members of the U.S. military have died since the war in Iraq started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Authorities had feared new attacks as tens of thousands of devout Shi'ites converged on Karbala, 50 miles south of Baghdad, for Monday's celebration of Arbaeen, a day of mourning for Imam Hussein, the prophet Muhammad's grandson, who was killed at Karbala in 680.

The bloodshed in Baghdad began yesterday as groups of Shi'ite faithful, many of them parents with children in tow, trekked down city streets in the morning, headed for the southbound highway to Karbala.

To help guard against violence in Shi'ite holy cities, the U.S. military earlier this week announced it was dispatching a fresh battalion of the 2nd Brigade, 1st Armored Division, about 700 troops, to Iraq from its base in Kuwait to provide extra security.

U.S. Seeks A Way Forward In Iraq (DMN)

By Tod Robberson

The Dallas Morning News, March 18, 2006

Officials cite dangers as elements inside and out escalate tensions

LONDON — The U.S.-led invasion launched three years ago to oust Iraq's dictatorship and eliminate weapons of mass destruction has instead pushed it to the brink of civil war and escalated Iraqi fears of imminent doom at the hands of radical militiamen.

Though this was hardly the outcome President Bush envisioned when he ordered the March 19, 2003, assault on Iraq, senior U.S. officials now acknowledge that their plans have gone awry. Iraqi leaders and clerics are urging restraint as they warn that their nation, already split along sectarian and ethnic lines, is close to imploding.

DOJ_NMG_0019418

In a region already fraught with decades of war and religious friction, an Iraqi civil conflict has catastrophic implications, according to diplomats and academic researchers. Fears are mounting that fighting between Shiite and Sunni Muslims in Iraq could spark broader conflict around the region, and that Iraq's security void is tempting its neighbors to meddle militarily.

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, underscored the dangers when he warned this month of the regional implications of civil war in Iraq, telling the Los Angeles Times, "We have opened the Pandora's box, and the question is, what is the way forward?"

President Bush stated bluntly in a speech Tuesday, "I wish I could tell you that the violence is waning and that the road ahead will be smooth. It will not. There will be more tough fighting and more days of struggle, and we will see more images of chaos and carnage in the days and months to come."

The State Department's coordinator for Iraq policy, James Jeffrey, expressed "full confidence" in the ability of Iraqi security forces to quell sectarian violence and added in a prepared statement Monday, "While civil war is a possibility, we do not believe that it is likely at this point."

There appears little or nothing that the 157,000 foreign troops, mainly Americans, deployed in Iraq can do to stop the bloodshed, officials and analysts agree.

"There can only be an Iraqi solution to this violence," Mr. Jeffrey stated.

Signs of divisions

Iraqis point to a number of worrying signs that the nation's security forces are dividing along sectarian lines. In Baghdad and the southern city of Basra, Shiite-dominated police forces have engaged in mass roundups of Sunni Muslims, in some cases torturing suspects and holding them without trial in secret jails.

Police this week uncovered a mass grave in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad filled with the bodies of 87 men who appeared to have been shot execution style.

Sunni militants have stepped up a campaign of bombings and mortar attacks aimed at Shiite religious shrines and busy street markets. A Feb. 22 bomb attack that blew up one of Iraq's most sacred Shiite shrines helped spark the current wave of bloodshed that has led to more than 500 deaths so far.

"We hear mortars or bombs almost every night," said Osama Saadoun, a Baghdad resident contacted by telephone. "Nowadays, the conditions are so hard that you cannot leave your house. If you have work, you must leave early in the morning and just hope you get to the office alive. When you get there, you sit down at the desk and say, 'Thanks to God.'

Mr. Saadoun, who described himself as non-Muslim and nonpolitical, said there is a widespread feeling in Iraq that the American military presence is making matters worse, not better.

"There used to be agreement, generally, that it [foreign presence] was good. Now, I think that 90 percent of the people think it's time for the Americans to go out. … Personally, I think Iraq is at a very critical edge."

Elements inside the country appear intent on pushing tensions to the breaking point, said Munir Chalabi, an Iraqi anti-war activist based in London. He said the primary instigators are Iraqi members of the radical Sunni Islamist group al-Qaeda, as well as supporters of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein.

But he also blamed U.S. political decisions in Iraq that helped cause the nation's political system to develop primarily along sectarian and ethnic lines, rather than creating parties with a cross-sectarian membership.

"The strategy concentrates on dividing the Iraqi people on ethnic and religious grounds. When you divide a society this way, you only increase the possibility of tensions and … civil war," Mr. Chalabi said.

His assertions are backed by poll results released ahead of national parliamentary elections in December in which 34 percent of respondents listed religion as the single most important consideration influencing their vote — double the percentage who listed a candidate's qualifications or a party's platform. The International Republican Institute conducted the poll.

With democratic institutions already split, Mr. Chalabi said, the nation is ripe for provocation, and Sunni Islamists appear intent on exploiting it with bomb attacks on Shiite shrines. Their goal, he said, is a war that would wipe out Islam's minority Shiite sect, which they regard as a heretic offshoot of mainstream Sunni Islam.

Outside help

According to various analysts, Iraq's Sunni militants are receiving support from radical backers in several neighboring countries, including Syria, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

Apparently to counter the Sunni threat, overwhelmingly Shiite Iran has been dispatching intelligence agents and other personnel to advise pro-Iranian Shiite militias in Iraq, according to British and U.S. government reports.

Donald Rumsfeld, the U.S. secretary of defense, charged Tuesday that Iran was deliberately trying to destabilize Iraq by sending Revolutionary Guard troops and weapons across the border.

"A 'reasonable man' test would suggest that they're not freelancing, and they're not pilgrims," Mr. Rumsfeld said of the Iranian military infiltration.

DOJ_NMG_0019419

On Thursday, Iran invited U.S. officials to meet for talks on stabilizing the situation in Iraq, a development the U.S. welcomed very cautiously.

Turkey has threatened to intervene if Iraq's Kurdish minority takes advantage of civil strife to declare an independent Kurdish state in northern Iraq. Polls in northern Iraq indicate an overwhelming majority of ethnic Kurds favor independence.

Few viable options remain for the Bush administration, said David G. Newton, U.S. ambassador to Iraq from 1984 to 1988 and now adjunct scholar at the Middle East Institute in Washington.

After months of haggling since the December election, Iraqi leaders have yet to agree on a permanent government. Elected leaders "are becoming less and less relevant as the … blood lust and the revenge heats up," Mr. Newton said. Under such rapidly deteriorating circumstances, he added, "the pressure to cut and run will be overwhelming" for Mr. Bush.

The final step to civil war would be the breakup of government security forces into opposing sectarian armies. If that happened, there would be little reason for U.S. troops to remain anyway.

"The bottom line is to have some kind of government — friendly or not — that can minimally maintain order," Mr. Newton said. "You can forget about human rights, women's rights, democracy and all of that stuff. If you can't achieve that, then it is a victory for the radicals."

Political Offensive Targets Bush (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

Senate Democrats have mapped a political battle plan for the March congressional recess that calls on lawmakers to stage press events with active duty military personnel, veterans and emergency responders to bash President Bush on virtually every one of his national security policies.

The game plan, devised by the office of Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, is contained in a six-page memo distributed to Democratic senators on Thursday at a closed-door meeting at the Capitol and provided to The Washington Times by a congressional staffer.

Titled "Real Security," the political document calls for staged town hall events at military bases, weapons factories, National Guard units, fire stations and veterans posts.

"Ensure that you have the proper U.S. and state flags at the event, and consider finding someone to sing the national anthem and lead the group in the Pledge of Allegiance at the start of the event," the battle plan states.

However, the Defense Department prohibits political events on military bases. The rule states, "commanders will not permit the use of installation facilities by any candidate for political campaign or election events, including public assemblies or town hall meetings. ..."

Jim Manley, Mr. Reid's spokesman, said yesterday the planned events are not part of a political campaign. They would involve only incumbent Democratic senators, some of whom are up for re-election, but not Democratic Senate challengers, he said. Democrats hope to capture Senate control in November's election.

"These are events to highlight the need for increased funding for the troops," Mr. Manley said. "It's an effort to paint the White House and the Republican Congress as having a failed effort on national security issues, which is a direct result of their misplaced priorities and mismanagement."

The Senate plan urges holding town hall events to "draw attention to the security vulnerabilities caused by the Bush budget and explain how Democrats fought to restore programs that keep America safe."

The plan is the latest attempt by Democrats to criticize Mr. Bush on national security issues in the aftermath of the Dubai ports deal dust-up, which Republicans conceded was mishandled by the administration. One of the few areas where Republicans continue to poll well versus Democrats is on fighting terrorists.

In almost every issue in the Reid memo, Democratic lawmakers are called upon to criticize the president for not spending enough federal dollars.

The plan urges the lawmakers to:

·"Hold a town hall meeting with state officials and a local National Guard unit at their armory to discuss the security impact of long deployments. ... Ask National Guard members to offer input on how security and disaster response at home is compromised by long deployments."

·"Hold a town hall meeting with troops at a local military installation. ... When selecting a location at the military installation for the event, make sure to select a space that allows easy press access and clearly conveys the message in the shot. Planes, vehicles, equipment and signage in the background enhance the pictures coming out of your event."

·"Work with [veterans] organizations ... to find recently returned Iraq and Afghanistan veterans willing to discuss the mental effects they or their fellow veterans have experienced."

DOJ_NMG_0019420

·"Tour a factory in your state that manufactures military equipment like Humvees or body armor and hold a press availability afterwards with Iraq and Afghanistan veterans on the importance of protective equipment."

·"Visit the home of a military family that has purchased body armor on their own for a family member serving in Iraq or Afghanistan and hold an open press 'conversion' on the issue. ... Ask the family if they would be willing to hold the open press conversation/town hall meeting in their yard, on their front porch or in their home."

As commander in chief, Mr. Bush has made frequent visits to military bases in the United States and abroad. His remarks are generally limited to explaining his war policies and encouraging the troops.

The Democratic memo calls on senators to seek the help of the Iraq and Afghanistan Veterans of America (IAVA), which is critical of Mr. Bush.

The IAVA political action committee has raised for $100,000 for Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans running for the House. It has endorsed all seven Democrats in that category who are running against House Republicans. An IAVA PAC spokesman said Republican candidates chose not to seek the group's endorsement.

Wisconsin Voters Prepare To Weigh In On The War In Iraq (WP)

By Peter Slevin

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Referendum Stirs Passion on Both Sides

WATERTOWN, Wis. -- In an exercise that one side calls democracy and the other considers a disservice, voters in 30 Wisconsin towns will cast ballots next month on whether the Bush administration should withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq.

From Baraboo and Monona to Madison and La Crosse, antiwar activists invoked a 1911 state law to schedule a bring-the-troops-home referendum designed to send a message to Congress and the White House that the war is costing too many lives and too much money.

Watertown, a conservative city of 23,000 on the Rock River, voted strongly for President Bush in the past two elections, yet war opponents had no trouble gathering nearly 1,000 signatures to put the referendum on the April 4 ballot. The City Council objected, but it was overruled by a local court.

Letters from readers flew into the popular "Voice of the People" section of the Watertown Daily Times. Posters began popping up. Veterans groups, including the American Legion, have been discussing how to turn a referendum they oppose into a victory for U.S. forces.

Meaning and motivation are discussed as heatedly as the referendum itself.

"We got accused of splitting the community," said Penny Eiler, 59, an organizer of the ballot question. "We weren't the ones who split the community. It was split already. All we did was give the people who didn't have a voice a voice."

Nationally, three years after the U.S. invasion, 76 cities have passed resolutions calling for troops to come home, most recently Corvallis, Ore., and Lansdowne, Pa. Among them are Chicago; Berkeley, Calif.; Chapel Hill, N.C.; and Gary, Ind., as well as dozens of towns in Vermont.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll earlier this month found that 57 percent of Americans believe the Iraq war has not been worth fighting, with 52 percent saying U.S. troop levels should be decreased. Among that group, one-third said withdrawal should be immediate.

Peace groups have waged counter-recruitment drives at high schools and colleges across the country, pressing to provide information tables or teach-ins about alternatives to military service. Antiwar organizations have scheduled hundreds of protests and other events to mark the war's third anniversary this weekend, yet the national effort to end the war has proved fitful.

"Attitudes are a little more complicated than thumbs up or thumbs down," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center. "Americans do care about Iraq, but it doesn't have the personal impact that the war in Vietnam had. Secondly, this is a more patriotic time. Even though the public is disillusioned with the war in Iraq, it tends to support the concept of preemptive war at a time when most people feel we're at risk."

Objections to the war in Wisconsin, which has long had twin streaks of activism and iconoclasm, have been growing steadily, to the dismay of Watertown residents such as Steve Gillis, who wears a green T-shirt that says "Army tradition."

The father of a soldier who served recently in Iraq, Gillis spent more than 20 years in the Wisconsin Army National Guard, and he does not like what the referendum is doing to his town or the troops he admires.

"They say they're supporting the troops, but they're not," said Gillis, 53, a city worker who believes that the troops and the mission are inseparable.

Gillis sees in the Wisconsin initiative an echo of the 1960s protests against the Vietnam War in nearby Madison that helped sour a nation on the war and how it was fought. He said: "We gave up before our mission was accomplished, and we turned around and came home. I don't want to see that happen again."

DOJ_NMG_0019421

The passion in some quarters in Watertown is as clear as the writing on the window of lawyer Ronald W. Ziwisky's downtown office and the words sent from Iraq by Army Capt. Jim Leslie, who left his City Council post late last year to serve as a chaplain in the 4th Infantry Division.

"Sent to their death by Osama: 2,189," Ziwisky's window read on a recent day, referring to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"Sent to their death by George: 2,296," referring to the number of American casualties since the Iraq war began.

As the council debated the referendum, Leslie wrote from Forward Operating Base Duke to urge them not to permit the April vote. He said "disagreement is an all-American pastime" but also said passing the measure would comfort the enemy and frustrate U.S. soldiers.

"We had five soldiers killed recently here from an IED," Leslie said, referring to an improvised explosive device. "Soldiers hate war. I saw with my own eyes what war does to soldiers, and I hope never to see it again. Please send us an encouraging referendum or don't send one at all."

The Watertown referendum, like most others in the state, began with the Wisconsin Green Party, which made a pitch to Eiler and her group in October. Drawing on a law from the Progressive Era that sanctioned "direct legislation" in municipalities as a curb on power, activists soon started gathering signatures -- a number equal to 15 percent of the people who voted for governor in the last election.

When the city clerk checked their work, 986 of the 1,000 signatures proved valid, six more than they needed.

The City Council objected, however, voting 5 to 4 that the issue was a federal matter unsuitable for local action. Eiler and fellow members of the Watertown Peace and Democracy Coalition filed suit.

A judge ruled in their favor and ordered the council to approve a resolution on its own or set a referendum. The council approved a citywide vote. But members also voted 8 to 0 to declare their opposition to the referendum.

"Be it resolved," the ballot issue reads, in language that differs slightly among the Wisconsin towns, "the city of Watertown urges the United States to begin an immediate withdrawal of its troops from Iraq, starting with National Guard and Reserves."

Mayor John David said the politics became personal, but he said he mostly hears comments that amount to spoofs, such as the person who collared him at a high school basketball game and said Watertown ought to vote on renaming Minnesota's official state bird, for all the influence the town has over national security policy.

"If it was something that no matter how it turned out, it might do some good, it might be worth discussing," said David, whose office in a Republican town is nonpartisan. "But we're having the discussion, and I'm not sure it's going to do any good. That's the sad part of it."

A number of anti-referendum organizations have established steering committees and Web sites in an effort to defeat the April 4 measures. One site urges "Vote No to Cut and Run" and admonishes readers to "let our troops git 'er done."

Chris Muller, chairman of the La Crosse Republican Party, runs Choosevictory.org, which aims to defeat the antiwar activists at their own game. Like their counterparts to the east, La Crosse council members permitted the referendum but voted 13 to 3 to oppose an immediate troop withdrawal.

"A defeatist attitude is not going to get us anywhere in the world, and it's certainly not going to help our children in the future," Muller said, adding that a yes vote would harm troop morale. "Constantly seeing the negative stuff and not seeing the good that they're doing over there, and having people essentially second-guessing them and their leadership has got to have an effect on them."

That is not how the referendum's supporters see the exercise.

"People always have to lead politicians. Politicians are waiting to see which way the wind is blowing," said Bill Reichertz, who gathered signatures for the petition in Watertown. "The fight is worth it no matter whether we win or lose, because democracy lets people have a vote."

Even As Support For War Shrinks, Few Protest It (SFC)

By Joe Garofoli

San Francisco Chronicle, March 18, 2006

Even though polls say a majority of Americans think President Bush has bungled the war in Iraq and now oppose it, anti-war organizers are struggling to get new converts to tell someone besides pollsters that the country needs to change course.

Activists say the fear of being labeled unpatriotic or unsupportive of the nation's troops will keep many anti-war newcomers away from today's 11 a.m. demonstration in San Francisco and the hundreds of others around the country marking the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Organizers expect several thousand demonstrators to show up for the downtown march and rally at Civic Center, compared to the tens of thousands who strode down Market Street in the weeks before the war.

DOJ_NMG_0019422

The movement's focus has shifted in the past couple of years from the street to online organizing and opposing military recruiting in high schools. But anti-war forces are still frustrated that more Americans -- and Congress -- haven't actively opposed the administration's policy.

"People get more involved when they see a glimmer of hope in the Iraq story," said Tom Matzzie, the Washington, D.C., director of the 3.3 million-member MoveOn.org. A "positive story" for the left, Matzzie said, such as Cindy Sheehan's vigil last August outside Bush's Texas ranch, excites donors and brings people out for demonstrations.

Another good-news story for the anti-war movement -- Pennsylvania Democratic Rep. John Murtha's call to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq -- prompted MoveOn members to contribute $350,000 in 48 hours last November after an online fundraising plea. By contrast, members dropped only $90,000 after MoveOn issued an appeal for money when the 2,000th U.S. soldier was killed in Iraq.

Yet Sheehan isn't everyone's cup of activism -- even in her home state. A Field Poll of 680 registered California voters released this month found that 36 percent had an unfavorable rating of Sheehan, and 24 percent saw her favorably. Forty percent had no opinion.

"As an organizer, it can be tricky to find that sweet spot where people want to get involved," Matzzie said.

With that in mind, MoveOn will focus on electing strong anti-war candidates to Congress this year, even if that means opposing incumbent Democrats. Earlier this year, the group raised money for Texas Democrat Ciro Rodriguez for his unsuccessful primary race against Rep. Henry Cuellar, who is seen as supportive of Bush's policies.

Matzzie said 86 percent of MoveOn's members say they want the organization to challenge Democrats who are "consistently wrong" on the issues dear to the liberal membership.

"A lot of people are frustrated because they don't think there's anything they can do," said Karen Dolan, a fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, a liberal think tank in Washington, D.C.

She has been working on a nonbinding resolution to "bring the troops home now," which will be voted on April 4 by 30 cities and towns in Wisconsin. Voters and representatives in 76 cities nationwide -- including San Francisco, Oakland and other Bay Area cities -- have passed similar resolutions.

Dolan says there is value in the symbolic gesture.

"Wisconsin is a swing state," she said. "And aside from Madison, which is very liberal, a lot of those towns (with measures on the ballot) are in conservative parts of the state."

In the months before the invasion, some anti-war leaders pledged to make an extra effort to include more voices from the Latino community in the peace movement, which has traditionally been dominated by white, middle-class activists. But while organizers have printed leaflets and other materials in Spanish and English, those outreach efforts have failed to engage much of the Latino community, which polls show opposes the war.

"Our community is never going to identify with these larger anti-war organizations like United for Peace or Code Pink or International Answer," said Pablo Paredes, who was sentenced to three months of hard labor and busted down to the Navy's lowest rank for refusing to board a ship bound for the Persian Gulf in December 2004. Now he travels the country on behalf of anti-war organizations to oppose military recruiting on high school campuses.

"There was a little bit of communication gap between the big organizations and the community," Paredes said. "The rhetoric was there, but those organizations were always saying, 'Come have a seat at our table,' instead of joining us in our community." Plus, Paredes said that after Sept. 11, many Latino immigrants fear publicly opposing the administration because they don't want to be seen as unpatriotic.

Paredes, along with several other Latino war resisters and activists, began a walk this week from Tijuana to San Francisco's Mission District. Their goal was to rally support for a separate Latino anti-war movement. "We hope to be lighting candles along the way that will lead to something bigger," he said.

Something bigger, like a change in the administration's Iraq policy, is unlikely to happen as long as Congress backs the war and pays for it. Demonstrators at a rally and march at noon today at Palo Alto's Civic Center Plaza had been planning to drop 2,000 handbills outside the office of Rep. Anna Eshoo, D-Atherton, that said, "I urge you to take a stronger stance against the war in Iraq."

But after Eshoo voted Thursday against the latest bill to pay for military operations in Iraq, organizers will encourage marchers to write, "Thanks for voting against the funding" on the cards. The $92 billion spending package -- the sixth since the United States invaded Iraq -- passed the House easily. The Senate is expected to vote on its version in the next month.

"We're kind of scrambling after she voted that way," said Paul George, a rally organizer who is director of the Peninsula Peace and Justice Center.

DOJ_NMG_0019423

Anti-war organizers have been frustrated that the movement hasn't taken root in the suburbs. George is hoping for a crowd of 2,000 people at today's rally. In Walnut Creek, activists are expecting about 1,000 people and are advertising an all-star cast of liberals more commonly found in the big city.

Former San Francisco Supervisor Matt Gonzalez, Bush-bashing media critic Norman Solomon and hip-hop artist Boots Reilly of the Coup will be awaiting marchers meeting at 11 a.m. at the Walnut Creek BART station. Last year's highlight of a much smaller rally in the Contra Costa County city: an oom-pah band.

Co-organizer Mary Alice O'Connor joked that Gonzalez, who is strongly identified with San Francisco's hipster community, might need directions to get to Walnut Creek.

"We want to wake up people in the suburbs," O'Connor said. "There's a lot of people sitting in their homes out here, thinking the same thoughts, but they're afraid that nobody else feels the same way. We want to show people that their neighbor feels the same way."

O'Connor said many suburbanites don't want to go to a San Francisco rally because they are put off by the many causes on display at such events that seemingly have no connection to the Iraq war.

"People don't want to get into the middle of the Israel-Palestine thing," she said. "They say that they feel that people are yelling at them at the rallies."

Rachael Hereford, a youth organizer with International Answer, which is sponsoring the San Francisco demonstration, said suburban rallies are "a long time coming, and it shows that the anti-war movement isn't just the hippie faces that the media shows you all the time."

But anti-war organizing can't stop with a demonstration, she conceded.

"It's easy to get students to come to a demonstration," Hereford said. "But will they bring their friends? And will they start organizing against the war when they go back to school?"

Hold The President Accountable (NYT)

By Senator Russell Feingold

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

To the Editor:

Re "Time for Facts, Not Resolutions" (editorial, March 17):

The president broke the law, and Congress must hold the president accountable.

You are right that the nation deserves to know more details about the National Security Agency's spying program, but there's nothing we could learn that would change the fact that by authorizing the program, the president broke the law.

Member of both parties who have concerns about the legality of the N.S.A.'s program, and there are quite a few, should not try to avoid that central issue while offering proposals to legalize the president's conduct.

I strongly support wiretapping terrorists to protect our national security, which current law allows.

The president needs to follow that law, or inform Congress of any reasons he thinks that law should be changed. He has a responsibility to obey the laws that Congress passes.

There must be no equivocation on that central tenet of our system of government.

I applauded Senator Harry Reid's effort to take the Senate into closed session to get answers on the intelligence and policy failures leading up to the Iraq war. But to suggest that such a maneuver is our only recourse now ignores the role the founders expected Congress to play when a president commits such a flagrant abuse of power.

We don't need a closed session to highlight the president's lawbreaking; we need an open debate and an expression of the Senate's judgment.

Members of Congress do need to "fulfill their sworn duty," as you suggest, and that means censuring a president who so plainly broke the law and violated the trust of the American people.

Democrats' Dilemma (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, March 18, 2006

The Dems must satisfy their base without alienating the rest of the country. Russ Feingold's censure bid isn't the smartest way to do that.

Republicans finally had something to celebrate this week when Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold called for censuring George W. Bush. Democrats must have a death wish. Just when the momentum was going against the president, Feingold pops up to toss the GOP a life raft.

DOJ_NMG_0019424

It's brilliant strategy for him, a dark horse presidential candidate carving out a niche to the left of Hillary Clinton. The junior senator from New York is under attack for being too soft on Bush and the war, and most of the non-Hillarys are to her right. There is a vacuum in the heart of the party's base that Feingold fills, but at what cost? His censure proposal looks like a stunt, "the equivalent of calling for a filibuster from Davos," says Marshall Wittmann, a senior fellow with the centrist Democratic Leadership Council. To win in '06, he says, "Democrats need to take the Hippocratic Oath: first, do no harm."

Just as John Kerry's belated effort to stop Judge Samuel Alito's confirmation to the Supreme Court failed to rally his fellow Democrats, Feingold's move toward censure has been received like a foul odor, sending Democrats scurrying for the exits. Only two of his colleagues, Iowa's Tom Harkin and California's Barbara Boxer, signed on as cosponsors. And for good reason. The broader public sees it as political extremism. Just when the Republicans looked like they were coming unhinged, the Democrats serve up a refresher course on why they can't be trusted with the keys to the country. Nor could it have come at a better time for a Republican Party still battered by bad news in the polls. The latest Wall Street Journal/NBC survey, released earlier this week, shows that Bush's job approval rating at its lowest ever—37 percent—as a majority of Americans lose confidence that the Iraq war will end successfully. The same poll shows a significant uptick in the country's willingness to accept a Democratic Congress, with 50 percent of those questioned saying they would prefer the party to control Congress. Thirty-seven percent say they want it controlled by Republicans.

The Democrats' dilemma is how to satisfy a restive and angry base without losing the rest of the country. "If someone proposed stringing up Bush like they did Mussolini, that would have a lot of support in the base of the party, too," says a Democratic strategist. "But it's not smart." Democrats want the November election to be a plebiscite on Bush's job performance, not a personal vendetta. "Republicans will rally round him if they think it's a personal attack just like we did with Clinton," warns the strategist.

Feingold has a reputation for being a principled politician who often takes positions at odds with his party. He didn't give Senate leader Harry Reid a heads-up about his censure motion, and Democrats were caught off-guard. What the country saw wasn't pretty, Democrats dodging and weaving and Republicans loving the whole sorry spectacle. With everything souring for the Republicans, the only thing that can rescue them is a foil, and Feingold's call for censure offered that, at least for now. Conservative radio hosts were raising the specter of impeachment should the Democrats take over the House in November, a call to arms for the otherwise demoralized GOP base.

The joy among Republicans could only be matched in the blogosphere, where liberal Democrats cheered Feingold—a synergy that prompted the DLC's Wittmann to speculate that the right and left are codependent. But the political mixing and matching provide only a brief respite from the real politics that will determine each party's fortunes in November. Congressional insiders say if the election were held today, the Democrats would capture 18 to 23 seats in the House. They need 15 to regain the majority. Things could get better by November, or worse, depending on your perspective.

There is talk of a possible October surprise to revive the GOP's standing, and the fact that the biggest military air assault in Iraq since the war began came the day after Bush sank to 33 percent in a Pew poll had some Democrats suspicious. "Is it an attempt to prop up his numbers?" asks the Democratic strategist. "It's probably not fair to think that, but it shows where we are in this presidency."

With the war about to enter its fourth year, the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, held a seminar on "Next Steps for U.S. Policy" that featured a keynote address by former national-security adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski. "I favor a decision by the U.S. to leave Iraq," Brzezinski declared. "I would ask the Iraqi leaders to ask us to leave," he explained, adding he would talk with them first privately and "treat them as adults, not colonial wards." He sees two parallel wars in Iraq, one is the insurgency, which is consolidating and widening, and the other is the growing sectarian violence. "We are engaged in a war of attrition," he said, and unless the Bush administration puts in 500,000 troops—the number it would take to crush the opposition—U.S. policymakers need to make "a very cold judgment whether staying the course is likely to be more or less damaging to U.S. interests."

Brzezinski, a hawk during the Carter administration, has emerged as a hero among progressives frustrated by their party's unwillingness to take a stand. Democrats have been "silent or evasive" on the war, he said, offering no alternative, which is "a form of political desertion." If Democrats don't want to talk about censure, they could change the topic in an instant with a credible exit plan from Iraq.

Bush The "Incompetent" (TIME)

By Matthew Cooper

Time, March 18, 2006

The polls are bad enough. Now the President fails a word-assocation test

DOJ_NMG_0019425

Over the last seven years, the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press has played a game of word association as part of its regular presidential polling, asking, "What one word best describes your impression of George W. Bush?" No options or suggestions are offered. The latest results — from a sample of 710 people done in March — aren't good for the President. Until this month, the word most associated with President Bush had always been "honest." Now the leading answer is "incompetent" (given by 29 people), followed by "good", "idiot" and "liar." "Honest" has slipped to 5th, tied with "Christian."

Three years ago, positive descriptions of Bush far outnumbered negative ones. In the past two years, the positive-negative ratio has been more nearly equal. This time, 48% of those polled used a negative word to describe Bush; just 28% picked a positive term; 10% chose neutral language. Six respondents chose a word that everyone could agree on: "President."

Bush Adviser Says Iran Bluffing On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, March 18, 2006

President Bush's top foreign policy adviser said Friday that Iran's new willingness to talk about Iraq with the United States is probably a ploy designed to "divert pressure and divert attention" from international concern that Tehran wants a nuclear bomb.

The United States has accused Iran of using a civilian nuclear program as a cover to build atomic weapons, an allegation Tehran denies. The U.N. Security Council is expected to discuss Iran's nuclear program this month, with Washington pressing for penalties.

The Bush administration views Tehran's acceptance of an American offer to talk about Iraq, made months ago, as an indication that Iran is feeling the international heat, national security adviser Steven J. Hadley said.

"What is interesting is that the Iranians would choose now, at this moment, in such a very public way, to embrace this idea and try to expand it to a negotiation about a broader set of issues," Hadley said.

"The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try and divert pressure that they're feeling in New York, to try and drive a wedge between the United States and the other countries with which we are working on the nuclear issue and, if you will, divert pressure and divert attention."

Hadley added: "Obviously, this is something that we and those who are working with us on these issues will not let happen."

The secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, Ali Larijani, said Thursday that Iran would discuss Iraq directly with the United States. Washington has accused Tehran of meddling in Iraqi politics and of supporting armed militias in Iraq by sending men and weapons, including components for increasingly lethal roadside bombs.

There was concern Friday in the Bush administration that the Iranian offer could increase the stature of Iran's government in its citizens' eyes, raise Tehran's status in the region and curry broader international sympathy that could undermine the U.N. Security Council efforts.

For that reason, there was also skepticism that talks would even take place.

"They've made such statements in the past that they would be open to talking about the matters in Iraq," said White House press secretary Scott McClellan. "We'll have to see."

The administration is proceeding with discussions about a meeting on the chance that it could save lives — as well as out of concern that the administration would be criticized if it didn't try, said a senior administration official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the diplomatic situation.

Earlier this week, Bush said Iran had supplied components for roadside bombs, which the president called the greatest threats to U.S. troops in Iraq.

But officials made clear that any talks with Iran would be given as low-key a status as possible, in an effort to defuse any broader benefit Iran might gain. The Bush administration is also sensitive to possible criticism that talks with Iran represent negotiating with terrorists.

The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, in charge of discussions on the talks, said Friday in an interview with The Associated Press that any meeting should be held in Baghdad. He also made clear that discussions would be limited only to issues related to Iraq, not the standoff over Tehran's nuclear activities, and would represent merely a face-to-face forum for the United States to state concerns it has expressed publicly.

"This is not a negotiation by any means," McClellan said.

U.S. Eyes Baghdad For Talks With Iran (WT)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

From combined dispatches

DOJ_NMG_0019426

BAGHDAD -- The American ambassador said yesterday he wants to talk with the Iranians -- but not negotiate -- in Baghdad.

"We are not entering into negotiations about Iraq with Iran. The Iraqis will decide the future of Iraq. We have concerns -- and I've spoken about them -- with regard to Iranian policy in Iraq," U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad told the Associated Press in an interview.

In Washington, the Bush administration said any meeting would have to involve Iraqi leaders, and it expressed concern that Iran might use such a meeting to divert attention from its nuclear program.

"The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try to divert pressure that they are feeling in New York," said National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley, referring to talks at the U.N. Security Council.

The United States has not decided whether to talk to Iran about its support for armed Shi'ite militias in Iraq, a U.S. official told the AP on the condition of anonymity.

The majority of Iraqis are Shi'ite Muslims. The overwhelming majority of Iranians belong to that sect and are governed by a Shi'ite theocracy.

Many important Shi'ite religious shrines are located in Iraq, meaning that thousands of pilgrims routinely cross the countries' long, common border.

Iraqi Sunnis objected yesterday to any U.S.-Iranian engagement.

"Iran is interfering deeply in Iraqi affairs, and the Iraqi people are afraid that a deal might be settled between Iran and America at the expense of Iraq's independence," said Bashar al-Faydi, a spokesman for the Association of Muslim Scholars.

Mr. Khalilzad said that talks would be limited to Iraq -- not the angry U.S. standoff with Tehran over its nuclear program.

The Afghanistan-born Mr. Khalilzad, who can speak with Iranians in a common language -- his native Dari is a Persian dialect -- insisted there would be no bargaining with Iran.

The 54-year-old ambassador has held talks with Iranians before, when he was envoy to Afghanistan, Iran's neighbor to the east.

"I was authorized by the president of the United States to talk with the Iranians about our concerns about Afghanistan. So I'm doing the same thing now here," he said.

"I think we would assume since these discussions are with regard to our concern with Iranian policies in Iraq that [the talks] should be in Baghdad," Mr. Khalilzad said.

The Iranians said their participation in talks may help Iraqis form a stable government.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran will hold talks with the United States about Iraq to help the process of building a government there, and to support the Iraqi people," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said in a speech to worshippers who had gathered at Tehran University for Friday prayers.

Meanwhile, at the United Nations in New York, Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said the Security Council should give Iran "four weeks to six weeks" to comply with demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog that it halt all uranium enrichment activities.

Speaking before a formal meeting of the council on the crisis, Mr. Wang said: "We must leave sufficient time for diplomacy and for the [U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency] to work ... at least four weeks to six weeks."

Russia's U.N. ambassador yesterday also spoke in opposition to proposals for the council to demand a quick progress report on Iran's suspect nuclear program.

He said, reportedly only half in jest, that fast action could lead to the bombing of Iran by June.

Andrey Denisov spoke just before a Security Council meeting in which diplomats considered a revised list of British, French and American proposals for a statement on Iran.

A key sticking point for Russia is a proposal asking Mohamed ElBaradei, the chief of the International Atomic Energy Agency, to deliver a report in two weeks on Iran's progress toward clearing up suspicions about its nuclear program.

U.S., Iran Closer To Talks On Iraq (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And William Branigin

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Concern About Tehran's Role in Country Reopens Channels

BAGHDAD, March 17 -- U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Friday that back-channel discussions were underway with Iran on resuming direct talks about Iraq that broke off shortly after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion, and he said the talks should be held in Baghdad.

Khalilzad said he would not describe the proposed talks as "negotiations" but as a chance to express concerns about what Washington and some in Iraq regard as Iran's alarming activities here.

"Iraqis will decide their own future," Khalilzad said, "but they have concerns about [Iranian] policy regarding Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0019427

The ambassador spoke after the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad issued a statement critical of Iran in response to remarks Thursday by the top Iranian national security official.

Saying that the embassy had taken note of remarks by Ali Larijani, secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, the statement said: "The future of Iraq will not be decided by the United States, Iran or any other country. Iraqis will decide the future of Iraq. The United States is concerned about unhelpful Iranian activities in Iraq. These concerns are well known, and we have talked about them."

Khalilzad's comments came a day after Tehran offered to enter into talks with the United States aimed at stabilizing Iraq, following a request to do so by the Shiite Muslim political heavyweight Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who spent years in self-imposed exile in Iran when Saddam Hussein ruled Iraq. Hakim's party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and other members of the Shiite coalition that dominate Iraq's government are closely allied with Iran.

In Baghdad, Jalal al-Sagheer, a cleric and ally of Hakim's, hailed the "diplomatic victory." Sagheer rejected widespread accusations by Sunni Arabs in Iraq that Iran was promoting torture, illegal detention and extrajudicial killing by Shiite militiamen against Iraq's Sunni minority.

"In every case, the sectarian terrorism uses the Iran question as an excuse to slaughter us," Sagheer told worshipers during Friday prayers at Baghdad's Buratha mosque. "This is why we are working on this case and making many contacts to solve the problem between America and Iran, so the Iraqis will not be affected by any problem between them.

"It's not for a specific sect," Sagheer said. "It is for the fate of all Iraqis."

Meanwhile, U.S. and Iraqi troops searched house to house for insurgents for a second day in arid farmland east of Samarra. Forty-eight suspects had been detained, with 17 of them released, Maj. Tom Bryant, public affairs officers with the 3rd Brigade of the Army's 101st Airborne Division, told journalists flown to the area Friday.

Six weapons caches with a total of about 300 rockets, mortar rounds and other ordnance had been found by late Friday, "a typical number" for weapons caches discovered in the area, said Maj. John Calahan, another public affairs officer with the 3rd Brigade. U.S. and Iraqi forces had made "no contact whatsoever," Calahan added, meaning no shots had been fired or resistance encountered.

The 600 to 800 Iraqi police commandos in the U.S.-Iraqi force deployed Thursday had returned to normal duties by midday Friday, U.S. authorities said.

Roughly 50 Chinook and Black Hawk helicopters had transported the Iraqi and U.S. forces from bases in the surrounding area. The operation, which is continuing, has been good for building the confidence of Iraqi forces and for showing insurgents that the Iraqis, with the help of U.S. air assets, can go anywhere, U.S. officials said.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the commanding general of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said that by the end of this summer Iraqi units will take charge in 75 percent of the country's territory, compared with less than 50 percent now. He did not specify whether these areas would include the most violent or populous parts. Other U.S. commanders have said that Iraqi police and army units are now responsible for security in about 60 percent of Baghdad.

Chiarelli, briefing Pentagon reporters via teleconference from Iraq, said the country was closer to civil war than at any time since the U.S. invasion three years ago, but added that such an eventuality remained "a long ways away."

Branigin reported from Washington. Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson in Washington and special correspondent Naseer Nouri in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Sunni Leaders Say U.S.-Iran Talks Amount To Meddling (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 17 — Sunni Arab political leaders on Friday denounced an agreement between the United States and Iran to hold face-to-face talks about solutions to the unrest in Iraq, saying the conversations would amount to meddling by foreign nations in Iraq's domestic affairs.

The Iraqi Consensus Front, the country's main Sunni political bloc, issued a statement calling the agreement "an obvious unjustified interference" and asserted that it was not obligated to comply with any results of the negotiations.

The Sunni leadership has long criticized Tehran's influence over Iraq's powerful Shiite religious parties, and its opposition to the talks could add another obstacle to the grinding efforts by Iraq's political leaders to forge a coalition government.

"The Iraqis in the current government should have these talks with the Iranians and discuss the level of intervention of Iran," Naseer al-Ani, a member of the Sunni Arab bloc, said in a telephone interview. "It's not up to the American ambassador to talk to Iran about Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0019428

The agreement between the United States and Iran was announced Thursday. Ali Larijani, general secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said Iran's participation came at the request of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, leader of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite party with ties to Iran.

Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, said the Bush administration would not meet with Iran to negotiate the future of Iraq but rather to voice its concerns about what he called Iran's "unhelpful role" in Iraq. It remained unclear on Friday whether Iraqi leaders would be invited to the meetings.

The Sunni criticism came as leaders of Iraq's major political blocs, as well as the American ambassador, gathered in the heavily fortified compound of President Jalal Talabani to discuss the formation of a new Iraqi government.

According to several participants, the discussions focused on the proposal to create a national security council composed of leaders of the executive, judicial and legislative branches, as well as representatives of the country's main political blocs. The council would be consulted on pivotal national issues, like the economy, oil policy, public services and security.

Some Sunni leaders wanted the council's decisions to have binding executive authority. But, several participants said, the Shiite leadership and others were insisting that the council have only advisory powers, thereby safeguarding the constitutional powers of the executive.

A working group planned to continue the discussions on Saturday and was expected to submit its conclusions to the blocs' political leaders by Sunday, officials said.

In Halabja, Kurdistan, militias loyal to the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the party that governs the eastern part of the autonomous region, began a crackdown after a riot on Thursday in which demonstrators destroyed a museum dedicated to the thousands who perished in a poison gas attack by Saddam Hussein's security forces in 1988.

The riot began as a rally against government corruption but became violent after government guards fired weapons over the protesters' heads.

"The episode is a painful reminder that reforms are needed everywhere in this part of the world," Barham Saleh, Iraq's planning minister and a Kurd, said in an interview on Friday.

Although the riot may have arisen in part from the legitimate grievances of frustrated people, he said, radical Islamists might have taken advantage of the discord to foment violence. "Obviously this has to be investigated thoroughly," he said.

American and Iraqi security forces continued their search for insurgent hide-outs near Samarra on Friday, the second day of an assault in the area, north of Baghdad, though the results appeared to be modest and the American command began to return some troops to their bases.

About 10 people were detained on Friday, bringing the number of suspected insurgents captured during the raid to 47, said Lt. Col. Edward Loomis, a spokesman for the 101st Airborne Division, which is leading the operation. At least 17 have been released after questioning, he said, adding that troops uncovered no new weapons stockpiles on Friday.

The operation has garnered widespread attention, in part because Samarra is where a Shiite shrine was bombed by insurgents last month, setting off a wave of sectarian violence. But the military has not suggested that this assault was a direct response to the bombing.

The American military command described the push as the largest "air assault" since the invasion in 2003. The military defines air assault as the insertion of troops by aircraft. Some television networks erroneously used the term "airstrikes," conjuring images of the "shock and awe" bombing campaign that heralded the invasion.

But there were no reported aerial bombardments during this operation, and Colonel Loomis said Friday that the American and Iraqi forces had encountered no armed resistance and suffered no casualties.

The American military reported that a soldier from the 101st Airborne was shot and killed at an observation post in Samarra on Thursday, but the incident appeared to be unrelated to the operation.

In Baghdad, the authorities recovered two more bodies, both handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head, according to an official in the Interior Ministry. At least 170 bodies, all showing evidence of execution-style killings, have been recovered around Baghdad in the last 10 days, according to Iraqi officials.

Though the motives for most of the killings remain unclear, officials fear that the wave of executions is a continuation of the sectarian reprisals that followed the destruction of the Samarra shrine last month.

Gunmen fired on Shiite pilgrims in several locations on Friday, killing at least one and wounding 12, the ministry official said. An improvised bomb, apparently directed at pilgrims, exploded on the road between Mahmudiya and Karbala, killing one and wounding four, the official said.

Thousands of Shiites are converging on Karbala, in the south, to celebrate the end of the 40-day mourning period commemorating the death of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad.

Iran, U.S. Disagree Over Goal Of Talks (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0019429

By Paul Richter, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

America says it wants to discuss Tehran's meddling in Iraq, while the Islamic Republic asserts it wants to work to get foreign troops out.

WASHINGTON — A day after raising international hopes by agreeing to hold direct talks about stabilizing Iraq, U.S. and Iranian officials Friday took a decidedly sharper tone toward each other, differing markedly over the purpose of their planned discussions.

U.S. officials accused Iran of meddling in Iraq's internal affairs and said the discussions were aimed only at expressing American unhappiness over the interference. In Tehran, a senior official said Iran's goal in meeting with the Americans was to accelerate the U.S. departure from Iraq.

As differences between the two sides intensified, fears grew that the longtime adversaries were jeopardizing an opportunity to help stabilize Iraq, an effort in which they both have an important stake.

U.S. and Iranian officials fueled expectations for improved relations between the two countries Thursday when each said that teams of officials would meet to discuss Iraq. On Friday, U.S. officials said arrangements were being made by unidentified intermediaries to set a date and place for a meeting.

However, differences began to emerge almost immediately. At first, the Iranians suggested the talks could range more widely, encompassing issues other than Iraq. But U.S. officials quickly rejected that possibility, pointing out they had suggested talks last year only as a way to bring peace in Iraq.

Also Thursday, Iran's foreign policy chief, Ali Larijani, said Tehran had accepted "the proposal to help resolve the problems in Iraq and establish an independent government there."

U.S. officials retorted Friday that the talks would be held to discuss "unhelpful Iranian activities in Iraq," including, they alleged, allowing the shipment of components for roadside bombs used in Iraq and sending Iranian military agents into the country.

"These concerns are well known and we have talked about them," the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad said in a statement, adding that "Iraqis will decide the future of Iraq."

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in Australia, said the talks would be limited in scope, and cast doubt on whether they would take place.

"We will see if and when those talks take place," she said.

The inability of Washington and Tehran to agree on the subject of the talks gave rise to concerns that any meetings would be fruitless, ending in acrimony and heightening tensions between the two countries.

"If the Americans just plan to yell at them, then this will be about charges and counter-charges, and it won't be particularly productive," said Ray Takeyh, a Middle East specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations. "If this is about their common interests, which they do have, then maybe there will be something to it."

The Iranians can't afford to let Iraq descend into civil war, Takeyh said, because the conflict would spill across their border. In contrast, an Iraqi democracy would give power to a Shiite Muslim majority whose leaders have close ties to Iran. The agreement to meet reflects that, even as they continue to trade harsh denunciations, the two sides have been forced to recognize that they must work together to stabilize Iraq, he said.

But President Bush's national security advisor, Stephen J. Hadley, charged Friday that Iran's agreement to talk about Iraq was probably a ploy intended to head off adverse action by the United Nations Security Council, which is considering ways to address concerns over Tehran's nuclear program.

"What is interesting is that the Iranians would choose now, at this moment, in such a very public way, to embrace this idea and try to expand it to a negotiation about a broader set of issues," Hadley told a group of reporters. "The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try and divert pressure that they're feeling in New York, to try and drive a wedge between the United States and the other countries with which we are working on the nuclear issue and, if you will, divert pressure and divert attention."

Takeyh agreed that talks between U.S. and Iranian officials could ease pressure to act against the Tehran government.

"This could take all the air out of the Security Council effort," he said.

In Tehran, meanwhile, Larijani said Friday that Iran's motivation had nothing to do with the case before the Security Council.

"Iran's motive behind assistance to the Iraqi nation is helping establishment of lasting security in Iraq, and helping it get rid of the occupiers' tyranny … and there is no other hidden issue in that connection," he said, the official news agency IRNA reported. "At present there is no connection between the issue and Iran's nuclear case."

DOJ_NMG_0019430

Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, stressed Friday that a stable Iraqi government was a key U.S. goal, but that it would be up to Iraqis to form it — without Iranian interference.

"We won't negotiate with Iran over that," Khalilzad said in an interview on Al Arabiya television. He said any talks would concentrate on U.S. concerns about Iran's involvement in Iraq.

"We'll just express concerns with aspects of Iranian policy destabilizing Iraq," he said. "Iraq can rely on itself. We have serious concerns on aspects of Iranian policy that we will raise."

ANALYSIS: Talks With Iran Could Help Bush (MINNST/AP)

By Barry Schweid, The Associated Press

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 18, 2006

Possible negotiations between the United States and Iran and the convening of the first session of a new Iraqi parliament could give the Bush administration a long-needed lift.

WASHINGTON (AP) - Possible negotiations between the United States and Iran and the convening of the first session of a new Iraqi parliament could give the Bush administration a long-needed lift.

The recent inaugural session of Iraq's parliament is a positive step toward the new Iraq that President Bush envisions as he pursues a war that's unpopular with many Americans. Progress toward forging a unity government representing all of Iraq's sects would be a boost for a country that has been veering close to civil war.

U.S. intelligence strongly suspects Iran has been arming Iraqi Shiite militia and some insurgent groups. If talks with Iran come off, the administration would try persuading Tehran to curb its activities with the argument that instability in Iraq could envelop the area, including Iran.

For Bush, whose dive in the polls reflects Americans' eroding confidence in his Iraq strategy, progress on either front would be welcome relief - especially with midterm elections for control of Congress just eight months away.

There are troublesome developments as well. The eruption of violence among Kurds in northern Iraq poses new security problems for already strained Iraqi forces, particularly if Islamic radicals were behind the outbreak in Halabja.

Indications are the stone-throwing Kurds were registering displeasure with their own leaders and not threatening conflict with other Iraqi groups.

The disorder distracts from an aggressive U.S.-Iraqi military campaign against insurgents in a Sunni Arab-dominated area outside Samarra, where the bombing of a Shiite shrine three weeks ago ignited the most recent siege of violence.

Referring to the volatile situation in the country, U.N. envoy Ashraf Qazi said Friday that it has deteriorated since he took up the post 19 months ago.

Qazi, speaking at the U.S. Institute of Peace in Washington, said Iraq was not on the brink of civil war. But he described the situation as serious and said it "could lead to a breakdown of order" if left unchecked.

Bush administration officials are convinced Iran is playing a mischievous role in Iraq, especially in arming militias with explosives and other weapons.

They said Friday that Tehran's willingness to have face-to-face discussions with U.S. officials about Iraq could be an effort to divert attention from an approaching confrontation at the United Nations over Iran's nuclear program.

"The concern, therefore, is that it is simply a device by the Iranians to try and divert pressure that they're feeling in New York," White House national security adviser Steven Hadley said.

"Obviously, this is something that we and those who are working with us on these issues will not let happen," he added.

Despite the standoff over Iran's nuclear program, the administration has been seeking talks with Tehran narrowly limited to its intervention in Iraq. Despite its skepticism, some in the administration want to try setting up the talks, at the very least to avoid criticism in case Iran turns out to be serious about seeking a solution in Iraq.

Ruled out by U.S. officials is discussion of any attempt by Iran to gain a political foothold in Iraq, and the nuclear dispute, which could soon come before the U.N. Security Council.

The talks, which would be held in Baghdad, are not the first between the United States and Iran even though the two foes do not have diplomatic relations. They have met in the past for cooperative efforts in stabilizing Afghanistan and countering narcotics, for instance.

The antipathy is immense, however. American officials have denounced Iran repeatedly as the world's No. 1 supporter of terrorism.

'War' As Epithet: Sound Of Clay Feet Cracking (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019431

NEW YORK 'America is at war." These are the first words of the Bush administration's new national security strategy, a simple declarative sentence open to multiple interpretations and contestations.

That America is at war in Iraq is certainly true, although it's not the war the administration prepared for. Nor is it a war like any other. It's been accompanied by tax cuts; national sacrifice is not the theme of the hour; small-town America and smaller-salary America have borne the brunt.

But the war that President George W. Bush goes on to outline in the strategy, a revised version of the 2002 document whose emphasis on the supremacy of American power and the right to strike pre-emptively caused global unease, is not merely the Mesopotamian mess.

No, this war is of greater scope. "The United States is in the early years of a long struggle, similar to what our country faced in the early years of the Cold War," the document says. "The 20th century witnessed the triumph of freedom over the threats of fascism and communism. Yet a new totalitarian ideology now threatens, an ideology grounded not in secular philosophy but in the perversion of a proud religion."

This is a little pat. Let's leave aside whether the problem is a "perversion" of Islam or merely a certain reading of it. To compare Osama bin Laden and his scattered followers to the divisions of the Soviet empire is a stretch.

To invoke totalitarianism - a system of complete control over certain territory through state-directed terror - in describing a motley bunch of fanatics who control very little also seems fanciful, however vile the jihadists' methods and however ominous their visions of a restored caliphate.

All in all, it's easy enough to see this broader war as a construct that preserves the familiar paradigm of American liberty confronting tyranny, comforts the far-flung garrisons that serve a global American mission, and gives Bush's Republican Party a pivotal issue that plays to its strengths against a Democratic Party still seen as weak on national security.

None of this is meant to suggest that the terrorist threat to the United States is not real. But to frame the confrontation with this danger as a "war" - a war without apparent or possible end, a war without geographical definition, a war without an opposing army - is a political decision, one of whose effects has been to cast Bush as a "war president."

The epithet has played well. It was decisive in delivering the 2004 election to Bush: you don't change commander-in-chiefs in the middle of a war.

It also captured the qualities many Americans thought they liked in Bush: boldness and decisiveness and an unwavering determination. Because they did not see those traits in John Kerry, the Democratic candidate, they rejected him.

But, a little over a year into Bush's second term, the epithet is tired; Americans have soured on their war president. It's partly the festering situation in Iraq. But the disillusionment runs deeper. With his approval rating at 33 percent, according to a new poll by the Pew Research Center, Bush is in Nixonian territory.

The same poll found that where "honesty" had been the single characteristic most closely associated with Bush, the description now most favored was "incompetent." That's a seismic shift - from war leader to clown.

The shift has many roots. The president has never recovered from his administration's hapless distractedness at the time Hurricane Katrina struck New Orleans. It was one thing not to have a plan for postwar Baghdad, quite another to have no plan to save a major American city.

The same impression - of hubris and inattention and waywardness - was left by the administration's handling of the aborted takeover of several U.S. port terminals by a Dubai- owned company.

Having whipped the country into a frenzy over security, Bush favored free trade in this instance, a reasonable position. But he failed to see that he would reap what he had sown: a congressional outcry based in the scurrilous but pervasive notion that all Arabs are dangerous. The absence of preparation for a predictable storm was startling.

Bush's unpopularity is also startling. With the Dow at its highest level in years and the economy growing briskly, his low ratings suggest that links between the economy and a president's popularity are weaker in an era of globalization.

The stock market may be up and profits at investment banks soaring, but companies are cutting back on pensions and health plans to achieve the profits Wall Street likes, and insecurity about jobs is high. Competition is so remorseless that a strong economy is no longer synonymous with the feel-good factor presidents need.

"There is a level of unease about whether you will be able to preserve what you've got," said Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute.

In theory, that's the sort of economic unease the Democrats should be able to pounce on to seize the political initiative as Bush's popularity erodes. With the president's stature on national security issues also falling, the stars seem to be aligning themselves for the Democrats.

Still, it's striking that the nadir of Bush's popularity has not coincided with the emergence of any compelling Democratic message or theme, from Hillary Clinton or anyone else. Attacking the president's incompetence may be enough for the

DOJ_NMG_0019432

Democrats to secure a House majority in the midterm election in November. But a negative campaign alone will not gain the presidency in 2008.

"The Democrats have still not come up with a coherent national security or homeland security posture," said Ornstein. "Saying no Arabs should run our ports is not a program."

Bush has a program, but he's increasingly seen as unable to deliver. The "war president" aura has crumbled. War talk of decades-long struggles seems unlikely to revive him. Talking to Iran - the country identified in the new strategy as presenting the greatest challenge to America - may help more by delivering results in Iraq and elsewhere.

Why Iran Wants To Talk (WP)

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

IT'S EASY to see the potential advantage to Iran of opening negotiations with the United States on Iraq. The sudden announcement by Iran's national security chief Thursday that Tehran would accept an offer of dialogue made months ago by the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad came as members of the U.N. Security Council were meeting to discuss a council statement about the Iranian nuclear program.

That statement could be the first in an escalating series of steps to force Tehran to give up the enrichment of uranium and fully cooperate with international inspectors. Preventing such diplomatic action has been Iran's main aim since its illegal nuclear program was discovered in 2004; the failure to stop the issue from reaching the Security Council has prompted some visible handwringing and backbiting among the mullahs.

By drawing the Bush administration into talks about Iraq, the Iranians give themselves a shot at splintering or distracting the fragile coalition that may be forming in New York. Already Iranian officials are speaking openly about the possibility that any discussions would expand into the broader security dialogue that Tehran has long coveted with the United States. In Iraq -- where American soldiers are dying from Iranian-supplied roadside bombs and sectarian violence by Iranian-supported militias is steadily mounting -- the Islamic regime has a tacit and sinister offer to make: Back down in New York, and the carnage in Baghdad might just drop off. Even the appearance that the Bush administration might be considering such a trade-off would worsen the situation in Iraq and wreck a year of careful and mostly effective anti-proliferation diplomacy.

The right response to the Iranian initiative is to limit any discussions to short-term U.S. priorities in Iraq and to ensure that the exchange is as open as possible. In theory, the United States and Iran share an interest in preventing an all-out Iraqi civil war, and thus in the establishment of a government that could rein in both the Sunni insurgency and the Shiite militias. But Iran's other objectives in Iraq are mostly inimical: It has promoted the creation of a Shiite ministate in southern Iraq that would control the country's largest oil fields and be dominated by Iran's allies; it hopes that the Sunni insurgency will meanwhile bleed American troops and exhaust U.S. willpower.

The U.S. goal of a broad and cohesive Iraqi government that would fairly balance Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish interests and be defended by a national Iraqi army would, if achieved, check Iranian ambitions. If Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad can advance that cause through talks with Iran, good. But it will be worth bearing in mind that Tehran has agreed to sit down with him for entirely different reasons.

U.N. To Raise Its Profile In Iraq (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

The senior U.N. official in Iraq yesterday said that the United Nations will soon be raising its profile there, acknowledging that its "perceived absence" has been noticeable since a tragic suicide bombing after the U.S. invasion three years ago.

Ashraf Qazi, the special representative of U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan, will be in Washington through Monday for meetings at the Pentagon, State Department and National Security Council.

"It is a fact that the United States strongly encourages us to play a more proactive role in a whole range of activities to make an impact on Iraqi lives," Mr. Qazi told editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

He said the organization has been active in many aspects of nation building, assisting Iraqis in drafting a constitution, holding elections and rebuilding infrastructure.

But Mr. Qazi also said that it was time for the 90-member U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq, or UNAMI, to take a higher profile despite security concerns.

"A lot of people are not aware of our contributions," he said, in part because U.N. officials are based inside the heavily fortified Green Zone.

DOJ_NMG_0019433

"People ask 'where are you?' because they don't always notice us," said the former Pakistani ambassador to Washington.

"We need to do a better job in terms of enlarging the scale of our activities, being seen and being safe at the same time."

Mr. Qazi's predecessor, Sergio Vieira de Mello of Brazil, and 21 others died in an August 2003 suicide bombing of the U.N. headquarters in Baghdad.

Mr. Qazi, told the U.N. Security Council earlier this week that UNAMI needs its own helicopters and small aircraft to transport U.N. staff between the Green Zone base and new offices in Irbil and Basra.

The planes, he said yesterday, would allow the organization to be more active and independent in a country where the roads are dangerous and movement is often curtailed.

Mr. Qazi made it clear that he disagreed with the frequent warnings that Iraq is slipping into a full-scale civil war.

"What is civil war? I wouldn't say it is even a prospect right now, but there is no reason to be complacent," he said, acknowledging serious human rights violations, sectarian violence, little protection for civil servants and an absence of civil services that would make daily life easier for average Iraqis.

For example, he said yesterday, the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last month might have actually been a turning point in the effort to calm sectarian violence that continues to cripple reconstruction efforts.

"The government has managed to keep a lid on it but [sectarian tensions] have to be addressed through a broad-based approach" that includes security, political inclusiveness and restored electricity, transportation, education, health care and other services.

The Iraqi government plans to rebuild the historic Shi'ite mosque, as well as many Christian churches that have been bombed over the past three years.

Mr. Qazi said UNAMI is working with U.N. agencies such as UNESCO and the World Bank to try to raise money and recruit expertise for the project, which he said would also encourage sectarian healing.

Although Mr. Qazi declined to comment on the progress or strength of the U.S.-led multinational forces, he noted that the Iraqi police remain tangled in sectarian and political divisions, even though the Iraqi army seems to be making greater progress.

This will be one of his messages when he addresses the donors conference, which is likely to be convened this June or July in Istanbul.

About $13 billion has been pledged for Iraq's reconstruction, and more than half of the nearly $1 billion received has already been spent on governance, humanitarian and reconstruction projects.

Mr. Qazi and his team also met yesterday with World Bank President Paul Wolfowitz, who said the bank would soon have a larger presence in Iraq.

Mr. Qazi stressed that he has frequent contact with Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador in Iraq. And he repeatedly made clear that the United Nations is in service to the Iraqi government, rather than dictating to it.

Ringleader In Custody, Iraqi Officials Say (LAT)

By John Johnson Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Military and political leaders say a sweep in the Samarra area has yielded a key figure in last month's divisive mosque attack.

SAMARRA, Iraq — Iraqi military officials said Friday that a continuing offensive targeting insurgents in the hardpan desert northeast of here has resulted in the capture of additional weapons and a man they believe is among those responsible for the recent bombing of a venerated Shiite Muslim shrine in Samarra.

Iraqi military and political leaders, speaking at an operations base along the Tigris River about 80 miles northeast of Baghdad, said they were checking photos and other documents to determine if they had captured one of the people they believe planned the bombing of the Golden Mosque and the killing of an Arabic TV journalist.

"One ringleader is in custody," Iraqi Gen. Abdul Jabbar said. "He is a main person in all the attacks that took place."

The Golden Mosque, one of Shiite Islam's holiest places, was stormed Feb. 22 by about 20 men who placed 475 pounds of explosives throughout the building and set them off by remote control. A handful of suspects have been arrested, but authorities have not identified them.

The bombing led to scores of retaliatory attacks on Sunni Islam's holy places and a series of tit-for-tat executions by Sunnis and Shiites. The slaying of Al Arabiya broadcast journalist Atwar Bahjat, a Samarra native who had returned to her hometown to report on the mosque bombing, underscored the deteriorating security situation.

On Thursday, in what U.S. military officials called the largest airborne operation since shortly after the start of the war in March 2003, about 1,500 U.S. and Iraqi troops swooped into the desert area in 50 helicopters.

DOJ_NMG_0019434

By late Friday, officials said they had detained more than 50 people and uncovered as many as eight weapons caches, most buried in fields. In a soccer field near Balad, searchers said, they turned up a Soviet antiaircraft gun, four rocket-propelled grenade launchers, 100 pounds of explosives and hand grenades.

U.S. officials on Friday said the scope of the operation was proportionate to the relatively modest amount of weapons uncovered.

They added that the timing was not tied to the impending three-year anniversary of the invasion, which toppled President Saddam Hussein.

The officials said the offensive, called Operation Swarmer, was a show of force in an area teeming with insurgents, and was a symbol of the growing maturity of Iraqi fighting forces.

Much of the planning was done by Iraqis, the officials said. The Iraqis, who make up about half the force, which includes Americans from the Army's 101st Airborne Division, took the lead in searching houses in the sparsely populated region.

"We realize the importance of an Iraqi army being able to take responsibility" in combat missions, said Col. Skip Johnson, standing in the shadow of the ruins of a mosque he said had been destroyed by insurgents three months ago.

Iraq's military capability is also key to Washington's hopes of drawing down U.S. forces in coming months.

Just as important as the planning and execution was the fact that Iraqi intelligence provided the basis for the operation.

"This fight will be won at the intelligence level," Johnson said. "The Iraqis know the culture and they know the people."

The operation, and the wide television coverage it has been accorded, appeared to have inflamed some Muslim clerics, who accused the Americans of waging sectarian "ethnic cleansing" against Iraq's Sunnis.

Sheik Mohammed Faidhi, a spokesman for the Muslim Scholars Assn., called the operation "a scandal which is bigger than Abu Ghraib," the prison where Iraqi inmates were humiliated and abused by U.S. soldiers.

"Places are raided, innocents are killed and villages are bombed under the pretext of terrorists," he said.

U.S. military officials and local political leaders insisted that there had been no bombing.

The troops searched on foot, they said, adding that there had been no firefights in the first two days, no resistance to the troops and no deaths or injuries.

In Samarra, about 30 miles south of the search area, a soldier from the 3rd Brigade Combat Team of the 101st Airborne was shot and killed Thursday while manning an observation post.

The military said the killing of the soldier was unrelated to the operation.

Two other soldiers from the 101st Airborne were killed Thursday in an "indirect fire attack" on their base northwest of Tikrit, the military announced today.

The names of all three were withheld pending notification of their relatives.

Officials said about 1,500 people live in the remote area where the offensive is taking place.

There are about 150 buildings, mostly simple huts. By evening Friday, about a third of them had been searched.

At a 70-acre okra and wheat farm, Rahma Saleh was making flatbread in an outdoor stove in the 80-degree sunshine while two of her seven children looked on.

"A lot of people came here and searched," she said while pounding out the dough, wetting it and sticking it to the inside of the stove's narrow chimney.

Saleh, who said her husband had been wounded in the Iran-Iraq war and could no longer work, called the soldiers polite and "very respectful." But she insisted: "It's all families here, no insurgents."

The deputy governor of Salahuddin province, Abdullah Hussein, disagreed. He said residents had been complaining of being harassed by insurgents.

"A lot of people have been killed for not cooperating with them," he said.

The bombing of the shrine in Samarra was a factor in the decision to go after the insurgents nearby.

The deputy governor guessed that they numbered about 200; U.S. officers estimated that the number was closer to 100.

Jabbar, a brigade commander with the Iraqi forces, said he was hunting a group called Mohammed's Army, or Takfiris, which was linked to the forces of Jordanian militant Abu Musab Zarqawi.

Their principal target, the Iraqis said, was Hamed Taki, alleged to be the leader of a terrorist cell.

A U.S. military official called Taki "a person of interest that we'd like to catch."

Elsewhere in Iraq, gunmen in Ramadi attacked people headed to Friday prayers, killing one, and fought Iraqi soldiers, killing five, officials said.

In Baghdad, gunmen also attacked worshipers, killing two and injuring 16. A suicide bomber killed himself and the driver of a bus.

Police found six more bodies around Baghdad. Four of the victims had been blindfolded, handcuffed and shot in the head.

*

DOJ_NMG_0019435

Times staff writers Asmaa Waguih, Caesar Ahmed, Raheem Salman and Zainab Hussein in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Study Is Said To Find Overlap In U.S. Counterterror Effort (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — A classified Pentagon study analyzing the effectiveness of Special Operations forces has found that the military's counterterrorism effort is hampered by bureaucratic duplication, officials said, citing in particular an overlap between new government centers.

The study also found evidence of broad resistance to the Special Operations Command's new counterterrorism role, from regional military commands and from other parts of the government's sprawling defense and intelligence apparatus.

The findings were viewed as so provocative that the classified report has not been distributed widely, even among officials with the security clearance needed to read such internal reviews, Pentagon and military officials said. The study was initially ordered by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Pentagon and military officials who have read the study say that the mission of the new Center for Special Operations, a large military headquarters created in Florida in 2003, mirrors the work of the new National Counterterrorism Center, established by executive order in 2004. The military center is intended to bring together elements of the armed services under a three-star general; the intelligence center answers to John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence.

The officials were granted anonymity to discuss the classified report's contents because they were not authorized to speak about it.

The review, conducted by a retired four-star officer, Gen. Wayne A. Downing Jr., grew out of a budget and strategy briefing last October during which Mr. Rumsfeld expressed grave concerns over the readiness of the troops and the effectiveness of the Special Operations Command's counterterrorist operations.

"The Rumsfeld family crest probably says something like, 'More, and faster,' " said a senior Pentagon official involved in the policy debate over the role of the command, known as Socom in military circles. "So what he thinks about Socom is, 'With all this new money and all these extra people and all this wider latitude to maneuver, why haven't you won the war on terror for me yet?' "

The Special Operations Command reports to Mr. Rumsfeld, and falls outside those organizations that report to Mr. Negroponte. The command's new global role in counterterrorism has rankled some officers at the Pentagon and in regional war-fighting commands who previously took charge of that mission.

Some of the command's new efforts, in particular the placement of small teams in American embassies to gather intelligence on terrorists and to prepare for potential missions, has outraged some intelligence officers and career diplomats.

According to Pentagon civilians and military officers who have read the Downing study, the review found "a tremendous duplication of effort" in the government and military that overlaps with assignments given the Special Operations Command.

More broadly, the review found that the government-wide national security bureaucracy still does not respond rapidly and effectively to the new requirements of the counterterrorism campaign. The report said more streamlining was necessary across a broad swath of the civilian bureaucracy and military, including civilians in the policy office that reports to Mr. Rumsfeld and the office of the secretary of defense, the military organization that reports to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the regional combatant commanders and even the National Security Council staff at the White House.

One Pentagon official who read the review said it criticized the Defense Department and National Security Council bureaucracy for not creating ways to answer Socom's real-time needs, forcing the command to navigate plodding bureaucratic channels whenever it wanted to adjust course. The official said this made it difficult to mount the quick action required to single out insurgents or terrorist leaders whose locations may become known only for brief periods of time.

Seeking answers to his concerns, Mr. Rumsfeld asked General Downing, who is known for his blunt, independent style, to conduct the classified review. General Downing, a former Socom commander, led the inquiry into the 1996 bombing at the Khobar Towers housing complex in Saudi Arabia and served as counterterrorism adviser for the first President Bush.

Contacted by telephone and e-mail, General Downing declined to discuss the review, citing the secrecy of the project. But when asked to summarize his personal views of the debate, he said: "Over the years, the inter-agency system has become so lethargic and dysfunctional that it materially inhibits the ability to apply the vast power of the U.S. government on problems. You see this inability to synchronize in our operations in Iraq and in Afghanistan, across our foreign policy and in our response to Katrina."

DOJ_NMG_0019436

The Downing study criticizes Pentagon civilians, the military's Joint Staff, the regional war-fighting commanders and the National Security Council staff for not readjusting their organizations to expedite the Special Operations Command's new counterterrorism missions.

Another official who read the review said it took to task senior civilian and military leaders who demanded "responsive, flexible, agile operations around the world, yet tolerate a staff system that gives you exactly the opposite."

Under a Unified Command Plan signed by President Bush, the Special Operations Command now "leads, plans, synchronizes, and as directed, executes global operations against terrorist networks." But the Special Operations Command, based in Tampa, Fla., "does not have the power to do what it has been assigned," said yet another official in paraphrasing the report.

The report included one radical proposal: It advocated relocating to Washington the headquarters of the Joint Special Operations Command, which runs all of the "special-mission units" that carry out the most secret attacks against terrorists and work to halt the proliferation of unconventional weapons. It proposed that these highly trained units then be put under Mr. Rumsfeld's direct, personal control.

Several readers of the Downing review said they believed the proposal was intended to call the bluff of those at the Pentagon who say these elite counterterrorism teams are not doing enough to find and capture or kill terrorist leaders. The implicit message, the readers said, was that if Pentagon leaders were dissatisfied, then they should try being in charge of planning and executing counterterrorism missions.

That proposal was rejected.

Documents Reveal Iraqis Dodging Inspectors (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, March 18, 2006

Iraqi officials talked about when and how to deceive international authorities about their weapons programs in the mid-1990s, referring at one point to materials imported from the United States for an apparent chemical program.

A transcript of the conversation is one of several dozen documents made public Friday by the U.S. government as part of a program allowing researchers, the media and Iraqis comb through millions of pages of documents and audio recordings confiscated since the 2003 invasion.

In the U.S. government's translation of captured Iraqi audio recordings, an official identified as "Comrade Husayn" talks to Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and other officials about when it would be best to lie to weapons inspectors and U.N. Security Council members and when to be open.

He shows particular concern that outsiders will learn about the importation of material, including some from the U.S., apparently for chemical weapons.

"They have a bigger problem with the chemical program than the biological program," he says. "We have not told them that we used it on Iran, nor have we told them abut the size or kind of chemical weapons that we produced, and we have not told them the truth about the imported material."

He went on to say, "We imported a quantity from America and we imported a quantity from Europe. However, we did not come forth with the quantities."

On the overall question of weapons of mass destruction, he said: "I must say that it is in our best interest not to uncover it, not only in fear of exposing the technology that we have or that we possess or to hide it for future agendas."

The precise date of the conversation was not clear, but clues suggest it came at the end of Rolf Ekeus' leadership of the United Nations Special Commission on Iraq, which he headed from 1991 to 1997.

The documents show debates among Iraq's senior leadership about U.N. sanctions, inspections and resolutions — and how to handle the country's economic and military security. They come in an era when U.S. officials now believe that Saddam's ability to develop weapons of mass destruction was diminishing, under pressure from international sanctions.

Although the Bush administration used the weapons programs as the main justification for the 2003 invasion, U.S. arms inspectors ultimately found no concrete evidence that Iraq produced weapons of mass destruction after 1991.

Yet the Iraqis apparently were far from forthcoming about their actions. Another conversation with Saddam from the mid-1990s indicates that officials knew they had problems with the weapons inspectors.

"On the nuclear file, sir, we are saying we disclosed everything? No, we have uncleared problems in the nuclear field, and I believe that they (the inspectors) know some of them," said a man identified as al-Sahhaf, possibly a reference to the former Iraqi diplomat and Information Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahaf. "Some teams work, and no one knows some of them."

He then apologized for speaking so clearly. "Everything is over. But, did they know? No, sir, they did not know, not all the methods, not all the means, not all the scientists and not all the places."

DOJ_NMG_0019437

He tells Saddam that missing materials and equipment — for biological and nuclear weapons — would be a problem in dealing with the U.N. as it crafted resolutions against Iraq. "Really, sir, we must be frank so that the resolution will be straightforward," al-Sahaf said.

The transcripts also show extensive debates among Saddam's inner circle about how to deal with other governments.

"Comrade Husayn" expressed frustration at Iraq's increasing isolation, venting particularly at the French, who were managing to upset the Americans as well.

He said the French had an "attitude."

"To be truthful before your Excellency, I do not trust the French in their current position. Maybe this will change after the election," said Husayn. "I think that they are more distant than the Chinese are, even though the Chinese are very far also. They (French) appear in the Security Council with a yes one time and a no another time.

"Therefore, sir, my personal belief is that they are layered (two-faced) and possibly in coordination with America and in coordination with the world."

Years later, the U.S. and the French would be at odds over the invasion of Iraq.

There are personal nuggets in the documents, too. "Bring us tea and milk," Saddam would interrupt meetings to order. Attendants would hustle to pour.

Saddam also spoke to his aides about a need to give Iraqis hope in the face of sanctions that were starting to make them suffer.

"We can't just tell the people to be patient," he said. "They need to see and hear results that they consider logical."

___

Associated Press Writer Cal Woodward contributed to this report.

New Documents From Saddam Hussein's Archives Discuss Bin Laden, WMDs (ABC)

ABC News website, March 16, 2006

U.S. Government Releases Papers From Saddam's Reign

March 16, 2006 — Following are the ABC News Investigative Unit's summaries of four of the nine Iraqi documents from Saddam Hussein's government, which were released by the U.S. government Wednesday.

The documents discuss Osama bin Laden, weapons of mass destruction, al Qaeda and more.

The full documents can be found on the U.S. Army Foreign Military Studies Office Web site: http://fmso.leavenworth.army.mil/products-docex.htm.

Note: Document titles were added by ABC News.

"Osama bin Laden and the Taliban"

Document dated Sept. 15, 2001

An Iraqi intelligence service document saying that their Afghani informant, who's only identified by a number, told them that the Afghani Consul Ahmed Dahastani claimed the following in front of him:

That OBL and the Taliban are in contact with Iraq and that a group of Taliban and bin Laden group members visited Iraq.

That the U.S. has proof the Iraqi government and "bin Laden's group" agreed to cooperate to attack targets inside America.

That in case the Taliban and bin Laden's group turn out to be involved in "these destructive operations," the U.S. may strike Iraq and Afghanistan.

That the Afghani consul heard about the issue of Iraq's relationship with "bin Laden's group" while he was in Iran.

At the end, the writer recommends informing "the committee of intentions" about the above-mentioned items. The signature on the document is unclear.

(Editor's Note: The controversial claim that Osama bin Laden was cooperating with Saddam Hussein is an ongoing matter of intense debate. While the assertions contained in this document clearly support the claim, the sourcing is questionable — i.e. an unnamed Afghan "informant" reporting on a conversation with another Afghan "consul." The date of the document — four days after 9/11 — is worth noting but without further corroboration, this document is of limited evidentiary value.)

"Election Campaign Laws in France"

Documents dated July-August 1999

Correspondence regarding election campaigns in France. This includes a document from the Iraqi intelligence service classified as "secret," ordering the translation of important parts of a 1997 report about campaign financing laws in France. It also includes a document from the foreign minister's office indicating the report was attached. The attached translated report included very detailed information about all the regulations regarding financing of election campaigns in France. Translation was done by someone called "Salam Abdul Karim Mohammed."

DOJ_NMG_0019438

(Editor's Note: This is an intriguing document which suggests Saddam Hussein's regime had a strong interest in the mechanics and legalities of financial contributions to French politicians. Several former French politicians are implicated in receiving oil vouchers from Iraq under the U.N. Oil for Food program.)

"Hiding Docs from the U.N. Team"

Document dated March 23, 1997

A letter from the Iraqi intelligence service to directors and managers advising them to follow certain procedures in case of a search by the U.N. team, including:

Removing correspondence with the atomic energy and military industry departments concerning the prohibited weapons (proposals, research, studies, catalogs, etc.).

Removing prohibited materials and equipment, including documents and catalogs and making sure to clear labs and storages of any traces of chemical or biological materials that were previously used or stored.

Doing so through a committee which will decide whether to destroy the documents.

Removing files from computers.

The letter also advises them on how they should answer questions by U.N. team members. It says the intelligence service should be informed within one week about the progress made in discarding the documents.

(Editor's Note: This document is consistent with the Report of the Special Advisor to the Director of Central Intelligence, which described a pattern of deception and concealment on the part of Saddam Hussein's government towards the U.N. inspectors in the mid to late 90's. Hussein halted all cooperation with those inspectors and expelled them in October 1998.)

"Al Qaeda Presence in Iraq"

Document dated August 2002

A number of correspondences to check rumors that some members of al Qaeda organization have entered Iraq. Three letters say this information cannot be confirmed. The letter on page seven, however, says that information coming from "a trustworthy source" indicates that subjects who are interested in dealing with al Qaeda are in Iraq and have several passports.

The letter seems to be coming from or going to Trebil, a town on the Iraqi-Jordanian border. Follow up on the presence of those subjects is ordered, as well as comparison of their pictures with those of Jordanian subjects living in Iraq. (This may be referring to pictures of Abu Musaab al Zarqawi and another man on pages 4-6) The letter also says tourist areas, including hotels and rented apartments, should be searched.

(Editor's note: This document indicates that the Iraqis were aware of and interested in reports that members of al Qaeda were present in Iraq in 2002. The document does not support allegations that Iraq was colluding with al Qaeda.)

Papers Give Glimpse Of Al-Qaida Recruits (LAT/AP)

By Sam F. Ghattas, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Recruits at Osama bin Laden's terrorist training camps in Afghanistan were clamoring for suicide missions against the United States more than a year before the Sept. 11 attacks, according to al-Qaida documents declassified by the U.S. Defense Department.

One document published on the Pentagon Web site this week contained rare criticism of bin Laden from an al-Qaida operative, who accused the terrorist leader of monopolizing decision-making and ignoring advice.

"We must completely stop outside operations until we sit down and consider the disaster we have caused," said the operative, who used the name Abdel Halim Adel.

Adel appealed to a friend in the al-Qaida leadership to steer the group away from the policies of bin Laden, whom he referred to as Abu Abdullah.

"Stop foreign operations, stop sending people to detention, and stop planning new operations, whether they are ordered by Abu Abdullah or not," he wrote.

The documents provide a rare glimpse of the mentality and training of recruits at al-Qaida's camps in Afghanistan, where bin Laden was based until late 2001. After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, the United States threw its weight behind opponents of the Taliban regime that hosted bin Laden.

While the camps in Afghanistan have been destroyed, many of those who trained there have returned to their home countries, taking al-Qaida's ideology and tactics with them.

The U.S. military said the documents, published Wednesday, were "captured during recent operations." Some were seized in the 2003 invasion of Iraq but many, according to U.S. Rep. Pete Hoekstra, were found in Afghanistan.

"Why have the martyrdom operations against the Americans been delayed?" one recruit wrote on a calendar page dated July 8, 2000.

Another recruit referred to the 1998 suicide attacks on the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, which killed 231 people, saying: "We look forward to martyrdom operations like the ones in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam. What are the characteristics of the man that is required to execute such operations?"

A third recruit asked the leadership why it disapproved of assassination: "Why do you oppose and find it inappropriate, knowing that it cleansed many tyrants?"

The recruits called bin Laden "sheik," a clerical title. But it was not clear whether their questions were addressed to him or to one of his lieutenants.

"Our sheik, you have previously given us lessons and asked the question: 'How do we drive the infidels out of the Arabian Peninsula?'" a recruit said in one document.

He then asked: "Is striking at the origin (America) the priority or is it driving them out (of Saudi Arabia)?"

The documents show al-Qaida members were concerned about their safety and the safety of their families, although they embraced suicide attacks.

Adel, the operative who criticized bin Laden, protests the leadership's posting on the Internet of a letter in which he sent kisses to his children.

"Please quickly take it off because I think the whole world now knows how many kids I have and their names," he wrote.

A recruit said a reconnaissance plane has been spotted over the camp and asked: "Why aren't there enough personal weapons (Kalashnikov rifles) for the self-defense of all the holy warriors, particularly as an attack on the camp by the global infidels is possible anytime?"

Bin Laden is thought to have written one of the documents -- a letter to Taliban leader Mullah Omar. It is not clear whether the letter was written before or after Omar was overthrown.

Bin Laden told Omar that if they continued attacks in the "Islamic republics" -- apparently Muslim-dominated areas of the former Soviet Union -- it will "keep the enemies busy and divert them away from the Afghan issue and ease the pressure."

"It is a fact that the region of the Islamic republics is rich with significant scientific experience in conventional and non-conventional military industries, which will have a great role in future holy war against the enemies of Islam," the letter said. It was not specific about the type of non-conventional armaments, but seemed to refer to biological and chemical warfare.

The letter also addressed the importance of communicating with the media, a matter on which Mullah Omar would have disagreed. The Taliban leader was known for refusing press interviews and avoiding cameras.

"It is obvious that the media war in this century is one of the strongest methods (of struggle). In fact, its ratio may reach 90 percent of the total preparation for battles," bin Laden wrote.

The release of the documents, which is expected to continue for months, is designed to allow U.S. lawmakers and the public to investigate issues such as what Saddam Hussein's Iraqi regime said about weapons of mass destruction.

The Pentagon cautioned it has made "no determination regarding the authenticity of the documents, validity or factual accuracy."

Cited As Symbol Of Abu Ghraib, Man Admits He Is Not In Photo (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

In the summer of 2004, a group of former detainees of Abu Ghraib prison filed a lawsuit claiming that they had been the victims of the abuse captured in photographs that incited outrage around the world.

One, Ali Shalal Qaissi, soon emerged as their chief representative, appearing in publications and on television in several countries to detail his suffering. His prominence made sense, because he claimed to be the man in the photograph that had become the international icon of the Abu Ghraib scandal: standing on a cardboard box, hooded, with wires attached to his outstretched arms. He had even emblazoned the silhouette of that image on business cards.

The trouble was, the man in the photograph was not Mr. Qaissi. [Editors' Note, Page A2.]

Military investigators had identified the man on the box as a different detainee who had described the episode in a sworn statement immediately after the photographs were discovered in January 2004, but then the man seemed to go silent.

Mr. Qaissi had energetically filled the void, traveling abroad with slide shows to argue that abuse in Iraq continued, as head of a group he called the Association of Victims of American Occupation Prisons.

The New York Times profiled him last Saturday in a front-page article; in it, Mr. Qaissi insisted he had never sought the fame of his iconic status. Mr. Qaissi had been interviewed on a number of earlier occasions, including by PBS's "Now," Vanity Fair, Der Spiegel and in the Italian news media as the man on the box.

This week, after the online magazine Salon raised questions about the identity of the man in the photograph, Mr. Qaissi and his lawyers insisted he was telling the truth.

DOJ_NMG_0019440

Certainly, he was at Abu Ghraib, and appears with a hood over his head in some photographs that Army investigators seized from the computer belonging to Specialist Charles Graner, the soldier later convicted of being the ringleader of the abuse.

However, he now acknowledges he is not the man in the specific photograph he printed and held up in a portrait that accompanied the Times article. But he and his lawyers maintain that he was photographed in a similar position and shocked with wires and that he is the one on his business card. The Army says it believes only one prisoner was treated in that way.

"I know one thing," Mr. Qaissi said yesterday, breaking down in tears when reached by telephone. "I wore that blanket, I stood on that box, and I was wired up and electrocuted."

Susan Burke, a lawyer in Philadelphia who is representing Mr. Qaissi and other former prisoners in a lawsuit against civilian interrogators and translators at Abu Ghraib, said that Mr. Qaissi had been abused in the same way as the man in the photo. "The sad fact is that there is not only one man on the box," she said.

Using a name that Mr. Qaissi is often called, she said, "Haj Ali is but one of many victims of the torture by Graner and the others."

In the interview for the article, Mr. Qaissi pointed to his deformed hand and said it matched the hand in the photograph. A close look at the photograph, however, is inconclusive.

Whether he was forced to stand on a box and photographed is not clear, but evidence suggests that he adopted the identity of the iconic man on the box, the very symbol of Abu Ghraib, well after he left the prison.

Records confirm that Mr. Qaissi became inmate 151716 sometime after the prison opened in June 2003, but do not give firm dates; Mr. Qaissi, a 43-year-old former Baath Party member and neighborhood mayor in Baghdad, said he arrived at Abu Ghraib in October 2003 and was released in March 2004, two months after the Army began an investigation into the abuse.

And he suffered mistreatment and humiliation at the hands of the same people who photographed the man on the box: photographs investigators seized show him forced into a crouch, identifiable by his mangled hand, with the nickname guards gave him — "The Claw" — scrawled in black marker across his orange jumpsuit.

But if he was the hooded man on the box, he did not mention it on several key occasions in the first months after the scandal broke.

In the spring of 2004, Mr. Qaissi approached Muhammad Hamid al-Moussawi, the deputy director of the Human Rights Organization of Iraq, and proposed that the men set up a group for prisoners of the occupation, Mr. Moussawi said this week. Yet Mr. Qaissi never claimed at the time that he had been the man in the photograph, Mr. Moussawi recalled.

A journalist who interviewed Mr. Qaissi three times that May and June about what happened at Abu Ghraib similarly said he never mentioned the pose or the photograph. The journalist, Gert Van Langendonck, said Mr. Qaissi mentioned the other cruelties he described in the Times profile.

A lawsuit Mr. Qaissi joined, filed on July 27, 2004, also made no allegation that he was shocked with wires or forced to stand on a box. That allegation appeared only on an amended version of a complaint he later joined, filed last month, which said he had been forced to stand on the box and fell off from the shocks of the electrocution: "They repeated this at least five times."

Another man had already been publicly identified as the man on the box in May 2004, when documents including logbooks and sworn statements from detainees and soldiers were leaked to The Times.

On May 22, 2004, The Times quoted the testimony of a detainee, Abdou Hussain Saad Faleh: "Then a tall black soldier came and put electrical wires on my fingers and toes and on my penis, and I had a bag over my head. Then he was saying, 'Which switch is on for electricity?'"

Specialist Sabrina Harman, one of the soldiers later convicted of abuse, identified the man by his nickname, Gilligan, in her statement.

She left some room to believe that others were subjected to the same treatment. "The wires part," she said, was her idea, but she said Specialist Graner and Staff Sgt. Ivan Frederick II had forced detainees to stand on a box to stay awake, and did so at the request of military intelligence officials. Abu Ghraib photographs show more than one example of a hooded man forced to stand on boxes.

But Chris Grey, a spokesman for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command, said that the military believed that Mr. Faleh had been the only prisoner subjected to the treatment shown in the photo. "To date, and after a very thorough criminal investigation, we have neither credible information, nor reason to believe, that more than one incident of this nature occurred," he said.

Mr. Qaissi's lawyer, Ms. Burke, countered, "We do not trust the torturers."

Mr. Qaissi seems to have first begun identifying himself as the hooded man in the fall of 2004, by which point he had started his prisoners' group out of a politically charged mosque in Baghdad.

In an article in the February 2005 issue of Vanity Fair, Donovan Webster identified Mr. Qaissi as Haj Ali, the likely man on the box, based on an extensive investigation of military records. Soon, Mr. Qaissi was featured in numerous profiles, including in

Der Spiegel, reprinted by Salon, as well as on the PBS current affairs program "Now," where he described being shocked: "It felt like my eyeballs were coming out of my sockets."

With his soft voice and occasionally self-deprecating humor, he has impressed interviewers as affable and credible. He told his story with a level of detail that separated it from that of many others.

Most of his assertions and details could be confirmed, Mr. Webster and others stress. In his three-hour interview with The Times, Mr. Qaissi did not veer from reported details and appeared confident in his discussion, punctuating his story with bitter laughter and occasionally, tears. But he never raised the possibility that another man may have also been photographed in the same pose.

Human rights workers were compelled by his story, as well. Reporting the Saturday article, The Times relied in part on their statements that he could well be the hooded man, as well as on prison records and interviews with friends and his lawyers, who say they have Mr. Qaissi's blanket, the same one, they said, draped over the man in the photograph. Army officials at the time refused to confirm or refute Mr. Qaissi's claims, citing privacy protections in the Geneva Convention.

Abdel Jabbar al-Azzawi, who now lives in Baghdad and says he was in the prison with both Mr. Qaissi and the man named Gilligan and has joined the lawsuit, says he saw Mr. Qaissi wearing the blanket fashioned into a poncho depicted in the photograph, though he did not see the photographs being taken.

Mr. Qaissi's lawyers also stress that the iconic photograph is not the basis of his case. In court papers, he also says he was punched, kicked, hit with a stick and chained to his cell while his captors poured cold water over his naked body.

Meanwhile, it is not clear what happened to the real hooded man, Mr. Faleh. An Army spokesman said he was released from American custody in January 2004. Tribal leaders, and the manager of a brick factory next to the address where prison records say he lived, said they had never heard the name. Besides, they said, detainees often make up identities when they are imprisoned. Mr. Qaissi's attorneys said they have not attempted to search for him.

Times Says It Misidentified Iraqi As Hooded Prisoner (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

It was a dramatic front-page story to match an infamous photo: the chilling shot of an Abu Ghraib prisoner, hooded, standing on a box, electrical wires attached to his outstretched arms.

He is Ali Shalal Qaissi, the New York Times said last Saturday, and the Iraqi told the paper that his wounds are still raw.

But after questions were raised by the online magazine Salon, the Times acknowledged last night that the story was flat wrong. The prisoner in the photograph was not Qaissi, who has belatedly admitted that to the newspaper.

"The Times did not adequately research Mr. Qaissi's insistence that he was the man in the photograph" and "should have been more persistent in seeking comment from the military," the paper said in an editor's note.

Susan Chira, the Times foreign editor, said in an interview earlier this week that Salon had "raised legitimate questions" about the newspaper's story. "Any time you talk to someone like this, you worry: Are they telling you some kind of story?"

In a story published in today's editions, Qaissi is quoted as saying in a tearful telephone interview that he was photographed in a similar position. "I know one thing," Qaissi told the Times. "I wore that blanket, I stood on that box, and I was wired up and electrocuted."

The Army, however, says that only one man was mistreated that way, a prisoner whom guards nicknamed "The Claw," according to the Times report. Further undercutting Qaissi's account, the Times reported, is that he never claimed to have been the man under the hood in the first months after his release from Abu Ghraib or in a July 2004 lawsuit that he joined.

In last Saturday's Times story, written from Amman by staff writer Hassan Fattah, the 43-year-old Qaissi was quoted as saying: "I never wanted to be famous, especially not in this way." The paper reported that Qaissi has a slight limp and a mangled hand -- an old injury that became infected by his shackles -- after his six-month imprisonment at Abu Ghraib in 2003 and 2004, and that he is now a prisoner advocate who uses the hooded image on his business card.

A U.S. military spokesman would not comment to the Times, citing the Geneva Conventions' rules against disclosing the identity of prisoners. But the paper said government records made available by Amnesty International show that Qaissi was in U.S. custody at the time and that the organization, along with Human Rights Watch and attorneys involved in a class-action suit over the abuses at Abu Ghraib, "believe that he is the man in the photograph."

In today's report, however, the Times said: "Evidence suggests that he adopted the identity of the iconic man on the box, the very symbol of Abu Ghraib, well after he left the prison."

Qaissi, who had been a neighborhood official in Saddam Hussein's government, has been touring the Arab world and delivering computer slide shows about the mistreatment of prisoners at Abu Ghraib, the photographs of which became a global embarrassment for the U.S. military after they were obtained by several news organizations.

DOJ_NMG_0019442

Days after the Times story was published, Salon reported that Qaissi was not the man in the picture and that it was actually "another detainee, named Saad, whose full name is being withheld by Salon to protect his identity." The magazine cited Army documents and confirmation by a spokesman for the Army's Criminal Investigation Command.

Salon Editor Joan Walsh said her organization raised questions after obtaining 279 photos taken inside Abu Ghraib along with other Army documents. "We thought, gee, let's check and see how this lines up with the documentation we had, and it really didn't," Walsh said. "We knew who the Army said that particular prisoner was," and it was not Qaissi.

The Times was hardly the only news organization to name Qaissi as the hooded prisoner, although its profile -- headlined "Symbol of Abu Ghraib Seeks to Spare Others His Nightmare" -- gave him considerable prominence. Vanity Fair, the PBS show "Now," Der Spiegel and the Italian news media have all identified Qaissi as "The Claw."

"We did not present this as a scoop," Chira said. After careful checking, "we came up with a lot of people who believed he was this guy" in the photo.

Walsh credited the Times for its response to Salon. "As a Times subscriber, I was happy they moved to at least try to correct the record so quickly," she said.

Abu Ghraib Dog Handler Case Goes To Jury (AP)

By David Dishneau

AP, March 18, 2006

A military jury began deliberating Friday in the case against an Army dog handler accused of using his barking animal to torment prisoners at Abu Ghraib for his own amusement.

Sgt. Michael Smith, 24, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., could get up to 24 1/2 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

The jury met for about six hours before going home. Deliberations were to resume Monday morning.

The government contended Smith and another canine handler competed to make terrified prisoners at the Iraqi prison soil themselves. The defense argued that Smith believed he was following orders in a chaotic and confusing environment.

An Army prosecutor, Maj. Christopher Graveline, said in his closing argument that Smith violated training on treating prisoners humanely and using the minimum amount of force necessary. Graveline showed the jury enlarged photographs from 2003 and 2004 of Smith's black Belgian shepherd menacing cowering detainees.

"American soldiers don't do that," Graveline said. "And we don't do it because we think it's fun. And we don't do it for our laughs. And we don't take pictures of it."

But defense attorney Capt. Mary G. McCarthy countered: "He's on trial for his life for things he did because he thought he was supposed to — things he did because there was a lack of clear guidance."

She said that all Smith's dog did to prisoners was bark at them. One witness' testimony that the dog appeared to have nipped a prisoner's wrist was not corroborated.

Smith told investigators that he and Sgt. Santos A. Cardona used their unmuzzled dogs to help military intelligence interrogators. Cardona, 31, of Fullerton, Calif., is to stand trial May 22.

Testimony in the trial revealed conflicting notions among prison workers about how dogs were supposed to be used and what the approval process was.

Abu Ghraib's former military intelligence chief, Col. Thomas M. Pappas, testified that the dogs were to be used "to assist in setting conditions for interrogations." Pappas said that he approved a one-time use of muzzled dogs inside interrogation booths but later learned he lacked the authority to give such an order.

Military Investigating Deaths Of 15 Iraqis (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, March 18, 2006

The military will investigate allegations of potential misconduct by Marines during a bombing and firefight last November that left 15 Iraqi civilians dead, a top U.S. commander in Iraq said Friday.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the number two U.S. commander in Iraq, said that after a preliminary review of the incident he directed a criminal investigation into whether the Marines violated the rules of military engagement.

"We take these allegations of potential misconduct seriously and they will be thoroughly investigated. I really can't comment any further on this incident because of the ongoing investigation," said Chiarelli, who made the first public statements about the investigation Friday while speaking from Iraq to Pentagon reporters.

About a dozen Marines are being investigated for possible war crimes in connection with the November 2005 bombing and subsequent firefight between Marines and insurgents that led to the deaths of the Iraqi citizens. The 15 Iraqi civilians were initially reported killed by a roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0019443

Chiarelli said allegations of possible violations were brought to the attention of the military by a reporter in mid-February. He has referred the matter to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

Fifteen Iraqis, eight insurgents and a Marine were killed during the Nov. 19 firefight, which began when a roadside bomb detonated next to a joint Iraqi-U.S. squad patrolling Haditha, about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad. Immediately after the explosion, insurgents attacked the patrol with small arms.

The Marine killed was assigned to Regimental Combat Team 2 of the 2nd Marine Division; two other Marines were wounded. Defense officials would not identify the unit or Marines involved in the investigation. While several Iraqis were part of the patrol, they are not involved in the investigation, the official said.

Military officials will try to determine whether the Marines followed the international law of armed conflict, including whether they positively identified or tried to identify the enemy and whether they determined there was hostile intent, as they are supposed to do.

The law regulates international military operations, and anyone found in violation can be held liable for war crimes and be court-martialed under the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

It is not uncommon for insurgents to launch attacks from homes, hospitals and other public buildings, where civilians can get caught in the crossfire.

The official said the investigation is not focused on any one individual. About a dozen Marines were involved in the incident.

As the Iraq war ends its third year, estimates vary on civilian casualties. President Bush has said he thinks at least 30,000 Iraqis had been killed as of December, while some researchers put the number at 50,000 or more.

More than 2,300 U.S. military personnel have died, but the Pentagon does not release a tally of civilian or insurgent deaths.

U.S. To Investigate Civilian Deaths In Iraq (KRT)

By Drew Brown

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - Naval investigators are looking into whether Marines intentionally killed 15 Iraqi civilians - four of them women and five of them children - during fighting last November, defense officials said Friday.

One official said it's unclear whether the Marines killed the civilians accidentally or whether they fired indiscriminately. It's also unclear whether all the civilians died in the same house or in separate locations. Among the dead was a 15-year-old girl, an official said.

The investigation will examine how the Marines determined hostile intent during the firefight and whether they attempted to positively identify their targets before firing, the official said.

Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, the ground commander of U.S. and coalition forces in Iraq, said he ordered the investigation to determine what happened during a firefight on Nov. 19, 2005, after insurgents exploded a bomb near a Marine convoy in the insurgent stronghold of Haditha, in western Iraq.

A U.S. military press release issued the next day said that one Marine and 15 Iraqi civilians died in the blast and that eight insurgents were killed in an ensuing firefight.

Chiarelli said he ordered an initial fact-finding investigation on Feb. 14 after a news reporter in Iraq raised allegations of possible wrongdoing by the Marines.

Chiarelli said he ordered the second investigation on March 9. That was after the preliminary inquiry found that the civilians didn't die in the blast, but were killed in the firefight that followed, according to the two defense officials familiar with the investigation.

"We take these allegations of potential misconduct seriously, and they will be thoroughly investigated," Chiarelli said, speaking from Iraq by teleconference to reporters at the Pentagon.

The Navy's Criminal Investigative Service is conducting the probe.

The Navy's investigation will seek to answer whether the Marines killed the civilians accidentally or whether the killings were deliberate, said one of the defense officials. The two officials asked not to be named because they weren't authorized to comment on specifics of the case.

CNN reported the first details of the investigation late Thursday.

Marines from the 2nd Marine Division's Regimental Combat Team 2 were traveling in a four-Humvee convoy through Haditha on Nov. 19 when an improvised explosive device went off, according to one of the officials. Lance Cpl. Miguel Tarrazas, 20, of El Paso, Texas, was killed in the blast.

The explosion was the first of five blasts and coordinated small-arms attacks that hit the Marines over the next five hours. They stopped only after U.S. warplanes dropped two bombs on suspected insurgents, an official said. Haditha, which is about 140 miles northwest of Baghdad, is an insurgent stronghold and has been the scene of frequent attacks on U.S. troops in the past three years.

DOJ_NMG_0019444

After the initial blast, a gun battle developed in which a squad of 12 to 15 Marines pursued the insurgents from house to house, with civilians inside apparently caught in the crossfire.

The incident isn't the first time that U.S. forces have been accused of killing unarmed civilians in Iraq. During the siege of the insurgent stronghold of Fallujah in November 2004, a television cameraman recorded a Marine shooting and killing an unarmed Iraqi who'd been wounded during the fierce fighting. The Marine was later cleared of any wrongdoing.

The two officials who asked not to be identified said that the squad that's under investigation in the present case is from the same unit, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, that was involved in the 2004 incident.

Casualty Of War (NSWK)

By Robina Riccitiello With Martha Brant and Karen Breslau

Newsweek, March 18, 2006

Damaged brains are emerging as the singular injury of the Iraq conflict. A soldier's story.

Sam Reyes remembers nothing of the suicide bomb attack on a highway outside Fallujah that nearly killed him on the morning of Sept. 6, 2004. Perhaps it's just as well. When medics arrived at the site of the attack, which left 12 Marines dead, they found Reyes sprawled on the road in desperate condition: his arms, back and head were pierced by shrapnel; his left arm was ripped open to the muscle; his stomach and spleen had been sliced; his ribs were broken, his face was badly burned and his tongue had been cut in half.

In the helicopter on the way to a military hospital in Baghdad, the medical team had to defibrillate his heart to keep him alive. Over the next 18 months, during an agonizing recovery, the young Marine gunner underwent several operations and lost 45 pounds. Although his physical wounds have largely healed—save for scattered scars across his forehead and his sense of taste, which has yet to return—the bomb blast left Reyes, now 21, with a less visible, but devastating injury to his brain. Like many Iraq vets who survive the concussive force of an improvised explosive device, or IED, Reyes is now sometimes unable to recognize his friends or family, to recall what he just read or heard, to concentrate or to read faster than the average second-grader. " I feel kind of odd when I see people and they say, 'Oh, you don't remember me'," says Reyes. "And I say, 'No, I don't.' They'll say, 'Remember, we did this and that when we were younger.' And I go, 'Oh, yeah.' It kind of makes me feel bad."

Like more than 1,700 military personnel wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan in recent years, Marine Cpl. Samuel Reyes Jr. is suffering from traumatic brain injury, known in military jargon as TBI, which leaves survivors unable to perform the most basic cognitive functions. According to officials at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, TBI affects more than 25 percent of bomb-blast survivors like Sam Reyes, making it the signature injury of the Iraq war. In fact, military officials say that were it not for advances in body armor, helmets and drastically improved battlefield medicine, the majority of survivors being treated for TBI would not have even survived their injuries as recently as the first gulf war 15 years ago. The increasing number of TBI survivors and the vexing limitations they face has become an enormous challenge for both military medicine and for the Department of Veterans Affairs, which will treat these survivors for life. "In the military, the question is 'are you battle ready?'" says Dr. Harriet Zeiner, a clinical neuropsychologist for the VA in Palo Alto, Calif., where Reyes is being treated. "Our criteria at the VA [are], are you going to be able to hold down a job, sustain a relationship, get married, have kids or do you have something that's going to impair you?"

For Reyes, and hundreds of others suffering from TBI, the answers to these questions are still far from clear. The diffuse but debilitating symptoms of traumatic brain injury—which sometimes are not apparent until months after the bomb blast—can leave veterans with festering psychological problems and anger that often lead to failed relationships and careers, substance-abuse problems and the inability to adapt to civilian life. Many TBI patients, like Reyes, are also suffering from posttraumatic stress syndrome (PTSD), a psychological condition affecting many combat veterans and other trauma survivors that is marked by flashbacks, nightmares, anxiety and irritability. The combination of TBI and PTSD, says the VA's Zeiner, "is pretty deadly." Reyes suffered damage to the frontal lobe of his brain, the area that helps a person calm himself after a stressful or frightening experience and where problem-solving takes place. When Reyes becomes anxious, he quickly escalates to a state of agitation. It's not uncommon, says Zeiner, for those suffering from TBI and PTSD to "either drink themselves into a stupor," in an effort to self-medicate, or to become agoraphobic, afraid to go out where they may have to contend with overwhelming stimuli.

In the months after his injury, Reyes tried over and over again to qualify for combat duty and return to Iraq. The first three times, he wasn't strong enough to run and do the pullups required to demonstrate his fitness for duty. On the last two attempts, Reyes passed the physical tests, but knee pain, stomach problems and the increasing effects of the brain injury kept him confined to barracks at Camp Pendleton, near San Diego. While other members of his unit, the First Marine Division, Second Battalion Fox Company weapons platoon, returned from Iraq in October 2004 and went back to work at Camp Pendleton, Reyes lived in limbo for nearly a year. "I never had to get dressed. I didn't have to go to work," says Reyes. "They wouldn't want me to have a 'brain-injury moment'." He spent his days in the barracks watching movies and playing videogames to make the time pass and seeing a doctor for his memory problems and nightmares. He began to drink heavily. In June 2005, Reyes was examined by a civilian doctor who recognized signs of traumatic brain injury, and he was transferred almost immediately to the VA's specialized brain-injury unit in Palo Alto.

DOJ_NMG_0019445

At the Palo Alto center, one of four VA facilities around the country with a specialized TBI unit, Reyes began the frustrating process of retraining the damaged memory center of his brain. All the brain-injury patients in Palo Alto are issued handheld computers, which the staff jokingly calls "brain prosthetics." Reyes sets the alarm on his twice a day in order to remember to check his to-do list. He began keeping a journal to try to spur his memory. Another device, a Franklin electronic dictionary, pronounces words to help rebuild his vocabulary while reading. It recently took Reyes a month and a half to read "Jarhead," the memoir of a Marine sniper. Before his injury, he says would have read the same book in a day or two. In his lighter moments, Reyes, who hopes to attend college on the G.I. bill, quips that Dr. Seuss's "Green Eggs and Ham" is about his speed now.

The brain damage also has painful emotional consequences. His family members were shocked that he often couldn't remember their faces. Sometimes a voice will help him remember. Other times an object can prod his memory. One buddy gave him a football to remind Reyes of his high-school football career in Houston, where he grew up. Tossing the football can bring back specific memories of plays he used to run and hits he made. Other times, it's harder to remember. If a therapist reads him a two-line story about a mom and dad going to the store and the purchases they made, he'll say, "Who went to the store?" Reyes says, "It gets kind of annoying." When he watches movies, he tends to forget by the end what happened in the beginning.

Soon after he arrived at the brain-injury center, Reyes's doctors began trying to convince him to go for treatment at the VA's PTSD center in nearby Menlo Park, where Vietnam veterans work side by side with active-duty Marines and soldiers, trying to find ways to deal with the lingering trauma of their respective wars. At first, Reyes resisted, worried that his fellow Marines might think he was weak. Meeting the other men in the PTSD treatment center had a big impact on him. "Some of them are real tough, big guys, real smart, and that made me feel better. It showed me I wasn't the only one in the whole world who would have it." Reyes says his fellow Marines who haven't gotten help are suffering. "I tried to let some guys know who I thought could use help, and they said, 'Nah, I don't need that. I take sleep medicine and I drink, so I'm doing pretty good'." Although the Marine Corps is sending some mental-health workers into the field, Reyes says he didn't have any discussions about combat-related stress. He got a brochure about PTSD at one point, but says it didn't explain the symptoms. "It scares me that all these guys could be just like me, having the same problems, and they're getting ready to ruin a whole lot of their life."

As the population of wounded Iraq veterans increases, the military is also trying to raise awareness about TBI, especially the less severe cases like Reyes's, which can easily be misdiagnosed or overlooked in the chaos of battlefield medicine. The Defense Department is developing a training course for medics to teach them how to screen for TBI in the field. Any injured combatant who has lost consciousness is a candidate for TBI diagnosis. The military is also making plans to station a TBI expert at medical facility in Germany where the U.S. wounded are first evacuated after leaving Iraq. "I'm sure people do get misdiagnosed , says Dr. Warren Lux, deputy director of the Defense and Veterans Brain Injury Center at Walter Reed. "That is why we are trying to get education out there."

For now, the 6-foot-3 Reyes fills his days with volleyball and basketball, group-therapy sessions, meditation and recreational therapy at the VA's Residential Rehabilitation Program in Menlo Park. Being so close to the civilian world has exposed him to painful criticism of the war. "It kind of hurts that I lost a lot of friends and I got injured," he says. "I guess that's what freedom of speech is for." Someday, he hopes the Iraqi children who once enthusiastically greeted Reyes and his fellow Marines will appreciate their sacrifices. In the meantime, Reyes is working on putting his own life back together. Later this year, he plans to marry, and before long, to attend college. First though, he wants to learn once again to recognize his family members, especially his beloved 5-year-old brother who dressed up as a Marine for Halloween in honor of the injured big brother who struggles to remember his name.

The War Through A Father's Eyes (WP)

By H. Barry Holt

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

I cannot describe the relief I felt when our oldest son returned from war alive -- for the second time. He is an Army communications specialist, a job designed to support combat units in a mobile war. Although his first deployment to Iraq may have been inevitable, my wife and I were terrified when he received his orders, less than a year after he had enlisted as an uncertain and directionless 18-year-old and less than six months after basic training. Uncertain information from the Army meant we couldn't be there to see him board the plane to war. But we managed to be there the week before, full of parental stoicism and quiet terror demonstrated through hugs and tears.

DOJ_NMG_0019446

I generally accepted the reasons we went to war and worried about terrorism and weapons of mass destruction. Like many Americans, I believed that America had a moral duty to protect the oppressed of Iraq. But with my son in that war, my interest became much more parochial. Policy meant less than facts.

At first we heard nothing, then finally one short phone call from Kuwait told us he was safe and bored with waiting. I filled time between infrequent e-mails scouring the Internet for local newspapers showing pictures of his unit's equipment being shrink-wrapped and loaded on transport ships. Think-tank Web sites gave information about bases in western Iraq, where he was headed. I devoured bits of information he gave me through e-mail and telephone calls, and slowly his story unfolded. I shuddered when he described his terrifying 36-hour convoy race from Kuwait to Anbar province. His girlfriend told us (he tried to protect us from such news) about the attack on his convoy and his using his newly minted "expert" qualification on the SAW light machine gun to kill an attacking Iraqi soldier.

I anguished over his descriptions of random mortar attacks on his base, and I chastised him for volunteering for "shotgun" duty on missions conducted by the combat unit he supported. But hearing nothing for long periods was so much worse. I had persistent nightmares about improvised explosive devices, mortar rounds, snipers and accidents, knowing nothing but fearing the worst. Every report of an attack triggered frantic efforts to unearth the latest news, each time followed by guilty relief that my son was not hurt and by shame that I was relieved that someone else had died. But I cried every time I saw lists of casualties as I scoured the names for soldiers and Marines from his home base or our hometown. Now they were my children, too.

My fears escalated when he told me he was slightly wounded during a firefight, and his only reaction was annoyance that there would be no Purple Heart because an investigation revealed the cause was friendly fire. My heart broke when he told me about two friends who died in different accidents and about a sergeant he knew who was killed by a sniper. When he left Anbar on the convoy back to Kuwait, with improvised armor on his vehicle, I worried until he phoned after his safe arrival.

My son came home . . . alive.

Our visit after he returned was emotional and sweet. He had not changed much, but he was moody and uninterested in news about the war. During the next nine months, with another deployment expected, life became more urgent as he married and then fathered our first grandchild. Much of that immediate joy was denied him because he was in northern Iraq when his son was born. But our grandson is beautiful and will grow up proud of his father.

My son's second tour in Iraq was, in some ways, easier on us than the first. We knew more of what to expect, and my anxiety dulled to a continuous daily ache. He complained to me about boredom -- and I celebrated! "A little boredom is a good thing, enjoy it," I would tell him. But with youthful impatience, he longed for more action.

Although the second deployment generally was less stressful, we were confused and angry at the Army when he asked us to buy ammo pouches and other military accessories that weren't issued to him. His convoy to northern Iraq was nerve-wracking and dangerous, but he made it safely. His base was more developed than it was in Anbar, but mortar and rocket-propelled grenade attacks continued, and some fell perilously close. Our persistent worry resurfaced. But he survived all of that and finally flew back home safely.

My view of the war hasn't changed. I am concerned about mistakes made and whether it will be worth all the bloodshed. I wonder how long the troops will remain -- will my son have to go back? Even though our thoughts are full of visits with son, daughter-in-law and grandson, in the back of my mind the worry persists. Rumors are that his unit will return to Iraq next fall. Will he survive?

Anxiety resurrects itself each time I see casualty lists, and I still cry over each soldier's death. I am one with all the parents who lie sleepless every night worrying over their soldier children. Their children are still my children, and that feeling will never end. We are U.S Army and Marine parents, proud of all our sons and daughters who protect this country. But they have seen far too much for people so young, and I don't want any of them to die.

My son is home and alive. He has done his duty and I don't want him to go back.

The writer lives in Arlington.

Was The War Worth It? (TIME)

By David Kennedy

Time, March 16, 2006

As the third anniversary of the beginning of the Iraq War approaches, TIME asked leading thinkers around the world to weigh in on the question at the heart of the ongoing debate about the controversial conflict.

This is the first installment of a feature that will appear in the forthcoming issue of TIME.

No. From the outset the war was a colossally bold and breathtakingly risky gamble. Unfortunately, and unsurprisingly, the United States has failed to beat the odds. Forget about WMDs and links to al-Queda as rationales for the war. The real purpose for invading Iraq was the extravagant ambition to transform the political culture of the entire Middle East. The Bush administration bet American might and good intentions against the accumulated weight of centuries of religious rivalry, tribal tensions, wanton bloodletting, and authoritarian rule. Even American hyper-power has proved no match for the burden of all that sorry history.

DOJ_NMG_0019447

Hisham Kassem, Egyptian democracy activist:

Sadly, I have to say yes. It is difficult to commend such a bloody scene. But it achieved something useful. Parallel to the chaos and bloodshed, there is a political process evolving in Iraq. Bloodshed is the price of the transition from Saddam's psychopathic dictatorship. The losses would have been higher had Saddam stayed on. You could easily see that regime lasting for another 30 years, under his sons and top generals. Negotiating with Iraq was not an option. There had to be a military intervention. You have a block of 22 countries in the Arab world dominated by authoritarianism and dictatorship. It is not a block you could engage politically and pressure for reform. By military intervention, the U.S. is able to pressure the region into the reforms we are beginning to see across the region that might avert many countries from becoming failed states. The world cannot put up with state failure in the back yard of the world's oil fields, Israel and Europe.

Lawrence B. Wilkerson, Colonel, U.S. Army (ret.); former chief of staff for Secretary of State Colin Powell:

No. I'm principally a strategist and from that perspective the war has been a disaster. First, the foremost winner has been Iran: it rid itself of its greatest threat, Saddam Hussein and his military, without firing a shot; won the December 15 Iraq elections; owns the south, particularly Basra; and has felt the freedom to elect Mahmoud Amadinejad who, in turn, has felt the freedom to reclaim leadership of radical Islam, leadership Osama bin Laden claimed on 9/11. Second, the foremost loser, after Iraq itself, has been Israel, whose leaders must now fear more than ever before the new strategic maneuver room afforded Iran by America's ineptitude. Third, the general war against global terrorists has been affected greatly by the failure in Iraq. Recruiting among Muslim ranks has been aided significantly, while America has squandered the upper hand in the world of ideas, which is the real battlefield of this conflict. Lastly, if our failure in Iraq produces regional conflict, we will find ourselves expending far greater blood and treasure to stabilize the situation once it gets completely out of hand. And the odds that it will get completely out of hand if we continue on the present course are quite high.

Tommy Franks, General, U.S. Army (ret.); as chief of U.S. Central Command, Franks oversaw the invasion and the three months following it, until his retirement on July 7, 2003:

Yes. America remains very proud of, and very thankful to our sons and daughters serving in Iraq and around the world in the cause of freedom. The events of 9-11-01 taught us a valuable lesson.... ignoring terrorism will not make the problem go away. The sacrifices of our military members and their families are giving Iraqis a chance for freedom. And a free Iraq serves not only Iraqis... it will stand as a model in the Middle East. A model that represents to millions of people that there is an alternative to terrorism.

Taliban Rebels Team Up With Drug Barons (WT/AFP)

By Emmanuel Duparcq, Agence France-presse

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

LASHKARGAH, Afghanistan -- Taliban rebels determined to keep southern Afghanistan in chaos have teamed up with drug barons against the government and its opium eradication campaign, officials say.

The campaign to destroy opium poppy fields was begun March 8 in southern Helmand, the producer of most of Afghanistan's opium crop -- which makes up nearly 90 percent of the world total -- and also one of the provinces worst-hit by a Taliban-led insurgency.

"Terrorists and narcotics are very close; they're supporting each other," said Helmand province Gov. Muhammad Daud. "When narcotics production is up, terrorism automatically goes up."

Lt. Col. Henry Worsley of the 3,500 British forces deployed in the province agreed. "Taliban and drugs feed each other. You cannot separate them here."

In their final two years in power, before they were toppled in a U.S.-led invasion in late 2001, the Taliban banned opium and succeeded in drastically slashing its production to 185 tons from 3,300 tons.

Some observers say their motivation was to win international favor. Others say they wanted to push up the price of the raw ingredient of heroin.

Four years later, the Taliban rebels are willing to protect opium crops and farmers against the new administration in Kabul. The United States and other Western countries, which see opium as a source of terrorist funding, are pressuring the government led by President Hamid Karzai to eradicate the crop.

Several anonymous letters attributed to the Taliban have been distributed in the past few months in Helmand and other insurgency-infested provinces that threaten farmers with reprisals if they do not plant opium, residents said.

Some letters also offer protection against government eradication attempts.

DOJ_NMG_0019448

"Taliban will try to disrupt the eradication campaign," said the Helmand governor who has vowed to remove all the opium from his province in two months.

"Eradication will cause fighting," said Mohammed Sardar, an official from the nongovernmental group Mercy Corps that is trying to persuade opium farmers to switch to other crops.

"Poor farmers won't fight, but Taliban and smugglers will," he said.

DOJ:

Justice Lawyer Named Interim U.S. Attorney (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 18, 2006

Chuck Rosenberg, a veteran Justice Department lawyer serving as the top federal prosecutor in Houston, will take over the high-profile chief prosecutor's job in Alexandria, Va.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday named Rosenberg the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. He replaces Paul McNulty, who was confirmed by the Senate late Thursday as deputy attorney general.

Rosenberg, 45, will be in charge of the office that is seeking the death penalty against Zacarias Moussaoui and has prosecuted other terrorism cases.

Rosenberg served as the chief of staff to then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey when Comey reportedly raised objections to aspects of the National Security Agency's warrantless eavesdropping program.

Alexandria Federal Prosecutor Sworn In (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Job Likely to Be Made Permanent

A veteran prosecutor with experience in Northern Virginia was appointed yesterday as interim U.S. attorney in Alexandria, one of the highest-profile federal prosecutor's jobs in the country, the Justice Department announced.

Chuck Rosenberg, 45, was sworn in last night before U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III. President Bush intends to nominate Rosenberg for the job permanently, but it was unclear when that would occur, officials familiar with the selection process said.

Rosenberg, the interim U.S. attorney in Houston and a former federal prosecutor in Alexandria, succeeds Paul J. McNulty, who was sworn in yesterday as deputy attorney general after being confirmed by the U.S. Senate. McNulty had been U.S. attorney in Alexandria since 2001.

The Alexandria U.S. attorney's job has always been considered a law enforcement plum, and it grew increasingly visible after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks as the Justice Department made McNulty's office a central front in terrorism prosecutions. The office won a guilty plea from Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person convicted in a U.S. courtroom on charges stemming from Sept. 11, and is now trying to convince a jury to execute him.

Other prominent cases in Alexandria have included the prosecutions of John Walker Lindh, a Californian convicted of fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, and of a group of Muslim men convicted of training overseas for holy war against the United States. The office also has been known to handle highly publicized espionage cases such as the Aldrich H. Ames and Robert P. Hanssen cases.

Rosenberg declined to comment last night on the selection process.

Law enforcement sources have said Rosenberg was the favored candidate to replace McNulty in part because his selection would provide continuity in terrorism prosecutions and national security. A Justice Department news release yesterday said Rosenberg has focused on counterterrorism, counterintelligence and national security matters in recent years.

He has held the Houston post for nine months and previously served in a variety of high-profile jobs at the Justice Department and the FBI in Washington. They included chief of staff for Deputy Attorney General James B. Comey, counselor to then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft and counsel to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III.

In the 1990s, Rosenberg worked as a prosecutor in Alexandria and Richmond and specialized in financial fraud crimes, violent crimes and espionage cases.

The U.S. attorney's office in Alexandria serves the eastern half of Virginia, including all of Northern Virginia and Richmond, Norfolk and Newport News.

DOJ_NMG_0019449

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Two Cheers For Nancy Pelosi (WSJ)

By Mallory Factor

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Have America's entrepreneurs and corporate leaders found a new voice of regulatory sanity in, of all people, Nancy Pelosi? Apparently so, and that should be a wake-up call to Republicans -- because like everything else in the free market, the free enterprise agenda is up for grabs. In the recent "Innovation Agenda" that the House Democratic leader and her party unveiled, Ms. Pelosi acknowledges specifically the need to "ensure Sarbanes-Oxley requirements are not overly burdensome," and endorses reform. Meanwhile, the scourge of Wall Street, New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, is criticizing Sarbanes-Oxley's "unbelievable burden on small companies" and its possible role in "preventing some initial public offerings."

Ms. Pelosi and other Democrats have been quicker to recognize what many traditional champions of free enterprise have been slow to see: the law's disastrous consequences for our nation's ability to compete. Congress passed this law hastily in 2002 after the egregious accounting frauds at Enron and WorldCom. The intent was to hold publicly held companies and their executives more accountable and weed out bad actors; but that's not been the effect. Four years after passage, it is now evident that the costs of Sarbox clearly outweigh the benefits.

Consider first the costs. Recent estimates from the American Electronic Association, for example, show that U.S. companies are spending $35 billion annually simply to comply with the law as opposed to original federal estimates of $1.2 billion. A University of Nebraska study found that audit fees for Fortune 1000 companies, on average, increased a staggering 103% from 2003 to 2004. The costs of being a U.S. public company are now more than triple what they were before the law passed, according to a study conducted by the Milwaukee-based law firm of Foley & Lardner. Some smaller firms report that they are spending 300% more on Sarbox compliance than on health care for their employees.

Based on a growing body of theoretical and empirical research, the SEC's Advisory Committee on Smaller Public Companies concluded that Sarbox places a disproportionate compliance burden on small public companies, making it more difficult for them to compete with foreign companies and to a lesser extent with larger U.S. companies. Consider the survey by the American Electronics Association, which found that companies with sales of $100 million and under are spending 2.6% of their revenues on Sarbox compliance -- enough to tip many of them from profitability into unprofitability. This makes it something of a challenge for these companies to innovate, compete or grow -- or even survive.

As a result of these burdensome costs, enterprises are deciding not to go public, or else are opting to back out of our capital markets. Explaining his company's absorption into privately held Koch Industries, Peter Correll, the CEO of Georgia-Pacific, said, "There is a lot of time spent by top management on things that are not value-adding, but are simply bureaucratic and are required by a raft of regulation." In fact, the Foley & Lardner study found that 20% of public companies are considering going private just to avoid Sarbox compliance. It's no wonder, then, that the London Stock Exchange -- eager to exploit a competitive advantage -- now promotes itself by reminding companies that by listing on the LSE they are not subject to Sarbox.

Beyond the direct cost of compliance to individual companies, a recent University of Rochester study concluded that the total effect of the law has reduced the stock value of American companies by $1.4 trillion. That is $1.4 trillion that could be invested in infrastructure improvements, jobs, innovative technologies or research and development. As Sun Microsystems CEO Scott McNealy says, Sarbanes-Oxley throws "buckets of sand into the gears of the market economy."

The true beneficiaries of Sarbox are the nation's large auditing firms, which now maintain a regulatory oligarchy composed of a handful of entrenched services corporations. They will continue to champion Sarbox, since it provides a guaranteed market for their services. Surely this law was not intended by its authors to become a full employment act for the same auditing industry which was implicated in the original malfeasance of four or five years ago.

Sarbox highlighted the importance of financial transparency and management integrity. And those in the corporate world who break the law should be punished. They are: Over 700 prosecutions have been launched since 2002 to address corporate crimes. Nevertheless, not one conviction was a result of Sarbox. Meanwhile, Sarbox clearly failed to prevent the massive accounting scandal at Fannie Mae.

On top of everything else, the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board (PCAOB), which is central to the operation of the law, violates the separation of powers principle and the federal Constitution's Appointments Clause -- which is why the Free Enterprise Fund has joined with a team of legal experts to challenge the PCAOB's constitutionality. Since the Sarbanes-Oxley law is not severable, the result would be to throw out the entire law.

DOJ_NMG_0019450

The PCAOB performs an executive branch function, but the president does not have the authority to appoint or remove members of the board; they're appointed by the SEC in consultation with the chairman of the Federal Reserve and the secretary of the Treasury, and may be removed only by the SEC. In short, PCAOB is not accountable to any elected official or the citizens. It therefore violates the Appointments Clause (Article II, Section 2) of the U.S. Constitution, which calls for appointment by the president with the "advice and consent" of the Senate -- not the SEC.

American financial markets have long been at the center of economic growth, innovation and world commerce. Unfortunately, Sarbanes-Oxley is undermining our financial markets; and in its current form it is also unconstitutional. For the sake of the free enterprise system and America's prosperity, I hope that the desires of Ms. Pelosi and Mr. Spitzer to reform this well-intentioned, but misguided attempt at reform will soon be joined by many others in Congress -- and in the Bush administration.

Mr. Factor is the chairman of the Free Enterprise Fund.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Prosecutor Opposes Libby Motion To Dismiss (AP)

AP, March 18, 2006

Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald on Friday disputed the claim of Vice President Dick Cheney's former top aide that the prosecutor lacks legal authority to indict him in the CIA leak investigation.

Fitzgerald opposed the move of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby asking a judge to dismiss the five-count indictment against him in the Valerie Plame affair. In court papers, the prosecutor argued that being allowed to operate outside any control of the Justice Department is constitutional and in accordance with federal law.

The prosecutor, who is investigating the disclosure of Plame's CIA undercover status, is not supervised by the Justice Department and he is not required to inform anyone at the department about the investigation's progress.

In a court filing in February, Libby said that only Congress could approve such an arrangement.

"The attorney general may delegate powers but he may not abdicate responsibility," Libby's lawyers wrote.

Fitzgerald replied that the attorney general has been granted broad legal authority by Congress "to delegate any of his functions to other offices of the Department of Justice."

Fitzgerald is the U.S. attorney in Chicago. He was appointed in December 2003 by then-Deputy Attorney General James Comey. John Ashcroft, the attorney general at the time, recused himself from the matter because of a conflict.

Fitzgerald obtained an indictment of Libby on five counts of perjury, obstruction and lying to the FBI.

Charges Against Cowles Dropped (WP)

By Cecilia Kang

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

U.S. Court Clears Local Executive

Charges have been dropped against Northern Virginia businessman Frank L. Cowles Jr., who was arrested in November on allegations of conspiring to defraud a hedge fund out of $25 million.

A U.S. District Court judge in Chicago dropped criminal charges against Cowles on March 1 after the U.S. attorney's office there filed a motion to dismiss. Cases continue against two men who were charged with Cowles for allegedly defrauding a Chicago-based fund.

From his horse farm in Scottsville, Va., Cowles, an attorney and former board chairman of Arlington-based Virginia Commerce Bank, said he was "ebullient" that the charges were dismissed.

"For someone who has been absolutely clean and honorable all my life, the charges came as quite a blow," Cowles, 76, said in a telephone interview.

"The only thing I've ever had on my record is three speeding tickets when I was 18," he said. "After a very, very exhaustive 3 1/2 -month investigation, they came up with the right conclusion."

Cowles's attorney, Robert D. Luskin of the law firm Patton Boggs in the District, said the complaint against Cowles was a mistake and that his client had been the victim of a scheme that cost him a great financial loss.

"This was a mistake," Luskin said. "The person that was thought to be the predator was actually the prey."

The two men still facing prosecution in the case are accused by prosecutors of wire fraud. Richard E. Warren of Fredericksburg, who has pleaded not guilty, was indicted and detained. A complaint against David L. Myatt of Los Banos, Calif., is pending.

DOJ_NMG_0019451

Cowles said he lost "millions of dollars" from his dealings with Warren.

After his arrest, Cowles resigned as a director of Virginia Commerce Bank. He owns two car dealerships in Woodbridge and raises Brangus cattle and Arabian horses on his Scottsville farm. The decision to drop charges against him was reported yesterday by the Washington Business Journal.

Enron Trial Approaches Halfway Point (AP)

By Kristen Hays, Ap Business Writer

AP, March 18, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-The fraud and conspiracy trial of Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling is reaching its halfway mark: Seven weeks, 15 prosecution witnesses and more to come.

Yet for all the government's methodical efforts to show through documents, video and audio tapes and those witnesses' memories of how the former corporate titans repeatedly lied about the disgraced company's financial health, the jury's conclusion may hinge on what the defendants say if they testify as expected.

The government has already brought on its highly anticipated witnesses. This past week started with former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow's fourth and last day on the stand. Fastow, an admitted liar and thief, hid none of his own culpability as he said he helped Lay and Skilling lie about Enron's financial health.

The week wrapped with Sherron Watkins, the former vice president hailed as a hero by Congress for warning Lay of impending financial disaster months before the company crashed, denting Lay's claim that he believed the company was strong at the time.

Yet a conviction is far from a foregone conclusion.

"It's the difference between legitimate spinning and impermissible lying," Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor who has followed the trial, said of what will likely drive the outcome of the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals.

"In a case like this, if Lay or Skilling or both take the stand, it becomes almost a new trial in the sense that jurors will either believe them or disbelieve them," Mintz said.

The government's "brick by brick" approach is living up to expectations of putting together a puzzle without betting all on a single witness, said Michael Wynne, another former federal prosecutor in Houston who has observed much of the trial.

Even Fastow, who has been vilified for stealing millions and running scams that helped fuel the company's 2001 collapse, isn't the government's linchpin - and his public excoriation through brutal cross-examination provided plenty of drama, Wynne said.

Lay has said repeatedly he will testify - most recently in a speech to Houston business and academic leaders more than a month before the trial commenced. Lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli told jurors during his opening statement his client would do the same.

Both can change their minds, particularly if they decide the government's case is weak and they don't need to subject themselves to bruising cross-examination.

"If they testify, and we've been promised that, it is going to be one for the ages," Wynne said.

The government contends that Lay and Skilling repeatedly spouted ebullient optimism about Enron's financial strength when they allegedly knew accounting tricks propped up weak ventures and hid losses.

The defendants counter that there was no fraud at Enron, they did nothing wrong, and scathing publicity along with diminished market confidence pushed the company into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Prosecutors said they expect to wrap up their case by the last week of March. Then the defense gets its turn, and the government can have the last word with rebuttal witnesses.

"We'll probably end before the end of April," U.S. District Judge Sim Lake told jurors this past week, indicating that both sides may have severely whittled their cases in a trial that had been expected to last four months or more.

So far, Mintz said, "The government has done a very solid job and the defense has done its job as well.

"The government had its witnesses well prepared, but as with all witnesses, there are certain vulnerabilities that can't be avoided and the defense did an excellent job of highlighting those for the jury. Those who cut deals can't run from those deals. Those who have lied previously can't deny it," he said.

Wynne said both sides "are trying to arm individual jurors who may be leaning their way with arguments or examples to pull out during jury deliberations."

So far, seven ex-Enron executives who pleaded guilty to crimes have testified. Two other cooperators who haven't been charged with crimes - one who paid half a million dollars to settle regulatory allegations of manipulating Enron's books and another who obtained an immunity deal - also spoke from the witness chair.

DOJ_NMG_0019452

Of the rest, three were ex-executives who said they unearthed alarming financial problems and voiced concerns to no avail; two were rank-and-file Enron workers who lost their jobs and retirement savings when the company collapsed; and one is an accountant still employed by what is left of Enron who explained how the company once developed spending and profit plans to meet earnings goals.

In the coming week, prosecutors aim to present two former Arthur Andersen LLP accountants who once audited Enron's books; a credit rating analyst for Standard & Poors; and Ben Glisan Jr., the former Enron treasurer who pleaded guilty to conspiracy for creating financial structures to cook the company's books and is serving the five-year maximum prison term for his crime.

The cooperators provide an inside view and admit they participated in string of lies. Those like Watkins who voiced concerns demonstrate that top executives had access to negative financial information that contradicted rosy public statements. The victims provide a human view of what ex-workers lost when the company crumbled.

The ex-Andersen accountants are expected to testify that Enron hid the true nature of transactions to get their approvals, and the credit rating analyst is expected to say Enron's investment grade rating assumed the company's financial disclosures were accurate.

The defense teams have consistently challenged credibility of cooperators, indicating they succumbed to government pressure to plead guilty and hope for a lenient sentence rather than risk a trial. Some were likable, others weren't, but whether jurors believe them is paramount, Wynne said.

"It's not a question of whether you want to bring them home for dinner or if you like them," he said. "It's whether or not they are providing evidence that tends to prove up the counts in the indictment. You've got to put them on the stand and you've got to tell the whole story."

In Enron Trial, Witnesses' Quirks And Stamina Are On The Stand (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

HOUSTON, March 16 -- When former Enron Corp. executive Sherron Watkins took the witness stand Wednesday, she spoke confidently of the failings of her former bosses, chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling and chairman Kenneth L. Lay.

The media-savvy Watkins, who won plaudits from Congress and the public for her warnings that the Houston company would collapse, volunteered opinions about everything from accounting strategy to board members she called inept.

But on cross-examination, defense lawyers took one of Watkins's apparent strengths -- her outspokenness -- and turned it against her.

Ron Woods, a lawyer for Skilling, asked whether Watkins had developed a reputation at Enron for overheated judgments and for failing to listen, and Watkins more or less concurred.

"I found out my nickname was 'Buzzsaw,' " the witness said.

Seven weeks into the blockbuster fraud trial of Lay and Skilling, defense lawyers have tried to wear down the government's witnesses with questions tailored to exploit personality quirks, large or small. Cross-examination, after all, is a high-stakes game of endurance and amateur psychology -- a matter of finding a witness's Achilles' heel, that trait most likely to undermine their performances on the witness stand.

And, in this case, the defense has plenty of weapons at its disposal. "The fact is, the defense does have a somewhat unusual amount of material to cross-examine them with," said Washington criminal defense lawyer E. Lawrence Barcella Jr. of the Enron investigation, which generated countless articles and voluminous written reports from Congress, a bankruptcy examiner, the company's board and federal regulators.

The defense came out of the gate in February determined to test the endurance of the government's witnesses, many of them former executives who pleaded guilty and agreed to testify in exchange for reduced prison terms. Former investor relations chief Mark E. Koenig, the fraud trial's first witness, remained on the stand for eight days -- including five of protracted cross-examination in which a tired Koenig sometimes appeared to agree with the defense on certain points, if only to shorten his ordeal.

Questions to Kevin P. Hannon, a former official in Enron's high-speed-Internet unit who followed Koenig to the stand, appealed to the jury's sense of humor -- and Hannon's apparent lack of one.

Hannon delivered one of the most surprising bits of testimony so far -- saying under oath that Skilling uttered, "They're on to us," in a May 2001 meeting at which high-level executives discussed a research report suggesting that Enron's stock was overvalued. In a prosecution case built on subtle, indirect testimony, that quote resonated.

But Skilling lawyer Mark Holscher managed to diminish its impact. He underscored Hannon's stiff demeanor, repeatedly highlighting the witness's inability to react to a joke. Holscher suggested that Skilling often employed sarcasm to deride investors who bet that Enron's stock price would fall, implying that the "They're on to us" remark was a note of humor that everyone else in the room picked up but Hannon.

DOJ_NMG_0019453

"Do you recall Mr. Skilling making reference to the Mr. Bill segment on 'Saturday Night Live'? The gag routine with Mr. Bill, 'Ooooh, noooo, Mr. Bill'?" Holscher asked.

No, Hannon replied solemnly.

"You're a rather tightly wound, intense person aren't you, Mr. Hannon?" the smiling defense lawyer said.

Taking a different tack, Skilling's lawyer Daniel M. Petrocelli hammered away at former investor relations official and corporate secretary Paula H. Rieker last month. Rieker is a controlled, impeccably dressed woman who spent most of her questioning by prosecutors smiling, nodding and speaking directly to the jury in calm tones. But she was rattled and blinked repeatedly after Petrocelli pounded at exhibits in a notebook in front of her and stood directly beside her, invading her space until she asked him, with a chill in her voice, to step back to the podium.

The defense lawyer later turned the moment into a joke, asking the witness rather than the judge if he might "approach." Rieker granted him permission, but she had lost some of the confidence that characterized her earlier performance on the stand.

"Sometimes it's not what you get a witness to say but how you get a jury to perceive a witness," said Chip Lewis, a lawyer for Lay who led the cross-examination of Watkins on Wednesday.

The Enron defendants are following a strategy similar to that of former HealthSouth Corp. founder Richard M. Scrushy, acquitted by a Birmingham jury last year of three dozen criminal charges related to a $2.7 billion accounting fraud. At Scrushy's urging, and armed with his insights about former colleagues, his lawyers vigorously went after five chief financial officers who testified against him. James Parkman, Scrushy's lawyer, goaded the government's star witness, William T. Owens, into demonstrating a formidable ego that once led him to call himself "the smartest man in the world." Jurors later said they discounted his testimony.

Houston trial lawyer Rusty Hardin, whose questions in a successful probate dispute over the estate of billionaire J. Howard Marshall II sparked his widow, model and reality-TV star Anna Nicole Smith, to lose her cool and holler, "Screw you, Rusty!" from the witness stand, has taken a softer approach when circumstances called for it.

For instance, sensing that a key witness did not believe he had really broken the law, the lawyer gently prodded auditor David B. Duncan to raise questions about his own guilt, to which he had pleaded, and by implication, that of his firm, Arthur Andersen LLP, in a 2002 obstruction-of-justice case. Jurors ultimately convicted Andersen, but the Supreme Court tossed out the verdict because of faulty jury instructions that struck at the heart of Hardin's argument: that no one had intended to commit a crime.

Cross-examination involves walking a delicate line between discrediting a witness and being too harsh and invoking sympathy from the jury, he said.

"You have to stay polite," Hardin said. "I want a jury to like me, because I want 'em to go back there and resolve the close issues in my favor. They're suspicious of lawyers to begin with. You don't want to be in a position of beating up on a cripple."

Despite scoring points on many of the government's 15 witnesses, lawyers for Skilling and Lay, who argued in opening statements that no major fraud occurred at Enron, have yet to get one of prosecutors' cooperating witnesses to recant the way Duncan did in the Andersen trial. And while they have raised questions about the motives and the truthfulness of former executives who pleaded guilty, they have met with less success in shaking them from assertions that at least two of Enron's core business units performed disastrously in the company's final years and that management was aware of the disasters at the same time Lay and Skilling were reassuring investors and employees that all was well.

And even as Skilling lawyer Ron Woods confronted Watkins with the prospect that her lucrative speech-making career could be cut short if jurors acquit the defendants, Watkins got the last word Wednesday afternoon.

"Sir, I speak on leadership failures," she said. "They remain failed business leaders."

Court Reverses Death Sentence Of L.A. Man (LAT)

By Kelly-anne Suarez, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

A federal appeals court on Friday overturned the death sentence of a Los Angeles man who avenged the loss of his therapist by murdering her husband.

The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld William Clark's conviction, which included murder, two counts of attempted murder, rape and arson. But the court said the judge had misled the jury about death penalty law. The court also said the California Supreme Court should have overturned the penalty during its review.

Ava Gawronski was counseling Clark, a 37-year-old Canoga Park underwriter, and his wife, but stopped treating him after he threatened to rape her in her office.

In January 1982, Clark set Gawronski's West Los Angeles house ablaze. His intent, Clark said during his trial, was to chase the family out so he could shoot and kill David Gawronski, a 35-year-old federal job trainer, in front of his wife and infant daughter.

Instead, David Gawronski perished in the fire.

Ava Gawronski, 32, was hospitalized for 10 months and lost her nose and fingers. A neighbor rescued the baby, who was unharmed.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Scott Taryle, who represented the prosecution, called it an "unfortunate decision."

Taryle said Clark initially considered mailing Ava Gawronski severed heads, but decided that wasn't enough.

"The crime itself was a horrible act by a coldblooded murderer," he said.

Attorneys with the federal public defender's office in Los Angeles, who brought the appeal, could not be reached for comment.

Feds May Drop Capital Case: Dot Men Face Death Penalty In Slay (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, March 18, 2006

Federal prosecutors may soon drop the controversial death-penalty case against two Dorchester menthe federal government wanted to try for murder and gang activity.

Pending a green light from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, murder and racketeering indictments against Darryl Green and Branden Morris could be dropped as early as next month.

Prosecutor Theodore Heinrich said in court documents “the likelihood of dismissal is so great” after two co-defendants of Green and Morris who weren’t facing capital punishment were acquitted, that it would be futile to go on.

Morris is “tremendously relieved,” his attorney, Patricia Garin, said yesterday. “We were all incredulous from the beginning that this case was charged as a death-penalty case and that our client was charged at all.”

Green’s defense counsel, Randolph Gioia, said, “The only reason you bring a case like this to federal court is because you want to make an example of these kids.”

Green, he said, “does feel some bitterness, but he just wants to put it behind him.”

In order to successfully prosecute Green, 28, and Morris, 22, in federal court for the 2001 murder of Terrell Gethers, the government had to prove a racketeering case against them. But in January, Judge Nancy Gertner ordered acquittals in the companion case of Jonathan Hart, 24, and Edward Washington, 25, after a jury deadlocked on whether their street-corner crew operated on the same “criminal enterprise” level as the Mafia.

Green and Morris still face federal drug charges and may yet be tried for Gethers’ homicide in state court. The federal prosecution of Green and Morris angered Suffolk District Attorney Daniel Conley, who said he felt life imprisonment was sufficient, and some members of the black community, who said the defendants were fall guys in a state that outlawed capital punishment. The case also publicly forced U.S. District Court in Boston to question why it seats predominantly white, middle-class juries for black defendants.

Of the 122 federal death-penalty cases pursued nationwide since 1988, the government has dropped charges 28 times before going to trial, according to the Capital Defense Network.

Mariano Guilty Of Corruption Charges (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

Rick Mariano, an electrician who rose from a tough corner of Northeast Philadelphia to become a city councilman, was convicted of corruption charges yesterday and led from a federal courtroom in handcuffs.

Mariano's wife, son and staffers did not flinch at the guilty verdicts, but Susan Mariano and others gasped when U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel ordered the councilman imprisoned immediately. Stengel, citing Mariano's suicide scare at City Hall shortly before last year's indictment, revoked bail pending a psychiatric evaluation.

As a marshal prepared to cuff him in public, Mariano said, "Can we do it back there?" He didn't get his wish and is expected to remain at the Federal Detention Center through the weekend.

Mariano, 50, became the first elected city official convicted in 15 years, and under state law he can remain on Council only until he is sentenced, probably by midsummer. Mayor Street, a longtime friend, called on Mariano yesterday to resign immediately. Mariano's top aide vowed the councilman would not step down.

The jury deliberated for about six hours before convicting Mariano of 18 counts, including conspiracy, bribery, money laundering, fraud and tax charges. He was acquitted of four fraud charges.

DOJ_NMG_0019455

"The evidence was so glaring, so overwhelming, we had no choice but to come up with a guilty verdict," said juror Jon Thorpe, a real estate agent from East Norriton, Montgomery County. "The prosecution had a very tight case and the defense did very little to contest the evidence."

Another juror said the paper trail doomed Mariano.

"Regardless of the witnesses' credibility, the checks, the receipts and the bank account were the deciding factor," said Drew Folk, a chemist from Hamburg, Berks County. "None of us felt he was a bad guy, but the evidence speaks for itself."

Jurors found that Mariano accepted nearly $30,000 from businessmen in exchange for regulatory favors, tax breaks, cheap city land, and a suspect schools contract. The crimes cost taxpayers $700,000, prosecutors said.

"When City Council becomes a branch office for those who provide bribes, it becomes a perversion of the process," U.S. Attorney Patrick L. Meehan said at a news conference with FBI agents.

Mariano likely faces six to 10 years in federal prison. His character is likely to weigh heavily at sentencing. During the trial, witnesses testified to his good deeds and hard work, but also to retaliatory acts against former city aides.

Mariano's lawyer, Nino V. Tinari, said he would appeal, but his primary focus would be to get the councilman released before sentencing. Everyone in Mariano's camp, including the councilman, was surprised by Stengel's decision, the lawyer told reporters afterward.

"There was no need to have that sort of display but apparently it makes a good media event," Tinari said. He quickly added: "The judge is not playing to media at all. However, it occurred."

Tinari said handcuffing Mariano in front of his family, supporters and reporters - standard procedure in federal court - "was really reprehensible in my mind."

Mariano will be evaluated by a court-approved psychiatrist who will consider Stengel's concern that Mariano could pose a danger to himself or others or is a flight risk.

In ordering Mariano detained, Stengel cited the councilman's highly publicized climb to the top of the City Hall tower on Oct. 20, just days before he was indicted. Mariano was hospitalized and received psychiatric care after that. Tinari said yesterday Mariano's mental health is good.

At City Hall yesterday, Street issued a statement calling Mariano "a good friend for many years," but said it was time for Mariano to step down.

"No city employee or elected official is entitled to misuse a public position for private gain," Street said. "His resignation would be in the best interests of the city."

Council President Anna C. Verna called it "a sad day for this city," but said Mariano should not resign until he is sentenced.

"I guess going up to the tower didn't help him, did it?" Verna said. "If you want to meditate, go to church."

Councilman Juan Ramos said he felt sorry for his friend. Majority Leader Jannie Blackwell, long a Mariano ally, called the news "a shame" and said she would pray for him. She noted that the last two councilmen convicted on corruption charges, Lee Beloff in 1987 and James Tayoun in 1991, had since made comebacks.

Blackwell was among three Council members who testified to Mariano's good character during the two-week trial. Under cross-examination, however, prosecutors got them to acknowledge that the law obligated them to disclose loans and gifts, which Mariano did not do.

Mariano was convicted of taking six bribes - three to pay credit card debts and three to pay for a fancy gym membership.

He took $23,000 from Philip Chartock, who operated a North Philadelphia factory, Erie Steel Ltd. Prosecutors Michael Schwartz and Kenya Mann ridiculed Mariano's assertion that these were loans, not bribes, by noting that two checks were laundered through two businessmen. The two men, Vincent DiPentio and Joseph Pellecchia, have since have pleaded guilty.

In return for the money, the jury found, Mariano helped Erie Steel with tax breaks and city regulatory agencies and Pellecchia with a $225,000 city schools contract. Reinaldo Pastrana, who paid Mariano's gym membership, got help buying city land for 25 percent of its market value.

Most of the evidence in the case was dry paperwork. But there were flashes of drama: retellings of profanity-laced exchanges at City Hall, witnesses calling one another liars, prosecutors alleging a cover-up, and a defense attorney alleging a plot to sabotage a vulnerable man.

And there was always the question of whether Mariano would take the stand. He flirted with the idea at the last moment, but did not.

"It would have helped his case a little, but I don't think it would have changed the outcome," said Thorpe, the juror.

Without Mariano's testimony, jurors had only the version of the councilman presented by his defense. In the end, as the councilman's attorney called forth a parade of character witnesses - a priest, a disabled veteran, a community activist - Mariano began to seem like a wounded character, the focus of a charity project.

DOJ_NMG_0019456

Even his physical demeanor was a far cry from the burly, blunt figure he presented for 10 years in Council. Hobbling from recent knee surgery, he carried a cane to court every day.

After Mariano was taken into custody, hands behind his back, relatives and supporters took turns carrying his cane during the long walk from the courthouse.

Contact staff writer John Shiffman at 215-854-2658 or jshiffman@phillynews.com.

Inquirer staff writer Marcia Gelbart contributed to this article.

The Fallout

What happens next with Mariano's Council seat is uncertain. A6.

A breakdown of the schemes that led to Mariano's conviction. A6.

JURY: MARIANO'S CORRUPT (PHDN)

By Chris Brennan & Michael Hinkelman

Philadelphia Daily News, March 18, 2006

CITY COUNCILMAN Rick Mariano, preparing to enter a federal courtroom yesterday to hear the verdict in his corruption trial, offered this prediction with a smile: "Innocent, as always."

The jury disagreed, convicting Mariano on 18 counts of conspiracy, mail and wire fraud, money laundering, bribery and filing a false tax return. He faces a maximum of close to 10 years in prison. He was cleared on four counts of mail or wire fraud.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence Stengel then stunned Mariano and his attorney by quickly revoking Mariano's bail, suggesting that he might be a danger to himself or others. As part of his concern, Stengel cited a suicide scare that Mariano sparked in City Hall in October.

U.S. marshals handcuffed Mariano, dressed in a green suit, shirt and tie for St. Patrick's Day, and whisked him out of the courtroom as his wife watched while wiping away tears.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Meehan hailed the verdict, saying Mariano, 50, had turned his Council post into "a branch office for businesses that will pay bribes to get things done."

Meehan, who has overseen a long-running corruption probe that has targeted several areas in City Hall, called on the business community to "stand up and take control" by refusing to give in to the demands of corrupt officials.

"What surprises you... is that they sell it out for so little," Meehan said. "But the effect is so big because it tears apart the whole future of the city."

Mayor Street, in a statement, called on Mariano to resign from Council, saying that was in the "best interests of the city." Street, who often joked with Mariano that they were so close they called each other "cousin," said Mariano was a close friend but not above the law.

Mariano's one-time political patron, electricians' union president John Dougherty, declined to be interviewed yesterday, issuing a statement through a spokesman that he hopes people will pray for Mariano and his family.

The end of Mariano's freedom and political career began in 2002, when he felt the financial pinch of one marriage ending and another starting as City Council went several months without pay because it had not approved a political redistricting plan.

Erie Steel Co., a business in Mariano's district run by friends, wrote three checks totaling $23,455 to help him pay his credit- card bills.

Mariano asked two friends, who have since pleaded guilty, to launder two of the checks through their businesses and create bogus invoices to make it look like they provided services to Erie Steel.

Mariano asked another friend, who is expected to plead guilty soon, to pay $5,400 for his Center City gym dues.

Erie Steel's owners, Philip Chartock and his father, Lou, are set to go on trial in late April.

Philip Chartock watched most of Mariano's two-week trial but was not in court for yesterday's verdict.

Erie Steel's former office manager, charged with embezzlement in 2004, cut a deal last year to have 95 felony counts reduced to one misdemeanor in exchange for her cooperation against the Chartocks and Mariano.

The office manager, Margaret "Maggie" Greer, testified that Phil Chartock instructed her to write the checks when Mariano was present.

Federal prosecutors spent the last two weeks linking the money Mariano received to a range of services he provided to his friends - helping get speedy service from city agencies, reductions on tax bills and buying city property.

The jurors - two from Philadelphia and 10 from suburban towns as far away as Bethlehem, Millersville and Hamburg - took about 6 ½ hours over two days to convict Mariano.

They declined to be interviewed by reporters after the verdict.

DOJ_NMG_0019457

"We considered the evidence carefully and did what we believed was right," jury forewoman Jennifer Sweeney of Lansdale said.

Mariano's attorney, Nino Tinari, led a bombastic defense based on attacking the credibility of witnesses, especially Greer and three former staffers fired by Mariano late last year.

Tinari repeatedly suggested to the jury that the money Mariano had received had been loans from friends. But he never offered any evidence to support that theory.

Tinari yesterday said he did not think that attacking the witnesses had backfired for Mariano. "We did whatever we felt was best," he said. "Let some other lawyer think of all that later on."

Tinari now is focused on getting Mariano again out on bail until he is sentenced.

Stengel shot down a government request earlier in the case to have Mariano evaluated by a psychiatrist after an October incident in City Hall, just days before he was indicted with his friends.

Mariano had to be talked down from the City Hall tower by Street that day and then spent a weekend in a psychiatric ward. He later said he was just taking pictures with a new camera.

Stengel said he now wanted the psychiatric evaluation, which will probably happen early next week.

"There are a number of felony convictions here and exposure to a lengthy prison sentence," Stengel said, explaining his concern. He did not say when he would sentence Mariano.

Tinari argued in court after the verdict that the evaluation was not necessary. Federal prosecutors had been prepared to allow Mariano to remain free on $250,000 bail.

Tinari later said he would provide Stengel with information about the October incident, including "what motivated it and whether it has anything to do with his state of mind."

Asked what that was, Tinari said the information should be disclosed in a court hearing and raised the possibility that it might be closed to the public.

Tinari was not happy with the rush to put Mariano in handcuffs.

"It was really disturbing to me personally and to his family, of course," Tinari said. "It just appeared there was no need to have that kind of display. Apparently it makes a good media event."

Philly Councilman Found Guilty Of Bribery, Money Laundering (AP)

By MARYCLAIRE DALE, The Associated Press

AP, March 18, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - A city councilman was convicted Friday of trading political favors for bribes from friends and businesses, money that he used to pay his credit-card bills and other personal expenses.

A federal jury returned guilty verdicts on 18 of the 22 counts against Councilman Rick Mariano, including bribery, money laundering, filing a false tax return and honest services fraud.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence F. Stengel immediately revoked Mariano's bail, pending a mental health evaluation. Mariano, a former union electrician who earns about $100,000 as a councilman, remains in office.

Five days before he was indicted in October, Mariano caused a suicide scare by taking a solitary trip up to the observation deck of City Hall. He later said he went up to reflect, not harm himself, though Mariano did check himself into a hospital after the incident.

The judge said that the incident was never explained to his satisfaction and he feared Mariano could be a harm to himself and possibly put others at risk.

The jury found Mariano not guilty of two counts each of mail fraud and wire fraud.

Mariano's lawyer had argued that the councilman simply accepted loans when he found himself in financial trouble, and did not provide official favors in return.

But prosecutors say there was a clear quid-pro-quo: Businessmen paid Mariano's credit-card bills and membership dues at a tony gym - worth about $28,500 in all - and Mariano helped them obtain tax breaks, city contracts and properties, they said.

After the verdict, Mayor John Street issued a statement saying it is "in the best interests of the city" for Mariano to resign.

"No city employee or elected official is entitled to misuse a public position for private gain," Street said. "Such behavior is not only illegal, it erodes public confidence in government."

The case against Mariano, an outspoken member of the council for the past decade, is the latest in a string of federal corruption investigations in the city.

More than a dozen people have been convicted in the various probes, one of which became public when police discovered an FBI bug in Mayor John F. Street's office in October 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0019458

The federal investigations have brought down a former city treasurer serving a 10-year prison term for accepting trips and other gifts; two Commerce Bank executives; a prominent Muslim imam with close ties to the mayor; and others.

Street, a Democrat, denies wrongdoing and has not been charged.

Mariano defense lawyer Nino Tinari in closing remarks Thursday compared staff members who testified against Mariano to Brutus and others who betrayed Julius Caesar. But prosecutors spun the analogy to their own end.

"The only thing Mariano has in common with Julius Caesar is that the councilman stabbed the citizens of Philadelphia in the back each time he took a bribe," Assistant U.S. Attorney Kenya Mann said.

Philly Councilman Guilty In Bribery Case (UPI)

United Press International, March 18, 2006

PHILADELPHIA, March 17 (UPI) -- A Philadelphia city councilman was convicted Friday of taking bribes from business owners seeking contracts from the city.

Rick Mariano faces six to 10 years behind bars. A judge ordered his immediate incarceration pending a psychiatric evaluation.

Prosecutors said Mariano received $30,000 from contractors who got about $700,000 in business.

Mariano continued to attend council meetings while he was under indictment, and even after the trial began, when he was able. City officials seemed unsure whether he would be forced out of office immediately or only after he is sentenced.

Mayor John Street suggested Mariano resign immediately.

"A jury has determined the law has been violated. No one is above the law," Street said. "No city employee or elected official is entitled to misuse a public position for private gain."

Once A Key Political Ally, Now Alone (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

In the end, the crimes that ended Rick Mariano's political career were tailor-made for the man who spent a decade representing a struggling swatch of lower Northeast Philadelphia.

Other crooked Philly pols have reached for the stars, conspiring with mobsters or taking bribes from purported Arab sheikhs. But Mariano, the ultimate neighborhood guy, was felled by just under $30,000 in ill-gotten gains - less than a third of his City Council salary.

Mariano's defense strategy, likewise, involved asking the jury to view the case through the same small-time, parochial prism that defined Mariano's politics.

Thus, in defense lawyer Nino V. Tinari's telling, the case against Mariano became just a small-town food fight between estranged political factions. The witnesses against him became jilted liars grubbing for payoffs. And the bribes he took became simple loans between old neighborhood pals who don't bother with fancy uptown formalities such as receipts or IOUs.

The jurors didn't buy it. On Friday, they convicted Mariano, 50, of 18 counts of bribery, fraud and conspiracy. He faces a likely 6 to 10 years in prison.

Mariano, who fashioned himself a tough guy, wound up being swept immediately to jail as a result of his perceived fragility. Recalling last fall's suicide scare atop City Hall Tower, Judge Lawrence F. Stengel revoked his bail until a psychiatric evaluation could be conducted.

He was led away in handcuffs. He was led away alone.

It was a particularly poignant moment for someone who had served as the quintessential foot soldier for many other bigger names in Philadelphia politics.

During his career, Mariano was shrewd about making alliances - belying the bumbling caricature of a man Philadelphia Weekly once named as the city's dumbest politician. In Council, he did little by way of legislation but enthusiastically rattled the chandeliers on behalf of allies.

Many of those whose battles Mariano fought are among the city's most powerful politicians, such as Mayor Street, U.S. Rep. Bob Brady, electricians union leader John Dougherty, and State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo, who strongly supported Mariano's first campaign before the two fell out amid Fumo's epic feud with Dougherty.

According to Daniel P. McElhatton, the councilman whom Mariano served as a staffer before ousting him from office in 1995, political Philadelphia didn't have any problem with Mariano's behavior back then.

"They hounded my daughters," McElhatton said of the Mariano campaign, supported by the Democratic establishment. "They had people making threats. There were... goons around to intimidate my poll workers. Had some of that happened in a third-world country, we would have said, 'We won't stand for this.' "

Mariano's campaign denied the allegations at the time.

McElhatton said Mariano's supporters knew just what they were getting.

"He got the support of the party structure, and they got a predictable vote," he said. "You lie down with dogs, you get fleas."

No one was closer to Mariano than Dougherty. Dougherty's union's political fund has given Mariano $452,000 since 1998 - a third of all money he raised - and put him on the payroll when a redistricting dispute held up City Council's paychecks. Union officials also selected top Mariano staffers.

Mariano, meanwhile, beat the drum for top union priorities, such as public funding for new stadiums for the Eagles and Phillies.

The relationship stayed strong through a long run of Mariano miscues - from the 1999 "Cookiegate" incident, when Mariano staffers were caught delivering cookies for his wife's business, to the first anonymous bribery allegations against him last year, after which Dougherty gathered top political aides to plot strategy.

But the pair split after the investigation became public last year. At trial, Tinari repeatedly suggested that Dougherty was behind a shadowy conspiracy to jail Mariano. He never spelled out the details.

Through spokesman Frank Keel - who until last fall spoke for Mariano, as well - Dougherty declined to comment, except to say that he "asks everyone to keep Rick and his children in their prayers."

Street was another Mariano booster, affectionately calling him "Cousin Rick" while Mariano was one of six votes that helped Street sustain key vetoes and battle new ethics legislation.

Unlike Dougherty, Street did not break with Mariano as the feds circled. Over the summer, he regularly sent Mariano religious text messages urging him to keep his spirits up. Street was among those who talked Mariano down from City Hall Tower last fall.

In a statement after the verdict, Street called Mariano "a good friend" but called for him to step down immediately. Under the law, he wouldn't have to do that until sentencing, which could be months away.

Whether Mariano was a dummy who was in way over his head or a ticking time bomb whose enablers should have known better, McElhatton said, the damage to Philadelphia was massive - much bigger than the $700,000 in benefits that Mariano got for the men who bribed him.

Just in the last week, he noted, state lawmakers moved to strip the city of zoning power over casinos, saying Philadelphia was too corrupt to be trusted.

"Imagine businesspeople somewhere, reading about Mariano in the New York Times," he said. "They'll say, 'I was thinking about going back there, starting a business, but look at how corrupt.' That stains us irreparably and immeasurably."

For his part, even before the conviction, the former electrician seemed to wish he had never met Dougherty or Street, or even McElhatton, his first boss in politics.

"If I knew 20 years ago what I know now, I'd be just getting home, putting my feet up, and watching TV after a day working at some construction site," Mariano said Thursday outside the courtroom as jurors deliberated late into the afternoon. "Instead, I'm sitting here waiting for a bunch of people to decide if I'm going to jail."

Immediate Fate Of Mariano's Council Seat Unclear (PHI)

By Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

Rick Mariano's corruption conviction throws into question the future of the City Council seat he has held since 1996.

Pennsylvania's constitution bars felons from elected office, meaning Mariano must step down. But moments after Mariano's bail was revoked and he was led away to detention, his chief of staff said Mariano intended to stay in office until sentencing, as the law allows. That could be several months from now.

"He'll continue to come to Council when permitted," Jay McCalla said. "If for no other reason than to show we have what it takes, we'll continue to push for an agenda that's focused on his district."

By declining to step down until his sentencing, Mariano will keep drawing his $102,000 salary.

In a statement, Mayor Street called on Mariano to resign immediately. But Council President Anna C. Verna said she would not try to dissuade Mariano from coming to Council.

"That's the law," she said.

Verna has asked the city solicitor whether there have been any changes in legal interpretations that could force Mariano from office sooner. She is awaiting a response.

As for the future of Mariano's seat, there is no guarantee that a replacement would be chosen before the next election in 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0019460

Under Philadelphia's charter, the power to call a special election rests with Verna. She said it was premature to say whether she would call one.

Verna said the issue was more complicated because Mariano's seat would be the second vacancy on the 17-member Council. Councilman David Cohen died in office last fall.

Special elections differ from ordinary elections in that each party's nominee is chosen not through a primary election but through a closed vote of the party ward leaders. Thus the lead-up to such elections - and the decision about whether to hold one - typically involves considerable political jockeying.

Mariano's district, which includes parts of North and Northeast Philadelphia, is heavily Democratic, giving anyone the party nominates a strong advantage.

Job, Pension Go When Rick Does (PHDN)

Philadelphia Daily News, March 18, 2006

Councilman Rick Mariano's chief of staff, Jay McCalla, said yesterday that Mariano would continue to show up for work at City Hall.

But for how long? As a convicted felon, Mariano can't hang onto his elected post, according to the state constitution and the city charter.

Council President Anna Verna said yesterday Mariano must resign when he is sentenced. Verna on Thursday asked City Solicitor Romulo Diaz to issue a legal opinion to back that up.

But Verna stopped short of saying if she would call a special election to fill Mariano's post, calling that "premature."

Mayor Street, a political ally of Mariano's, yesterday called on him to resign.

Mariano, now in the third year of his third four-year term, also faces the loss of his city pension from his time on Council and, before that, as a staffer to Councilmen Dan McElhatton and Jim Kenney.

The city could move to claim some of that forfeited money as repayment for attorney fees paid for Mariano from late March until he was indicted in October.

Editorial | The Rick Mariano Verdict (PHI)

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 18, 2006

Another day, another verdict that lets you dare think there might be hope for the city.

One day, two thugs get convicted, as they should have, of murdering a little boy in a schoolyard.

The next day, a city councilman gets convicted, as the evidence screamed he should, of betraying the public trust by taking bribes.

You'd rather that little Faheem Thomas-Childs were still alive.

You'd rather that Rick Mariano, bully and cheat, had never been elected to City Council, never been allowed to cost taxpayers $700,000 by exploiting his powers as councilman.

But this is a big city; crime and corruption are going to happen. You just want to feel that decent people can fight back, can stem the tide. This time, the courts offered hope.

In Mariano's case, it's time for him to do the right thing, for once: resign his seat, instead of hanging on pointlessly until his sentencing forces the issue. His friends on Council, who vouched for his redeeming qualities at trial, should let him know it's best for him to go now.

Laski Admits Guilt, Braces For Jail Time (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters. Tribune Staff Reporters Gary Washburn And Todd Lighty Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, March 18, 2006

Ex-clerk admits taking $50,000 to help friends

Former Chicago City Clerk James Laski, the highest-ranking city official charged in the federal probe of the city's Hired Truck Program, pleaded guilty Friday to pocketing nearly $50,000 in bribes for steering city business to two trucking companies.

Laski, 52, who disclosed that he takes anti-anxiety medication, appeared nervous as he stood before U.S. District Judge Charles Norgle, but he spoke in a clear, soft voice as the judge questioned him.

Asked by Norgle if he had done a good job as city clerk, Laski replied, "I thought I did, your honor."

"Until recently?" Norgle asked.

"Until recently," said Laski, who pleaded guilty to one count of bribery.

Laski's wrongdoing, in fact, had nothing directly to do with his city clerk duties.

He solicited bribes totaling about $48,000 from two friends after interceding on their behalf with other city officials and obtaining Hired Truck work for separate trucking companies.

Between 1998 and 2004, Laski pocketed monthly cash bribes of $500 to $1,000 from Michael "Mick" Jones, a top official in the clerk's office who helped operate Get Plowed Inc. Jones pleaded guilty Thursday to bribery.

Laski also acknowledged he took $2,000 a month for 12 months from Randy Aderman, another friend and city employee, after Laski arranged for Hired Truck work for FRC Trucking. Aderman pleaded guilty to bribery Friday.

According to court records, Frank Cannatello, another Hired Truck defendant who pleaded guilty this month to lying to FBI agents, asked Aderman to help obtain Hired Truck business after Cannatello and a relative started FRC Trucking.

Friday's guilty pleas by Laski and Aderman bring to 34 the number of convictions in the Hired Truck probe. Charges are pending against nine others, but the investigation continues.

As city clerk, Laski ranked second to the mayor among the city's elected officials.

Laski's plea agreement does not call for his cooperation with prosecutors, because he had no additional criminal wrongdoing to reveal, according to a source close to Laski.

Laski faces up to 3 years in prison when he is sentenced May 25.

Mayor Richard Daley hasn't tipped his hand on whom he is considering to replace Laski.

Laski's lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, declined to let Laski comment to reporters as the two left the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse following his guilty plea.

"I think he especially feels bad about what he's done and how it's affected his office and how he's let down his constituents," Steinback said.

Laski is "bracing himself" for prison, Steinback said.

Laski's plea marks an ignominious end to the former 23rd Ward alderman's once-promising political career. A onetime protege of former U.S. Rep. William Lipinski (D-Ill.), he was elected city clerk in 1995, a post he held until his resignation last month following his indictment.

According to his plea agreement, Laski asked an undisclosed alderman as well as officials in the Mayor's Office for Intergovernmental Affairs for assistance in obtaining Hired Truck work for Jones' Get Plowed.

A source close to the investigation previously identified the alderman as Patrick Huels from Daley's native 11th Ward. Huels was Daley's City Council floor leader until he resigned in October 1997 after admitting he borrowed $1.25 million from another Daley friend and city contractor, Mike Tadin.

Daley's intergovernmental affairs director until December 2000 was Victor Reyes, who heads the pro-Daley Hispanic Democratic Organization. A top aide to Reyes at the time was Robert Sorich, who is facing charges that he helped rig city personnel decisions to get jobs and promotions for political campaign workers.

With Aderman's introduction, Laski also reached out to Donald Tomczak, the No. 2 official in the city's Department of Water Management who held sway over which trucking companies got coveted Hired Truck work.

Tomczak, who directed work to Get Plowed, pleaded guilty in the federal probe and has cooperated with authorities.

Though prosecutors agreed to drop an obstruction of justice charge against Laski, he admitted he advised Jones' wife, Traci, to lie in a grand-jury appearance.

In October, Laski acknowledged, he called Mick Jones and announced, "Go Cubs," an agreed-on code of his approval for Jones' wife to lie to the grand jury.

Jones by then was cooperating with federal authorities and secretly tape-recorded the conversation.

Laski also admitted that he personally reviewed his campaign records to identify dates on which cash deposits had been made. An intermediary then passed that information on to Jones' wife to bolster her phony claim that the payoffs to Laski were actually campaign contributions.

---

mo'connor@tribune.com
rrbush@tribine.com

Laski Admits Taking Payoffs (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter
Chicago Sun-Times, March 18, 2006

Former City Clerk James Laski pleaded guilty Friday to taking bribes in return for steering Hired Truck business to friends -- making him the highest-ranking public official convicted in the ongoing probe.

Jail time is nearly certain for Laski, 52, who resigned earlier this year after serving as clerk since 1995. The government says he should go to prison for 30 to 37 months.

When asked what Laski would tell others in City Hall who thought about taking bribes, his lawyer Jeffrey Steinback responded: "Don't do it, don't do it. . . . I think he feels terrible about mistakes he's made and how he's let down his constituents."

CAUGHT IN SCANDAL

44 people have been charged in the federal government's investigation of Chicago's Hired Truck Program, including 26 city workers.

34 of them have pleaded guilty, including 21 city workers.

22 have been sentenced to terms from 3 years of probation to 7 years in prison.

1 former city worker will never stand trial. He died after he was thrown from a horse.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

Laski admitted to taking $48,000 in payoffs. While other charges were dropped in his plea bargain, Laski still admitted to the conduct. That includes obstructing justice at one point by using the coded comment of "Go, Cubs" to try to get a witness to lie to the grand jury.

Case taking its toll

Moments before his plea hearing, Laski nervously paced the courthouse hallway. Earlier that morning, he had downed a tranquilizer and an anti-anxiety pill, along with some orange juice and a Pepsi, he later told U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle. The night before, he had a few beers, he said.

"He's feeling the wear," Steinback said, adding that Laski is battling health issues. Laski has said he has long had stomach problems, which have been exacerbated by his indictment.

When he stepped up to the courtroom lectern, he kept his hands clasped before him, leaned forward, and spoke in a thick Chicago accent.

"I'm unemployed right now," Laski said, smiling at Norgle's question of what he did for a living. "I resigned my position, based on these proceedings."

"Did you do a good job while you were there?" Norgle asked.

"I thought I did, your honor," Laski said.

"Until recently?" Norgle asked.

"Until recently," Laski said, his voice trailing off.

In addition to resigning, Laski relinquished his law license and agreed to pay $48,000 in bribes he said he took -- already having paid $15,400, Steinback said.

Norgle asked if Laski knew what rights he was waiving by pleading guilty.

Laski took a deep breath. "I know exactly what I'm doing, your honor," he said.

"No one pushed or shoved or squeezed you into pleading guilty?" Norgle asked.

"No, your honor," Laski said.

Laski admitted he took money from his longtime friend Michael Jones in return for getting Jones' company, Get Plowed Inc., business with the city's Hired Truck Program. Jones paid Laski $500 a month beginning in 1998, and that went up to $1,000 a month in 2001.

Laski also admitted to taking $2,000 a month for 12 months from Randy Aderman, whom Laski also helped get Hired Truck work. Jones wore a wire on Laski, his boyhood friend.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Manish Shah told Norgle that Laski also admitted to coaching a witness on how to lie to the grand jury and later called him and said, "Go Cubs," as a go-ahead to lie.

Slew of admissions

Laski's plea came a day after Jones admitted giving Laski thousands of dollars in bribe money to retain Hired Truck business. And Aderman also pleaded guilty Friday to bribery. He faces an agreed sentence of 16 months in prison.

Also this week, Robert Mangiamele was sentenced to 18 months in prison after admitting he paid bribes to get business in the Hired Truck program. He pleaded guilty in December.

Jones argues he should keep his pension because the crime was related to his trucking firm -- not his city job as the chief investigator in Laski's office.

Steinback said another lawyer is determining whether Laski could keep his pension.

"We don't want to give it up if we don't have to," Steinback said. "It's his life's work."

Former Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty To Bribery In Trucking Scandal (AP)

By Mike Robinson

AP, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019463

CHICAGO - Chicago's former city clerk pleaded guilty Friday to taking $48,000 in payoffs to get companies into the city's scandal-plagued Hired Truck Program.

James J. Laski, 52, became the highest-ranking official convicted in the two-year federal investigation of the scandal-plagued program that was designed to save money by outsourcing the city's hauling work to private truckers but which prosecutors say is awash in corruption.

Laski, who had been city clerk since 1995, admitted he received envelopes of cash from an official in his own office, Michael Jones, who doubled as an operator of a trucking company.

He also admitted to taking payoffs from a former employee of the city water department, Randy Aderman, to help get other trucks into the program.

Forty-four people have been charged thus far in the investigation, which has expanded to include alleged patronage hiring abuses. Laski was the 33rd person convicted.

Unlike many who have pleaded guilty, Laski did not agree to help prosecutors in the ongoing investigation - something that might have lessened his sentence.

He pleaded guilty to one count of bribery. Under advisory sentencing guidelines, he could get 30 to 37 months in federal prison when he is set to be sentenced on May 25.

As he left court, a reporter asked Laski what he had to say to those who elected him.

His attorney, Jeffrey Steinback, stepped forward and said "I think you can tell from the way today's proceedings went that Jim is very sorry."

"I think he feels terrible about the mistakes he made," Steinback said. "He admitted them in open court today and I think he especially feels bad about what he's done and how it has affected his office and how it has affected his constituents."

Laski declined to say anything. "This has been an extremely difficult day for Jim," Steinback said.

In response to questions from U.S. District Judge Charles R. Norgle Sr., Laski said that on waking up Friday morning he took a mild tranquilizer as well as a separate anti-anxiety drug.

"Do you know what you're doing?" Norgle asked.

"I know exactly what I'm doing," Laski said.

Norgle asked Laski briefly about his political career as city clerk.

"Did you do a good job?" Norgle asked.

"I thought I did, your honor," Laski said, hesitantly.

"Until recently?" Norgle asked.

"Until recently," Laski said.

Laski acknowledged in his plea agreement that starting in 1998, he took $500-a.m.onth envelopes of cash from Jones, who has cooperated with the federal investigation and pleaded guilty to payoff charges on Thursday.

Besides working in the clerk's office, Jones was one of the operators of Get Plowed Inc., which had trucks working in the program. Laski acknowledged that in 2001, the amount was upped to $1,000 a month in return for additional Get Plowed trucks in the program.

Laski also acknowledged he received $2,000 for a year from Aderman to get another trucking company into the program.

He said that at one point he discussed a deal with Donald Tomczak, the retired head of day-to-day operations at the water department. Under that deal, Tomczak would put trucks in the program and Laski would in return give jobs in the clerk's office to individuals that Tomczak recommended.

It was not clear if anything came of the discussion.

Tomczak, a former precinct captain and the unofficial commander of a group of election workers with political patronage jobs, has pleaded guilty to racketeering and tax fraud.

After Laski left Norgle's courtroom Friday, Aderman arrived and pleaded guilty to one count of bribery. Guidelines call for a sentence in the range of 24 to 30 months. Norgle set sentencing for June 21.

Aderman said in his plea agreement that he paid $750 a month to former water department official John Briatta to secure Tomczak's help in getting trucks into the program. Briatta has pleaded guilty to charges in the case. He is the brother-in-law of Cook County Commissioner John Daley - the mayor's brother.

Still scheduled for trial in April is Laski's former political aide, Sam Gammicchia. The indictment says that Gammicchia advised and coached a witness in the case to mislead a federal grand jury. He has pleaded not guilty and is due for a status hearing on Monday.

Ex-Chicago City Clerk Pleads Guilty In Trucking Kickback Scheme (LAT)

By P.j. Huffstutter, Times Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0019464

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

CHICAGO — James J. Laski Jr., the former city clerk and Chicago's second-highest public official, pleaded guilty Friday to a federal bribery charge and admitted that he had taken cash payoffs in exchange for city trucking contracts.

According to the plea agreement, Laski took $48,000 in kickbacks from 1998 to 2003 from trucking companies eager to participate in the city's Hired Truck Program.

The program, which contracted vehicles from private businesses to assist with public works and construction projects, was promoted by City Hall as a means of helping to cut costs.

But federal investigators found that many of the trucking companies were being paid millions of dollars to do no work, and city workers were seeking bribes in exchange for securing the contracts.

Of the 44 people charged in the investigation, about half are city workers. To date, 34 people have been convicted.

The Hired Truck scandal — though arguably among the widest reaching in City Hall — is only one of a series of corruption woes plaguing Mayor Richard M. Daley, who has said he was completely unaware of such doings.

Among other things, federal investigators have been digging for evidence of alleged fraud in politically based promotions and hiring practices.

Though Daley has had a public approval rating of 56%, according to a Chicago Tribune poll conducted last month, 70% of respondents didn't believe the mayor's claims of ignorance.

Among those convicted in the Hired Truck scandal was a trucking company head who contributed money to political groups to stay in the program organizers' good graces.

The donations included funds sent to the 11th Ward Democratic organization — headed by Cook County Commissioner John Daley, the mayor's brother — and the Committee to Elect John Daley.

"The corruption is just so blatant, and it's very much a growing pain for the mayor," said Paul Green, director of policy studies at Roosevelt University in Chicago.

"It's a constant pinprick in him, and no one knows where the pin's going next."

Laski, 52, resigned his position as city clerk Feb. 6.

On Friday, Laski admitted that the owner of Get Plowed Inc. trucking company had given him monthly installments of cash to get business from various city departments.

An unnamed person "handed [Laski] an envelope containing $500 to $1,000" each month as payoff for getting and staying with the Hired Truck Program, according to the plea agreement.

The bribes stopped in 2003, after federal investigators began to look into the program.

Laski, who has repaid $15,400, faces as much as three years in prison. His sentencing hearing is scheduled for May 25.

The Get Plowed company was run by Laski's friend Michael Jones, 48, who also was an employee at the city clerk's office.

On Thursday, Jones pleaded guilty to one count of bribery.

Man Held In Isolation On Child Porn Charges (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 18, 2006

A Bartlett man indicted this week on charges he molested an infant and broadcast it live over an Internet chatroom is being kept in isolation after his lawyer complained he was receiving threats from other inmates.

Brian Annoreno, 29, is being held in a Kankakee lockup, but his lawyer, Michael Falconer, said Annoreno also needs to be kept in isolation when he is taken to court appearances in Chicago for his own safety.

"Regular street criminals hate people who are accused of being child molesters," Falconer said.

Falconer said Annoreno was getting threats from inmates and harsh words from jail guards.

"They just told him he's the scum of the earth," Falconer said.

Annoreno and two others charged this week with being tied to a child pornography chatroom pleaded not guilty to the charges Friday. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales flew to Chicago on Wednesday to announce that the chatroom was shut down and a worldwide investigation had nabbed 47 people.

Evidence lacking, lawyer says

Falconer criticized the feds Friday for putting on a "dog and pony show," saying Gonzales' news conference was "deplorable" and over the top. Gonzales said the crimes were particularly disturbing because the chatroom allegedly broadcast video showing young children being molested. But Falconer said the prosecution does not have evidence of those videos except for a witness' testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0019465

Falconer would not comment on whether Annoreno is cooperating but said he has made "a ton of admissions" to the feds. However, he said Annoreno has a low IQ and may not have known what he was saying. Annoreno has a 22-month-old daughter, whom the Department of Children and Family Services took into custody and placed with a family member.

Cyber Sex Crime Unit Begun (INDYSTAR)

By Paul Bird

The Indianapolis Star, March 18, 2006

Officials hope to protect kids from predators

Johnson County officials have formed a "Cyber Sex Crimes Task Force" to protect children from Internet predators.

County Prosecutor Lance Hamner appointed Deputy Prosecutor Paul Felix to spearhead the effort.

Greenwood police Detective Erick Klinkowski, Franklin police Detective Brain Goldfarb and Johnson County Sheriff's Detective Bill Pfifer are the rest of the task force.

A month ago, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the Justice Department's Safe Child Initiative to stop sexual exploitation of children through the Internet.

The county team recently returned from Washington, D.C., after getting training on procedures and protocols to use during investigations and prosecutions of Internet predators.

"With this initiative, sexual predators who prey on children will be relentlessly targeted and prosecuted," Hamner said.

Klinkowski already has conducted two stings that led to arrests and convictions, one a special deputy with the Genesee County (Mich.) Sheriff's Department who traveled to Greenwood to meet a 13-year-old girl, Hamner said.

The man was charged with child exploitation, solicitation of a minor, dissemination of matter harmful to minors and possession of child pornography. In May 2005, he was sentenced to an 18-year prison term, with nine years suspended.

"When the would-be child molester shows up at an arranged location and finds me waiting for him instead of the 13-year-old girl he was expecting, he's going to jail," Klinkowski said. "He won't be able to slither away into the darkness."

Franklin Police Chief John Borges believes Internet child solicitation is a global problem.

"We have had some child pornography cases here," he said.

Greenwood Police Chief Joe Pitcher has purchased equipment to track Internet child pornography.

"We've have equipment that will allow us to look deep into computers and expose kiddie porn," he said. "We are going to set traps and arrest child molesters who travel Johnson County."

3 Sentenced In ELF Terror Case (SACBEE)

By Crystal Carreon, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 18, 2006

Man, sisters pleaded guilty to arson and attempts to torch buildings

A follower of an eco-terrorism group and two other Newcastle residents were sentenced Friday in Sacramento federal court for their roles in attempted firebombings of buildings under construction.

Ryan Daniel Lewis, the 22-year-old admitted adherent of the Earth Liberation Front - a radical group that targets suburban development - was sentenced to six years in federal prison for orchestrating arsons in Placer and Amador counties in late 2004 and early 2005.

Two of his acquaintances, sisters Lili Marie Holland, 21, and Eva Rose Holland, 26, were sentenced to two years each in prison. In an earlier plea agreement, the women faced three years and three months behind bars.

A fourth person arrested in the case, Jeremiah Colcleasure, 21, also of Newcastle, is scheduled to be sentenced in May. He pleaded guilty to attempted arson earlier this month.

Immediately after U.S. District Judge Edward J. Garcia sentenced Lewis on Friday, the bespectacled Newcastle man - who had been free on bond since November - was remanded into custody and led out of the courtroom past a row of his sobbing relatives.

Garcia called Lewis the ringleader who recruited the Holland sisters and another acquaintance to exact acts of violence on property under misguided ideals. At times, the judge chided defense attorneys for misusing the term "idealism" in explaining their clients' actions.

"I don't understand why you and the other lawyers talk about ideals," Garcia said to Lewis' attorney. "I consider this type of terrorism (a) most serious crime."

Earlier in the day, Garcia had allowed the Holland sisters, who reiterated their remorse before the court, to surrender to authorities April 28. Lewis did not make a statement before the judge.

DOJ_NMG_0019466

Friday's sentencing marked the first successful prosecution of ELF activity from the Oregon border to Bakersfield and should serve, authorities said, as a cautionary tale for others influenced to act on behalf of the shadowy organization.

In January, three other followers of ELF were arrested on suspicion of plotting a bombing campaign on local targets, including Nimbus Dam and fish hatchery and a forest genetics lab in Placerville.

"Domestic terrorists mistakenly believe they are on the moral high ground, but their actions are those of cowards," U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott told reporters after the sentences were handed down.

"Let today's sentencings be a warning to idealistic young people that if they make the wrong decisions, they will spend several years in prison."

But Lewis' attorney, Timothy Zindel, said he did not believe the six-year sentence was warranted for a "kid who made a serious mistake."

He said Lewis was not a terrorist.

"I don't agree that the Earth Liberation Front is a terrorist organization; (terrorism) it's a word that is cheapened in how it's thrown around," Zindel said after the sentencing hearing.

Anyone involved in a "protest crime has to watch out ... the federal government is very unforgiving."

The trio, who were arrested last year, admitted conspiracy to plant incendiary devices at an upscale housing development in Lincoln after leaving a Christmas party in 2004.

On Dec. 27, 2004, four homemade incendiary devices with kitchen timers were found in two homes under construction. "ELF" was painted in a cul-de-sac and other graffiti was discovered, including the statements "U will pay" and "Leave."

Lewis also confessed to placing firebombs inside an office building under construction in Auburn and devices inside apartments near completion in the Amador County town of Sutter Creek early last year.

The bombs in Lincoln and Auburn failed to ignite, and sprinkler systems in Sutter Creek managed to abate much of the damage.

However, one device did spark a fire, causing at least $243,000 in damage.

In the original indictment, the defendants faced a minimum of five years and up to 20 years in prison on each charge, including conspiracy to commit arson, attempted arson and additional counts of arson against Lewis.

In October, however, Lewis and the Holland sisters pleaded guilty as part of an agreement reached with the prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney R. Steven Lapham.

They were sentenced Friday on charges reached in their plea agreements: two counts of attempted arson and one count of arson against Lewis; one count each of attempted arson for the Holland sisters.

Eva Holland, surrounded by supporters after the hearing, said she was relieved that her legal ordeal was over and expressed hope that officials would house her in the same prison as her younger sister.

"We're just glad to be moving forward with our life," she said moments later, leaving the courthouse with her sister and mother, who declined to comment.

Members of Lewis' family marched out of the courtroom after shaking hands with Zindel. They declined to speak with reporters.

Lewis, his attorney said, will remain at the Sacramento Main Jail for about a month.

He then will be transferred to a federal prison.

6-Year Prison Sentence In Series Of Arsons (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

A 22-year-old man was sentenced Friday to six years in prison for a string of Northern California arsons on behalf of the Earth Liberation Front.

Ryan Daniel Lewis will also have to pay $243,000 in restitution for setting fire in February 2005 to a nearly completed apartment building in Sutter Creek, a Gold Country tourist town.

Lewis also admitted to two earlier arson attempts in nearby Placer County.

Two other defendants, Eva Rose Holland, 26, and Lili Marie Holland, 21, received two-year sentences for joining Lewis in attempting to set fire to several unfinished structures at a housing tract in fast-growing Lincoln.

3 Eco-terrorists Sentenced For Firebombs (MHCA/AP)

Montery (CA) Herald, March 18, 2006

SACRAMENTO (AP) - Three eco-terrorists were sentenced Friday to federal prison for a series of firebombings that put towns in the Sierra foothills on edge.

DOJ_NMG_0019467

Ryan Daniel Lewis, 22, the alleged leader of the group, was sentenced to six years, and two sisters -- Eva Rose Holland, 26, and Lili Marie Holland, 21 -- were each handed two-year prison terms.

Prosecutors alleged Lewis recruited the Holland sisters and Jeremiah Dean Colcleasure, 24, on Christmas Eve 2004 to help him burn down two unoccupied upscale homes in Lincoln, a Sacramento suburb, in the name of the Earth Liberation Front.

The four set up incendiary devices in two homes, but the firebombs didn't ignite.

Lewis tried and failed again on Jan. 12, 2005. In a third attempt Feb. 7, 2005, Lewis caused $50,000 damage to an apartment complex in Sutter Creek.

Lewis and the Holland sisters pleaded guilty in October.

CIVIL LAW:

Google Doesn't Have To Turn Over Query Data (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

A federal judge ruled Friday that Google Inc. did not have to turn over data about consumer Web search queries that the Department of Justice had requested.

U.S. District Judge James Ware ordered Google to work with the government to provide 50,000 randomly selected addresses for Web sites from its databases. But he denied government lawyers' request for a sampling of 5,000 search queries entered by Google users, concluding that they essentially duplicated information the government could glean from the Web addresses. In addition, Judge Ware said that Google's providing the queries could potentially cost it the trust of some users and expressed concerns about whether "search queries themselves may constitute potentially sensitive information."

The Department of Justice originally requested the information from Google last year to defend the Child Online Protection Act, a law designed to shield minors from sexually explicit materials on the Internet that has been blocked in the courts. Judge Ware had said during a public hearing Tuesday that he was leaning toward ordering Google to at least partially respond to a Department of Justice subpoena.

"This is a clear victory for our users," said Google in a statement. "The subpoena has been drastically limited."

U.S. Is Denied Google Queries (LAT)

By Chris Gaither

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Privacy activists hail a federal judge's ruling. But he orders the search engine to reveal some information about websites in its database.

A federal judge Friday denied a Justice Department demand for access to some Internet search queries of Google Inc. users in a closely watched case testing the limits of online privacy.

The ruling by U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose was a victory for Google, which argued that handing over the records would violate the privacy of people who might scour the Internet with terms as diverse as "best-actor nominees," "third trimester abortion" or "pipe bomb."

Although Ware required Google to reveal some information about the websites in its database, he ordered the government to reimburse the Mountain View, Calif., company for the time and expense required to comply.

But for Google — a quirky dot-com with the corporate mantra "Don't be evil" — the more important issue was whether it could restrict access to potentially revealing queries.

"We will always be subject to government subpoenas, but the fact that the judge sent a clear message about privacy is reassuring," said Google's associate general counsel, Nicole Wong. "What his ruling means is that neither the government nor anyone else has carte blanche when demanding data from Internet companies."

Privacy advocates cheered the decision as a check on the Bush administration's efforts to collect information about people, but noted that the trove of personal data gathered and stored by sites like Google was irresistible to investigators.

"This issue is going to come up over and over again," said Cindy Cohn, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation. "I don't think this should make anybody very comfortable about the future. Google still has this stuff and people will still try to seek it."

Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales issued subpoenas to Google and three other top Internet companies last year, seeking details of potentially billions of search queries as part of an investigation into online pornography. The Justice Department also demanded a sample of the millions of websites archived in the search engines' databases.

DOJ_NMG_0019468

The other companies — Yahoo Inc., Microsoft Corp. and America Online Inc. — complied at least in part. Google executives balked and the case became a test of the government's reach in the Internet Age.

Yahoo, Microsoft and America Online declined to comment after Ware's ruling late Friday.

Those companies have said that the information they provided did not violate users' privacy, because it did not include names or computer addresses. Even so, the disclosure alarmed civil liberties advocates, who feared that the searches could reveal private information and that the government could pass alarming queries to criminal investigators.

"People for too long thought they were anonymous on the Internet," said Andrew Serwin, an attorney specializing in privacy and Internet law. "People now realize they're not."

Justice Department officials could not be reached late Friday.

Federal lawyers earlier this week slashed their Google request to 5,000 randomly selected search terms entered by users and 50,000 website addresses in the company's searchable index. The government previously had requested a week's worth of queries, which could have numbered in the billions, as well as a million indexed Web addresses.

Ware granted the request for the Web addresses but declined to force Google to release the queries. He wrote in his 21-page ruling that he was balancing the government's need to gather data against Google's expectation that it could operate without undue interference or fear that its trade secrets might be revealed. Google lawyers argued at a hearing Tuesday that the company's search engine was popular in part because users trusted that their personal information would be guarded.

"The expectation of privacy by some Google users may not be reasonable, but may nonetheless have an appreciable impact on the way in which Google is perceived, and consequently the frequency with which users use Google," Ware wrote.

Federal laws generally require a search warrant or court order to procure electronic information without a user's permission, not the simple subpoena presented to Google.

Government lawyers had requested the data for an unrelated civil lawsuit regarding the Child Online Protection Act, a 1998 law blocked by a federal court. The Justice Department, seeking to restore the law, said it would use the information from search engines only to test how well Internet filters prevent children from accessing potentially harmful websites.

Deirdre Mulligan, a law profesor at UC Berkeley, called the government's request to Google "a fishing expedition."

"It's the same as going into a medical clinic and saying, 'The last few people who came in, what diseases did they ask you about?' " Mulligan said.

Google To Reveal Sites, Not Searches (AP)

By MICHAEL LIEDTKE, The Associated Press

AP, March 18, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO – A federal judge on Friday ordered Google Inc. to give the Bush administration a peek inside its search engine, but rebuffed the government's demand for a list of people's search requests – potentially sensitive information the company had fought to protect.

In his 21-page ruling, U.S. District Judge James Ware told Google to provide the U.S. Justice Department by April 3 with the addresses of 50,000 randomly selected Internet sites indexed by its search engine .

The government says it plans to use the data for a study in another case in Pennsylvania, where the Bush administration is trying to revive a law meant to shield children from online pornography.

Ware, though, decided Google won't have to disclose what people have been looking for on its widely used search engine, handing a significant victory to the company and privacy rights advocates.

"We will always be subject to government subpoenas, but the fact that the judge sent a clear message about privacy is reassuring," Google lawyer Nicole Wong wrote on the company's Web site Friday night. "What his ruling means is that neither the government nor anyone else has carte blanche when demanding data from Internet companies."

Attempts to reach a spokesman for the Justice Department late Friday were not immediately successful.

The government had asked for the contents of 5,000 randomly selected search requests, dramatically scaling back its initial demands after Google's vehement protests gained widespread attention.

When the Justice Department first turned to Ware for help in January, the government wanted an entire week's worth of Google search requests — a list that would encompass queries posed by millions of people.

Google Wins Ruling On Turning Over Search Queries To Government (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 18 (Bloomberg) -- Google Inc. won a partial victory in a battle with the government when a federal judge ruled yesterday that the company didn't have to turn over customer search queries to the U.S. Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0019469

U.S. District Judge James Ware in San Jose, California, refused to make Google, the most-used Internet search engine, give the agency 5,000 search queries as part of an effort to defend a law aimed at keeping children from accessing Internet pornography. Ware did rule Google had to comply with the U.S. demand for 50,000 Web addresses from its index of Web sites.

Google's success in limiting the government's access to customer search records came after a two-month battle that led to concerns that some Web surfers might avoid using Google, which profits by displaying ads next to search results and earning fees when consumers click on the ads.

``This is a victory for Google," said Andrew Serwin, a lawyer in the San Diego office of Foley & Lardner, who has followed the case. Google ``didn't want to give up search terms or anonymous customer data, and they didn't have to."

Ware ordered Google and the Justice Department to come up with a method to randomly select the 50,000 Web addresses in a way that would not force Google to disclose any confidential information. He gave both sides until April 3 to raise any problems with the confidentiality requirement.

1 Million Addresses

The government had originally sought as many as 1 million Web addresses, then agreed at a hearing earlier this week to narrow the data request to 50,000 Web addresses, of which the government would examine 10,000. The government also wanted the 5,000 search queries, of which it would look at 1,000.

``This is a clear victory for our users and for our company," Nicole Wong, associated general Counsel at Google said on the company's Web site. ``We believe that if the government was permitted to require Google to hand over search queries, that could have undermined confidence that our users have in our ability to keep their information private."

The government wants the data to support a lawsuit pending in federal court in Pennsylvania over whether a federal law may prove more effective in limiting minors' access to pornography on the Internet than filtering software.

``The search query data could have shown why filtering software doesn't always work," Serwin said.

The ACLU and other privacy rights organizations have so far successfully sued to block enforcement of the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, or COPA, since it was signed into law in 1998. A trial in the Pennsylvania case challenging COPA is set for Oct. 23 before U.S. District Judge Lowell Reed in Philadelphia, Fine said.

`Significantly Hampered'

Ware said that Google must turn over the Web addresses because they could help the government study the effectiveness of filtering software. Because Google is the biggest search engine, the government's effort could be ``significantly hampered" if it didn't have access to some of the information it sought.

``What the government has not demonstrated, however, is a substantial need for both the information contained in the sample of URLs and the sample of search query text," Ware wrote in a 21-page ruling released yesterday.

Ware said groups challenging the government's anti- pornography law may also seek information from Google that ``may implicate Google's confidential commercial information."

Shares of Mountain View, California-based Google rose $1.02 to $339.72 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading yesterday.

The case is Gonzales v. Google Inc., 5:06-mc-80006, U.S. District Court, Northern District of California (San Jose).

Searching For Google (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Google had its day in court this week in its battle with the Justice Department over a subpoena for data about Web searches and the sites available through Google's search engine. The judge indicated that he was inclined to give both sides something, and Justice later agreed to limit its request to "just" 5,000 sample searches and 50,000 Web addresses.

This outcome may seem Solomonic, but the precedent is still troubling. The subpoena that started it all emerged from a separate case being tried in Pennsylvania. In that case, the ACLU is challenging the constitutionality of the 1998 Child Online Protection Act, or COPA.

That law has never been enforced owing to an injunction and multiple unfavorable rulings, including one from the Supreme Court. But it nonetheless aims to protect minors from "harmful" material on the Internet by making it a crime to allow them to access it. The ACLU suit claims the law is a restriction on free speech. The Supreme Court said it might be, and sent the case back to trial for the government to prove that it wasn't.

Which is where Google, Yahoo and MSN come in. The government wants to use their search data as part of its effort to show that the law is necessary to protect minors from the Internet's seamier side. But these companies are innocent bystanders in the dispute over the constitutionality of COPA. It is one thing when company data are pursued by the government as evidence in a criminal proceeding. Most Americans would probably accept if otherwise private information were turned over to law enforcement in a case where the request is narrowly tailored and probable cause exists.

DOJ_NMG_0019470

The COPA trial is different. Tasked by the Supreme Court with justifying COPA's Internet restrictions, the Justice Department has embarked on a fishing expedition for large swathes of data about Internet use. The whole project suggests that the government has little basis for defending the law in the first place, and is hoping it can use the Web sites' data to generate a rationale after the fact.

But dragging these companies into this litigation is not without risks. The first is the possibility that the data could lead to further inquiries -- possibly under COPA, should it be upheld -- of a criminal nature. Justice has taken pains to emphasize that this case is being handled by the civil division and that there are safeguards to ensure the information does not find its way into any future criminal case. But it's not hard to imagine a legal rationale for securing the data for such a use in the future, once the precedent has been set.

Then there are the ramifications for Google, Yahoo and the rest in the COPA case itself. The ACLU has already argued that if the Web site operators become, in effect, witnesses for the government in this case, the ACLU may be compelled to seek further discovery of the data employed by Justice, the Web sites' means of gathering it, their search methodology, and so on. This is no small intrusion into the business practices and privacy reputations of companies whose stock in trade is information about what is searched for and found on the Web.

All of which highlights the dangers and unintended consequences of the government's conducting wide-ranging market research by subpoena. Two prior incarnations of COPA have already been struck down twice by the Supreme Court. The third time, the Court created a presumption of unconstitutionality but remanded the case for trial. If commandeering such data from private companies against their will is what it takes to defend the law, maybe defending it isn't worth the effort.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

N.C., Justice Department Agree On Overseas Voting In 2nd Primary (CO)

The Charlotte Observer, March 18, 2006

RALEIGH, N.C. - The Justice Department said it had reached an agreement with North Carolina officials that will allow military and other overseas voters to participate in a second primary election, if one is needed this year.

The U.S. District Court in Raleigh still must approve the agreement.

The agreement was filed at the same time as the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit because of the short amount of time between North Carolina's primary and runoff elections. Federal officials said in a news release Thursday that the four-week break doesn't provide enough time to get runoff ballots to and returned from absentee voters.

Besides other changes, the state and federal governments agreed that all military and overseas voters requesting an absentee ballot for the primary election also will receive a blank write-in ballot for a runoff. They also agreed to allow write-in ballots to be faxed and e-mailed, if necessary.

The agreement also provides for reporting to the court on the status of the North Carolina Legislature's efforts to find a permanent solution to the timing problem.

"These measures provide an immediate solution while the Legislature adopts permanent procedures, as we trust they will promptly," Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general of the Civil Rights Division, said in a statement.

The lawsuit was brought under the Uniformed and Overseas Citizens Absentee Voting Act, which requires states to allow uniformed services voters and other overseas citizens to register to vote and vote absentee for all elections for federal office.

Group Charges Libraries Filtered Out Web Site (SLPD)

By Peter Shinkle, ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 18, 2006

The Council of Conservative Citizens, a nationwide group that has been portrayed as racist, is suing four libraries in the St. Louis area for allegedly blocking patrons from viewing its Web site.

Gordon Baum, a lawyer from St. Charles who is the group's chief executive, said the U.S. Constitution protects the public's right to see his Web site.

"We don't believe we're any more to the right than the NAACP is to the left," he said, adding that his group does not advocate violence.

The site, cofcc.org, does not feature the racial epithets commonly used by racist groups. It does, however, provide a slate of news stories about crime by blacks or immigrants. It also offers for sale a T-shirt with the words, "White Pride," "Deutschland" and "Save Our Culture."

DOJ_NMG_0019471

The Southern Poverty Law Center says that racism "underlies" the group and that it has long had ties to politicians the law center considers racist.

Baum filed a suit in U.S. District Court on Monday claiming the Maplewood City Library, University City Public Library, Valley Park Community Library and Festus Public Library had violated his constitutional right to free speech by blocking access to the Web site. At least two of the libraries say they now permit patrons to view the site.

Baum said the suit was filed after the group checked on local libraries and wrote letters complaining to those libraries that blocked access to the group's site.

Maplewood City Library Director Terrence Donnelly sent the group a letter replying that the Internet filter service the library uses had blocked the site after tagging it as being in "the categories of Hate and Discrimination."

On Friday, however, Donnelly said that changed after the library's board discussed the issue on Wednesday and he consulted with a lawyer. Donnelly said the Web site is now accessible at the library.

Federal law requires libraries that use federal money to have an Internet filter that can block out pornography, but it does not require a filter to block hate speech, Donnelly said.

The University City Library stopped blocking the group's Web site after it received a letter from Baum in November, said the library's director, Linda Ballard.

"We have turned off the hate speech filters for the adult machines, but they're still in place for the children's machines," she said.

Both libraries use Morenet, a division of the University of Missouri in Columbia that offers Internet service to 85 libraries across the state. Morenet provides the libraries with the Bess filter system offered by Secure Computing, a software company in San Jose, Calif. Secure Computing's site on the Internet enables users to check on how its filters would categorize a given Web site. A check Friday on cofcc.org showed the site was considered to be "hate speech."

It was unclear whether the two other libraries block the site. Festus Public Library director Lollie Gray declined to comment. Valley Park Community Library director Bonnie Morris could not be reached for comment.

Baum said the group is not like the Ku Klux Klan and includes Jewish members. "We're not a white Supremacist group that insists you have to be a white Christian," he said.

Whistle-Blower Or Thief In Diebold Case? (LAT)

By Hemmy So, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Stephen Heller's alleged theft of papers about the firm's electronic voting machines spurs praise and scorn as he faces felony charges.

A whistle-blower to some, a thief to others, Stephen Heller says he's a regular guy, not an activist or a member of any political group.

But charged last month in Los Angeles with three felonies for allegedly stealing damaging documents about voting machine manufacturer Diebold Election Systems, Heller has become a hero to digital rights and political activists who say he helped expose a threat to the election system.

"My wife would never describe me as someone on the front lines of anything, and I wouldn't either," Heller said in a recent interview. "I'm not politically active except I've voted since I was 18."

Prosecutors say Heller, a 43-year-old actor and resident of Van Nuys, took more than 500 pages of Diebold-related documents, including memos from the company's attorneys at the Jones Day law firm. The memos suggested that the company might have broken state law by providing Alameda County with voting machines that had not been certified by the state.

"This case is not about whistle-blowing. It's about theft of attorney-client privileged material from an attorney's office," Los Angeles County district attorney spokeswoman Sandi Gibbons said.

But activists and bloggers — including the California Voter Foundation; Black Box Voting, an electronic voting group; and the liberal http://www.huffingtonpost.com website — say the purloined documents, some of which turned up on the Oakland Tribune website, helped spur a state crackdown on Diebold.

"People should be thanking Stephen Heller because ultimately he helped our secretary of state stop illegal acts by Diebold," said Cindy Coen, legal director of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, a digital rights group based in San Francisco.

Heller has pleaded not guilty to three counts of felony access to computer data, commercial burglary and receiving stolen property.

Although state law protects whistle-blowers from retaliation by employers, it does not preclude criminal prosecution.

On the advice of his lawyer, Heller declined to discuss the facts of his case, but agreed to talk more generally.

DOJ_NMG_0019472

Brought up in a small dairy farming town in upstate New York, Heller moved to Los Angeles in 1997 after years of waiting tables and performing in small theaters in Chicago. Heller said he had stopped just short of finishing a theater degree at DePaul University to dedicate himself to an acting career.

In Los Angeles, he managed to land a few small roles on television shows and in commercials. But acting failed to pay the bills and Heller refused to wait any more tables. So he brushed up on his typing skills and found work as a word processor — a decent, less stressful way to make ends meet, he said.

He lives in a quaint, one-story home with his wife, an actress and writer who also works as a word processor. They have three cats and a dog.

Heller began a three-month stint as a temporary worker at the Los Angeles office of Jones Day in December 2003. One of his assignments was transcribing an attorney's tapes on legal issues facing a major client: Diebold.

The name was familiar because of media attention surrounding the company and its new touch-screen voting systems. Heller, a news junkie, said he had had no prior dealings with the company.

Bev Harris, founder of Black Box Voting, told investigators that Heller met her in a park in Ventura County in early 2004 and gave her the documents, which she turned over to the secretary of state and the Oakland Tribune.

"What Stephen did was the best of citizenry," Harris said.

Harris and fellow activist Jim March, later joined by the state attorney general, had already sued Diebold in 2003 for allegedly failing to certify the voting system.

The lawsuit gained traction when Diebold's touch-screen systems failed in March 2004. Because of a battery drain, the screens could not display the proper ballot, and poll workers in San Diego County had to turn away some early voters. Alameda County residents had to use paper ballots.

Diebold eventually settled the suit for $2.6 million. The state banned use of its machines, but the ban was reversed this year and the machines were certified for use in 17 counties.

Gibbons said Heller's alleged theft had nothing to do with the attorney general's suit or a later investigation of Diebold by the secretary of state's office.

Members of a state commission considering the ban on Diebold, however, did question witnesses about the leaked documents.

Jones Day sued the Oakland Tribune over the leak, but later dropped the case and referred the alleged theft to authorities.

Diebold declined to comment on Heller's prosecution. Jones Day officials have said his actions forced them to return $1 million in legal fees to Diebold and damaged the reputation of one of their lawyers.

John Majoras, a partner at Jones Day, said: "As far we are aware, this is a criminal matter. The authorities are taking care of it, and we will watch to see what comes of it."

Heller said he learned that he was under investigation when a team of district attorney investigators and police descended on his Van Nuys home in August 2004 and seized his computer, personal papers and address book.

"For the first few minutes, I thought this is a mistake … just cooperate and they'll find out that I'm not that drug dealer they're looking for," Heller said. "But that wasn't the case."

Heller eventually was fired by the temporary employment agency, and remained jobless for eight months before landing work in a related field. He declined to identify his job for fear that it would be jeopardized by the publicity.

D.A. spokeswoman Jane Robison said defendants such as Heller, with no criminal record, typically receive probation if convicted.

But Heller's lawyer said he doesn't want to risk a conviction.

"The felony conviction itself will prohibit many kinds of employment for him," attorney Blair Berk said. "He'll lose his right of citizenship to vote."

The Electronic Frontier Foundation and the Assn. of Computing Machinery, an information technology group, are searching for a pro bono attorney to help represent Heller, who said he has exhausted his savings on legal fees.

Black Box Voting has donated $10,000 to the Stephen Heller Legal Defense Fund.

"I'm optimistic that the right thing is going to be done here," Heller said.

"Hopefully, I'll get a chance to properly defend myself and justice will prevail."

Putting A Racist Past In The Past (LAT)

By Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

A bill says activists who broke racially biased laws would be eligible for Alabama pardon.

DOJ_NMG_0019473

ATLANTA — Civil rights activists and others convicted under laws that enforced racial discrimination would be eligible for a pardon from the state of Alabama under a bill working its way through the Legislature, the bill's sponsor said Friday.

Rep. Thad McClammy said that his proposed "Rosa Parks Act" would serve the symbolic purpose of bestowing posthumous pardons on activists like Parks, whose 1955 arrest sparked the 381-day Montgomery bus boycott.

But McClammy, a Democrat, said the pardons also could help living veterans of the segregated South, who still may have trouble explaining away their arrests when applying for jobs or loans.

"If they do a background check, they say: 'Oh my … this person was arrested five times,' " McClammy said. "It follows you. What we're saying is, not only should individuals be pardoned, but the record should be expunged. These were illegal laws."

Some of the most famous arrests of the civil rights era occurred in Alabama in the 1950s and '60s. Parks was convicted of violating Montgomery's municipal code for refusing to move to the back of a city bus. Dozens more were charged under anti-boycott and curfew statutes.

The early 1960s saw the arrests of "freedom riders" and protesters who engaged in civil disobedience at lunch counter sit-ins. In 1963, about 3,000 children were arrested in Birmingham for taking part in civil rights demonstrations. Horace Huntley of the Birmingham Civil Rights Institute said many of those young people eventually were convicted. "Those [convictions] are still on the books, just as it was in Rosa Parks' case," said Huntley, director of the institute's oral history project.

McClammy's bill unanimously passed the Democratic-controlled Alabama House Judiciary Committee this week; House Minority Leader Mike Hubbard predicted that his fellow Republicans probably would support the measure.

"I guess it's just never occurred to me that there'd be any opposition to it," Hubbard said. "I'm 44 years old, and I've never been a part of any segregation or race problems or whatever."

Alabama has struggled to emerge from the shadows of its racist past. In 2004, voters narrowly rejected a proposed constitutional amendment to strike language requiring separate schools for "white and colored" children. That wording is superseded by federal law.

However, if McClammy's bill becomes law, it will be one of a number of recent steps taken by Alabamians toward reconciliation. In December, Montgomery's predominantly white First Baptist Church kicked off an effort to bridge the gap between black and white churches to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the bus boycott. The church has held prayer vigils and meals with members of predominantly black churches. And the Montgomery library system has named its main branch for Juliette Hampton Morgan, a library research director in the 1950s who was an outspoken white opponent of segregation. Morgan reportedly committed suicide in 1957 after intense public ridicule and threats to the library system by racist whites.

2nd Autopsy In Youth Boot Camp Death Fails To End Questions (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

MIAMI, March 17 — Martin Lee Anderson was buried a second time this week, more than two months after he died following a confrontation with guards at a boot camp for teenage offenders in the Florida Panhandle. But questions about his death, and whether the state should close all its boot camps in the aftermath, are very much alive.

After supervising a second autopsy of Martin's body on Monday, a special prosecutor appointed by Gov. Jeb Bush disputed the findings of the original pathologist in the case: that the youth had died from complications of sickle cell trait, an undiagnosed blood disorder. But the prosecutor, Mark Ober, would not say more until his broader investigation of the case was finished.

The guards at Bay Boot Camp in Panama City kneed, kicked and hit Martin, 14, after he stopped running during an orientation drill on Jan. 5. He had been sent to the camp for violating probation after stealing his grandmother's car. In a videotape, which the state released after news organizations sued for it, the boy appears limp throughout the encounter.

He died early on Jan. 6, and when the original autopsy report came out a month later, his parents, lawmakers and civil rights groups expressed outrage. Even after Mr. Ober said through a spokeswoman that Martin "did not die of sickle cell trait, nor did he die of a natural cause," the medical examiner who made those findings, Dr. Charles Siebert of Bay County, stood by them.

"I am appalled at the baseless and mean-spirited accusations from special interest groups with little or no knowledge of the evidence in this case," Dr. Siebert said in a statement on Thursday, "who are calling for everything from the revocation of my license to criminal charges."

Dr. Michael Baden, a pathologist who attended the second autopsy on behalf of Martin's family, told a legislative committee in Tallahassee on Friday that Martin had most likely suffocated during the incident and was brain dead by the time an ambulance carried him away.

DOJ_NMG_0019474

"There was a time when there were hands over Anderson's mouth," Dr. Baden said in an interview, noting that the guards held ammonia capsules under the boy's nose several times during the incident. "There may have been ammonia capsules blocking his nose, hands blocking his mouth — that could contribute to asphyxia."

The boot camp, run by the Bay County Sheriff's Office, will close next month. In a letter to state officials, Sheriff W. Frank McKeithen said he was closing it because the program had been "virtually paralyzed" after Martin's death.

The seven guards in the incident remain on the job — though not working with young offenders, who have already been cleared from the camp — while Mr. Ober decides whether they should face criminal charges.

Meanwhile, Governor Bush and his Department of Juvenile Justice are reviewing policies for the state's five other boot camps, as the Legislature debates whether they should remain open. Many states have closed military-style boot camps for teenagers in recent years, but Governor Bush said Thursday that they have "yielded a good result," and Anthony Schembri, his juvenile justice secretary, affirmed that assessment in an interview Friday.

"I think the remainder are good options that we can use for certain kids," Mr. Schembri said of the five surviving boot camps, though he said every camp should have education and therapy components.

Martin's parents, Gina Jones and Robert Anderson, said they were appalled to hear that Dr. Siebert had not changed his assessment of Martin's death after the second autopsy, which he attended. In an interview, they said every guard involved in the incident should be arrested immediately, as should a nurse who stood by during the confrontation.

"My baby passed away from the beating," said Ms. Jones, who said her son was an honor student who liked basketball, chess and video games. "It's not only the guards to blame; it's the sheriff, the doctor, the governor. It's time for the governor to step in."

In an interview, Dr. Siebert said Dr. Baden, a former chief medical examiner for New York City, was biased because Martin's parents had sought his involvement.

"I'm charged with coming to a truthful and unbiased manner of death, and I feel that's what I did in this case," he said. "I have nothing to gain by conspiring with anybody."

During a meeting on Friday of the Criminal Justice Appropriations Committee of the Florida House of Representatives, Mr. Schembri's chief of staff, Chris Caballero, said the Juvenile Justice Department might require young offenders to get electrocardiograms and drug tests before entering boot camps.

Mr. Schembri, who would not discuss the Anderson incident except to call it tragic, said he would also revise use-of-force policies at boot camps, which in Florida are for "moderate risk" young offenders.

Representative Dan Gelber, a Miami Beach Democrat on the Criminal Justice Appropriations Committee, said the video suggested that guards at the Bay Boot Camp were following an established use-of-force protocol.

"I just was shocked that the officers seemed to think this was what they were supposed to do," he said. "They clearly were inflicting substantial force on somebody who was not threatening them or himself."

Mr. Gelber added: "They knew the camera was there, they knew they were being filmed, they weren't trying to hide anything. But the notion that you could inflict pain to get somebody to run or say, 'Yes, sir' — that is just un-American."

Federal Appeals Court Allows 'Choose Life' License Plates In Tennessee (FINDLAW/AP)

By Lucas L. Johnson Ii, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 18, 2006

(AP) - NASHVILLE, Tennessee-A federal appeals court Friday allowed Tennessee to offer anti-abortion license plates bearing the message "Choose Life."

A three-judge panel of the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati overturned a lower-court ruling that said the tag illegally promoted only one side of the abortion debate.

"Although this exercise of government one-sidedness with respect to a very contentious political issue may be ill-advised, we are unable to conclude that the Tennessee statute contravenes the First Amendment," Judge John M. Rogers said in a 2-1 ruling.

An anti-abortion group, Tennessee Right to Life, declared victory.

"It's a validation of our position all along that the Legislature had the authority to authorize a plate that favors normal childbirth over the practice of abortion," said Brian Harris, the group's president.

In a dissenting opinion, Judge Boyce F. Martin Jr. said the plates should be banned because they amount to unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination.

The plaintiffs, the American Civil Liberties Union of Tennessee and Planned Parenthood of Middle and East Tennessee, said they were still reviewing Friday's ruling.

DOJ_NMG_0019475

Abortion-rights proponents complained the state does not offer those with other political views a similar way to express them. An attempt to create a "Choose Choice" tag failed in the Legislature in 2002.

Federal appeals courts have been divided over whether such license plate programs are constitutional. Last year the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower-court ruling that said similar South Carolina license plates violated the First Amendment.

Drivers will be able to pay an extra fee in Tennessee for the "Choose Life" plate, and some of the proceeds will go to New Life Resources, an anti-abortion group.

Tennessee is the 13th state to offer "Choose Life" plates. The others are Alabama, Arkansas, Connecticut, Florida, Hawaii, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Montana, Ohio, Oklahoma and South Dakota. Most states donate proceeds to adoption groups, but Alabama, Hawaii, Maryland and Montana donate at least some of the money to anti-abortion groups.

Tennessee has more than 120 specialty plates, most of them saluting uncontroversial subjects such as the Tennessee Titans football team, the Smoky Mountains and the Tennessee Walking Horse.

Gov. Phil Bredesen let the anti-abortion license plates measure become law but declined to sign it, and he urged lawmakers to develop a new approach to deciding which causes would benefit from the sale of specialty plates.

After 2 More Deaths, Planned Parenthood Alters Method For Abortion Pill (NYT)

By Gardiner Harris

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — After receiving reports that two more women died after taking abortion pills, Planned Parenthood, the nation's largest provider of abortion and contraceptive services, announced that it would immediately change the way it gives the medicines.

The change partly resolves a long-running dispute between Planned Parenthood and the Food and Drug Administration over the safest way to provide pill-based abortions.

The F.D.A. has now received reports that six women in the United States died after taking RU-486, or Mifeprex. A seventh died in Canada. The two most recent deaths and two of the previous four underwent their procedures at Planned Parenthood clinics, a spokeswoman said.

Federal officials do not yet know the cause of the latest two deaths. The previous four resulted from systemic infections with a virulent bacteria, Clostridium sordellii. Planned Parenthood announced in a statement that one of the two recent deaths occurred within days of the victim's undergoing a pill-based abortion, while the other woman died within five weeks.

Mifeprex has been used in more than 560,000 medical abortions in the United States and more than 1.5 million in Europe. The risks of death from infection after using the pill are similar to the risks after surgical abortions or childbirth, drug agency officials said.

When Mifeprex was first approved by the agency in 2000, the standard regimen was to give the drug in a doctor's office followed two days later by an oral dose of a different drug, misoprostol, also in a doctor's office. Women expelled the fetus over the following days or weeks in a process that mimicked a miscarriage. The procedure must begin within 49 days of conception.

Soon after Mifeprex's approval, most Planned Parenthood doctors switched to a different regimen, instructing women to insert misoprostol vaginally at home two to three days after taking Mifeprex. Studies of the new regimen showed that it was effective, and it allowed women to take lower doses of misoprostol. It also meant fewer office visits for Planned Parenthood.

But this regimen was not approved by the drug agency. It is not unusual for doctors to use drugs differently from how they are officially approved. But as reports of deaths among women undergoing the procedure trickled into the F.D.A., government officials issued stern warnings that doctors should stick to the approved regimen.

Until Friday, Planned Parenthood had rejected those warnings.

Dr. Vanessa Cullins, vice president of medical affairs for Planned Parenthood, said in an interview that effective immediately the group would ask patients to take misoprostol orally instead of vaginally. Although the F.D.A. has asked that this be done in doctors' offices, a Planned Parenthood spokeswoman said patients would still be asked to take the second drug at home.

"There is no single reason for the change" in policy by the group, Dr. Cullins said.

"We don't really know all the circumstances surrounding these women's deaths," she said.

Whether the method of drug administration has anything to do with the deaths is not known. The drug agency said it was "investigating all the circumstances associated with these cases." The agency has already added strong warnings to Mifeprex's label regarding the risks of infection.

On Friday, the agency repeated warnings that women who undergo pill-based abortions should be vigilant for signs of trouble. If they suffer from nausea, vomiting or diarrhea and weakness with or without abdominal pain more than a day after taking abortion medicines they should be given antibiotics.

DOJ_NMG_0019476

Clostridium sordellii infections are rare and can be difficult to diagnose because they are not always accompanied by fever.

Since reporting drug side effects is voluntary in the United States, it is possible that more women have died and that their deaths have gone unreported because doctors, medical examiners and coroners are not obligated to forward such reports to the F.D.A. Doctors and local officials also may not associate a death with a pill-based abortion, especially if the death occurs weeks later.

The risk of infections could be lowered or eliminated if abortion patients were given antibiotics as a preventative. But antibiotic therapy has its own risks, and officials say that the risk of infection from Clostridium sordellii is so slight that it does not merit such a precaution.

The government has scheduled a scientific conference on May 11 at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention to discuss Clostridium sordellii and a related bacteria, Clostridium difficile, that has caused outbreaks of diarrhea and colitis in hospitals and nursing homes.

Both bacteria generally live in the soil and human intestinal tracts. Both thrive in environments with limited oxygen. When these bacteria infect the bloodstream, they can produce a toxin that causes something akin to toxic shock syndrome.

Senators Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, and Tom Coburn, Republican of Oklahoma, released a statement Friday calling for the withdrawal of Mifeprex. They have sponsored a bill that would force the F.D.A. to withdraw the drug.

Monty Patterson, whose 18-year-old daughter, Holly, died on Sept. 17, 2003, from a Clostridium sordellii infection after a medical abortion, has since argued that Mifeprex predisposes women to such infections by suppressing their immune systems.

"How many women have to die needlessly before this drug is removed from the market?" Mr. Patterson asked.

FDA Says 2 More Women Have Died After Taking Abortion Pill (WP)

By Marc Kaufman

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Agency Is Investigating; 7 Fatalities Now Tied to RU-486

The Food and Drug Administration reported yesterday that two more women have died after taking the RU-486 abortion pill, bringing to seven the number of fatalities associated with the drug since it was approved for use in 2000.

The agency said that it was investigating the new reports, provided by the manufacturer of the drug, but so far was not able to confirm any cause of death. In four earlier fatalities of California women who had undergone medical abortions, the victims died of a form of blood poisoning caused by Clostridium sordellii , a common but rarely fatal bacterium.

Opponents of abortion quickly described the FDA advisory as another reason to ban the abortion pill, sold as Mifeprex.

"RU-486 is a deadly drug that is killing pregnant women," Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.), who has co-sponsored a bill to take the drug off the market pending a review, said in a statement. "This drug should never have been approved, and it must be suspended immediately."

But supporters said that the pill, which has been used worldwide for years, remains safe.

"To put this in context . . . 560,000 medication abortions have occurred in the United States. We know of seven reported deaths of women who had medication abortions in North America," Vanessa Cullins, vice president for medical affairs of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, said in a statement. "At this time, none of those deaths have been directly attributed" to the abortion pill, she said.

Though commonly known as RU-486, this medical abortion actually entails taking two pills. The first, an antiprogestin, binds itself to the wall of the uterus, triggering the shedding of the uterine wall and not allowing the embryo to become implanted. One or two days later, the woman takes another drug -- misoprostol -- that causes her cervix to soften and dilate so the embryo can be expelled.

As a precaution, Cullins said, Planned Parenthood is changing its policy on how medical abortions should be administered. In the past, many women received misoprostol vaginally, although the FDA had never reviewed or approved that method. Vaginal use is considered to be more effective and has fewer side effects, but Cullins said that her organization would no longer recommend that method.

In its advisory, the FDA pointedly said that the safety and effectiveness of vaginal use of the second drug "has not been established." It also said that providers of medical abortion and emergency-room staffs should investigate the possibility of blood poisoning whenever women who have taken the drugs come in complaining of nausea, vomiting or weakness unassociated with fever or other signs of infection.

The FDA said yesterday that it did not know whether the clostridium bacteria played any role in the most recent deaths, but the agency did establish that it was present in four earlier fatalities. One other death related to medical abortion was in a woman who had an ectopic pregnancy -- a condition where RU-486 is not considered appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0019477

The issue of clostridium infection will be discussed at a public workshop in May hosted by the FDA and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The bacterium has been associated with a small number of deaths and more hospitalizations involving both medical abortions and skin grafts.

The agency's handling of the seven deaths of women who had undergone medical abortion was criticized by opponents of the drug.

"The FDA has pulled other drugs that have caused fewer deaths and less severe complications than RU-486," Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, said in a statement. "Why the double-standard for an abortion drug that is now linked to the deaths of seven healthy women and over 800 other reported complications?"

Opponents of medical abortion filed a citizen's petition with the FDA soon after the drug was approved for use, but the FDA has never acted on it. In addition, Rep. Roscoe G. Bartlett (R-Md.) introduced a bill in 2003 -- called Holly's Law, after Holly Patterson, an 18-year-old California woman who died following a medical abortion -- that would ban use of RU-486. The bill has 79 co-sponsors.

Bartlett said yesterday that the maker of Mifeprex, Danco Laboratories LLC, should pull the drug from the market. If it refuses, he said, the FDA should force its withdrawal.

FDA Says Two More Women Dead After Abortion Pill Use (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration disclosed yesterday that two more American women had died after taking the abortion pill, mifepristone or RU-486; bringing to seven the number of mifepristone users who have died in this country since the drug was approved here in 2000.

"At this time, we are investigating all circumstances associated with these cases and are not able to confirm the causes of death," or know whether the abortion pill was a factor, the FDA said in a "public health advisory" posted at its Web site.

Reacting to the two new deaths, Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, and Sen. Tom Coburn, Oklahoma Republican, both demanded that sales of mifepristone be suspended immediately.

In addition to the seven deaths potentially linked to the drug, Mr. DeMint said federal records also indicate another 600 women have experienced adverse events following its use. They include 200 women whose complications were "either life-threatening or extremely serious," Mr. DeMint said.

Mifepristone, known under the trade name of Mifeprex, is approved to end pregnancies up to 49 days after the start of a woman's last menstrual cycle. It blocks a hormone needed to sustain a pregnancy. Misoprostol, which should be taken two days after mifepristone, induces labor contractions to end a pregnancy.

In its health advisory yesterday, the FDA presented the regimen it has approved for taking mifepristone and misoprostol. Rather than taking misoprostol orally, as the FDA recommends, four California women who died inserted that drug vaginally.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America Inc. said since 2000, four of the seven women who died, including the latest two, received the pills at affiliated clinics. The organization said it will immediately stop recommending vaginal insertion of the final two tablets.

The FDA yesterday warned doctors to watch for sepsis, a potentially deadly blood infection, that previously killed four California women following medical abortions using mifepristone and misoprostol. The four all tested positive for a rare bacterial infection known as Clostridium sordelli.

"We do not know if these [two] new deaths were caused by sepsis or, if they were, if they were caused by infection with Clostridium sordelli," the FDA said in its notice. But the agency urged physicians to be on the lookout for such infections in women who have used mifepristone and misoprostol to terminate pregnancies.

Wendy Wright, president of Concerned Women for America, a pro-life organization, said she was dismayed that the FDA "did not pull" the abortion pill when it announced the two additional deaths.

"The FDA has pulled other drugs that have caused fewer deaths and even some that caused complications but no deaths. Why the double standard for this abortion drug?" Miss Wright asked. The FDA says it cannot prove mifepristone or misoprostol were to blame, but says the rate of fatal sepsis in medical abortions is approximately 1 in 100,000, which is comparable with infection risks in surgical abortions and childbirths.

2 More Women Die After Taking Abortion Pills (LAT)

By Jonathan D. Rockoff, Baltimore Sun

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019478

Federal regulators are looking into whether they had the same infection that killed four California women who also took RU-486.

WASHINGTON — Two more women who took the abortion pill RU-486 have died, according to federal drug regulators who are investigating whether the same rare infection that caused four earlier deaths was responsible.

In announcing the two additional cases Friday, the Food and Drug Administration issued an alert urging doctors and patients to follow approved directions for the drug — which is used in combination with another medication, misoprostol — and to look for warning signs warranting immediate attention.

The agency did not provide further details about the two deaths, which followed reports that four women in California had died from septic shock since 2003 after undergoing medical abortions, as the procedure for using RU-486 is called.

Planned Parenthood Federation of America said it would immediately alter its procedures for administering the drug. The group had been recommending that women take the misoprostol vaginally, a widespread practice that is generally believed to be more effective but is not what the FDA recommends. The four California women took the drug vaginally.

In a statement, Planned Parenthood said one of the two recent deaths took place weeks after use of the pills, and the second several days after. It emphasized that of 560,000 women who had taken the pills in the U.S., a tiny fraction — seven — had died afterward.

According to the FDA, reports of fatal infections in women taking RU-486 are "very rare" — about 1 in every 100,000 cases.

After learning that the four California women who died had taken the abortion pills, the FDA issued a warning in July but said it did not know whether use of the abortion pills had caused the deaths. In November, it updated its alert to say that the women were infected with the same Clostridium sordellii bacterium.

Controversial even before the FDA approved its sale six years ago, RU-486 has been a flashpoint in the abortion wars. It ends a pregnancy, unlike the "morning after" pill, which prevents one.

Government investigators have said that RU-486 poses a small risk to women and that the infection that killed the four California women could occur in women giving birth as well.

The infections are hard to detect because they do not produce fevers or other signs of infection.

Some groups have called on the FDA to restrict sales, saying hundreds of deaths may not have been reported. Other groups say evidence shows that the drug is safe.

A May 11 workshop by the FDA, the Centers for Disease Control and the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases will review cases of clostridial infections, including the California deaths.

Investigators are trying to determine whether use of RU-486, sold as Mifeprex, makes women more susceptible to infection.

Birth Control (WSJ)

By Ann Zimmerman

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Morning-After Pill Comes to Wal-Mart

On Monday, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. is set to sell for the first time prescription emergency contraceptives commonly referred to as Plan B or the morning-after pill.

The move comes after a short but vociferous activist campaign that labeled the world's largest retailer as antiwomen for being the only large pharmacy chain in the country that refused to stock the pills.

Emergency contraception is in essence a high-dose birth-control pill that works by preventing the ovaries from releasing an egg, blocking the union of sperm and egg, or stopping a fertilized egg from implanting in the uterus. The pill must be taken within five days of sex, but the earlier it is taken, the more effective it is.

That Wal-Mart chose "for business reasons" not to stock the pill was an issue that simmered on the back burner for women's groups for years after the pill was first approved by the Food and Drug Administration in 1997. But with Wal-Mart on the hot seat for a slew of other issues, from a huge gender-discrimination lawsuit to its high-deductible health benefits, activists saw this as an excellent time to hit the issue again.

In February, three women filed suit against the retailer in Massachusetts. A few days later, the board that oversees Massachusetts pharmacies ruled that Wal-Mart stores in that state must fill prescriptions for emergency contraception. Illinois has a similar rule. Within short order, several other states, including Connecticut and New York, were making noise that they would follow suit. The last thing Wal-Mart needed was another state-by-state battle on its hands: More than 20 states are considering legislation that would require Wal-Mart to pay a higher percentage of employee's health-care benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0019479

But Wal-Mart's decision to stock Plan B doesn't mean the pressure is off. The retailer will allow pharmacists who object to the pills for personal reasons to refuse to dispense them, recommending another pharmacy instead if no other Wal-Mart pharmacist on the premises is willing to fill the prescription. With Wal-Mart occasionally the only pharmacy in town, especially in rural areas, some argue that refusing to dispense Plan B could present a real hardship for women. Groups are already starting to send petitions to the company, asking them to rescind the policy.

This will be a tougher fight, as Wal-Mart has more company in this arena. Rite Aid Corp., Target Corp., Walgreen Co. and Winn-Dixie Stores Inc. also allow pharmacists to refuse to dispense the pills, except in the states where it is illegal to do so. Pressure is coming from the other side, too: Sixteen states are considering legislation that would allow pharmacies to refuse to fill prescriptions for any sort of birth control -- Plan B or just everyday birth control.

Abortion Nation (WSJ)

By James Q. Wilson

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

When South Dakota passed a law banning all abortions save those that threaten the physical health of the mother, opponents of abortion were cheered and defenders of it outraged. I think both sides were mistaken.

Roe v. Wade, decided in 1973, did not create abortion, it created a right to an abortion. The decision had few merits on constitutional grounds and it was a disaster on political ones. For nearly a quarter of a century American politics has been convulsed by a polarizing debate. No one can become the Democratic presidential candidate without favoring abortion and (so far) no one can become the Republican candidate without opposing it. This has driven the candidates and parties far apart even though most Americans occupy a middle ground on the issue.

Abortion has become the key test for selecting people for high-level judicial offices. When Sen. Charles Schumer says he favors using "ideology" as a test for judges, the ideology he has in mind is abortion. When other senators oppose a "litmus test" for judges, the test to which they refer is about abortion. We closely watch Supreme Court decisions to see if they will oppose even the slightest restriction on this "right."

By contrast, abortion is scarcely an issue in most European democracies, not because the people who live there have views radically different from American ones, but because legislatures, not courts, authorized abortions using language that tried to strike a reasonable balance among competing views.

When other countries authorized abortions, they did not authorize a right to one. Their laws were designed to give varying degrees of respect to unborn life. (Only in China is there a law as permissive as that conferred by Roe v. Wade.) When Prof. Mary Ann Glendon surveyed abortion laws here and abroad in the late 1980s, she found that in France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Switzerland and the U.K. there existed pre-abortion waiting periods, mandatory counseling, time limits of when during a pregnancy an abortion could occur, and a requirement that several physicians agree on the need for an abortion.

Suppose, in response to a lawsuit brought against the South Dakota law, Roe were overturned. Abortion would not disappear. Women would not visit quack doctors or travel to Sweden. Abortion would be legalized in many states (it was legal in five before Roe was decided), but having been made legal by state legislatures, the laws would, as in Europe, accommodate the diverse views of proponents and opponents. Ardent defenders of abortion would realize that, in exchange for a small bus fare, a woman in South Dakota could go to a nearby state where abortions were easy to obtain. Ardent opponents would know that if they wished to live in an abortion-free state, they could move to one.

In making these decisions, the states would be exercising their police powers; that is, their right to pass laws that protect the lives, health and morality of their citizens. The federal government has no such police power; it can only act in ways that can be plausibly derived from the Constitution. The Framers would have never imagined that the national government would pass laws about abortion -- or marriage, or parenting, or private sexual acts.

There are, of course, checks on the states' police powers. They cannot be used in ways that plainly deprive people of rights guaranteed by state or federal constitutions. A state regulation must be reasonably related to the provision of a public good. But within those limits, states can and do regulate sex, marriage, divorce, parenting and communicable diseases.

The states should also decide about gay marriage. Some conservatives are urging Congress to propose a constitutional amendment banning this, but this would be a mistake. People should vote on this matter and about the conditions of life they wish to experience where they live. Though I oppose gay marriage, voters in some states may approve it. If they do, we will have a chance to learn what it means in practice, with the costs and benefits falling on people who have accepted it.

Moreover, a state-by-state vote on the matter provides an opportunity for gay advocates of this policy to make their case. A constitutional amendment would deny them that opportunity, leaving them perpetually angry. Since feelings run high on this matter, it would be a mistake to let it be decided as the right to abortion was decided. If there were the gay marriage equivalent of

DOJ_NMG_0019480

Roe v. Wade or a constitutional ban on it, we would infect the nation with the divisive anger that followed Roe and our earlier attempt at alcohol prohibition.

If there is to be a constitutional amendment, it would be better if it said this: "Nothing in this Constitution shall authorize a federal judge to decide that a marriage can be other than between one man and one woman." If I could think of language to bar judges from making other social policy decisions, I would add it, but the words fail me.

The rising demand that every personal preference become a constitutional right is a worrisome disease. People, of course do have rights; the Constitution and the first 10 amendments spell most of them out. That document defines the essential requirements of life and liberty. Adding new invented rights by either a ratified amendment or judicial overreaching is a mistake.

Mr. Wilson has taught at Harvard, UCLA and Pepperdine, and is the author, among other books, of "The Moral Sense" (Free Press, 1997).

FDA To Review Ban On Gay Men Donating Blood (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

The Food and Drug Administration is considering revising its policy that bars as a blood donor any man who has had sex with another man since 1977, officials said yesterday.

The change in policy is being recommended by the American Red Cross, the American Association of Blood Banks and America's Blood Centers, which collect virtually all the blood used for transfusions nationwide.

The three groups requested the change at a March 8 workshop the FDA convened to review the latest scientific information about the safety of the blood supply, arguing that current tests and screening methods have improved enough to protect transfusion recipients without the lifetime ban.

Instead, the group recommended that men be barred from donating for only a year after having had sex with another man, treating them the same as other groups at increased risk for spreading sexually transmitted virus through donated blood.

"We strongly support the use of rational, scientifically based deferral policies, and we want them to be applied fairly and consistently," said Ryland Dodge, a Red Cross spokesman.

The FDA implemented the lifetime ban in the mid-1980s when concerns about the spread of the human immunodeficiency virus, which causes AIDS, were running high and many questions remained about the ease with which people could spread the virus and the reliability of screening methods. Since then, the accuracy of testing has improved substantially, as have questionnaires that all donors answer to identify those posing the greatest risk, Dodge said.

"All these things come together to make us much more confident that our layers of safety have improved to the point where they should review the policy," Dodge said.

FDA spokesman Stephen King said the agency would convene a meeting of its Blood Products Advisory Committee to formally reconsider revising the policy, probably later this year.

Agency officials are "definitely interested in hearing all the science, and if there's hard evidence in place that changing the policy would not endanger the blood supply they're definitely open to it," King said.

The current policy has drawn strong criticism from gay rights groups.

"The blood deferral policy that exists is not based on science. It's based on inertia and in many cases stereotypes," said Jon Givner of the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund. "The FDA should revisit the issue and adopt a deferral policy that is based on actual risk rather than sexual orientation."

ANTITRUST:

Maytag, Whirlpool Deal At Risk (AP)

By David Pitt

AP, March 18, 2006

DES MOINES, IOWA - Shares of Maytag Corp. (the parent of North Canton's Hoover Co.) and Whirlpool Corp. fell Friday on speculation that the federal government may challenge their proposed merger.

Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Mich., has proposed a $1.79 billion acquisition of Maytag.

The U.S. Department of Justice antitrust division sought an extension to review the merger last month. The companies have agreed not to close the transaction before March 30.

A leading antitrust lawyer said a decision is likely to come next week.

DOJ_NMG_0019481

The heightened speculation drove stock prices for both companies lower Friday. Maytag shares dropped $1.23, or 6.9 percent, to close at $16.71 on the New York Stock Exchange. Whirlpool shares fell $1.29, or 1.5 percent, to $86.25.

Steven C. Sunshine, a supervisor of the antitrust division's merger enforcement program from 1993 to 1995, said antitrust attorneys have expected the government to challenge the deal because it concentrates so much power in one company.

``I think this is a merger that on true antitrust principles raises real concerns," said Sunshine, now head of the antitrust practice at the New York law firm of Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft.

The merger would create a company that produces half of the dishwashers in the United States and more than 70 percent of its clothes washers and dryers. Under long-standing federal guidelines, a rise in market concentration of that magnitude would usually draw a court challenge.

Antitrust attorneys have sought sworn statements from business rivals and customers as they review the deal, which was approved by Maytag's shareholders in December, the Wall Street Journal reported Feb 13.

Gina Talamona, spokeswoman for the Justice Department, declined to comment Friday, confirming only that the merger is still under review.

The Competition Bureau of Canada, an independent law enforcement agency, concluded on Tuesday that it had no grounds to challenge the merger under Canada's Competition Act.

Sunshine said it appears the U.S. Department of Justice antitrust staff has made a recommendation to challenge the merger to Tom Barnett, who heads the division. Barnett will make the final decision about whether the government challenges the merger in court.

If it does, the companies have the option of fighting a lengthy court battle, abandoning the deal or agreeing to sell off parts of the business to allay government concerns.

If Whirlpool chooses to walk away, it must pay Maytag $120 million.

Prudential Equity Group analyst Nicholas Heymann said he believes the Justice Department will oppose the merger ``based on the potential for anticompetitive pricing by the merged entity."

In a March 17 research note to investors, he speculated that the merger makes economic sense for Whirlpool only if the company increases the price of some washers and dryers to help boost profits.

A Whirlpool spokesman didn't immediately return calls for comment. CEO Jeff M. Fettig said Tuesday that the merger ``will result in better products, quality and service, as well as cost efficiencies, which will enhance our ability to succeed in the competitive global home-appliance industry."

A Maytag spokesman declined to comment. Maytag is based in Newton, Iowa.

Whirlpool's Maytag Purchase May Be Opposed By U.S. (Update7) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Justice Department lawyers are gathering evidence for a possible court challenge to Whirlpool Corp.'s proposed $1.68 billion purchase of home appliance rival Maytag Corp., people familiar with the case say.

Antitrust enforcers are worried the Whirlpool deal would let the combined company raise prices through control of more than two-thirds of the U.S. market for some appliances, said antitrust lawyers who spoke on condition of anonymity because they aren't authorized to talk about the case. They said the government has questioned such retailers as Lowe's Cos. and Home Depot Inc. and Whirlpool's manufacturing rivals.

The decision on whether to pursue the agency's first court challenge to a takeover in two years will be up to the Bush administration's new antitrust chief, Thomas O. Barnett, 44. It will be the first test of his approach to mergers since he won Senate confirmation Feb. 10 as assistant attorney general.

``If they don't challenge this merger, Ford and General Motors is next," said Steven M. Axinn, a New York antitrust lawyer not involved in the transaction. ``Unless someone can argue that Maytag is going out of business, I don't understand how the government can let this deal happen."

Maytag shares fell $1.03, or 5.7 percent, to $16.91 as of 1:06 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. Whirlpool shares declined 90 cents, or 1 percent, to $86.64.

Maytag Shares

Maytag shares are up about 16 percent and Whirlpool has risen about 26 percent since June when Ripplewood Holdings and Chinese refrigerator maker Haier Group Corp. entered the bidding for Maytag. Haier withdrew from the competition in July.

The difference between Whirlpool's $21 offer for each Maytag share and the current share price widened to almost 25 percent today.

``That suggests that Wall Street does not have confidence this transaction will happen," Axinn said. ``This is not a situation for the faint of heart."

The combination of Whirlpool, which makes stoves, ranges and washing machines, and Maytag, manufacturer of Amana refrigerators and Maytag washers and dryers, would create the world's largest appliance maker. The takeover would give Whirlpool more than 70 percent of the U.S. market for washing machines and dryers and almost half the dishwasher market.

Under Review

``We are still looking at the proposed transaction,'' said Justice Department spokesman Gina Talamona.

``We are not commenting,'' said Whirlpool spokesman Christopher Wyse. Maytag spokesman John Daggett declined to comment.

Maytag, which reported a fourth-quarter loss of $75 million, or 93 cents a share, said last month it may sell its Jade commercial business and its Hoover vacuum cleaner unit. In the year-earlier period, the loss was $14.1 million, or 18 cents a share.

Maytag's operating margin, the amount it makes after deducting costs, turned negative last quarter. It reported losing 1.6 cents for every dollar of sales. In 2000, the company made about 14 cents of profit on each dollar of sales. Whirlpool's operating margin was 6.3 percent last quarter, according to Bloomberg data.

Whirlpool and Maytag say their deal would promote competition by cutting costs from closing Maytag factories and consolidating production. They cite increased sales by foreign appliance makers such as Sweden's Electrolux AB, LG Corp. of South Korea and Haier.

Questioned Under Oath

The Justice Department's staff has questioned executives of the companies under oath, a sign the agency is preparing for a possible court challenge, the people familiar with the case said.

Last month, Whirlpool, based in Benton Harbor, Michigan, and Newton, Iowa-based Maytag, agreed to give the department until March 30 to complete its investigation. The company could extend that deadline if the government wants more time.

Before Barnett makes a decision, company officials will get a chance to meet with him and others at the Antitrust Division to argue for the transaction.

Atlanta-based Home Depot, the world's largest home improvement retailer, has told the government the deal would hurt its business, people said. Home Depot, which now sells Maytag products, fears that the combined company would deny it access to the most popular brands and could lead to higher prices for less popular brands made by other companies, one person said.

``We don't comment on vendor transactions,'' said Home Depot spokesman Jerry Shields.

Losing Battles

The government lost its last two court battles to stop mergers. In 2004, a U.S. judge in San Francisco rejected the Justice Department's request to block software maker Oracle Corp.'s $7.7 billion acquisition of PeopleSoft Inc. The Federal Trade Commission also lost an effort later that year to block Arch Coal Inc.'s $364 million acquisition of Triton Coal Co. in Wyoming's Powder River Basin.

Those defeats have made the government cautious about challenging mergers, according to observers and antitrust experts.

``Justice has been very gun shy about going into court'' since the Oracle defeat, said Herb Hovenkamp, who teaches antitrust at the University of Iowa's College of Law in Iowa City.

He predicted ``the tide will turn a little'' and the government may be more aggressive in the Whirlpool case because recent Supreme Court decisions show deference to the government on antitrust issues.

Congressional Concerns

Barnett's decision on the Whirlpool case is being watched closely. He became acting head of the antitrust division in June when his former boss, R. Hewitt Pate, left government for private law practice.

Late last year, Republican senators Jon Kyl of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas held up a Senate vote on Barnett's nomination for three months, complaining about his role in pressing for a breakup of the Oracle-PeopleSoft deal.

On Dec. 16, the Wall Street Journal's editorial page praised Kyl and Brownback for ``raising a red flag'' about Barnett, and on March 13 the newspaper urged the Justice Department to clear Whirlpool's bid for Maytag. The ``main beneficiary of an antitrust injunction would be foreign companies,'' the editorial said.

``Mr. Barnett assured Congress during his confirmation hearings that he appreciates the global scope of modern markets,'' the newspaper said. The Whirlpool case ``will be the first test of his sincerity.''

Higher Prices

With just three large U.S. appliance makers, Whirlpool, Maytag and General Electric Co., the Justice Department is trying to determine whether the Whirlpool-Maytag combination would result in higher prices for washers, dryers and dishwashers.

DOJ_NMG_0019483

Foreign makers such as Electrolux, LG and Haier sell expensive appliances in the U.S., accounting for less than 10 percent of the U.S. market.

Consumers purchasing washing machines priced from $200 to $600 have fewer choices because it is too expensive for foreign makers to ship their cheaper brands to the U.S.

After Whirlpool announced its Maytag offer in July, the company's antitrust lawyer, James F. Rill, argued that increased sales by foreign manufacturers plus the buying power of discount appliance stores such as Home Depot, Lowe's, Best Buy Co. and Sears Holding Corp. would keep the market competitive.

``Synergies and efficiencies'' from the combination would also mean cheaper products, Rill said. He also said the government shouldn't consider Whirlpool's production of Sears Kenmore appliances part of its market share.

``Sears owns the Kenmore label. Sears sets the pricing for the Kenmore product,'' Rill said in a July 18, 2005, interview. Antitrust enforcers have rejected that argument, people familiar with the case said.

4 Companies Under Federal Investigation (BEAUENT)

By Dan Wallach, The Enterprise

Beaumont (TX) Enterprise, March 18, 2006

Four U.S. chemical companies, including two with a major Southeast Texas presence, received subpoenas from the U.S. Department of Justice as part of an investigation into possible anti-competitive pricing in certain materials that are used in a variety of consumer goods.

The companies include Huntsman Corp., BASF Corp., Dow Chemical Co., and Lyondell Chemical Co.

The justice department delivered the subpoenas for documents to the companies in mid-February, said publicists for three of the companies contacted Friday by The Enterprise.

A spokeswoman for the justice department acknowledged the investigation but offered little detail.

"The anti-trust division is investigating the possibility of anti-competitive practices in the polyurethanes industry," said justice department spokeswoman Gina Talamona.

Polyurethanes are made from chemical bases that eventually are used in the production of consumer goods. The material is used in shoe soles, furniture padding, automotive components such as steering wheels and dashboards, particle board used in home construction and as insulation in residential and commercial refrigerators.

Huntsman Corp. spokesman Don Olsen said the subpoena sought documents related to sales and pricing.

"We are cooperating fully," Olsen said. "We don't know the basis of the investigation nor do we know why."

Huntsman does not make any of the material in Jefferson County, Olsen said. The company's largest manufacturing unit for polyurethanes is in Geismar, La.

BASF also does not make the material in Jefferson County, and most of its production also is in Geismar, said Jack Maurer, a BASF spokesman.

"Yes, we were subpoenaed but we're not aware of any violation on the part of BASF," he said.

Susan Moore, a spokeswoman for Houston-based Lyondell, also confirmed the company received a subpoena.

"We believe we haven't violated any antitrust laws," she said.

In 2004, Lyondell acquired the PD Glycol plant in Beaumont, which makes products such as antifreeze, unrelated to the justice department's probe.

A call to Dow Chemical at its headquarters in Midland, Mich., was not returned Friday.

Airlines Can Legally Meet (FWST)

By Bob Cox

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 18, 2006

Officials from American Airlines and Southwest Airlines could negotiate a proposal to resolve the Wright Amendment controversy without running afoul of federal antitrust laws, legal experts said Friday.

Legal precedent allows competing businesses "to petition government" and propose legislation or regulation if they are not conspiring to fix prices or divide up market share, experts said. American says it is reluctant to enter talks with Southwest on Wright for fear of an antitrust inquiry or Justice Department lawsuit.

If American and Southwest "work out a compromise and ask Congress to enact a statute, then they're protected," said George Cohen, a professor at the University of Virginia's law school.

What the legal community calls the Noerr-Pennington doctrine, named for two precedent-setting Supreme Court cases, allows competing companies to work together to influence the legislative or executive branch of government without violating the Sherman Antitrust Act.

DOJ_NMG_0019484

"No violation of the Sherman Act can be predicated upon mere attempts to influence the passage or enforcement of laws, and the Sherman Act, therefore, does not prohibit two or more persons from associating together in an attempt to persuade the legislature or the executive to take particular action with respect to a law that would produce a restraint or monopoly," the court ruled in the 1961 Noerr case.

In the cases, the court ruled that the constitutional guarantee of individuals' and corporations' right to petition government supersedes antitrust laws, designed to preserve competition among businesses.

American and Southwest could offer a compromise to resolve the Wright controversy "no matter how stupid or anticompetitive it might be," said Bruce Foer, president of the American Antitrust Institute, a Washington, D.C.-based legal group that works to preserve and enhance business competition.

Cohen and Foer cited the example of tobacco companies working together to propose legislation that allowed the industry to resolve lawsuits brought by states and individuals.

Still, any law or regulation enacted through the airlines' efforts could still be subject to legal challenges.

Proposing a political compromise would be one thing. But if the two airlines tried to divide up routes between them, Foer said, the legal ramifications "might get dicey."

That Other Madness This Month: Mergers (NYT)

By Mark A. Stein

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

MARCH madness is not limited to college basketball. Billions of dollars in mergers were announced this week, building on the momentum created when AT&T offered to acquire BellSouth for $67 billion earlier in the month.

The trend even swept up entire stock exchanges, as the Nasdaq Stock Market offered to buy the London Stock Exchange (just as the New York Stock Exchange was weighing a bid of its own), and Euronext, the owner of the Paris, Amsterdam, Brussels and Lisbon stock markets, said it was interested in buying Deutsche Börse, the German exchange.

BUT FIRST, A CORRECTION Just as investors may have been recovering from General Motors' $8.6 billion loss last year, the company stepped up to say the loss was actually $10.6 billion. It said the added losses more accurately reflected the costs of scaling back its North American operations and of helping its former parts subsidiary, Delphi, restructure while in bankruptcy protection.

G.M. said it would also restate five years of results and delay filing its annual report with the Securities and Exchange Commission while it looks into accounting irregularities at its residential mortgage unit.

CHARGE! Eager to further diversify its business amid rising interest rates and slowing growth for credit card issuers, Capital One Financial, the big credit card company, agreed to buy the North Fork Bancorporation, a regional bank serving the Northeast, for about $14.6 billion in cash and stock.

After its acquisition last fall of the Hibernia National Bank in New Orleans, Capital One would have deposits of more than $84 billion when its North Fork acquisition is completed. It would have more than 50 million customer accounts and 655 branches from White Plains to Brownsville, Tex.

Credit card companies are looking for new ways of financing the debt accumulated by their customers. In the past, card issuers repackaged the debt into bonds. Teaming up with banks also lets them use relatively inexpensive bank deposits to finance card debt.

HEADLINE NEWS The McClatchy Company, a California newspaper publisher, won a one-bid auction for Knight Ridder, offering $4.5 billion in cash and stock for its 32 newspapers, including The Miami Herald, The Star-Telegram of Fort Worth and The Charlotte Observer in North Carolina.

To help finance the deal and head off some antitrust concerns, McClatchy, which is based in Sacramento, immediately put 12 of the papers back up for sale. Among those it plans to sell are The Mercury News in San Jose, Calif., Knight Ridder's hometown; The Akron Beacon Journal in Ohio, which was the first in the chain; and both papers in Philadelphia, The Inquirer and The Daily News.

Gary Pruitt, the chief executive of McClatchy, which already owned The Star Tribune in Minneapolis, The Sacramento Bee and The News & Observer in Raleigh, N.C., said he hoped he could complete both the acquisition and the sale this summer.

DRUG DEAL Even some Europeans got carried away by merger furor: Merck of Germany made a hostile $17.7 billion bid for Schering of Germany, the largest maker of oral contraceptives. The businesses are unaffiliated with similarly named American companies: Merck & Company and Schering-Plough.

A combination of Merck and Schering would create the second-largest drug maker in Germany after Bayer, with annual sales of $13 billion. Midsize pharmaceutical companies are under pressure to buy one another as generics makers eat away at their profit margins and the cost of discovering and developing new drugs rises.

DOJ_NMG_0019485

Schering's board rejected the Merck offer, but it may be persuaded by a higher price from a bigger company, including Novartis of Switzerland or GlaxoSmithKline of Britain.

TAX FIRM SUED The New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, sued H&R Block, the nation's largest tax-preparation service, accusing it of selling retirement-savings plans without disclosing that investors would probably earn less from the plans than they would pay in fees.

Last month, the California attorney general, Bill Lockyer, accused Block of illegally promoting high-cost loans as "instant" tax refunds. The company agreed last year to pay $62.5 million to settle four class-action lawsuits over those refund-anticipation loans.

Perhaps even more embarrassing for the company, Block has said it will need to restate profits for two years because it understated its 2004 state tax liabilities by millions of dollars.

Despite these issues, federal banking regulators have approved H&R Block's plan to start its own savings bank later this year.

DELAY OF GAME In an embarrassing development, Sony pushed back the introduction of its PlayStation 3 video game console to November — months after it originally planned to start selling the consoles and almost a full year after its chief rival, Microsoft, was able to put its latest hardware into stores.

Sony is counting on PlayStation 3 to showcase two new technologies: the Blu-ray high-definition DVD format and the Cell processing chip. Sony had hoped the new PlayStation would help spread the use of the Blu-ray format, which is in a separate battle with a Toshiba technology to become the global standard for next-generation DVD's.

Analysts said Sony would probably try to sell PlayStation 3 for about $500. While that is $100 more than the Microsoft Xbox 360, they said it was probably much less than the actual building cost.

MOST VIEWED Following are the most-viewed business news articles on nytimes.com from March 11 through March 17:

1. A Cancer Drug's Big Price Rise Is Cause for Concern
2. Many Utilities Collect for Taxes They Never Pay
3. As Internet TV Aims at Niche Audiences, the Slivercast Is Born
4. TV Stations Fined Over CBS Show Deemed to Be Indecent
5. Surgical Device Poses a Rare but Serious Peril

ENVIRONMENT:

Judges Overturn Bush Bid To Ease Pollution Rules (NYT)

By Michael Janofsky

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — A federal appeals court on Friday overturned a clean-air regulation issued by the Bush administration that would have let many power plants, refineries and factories avoid installing costly new pollution controls to help offset any increased emissions caused by repairs and replacements of equipment.

Ruling in favor of a coalition of states and environmental advocacy groups, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit said the "plain language" of the law required a stricter approach. The court has primary jurisdiction in challenges to federal regulations.

The ruling by a three-judge panel was the court's second decision in less than a year in a pair of closely related cases involving the administration's interpretations of a complex section of the Clean Air Act. Unlike its ruling last summer, when the court largely upheld the E.P.A.'s approach against challenges from industry, state governments and environmental groups, the new ruling was a defeat for the agency and for industry, and a victory for the states and their environmentalist allies.

In the earlier case, a panel including two of the three judges who ruled on Friday decided that the agency had acted reasonably in 2002, when it issued a rule changing how pollution would be measured, effectively loosening the strictures on companies making changes to their equipment and operations.

But on Friday, the court said the agency went too far in 2003 when it issued a separate new rule that opponents said would exempt most equipment changes from environmental reviews — even changes that would result in higher emissions.

With a wry footnote to Lewis Carroll's "Through the Looking Glass," the court said that "only in a Humpty-Dumpty world" could the law be read otherwise.

"We decline such a world view," said their unanimous decision, written by Judge Judith W. Rogers, an appointee of President Bill Clinton. Judges David Tatel, another Clinton appointee, and Janice Rogers Brown, a recent Bush appointee, joined her.

DOJ_NMG_0019486

The winners this time —more than a dozen states, including New York and California and a large group of environmental organizations — hailed the decision as one of their most important gains in years of litigation, regulation and legal challenges under the Clean Air Act.

The provision of the law at issue, the "new source review" section, governs the permits required at more than 1,300 coal-fueled power plants around the country and 17,000 factories, refineries and chemical plants that spew millions of tons of pollution into the air each year.

"This is an enormous victory over the concerted efforts by the Bush administration to dismantle the Clean Air Act," Eliot Spitzer, the New York attorney general, whose office led the opposition from the states, said in an interview.

Mr. Spitzer, who is running for governor, said the ruling "shows that the administration's effort to misinterpret and undermine the statute is illegal."

Howard Fox, a lawyer for Earth Justice, which represented six environmental and health groups in the case, called the ruling "a victory for public health," adding, "It makes no sense to allow huge multimillion-dollar projects that drastically increase air pollution without installing up-to-date pollution controls."

The E.P.A. issued only a brief statement, saying: "We are disappointed that the court did not find in favor of the United States. We are reviewing and analyzing the opinion."

The decision is unlikely to be the last word; several circuit courts or appeals courts have considered or decided related cases, and the issue may eventually reach the Supreme Court. Some in Congress say the uncertainty demands an overhaul of the Clean Air Act itself, but there has been no real movement in that direction in recent years.

The new ruling addressed the administration's effort in 2003 to offer relief to energy companies that faced costly settlements of litigation brought by President Clinton's E.P.A. The agency proposed exemptions for companies whenever upgrades to their equipment amounted to less than 20 percent of the replacement cost of the equipment. In effect, that made perennial repairs of old equipment a more attractive alternative in many cases than its outright replacement.

Energy companies said the two rules the administration proposed in 2002 and 2003 would help them expand energy supplies at lower cost to consumers. But environmentalists said the change would result in just the kind of increased pollution that the law was intended to control.

The Clean Air Act calls for companies to build plants with up-to-date control technologies, and the new source provision was a way to ensure that as time goes by, pollution controls must be modernized along with the plants themselves.

Industry groups, which had challenged the first E.P.A. rule last year as not being flexible enough, were aligned with the agency this time. In general, they have been close partners with the Bush administration in environmental matters, pushing for greater economic considerations in the creation of any new policy.

The 20 percent threshold in the overturned rule would have enabled plant operators to make many repairs and upgrades without spending additional tens of millions of dollars for more advanced pollution controls. In settlements under the old rules, some companies faced costs of more than $100 million.

"This is a terrible decision," said Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, a trade organization, arguing that the "any physical change" definition created financial instability for plant operators who spent as much as $800 million for a new boiler.

He and other industry leaders expressed hope that the court ruling might induce Congress to pass new legislation that would include New Source Review, a step that he said would make it easier for plant operators to plan for their future upgrades and investments.

John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, called the ruling "a significant setback to business efficiency" and environmental quality.

The government has 45 days to decide whether to seek a review of the ruling by the entire appeals court.

Court Rejects EPA's Loosening Of Air Rule (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON — Dealing a sharp setback to the Bush administration, a federal appeals court Friday threw out a controversial regulation in the federal government's clean-air program that would have allowed older factories, refineries and power plants to install new equipment without using the most modern anti-pollution devices.

The U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which decides some of the most far-reaching cases dealing with federal regulations, said the Environmental Protection Agency had relied on "Humpty Dumpty" reasoning in arriving at a rule that critics said would have eased enforcement of a law intended to reduce industrial air pollution.

DOJ_NMG_0019487

If the regulation were allowed to take effect, the court said, "a law intended to limit increases in air pollution would allow sources operating below applicable emission limits to increase significantly the pollution they emit without government review."

California and 13 other states had challenged the EPA ruling.

The Clean Air Act requires major industrial sites that modernize their equipment to install the most modern pollution-reducing devices. But in August 2003, the Bush administration altered enforcement of the regulation to allow companies to avoid installing the most expensive new emissions-cutting equipment if the price of the modernization was less than 20% of what it would cost to replace a major component of the plant. In California, whose air pollution rules are among the strictest in the nation, it takes less pollution to count as a major emitter than elsewhere. Many smaller facilities, among them some auto body paint shops, bakeries and small-parts manufacturers, fall into that category and come under the regulation.

Manufacturers, power plant operators and others had worked for years to win the revision in a section of the law known as "new source review." Almost as soon as it was announced, it faced legal challenges. Since then, court actions have chipped away at the administration's relaxation of the landmark 1970 law that has cleaned up some of the nation's worst air pollution. In December 2003, the appeals court here stayed enforcement of the administration's revision.

Last June, the court delivered a divided verdict on the measure. It upheld the rule change itself, but it decided that the EPA had erred in declaring that power plants and other large polluters did not have to keep records of their emissions. It concluded that without the documentation, regulators would not know whether the facilities were breaking clean-air laws.

The case decided Friday, which can be appealed to the Supreme Court, reaches further. Representatives of industry and environmental groups disagreed sharply over the impact.

The National Assn. of Manufacturers said the court was applying unnecessary limits on an EPA effort to ease what proponents of the change consider a burdensome aspect of the clean-air law. John Engler, the association's president, said the clean-air law could "trigger an endless review process for power plants and other stationary sources of air emissions that merely want to repair or upgrade existing facilities."

New York Atty. Gen. Eliot Spitzer, whose office played a leading role in opposing the administration's rule, called the decision "an enormous victory for clean air and for the enforcement of the law, and an overwhelming rejection of the Bush administration's efforts to gut the law."

Spitzer's top environmental lawyer, Peter Lehner, said 800 power plants and up to 17,000 factories nationwide would be affected.

"This is a victory for public health," said Howard Fox, an attorney at Earthjustice, which represented six groups in the case. "It makes no sense to allow huge multimillion-dollar projects that drastically increase air pollution without installing up-to-date pollution controls or even notifying nearby residents."

The case was decided unanimously by a panel made up of two judges appointed by President Clinton — Judith W. Rogers and David S. Tatel — and Judge Janice Rogers Brown, a former California Supreme Court justice, whose nomination to the appeals court by Bush encountered a filibuster by Democrats.

The new-source-review regulation was intended to bring aging facilities, which are responsible for a disproportionate share of the nation's air pollution, up to current standards when their operators modernized for efficiency and profitability. The administration said relaxing the rule would encourage plants to increase their efficiency and provide more affordable energy. Critics said it would make it easier for plants to increase emissions, causing more asthma and premature deaths, and choking cities and national parks with smog.

That argument continued Friday: Scott Segal, director of the Electric Reliability Coordinating Council, said the ruling would "delay efficiency improvements … at the heart of effective emissions control."

Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) said the rule was written "to allow polluters to get away with not installing modern pollution controls on upgraded plants," and was "nothing more than a free ride for polluters."

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Looser Emission Rules Rejected (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Court Says Changes By EPA Violated Clean Air Act

A federal appeals court blocked the Bush administration's four-year effort to loosen emission rules for aging coal-fired power plants, unanimously ruling yesterday that the changes violated the Clean Air Act and that only Congress could authorize such revisions.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit sided with officials from 14 states, including New York, California and Maryland, who contended that the rule changes -- allowing older power plants, refineries and factories to upgrade their facilities without having to install the most advanced pollution controls -- were illegal and could increase the amount of health-threatening pollution in the atmosphere.

DOJ_NMG_0019488

The Environmental Protection Agency's New Source Review policy was formally issued in 2003 but has never taken effect because of legal challenges by state officials and environmental groups. The administration has long argued that the existing standards are too stringent and have discouraged utility plants and other industries from upgrading and expanding their facilities. But opponents have characterized the rule changes as a favor to administration allies in the utility and coal-producing industries that would greatly add to public health problems.

New York Attorney General Eliot L. Spitzer, who led the court fight to block the administration's New Source Review policy, called yesterday's ruling "a major victory for clean air and public health" and a "rejection of a flawed policy."

"It will encourage industry to build new and cleaner facilities, instead of prolonging the life of old, dirty plants," Spitzer said.

In a statement, EPA spokesman John Millet said: "We are disappointed that the Court did not find in favor of the United States. We are reviewing and analyzing the opinion and cannot comment further at this time."

Some studies have linked pollution from coal-fired power plants to as many as 20,000 premature deaths in the United States every year. Environmental activists have made curbing this type of pollution one of their most pressing legislative and legal priorities, and yesterday they celebrated the ruling.

"Irish eyes are surely smiling -- and we all will be breathing easier -- with this green court ruling on St. Patrick's Day," said John Walke, director of the clean-air program at the Natural Resources Defense Council. "This is about as thorough a rebuke a court can give."

President Bush took office in 2001 promising to ease regulations on coal-fired power plants as part of a larger energy production initiative. Three successive administrators of the EPA have tried without success to alter the rules and policies adopted during the Clinton administration that cracked down on aging power plants and refineries that were not equipped with modern air pollution equipment when they were upgraded and when their output was expanded.

Under the revised policy that was rejected by the court yesterday, power plants and other industrial polluters would not have to install new pollution technology if they modernized less than 20 percent of their operations.

The central question in the case focused on what constitutes an industrial facility "modification," because that is what triggers the federal requirement to cut down on the smog or soot emitted by utilities, oil refineries, incinerators, chemical plants and manufacturing operations. Previous administrations, including Bill Clinton's, had interpreted that phrase to encompass any physical activity that increases pollution from a given facility, with the exception of routine maintenance.

EPA officials in the Bush administration sought to broaden this exemption by asserting that "routine maintenance" is any activity that amounts to less than 20 percent of a plant's value. But the ruling, written by Judge Judith W. Rogers, rejected that reasoning as illogical.

"EPA's approach would ostensibly require that the definition of 'modification' include a phrase such as 'regardless of size, cost, frequency, effect,' or other distinguishing characteristic," Rogers wrote. "Only in a Humpty Dumpty world would Congress be required to use superfluous words while an agency could ignore an expansive word that Congress did use. We decline to adopt such a world-view."

The other two judges on the panel were David S. Tatel and Janice Rogers Brown.

The EPA's statement did not indicate whether the administration intends to appeal the ruling. Both Walke and Scott Segal, a lobbyist for the utilities industry, said it would be difficult for the administration to forge ahead in light of the appeals court's strong ruling. Walke said the decision is tantamount to the court "burying the rule six feet under, where before it was just in a casket."

Segal said the ruling will make it more costly for plants to operate. "This is a missed opportunity for reform that would have made it easier to improve power plant efficiency and workplace safety, and that's bad news for consumers and the environment," he said. "We believe it is a step backwards for the protection of air quality in the United States."

Court Overturns Bush Clean Air Act Exemption In Loss For Power Industry (WSJ)

By Matthew Dalton

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

A U.S. appeals court handed environmentalists a victory Friday, overturning a Bush-administration rule that gave power plants and petroleum refineries more leeway to expand facilities without triggering requirements to install expensive pollution-control equipment.

The rule attempted to set a standard for what counts as "routine maintenance" under the New Source Review, or NSR, provisions of the Clean Air Act. Construction projects deemed to be routine maintenance are exempt from pollution-control requirements, and compliance with those requirements can cost hundreds of millions of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0019489

Construction projects valued at less than 20% of a facility's total value were exempt from the Environmental Protection Agency's rule, issued in 2003. But state officials and environmental groups said that exemption was too large and a violation of federal law.

On Friday, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia agreed, deciding that the EPA rule "is contrary to the plain language of" the Clean Air Act. In the opinion for the three-judge panel, Judge Judith W. Rogers wrote that, "Although EPA might prefer market-based methods of controlling pollution, Congress has chosen a different course" with the NSR requirements.

State officials hailed the appeals-court ruling. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who led the states' action, called the ruling "an enormous victory for clean air and for the enforcement of the law and an overwhelming rejection of the Bush administration's efforts to gut the law." He said the ruling will encourage industry to build new and cleaner facilities "instead of prolonging the life of old dirty plants." Mr. Spitzer's office estimates that the decision covers about 800 power plants and as many as 17,000 industrial sites nationwide.

The ruling Friday overturns a regulatory change, made by the Bush administration, that was designed to clarify the EPA's requirements for construction projects at power plants and refineries. The Clinton administration had begun suing owners of older, coal-fired plants and oil refineries, alleging that they were secretly overhauling them under the guise of "routine maintenance" and that they were essentially new plants subject to tighter air-emission restrictions.

John Millett, a spokesman for EPA, said: "We are disappointed that the court did not find in favor of the United States. We are reviewing and analyzing the opinion and cannot comment further at this time."

Scott Segal, a lawyer representing a group of coal-fired utilities, called the ruling "a step backward for the protection of air quality in the United States." He noted, however, that the decision doesn't undermine the defense that electric utilities have mounted against the lawsuits brought by the Clinton administration. Several of those cases are still under review by federal courts. The environmental community's victory, Mr. Segal said, amounted to "the ability to place roadblocks in front of energy-efficient projects. This is terrible news."

Vickie Patton, a lawyer for Environmental Defense, a New York-based environmental group, said the ruling "firmly rejects EPA's attempt to adopt damaging air-pollution loopholes for thousands of industrial sources across the country." She called for new legislation that would "end the parade of loopholes, exemptions and rollbacks."

The rule has been among the most hotly contested regulations of the Bush administration, with environmental groups saying it amounts to a rollback of the Clean Air Act and companies arguing that they needed the rule to give them more certainty on construction projects.

In October 2003, 14 states, a number of cities and environmental groups filed to block the rules from going into effect. The appeals court had issued a stay in December 2003, preventing utilities and industrial facilities from taking advantage of the change.

U.S. Court Blocks EPA Standard On Modernizing Plants, Factories (BLOOM)

By Bill Arthur

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- A U.S. appeals court ruled that the Environmental Protection Agency can't make it easier for power plants, factories and refineries to avoid installing pollution controls when they replace aging equipment.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit sided with 15 states and three cities that said a rule issued by the EPA in 2003 violated the Clean Air Act. The federal law requires plants undergoing ``any physical change'' that would increase their pollution discharges to install the best available control technology.

The EPA's rule, which wasn't enforced during the lawsuit, interpreted the law to let plants install new equipment without including pollution-control devices as long as the new installation cost less than 20 percent of the plant's value.

Such an interpretation would produce a ``strange'' result in which a law intended to limit increases in air pollution would allow plants ``to increase significantly the pollution they emit without government review,'' the court ruled today.

``The decision is a major victory for clean air and public health,'' New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer said in a statement. ``It will encourage industry to build new and cleaner facilities instead of prolonging the life of old, dirty plants.'' New York was one of the states that sued the EPA over the rule.

John Engler, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, said the ruling was a ``significant setback to business efficiency and, for that matter, environmental quality.''

`Unnecessary' Delays

The EPA exemption would have benefited consumers and businesses by allowing ``power companies and manufacturers to upgrade their facilities and increase efficiency without undergoing unnecessary and costly delays,'' Engler said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0019490

EPA spokesman John Millett said in an e-mailed statement that the agency was disappointed in the ruling and had no further comment.

Other states joining the lawsuit were California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and Wisconsin. Cities participating were Washington D.C., New York City and San Francisco.

Budget Vote Revives Bid For Arctic Oil Drilling (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

A last-minute deal to secure the vote of Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.) on a $2.8 trillion budget plan has given new life to the Republican drive to open Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

The budget blueprint for fiscal 2007, which will begin in October, includes a $10 billion Gulf Coast restoration fund that would be financed from the leasing of arctic refuge drilling rights, revenue from new drilling in the Outer Continental Shelf of the Gulf of Mexico and further sales of the broadcast spectrum. With that provision in hand, Landrieu cast the only Democratic vote for the budget resolution, which squeaked through Thursday night, 51 to 49.

"It's not easy being alone on anything. I don't relish this position," Landrieu said. "But, at times, it's necessary."

Republicans, who have been trying to open up the refuge for well over a decade, hope that by explicitly linking oil drilling to Gulf Coast restoration, they can prompt some Democrats to drop their opposition. Under the Senate plan, the funds from oil leases could be used for coastal restoration projects in Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama that have long been sought by environmentalists. The fund could also be tapped to rebuild levees damaged last year by hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

But it is not clear whether the political equation has shifted at all since December, when moderate Republicans -- led by Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.) -- forced their leaders to take arctic drilling out of a 2006 budget-cutting measure to secure their votes. Bass has warned House budget writers that nothing has changed.

"We are all aware of last year's effort and outcome, and I don't see any reason why this year would be different," Bass told the House Budget Committee last month. Using the budget process to pass drilling "is a gimmick that must be resisted," he said.

The issue of arctic drilling has presented Republican leaders with a quandary for years. Majorities in both the House and the Senate support drilling, but the measure does not have the votes to clear Congress for President Bush's signature.

Lacking the 60 votes to overcome a filibuster, Senate leaders for two years now have tried to attach a drilling measure to a budget resolution. By doing so, subsequent legislation to open the arctic would be protected from a filibuster under congressional budget rules.

In the House, a bipartisan majority favors drilling, but when GOP leaders have attached the issue to a broader budget measure, Democratic supporters have abandoned the cause to oppose the budget.

The 2007 budget, which will be drafted by the House Budget Committee the week of March 27, is not likely to include an arctic drilling provision, but it is also not likely to include significant cuts to popular federal programs, a senior leadership aide said.

If House and Senate negotiators produce a final budget blueprint that includes the Senate drilling plan and excludes deep cuts, a sufficient number of House Democrats may be persuaded to support the budget to overcome moderate Republican opposition, the aide said.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico's Attempt To Quell Drug Violence Falters (KRT)

By Jay Root

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

NUEVO LAREDO, Mexico - The general who'd been in charge of Mexico's efforts to quell drug violence on the border with the United States hasn't been seen by officials here in weeks, and the program is in disarray.

Drug killings are on the rise, local news outlets have been cowed into silence, and evidence is mounting that members of two warring drug-trafficking cartels have infiltrated the program's elite anti-drug forces.

U.S. officials are concerned that the violence is crossing the border: Assaults on U.S. Border Patrol agents are up 108 percent this year, according to recent congressional testimony.

Mexican officials, recognizing that the Secure Mexico program had failed, announced a new program this week, dubbed Northern Border. Under the program, 600 to 800 more federal police agents were dispatched to this besieged border city.

DOJ_NMG_0019491

But few expect that to make much difference, and drug traffickers weren't intimidated: On Thursday, they gunned down four federal police intelligence agents in broad daylight outside a school here. At least 30 shots were fired into the agents' bodies.

Adding to the confusion is the absence of Gen. Alvaro Moreno Moreno, who'd been in charge of Secure Mexico. Nuevo Laredo city officials and a Mexican diplomat on the U.S. side of the border said they'd had no contact with the general in weeks.

"I couldn't tell you where he is," said Eloy Caloca, a spokesman in Mexico City for the federal Ministry of Public Security, the agency to which Moreno reports. Asked who's in charge in Nuevo Laredo now, Caloca said: "I don't have his name right now."

The deaths of the four agents brought the number of killings laid to drug traffickers in this city so far this year to 50 in less than three months, a rate that outpaces last year's, when about 170 people total died in drug violence.

Statements Friday by Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for President Vicente Fox, suggest that efforts to get rid of corrupt city police officers have failed. He said preliminary evidence indicated that the hit men who killed the four agents were municipal police aligned with one of the cartels.

Experts see no end to the killings as long as the two cartels battle to control the distribution routes that lead into the United States.

"It won't be resolved until this war is over, until one of the cartels wins," said Jorge Chabat, an expert on U.S.-Mexico relations and border security. "It's clear that the (Mexican) federal government doesn't have the capacity to stop this wave of violence."

Mexico's federal authorities launched Secure Mexico last year after Nuevo Laredo's police chief, Alejandro Dominguez, was gunned down by suspected traffickers only hours after he took the job.

The Secure Mexico program was designed to weed out local police corruption and place all levels of law enforcement under the command of a single military official - Gen. Moreno.

But the violence has only become more virulent, often spectacularly so: Suspected drug gang members used a grenade to attack a newspaper newsroom here last month.

The Mexican government's new initiative is supposed to re-establish order. Authorities announced that they were sending up to 800 more agents from Federal Preventative Police, known by its Spanish acronym PFP. There already were hundreds here, but estimates vary wildly on the total number patrolling now.

But few are optimistic. "Last year there were over 170-something murders. I don't think anyone was charged or has been arrested in connection with those murders, and the majority of those were drug-related," said a U.S. official involved in drug enforcement who was granted anonymity because his agency doesn't allow him to speak publicly. "They've had the military employed at different occasions during those spates of murder, and they've continued to happen."

Meanwhile, Mexican media reports and public statements have raised questions about whether the PFP forces sent to restore order under Secure Mexico have been infiltrated by elements of the drug cartels.

In Nuevo Laredo, questions center on a Feb. 2 shootout in which armed bandits, in broad daylight near the police headquarters, attacked a marked PFP vehicle that was carrying a suspect, U.S. citizen Javier Escalera. The American was later handed over to U.S. authorities.

News accounts said two PFP agents were wounded. But since then doubts have been raised about whether one of the wounded men was really a PFP agent. Photos show him wounded, dressed in a PFP uniform.

But the man in the photos, identified as Mario Humberto Rodriguez Castillo, later fled Nuevo Laredo by bus toward the northern Mexico city of Monterrey. Along the way, he was attacked and shot again by armed assailants, according to Rafael Luque, a spokesman for the state of Tamaulipas. He survived, but his whereabouts aren't known.

Daniel Hernandez, Mexico's consul general in Laredo, said it's not unusual for law enforcement agencies to protect the identity and whereabouts of an agent who might be involved in intelligence. He also noted that corruption can be found on both sides of the border, citing the recent indictment of two U.S. Border Patrol agents who are accused of taking $300,000 in bribes from smugglers to release immigrants from detention.

The violence has become a problem for Nuevo Laredo's businesses, said Jack Suneson, owner of upscale Marti's jewelry and crafts store in Nuevo Laredo. Noting that many businesses have relocated to the U.S. side of the border, Suneson said he might have to shut his doors after five decades of operation.

"No more promises. I want them to safeguard our city," Suneson said. "I don't know how much longer we can hold out. This is the third year we've taken a nosedive."

Root reports for the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

DOJ_NMG_0019492

IMMIGRATION:

Frist Immigration Bill Would Target Bosses (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP, March 18, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist sidesteps President Bush's call for giving illegal immigrants temporary work permits in an election-year immigration bill the Tennessee Republican unveiled Friday.

Frist, who is seeking his party's nomination in 2008 to succeed Bush in the White House, said the Senate will turn to his proposal to tighten borders, punish employers who hire illegal immigrants and provide more visas if the Senate Judiciary Committee doesn't complete a broader bill in the next 10 days.

A clear majority on the 18-member committee has come out in favor of a "guest worker" program that would let employed illegal immigrants remain in the U.S. — at least temporarily — rather than be deported. The committee members agreed Friday to try to come up with a substitute for Frist's bill by March 27.

Bush — walking a tightrope between businesses that oppose deporting undocumented workers they've trained, and social conservatives who want all 11 million illegals in the U.S. deported — has called for letting those with jobs stay for up to six years.

The House passed a tough immigration enforcement bill in December that would make it a felony for illegal immigrants to be in the United States, impose new penalties on employers who hire them and erect fencing along a third of the U.S.-Mexico border. But it had no temporary worker program.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., faulted Frist's bill for not addressing what to do with illegal immigrants already in the U.S. "Countless businesses rely heavily on their labor and it's long past time to provide legal avenues to bring this underground economy out of the shadow," he said.

Frist's bill would:

_Require all employers to verify the identity and immigration status of their employees through an electronic system.

_Assess civil penalties of between $500 and $20,000 against employers for each illegal immigrant they hire and criminal penalties of up to $20,000 per illegal immigrant hired and up to six months in jail for engaging in a pattern of employing illegal workers.

_Add 4,400 Border Patrol agents over six years to the 10,000 Congress provided for in the intelligence reform law passed in 2004, and 1,000 more immigrant smuggling investigators over the next five years.

_More than double the number of employment-based green cards, from 140,000 to 290,000, and make more employment based visas available to unskilled workers. It also would free up other visas by exempting immediate relatives of U.S. citizens from being counted in the annual pool of 480,000 visas, and increase country-by-country ceilings on family sponsored and employment-based immigrants.

An Immigration Breakthrough (NYT)

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

The clock was running out on the Senate Judiciary Committee this week, and with it the chances for a meaningful overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. After weeks of work, the committee members faced a rigid deadline to get a bill ready before next week's recess. But about all they had agreed on were various ways to tighten the borders. It was increasingly likely that Congress's message to 12 million illegal immigrants would end up being this: Thanks for the help — now get out.

But in a startling pivot, so sharp you could almost hear it, a bipartisan consensus emerged in the hearing room. Senator Arlen Specter, the committee's chairman, endorsed the principle behind an earlier bill sponsored by Senators John McCain and Edward Kennedy: that illegal immigrants who met strict criteria and paid fines and back taxes should have a path to permanent residency and citizenship.

Mr. Specter said he was all for that, as long as the country first cleared up the backlog of three million foreigners seeking to come here through legal channels. The panel also neared an agreement on a related proposal to allow foreign guest workers to enter legally and earn permanent status. Mr. Specter said he wanted a comprehensive bill ready when Congress reconvened on March 27, the deadline set by the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, who has his own hard-line border-tightening bill waiting in the wings.

The blowback was instantaneous. Mr. Frist announced that he would be putting his own bill forward as an alternative to the committee's. Seventy-one House members signed a letter saying that the Judiciary Committee's actions were "fundamentally incompatible" with the House's strident vision of immigration reform, which completely rejects the idea of providing illegal immigrants any path to legalization.

DOJ_NMG_0019493

Mr. Specter often wilts under party pressure like lettuce in a broiler, but he has shown admirable resilience in working to get a comprehensive immigration bill to the Senate floor. His committee's emergent consensus, fragile but real, has finally pointed to a way out of what has been a bitter struggle between starkly conflicting visions of what America should do about immigration. For too long the debate has been hijacked by stereotypes. The recent waves of newcomers are not all potential terrorists living among us like pod people. Nor is every last one a model-citizen-in-waiting.

The chances of finally fixing the immigration system depend on Congress's recognition and acceptance of what President Bush has said for years: that immigration reform is about far more than border enforcement, and that there is a way to bring order and lawfulness to an unauthorized population without compromising the values and traditions of our robust immigrant nation.

Mr. Specter's compromise has wisely elevated the discussion by endorsing a balanced approach. That means making the borders more secure, trying to match the supply of work visas with the demand, and sending this message to the illegal immigrants who are already here: Come out of the shadows, and join your neighbors in making America a better place.

Ireland Asks Bush For Alien Amnesty (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

When the Irish prime minister urged President Bush yesterday to grant amnesty to illegal Irish aliens in the United States, he was just the latest in a line of foreign leaders to beg the president to relax immigration rules.

Before handing over a bowl of shamrocks in the traditional St. Patrick's Day ceremony involving U.S. and Irish leaders, Prime Minister Bertie Ahern asked Mr. Bush to push for a way for "current Irish immigrants to legalize their status in the United States on a permanent basis."

That sort of lobbying, which comes as Congress is debating what to do about illegal aliens and new temporary workers, has become a standard plea from foreign leaders meeting with Mr. Bush.

While some nations, such as Ireland and Mexico, want citizenship for their illegal alien nationals, others want the United States to lift the caps for temporary student or worker visas.

That was the request Mr. Bush heard earlier this week from the Slovak Republic's prime minister -- a message Mr. Bush told reporters was made "very clear" to him. And two weeks ago, in his joint press conference with the Indian prime minister during a trip to New Delhi, Mr. Bush called for an expansion of skilled worker temporary visas.

Speaking with Pakistani reporters before his trip to India, Pakistan and Afghanistan, Mr. Bush said he is working to loosen visa restrictions.

"We had a very restrictive visa policy right after 9/11," he said. "Our visa policy was a natural reaction to a terrible event that took place, but it didn't take me long to realize that we were missing a great opportunity to have students from Pakistan see the real America."

The issue is coming to a head in Congress. The House voted for an immigration enforcement bill in December. The Senate is preparing for a full-scale debate on creating a new guest-worker program and offering a path to citizenship to illegal aliens already in the United States.

Ireland's government has lined up behind the legalization plan of Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which is expected to receive a vote in the Senate Judiciary Committee in two weeks. It is unclear whether that plan has majority support on the Senate floor, and the plan is unlikely to survive a House-Senate conference because too many House Republicans say it amounts to amnesty.

Mr. Ahern said if the McCain-Kennedy plan fails, Ireland will then ask for specific consideration for Irish nationals, or what he called "an Irish arrangement."

Those calling for immigration restrictions said the amnesty President Reagan signed into law in 1986 was a failure, as it effectively prompted an increase in illegal entries.

"We certainly have legal channels to get people like the Irish or whomever from any other nation to be residents or legal immigrants, but we learned our mistake in 1986 and it's not something we should be willing to repeat and encourage an even greater problem down the line," said Rikki Horton, who lobbies on immigration for the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

Even as Ireland pushes for more liberal U.S. laws, it is moving the other direction at home, including trying to find and deport aliens whose asylum applications were rejected. Ireland also has passed a referendum ending "birthright citizenship" for children of non-Irish nationals born in Ireland. That issue is proving contentious in the United States.

Also contentious, apparently, is the current U.S. status of Gerry Adams, leader of the IRA-allied Sinn Fein party in Northern Ireland.

DOJ_NMG_0019494

A New York congressman said yesterday that Mr. Adams was detained at Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport after attending the White House event, the Associated Press reported.

Last year, Mr. Bush barred all Northern Ireland leaders from the St. Patrick's Day event to put pressure on Mr. Adams because of his links to the IRA.

Rep. Brian Higgins, New York Democrat, who had invited Mr. Adams to speak in Buffalo, told his audience last night that Mr. Adams didn't make it on time because he had been detained at Reagan Airport.

A spokeswoman for the Transportation Security Administration said she could not confirm that Mr. Adams had been detained. Jennifer Peppin said the TSA log showed no record of Mr. Adams' having been detained or subjected to secondary screening.

A Homeland Security official said Mr. Adams had left the Washington area, but he would give no further details.

TAX:

Judge Ties Up Tax Firm (SBCS)

By Stephen Wall, Staff Writer

San Bernardino County (CA) Sun, March 18, 2006

IRS claims $25M lost by fraudulent preparation in Rialto

RIALTO - A firm accused of preparing thousands of fraudulent tax returns costing the government more than $25 million has been barred from doing business by a federal court order.

N.C.K. Services and its three preparers - sisters Karen and Carla Berry of Rialto and Ivan Johnson of San Bernardino - are set to appear in court March 24 to respond to the civil complaint.

The three defendants are accused of preparing thousands of tax returns containing false and fraudulent home-mortgage interest deductions since 2001, federal officials said.

Calls to the firm's office at 2850 W. Foothill Blvd. were not answered Friday.

The total loss to the government as a result of the understatements of tax on customers' returns exceeds $25 million, according to an IRS audit.

The government claims the defendants systematically claimed fictitious home-mortgage interest deductions for their customers, even in cases where the customers did not own homes.

The complaint also states the preparers failed to sign customer returns as required by federal law.

"Immediate and irreparable injury will result" if the preparers are allowed to continue doing business, Judge Virginia Phillips of the U.S. District Court in Riverside wrote in her Wednesday ruling granting the temporary restraining order.

Phillips is scheduled to decide Friday whether a preliminary injunction should be issued against the defendants.

A preliminary injunction would prevent the firm from operating until the case

Advertisement

goes to trial, which is expected July 25.

Justice Department officials said the case is part of the federal government's increased effort to stop tax-fraud schemes.

Since 2001, the department has obtained injunctions against more than 160 tax-scam promoters and preparers of false or fraudulent returns, federal officials said.

"Tax-preparation fraud costs the federal treasury hundreds of millions of dollars every year," said Eileen O'Connor, the assistant attorney general for the department's tax division.

Officials warned customers to carefully review their tax returns and make sure they contain the preparer's signature and identification number.

"It's important to check the work on the return to make sure the numbers match your financial situation before you send in your return," said Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson. "People ought to be very suspicious and should have a red light go off if you hear you can always get a return if you go to x or y return preparer."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Politics Drives A Senate Spending Spree (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0019495

WASHINGTON, March 17 — The largess demonstrated by the Senate in padding its budget with billions of dollars in additional spending this week showed that lawmakers are no different from many of their constituents: they don't mind pulling out the charge card when money is tight.

Just hours after opening a new line of credit through an increase in the federal debt limit, the Senate splurged on a bevy of popular programs before approving a spending plan that was as much a political document as an economic one, its fine print geared to the coming elections.

Forced to choose between calls for renewed austerity and demands for more money, many Republicans joined Democrats in reaching deeper into the Treasury, leaving the party's push for new fiscal restraint in tatters.

Some of their colleagues said it was an open-and-shut case of nervous politicians ducking a tough spending stance to avoid starring in negative campaign commercials. Republicans in some of this year's tightest races — Conrad Burns of Montana, Mike DeWine of Ohio, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island — all backed the chief budget-busting provision as they endorsed an extra $7 billion for medical research, education and worker safety.

Lawmakers, analysts and others said the Senate's reluctance to clamp down on spending was a natural result of an approach that fails to recognize a sharply changed reality. In some respects, the administration and Congress act as if the surplus that greeted President Bush when he checked into the White House is still in the bank, rather than recognizing that whatever windfall was available then was eaten up and more by tax cuts.

The reality is that the cuts, plus two wars, new domestic security needs, natural disasters and a big expansion of Medicare have left the government's account badly overdrawn with no prospect of getting it back in balance anytime soon.

The criticisms set out by many Democrats — that no real progress can be made in setting the nation's finances right until Congress proves willing to revisit the tax cuts and that the nation is failing to invest sufficiently in addressing its economic and social ills — do not receive much of a hearing in a Washington where Republicans are in charge.

"I think the critical flaw is the failure to adjust fiscal policy in the face of new circumstances," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a bipartisan group that advocates reducing the deficit through spending cuts and tax increases.

Mr. Bixby and others say the Republican-controlled Congress and the Bush administration have shown a near total disregard for fiscal discipline, running up new debt.

"The problem we have had on the budget all along is a lack of adult supervision on the part of the White House," said Bruce Bartlett, an economist and author of a new book critical of Mr. Bush's economic record. "You can't blame members of Congress for looking out for their parochial interests. It is the president's responsibility to look out for the national interest."

With the president's influence on Capitol Hill slipping along with his poll numbers, it is unclear how much authority Mr. Bush could exert over lawmakers regardless. Senate Republicans showed no hesitation about bursting through the spending ceiling he set, adding more than $16 billion after eliminating some of his cuts.

And while the House, which was considering $92 billion in emergency war spending and hurricane aid, rejected most efforts to increase that total, lawmakers did buy a few extras, including $50 million more for peacekeeping in Darfur.

Almost lost in all the budget and spending activity was that House and Senate negotiators continue to try to hammer out an agreement for new tax cuts that could cost an additional $70 billion over five years.

If Republicans in the Senate were motivated by a political calculation that this was not the time to close the fiscal taps, much less cut more deeply into domestic spending, they risked what some conservatives suggested could be a backlash from the right. Many strategists have warned Republicans that their core conservative supporters are demoralized by what they see as the unchecked growth of government.

John Kasich, a former Republican chairman of the House Budget Committee and devotee of balanced budgets who is now an investment adviser and author, said much of Washington had surrendered to the political impulse to please various voter groups with unbridled spending."

Republican leaders see it a bit differently. They point to nearly $40 billion in savings from social insurance programs they produced last year, an effort that took a tremendous amount of political effort. And an across-the-board cut shaved about $8 billion from current agency budgets.

They say they intend to hold spending for most agencies outside of the military and domestic security under this year's tight limits and will try to erase some of the Senate spending additions in negotiations with the House.

To do so, they will have to get around Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, who clamored for the extra $7 billion. Mr. Specter said that spending constraints had cut too deeply into health and education programs and that there was a strong show of support for the money — a majority of Republicans backed it.

Republicans also say they see a proposed line-item veto and new restrictions on pet projects as part of a rehabilitation program to kick their spending habit. While those initiatives may end some suspect practices, most see the savings as chump change in an era of $350 billion annual deficits and $9 trillion in total debt.

Serious fiscal worriers believe the only true fix can come from a bipartisan meeting of the minds that would put all federal programs on the table along with consideration of both spending cuts and tax increases.

"I've concluded this job is so big it can only be done if the two parties work together," said Senator Kent Conrad of North Dakota, the senior Democrat on the Budget Committee.

But Mr. Conrad acknowledged that nothing substantive could get done in the short term, with both parties girding for November. As the Senate deliberations show, frugality is not an election-year budget value.

GOP Spenders Think Voters Dismiss Deficits (LAT)

By Joel Havemann And Richard Simon, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Fiscal conservatives may be upset with increased spending, but Congress just can't say no.

WASHINGTON — For two days they marched past the huge marble fountain and upstairs to the terra-cotta and creamy-gold splendor of the grand ballroom at the historic Peabody Hotel in Memphis. There, flanked by the flags of more than two dozen states, four U.S. senators who hope to carry the Republican banner in the 2008 presidential election pledged allegiance to one of the GOP's most revered principles: fiscal responsibility — never spend taxpayers' money you don't have.

Less than a week later, the Senate's Republican majority overwhelmingly approved billions of dollars in deficit spending. Despite outcry from conservative groups that helped build the GOP majorities in both houses of Congress, the Republican spenders were undeterred, for one reason:

They're convinced that voters now care less about big deficits than they do about the things that increased federal spending will buy.

"Senators are betting that pandering to the public with billions in election-year promises will pay off more than they lose by cutting the fiscal conservatives in their own party off at the knees," said Keith Ashdown of Taxpayers for Common Sense.

That political calculation was behind congressional Republicans' support for the new Medicare prescription drug entitlement in 2003. And it drove Thursday's votes to raise the debt ceiling and approve more deficit spending.

There is another reason that many congressional Republicans have drawn back from fiscal discipline: Two other elements in the conservative credo, support for greater spending on national security and determination to cut taxes, have left budget makers with little room to maneuver, and so significant budget cuts have become hard to make.

Some Republicans warned that the GOP could pay a heavy price for yielding to spending pressures.

Former Rep. Patrick J. Toomey (R-Pa.), who now heads the free-market-oriented Club for Growth, warned that "Republican voters are going to ask themselves, 'Why bother having Republicans in office?' " Senate Republicans have shown "absolutely no semblance of discipline on spending," said Toomey, adding that they have also failed to extend President Bush's expiring tax cuts.

"If they can't do either taxes or spending right, how do they expect Republicans to turn out in the fall to reelect Republican majorities?" Toomey said. "I think they're in … for a very rude awakening in November."

Democrats, long vilified by opponents as the tax-and-spend party, think they can turn the tables by calling the Republicans the party of borrow and spend. The federal budget, in surplus when Bush took office in 2001, immediately ran deficits that assumed record proportions.

Rep. John Tanner (D-Tenn.) told the House on Wednesday that he grew up with three principles: "Live within your means, pay your debts and invest in the future.

"This government under this leadership is doing none of those," he said.

He noted that the House approved a $92-billion emergency spending bill Thursday that provided $68 billion for the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan and $19 billion for communities struck by Hurricane Katrina. The bill passed handily, 348 to 71, with only 19 Republicans joining 52 Democrats in opposition.

The Senate meanwhile added $16 billion for a host of domestic programs, including health, education and heating assistance for the poor, to the $2.8-trillion budget for fiscal year 2007 that its Budget Committee had recommended. The budget passed on a scant 51 to 49 vote, with a lone Democrat — Mary Landrieu of Louisiana — joining 50 Republicans to form the majority and five Republicans voting no, mostly to protest the budget's call for legislation to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil drilling.

"When it comes to fiscal discipline," said Executive Director Robert L. Bixby of the Concord Coalition, a budget watchdog group, "the gap between rhetoric and reality on Capitol Hill is as wide as the deficit."

Spending has grown more in Bush's five years in office than it did in President Clinton's eight, even excluding the boom in defense spending under Bush. Altogether, spending rose about 4% a year under Clinton and has risen 9% a year under Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0019497

Despite this arithmetic, some Republicans think the Democrats will have a hard time convincing the public that they are the party of spending restraint. "It would be even worse under the Democrats," said Dick Armey, a former House majority leader from Texas who now is chairman of FreedomWorks, a group advocating lower taxes and less government.

And restraint may have lost some of its political appeal. The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press, in its annual survey in January of what issues weigh on the public, said 36% of conservative Republicans rated the deficit a "top priority" — well below eduction, jobs, terrorism and illegal immigration.

"The deficit does not have the same resonance that it did through much of the 1990s," said the Pew center's Carroll Doherty.

Paying homage to fiscal responsibility is apparently still mandatory for Republican politicians who aspire to higher office, however.

Among those who vowed to curb spending last weekend when they addressed a combined meeting of the Southern and Midwestern Republican Leadership Conference in Memphis were four of the party's leading presidential hopefuls: Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Sens. John McCain of Arizona, George Allen of Virginia and Sam Brownback of Kansas.

All four, however, supported the final budget bill.

Some fiscal conservatives in the House were so furious at the absence of spending cuts to offset hurricane relief that they voted against the spending bill despite its defense funding.

"I strongly support our troops," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas). "Successfully fighting the war on terror is our most important national priority. But another national priority is saving our children from a mountain of debt or unconscionable tax increases."

For other conservative lawmakers, local interests trumped ideology. Sen. Craig Thomas (R-Wyo.) issued a statement Friday praising his chamber's vote, which made room for $235 million more for rural healthcare.

"While it is important to identify and eliminate wasteful and inefficient programs," Thomas said, "I also believe that we must support policies that work."

Mike Franc, a former House Republican leadership aide now with the conservative Heritage Foundation, said many Republican lawmakers, "as Ricky Ricardo used to say, have some explaining to do."

"It's an uphill battle for many Republicans to explain why, during an era when they control the House, the Senate and the White House, spending has been unleashed as it has," he said.

Testing Errors Prompt Calls For Oversight (NYT)

By Karen W. Arenson

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

As the College Board races to score the final 1,600 exams from its problem-ridden October SAT test, a string of recent testing errors around the country has college and high school officials, testing experts, students and parents asking with rising urgency, Who is watching the testing industry?

Spurred largely by the No Child Left Behind law, testing has exploded in recent years. Educators are now trying to measure factors like whether toddlers in Head Start know their letters and whether elementary and high school students are making progress in reading and math.

The states alone are administering about 45 million tests this school year.

And for students headed to college, there are the Advanced Placement exams, the SAT and the ACT.

The volume is stretching the $2 billion-a-year education testing industry, educators say, taxing its ability to draw up enough tests and score them quickly and reliably. The states are struggling to find experienced officials to provide quality control.

The resulting flurry of errors has educators and lawmakers calling for better disclosure and oversight. Some are even proposing a national agency like the Food and Drug Administration to regulate testing.

"We need accountability," said George F. Madaus, a research professor at the Center for the Study of Testing, Evaluation and Educational Policy at Boston College. "I certainly wouldn't get rid of testing, but we need to be much more aware than we are now about the shortcomings, the limitations and the fallibility of the technology."

The past few weeks have shown the range of the problems. The College Board's disclosure that at least 4,600 students out of 495,000 who took its October SAT test had scoring errors was followed this week by an $11 million settlement by the Educational Testing Service of a case involving scoring errors for 27,000 people on tests that more than half the states use for teacher certification.

The Illinois superintendent of education, Randy J. Dunn, threatened last week to recommend ending the state's $44.5 million five-year contract with Harcourt Assessment because state tests were delivered late with misprints and collating errors.

DOJ_NMG_0019498

(He later backed away.) And New York State said this week that its seventh- and eighth-grade math tests had several questions that had been in test preparation materials.

"All of these tests have errors," said John Katzman, chairman and founder of the Princeton Review, a test-coaching company that has benefited from the testing boom. "The questions might be flawed in some way. The scoring might be flawed. The administration is often flawed."

A large part of the problem, policy makers and educators say, is that the demand for tests is outstripping the abilities of the industry, and testing and scoring quality have deteriorated. Adding to the pressure, each state has its own specifications.

Robert L. Linn, a professor emeritus at the University of Colorado at Boulder who serves on a College Board advisory committee, said that problems like those with the October SAT were not uncommon in testing.

"These things happen now and then in a lot of testing programs," Dr. Linn said. "But there are too many now; the industry is stretched pretty thin." He added, "It's pretty clear, I guess, that the quality-control issues need to be looked at again."

In a recent study for EducationSector, a new education research organization, Thomas Toch, the group's co-director, found that the high stakes of the No Child Left Behind law, which sanctions schools that do not improve, had states trying to administer tests as late as possible so children had the most time to prepare. But they still want scoring completed in time for summer school placement, giving companies little turnaround time.

Mr. Toch said states were having trouble recruiting and retaining experts, leaving testing companies largely responsible for their own quality control. Companies, too, are struggling with these demands.

"They get so little money for these contracts that they are hard pressed to hire all the people they need to do this immense amount of work without making mistakes," he said.

Joyce E. Karon, a member of the Illinois State Board of Education, said that although she believed Harcourt was "a reliable company," like other test providers, it was "working at the brink, and when you work at the brink, things happen."

Mrs. Karon said that before the board chose Harcourt, it asked other states whether they had experienced problems. "Almost universally," she said, "they had all had some problems."

Rick Blake, a spokesman for Harcourt Assessment, said the company regretted the hardship that the problems had created for Illinois and was working to ensure that the rest of the testing went "smoothly and without further delay."

Still, as the pressure for more tests intensifies, testing experts and policy makers are beginning to weigh whether more oversight is needed.

One suggestion would require that testing problems be reported publicly. W. James Popham, an emeritus professor at the University of California at Los Angeles, said that more exposure might help. "Frankly, because it is in the best public-relations interest of both the scoring service and the state officials who hire them, many scoring muck-ups are masked," Dr. Popham said.

One step toward disclosure could come from the inspector general of the federal Education Department, who is planning to study what states are doing about errors and whether there is need for federal oversight.

Another approach being suggested by Mr. Toch, Dr. Madaus and others is to have some kind of auditor or oversight board, an independent entity or a federal body. "There are all kinds of things in society that get monitored," Dr. Madaus said. "Nobody is seriously looking over the shoulder of those testing programs."

But some in the industry say regulation is unnecessary and will raise the price of testing. "When something like this occurs, you want to make sure you don't create regulations or ways of doing things that increase costs and don't improve the quality of service," said Gaston Caperton, the College Board president.

Kenneth P. LaValle, the New York State senator responsible for the state's 1979 Truth in Testing law mandating disclosure, said he believed more disclosure of test questions and answers might be needed.

"We are now living in a testing culture," said Mr. LaValle, Republican of Long Island. "We need accuracy and security and all these things."

Some counselors are urging college-bound students to pay extra to obtain answers after a test is administered to check their own performance, and for hand scoring.

Eugene Falik, a computer specialist in Far Rockaway, N.Y., said that after his daughter signed up recently for an Advanced Placement exam, he spotted the hand-scoring option. "The clear implication is that these marked sense sheets, or optical mark readers, are not reliable," Mr. Falik said.

More colleges have stopped requiring the SAT. Joanne V. Creighton, president of Mount Holyoke College in Massachusetts, said she felt her college's decision five years ago to make the tests optional was reinforced when she learned of the SAT scoring errors. She said the college had found this made "no measurable difference" in quality.

But others say testing is a crucial tool. Richard P. Mills, education commissioner in New York State, said recent problems had not changed his mind about the usefulness of testing. "It can be done right," Mr. Mills said. "Does that mean it's flawless? No. Errors crop up. No error is acceptable. But testing is indispensable."

DOJ_NMG_0019499

'Teach To The Test'? What Test? (WP)

By Colman Mccarthy

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

From the academic sidelines, where calls to Leave No Child Untested are routinely sounded by quick-fix school reformers, Jay Mathews joins in with his Feb. 20 op-ed column, "Let's Teach to the Test." In well-crafted prose, he reports that "in 23 years of visiting classrooms I have yet to see any teacher preparing kids for exams in ways that were not careful, sensible and likely to produce more learning."

On Mathews's visit to my classroom four years ago -- at School Without Walls, where I have been volunteering since 1982 -- he must not have noticed that not only was I not preparing my 28 students for tests but that I regard tests as educational insults. At School Without Walls and two other high schools where I am a guest teacher -- Wilson High School in the District and Bethesda-Chevy Chase High School in lower Montgomery County -- I have never given a test. I respect my students too much to demean them with exercises in fake knowledge.

Tests represent fear-based learning, the opposite of learning based on desire. Frightened and fretting with pre-test jitters, students stuff their minds with information they disgorge on exam sheets and sweat out the results. I know of no meaningful evidence that acing tests has anything to do with students' character development or whether their natural instincts for idealism or altruism are nurtured.

I have large amounts of evidence that tests promote the opposite: character defects. After having two of my high school classes read Mathews's column, I asked the students: If during a test the opportunity came to cheat, with no fear of being caught, would you? A majority of hands went up. A few students dismissed the question as naive. Not cheat if you could get away with it? Get real. When speaking at high school assemblies, I ask students how many can raise their hands and say with total honesty that they never cheated in school. Few hands go up. If some brave souls do confess to honesty, they are greeted with jeers or calls of "yeah, right."

Standardized tests measure braininess and memory skills. American society has plenty of people who were academic whizzes in high school but were so driven by the lure of a high grade-point average that their spiritual lives remained stunted. I worry about students who make too many A's. What parts of their inner lives are they sacrificing to conform to someone else's notion that doing well in tests means doing well in life? Is any time left over from mastering theoretical knowledge for gaining the kind of experiential knowledge found in community service or volunteering in programs such as Special Olympics or DC Reads?

Desire-based learning happens when teachers deal in combustibles, when fires are lit and students burn to explore ideas that have nothing to do with what testocrats require. Quality teachers who are fire-lighters often find themselves trapped in schools that have been seduced by the Advanced Placement fad. Teachers whose students can't hack the AP final are regarded as failures.

School principals get hammerlocked also. They watch teachers' performance the way teachers watch students' performance. A hierarchy results. Most everyone is fearful of someone in power right above. Students worry about teachers, teachers worry about principals, principals worry about school boards, school boards worry about politicians and politicians worry about the voters.

Before riskily breaking ranks with an innovation or two that might actually eliminate fear in the classroom, a deviator must ask: Will I be whacked by that power-wielder just above me? Caution reigns.

To compensate for my no-testing policy, I assign tons of homework. The assignments? Tell someone you love him or her. Do a favor for someone who won't know you did it. Say a kind word to the workers at the school: the people who clean the toilets, cook the food, drive the buses and heat the buildings. And a warning: If you don't do the homework, you'll fail. You'll fail your better self, you'll fail to make the world better, you'll fail at being a peacemaker.

For 25 years of testing the waters by not testing, I've been telling my students not to worry about answering questions. Be braver and bolder: Question the answers. Which answers? To start, the ones from anyone who champions classroom get-aheadism based on test scores. Throw off your chains, students. You have nothing to lose but your backpacks.

The writer, a former Post columnist, directs the Center for Teaching Peace and teaches nonviolence at three high schools and four universities.

April May Bring New Medicare Drug Problems (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, March 18, 2006

Many elderly and disabled Americans enrolled for the Medicare drug benefit will face new difficulties in obtaining their medicines on April 1, say advocacy groups familiar with the program.

DOJ_NMG_0019500

On that date, insurers will have more latitude to tell pharmacists that they won't pay for a particular drug. Before that, insurers have been told that they should pay for a prescription even if it's not on the list of drugs they cover.

"I think that, after April 1, you're going to see huge problems with access. It's going to be January 1 all over again," said Tom Clark, policy director at the American Society of Consultant Pharmacists. The association represents pharmacists who serve nursing homes.

Government officials said the Medicare drug benefit covers most of the drugs commonly used by seniors and the disabled. They say beneficiaries who take those drugs will have nothing to worry about come April 1.

And, if beneficiaries find that their drugs are not on a plan's list of drugs covered, often referred to as the formulary, then they usually will have access to substitute medicines. The poorest beneficiaries can switch plans at any time.

"What we're requiring is that the formularies all must be broad, all must meet our stricter-than-usual requirements, plus there must be a timely way for beneficiaries to get an exception," said Mark McClellan, head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services.

McClellan said he has heard from some insurers who plan to make the transition easier by gradually restricting which drugs customers can get, rather than doing it all at once on April 1. Insurers put in place such restrictions to move patients into safer drugs, as well as cheaper drugs that save the company money.

Many insurers are also sending customers letters to let them know when their drug is not covered, McClellan said.

Still, McClellan was not as resolute in countering the warnings as he had been in December before to the program's startup. Then, he aggressively contested concerns raised by the Government Accountability Office that some poor and disabled beneficiaries would have trouble getting their medicine.

"CMS has significant concerns about the GAO's finding," McClellan had said in his reply to the government's auditors. "These individuals will get effective, comprehensive prescription drug coverage when the new Medicare prescription drug benefit begins."

That did not turn out to be the case for hundreds of thousands of poor senior citizens who were not properly enrolled in the program. They faced delays in getting their medicine or were charged higher out-of-pocket costs than they should have been.

McClellan said the issues now are different. In January, the main problem was getting people enrolled in the program properly. Now, it's about making sure that insurers do what they said they would do in setting up their appeals process.

McClellan said the government would monitor insurers in April to make sure they respond quickly to patients who ask to continue taking a particular drug not covered by a plan.

For urgently needed drugs, plans are required to act within a day. If patients lose that appeal, they can then take their case to an independent reviewer.

"Because we are tracking plan wait times on call lines, because we're tracking complaints, we will take prompt enforcement actions," McClellan said.

Vicki Gottlich, senior policy attorney for the Center for Medicare Advocacy Inc., said she's concerned that the poorest of senior citizens and the disabled would again have the most significant problems on April 1.

Often, those beneficiaries were automatically enrolled into a drug plan, and they will have no idea until next month that their medicine is not covered.

"To be honest, we've been talking to CMS, and I got the sense they thought this was an issue," Gottlich said.

The Center for Medicare Advocacy has been critical of the drug program. Gottlich said the organization has heard stories of clients with numerous drugs not covered by their drug plans.

Another advocacy group that has criticized the program, the Medicare Rights Center, said it's hearing complaints that people calling to appeal coverage restrictions have been put on hold for more than an hour. In other cases, customer service representatives promise to call back but never do.

"The plans make it difficult for patients and doctors to navigate the appeals process," the group said.

___

On the Net:

Official Medicare site: http://www.medicare.gov

Center for Medicare Advocacy: http://www.medicareadvocacy.org/

Health Secretary: Costs Too High (PPG)

By Christopher Snowbeck

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 18, 2006

The Pittsburgh region is contributing to health care innovations, but it also is the 13th costliest market in the country for people buying health care services, says Michael Leavitt, secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

DOJ_NMG_0019501

During a breakfast talk yesterday with the Pittsburgh Technology Council at the Sheraton Station Square, Mr. Leavitt called for a variety of reforms to help tame health care costs. The situation in Pittsburgh, he said, exemplifies the broad challenge with health care in the country: No one wants to go without advanced treatments that people rightly regard as "priceless," yet health care comes a price -- one that's increasingly difficult for society to afford.

"This isn't just about debits and credits, it's about human lives," Mr. Leavitt said. "[But] we've got to find ways to reconcile priceless with pricey."

Speaking to about 100 people, Mr. Leavitt reiterated a pledge made earlier this week to publish the prices Medicare pays for common procedures, which would help individuals shop more smartly for care. The lack of good pricing information is one of the key problems with the move toward high-deductible health plans that feature Health Savings Accounts, another Bush administration initiative.

What's more, the current system is "saturated with inefficiency" and suffers from "poorly-aligned incentives," he said.

A focus on getting more value out of the system is important, he said, because the current rate of growth in health care spending can't be sustained.

Health care currently accounts for 16 percent of the gross domestic product, and its share is expected to increase to 20 percent by 2015. Spending in the Medicare program alone accounts for 3.4 percent of GDP today, Mr. Leavitt said, adding that spending for that single program is projected to consume 14 percent of GDP by 2070.

"It can't happen," Mr. Leavitt said, noting the impact of health care costs on the competitiveness of U.S. businesses. "We'll either change, or we'll have been eliminated from the competition."

Congress Backs Off From Lobbying Limits (KRT)

By Steven Thomma

Knight Ridder, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON - With the spotlight turned elsewhere, Republicans this week backed off their vow to crack down on the relationship between lobbyists and Washington politics.

A proposal offered by House Republicans late Thursday would suspend privately financed travel for members of Congress only until this year's congressional elections and would put off a decision on a permanent ban of travel, meals or other gifts until after the elections.

It would require lobbyists to disclose their activities more frequently, but offered only occasional audits to ensure compliance with no additional people or resources to enforce the rules.

It wouldn't do anything to limit pork-barrel spending, as some had urged, or ban those lobbyists who are former members of Congress from mingling with current lawmakers on the House floor or in the House gym. And it wouldn't lengthen the period in which former members of Congress or their staffs are prohibited from lobbying their former colleagues.

All the proposed new regulations stopped short of those offered weeks earlier when congressional leaders rushed to embrace reform in the wake of the political fallout from the scandal surrounding disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Rep. David Dreier, R-Calif., who put the proposal together, called it "real reform." Outside analysts said it passed the buck.

"The House is taking baby steps that will be ineffective in preventing future Abramoff-style scandals," said Joan Claybrook, president of the watchdog group Public Citizen.

"Their interest is waning because the public's interest is waning," said Roberta Baskin, executive director of Center for Public Integrity, another Washington watchdog group.

In January, congressional leaders promised aggressive new regulations to assure the public that the government would never be influenced and tarred again by free-spending lobbyists like Abramoff. Republicans, in particular, feared a backlash that could hurt them in the fall elections.

Leading the reform charge, House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., urged permanently banning members of Congress from accepting privately financed trips on corporate jets, overseas junkets and gifts worth more than $20, such as meals or tickets to sporting events. It was necessary, he said at the time, "to regain the trust of the American people."

He also wanted to consider banning pork-barrel spending, or "earmarks," and stripping former members of their visiting privileges on the House floor or in the House gym if they became lobbyists.

Since then, however, Hastert has found Republicans and Democrats reluctant to stop all interaction with lobbyists.

First, members privately groused to Hastert that he was going too far. Then, House Republicans elected Rep. John Boehner of Ohio as their new majority leader, rejecting the bid of Rep. John Shadegg of Arizona, who promised a tougher crackdown on lobbying.

DOJ_NMG_0019502

"This is a very difficult process when you begin to look at changing the rules in terms of the way we do business," Boehner said this week. "You know, the Senate started on it, looked like it was moving pretty well, but they've got their own issues that are bogging them down."

A key reason is that the public's attention has turned elsewhere to stories such as the possible turnover of some U.S. port operations to a foreign company and the vice president's accidental shooting of a friend. That took the heat off of Congress, at least temporarily.

A recent survey by the Pew Research Center found that fewer than one out of five Americans still followed the lobbying scandal story closely.

Yet public interest could rise again. "There will be other indictments. Just stand by," cautioned Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who hopes to offer a bipartisan set of new regulations on lobbyists and politicians.

And if the public tunes back in, it could find at least some of the Washington response to the scandal wanting.

A recent bipartisan survey, the Battleground Poll, found broad public support for many possible new regulations, including one that was offered by the Republicans and many more that weren't proposed:

The deepest support, 87 percent, was for greater disclosure by lobbyists about their work and their contacts with the government. The Republican proposal would require lobbyists to file more detailed reports more frequently.

Other popular reforms weren't in the plan, however, including:

-Broader ban on gifts, supported by 79 percent.

-Lengthening the lobbying ban for former members of Congress or their staffs from one year to two years, supported by 75 percent.

-Banning lobbying on the House floor and in House gym, supported by 67 percent.

-A broader travel ban, supported by 67 percent.

-Ending earmarks, supported by 59 percent.

Even before the proposal was unveiled, Republican pollster Ed Goeas said the survey offered a road map to political success - if it were followed.

But Baskin, of the Center for Public Integrity, noted that Congress has resisted such advice in the past. She recalled that the first proposal to ban members-turned-lobbyists from the House floor was made in 1897 -and that it's been rejected ever since.

"The way it works in Washington, lobbyists have tremendous power," she said. "And they will continue to as Congress backs off from all the verbiage about cracking down."

House GOP Leader Well Traveled (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Privately Paid Trips Total Half a Year

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio), who rose to power in the wake of a congressional lobbying scandal, spent the equivalent of nearly six months on privately funded trips over the past six years, according to a new study by a nonpartisan research group.

The Center for Public Integrity said that Boehner accepted 42 privately sponsored trips from January 2000 to December 2005. That put him on the road to other countries and "golfing hotspots," often with his wife, Debbie, for about half a year, "only nine days of which he listed as being 'at personal expense,' " the center said.

Boehner also flew at least 45 times on corporate jets owned by companies "with a financial stake in congressional affairs" from June 2001 through September 2005, the center reported. The corporations on whose planes Boehner flew included tobacco companies such as R.J. Reynolds Tobacco (15 times), UST Inc. (seven times) and Swisher International Inc. (seven times).

"Boehner is one of Congress' most frequent corporate fliers," Roberta Baskin, executive director of the center, said, based on a review of other lawmakers' disclosure forms.

The report is the most detailed and comprehensive look at the new majority leader. Boehner, who was elected to the post last month, had been criticized by lawmakers who opposed his elevation for being too close to lobbyists.

Boehner rejected that characterization and offered himself as an agent of change, especially on the issue of congressional ethics. The center concluded, however, that Boehner built "a network of political and business relationships" with corporations and other interests "not unlike" his predecessor, Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Tex.), whose tenure in the job was controversial in large part because of his close ties to lobbyists and lobbying groups. DeLay stepped down last year after he was indicted in Texas on charges of political money laundering.

DOJ_NMG_0019503

In the early debate over how to crack down on lobbyists -- a byproduct of the guilty plea in January of former GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff -- Boehner had been a leading opponent of a ban on privately paid travel. One of his first public pronouncements after winning the second-ranking position in the House leadership was to declare his disagreement with Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), who wanted to end travel paid for by private interests.

Boehner pushed instead for enhanced disclosure of privately provided benefits including travel, meals and gifts -- the direction the House now appears to be taking in pending legislation. In the meantime, he has accepted a compromise that would ban privately paid travel this year until the House ethics committee devises new rules.

Kevin A. Madden, a Boehner spokesman, defended the lawmaker's trips as legal, proper and educational. He said Boehner's initial enmity toward a ban on privately paid trips was not because he has taken so many of them.

Rather, Madden pointed to the center's report as proof that disclosure works well. Madden said the study was possible because of the thorough disclosures Boehner made through the years and which he now advocates expanding. The center was able to detail Boehner's activities because his trips, "in each and every instance, were promptly and publicly disclosed according to law," Madden said.

"The fact that this report uses publicly available documents underscores Mr. Boehner's commitment to transparency and full disclosure," Madden said. "The entire approach of transparency and disclosure is so that groups like this one [the center] aren't the ultimate judge. The voters are."

Among the places Boehner traveled on privately financed trips were Edinburgh, Scotland; Venice; Brussels; and Barcelona, the center said. Two of his domestic destinations, which the center pointed out are famous for their golf courses, were Boca Raton, Fla., and Scottsdale, Ariz.

The report said Boehner received more than $160,000 in food, lodging, transportation and other expenditures on his privately paid journeys. His benefactors included the Chicago Board of Trade, the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, CSX Corp. and the Sallie Mae Foundation.

The congressman also "hosted many high-end fundraisers to wine and dine potential donors and Republican colleagues," the center said. Boehner's Freedom Project political action committee, which he used to help fellow Republicans get elected to Congress, paid more than $119,000 for golf-outing fundraisers from March 2003 through the end of 2005, the center said. It also paid $25,000 to Duck Soup, the "unofficial band of the PGA Tour."

The same leadership PAC spent more than $87,000 on food, beverages and fund-raising costs at Sam & Harry's, a D.C. steakhouse popular with lobbyists, from 2001 through August 2005. It also paid more than $40,000 over two nights at Washington's Hard Rock Cafe, the center reported.

Boehner's spokesman said that those kinds of expenditures were commonplace for fundraising events.

Boehner's staff has benefited from corporate-paid travel. The congressman approved trips taken by dozens of his aides from his personal office and the staff of the House Committee on Education and the Workforce, which he chaired starting in 2001. Over the past five years, the center said, his staff aides took more than 150 privately paid trips worth more than $200,000 to locations as far-flung as Japan and Europe.

Opening The Door On The Credit Report And Throwing Away The Lock (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

In a dozen states, legislatures have set up procedures for residents afraid of identity theft to lock and unlock their credit reports.

But credit-reporting agencies are pushing Congress to override the state laws, which could make it harder for Americans to keep their credit information under wraps.

Lobbyists for the big agencies — Equifax, Experian and TransUnion, owned by the Marmon Group — are seeking to add an amendment to the Financial Data Protection Act, a bill being rewritten by the House of Representatives. (A similar bill, S1408, is working its way through the Senate.) While the wording has not been set for the bill, also known as HR3997, lobbyists for the credit agencies are pushing for a law that limits the ability to lock credit reports to victims of identity theft. Moreover, the reports could be unlocked with five days' advance notice.

Once a report is locked, an agency cannot release any of its details.

Consumer groups are upset that a federal law might supersede what has been done at the state level.

"Is Congress going to go soft on crime?" asked Abigail Caplovitz, legislative advocate at the New Jersey Public Interest Research Group. Her group thinks that a law it pushed through the New Jersey Legislature last year cuts down on identity theft because it makes it relatively easy and inexpensive for consumers to lock and unlock their credit reports. "Unless a credit freeze is user-friendly, it is useless because it won't be used," Ms. Caplovitz said.

Even if Congress does nothing, protecting credit information is going to become more complicated and inconvenient as more states pass laws that try to balance protecting consumers and protecting the credit-reporting industry.

Before we get to the advice, let's take a look at what is at stake here. The New Jersey law, which went into effect in January, permits any resident to freeze access to a credit report free. A thaw costs the consumer $5 an agency. The law also calls on the agencies to set up technology allowing credit to be thawed as quickly as 15 minutes after notification. Utah recently passed a bill, as yet unsigned by the governor, that would require the credit agencies, by 2008, to switch a lock on or off in 15 minutes.

The lag time is important because a three- or five-day delay could prevent a person from making a spur-of-the-moment purchase. Merchants may lose sales if they have to wait several days before they can verify a customer's creditworthiness. By then the consumer's urge to buy may pass — which, for some people, might not be such a bad thing.

Getting Americans to spend less and save more is not what the credit-reporting agencies are after. And there is no technological barrier that makes a quick unlock impossible. They are concerned that each state will have different rules and prices. That is already happening. Nevadans pay the most: $15 to lock and $18 to unlock. It is free in Illinois, Texas, Washington and Vermont, but only fraud victims can do it.

The agencies also dislike laws like New Jersey's because they fear that making it too easy to lock a credit report may ruin their business in the way that the Do Not Call list decimated the phone solicitation business. The companies' main business is selling credit information to potential lenders, insurers and even employers.

The ability to turn credit reports on and off is a "false promise," said Stuart Platt, president of the Consumer Data Industry Association, the trade group that represents the credit reporting industry. He said it could damage an industry that has helped to reduce the cost of credit by helping lenders manage risk.

Locking reports, however, does not stop credit card solicitations. That can already be done by calling 888-5OPTOUT (888-567-8688). The ban lasts five years.

Congress will not take a vote on the full Financial Data Protection Act until fall. In the meantime, the confusion in the current system presents an opportunity for businesses to charge consumers who want to protect themselves. They have already scared Americans with statistics like, nine million Americans were victims of identity theft. Never mind that most cases labeled identity theft are simple fraud resulting from a lost or stolen credit card, according to Federal Trade Commission statistics. A consumer's liability is limited to $50 in those cases.

But the marketing campaigns seem to be working. Ten million Americans already pay about $100 a year to protect their credit information. In other words, it is already a $1 billion industry. Consumers will probably be paying more, though they don't always need to.

There are various levels of protection. Every year, a person can go to annualcreditreport.com for a free copy of all three credit reports or space them out over several months. There is no reason to ever pay for this service. Look it over for errors. (Making sense of credit scores, which determine your rate of interest, may be getting easier. This week, the three agencies said they had created a VantageScore, a single scoring system that each company will use.)

If you are worried about someone opening accounts in your name, you can call or write one of the agencies to put a fraud alert on your account. Each has the responsibility to alert the other two. The protection lasts 90 days. An additional 90 days are available but you will have to write to each credit bureau and ask. You have to keep doing this for as long as you want lenders to double-check with you.

When this fraud alert works correctly, lenders are supposed to take extra precautions before extending credit, but they do not have to do this. It could be a simple as asking for additional identification, but others may want to call you and ask for other information.

One drawback of fraud alert is that you may find it difficult to take advantage of instant-credit offers at stores. (Though this, too, might not be a bad thing. Opening too many lines of credit in a short period of time will harm your credit score.) Sometimes you may be denied credit because the lender does not want to go through the extra verification.

Another drawback is that while it is simple to sign up for a fraud alert, it is difficult to get off the list when you find it more trouble than it is worth. You have to make the request in writing and provide documents attesting to your identity.

An alternative is credit monitoring, but these services will cost you. TransUnion's TrueCredit offers three-bureau credit monitoring for $15 a month, while Equifax's Credit Watch Gold is $13 a month, also for three bureaus. A consumer is notified by e-mail after a new credit card has been issued or when a chunk of a home equity line of credit has been used. But after a while, those messages sound like the little boy who cried wolf and you might start ignoring them.

"They tell you after the fact," says Scott Mitic, vice president for business development at TrustedID, a start-up company that intends to take advantage of the confusion surrounding the protection of credit information. "It is this reactive system that irked us."

DOJ_NMG_0019505

Mr. Mitic, a former executive with Fair Isaac, the company that created the formulas for computing credit scores, and Omar Ahmad, chief technology officer at TrustedID, were introduced on what they call an "entrepreneurial blind date." They discovered a shared interest in identity theft and they came up with a way to profit from it.

"No one will confuse the credit bureaus' customer service with Nordstrom's," said Mr. Ahmad, a former chief information officer at Napster.

TrustedID plans to automate the process of locking and unlocking credit reports. When you want your credit locked or unlocked, for instance, when you intend to buy a car or apply for a mortgage, TrustedID will send the agencies all the paperwork and the fees and charge you $8 a month or $90 a year.

You could do it yourself for far less, especially if you live in one of those states where the service is free. But the company is counting on the process being so onerous that you would pay them to do it instead. Indeed, the notion that people will pay extra for the convenience of protecting their credit reports is so compelling that the company has attracted financing from one of Silicon Valley's top venture capital firms, Draper Fisher Jurvetson.

The bottom line: Those few people who have been victimized by identity thieves — not credit-card thieves — and continue to be vulnerable should take the extra precautions. For everyone else, all these services are just going to be one more hassle.

OTHER NEWS:

'A Strong Move Higher' (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

March 17, 2006 4:57 p.m.

Fueled by renewed expectations that the Federal Reserve will ease off the interest-rate brakes, the Dow Jones Industrial Average motored higher this week, nearing a six-year high.

Friday, the Dow industrials rose 26.41 points to 11279.65 Friday, finishing the week with a 203-point gain. That left the average less than 60 points shy of its highest level since January 2000, when the dot-com bubble was in full bloom -- and about to burst. It was also the same month the Dow industrials hit their all-time closing high of 11722.98.

Those airy heights proved fleeting: By Jan. 28, the Dow industrials closed at 10738.87, shedding nearly 1,000 points in two weeks as investors started to doubt the foundation of the powerful move by technology stocks. Another factor that deflated stocks: a rate-lifting campaign by the Fed.

Analysts say this move is different. Strong gains by financial, energy and basic materials companies -- more resilient than the dot-com babies of the late 1990s -- have driven the latest rally. Indeed, the move up has come from big, blue-chip companies, while the Nasdaq Composite Index, which rose 6.92 points to 2306.48 Friday, has been sluggish. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, up six days in a row, added 1.92 to 1307.25.

The relatively solid underpinning of the gains has analysts forecasting more good things to come. "I believe this is the beginning of a strong move higher," said Ned Riley of Riley Asset Management. Investors who've been sitting on the sidelines will get drawn into the market as they see major stock benchmarks such as the Dow hitting multiyear highs, he said.

Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investments, said the market could pull back next week as it consolidates its gains, but thinks the rally could still have legs if economic reports over the next few months show inflation remains under control. "If you don't see evidence that either wages are building up or that there's a continuous buildup in manufacturing prices, the likelihood is that the Fed is going to stop" raising rates soon, he said.

One factor driving stocks Friday was the expiration of four types of futures and options contracts, a quarterly phenomenon known as "quadruple witching." Midday, more than one billion shares changed hands on the New York Stock Exchange -- more than one-half of the average day's total. Volume topped 500 million shares in the first hour of trading.

Treasury bonds declined, sending yields higher. The dollar fell against the euro and yen. Futures prices for light, sweet crude oil, which jumped Thursday amid news of a big military operation in Iraq, fell 75 cents to $62.83 on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Weighing on the Dow industrials Friday was the familiar sight of General Motors hitting the skids. The auto maker shed 4.9% after it said it was increasing its 2005 loss by $2 billion4 and that it intends to restate earnings dating back to 2000. The company also delayed the filing of its 10-K report with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

On the economic front, industrial output rose at a solid pace in February on a surge in utilities production and consumer-goods output. The Federal Reserve said industrial production, which fell 0.3% in January, rose 0.7% in February, better than the 0.2% drop forecast. A confidence measure put out by the University of Michigan came in at 86.7, below the 87.8 reading expected and unchanged from February.

DOJ_NMG_0019506

In major market action:

Stocks rose5. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,939 stocks rose and 1,464 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2.6 billion shares traded, 1,581 rose and 1,434 declined.

Bonds fell6. The benchmark 10-year Treasury fell 8/32, or $2.50 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.674%. The 30-year bond fell 12/32 to yield 4.718%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar declined.7 It traded at 115.85 yen, down from 116.84 yen late Wednesday, while the euro rose to $1.2196 from $1.2178.

Housing, Inflation Data Give Investors A Boost (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- Bullish data on inflation and the housing market sent stocks mostly higher yesterday, with the Dow Jones industrials and Standard & Poor's 500 Index posting nearly five-year highs for the third straight session. A jump in oil prices moderated the gains, however, and the Nasdaq Composite Index finished lower.

Wall Street welcomed the latest report from the Labor Department, which showed consumer prices rising just 0.1 percent in February, far less than the 0.7 percent jump in January. Core CPI, with food and fuel prices removed, also rose 0.1 percent, down from 0.2 percent the previous month.

Combined with better-than-expected housing construction in February, investors were reassured that the economy continues to grow while inflation remains in check.

The Dow rose 43.47, or 0.39 percent, to 11,253.24, its highest close since May 22, 2001, when it finished at 11,257.24.

Broader stock indicators were narrowly mixed. The S&P 500 Index added 2.31, or 0.18 percent, to 1,305.33, its best close since May 22, 2001. The Nasdaq Composite Index slid 12.28, or 0.53 percent, to 2,299.56.

The Russell 2000 Index of smaller companies rose 0.85, or 0.11 percent, to 743.79, an all-time high.

Advancers outnumbered decliners by nearly 2 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Bonds mounted another strong rally, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note falling to 4.64 percent from 4.73 percent late yesterday. The dollar fell against most major currencies, while gold prices also fell.

Rising crude-oil futures eroded some of the major indexes' earlier gains. A barrel of light crude settled at $63.58, up $1.41, on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Fears of a declining housing market eased after the Commerce Department reported an annualized 2.145 million new homes under construction in February, down slightly from 2.216 million in January but a better figure than economists had expected.

First-time unemployment claims rose again, with 309,000 new jobless forms filed last week, up from 304,000 the previous week. The rising trend, while troubling to the labor market, also reassured investors that consumers' spending power would remain moderate, lowering the risk of inflation and, in turn, rate increases from the Fed.

"Once again, we're seeing a reaction to soft economic data," said Jeff Kleintop, chief investment strategist for PNC Financial Services Group in Philadelphia. "It seems to be the key to reducing worries about how aggressive the Fed is going to be going forward, which seems to be the catalyst for stocks here."

Ford Motor Co. rose 8 cents, or 1 percent, to $7.93 despite a Citigroup downgrade to "underweight" from "equal weight," or the equivalent of a "sell" rating. Citigroup said Ford was losing market share in sport utility vehicles and is seeing increased competition in pickup trucks.

Bear Stearns Cos. continued the streak of record earnings posted by Wall Street brokerage houses this week. The company's first-quarter profits beat analysts' expectations by 59 cents per share. After the session began, however, regulators announced a $250 million settlement with the company over improper mutual fund trading. Bear Stearns lost 94 cents to $133.27.

ConAgra Foods Inc. fell 91 cents to $19.50 after the food producer announced a massive restructuring plan that includes the sale of its seafood and cheese businesses and would result in unspecified one-time charges for the rest of the year. The company also cut its quarterly dividend by 34 percent.

Barnes & Noble Inc., the nation's largest bookseller, surged $4.18, or 9.7 percent, to $47.40 after it reported a 6.3 percent profit increase in its fourth quarter, beating Wall Street's expectations, and offered an earnings outlook for the current year that is higher than what Wall Street had expected.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average tumbled 1.37 percent as investors there bid stocks lower in preparation for a possible rise in interest rates there. In Europe, Britain's FTSE 100 closed up 0.47 percent, France's CAC-40 fell 0.04 percent for the session, and Germany's DAX Index slipped 0.01 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0019507

That would allow the economy to withstand further interest rate increases from the Federal Reserve, which is expected to approve another quarter percentage point rate rise when it meets March 28.

"The consumer price index rise was very modest. It suggests, as I think many of us have been forecasting, that inflation is in the process of moderating," said Hugh Johnson, chairman and chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors. "The good news is investors can feel somewhat more comfortable about monetary policy."

U.S. Stocks Rise, Notching Best Week In 2 Months; Boeing Gains (BLOOM)

By Hilary Johnson

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rose, closing out their best week in two months amid signs of steady economic growth and tame inflation.

A drop in oil prices helped the Standard & Poor's 500 Index and the Dow Jones Industrial Average advance to their highest levels since May 2001. Boeing Co., the largest U.S. aircraft maker, led the advance on demand for its 787 jetliner.

Stocks this week were aided by the biggest drop in bond yields this year and record profits from Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Bear Stearns Cos. and Lehman Brothers Holdings Inc.

``There's pent up optimism that the next couple of quarters should be OK for corporate America and the economy because the interest-rate environment has stabilized," said Jay Suskind, co-head of capital markets at Ryan Beck & Co. in Florham Park, New Jersey.

The S&P 500 added 1.92, or 0.2 percent, to 1307.25, climbing for a sixth consecutive day. The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 26.41, or 0.2 percent, to 11,279.65. The Nasdaq Composite Index rose 6.92, or 0.3 percent, to 2306.48.

Almost four stocks rose for every three that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 2 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, the highest since Jan. 26. Trading was heavier than usual because of the expiration of options and futures contracts, known as quadruple witching.

The S&P 500 climbed 2 percent since March 10, the biggest weekly advance since Jan. 6. The Dow average gained 1.8 percent and the Nasdaq is up 2 percent. Data on consumer prices and retail sales, along with a regional business survey from the Federal Reserve, eased concern that inflation will drive the central bank to raise interest rates beyond mid-year.

Bond Yields

The yield on the 10-year Treasury note dropped almost 9 basis points, or 0.09 percent, to 4.67 percent this week, the biggest decrease since December.

Boeing jumped $1.12, or 1.5 percent, to a record $77.85 for the biggest gain in the Dow average. The world's No. 2 commercial-aircraft maker met with its top suppliers on March 14 and 15 to discuss boosting production, said a spokeswoman. Doubling 787 production may mean an extra $12.6 billion in annual revenue, based on top list prices for the plane.

Boeing's gain and a Fed report on industrial production lifted a measure of industrial companies to the best gain among 10 groups in the S&P 500, rising 0.6 percent. United Technologies Corp., the largest maker of elevators and air conditioners, gained 57 cents to $58.80.

Industrial Production

Production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities increased 0.7 percent last month after decreasing 0.3 percent in January, the Fed said. The proportion of industrial capacity in use rose to 81.2 percent, the highest since September 2000, from 80.8 percent.

A separate report showed the University of Michigan's preliminary index of consumer sentiment for March was unchanged at 86.7 this month. Economists expected an increase to 88.

Crude oil for April delivery fell 1.3 percent to $62.77 a barrel in New York. The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries lowered its forecast for world demand amid signs that surging U.S. supplies are sufficient to make up for a possible disruption.

General Motors Corp. weighed on the Dow average, losing $1.09, or 4.9 percent, to $21.13. The world's No. 1 automaker said its 2005 loss will be $10.6 billion, wider than the loss of $8.6 billion it reported. GM cited higher costs to eliminate workers and bail out its bankrupt former unit Delphi Corp.

Wall Street reported record earnings this week on increases in stock trading and takeovers.

Goldman, Lehman

Goldman climbed $2.67 to $150.36 today, extending its weekly gain to 6.2 percent. The second-largest securities firm said quarterly earnings jumped 64 percent to $2.48 billion, greater than it netted in all of fiscal 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0019508

Lehman rose 0.5 percent to $142.80 this week. The fifth- biggest securities firm said earnings climbed 24 percent to $1.09 billion. Bear Stearns, the No. 6 securities firm, added 0.5 percent for the week to $132.87. Its quarterly results exceeded the highest analyst estimate in a Thomson survey.

Futures show traders kept bets the Fed will increase its main rate to 4.75 percent this month. The chance of a 5 percent rate at the meeting in May dropped to 73 percent from 90 percent at the beginning of the week, and traders erased bets on any increase in June, from 22 percent odds on March 13.

``We have a tug-of-war going on between earnings, which are reasonably good, versus the Fed, where people are trying to figure out are they still going to tighten or not,'' said Richard Bernstein, chief U.S. strategist for Merrill Lynch & Co. in New York.

Copper and zinc prices rose to records, leading a rally in base metals and boosting shares of Phelps Dodge Corp. and Southern Copper Corp. Phelps Dodge climbed $3.06 to $75.57. Southern Copper $2.38 to $83.89.

Accounting Issues

American International Group Inc., the world's largest insurer that has restated earnings twice in the past year, fell 42 cents to $68.82 today. AIG said fourth-quarter profit before some items was 14 cents a share, less than the 19 cents predicted by Mark Lane, an analyst at William Blair & Co. in Chicago. AIG also said it is trying to fix remaining flaws in its accounting systems by 2007.

Bausch & Lomb Inc. gained after the impact from its accounting problems proved to be less than feared. The maker of contact lenses and eye-care products, which plans to restate results for 2001 to 2005 due to financial misconduct in Brazil, said improper revenue practices at some other overseas units lowered sales during that period by $12.6 million. The adjustments are ``minor,'' said Suey Wong, an analyst at Robert W. Baird & Co. The stock rose $3.81 to $68.87.

Maytag, Sirius

Maytag Corp. fell $1.23, or 6.9 percent, to $16.71 for the steepest drop in the S&P 500. The Justice Department may fight Whirlpool Corp.'s proposed $1.68 billion purchase of its rival, on concern the deal is anticompetitive, people familiar with the case say. Whirlpool spokesman Christopher Wyse and Maytag spokesman John Daggett declined to comment.

Shares of Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., the No. 2 pay-radio company, jumped 38 cents to $4.89. The company said it signed an exclusive 5-year agreement for Volkswagen AG to put its receivers in 80 percent of the carmaker's new U.S. cars starting with 2007 models.

Tektronix Inc., a maker of test equipment for electronics manufacturers, climbed $4.11, or 13 percent, to $36.70 for its biggest gain in three years on better-than-expected earnings. Fiscal third-quarter profit, excluding some items, was 37 cents a share, more than the 33 cents average expected in a Thomson Financial survey. Thomson does not provide the parameters of its estimates to Bloomberg News.

Oil And Productivity Set A Positive Tone (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

NEW YOR -- A rebound in manufacturing activity along with declining oil prices helped Wall Street extend its rally Friday, lifting the Dow Jones industrial average and the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index to fresh five-year highs for the fourth consecutive session.

The Federal Reserve reported that industrial production grew 0.7 percent in February after sliding 0.3 percent the month before, with the onset of cold weather driving an upswing in utilities output.

Stocks' gains were limited, however, as the day's news reports did little to address Wall Street's persistent worries about inflation and more interest-rate increases from the Fed, said Ken Tower, chief market strategist for Schwab's CyberTrader.

"I think the question the market is struggling with is whether we are concerned about inflation and too strong an economy, or if the Fed is raising interest rates too much and cooling things off," Tower said. "So we have a little pause in the market today as it tries to work this question out."

The Dow rose 26.41, or 0.23 percent, to 11,279.65, its highest level since May 21, 2001.

The S&P rose 1.92, or 0.12 percent, to 1307.25 , its highest close since May 22, 2001. The Nasdaq composite index rose 6.92, or 0.3 percent, to 2306.48.

Bonds cooled following this week's rally, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note edging up to 4.67 percent, from 4.64 percent late Thursday.

Crude oil futures declined slightly after OPEC cut its projected global demand by 110,000 barrels a day.

The market also weighed a mixed assessment of consumers from the University of Michigan. Its consumer-sentiment index for March came in at 86.7, unchanged from February but below economists' prediction of 88.

DOJ_NMG_0019509

"One thing worth noting is that we saw several positive pre-announcements from economically sensitive companies," such as DuPont and Union Pacific, Sheldon said.

Analysts also said that while the Dow and the S&P 500 are pressing past multiyear highs, the Nasdaq is still about 30 points off its January record of 2331.36. Whether the tech sector can close that gap and contribute to the market's gains could determine how long this rally will continue, Tower said.Movers Viacom rose 60 cents, to $38.97. It is selling the film library of recently acquired DreamWorks SKG for $900 million.

Google rose $1.02, to $339.79, after saying it expects its 2006 capital expenditures to be significantly greater than the $838.2 million it spent last year.

General Motors fell $1.09, to $21.13, after saying its 2005 loss was $2 billion more than originally reported.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 9.69, to 8271.61.

American Stock Exchange index fell 3.89, to 1927.83.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks rose 2.30, to 746.09.Volume

NYSE: 2.39 billion shares, down from 2.41 billion Thursday. Advancers outnumbered decliners by nearly 2 to 1.

Nasdaq: 2.51 billion shares, up from 2.38 billion. Advancers narrowly outnumbered decliners.Commodities

Crude oil for April delivery: $62.77, down 81 cents.

Gold for current delivery: $554.10 a troy ounce, down from $554.40 on Thursday.

Industrial Output Advanced Briskly Last Month (WSJ)

By Rafael Gerena-morales

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Utility-Plant Production Surges to Fuel the Gains; Manufacturing Stays Solid

Industrial production expanded at a healthy pace last month, the latest sign that American industry is thriving.

The Federal Reserve reported Friday that industrial production in February at the nation's factories, mines and utilities jumped 0.7% from January, boosted by a surge in production at utility plants. Compared with a year earlier, industrial production was up 3.3%.

Read the complete text1 of the Federal Reserve's report on February industrial production and capacity utilization, and analysis2 from Briefing.com.

On the surface, the showing was slightly weaker than economists had expected, due partly to declining auto production. In addition, February's output follows an unusually strong January, when manufacturing output expanded at a 10% annualized rate as factories along the Gulf Coast continued to come back online in the aftermath of last year's hurricanes. January's surge was "due for a pause," said Daniel Meckstroth, chief economist at the Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI.

But economists found lots of positive news in the report, especially in the manufacturing sector, which is seeing year-over-year output expand at double-digit rates for some key sectors that reflect consumer spending and business investment. Overall, manufacturing output was flat last month, but was up 4.2% over the past 12 months.

"The manufacturing sector is solid," said Joel Naroff, chief economist at Commerce Bancorp. "We're still in the midst of a pretty well-rounded expansion. Consumers have been buying. Businesses have been investing. That's translating into more output" on an annual basis, he said. In February, manufacturing output "was taking a deep breather more than anything else."

The average capacity utilization rate -- which measures how fast industry is running -- rose to 81.2% last month from 80.8% in January. When utilization rates spike, busy factories compete for workers and materials, which could eventually put upward pressure on inflation. For now, though, economists said capacity levels aren't high enough to do so.

Within manufacturing, production was strongest among makers of computers and electronic products, where output rose 19% during the past 12 months and 1.2% last month. Economists pay close attention to computer output because it suggests that businesses are investing in new equipment. When business spending is rising, "it's a suggestion that businesses are doing well and they have a high level of confidence in the U.S. economy," said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Corp. "It shows you there is more breadth in the economic expansion than the consumer alone."

Breach Security Inc., a 38-employee manufacturer of data-security equipment in Carlsbad, Calif., is riding the technology-investment boom. The company's security device -- which sells for as much as $50,000 per unit -- works on computer networks to prevent hackers from penetrating corporate Web sites and also safeguards sensitive information. Last year, Breach Security sold 20 units, but it has ramped up production and manufactured 40 of the 50 units it expects to sell in 2006. Any business "with privileged information on the Web has to protect its customers and employees," said Marc Shinbrood, Breach Security's chief executive officer.

DOJ_NMG_0019510

A housing boom has kept factories humming for makers of electrical equipment and appliances. Although the sector declined 1.7% last month following a 2.4% gain in January, production for the group was up 7.3% year over year. The category includes washing machines, refrigerators and dishwashers.

Whirlpool Corp., Benton Harbor, Mich., last month reported that its fourth-quarter net income rose 30% to $126 million. Roy Armes, senior vice president of the program management office, said sales are rising as consumers trade up to higher-quality appliances in new styles that emphasize modern design. Customers are willing to pay more for those goods, which include energy-efficient, front-load washers and stainless-steel refrigerators that resist fingerprints, he said. "We are entering 2006 with strong business momentum," Jeff Fettig, Whirlpool's chairman and CEO, recently told investors.

Last month, utility output increased 7.9% as the weather turned cooler and consumers used more electricity to heat their homes. Natural-gas production rose 12.9%. Spending on business equipment rose 0.1%. Meanwhile, production of cars and parts fell 0.8%, and textile production fell 1.3%, according to the Fed. Excluding autos and parts, manufacturing output rose 0.1% last month.

Separately, the University of Michigan's midmonth report on consumer sentiment for March held steady at 86.7, the same level seen at the end of February.

U.S. Economy: Industrial Production Rebounds In Feb. (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Carlos Torres

Bloomberg, March 18, 2006

March 17 (Bloomberg) -- Industrial production in the U.S. rebounded last month, led by utilities and computer makers, as a record increase in demand for power raised the risk of faster inflation.

The 0.7 percent increase last month in production at the nation's factories, mines and utilities followed a 0.3 percent decrease in January, the Federal Reserve said in Washington. The proportion of industrial capacity in use rose to 81.2 percent, matching December as the highest since September 2000.

``You can no longer make the argument that there is a lot of excess capacity out there," said John Silvia, chief economist at Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``The bias on inflation is a little bit to the upside and the Fed has to be careful about that."

The lack of untapped capacity may cause factories to raise prices, prompting Fed policy makers to boost interest rates one or two more times, economists forecast. Higher borrowing costs and gasoline prices limited consumer confidence this month, a University of Michigan survey showed today.

The university's index of sentiment held at 86.7, reflecting a rise in Americans' perceptions of current conditions and a decline in expectations.

The Fed's report followed data yesterday that showed consumer price inflation slowed in February from a month earlier, suggesting companies are having limited success passing along higher costs.

The gain in February industrial production was led by a 7.9 percent jump in utility output as people used more electricity and natural gas to heat their homes.

Manufacturing

Manufacturing was unchanged, restrained by a decrease in motor vehicle production. Factories churned out more computers, semiconductors and communications equipment, reflecting an increase in corporate investment that will help drive economic growth.

``The big surprise here, though, is the unchanged manufacturing output, following four straight gains," said Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics in Valhalla, New York. ``This looks like nothing more than a blip. The average gain in manufacturing in January and February is a healthy 0.4 percent."

Economists expected a 0.8 percent increase in industrial production, according to the median of 63 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey, following January's previously reported 0.2 percent decrease. Capacity utilization rose from January's 80.8 percent.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year note rose 3 basis points to 4.67 percent at 4:15 p.m. in New York. Ten-year notes still increased this week by the most since the period ended Dec. 16.

Interest Rate Futures

Interest-rate futures show traders kept bets the Fed will increase its key rate to 4.75 percent this month. The chance of a 5 percent rate at the meeting in May dropped to 73 percent from 90 percent at the beginning of the week, and traders erased bets on any increase in June, from 22 percent odds March 13.

Industries used 81 percent of capacity on average over the last three decades, according to Fed data. Higher-than-average operating rates increase the risk bottlenecks develop in the production process that will cause manufacturers to raise prices.

DOJ_NMG_0019511

Work at factories, which accounts for almost 90 percent of industrial production, was unchanged after rising 0.8 percent in January. Production of consumer durable goods, which includes automobiles, furniture and electronics, roes 0.1 percent after increasing 1 percent the previous month.

Vehicle Production

Production of autos and parts fell 0.8 percent after increasing 2.4 percent. Manufacturing production excluding autos rose 0.1 percent after a 0.6 percent increase.

Business equipment production, which includes transportation and information processing equipment, rose 0.1 percent in February after increasing 1.2 percent the previous month. Production of technology equipment, such as computers, communications gear and semiconductors, rose 2.3 percent last month after no change.

Production of non-durable consumer goods, which include food, clothing, and paper products, rose 1 percent in February after falling 1.4 percent the previous month.

The return of more seasonable temperatures in February also contributed to the production increase. Utility use slumped a record 11.5 percent in January, when the average temperature was the warmest for the month in over a century of record keeping.

Mine production decreased 0.5 percent last month after rising 2.3 percent.

Manufacturing Employment

Factories are hiring and boosting hours to keep up with demand from companies looking to expand operations. Manufacturers added 41,000 workers to their payrolls in the last five months and the workweek rose to 41 hours in February, 30 minutes longer than the average over the last five years, figures from the Labor Department show.

While U.S. automakers are struggling, foreign competitors are among those growing.

Toyota Motor Corp., the world's second-largest automaker, said this week it will build Camry sedans at Fuji Heavy Industries Ltd.'s U.S. Subaru plant, as the company rushes to add capacity to meet rising sales in the biggest auto market.

Toyota plans to make as many as 100,000 Camry automobiles annually at its factory in Lafayette, Indiana, with production to begin in 2007. In turn, Fuji plans to hire 1,000 workers and invest $230 million to upgrade the factory.

Inventories

Low inventories are also giving manufacturers reason to ramp up production. After sales jumped in January, businesses had enough goods on hand to meet 1.24 months' demand at the current pace, a record low, according to a Commerce Department report this week.

``We came into the year on the lean side'' in inventories, Abhi Talwalkar, chief executive officer at LSI Logic Corp., said in an interview March 15. The Milpitas, California-based maker of chips for consumer products and data storage devices had ``pretty strong growth'' in demand last year which is likely to continue in 2006, he said.

Regional surveys suggest factory activity gained momentum this month. Manufacturing in New York unexpectedly accelerated, a report this week from the state's Fed Bank showed. Measures of hiring, sales, and orders all rose. A similar report from the Philadelphia Fed showed total activity in the region slowed even as orders and sales accelerated.

The strength in manufacturing will prompt central bankers to raise interest rates one or two more times, economists forecast. Fed policy makers, when they meet in two weeks, are forecast to raise their target rate to 4.75 percent, according to the median estimate of economists surveyed by Bloomberg News. It would be the 15th consecutive quarter percentage point increase since they began raising the rate in June 2004.

Reduced Gas Price Slows Inflation (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Inflation slowed sharply in February as food costs moderated and the price of gasoline, natural gas and other energy products posted big declines.

The Labor Department reported yesterday that its closely watched U.S. Consumer Price Index (CPI) posted a tiny 0.1 percent increase last month after having jumped 0.7 percent in January. The slowdown in price pressures was certain to be welcomed at the Federal Reserve, which has been boosting interest rates since June 2004 to make sure inflation does not get out of control.

The number of Americans filing claims for unemployment benefits edged up to 309,000 last week, an increase of 5,000 from the previous week. Even with the slight increase, analysts said the level of claims was still signaling a strong labor market.

The third consecutive rise in jobless claims pushed them to the highest point in 11 weeks. However, analysts said they remain at a level that shows the labor market has rebounded from the blows delivered last year by the Gulf Coast hurricanes and surging energy prices.

DOJ_NMG_0019512

The government reported last week that 243,000 new jobs were created in February, the strongest gain in three months, as hiring picked up across the country. Analysts are forecasting similar strong job gains in coming months.

In a third report, the Commerce Department said that construction of new homes and apartments declined by 7.9 percent in February to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.12 million units, another sign that the nation's five-year housing boom is slowing.

Analysts had expected the February slowdown after housing had surged to the fastest pace in more than three decades in January, reflecting unusually warm weather during the month.

The CPI report showed that energy prices dipped by 1.2 percent last month after a big 5 percent increase in January. The moderation reflected a 1 percent drop in gasoline pump prices, a 2.8 percent fall in home heating oil costs and a 4.5 percent drop in the price of natural gas, which was the biggest decline in more than four years.

New York Congressman Won't Seek 13th Term (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 17 — Representative Sherwood L. Boehlert, a moderate Republican from central New York who became a national advocate of science and a champion of environmental protection, announced Friday that he would not seek re-election.

Mr. Boehlert, 69, who under party rules would have had to surrender his chairmanship of the Science Committee at the end of this session, said he believed he had recorded solid accomplishments in his current term and decided after 24 years on Capitol Hill that he was ready to step aside.

"It is just time," Mr. Boehlert said in a telephone interview before he made his decision public at an event in his district, which is centered in Oneida and Cayuga Counties.

"There are other things to challenge my free time," said Mr. Boehlert, a baseball fan who said he wanted to spend some time at the ballpark and more time with his family. "I'm not tired, but I would rather not work 25 hours a day, eight days a week."

Although Mr. Boehlert and Republican leaders say the party will hold onto the seat in November, his departure provides an added opportunity for Democrats who need 15 seats to gain control of the House of Representatives.

Amy Walter, who follows House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report, observed that President Bush won the district with about 17,000 votes or 53 percent in 2004 but carried it by only 3,000 votes or 48 percent in 2000. "If this were a normal election year, you would give Republicans a bit of an edge," she said. "But between the reality of a bleak national political environment for Republicans and a weak Republican slate at the top of the ticket in New York, you wonder if Republican voters will be motivated to go the polls."

But Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, a New York colleague who heads the National Republican Congressional Committee, said he was confident that Republicans would keep the 24th District.

"Look, I would like Sherry to stay," Mr. Reynolds said. "But it is a Republican seat, and we will do fine."

Mr. Boehlert said he provided assurances to President Bush that the seat was safely Republican when he rode to New York on Air Force One with the president earlier this week, and he reiterated that view to Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. Mr. Boehlert is the 17th House Republican to retire this year.

A former Congressional staffer, Mr. Boehlert also served as Oneida County executive before he won the House seat. He compiled a liberal voting record for a Republican and has been challenged from the right in recent primaries.

In the House he was known for his willingness to challenge his conservative colleagues on environmental issues like the Endangered Species Act, automobile mileage standards and oil drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. His frequent breaks with the party would have complicated his efforts to win the chairmanship of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee had he decided to seek another term.

Mr. Boehlert said he believed that he could have captured the post, but that the panel's most important piece of legislation — the highway bill — would not be taken up again until 2009, meaning a decision to run again would have also meant a commitment to seek re-election in 2008.

Mr. Boehlert used his seniority on that panel to steer tens of millions of dollars in highway and transportation money to his district over the years, and he announced his plans on Friday afternoon at the Boehlert Transportation Center in Utica. "Some people outside my district might call it pork," he said, "but to me it is the lifeblood."

He said he considered retiring in 2002 but decided to stay to help prevent the closing of military facilities in his district. As the head of the Science Committee, Mr. Boehlert was a supporter of space exploration and helped lead the Congressional inquiry after the Columbia disaster. But he said he took pride in moving the scope of the panel beyond the space agency into a push for more science education and new energy technology while beefing up the academic credentials of the committee staff.

DOJ_NMG_0019513

"We are still No. 1," said Mr. Boehlert, referring to America's standing against its international competitors, "but they are catching up fast."

N.Y. Republican Boehlert Won't Seek 13th House Term (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

Rep. Sherwood L. Boehlert (N.Y.), a champion of space exploration and environmental causes who remained a moderate Republican as the House shifted rightward, said yesterday that he will not seek a 13th term this fall.

Another House veteran -- 14-term Rep. Martin O. Sabo (D-Minn.) -- has scheduled a news conference for today to announce his retirement as well, the Minneapolis Star Tribune reported on its Web site yesterday. Democrats have some hope of replacing Boehlert in his Upstate New York district, whereas Sabo's solidly Democratic district is almost surely beyond the GOP's reach.

Republican term limits would have forced Boehlert, 69, to give up his Science Committee chairmanship next year. He had told hundreds of supporters in his home town of Utica that he would retire after 24 years as the representative of his district -- and 15 as a congressional aide to his predecessors.

Democrats hope Boehlert's retirement and President Bush's low approval ratings will give them a chance to win the seat, which the GOP has held for decades. Bush won 53 percent of the district's 2004 presidential votes while John F. Kerry drew 47 percent, and independent analysts say it still leans Republican.

"It's a difficult opportunity for the Democrats, but nevertheless an opportunity," said Stuart Rothenberg, who writes a nonpartisan political newsletter in Washington. "Democrats are going to need a wave there."

Democratic activists expect Michael A. Arcuri, 46, the Oneida County district attorney since 1993, to win the Sept. 12 primary. Republicans are looking to five-term state Sen. Raymond A. Meier, 53, to be their nominee. Rothenberg said Meier could be formidable because, as a mainstream Republican, he might enjoy stronger support from conservatives than did Boehlert, who often irritated his party's right.

In announcing his retirement, Boehlert said: "It is time. I feel like I've done it the right way."

Once a heavy smoker, Boehlert had heart bypass surgery in 2004. But insiders attributed his retirement largely to Republican rules that force most committee chairmen to step aside after six years. Other GOP veterans who have chosen to retire this fall rather than return to rank-and-file status include Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Thomas (Calif.).

Boehlert has been among the most liberal House Republicans for years. He has voted to raise the minimum wage and against a ban on a late-term abortion procedure. He supports stricter limits on carbon dioxide pollution -- a cause of greenhouse-effect warming -- than the Bush administration and many of his colleagues.

In 2001, Boehlert opposed an administration proposal to reduce the international space station's activities to allow only three astronauts to work there. After the space shuttle Columbia was lost in February 2003, he co-chaired hearings about the space program. He endorsed Bush's call for manned missions to the moon and Mars, but he said people should go into space "on a limited basis, on an as-needed basis."

Sabo, 68, has represented Minneapolis in the House since 1979, and he spent 18 years in the Minnesota House before that. He briefly served as House Budget Committee chairman before the GOP takeover of the chamber, which followed the 1994 elections.

Rep. Sabo To End His Long Career In Congress (MINNST)

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 18, 2006

The Minneapolis Democrat will retire one of the nation's safest seats for an incumbent, setting off a DFL scramble to replace him.

Kevin Diaz, Rob Hotakainen and Rochelle Olson Star Tribune Staff Writers WASHINGTON - Rep. Martin Sabo, a lion of Minneapolis DFL politics for four decades, is expected to announce his retirement today after 28 years in Congress, people familiar with his decision told the Star Tribune on Friday.

Sabo, who turned 68 last month, has scheduled a noon news conference in his Minneapolis office.

His departure is expected to set off a scramble within the DFL party for a replacement. Jack Nelson-Pallmeyer, a professor of justice and peace studies at the University of St. Thomas, already has opened a campaign office and challenged Sabo at last week's precinct caucuses. And Michael Erlandson, Sabo's chief of staff and the former chair of the state DFL party, is expected to run.

"If the right situation arose, I've spent 19 years in public service and public policy, and such an opportunity would be the opportunity of a lifetime," Erlandson said Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0019514

State Rep. Keith Ellison, DFL-Minneapolis, and DFL Minneapolis City Council Member Gary Schiff also said Friday that they would run.

Sabo's departure comes as a big surprise, especially since he could have become a committee chairman next year if Democrats recapture the House in this fall's elections. He had been campaigning for another term. One person familiar with the decision said the congressman's decision had nothing to do with his health or that of his wife, Sylvia, who had breast cancer.

The people who said Sabo would announce his retirement spoke on the condition that they wouldn't be identified, because they did not want to upstage Sabo's official announcement.

Minneapolis Mayor R.T. Rybak said he was stunned and saddened by Sabo's decision.

"There is no other politician who has had more of an impact on the character of Minneapolis, our roads, bridges, parks, schools," he said.

Rybak said that he met with Sabo two days ago in Washington and that Sabo said nothing about his retirement.

"He was the one single bright light in government who was always watching out for the city," Rybak said. "I am in awe of the man. He's one of those very quiet guys who delivers tremendously more than he would ever promise."

Sabo, who always took pride in his ability to deliver projects to his district, has helped Minnesota win tens of millions in dollars for the Twin Cities light-rail system and other transportation projects. Rybak said Sabo has an "enormous grasp of the big picture" and an "ability to get things done."

Minnesota now will have three of its 10 congressional seats open in the November election. Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton is retiring, and Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy is giving up his House seat to run for Dayton's seat. The last time Minnesota had three open seats was 1994.

Elected at age 22

Born in North Dakota, Sabo attended Augsburg College and was elected to the Minnesota House of Representatives in 1960 at age 22. He was elected House speaker at 34. He won a seat in Congress in 1978 and has consistently ranked among its most liberal members, a fit for his district, the staunchest Democratic district in the state.

Sabo, always soft-spoken and low-key, perhaps hit his pinnacle of power in 1993 and 1994, when he chaired the House Budget Committee, earning a reputation as a deficit hawk.

He has been a vocal critic of the Bush administration, consistently voting against the president's tax cuts, saying they were skewed to wealthy Americans. In an open letter to President Bush last month, he reiterated his opposition to the war in Iraq, asking the president how he can justify spending $5.9 billion each month on the effort. Sabo was one of 133 House members who voted against the war.

Even though the idea never went anywhere on Capitol Hill, Sabo vigorously pushed legislation that would cap tax write-offs when the pay for a company's chief executive officer exceeds 25 times the pay of the company's lowest-paid worker. In recent years, Sabo left a mark by promoting civil libertarians' concerns about airline passenger profiling. And Sabo, who was born to Norwegian immigrant parents, founded the Friends of Norway caucus in 1999.

Not fertile for Republicans

Sabo, Minnesota's longest-sitting legislator, has been a popular figure in Minnesota's Fifth District, one of the nation's safest Democratic seats. He won his 14th term in 2004 with 70 percent of the vote.

"Downtown Minneapolis is not fertile Republican territory," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

In Washington, Democrats have no worries about Sabo's seat.

"No matter what Congressman Sabo announces, we are 100 percent confident that Minnesotans will send a Democrat to represent them in Congress this November," said Bill Burton, communications director for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

University of Minnesota political science Prof. Larry Jacobs called Sabo's departure a changing of the guard.

"It really is the last link to the original DFL," Jacobs said. "In another way, it's a big loss for Minnesota because Sabo had so much seniority. If the Democrats ever had the majority again, it would have meant a lot of money for the state."

But Jacobs said it's certainly not a bellwether district: "I think of the Sabo seat as the United Republic of Social Democracy. I think of it as the most liberal seat in Minnesota. I think it will be an interesting scuffle within the party."

Sabo had come under attack from the left side of his party lately, with Nelson-Pallmeyer saying that he was a decent man but that he had failed to press hard enough for an end to the war in Iraq and for other progressive causes.

"I'm confident in the power of our message. ... The people are eager for a different kind of politics," Nelson-Pallmeyer said Friday. He thanked Sabo for his long tenure in Congress and urged him to stay involved: "There are ways for Martin to be helpful to the DFL without returning to Washington for another two years."

DOJ_NMG_0019515

His departure will mean changes for the Democrats' baseball team in Washington. A huge baseball fan who follows the Minnesota Twins closely, Sabo had long played for and coached the Democrats in the annual congressional charity baseball game.

Sabo's office declined to say anything about his announcement. "He's holding a press conference and that's all I can say," Erlandson said. "I'm going to leave it at that."

Until Friday, Sabo had been expected to run for another term. He had set up a website, seeking volunteers for the "2006 Sabo team," telling his supporters that he needed help with parades, festivals, door-knocking and literature drops.

"I hope I can count on your support," he wrote on the site. "It would mean a great deal to me." Washington Bureau correspondents Greg Gordon and Aaron Blake contributed to this report.

U.S. Seen As Failing To Engage In U.N. Process (LAT)

By Maggie Farley

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Bolton shunned most talks on a rights council and his aides refused to negotiate, envoys say.

UNITED NATIONS — After being on the losing end of a 170-4 vote on the creation of a U.N. Human Rights Council, the U.S. is being criticized by many diplomats and human rights representatives here as having never fully engaged in negotiations over the matter and being unwilling to compromise.

Some diplomats said that if U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton had spent as much time lobbying at the United Nations as he did in Washington, the U.S. would have had a better result.

Bolton and other U.S. officials disagreed, saying they talked but that other nations didn't listen, and insisting they were right in trying to hold out for a better plan.

"We would rather have nothing than something that falls short of our standards. That was our view all along," Bolton said Thursday, a day after the lopsided tally in which the U.S. found itself with Palau, the Marshall Islands and Israel.

"What we found sad was that some of our central allies gave up on key points. I don't understand it to this day," he said.

The outcome seems to be a result of mixed messages and mutual miscalculation. But it was rooted in the United States' ambivalence about how deeply to engage at the United Nations on certain issues.

"It is not clear whether or not they wanted the council to succeed, but it is clear that they were ineffective," said Lawrence Moss,Ö the special counsel for U.N. reform for Human Rights Watch. "The Bush administration was divided about the proposed human rights council, and that was reflected in the way they negotiated. They could have been much more focused and joined with others in Europe and Latin America to press for their goals."

The drive for a new human rights body began last fallÖ after world leaders agreed at a U.N. summit to replace the Human Rights Commission, which Secretary-General Kofi Annan lamented was being used to protect violators from censure more than safeguarding human rights.

There should be no place for human rights violators on the new council, Annan said.

He suggested that new members must win support of two-thirds of the 191-nation General Assembly rather than have seats allocated by region. membership hinge on winning the support of two-thirds of the 191-nation National Assembly rather than on allocation of seats by region. In the past, countries with poor human rights records such as Sudan, Libya and Zimbabwe had been able to gain seats, and the commission could not pass a resolution condemning Sudan in 2004 even after the United States had called deemed the systematic massacres in Darfur genocide.

However, the majority of the General Assembly members, many from Africa and Asia, feared that the new council would be dominated by wealthy countries and be used against them.

When negotiations began in late October, the United States insisted that human rights violators be kept off the new council, and that the panel be able to take effective action against abusers.

"Their bottom lines were not unreasonable," said one of the chairs of the preparatory meetings. "But their inflexibility was. If one formula does not work, if you're serious, you should work to come up with another one. For the most part, they did not do that."

In the end, members who feared they could not win a vote for the 2/3 rule two-thirds support rule agreed that candidates for the council would have to win a majority, or 96 votes, in a direct election in the General Assembly. In addition, each council member's human rights record would be reviewed from time to time, and a systematic violator could be suspended from the council by a two-thirds vote of the General Assembly.

Critics said that instead of negotiating at meetings, the U.S. kept repeating its position. As well, Bolton did not appear at most of the formal sessions, which other ambassadors who did show up took to mean that Washington was not taking the process seriously, diplomats said.

DOJ_NMG_0019516

In addition, they said that U.S. negotiators privately acknowledged that the standard could even be used to keep the U.S. off the council in a time when the United States is under scrutiny for its treatment of detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq and the detention camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

"Other countries engaged more in the process than the United States did," said Ricardo A. Arias,Ö Panamanian envoy who was one of the chairmen, known in the U.N. parlance as a "facilitators."

"I can not say they were not negotiating constructively," he said, "but they were firm in their position all through the process."

Bolton said that his deputy, Alex Wolf, and other U.S. mission staffers attended the meetings, and represented the United States well.

The negotiations stalled, and on Feb. 1, under pressure to deliver a new council before the existing Human Rights commission convened in early March, the president of the General Assembly and two facilitators sounded out countries to find a middle ground.

On Feb. 27, after many revisions and dozens of meetings, General Assembly President Jan EliassonÖ presented the final proposal. Bolton immediately denounced it because it did not contain the U.S. demands for the two-thirds threshold and a ban on countries under sanctions and called for negotiations to reopen.

"I think in the facilitator process, the United States does not get heard," said Bolton. "I would rather sit down at the table across from other countries with my red pen, and go through it line by line."

The U.S. demand put Eliasson in a quandary. "Opening up negotiations would be a ticket to misery," he said in an interview Friday. "We would end up in a deadlock — or even worse-with a text that was weaker. Every country that gave up something would want to put something back in."

But it was a situation that seemed familiar. In two other negotiations on U.N. reform in the last six months, Bolton had presented a hard line in New York, only to have Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice ultimately approve a compromise. Eliasson and his aides gambled that the same thing might happen again.

"I certainly made clear to Under-Secretary [Nicholas] Burns that I had my concerns and worries," said Eliasson. "I was glad that they did not appear to close the door."

There was a last-minute scramble to find a way to win U.S. support — or to at least keep it from blowing up the whole thing. To Eliasson, putting the proposal up for further negotiations would not only kill the council, but endanger a whole raft of U.N. reforms yet to be considered.

"It's not clear that they wanted to move," said a diplomat closely involved in the talks. "In fact I couldn't tell what they wanted. We offered ideas to Washington to achieve their goals, and nothing happened."

The diplomat questioned if the U.S. understood the disruptive effect its strategy would have on subsequent talks on human rights and UN reform, and if there was too much playing to the domestic gallery.

If Bolton was not making his message clear at the U.N., it was certainly clear in Washington. The ambassador spent every Friday there in Washington, briefing Congress members and meeting with State Department and White House government officials.

His press secretary, Ric Grenell,Ö arranged calls and meetings with about 70 editorial page editors. In one influential editorial, the New York Times wrote, "John Bolton is right; Secretary General Kofi Annan is wrong."

"We would show up at the facilitator meetings, present our case, and be ignored. When the U.S. is ignored, ignored, ignored, they can't complain when we have to go public to present our case," Grenell said.

Eliasson went ahead and scheduled a meeting of the General Assembly on Wednesday to adopt the proposal.

After the nearly unanimous vote, even the traditionally toughest critics, the human rights groups, praised the result. It may not have had the 62/37threshold that they were pushing for, but it had other measures to keep the worst violators off the council.

Bolton said the U.N. had missed a historic opportunity to help people who are most in need. But he did not carry through on a threat to block funding for the new body.

"It is encouraging to hear that despite voting against the resolution, the U.S. government will cooperate with the council and support it," said Yvonne Terlingen, of Amnesty International. "It's a victory for human rights protection around the world. Now the test is for the U.S. and other countries to join forces to make it work."

While the outcome may have reflected the White House bottom line, the bruising negotiations left bitter feelings among allies at the U.N. — and even within the State Department, said U.N. and U.S. officials. Those sentiments may play into future negotiations, some warn.

"If you don't want to be isolated, you have to willing to work to end the isolation," said the European diplomat. "You have to create conditions to get people to want to help you. So far, we haven't seen that."

DOJ_NMG_0019517

Rice Urges Better Japan-China Ties (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday expressed concern over tensions between Japan and China and urged the two Asian powers to find common ground and overcome their differences for the sake of stability in the region.

"We have encouraged good relations between China and Japan, and even though there are difficulties in that relationship, China and Japan also share a lot of interest and, indeed, a lot of trade and commerce and a lot of economic relations," the secretary said.

Miss Rice made her remarks at a press conference with Australian Prime Minister John Howard in Sydney, where she is to participate in an inaugural trilateral forum on the Asia-Pacific region with Australia and Japan today.

Beijing views the meeting as a strategy-plotting session against it, but Miss Rice insisted that the United States had a policy of engagement, not containment, toward the world's most populous country.

Japan and China often feud over a benign view of Japan's colonial past and a denial by Japanese nationalists that their nation committed atrocities in World War II.

Miss Rice, who visited Indonesia earlier in the week, traveled to the Victoria Barracks in Melbourne, Australia's second-largest city, yesterday to thank Australian troops for their participation in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

"It is always good to have friends, but it is especially good to have steadfast friends when you have difficult fights ahead," she said, noting that Mr. Howard was in Washington on September 11, 2001.

"As we continue to fight the war on terrorism, as we continue to try and supplant that ideology of hatred that has produced terrorism with the hope of democracy and liberty for people around the world, it is wonderful to have a steadfast friend like Australia," she said.

Mr. Howard signaled that he might be willing to change long-standing Australian ban on exports of uranium to nations that have not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and make an exception for India.

The prime minister visited New Delhi earlier this month, a few days after President Bush, who reached a deal on U.S.-Indian civilian nuclear cooperation. The agreement requires legislation in Congress to exempt India from U.S. proliferation laws similar to those in Australia.

On Thursday, Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer said that this is a "good deal and it takes forward this whole process of openness and transparency about at least many aspects of India's nuclear program."

But asked about selling uranium to India, as New Delhi has asked, he said: "We don't have any plans to change our current policy."

Mr. Howard softened that position yesterday, saying that there will not be an "immediate" policy change and added, "You never say never."

China May Release Jailed Times Researcher, Lawyer Says (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

BEIJING, March 17 — Chinese authorities on Friday withdrew at least part of the case against a Chinese researcher for The New York Times, in a surprise legal maneuver that left unclear whether he would soon be released as President Hu Jintao prepares to visit the United States next month.

Zhao Yan, 44, a researcher in the Beijing office of The Times, has been imprisoned for 18 months on a charge that he disclosed state secrets to the newspaper, as well as a lesser charge of fraud. Mr. Zhao has denied both charges.

His lawyer, Mo Shaoping, said court officials told him on Friday that the decision meant that both charges against Mr. Zhao were being withdrawn. He said his client could possibly be released within days. But a court order on the matter, issued Friday, made no mention of a release date for Mr. Zhao and gave no definitive statement about his status.

Officials with China's Foreign Ministry, who had failed to respond to earlier calls, said late in the evening that "further information" was needed about the "new developments." The ministry declined to say whether Mr. Zhao would be released.

In Washington, the State Department could not confirm that one or both charges against Mr. Zhao had been dropped, said a spokesman, Tom Casey. He said the embassy in Beijing would continue to press for Mr. Zhao's release, "because the charges against him lack merit."

DOJ_NMG_0019518

The uncertainty about Mr. Zhao's fate lies in the unusual legal maneuver invoked by prosecutors. Mr. Zhao was supposed to go on trial no later than Monday, his lawyer said. But prosecutors used a procedural clause to ask the court to withdraw the lesser fraud charge, citing a need for more investigation.

Mr. Mo said prosecutors sometimes use this language to request a delay of the trial date. But, in this instance, Mr. Mo said, prosecutors instead asked to withdraw the case. He said Chinese law held that prosecutors could not indict Mr. Zhao again on the same charges, unless they found new evidence.

"They are clearly looking for a reason to end the case," Mr. Mo said.

The order issued by the Beijing Second Intermediate Court is written in vague language. It defines "the case" as consisting of both charges. It then says the court agrees with the motion by prosecutors to withdraw the case. But, as explanation for the withdrawal, the order said prosecutors wanted more investigation into the lesser fraud charge. It does not refer to any new disposition of the state secrets charge, which carries a prison sentence of at least 10 years.

Mr. Zhao's case has brought heavy criticism against China from human rights groups, the United States government and other nations. President Bush has twice personally raised Mr. Zhao's case with Mr. Hu, while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has also criticized the arrest.

Bill Keller, executive editor of The Times, said he hoped that the new developments meant that Mr. Zhao would be released. "The notion that Zhao Yan's work for The Times constituted anything but dogged journalism was wrong from the outset," he said. "If this represents a legal system working the way it is supposed to, that is happy news far beyond the family of The New York Times."

The case against Mr. Zhao was politically delicate because it involved the highest levels of the Chinese leadership, which made the decision to drop any charges all the more remarkable. His arrest was tied to a Sept. 7, 2004, article in The Times, which disclosed that the former president, Jiang Zemin, had unexpectedly offered to give up his final leadership position as head of the military. The article later proved accurate when Mr. Jiang resigned.

The Chinese news media are forbidden to report on the inner workings of the top leadership of the Communist Party. The Times article prompted a high-level investigation to find the sources of the leak, according to a person familiar with the investigation. State security agents apparently quickly focused on Mr. Zhao, who had been an investigative journalist for Chinese publications before joining The Times's Beijing bureau in April 2004.

Mr. Zhao was arrested on Sept. 17, 10 days after the publication of the Times article. The key piece of evidence, later revealed in a confidential state security report, was a photocopy of a handwritten note that Mr. Zhao had written to The Times's Beijing bureau chief, Joseph Kahn, the writer of the Sept. 7 article.

The note, written two months before the publication of the article, was unrelated to Mr. Jiang's resignation plans. Instead, it described maneuvering taking place between Mr. Hu and Mr. Jiang over military appointments. Mr. Kahn later referred to the political jockeying at the end of the Sept. 7 article.

It is still uncertain how state security agents obtained the photocopy. Agents either entered the office without permission or enlisted someone to help them make a copy. Under Chinese law, the note should not have been admissible in court.

Investigators added the fraud charge a few months after Mr. Zhao was arrested. It is unrelated to the state secrets charge and involves allegations involving improper payments that date from Mr. Zhao's work at a Chinese publication, before he joined The Times. Mr. Zhao and a witness disputed the accusation.

John Kamm, a human rights campaigner who negotiates the release of political prisoners in China, urged caution about the new developments in Mr. Zhao's case, but said he was "cautiously optimistic" that the researcher would be released.

Mr. Kamm said he raised the case of Mr. Zhao and others last month in a meeting with Foreign Ministry officials. He said the officials had suggested that China would make "human rights gestures" in advance of Mr. Hu's trip to the United States.

Mr. Mo said the procedural clause used by prosecutors to withdraw the case could allow them to release Mr. Zhao without restraint, or to release him on something similar to bail for up to 12 months. Then prosecutors would decide whether to bring a new case with new evidence, he added.

China Dismisses Journalist's Case (WP)

By Philip P. Pan

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

N.Y. Times Researcher Was Accused of Leaking State Secrets

BEIJING, March 17 -- Chinese authorities dropped charges Friday against a New York Times researcher accused of leaking state secrets, according to his attorney. The surprise decision could lead to the researcher's release from prison and soften criticism of China's human rights record during President Hu Jintao's upcoming visit to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0019519

Zhao Yan, 44, a Chinese journalist who worked in the newspaper's Beijing bureau, could be freed as early as Monday from the detention center where he has been held by the Ministry of State Security for the past 18 months, according to his attorney, Mo Shaoping, who said he received a formal court notice withdrawing the charges.

The move amounts to a rare admission of error by the Chinese government in a criminal prosecution involving national security, and it almost certainly required Hu's approval, because he had endorsed the investigation that led to Zhao's arrest and issued instructions to the officials running it, according to people familiar with the probe.

State security agents detained Zhao in September 2004 after the New York Times published an article accurately predicting the retirement of China's former president. Zhao's prolonged detention without trial on vague state secrets charges provoked criticism by human rights groups, and U.S. officials pressed for his release during President Bush's prior two meetings with Hu.

In a written statement, Bill Keller, executive editor of the Times, said: "The apparent end of Zhao Yan's ordeal is thrilling news for all of his colleagues. We are grateful to the many people outside the paper who spoke up on his behalf."

"The notion that Zhao Yan's work for the Times constituted anything but dogged journalism has seemed ridiculous from the outset," he added.

China often releases political prisoners as a gesture of goodwill ahead of high-level meetings with foreign leaders, and the Bush administration had put Zhao's name on a shortlist of prisoners it hoped to see released before Hu's trip to Washington next month.

But another person whose case U.S. officials had raised with the Chinese was jailed last week after spending more than six months confined to his home. Chen Guangcheng, a blind activist who led a legal campaign against the use of forced abortion and sterilization to implement China's one-child policy, was taken away March 11 and has not been heard from since, according to his wife, Yuan Weijing.

Zhao was arrested 10 days after the Times reported that former president Jiang Zemin had agreed to give up his last leadership post as chief of the military. The ruling Communist Party rarely discloses information about the senior leadership's deliberations, and the article prompted an urgent investigation to find the sources of the leak, according to people familiar with the probe.

Investigators focused almost immediately on Zhao, who friends said had been under scrutiny by state security agents even before he joined the Times in April 2004 because of his work as a journalist for Chinese publications and as an advocate for the rural poor.

But after his arrest, both he and the Times denied he was a source for the article. Prosecutors twice returned Zhao's case to state security agents for more evidence before finally indicting him in January on a charge of leaking state secrets and a lesser charge of fraud related to his work as a reporter before joining the Times.

After a series of delays, Zhao was scheduled to go to trial on Monday at the latest. But Mo, his attorney, said he received a notice Friday morning indicating that prosecutors had applied to drop the charges and that the court had reviewed and approved the request.

The notice dropping the case said prosecutors wanted to conduct "additional investigation" into the fraud charge against Zhao but gave no reason for the withdrawal of the state secrets charge, Mo said. It also said nothing about when Zhao might be released.

Under Chinese law, Mo said, "withdrawing an indictment is the equivalent of a verdict of innocence." He said that such decisions are "extremely, extremely uncommon in China" and that he had never heard of it occurring in a case involving state security.

In past cases involving international pressure, the Chinese government has usually released prisoners only after convicting them.

There are no clear procedures for releasing a defendant after prosecutors withdraw charges, but Mo said he expected Zhao to be freed on bail by Monday, the original trial deadline. He added that prosecutors could not indict Zhao again on the same charges unless they found new evidence.

"The key is that Hu Jintao would have faced a lot of questions about this case on his trip," said Jerome A. Cohen, a scholar of Chinese law retained by the Times to assist with Zhao's defense. "If they tried to delay the trial again, people would be asking, 'How can you keep delaying it? What are you afraid of?' "

But if the government put Zhao on trial, the case would have focused attention on the party's obsession with secrecy and its record of imprisoning journalists, perhaps overshadowing Hu's first state visit to the United States since he became president in 2003.

For example, the authorities would have been challenged to explain how state security agents obtained a key piece of evidence, a photocopy of a note describing rumors of political jockeying over military promotions that Zhao had written by hand for Joseph Kahn, the Beijing bureau chief of the Times. The paper has said it suspects agents entered the office without permission or recruited someone to make a copy of the memo.

DOJ_NMG_0019520

China Dismisses Case Against US Reporter (FT)

By Andrew Yeh

Financial Times, March 18, 2006

Chinese authorities have dropped charges against a New York Times news assistant who has been detained for a year and a half without trial on allegations he leaked state secrets.

The decision by prosecutors to dismiss charges against Zhao Yan comes ahead of President Hu Jintao's visit to the US in April.

The case was one of a series involving foreign and domestic journalists that has drawn international concern, amid efforts by China's ruling Communist party to tighten controls on the media – with its at times vague definition of what constitutes a state secret.

"All charges have been withdrawn," said Mo Shao-ping, Mr Zhao's attorney. He expected Mr Zhao to be released in days.

Mr Mo said government prosecutors had submitted a request to a Beijing court to have the charges dismissed and the court had agreed on Friday.

Mr Zhao was accused of revealing state secrets to foreigners and committing fraud.

The case against Mr Zhao was probably prompted by a New York Times story in September 2004 that correctly forecast the retirement of China's former president, Jiang Zemin.

However, a legal expert advising the newspaper has said the evidence against him rests on an internal memo from Mr Zhao about possible personnel changes in the military mentioned in the same story.

China often acts against journalists and intellectuals whose work focuses on the inner workings of the top communist leadership, or those dealing with sensitive topics such as the 1989 Tiananmen massacre.

Since Mr Zhao's arrest, the New York Times has repeatedly denied the allegations against him and lobbied for his release. But the long-time investigative reporter, who may have drawn the government's ire well before the story was published, was indicted last December.

The Bush administration had also raised the case as one of great concern.

Mr Zhao, now in his mid-40s, has been held incommunicado for much of the time since his arrest. He is believed to be in a high-security detention centre south of Beijing.

State security and police agents often closely monitor the activities of foreign media bureaux in China, especially those with a high profile.

``A Chinese court on Friday sentenced a junior high school teacher to 10 years in jail for publishing sensitive material on the internet, Reuters reports from Beijing. Ren Ziyuan, 27, was found guilty of "subversion of state power" for publishing an essay titled "The Road to Democracy" and other papers on the web, his father said.

Mr Ren was sentenced by the Jining Intermediate People's Court in Shandong.

Chinese Researcher For New York Times To Be Let Out Of Jail (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Zhao Yan was held on a charge of revealing state secrets. Beijing's move precedes a U.S. summit.

BEIJING — A Chinese court said Friday that it would drop a high-profile case against a New York Times researcher, a move coming a few weeks before President Hu Jintao is to meet President Bush in Washington.

The decision on Zhao Yan fits China's pattern of releasing token numbers of political or human rights prisoners before major summit meetings.

"I'm so happy," said Zhao Kun, the researcher's sister. "When I heard the news, I felt like a window had opened in my heart. Everything seemed so bright."

Zhao Yan was detained in September 2004 and charged several months later with revealing state secrets. He faced 10 years in prison. The charge came on the heels of an exclusive story by the newspaper that former President Jiang Zemin planned to step down from a government military commission, surrendering his last major post.

China's Communist Party does not view favorably the release of information on its internal workings, particularly by media beyond its direct control.

DOJ_NMG_0019521

"The government doesn't accept that journalists can have scoops," said Vincent Brossel, director of the Asia desk of Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based advocacy group. "When a big decision is made inside the party, they won't accept the liberal Chinese media or the foreign media releasing the news."

Zhao's lawyer, Mo Shaoping, said Friday that he hoped his client would be released within the next few days. It was unclear why Zhao was not released immediately, or whether he would face new charges in Beijing No. 2 Intermediate Court or some other court, Mo said.

But the news of the charges being dropped was viewed as a good sign.

"Of course I'm pleased," Mo said.

Human rights groups, attorneys and legal scholars said it was difficult to draw a broader lesson from the case. Authorities might have acted because of the gradual strengthening of the legal system, because of lobbying, or some combination. Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other officials all have raised Zhao's case with Chinese officials. Hu is to visit Washington the last week of April.

But on the same day Zhao's case was reportedly dropped, a court sentenced a 27-year-old teacher, Ren Ziyuan, to 10 years in prison on charges of "subversion of state power" for publishing Internet essays critical of the Chinese government, according to the Reuters news service.

Ren, like most Chinese in trouble for criticizing the government, had no foreign leaders calling for his release.

"On one day there's good news, and then there's bad," Brossel said. "In the long run, I really hope things are changing. But I can't read the implications of Zhao's case."

Media watchdogs also wondered whether the Zhao decision augured well for a related case, that of Singapore reporter Ching Cheong, who was detained on spying charges last year.

For the seventh year in a row, China put more journalists in jail in 2005 than any other nation, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Thirty-two were in prison as of Dec. 1.

Analysts said one result of the court's decision to drop the Zhao case might be to ease the chill on Chinese reporters, some of whom push censorship boundaries at significant personal risk.

"Zhao is a senior reporter," said Wu Ge, director of the Constitution and Human Rights Center at Qinghua University. "Chinese media will be encouraged by this decision."

Zhao's sister, who lives in the northeastern city of Harbin, said she planned to give her brother a big hug when she saw him.

"I've been very worried about him being in jail for the past 18 months," she said. "At the same time, I always believed he'd be OK. He's only a journalist, and I don't think my brother would ever do anything to hurt the country."

*

Yin Lijin of The Times' Beijing Bureau contributed to this report.

German Trial Promises A Look Into The Nuclear Black Market (LAT)

By Jeffrey Fleishman

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

BERLIN — A German engineer accused of belonging to a worldwide nuclear smuggling network went on trial Friday for allegedly providing technology to Libya that could have been used to enrich uranium for weapons.

The case, being heard in a Mannheim court, is expected to offer a glimpse of the nuclear black market once masterminded by Pakistani scientist Abdul Qadeer Khan. The trial is likely to focus on Western intelligence information, middlemen, money trails and what role German companies may have played in aiding leaders such as Libyan ruler Moammar Kadafi.

Gotthard Lerch, 63, is charged with violating Germany's weapons control and foreign trade acts. He allegedly was paid $34 million to provide Libya with gas centrifuges and other dual-use technologies.

Lerch had earlier been charged with treason. Prosecutors dropped that charge as part of an agreement with Switzerland, where Lerch had been living, to have him extradited to Germany in 2005.

Lerch has pleaded not guilty. His lawyers argued Friday that they had been denied access to prosecution documents, and they requested that the six judges hearing the case be replaced. Lerch is expected to seek intelligence records from the CIA and other Western spy agencies.

"The trial is hugely important in strengthening international attention to the problem of illegal proliferation," Goetz Neuneck of the Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at the University of Hamburg told German radio. "It would be very good for international nonproliferation if the trial were to provide more details and shine more light on dark corners."

Authorities focused on Lerch after the U.S. and Britain seized a shipment of nuclear-related components from a Libya-bound freighter in October 2003. Under Western pressure to abandon its quest for weapons of mass destruction, Libya cooperated with investigators. The seizure also provided details of Khan's dealings with other countries, including North Korea and Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0019522

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, told German prosecutors that Lerch was involved in supplying technology to Libya. He was also mentioned in a Malaysian investigation of smuggling.

The Times reported last year that an IAEA investigator had found that rotors for an advanced centrifuge were delivered for the Libyan project to Khan's operations in Dubai.

The alleged sale of such technology led to Lerch's arrest. Investigators fear that other crucial components collected by the Khan network never arrived in Libya and may have been diverted to another country. The father of Pakistan's nuclear program, Khan was humiliated when he confessed in 2004 that his black market had provided technology to Libya and Iran. He is under house arrest.

In the late 1970s, Lerch, working for a German company that produced nuclear technology, was investigated by German trade authorities for selling centrifuges and pumps to Pakistan. He was never charged. He was also investigated, but again never charged, for allegedly smuggling nuclear blueprints into Switzerland in the 1980s.

Hamas Ready To Announce Government (AP)

By IBRAHIM BARZAK

Associated Press, March 18, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip (AP) -- Hamas said it is ready to announce the formation of its government Saturday, two weeks ahead of a deadline but apparently without coalition partners that might have softened the militants' image.

In another possible setback, the Hamas government program is not expected to win the approval of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who is to meet with the group's leaders in Gaza Saturday. Abbas' aides said the Palestinian leader considers the Hamas platform too vague and wants it rewritten.

Hamas cannot present its Cabinet to parliament for approval without backing from the moderate Abbas, who was elected separately and wields considerable authority. However, Abbas cannot impose his own Cabinet lineup on Hamas, which swept January parliament elections and controls an absolute majority in the legislature.

Abbas is expected to put off the approval of a new government until after Israel's March 28 election, but his confidants say he is not ready to force a full-blown political crisis with the Islamic militants.

The new foreign minister will almost definitely be Mahmoud Zahar, a Hamas firebrand, according to a preliminary list given to The Associated Press by officials in Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a smaller PLO faction that was considering joining the government.

Said Siyam, a Hamas lawmaker from Gaza, has been tapped for the Interior and Civil Affairs Ministries, which control three of the five Palestinian security forces and is responsible for contacts with Israel's security services, said the officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the list was not final.

Siyam, considered a relative moderate, was among hundreds of militants deported by Israel to south Lebanon in 1992.

The wrangling over the new government comes at a time when some officials in Abbas' Fatah Party are calling on him to resign and to dissolve the Palestinian Authority, to protest Israel's raid of a West Bank prison earlier this week. The raid, in which troops snatched Ahmed Saadat, the leader of a small PLO faction, and other suspects in the assassination of an Israeli Cabinet minister, was a blow to Abbas' prestige.

If the Palestinian Authority were to be dissolved, Israel - as occupier of the West Bank and Gaza Strip - would be forced to assume responsibility for some 3 million Palestinians living there. The dissolution would also render Hamas' election victory irrelevant.

Abbas said earlier this week he was not ready yet to break up the Palestinian Authority.

In other developments Saturday, Israeli troops left a West Bank village after a failed overnight arrest raid. At the start of the operation late Friday, a 10-year-old Palestinian girl was killed when soldiers fired at a car she was riding in with her older brother and uncle, Palestinian witnesses and Israel Radio said. The witnesses said the soldiers were dressed in civilian clothes and fired without warning. The army declined comment.

After the initial shooting, soldiers surrounded a house where they believed three militants were holed up, and an army bulldozer began demolishing the building. However, the fugitives escaped.

In Gaza City, the designated Hamas prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, was to hold a news conference Saturday to announce the formation of the Hamas government, officials in the group said.

Abbas was to travel from the West Bank to Gaza on Saturday for a meeting with Hamas leaders, his office said. In the meeting, Hamas is to present its Cabinet lineup and program. Abbas aides said he was expected to ask for revisions in the Hamas program.

DOJ_NMG_0019523

Hamas has rejected demands that it moderate its views, despite threats by the West that it will cut off substantial foreign aid to the Palestinian Authority unless the new government renounces violence, recognizes Israel and promises to honor existing peace agreements.

Hamas To Propose Palestinian Cabinet That Excludes Other Parties (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 17 — Hamas said Friday that it would propose a new Palestinian cabinet consisting of Hamas members and independent figures, but without officials from any other party.

Hamas said it expected to give the list to Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, on Saturday. Mr. Abbas's Fatah faction has already said it will not participate in a Hamas-led government. Mr. Abbas may yet reject the new government's agenda, because it does not explicitly acknowledge the validity of past agreements between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization, or support negotiations with Israel.

But it is not clear what consequences such a rejection would have in this untested political situation for the Palestinians. Hamas is expected to take the crucial ministries of foreign affairs, finance, education and interior, which controls the police.

An indication of Hamas's position came from its exiled political leader, Khaled Meshal, who said in Damascus on Thursday night that political power for Hamas was only "a means to an end" and is less important than fighting Israel, Reuters reported.

"Our fate is to combine resistance and politics, but resistance remains the basis and politics only a branch," Mr. Meshal said. "Being in power is only a means to an end for Hamas."

Mr. Meshal was speaking at a memorial gathering on Thursday night. "We and the Zionists have a date with destiny," he said. "If they want a war, we are the sons of war," he said, adding, "We have more stamina than Israel and will defeat it, God willing."

Mr. Abbas was a crucial negotiator for the P.L.O., but Mr. Meshal criticized its agreements with Israel that created the interim Palestinian Authority. "A country can only exist on liberated land," he said.

Mr. Meshal's comments did not suggest that Hamas would soon agree to international demands that a new Palestinian government recognize Israel, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

In Brussels, at a meeting of the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — together known as the quartet — an American assistant secretary of state, David Welch, said, "To this date, I have not seen a positive Hamas reaction in respect to any of these principles." He said the quartet was discussing ways to channel emergency aid to the Palestinians while trying to avoid sending money to a government led by Hamas, which is classified by the United States and the European Union as a terrorist group.

In Israel, the government officially confirmed its first avian cases of the A(H5N1) strain of bird flu, saying the virus had killed thousands of turkeys and chickens in the south. Three people who worked with infected birds have been hospitalized.

The European Union immediately banned the import of Israeli poultry, unless the meat had been heat-treated or the birds were slaughtered before mid-February.

Separately, Israel's Justice Ministry said it was investigating a hospital that reportedly held a newborn baby to ensure that the parents of triplets would pay their hospital bill. The mother, an Israeli Arab, gave birth prematurely two months ago, and the babies required extensive treatment. After the case was written about in the daily newspaper Haaretz, the ministry ordered the release of the child and said it would ensure payment to the hospital.

Beyond that, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, still comatose after a stroke in January, will be moved to a long-term care center outside Tel Aviv after elections this month, The Associated Press reported, citing an Israeli television station.

Fatah Officials Call For Abbas To Resign (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, March 18, 2006

Several Fatah officials called on President Mahmoud Abbas to resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority to protest Israel's raid of a West Bank prison earlier this week, party activists said Friday.

The raid, in which Israel seized six top militants, was seen as a humiliating blow to Abbas' prestige and raised new questions in his Fatah Party about their president's ability to govern, especially following Hamas' landslide victory in a January parliamentary election.

If the Palestinian Authority is dissolved, Israel — as occupier of the West Bank and Gaza Strip — would be forced to assume responsibility for the 3 million Palestinians living there. The dissolution also would render Hamas' election victory irrelevant.

DOJ_NMG_0019524

In violence Friday, Israeli soldiers shot and killed a 10-year-old girl during an operation in the West Bank village of Yamoun, the girl's father, Abdul Rahman Zaed, said. The girl was in a car with her uncle, who was shot in the head and arrested, Zaed said.

The army, engaged in a fierce gunbattle with militants in Yamoun, surrounded a house in which three militants were holed up and called on them to surrender, Palestinian security officials said. Later, a 13-year-old boy was wounded in the fighting, officials said.

The call for Abbas' resignation and the dissolution of the Palestinian Authority at the Fatah Central Committee late Thursday was the first time such a demand was made.

Analysts and Fatah officials said the demands — raised both in a letter to Abbas signed by five midlevel Fatah activists and at Thursday's meeting by a senior party official — are not serious at the moment.

However, the idea could gain momentum if a resumption of peace talks becomes increasingly unlikely and the economic situation deteriorates further, said Ghassan Khatib, the outgoing Palestinian planning minister.

Taysir Nasrallah, a Fatah official from the West Bank city of Nablus who signed the letter, said Israel's prison raid showed the Palestinian Authority was useless.

"Israel should pay a heavy price for occupying the Palestinian Authority," Nasrallah told The Associated Press.

In Thursday's meeting of Fatah's Central Committee, one of the members, Tayeb Abdel Rahim, opened the session by demanding that Abbas resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority, a participant said. He spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media about the closed-door session.

The official quoted Abdel Rahim as saying that the Palestinian Authority is unable to solve Palestinian problems and that it is "time for us to leave."

During a tour of the demolished prison in Jericho a day after Israel's raid, Abbas rejected the idea that he would resign and dissolve the Palestinian Authority.

Fatah has been increasingly frustrated with Abbas since Hamas' election victory, and the party is almost certainly not joining the Islamic group's new government.

Abbas is tentatively scheduled to meet Hamas' designated prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh, on Saturday.

Hamas spokesman Salah Bardawil said the group would be ready to present its government to Abbas on Saturday. Abbas has the power to veto Hamas' government, forcing it to return with a different program.

Since Hamas' election victory, Israel has tightened its hold on the Palestinians.

It has stopped transferring millions of dollars in tax revenues collected for the Palestinian Authority and has called on the international community to slap economic sanctions on a Hamas government, steps the World Bank says would devastate the already poverty-ridden Palestinian areas.

A closure on Palestinian areas, meant to end Thursday after the Jewish holiday of Purim, has been extended until at least next week, and the army is inclined to continue it until after Israel's March 28 elections.

The closure bars Palestinian laborers from entering Israel and shuts down Gaza's main cargo crossing, Karni. Israel, citing security concerns, has closed Karni on and off for most of the past two months.

Karni's closure led the Palestinian Mill Co., which says it supplies about 60 percent of Gaza's flour, to idle last week because it used up its flour stocks. On Friday, Palestinians flocked to bakeries in Gaza City, fearing a bread shortage.

The Palestinian National Economy Ministry said Friday it expects bakeries to run out of flour within a few days because of the mill's shutdown.

Also Friday, two Palestinians were killed and three wounded in northern Gaza when homemade rockets they were preparing to fire at Israel exploded prematurely, Palestinian security officials said.

Netanyahu Angles For Yet Another Comeback (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Israel's former prime minister, lagging in the run-up to a national election, leads a party whose prospects, like his own, have turned.

TEL HAI, Israel — Benjamin Netanyahu was in his element: a dramatic, wind-whipped overlook at Israel's northern tip, a onetime fortress where 86 years ago, a storied band of beleaguered Jewish pioneers fought and died at the hands of Arab attackers.

Here in Tel Hai, a Zionist touchstone, the 56-year-old candidate for prime minister paid his respects to the fallen — and symbolically linked their lonely struggle to his own.

DOJ_NMG_0019525

"Who is going to act against Hamas, for the safety of our children?" he thundered, referring to the Islamist group that swept to victory in January's Palestinian elections. "Who is going to do it? We're talking about our country!"

It wasn't subtle, but neither is Netanyahu's style. And even if it were, subtlety is a luxury he could ill afford these days.

Heading into a March 28 parliamentary election, the onetime boy wonder of Israeli politics leads a party that once dominated the electoral landscape, but now is lagging far behind.

There is no small irony in this turn of events. Netanyahu devoted most of the last three years to trying to wrest control of the conservative Likud Party from his archrival, Ariel Sharon. He achieved that ambition at last, but only after Sharon quit Likud, leaving it a shriveled husk. The centrist Kadima party that Sharon started — now led by Ehud Olmert, who took over after Sharon suffered a massive stroke — is forecast to win at least twice as many seats as Likud.

Still, many observers believe it would be foolish to count out Netanyahu, a charismatic but divisive politician whose career has been marked by dramatic reversals of fortune.

In the 1996 campaign, six months after the assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Netanyahu at one point trailed the dovish Shimon Peres by 20 percentage points. Then Israel was rocked by a devastating series of Palestinian bombings. The attacks killed 67 people in 13 days. Netanyahu emerged the victor by a razor-thin margin. At the age of 46, the U.S.-educated, media-savvy Netanyahu, universally known by his nickname Bibi, became the country's youngest prime minister.

A scant three years later, irate Israeli voters booted him out of office by a humiliatingly large margin.

When Netanyahu reentered politics in 2001 after a hiatus to lick his wounds, he presumed that the aging Sharon would present little obstacle to his claim on the Likud leadership. Instead, the old ex-general went on to become one of the most popular leaders in modern Israeli political history, with his statesmanship likened to such towering figures as David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister.

Having assumed the leadership of Israel's hard right at a time when the country is embracing a more centrist view, Netanyahu now finds himself struggling to broaden his appeal.

"Likud has not been able to follow the swing in Israeli public opinion," said political scientist Itzhak Galnoor of Hebrew University. "The public generally agrees with the partitioning of the biblical Land of Israel, and the Likud leadership remains stuck in its previous position."

Likud's platform opposes the creation of a Palestinian state — something most Israelis now accept as inevitable.

Netanyahu strategists express frustration that voters apparently are giving little weight to his impressive qualifications.

The Israeli economy was a shambles when he took over as finance minister in 2003, but was booming when his tenure ended. Even critics agreed the turnaround was largely due to the rigorous economic reforms Netanyahu championed, though many complained his policies caused hardship to the poor and elderly.

And after years spent in the shadow of one ex-general after another, Netanyahu is finally in a race in which his military credentials, including a stint in the ultra-elite commando unit Sayeret Matkal, are far more solid than those of either of his main opponents, Olmert and Peretz.

Instead, a viewer of the political ads that flicker across the country's TV screens every night might be forgiven for believing Netanyahu was the electoral contest's dominant figure and his character the chief issue.

Kadima has devoted considerable resources to skewering him, playing to the perception that Netanyahu is manipulative and insincere. One much-discussed Kadima ad, apparently aimed at making Netanyahu appear untrustworthy, features nothing but footage of him giving a speech while his eyes continually shift back and forth.

The Israeli electorate's relationship with Netanyahu is a complicated one. He is simultaneously admired and reviled for his smooth public persona, widely remembered for a made-for-television moment during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, in which he suavely donned a gas mask while speaking live on CNN in his perfect colloquial American English.

"He's really a very skilled politician — an extremely good speaker, good at diplomacy, and he works hard and does his homework," said political analyst Gideon Doron of Tel Aviv University. "But his weakness is lack of credibility — the public perception that he lies to those around him, that under pressure he panics."

On the campaign trail, Netanyahu appears to be fighting the stereotype of slickness. He's a man who knows how to carry himself in an expensively tailored suit, but at recent speeches and appearances, he has favored a simple open-collared shirt. At one campaign stop, he ignored the raised platform set up for him and brought a microphone down to crowd level.

Few things irritate Netanyahu more than what he calls "armchair analysis" of his family history, but it looms large in his public persona. Almost every Israeli knows the story of Netanyahu's elder brother, Yonatan, who was killed in the daring 1976 raid at Entebbe airport in Uganda, when Israeli commandos rescued the passengers of a plane held by Palestinian hijackers.

The family was devastated, and hopes of a brilliant future for Yonatan, the favored son, were transferred to the younger Benjamin. Despite protestations that he hates having his character dissected in connection with Yonatan's death, Netanyahu chose to feature footage of Entebbe in his campaign ads.

DOJ_NMG_0019526

Netanyahu is adept at cultivating political allies, but appears to have few real friends in Israel's political establishment.

On a Likud campaign swing through the economically depressed northern town of Kiryat Shemona, Uzi Landau, a prominent Likud member of parliament, stumped energetically for the party in a shopping mall and an open-air produce market, but turned snappish when asked about Netanyahu's leadership attributes.

"I think I would have made a better leader," Landau said.

If asked what quality they associate with Netanyahu, many Israelis mention raw opportunism. Even among Netanyahu's supporters, many noticed that although he railed for months against Sharon's plan to withdraw troops and settlers from the Gaza Strip, he waited until just days before the pullout to give up his Cabinet post in protest.

Among voters, those character traits often outweigh Netanyahu's strengths, including his searching intelligence. Visiting a high-tech factory in the Negev desert town of Sderot, the MIT-schooled candidate sat with computer-circuitry technicians in their white lab coats, peppering them with detailed questions.

"I was surprised — he really knows a lot about this," said 30-year-old technician Alexander Kirzner. But asked whether that was enough to win his vote, he smiled.

"I admire what he's done with the economy, and this is the best-paying job I've ever had," he said.

"But that doesn't mean I trust him with everything to do with our lives."

How I Learned To Love The Wall (NYT)

By Irshad Manji

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

New Haven

ON March 28, Israelis will elect a new prime minister to replace the ailing Ariel Sharon. But I'd bet my last shekel that I'll continue to hear the phrase "Ariel Sharon's apartheid wall." It's a phrase spoken — make that spewed — on almost every university campus I visit in North America and Europe.

Among a new generation of Muslims, this is what Mr. Sharon will be known for long after he leaves office: unilaterally erecting a barrier, most of it a fence, some of it a wall, that cuts Arab villages in half, chokes the movement of ordinary Palestinians, cripples local economies and, ultimately, separates human beings.

The critics have a point — up to a point.

They're right that Palestinians are virtually wailing at "the wall." When I went to see its towering cement slabs in the West Bank town of Abu Dis last year, an Arab man approached me to unload his sadness. "It's no good," he said. "It's hard."

"Why do you think they built it?" I asked.

The man shook his head and repeated, "It's hard." After some silence, he added, "We are not two people. We are one."

"How do you explain that to suicide bombers?" I wondered aloud.

The man smiled. "No understand," he replied. "No English. Thank you. Goodbye."

Was it something I said? Maybe my impolite mention of Palestinian martyrs? Then again, how could I not mention them?

After all, this barrier, although built by Mr. Sharon, was birthed by "shaheeds," suicide bombers whom Palestinian leaders have glorified as martyrs. Qassam missiles can kill two or three people at a time. Suicide bombers lay waste to many more. Since the barrier went up, suicide attacks have plunged, which means innocent Arab lives have been spared along with Jewish ones. Does a concrete effort to save civilian lives justify the hardship posed by this structure? The humanitarian in me bristles, but ultimately answers yes.

That's not to deny or even diminish Arab pain. I had to twist myself like an amateur gymnast when I helped a Palestinian woman carry her grocery bags through a gap in the wall (such gaps, closely watched by Israeli soldiers, do exist). It made me wonder how much more difficult the obstacle course must be for people twice my age, who must travel to one of the wider official checkpoints nearby.

I appreciate that Israel's intent is not to keep Palestinians "in" so much as to keep suicide bombers "out." But in the minds of many Palestinians, Ariel Sharon never adequately acknowledged the humiliation felt by a 60-year-old Arab whose family has harvested the Holy Land for generations when she has to show her identity card to an 18-year-old Ethiopian immigrant in an Israeli Army uniform who's been in the country for eight months. In that context, fences and walls come off as cruelly gratuitous.

For all the closings, however, Israel is open enough to tolerate lawsuits by civil society groups who despise every mile of the barrier. Mr. Sharon himself agreed to reroute sections of it when the Israel High Court ruled in favor of the complainants. Where else in the Middle East can Arabs and Jews work together so visibly to contest, and change, state policies?

I reflected on this question as I observed an Israeli Army jeep patrol the gap in Abu Dis. The vehicle was crammed with soldiers who, in turn, observed me filming the anti-Israel graffiti scrawled by Western activists — "Scotland hates the blood-sucking Zionists!" I turned my video camera on the soldiers. Nobody ordered me to shut it off or show the tape. My Arab taxi driver stood by, unprotected by a diplomatic license plate or press banner.

DOJ_NMG_0019527

Like all Muslims, I look forward to the day when neither the jeep nor the wall is in Abu Dis. So will we tell the self-appointed martyrs of Islam that the people — not just Arabs, but Arabs and Jews — "are one"? That before the barrier, there was the bomber? And that the barrier can be dismantled, but the bomber's victims are gone forever?

Young Muslims, especially those privileged with a good education, cannot walk away from these questions as my interlocutor in Abu Dis did. If we follow in his footsteps, we are only conspiring against ourselves. After all, once the election is over, we won't have Ariel Sharon to kick around anymore.

Israel Announces First Cases Of Deadly Bird Flu Strain, In Turkeys (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 17 -- Israeli health officials announced Friday that they believe more than 1,000 turkeys have died in recent days from bird flu, the first reported cases in the country.

Initial test results appeared to confirm that birds being raised on four farms in southern Israel died after being infected by the H5N1 virus, avian influenza's deadly strain. Additional tests recommended by the World Health Organization are being conducted to confirm the findings, but Israeli officials are already taking precautions.

The Agriculture Ministry began preparations Friday to kill 86,000 birds within a roughly two-mile radius around the farms where, by some unofficial estimates, 11,000 turkeys have died in recent days.

Israel also halted the export of all unprocessed chicken and turkey meat, and health officials sought to assure Israelis that the supply in stores was safe.

"The risk that people will contract the virus is very, very low," said Avi Yisraeli, the Health Ministry's director general.

Nearly 100 people worldwide have died of avian flu, and tens of millions of birds have been slaughtered in efforts to stop its spread.

After it was discovered in Turkey last fall, Israeli health and agriculture officials said it was likely only a matter of time before the first birds here contracted the virus. Yaakov Edri, Israel's health minister, told Army Radio on Friday that there was a "very high chance that this is avian flu."

"But, of course, there are more tests to be done," Edri said.

Last month, the H5N1 virus was detected in poultry in Egypt, Israel's southern neighbor. Because the suspected cases of infection in Israel have so far been concentrated in the south, Agriculture Minister Zeev Boim said the virus may have migrated from Egypt.

Israeli military officials have also asked the Palestinian Authority for blood samples from poultry in the Gaza Strip, seeking to determine if the virus may have come from there. Israel evacuated settlers and military installations in Gaza last year but still maintains control over trade passages into Israel.

Israeli agriculture officials imposed a quarantine on at least three farms in the Negev region of southern Israel while testing is underway. Israeli officials said the results would be ready within two days.

The Haaretz newspaper reported that at least three workers from the farms were being treated for symptoms associated with bird flu, although there has been no confirmation that they are suffering from the virus. One of the men, a Thai immigrant, is being held in isolation at the Soroka Medical Center in the city of Beersheba.

Health officials said they had vaccinations for about half of Israel's roughly 6.2 million people and planned to fly in an additional 4 million doses from the Netherlands in the coming days.

The Ynet news Web site reported that culling had begun Friday and estimated it would eventually involve more than 200,000 birds. The killing is done by poisoning the birds' drinking water, and Israeli farmers are expressing fears of huge financial losses.

As Spring Thaws The Caucasus, Birds And Fear Are Flying North Through Georgia (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

TBILISI, Georgia, March 16 — In the early morning hours, the cobblestone alleys that wander this city's slopes are normally crowded with schoolchildren, walking in groups with their backpacks and books. But such sights have lately become rare.

At School No. 50 on Thursday, the director, Nino Gogsadze, stood in the corridors for the 9 a.m. opening. Only two students were waiting for the day's lessons. Both were her sons.

DOJ_NMG_0019528

The school's 822 other children were absent.

"The parents do not let their children go to school," Ms. Gogsadze said. "They are afraid."

Such is the power that avian influenza can hold over the public imagination as the March thaw advances north across the former Soviet Union.

Two girls from School No. 50 died this month of complications related to a strain of common influenza. The deaths were not caused by avian influenza, according to the Georgian government and the World Health Organization, which has reviewed the laboratory results of biological samples taken from the girls.

But clinical facts have hardly mattered, and Tbilisi has succumbed to an outbreak — not of avian influenza, but of fear.

School attendance has dipped to half of normal levels, said Alexander Lomaia, the minister of education. Ambulance calls have soared, reaching 900 a day here, up from slightly more than 600, said Lado Chipashvili, the minister of labor, health and social affairs.

The fear has undermined confidence in the food supply, reducing poultry sales and making it hard to find dishes containing chicken or eggs in restaurants.

Even Mr. Chipashvili has had trouble ordering shkmeruli, the sautéed chicken in garlic-and-cream sauce that is part of Georgia's national cuisine. "Unfortunately, it is impossible," he said.

Only one bird has been identified in Georgia with the avian influenza virus — a wild swan found dead near the coast of the Black Sea on Feb. 23. Domestic birds within a radius of about two miles of the dead swan were promptly culled, about 1,700 birds in all, according to Levan Ramishvili, the coordinator of avian influenza programs at the Ministry of Agriculture.

Georgia has had no human cases of avian influenza, and the World Health Organization said Georgia had monitored bird populations, improved its health system's ability to treat human cases, and educated its public about the virus and how it its transmitted.

"I have the impression that they are doing quite well," said Dr. Bernardus Ganter, the adviser on communicable diseases for the World Health Organization's European region, which includes Georgia. "They are serious about this."

The public reaction, however, has tapped a combination of fears. Georgia borders Turkey and Azerbaijan, which between them have had seven confirmed human deaths from avian influenza this winter.

And as residents of a post-Soviet state, Georgians retain an ingrained distrust of government announcements, even though the current government, which came to power in 2003, has proved much more open than the old.

The sense that official assurances should be treated with skepticism was deepened by the handling of three deaths in recent weeks in Azerbaijan, where government officials alternately said the victims had died from avian influenza and that such diagnoses were "premature."

The World Health Organization, working with Azerbaijani officials, on Tuesday confirmed that the deaths were caused by avian influenza, which is not contagious among humans but can be contracted by people who come in contact with the blood or feces of poultry.

Georgian officials have embarked anew on a public relations campaign, which has already included public service announcements about the disease on television, and pamphlets for schoolchildren and medical workers. "It is like a panic and we are trying to calm this panic down," Mr. Chipashvili said.

He noted, however, that the spring bird migration is under way, and that as more birds pass through the region, the virus could readily spread to wild and domestic birds.

That has been the case on the other side of the Caucasus ridge, in southwestern Russia, where more than a million birds have been killed by the virus or by the culling of domestic stocks.

As the concerns multiply, Dr. Ganter says the World Health Organization has increased its presence and diagnostic capacity in Azerbaijan, and is getting cooperation from the government there.

If School No. 50 is any indicator, however, restoring public confidence in the Caucasus will be slow. Ms. Gogsadze has invited citizens to examine medical certificates showing that the girls who died did not have avian influenza. The school has been disinfected from end to end. "Every room, every corner, every toilet," Mr. Chipashvili said.

Yet the building stands empty.

"Epidemiologists told me that this school is the cleanest in Georgia," Ms. Gogsadze said. "But fear has emerged."

G-8 Countries Back Nuclear Power In Future (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

MOSCOW (AP) -- Energy ministers from the world's leading industrialized nations called yesterday for major new investments and the development of nuclear power as high oil prices and uncertainty about supplies weigh on the global economy.

DOJ_NMG_0019529

The ministers from the Group of Eight nations, meeting in the Russian capital to discuss global energy security, said significant investments would be needed in the production, transportation and processing of resources and urged policies to encourage this.

"We recognize that to attract investment it is essential for countries to have open and favorable investment regimes," they stated, "including stable and predictable regulations, clear tax laws and efficient administration procedures, as well as fair and reciprocal access to markets along the energy value chain."

Though they conceded that fossil fuels "will remain the basis of the world energy industry for at least the first half of the 21st century," the ministers urged a diversification of energy sources, suppliers, consumers, routes and delivery methods as a means of reducing energy security risks. They noted in particular the importance of nuclear energy.

"For those countries that wish, wide-scale development of safe and secure nuclear energy is crucial for long-term, environmentally sustainable diversification of energy supply," they said in a statement released by Russia's Ministry of Industry and Energy.

"We are hopeful for a very substantial worldwide rebirth of the nuclear power industry, which appears to be taking place in various parts of the world," U.S. Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said at a press conference.

The ministers called for increasing energy supplies to less-developed countries, and said the development of low-carbon technologies will be "crucial" to long-term global environmental sustainability.

Britain's trade and industry minister, Alan Johnson, emphasized there was no simple solution to easing world's dependence on hydrocarbons -- with fossil fuels likely to continue to provide 80 percent of global energy needs in the first half of this century.

But he said new technologies could reduce the environmental effects.

The ministers also said better communication between energy producers, transit providers and consumer countries was necessary.

Russia is the world's No. 1 gas producer and the biggest oil exporter after Saudi Arabia, but Moscow's recent behavior has raised concern among Western oil companies about investing in Russia and European Union worries about the dependability of supplies from state-controlled monopoly Gazprom.

Russian President Vladimir Putin promised that in the next few months Russia's parliament will pass a key bill regulating taxes on mineral extraction along with new legislation on using subsoil resources, including with the participation of the foreign capital.

The changes were "aimed at making energy business in Russia as transparent and predictable as possible," Mr. Putin said.

Russian Energy Minister Viktor Khristenko said yesterday that $17 trillion needed to be invested by 2030 "to create an effective global energy system that is resilient to shocks."

Stable legislation, a clear tax regime and flexible administration are key to realizing this goal, Mr. Khristenko said.

Russia Effectively Closes A Political Opponent's Rights Group (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

MOSCOW, March 17 — The bank accounts of a foundation led by an imprisoned Russian businessman, Mikhail B. Khodorkovsky, were frozen Friday by court order, the foundation and its bank said, a move that strongly suggests the organization is about to be shut down.

The group, the Open Russia Foundation, immediately announced that it was forced to suspend its activities promoting civil society and accused the government of extending its crackdown on private organizations.

"It seems that they are trying to stop all of our activities, because of course without money, we can do nothing," said Irina Yasina, the vice chairwoman.

The court action follows a general crackdown in Russia on private nonprofit organizations that receive foreign financing, all of which will be subject next month to a law signed in January restricting their activities.

Although Open Russia is a domestic organization, the new provisions seem tailored to include it, as a clause extends the law's restrictions to organizations founded by citizens convicted of crimes.

Mr. Khodorkovsky, the founder of the Yukos oil company, set up Open Russia in 2001. Once Russia's wealthiest man, he was convicted of fraud and other charges last year, and is serving an eight-year prison term in Siberia. He and his supporters contend that the charges against him were contrived by the Kremlin as punishment for his political activities. Mr. Khodorkovsky remains chairman of Open Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0019530

The foundation, which claims to be the country's largest, has advocated for human rights and political freedoms, in part by providing grants to partner organizations throughout Russia. It had planned a budget of $11 million this year and maintained its accounts at Trast Bank, Ms. Yasina said.

Its activities have been the subject of intense government interest, including a raid on its offices here last fall and at least five tax inspections last year, she said. On Friday, much of the suspense about Russia's intentions ended.

Dmitry V. Chukseyev, a spokesman for Trast Bank, said an official from the general prosecutor's office arrived in the morning with a court order stipulating that the accounts had been frozen "in relation to a criminal matter against Khodorkovsky, Lebedev and other unidentified people." Platon Lebedev was a business associate of Mr. Khodorkovsky and was convicted with him.

The order, Mr. Chukseyev said, "immobilizes any movements of money" without the prosecutor's approval. It did not make clear the nature of the criminal activity, he said.

The general prosecutor's office made no public statement about the case.

Mr. Yasina said that the accounts contained several million dollars, and that the assets were frozen on a day that Open Russia had planned to distribute funds to organizations it helps underwrite. She said the move was another example of Russia's backsliding on human rights, even as it holds the rotating chairmanship of the Group of 8 industrialized nations.

Mr. Khodorkovsky's supporters said Friday that he had been sentenced to serve a week in a punitive cell because he had been drinking tea outside an approved prison area. Officials of the prison service could not be reached for comment.

Almost all aspects of Mr. Khodorkovsky's business and public activities have faced government pressure since his arrest in 2003. His oil company is in ruins, after being drained of assets by enormous tax judgments against it and by having its core business auctioned off by the Russian authorities. Mr. Khodorkovsky himself still has several years to serve on his prison term.

Ms. Yasina said the events on Friday signaled to her that Open Russia, like Yukos, would not survive.

"Now it is absolutely clear," she said. "I had some hope, even today in the morning. Now I understand that we are stopped."

U.S. May Consider New Belarus Sanctions (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

White House Report Calls Leader 'Corrupt'

The White House accused the authoritarian president of Belarus yesterday of being "among the most corrupt leaders in the world," and administration officials said they will consider new sanctions assuming tomorrow's elections are manipulated as expected.

In a report sent to Congress on Thursday night and posted on the Web yesterday, the White House alleged that President Alexander Lukashenko "has created a repressive dictatorship on the doorstep of the European Union," sold arms to rogue states and enriched himself at the expense of his people.

The release of the report just two days before presidential elections in the former Soviet republic was intended as a sharp repudiation of a man often called Europe's last dictator amid a pre-vote crackdown on dissent. Authorities in Belarus, where the KGB retains its Soviet name, have shut down newspapers, raided civil society organizations, stifled anti-government rallies, and beaten and arrested opposition figures, including a candidate running against Lukashenko.

"We are very concerned about the behavior of the leaders in Belarus," White House press secretary Scott McClellan said yesterday. "They are not pursuing a democratic course."

In separate interviews, two other administration officials who were not authorized to speak on the record said the U.S. government is studying ways of applying more sanctions against Lukashenko's regime, targeted specifically against him and his cronies. The United States has already imposed travel restrictions on some high-level Belarusan officials.

Assuming the elections are not deemed free and fair, the administration would consider working with European governments to go after the assets of Lukashenko and his circle, the officials said. "This is something that people at the highest level feel strongly about," said one of the officials. The other said, "It's unacceptable that there's a dictator and a tyrant on the border of NATO and the E.U."

Although Belarus is a small country with 10 million people and little strategic importance, Bush has taken a personal interest as part of his vow to spread democracy. On Feb. 27, he invited to the Oval Office two Belarusan women, Irina Krasovskaya and Svetlana Zavadskaya, who have become important opposition symbols since their husbands disappeared. In the national security strategy he unveiled this week, Bush included Belarus among seven countries deemed "despotic systems."

DOJ_NMG_0019531

The new report, drafted in response to the Belarus Democracy Act passed by Congress in 2004, alleges that Belarus sold arms, military equipment and dual-use items to countries such as Iran and Sudan. The money goes into secret funds controlled by Lukashenko, according to the report.

The report says that Lukashenko controls a presidential fund with more than $100 million and quotes him once bragging that it really has $1 billion. "The precise extent of corruption is difficult to determine because of the regime's lack of transparency and the blurring of personal and state property," the report says. Lukashenko gave the U.S. embassy a document reporting his annual income as $16,596.

Much of the information about his finances comes from public statements by Tamara Vinnikova, a former head of the national bank who fled Belarus in 1999. A classified version of the report has other authentication, sources said.

"This gives a very clear picture of this monstrous regime," said Rep. Christopher H. Smith (R-N.J.), who sponsored the Belarus Democracy Act. "We're not going to give up. As we've seen with every thief and dictator over time -- remember Nicolae Ceausescu? -- there's a long list of people who are no longer there to torture and abuse their people." Ceausescu, the Romanian dictator, was executed in a popular uprising in 1989.

Belarusan Ambassador Mikhail Khvostov complained that the White House report was filled with "false allegations" and "black PR." Khvostov said Belarus does not hide its arms sales but complies with U.N. regulations. And he said Lukashenko does not use the presidential fund for personal purposes but instead to fund arts and sports.

"In my view, this action on the eve of the election is an attempt of a black intervention into the internal affairs of another country," Khvostov said. "This administration does not like President Lukashenko to win this election."

Pelosi Seeks End To Darfur Violence (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, March 18, 2006

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi yesterday said the warring in the Darfur region of Sudan demands immediate attention, a day after privately urging President Bush to appoint a special envoy to help end what the White House calls a genocide.

"President Bush and I don't agree ... well we disagree on almost everything, but on this we do, and he has told us 'not on his watch' and I believe him," Mrs. Pelosi said after a speech to the Center for National Policy.

Mrs. Pelosi and congressional Democrats, who last month visited Darfur, told Mr. Bush in a meeting Thursday that an envoy would signal that peace in Sudan is important to the U.S.

"To do this we must stop the violence, bring the parties to the negotiating table and get humanitarian relief to the people who need it," the California Democrat said in her address.

The war between rebels and government forces and Arab militias has killed an estimated 180,000 people and displaced 2 million more.

Mrs. Pelosi said the congressional delegation found "a mass of death, disease and despair" for the native farmers imposed by both the state-sponsored Janjaweed militia and thieving rebels.

"[Sudanese] Vice President [Ali Osman Mohammed] Taha denied what we had seen with our very eyes," Mrs. Pelosi said.

"After persistent questioning by Congresswoman Maxine Waters, Vice President Taha finally admitted that the Sudan government had supported the Janjaweed in the past," she said.

Congress on Thursday approved more than $350 million in aid to the region, including more than $90 million for United Nations peacekeepers, who have not yet been authorized to enter the African nation.

Mrs. Pelosi said one of the problems with U.N. intervention is that the African Union has not yet requested it, and the Sudanese government fought against it in a meeting held March 10.

A decision has been postponed to give all the parties a chance to reach and sign a peace accord with a deadline of April 30. Sudan yesterday said it expected to meet the deadline.

Mrs. Pelosi said a request for U.N. troops may not come until September: "But that will only allow for more death, disease and genocide to take place."

Part of the reason the conflict has gone on for so long without U.N. intervention is contention over whether the situation classifies as genocide. The U.N. describes the conflict as the world's gravest humanitarian crisis.

Imam Mahdi Bray, executive director of the Muslim American Society Freedom Foundation, said the debate is based on the semantic arguments of a "ridiculously high" standard.

"I am also troubled that during our trips there we were told by numerous officials throughout the country that the U.S. and U.N. have not given the African Union the financial support they need," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0019532

An African Union military force has been in the region acting as a peacekeeping force since October 2004, but it only has 7,000 troops to protect hundreds of thousands of displaced families in scattered camps throughout Darfur.

Liberian Seeks Extradition Of Predecessor For Atrocities Trial (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, March 18, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, March 17 — Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the president of Liberia, said Friday that she had asked Nigeria to extradite Charles Taylor, the former Liberian president and guerrilla leader, to face war crimes charges in Sierra Leone.

Ms. Johnson Sirleaf told the Security Council that she had made a formal request to President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria, where Mr. Taylor lives in exile.

Mr. Taylor claimed asylum in Nigeria in August 2003 as part of an internationally brokered peace settlement ending 14 years of civil war in Liberia. He was later indicted on 17 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity by a United Nations-backed court in Sierra Leone.

Mr. Taylor, 58, a warlord-turned-president, rampaged through his own country and much of West Africa during the 1990's, unleashing ruthless campaigns of torture, rape and dismemberment.

Even from exile, he has maintained influence in Liberia, with thousands of young combatants still loyal to him, Ms. Johnson Sirleaf said, making her plea "courageous but risky."

"Please bear in mind that time is of the essence in this regard," she said at a news conference. "Liberia's peace is fragile. There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor, there are many business interests he has. Whatever decision is taken by the African leadership must ensure that the safety of the Liberian people and the stability of our nation is not undermined."

She said Mr. Obasanjo would consult African leaders because they had been signatories to the deal that sent Mr. Taylor into exile.

She said she also wanted to "ensure that in any proceedings, there is an environment that protects all, including the accused's, fundamental human rights."

She was not seeking Mr. Taylor's extradition to Liberia, she said, because he was not under indictment there. If he is sent to Liberia, peacekeepers there have been authorized by the Security Council to transfer him to Sierra Leone.

Mr. Obasanjo has been under pressure to act on Mr. Taylor but had said he would await a request from a democratically elected Liberian president. Ms. Johnson Sirleaf was elected in November and inaugurated on Jan. 16.

She complained that the international community should have acted sooner to help Liberia free itself from Mr. Taylor's influence.

"We inherited a problem, we are faced with serious pressure, we are a small country, we have no powers that others have, we have no security forces to protect our people and the safety of our nation, so we are caught in a situation that we have to take a major decision that should have been taken long before, giving us an opportunity to pursue our development agenda," she said.

Corinne Dufka, a senior researcher for Human Rights Watch in Dakar, Senegal, who has followed the Taylor case closely, hailed the move as an "enormous step toward advancing justice in West Africa," but she said she was troubled by Mr. Obasanjo's decision to seek the approval of other African leaders.

"Obasanjo must now play his own part in the fight against impunity in West Africa," she said.

Ms. Johnson Sirleaf, who served five years as an assistant secretary general with the United Nations Development Program, addressed a joint meeting of Congress on Wednesday and will see President Bush in the White House on Tuesday.

She used her appearance before the Council on Friday to thank the United Nations for helping Liberia end its debilitating conflicts and hold the election that put her in office.

The United Nations has a peacekeeping force in Liberia of 16,000 soldiers and police officers, and Ms. Johnson Sirleaf asked the Council to guarantee its continuance.

She was praised in speeches by many of the ambassadors, and her speech was greeted with applause, a rare occurrence in the chamber.

Liberia Seeks Trial For Ex-President (WP)

By Colum Lynch

The Washington Post, March 18, 2006

New Leader Presses Nigeria and U.N.

DOJ_NMG_0019533

UNITED NATIONS, March 17 -- Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf has asked Nigerian leader Olusegun Obasanjo and other African leaders to force Charles Taylor, Liberia's exiled former president, to face trial for war crimes allegedly committed in neighboring Sierra Leone's bloody 10-year-long civil war.

Johnson-Sirleaf, who was elected president in November, appealed to the U.N. Security Council on Friday to back her government's efforts, noting that "Liberia is still fragile." She asked Obasanjo in a meeting in Abuja last weekend to rally other African leaders to make a formal statement requesting that Taylor be tried by the U.N.-backed Special Court in Sierra Leone.

Taylor resigned and went to exile in Nigeria in August 2003 as part of a U.S.-backed deal to end Liberia's civil war and pave the way for a U.N.-led effort to rebuild the country.

Obasanjo has previously resisted international pressure to hand Taylor over, citing the need for a request from a democratically elected Liberian leader. His office said Friday that he is considering sending Taylor back to Liberia, not Sierra Leone, where he is charged.

A statement issued by Obasanjo's office cited his "commitment to give due consideration to any formal request from a democratically elected government of Liberia for the return of former president Charles Taylor," Reuters reported from Lagos.

The request for a broader African decision on Taylor's fate is aimed at easing political pressure on Liberia's fledgling government, which is struggling to put the country back on its feet after more than a decade of civil war, extreme poverty and misrule.

U.N. prosecutors maintain that Taylor has continued to exercise considerable power in Liberia from his compound in Calabar, Nigeria. They have also accused him of plotting two assassination attempts against Guinea's president, Lansana Conte.

"I have consulted with Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo and asked him that we and the leaders of Africa, particularly those that were involved in the arrangement that took Mr. Taylor to exile now bring this matter to closure," Johnson-Sirleaf told reporters at the United Nations. "And by closure I mean that a decision should be taken that would allow Mr. Taylor to have his case in court."

Johnson-Sirleaf voiced frustration that Nigeria and other African governments that crafted the deal that led to Taylor's resignation left her with the burden of confronting Taylor's legacy. "We have to take a major decision which should have been taken a long time ago," she told reporters after speaking to the council. "The pressure that has been put on Liberia is in a way unfair."

The United States and other Security Council members praised Johnson-Sirleaf's decision to press for Taylor's trial before the war crimes court. "We support President Johnson-Sirleaf's stand on Charles Taylor," said Emyr Jones-Parry, Britain's U.N. ambassador. "She has shown courage in approaching President Obasanjo on what is a difficult issue. Charles Taylor stands accused of the gravest human rights abuses and war crimes. We want to see him face the charges against him at the Sierra Leone Special Court. We hope regional leaders will support President Johnson-Sirleaf."

Taylor pitched Liberia into a civil war in 1989, when he launched an insurgency from his base in Ivory Coast. He was elected president in 1997 and has sponsored rebel movements throughout the region.

Sierra Leone's Special Court, a U.N.-sanctioned court comprised of national and international judges and prosecutors, indicted him on 17 counts of crimes against humanity, including mass murder, rape and the use of child soldiers. The court accused Taylor of training and equipping Sierra Leonean rebels believed responsible for killing, mutilating and terrorizing civilians in their quest to seize power and to control the country's lucrative diamond trade.

Liberia Seeks Extradition Of Indicted Ex-Leader (LAT)

By Robyn Dixon

The Los Angeles Times, March 18, 2006

Ex-President Charles Taylor, who lives in Nigeria, faces war crimes charges in Sierra Leone.

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf has asked Nigeria to extradite her country's former leader, Charles Taylor, to face war crimes charges, a move cheered by human rights advocates that is also laden with risks for her battered West African country.

An international court in Sierra Leone, which borders Liberia, has a cell waiting for Taylor, who has been indicted on 17 counts of war crimes. The United States has been putting intense pressure on Nigeria and Liberia to ensure that Taylor faces trial for his role in Sierra Leone's 10-year civil war.

In Sierra Leone, Taylor is accused of supporting rebels of the Revolutionary United Front, whose trademark was mutilating civilians and cutting off their limbs, as well as using children as soldiers. He left Liberia in 2003, accepting exile in Nigeria in a move that paved the way for the end of the civil war that racked his country.

DOJ_NMG_0019534

Johnson-Sirleaf, a former World Bank official, upset the favored candidate, former soccer star George Weah, in a presidential election last year and took office in January. She has been applauded for her tough stance against corruption, but she also has alienated powerful figures in the country.

In recent months there has been increased speculation about a Taylor trial, and whether it would lead to a border attack on Sierra Leone by his supporters in Liberia or some other destabilizing event. Some have suggested holding the trial outside Africa, but many analysts say that would anger Africans who are highly sensitive to the legacy of colonialism.

President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria confirmed Friday that Liberia had formally sought Taylor's extradition.

Obasanjo has repeatedly promised to hand Taylor over if requested by a democratically elected Liberian president. However, he seemed to be setting new conditions, saying he intends to consult the African Union and West African government leaders.

Johnson-Sirleaf told journalists Friday that the decision would be a collective one involving African leaders. She appealed to the United Nations Security Council to help bring Taylor to justice.

"It is time to bring the Taylor issue to closure," she said.

Nigeria argues that the AU and the Economic Community of West African States, or ECOWAS, must be consulted because they were part of the original deal to exile Taylor. But human rights groups and analysts say that extradition may become bogged down in a long consultation process, or that Taylor may take advantage of the delay and flee.

"The prosecution itself does not necessarily agree that this [consultations with the AU and ECOWAS] is a precondition to the transfer at all," said Harpinder Athwal, special assistant to the prosecution at the Special Court for Sierra Leone. Those groups were involved at a point when Liberia did not have a functioning government, she said.

"Now this is an issue government-to-government and the prosecution doesn't necessarily see that there is a role for the African Union or ECOWAS," she said. "It only takes one spoiler to say 'no' for the whole thing to collapse again and then we're back to square one."

She said prosecution of Taylor would send a powerful message to Sierra Leone, to the region with its complex web of inter-related conflicts and to the world that no one is above the rule of law.

"Often it's seen that the rich and powerful escape the rules that have been set, that there's one rule for one person and another for another," Athwal said.

Johnson-Sirleaf has moved quickly in her first two months in office. She set up a truth and reconciliation commission, fired top officials in the Finance Ministry as part of her anti-corruption drive and barred officials of the former transitional government from traveling abroad until they underwent financial audits.

The transitional government consisted of members of factions from Liberia's 14-year civil war. When they left, there were reports that members stole cars, as well as the furniture, carpets and even the light fixtures in their offices.

The new president promised to give women's issues prominence, saying she had experienced the terror of attempted rape.

Johnson-Sirleaf won enthusiastic applause when she addressed a joint session of the U.S. Congress this week, and won the warm backing of the U.N. Security Council on Friday. But the extradition move is seen as her boldest yet.

"It's a very bold step," said Mike McGovern, West Africa analyst for the International Crisis Group. "It's going to buy her a degree of goodwill because people should recognize that she's taking a risk here for the sake of ending the culture of immunity and moving Liberia into a new era."

Corinne Dufka, West Africa analyst for Human Rights Watch, said there was no reason for Nigeria to balk at Johnson-Sirleaf's request.

"Now Obasanjo will have to move ahead, and do it quickly. We do not think that he needs to get approval from the African Union or from ECOWAS," Dufka said. "He has repeatedly stated that he will surrender former President Taylor after there has been a legitimate election in Liberia. That has happened. President Johnson-Sirleaf has made a request. There is no reason to delay this any further."

*

Times staff writer Maggie Farley at the United Nations contributed to this report.

Liberia Seeks Handover Of Taylor To Court (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, March 18, 2006

Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf said Friday she wants ex-president Charles Taylor handed over to a war crimes tribunal for prosecution for his role in Sierra Leone's civil war, with the agreement of African leaders.

Sirleaf told the U.N. Security Council Liberia "is determined to address issues from our painful past ... so that the country can move ahead."

DOJ_NMG_0019535

Taylor was given asylum in Nigeria to help end Liberia's civil war and Sirleaf said she and Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo agreed at a recent meeting to seek African leaders' views before any handover.

"I have consulted with Nigerian president Obasanjo and asked him that we and the leaders of Africa, particularly those that were involved in the arrangements that took Mr. Taylor to exile, now bring this matter to closure — and by closure I mean that that decision should be taken that would allow Mr. Taylor to have his day in court," Sirleaf told a news conference after addressing the Security Council.

Obasanjo, who was credited with helping end Liberia's civil war when he helped arrange Taylor's asylum, is consulting with other African leaders on how to respond to Sirleaf's request, his office said.

Both Nigeria and Liberia have been under heavy international pressure to hand over Taylor to the court.

Obasanjo had said he would consider any request by a democratically elected Liberian leader. Sirleaf became African's first woman president after winning election in January.

Taylor plunged Liberia into years of civil war in 1989 when he led a small rebel band that invaded from neighboring Ivory Coast. He was elected president in 1997 during a lull in fighting.

He has been indicted by a U.N. tribunal in Sierra Leone on charges of committing crimes against humanity while in office by aiding and directing a Sierra Leone rebel movement and trading guns and gems with the insurgents infamous for chopping off the lips, ears and limbs of civilian victims. Fighting ended in 2001 in Sierra Leone.

Taylor has lived in exile in the southern Nigerian city of Calabar since being forced from power under a peace deal brokered in 2003 that ended the rebel assault on the Liberian capital, Monrovia.

The first word of Liberia's move came from Obasanjo's office, which issued a statement earlier on Friday saying Liberia had asked for Taylor's extradition. It said the Nigerian president was consulting with leaders from the African Union and the Economic Community of West African States who helped broker Taylor's exile on how to respond.

When Sirleaf arrived at the United Nations and was asked about Nigeria's statement, she clarified that she wanted African leaders to agree to ask for Taylor's handover.

Sirleaf criticized Obasanjo and the international community for not acting much earlier to bring Taylor to justice.

She said Liberia was taking "a rather courageous but risky" stand because "Liberia's peace is fragile."

"There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor. There are many business interests he has. Whatever decision is taken by the African leadership must ensure that the safety of the Liberian people and the stability of our nation is not undermined," she said.

Sirleaf said she met with Obasanjo in response to the increasing international pressure.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told the Security Council that the United States supported efforts by Sirleaf, Obasanjo "and other African leaders to bring Charles Taylor to justice."

___

Associated Press Writer Bashir Adigun contributed to this story from Abuja, Nigeria.

African Hope (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 18, 2006

Good news out of Africa has been all too rare in recent years. But a major exception was the election last year of Liberian President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, who stopped by our offices yesterday after addressing the United Nations.

Established by former American slaves, Liberia descended into a hellish civil war in the 1990s -- a conflict that ex-Liberian President and fugitive war criminal Charles Taylor helped spread to neighboring countries like Sierra Leone. One of Mrs. Sirleaf's agenda items at Turtle Bay was requesting that Nigeria extradite Mr. Taylor to face charges at an international tribunal in Sierra Leone.

But more important for her country's future, Mrs. Sirleaf used her time with us to emphasize that Liberia is "open for business." She's a former World Bank economist herself, and she brought along a retinue of advisers who seemed to understand that low tax rates and the rule of law are the sine qua non of Liberian hopes for growth and development. What a refreshing difference from some other African leaders, who blame the West for every trouble. Asked if she believed the U.S. owes Liberia anything, she said flatly, "no." She just wants it to be treated like other countries.

Mrs. Sirleaf is the first woman elected as an African head of state, beating out soccer superstar George Weah for the post -- a remarkable sign of political maturity from war-ravaged Liberians. "The fact that I beat a football star is proof that African electorates are looking for someone who can reverse violence, oppression and lack of freedom," she told us. Let's hope so.

DOJ_NMG_0019536

[redacted]@nsc.eop.gov

From: [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov
Sent: Monday, March 20, 2006 9:42 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Garre, Gregory G
Subject: RE: Supreme Court

I should join the bar but I am not currently a Member. Is here any way to get into the argument wihtout waiting in the public line?

-----Original Message-----
From: Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov [mailto:Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov]
Sent: Sunday, March 19, 2006 11:03 PM
To: Gregory.G.Garre@usdoj.gov; [redacted]
Subject: Re: Supreme Court

[redacted] - My recollection is that if you're a member of the sct bar you can pretty easily get a seat in the section reserved for bar members just so long as you arrive early. If you're not a member of the bar you can still get a seat but need to arrive earlier still. Am adding Greg Garre, Principal Depty SG, for any further/better info bc he's the real expert here. Greg - [redacted] is head of leg for the NSC and he led the charge on the DTA through many long days and nights.

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Sun Mar 19 15:43:23 2006
Subject: Supreme Court

Neil: Good to see you the other week at the CFR event. Any advice on how I might get a seat for the Hamdan oral arguments? Does anyone at DoJ know how to arrange this?

Thanks,
[redacted]

Garre, Gregory G

From: Garre, Gregory G
Sent: Monday, March 20, 2006 10:12 AM
To: [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov'; Gorsuch, Neil M
Subject: RE: Supreme Court

Unfortunately we have already received numerous requests for tickets from DoD and the Office of Military Commissions, and Paul has been only 9 seats for oral argument (including seats for [redacted]. Paul will make the final determination as to how to allocate seats, but as it now stands there are not enough seats even for all the attorneys who worked on the case. If we get more tickets, I will let you know; we are trying to pull all stops on this, but the Supreme Court also is receiving high demands for tickets as well. Very sorry. Greg

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov [mailto[redacted]@nsc.eop.gov]
Sent: Monday, March 20, 2006 8:42 AM
To: Gorsuch, Neil M; Garre, Gregory G
Subject: RE: Supreme Court

I should join the bar but I am not currently a Member. Is here any way to get into the argument wihtout waiting in the public line?

-----Original Message-----
From: Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov [mailto:Neil.Gorsuch@usdoj.gov]
Sent: Sunday, March 19, 2006 11:03 PM
To: Gregory.G.Garre@usdoj.gov; [redacted]
Subject: Re: Supreme Court

[redacted] - My recollection is that if you're a member of the sct bar you can pretty easily get a seat in the section reserved for bar members just so long as you arrive early. If you're not a member of the bar you can still get a seat but need to arrive earlier still. Am adding Greg Garre, Principal Depty SG, for any further/better info bc he's the real expert here. Greg - [redacted] is head of leg for the NSC and he led the charge on the DTA through many long days and nights.

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted]@nsc.eop.gov
To: Gorsuch, Neil M
Sent: Sun Mar 19 15:43:23 2006
Subject: Supreme Court

Neil: Good to see you the other week at the CFR event. Any advice on how I might get a seat for the Hamdan oral arguments? Does anyone at DoJ know how to arrange this?

Thanks

Thanks,

[redacted]

Williams, Jan

From: Williams, Jan

Sent: Monday, March 20, 2006 11:20 AM

To: Williams, Jan; Horvath, Jane (JMD); Garrett, Paul; Cushmac, Anne Marie; Davis, Michael; Fuentes, Maria; Balfe, Robert; Biskupic, Steven (USAWIE); Bogden, Daniel (USANV); Brooks, Susan; Brownlee, John (USAVAW); Buchanan, MaryBeth (USAPAW); Canary, Leura G. (USAALM); Charlton, Paul (USAAZ); Chiara, Margaret M. (USAMIW); Christie, Christopher (USANJ); Colantuono, Thomas P. (USANH); Connolly, Colm (USADE); Corrente, Robert (USARI); Cummins, Bud (USAARE); Dugas, David R. (USALAM); Fitzgerald, Patrick J. (USAILN); Garcia, H; Garcia, Michael J (SDNY); Graves, Todd (USAMOW); Greenlee, Jim (USAMSN); Heavican, Michael (USANE); Heffelfinger, Tom (USAMN); Huber, David L. (USAKYW); Iglesias, David C. (USANM); Immergut, Karin (USAOR); Jenkins, Anthony; Kubo, Ed (USAHI); Lam, Carol (USACAS); Lampton, Dunn (USAMSS); Larson, Charles (USAIAN); Letten, James (USALAE); 'Lockhart, Gregory'; Marino, Thomas (USAPAM); Martin, Alice (USAALN); Mauskopf, Roslynn; McDevitt, Jim A. (USAWAE); McKay, John (USAWAW); Mead, Matthew H. (USAWY); Meehan, Patrick (USAPAE); Melgren, Eric (USAKS); Mercer, Bill (USAMT); Miller, Gregory (USAFLN); Moss, Thomas (USAID); Murphy, Stephen J. (USAMIE); Nahmias, David (USAGAN); O'Connor, Kevin (USACT); 'O'Melia, Michael (USAAZ)'; Orwig, Matt (USATXE); Perez, Paul (USAFLM); Rapadas, Leonardo; Roper, Richard (USATXN); Rosenstein, Rod (USAMD); Ryan, Kevin (USACAN); Scott, McGregor (USACAE); Shappert, Gretchen (USANCW); Sperling, Sheldon J. (USAOKE); Suddaby, Glenn T. (USANYN); Sullivan, Michael (USAMA); Sutton, Johnny K. (USATXW); Vines, Jim (USATNM); Wagoner, Anna Mills S. (USANCM); Wainstein, Kenneth; Washington, Donald (USALAW); Whitaker, Matt (USAIAS); White, Greg (USAOHN); Whitney, Frank (USANCE); Wood, Lisa (USAGAS); Wood, Maxwell; Wrigley, Drew (USAND); Yang, Debra Wong (USACAC); '/o=USDOJ/ou=CRT/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=wsanchez'; Bradbury, Steve; Brand, Rachel; Clark, John (USMS); Clement, Paul D; Fisher, Alice; Flores, Robert; Gillis, John; Herraiz, Domingo S.; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kim, Wan (CRT); Leonhart, Michele M.; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McNulty, Paul J; Moschella, William; O'Connor, Eileen J. (AAG/TAX); Schofield, Regina; Spagnoli, Deborah A. (USPC); Tamargo, Mauricio J; Tandy, Karen P (DEA); Wooldridge, Sue Ellen (ENRD); '/o=USDOJ/ou=USAPAE/cn=Recipients/cn=Mailboxes/cn=SMalloy'; Agarwal, Asheesh (CIV); Akers, Eric J.; Ames, Andrew; Barnett, Thomas O.; Battle, Michael (USAEO); Beach, Andrew; Beck, Cherith (USAARE); 'Bianco, Joseph F.'; Blomquist, Kathleen M; Boardman, Michelle; Boote, John; Bottner, Andrea; Bounds, Ryan W (OLP); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); 'Burch, Victoria'; Chambers, Shane P; Clinger, James H; Cohen, Brian; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Comisac, Rena (CRT); Cook, Elisebeth C; Cook, Marita L. (USAWY); Cooperstein, Theodore M; Coppenger, Chesed L. (TAX); Costigan, Michael; Coughlin, Robert; Curtis, O. Benton; Daley, Cybele; 'David, Matt'; Dhillon, Uttam; Dummermuth, Matt (USAVAE); Eisenberg, John; Elwood, Courtney; Elwood, John; Flaherty, Connor; Freeman, Sharee (CRT); Friedrich, Matthew; 'Gambatesa, Donald (USMS)'; Garre, Gregory G; Glut, Martha (USANE); 'Gober, Chris'; 'Golden, Lois'; Goodling, Monica; Gorsuch, Neil M; 'Greg Harris'; Hagle, Timothy; 'Harris, Gregory'; Henke, Tracy (SMO); Hertling, Richard; 'Hofer, Patrick F. (TAX)';

Hoisington, Jana; Holland, Eric W; Irving, John (ODAG); Jaffer, Jamil N; Jezierski, Crystal; Jordan, Theresa (USADE); Jungeblut, Neal P.; Katsas, Gregory (CIV); Keehner, Laura; Kessler, Elizabeth A; 'Korn, Jennifer'; Lesch, Jaclyn; Little, Kimani (CRT); Longlet, Benjamin; Lonick, Saundra; Luckinbill, Trent W.; Macklin, Kristi R; MacLean, Alex (CRT); Magnuson, Cynthia; Marshall, C. Kevin; Martinson, Wanda; Masoudi, Gerald; McArthur, Patrick; McDonald, Bruce; McFarland, Steven T (ODAG); McIntosh, Brent; McKee, Cindy (USAKS); McKeown, Matt (ENRD); McKnight, Cynthia M (CRT); McNally, Edward; McNeil, Tucker (OPA); Mercer, Bill (ODAG); Meron, Daniel (CIV); Metcalf, Mark H (CRT); Miranda, Matthew; Monheim, Thomas; Moore, Miriam (ODAG); Morrison, Richard T. (TAX); Murphy, Sean; 'Neumayr, Mary (ENRD)'; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nichols, Grant W; Nowacki, John; OConnell, James; Otis, Lee L; Otis, William G.; Pagliocca, Theresa; Parsky, Laura; Peabody, Payson R. (TAX); Peed, Carl; Potter, Janet; Racicot, Tim (USAMT); Reyes, Luis (SMO); Roe, Price (OCIO); Roehrkasse, Brian; 'Roper, Matt M'; Rosenberg, Chuck; Rowe, Kiri; Sampson, Kyle; Schlozman, Brad (CRT); Schmitt, Glenn; Schwartz, Arthur; Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Selim, George (CRS); Sellers, Kiahna (OAG); Smith, Kimberly A; Sours, Raquel; Strug, Kerri; Swenson, Lily F; Taylor, Bruce A.; Tenpas, Ronald J (ODAG); Todd, Gordon (SMO); Tomlinson, Linda (USANH); Turner, Donald J. (USAPAM); Tzitzon, Nicholas; Underhill, Deborah; Vargas, Omar (CRT); Voris, Natalie (USAEO); Warren, Julie; Woodruff, William; Lewis, Matthew; Nelson, Ryan (ENRD); Becker, Grace (CRT); Masugi, Ken (OPA); Boente, Dana J. (TAX); Nash, Stuart (ODAG); Oldham, Jeffrey L; Pacold, Martha M; Purpura, Michael M (ODAG); Rowan, Patrick (ODAG); Senger, Jeffrey M; Taylor, Jeffrey (OAG); Webb, Lauren; White, Clifford; Murray, Fred F. (TAX)

Subject: White House Progress in Iraq Newsletter

Attachments: tmp.htm; Iraq_Newsletter_3-17-1-1.jpg; Iraq_Newsletter_3-17-1-2.jpg; Progress in Iraq _Newsletter_3-17-1 final.pdf

Attached is the White House's lastest edition of the Progress in Iraq newsletter.

THE REAL DEAL: PROGRESS IN IRAQ

MARCH 2006

"And I believe this country has got to be aggressive in our pursuit of democracy and liberty, based upon our firm belief that there are such things as the natural rights of men and women. After all, that's what caused our founding, that there is universality to liberty. And we shouldn't be surprised when 11 million Iraqis go to the polls and demand freedom in the face of unbelievable terrorist attacks."

President Bush
Remarks To National Governors Association
Washington, DC, 2/27/06

Strategy For Victory

The President's Strategy for Victory in Iraq has three components: political, economic, and security. On March 13, 2006 the President outlined the plans to defeat the terrorists while training more Iraqi Security Forces.

The Iraqi people have chosen a future of freedom and peace, and they oppose a violent minority that seeks to take that future away. Out of the new Iraq, a free government will emerge that represents the will of the Iraqi people — instead of the will of one cruel dictator. Iraqi Security Forces are taking the lead in defending their new democracy, making progress against the enemy and gaining the confidence of the Iraqi people. A major goal of 2006 is to accelerate training of the Iraqi police.

President George W. Bush addresses his remarks on the global war on terror, Monday, March 13, 2006 , before members and guests of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies at the Dorothy Betts Marvin Theatre at George Washington University in Washington. White House photo by Paul Morse

An Iraqi child is greeted by Staff Sgt. Robert Proteau, from 2nd Squadron, 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, during a patrol in Tal Afar. This photo appeared on www.army.mil.

Security Progress: Iraqi Forces Are Growing In Size And Capability

- Coalition military commanders are developing Iraqi police forces, and are helping Iraqis develop a disciplined force that protects the rights of all Iraqis.
- There are some 100 Iraqi Ministry of Defense combat battalions in the fight – up from August 2004 when there were only a handful of Iraqi Army battalions.
- There are 10 Iraqi brigade headquarters and 43 battalions that have assumed battle space. In July 2004, there were no operational Army division or brigade headquarters, and no Iraqi battalions owned their own battle space.
- In December 2005, the Iraqi armed forces performed more independent operations than did the coalition forces.
- There are approximately 240,000 trained and equipped Iraqi security forces – up from 115,000 15 months ago.

Political Progress: Iraq Moving Towards Freedom And Democracy

- Iraqi leaders are working to form a national unity government to represent all of Iraq's people.
- The IECI calculated that nearly 11.9 million Iraqi's – approximately 75 percent – voted in the Dec. 2005 elections. This represents an increase of about 4 million voters from the Jan. 2005 elections.
- Since June 2004, when the Coalition transferred sovereignty, Iraqi people have: Elected an interim government (Jan. 2005); Drafted and ratified a constitution (Oct. 2005); and elected a four-year, constitutionally based government (Dec. 2005).

Last week, the White House released President Bush's second term National Security Strategy (NSS), which explains how we are working to protect the American people, advance American interests, enhance global security, and expand global liberty & prosperity. The National Security Strategy Report is available in both text and PDF formats on the White House website: www.whitehouse.gov/nsc/nss/2006

DOJ_NMG_0019543

Economic Progress: Iraq's Economy Is Growing

- Iraq's economy is recovering after 30 years of dictatorship and lack of infrastructure maintenance.
- In 2005 the Iraqi economy grew an estimated 3 percent in real terms. The International Monetary Fund anticipates the Iraqi economy will grow by more than 10 percent in 2006.
- Under Saddam Hussein's regime, Iraqis' standard of living deteriorated rapidly. Iraq's per capita income had dropped from $3,800 in 1980 (higher than Spain at the time) to $715 in 2002 (lower than Angola).
- Today, economic recovery is picking up, with GDP growing from $18.9 billion in 2002 to $33.1 billion in 2005.

The Department of Defense Speaker's Bureau

Many community leaders have requested a member of the military to speak at community events (Rotary, Chamber of Commerce, etc.). We encourage you to visit a website that can facilitate that request:
http://www.defendamerica.mil/speakers/SpeakerProgram2.html

The DOD Speaker's Bureau places service members and civilian employees in speaking forums across the country. To request a speaker, simply click the link and fill out the form online.

"Next week, we will mark the three-year anniversary of the start of Operation Iraqi Freedom. In less than three years, the Iraqi people have gone from living under the boot of a brutal tyrant, to liberation, to sovereignty, to free elections, to a constitutional referendum, and last December, to elections for a fully constitutional government. In those December elections, over 11 million Iraqis—more than 75 percent of the Iraqi voting age population—defied the terrorists to cast their ballots.

President Bush
Discusses Freedom And Democracy In Iraq, Washington, D.C, 3/13/06

www.defendamerica.mil/

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

An Iraqi security force soldier (bottom right) leads Iraqi citizens into a voting area during elections, in Rawah, Iraq, Dec. 15. Photo taken by Lance Cpl. Shane S. Keller. This photo courtesy of the Department of Defense.

Close to 1,500 newly-trained Iraqi soldiers graduate from the Kirkush Military Training Base March 20. Photo by Sgt. Lorie Jewell. This Photo courtesy of the Department of Defense

Yes, I want to learn more about the progress in Iraq…

Name _____

Title _____

E-mail Address (required) _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

Work Phone _____ Home Phone _____

PLEASE PRINT FORM AND FAX TO (202) 456-7015.

DOJ_NMG_0019544

THE REAL DEAL: PROGRESS IN IRAQ

MARCH 2006

"And I believe this country has got to be aggressive in our pursuit of democracy and liberty, based upon our firm belief that there are such things as the natural rights of men and women. After all, that's what caused our founding, that there is universality to liberty. And we shouldn't be surprised when 11 million Iraqis go to the polls and demand freedom in the face of unbelievable terrorist attacks."

President Bush
Remarks To National Governors Association
Washington, DC, 2/27/06

Strategy For Victory

The President's Strategy for Victory in Iraq has three components: political, economic, and security. On March 13, 2006 the President outlined the plans to defeat the terrorists while training more Iraqi Security Forces.

The Iraqi people have chosen a future of freedom and peace, and they oppose a violent minority that seeks to take that future away. Out of the new Iraq, a free government will emerge that represents the will of the Iraqi people — instead of the will of one cruel dictator. Iraqi Security Forces are taking the lead in defending their new democracy, making progress against the enemy and gaining the confidence of the Iraqi people. A major goal of 2006 is to accelerate training of the Iraqi police.

President George W. Bush addresses his remarks on the global war on terror, Monday, March 13, 2006 , before members and guests of the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies at the Dorothy Betts Marvin Theatre at George Washington University in Washington. White House photo by Paul Morse

An Iraqi child is greeted by Staff Sgt. Robert Proteau, from 2nd Squadron, 3rd Armored Cavalry Regiment, during a patrol in Tal Afar. This photo appeared on www.army.mil.

Security Progress: Iraqi Forces Are Growing In Size And Capability

- Coalition military commanders are developing Iraqi police forces, and are helping Iraqis develop a disciplined force that protects the rights of all Iraqis.
- There are some 100 Iraqi Ministry of Defense combat battalions in the fight – up from August 2004 when there were only a handful of Iraqi Army battalions.
- There are 10 Iraqi brigade headquarters and 43 battalions that have assumed battle space. In July 2004, there were no operational Army division or brigade headquarters, and no Iraqi battalions owned their own battle space.
- In December 2005, the Iraqi armed forces performed more independent operations than did the coalition forces.
- There are approximately 240,000 trained and equipped Iraqi security forces – up from 115,000 15 months ago.

Political Progress: Iraq Moving Towards Freedom And Democracy

- Iraqi leaders are working to form a national unity government to represent all of Iraq's people.
- The IECI calculated that nearly 11.9 million Iraqi's – approximately 75 percent – voted in the Dec. 2005 elections. This represents an increase of about 4 million voters from the Jan. 2005 elections.
- Since June 2004, when the Coalition transferred sovereignty, Iraqi people have: Elected an interim government (Jan. 2005); Drafted and ratified a constitution (Oct. 2005); and elected a four-year, constitutionally based government (Dec. 2005).

Last week, the White House released President Bush's second term National Security Strategy (NSS), which explains how we are working to protect the American people, advance American interests, enhance global security, and expand global liberty & prosperity. The National Security Strategy Report is available in both text and PDF formats on the White House website: www.whitehouse.gov/nsc/nss/2006

DOJ_NMG_0019545

Economic Progress: Iraq's Economy Is Growing

- Iraq's economy is recovering after 30 years of dictatorship and lack of infrastructure maintenance.
- In 2005 the Iraqi economy grew an estimated 3 percent in real terms. The International Monetary Fund anticipates the Iraqi economy will grow by more than 10 percent in 2006.
- Under Saddam Hussein's regime, Iraqis' standard of living deteriorated rapidly. Iraq's per capita income had dropped from $3,800 in 1980 (higher than Spain at the time) to $715 in 2002 (lower than Angola).
- Today, economic recovery is picking up, with GDP growing from $18.9 billion in 2002 to $33.1 billion in 2005.

The Department of Defense Speaker's Bureau

Many community leaders have requested a member of the military to speak at community events (Rotary, Chamber of Commerce, etc.). We encourage you to visit a website that can facilitate that request:
http://www.defendamerica.mil/speakers/SpeakerProgram2.html

The DOD Speaker's Bureau places service members and civilian employees in speaking forums across the country. To request a speaker, simply click the link and fill out the form online.

"Next week, we will mark the three-year anniversary of the start of Operation Iraqi Freedom. In less than three years, the Iraqi people have gone from living under the boot of a brutal tyrant, to liberation, to sovereignty, to free elections, to a constitutional referendum, and last December, to elections for a fully constitutional government. In those December elections, over 11 million Iraqis—more than 75 percent of the Iraqi voting age population—defied the terrorists to cast their ballots.

President Bush
Discusses Freedom And Democracy In Iraq, Washington, D.C, 3/13/06

www.defendamerica.mil/

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

An Iraqi security force soldier (bottom right) leads Iraqi citizens into a voting area during elections, in Rawah, Iraq, Dec. 15. Photo taken by Lance Cpl. Shane S. Keller. This photo courtesy of the Department of Defense.

Close to 1,500 newly-trained Iraqi soldiers graduate from the Kirkush Military Training Base March 20. Photo by Sgt. Lorie Jewell. This Photo courtesy of the Department of Defense

Yes, I want to learn more about the progress in Iraq…

Name _____

Title _____

E-mail Address (required) _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

Work Phone _____ Home Phone _____

PLEASE PRINT FORM AND FAX TO (202) 456-7015.

DOJ_NMG_0019546

Please share as appropriate. Thank you.

From: Sinatra, Nicholas A.
Sent: Monday, March 20, 2006 9:26 AM
To: OSI - Strategic Initiatives; OPL - Public Liaison; OPA - Political Affairs; OCL - Cabinet Liaison; IGA-Intergovernmental Affairs
Cc: Ralston, Susan B.
Subject: White House IGA Progress in Iraq Newsletter

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, March 21, 2006 9:50 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Tuesday, March 21, 2006
Attachments:	agnb060321.pdf; agnb060321.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Agent Testifies Senior FBI Officials Repeatedly Dismissed Moussaoui Concerns 3
9th Circuit Critical Of DOJ Over Sri Lankan Man's Detention ...4
Judge Approves Media Release Of Edited Hayat Interview Video 5
Bush May Have Mentioned NSA Surveillance Program To Musharraf In 2001 5
Al Qaeda Operative Disrupts Trial In Turkey 5

Patriot Act:

Banks Filing More Suspicious Activity Reports Under Patriot Act 6

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says DHS Planning Chemical Plant Security Crackdown 6
Chertoff Called "A Model Technocrat," But Not "Commanding Leader." 6
DHS May Outsource Some Port Security Processes 6
Dubai Firm Delays Purchase Of US Military Manufacturer 7
FEMA Seeking Return Of Disaster Relief Funds From 51,000 Families 7

War News:

Bush Sounds Upbeat Message On US Progress In Iraq 8
Gunmen Attack Iraqi Police Station Killing 15 Police Officers 11
Iraqis Said To Have Contradictory Emotions On Third Anniversary Of US Invasion 11
Lawmakers Create Independent Panel To Study Iraq Alternatives 12
US Military Investigating Two Incidents Involving Civilian Deaths 12
Saddam's Foreign Minister Was CIA Informant 12
Father Went To Iraq Seeking Revenge For Son's Death 12
At Least 120,000 Children In Military Families Have Parent In Iraq 13
US Closely Watching Trial Of Afghan Christian 13
Van Hollen Argues Against Troop Withdrawal From Afghanistan 13
Army Conducting Criminal Investigation Of Tillman Shooting 13

DOJ:

Gonzales' Taco Bell Visit Noted 13

Corporate Scandals:

2nd Circuit Panel Tosses Quattrone Conviction 13
Former Enron Auditors Testify On Charges, Reserve Accounts 15
Former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Found Liable For Securities Fraud 15
"Chicago" Suit Hits Movie Industry Accounting Practices 15

Criminal Law:

Star Witness At "Mafia Cops" Trial Recalls Government Pressure To Cooperate 16
Pellicano Asks To Represent Himself As Defense Lawyer Challenges FBI Search 16
Jury Hears FBI Tapes During Informant's Testimony At Baltimore Police Corruption Trial 16
Eight More Indicted In California Red Cross Katrina Aid Fraud Scheme 16
Federal Scrutiny Of Chicago Hiring Practices Goes Back At Least Nine Years 17
US Attorney Challenges Campbell Lawyer's Criticism Of Investigation 17
Philadelphia Council Members Reluctant To Call For Mariano's Resignation 17
Eight Former Southwest Airlines Employees Charged In Embezzlement Scheme 17
California Developer Sentenced To Prison For Real Estate Fraud 18
Maryland Man Sentenced To Six Years For Child Porn Possession 18

FBI Arrests Senior Pentagon IT Employee On Child Porn Charges 18
Former East St Louis Police Chief Sentenced 18
Guatemalan Pleads Guilty To DC Hit Man Plot 18
SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Pollard Appeal 19
High Court Appears To Side Against Prosecutors' Use Of Victims' Words 19
Former Philippine President Says US Tapped His Calls With Aragoncillo 19
California Sex Assault Case Shifts To Civil Courtroom 19
States Move To Pass "Stand Your Ground" Bills 20

Civil Law:

RJ Reynolds Tries To Evade Chicago Smoking Ban 20
NYTimes Calls Court Ruling "Partial Victory" For Google 20

Civil Rights:

Judge Sentences Two Cuban Human Smugglers To Maximum 10-Year Sentences 20
Attorney Charges Cover-Up In Florida Boot Camp Death 21
California Prisons Prepare For Desegregation Policy 21
Consumers Group Challenges Geico's Risk Criteria 21

Antitrust:

Online Poll Shows Small-Business Opposition To AT&T-BellSouth Merger 22
Proxy Adviser Backs Boston Scientific-Guidant Deal 22
Lucent Gets FTC Nod To Purchase Riverstone Operations 22
Analysts Expect Counter-Bid For UK Insurer Prudential 22
Belgium Seeks Concessions On GDF-Suez Deal 23
FCC Deregulates Verizon's Big-Business Market 23
Kerzner Takes $3 Billion Buyout Offer 23
France Copyright Proposal Would Open Up iTunes 23
Supreme Court To Hear Patent Case 24

Environment:

Kerr-McGee Suit Disputes Federal Oil Royalties 24
US Expects Bird Flu This Year 25
Scientists Oppose Removing ESA Protections For Yellowstone Grizzly 25
Conservationists Move To Buy Timber Company Holdings 25
NYTimes Calls Administration Record On Mine Safety "Embarrassing." 25

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Sentinel Subcontractors Criticized In GAO Trilogy Audit 26
ATF Team To Target Violence In Atlanta, Other Cities 26
Gonzales Targets Georgia Meth Production 26
Former Baton Rouge Police Officer Charged With Cocaine Possession 27
Accused "Chief" Cocaine Trafficker Appears In Colorado Court 27
NBA Player's Dismissal Upheld For Violating Drug Policy 27
Bolivia Takes Coca Debate To UN 27
Government Accused Of Being Willfully Blind To Canada's Marijuana Problem 27
Former German Track Coach Convicted Of Doping Athletes 27

Immigration:

Melloan Says Illegal Aliens Should Be Given Green Cards 28

Tax:

Tax Refund Advances Under Attack 28
Training Of Pastors On GOTV Activities May Lead To IRS "Crackdown." 28
Justices Reject Former Arkansas Governor's Whitewater Appeal 28
Overpayment Of Taxes Is Growing Trend 28

Congress-Administration:

Bush Signs Debt Limit Increase Into Law 29
Bush Signs Bill Increasing Energy Aid To Poor 29
Study Finds Fewer Choices In Medicare Drug Plans 29
Education Department Official To Leave Post 29
Republicans Make Play For Firefighters' Union 29
Allen's "Paycheck Penalty" Legislation Unpopular In Congress 29
Jackson Takes Mentoring Next Generation Seriously 30
West Texas Eliminated As Possible Site For Bush Library 30
Intelligence Community To Move Toward Common Pay System This Year 30
Teacher's Union Official Opposes Bush Adjunct Faculty Proposal 30
Professor Criticizes Feingold Censure Plan 30
Marcus Criticizes Administration "Manliness." 30

Other News:

Bernanke Says Low Rates Not Indicative Of Looming Slowdown 31
"Da Vinci Code" Trial Wraps Up In London 31
Penn Says Swing Voters, Not Base, Key To Election Victories 32
Gore Says He Has No Plan To Run For President In 2008 32
Rice Not Applying For NFL Commissioner 32
Dell To Double Its Workforce In India 32
Dionne Says Republican Moderates Are Gone 32

DOJ_NMG_0019550

WPost Objects To Ginsburg Insinuations In Making Foreign Law Argument 33
US Officials Believe Iran Aiding Al Qaeda 33
Israel Briefly Reopens Gaza Crossing 34
Nunn Voices "Serious Concerns" About India Nuclear Deal .. 34
NATO Secretary-General Pledges Alliance Force For Darfur 34
US Calls For New Belarus Vote 34
Courted By China, Buffeted By Western Neighbors, Putin Faces New Ascendancy 35
Mexican Government Takes Out Full-Page Ads In US Newspapers 35
Proposed Tariffs On Chinese Imports Called "Close To Economic Suicide" For US 35
French Protesters Call For Strikes Next Week 36
Danish Emphasis On Retraining Said To Have Cut Jobless Rate In Half 36
Blair Government Proposes Ban On Secret Loans To Political Parties 36
Protesters Continue To Demand Thai PM's Resignation 36
Ethiopian Regime Cracks Down On Critics 36
NYTimes Backs Liberian Request For Taylor's Extradition From Nigeria 36

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 37

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 38

TERRORISM NEWS:

Agent Testifies Senior FBI Officials Repeatedly Dismissed Moussaoui Concerns. At the penalty phase of al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussoui's trial on Monday, defense lawyer Edward MacMahon cross-examined Minneapolis FBI Special Agent Harry Samit, who arrested Moussaoui in August 2001 and – as he testified earlier for the government on March 9 and yesterday in greater detail – unsuccessfully sought approval from FBI headquarters for a warrant to search Moussaoui's computer and belongings because Samit believed he was a terrorist who wanted to use an airliner for an attack in the US. Samit's testimony receives heavy print press coverage which emphasizes his contention, as the AP (3/21, Sniffen) puts it, "'criminal negligence' by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks."

The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) was the only network which covered the testimony, noting it was "an embarrassment a day for the Federal Government." CBS (Stewart) added Samit "was supposed to be the government's star witness," but he "accused his own headquarters of 'criminal negligence' for not investigating Moussaoui hard enough. And that failure, he testified, directly prevented 'a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks and save innocent lives.'" Samit "blamed the lack of action on careerism within the bureau."

Under the headline "FBI Witness In Moussaoui Trial Faults Superiors," The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Serrano, 958K) adds that "Samit also said his superiors did not share other critical counterterrorism intelligence with him, such as a memo from the FBI's Phoenix office about suspected terrorists taking flight lessons and a briefing for President Bush citing intelligence that planes might be hijacked. … His testimony undermined the prosecution's argument for sentencing Moussaoui to death, even though he was in jail for overstaying his visa at the time of the attacks."

The New York Times (3/21, Lewis, 1.19M) notes, under the headline "F.B.I. Discounted Suspicions About Moussaoui, Agent Says," Samit "said that two senior agents declined to provide help in getting a search warrant, either through" the FISA court "or through a normal application to any federal court for a criminal investigation," and his testimony "appeared to provide a lift for the defense."

Under the headline "FBI Was Warned About Moussaoui," The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) adds that Samit "warned his supervisors more than 70 times that Moussaoui was a terrorist and spelled out his suspicions that the al-Qaeda operative was plotting to hijack an airplane." His "testimony added striking detail to the voluminous public record on the FBI's bungling of the Moussaoui case. It also could help Moussaoui's defense."

USA Today (3/21, 3A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Samit's FBI superiors at the time did not believe he had enough evidence to support a warrant for either a criminal or intelligence investigation," the Patriot Act "has made it easier for federal authorities to obtain such warrants in terrorism investigations."

DOJ_NMG_0019551

The AP (3/21) reports, "The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August 2001 testified Monday that he spent almost four weeks trying to warn U.S. officials about the radical Islamic student pilot but that 'criminal negligence' by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks." The AP continues, "FBI Agent Harry Samit of Minneapolis originally testified as a government witness on March 9, but his daylong cross examination by defense attorney Edward MacMahon was the strongest moment yet for the court-appointed lawyers defending Mr. Moussaoui. The Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person charged in this country in connection with al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon." The AP adds, "Mr. MacMahon displayed a communication addressed to Agent Samit and FBI headquarters Agent Mike Maltbie from a bureau agent in Paris relaying word from French intelligence that Mr. Moussaoui, 37, was 'very dangerous,' had been indoctrinated in radical Islamic fundamentalism at London's Finsbury Park mosque, was 'completely devoted' to a variety of radical fundamentalism that Osama bin Laden espoused, and had been to Afghanistan. … The communication arrived Aug. 30, 2001. The Sept. 11 commission reported that British intelligence told U.S. officials on Sept. 13, 2001, that Mr. Moussaoui had attended an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan. 'Had this information been available in late August 2001, the Moussaoui case would almost certainly have received intense, high-level attention,' the commission concluded. … But Agent Samit told Mr. MacMahon he couldn't persuade FBI headquarters or the Justice Department to take his fears seriously. No one from Washington called Agent Samit to say this intelligence altered the picture the agent had been painting since Aug. 18 in a running battle with Agent Maltbie and Agent Maltbie's boss, David Frasca, chief of the radical fundamentalist unit at headquarters. … They fought over Agent Samit's desire for a warrant to search Mr. Moussaoui's computer and belongings."

The Long Island Newsday (3/21, Riley) reports, "Prosecutors are trying to show that Moussaoui should get the death penalty because his lies prevented agents from thwarting the Sept. 11 attacks, while Moussaoui says he knew no details of the plot. Defense lawyer Edward MacMahon spent his five-hour cross-examination trying to show that the FBI's failure to act on Samit's instincts was to blame. … 'Your investigation here was to uncover the facts that Moussaoui was in fact a terrorist ... and you uncovered those facts didn't you?' MacMahon asked. 'I uncovered enough facts to generate suspicion in my mind that he was a terrorist," Samit said, "But that's a far distance from being able to prove it.'"

Martin's Actions Cast Doubt On Death Penalty Push. The Legal Times (3/21, Kelley, Mclure) reports, "Almost from the beginning, the goal was clear: Zacarias Moussaoui must die. … This was the government's first, and likely only, chance to prosecute a suspect in the Sept. 11 plot in a U.S. court. And from the start, doing so would present a monumental challenge to federal prosecutors. With the world watching, the pressure would be enormous." The Times continues, "Pursuing a death sentence meant raising the stakes in what already was considered the highest-profile criminal case ever in the United States. For the team of three federal prosecutors it meant facing an unprecedented task: convincing a jury that Moussaoui should be executed even though -- by their own admission -- he wasn't directly involved in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. … The government's decision to seek death was scrutinized from the outset and continued to be so even after Moussaoui pleaded guilty, in April 2005, to participating in a conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism in the United States. But last week it became clear just how precarious the argument for death was. The government's case was in jeopardy of crumbling midway through the penalty phase of the trial after Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla Martin allegedly tampered with government witnesses."

9th Circuit Critical Of DOJ Over Sri Lankan Man's Detention. The California Recorder (3/21, Scheck) reports, "Ahilan Nadarajah was detained as a terrorism suspect for nearly five years before he got to argue his case before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It only took a three-judge panel 10 days to order his release." The Recorder continues, "In a unanimous decision Friday, Judge Sidney Thomas wrote that federal immigration officials can't detain an asylum seeker indefinitely after an immigration court orders his release. Thomas wrote that the government's interpretation that a Supreme Court opinion allowed indefinite detention was 'patently absurd.' … 'The general immigration detention statutes do not authorize the Attorney General to incarcerate detainees for an indefinite period,' Thomas wrote. He was joined by Judge Richard Tallman and Senior U.S. District Judge James Fitzgerald of the District of Alaska, who sat by designation." The Recorder adds, "Nadarajah's lawyer, Ahilan Arulanantham of the ACLU Foundation of Southern California, argued the case to the panel on March 7, and asked the judges to rule quickly, given the long detention at issue. … Immigration and appeals courts found that Nadarajah had been beaten, burned and hung upside down, his head submersed in gasoline, by Sri Lankan authorities. … But the Justice Department insisted that Nadarajah was a member of the rebel Tamil Tigers, which it classifies as a terrorist group. And after missing two hearings, a Department of Homeland Security agent appeared in an immigration court to provide evidence of Nadarajah's terrorist links."

Judge Approves Media Release Of Edited Hayat Interview Video. The AP (3/21, Thompson) reports U.S. District Court Judge Garland Burrell Jr., presiding over the Umer and Hamid Hayat trial, "approved releasing an edited version of their videotaped FBI interviews on Monday," over the objections of defense attorneys. "Edited out of the videotapes to be released will be mentions of two Islamic religious leaders who were deported to Pakistan last year and segments in which Umer Hayat speculates that four Lodi men could be preparing to commit terrorist acts." The AP notes, "Oakland television station KTVU sought release of the tapes" and was joined by "NBC and ABC affiliates in Los Angeles, San Diego and Sacramento." KXTV-TV Sacramento (3/20, Bishop) also reports on the ruling and notes that the station, which was part of the lawsuit, will air the videos and post them to its Web site.

Convenience Store Clerk Turned FBI Informant Is Central US Witness. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Tempest, 958K) runs a profile of FBI informant Naseem Khan. "The picture of Khan that emerges from interviews with friends, co-workers and landlords in Bend…is of a quiet, hard-working, mostly solitary young man with an interest in law enforcement. … Last week, he shocked the Sacramento courtroom when he said he saw" Ayman al Zawahri at the Lodi mosque, and "he is expected to take the stand today for the first time since he made that claim, which terrorism experts discount as highly improbable." The Times goes on to detail Khan's recruitment and surveillance in Lodi, noting he "was first approached by FBI agents…after someone reported him as a possible terrorism suspect," but "quickly cleared of those suspicions, the $7-an-hour manager of the K Market convenience store was hired by the FBI…and was paid more than $200,000 in salary and expenses for his three-year undercover assignment."

Hayat Defense Is First Major Case For Young Afghan Immigrant. In a flattering profile of Hayat defense lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi – who is only 18 months out of law school – the AP (3/21, Thompson) reports, "Despite her inexperience, Mojaddidi has stood her ground. She sparred with the prosecution's expert on Islamic religion and law" and "challenged an FBI linguist about the significance of news articles praising" bin Laden and the Taliban. "The case represents a leap for Mojaddidi, who previously was using her command of Urdu, Farsi and Pashto to help immigrants with family law cases." In an AP interview, "she described her family's flight from Afghanistan when was 5, what she described as a middle-of-the-night escape into Pakistan in 1979 after the Russian invasion."

Bush May Have Mentioned NSA Surveillance Program To Musharraf In 2001. The Washington Post (3/21, A15, Eggen, 744K) reports "a brief passage" in Bob Woodward's book "Bush at War" raises the possibility that President Bush may have mentioned "the government's secret warrantless surveillance program to the president of Pakistan more than four years ago." Woodward "recounts a meeting between Bush and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the Waldorf Towers in New York in early November 2001." On page 303, Woodward wrote, "He had become fascinated with the ability of the National Security Agency to intercept phone calls and other communications worldwide. If they got the key phone calls, future terrorism might be stopped, certainly curtailed. Bush summarized his strategy: 'Listen to every phone call and close them down and protect the innocents.'"

Al Qaeda Operative Disrupts Trial In Turkey. The Washington Post (3/21, A11, Vick, 744K) reports Louai al-Sakka, the "al-Qaeda operative accused of organizing the 2003 Istanbul bombings and a botched attempt to sink an Israeli cruise ship appeared in a Turkish courtroom on Monday -- and did his best to take it over." Al-Sakka, "who by his own account worked beside insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, first told the court he was someone else, then was hustled out of the morning session after refusing to stand to address the judge." Sakka shouted, "I performed jihad and killed Americans! Why should I stand up in front of you? Should I stand in front of these liars?" The Post adds

DOJ_NMG_0019553

Sakka, "a Syrian described by Turkish officials as a senior figure in al-Qaeda, is accused of providing other operatives with about $170,000 from the group to carry out four truck bombings that killed 57 people over two days in November 2003."

PATRIOT ACT:

Banks Filing More Suspicious Activity Reports Under Patriot Act. The Washington Times (3/21, Haberkorn, 90K) reports that after the Holy Name Monastery of the Benedictine Sisters' bank account was frozen last year "because one of the account's signatories -- an 80-year-old nun -- didn't have an identification card on file," Sister Jean Abbott said that the bank blamed the USA Patriot Act "for the account freeze." The Times continues, "The number of suspicious transactions that financial institutions are reporting to the government has nearly tripled since the Patriot Act was passed in 2001." However, "The average consumer 'should not be concerned as long as the transactions they're doing are legit,' said Anne Marie Kelly, a spokeswoman for the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, the Treasury Department bureau responsible for administering the Bank Secrecy Act."

Librarians, Civil Libertarians Remain Skeptical Of Patriot Act Safeguards. The New York Times (3/21, Cowan, 1.19M) reports, "Lawmakers may be giving themselves credit for having improved safeguards on civil liberties when they reauthorized" the Patriot Act, but "many librarians and civil liberties lawyers say the revisions did nothing to enable the guest of honor" at a January American Library Association meeting in Texas "to take the stage and discuss the Patriot Act without risk of prosecution. Known as John Doe in court filings, the guest of honor was the Connecticut librarian who was visited by the Federal Bureau of Investigation last year and presented with…a national security letter demanding patron records." The Times notes, "The section of the new law that addresses 'privacy protection for library patrons' states that library records are beyond the reach of national security letters so long as the library is not operating as an 'electronic communication service.' … But much of what a modern library does courses through its computers."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says DHS Planning Chemical Plant Security Crackdown. The AP (3/21, Jordan) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Monday his department will crack down on chemical manufacturers and storage facilities that he described as 'free riders' — those that haven't beefed up their security measures." Meanwhile, "Legislation is pending in the Senate to authorize Homeland Security to shut down facilities that do not comply with minimum safety standards. … Chertoff has not endorsed the plan, but he is expected on Tuesday to outline elements that he said would need to be in acceptable legislation."

The Wall Street Journal (3/21, A4, Block, 2.11M) reports that in a preview of today's remarks to the American Chemical Council, Chertoff told an audience at the Heritage Foundation that "chemical plants and, in fact, transportation of chemicals, remains a vulnerability. Progress on this has stalled for too long. We do need legislation and congressional action and leadership on this point,'" said Chertoff. "Chris VandenHeuvel, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, said he expects Mr. Chertoff will say legislation must give his department authority to work with the industry to set minimum security standards."

Chertoff Called "A Model Technocrat," But Not "Commanding Leader." Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (3/21, A2, 744K) writes that a year after taking the job, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "is getting much of the blame for the woeful Hurricane Katrina response, insufficient supervision of the Dubai port deal and domestic defenses that remain, by most accounts, unacceptably weak." Milbank writes that Chertoff is not "incompetent. … His problem, if anything, is he's a model technocrat in a position that sometimes demands a commanding leader." In a speech at the Heritage Foundation yesterday, rather than "telling people that he's protecting them," Chertoff said "that his department has 'done a lot to elevate the general baseline of security in this country.'" Milbank adds, "These kinds of statements…make the wiry Chertoff a big target for those building a case that the administration is lax about homeland security."

DHS May Outsource Some Port Security Processes. The Washington Times (3/21, Hudson, 90K)

DOJ_NMG_0019554

reports, "Homeland Security officials are looking to have private companies validate the security procedures under which cargo travels from foreign ports into US terminals." The Customs-Trade Partnership Against Terrorism "is now in the hands of 80 Homeland Security inspectors who have to plow through more than 10,000 applicants." DHS "is looking to outsource to private companies some of its duties, in particular the validation process, which has dragged for years and involves on-site inspections of ships and cargo abroad." Meanwhile, "Peter Tirschwell, publisher of the Journal of Commerce, called the Homeland Security idea an 'outsourcing of security.'"

Dubai Firm Delays Purchase Of US Military Manufacturer. The New York Times/Bloomberg News (3/21) the Dubai government "delayed its $1.2 billion purchase of a military equipment maker yesterday, the second time in a month that a takeover by the Middle East emirate has been jeopardized by American security concerns." Dubai International Capital "said that it would delay its acquisition of the Doncasters Group, a British company that has nine plants in the United States, by as much as two months from March 31 while government agencies review the purchase."

DPW "Debacle" Could Trigger Decline In Value Of Dollar. In a Washington Times op-ed (3/21), Michael R. Czinkota of Georgetown University says that while the Dubai Ports World deal debacle "appears to be over," there "may be significant long-term consequences for currency values and trade practices." What "appears to be not yet widely understood are the potential effects that these and similar policy decisions (such as the Unocal walk-away by China) can have on the value of global currencies and on trade flows. Congress' law of unintended consequences may strike again: The short-term direct effects of this action are likely to be far outweighed by the long-run indirect effects." It "does appear that in addition to growing international competitiveness of U.S. firms, changes in the value of the U.S. dollar are needed to reverse the astounding trade imbalances. The Dubai withdrawal may well be the watershed that triggers shifts in exchange rates now. The congressional debate, the national posture and the global repercussions may well form the basis of new Plaza Agreement-type conditions, which will gradually drive down the value of the dollar for the long term."

FEMA Seeking Return Of Disaster Relief Funds From 51,000 Families. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 5, 2:15, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Nearly $7 billion in direct relief was handed out last year to 1.7 million households, and now FEMA says some who got that aid didn't deserve it and they're trying to get that money back." NBC (Ellis) added FEMA says, "based on an audit…2% to 3% of households that got relief money probably didn't deserve it. And now FEMA is sending out this letter to about 51,000 families asking for the money back, up to $100 million." Marty Bahamonde, FEMA: "If we err on the side of helping people and have to ask for it back later, that's what we're doing now." Ellis: "Authorities say this kind of thing has happened before but never in this magnitude." The Government Accountability Office "alleges fraud for one thing. Thousands submitted duplicate or false Social Security numbers and in other cases, relief money was paid twice to the same family. But the GAO says FEMA is also to blame" because it did not have fraud prevention controls in place.

House Panel To Investigate Post-Katrina Contracts. The Government Accountability Office said last week that millions of dollars had been wasted in post-Katrina hurricane contracts and the Washington Post reported yesterday that contractors profits are resulting in overpriced cleanup work. In an article appearing on no less than 59 news websites, the AP (3/21) reports that the House Government Reform Committee "said Monday it would review several post-Katrina hurricane contracts for waste and abuse, citing recent concerns about limited oversight and the haste in which they were awarded." The committee "will hold at least one hearing in April, said Robert White, a spokesman for chairman Tom Davis, R-Va. Witnesses and the specific contracts that will be scrutinized have yet to be determined, he said."

Nagin Endorses Plan To Allow Rebuilding In All Neighborhoods. The Washington Post/AP (3/21, A3) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin endorsed a rebuilding plan Monday "that would allow all residents to rebuild their homes in neighborhoods shattered by Hurricane Katrina." Nagin, who is running for reelection on April 22, "distanced himself" from a plan recommended by his advisory commission in January "that some flooded neighborhoods be replaced with parks and that the city take a go-slow attitude in rebuilding low-lying areas." However, Nagin "warned that homeowners in flood-prone areas would do so at their own risk."

DOJ_NMG_0019555

Officials Say More Bodies May Be Found In New Orleans. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Simmons, 958K) reports that in New Orleans, "Eight bodies have been found since March 1, and with about 1,400 people still unaccounted for, Louisiana state officials said they could not rule out the possibility of finding others. Until recently, recovery teams were unable to retrieve bodies from the neighborhoods that were rendered uninhabitable and designated off-limits to residents." The Times notes that the task of "alerting families when a deceased relative had been identified, and then alerting families" moved from the federal government's Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team to the Orleans Parish coroner's office in early March.

New Orleans Says It Will Need Federal Help Evacuating Residents. USA Today (3/21, Konigsmark, Hall, 2.31M) reports that New Orleans "doesn't have an emergency shelter," and with the approach of hurricane season, "local officials are asking for federal help to get people out of harm's way if another disaster strikes." Terry Ebbert, the city's director of homeland security "said he fears that without federal help, citizens could be stranded in the city with nowhere to go." He "sent written requests for help recently to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, both of whom he criticized for not reacting quickly enough. 'The silence has been deafening,' Ebbert said." However, DHS Undersecretary for Preparedness George Foresman "and FEMA will be in the region this week to get a 'clear, blunt assessment' of what's needed, Chertoff said Monday."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Sounds Upbeat Message On US Progress In Iraq. On the third anniversary of the start of the Iraq war, President Bush delivered a speech at the Cleveland City Club to highlight successes in the effort to combat the insurgency in Iraq. Bush cited the example of Tal Afar, an insurgent stronghold that was liberated by a joint US-Iraqi force. Many reports this morning note the President's comments about the "horrific violence" in Iraq, and its effect on Americans' morale. The Akron Beacon Journal (3/21, Chancellor, Abraham, 148K) reports Bush "said more days of sacrifice and fighting are ahead, but he predicted that freedom would prevail, in the same way that Germany and Japan were turned into democracies after World War II." He also "said a democratic Iraq would one day serve as an inspiration for freedom throughout the Middle East." Much of the media coverage of the speech is largely negative, with most stories citing sagging poll numbers for the Iraq mission. Many also report Bush was challenged by skeptical audience members on Iraq as well as other issues, such as the National Security Agency's domestic intelligence program.

Typical of the tenor of the reporting is the AP (3/21, Raum), which says that "beginning the fourth year of an unpopular war…Bush defended his Iraq record…against skeptical questioning." He "said he could 'understand people being disheartened'" but "appealed to Americans to look beyond the bloodshed and see signs of progress." Bush "fielded questions for nearly an hour at the City Club, a forum known for its tough interrogations of world leaders. Not only was he grilled on Iraq, but he also was asked to justify his warrantless wiretapping program, US relations with Pakistan and his domestic priorities."

Under the headline "Old Forecasts Come Back To Haunt Bush," the Washington Post (3/21, A14, VandeHei, 744K) runs a front-page story reporting, "Three years of upbeat White House assessments about Iraq that turned out to be premature, incomplete or plain wrong are complicating…Bush's efforts to restore public faith in the military operation and his presidency, according to pollsters and Republican lawmakers and strategists." The Post adds, "The last two weeks have provided a snapshot of White House optimism that skeptics contend is at odds with the facts on the ground in Iraq. … Pollsters and some congressional Republicans said the administration's sunny-side-up appraisals, instead of lifting the public mood, may now complicate the task of sustaining support for a long-term military commitment in Iraq. The loss of trust, they said, is affecting Bush's presidency more broadly, as polls show his public support at a nadir."

The story was reported on each of the networks. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, lead story, 1:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported President Bush "used today's anniversary to send an optimistic message on Iraq. Public support for the war has fallen sharply in the last three years," and Bush said, "this is partly because reporters have missed stories of progress, while covering conflict." President Bush: "Others look at the violence they see each night on their television screens. And they wonder how I can remain so optimistic, about the prospects of success in Iraq. They wonder what I see that they don't."

DOJ_NMG_0019556

The CBS Evening News (3/20, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported that in a "new tactic designed to win over skeptics…Bush acknowledged what he called horrific violence in Iraq." President Bush: "And in the face of continued reports about killings and reprisals, I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken." Axelrod Bush then "pointed to Tal Afar as a model for how he intends to secure the rest of Iraq, describing the city of 200,000 as an example of a strategy called 'clear, hold and build.' Clear out the terrorists, hold the city with Iraqi forces, and build its economy and government."

NBC Nightly News (3/20, lead story, 4:45, O'Donnell, 9.87M) said Bush "provided unusual detail, a 20-minute explanation of how one northern Iraqi town struggled with US help to break from terrorist control." President Bush: "It came only after much trial and error. It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq." Questions "were not screened in advance. Two of 11 clearly supported the President." But others "sharply challenged Mr. Bush on issues including the mounting cost of the conflict, the President's warrantless spy program, and the rationale for war."

Knight Ridder (3/21, Hutcheson), meanwhile, says Bush "got an earful from skeptics who questioned his motives and his credibility." Bush "seemed taken aback when the first questioner asked him whether he views the conflict in biblical terms, as an apocalyptic struggle for the Middle East. Some of the president's critics have speculated that his Christianity and a wish to protect the Holy Land are behind his desire to transform the Middle East. 'The answer is, I haven't really thought of it that way,' he replied. 'First I've heard of that, by the way. I guess I'm more of a practical fella.'"

USA Today (3/21, Jackson, 2.31M) says Bush "has opened himself up to audience questions more frequently in recent months, starting with a December speech on Iraq before the Philadelphia World Affairs Council. Last week, he took critical questions on his prescription-drug program at a senior citizens center in Maryland." Bush "clearly enjoys the repartee." Adam Levine, a former Bush assistant press secretary, "says the president is 'at his best' in a give-and-take. More important, this lets him bypass the media."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Blitzer) reported Bush "tried again to sound upbeat about the situation in Iraq, despite dwindling public support for the mission and for him." CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Quijano) later said the President's appearance "was really part of the renewed push by the administration to shape public opinion on Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Gerstenzang, 958K) says Bush's recent speeches on Iraq "reflect a two-fold campaign: To lower expectations and at the same time hold out prospects for a successful outcome. Unless pressed by a questioner, the president makes no mention any more of one of the original reasons for the invasion: the suspicion that Hussein was developing unconventional weapons. No evidence of such a program has been found." Rather, "Bush focuses on the effort to establish democracy in a part of the world where it is rare, and on placing Iraq at the center of his effort to secure the United States from terrorist attacks." He has also "avoided the optimistic language that Vice President Dick Cheney has used. … White House aides have concluded that Bush would lose credibility with such a rosy scenario." In a similar story, the Chicago Tribune (3/21, Silva, 643K) says the President "is taking a new tack of balancing a sober and chilling recognition of persistent bloodshed with an unrelenting optimism for eventual victory."

The New York Times (3/21, O'Neil, 1.19M) headlines its story "Bush Bluntly Defends Iraq Strategy, But Admits Missteps," and calls Bush's remarks "characteristically optimistic and unusually candid about shortcomings in the war's earlier phases and the suffering it caused for ordinary Iraqis." The speech "followed a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved that was displayed on Sunday by Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who sounded much as they had on the first anniversary of the invasion."

Bloomberg (3/21, Keil) also reports Bush "said today that he remains optimistic about the outcome of the war that defines his presidency." The Financial Times (3/21, Daniel) notes that last week "a poll showed that only one third of Americans thought Mr Bush had a clear plan for Iraq. However, only 24 per cent thought the Democrats in Congress had a clear plan."

Offering a more positive view of Bush's speech, Fox News' Special Report (3/20, Cameron) reported, "The President argued insurgents know they can't win militarily so they are trying to provoke civil war to halt progress. He pressed Iraqis to act quickly in forming a consensus government." Fox added, "The President acknowledged in the short return run, there will be more challenge in Iraq, but he remains undaunted by public doubts." The Washington

DOJ_NMG_0019557

Times (3/21, Dinan, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Pledges Not To Give Into Insurgents."

Tal Afar Situation Said To Be "More Complex" Than Bush Acknowledged. The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Baker, 744K) reports that as Bush "tells the tale, the battle for Tall Afar offers a case study in how US and Iraqi forces working together can root out insurgents and restore stability. … Reports from the streets of Tall Afar, half a world away, offer a more complex story. US forces last fall did drive out radicals who had brutalized the mid-size city near the Syrian border. But lately, residents say, the city has taken another dark turn." The Post adds, "The twists of Tall Afar underline the difficulties Bush has had in reassuring a doubtful American public that progress is being made in Iraq. The president and his aides say that the positive developments in Iraq get overwhelmed by the grim pictures of mayhem and massacre that dominate the evening news. If Americans knew about the success stories, the White House maintains, they would understand Bush's confidence of victory." Yet "even the success stories seem to come with asterisks."

Number Of Iraqi Security Forces Increasing, But Equipment Still Lacking. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 2, 4:20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The Pentagon has spent $10 billion already to strain and equip 128,000 Iraqi police and 113,000 Iraqi soldiers. But how many of them are truly ready to fight?" ABC (Raddatz) added that in Sadr City, the "biggest change here on this anniversary of the invasion, is that the American battalions that were here are now gone. About 1,500 soldiers replaced by Iraqi security forces. Today, only 37 American soldiers remain here. These Iraqis are now considered to be what the Pentagon calls 'Level 2' forces, meaning they are capable of taking the lead in a fight, as long as there are some US forces present." There are "currently 60 of these so-called Level 2 battalions across Iraq, which means more than 36,000 Iraqi security forces judged capable of leading a fight." But the Iraqi commander in Sadr City "tells us if things heat up here, his troops will be in trouble. 'The militia has the capability to defeat my soldiers,' he said. 'They have rocket-propelled grenades, mines and mortars. My soldiers have only AK-47 rifles.'"

Khalilzad Says Iraq "Bleeding," But Not In Civil War. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 5, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M) interviewed US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who said the US is "making progress. But it's a difficult situation that we are in." Asked why the Iraqi politicians are taking so long to form a government, Amb. Khalilzad said, "They are trying to form a government of national unity. Agree on a program. Agree on processes for decision making. There is not a lot of tradition for compromising. So it is not easy for them, given the background from which they come." Khalilzad said it is "a particular period of vulnerability" in Iraq because of the insurgent violence, adding, "I am optimistic they will make the right decision and form a government of national unity in the coming weeks." Khalilzad added that while there are "sectarian tensions" and "sectarian killings. Civil war, in my judgment, is not here yet. But the potential for increased sectarian violence is there. And terrorists are seeking to provoke it. The country is bleeding."

Biden Urges Bush To Bolster International Pressure On Iraqi Leaders. CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Blitzer) reported, "A leading Democratic critical today is urging the president to take a political risk to try to improve the situation in Iraq. On this, the third anniversary of the US-led invasion, Senator Joe Biden is blaming what he calls the administration's, and I'm quoting now, 'dangerous incompetence for leaving Iraq or the brink of a full- blown civil war.'" Biden "says the president should personally fly to other countries to try to bolster international pressure on Iraqi leaders to form that kind of national unity government.'

Mehlman Says Iraq War Was "Worth It." RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (3/20) about the recent CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll, which found that 37% say the situation in Iraq worth going to war over. Mehlman said, "It certainly was worth it. The fact is I believe, and I think most Americans who think about it, will recognize that we're safer."

Analysts Say Iraq War Has Put Middle East On Edge. Analysts say that three years into the Iraq war, the Middle East is experiencing heightened sectarian tensions between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, growing Islamic militance, high levels of anti-Western hostility and authoritarian regimes still clinging to power. The Christian Science Monitor (3/21, Blanford, 61K) reports, "The Iraq invasion jolted complacent regimes, especially as it coincided with nascent attempts by Arab democracy campaigners to push for reform. But, says Jordanian political commentator Rami Khouri, 'the way the American adventure in Iraq has gone has emboldened many Arab [regimes] to defy the US because they feel that it has gone badly in Iraq and the Americans are not likely to do this again.'" The Monitor adds, "The turmoil in Iraq is not solely to blame for the ills in the region, but it represents a powerful dynamic that has rippled across the Middle East feeding into other conflicts."

DOJ_NMG_0019558

Hitchens Says Iraq Needs Federal Democracy, Power Sharing. Christopher Hitchens writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/21, 2.11M)that "if our apparent domestic demoralization continues, the options could come down to two. First, we might use our latent power and threaten to withdraw, implicitly asking Iraqis and their neighbors if that is really what they want, and concentrating their minds. This still runs the risk of allowing the diseased spokesmen of al Qaeda to claim victory. Second, we can demand to know, of the wider international community, if it could afford to view an imploded Iraq as a spectator. Three years ago, the smug answer to that, from most U.N. members, was 'yes.'" According to Hitchens, "Absent federal democracy and power-sharing, there will not just be anarchy and fragmentation and thus a moral victory for jihadism, but opportunist interventions from Iran, Saudi Arabia and Turkey."

Tierney Says Pentagon Did Not Prepare For Post-War Looting, Disorder. John Tierney writes in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) that the looting and disorder in Iraq were predictable. Some Pentagon officials 'did warn of civil disorder and crime, but they didn't do anything about it. They passed the buck to Gen. Tommy Franks, even though he didn't have enough troops or money for the job and showed little interest in postwar planning. … Looting, crime, mayhem — that was always someone else's department." Hitchens adds, "That summer, as Iraqis watched looters and criminals taking control, they kept asking why nobody put a stop to the crime. The answer from officials in Washington, it turns out, is the same one that would have been given by the old Iraqi police: not my job."

Gunmen Attack Iraqi Police Station Killing 15 Police Officers. Gunmen have ambushed a police station in the Iraqi city of Muqdadiyah today, killing 15 police officers and a guard at a nearby courthouse. The AP (3/21) reports, "The suspected insurgents struck at dawn, burning the police station and detonating a string of roadside bombs as they raced from the scene, a police spokesman in the region said."

Over 20 Dead In Iraq Violence Yesterday. The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 1, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The war in Iraq entered its fourth year today. And in Baghdad it was a day like so many others: 20 people were killed or found dead in and around the city, victims of one kind of violence or another. So far, 2,311 Americans and more than 30,000 Iraqis have died." NBC Nightly News (3/20, lead story, 4:45, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "For the insurgents in Iraq tonight, three years is just another opportunity for violence." The AP (3/21, Hurst) also reports on the violence.

Iraqis Said To Have Contradictory Emotions On Third Anniversary Of US Invasion. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 4, 3:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the Iraqi nation "of 26 million people is deeply divided along political and religious lines. It is also split on what life is like three years after Saddam and how to make it better." ABC (Harris) added, "After invasion and elections, new freedoms and new terrors, Iraqis today show a range of complex, competing emotions." They "express the same, seemingly contradictory emotions so common in Iraq today. They sometimes miss the days of Saddam, but don't want him back. They want the Americans to get out, but just not yet."

NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 3, 4:15, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "Few Iraqis imagined that three years after the war began, Iraq would still look like this. Since the US invasion, there has not been a single day without mortar fire, car bombings, or IED attacks."

The AP (3/21, Salaheddin) reports that some Iraqis are expressing anger and dismay about their lives as the war enters its fourth year. Salah Hashim, a 49-year-old businessman, "said he yearned for the return of Saddam Hussein, the country's ousted dictator, given the violence that now envelops the country." Ahmen Najeeb, a 33-year-old supermarket owner, "said he originally 'waved his hands' at American forces as they entered the country in March 2003, but that his outlook has since changed. 'Day after day the Americans proved that they are here to steal our oil and protect their homes by keeping the their war against terror in another country,' he said. One English teacher, though, said that Iraqis had tolerated Saddam's tyranny for so long that it was worth fighting through the violence to rebuild the country."

The Washington Post (3/21, A13, Anderson, Fekeiki, 744K) notes a "stark difference" between Iraqis' "pessimistic outlook and some U.S. officials' upbeat assessment of the situation. With insurgent violence grinding on, essential services sagging below pre-invasion levels and the prospect of civil war looming, many Iraqis question whether Hussein's ouster was worth the cost."

DOJ_NMG_0019559

More Iraqis Buying Terrorism Insurance. The New York Times (3/21, Worth, 1.19M) reports "a small but growing number of Iraqis" are buying "terrorism insurance" policies that look "like an ordinary life insurance policy, but with a one-page rider adding coverage for 'the following dangers: 1) explosions caused by weapons of war and car bombs; 2) assassinations; 3) terrorist attacks.'" That guarantee "appears to be the first off-the-shelf terrorism policy in the world, insurance experts say. In most countries, of course, there is no need for it: death by terrorism is rare enough that it is usually covered by ordinary accident insurance. In Iraq it is not, partly because the state used to compensate the families of war victims directly. So the Iraq Insurance Company began stepping into the gap about a year ago." The Iraq Insurance Company, "a state-owned group, has sold about 200 individual terrorism policies in the last year, and is now negotiating with several government ministries and private companies for group policies that would cover thousands of employees."

Lawmakers Create Independent Panel To Study Iraq Alternatives. Lawmakers are signaling that this year could be a decisive one in the Iraq war and, according to the Christian Science Monitor (3/21, Chaddock, 61K), "many of the war's vigorous defenders are looking for guidance outside the Bush administration on how to move ahead." The Monitor adds the "quiet launch of an independent, bipartisan panel to bring 'fresh eyes' to the Iraq conflict. Last week, the House included $1.3 million in a defense funding bill for the panel, which will work out of the congressionally chartered US Institute for Peace here." The Monitor adds, "The move to develop alternatives to Bush administrative briefings signals a growing distrust on Capitol Hill for the 'closed circuit between people sitting inside the Green Zone and the 'good news' being sent back to Washington,' says Mr. [Edward] Luttwak," a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

US Military Investigating Two Incidents Involving Civilian Deaths. The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 2, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "US officials confirmed there are investigations under way into two separate incidents in which US forces are being blamed for the deaths of Iraqi women and children." CBS (Logan) added, "A spokesman for the US military in Baghdad says the top general in Iraq, General George Casey, has ordered an investigation into the discrepancy over how many Iraqi civilians were killed in a US raid here last Wednesday." Iraqi police "and human rights groups say there were 11 dead, including at least 5 children and 4 women. The US military confirms 4 killed, including 2 women and a child."

NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 2, 1:20, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported that in the other incident, "a team of Naval investigators is on its way to Iraq tonight where 12 US Marines are accused of killing 15 Iraqi civilians, including 7 women and 3 children, in a vengeful rage after one of their fellow Marines was killed by a roadside bomb. The incident occurred last November in Haditha." The "formal criminal investigation was opened after some of the Marines had changed their original stories

Saddam's Foreign Minister Was CIA Informant. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 4, 4:00, Myers, 9.87M) reported Naji Sabri was "Saddam Hussein's foreign minister before the war, part of his inner circle." But "after Saddam fell, Naji Sabri was never arrested, nor included in the infamous deck of cards of wanted Iraqis. Why? Perhaps because sources tell NBC News that at the same time he denounced the US, Iraq's foreign minister was a secret, paid source of the CIA. Current and former US intelligence officials say Sabri provided the US information on Saddam's WMD that turned out to be more accurate than CIA estimates. So why didn't anyone listen?" Intelligence sources "say the deal was brokered by the French in September 2002, and that Sabri was paid more than $100,000 through an intermediary. Sabri may have thought he was working with the French, but some US intelligence officials believe he knew it was the CIA. The CIA questioned Sabri through a go-between about Saddam's WMD capabilities." Intelligence sources "say Sabri indicated Saddam had no significant weapons program. Sabri was right." Intelligence sources "say the CIA's brief relationship with Sabri ended when the CIA, hoping for a public relations coup, pressured him to defect to the United States. He refused."

Father Went To Iraq Seeking Revenge For Son's Death. The AP (3/21, Hanley) reports on Army Cpl. Joe Johnson, who joined the Army after his son Justin was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq. The death of Justin, "stunned his parents with a shock that lingers still." Joe, who was training with the National Guard at the time of Justin's death tried to explain his reasons for going to Iraq, saying, "It's a lot of things combined," adding, "One, a sense of duty. I was pissed off at the terrorists for 9/11 and other atrocities. Second, I'd only trained. I wanted combat." Johnson also said, "There's some revenge involved. I'd be lying if I said there wasn't."

DOJ_NMG_0019560

At Least 120,000 Children In Military Families Have Parent In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 6, 3:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The American mission in Iraq has had a tremendous impact on many communities in this country. At least 120,000 children have a father or mother in Iraq right now. For them, the war is not a distant abstraction, but something they're living with every day."

US Closely Watching Trial Of Afghan Christian. The US says it is closely watching the trial of an Afghan man who face a possible death sentence for converting to Christianity. AFP (3/21) reports, "State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged the Afghan authorities to deal with the proceedings against Abdul Rahman transparently and according to the rule of law. … 'Our view certainly...is that tolerance, freedom of worship, is an important element of any democracy,' he said. 'These are issues, as Afghan democracy matures, that they are going to have to deal with increasingly.'"

Van Hollen Argues Against Troop Withdrawal From Afghanistan. Rep. Chris Van Hollen writes in the Washington Post (3/21, A17, 744K) that the US has not accomplished "our mission of destroying bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Fulfilling that mission and preventing a resurgence of the Taliban will depend on the actions we take in Afghanistan. This is no time to reduce our commitment there. … The anticipated withdrawal of US forces has reportedly already caused some local leaders to hedge their bets with respect to the Taliban." Van Hollen adds, "With the Bush administration and political Washington focused on Iraq, many Afghan leaders worry that the reduction of U.S. forces is a sign that we will again lose sight of Afghanistan. We do so at our peril. Let us not forget that the Sept. 11 plot was launched from Afghanistan, and not from Iraq."

Army Conducting Criminal Investigation Of Tillman Shooting. The New York Times (3/21, Davey, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports that the family of former NFL player and Army Ranger Pat Tillman, who was killed in a friendly fire incident in Afghanistan, "may be close to getting some of the answers they so desperately seek. After repeated complaints from the Tillmans and members of Congress contacted by them, the Army is immersed in a highly unusual criminal investigation of the killing, and the Defense Department's inspector general, which called for the criminal investigation this month, is looking separately into the Army's conduct in its aftermath." The inquiry "is for the first time examining whether the soldiers broke military law when they failed to identify their targets before firing on Corporal Tillman's position."

DOJ:

Gonzales' Taco Bell Visit Noted. The Reliable Source column in the Washington Post (3/21, C03, Argetsinger, Roberts) reports on "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales picking up lunch Sunday at the Leesburg Pike Taco Bell in Falls Church, wearing a dark suit and accompanied by a Secret Service detail. A Justice source says the trip was 'at the request of his 10- and 13-year-olds.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

2nd Circuit Panel Tosses Quattrone Conviction. The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Masters) reports, "A federal appeals court tossed out the obstruction-of-justice conviction of once high-flying investment banker Frank P. Quattrone, in a blow to the government's effort to prosecute and deter white-collar crime." The Post continues, "The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit held unanimously that the trial judge's instructions to the jury included such a 'glaring deficiency' that Quattrone did not get a fair trial on charges that he encouraged subordinates to destroy documents sought by a federal grand jury. … The court also took the unusual step of reassigning the case to a new trial judge, writing that 'certain comments' made by U.S. District Judge Richard Owen 'could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience and annoyance.'"

The New York Times (3/21, Sorkin) reports, "The appeals panel found that the judge in the case, Richard Owen, a Nixon appointee known for being pro-prosecution, gave erroneous jury instructions on what was required for the jury to find Mr. Quattrone guilty. The panel also said that 'in the interest of justice,' the case should be reassigned to another judge on the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. … The prosecutors in the case, Steven R. Peiken and David Anders — both of whom have since left the United States attorney's office for private practice — were also singled out by the appellate panel for unfairly trying to prejudice the jury during their questioning of Mr. Quattrone. … Still, the appeals court found that there was sufficient evidence to retry Mr. Quattrone. And despite finding that Judge Owen had given flawed jury instructions, the panel said it agreed with many of his rulings, including his decision to restrict the introduction of mountains of evidence that defense lawyers contended would have led to a not guilty verdict."

DOJ_NMG_0019561

The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Smith) reports, "While prosecutors issued a short statement saying only 'we are reviewing the opinion and considering our options,' the Quattrone defense team hailed the ruling as 'a significant victory.' … Mr. Quattrone himself said in a statement, 'For over three years during this difficult ordeal, I have held my head high knowing I was innocent and never intended to obstruct justice.'"

The Financial Times (3/21, Ben White) reports, "The ruling dealt a blow to the federal government's efforts to crack down on alleged white-collar crime. It followed a similar ruling by the Supreme Court last year voiding the criminal conviction of now defunct accounting firm Arthur Andersen." The Times adds, "A retrial would mark the third time Mr Quattrone, who emerged as the top technology banker of the 1990s, has faced a federal jury. The first trial ended with no decision after a jury was unable to reach a verdict. … In the second trial, a jury convicted Mr Quattrone of two counts of obstructing justice and one count of witness tampering. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison, but remained free pending his appeal."

USA Today (3/21, Farrell) reports, "The charges against the former Credit Suisse First Boston banker and onetime Silicon Valley rainmaker grew out of a federal investigation into the allocation of red-hot technology IPOs during the dot-com bubble. In December 2000, after being informed that a grand jury was investigating the matter, Quattrone endorsed and circulated a colleague's e-mail reminding subordinates to clean up their files, including paperwork from the IPOs in question. … Prosecutors said Quattrone's sending of the e-mail amounted to obstruction. In his first trial in the fall of 2003 the jury deadlocked, partly because some jurors didn't find Quattrone credible on the stand. His spring 2004 retrial resulted in a conviction."

The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Sanchez) reports, "Prosecutors said the intent of Quattrone's e-mail was to destroy documents sought in federal probes into whether the investment bank forced customers to pay kickbacks for shares of hugely profitable IPOs in the late-1990s bull market. … Quattrone had argued that he thought the investigations centered on other units of his company. He also was unaware that a grand jury subpoena called for documents from his technology banking group, his attorneys claimed."

Bloomberg (3/21) reports, "It's now up to federal prosecutors to decide whether to re- try the former investment banker. Today's reversal may also lead the government and Quattrone to open plea negotiations. Quattrone was convicted in May 2004 after his first trial ended in a hung jury in October 2003."

The New York Law Journal (3/21, Hamblett) reports, "U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia now must decide whether to retry Quattrone. If Garcia decides to go ahead, it would be the third trial for the former head of Credit Suisse's Global Technology Group, which was accused of obstructing two investigations into the allocation of shares in red-hot initial public offerings during the height of the high-tech boom."

Ruling Shows Importance Of Jury Instructions. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Davies, Scannell) reports, "At the end of any jury trial, the judge's instructions to the jurors can be the most boring part of the proceedings. … They can also be the most important. Just ask Frank Quattrone." The Journal continues, "The court ruled that (Judge Owen's) instructions to jurors wrongly allowed them to convict him of obstruction for urging the destruction of documents without determining 'that the defendant knew the documents were subject to a subpoena [or document request].' The panel said that 'the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction of justice regardless of whether he intended such.' … The witness-tampering conviction was overturned because, after Mr. Quattrone's conviction, the Supreme Court -- in a similar case against the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen -- ruled that jurors should have been told that a conviction requires a link between the defendant urging the destruction of documents and 'a particular proceeding.' The judge in the Quattrone case didn't include such an instruction."

Order For New Judge Seen As Unusual. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Sidel, Lattman) reports, "In reversing the conviction of the former star technology-industry investment banker, a federal appeals court yesterday assigned a new judge to the case, saying that 'the interests of all involved would best be served by another judge.' The appeals court didn't name the judge who would take the case. … Lawyers who aren't involved in the case said it is rare for an appeals court to assign a new judge when sending a case back to the lower court for a new trial. … 'It is highly unusual for the court of appeals to reverse a case with instructions that it be assigned to a new trial judge because it implies that the appellate court believes that the original judge may have been partial to one side or the other,' said former prosecutor Marc Mukasey, now of Bracewell & Giuliani in New York. 'In this case, however, the court of appeals stressed that it didn't question Judge Owen's impartiality.'"

Former Enron Auditors Testify On Charges, Reserve Accounts. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Mcwilliams, Emshwiller) reports, "Two former partners of Enron Corp.'s outside auditor, Arthur Andersen LLP, took the witness stand to help prosecutors link former top company executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2 to the alleged manipulation of the energy firm's reported financial results." The Journal continues, "The auditors' testimony at the beginning of the eighth week of the conspiracy and fraud trial touched on two main areas: the alleged downward manipulation of charges for goodwill expenses and the alleged misuse of reserve accounts to bump up reported earnings." The Journal adds, "In the case of goodwill, prosecutors contend that Mr. Lay, Enron's former chairman, misled Andersen and the public in October 2001 about the company's plans for its big water-distribution unit in order to avoid a hefty charge to earnings. On the reserve issue, the government contends Enron improperly tapped a reserve account to meet the desire by Mr. Skilling, the former company president, to beat analysts' earnings estimates. … The goodwill issue arose because of a new accounting rule in 2001 that required the write-down of an asset if it didn't meet certain criteria, which in the case of the Enron water unit included whether the company had an expensive growth plan, testified John R. Sult, one of the former Andersen partners. Without such a growth strategy, said Mr. Sult, Enron likely would have been forced to recognize an "impairment," or write-down, which prosecutors have said could have totaled hundreds of millions of dollars."

Former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Found Liable For Securities Fraud. The AP (3/21, Marquez) reports, "A federal judge found former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Henry C. Yuen liable for securities fraud, according to a ruling unsealed Monday in a federal regulatory lawsuit that claimed Yuen inflated the company's revenue by $248 million to boost its stock." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Mariana R. Pfaelzer also found Yuen liable for misrepresenting facts to Gemstar's auditors and falsifying its books. … The Securities and Exchange Commission will now submit a proposed penalty." The AP adds, "Yuen's attorney, Stanley Arkin, said an appeal was being considered. … 'I don't see eye to eye with her decision, but she's a judge,' Arkin said. 'The game isn't over.' … Gemstar, meanwhile, said in a statement that it was pleased by the decision to hold Yuen 'accountable for his wrongful and inappropriate actions.'" The AP notes, "Pfaelzer's findings came almost three years after the SEC filed the lawsuit against Yuen and Elsie Leung, Gemstar's ex-finance chief, in an alleged scheme to inflate company revenue to meet certain financial targets. … Regulators contend that Yuen's actions contributed to a windfall between 2000 and 2002 - at least $18.8 million in salary and bonuses, $14.6 million in exercised stock options, and more than $63.6 million in Gemstar stock sales."

"Chicago" Suit Hits Movie Industry Accounting Practices. The New York Times (3/21, Hartocollis) reports, "The producer of 'Chicago,' the Oscar-winning 2002 movie, is charging that Miramax has cheated him out of millions of dollars of profit from it by using deceptive accounting to understate revenue." The Times continues, "The producer, Martin Richards, sold Miramax an option to the movie rights to the musical in 1994. In papers filed in State Supreme Court in Manhattan yesterday, he said that he has been cheated by a Hollywood system of contingency payments to participants in moviemaking like producers, actors and writers that gives studios an incentive to underreport revenues. … Under that system, the court papers say, 'the worse a movie performs financially, the better off the studio is.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Richards's lawsuit says that he does not know precisely how much he is owed, but it seeks at least $10 million, which he estimates is his share of the movie's profits. … Mr. Richards declined to say how much he had been paid for the movie upfront, although the court papers said that his contract called for him to be paid several fees, including $500,000 after the movie reached its initial break-even point. "

DOJ_NMG_0019563

CRIMINAL LAW:

Star Witness At "Mafia Cops" Trial Recalls Government Pressure To Cooperate. The New York Times (3/21, Feuer, 1.19M) reports that the trial of alleged "Mafia cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa on Monday "veered…from Brooklyn murder and Las Vegas lunacy to the high-stakes poker game played by government agents and gangland turncoats as the trial's star witness," Burton Kaplan, testified under cross-examination that, "after he was arrested in 1996 on marijuana and tax-evasion charges, 'the government was willing to go to any length' to have him 'crack' and come 'on board to provide information' against" Eppolito and Caracappa. Newsday (3/21, DeStefano) adds that Kaplan "testified that he wasn't aware of any surveillance photos that show him meeting over the years with the alleged 'Mafia Cops.' … During two full days of cross examination, Kaplan didn't appear to waver or change his story about his dealings with the detectives," but "the defense is likely to use Kaplan's admission that he wasn't shown surveillance photos to undermine his claim that he met Eppolito and Caracappa during the six-year period."

Kaplan's Lawyer Expected To Testify As Surprise Prosecution Witness Today. The New York Daily News (3/21, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "Federal prosecutors plan to call Judd Burstein, the ex-mouthpiece of Burton Kaplan, to the witness stand today, the Daily News has learned. Burstein is expected to testify that Kaplan told him back in 1994 about his role as a middleman between" Eppolito and Caracappa "and gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso. Contacted last night, Burstein acknowledged to The News that he had volunteered to share what he knew with prosecutors." The Daily News adds, "The surprise witness echoes a successful gambit this month in the racketeering trial of John A. (Junior) Gotti, whose defense team had lawyer Ron Kuby testify that Gotti told him in 1998 that he had left the mob because he was sick of that life."

Pellicano Asks To Represent Himself As Defense Lawyer Challenges FBI Search. The AP (3/21, Risling) reports, "Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Monday he wants to act as his own lawyer in a case charging that he orchestrated an illegal wiretapping scheme targeting Hollywood celebrities and executives. … Meanwhile, federal prosecutors provided the judge with snippets of their case scheduled to go to trial next month." At the hearing, Assistant US Attorney Daniel Saunders "said three search warrant affidavits connected to raids on Pellicano's offices in 2002 would be unsealed later this week. FBI agents found illegal explosives and seized documents and computers during the searches," but Pellicano's current counsel, Steven Gruel "filed a motion Monday revisiting the legality of the search warrants," writing, "The Pellicano defense seeks discovery that will show that the FBI knew and expected to find a lot more than what they represented to or sought from the magistrate judge."

The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Krikorian, Weinstein, 958K) adds, "In his motion, Gruel said FBI Agent Stan Ornellas stated in a search warrant affidavit that authorities wanted to seize Pellicano's office computers, suggesting a far broader investigation than the threat against" Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch. "Gruel noted that long before the search of Pellicano's offices, the FBI had become aware of allegations that one of its own agents had illegally wiretapped while investigating a dispute over control of a $40-million Internet business." Additionally, Gruel questioned "the role Pellicano's former girlfriend played in the case," saying "it may have been improper for a 'cooperating' government witness to be visiting Pellicano in prison at a time when he was representing himself."

Jury Hears FBI Tapes During Informant's Testimony At Baltimore Police Corruption Trial. The Baltimore Sun (3/21, Dolan, 296K) reports that "in hours of secretly recorded conversations by federal agents, prosecutors say, one topic of conversation dominated the relationship between Detective William A. King and his informant, Antonio Mosby: selling illegal drugs for mutual profit. A federal jury heard more than a dozen recorded phone calls Monday that prosecutors say show how King and his partner, Detective Antonio L. Murray, shook down drug dealers pointed out by Mosby at open-air drug markets across Baltimore." The Sun notes that King's trial "is the culmination of the FBI's seven-month wiretap probe into misconduct in the Baltimore Police Department that ended with the May 2005 arrests of King and Murray."

Eight More Indicted In California Red Cross Katrina Aid Fraud Scheme. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/21) reports, "The number of Bakersfield-area people indicted in a scheme that bilked thousands of dollars from an American Red Cross fund designated for Hurricane Katrina victims has risen to 61, federal authorities said. Eight people were indicted last week in federal court in Fresno on charges of wire fraud and filing fake claims" with FEMA. "The Red Cross contacted the FBI after it performed an audit and discovered an unusually high number of claims were being paid out at Western Union outlets in the Bakersfield area, even though not many evacuees had moved there." The Los Angeles Times (3/21, 958K) also briefly reports on the indictments in "California In Brief."

DOJ_NMG_0019564

Federal Scrutiny Of Chicago Hiring Practices Goes Back At Least Nine Years. The Chicago Tribune (3/21, Higgins, Lighty, 643K) reports, "As far back as 1997, federal authorities were investigating the hiring practices in Mayor Richard Daley's administration — obtaining backup tapes from the city's mainframe computer system and questioning a top Daley aide about how some people got their city jobs. The disclosures of the government's earlier interest in City Hall hiring came Monday during a routine court hearing for Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, who is under indictment along with three others." Sorich lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin "said FBI agents had interviewed his client in August 1997 as part of…Operation Silver Shovel," but "Assistant U.S. Attorneys Patrick Collins and Barry Miller did not concede that information in the 1997 records would be helpful to the defense."

US Attorney Challenges Campbell Lawyer's Criticism Of Investigation. In an Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/21, 430K) op-ed, US Attorney David E. Nahmias responds to former Mayor Bill Campbell's lawyer, Michael Coleman, who "claims that the government's investigation targeted Campbell, lasted for eight years and cost 'millions of dollars in resources and manpower.' That is not true. … The 'army' from the FBI and U.S. attorney's office consisted of one or two agents and two prosecutors," which "increased to three prosecutors shortly before Campbell's indictment and to five agents only in the months just before and during his trial." Nahmias adds, "in essence the mayor's lawyer's argument is that, if someone concocts a criminal scheme that is complicated and difficult to uncover, and obstructs and delays efforts to do so, we should ignore the crimes rather than invest the time and resources needed to bring them to court."

Philadelphia Council Members Reluctant To Call For Mariano's Resignation. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/21, Schaffer, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "Many members of City Council hope Rick Mariano will resign following his federal corruption conviction," but "they don't want to call on him to step down. The legislators' semantic two-step came as city solicitor Romulo L. Diaz Jr. issued an opinion confirming that the state ban on felons in elected office won't kick in until Mariano's sentencing, which Judge Lawrence F. Stengel yesterday set for July 6." The Inquirer notes, "Of 14 members interviewed, only one -- Councilman Michael Nutter -- said he would definitely vote for a resolution asking Mariano to quit." The Philadelphia Daily News (3/21, Brennan, McDonald) adds, "Only four Council members -- Donna Reed Miller, Michael Nutter, Juan Ramos and Jack Kelly - echoed Mayor Street's call from last week for Mariano to resign immediately. The rest are content to let state law take its course."

FBI, IRS Raids On Accountant Seen As Spurring Businessman's Guilty Plea. The Philadelphia Daily News (3/21, Hinkelman) reports, "A new federal-court filing yesterday offered a broad clue as to why a key figure in the Rick Mariano bribery-and-corruption case abruptly agreed to change his plea to guilty in late February. On Feb. 28 -- the day after businessman Reinaldo Pastrana had his surprising change of heart -- FBI and IRS agents raided the office of Pastrana's accountant and seized copies of false tax returns filed on behalf of Pastrana; his mother, Ada, and sister Debbie. … Now in state prison for violating parole in connection with a state tax conviction, Pastrana has agreed to enter a guilty plea on Thursday to three counts of bribery."

Eight Former Southwest Airlines Employees Charged In Embezzlement Scheme. The San Antonio Express-News (3/21, Contreras) reports, "Eight former Southwest Airlines employees have been charged with wire fraud over allegations they stole more than $1 million from the Dallas-based carrier by using used tickets to issue new ones and pocketing some of the proceeds. … The scheme lasted from March 2000 through January 2003," and "Special agent Andrea Simmons, a spokeswoman for the FBI in El Paso, said the probe took a while to come to fruition because the case involved 'hundreds to thousands of tickets' that needed to be compared." The Express-News notes that seven of the defendants were in custody, and the FBI was still searching for the eighth. The AP (3/21) also reports on the charges, and notes Simmons' comment to the Express-News.

DOJ_NMG_0019565

California Developer Sentenced To Prison For Real Estate Fraud. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, C3, Lee) reported, "A San Francisco real estate developer will spend eight years in prison and pay more than $17 million in restitution and fines for defrauding more than 700 investors, a judge has ruled. U.S. District Judge William Alsup sentenced John A. Hickey…on Thursday to 97 months in prison and ordered him to pay a $15,000 fine and $17.4 million in restitution." The Chronicle notes, "Federal prosecutors said Hickey raised about $20 million from 724 investors through his company, Continental Capital Financial Group, by offering shares in two limited partnerships," allegedly "to develop real estate in Napa and Sonoma, among other locations."

Maryland Man Sentenced To Six Years For Child Porn Possession. The Baltimore Sun (3/21, 296K) reports Joshua M. Marsh of Great Mills, Maryland, yesterday "was sentenced…in federal court to six years in prison for transmitting child pornography files over the Internet, the U.S. attorney's office said. … According to a statement of facts at the plea, Marsh admitted to allowing users to download child pornography from his personal computer, as well as to facilitating the transmission of pornographic files between users. When the FBI conducted a search warrant in 2004, they found more than 1,000 files of child pornography on Marsh's computer."

FBI Arrests Senior Pentagon IT Employee On Child Porn Charges. UPI (3/21) reports, "A senior Defense Department employee managing the Pentagon's transition to a new Internet system was arrested for child pornography, DOD announced last week." Charles Lamont Lynch of Clifton, Virginia, "was operating a peer-to-peer file sharing program on his comuter at the Defense Information Systems Agency, according to the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. FBI Agents on March 8 seized a computer and more than 1,000 CD-Rom disks during a search of Lynch's office," and he "is now on leave without pay while his case is pending in court."

Former East St Louis Police Chief Sentenced. The AP (3/21, Suhr) reports that the former police chief of East St. Louis, IL, "was sentenced Monday to more than two years in federal prison for attempting to shield a politically connected businessman from a criminal probe." The AP continues, "Ronald Matthews, 56, had faced up to five years behind bars for conspiracy to obstruct justice, attempted obstruction of justice and perjury before a grand jury. He was convicted Dec. 21... Matthews professed his innocence and said he would appeal. But he also told the judge he preferred to begin his prison term immediately." The AP notes, "The case stems from a traffic stop during which Ayoub 'Dave' Qattoum, an auxiliary policeman and businessman, was found with a .38-caliber handgun. Under federal law, Qattoum was not entitled to have a gun as a convicted felon. … Prosecutors described Qattoum as well-connected, quick to give loans or kickbacks to local elected officials to curry favor as the owner of a convenience store. … Authorities accused Matthews of commandeering the local investigation of Qattoum's arrest after the Jordanian national expressed fear that U.S. immigration officials had learned of his legal troubles and might deport him."

The Belleville News Democrat (3/21, Pawlaczyk) reports, "Although Murphy offered him the opportunity to remain free until being ordered to report to prison, Matthews opted to be taken immediately into custody. … Two federal marshals asked him to remove any personal items, including a driver's license and a comb, which he gave to family members, and then he was escorted into a backroom."

Guatemalan Pleads Guilty To DC Hit Man Plot. The Washington Times (3/21, Emerling) reports, "An illegal alien from Guatemala pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to charges that he tried to arrange the killing of a D.C. jail inmate last year." The Times continues, "Victor Moscoso Espana, 20, of Hyattsville, admitted in D.C. District Court that he attempted to have inmate Alvaro Garcia-Hernandez -- a fellow Guatemalan in jail on drug charges -- killed for $15,000, which would have been paid in monthly installments." The Times adds, "According to court documents, Moscoso tried to arrange the hit because he 'did not like' Garcia-Hernandez and wanted to 'take over' his drug sources and 'make money.' … Agents with the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) began investigating Moscoso in September after receiving information about a conspiracy to import cocaine and heroin from Guatemala through various U.S. entry points, including Washington Dulles International Airport. … Court documents show that the hit man plot began when Moscoso arranged to meet another person -- who was cooperating with investigating agents -- at a Hess gasoline station in the 1900 block of New Jersey Avenue Northwest in October."

DOJ_NMG_0019566

SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Pollard Appeal. The AP (3/21) reports, "The Supreme Court refused Monday to give Jonathan Pollard, now serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, access to records that could bolster his case for a presidential clemency." The AP continues, "Pollard's lawyers wanted the justices to reopen his case, so that they could pursue secret documents the government submitted to the judge who sentenced Pollard in 1987." The AP adds, "Pollard sold military secrets to Israel while he worked at the Defense Department's Pentagon headquarters. He was arrested in 1985 and pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court had already refused to let the former Navy intelligence analyst withdraw the guilty plea. …The latest Supreme Court case was not about spying, but about government authority to keep records used in court sealed from the public. … A federal appeals court said last summer that it had no authority to review requests for the documents which Pollard contends will help his bid for presidential clemency."

High Court Appears To Side Against Prosecutors' Use Of Victims' Words. The New York Times (3/21, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "A crime victim's emergency call to 911, when introduced in court, can provide powerful evidence of the attacker's identity and the circumstances of the crime. Perhaps too powerful -- or so most Supreme Court justices seemed to conclude during an argument Monday on whether the prosecution could use such evidence without violating defendants' constitutional rights to face their accusers in the courtroom." The constitutional problem "arises when the victim fails to appear in court and is therefore not available for cross-examination."

The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Savage, 958K) reports, "Eight of the nine Supreme Court justices -- all but Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- sounded today as though they would vote to bar prosecutors from using in court the words of crime victims who spoke to authorities but refused to testify." The Washington Post (3/21, A4, Lane, 744K) says that "at stake are the rules of evidence that will govern not only many domestic violence prosecutions but also any criminal case in which prosecutors seek to introduce past accusations by people who, whether out of fear or any other reason, cannot or will not repeat their charges in open court." The AP (3/21, Locy) also reports the story.

Former Philippine President Says US Tapped His Calls With Aragoncillo. The AP (3/21, Gomez) reports former Philippine President Joseph Estrada "said Tuesday he has been notified by an American court that U.S. authorities bugged his telephone conversations with an FBI analyst accused of revealing U.S. government secrets. The New Jersey court indicated it had authorized the wiretapping as part of an investigation into Leandro Aragoncillo last year, Estrada said, adding that there was no suggestion he was under investigation." The AP notes, "Aragoncillo was arrested in the United States last year" and "has been charged with conspiring to reveal government secrets, acting as a foreign agent and improperly using FBI computers."

California Sex Assault Case Shifts To Civil Courtroom. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Goffard) reports, "Now that a judge has imposed a prison term on the attackers, the sordid, painful four-year-long case involving Gregory Haidl and two co-defendants — and the woman who says they destroyed her — shifts to the civil courtroom, which may prove the ugliest show yet. … The victim, now 20 and known publicly as Jane Doe, has sued the three young men convicted of sexually assaulting her while a video camera rolled and she lay unconscious on a pool table one July night in 2002. And she is suing Haidl's father, a rich former Orange County assistant sheriff, alleging that he should have known of the drug- and alcohol-fueled parties raging in his Corona del Mar home, where the attack occurred. … But, as part of her $26-million lawsuit, Jane Doe is also targeting others who, she says, subjected her to years of 'harassment, intimidation and torture' after the attack itself." The Times continues, "In a rare legal move, her suit names Haidl defense attorney Joseph G. Cavallo and two defense investigators, John Warren and Shawn Smigel. She says the defense staked out her Rancho Cucamonga house, went through her trash, stalked her, improperly obtained her medical records, broadcast her identity and once cornered her in a parking lot while snapping pictures. … 'We're taking these people to task about what they did,' said Jane Doe's attorney, Sheldon Lodmer. 'They crossed the line in terms of appropriate legal defense.' … Cavallo said he did nothing improper in trying to defend a client who could have faced life in prison, and characterized the lawsuit as 'revenge' for his zealous representation."

DOJ_NMG_0019567

States Move To Pass "Stand Your Ground" Bills. USA Today (3/21, Willing, 2.31M) reports that states are beginning to pass bills allowing citizens to use deadly force against muggers and other attackers. USA reports, "Dubbed 'Stand Your Ground' bills by supporters such as the National Rifle Association, the measures generally grant immunity from prosecution and lawsuits to those who use deadly force to combat any unlawful entry or attack. Several states allow people to use deadly force in their homes against intruders; the new measures represent an expansion of self-defense rights to crimes committed in public."

CIVIL LAW:

RJ Reynolds Tries To Evade Chicago Smoking Ban. The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 7, 2:35, Schieffer) reported, "Smoking laws have been tightened so much over the last few years that in many parts of the country it is pretty much illegal to smoke anywhere in public. But one spot in nearly smoke-free Chicago has begun to buck the trend." CBS (Bowers) added, "Chicago, like a growing number of American cities, recently enacted its own version of the Clean Air Act, which basically stamps out smoking in public, even in bars." But the tobacco lounges aren't "licensed as a restaurant or a bar but as a tobacco manufacturer where smoking is permitted, which starts sense when you consider the owner is RJ Reynolds. And as you might imagine, the cigarette-maker is fuming over what it sees as a thinly veiled attempt to outlaw smoking."

NYTimes Calls Court Ruling "Partial Victory" For Google. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/21, 2.11M) calls a Federal judge's ruling that Google would not be forced to hand over a sample of user searches a "partial victory" for Google. The Post adds, "The real question is whether criminalizing whole categories of speech on the basis of vaguely worded 'community standards' is the least restrictive way of protecting children." Friday's ruling established "some limits on what the government can demand from private corporations in seeking to defend this law against a First Amendment challenge. Justice's initial request was for every indexed Web address and two months' worth of search queries. By comparison, what the government will now get looks reasonable indeed."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Sentences Two Cuban Human Smugglers To Maximum 10-Year Sentences. The Miami Herald (3/21, Weaver) reports, "Two Cuban immigrants who captained a smuggling mission that ended with the drowning of a young boy received the maximum prison sentence on Monday -- 10 years." The Herald continues, "U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore hammered the two men after concluding a six-year term proposed under federal sentencing guidelines was not enough punishment for the child's death in the Oct. 13 illegal crossing of the Florida Straits." The Herald adds, "A lawyer for both Alexander Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Luis Manuel Taboada-Cabrera, 28, whose relatives sobbed outside the courtroom, said they will appeal the judge's sentences for their alien-smuggling convictions. Attorney Steven Amster said the two Miami men, who were not charged or convicted of causing the death of 6-year-old Julian Villasuso, still faced up to the maximum prison term because his drowning was a factor in the judge's sentencing under advisory guidelines. … The two men had reached plea deals in November, expecting to receive lighter sentences. They pleaded guilty to a conspiracy to smuggle 29 Cubans in a 33-foot speedboat that overturned and claimed the life of the boy, who got trapped beneath the capsized vessel. … But Assistant U.S. Attorney Dana Washington said he didn't have enough evidence to charge them with the death of Julian Villasuso."

The AP (3/21, Anderson) reports that Judge Moore "said he was imposing the long sentence because of a marked increase in dangerous pursuits between U.S. authorities and smugglers on the open ocean. Moore also said the two men should pay an extra penalty for playing a role in the boy's death. … Sentences imposed under federal guidelines are 'not providing an adequate deterrent for this kind of criminal conduct,' Moore said."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (3/21, Blum) reports, "Defense attorney Steven Amster argued that the lower penalty was sufficient punishment, in part because the smuggling trip was not organized for profit. In remarks to the judge, Taboada apologized and took responsibility for his actions. … Amster also suggested that the Coast Guard played a role in the boy's death by casting a net over their boat's engines, causing water to rush over the stern and precipitating the boat's capsizing. There also was a delay in the attempt to rescue Julian after it was realized he was still under the boat. … But Moore said the smugglers should not expect leniency by attempting to shift blame to the Coast Guard and noted that other migrants on the boat had pleaded with the two smugglers to stop once the chase began."

DOJ_NMG_0019568

Attorney Charges Cover-Up In Florida Boot Camp Death. The AP (3/21, Kallestad) reports, "Bay County (FL) authorities are covering up their role in the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a boot camp, and his relatives want any trial in the case moved to another area to ensure a fair proceeding, the family's attorney said Monday." The AP continues, "Bay County sheriff's spokeswoman Ruth Sasser declined to comment on the cover-up allegations, but said seven drill instructors involved in the altercation and a nurse who witnessed it will be among about 20 people who lose their jobs when the camp closes next month. The closure plans had already been announced." The AP adds, "Ben Crump, the attorney for Martin Lee Anderson's parents, said they were 'outraged' because medical examiner Dr. Charles Siebert last week defended his findings that the 14-year-old died from complications of sickle cell trait, a usually harmless blood disorder. … Investigators re-examining the death with a second autopsy said last week that Anderson didn't die of natural causes. … Anderson died Jan. 6 after the confrontation at the boot camp in Panama City run by Bay County sheriff's officials. He had been struck, kicked and dragged to the ground by several guards during a half-hour ordeal that was recorded on videotape. … Gov. Jeb Bush has appointed Hillsborough County State Attorney Mark Ober to investigate and he observed the second autopsy done in Tampa. The U.S. Attorney's office in Tallahassee and the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division also have opened an investigation into Anderson's death."

California Prisons Prepare For Desegregation Policy. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Jordan) reports, "It's exercise time at the California Institution for Men, and dozens of inmates walk around the track in pairs or small groups -- blacks with blacks, whites with whites, Hispanics with Hispanics. … Prison culture dictates that inmates stick with their own kind, associating almost exclusively with other inmates from their race or ethnic group, defending them to the death if necessary. And that is why prison officials, inmates and scholars are uneasy as California's prison system prepares to introduce a formal policy desegregating its double cells, after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that prisoners may not be routinely segregated in cells by race. The ruling has ramifications for state correctional systems nationwide." The Journal continues, "In 2004, an African-American inmate challenged the California Department of Corrections' unwritten policy of assigning new prisoners and transfers to double cells only with a cellmate of the same race or ethnic group. The corrections department claimed segregated prison cells were necessary to avoid racial violence. Unswayed, the high court last year refused to strike down the inmate's challenge. California's new policy, which officials expect to implement over the next 2½ years, is the result of a settlement of that case. … Critics of the new policy say the purpose of segregated cells is to keep prisons peaceful and safe, not to discriminate. … California's prison system, at present still operating largely under the old policy, uses ethnicity as the main criteria when assigning higher-threat inmates to double cells. … Criminal-justice scholars say it is impossible to get a clear picture of prison-cell integration across the U.S. because practices vary widely from facility to facility."

Consumers Group Challenges Geico's Risk Criteria. The Washington Post (3/21, D1, Crenshaw, Mayer) reports, "According to an internal Geico document, the auto insurer uses drivers' levels of education and occupations in setting insurance rates. … As a result, Consumer Federation of America argued, blue-collar workers with relatively low levels of education sometimes are charged almost twice as much as better-educated professionals, based on those criteria." The Post continues, "Geico said in a statement that it uses many factors in setting rates and that allegations that education and occupation are being used as the sole criterion are 'absolutely untrue.'" The Post adds, "The document cited by the consumer group and a Geico competitor raises long-standing questions about which criteria insurance companies may use as proper gauges of risk and which improperly discriminate against poor people and minorities. … Insurers, consumer advocates, regulators and politicians have been struggling for years over such issues, including the use of credit scores in assessing risk.

DOJ_NMG_0019569

The use of credit scores is permissible in about 30 states but continues to be debated."

ANTITRUST:

Online Poll Shows Small-Business Opposition To AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The San Antonio Business Journal (3/21) reports, "AT&T Inc.'s plan to merge with BellSouth Corp. is seen as a development that will not work in favor of San Antonio's small-business community, according to the majority of individuals who participated in an online Business Pulse poll." The Journal continues, "Slightly more than half of the San Antonio Business Journal readers who responded to the survey say San Antonio-based AT&T's planned $67 billion stock merger with BellSouth in Atlanta will lead to less competition in the marketplace, rising prices, less technological innovation and poor customer service. … (The online poll is not scientific and the results represent only a snap shot of some readers' opinions.)" The Journal adds, "AT&T officials, however, disagree with the negative assessments of the merger and have long maintained that there is sufficient competition in the marketplace as evidenced by the full slate of services offered by cable, wireless carriers and competing local phone companies. … The merger still needs shareholder and regulatory approval in five states and with the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission."

Proxy Adviser Backs Boston Scientific-Guidant Deal. Dow Jones (3/21, Kamp) reports, "Shareholders of Boston Scientific Corp. and Guidant Corp. should approve the consolidation of the two companies in votes scheduled for March 31, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, an influential proxy advisory firm." Dow Jones continues, "In reports recently directed to shareholders of each company, ISS said 'the acquisition of GDT will allow BSX to diversify its product offerings, adding defibrillators and pacemakers, and should ameliorate some of the concerns regarding future growth.'" Dow Jones adds, "On Jan. 25, Boston Scientific and Guidant announced a merger agreement, under which Boston Scientific will buy Guidant for a combination of cash and stock worth about $27 billion. The deal is valued at $80 a share to Guidant shareholders as long as Boston Scientific shares close within a $22.62-$28.86 collar over a certain period prior to the deal's closing. … So far, Boston Scientific's closing price has largely remained within that range. Boston Scientific recently traded at $23.28, up 66 cents, or 2.9%. … Jim Tobin, Boston Scientific's chief executive, repeated that the acquisition is expected to close in the first week of April. In a recent filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, Boston Scientific said it anticipates antitrust approval for the deal that week."

Lucent Gets FTC Nod To Purchase Riverstone Operations. Dow Jones (3/21) reports, "Lucent Technologies Inc. received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the business operations of Riverstone Networks Inc. for $170 million in cash." Dow Jones continues, "The FTC said Monday that on Friday it granted Lucent early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … Lucent has said the acquisition would complement its broadband, data and optical-networking products. The transaction is subject to bankruptcy court approval and other conditions."

Analysts Expect Counter-Bid For UK Insurer Prudential. The Financial Times (3/21, Felsted) reports, "Image Investors were braced for a counter-bid for Prudential, Britain's second biggest life assurer, after its shares rose 5 per cent above the offer price proposed by Aviva. Shares in Prudential rose 11 per cent to 743½p, ahead of the 706p proposed by Aviva in its all-share offer which, valuing Prudential at £16.8bn. 'The share price is telling you that the market is expecting a counter-bid,' said Roman Cizdyn, an analyst at Oriel Securities. 'As we sit where we are now, Aviva is not likely to succeed. The price is telling you that.'" Aviva CEO Richard Harvey, however, "said a counterbid was 'unlikely' and that consequently, Aviva was not expected to make a hostile offer. 'I think it's unlikely that someone else would come in and that is why we are expecting to proceed on a recommended basis,' Mr. Harvey said. France's Axa is seen as the most likely counter-bidder for Prudential, but some analysts said that it had been reluctant to become involved in contested bid situations in the past."

Aviva CEO Says He'll Seek To Sell Prudential Shareholders On Takeover Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, A9, Fleming) reports that Harvey, "said he would take his case for a merger with" Prudential "directly to shareholders, overriding Prudential managers' rejection of his unsolicited £17.1 billion (€24.63 billion or $30.04 billion) takeover offer." Harvey "said the two companies have many shareholders in common and that Aviva's investor-relations team is currently working the telephones to explain Aviva's position to investors. 'I expect them to arrange a number of rendezvous for me [with shareholders] in the coming weeks,' Mr. Harvey said." Meanwhile, Prudential officials on Monday continued to voice opposition to the proposal. Prudential Chairman David Clementi "said in a statement that Prudential's potential as a stand-alone company was 'tremendous and distinctive' and that a combination with Aviva would dilute the benefits of its growth."

DOJ_NMG_0019570

Belgium Seeks Concessions On GDF-Suez Deal. The AP (3/21) reports, "Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said Monday he plans to hold talks to seek concessions on the French government-backed plan for Gaz de France SA to acquire French utility company Suez SA." The AP continues, "Speaking after a meeting with President Jacques Chirac in Paris, Verhofstadt said he had told the French leader that a GDF-Suez deal should not prevent Belgium from opening its gas and electricity markets to more competition. … Verhofstadt also said the two Paris-based companies would likely have to sell assets in order to meet that requirement." The AP adds, "The GDF-Suez deal was announced by the French government last month just days after Italian power company Enel SPA said it might launch a takeover bid for Suez. … Suez owns Electrabel, the Belgium's largest power company, and GDF holds a sizable stake in its nearest domestic rival, SPE. … Verhofstadt said last week that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market. The Belgian energy regulator is also concerned about the country's nuclear plants coming under French control, according to press reports."

FCC Deregulates Verizon's Big-Business Market. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Schatz) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc. got a boost in the big-business market as federal regulators agreed to deregulate its high-volume data lines for its largest corporate customers." The Journal continues, "The decision by the Federal Communications Commission essentially lifts price controls and possibly reverses some conditions imposed on the New York telecommunications company last year during its acquisition of MCI Inc. It also gives Verizon pricing flexibility for lucrative high-volume services sold to major corporations, although regulations may continue to stay in effect for smaller business customers." The Journal adds, "The action signaled the FCC's willingness to expand phone companies' control over high-speed Internet lines to cover the large corporate market as well as residential customers. … But by granting Verizon's request without guidance, the FCC prompted confusion in the industry Monday. The action could lead to legal challenges by smaller competitors, particularly companies that resell high-volume services, such as Internet access, to small businesses. Also, other phone companies are likely to file requests for similar relief with the FCC."

Kerzner Takes $3 Billion Buyout Offer. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Sanders) reports, "Casino operator Kerzner International Ltd. agreed to be acquired by a consortium of private-equity concerns for $3 billion in cash plus the assumption of $599 million in debt." The Journal continues, "The consortium, including Kerzner Chairman Sol Kerzner and his son, Butch Kerzner, the company's chief executive, agreed to pay $76 a share for the Bahamas-based casino company, an 8% premium to the stock's Friday closing price. The company operates its flagship Atlantis properties in the Bahamas and soon in Dubai, as well as the ultraluxury 'One&Only' hotels in exotic destinations around the world. Kerzner International also receives income from the Mohegan Sun tribal casino in Connecticut, which it developed, and has a large casino at its Atlantis property in the Bahamas." The Journal adds, "If successful in their buyout attempt, the Kerzners would see their ownership stake rise to about 25% from about 10%, Butch Kerzner said in an interview. Kerzner officials insist they 'will actively solicit superior proposals during the next 45 days,' but the proposed deal represents a multiple of about 19 times last year's earnings, according to a person familiar with the situation."

France Copyright Proposal Would Open Up iTunes. The Financial Times (3/21, Braithwaite) reports, "Apple Computer could on Tuesday be forced to open up its digital music business to competitors after a vote in the French parliament." The Times continues, "The owner of iTunes, the online music store, and the iPod digital music player, will have to choose between making downloaded music compatible with rival platforms or pulling out of France if, as expected, the parliament in Paris approves a draft copyright law." The Times adds, "Software in digital downloads from iTunes prevents music being played by any rival to the popular iPod, but the French bill seeks to impose 'interoperability' on online music stores and break Apple's closed system. … 'It is unacceptable that . . . the key should be controlled by a monopoly. France is against monopolies,' said Martin Rogard, an adviser at the French Culture Ministry. 'The consumer must be able to listen to the music they have bought on no matter what platform.' … Mr Rogard said it was 'desirable' that France led in this respect, but hoped that it was the start of a Europe-wide move to open up digital music."

DOJ_NMG_0019571

Supreme Court To Hear Patent Case. The New York Times (3/20, Pollack, 1.19M) reports, "For the first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented." Both sides say "the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests." But "the array of companies filing supporting briefs -- including American Express, Bear Stearns and IBM -- indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected."

Writers See Patent Problems As Structural, Systemic. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/21), Adam Jaffe, professor of economics and dean of arts and sciences at Brandeis University, and Josh Lerner, Jacob Schiff Professor of Investment Banking at Harvard Business School, write, "The problems of the U.S. patent system are under discussion today with an urgency not seen in decades. The Supreme Court will soon hear oral arguments in eBay v. MercExchange LLC, which promises to be its most far-reaching examination of patent law in many years. Today the court will also consider LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories -- the contested matter is whether a patent can be issued for the correlation between a disease and a naturally occurring substance in the human body. That is: Can you actually patent the laws of nature? And shockingly, Research in Motion has been forced to pay $612 million to prevent all of our BlackBerry handhelds from going dark, even though the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) has indicated that it is likely to find all of the patents behind this ransom demand invalid. Congressional subcommittees, with good reason, have recently held hearings asking fundamental questions about developments like these in the patent system." Jaffe and Lerner adds, "Commentators have tended to focus on the incompetence of the USPTO in allowing 'bad patents.' Others have concluded that the patent system is not working with respect to a particular area of technology. Concerns about software awards led, for instance, Jeff Bezos of Amazon to propose a new patent type for software; others have suggested that biotechnology be excluded in various ways from the patent regime. … We believe, instead, that the problems with the patent system are systemic and fundamental, the result of two congressional changes to the patent system." Jaffe and Lerner concludes, "The protection for true innovators created by a workable patent system is vital to technological change and economic growth. The problems in the existing patent system are structural, and the fundamental solutions need to be structural as well. As much as the USPTO needs to do a better job, it can only do so if the system is modified so that all parties have incentives to help with the job, and the courts provide a reliable backstop when mistakes are made."

ENVIRONMENT:

Kerr-McGee Suit Disputes Federal Oil Royalties. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Levine) reports, "Kerr-McGee Corp., at a time of rising political scrutiny of oil-company profits, is suing the federal government to avoid about $108 million in royalties on its deep-water production in the Gulf of Mexico." The Journal continues, "The issue of royalty payments on Gulf-of-Mexico oil properties owned by the federal government has attracted much criticism in Congress because of high gasoline prices and record oil-company financial results. Some lawmakers have called for a windfall-profits tax on the industry, though such a levy still appears to be a long shot." The Journal adds, "In all, the Interior Department estimates that royalty exemptions in the Gulf of Mexico could cost the U.S. treasury some $7 billion over time, depending on the price of oil and the level of production. … Kerr-McGee, which produces oil and natural gas from 17 deep-water fields in the Gulf, filed suit Friday in federal court in Lake Charles, La. The Oklahoma City company is seeking to overturn a January order by the department's Minerals Management Service division that Kerr-McGee and other oil companies pay more in royalties for the fields. Most oil companies complied with the order, but Kerr-McGee was among three that didn't pay. … The case involves fallout from a 1995 congressional act that, at a time of relatively low oil prices and shrinking U.S. production, attempted to increase oil and natural-gas production from the deep-water sections of the Gulf of Mexico. Water depths there often exceed 2,500 feet, and exploration is expensive and riskier than elsewhere. The congressional act exempted oil companies from royalty payments for millions of barrels of deep-water production for leases obtained from 1996 to 2000 as long as world prices didn't exceed a certain level."

DOJ_NMG_0019572

US Expects Bird Flu This Year. Leaders of three federal agencies Monday warned that the bird flu could reach the USA this year on the wings of migratory birds. However, USA Today (3/21, Manning, 2.31M) reports Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the appearance of the virus "will not constitute a reason for panic," stressing that "a detection of this virus in birds does not signal the start of a pandemic in people." For his part, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said local communities need to make their own pandemic plans, and "any community that fails to prepare with the expectation that the federal government will, at the last moment, be able to come to the rescue will be tragically wrong."

US To Increase Testing Of Wild Birds For Avian Flu. Meanwhile, Interior Secretary Gale Norton said a program to test up to 100,000 wild birds for signs of infection this year will focus on breeding grounds in Alaska and islands in the Pacific where migrating birds from Asia are now heading. The Washington Post (3/21, A5, Stein, 744K) says the program signals a "sharp increase" in the number of testing, and "is part of the Bush administration's $29 million plan to protect the country against the virus." The AP (3/21, Quaid) quotes Norton as saying that the wild bird testing "could reveal 20 to 100 suspected cases of bird flu," although follow-up testing is likely to reveal "dozens" are false alarms. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, 958K) also briefly noted Norton's comments.

US Businesses Prepare For Avian Flu Arrival. The New York Times (3/21, Warner, 1.19M) reports that many US poultry firms, such as Tyson, Pilgrim's Pride, and KFC, "all say they have formed internal avian flu task forces that meet regularly" with government health officials to discuss "what information should go on the companies' Web sites and when, and devising sales loss projections."

FDA To Ban Poultry Use Of Flu Vaccines. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, A4, Zhang, 2.11M) reports "amid concern of a possible avian-flu pandemic," the Food and Drug Administration "moved to ban the poultry industry from using two groups of human antiviral drugs to treat their flocks, for fear that may reduce their effectiveness in humans." The agency is "proposing to ban veterinarians from prescribing" Roche's Tamiflu and GlaxoSmithKline's Relenza for animal use.

Scientists Oppose Removing ESA Protections For Yellowstone Grizzly. A group of 269 scientists have asked the Fish and Wildlife Service on Monday not to lift Endangered Species Act protections for the Yellowstone grizzly bear. The New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) reports that the scientists say removing the protections could jeopardize the bear's survival. The scientists' letter "says the Yellowstone grizzly is cut off from other bears, and therefore new sources of DNA. Because of that, the population needs to be 2,000 to 3,000, the scientists say, to survive a catastrophic event, like disease or the loss of a critical food source."

Conservationists Move To Buy Timber Company Holdings. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/21, A1, Eilperin, 744K) reports that timber companies have been shedding holdings in recent years, which has "spurred a land rush that has conservation groups scrambling to raise money to buy environmentally sensitive tracts in competition with private investors seeking to snap up the land for development. … The consulting firm U.S. Forest Capital estimates that half of all U.S. timberland has changed hands in the past decade. The Bush administration also wants to sell off forest land, by auctioning more than 300,000 acres of national forest to fund a rural school program." However, "if the selling spree continues, environmentalists fear, these areas could be cut up into much smaller parcels in which condominiums and trailer parks would replace soaring trees."

NYTimes Calls Administration Record On Mine Safety "Embarrassing." An editorial in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) says the Bush Administration's "accommodation of the mining industry…has produced a marked decline in major fines for negligent companies. A recent data analysis by The Times documented a risky, business-friendly downturn in penalties since 2001. At the same time, nearly half of the announced fines still go uncollected." In the wake of recent mine deaths, Congress is considering tougher fines for violations, but, "what good are fines if they are not being forcefully used by the federal agencies supposedly responsible for workers' safety?" The Times adds that the Bush Administration begin "an urgent reversal of its embarrassing record on penalizing flagrantly negligent companies."

DOJ_NMG_0019573

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Sentinel Subcontractors Criticized In GAO Trilogy Audit. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/21, Sherman) reports, "Two companies that will share in a new FBI computer contract were singled out in a government audit Monday that questioned $17 million in the agency's computer overhaul." In its review of the Trilogy program, the GAO said that "the FBI and its contractors share the blame for $10 million in questionable costs and for 1,205 pieces of missing computer equipment valued at $7.6 million," citing CACI and Computer Sciences Corp. specifically. But FBI spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said, "The lessons learned from the Trilogy program are guiding us, and the FBI continues to strengthen our internal controls." She added that "the CSC unit that worked on Trilogy will not be part of the Sentinel project," and "CACI will provide training for new system, as it did for Trilogy."

ATF Team To Target Violence In Atlanta, Other Cities. The Washington Times (3/21, Seper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said Atlanta would become the 23rd U.S. city assigned a federal Violent Crime Impact Team in an aggressive effort to make that city safer. … 'The citizens of the city of Atlanta deserve to live free from violent crime,' Mr. Gonzales said in announcing the law-enforcement initiative during a press conference at the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta. 'VCIT will help make Atlanta safer through a coordinated campaign to investigate and prosecute those individuals who threaten our communities with guns and violence.' … Washington, Baltimore and Richmond are among the other cities participating in the VCIT program." The Times adds, "The VCIT teams, led by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, consist of ATF agents, U.S. marshals, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and federal prosecutors who partner with state and local law-enforcement officers and prosecutors to proactively and aggressively identify, arrest and prosecute those responsible for firearms-related offenses and other violent crimes. … 'Make no mistake about it; Violent Crime Impact Teams have saved lives by getting armed criminals off the streets,' said ATF Director Carl J. Truscott. … Mr. Truscott said the teams use technology and human intelligence to identify geographic areas within cities with violent firearms crime; identify the 'worst' violent offenders, the criminal organizations that support them and armed career criminals; and use criminal investigations and investigative tools and resources to disrupt and dismantle criminal activity being perpetrated by the targeted persons and organizations."

Gonzales Targets Georgia Meth Production. The AP (3/21, Gross) reports, "Anti-methamphetamine laws like the ones passed in Georgia are tamping down the domestic production of the deadly drug, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Monday. … But Gonzales said an increase in the amount of meth being smuggled into the country from Mexico threatens to offset those advances." The AP continues, "Gonzales joined Gov. Sonny Perdue (in Waleska, GA) at a town-hall meeting of law enforcement officials, community activists and others on what they called the methamphetamine crisis in the state. … 'Meth threatens to turn the American dream into the American nightmare - not just for the users, but for their families ... and their communities,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "The event was held at Reinhardt College in north Georgia's Cherokee County, where there were 490 meth-related arrests and more than $300,000 worth of the drug confiscated by authorities last year, according to Perdue. … The governor highlighted anti-meth measures taken by Georgia's Legislature over the past few years, such as requiring the drug's key ingredients to be moved behind the counter of stores that sell them and making it a felony to cook meth in the presence of a child. … Earlier Monday, Gonzales was in Atlanta to announce the launch of a federal initiative to target violent crime in the worst parts of the city."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/21, Williams) reports, "Much of Georgia's methamphetamine problem starts in Mexico, Gov. Sonny Perdue said Monday, making a good working relationship with federal and foreign authorities increasingly important. … To stress the need for help in combating the highly addictive drug, the governor appeared with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a meeting at Reinhardt College in Cherokee County." The AJC continues, "About 200 people made up the invitation-only group of law enforcement officials, prosecutors, drug rehabilitation professionals and elected officials. … Metro Atlanta has become a hub for eastern U.S. distribution of the drug being manufactured at large clandestine labs in Mexico and in the Western United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … Stemming the flow of the drug, known as 'ice,' will take international cooperation, Gonzales said Monday afternoon, noting that he is to meet with the Mexican attorney general in Dallas in May. The United States is training Mexican officials on how to deal with the cleanup of toxic meth labs and other issues, Gonzales said."

DOJ_NMG_0019574

Former Baton Rouge Police Officer Charged With Cocaine Possession. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (3/21) reports, "A former Baton Rouge police officer who once went to jail for selling items from the evidence room now faces more prison time after federal agents allegedly found 6 kilograms of cocaine in a trash can in his garage. Daryl W. Davis…was charged Monday. … In an affidavit, DEA Special Agent Mark Lusco writes that investigators believed Davis was 'obtaining multikilograms of cocaine from Houston, Texas, and distributing them in the Baton Rouge area.'"

Accused "Chief" Cocaine Trafficker Appears In Colorado Court. The Aspen (CO) Daily News (3/21) reports a Little Annie's Eating House employee "was bound over for trial Monday after the prosecution portrayed him as a chief trafficker of a local cocaine network." Fernando Leal-Ruiz "listened as law-enforcement officers at his preliminary hearing testified that during a Dec. 2 drug raid they saw him reaching in the direction of a plastic bag that was later determined to contain 44 bindles of cocaine. … Monday's hearing was the latest courtroom development concerning the December drug raids of two downtown restaurants in an operation coordinated by local, state and federal authorities."

The Aspen (CO) Times (3/21) reports, "A judge ruled Monday there is enough evidence to try a man on cocaine distribution and conspiracy charges. Fernando Leal-Ruiz of Carbondale was arrested, along with nine others, in the Dec. 2 drug raids on Little Annie's Eating House and Cooper Street Pier. … Monday's preliminary hearing saw testimony by the Aspen police detective who led the raid on Little Annie's, a DEA agent and an immigration officer."

NBA Player's Dismissal Upheld For Violating Drug Policy. The New York Times (3/21, Robbins) reports an arbitrator "ruled in favor of the N.B,A. yesterday and upheld the league's dismissal of Hornets forward Chris Andersen for violating the league's drug policy. … Andersen, dismissed Jan. 27, cannot apply for reinstatement for two years."

The AP (3/20) writes, "According to the league's collective bargaining agreement, a player can be disqualified only for a fourth positive test for performance-enhancing drugs, or a first positive test for 'drugs of abuse.'"

Bolivia Takes Coca Debate To UN. The UK's Independent (3/21) writes, "Bolivia stepped up a long-running battle with Washington this week by taking its campaign to legalize coca plants to the United Nations in a bid to persuade the international community that the leaf should no longer be banned because of its links to the illegal drugs trade." Bolivia "is determined to prove that coca can be the source of legitimate products for export and not just the raw material for cocaine."

The UK's Telegraph (3/20) reports, "Under the slogan 'coca is not cocaine,' politicians, consumers and growers across the Andes are promoting the leaf's qualities and calling for coca-based tea, yoghurt, bread, toothpaste, shampoo and soap to be mass produced and exported."

Government Accused Of Being Willfully Blind To Canada's Marijuana Problem. The BBC (3/21) reports on its Web site, "Nearly half of Canadians admit to smoking marijuana at least once. … Tens of thousands of illegal 'grow-ops' remain in Canada. Estimates suggest marijuana may generate up to C$7bn (£3.5bn; US$6.1bn) a year in BC, the sunny province thought to be at the heart of the industry." The BBC adds that critics "accuse the government of being willfully blind to the historic failures of law enforcement, and ignoring public opinion and the findings of expert committees in favor of a policy of demonizing marijuana."

Former German Track Coach Convicted Of Doping Athletes. The AP (3/20) reports, "Former German track coach Thomas Springstein was convicted of doping charges Monday and given a 16-month suspended prison sentence. The court found the 47-year-old Springstein guilty on charges including the alleged doping of young athletes in 2003. … Springstein was accused of supplying testosterone to his athletes, including a 16-year-old girl."

DOJ_NMG_0019575

IMMIGRATION:

Melloan Says Illegal Aliens Should Be Given Green Cards. George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/21, Melloan, 2.11M) that "US immigration policy is a mess. … The equation is simple: The US needs labor; immigrants supply labor. So the solution is to find ways to bring the two together in some legal, orderly way." Melloan adds, "Offering to give illegals green cards and wipe the slate clean is the only practical solution. If they come forward, they can stay on their jobs and travel back and forth to their homes legally. Some who have been trapped in the U.S. by their inability to travel freely will choose to go home permanently. There will be less incentive to sneak in family members, since it will be possible to visit relatives or send remittances."

TAX:

Tax Refund Advances Under Attack. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Opdyke) reports, "A variety of companies are trying to get their hands on your tax refund before you do, and state law-enforcement officials are cracking down on some of the practices." The Journal continues, "As the April tax-filing deadline approaches, businesses from tax-preparation firms to auto dealerships are offering consumers the opportunity to put their expected refund checks to work weeks before the IRS sends them out -- often by loaning them the expected amount for a high fee. Dozens of retailers, including Olive Garden restaurants and AMC move theaters, have begun offering gift cards in exchange for tax refunds to people who file using TurboTax, the popular tax-preparation software. H&R Block Inc. recently launched savings accounts for customers to channel their tax refunds. And hundreds of car dealerships will prepare your taxes if your refund is applied toward a down payment on a car." The Journal adds, "But now, state officials are clamping down on some of these programs, claiming they saddle low and moderate-income families, recent college graduates and others with high fees. Last year about three of every four tax filers received a refund, according to the Internal Revenue Service. Those refunds totaled nearly $218 billion, or about $2,171 per household."

Training Of Pastors On GOTV Activities May Lead To IRS "Crackdown." The New York Times (3/21, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports, "Weeks after the Internal Revenue Service announced a crackdown on political activities by churches and other tax-exempt organizations, a coalition of nonprofit conservative groups is holding training sessions to enlist Pennsylvania pastors in turning out voters for the November elections." The Times adds, "Experts in tax law said the sessions, organized by four groups as the Pennsylvania Pastors Network, could test the promises by the tax agency to step up enforcement of the law that prohibits such activity by exempt organizations. Such a test could define the boundaries for churches and other groups." Although "the tax agency has often overlooked political activity by churches, it has repeatedly warned the clergy and religious groups that it intends to enforce its rules with new vigor this yea."

Justices Reject Former Arkansas Governor's Whitewater Appeal. The AP (3/21, Zeman) reports, "The seven-year, $70 million Whitewater investigation that toppled an Arkansas governor and dogged Bill Clinton for most of his presidency officially drew to a close Monday when the US Supreme Court declined to hear the last remaining appeal." Former Gov. Jim Guy Tucker "had asked the high court to let him withdraw a guilty plea in a tax-conspiracy case that he said was based on an outdated law." Tucker "was accused of crookedly scheming to reduce his tax liability on the sale of cable television system." The Washington Times (3/21, Seper, 90K) also reports the story, saying the Whitewater probe "netted 14 guilty verdicts or pleas."

Overpayment Of Taxes Is Growing Trend. USA Today (3/21, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Taxpayers overpaid their federal income taxes by a record 29% in both 2003 and 2004, according to a USA TODAY analysis of Internal Revenue Service data. That has pushed refunds above $200 billion a year. Final figures aren't in for the 2005 tax year, but the average refund so far is $2,423, up 4% from last year. The fatter refunds are the result of taxpayers withholding nearly twice the traditional safety margin from their paychecks to avoid a year-end tax bill." USA adds, "Overwithholding has grown fastest among families earning $50,000 or less a year because they benefit most from tax credits. Many low-income families obtain refund anticipation loans, which typically cost $100 or more, to get their money about 10 days earlier than from Internal Revenue Service."

DOJ_NMG_0019576

Taxpayer Advocate Is Public's Designated Voice At IRS. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Matthews, 2.11M) profiles National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson. As advocate, "one of her tasks is to tell [IRS Commissioner Mark] Everson what he's doing wrong -- and to take action if, in her view, injustices against taxpayers aren't resolved fairly and quickly." Olson "is the designated 'voice' of the taxpayer within the IRS. Congress created the position in 1998, when the IRS was under criticism for being unyielding and heavy-handed with taxpayers. Ms. Olson was appointed in 2001.'

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Debt Limit Increase Into Law. The A2 (3/21) reports, "With no fanfare, President Bush signed a bill Monday pushing the ceiling on the national debt to nearly $9 trillion." The debt limit increase "was the fourth of Bush's presidency, totaling $3 trillion. With the budget deficit near record levels, an additional increase in the debt limit almost certainly will be required next year."

Bush Signs Bill Increasing Energy Aid To Poor. The AP (3/21) reports, "Federal aid to help the poor cope with energy costs will increase by $1 billion to more than $3 billion this year under legislation President Bush signed on Monday." The $1 billion, "on top of $2.1 billion already allotted for the current budget year, was obtained by transferring money originally intended for the budget year that begins Oct. 1."

Study Finds Fewer Choices In Medicare Drug Plans. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports that an independent study of the Medicare prescription benefit "has concluded that many low-income California seniors now have access to a narrower range of drugs than when the state covered their medications." The program "contains pitfalls for middle-class beneficiaries as well, the report said, because of wide differences in the number of drugs the private Medicare prescription plans cover." Medicare administrator Mark McClellan "took issue with the report's conclusions Monday, saying that many of the medications that plans do not cover have generic equivalents that cost much less and are paid for by the plans."

Education Department Official To Leave Post. The New York Times (3/21, Schemo, 1.19M) reports, "The federal Education Department's top official overseeing colleges and universities has resigned and will become deputy staff director of the House committee on education, the panel announced on Monday." The official, Sally L. Stroup, the assistant secretary for postsecondary education, "said in an interview on Monday that she submitted her resignation last Wednesday and would leave the department in mid-April. 'I've been here four years,' Ms. Stroup said. '"That was long enough.'" The Times adds, "In moving to Capitol Hill, Ms. Stroup will return to her onetime employer, officially known as the Committee on Education and the Workforce, for which she had worked for seven years."

Republicans Make Play For Firefighters' Union. The New York Times (3/21, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "With the election season heating up, the Bush administration and the Republican Party used a good deal of energy and charm on Monday to woo a group that has long been part of the Democrats' base: organized labor." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff; Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska; and the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, "spoke to the annual legislative conference of the main firefighters' union, saying they were eager to work with the union on issues of common ground." The White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., "had been scheduled to speak, but canceled, citing illness." Harold A. Schaitberger, the president of the International Association of Fire Fighters "and the first prominent labor leader to back Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, for president in 2004, voiced the views of an increasing number of union leaders in saying it was important to work with Republicans."

Allen's "Paycheck Penalty" Legislation Unpopular In Congress. The Washington Times (3/21, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Sen. George Allen, testing the 2008 presidential waters while facing his own re-election in the fall, says members of Congress should not get paid if they miss the deadline for passing a federal budget." Allen's "so-called 'paycheck penalty' proposal has piqued the interest of fiscal conservatives, but is unpopular among his colleagues." His "critics call the proposal disingenuous, noting that last week the senator voted to increase the federal debt limit to $9 trillion."

DOJ_NMG_0019577

Jackson Takes Mentoring Next Generation Seriously. The Washington Post (3/21, Blumenfeld, 744K) reports on Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson's mentoring of Jerell Blakeley, a Howard University Student. Jackson, who grew up in Texas as the youngest of 12 children believes his "happy ending is meaningless….unless it is retold through the lives of other young blacks. It is why he reached out to Blakeley and why, on weekends, he is tape-recording his memoirs for his first grandchild. Jackson is a grandfather now and has a story to tell, one that he hopes will cast a spell."

West Texas Eliminated As Possible Site For Bush Library. The Washington Post (3/21, A15, 744K) reports that West Texas has been dropped from consideration as a site for President Bush's Presidential Library. The West Texas Coalition "had proposed a contemporary-style or Spanish Renaissance library on 100 acres west of Texas Tech's Health Science Center and, at Midland College, a Laura Welch Bush Center for Early Literacy." The Post adds, "Still in the running as library sites are Southern Methodist University in Dallas (Laura Bush's alma mater), the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco. Although SMU has little land available for new building, it is perceived to be the favorite because Laura Bush is a member of the board of trustees."

Intelligence Community To Move Toward Common Pay System This Year. The Washington Post (3/21, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The intelligence community…plans to take the first steps this year toward pulling its tens of thousands of employees into a common pay system." The "departments of Homeland Security and Defense have firmed up plans to roll out performance-based pay systems this year. Pay changes also may come to parts of the FBI, such as its new national security branch."

Teacher's Union Official Opposes Bush Adjunct Faculty Proposal. Tom Mooney, president of the Ohio Federation of Teachers, writes in USA Today (3/21, 2.31M), "The Bush administration's proposal to import the concept of adjunct faculty from higher education and apply it to America's high schools is just another quick-fix attempt to avoid tackling the real problems that limit and drain the teaching talent pool. Low pay, poor working conditions and the lack of opportunity for advancement cause too many talented people to take a pass or just pass through. … The president's proposal is unlikely to be helpful, and it could erode the quality of teaching in America's high schools. The last thing secondary education needs is to replicate the extensive use of exploited adjunct faculty that is turning our public colleges and universities into academic sweatshops."

USA Today Makes Case For Proposal. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (3/21, 2.31M), "Teachers' union leaders are resisting a plan by President Bush to build an 'adjunct teacher corps' of 30,000 experienced scientists and mathematicians…to assist in the nation's schools. The union leaders say raising teacher pay and improving working conditions, not bring in outside experts, is the way to enhance math and science teaching." USA adds that "Bush's $25 million adjunct teacher plan, being considered by Congress, could prove invaluable. Some of these volunteer experts might advise teachers and mentor students. … Other scientists might become certified to try teaching as a full-time second career." Teachers "should see them as educational partners, not as a threat to their livelihoods."

Professor Criticizes Feingold Censure Plan. H. W. Brands, a history professor at the University of Texas at Austin, writes in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) that history shows that Sen. Russ Feingold should "move carefully" in his effort to censure President Bush for authorizing wiretaps of Americans without court orders. If Feingold "hopes to discredit Mr. Bush, as he doubtless does, I'd suggest he find means other than censure."

Marcus Criticizes Administration "Manliness." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (3/21, A17, 744K), "I have a new theory about what's behind everything that's wrong with the Bush administration: manliness." In his book "Manliness," Harvard professor Harvey C. Mansfield argues that manliness "seeks and welcomes drama and prefers times of war, conflict, and risk." The manliness of the Bush White House "has a darker side that has proved more curse than advantage. The prime example is the war in Iraq: the administration's assertion of the right to engage in preemptive and unilateral war; the resolute avoidance of debate about the "slam-dunk" intelligence on weapons of mass destruction; the determined lack of introspection or self-doubt about the course of the war; and the swaggering dismissal of dissenting views as the carping of those not on the team." Marcus adds, "What this country could use is a little less manliness -- and a little more of what you would describe as womanly qualities: restraint, introspection, a desire for consensus, maybe even a touch of self-doubt."

DOJ_NMG_0019578

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Low Rates Not Indicative Of Looming Slowdown. USA Today (3/21, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Monday the fact that long-term interest rates have stayed low, even though the central bank has been raising short-term rates since mid-2004, does not indicate a major, looming economic slowdown." But "in a speech to the Economic Club of New York, Bernanke said the reasons for the tame long-term rates, unusual during a period of Fed tightening, are unclear, as are the implications for future policy." USA Today adds, "If low long-term rates signal investor expectations of a slower economy, a Fed response might be to ease short-term rates. If other factors, such as a decline in long-term inflation fears or higher demand, are in play, that would be more stimulative, and the Fed might need a higher short-term rate, he said."

The New York Times (3/21, Porter, 1.19M) reports the Fed chairman said he is "skeptical about the argument that the economy will slow in the near future, a view that many investors may take as a sign that the Fed is not quite near the end of its string of interest rate increases," and the Financial Times (3/21, Balls) runs a similar report under the headline "Bernanke Dismisses Fears Of US Slowdown." The Washington Post (3/21, D3, Henderson, 744K) also reports the story.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/21, Ip, 2.11M) says that "for the first time since Mr. Bernanke became chairman, the Fed's policy-making committee meets Monday and Tuesday. It is expected to raise the funds rate by one-quarter percentage point to 4.75%." It also "is likely to signal a bias to raise rates further, though possibly with less certainty than it has to date."

Leading Indicators Down 0.2% In February. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, McAuley, 2.11M) reports, "A gauge of future economic activity slipped 0.2% in February to 139, according to preliminary estimates by the Conference Board." The group said "its composite index of leading indicators edged down in February after a revised 0.5% increase in January, when the index was originally reported to have increased 1.1%. The February reading for the leading index came in slightly less weak than the -0.3% median estimate of 21 economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires." The index "was equal to 100 in 1996."

US Gasoline Prices Up 14 Cents In One Week; Oil Prices Down. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 8, 0:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "If you are trying to outrun the spring storms and head somewhere warm, it will cost you. Gas prices jumped nearly 14 cents a gallon since last week to just above $2.50 a gallon nationwide. That is the third-biggest weekly jump ever and the highest price ever for the month of March." Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/21, Civils, 2.11M) reports oil prices "plunged Monday," with "benchmark light, sweet crude futures for April, set to expire Tuesday," falling "$2.35, or nearly 4%, to settle at a one-week low of $60.42 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange."

Stock Markets Have Mixed Finish. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 9, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks finished narrowly mixed. The Dow was down just over 5 points on the day [to close at 11,274.53]. The NASDAQ gained nearly 8 points [to close at 2,314.11]." The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Browning, 2.11M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 0.17%, or 2.17 points, to 1305.08, up 4.6% this year."

"Da Vinci Code" Trial Wraps Up In London. The Washington Post (3/21, C1, Sullivan) reports, "The 'Da Vinci Code' copyright infringement trial, which ended in a London courtroom Monday, combined lively peeks into a celebrity author's lifestyle and hours of legal arcana so numbing that they put a white-wigged attorney to sleep within feet of the judge." The Post continues, "Fans of media-shy author Dan Brown learned that his inspiration to write fiction came on a Tahitian vacation when he read Sidney Sheldon's alien-invasion thriller 'The Doomsday Conspiracy.' The next day lawyers were arguing about obscure points of religious history, such as whether and why Pepin the Fat murdered Dagobert II, and what Godefroi de Bouillon was really up to during the First Crusade." The Post adds, "In 12 days of testimony over three weeks, authors Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh tried to prove that Brown stole the idea for his mega-selling novel from a nonfiction book they published in 1982, 'The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail.' Judge Peter Smith, a man so soft-spoken that his words often seemed to have trouble escaping his thick black mustache, said he hoped to issue a ruling by April 8. … At stake is a multimillion-dollar slice of Brown's pie, which includes sales of nearly 40 million books and an upcoming Hollywood film starring Tom Hanks that, if 'Da Vinci's' luck holds, is expected to sell movie tickets and Raisinets from here to the Sea of Tranquillity. (And next week the paperback, a massive 5 million copies, will finally hit U.S. shelves.)"

DOJ_NMG_0019579

Penn Says Swing Voters, Not Base, Key To Election Victories. Mark J. Penn, head of a polling firm that conducted surveys for President Bill Clinton in 1996, writes in the Washington Post (3/21, A17, 744K), "We hear it every day: America is divided into two camps -- red and blue -- and the key to elections is just energizing the base. But in fact, while the base is critical, it's not the whole picture. Behind all the rhetoric, the reality is that swing is still king. The two or three or 10 voters who are the quietest in focus groups, who never demonstrate and who belong to no political party, will be the ones who determine the political course of America. … Recent polls show that rather than a static electorate, we have a dynamically changing one. Based on the polls six months ago, journalists were declaring Republican hegemony. Today, Democrats have the widest margin in two decades on the generic congressional vote."

Gore Says He Has No Plan To Run For President In 2008. The Washington Times (3/21, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Former Vice President Al Gore said yesterday he has no plans to run for president in 2008, but hasn't ruled out a future in politics." However, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/21, Shepard, 430K) reports that "even those who were part of his inner circle in 2000," when Al Gore "lost the White House to George W. Bush in one of the closest and most controversial presidential elections in American history, still don't have a clear idea what the former vice president is thinking in terms of a 2008 campaign. … Speculation about Gore's intentions has intensified in recent weeks due to three events: his Martin Luther King Jr. holiday speech in January lambasting the president for 'breaking the law' with his warrantless domestic surveillance program; his message to Democratic donors in February soliciting funds for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee; and his party fund-raising appearances this month in Florida, the scene of the contentious vote recount that ended with a Supreme Court ruling that made Bush president in the 2000 election." Gore's activities "prompted pollster Lee Miringoff to include Gore in a recent poll on possible Democratic 2008 contenders. It found Gore was second only to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. Clinton was the favorite of 33 percent, Gore was the choice of 17 percent."

Rice Not Applying For NFL Commissioner. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is not applying for the NFL commissioner's job which has recently become open. The AP (3/21) reports, "Rice, who is avid particularly in support of the Cleveland Browns, is enjoying being secretary of state 'at the moment,' spokesman Sean McCormack said. The wiggle-room in his response after NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced he would retire resonated off frequent only half-joking statements by Rice that as a lifelong football fan she aspires to run the league one day."

Dell To Double Its Workforce In India. Dell plans to double its employee strength in India to 20,000. The New York Times (3/21, Rai, 1.19M) reports, "Dell, which is based in Round Rock, Tex., has four call centers in India, where the bulk of its 10,000 employees work, as well as software development and product testing centers." The Times adds, "Salaries in India are rising rapidly, but still are about a fifth of what they are in the West for comparable jobs. … In a market where the penetration of computers is very low, companies such as Dell are eager to set up a manufacturing base to help expand sales. Dell accounts for about four percent of the 4 million computers purchased in India."

Dionne Says Republican Moderates Are Gone. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (3/21, 744K), "Boehlert chose to retire in the year when National Journal, the political world's answer to Sports Illustrated, featured him as the ultimate 'Down the Middle' guy. In its Feb. 25 issue, the magazine published its annual ratings, which showed that Boehlert's votes were more liberal than those of 52.2 percent of House members and more conservative than 47.8 percent." Dionne adds, "I'll miss Boehlert and his optimistic moderation. Our politics worked better when a sufficiently large band of Republican moderates and liberals could take the edge off polarization and orient government toward problem-solving."

DOJ_NMG_0019580

WPost Objects To Ginsburg Insinuations In Making Foreign Law Argument. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/21, 744K) says, "In a speech last month at the Constitutional Court of South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg made some unfair insinuations about critics of the use of foreign law in American courts. Justice Ginsburg was defending what is, in our view, a perfectly defensible proposition: that American courts should 'learn from legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own.' Yet in doing so, she managed to link those who take an opposing view to the legacies of slavery and apartheid and to paint them as 'fuel[ing] the irrational fringe' in its threats against judges." The Post adds, "We agree with Justice Ginsburg and the court majority that American courts need not pretend that foreign courts do not exist. … Justice Ginsburg has a strong case to make without stooping to such insinuations."

US Officials Believe Iran Aiding Al Qaeda. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Meyer, 958K) reports, "US intelligence officials, already focused on Iran's potential for building nuclear weapons, are struggling to solve a more immediate mystery: the murky relationship between the new Tehran leadership and the contingent of Al Qaeda leaders residing in the country. Some officials, citing evidence from highly classified satellite feeds and electronic eavesdropping, believe the Iranian regime is playing host to much of Al Qaeda's remaining brain trust and allowing the senior operatives freedom to communicate and help plan the terrorist network's operations." They also "suggest that new President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may be forging an alliance with Al Qaeda operatives as a way to expand Iran's influence or, at a minimum, that he is looking the other way as Al Qaeda leaders in his country collaborate with their counterparts elsewhere."

Bush Warns Iran He Would Use Military Force To Defend Israel. AFP (3/20) reports, "US President George W. Bush said he hoped to resolve the nuclear dispute with Iran with diplomacy, but warned Tehran he would 'use military might' if necessary to defend Israel." Said Bush, "The threat from Iran is, of course, their stated objective to destroy our strong ally Israel. That's a threat, a serious threat. It's a threat to world peace. … I made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally Israel."

Key Security Council Members Cannot Agree On Tehran Strategy. The Washington Post (3/21, A12, Lynch, 744K) reports Germany and the five permanent members of the UNSC "failed to reach agreement at a meeting Monday on how to respond to the Iranian nuclear crisis but said they would forge ahead in the coming days to break the impasse." While the British representative denied that London has offered a new diplomatic solution, Under Secretary Burns "said the United States is not going to participate in direct negotiations with Iran on the nuclear issue." The Post says the meeting's six-way joint statement resulting "echoed an agreement Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had reached with those five governments in January." The AP (3/21, Lederer, Jahn) reports Britain "is calling for new talks with Iran about its suspect nuclear program but will push for militarily enforceable U.N. Security Council sanctions if those talks do not make progress, according to a letter obtained by The Associated Press." The proposal is angled toward Russia and China, allies of Tehran who staunchly oppose firm Security Council action."

Ahmadinejad Says West Should Apologize. The AP (3/21, Karimi) reports Ahmadinejad yesterday "said the West should apologize to Iran for accusing it of trying to develop a nuclear weapons program and said his country would continue to resist international pressure to halt its nuclear energy program."

Iranian Jews Fear Fallout. The Washington Times (3/21, Bradley, 90K) reports, "Members of Iran's Jewish community fear they are being set up to take the blame if President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's drive to establish a nuclear program ends badly for the country." Members of the "30,000-strong community" say "they already are being viewed as a potential fifth column after a series of speeches in which the firebrand president has spoken of a 'Holocaust myth' and heaped scorn on Europe for its defense of the 'Zionist entity.'"

More Commentary. Jessica T. Matthews, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, writes in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M), "The idea that 'it's too late' to stop Iran's progress toward building nuclear weapons is technologically wrong. 'There's nothing we can do about it' ignores a range of options between economic sanctions, going to war and more of doing nothing. And the argument that "we can learn to live with it" misses the nature of the challenge." A nuclear Iran "is dangerous enough, but this crisis is only proximately about Iran. More important, it is about the likely consequence of an Iranian bomb, namely, that Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Egypt would produce their own bombs, and, thanks to the concomitant international failure to deal with North Korea, the nonproliferation regime would collapse. What is at stake is not a choice between 9 and 10 nuclear weapons states, but a choice between 9 and 30 or more."

DOJ_NMG_0019581

Israel Briefly Reopens Gaza Crossing. The New York Times (3/21, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Israel reopened the main freight crossing to the Gaza Strip on Monday to allow delivery of flour and sugar to the Palestinians. But it abruptly closed the crossing after just a half-hour, citing security threats." The Israeli military "said there were security alerts, but did not provide additional details."

After Rice Meeting, Bahrain Leader Calls On Hamas To Engage Israel. The AP (3/21, Schweid) reports, "An Arab leader said Monday a Hamas-led Palestinian government has no alternative but to deal with Israel. 'They will be obliged to do that because the Palestinians, as a government, deal with Israel,' Crown Prince Salman bin Hamad bin Isa Al-Khalifa of Bahrain told reporters after meeting with Secretary...Rice. 'How can they deal with Israel if they don't recognize Israel?'" The crown prince went on to say, "This is an international Palestinian issue. ... We encourage our Palestinian brothers to be committed to all the agreements they were committed to over all the long years."

Nunn Voices "Serious Concerns" About India Nuclear Deal. The Washington Post (3/21, A9, Kessler, 744K) reports Nuclear Threat Initiative co-chair and former Senate Armed Services Chair Sam Nunn "said yesterday that he has serious concerns the [India nuclear] deal would harm the 'United States' vital interest' in preventing nuclear proliferation and urged Congress to set conditions for its support." The Post calls Nunn's remarks "a setback for the administration's efforts to win approval of" the nuclear pact. Nunn "said he is concerned it would lead to the spread of weapons-grade nuclear material, unleash a regional arms race with China and Pakistan, and make it more difficult for the United States to win support for sanctions against nuclear renegades such as Iran and North Korea." The Post repeats Under Secretary Burns' remarks last week "that congressionally mandated conditions could cause the agreement to unravel. He and other administration officials say the agreement is a groundbreaking achievement that will bring India, which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, into the nonproliferation mainstream, while bolstering U.S.-India ties and adding jobs to the U.S. economy."

NATO Secretary-General Pledges Alliance Force For Darfur. The AP (3/20, Schweid) reports NATO Secretary-General Jaap De Hoop Scheffer told President Bush Monday that "NATO is prepared to support a U.N. force in the Darfur region of Sudan." The AP notes that "Bush has called for greater NATO involvement in Darfur" but "said the African Union must request that its mission in Darfur be converted to a U.N. mission. When that happens, NATO can move in with U.S. help 'to make it clear to the Sudanese government that we're intent upon providing security for the people there and intent upon helping work toward a lasting peace agreement.'" The AP reports Secretary Rice made similar statements after her meeting with De Hoop Scheffer. Assistant Secretary McCormack "issued a statement, meanwhile, criticizing the Sudanese government's closing of several U.S.-supported social development, health and food distribution offices. [He] urged the government in Khartoum to remove immediately all obstacles to delivery of humanitarian assistance and to provide protection for civilians and aid workers."

US Calls For New Belarus Vote. The New York Times (3/21, Chivers, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The United States declared the results of the president election in Belarus invalid on Monday and called for a new race, even as President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko defiantly swept aside criticism and declared himself the winner of a third term." White House spokesman Scott McClellan is quoted saying, "The United States does not accept the results of the election. ... We support the call for a new election." Appearing on state television after official results gave him 83 percent of the vote, "Mr. Lukashenko exuded confidence and said the outcome had 'convincingly demonstrated who the Belarussians are and who is the master of our house.'"

The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Finn, 744K) adds, "The United States will work with the European Union to possibly freeze the foreign assets of Belarussians responsible for electoral fraud or human rights violations." McClellan is quoted saying the campaign "was conducted in a climate of fear. It included arrests and beatings and fraud. We applaud democrats in Belarus for their courage and peaceful stand." Bloomberg (3/21, Neuger) adds, "The Vienna-based Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said about 400 observers found 'substantial empirical evidence' of fraud. The elections were not 'free and fair,' the group said." The Financial Times (3/21, Buckley, Wagstyl, Dombey), Washington Times (3/21, Mainville, 90K), AP (3/21, Danilova) and Christian Science Monitor (3/21, Weir, 61K), among other sources, also report the story.

DOJ_NMG_0019582

WPost Says Russia Prefers Dictatorships In Europe. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/21, A16, 744K) says, "After years of tolerating a dictatorship on their borders, European countries finally are taking measures against Belarus. … All of this might have a decisive impact if not for the countervailing influence of Russia, which still prefers dictatorships in Europe. The Post notes that the G8 Chairman, Russian President Vladimir Putin, "publicly congratulated Mr. Lukashenko yesterday." Putin's policy "is to preserve Russia's domination of its neighbor by backing a dictator who falsifies elections, has murdered leading opponents and enriches himself through arms sales to such countries as Iran and Sudan. That presumably won't stop President Bush and the six other leaders of Western democracies from toasting their G-8 chairman in St. Petersburg this summer. Too bad the national security strategy seems not to extend that far; Mr. Putin's emerging autocracy also deserves some adversaries."

Courted By China, Buffeted By Western Neighbors, Putin Faces New Ascendancy. The AP (3/21, Meyer) reports, "The Kremlin may be reclaiming a dominant role in its former Soviet backyard. In Belarus, Moscow-allied strongman Alexander Lukashenko just won re-election by a landslide — at least by the official count. And President Vladimir Putin's allies could return to government in Sunday's Ukrainian parliamentary election, just over a year after the Orange Revolution. Such developments set back Western hopes of a democratic tidal wave in the former Soviet sphere and could further tarnish Putin's democratic credentials as he tries to cast himself as a statesman capable of brokering deals with Iran and Hamas."

Meanwhile, as Putin arrives in China for "his fifth meeting in under a year with the Chinese president," a separate AP (3/21, Eckel) says, "With China's wealth and might on the ascendancy, Putin's meetings with Chinese President Hu Jintao and other officials are expected to be spectacles of symbolism and overtures to Russia's gigantic neighbor." Hoping to ink a major pipeline deal, "officials in both Moscow and Beijing are looking to spur new investment between the former Cold War adversaries and double last year's $29 billion in trade by 2010." The two Eurasian behemoths "have also moved to deepen political ties following years of Cold War suspicion. Both have pledged commitment to a 'multipolar world' and last year warned other nations against attempts to dominate global affairs and interfere in sovereign nations' domestic matters." The Financial Times (3/21, McGregor, Yeh) reports Putin "arrives in China on Tuesday for a visit that Beijing hopes will secure it a decisive advantage over Japan in their lengthy battle to secure the route of an oil pipeline from east Siberia."

Mexican Government Takes Out Full-Page Ads In US Newspapers. The Dallas Morning News (3/21, Mittelstadt) reports, "Worried by the sometimes harsh tone of the immigration debate unfolding in the US, the Mexican government on Monday took its message directly to the American public: As your neighbor, we want to work with you to fashion a solution. In full-page ads in The New York Times, Washington Post and other newspapers, the Mexican government acknowledged a shared responsibility to address illegal immigration and to stem its citizens' northward exodus by creating more jobs at home." Designed by Dallas-based Allyn & Co., the ad says "the US should allow Mexico to participate in the 'design, management, supervision and evaluation' of a guest worker program that should cover 'the largest possible number of workers and their families' currently in the US illegally."

Proposed Tariffs On Chinese Imports Called "Close To Economic Suicide" For US. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Dean, 2.11M) reports, "Morgan Stanley Chief Economist Stephen S. Roach said Tuesday that a successful move by the US Congress to pass sweeping tariffs on imports from China would be 'close to economic suicide' for the U.S." US Sens. Charles Schumer and Lindsey Graham "have proposed a bill that would impose 27.5% tariffs on all Chinese imports unless Beijing sharply revalues its currency." Roach, "in Beijing for meetings with Chinese officials, told reporters Tuesday that he believes that bill would easily pass in the Senate, and could well pass in the House of Representatives as well." He added the tariffs "would be a 'horrible mistake' that could prompt Beijing to cut back on purchases of US treasuries, leading to a weaker dollar and higher interest rates."

DOJ_NMG_0019583

French Protesters Call For Strikes Next Week. The New York Times (3/21, Smith, 1.19M) reports, "French students and unions stepped up pressure on the government today, calling for more demonstrations culminating in strikes next week to fight a hotly contested new labor law that makes it easier for companies to fire young employees." The protesters "set March 28 as the fourth 'day of action' since street rallies over the new job rules began Feb. 7."

In an editorial titled "The Decline Of France," the Wall Street Journal (3/21, 2.11M) says, "The right to assemble is a pillar of free society. But in France it's the only pillar its citizens seem to take seriously. So much so that any public debate of import gets conducted in the streets rather than through the ballot box or institutions of a purportedly mature democracy. In less enlightened societies, as opposed to the birthplace of the Enlightenment, that's usually called mob rule." But "the violent street demonstrations roiling France's cities today, and the unhappy career prospects of Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin, are the latest symptoms of an ailing democracy."

Danish Emphasis On Retraining Said To Have Cut Jobless Rate In Half. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Walker, 2.11M) reports, "Most of Western Europe is fighting to hold on to its traditionally strong job protections while in some cases cutting jobless benefits, as the region struggles to compete in a globalized economy. Denmark has gone the other way." The government "allows liberal hiring and firing as in the US. And it has imposed limits on the duration of its high unemployment benefits." But "it also invests more than any other country, as a percentage of its gross domestic product, in retraining the jobless -- a combination it calls 'flexicurity.' Its unusual mix of the free market and big government has helped Denmark cut its unemployment rate in half, from about 10% in the early 1990s to U.S.-style levels of under 5% now."

Blair Government Proposes Ban On Secret Loans To Political Parties. The Washington Post (3/21, A9, Jordan, 744K) reports, "The government of Prime Minister Tony Blair on Monday proposed banning secret loans to political parties to try to end a financing scandal blamed for sending Blair's popularity ratings to record lows." Charles Falconer, the cabinet minister in charge of the judiciary, "said he would immediately seek to amend campaign finance laws to force political parties to disclose who lends them money." Blair's Labor Party "said Friday that it had accepted loans worth more than $24 million from unidentified donors. Under British law, political parties must disclose the source of donations, but they do not have to declare the source of loans." Blair "has been badly hurt by recent disclosures that several wealthy businessmen who privately lent money to his campaign were then recommended for seats in the House of Lords, the upper house of Parliament."

Protesters Continue To Demand Thai PM's Resignation. The Washington Post (3/21, A9, Sipress, 744K) reports, "For several weeks, Thai Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra has faced nightly demonstrations demanding his ouster. Tens of thousands of protesters have crowded into the capital, joining ranks with brown-robed monks, Chinese opera performers and tribal children in colorful costumes." The "spectacle" so far "has remained peaceful, though the potential for violence is growing as Thaksin refuses to budge."

Ethiopian Regime Cracks Down On Critics. The Washington Times (3/21, Pisik, 90K) reports, "A climate bordering on fear has taken hold of the Ethiopian capital as journalists, lawyers and politicians carefully measure their public remarks and contacts in the face of widespread arrests and prosecutions." The Times adds "tens of thousands…have been arrested on a variety of charges, according to Amnesty International, most of these stemming from violent political demonstrations in November. Advocates say it is impossible to know how many are still being held." Human Rights Watch "offers anecdotal reports of farmers denied fertilizer and seed because of their political affiliations, nighttime sweeps by federal police and beatings at checkpoints. Most independent newspapers have been shut down."

NYTimes Backs Liberian Request For Taylor's Extradition From Nigeria. The New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) editorializes, "Last week, Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, called for Nigeria to extradite the former president and warlord Charles Taylor to face war crimes charges. Mr. Taylor, who has been living in a Nigerian government guesthouse since 2003, is wanted on a range of charges relating to his decade-long West African rampage, which unleashed campaigns of torture, rape and dismemberment in Ivory Coast and Sierra Leone and on his home turf, Liberia." The Times adds, "In a just world, Mr. Taylor would have already been tried, condemned and sent up the river. … For West Africans, who have endured more than a decade of war, there's no justice without peace."

DOJ_NMG_0019584

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Agent Faults FBI On 9/11."
"Attack Of The Pandas."
"Choices Shrink In Drug Plan, Study Says."
"Welcome To Maywood, Where Roads Open Up For Immigrants."
"Some U.S. Officials Fear Iran Is Helping Al Qaeda."
"As Japanese Bring Work Home, Virus Hitches A Ride."
"Downsizing And In Debt, Idealab Chief Still Pitching."

USA Today:
"US Tax Refunds Break Records."
"Fear Of Flying Can Cripple Workers."
"States Allow Deadly Self-Defense."

New York Times:
"Banker Granted Retrial In A Case From 90's Boom."
"2 Years After Soldier's Death, Family's Battle Is With Army."
"New Business Blooms In Iraq: Terror Insurance."
"NYU And Columbia To Receive $200 Million Gifts For Research."
"Visitors Seek A Taste Of Revolution In Venezuela."
"Airline Workers Are Left At Gate, Mourning A Perk."

Washington Post:
"FBI Was Warned About Moussaoui."
"Conviction Of Ex-Star Banker Tossed Out."
"An Iraq Success Story's Sad New Chapter."
"Overnight Success, Instant Changes At George Mason."
"Conservationists Vie To Buy Forest Habitat."
"Belarus Leader Defiant After Reelection As US, EU Threaten Sanctions."

Washington Times:
"George Mason Basketball Has Finally Arrived."
"Bush Pledges Not To Give In To Insurgents."
"Jews Wary Of Becoming Fall Guy For Iran's Woes."
"US Eyes Privatizing Cargo Security Work."
"DC Schools Salaries Skyrocket."
"Ethiopia Gripped By Harsh Regime."
"Freezing Nuns A Result Of Patriot Act Move."

Detroit Free Press:
"Little Caesars Thinks Huge."
"Hospital To Give Detroit A Shot In Arm."
"As Best Pals, Belbin And Agosto Dance For History."
"Zoo Aid Likely, But On Legislature's Timeline."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"DeKalb Tax Freeze Closer."
"Divorce Wait Bill Likely Dead This Session After House Balks."
"Bush Defends Agenda, Motives."
"Termite Panic Is Much Ado About Nothing."
"NFL Chief Goes Out On Top."

Houston Chronicle:
"Perry Orders Up Evacuation Plan."
"Suspected Killer 'B-Stupid' Arrested."
"FBI Agent Says He Warned His Bosses About Moussaoui."
"DeLay Case May Once Again Face Bias Issue."
"'They Make Him Into Something He Wasn't.'"

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush-Iraq Speech; Iraqi Security Forces; Iraqi Insurgents; Iraqi Divisions; Khalilzad Interview; Military Families; Iraq Retrospective.
CBS: Bush-Iraq Speech; Iraq-US Military Investigations; Iraqi Insurgents; FBI-Moussaoui; Hurricanes-Global Warming; US-Extreme Weather; Smoking Laws-Premium Cigarettes; Tagliabue-Retirement Announcement; Attention Deficit Disorder-Athletes.
NBC: Bush-Iraq Speech; Marines-Shooting Investigation; Iraq-Citizens; Saddam's Cabinet-CIA Contact; FEMA-Relief Payments; Australia-Cyclone; US-Extreme Weather; Gas Prices; Stock Markets; National Anthem-Correct Lyrics Promotion.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Nagin-New Orleans Rebuilding Plan; 2006 Hurricane Season; TX-Roof Collapse; Iraq-Iraqi Police Officers Killed; Bush-Iraq;
CBS: Iraq-Police Officers Killed; Bush-Iraq; Moussaoui Sentencing; World Baseball Classic; Midwest Snowstorm; Wall Street.
NPR: Iraq-Police Officers Killed; Bush-Iraq; Moussaoui Sentencing; Red Cross-Katrina Relief Fraud; Midwest Snowstorm; UN Human Rights Commission-Session

DOJ_NMG_0019585

Canceled; World Baseball Classic; NFL-Tagliabue Retirement.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meet with President Ellen Johnson Sirleaf of the Republic of Liberia; President and Mrs. Bush meet with Iraq and Afghanistan Non-Governmental Organizations. Roosevelt Room.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — Arrives Scott Airforce Base, Illinois, open press; participates in a command briefing by General Schwarz, Commander of TRANSCOM, Building 1900, Scott Air Force Base; delivers remarks on Iraq and the global war on terror at a rally for the troops at Scott Air Force Base. Hangar 1, Scott Air Force Base, IL. Open press.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: SECURITY ISSUES _ American University's Washington College of Law hosts EMININT 2006 (Emerging Issues in National and International Security) to discuss emerging issues in national and international security. Highlights: Location: Room 603, American University's Washington College of Law, 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CHEMICAL SECURITY-CHERTOFF _ 9 a.m. - 10:30 a.m. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff delivers remarks on chemical facility security issues at the The National Chemical Security Forum. With Chris Beck, critical infrastructure specialist, House Committee on Homeland Security; Tim Scott, chief security officer, Dow Chemical; and others. Location: Capital Hilton, 16th and K Sts. NW.

CENSUS-HISPANICS _ 10 a.m. The Census Bureau holds a news conference to release new details on Hispanic-owned businesses. Location: Room 4830, main Commerce.

FEMINISTS-PENNA. SENATE _ 10 a.m. Kim Gandy of NOW PAC and Eleanor Smeal of Feminist Majority PAC will announce what they say is a major move in to mobilize both political resources and grassroots activists in order to make a difference in the Pennsylvania Senate race. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Room.

DEFICIT REDUCTION LAWSUIT _ 10:30 a.m. Public Citizen holds a teleconference to discuss a lawsuit being filed Tuesday that challenges the validity of the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005 on constitutional grounds.The suit, being brought by Public Citizen, says the act is invalid because the bill that President Bush signed was passed by the U.S. Senate but not the U.S. House of Representatives. Bills must be approved by both chambers to become law. Notes: Call-in is 1-800-377-8846, passcode 36707396.. All material is embargoed until 10:30 a.m.

NATIONAL SECURITY-BUSH _ 10:30 a.m. - 12 p.m. The Brookings Institution hosts a discussion on the Bush national security strategy and meeting global challenges. With Carlos Pascual, Vice President and Director, Foreign Policy Studies; Ivo H. Daalder, Senior Fellow, Foreign Policy Studies; Richard A. Falkenrath, Senior Fellow, Foreign Policy Studies; Martin S. Indyk, Senior Fellow and Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy; and Michael E. O'Hanlon Senior Fellow, Foreign Policy Studies. Location: The Saul/Zilkha Room, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

COX _ 12 p.m. The Committee for Economic Development holds a luncheon to release a new report on corporate governance in the wake of Sarbanes-Oxley, with featured speaker SEC Chairman Christopher Cox. Location: Atrium Ballroom, Washington Court Hotel, 525 New Jersey Ave. NW.

LOBBYING REFORM _ 12 p.m. The Cato Institute hosts a briefing, ``Lobby Reform or Retrogression.'' Briefers are Bradley A. Smith, former chairman of the Federal Election Commission and senior adviser to the Center for Competitive Politics; Nan Aron, president, Alliance for Justice; and John Samples, director, Center for Representative Government, Cato Institute. Location: Room B-354, Rayburn House Office Building.

COLLINS-PORTS _ 12:30 p.m. Senator Susan Collins accepts an award from the American Association of Port Authorities in honor of her selection as their ``Port Person of the Year'' for 2006. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

SCIENCE-HEALTH LEADERSHIP FORUM _ 12:45 p.m. - 3:30 p.m. ResearchAmerica holds its 2006 national forum on leadership in science and health in the 21st century. With David Gergen, editor-at-large, U.S. News & World Report; Ralph Cicerone, president, National Academy of Sciences; Arden Bement, Jr., president, National Science Foundation; Carolyn Clancy, MD, director, Agency for Healthcare Research and Quality; Helen Darling, president, National Business Group on Health; Declan Doogan, MD, senior vice president, Pfizer Global Research and Development; Julie L. Gerberding, director, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; John M. Leonard, MD, vice president, Global Pharmaceutical Development, Abbott; Myrl Weinberg, CAE, president, National Health Council; and Elias Zerhouni, MD, director, National Institutes of Health. Location: National Press Club, 14th and F Sts. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0019586

BIRD FLU-ECONOMY _ 6 p.m. The Congressional Budget Office hosts a seminar, ``A Potential Bird Flu Pandemic: Possible Macroeconomic Effects." Participants are Robert W. Arnold, Congressional Budget Office; and Joseph A. Barbera, M.D., co-director of the George Washington University Institute for Crisis, Disaster, and Risk Management. Location: Conference room 483, Congressional Budget Office, 2nd & D Streets SW, 4th Floor.

SIRLEAF-LIBERIA _ 6:30 p.m. - 7:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations hosts a speech by the new president of Liberia, Ellen Johnson Sirleaf. With Princeton Lyman, director of African Studies, Council on Foreign Relations. Location: Council on Foreign Relations, 1779 Massachusetts Ave., NW.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL-TORTURE _ 7 p.m. - 9:30 p.m. Amnesty International holds a public information forum, ``Torture and the War on Terror: What You Should Know and What You Can Do." Speakers include Congressman Moran; Barbara Olshansky, Deputy Legal Director of the Center for Constitutional Rights; and Major Tom Fleener, attorney for Ali Hamza Al Bahlul, a detainee at Guantanamo Bay. Rep. Jim Moran, D-Va., will address what specific actions Congress has taken with regard to U.S. torture policy and what needs to be done legislatively to prevent torture from occurring. Location: Room 329, George Mason University, Arlington Campus, 3401 N. Fairfax Drive, Arlington, Va.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Agent Testifies Senior FBI Officials Repeatedly Dismissed Moussaoui Concerns ... 3
9th Circuit Critical Of DOJ Over Sri Lankan Man's Detention ... 4
Judge Approves Media Release Of Edited Hayat Interview Video ... 4
Bush May Have Mentioned NSA Surveillance Program To Musharraf In 2001 ... 5
Al Qaeda Operative Disrupts Trial In Turkey ... 5

Patriot Act:

Banks Filing More Suspicious Activity Reports Under Patriot Act ... 5

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says DHS Planning Chemical Plant Security Crackdown ... 5
Chertoff Called "A Model Technocrat," But Not "Commanding Leader." ... 5
DHS May Outsource Some Port Security Processes ... 6
Dubai Firm Delays Purchase Of US Military Manufacturer ... 6
FEMA Seeking Return Of Disaster Relief Funds From 51,000 Families ... 6

War News:

Bush Sounds Upbeat Message On US Progress In Iraq ... 7
Gunmen Attack Iraqi Police Station Killing 15 Police Officers ... 9
Iraqis Said To Have Contradictory Emotions On Third Anniversary Of US Invasion ... 10
Lawmakers Create Independent Panel To Study Iraq Alternatives ... 10
US Military Investigating Two Incidents Involving Civilian Deaths ... 10
Saddam's Foreign Minister Was CIA Informant ... 11
Father Went To Iraq Seeking Revenge For Son's Death ... 11
At Least 120,000 Children In Military Families Have Parent In Iraq ... 11
US Closely Watching Trial Of Afghan Christian ... 11
Van Hollen Argues Against Troop Withdrawal From Afghanistan ... 11
Army Conducting Criminal Investigation Of Tillman Shooting ... 11

DOJ:

Gonzales' Taco Bell Visit Noted ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

2nd Circuit Panel Tosses Quattrone Conviction ... 12
Former Enron Auditors Testify On Charges, Reserve Accounts ... 13
Former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Found Liable For Securities Fraud ... 13
"Chicago" Suit Hits Movie Industry Accounting Practices ... 13

Criminal Law:

Star Witness At "Mafia Cops" Trial Recalls Government Pressure To Cooperate ... 14
Pellicano Asks To Represent Himself As Defense Lawyer Challenges FBI Search ... 14
Jury Hears FBI Tapes During Informant's Testimony At Baltimore Police Corruption Trial ... 14
Eight More Indicted In California Red Cross Katrina Aid Fraud Scheme ... 14
Federal Scrutiny Of Chicago Hiring Practices Goes Back At Least Nine Years ... 15
US Attorney Challenges Campbell Lawyer's Criticism Of Investigation ... 15
Philadelphia Council Members Reluctant To Call For Mariano's Resignation ... 15
Eight Former Southwest Airlines Employees Charged In Embezzlement Scheme ... 15
California Developer Sentenced To Prison For Real Estate Fraud ... 15
Maryland Man Sentenced To Six Years For Child Porn Possession ... 16
FBI Arrests Senior Pentagon IT Employee On Child Porn Charges ... 16
Former East St Louis Police Chief Sentenced ... 16
Guatemalan Pleads Guilty To DC Hit Man Plot ... 16
SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Pollard Appeal ... 16
High Court Appears To Side Against Prosecutors' Use Of Victims' Words ... 16
Former Philippine President Says US Tapped His Calls With Aragoncillo ... 17
California Sex Assault Case Shifts To Civil Courtroom ... 17
States Move To Pass "Stand Your Ground" Bills ... 17

Civil Law:

RJ Reynolds Tries To Evade Chicago Smoking Ban ... 17
NYTimes Calls Court Ruling "Partial Victory" For Google ... 17

Civil Rights:
Judge Sentences Two Cuban Human Smugglers To Maximum 10-Year Sentences ... 18
Attorney Charges Cover-Up In Florida Boot Camp Death ... 18
California Prisons Prepare For Desegregation Policy ... 18
Consumers Group Challenges Geico's Risk Criteria ... 19

Antitrust:
Online Poll Shows Small-Business Opposition To AT&T-BellSouth Merger ... 19
Proxy Adviser Backs Boston Scientific-Guidant Deal ... 19
Lucent Gets FTC Nod To Purchase Riverstone Operations ... 19
Analysts Expect Counter-Bid For UK Insurer Prudential ... 19
Belgium Seeks Concessions On GDF-Suez Deal ... 20
FCC Deregulates Verizon's Big-Business Market ... 20
Kerzner Takes $3 Billion Buyout Offer ... 20
France Copyright Proposal Would Open Up iTunes ... 21
Supreme Court To Hear Patent Case ... 21

Environment:
Kerr-McGee Suit Disputes Federal Oil Royalties ... 21
US Expects Bird Flu This Year ... 22
Scientists Oppose Removing ESA Protections For Yellowstone Grizzly ... 22
Conservationists Move To Buy Timber Company Holdings ... 22
NYTimes Calls Administration Record On Mine Safety "Embarrassing." ... 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Two Sentinel Subcontractors Criticized In GAO Trilogy Audit ... 22
ATF Team To Target Violence In Atlanta, Other Cities ... 23
Gonzales Targets Georgia Meth Production ... 23
Former Baton Rouge Police Officer Charged With Cocaine Possession ... 23
Accused "Chief" Cocaine Trafficker Appears In Colorado Court ... 23
NBA Player's Dismissal Upheld For Violating Drug Policy ... 24
Bolivia Takes Coca Debate To UN ... 24
Government Accused Of Being Willfully Blind To Canada's Marijuana Problem ... 24
Former German Track Coach Convicted Of Doping Athletes ... 24

Immigration:
Melloan Says Illegal Aliens Should Be Given Green Cards ... 24

Tax:
Tax Refund Advances Under Attack ... 24
Training Of Pastors On GOTV Activities May Lead To IRS "Crackdown." ... 25
Justices Reject Former Arkansas Governor's Whitewater Appeal ... 25
Overpayment Of Taxes Is Growing Trend ... 25

Congress-Administration:
Bush Signs Debt Limit Increase Into Law ... 25
Bush Signs Bill Increasing Energy Aid To Poor ... 25
Study Finds Fewer Choices In Medicare Drug Plans ... 25
Education Department Official To Leave Post ... 25
Republicans Make Play For Firefighters' Union ... 26
Allen's "Paycheck Penalty" Legislation Unpopular In Congress ... 26
Jackson Takes Mentoring Next Generation Seriously ... 26
West Texas Eliminated As Possible Site For Bush Library ... 26
Intelligence Community To Move Toward Common Pay System This Year ... 26
Teacher's Union Official Opposes Bush Adjunct Faculty Proposal ... 26
Professor Criticizes Feingold Censure Plan ... 27
Marcus Criticizes Administration "Manliness." ... 27

Other News:
Bernanke Says Low Rates Not Indicative Of Looming Slowdown ... 27
"Da Vinci Code" Trial Wraps Up In London ... 27
Penn Says Swing Voters, Not Base, Key To Election Victories ... 28
Gore Says He Has No Plan To Run For President In 2008 ... 28
Rice Not Applying For NFL Commissioner ... 28
Dell To Double Its Workforce In India ... 28
Dionne Says Republican Moderates Are Gone ... 28
WPost Objects To Ginsburg Insinuations In Making Foreign Law Argument ... 29
US Officials Believe Iran Aiding Al Qaeda ... 29
Israel Briefly Reopens Gaza Crossing ... 29
Nunn Voices "Serious Concerns" About India Nuclear Deal ... 30
NATO Secretary-General Pledges Alliance Force For Darfur ... 30
US Calls For New Belarus Vote ... 30
Courted By China, Buffeted By Western Neighbors, Putin Faces New Ascendancy ... 31
Mexican Government Takes Out Full-Page Ads In US Newspapers ... 31
Proposed Tariffs On Chinese Imports Called "Close To Economic Suicide" For US ... 31
French Protesters Call For Strikes Next Week ... 31
Danish Emphasis On Retraining Said To Have Cut Jobless Rate In Half ... 31
Blair Government Proposes Ban On Secret Loans To Political Parties ... 32
Protesters Continue To Demand Thai PM's Resignation ... 32
Ethiopian Regime Cracks Down On Critics ... 32
NYTimes Backs Liberian Request For Taylor's Extradition From Nigeria ... 32

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 32

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington ... 33

DOJ_NMG_0019589

TERRORISM NEWS:

Agent Testifies Senior FBI Officials Repeatedly Dismissed Moussaoui Concerns. At the penalty phase of al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussoui's trial on Monday, defense lawyer Edward MacMahon cross-examined Minneapolis FBI Special Agent Harry Samit, who arrested Moussaoui in August 2001 and – as he testified earlier for the government on March 9 and yesterday in greater detail – unsuccessfully sought approval from FBI headquarters for a warrant to search Moussaoui's computer and belongings because Samit believed he was a terrorist who wanted to use an airliner for an attack in the US. Samit's testimony receives heavy print press coverage which emphasizes his contention, as the AP (3/21, Sniffen) puts it, "'criminal negligence' by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks."

The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 4, 2:30, Schieffer, 7.66M) was the only network which covered the testimony, noting it was "an embarrassment a day for the Federal Government." CBS (Stewart) added Samit "was supposed to be the government's star witness," but he "accused his own headquarters of 'criminal negligence' for not investigating Moussaoui hard enough. And that failure, he testified, directly prevented 'a serious opportunity to stop the 9/11 attacks and save innocent lives.'" Samit "blamed the lack of action on careerism within the bureau."

Under the headline "FBI Witness In Moussaoui Trial Faults Superiors," The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Serrano, 958K) adds that "Samit also said his superiors did not share other critical counterterrorism intelligence with him, such as a memo from the FBI's Phoenix office about suspected terrorists taking flight lessons and a briefing for President Bush citing intelligence that planes might be hijacked. … His testimony undermined the prosecution's argument for sentencing Moussaoui to death, even though he was in jail for overstaying his visa at the time of the attacks."

The New York Times (3/21, Lewis, 1.19M) notes, under the headline "F.B.I. Discounted Suspicions About Moussaoui, Agent Says," Samit "said that two senior agents declined to provide help in getting a search warrant, either through" the FISA court "or through a normal application to any federal court for a criminal investigation," and his testimony "appeared to provide a lift for the defense."

Under the headline "FBI Was Warned About Moussaoui," The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) adds that Samit "warned his supervisors more than 70 times that Moussaoui was a terrorist and spelled out his suspicions that the al-Qaeda operative was plotting to hijack an airplane." His "testimony added striking detail to the voluminous public record on the FBI's bungling of the Moussaoui case. It also could help Moussaoui's defense."

USA Today (3/21, 3A, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Samit's FBI superiors at the time did not believe he had enough evidence to support a warrant for either a criminal or intelligence investigation," the Patriot Act "has made it easier for federal authorities to obtain such warrants in terrorism investigations."

The AP (3/21) reports, "The FBI agent who arrested Zacarias Moussaoui in August 2001 testified Monday that he spent almost four weeks trying to warn U.S. officials about the radical Islamic student pilot but that 'criminal negligence' by superiors in Washington thwarted a chance to stop the 9/11 attacks." The AP continues, "FBI Agent Harry Samit of Minneapolis originally testified as a government witness on March 9, but his daylong cross examination by defense attorney Edward MacMahon was the strongest moment yet for the court-appointed lawyers defending Mr. Moussaoui. The Frenchman of Moroccan descent is the only person charged in this country in connection with al-Qaeda's Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon." The AP adds, "Mr. MacMahon displayed a communication addressed to Agent Samit and FBI headquarters Agent Mike Maltbie from a bureau agent in Paris relaying word from French intelligence that Mr. Moussaoui, 37, was 'very dangerous,' had been indoctrinated in radical Islamic fundamentalism at London's Finsbury Park mosque, was 'completely devoted' to a variety of radical fundamentalism that Osama bin Laden espoused, and had been to Afghanistan. … The communication arrived Aug. 30, 2001. The Sept. 11 commission reported that British intelligence told U.S. officials on Sept. 13, 2001, that Mr. Moussaoui had attended an al-Qaeda camp in Afghanistan. 'Had this information been available in late August 2001, the Moussaoui case would almost certainly have received intense, high-level attention,' the commission concluded. … But Agent Samit told Mr. MacMahon he couldn't persuade FBI headquarters or the Justice Department to take his fears seriously. No one from Washington called Agent Samit to say this intelligence altered the picture the agent had been painting since Aug. 18 in a running battle with Agent Maltbie and Agent Maltbie's boss, David Frasca, chief of the radical fundamentalist unit at headquarters. … They fought over Agent Samit's desire for a warrant to search Mr. Moussaoui's computer and belongings."

The Long Island Newsday (3/21, Riley) reports, "Prosecutors are trying to show that Moussaoui should get the death penalty because his lies prevented agents from thwarting the Sept. 11 attacks, while Moussaoui says he knew no details of the plot. Defense lawyer Edward MacMahon spent his five-hour cross-examination trying to show that the FBI's failure to act on Samit's instincts was to blame. … 'Your investigation here was to uncover the facts that Moussaoui was in fact a terrorist ... and you uncovered those facts didn't you?' MacMahon asked. 'I uncovered enough facts to generate suspicion in my mind that he was a terrorist," Samit said, "But that's a far distance from being able to prove it.'"

Martin's Actions Cast Doubt On Death Penalty Push. The Legal Times (3/21, Kelley, Mclure) reports, "Almost from the beginning, the goal was clear: Zacarias Moussaoui must die. … This was the government's first, and likely only, chance to prosecute a suspect in the Sept. 11 plot in a U.S. court. And from the start, doing so would present a monumental challenge to federal prosecutors. With the world watching, the pressure would be enormous." The Times continues, "Pursuing a death sentence meant raising the stakes in what already was considered the highest-profile criminal case ever in the United States. For the team of three federal prosecutors it meant facing an unprecedented task: convincing a jury that Moussaoui should be executed even though -- by their own admission -- he wasn't directly involved in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. … The government's decision to seek death was scrutinized from the outset and continued to be so even after Moussaoui pleaded guilty, in April 2005, to participating in a conspiracy to commit acts of terrorism in the United States. But last week it became clear just how precarious the argument for death was. The government's case was in jeopardy of crumbling midway through the penalty phase of the trial after Transportation Security Administration lawyer Carla Martin allegedly tampered with government witnesses."

9th Circuit Critical Of DOJ Over Sri Lankan Man's Detention. The California Recorder (3/21, Scheck) reports, "Ahilan Nadarajah was detained as a terrorism suspect for nearly five years before he got to argue his case before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It only took a three-judge panel 10 days to order his release." The Recorder continues, "In a unanimous decision Friday, Judge Sidney Thomas wrote that federal immigration officials can't detain an asylum seeker indefinitely after an immigration court orders his release. Thomas wrote that the government's interpretation that a Supreme Court opinion allowed indefinite detention was 'patently absurd.' … 'The general immigration detention statutes do not authorize the Attorney General to incarcerate detainees for an indefinite period,' Thomas wrote. He was joined by Judge Richard Tallman and Senior U.S. District Judge James Fitzgerald of the District of Alaska, who sat by designation." The Recorder adds, "Nadarajah's lawyer, Ahilan Arulanantham of the ACLU Foundation of Southern California, argued the case to the panel on March 7, and asked the judges to rule quickly, given the long detention at issue. … Immigration and appeals courts found that Nadarajah had been beaten, burned and hung upside down, his head submersed in gasoline, by Sri Lankan authorities. … But the Justice Department insisted that Nadarajah was a member of the rebel Tamil Tigers, which it classifies as a terrorist group. And after missing two hearings, a Department of Homeland Security agent appeared in an immigration court to provide evidence of Nadarajah's terrorist links."

Judge Approves Media Release Of Edited Hayat Interview Video. The AP (3/21, Thompson) reports U.S. District Court Judge Garland Burrell Jr., presiding over the Umer and Hamid Hayat trial, "approved releasing an edited version of their videotaped FBI interviews on Monday," over the objections of defense attorneys. "Edited out of the videotapes to be released will be mentions of two Islamic religious leaders who were deported to Pakistan last year and segments in which Umer Hayat speculates that four Lodi men could be preparing to commit terrorist acts." The AP notes, "Oakland television station KTVU sought release of the tapes" and was joined by "NBC and ABC affiliates in Los Angeles, San Diego and Sacramento." KXTV-TV Sacramento (3/20, Bishop) also reports on the ruling and notes that the station, which was part of the lawsuit, will air the videos and post them to its Web site.

Convenience Store Clerk Turned FBI Informant Is Central US Witness. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Tempest, 958K) runs a profile of FBI informant Naseem Khan. "The picture of Khan that emerges from interviews with friends, co-workers and landlords in Bend…is of a quiet, hard-working, mostly solitary young man with an interest in law enforcement. … Last week, he shocked the Sacramento courtroom when he said he saw" Ayman al Zawahri at the Lodi mosque, and "he is expected to take the stand today for the first time since he made that claim, which terrorism experts discount as highly improbable." The Times goes on to detail Khan's recruitment and surveillance in Lodi, noting he "was first approached by FBI agents…after someone reported him as a possible terrorism suspect," but "quickly cleared of those suspicions, the $7-an-hour manager of the K Market convenience store was hired by the FBI…and was paid more than $200,000 in salary and expenses for his three-year undercover assignment."

Hayat Defense Is First Major Case For Young Afghan Immigrant. In a flattering profile of Hayat defense lawyer Wazhma Mojaddidi – who is only 18 months out of law school – the AP (3/21, Thompson) reports, "Despite her inexperience, Mojaddidi has stood her ground. She sparred with the prosecution's expert on Islamic religion and law" and "challenged an FBI linguist about the significance of news articles praising" bin Laden and the Taliban. "The case represents a leap for Mojaddidi, who previously was using her command of Urdu, Farsi and Pashto to help immigrants with family law cases." In an AP interview, "she described her family's flight from Afghanistan when was 5, what she described as a middle-of-the-night escape into Pakistan in 1979 after the Russian invasion."

DOJ_NMG_0019591

Bush May Have Mentioned NSA Surveillance Program To Musharraf In 2001. The Washington Post (3/21, A15, Eggen, 744K) reports "a brief passage" in Bob Woodward's book "Bush at War" raises the possibility that President Bush may have mentioned "the government's secret warrantless surveillance program to the president of Pakistan more than four years ago." Woodward "recounts a meeting between Bush and Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf at the Waldorf Towers in New York in early November 2001." On page 303, Woodward wrote, "He had become fascinated with the ability of the National Security Agency to intercept phone calls and other communications worldwide. If they got the key phone calls, future terrorism might be stopped, certainly curtailed. Bush summarized his strategy: 'Listen to every phone call and close them down and protect the innocents.'"

Al Qaeda Operative Disrupts Trial In Turkey. The Washington Post (3/21, A11, Vick, 744K) reports Louai al-Sakka, the "al-Qaeda operative accused of organizing the 2003 Istanbul bombings and a botched attempt to sink an Israeli cruise ship appeared in a Turkish courtroom on Monday -- and did his best to take it over." Al-Sakka, "who by his own account worked beside insurgent leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Iraq, first told the court he was someone else, then was hustled out of the morning session after refusing to stand to address the judge." Sakka shouted, "I performed jihad and killed Americans! Why should I stand up in front of you? Should I stand in front of these liars?" The Post adds Sakka, "a Syrian described by Turkish officials as a senior figure in al-Qaeda, is accused of providing other operatives with about $170,000 from the group to carry out four truck bombings that killed 57 people over two days in November 2003."

PATRIOT ACT:

Banks Filing More Suspicious Activity Reports Under Patriot Act. The Washington Times (3/21, Haberkorn, 90K) reports that after the Holy Name Monastery of the Benedictine Sisters' bank account was frozen last year "because one of the account's signatories -- an 80-year-old nun -- didn't have an identification card on file," Sister Jean Abbott said that the bank blamed the USA Patriot Act "for the account freeze." The Times continues, "The number of suspicious transactions that financial institutions are reporting to the government has nearly tripled since the Patriot Act was passed in 2001." However, "The average consumer 'should not be concerned as long as the transactions they're doing are legit,' said Anne Marie Kelly, a spokeswoman for the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, the Treasury Department bureau responsible for administering the Bank Secrecy Act."

Librarians, Civil Libertarians Remain Skeptical Of Patriot Act Safeguards. The New York Times (3/21, Cowan, 1.19M) reports, "Lawmakers may be giving themselves credit for having improved safeguards on civil liberties when they reauthorized" the Patriot Act, but "many librarians and civil liberties lawyers say the revisions did nothing to enable the guest of honor" at a January American Library Association meeting in Texas "to take the stage and discuss the Patriot Act without risk of prosecution. Known as John Doe in court filings, the guest of honor was the Connecticut librarian who was visited by the Federal Bureau of Investigation last year and presented with…a national security letter demanding patron records." The Times notes, "The section of the new law that addresses 'privacy protection for library patrons' states that library records are beyond the reach of national security letters so long as the library is not operating as an 'electronic communication service.' … But much of what a modern library does courses through its computers."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says DHS Planning Chemical Plant Security Crackdown. The AP (3/21, Jordan) reports, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Monday his department will crack down on chemical manufacturers and storage facilities that he described as 'free riders' — those that haven't beefed up their security measures." Meanwhile, "Legislation is pending in the Senate to authorize Homeland Security to shut down facilities that do not comply with minimum safety standards. … Chertoff has not endorsed the plan, but he is expected on Tuesday to outline elements that he said would need to be in acceptable legislation."

The Wall Street Journal (3/21, A4, Block, 2.11M) reports that in a preview of today's remarks to the American Chemical Council, Chertoff told an audience at the Heritage Foundation that "chemical plants and, in fact, transportation of chemicals, remains a vulnerability. Progress on this has stalled for too long. We do need legislation and congressional action and leadership on this point,'" said Chertoff. "Chris VandenHeuvel, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, said he expects Mr. Chertoff will say legislation must give his department authority to work with the industry to set minimum security standards."

Chertoff Called "A Model Technocrat," But Not "Commanding Leader." Dana Milbank, in his "Washington Sketch" column for the Washington Post (3/21, A2, 744K) writes that a year after taking the job, Homeland

DOJ_NMG_0019592

Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "is getting much of the blame for the woeful Hurricane Katrina response, insufficient supervision of the Dubai port deal and domestic defenses that remain, by most accounts, unacceptably weak." Milbank writes that Chertoff is not "incompetent. … His problem, if anything, is he's a model technocrat in a position that sometimes demands a commanding leader." In a speech at the Heritage Foundation yesterday, rather than "telling people that he's protecting them," Chertoff said "that his department has 'done a lot to elevate the general baseline of security in this country.'" Milbank adds, "These kinds of statements…make the wiry Chertoff a big target for those building a case that the administration is lax about homeland security."

DHS May Outsource Some Port Security Processes. The Washington Times (3/21, Hudson, 90K) reports, "Homeland Security officials are looking to have private companies validate the security procedures under which cargo travels from foreign ports into US terminals." The Customs-Trade Partnership Against Terrorism "is now in the hands of 80 Homeland Security inspectors who have to plow through more than 10,000 applicants." DHS "is looking to outsource to private companies some of its duties, in particular the validation process, which has dragged for years and involves on-site inspections of ships and cargo abroad." Meanwhile, "Peter Tirschwell, publisher of the Journal of Commerce, called the Homeland Security idea an 'outsourcing of security.'"

Dubai Firm Delays Purchase Of US Military Manufacturer. The New York Times/Bloomberg News (3/21) the Dubai government "delayed its $1.2 billion purchase of a military equipment maker yesterday, the second time in a month that a takeover by the Middle East emirate has been jeopardized by American security concerns." Dubai International Capital "said that it would delay its acquisition of the Doncasters Group, a British company that has nine plants in the United States, by as much as two months from March 31 while government agencies review the purchase."

DPW "Debacle" Could Trigger Decline In Value Of Dollar. In a Washington Times op-ed (3/21), Michael R. Czinkota of Georgetown University says that while the Dubai Ports World deal debacle "appears to be over," there "may be significant long-term consequences for currency values and trade practices." What "appears to be not yet widely understood are the potential effects that these and similar policy decisions (such as the Unocal walk-away by China) can have on the value of global currencies and on trade flows. Congress' law of unintended consequences may strike again: The short-term direct effects of this action are likely to be far outweighed by the long-run indirect effects." It "does appear that in addition to growing international competitiveness of U.S. firms, changes in the value of the U.S. dollar are needed to reverse the astounding trade imbalances. The Dubai withdrawal may well be the watershed that triggers shifts in exchange rates now. The congressional debate, the national posture and the global repercussions may well form the basis of new Plaza Agreement-type conditions, which will gradually drive down the value of the dollar for the long term."

FEMA Seeking Return Of Disaster Relief Funds From 51,000 Families. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 5, 2:15, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "Nearly $7 billion in direct relief was handed out last year to 1.7 million households, and now FEMA says some who got that aid didn't deserve it and they're trying to get that money back." NBC (Ellis) added FEMA says, "based on an audit…2% to 3% of households that got relief money probably didn't deserve it. And now FEMA is sending out this letter to about 51,000 families asking for the money back, up to $100 million." Marty Bahamonde, FEMA: "If we err on the side of helping people and have to ask for it back later, that's what we're doing now." Ellis: "Authorities say this kind of thing has happened before but never in this magnitude." The Government Accountability Office "alleges fraud for one thing. Thousands submitted duplicate or false Social Security numbers and in other cases, relief money was paid twice to the same family. But the GAO says FEMA is also to blame" because it did not have fraud prevention controls in place.

House Panel To Investigate Post-Katrina Contracts. The Government Accountability Office said last week that millions of dollars had been wasted in post-Katrina hurricane contracts and the Washington Post reported yesterday that contractors profits are resulting in overpriced cleanup work. In an article appearing on no less than 59 news websites, the AP (3/21) reports that the House Government Reform Committee "said Monday it would review several post-Katrina hurricane contracts for waste and abuse, citing recent concerns about limited oversight and the haste in which they were awarded." The committee "will hold at least one hearing in April, said Robert White, a spokesman for chairman Tom Davis, R-Va. Witnesses and the specific contracts that will be scrutinized have yet to be determined, he said."

Nagin Endorses Plan To Allow Rebuilding In All Neighborhoods. The Washington Post/AP (3/21, A3) reports New Orleans Mayor C. Ray Nagin endorsed a rebuilding plan Monday "that would allow all residents to rebuild their homes in neighborhoods shattered by Hurricane Katrina." Nagin, who is running for reelection on April 22, "distanced himself" from a plan recommended by his advisory commission in January "that some flooded neighborhoods be replaced with parks and that the city take a go-slow attitude in rebuilding low-lying areas." However, Nagin "warned that homeowners in flood-prone areas would do so at their own risk."

DOJ_NMG_0019593

Officials Say More Bodies May Be Found In New Orleans. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Simmons, 958K) reports that in New Orleans, "Eight bodies have been found since March 1, and with about 1,400 people still unaccounted for, Louisiana state officials said they could not rule out the possibility of finding others. Until recently, recovery teams were unable to retrieve bodies from the neighborhoods that were rendered uninhabitable and designated off-limits to residents." The Times notes that the task of "alerting families when a deceased relative had been identified, and then alerting families" moved from the federal government's Disaster Mortuary Operational Response Team to the Orleans Parish coroner's office in early March.

New Orleans Says It Will Need Federal Help Evacuating Residents. USA Today (3/21, Konigsmark, Hall, 2.31M) reports that New Orleans "doesn't have an emergency shelter," and with the approach of hurricane season, "local officials are asking for federal help to get people out of harm's way if another disaster strikes." Terry Ebbert, the city's director of homeland security "said he fears that without federal help, citizens could be stranded in the city with nowhere to go." He "sent written requests for help recently to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff and R. David Paulison, the acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, both of whom he criticized for not reacting quickly enough. 'The silence has been deafening,' Ebbert said." However, DHS Undersecretary for Preparedness George Foresman "and FEMA will be in the region this week to get a 'clear, blunt assessment' of what's needed, Chertoff said Monday."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Sounds Upbeat Message On US Progress In Iraq. On the third anniversary of the start of the Iraq war, President Bush delivered a speech at the Cleveland City Club to highlight successes in the effort to combat the insurgency in Iraq. Bush cited the example of Tal Afar, an insurgent stronghold that was liberated by a joint US-Iraqi force. Many reports this morning note the President's comments about the "horrific violence" in Iraq, and its effect on Americans' morale. The Akron Beacon Journal (3/21, Chancellor, Abraham, 148K) reports Bush "said more days of sacrifice and fighting are ahead, but he predicted that freedom would prevail, in the same way that Germany and Japan were turned into democracies after World War II." He also "said a democratic Iraq would one day serve as an inspiration for freedom throughout the Middle East." Much of the media coverage of the speech is largely negative, with most stories citing sagging poll numbers for the Iraq mission. Many also report Bush was challenged by skeptical audience members on Iraq as well as other issues, such as the National Security Agency's domestic intelligence program.

Typical of the tenor of the reporting is the AP (3/21, Raum), which says that "beginning the fourth year of an unpopular war…Bush defended his Iraq record…against skeptical questioning." He "said he could 'understand people being disheartened'" but "appealed to Americans to look beyond the bloodshed and see signs of progress." Bush "fielded questions for nearly an hour at the City Club, a forum known for its tough interrogations of world leaders. Not only was he grilled on Iraq, but he also was asked to justify his warrantless wiretapping program, US relations with Pakistan and his domestic priorities."

Under the headline "Old Forecasts Come Back To Haunt Bush," the Washington Post (3/21, A14, VandeHei, 744K) runs a front-page story reporting, "Three years of upbeat White House assessments about Iraq that turned out to be premature, incomplete or plain wrong are complicating…Bush's efforts to restore public faith in the military operation and his presidency, according to pollsters and Republican lawmakers and strategists." The Post adds, "The last two weeks have provided a snapshot of White House optimism that skeptics contend is at odds with the facts on the ground in Iraq. … Pollsters and some congressional Republicans said the administration's sunny-side-up appraisals, instead of lifting the public mood, may now complicate the task of sustaining support for a long-term military commitment in Iraq. The loss of trust, they said, is affecting Bush's presidency more broadly, as polls show his public support at a nadir."

The story was reported on each of the networks. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, lead story, 1:35, Vargas, 8.78M) reported President Bush "used today's anniversary to send an optimistic message on Iraq. Public support for the war has fallen sharply in the last three years," and Bush said, "this is partly because reporters have missed stories of progress, while covering conflict." President Bush: "Others look at the violence they see each night on their television screens. And they wonder how I can remain so optimistic, about the prospects of success in Iraq. They wonder what I see that they don't."

The CBS Evening News (3/20, lead story, 2:45, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported that in a "new tactic designed to win over skeptics…Bush acknowledged what he called horrific violence in Iraq." President Bush: "And in the face of continued reports about killings and reprisals, I understand how some Americans have had their confidence shaken." Axelrod Bush then "pointed to Tal Afar as a model for how he intends to secure the rest of Iraq, describing the city of 200,000 as an example of a strategy called 'clear, hold and build.' Clear out the terrorists, hold the city with Iraqi forces, and build its economy and government."

DOJ_NMG_0019594

NBC Nightly News (3/20, lead story, 4:45, O'Donnell, 9.87M) said Bush "provided unusual detail, a 20-minute explanation of how one northern Iraqi town struggled with US help to break from terrorist control." President Bush: "It came only after much trial and error. It took time to understand and adjust to the brutality of the enemy in Iraq." Questions "were not screened in advance. Two of 11 clearly supported the President." But others "sharply challenged Mr. Bush on issues including the mounting cost of the conflict, the President's warrantless spy program, and the rationale for war."

Knight Ridder (3/21, Hutcheson), meanwhile, says Bush "got an earful from skeptics who questioned his motives and his credibility." Bush "seemed taken aback when the first questioner asked him whether he views the conflict in biblical terms, as an apocalyptic struggle for the Middle East. Some of the president's critics have speculated that his Christianity and a wish to protect the Holy Land are behind his desire to transform the Middle East. 'The answer is, I haven't really thought of it that way,' he replied. 'First I've heard of that, by the way. I guess I'm more of a practical fella.'"

USA Today (3/21, Jackson, 2.31M) says Bush "has opened himself up to audience questions more frequently in recent months, starting with a December speech on Iraq before the Philadelphia World Affairs Council. Last week, he took critical questions on his prescription-drug program at a senior citizens center in Maryland." Bush "clearly enjoys the repartee." Adam Levine, a former Bush assistant press secretary, "says the president is 'at his best' in a give-and-take. More important, this lets him bypass the media."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Blitzer) reported Bush "tried again to sound upbeat about the situation in Iraq, despite dwindling public support for the mission and for him." CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Quijano) later said the President's appearance "was really part of the renewed push by the administration to shape public opinion on Iraq." The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Gerstenzang, 958K) says Bush's recent speeches on Iraq "reflect a two-fold campaign: To lower expectations and at the same time hold out prospects for a successful outcome. Unless pressed by a questioner, the president makes no mention any more of one of the original reasons for the invasion: the suspicion that Hussein was developing unconventional weapons. No evidence of such a program has been found." Rather, "Bush focuses on the effort to establish democracy in a part of the world where it is rare, and on placing Iraq at the center of his effort to secure the United States from terrorist attacks." He has also "avoided the optimistic language that Vice President Dick Cheney has used. … White House aides have concluded that Bush would lose credibility with such a rosy scenario." In a similar story, the Chicago Tribune (3/21, Silva, 643K) says the President "is taking a new tack of balancing a sober and chilling recognition of persistent bloodshed with an unrelenting optimism for eventual victory."

The New York Times (3/21, O'Neil, 1.19M) headlines its story "Bush Bluntly Defends Iraq Strategy, But Admits Missteps," and calls Bush's remarks "characteristically optimistic and unusually candid about shortcomings in the war's earlier phases and the suffering it caused for ordinary Iraqis." The speech "followed a carefully calibrated mix of optimism about eventual victory and caution about how long American troops would be involved that was displayed on Sunday by Mr. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, who sounded much as they had on the first anniversary of the invasion."

Bloomberg (3/21, Keil) also reports Bush "said today that he remains optimistic about the outcome of the war that defines his presidency." The Financial Times (3/21, Daniel) notes that last week "a poll showed that only one third of Americans thought Mr Bush had a clear plan for Iraq. However, only 24 per cent thought the Democrats in Congress had a clear plan."

Offering a more positive view of Bush's speech, Fox News' Special Report (3/20, Cameron) reported, "The President argued insurgents know they can't win militarily so they are trying to provoke civil war to halt progress. He pressed Iraqis to act quickly in forming a consensus government." Fox added, "The President acknowledged in the short return run, there will be more challenge in Iraq, but he remains undaunted by public doubts." The Washington Times (3/21, Dinan, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "Pledges Not To Give Into Insurgents."

Tal Afar Situation Said To Be "More Complex" Than Bush Acknowledged. The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Baker, 744K) reports that as Bush "tells the tale, the battle for Tall Afar offers a case study in how US and Iraqi forces working together can root out insurgents and restore stability. … Reports from the streets of Tall Afar, half a world away, offer a more complex story. US forces last fall did drive out radicals who had brutalized the mid-size city near the Syrian border. But lately, residents say, the city has taken another dark turn." The Post adds, "The twists of Tall Afar underline the difficulties Bush has had in reassuring a doubtful American public that progress is being made in Iraq. The president and his aides say that the positive developments in Iraq get overwhelmed by the grim pictures of mayhem and massacre that dominate the evening news. If Americans knew about the success stories, the White House maintains, they would understand Bush's confidence of victory." Yet "even the success stories seem to come with asterisks."

Number Of Iraqi Security Forces Increasing, But Equipment Still Lacking. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 2, 4:20, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The Pentagon has spent $10 billion already to strain and equip 128,000 Iraqi police and 113,000 Iraqi soldiers. But how many of them are truly ready to fight?" ABC (Raddatz) added that in Sadr City, the "biggest change here on this anniversary of the invasion, is that the American battalions that were here are now gone. About 1,500 soldiers replaced by Iraqi security forces. Today, only 37 American soldiers remain here. These Iraqis are now considered to be what the Pentagon calls 'Level 2' forces, meaning they are capable of taking the lead in a fight, as long as there are some US forces present." There are "currently 60 of these so-called Level 2 battalions across Iraq, which means more than 36,000 Iraqi security forces judged capable of leading a fight." But the Iraqi commander in Sadr City "tells us if things heat up here, his troops will be in trouble. 'The militia has the capability to defeat my soldiers,' he said. 'They have rocket-propelled grenades, mines and mortars. My soldiers have only AK-47 rifles.'"

DOJ_NMG_0019595

Khalilzad Says Iraq "Bleeding," But Not In Civil War. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 5, 2:35, Vargas, 8.78M) interviewed US Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad, who said the US is "making progress. But it's a difficult situation that we are in." Asked why the Iraqi politicians are taking so long to form a government, Amb. Khalilzad said, "They are trying to form a government of national unity. Agree on a program. Agree on processes for decision making. There is not a lot of tradition for compromising. So it is not easy for them, given the background from which they come." Khalilzad said it is "a particular period of vulnerability" in Iraq because of the insurgent violence, adding, "I am optimistic they will make the right decision and form a government of national unity in the coming weeks." Khalilzad added that while there are "sectarian tensions" and "sectarian killings. Civil war, in my judgment, is not here yet. But the potential for increased sectarian violence is there. And terrorists are seeking to provoke it. The country is bleeding."

Biden Urges Bush To Bolster International Pressure On Iraqi Leaders. CNN's The Situation Room (3/20, Blitzer) reported, "A leading Democratic critical today is urging the president to take a political risk to try to improve the situation in Iraq. On this, the third anniversary of the US-led invasion, Senator Joe Biden is blaming what he calls the administration's, and I'm quoting now, 'dangerous incompetence for leaving Iraq or the brink of a full- blown civil war.'" Biden "says the president should personally fly to other countries to try to bolster international pressure on Iraqi leaders to form that kind of national unity government.'

Mehlman Says Iraq War Was "Worth It." RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (3/20) about the recent CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll, which found that 37% say the situation in Iraq worth going to war over. Mehlman said, "It certainly was worth it. The fact is I believe, and I think most Americans who think about it, will recognize that we're safer."

Analysts Say Iraq War Has Put Middle East On Edge. Analysts say that three years into the Iraq war, the Middle East is experiencing heightened sectarian tensions between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, growing Islamic militance, high levels of anti-Western hostility and authoritarian regimes still clinging to power. The Christian Science Monitor (3/21, Blanford, 61K) reports, "The Iraq invasion jolted complacent regimes, especially as it coincided with nascent attempts by Arab democracy campaigners to push for reform. But, says Jordanian political commentator Rami Khouri, 'the way the American adventure in Iraq has gone has emboldened many Arab [regimes] to defy the US because they feel that it has gone badly in Iraq and the Americans are not likely to do this again.'" The Monitor adds, "The turmoil in Iraq is not solely to blame for the ills in the region, but it represents a powerful dynamic that has rippled across the Middle East feeding into other conflicts."

Hitchens Says Iraq Needs Federal Democracy, Power Sharing. Christopher Hitchens writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/21, 2.11M)that "if our apparent domestic demoralization continues, the options could come down to two. First, we might use our latent power and threaten to withdraw, implicitly asking Iraqis and their neighbors if that is really what they want, and concentrating their minds. This still runs the risk of allowing the diseased spokesmen of al Qaeda to claim victory. Second, we can demand to know, of the wider international community, if it could afford to view an imploded Iraq as a spectator. Three years ago, the smug answer to that, from most U.N. members, was 'yes.'" According to Hitchens, "Absent federal democracy and power-sharing, there will not just be anarchy and fragmentation and thus a moral victory for jihadism, but opportunist interventions from Iran, Saudi Arabia and Turkey."

Tierney Says Pentagon Did Not Prepare For Post-War Looting, Disorder. John Tierney writes in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) that the looting and disorder in Iraq were predictable. Some Pentagon officials 'did warn of civil disorder and crime, but they didn't do anything about it. They passed the buck to Gen. Tommy Franks, even though he didn't have enough troops or money for the job and showed little interest in postwar planning. … Looting, crime, mayhem — that was always someone else's department." Hitchens adds, "That summer, as Iraqis watched looters and criminals taking control, they kept asking why nobody put a stop to the crime. The answer from officials in Washington, it turns out, is the same one that would have been given by the old Iraqi police: not my job."

Gunmen Attack Iraqi Police Station Killing 15 Police Officers. Gunmen have ambushed a police station in the Iraqi city of Muqdadiyah today, killing 15 police officers and a guard at a nearby courthouse. The AP (3/21) reports, "The suspected insurgents struck at dawn, burning the police station and detonating a string of roadside bombs as they raced from the scene, a police spokesman in the region said."

DOJ_NMG_0019596

Over 20 Dead In Iraq Violence Yesterday. The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 1, 2:45, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "The war in Iraq entered its fourth year today. And in Baghdad it was a day like so many others: 20 people were killed or found dead in and around the city, victims of one kind of violence or another. So far, 2,311 Americans and more than 30,000 Iraqis have died." NBC Nightly News (3/20, lead story, 4:45, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "For the insurgents in Iraq tonight, three years is just another opportunity for violence." The AP (3/21, Hurst) also reports on the violence.

Iraqis Said To Have Contradictory Emotions On Third Anniversary Of US Invasion. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 4, 3:15, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the Iraqi nation "of 26 million people is deeply divided along political and religious lines. It is also split on what life is like three years after Saddam and how to make it better." ABC (Harris) added, "After invasion and elections, new freedoms and new terrors, Iraqis today show a range of complex, competing emotions." They "express the same, seemingly contradictory emotions so common in Iraq today. They sometimes miss the days of Saddam, but don't want him back. They want the Americans to get out, but just not yet."

NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 3, 4:15, Engel, 9.87M) reported, "Few Iraqis imagined that three years after the war began, Iraq would still look like this. Since the US invasion, there has not been a single day without mortar fire, car bombings, or IED attacks."

The AP (3/21, Salaheddin) reports that some Iraqis are expressing anger and dismay about their lives as the war enters its fourth year. Salah Hashim, a 49-year-old businessman, "said he yearned for the return of Saddam Hussein, the country's ousted dictator, given the violence that now envelops the country." Ahmen Najeeb, a 33-year-old supermarket owner, "said he originally 'waved his hands' at American forces as they entered the country in March 2003, but that his outlook has since changed. 'Day after day the Americans proved that they are here to steal our oil and protect their homes by keeping the their war against terror in another country,' he said. One English teacher, though, said that Iraqis had tolerated Saddam's tyranny for so long that it was worth fighting through the violence to rebuild the country."

The Washington Post (3/21, A13, Anderson, Fekeiki, 744K) notes a "stark difference" between Iraqis' "pessimistic outlook and some U.S. officials' upbeat assessment of the situation. With insurgent violence grinding on, essential services sagging below pre-invasion levels and the prospect of civil war looming, many Iraqis question whether Hussein's ouster was worth the cost."

More Iraqis Buying Terrorism Insurance. The New York Times (3/21, Worth, 1.19M) reports "a small but growing number of Iraqis" are buying "terrorism insurance" policies that look "like an ordinary life insurance policy, but with a one-page rider adding coverage for 'the following dangers: 1) explosions caused by weapons of war and car bombs; 2) assassinations; 3) terrorist attacks.'" That guarantee "appears to be the first off-the-shelf terrorism policy in the world, insurance experts say. In most countries, of course, there is no need for it: death by terrorism is rare enough that it is usually covered by ordinary accident insurance. In Iraq it is not, partly because the state used to compensate the families of war victims directly. So the Iraq Insurance Company began stepping into the gap about a year ago." The Iraq Insurance Company, "a state-owned group, has sold about 200 individual terrorism policies in the last year, and is now negotiating with several government ministries and private companies for group policies that would cover thousands of employees."

Lawmakers Create Independent Panel To Study Iraq Alternatives. Lawmakers are signaling that this year could be a decisive one in the Iraq war and, according to the Christian Science Monitor (3/21, Chaddock, 61K), "many of the war's vigorous defenders are looking for guidance outside the Bush administration on how to move ahead." The Monitor adds the "quiet launch of an independent, bipartisan panel to bring 'fresh eyes' to the Iraq conflict. Last week, the House included $1.3 million in a defense funding bill for the panel, which will work out of the congressionally chartered US Institute for Peace here." The Monitor adds, "The move to develop alternatives to Bush administrative briefings signals a growing distrust on Capitol Hill for the 'closed circuit between people sitting inside the Green Zone and the 'good news' being sent back to Washington,' says Mr. [Edward] Luttwak," a senior adviser at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

US Military Investigating Two Incidents Involving Civilian Deaths. The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 2, 2:25, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "US officials confirmed there are investigations under way into two separate incidents in which US forces are being blamed for the deaths of Iraqi women and children." CBS (Logan) added, "A spokesman for the US military in Baghdad says the top general in Iraq, General George Casey, has ordered an investigation into the discrepancy over how many Iraqi civilians were killed in a US raid here last Wednesday." Iraqi police "and human rights groups say there were 11 dead, including at least 5 children and 4 women. The US military confirms 4 killed, including 2 women and a child."

DOJ_NMG_0019597

NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 2, 1:20, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported that in the other incident, "a team of Naval investigators is on its way to Iraq tonight where 12 US Marines are accused of killing 15 Iraqi civilians, including 7 women and 3 children, in a vengeful rage after one of their fellow Marines was killed by a roadside bomb. The incident occurred last November in Haditha." The "formal criminal investigation was opened after some of the Marines had changed their original stories

Saddam's Foreign Minister Was CIA Informant. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 4, 4:00, Myers, 9.87M) reported Naji Sabri was "Saddam Hussein's foreign minister before the war, part of his inner circle." But "after Saddam fell, Naji Sabri was never arrested, nor included in the infamous deck of cards of wanted Iraqis. Why? Perhaps because sources tell NBC News that at the same time he denounced the US, Iraq's foreign minister was a secret, paid source of the CIA. Current and former US intelligence officials say Sabri provided the US information on Saddam's WMD that turned out to be more accurate than CIA estimates. So why didn't anyone listen?" Intelligence sources "say the deal was brokered by the French in September 2002, and that Sabri was paid more than $100,000 through an intermediary. Sabri may have thought he was working with the French, but some US intelligence officials believe he knew it was the CIA. The CIA questioned Sabri through a go-between about Saddam's WMD capabilities." Intelligence sources "say Sabri indicated Saddam had no significant weapons program. Sabri was right." Intelligence sources "say the CIA's brief relationship with Sabri ended when the CIA, hoping for a public relations coup, pressured him to defect to the United States. He refused."

Father Went To Iraq Seeking Revenge For Son's Death. The AP (3/21, Hanley) reports on Army Cpl. Joe Johnson, who joined the Army after his son Justin was killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq. The death of Justin, "stunned his parents with a shock that lingers still." Joe, who was training with the National Guard at the time of Justin's death tried to explain his reasons for going to Iraq, saying, "It's a lot of things combined," adding, "One, a sense of duty. I was pissed off at the terrorists for 9/11 and other atrocities. Second, I'd only trained. I wanted combat." Johnson also said, "There's some revenge involved. I'd be lying if I said there wasn't."

At Least 120,000 Children In Military Families Have Parent In Iraq. ABC World News Tonight (3/20, story 6, 3:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The American mission in Iraq has had a tremendous impact on many communities in this country. At least 120,000 children have a father or mother in Iraq right now. For them, the war is not a distant abstraction, but something they're living with every day."

US Closely Watching Trial Of Afghan Christian. The US says it is closely watching the trial of an Afghan man who face a possible death sentence for converting to Christianity. AFP (3/21) reports, "State Department spokesman Sean McCormack urged the Afghan authorities to deal with the proceedings against Abdul Rahman transparently and according to the rule of law. … 'Our view certainly...is that tolerance, freedom of worship, is an important element of any democracy,' he said. 'These are issues, as Afghan democracy matures, that they are going to have to deal with increasingly.'"

Van Hollen Argues Against Troop Withdrawal From Afghanistan. Rep. Chris Van Hollen writes in the Washington Post (3/21, A17, 744K) that the US has not accomplished "our mission of destroying bin Laden and al-Qaeda. Fulfilling that mission and preventing a resurgence of the Taliban will depend on the actions we take in Afghanistan. This is no time to reduce our commitment there. … The anticipated withdrawal of US forces has reportedly already caused some local leaders to hedge their bets with respect to the Taliban." Van Hollen adds, "With the Bush administration and political Washington focused on Iraq, many Afghan leaders worry that the reduction of U.S. forces is a sign that we will again lose sight of Afghanistan. We do so at our peril. Let us not forget that the Sept. 11 plot was launched from Afghanistan, and not from Iraq."

Army Conducting Criminal Investigation Of Tillman Shooting. The New York Times (3/21, Davey, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports that the family of former NFL player and Army Ranger Pat Tillman, who was killed in a friendly fire incident in Afghanistan, "may be close to getting some of the answers they so desperately seek. After repeated complaints from the Tillmans and members of Congress contacted by them, the Army is immersed in a highly unusual criminal investigation of the killing, and the Defense Department's inspector general, which called for the criminal investigation this month, is looking separately into the Army's conduct in its aftermath." The inquiry "is for the first time examining whether the soldiers broke military law when they failed to identify their targets before firing on Corporal Tillman's position."

DOJ_NMG_0019598

DOJ:

Gonzales' Taco Bell Visit Noted. The Reliable Source column in the Washington Post (3/21, C03, Argetsinger, Roberts) reports on "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales picking up lunch Sunday at the Leesburg Pike Taco Bell in Falls Church, wearing a dark suit and accompanied by a Secret Service detail. A Justice source says the trip was 'at the request of his 10- and 13-year-olds.'"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

2nd Circuit Panel Tosses Quattrone Conviction. The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Masters) reports, "A federal appeals court tossed out the obstruction-of-justice conviction of once high-flying investment banker Frank P. Quattrone, in a blow to the government's effort to prosecute and deter white-collar crime." The Post continues, "The U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit held unanimously that the trial judge's instructions to the jury included such a 'glaring deficiency' that Quattrone did not get a fair trial on charges that he encouraged subordinates to destroy documents sought by a federal grand jury. … The court also took the unusual step of reassigning the case to a new trial judge, writing that 'certain comments' made by U.S. District Judge Richard Owen 'could be viewed as rising beyond mere impatience and annoyance.'"

The New York Times (3/21, Sorkin) reports, "The appeals panel found that the judge in the case, Richard Owen, a Nixon appointee known for being pro-prosecution, gave erroneous jury instructions on what was required for the jury to find Mr. Quattrone guilty. The panel also said that 'in the interest of justice,' the case should be reassigned to another judge on the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. … The prosecutors in the case, Steven R. Peiken and David Anders — both of whom have since left the United States attorney's office for private practice — were also singled out by the appellate panel for unfairly trying to prejudice the jury during their questioning of Mr. Quattrone. … Still, the appeals court found that there was sufficient evidence to retry Mr. Quattrone. And despite finding that Judge Owen had given flawed jury instructions, the panel said it agreed with many of his rulings, including his decision to restrict the introduction of mountains of evidence that defense lawyers contended would have led to a not guilty verdict."

The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Smith) reports, "While prosecutors issued a short statement saying only 'we are reviewing the opinion and considering our options,' the Quattrone defense team hailed the ruling as 'a significant victory.' … Mr. Quattrone himself said in a statement, 'For over three years during this difficult ordeal, I have held my head high knowing I was innocent and never intended to obstruct justice.'"

The Financial Times (3/21, Ben White) reports, "The ruling dealt a blow to the federal government's efforts to crack down on alleged white-collar crime. It followed a similar ruling by the Supreme Court last year voiding the criminal conviction of now defunct accounting firm Arthur Andersen." The Times adds, "A retrial would mark the third time Mr Quattrone, who emerged as the top technology banker of the 1990s, has faced a federal jury. The first trial ended with no decision after a jury was unable to reach a verdict. … In the second trial, a jury convicted Mr Quattrone of two counts of obstructing justice and one count of witness tampering. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison, but remained free pending his appeal."

USA Today (3/21, Farrell) reports, "The charges against the former Credit Suisse First Boston banker and onetime Silicon Valley rainmaker grew out of a federal investigation into the allocation of red-hot technology IPOs during the dot-com bubble. In December 2000, after being informed that a grand jury was investigating the matter, Quattrone endorsed and circulated a colleague's e-mail reminding subordinates to clean up their files, including paperwork from the IPOs in question. … Prosecutors said Quattrone's sending of the e-mail amounted to obstruction. In his first trial in the fall of 2003 the jury deadlocked, partly because some jurors didn't find Quattrone credible on the stand. His spring 2004 retrial resulted in a conviction."

The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Sanchez) reports, "Prosecutors said the intent of Quattrone's e-mail was to destroy documents sought in federal probes into whether the investment bank forced customers to pay kickbacks for shares of hugely profitable IPOs in the late-1990s bull market. … Quattrone had argued that he thought the investigations centered on other units of his company. He also was unaware that a grand jury subpoena called for documents from his technology banking group, his attorneys claimed."

Bloomberg (3/21) reports, "It's now up to federal prosecutors to decide whether to re- try the former investment banker. Today's reversal may also lead the government and Quattrone to open plea negotiations. Quattrone was convicted in May 2004 after his first trial ended in a hung jury in October 2003."

The New York Law Journal (3/21, Hamblett) reports, "U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia now must decide whether to retry Quattrone. If Garcia decides to go ahead, it would be the third trial for the former head of Credit Suisse's Global Technology Group, which was accused of obstructing two investigations into the allocation of shares in red-hot initial public offerings during the height of the high-tech boom."

Ruling Shows Importance Of Jury Instructions. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Davies, Scannell) reports, "At the end of any jury trial, the judge's instructions to the jurors can be the most boring part of the proceedings. … They can also be the most important. Just ask Frank Quattrone." The Journal continues, "The court ruled that (Judge Owen's) instructions to jurors wrongly allowed them to convict him of obstruction for urging the destruction of documents without determining 'that the defendant knew the documents were subject to a subpoena [or document request].' The panel said that 'the jury was allowed to convict Quattrone of obstruction of justice regardless of whether he intended such.' … The witness-tampering conviction was overturned because, after Mr. Quattrone's conviction, the Supreme Court -- in a similar case against the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen -- ruled that jurors should have been told that a conviction requires a link between the defendant urging the destruction of documents and 'a particular proceeding.' The judge in the Quattrone case didn't include such an instruction."

DOJ_NMG_0019599

Order For New Judge Seen As Unusual. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Sidel, Lattman) reports, "In reversing the conviction of the former star technology-industry investment banker, a federal appeals court yesterday assigned a new judge to the case, saying that 'the interests of all involved would best be served by another judge.' The appeals court didn't name the judge who would take the case. … Lawyers who aren't involved in the case said it is rare for an appeals court to assign a new judge when sending a case back to the lower court for a new trial. … 'It is highly unusual for the court of appeals to reverse a case with instructions that it be assigned to a new trial judge because it implies that the appellate court believes that the original judge may have been partial to one side or the other,' said former prosecutor Marc Mukasey, now of Bracewell & Giuliani in New York. 'In this case, however, the court of appeals stressed that it didn't question Judge Owen's impartiality.'"

Former Enron Auditors Testify On Charges, Reserve Accounts. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Mcwilliams, Emshwiller) reports, "Two former partners of Enron Corp.'s outside auditor, Arthur Andersen LLP, took the witness stand to help prosecutors link former top company executives Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2 to the alleged manipulation of the energy firm's reported financial results." The Journal continues, "The auditors' testimony at the beginning of the eighth week of the conspiracy and fraud trial touched on two main areas: the alleged downward manipulation of charges for goodwill expenses and the alleged misuse of reserve accounts to bump up reported earnings." The Journal adds, "In the case of goodwill, prosecutors contend that Mr. Lay, Enron's former chairman, misled Andersen and the public in October 2001 about the company's plans for its big water-distribution unit in order to avoid a hefty charge to earnings. On the reserve issue, the government contends Enron improperly tapped a reserve account to meet the desire by Mr. Skilling, the former company president, to beat analysts' earnings estimates. … The goodwill issue arose because of a new accounting rule in 2001 that required the write-down of an asset if it didn't meet certain criteria, which in the case of the Enron water unit included whether the company had an expensive growth plan, testified John R. Sult, one of the former Andersen partners. Without such a growth strategy, said Mr. Sult, Enron likely would have been forced to recognize an "impairment," or write-down, which prosecutors have said could have totaled hundreds of millions of dollars."

Former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Found Liable For Securities Fraud. The AP (3/21, Marquez) reports, "A federal judge found former Gemstar-TV Guide CEO Henry C. Yuen liable for securities fraud, according to a ruling unsealed Monday in a federal regulatory lawsuit that claimed Yuen inflated the company's revenue by $248 million to boost its stock." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Mariana R. Pfaelzer also found Yuen liable for misrepresenting facts to Gemstar's auditors and falsifying its books. … The Securities and Exchange Commission will now submit a proposed penalty." The AP adds, "Yuen's attorney, Stanley Arkin, said an appeal was being considered. … 'I don't see eye to eye with her decision, but she's a judge,' Arkin said. 'The game isn't over.' … Gemstar, meanwhile, said in a statement that it was pleased by the decision to hold Yuen 'accountable for his wrongful and inappropriate actions.'" The AP notes, "Pfaelzer's findings came almost three years after the SEC filed the lawsuit against Yuen and Elsie Leung, Gemstar's ex-finance chief, in an alleged scheme to inflate company revenue to meet certain financial targets. … Regulators contend that Yuen's actions contributed to a windfall between 2000 and 2002 - at least $18.8 million in salary and bonuses, $14.6 million in exercised stock options, and more than $63.6 million in Gemstar stock sales."

"Chicago" Suit Hits Movie Industry Accounting Practices. The New York Times (3/21, Hartocollis) reports, "The producer of 'Chicago,' the Oscar-winning 2002 movie, is charging that Miramax has cheated him out of millions of dollars of profit from it by using deceptive accounting to understate revenue." The Times continues, "The producer, Martin Richards, sold Miramax an option to the movie rights to the musical in 1994. In papers filed in State Supreme Court in Manhattan yesterday, he said that he has been cheated by a Hollywood system of contingency payments to participants in moviemaking like producers, actors and writers that gives studios an incentive to underreport revenues. … Under that system, the court papers say, 'the worse a movie performs financially, the better off the studio is.'" The Times adds, "Mr. Richards's lawsuit says that he does not know precisely how much he is owed, but it seeks at least $10 million, which he estimates is his share of the movie's profits. … Mr. Richards declined to say how much he had been paid for the movie upfront, although the court papers said that his contract called for him to be paid several fees, including $500,000 after the movie reached its initial break-even point. "

DOJ_NMG_0019600

CRIMINAL LAW:

Star Witness At "Mafia Cops" Trial Recalls Government Pressure To Cooperate. The New York Times (3/21, Feuer, 1.19M) reports that the trial of alleged "Mafia cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa on Monday "veered…from Brooklyn murder and Las Vegas lunacy to the high-stakes poker game played by government agents and gangland turncoats as the trial's star witness," Burton Kaplan, testified under cross-examination that, "after he was arrested in 1996 on marijuana and tax-evasion charges, 'the government was willing to go to any length' to have him 'crack' and come 'on board to provide information' against" Eppolito and Caracappa. Newsday (3/21, DeStefano) adds that Kaplan "testified that he wasn't aware of any surveillance photos that show him meeting over the years with the alleged 'Mafia Cops.' … During two full days of cross examination, Kaplan didn't appear to waver or change his story about his dealings with the detectives," but "the defense is likely to use Kaplan's admission that he wasn't shown surveillance photos to undermine his claim that he met Eppolito and Caracappa during the six-year period."

Kaplan's Lawyer Expected To Testify As Surprise Prosecution Witness Today. The New York Daily News (3/21, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "Federal prosecutors plan to call Judd Burstein, the ex-mouthpiece of Burton Kaplan, to the witness stand today, the Daily News has learned. Burstein is expected to testify that Kaplan told him back in 1994 about his role as a middleman between" Eppolito and Caracappa "and gangster Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso. Contacted last night, Burstein acknowledged to The News that he had volunteered to share what he knew with prosecutors." The Daily News adds, "The surprise witness echoes a successful gambit this month in the racketeering trial of John A. (Junior) Gotti, whose defense team had lawyer Ron Kuby testify that Gotti told him in 1998 that he had left the mob because he was sick of that life."

Pellicano Asks To Represent Himself As Defense Lawyer Challenges FBI Search. The AP (3/21, Risling) reports, "Imprisoned private investigator Anthony Pellicano said Monday he wants to act as his own lawyer in a case charging that he orchestrated an illegal wiretapping scheme targeting Hollywood celebrities and executives. … Meanwhile, federal prosecutors provided the judge with snippets of their case scheduled to go to trial next month." At the hearing, Assistant US Attorney Daniel Saunders "said three search warrant affidavits connected to raids on Pellicano's offices in 2002 would be unsealed later this week. FBI agents found illegal explosives and seized documents and computers during the searches," but Pellicano's current counsel, Steven Gruel "filed a motion Monday revisiting the legality of the search warrants," writing, "The Pellicano defense seeks discovery that will show that the FBI knew and expected to find a lot more than what they represented to or sought from the magistrate judge."

The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Krikorian, Weinstein, 958K) adds, "In his motion, Gruel said FBI Agent Stan Ornellas stated in a search warrant affidavit that authorities wanted to seize Pellicano's office computers, suggesting a far broader investigation than the threat against" Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch. "Gruel noted that long before the search of Pellicano's offices, the FBI had become aware of allegations that one of its own agents had illegally wiretapped while investigating a dispute over control of a $40-million Internet business." Additionally, Gruel questioned "the role Pellicano's former girlfriend played in the case," saying "it may have been improper for a 'cooperating' government witness to be visiting Pellicano in prison at a time when he was representing himself."

Jury Hears FBI Tapes During Informant's Testimony At Baltimore Police Corruption Trial. The Baltimore Sun (3/21, Dolan, 296K) reports that "in hours of secretly recorded conversations by federal agents, prosecutors say, one topic of conversation dominated the relationship between Detective William A. King and his informant, Antonio Mosby: selling illegal drugs for mutual profit. A federal jury heard more than a dozen recorded phone calls Monday that prosecutors say show how King and his partner, Detective Antonio L. Murray, shook down drug dealers pointed out by Mosby at open-air drug markets across Baltimore." The Sun notes that King's trial "is the culmination of the FBI's seven-month wiretap probe into misconduct in the Baltimore Police Department that ended with the May 2005 arrests of King and Murray."

Eight More Indicted In California Red Cross Katrina Aid Fraud Scheme. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/21) reports, "The number of Bakersfield-area people indicted in a scheme that bilked thousands of dollars from an American Red Cross fund designated for Hurricane Katrina victims has risen to 61, federal authorities said. Eight people were indicted last week in federal court in Fresno on charges of wire fraud and filing fake claims" with FEMA. "The Red Cross contacted the FBI after it performed an audit and discovered an unusually high number of claims were being paid out at Western Union outlets in the Bakersfield area, even though not many evacuees had moved there." The Los Angeles Times (3/21, 958K) also briefly reports on the indictments in "California In Brief."

DOJ_NMG_0019601

Federal Scrutiny Of Chicago Hiring Practices Goes Back At Least Nine Years. The Chicago Tribune (3/21, Higgins, Lighty, 643K) reports, "As far back as 1997, federal authorities were investigating the hiring practices in Mayor Richard Daley's administration — obtaining backup tapes from the city's mainframe computer system and questioning a top Daley aide about how some people got their city jobs. The disclosures of the government's earlier interest in City Hall hiring came Monday during a routine court hearing for Daley's former patronage chief Robert Sorich, who is under indictment along with three others." Sorich lawyer Thomas Anthony Durkin "said FBI agents had interviewed his client in August 1997 as part of…Operation Silver Shovel," but "Assistant U.S. Attorneys Patrick Collins and Barry Miller did not concede that information in the 1997 records would be helpful to the defense."

US Attorney Challenges Campbell Lawyer's Criticism Of Investigation. In an Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/21, 430K) op-ed, US Attorney David E. Nahmias responds to former Mayor Bill Campbell's lawyer, Michael Coleman, who "claims that the government's investigation targeted Campbell, lasted for eight years and cost 'millions of dollars in resources and manpower.' That is not true. … The 'army' from the FBI and U.S. attorney's office consisted of one or two agents and two prosecutors," which "increased to three prosecutors shortly before Campbell's indictment and to five agents only in the months just before and during his trial." Nahmias adds, "in essence the mayor's lawyer's argument is that, if someone concocts a criminal scheme that is complicated and difficult to uncover, and obstructs and delays efforts to do so, we should ignore the crimes rather than invest the time and resources needed to bring them to court."

Philadelphia Council Members Reluctant To Call For Mariano's Resignation. The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/21, Schaffer, Shiffman, 423K) reports, "Many members of City Council hope Rick Mariano will resign following his federal corruption conviction," but "they don't want to call on him to step down. The legislators' semantic two-step came as city solicitor Romulo L. Diaz Jr. issued an opinion confirming that the state ban on felons in elected office won't kick in until Mariano's sentencing, which Judge Lawrence F. Stengel yesterday set for July 6." The Inquirer notes, "Of 14 members interviewed, only one -- Councilman Michael Nutter -- said he would definitely vote for a resolution asking Mariano to quit." The Philadelphia Daily News (3/21, Brennan, McDonald) adds, "Only four Council members -- Donna Reed Miller, Michael Nutter, Juan Ramos and Jack Kelly - echoed Mayor Street's call from last week for Mariano to resign immediately. The rest are content to let state law take its course."

FBI, IRS Raids On Accountant Seen As Spurring Businessman's Guilty Plea. The Philadelphia Daily News (3/21, Hinkelman) reports, "A new federal-court filing yesterday offered a broad clue as to why a key figure in the Rick Mariano bribery-and-corruption case abruptly agreed to change his plea to guilty in late February. On Feb. 28 -- the day after businessman Reinaldo Pastrana had his surprising change of heart -- FBI and IRS agents raided the office of Pastrana's accountant and seized copies of false tax returns filed on behalf of Pastrana; his mother, Ada, and sister Debbie. … Now in state prison for violating parole in connection with a state tax conviction, Pastrana has agreed to enter a guilty plea on Thursday to three counts of bribery."

Eight Former Southwest Airlines Employees Charged In Embezzlement Scheme. The San Antonio Express-News (3/21, Contreras) reports, "Eight former Southwest Airlines employees have been charged with wire fraud over allegations they stole more than $1 million from the Dallas-based carrier by using used tickets to issue new ones and pocketing some of the proceeds. … The scheme lasted from March 2000 through January 2003," and "Special agent Andrea Simmons, a spokeswoman for the FBI in El Paso, said the probe took a while to come to fruition because the case involved 'hundreds to thousands of tickets' that needed to be compared." The Express-News notes that seven of the defendants were in custody, and the FBI was still searching for the eighth. The AP (3/21) also reports on the charges, and notes Simmons' comment to the Express-News.

California Developer Sentenced To Prison For Real Estate Fraud. The San Francisco Chronicle (3/18, C3, Lee) reported, "A San Francisco real estate developer will spend eight years in prison and pay more than $17 million in restitution and fines for defrauding more than 700 investors, a judge has ruled. U.S. District Judge William Alsup sentenced John A. Hickey…on Thursday to 97 months in prison and ordered him to pay a $15,000 fine and $17.4 million in restitution." The Chronicle notes, "Federal prosecutors said Hickey raised about $20 million from 724 investors through his company, Continental Capital Financial Group, by offering shares in two limited partnerships," allegedly "to develop real estate in Napa and Sonoma, among other locations."

DOJ_NMG_0019602

Maryland Man Sentenced To Six Years For Child Porn Possession. The Baltimore Sun (3/21, 296K) reports Joshua M. Marsh of Great Mills, Maryland, yesterday "was sentenced…in federal court to six years in prison for transmitting child pornography files over the Internet, the U.S. attorney's office said. … According to a statement of facts at the plea, Marsh admitted to allowing users to download child pornography from his personal computer, as well as to facilitating the transmission of pornographic files between users. When the FBI conducted a search warrant in 2004, they found more than 1,000 files of child pornography on Marsh's computer."

FBI Arrests Senior Pentagon IT Employee On Child Porn Charges. UPI (3/21) reports, "A senior Defense Department employee managing the Pentagon's transition to a new Internet system was arrested for child pornography, DOD announced last week." Charles Lamont Lynch of Clifton, Virginia, "was operating a peer-to-peer file sharing program on his comuter at the Defense Information Systems Agency, according to the United States Attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. FBI Agents on March 8 seized a computer and more than 1,000 CD-Rom disks during a search of Lynch's office," and he "is now on leave without pay while his case is pending in court."

Former East St Louis Police Chief Sentenced. The AP (3/21, Suhr) reports that the former police chief of East St. Louis, IL, "was sentenced Monday to more than two years in federal prison for attempting to shield a politically connected businessman from a criminal probe." The AP continues, "Ronald Matthews, 56, had faced up to five years behind bars for conspiracy to obstruct justice, attempted obstruction of justice and perjury before a grand jury. He was convicted Dec. 21... Matthews professed his innocence and said he would appeal. But he also told the judge he preferred to begin his prison term immediately." The AP notes, "The case stems from a traffic stop during which Ayoub 'Dave' Qattoum, an auxiliary policeman and businessman, was found with a .38-caliber handgun. Under federal law, Qattoum was not entitled to have a gun as a convicted felon. … Prosecutors described Qattoum as well-connected, quick to give loans or kickbacks to local elected officials to curry favor as the owner of a convenience store. … Authorities accused Matthews of commandeering the local investigation of Qattoum's arrest after the Jordanian national expressed fear that U.S. immigration officials had learned of his legal troubles and might deport him."

The Belleville News Democrat (3/21, Pawlaczyk) reports, "Although Murphy offered him the opportunity to remain free until being ordered to report to prison, Matthews opted to be taken immediately into custody. … Two federal marshals asked him to remove any personal items, including a driver's license and a comb, which he gave to family members, and then he was escorted into a backroom."

Guatemalan Pleads Guilty To DC Hit Man Plot. The Washington Times (3/21, Emerling) reports, "An illegal alien from Guatemala pleaded guilty in federal court yesterday to charges that he tried to arrange the killing of a D.C. jail inmate last year." The Times continues, "Victor Moscoso Espana, 20, of Hyattsville, admitted in D.C. District Court that he attempted to have inmate Alvaro Garcia-Hernandez -- a fellow Guatemalan in jail on drug charges -- killed for $15,000, which would have been paid in monthly installments." The Times adds, "According to court documents, Moscoso tried to arrange the hit because he 'did not like' Garcia-Hernandez and wanted to 'take over' his drug sources and 'make money.' … Agents with the federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) began investigating Moscoso in September after receiving information about a conspiracy to import cocaine and heroin from Guatemala through various U.S. entry points, including Washington Dulles International Airport. … Court documents show that the hit man plot began when Moscoso arranged to meet another person -- who was cooperating with investigating agents -- at a Hess gasoline station in the 1900 block of New Jersey Avenue Northwest in October."

SCOTUS Refuses To Hear Pollard Appeal. The AP (3/21) reports, "The Supreme Court refused Monday to give Jonathan Pollard, now serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, access to records that could bolster his case for a presidential clemency." The AP continues, "Pollard's lawyers wanted the justices to reopen his case, so that they could pursue secret documents the government submitted to the judge who sentenced Pollard in 1987." The AP adds, "Pollard sold military secrets to Israel while he worked at the Defense Department's Pentagon headquarters. He was arrested in 1985 and pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court had already refused to let the former Navy intelligence analyst withdraw the guilty plea. …The latest Supreme Court case was not about spying, but about government authority to keep records used in court sealed from the public. … A federal appeals court said last summer that it had no authority to review requests for the documents which Pollard contends will help his bid for presidential clemency."

High Court Appears To Side Against Prosecutors' Use Of Victims' Words. The New York Times (3/21, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "A crime victim's emergency call to 911, when introduced in court, can provide powerful evidence of the attacker's identity and the circumstances of the crime. Perhaps too powerful -- or so most Supreme Court justices seemed to conclude during an argument Monday on whether the prosecution could use such evidence without violating defendants' constitutional rights to face their accusers in the courtroom." The constitutional problem "arises when the victim fails to appear in court and is therefore not available for cross-examination."

DOJ_NMG_0019603

The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Savage, 958K) reports, "Eight of the nine Supreme Court justices -- all but Ruth Bader Ginsburg -- sounded today as though they would vote to bar prosecutors from using in court the words of crime victims who spoke to authorities but refused to testify." The Washington Post (3/21, A4, Lane, 744K) says that "at stake are the rules of evidence that will govern not only many domestic violence prosecutions but also any criminal case in which prosecutors seek to introduce past accusations by people who, whether out of fear or any other reason, cannot or will not repeat their charges in open court." The AP (3/21, Locy) also reports the story.

Former Philippine President Says US Tapped His Calls With Aragoncillo. The AP (3/21, Gomez) reports former Philippine President Joseph Estrada "said Tuesday he has been notified by an American court that U.S. authorities bugged his telephone conversations with an FBI analyst accused of revealing U.S. government secrets. The New Jersey court indicated it had authorized the wiretapping as part of an investigation into Leandro Aragoncillo last year, Estrada said, adding that there was no suggestion he was under investigation." The AP notes, "Aragoncillo was arrested in the United States last year" and "has been charged with conspiring to reveal government secrets, acting as a foreign agent and improperly using FBI computers."

California Sex Assault Case Shifts To Civil Courtroom. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Goffard) reports, "Now that a judge has imposed a prison term on the attackers, the sordid, painful four-year-long case involving Gregory Haidl and two co-defendants — and the woman who says they destroyed her — shifts to the civil courtroom, which may prove the ugliest show yet. … The victim, now 20 and known publicly as Jane Doe, has sued the three young men convicted of sexually assaulting her while a video camera rolled and she lay unconscious on a pool table one July night in 2002. And she is suing Haidl's father, a rich former Orange County assistant sheriff, alleging that he should have known of the drug- and alcohol-fueled parties raging in his Corona del Mar home, where the attack occurred. … But, as part of her $26-million lawsuit, Jane Doe is also targeting others who, she says, subjected her to years of 'harassment, intimidation and torture' after the attack itself." The Times continues, "In a rare legal move, her suit names Haidl defense attorney Joseph G. Cavallo and two defense investigators, John Warren and Shawn Smigel. She says the defense staked out her Rancho Cucamonga house, went through her trash, stalked her, improperly obtained her medical records, broadcast her identity and once cornered her in a parking lot while snapping pictures. … 'We're taking these people to task about what they did,' said Jane Doe's attorney, Sheldon Lodmer. 'They crossed the line in terms of appropriate legal defense.' … Cavallo said he did nothing improper in trying to defend a client who could have faced life in prison, and characterized the lawsuit as 'revenge' for his zealous representation."

States Move To Pass "Stand Your Ground" Bills. USA Today (3/21, Willing, 2.31M) reports that states are beginning to pass bills allowing citizens to use deadly force against muggers and other attackers. USA reports, "Dubbed 'Stand Your Ground' bills by supporters such as the National Rifle Association, the measures generally grant immunity from prosecution and lawsuits to those who use deadly force to combat any unlawful entry or attack. Several states allow people to use deadly force in their homes against intruders; the new measures represent an expansion of self-defense rights to crimes committed in public."

CIVIL LAW:

RJ Reynolds Tries To Evade Chicago Smoking Ban. The CBS Evening News (3/20, story 7, 2:35, Schieffer) reported, "Smoking laws have been tightened so much over the last few years that in many parts of the country it is pretty much illegal to smoke anywhere in public. But one spot in nearly smoke-free Chicago has begun to buck the trend." CBS (Bowers) added, "Chicago, like a growing number of American cities, recently enacted its own version of the Clean Air Act, which basically stamps out smoking in public, even in bars." But the tobacco lounges aren't "licensed as a restaurant or a bar but as a tobacco manufacturer where smoking is permitted, which starts sense when you consider the owner is RJ Reynolds. And as you might imagine, the cigarette-maker is fuming over what it sees as a thinly veiled attempt to outlaw smoking."

NYTimes Calls Court Ruling "Partial Victory" For Google. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/21, 2.11M) calls a Federal judge's ruling that Google would not be forced to hand over a sample of user searches a "partial victory" for Google. The Post adds, "The real question is whether criminalizing whole categories of speech on the basis of vaguely worded 'community standards' is the least restrictive way of protecting children." Friday's ruling established "some limits on what the government can demand from private corporations in seeking to defend this law against a First Amendment challenge. Justice's initial request was for every indexed Web address and two months' worth of search queries. By comparison, what the government will now get looks reasonable indeed."

DOJ_NMG_0019604

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Judge Sentences Two Cuban Human Smugglers To Maximum 10-Year Sentences. The Miami Herald (3/21, Weaver) reports, "Two Cuban immigrants who captained a smuggling mission that ended with the drowning of a young boy received the maximum prison sentence on Monday -- 10 years." The Herald continues, "U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore hammered the two men after concluding a six-year term proposed under federal sentencing guidelines was not enough punishment for the child's death in the Oct. 13 illegal crossing of the Florida Straits." The Herald adds, "A lawyer for both Alexander Gil Rodriguez, 25, and Luis Manuel Taboada-Cabrera, 28, whose relatives sobbed outside the courtroom, said they will appeal the judge's sentences for their alien-smuggling convictions. Attorney Steven Amster said the two Miami men, who were not charged or convicted of causing the death of 6-year-old Julian Villasuso, still faced up to the maximum prison term because his drowning was a factor in the judge's sentencing under advisory guidelines. … The two men had reached plea deals in November, expecting to receive lighter sentences. They pleaded guilty to a conspiracy to smuggle 29 Cubans in a 33-foot speedboat that overturned and claimed the life of the boy, who got trapped beneath the capsized vessel. … But Assistant U.S. Attorney Dana Washington said he didn't have enough evidence to charge them with the death of Julian Villasuso."

The AP (3/21, Anderson) reports that Judge Moore "said he was imposing the long sentence because of a marked increase in dangerous pursuits between U.S. authorities and smugglers on the open ocean. Moore also said the two men should pay an extra penalty for playing a role in the boy's death. … Sentences imposed under federal guidelines are 'not providing an adequate deterrent for this kind of criminal conduct,' Moore said."

The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (3/21, Blum) reports, "Defense attorney Steven Amster argued that the lower penalty was sufficient punishment, in part because the smuggling trip was not organized for profit. In remarks to the judge, Taboada apologized and took responsibility for his actions. … Amster also suggested that the Coast Guard played a role in the boy's death by casting a net over their boat's engines, causing water to rush over the stern and precipitating the boat's capsizing. There also was a delay in the attempt to rescue Julian after it was realized he was still under the boat. … But Moore said the smugglers should not expect leniency by attempting to shift blame to the Coast Guard and noted that other migrants on the boat had pleaded with the two smugglers to stop once the chase began."

Attorney Charges Cover-Up In Florida Boot Camp Death. The AP (3/21, Kallestad) reports, "Bay County (FL) authorities are covering up their role in the death of a boy who was punched and kicked by guards at a boot camp, and his relatives want any trial in the case moved to another area to ensure a fair proceeding, the family's attorney said Monday." The AP continues, "Bay County sheriff's spokeswoman Ruth Sasser declined to comment on the cover-up allegations, but said seven drill instructors involved in the altercation and a nurse who witnessed it will be among about 20 people who lose their jobs when the camp closes next month. The closure plans had already been announced." The AP adds, "Ben Crump, the attorney for Martin Lee Anderson's parents, said they were 'outraged' because medical examiner Dr. Charles Siebert last week defended his findings that the 14-year-old died from complications of sickle cell trait, a usually harmless blood disorder. … Investigators re-examining the death with a second autopsy said last week that Anderson didn't die of natural causes. … Anderson died Jan. 6 after the confrontation at the boot camp in Panama City run by Bay County sheriff's officials. He had been struck, kicked and dragged to the ground by several guards during a half-hour ordeal that was recorded on videotape. … Gov. Jeb Bush has appointed Hillsborough County State Attorney Mark Ober to investigate and he observed the second autopsy done in Tampa. The U.S. Attorney's office in Tallahassee and the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division also have opened an investigation into Anderson's death."

California Prisons Prepare For Desegregation Policy. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Jordan) reports, "It's exercise time at the California Institution for Men, and dozens of inmates walk around the track in pairs or small groups -- blacks with blacks, whites with whites, Hispanics with Hispanics. … Prison culture dictates that inmates stick with their own kind, associating almost exclusively with other inmates from their race or ethnic group, defending them to the death if necessary. And that is why prison officials, inmates and scholars are uneasy as California's prison system prepares to introduce a formal policy desegregating its double cells, after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled last year that prisoners may not be routinely segregated in cells by race. The ruling has ramifications for state correctional systems nationwide." The Journal continues, "In 2004, an African-American inmate challenged the California Department of Corrections' unwritten policy of assigning new prisoners and transfers to double cells only with a cellmate of the same race or ethnic group. The corrections department claimed segregated prison cells were necessary to avoid racial violence. Unswayed, the high court last year refused to strike down the inmate's challenge. California's new policy, which officials expect to implement over the next 2½ years, is the result of a settlement of that case. … Critics of the new policy say the purpose of segregated cells is to keep prisons peaceful and safe, not to discriminate. … California's prison system, at present still operating largely under the old policy, uses ethnicity as the main criteria when assigning higher-threat inmates to double cells. … Criminal-justice scholars say it is impossible to get a clear picture of prison-cell integration across the U.S. because practices vary widely from facility to facility."

DOJ_NMG_0019605

Consumers Group Challenges Geico's Risk Criteria. The Washington Post (3/21, D1, Crenshaw, Mayer) reports, "According to an internal Geico document, the auto insurer uses drivers' levels of education and occupations in setting insurance rates. … As a result, Consumer Federation of America argued, blue-collar workers with relatively low levels of education sometimes are charged almost twice as much as better-educated professionals, based on those criteria." The Post continues, "Geico said in a statement that it uses many factors in setting rates and that allegations that education and occupation are being used as the sole criterion are 'absolutely untrue.'" The Post adds, "The document cited by the consumer group and a Geico competitor raises long-standing questions about which criteria insurance companies may use as proper gauges of risk and which improperly discriminate against poor people and minorities. … Insurers, consumer advocates, regulators and politicians have been struggling for years over such issues, including the use of credit scores in assessing risk. The use of credit scores is permissible in about 30 states but continues to be debated."

ANTITRUST:

Online Poll Shows Small-Business Opposition To AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The San Antonio Business Journal (3/21) reports, "AT&T Inc.'s plan to merge with BellSouth Corp. is seen as a development that will not work in favor of San Antonio's small-business community, according to the majority of individuals who participated in an online Business Pulse poll." The Journal continues, "Slightly more than half of the San Antonio Business Journal readers who responded to the survey say San Antonio-based AT&T's planned $67 billion stock merger with BellSouth in Atlanta will lead to less competition in the marketplace, rising prices, less technological innovation and poor customer service. … (The online poll is not scientific and the results represent only a snap shot of some readers' opinions.)" The Journal adds, "AT&T officials, however, disagree with the negative assessments of the merger and have long maintained that there is sufficient competition in the marketplace as evidenced by the full slate of services offered by cable, wireless carriers and competing local phone companies. … The merger still needs shareholder and regulatory approval in five states and with the Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission."

Proxy Adviser Backs Boston Scientific-Guidant Deal. Dow Jones (3/21, Kamp) reports, "Shareholders of Boston Scientific Corp. and Guidant Corp. should approve the consolidation of the two companies in votes scheduled for March 31, according to Institutional Shareholder Services, an influential proxy advisory firm." Dow Jones continues, "In reports recently directed to shareholders of each company, ISS said 'the acquisition of GDT will allow BSX to diversify its product offerings, adding defibrillators and pacemakers, and should ameliorate some of the concerns regarding future growth.'" Dow Jones adds, "On Jan. 25, Boston Scientific and Guidant announced a merger agreement, under which Boston Scientific will buy Guidant for a combination of cash and stock worth about $27 billion. The deal is valued at $80 a share to Guidant shareholders as long as Boston Scientific shares close within a $22.62-$28.86 collar over a certain period prior to the deal's closing. … So far, Boston Scientific's closing price has largely remained within that range. Boston Scientific recently traded at $23.28, up 66 cents, or 2.9%. … Jim Tobin, Boston Scientific's chief executive, repeated that the acquisition is expected to close in the first week of April. In a recent filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, Boston Scientific said it anticipates antitrust approval for the deal that week."

Lucent Gets FTC Nod To Purchase Riverstone Operations. Dow Jones (3/21) reports, "Lucent Technologies Inc. received antitrust clearance from the Federal Trade Commission to buy the business operations of Riverstone Networks Inc. for $170 million in cash." Dow Jones continues, "The FTC said Monday that on Friday it granted Lucent early termination of the waiting period required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act. … Lucent has said the acquisition would complement its broadband, data and optical-networking products. The transaction is subject to bankruptcy court approval and other conditions."

Analysts Expect Counter-Bid For UK Insurer Prudential. The Financial Times (3/21, Felsted) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0019606

"Image Investors were braced for a counter-bid for Prudential, Britain's second biggest life assurer, after its shares rose 5 per cent above the offer price proposed by Aviva. Shares in Prudential rose 11 per cent to 743½p, ahead of the 706p proposed by Aviva in its all-share offer which, valuing Prudential at £16.8bn. 'The share price is telling you that the market is expecting a counter-bid,' said Roman Cizdyn, an analyst at Oriel Securities. 'As we sit where we are now, Aviva is not likely to succeed. The price is telling you that.'" Aviva CEO Richard Harvey, however, "said a counterbid was 'unlikely' and that consequently, Aviva was not expected to make a hostile offer. 'I think it's unlikely that someone else would come in and that is why we are expecting to proceed on a recommended basis,' Mr. Harvey said. France's Axa is seen as the most likely counter-bidder for Prudential, but some analysts said that it had been reluctant to become involved in contested bid situations in the past."

Aviva CEO Says He'll Seek To Sell Prudential Shareholders On Takeover Proposal. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, A9, Fleming) reports that Harvey, "said he would take his case for a merger with" Prudential "directly to shareholders, overriding Prudential managers' rejection of his unsolicited £17.1 billion (€24.63 billion or $30.04 billion) takeover offer." Harvey "said the two companies have many shareholders in common and that Aviva's investor-relations team is currently working the telephones to explain Aviva's position to investors. 'I expect them to arrange a number of rendezvous for me [with shareholders] in the coming weeks,' Mr. Harvey said." Meanwhile, Prudential officials on Monday continued to voice opposition to the proposal. Prudential Chairman David Clementi "said in a statement that Prudential's potential as a stand-alone company was 'tremendous and distinctive' and that a combination with Aviva would dilute the benefits of its growth."

Belgium Seeks Concessions On GDF-Suez Deal. The AP (3/21) reports, "Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said Monday he plans to hold talks to seek concessions on the French government-backed plan for Gaz de France SA to acquire French utility company Suez SA." The AP continues, "Speaking after a meeting with President Jacques Chirac in Paris, Verhofstadt said he had told the French leader that a GDF-Suez deal should not prevent Belgium from opening its gas and electricity markets to more competition. … Verhofstadt also said the two Paris-based companies would likely have to sell assets in order to meet that requirement." The AP adds, "The GDF-Suez deal was announced by the French government last month just days after Italian power company Enel SPA said it might launch a takeover bid for Suez. … Suez owns Electrabel, the Belgium's largest power company, and GDF holds a sizable stake in its nearest domestic rival, SPE. … Verhofstadt said last week that it would be unacceptable for one company to control 90 percent of his country's electricity market. The Belgian energy regulator is also concerned about the country's nuclear plants coming under French control, according to press reports."

FCC Deregulates Verizon's Big-Business Market. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Schatz) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc. got a boost in the big-business market as federal regulators agreed to deregulate its high-volume data lines for its largest corporate customers." The Journal continues, "The decision by the Federal Communications Commission essentially lifts price controls and possibly reverses some conditions imposed on the New York telecommunications company last year during its acquisition of MCI Inc. It also gives Verizon pricing flexibility for lucrative high-volume services sold to major corporations, although regulations may continue to stay in effect for smaller business customers." The Journal adds, "The action signaled the FCC's willingness to expand phone companies' control over high-speed Internet lines to cover the large corporate market as well as residential customers. … But by granting Verizon's request without guidance, the FCC prompted confusion in the industry Monday. The action could lead to legal challenges by smaller competitors, particularly companies that resell high-volume services, such as Internet access, to small businesses. Also, other phone companies are likely to file requests for similar relief with the FCC."

Kerzner Takes $3 Billion Buyout Offer. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Sanders) reports, "Casino operator Kerzner International Ltd. agreed to be acquired by a consortium of private-equity concerns for $3 billion in cash plus the assumption of $599 million in debt." The Journal continues, "The consortium, including Kerzner Chairman Sol Kerzner and his son, Butch Kerzner, the company's chief executive, agreed to pay $76 a share for the Bahamas-based casino company, an 8% premium to the stock's Friday closing price. The company operates its flagship Atlantis properties in the Bahamas and soon in Dubai, as well as the ultraluxury 'One&Only' hotels in exotic destinations around the world. Kerzner International also receives income from the Mohegan Sun tribal casino in Connecticut, which it developed, and has a large casino at its Atlantis property in the Bahamas." The Journal adds, "If successful in their buyout attempt, the Kerzners would see their ownership stake rise to about 25% from about 10%, Butch Kerzner said in an interview. Kerzner officials insist they 'will actively solicit superior proposals during the next 45 days,' but the proposed deal represents a multiple of about 19 times last year's earnings, according to a person familiar with the situation."

DOJ_NMG_0019607

France Copyright Proposal Would Open Up iTunes. The Financial Times (3/21, Braithwaite) reports, "Apple Computer could on Tuesday be forced to open up its digital music business to competitors after a vote in the French parliament." The Times continues, "The owner of iTunes, the online music store, and the iPod digital music player, will have to choose between making downloaded music compatible with rival platforms or pulling out of France if, as expected, the parliament in Paris approves a draft copyright law." The Times adds, "Software in digital downloads from iTunes prevents music being played by any rival to the popular iPod, but the French bill seeks to impose 'interoperability' on online music stores and break Apple's closed system. … 'It is unacceptable that . . . the key should be controlled by a monopoly. France is against monopolies,' said Martin Rogard, an adviser at the French Culture Ministry. 'The consumer must be able to listen to the music they have bought on no matter what platform.' … Mr Rogard said it was 'desirable' that France led in this respect, but hoped that it was the start of a Europe-wide move to open up digital music."

Supreme Court To Hear Patent Case. The New York Times (3/20, Pollack, 1.19M) reports, "For the first time in a quarter-century, the Supreme Court will hear on Tuesday a case involving the basic question of what type of discoveries and inventions can be patented." Both sides say "the case, which involves a blood test for a vitamin deficiency, could have a wide-ranging impact on the development of diagnostics, perhaps threatening many of the underlying patents for genetic and other medical tests." But "the array of companies filing supporting briefs -- including American Express, Bear Stearns and IBM -- indicates that intellectual property in other fields might also be affected."

Writers See Patent Problems As Structural, Systemic. In an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal (3/21), Adam Jaffe, professor of economics and dean of arts and sciences at Brandeis University, and Josh Lerner, Jacob Schiff Professor of Investment Banking at Harvard Business School, write, "The problems of the U.S. patent system are under discussion today with an urgency not seen in decades. The Supreme Court will soon hear oral arguments in eBay v. MercExchange LLC, which promises to be its most far-reaching examination of patent law in many years. Today the court will also consider LabCorp v. Metabolite Laboratories -- the contested matter is whether a patent can be issued for the correlation between a disease and a naturally occurring substance in the human body. That is: Can you actually patent the laws of nature? And shockingly, Research in Motion has been forced to pay $612 million to prevent all of our BlackBerry handhelds from going dark, even though the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office (USPTO) has indicated that it is likely to find all of the patents behind this ransom demand invalid. Congressional subcommittees, with good reason, have recently held hearings asking fundamental questions about developments like these in the patent system." Jaffe and Lerner adds, "Commentators have tended to focus on the incompetence of the USPTO in allowing 'bad patents.' Others have concluded that the patent system is not working with respect to a particular area of technology. Concerns about software awards led, for instance, Jeff Bezos of Amazon to propose a new patent type for software; others have suggested that biotechnology be excluded in various ways from the patent regime. … We believe, instead, that the problems with the patent system are systemic and fundamental, the result of two congressional changes to the patent system." Jaffe and Lerner concludes, "The protection for true innovators created by a workable patent system is vital to technological change and economic growth. The problems in the existing patent system are structural, and the fundamental solutions need to be structural as well. As much as the USPTO needs to do a better job, it can only do so if the system is modified so that all parties have incentives to help with the job, and the courts provide a reliable backstop when mistakes are made."

ENVIRONMENT:

Kerr-McGee Suit Disputes Federal Oil Royalties. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Levine) reports, "Kerr-McGee Corp., at a time of rising political scrutiny of oil-company profits, is suing the federal government to avoid about $108 million in royalties on its deep-water production in the Gulf of Mexico." The Journal continues, "The issue of royalty payments on Gulf-of-Mexico oil properties owned by the federal government has attracted much criticism in Congress because of high gasoline prices and record oil-company financial results. Some lawmakers have called for a windfall-profits tax on the industry, though such a levy still appears to be a long shot." The Journal adds, "In all, the Interior Department estimates that royalty exemptions in the Gulf of Mexico could cost the U.S. treasury some $7 billion over time, depending on the price of oil and the level of production. … Kerr-McGee, which produces oil and natural gas from 17 deep-water fields in the Gulf, filed suit Friday in federal court in Lake Charles, La. The Oklahoma City company is seeking to overturn a January order by the department's Minerals Management Service division that Kerr-McGee and other oil companies pay more in royalties for the fields. Most oil companies complied with the order, but Kerr-McGee was among three that didn't pay. … The case involves fallout from a 1995 congressional act that, at a time of relatively low oil prices and shrinking U.S. production, attempted to increase oil and natural-gas production from the deep-water sections of the Gulf of Mexico. Water depths there often exceed 2,500 feet, and exploration is expensive and riskier than elsewhere. The congressional act exempted oil companies from royalty payments for millions of barrels of deep-water production for leases obtained from 1996 to 2000 as long as world prices didn't exceed a certain level."

DOJ_NMG_0019608

US Expects Bird Flu This Year. Leaders of three federal agencies Monday warned that the bird flu could reach the USA this year on the wings of migratory birds. However, USA Today (3/21, Manning, 2.31M) reports Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the appearance of the virus "will not constitute a reason for panic," stressing that "a detection of this virus in birds does not signal the start of a pandemic in people." For his part, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said local communities need to make their own pandemic plans, and "any community that fails to prepare with the expectation that the federal government will, at the last moment, be able to come to the rescue will be tragically wrong."

US To Increase Testing Of Wild Birds For Avian Flu. Meanwhile, Interior Secretary Gale Norton said a program to test up to 100,000 wild birds for signs of infection this year will focus on breeding grounds in Alaska and islands in the Pacific where migrating birds from Asia are now heading. The Washington Post (3/21, A5, Stein, 744K) says the program signals a "sharp increase" in the number of testing, and "is part of the Bush administration's $29 million plan to protect the country against the virus." The AP (3/21, Quaid) quotes Norton as saying that the wild bird testing "could reveal 20 to 100 suspected cases of bird flu," although follow-up testing is likely to reveal "dozens" are false alarms. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, 958K) also briefly noted Norton's comments.

US Businesses Prepare For Avian Flu Arrival. The New York Times (3/21, Warner, 1.19M) reports that many US poultry firms, such as Tyson, Pilgrim's Pride, and KFC, "all say they have formed internal avian flu task forces that meet regularly" with government health officials to discuss "what information should go on the companies' Web sites and when, and devising sales loss projections."

FDA To Ban Poultry Use Of Flu Vaccines. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, A4, Zhang, 2.11M) reports "amid concern of a possible avian-flu pandemic," the Food and Drug Administration "moved to ban the poultry industry from using two groups of human antiviral drugs to treat their flocks, for fear that may reduce their effectiveness in humans." The agency is "proposing to ban veterinarians from prescribing" Roche's Tamiflu and GlaxoSmithKline's Relenza for animal use.

Scientists Oppose Removing ESA Protections For Yellowstone Grizzly. A group of 269 scientists have asked the Fish and Wildlife Service on Monday not to lift Endangered Species Act protections for the Yellowstone grizzly bear. The New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) reports that the scientists say removing the protections could jeopardize the bear's survival. The scientists' letter "says the Yellowstone grizzly is cut off from other bears, and therefore new sources of DNA. Because of that, the population needs to be 2,000 to 3,000, the scientists say, to survive a catastrophic event, like disease or the loss of a critical food source."

Conservationists Move To Buy Timber Company Holdings. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/21, A1, Eilperin, 744K) reports that timber companies have been shedding holdings in recent years, which has "spurred a land rush that has conservation groups scrambling to raise money to buy environmentally sensitive tracts in competition with private investors seeking to snap up the land for development. … The consulting firm U.S. Forest Capital estimates that half of all U.S. timberland has changed hands in the past decade. The Bush administration also wants to sell off forest land, by auctioning more than 300,000 acres of national forest to fund a rural school program." However, "if the selling spree continues, environmentalists fear, these areas could be cut up into much smaller parcels in which condominiums and trailer parks would replace soaring trees."

NYTimes Calls Administration Record On Mine Safety "Embarrassing." An editorial in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) says the Bush Administration's "accommodation of the mining industry…has produced a marked decline in major fines for negligent companies. A recent data analysis by The Times documented a risky, business-friendly downturn in penalties since 2001. At the same time, nearly half of the announced fines still go uncollected." In the wake of recent mine deaths, Congress is considering tougher fines for violations, but, "what good are fines if they are not being forcefully used by the federal agencies supposedly responsible for workers' safety?" The Times adds that the Bush Administration begin "an urgent reversal of its embarrassing record on penalizing flagrantly negligent companies."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Sentinel Subcontractors Criticized In GAO Trilogy Audit. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (3/21, Sherman) reports, "Two companies that will share in a new FBI computer contract were singled out in a government audit Monday that questioned $17 million in the agency's computer overhaul." In its review of the Trilogy program, the GAO said that "the FBI and its contractors share the blame for $10 million in questionable costs and for 1,205 pieces of missing computer equipment valued at $7.6 million," citing CACI and Computer Sciences Corp. specifically. But FBI spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan said, "The lessons learned from the Trilogy program are guiding us, and the FBI continues to strengthen our internal controls." She added that "the CSC unit that worked on Trilogy will not be part of the Sentinel project," and "CACI will provide training for new system, as it did for Trilogy."

DOJ_NMG_0019609

ATF Team To Target Violence In Atlanta, Other Cities. The Washington Times (3/21, Seper) reports, "Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday said Atlanta would become the 23rd U.S. city assigned a federal Violent Crime Impact Team in an aggressive effort to make that city safer. … 'The citizens of the city of Atlanta deserve to live free from violent crime,' Mr. Gonzales said in announcing the law-enforcement initiative during a press conference at the U.S. attorney's office in Atlanta. 'VCIT will help make Atlanta safer through a coordinated campaign to investigate and prosecute those individuals who threaten our communities with guns and violence.' … Washington, Baltimore and Richmond are among the other cities participating in the VCIT program." The Times adds, "The VCIT teams, led by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, consist of ATF agents, U.S. marshals, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and federal prosecutors who partner with state and local law-enforcement officers and prosecutors to proactively and aggressively identify, arrest and prosecute those responsible for firearms-related offenses and other violent crimes. … 'Make no mistake about it; Violent Crime Impact Teams have saved lives by getting armed criminals off the streets,' said ATF Director Carl J. Truscott. … Mr. Truscott said the teams use technology and human intelligence to identify geographic areas within cities with violent firearms crime; identify the 'worst' violent offenders, the criminal organizations that support them and armed career criminals; and use criminal investigations and investigative tools and resources to disrupt and dismantle criminal activity being perpetrated by the targeted persons and organizations."

Gonzales Targets Georgia Meth Production. The AP (3/21, Gross) reports, "Anti-methamphetamine laws like the ones passed in Georgia are tamping down the domestic production of the deadly drug, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Monday. … But Gonzales said an increase in the amount of meth being smuggled into the country from Mexico threatens to offset those advances." The AP continues, "Gonzales joined Gov. Sonny Perdue (in Waleska, GA) at a town-hall meeting of law enforcement officials, community activists and others on what they called the methamphetamine crisis in the state. … 'Meth threatens to turn the American dream into the American nightmare - not just for the users, but for their families ... and their communities,' Gonzales said." The AP adds, "The event was held at Reinhardt College in north Georgia's Cherokee County, where there were 490 meth-related arrests and more than $300,000 worth of the drug confiscated by authorities last year, according to Perdue. … The governor highlighted anti-meth measures taken by Georgia's Legislature over the past few years, such as requiring the drug's key ingredients to be moved behind the counter of stores that sell them and making it a felony to cook meth in the presence of a child. … Earlier Monday, Gonzales was in Atlanta to announce the launch of a federal initiative to target violent crime in the worst parts of the city."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/21, Williams) reports, "Much of Georgia's methamphetamine problem starts in Mexico, Gov. Sonny Perdue said Monday, making a good working relationship with federal and foreign authorities increasingly important. … To stress the need for help in combating the highly addictive drug, the governor appeared with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a meeting at Reinhardt College in Cherokee County." The AJC continues, "About 200 people made up the invitation-only group of law enforcement officials, prosecutors, drug rehabilitation professionals and elected officials. … Metro Atlanta has become a hub for eastern U.S. distribution of the drug being manufactured at large clandestine labs in Mexico and in the Western United States, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … Stemming the flow of the drug, known as 'ice,' will take international cooperation, Gonzales said Monday afternoon, noting that he is to meet with the Mexican attorney general in Dallas in May. The United States is training Mexican officials on how to deal with the cleanup of toxic meth labs and other issues, Gonzales said."

Former Baton Rouge Police Officer Charged With Cocaine Possession. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (3/21) reports, "A former Baton Rouge police officer who once went to jail for selling items from the evidence room now faces more prison time after federal agents allegedly found 6 kilograms of cocaine in a trash can in his garage. Daryl W. Davis…was charged Monday. … In an affidavit, DEA Special Agent Mark Lusco writes that investigators believed Davis was 'obtaining multikilograms of cocaine from Houston, Texas, and distributing them in the Baton Rouge area.'"

Accused "Chief" Cocaine Trafficker Appears In Colorado Court. The Aspen (CO) Daily News (3/21)

DOJ_NMG_0019610

reports a Little Annie's Eating House employee "was bound over for trial Monday after the prosecution portrayed him as a chief trafficker of a local cocaine network." Fernando Leal-Ruiz "listened as law-enforcement officers at his preliminary hearing testified that during a Dec. 2 drug raid they saw him reaching in the direction of a plastic bag that was later determined to contain 44 bindles of cocaine. … Monday's hearing was the latest courtroom development concerning the December drug raids of two downtown restaurants in an operation coordinated by local, state and federal authorities."

The Aspen (CO) Times (3/21) reports, "A judge ruled Monday there is enough evidence to try a man on cocaine distribution and conspiracy charges. Fernando Leal-Ruiz of Carbondale was arrested, along with nine others, in the Dec. 2 drug raids on Little Annie's Eating House and Cooper Street Pier. … Monday's preliminary hearing saw testimony by the Aspen police detective who led the raid on Little Annie's, a DEA agent and an immigration officer."

NBA Player's Dismissal Upheld For Violating Drug Policy. The New York Times (3/21, Robbins) reports an arbitrator "ruled in favor of the N.B,A. yesterday and upheld the league's dismissal of Hornets forward Chris Andersen for violating the league's drug policy. … Andersen, dismissed Jan. 27, cannot apply for reinstatement for two years."

The AP (3/20) writes, "According to the league's collective bargaining agreement, a player can be disqualified only for a fourth positive test for performance-enhancing drugs, or a first positive test for 'drugs of abuse.'"

Bolivia Takes Coca Debate To UN. The UK's Independent (3/21) writes, "Bolivia stepped up a long-running battle with Washington this week by taking its campaign to legalize coca plants to the United Nations in a bid to persuade the international community that the leaf should no longer be banned because of its links to the illegal drugs trade." Bolivia "is determined to prove that coca can be the source of legitimate products for export and not just the raw material for cocaine."

The UK's Telegraph (3/20) reports, "Under the slogan 'coca is not cocaine,' politicians, consumers and growers across the Andes are promoting the leaf's qualities and calling for coca-based tea, yoghurt, bread, toothpaste, shampoo and soap to be mass produced and exported."

Government Accused Of Being Willfully Blind To Canada's Marijuana Problem. The BBC (3/21) reports on its Web site, "Nearly half of Canadians admit to smoking marijuana at least once. … Tens of thousands of illegal 'grow-ops' remain in Canada. Estimates suggest marijuana may generate up to C$7bn (£3.5bn; US$6.1bn) a year in BC, the sunny province thought to be at the heart of the industry." The BBC adds that critics "accuse the government of being willfully blind to the historic failures of law enforcement, and ignoring public opinion and the findings of expert committees in favor of a policy of demonizing marijuana."

Former German Track Coach Convicted Of Doping Athletes. The AP (3/20) reports, "Former German track coach Thomas Springstein was convicted of doping charges Monday and given a 16-month suspended prison sentence. The court found the 47-year-old Springstein guilty on charges including the alleged doping of young athletes in 2003. … Springstein was accused of supplying testosterone to his athletes, including a 16-year-old girl."

IMMIGRATION:

Melloan Says Illegal Aliens Should Be Given Green Cards. George Melloan writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/21, Melloan, 2.11M) that "US immigration policy is a mess. … The equation is simple: The US needs labor; immigrants supply labor. So the solution is to find ways to bring the two together in some legal, orderly way." Melloan adds, "Offering to give illegals green cards and wipe the slate clean is the only practical solution. If they come forward, they can stay on their jobs and travel back and forth to their homes legally. Some who have been trapped in the U.S. by their inability to travel freely will choose to go home permanently. There will be less incentive to sneak in family members, since it will be possible to visit relatives or send remittances."

TAX:

Tax Refund Advances Under Attack. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Opdyke) reports, "A variety of companies are trying to get their hands on your tax refund before you do, and state law-enforcement officials are cracking down on some of the practices." The Journal continues, "As the April tax-filing deadline approaches, businesses from tax-preparation firms to auto dealerships are offering consumers the opportunity to put their expected refund checks to work weeks before the IRS sends them out -- often by loaning them the expected amount for a high fee. Dozens of retailers, including Olive Garden restaurants and AMC move theaters, have begun offering gift cards in exchange for tax refunds to people who file using TurboTax, the popular tax-preparation software. H&R Block Inc. recently launched savings accounts for customers to channel their tax refunds. And hundreds of car dealerships will prepare your taxes if your refund is applied toward a down payment on a car." The Journal adds, "But now, state officials are clamping down on some of these programs, claiming they saddle low and moderate-income families, recent college graduates and others with high fees. Last year about three of every four tax filers received a refund, according to the Internal Revenue Service. Those refunds totaled nearly $218 billion, or about $2,171 per household."

DOJ_NMG_0019611

Training Of Pastors On GOTV Activities May Lead To IRS "Crackdown." The New York Times (3/21, Kirkpatrick, 1.19M) reports, "Weeks after the Internal Revenue Service announced a crackdown on political activities by churches and other tax-exempt organizations, a coalition of nonprofit conservative groups is holding training sessions to enlist Pennsylvania pastors in turning out voters for the November elections." The Times adds, "Experts in tax law said the sessions, organized by four groups as the Pennsylvania Pastors Network, could test the promises by the tax agency to step up enforcement of the law that prohibits such activity by exempt organizations. Such a test could define the boundaries for churches and other groups." Although "the tax agency has often overlooked political activity by churches, it has repeatedly warned the clergy and religious groups that it intends to enforce its rules with new vigor this yea."

Justices Reject Former Arkansas Governor's Whitewater Appeal. The AP (3/21, Zeman) reports, "The seven-year, $70 million Whitewater investigation that toppled an Arkansas governor and dogged Bill Clinton for most of his presidency officially drew to a close Monday when the US Supreme Court declined to hear the last remaining appeal." Former Gov. Jim Guy Tucker "had asked the high court to let him withdraw a guilty plea in a tax-conspiracy case that he said was based on an outdated law." Tucker "was accused of crookedly scheming to reduce his tax liability on the sale of cable television system." The Washington Times (3/21, Seper, 90K) also reports the story, saying the Whitewater probe "netted 14 guilty verdicts or pleas."

Overpayment Of Taxes Is Growing Trend. USA Today (3/21, Cauchon, 2.31M) reports, "Taxpayers overpaid their federal income taxes by a record 29% in both 2003 and 2004, according to a USA TODAY analysis of Internal Revenue Service data. That has pushed refunds above $200 billion a year. Final figures aren't in for the 2005 tax year, but the average refund so far is $2,423, up 4% from last year. The fatter refunds are the result of taxpayers withholding nearly twice the traditional safety margin from their paychecks to avoid a year-end tax bill." USA adds, "Overwithholding has grown fastest among families earning $50,000 or less a year because they benefit most from tax credits. Many low-income families obtain refund anticipation loans, which typically cost $100 or more, to get their money about 10 days earlier than from Internal Revenue Service."

Taxpayer Advocate Is Public's Designated Voice At IRS. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Matthews, 2.11M) profiles National Taxpayer Advocate Nina Olson. As advocate, "one of her tasks is to tell [IRS Commissioner Mark] Everson what he's doing wrong -- and to take action if, in her view, injustices against taxpayers aren't resolved fairly and quickly." Olson "is the designated 'voice' of the taxpayer within the IRS. Congress created the position in 1998, when the IRS was under criticism for being unyielding and heavy-handed with taxpayers. Ms. Olson was appointed in 2001.'

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Signs Debt Limit Increase Into Law. The A2 (3/21) reports, "With no fanfare, President Bush signed a bill Monday pushing the ceiling on the national debt to nearly $9 trillion." The debt limit increase "was the fourth of Bush's presidency, totaling $3 trillion. With the budget deficit near record levels, an additional increase in the debt limit almost certainly will be required next year."

Bush Signs Bill Increasing Energy Aid To Poor. The AP (3/21) reports, "Federal aid to help the poor cope with energy costs will increase by $1 billion to more than $3 billion this year under legislation President Bush signed on Monday." The $1 billion, "on top of $2.1 billion already allotted for the current budget year, was obtained by transferring money originally intended for the budget year that begins Oct. 1."

Study Finds Fewer Choices In Medicare Drug Plans. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Alonso-Zaldivar, 958K) reports that an independent study of the Medicare prescription benefit "has concluded that many low-income California seniors now have access to a narrower range of drugs than when the state covered their medications." The program "contains pitfalls for middle-class beneficiaries as well, the report said, because of wide differences in the number of drugs the private Medicare prescription plans cover." Medicare administrator Mark McClellan "took issue with the report's conclusions Monday, saying that many of the medications that plans do not cover have generic equivalents that cost much less and are paid for by the plans."

Education Department Official To Leave Post. The New York Times (3/21, Schemo, 1.19M) reports, "The federal Education Department's top official overseeing colleges and universities has resigned and will become deputy staff director of the House committee on education, the panel announced on Monday." The official, Sally L.

DOJ_NMG_0019612

Stroup, the assistant secretary for postsecondary education, "said in an interview on Monday that she submitted her resignation last Wednesday and would leave the department in mid-April. 'I've been here four years,' Ms. Stroup said. '"That was long enough.'" The Times adds, "In moving to Capitol Hill, Ms. Stroup will return to her onetime employer, officially known as the Committee on Education and the Workforce, for which she had worked for seven years."

Republicans Make Play For Firefighters' Union. The New York Times (3/21, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports, "With the election season heating up, the Bush administration and the Republican Party used a good deal of energy and charm on Monday to woo a group that has long been part of the Democrats' base: organized labor." Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff; Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska; and the Republican National Committee chairman, Ken Mehlman, "spoke to the annual legislative conference of the main firefighters' union, saying they were eager to work with the union on issues of common ground." The White House chief of staff, Andrew H. Card Jr., "had been scheduled to speak, but canceled, citing illness." Harold A. Schaitberger, the president of the International Association of Fire Fighters "and the first prominent labor leader to back Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts, for president in 2004, voiced the views of an increasing number of union leaders in saying it was important to work with Republicans."

Allen's "Paycheck Penalty" Legislation Unpopular In Congress. The Washington Times (3/21, Bellantoni, 90K) reports, "Sen. George Allen, testing the 2008 presidential waters while facing his own re-election in the fall, says members of Congress should not get paid if they miss the deadline for passing a federal budget." Allen's "so-called 'paycheck penalty' proposal has piqued the interest of fiscal conservatives, but is unpopular among his colleagues." His "critics call the proposal disingenuous, noting that last week the senator voted to increase the federal debt limit to $9 trillion."

Jackson Takes Mentoring Next Generation Seriously. The Washington Post (3/21, Blumenfeld, 744K) reports on Housing and Urban Development Secretary Alphonso Jackson's mentoring of Jerell Blakeley, a Howard University Student. Jackson, who grew up in Texas as the youngest of 12 children believes his "happy ending is meaningless….unless it is retold through the lives of other young blacks. It is why he reached out to Blakeley and why, on weekends, he is tape-recording his memoirs for his first grandchild. Jackson is a grandfather now and has a story to tell, one that he hopes will cast a spell."

West Texas Eliminated As Possible Site For Bush Library. The Washington Post (3/21, A15, 744K) reports that West Texas has been dropped from consideration as a site for President Bush's Presidential Library. The West Texas Coalition "had proposed a contemporary-style or Spanish Renaissance library on 100 acres west of Texas Tech's Health Science Center and, at Midland College, a Laura Welch Bush Center for Early Literacy." The Post adds, "Still in the running as library sites are Southern Methodist University in Dallas (Laura Bush's alma mater), the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco. Although SMU has little land available for new building, it is perceived to be the favorite because Laura Bush is a member of the board of trustees."

Intelligence Community To Move Toward Common Pay System This Year. The Washington Post (3/21, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The intelligence community…plans to take the first steps this year toward pulling its tens of thousands of employees into a common pay system." The "departments of Homeland Security and Defense have firmed up plans to roll out performance-based pay systems this year. Pay changes also may come to parts of the FBI, such as its new national security branch."

Teacher's Union Official Opposes Bush Adjunct Faculty Proposal. Tom Mooney, president of the Ohio Federation of Teachers, writes in USA Today (3/21, 2.31M), "The Bush administration's proposal to import the concept of adjunct faculty from higher education and apply it to America's high schools is just another quick-fix attempt to avoid tackling the real problems that limit and drain the teaching talent pool. Low pay, poor working conditions and the lack of opportunity for advancement cause too many talented people to take a pass or just pass through. … The president's proposal is unlikely to be helpful, and it could erode the quality of teaching in America's high schools. The last thing secondary education needs is to replicate the extensive use of exploited adjunct faculty that is turning our public colleges and universities into academic sweatshops."

USA Today Makes Case For Proposal. An accompanying editorial in USA Today (3/21, 2.31M), "Teachers' union leaders are resisting a plan by President Bush to build an 'adjunct teacher corps' of 30,000 experienced scientists and mathematicians…to assist in the nation's schools. The union leaders say raising teacher pay and improving working conditions, not bring in outside experts, is the way to enhance math and science teaching." USA adds that "Bush's $25 million adjunct teacher plan, being considered by Congress, could prove invaluable. Some of these volunteer experts might advise teachers and mentor students. … Other scientists might become certified to try teaching as a full-time second career." Teachers "should see them as educational partners, not as a threat to their livelihoods."

DOJ_NMG_0019613

Professor Criticizes Feingold Censure Plan. H. W. Brands, a history professor at the University of Texas at Austin, writes in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M) that history shows that Sen. Russ Feingold should "move carefully" in his effort to censure President Bush for authorizing wiretaps of Americans without court orders. If Feingold "hopes to discredit Mr. Bush, as he doubtless does, I'd suggest he find means other than censure."

Marcus Criticizes Administration "Manliness." Ruth Marcus writes in the Washington Post (3/21, A17, 744K), "I have a new theory about what's behind everything that's wrong with the Bush administration: manliness." In his book "Manliness," Harvard professor Harvey C. Mansfield argues that manliness "seeks and welcomes drama and prefers times of war, conflict, and risk." The manliness of the Bush White House "has a darker side that has proved more curse than advantage. The prime example is the war in Iraq: the administration's assertion of the right to engage in preemptive and unilateral war; the resolute avoidance of debate about the "slam-dunk" intelligence on weapons of mass destruction; the determined lack of introspection or self-doubt about the course of the war; and the swaggering dismissal of dissenting views as the carping of those not on the team." Marcus adds, "What this country could use is a little less manliness -- and a little more of what you would describe as womanly qualities: restraint, introspection, a desire for consensus, maybe even a touch of self-doubt."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Says Low Rates Not Indicative Of Looming Slowdown. USA Today (3/21, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Monday the fact that long-term interest rates have stayed low, even though the central bank has been raising short-term rates since mid-2004, does not indicate a major, looming economic slowdown." But "in a speech to the Economic Club of New York, Bernanke said the reasons for the tame long-term rates, unusual during a period of Fed tightening, are unclear, as are the implications for future policy." USA Today adds, "If low long-term rates signal investor expectations of a slower economy, a Fed response might be to ease short-term rates. If other factors, such as a decline in long-term inflation fears or higher demand, are in play, that would be more stimulative, and the Fed might need a higher short-term rate, he said."

The New York Times (3/21, Porter, 1.19M) reports the Fed chairman said he is "skeptical about the argument that the economy will slow in the near future, a view that many investors may take as a sign that the Fed is not quite near the end of its string of interest rate increases," and the Financial Times (3/21, Balls) runs a similar report under the headline "Bernanke Dismisses Fears Of US Slowdown." The Washington Post (3/21, D3, Henderson, 744K) also reports the story.

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/21, Ip, 2.11M) says that "for the first time since Mr. Bernanke became chairman, the Fed's policy-making committee meets Monday and Tuesday. It is expected to raise the funds rate by one-quarter percentage point to 4.75%." It also "is likely to signal a bias to raise rates further, though possibly with less certainty than it has to date."

Leading Indicators Down 0.2% In February. The Wall Street Journal (3/21, McAuley, 2.11M) reports, "A gauge of future economic activity slipped 0.2% in February to 139, according to preliminary estimates by the Conference Board." The group said "its composite index of leading indicators edged down in February after a revised 0.5% increase in January, when the index was originally reported to have increased 1.1%. The February reading for the leading index came in slightly less weak than the -0.3% median estimate of 21 economists surveyed by Dow Jones Newswires." The index "was equal to 100 in 1996."

US Gasoline Prices Up 14 Cents In One Week; Oil Prices Down. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 8, 0:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "If you are trying to outrun the spring storms and head somewhere warm, it will cost you. Gas prices jumped nearly 14 cents a gallon since last week to just above $2.50 a gallon nationwide. That is the third-biggest weekly jump ever and the highest price ever for the month of March." Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (3/21, Civils, 2.11M) reports oil prices "plunged Monday," with "benchmark light, sweet crude futures for April, set to expire Tuesday," falling "$2.35, or nearly 4%, to settle at a one-week low of $60.42 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange."

Stock Markets Have Mixed Finish. NBC Nightly News (3/20, story 9, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks finished narrowly mixed. The Dow was down just over 5 points on the day [to close at 11,274.53]. The NASDAQ gained nearly 8 points [to close at 2,314.11]." The Wall Street Journal (3/21, Browning, 2.11M) reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index "fell 0.17%, or 2.17 points, to 1305.08, up 4.6% this year."

"Da Vinci Code" Trial Wraps Up In London. The Washington Post (3/21, C1, Sullivan) reports, "The 'Da Vinci Code' copyright infringement trial, which ended in a London courtroom Monday, combined lively peeks into a celebrity author's lifestyle and hours of legal arcana so numbing that they put a white-wigged attorney to sleep within feet of the judge." The Post continues, "Fans of media-shy author Dan Brown learned that his inspiration to write fiction came on a Tahitian vacation when he read Sidney Sheldon's alien-invasion thriller 'The Doomsday Conspiracy.' The next day lawyers were arguing about obscure points of religious history, such as whether and why Pepin the Fat murdered Dagobert II, and what Godefroi de Bouillon was really up to during the First Crusade." The Post adds, "In 12 days of testimony over three weeks, authors Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh tried to prove that Brown stole the idea for his mega-selling novel from a nonfiction book they published in 1982, 'The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail.' Judge Peter Smith, a man so soft-spoken that his words often seemed to have trouble escaping his thick black mustache, said he hoped to issue a ruling by April 8. … At stake is a multimillion-dollar slice of Brown's pie, which includes sales of nearly 40 million books and an upcoming Hollywood film starring Tom Hanks that, if 'Da Vinci's' luck holds, is expected to sell movie tickets and Raisinets from here to the Sea of Tranquillity. (And next week the paperback, a massive 5 million copies, will finally hit U.S. shelves.)"

DOJ_NMG_0019614

Penn Says Swing Voters, Not Base, Key To Election Victories. Mark J. Penn, head of a polling firm that conducted surveys for President Bill Clinton in 1996, writes in the Washington Post (3/21, A17, 744K), "We hear it every day: America is divided into two camps -- red and blue -- and the key to elections is just energizing the base. But in fact, while the base is critical, it's not the whole picture. Behind all the rhetoric, the reality is that swing is still king. The two or three or 10 voters who are the quietest in focus groups, who never demonstrate and who belong to no political party, will be the ones who determine the political course of America. … Recent polls show that rather than a static electorate, we have a dynamically changing one. Based on the polls six months ago, journalists were declaring Republican hegemony. Today, Democrats have the widest margin in two decades on the generic congressional vote."

Gore Says He Has No Plan To Run For President In 2008. The Washington Times (3/21, Pierce, 90K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column, "Former Vice President Al Gore said yesterday he has no plans to run for president in 2008, but hasn't ruled out a future in politics." However, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution (3/21, Shepard, 430K) reports that "even those who were part of his inner circle in 2000," when Al Gore "lost the White House to George W. Bush in one of the closest and most controversial presidential elections in American history, still don't have a clear idea what the former vice president is thinking in terms of a 2008 campaign. … Speculation about Gore's intentions has intensified in recent weeks due to three events: his Martin Luther King Jr. holiday speech in January lambasting the president for 'breaking the law' with his warrantless domestic surveillance program; his message to Democratic donors in February soliciting funds for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee; and his party fund-raising appearances this month in Florida, the scene of the contentious vote recount that ended with a Supreme Court ruling that made Bush president in the 2000 election." Gore's activities "prompted pollster Lee Miringoff to include Gore in a recent poll on possible Democratic 2008 contenders. It found Gore was second only to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. Clinton was the favorite of 33 percent, Gore was the choice of 17 percent."

Rice Not Applying For NFL Commissioner. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Monday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is not applying for the NFL commissioner's job which has recently become open. The AP (3/21) reports, "Rice, who is avid particularly in support of the Cleveland Browns, is enjoying being secretary of state 'at the moment,' spokesman Sean McCormack said. The wiggle-room in his response after NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced he would retire resonated off frequent only half-joking statements by Rice that as a lifelong football fan she aspires to run the league one day."

Dell To Double Its Workforce In India. Dell plans to double its employee strength in India to 20,000. The New York Times (3/21, Rai, 1.19M) reports, "Dell, which is based in Round Rock, Tex., has four call centers in India, where the bulk of its 10,000 employees work, as well as software development and product testing centers." The Times adds, "Salaries in India are rising rapidly, but still are about a fifth of what they are in the West for comparable jobs. … In a market where the penetration of computers is very low, companies such as Dell are eager to set up a manufacturing base to help expand sales. Dell accounts for about four percent of the 4 million computers purchased in India."

Dionne Says Republican Moderates Are Gone. E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (3/21, 744K), "Boehlert chose to retire in the year when National Journal, the political world's answer to Sports Illustrated, featured him as the ultimate 'Down the Middle' guy. In its Feb. 25 issue, the magazine published its annual ratings, which showed that Boehlert's votes were more liberal than those of 52.2 percent of House members and more conservative than 47.8 percent." Dionne adds, "I'll miss Boehlert and his optimistic moderation. Our politics worked better when a sufficiently large band of Republican moderates and liberals could take the edge off polarization and orient government toward problem-solving."

DOJ_NMG_0019615

WPost Objects To Ginsburg Insinuations In Making Foreign Law Argument. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/21, 744K) says, "In a speech last month at the Constitutional Court of South Africa, Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg made some unfair insinuations about critics of the use of foreign law in American courts. Justice Ginsburg was defending what is, in our view, a perfectly defensible proposition: that American courts should 'learn from legal systems with values and a commitment to democracy similar to our own.' Yet in doing so, she managed to link those who take an opposing view to the legacies of slavery and apartheid and to paint them as 'fuel[ing] the irrational fringe' in its threats against judges." The Post adds, "We agree with Justice Ginsburg and the court majority that American courts need not pretend that foreign courts do not exist. … Justice Ginsburg has a strong case to make without stooping to such insinuations."

US Officials Believe Iran Aiding Al Qaeda. The Los Angeles Times (3/21, Meyer, 958K) reports, "US intelligence officials, already focused on Iran's potential for building nuclear weapons, are struggling to solve a more immediate mystery: the murky relationship between the new Tehran leadership and the contingent of Al Qaeda leaders residing in the country. Some officials, citing evidence from highly classified satellite feeds and electronic eavesdropping, believe the Iranian regime is playing host to much of Al Qaeda's remaining brain trust and allowing the senior operatives freedom to communicate and help plan the terrorist network's operations." They also "suggest that new President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad may be forging an alliance with Al Qaeda operatives as a way to expand Iran's influence or, at a minimum, that he is looking the other way as Al Qaeda leaders in his country collaborate with their counterparts elsewhere."

Bush Warns Iran He Would Use Military Force To Defend Israel. AFP (3/20) reports, "US President George W. Bush said he hoped to resolve the nuclear dispute with Iran with diplomacy, but warned Tehran he would 'use military might' if necessary to defend Israel." Said Bush, "The threat from Iran is, of course, their stated objective to destroy our strong ally Israel. That's a threat, a serious threat. It's a threat to world peace. … I made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally Israel."

Key Security Council Members Cannot Agree On Tehran Strategy. The Washington Post (3/21, A12, Lynch, 744K) reports Germany and the five permanent members of the UNSC "failed to reach agreement at a meeting Monday on how to respond to the Iranian nuclear crisis but said they would forge ahead in the coming days to break the impasse." While the British representative denied that London has offered a new diplomatic solution, Under Secretary Burns "said the United States is not going to participate in direct negotiations with Iran on the nuclear issue." The Post says the meeting's six-way joint statement resulting "echoed an agreement Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had reached with those five governments in January." The AP (3/21, Lederer, Jahn) reports Britain "is calling for new talks with Iran about its suspect nuclear program but will push for militarily enforceable U.N. Security Council sanctions if those talks do not make progress, according to a letter obtained by The Associated Press." The proposal is angled toward Russia and China, allies of Tehran who staunchly oppose firm Security Council action."

Ahmadinejad Says West Should Apologize. The AP (3/21, Karimi) reports Ahmadinejad yesterday "said the West should apologize to Iran for accusing it of trying to develop a nuclear weapons program and said his country would continue to resist international pressure to halt its nuclear energy program."

Iranian Jews Fear Fallout. The Washington Times (3/21, Bradley, 90K) reports, "Members of Iran's Jewish community fear they are being set up to take the blame if President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's drive to establish a nuclear program ends badly for the country." Members of the "30,000-strong community" say "they already are being viewed as a potential fifth column after a series of speeches in which the firebrand president has spoken of a 'Holocaust myth' and heaped scorn on Europe for its defense of the 'Zionist entity.'"

More Commentary. Jessica T. Matthews, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, writes in the New York Times (3/21, 1.19M), "The idea that 'it's too late' to stop Iran's progress toward building nuclear weapons is technologically wrong. 'There's nothing we can do about it' ignores a range of options between economic sanctions, going to war and more of doing nothing. And the argument that "we can learn to live with it" misses the nature of the challenge." A nuclear Iran "is dangerous enough, but this crisis is only proximately about Iran. More important, it is about the likely consequence of an Iranian bomb, namely, that Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Egypt would produce their own bombs, and, thanks to the concomitant international failure to deal with North Korea, the nonproliferation regime would collapse. What is at stake is not a choice between 9 and 10 nuclear weapons states, but a choice between 9 and 30 or more."

Israel Briefly Reopens Gaza Crossing. The New York Times (3/21, Myre, 1.19M) reports, "Israel reopened the main freight crossing to the Gaza Strip on Monday to allow delivery of flour and sugar to the Palestinians. But it abruptly closed the crossing after just a half-hour, citing security threats." The Israeli military "said there were security alerts, but did not provide additional details."

DOJ_NMG_0019616

After Rice Meeting, Bahrain Leader Calls On Hamas To Engage Israel. The AP (3/21, Schweid) reports, "An Arab leader said Monday a Hamas-led Palestinian government has no alternative but to deal with Israel. 'They will be obliged to do that because the Palestinians, as a government, deal with Israel,' Crown Prince Salman bin Hamad bin Isa Al-Khalifa of Bahrain told reporters after meeting with Secretary...Rice. 'How can they deal with Israel if they don't recognize Israel?'" The crown prince went on to say, "This is an international Palestinian issue. ... We encourage our Palestinian brothers to be committed to all the agreements they were committed to over all the long years."

Nunn Voices "Serious Concerns" About India Nuclear Deal. The Washington Post (3/21, A9, Kessler, 744K) reports Nuclear Threat Initiative co-chair and former Senate Armed Services Chair Sam Nunn "said yesterday that he has serious concerns the [India nuclear] deal would harm the 'United States' vital interest' in preventing nuclear proliferation and urged Congress to set conditions for its support." The Post calls Nunn's remarks "a setback for the administration's efforts to win approval of" the nuclear pact. Nunn "said he is concerned it would lead to the spread of weapons-grade nuclear material, unleash a regional arms race with China and Pakistan, and make it more difficult for the United States to win support for sanctions against nuclear renegades such as Iran and North Korea." The Post repeats Under Secretary Burns' remarks last week "that congressionally mandated conditions could cause the agreement to unravel. He and other administration officials say the agreement is a groundbreaking achievement that will bring India, which has not signed the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, into the nonproliferation mainstream, while bolstering U.S.-India ties and adding jobs to the U.S. economy."

NATO Secretary-General Pledges Alliance Force For Darfur. The AP (3/20, Schweid) reports NATO Secretary-General Jaap De Hoop Scheffer told President Bush Monday that "NATO is prepared to support a U.N. force in the Darfur region of Sudan." The AP notes that "Bush has called for greater NATO involvement in Darfur" but "said the African Union must request that its mission in Darfur be converted to a U.N. mission. When that happens, NATO can move in with U.S. help 'to make it clear to the Sudanese government that we're intent upon providing security for the people there and intent upon helping work toward a lasting peace agreement.'" The AP reports Secretary Rice made similar statements after her meeting with De Hoop Scheffer. Assistant Secretary McCormack "issued a statement, meanwhile, criticizing the Sudanese government's closing of several U.S.-supported social development, health and food distribution offices. [He] urged the government in Khartoum to remove immediately all obstacles to delivery of humanitarian assistance and to provide protection for civilians and aid workers."

US Calls For New Belarus Vote. The New York Times (3/21, Chivers, Myers, 1.19M) reports, "The United States declared the results of the president election in Belarus invalid on Monday and called for a new race, even as President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko defiantly swept aside criticism and declared himself the winner of a third term." White House spokesman Scott McClellan is quoted saying, "The United States does not accept the results of the election. ... We support the call for a new election." Appearing on state television after official results gave him 83 percent of the vote, "Mr. Lukashenko exuded confidence and said the outcome had 'convincingly demonstrated who the Belarussians are and who is the master of our house.'"

The Washington Post (3/21, A1, Finn, 744K) adds, "The United States will work with the European Union to possibly freeze the foreign assets of Belarussians responsible for electoral fraud or human rights violations." McClellan is quoted saying the campaign "was conducted in a climate of fear. It included arrests and beatings and fraud. We applaud democrats in Belarus for their courage and peaceful stand." Bloomberg (3/21, Neuger) adds, "The Vienna-based Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe said about 400 observers found 'substantial empirical evidence' of fraud. The elections were not 'free and fair,' the group said." The Financial Times (3/21, Buckley, Wagstyl, Dombey), Washington Times (3/21, Mainville, 90K), AP (3/21, Danilova) and Christian Science Monitor (3/21, Weir, 61K), among other sources, also report the story.

WPost Says Russia Prefers Dictatorships In Europe. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/21, A16, 744K) says, "After years of tolerating a dictatorship on their borders, European countries finally are taking measures against Belarus. … All of this might have a decisive impact if not for the countervailing influence of Russia, which still prefers dictatorships in Europe. The Post notes that the G8 Chairman, Russian President Vladimir Putin, "publicly congratulated Mr. Lukashenko yesterday." Putin's policy "is to preserve Russia's domination of its neighbor by backing a dictator who falsifies elections, has murdered leading opponents and enriches himself through arms sales to such countries as Iran and Sudan. That presumably won't stop President Bush and the six other leaders of Western democracies from toasting their G-8 chairman in St. Petersburg this summer. Too bad the national security strategy seems not to extend that far; Mr. Putin's emerging autocracy also deserves some adversaries."

DOJ_NMG_0019617

