Cheney and Libby got to know each other when Cheney was defense secretary under the first President Bush. Libby has been extremely loyal to Cheney and, in return, had the vice president's unwavering trust.

By 2000, Libby was working as a top adviser to Cheney in the presidential campaign and then followed him to the White House. In the White House, he was known as "Cheney's Cheney" for being as trusted a problem solver for the vice president as Cheney was for Bush.

Even after Libby's indictment, Cheney called him "one of the finest men I've ever known."

In addition to Cheney, other government officials and journalists are expected to be key witnesses in the trial, which is scheduled to start next month.

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert are expected to be prosecution witnesses. Libby's lawyers said in court papers that several reporters will testify on Libby's behalf.

Two unidentified reporters may resist testifying, Libby's attorneys said, but they expect to resolve that issue before trial.

Cheney Testimony Could Exacerbate White House Woes (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney's testimony in the trial of his former top aide will add to White House political problems, at a time when President Bush will be seeking to rebuild his eroded standing.

DOJ_NMG_0107807

Attorneys for Mr. Cheney's indicted former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, confirmed in court yesterday that they plan to call the vice president as a witness in Mr. Libby's perjury and obstruction-of-justice case. The trial is scheduled to start next month.

Mr. Libby is accused of misleading investigators about his role in leaking the identity of a former Central Intelligence Agency agent, Valerie Plame, to reporters. Several administration officials began discussing her identity with reporters soon after her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, started criticizing the administration's use of prewar intelligence concerning Iraq's nuclear-weapons program.

A Cheney spokeswoman suggested he doesn't plan to resist. "We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so," said Lea Anne McBride.

The spectacle of the vice president testifying in court is likely to deepen the White House's public-relations problems, as Democrats on Capitol Hill also will launch investigations of the administration in a number of areas, including its conduct of the Iraq war.

Mr. Cheney's role already has been a source of political pain for the White House. From an early point, the criminal investigation focused on his office, although other administration aides, including Karl Rove, also discussed Ms. Plame with reporters. More recently, details of Mr. Cheney's role have emerged in filings by Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald.

Mr. Libby testified before the grand jury that the vice president was upset about Mr. Wilson's criticisms. "He was very keen to get the truth out," Mr. Libby testified. He quoted Mr. Cheney as saying, "Let's get everything out."

Mr. Libby's defense team has hinted he will argue, among other things, he misremembered dates and details of certain conversations. Mr. Libby's defense would be helped if the vice president can buttress those claims. The vice president also could provide some of the policy reasons why the administration was interested in undercutting Mr. Wilson's story.

Cheney Will Testify In C.I.A. Leak Case (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19 — Vice President Dick Cheney will be summoned as a defense witness in the trial of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice, a defense lawyer said Tuesday in federal court. A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney signaled that he would not resist the request for his testimony.

The decision to call Mr. Cheney was announced by Theodore V. Wells, a lawyer for Mr. Libby, whose trial is scheduled to begin next month.

“We’re calling the vice president,” Mr. Wells said at a hearing before Judge Reggie B. Walton in Federal District Court.

Mr. Cheney has been a looming presence in the C.I.A. leak case from the start, and his appearance as a defense witness would keep the vice president and the White House in the foreground of Mr. Libby’s trial. Mr. Libby is the only person charged with a crime as a result of an investigation into whether anyone in the Bush administration intentionally leaked the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency officer.

After the announcement at Tuesday’s hearing, Lea Anne McBride, Mr. Cheney’s spokeswoman, said: “We’ve cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so in fairness to the parties involved. And as we’ve stated previously, we’re not going to comment further on the legal proceedings.”

The prospect of Mr. Cheney’s testimony suggested that Mr. Libby’s trial could be transformed from a narrowly gauged perjury case into a riveting courtroom drama with the taciturn vice president as the star witness. He would testify under oath and be exposed to cross-examination by prosecutors.

Mr. Cheney would be the first sitting vice president, at least in modern times, to appear as a witness in a criminal trial, said Prof. Joel Goldstein of the St. Louis University Law School, an authority on the vice presidency.

Although Mr. Cheney has been a vigorous proponent of sweeping executive authority, which includes the notion that the president and perhaps other high officials could resist calls to testify in criminal trials involving their official conduct, his appearance may not set precedents, legal experts said. That is mostly because the Libby case presents a different situation from one in which such officials are subpoenaed to testify, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0107808

Mr. Cheney appears to have voluntarily agreed to testify on behalf of Mr. Libby, whom he has steadfastly supported. It is unclear whether Mr. Cheney would appear personally in the courtroom or seek to testify in a less exposed manner like having his testimony taken at the White House and introduced into the trial by videotape.

The trial stems from the disclosure of the identity of Valerie Wilson as a C.I.A. officer in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak. The fallout from that disclosure led to an investigation by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, a special prosecutor, into whether the leak violated any laws and whether Ms. Wilson's name was disclosed as part of a campaign to punish her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador, for his criticism of the White House.

Mr. Wilson wrote an opinion article in The New York Times on July 6, 2003 — shortly before the Novak column — in which he claimed that the White House had twisted intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq. He wrote that he had personally investigated whether Iraq bought uranium in Africa and had not found any basis for that belief.

Mr. Fitzgerald did not bring any charges in connection with laws that prohibit the willful disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity as a covert operative. But he did indict Mr. Libby, also known as Scooter, on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice, saying he had untruthfully testified to a grand jury and federal agents when he said he had learned about Ms. Wilson's role at the C.I.A. from reporters rather than from several officials, including Mr. Cheney.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have said, in court papers, that they will seek to demonstrate that he had no motive to lie and that if he made any inaccurate statements about his conversations with reporters, they were a result of his being distracted by far more important issues of national security.

In his testimony, Mr. Cheney will probably be asked to affirm Mr. Libby's statements that he was occupied with many important issues and that there was no deliberate White House plan to disclose Ms. Wilson's identity.

Prosecutors have said in legal filings that Mr. Cheney played a central role in the White House reaction to Mr. Wilson's Op-Ed article. Mr. Fitzgerald has hinted in filings that Mr. Cheney may be a prosecution witness, although he said at the hearing that the government had no plans to call the vice president.

According to Mr. Libby's grand jury testimony, cited in prosecution legal papers, Mr. Cheney believed that the article falsely attacked his credibility because it asserted that the vice president's office instigated Mr. Wilson's 2002 trip to Niger.

Prosecutors have already disclosed a copy of the article on which Mr. Cheney made handwritten notations asking whether it was Mr. Wilson's wife who sent him on the trip.

In previous legal briefs, prosecutors have said they want to use Mr. Cheney's notes as evidence, saying they show the agitated environment in Mr. Cheney's office and the importance that Mr. Libby attached to the effort to rebut the article.

After Mr. Cheney expressed concern, Mr. Libby told several reporters that Mr. Cheney's office had not sent Mr. Wilson on the trip and that he might have traveled on what was little more than a junket arranged by Ms. Wilson.

With the trial scheduled to start on Jan. 16, Mr. Libby's lawyers and federal prosecutors skirmished throughout the hearing over several likely issues about Mr. Libby's motives and state of mind.

William H. Jeffress Jr., one of the defense lawyers, said he planned to call Mr. Libby as a witness, along with several reporters who interviewed him in mid-2003, to show that Mr. Libby had encouraged the reporters to testify or give depositions in the case.

Atlanta-Area School Board Abandons Evolution Sticker Case (LAW/AP)

By Doug Gross, The Associated Press

Law.com, December 20, 2006

A suburban Atlanta school board that put stickers in high school science books saying evolution is "a theory, not a fact" abandoned its legal battle to keep them Tuesday after four years.

The Cobb County board agreed in federal court never to use a similar sticker or to undermine the teaching of evolution in science classes.

In return, the parents who sued over the stickers agreed to drop all legal action.

"We certainly think that it's a win not just for our clients but for all students in Cobb County and, really, all residents of Georgia," said Beth Littrell of the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia.

DOJ_NMG_0107809

The case briefly became an issue in Kansas in 2005, when Attorney General Phill Kline told State Board of Education members in private meetings that he would defend them if they wanted to put such stickers in textbooks.

The board didn't pursue the idea but instead rewrote science standards to incorporate anti-evolution language. After elections this year overturned the board's 6-4 conservative Republican majorities, those standards are likely to become evolution-friendly again next year.

The Atlanta school board placed the stickers inside the front cover of biology books in 2002 after a group of parents complained that evolution was being taught to the exclusion of other theories, including a literal reading of the biblical story of creation.

The stickers read: "This textbook contains material on evolution. Evolution is a theory, not a fact, regarding the origin of living things. This material should be approached with an open mind, studied carefully and critically considered."

A federal judge ordered the stickers removed in 2005, saying they amount to an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion. The school board appealed, but a federal appeals court sent the case back, saying it did not have enough information.

"We faced the distraction and expense of starting all over with more legal actions and another trial," said board Chairwoman Teresa Plenge. "With this agreement, it is done and we now have a clean slate for the new year."

School board attorney Linwood Gunn said the agreement is not an admission that the stickers were unconstitutional. "The school board attempted to reach what they thought was a reasonable compromise," he said.

The board agreed to pay about one-third of the plaintiffs' court costs, Gunn said.

"The settlement brings to end a long battle to keep our science classes free of political or religious agendas," parent Jeffrey Selman said in a statement handed out by Americans United for Separation of Church and State, one of the groups that represented the plaintiffs.

It was one of several recent battles over what role evolution should play in science education.

Last year, a federal judge barred the Dover, Pa., school district from teaching "intelligent design" as an alternative to evolution.

In 2004, Georgia's state schools superintendent briefly proposed a science curriculum that dropped the word "evolution" in favor of "changes over time." That plan was scrapped amid protests by teachers.

Cobb County has a population of about 660,000.

Copyright 2006 Associated Press. All Rights Reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

Raising The Floor On Pay (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

On the verge of controlling Congress, the Democrats are making a much-delayed increase in the minimum wage their signature attempt to lift incomes and quiet widespread economic anxiety. But the party's modest proposal does not catch up with what the states have already done to raise the wages of tens of millions of workers.

Putting a floor under wages was once the domain of the national government, a legacy of the New Deal that lasted for decades. As recently as 1984, only one state — Alaska — had a higher minimum.

By then, however, Congress no longer regularly increased the minimum. So the states stepped into the vacuum, one after another, everywhere but in the South. In the last election alone, voters in six states approved minimums higher than the federal level, and in some states cost-of-living clauses automatically increase the minimums — a step that Congress has never taken and that most Democrats still balk at.

Some advocates wonder whether Congress can regain the lead, or should. "I am very strongly in favor of populism at the national level, but it is not happening," said Gar Alperovitz, a political economist at the University of Maryland who supports and studies populist movements at the state and local level.

DOJ_NMG_0107810

"The minimum wage is definitely a populist issue," he said, "but to go beyond the present modest effort in Congress, you have to build support state by state until there is a new national consensus as to what the minimum should be. That is a long slog."

The minimum wage is not the only issue in which the states have taken the lead from the federal government. California, for example, has pushed to limit the emission of global warming gases, and New York City has just enacted the first major ban on the use of trans fats in restaurant cooking.

When it comes to the minimum wage, the Democrats plan to introduce a bill in Congress next month that would increase the federal minimum for the first time in a decade — to $7.25 an hour in the spring of 2009, reaching that level in three steps from the present $5.15 an hour.

More than 13 million workers earning less than $7.25 an hour today, or just above that, would get raises. The majority are adults working full time, mainly in the South and Southwest. The 29 states that have jumped ahead of the federal government now have minimums that range from $6.15 to $7.63 an hour, lifting 70 percent of the nation's work force well above the federal level of $5.15. Most of these state minimums have escalators built into them.

As a result, even in the unlikely event that none of the states took any further action, 12 of them, representing 33 percent of the work force, would still have minimums either equal to or above $7.25 an hour in 2009, according to projections by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School.

Many of the state minimums were enacted over the last decade. Indeed, when the federal minimum rose to $5.15 an hour in 1997, less than 5 percent of the work force enjoyed higher state minimums.

"What you have are a growing number of states more oriented toward workers than in the past," said Richard B. Freeman, a Harvard labor economist, adding: "The left is uneasy about states' rights, but people are becoming more progressive at the local level. They can see what is happening to their neighbors, and they are more sympathetic toward the poor, whom they can also see."

Starting in the early 1980s, after Ronald Reagan was elected president, increasing the federal minimum wage by more than token amounts ran into a buzz saw of opposition. Conservative economists contended that regular increases distorted the free supply and demand for workers. Citing longstanding economic research, they said it did more harm than good, prompting employers to drop marginal workers not worth the higher minimum.

That was still the prevailing view in the early 1990s when two labor economists, David Card, now at the University of California, Berkeley, and Alan B. Krueger at Princeton, found that modest increases in low minimum wages had no impact on employment, and in fact might reduce turnover.

The states themselves became tests of this finding. As more of them increased their minimums without measurable effect on employment, the opposition faded. Even the chief critic of the Card-Krueger position, David Neumark, a labor economist at the University of California, Irvine, has softened his position, though he still sees little if any advantage in a higher minimum wage.

"A congressman once said to me, 'Suppose you are right and the minimum wage reduces employment; does that mean we should not raise the minimum?' " Mr. Neumark said in an interview.

"And I said, 'No, I don't know; it depends,' " he went on. "There is some cost to raising the minimum, but there may be some benefit. If I thought one guy would lose his job and a thousand would be lifted out of poverty, I would say that is a pretty good trade-off. But my research says there is no evidence you reduce poverty."

Even the higher state minimums are often not enough to keep millions of workers out of poverty. Consider Elvia Rios, a 43-year-old college graduate from Panama who worked as an executive secretary there before immigrating to the United States three years ago. She earns the New Jersey minimum of $7.15 an hour as a stockroom employee, working 40 hours a week at a large retail store in the center of the state.

Ms. Rios and her 2-year-old daughter are living in a homeless shelter run by the Interfaith Hospitality Network, a nonprofit organization. She gets help with her daily expenses, particularly child care, from charities as well as the state. When Ms. Rios moves into an apartment next month, the state will pay 70 percent of the $1,200-a-month rent for two years. It will do so under an assistance program for women who are victims of domestic violence.

DOJ_NMG_0107811

"The $7.15 an hour is just not enough," Ms. Rios said. "I don't pay any rent right now, but I soon will and I will also have to buy what the child needs."

How much income would be enough? At least $9 an hour, she said, "to live not well but without falling into poverty."

Trying to reach beyond that goal, Ms. Rios plans to enroll in a course that will train her by early spring to care for the elderly — work that in New Jersey pays $12 or $13 an hour, she says.

"The job I do now, I don't like," Ms. Rios said. "I prefer to take care of elderly people or ill people or children."

The decades immediately after World War II were the heyday of the federal minimum wage. Without following any particular formula, Congress periodically ended up setting it at roughly one-half the average hourly pay of the nation's production workers. That average is nearly $17 an hour today; half would be $8.50. By 2009 it is likely to be close to the $9 that Ms. Rios seeks.

Spurred on by last month's election results, the populist wing of the Democratic Party is calling for a return to the old standard. Sherrod Brown, newly elected to the Senate from Ohio, is in that group. So is the A.F.L.-C.I.O., which says that its success in getting out the vote this fall entitles it to a bigger voice in Democratic Party policy.

But they are meeting political resistance from the moderates in the party. Trying to push the populist case, the Economic Policy Institute, a labor-oriented research center, posted a statement in late November calling for an increase in the minimum to $8 an hour in 2009 instead of the $7.25 proposed by the party leaders. That recommendation was quickly withdrawn, however, under pressure from the leadership.

"Our friends on Capitol Hill said our statement would be heard as criticizing the Democrats," said Ross Eisenbrey, the institute's policy director. "It would not be perceived as encouragement to do more; it would be perceived as raining on the parade."

In a second statement, issued this month, the Economic Policy Institute finally endorsed the increase to $7.25, stipulating that once Congress approved this amount, a second bill should be introduced to raise it to a higher $8 in 2009.

Senator-elect Brown and the A.F.L.-C.I.O. have taken similar stands, wanting more but nevertheless endorsing the bill that the Democratic leadership intends to introduce in the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

No Democrat has pushed harder in Congress for increases in the federal minimum wage than Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the bill's author. He was the chief sponsor of the last increase, enacted a decade ago. He first tried to introduce the current proposal in 2004, but was unsuccessful in a Republican-dominated Congress.

Now he and other party leaders argue that they cannot go above a $7.25 minimum wage without risking a presidential veto. Once it becomes law, Senator Kennedy plans to push for an increase beyond $7.25. Still, he acknowledges that the initiative may indeed have passed to the states.

"States have always been the laboratories of democracy, and I am proud of the leadership they have shown on this issue," Senator Kennedy said in a written response to a question. "Philosophically, are we O.K. with leaving the minimum wage in their hands?"

Liberal economists and policy makers are divided on this point. Mr. Alperovitz says there is no other choice but to go with the states. At the federal level, he argues, the Democrats are no longer a powerful source of progressive legislation.

They have lost their influence for three reasons, he said: the decline in union power; the defection of the South to the Republican Party; and the absence of a riveting economic crisis, like the Depression, that demands national solutions.

The problem with letting the initiative shift to the states, argues Ronald Blackwell, chief economist at the A.F.L.-C.I.O., is that the variety of state minimums encourages companies to shift jobs to the lower-wage states.

Mr. Freeman, the Harvard economist, argues in response that the various minimums are useful, reflecting different living costs across the country.

Mississippi, for example, like most Southern states, simply adheres to the federal minimum of $5.15 an hour. If it were forced to go to a $9 federal minimum, the drastic increase, even spread out over two or three years, would eliminate many of the low-end jobs that have migrated to the state, Mr. Freeman said.

On the other hand, that same $9 an hour would be no problem for Washington State, where the minimum is already $7.63 and will rise to $7.94 next year.

DOJ_NMG_0107812

"The fight at the federal level is really no longer over how high the minimum should go," Mr. Freeman said, "but where the low end should be."

Abramoff's Holiday Cheer (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

These days he makes no more than 40 cents an hour for his labors at the federal prison camp at Cumberland, Md. But Christmas 2001 was a far more high-flying holiday for Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who then was paid as much as $500 an hour.

Back then -- before he pleaded guilty to defrauding banks in a deal to buy a casino cruise line -- Abramoff was a top rainmaker at Greenberg Traurig's Washington office and liked to be generous at this time of year, at least to those who could help him. He compiled a list of 45 people to whom his staff was supposed to send gifts such as a Baccarat crystal bowl and a platinum Tiffany clock.

A copy of his holiday gift list, obtained by The Washington Post, details one of the methods that Washington lobbyists can use to flatter clients and lawmakers. It shows that those who had helped enrich Abramoff got a reward, and his father and brother and their wives got either cookies or a fruit basket.

Three members of Congress and one staff member were among his intended gift recipients, according to the list. Three of them received a more lavish item than House ethics rules allowed, if Abramoff's assistants followed his instructions.

Then-House Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) was listed as the intended recipient of a $250 box of Godiva chocolates; Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) was to receive a $100 gift basket from Harry and David; and Susan Hirschmann, DeLay's chief of staff, was to get a Godiva box worth $100. Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) was to get a less valuable gift: some Jerry Seinfeld CDs.

All four were close to Abramoff and his clients. DeLay, for example, had traveled the previous year to a Scottish golf course and a posh London hotel on Abramoff's credit card; he also voted against legislation opposed by two Abramoff clients that helped underwrite that trip. In 2000, Abramoff listed Rohrabacher in bank documents as a personal reference for his casino-boat purchase.

Doolittle endorsed a politician in the Northern Mariana Islands who helped hire Abramoff as a lobbyist; Doolittle's wife, Julie, was hired by Abramoff's lobbying firm in 2002. Hirschmann worked with Abramoff's office to arrange the golf trip, and Abramoff's credit card was used to pay her husband's plane fare.

Ethics rules have long barred House members and staff from receiving gifts from registered lobbyists separately worth more than $50. Reached by phone, DeLay said, "I don't think I got a box of Godiva chocolates" from Abramoff, adding that a box worth $250 would be "memorable." Doolittle spokeswoman Laura Blackann said the Seinfeld CDs were of negligible value.

Tara Setmayer, a spokeswoman for Rohrabacher, said that the congressman does not recall receiving a fruit basket from Abramoff but added that between the two close friends, it was a "regular practice" to exchange gifts. She said anything the congressman received from the lobbyist was "under the limit" set by the House.

As is typical with many lobbyists -- and not illegal or improper -- clients received generous gifts. In Abramoff's case they included Tiffany trinkets, Montblanc pens and $300 clocks.

Kathryn Van Hoof, a lawyer for the Coushatta Indian tribe, was to receive a $200 Montblanc pen. In March 2001, she negotiated a lobbying contract with Abramoff that called for the tribe to pay his firm $125,000 a month. Chitimacha tribe chairman Alton D. LeBlanc Jr., who publicly defended Abramoff's $120,000 annual lobbying fees, was also to get a Montblanc.

Identical pens were to go to Marina Nevskaya and Alexander Koulakovsky, two Russian oil executives who had hired Abramoff to help them arrange meetings with DeLay and lobby for federal aid. Willie Tan, a textile magnate in the Mariana Islands who helped direct $650,000 to a nonprofit group linked to DeLay, was to get a Montblanc, and two of Tan's aides were to get fruit baskets.

DOJ_NMG_0107813

Nell Rogers, the Choctaw tribe's liaison with Abramoff and the person who processed his firm's multimillion-dollar bills, was to get a Baccarat bowl. At congressional hearings in June 2005, she would describe Abramoff's work for the tribe as "a story of betrayal."

Former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed, who agreed in October 2001 to help Abramoff stifle a new casino that could compete with an Abramoff client casino, was to receive a fruit basket. "Let's give him a list of things we want . . . [and] some chump change to get it done," Abramoff told a partner about Reed in a February 2002 e-mail.

Amy and David Ridenour, who ran the National Center for Public Policy Research, were to get a $100 fruit basket. A congressional report would later describe their nonprofit organization as an "appendage" of Abramoff's lobbying operation, and Abramoff himself, in a 2002 e-mail, would tell a client that their group "can direct money at our discretion, anywhere if you know what i mean."

Maynard Kahgegab, a chief of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe that signed a costly lobbying contract with Abramoff in December 2001, was listed tentatively as the recipient of a Tiffany platinum alarm clock valued at $295. In an e-mail on Dec. 17 of that year, Abramoff described members of that tribe as "troglodytes." A tribal council removed Kahgegab from office on June 2, 2004, for misconduct related to Abramoff.

Abramoff has been telling federal investigators about many of these connections since he pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials; his sentence for that crime is slated to be meted out in the spring. A spokesman for Abramoff's lawyer declined to comment.

Staff researcher Karl Evanzz and research editor Alice Crites contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0107814

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Convict In Terror Case Back In Court (AP) ... 2
U.S. Fugitive With Al Qaeda Ties Arrested (WT) ... 3
U.S. Freezes Accounts Of British Citizen (AP) ... 3

Homeland Response:

Wiretap Suit Joins Others In Bay Area (OREGONIAN) ... 4
U.S. Cancels Order For 75 Million Doses Of Anthrax Vaccine (NYT) ... 4
Anthrax Vaccine Contract Voided, Thwarting Administration (WP) ... 5
U.S. Turns To Tech For Translators (USAT) ... 6

War News:

U.S. Not Winning War In Iraq, Bush Says For 1st Time (WP) ... 6
President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP) ... 8
Bush Calls For Increase In Number Of Troops (USAT) ... 13
President Wants To Increase Size Of Armed Forces (NYT) ... 14
On The War, Determined To Go His Own Way (WP) ... 15
Rice Confirms President Bush Is Considering More Troops For Iraq (MCT) ... 16
Lawmaker Opposes More Troops For Baghdad (WP) ... 17
Rice Stands Firm, Embarks On New Push (WSJ) ... 18
Budget Chief: 2007's War Costs Will Exceed Projected $110 Billion (USAT) ... 19
Cost Of Wars Rises (NYT) ... 19

Corporate Scandals:

NASD: Morgan Stanley Hid Trove Of E-mail (USAT) ... 20
Morgan Stanley Used 9/11 As Excuse, NASD Says (WSJ) ... 20
Firm Accused Of Deleting Missing E-Mail (WP) ... 21
Plan Unveiled To Scrap A Sarbanes-Oxley Rule (WP) ... 22
Will Backdating Scandal Thwart Effort To Roll Back Reforms? December 20, 2006; Page A2 (WSJ) ... 23
The Enron Pendulum (FT) ... 24
The 'McNulty Memo': Real Change, Or Retreat? (LAW) ... 24
Forrester CFO Resigns Amid Options Probe (AP) ... 26
Love Thy Lawyer (WSJ) ... 26
Amtrak Fires Five In Midst Of Congressional Probe (LAW) ... 27
Municipal Bond Attorney Group To Warn Members On Bid Rigging (BLOOM) ... 28
Vitesse Finds Options, Other Errors (WSJ) ... 29

Criminal Law:

Md. High Court Orders Executions Halted (BSUN) ... 29
Highest Court In Maryland Suspends Executions (NYT) ... 31
Court Halts Executions, Eyes Review Of Protocols (WT) ... 31
Maryland High Court Calls Halt To Executions (WP) ... 32
Dead Wrong (LAT) ... 33
Feds Probe 12 Police Shootings In DeKalb (AJC) ... 34
U.S. Attorney For State Leaving For Private Practice (AZREP) ... 35
U.S. Attorney Ousted (KRQE) ... 36
Local Federal Attorney Plans To Step Down; Iglesias Investigated State Corruption (ALBTRIB) ... 36

Civil Law:

In A Crisis, Do-not-revive Requests Don't Always Work (USAT) 37

Civil Rights:

The Secret's Out, But Why Was It Ever Under Wraps? (USAT) ... 39
Both Sides At Fault (USAT) ... 40
Legal Fight Against Racial Ban Intensifies (Det News) ... 40
Rights Groups File Prop 2 Lawsuit (FREEP) ... 41
Short-Term Reprieve For Affirmative Action (INSHIGHED) ... 42
Proposal 2 Challenges Subvert Self-government (Det News) ... 43
N.J. Judge Voids City's Gun Control Law (LAW) ... 44
Jury Finds That New York City Violated Constitutional Rights With Arrest Policy (FINDLAW/AP) ... 45
UK Report Says Robots Will Have Rights (FT) ... 46

Antitrust:

Delta Plans To Stay In The Air Without US Airways Buyout (WP/AP) ... 46
Delta Air Lines Rejects US Airways' Hostile Takeover (Update11) (BLOOM) ... 47
Merger Criticized As Push Toward Monopoly (CO) ... 48
Delta Shuns Bid, Prefers To Fly Solo (USAT) ... 49
Delta Lawyer: US Airways Merger Has 'antitrust Issues' (PITTBIZ) ... 49
Delta: US Air Deal Would Hike Fares (CNN) ... 50
US Airways Still Chasing Delta Despite Its Rejection (PPG) ... 52
Delta CEO: Airline Would Look At Any Other Proposal (DOWJONES) ... 52
Sector Snap: Airline Shares Dip (AP) ... 53
A Holiday Travel Wish List (USAT) ... 53

Owner Of Small Coffee Shop Takes On Java Titan Starbucks (USAT) ... 55
Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ) ... 58
Valassis Strikes Deal With Advo To Acquire Firm For $1.05 Billion (WSJ) ... 59
AT&T/BellSouth Merger Faces Onerous Conditions (FT) ... 59
Judge Bars Business Operations Merger Pending Media Trial (AP) ... 59
Judge Bars MediaNews, Hearst Talks On Collaboration (MERCN) ... 60
MediaNews, Hearst Agreement On Ad Sales Blocked (BLOOM) 60
Phone Firms Await FCC On Cable Ruling (WP) ... 61
Legal View: M&A Makeover Makes Good Sense (FT) ... 62

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Critics Call EPA's New Rule A Loophole For Big Business (CSM) ... 63
Pollution Nets A $37-million Penalty (LAT) ... 64
Shipping Company Fined $37M For Dumping (AP) ... 65
Oil Tanker Giant To Pay Hefty Fine (WT) ... 65
Shipping Firm Fined $37M For Sludge (USAT) ... 66
Seagoing Polluter Punished: Oil Dumper Will Pay $37M Fine (BOSH) ... 67

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Accused Drug Kingpin Faces New Charges (AP) ... 67
Legal Affairs More Pot Busts Taking Place In Suburban Areas (ATC) ... 68
Palm Desert Tells Marijuana Dispensary To Cease And Desist (KESQ) ... 69
CannaHelp Owner To Defy City Cease-and-desist Letter (DS) .. 69
Trenton: Needle Exchanges Approved (NYT) ... 69
Local Lawmen: U.S. Attorney Draws The Line At 500 Pounds (NI) ... 70
Marijuana 'top Cash Crop In US' (BBC) ... 71
Parole Board Member Says FBI Tried To Intimidate Him (AP) ... 71
FBI To Release Last Of Its John Lennon Files (LAT) ... 72

Immigration:

Swift Raids Put Iowa Guard At Risk, Vilsack Says (DMR) ... 73
Harkin 'appalled' By Treatment Of Illegal Workers (DMR) ... 74
Lawmakers Use Swift Raids To Bolster Locked-in Positions (RMN) ... 74
Raid On Swift Leaves Staffing In Disarray (DENP) ... 75
Study Warns Of Hunger Among Hispanics (WP) ... 76
Sixty-two Fugitives And Immigration Violators Snared (MH) ... 77

Congress-Administration:

Bush Appointees Signal Court's New Direction (USAT) ... 77
Brownback Wants To Re-question Nominee (AP) ... 79
Senator Seeks Detainee Abuse Case Update (AP) ... 79

Other News:

Cheney To Be Defense Witness In CIA Case (AP) ... 80
Cheney Testimony Could Exacerbate White House Woes (WSJ) 81
Cheney Will Testify In C.I.A. Leak Case (NYT) ... 81
Atlanta-Area School Board Abandons Evolution Sticker Case (LAW/AP) ... 82
Raising The Floor On Pay (NYT) ... 83
Abramoff's Holiday Cheer (WP) ... 85

TERRORISM NEWS:

Convict In Terror Case Back In Court (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, December 20, 2006

An American convicted of helping the Taliban was back in federal court Tuesday for violating the terms of his probation, authorities said.

James Ujaama, a Muslim convert from Seattle, was arrested over the weekend in Belize — where, under the terms of his supervised release, he was not supposed to be, Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra said.

Ujaama was brought back Tuesday to the United States, and waived his rights to a removal hearing in U.S. District Court in Miami. Sierra said Ujaama soon will be transferred to Seattle, where he was sentenced in 2003.

The full terms of Ujaama's three-year probation period were not immediately available.

Ujaama, who was born James Earnest Thompson, was charged in 2002 with trying to set up a terrorist training camp for Muslim cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri.

He pleaded guilty a year later to lesser charges: conspiring to provide cash, computers and fighters to the Taliban. In exchange, Ujaama served two years in prison and agreed to cooperate with terrorism investigations until 2013.

Federal officials have said Ujaama's help was crucial in the 2004 indictment of al-Masri on charges of trying to establish the training camp in Bly, Ore., and providing aid to al-Qaida. Authorities also questioned Ujaama in the case of Haroon Rashid Aswat, linked to the July 2005 transit bombings in London that killed 56 people.

Ujaama's attorney in Seattle, Peter Offenbecher, declined to say whether he had recently spoken with his client.

DOJ_NMG_0107816

"We're investigating the facts to determine the appropriate course of action," Offenbecher said. He refused further comment.

Emily Langlie, spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle, said it was unclear when Ujaama would appear there. "It's determined by when the marshals get him here," Langlie said.

U.S. Fugitive With Al Qaeda Ties Arrested (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 20, 2006

Police in Belize yesterday arrested an American Muslim with ties to al Qaeda who pleaded guilty in 2003 to conspiring to provide cash, computers and fighters to the Taliban, but fled after agreeing to cooperate in ongoing investigations.

Authorities said James Ujaama, who was wanted for parole violation, entered Belize, a small country on the eastern coast of Central America, 10 days ago using a phony Mexican passport.

"The police conducted an investigation, and some time around midnight last night or earlier this morning, this fugitive was apprehended here in Belize City," said acting Police Chief Eduardo Wade, adding that one Belizean police inspector was treated and later released for injuries he received when Ujaama "attempted to escape during his apprehension."

Ujaama, who served two years in a plea agreement on charges of dealing with al Qaeda and providing various types of material support to the Taliban, has since been turned over to U.S. authorities, said Leonard Hill, deputy chief of mission at the U.S. Embassy.

Mr. Hill said Ujaama's immediate crime was a parole violation, but he could face additional charges and also is being held as a material witness in other terror-related cases.

"One indication of his status may be that federal officials sent down a private plane to bring him back to the States," Mr. Hill said.

Ujaama, also known as Ernest James Thompson, was first arrested in Denver in July 2002 as a material witness and later named in a federal grand jury indictment of providing resources to al Qaeda. The indictment said he was attempting to create a camp for training terrorists near Bly, Ore., between October and December of 1999.

In April 2003, the government filed a superseding complaint saying Ujaama took money, computer equipment and women to Taliban officials in Afghanistan. In February 2004, he agreed to cooperate with U.S. prosecutors -- especially for what he knew about radical London cleric Abu Hamza al-Masri, who has since been convicted in Britain of inciting murder and racial hatred.

Al-Masri, the one-eyed former head of the Finsbury Park mosque in north London, preached hatred to hundreds of young Muslims, including Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person charged in the U.S. in connection with the September 11 attacks.

Ujaama, a former community activist in Seattle, converted to Islam in the post-civil rights era. While traveling in England in 1999, he purportedly met with al-Masri and then traveled to Afghanistan to study Shariah, according to family friends. Shariah refers to the legal framework within which public and some private aspects of life are regulated for those living in a legal system based on Muslim principles of jurisprudence.

As part of the plea agreement, which limited his prison terms to just two years, he admitted delivering currency and other items to persons in the territory of Afghanistan controlled by the Taliban, and that with the assistance of the Taliban, he entered the country to install software programs he had brought with him on computers belonging to Taliban officials.

U.S. Freezes Accounts Of British Citizen (AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP, December 20, 2006

The Bush administration took action Tuesday to freeze financial accounts and assets of a naturalized British citizen for allegedly providing "material and logistical" support to al-Qaida and other terror groups.

The action against Mohammed Al Ghabra means that any bank accounts or other financial assets belonging to him found in the United States must be frozen. Americans also are prohibited from doing business with him.

The Treasury Department alleged that Al Ghabra had organized travel to Pakistan for people seeking to meet with senior al-Qaida officials and to undertake jihad training. Several of those people returned to the United Kingdom to engage in covert activity on behalf of al-Qaida, the department said.

Al Ghabra also allegedly provided support and facilitated travel of people based in the United Kingdom to Iraq to support the insurgents' fight against coalition forces, the department said.

DOJ_NMG_0107817

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Wiretap Suit Joins Others In Bay Area (OREGONIAN)

The Oregonian, December 20, 2006

An Oregon lawsuit challenging a federal warrantless eavesdropping program has been shipped to a judge in San Francisco who is handling dozens of similar cases.

The move, ordered by a judicial panel that consolidates groups of lawsuits with related legal issues, takes the Oregon case away from U.S. District Judge Garr M. King in Portland.

Earlier this year, King refused the government's motion to dismiss the suit filed by the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation, a defunct Ashland-based organization that claims to have been the subject of illegal wiretapping.

The case has been sent to U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker, who earlier this year refused the federal government's attempt to dismiss a similar case that accuses AT&T of illegally cooperating with the program.

The government claims letting the lawsuits go forward will reveal state secrets and threaten national security.

The Oregon case was transferred along with two suits from New York and one from Missouri.

A federal judge in Detroit earlier this year said the warrantless wiretapping program was illegal and unconstitutional. That case is under appeal and not subject to the transfer order.

The Bush administration has defended the legality of the program, which entails monitoring conversations between U.S. citizens and suspected terrorists elsewhere in the world.

U.S. Cancels Order For 75 Million Doses Of Anthrax Vaccine (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19 — In a major setback to the Bush administration's biodefense efforts, the government announced Tuesday that it had canceled an order for 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine, the single biggest purchase planned for the nation's antiterror drug stockpile.

Since VaxGen of Brisbane, Calif., won the contract two years ago, skeptics have questioned the ability of the company, a small biotechnology business, to deliver on such a large order, as well as the administration's capacity to properly manage the overall $5.6 billion program, known as BioShield.

VaxGen, which has no other major customers and has never made a successful vaccine or drug, was supposed to deliver enough vaccine to inoculate 25 million Americans after an anthrax attack, each with three doses.

Officials at the Department of Health and Human Services terminated the $877 million contract Tuesday after VaxGen failed to start required clinical trials, a delay caused by troubles with the vaccine formula.

"With any type of scientific endeavor or research, it is always an unpredictable path that you will follow," said Bill Hall, a department spokesman.

VaxGen's genetically engineered vaccine was selected because it was expected to produce fewer side effects and was effective with fewer doses than the only alternative, a 1950s-era vaccine now manufactured by Emergent BioSolutions of Rockville, Md.

A modern anthrax vaccine had been under development for a decade by Army scientists, before VaxGen won its contract after lining up a licensing agreement with the military researchers.

"This is a great disappointment and a very real setback," said D. A. Henderson, the former director of the Department of Health and Human Services office that helped create the BioShield program.

By the end of this year, VaxGen was supposed to have delivered its first 25 million doses to the stockpile. But as it was testing the vaccine, the company noticed that it was breaking down too quickly, apparently because of an unexpected interaction with an additive intended to bolster the vaccine's effectiveness, said Lance Ignon, a company spokesman.

The Department of Health and Human Services, under pressure from Congress to reduce the risk of relying on a single company, has separately bought nine million doses of the Emergent BioSolutions vaccine, which has been widely used by the military since 1998 to inoculate more than 1.5 million members of the military. The mandatory vaccinations led to lawsuits and complaints of serious side effects.

Mr. Hall said the Department of Health and Human Services was committed to finding a manufacturer to develop the modern version of the vaccine. But he said he could not predict how long that would take.

The vaccine is not the nation's only defense against an anthrax attack. The department has also bought enough antibiotics to treat about 40 million Americans, in the event that multiple cities are struck at once. The recommended treatment after confirmed exposure to anthrax is a combination of a vaccine and antibiotics because anthrax spores are so hardy they can outlive the 60-day antibiotic course and still possibly threaten an exposed person.

DOJ_NMG_0107818

VaxGen's future is now in jeopardy, as the company was entitled to no compensation until it began to make deliveries to the stockpile. The company, which has about 230 employees, has invested more than $150 million on the project, Mr. Ignon said.

This is the second high-profile failure for VaxGen. The 11-year-old company's planned AIDS vaccine was abandoned in 2003 after it proved ineffective.

Project BioShield was created in July 2004 by an act of Congress at the request of the president. It was supposed to greatly expand the nation's stockpile of a variety of drugs and vaccines to protect against a biological, nuclear or chemical attack. But progress has been slow, in part because large pharmaceutical companies have shied from the venture and the government has taken a long time to decide what it wants.

Anthrax Vaccine Contract Voided, Thwarting Administration (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Federal health officials yesterday scuttled the largest piece of the Bush administration's two-year program to counter bioterrorism, canceling an $877.5 million contract with VaxGen to develop an anthrax vaccine after the company missed a deadline to begin human testing.

The decision, delivered in a one-page letter, ends a troubled effort by the small California firm that has come to symbolize the failures of the government's ambitious $5.6 billion Project BioShield. The termination occurred on the same day President Bush signed legislation attempting to salvage the program by reorganizing its management and pumping more money into firms doing the work.

"It's very disappointing that they took such aggressive and dramatic action without engaging in a discussion with us about potential ways for salvaging all the work that has gone into this program," said Lance Ignon, VaxGen's vice president of corporate affairs. "We believe there is a high probability that this technology would lead to a modern anthrax vaccine."

The company has spent more than $175 million of its own money on the project, its only current contract, he said.

The cancellation means the government will continue to depend on a controversial anthrax vaccine, used by the military and made by Emergent BioSolutions of Gaithersburg, years longer than expected. A spokesman for the Department of Health and Human Services said the agency remains committed to developing a next-generation anthrax vaccine but has not decided whether to hold another competition.

"We are moving as aggressively and quickly as we can to reach that goal," said Bill Hall, a department spokesman.

VaxGen was picked for the project in 2004 despite having never successfully produced a drug. It was known for a failed attempt at an AIDS vaccine, and the company has had accounting and management problems, which caused it be delisted from the Nasdaq Stock Market.

In signing on to develop an anthrax vaccine, the company agreed to meet the government's aggressive timetable, producing a drug in five years, half the industry standard for such a product. VaxGen was to be paid as it began delivering the 75 million doses to the government, enough for 25 million people, roughly the equivalent of the population in the New York and Washington areas combined.

But VaxGen struggled from the beginning. The product's expected delivery was delayed two years as the company attempted to improve the vaccine's potency and reliability. In November, the company suffered another blow when the Food and Drug Administration refused to allow the firm to begin human testing because of those long-standing concerns.

The cancellation throws the company's survivability into doubt. VaxGen has said it has enough funds to work through 2007, but its only other product is a smallpox vaccine for which it doesn't have a contract. The anthrax contract was canceled for default, meaning the government does not plan to reimburse VaxGen for its costs and could even hold the company liable if there are extra costs from buying the product from another source.

VaxGen is exploring its legal and strategic options, Ignon said. The company could appeal the decision. "Fortunately, we are well capitalized," he said.

The government now hopes a reorganization of the program, signed into law yesterday, will address the delays and other complaints lobbed at Project BioShield by the private sector for the past two years. The legislation creates the Biomedical Advanced Research and Development Authority, within HHS, to manage the effort. It also allocates $1 billion over three years for research and attempts to pump more government money into the private sector sooner by making payments as companies meet milestones, instead of waiting until they begin delivering the product.

DOJ_NMG_0107819

Yesterday's cancellation of the VaxGen effort "is a step back for an anthrax vaccine, but I think we have said this was a flaw in BioShield," said Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.), one of the chief architects of the legislation revamping the program. "I would like to think if that happened under the new system, we would have caught the problem at a much earlier point."

Until a new vaccine is developed, the government will rely on its stockpiles of antibiotics, including ciprofloxacin, for dealing with anthrax exposure and 10 million doses of an older vaccine made by Emergent. Some soldiers have complained of significant side effects from the Emergent vaccine and have refused to take it, though the FDA says it's safe. VaxGen had aimed to require fewer doses over a shorter period than Emergent's to produce immunity.

U.S. Turns To Tech For Translators (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, December 20, 2006

Intelligence agencies and the military are turning to technology developed for call centers, sporting events and television shopping channels to compensate for an ongoing shortage of qualified translators, interviews and public documents show.

In Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, the Defense Department's research arm is testing portable translation devices that allow English-speaking soldiers to hold conversations with Iraqis.

Government-backed researchers are working to convert broadcasts and website postings from Arabic and Mandarin Chinese into English and to build search engines that can extract complex information from the translated texts.

These efforts are part of a government plan to bolster the thin ranks of skilled translators, say researchers and experts, so human translators can focus on more demanding projects.

"Human language specialists are precious assets," says John Hall, a former Navy SEAL who is president of VoxTec International. The Annapolis, Md., company makes a handheld translation device being tested in Iraq. "You're never going to have enough of them," Hall says. "But if a machine can do some basic tasks, that frees up (a translator) for other work."

In-Q-Tel, a venture-capital company funded by the CIA, has invested in a company that produces software that helps private companies glean information from recorded customer-service calls.

The technology could help intelligence analysts decipher subtleties, such as differences in accents and pronunciations, that can change the meanings of spoken words, its makers say.

Much of the spending is classified, but available public contracting and budget documents show that the Pentagon has at least $22 million to spend this year on research. In November 2005, the Pentagon announced $26 million worth of contracts for translation software.

This month, the Iraq Study Group reported that only 33 of 1,000 workers in the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad speak Arabic, including only six fluent speakers.

The group recommended that the State and Defense departments and the director of national intelligence "accord the highest possible priority" to language and cultural training.

In October, the FBI reported that only 33 of about 12,000 agents have even limited Arabic proficiency. The CIA does not disclose its officers' language capabilities, but Robert Baer, a retired CIA agent, estimates that he was the agency's only undercover officer fluent in Arabic when he operated in Beirut in the mid-1980s.

It takes about eight years to train a CIA officer to be "completely comfortable" speaking Arabic, says Baer, author of two books about the intelligence community and foreign policy.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Not Winning War In Iraq, Bush Says For 1st Time (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

President Bush acknowledged for the first time yesterday that the United States is not winning the war in Iraq and said he plans to expand the overall size of the "stressed" U.S. armed forces to meet the challenges of a long-term global struggle against terrorists.

As he searches for a new strategy for Iraq, Bush has now adopted the formula advanced by his top military adviser to describe the situation. "We're not winning, we're not losing," Bush said in an interview with The Washington Post. The assessment was a striking reversal for a president who, days before the November elections, declared, "Absolutely, we're winning."

DOJ_NMG_0107820

In another turnaround, Bush said he has ordered Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates to develop a plan to increase the troop strength of the Army and Marine Corps, heeding warnings from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill that multiple deployments in Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the armed forces toward the breaking point. "We need to reset our military," said Bush, whose administration had opposed increasing force levels as recently as this summer.

But in a wide-ranging session in the Oval Office, the president said he interpreted the Democratic election victories six weeks ago not as a mandate to bring the U.S. involvement in Iraq to an end but as a call to find new ways to make the mission there succeed. He confirmed that he is considering a short-term surge in troops in Iraq, an option that top generals have resisted out of concern that it would not help.

A substantial military expansion will take years and would not immediately affect the war in Iraq. But it would begin to address the growing alarm among commanders about the state of the armed forces. Although the president offered no specifics, other U.S. officials said the administration is preparing plans to bolster the nation's permanent active-duty military with as many as 70,000 additional troops.

A force structure expansion would accelerate the already-rising costs of war. The administration is drafting a supplemental request for more than $100 billion in additional funds for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, on top of the $70 billion already approved for this fiscal year, according to U.S. officials. That would be over 50 percent more than originally projected for fiscal 2007, making it by far the costliest year since the 2003 invasion.

Since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Congress has approved more than $500 billion for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as for terrorism-related operations elsewhere. An additional $100 billion would bring overall expenditures to $600 billion, exceeding those for the Vietnam War, which, adjusted for inflation, cost $549 billion, according to the Congressional Research Service.

For all the money, commanders have grown increasingly alarmed about the burden of long deployments and the military's ability to handle a variety of threats around the world simultaneously. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, warned Congress last week that the active-duty Army "will break" under the strain of today's war-zone rotations. Former secretary of state Colin L. Powell, a retired chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said on CBS News's "Face the Nation" on Sunday that "the active Army is about broken."

Democrats have been calling for additional troops for years. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) proposed an increase of 40,000 troops during his 2004 campaign against Bush, only to be dismissed by the administration. As recently as June, the Bush administration opposed adding more troops because restructuring "is enabling our military to get more war-fighting capability from current end strength."

But Bush yesterday had changed his mind. "I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops -- the Army, the Marines," he said. "And I talked about this to Secretary Gates, and he is going to spend some time talking to the folks in the building, come back with a recommendation to me about how to proceed forward on this idea."

In describing his decision, Bush tied it to the broader struggle against Islamic extremists around the world rather than to Iraq specifically. "It is an accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and to help us achieve peace," he said.

Bush chose a different term than Powell. "I haven't heard the word 'broken,' " he said, "but I've heard the word, 'stressed.' . . . We need to reset our military. There's no question the military has been used a lot. And the fundamental question is, 'Will Republicans and Democrats be able to work with the administration to assure our military and the American people that we will position our military so that it is ready and able to stay engaged in a long war?' "

Democrats pounced on Bush's comments. "I am glad he has realized the need for increasing the size of the armed forces . . . but this is where the Democrats have been for two years," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the new House Democratic Caucus chairman. Kerry issued a statement calling Bush's move a "pragmatic step needed to deal with the warnings of a broken military," but he noted that he opposes increasing troops in Iraq. Even before news of Bush's interview, Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, told reporters that the military is "bleeding" and "we have to apply the tourniquet and strengthen the forces."

The Army has already temporarily increased its force level from 482,000 active-duty soldiers in 2001 to 507,000 today and soon to 512,000. But the Army wants to make that 30,000-soldier increase permanent and then add between 20,000 and 40,000 more on top of that, according to military and civilian officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. Every additional 10,000 soldiers would cost about $1.2 billion a year, according to the Army. Because recruitment and training take time, officials cautioned that any boost would not be felt in a significant way until at least 2008.

Bush, who has always said that the United States is headed for victory in Iraq, conceded yesterday what Gates, Powell and most Americans in polls have already concluded. "An interesting construct that General Pace uses is, 'We're not winning, we're not losing,' " Bush said, referring to Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the Joint Chiefs chairman, who was spotted near the Oval

DOJ_NMG_0107821

Office before the interview. "There's been some very positive developments. . . . [But] obviously the real problem we face is the sectarian violence that needs to be dealt with."

Asked yesterday about his "absolutely, we're winning" comment at an Oct. 25 news conference, the president recast it as a prediction rather than an assessment. "Yes, that was an indication of my belief we're going to win," he said.

Bush said he has not yet made a decision about a new strategy for Iraq and would wait for Gates to return from a trip there to assess the situation. "I need to talk to him when he gets back," Bush said. "I've got more consultations to do with the national security team, which will be consulting with other folks. And I'm going to take my time to make sure that the policy, when it comes out, the American people will see that we . . . have got a new way forward."

Among the options under review by the White House is sending 15,000 to 30,000 more troops to Iraq for six to eight months. The idea has the support of important figures such as Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and has been pushed by some inside the White House, but the Joint Chiefs have balked because they think advocates have not adequately defined the mission, according to U.S. officials.

The chiefs have warned that a short-term surge could lead to more attacks against U.S. troops, according to the officials, who described the review on the condition of anonymity because it is not complete. Bush would not discuss such ideas in detail but said "all options are viable."

While top commanders question the value of a surge, they have begun taking moves that could prepare for one, should Bush order it. Defense officials said yesterday that the U.S. Central Command has made two separate requests to Gates for additional forces in the Middle East, including an Army brigade of about 3,000 troops to be used as a reserve force in Kuwait and a second Navy carrier strike group to move to the Persian Gulf.

Gates has yet to approve the moves, which could increase U.S. forces in the region by as many as 10,000 troops, officials said. The previous theater reserve force, the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, was recently moved to Iraq's Anbar province to help quell insurgent violence. Gen. George W. Casey, the U.S. commander in Iraq, has called for the additional brigade -- likely the 2nd Brigade, 82nd Airborne Division -- to be positioned to move into Iraq hotspots if needed.

The additional carrier strike group would give Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of the Central Command, more flexibility in a volatile region, said one official. While such a move would certainly send a pointed message to Iran, the official said it would also allow additional strike capabilities in Iraq.

Staff writers Robin Wright, Lori Montgomery, Josh White, Ann Scott Tyson, Michael Abramowitz and Walter Pincus contributed to this report.

President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP)

By Peter Baker, Michael A. Fletcher And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

This 25-minute interview was conducted yesterday in the Oval Office by Washington Post staff writers Peter Baker, Michael A. Fletcher and Michael Abramowitz.

President Bush: Listen, a couple of things before we get going. Obviously, I've been thinking about -- and talking to a lot of people about -- the way forward in Iraq and the way forward in this ideological struggle. I want to share one thought I had with you, and I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops, the Army, the Marines. And I talked about this to [Defense] Secretary [Robert M.] Gates, and he is going to spend some time talking to the folks in the building, come back with a recommendation to me about how to proceed forward on this idea. I want to give him a little time to get his feet on the ground. And so I'll be addressing this after consultations with him. I just want to share that with you before we get going.

You're talking about troops in Iraq, not --

No, I'm talking about overall size.

-- overall size of the Army. Do you have a rough idea how much --

I'm going to wait for Secretary Gates. As I say, I'm inclined to believe it's important and necessary to do so. The reason why is, it is an accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while, and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and to help us achieve peace.

So you've not made a decision about Iraq, per se, about what to do --

I have not, Mike, I have not. And we'll spend some more time -- Secretary Gates, as he indicated, is going to head to the region at some point in time. I need to talk to him when he gets back. I've got more consultations to do with the national security team, which will be consulting with other folks. And I'm going to take my time to make sure that the policy, when it comes out, the American people will see that we are -- have got a new way forward to achieve an important objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself.

DOJ_NMG_0107822

And one thing that will be clear is that I want the American people to know that -- and the Iraqi people to know that -- we expect the Iraqi people to continue making hard choices and doing hard work necessary to succeed, and our job is to help them do so.

Are we winning in Iraq, in your estimation?

You know, I think an interesting construct that General [Peter] Pace uses is, "We're not winning, we're not losing." There's been some very positive developments. And you take a step back and look at progress in Iraq, you say, well, it's amazing -- constitutional democracy in the heart of the Middle East, which is a remarkable development in itself.

I think one of the -- obviously, the real problem we face is the sectarian violence that needs to be dealt with. So part of my policy review is how do we deal with that in a way that then enables the Iraqi people to live in a more secure society so that the government can prove its worth to the people -- saying, we can help you. And one of the main functions of government is to provide security for its people. Our job is to help the Iraqis provide that security. And I'll come forward with a plan that will enable us to achieve that objective.

There's other threats, by the way. It's a multiple-front war, if you really think about it. You got Shia discord in the south; you've got Sunni attacks, much of that -- many of them are caused by al-Qaeda. A lot of them, former Baathists and regimists who are angry that Saddam is no longer in power, and they are a source of conflict in al-Anbar province. And we've got a very robust effort -- I said the other day something that, I guess, people didn't pay that much attention to -- but for October and November and the first week of December, our actions on the ground have -- as a result of action on the ground, we killed or captured nearly 5,900 people. My point in making that point is our troops and coalition troops are on the offense in a lot of areas.

And then the third area of conflict, the one that gets a lot of attention, as it should, is the sectarian violence taking place in Baghdad. And I fully understand that we've got to help the Iraqis deal with that. So my thinking is -- and a lot of our strategy sessions revolve around how best to deal with this problem, and how best to help the Iraqis deal with it. And I've got some more work to do, and I'll come forth at the appropriate time and explain the way forward to the country.

Given the election results, is increasing the troop level in Iraq even a viable possibility or option?

Yes, Mike, all options are viable.

-- given the political will out there?

Well, all options are viable. I think what the people want is -- they want a couple of things. They want to see Democrats and Republicans work together to achieve a common objective, and they want us to win in Iraq. A lot of people understand that if we leave Iraq, there will be dire consequences -- in other words, if we leave before the job is done. There are some, a fair number of people, who say, "Get out now." So I view the election results as people are not satisfied with the progress being made in Iraq and expect to see a different strategy to achieve an important objective.

But the election results seemed people wanted to bring the venture in Iraq to closure. That seemed to be the strong lesson. And what indications are there that you're actually listening to that sentiment?

Oh, Mike, look, I want to achieve the objective. I think the American people -- I know the American people are very worried about an external threat and that they recognize that failure in Iraq would embolden that external threat, and they expect this administration to listen with people, to work with Democrats, to work with the military, to work with the Iraqis to put a plan in place that achieves the objective. There's not a lot of people saying, "Get out now." Most Americans are saying, "We want to achieve the objective."

But there are a lot of people who are saying, "Let's get out with a phased deployment over a certain period of time."

If they felt -- if that leads to victory, it needs to be seriously considered. And I'm considering all options and listening very carefully to a lot of good people who have got different opinions about how to proceed.

Can we come back to General Pace's formulation about winning, not losing? You said October 24th, "Absolutely, we're winning." And I wanted to --

Yes, that was an indication of my belief we're going to win. Look, I've got four constituencies I speak to on a regular basis; one is the American people, who are justifiably frustrated at the progress in Iraq. And they expect the commander in chief and the people in Washington to support our troops. Supporting our troops not only means good equipment, good [pay], good housing -- it also means a plan that helps achieve the objective.

The second constituency is the enemy. I'm not through yet.

Sure.

The enemy wants to know whether or not the United States has the will to stay engaged in this ideological struggle. They don't believe we do. That's what they say. And I believe that's what they believe.

The third group of people I speak to are the Iraqis. They wonder whether the United States has got the will to help them achieve their objectives. That's what they wonder. The leaders I have talked to wonder whether or not -- what the elections mean, or what the Baker-Hamilton commission means, or what changing [former defense] secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld means -- that's what they wonder. But in the back of their mind, they're saying, "Are they going to leave us again?" And that's an important question for them to have answered, because in order to make difficult choices and to take risk for peace, they're going to have to be assured that they'll get support. This is a group of people that have had their hopes dashed in the past.

DOJ_NMG_0107823

And the fourth group is the military. Our troops wonder whether or not our country supports them, and they do. They wonder whether or not the mission and the sacrifice and the toil that they're making is worth it. And they need to know from the commander in chief: Not only is it worth it, but I strongly support them and believe that their work will lead to victory. That's what I believe.

Anyway, you just need to know that's who I'm speaking to when I speak. And to you, of course. You're the objective filter through which my -- (Laughter.)

I suspect your message gets out. (Laughter.)

I do want to say something about the press. I hope you realize that, one, I enjoy the relationship, and two, know it is vital for my presidency. You can't exist without me, and I can't exist without you. And I generally respect the hard work of the press corps. I don't necessarily generally respect every word you write, but nevertheless, I do respect the fact that you're a hardworking group of people seeking the truth. And we're necessary for each other. And that relationship can either be a positive relationship or a suspicious, harmful relationship. And I have worked hard to make it a positive relationship. And I think it is, generally, I do believe it is. And I bear no ill will, and I don't think you do, either.

We appreciate that, and you've certainly been good for business --

Good. That's what decision-makers do, Peter, people who seize the moment and make decisions to lead give people things to write about.

Some of the supporters of the war and you from the beginning have begun to ask the question publicly: Was it, in fact, the idea that turned out not so great, or the execution that turned out not so great?

The idea of?

The idea of the war in the first place, and the --

I've never really asked that question. I believe it's justifiable and necessary. Obviously, the war has not -- the results on the ground haven't happened as quickly as I hoped, and part of this review process is to develop new strategies and tactics so that we can expedite success. Look, I of all people would like to see the troops come home. But I don't want them to come home without achieving our objective, because I understand what happens if there's failure. And I'm going to keep repeating this over and over again, that I believe we're in an ideological struggle that is -- that our country will be dealing with for a long time.

Can I ask you a question about history?

Yes.

President Lincoln fired a number of his generals in the Civil War until he found Grant.

Is that what triggered your question, looking at Abe?

Why haven't you fired any generals? And does the fact that you haven't fired generals suggest that you are satisfied with the military strategy that they have pursued?

We're reviewing the strategy, because it has -- the results aren't -- we haven't achieved the results as quickly as we wanted -- precisely what the secretary of defense said, by the way. And the chain-of-command issues are issues that percolate up through the Pentagon. And there is a clear chain of command that I adhere to, and I think it's important for the commander in chief to do just that.

I've often talked about how it's important to trust the judgment of the military when they're making military plans as the key advisers to the president, as opposed to the president determining the tactics on the ground, which has happened in previous wars. And so I'm a strict adherer to the command structure.

But isn't there a point in which you say, "We screwed up the amount of troops we need there, we screwed up the WMD, someone ought to pay a penalty for that"?

There is a constant review of the commanders, and I support that constant review. And to the extent that people think they can do -- somebody can do a better job, those recommendations will come forward.

Sir, when you look back at last month's election, do you see that strictly as a repudiation of Iraq and the fact that we're not winning in Iraq, or is it also a judgment of your leadership in general?

Michael, I said in my press conference, I think it's -- no question Iraq was a significant part of the elections. People were troubled by the lack of progress. War is difficult for people, particularly the American people are very compassionate people. When you turn on your TV screens and see bombings and deaths, and read about beheadings or sectarian violence, it troubles America. And they wonder or not -- whether or not we have a plan that succeeds. And I can understand that level of frustration.

Secondly, there's a sense that people's votes were being taken for granted, in a way. We had ethics disputes, and just a lot of signals that said that it's time to -- that people wanted a change. There was a lot of -- look, you've got a guy using earmarks to enrich himself; there was sex and all kinds of issues that sent the signal that perhaps it was time to give another group a chance to lead. I also believe that people are sick and tired of the needless partisanship in Washington. And there's a lot of it. And for some, every expression of position by somebody is an opportunity to attack, and people are tired of it. And there's some big issues that we need to work together.

DOJ_NMG_0107824

I will tell you that I view the elections as an opportunity to say to all of us in Washington, "Let's work together." People want that. And what are some issues we can work together on -- energy, or immigration, budgetary reforms. I mean, there's a lot -- education, No Child Left Behind reauthorization. I believe there are some wonderful opportunities --

So you don't think you're out of the policy business with the Democrats in charge on the Hill?

Do what now?

You're not out of the domestic policy business --

Quite the contrary. Quite the contrary. The microphone of the president has never been louder, and I think we have a good -- in other words, to talk about what I think is important. But it turns out that what I think is important, the Democrat leadership thinks is important, as well -- energy security, immigration reform, education -- and Republicans on the Hill agree. And so my task is going to be to talk about big issues that the American people expect us to work on, and work with both Republicans and Democrats.

Will it be easier with Democrats, in some ways? Are there some issues --

I think the legislative process, Peter, is always hard, from the executive-branch perspective. They're pretty independent-minded people, they -- no matter who's in charge, they tend to take some ideas from the president, but they've got their own minds. And the task is to work together in a collegial and constructive spirit to solve some big problems.

I'll tell you one I want to work on, as well, is entitlements. And that's a hard issue, as you know. Social Security is viewed as the third rail of American politics. I've campaigned on it every time -- two times I ran for president. I've talked about it in the State of the Union every time. It's an issue that's -- a president is just going to have to keep talking about to convince people it's worthwhile to take the risk, the political -- so-called political risk to work together to get something done. And we will continue to do so. [Treasury Secretary Henry M.] Paulson is going to take the lead for us up there, working with members of both parties.

I will tell you this: In an issue like this, unless the president tries, nothing is going to happen. Without presidential involvement, nothing will happen. So we have a chance, and I'm going to work it. And I think that's -- I know that's the job of the president, is to say, "This is important to the future of the country, let us work together."

Yes, sir.

Just on that point, are you willing to sit down with Democrats in a commission that puts all the options on Social Security on the table? Not just reductions and benefits, not just private accounts, but also some kind of revenue increases, tax increases?

I don't see how you can move forward without people feeling comfortable about putting ideas on the table. I have made it clear that I've got a way forward that can do it and I want to hear other people's opinions. And that's what Hank Paulson is telling both Republicans and Democrats. It's going to be very important for people to feel there can be a full, wide-ranging discussion about how to move forward.

And specifically, tax increases on the table then?

Well, specifically, personal accounts; specifically, everything that the Democrats think will work, as well.

Well, they talk about tax increases.

Well, let them; that's fine. They can come to the table and talk about them. I proposed a way forward that doesn't require tax increases. Nevertheless, I look forward to hearing their opinions.

[Incoming Speaker of the House] Mrs. Pelosi has identified six or seven things that she wants the House to do in the first 100 hours. Can I just mention -- ask you in a bullet-point way just your point on this?

No. (Laughter.)

Minimum-wage increase -- generally supportive or against it?

Generally supportive. But, no, the answer is no, you can't. (Laughter.)

Look, here's the challenge. The challenge is to find out specifically what they have in mind and to explain to them areas where we can work together and can't work together. I'm pleased with our initial round of discussions. I fully understand that they're going to come out with this -- they made it very clear. And I want to work with them on issues where we can find common ground.

On immigration -- you mentioned immigration. Can you envision supporting a deal --

See, now you're getting me to negotiate with myself --

No, no, no, but this is a policy --

Same thing he's trying to do. (Laughter.) It's a classic ploy. (Laughter.)

DOJ_NMG_0107825

This is about your policy, Sir, in terms of can you envision a deal in which you would agree with Democrats that would not necessarily have a majority support among Republicans --

Peter, remember the speech I gave right here in the Oval Office?

I remember several.

The one on immigration. I gave a comprehensive speech to the country from the Oval Office, prime time, about how I thought we ought to move forward on immigration. I still feel very strongly about that. And I hope that Congress will join me on a comprehensive bill, and I would hope that the majority of both parties support it.

[Former House] speaker Hastert had a policy that he would not put forward a bill that didn't have a majority support of his caucus. Is that important to you, having majority support of the Republican caucuses?

I'm interested in getting a comprehensive bill out, because I believe it is vital to solving the pressure we have on our border.

One of the interesting things that, if you notice from the recent enforcement activities that ICE took, there are a lot of people who are using forged documents to do jobs Americans are not doing. And my attitude is that there ought to be a way for people to come to this country on a temporary basis and fill those jobs in an open way, a transparent way, that doesn't cause there to be, one, a smuggling operation that's vibrant and making money, a housing operation that is illegal, and a document forgery operation that clearly is in effect.

There is a better way to treat people, and there's a better way to deal with the issue of finding workers Americans are not doing, to fill on a temporary basis. And, therefore, there need -- and that in itself will take pressure off our border. In other words, if people feel like they can come in on a temporary, legal basis, they're not going to have to sneak in, which in itself does away with -- that in itself does away with this kind of underground industry that has sprung up.

The point I make to you on that is that it's a comprehensive reform of the immigration system that is going to make our borders more secure. I strongly believe that is important, and look forward to working with people on the way forward. It's hard for me to predict the dynamics yet on how the Congress is going to handle the immigration bill. The point I'm telling you is that I think it's vital and necessary, and this is an area where we can work together to get it done.

I'd like to come back to your first statement, because I'd like to expand a little bit. You talked about the size of the military. Colin Powell said on a Sunday show that the Army was nearly broken. Do you believe that's true? And, if so, do you feel responsible for that? Do you --

I heard -- we have been transforming our Army to make it lighter, more lethal and easier to move, and that transformation has been very important. Secondly, we have been changing our force posture around the world to reflect the threats of the 21st century, and that has been a very important reform.

I also believe that the suggestions I've heard from outside our government, plus people inside the government -- particularly, the Pentagon -- that we need to think about increasing our force structure makes sense, and I will work with Secretary Gates to do so. He's going to come back and report --

So is our Army nearly broken, or not?

The people that would know best are those in the Pentagon. I haven't heard the word "broken," but I've heard the word "stressed." I know that we need to -- and my budgetary requests will reflect what a lot of people in Congress have been saying and in the Pentagon, and that is we need to reset our military. There's no question the military has been used a lot. And the fundamental question is, will Republicans and Democrats be able to work with the administration to assure our military and the American people that we will position our military so that it is ready and able to stay engaged in a long war, and this ideological struggle?

Can I ask a hometown question?

Final question -- yes, which one, Crawford, Midland, Houston, Dallas or Washington?

Washington. Do you support a bill that would give the District of Columbia residents a vote in the House of Representatives?

This is a Fletcher question. This is a Fletcher question.

He's not asking about a specific question. We're asking about your broad view on --

Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?

I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes.

But what is your philosophical view of that? Because we've gone to Iraq to provide freedom for people in Iraq, and the people in this country --

I understand that. You're trying to get me to opine on specific legislation that may be forthcoming, and I look forward to working with Congress on that.

I'm actually asking you to opine on general --

That's my answer. (Laughter.)

-- philosophy on whether --

I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes.

Is Vice President Cheney correct, do you believe that secretary Rumsfeld was the best defense secretary?

I think he was one of the finest defense secretaries, and I said that there have been more profound change -- policy change under his leadership than at any time since the formation of the Defense Department.

Thank you.

Bush Calls For Increase In Number Of Troops (USAT)

By Matt Kelley And Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Tuesday he wants to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps to help ease problems caused by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In an interview with The Washington Post posted online Tuesday, Bush said the military needed to grow because "this ideological war we're in is going to last a while."

The new troops, Bush said, would not be added specifically to fight in either Iraq or Afghanistan but would be available for military needs worldwide.

ON DEADLINE: Read the interview

Bush said he directed Defense Secretary Robert Gates to recommend how to expand the military, which Pentagon officials have told Bush is "stressed."

Bush's comments come as he prepares to announce in early January his new plan for the war in Iraq, which has claimed the lives of at least 2,950 U.S. troops since it began in March 2003.

Military leaders and their supporters in Congress have recently stepped up their calls for more troops.

Last week, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker said he wanted to increase the 500,000 active-duty Army beyond the 30,000 soldiers that had been authorized in recent years. The Army could add between 6,000 and 7,000 soldiers a year, he told Congress. Without such an increase, Schoomaker said, the Army "will break."

There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Pentagon records show that one-fifth of the Army's soldiers have served multiple tours of duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Members of Congress and military experts welcomed Bush's comments Tuesday, saying that a larger military would ease the strain on today's troops.

Rep. Ike Skelton, a Missouri Democrat and incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, "would welcome anyone" supporting a larger military, said his spokeswoman Loren Dealy.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., and a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said in a statement that an increase has been needed for years and called on Bush to fund it in his budget.

"It is imperative that this administration step up and honestly budget for the long-term commitment they have made in Iraq," Reed said.

Adding 10,000 troops, about the size of a division, will cost about $1.2 billion a year, Skelton and Reed said.

It will take two to three years to recruit and train those troops, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said late last month.

It makes sense to increase the military's size regardless of the Iraq war, said Frederick Kagan, a military analyst at the American Enterprise Institute think tank. The military has been short of the troops it needs since the 1990s, Kagan said.

The Iraq war's demand for people and resources means the Pentagon is stretched too thin, according to a report released Dec. 6 by the Iraq Study Group: "A continuing Iraqi commitment of American ground forces at present levels will leave no reserve available to meet other contingencies."

Former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, whom Gates replaced Monday, resisted increasing the size of the military, Kagan said.

Rumsfeld, Kagan said, "saw soldiers as detracting from the transformation program he wanted the military to go through."

Also Tuesday:

· In Baghdad, 13 men convicted of murder, kidnapping and other crimes were hanged in a televised execution at a Baghdad jail.

· U.S. Sens. John Kerry and Chris Dodd, both Democrats and critics of the Bush administration's Iraq policies, arrived in Syria to talk about efforts to bring stability to neighboring Iraq. The administration has refused direct talks with Syria, which was also recommended by the Iraq Study Group.

DOJ_NMG_0107827

· The U.S. military announced the death of a Marine in the insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, bringing to 61 the number of American military personnel killed in December.

Contributing: The Associated Press

President Wants To Increase Size Of Armed Forces (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19 — President Bush said Tuesday that the United States should expand the size of its armed forces, acknowledging that the military had been strained by the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and would need to grow to cope with what he suggested would be a long battle against Islamic extremism.

"I'm inclined to believe it's important and necessary to do," Mr. Bush said. He said this was an "accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while, and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and help us achieve peace."

Speaking in an interview with The Washington Post, Mr. Bush did not specify how large an increase he was contemplating or put a dollar figure on the cost. He said that he had asked his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, to bring him a proposal, and that the budget he unveils at the beginning of February would seek approval for the plan from Congress, where many members of both parties have been urging an increase in the military's size.

In interviews on Tuesday, administration officials said the president was speaking generally about the broader campaign against terrorism and was not foreshadowing a decision on whether to send additional troops into Iraq in coming months in an effort to stabilize Baghdad. Any big change in the size of the American military would take years to accomplish.

Mr. Bush told The Post, which excerpted the interview Tuesday on its Web site, that he had not made a decision about sending more troops to Iraq.

Coming the day after Mr. Gates was sworn in as defense secretary, Mr. Bush's comments indicated that the administration was breaking abruptly with the stance taken by Donald H. Rumsfeld, the former Pentagon chief, who championed the view that better intelligence and technological advancements could substitute for a bigger military.

Mr. Bush said his plan would focus on ground forces rather than on the Navy and the Air Force, telling The Post, "I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops — the Army, the Marines." There are about 507,000 active-duty Army soldiers and 180,000 active-duty marines.

Mr. Bush's comments were his most direct assessment that the armed forces were facing strain so serious that the nation should invest billions of dollars in expanding the military. Asked directly whether the United States was winning in Iraq, Mr. Bush quoted what he called the "construct" of Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: "We're not winning. We're not losing."

The president has come under increasing pressure from allies and critics, including Democrats and Republicans in Congress, and former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell, who have warned that the Army could break under the stress of the demands it faces.

"I also believe that the suggestions I've heard from outside our government, plus people inside the government — particularly the Pentagon — that we need to think about increasing our force structure makes sense, and I will work with Secretary Gates to do so," Mr. Bush said.

Congress authorized a 30,000-soldier increase in the active-duty Army after the Sept. 11 attacks — when the Army stood at about 484,000 — in what was described as a temporary measure. Army officials say they hope to reach that authorized total troop strength of 514,000 by next year and would like to make that a permanent floor, not a ceiling.

To that end, the Army already has drawn up proposals to grow to up to 540,000, with some retired officers advocating an even larger increase.

The active-duty Army peaked at 1.6 million troops during the Korean conflict and stood at just below that figure during the war in Vietnam, before hovering around 800,000 for much of the 1970s and 1980s, according to Pentagon statistics. Following the first Persian Gulf war, which coincided with the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe, the Army's active-duty force dropped first to below 600,000 and then below 500,000 before the increases ordered after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Any decision to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps would do little to meet the need for more troops should Mr. Bush order a significant increase of American forces in Iraq in 2007, as it takes considerable time to recruit, train and deploy new troops. Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, said last week that the Army could probably grow by only 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year.

Army officials have estimated that for each addition of 10,000 soldiers to the force, it would cost about $1.2 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0107828

While it is not likely to determine the administration's decision about a short-term increase in troop levels in Iraq, a substantial increase in the size of the American military could give the United States more flexibility in setting and maintaining troop levels there over the long run. Army officials had already drawn up proposals for sustaining the Iraq and Afghanistan missions by drawing heavily on the National Guard and Reserves over the next several years.

But the prospect of mobilizing large numbers of those part-time soldiers would present Mr. Bush with a hugely vexing political problem as the Republican Party prepares for a campaign to hold the White House in 2008. The administration has promised to limit overseas deployments for the Guard and the Reserve, which have been used extensively since the Sept. 11 attacks.

Pentagon and military officials who were briefed on the president's discussions with the Joint Chiefs of Staff last week said that the classified briefing ranged broader than just how to win in Iraq.

The chiefs argued that the nation must not let the military's other capabilities lapse from commitments of personnel, equipment and money for Iraq, these officials said.

In particular, the chiefs expressed concerns that the United States must show enough strength to deter potential adversaries from aggressive moves based on an assumption that American power was bogged down in Iraq. That led to a discussion on the merits of expanding the military, officials said.

The president's statements were applauded by leading members of Congress who specialize in military affairs. Loren Dealy, spokeswoman for Democrats on the House Armed Services Committee, said that Representative Ike Skelton of Missouri, who will become chairman of the panel in the new Congress, said after Mr. Bush spoke that "Mr. Skelton has long supported the idea of increasing the end strength in both the Army and the Marine Corps."

Senator Jack Reed, a Rhode Island Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Tuesday night: "I am pleased President Bush has finally recognized the need to increase the overall size of our military. I have been calling for such an expansion for several years." But Mr. Reed, who served in the 82nd Airborne Division, warned that the battle over troop numbers was not over.

"Now that the president is asking for an increase, he needs to follow through and put the money in the budget to pay for these soldiers," Mr. Reed said. "It is imperative that this administration step up and honestly budget for the long-term commitment they have made in Iraq. If the president doesn't put forward a plan to pay for this in his annual budget request then this announcement is meaningless."

On The War, Determined To Go His Own Way (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Ever since Republicans were routed last month in what was widely seen as a repudiation of his Iraq strategy, President Bush has been busily listing why his policies there will not be changing.

There will be no timetable for removing American troops, no high-level dialogue with Iran and Syria, and no slackening of support for the widely criticized government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. Meanwhile, White House aides are reported to be pushing a major "surge" of troops to Baghdad while preparing a fresh infusion of tens of billions of dollars for the war effort.

Yesterday, in an interview with The Washington Post, while acknowledging that the United States is not winning in Iraq, Bush bluntly dismissed the suggestion that the midterm elections meant voters want to bring the mission in that country to closure. He said he interpreted the election results "as people not satisfied with the progress" in Iraq.

"A lot of people understand that if we leave Iraq, there will be dire consequences," Bush said in the Oval Office. "They expect this administration to listen with people, to work with Democrats, to work with the military, to work with the Iraqis to put a plan in place that achieves the objective. There's not a lot of people saying, 'Get out now.' Most Americans are saying, 'We want to achieve the objective.' "

The comments were another strong indication of the president's determination to chart his own way forward on Iraq, no matter the election results nor any amount of free advice from senior statesmen of past administrations. Bush may well announce a major drawdown of the U.S. presence in Iraq when he appears before the nation after the turn of the year, but that possibility seems remote after statements from him and his aides that suggest an intention to keep the basic contours of the Iraq policy in place -- and possibly even raise the ante by sending more troops.

"There hasn't been a change from the president," observed Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the incoming House majority leader. "The president may be trapped in his own policy, sensing, 'If I don't succeed, it will be a huge blot on my record, and so therefore I have no choice but to try to succeed.' "

Hoyer pointedly added: "I don't think the Democratic Congress is going to say, 'Well, that's okay.' "

DOJ_NMG_0107829

Clad in a gray suit and red tie, Bush was relaxed and engaged during the 25-minute interview, going out of his way to say how much he enjoys his relationship with the media despite indications to the contrary. At the end, he talked a bit about recent books -- he mentioned having just finished "King Leopold's Ghost," an account of the plundering of the Congo in the late 19th century -- and expressed some befuddlement at the suggestion that some people do not think he reads.

He gestured at the portrait on his office wall of Abraham Lincoln by George H. Story when asked why he has fired no generals when Lincoln fired a number before settling on Ulysses S. Grant. "Is that what triggered your questioning, looking at Abe?" he asked, before explaining how important it was, in his view, to adhere to the command structure at the Pentagon.

As he reviews what to do in Iraq, Bush said he is considering all options and "listening to a lot of good people who have got different opinions about how to proceed." But he left little doubt that he continues to believe in achieving "victory," a goal that many foreign policy experts believe is fast slipping out of reach. When his new policy comes out next month, he said, the American people will see "a new way forward to achieve an important objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself."

For the second time in a week, Bush noted the number of dead insurgents, something that he has been extremely reluctant to do, given the way such numerical indicators presented a false picture of progress during the Vietnam War. But perhaps seeking to keep the American people engaged in the unpopular mission, Bush noted that U.S. ground forces in Iraq in the past two months have killed or captured nearly 5,900 people.

"My point in making that point is our troops and coalition troops are on the offense in a lot of areas," Bush said.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus, said he could not think of anyone more "stubborn and isolated" than the president. "The American people have spoken, and voices inside and outside the national security apparatus . . . have all come to the conclusion: Doing more of the same and hoping for a different result is not going to be successful," Emanuel said.

More than stubbornness may explain the president's adherence to his basic policy despite election results and polls suggesting a widespread desire for change from the electorate. Frederick W. Kagan, a military historian at the American Enterprise Institute, said it is not at all clear to him that the public wants out of Iraq, and said he believes many pundits have overinterpreted the election results.

Americans "are not going to support a strategy that looks like more of the same, and they shouldn't," said Kagan, who has met with the president to discuss his idea of bringing more troops to Iraq. But he said the electorate may be willing to support a more forceful strategy for victory: "The choice is pretty stark -- between doing what's necessary to win, which includes changing strategy and committing the necessary resources, and losing, and I don't think the American people are ready to lose yet if they think if there is a chance to win."

Bush himself seemed to hang on to this possibility during the interview yesterday. The risk is that if his prescription for what to do in Iraq is insufficiently bold, he will find himself back in the same stalemate six months from now. "If he is unable to change course and he is unable to produce results, he is going to be in trouble," said Democratic pollster Jeremy Rosner, who was on the staff of President Bill Clinton's National Security Council.

But Bush may not be thinking in those terms. "I, of all people, would like to see the troops come home," he said during the interview. "But I don't want them to come home without achieving our objective, because I understand what happens if there's failure. And I'm going to keep repeating this over and over again, that I believe we're in an ideological struggle that is -- that our country will be dealing with for a long time."

Rice Confirms President Bush Is Considering More Troops For Iraq (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that President Bush is considering a surge of additional U.S. troops into Iraq to help secure Baghdad - despite strong reservations by some U.S. military leaders and the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee.

"The president has to decide whether he thinks some adjustments in American troop levels and what American troops would do is necessitated by current circumstances," Rice said.

"Anything he considers will certainly look at what can be done about the security of Baghdad," Rice said, describing sectarian violence in the capital as the main stumbling block to a more peaceful Iraq.

Rice said Bush, who's due to announce his new tactics in early January, wouldn't decide before further consultations with new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and military commanders.

But a number of active and retired generals already have expressed serious doubts about sending more troops to Iraq, saying there's little likelihood that the 20,000 to 30,000 troops under discussion would make a difference.

DOJ_NMG_0107830

Rice's predecessor as secretary of state, retired Gen. Colin Powell, said Sunday that sending more troops would strain the overstretched U.S. Army and wouldn't necessarily do much good.

"What mission is it these troops are to accomplish? Is it to secure Baghdad? In which case, the American Army isn't large enough to secure Baghdad, and we should not use our troops as policemen," Powell told CBS News.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., incoming chairman of the House Armed Service Committee, told reporters Tuesday that sending more troops probably wouldn't stop the violence and "could actually exacerbate the situation even further."

The White House sought to play down reports of a rift over Iraq strategy with the uniformed military.

"I think people are trying to create a fight between the president and the Joint Chiefs where one does not exist," White House spokesman Tony Snow said. He confirmed that the president is considering more troops but emphasized that Bush has made no final decisions.

Rice's comments on Iraq came during an hour-long interview with McClatchy Newspapers and other papers, much of which she spent defending U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East and elsewhere from rising public criticism.

On another topic, Cuba, Rice reiterated that should ailing leader Fidel Castro die, the United States won't try to engage his brother, Raul, who's temporarily in charge and is Fidel's presumed successor.

Giving an impression of American outreach "from one dictator to another" would be "the worst betrayal" of Cubans, she said.

With Iraq in near chaos, Palestinian factions fighting in the streets of Gaza, and Iran flexing its muscle throughout the Middle East, Rice's stewardship of foreign policy has come under increasing criticism.

In an implicit rebuke two weeks ago, the Iraq Study Group called on the administration to open talks with Iran and Syria, a move Bush and Rice almost immediately rejected.

Rice dismissed the idea that the administration might back off pushing for democracy in the Middle East, a course that critics say has added to instability and increased the strength of Islamists.

Asked what would be new about U.S. foreign policy in 2007, Rice replied: "Let's talk first about what is constant."

The Middle East, Rice argued, is at a "clarifying moment," with extremists on one side and moderate forces on the other. In the first camp she put Iran and Syria; in the second, mainstream states such as Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia.

In the coming year, "the one possible opportunity is to have a coalescence of these more mainstream, moderate forces," she said. The goal would be to build support for the fragile democratic governments of Lebanon and Iraq, and to make progress toward the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Rice plans to travel to the Middle East in the first half of January, after Bush's speech on Iraq, to resume diplomacy in the Arab-Israeli dispute.

But the effort is complicated by the failure of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the Hamas-led Palestinian assembly to form a national unity government.

Rice's critics say that the Middle East she sees - where democracy is slowly but unevenly on the rise - isn't matched by the chaotic reality on the ground.

"I'm not arguing that it's just going great - no," Rice responded. But, comparing the current era to the onset of the Cold War in the late 1940s, she said: "At the beginning of big historical transitions, everything is on the table. Yes, it can go wrong. But yes, it can go right."

Lawmaker Opposes More Troops For Baghdad (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, questioned the purpose of sending an additional 20,000 U.S. troops into Baghdad, the surge option being mentioned as one strategy change in Iraq being considered by President Bush.

"What is the military mission?" Skelton asked yesterday during a meeting with reporters. "I don't think it will change a thing," he said, adding: Would the added troops "exacerbate the problem by being more targets? Is there something to go after that we don't know?"

Sending 15,000 to 30,000 more troops for a mission of possibly six to eight months is among the proposals on the table in the White House policy review to reverse the steady deterioration in Iraq. Bush has said he will not make up his mind until next month, and after receiving recommendations from his new defense secretary, Robert M. Gates.

Skelton, in a news conference to outline his strategic priorities for the committee next year, took the time to voice his opposition to the surge proposal and, in so doing, seemed to reflect the position taken by members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. "The time for a troop increase," he said, "was about 3 1/2 years ago, when we initially went into Iraq." Referring to the 2003 suggestion of Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, the Army chief of staff then, that several hundred thousand troops may be needed, Skelton said: "If we had done that, I don't think we would be in the situation we are today."

DOJ_NMG_0107831

Skelton told reporters: "I'm not real optimistic about Iraq." During a 25-minute meeting last week that Vice President Cheney attended, "I told the president that personally," the Missouri Democrat said.

Skelton said he told Bush "that we should at least begin to do some redeployment right away to show the American people that we are not there forever [and] to show the Iraqi government . . . that the future of Iraq is in the hands of the Iraqis."

Next year, he said, his committee will focus on Iraq, Afghanistan, the fight against terrorism and "the fixing of U.S. forces." The full panel will provide oversight on Iraq, and the reconstituted oversight investigations subcommittee will explore matters such as the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad.

"We're going to look at every issue, and the fact that we will do a stronger oversight should mean something within the administration," he said.

Rice Stands Firm, Embarks On New Push (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- This should be Condoleezza Rice's moment.

The secretary of state's longtime rival, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, is gone. Her ties to President Bush appear as strong as ever. Her popularity remains high, even as support for the president ebbs. And voices on all sides are calling for more diplomacy, more outreach -- core strengths of the department she heads.

Yet, as she moves into her third year as the nation's top diplomat, she faces doubt over the administration's Iraq strategy and finds herself embattled and increasingly defensive. Criticism of the administration's foreign policy is on the rise, not only among Democrats, but from Republican stalwarts such as former Secretary of State James Baker, and even from close ally Britain.

Ms. Rice is about to embark on a new diplomatic push in the Middle East to win increased support in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories from what she calls "mainstream states" such as Jordan, Egypt and Saudi Arabia.

In a roundtable discussion with reporters yesterday, Ms. Rice firmly defended the administration's current approach in the region and made clear that stark shifts aren't in the offing.

Seeking to counter her critics and to put a positive gloss on the instability now rippling through the Middle East, Ms. Rice touted what she described as "a new opportunity" to get moderate forces in the region "to support the development of stable new governments in Iraq and Lebanon...and to make progress toward the emergence of a Palestinian state that is founded on the same principles."

In trying to solidify this block of moderate states, she said, the U.S. also would be marginalizing Iran and Syria, which she said has become "a sort of handmaiden to Iran."

While the White House continues to weigh changes to its Iraq strategy, Ms. Rice argues that a new alignment is shaping up in the Middle East that offers fresh promise for a new U.S. diplomatic effort. She described a campaign in which the U.S. is calling upon Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Egypt and key Gulf states to help calm the sectarian passions in Iraq, even going so far as to recognize the current Shiite-led government in Baghdad, a move most of Iraq's Sunni neighbors have avoided. U.S. allies in the region also are being asked to ramp up support for the embattled Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and for Lebanese Prime Minister Fouad Siniora to weaken Iranian-aided radical groups such as Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the Palestinian territories.

In exchange, the Bush administration is promising its Arab partners to try to reinvigorate the long-moribund peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians, assuming President Abbas can emerge as a viable interlocutor in place of the Hamas-led government. The U.S. also is reassuring allies it won't pull precipitously out of Iraq.

None of this suggests a dramatic shift in the U.S. diplomatic strategy. Calls for such a shift have soared, especially after the release three weeks ago of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group report, which criticized nearly every aspect of the administration's policies in the Middle East.

Ms. Rice defended the administration's endeavors in the Middle East, including its quest for democracy at the expense of stability, by arguing that the old order in the region was rotten at heart and an incubator for terrorism. "When people speak of returning to the stability of the old Middle East, I wonder, what stability was that?" she said.

This year has offered plenty of frustrations for a secretary of state who took over in January 2005 promising a push to spread freedom around the world.

The administration's biggest gamble, the Iraq invasion, is now widely seen as having backfired in several ways. Iran is surging as a regional power -- and, perhaps soon, as a nuclear one, too. Efforts in the United Nations Security Council to punish

DOJ_NMG_0107832

Iran over its nuclear ambitions continue to run afoul of Russian objections. Syria's position has been strengthened by the U.S. entanglement in Iraq, while Lebanon next door teeters on the edge of civil war. An emboldened North Korea, months after its first nuclear test, demands wide-ranging concessions from the U.S. and others before making a move to give up its nuclear program.

Ms. Rice has notched some successes. She won a quick U.N. resolution to slap sanctions on North Korea after its Oct. 9 nuclear test, a move that gained the support even of Pyongyang's longtime ally, China. She also won congressional approval of a landmark civilian nuclear deal with India that the administration considers key to a new strategic relationship with New Delhi.

But moving into the administration's last two years, critics say, the big question for Ms. Rice is whether she will hold to the administration's guiding principles -- that you preempt your enemies, but don't talk with them -- or will turn more toward trying to fix pressing problems, no matter who sits at the table.

"She is caught in a very difficult situation," said Aaron Miller, who advised six secretaries of state on Middle East issues and is now a scholar at the Woodrow Wilson Center. "She is showing signs of an emerging pragmatism, but is still locked in a set of principles that give her very little leeway and make it impossible for her to succeed."

Ms. Rice, however, repeatedly looked back to the challenges of the Cold War to argue that the turmoil in the Middle East will turn out for the better. "These are changes that take time," she said, adding that one will not be able to judge the success of the administration's actions for "decades. And I mean decades."

Budget Chief: 2007's War Costs Will Exceed Projected $110 Billion (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Iraq war will cost more this year than the $110 billion the Bush administration had forecast, the head of the White House budget office said Tuesday.

Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman said there was no firm estimate of the costs for fiscal 2007, which began Oct. 1. When he was asked if the $110 billion estimate was now too low, Portman said, "Yes."

He said the final figure "depends on a lot of things that are not yet decided. One is the policy moving forward."

Portman's statement adds fuel to speculation that the war costs will top last year's record $120 billion. Lawmakers have already approved $70 billion in supplemental spending for the Iraq war this year. The White House will issue a request for supplemental funding for the war in February.

A number of lawmakers, including Sen. Kent Conrad, D-N.D., and Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., have said they expect the supplemental request to exceed $100 billion, putting the total cost for the year at more than $170 billion.

"We'll review it and scrutinize it very closely," Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., the incoming chairman of the House Armed Services Committee said at a news conference Tuesday of the supplemental request.

Portman said increased tax revenues are helping offset the war's higher price tag, reducing the strain on the nation's budget deficit.

"Revenues are up because of the growing economy," he said. "That has enabled us not just to afford the relatively high supplementals, higher than expected, but also to have a declining deficit."

The Bush administration is trying to offer more information to lawmakers and the public about how much the war is projected to cost, Portman said.

"It's our intention to be more transparent about it than we have been in the past," he said. "It's a tough issue because the military will tell you, it's tough to predict a year out, much less 18 months, 24 months out."

Cost Of Wars Rises (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

Government spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan will exceed the Bush administration's original estimate of $110 billion for the 2007 fiscal year, and is likely to top $120 billion, White House officials said. That would set a record for annual wartime spending under President Bush. In an interview, the White House budget director, Rob Portman, said his original $110 billion estimate would "end up being low." Congress has already approved $70 billion in emergency spending for the war, and Mr. Portman's office is preparing an additional emergency request. Mr. Portman said he did not know what the final figure would be, but a senior administration official said it was "highly unlikely" that total wartime spending for 2007 would fall below the record $120 billion spent in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0107833

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

NASD: Morgan Stanley Hid Trove Of E-mail (USAT)

By Greg Farrell, Usa Today

USA Today, December 20, 2006

Broker used 9/11 to avoid request, complaint says

Once again, an old e-mail issue is coming back to haunt Morgan Stanley. For the second time this year, a national regulator has accused Morgan Stanley of stonewalling requests for documents and withholding crucial e-mails from investigators.

The NASD claimed Tuesday that Morgan Stanley hid the existence of millions of e-mails from customers of its Dean Witter brokerage. According to an NASD complaint, executives at Morgan Stanley used the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, as an alibi for their inability to produce a massive trove of e-mails sought by customers who felt they'd been burned by bad advice from Dean Witter brokers.

The firm's e-mail servers were, in fact, destroyed in those attacks, the NASD acknowledged. But by Sept. 17, 2001, the company was able to use emergency backup tapes to restore all e-email through Aug. 30, 2001, to the Morgan Stanley internal database.

Nevertheless, from October 2001 through March 2005, Morgan Stanley executives rebuffed requests from customers and regulators for internal e-mails predating the attacks, claiming they had been destroyed. The NASD alleged Morgan Stanley compounded that error by allowing the pre-Sept. 11 e-mails to be gradually overwritten on the company's internal system and lost forever.

The Securities and Exchange Commission settled a similar matter with Morgan Stanley in May, extracting a $15 million fine. But the SEC settlement only involved the firm's failure to provide documents to regulators. It didn't address the alleged harm done to customers who had filed arbitration claims against Dean Witter.

The NASD action specifically charges that Morgan Stanley hurt retail investors who filed arbitration claims against the brokerage firm. By denying those investors access to e-mails in the years leading up to September 2001, Morgan Stanley made it nearly impossible for its customers to present evidence on their own behalf.

In March 2005, during a civil trial brought against it in Florida, Morgan Stanley admitted the existence of the pre-Sept. 11 e-mails. Since then, the firm has pledged to cooperate with regulators.

But in a statement Tuesday, Morgan Stanley said it would fight the NASD's action. "Current management has made extensive efforts to reach a fair and appropriate settlement of this matter, but the NASD's disproportionate and unprecedented demands leave us no choice but to litigate. We look forward to having this issue heard by an impartial hearing panel."

Morgan Stanley reported fiscal 2006 earnings up 44% to $7.5 billion on Tuesday. Its stock rose $1.33 to $81.70.

Morgan Stanley Used 9/11 As Excuse, NASD Says (WSJ)

By Jaime Levy Pessin

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Complaint Alleges Emails Linked to Arbitration Cases Weren't Lost After Attacks

Morgan Stanley used 9/11 as an excuse for failing to produce millions of emails in hundreds of arbitration claims, even though it turned out not to be the case, the National Association of Securities Dealers charged yesterday.

The NASD is proceeding to litigate the case after the big Wall Street firm declined to settle it.

In its complaint, the NASD alleges that the brokerage arm of Morgan Stanley falsely claimed millions of its emails were destroyed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, where Morgan Stanley had a large brokerage operation. The complaint alleges that the firm recovered most of those emails within days of the attacks.

"There was a lengthy attempt to reach the settlement," said James Shorris, the NASD's enforcement chief. "Had the firm been willing to settle this appropriately and compensate all the individual investors who had been hurt, we would have been happy to settle it."

According to people familiar with Morgan Stanley's position on the matter, the firm was willing to compensate some investors whose claims might have been affected had the emails been produced. They said the NASD wanted the firm to compensate more than 1,000 investors who filed arbitration claims between October 2001 and March 2005, even if those claims were without merit altogether, or didn't involve email at all.

In an emailed statement, Morgan Stanley called the NASD's settlement demands "disproportionate and unprecedented."

DOJ_NMG_0107834

In its statement, Morgan Stanley said that once its prior management realized backup emails were available, it informed regulators and lawyers, built searchable databases, produced newly discovered emails and cooperated fully with the NASD.

While the NASD charges focus on arbitration cases involving small individual investors, Morgan Stanley's document-retention problems also played a large role in litigation between the firm and investor Ronald Perelman. In 2005, a Florida state court ruled against Morgan Stanley in a case focused on the firm's actions surrounding the sale of a company controlled by Mr. Perelman to Sunbeam Corp., which was a Morgan Stanley client. The court railed against Morgan Stanley's repeated inability to produce documents, and the jury awarded Mr. Perelman $1.58 billion. Morgan Stanley has appealed that verdict.

Last year, Morgan Stanley paid $15 million to settle a civil lawsuit with the Securities and Exchange Commission over failure to produce tens of thousands of emails during probes of conflicts of interest among Wall Street analysts and other issues between late 2000 and mid-2005.

Morgan Stanley's brokerage-unit email servers were kept in its World Trade Center offices at the time of the terrorist attacks on lower Manhattan. Although the servers were destroyed, the NASD's complaint says, the firm was able to restore millions of emails by using backup tapes.

Despite restoring the emails, the NASD alleges, Morgan Stanley repeatedly told regulators and investors involved in arbitration claims that all emails had been destroyed. The complaint also says that when Morgan Stanley discovered that backup copies of emails still existed, "it made the affirmative determination not to preserve the restored messages or the tapes used to restore them to the servers."

According to the NASD's complaint, many arbitration proceedings were concluded between October 2001 and March 2005 "without the benefit of potentially valuable evidence that [the firm] possessed but falsely denied having."

Because of the nature of the NASD's arbitration process, it is unlikely investors will be able to reopen their claims should old emails turn up, Mr. Shorris and lawyers who represent investors said. Mr. Shorris said he didn't think Morgan Stanley's behavior rose to the level of fraud -- one of the conditions that would allow investors to reopen their cases.

Instead, Mr. Shorris said, his top priority in litigating the case will be to seek a remedy that will directly benefit investors whose claims may have been dismissed unfairly: possibly a new process to adjudicate claims, possibly direct compensation or possibly a combination of those options.

Since Sept. 11, 2001, Morgan Stanley has been involved in scores of arbitration cases, regulatory settlements and legal judgments in which it said it couldn't produce email evidence. Morgan Stanley told one Kansas City investor her files were destroyed even though there were no trades in her account until October 2001. The firm blamed a "simple and honest mistake," apologized and agreed to settle.

But last year, the firm informed regulators and lawyers for individual investors that it had discovered email sources thought to have been destroyed in the World Trade Center. The email sources were discovered as part of an internal review of email retention related to the Perelman case, according to people familiar with the matter.

Lawyers who represent investors cheered the NASD's complaint against Morgan Stanley. "It's long overdue," said Charles Austin, a Richmond, Va., lawyer who had a client denied documents that had supposedly been destroyed in the terrorist attacks. "Morgan Stanley repeatedly misrepresented the status and existence of emails and some of the stories they told were patently incredible."

--Susanne Craig and Jed Horowitz contributed to this article.

Write to Jaime Levy Pessin at jaime.pessin@dowjones.com1

Firm Accused Of Deleting Missing E-Mail (WP)

By Carrie Johnson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Morgan Stanley Said Files Were Lost After Sept. 11

Securities regulators charged Morgan Stanley DW Inc. with failing to hand over millions of e-mail messages to investigators and plaintiffs by falsely saying that the documents had been lost in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the World Trade Center, according to a complaint filed yesterday.

The NASD alleged that the retail brokerage destroyed nearly 8 million electronic messages between September 2001 and March 2005, a period when documents preserved on backup tapes and on the computers of individual employees were deleted during the normal course of business.

Morgan Stanley had told regulators and plaintiffs seeking to recover money lost in disputes with company brokers over investment strategy that its computer servers had fallen victim to terror attacks in New York. Documents dated before Sept. 11 were no longer available for review, the company said. In fact, the firm had backed up its systems as of Aug. 30, according to investigators.

"The firm's actions undermined the integrity of the regulatory and arbitration processes, potentially leaving in question the validity of the outcomes in hundreds of cases," said James S. Shorris, head of enforcement at the NASD.

Investors have little hope of reopening their arbitration cases, however, because they are unlikely to meet the high standard for doing so, legal analysts said. To prevail, investors would need to prove that individual Morgan Stanley brokers intentionally withheld the e-mail messages or committed fraud -- accusations the NASD stopped short of making yesterday.

Settlement talks collapsed after the NASD sought to recover money for the arbitration plaintiffs, many of whom expressed little interest after they received notice of the e-mail breakdown in March 2005, according to Morgan Stanley officials.

"Current management has made extensive efforts to reach a fair and appropriate settlement of this matter, but the NASD's disproportionate and unprecedented demands leave us no choice but to litigate," the firm said in a written statement.

In its complaint, the NASD said Morgan Stanley was able to rebuild its e-mail system and restore 11 of its 12 computer servers within days of the attack. Even more messages remained in the inboxes of individual employees, regulators said. But by last year millions of the pre-Sept. 11 e-mails had been deleted, leaving only 500,000 for regulators to examine.

The failure to hand over documents affected a since-settled NASD probe into fees Morgan Stanley had charged investors, as well as other requests by the New York Stock Exchange and the Massachusetts Securities Division.

"Arbitration lawyers have been complaining for years that Morgan Stanley was hiding the ball," said Jacob H. Zamansky, a lawyer who represents investors in arbitration cases.

It is not the company's first run-in with regulators. Earlier this year Morgan Stanley & Co., a separate unit for institutional clients, agreed to pay $15 million to settle Securities and Exchange Commission charges that it failed to produce documents related to a pair of enforcement probes. In March 2005, a judge in Florida criticized the same unit for withholding evidence in a case filed by financier Ronald O. Perelman.

Two years ago, Morgan Stanley's brokerage arm paid $250,000 to resolve separate NASD charges that it failed to comply with obligations to turn over papers in arbitration cases.

Plan Unveiled To Scrap A Sarbanes-Oxley Rule (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Accounting industry overseers yesterday scrapped an audit rule targeted by businesses as expensive and burdensome, proposing looser guidelines that would direct accountants to focus on the integrity of corporate managers and the most risky aspects of a company's financial reports.

The proposal is designed to address the most contentious part of the 2002 Sarbanes-Oxley law, passed by Congress after problems at Enron and WorldCom tarnished the reputation of the accounting profession and rocked investor confidence.

The planned changes to a rule that requires auditors to review the financial controls of their client companies come after more than two years of complaints by businesses large and small. The overhaul marks one of the most significant concessions by regulators in a broad campaign by trade groups to make corporate rules and laws more flexible.

Criticism over the rule and charges that it is prompting fewer companies to list their shares on U.S. markets have gathered momentum in recent months, which was acknowledged by Mark W. Olson, chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. The proposed change, which will be subject to more than two months of public comment, "will help transform the rule into a cornerstone accomplishment rather than a provision that continues to be associated with adverse market trends," Olson said.

At its core, the proposal cuts the current rule by one-third -- to 65 pages from 180. It is intended to eliminate unnecessary or duplicative work by the nation's largest accounting firms, which have posted steep profit gains for the past few years as a result of the rule and the reluctance of companies to push back against it in the post-Enron environment.

Members of the accounting board debated whether the plan would result in substantial cost savings, with at least one expressing a measure of skepticism. It may be two years or more before the economics become clear, said Bill Gradison, who urged "a strong need for patience."

Under the plan, which could be revised based on public feedback, auditors would be allowed to use the work of internal accountants and corporate managers as well as refer back to their own work in previous years. They would be given new instructions on such costly and resource-intensive issues as how many corporate offices they must visit. And they would be told that they no longer need to test controls that relate to "a large portion" of their clients' assets, language that was harshly criticized in comment letters from managers as too onerous.

The plan would require auditors to look for problems that have a "reasonable possibility" of producing a weakness in a company's finances. The current provision instructs auditors to consider issues with a "more than remote" chance of causing trouble.

DOJ_NMG_0107836

Instead, auditors would be encouraged to examine how companies close out their books at the end of each quarter and to scrutinize managers' integrity and ability to overrule in-house accountants. Among the items auditors would be explicitly told to consider under the new proposal is whether corporate managers' compensation is tied to the financial performance of the company, an issue that affects the independence of the managers' judgment.

In a change that observers said would significantly reduce costs and the number of audit hours, the accounting board proposal would throw out a requirement that auditors assess how well management reviewed internal controls -- focusing instead on a single assessment of how the controls are working.

When working with companies with market capitalization of between $75 million and $787 million, accounting firms would be urged to focus on such issues as the number of people in the financial unit, the number of the company's business lines, and the complexity of the company's operations. Smaller companies would not automatically win less-intense reviews from auditors.

Charles D. Niemeier, a member of the accounting board, said the current rules work for small companies, noting that more than 18 percent of companies with market capitalization of less than $787 million had discovered control weaknesses during the first year of reviews. But that figure was halved during the second year -- evidence, he said, that rigorous reviews were uncovering mistakes that are important to investors.

Regulators had predicted that the changes could take effect as early as March or April, in time for next year's audit season. But disagreement between the accounting board and the Securities and Exchange Commission over the extent of the concessions hindered the process. Officials now say the new rule will likely be adopted next summer. Small businesses recently won another compliance extension and will not be required to adopt the proposal until the end of 2008, meaning that it could take until 2009 to determine how much the reviews will cost.

Rulemakers called the changes substantial but vigorously denied that they would lead to fewer protections for investors. "This proposal does not diminish or water down" the existing rule, said Kayla J. Gillan, another accounting board member.

Will Backdating Scandal Thwart Effort To Roll Back Reforms? December 20, 2006; Page A2 (WSJ)

By Alan Murray

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

A few bad apples. That was the oft-heard line taken by corporate leaders back in 2002 and 2003, after the meltdowns of Enron, WorldCom, Tyco and Parmalat. A few miscreants, they argued, shouldn't be allowed to tarnish the entire corporate world.

But this year's backdating scandal has eliminated the last echoes of that defense. More than 120 companies have been implicated in what all but a few hardy holdouts now acknowledge is simple theft. As one former chairman of the Business Roundtable told me: "Those guys were caught with their hands in the cookie jar."

Clearly, something's amiss in the orchard. A new study out this week helps explain what that might be. Three scholars -- Lucian Bebchuk, Yaniv Grinstein, and Urs Peyer -- have run the numbers on 29,000 grants of stock options to directors, and found that 9% of them were "lucky" -- that is, they occurred on a day when the stock price hit a monthly low. "Lucky" is in quotes, because the authors clearly believe that many, if not most, were the result not of luck but of backdating.

Options were originally given to directors to align their interests more closely with those of shareholders. But the new study suggests in many cases that options have had a very different effect, tying directors more closely to management. "Directors' grant events were more likely to be lucky when executives, and especially the CEO, also received a grant on the same date," the study concludes.

One more finding of note: The "lucky" grants were more common in the days before Sarbanes-Oxley, which sets tight deadlines for reporting option grants. But they continued after the corporate-reform law was passed, suggesting the problem hasn't been solved.

The backdating brouhaha has occurred just as the business community is gearing up to roll back rules put into place after the 2002-2003 scandals. The Securities and Exchange Commission last week announced plans to relax Sarbanes-Oxley requirements for smaller companies. In addition, the Justice Department said it was revising some of the tougher prosecution practices it adopted in the wake of those scandals. And the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation, a private group acting with the blessing of Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, recently recommended more sweeping changes, including measures to limit class-action securities lawsuits.

The prevalence of backdating raises the question: Has the corporate-reform movement really gone too far? Or has it not gone far enough?

Assemble a room full of CEOs and you will find no doubt that it has gone too far. They'll regale you with stories about the excesses of litigation, the terror tactics of prosecutors who threaten to indict entire companies and the pointless costs of Sarbanes-Oxley Section 404, which requires outside audits of companies' internal financial controls. Fill the room with unionists, shareholder advocates and academics, and you'll hear tirades against the inconceivable greed of CEOs, who despite eight-figure paychecks feel the need to break the rules to make even more money.

DOJ_NMG_0107837

In the midst of this rancorous debate, Ira Millstein, who has long labored in corporate governance, is the rare voice of sanity. Mr. Millstein, senior partner at Weil, Gotshal & Manges, rightly argues that some of the post-Enron reforms have gone too far. Indeed, he surprised and angered many of his left-leaning friends in academia and elsewhere by signing on to the report of the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation.

Many of those recommendations make good sense. Section 404 of Sarbanes Oxley was a classic case of legislative overreach, imposing excessive burdens on small companies, and discouraging foreign companies from listing shares in the U.S. The Justice Department's much-discussed "Thompson memo" was also the product of overreaction, allowing federal prosecutors to adopt the bullying tactics favored by New York's former attorney general, Eliot Spitzer. And class-action securities lawsuits, while not new, continue to be an overused tool. On all of these, some rollback would be welcome.

But in return for those changes, Mr. Millstein wants "the grand bargain." Instead of more regulation, more prosecution and more litigation give shareholders more power to oversee the companies in which they invest. Make it clear, once and for all, that directors really do work for shareholders, not for management, by giving shareholders the power not only to remove directors, but also to nominate them, without engaging in costly proxy battles.

The commissioners of the SEC are considering changes that move in this direction, and the business lobby in Washington has launched a determined battle to stop them. For corporate leaders, shareholder democracy may be a frightening prospect. But it beats the alternatives.

The Enron Pendulum (FT)

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

Five years after the Enron debacle, the pendulum seems to be swinging back towards a lighter form of corporate regulation in America. Over the past week, the SEC and justice department have both announced changes in the methods they use to keep corporate America honest. They were reacting to criticism from business, which complains of an excess of zeal in the post-Enron period - and that is good news, not just for corporate America, but for the investing public.

But serious concerns remain over whether the justice department, for its part, has done enough to rein in abusive practices that have become all too common post-Enron. Last week the head of the department's white collar crime fighters, Paul McNulty, announced new guidelines for prosecutors: from now on, they will have to get approval directly from him if they want to ask a company to waive the confidentiality that normally protects communications with its lawyers - and if the company refuses, it can no longer be penalised for doing so. Prosecutors will also be forbidden, in most cases, from putting pressure on companies to cut off legal fees to employees involved in an investigation.

So far, so laudable. For too long, prosecutors have abused their power by demanding that companies show their willingness to co-operate with the government by waiving the sacred privilege that normally protects communications with their lawyers. Faced with the corporate equivalent of the death penalty - an indictment that could mean bankruptcy - few dared to refuse the prosecutor's demands.

Now, at least in theory, they can "just say no"; but will they? It seems unlikely. For in one important respect, the changes appear more semantic than real: prosecutors may not penalise companies for refusing to disclose communications with their lawyers - but they may still reward them for doing so. The end result is the same: you waive, or you lose. With a nod and a wink, any half-clever prosecutor can circumvent the new requirement that the top cop sign off on all waiver requests - and the post-Enron "culture of waiver" could easily remain unchanged.

That would be bad news for corporate America and the investing public: companies need legal advice to obey complex laws; if they cannot get it - without the risk that what they say will be revealed to the government in a subsequent investigation - they may not try to obey the law at all. That could defeat the purpose of the post-Enron corporate crime crusade: to create a culture of compliance that encourages companies to do the right thing, without having to be prosecuted.

Congress must keep the heat on the prosecutors. Unless they change their tactics, as well as their rhetoric, legislators should step in to make sure that the prosecutorial abuses of the past few years are firmly behind us.

The 'McNulty Memo': Real Change, Or Retreat? (LAW)

By Marcia Coyle, The National Law Journal

Natinoal Law Journal, December 20, 2006

In the wake of newly revised guidelines for federal prosecutors investigating and prosecuting corporations, the key question, according to white-collar criminal defense lawyers, is: Are the guidelines meaningful change or strategic retreat?

DOJ_NMG_0107838

William McGuinness, chairman of the New York litigation department at Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver & Jacobson, believes the answer is clear:

"I regard it as strategic retreat -- when you're going to lose a battle, you back up to the point you think you can defend," he said.

The McNulty memorandum, issued by Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty last week, revises the controversial Thompson memorandum, which was widely criticized as creating a culture in which prosecutors routinely demanded waiver of the attorney-client and work-product privileges as evidence of cooperation with an investigation.

But, McGuinness said, "The fact is it continues to embrace the notion that under certain circumstances the Justice Department can consider waiver of the privilege in making its charging determinations. I think that's wrong."

Many defense lawyers, legal scholars, and members of a broad coalition of business and civil liberties groups that had lobbied intensely for changes in the Thompson memorandum echoed McGuinness' skepticism. As they digested the 21-page McNulty memorandum, they saw the following "flaws" or problems in the government's new approach:

The guidelines are internal policy, unenforceable at law, and there is no remedy per se if a prosecutor fails to follow them.

The guidelines create two new categories of information sought by prosecutors; both contain privileged materials but they require different standards for department approval of waiver requests by prosecutors. Those categories are unlikely to be recognized by courts or accepted by third parties seeking the waived materials.

The pressure to waive privilege is unabated under the guidelines because although they prohibit prosecutors making charging decisions from considering a corporation's refusal to provide "the most sensitive" attorney-client information, they do allow favorable consideration when a company agrees.

Prosecutors in making a decision to bring charges may not consider a corporation's advancement of attorney fees to employees, except when it was done to impede the government's investigation -- a standard that may be too easy to meet.

The guidelines continue to allow prosecutors weighing a corporation's cooperation to consider joint defense agreements, information-sharing between a corporation and employees about a government investigation, or a corporation's retention or failure to sanction employees who assert Fifth Amendment rights.

"I think the Department of Justice is somewhat on probation here," said Craig D. Margolis, partner in the Washington office of Houston's Vinson & Elkins.

If the guidelines are not implemented according to their terms and the department simply becomes a rubber stamp for prosecutors' waiver requests, he said, "I think there will be a hue and cry out of corporate America, and we'll see Congress stepping in."

NEW PROCESS

The revised guidelines basically create a two-tiered approach for prosecutors' requests for protected materials.

For Category 1 materials -- factual information such as key documents, witness statements or purely factual interview memoranda -- the prosecutor first must seek approval from the U.S. attorney, who must consult with the assistant attorney general of the Justice Department Criminal Division before approving the waiver request.

For Category 2 materials -- attorney-client communications, legal advice or nonfact attorney work product -- the U.S. attorney must obtain written approval from the deputy attorney general.

Prosecutors also must establish a legitimate need by addressing four factors, such as whether alternatives to waiver are available. Prosecutors may not consider in their charging decisions a corporation's refusal to provide Category 2 materials, but they can consider favorably a corporation's compliance with the request. And they can consider a corporation's decision to refuse to provide Category 1 factual information.

Stephanie Martz, director of the white-collar crime project at the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, called the two new categories of protected materials "very deceiving." Category 1, she explained, is described as purely factual materials, but includes witness statements and interview notes.

"They apparently are supposed to be just devoid of opinion work product, but that's pretty close to the line," said Martz. "Courts are all over the place on what kind of waiver it is when you turn over witness statements. The notion that it is just factual has not been universally accepted."

But former federal prosecutor Jonathan Rosen, a white-collar criminal defense attorney in the Washington office of Boston-based Mintz, Levin, Cohn, Ferris, Glovsky and Popeo, said the McNulty memo is a "significant departure" from prior practice.

Removing the waiver decision from the line prosecutor and requiring an objective showing of need, he said, should eliminate the often wildly varying and arbitrary enforcement of waiver requests in certain jurisdictions.

Ronald C. Minkoff, a litigation partner and attorney ethics specialist at New York's Frankfurt Kurnit Klein & Selz, countered, "Even for the most core attorney-client privileged information, the prosecutor could pass that test without any major problem. If the issue is the need for the information, there's almost always the need. On the other hand, if enforced strictly, it can be useful in curbing whatever abuses there have been."

DOJ_NMG_0107839

Also significant, said Rosen, is that the memo changes the department's practice to conform with Southern District of New York Judge Lewis Kaplan's ruling on legal fees in the government's litigation against KPMG. Kaplan found that prosecutors effectively coerced the accounting firm into cutting off all payments of fees and expenses of indicted employees -- a violation of their Fifth and Sixth amendment rights.

The guidelines prohibit prosecutors from considering the advancement of attorney fees in their charging decision, except where the fees and other facts show an intent to impede the investigation. Rosen said that fees combined with, for example, joint defense agreements or failure to terminate employees who refuse to cooperate, could be sufficient for prosecutors to use the exception.

Forrester CFO Resigns Amid Options Probe (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

Forrester CFO Resigns After Internal Probe Finds Stock Option Grant Irregularity

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) -- Forrester Research Inc. said late Tuesday its Chief Financial Officer and Treasurer Warren Hadley resigned after an internal investigation found irregularities regarding an option grant for 5,000 shares made to him in 1999.

The initial findings resulted from a probe started by the audit committee of Forrester's board. The committee has hired independent counsel to conduct the investigation and Forrester said it informed the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The impact of the grant to Hadley is not financially material, but the review is still in the early stages, Forrester said.

"Forrester is unable to speculate whether, when the investigation is complete, there will be any material impact on current or prior financial statements," the company said. "Any adjustments that would be required are expected to be non-cash, stock compensation charges and related tax benefit or expense."

A total of 105 companies are currently under SEC or Justice Department scrutiny regarding past stock option grants and accounting practices, and at least 90 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews, according to an AP review. Hadley is one of now 60 senior executives, including 18 chief executives and a dozen other finance chiefs, who left 33 companies as a result of the various probes.

George F. Colony, Forrester's chairman and chief executive, will also serve as acting CFO while the company searches for Hadley's replacement.

Shares of Forrester dipped 5 cents to end at $28.85 on the Nasdaq.

Love Thy Lawyer (WSJ)

By Bruno Cova And Leigh Dance

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

The short-term risk most likely to influence a company's future today is legal risk and its consequences. Just look at the crises that hit ABB in 2003, Marsh & McLennan in 2004 or Hewlett Packard late this year. Several factors are driving legal risks to the forefront: aggressive development and enforcement of regulations in the U.S. and Europe; more cooperation and communication among regulatory authorities world-wide; and a public and media happy to punish companies that appear to "misbehave" or break their promises.

A regulatory investigation or an abrupt fall in share price often triggers costly disputes and litigation, followed by management reorganizations, fines, takeovers, loss of market share, and more binding regulations and regulatory policing. A poorly handled legal problem can push a successful company into insolvency, prevent the achievement of business objectives, and cost the jobs and reputations of chief executives and board members.

Often, what initially seems to be a marginal legal issue -- a regulatory approval or a violation of banking regulations in a remote subsidiary, for example -- grows into a bet-the-company type of risk. And even once the threat or problem is resolved, legal disputes and regulatory inquiries may linger on for years in other jurisdictions, causing far-reaching damage and costly distraction. Just consider the competition problems Microsoft still faces in Europe, years after the company settled with U.S. authorities.

Boards, particularly of European and Asian companies, sometimes fail to leverage their company's legal department to prevent a legal problem or to advise them in a crisis. Directors may spend hours discussing finance or audit issues related to a financial-disclosure issue, but often they have never met with the general counsel and are unaware of the available legal resources.

DOJ_NMG_0107840

A duly empowered legal department can help directors govern better, and shield them from liability. Legal and regulatory issues can be a huge driver of a company's strategy: Think of how the European energy industry has transformed itself as a consequence of EU regulatory changes. They can also be key tools for achieving a business objective or prevent a competitor from reaching it, as demonstrated by the recent wave of protectionist measures introduced to thwart cross-border takeovers. Once a problem has erupted, it is often the legal response that determines whether and how quickly a company recovers, as in the skillfully handled crises at Tyco, Marsh & McLennan, Royal Dutch Shell and others.

Some boards' failure to pay attention to legal issues is even more surprising considering that, more and more often, authorities explicitly direct corporations to identify and demonstrate how they are reducing legal risks, such as implementing compliance programs. Increasingly, regulators sternly punish those who fail to do so.

Compliance reaches deep into the company's operations, and therefore problems are not easy for directors to spot. This is why the legal compliance function is critical. At the first sign of a serious problem, the chief legal or compliance officer can alert the board quickly. An internal investigation may be merited in any of the company's activities, anywhere in the world.

European and Asian companies are beginning to follow America's lead in building highly capable legal teams that know the business intimately. Many in-house counsels of Europe's (and, to a lesser extent, Asia's) leading companies have far more compliance and risk-management responsibilities, including tracking legal and regulatory compliance throughout the company. The general counsel and chief compliance officer have demanding roles: They implement and oversee internal controls, support ongoing business transactions, and manage in-house and outside advisers across broad territories.

But while the position of the corporate counsel has improved, there is still a ways to go, particularly in Europe and Asia. No longer can in-house lawyers be seen as narrow legal practitioners, called in to rubber-stamp a decision. They must work along side business management.

Besides assisting the board with internal controls to defend against a crisis, in-house counsel can shed light on opportunities unfolding in the business. Laws and regulations can be used to find the most efficient route to enter certain markets, or to better defend market share and retain key intellectual property assets. Early and consistent interaction with the general counsel puts directors in a far better position to help the company compete effectively and deliver shareholder value.

Because they can provide additional armor for directors and help protect the company overall, general counsel (and where they exist, chief compliance officers) need to communicate freely with the board. Often they are disarmed by reporting relationships that don't allow proper access to executives and directors, or that discourage directors from exercising effective control of the legal function.

Chief executives and directors of international companies should be more interested than ever to link to the general counsel and to ensure that the legal department has the talent, tools and structure to effectively inform corporate governance.

If you are a director and are not sure about your company's status on these issues, beware. What you don't know may hurt you. We know that you want to avert crisis or scandal, minimize loss, and maximize the company's ability to grow profitably. On your way to the boardroom, don't forget your legal shield.

Mr. Cova, who was chief legal adviser to Italy's Parmalat during its restructuring in 2004-05 and previously general counsel of Fiat, is co-managing partner of Paul Hastings's Milan office. Ms. Dance is president of ELD International, a consultancy to global law departments and law firms.

Amtrak Fires Five In Midst Of Congressional Probe (LAW)

By Anna Palmer, Legal Times

Law.com, December 20, 2006

New Amtrak President Alex Kummant engineered a major management restructuring Monday, firing five top officials and naming Eleanor Acheson, assistant attorney general for policy development under President Bill Clinton, as the passenger rail's general counsel.

The move comes after a call earlier this month by outgoing House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee Chairman Don Young, R-Alaska, and Rep. John Mica, R-Fla., for the Department of Justice to investigate Amtrak's legal department and outside counsel after the release of an inspector general's report, which found that Amtrak mismanaged more than $100 million in legal bills. The congressmen also called for Amtrak's inspector general to further investigate Manatt, Phelps & Phillips' expenses and billing of secretarial work.

In a Dec. 18 letter to Amtrak employees, Kummant announced the firing of Chief Financial Officer David Smith, Assistant Vice President of Transportation Thomas Schmidt, Police Chief Alfred Broadbent, Vice President for Marketing and Sales Barbara Richardson, and Vice President of Corporate Communications William Schulz. The letter also stated that Acheson will replace Alicia Serfaty as general counsel and corporate secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0107841

"While change can be difficult, this reorganization is the result of a great deal of consideration," Kummant said in the letter. He also said the "restructuring and personnel changes put in place the team that will drive the vision and the future of our company."

Amtrak spokesman Cliff Black says the changes were not a response to the inspector general's report on its legal department. "I can't associate it directly with the report. Corporate reorganizations are common under new CEOs. This is no different than that of any other large corporation under new leadership."

Serfaty has headed up Amtrak's 160-person legal department since 2002. Until Acheson comes on board in mid-January, Joseph Bress, Amtrak labor relations vice president, will serve as acting general counsel. According to the Kummant letter, Serfaty will remain at Amtrak and will "assist Kummant in the transition period" in her new position as counsel to the president. The New York Times has reported that Serfaty would act in that capacity for three months, but Black could not confirm whether or not Serfaty's position was temporary. No other personnel in Amtrak's legal department have been fired.

Acheson headed the Justice Department office responsible for vetting judges under Clinton. After leaving the Justice Department in 2001, Acheson moved to the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force's government affairs department.

Kummant declined to be interviewed for this story.

Despite the changes, the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee's Amtrak oversight is far from over.

"We've been through the Acela fiasco, the brake fiasco, the food service fiasco and now the latest is the legal fiasco," says Mica, who will be the ranking Republican member on the House Transportation Committee in the next Congress.

More than 200 Amtrak employees outside the legal department have been fired for theft or financial irregularities in the past couple of years.

"Some people say I'm Amtrak's biggest opponent. I'm actually the strongest supporter of a national passenger rail system and high-speed rail system," says Mica. "But I want to bring in some of the efficiencies that the private sector can bring in."

Mica says he plans to unveil a major legislative initiative early next year to revamp the northeast corridor and high-speed rail system. Amtrak's inspector general is expected to report back to the House committee regarding Manatt's legal bills by February.

Municipal Bond Attorney Group To Warn Members On Bid Rigging (BLOOM)

By Christine Richard And Darrell Preston

Bloomberg, December 20, 2006

Dec. 19 (Bloomberg) -- The National Association of Bond Lawyers, a group of attorneys who advise U.S. state and local governments on borrowings, plans to warn members about anti- competitive practices amid a growing government probe of the municipal bond market.

The Justice Department investigation into potential bid- rigging in municipal investment contracts prompted the Chicago-based association to schedule a conference call with members to review potential abuses, said Carol Lew, president of the group and a public finance lawyer at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Rauth in Orange County, California.

``We need to educate our membership as to what's going on and how people should be handling things," said Lew. ``We do not know how pervasive any of this wrongdoing is. It may be a few isolated cases or it may be worse than that."

U.S. state and local governments that borrow in the almost 200-year-old municipal debt market rely on the opinions of attorneys and advisers to assure potential investors that their bonds clear requirements by the Internal Revenue Service and will remain tax-exempt. The IRS can publicly reprimand, suspend or disbar attorneys from representing clients before the agency for reasons including ``incompetent or disreputable" behavior or misleading a client with ``intent to defraud," according to the agency's Web site.

The Justice Department's criminal investigation stems from an IRS review that found municipal bond deals robbed federal taxpayers of more than $100 million.

Subpoenas, Raids

Prosecutors are trying to determine whether banks and brokers conspired to fix prices on the financial products municipalities buy to invest proceeds that aren't spent immediately on schools and sewers. The Justice Department last month subpoenaed more than a dozen financial firms and seized documents from three brokers in a search for bid rigging in the broadest criminal probe of the market where local governments have $2.3 trillion of debt outstanding.

Among the deals reviewed by the IRS was the purchase by the city of Atlanta of a $453 million guaranteed investment contract using proceeds of a bond sold in 1999. The IRS asked whether banks arranged to submit ``courtesy losing bids" at an auction to provide the investment. It isn't known whether officials in Atlanta were contacted by the Justice Department.

A call to Janice Davis, Atlanta's chief financial officer, wasn't immediately returned.

Hard to Prevent

Few details about the Justice Department investigation have been made public, leaving issuers and their attorneys to draw conclusions from the few public details available.

``It's not readily apparent what action bond counsel could have taken to prevent the kind of activity that has been uncovered by the IRS," said Roger Davis, a partner in Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe's San Francisco public finance office. ``The practices were intended to be covered up."

Davis said the concerns raised by the investigation over potential abuses are starting to push states and cities away from purchasing guaranteed investment contracts.

Scranton School District in Pennsylvania, an issuer that has been questioned by the IRS, said it relies on the services of professionals including lawyers when doing deals.

The district has been asked to provide information about a $63.3 million issue of General Obligation refunding notes sold in July 2001, according to a disclosure statement the school district filed with Bloomberg. The document said the IRS is concerned about a certificate of deposit acquired to invest some of the proceeds and ``possible unusual fee arrangements between parties to the transaction."

``We hire professional people and rely on them to structure a deal that is in the best interest of the district," said Gregg Sunday, business manager for the school district. The district hasn't been asked by the Justice Department for information, he said.

Vitesse Finds Options, Other Errors (WSJ)

By ZACHARY M. SEWARD

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Vitesse Semiconductor Corp. said it had found a wide-ranging array of irregularities at the company, including options backdating, bogus sales invoices, improper revenue recognition, inflated reporting of cash balances and a failure to take write-offs for returned merchandise.

The disclosures came as a result of an internal review, which was started in April to examine options practices, by a special committee of Vitesse's board.

Separately, the chief financial officer of Forrester Research Inc., Warren Hadley, resigned in what that company called the result of findings in its options probe.

The irregularities at Vitesse, based in Camarillo, Calif., were so widespread that the company said it would likely be unable to file restated financials for the 2004 and 2005 fiscal years. The company said former top executives had backdated their own options grants and artificially inflated Vitesse's revenue while altering financial records to conceal the practices.

Options give a recipient the right to purchase stock at a set price. Backdating, or saying the options were granted earlier than they were, can create an instant increase in value, reducing an executive's incentive for stock growth and presenting accounting problems and potential criminal charges. Vitesse is under investigation by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Its irregular options grants were reported by The Wall Street Journal in March.

Vitesse, which has already cleared its executive suite of individuals implicated in the internal probe, said it had dismissed the company's independent accounting firm, KPMG LLP, "based on its lack of independence." Vitesse didn't elaborate, and a spokesman for KPMG, George Ledwith, said, "We're not aware of any independence issue."

The investigation at Vitesse found that "backdating and manipulation" of stock options amounted to about $120 million in unaccounted expenses since 1995. The company said that all but one of its current directors and senior executives were unaware of the options backdating when it occurred. The exception, it said, was Louis R. Tomasetta, Vitesse's co-founder and former chief executive, who remains on the board but has been excluded from discussions and actions related to the probe. Mr. Tomasetta couldn't be reached for comment.

Separately, Forrester, based in Cambridge, Mass., said in a brief statement that its continuing options probe found "irregularities" in a 1999 options grant to Mr. Hadley, the departing finance chief. The technology and market-research company said that the effect of the grant was "not financially material."

A woman at Mr. Hadley's home last night said he couldn't comment.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Md. High Court Orders Executions Halted (BSUN)

By Jennifer Mcmenamin

The Baltimore Sun, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107843

In a narrowly tailored decision with potentially sweeping consequences, Maryland's highest court ordered a halt Tuesday to executions in the state, ruling that procedures for putting prisoners to death were never submitted for the public review required by law.

Under the Court of Appeals ruling, state prison officials face the prospect of having to submit the execution protocols to the scrutiny of a joint legislative committee and schedule a public hearing on the issue. Alternatively, the court ruled, the legislature could exempt the execution procedures from that review process -- something that one state senator characterized as "very unlikely."

"One way or another, the legislature is going to need to look at the issue again," said Carl W. Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond whose specialty includes federal administrative procedure law, and who has followed the debate surrounding lethal injection procedures in states across the country.

"They're going to want to have hearings, and that could potentially open up the whole death penalty issue for debate," he said. "Then, I guess, most anything could be fair game."

Executions were halted in Florida and California this week amid concerns that lethal injection, as carried out, violates the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Although that argument was not a part of the appeals decided Tuesday by the Maryland court in the case of death row inmate Vernon L. Evans Jr., the convicted killer has raised the issue in a federal lawsuit pending in U.S. District Court in Baltimore.

In the opinion handed down Tuesday, the judges of the state appeals court rejected three of the convicted killer's four challenges -- including one raising questions about racial disparities in the application of the death penalty -- and declined to grant him either the new trial or the new sentencing hearing that he had requested. Rather, the court dealt exclusively with the mechanics of how Maryland's execution procedures were drafted.

Those procedures -- still deemed confidential but filed as court exhibits in litigation brought in recent years on behalf of death row inmates -- were not written or implemented with the required layers of legislative oversight and public scrutiny, so they are "ineffective and may not be used until such time as they are properly adopted," the court unanimously wrote.

Some death penalty opponents, legal experts and capital defense attorneys said the court's decision has paved the way for a debate on the state's method of putting convicted killers to death.

"The Court of Appeals' decision falls in line completely with how lethal injection has just ripped across the nation as an issue that really has turned out to be much more substantive than people initially thought," said Michael Stark, an organizer with the Campaign to End the Death Penalty.

"What the court appears to be mandating is that the process of putting a person to death -- the gruesome techniques of putting a person to death -- is going to be up to public debate and scrutiny. When really tasked with the details of laying out what is the most efficient way of killing someone, no one is going to be able to stomach that," he said.

A. Stephen Hut Jr., an attorney representing Evans, said the ruling has "significant implications, particularly in light of the events related to lethal injection over the last several days."

"This will allow some of that information and some of the science and expert input to inform the process and the policymakers' decision about what kind of execution procedure Maryland wants to have," he said.

Some activists seized on the ruling as an opportunity to push for Maryland to join the 13 states that do not have capital punishment.

"Don't bother to try to fix this. Maryland can avoid this whole mess by repealing the death penalty," said Jane Henderson, executive director of Maryland Citizens Against State Executions.

"This is a great moment for [Gov.-elect Martin] O'Malley to step up and take some leadership," she said. "If you've got a governor who doesn't like the death penalty and a public that is vastly in favor of instituting life without parole in place of the death penalty, why would you go through the trouble of rewriting execution protocol that may never get used?"

O'Malley, who said Tuesday that he had not yet read the court's decision, personally opposes capital punishment.

"I'd like to see us evolve to the point in time where we understand the death penalty does not deter violent crime ... and the resources we put toward it could better be invested elsewhere," the governor-elect said. He added, however, that his personal views would not prevent him from signing a death warrant.

"I'll take an oath to uphold the laws of the state of Maryland," O'Malley said. "That doesn't mean those laws can't be made better and more effective."

Sen. Brian E. Frosh, a Montgomery County Democrat who heads the judiciary committee, said Tuesday that he agreed with the appeals court's finding that the legislature never intended to give the Division of Correction free rein in implementing lethal injection procedures. He also said that he expects the "usual panoply" of death penalty-related bills, both to expand and eliminate the practice, to be introduced at the coming legislative session.

DOJ_NMG_0107844

He said that while the General Assembly would "get a turn at bat" on the matter raised by the Court of Appeals, the executive branch would have to resolve the issue.

Evans, 57, was sentenced to death for the 1983 contract killings of David Scott Piechowicz and his wife's sister, Susan Kennedy, at the Pikesville motel where they worked. Piechowicz and his wife, Cheryl, had been scheduled to testify in federal court against a Baltimore drug lord.

The ruling in his case extends what has effectively been a ban on Maryland's use of its death chamber since the court postponed his execution in February and agreed to hear four appeals.

Lawyers for Evans were unsuccessful in their arguments that he should be granted a hearing to explore whether he was unfairly sentenced because of the death penalty policy of Baltimore County's top prosecutor and because of statewide racial and geographic disparities in the use of capital punishment. They also failed to persuade the judges that lawyers who represented Evans at his 1992 sentencing hearing did not meet the minimum standards for effective assistance of counsel.

In ruling in Evans' favor on the need for oversight of the execution protocols, the court rejected the state's arguments that the detailed checklist of tasks in Maryland's Execution Operations Manual is not subject to review because the procedures concern "only the internal management" of the Division of Correction and do not "directly affect the rights of the public."

Judge Alan M. Wilner, who authored the court's 102-page majority opinion, wrote: "We are unwilling to assume that the legislature intended to leave to DOC, on its own and without any oversight, unbridled authority to determine and then change at will, as a matter of internal management, how that statute is to be implemented."

Karen V. Poe, a spokeswoman for the state's Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, said the agency's lawyers will review the decision and advise the secretary on what to do.

Highest Court In Maryland Suspends Executions (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

Maryland's highest court yesterday halted executions in the state, ruling that the state's protocol for lethal injections had been adopted improperly.

The ruling follows similar developments in two other states on Friday. Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida suspended executions there after a troubled execution that lasted 34 minutes and required a second dose of lethal chemicals, while a federal judge in California ruled that the state's lethal injection protocol violated the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

The Maryland decision, from its Court of Appeals, accepted a technical argument from lawyers for a condemned inmate, Vernon Evans Jr. Mr. Evans murdered two people in 1983 for $9,000.

The court ruled that the state agencies in charge of executions had adopted a "lethal injection checklist" without following the required administrative procedures. New regulations must be published in the Maryland Register, submitted to a legislative committee and discussed at a public hearing.

The state argued that the checklist was a management tool rather than a regulation. Judge Alan M. Wilner, writing for the court, disagreed, noting that the checklist "prescribes in considerable detail the actual contents of the lethal concoction and the method of injecting it."

Judge Wilner wrote that the court was unwilling to assume, particularly in light of controversies surrounding the death penalty and its carrying out, that the legislature had meant to give the Corrections Department "unbridled authority to determine and change at will" how executions are carried out.

"Those kinds of decisions do not constitute routine internal management," Judge Wilner wrote. "They affect not only the inmates and the correctional personnel, but the witnesses allowed to observe the execution and the public generally, through its perception of the process."

While Judge Wilner noted in passing that the combination of three chemicals used in lethal injections in Maryland and 36 other states had been the subject of several court challenges and that "some believe it is not as humane as it was purported to be," the decision did not address those arguments.

A separate challenge pending in federal court in Baltimore, similar to the California case, takes direct issue with the chemicals used and the personnel who administer them.

Court Halts Executions, Eyes Review Of Protocols (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, December 20, 2006

Maryland's highest court yesterday rejected condemned murderer Vernon Evans' appeal for a new trial but ruled that the state must revisit protocols for lethal injections before carrying out another execution.

DOJ_NMG_0107845

The Maryland Court of Appeals directed the state to rewrite the protocols in accordance with state law or have the legislature grant an exemption for the protocols.

The ruling did not impugn the state's lethal-injection procedure, but faulted the way the state established the procedures.

Nevertheless, the decision set the stage for a debate about capital punishment and lethal injection in the upcoming General Assembly session.

The ruling prompted Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley to pledge his willingness to sign death warrants despite his personal opposition to capital punishment.

"I take an oath to uphold the law," said Mr. O'Malley, a Democrat serving his second term as Baltimore's mayor. "That doesn't mean those laws can't be made better and more effective."

The Maryland decision comes four days after executions were halted in California and Florida over concerns that lethal injections might constitute cruel and unusual punishment.

Evans is pursuing that claim in a federal lawsuit.

Mr. O'Malley said he supported an end to capital punishment in Maryland, saying it was an ineffective crime-fighting strategy and a waste of money.

"I would like to see us evolve to a point in time where we understand that the death penalty does not reduce violent crime and it is not a deterrent to violent crime," Mr. O'Malley told reporters at a press conference in Baltimore, where he announced that his transportation secretary will be John D. Porcari, who had the same post under former Gov. Parris N. Glendening.

"The dollars that we invest in [capital punishment] would be better spent in other places," Mr. O'Malley said. "I am very much in favor of life without parole for people who shoot, maim and kill other people. ... I'm not an advocate for the death penalty. I don't think it works."

At issue in yesterday's ruling is the state's execution operations manual, which determines the drugs that will be used and how they will be injected. The court found that the manual was never submitted to a joint legislative committee or given a public hearing before it was adopted by the Department of Corrections, as required under the state's Administrative Procedure Act.

The Court of Appeals reversed a ruling that denied a temporary restraining order in the case and remanded the case back to the Baltimore Circuit Court

While Evans is not entitled to a new sentencing proceeding or to a new trial under the ruling, his attorney, A. Stephen Hut Jr., called the ruling "an important win" that comes at a time when lethal injection is coming under closer scrutiny in other states.

Karen V. Poe, a spokeswoman for the Maryland Department of Public Safety and Correctional Services, said attorneys for the state will review the opinion and advise the department head on the next course of action.

Maryland uses three drugs during executions. Sodium pentothal renders the inmate unconscious; pancurium bromide paralyzes the inmate's breathing; and potassium chloride stops the heart.

Evans was sentenced to die for the 1983 contract murders of Scott Piechowicz, 27, and his sister-in-law, Susan Kennedy, 19.

The victims were killed with a high-powered Ingram MAC-10 submachine gun while working at a motel in Pikesville. Evans mistakenly killed Miss Kennedy in place of her sister Cheryl -- Mr. Piechowicz's wife. Miss Kennedy was filling in for Mrs. Piechowicz that night.

The Piechowiczes had been scheduled to testify against Anthony Grandison in a federal drug case. Prosecutors said Evans took $9,000 from Grandison, who was in prison, to carry out the killings

Both men eventually were convicted in federal court of witness tampering and civil rights violations. They also were found guilty of murder and sentenced to death in trials prosecuted by Baltimore County.

Maryland High Court Calls Halt To Executions (WP)

By Eric Rich And John Wagner

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Maryland's highest court ruled yesterday that the state's procedure for carrying out executions was adopted improperly, a defect that the court said must be addressed before any more condemned inmates are put to death.

The unanimous ruling by the Court of Appeals moved the debate squarely into the political realm, where Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) or his Democratic successor, Martin O'Malley, must act if executions are to resume.

Last night, O'Malley, who takes office Jan. 17, called on Ehrlich to leave the issue for the incoming administration. "I'm sure all of this will spark a renewed debate as to whether all of the money we spend prosecuting death penalty cases might be better spent fighting violent crime and saving lives," O'Malley said.

An Ehrlich aide said the administration was reviewing the matter and had not decided how to proceed.

DOJ_NMG_0107846

Because of the effort required to correct the defect identified by the court, many death penalty opponents said they expect that O'Malley would ultimately chart the state's course.

O'Malley has taken a nuanced position on the issue, saying that he is personally opposed to the death penalty but that his opposition would not prevent him from signing a death warrant. "I'm very much in favor of life without parole for people that shoot, maim and kill others time and time again," he said yesterday.

Cindy Boersma, legislative director for the American Civil Liberties Union in Maryland, one of several plaintiffs in the case, said of the situation: "This is a perfect opportunity for the O'Malley administration to conclude that it's not possible to have capital punishment in Maryland consistent with standards of human dignity."

In ordering that the execution of Vernon L. Evans be postponed indefinitely, the Court of Appeals did not find that the three-drug cocktail that Maryland uses in lethal injections is unconstitutionally cruel.

Rather, the court held that the process was developed by state prison authorities without legislative oversight and thus was not adopted, as regulations are supposed to be, in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act.

The court offered two paths to remedy the defect. The procedure could be adopted properly, a step that would require action by the secretary of public safety, a gubernatorial appointee, and a legislative panel; or the legislature could exempt the execution protocol from the requirements of the act.

A. Stephen Hut Jr., the attorney who argued the case in May on Evans's behalf, said yesterday that mounting scrutiny over the pain lethal injection may cause should have a sobering effect on either process.

"I think all of the botched processes in other states become highly relevant," he said.

Gov. Jeb Bush (R) suspended the death penalty in Florida on Friday after a botched execution took 34 minutes and a second injection to kill convicted murderer Angel Nieves Diaz. In the Northern District of California, Judge Jeremy D. Fogel ruled on the same day that the state must overhaul its lethal injection procedures, calling the current protocol unconstitutional because of the pain it might inflict.

Hut has brought a challenge similar to the one in California in U.S. District Court in Baltimore, arguing that the state's method of execution risks causing excruciating but undetectable pain and would not be permitted under state law even "to euthanize household pets or barnyard animals." Judge Benson E. Legg has not ruled in that case.

Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) reiterated yesterday that he remains personally opposed to the death penalty, but he said he will not push for a review of lethal injection because state courts have upheld the practice.

Evans, of Baltimore, was convicted of the 1983 murders of David S. Piechowicz, 27, and Piechowicz's sister-in-law, Susan Kennedy, 19, at a hotel that Piechowicz managed in Pikesville. He is one of six inmates on death row in Maryland.

Wesley E. Baker died by lethal injection in December 2005 in the first execution in the state since June 2004 and the fifth in Maryland since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976.

Although yesterday's ruling had the effect of halting executions on technical grounds, a majority of the court rejected arguments that have been widely embraced by opponents of execution, including that the death penalty as applied in Maryland is unconstitutional because of racial bias.

To bring the execution process into compliance with the administrative procedure law would require a review by a joint committee of 20 legislators, who could significantly slow or even block implementation, depending upon on how the rules are presented by the administration.

If designated as "emergency" regulations by the administration, the rules would need the approval of the panel -- the Joint Committee on Administrative, Executive and Legislative Review -- and any one of the 20 members could call for a public hearing, the date of which would be set by the House and Senate chairmen. One of those is Sen. Paul G. Pinsky (D-Prince George's), a death penalty opponent.

"I'm not going to be in a hurry to push the plunger or let anyone else push the plunger," Pinsky said yesterday.

If the regulations are put forward without an "emergency" designation, they would be subject to a public comment period and could take several months to implement, Pinsky said. Ultimately, though, if there is no emergency designation, the administration could ignore the will of the legislative panel.

To exempt the execution protocol from the administrative procedures law -- the second course suggested by the high court -- would require legislation, and it is hard to gauge the likely support for such a measure. In recent years, the General Assembly has considered contradictory bills on the death penalty, and consensus has been in short supply.

Dead Wrong (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 20, 2006

It's killing that's cruel and unusual

DOJ_NMG_0107847

IN ORDERING CHANGES in the way lethal injections are administered to condemned prisoners in California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is doing the right thing for the wrong reason.

It's not only right but imperative that the state correct the flaws in the lethal-injection protocol that were dispassionately detailed by U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel in a "memorandum of intended decision" issued last week. Fogel's ruling followed a trial at which witnesses portrayed lethal injection in this state as a haphazard procedure in which some condemned inmates might have been conscious in their last moments of life.

But in promising to redress what Fogel had called a "pervasive lack of professionalism" in lethal injection, Schwarzenegger didn't emphasize — as the enlightened centrist chief executive he fancies himself should have — the need to spare even convicted murderers cruel and unusual punishment, by a moratorium on executions if necessary. No, Schwarzenegger indicated that he was seeking changes in what is blandly known as Operational Procedure No. 770 to keep judges from thwarting what the governor called "the will of the people [that] the death penalty is maintained in California." That death row inmates might be spared excruciating pain would be merely a byproduct of crossing the legal t's and dotting the i's.

That focus on propping up the death penalty is one problem with the governor's response to Fogel's decision. Another is that Schwarzenegger seems unwilling to entertain the possibility that what is really inappropriate about a civilized state's embrace of capital punishment — by lethal injection or any other means — is not the infliction of pain but the extinguishing of human life.

Contrary to Fogel's assertion in his opinion that the propriety of capital punishment is a matter for the Legislature, there was a time when judges took a broad view of whether the death penalty in its totality — and not just in a few botched executions — amounted to cruel and unusual punishment.

In 1972, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down state death penalty laws then on the books. In a much-quoted opinion, Justice Potter Stewart said that capital punishment was imposed "wantonly and freakishly," adding that "these death sentences are cruel and unusual in the same way that being struck by lightning is cruel and unusual." The same is true, we believe, of the selective, even capricious imposition of the death penalty at the present time, whether or not the chemical cocktail administered to a prisoner is mixed in a way that minimizes pain. Tinkering with the machinery of lethal injection is only the beginning.

Feds Probe 12 Police Shootings In DeKalb (AJC)

By Mae Gentry, Ty Tagami, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 20, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department and the FBI are looking into fatal police shootings this year in DeKalb County.

If civil rights violations are found, "appropriate action will be taken," Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim wrote in a Dec. 12 letter to local activist John Evans, who asked the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division to investigate the DeKalb shootings.

Since January, DeKalb officers have shot to death 12 suspects — more than any other police department in metro Atlanta. One officer has also been killed.

The shootings have drawn protests and demonstrations at county commission meetings and outside the police department.

Kim could not be reached for comment Tuesday. A spokeswoman for the U.S. Justice Department confirmed the federal inquiry into the DeKalb shootings, but would not give details.

Relatives of suspects killed in the police shootings welcomed the news that the federal government is looking into the cases.

"Wow, great," said Iffat Muhammad, after being told that the federal agencies were "gathering information" about the shootings, according to Wan's letter.

Muhammad's brother, Abraheem, was killed by a DeKalb police officer in August. Her brother was shot by an officer checking on a trespassing complaint. He attacked the officer and tried to get her gun, police said.

"We're hopeful," Iffat Muhammad said. "We're praying someone will come in and investigate it [the police shootings] thoroughly."

DeKalb Interim Police Chief Nick Marinelli last month asked District Attorney Gwen Keyes Fleming to review the police department's investigation of several of the 2006 shootings. Keyes Fleming said she will impanel a special grand jury to look into the cases.

Keyes Fleming said the federal inquiry will have no impact on the investigation by the county grand jury.

"The grand jury will review the internal policies of the department and the decisions made under those policies as it relates to these cases," she said. "It appears that the FBI is investigating a completely independent track, and we will continue what we've started.

DOJ_NMG_0107848

"The more agencies involved, the more confidence the citizens will have that their questions will be answered," she said.

Marinelli did not return a phone call seeking comment.

DeKalb Chief Executive Officer Vernon Jones, asked about the federal inquiry, said: "I have confidence in this police department and if an officer did something improper, that this police department made the proper recommendations to handle that individual officer."

Jones said if an officer did act improperly, it's up to the district attorney to prosecute.

But Evans said he had no confidence in an investigation by local authorities. "Out here in this county, we have too much nepotism, too much favoritism, too many people know each other," he said. "There's so many examples of that."

Evans has asked the county commission to adopt a resolution calling for a federal grand jury investigation.

County Commissioner Burrell Ellis said it may be "premature" to do so, given the advice he has received from the county law department. The department told him two things, he said: A federal grand jury only investigates criminal matters, and the only agency with standing to request a federal grand jury investigation is the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"I'm not aware of any criminal allegations that were raised," Ellis said. Jones has pleaded with residents to "put your weapon down" in confrontations with cops. Nine of the 12 slain suspects had guns, and one shot a police officer to death.

Gerald Rose, founder of a group called New Order National Human Rights Organization, who organized a protest outside DeKalb police headquarters last month, called the new development "baby steps toward justice."

"We hope the FBI and other investigators really get to the bottom of this," he said.

Chandra Harden, whose 19-year-old son was killed in August, said she was happy to learn the federal government was getting involved.

Harden's son, Deon Studiemyer, was fatally shot by an off-duty officer who said Studiemyer was breaking into his home.

"The D.A. was already looking into it, but we weren't getting half the information we were asking for," Harden said. "I think it's necessary that they go ahead and tell us something so we can go ahead and get some type of peace in our lives."

Staff writer Mary MacDonald contributed to this article.

U.S. Attorney For State Leaving For Private Practice (AZREP)

By Dennis Wagner

The Arizona Republic, December 20, 2006

U.S. Attorney Paul Charlton announced Tuesday that that he is quitting his government post to enter private legal practice early next year.

Charlton said he will become a partner in the Phoenix-based firm of Gallagher and Kennedy at the end of January.

During his stint as the state's top federal lawyer, Charlton oversaw major enforcement initiatives against terrorism, public corruption, illegal immigration and crime in Indian country.

advertisement

"I am immensely proud of what the men and women of this office have accomplished over the past five years," Charlton said. "I'm excited to open a new chapter in my career, and to face the very new and different challenges of private practice."

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is expected to appoint an interim U.S. attorney, who will serve until a permanent replacement is nominated by the president and confirmed by the U.S. Senate.

Charlton was appointed U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona on Nov. 12, 2001, by President Bush. He said he is proud of post-9/11 efforts to protect the homeland, including the creation of a statewide Anti-Terrorism Task Force to secure nuclear plants, railroads and other key public facilities.

The nation's 93 U.S. Attorneys work with federal enforcement agencies to oversee criminal investigations and prosecutions. They also represent the federal government in civil litigation. The U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona has more than 250 employees.

In a news release, U.S. Sen. Jon Kyl praised Charlton as "an extraordinary public servant during a time of grave challenge to our national security. We will miss his strong and principled leadership."

John E. Lewis, the FBI's special agent in charge for Arizona, credited Charlton with being "proactive concerning the bureau's number one priority, protecting the United States from terrorist attacks."

Charlton also launched a campaign against drug abuse on Native American reservations, inviting the state's 21 tribes to join in an Arizona Indian Country Methamphetamine Eradication Initiative. He spearheaded efforts to root out corruption, especially among government officials along the Mexican border. And he oversaw a crackdown on criminal aliens.

"We really are making a difference on the border, and that's encouraging," Charlton said.

During Charlton's tenure, the U.S. Attorney's Office established permanent offices in Flagstaff and Yuma, added 16 new prosecutors and increased criminal filings by more than 25 percent.

Charlton, 46, earned his law degree in 1988 at the University of Arizona. After serving a clerkship at the state Court of Appeals, he worked at the Arizona Attorney General's Office for two years before becoming a federal prosecutor.

Charlton will join his wife, Susan, who also is an attorney at Gallagher and Kennedy. He said he expects to specialize in corporate compliance and white-collar defense.

"I've worked as a public servant for a long time, and I've enjoyed it," he said. "Now, it's time to move on."

Reach the reporter at dennis.wagner@arizonarepublic.com or (602) 444-8874

U.S. Attorney Ousted (KRQE)

By Michael Herzenberg

KRQE-TV CBS 13, December 19, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE -- The top federal prosecutor in New Mexico, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias, has been asked to resign and will be giving up the office, KRQE News 13 has learned.

Sources confirmed the Department of Justice called Iglesias last week and asked him to resign.

He has held the position since 2001 after being appointed by President Bush.

During his five years, Iglesias oversaw high-profile cases including the successful prosecution of the Cisneros drug ring with murder charges resulting in guilty pleas and life sentences.

Five of six defendants in what was known as the China Wok case also took plea deals in 2005 admitting they smuggled illegal Chinese immigrants into the state.

Other cases didn't turn out the way Iglesias would have hoped

David Hudak, accused in 2002 for weapons and explosives violations and for illegal military, was acquitted of all charges in his 2003 trial. He had been charged with nine counts stemming from his use of explosives and training in counterterrorism techniques.

Most recently public corruption trial of former State Treasurer Robert Vigil ended with both sides claiming victory.

A hung jury ended the first trial with the retrial producing a single conviction for extortion. The jury acquitted Vigil of 23 other felony counts.

A sentencing of 12 months to 20 years awaits him in January.

A statement released Monday night by the U.S. Attorney's office spokesman Norm Cairns confirmed Iglesias's departure.

"He will leave in the next few months, has had discussions with Washington and based on those discussions he has decided to move on to other things."

Why Iglesias was asked to resign remains unknown although source said was probably just time for a change.

The Justice Department is already looking for a replacement.

Local Federal Attorney Plans To Step Down; Iglesias Investigated State Corruption (ALBTRIB)

Albuquerque Tribune, December 20, 2006

U.S. Attorney David Iglesias will resign his post in the next few months, an office spokesman said today.

After discussions with officials in Washington, D.C., Iglesias decided he would move on, U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman Norm Cairns said. No other information was released.

The U.S. Attorney's Office has been involved in two high-profile investigations of public corruption in New Mexico this year with mixed results.

Former state Treasurer Robert Vigil was convicted of one count of extortion this fall but acquitted on 23 counts of racketeering and extortion. He will be sentenced later this month.

Vigil was tried on essentially the same charges earlier in the year. The trial ended in a hung jury, with one juror holding out against any guilty verdict.

Rumors have also swirled for months about an investigation into corruption involving major public construction projects in Bernalillo County including the state District Courthouse and Metro Courthouse.

An FBI spokesman confirmed in October that an investigation had been forwarded to Iglesias' office - although he declined to specify details. Since then indictments have regularly been expected and then delayed.

Details that have emerged about the investigation suggest it centers on kickbacks paid for work on the two courthouses. It arose from testimony in a lawsuit between partners in an engineering firm. One partner suggested that improper payments were made to former state Sen. Manny Aragon, a consultant for the company.

Iglesias, 48, was appointed to his post as the state's top federal law enforcement officer in 2001 by President George W. Bush. He was the first Hispanic to serve as U.S. attorney since the Nixon administration.

He lost the general election for state attorney general in 1998 to Patricia Madrid.

His other legal experience includes assistant state attorney general, office of special prosecutions, 1988-91; assistant city attorney for Albuquerque, civil rights division, 1991-94; White House fellow, 1994-95; chief counsel for the state Risk Management Division, 1988-91.

From 1985-88, he was lieutenant in the Navy Judge Advocate General's Corps. A hazing case in Cuba that he worked on was turned into the movie "A Few Good Men."

CIVIL LAW:

In A Crisis, Do-not-revive Requests Don't Always Work (USAT)

By Laura Parker, Usa Today

USA Today, December 20, 2006

Family sues after Florida woman put on life support

After watching her husband and two daughters die painfully from cancer, Madeline Neumann decided she did not want to prolong her own death. When she moved into a nursing home in Florida at age 89, she signed an advance directive that instructed doctors not to revive her if she collapsed.

Despite those written instructions, emergency medics were summoned one evening in 1995 when aides found her unresponsive.

Neumann, who suffered from Alzheimer's disease, ended up in a hospital, tethered to wires, tubes and life-support machines — just the situation her family says she had hoped to avoid.

Neumann's three granddaughters persuaded doctors to disconnect the machines over the next several days. A week after she was admitted, Neumann died. Those seven days were degrading and painful to Neumann, according to her granddaughters, who say Neumann's directive should have protected her from such an experience.

The granddaughters are suing the Joseph L. Morse Geriatric Center in West Palm Beach and its chief doctor, Jaimy Bensimon, for unspecified damages, claiming they essentially ignored Neumann's wishes.

"We watched my grandmother suffer and linger for one week," says Linda Scheible, 47, the oldest granddaughter. "This is never what she wanted or what the family wanted. We had taken every measure possible.

"If this can happen to a family that was so involved, I believe this is happening in a much more widespread way."

The suit, filed in 1997, is drawing attention nationwide and is likely to be tried early next year, after nearly a decade of legal wrangling.

It appears to be the first time a Florida court has been asked to decide whether a doctor can be held liable for providing treatment at odds with a medical directive. The case could have significant implications for efforts to hold hospitals, nursing homes and physicians accountable if they disregard living wills and advance directives.

The trial's venue also is symbolic. Living wills and medical directives are an increasingly hot topic in a nation where the U.S. Census Bureau projects the number of people over age 65 will double during the next 25 years, to 72 million. Florida has a higher percentage of residents over 65 than any other state — 17.6% of the state's 18.2 million people.

The Neumann case will be heard in West Palm Beach, about 200 miles east of Pinellas Park, where the bruising right-to-die court battle was waged last year over Terri Schiavo, the severely brain-damaged woman whose family members fought over whether to remove the feeding tube that kept her alive.

Schiavo, who was 26 when she collapsed, had left no living will or written instructions about her care in the event she became incapacitated.

The Schiavo case ended when her husband defeated her parents' efforts to keep the feeding tube in place. It prompted new interest in living wills and medical directives, including federal legislation that encouraged people to draft them, says Kathy Cerminara, a professor at Nova Southeastern University law school in Fort Lauderdale.

Even so, most adult Americans have not drafted such documents.

Only a few lawsuits stemming from medical treatment that was against a patient's wishes have advanced in the courts, which generally have viewed efforts to sustain life as not being harmful to a patient.

Attorneys who file such claims have used a variety of legal tactics. The attorneys for Neumann's family allege in court papers that by resuscitating her, doctors subjected Neumann to a form of battery, or beating.

The attorneys also are alleging breach of contract and negligence.

Doctors facing such lawsuits have emphasized the need to assess a patient's condition in an emergency and determine whether it is truly life-threatening, instead of simply withholding treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0107851

Bensimon, the doctor targeted in the suit filed by Neumann's family, had read Neumann's directive, says his attorney, James Nosich.

The attorney says Bensimon sent Neumann to the hospital because Bensimon was away from the nursing home when she collapsed. Rather than not treat her, the doctor wanted to have her condition evaluated that night, Nosich says.

After life support was withdrawn, "Neumann died peacefully," Nosich says, "with her granddaughters at her side."

Lois Shepherd, a law professor at Florida State University who specializes in health care law and end-of-life issues, says such disputes represent "one of the next frontiers in health care litigation."

"We've been lulled into this sense of security that all you need to do is have an advance directive," Shepherd says. "But it's not as simple as that. They're clumsy documents, and vague. They can't predict all conditions."

An advance directive, such as a living will, informs doctors about what kind of treatment to administer when a patient is unable to make those decisions personally.

As Shepherd says, advance directives cannot anticipate every scenario. Most conflicts over them stem from emergencies, when decisions are made rapidly and patients and family members sometimes change their minds about what should be done, despite the patient's prior instructions.

Robert Arnold, a medical ethicist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center who specializes in end-of-life issues, says merely drafting a medical directive sometimes isn't enough to ensure that a patient's desires regarding treatment will be carried out. And, he says, sometimes they shouldn't be.

"It's important to talk to your doctor beforehand. These kinds of conversations are hard to have in the middle of the night" during an emergency, he says. "It may be that I'm not sure why you've filled out the advance directive. If you're a healthy 75-year-old and all of a sudden you have chest pains, I'm going to send you to the ER," regardless of what the directive says.

"I don't expect when you filled out your living will that what you meant was you were unwilling to be on machines," Arnold says. "That's why it's so important not just to have the (paperwork) filled out. It's about what your goals are."

The most notable court case involving an advance directive was in 1996, when a jury awarded $16.5 million to the family of a 38-year-old Michigan woman who had been kept on life support for more than four years after a seizure incapacitated her, despite her written instructions directing doctors to let her die in such a situation.

The award was reduced on appeal to $1.4 million, although the judge upheld the finding that the patient had been battered medically. The family and the hospital agreed to void the medical battery finding when they settled the case in 1997 for an undisclosed amount.

Scheible says pursuing her grandmother's case has become a crusade.

"How could this have happened? All the paperwork was completed. Her wishes were verbalized. This is a violation of her wishes that could not be ignored," she says.

Scheible's grandmother moved into the Morse Center in 1992 with a diagnosis of progressive dementia.

She was mentally competent and requested a living will declaration form, provided by the nursing home. It instructed doctors not to resuscitate her, feed her with tubes, perform surgery or assist her breathing with a ventilator if she became unable to participate in decisions regarding her care.

Neumann did request treatment with antibiotics. Apart from the advance directive, she also received medication for seizures.

Neumann also authorized Scheible, a nurse and licensed psychotherapist, to make medical decisions on Neumann's behalf.

Scheible says she attended quarterly meetings at the nursing home to plan Neumann's care and that she made sure the advance directive, color-coded in pink, was included in her grandmother's medical file.

However, doctors did not place a Do Not Resuscitate order (DNR) in her file — a fact that would become important when the medics were called.

A DNR order, written by a doctor, tells health care professionals not to attempt emergency CPR if a patient stops breathing. In the absence of such an order, Florida law requires emergency medics to do CPR.

By 1995, Neumann, then 92, was firmly in the grip of Alzheimer's disease, Scheible says. Neumann lost more than 25 pounds in three months, and her granddaughters thought it was obvious that she was in her final decline.

The night of the emergency, Neumann was "in the process of slowly, peacefully passing away," says Jack Scarola, Scheible's attorney.

Scheible says she was stunned when she learned medics had inserted a tube into her grandmother's airway to resuscitate her and taken her to the hospital.

Neumann says her grandmother was in pain and was bruised, and her arms had to be tied with restraints because she tried to pull tubes out of her neck.

DOJ_NMG_0107852

Scarola says he intends to show at trial that the Morse Center staff knew of the advance directive but had not read it, and so had not adequately prepared a medical plan for the end of Neumann's life.

He says the center never informed the family that a DNR order was needed.

"The absence of the document in the chart is very significant," he says. "But the case involves broader principles. This was a situation where they had three years of responsibility for this patient, during which the end-of-life issues were ignored."

He says the Florida Supreme Court has upheld a patient's right to determine his or her health care, without the need for any diagnosis.

The Morse Center did not respond to requests for comment. In court papers, it has said the claim by Neumann's family is not valid under Florida law and has sought to have the case dismissed.

Nosich, the attorney for Bensimon, says the doctor had read the directive but was 40 minutes away from the nursing home the night Neumann collapsed and therefore summoned medics to assess Neumann's condition.

"At the end of the day, when the (emergency) phone call comes in, do you want your doctor, before letting you die, to have you evaluated?" Nosich asks. "Or do you let a non-medical professional give your doctor the information and have him rely on that?"

He adds that Neumann's request to be treated with antibiotics is important to the defense.

"Under her own wishes, (Neumann) said she wanted antibiotics if they can prolong her life. Which means, at a minimum, Dr. Bensimon has to examine her to see if they are appropriate," Nosich says.

He believes Neumann's family would have questioned the doctor's judgment if he had let Neumann die.

"What if (she) dies, and it turned out she had another seizure" similar to those she had in the past? Nosich asks. "What do you think the family would have done then?

"If you call 911, you get sued," he says. "If you don't call, you get sued."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

The Secret's Out, But Why Was It Ever Under Wraps? (USAT)

USA Today, December 20, 2006

ACLU case uncovers folly of government classifying too much.

Every minute, the U.S. government makes 27 decisions to classify documents. That translates into 1,620 classification decisions every hour, 38,880 every day and 14 million every year.

Some of these decisions, of course, protect sensitive state secrets. But it's preposterous to believe that more than a tiny percentage of classifications are justified by national security concerns. They are more probably the result of the bureaucratic impulse to keep secrets and the political instinct to avoid accountability.

So when one of these innocuous pieces of paper leaks out, as they inevitably do when classification is used so promiscuously, it exposes the folly of the exercise. More so when the government uses its power in an attempt to intimidate anyone who seeks to make the information public.

One such case has unfolded over the past few weeks with embarrassing results.

The American Civil Liberties Union obtained a document so sensitive that the Justice Department, in a burst of indignation, took the extraordinary step of seeking a grand jury subpoena to demand its return.

And what was this hypersensitive material? It turns out the document laid out the conditions under which prisoners of war in Iraq could be photographed. It had no national security ramifications. It wasn't even particularly revealing, as the ACLU had suggested when it was still under wraps.

This week, the Justice Department, apparently sensing a legal defeat and public relations problem, prudently backed down and declassified the document.

Though it might be tempting to shrug off the incident now that the subpoena has been withdrawn, that would miss the larger point. The case illustrates how mindless government's secrecy efforts can be. Sometimes, it seems as if secrecy is less a policy than the output of inertial forces. Once leaders decide to make government more closed, the wheels of the bureaucracy creak into motion — classifying more documents, declassifying fewer and, as this case shows, sometimes careening out of control as the result of its own momentum.

That is what has happened as President Bush's administration has embraced secrecy, reversing a Clinton-era declassification program and even seeking to reclassify documents that have been public for years. The ACLU case exposes the excesses.

DOJ_NMG_0107853

Obviously, this document never should have been classified. It might well have been handed out to military personnel and journalists in Iraq to let them know the ground rules, some of them adapted from the Geneva Conventions.

Using a subpoena to recover it was little more than an artful ruse to achieve prior restraint, a practice involving government trying to quash information before it is made public. Because prior restraint is the ultimate in suppression of free speech, it is presumed to be unconstitutional under all but the most extraordinary circumstances, as the Supreme Court made clear in a 1971 ruling on another leaked document in the landmark Pentagon Papers case.

The government should have known this was no way to plug leaks. And it should have realized that the ACLU document wasn't worth making a federal case over. But exercising sound judgment is hard when government is unable to stop itself from declaring virtually anything a secret.

Both Sides At Fault (USAT)

By Douglas W. Kmiec

USA Today, December 20, 2006

The dust-up over the Justice Department subpoena is over. This was no major victory for civil liberty. It turns out the subpoena sent to the ACLU might have been issued only because the organization's lawyers were looking for a fight. Bad form, even worse constitutional theory.

Press freedom cannot be understated in a democratic republic. But it should not be overstated either. The ACLU claimed that the 3½-page document contained no classified information. That well could be — Justice has now declassified it, and it is merely military guidance limiting photography of detainees to comply with the Geneva Conventions.

But no one elected the ACLU to make declassification decisions. What documents must be classified for national defense is governed by law and regulation. Though this soap opera lends credence to the complaint that too much is kept secret, the remedy is not to take the law into one's own hands.

There is a lesson for Justice, too. Though grand jury subpoenas are hardly novel, somebody should think twice before issuing one that might unnecessarily limit free speech. Judge Jed Rakoff was sensitive to this, referencing the Pentagon Papers case.

The two cases are different, but only subtly so. The present matter concerns the responsibility of a private citizen in possession of stolen government property. By contrast, the Pentagon Papers was an unsuccessful effort to stop newspaper publication. Properly, such press prior restraint has a heavy presumption against its constitutional validity.

Returning classified materials, however, is exactly called for in law: "Whoever, lawfully or unlawfully, having possession of (classified information) and fails to deliver it on demand to the officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive it" is in violation.

The late Chief Justice Warren Burger put it well: "It is hardly believable that an (entity) long regarded as a great institution in American life would fail to perform one of the basic and simple duties of every citizen with respect to the discovery or possession of stolen property or secret government documents."

"That duty," wrote Burger, "rests on taxi drivers, Justices, and The New York Times." It would befit the ACLU, too.

Douglas W. Kmiec, a law professor at Pepperdine University, was constitutional legal counsel to Presidents Reagan and George H. W. Bush. (The Justice Department declined to provide an opposing view before a court hearing scheduled for today in the case.)

Legal Fight Against Racial Ban Intensifies (Det News)

By Marisa Schultz

Detroit News, December 20, 2006

Prop 2 backers outraged as judge lets colleges continue to use race for fall admissions.

DETROIT -- The ACLU and NAACP filed suit Tuesday against Proposal 2, the latest salvo in a growing assault just four days before Michigan's ban on affirmative action was to take effect.

The challenge was filed on the same day a federal judge agreed to give three Michigan universities a six-month delay before they stop using race as a consideration in admissions and financial aid.

The court maneuvers fed a growing concern by affirmative action opponents who fear that the will of the voters, who on Nov. 7 passed the prohibition against using race, is not being respected. Both candidates for governor, and business and other leaders campaigned against the proposal.

"I'm disgusted with the whole shebang," said Dick Megregian, a retired senior automotive engineer and MSU alumnus. "My vote and the vote of 58 percent of the people is undermined by the politicians and judges because they are dragging their feet and don't want to implement it."

DOJ_NMG_0107854

Tuesday was the busiest court day yet for Proposal 2:

U.S. District Judge David Lawson granted a request from the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and Wayne State University to delay the implementation of Proposal 2 for those schools from Dec. 23 to July 1. Supported by Attorney General Mike Cox and Gov. Jennifer Granholm, the schools claimed that changing admissions and financial-aid rules midway through the admissions cycle would be unfair to students who start in fall 2007.

The city of Lansing also filed a motion before Lawson asking for permission to delay implementing Proposal 2 until July 1, the beginning of its fiscal year. The city doesn't have enough time to make necessary changes, officials said.

The ACLU of Michigan, NAACP and others filed a lawsuit on behalf of 19 students, faculty and applicants to U-M asking a judge to allow race and gender preferences to continue in university admissions. Proposal 2 shouldn't undue the U.S. Supreme Court ruling that allows the use of race as a factor in admissions, they argued.

The Center for Individual Rights, which argued against the University of Michigan before the Supreme Court, asked for an emergency hearing on behalf of Eric Russell, a white applicant to U-M Law School. Lawson should have heard the argument of a student who will be impacted by delaying Proposal 2 before making his decision, they say.

At a Tuesday press conference in front of U.S. District Court in Detroit, leaders for ACLU of Michigan and the NAACP argued that without affirmative action in university admissions, minorities and women would face a double standard, since athletes, veterans and children of alumni would be allowed preferential treatment.

"We believe affirmative action is the law of the land," said the Rev. Wendell Anthony, president of the NAACP-Detroit Chapter. "We hope the court will hear our plea."

He points to the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in 2003 that upheld the use of race as a factor in admissions. Proposal 2 should not override that ruling, he said.

Terry Pell, president of the Center of Individual Rights, believes the ACLU's case will be a losing battle. The center sued the University of Michigan to limit the use of affirmative action in college admissions.

The Supreme Court allowed the use of race but does not mandate it, said Pell, who filed a motion in an effort to block the delay from taking place for universities.

Postponing the implementation of Proposal 2 for six months means Pell's client, Russell, will not be treated equally in U-M's admission process, both men claimed.

"It's about me and it's about all the applicants," said Russell, 29, of Auburn Hills. "The electorate passed Proposal 2 and the university ought to implement it. I'm not suing for admission, I'm suing for equal consideration."

Pell anticipates Lawson will rule on his motion as soon as today.

Still uncertain is whether more cities or other governmental units will follow Lansing's lead and ask for more time.

Michael McGee, a partner at Miller Canfield in Detroit, said he wouldn't be surprised if others file as well. Like universities, municipalities are dealing with a fundamental change in the way they do business, said McGee, whose law firm represents several cities.

"It's difficult to turn on the dime and it takes a reasonable transition period, particularly when a unit of government is in the middle of its fiscal year," said McGee, noting cities typically take action at the start of a fiscal year, setting the tone for the rest of year.

You can reach Marisa Schultz at (313) 222-2310 or mschultz@detnews.com.

Rights Groups File Prop 2 Lawsuit (FREEP)

By CHASTITY PRATT And DAWSON BELL

Detroit Free Press, December 20, 2006

On the same day the University of Michigan won a reprieve that will allow it to continue considering race in the fall admissions process, civil rights organizations filed a lawsuit Tuesday aiming to make the reprieve permanent.

At issue is Proposal 2, the anti-affirmative action amendment to Michigan's Constitution. The amendment takes effect Friday.

Civil rights organizations, including the NAACP's Detroit chapter and the American Civil Liberties Union, took their case to federal court. They argued the amendment doesn't apply because of a 2003 U.S. Supreme Court case affirming universities' right to consider race in admissions.

"We have come too far to allow the doors of opportunity to be shut in the face of the American promise of liberty and justice," Wendell Anthony, president of the Detroit branch of the NAACP, said Tuesday at a news conference on the steps of U.S. District Court in Detroit.

DOJ_NMG_0107855

But a Washington-based group that has fought against race and gender preferences said the U.S. Supreme Court already decided the issue when it chose not to hear a challenge to California's Proposition 209, which was passed by voters in 1996. The California law was the model for Proposal 2.

An appellate panel in that case found that "nobody has a right to a racial preference; a state can decide it doesn't want them," said Terence Pell of the Center for Individual Rights. The same group filed papers Tuesday to appeal Judge David Lawson's order affirming a deal among the state's three largest universities -- U-M, Michigan State University and Wayne State University-- and Attorney General Mike Cox. The deal grants the schools a delay until 2007-08 in putting Proposal 2's mandates in effect for admissions and financial aid.

Pell's organization is representing Eric Russell, a Wayne State University graduate student who is applying to U-M Law School.

Neither the parties to the suit nor the federal court has the authority "to second guess Michigan voters," Pell said.

The schools had argued that because they were in the middle of the application and admission process for fall 2007 and many students already have been accepted that it would have been unfair to subject different students in the same class to different admissions and financial aid criteria.

If Lawson's ruling stands, current high school juniors would be the first students impacted by the implementation of Proposal 2.

Cox spokesman Rusty Hills defended the agreement, which he said was narrowly tailored to allow the universities to complete processing applications for 2007-08 without challenging Proposal 2 directly.

State Rep. Leon Drolet, R-Clinton Township, one of the ballot proposal's chief backers, said he is "stunned that the universities couldn't find a way to comply with the will of the people." But giving up their underlying challenge could help, he said, if the universities "live up to their end of the bargain."

Butch Hollowell, an attorney speaking on behalf of the civil rights groups that filed Tuesday's lawsuit, said it focuses on the University of Michigan because of the school's excellent educational reputation and the 2003 case.

"Ultimately, this could get to the U.S. Supreme Court," Hollowell said.

In 2003, the Supreme Court found U-M's previous admissions system that awarded points to underrepresented minorities -- African Americans, Hispanics and American Indians -- was unconstitutional. But it ruled that race may be among factors considered in the admissions process.

Sheldon Johnson, 20, a U-M junior, echoed two U-M professors who said Tuesday that affirmative action in admissions not only helps diversify the students, but gives them exposure to people and perspectives that can help them navigate the world after they graduate.

"That's what this is really about, opportunity," he said.

The NAACP's Anthony said the challenge isn't meant to defy Michigan citizens who voted 58% to 42% in favor of Proposal 2, which bans race and gender-based preferences in university admissions and government hiring and contracting.

The case is meant to force an interpretation of the law, Anthony said.

He added that under the current admissions policy, U-M may consider whether an applicant is the child of an alum or from specific parts of the state, therefore race and gender should be retained, he said.

Contact CHASTITY PRATT at 313-223-4537

Short-Term Reprieve For Affirmative Action (INSHIGHED)

By Scott Jaschik

Inside Higher Ed, December 20, 2006

Three Michigan universities on Tuesday won the right to keep their current admissions and financial aid policies — the affirmative action portions of which could have been illegal in the state by the end of the week — until July 1. But long term, the ability of colleges to challenge the ban on affirmative action remained uncertain, with some advocates saying that the day's developments strengthened efforts to do so, and others saying just the opposite.

A federal judge granted the universities a reprieve from the Michigan Civil Rights Initiative, known as Proposal 2, which was to take effect this week and would bar affirmative action in admissions by public colleges and universities in the state. Michigan State and Wayne State Universities and the University of Michigan sought permission to delay Proposal 2, saying that it would be impractical and unfair for the institutions to change their processes in the middle of an admissions cycle, with some applicants already evaluated and others awaiting review.

In November, 58 percent of Michigan voters backed Proposal 2 — despite widespread opposition from higher education, business and political leaders. The impact has expected to be most dramatic at the University of Michigan — both because its admissions process is the most competitive in the state and because it is the institution that in 2003 successfully defended at the U.S. Supreme Court the right of colleges to consider race and ethnicity in admissions decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0107856

The day after the vote on Proposal 2, the University of Michigan signaled that it would probably challenge the measure in court, although it did not specify how it would do so, and similar challenges in other states had failed. But within a few weeks, the university — while saying it was continuing to consider legal options — changed its tone and started talking more about complying with Proposal 2. To date, the only legal challenge to the measure from the universities in the state was the request to delay the start of the ban on affirmative action.

University officials on Tuesday stressed that the court ruling affected only the immediate questions of this admissions cycle.

"What we sought was not a change on the Proposal 2 scoreboard, but merely a timeout," said Terry Denbow, vice president for university relations at Michigan State. "I am pleased that the request was deemed reasoned and reasonable. We need time to assess — within the boundaries of the law — programs to assure fairness to students and to others, like private donors and major corporations who have designated financial aid gifts. Our due diligence is directed at being one, true to the law, and, two, true to our values."

Whether the universities will seek to overturn Proposal 2 remains the big question. By Any Means Necessary, a group formed to defend affirmative action, has already filed a suit in federal court to do so — and Tuesday's ruling technically came in motions related to that case, the substance of which has yet to be heard. By Any Means Necessary has criticized the University of Michigan for not fully joining the suit already, while many others in the state have criticized the university for hinting that it would sue.

Among those who criticized universities for seeking to delay Proposal 2 was Mike Cox, the state's attorney general. But he helped broker the deal approved by the court on Tuesday. In announcing the agreement, Cox issued a statement saying that the pact settled the question of Proposal 2's viability. "This is a historic agreement. It upholds the will of the people," Cox said. "In addition, the agreement is a reasonable compromise that serves the public interest by allowing the current admissions and financial aid cycles to be completed under existing policies, while confirming the constitutionality of Proposal 2 in light of the legal challenges launched against it by the universities."

Cox went on to say that the universities had pledged — as part of the agreement — not to file any lawsuits against Proposal 2 on the basis of their First Amendment rights to academic freedom.

The academic freedom issue is potentially important for any legal challenge to Proposal 2. While academic freedom is not an explicit part of the U.S. Constitution, it has been recognized as a right by the U.S. Supreme Court since the 1957 case of Sweezy v. New Hampshire, in which Justice Felix Frankfurter defined the four elements of academic freedom as "the freedom of an institution to decide who may attend, who may teach, what may be taught and how it shall be taught." Many supporters of affirmative action believe the concept should be covered by the "who may attend" provision.

There is, however, a problem with Cox's statement: It is not clear that the universities agreed to what he said they agreed to. The universities released a copy of the "stipulations" that were filed with the court as part of the request for the delay in Proposal 2. The relevant stipulation says that the universities' claim (which includes the academic freedom argument) "shall be and hereby is dismissed in its entirety, with prejudice only as to the specific injunctive relief requested in the cross-claim."

Donna Stern, a spokeswoman for By Any Means Necessary, noted that the specific relief requested was the delay. As a result, she said, there was no stipulation that the universities couldn't sue on academic freedom grounds to try to block Proposal 2.

"All they've said is that they won't make the same exact claim, but they couldn't make the same exact claim because that issue is now settled," Stern said. She said she was encouraged by the outcome to hope that the universities might join the suit.

University of Michigan officials said they were pleased with the ruling Tuesday, but didn't comment on the possible inconsistency in what the attorney general said they had agreed to, and what the stipulation said.

A spokesman for the attorney general did not return repeated calls.

Proposal 2 Challenges Subvert Self-government (Det News)

By John T. Greilick

The Detroit News, December 20, 2006

ACLU lawsuit seeks to nullify effect of public's vote

The American Civil Liberties Union should add the right of the people to self government to the list of freedoms it is dedicated to protecting.

Michigan's ACLU chapter is making a direct assault on that right by asking a federal judge to rewrite the recently passed Proposal 2 anti-affirmative action measure in a way that would render the new law meaningless.

DOJ_NMG_0107857

In a lawsuit filed Tuesday, the ACLU asked the federal district court in Detroit to declare that Proposal 2 allows for race and gender to be considered in university admissions, consistent with the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in the University of Michigan case.

That's completely opposite of what voters intended when they approved Proposal 2 by an overwhelming margin in the November election.

The ballot language was precise. It asked voters whether race and gender preferences ought to be used in admissions and hiring at public institutions, specifically universities. And the voters said no.

We disagreed with the decision made by the electorate. We argued during the campaign that affirmative action is still needed as a tool to erase the inequities that exist in our society, and particularly in the education system.

But we lost the argument. And our respect for the referendum process and the direct democracy it provides to the people is far greater than our desire to prevail on the issue.

The ACLU argues that it is not making a constitutional challenge to Proposal 2, but rather asking the judge to rewrite the law to make it consistent with what the Supreme Court ruling allows.

But the Supreme Court said only that race and gender could be considered if an institution so desires. It did not mandate that institutions make such considerations.

Voters were quite clear in their desire to not have Michigan's public universities consider race and gender when admitting students.

If the ACLU were to prevail in its lawsuit, the expressed desire of the people would be subverted.

We share the concern of the universities that Proposal 2 makes their goal of creating culturally diverse campuses more difficult.

That's unfortunate, but it is now the law.

The appropriate response for those who want to mitigate the impact of the law is to work to make sure more minority students are prepared to gain admission to the University of Michigan and other schools based on academic merit.

That means an all-out commitment to improve the sorry public schools in Michigan's urban communities.

Michigan's Constitution allows citizens to make laws through the referendum process. The court should hold that constitutional right sacred and not involve itself in undoing the will of the people.

The ACLU's suit, and other legal challenges to Proposal 2, should be tossed.

N.J. Judge Voids City's Gun Control Law (LAW)

By Charles Toutant, New Jersey Law Journal

New Jersey Law Journal, December 20, 2006

A New Jersey state court judge on Dec. 13 enjoined enforcement of a Jersey City ordinance limiting handgun purchasers to one gun a month.

In a suit that tested the power of cities to write their own laws to curb gun-related violence, Hudson County Assignment Judge Maurice Gallipoli said he doubted the ordinance would achieve that end. And he found it pre-empted by the state's extensive gun-control scheme.

Gallipoli also said the law violated equal protection grounds, deeming it arbitrary, capricious and lacking a rational basis.

Jersey City's lawyer, Thomas Jardim, of Ramsey Berman in Morristown, says he will seek leave to appeal, particularly as to the equal protection holding.

Jersey City was the first municipality in the state to adopt an ordinance limiting gun purchases. Ordinance 06-082, adopted June 13, required purchasers to certify in writing that they had not bought another handgun in the city in the past 30 days. Violators could be fined as much as $500.

In July, suit was filed by Caso's Gun-a-Rama, the only licensed gun dealer in Jersey City, as well as the Association of New Jersey Rifle & Pistol Clubs Inc., which argued the law gave out-of-town gun shops an unfair advantage.

Gallipoli denied the plaintiffs' request for a temporary injunction on July 28 and set the case down for argument on a permanent one. The same day, the judge did allow Jersey City to rewrite the ordinance to address the plaintiffs' argument that it was vague.

Intervening on Jersey City's behalf was the local chapter of Associations of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN), represented by Renée Steinhagen of New Jersey Appleseed Public Interest Law Center and Linda Fisher of the Center for Social Justice at Seton Hall University School of Law.

Defense counsel Jardim argued that the ordinance was a legitimate use of police power because it would restrict the supply of handguns in the city, decrease the possibility of gun trafficking and curb the use of legitimately purchased guns in criminal acts by someone other than the purchaser.

DOJ_NMG_0107858

Jardim pointed out that the city this year passed another ordinance, requiring residents to make a report to police when firearms are lost or stolen, and that city council members are contemplating another law that would ban possession of a type of small, inexpensive gun known as a "Saturday Night Special," Jardim says.

In his brief, plaintiffs lawyer Frank Pisano III, of Needleman & Pisano in Montville, claimed that the ordinance violates the state constitutional equal protection clause because it places a restriction on Jersey City's citizens that does not apply to people living elsewhere in the state.

He also argued pre-emption, citing In re Pries, 118 N.J. 564 (1990), in which the state Supreme Court noted the "careful grid of regulatory provisions" in the criminal code about purchase and sale of handguns. Among those provisions is N.J.S.A. 2C:58-3i, which limits handgun purchases to one per permit but allows multiple purchases to someone with more than one permit.

Jardim argued that while the state has exclusive authority over licensing of handguns, N.J.S.A. 40:40-1(18) gives municipalities authority to regulate and prohibit the purchase or sale of firearms. He added that the court left localities the right to gun possession to further health and safety goals in Township of Chester v. Panicucci, 62 N.J. 94 (1973), in which a local law restricting hunting was upheld.

During the oral argument Dec. 13, Gallipoli pointed out to Jardim that the city had no evidence that any guns purchased at Caso's were used in crimes.

After the ruling Jardim said, "I respect the judge's personal opinion but the fact that he didn't think it was a wise piece of legislation is not within his purview. It's the job of the mayor and council."

ACORN lawyer Fisher says Gallipoli wrongly interpreted the court's "careful grid" language in Pries to mean that state legislation intended to have exclusive authority over gun regulation. The state statute, for example, does not address frequency of gun purchases at all. "There's plenty of room in that state statutory scheme for municipalities to fill in the gaps," Fisher says.

Fisher conceded the ordinance will have the effect of sending purchasers to nearby towns in search of guns. "We would be more than happy if Bayonne or Hoboken would enact similar ordinances, but in this business it's one step at a time," she says.

Plaintiffs lawyer Pisano says of the ruling Dec. 13, "I think the court clearly recognized that our Legislature has enacted comprehensive regulations regulating the purchase and sale of firearms and intended to occupy that field exclusively.

"The other message is if you want to address the problem of violent crime, the way not to do it is by restricting law-abiding citizens from lawfully purchasing firearms consistent with state law, which they can do everywhere else in the state."

Jury Finds That New York City Violated Constitutional Rights With Arrest Policy (FINDLAW/AP)

By Larry Neumeister, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 20, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-New York City violated constitutional rights for a few months when the police department introduced a written policy in May 2001 to require those arrested at demonstrations to be locked up overnight rather than issued desk appearance tickets, a jury found.

But the same jury of eight people greatly diminished Monday any potential damages when it rejected a claim that the police department had enforced an unwritten policy to lock up demonstrators for more than two years before it put the policy in writing.

The verdict came after a lawsuit, brought on behalf of some 350 demonstrators, accused the city of starting to lock up all demonstrators it arrested after the 1999 killing of unarmed Guinean immigrant Amadou Diallo, who was struck by 19 of 41 bullets fired by police officers.

The lockups sometimes occurred despite a city policy that had existed in which people charged with misdemeanors are usually given desk appearance tickets, telling them when to show up at court for arraignment.

The overnight lockup in Manhattan is notorious for mixing those charged with all nature of crimes as they await arraignment, making it a particularly unpleasant experience for those unlikely to face any jail time even if they are convicted.

After a three-week trial, the jury found that the city violated the U.S. Constitution's First Amendment right to free speech and assembly as well as the 14th Amendment right to due process when the written policy was put in place on May 1, 2001. The policy was withdrawn on July 13, 2001.

However, the jury concluded that the city did not violate the Constitution between April 7, 1999 and April 30, 2001, when the plaintiffs said the city enforced an unwritten policy to lock up demonstrators.

The verdict left the city claiming victory.

The city's corporation counsel, Michael A. Cardoza, told The Associated Press the city was vindicated against claims that for more than two years there were "winks and nods" as police carried out an unwritten policy to lock up all arrested protesters.

He said the jury had flatly told the plaintiffs they were wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0107859

"That's big news," Cardoza said. "The plaintiffs prevailed in part, no question about it, but on the huge overwhelming part of the case the plaintiffs lost."

Jonathan C. Moore, a lawyer for the demonstrators, said the trial was limited to liability so a second trial would have to be conducted to determine damages, unless settlements were reached on behalf of some 30 people who claim to have been improperly arrested during that period.

Moore said he was disappointed that the jury did not conclude that the city violated the rights of those who were arrested between 1999 and 2001.

"It's unfortunate that a lot of plaintiffs will go uncompensated," he said.

During the trial, former police Commissioner Howard Safir testified he did not order that demonstrators be locked up rather than issued summonses after the Diallo shooting.

Earlier in the trial, Louis Anemone, a former police chief, testified for plaintiffs that Safir was so annoyed that celebrities were joining the demonstrations that he ordered the change in policy.

Among those arrested during the demonstrations were the Rev. Jesse Jackson, the Rev. Al Sharpton, former Mayor David Dinkins and several actors including Danny Glover, Susan Sarandon and Timothy Hutton.

UK Report Says Robots Will Have Rights (FT)

By Salamander Davoudi In London

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

The next time you beat your keyboard in frustration, think of a day where it may be able to sue you for assault. Within 50 years we might even find ourselves standing next to the next generation of vacuum cleaners in the voting booth.

Far from being extracts from the extreme end of science fiction, the idea that we may one day give sentient machines the kind of rights traditionally reserved for humans is raised in a British government-commissioned report which claims to be an extensive look into the future.

Visions of the status of robots around 2056 have emerged from one of 270 forward-looking papers sponsored by Sir David King, the UK government's chief scientist. The paper covering robots' rights was written by a UK partnership of Outsights, the management consultancy, and Ipsos Mori, the opinion research organisation.

"If we make conscious robots they would want to have rights and they probably should," said Henrik Christensen, director of the Centre of Robotics and Intelligent Machines at the Georgia Institute of Technology.

The idea will not surprise science fiction aficionados. It was widely explored by Dr Isaac Asimov, one of the foremost science fiction writers of the 20th century. He wrote of a society where robots were fully integrated and essential in day-to-day life.

In his system, the 'three laws of robotics' governed machine life. They decreed that robots could not injure humans, must obey orders and protect their own existence – in that order.

Robots and machines are now classed as inanimate objects without rights or duties but if artificial intelligence becomes ubiquitous, the report argues, there may be calls for humans' rights to be extended to them.

It is also logical that such rights are meted out with citizens' duties, including voting, paying tax and compulsory military service.

Mr Christensen said: "Would it be acceptable to kick a robotic dog even though we shouldn't kick a normal one?

"There will be people who can't distinguish that so we need to have ethical rules to make sure we as humans interact with robots in an ethical manner so we do not move our boundaries of what is acceptable."

The Horizon Scan report argues that if 'correctly managed', this new world of robots' rights could lead to increased labour output and greater prosperity.

"If granted full rights, states will be obligated to provide full social benefits to them including income support, housing and possibly robo-healthcare to fix the machines over time," it says.

But it points out that the process has casualties and the first one may be the environment, especially in the areas of energy and waste.

ANTITRUST:

Delta Plans To Stay In The Air Without US Airways Buyout (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107860

ATLANTA, Dec. 19 -- Delta Air Lines filed a reorganization plan Tuesday that calls for it to emerge from bankruptcy protection next spring as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion, which would be more than the market value of the nation's two biggest carriers combined.

Delta said that under the plan, its unsecured creditors would recover 63 to 80 percent of their allowed claims.

Delta's existing stock would be wiped out under the plan and creditors generally would receive distributions of new Delta common stock to settle their claims.

Delta outlined a five-year business plan and said it would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion after it's reorganized.

The high end of the equity value Delta is projecting would be more than the $11.6 billion combined market value of American Airlines and United Airlines.

Delta also said that its board voted to reject US Airways' $8.3 billion hostile takeover bid. "US Airways is the worst of all potential merger partners," Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said.

US Airways said it remained committed to its merger proposal. It said its offer, including $1.65 billion in cost savings it anticipates, provides more value than Delta's plan. The offer included $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock.

Delta Air Lines Rejects US Airways' Hostile Takeover (Update11) (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein

Bloomberg, December 20, 2006

Dec. 19 (Bloomberg) -- Delta Air Lines Inc. rejected a hostile $8.51 billion merger proposal from US Airways Group Inc. and said it plans to exit bankruptcy on its own with a value of as much as $12 billion.

The US Airways offer is unlikely to receive antitrust approval, is based on flawed economic assumptions and would result in the biggest debt load in the industry, Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier, said today. US Airways said it will continue to pursue a takeover.

Delta wasn't persuaded by US Airways' argument that a combination creating the world's largest airline would add $1.65 billion in annual savings and new revenue. Executives at Atlanta-based Delta have expressed skepticism about US Airways' offer since it was unveiled Nov. 15.

``It will be extremely difficult for this merger to go forward," James Corridore, an analyst for Standard & Poor's, said in a note. US Airways' ``options are to raise its bid, try and sway creditors, or retract its bid."

Delta filed its five-year business strategy with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York today, 15 months after seeking Chapter 11 protection. The carrier said it will leave bankruptcy in the first half of next year, and forecast net income of about $450 million in 2007 and $1.2 billion in 2010.

US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said his company's offer of $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million US Airways shares, coupled with cost savings and new revenue, ``is significantly greater" than the value of Delta's plan to its creditors and future shareholders.

``We remain a disciplined and determined bidder for Delta," Parker said in a statement.

Industry Consolidation

Delta's board unanimously rejected the US Airways offer. The carrier faces pressure to consolidate as rivals consider tie-ups. AirTran Holdings Inc. made a hostile $290 million bid for Midwest Air Group Inc. on Dec. 13, and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines has held talks with Continental Airlines Inc.

Delta's shares fell 10 cents, or 6.8 percent, to $1.37 at 4:01 p.m. New York time in over-the-counter trading. US Airways shares rose $1.70, or 3.1 percent, to $57.50 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Delta's 8.3 percent note due in 2029 rose about 1.5 cents to 67.5 cents on the dollar, according to Trace, the bond-price reporting system of the NASD.

80% Recovery

Delta said its plan would let unsecured creditors recover 63 percent to 80 percent of their claims, and that Blackstone Group, a financial adviser, estimates the airline's value at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. Delta's current shares will be worthless once it leaves bankruptcy.

``Creditors are going to want to put a sharp pencil to both plans," said Robert Mann, a Port Washington, New York-based consultant who works with airlines and unions.

Delta's creditors committee likely will ask the carrier by the end of this week to let US Airways review its finances, Mann said. Such a review, which Delta has rejected, is needed so Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways can firm up parts of its offer.

The financial targets in Delta's plan are reasonable compared with forecasts for its peers, said Robert Barry, a Goldman Sachs Group Inc. analyst in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0107861

Concerns about merging workforces ``are real and sizable," while Delta's claims that US Airways' forecast savings are overstated ``seem more dubious," Barry said in a report.

Support from Delta's nine-member creditors committee is vital because it will help set the terms of any plan for Delta to exit bankruptcy. Executives from both carriers met with the panel last week to build support for their strategies.

`Great Progress'

``We've got a very constructive relationship with our committee," Delta Chief Financial Officer Ed Bastian said on a call with reporters. ``They understand the great progress Delta is making."

Delta used its time under court protection to cut labor costs, ground planes and expand more-profitable international routes. The airline said it achieved 85 percent of the $3 billion annual cost-savings goal set when it filed for bankruptcy. It plans $700 million in new savings next year.

Under the plan, Delta said its operating margin would move from a negative 6.9 percent this year to 2.4 percent in 2007 and 10.5 percent by 2010. The cost to fly each seat a mile will fall to 6.73 cents in 2007, down 20 percent from 2004, Bastian said.

By next year, Delta expects to narrow its gap in revenue for each seat flown a mile to 94 percent of the industry average from 86 percent, and to achieve parity in 2008, Bastian said.

International Service

The carrier will continue to beef up international service, increasing capacity 15 percent next year compared with a decline of as much as 4 percent in domestic markets. Total capacity would rise 1 percent to 2 percent in 2007. Annual growth in later years will be 2 percent to 3 percent, Delta said.

Delta said US Airways' plan would result in a ``precariously high" $23 billion in debt for the combined carrier, compared with $10 billion for Delta independently. It would be a ``prescription for disaster," Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein said.

Delta said it hasn't had any merger talks with other airlines since US Airways' offer was made public Nov. 15 following Delta's rejection of earlier, private overtures.

Other Bidders?

Other airlines, including UAL, may bid for Delta now that details of its plan are known, according to Barry, the Goldman analyst, and Philip Baggaley, a New York-based S&P analyst.

Delta was saddled with more than $28 billion in debt when it sought bankruptcy protection. It blamed growing low-cost competition, increased fuel costs and a drop in travel following the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. Northwest Airlines Corp. filed on the same day, in the same court, citing the same problems.

US Airways came out of bankruptcy last year for a second time when it merged with America West Holdings Corp. US Airways is now the seventh-largest U.S. airline.

``US Airways was literally on the brink of liquidation" when it agreed to merge with America West, said Jim Whitehurst, Delta's chief operating officer. ``Our cash position is strong, our financial position is strong. This situation is very different than when America West acquired US Airways."

The case is In re Delta Air Lines Inc., 05-17923, U.S. Bankruptcy Court, Southern District of New York (Manhattan).

Merger Criticized As Push Toward Monopoly (CO)

By Steve Harrison

The Charlotte Observer, December 20, 2006

Delta Air Lines attacked all facets of the US Airways' plan for a merged airline Tuesday, but its sharpest criticism is that the "new Delta" would be anti-competitive.

"If you asked us who is our major competitor, we would say US Airways," said Delta chief executive Gerald Grinstein said. "(This deal) may sound good to a monopolist."

A merged Delta and US Airways would create the nation's biggest airline and would dominate the East Coast, with hubs in Atlanta, Charlotte, Philadelphia and New York's Kennedy Airport. It also would have significant operations at New York's LaGuardia Airport, Reagan National in Washington, and Boston Logan.

"It appears, at the end of the day, this is more than likely to be blocked," said New York City attorney Jim Weiss, a partner in Preston Gates & Ellis LLP who is on retainer to Delta. Weiss spoke during a conference call with analysts and reporters Tuesday.

Creditors will vote in February or March on whether to approve Delta's Chapter 11 reorganization plan or to accept US Airways' offer. In its sales pitch to creditors, Delta warns that any merger would be scrutinized for at least a year, and would likely be turned down by the Justice Department. That would delay the creditors being compensated in the deal.

DOJ_NMG_0107862

Since launching the takeover bid Nov. 15, US Airways has insisted the deal would get antitrust approval so long as it sold one of its Northeastern shuttles. It also said the deal would go through because of the growth of low-cost carriers this decade, with AirTran operating a major hub in Atlanta and JetBlue operating one at New York Kennedy.

Weiss noted that the new airline would still have roughly 50 percent of the market at LaGuardia and Reagan National, even after selling a shuttle. He said there would be nearly 2,000 city pairs -- many in the Southeast -- where the new airline would carry 90 percent or more of all passengers. Delta said that in about half of those cities Delta today has less than a 50 percent share. And it showed in a PowerPoint presentation the geographic proximity of the two airline's hubs, predicting that the new airline would cut service in cities such as Charlotte and Pittsburgh.

Grinstein noted that low-cost carriers wouldn't go to small cities such as Florence, S.C.

Goldman Sachs analysts wrote Tuesday they believe US Airways would "go to great lengths" to assuage Department of Justice concerns.

Delta has launched a new Web site -- www.keepdeltamydelta.org -- that highlights cities that could be impacted by the merger.

Delta Shuns Bid, Prefers To Fly Solo (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, December 20, 2006

US Airways' pursuit of Delta Air Lines took on a more hostile tone after Delta formally rejected its advances Tuesday and announced its intention to emerge from bankruptcy as an independent airline.

Delta said that as an independent, it would be worth $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it exits Chapter 11 protection next spring. US Airways' unsolicited cash-and-stock bid was worth $8.4 billion at US Airways' closing price Tuesday.

CEO Gerald Grinstein said Delta believes an independent airline offers investors and creditors greater value and certainty of success than US Airways' proposal.

US Airways would not say Tuesday whether it will sweeten its offer but said it remains a "determined bidder" for the USA's third-biggest carrier. Spokeswoman Andrea Rader said US Airways had hoped to work cooperatively on a merger with Delta.

A merger with US Airways, the seventh-biggest U.S. carrier, would create the biggest domestic airline by passenger capacity, passing American Airlines.

US Airways says it will press its offer with Delta's creditors committee, which has taken no official stand. The committee could pressure management to open its books to US Airways and ask the bankruptcy judge to consider the merger. But so far, the committee has worked with Delta, which says the stand-alone plan would give creditors a stock payout worth 63% to 80% of their claims.

US Airways is offering $4 billion cash and 78 million shares of its stock. It says a merger would save the combined airline $1.6 billion a year. Delta questions those savings.

And Delta's Grinstein says a sweetened US Airways offer would not overcome antitrust and other obstacles. Delta CFO Ed Bastian says a merger would leave the new airline with $23 billion in debt, about double what Delta would have as an independent.

Goldman Sachs analyst Robert Barry says another option for Delta would be a bid from United Airlines, because route networks and corporate cultures would be a good fit. But analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities says he doubts more offers will come until the Justice Department gives some indication of how it views the burgeoning number of airline mergers.

Last week, AirTran made an unsolicited bid for Midwest Airlines. And United is said to be in early merger talks with Continental.

Delta forecast a 2006 loss of $350 million excluding bankruptcy charges. Next year it expects net income of $450 million, rising to about $1.2 billion by 2010. Delta said $700 million in cost cuts will take effect next year, including termination of its pilots' pension plan.

Delta Lawyer: US Airways Merger Has 'antitrust Issues' (PITTBIZ)

Pittsburgh Business Times, December 19, 2006

Delta Chairman and CEO Jerry Grinstein continued his offensive against US Airways' hostile takeover bid in a conference call with analysts Tuesday, saying that the merger would create too much of a monopoly in too many markets.

"If the suggestion is that we're going to put a for sale sign on Delta airlines, we're just not going to do that," Grinstein said.

But "if the process of consolidation starts, you do not want to be left out," he added, explaining that all airlines are keeping tabs on each other.

DOJ_NMG_0107863

And he touted "the huge amount of value" that has been created at Delta during the Atlanta-based airline's bankruptcy proceedings, essentially pointing to US Airways' $8.7 billion bid as being less than the up to $12 billion in value that Delta believes it is worth. Delta earlier on Thursday filed its standalone plan to emerge from bankruptcy and reported its board of directors unanimously rejected US Airways' takeover bid.

"I hope we'd be an acquirer rather than an aquiree," Grinstein said.

Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta Air Lines Inc. (Pink Sheets: DALRQ) and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. (NYSE: LCC), Pittsburgh International Airport's leading carrier.

"It appears from a factual standpoint, this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it," said Jim Weiss, a Washington partner in the law firm Preston Gates & Ellis LLP, which recently merged with Kirkpatrick & Lockhart Nicholson Graham, a Pittsburgh law firm. "The antitrust risk here is quite high."

Weiss, the former head of the DOJ's antitrust division and a hired gun for Delta since 1988, said he believes it would take the department about a year to review US Airways' hostile bid for Delta.

That's because the DOJ will anticipate more merger proposals and would want to go over the Delta/US Airways merger with a fine-toothed comb.

In a detailed PowerPoint presentation available on Delta's Web site, Weiss showed why he believes the Delta/US Airways combination wouldn't pass muster. Chiefly, he said, a lot of small to midsized American cities would lose competition if the two airlines merged. The combined airline would be the largest carrier in 127 small communities.

And Weiss contends that low cost carriers don't usually go into really small cities, so the competition isn't likely to be replaced.

Other proof he offered for his position: the DOJ rejected a US Airways/United merger after a 14-month investigation. And that merger had even fewer overlapping routes and hubs, Weiss said.

Meanwhile, US Airways continued its public campaign for Delta. The airline sent out a statement from Chairman and CEO Doug Parker saying, "Combining US Airways and Delta will create at least $1.65 billion in annual synergies beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan. These synergies come on top of the certainty of $4 billion in cash and the upside potential of 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock."

But Grinstein said in the conference call that he expects Delta would be $8 billion in debt when it emerges from bankruptcy. By contrast, he said, a US Airways/Delta merger would be saddled with $23 billion in debt. If that sounds familiar, he quipped, that was the amount of debt Delta had when it filed for Chapter 11 in 2005.

Delta: US Air Deal Would Hike Fares (CNN)

By Chris Isidore

CNN Money, December 20, 2006

NEW YORK (CNNMoney.com) -- Delta Air Lines formally rejected the hostile bid from US Airways Group early Tuesday, saying regulators are unlikely to approve the combination because of the risk of higher airfares and that its creditors will get more if it stays independent.

The move is not a surprise. Since US Air made its $8.4 billion stock and cash bid for Delta on Nov. 15, Delta management has stated that it intends to emerge from bankruptcy as an independent carrier. But the statements Tuesday make the airline's strongest case against the combination of No. 3 Delta and No. 7 US Air.

Executives at Delta Air Lines (tail in front) say a combination with US Airways (tail in rear) would be blocked by regulators because it would hike fares in many East Coast markets.

In a call with investors, Delta CEO Jerry Grinstein said US Airways is Delta's primary competitor on the East Coast, and a deal with it would be the one least likely to be approved because of the impact on fares.

"Combining the carriers necessarily reduces competition, which may sound good to a monopolist but a regulator would not like it all," he said.

US Airways quickly responded that it is not dropping its bid for Delta, despite the formal rejection by the Delta board.

"We remain a determined, disciplined bidder and are confident the offer we made presents the greatest value for all our stakeholders," said a statement by spokeswoman Valerie Wunder.

If airline mergers fly, fares could follow

Delta said there are 2,000 routes where a combined US Airways and Delta would control 90 percent of the flights, which the company argues would prevent U.S. antitrust regulators from agreeing to the deal.

"Delta believes consumers have valid reason for concern, as pricing has gone up, not down, on approximately 6,600 US Airways routes following its merger with America West," said Delta's statement.

US Airways executives have insisted that fares did not rise after the former America West bought US Airways' assets out of bankruptcy in September 2005, arguing that cost savings from the combined operations allowed it to keep fares low.

Fares up

But filings by US Airways Group (down $0.23 to $55.57, Charts) as well as the two predecessor carriers that combined in late September 2005, America West and US Airways Inc., suggest that the combined carrier has seen a rise in the revenue per passenger mile, a closely watched measure known as yield that approximates average fares.

US Airways Group's yield in the third quarter is up 10.4 percent compared to the average of the two predecessor carriers a year earlier. Over the first three quarters of 2006 the average yield is up 14 percent. Both are higher than the average gain in industrywide yields reported by the Air Transport Association, the industry trade group.

7 amazing travel secrets revealed

Grinstein rejected the idea of continuing talks with US Air, making some of its financial information available in order to see if US Air would be willing to raise its bid, while Delta management continued to move toward emerging from bankruptcy as an independent carrier.

"Remember this is a hostile proposal, not a solicited one," he said. "When you get into exchanging information with your largest competitor, you've got issues. The Justice Department has already indicated they did not want us to do so without some clearance from them."

S&P airline equity analyst Jim Corridore doesn't think the regulatory hurdles are as clear cut as presented by Delta management, but he agrees that in some smaller markets the merger would result in higher fares.

"I don't think that it's a regulatory non-starter, but there are significant hurdles that have to be cleared," he said. "I believe there is a case to be made that these hurdles can be overcome."

Tuesday's statement from Delta says that its financial adviser, the Blackstone Group, estimates that Delta will be worth about $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy.

US Air is offering $4 billion in cash and stock now worth about $4.4 billion to Delta creditors.

While Delta is not offering cash to creditors at this point of the discussions, Grinstein insisted that the Delta plan still is less risky for creditors since it doesn't face the regulatory hurdles that a merger with US Air would face, and it would allow Delta to emerge from bankruptcy sooner.

S&P's Corridore said he believes the U.S. Air offer is the better deal for Delta creditors. But he said he now doubts that the merger will take place.

"It will be very difficult for the deal to go forward in the face of the opposition from Delta management and directors," he said. "The Delta pilots are also a constituent that you have to convince, and US Air hasn't been able to do that."

But Joseph Capobianco, a Long Island, N.Y.-based merger & acquisition attorney, said he believes it's easier for a hostile bidder to convince creditors to accept a deal than it is to convince shareholders of a non-bankrupt company. So he thinks that US Air still has good chance to get Delta.

"I think US Airways will increase their offer," he said. "I don't think the fat lady has sung."

US Air's Wunder would not comment when asked about reports that the company was considering an increased bid.

Spring emergence

Delta said it is on track to emerge from bankruptcy next spring but said that emergence would be delayed until 2008 if the merger went forward. The company filed its reorganization plan, which it said would result in a recovery for Delta's unsecured creditors of approximately 63 to 80 percent of their allowed claims through equity in the reorganized company.

Delta also argued a combined US Air-Delta would have $23 billion in total debt, compared with about $10 billion in total debt for a stand-alone Delta.

"In our industry, as all of us know, that [heavy debt] is a prescription for disaster," said Grinstein.

And Grinstein insisted the Delta contract with the Air Line Pilots Association prohibits the 10 percent cut in capacity at a combined Delta-US Air that the US Air executives plan to make as part of the merger.

"There are significant labor issues that can not be blinked away," he said. "The pilots have said that Delta is not for sale."

US Air's Wunder would not comment on the specifics of Delta's statement other than to repeat the prepared remark reiterating the bid.

The bid from US Air for Delta last month set off speculation that it could bring a round of mergers in the industry. Last week there were reports that United Airlines' parent UAL Corp. (Charts) was in preliminary talks with Continental Airlines (Charts) on a potential merger. And even smaller carriers could get involved, as AirTran (Charts) announced an unsolicited bid for Midwest Express (Charts).

Grinstein told investors that if some of the other deals come to pass, Delta may have to reassess its go-alone strategy. But he repeated that he believes an independent Delta is the best strategy, no matter what negotiations are taking place.

DOJ_NMG_0107865

"They may be in conversation, but we haven't seen any fruit of that yet," he said. "What history has shown us about airline mergers is they're difficult to do."

If airline mergers fly, fares could follow

US Airways Still Chasing Delta Despite Its Rejection (PPG)

By Dan Fitzpatrick, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 20, 2006

US Airways is refusing to back off its $8.4 billion takeover bid for Delta Air Lines despite an official rejection from Delta's board and a pledge that Delta will emerge from bankruptcy next year as a stand-alone company worth as much as $12 billion.

"We remain a disciplined and determined bidder for Delta," US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said yesterday after Delta's board released its reorganization plan that eschewed US Airways' advances.

The back-and-forth drama pitting the nation's third-largest carrier against the fifth-largest, US Airways, and its 45-year-old CEO now turns to Delta's creditors, who will have to decide early next year between the two competing plans for Delta's emergence from Chapter 11 bankruptcy.

It "is quite exciting," said longtime Virginia airline consultant Darryl Jenkins.

"Certainly, Parker is not going to give up. Parker is a very driven young man" and "not one that shirks from a fight," Mr. Jenkins said. By the same token, Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein, 74, is "a tough old bird. ... He is not going to let some young snot-nose tell him what to do with his airline."

The outcome of the takeover battle is being watched closely in the Pittsburgh area, where Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways still employs 2,275 employees and serves 146 daily flights from Pittsburgh International Airport. Its presence, though, is down significantly from five years ago, prior to the 9/11 attacks, when it employed more than 12,000 locally and offered more than 500 daily flights.

Atlanta-based Delta, which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in 2005, filed its reorganization plan yesterday in New York and disclosed for the first time that its board had unanimously rejected US Airways' merger proposal. The five-year strategy outlined in the airline's plan predicts that an independent Delta would be valued at $9.4 billion to $12 billion while earning a profit of $456 million in 2007 and $1.2 billion in 2010.

Delta's Grinstein argued in a conference call that US Airways' bid, based on "flawed economic assumptions," would never clear antitrust concerns and that it would saddle the combined company with too much debt and too many unsolved labor issues.

"A prescription for disaster," Mr. Grinstein said, in the conference call. "US Airways is the worst of all potential merger partners."

Mr. Grinstein didn't completely dismiss the idea of a merger with a company other than US Airways, saying later that Delta would review any other bids. But he said Delta would not put out a "for sale" sign.

Delta's chief financial officer, Ed Bastian, said in the conference call that Delta so far has not received any other offers.

Mr. Parker, who launched his takeover attempt Nov. 15 after being rebuffed twice by phone and letter, said "we have always expected that Delta would submit a stand-alone plan" and noted that Delta's creditors now have a "benchmark against which to evaluate the competing proposals and we welcome that comparison. This is an important step in a process that we believe will result in the merger of US Airways and Delta."

The US Airways CEO maintains a merger would provide at least $1.65 billion in cost savings and new revenue "beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan." Delta creditors would also receive $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock, which closed yesterday at $57.50, up $1.70, or 3 percent.

Delta's reorganization plan, on the other hand, would allow creditors to get back 63 percent to 80 percent of what they are owed.

Both airlines have been lobbying the creditors committee, hoping to win support. The committee will now review both plans and is expected to make a decision early next year.

"We recognize and appreciate the creditors' ultimate authority in this process," Mr. Parker said.

Some experts expect US Airways to raise its bid, but Mr. Parker did not address that possibility yesterday.

"I assume over time that bid will be upped," said Mr. Jenkins, the airline consultant.

Whether the creditors go for US Airways or Delta depends on "what your time preference is. One [US Airways] is more money now and one [Delta] is more money later. Everybody is playing their cards."

Delta CEO: Airline Would Look At Any Other Proposal (DOWJONES)

By Terry Kosdrosky

Dow Jones Newswires, December 19, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107866

The Chief Executive of Delta Air Lines Inc. (DALRQ) said Tuesday that US Airways Group Inc.'s merger proposal raises unique antitrust concerns. He added that Delta would "look at" any other proposal.

Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said during a conference call that the US Airways proposal has some "some very unusual antitrust aspects to it." He noted that his concerns about antitrust issues apply to the bid from US Airways only and don't reflect the company's views on any other combination. Grinstein also said Delta realizes its fiduciary duty to creditors and other stakeholders, noting that the company would look at any other proposal that comes up.

Delta, which has been operating under bankruptcy protection since September 2005, on Tuesday filed a reorganization plan and formally rejected the $8.4 billion merger offer from US Airways, which was first announced last month.

Jim Weiss, an attorney at Preston Gates & Ellis LLP who did an antitrust analysis for Delta on the US Airways proposal, said on the conference call that the risk of rejection on antitrust concerns is quite high.

The review process would take at least a year and the US Airways/Delta proposal would be more anticompetitive than the attempted US Airways-United Airlines merger rejected by the Department of Justice years ago. United is a unit of UAL Corp. (UAUA).

Weiss said the department's conservative view on airline matters hasn't changed much.

Sector Snap: Airline Shares Dip (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

Airline Shares Slip As Delta Rejects US Airways' Buyout Bid

NEW YORK (AP) -- Airline shares slipped in Tuesday trading, after Delta Air Lines Inc. rejected a buyout bid by US Airways Group Inc.

The overall Amex Airline Index fell 1 percent, with all 11 of its component stocks marking declines. Many of the index's percentage swings were slight, less than 1 percent.

The declines came amid easing crude oil prices, which dropped 29 cents to $61.92 per barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange. Falling oil prices typically strengthen airline shares, as jet fuel is among the industry's top costs.

When Delta filed a reorganization plan Tuesday with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court overseeing its Chapter 11 proceedings, the company said it wanted to remain a standalone carrier. Delta also said it plans to wipe out its existing stock under the plan.

Among the obstacles Delta said it foresaw for a possible deal with US Airways was federal antitrust scrutiny and labor issues. Investors have long been waiting for consolidation in the industry, which analysts say could help boost carriers' pricing power and profits.

Delta shares fell 8 cents, or 5.4 percent, to $1.39 in over-the-counter trading outside the index.

US Airways shares, meanwhile, slipped 32 cents to $55.56 on the New York Stock Exchange, also outside the index.

The index's biggest percentage decliner was AirTran Holdings Inc., whose shares fell 32 cents, or 2.5 percent, to $12.34 on the NYSE.

A Holiday Travel Wish List (USAT)

USA Today, December 20, 2006

This time of the year means two things: Many of us are thinking about what we'd like to receive. And travel is more of a hassle than ever.

For those of us who will be on the road, it's a good time to think about the measures — even the small ones — that could make our journeys easier. According to AAA, nearly 65 million Americans will be traveling more than 50 miles from home this holiday season, an increase over last year and a sure sign that airports, highways, train stations and bus depots will be packed in the coming weeks.

So whether you're traveling for Christmas, Hanukkah, Kwanzaa or New Year's, what follows is a holiday wish list of modest suggestions for making all of our trips a little easier.

For the Airlines:

Please, please, please, don't allow cellphones in flight.

Several firms have been tweaking the technology to allow for the safe transmission of cellular calls while airborne. Both the Federal Aviation Administration and Federal Communications Commission are said to be considering changes to the long-term ban, but ultimately it will be up to each airline to set its own policy. To which most of the flying public can only say: "Don't!"

Record load factors have made commercial flights more crowded than ever and the security "travel hassle" factor has made passengers more testy than ever. Think air rage is bad now? Try flying from coast to coast next to a loud talker. Or wait until you take a red-eye beside someone breaking up with an unfaithful partner. Such scenarios are why some business travel advocates are leading the move toward "Tapping-Not Talking" technology, so that passengers can stay in touch via real-time text messaging, not voice communication.

DOJ_NMG_0107867

Technology is good. Employing it wisely is even better.

For hotels:

Implement an all-hands-on-deck policy at peak times.

My friend Andy recently told me about arriving at a hotel with his wife and three young children, and waiting in a long line as one employee checked in all of the guests. Meanwhile, two other employees stood by, apparently just watching. Were they in training? Not qualified? Who knows? But we've all had this experience and it's harder to accept at a four-star hotel than at a grocery store. So if warm bodies are available at busy times, please put them to work.

For the car rental companies:

Guarantee child safety seats.

A few months ago, I noted how some car rental firms state that optional equipment — such as child safety seats — "may" be available at "many" or "most" locations (Read column). On such a critical issue, mushy language is not acceptable. All car rental firms should guarantee such seats in advance. Then if one is not available, parents can make alternative plans before it's too late.

For cruise lines:

Clarify tipping at sea.

For years, veteran cruisers understood the onboard rules and brought along enough cash to provide gratuities before disembarking. Now some cruise lines provide automatic payment systems, some lines prohibit tipping, and other lines allow it under certain conditions. Each program may have its benefits, but readers say they're confused. When such policies are not clear, cruise lines need to clarify these issues prior to booking.

For the travel websites:

List all competitive products fairly.

After years of analyzing travel websites for Consumer Reports WebWatch, it's amazing to me that some travel sites still segregate their listings according to the marketing agreements they've signed with travel suppliers, such as airlines, hotel chains and car rental firms. You shouldn't need to input extra keystrokes and view fresh pages to see all of the viable choices for a given booking. Better transparency will benefit an even more important constituency: customers.

For the Transportation Security Administration:

Please think through new policies.

Yes, I know that the TSA has the Herculean task of securing our airports and airlines. But whatever goodwill was built up after 9/11 has long since eroded as new policies, procedures and guidelines have been introduced, revamped, rescinded and even brought back. Shoes off. Shoes on. No to liquids. Yes to liquids. Maybe to liquids. We all understand the importance of making air travel safer, but many are wondering how the TSA's ever-changing rules are contributing to that goal.

For the U.S. Department of Transportation:

Update the flight delays rule.

If you'd like to know the on-time history of the domestic flight you're booking, you can call a travel agent or the airline's reservations department and they're required to tell you. That's the good news. The bad news is that this DOT rule went into effect prior to the launch of the Internet, so online providers are not required to tell you the same information. A simple tweak of this regulation would force airline and travel agency websites to provide you with the same delay records you get through off-line bookings.

For the U.S. Department of Justice:

Don't rubber-stamp airline mergers.

It's been shown time and again: What investors call "consolidation" is a nice word for worse service and more unemployment. With the ink not even dry on US Airways' marriage with America West, that carrier already is considering a hostile takeover of Delta. This has promptly led to merger talks between Continental and United, while AirTran (formerly ValuJet) says it wants to initiate a hostile takeover of Midwest Airlines.

For passengers, a dwindling number of carriers will mean higher prices, fewer flights and a decline in service (yes, it's possible for service to decline further). For employees, it means even more lay-offs in an industry still reeling from lost jobs. The DOJ should look long and hard before blessing any of these deals that essentially benefit no one but a handful of senior executives — and, of course, their attorneys.

For all Americans (not just those who travel):

Let's discuss the automated targeting system (ATS).

DOJ_NMG_0107868

As reported last month, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has been using ATS to monitor travel records, motor vehicle records and even airline meal preferences, all in the name of security. "Without notifying the public, federal agents for the past four years have assigned millions of international travelers, including Americans, computer-generated scores rating the risk they pose of being terrorists or criminals," the Associated Press reported.

Unfortunately, we're not allowed to view these assessments, let alone challenge them, even though the government intends to maintain them for 40 years. That's why the European Union recently asked for further clarification about ATS. In fact, we all should. Want to learn more? You'll have to dig, but you can find it on the DHS site (PDF file).

ATS is not the first initiative of this kind proposed by the DHS and its subsidiary, the TSA. The ill-fated Computer Assisted Passenger Prescreening System (CAPPS II) generated criticism from organizations as diverse as the American Civil Liberties Union and the Christian Coalition.

After I wrote about that program in this space in 2004, a reader's response eloquently invoked Benjamin Franklin: "They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety." At what point, exactly, do we finally stand up as a nation and declare that the freedoms we've sacrificed in the name of security have altered the very concept of what it means to be an American? At what point do we say that government agencies (and even worse, their outsourced private-sector partners) do not have complete freedom to track each and every one of us? At what point do we simply say that enough is enough?

Preserving the personal rights that make this country a beacon of freedom—how's that for a holiday wish? In the meantime, travel safely. I look forward to hearing from you in 2007.

Read previous columns

Bill McGee, a contributing editor to Consumer Reports and the former editor of Consumer Reports Travel Letter, is an FAA-licensed aircraft dispatcher who worked in airline operations and management for several years. Tell him what you think of his latest column by sending him an e-mail at USATODAY.com at travel@usatoday.com. Include your name, hometown and daytime phone number, and he may use your feedback in a future column.

Owner Of Small Coffee Shop Takes On Java Titan Starbucks (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, December 20, 2006

After coffeehouse owner Penny Stafford sued Starbucks in September, she says she was stunned by hostile and anonymous telephone calls and e-mails. Drop your lawsuit, she was warned. How dare you attack Starbucks?

"It's as if I had insulted apple pie and America," says Stafford, owner of the Belvi Coffee and Tea Exchange in Bellevue, Wash.

In the closely watched federal lawsuit in Seattle that alleges nationwide antitrust violations, Stafford's attorneys portray Starbucks as a predatory monopoly crushing her and other small coffee sellers.

The lawsuit charges that Starbucks illegally maintains its monopoly by barring other coffeehouses from prime downtown high-rises in Seattle and Bellevue through exclusive leases with property owners.

Starbucks also drove Stafford and other coffeehouses out of business by buying coffee sellers and flooding neighborhoods with new Starbucks stores that even cannibalized the sales of existing Starbucks shops, the lawsuit alleges.

"This is wrong, period," Stafford says. "I'm not willing to leave the specialty coffee business because of Starbucks shutting me or anyone else down."

Starbucks spokeswoman Sanja Gould says, "Starbucks denies that we have done anything improper, and we intend to rightfully defend ourselves. As Starbucks has grown, so has the industry, all of which benefits coffee consumers and the competitors of Starbucks."

In a court filing, attorney Thomas Boeder of the Perkins Coie law firm writes: "Starbucks is committed to conducting business in a respectful, ethical and responsible manner in the communities it serves."

While it's early, antitrust experts say the lawsuit could clarify a murky area of the law by defining what a monopoly might be — and what business conduct by a monopoly might be illegal.

The Starbucks case comes amid what Boston attorneys Thane Scott and Veronica Abreu call "antitrust's second golden age." Attorneys are heatedly debating what monopoly practices are predatory. Regulators are weighing whether antitrust law should be upgraded in the new global economy, just as the law was shaped in the early 20th-century industrial economy. And antitrust civil lawsuits are on the rise, reports Competition Law 360, a legal publication.

The lawsuit also increases the controversy around fast-growing Starbucks, the target of a vocal backlash in recent years from neighborhood and anti-globalization activists and some consumers.

DOJ_NMG_0107869

Stafford's lawsuit seeks class-action status. So far, dozens of coffee sellers in Washington, California, Illinois and other states report similar problems with the coffee behemoth, says Stafford's attorney, Steve Berman of Hagens Berman Sobol Shapiro in Seattle. If a federal judge finds that Starbucks is a monopoly that violates the antitrust Sherman Act, his ruling would apply to all Starbucks in the USA, Berman says.

A monopoly itself isn't illegal. But a monopoly cannot willfully acquire or maintain power through predatory acts, such as blocking rivals from a market. Nor can it limit consumers' choices, courts have ruled.

That's why lawyers are eyeing the Starbucks suit, plus a recently argued Supreme Court case in which Ross-Simmons Hardware Lumber accused Weyerhaeuser of pricing rivals out of the market. The cases raise a long-running legal question: What practices by a monopoly are predatory and anti-competitive?

Attorneys say there's no single legal test. Judges offer conflicting guidance, from the Supreme Court's landmark 1911 Standard Oil ruling to a lower court's settlement approval in the vast Microsoft case in 2001.

In antitrust cases such as Starbucks, plaintiffs face long odds, says Stephen Calkins, a Wayne State University law professor and former Federal Trade Commission general counsel. They must show that a firm is a monopoly, then prove that it abuses its power.

Courts typically require plaintiffs to show that a business has more than 40% market share before it might be deemed a monopoly, says Dionne Lomax, a partner at Vinson & Elkins and a former Justice Department attorney.

Already, Starbucks and Belvi are trying to define market share. Belvi Coffee says Starbucks monopolizes 73% of the market for gourmet coffee and espresso drinks in coffeehouses, while Starbucks says it represents "7% of all coffee consumption in the U.S."

If the lawsuit is not dismissed, the ensuing debate in court could raise other crucial antitrust issues:

·Market definition. How should a monopoly and its "market" be defined? By range or type of products sold? By business region? Or, as alleged in the Starbucks lawsuit, by access to leased high-rise space — a narrow, hard-to-prove definition, says law professor Andrew Chin at the University of North Carolina.

·Exclusionary conduct. Are Starbucks' leases with landlords exclusionary vehicles that bar other coffee sellers from the market?

·"No economic sense" test. When does a monopoly cross the line from tough, competitive practices to illegal actions that make no economic sense and serve only to wipe out rivals?

"Courts are all over the map" on issues, says Mark Popofsky, a partner at Kaye Scholer and former Justice Department senior counsel on the Microsoft case.

Starbucks is widely admired by Wall Street and other businesses as a well-run corporation, a mighty marketing machine and, until recently, a highflying stock.

Since its first store opened in 1971 in Seattle, Starbucks has grown to 12,400 outlets worldwide, 115,000 employees and $7.8 billion in revenue in fiscal 2006. The chain hopes to expand to 40,000 outlets, cafes and kiosks worldwide.

Starbucks also has been praised for its social and environmental acts, from donating millions of dollars to charities, to promoting "fair trade" export practices with Third World coffee bean producers.

But Stafford's lawsuit symbolizes the distaste that critics have toward Starbucks. Few retail chains have been the target of such a long-brewing backlash from neighborhood activists, anti-globalization protesters, labor organizers and some consumers and small-business owners. Starbucks has been accused of being a corporate bully whose tactics hurt small businesses, erode the character of local communities and exploit the coffee bean economies of Third World countries.

Starbucks' vast size and "aggressive real estate grabs" clearly alienate some people, says Bryant Simon, a Temple University historian and author of Consuming Starbucks, to be published in 2008.

"By being everywhere, they create markets," Simon says. "But they also narrow the markets and limit opportunities for companies."

The $11 billion U.S. market for specialty coffee keeps growing, with about 23,000 coffeehouses, reports the Specialty Coffee Association of America trade group. Spokesman Mike Ferguson says sales won't peak "until there's an espresso bar in every neighborhood."

Starbucks dominates with a 73% market share of U.S. coffeehouse sales in 2005, says Mintel, a global consumer research firm in Chicago. The coffee king faces scant competition from Caribou Coffee and Peet's Coffee and Tea, its closest rivals.

But Starbucks commands only 43% of the gourmet coffee market if Dunkin' Donuts (27%), Krispy Kreme (5%) and Tim Hortons (2%) are included, says Mintel.

Marcia Mogelonsky, an industry analyst at Mintel, says coffeehouses with loyal customers and strong business strategies "can co-exist with Starbucks." But, she adds, "There's no denying that Starbucks can easily put a lot of independents out of business."

DOJ_NMG_0107870

Owners of small coffeehouses describe Starbucks' impact as "a double-edged sword." They praise it for launching a mass market for specialty coffee and espresso drinks and educating consumers. Starbucks brings consumers to shopping districts, and paves the way for "independent coffeehouses to come in, find a niche and provide higher-quality products," says Joe Mancuso of Caffe D'arte, a Seattle roaster.

Mike Sheldrake, owner of Polly's Gourmet Coffee, says he nearly closed his store in the late 1990s, after two Starbucks opened near him in Long Beach. But Sheldrake retrained his staff, painted his store and added more coffee beans, pastries and other items.

"We understood the battle is never over," says Sheldrake, whose coffeehouse is healthy again with $1 million in annual sales.

But some coffee sellers still lose customers to Starbucks — especially in areas saturated with Starbucks outlets, according to Stafford's lawsuit and a dozen coffeehouse owners interviewed by USA TODAY.

When coffeehouses find their leases up for renewal, some must close or relocate after Starbucks pays property owners two or three times the fair market rental price, say Stafford and other coffee sellers. Stafford, Mancuso and other small coffee sellers also are troubled by Starbucks' exclusive lease deals with landlords.

"Unfortunately, it happens so much here, it's common knowledge," Mancuso says.

These coffee sellers have lost to Starbucks:

·Boston Coffee Exchange. For 25 years, Mort and Bonnie Glovin have run this popular coffee stand in the historic South Station train terminal in Boston.

But the Glovins were stunned when the terminal's property manager, Equity Office Properties, would not renew their lease, which expires Jan. 31. The new tenant? Starbucks, says Mort Glovin.

The Glovins printed T-shirts that read "Don't Throw Us in the Grinder." Two thousand customers signed a petition urging that the coffee stand be allowed to stay. Even Boston Mayor Tom Menino wrote EOP, urging the firm to renew the lease.

"Little guys like us mean nothing," says Mort Glovin, 72, a former food-service manager.

·Reality Coffee. Fifteen years ago, Renee Kappes spent long days selling coffee from a tiny cart in Bellevue. Her hard work paid off. Soon, she owned two thriving Seattle's Best Coffee franchises in Kirkland, Wash., a popular waterfront village.

But after SBC was bought by Starbucks in 2003, Kappes and Starbucks disagreed about the operations and sale of her shops. Kappes says she had a buyer for $500,000. Starbucks offered her half that price, she says. Kappes rejected the offer, and Starbucks signed new leases with property owners. Before her leases ended, Kappes renamed her business Reality Coffee.

"It's just not right, but Starbucks can get away with it," says Kappes.

·Deaf Dog Coffee. Former banker Ron Salisbury moved to Petaluma, north of San Francisco, to start his own coffeehouse in 1994. Deaf Dog Coffee became a hit, and Salisbury opened five local outlets.

Then Starbucks opened six nearby stores and kiosks. Deaf Dog Coffee's $1 million in annual sales dropped 25%. Salisbury sold new drinks, cut costs and made bumper stickers that read "Friends Don't Let Friends Go To Starbucks."

It wasn't enough. Deaf Dog Coffee was hurt even more by downtown construction and winter flooding. Salisbury, 63, couldn't meet his loan and rent payments, and he recently filed for bankruptcy. "Starbucks has left a lot of bodies in their wake," he says.

Penny Stafford, believed to be the first small coffee seller to sue Starbucks on federal antitrust grounds, says she won't cave in. A former commercial real estate agent and mortgage broker, she decided in 2003 to pursue her dream of starting a coffeehouse.

For two years, she hunted for "Class A" retail space in busy high-rises in Seattle and Bellevue. But agents steered her to less desirable sites, according to her lawsuit. When she asked to see better spaces, the agents refused, saying Starbucks had locked up the sites.

"That's when I realized I had a zero chance of getting into one of these locations," Stafford says.

According to the lawsuit, agents told Stafford that Starbucks had signed nationwide exclusive leases with Equity Office Properties and other real estate investment trusts that owned commercial buildings.

Under the leases, the landlords cannot rent to other gourmet coffee sellers, the lawsuit alleges. The agreements also bar landlords from renewing the leases of existing coffee sellers, the lawsuit alleges.

In exchange for exclusivity, Starbucks paid property owners higher-than-market rates, the lawsuit alleges.

Retail tenants typically have "exclusive-use clauses" in their leases that give them the exclusive right to sell products in a building or mall. But Stafford's lawsuit contends that Starbucks' use of exclusive leases is an abuse of monopoly power — which Starbucks denies.

Equity Office Properties spokeswoman Terry Holt declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0107871

In its court filing, Starbucks acknowledges that some of its leases in downtown Seattle and Bellevue "prohibit the landlord from leasing space in the same building to other retail coffee stores."

Last year, Stafford opened Belvi Coffee in a tiny space in a Bellevue high-rise by leasing the espresso machine of a tenant, Johnika's Deli. But Starbucks retaliated by "poaching" her customers, the lawsuit alleges. Employees from a nearby Starbucks outlet repeatedly offered free coffee samples to Stafford's customers seated outside the deli, says Stafford and her lawsuit.

Four months later, Stafford had to close the outlet.

Her lawsuit alleges that Starbucks, which runs 59 stores within a 2-mile radius of downtown Seattle, creates "Starbucks-only zones" that bar rivals. For instance, Starbucks in 2003 bought Seattle's Best Coffee and Torrefazione Italia for $72 million, then closed half of SBC's 22 stores and all five Torrefazione stores.

"Starbucks' game plan is to completely dominate a market by forcing out competition," Berman says. "We also believe that this scorched-earth approach is happening in many other major markets across the U.S."

Starbucks denies the allegations. In their filing, Starbucks' attorneys write: "Since its founding, Starbucks has played an integral role in creating an industry for gourmet coffee in Seattle and beyond. … Starbucks believes there is room for many coffeehouses in the marketplace that meet different customers' needs."

Until the lawsuit is resolved, Stafford is leasing a small spot in a Bellevue office building. So far, she has poured $130,000 into her coffee business. Despite the risks, she says, "I have to do the right thing."

Meanwhile, another Starbucks has just opened a block away.

Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ)

By Bobby White And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson's agreement to buy Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite.

Ericsson, a Swedish provider of equipment and services for telecommunications infrastructure, said it will pay holders of the Silicon Valley seller of routing equipment $25 a share, or 18% more than Redback's share price before the announcement. Ericsson characterized the price as a 60% premium above the 90-day average for Redback stock.

The companies said the deal will make them more effective suppliers for the fast-moving market. It also could help Redback contend with larger competitors such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Juniper Networks Inc.

"Some companies were reluctant to use our technology because of Redback's size," said Paul Giordano, chairman of Redback's board and chief executive of Tamalpais Asset Management, a hedge fund that is an investor in the company. "Redback can compete in a much stronger way now."

Redback was forced to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in 2003, after an expansion during the telecom boom left the company saddled with debt. It slashed costs, cut nearly 1,000 employees and invested millions of dollars on new technology.

At one point, the stock traded for less than $1. In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, before the deal was announced, the stock traded at $21.17, up 45 cents. In after-hours trading the shares were up $3.63, or 17%, to $24.80.

Kevin Denuccio, Redback's chief executive, said his company had been in talks with Ericsson off and on for months but discussions grew more intense in mid-November. He said Redback was interested in being acquired, hoping "to marry the size, reach and resources of Ericsson with Silicon Valley culture and expertise."

Ericsson, with a market value of $65 billion, is Europe's largest telecom-equipment maker. Its acquisition last year of most of the assets of Marconi PLC set off a wave of consolidation in the industry, which included the proposed combination of the networks divisions of Nokia Corp. and Siemens AG, as well as last month's purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by Alcatel SA of France to form Alcatel Lucent.

Marconi's technology, designed to help telecom carriers handle big increases in data traffic, gave Ericsson a foothold in the networks of Marconi's existing customers, which were concentrated in the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany. The Redback deal could further improve Ericsson's ability to sell to U.S. carriers rolling out Internet television services.

"There's a scramble right now between Ericsson and Cisco to become the alternative to Alcatel in Internet television," said Inder Singh, telecom analyst at Prudential Equity Group. He thinks Ericsson could still be in the market for high-speed optical devices that collect and send signals to hundreds of homes.

Redback, of San Jose, Calif., will retain its management team and will operate as a business unit of Ericsson. The deal is expected to close by early 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0107872

Valassis Strikes Deal With Advo To Acquire Firm For $1.05 Billion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

NEW YORK -- Valassis Communications Inc. agreed to acquire direct-mail marketer Advo Inc. for a reduced amount as the companies dropped lawsuits against each other over their disputed merger agreement.

Valassis will pay $33 a share for Advo, or about $1.05 billion, down from $37 a share, or $1.18 billion, under an agreement reached in July. Valassis also will assume about $125 million in debt.

Less than two months after the companies first struck a deal, Valassis sued to end it, saying Advo, of Windsor, Conn., hid its financial problems to clinch an acquisition, and its business had eroded so much it was no longer the same company Valassis agreed to buy. Advo denied the claims and countersued to push through the deal.

"We are pleased to have reached this amended agreement with Advo and put the litigation behind us," said Alan Schultz, chief executive of Valassis, a Livonia, Mich., marketing company.

The settlement comes after a week of testimony from Valassis executives and other witnesses. The trial was adjourned Monday as the companies discussed the potential settlement.

Valassis also agreed evidence doesn't support claims Advo engaged in fraud or misconduct in connection with the initial merger agreement.

The renegotiated merger requires approval from Advo shareholders, and is expected to close during the first quarter.

Valassis shares yesterday rose 4.3%, or 62 cents, to $14.90 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading, while Advo shares fell 40 cents, or 1.2%, to $32.60 on the Big Board.

AT&T/BellSouth Merger Faces Onerous Conditions (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington And Paul Taylor In New,york

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

AT&T's $68bn takeover of BellSouth will face a tough political climate in Washington in 2007 when Democrats take control of the Congress, virtually ensuring that the former Ma Bell will have to agree to harsher conditions.

The possibility that the telecoms mega-merger would be approved by the Federal Communications Commission before the end of this year appeared to disintegrate on Monday after Robert McDowell, a Republican commissioner at the FCC, said he would abstain from deadlocked negotiations over the transaction at the regulatory agency.

The decision marks the beginning of what is likely to be a difficult period for Kevin Martin, FCC chairman and a savvy political operator who has, until now, faced few serious hurdles on his agenda. Among other issues, Mr Martin will probably be forced to defend the FCC's future decision on the AT&T deal and separate deliberations on media ownership limits before Democratic lawmakers next year.

With Mr McDowell out of the game, AT&T will be forced to succumb to at least some of the demands of the FCC's two Democratic commissioners, who are expected to have the backing of the new Democratic majority in the Congress on issues ranging from net neutrality to "special access" price freezes, coveringcompetitors' access to its network.

"There seems little doubt that McDowell's move strengthens the Democrat's hand and, while AT&T has been complaining of 'moving goalposts' in their negotiations, the goalposts look set possibly to move again on the topics ... where talks appear to have stalled," noted David Barden, a Bank of America analyst.

Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union, a public advocacy group, said AT&T had held out on agreeing to some concessions so far because it had made a miscalculation that Mr McDowell would weigh in on the stalled talks.

AT&T yesterday said it had sought support from every member of the FCC since "the very beginning".

Analysts believe the Democrats are insisting on special access price freezes that exceed 30 months - something AT&T might be willing to accept - and an arbitration process governing wholesale price disputes, which they believe AT&T opposes if it relates to AT&T specifically.

Judge Bars Business Operations Merger Pending Media Trial (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - A federal judge on Tuesday blocked San Francisco Bay area newspapers owned by MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle from consolidating some of their business operations until the outcome of an antitrust lawsuit challenging the move.

U.S. District Judge Susan Illston had temporarily barred the consolidation of distribution and national advertising sales. She made her ruling official on Tuesday after giving the news outlets a chance to respond. The organizations said two weeks ago they would not immediately merge operations, but they planned to do so if they prevailed in the antitrust trial scheduled for April.

DOJ_NMG_0107873

"The court does not doubt the sincerity of defendants' representations. However, the court is concerned that denying the preliminary injunction may leave defendants unsure of whether they are free to immediately pursue such agreements," Illston ruled.

New York-based Hearst Corp., the Chronicle's publisher, has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives Denver-based MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers - on top of the seven it already owns, including the Oakland Tribune. Hearst's investment helped finance the purchase of Hearst rivals the Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly is trying to undo the sales as part of a federal antitrust lawsuit. The suit claims the deal, among other things, gives the outlets a monopoly on readership and advertising sales.

The news outlets maintain the deal is not anticompetitive, and said they would prove that at trial.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Judge Bars MediaNews, Hearst Talks On Collaboration (MERCN)

By Pete Carey

The San Jose Mercury News, December 20, 2006

A federal judge issued an order Tuesday barring Hearst and MediaNews from collaborating on national advertising and distribution with their Bay Area newspapers until an antitrust lawsuit is concluded.

The order, by U.S. District Court Judge Susan Illston, granted the preliminary injunction sought by Clint Reilly, a San Francisco investor who has filed an antitrust lawsuit to prevent MediaNews from buying the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times.

Reilly contends that the purchase, which was assisted by Hearst, owner of the San Francisco Chronicle, would give MediaNews a Bay Area news and advertising monopoly. The newspaper company says it is beset by competition from the Internet and online advertising, and by declining circulation. Denver-based MediaNews owns seven other Bay Area papers, including the Oakland Tribune, Hayward Daily Review and Marin Independent Journal.

Hearst and MediaNews said in court filings opposing the injunction as unnecessary that despite an April 26 letter between Hearst and MediaNews executives outlining proposed areas of future collaboration, they have no intention of combining either distribution or national advertising at this time.

Illston's two-page order said she is granting the injunction -- which lasts until a trial is held -- to avoid any confusion that might have followed if she had denied Reilly's request. In an earlier order, she characterized the collaboration discussed in the April 26 letter agreement as ``a significant threat'' of anti-competitive behavior. A trial is scheduled for April.

``The notion that they have no intention of doing it anyway is something she is not accepting," Reilly's lawyer, Joseph Alioto, said, referring to Illston.

Calls to an attorney for Hearst were not returned.

MediaNews, Hearst Agreement On Ad Sales Blocked (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, December 20, 2006

Dec. 19 (Bloomberg) -- A federal judge blocked MediaNews Group Inc. and Hearst Corp. from jointly selling advertising in three northern California newspapers until after an antitrust trial next year.

U.S. District Judge Susan Illston in San Francisco today extended her Nov. 28 order halting a plan to collaborate on national ad sales and distribution. MediaNews and Hearst are accused in a lawsuit of forming a monopoly of newspapers in the San Francisco Bay area. Last month, Illston said the companies' agreement to jointly sell ads might violate antitrust laws and should be put off pending the outcome of the trial.

MediaNews and Hearst agreed in April to try to boost revenue by offering one contract to advertise in the San Francisco Chronicle, owned by Hearst, and the Contra Costa Times and the San Jose Mercury News, both owned by MediaNews. Lawyers for both companies told Illston last month that implementation of the plan wasn't imminent.

Illston said she sought ``to leave no confusion'' as to her expectation ``that defendants will comply with their stated intent not to pursue any of the agreements at issue."

``The order is consistent with the representations made in the papers we recently filed in court," Paul Luthringer, a spokesman for New York-based Hearst, said in an e-mail. Joseph Lodovic, president of Denver-based MediaNews, didn't return messages seeking comment. Both companies are closely held.

McClatchy Deal

MediaNews acquired the Mercury News and Contra Costa Times, the No. 2 and No. 3 Bay-area papers, from McClatchy Co. in August. The $1 billion deal included at least $263 million from New York-based Hearst, whose Chronicle is the area's largest paper.

San Francisco real estate investor Clint Reilly has claimed in a lawsuit that the deal will create a monopoly, reducing choices for readers and advertisers. He is seeking a court order to undo the transaction.

At a Nov. 22 hearing, Reilly's lawyers told Illston that the national advertising agreement is evidence of price-fixing. Lawyers for MediaNews and Hearst said such agreements were legal, commonplace and necessary for both companies to beef up sagging revenue.

The case is Clinton Reilly v MediaNews Group, 06-04332, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Phone Firms Await FCC On Cable Ruling (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Telephone companies could get a major boost today in their efforts to penetrate the cable television market when the Federal Communications Commission considers a measure that would give state and local officials less latitude in awarding cable franchises.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a leading advocate of the rule, has argued that government officials often stymie competition by delaying decisions on awarding cable franchises to telephone companies and by imposing exorbitant fees and conditions. As a result, cable operators often have been able to maintain a virtual monopoly on television services, resulting in steadily increasing prices for consumers, according to Martin. He cited an FCC survey

"Telephone companies are investing billions of dollars to upgrade their networks to provide video," Martin said in a speech two weeks ago. "As the telephone companies and others began actively seeking to enter video markets in late 2004 and 2005, however, we began to hear from some providers that local authorities were making the process of getting franchises unreasonably difficult."

Though the draft proposal will not be made public until today, it has already drawn sharp criticism from cable companies -- which argue that it would unfairly penalize them -- and local and state officials, who balk at efforts to curtail their authority in awarding franchises.

FCC officials said the measure's key provisions reflect proposals that Martin outlined in his remarks to the Phoenix Center, a research group, including specific deadlines for officials to decide on franchise requests. He said that state and local officials should be required to rule on applications within 90 days if the companies applying already have access to the required rights of way. Telephone companies such as Verizon Communications and AT&T, which stand to benefit most from the measure, often have such access for their fiber-optic lines.

Martin also urged that limits be placed on what local officials can demand from applicants in return for franchises. Local officials now can impose fees amounting to no more than 5 percent of cable revenues, but they often also demand that companies make other public improvements, such as wiring government buildings for broadband and even building a public swimming pool.

Finally, Martin has raised concerns about "build-out" requirements, which force telephone companies and other new providers to offer TV service to everyone within a given geographic area as a condition for winning a franchise. An FCC official said some of those demands are unreasonable because the companies are asked to carry them out too quickly.

"There have been abuses of the franchising process that make consumers wait longer than they should," said David M. Fish, a Verizon spokesman.

Fish said Verizon is spending $18 billion to build a fiber-optic network capable of providing video. But he said the company often must wait 18 to 22 months to receive local franchise approval after filing an application, slowing its bid to gain 3,000 franchises across the country in the coming years.

Verizon now has about 200 franchises for providing video. In the Washington area, the company has approval to offer television service in five Northern Virginia counties, four counties in the Maryland suburbs and more than 10 area cities, though not the District.

While cable operators say they share the aim of streamlining the review process, they accuse the FCC of offering new providers, especially telephone companies, an unfair advantage by freeing them from some conditions imposed on incumbents.

"The proposals we keep hearing about at the commission appear not to represent a level playing field," said Kyle E. McSlarrow, president of the National Cable and Telecommunications Association. Speaking to reporters yesterday, he urged the FCC to pare back the proposed measure.

Local and state officials, meanwhile, have accused the FCC of overstepping its legal rights.

DOJ_NMG_0107875

"Franchising authority is a local one," said Carolyn Coleman, director of federal relations for the National League of Cities. "We want to see no more preemption of local government rights in this area." She said the FCC lacked the authority required to address franchising issues.

Congress entered the debate this year over video franchising. But while the House approved rules to streamline the process, the measure did not come up for a vote in the Senate.

Verizon and other phone companies have lobbied for new rules both at the federal and state levels. At least eight states have adopted measures designed to ensure that local officials follow consistent standards when evaluating applications.

Martin has referred to FCC statistics showing that cable rates increased 93 percent from 1995 to 2005. He said the commission's annual price survey, scheduled for release today, also found that cable rates were lower in areas where there was competition between at least two providers.

McSlarrow said those figures were deceptive because they rely on old data and only a portion of the cable market. Moreover, he said, many consumers now buy cable as part of a bundle that includes broadband Internet service and voice communications, and the price of such bundles has declined 25 percent since the mid-1990s.

"The bottom line is that value and price have only gotten better for our customers and that is a much sounder basis for policy proposals than outdated and manipulated statistics," he said.

Legal View: M&A Makeover Makes Good Sense (FT)

By Kenneth Chan

Financial Times, December 20, 2006

The merger and acquisition provisions enacted jointly by China's Ministry of Commerce and other ministries in 2003 were overhauled in August this year. The new provisions, which came into effect on September 8, represent a significant upgrade.

The added involvement of the securities regulator and state-owned asset watchdog in its enactment is expected to facilitate wider acceptance within the government and enhance the effective implementation of the new provisions.

Important changes were made in a number of areas, in recognition of the growing importance of China's private enterprises, the increased international mobility of Chinese entrepreneurs and the significant role they are playing in foreigners' M&A activities.

Previous obstacles to the continuing participation of these entrepreneurs in target companies post-acquisition have largely been removed.

However, a system has also been put in place to regulate entrepreneurs' investment overseas and subsequent "round-trip investments" back into China and to neutralise the implications that a change in their nationality may have on the legal characterisation of their domestic businesses.

The prospect of using foreign shares for investment in Chinese companies was an eye-catching feature in the 2003 provisions that was never realised. The role of foreign shares as a recognised form of investment has now been defined.

While their much narrower application – largely confined to two scenarios that are both foreign listing-related – is a disappointment to many, the clearer and more detailed regime that has now been put in place for its implementation is nonetheless a welcome development.

Foreign acquirers and their Chinese targets are also required to disclose more information on relationships between the parties involved and the basis for determining the purchase price. This is to enable regulators to ask relevant questions and spot potentially problematic acquisitions more easily.

While no change or further elaboration has been made to the original anti-trust filing provisions – largely because the long-awaited anti-trust law is still being debated – new criteria for barring foreign acquisitions in the name of protecting key industries, national economic security, famous trademarks and famous Chinese trade names have been introduced in addition to the existing market concentration and anti-competition rules.

Clarifications were made on the interaction of the provisions with legislation on protecting state-owned assets, securities listing and foreign exchange and on the continuing applicability of the 25 per cent minimum foreign ownership rule for recognising enterprises as foreign invested.

It is a useful reminder that the provisions do not constitute all-encompassing legislation on M&A by Chinese enterprises, that existing legislation has a role to play in the process and that new problems will no doubt arise on the consistency of the various regulatory systems and the need for these systems to continue to adapt to one another.

The overhaul of the provisions addresses certain pressing issues arising from the increased sophistication of China's economy and the type of foreign capital it is now attracting and highlights possible directions for further upgrading of the provisions in the future.

All these are further food for thought for foreign investors planning China acquisitions.

DOJ_NMG_0107876

Kenneth Chan heads Allen & Overy's China group as a partner in its Hong Kong office.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Critics Call EPA's New Rule A Loophole For Big Business (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

The Christian Science Monitor, December 20, 2006

In a bid to trim the regulatory burden on small businesses, the Environmental Protection Agency is set to relax the rules on what toxic chemicals they have to report.

But in a twist, the EPA's newly revised Toxics Release Inventory rule will also make it possible for hundreds of large corporations to avoid reporting specific amounts of toxic chemicals they release into the air, land, or water, environmentalists warn.

The rule change has cheered small-business groups, generated widespread public opposition, and caught the eye of some Democratic congressmen, who will take control of Congress next month. It takes effect immediately.

The change affects companies that release relatively small amounts of toxic materials but still have to report them to the federal Toxics Release Inventory.

Under current TRI rules, companies have to report emissions of any toxic chemical that exceed 500 pounds in a year. Under the new rules, facilities could fill out a simpler form that omits reporting the amount of toxic chemicals if they created less than 5,000 pounds of it in a year and released no more than 2,000 pounds of it into the environment.

But the move makes it harder for neighborhoods or environmentalists to find out how much of a toxic chemical, such as toluene, a nearby factory is emitting. Researchers have linked toluene, used to make dyes and as a solvent, to various health problems. Similar streamlined reporting could be applied to another class of even more dangerous toxins if the waste was less than 500 pounds, entirely recycled, and not released at all.

Such limits spur business to reduce their toxic waste, federal officials contend. "EPA is delivering a cleaner, healthier nation by encouraging businesses to make environmental improvements now and in the future," Marcus Peacock, deputy EPA administrator said at a press conference to announce the new rule Monday.

EPA officials say the new TRI would save $6 million annually in unnecessary paperwork. Business groups back the measure.

"This move by the EPA will primarily assist small businesses that already release little or nothing into the environment at all from being overburdened with regulatory filings," says Andrew Langer, manager of regulatory policy for the National Federation of Independent Business, a Washington trade group.

But critics say the move seems to be an effort to weaken a reporting law that has empowered community activists with details about some 650 industrial chemicals that the TRI tracks. While TRI does not require emission controls, activists have used data to embarrass companies into cutting emissions.

"Americans who live near industrial facilities want to know what's going into their air and water," Rep. Frank Pallone Jr. (D) of New Jersey said during a recent teleconference with reporters.

The EPA move, which Mr. Pallone called a "terrible decision," could herald a wider battle with a new Democrat-controlled Congress with more intense oversight hearings examining EPA rulemaking in the new year, observers say. Legislation Pallone brought last year to cut funding for the TRI revision may be resurrected to block its implementation.

Of 24,000 facilities currently reporting TRI data, about one-third could be eligible to fill out a short form that simply lists the chemical, they said.

But one largely hidden element of the rule change is that big companies are among the largest beneficiaries, says Tom Natan, of the National Environmental Trust, a Washington environmental group.

"The idea that this change is meant to benefit small independent business is just not true," he says. "When they first issued the proposal last year, EPA was saying it's mom and pop businesses this will help, but it turns out it's really General Motors, Sunoco, and companies like that."

While thousands of facilities will see major reductions in their paperwork, Dr. Natan is most concerned about the 3,600 facilities, about 15 percent of the total, that his analysis shows will no longer have to report any emissions details at all. Many such facilities, which emit thousands of pounds of toxins, are operated by some of the nation's largest companies.

An Ashland Distribution Co. facility, located in Birmingham, Ala., a division of the Fortune 500 giant Ashland Inc., released seven toxic chemicals totaling 4,405 pounds in 2004, according to the most recent TRI data. But because each chemical is below the new 2,000-pound threshold, the facility may no longer have to report any data on amounts and types of releases, Natan says. It also leaves room for emissions to rise without data being made public, he adds.

DOJ_NMG_0107877

Similarly, one of Chevron's Honolulu marine terminals emitted 1,328 pounds of seven chemicals in 2004, including 580 pounds of the n-hexane, a potent toxin. But under the new TRI, that facility won't have to report such details in the future.

Both companies are taking a wait-and-see attitude.

"We're going to look at this change, but in the meantime continue to remain compliant with all federal regulations," says Ken Gordon, an Ashland spokesman. "It may help us a little bit to fill out the shorter form - save us some time - and that's what EPA had in mind. It wants companies to save time and still be protective of public health. The public is still getting their right to know what chemicals are being used."

"Right now we file the long form and it is our intent to continue that practice until the new TRI proposals are fully vetted," says Albert Chee, a Chevron spokesman. "If there's some reason to change our reporting practices, then changes will be made. But right now, we'll continue to follow our historical practice."

EPA found broad public discontent after it proposed its rule. More than 99 percent of the roughly 120,000 respondents during the public comment period opposed it, according to OMB Watch, a budget watchdog in Washington, D.C.

"It's outrageous that you want to make it easier for businesses to avoid public scrutiny of their releases," Carolyn Boatsman of Mercer Island, Wash., wrote the EPA in 2005. "It has been unequivocally documented that having to publish releases has shamed businesses into drastically reducing their output. We need that motivation."

Pollution Nets A $37-million Penalty (LAT)

By Elizabeth Mehren And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 20, 2006

Overseas Shipholding must pay the record fine for dumping oil waste into the ocean.

BOSTON — Capping a three-year international investigation, federal officials on Tuesday announced a landmark, $37-million penalty in a maritime pollution case involving one of the world's largest publicly traded tanker companies.

The fine against Overseas Shipholding Group Inc., a U.S. corporation based in New York, is the largest criminal penalty on record concerning deliberate maritime pollution, and it includes a $9.2-million "community service payment" that will fund maritime environmental projects from coast to coast, including projects off California.

Overseas Shipholding pleaded guilty to 33 felony counts related to deliberate dumping of sludge and other contaminants as well as falsification of log entries that such carriers are required to maintain.

All of the vessels involved were oil tankers, including the Cabo Hellas, whose captain pleaded guilty this year in Los Angeles to obstructing a Coast Guard investigation of dumping oil into the ocean.

"To those who cut corners at OSG, discharging waste in the middle of the night to save a few bucks, this case sends a message that crime just does not pay," said acting Associate Atty. Gen. William Mercer, at a news conference Tuesday beside the Boston waterfront. "We will not see our oceans and our seas used as convenient dumping grounds for corporations."

Charging that Overseas Shipholding "engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," Mercer added: "What is more disturbing is that OSG's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management on several occasions, and again after the initiation of the government's investigation."

Morten Amtzen, Overseas Shipholding's president and chief executive, said in a statement Tuesday that his company had "worked hard to correct the issues that resulted" in the judgment.

The prosecution concerns violations on 12 oil tankers in six U.S. ports on both coasts and the Gulf of Mexico. Officials in Boston, San Francisco, Los Angeles, North Carolina and Texas participated in an inquiry that began in 2003 when Canadian authorities looked into a routine report of spillage in New Brunswick, off the country's eastern coast.

Capt. William Nash, director general of maritime safety for Transport Canada — the government agency responsible for enforcing Canada's maritime pollution laws — said Tuesday that officials boarded an Overseas Shipholding vessel to examine the ship's records.

"They realized there had been some inappropriate entries in the logbook," Nash said. The Canadians passed the information on to U.S. authorities.

Mercer said U.S. investigators found that Overseas Shipholding vessels were dumping "hundreds of thousands of pounds" of contaminants into marine waters. Court documents said the toxins included "machinery space bilge water and/or bilge slops, oily wastes and oil residues … in a manner that intentionally circumvented required pollution prevention."

Mercer said the company's personnel altered ship log books in what he called "a conspiracy to hide the crimes from the Coast Guard."

DOJ_NMG_0107878

Thomas S. Rue, a lawyer with a large maritime practice in Mobile, Ala., said: "I am personally aware that ship owners are undertaking action to prevent this kind of practice, but that is coming from the top.

"If some third engineer wants to dump something off the deck in the middle of the night, there's not much they can do to stop it," Rue said.

Rodolfo Esplana Rey, captain of the Cabo Hellas, admitted in Los Angeles that he had failed to maintain proper records about oil dumping from the 750-foot vessel and that he had made false statements that oily bilge waste had been correctly treated. In September, Rey was sentenced to one year of probation.

A portion of the settlement is expected to aid environmental causes along California's Central Coast and at Channel Islands National Park.

But Mercer said the full extent of actual or potential environmental damage was impossible to calculate.

He said the contamination undoubtedly would produce "significant effects in terms of bird life and other ocean life."

Prior to Tuesday's announcement, the largest federal fine levied in a similar ocean vessel case occurred last year in Los Angeles, when Evergreen International, another of the world's largest shipping lines, agreed to pay $25 million for secretly dumping oil waste into the ocean rather than bringing it ashore for disposal.

*

elizabeth.mehren@latimes.com
greg.krikorian@latimes.com
Mehren reported from Boston and Krikorian from Los Angeles.

Shipping Company Fined $37M For Dumping (AP)

By Rodrique Ngowi, Associated Press Writer
AP, December 20, 2006
Overseas Shipholding Fined a Record $37M for Dumping Waste Oil Along East Coast

BOSTON (AP) -- Oil tanker and bulk shipping company Overseas Shipholding Group Inc. will pay a record fine of $37 million after pleading guilty to illegally dumping waste oil and falsifying pollution logs in six U.S. ports, federal officials said Tuesday.

The company agreed to plead guilty to 33 felony counts stemming from dumping violations from nine ships and for log violations for three other ships in Boston; Portland, Maine; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Wilmington, N.C.; and Beaumont, Texas, federal officials said.

The penalty includes a $27.8 million criminal fine which will be divided among the districts and a $9.2 million community service payment to fund various marine environmental projects.

The criminal penalty is the largest-ever involving deliberate vessel pollution, the U.S. Coast Guard said.

Shares of New York-based Overseas Shipholding closed unchanged at $59.05 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The Department of Justice and the U.S. Coast Guard opened their investigation after a tip from Canadian officials, who reported that official records of one of the company's ships failed to account for the disposal of oil waste. An investigation showed 150,000 gallons of oil-contaminated waste was dumped in the waters between Maine and Massachusetts, officials said.

Overseas Shipholding, one of the largest publicly traded tanker firms in the world, "has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," Acting Associated Attorney General William Mercer said in a release.

The company's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management several times and again after the government started its investigation, Mercer said.

"This penalty ... will serve as a deterrent for all other companies who attempt to circumvent the law for their own financial gain at the expense of the environment," he said.

Company officials did not immediately return a call for comment left at its New York headquarters.

Under the terms of the guilty plea, the company agreed to a three-year probation during which it must implement and follow a stringent environmental control program that includes a court-appointed monitor and outside independent auditing of its ships trading worldwide.

The company also admitted in a court record that its "motive for the crimes was financial." "OSG was saving the cost of offloading waste oil in port and the time it would take to comply with the law," according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Oil Tanker Giant To Pay Hefty Fine (WT)

By Jerry Seper
The Washington Times, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107879

The world's second-largest publicly traded oil tanker company yesterday agreed to plead guilty to 33 felony counts for deliberately polluting six U.S. ports and making false pollution log entries.

In what the Justice Department called the largest criminal penalty involving deliberate vessel pollution, Overseas Shipholding Group Inc. (OSG) will pay the government $37 million and plead guilty to the illegal dumping of waste oil, violations of the Clean Water and Oil Pollution acts, conspiracy, making false statements and obstruction of justice.

"OSG has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer said. "What is more disturbing is that OSG's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management on several occasions and again after the initiation of the government's investigation."

Rear Adm. Tim Sullivan, commander of the First U.S. Coast Guard District, said the service is committed to achieving industrywide compliance with international and domestic pollution prevention rules.

"The case demonstrates that scofflaws within maritime industry can no longer treat intentional discharging of oil and the penalties associated with those acts as a 'cost of doing business.' Instead, the industry must embrace a culture of compliance," he said.

New York-based OSG, which has 4,000 employees, transports crude oil, petroleum products and dry bulk commodities throughout the world. The company owns an international fleet of 106 operating vessels and has 30 under construction. The guilty plea involves 12 of its ships.

The ports where the pollution occurred were identified as Boston; Portland, Maine; Los Angeles; San Francisco; Wilmington, N.C.; and Beaumont, Texas.

The $37 million penalty consists of a $27.8 million criminal fine, which will be divided among the port districts, and a $9.2 million organizational community service payment that will fund marine environmental projects coast to coast.

According to a statement of facts filed by the Justice Department in the plea agreement, OSG admitted that it:

· Made illegal releases of oily waste from August 2001 to October 2003 into waters off the coast of New England, in proximity to Maine and Massachusetts, including the island of Nantucket.

· Was responsible for dumping sludge, including 40,600 gallons dumped overboard by one ship.

· Violated the Clean Water Act by discharging 2,640 gallons of oily waste and sludge off the coast of North Carolina, and made false statements about it.

· Made illegal discharges of oily waste in 2004 and 2005 in the Gulf of Mexico.

· Concealed the illegal discharges by falsifying official ship records, making discharges at night and hiding bypass equipment during U.S. port calls so the Coast Guard would not discover the criminal activity.

The company also said numerous high-ranking crew members engaged in conspiracies to commit illegal pollution and falsify ship records while lower-level crew participated because they were explicitly or implicitly threatened with loss of employment if they refused.

The Justice Department said the motive for the crimes was financial, adding that OSG "was saving the cost of offloading waste oil in port and the time it would take to comply with the law."

Shipping Firm Fined $37M For Sludge (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — A New York shipping company agreed Tuesday to pay a record $37 million fine and plead guilty to 33 felony charges for discharging sludge and other polluted waste into ocean waters from the New England coast to the Gulf of Mexico.

The settlement concludes a three-year federal investigation into activities aboard 12 tankers operated by Overseas Shipholding Group, the Justice Department said in a statement, adding that the fine was the largest ever levied in a vessel pollution case.

"OSG has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer said in a statement.

"What is more disturbing is that OSG's management failed to uncover or stop this illegal activity after allegations were brought to the attention of management on several occasions and again after the initiation of the government's investigation," Mercer said.

In one instance described in government documents, an unidentified engineer aboard the M/T Overseas Shirley alerted managers to the "criminal" dumping of an estimated 40,600 gallons of sludge, or concentrated black waste oil.

In another case, the government cited the tanker M/T Uranus for routinely releasing "oily waste" into the waters off Maine and Massachusetts from August 2001 to October 2003.

"We are pleased to bring closure to this investigation and believe our cooperation with the government was vital to today's announcement," Morten Arntzen, OSG's president and chief executive officer, said in a statement.

"Our internal processes enabled us to self-report information to the government about certain violations. We did so not only because it was the right thing to do but because it is consistent with the company's core values of integrity and transparency."

Seagoing Polluter Punished: Oil Dumper Will Pay $37M Fine (BOSH)

By Jay Fitzgerald

Boston Herald, December 20, 2006

A New York shipping company has admitted criminal guilt and agreed to pay a record $37 million in fines for illegally dumping waste oil from ships off the coast of Massachusetts, Maine and elsewhere, the U.S Department of Justice announced yesterday.

The New York-based Overseas Shipholding Group Inc., described as one of the world's largest publicly traded tanker companies, agreed to 33 felony counts related to routinely discharging pollutants off of ships into the oceans, the feds said in a statement.

"OSG has engaged in repeated and deliberate pollution of our oceans," said Acting Associate Attorney General William Mercer.

The multi-state investigation was launched in Boston after Canadian officials tipped off local Coast Guard authorities that records for one of OSG's ships showed bilge waste was being disposed into the sea - even though other records indicated the ship was complying with environmental laws.

"We are pleased to bring closure to this investigation and believe our cooperation with the government was vital to today's announcement," said OSG chief executive Morten Amtzen.

Under the terms of the guilty plea, OSG agreed to a three-year probation during which it must implement and follow a stringent environmental control program.

The company also admitted in a court record that its "motive for the crimes was financial."

"OSG was saving the cost of offloading waste oil in port and the time it would take to comply with the law," according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

The $37 million fine is the largest-ever criminal penalty involving deliberate vessel pollution, according to the U.S. Coast Guard.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Accused Drug Kingpin Faces New Charges (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

SAN DIEGO (AP) -- The suspected kingpin of one of Mexico's oldest and most notorious drug cartels ordered the murder of Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three police officers, according to a federal indictment unsealed Tuesday.

Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, would be eligible for the death penalty if convicted on a count of running a criminal enterprise, part of the new seven-count indictment. The killings were included as evidence of the criminal enterprise that authorities say extended into the United States.

That charge was not part of a 2003 indictment that led to his arrest in August by the U.S. Coast Guard in international waters near La Paz, Mexico.

The new indictment alleges Arellano Felix ordered the murder of Hugo Gabriel Coronel Vargas, Tijuana's deputy police chief, who died Jan. 17, 2005, in a hail of more than 60 shots from an automatic rifle.

The indictment also charges that Arellano Felix and a man authorities consider his underling, Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, ordered the June 20 beheadings of three police officers from Rosarito Beach, a spring break spot just south of the border from San Diego.

Arellano Felix and Villarreal were to appear in federal court Wednesday on charges of running a criminal enterprise, racketeering and conspiracy to commit racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering.

Villarreal, 31, had not been charged with any crimes since his capture alongside Arellano Felix but also would be eligible for the death penalty if convicted of running a criminal enterprise. He was initially held as a material witness and has been in solitary confinement amid extradition proceedings to Mexico.

Arellano Felix is being held in San Diego without bail. He has pleaded not guilty to drug trafficking, money laundering and conspiracy charges from the earlier indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0107881

Officials at Mexico's Foreign Relations Department and attorney general's office said Tuesday they had no immediate response to the charges. David Bartick, an attorney for Arellano Felix, declined comment.

Eugene Iredale, an attorney for Villarreal, said his client would plead not guilty. He said any crimes alleged to have occurred in Mexico should be tried in Mexico, not the United States.

Laura Duffy, a federal prosecutor in San Diego, said the men can be tried in the United States because they directed operations on U.S. soil.

The indictment alleges the men ordered the kidnapping, torture and murder of rivals in the United States as well as Mexico. It also says they smuggled cocaine and marijuana across the border in trucks and boats.

The Arellano Felix cartel emerged as a drug powerhouse in the 1980s in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego, but its influence has waned.

Associated Press writer Ioan Grillo contributed to this report from Mexico City.

Legal Affairs More Pot Busts Taking Place In Suburban Areas (ATC)

By Tamara Keith

NPR's All Things Considered, December 19, 2006

"BC Bud" is the name of a high-grade marijuana strain grown in British Columbia. Much of it is grown indoors, in warehouses and increasingly in homes. Now federal agents in California have busted a marijuana-growing ring that seems to be taking a page from the BC Bud handbook by growing their lucrative crop in suburban homes.

Federal agents in California say the pot farms they raided have all the markings of organized crime. The farms were found in unexpected places, many of them at suburban homes near Sacramento.

On a quiet street in suburban Elk Grove, an orange tag marks a two-story home. Detectives found several hundred marijuana plants at the house. Richard Maynard, who lives next door, says he really didn't know what his neighbors were up to.

"We never saw them," Maynard says. "They'd show up in the middle of the night, about 1 o'clock, with a moving van occasionally, not very often. They'd say hi if they showed up in the middle of the day, which was once a month maybe. They were just very quiet."

But inside the home was a marijuana factory, designed to create the greatest yields. Gordon Taylor is the Assistant Special Agent in Charge of the DEA office in Sacramento.

"This is not the hippy growing marijuana in his closet from back in the 1970s," Taylor says. "This is not Cheech and Chong."

Taylor says the plants seized from 41 homes linked to the case were capable of producing $74 million worth of pot in a year. Eight people have been arrested. They're all in their 20s, have Chinese surnames and San Francisco Bay Area addresses. Taylor says he believes this reaches beyond those already under arrest.

"What we're seeing here is very organized and extremely sophisticated in terms of the operation inside the homes," Taylor says. "And then just the purchase of the homes. You couple all that together, and you see it has all the markings of an Asian organized criminal group."

The details were the same with nearly all the recent pot busts in Sacramento-area homes. They were large, costing about half a million dollars, and usually in newer subdivisions. They were bought with 100-percent financing, no cash down -- not an uncommon practice in California's real estate market.

The homes were then gutted and "remodeled" to grow pot. Windows were covered and electricity was pirated to avoid the meter. Lights and insulation were brought in along with drip watering systems.

Law enforcement officials say it's not an isolated problem. Seizures of indoor marijuana plants in California are up 81 percent this year.

There are likely many more marijuana growing rings like this one, that just haven't been discovered yet, says Kent Shaw, Assistant Chief of the California Department of Justice Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement. He says large-scale pot operations hidden behind stucco walls and picket fences have proven to be cash machines. The quality is better than outdoor marijuana varieties and can be harvested year round, rather than just once.

"If it's fairly high grade," Shaw says, the pot can net "anywhere from $3,500 to $6,000 a pound. For a minimal amount of investment, if you have a decent amount of square footage in a residence to grow it, there's a lot of return that's going to come back on your initial investment."

And that might explain why narcotics investigators are seeing more criminal organizations move into the marijuana business. Shaw says where once they may have dealt only in methamphetamine, cocaine or heroin, some groups now see marijuana as a low-risk high-profit alternative.

DOJ_NMG_0107882

From member station KQED, Tamara Keith reports.

Palm Desert Tells Marijuana Dispensary To Cease And Desist (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, December 20, 2006

CannaHelp, the medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Desert is being told to close up shop. The city has sent the business a cease and desist letter.

Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin told NewsChannel 3 CannaHelp violated its agreement with the city and its business license is now revoked.

CannaHelp was raided a little more than two weeks ago when authorities believed the dispensary was selling pot for profit.

The owner of CannaHelp then admitted to NewsChannel 3 that he did sell pot for a profit, saying he's paid a salary.

Since that interview aired, we have heard from the district attorney, who told us our story could be used in court.

Also, the owner called us back, threatening to file a lawsuit for showing the interview.

Stay tuned to NewsChannel 3 for more on this developing story.

CannaHelp Owner To Defy City Cease-and-desist Letter (DS)

Desert Sun, December 19, 2006

CannaHelp, the medical marijuana in Palm Desert, is staying open in defiance of a cease-and-desist letter from the city.

"I'm going to stay open by myself," said owner Stacy Hochanadel, after sending his other employees home. "I don't think it's right what they're doing."

The city issued the letter, which Hochanadel received today, following a City Council vote in closed session last Thursday, said City Attorney David Erwin.

The vote was not reported during the council's open session on Erwin's advice.

"I felt this was an action we needed to take, and we needed to take the action before we reported it publicly," Erwin said in a phone interview today. "That was my decision."

Councilman Robert A. Spiegel said the reason for the closed session vote was an investigation "not by our police department but by another police department in California.

"When they were investigated, they sold marijuana to an undercover police person who did not have correct credentials to buy marijuana," he said.

The city is not releasing the staff report presented in the closed session due to the potential for litigation on the closure order, said City Clerk Rachelle Klassen.

Hochanadel signed an agreement with the city earlier this year that the dispensary would only sell medical marijuana to patients with a medical marijuana identification card issued by Riverside County.

But, he said, that part of the agreement had been put on hold following discussions with then-Mayor Jim Ferguson, due to the financial impact on the business which would have had to turn away significant numbers of customers.

California's medical marijuana law requires counties to issue the ID cards, but they are voluntary for patients. The law does require that patients have a letter of recommendation from their doctors.

Federal law bans all use, cultivation or distribution of marijuana.

CannaHelp has had a business license issued by the city since it opened in October 2005. The dispensary was closed briefly earlier this month when the Special Investigation Unit of the Riverside County Sheriff's Department served a search and seizure warrant on the business

But, said Capt. Steve Thetford, chief of the Palm Desert Police Department, "The Palm Desert (department) hasn't made any significant arrests out of CannaHelp" in recent months, the county investigation notwithstanding.

Spiegel, who said he voted to close the dispensary, would like to see medical marijuana regulated by the federal government.

"It should be dispensed thourgh a pharmacy," he said in phone interview today. "That's what I would prefer to see happen and hopefully someday that's the way it will be."

Hochanadel would have liked the city to talk with him before issuing the letter, he said.

"I was hoping my city would stand behind me and support me. At this point they're trying to pull the carpet out from under my feet," he said.

Trenton: Needle Exchanges Approved (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107883

New Jersey yesterday became the last state in the country to offer needle exchange programs for intravenous drug users, when Gov. Jon S. Corzine signed legislation authorizing a pilot program for up to six towns. The law allows drug users to exchange used syringes for new ones, and provides $10 million for drug treatment facilities. A bipartisan array of legislators who attended the bill-signing ceremony said that such programs could help reduce the spread of H.I.V. in New Jersey, which has one of the country's highest infection rates. But critics say that the government should focus on treatment programs, and that free needles contributed to addictions.

Local Lawmen: U.S. Attorney Draws The Line At 500 Pounds (NI)

Nogales International, December 20, 2006

Many people want a fence built along the Mexico/United States border as a means to stop drug smuggling, terrorism and illegal immigration, but the truth is that drug smugglers can be caught red-handed, and still go free - as long as they're carrying less than 500 pounds of marijuana, officials say.

Unwritten rule

Several local officials have said that the unwritten rule at the Tucson office of the U.S. Attorney is that if a smuggler is accused of moving less than 500 pounds of pot through a port of entry, that person will walk away, generally.

Wyn Hornbuckle, the public information officer for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona said that he knew of no such threshold, but Santa Cruz County officials say that one definitely exists.

Brad Giles, the chief narcotics officer at the Tucson U.S. Attorney's Office said that he couldn't comment on prosecution strategies because the office has found that in the past, smugglers have adapted.

The problem is complex. All the local officials said that they do not blame the U.S. Attorney's Office. They say the office staff is too small and overworked.

Exacerbating the situation is the recent national attention on immigration reform. The Bush administration is demanding that the office focus on immigration. As a result, the smaller drug cases are tossed out, the officials say.

But small is a relative term when it comes to dope. The street market here for 499 pounds of marijuana is about $399,000, by U.S. Border Patrol standards.

Local lawmen say that the federal government expects them to pick up the slack and that the issue has been divisive. Some officials feel that they have an obligation to try the cases left dormant by the federal government, but others feel that by cleaning up after the feds their good deeds will be expected to become regular.

One official that confirmed the threshold and is willing to take the cases to court is Santa Cruz County Attorney George Silva.

"They're (local agencies and the U.S. Attorney's Office) doing the best job they can with their resources," he said. "If anyone's to blame it's the U.S. Department of Justice or the Bush administration. They're throwing billions of dollars at immigration, but they're letting drug smugglers go free."

Lt. Jerry Castillo, commander of the Metro Santa Cruz County Task Force, a conglomeration of law enforcement agencies that have grouped together to tackle the drug problem, also confirmed the 500-pound benchmark and was quick to divert blame.

"They're (U.S. Attorney's office) just overwhelmed," he said.

Nogales Police Chief John Kissinger agreed.

"I know that the U.S. Attorney's office in Tucson is declining criminal prosecutions of certain narcotics cases at the ports because of a threshold, but I can't say what that threshold is," Kissinger said. But despite the threshold, Kissinger emphasized that any inaction on a federal level will not affect the department's operations in town.

"The Nogales Police Department is going to continue to work to remove drugs and drug dealers off the streets," he said.

Sheriff Antonio Estrada said that the smugglers are charged on a case-by-case basis.

"I have no idea what gets turned loose," he said. "We'd have to go back and see how many we get, but my understanding is that the attorney's office makes the decision on a case-by-case basis."

Meanwhile, Customs agents are growing weary of their work, knowing that anyone they seize with less than a quarter ton of marijuana will most likely go free, Silva says.

But Brian Levin, the public affairs liaison for the Tucson sector of U.S Customs and Border Protection, puts it differently.

"We tell our guys to take pride in what they're doing he said," and they do an amazing job catching (smugglers). The analogy we like to use is that we're like the beat cops. We're the guys on the street doing the arresting. We find it, seize it then call in ICE (Immigration and Customs Enforcement) to do the investigation. Our authority ends there," Levin said.

Several telephone messages requesting comment from Terence Azvill, the regional director of high intensity drug trafficking areas from the Tucson office of the National Drug Control Policy, went unanswered.

DOJ_NMG_0107884

Marijuana 'top Cash Crop In US' (BBC)

BBC News, December 19, 2006

Marijuana is the top cash crop in the US, a report released on Monday says.

It says that despite intensive eradication plans, $35bn (£18bn) worth of the illegal drug is produced a year - more than corn and wheat combined.

The study was prepared by Jon Gettman, a public policy analyst who advocates reform of US marijuana laws.

Activists seeking the decriminalisation of the substance, say the report backs the need for change, a position rejected by government officials.

'Inherently harmful'

Using government reports, Mr Gettman estimates that 10,000 metric tons of marijuana are produced annually in the country.

"Marijuana has become a pervasive and ineradicable part of the economy of the United States," Mr Gettman - who has in the past campaigned for marijuana to be removed from a list of drugs considered to have no medical value - says in his report.

"The focus of public policy should be how to effectively control this market through regulation and taxation in order to achieve immediate and realistic goals, such as reducing teenage access."

The report was welcomed by the Marijuana Policy Project (MPP), which said it showed that "marijuana laws are a complete failure".

"Our nation's laws guarantee that 100% of the proceeds from marijuana sales go to unregulated criminals rather that to legitimate businesses that pay taxes to support schools, police and roads," said MPP executive director Rob Kampia.

But Tom Riley, a spokesman for the Office of National Drug Control Policy, rejected any economic arguments for legalising marijuana saying marijuana use was an "inherently harmful activity".

Parole Board Member Says FBI Tried To Intimidate Him (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

BOSTON - A former member of the state Parole Board said Tuesday that two FBI agents tried to intimidate him into keeping a wrongly convicted man in prison for a 1960s gangland slaying.

Former Springfield Mayor Michael Albano, who served on the board from 1982 to 1994, testified in a lawsuit filed by the families of four men who say the FBI allowed them to be framed to protect a mobster informant.

Two of those men, Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone, spent more than 30 years in prison for the murder of Edward “Teddy” Deegan before being exonerated in 2001 when the Justice Department released documents showing the FBI withheld evidence from prosecutors that could have cleared the men so the agency could protect Vincent “Jimmy” Flemmi, an informant who actually committed the crime.

Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo, who were also convicted in Deegan’s killing, died in prison.

Lawyers for the men’s families asked Albano if the FBI, after being contacted by the parole board as it considered petitions to commute their sentences, ever turned over evidence it had that the men were not involved in the murder of Deegan.

“No such information was provided,” Albano testified.

Albano also made a brief reference in his testimony to a 1983 “unannounced visit” from former FBI Agents John Connolly and John Morris as the board was considering a petition to commute Limone’s sentence.

He was not asked to provide details of the visit during his testimony. But outside the courtroom, Albano said Connolly and Morris urged him to vote against commuting Limone’s sentence and said that if he voted in favor of commuting his sentence it could hurt his career.

“They intimidated me and tried to get me to change my vote,” Albano told reporters. “They said this was a bad crime ... that these defendants should remain incarcerated for the rest of their lives.”

“They also said it probably would not bode well for me, if I wanted to remain in public life, that this would not be a good vote for me,” he said.

Albano said he later voted with the majority of the 7-member board to commute Limone’s sentence, but Gov. Michael Dukakis denied the petition.

Connolly is now serving a 10-year federal prison sentence for racketeering, obstruction of justice and other charges for protecting members of Boston’s Winter Hill Gang - including fugitive gangster James “Whitey” Bulger” - from prosecution while using them as FBI mob informants.

Connolly is awaiting trial on first-degree murder and conspiracy charges for allegedly providing information to members of the gang that led to the 1982 killing of former World Jai Alai President John Callahan.

DOJ_NMG_0107885

Connolly's attorney, E. Peter Mullane, said Connolly denies the meeting described by Albano ever took place.

"John Connolly never met Mr. Albano under any circumstance, never spoke to him, never met him, never had any reason to meet him," he said. [continue]

FBI To Release Last Of Its John Lennon Files (LAT)

By Henry Weinstein, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 20, 2006

The U.S. had said such an act could stir military retaliation. The papers, withheld 25 years, don't seem to bear that out.

The FBI agreed Tuesday to make public the final 10 documents about the surveillance of John Lennon that it had withheld for 25 years from a UC Irvine historian on the grounds that releasing them could cause "military retaliation against the United States."

Despite the fierce battle the government waged to keep the documents secret, the files contain information that is hardly shocking, just new details about Lennon's ties to New Left leaders and antiwar groups in London in the early 1970s, said the historian, Jon Wiener.

For example, in one memo, then-FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover wrote to H.R. Haldeman, President Nixon's chief of staff, that "Lennon had taken an interest in 'extreme left-wing activities in Britain' and is known to be a sympathizer of Trotskyist communists in England."

Another document had been blacked out on the grounds of national security when Wiener obtained it more than 20 years ago through litigation brought under the Freedom of Information Act. It is now known that it said two prominent British leftists, Tariq Ali and Robin Blackburn, had courted Lennon in hopes that he would "finance a left-wing bookshop and reading room in London."

But the newly released document adds that Lennon apparently gave them no money "despite a long courtship by Blackburn and Ali."

Another surveillance report states explicitly that there was "no certain proof" that Lennon had provided money "for subversive purposes." And yet another says there was no evidence that Lennon had any formal tie to any leftist group.

Another describes an interview with Lennon published in 1971 in an underground London newspaper called the Red Mole. "Lennon emphasized his proletarian background and his sympathy with the oppressed and underprivileged people of Britain and the world," the document says.

Wiener and his attorneys, Dan Marmalefsky of Morrison & Foerster and Mark Rosenbaum of the American Civil Liberties Union of Southern California, all said the documents revealed there was no sign that government officials considered Lennon a serious threat. They said they were mystified that several administrations had resisted making the material public.

"The content of the files released today is an embarrassment to the U.S. government," said Wiener, 62, who has written two books on the late Beatle, "Come Together: John Lennon in His Time" and "Gimme Some Truth: the John Lennon FBI Files."

"I doubt that Tony Blair's government will launch a military strike on the U.S. in retaliation for the release of these documents. Today, we can see that the national security claims that the FBI has been making for 25 years were absurd from the beginning," said Wiener, who requested the documents in 1981.

Wiener initially obtained some files showing that the FBI closely monitored Lennon's activities in 1971 and 1972. The documents indicated Nixon administration concern that Lennon would support then-Sen. George S. McGovern (D-S.D.) for president against incumbent Richard M. Nixon in 1972, the first year that 18-year-olds could vote.

But the FBI also withheld numerous files, saying they were exempt from the Freedom of Information Act, including part of a surveillance report on a December 1971 antiwar rally in Michigan. There, Lennon urged the release of activist and singer John Sinclair, who was serving a 10-year sentence for possession of two marijuana joints. A judge soon freed him.

Wiener sued in U.S. District Court in Los Angeles seeking all the documents. The FBI countered that some contained "national security information provided by a foreign government under an explicit promise of confidentiality" and that release of the documents "can reasonably be expected to … lead to foreign diplomatic, economic and military retaliation against the United States," according to a government brief filed in 1983.

Wiener lost the initial court skirmishes, but in 1991 he won a major victory in the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, which ruled that declarations filed by FBI agents provided inadequate grounds for keeping the material secret. From that point forward, the court ruled, the FBI had to file "affidavits containing sufficient detail" to allow Wiener to "intelligently advocate" for their release and for a trial judge "to intelligently judge the contest."

That decision significantly strengthened the hand of people trying to pry secret documents out of the government. Justice Department attorneys, including John Roberts, who is now the chief justice of the United States, appealed, but the Supreme Court let the ruling stand.

DOJ_NMG_0107886

Six years later, Wiener settled with lawyers from the Clinton administration and obtained a number of FBI files on the former Beatle. But Justice Department lawyers continued to withhold 10 documents under the national security exemption of the Freedom of Information Act.

Scott Hodes, who was acting chief of the FBI litigation unit dealing with freedom of information cases, said disclosure of the documents could strain relations between the U.S. and a foreign government, lead to diplomatic, political or economic retaliation and have a chilling effect on the flow of information between the two countries. Hodes also said disclosure of the documents could subject the government agents involved in the Lennon operation to "public ridicule, ostracism" or even jeopardize their safety.

In August 2004, U.S. District Judge Robert M. Takasugi granted summary judgment to Wiener, concluding that the government had not adequately supported its claims. Justice Department lawyers said they would appeal. But a 9th Circuit mediator eventually forged a settlement, leading to a final settlement resolution of the case Tuesday.

Years ago, Wiener called the case a "rock 'n' roll Watergate," in part because the FBI took an intense interest in Lennon at the time operatives from the Nixon administration perpetrated the Watergate burglary. But on Tuesday, Wiener agreed that given how long the case dragged out, it might more appropriately be characterized as a "rock 'n' roll 'Bleak House,' " referring to the Dickens novel about a years-long inheritance case.

"The release of these final documents, concealed from public view for nearly a quarter of a century, reveals government paranoia at a pathological level and an attempt to shield executive branch abuse of civil liberties under the rubric of national security," said Rosenbaum of the ACLU. "The ultimate lesson of these documents is that the head of document classification for the FBI must be Stephen Colbert."

On his late-night television show, satirist Colbert plays a right-wing talk show host who is a government cheerleader.

The Justice Department declined to comment.

Marmalefsky said the one concession that Wiener made in settling the suit was agreeing that the letterhead on some of the documents released Tuesday could be blacked out "as well as a word here or there that would identify the foreign government" that provided information to the U.S.

However, Marmalefsky said, "having reviewed the final documents and all the others in this case, it is very difficult to believe that it could be any government other than the United Kingdom."

The documents will be posted on the Internet today at http://www.LennonFBIfiles.com . <252>*

henry.weinstein@latimes.com

IMMIGRATION:

Swift Raids Put Iowa Guard At Risk, Vilsack Says (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 19, 2006

In a blunt and stinging letter, the governor and the top officer of the Iowa National Guard today called federal immigration officials' actions in the Swift raids "completely unacceptable," saying agents undermined the public's trust in government, potentially jeopardized the safety of law enforcement personnel in Iowa and could have compromised undercover operations.

Gov. Tom Vilsack and Maj. Gen. Ron Dardis, in a letter today to Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, said they will not cooperate with federal immigration officials in the future unless they act more responsibly and provide better coordination with state officials.

Immigration officials "chose to pursue a solitary path that limited the operation's effectiveness, created undue hardship for many not at fault, and led to resentment and further mistrust of government," Vilsack and Dardis wrote.

The arrests Dec. 12 of 1,282 workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in Marshalltown and in five other states represented the biggest crackdown in history on immigration violations at one company. The raids were executed by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, known as ICE, an agency of the Department of Homeland Security.

Vilsack and Dardis said ICE officials failed to advise the Iowa National Guard of the size and scope of the raid, which "could have led to unacceptable risks to Guard personnel and property."

The raids could have compromised ongoing local, state and federal law enforcement undercover operations, they said.

ICE gave Iowa little chance to prepare to deal with the humanitarian consequences of the raids, they said.

And the "information blackout" ICE imposed after the raids made the situation worse, they said.

Although the Iowa National Guard's only role was to provide a temporary space to hold detainees, ICE's operations and lack of coordination thrust the Guard into the national spotlight "without the sufficient information or authority to plan or respond."

DOJ_NMG_0107887

Federal agents failed to provide any information to Guard public affairs staff before or during the raids, then ICE public affairs in Washington, D.C., issued only one short news release more than 24 hours after the raids began.

After promising to hold a news conference at Camp Dodge, ICE failed to do so, they wrote.

"The complete lack of an adequate media plan in the age of 24-7 news coverage is completely unacceptable," they wrote. "These systemic failures to communicate with the public and news organizations created an information vacuum that was filled with unreliable and unverifiable rumors that further undermined the public's trust and confidence in both the state and federal government."

Rather than working with local, state and other federal law enforcement agencies, ICE worked alone, they said.

"This lack of coordination among law enforcement and military authorities is completely unacceptable in this post 9/11 and (Hurricane) Katrina world," they wrote.

They ended the letter with this warning:

"In order to prevent similar or greater problems in the future, please note that the Iowa National Guard, at both Camp Dodge and throughout our state, will now require proper notification to the governor and appropriate law enforcement personnel, as well as a thorough and synchronized media plan, before we again agree to provide any space for future actions or operations by ICE."

As of this evening, 1,283 people had been arrested in connection with the Swift raids and charged with non-criminal administrative violations.

Of those, 144 had also been charged with criminal violations: one with re-entering the United States after deportation and 143 with identity theft or a fraud-related charge.

Harkin 'appalled' By Treatment Of Illegal Workers (DMR)

Des Moines Register, December 19, 2006

Washington, D.C. – Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa wrote Secretary of Homeland

Security Michael Chertoff today to say he is "appalled" by the process used to detain and deport workers in raids earlier this month at six Swift & Co. packing plants, including one in Marshalltown.

Harkin, a Democrat, said a telephone hotline for information for family members that was set up by the government has at times gone unanswered. At other times, it "provided no information of any use," Harkin said in the letter.

It has been "almost impossible" for lawyers and members of the clergy to gain access to workers who were detained, and workers were taken to other states without being granted access to lawyers, Harkin said.

Although assurances were provided to his staff that parents with small children would be released to make arrangements for their children's care, "there continues to be reports of numerous single mothers remaining in custody," Harkin said.

He said he hopes Chertoff shares his belief that "the failure to ensure that basic legal rights and humanitarian protections are afforded to individuals in our immigration system reflects poorly on the principles that have made the United States strong."

A spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the law enforcement agency that conducted the raids, had no immediate comment. The agency is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

At the time of the raids, officials said that in certain cases where "humanitarian or medical concerns were identified," those arrested were given notices to appear in court at a later date.

The raids came as part of a investigation of worksite immigration violations and a massive identity theft scheme that federal officials say has victimized large numbers of legal citizens.

Criminal organizations traffic in genuine birth certificates and Social Security cards belonging to legal citizens, stolen in some cases and in other cases bought from homeless people and people in jail, officials say.

There were 1,282 arrests on immigration violations at the six Swift plants, with countries of origin of those arrested including Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador, Peru, Laos, Sudan and Ethiopia.

Harkin said the arrests demonstrate the need for Congress to move on immigration reform, including a path to citizenship for those in the country illegally.

Lawmakers Use Swift Raids To Bolster Locked-in Positions (RMN)

By M.E. Sprengelmeyer

Rocky Mountain News, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON - Mass arrests of suspected illegal immigrants have done little to end the congressional stalemate over the country's immigration policies.

DOJ_NMG_0107888

Instead, after the crackdown at Swift & Co. plants in Colorado and five other states, lawmakers from competing sides of the debate over a proposed guest-worker plan used the arrests last week to bolster their locked-in positions.

That could set the stage for another difficult debate in coming months, after Democrats take control of both houses of Congress and try to advance a plan President Bush has long favored.

Advocates of tougher enforcement of immigration laws generally praised last week's actions, which ended with the arrests of 1,282 workers, including 261 in Greeley, for immigration infractions or identity-theft charges.

But some, including Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Littleton, expressed concerns that it could be a "ruse," or temporary show of force, intended to appease enforcement-first factions to clear the way for a guest- worker plan critics equate to amnesty.

Tancredo called it "hogwash" that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff began his press conference detailing the arrests by talking about the need for a guest-worker plan, which could grant legal status to millions who have entered the country illegally.

Chertoff said tough enforcement was only one part of solving immigration problems.

"It needs to be solved, and it won't be solved with a piecemeal approach," Chertoff said.

That was a common theme all week, as longtime backers of the proposed guest-worker plan, including Sen. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., said the arrests signaled a clarion call for a comprehensive approach to solving immigration problems.

"The lesson for me is that it underlines the need for Congress to act and enact comprehensive reform," said Rep. Mark Udall, D-Eldorado Springs. "It's time to do what the American public wants us to do."

The Immigration and Customs Enforcement raids, which prompted protests from workers' families and immigrant rights activists, rejuvenated a debate that had been dormant since the summer, when the Senate passed a comprehensive immigration bill but couldn't win agreement from the enforcement-minded House of Representatives.

Udall said the highly publicized arrests "rub away the scar tissue" and bring the raw emotions of the issue to the surface again.

The timing of the raids, during the Christmas season and on the Catholic Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe, prompted Denver Archbishop Charles Chaput to denounce the ICE raids.

But Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Loveland, said the timing could not be avoided.

"You have to feel sorry for the kids who see their parents taken away from them," Allard said. "But the real victims are those in the identity-theft part of that. Once your identity is taken, you never recover.

"If you're dealing with criminals, you go when the case is ready and you have to do that to prevent more victims from being exploited."

Over the summer, Allard opposed a Senate version of immigration reform, which he said would amount to rewarding law-breakers. Still, he said Congress needs to do more, in addition to increasing funds for enforcement.

"I think everyone understands we need to do something about illegal immigration," Allard said.

Rep. Bob Beauprez, R-Arvada, said the Swift & Co. arrests highlight a growing problem with identity theft, but they don't make the leading guest-worker proposals any easier to swallow.

"When they talk about guest-worker, they're talking about amnesty, pure and simple," Beauprez said. "That's what Salazar is talking about. That's what the president is talking about. That's not equitable to people who are playing by the rules."

If the arrests have created any room for common ground, it's that people on both sides said Congress needs to consider closing a loophole in an existing employer-verification program.

Swift participated in a pilot project to verify workers' names and Social Security numbers. Chertoff said that while the program can catch some who use fabricated identity documents, it does not stop those who have stolen matching names and Social Security numbers.

That's why Chertoff and Tancredo, who are on opposite sides of the guest-worker debate, both said Congress needs to grant the Social Security Administration authority to tell immigration officials when numbers are being used in multiple locations.

Even then, Tancredo said he was skeptical that so far, of the 1,282 people arrested in the recent raids, most were charged only with administrative immigration violations and fewer than 65 face criminal charges, some related to identity theft.

"Something is askew here," he said.

Raid On Swift Leaves Staffing In Disarray (DENP)

By Bruce Finley

Denver Post, December 20, 2006

Meatpacking workers detained during last week's federal raids began facing immigration judges Tuesday in Colorado and five other states.

Some were released after relatives posted bond of at least $1,500. In Colorado, Immigration Judge Donn Livingston saw 27 detainees at the regional detention facility in Aurora and set court hearings where they are to be informed of charges against them.

Meanwhile, a federal grand jury in Minnesota indicted 20 detained workers on criminal-immigration offenses and charges related to identity theft.

Now the immigration authorities themselves - who last week stormed six Swift & Co. plants in Greeley and other states based on allegations that illegal workers stole U.S. identities to get jobs - also are facing challenges in federal courts.

Labor-union leaders representing workers in Colorado have asked a federal judge to release them, arguing that workers were mistreated and denied access to lawyers.

The raids constituted "an outrageous abuse of police power," and the government's criminal probe into identity theft "functioned as the Trojan Horse to effectuate an immigration raid," said a lawsuit filed by the United Food and Commercial Workers Union Local 7.

U.S. District Judge John Kane has ordered immigrants detained at the Greeley plant to remain in his jurisdiction, but the union said some had been taken out of state. Union officials said Kane on Tuesday asked them to provide more details of their allegations.

"We're gathering witness statements and other material to present to him," UCFW spokesman Dave Minshall said.

Some 75 out of 260 workers detained in Greeley already have been returned to Mexico.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) officials have filed a legal response saying detainees were told why they were arrested, allowed to use phones and advised they could get legal help.

ICE officials routinely move detained immigrants around the country to find bedspace.

U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo called Tuesday for more raids and urging the government to target managers who hire illegal workers.

"This kind of enforcement action by ICE has been sorely missing over the past decade and I urge you to expand such operations to other industries," Tancredo, R-Littleton, wrote in a letter to ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers.

"Many in the agriculture industry prefer to use illegal labor despite the availability of legal workers through the H-2A (temporary-worker) program, which as you know has no cap. I believe an investigation would reveal that identity theft is rampant across many sectors and industries, not only meatpacking," Tancredo said.

And "it strains credulity," he said, to suggest that so many illegal workers at Swift "could be employed, in six plants, without the company's management being aware of it," as the company has claimed.

Study Warns Of Hunger Among Hispanics (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

Nearly one in five Hispanics lacks sufficient access to nutritious food and one in 20 regularly goes hungry, posing serious health and economic risks to the nation's largest and fastest-growing minority group, according to a new study.

The National Council of La Raza, a Latino advocacy group, noted in its study that the "food insecurity" rate of Hispanics is nearly as high as that of non-Hispanic blacks and substantially greater than that of non-Hispanic whites, of whom only about 5 percent suffer from limited access to nutritious food, according to U.S. government statistics.

"Yet the Latino community is practically invisible when it comes to this issue," said co-author Jennifer Ng'andu. "Folks notice the presence of Latinos in their area, but they are not connecting it to the need for food assistance."

As with African Americans, poverty appears to be the main factor limiting Latinos' access to nutritious food. About 22 percent of Latinos and 25 percent of non-Hispanic blacks are poor, compared with 8 percent of non-Hispanic whites.

Latinos, about 40 percent of whom are foreign-born, also often face linguistic, cultural and legal barriers to enrolling in federal hunger programs.

In 1996, Congress disqualified legal immigrants from nearly all forms of government assistance. Although a 2002 law restored access to certain programs for many categories of immigrants, including all otherwise eligible immigrant children, many Latinos appear unaware of the change. For instance, slightly more than half of eligible Latinos participate in the national food stamp program, compared with more than 70 percent of eligible blacks.

"For a lot of our immigrant families, there's either a lack of understanding of the system or fear, due to their immigration status," of approaching authorities, said Beatriz Otero, director of CentroN?a, a nonprofit child-care center in the District that has helped many Latino parents apply for federal assistance.

DOJ_NMG_0107890

The problem extends to immigrants' children who are U.S. citizens. Only about half of such children participate in the food stamp program, compared with more than 80 percent of eligible children who are U.S. citizens but whose parents are also U.S. citizens.

Just as daunting to many immigrant Latinos are the complex requirements and paperwork involved in signing up for many federal programs, Ng'andu said. By contrast, she noted, the government's nutrition program for low-income pregnant or post-partum mothers has a simpler enrollment process and a high rate of Latino participation.

Ng'andu argued that other federal food assistance programs need to follow suit by undertaking aggressive outreach in the Latino community and training their staff to better understand the eligibility rules affecting immigrants.

Otherwise, she cautioned, the consequences could be telling: Children who lack sufficient nutritional food have more difficulty concentrating in school as well as higher levels of anxiety, depression and obesity and its attendant health complications.

Sixty-two Fugitives And Immigration Violators Snared (MH)

By Miami Herald Staff

The Miami Herald, December 20, 2006

Immigration authorities have arrested 50 undocumented immigrants who ignored orders to leave the country and another 12 who were in violation of U.S. immigration laws, many of them with criminal histories, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said today.

Among those arrested was a 38-year-old Honduran convicted of sex crimes and deported in 2000. Jose Mario Lara now faces criminal charges for returning illegally to the United States. Re-entry after deportation is a felony that carries up to a 25-year prison sentence.

The criminal histories of those being held range from aggravated assault with a deadly weapon to prostitution and probation violations. Of the more than 52,000 undocumented immigrants apprehended by ICE fugitive operations teams nationwide since 2003, about 22,669 had criminal convictions, immigration authorities said.

"Our officers are working tirelessly to ensure that our nation's laws are upheld," Michael Rozos, field office director for the ICE Office of Detention and Removal Operations in Florida, said in a statement. ``Those who break our immigration laws shouldn't be surprised if they are arrested, charged and deported."

The weeklong sweep by ICE's Miami Fugitive Operations team ended Friday with the arrest of 62 fugitives and violators.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Appointees Signal Court's New Direction (USAT)

USA Today, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON — They are President Bush's appointees to the Supreme Court, the products of the administration's efforts to make the court more conservative.

And although most of the major decisions in their first full term together won't be announced for months, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito have signaled a readiness to move the court to the right.

In recent cases involving abortion, global warming and school integration, Roberts and Alito have been aggressive and sometimes feisty proponents of conservative views and particularly sympathetic to arguments by the Bush administration.

Their tactics have added flair to the court's public sessions and have contrasted sharply with the tentative approach that moderate Justices Sandra Day O'Connor and Anthony Kennedy often took in disputes over abortion, affirmative action and other key issues.

On an ideologically divided, nine-member court, the now-retired O'Connor was an especially key player because she generally was conservative but sometimes voted with the bench's four more-liberal justices: John Paul Stevens, David Souter, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer.

O'Connor voted with the liberals, for example, in favor of affirmative action in college admissions. O'Connor and Kennedy joined the liberals in backing abortion rights.

Now, Alito has replaced O'Connor, and he has joined the new chief justice — who replaced another conservative, the late William Rehnquist — in beginning to alter the court's course.

During last month's dispute over the Bush administration's decision against regulating carbon dioxide emissions and other so-called greenhouse gases, Roberts and Alito were skeptical about whether the USA is a significant contributor to global warming.

DOJ_NMG_0107891

Roberts, echoing a sentiment expressed by an administration lawyer, suggested that federal regulation of emissions from cars and trucks might produce only a "marginal benefit" to the environment. Massachusetts and several other states argued that continued inaction by the U.S. government on car and truck emissions could lead to greater harm to the environment around the world.

The abortion issue

Also last month, Roberts suggested by his questions that he was leaning toward voting to uphold a congressional ban on a midterm abortion procedure that critics call "partial birth."

While Kennedy expressed concern about how such a ban would affect women's health, Roberts — again reflecting a position taken by the Bush administration — challenged abortion rights lawyers who argued that the procedure known medically as "dilation and extraction" was safer than other methods of abortion. (Alito asked no questions during that session.)

And during a dispute this month over school integration programs that allow districts to consider a student's race in making school assignments, Roberts compared such diversity programs in Louisville and Seattle to school segregation policies struck down by the high court a half-century ago in Brown v. Board of Education.

Alito, suggesting that he would support arguments brought by parents of white students who were denied their choice of schools, also bristled at the notion of using race as a factor in efforts to diversify school systems.

He indicated that even if the intent of such programs is admirable, the programs' treatment of students is reminiscent of the "separate but equal" doctrine that the court rejected in Brown.

Legal and political conservatives have been pleased with the new justices' approach.

At the annual meeting of the conservative Federalist Society last month, outgoing Senate Majority Whip Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., praised Roberts' and Alito's confirmation to the high court as "signature achievements" of the Congress that Republicans controlled for more than a decade.

After oral arguments in the school integration cases on Dec. 4, Ward Connerly, a former University of California regent who has fought race-based policies nationwide, said he was heartened by comments from Roberts and Alito and believes the court is headed toward rejecting the Seattle and Louisville programs.

"When people go through the Senate (confirmation) process" for judicial nominees, "you think that you might be getting some insight into their intelligence and demeanor," Connerly said last week. "But you never really know because the hearing process is fraught with theater."

Connerly said he interpreted the session on school integration as a sign that the court was on the verge of a new era — one in which the court would not support programs that consider race to promote diversity.

"It's something whose time has come," Connerly said.

For those who are fighting policies set forth by the Bush administration, the early courtroom performances by Roberts and Alito have been disheartening.

After the arguments in the school integration cases, Theodore Shaw of the NAACP Legal Defense Fund said he walked out of the Supreme Court feeling lower than he has in years.

"If the ruling is in keeping with the way the argument went, it would be a tragedy," Shaw said, adding that school districts across the nation could have their hands tied in trying to promote racial diversity.

Turning-point potential

Roberts, 51, and Alito, 56, shared the bench for five months during the 2005-06 term, which ended in June. The term didn't reveal much about how the court might change under Roberts' leadership.

This term is likely to provide some guidance on the issue. The school integration cases heard this month had the feel of a potentially distinctive turning point for the court in dealing with government programs that have been created as remedies to past discrimination.

After Roberts declared that the constitutional guarantee of equality is intended "to ensure that people are treated as individuals rather than based on the color of their skin," Breyer countered that past rulings by the court had allowed race to be used as a factor in programs to address the lasting effects of segregation.

The liberal justice said "thousands of school districts" could have to change their enrollment policies if the court sets a new path by rejecting such initiatives.

Upcoming cases are likely to further define the conservatism of Roberts and Alito, both of whom were lawyers in the Reagan administration who went on to become U.S. appeals court judges. One dispute revolves around whether taxpayers can challenge Bush administration initiatives that encourage faith-based charities to compete for federal grants for social programs.

Outside the courtroom

Beyond the court, Roberts and Alito have been revealing more of themselves as well.

DOJ_NMG_0107892

In a speech before the Federalist Society in November, Alito saluted President Reagan's efforts to curtail judicial involvement in solving societal problems and exhibited self-deprecating humor as he recalled his contentious confirmation hearings before the Senate last January.

Alito noted that the Senate Hart Office Building, where his hearings were held, is near the Supreme Court and that he often walks by it. But now, Alito quipped, "I cross to the other side of the street. I quicken my step until I'm well past the building."

Alito was confirmed to the Supreme Court in a 58-42 Senate vote that reflected Democrats' anxiety over whether replacing O'Connor with Alito would lead the court to take a harsher view of abortion rights, affirmative action and other Democratic priorities.

Roberts, who has been on the court since fall 2005, has used speeches at colleges to show the humor that has served him well as a litigator and as a judge.

In court, Roberts' humor has a distinctive bite. During arguments in a recent patent case, he derided a lower-court rule for assessing when an invention should not be patented because it would have been "obvious" at the time of development.

"Who do you get to be an expert to tell you something's not obvious?" he asked. "I mean, the least insightful person you can find?"

As usually happens when the chief justice makes a joke, the spectators laughed.

Brownback Wants To Re-question Nominee (AP)

By Todd Dvorak

AP, December 20, 2006

Sen. Sam Brownback, who wants to champion social conservatives in the presidential race, said Tuesday he wants a Senate panel to re-question a judicial nominee who attended a same-sex union ceremony.

Brownback, a Kansas Republican, said he wants Michigan state judge Janet Neff to testify about her role in the 2002 Massachusetts ceremony, her legal views on same-sex unions and her ability to be impartial if called upon to rule on such cases.

Neff's nomination to federal district court is among a dozen or so now stalled in the Senate, a logjam in part due to Brownback's questions about Neff's attendance at a lesbian commitment ceremony. The Senate Judiciary Committee has already approved her nomination.

Neff was traveling outside the country and could not immediately be reached for comment, said Chris Bockheim, her judicial assistant.

Earlier this month, Brownback, a prominent opponent of gay marriage who is exploring a presidential run in 2008, said he would lift the hold he put on Neff's nomination if the judge agreed to withdraw from ruling on any court case involving the legality of same sex unions.

In Iowa on Tuesday to meet with GOP activists, Brownback said he only wants a chance to question Neff about her role in the 2002 ceremony. Brownback also wants a recorded vote in the Senate.

"I am not opposed to her getting a vote," Brownback said before a lunch with potential donors and supporters in Davenport. "I would like her to come back through committee so she can testify what took place, factually ... her legal views on same-sex marriage and her ability and willingness to be impartial."

Neff has said she attended the commitment ceremony as a friend of one of the two women, a longtime neighbor.

She insisted in an Oct. 12 letter to Brownback that the ceremony had no legal effect and would not influence her ability to act fairly as a federal judge.

Brownback has also been criticized for his proposal that Neff be required to recuse herself from gay marriage cases. Legal scholars said such a deal would infringe on the separation of the legislative and judicial branches of government.

But Brownback said it was simply a last resort to put her nomination forward.

"If we don't testify on her views on same-sex marriage legally, then the only way I can see fit to do this is to have her recuse herself from a class of cases," Brownback said. "Then others stepped in and said 'you can't do that.' Well, that's the only option I had at that late hour."

Senator Seeks Detainee Abuse Case Update (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP, December 20, 2006

A key Democratic senator asked the Justice Department on Monday for an update on its progress prosecuting government employees who were accused in at least 17 cases of abusing detainees in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In response, a Justice spokesman said at least some of the cases are still under investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0107893

In a letter sent Monday to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, incoming Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin, D-Ill., noted that the department began looking into the allegations of abuse two and a half years ago.

"In that time, there have not been any indictments in any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who first pressed the Justice Department for a prosecutions update in November 2005, when now-Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty was seeking Senate confirmation.

"It is my understanding that since then, the Justice Department has not commented publicly on the status of any of these cases," wrote Durbin, who sits on the Senate panel that oversees the Justice Department.

In response to Durbin's first request, the Justice Department revealed in a Jan. 17 letter that it had opened 20 investigations into claims of detainee abuse that were referred to prosecutors by the Pentagon and the CIA. The investigations were being led by a task force in the U.S. Attorney's office in Virginia's eastern district — which McNulty headed before taking the Justice Department's No. 2 job in March.

Two of those cases were dropped because of insufficient evidence to support a prosecution, the Justice Department letter noted. Additionally, another case resulted in the indictment of a former CIA contractor in North Carolina.

Justice spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said at least a few of the estimated 17 remaining cases are still open. "The Justice Department continues to investigate these cases," Roehrkasse said Monday. He declined further comment.

The New York Times reported on its Web site Monday that a Justice Department team has decided against prosecuting nearly all of the 20 cases that were initially under investigation. It was not immediately clear precisely how many cases remain open, and Roehrkasse refused to respond to the newspaper's report.

Privately, Justice officials have acknowledged difficulties in tracking down reliable witnesses or preserving enough evidence to bring strong cases against the accused employees.

OTHER NEWS:

Cheney To Be Defense Witness In CIA Case (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 20, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney will be called to testify on behalf of his former chief of staff in the CIA leak case, defense attorneys said Tuesday, ending months of speculation over what would be historic testimony.

"We're calling the vice president," attorney Ted Wells said in court. Wells represents defendant I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, who is charged with perjury and obstruction.

Sitting presidents, including Clinton and Ford, have testified in criminal cases, but presidential historians said they knew of no vice president who has done so.

William Jeffress, another of Libby's attorneys, would not say whether Cheney is under a subpoena to testify. Issuing a court order to a sitting vice president could raise separation-of-powers concerns, but Jeffress said it was not an issue.

"We don't expect him to resist," Jeffress said.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, who said last week he did not expect the White House to challenge his witnesses, said Tuesday he did not plan to call Cheney.

Wells immediately said he would.

"That settles that," Fitzgerald said.

Neither Jeffress nor Wells would say whether they expect Cheney to testify in the courtroom or offer videotaped testimony to avoid infringing on the separation of powers.

"We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so in fairness to the parties involved," said Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for the vice president. "As we've stated previously, we're not going to comment further on a legal proceeding."

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about what he told reporters regarding former CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame's identity was leaked to reporters around the time that her husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, publicly criticized the Bush administration's prewar intelligence on Iraq.

Libby says he was focused on more important issues — including terrorism, Iraq and nuclear proliferation — and didn't remember his conversations regarding Plame.

Cheney could bolster that argument by testifying about the many other larger issues Libby was responsible for. During cross-examination, Fitzgerald likely will press Cheney to acknowledge that Plame was a key concern for him, and thus would have been important to Libby.

DOJ_NMG_0107894

The trial could offer a behind-the-scenese look at the Bush administration's march to war and U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton said he planned to ask potential jurors whether their feelings on the administration's policies would interfere with their ability to serve.

Cheney and Libby got to know each other when Cheney was defense secretary under the first President Bush. Libby has been extremely loyal to Cheney and, in return, had the vice president's unwavering trust.

By 2000, Libby was working as a top adviser to Cheney in the presidential campaign and then followed him to the White House. In the White House, he was known as "Cheney's Cheney" for being as trusted a problem solver for the vice president as Cheney was for Bush.

Even after Libby's indictment, Cheney called him "one of the finest men I've ever known."

In addition to Cheney, other government officials and journalists are expected to be key witnesses in the trial, which is scheduled to start next month.

Former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert are expected to be prosecution witnesses. Libby's lawyers said in court papers that several reporters will testify on Libby's behalf.

Two unidentified reporters may resist testifying, Libby's attorneys said, but they expect to resolve that issue before trial.

Cheney Testimony Could Exacerbate White House Woes (WSJ)

By John D. Mckinnon

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Vice President Dick Cheney's testimony in the trial of his former top aide will add to White House political problems, at a time when President Bush will be seeking to rebuild his eroded standing.

Attorneys for Mr. Cheney's indicted former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, confirmed in court yesterday that they plan to call the vice president as a witness in Mr. Libby's perjury and obstruction-of-justice case. The trial is scheduled to start next month.

Mr. Libby is accused of misleading investigators about his role in leaking the identity of a former Central Intelligence Agency agent, Valerie Plame, to reporters. Several administration officials began discussing her identity with reporters soon after her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson, started criticizing the administration's use of prewar intelligence concerning Iraq's nuclear-weapons program.

A Cheney spokeswoman suggested he doesn't plan to resist. "We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so," said Lea Anne McBride.

The spectacle of the vice president testifying in court is likely to deepen the White House's public-relations problems, as Democrats on Capitol Hill also will launch investigations of the administration in a number of areas, including its conduct of the Iraq war.

Mr. Cheney's role already has been a source of political pain for the White House. From an early point, the criminal investigation focused on his office, although other administration aides, including Karl Rove, also discussed Ms. Plame with reporters. More recently, details of Mr. Cheney's role have emerged in filings by Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald.

Mr. Libby testified before the grand jury that the vice president was upset about Mr. Wilson's criticisms. "He was very keen to get the truth out," Mr. Libby testified. He quoted Mr. Cheney as saying, "Let's get everything out."

Mr. Libby's defense team has hinted he will argue, among other things, he misremembered dates and details of certain conversations. Mr. Libby's defense would be helped if the vice president can buttress those claims. The vice president also could provide some of the policy reasons why the administration was interested in undercutting Mr. Wilson's story.

Cheney Will Testify In C.I.A. Leak Case (NYT)

By David Johnston

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19 — Vice President Dick Cheney will be summoned as a defense witness in the trial of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis Libby Jr., on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice, a defense lawyer said Tuesday in federal court. A spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney signaled that he would not resist the request for his testimony.

The decision to call Mr. Cheney was announced by Theodore V. Wells, a lawyer for Mr. Libby, whose trial is scheduled to begin next month.

“We’re calling the vice president,” Mr. Wells said at a hearing before Judge Reggie B. Walton in Federal District Court.

Mr. Cheney has been a looming presence in the C.I.A. leak case from the start, and his appearance as a defense witness would keep the vice president and the White House in the foreground of Mr. Libby’s trial. Mr. Libby is the only person charged with a crime as a result of an investigation into whether anyone in the Bush administration intentionally leaked the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency officer.

DOJ_NMG_0107895

After the announcement at Tuesday's hearing, Lea Anne McBride, Mr. Cheney's spokeswoman, said: "We've cooperated fully in this matter and will continue to do so in fairness to the parties involved. And as we've stated previously, we're not going to comment further on the legal proceedings."

The prospect of Mr. Cheney's testimony suggested that Mr. Libby's trial could be transformed from a narrowly gauged perjury case into a riveting courtroom drama with the taciturn vice president as the star witness. He would testify under oath and be exposed to cross-examination by prosecutors.

Mr. Cheney would be the first sitting vice president, at least in modern times, to appear as a witness in a criminal trial, said Prof. Joel Goldstein of the St. Louis University Law School, an authority on the vice presidency.

Although Mr. Cheney has been a vigorous proponent of sweeping executive authority, which includes the notion that the president and perhaps other high officials could resist calls to testify in criminal trials involving their official conduct, his appearance may not set precedents, legal experts said. That is mostly because the Libby case presents a different situation from one in which such officials are subpoenaed to testify, they said.

Mr. Cheney appears to have voluntarily agreed to testify on behalf of Mr. Libby, whom he has steadfastly supported. It is unclear whether Mr. Cheney would appear personally in the courtroom or seek to testify in a less exposed manner like having his testimony taken at the White House and introduced into the trial by videotape.

The trial stems from the disclosure of the identity of Valerie Wilson as a C.I.A. officer in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak. The fallout from that disclosure led to an investigation by Patrick J. Fitzgerald, a special prosecutor, into whether the leak violated any laws and whether Ms. Wilson's name was disclosed as part of a campaign to punish her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador, for his criticism of the White House.

Mr. Wilson wrote an opinion article in The New York Times on July 6, 2003 — shortly before the Novak column — in which he claimed that the White House had twisted intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq. He wrote that he had personally investigated whether Iraq bought uranium in Africa and had not found any basis for that belief.

Mr. Fitzgerald did not bring any charges in connection with laws that prohibit the willful disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity as a covert operative. But he did indict Mr. Libby, also known as Scooter, on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice, saying he had untruthfully testified to a grand jury and federal agents when he said he had learned about Ms. Wilson's role at the C.I.A. from reporters rather than from several officials, including Mr. Cheney.

Mr. Libby's lawyers have said, in court papers, that they will seek to demonstrate that he had no motive to lie and that if he made any inaccurate statements about his conversations with reporters, they were a result of his being distracted by far more important issues of national security.

In his testimony, Mr. Cheney will probably be asked to affirm Mr. Libby's statements that he was occupied with many important issues and that there was no deliberate White House plan to disclose Ms. Wilson's identity.

Prosecutors have said in legal filings that Mr. Cheney played a central role in the White House reaction to Mr. Wilson's Op-Ed article. Mr. Fitzgerald has hinted in filings that Mr. Cheney may be a prosecution witness, although he said at the hearing that the government had no plans to call the vice president.

According to Mr. Libby's grand jury testimony, cited in prosecution legal papers, Mr. Cheney believed that the article falsely attacked his credibility because it asserted that the vice president's office instigated Mr. Wilson's 2002 trip to Niger.

Prosecutors have already disclosed a copy of the article on which Mr. Cheney made handwritten notations asking whether it was Mr. Wilson's wife who sent him on the trip.

In previous legal briefs, prosecutors have said they want to use Mr. Cheney's notes as evidence, saying they show the agitated environment in Mr. Cheney's office and the importance that Mr. Libby attached to the effort to rebut the article.

After Mr. Cheney expressed concern, Mr. Libby told several reporters that Mr. Cheney's office had not sent Mr. Wilson on the trip and that he might have traveled on what was little more than a junket arranged by Ms. Wilson.

With the trial scheduled to start on Jan. 16, Mr. Libby's lawyers and federal prosecutors skirmished throughout the hearing over several likely issues about Mr. Libby's motives and state of mind.

William H. Jeffress Jr., one of the defense lawyers, said he planned to call Mr. Libby as a witness, along with several reporters who interviewed him in mid-2003, to show that Mr. Libby had encouraged the reporters to testify or give depositions in the case.

Atlanta-Area School Board Abandons Evolution Sticker Case (LAW/AP)

By Doug Gross, The Associated Press

Law.com, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0107896

A suburban Atlanta school board that put stickers in high school science books saying evolution is "a theory, not a fact" abandoned its legal battle to keep them Tuesday after four years.

The Cobb County board agreed in federal court never to use a similar sticker or to undermine the teaching of evolution in science classes.

In return, the parents who sued over the stickers agreed to drop all legal action.

"We certainly think that it's a win not just for our clients but for all students in Cobb County and, really, all residents of Georgia," said Beth Littrell of the American Civil Liberties Union of Georgia.

The case briefly became an issue in Kansas in 2005, when Attorney General Phill Kline told State Board of Education members in private meetings that he would defend them if they wanted to put such stickers in textbooks.

The board didn't pursue the idea but instead rewrote science standards to incorporate anti-evolution language. After elections this year overturned the board's 6-4 conservative Republican majorities, those standards are likely to become evolution-friendly again next year.

The Atlanta school board placed the stickers inside the front cover of biology books in 2002 after a group of parents complained that evolution was being taught to the exclusion of other theories, including a literal reading of the biblical story of creation.

The stickers read: "This textbook contains material on evolution. Evolution is a theory, not a fact, regarding the origin of living things. This material should be approached with an open mind, studied carefully and critically considered."

A federal judge ordered the stickers removed in 2005, saying they amount to an unconstitutional government endorsement of religion. The school board appealed, but a federal appeals court sent the case back, saying it did not have enough information.

"We faced the distraction and expense of starting all over with more legal actions and another trial," said board Chairwoman Teresa Plenge. "With this agreement, it is done and we now have a clean slate for the new year."

School board attorney Linwood Gunn said the agreement is not an admission that the stickers were unconstitutional. "The school board attempted to reach what they thought was a reasonable compromise," he said.

The board agreed to pay about one-third of the plaintiffs' court costs, Gunn said.

"The settlement brings to end a long battle to keep our science classes free of political or religious agendas," parent Jeffrey Selman said in a statement handed out by Americans United for Separation of Church and State, one of the groups that represented the plaintiffs.

It was one of several recent battles over what role evolution should play in science education.

Last year, a federal judge barred the Dover, Pa., school district from teaching "intelligent design" as an alternative to evolution.

In 2004, Georgia's state schools superintendent briefly proposed a science curriculum that dropped the word "evolution" in favor of "changes over time." That plan was scrapped amid protests by teachers.

Cobb County has a population of about 660,000.

Copyright 2006 Associated Press. All Rights Reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

Raising The Floor On Pay (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, December 20, 2006

On the verge of controlling Congress, the Democrats are making a much-delayed increase in the minimum wage their signature attempt to lift incomes and quiet widespread economic anxiety. But the party's modest proposal does not catch up with what the states have already done to raise the wages of tens of millions of workers.

Putting a floor under wages was once the domain of the national government, a legacy of the New Deal that lasted for decades. As recently as 1984, only one state — Alaska — had a higher minimum.

By then, however, Congress no longer regularly increased the minimum. So the states stepped into the vacuum, one after another, everywhere but in the South. In the last election alone, voters in six states approved minimums higher than the federal level, and in some states cost-of-living clauses automatically increase the minimums — a step that Congress has never taken and that most Democrats still balk at.

Some advocates wonder whether Congress can regain the lead, or should. "I am very strongly in favor of populism at the national level, but it is not happening," said Gar Alperovitz, a political economist at the University of Maryland who supports and studies populist movements at the state and local level.

DOJ_NMG_0107897

"The minimum wage is definitely a populist issue," he said, "but to go beyond the present modest effort in Congress, you have to build support state by state until there is a new national consensus as to what the minimum should be. That is a long slog."

The minimum wage is not the only issue in which the states have taken the lead from the federal government. California, for example, has pushed to limit the emission of global warming gases, and New York City has just enacted the first major ban on the use of trans fats in restaurant cooking.

When it comes to the minimum wage, the Democrats plan to introduce a bill in Congress next month that would increase the federal minimum for the first time in a decade — to $7.25 an hour in the spring of 2009, reaching that level in three steps from the present $5.15 an hour.

More than 13 million workers earning less than $7.25 an hour today, or just above that, would get raises. The majority are adults working full time, mainly in the South and Southwest. The 29 states that have jumped ahead of the federal government now have minimums that range from $6.15 to $7.63 an hour, lifting 70 percent of the nation's work force well above the federal level of $5.15. Most of these state minimums have escalators built into them.

As a result, even in the unlikely event that none of the states took any further action, 12 of them, representing 33 percent of the work force, would still have minimums either equal to or above $7.25 an hour in 2009, according to projections by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School.

Many of the state minimums were enacted over the last decade. Indeed, when the federal minimum rose to $5.15 an hour in 1997, less than 5 percent of the work force enjoyed higher state minimums.

"What you have are a growing number of states more oriented toward workers than in the past," said Richard B. Freeman, a Harvard labor economist, adding: "The left is uneasy about states' rights, but people are becoming more progressive at the local level. They can see what is happening to their neighbors, and they are more sympathetic toward the poor, whom they can also see."

Starting in the early 1980s, after Ronald Reagan was elected president, increasing the federal minimum wage by more than token amounts ran into a buzz saw of opposition. Conservative economists contended that regular increases distorted the free supply and demand for workers. Citing longstanding economic research, they said it did more harm than good, prompting employers to drop marginal workers not worth the higher minimum.

That was still the prevailing view in the early 1990s when two labor economists, David Card, now at the University of California, Berkeley, and Alan B. Krueger at Princeton, found that modest increases in low minimum wages had no impact on employment, and in fact might reduce turnover.

The states themselves became tests of this finding. As more of them increased their minimums without measurable effect on employment, the opposition faded. Even the chief critic of the Card-Krueger position, David Neumark, a labor economist at the University of California, Irvine, has softened his position, though he still sees little if any advantage in a higher minimum wage.

"A congressman once said to me, 'Suppose you are right and the minimum wage reduces employment; does that mean we should not raise the minimum?' " Mr. Neumark said in an interview.

"And I said, 'No, I don't know; it depends,' " he went on. "There is some cost to raising the minimum, but there may be some benefit. If I thought one guy would lose his job and a thousand would be lifted out of poverty, I would say that is a pretty good trade-off. But my research says there is no evidence you reduce poverty."

Even the higher state minimums are often not enough to keep millions of workers out of poverty. Consider Elvia Rios, a 43-year-old college graduate from Panama who worked as an executive secretary there before immigrating to the United States three years ago. She earns the New Jersey minimum of $7.15 an hour as a stockroom employee, working 40 hours a week at a large retail store in the center of the state.

Ms. Rios and her 2-year-old daughter are living in a homeless shelter run by the Interfaith Hospitality Network, a nonprofit organization. She gets help with her daily expenses, particularly child care, from charities as well as the state. When Ms. Rios moves into an apartment next month, the state will pay 70 percent of the $1,200-a-month rent for two years. It will do so under an assistance program for women who are victims of domestic violence.

"The $7.15 an hour is just not enough," Ms. Rios said. "I don't pay any rent right now, but I soon will and I will also have to buy what the child needs."

How much income would be enough? At least $9 an hour, she said, "to live not well but without falling into poverty."

Trying to reach beyond that goal, Ms. Rios plans to enroll in a course that will train her by early spring to care for the elderly — work that in New Jersey pays $12 or $13 an hour, she says.

"The job I do now, I don't like," Ms. Rios said. "I prefer to take care of elderly people or ill people or children."

DOJ_NMG_0107898

The decades immediately after World War II were the heyday of the federal minimum wage. Without following any particular formula, Congress periodically ended up setting it at roughly one-half the average hourly pay of the nation's production workers. That average is nearly $17 an hour today; half would be $8.50. By 2009 it is likely to be close to the $9 that Ms. Rios seeks.

Spurred on by last month's election results, the populist wing of the Democratic Party is calling for a return to the old standard. Sherrod Brown, newly elected to the Senate from Ohio, is in that group. So is the A.F.L.-C.I.O., which says that its success in getting out the vote this fall entitles it to a bigger voice in Democratic Party policy.

But they are meeting political resistance from the moderates in the party. Trying to push the populist case, the Economic Policy Institute, a labor-oriented research center, posted a statement in late November calling for an increase in the minimum to $8 an hour in 2009 instead of the $7.25 proposed by the party leaders. That recommendation was quickly withdrawn, however, under pressure from the leadership.

"Our friends on Capitol Hill said our statement would be heard as criticizing the Democrats," said Ross Eisenbrey, the institute's policy director. "It would not be perceived as encouragement to do more; it would be perceived as raining on the parade."

In a second statement, issued this month, the Economic Policy Institute finally endorsed the increase to $7.25, stipulating that once Congress approved this amount, a second bill should be introduced to raise it to a higher $8 in 2009.

Senator-elect Brown and the A.F.L.-C.I.O. have taken similar stands, wanting more but nevertheless endorsing the bill that the Democratic leadership intends to introduce in the first 100 hours of the new Congress.

No Democrat has pushed harder in Congress for increases in the federal minimum wage than Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, the bill's author. He was the chief sponsor of the last increase, enacted a decade ago. He first tried to introduce the current proposal in 2004, but was unsuccessful in a Republican-dominated Congress.

Now he and other party leaders argue that they cannot go above a $7.25 minimum wage without risking a presidential veto. Once it becomes law, Senator Kennedy plans to push for an increase beyond $7.25. Still, he acknowledges that the initiative may indeed have passed to the states.

"States have always been the laboratories of democracy, and I am proud of the leadership they have shown on this issue," Senator Kennedy said in a written response to a question. "Philosophically, are we O.K. with leaving the minimum wage in their hands?"

Liberal economists and policy makers are divided on this point. Mr. Alperovitz says there is no other choice but to go with the states. At the federal level, he argues, the Democrats are no longer a powerful source of progressive legislation.

They have lost their influence for three reasons, he said: the decline in union power; the defection of the South to the Republican Party; and the absence of a riveting economic crisis, like the Depression, that demands national solutions.

The problem with letting the initiative shift to the states, argues Ronald Blackwell, chief economist at the A.F.L.-C.I.O., is that the variety of state minimums encourages companies to shift jobs to the lower-wage states.

Mr. Freeman, the Harvard economist, argues in response that the various minimums are useful, reflecting different living costs across the country.

Mississippi, for example, like most Southern states, simply adheres to the federal minimum of $5.15 an hour. If it were forced to go to a $9 federal minimum, the drastic increase, even spread out over two or three years, would eliminate many of the low-end jobs that have migrated to the state, Mr. Freeman said.

On the other hand, that same $9 an hour would be no problem for Washington State, where the minimum is already $7.63 and will rise to $7.94 next year.

"The fight at the federal level is really no longer over how high the minimum should go," Mr. Freeman said, "but where the low end should be."

Abramoff's Holiday Cheer (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

These days he makes no more than 40 cents an hour for his labors at the federal prison camp at Cumberland, Md. But Christmas 2001 was a far more high-flying holiday for Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who then was paid as much as $500 an hour.

Back then -- before he pleaded guilty to defrauding banks in a deal to buy a casino cruise line -- Abramoff was a top rainmaker at Greenberg Traurig's Washington office and liked to be generous at this time of year, at least to those who could help him. He compiled a list of 45 people to whom his staff was supposed to send gifts such as a Baccarat crystal bowl and a platinum Tiffany clock.

DOJ_NMG_0107899

A copy of his holiday gift list, obtained by The Washington Post, details one of the methods that Washington lobbyists can use to flatter clients and lawmakers. It shows that those who had helped enrich Abramoff got a reward, and his father and brother and their wives got either cookies or a fruit basket.

Three members of Congress and one staff member were among his intended gift recipients, according to the list. Three of them received a more lavish item than House ethics rules allowed, if Abramoff's assistants followed his instructions.

Then-House Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) was listed as the intended recipient of a $250 box of Godiva chocolates; Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.) was to receive a $100 gift basket from Harry and David; and Susan Hirschmann, DeLay's chief of staff, was to get a Godiva box worth $100. Rep. John T. Doolittle (R-Calif.) was to get a less valuable gift: some Jerry Seinfeld CDs.

All four were close to Abramoff and his clients. DeLay, for example, had traveled the previous year to a Scottish golf course and a posh London hotel on Abramoff's credit card; he also voted against legislation opposed by two Abramoff clients that helped underwrite that trip. In 2000, Abramoff listed Rohrabacher in bank documents as a personal reference for his casino-boat purchase.

Doolittle endorsed a politician in the Northern Mariana Islands who helped hire Abramoff as a lobbyist; Doolittle's wife, Julie, was hired by Abramoff's lobbying firm in 2002. Hirschmann worked with Abramoff's office to arrange the golf trip, and Abramoff's credit card was used to pay her husband's plane fare.

Ethics rules have long barred House members and staff from receiving gifts from registered lobbyists separately worth more than $50. Reached by phone, DeLay said, "I don't think I got a box of Godiva chocolates" from Abramoff, adding that a box worth $250 would be "memorable." Doolittle spokeswoman Laura Blackann said the Seinfeld CDs were of negligible value.

Tara Setmayer, a spokeswoman for Rohrabacher, said that the congressman does not recall receiving a fruit basket from Abramoff but added that between the two close friends, it was a "regular practice" to exchange gifts. She said anything the congressman received from the lobbyist was "under the limit" set by the House.

As is typical with many lobbyists -- and not illegal or improper -- clients received generous gifts. In Abramoff's case they included Tiffany trinkets, Montblanc pens and $300 clocks.

Kathryn Van Hoof, a lawyer for the Coushatta Indian tribe, was to receive a $200 Montblanc pen. In March 2001, she negotiated a lobbying contract with Abramoff that called for the tribe to pay his firm $125,000 a month. Chitimacha tribe chairman Alton D. LeBlanc Jr., who publicly defended Abramoff's $120,000 annual lobbying fees, was also to get a Montblanc.

Identical pens were to go to Marina Nevskaya and Alexander Koulakovsky, two Russian oil executives who had hired Abramoff to help them arrange meetings with DeLay and lobby for federal aid. Willie Tan, a textile magnate in the Mariana Islands who helped direct $650,000 to a nonprofit group linked to DeLay, was to get a Montblanc, and two of Tan's aides were to get fruit baskets.

Nell Rogers, the Choctaw tribe's liaison with Abramoff and the person who processed his firm's multimillion-dollar bills, was to get a Baccarat bowl. At congressional hearings in June 2005, she would describe Abramoff's work for the tribe as "a story of betrayal."

Former Christian Coalition leader Ralph Reed, who agreed in October 2001 to help Abramoff stifle a new casino that could compete with an Abramoff client casino, was to receive a fruit basket. "Let's give him a list of things we want . . . [and] some chump change to get it done," Abramoff told a partner about Reed in a February 2002 e-mail.

Amy and David Ridenour, who ran the National Center for Public Policy Research, were to get a $100 fruit basket. A congressional report would later describe their nonprofit organization as an "appendage" of Abramoff's lobbying operation, and Abramoff himself, in a 2002 e-mail, would tell a client that their group "can direct money at our discretion, anywhere if you know what i mean."

Maynard Kahgegab, a chief of the Saginaw Chippewa tribe that signed a costly lobbying contract with Abramoff in December 2001, was listed tentatively as the recipient of a Tiffany platinum alarm clock valued at $295. In an e-mail on Dec. 17 of that year, Abramoff described members of that tribe as "troglodytes." A tribal council removed Kahgegab from office on June 2, 2004, for misconduct related to Abramoff.

Abramoff has been telling federal investigators about many of these connections since he pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials; his sentence for that crime is slated to be meted out in the spring. A spokesman for Abramoff's lawyer declined to comment.

Staff researcher Karl Evanzz and research editor Alice Crites contributed to this article.

DOJ_NMG_0107900

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, December 21, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Thursday, December 21, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061221.pdf; agnb061221.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Leahy Wants To Question Gonzales About Arar Case, Rendition Policy....3
US Convicts Pakistani Man Of Supporting Indian Terror Group....3
Video Shows Attack On US Embassy In Damascus....3
Threat Of Terror Attack In Europe Thought To Be Increasing....4
Alleged Terrorists Can Appeal Sanctions To UN Security Council....4
WPost Says Congress Should Restore Habeas Corpus For Accused Terrorists....4

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says DHS Must Be Honest With Congress, Public About Capabilities, Costs....4
DHS IG Finds Holes In Acquisition Oversight, Secure Border Initiative....5
Reliance Of Biometric Security Devices Seen As Risky....5
British Firm May Get Anthrax Vaccine Contract....5

War News:

Bush Reiterates US "Not Winning" In Iraq....5
CIA Simulation Finds US Defeat In Iraq Would Be Boon To Al Qaeda....9
Cody Says US Involved In "Global," New Kind Of War....10
Pentagon Says It Will Need Additional $99 Billion For War....10
Sistani's Influence Seen As Declining As Sadr-Hakim Rivalry Intensifies....10
Another Day Of Severe Violence In Iraq....11
Najaf Security Turned Over To Iraqis....11
Fugitive Iraqi Minister May Return To Illinois....11
As Violence Mounts, French Pull Some Soldiers Out Of Afghanistan....12
Pakistani City Of Quetta Serving As Taliban Refuge....12

DOJ:

Griffin Sworn In As Interim Eastern Arkansas USA....12
DOJ's In-Sites Magazine Praises Georgia Community Policing Program....12
DOJ Grant Fund Cut Imperils Ohio Anti-Drug Task Force....13

Corporate Scandals:

Juniper Taking $900 Million Charge To Cover Tainted CEO Options....13
Four Former Enterasys Executives Convicted Of Fraud, Conspiracy....14
Homestore CEO Hopes To Remain Free Pending Appeal....14
Dell Names Carty CFO To Tackle Accounting Problems....14
Wall Street Group Says Connecticut Election Law Violates Privacy Rights....15
Virginia Investment Firm Settles Insider Trading Case For $7.8 Million....15
Columnist Says Sarbanes-Oxley Discourages New Companies From Going Public....15
WSJournal Notes Hedge Fund Manager's Effort To Limit Disclosure....15

Criminal Law:

NYC Gang Member Convicted Of Killing Detectives, Faces Death Penalty....16
Alaska Man Indicted On Federal Sex, Drug Trafficking Charges....16
Virginia Task Force Recommends Stiffer Internet Predator Punishments....17
Wilson Asks Judge To Quash Libby Subpoena....17
California Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud....17
Three Indicted For Alleged Roles In CyberNET Fraud....17
Insurance Administrator Sentenced To Prison For Defrauding Union Pensions....18
RCMP, ICE Bust Fraudulent Canadian Telemarketing Syndicate....18
Virginia DNA Database Missing Data On Thousands Of Felons....18

New York Inmate Seeks Vacating Of Murder Conviction Based On New DNA Evidence 18
Houston Police Suspect Serial Rapist In Attacks On Five Men 18
Some Say Supermax Security Weak, But Nearby Residents Skeptical 18
Reason For Leap In Robbery Rate Unclear 19
NYTimes Calls 17-Year Old's Statutory Rape Conviction "Miscarriage Of Justice." 19

Civil Law:

DOJ Seeks Appointment Of US Trustee For $800 Million USVI Bankruptcy Case 19

Civil Rights:

North Carolina Lawmaker Seeks DOJ Probe Of Duke Rape Case Prosecutor 19
New Mexico To Allow New Patients At Medical Center Probed By DOJ 20

Antitrust:

Delta Antitrust Lawyer Says DOJ Unlikely To Approve US Airways Merger 20
FCC Ruling To Speed Phone Company Access To Cable TV Markets 20
FTC Approves CVS Purchase Of Caremark Rx 21
Wisconsin Energy Selling Only Nuclear Plant To FPL Group 21
Service Corp. International Seeks FTC Approval Of Funeral Home Sales 21
Judge Refuses Motion To Dismiss Antitrust Allegations Against Amway 21
NYSE Shareholders Approve Euronext Acquisition 21
M&F Worldwide Offers $1.7 Billion For Check-Maker John H. Harland 22
Sky Financial, Huntington Bancshares To Merge 22
Internet Video Boom Spurs Ericsson To Purchase Redback Networks 22
Arcelor Mittal Buys Grupo Villacero For $1.4 Billion 22
European Commission Approves MAN's €10.3 Billion Hostile Bid For Scania 22
Italian Regulator Orders Banca Intesa To Sell Branches For Sanpaolo Acquisition 22

Environment:

US Behind In Reforestation Efforts 23
Lawsuits Seek To Block Maryland ICC Commuter Highway. 23
Global Warming Trading Program Comes Under Fire 23

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales To Decide Whether Alleged Drug Trafficking Kingpin Faces Death Penalty 24
Web Site Seen As Risk To Undercover Agents, Informants 24
California Marijuana Dispensary Defies Order To Close 24
Trove Of FBI Documents More Than Twenty-Five Years Old About To Be Declassified 25
FBI Investigation Targets Firms Tied To New York Senate Leader 25
Congressman Seeks FBI Help In Search For Missing Persons In Mexico 26
Tennessee Waltz Target Reportedly Accepted $40,000 Watch From Developer 26
Three Former Students Plead Guilty To Alabama Church Arsons 26
USMS's Briskman Called "Washington's…Warren Buffett." ... 27
US Marshals Arrest New Hampshire Bank Robbery Suspect In Florida 27
Ohio Police, US Marshals Arrest Alleged Child Rapist 27
USMS Arrests Tennessee Statutory Rape Fugitives In Louisiana 27

Immigration:

Disabled Immigrants Sue Federal Agencies Over Loss Of Benefits 27
US-Mexico Border Separates Many Families 28
NYTimes Praises Bush On Immigration 28

Tax:

Judge Rejects Defense Request For Separate KPMG Trials 28
Syracuse University Study Finds Fewer IRS Audits Of Large Companies 28
South Dakota Accounting Firm Implicated In Chicago Tax Fraud Case 28

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Enforce Clinton Declassification Order 29
IG Report Gives New Details On Berger's Removal Of Classified Documents 29
Bush Links Minimum Wage Hike To Small Business Tax Relief 29
Bush Signs Omnibus Tax Break, Trade Bill 30
Bush Signs Postal Service Overhaul Measure 31
Bush Signs Bill To Fund Clean Up Of Abandoned Coal Mines 31
Democrats Plan Stepped-Up Investigations 31
Goode Under Fire For Criticizing Muslim Congressman's Use Of Koran For Oath 31

DOJ_NMG_0107903

Democrats Challenge Loss In Florida's 13th CD 32
Shift To Right On Social Issues Said To Raise Questions About Romney..... 32
Law Professor Defends Judicial Ethics Act Of 2006 32
Personnel News 33

Other News:

Chavez Claims US Envoy Lied About Drug Trafficking..... 33
Bush Rejects Talks With Syria, Iran..... 33
US, UK To Move Forces To Persian Gulf In "Display Of Military Resolve Toward Iran." 33
Hill "Encouraged" As Six-Party Talks Enter Fourth Day..... 35
Somali Factions Agree To Resume Peace Talks 35
Saudi Arabia Names Jubeir Ambassador To US 35
Rice Says Darfur Remains "Deep Concern" To US 35
US Condemns EU Plans To Include Airlines In Emissions Trading Scheme 36
China Cracks Down On Investigative Reporting 36

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 37

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 37

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Wants To Question Gonzales About Arar Case, Rendition Policy. The Toronto Star (12/20, Harper) reported, "The incoming chair of a powerful Senate committee says he will summon U.S. Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales before American legislators to explain why Maher Arar is still barred from the U.S." Sen. Patrick Leahy "said Arar has the right to know what suspicions the Bush administration still harbour against him after he was exonerated by a Canadian inquiry. 'The Canadian government has now documented that the wrong thing was done to the wrong man,' Leahy said. 'It is time for the (Bush) administration to do what it can to redress this wrong, instead of perpetuating it.'" The Star added, "Leahy says he wants Gonzales before his committee to discuss the entire U.S. policy of rendition and he said in a speech last week he will no longer put up with non-answers shrouded in security concerns or promises to get back to him." Leahy added, "You know they are going to be tortured. This is beneath our country. And it does absolutely nothing to make us more secure and it is a gross human rights violation." AFP (12/21) reports on the Toronto Star interview with Leahy about his intention to question Gonzales about Arar and the renditions.

US Convicts Pakistani Man Of Supporting Indian Terror Group. The AP (12/21) reports, "A Pakistani man was convicted Wednesday of financially supporting a militant separatist group in India, federal prosecutors announced. Khalid Awan, of Garden City [MI], was convicted by a federal jury after a two-week trial in Brooklyn and faces up to 45 years in prison. Awan, 44, was charged with helping the Khalistan Commando Force, a Sikh secessionist group that operated in India's Punjab state. The group, founded in 1986, is considered a terrorist organization in India and is said to be responsible for the deaths of thousands of people through bombings, sabotage and assassinations." The AP adds, "'The war on terror is a global battle,' said Roslynn Mauskopf, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York. 'We will not permit individuals in our jurisdiction to finance terrorist groups responsible for murder and violence in any part of the world.' … Awan's sentencing is set for March 7."

Video Shows Attack On US Embassy In Damascus. ABC World News (12/20, story 7, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For our 'Closer Look' tonight, something almost never scene -- a terrorist strike captured in real-time on videotape. It was a brazen assault on the US Embassy in Syria three months ago by Islamic militants with guns, grenades and explosives. There are many questions about this attack, including whether Syria may have had advanced knowledge it was going to happen. The tape obtained by ABC News offers the first look at what really happened that day in Damascus." ABC (Ross) added, "A US government security camera was rolling as the attackers in the white car pull up outside the embassy wall." ABC noted that "while the embassy is only a few feet from the road, the attackers are not able to breach the heavily reinforced walls."

DOJ_NMG_0107904

Bruce Tully, a former US Diplomatic Security Service agent, told ABC, "We've poured money and technology into this. It was a very good day for the US and a very bad day for the terrorists." ABC also noted that "of the 13 attacks on US embassies in the last 8 years, this is one of the few that remains a mystery as to who was responsible."

Threat Of Terror Attack In Europe Thought To Be Increasing. The Washington Post (12/21, A20, Whitlock, 690K) reports the "threat of a terrorist attack on European soil by Islamic radicals has increased substantially in recent months, reaching its highest levels since the London transit attacks of July 2005, according to European counterterrorism officials. Adding to the anxiety: fresh threats against Britain and France delivered Wednesday by al-Qaeda's deputy leader." Al Qaeda second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahri "singled out Britain as a historical enemy of Muslims, blaming it for the creation of the state of Israel and the downfall of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century." Zawahri's "recent remarks have particularly concerned French counterterrorism officials. They have warned of a heightened risk of attacks because of a newly declared alliance between al-Qaeda and an Algerian-based network, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has developed an extensive collection of cells in France and elsewhere in Europe."

Alleged Terrorists Can Appeal Sanctions To UN Security Council. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A10, Crawford, 2.04M) reports, "Alleged al Qaeda and Taliban supporters blacklisted by the United Nations Security Council will be able to petition directly to have their names removed and sanctions lifted, removing a top complaint of lawyers and civil-rights lobbies." The UNSC "cleared the way for a form of appeals process when it voted Tuesday to set up an office to handle requests by individuals to lift sanctions imposed under a range of U.N. resolutions dating back to 1992."

WPost Says Congress Should Restore Habeas Corpus For Accused Terrorists. The Washington Post (12/21, A28, 690K) editorializes, "One of the actions Congress took in the hastily passed Military Commissions Act was to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over" lawsuits such as that filed by accused terrorist Salim Hamdan "that were already pending. Under the act, many other important cases will probably have to be dismissed -- which is why Congress should promptly amend the law when it reconvenes in January." The "fault here lies with Congress, not with" US District Judge James Robertson, who "held that the legislature had unambiguously stripped the courts of jurisdiction over all lawsuits challenging detentions at Guantanamo Bay -- so-called habeas corpus lawsuits. And he ruled as well that Congress had the power under the Constitution to do so -- at least for aliens held beyond American shores. But saying that Congress acted lawfully is not the same as saying it acted wisely."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says DHS Must Be Honest With Congress, Public About Capabilities, Costs. Government Executive/National Journal (12/20, Harris) ran an edited transcript of a Dec. 5 interview with DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff, who said the agency's performance "improved quite a bit in the past two years," but "acknowledged that he didn't anticipate just how high a hill he would have to climb when he became department secretary." Chertoff "described some of his major goals, responded to his critics, and talked about what lawmakers and the public should -- and shouldn't -- expect from the Homeland Security Department." Asked whether the public understands "that the federal government will not respond immediately to a major catastrophe," Chertoff said, "I think everyone intellectually knew that the feds weren't going to be there immediately. The federal government does not own all the response resources. The National Guard is the single biggest response resource." Chertoff added that governors "must…take the responsibility to make sure that the National Guard is properly trained and able to work. What we have to do is make sure the National Guard training and planning is integrated with ours." Discussing criticism of the department's contract management, Chertoff said, "We have to be honest with Congress and the public. We ought to ask the question very directly: Do you want us to short-circuit the contracting rules in a time of national emergency?" Chertoff continued, "I've become more and more convinced that one of the best things I can do is to be completely crystal clear about what it is you want us to do: What are our capabilities, what are you prepared to give us or not give us, what's it going to cost, and what can we deliver? Accountability is not about gotcha. It's about clarity of goal, accurate assessment of capability and of cost, and the deliberate decision-making about what you want to do."

DOJ_NMG_0107905

DHS IG Finds Holes In Acquisition Oversight, Secure Border Initiative. Government Executive (12/20, Marino) reported a report released Wednesday by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general found that the agency "needs to establish a more comprehensive acquisition oversight program and better plan an initiative to secure the borders." The report stated "that DHS' contract writing systems are incompatible with the Federal Procurement Data System - Next Generation, a governmentwide repository for information on acquisitions," and that some of the department's "contract writing systems 'may need to be replaced." The report also said, of the Secure Border Initiative, "that DHS is embarking upon a multibillion-dollar acquisition project without having laid the foundation to effectively oversee and assess contractor performance and effectively control cost and schedule. DHS has not properly defined, validated and stabilized operational requirements." The report "singled out DHS' Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau and the Coast Guard as needing better financial management" and, citing "significant interdependencies" between CBP and ICE, said "'jurisdictional, operational and communication gaps exist between the two organizations that must be addressed by DHS leadership.' DHS Spokesman Jarrod Agen cited ICE's and CBP's joint efforts to end the United States' catch-and-release policy of dealing with illegal immigrants as an example of how both agencies 'effectively worked together.' In a written response to the IG, DHS officials said the department will continue to build its acquisition workforce, and 'initiatives to resolve personnel shortages will include a centralized recruiting system for contract personnel within DHS components.'"

The Federal Times (12/20, Friedman) reported Inspector General Richard Skinner wrote "that almost four years after the government's largest reorganization in a half-century, the department 'still has much to do to establish a cohesive, efficient and effective organization.'" He said Hurricane Katrina "highlighted longstanding problems at the Federal Emergency Management Agency in managing assistance and housing for disaster evacuees, information and systems, contracts, grants and flood insurance. The IG also is conducting reviews of FEMA's intake process for evacuees, its management of the national flood insurance program, and its acquisition management structure, the report says."

Reliance Of Biometric Security Devices Seen As Risky. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, B3, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports a rise in the use of biometric security devices in the business world has been accompanied by "increasing worry that these security devices can be faked out. Deception methods including well-made copies of fingerprints, masks or contact lenses that replicate iris patterns might be used to defeat the new identification technologies." International Biometric Group, a consulting firm hired by Financial Services Technology Consortium to assess how successful the devices are has taken the preliminary view that they "aren't spoof-proof." Meanwhile, "Use of biometrics in various applications is exploding," and companies that make the devices "downplay the risk of spoofing."

British Firm May Get Anthrax Vaccine Contract. The Washington Post (12/21, D3, Merle, 690K) reports the cancellation of VaxGen's "high-profile contract to produce 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine leaves federal heath officials years away from a replacement for the version now in use but could raise the prospects for an alternative being developed by a British competitor." After "delays and technical problems, the Department of Health and Human Services voided" VaxGen's "$877.5 million contract Tuesday. The department has not announced plans to replace it, but an alternative version being developed by Avecia of Manchester, England, is being tested, and the National Institutes of Health is expected to award contracts next year for research into advanced vaccines."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Reiterates US "Not Winning" In Iraq. President Bush held a press conference yesterday in which he reiterated his assessment, first made in a Tuesday interview with the Washington Post, that the US is "not winning" in Iraq. Though, as the Financial Times (12/21, Daniel) reports, "the president seemed to retreat from this bleak assessment…saying that comment 'reflected the fact that we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted,'" Bush's "not winning" remark dominated media coverage for a second straight day. The CBS Evening News (12/20, lead story, 3:09, Couric, 7.66M), for example, opened its broadcast saying Bush "admits the United States is not winning the war in Iraq. Most of the American public doubts we can win, but not the President. At a news conference today he said flat out 'I believe we are going to win.' If he didn't think so, he added, he wouldn't have US troops there." CBS (Axelrod) added the President "admitted the insurgents have been having quite a run in Iraq, calling 2006 a difficult year for US troops. But he gave no indication of any plan to bring those troops home any time soon."

DOJ_NMG_0107906

Media reports saw a change in Bush's tone during yesterday's press conference. The AP (12/21, Hunt) says Bush was "unusually candid," while NBC Nightly News (12/20, lead story, 2:45, O'Donnell, 9.87M) spoke of "a stark new-year prediction on Iraq from the President today: difficult choices and additional sacrifices in 2007. … While still using words like victory, the President left room to read between the lines -- less certainty, more hedge. Here's the contrast just eight weeks ago." The New York Times (12/21, Stolberg, 1.16M) describes Bush as "somber and at times reflective," though he "showed no indication that he was inclined to change goals or pull out of Iraq." The Times also notes Bush "used the news conference to confirm his plans, disclosed Tuesday in an interview with The Washington Post, to propose an increase in the permanent size of both the Army and the Marines. He called the global campaign against terrorism 'the calling of our generation,' and he said the military needed to be beefed up to fight it." The Financial Times (12/21, Daniel) says "the tone of the press conference reflected a hesitant president, conscious of his legacy, struggling to find a way out of Iraq and redefine his agenda after losing control of the House and Senate." The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Gerstenzang, 850K) referred to an "uncharacteristically dour assessment" by the President, and adds he appeared "reflective." His statements "reflected a new willingness to acknowledge that the sectarian violence in Iraq has grown consistently worse and political cooperation there is flagging."

ABC World News (12/20, story 4, 2:35, Tapper, 8.78M) called Bush's assessment of the situation "grim…basically saying 2006 in Iraq was bad, 2007 could be even worse." The President "came before the public to offer an unusually somber look at both the past and the future in Iraq." Bush was shown saying, "2006 was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people. We began the year with optimism after watching nearly 12 million Iraqis go to the polls to vote for a unity government and a free future. The enemies of liberty responded fiercely to this advance of freedom." Bush's "look ahead seemed bleaker still." Bush: "It's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices, because the enemy is merciless and violent." ABC added, "Just six weeks ago, the President sounded much more upbeat." Bush (from October 25, 2006): "Absolutely we're winning. Al Qaeda's on the run."

The Chicago Tribune (12/21, Silva, 617K) says Bush "now offers a more sobering assessment of the war -- saying that American forces are neither winning nor losing, but still asserting that victory will be achieved. That victory, as he has defined it before, remains the promise of an Iraqi government that can govern the nation, sustain it and defend it against unrelenting violence."

The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A6, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports "Bush's comments highlighted the administration's search for a long-term strategy that is sustainable politically at a time when a majority of Americans have concluded the US is losing in Iraq."

The Washington Times (12/21, Curl, 88K) headlines its story "Bush Concedes Us Not Ready For Iraq," and reports Bush said "US forces were inadequately prepared to handle sectarian violence that broke out in Iraq after the fall of Baghdad."

First Lady Notes Husband Says US "Not Losing, Either." The CBS Evening News (12/20, story 4, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We have another perspective on the war in Iraq tonight and it comes from the person closest to President Bush, his wife of 29 years, Laura. She talked exclusively…to Bob Schieffer." Mrs. Bush: "It has been a difficult year. I think this year especially watching the violence in Iraq is difficult for Americans and difficult for people around the world to watch." Schieffer: "I noticed the President now says he wants to enlarge the army. For so long he said he didn't want to do that. He now concedes that we're not winning in Iraq." Mrs. Bush: "Well, he said we weren't losing, either." Schieffer: "Yes, but was it hard for him to come to those conclusions?" Mrs. Bush: "He, as the President, has to assess and try to make the decisions for our troops, for our country, that are the best for Iraq to try to stabilize the government there, for them to have a chance to have reconciliation and build their government. We know Iraqis want to."

In "Shift," Bush Says Commanders' Opinion On Troop Levels "Just One Set Of Many." The CBS Evening News (12/20, lead story, 3:09, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported Bush "always says he defers to his commanders when talking about troop levels. Well, today a shift: Talking about a possible surge, Mr Bush said the commanders' voices are just one set of many that he's listening to."

DOJ_NMG_0107907

NBC Nightly News (12/20, lead story, 2:45, O'Donnell, 9.87M) also said "the President gave less weight to the views of military leaders, a change from how he described their input in October." Bush (from October 30, 2006): "If they want more troops, they get more troops. If they want less troops, they get less troops." Yesterday "he referred to them as one part of his consultation process." Bush: "The opinion of my commanders is very important. They are bright, capable, smart people whose opinion matters to me a lot."

Under the headline "Contention Increases On Troop Numbers," the Washington Post (12/21, A1, Baker, 690K) reports "the debate over sending more US troops to Iraq intensified yesterday as…Bush signaled that he will listen but not necessarily defer to balky military officers." The Post adds, "The tension between the White House and the Joint Chiefs of Staff over the proposed troop increase has come to dominate the administration's post-election search for a new strategy in Iraq. The uniformed leadership has opposed sending additional forces without a clear mission, seeing the idea as ill-formed and driven by a desire in the White House to do something different even without a defined purpose."

"Surge" Option Said To Put Bush In Tough Political Predicament. USA Today (12/21, Nichols, 2.27M) says Bush yesterday "confirmed that one option he is considering is sending tens of thousands of additional troops to Iraq to try to establish control in key areas, particularly Baghdad. The president said that before he would pursue such a strategy, he and his military planners would have to agree on a 'specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops.'" But the AP (12/21, Baldor) reports, "Defense Secretary Robert Gates found American commanders wary of a proposal to rush more US troops to Iraq as he visited the war-ravaged country Wednesday. … On just his third day in charge of the Pentagon, Gates made the unannounced trip with the administration under intense pressure to forge a new strategy -- and just hours after the president conceded, for the first time, that the US is not winning the conflict." The AP Adds, "After meeting with top US generals at Camp Victory, Gates acknowledged concerns that rushing thousands more American troops to the battlefront could allow the Iraqis to slow their effort take control of the country. He said no decisions have been made." The Washington Post (12/21, A20, Ricks, 690K) reports, "Appearing relaxed but looking funereal in a black suit, white shirt and dark tie, Gates said he had received 'candid, honest, firsthand assessments' from senior officers he met with here Wednesday." Said Gates, "This trip is part of the overall assessment that the president asked me to do."

On NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 3, 1:45, 9.87M), Tim Russert said that "if the President decides to put 30,000 more American troops in Iraq, he is going to have to do a major salesmanship job with the American people. Right now, 71% give the President an unfavorable rating in handling Iraq. And overwhelmingly they are opposed to the introduction of new troops, so he will have a very uphill battle trying to convince the public to support him in that effort." Also, "the Democrats will have the gavels of the relevant committees. They will call witnesses who will refute the President. They will call military officials who will disagree with the President. It will be an extraordinary scene on Capitol Hill. If the President decides not to go forward with the surge of temporary troops, then his conservative base, particularly neoconservatives who are pushing for this new battle of Baghdad will be very disappointed and the President cannot afford to lose that key ingredient of his political base. This is a very, very difficult, potentially lose-lose situation for the President."

The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Gerstenzang, 850K) reported that "Bush's comments on Wednesday did not satisfy senior Democratic leaders in Congress. In similar statements, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic Senate leader, and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming House speaker, said Bush did not understand the need for a more dramatic change in Iraq." Sen. Hillary Clinton "said on NBC's Today Show that her support for a temporary troop increase would depend on their mission." The Times adds "there is strong opposition to the idea among Democrats."

The Washington Post (12/21, A1, Baker, 690K) reports Reid "said Bush's latest remarks indicate that he has not come to grips with the need for urgent change in Iraq. 'The president seems lost within his own rhetoric,' Reid said in a statement. 'He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war.'"

Incoming House Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton appeared on both PBS and MSNBC to discuss the President's remarks. On PBS' NewsHour (12/20, Suarez), Skelton said, "What is winning? They've moved the goalposts on us. At first it was ridding Iraq of weapons of mass destruction. Then it was establishing a democracy. And now it's quelling the sectarian violence. Really, what is winning in today's terms? I don't know what it is, but what we hope to end up with is a representative, effective government there that has stability throughout the nation, and that's probably as close to winning as we can really hope for, under the conditions that we have." On MSNBC (12/20, Mitchell), Skelton spoke against a troop surge in Iraq, saying "it might even exacerbate the situation and maybe even make it worse."

DOJ_NMG_0107908

The AP (12/21, Frommer) reports GOP Sen. Norm Coleman, "following a two-day trip to Iraq, said Wednesday he opposes a plan…Bush is considering for a short-term surge of US troops there. At the same time, Coleman said, he supports Bush's call this week for the U.S. to increase its overall number of troops to help a taxed military fight the global war on terror." Said Coleman, "I would not support a massive increase in troops in Baghdad. … I think it would create more targets, I think we'd put more life at risk."

Ex-Rep. J.C. Watts, also a Republican, said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/20, Blitzer), "The last 24 hours, I don't think the American people have become less skeptical. And let me tell you why. Six weeks ago, it was 'stay the course,' before the election. Yesterday, today, it's, 'we're not winning,' more troops. The President's got a tough sell."

Military Officials Said To Be "Suspicious" Of Bush's Plan To Expand Military. NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 2, 0:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The President's decision to push for this expansion of the US military has caught a few people at the Pentagon by surprise." NBC (Miklaszewski) added "some military officials are highly suspicious of the President's sudden turnaround on the issue. They believe that he's dangling that offer out there in an effort to buy the military support for the option to surge additional American troops into Iraq as if it's some kind of tradeoff. You throw in 30,000 more American troops into Baghdad now in exchange for an overall larger force four to five years down the road. But many military leaders that we're talking to still oppose a surge. They still believe it won't work and will put more Americans at risk. As one senior military official put it today, it'll be like throwing kerosene on a fire."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/21, Grier, 59K) reports, "Expanding the size of US armed forces could be an expensive and lengthy task -- in essence, a redoubling of the national effort to grapple with the challenge posed by Islamic extremism." The move, moreover, "would be irrelevant in the Iraq war, say some critics, because by the time more troops are recruited, trained, and deployed, the conflict there will probably be set in its course." Likewise, the AP (12/21, Flaherty) reports "Bush's plan to enlarge the Army and Marine Corps responds to pleas from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill, but finding more recruits will be expensive and challenging and have little immediate impact on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." USA Today (12/21, Kelley, 2.27M) says "the Iraq war's unpopularity is another challenge for recruiters, says Andrew Bacevich, a retired Army colonel and professor at Boston University. That adds to the costs of getting more people to enlist, he says."

NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 6, 1:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US Army expects it will have to spend more money on recruiting efforts to meet this new proposal by the President to expand the US military, and some worry it will have to sacrifice quality in some way." NBC (Potter) added that "to meet its current goals, the Army has already added thousands of recruiters. The Army is also offering signing bonuses of up to $40,000 and has gone digital with recruiting ads online at sites like MySpace.com. But even Army officials admit to substantially increase the force could take a long time." General Peter Schoomaker, US Army Chief of Staff: "Optimistically, we could add 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year." Training them, added NBC, "will be expensive – an estimated $1.2 billion for every 10,000 recruits."

Meanwhile, McClatchy (12/21, Montgomery, Hall) reports "military experts see as a pattern as the Pentagon seeks to increase the burden on the Army's two reserve components, the Reserve and National Guard. Torn between family and the call to duty, many are taking a hard look at military commitment and choosing family when re-enlistment time arrives. … Those deciding whether to remain in the Guard and Reserve must take into account the possibility that they'd have to serve longer and more frequently on active duty than they do now."

Abizaid Retiring. ABC World News (12/20, story 5, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We learned today that the commander of US forces in the Middle East, John Abizaid, will retire next March." The CBS Evening News (12/20, story 2, 2:02, Martin, 7.66M) said "this is the most critical moment in the war since the invasion. We've got a new Secretary of Defense, we've got a new strategy. We're about to get new generals since both…Abizaid and Gen. Casey are nearing the end of their tours. This may be the last best chance to get it right. Having said that, success still depends on the ability of the Iraqi government to govern itself, but ultimately it's just out of our control." NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 4, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also notes Abizaid's retirement announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0107909

The Washington Post (12/21, A14, Tyson, White, 690K) profiles Baizaid in a story titled "A Soldier's Soldier, Outflanked," and says "the departure of the general, who has won wide respect for his candid advice to the administration as the head of US Central Command, was expected and is not seen as an indication of his own displeasure or that of superiors over his performance." The Post adds, "Supporters portray Abizaid, 55, as a brilliant commander who did his best, despite constraints from Washington, to adapt the US military to fight an unanticipated guerrilla war -- which he was among the first to identify -- and later the unexpected outbreak of sectarian violence." Yet "critics say Abizaid has placed too much emphasis on Arab sensitivity to foreign occupation, and therefore never demanded enough US troops to stabilize the country." A "US officer" tells the Post, "He was too smart by half."

NYTimes Says Bush Must "Acknowledge" His Iraq Policies Have Failed. The New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) editorializes, "Anyone looking for new thinking on Iraq, or even candor, had to be disappointed by…Bush's news conference yesterday. Mr. Bush may want to defer unveiling his new strategy, but there will be no obliging pause in Iraq's unraveling." Bush "acknowledged the obvious and desperate need to rebuild America's overstretched ground forces, a subject he refrained from talking about so long as Donald Rumsfeld ran the Pentagon." But "that will take time and won't be any help in Iraq. Mr. Bush also needs to acknowledge that his course there has reached a dead end. He needs to quickly define a new direction while he still has any choices left."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/21, 850K) says "Bush's call for a larger military is the right thing to do, even if the president's reasons miss the mark." Yesterday, "Bush couched his argument in excessively narrow terms, saying that a beefed-up military was necessary to prosecute the 'war on terror [that] is the calling of a new generation.' This argument jumbles together the (at least partly metaphorical) 'war on terror' -- a many-fronted effort to prevent the repetition of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 -- with the amassing and deployment of military forces around the globe to protect all of the nation's vital interests. … The need for a larger military isn't confined to the Iraq war but to any number of possibilities -- war on the Korean peninsula, genocide in Africa, the defense of Israel, you name it."

Frederick W. Kagan, author of "Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq," writes in USA Today (12/21, 2.27M), "It is essential…to adopt a new strategy. We must secure Iraq's population and thereby bring the violence under control, abandoning the failed attempt to hand responsibility over to the Iraqis prematurely. … The options in Iraq are stark: withdrawal, defeat and regional disaster, or an effort to secure the population to permit the political, economic and social development and national reconciliation needed for Iraq to move forward. The president's determination to win with a comprehensive new strategy isn't stubbornness. It is wisdom."

In an editorial, USA Today (12/21, 2.27M) weighs in against "a temporary 'surge' of 15,000 to 30,000 US troops in a last-ditch effort to stabilize the violence-wracked nation. … Though it's tempting to think that adding troops for a little while would solve the problem, this is a seductive and dangerous road. It's the same vague reasoning that led to sending hundreds of thousands of troops to Vietnam."

Meanwhile, Berl Brechner writes in the Washington Post (12/21, 690K), "Should we revive the military draft? There's been a lot of talk about it lately. Conscription, as a social exercise, might instill discipline and respect while getting people to mix with all types and classes of their fellow Americans and perform a patriotic duty. It might also serve the political goals of some who oppose the Iraq war." But "if the purpose of the armed services is to be an effective force for defending and protecting the nation, and winning wars when engaged, I have to say this: The draft wasn't great when I got caught up in it 37 years ago, and it would be even worse today."

CIA Simulation Finds US Defeat In Iraq Would Be Boon To Al Qaeda. The Washington Times (12/21, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The CIA this month conducted a simulation of how the Iraq war affects the global jihadist movement, and one conclusion was that a US loss would embolden al Qaeda to expand its ranks of terrorists as well as pick new strategic targets, according to sources familiar with the two-day exercise." CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield "confirmed to The Washington Times yesterday that the simulation took place in Northern Virginia. He declined to discuss its findings, saying that a final report is not finished and that the report will not be the intelligence community's official view. It will, however, be circulated within the community and possibly to US policy-makers. … Although it takes no policy positions, the simulation's key finding appears to bolster Mr. Bush's contention that a U.S. loss in Iraq will have far-reaching ramifications."

DOJ_NMG_0107910

Cody Says US Involved In "Global," New Kind Of War. Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody said on CNN (12/20, Phillips), "This is a global war. Right now the focus is on Iraq and Afghanistan, where we freed 50 million people from two bad regimes, but it is a global war. The nature of this war is certainly different. And the nature of this enemy is certainly different. And it's a war that we'll be successful with, but not one that people will see someday where people are going to sit on either side of a table and sign a peace accord. That's not the nature of this. It's going to require strength of purpose. It's going to require a strong military. It's going to require a strong American support for us to be able to be successful in this."

Pentagon Says It Will Need Additional $99 Billion For War. ABC World News (12/20, story 3, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We learned that the Pentagon has put together an estimate that the military next year will need another $99 billion on top of moneys already appropriated. In the days before the US went into Iraq, there were some suggestions the operation could be paid for with Iraqi oil revenues. That thought is a distant memory." ABC (Karl) added, "In the coming weeks, President Bush faces two colossal challenges related to the war in Iraq -- convincing the American people he has a new strategy that will work and getting Congress to pay for it. The war on terror is getting a lot more expensive. Considering the Pentagon once estimated the total cost of the Iraq war to be just $50 billion, the numbers are staggering. The 17-page memo outlines the Pentagon's request for additional funds for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2007. Combined with the money already approved by Congress, the total single-year cost would be $170 billion, the vast majority of that money for Iraq." NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 5, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) said that "if approved by Congress, total spending for the wars in 2007 going in would be $170 billion. That would be a new record."

The AP (12/21, Taylor) reports, "Overall, the war in Iraq has cost about $350 billion. Combined with the conflict in Afghanistan and operations against terrorism elsewhere, the cost has topped $500 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service."

Sistani's Influence Seen As Declining As Sadr-Hakim Rivalry Intensifies. The Washington Post (12/21, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "In the quest to create a new Iraq, two powerful clerics compete for domination, one from within the government, the other from its shadows. … They have fought each other since the days their fathers vied to lead Iraq's majority Shiites. They hold no official positions, but their parties each control 30 seats in the parliament. And they both lead militias that are widely alleged to run death squads." But "in the view of the Bush administration, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim is a moderate and Moqtada al-Sadr is an extremist. As the US president faces mounting pressure to reshape his Iraq policy, administration officials say they are pursuing a Hakim-led moderate coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurdish parties in order to isolate extremists, in particular Sadr." Hakim, "who once verbally attacked US policy, now senses a political opportunity and is softening his stance toward the Americans. Sadr's position is hardening. Young and aggressive, he has suspended his participation in Iraq's government and is intensifying his demands for U.S. troops to leave the country." Their "rivalry is rising as the moderating influence of Iraq's most revered Shiite figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, is fading on the streets of Baghdad and is being replaced by allegiance to militant clerics such as Sadr, according to Iraqi officials and analysts."

ABC World News (12/20, story 6, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M), meanwhile, reported on a breakthrough in trying to isolate Iraq's extremists. According to the 'New York Times,' Iraq's revered Shiite cleric, the Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, has tentatively approved a ruling coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds that would exclude the Shiite militia leader, Muqtada al-Sadr." But Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former Central Intelligence Agency officer and now a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) that "the administration should nip in the bud" such an approach. Gerecht adds, "Changing the Shiite parts of the Iraqi government and quickly taking on Mr. Sadr would do nothing to end the Sunni insurgency and the holy war of foreign jihadists against the new Iraq. … Such a tack would not likely diminish the appeal or the power of the Mahdi Army, which is largely made up of poor, radicalized young men whose families were brutalized by Saddam Hussein and have been savaged by Sunni Arab fighters since the fall of 2003. … The key for America is the same as it has been for years: to clear and hold the Sunni areas of Baghdad and the so-called Sunni triangle to the north."

DOJ_NMG_0107911

Sadr Ponders One-Month Ceasefire. The AP (12/21, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who heads a militia feared by Iraq's Sunnis, is considering a one-month unilateral cease-fire and may push his followers to rejoin the political process after a three-week boycott, officials close to him said Wednesday. The issue is expected to come up at a meeting Thursday in the holy city of Najaf between al-Sadr and a delegation representing the seven Shiite groups that form the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament, the Shiite officials said on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the talks." The AP adds, "In perhaps an even more important session, the delegation will also sit down with the country's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani."

Zawahri Says Al Qaeda Real Power Broker In Iraq. The AP (12/21, Michael) reports, "The deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, told the United States it is negotiating with the wrong people in Iraq, suggesting in a video released Wednesday that his terror group was the real power broker in the country." Zawahri "warned that al-Qaida would keep fighting US troops in the Muslim world and target Western nations in retaliation. But he also criticized rival Islamic militant groups, such as the Palestinian Hamas, for being too soft in waging 'jihad' or holy war." The New York Times (12/21, El-Naggar, 1.16M) also reports on Al-Zawahri's statement.

Another Day Of Severe Violence In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "The bodies of 76 unidentified people were recovered in Baghdad on Wednesday, police said, the highest 24-hour toll so far for the anonymous slayings that have become a grim part of life in the capital. All of the victims were men between the ages of 20 and 50. Although they died violently, all shot with automatics weapons, the men were not slain execution-style as is often the case these days -- no handcuffs or blindfolds, morgue staff said. Only a few showed signs of torture." And "they were not the only bodies delivered to the morgue Wednesday. There were victims of drive-by shootings, assassinations and bombings, police said." Meanwhile, "two US soldiers also were killed by separate roadside bomb explosions Wednesday. One soldier died while investigating an explosion on foot with a combat patrol southwest of the capital, the military said. Another soldier died after an explosion near his vehicle during a road-clearing mission in southern Baghdad. Six soldiers were wounded in the explosions."

Iraqi Comedian Killed. The AP (12/21, Yahya) reports, "Gunmen killed a veteran Iraqi actor and comedian known for his stage portrayal of the lighter side of life in Baghdad during Ottoman rule in the early 1900s, police said Wednesday." Mitashar al-Sudani "was killed as he drove to theater offices on Haifa Street in Baghdad on Tuesday, a police officer and an official at Iraq's Theater and Cinema Ministry said. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns."

Najaf Security Turned Over To Iraqis. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Hennessy-Fiske, Fakhrildeen, 850K) reports from Najaf, "The local audience knew what to expect when Iraqi commandos took the stage at the stadium here Wednesday with frogs and a rabbit in hand, preparing to celebrate with a bloody flourish the transfer of local authority from US to Iraqi troops. The Americans were in for a surprise." As "US commanders and guests looked on, the commandos in dark green T-shirts began taking bites out of the frogs. One man knelt, placed the rabbit belly-up on his lap and proceeded to cut it open with his military knife. He screamed as he bit the rabbit's heart, then handed the carcass to companions who began gnawing away, blood flowing down their cheeks." The ceremony "marked the shifting of responsibility for security in Najaf province to Iraqi forces and was attended by US and Iraqi dignitaries, including Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak Rubaie."

The Washington Post (12/21, A21, Trejos, Sarhan, 690K) reports, "Najaf is the third province to be turned over to Iraqi forces. Fifteen more are still under the control of US-led forces."

Fugitive Iraqi Minister May Return To Illinois. The New York Times (12/21, Saulny, 1.16M) reports from Oak Brook, Il, "It was an unremarkable scene on Wednesday outside a gated community here where the former Iraqi electricity minister, Aiham Alsammarae, now a fugitive from justice, keeps a palatial house. Having escaped from a Baghdad jail over the weekend in what he boasted was the 'Chicago way,' Mr. Alsammarae, whose whereabouts are unknown, could have been on the way back here. Or perhaps he had already arrived." The watchman "at the Covington entrance, who either stops or waves through every car that approaches, said Wednesday that he knew Mr. Alsammarae but that he had not seen him 'in quite some time.' Was that days or months? The watchman, who would not give his name, would not elaborate."

DOJ_NMG_0107912

As Violence Mounts, French Pull Some Soldiers Out Of Afghanistan. The AP (12/21, Ganley) reports, " "As violence mounts in Afghanistan, France is pulling 200 of its best soldiers out. But military officials here insist France remains fully committed, with 1,100 troops still based in Kabul." Nevertheless, "France's decision to withdraw its Special Forces comes amid concerns in Paris that NATO's mission in Afghanistan has grown confused and that the alliance may be overreaching in its efforts to stabilize and rebuild the nation." The AP adds, "French officials and experts say that as fighting in Afghanistan has dragged on and the insurgency has grown in strength, the special forces were no longer ideal for the mission. Such elite units tend to be more lightly armed, and specialize in gathering intelligence or rapid attacks."

Pakistani City Of Quetta Serving As Taliban Refuge. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, King, 850K) reports from Quetta, in Pakistan, "At a time when the Taliban is making its strongest push in years to regain influence and territory across the border in Afghanistan, this mountain-ringed provincial capital has become an increasingly brazen hub of activity by the Islamist militia." Quetta "serves as a place of rest and refuge for Taliban fighters between battles, a funneling point for cash and armaments, a fertile recruiting ground and a sometime meeting point for the group's fugitive leaders, say aid workers, local officials, diplomats and others. … The apparent ease of Taliban movement in and out of Quetta comes against a backdrop of increasingly bitter squabbling by authorities in Afghanistan and Pakistan over who bears responsibility for the militia's use of tribal areas on the Pakistani side of the border as a staging ground for attacks that have killed at least 180 North Atlantic Treaty Organization and allied troops this year.

WPost Says Bush "Tolerating" Musharraf's "Empty Promises." The Washington Post (12/21, 690K) editorializes, "Three months ago the Pakistani government struck a deal with pro-Taliban leaders in the district of North Waziristan, bordering Afghanistan: It agreed to abandon military operations, withdraw the army and release prisoners in exchange for promises that the militants would cease cross-border attacks and disarm the foreign terrorists in their midst. That the extremists would not respect the accord, and that attacks on US forces in Afghanistan would increase rather than decline, obviously seemed likely at the time. Yet President Bush, ever indulgent of Pakistan's autocratic ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, accepted his promises. … As senior administration officials now acknowledge, Gen. Musharraf's assurances were empty -- as they have been many times before. According to multiple independent reports, Waziristan has been thoroughly Talibanized, and the fundamentalists are spreading their influence through adjacent border districts. Cross-border attacks and the deaths of American soldiers that they cause are up significantly." The Post adds, "By tolerating the general's empty promises and excuses, the Bush administration is putting its mission in Afghanistan and homeland security into unacceptable jeopardy."

DOJ:

Griffin Sworn In As Interim Eastern Arkansas USA. The AP (12/20) reported, "Tim Griffin, a former assistant to President Bush adviser Karl Rove, was sworn in today as the interim US attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. The 38-year-old Griffin replaces Bud Cummins, who announced last week that his resignation would be effective today." The AP noted, "He recently spent three months of active duty in Iraq in the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps. Griffin had previously served as special assistant to President Bush and deputy director of political affairs at the White House, as well as deputy communications director for the Republican National Committee."

DOJ's In-Sites Magazine Praises Georgia Community Policing Program. The Athens (GA) Banner Herald (12/21, Johnson) reports, "Their duty is to protect and serve, so what does dressing up like Santa, waiting tables for tip money to buy toys and walking neighborhood streets have to do with being a good police officer? Everything, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which highlighted Athens-Clarke police's Community Oriented Policing and Problem Solving (COPPS) program in the current edition of In-Sites, a magazine published by the department's crime prevention arm, the Office of Justice Programs. 'Imagine a successful, proactive police department, one that involves all levels of law enforcement management and strong community leadership,' the magazine says. 'The police force in Athens, Georgia, does more than imagine it - they practice it.' The magazine goes on to explain how since Athens-Clarke Police Chief Jack Lumpkin introduced the concept of community-oriented policing nearly 10 years ago, it has evolved so that individual officers now are 'chiefs' of their beats, responsible for resolving quality of life issues and reducing crime."

DOJ_NMG_0107913

DOJ Grant Fund Cut Imperils Ohio Anti-Drug Task Force. The Bucyrus (OH) Telegraph Forum (12/21, Caudill) reports, "The METRICH Enforcement Unit annually spends $115,000 on drug buys. But because of federal and state funding cuts, METRICH will receive a total of only $100,000 in 2007 after getting $260,000 this year". Mansfield police Chief Phil Messer "made the cutback announcement…at the Holiday Inn at a luncheon celebrating the task force's 20th anniversary." Messer noted, "We hope that most of our agencies have made plans to get us through 2007. It's anyone's guess after that." The Forum adds, "Task forces in general could be in trouble. In 2002, $4.8 million of federal money was allocated from the U.S. Department of Justice through the Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services for task forces. That figure will drop to $1.2 million in 2007. Messer said he hopes the 10 counties in the region would continue to work together even if they receive no funding.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Juniper Taking $900 Million Charge To Cover Tainted CEO Options. The San Jose Mercury News (12/21, Schwanhausser, 229K) reports, "Announcing one of the largest restatements stemming from the stock option scandal, Juniper Networks said [Wednesday] it will take a charge of about $900 million to account for tainted options issued to Chief Executive Scott Kriens and others during the frenzied tech boom. 'That tells me the profits of this company were massively overstated during this time period, that's what it tells me,' said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues." Juniper's "board and audit committee absolved Kriens of responsibility," but "some corporate governance experts say the company's probe left unanswered questions about Kriens' role -- questions that might not be resolved until the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department conclude their own probes." The Mercury News notes, "Juniper's internal probe found 'numerous' cases of misdated options, with '99.9 percent' of the problems occurring from just days before the company's initial public offering in June 1999 through December 2003." Kriens "received two tainted grants during that period, both issued at quarterly lows in Juniper's volatile stock price."

IBM To End Granting Of Stock Options To Directors. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A1, Lublin, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports that in the wake of "scandal and accounting and legal changes," IBM announced "it no longer will grant outside directors stock options," but such directors "will be paid an annual $200,000 retainer, which they can take either in IBM shares or partly in cash -- though rules strongly encourage them to take the shares." The Journal notes that the move follows similar changes by "retailer Gap Inc., recruiter Heidrick & Struggles International Inc. and food company Tyson Foods Inc." Moreover, "Options are suffering a heavy backlash after big corporate scandals such as the accounting frauds at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. and the more recent backdating scandal, corporate-governance experts said."

American Tower To Eliminate $7.5 Million In Options Gains. Bloomberg (12/20, Heiskanen, Armitage) reports, "American Tower Corp., the largest U.S. owner of sites for wireless telephone antennas, will eliminate about $7.5 million in gains from misdated stock option grants given to eight current executives and directors. The company also plans to cut about $7.6 million in benefits received by three former officers, Boston-based American Tower said today in a statement." Bloomberg notes, "American Tower continues to cooperate with U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission options inquiries. The company reported on Nov. 8 that some managers routinely misdated option grants for at least six years, artificially inflating their worth."

Nasdaq Warns Chordiant Software Over Options Probe-Related Noncompliance. The AP (12/21) reports, "Chordiant Software Inc., a maker of customer relationship software for businesses, said Wednesday it received an anticipated Nasdaq Staff Determination letter for its failure to timely file its 2006 annual report as a result of a stock options probe. Nasdaq initially informed the company in August that its common stock would be delisted because of its failure to timely file its Form 10-Q for the quarter ended June 30, unless it requested a hearing. Chordiant appeared before the Nasdaq Listing Qualifications Panel, which issued a decision granting it an exception until Dec. 29, to get into compliance with listing rules." The AP notes, "The restatements are necessary because of the conclusions of a historical stock option review concluded by its audit committee, which determined additional non-cash expense for the period 2001 through 2006 is expected to be about $8 million. A total of 105 companies are currently under Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department stock-option grants scrutiny, and at least 90 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews, according to an AP review."

DOJ_NMG_0107914

Four Former Enterasys Executives Convicted Of Fraud, Conspiracy. The AP (12/20) reported, "A federal jury convicted four former Enterasys executives on securities fraud and conspiracy charges [Tuesday], but was unable to reach a verdict on five charges against the computer networking company's former chief operating officer. … The onetime executives were accused of scheming to inflate company revenues in the quarter ended Sept. 1, 2001. The charges were related to sales contracts, investments, and revenue the company reported during and immediately after its spinoff from Cabletron Systems Inc." The AP notes that the four executives are former CFO Robert Gagalis, former VP Bruce Kay, former accountant Robert Barber and Singapore office employee David Boey. They "were convicted on 27 of 39 conspiracy, securities, and wire fraud charges against them. … Former chief operating officer Jerry Shanahan, the only defendant who was not a certified public accountant, was acquitted on one count of securities fraud."

InformationWeek (12/20, Gardner) reported, "Prosecutors scored another victory over executives who played illegal financial games during the technology bubble when a federal jury convicted four former executives of telecom equipment provider Enterasys of securities fraud and conspiracy charges. … Four other former Enterasys executives, including former chairman, president, and CEO Enrique Fiallo, had previously pleaded guilty to charges and testified in the jury trial," and "sentencing of all the executives is scheduled for March."

Gagalis, Kay Put Up Houses For Bail. The Manchester Union Leader (12/21, Paiste, 56K) reports, "Two of four former Enterasys executives…have posted equity in their homes as bail, while two others have been ordered to home confinement with electronic bracelet monitoring pending sentencing on the federal criminal charges in March." Former CFO Robert Gagalis "signed an agreement to forfeit his $2.5 million home in Rye if he fails to appear for his sentencing, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney William E. Morse." Likewise, former VP Bruce Kay "agreed to forfeit his principal home and a vacation home collectively valued at about $630,000, which he owns free and clear, Morse said." Meanwhile, the Union Leader notes, "Acting U.S. Attorney Joseph N. Laplante praised the verdict, stating yesterday: 'The investing public deserves and needs accurate financial information about public companies. The successful prosecutions in this case should serve as a substantial deterrent to others in similar circumstances who might otherwise be inclined to cook the books.'"

Homestore CEO Hopes To Remain Free Pending Appeal. Inman News (12/20, Roberts) reported, "Lawyers for Stuart Wolff, the former Homestore CEO who was sentenced in October to 15 years in federal prison for his role in an accounting fraud scheme that artificially inflated Homestore revenues and almost ruined the company, have filed a motion to keep him out of custody pending an appeal of his conviction. The motion raises questions about a judge's financial interest in a company involved with Wolff's case and other aspects of his trial." Inman noted, "On Dec. 7, Wolff's lawyers submitted a motion to the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals for Wolff's release, and lawyers had earlier filed a motion with the district court to put off Wolff's payment of a $5 million fine plus about $8 million in restitution. … 'We think he should start serving his sentence,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner, who is representing the government in the case against Wolff. 'We are just waiting to hear what the court is going to do.'"

Dell Names Carty CFO To Tackle Accounting Problems. Market Watch (12/20, Andrejczak) reported, "Faced with two investigations into its bookkeeping, Dell Inc. turned to the head of its audit committee and a close friend of the chairman and the chief executive to sort out the accounting mess. Donald Carty was named Dell's chief financial officer late Tuesday. The move comes as the world's No. 2 manufacturer of personal computers copes with investigations into its bookkeeping, corporate stumbles and a faltering stock price. Carty, a former CEO at American Airlines and a Dell director for 14 years, will succeed James Schneider on Jan. 1. … But there is doubt about whether Carty is best suited to the job." Carty "is Dell's longtime auditcommittee chairman, and the company's accounting methods are under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney in New York. The inquiries forced Dell to delay its third-quarter results last month." MarketWatch noted, "Carty was forced to resign from American Airlines in 2003 after failing to disclose large bonuses and pension protections for executives even as he was negotiating for concessions from unions."

DOJ_NMG_0107915

Forbes (12/20, Kirdahy) reported on its Web site, "Don Carty left American Airlines under a cloud. Now he's returning to a marquee corporate job at Dell," which "is puzzling because Dell's problems have to do with its accounting, indirectly overseen by the panel that Carty chaired." Forbes noted, "Both the SEC and the Justice Department are investigating whether prior financials were misstated regarding issues like revenue recognition, accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items. American Technology Research analyst Shaw Wu questioned the move."

Wall Street Group Says Connecticut Election Law Violates Privacy Rights. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A8, Hudson, 2.04M) reports that the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association "has gone to court to challenge a new Connecticut election law that requires that state officials maintain an Internet database listing the names of the children and spouses of executives at companies that do business with the state. The law is meant to discourage executives from hiding campaign contributions by funneling them through family members." The group "contends the state's public-disclosure requirement would invade its members' privacy and put children at risk."

Virginia Investment Firm Settles Insider Trading Case For $7.8 Million. The Washington Post (12/21, D1, Hilzenrath, Hart, 690K) reports, "Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group, the Arlington investment firm, yesterday agreed to pay $7.8 million to settle charges that it engaged in insider trading and other violations in 2001 when in effect it bet that the stock price of a client company would decline." The case involved short-selling sales of Annapolis security firm CompuDyne stock, and former FBR chairman Emanuel Friedman "agreed to pay almost $1.3 million for his role in the episode."

Columnist Says Sarbanes-Oxley Discourages New Companies From Going Public. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (12/21, A16), Michael Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, says that despite the generally positive economy, it is "troubling to note that something is missing from this new boom: Where are the IPOs? Historically, stock booms have seen an explosion in the number of young companies making their first public sale of stock." To know why new companies "aren't going public, just look at their business plans. In the past, the inevitable end-point of these plans, the so-called liquidation moment, was an IPO. Not any more. These days, the goal of almost every new start-up is to be acquired by an established company. And in that little shift in orientation lies a potentially radical change in the U.S. economy." To "understand this sudden desire to pump and dump, put yourself in the entrepreneurs' shoes. Looking ahead at a possible IPO for your hot little start-up, all you see are minefields of legal precedents and new regulations created after the dot.com boom. Not least -- but worst -- there is the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, whose self-monitoring rules Big Corporate initially resisted, but now embraces as an effective way to track internal financial operations."

WSJournal Notes Hedge Fund Manager's Effort To Limit Disclosure. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, 2.04M) says in an editorial that hedge fund manager Phillip Goldstein is "seeking an exemption from Section 13(f) of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act, and if he doesn't get it he says he'll mount a legal challenge to the rule. The clause requires managers with more than $100 million in assets under their care to disclose their equity positions quarterly." Filers of 13(f) forms "can request confidentiality but the bar is so high that, of all the managers covered by the rule, only about 60 ask for secrecy in any given quarter. So 13(f)-based articles frequently appear in the business press reporting the latest moves of savvy investors. Mr. Goldstein argues that this is tantamount to theft, allowing others to capitalize on smart money managers' talents without paying for their services. And by facilitating this, Mr. Goldstein says, the SEC is essentially perpetrating an eminent domain seizure of managers' intellectual property rights. It's a novel theory. Whether or not it succeeds, though, Mr. Goldstein's gambit promises to spark a much-needed discussion about the virtues of secrecy."

DOJ_NMG_0107916

CRIMINAL LAW:

NYC Gang Member Convicted Of Killing Detectives, Faces Death Penalty. The New York Sun (12/21, Goldstein) reports, "The first federal death penalty execution of a New York resident in more than 50 years may be on the horizon following the conviction yesterday of a Staten Island gang member who executed two undercover police detectives. In the U.S. courthouse in Brooklyn yesterday, the foreman of the jury called out 'guilty' in a loud voice for each of the 10 counts in Ronell Wilson's federal racketeering indictment. … 'The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public,' Police Commissioner Kelly said in a statement. 'They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice.'" The Sun adds, "In response to yesterday's conviction, Mayor Bloomberg reaffirmed his commitment to seizing illegal guns."

The New York Times (12/21, Brick, 1.16M) reports, "It was never proved whether Mr. Wilson knew his victims were detectives, and an accomplice's recantation eventually prompted prosecutors to drop such charges. But a witness testified that Mr. Wilson gave a reason for the shootings in the minutes after he pulled the trigger. He did not care, the witness quoted him saying, 'about anybody.' The prosecutors…assisted by Special Agent Thomas Shelton of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, presented nearly three weeks of testimony and evidence from members of the crew, scientific experts, civilian eyewitnesses, investigators and audio and video surveillance recordings." The Times notes that as the verdict was read, the gallery was filled with "spectators, including law officers, family members, television commentators, sketch artists and the United States attorney, Roslynn R. Mauskopf."

Newsday (12/21, Lowe) reports US District Judge Nicholas Garaufis told the jurors "they must return to his courtroom on Jan. 10 to begin the trial's penalty phase. Wilson's attorneys told the judge they expect to spend nearly two weeks presenting evidence and testimony in hopes of persuading the jury to spare his life. Garaufis said he expects a penalty verdict by late January. While state appeals courts have voided the death penalty in New York, Michael Palladino, president of the New York City Detectives Benevolent Association, said he was hopeful a federal death sentence against Wilson could be carried out." The New York Daily News (12/21, Marzulli, 729K) reports the conviction under the headline "Cops' Killer Faces Needle."

Prosecutors Capitalized On Wilson's Violent Rap Lyrics. The AP (12/21, Caruso) reports, "When police arrested Ronell Wilson, his pockets were stuffed with the type of violent poetry that boys have been scribbling in notebooks since the advent of gangster rap. Wilson called himself 'Rated R,' warned any challengers to wear a bulletproof vest, and boasted of leaving .45-caliber slugs in the heads of his enemies. The clumsy verses — littered with misspelled words — may never land Wilson a record deal, but to prosecutors, they were solid gold." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Morris J. Fodeman asked jurors to take special note of one stanza. In it, Wilson had written 'Ain't goin' stop to I'm dead.'"

Alaska Man Indicted On Federal Sex, Drug Trafficking Charges. The AP (12/21, Joling) reports, "An Anchorage man has been indicted on charges of coercing juvenile girls and adult women into prostitution and paying them off in crack cocaine. Don Arthur Webster Jr., 49…was indicted in federal court on 28 counts of sex and drug trafficking. The indictment was made public Wednesday. … The yearlong investigation was a joint effort of the FBI, Anchorage police and the U.S. Attorney's office." The AP notes, "Prosecutors said the prostitution ring was operated on an out-call basis. … Webster provided housing for the females at six homes. Police and federal authorities said Webster was violent with the females and threatened them with harm if they disobeyed him or tried to leave." US Attorney Nelson Cohen "revealed few details of the investigation outside of what was stated in the indictment, such as the ages of the juvenile prostitutes. … 'We want to protect them,' Cohen said." The AP adds, "FBI special agent Toni Marie Fogle said human trafficking crimes have been made a high priority of the agency and are considered to be a human rights violation."

KTVA-TV Anchorage (12/20, O'Brien) reported on its Web site, "Five girls under the age of 18, may have been victimized," and "investigators say they're dealing with a pimp who ran at least seven businesses that were really fronts for prostitution. … 'This indictment is the culmination of an investigation that has taken place for over a year,' said…Cohen. Webster is accused of operating seven so-called escort services. They have names like Foxy Roxies, Sunshine Girls, Tickle Your Fancy and Tiffani's. They are all listed in the phone book, but investigators say they're really a front for prostitution." KTVA added, "Meanwhile, the FBI, the U.S. Attorney and Anchorage police say the investigation isn't over and there could be more victims they don't know about yet."

DOJ_NMG_0107917

Virginia Task Force Recommends Stiffer Internet Predator Punishments. The Washington Times (12/21, McLaughlin, 88K) reports, "Virginia should establish stiffer sentencing guidelines against sexual predators convicted of hunting down victims on the Internet, and parents must be better educated about the risks their children face in cyberspace, according to a report released by a state task force yesterday. The Youth Internet Safety Task Force was established by state Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell," and "there are 25 recommendations in the nearly 100-page report, which was compiled by more than 40 parents, business leaders and law-enforcement officials after six months of study. … The proposals include mandatory minimum prison sentences for producing child pornography or soliciting children online." The Times notes, "According to the U.S. Justice Department, one in five children ages 10 to 17 receive an unwanted sexual solicitation online."

Wilson Asks Judge To Quash Libby Subpoena. The AP (12/21) reports former Ambassador Joseph Wilson "asked a federal judge Wednesday not to force him to testify in the CIA leak case and accused former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby of trying to harass him on the witness stand." Libby "subpoenaed Wilson as a defense witness this month. Libby's attorney, William Jeffress, said in court Tuesday that was a precautionary move and he did not expect to put Wilson on the stand." While Wilson and his wife, former CIA agent Valerie Plame, "are at the center of the CIA leak scandal, Wilson is a minor figure in Libby's perjury trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton has sought to keep much of the back story of the leak out of the case."

California Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The Yuba (CA) Appeal-Democrat (12/20, Young) reported, "A Yuba County resident admitted Tuesday in federal court that she conspired to steal $6,000 in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office." Crystal J. Housley, "along with defendants John P. Housley and Shawn R. Cudaback, said they lived in Gibson, La., at the time of the hurricane when they actually were in Arkansas, according to U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott. The three allegedly gathered Sept. 15, 2005, at a Yuba County motel to defraud the Federal Emergency Management Agency." John Housley was arraigned on Wednesday, "Crystal Housley will be sentenced Feb. 27 and Cudaback, who pleaded guilty earlier, on March 20." The Appeal-Democrat noted, "The case was investigated by the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. … As of September, more than 400 people nationwide had been charged with hurricane-related fraud, according to the latest progress report from the Task Force."

Three Indicted For Alleged Roles In CyberNET Fraud. WOOD-TV Grand Rapids (12/20) reported on its Web site, "Krista Watson and two others were indicted Wednesday morning for their role in the CyberNET fraud uncovered in 2004. Watson, 39, her mother-in-law Geraldine and Paul Wright are charged in a criminal conspiracy to commit bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering crimes. The charges lay out how they and others defrauded investors of approximately $100 million. 'CyberNET is a local example of a national problem,' said US Attorney Margaret Chiara. 'Prosecuting corporate officers for committing unconscionable acts against the public remains a top priority of my office and the Department of Justice.' The three are also charged with defrauding Huntington National Bank over a $17 million line of credit, as well as individual acts of money laundering." WOOD noted, "If convicted on all counts, the three are facing very long prison sentences as well as the forfeiture of $3,364,412.49 in nine bank accounts."

The Grand Rapids Press (12/21) reports, "Geraldine Watson, mother of the company founder, the late Barton Watson, is charged with falsifying a federal form submitted to a gun dealer when she bought a 12-gauge shotgun Nov. 22, 2004. The indictment alleges that Mrs. Watson said the gun was for her when she in fact bought it for her son. Watson, 44, shot himself with a 12-gauge shotgun after a standoff with police at his Ada Township home in the early hours of Nov. 24." The Press notes, "The conspiracy charge outlines what investigators called a plan to deceive banks and other lenders to amass $100 million from 2002 to 2004. … Other charges against Kotlarz-Watson include one count of illegally spending money obtained through bank fraud and three counts of income tax evasion. … Wright faces charges of engaging in mail fraud by setting up commercial mailbox accounts as part of the CyberNET fraud scheme, which carries a maximum 30-year prison term and $1 million fine."

DOJ_NMG_0107918

Insurance Administrator Sentenced To Prison For Defrauding Union Pensions. STNG Wire (12/21) reports Michael G. Linder of Crete, Ill., yesterday "was sentenced to seven years in federal prison for paying to two union local officials and for embezzling from and defrauding numerous union local pensions and welfare benefit plans for more than $6.9 million, according to a release from the U.S. Department of Justice. Linder pleaded guilty to defrauding eleven union local pension plans of $5 million and embezzling $1,930,154 from five union local pensions and health and welfare benefit plans on June 30, 2006, the release stated." STNG notes, "Linder was the president of…a third party administrator for pension plans for various union locals," and "while Linder was defrauding the pension and welfare benefit plans, he provided union local officials with graft payments, including a 1999 Harley Davidson motorcycle valued at more than $19,000, the release stated. Thomas Kisting and Fred Schreier, who received the bikes, were also charged and convicted, the release stated."

RCMP, ICE Bust Fraudulent Canadian Telemarketing Syndicate. The Washington Times (12/21, Seper, 88K) reports that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, under the auspices of "Project Colt," "have dismantled a Montreal-based telemarketing ring that victimized as many as 500 people a week, many of them U.S. citizens, for up to $13 million." ICE spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said that "forty Canadian citizens were arrested on suspicion of fraud," and that the ring used a lottery scheme and a "mass telemarketing fraud" in which "the ring used various approaches, either telling persons they called that they were eligible to receive a $7,000 grant, or selling them health care kits or billing them for services never rendered." Moreover, "Nearly 90 percent of the victims in this case were over 60 years of age."

Virginia DNA Database Missing Data On Thousands Of Felons. The Washington Post (12/21, A1, Rondeaux, 690K) reports that in Virginia, "thousands of felons may have skirted a legal requirement to submit genetic samples, partly because local and state agencies may have failed to make them do so," even though Virginia law requires "all convicted felons and those arrested in connection with violent crimes such as rape or homicide to submit cheek swabs for DNA analysis and entry into the statewide database." Virginia's Public Safety Department is investigating the cause and extent of the missing profiles.

New York Inmate Seeks Vacating Of Murder Conviction Based On New DNA Evidence. The New York Times (12/21, Santos, 1.16M) reports profiles the case of Roy Brown, a New York prison inmate who in 2003 wrote "a harsh letter" to Barry Bench, who Brown believed had committed the murder for which Brown was serving 25 years to life. Bench subsequently committed suicide. "Two weeks ago, DNA tests matched a sample provided by Mr. Bench's daughter to saliva stains on a bloodied nightshirt found at the crime scene, and now Mr. Brown is scheduled to appear in court on Thursday to ask the judge who presided over his original trial to vacate the conviction." The Times notes the involvement of the Innocence Project, "a nonprofit legal clinic that has helped exonerate 188 people since 1989," and notes the fact that Bench's daughter had volunteered to submit DNA. "The recent DNA tests have excluded Mr. Brown as the source of the saliva on Ms. Kulakowski's nightshirt and showed half of the DNA profile matched Ms. Eckstadt's, suggesting the saliva could have come from her father."

Houston Police Suspect Serial Rapist In Attacks On Five Men. The New York Times (12/21, Times, 1.16M) reports that Houston, Texas, area police have said that five men who were attacked and robbed appear to be victims of a serial rapist. The attacks have occurred over a period from May to late November. "All five victims have been white men who were alone and attacked in or near their homes in upscale neighborhoods, Captain Clifford said. The attacker is described as a black man in his mid-20s who is about 6 feet tall and 200 pounds with short hair and no discernible accent."

Some Say Supermax Security Weak, But Nearby Residents Skeptical. The Washington Post/McClatchy (12/21, A27, Rappold) reports, "Although it was once taken as an article of faith that Supermax -- one of four federal prisons at the complex and officially known as ADX Florence -- is as secure as anyplace on Earth, some aren't so sure now. The union representing prison guards is raising alarms about staff cuts. A federal report revealed inadequate scanning of terrorists' mail, and an arbitrator agreed that staff cuts had made the prison dangerous for employees. … But on the streets of Florence, there is little concern about a terrorist breaking out -- or his fellow terrorists breaking in." McClatchy adds, "Even union officials concede that an escape is unlikely. But they say staff cuts have made the prison dangerous for employees and vulnerable to attack from the outside."

DOJ_NMG_0107919

Reason For Leap In Robbery Rate Unclear. The Christian Science Monitor (12/21, Ben Arnoldy, 59K) reports, "Possible explanations abound for the soaring robbery rate - 9.7 percent nationwide in the first half of 2006, according to federal crime statistics released this week. But a lead suspect in that troubling trend, say some criminologists, is added economic stress. … But many cities show no such correlation, meaning the root of the problem is more complex than simple economics." The Monitor notes that University of Toledo law professor David Harris "suspects the worsening violent-crime rates may be related to less police presence on the streets. … 'They have a whole set of demands on their plates that simply didn't exist a few years ago,' says Harris, referring to homeland-security duties and less assistance from federal agents reassigned to antiterrorism. A Justice Department spokesman counters that view, noting that federal spending has never been more than 4 percent of state and local law-enforcement spending. The number of police officers has grown every year regardless of federal funding, he adds, and first responders have benefited from a windfall of homeland-security funding in recent years."

NYTimes Calls 17-Year Old's Statutory Rape Conviction "Miscarriage Of Justice." A New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) editorial sympathetically describes the case of Genarlow Wilson, a 20-year-old Georgia man tried for "engaging in consensual oral sex with a 15-year-old girl at a New Year's Eve party when he was 17," and convicted of "aggravated child molestation even though he and the girl were both minors at the time." Calling Wilson's case "an obvious miscarriage of justice," the Times notes that the law under which he was convicted has since been changed to prevent such "draconian punishment for consensual youthful indiscretions." The Times concludes, "His lawyer is planning to file a habeas petition seeking his release. The courts need to grant it and expunge his record so that Mr. Wilson can return to his family and his once promising academic career. Legislators in other states should take notice and make sure that their own laws do not catch children in dragnets designed for predatory adults."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Seeks Appointment Of US Trustee For $800 Million USVI Bankruptcy Case. The St. Thomas Source (12/21) reports, "An arm of the U.S. Justice Department has moved against Innovative Communication Corp. owner Jeffrey Prosser in the seemingly endless bankruptcy cases involving, indirectly, Vitelco, the V.I. phone company. The government unit is the U.S. Trustee, a self-described 'watchdog' of the bankruptcy courts." The Source notes, "The U.S. Trustee moved on Dec. 19 that a case trustee be appointed to manage Prosser's business operations until the bankruptcy case is concluded. The presiding judge, Judith K. Fitzgerald, has already indicated her positive interest in such an appointment. … The full set of undiscounted debts, including unpaid interest and extensive legal bills, has been estimated as exceeding $800 million."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

North Carolina Lawmaker Seeks DOJ Probe Of Duke Rape Case Prosecutor. The Kinston (NC) Free Press (12/21) reports, "State Rep. Stephen LaRoque has joined U.S. Congressman Walter Jones in calling for the investigation of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong. Jones, in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, said Nifong might have violated the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players accused of raping an exotic dancer last spring. He also could have committed prosecutorial misconduct in his investigation of the case, Jones said." The Free Press adds, "'The prosecutor seems to have put his own political aspirations ahead of justice for these three young men who appear to have been falsely accused,' LaRoque said."

Gonzales Acknowledges Letter From Jones. WFTX-TV Ft. Myers, FL (12/20, 5:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "The Department of Justice says it may get involved in the Duke Lacrosse rape investigation," and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said "he's received a letter from US Congressman Walter Jones asking for federal authorities to step in."

DOJ_NMG_0107920

New Mexico To Allow New Patients At Medical Center Probed By DOJ. The AP (12/21) reports that the New Mexico Department of Health "has lifted a yearlong-plus moratorium against admitting new long-term patients at its Fort Bayard Medical Center. The state agency halted new admissions after a Justice Department review of the facility." The AP notes, "Justice investigators said last spring they had serious concerns with the care at Fort Bayard. A report said an investigation 'revealed a wide range of dangerously deficient medical and nursing care practices,' and a failure to comply with federal regulations or meet professional standards. … The state hired GEO Care Inc. of Florida to run the center in November 2005. GEO Care recently hired an administrator, an assistant administrator and a medical director. GEO Care asked the state to lift the moratorium, and has proposed a gradual admission of new long-term residents."

ANTITRUST:

Delta Antitrust Lawyer Says DOJ Unlikely To Approve US Airways Merger. The New Mexico Business Weekly (12/20) reports, "Delta Chairman and CEO Jerry Grinstein continued his offensive against US Airways' hostile takeover bid in a conference call with analysts Tuesday, saying the merger would create too much of a monopoly in too many markets." Meanwhile, "Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta" and US Airways Group. "'It appears from a factual standpoint this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it,' said Jim Weiss, a Washington partner in the law firm Preston Gates & Ellis LLP. … Weiss, the former head of the DOJ's antitrust division and a hired gun for Delta since 1988, said he believes it would take the department about a year to review US Airways' hostile bid for Delta. That's because the DOJ will anticipate more merger proposals and would want to go over the Delta/US Airways merger with a fine-toothed comb. … Chiefly, he said, a lot of small to mid-sized American cities would lose competition if the two airlines merged."

FCC Ruling To Speed Phone Company Access To Cable TV Markets. The New York Times (12/21, Richtel, 1.16M) reports that the FCC has ruled that "cable television rates have surged in the absence of robust competition," and therefore municipal authorities must decide within 90 days whether phone companies may enter into local cable television markets. "Phone carriers, notably Verizon, have asserted that some municipalities are slow to grant approvals, often in the face of cable industry lobbying. If it succeeds in fostering competition, the decision could eventually affect the rates and services available to the roughly 100 million households that pay for access to television."

The Washington Post (12/21, D1, Sipress, 690K) adds, under the headline, "FCC Vote A Victory For Phone Companies," that the FCC move helps phone companies "by significantly limiting what local officials can demand in return for franchises. … But the telephone industry's victory could prove temporary because opponents say the measure will almost certainly be challenged in court." Moreover, "The FCC's Republican majority said that removing unreasonable hurdles erected by local governments would translate into lower cable rates. Democratic members disagreed and accused the Republicans of overstepping the FCC's authority."

USA Today (12/21, 1B, Davidson, 2.27M) adds, "The move is expected to let AT&T and Verizon more quickly enter hundreds of markets in the next few years, spurring new competition for the cable giants and possibly bringing lower prices." The article notes that despite the phone companies' investment in broadband infrastructure, "local officials often cause delays by making outrageous demands, such as to build swimming pools and recreation centers. 'Such requirements are especially troubling, because competition is desperately needed,' FCC Chairman Kevin Martin says."

Democrats, Cable Companies Look To Hinder Bells' Market Entry. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A3, Schatz, 2.04M) reports, "Phone companies scored a win at the Federal Communications Commission when the agency agreed to change rules to let them enter the cable-television business faster, but the victory may be short-lived, as congressional Democrats complained and opponents threatened legal action. The FCC, in a 3-2 party-line vote, passed rules that give state and local authorities a 90-day deadline to grant video-franchising agreements to new competitors. The commission also struck down rules requiring that the Bells do more to provide service to all residents in an area than current providers." The Journal suggests that a court case is likely.

DOJ_NMG_0107921

FTC Approves CVS Purchase Of Caremark Rx. Bloomberg (12/21) reports, "CVS Corporation has won antitrust approval to purchase Caremark Rx, the pharmacy benefit manager, removing potential regulatory opposition to the pending $21 billion acquisition. CVS, which is competing against Express Scripts's $26 billion bid for Caremark, received approval from the Federal Trade Commission, Caremark, which is based in Nashville, said in a statement yesterday. Last month, CVS agreed to buy Caremark to gain more power to negotiate prices with drug makers and to prevent the loss of foot traffic to mail-order medicines from hurting sales of razors, sodas and makeup."

Wisconsin Energy Selling Only Nuclear Plant To FPL Group. The AP (12/21, Fredrix) reports, "Wisconsin Energy Corp. is selling its only nuclear power plant to Florida-based FPL Energy in a deal worth about $1 billion, the companies announced Wednesday. We Energies' agreement with the subsidiary of FPL Group Inc. includes $783 million for the plant and $215 million for its nuclear fuel and other inventories." We Energies spokesman Barry McNulty said that the company also "will give FPL Energy $560 million from a trust fund it had set aside to pay for the decommissioning, when the plant is taken offline and cleaned up," and "the state's public service commission will consider what to do with the remainder of the trust fund, about $300 million, which customers contributed to." The AP notes, "Besides the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, other groups that have to rule on the deal include the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission."

The Business Journal of Milwaukee (12/20) also noted, "The transaction is expected to close in August 2007. The transaction is subject to a number of state and federal approvals, including the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and review by the Department of Justice. … Upon closing, FPL Energy will assume management and operation of the plant from Nuclear Management Co., Hudson, and will work with NMC to ensure a smooth transition. NMC, a joint venture of upper Midwest utilities, has managed the plant since 2000."

Service Corp. International Seeks FTC Approval Of Funeral Home Sales. The AP (12/21) reports, "Funeral home operator Service Corp. International requested government approval Wednesday to sell several properties in order to comply with an agreement reached with the Federal Trade Commission last month." Service Corp. asked FTC "to approve the sale of thirteen funeral homes and cemeteries in Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi to privately-held Legacy Holdings." The AP notes, "SCI agreed with the FTC Nov. 22 to sell a total of 55 properties in order to settle antitrust concerns stemming from its purchase of Alderwoods Group. SCI's purchase of Alderwoods closed Nov. 28. … Mitchell Katz, an FTC spokesman, said the agency expects further petitions from the company as it sells off additional properties as called for in the agreement."

Judge Refuses Motion To Dismiss Antitrust Allegations Against Amway. The McClatchy (12/21, Margolies) reports, "Plaintiffs in a massive antitrust action against Amway Corp. overcame another hurdle this week in their long quest to get their case heard by a jury. A federal judge on Monday refused to dismiss all but one of eight counts against the company, finding that the plaintiffs' allegations were legally sufficient to support claims of price fixing, conspiracy and other charges. U.S. District Judge Richard E. Dorr agreed to dismiss only a civil racketeering claim, ruling that it failed to establish 'a pattern of racketeering activity.'" McClatchy notes, "The case, which was filed in mid-2003 in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Missouri, has been closely watched by Amway distributors nationwide. … The lawsuit contends that Amway exaggerates the profits to be made selling its products and pressures distributors into buying its motivational materials. It alleges that a handful of Amway 'kingpins' - those who bought into Amway early on - control thousands of down-line distributors and make most of their money by selling them the motivational materials, known at Amway as the 'tool and function' business."

NYSE Shareholders Approve Euronext Acquisition. The USA Today (12/21, Farrell, 2.27M) reports, "Shareholders in the New York Stock Exchange voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to approve a $14 billion acquisition of Euronext that will create the first trans-Atlantic market for stocks." With "more than 75% of NYSE shareholders voting, the merger received overwhelming approval, winning an estimated 99.7% of ballots cast.

DOJ_NMG_0107922

Euronext shareholders approved the deal Tuesday." The "deal is expected to close within three months, since European regulators have already approved it."

M&F Worldwide Offers $1.7 Billion For Check-Maker John H. Harland. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/21, Paul, 379K) reports, "M&F Worldwide Corp. isn't exactly a household name. The New York company — which said Wednesday it entered into a $1.7 billion deal to acquire John H. Harland Co., the Decatur-based check maker — owns Clarke American Corp., another big check printer. Its other holding is Mafco Worldwide Corp., a maker of licorice extract used in candies, pharmaceuticals and tobacco products," and "one analyst said the all-cash transaction, which calls for M&F to give $52.75 per share to Harland stockholders, will allow Clarke American to leapfrog Deluxe Corp., the market leader in check printing. And it fits in with the style of Ronald O. Perelman, an M&F board member and head of cosmetics giant Revlon Inc., said John Kraft, an analyst at D.A. Davidson & Co. who follows Harland." The AJC notes, "Still, the pending acquisition, which the companies anticipate will close in the second half of next year, isn't necessarily a done deal. Regulators will take their time in reviewing the proposal because of antitrust concerns."

Sky Financial, Huntington Bancshares To Merge. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, C4, Carrns, 2.04M) reports that Sky Financial Group Inc. of Bowling Green, Ohio, will acquire Huntington Bancshares Inc. of Columbus, Ohio, "in a stock-and-cash deal valued at roughly $3.29 billion, signaling that banking-industry consolidation is occurring even in less attractive markets like the Midwest. Because there are many banks in the region vying for customers amid a relatively slow-growing economy, competition is even more fierce than elsewhere in the country. … The deal is expected to close in the third quarter of next year, subject to the approval of both banks' shareholders and of regulators."

Internet Video Boom Spurs Ericsson To Purchase Redback Networks. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, B2, White, Silver, 2.04M) reports that Swedish telecommunications firm Ericsson has agreed to buy the bankrupt Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion, a move that "reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite. … The companies said the deal will make them more effective suppliers for the fast-moving market. It also could help Redback contend with larger competitors such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Juniper Networks Inc."

Arcelor Mittal Buys Grupo Villacero For $1.4 Billion. Bloomberg (12/21, Nightingale, Craze) reports, "Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel maker, said Wednesday that it had bought plants owned by Grupo Villacero for $1.4 billion to become the biggest producer of the metal in Mexico. The purchase is the first since Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion combination with Arcelor this year. … It also acquired Border Steel, a mini-mill in Texas, as part of the deal. Arcelor Mittal and Villacero also created a joint venture to become the biggest supplier of steel products in Mexico and the U.S. Southwest." Bloomberg notes, "Arcelor Mittal wants to strengthen its position as the biggest steel maker in the United States and tap growing demand for the metal in Latin America."

European Commission Approves MAN's €10.3 Billion Hostile Bid For Scania. The Financial Times (12/21, Milne, Buck, David, ibison) reports, "MAN, the German truckmaker, last night won unconditional approval from Europe's top competition regulator for its €10.3bn ($13.7bn) hostile bid for Swedish rival Scania, removing a significant obstacle from the four-month take-over fight. The European Commission said there was no reason to object to the transaction on antitrust grounds." The FT notes, "The focus will now move to MAN's efforts to persuade Scania's two largest shareholders - German carmaker Volkswagen and the investment vehicle of the Wallenberg family, Investor - to accept its offer before aJanuary 31 deadline."

Italian Regulator Orders Banca Intesa To Sell Branches For Sanpaolo Acquisition. Bloomberg (12/21, Scherer, Ebhardt) reports, "Banca Intesa SpA, Italy's second-biggest bank, must sell 748 bank branches and part of its insurance business to win approval from Italy's antitrust regulator for its purchase of Sanpaolo IMI SpA. Credit Agricole SA, Intesa's biggest shareholder, 'must reduce significantly' its stake in the new bank and may not play an 'administrative or management role,' according to a faxed statement from the Rome-based antitrust authority. Intesa must also sell its Po Vita life insurance unit, and limit the sales of insurance products from its bank branches." Bloomberg notes, "Intesa and Sanpaolo shareholders backed the 30.8 billion-euro ($41 billion) acquisition on Dec. 1. … 'It doesn't change substantially the merger,' said Fabrizio Barini, an analyst at Websim SpA in Milan. 'They won't have any problems selling the extra branches.'"

DOJ_NMG_0107923

ENVIRONMENT:

US Behind In Reforestation Efforts. USA Today (12/21, 1A, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "As severe wildfires scorch more of the USA each year, the Forest Service is falling further behind in replacing trees lost to fire, insects and disease because of shrinking budgets and mounting costs of fighting the blazes." The Forest Service "had a backlog of 1.1 million acres that needed replanting in 2005 -- a combined area slightly larger than Rhode Island 00 according to the agency's latest reforestation report. Last year, it could replant only 153,000 acres."

Lawsuits Seek To Block Maryland ICC Commuter Highway. The Baltimore Sun (12/21, Wheeler, 257K) reports that "four environmental groups and two Montgomery County residents" who live near Maryland's proposed Inter-County Connector have "filed a pair of lawsuits Wednesday seeking to block construction of the east-west toll highway through Washington's Maryland suburbs." The lawsuit argues that "state and federal officials glossed over the environmental damage the project would do. They also contend that officials failed to consider other ways of easing Washington area traffic congestion that would be less costly and less harmful to human health and natural resources."

The Washington Post (12/21, B6, Shaver, 690K) adds, "The two federal lawsuits -- one filed in the District and the other in Maryland -- also allege that the federal environmental review did not meet legal requirements to consider other east-west transportation options. Building mass transit and improving local roads, among other measures, would cost less, do less environmental damage and combat traffic better than an 18-mile road cutting across Montgomery and Prince George's counties, the complaints say."

The Washington Times/AP (12/21, Karush) notes that "the 18-mile, six-lane highway connecting Interstate 270 in Montgomery County with Interstate 95 in Prince George's County has long been championed by regional business groups, but faced stiff opposition from environmentalists as well as concerns over its cost. It finally won federal approval in May. In one lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in the District, Environmental Defense and the Sierra Club say the air quality analysis conducted by federal and regional officials was inadequate because it gauged the potential pollution from the ICC by using monitors that were more than 1½ miles from major highways. The second lawsuit -- filed in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, by the Audubon Naturalist Society, the Maryland Native Plant Society and a family whose property is on the proposed route for the ICC -- says federal officials failed to consider reasonable alternatives to the road and the full environmental impact of the project."

WPost Calls On Maryland Officials To Clear Path For ICC. A Washington Post (12/21, A28, 690K) editorial titled, "Build It," blasts the Montgomery County Planning Board for blocking the purchase of land needed for the ICC, writing, "Maybe the board members are also awaiting a bolt of lightning or some other heavenly sign before they give the go-ahead for the road. … While they wait, they might consider that the connector has been on the drawing board since the 1950s; that it has been the subject of exhaustive efforts to mitigate possible environmental impacts; that the state and federal governments have given it the green light; that financing is in place; and that the 87 acres in dispute have been purchased, preserved and set aside for the roadway over the course of three decades. … Environmentalists filed lawsuits yesterday; that is their right. In the meantime, the planning board should stop its posturing, sell the parcels and get out of the way."

Global Warming Trading Program Comes Under Fire. The New York Times (12/21, A1, Bradsher, 1.16M) reports, "Foreign businesses have embraced an obscure United Nations-backed program as a favored approach to limiting global warming. But the early efforts have revealed some hidden problems. Under the program, businesses in wealthier nations of Europe and in Japan help pay to reduce pollution in poorer ones as a way of staying within government limits for emitting climate-changing gases like carbon dioxide." Among their targets is a chemical factory in China that contributes "as much to global warming each year as the emissions from a million American cars … . Cleaning up this factory will require an incinerator that costs $5 million — far less than the cost of cleaning up so many cars, or other sources of pollution in Europe and Japan. Yet the foreign companies will pay roughly $500 million for the incinerator." The "high price is set in a European-based market in carbon dioxide emissions." The "huge profits from that will be divided by the chemical factory's owners, a Chinese government energy fund, and...consultants and bankers." The Times adds, "Such efforts are being watched in the United States as an alternative more politically attractive than imposing taxes on fossil fuels." But "critics of the fast-growing program...complain that it mostly enriches a few bankers, consultants and factory owners." Canada announced in October that it "would withdraw from the trading program."

DOJ_NMG_0107924

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales To Decide Whether Alleged Drug Trafficking Kingpin Faces Death Penalty. The Washington Times (12/21, Seper, 88K) reports, "An earlier indictment that sought his extradition in 2003 did not include the charges that could lead to his execution and is expected to be dismissed as moot." DEA spokesman Rusty Payne "said a decision whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has described Arellano-Felix, 37, as 'one of the world's major drug traffickers,' citing his role as a leader of a brutal international drug gang that includes seven brothers and four sisters. Mr. McNulty said the Arellano-Felix organization negotiated directly with Colombian cocaine-trafficking organizations, including the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia for the purchase of multiton shipments of cocaine, received those shipments by sea and air in Mexico, and then arranged for smuggling the cocaine into the U.S."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (12/20, 5:00 a.m.) also reported in its broadcast that Gonzales "will make the final decision on the death penalty." XETV-TV San Diego, CA (12/20, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The US Attorney's Office offered no comment on the case," but if "one or both defendants are convicted," Gonzales will "decide whether to seek the death penalty." Meanwhile, Telemundo (12/20, 5:30 p.m.) broadcasted in a Spanish-language story that "fearing the US Justice Department," Arellano Felix's defense attorney contends Arellano-Felix was not under arrest in "international water," as US officials say, but in Mexican territorial waters. This would mean that he "must" be tried in Mexico where "there is no death penalty." Telemundo notes that Gonzales will "decide in the next days" whether the charges should be in Mexico or "if there should be a death penalty." The Spanish-language KWHY-TV Noticias, Los Angeles (12/20, 10:00 p.m.) also noted, "Gonzales has the final decision Arellano Felix's luck."

Arellano Felix, Villarreal Heredia Plead Not Guilty To US Charges. The AP (12/21, Hoffman) reports, "A man suspected of overseeing one of Mexico's most violent drug cartels and his top associate pleaded not guilty Wednesday to new charges detailing a criminal enterprise that included a hit on Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three officers. The new charges could make Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, and his right-hand man Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, eligible for the death penalty if they are found guilty of crimes outlined in a seven-count indictment unsealed this week." The AP notes, "According to the filing, the pair directed the smuggling of cocaine and marijuana shipments from Mexico into the U.S. and oversaw 'enforcement operations' - threats and murders designed to reinforce the power of the cartel. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy said the Mexican government had agreed to allow the U.S. to complete its prosecution of the pair before pursuing extradition requests. She said the criminal enterprise operated on both sides of the border and merited prosecution in U.S. courts."

Web Site Seen As Risk To Undercover Agents, Informants. On its Web site, KHOU-TV Houston (12/21) reports on the "Who's a Rat" Web site, noting, "Search for the term 'Houston', and more than 200 profiles pop up with names and sometimes pictures of officers said to be working at agencies all over the area: state and local police, sheriff's deputies, and even the FBI and DEA. Still civil libertarians defend the site's right to exist. … The site may not have caused damage yet, but law enforcement officials said you don't have to look far to see the potential risk." The site "has gotten the attention of the Judicial Conference and that group sent an official memo last month to all federal judges, alerting them and asking that certain documents be sealed to protect the identities of informants and agents."

California Marijuana Dispensary Defies Order To Close. On its Web site, KESQ-TV Palm Desert, CA (12/21) reports CannaHelp "continues to do business, even after the city revoked their business license.

DOJ_NMG_0107925

… Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin won't discuss what possible action may be taken against CannaHelp, after the medicinal marijuana dispensary defied the city's cease and desist order to operate. … Feds and local police recently raided CannaHelp, suspecting it sold marijuana for profit. We spoke with [the owner] after the raid. He said he was, indeed, drawing a salary from CannaHelp sales." The Desert Sun (12/20) noted that owner Stacy Hochanadel "justified his decision to keep the dispensary open because, he said, the City Council should have held a public hearing before voting to revoke his business license last Thursday. The vote was taken in a closed session, based on a report stating that Hochanadel sold medical marijuana to an undercover police agent who did not have appropriate paperwork."

Trove Of FBI Documents More Than Twenty-Five Years Old About To Be Declassified. The New York Times (12/21, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "At midnight on Dec. 31, hundreds of millions of pages of secret documents will be instantly declassified, including many F.B.I. cold war files on investigations of people suspected of being Communist sympathizers. After years of extensions sought by federal agencies behaving like college students facing a term paper, the end of 2006 means the government's first automatic declassification of records. Secret documents 25 years old or older will lose their classified status without so much as the stroke of a pen, unless agencies have sought exemptions on the ground that the material remains secret. Historians say the deadline, created in the Clinton administration but enforced, to the surprise of some scholars, by the secrecy-prone Bush administration, has had huge effects on public access, despite the large numbers of intelligence documents that have been exempted." The Times notes, "Several hundred million pages will be declassified at midnight on Dec. 31, including 270 million pages at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has lagged most agencies . J. William Leonard, who oversees declassification as head of the Information Security Oversight Office at the National Archives, said the threat that files might be made public without a security review had sent a useful chill through the bureaucracy." The F.B.I. "negotiated an exemption from the 1995 executive order and concluded last year that the 2003 executive order ended its special status. It has rushed to review material, seeking exemption for 50 million pages on intelligence, counterintelligence and terrorism, but leaving 270 million pages to be automatically declassified now. Among those files, said David M. Hardy, the bureau declassification chief, are those on investigations of Americans with suspected ties to the Communist Party. Reviewers will keep working on the exempt material to see what can be released, but it is a slow process, Mr. Hardy said. … The bureau is studying digitizing documents and using computers to search for classified material."

FBI Investigation Targets Firms Tied To New York Senate Leader. The New York Times (12/21, McIntire, 1.16M) reports, "Federal investigators have issued subpoenas to at least two firms linked to the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, as part of their investigation into his business dealings, one of Mr. Bruno's former business partners and a legislative aide said yesterday. One of the companies was a partnership involving Mr. Bruno and an influential Albany lobbyist that bought and sold lakeside property in Rensselaer County, including a parcel that was purchased by the wife of Jared E. Abbruzzese. Mr. Abbruzzese is an investor in a group seeking control of the state's thoroughbred racing franchise — a decision in which Mr. Bruno will play a key role. The other company is a consulting firm that Mr. Bruno operated out of his home that he said had 'a client relationship with lawyers and businesspeople.' … The two companies that received subpoenas are just a small part of Mr. Bruno's broad array of personal financial interests, several of which have intersected with his activities as the most powerful Republican in the State Legislature. Mr. Bruno has purchased stock in about a half-dozen companies whose principals obtained state aid or contracts, sometimes with his help, according to a review of his financial-disclosure reports and other public records. He also once co-owned a small apartment building with an Albany-area businessman, who said that Mr. Bruno asked him to step in and replace the senator's son as an investment partner." The Long Island Newsday (12/21, Cockfield, Gonzales, 414K) reports, "An FBI investigation of Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno's business interests has set off alarms among Senate Republicans who fear their flagbearer has been wounded as Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer, a tenacious Democrat, prepares to take office. Members of the GOP held out hope Wednesday that Bruno, 77, can withstand the scrutiny of a federal inquiry, but those sentiments were clouded by apprehension, especially at a time when Democratic state Comptroller Alan Hevesi may be hours from indictment."

DOJ_NMG_0107926

The New York Daily News (12/21, Mahoney, Siemaszko, 729K) reports, "The FBI's corruption probe of New York's most powerful Republican gathered steam. … The grand jury has authorized FBI subpoenas related to Bruno's dealings with Albany-area businessman Jared (Jerry) Abbruzzese, a principal of a Troy, N.Y., high-tech company to which Bruno steered $500,000 in pork-barrel grants over the past four years, sources said. One specific subpoena was issued to a big-time Albany lobbyist, who confirmed the FBI rousted him for records on a land deal he and his pal Bruno were involved in until last year. 'Someone from the FBI dropped' by with a subpoena and asked for the records,' the lobbyist, James Featherstonhaugh, said. 'They were provided.'" capitalnews9.com (12/21, Ference), the New York Sun (12/21, Gershman) and the Buffalo News (12/20, Precious) are among other media outlets with articles covering the Bruno investigation.

Congressman Seeks FBI Help In Search For Missing Persons In Mexico. KENS 5 Eyewitness News San Antonio (12/20, Lopez) reported, "Families of eight people who disappeared in Nuevo Laredo traveled there Wednesday to meet with U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar. They hope he can push for more help to find their loved ones who vanished once they crossed the border. In some cases years have gone by with the Mexican authorities doing nothing, families said. … 'I have hope. And I hope that President Calderon will continue to do what he's done,' Cuellar said. Mexico's new president is revamping his law enforcement agencies, but that's not enough. Desperation pushed these families to come up with hopeful solutions. The congressman wants to publicize the faces of missing Americans in Mexico. 'We also want to set up a toll-free number where people of Nuevo Laredo can call law enforcement here,' Cuellar said. In addition, Cuellar hopes to meet with Calderon and provide the FBI with additional resources to solve kidnapping cases and possibly fund a forensics lab in Nuevo Laredo to help identify bodies."

Tennessee Waltz Target Reportedly Accepted $40,000 Watch From Developer. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/21, Perrusquia, 163K) reports, "Just when it seemed John Ford's legal troubles couldn't get worse, enter a $40,000 wristwatch of questionable origin. Federal prosecutors alleged Wednesday that Ford received the watch -- a diamond-studded Rolex Masterpiece -- in 2004 from prominent Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman. Ford once asserted he got the watch free of charge after using his influence to try to reduce state pollution fines levied against Hyneman, prosecutors said. Neither Hyneman nor Ford has been charged in connection with the watch transaction, yet prosecutors plan to use it as evidence that Ford, who faces separate corruption charges in Memphis and Nashville, had a practice of taking payoffs. 'Ford stated that he had received the watch because he had done Hyneman a big favor, that is, saved him 1.3 million dollars," says a 'Notice of Intervention to Introduce Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts," filed Wednesday. The notice by U.S. Atty. David Kustoff and Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza seeks to introduce the watch as evidence in Ford's bribery trial set to start Feb. 5 in Memphis." Ford "is charged in U.S. District Court in Memphis with taking $55,000 in cash bribes in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover sting. In an unrelated matter, Ford was indicted this week by a federal grand jury in Nashville on charges alleging huge kickbacks taken while he was in the General Assembly. … He resigned from the Senate in May 2005 after his Waltz indictment in Memphis."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/21, Spivack, Bice, 255K) reports, "Maybe you forgot all about Mequon-based Doral Dental and its controversial ties to a once-powerful Tennessee politician who has a bribery indictment hanging over his head. Yeah, maybe you forgot about it, but the feds sure haven't. Federal prosecutors in Nashville, Tenn., this week unsealed a six-count indictment charging former Tennessee Sen. John Ford with wire fraud and failing to disclose more than $400,000 in payments from Doral after he helped the Wisconsin company land a lucrative state contract. The feds say Ford and two others created a consulting firm, Managed Care Services Group, in 2001 that collected $1 million from Doral after it beat out other firms vying for the three-year, $18 million contract to administer dental payments for poor Tennessee children. … In the midst of the Doral controversy, Ford and other Tennessee legislators were charged in May 2005 with bribery and threatening to shoot potential witnesses against him. The witnesses turned out to be undercover federal agents running a sting operation dubbed the Tennessee Waltz."

Three Former Students Plead Guilty To Alabama Church Arsons. The AP (12/21, Rawls) reports, "Three former college students pleaded guilty

DOJ_NMG_0107927

Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama. Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February." US District Judge David Proctor "told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences." The AP notes, "The three are also charged with state crimes," and "defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached."

USMS Deputy Chief Of Business Management Called "Washington's…Warren Buffett." Forbes (12/20, Crane) reported on its Web site, "Uncle Sam's got a thing for strip clubs. And banana plantations, horse farms and private prisons. These are just some of the businesses overseen by the federal government while their shady owners sit on trial for various crimes. Administering this colorful portfolio is Len Briskman, deputy chief of business management for the U.S. Marshals Service. Call him Washington's own Warren Buffett. At any given time, Briskman presides over 30 businesses -- many of them profitable and each with $20 million to $400 million in assets -- while their owners get a fair trial, which could take up to seven years. Meanwhile, all of those honest employees get to keep working." Forbes added, "How much do Briskman's efforts pull in? 'Conservatively, [the government] makes a couple hundred million a year, at least'" from selling those businesses (net of losses), he says. That's a pretty snazzy return for a relatively minuscule initial investment." Forbes noted, "With the number of forfeited businesses growing in recent years, Eben Morales, deputy chief in charge of the Asset Forfeiture Program, wishes he could find 'carbon copies' of Briskman to help distribute the workload."

US Marshals Arrest New Hampshire Bank Robbery Suspect In Florida. The AP (12/20) reported, "A suspected bank robber from Manchester has been captured in Florida, according to the U.S. Marshals Service. The federal marshals said Richard Villar, 33, was arrested and charged with the armed robbery of a St. Mary's Bank in Hudson on April 18. His alleged accomplices, Joshua Gagnon, 21, of Nashua, and Debra Scott, 28, formerly of Manchester, were arrested in May by Hudson police, but Villar reportedly fled the state and was using an alias. Federal marshals said they traced him to the St. Petersburg area where he had family and friends."

Ohio Police, US Marshals Arrest Alleged Child Rapist. WEWS-TV Cleveland (12/20) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A rape suspect is in jail after being arrested by the Akron police gang unit and U.S. Marshals. Ryan Lawson, 19, was arrested on warrants for rape and gross sexual imposition involving a 12-year-old girl." Lawson allegedly "raped the girl sometime between February and March."

USMS Arrests Tennessee Statutory Rape Fugitives In Louisiana. The AP (12/21) reports, "Two men wanted in Jackson, Tennessee, on charges of statutory rape have been arrested in New Orleans. Twenty-three-year-old William Paulus and 22-year-old Santo Camarillo were arrested while working construction jobs. That's according to the US Marshals Service." The AP notes, "The men were arrested…on federal charges they used cell phones to entice minors to engage in sexual acts. The two were wanted in Tennessee after they failed to appear in court on eight counts of statutory rape.

IMMIGRATION:

Disabled Immigrants Sue Federal Agencies Over Loss Of Benefits. The Washington Post (12/21, A3, Fears, 690K) reports, "For eight years, Shmul Kaplan lived alone in a suburban Philadelphia housing complex with hardly any furniture and barely enough food to eat." Then "Kaplan, who is from Ukraine, lost his $603 in Supplemental Security Income after he missed a seven-year deadline to become a U.S. citizen. The clock started ticking after he was granted asylum in 1997. A class-action lawsuit filed in federal court in Pennsylvania recently on behalf of people such as Kaplan, 80, contends that they are not responsible for missing the deadline. Kaplan's citizenship application is among hundreds of thousands awaiting background checks by the FBI, a mountainous backlog that grew after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. More than 6,000 physically handicapped people who were granted asylum have had benefits cut as they wait, according to the suit." The Post notes, "The suit was filed against top officials of the Social Security Administration, the Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) unit of DHS, the Justice Department and the FBI. The National Name Check Program at the FBI receives more than 67,000 requests for background checks each week. Half the requests come from the USCIS, said Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman. When requests from private entities are included, the total reaches several million each year, Bresson said. … The FBI has struggled for years with a growing backlog of such requests from all entities. The Government Accountability Office reported earlier this year that, for immigration cases alone, 113,000 background checks had been pending for more than six months. USCIS spokeswoman Chris Rhatigan said her agency processes citizenship applications as quickly as it can and is not responsible for the backlog that results from the delay in background checks."

DOJ_NMG_0107928

US-Mexico Border Separates Many Families. The New York Times (12/21, Navarro, 1.16M) profiles Irma of Mexico, a onetime illegal resident of the US whose two daughters married and now live in Texas. Her "youngest daughter, Lupita, and another daughter, who is married and has three children, now live together just a few blocks from her. But the other two are still in Texas, still illegally, now with one American-born child each. The border is now a barrier between the Mexican and American sides of her family, and now Irma feels the pull of her absent daughters."

NYTimes Praises Bush On Immigration. The New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Every now and then the public gets a glimpse of the George W. Bush who is a calm realist on immigration, a former governor of a border state who knows, likes and understands Latino immigrants. It's an identity sharply at odds with that of many other members of his Republican Party, especially the snarlers clustered on its right wing." Bush has "shown a way to move the debate away from the 'amnesty' trap by casting reform as a means to end an abusive system and remove the perverse incentives that allow illegality to flourish."

TAX:

Judge Rejects Defense Request For Separate KPMG Trials. The New York Times (12/21, Browning, 1.16M) reports, "The federal judge overseeing a mammoth tax shelter case said yesterday that the delayed trial would begin next fall, but he rejected a proposal by prosecutors to try the defendants separately in two groups." US District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan "ordered jury selection to begin on Sept. 17, 2007, in the criminal trial of the 18 defendants, 16 of whom are former employees of the accounting firm KPMG. The judge also said that he had tentatively decided not to have separate trials." The Times notes, "The trial date could still be changed again, because of uncertainty over the issue of legal fees. A federal appeals panel is weighing whether Judge Kaplan had the authority last June to dismiss KPMG's motion to compel the defendants to submit to arbitration over the fees issue. A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is hearing KPMG's appeal of the judge's ruling."

Syracuse University Study Finds Fewer IRS Audits Of Large Companies. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, C3, Drucker, 2.04M) reports on a study by researchers at Syracuse University that found that "the Internal Revenue Service audited a smaller proportion of the nation's largest corporations this year than it did in 2005 and, over the past five years, it has cut the average number of hours spent on such audits." … IRS officials said part of the reason for the overall drop in audits of big corporations was that the agency hired hundreds of new auditors in 2006 who required training. The officials cited the decline in hours per audit as a sign of greater efficiency."

South Dakota Accounting Firm Implicated In Chicago Tax Fraud Case. The Yankton (SD) Daily Press (12/21, Johnson, 94K) reports, "A Yankton accounting firm has been implicated in a health care reimbursement tax fraud plan that was recently shut down by a Chicago federal court. According to a press release issued by the Tax Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, the firm of Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. LLC of Yankton helped businesses in Illinois and Indiana sell 'illegal or improper' health care reimbursement plans that the Internal Revenue Service estimates cost the U.S. Treasury between $12 and $63 million. The district court in Illinois issued a permanent injunction Dec. 5, ordering Carmelo Zanfei of Steger, Ill., and William Crouse of Greenwood, Ind., and any individuals or entities working in association with them, to no longer sell their Health Incentive Plan and HealthIER Plan." The Daily Press notes, "Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Department of Justice, said the organization would not comment on whether there is a criminal investigation into the case. However, a lawyer representing Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. said he has been assured by the Department of Justice that there will be no criminal investigation into his client's involvement."

DOJ_NMG_0107929

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Enforce Clinton Declassification Order. The New York Times (12/21, A1, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "It will be a Cinderella moment for the band of researchers who study the hidden history of American government. At midnight on Dec. 31, hundreds of millions of pages of secret documents will be instantly declassified, including many FBI cold war files on investigations of people suspected of being Communist sympathizers. After years of extensions sought by federal agencies behaving like college students facing a term paper, the end of 2006 means the government's first automatic declassification of records." The Times adds, "Secret documents 25 years old or older will lose their classified status without so much as the stroke of a pen, unless agencies have sought exemptions on the ground that the material remains secret. Historians say the deadline, created in the Clinton administration but enforced, to the surprise of some scholars, by the secrecy-prone Bush administration, has had huge effects on public access, despite the large numbers of intelligence documents that have been exempted. … Many historians had expected President Bush to scrap the deadline."

IG Report Gives New Details On Berger's Removal Of Classified Documents. The AP (12/21, Margasak) reports Sandy Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser, "removed classified documents from the National Archives, hid them under a construction trailer and later tried to find the trash collector to retrieve them, the agency's internal watchdog said Wednesday." Berger, who "pleaded guilty to unlawfully removing and retaining classified documents," took them "in the fall of 2003 while working to prepare himself and Clinton administration witnesses for testimony to the Sept. 11 commission." Later, when Berger "was confronted by Archives officials about the missing documents, he lied by saying he did not take them, the report said."

The New York Times (12/21, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports, "Still unresolved in the inspector general's report is one lingering mystery in the episode: Whether, as Mr. Berger's critics have charged, he was so cavalier as to stuff classified documents in his socks." The report "said one witness at the archives saw Mr. Berger bending down and 'fiddling with something white, which could have been paper, around his ankle.' But Mr. Berger denied he had ever stuffed documents in his socks, explaining the episode by saying that 'his shoes frequently come untied and his socks frequently fall down.'"

The Washington Post (12/21, A7, Smith, 690K) reports the documents Berger "took detailed how the Clinton administration had responded to the threat of terrorist attacks at the end of 1999. Berger removed a total of five copies of the same document without authorization and later used scissors to destroy three before placing them in his office trash, the National Archives inspector general concluded in a Nov. 4, 2005, report." The fact "that Berger, one of President Bill Clinton's closest aides from 1997 to 2001, illicitly removed the documents is well-known: A federal judge in September 2005 ordered him to pay a $50,000 fine for his actions and forfeit his security clearance for three years." But what Berger "did, and the ham-handed and comical methods by which he did it, are freshly detailed in the National Archives report." The report "states that in 2003, an official whose name was deleted informed the White House that the documents Berger reviewed during his first two visits -- in May and June of that year -- were so poorly organized and tracked that the archives 'would never know what if any original documents were missing.'"

The Washington Times (12/21, Seper, 88K) reports, Berger, "fined $50,000 for taking classified documents from the National Archives, hid the papers under a construction trailer where they later could easily be retrieved, a report yesterday said." In his "televised testimony to the September 11 commission, Mr. Berger said the Clinton administration's 'sustained attention' to terrorist threats and 'rigorous actions' had foiled a terrorist threat in December 1999 to bomb airports in the United States. But Attorney General John Ashcroft told the commission that he saw some of the documents that had turned up missing from the Archives and that the plot was stopped with 'luck playing a major role.'"

Bush Links Minimum Wage Hike To Small Business Tax Relief. The AP (12/21, Loven) reports President Bush "endorsed one of the Democrats' top priorities for the new Congress, a $2.10-an-hour minimum wage increase — and on a faster timetable than they have proposed," but "his support comes with a catch." Bush said "at a Wednesday news conference that any pay hike should be accompanied by tax and regulatory relief for small businesses, potentially a tough sell for Democrats, who are about to reassume control of the House and Senate." At his news conference, Bush was "eager to show he heard the message of voters who stripped his party of majorities in both the House and Senate in the November elections" and said "he'll work hard on what he called 'an interesting new challenge' — trying to find common ground with Democrats who will lead Congress for the first time in his presidency."

DOJ_NMG_0107930

The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "Efforts to link a hike in the minimum wage to tax cuts have repeatedly failed during Bush's time in office, despite Republican control of Congress." Democrats have "objected to linking the wage increase to tax cuts, and Drew Hammill, a spokesman for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), said she was not interested in such an arrangement. But shortly afterward, Hammill altered his response. He said that Pelosi preferred a bill unencumbered by tax cuts but that 'House Democrats have long supported tax changes that would benefit small business' and would look at such proposals." Still, there is "strong opposition to the idea among Democrats."

The Wall Street Journal (12/21, McKinnon, 2.04M) reports Bush's "insistence on tax breaks and regulatory relief for small business sets up a test that could determine the tenor of relations between the White House and Congress's new leaders for the rest of his term." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "and House Democrats plan to pass an increase in the minimum wage in their first 100 hours of work next year. Other priorities include repealing tax breaks for big oil companies, allowing Medicare to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices and cutting interest rates on student loans." Democrats hope "to build enough momentum to move the provisions through the Senate and force Mr. Bush to accept them as they are." But it is "unlikely any of those measures will become law without concessions to Republicans, however."

The Washington Post (12/21, A14, Fletcher, Weisman, 690K) reports President Bush "for the first time endorsed a specific plan for raising the federal minimum wage yesterday, as he embraced Democratic calls to boost it by $2.10, to $7.25 an hour, over two years." The president's "endorsement of a minimum wage increase breaks with the position long held by conservative Republicans that the increase would hurt business and ultimately the economy. But with the Democrats poised to take control of both chambers of Congress for the first time in more than a decade, Bush cited his support of the proposed increase as proof of his intent to operate in a more bipartisan manner during the remaining two years of his presidency." Beyond "increasing the minimum wage, the president said that he hopes to reach agreements with the new Congress on a guest-worker program for low-skill immigrants, renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law and measures aimed at encouraging the development of alternative fuels."

The Washington Times (12/21, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "highlighted the new dynamic at work on Capitol Hill, saying now he and the Democrats both have an interest in getting things done – 'to show that they're worthy of their leadership roles.' The president said he is willing to accept a deal with Democrats that raises the minimum wage to $7.25 as long as that doesn't hurt businesses. He said the way to protect businesses is to combine the increase 'with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing.'" Senate and House Republican leaders "lined up behind Mr. Bush's position yesterday, with incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, saying pairing tax cuts and wage increases makes sense."

Bush Signs Omnibus Tax Break, Trade Bill.

The AP (12/21) reports President Bush "revived some 20 tax breaks, extended trade benefits for developing countries and protected doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments by signing sweeping tax and trade legislation Wednesday." The bill "is a patchwork of must-do items that were left for the lame duck Congress. It was bundled together and passed by the House and Senate just before adjourning earlier this month." Republican "budget hawks bridled at the measure's approximately $40 billion price tag, and textile state senators objected to trade provisions benefiting Haiti."

The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Hamburger, Roche, 850K) reports the bill "was a lavish hodgepodge that included a $100 million-a-year boost in the Medicare reimbursement rates for dialysis providers who proved to be generous contributors to important legislators, notably House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of Bakersfield." The dialysis folks "were among many special interests benefiting from a piece of legislation that was designed to simply extend existing tax cuts and credits — but ended up freighted with billions of dollars in new spending earmarks for the coal industry, Brooks Brothers and various other interests."

DOJ_NMG_0107931

Bush Signs Postal Service Overhaul Measure. The Washington Post's (12/21, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports on the 12-year effort by Rep. John M. McHugh (R-NY) to pass legislation overhauling the US Postal Service. "McHugh has worked to balance the competing interests of postal management, postal competitors, unions and companies," that "rely on the post office," and "yesterday, he" saw "President Bush sign the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act," which "offers some hope that subsequent increases in postage will be more predictable, especially for letters, magazines and advertising mail." The "public, for the most part, will see no change in its dealings with the post office. But stamp prices will probably go up once or twice in the next year. The Postal Service has a request pending to raise first-class postage by 3 cents, to 42 cents, probably in May. Under the new law, the Postal Service can seek one more increase, no later than Dec. 20 next year, before new rules take effect."

Bush Signs Bill To Fund Clean Up Of Abandoned Coal Mines. The AP (12/21, Hefling) reports President Bush "signed legislation Wednesday that gives billions of dollars to coal-producing states to clean up hazardous abandoned coal mines and pay for health care for retired miners." The signing "ends a long fight that has pitted coal-producing states against each other over the best use of funds collected for the nation's coal mine reclamation program." Coal-producing states "will get an estimated $6.3 billion for abandoned mine cleanup and another $1.6 billion to pay for health care for retired miners who worked for coal companies that no longer exist, according to the federal Office of Surface Mining. The money will be distributed from 2007 to 2025."

Democrats Plan Stepped-Up Investigations. The Christian Science Monitor (12/21, Chaddock, 59K) reports that with "little prospect of funding bold spending initiatives, Democrats poised to take control of the 110th Congress are reviving the ability to investigate the executive branch." Democratic leaders "and new committee chairs aim to jump-start oversight on issues ranging from the Iraq war to homeland security and consumer protection," but they "say they will not use their new powers to conduct a witch hunt on the Bush presidency, and will take a more careful tack instead." But plans for a five-day work week "and the eagerness of new committee chairs - also poses dilemmas for the new Democratic leadership over how to aggressively question administration officials, without distracting them from their work fighting wars and securing the homeland."

Goode Under Fire For Criticizing Muslim Congressman's Use Of Koran For Oath. The AP (12/21, Frommer) reports that in response "to constituent e-mails about Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing-in," Rep. Virgil Goode "warned that 'many more Muslims' will be elected demanding to use the Quran unless immigration is tightened." The letter "triggered angry responses from a New Jersey congressman and an Islamic civil rights group."

The Washington Post (12/21, A11, Goldfarb, 690K) reports Goode "is coming under sharp criticism for lashing out against the decision by" Ellison "to use the Koran during a swearing-in ceremony." In a "recent letter to constituents, Goode, a five-term congressman from Rocky Mount, wrote that he does 'not subscribe to using the Koran in any way' and added: 'The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration, there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran.'" The Post adds the Council on American-Islamic Relations "condemned Goode's remarks and called on him to apologize."

The New York Times (12/21, Swarns, 1.16M) reports Ellison's "plan to use the Koran during his private swearing-in ceremony in January had outraged some Virginia voters, prompting Mr. Goode to issue a written response to them, a spokesman for Mr. Goode said." Goode's letter "quickly stirred a furor among some Congressional Democrats and Muslim Americans, who accused him of bigotry and intolerance. They noted that the Constitution specifically bars any religious screening of members of Congress and that the actual swearing in of those lawmakers occurs without any religious texts." Ellison "dismissed Mr. Goode's comments, saying they seemed ill informed about his personal origins as well as about Constitutional protections of religious freedom."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/21, Hotakainen, 395K) reports "a Muslim group is asking" Goode "to apologize after he told hundreds of his constituents that more Muslims will follow" Ellison to Congress "if strict immigration laws are not passed." Goode, "an attorney and former state senator who was first elected to Congress in 1996, said he wants to 'stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country." Corey Saylor, "national legislative director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), said Goode's 'Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office.'"

DOJ_NMG_0107932

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (12/21, Bowman) reports, "After one of Goode's letters miscarried, its contents were plastered online across the blogosphere." Mukit Hossain, "president of the Potomac Falls-based Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, which estimates there are 60,000 Muslim voters in Virginia," said, "It's about as stupid a comment as I've ever heard from a legislator. We will do everything we can to keep this issue alive. I think we can educate the people in his district that he is not the right candidate."

CNN.com (12/21) reports Goode "will not apologize for writing that without immigration reform 'there will be many more Muslims elected to office demanding the use of the Quran,' his spokesman said."

Democrats Challenge Loss In Florida's 13th CD. The AP (12/21, Royse) reports Democrat Christine Jennings, "who narrowly lost to a Republican in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris, asked Congress on Wednesday for an investigation." Florida has "declared that" Jennings "lost to Republican Vern Buchanan by 369 votes. But 18,000 Sarasota County electronic ballots did not record a choice in the race, and Jennings contends that the number is abnormally high and that the machines lost the votes. She filed with the House clerk an official contest of the election results in Florida's 13th Congressional District."

Shift To Right On Social Issues Said To Raise Questions About Romney. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (12/21, A1, Balz, Murray, 690K) reports, "As he prepares for a 2008 presidential campaign, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) has championed the conservative principles that guided President Ronald Reagan, become an outspoken opponent of same-sex marriage and supported overturning the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion." But in 1994, "Romney boasted that he would be more effective in fighting discrimination against gay men and lesbians than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), distanced himself from some conservative policies of the Reagan administration, and proudly recalled his family's record in support of abortion rights. The apparent gulf between the candidate who ran for the Senate in 1994 and the one getting ready to run for president has raised questions as to who is the real Mitt Romney." In emphasizing "his conservative views, Romney has sought to fill a vacuum on the right in the Republican nomination contest. Neither Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) nor former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who top the opinion polls among Republicans, has a comfortable relationship with social and cultural conservatives." Romney "acknowledges his positions on abortion and gay rights have changed. He told National Review Online last week that he would like to see the Supreme Court overturn the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision and return the issue to the states. He also said he no longer favors a federal non-discrimination law that would cover gay men and lesbians, and no longer backs accelerating the opening up of the military to gay men and lesbians."

Law Professor Defends Judicial Ethics Act Of 2006. Ronald D. Rotunda, professor of law at George Mason University, writes in the Washington Post (12/21, A29, 690K), "The Judicial Transparency and Ethics Enhancement Act of 2006, now before Congress, would create an inspector general for the courts. It offers modest reforms that would keep our judiciary independent (because no one favors a dependent judiciary) and help keep it accountable (because no one favors a judiciary that is above the law)." Nonetheless, "there are those who greet it the way Dracula would greet a bouquet of garlic. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, for example, has said of the proposal: 'That's a really scary idea.'" Rotunda adds, "On the contrary, this bill would strengthen judicial independence because it would give people greater faith that if there were problems, the inspector general for the courts would deal with them and not sweep them under the rug. An inspector general would also protect judges from frivolous or false charges. … Opponents of this bill say that the sky is falling. But it is not falling. There are no cracks in the sky. There are not even pre-fracture incipient fissures in the sky. Instead there is a real need for change."

DOJ_NMG_0107933

Personnel News. Judy Sarasohn reports in his "Special Interests" column in the Washington Post (12/21, A27, 690K), "Dave McCurdy, a Democratic survivor of the Republican K Street Project, is moving from the Electronic Industries Alliance to become president of the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers. … Raymond Shepherd III, chief counsel of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is moving to Venable next month to be head of the law firm's new congressional investigation group. … Jonathon Jones, a longtime aide to Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), most recently as chief of staff, joined the lobby shop Monday. … Howard Waltzman, chief counsel for the House Energy and Commerce Committee, is leaving the Hill for Mayer, Brown, Rowe &; Maw as a partner in the law firm. Scott Gottlieb, deputy commissioner for medical and scientific affairs at the Food and Drug Administration, is leaving Jan. 16 to rejoin the American Enterprise Institute."

OTHER NEWS:

Chavez Claims US Envoy Lied About Drug Trafficking. The AP (12/20) reported the U.S. ambassador's "suggestion that better ties were possible with Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez met a blunt reply on Wednesday when Chavez accused the ambassador of lying about drug trafficking. The lack of counter-drug cooperation between Venezuela and the United States has been one of many diplomatic sticking points between the two countries -- one that has worsened as Chavez has accused American anti-drug agents of involvement in espionage." Venezuelan officials "said they are fighting the drug war with increasing success, claiming that since Chavez broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration last year, the amount of illegal drugs seized has doubled." Ambassador William Brownfield "has urged Venezuela to sign a new agreement with the DEA, but Chavez revived his earlier claims that officials of that agency had been involved in spying -- allegations that Washington denies." The AP writes that yesterday Chavez said, "A little while ago, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas told a big lie. He should retract it if it's really true that [U.S. officials] want good relations like they've been saying." CNN and FOX News have used the AP story.

Bush Rejects Talks With Syria, Iran. McClatchy (12/21, Douglas, Strobel) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday voiced his strongest opposition yet to talking directly to Iran and Syria as other administration officials acknowledged secret US funding of opponents to Syria's regime. At a year-end White House news conference, the president insisted that he won't deal with Iran until it verifiably abandons its uranium enrichment program and won't talk with Syria until it stops interfering in Lebanon and Iraq." Both stands "are rejections of a key recommendation made earlier this month by the Iraq Study Group."

Kerry, Dodd Meet With Assad Despite White House Objections. The AP (12/21, Aji) reports Senators John Kerry and Christopher Dodd met with Syrian President Bashar Assad Wednesday to discuss "the need for Damascus to cooperate with efforts to maintain the unity and stability of war-ravaged Iraq," state media reported. The US Embassy in Damascus said the meeting, which lasted two and a half hours, covered "a full-range of topics relating to US-Syrian relations and regional issues." In a telephone interview with the AP, Kerry said, "I feel quite confident in saying this was a conversation worth having and that the (Bush) administration ought to pursue it." Meanwhile, the Bush administration "has accused Kerry, Dodd and other senators who have met with Assad of sending mixed signals." White House spokesman Blair Jones said Wednesday night, "We discourage the travel of members of Congress to Syria because we believe it undermines the cause of democracy in the region and particularly" Lebanon's government.

The Boston Globe (12/21, Klein, 413K) reports Kerry "said Wednesday that President Bashar Assad of Syria expressed a willingness to work with the United States to bring stability to Iraq, and said Assad personally offered assistance that Kerry plans to convey to the Bush administration." Kerry "said the Assad government is interested in approaching the Iraq war from a regional perspective, where other Middle East issues -- including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- are part of the equation." The Massachusetts Democrat "said he would not publicly discuss the substance of his talks with Assad until he has fully briefed State Department officials about his visit."

US, UK To Move Forces To Persian Gulf In "Display Of Military Resolve Toward Iran." The New York Times (12/21, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "The United States and Britain will begin moving additional warships and strike aircraft into the Persian Gulf region in a display of military resolve toward Iran that will come as the United Nations continues to debate possible sanctions against the country, Pentagon and military officials said Wednesday." The officials "said that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was expected this week to approve a request by commanders for a second aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran by early next year." The Times adds, "Senior American officers said the increase in naval power should not be viewed as preparations for any offensive strike against Iran. But they acknowledged that the ability to hit Iran would be increased and that Iranian leaders might well call the growing presence provocative."

DOJ_NMG_0107934

Security Council Set To Vote Friday On Iran Sanctions. AFP (12/21, Aziakou) reports "under pressure from the United States," the UNSC "edged toward a Friday vote on a compromise draft resolution mandating sanctions against Iran." After the European sponsors "offered concessions to overcome Russian objections," Britain's UN envoy Emyr Jones Parry announced a vote has been schedule for Friday. The new draft, "which watered down a contentious proposal for a travel ban" on 12 officials directly linked to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, "finessed the issue by making the travel ban voluntary." Acting Ambassador Alejandro Wolff said he was consulting with Washington over the latest changes to the draft. Asked about the travel ban, which earlier this week he described as a "priority" issue for the US side, Wolff said: "We're still negotiating this...we want a vote early and we want a really good resolution." Secretary Rice, meanwhile, spoke by telephone Wednesday with British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett to discuss "ways to close the remaining gaps" over the wording of the draft, Assistant Secretary McCormack said. The New York Times (12/21, A26, Hoge, 1.16M) calls the revisions a "major concession to Russia."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (12/21, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "Iranians made their feelings plain about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad last week by voting to reject his allies in municipal elections and in the Assembly of Experts, a clerical body that theoretically has authority over Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei. That doesn't mean reformers now run Iran, but it does suggest that international pressure and a policy of democracy promotion may produce the kinds of changes in Iran that three years of Western diplomacy have failed to achieve." The Journal adds, "So it's all the more puzzling that, even as Iranians try to apply some pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad, the international community is about to prove his point that Iran will pay little price for its quest to develop an atomic bomb. Consider what's happening at the UN, where the Security Council is expected to approve a sanctions resolution this week, nearly four months after its August 31 'deadline' for Tehran to stop enriching uranium. … There's an opening here to promote change, provided the US doesn't reward Mr. Ahmadinejad's bad behavior by failing to punish it, and provided President Bush reminds Iranians that while the US opposes their government, it stands with Iranians who want more freedom."

Iranian Oil Minister Says "De Facto" Sanctions Hurting Projects. The Financial Times (12/21, Bozorgmehr, Khalaf) reports, "Iran's oil minister on Wednesday admitted that Tehran was having trouble financing oil projects, in a rare acknowledgment of the economic cost of its nuclear dispute. 'Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their co-operation,' Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told the oil ministry news agency, Shana." The Times adds, "The statement underlined the impact of de facto financial sanctions on the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries' second biggest oil producer. As the controversy over Iran's nuclear programme has escalated, the US has applied pressure on European banks and financial institutions to curb dealings with Tehran."

Reemerging Student Movement Seen As Threat To Ahmedinejad. The New York Times (12/21, A1, Fathi, 1.16M) reports in a front page article that the Iranian student movement is "reawakening from its recent slumber and may even be spearheading a widespread resistance against" President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. For example, last week protestors disrupted a speech by the Iranian president, representing "the first widely publicized outcry against Mr. Ahmadinejad, one that was reflected Friday in local elections, where voters turned out in droves to vote for his opponents." The students' complaints "largely mirrored public frustrations over the president's crackdown on civil liberties, his blundering economic policies and his harsh oratory against the West, which they fear will isolate the country. But the students had an additional and potent source of outrage: the president's campaign to purge the universities of all vestiges of the reform movement of his predecessor, Mohammad Khatami."

Rafsanjani Emerging As Top Challenger. The AP (12/21, Karimi) reports "elder statesman Hashemi Rafsanjani, a mercurial cleric who has played both sides of Iran's reformist-conservative divide, is rising again as a key challenger to Iran's president after local elections show deep discontent with the president's hard line." Last week's local elections across Iran were "seen as a referendum on President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's 18 months in office, and results so far were showing widespread victories for his opponents." In fact, many analysts are "now predicting a coalition between reformers and moderate conservatives to oppose Ahmadinejad and his hard-line allies in parliament and presidential elections in 2009." Talk of a political bloc was "fueled after two top reformist politicians -- former president Mohammad Khatami and Mehdi Karroubi -- met on Sunday with Rafsanjani."

DOJ_NMG_0107935

Hill "Encouraged" As Six-Party Talks Enter Fourth Day. The New York Times (12/21, A9, Kahn, 1.16M) reports Assistant Secretary Hill said Wednesday that the six-party talks "could reach a new agreement on rolling back North Korea's bomb-making effort this week, but the prospects for a meaningful breakthrough remained uncertain." Hill "said the tenor of the often tortuous discussions had improved" and "have been very useful." Negotiators "are talking about much more than just agreeing on things on paper. We're discussing actual developments on the ground, and for that reason these discussions are not easy," Hill cautioned. The envoy also "said he was pleasantly surprised that the talks had moved beyond posturing" and "raised the possibility that they could produce an agreement before the end of the current round this week."

AFP (12/21) reports talks entered a fourth day Thursday "amid a slightly warmer climate," with Hill "saying negotiations were tough but offered a glimmer of hope." Hill said late Wednesday after a second straight day of direct talks with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-Gwan, that the discussions "are not easy -- actually, they are very difficult but we are encouraged by the process." He went on to say that talks have been "very useful in the last day and a half." Meanwhile, financial teams from the two nations met on Tuesday and Wednesday in Beijing on the sidelines, "but they finished without any agreement being reached." The Treasury Department's chief negotiator, Daniel Glaser, told reporters late Wednesday "only that the two sides may meet again in New York next month." The AP (12/21, Herman) reports Glaser said the process is "moving forward to be productive and useful, it's going to have to start focusing very, very closely on the underlying concerns of illicit finance."

Hill Says Talks Give Japan, North Korea Chance To Improve Relations. The AP (12/21, Yamaguchi) reports Assistant Secretary Hill "expressed hope Wednesday that Japan and North Korea would meet on the sidelines of the six-nation negotiations to discuss normalizing their relations." However, Hill cautioned, "The normalization process depends on the discussion of ongoing issues and clearly the Japanese have some issues that need to be addressed. It's our hope that there can be a bilateral meeting between the DPRK and the Japanese aiming at these issues."

Somali Factions Agree To Resume Peace Talks. The Washington Post (12/21, A20, McCrummen, 690K) reports Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts and the country's transitional government agreed Wednesday to resume peace talks "without any preconditions, as fighting broke out between the two sides." European Union envoy, Louis Michel, said at a news conference in Nairobi that "there was a broad agreement to deescalate and refrain from hostile acts," but cautioned "there are still issues that will have to be resolved." However, as Michel "discussed peace with their leaders, Islamic Courts militias and the Ethiopian-backed transitional government fought with rockets and heavy weapons in towns just southeast and southwest of Baidoa, the town where the government is based." The Financial Times (12/21, England) says no date was given for the talks which are expected to take place in Khartoum. Meanwhile, the AP (12/21, Hassan) says Wednesday's violence "underlined the difficulties of securing peace" in the country. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) runs a similar report.

Saudi Arabia Names Jubeir Ambassador To US. The Washington Post (12/21, A25, Wright, 690K) reports Saudi Arabia has informed the State Department "that it intends to appoint Adel al-Jubeir as the new ambassador to Washington," according to US officials. Jubeir, a long-time foreign policy adviser to King Abdullah, has "long been the public face" of the kingdom in the West," and his "impending appointment represents a meteoric rise in Saudi diplomacy for a man who last served in Washington as special assistant to Prince Bandar bin Sultan, now the Saudi national security adviser."

Rice Says Darfur Remains "Deep Concern" To US. AFP (12/21) reports Secretary Rice said

DOJ_NMG_0107936

Wednesday the crisis in Darfur remains an issue of "deep concern" in Washington following a visit to Khartoum last week by a US special envoy Andrew Natsios. Rice also reiterated calls for Sudan to "drop its objections to deployment of a hybrid African-UN peacekeeping force" in the region. After meeting with Natsios, Rice said, "It is extremely important (to deploy) a robust peacekeeping force that can actually help to end the violence and bring relief to the many innocent men, women and children who are suffering in Sudan." Rice said Natsios had "moved the ball forward" during meetings with Sudanese President Omar al-Beshir and other leaders in Khartoum last week.

Natsios Warns Of Possible Action In Darfur. The AP (12/21, Gedda) reports Natsios warned Wednesday that Sudan "must open a path toward ending the Darfur crisis before the end of the year or the international community will take coercive action against the Islamic government." The envoy said "international patience is running out" on Sudan, but he declined to say what options are being considered. "It's not useful to make threats," said Natsios, briefing reporters. British officials have said that creation of a no-fly zone over Darfur is one option being considered. However, AFP (12/21, Millikin) reports Natsios issued a January 1 deadline for Sudan to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers to Darfur or "face coercive international action" to halt violence in the region. Natsios was quoted as saying, "For us to continue on the process of quiet diplomacy, negotiation and a process to resolve Darfur, then we need progress that's operational, on the ground, in Darfur...by the end of the year." The Washington Times (12/21, Kralev, 88K) also reports the story.

US Condemns EU Plans To Include Airlines In Emissions Trading Scheme. The Financial Times (12/21, Bounds) reports, "The US on Wednesday condemned as illegal plans to include all airlines flying to and from the European Union in the bloc's greenhouse gas trading scheme from 2012. 'The inclusion of non-EU airlines on a non-consensual basis runs counter to EU member states' legal obligations under the Chicago convention...and their bilateral air transport agreements, including with the US,' a government spokesman said." The "US called on the EU's 25 member states to block the proposal, saying that it jeopardised international efforts to tackle the effect of air travel on global warming."

The New York Times (12/21, Kanter, 1.16M) reports, "In the face of stiff opposition from the airline industry, the European Union moved forward Wednesday with plans to impose extra charges on foreign and domestic carriers that pollute too much." The rules "would apply to all flights within the bloc starting in 2011. Foreign carriers landing and taking off from busy airports like those in Frankfurt, London and Paris would be obliged to join the system the following year. If enacted, the measure could drive up costs for airlines, potentially leading to higher airfares for travelers." The Times adds, "The proposal draws from the principles of an established system that Europe now uses to help combat global warming and meet emissions goals set forth under the Kyoto Protocol. ... Many airlines, supported by the United States government, are seeking to blunt the European plans, calling them expensive and unworkable."

The AP (12/21, White) says the EU's move "would hit U.S. airlines on their lucrative trans-Atlantic routes. Airlines are generally in favor of the plan, since EU officials had warned them that refusing to back a carbon emissions trading program would result in an aviation tax." The AP adds, "Bowing to pressure from trade partners, the EU's executive arm will give all flights to and from EU airports an extra year to join the program. All airlines — based in the EU or elsewhere — will have to trade emissions beginning in 2012 for all flights to and from European airports, it said."

China Cracks Down On Investigative Reporting. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A1, Fowler, Dean, 2.04M) reports "China's government is waging a media crackdown on…hard-hitting reports. Some officials fear that investigative reporting feeds public discontent over social ills such as rampant pollution, a growing wealth gap, and especially corruption. Prominent editors at publications around the country have lost their jobs. A law under review in China's legislature could make it much more difficult for reporters…to investigate emergencies and dig up wrongdoing in distant towns and villages.

Meanwhile, the Washington Times/AP (12/21, Kurtenbach) reports, "A journalist serving a 13-year jail term for reporting about a bogus irrigation project has been released five years early to unusually vocal official acclaim for his determination to fight corruption." Gao Qinrong, "previously an investigative journalist for a state-run newspaper in northern China's Shanxi province, was imprisoned in 1998 and released earlier this month, according to media activists and state press reports."

DOJ_NMG_0107937

Wal-Mart's Acceptance Of Unions In China Noted. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, 2.04M) reports says in an editorial, "For a peek into China's labor market, look no further than Wal-Mart. In North America, the world's biggest retailer prefers to close down stores rather than tolerate unionized staff. But in China, most of Wal-Mart's 68 stores not only have labor unions, but six locations now boast Communist Party branches as well." But the "function of the new unions remains unclear," but there is "nothing to guarantee that union members won't catch onto the practices of their Western peers." Meanwhile, "sometime in the next week, Beijing's legislature is expected to hold a second reading of the Labor Contract Law. The document will redefine labor rights and the ACFTU's power. The first draft gave foreign investors a jolt. It made employee dismissals for poor performance difficult. The draft also required company policies and regulations to be negotiated between employer and 'employee representatives,' a la Germany." Many "foreign-invested firms are waiting for the passage of the legislation before deciding whether to admit the ACFTU, as Wal-Mart did. Which makes Wal-Mart's embrace of union and Party all the more puzzling. Perhaps Wal-Mart wasn't given much of a choice, and was chosen to send a message to other foreign-invested enterprises. Which is: We're watching you from outside, and inside."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. In Washington.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: 11 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the state of religious freedom in problem spotys around the world, especially Vietnam. Stephen M. Liston, State Department; Felice Gaer, Chair, U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom; Thomas F. Farr, former Director, Office of International Religious Freedom; Nina Shea, Director, Center for Religious Freedom, Freedom House; Pastor Bui Thien Hue, Pastor, Hoa Hao Church; Joseph Kung, President, The Cardinal Kung Foundation; Berhane Sium, Eastern U.S. Coordinator, The Eritrean National Salvation Front. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: DRUG USE SURVEY _ 10 a.m. The National Institute on Drug Abuse holds a press conference to announce the results of the 2006 Monitoring the Future Survey, which tracks annual drug abuse trends of 8th, 10th, and 2th grade students, including attitudes and perceived risk of specific illicit drugs. Speakers include Office of National Drug Control Policy Director John Walters, Attorney General Gonzales, NIDA Director Nora Volkow. Location: National Press Club.

VIETNAM MEMORIAL-CHRISTMAS _ 10 a.m. The Vietnam Veterans Memorial holds a Christmas tree ceremony to honor veterans and active duty personnel. Location: East Knoll of the memorial.

HOLZER-EMPLOYMENT _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. The National Economosts Clubs hosts a luncheon with Harry Holzer of Georgetown University. Topic: ``Employment During the Boom: Implications for 2007 and Beyond." Location: Chinatown Gardens Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

LOCKERBIE MEMORIAL _ 1:30 p.m. The families of Pan Am Flight 103 victims hold a memorial service on the 18th anniversary of the crash in Lockerbie, Scotland. Participants include Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. Location: Flight 103 Memorial Cairn, Arlington National Cemetery.

UN REFORM _ 2 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds a telephone briefing with Lee Feinstein of the council on the reform agenda for new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon. Notes: RSVP required to NYPressRSVPcfr.org. Dialin number: 800-247-5110; passcode: UN reform.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Bush Acknowledges 'Difficult Year' In Iraq."
"A Matter Of Grove Concern."
"Pakistani City Serves As A Refuge For The Taliban."
"Congress Closes With A Pork-Filled Flourish."
"State High Court To Review Same-Sex Marriage Ban."
"Does A Bug In Our Gut Make Us Fat?"

USA Today:

"Storm Snarls Holiday Travel."

DOJ_NMG_0107938

"For New Orleans After Katrina, Too Many Nights Remain Silent."
"Intestinal Microbes Pack On Your Pounds."
"Reforestation Lags Amid Record Wildfires."

New York Times:

"Big Profits, And Questions, In Effort To Cut Emissions."
"U.S. To Declassify Secrets At Age 25."
"Iran President Facing Revival Of Students' Ire."
"For Divided Family, Border Is Sorrowful Barrier."
"In Cable Wars, Phone Carriers Win A Skirmish."
"U.S. And Britain To Add Ships To Persian Gulf In Signal To Iran."

Washington Post:

"Contention Increases On Troop Levels."
"Federal Subsidies Turn Farms Into Big Business."
"Felons' DNA Missing From Va. Database."
"Shiite Clerics' Rivalry Deepens In Fragile Iraq."
"Mass. Governor's Rightward Shift Raises Questions."
"Mastering A Branch Of History."

Washington Times:

"Bush Concedes U.S. Not Ready For Iraq."
"Berger Took Papers To A Hiding Place."
"Bush Prepares To Make Deals With Democrats."
"Decking The Salesmen Instead Of The Halls?"
"Retailers Get Personal With Blogs From Inside."

Detroit Free Press:

"Classic Seger."
"In Face Of Crimes, Her Will Is Unshaken."
"Gunfire Rages Even As Detroit Tries To Clean Up."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Leaders Back $100 Million Rights Museum."
"Bush: Difficult Choices Ahead."
"Big Belly? Blame Bacteria."
"FCC Takes Slap At Rising Cable Rates."
"'I Feel About As Bad As I've Felt In My Life.'"

Houston Chronicle:

"4 Area Chemical Plants Accused In State Lawsuit."
"Bush May Not Defer To Brass On Troop Levels."
"A Timeout For Reality."
"Rice Stakes Its Future On Booming Biomedicine."
"Rita-Ravaged Town Gets A Booster Shot."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Denver-Snowstorm; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Pentagon-War Spending; Bush-Iraq; Abizaid's Retirement; Iraq-Ruling Coalition; Syria-US Embassy Attack Footage; Gettysburg Casino; China-Adoption Rules; Astronaut-Hair Donation; Ghana-Crocodile Petting Zoo.

CBS: Bush-Iraq; Iraq-Pentagon; Military Recruitment; First Lady-Iraq; Midwest Winter Weather; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Missile Defense System-Alaska Weather; California Air Pollution; Wounded Vets-Skiing.

NBC: Bush-Iraq; Pentagon-Military Expansion; Troop Surge-Analysis; Abizaid's Retirement; Pentagon-War Spending; Military Recruitment; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Denver-Snowstorm; Elderly Care Managers; Immigrants-Minnesota Town; Stock Markets; Reemerging Popularity Of Toy Trains.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

ABC: Denver-Snowstorm; CA-Earthquake; CA-Gay Marriage; Bush-Mary Cheney; Turkmenistan President Dies; CA-Court Case Involving Murder Of Deejay; MADD-Cutting Ties With Miss Teen USA; Wall Street.

CBS: Denver-Snowstorm; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Charges To Be Announced In Haditha Killings Case; Space Shuttle; Bush Signs Bill To Upgrade U.S. Tsunami Warning System.

NPR: Turkmenistan President Dies; Wyoming-Snowstorm; CA-Population Growth Slowing; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Wall Street; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Sen. Leahy-Wants To Know Why Canadian Man Is Still On No-Fly List Despite Being Cleared; Space Shuttle.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0107939

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Leahy Wants To Question Gonzales About Arar Case, Rendition Policy ... 3
US Convicts Pakistani Man Of Supporting Indian Terror Group ... 3
Video Shows Attack On US Embassy In Damascus ... 3
Threat Of Terror Attack In Europe Thought To Be Increasing ... 3
Alleged Terrorists Can Appeal Sanctions To UN Security Council ... 3
WPost Says Congress Should Restore Habeas Corpus For Accused Terrorists ... 3

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Says DHS Must Be Honest With Congress, Public About Capabilities, Costs ... 4
DHS IG Finds Holes In Acquisition Oversight, Secure Border Initiative ... 4
Reliance Of Biometric Security Devices Seen As Risky ... 4
British Firm May Get Anthrax Vaccine Contract ... 5

War News:

Bush Reiterates US "Not Winning" In Iraq ... 5
CIA Simulation Finds US Defeat In Iraq Would Be Boon To Al Qaeda ... 8
Cody Says US Involved In "Global," New Kind Of War ... 8
Pentagon Says It Will Need Additional $99 Billion For War ... 9
Sistani's Influence Seen As Declining As Sadr-Hakim Rivalry Intensifies ... 9
Another Day Of Severe Violence In Iraq ... 10
Najaf Security Turned Over To Iraqis ... 10
Fugitive Iraqi Minister May Return To Illinois ... 10
As Violence Mounts, French Pull Some Soldiers Out Of Afghanistan ... 10
Pakistani City Of Quetta Serving As Taliban Refuge ... 10

DOJ:

Griffin Sworn In As Interim Eastern Arkansas USA ... 11
DOJ's In-Sites Magazine Praises Georgia Community Policing Program ... 11
DOJ Grant Fund Cut Imperils Ohio Anti-Drug Task Force ... 11

Corporate Scandals:

Juniper Taking $900 Million Charge To Cover Tainted CEO Options ... 11
Four Former Enterasys Executives Convicted Of Fraud, Conspiracy ... 12
Homestore CEO Hopes To Remain Free Pending Appeal ... 12
Dell Names Carty CFO To Tackle Accounting Problems ... 13
Wall Street Group Says Connecticut Election Law Violates Privacy Rights ... 13
Virginia Investment Firm Settles Insider Trading Case For $7.8 Million ... 13
Columnist Says Sarbanes-Oxley Discourages New Companies From Going Public ... 13
WSJournal Notes Hedge Fund Manager's Effort To Limit Disclosure ... 13

Criminal Law:

NYC Gang Member Convicted Of Killing Detectives, Faces Death Penalty ... 14
Alaska Man Indicted On Federal Sex, Drug Trafficking Charges 14
Virginia Task Force Recommends Stiffer Internet Predator Punishments ... 15
Wilson Asks Judge To Quash Libby Subpoena ... 15
California Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud ... 15
Three Indicted For Alleged Roles In CyberNET Fraud ... 15
Insurance Administrator Sentenced To Prison For Defrauding Union Pensions ... 15
RCMP, ICE Bust Fraudulent Canadian Telemarketing Syndicate16
Virginia DNA Database Missing Data On Thousands Of Felons 16
New York Inmate Seeks Vacating Of Murder Conviction Based On New DNA Evidence ... 16
Houston Police Suspect Serial Rapist In Attacks On Five Men .. 16
Some Say Supermax Security Weak, But Nearby Residents Skeptical ... 16
Reason For Leap In Robbery Rate Unclear ... 16
NYTimes Calls 17-Year Old's Statutory Rape Conviction "Miscarriage Of Justice." ... 17

Civil Law:

DOJ Seeks Appointment Of US Trustee For $800 Million USVI Bankruptcy Case ... 17

Civil Rights:

North Carolina Lawmaker Seeks DOJ Probe Of Duke Rape Case Prosecutor ... 17

New Mexico To Allow New Patients At Medical Center Probed By DOJ ... 17

Antitrust:

Delta Antitrust Lawyer Says DOJ Unlikely To Approve US Airways Merger ... 17
FCC Ruling To Speed Phone Company Access To Cable TV Markets ... 18
FTC Approves CVS Purchase Of Caremark Rx ... 18
Wisconsin Energy Selling Only Nuclear Plant To FPL Group ... 18
Service Corp. International Seeks FTC Approval Of Funeral Home Sales ... 18
Judge Refuses Motion To Dismiss Antitrust Allegations Against Amway ... 19
NYSE Shareholders Approve Euronext Acquisition ... 19
M&F Worldwide Offers $1.7 Billion For Check-Maker John H. Harland ... 19
Sky Financial, Huntington Bancshares To Merge ... 19
Internet Video Boom Spurs Ericsson To Purchase Redback Networks ... 19
Arcelor Mittal Buys Grupo Villacero For $1.4 Billion ... 19
European Commission Approves MAN's €10.3 Billion Hostile Bid For Scania ... 20
Italian Regulator Orders Banca Intesa To Sell Branches For Sanpaolo Acquisition ... 20

Environment:

US Behind In Reforestation Efforts ... 20
Lawsuits Seek To Block Maryland ICC Commuter Highway ... 20
Global Warming Trading Program Comes Under Fire ... 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales To Decide Whether Alleged Drug Trafficking Kingpin Faces Death Penalty ... 21
Web Site Seen As Risk To Undercover Agents, Informants ... 21
California Marijuana Dispensary Defies Order To Close ... 22
Trove Of FBI Documents More Than Twenty-Five Years Old About To Be Declassified ... 22
FBI Investigation Targets Firms Tied To New York Senate Leader ... 22
Congressman Seeks FBI Help In Search For Missing Persons In Mexico ... 23
Tennessee Waltz Target Reportedly Accepted $40,000 Watch From Developer ... 23
Three Former Students Plead Guilty To Alabama Church Arsons 23
USMS's Briskman Called "Washington's…Warren Buffett." ... 23
US Marshals Arrest New Hampshire Bank Robbery Suspect In Florida ... 24
Ohio Police, US Marshals Arrest Alleged Child Rapist ... 24
USMS Arrests Tennessee Statutory Rape Fugitives In Louisiana 24

Immigration:

Disabled Immigrants Sue Federal Agencies Over Loss Of Benefits ... 24
US-Mexico Border Separates Many Families ... 24
NYTimes Praises Bush On Immigration ... 25

Tax:

Judge Rejects Defense Request For Separate KPMG Trials ... 25
Syracuse University Study Finds Fewer IRS Audits Of Large Companies ... 25
South Dakota Accounting Firm Implicated In Chicago Tax Fraud Case ... 25

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Enforce Clinton Declassification Order ... 25
IG Report Gives New Details On Berger's Removal Of Classified Documents ... 25
Bush Links Minimum Wage Hike To Small Business Tax Relief. 26
Bush Signs Omnibus Tax Break, Trade Bill ... 27
Bush Signs Postal Service Overhaul Measure ... 27
Bush Signs Bill To Fund Clean Up Of Abandoned Coal Mines ... 27
Democrats Plan Stepped-Up Investigations ... 27
Goode Under Fire For Criticizing Muslim Congressman's Use Of Koran For Oath ... 27
Democrats Challenge Loss In Florida's 13th CD ... 28
Shift To Right On Social Issues Said To Raise Questions About Romney ... 28
Law Professor Defends Judicial Ethics Act Of 2006 ... 28
Personnel News ... 29

Other News:

Chavez Claims US Envoy Lied About Drug Trafficking ... 29
Bush Rejects Talks With Syria, Iran ... 29
US, UK To Move Forces To Persian Gulf In "Display Of Military Resolve Toward Iran." ... 29
Hill "Encouraged" As Six-Party Talks Enter Fourth Day ... 31
Somali Factions Agree To Resume Peace Talks ... 31
Saudi Arabia Names Jubeir Ambassador To US ... 31
Rice Says Darfur Remains "Deep Concern" To US ... 31
US Condemns EU Plans To Include Airlines In Emissions Trading Scheme ... 32
China Cracks Down On Investigative Reporting ... 32

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 32

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 33

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0107941

TERRORISM NEWS:

Leahy Wants To Question Gonzales About Arar Case, Rendition Policy. The Toronto Star (12/20, Harper) reported, "The incoming chair of a powerful Senate committee says he will summon U.S. Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales before American legislators to explain why Maher Arar is still barred from the U.S." Sen. Patrick Leahy "said Arar has the right to know what suspicions the Bush administration still harbour against him after he was exonerated by a Canadian inquiry. 'The Canadian government has now documented that the wrong thing was done to the wrong man,' Leahy said. 'It is time for the (Bush) administration to do what it can to redress this wrong, instead of perpetuating it.'" The Star added, "Leahy says he wants Gonzales before his committee to discuss the entire U.S. policy of rendition and he said in a speech last week he will no longer put up with non-answers shrouded in security concerns or promises to get back to him." Leahy added, "You know they are going to be tortured. This is beneath our country. And it does absolutely nothing to make us more secure and it is a gross human rights violation." AFP (12/21) reports on the Toronto Star interview with Leahy about his intention to question Gonzales about Arar and the renditions.

US Convicts Pakistani Man Of Supporting Indian Terror Group. The AP (12/21) reports, "A Pakistani man was convicted Wednesday of financially supporting a militant separatist group in India, federal prosecutors announced. Khalid Awan, of Garden City [MI], was convicted by a federal jury after a two-week trial in Brooklyn and faces up to 45 years in prison. Awan, 44, was charged with helping the Khalistan Commando Force, a Sikh secessionist group that operated in India's Punjab state. The group, founded in 1986, is considered a terrorist organization in India and is said to be responsible for the deaths of thousands of people through bombings, sabotage and assassinations." The AP adds, "'The war on terror is a global battle,' said Roslynn Mauskopf, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York. 'We will not permit individuals in our jurisdiction to finance terrorist groups responsible for murder and violence in any part of the world.' … Awan's sentencing is set for March 7."

Video Shows Attack On US Embassy In Damascus. ABC World News (12/20, story 7, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "For our 'Closer Look' tonight, something almost never scene -- a terrorist strike captured in real-time on videotape. It was a brazen assault on the US Embassy in Syria three months ago by Islamic militants with guns, grenades and explosives. There are many questions about this attack, including whether Syria may have had advanced knowledge it was going to happen. The tape obtained by ABC News offers the first look at what really happened that day in Damascus." ABC (Ross) added, "A US government security camera was rolling as the attackers in the white car pull up outside the embassy wall." ABC noted that "while the embassy is only a few feet from the road, the attackers are not able to breach the heavily reinforced walls." Bruce Tully, a former US Diplomatic Security Service agent, told ABC, "We've poured money and technology into this. It was a very good day for the US and a very bad day for the terrorists." ABC also noted that "of the 13 attacks on US embassies in the last 8 years, this is one of the few that remains a mystery as to who was responsible."

Threat Of Terror Attack In Europe Thought To Be Increasing. The Washington Post (12/21, A20, Whitlock, 690K) reports the "threat of a terrorist attack on European soil by Islamic radicals has increased substantially in recent months, reaching its highest levels since the London transit attacks of July 2005, according to European counterterrorism officials. Adding to the anxiety: fresh threats against Britain and France delivered Wednesday by al-Qaeda's deputy leader." Al Qaeda second-in-command Ayman al-Zawahri "singled out Britain as a historical enemy of Muslims, blaming it for the creation of the state of Israel and the downfall of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century." Zawahri's "recent remarks have particularly concerned French counterterrorism officials. They have warned of a heightened risk of attacks because of a newly declared alliance between al-Qaeda and an Algerian-based network, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has developed an extensive collection of cells in France and elsewhere in Europe."

Alleged Terrorists Can Appeal Sanctions To UN Security Council. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A10, Crawford, 2.04M) reports, "Alleged al Qaeda and Taliban supporters blacklisted by the United Nations Security Council will be able to petition directly to have their names removed and sanctions lifted, removing a top complaint of lawyers and civil-rights lobbies." The UNSC "cleared the way for a form of appeals process when it voted Tuesday to set up an office to handle requests by individuals to lift sanctions imposed under a range of U.N. resolutions dating back to 1992."

WPost Says Congress Should Restore Habeas Corpus For Accused Terrorists. The Washington Post (12/21, A28, 690K) editorializes, "One of the actions Congress took in the hastily passed Military Commissions Act was to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over" lawsuits such as that filed by accused terrorist Salim Hamdan "that were already pending. Under the act, many other important cases will probably have to be dismissed -- which is why Congress should promptly amend the law when it reconvenes in January." The "fault here lies with Congress, not with" US District Judge James Robertson, who "held that the legislature had unambiguously stripped the courts of jurisdiction over all lawsuits challenging detentions at Guantanamo Bay -- so-called habeas corpus lawsuits. And he ruled as well that Congress had the power under the Constitution to do so -- at least for aliens held beyond American shores. But saying that Congress acted lawfully is not the same as saying it acted wisely."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says DHS Must Be Honest With Congress, Public About Capabilities, Costs. Government Executive/National Journal (12/20, Harris) ran an edited transcript of a Dec. 5 interview with DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff, who said the agency's performance "improved quite a bit in the past two years," but "acknowledged that he didn't anticipate just how high a hill he would have to climb when he became department secretary." Chertoff "described some of his major goals, responded to his critics, and talked about what lawmakers and the public should -- and shouldn't -- expect from the Homeland Security Department." Asked whether the public understands "that the federal government will not respond immediately to a major catastrophe," Chertoff said, "I think everyone intellectually knew that the feds weren't going to be there immediately. The federal government does not own all the response resources. The National Guard is the single biggest response resource." Chertoff added that governors "must…take the responsibility to make sure that the National Guard is properly trained and able to work. What we have to do is make sure the National Guard training and planning is integrated with ours." Discussing criticism of the department's contract management, Chertoff said, "We have to be honest with Congress and the public. We ought to ask the question very directly: Do you want us to short-circuit the contracting rules in a time of national emergency?" Chertoff continued, "I've become more and more convinced that one of the best things I can do is to be completely crystal clear about what it is you want us to do: What are our capabilities, what are you prepared to give us or not give us, what's it going to cost, and what can we deliver? Accountability is not about gotcha. It's about clarity of goal, accurate assessment of capability and of cost, and the deliberate decision-making about what you want to do."

DHS IG Finds Holes In Acquisition Oversight, Secure Border Initiative. Government Executive (12/20, Marino) reported a report released Wednesday by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general found that the agency "needs to establish a more comprehensive acquisition oversight program and better plan an initiative to secure the borders." The report stated "that DHS' contract writing systems are incompatible with the Federal Procurement Data System - Next Generation, a governmentwide repository for information on acquisitions," and that some of the department's "contract writing systems 'may need to be replaced." The report also said, of the Secure Border Initiative, "that DHS is embarking upon a multibillion-dollar acquisition project without having laid the foundation to effectively oversee and assess contractor performance and effectively control cost and schedule. DHS has not properly defined, validated and stabilized operational requirements." The report "singled out DHS' Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau and the Coast Guard as needing better financial management" and, citing "significant interdependencies" between CBP and ICE, said "'jurisdictional, operational and communication gaps exist between the two organizations that must be addressed by DHS leadership.' DHS Spokesman Jarrod Agen cited ICE's and CBP's joint efforts to end the United States' catch-and-release policy of dealing with illegal immigrants as an example of how both agencies 'effectively worked together.' In a written response to the IG, DHS officials said the department will continue to build its acquisition workforce, and 'initiatives to resolve personnel shortages will include a centralized recruiting system for contract personnel within DHS components.'"

The Federal Times (12/20, Friedman) reported Inspector General Richard Skinner wrote "that almost four years after the government's largest reorganization in a half-century, the department 'still has much to do to establish a cohesive, efficient and effective organization.'" He said Hurricane Katrina "highlighted longstanding problems at the Federal Emergency Management Agency in managing assistance and housing for disaster evacuees, information and systems, contracts, grants and flood insurance. The IG also is conducting reviews of FEMA's intake process for evacuees, its management of the national flood insurance program, and its acquisition management structure, the report says."

Reliance Of Biometric Security Devices Seen As Risky. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, B3, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports a rise in the use of biometric security devices in the business world has been accompanied by "increasing worry that these security devices can be faked out. Deception methods including well-made copies of fingerprints, masks or contact lenses that replicate iris patterns might be used to defeat the new identification technologies." International Biometric Group, a consulting firm hired by Financial Services Technology Consortium to assess how successful the devices are has taken the preliminary view that they "aren't spoof-proof." Meanwhile, "Use of biometrics in various applications is exploding," and companies that make the devices "downplay the risk of spoofing."

DOJ_NMG_0107943

British Firm May Get Anthrax Vaccine Contract.

The Washington Post (12/21, D3, Merle, 690K) reports the cancellation of VaxGen's "high-profile contract to produce 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine leaves federal heath officials years away from a replacement for the version now in use but could raise the prospects for an alternative being developed by a British competitor." After "delays and technical problems, the Department of Health and Human Services voided" VaxGen's "$877.5 million contract Tuesday. The department has not announced plans to replace it, but an alternative version being developed by Avecia of Manchester, England, is being tested, and the National Institutes of Health is expected to award contracts next year for research into advanced vaccines."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Reiterates US "Not Winning" In Iraq.

President Bush held a press conference yesterday in which he reiterated his assessment, first made in a Tuesday interview with the Washington Post, that the US is "not winning" in Iraq. Though, as the Financial Times (12/21, Daniel) reports, "the president seemed to retreat from this bleak assessment…saying that comment 'reflected the fact that we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted,'" Bush's "not winning" remark dominated media coverage for a second straight day. The CBS Evening News (12/20, lead story, 3:09, Couric, 7.66M), for example, opened its broadcast saying Bush "admits the United States is not winning the war in Iraq. Most of the American public doubts we can win, but not the President. At a news conference today he said flat out 'I believe we are going to win.' If he didn't think so, he added, he wouldn't have US troops there." CBS (Axelrod) added the President "admitted the insurgents have been having quite a run in Iraq, calling 2006 a difficult year for US troops. But he gave no indication of any plan to bring those troops home any time soon."

Media reports saw a change in Bush's tone during yesterday's press conference. The AP (12/21, Hunt) says Bush was "unusually candid," while NBC Nightly News (12/20, lead story, 2:45, O'Donnell, 9.87M) spoke of "a stark new-year prediction on Iraq from the President today: difficult choices and additional sacrifices in 2007. … While still using words like victory, the President left room to read between the lines -- less certainty, more hedge. Here's the contrast just eight weeks ago." The New York Times (12/21, Stolberg, 1.16M) describes Bush as "somber and at times reflective," though he "showed no indication that he was inclined to change goals or pull out of Iraq." The Times also notes Bush "used the news conference to confirm his plans, disclosed Tuesday in an interview with The Washington Post, to propose an increase in the permanent size of both the Army and the Marines. He called the global campaign against terrorism 'the calling of our generation,' and he said the military needed to be beefed up to fight it." The Financial Times (12/21, Daniel) says "the tone of the press conference reflected a hesitant president, conscious of his legacy, struggling to find a way out of Iraq and redefine his agenda after losing control of the House and Senate." The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Gerstenzang, 850K) referred to an "uncharacteristically dour assessment" by the President, and adds he appeared "reflective." His statements "reflected a new willingness to acknowledge that the sectarian violence in Iraq has grown consistently worse and political cooperation there is flagging."

ABC World News (12/20, story 4, 2:35, Tapper, 8.78M) called Bush's assessment of the situation "grim…basically saying 2006 in Iraq was bad, 2007 could be even worse." The President "came before the public to offer an unusually somber look at both the past and the future in Iraq." Bush was shown saying, "2006 was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people. We began the year with optimism after watching nearly 12 million Iraqis go to the polls to vote for a unity government and a free future. The enemies of liberty responded fiercely to this advance of freedom." Bush's "look ahead seemed bleaker still." Bush: "It's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices, because the enemy is merciless and violent." ABC added, "Just six weeks ago, the President sounded much more upbeat." Bush (from October 25, 2006): "Absolutely we're winning. Al Qaeda's on the run."

The Chicago Tribune (12/21, Silva, 617K) says Bush "now offers a more sobering assessment of the war -- saying that American forces are neither winning nor losing, but still asserting that victory will be achieved. That victory, as he has defined it before, remains the promise of an Iraqi government that can govern the nation, sustain it and defend it against unrelenting violence."

The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A6, Dreazen, Jaffe, 2.04M) reports "Bush's comments highlighted the administration's search for a long-term strategy that is sustainable politically at a time when a majority of Americans have concluded the US is losing in Iraq."

The Washington Times (12/21, Curl, 88K) headlines its story "Bush Concedes Us Not Ready For Iraq," and reports Bush said "US forces were inadequately prepared to handle sectarian violence that broke out in Iraq after the fall of Baghdad."

DOJ_NMG_0107944

First Lady Notes Husband Says US "Not Losing, Either." The CBS Evening News (12/20, story 4, 1:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We have another perspective on the war in Iraq tonight and it comes from the person closest to President Bush, his wife of 29 years, Laura. She talked exclusively…to Bob Schieffer." Mrs. Bush: "It has been a difficult year. I think this year especially watching the violence in Iraq is difficult for Americans and difficult for people around the world to watch." Schieffer: "I noticed the President now says he wants to enlarge the army. For so long he said he didn't want to do that. He now concedes that we're not winning in Iraq." Mrs. Bush: "Well, he said we weren't losing, either." Schieffer: "Yes, but was it hard for him to come to those conclusions?" Mrs. Bush: "He, as the President, has to assess and try to make the decisions for our troops, for our country, that are the best for Iraq to try to stabilize the government there, for them to have a chance to have reconciliation and build their government. We know Iraqis want to."

In "Shift," Bush Says Commanders' Opinion On Troop Levels "Just One Set Of Many." The CBS Evening News (12/20, lead story, 3:09, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported Bush "always says he defers to his commanders when talking about troop levels. Well, today a shift: Talking about a possible surge, Mr Bush said the commanders' voices are just one set of many that he's listening to."

NBC Nightly News (12/20, lead story, 2:45, O'Donnell, 9.87M) also said "the President gave less weight to the views of military leaders, a change from how he described their input in October." Bush (from October 30, 2006): "If they want more troops, they get more troops. If they want less troops, they get less troops." Yesterday "he referred to them as one part of his consultation process." Bush: "The opinion of my commanders is very important. They are bright, capable, smart people whose opinion matters to me a lot."

Under the headline "Contention Increases On Troop Numbers," the Washington Post (12/21, A1, Baker, 690K) reports "the debate over sending more US troops to Iraq intensified yesterday as…Bush signaled that he will listen but not necessarily defer to balky military officers." The Post adds, "The tension between the White House and the Joint Chiefs of Staff over the proposed troop increase has come to dominate the administration's post-election search for a new strategy in Iraq. The uniformed leadership has opposed sending additional forces without a clear mission, seeing the idea as ill-formed and driven by a desire in the White House to do something different even without a defined purpose."

"Surge" Option Said To Put Bush In Tough Political Predicament. USA Today (12/21, Nichols, 2.27M) says Bush yesterday "confirmed that one option he is considering is sending tens of thousands of additional troops to Iraq to try to establish control in key areas, particularly Baghdad. The president said that before he would pursue such a strategy, he and his military planners would have to agree on a 'specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops.'" But the AP (12/21, Baldor) reports, "Defense Secretary Robert Gates found American commanders wary of a proposal to rush more US troops to Iraq as he visited the war-ravaged country Wednesday. … On just his third day in charge of the Pentagon, Gates made the unannounced trip with the administration under intense pressure to forge a new strategy -- and just hours after the president conceded, for the first time, that the US is not winning the conflict." The AP Adds, "After meeting with top US generals at Camp Victory, Gates acknowledged concerns that rushing thousands more American troops to the battlefront could allow the Iraqis to slow their effort take control of the country. He said no decisions have been made." The Washington Post (12/21, A20, Ricks, 690K) reports, "Appearing relaxed but looking funereal in a black suit, white shirt and dark tie, Gates said he had received 'candid, honest, firsthand assessments' from senior officers he met with here Wednesday." Said Gates, "This trip is part of the overall assessment that the president asked me to do."

On NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 3, 1:45, 9.87M), Tim Russert said that "if the President decides to put 30,000 more American troops in Iraq, he is going to have to do a major salesmanship job with the American people. Right now, 71% give the President an unfavorable rating in handling Iraq. And overwhelmingly they are opposed to the introduction of new troops, so he will have a very uphill battle trying to convince the public to support him in that effort." Also, "the Democrats will have the gavels of the relevant committees. They will call witnesses who will refute the President. They will call military officials who will disagree with the President. It will be an extraordinary scene on Capitol Hill. If the President decides not to go forward with the surge of temporary troops, then his conservative base, particularly neoconservatives who are pushing for this new battle of Baghdad will be very disappointed and the President cannot afford to lose that key ingredient of his political base. This is a very, very difficult, potentially lose-lose situation for the President."

The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Gerstenzang, 850K) reported that "Bush's comments on Wednesday did not satisfy senior Democratic leaders in Congress. In similar statements, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic Senate leader, and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming House speaker, said Bush did not understand the need for a more dramatic change in Iraq." Sen. Hillary Clinton "said on NBC's Today Show that her support for a temporary troop increase would depend on their mission." The Times adds "there is strong opposition to the idea among Democrats."

The Washington Post (12/21, A1, Baker, 690K) reports Reid "said Bush's latest remarks indicate that he has not come to grips with the need for urgent change in Iraq. 'The president seems lost within his own rhetoric,' Reid said in a statement. 'He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war.'"

DOJ_NMG_0107945

Incoming House Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton appeared on both PBS and MSNBC to discuss the President's remarks. On PBS' NewsHour (12/20, Suarez), Skelton said, "What is winning? They've moved the goalposts on us. At first it was ridding Iraq of weapons of mass destruction. Then it was establishing a democracy. And now it's quelling the sectarian violence. Really, what is winning in today's terms? I don't know what it is, but what we hope to end up with is a representative, effective government there that has stability throughout the nation, and that's probably as close to winning as we can really hope for, under the conditions that we have." On MSNBC (12/20, Mitchell), Skelton spoke against a troop surge in Iraq, saying "it might even exacerbate the situation and maybe even make it worse."

The AP (12/21, Frommer) reports GOP Sen. Norm Coleman, "following a two-day trip to Iraq, said Wednesday he opposes a plan…Bush is considering for a short-term surge of US troops there. At the same time, Coleman said, he supports Bush's call this week for the U.S. to increase its overall number of troops to help a taxed military fight the global war on terror." Said Coleman, "I would not support a massive increase in troops in Baghdad. … I think it would create more targets, I think we'd put more life at risk."

Ex-Rep. J.C. Watts, also a Republican, said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/20, Blitzer), "The last 24 hours, I don't think the American people have become less skeptical. And let me tell you why. Six weeks ago, it was 'stay the course,' before the election. Yesterday, today, it's, 'we're not winning,' more troops. The President's got a tough sell."

Military Officials Said To Be "Suspicious" Of Bush's Plan To Expand Military. NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 2, 0:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The President's decision to push for this expansion of the US military has caught a few people at the Pentagon by surprise." NBC (Miklaszewski) added "some military officials are highly suspicious of the President's sudden turnaround on the issue. They believe that he's dangling that offer out there in an effort to buy the military support for the option to surge additional American troops into Iraq as if it's some kind of tradeoff. You throw in 30,000 more American troops into Baghdad now in exchange for an overall larger force four to five years down the road. But many military leaders that we're talking to still oppose a surge. They still believe it won't work and will put more Americans at risk. As one senior military official put it today, it'll be like throwing kerosene on a fire."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/21, Grier, 59K) reports, "Expanding the size of US armed forces could be an expensive and lengthy task -- in essence, a redoubling of the national effort to grapple with the challenge posed by Islamic extremism." The move, moreover, "would be irrelevant in the Iraq war, say some critics, because by the time more troops are recruited, trained, and deployed, the conflict there will probably be set in its course." Likewise, the AP (12/21, Flaherty) reports "Bush's plan to enlarge the Army and Marine Corps responds to pleas from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill, but finding more recruits will be expensive and challenging and have little immediate impact on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan." USA Today (12/21, Kelley, 2.27M) says "the Iraq war's unpopularity is another challenge for recruiters, says Andrew Bacevich, a retired Army colonel and professor at Boston University. That adds to the costs of getting more people to enlist, he says."

NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 6, 1:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The US Army expects it will have to spend more money on recruiting efforts to meet this new proposal by the President to expand the US military, and some worry it will have to sacrifice quality in some way." NBC (Potter) added that "to meet its current goals, the Army has already added thousands of recruiters. The Army is also offering signing bonuses of up to $40,000 and has gone digital with recruiting ads online at sites like MySpace.com. But even Army officials admit to substantially increase the force could take a long time." General Peter Schoomaker, US Army Chief of Staff: "Optimistically, we could add 6,000 to 7,000 soldiers per year." Training them, added NBC, "will be expensive – an estimated $1.2 billion for every 10,000 recruits."

Meanwhile, McClatchy (12/21, Montgomery, Hall) reports "military experts see as a pattern as the Pentagon seeks to increase the burden on the Army's two reserve components, the Reserve and National Guard. Torn between family and the call to duty, many are taking a hard look at military commitment and choosing family when re-enlistment time arrives. … Those deciding whether to remain in the Guard and Reserve must take into account the possibility that they'd have to serve longer and more frequently on active duty than they do now."

Abizaid Retiring. ABC World News (12/20, story 5, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We learned today that the commander of US forces in the Middle East, John Abizaid, will retire next March." The CBS Evening News (12/20, story 2, 2:02, Martin, 7.66M) said "this is the most critical moment in the war since the invasion. We've got a new Secretary of Defense, we've got a new strategy. We're about to get new generals since both…Abizaid and Gen. Casey are nearing the end of their tours. This may be the last best chance to get it right. Having said that, success still depends on the ability of the Iraqi government to govern itself, but ultimately it's just out of our control." NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 4, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) also notes Abizaid's retirement announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0107946

The Washington Post (12/21, A14, Tyson, White, 690K) profiles Baizaid in a story titled "A Soldier's Soldier, Outflanked," and says "the departure of the general, who has won wide respect for his candid advice to the administration as the head of US Central Command, was expected and is not seen as an indication of his own displeasure or that of superiors over his performance." The Post adds, "Supporters portray Abizaid, 55, as a brilliant commander who did his best, despite constraints from Washington, to adapt the US military to fight an unanticipated guerrilla war -- which he was among the first to identify -- and later the unexpected outbreak of sectarian violence." Yet "critics say Abizaid has placed too much emphasis on Arab sensitivity to foreign occupation, and therefore never demanded enough US troops to stabilize the country." A "US officer" tells the Post, "He was too smart by half."

NYTimes Says Bush Must "Acknowledge" His Iraq Policies Have Failed. The New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) editorializes, "Anyone looking for new thinking on Iraq, or even candor, had to be disappointed by…Bush's news conference yesterday. Mr. Bush may want to defer unveiling his new strategy, but there will be no obliging pause in Iraq's unraveling." Bush "acknowledged the obvious and desperate need to rebuild America's overstretched ground forces, a subject he refrained from talking about so long as Donald Rumsfeld ran the Pentagon." But "that will take time and won't be any help in Iraq. Mr. Bush also needs to acknowledge that his course there has reached a dead end. He needs to quickly define a new direction while he still has any choices left."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/21, 850K) says "Bush's call for a larger military is the right thing to do, even if the president's reasons miss the mark." Yesterday, "Bush couched his argument in excessively narrow terms, saying that a beefed-up military was necessary to prosecute the 'war on terror [that] is the calling of a new generation.' This argument jumbles together the (at least partly metaphorical) 'war on terror' -- a many-fronted effort to prevent the repetition of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 -- with the amassing and deployment of military forces around the globe to protect all of the nation's vital interests. … The need for a larger military isn't confined to the Iraq war but to any number of possibilities -- war on the Korean peninsula, genocide in Africa, the defense of Israel, you name it."

Frederick W. Kagan, author of "Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq," writes in USA Today (12/21, 2.27M), "It is essential…to adopt a new strategy. We must secure Iraq's population and thereby bring the violence under control, abandoning the failed attempt to hand responsibility over to the Iraqis prematurely. … The options in Iraq are stark: withdrawal, defeat and regional disaster, or an effort to secure the population to permit the political, economic and social development and national reconciliation needed for Iraq to move forward. The president's determination to win with a comprehensive new strategy isn't stubbornness. It is wisdom."

In an editorial, USA Today (12/21, 2.27M) weighs in against "a temporary 'surge' of 15,000 to 30,000 US troops in a last-ditch effort to stabilize the violence-wracked nation. … Though it's tempting to think that adding troops for a little while would solve the problem, this is a seductive and dangerous road. It's the same vague reasoning that led to sending hundreds of thousands of troops to Vietnam."

Meanwhile, Berl Brechner writes in the Washington Post (12/21, 690K), "Should we revive the military draft? There's been a lot of talk about it lately. Conscription, as a social exercise, might instill discipline and respect while getting people to mix with all types and classes of their fellow Americans and perform a patriotic duty. It might also serve the political goals of some who oppose the Iraq war." But "if the purpose of the armed services is to be an effective force for defending and protecting the nation, and winning wars when engaged, I have to say this: The draft wasn't great when I got caught up in it 37 years ago, and it would be even worse today."

CIA Simulation Finds US Defeat In Iraq Would Be Boon To Al Qaeda. The Washington Times (12/21, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "The CIA this month conducted a simulation of how the Iraq war affects the global jihadist movement, and one conclusion was that a US loss would embolden al Qaeda to expand its ranks of terrorists as well as pick new strategic targets, according to sources familiar with the two-day exercise." CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield "confirmed to The Washington Times yesterday that the simulation took place in Northern Virginia. He declined to discuss its findings, saying that a final report is not finished and that the report will not be the intelligence community's official view. It will, however, be circulated within the community and possibly to US policy-makers. … Although it takes no policy positions, the simulation's key finding appears to bolster Mr. Bush's contention that a U.S. loss in Iraq will have far-reaching ramifications."

Cody Says US Involved In "Global," New Kind Of War. Army Vice Chief of Staff Gen. Richard Cody said on CNN (12/20, Phillips), "This is a global war. Right now the focus is on Iraq and Afghanistan, where we freed 50 million people from two bad regimes, but it is a global war. The nature of this war is certainly different. And the nature of this enemy is certainly different. And it's a war that we'll be successful with, but not one that people will see someday where people are going to sit on either side of a table and sign a peace accord. That's not the nature of this. It's going to require strength of purpose. It's going to require a strong military. It's going to require a strong American support for us to be able to be successful in this."

DOJ_NMG_0107947

Pentagon Says It Will Need Additional $99 Billion For War. ABC World News (12/20, story 3, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We learned that the Pentagon has put together an estimate that the military next year will need another $99 billion on top of moneys already appropriated. In the days before the US went into Iraq, there were some suggestions the operation could be paid for with Iraqi oil revenues. That thought is a distant memory." ABC (Karl) added, "In the coming weeks, President Bush faces two colossal challenges related to the war in Iraq -- convincing the American people he has a new strategy that will work and getting Congress to pay for it. The war on terror is getting a lot more expensive. Considering the Pentagon once estimated the total cost of the Iraq war to be just $50 billion, the numbers are staggering. The 17-page memo outlines the Pentagon's request for additional funds for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in 2007. Combined with the money already approved by Congress, the total single-year cost would be $170 billion, the vast majority of that money for Iraq." NBC Nightly News (12/20, story 5, 0:20, Williams, 9.87M) said that "if approved by Congress, total spending for the wars in 2007 going in would be $170 billion. That would be a new record."

The AP (12/21, Taylor) reports, "Overall, the war in Iraq has cost about $350 billion. Combined with the conflict in Afghanistan and operations against terrorism elsewhere, the cost has topped $500 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service."

Sistani's Influence Seen As Declining As Sadr-Hakim Rivalry Intensifies. The Washington Post (12/21, A1, Raghavan, 690K) reports, "In the quest to create a new Iraq, two powerful clerics compete for domination, one from within the government, the other from its shadows. … They have fought each other since the days their fathers vied to lead Iraq's majority Shiites. They hold no official positions, but their parties each control 30 seats in the parliament. And they both lead militias that are widely alleged to run death squads." But "in the view of the Bush administration, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim is a moderate and Moqtada al-Sadr is an extremist. As the US president faces mounting pressure to reshape his Iraq policy, administration officials say they are pursuing a Hakim-led moderate coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurdish parties in order to isolate extremists, in particular Sadr." Hakim, "who once verbally attacked US policy, now senses a political opportunity and is softening his stance toward the Americans. Sadr's position is hardening. Young and aggressive, he has suspended his participation in Iraq's government and is intensifying his demands for U.S. troops to leave the country." Their "rivalry is rising as the moderating influence of Iraq's most revered Shiite figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, is fading on the streets of Baghdad and is being replaced by allegiance to militant clerics such as Sadr, according to Iraqi officials and analysts."

ABC World News (12/20, story 6, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M), meanwhile, reported on a breakthrough in trying to isolate Iraq's extremists. According to the 'New York Times,' Iraq's revered Shiite cleric, the Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, has tentatively approved a ruling coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds that would exclude the Shiite militia leader, Muqtada al-Sadr." But Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former Central Intelligence Agency officer and now a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) that "the administration should nip in the bud" such an approach. Gerecht adds, "Changing the Shiite parts of the Iraqi government and quickly taking on Mr. Sadr would do nothing to end the Sunni insurgency and the holy war of foreign jihadists against the new Iraq. … Such a tack would not likely diminish the appeal or the power of the Mahdi Army, which is largely made up of poor, radicalized young men whose families were brutalized by Saddam Hussein and have been savaged by Sunni Arab fighters since the fall of 2003. … The key for America is the same as it has been for years: to clear and hold the Sunni areas of Baghdad and the so-called Sunni triangle to the north."

Sadr Ponders One-Month Ceasefire. The AP (12/21, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who heads a militia feared by Iraq's Sunnis, is considering a one-month unilateral cease-fire and may push his followers to rejoin the political process after a three-week boycott, officials close to him said Wednesday. The issue is expected to come up at a meeting Thursday in the holy city of Najaf between al-Sadr and a delegation representing the seven Shiite groups that form the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament, the Shiite officials said on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the talks." The AP adds, "In perhaps an even more important session, the delegation will also sit down with the country's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani."

Zawahri Says Al Qaeda Real Power Broker In Iraq. The AP (12/21, Michael) reports, "The deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, told the United States it is negotiating with the wrong people in Iraq, suggesting in a video released Wednesday that his terror group was the real power broker in the country." Zawahri "warned that al-Qaida would keep fighting US troops in the Muslim world and target Western nations in retaliation. But he also criticized rival Islamic militant groups, such as the Palestinian Hamas, for being too soft in waging 'jihad' or holy war." The New York

DOJ_NMG_0107948

Times (12/21, El-Naggar, 1.16M) also reports on Al-Zawahri's statement.

Another Day Of Severe Violence In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) reports, "The bodies of 76 unidentified people were recovered in Baghdad on Wednesday, police said, the highest 24-hour toll so far for the anonymous slayings that have become a grim part of life in the capital. All of the victims were men between the ages of 20 and 50. Although they died violently, all shot with automatics weapons, the men were not slain execution-style as is often the case these days -- no handcuffs or blindfolds, morgue staff said. Only a few showed signs of torture." And "they were not the only bodies delivered to the morgue Wednesday. There were victims of drive-by shootings, assassinations and bombings, police said." Meanwhile, "two US soldiers also were killed by separate roadside bomb explosions Wednesday. One soldier died while investigating an explosion on foot with a combat patrol southwest of the capital, the military said. Another soldier died after an explosion near his vehicle during a road-clearing mission in southern Baghdad. Six soldiers were wounded in the explosions."

Iraqi Comedian Killed. The AP (12/21, Yahya) reports, "Gunmen killed a veteran Iraqi actor and comedian known for his stage portrayal of the lighter side of life in Baghdad during Ottoman rule in the early 1900s, police said Wednesday." Mitashar al-Sudani "was killed as he drove to theater offices on Haifa Street in Baghdad on Tuesday, a police officer and an official at Iraq's Theater and Cinema Ministry said. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns."

Najaf Security Turned Over To Iraqis. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Hennessy-Fiske, Fakhrildeen, 850K) reports from Najaf, "The local audience knew what to expect when Iraqi commandos took the stage at the stadium here Wednesday with frogs and a rabbit in hand, preparing to celebrate with a bloody flourish the transfer of local authority from US to Iraqi troops. The Americans were in for a surprise." As "US commanders and guests looked on, the commandos in dark green T-shirts began taking bites out of the frogs. One man knelt, placed the rabbit belly-up on his lap and proceeded to cut it open with his military knife. He screamed as he bit the rabbit's heart, then handed the carcass to companions who began gnawing away, blood flowing down their cheeks." The ceremony "marked the shifting of responsibility for security in Najaf province to Iraqi forces and was attended by US and Iraqi dignitaries, including Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak Rubaie."

The Washington Post (12/21, A21, Trejos, Sarhan, 690K) reports, "Najaf is the third province to be turned over to Iraqi forces. Fifteen more are still under the control of US-led forces."

Fugitive Iraqi Minister May Return To Illinois. The New York Times (12/21, Saulny, 1.16M) reports from Oak Brook, Il, "It was an unremarkable scene on Wednesday outside a gated community here where the former Iraqi electricity minister, Aiham Alsammarae, now a fugitive from justice, keeps a palatial house. Having escaped from a Baghdad jail over the weekend in what he boasted was the 'Chicago way,' Mr. Alsammarae, whose whereabouts are unknown, could have been on the way back here. Or perhaps he had already arrived." The watchman "at the Covington entrance, who either stops or waves through every car that approaches, said Wednesday that he knew Mr. Alsammarae but that he had not seen him 'in quite some time.' Was that days or months? The watchman, who would not give his name, would not elaborate."

As Violence Mounts, French Pull Some Soldiers Out Of Afghanistan. The AP (12/21, Ganley) reports, " "As violence mounts in Afghanistan, France is pulling 200 of its best soldiers out. But military officials here insist France remains fully committed, with 1,100 troops still based in Kabul." Nevertheless, "France's decision to withdraw its Special Forces comes amid concerns in Paris that NATO's mission in Afghanistan has grown confused and that the alliance may be overreaching in its efforts to stabilize and rebuild the nation." The AP adds, "French officials and experts say that as fighting in Afghanistan has dragged on and the insurgency has grown in strength, the special forces were no longer ideal for the mission. Such elite units tend to be more lightly armed, and specialize in gathering intelligence or rapid attacks."

Pakistani City Of Quetta Serving As Taliban Refuge. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, King, 850K) reports from Quetta, in Pakistan, "At a time when the Taliban is making its strongest push in years to regain influence and territory across the border in Afghanistan, this mountain-ringed provincial capital has become an increasingly brazen hub of activity by the Islamist militia." Quetta "serves as a place of rest and refuge for Taliban fighters between battles, a funneling point for cash and armaments, a fertile recruiting ground and a sometime meeting point for the group's fugitive leaders, say aid workers, local officials, diplomats and others. … The apparent ease of Taliban movement in and out of Quetta comes against a backdrop of increasingly bitter squabbling by authorities in Afghanistan and Pakistan over who bears responsibility for the militia's use of tribal areas on the Pakistani side of the border as a staging ground for attacks that have killed at least 180 North Atlantic Treaty Organization and allied troops this year.

DOJ_NMG_0107949

WPost Says Bush "Tolerating" Musharraf's "Empty Promises." The Washington Post (12/21, 690K) editorializes, "Three months ago the Pakistani government struck a deal with pro-Taliban leaders in the district of North Waziristan, bordering Afghanistan: It agreed to abandon military operations, withdraw the army and release prisoners in exchange for promises that the militants would cease cross-border attacks and disarm the foreign terrorists in their midst. That the extremists would not respect the accord, and that attacks on US forces in Afghanistan would increase rather than decline, obviously seemed likely at the time. Yet President Bush, ever indulgent of Pakistan's autocratic ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, accepted his promises. … As senior administration officials now acknowledge, Gen. Musharraf's assurances were empty -- as they have been many times before. According to multiple independent reports, Waziristan has been thoroughly Talibanized, and the fundamentalists are spreading their influence through adjacent border districts. Cross-border attacks and the deaths of American soldiers that they cause are up significantly." The Post adds, "By tolerating the general's empty promises and excuses, the Bush administration is putting its mission in Afghanistan and homeland security into unacceptable jeopardy."

DOJ:

Griffin Sworn In As Interim Eastern Arkansas USA. The AP (12/20) reported, "Tim Griffin, a former assistant to President Bush adviser Karl Rove, was sworn in today as the interim US attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. The 38-year-old Griffin replaces Bud Cummins, who announced last week that his resignation would be effective today." The AP noted, "He recently spent three months of active duty in Iraq in the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps. Griffin had previously served as special assistant to President Bush and deputy director of political affairs at the White House, as well as deputy communications director for the Republican National Committee."

DOJ's In-Sites Magazine Praises Georgia Community Policing Program. The Athens (GA) Banner Herald (12/21, Johnson) reports, "Their duty is to protect and serve, so what does dressing up like Santa, waiting tables for tip money to buy toys and walking neighborhood streets have to do with being a good police officer? Everything, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which highlighted Athens-Clarke police's Community Oriented Policing and Problem Solving (COPPS) program in the current edition of In-Sites, a magazine published by the department's crime prevention arm, the Office of Justice Programs. 'Imagine a successful, proactive police department, one that involves all levels of law enforcement management and strong community leadership,' the magazine says. 'The police force in Athens, Georgia, does more than imagine it - they practice it.' The magazine goes on to explain how since Athens-Clarke Police Chief Jack Lumpkin introduced the concept of community-oriented policing nearly 10 years ago, it has evolved so that individual officers now are 'chiefs' of their beats, responsible for resolving quality of life issues and reducing crime."

DOJ Grant Fund Cut Imperils Ohio Anti-Drug Task Force. The Bucyrus (OH) Telegraph Forum (12/21, Caudill) reports, "The METRICH Enforcement Unit annually spends $115,000 on drug buys. But because of federal and state funding cuts, METRICH will receive a total of only $100,000 in 2007 after getting $260,000 this year". Mansfield police Chief Phil Messer "made the cutback announcement…at the Holiday Inn at a luncheon celebrating the task force's 20th anniversary." Messer noted, "We hope that most of our agencies have made plans to get us through 2007. It's anyone's guess after that." The Forum adds, "Task forces in general could be in trouble. In 2002, $4.8 million of federal money was allocated from the U.S. Department of Justice through the Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services for task forces. That figure will drop to $1.2 million in 2007. Messer said he hopes the 10 counties in the region would continue to work together even if they receive no funding.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Juniper Taking $900 Million Charge To Cover Tainted CEO Options. The San Jose Mercury News (12/21, Schwanhausser, 229K) reports, "Announcing one of the largest restatements stemming from the stock option scandal, Juniper Networks said [Wednesday] it will take a charge of about $900 million to account for tainted options issued to Chief Executive Scott Kriens and others during the frenzied tech boom. 'That tells me the profits of this company were massively overstated during this time period, that's what it tells me,' said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues." Juniper's "board and audit committee absolved Kriens of responsibility," but "some corporate governance experts say the company's probe left unanswered questions about Kriens' role -- questions that might not be resolved until the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department conclude their own probes." The Mercury News notes, "Juniper's internal probe found 'numerous' cases of misdated options, with '99.9 percent' of the problems occurring from just days before the company's initial public offering in June 1999 through December 2003." Kriens "received two tainted grants during that period, both issued at quarterly lows in Juniper's volatile stock price."

DOJ_NMG_0107950

IBM To End Granting Of Stock Options To Directors. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A1, Lublin, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports that in the wake of "scandal and accounting and legal changes," IBM announced "it no longer will grant outside directors stock options," but such directors "will be paid an annual $200,000 retainer, which they can take either in IBM shares or partly in cash -- though rules strongly encourage them to take the shares." The Journal notes that the move follows similar changes by "retailer Gap Inc., recruiter Heidrick & Struggles International Inc. and food company Tyson Foods Inc." Moreover, "Options are suffering a heavy backlash after big corporate scandals such as the accounting frauds at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. and the more recent backdating scandal, corporate-governance experts said."

American Tower To Eliminate $7.5 Million In Options Gains. Bloomberg (12/20, Heiskanen, Armitage) reports, "American Tower Corp., the largest U.S. owner of sites for wireless telephone antennas, will eliminate about $7.5 million in gains from misdated stock option grants given to eight current executives and directors. The company also plans to cut about $7.6 million in benefits received by three former officers, Boston-based American Tower said today in a statement." Bloomberg notes, "American Tower continues to cooperate with U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission options inquiries. The company reported on Nov. 8 that some managers routinely misdated option grants for at least six years, artificially inflating their worth."

Nasdaq Warns Chordiant Software Over Options Probe-Related Noncompliance. The AP (12/21) reports, "Chordiant Software Inc., a maker of customer relationship software for businesses, said Wednesday it received an anticipated Nasdaq Staff Determination letter for its failure to timely file its 2006 annual report as a result of a stock options probe. Nasdaq initially informed the company in August that its common stock would be delisted because of its failure to timely file its Form 10-Q for the quarter ended June 30, unless it requested a hearing. Chordiant appeared before the Nasdaq Listing Qualifications Panel, which issued a decision granting it an exception until Dec. 29, to get into compliance with listing rules." The AP notes, "The restatements are necessary because of the conclusions of a historical stock option review concluded by its audit committee, which determined additional non-cash expense for the period 2001 through 2006 is expected to be about $8 million. A total of 105 companies are currently under Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department stock-option grants scrutiny, and at least 90 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews, according to an AP review."

Four Former Enterasys Executives Convicted Of Fraud, Conspiracy. The AP (12/20) reported, "A federal jury convicted four former Enterasys executives on securities fraud and conspiracy charges [Tuesday], but was unable to reach a verdict on five charges against the computer networking company's former chief operating officer. … The onetime executives were accused of scheming to inflate company revenues in the quarter ended Sept. 1, 2001. The charges were related to sales contracts, investments, and revenue the company reported during and immediately after its spinoff from Cabletron Systems Inc." The AP notes that the four executives are former CFO Robert Gagalis, former VP Bruce Kay, former accountant Robert Barber and Singapore office employee David Boey. They "were convicted on 27 of 39 conspiracy, securities, and wire fraud charges against them. … Former chief operating officer Jerry Shanahan, the only defendant who was not a certified public accountant, was acquitted on one count of securities fraud."

InformationWeek (12/20, Gardner) reported, "Prosecutors scored another victory over executives who played illegal financial games during the technology bubble when a federal jury convicted four former executives of telecom equipment provider Enterasys of securities fraud and conspiracy charges. … Four other former Enterasys executives, including former chairman, president, and CEO Enrique Fiallo, had previously pleaded guilty to charges and testified in the jury trial," and "sentencing of all the executives is scheduled for March."

Gagalis, Kay Put Up Houses For Bail. The Manchester Union Leader (12/21, Paiste, 56K) reports, "Two of four former Enterasys executives…have posted equity in their homes as bail, while two others have been ordered to home confinement with electronic bracelet monitoring pending sentencing on the federal criminal charges in March." Former CFO Robert Gagalis "signed an agreement to forfeit his $2.5 million home in Rye if he fails to appear for his sentencing, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney William E. Morse." Likewise, former VP Bruce Kay "agreed to forfeit his principal home and a vacation home collectively valued at about $630,000, which he owns free and clear, Morse said." Meanwhile, the Union Leader notes, "Acting U.S. Attorney Joseph N. Laplante praised the verdict, stating yesterday: 'The investing public deserves and needs accurate financial information about public companies. The successful prosecutions in this case should serve as a substantial deterrent to others in similar circumstances who might otherwise be inclined to cook the books.'"

Homestore CEO Hopes To Remain Free Pending Appeal. Inman News (12/20, Roberts) reported, "Lawyers for Stuart Wolff, the former Homestore CEO who was sentenced in October to 15 years in federal prison for his role in an accounting fraud scheme that artificially inflated Homestore revenues and almost ruined the company, have filed a motion to keep him out of custody pending an appeal of his conviction. The motion raises questions about a judge's financial interest in a company involved with Wolff's case and other aspects of his trial." Inman noted, "On Dec. 7, Wolff's lawyers submitted a motion to the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals for Wolff's release, and lawyers had earlier filed a motion with the district court to put off Wolff's payment of a $5 million fine plus about $8 million in restitution. … 'We think he should start serving his sentence,' said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner, who is representing the government in the case against Wolff. 'We are just waiting to hear what the court is going to do.'"

DOJ_NMG_0107951

Dell Names Carty CFO To Tackle Accounting Problems. Market Watch (12/20, Andrejczak) reported, "Faced with two investigations into its bookkeeping, Dell Inc. turned to the head of its audit committee and a close friend of the chairman and the chief executive to sort out the accounting mess. Donald Carty was named Dell's chief financial officer late Tuesday. The move comes as the world's No. 2 manufacturer of personal computers copes with investigations into its bookkeeping, corporate stumbles and a faltering stock price. Carty, a former CEO at American Airlines and a Dell director for 14 years, will succeed James Schneider on Jan. 1. … But there is doubt about whether Carty is best suited to the job." Carty "is Dell's longtime audit-committee chairman, and the company's accounting methods are under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney in New York. The inquiries forced Dell to delay its third-quarter results last month." MarketWatch noted, "Carty was forced to resign from American Airlines in 2003 after failing to disclose large bonuses and pension protections for executives even as he was negotiating for concessions from unions."

Forbes (12/20, Kirdahy) reported on its Web site, "Don Carty left American Airlines under a cloud. Now he's returning to a marquee corporate job at Dell," which "is puzzling because Dell's problems have to do with its accounting, indirectly overseen by the panel that Carty chaired." Forbes noted, "Both the SEC and the Justice Department are investigating whether prior financials were misstated regarding issues like revenue recognition, accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items. American Technology Research analyst Shaw Wu questioned the move."

Wall Street Group Says Connecticut Election Law Violates Privacy Rights. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A8, Hudson, 2.04M) reports that the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association "has gone to court to challenge a new Connecticut election law that requires that state officials maintain an Internet database listing the names of the children and spouses of executives at companies that do business with the state. The law is meant to discourage executives from hiding campaign contributions by funneling them through family members." The group "contends the state's public-disclosure requirement would invade its members' privacy and put children at risk."

Virginia Investment Firm Settles Insider Trading Case For $7.8 Million. The Washington Post (12/21, D1, Hilzenrath, Hart, 690K) reports, "Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group, the Arlington investment firm, yesterday agreed to pay $7.8 million to settle charges that it engaged in insider trading and other violations in 2001 when in effect it bet that the stock price of a client company would decline." The case involved short-selling sales of Annapolis security firm CompuDyne stock, and former FBR chairman Emanuel Friedman "agreed to pay almost $1.3 million for his role in the episode."

Columnist Says Sarbanes-Oxley Discourages New Companies From Going Public. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (12/21, A16), Michael Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, says that despite the generally positive economy, it is "troubling to note that something is missing from this new boom: Where are the IPOs? Historically, stock booms have seen an explosion in the number of young companies making their first public sale of stock." To know why new companies "aren't going public, just look at their business plans. In the past, the inevitable end-point of these plans, the so-called liquidation moment, was an IPO. Not any more. These days, the goal of almost every new start-up is to be acquired by an established company. And in that little shift in orientation lies a potentially radical change in the U.S. economy." To "understand this sudden desire to pump and dump, put yourself in the entrepreneurs' shoes. Looking ahead at a possible IPO for your hot little start-up, all you see are minefields of legal precedents and new regulations created after the dot.com boom. Not least -- but worst -- there is the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, whose self-monitoring rules Big Corporate initially resisted, but now embraces as an effective way to track internal financial operations."

WSJournal Notes Hedge Fund Manager's Effort To Limit Disclosure. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, 2.04M) says in an editorial that hedge fund manager Phillip Goldstein is "seeking an exemption from Section 13(f) of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act, and if he doesn't get it he says he'll mount a legal challenge to the rule. The clause requires managers with more than $100 million in assets under their care to disclose their equity positions quarterly." Filers of 13(f) forms "can request confidentiality but the bar is so high that, of all the managers covered by the rule, only about 60 ask for secrecy in any given quarter. So 13(f)-based articles frequently appear in the business press reporting the latest moves of savvy investors. Mr. Goldstein argues that this is tantamount to theft, allowing others to capitalize on smart money managers' talents without paying for their services. And by facilitating this, Mr. Goldstein says, the SEC is essentially perpetrating an eminent domain seizure of managers' intellectual property rights. It's a novel theory. Whether or not it succeeds, though, Mr. Goldstein's gambit promises to spark a much-needed discussion about the virtues of secrecy."

DOJ_NMG_0107952

CRIMINAL LAW:

NYC Gang Member Convicted Of Killing Detectives, Faces Death Penalty. The New York Sun (12/21, Goldstein) reports, "The first federal death penalty execution of a New York resident in more than 50 years may be on the horizon following the conviction yesterday of a Staten Island gang member who executed two undercover police detectives. In the U.S. courthouse in Brooklyn yesterday, the foreman of the jury called out 'guilty' in a loud voice for each of the 10 counts in Ronell Wilson's federal racketeering indictment. … 'The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public,' Police Commissioner Kelly said in a statement. 'They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice.'" The Sun adds, "In response to yesterday's conviction, Mayor Bloomberg reaffirmed his commitment to seizing illegal guns."

The New York Times (12/21, Brick, 1.16M) reports, "It was never proved whether Mr. Wilson knew his victims were detectives, and an accomplice's recantation eventually prompted prosecutors to drop such charges. But a witness testified that Mr. Wilson gave a reason for the shootings in the minutes after he pulled the trigger. He did not care, the witness quoted him saying, 'about anybody.' The prosecutors…assisted by Special Agent Thomas Shelton of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, presented nearly three weeks of testimony and evidence from members of the crew, scientific experts, civilian eyewitnesses, investigators and audio and video surveillance recordings." The Times notes that as the verdict was read, the gallery was filled with "spectators, including law officers, family members, television commentators, sketch artists and the United States attorney, Roslynn R. Mauskopf."

Newsday (12/21, Lowe) reports US District Judge Nicholas Garaufis told the jurors "they must return to his courtroom on Jan. 10 to begin the trial's penalty phase. Wilson's attorneys told the judge they expect to spend nearly two weeks presenting evidence and testimony in hopes of persuading the jury to spare his life. Garaufis said he expects a penalty verdict by late January. While state appeals courts have voided the death penalty in New York, Michael Palladino, president of the New York City Detectives Benevolent Association, said he was hopeful a federal death sentence against Wilson could be carried out." The New York Daily News (12/21, Marzulli, 729K) reports the conviction under the headline "Cops' Killer Faces Needle."

Prosecutors Capitalized On Wilson's Violent Rap Lyrics. The AP (12/21, Caruso) reports, "When police arrested Ronell Wilson, his pockets were stuffed with the type of violent poetry that boys have been scribbling in notebooks since the advent of gangster rap. Wilson called himself 'Rated R,' warned any challengers to wear a bulletproof vest, and boasted of leaving .45-caliber slugs in the heads of his enemies. The clumsy verses — littered with misspelled words — may never land Wilson a record deal, but to prosecutors, they were solid gold." The AP adds, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Morris J. Fodeman asked jurors to take special note of one stanza. In it, Wilson had written 'Ain't goin' stop to I'm dead.'"

Alaska Man Indicted On Federal Sex, Drug Trafficking Charges. The AP (12/21, Joling) reports, "An Anchorage man has been indicted on charges of coercing juvenile girls and adult women into prostitution and paying them off in crack cocaine. Don Arthur Webster Jr., 49…was indicted in federal court on 28 counts of sex and drug trafficking. The indictment was made public Wednesday. … The yearlong investigation was a joint effort of the FBI, Anchorage police and the U.S. Attorney's office." The AP notes, "Prosecutors said the prostitution ring was operated on an out-call basis. … Webster provided housing for the females at six homes. Police and federal authorities said Webster was violent with the females and threatened them with harm if they disobeyed him or tried to leave." US Attorney Nelson Cohen "revealed few details of the investigation outside of what was stated in the indictment, such as the ages of the juvenile prostitutes. … 'We want to protect them,' Cohen said." The AP adds, "FBI special agent Toni Marie Fogle said human trafficking crimes have been made a high priority of the agency and are considered to be a human rights violation."

KTVA-TV Anchorage (12/20, O'Brien) reported on its Web site, "Five girls under the age of 18, may have been victimized," and "investigators say they're dealing with a pimp who ran at least seven businesses that were really fronts for prostitution. … 'This indictment is the culmination of an investigation that has taken place for over a year,' said…Cohen. Webster is accused of operating seven so-called escort services. They have names like Foxy Roxies, Sunshine Girls, Tickle Your Fancy and Tiffani's. They are all listed in the phone book, but investigators say they're really a front for prostitution." KTVA added, "Meanwhile, the FBI, the U.S. Attorney and Anchorage police say the investigation isn't over and there could be more victims they don't know about yet."

DOJ_NMG_0107953

Virginia Task Force Recommends Stiffer Internet Predator Punishments. The Washington Times (12/21, McLaughlin, 88K) reports, "Virginia should establish stiffer sentencing guidelines against sexual predators convicted of hunting down victims on the Internet, and parents must be better educated about the risks their children face in cyberspace, according to a report released by a state task force yesterday. The Youth Internet Safety Task Force was established by state Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell," and "there are 25 recommendations in the nearly 100-page report, which was compiled by more than 40 parents, business leaders and law-enforcement officials after six months of study. … The proposals include mandatory minimum prison sentences for producing child pornography or soliciting children online." The Times notes, "According to the U.S. Justice Department, one in five children ages 10 to 17 receive an unwanted sexual solicitation online."

Wilson Asks Judge To Quash Libby Subpoena. The AP (12/21) reports former Ambassador Joseph Wilson "asked a federal judge Wednesday not to force him to testify in the CIA leak case and accused former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby of trying to harass him on the witness stand." Libby "subpoenaed Wilson as a defense witness this month. Libby's attorney, William Jeffress, said in court Tuesday that was a precautionary move and he did not expect to put Wilson on the stand." While Wilson and his wife, former CIA agent Valerie Plame, "are at the center of the CIA leak scandal, Wilson is a minor figure in Libby's perjury trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton has sought to keep much of the back story of the leak out of the case."

California Woman Pleads Guilty To Katrina Relief Fraud. The Yuba (CA) Appeal-Democrat (12/20, Young) reported, "A Yuba County resident admitted Tuesday in federal court that she conspired to steal $6,000 in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office." Crystal J. Housley, "along with defendants John P. Housley and Shawn R. Cudaback, said they lived in Gibson, La., at the time of the hurricane when they actually were in Arkansas, according to U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott. The three allegedly gathered Sept. 15, 2005, at a Yuba County motel to defraud the Federal Emergency Management Agency." John Housley was arraigned on Wednesday, "Crystal Housley will be sentenced Feb. 27 and Cudaback, who pleaded guilty earlier, on March 20." The Appeal-Democrat noted, "The case was investigated by the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force. … As of September, more than 400 people nationwide had been charged with hurricane-related fraud, according to the latest progress report from the Task Force."

Three Indicted For Alleged Roles In CyberNET Fraud. WOOD-TV Grand Rapids (12/20) reported on its Web site, "Krista Watson and two others were indicted Wednesday morning for their role in the CyberNET fraud uncovered in 2004. Watson, 39, her mother-in-law Geraldine and Paul Wright are charged in a criminal conspiracy to commit bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering crimes. The charges lay out how they and others defrauded investors of approximately $100 million. 'CyberNET is a local example of a national problem,' said US Attorney Margaret Chiara. 'Prosecuting corporate officers for committing unconscionable acts against the public remains a top priority of my office and the Department of Justice.' The three are also charged with defrauding Huntington National Bank over a $17 million line of credit, as well as individual acts of money laundering." WOOD noted, "If convicted on all counts, the three are facing very long prison sentences as well as the forfeiture of $3,364,412.49 in nine bank accounts."

The Grand Rapids Press (12/21) reports, "Geraldine Watson, mother of the company founder, the late Barton Watson, is charged with falsifying a federal form submitted to a gun dealer when she bought a 12-gauge shotgun Nov. 22, 2004. The indictment alleges that Mrs. Watson said the gun was for her when she in fact bought it for her son. Watson, 44, shot himself with a 12-gauge shotgun after a standoff with police at his Ada Township home in the early hours of Nov. 24." The Press notes, "The conspiracy charge outlines what investigators called a plan to deceive banks and other lenders to amass $100 million from 2002 to 2004. … Other charges against Kotlarz-Watson include one count of illegally spending money obtained through bank fraud and three counts of income tax evasion. … Wright faces charges of engaging in mail fraud by setting up commercial mailbox accounts as part of the CyberNET fraud scheme, which carries a maximum 30-year prison term and $1 million fine."

Insurance Administrator Sentenced To Prison For Defrauding Union Pensions. STNG Wire (12/21) reports Michael G. Linder of Crete, Ill., yesterday "was sentenced to seven years in federal prison for paying to two union local officials and for embezzling from and defrauding numerous union local pensions and welfare benefit plans for more than $6.9 million, according to a release from the U.S. Department of Justice. Linder pleaded guilty to defrauding eleven union local pension plans of $5 million and embezzling $1,930,154 from five union local pensions and health and welfare benefit plans on June 30, 2006, the release stated." STNG notes, "Linder was the president of…a third party administrator for pension plans for various union locals," and "while Linder was defrauding the pension and welfare benefit plans, he provided union local officials with graft payments, including a 1999 Harley Davidson motorcycle valued at more than $19,000, the release stated. Thomas Kisting and Fred Schreier, who received the bikes, were also charged and convicted, the release stated."

DOJ_NMG_0107954

RCMP, ICE Bust Fraudulent Canadian Telemarketing Syndicate. The Washington Times (12/21, Seper, 88K) reports that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, under the auspices of "Project Colt," "have dismantled a Montreal-based telemarketing ring that victimized as many as 500 people a week, many of them U.S. citizens, for up to $13 million." ICE spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said that "forty Canadian citizens were arrested on suspicion of fraud," and that the ring used a lottery scheme and a "mass telemarketing fraud" in which "the ring used various approaches, either telling persons they called that they were eligible to receive a $7,000 grant, or selling them health care kits or billing them for services never rendered." Moreover, "Nearly 90 percent of the victims in this case were over 60 years of age."

Virginia DNA Database Missing Data On Thousands Of Felons. The Washington Post (12/21, A1, Rondeaux, 690K) reports that in Virginia, "thousands of felons may have skirted a legal requirement to submit genetic samples, partly because local and state agencies may have failed to make them do so," even though Virginia law requires "all convicted felons and those arrested in connection with violent crimes such as rape or homicide to submit cheek swabs for DNA analysis and entry into the statewide database." Virginia's Public Safety Department is investigating the cause and extent of the missing profiles.

New York Inmate Seeks Vacating Of Murder Conviction Based On New DNA Evidence. The New York Times (12/21, Santos, 1.16M) reports profiles the case of Roy Brown, a New York prison inmate who in 2003 wrote "a harsh letter" to Barry Bench, who Brown believed had committed the murder for which Brown was serving 25 years to life. Bench subsequently committed suicide. "Two weeks ago, DNA tests matched a sample provided by Mr. Bench's daughter to saliva stains on a bloodied nightshirt found at the crime scene, and now Mr. Brown is scheduled to appear in court on Thursday to ask the judge who presided over his original trial to vacate the conviction." The Times notes the involvement of the Innocence Project, "a nonprofit legal clinic that has helped exonerate 188 people since 1989," and notes the fact that Bench's daughter had volunteered to submit DNA. "The recent DNA tests have excluded Mr. Brown as the source of the saliva on Ms. Kulakowski's nightshirt and showed half of the DNA profile matched Ms. Eckstadt's, suggesting the saliva could have come from her father."

Houston Police Suspect Serial Rapist In Attacks On Five Men. The New York Times (12/21, Times, 1.16M) reports that Houston, Texas, area police have said that five men who were attacked and robbed appear to be victims of a serial rapist. The attacks have occurred over a period from May to late November. "All five victims have been white men who were alone and attacked in or near their homes in upscale neighborhoods, Captain Clifford said. The attacker is described as a black man in his mid-20s who is about 6 feet tall and 200 pounds with short hair and no discernible accent."

Some Say Supermax Security Weak, But Nearby Residents Skeptical. The Washington Post/McClatchy (12/21, A27, Rappold) reports, "Although it was once taken as an article of faith that Supermax -- one of four federal prisons at the complex and officially known as ADX Florence -- is as secure as anyplace on Earth, some aren't so sure now. The union representing prison guards is raising alarms about staff cuts. A federal report revealed inadequate scanning of terrorists' mail, and an arbitrator agreed that staff cuts had made the prison dangerous for employees. … But on the streets of Florence, there is little concern about a terrorist breaking out -- or his fellow terrorists breaking in." McClatchy adds, "Even union officials concede that an escape is unlikely. But they say staff cuts have made the prison dangerous for employees and vulnerable to attack from the outside."

Reason For Leap In Robbery Rate Unclear. The Christian Science Monitor (12/21, Ben Arnoldy, 59K) reports, "Possible explanations abound for the soaring robbery rate - 9.7 percent nationwide in the first half of 2006, according to federal crime statistics released this week. But a lead suspect in that troubling trend, say some criminologists, is added economic stress. … But many cities show no such correlation, meaning the root of the problem is more complex than simple economics." The Monitor notes that University of Toledo law professor David Harris "suspects the worsening violent-crime rates may be related to less police presence on the streets. … 'They have a whole set of demands on their plates that simply didn't exist a few years ago,' says Harris, referring to homeland-security duties and less assistance from federal agents reassigned to antiterrorism. A Justice Department spokesman counters that view, noting that federal spending has never been more than 4 percent of state and local law-enforcement spending. The number of police officers has grown every year regardless of federal funding, he adds, and first responders have benefited from a windfall of homeland-security funding in recent years."

DOJ_NMG_0107955

NYTimes Calls 17-Year Old's Statutory Rape Conviction "Miscarriage Of Justice." A New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) editorial sympathetically describes the case of Genarlow Wilson, a 20-year-old Georgia man tried for "engaging in consensual oral sex with a 15-year-old girl at a New Year's Eve party when he was 17," and convicted of "aggravated child molestation even though he and the girl were both minors at the time." Calling Wilson's case "an obvious miscarriage of justice," the Times notes that the law under which he was convicted has since been changed to prevent such "draconian punishment for consensual youthful indiscretions." The Times concludes, "His lawyer is planning to file a habeas petition seeking his release. The courts need to grant it and expunge his record so that Mr. Wilson can return to his family and his once promising academic career. Legislators in other states should take notice and make sure that their own laws do not catch children in dragnets designed for predatory adults."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Seeks Appointment Of US Trustee For $800 Million USVI Bankruptcy Case. The St. Thomas Source (12/21) reports, "An arm of the U.S. Justice Department has moved against Innovative Communication Corp. owner Jeffrey Prosser in the seemingly endless bankruptcy cases involving, indirectly, Vitelco, the V.I. phone company. The government unit is the U.S. Trustee, a self-described 'watchdog' of the bankruptcy courts." The Source notes, "The U.S. Trustee moved on Dec. 19 that a case trustee be appointed to manage Prosser's business operations until the bankruptcy case is concluded. The presiding judge, Judith K. Fitzgerald, has already indicated her positive interest in such an appointment. … The full set of undiscounted debts, including unpaid interest and extensive legal bills, has been estimated as exceeding $800 million."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

North Carolina Lawmaker Seeks DOJ Probe Of Duke Rape Case Prosecutor. The Kinston (NC) Free Press (12/21) reports, "State Rep. Stephen LaRoque has joined U.S. Congressman Walter Jones in calling for the investigation of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong. Jones, in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, said Nifong might have violated the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players accused of raping an exotic dancer last spring. He also could have committed prosecutorial misconduct in his investigation of the case, Jones said." The Free Press adds, "'The prosecutor seems to have put his own political aspirations ahead of justice for these three young men who appear to have been falsely accused,' LaRoque said."

Gonzales Acknowledges Letter From Jones. WFTX-TV Ft. Myers, FL (12/20, 5:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "The Department of Justice says it may get involved in the Duke Lacrosse rape investigation," and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said "he's received a letter from US Congressman Walter Jones asking for federal authorities to step in."

New Mexico To Allow New Patients At Medical Center Probed By DOJ. The AP (12/21) reports that the New Mexico Department of Health "has lifted a yearlong-plus moratorium against admitting new long-term patients at its Fort Bayard Medical Center. The state agency halted new admissions after a Justice Department review of the facility." The AP notes, "Justice investigators said last spring they had serious concerns with the care at Fort Bayard. A report said an investigation 'revealed a wide range of dangerously deficient medical and nursing care practices,' and a failure to comply with federal regulations or meet professional standards. … The state hired GEO Care Inc. of Florida to run the center in November 2005. GEO Care recently hired an administrator, an assistant administrator and a medical director. GEO Care asked the state to lift the moratorium, and has proposed a gradual admission of new long-term residents."

ANTITRUST:

Delta Antitrust Lawyer Says DOJ Unlikely To Approve US Airways Merger. The New Mexico Business Weekly (12/20) reports, "Delta Chairman and CEO Jerry Grinstein continued his offensive against US Airways' hostile takeover bid in a conference call with analysts Tuesday, saying the merger would create too much of a monopoly in too many markets." Meanwhile, "Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta" and US Airways Group. "'It appears from a factual standpoint this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it,' said Jim Weiss, a Washington partner in the law firm Preston Gates & Ellis LLP. … Weiss, the former head of the DOJ's antitrust division and a hired gun for Delta since 1988, said he believes it would take the department about a year to review US Airways' hostile bid for Delta. That's because the DOJ will anticipate more merger proposals and would want to go over the Delta/US Airways merger with a fine-toothed comb. … Chiefly, he said, a lot of small to mid-sized American cities would lose competition if the two airlines merged."

DOJ_NMG_0107956

FCC Ruling To Speed Phone Company Access To Cable TV Markets. The New York Times (12/21, Richtel, 1.16M) reports that the FCC has ruled that "cable television rates have surged in the absence of robust competition," and therefore municipal authorities must decide within 90 days whether phone companies may enter into local cable television markets. "Phone carriers, notably Verizon, have asserted that some municipalities are slow to grant approvals, often in the face of cable industry lobbying. If it succeeds in fostering competition, the decision could eventually affect the rates and services available to the roughly 100 million households that pay for access to television."

The Washington Post (12/21, D1, Sipress, 690K) adds, under the headline, "FCC Vote A Victory For Phone Companies," that the FCC move helps phone companies "by significantly limiting what local officials can demand in return for franchises. … But the telephone industry's victory could prove temporary because opponents say the measure will almost certainly be challenged in court." Moreover, "The FCC's Republican majority said that removing unreasonable hurdles erected by local governments would translate into lower cable rates. Democratic members disagreed and accused the Republicans of overstepping the FCC's authority."

USA Today (12/21, 1B, Davidson, 2.27M) adds, "The move is expected to let AT&T and Verizon more quickly enter hundreds of markets in the next few years, spurring new competition for the cable giants and possibly bringing lower prices." The article notes that despite the phone companies' investment in broadband infrastructure, "local officials often cause delays by making outrageous demands, such as to build swimming pools and recreation centers. 'Such requirements are especially troubling, because competition is desperately needed,' FCC Chairman Kevin Martin says."

Democrats, Cable Companies Look To Hinder Bells' Market Entry. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A3, Schatz, 2.04M) reports, "Phone companies scored a win at the Federal Communications Commission when the agency agreed to change rules to let them enter the cable-television business faster, but the victory may be short-lived, as congressional Democrats complained and opponents threatened legal action. The FCC, in a 3-2 party-line vote, passed rules that give state and local authorities a 90-day deadline to grant video-franchising agreements to new competitors. The commission also struck down rules requiring that the Bells do more to provide service to all residents in an area than current providers." The Journal suggests that a court case is likely.

FTC Approves CVS Purchase Of Caremark Rx. Bloomberg (12/21) reports, "CVS Corporation has won antitrust approval to purchase Caremark Rx, the pharmacy benefit manager, removing potential regulatory opposition to the pending $21 billion acquisition. CVS, which is competing against Express Scripts's $26 billion bid for Caremark, received approval from the Federal Trade Commission, Caremark, which is based in Nashville, said in a statement yesterday. Last month, CVS agreed to buy Caremark to gain more power to negotiate prices with drug makers and to prevent the loss of foot traffic to mail-order medicines from hurting sales of razors, sodas and makeup."

Wisconsin Energy Selling Only Nuclear Plant To FPL Group. The AP (12/21, Fredrix) reports, "Wisconsin Energy Corp. is selling its only nuclear power plant to Florida-based FPL Energy in a deal worth about $1 billion, the companies announced Wednesday. We Energies' agreement with the subsidiary of FPL Group Inc. includes $783 million for the plant and $215 million for its nuclear fuel and other inventories." We Energies spokesman Barry McNulty said that the company also "will give FPL Energy $560 million from a trust fund it had set aside to pay for the decommissioning, when the plant is taken offline and cleaned up," and "the state's public service commission will consider what to do with the remainder of the trust fund, about $300 million, which customers contributed to." The AP notes, "Besides the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, other groups that have to rule on the deal include the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission."

The Business Journal of Milwaukee (12/20) also noted, "The transaction is expected to close in August 2007. The transaction is subject to a number of state and federal approvals, including the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and review by the Department of Justice. … Upon closing, FPL Energy will assume management and operation of the plant from Nuclear Management Co., Hudson, and will work with NMC to ensure a smooth transition. NMC, a joint venture of upper Midwest utilities, has managed the plant since 2000."

Service Corp. International Seeks FTC Approval Of Funeral Home Sales. The AP (12/21) reports, "Funeral home operator Service Corp. International requested government approval Wednesday to sell several properties in order to comply with an agreement reached with the Federal Trade Commission last month." Service Corp. asked FTC "to approve the sale of thirteen funeral homes and cemeteries in Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi to privately-held Legacy Holdings." The AP notes, "SCI agreed with the FTC Nov. 22 to sell a total of 55 properties in order to settle antitrust concerns stemming from its purchase of Alderwoods Group. SCI's purchase of Alderwoods closed Nov. 28. … Mitchell Katz, an FTC spokesman, said the agency expects further petitions from the company as it sells off additional properties as called for in the agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0107957

Judge Refuses Motion To Dismiss Antitrust Allegations Against Amway. The McClatchy (12/21, Margolies) reports, "Plaintiffs in a massive antitrust action against Amway Corp. overcame another hurdle this week in their long quest to get their case heard by a jury. A federal judge on Monday refused to dismiss all but one of eight counts against the company, finding that the plaintiffs' allegations were legally sufficient to support claims of price fixing, conspiracy and other charges. U.S. District Judge Richard E. Dorr agreed to dismiss only a civil racketeering claim, ruling that it failed to establish 'a pattern of racketeering activity.'" McClatchy notes, "The case, which was filed in mid-2003 in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Missouri, has been closely watched by Amway distributors nationwide. … The lawsuit contends that Amway exaggerates the profits to be made selling its products and pressures distributors into buying its motivational materials. It alleges that a handful of Amway 'kingpins' - those who bought into Amway early on - control thousands of down-line distributors and make most of their money by selling them the motivational materials, known at Amway as the 'tool and function' business."

NYSE Shareholders Approve Euronext Acquisition. The USA Today (12/21, Farrell, 2.27M) reports, "Shareholders in the New York Stock Exchange voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to approve a $14 billion acquisition of Euronext that will create the first trans-Atlantic market for stocks." With "more than 75% of NYSE shareholders voting, the merger received overwhelming approval, winning an estimated 99.7% of ballots cast. Euronext shareholders approved the deal Tuesday." The "deal is expected to close within three months, since European regulators have already approved it."

M&F Worldwide Offers $1.7 Billion For Check-Maker John H. Harland. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/21, Paul, 379K) reports, "M&F Worldwide Corp. isn't exactly a household name. The New York company — which said Wednesday it entered into a $1.7 billion deal to acquire John H. Harland Co., the Decatur-based check maker — owns Clarke American Corp., another big check printer. Its other holding is Mafco Worldwide Corp., a maker of licorice extract used in candies, pharmaceuticals and tobacco products," and "one analyst said the all-cash transaction, which calls for M&F to give $52.75 per share to Harland stockholders, will allow Clarke American to leapfrog Deluxe Corp., the market leader in check printing. And it fits in with the style of Ronald O. Perelman, an M&F board member and head of cosmetics giant Revlon Inc., said John Kraft, an analyst at D.A. Davidson & Co. who follows Harland." The AJC notes, "Still, the pending acquisition, which the companies anticipate will close in the second half of next year, isn't necessarily a done deal. Regulators will take their time in reviewing the proposal because of antitrust concerns."

Sky Financial, Huntington Bancshares To Merge. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, C4, Carrns, 2.04M) reports that Sky Financial Group Inc. of Bowling Green, Ohio, will acquire Huntington Bancshares Inc. of Columbus, Ohio, "in a stock-and-cash deal valued at roughly $3.29 billion, signaling that banking-industry consolidation is occurring even in less attractive markets like the Midwest. Because there are many banks in the region vying for customers amid a relatively slow-growing economy, competition is even more fierce than elsewhere in the country. … The deal is expected to close in the third quarter of next year, subject to the approval of both banks' shareholders and of regulators."

Internet Video Boom Spurs Ericsson To Purchase Redback Networks. The Wall Street Journal (12/20, B2, White, Silver, 2.04M) reports that Swedish telecommunications firm Ericsson has agreed to buy the bankrupt Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion, a move that "reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite. … The companies said the deal will make them more effective suppliers for the fast-moving market. It also could help Redback contend with larger competitors such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Juniper Networks Inc."

Arcelor Mittal Buys Grupo Villacero For $1.4 Billion. Bloomberg (12/21, Nightingale, Craze) reports, "Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel maker, said Wednesday that it had bought plants owned by Grupo Villacero for $1.4 billion to become the biggest producer of the metal in Mexico. The purchase is the first since Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion combination with Arcelor this year. … It also acquired Border Steel, a mini-mill in Texas, as part of the deal. Arcelor Mittal and Villacero also created a joint venture to become the biggest supplier of steel products in Mexico and the U.S. Southwest." Bloomberg notes, "Arcelor Mittal wants to strengthen its position as the biggest steel maker in the United States and tap growing demand for the metal in Latin America."

DOJ_NMG_0107958

European Commission Approves MAN's €10.3 Billion Hostile Bid For Scania. The Financial Times (12/21, Milne, Buck, David, ibison) reports, "MAN, the German truckmaker, last night won unconditional approval from Europe's top competition regulator for its €10.3bn ($13.7bn) hostile bid for Swedish rival Scania, removing a significant obstacle from the four-month take-over fight. The European Commission said there was no reason to object to the transaction on antitrust grounds." The FT notes, "The focus will now move to MAN's efforts to persuade Scania's two largest shareholders - German carmaker Volkswagen and the investment vehicle of the Wallenberg family, Investor - to accept its offer before aJanuary 31 deadline."

Italian Regulator Orders Banca Intesa To Sell Branches For Sanpaolo Acquisition. Bloomberg (12/21, Scherer, Ebhardt) reports, "Banca Intesa SpA, Italy's second-biggest bank, must sell 748 bank branches and part of its insurance business to win approval from Italy's antitrust regulator for its purchase of Sanpaolo IMI SpA. Credit Agricole SA, Intesa's biggest shareholder, 'must reduce significantly' its stake in the new bank and may not play an 'administrative or management role,' according to a faxed statement from the Rome-based antitrust authority. Intesa must also sell its Po Vita life insurance unit, and limit the sales of insurance products from its bank branches." Bloomberg notes, "Intesa and Sanpaolo shareholders backed the 30.8 billion-euro ($41 billion) acquisition on Dec. 1. … 'It doesn't change substantially the merger,' said Fabrizio Barini, an analyst at Websim SpA in Milan. 'They won't have any problems selling the extra branches.'"

ENVIRONMENT:

US Behind In Reforestation Efforts. USA Today (12/21, 1A, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "As severe wildfires scorch more of the USA each year, the Forest Service is falling further behind in replacing trees lost to fire, insects and disease because of shrinking budgets and mounting costs of fighting the blazes." The Forest Service "had a backlog of 1.1 million acres that needed replanting in 2005 -- a combined area slightly larger than Rhode Island 00 according to the agency's latest reforestation report. Last year, it could replant only 153,000 acres."

Lawsuits Seek To Block Maryland ICC Commuter Highway. The Baltimore Sun (12/21, Wheeler, 257K) reports that "four environmental groups and two Montgomery County residents" who live near Maryland's proposed Inter-County Connector have "filed a pair of lawsuits Wednesday seeking to block construction of the east-west toll highway through Washington's Maryland suburbs." The lawsuit argues that "state and federal officials glossed over the environmental damage the project would do. They also contend that officials failed to consider other ways of easing Washington area traffic congestion that would be less costly and less harmful to human health and natural resources."

The Washington Post (12/21, B6, Shaver, 690K) adds, "The two federal lawsuits -- one filed in the District and the other in Maryland -- also allege that the federal environmental review did not meet legal requirements to consider other east-west transportation options. Building mass transit and improving local roads, among other measures, would cost less, do less environmental damage and combat traffic better than an 18-mile road cutting across Montgomery and Prince George's counties, the complaints say."

The Washington Times/AP (12/21, Karush) notes that "the 18-mile, six-lane highway connecting Interstate 270 in Montgomery County with Interstate 95 in Prince George's County has long been championed by regional business groups, but faced stiff opposition from environmentalists as well as concerns over its cost. It finally won federal approval in May. In one lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in the District, Environmental Defense and the Sierra Club say the air quality analysis conducted by federal and regional officials was inadequate because it gauged the potential pollution from the ICC by using monitors that were more than 1½ miles from major highways. The second lawsuit -- filed in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, by the Audubon Naturalist Society, the Maryland Native Plant Society and a family whose property is on the proposed route for the ICC -- says federal officials failed to consider reasonable alternatives to the road and the full environmental impact of the project."

WPost Calls On Maryland Officials To Clear Path For ICC. A Washington Post (12/21, A28, 690K) editorial titled, "Build It," blasts the Montgomery County Planning Board for blocking the purchase of land needed for the ICC, writing, "Maybe the board members are also awaiting a bolt of lightning or some other heavenly sign before they give the go-ahead for the road. … While they wait, they might consider that the connector has been on the drawing board since the 1950s; that it has been the subject of exhaustive efforts to mitigate possible environmental impacts; that the state and federal governments have given it the green light; that financing is in place; and that the 87 acres in dispute have been purchased, preserved and set aside for the roadway over the course of three decades. … Environmentalists filed lawsuits yesterday; that is their right. In the meantime, the planning board should stop its posturing, sell the parcels and get out of the way."

DOJ_NMG_0107959

Global Warming Trading Program Comes Under Fire. The New York Times (12/21, A1, Bradsher, 1.16M) reports, "Foreign businesses have embraced an obscure United Nations-backed program as a favored approach to limiting global warming. But the early efforts have revealed some hidden problems. Under the program, businesses in wealthier nations of Europe and in Japan help pay to reduce pollution in poorer ones as a way of staying within government limits for emitting climate-changing gases like carbon dioxide." Among their targets is a chemical factory in China that contributes "as much to global warming each year as the emissions from a million American cars ... . Cleaning up this factory will require an incinerator that costs $5 million — far less than the cost of cleaning up so many cars, or other sources of pollution in Europe and Japan. Yet the foreign companies will pay roughly $500 million for the incinerator." The "high price is set in a European-based market in carbon dioxide emissions." The "huge profits from that will be divided by the chemical factory's owners, a Chinese government energy fund, and...consultants and bankers." The Times adds, "Such efforts are being watched in the United States as an alternative more politically attractive than imposing taxes on fossil fuels." But "critics of the fast-growing program...complain that it mostly enriches a few bankers, consultants and factory owners." Canada announced in October that it "would withdraw from the trading program."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Gonzales To Decide Whether Alleged Drug Trafficking Kingpin Faces Death Penalty. The Washington Times (12/21, Seper, 88K) reports, "An earlier indictment that sought his extradition in 2003 did not include the charges that could lead to his execution and is expected to be dismissed as moot." DEA spokesman Rusty Payne "said a decision whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date. Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has described Arellano-Felix, 37, as 'one of the world's major drug traffickers,' citing his role as a leader of a brutal international drug gang that includes seven brothers and four sisters. Mr. McNulty said the Arellano-Felix organization negotiated directly with Colombian cocaine-trafficking organizations, including the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia for the purchase of multiton shipments of cocaine, received those shipments by sea and air in Mexico, and then arranged for smuggling the cocaine into the U.S."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (12/20, 5:00 a.m.) also reported in its broadcast that Gonzales "will make the final decision on the death penalty." XETV-TV San Diego, CA (12/20, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The US Attorney's Office offered no comment on the case," but if "one or both defendants are convicted," Gonzales will "decide whether to seek the death penalty." Meanwhile, Telemundo (12/20, 5:30 p.m.) broadcasted in a Spanish-language story that "fearing the US Justice Department," Arellano Felix's defense attorney contends Arellano-Felix was not under arrest in "international water," as US officials say, but in Mexican territorial waters. This would mean that he "must" be tried in Mexico where "there is no death penalty." Telemundo notes that Gonzales will "decide in the next days" whether the charges should be in Mexico or "if there should be a death penalty." The Spanish-language KWHY-TV Noticias, Los Angeles (12/20, 10:00 p.m.) also noted, "Gonzales has the final decision Arellano Felix's luck."

Arellano Felix, Villarreal Heredia Plead Not Guilty To US Charges. The AP (12/21, Hoffman) reports, "A man suspected of overseeing one of Mexico's most violent drug cartels and his top associate pleaded not guilty Wednesday to new charges detailing a criminal enterprise that included a hit on Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three officers. The new charges could make Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, and his right-hand man Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, eligible for the death penalty if they are found guilty of crimes outlined in a seven-count indictment unsealed this week." The AP notes, "According to the filing, the pair directed the smuggling of cocaine and marijuana shipments from Mexico into the U.S. and oversaw 'enforcement operations' - threats and murders designed to reinforce the power of the cartel. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy said the Mexican government had agreed to allow the U.S. to complete its prosecution of the pair before pursuing extradition requests. She said the criminal enterprise operated on both sides of the border and merited prosecution in U.S. courts."

Web Site Seen As Risk To Undercover Agents, Informants. On its Web site, KHOU-TV Houston (12/21) reports on the "Who's a Rat" Web site, noting, "Search for the term 'Houston', and more than 200 profiles pop up with names and sometimes pictures of officers said to be working at agencies all over the area: state and local police, sheriff's deputies, and even the FBI and DEA. Still civil libertarians defend the site's right to exist. … The site may not have caused damage yet, but law enforcement officials said you don't have to look far to see the potential risk." The site "has gotten the attention of the Judicial Conference and that group sent an official memo last month to all federal judges, alerting them and asking that certain documents be sealed to protect the identities of informants and agents."

DOJ_NMG_0107960

California Marijuana Dispensary Defies Order To Close. On its Web site, KESQ-TV Palm Desert, CA (12/21) reports CannaHelp "continues to do business, even after the city revoked their business license. … Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin won't discuss what possible action may be taken against CannaHelp, after the medicinal marijuana dispensary defied the city's cease and desist order to operate. … Feds and local police recently raided CannaHelp, suspecting it sold marijuana for profit. We spoke with [the owner] after the raid. He said he was, indeed, drawing a salary from CannaHelp sales." The Desert Sun (12/20) noted that owner Stacy Hochanadel "justified his decision to keep the dispensary open because, he said, the City Council should have held a public hearing before voting to revoke his business license last Thursday. The vote was taken in a closed session, based on a report stating that Hochanadel sold medical marijuana to an undercover police agent who did not have appropriate paperwork."

Trove Of FBI Documents More Than Twenty-Five Years Old About To Be Declassified. The New York Times (12/21, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "At midnight on Dec. 31, hundreds of millions of pages of secret documents will be instantly declassified, including many F.B.I. cold war files on investigations of people suspected of being Communist sympathizers. After years of extensions sought by federal agencies behaving like college students facing a term paper, the end of 2006 means the government's first automatic declassification of records. Secret documents 25 years old or older will lose their classified status without so much as the stroke of a pen, unless agencies have sought exemptions on the ground that the material remains secret. Historians say the deadline, created in the Clinton administration but enforced, to the surprise of some scholars, by the secrecy-prone Bush administration, has had huge effects on public access, despite the large numbers of intelligence documents that have been exempted." The Times notes, "Several hundred million pages will be declassified at midnight on Dec. 31, including 270 million pages at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has lagged most agencies . J. William Leonard, who oversees declassification as head of the Information Security Oversight Office at the National Archives, said the threat that files might be made public without a security review had sent a useful chill through the bureaucracy." The F.B.I. "negotiated an exemption from the 1995 executive order and concluded last year that the 2003 executive order ended its special status. It has rushed to review material, seeking exemption for 50 million pages on intelligence, counterintelligence and terrorism, but leaving 270 million pages to be automatically declassified now. Among those files, said David M. Hardy, the bureau declassification chief, are those on investigations of Americans with suspected ties to the Communist Party. Reviewers will keep working on the exempt material to see what can be released, but it is a slow process, Mr. Hardy said. … The bureau is studying digitizing documents and using computers to search for classified material."

FBI Investigation Targets Firms Tied To New York Senate Leader. The New York Times (12/21, McIntire, 1.16M) reports, "Federal investigators have issued subpoenas to at least two firms linked to the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, as part of their investigation into his business dealings, one of Mr. Bruno's former business partners and a legislative aide said yesterday. One of the companies was a partnership involving Mr. Bruno and an influential Albany lobbyist that bought and sold lakeside property in Rensselaer County, including a parcel that was purchased by the wife of Jared E. Abbruzzese. Mr. Abbruzzese is an investor in a group seeking control of the state's thoroughbred racing franchise — a decision in which Mr. Bruno will play a key role. The other company is a consulting firm that Mr. Bruno operated out of his home that he said had 'a client relationship with lawyers and businesspeople.' … The two companies that received subpoenas are just a small part of Mr. Bruno's broad array of personal financial interests, several of which have intersected with his activities as the most powerful Republican in the State Legislature. Mr. Bruno has purchased stock in about a half-dozen companies whose principals obtained state aid or contracts, sometimes with his help, according to a review of his financial-disclosure reports and other public records. He also once co-owned a small apartment building with an Albany-area businessman, who said that Mr. Bruno asked him to step in and replace the senator's son as an investment partner." The Long Island Newsday (12/21, Cockfield, Gonzales, 414K) reports, "An FBI investigation of Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno's business interests has set off alarms among Senate Republicans who fear their flagbearer has been wounded as Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer, a tenacious Democrat, prepares to take office. Members of the GOP held out hope Wednesday that Bruno, 77, can withstand the scrutiny of a federal inquiry, but those sentiments were clouded by apprehension, especially at a time when Democratic state Comptroller Alan Hevesi may be hours from indictment."

The New York Daily News (12/21, Mahoney, Siemaszko, 729K) reports, "The FBI's corruption probe of

DOJ_NMG_0107961

New York's most powerful Republican gathered steam. … The grand jury has authorized FBI subpoenas related to Bruno's dealings with Albany-area businessman Jared (Jerry) Abbruzzese, a principal of a Troy, N.Y., high-tech company to which Bruno steered $500,000 in pork-barrel grants over the past four years, sources said. One specific subpoena was issued to a big-time Albany lobbyist, who confirmed the FBI rousted him for records on a land deal he and his pal Bruno were involved in until last year. 'Someone from the FBI dropped' by with a subpoena and asked for the records,' the lobbyist, James Featherstonhaugh, said. 'They were provided.'" capitalnews9.com (12/21, Ference), the New York Sun (12/21, Gershman) and the Buffalo News (12/20, Precious) are among other media outlets with articles covering the Bruno investigation.

Congressman Seeks FBI Help In Search For Missing Persons In Mexico. KENS 5 Eyewitness News San Antonio (12/20, Lopez) reported, "Families of eight people who disappeared in Nuevo Laredo traveled there Wednesday to meet with U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar. They hope he can push for more help to find their loved ones who vanished once they crossed the border. In some cases years have gone by with the Mexican authorities doing nothing, families said. … 'I have hope. And I hope that President Calderon will continue to do what he's done,' Cuellar said. Mexico's new president is revamping his law enforcement agencies, but that's not enough. Desperation pushed these families to come up with hopeful solutions. The congressman wants to publicize the faces of missing Americans in Mexico. 'We also want to set up a toll-free number where people of Nuevo Laredo can call law enforcement here,' Cuellar said. In addition, Cuellar hopes to meet with Calderon and provide the FBI with additional resources to solve kidnapping cases and possibly fund a forensics lab in Nuevo Laredo to help identify bodies."

Tennessee Waltz Target Reportedly Accepted $40,000 Watch From Developer. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/21, Perrusquia, 163K) reports, "Just when it seemed John Ford's legal troubles couldn't get worse, enter a $40,000 wristwatch of questionable origin. Federal prosecutors alleged Wednesday that Ford received the watch -- a diamond-studded Rolex Masterpiece -- in 2004 from prominent Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman. Ford once asserted he got the watch free of charge after using his influence to try to reduce state pollution fines levied against Hyneman, prosecutors said. Neither Hyneman nor Ford has been charged in connection with the watch transaction, yet prosecutors plan to use it as evidence that Ford, who faces separate corruption charges in Memphis and Nashville, had a practice of taking payoffs. 'Ford stated that he had received the watch because he had done Hyneman a big favor, that is, saved him 1.3 million dollars," says a 'Notice of Intervention to Introduce Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts," filed Wednesday. The notice by U.S. Atty. David Kustoff and Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza seeks to introduce the watch as evidence in Ford's bribery trial set to start Feb. 5 in Memphis." Ford "is charged in U.S. District Court in Memphis with taking $55,000 in cash bribes in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover sting. In an unrelated matter, Ford was indicted this week by a federal grand jury in Nashville on charges alleging huge kickbacks taken while he was in the General Assembly. … He resigned from the Senate in May 2005 after his Waltz indictment in Memphis."

The Milwaukee Journal Sentinel (12/21, Spivack, Bice, 255K) reports, "Maybe you forgot all about Mequon-based Doral Dental and its controversial ties to a once-powerful Tennessee politician who has a bribery indictment hanging over his head. Yeah, maybe you forgot about it, but the feds sure haven't. Federal prosecutors in Nashville, Tenn., this week unsealed a six-count indictment charging former Tennessee Sen. John Ford with wire fraud and failing to disclose more than $400,000 in payments from Doral after he helped the Wisconsin company land a lucrative state contract. The feds say Ford and two others created a consulting firm, Managed Care Services Group, in 2001 that collected $1 million from Doral after it beat out other firms vying for the three-year, $18 million contract to administer dental payments for poor Tennessee children. … In the midst of the Doral controversy, Ford and other Tennessee legislators were charged in May 2005 with bribery and threatening to shoot potential witnesses against him. The witnesses turned out to be undercover federal agents running a sting operation dubbed the Tennessee Waltz."

Three Former Students Plead Guilty To Alabama Church Arsons. The AP (12/21, Rawls) reports, "Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama. Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February." US District Judge David Proctor "told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences." The AP notes, "The three are also charged with state crimes," and "defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached."

USMS Deputy Chief Of Business Management Called "Washington's…Warren Buffett." Forbes (12/20, Crane) reported on its Web site, "Uncle Sam's got a

DOJ_NMG_0107962

thing for strip clubs. And banana plantations, horse farms and private prisons. These are just some of the businesses overseen by the federal government while their shady owners sit on trial for various crimes. Administering this colorful portfolio is Len Briskman, deputy chief of business management for the U.S. Marshals Service. Call him Washington's own Warren Buffett. At any given time, Briskman presides over 30 businesses -- many of them profitable and each with $20 million to $400 million in assets -- while their owners get a fair trial, which could take up to seven years. Meanwhile, all of those honest employees get to keep working." Forbes added, "How much do Briskman's efforts pull in? 'Conservatively, [the government] makes a couple hundred million a year, at least'" from selling those businesses (net of losses), he says. That's a pretty snazzy return for a relatively minuscule initial investment." Forbes noted, "With the number of forfeited businesses growing in recent years, Eben Morales, deputy chief in charge of the Asset Forfeiture Program, wishes he could find 'carbon copies' of Briskman to help distribute the workload."

US Marshals Arrest New Hampshire Bank Robbery Suspect In Florida. The AP (12/20) reported, "A suspected bank robber from Manchester has been captured in Florida, according to the U.S. Marshals Service. The federal marshals said Richard Villar, 33, was arrested and charged with the armed robbery of a St. Mary's Bank in Hudson on April 18. His alleged accomplices, Joshua Gagnon, 21, of Nashua, and Debra Scott, 28, formerly of Manchester, were arrested in May by Hudson police, but Villar reportedly fled the state and was using an alias. Federal marshals said they traced him to the St. Petersburg area where he had family and friends."

Ohio Police, US Marshals Arrest Alleged Child Rapist. WEWS-TV Cleveland (12/20) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "A rape suspect is in jail after being arrested by the Akron police gang unit and U.S. Marshals. Ryan Lawson, 19, was arrested on warrants for rape and gross sexual imposition involving a 12-year-old girl." Lawson allegedly "raped the girl sometime between February and March."

USMS Arrests Tennessee Statutory Rape Fugitives In Louisiana. The AP (12/21) reports, "Two men wanted in Jackson, Tennessee, on charges of statutory rape have been arrested in New Orleans. Twenty-three-year-old William Paulus and 22-year-old Santo Camarillo were arrested while working construction jobs. That's according to the US Marshals Service." The AP notes, "The men were arrested…on federal charges they used cell phones to entice minors to engage in sexual acts. The two were wanted in Tennessee after they failed to appear in court on eight counts of statutory rape.

IMMIGRATION:

Disabled Immigrants Sue Federal Agencies Over Loss Of Benefits. The Washington Post (12/21, A3, Fears, 690K) reports, "For eight years, Shmul Kaplan lived alone in a suburban Philadelphia housing complex with hardly any furniture and barely enough food to eat." Then "Kaplan, who is from Ukraine, lost his $603 in Supplemental Security Income after he missed a seven-year deadline to become a U.S. citizen. The clock started ticking after he was granted asylum in 1997. A class-action lawsuit filed in federal court in Pennsylvania recently on behalf of people such as Kaplan, 80, contends that they are not responsible for missing the deadline. Kaplan's citizenship application is among hundreds of thousands awaiting background checks by the FBI, a mountainous backlog that grew after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. More than 6,000 physically handicapped people who were granted asylum have had benefits cut as they wait, according to the suit." The Post notes, "The suit was filed against top officials of the Social Security Administration, the Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) unit of DHS, the Justice Department and the FBI. The National Name Check Program at the FBI receives more than 67,000 requests for background checks each week. Half the requests come from the USCIS, said Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman. When requests from private entities are included, the total reaches several million each year, Bresson said. … The FBI has struggled for years with a growing backlog of such requests from all entities. The Government Accountability Office reported earlier this year that, for immigration cases alone, 113,000 background checks had been pending for more than six months. USCIS spokeswoman Chris Rhatigan said her agency processes citizenship applications as quickly as it can and is not responsible for the backlog that results from the delay in background checks."

US-Mexico Border Separates Many Families. The New York Times (12/21, Navarro, 1.16M) profiles Irma of Mexico, a onetime illegal resident of the US whose two daughters married and now live in Texas. Her "youngest daughter, Lupita, and another daughter, who is married and has three children, now live together just a few blocks from her. But the other two are still in Texas, still illegally, now with one American-born child each. The border is now a barrier between the Mexican and American sides of her family, and now Irma feels the pull of her absent daughters."

DOJ_NMG_0107963

NYTimes Praises Bush On Immigration. The New York Times (12/21, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "Every now and then the public gets a glimpse of the George W. Bush who is a calm realist on immigration, a former governor of a border state who knows, likes and understands Latino immigrants. It's an identity sharply at odds with that of many other members of his Republican Party, especially the snarlers clustered on its right wing." Bush has "shown a way to move the debate away from the 'amnesty' trap by casting reform as a means to end an abusive system and remove the perverse incentives that allow illegality to flourish."

TAX:

Judge Rejects Defense Request For Separate KPMG Trials. The New York Times (12/21, Browning, 1.16M) reports, "The federal judge overseeing a mammoth tax shelter case said yesterday that the delayed trial would begin next fall, but he rejected a proposal by prosecutors to try the defendants separately in two groups." US District Judge Lewis A. Kaplan "ordered jury selection to begin on Sept. 17, 2007, in the criminal trial of the 18 defendants, 16 of whom are former employees of the accounting firm KPMG. The judge also said that he had tentatively decided not to have separate trials." The Times notes, "The trial date could still be changed again, because of uncertainty over the issue of legal fees. A federal appeals panel is weighing whether Judge Kaplan had the authority last June to dismiss KPMG's motion to compel the defendants to submit to arbitration over the fees issue. A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is hearing KPMG's appeal of the judge's ruling."

Syracuse University Study Finds Fewer IRS Audits Of Large Companies. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, C3, Drucker, 2.04M) reports on a study by researchers at Syracuse University that found that "the Internal Revenue Service audited a smaller proportion of the nation's largest corporations this year than it did in 2005 and, over the past five years, it has cut the average number of hours spent on such audits." … IRS officials said part of the reason for the overall drop in audits of big corporations was that the agency hired hundreds of new auditors in 2006 who required training. The officials cited the decline in hours per audit as a sign of greater efficiency."

South Dakota Accounting Firm Implicated In Chicago Tax Fraud Case. The Yankton (SD) Daily Press (12/21, Johnson, 94K) reports, "A Yankton accounting firm has been implicated in a health care reimbursement tax fraud plan that was recently shut down by a Chicago federal court. According to a press release issued by the Tax Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, the firm of Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. LLC of Yankton helped businesses in Illinois and Indiana sell 'illegal or improper' health care reimbursement plans that the Internal Revenue Service estimates cost the U.S. Treasury between $12 and $63 million. The district court in Illinois issued a permanent injunction Dec. 5, ordering Carmelo Zanfei of Steger, Ill., and William Crouse of Greenwood, Ind., and any individuals or entities working in association with them, to no longer sell their Health Incentive Plan and HealthIER Plan." The Daily Press notes, "Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Department of Justice, said the organization would not comment on whether there is a criminal investigation into the case. However, a lawyer representing Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. said he has been assured by the Department of Justice that there will be no criminal investigation into his client's involvement."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Enforce Clinton Declassification Order. The New York Times (12/21, A1, Shane, 1.16M) reports, "It will be a Cinderella moment for the band of researchers who study the hidden history of American government. At midnight on Dec. 31, hundreds of millions of pages of secret documents will be instantly declassified, including many FBI cold war files on investigations of people suspected of being Communist sympathizers. After years of extensions sought by federal agencies behaving like college students facing a term paper, the end of 2006 means the government's first automatic declassification of records." The Times adds, "Secret documents 25 years old or older will lose their classified status without so much as the stroke of a pen, unless agencies have sought exemptions on the ground that the material remains secret. Historians say the deadline, created in the Clinton administration but enforced, to the surprise of some scholars, by the secrecy-prone Bush administration, has had huge effects on public access, despite the large numbers of intelligence documents that have been exempted. … Many historians had expected President Bush to scrap the deadline."

IG Report Gives New Details On Berger's Removal Of Classified Documents. The AP (12/21, Margasak) reports Sandy Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser, "removed classified documents from the National Archives, hid them under a construction trailer and later tried to find the trash collector to retrieve them, the agency's internal watchdog said Wednesday." Berger, who "pleaded guilty to unlawfully removing and retaining classified documents," took them "in the fall of 2003 while working to prepare himself and Clinton administration witnesses for testimony to the Sept. 11 commission." Later, when Berger "was confronted by Archives officials about the missing documents, he lied by saying he did not take them, the report said."

DOJ_NMG_0107964

The New York Times (12/21, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports, "Still unresolved in the inspector general's report is one lingering mystery in the episode: Whether, as Mr. Berger's critics have charged, he was so cavalier as to stuff classified documents in his socks." The report "said one witness at the archives saw Mr. Berger bending down and 'fiddling with something white, which could have been paper, around his ankle.' But Mr. Berger denied he had ever stuffed documents in his socks, explaining the episode by saying that 'his shoes frequently come untied and his socks frequently fall down.'"

The Washington Post (12/21, A7, Smith, 690K) reports the documents Berger "took detailed how the Clinton administration had responded to the threat of terrorist attacks at the end of 1999. Berger removed a total of five copies of the same document without authorization and later used scissors to destroy three before placing them in his office trash, the National Archives inspector general concluded in a Nov. 4, 2005, report." The fact "that Berger, one of President Bill Clinton's closest aides from 1997 to 2001, illicitly removed the documents is well-known: A federal judge in September 2005 ordered him to pay a $50,000 fine for his actions and forfeit his security clearance for three years." But what Berger "did, and the ham-handed and comical methods by which he did it, are freshly detailed in the National Archives report." The report "states that in 2003, an official whose name was deleted informed the White House that the documents Berger reviewed during his first two visits -- in May and June of that year -- were so poorly organized and tracked that the archives 'would never know what if any original documents were missing.'"

The Washington Times (12/21, Seper, 88K) reports, Berger, "fined $50,000 for taking classified documents from the National Archives, hid the papers under a construction trailer where they later could easily be retrieved, a report yesterday said." In his "televised testimony to the September 11 commission, Mr. Berger said the Clinton administration's 'sustained attention' to terrorist threats and 'rigorous actions' had foiled a terrorist threat in December 1999 to bomb airports in the United States. But Attorney General John Ashcroft told the commission that he saw some of the documents that had turned up missing from the Archives and that the plot was stopped with 'luck playing a major role.'"

Bush Links Minimum Wage Hike To Small Business Tax Relief. The AP (12/21, Loven) reports President Bush "endorsed one of the Democrats' top priorities for the new Congress, a $2.10-an-hour minimum wage increase — and on a faster timetable than they have proposed," but "his support comes with a catch." Bush said "at a Wednesday news conference that any pay hike should be accompanied by tax and regulatory relief for small businesses, potentially a tough sell for Democrats, who are about to reassume control of the House and Senate." At his news conference, Bush was "eager to show he heard the message of voters who stripped his party of majorities in both the House and Senate in the November elections" and said "he'll work hard on what he called 'an interesting new challenge' — trying to find common ground with Democrats who will lead Congress for the first time in his presidency."

The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Reynolds, 850K) reports, "Efforts to link a hike in the minimum wage to tax cuts have repeatedly failed during Bush's time in office, despite Republican control of Congress." Democrats have "objected to linking the wage increase to tax cuts, and Drew Hammill, a spokesman for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), said she was not interested in such an arrangement. But shortly afterward, Hammill altered his response. He said that Pelosi preferred a bill unencumbered by tax cuts but that 'House Democrats have long supported tax changes that would benefit small business' and would look at such proposals." Still, there is "strong opposition to the idea among Democrats."

The Wall Street Journal (12/21, McKinnon, 2.04M) reports Bush's "insistence on tax breaks and regulatory relief for small business sets up a test that could determine the tenor of relations between the White House and Congress's new leaders for the rest of his term." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "and House Democrats plan to pass an increase in the minimum wage in their first 100 hours of work next year. Other priorities include repealing tax breaks for big oil companies, allowing Medicare to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices and cutting interest rates on student loans." Democrats hope "to build enough momentum to move the provisions through the Senate and force Mr. Bush to accept them as they are." But it is "unlikely any of those measures will become law without concessions to Republicans, however."

The Washington Post (12/21, A14, Fletcher, Weisman, 690K) reports President Bush "for the first time endorsed a specific plan for raising the federal minimum wage yesterday, as he embraced Democratic calls to boost it by $2.10, to $7.25 an hour, over two years." The president's "endorsement of a minimum wage increase breaks with the position long held by conservative Republicans that the increase would hurt business and ultimately the economy. But with the Democrats poised to take control of both chambers of Congress for the first time in more than a decade, Bush cited his support of the proposed increase as proof of his intent to operate in a more bipartisan manner during the remaining two years of his presidency." Beyond

DOJ_NMG_0107965

"increasing the minimum wage, the president said that he hopes to reach agreements with the new Congress on a guest-worker program for low-skill immigrants, renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law and measures aimed at encouraging the development of alternative fuels."

The Washington Times (12/21, Dinan, 88K) reports Bush "highlighted the new dynamic at work on Capitol Hill, saying now he and the Democrats both have an interest in getting things done – 'to show that they're worthy of their leadership roles.' The president said he is willing to accept a deal with Democrats that raises the minimum wage to $7.25 as long as that doesn't hurt businesses. He said the way to protect businesses is to combine the increase 'with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing.'" Senate and House Republican leaders "lined up behind Mr. Bush's position yesterday, with incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, saying pairing tax cuts and wage increases makes sense."

Bush Signs Omnibus Tax Break, Trade Bill. The AP (12/21) reports President Bush "revived some 20 tax breaks, extended trade benefits for developing countries and protected doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments by signing sweeping tax and trade legislation Wednesday." The bill "is a patchwork of must-do items that were left for the lame duck Congress. It was bundled together and passed by the House and Senate just before adjourning earlier this month." Republican "budget hawks bridled at the measure's approximately $40 billion price tag, and textile state senators objected to trade provisions benefiting Haiti."

The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Hamburger, Roche, 850K) reports the bill "was a lavish hodgepodge that included a $100 million-a-year boost in the Medicare reimbursement rates for dialysis providers who proved to be generous contributors to important legislators, notably House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of Bakersfield." The dialysis folks "were among many special interests benefiting from a piece of legislation that was designed to simply extend existing tax cuts and credits — but ended up freighted with billions of dollars in new spending earmarks for the coal industry, Brooks Brothers and various other interests."

Bush Signs Postal Service Overhaul Measure. The Washington Post's (12/21, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports on the 12-year effort by Rep. John M. McHugh (R-NY) to pass legislation overhauling the US Postal Service. "McHugh has worked to balance the competing interests of postal management, postal competitors, unions and companies," that "rely on the post office," and "yesterday, he" saw "President Bush sign the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act," which "offers some hope that subsequent increases in postage will be more predictable, especially for letters, magazines and advertising mail." The "public, for the most part, will see no change in its dealings with the post office. But stamp prices will probably go up once or twice in the next year. The Postal Service has a request pending to raise first-class postage by 3 cents, to 42 cents, probably in May. Under the new law, the Postal Service can seek one more increase, no later than Dec. 20 next year, before new rules take effect."

Bush Signs Bill To Fund Clean Up Of Abandoned Coal Mines. The AP (12/21, Hefling) reports President Bush "signed legislation Wednesday that gives billions of dollars to coal-producing states to clean up hazardous abandoned coal mines and pay for health care for retired miners." The signing "ends a long fight that has pitted coal-producing states against each other over the best use of funds collected for the nation's coal mine reclamation program." Coal-producing states "will get an estimated $6.3 billion for abandoned mine cleanup and another $1.6 billion to pay for health care for retired miners who worked for coal companies that no longer exist, according to the federal Office of Surface Mining. The money will be distributed from 2007 to 2025."

Democrats Plan Stepped-Up Investigations. The Christian Science Monitor (12/21, Chaddock, 59K) reports that with "little prospect of funding bold spending initiatives, Democrats poised to take control of the 110th Congress are reviving the ability to investigate the executive branch." Democratic leaders "and new committee chairs aim to jump-start oversight on issues ranging from the Iraq war to homeland security and consumer protection," but they "say they will not use their new powers to conduct a witch hunt on the Bush presidency, and will take a more careful tack instead." But plans for a five-day work week "and the eagerness of new committee chairs - also poses dilemmas for the new Democratic leadership over how to aggressively question administration officials, without distracting them from their work fighting wars and securing the homeland."

Goode Under Fire For Criticizing Muslim Congressman's Use Of Koran For Oath. The AP (12/21, Frommer) reports that in response "to constituent e-mails about Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing-in," Rep. Virgil Goode "warned that 'many more Muslims' will be elected demanding to use the Quran unless immigration is tightened." The letter "triggered angry responses from a New Jersey congressman and an Islamic civil rights group."

The Washington Post (12/21, A11, Goldfarb, 690K) reports Goode "is coming under sharp criticism for lashing out against the decision by" Ellison "to use the Koran during a swearing-in ceremony." In a "recent letter to constituents, Goode, a five-term congressman from Rocky Mount, wrote that he does 'not subscribe to using the Koran in any way' and added: 'The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration, there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran.'" The Post adds the Council on American-Islamic Relations "condemned Goode's remarks and called on him to apologize."

DOJ_NMG_0107966

The New York Times (12/21, Swarns, 1.16M) reports Ellison's "plan to use the Koran during his private swearing-in ceremony in January had outraged some Virginia voters, prompting Mr. Goode to issue a written response to them, a spokesman for Mr. Goode said." Goode's letter "quickly stirred a furor among some Congressional Democrats and Muslim Americans, who accused him of bigotry and intolerance. They noted that the Constitution specifically bars any religious screening of members of Congress and that the actual swearing in of those lawmakers occurs without any religious texts." Ellison "dismissed Mr. Goode's comments, saying they seemed ill informed about his personal origins as well as about Constitutional protections of religious freedom."

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (12/21, Hotakainen, 395K) reports "a Muslim group is asking" Goode "to apologize after he told hundreds of his constituents that more Muslims will follow" Ellison to Congress "if strict immigration laws are not passed." Goode, "an attorney and former state senator who was first elected to Congress in 1996, said he wants to 'stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country." Corey Saylor, "national legislative director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), said Goode's 'Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office.'"

The Richmond Times-Dispatch (12/21, Bowman) reports, "After one of Goode's letters miscarried, its contents were plastered online across the blogosphere." Mukit Hossain, "president of the Potomac Falls-based Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, which estimates there are 60,000 Muslim voters in Virginia," said, "It's about as stupid a comment as I've ever heard from a legislator. We will do everything we can to keep this issue alive. I think we can educate the people in his district that he is not the right candidate."

CNN.com (12/21) reports Goode "will not apologize for writing that without immigration reform 'there will be many more Muslims elected to office demanding the use of the Quran,' his spokesman said."

Democrats Challenge Loss In Florida's 13th CD. The AP (12/21, Royse) reports Democrat Christine Jennings, "who narrowly lost to a Republican in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris, asked Congress on Wednesday for an investigation." Florida has "declared that" Jennings "lost to Republican Vern Buchanan by 369 votes. But 18,000 Sarasota County electronic ballots did not record a choice in the race, and Jennings contends that the number is abnormally high and that the machines lost the votes. She filed with the House clerk an official contest of the election results in Florida's 13th Congressional District."

Shift To Right On Social Issues Said To Raise Questions About Romney. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (12/21, A1, Balz, Murray, 690K) reports, "As he prepares for a 2008 presidential campaign, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) has championed the conservative principles that guided President Ronald Reagan, become an outspoken opponent of same-sex marriage and supported overturning the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion." But in 1994, "Romney boasted that he would be more effective in fighting discrimination against gay men and lesbians than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), distanced himself from some conservative policies of the Reagan administration, and proudly recalled his family's record in support of abortion rights. The apparent gulf between the candidate who ran for the Senate in 1994 and the one getting ready to run for president has raised questions as to who is the real Mitt Romney." In emphasizing "his conservative views, Romney has sought to fill a vacuum on the right in the Republican nomination contest. Neither Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) nor former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who top the opinion polls among Republicans, has a comfortable relationship with social and cultural conservatives." Romney "acknowledges his positions on abortion and gay rights have changed. He told National Review Online last week that he would like to see the Supreme Court overturn the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision and return the issue to the states. He also said he no longer favors a federal non-discrimination law that would cover gay men and lesbians, and no longer backs accelerating the opening up of the military to gay men and lesbians."

Law Professor Defends Judicial Ethics Act Of 2006. Ronald D. Rotunda, professor of law at George Mason University, writes in the Washington Post (12/21, A29, 690K), "The Judicial Transparency and Ethics Enhancement Act of 2006, now before Congress, would create an inspector general for the courts. It offers modest reforms that would keep our judiciary independent (because no one favors a dependent judiciary) and help keep it accountable (because no one favors a judiciary that is above the law)." Nonetheless, "there are those who greet it the way Dracula would greet a bouquet of garlic. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, for example, has said of the proposal: 'That's a really scary idea.'" Rotunda adds, "On the contrary, this bill would strengthen judicial independence because it would give people greater faith that if there were problems, the inspector general for the courts would deal with them and not sweep them under the rug. An inspector general would also protect judges from frivolous or false charges. … Opponents of this bill say that the sky is falling. But it is not falling. There are no cracks in the sky. There are not even pre-fracture incipient fissures in the sky. Instead there is a real need for change."

DOJ_NMG_0107967

Personnel News. Judy Sarasohn reports in his "Special Interests" column in the Washington Post (12/21, A27, 690K), "Dave McCurdy, a Democratic survivor of the Republican K Street Project, is moving from the Electronic Industries Alliance to become president of the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers. … Raymond Shepherd III, chief counsel of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is moving to Venable next month to be head of the law firm's new congressional investigation group. … Jonathon Jones, a longtime aide to Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), most recently as chief of staff, joined the lobby shop Monday. … Howard Waltzman, chief counsel for the House Energy and Commerce Committee, is leaving the Hill for Mayer, Brown, Rowe &; Maw as a partner in the law firm. Scott Gottlieb, deputy commissioner for medical and scientific affairs at the Food and Drug Administration, is leaving Jan. 16 to rejoin the American Enterprise Institute."

OTHER NEWS:

Chavez Claims US Envoy Lied About Drug Trafficking. The AP (12/20) reported the U.S. ambassador's "suggestion that better ties were possible with Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez met a blunt reply on Wednesday when Chavez accused the ambassador of lying about drug trafficking. The lack of counter-drug cooperation between Venezuela and the United States has been one of many diplomatic sticking points between the two countries -- one that has worsened as Chavez has accused American anti-drug agents of involvement in espionage." Venezuelan officials "said they are fighting the drug war with increasing success, claiming that since Chavez broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration last year, the amount of illegal drugs seized has doubled." Ambassador William Brownfield "has urged Venezuela to sign a new agreement with the DEA, but Chavez revived his earlier claims that officials of that agency had been involved in spying -- allegations that Washington denies." The AP writes that yesterday Chavez said, "A little while ago, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas told a big lie. He should retract it if it's really true that [U.S. officials] want good relations like they've been saying." CNN and FOX News have used the AP story.

Bush Rejects Talks With Syria, Iran. McClatchy (12/21, Douglas, Strobel) reports, "President Bush on Wednesday voiced his strongest opposition yet to talking directly to Iran and Syria as other administration officials acknowledged secret US funding of opponents to Syria's regime. At a year-end White House news conference, the president insisted that he won't deal with Iran until it verifiably abandons its uranium enrichment program and won't talk with Syria until it stops interfering in Lebanon and Iraq." Both stands "are rejections of a key recommendation made earlier this month by the Iraq Study Group."

Kerry, Dodd Meet With Assad Despite White House Objections. The AP (12/21, Aji) reports Senators John Kerry and Christopher Dodd met with Syrian President Bashar Assad Wednesday to discuss "the need for Damascus to cooperate with efforts to maintain the unity and stability of war-ravaged Iraq," state media reported. The US Embassy in Damascus said the meeting, which lasted two and a half hours, covered "a full-range of topics relating to US-Syrian relations and regional issues." In a telephone interview with the AP, Kerry said, "I feel quite confident in saying this was a conversation worth having and that the (Bush) administration ought to pursue it." Meanwhile, the Bush administration "has accused Kerry, Dodd and other senators who have met with Assad of sending mixed signals." White House spokesman Blair Jones said Wednesday night, "We discourage the travel of members of Congress to Syria because we believe it undermines the cause of democracy in the region and particularly" Lebanon's government.

The Boston Globe (12/21, Klein, 413K) reports Kerry "said Wednesday that President Bashar Assad of Syria expressed a willingness to work with the United States to bring stability to Iraq, and said Assad personally offered assistance that Kerry plans to convey to the Bush administration." Kerry "said the Assad government is interested in approaching the Iraq war from a regional perspective, where other Middle East issues -- including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- are part of the equation." The Massachusetts Democrat "said he would not publicly discuss the substance of his talks with Assad until he has fully briefed State Department officials about his visit."

US, UK To Move Forces To Persian Gulf In "Display Of Military Resolve Toward Iran." The New York Times (12/21, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "The United States and Britain will begin moving additional warships and strike aircraft into the Persian Gulf region in a display of military resolve toward Iran that will come as the United Nations continues to debate possible sanctions against the country, Pentagon and military officials said Wednesday." The officials "said that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was expected this week to approve a request by commanders for a second aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran by early next year." The Times adds, "Senior American officers said the increase in naval power should not be viewed as preparations for any offensive strike against Iran. But they acknowledged that the ability to hit Iran would be increased and that Iranian leaders might well call the growing presence provocative."

DOJ_NMG_0107968

Security Council Set To Vote Friday On Iran Sanctions. AFP (12/21, Aziakou) reports "under pressure from the United States," the UNSC "edged toward a Friday vote on a compromise draft resolution mandating sanctions against Iran." After the European sponsors "offered concessions to overcome Russian objections," Britain's UN envoy Emyr Jones Parry announced a vote has been schedule for Friday. The new draft, "which watered down a contentious proposal for a travel ban" on 12 officials directly linked to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, "finessed the issue by making the travel ban voluntary." Acting Ambassador Alejandro Wolff said he was consulting with Washington over the latest changes to the draft. Asked about the travel ban, which earlier this week he described as a "priority" issue for the US side, Wolff said: "We're still negotiating this...we want a vote early and we want a really good resolution." Secretary Rice, meanwhile, spoke by telephone Wednesday with British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett to discuss "ways to close the remaining gaps" over the wording of the draft, Assistant Secretary McCormack said. The New York Times (12/21, A26, Hoge, 1.16M) calls the revisions a "major concession to Russia."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (12/21, A16, 2.04M) editorializes, "Iranians made their feelings plain about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad last week by voting to reject his allies in municipal elections and in the Assembly of Experts, a clerical body that theoretically has authority over Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei. That doesn't mean reformers now run Iran, but it does suggest that international pressure and a policy of democracy promotion may produce the kinds of changes in Iran that three years of Western diplomacy have failed to achieve." The Journal adds, "So it's all the more puzzling that, even as Iranians try to apply some pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad, the international community is about to prove his point that Iran will pay little price for its quest to develop an atomic bomb. Consider what's happening at the UN, where the Security Council is expected to approve a sanctions resolution this week, nearly four months after its August 31 'deadline' for Tehran to stop enriching uranium. … There's an opening here to promote change, provided the US doesn't reward Mr. Ahmadinejad's bad behavior by failing to punish it, and provided President Bush reminds Iranians that while the US opposes their government, it stands with Iranians who want more freedom."

Iranian Oil Minister Says "De Facto" Sanctions Hurting Projects. The Financial Times (12/21, Bozorgmehr, Khalaf) reports, "Iran's oil minister on Wednesday admitted that Tehran was having trouble financing oil projects, in a rare acknowledgment of the economic cost of its nuclear dispute. 'Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their co-operation,' Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told the oil ministry news agency, Shana." The Times adds, "The statement underlined the impact of de facto financial sanctions on the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries' second biggest oil producer. As the controversy over Iran's nuclear programme has escalated, the US has applied pressure on European banks and financial institutions to curb dealings with Tehran."

Reemerging Student Movement Seen As Threat To Ahmedinejad. The New York Times (12/21, A1, Fathi, 1.16M) reports in a front page article that the Iranian student movement is "reawakening from its recent slumber and may even be spearheading a widespread resistance against" President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. For example, last week protestors disrupted a speech by the Iranian president, representing "the first widely publicized outcry against Mr. Ahmadinejad, one that was reflected Friday in local elections, where voters turned out in droves to vote for his opponents." The students' complaints "largely mirrored public frustrations over the president's crackdown on civil liberties, his blundering economic policies and his harsh oratory against the West, which they fear will isolate the country. But the students had an additional and potent source of outrage: the president's campaign to purge the universities of all vestiges of the reform movement of his predecessor, Mohammad Khatami."

Rafsanjani Emerging As Top Challenger. The AP (12/21, Karimi) reports "elder statesman Hashemi Rafsanjani, a mercurial cleric who has played both sides of Iran's reformist-conservative divide, is rising again as a key challenger to Iran's president after local elections show deep discontent with the president's hard line." Last week's local elections across Iran were "seen as a referendum on President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's 18 months in office, and results so far were showing widespread victories for his opponents." In fact, many analysts are "now predicting a coalition between reformers and moderate conservatives to oppose Ahmadinejad and his hard-line allies in parliament and presidential elections in 2009." Talk of a political bloc was "fueled after two top reformist politicians -- former president Mohammad Khatami and Mehdi Karroubi -- met on Sunday with Rafsanjani."

DOJ_NMG_0107969

Hill "Encouraged" As Six-Party Talks Enter Fourth Day. The New York Times (12/21, A9, Kahn, 1.16M) reports Assistant Secretary Hill said Wednesday that the six-party talks "could reach a new agreement on rolling back North Korea's bomb-making effort this week, but the prospects for a meaningful breakthrough remained uncertain." Hill "said the tenor of the often tortuous discussions had improved" and "have been very useful." Negotiators "are talking about much more than just agreeing on things on paper. We're discussing actual developments on the ground, and for that reason these discussions are not easy," Hill cautioned. The envoy also "said he was pleasantly surprised that the talks had moved beyond posturing" and "raised the possibility that they could produce an agreement before the end of the current round this week."

AFP (12/21) reports talks entered a fourth day Thursday "amid a slightly warmer climate," with Hill "saying negotiations were tough but offered a glimmer of hope." Hill said late Wednesday after a second straight day of direct talks with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-Gwan, that the discussions "are not easy -- actually, they are very difficult but we are encouraged by the process." He went on to say that talks have been "very useful in the last day and a half." Meanwhile, financial teams from the two nations met on Tuesday and Wednesday in Beijing on the sidelines, "but they finished without any agreement being reached." The Treasury Department's chief negotiator, Daniel Glaser, told reporters late Wednesday "only that the two sides may meet again in New York next month." The AP (12/21, Herman) reports Glaser said the process is "moving forward to be productive and useful, it's going to have to start focusing very, very closely on the underlying concerns of illicit finance."

Hill Says Talks Give Japan, North Korea Chance To Improve Relations. The AP (12/21, Yamaguchi) reports Assistant Secretary Hill "expressed hope Wednesday that Japan and North Korea would meet on the sidelines of the six-nation negotiations to discuss normalizing their relations." However, Hill cautioned, "The normalization process depends on the discussion of ongoing issues and clearly the Japanese have some issues that need to be addressed. It's our hope that there can be a bilateral meeting between the DPRK and the Japanese aiming at these issues."

Somali Factions Agree To Resume Peace Talks. The Washington Post (12/21, A20, McCrummen, 690K) reports Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts and the country's transitional government agreed Wednesday to resume peace talks "without any preconditions, as fighting broke out between the two sides." European Union envoy, Louis Michel, said at a news conference in Nairobi that "there was a broad agreement to deescalate and refrain from hostile acts," but cautioned "there are still issues that will have to be resolved." However, as Michel "discussed peace with their leaders, Islamic Courts militias and the Ethiopian-backed transitional government fought with rockets and heavy weapons in towns just southeast and southwest of Baidoa, the town where the government is based." The Financial Times (12/21, England) says no date was given for the talks which are expected to take place in Khartoum. Meanwhile, the AP (12/21, Hassan) says Wednesday's violence "underlined the difficulties of securing peace" in the country. The Los Angeles Times (12/21, Sanders, Albadri, 850K) runs a similar report.

Saudi Arabia Names Jubeir Ambassador To US. The Washington Post (12/21, A25, Wright, 690K) reports Saudi Arabia has informed the State Department "that it intends to appoint Adel al-Jubeir as the new ambassador to Washington," according to US officials. Jubeir, a long-time foreign policy adviser to King Abdullah, has "long been the public face" of the kingdom in the West," and his "impending appointment represents a meteoric rise in Saudi diplomacy for a man who last served in Washington as special assistant to Prince Bandar bin Sultan, now the Saudi national security adviser."

Rice Says Darfur Remains "Deep Concern" To US. AFP (12/21) reports Secretary Rice said Wednesday the crisis in Darfur remains an issue of "deep concern" in Washington following a visit to Khartoum last week by a US special envoy Andrew Natsios. Rice also reiterated calls for Sudan to "drop its objections to deployment of a hybrid African-UN peacekeeping force" in the region. After meeting with Natsios, Rice said, "It is extremely important (to deploy) a robust peacekeeping force that can actually help to end the violence and bring relief to the many innocent men, women and children who are suffering in Sudan." Rice said Natsios had "moved the ball forward" during meetings with Sudanese President Omar al-Beshir and other leaders in Khartoum last week.

Natsios Warns Of Possible Action In Darfur. The AP (12/21, Gedda) reports Natsios warned Wednesday that Sudan "must open a path toward ending the Darfur crisis before the end of the year or the international community will take coercive action against the Islamic government." The envoy said "international patience is running out" on Sudan, but he declined to say what options are being considered. "It's not useful to make threats," said Natsios, briefing reporters. British officials have said that creation of a no-fly zone over Darfur is one option being considered. However, AFP (12/21, Millikin) reports Natsios issued a January 1 deadline for Sudan to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers to Darfur or "face coercive international action" to halt violence in the region. Natsios was quoted as saying,

DOJ_NMG_0107970

"For us to continue on the process of quiet diplomacy, negotiation and a process to resolve Darfur, then we need progress that's operational, on the ground, in Darfur...by the end of the year." The Washington Times (12/21, Kralev, 88K) also reports the story.

US Condemns EU Plans To Include Airlines In Emissions Trading Scheme. The Financial Times (12/21, Bounds) reports, "The US on Wednesday condemned as illegal plans to include all airlines flying to and from the European Union in the bloc's greenhouse gas trading scheme from 2012. 'The inclusion of non-EU airlines on a non-consensual basis runs counter to EU member states' legal obligations under the Chicago convention...and their bilateral air transport agreements, including with the US,' a government spokesman said." The "US called on the EU's 25 member states to block the proposal, saying that it jeopardised international efforts to tackle the effect of air travel on global warming."

The New York Times (12/21, Kanter, 1.16M) reports, "In the face of stiff opposition from the airline industry, the European Union moved forward Wednesday with plans to impose extra charges on foreign and domestic carriers that pollute too much." The rules "would apply to all flights within the bloc starting in 2011. Foreign carriers landing and taking off from busy airports like those in Frankfurt, London and Paris would be obliged to join the system the following year. If enacted, the measure could drive up costs for airlines, potentially leading to higher airfares for travelers." The Times adds, "The proposal draws from the principles of an established system that Europe now uses to help combat global warming and meet emissions goals set forth under the Kyoto Protocol. ... Many airlines, supported by the United States government, are seeking to blunt the European plans, calling them expensive and unworkable."

The AP (12/21, White) says the EU's move "would hit U.S. airlines on their lucrative trans-Atlantic routes. Airlines are generally in favor of the plan, since EU officials had warned them that refusing to back a carbon emissions trading program would result in an aviation tax." The AP adds, "Bowing to pressure from trade partners, the EU's executive arm will give all flights to and from EU airports an extra year to join the program. All airlines — based in the EU or elsewhere — will have to trade emissions beginning in 2012 for all flights to and from European airports, it said."

China Cracks Down On Investigative Reporting. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, A1, Fowler, Dean, 2.04M) reports "China's government is waging a media crackdown on…hard-hitting reports. Some officials fear that investigative reporting feeds public discontent over social ills such as rampant pollution, a growing wealth gap, and especially corruption. Prominent editors at publications around the country have lost their jobs. A law under review in China's legislature could make it much more difficult for reporters…to investigate emergencies and dig up wrongdoing in distant towns and villages.

Meanwhile, the Washington Times/AP (12/21, Kurtenbach) reports, "A journalist serving a 13-year jail term for reporting about a bogus irrigation project has been released five years early to unusually vocal official acclaim for his determination to fight corruption." Gao Qinrong, "previously an investigative journalist for a state-run newspaper in northern China's Shanxi province, was imprisoned in 1998 and released earlier this month, according to media activists and state press reports."

Wal-Mart's Acceptance Of Unions In China Noted. The Wall Street Journal (12/21, 2.04M) reports says in an editorial, "For a peek into China's labor market, look no further than Wal-Mart. In North America, the world's biggest retailer prefers to close down stores rather than tolerate unionized staff. But in China, most of Wal-Mart's 68 stores not only have labor unions, but six locations now boast Communist Party branches as well." But the "function of the new unions remains unclear," but there is "nothing to guarantee that union members won't catch onto the practices of their Western peers." Meanwhile, "sometime in the next week, Beijing's legislature is expected to hold a second reading of the Labor Contract Law. The document will redefine labor rights and the ACFTU's power. The first draft gave foreign investors a jolt. It made employee dismissals for poor performance difficult. The draft also required company policies and regulations to be negotiated between employer and 'employee representatives,' a la Germany." Many "foreign-invested firms are waiting for the passage of the legislation before deciding whether to admit the ACFTU, as Wal-Mart did. Which makes Wal-Mart's embrace of union and Party all the more puzzling. Perhaps Wal-Mart wasn't given much of a choice, and was chosen to send a message to other foreign-invested enterprises. Which is: We're watching you from outside, and inside."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. In Washington.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: 11 a.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the state of religious freedom in problem spotys around the world, especially Vietnam. Stephen M. Liston, State Department; Felice Gaer, Chair,

DOJ_NMG_0107971

U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom; Thomas F. Farr, former Director, Office of International Religious Freedom; Nina Shea, Director, Center for Religious Freedom, Freedom House; Pastor Bui Thien Hue, Pastor, Hoa Hao Church; Joseph Kung, President, The Cardinal Kung Foundation; Berhane Sium, Eastern U.S. Coordinator, The Eritrean National Salvation Front. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: DRUG USE SURVEY _ 10 a.m. The National Institute on Drug Abuse holds a press conference to announce the results of the 2006 Monitoring the Future Survey, which tracks annual drug abuse trends of 8th, 10th, and 2th grade students, including attitudes and perceived risk of specific illicit drugs. Speakers include Office of National Drug Control Policy Director John Walters, Attorney General Gonzales, NIDA Director Nora Volkow. Location: National Press Club.

VIETNAM MEMORIAL-CHRISTMAS _ 10 a.m. The Vietnam Veterans Memorial holds a Christmas tree ceremony to honor veterans and active duty personnel. Location: East Knoll of the memorial.

HOLZER-EMPLOYMENT _ 12 p.m. - 1:30 p.m. The National Economosts Clubs hosts a luncheon with Harry Holzer of Georgetown University. Topic: ``Employment During the Boom: Implications for 2007 and Beyond." Location: Chinatown Gardens Restaurant, 618 H St. NW.

LOCKERBIE MEMORIAL _ 1:30 p.m. The families of Pan Am Flight 103 victims hold a memorial service on the 18th anniversary of the crash in Lockerbie, Scotland. Participants include Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns. Location: Flight 103 Memorial Cairn, Arlington National Cemetery.

UN REFORM _ 2 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds a telephone briefing with Lee Feinstein of the council on the reform agenda for new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon. Notes: RSVP required to NYPressRSVPcfr.org. Dialin number: 800-247-5110; passcode: UN reform.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Bush Acknowledges 'Difficult Year' In Iraq."
"A Matter Of Grove Concern."
"Pakistani City Serves As A Refuge For The Taliban."
"Congress Closes With A Pork-Filled Flourish."
"State High Court To Review Same-Sex Marriage Ban."
"Does A Bug In Our Gut Make Us Fat?"

USA Today:
"Storm Snarls Holiday Travel."
"For New Orleans After Katrina, Too Many Nights Remain Silent."
"Intestinal Microbes Pack On Your Pounds."
"Reforestation Lags Amid Record Wildfires."

New York Times:
"Big Profits, And Questions, In Effort To Cut Emissions."
"U.S. To Declassify Secrets At Age 25."
"Iran President Facing Revival Of Students' Ire."
"For Divided Family, Border Is Sorrowful Barrier."
"In Cable Wars, Phone Carriers Win A Skirmish."
"U.S. And Britain To Add Ships To Persian Gulf In Signal To Iran."

Washington Post:
"Contention Increases On Troop Levels."
"Federal Subsidies Turn Farms Into Big Business."
"Felons' DNA Missing From Va. Database."
"Shiite Clerics' Rivalry Deepens In Fragile Iraq."
"Mass. Governor's Rightward Shift Raises Questions."
"Mastering A Branch Of History."

Washington Times:
"Bush Concedes U.S. Not Ready For Iraq."
"Berger Took Papers To A Hiding Place."
"Bush Prepares To Make Deals With Democrats."
"Decking The Salesmen Instead Of The Halls?"
"Retailers Get Personal With Blogs From Inside."

Detroit Free Press:
"Classic Seger."
"In Face Of Crimes, Her Will Is Unshaken."
"Gunfire Rages Even As Detroit Tries To Clean Up."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Leaders Back $100 Million Rights Museum."
"Bush: Difficult Choices Ahead."
"Big Belly? Blame Bacteria."
"FCC Takes Slap At Rising Cable Rates."
"'I Feel About As Bad As I've Felt In My Life.'"

Houston Chronicle:
"4 Area Chemical Plants Accused In State Lawsuit."
"Bush May Not Defer To Brass On Troop Levels."
"A Timeout For Reality."
"Rice Stakes Its Future On Booming Biomedicine."
"Rita-Ravaged Town Gets A Booster Shot."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Denver-Snowstorm; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Pentagon-War Spending; Bush-Iraq; Abizaid's Retirement; Iraq-Ruling Coalition; Syria-US Embassy Attack Footage; Gettysburg Casino; China-Adoption Rules; Astronaut-Hair Donation; Ghana-Crocodile Petting Zoo.
CBS: Bush-Iraq; Iraq-Pentagon; Military Recruitment; First Lady-Iraq; Midwest Winter Weather; OR-Climber Search

DOJ_NMG_0107972

Abandoned; Missile Defense System-Alaska Weather; California Air Pollution; Wounded Vets-Skiing.
NBC: Bush-Iraq; Pentagon-Military Expansion; Troop Surge-Analysis; Abizaid's Retirement; Pentagon-War Spending; Military Recruitment; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Denver-Snowstorm; Elderly Care Managers; Immigrants-Minnesota Town; Stock Markets; Reemerging Popularity Of Toy Trains.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Denver-Snowstorm; CA-Earthquake; CA-Gay Marriage; Bush-Mary Cheney; Turkmenistan President Dies; CA-Court Case Involving Murder Of Deejay; MADD-Cutting Ties With Miss Teen USA; Wall Street.
CBS: Denver-Snowstorm; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Charges To Be Announced In Haditha Killings Case; Space Shuttle; Bush Signs Bill To Upgrade U.S. Tsunami Warning System.
NPR: Turkmenistan President Dies; Wyoming-Snowstorm; CA-Population Growth Slowing; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Wall Street; OR-Climber Search Abandoned; Sen. Leahy-Wants To Know Why Canadian Man Is Still On No-Fly List Despite Being Cleared; Space Shuttle.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, December 21, 2006 8:14 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, December 21, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061221.pdf; dojclips061221.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Key Democrat wants to know why Arar still barred from U.S. (TS) 4
US Senator Seeks Answers In Botched Canadian Terror Case: Report (AFP) 5
Pakistani Man In NY Convicted Of Financing India Militant Group (AP) 5
Risk Of Attack Rising, Officials In Europe Say (WP) 6
U.N. To Allow Appeals On Sanctions Tied To Al Qaeda, Taliban (WSJ) 7
Fix Needed (WP) 7

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Discusses Goals, Responds To Critics (NJ) 8
Acquisition Listed Among DHS Management Challenges (GovExec) 10
IG Outlines Homeland Security Department Management Challenges (FEDT) 11
How Biometric Security Is Far From Foolproof (WSJ) 11
Quest For Anthrax Vaccine Lengthens (WP) 12

War News:

President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP) 13
Bush Concedes US 'not Winning' In Iraq (FT) 18
Bush Warns Of More U.S. Losses In Iraq (AP) 19
Bush Asserts That Victory In Iraq Is Still 'Achievable' (NYT) 20
Dour Bush Talks Of 'New Way Forward' (LAT) 22
Bush Seeks To Expand Military (BSUN/CTRIB) 23
Bush Seeks To Bolster Support For Sustained Iraq Engagement (WSJ) 25
Bush Concedes U.S. Not Ready For Iraq (WT) 26
Contention Increases On Troop Numbers (WP) 27
Bush: 'Additional Sacrifices' In Iraq Required In 2007 (USAT) 28
U.S. Commanders Wary Of Gates Proposal (AP) 29
Gates Talks Over Options With U.S. Commanders In Iraq (WP) 30
Coleman Says He's Against Sending More Troops To Iraq (AP) 31
Bush's Move To Supersize US Military (CSM) 32
Enlarging Military Poses Challenge (AP) 33
Cost, Effort, Time Of Military Expansion Plan Likely To Have 'Enormous' Impact (USAT) 34
Leaned On As Never Before, Reservists Weigh Re-enlistment (MCT) 35
A Soldier's Soldier, Outflanked (WP) 37
Rudderless In Iraq (NYT) 38
Uncle Sam Needs More (LAT) 39
U.S. Cannot Accept Defeat (USAT) 40
Push To Add Troops Grows, But No One Knows What They'd Do (USAT) 41
A Military Of The Willing Works Best (WP) 42
CIA Exercise Reveals Consequences Of Defeat (WT) 43
AP: Pentagon Wants $99.7B More For Wars (AP) 44
Shiite Clerics' Rivalry Deepens In Fragile Iraq (WP) 45
In Iraq, Let's Fight One War At A Time (NYT) 48
Cleric Weighs 1-month Cease-fire In Iraq (AP) 50
Al-Qaida Hints At Power Status In Iraq (AP) 51
Al Qaeda Warns U.S. On Fighting In Muslim Lands (NYT) 52
Anonymous Slayings, Car Bombs Plague Iraqi Capital (LAT) 53
Iraqi Comedian Shot To Death In Baghdad (AP) 54
Meaty Ceremony Marks Shift Of Province Command (LAT) ..54
U.S. Transfers Control Of Najaf Province To Iraqi Security Forces (WP) 55
Home In Illinois May Lure Fugitive Former Iraqi Minister (NYT) 56
French Pulls Troops From Afghanistan (AP) 57
Pakistani City Serves As A Refuge For The Taliban (LAT) 57
Al-Qaeda's Sanctuary (WP) 59

DOJ:

New US Attorney Sworn in For Little Rock District (AP) 60
Feds laud A-C police (ABH) 60

Loss of grant money clouds future for regional drug task force (BTF) 61

Corporate Scandals:

Juniper Takes Big Charge For Tainted Options (MERCN) ... 62
IBM Ends Director Stock Options, Spotlighting Popular Perk's Decline (WSJ) 63
American Tower Will Cut Gains From Managers' Options (BLOOM) 65
Chordiant Gets Nasdaq Noncompliance Note (AP) 65
4 Former Enterasys Officials Found Guilty (AP) 66
Former Enterasys Executives Convicted In New Hampshire (IW) 66
Convicted Enterasys execs use homes for bail (MUL) 67
Prison stay delayed for ex-Homestore CEO (INMAN) 68
A Job He Couldn't Refuse (MRKTWTCH) 69
Dell Books Carty To Captain Its Finances (FOR) 70
Wall Street Raises Privacy Fears Over Election-Law Overhauls (WSJ) 71
FBR Settles With SEC Over Insider Trading Case (WP) 71
The Pump-and-Dump Economy (WSJ) 72
Hedge Fund Secrets (WSJ) 75

Criminal Law:

Death Penalty May Follow A N.Y. Verdict (NYS) 75
Refrain Of 'Guilty' Ends Trial In Murder Of 2 Detectives (NYT) 76
Guilty In Killing Of 2 Detectives (NSDY) 78
Cops' Killer Faces Needle (NYDN) 79
Anchorage Man Charged With Sex Trafficking, Drug Counts (AP) 80
Federal prosecutors charge an Anchorage man with 28 counts of sex trafficking and drug-related offenses (KTVA) 81
Harsher penalties weighed for online sex offenders (WT) 81
Wilson Challenges Subpoena In CIA Case (AP) 82
Katrina fraud in Yuba (AD) 83
CyberNET wife, others indicted in fed court 83
(WOOD-TV) 83
CyberNET Widow, Mother, Executive Indicted (GRPRESS) .. 84
Crete Man Gets 7 Years For $7M Pension Fraud 84
(STNG) 84
Phone-fraud Ring Raided In Canada (WT) 85
Felons' DNA Missing From Va. Database (WP) 86
In Quest For A Killer, An Inmate Finds Vindication (NYT) 87
5 Houston-Area Men Attacked By Rapist (NYT) 89
Concerns Raised About Security At Supermax Prison (WP) .. 89
A Vexing Leap In US Robbery Rate (CSM) 91
Free Genarlow Wilson Now (NYT) 92

Civil Law:

U.S. Justice Department Moves Against Prosser in Bankruptcy Proceedings (STS) 92

Civil Rights:

LaRoque discusses district attorney Nifong with Fox News (KFP) 94
State lifts new patient moratorium at Fort Bayard (AP) 94

Antitrust:

Delta lawyer: US Airways merger has 'antitrust issues' (NMBW) 95
Phone Carriers Win A Skirmish In Cable Wars (NYT) 96
FCC Vote A Victory For Phone Companies (WP) 97
Phone Giants Are Closer To TV Service (USAT) 99
Bell Companies' FCC Victory Might Be Short-Lived (WSJ) 99
U.S. Clears CVS To Acquire Caremark Rx (BLOOM) 100
We Energies Sells Nuclear Plant to FPL (AP) 101
Wisconsin Energy to sell Point Beach nuclear plant for $1B (BJM) 101
Service Corp. Seeks Approval For Sale (AP) 102
Lawsuit against Amway still stands (MCT) 102
NYSE Gets OK On Euronext Deal (USAT) 103
N.Y. Firm To Buy Harland Low-profile M&F Worldwide's $1.7 Billion All-cash Deal For Decatur Check Printing Firm Certain To Face Antitrust Scrutiny. (AJC) 104
Huntington, Sky To Merge Banks (WSJ) 105
Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ) 105
Arcelor Mittal buys steel plants from Grupo Villacero (BLOOM) 106
Brussels Approves MAN's Scania Bid (FT) 107
Intesa Must Sell More Branches, Antitrust Says (BLOOM) ... 107

Environment:

Reforestation Lags Amid Record Wildfires (USAT) 108
Two Lawsuits Filed Against ICC (BSUN) 108
Federal Agency Sued Over Environmental Study (WP) 109
Suits Seek To Block ICC Construction (WT/AP) 110
Build It (WP) 111
Big Profits, And Questions, In Effort To Cut Emissions (NYT) 111

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Indicted On Drug Kingpin Charges (WT) 114
Suspected Drug Kingpin Pleads Not Guilty To New Charges In U.S. (AP) 114

DOJ_NMG_0107976

Web Site Puts Undercover Officers At Risk (KHOU) 115
KCK Man Sentenced To 121 Months In Connection To Marijuana Bust (KESQ).....116
CannaHelp Still Open In Defiance Of City Order (DS) 117
Secrets To Be Declassified Under New Rule At Age 25 (NYT) 117
Federal Inquiry Focuses On 2 Bruno Firms (NYT) 119
Fear Over Scrutiny Of Bruno (NSDY) 121
Feds Are Mining Joe's Biz (NYDN).....122
Land Deal With Albany Lobbyist At Center Of Bruno Inquiry (NYS).....122
Prosecutors Eye Rolex To Show A Pattern Of Payoffs (MCS)123
Doral Case Comes Back To Bite Politician (MJS).....124
3 Plead Guilty In Alabama Church Arsons (AP).....126
Uncle Sam's Private Equity Fund (FOR) 126
Alleged Bank Robber Captured In Florida (AP).....127
Akron Man Accused Of Raping 12-Year-Old (WEWS) 127
2 Tenn. fugitives arrested in New Orleans (AP) 128

Immigration:

U.S. Sued Over Dropping Of Benefits For Disabled (WP).....128
For Divided Family, Border Is Sorrowful Barrier (NYT).....129
Mr. Bush's Immigration Realism (NYT).....133

Tax:

Judge Refuses To Split Trial In U.S. Case On Tax Shelters (NYT) 133
IRS Scales Back Audits Of Big Firms, Study Finds (WSJ) 134
Yankton Firm Implicated In Tax Fraud Case (YDP).....135

Congress-Administration:

Report Says Berger Hid Archive Documents (AP) 136
Report Details Archives Theft By Ex-Adviser (NYT).....137
Berger Hid Archives Papers Under A Trailer, Probe Shows (WP) 138
Berger Took Papers To A Hiding Place (WT).....139
Bush Links Minimum Wage To Tax Break (AP).....140
Minimum-wage Battle May Be Brewing (LAT).....141
Minimum-Wage Deal As Bellwether (WSJ) 141
Bush Supports Democrats' Minimum Wage Hike Plan (WP)142
Bush Prepares To Make Deals With Democrats (WT) 144
Bush Signs Massive Tax And Trade Bill (AP).....145
Congress Closes With A Pork-filled Flourish (LAT).....145
FEDERAL DIARY: Price Caps At The Old Stamping Ground (WP) 147
Bush OKs Billions To Clean Up Coal Mines (AP) 148
New Congress To Toughen Oversight (CSM).....149
Va. Congressman Fears Election Of 'Many More Muslims' To Office (AP).....150
Va. Lawmaker's Remarks On Muslims Criticized (WP).....151
Congressman Criticizes Election Of Muslim (NYT).....152
Lawmaker Sees Muslims As Threat (MINNST).....153
Goode Stands By Comments On Muslims (RTD).....154
Tools: Save | Print | E-mail | Most Popular Lawmaker Won't Apologize For 'Islamophobic' Letter (CNN) 155
Congress Asked To Intervene In Fla. Race (AP).....155
Mass. Governor's Rightward Shift Raises Questions (WP) ...156
The Courts Need This Watchdog (WP).....158
Discover America Partnership Lands Ridge (WP).....159

Other News:

Chavez Accuses U.S. Envoy Of Lying On Drug Problem (AP)160
Bush Forcefully Rejects Direct Talks With Syria, Iran (MCT)161
Kerry, Dodd Meet With Syria President (AP).....163
Kerry: Syria Leader Wants To Assist In Iraq (BOS).....163
U.S. And Britain To Add Ships To Persian Gulf In Signal To Iran (NYT).....165
Security Council Set To Vote Friday On Iran Sanctions (AFP)166
U.N. Draft Resolution On Iran Loosens Travel Ban And Time Limits (NYT).....167
Who's Tough On Tehran? (WSJ).....168
Iran Admits Oil Projects Suffering (FT) 169
Iran President Facing Revival Of Students' Ire (NYT) 170
Cleric's Star Rises In Iran After Vote (AP) 171
U.S. Negotiator Notes An Improved Tone In Talks On North Korea (NYT).....173
Faint Hopes Of Progress As NKorea Nuclear Talks Enter Fourth Day (AFP) 173
North Korea Not Budging On Sanctions (AP) 174
U.S. Nuke Envoy Hopes Japan-N.Korea Meet (AP).....175
Somali Government, Islamic Militias Agree To Resume Peace Talks (WP) 176
Somalis Agree To Peace Talks Despite Clashes (FT).....177
Diplomat Pushes Peace Talks In Somalia (AP).....178
Clashes Raise Fears Of Civil War In Somalia (LAT).....179
Saudi Arabia Set To Name Jubeir As Ambassador (WP).....180
US Deeply Concerned Over Darfur After Visit By Bush Envoy (AFP) 181
U.S. Warns Sudan Of Possible Action (AP) 181
Sudan Given January 1 Deadline To Accept Darfur Peacekeepers (AFP).....182
U.S. Gives Deadline Over Darfur (WT).....183
US Hits At EU Emissions Plan For Airlines (FT).....184
Europe Acts To Penalize Jet Pollution (NYT) 184

DOJ_NMG_0107977

Fliers Could See Fares Rise When EU Pollution Allowances Begin (AP) 185
Paper Chase China's Reporters Face A Backlash Over Investigations (WSJ) 186
Chinese Journalist Freed Five Years Early (WT/AP) 189
Welcome, Wal-Mart Comrades (WSJ) 190

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Key Democrat wants to know why Arar still barred from U.S. (TS)

By Tim Harper
Toronto Star, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON–The incoming chair of a powerful Senate committee says he will summon U.S. Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales before American legislators to explain why Maher Arar is still barred from the U.S.

Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, who will chair the judiciary committee in the new Congress, said Arar has the right to know what suspicions the Bush administration still harbour against him after he was exonerated by a Canadian inquiry.

"The Canadian government has now documented that the wrong thing was done to the wrong man," Leahy said.

"It is time for the (Bush) administration to do what it can to redress this wrong, instead of perpetuating it."

Leahy, in an interview with the Toronto Star, also said he believed the new Congress would rewrite the law that will require Canadians and Americans crossing the international border by land to carry passports by June 2009, at the latest.

In the last Republican-controlled Congress, the Vermont senator co-sponsored an amendment to push the border regulations back from its original Jan. 1, 2008 start date.

He also called the administration's plans to install electronic sensors and satellite security along the border "insulting to Canada ... and beneath the United States, and I don't see that it accomplishes anything."

Leahy says he wants Gonzales before his committee to discuss the entire U.S. policy of rendition and he said in a speech last week he will no longer put up with non-answers shrouded in security concerns or promises to get back to him.

"It's not just this individual case," Leahy said, "but what does this say when someone's plane stops here, they have citizenship in a neighbouring country and we ship them back to Syria.

"You know they are going to be tortured.

"This is beneath our country. And it does absolutely nothing to make us more secure and it is a gross human rights violation.

"One thing that can be done is our country should sit down with yours and say: How did we all screw up here?"

Arar's Toronto lawyer, Lorne Waldman, said he was "very encouraged" by Leahy's pledge.

"This moves the matter to the next level and we're quite pleased with that," he said.

Washington's ambassador to Ottawa, David Wilkins, said last week Arar remained on a "no-fly" list in the United States, but neither he nor the U.S. State Department would outline the reasons.

Leahy said Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian engineer, should be told by U.S. authorities what allegations they are making.

There are a number of lists held by American authorities that could ban Canadians from this country and since the U.S. justice department has classed Arar's case a "deportation" and not a "rendition," he was barred from the U.S. for five years from the 2002 date he was picked up at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York.

From there, he was sent to Syria where he was imprisoned and tortured.

On the border issue, Leahy said the fact he was able to co-sponsor an extension to the legislation with a conservative Republican, Ted Stevens of Alaska, shows there is bipartisan support to change the law.

He cautioned against reading too much into the Democratic pledge, often mentioned by incoming Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, to implement all the recommendations of the 9/11 commission that studied the terrorist attacks in this country.

DOJ_NMG_0107978

The passport or secure card rules sprung from that commission.

"Will Rogers, the great American comedian once said, `I belong to no organized political party, I'm a Democrat,'" he said. "Certainly we want to implement a number of recommendations from the 9/11 commission, but we are not a parliamentary form of government and we don't take party positions.

"It's great to say we're going to implement a lot of things that haven't been implemented, but you're not just going to take the 9/11 commission report as a piece of legislation and just pass it.

"It's not going to happen."

Leahy said he has heard more and more senators, beyond border states, saying the security legislation doesn't make sense.

"I think we'll go back to the drawing board," he said. "It has to be rewritten."

US Senator Seeks Answers In Botched Canadian Terror Case: Report (AFP)

AFP, December 21, 2006

The incoming chair of the powerful US senate judiciary committee has vowed to get to the bottom of an alleged rendition of a Canadian man wrongly accused of terrorist ties, a Canadian newspaper said.

Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy told the Toronto Star in an interview published Wednesday that he would summon US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before the committee to explain why Maher Arar is still barred from the United States, after he was cleared of terrorist links by a Canadian judicial inquiry.

"The Canadian government has now documented that the wrong thing was done to the wrong man," Leahy told the newspaper.

"It is time for the (Bush) administration to do what it can to redress this wrong, instead of perpetuating it."

Arar was stopped in New York, on his way to Canada from a trip to Tunisia in September 2002, and was deported to Syria where he was jailed and tortured for more than a year.

Ottawa asked Washington to remove the 36-year-old software engineer from their surveillance list after he was exonerated in September. But the US ambassador to Ottawa said last week that Arar remains on the watch list.

The botched terrorism case has gripped Canada and led to the resignation earlier this month of the nation's top cop, Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) Commissioner Guiliano Zaccardelli.

A Canadian government report found that faulty intelligence provided to US authorities by the RCMP had likely led to Arar's detention and deportation to Syria.

Ottawa protested to Washington and Damascus over Arar's treatment, but Syria denies the torture claims and the United states has refused to accept blame for any wrongdoing in the case.

Senator Leahy said he would also question Gonzales about the US government's alleged widespread use of "extraordinary rendition" -- the clandestine seizing and transfer of terror suspects to allied nations that condone torture.

"It's not just this individual case," he said. "But what does this say when someone's plane stops here, they have citizenship in a neighboring country and we ship them back to Syria."

"This is beneath our country. And, it does absolutely nothing to make us more secure and it is a gross human rights violation."

Pakistani Man In NY Convicted Of Financing India Militant Group (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A Pakistani man was convicted Wednesday of financially supporting a militant separatist group in India, federal prosecutors announced.

Khalid Awan, of Garden City, was convicted by a federal jury after a two-week trial in Brooklyn and faces up to 45 years in prison.

Awan, 44, was charged with helping the Khalistan Commando Force, a Sikh secessionist group that operated in India's Punjab state. The group, founded in 1986, is considered a terrorist organization in India and is said to be responsible for the deaths of thousands of people through bombings, sabotage and assassinations.

DOJ_NMG_0107979

Awan came to the attention of federal authorities in 2003, when he was serving prison time on credit card fraud charges, the U.S. attorney's office said.

A fellow inmate at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn reported that Awan had talked about his relationship with Paramjit Singh Panjwar, the leader of the KCF and one of India's most wanted fugitives, prosecutors said.

Evidence that prosecutors presented included recordings of Awan's prison phone calls to Panjwar in Pakistan, statements by Awan saying he sent the group hundreds of thousands of dollars and testimony by two New York-area fundraisers for the militants who said they had delivered money to Awan's home in Garden City. Prosecutors also said Awan introduced the fellow inmate as a potential recruit when talking to Panjwar.

The Indian government cooperated in the investigation, prosecutors said.

"The war on terror is a global battle," said Roslynn Mauskopf, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York. "We will not permit individuals in our jurisdiction to finance terrorist groups responsible for murder and violence in any part of the world."

A telephone message seeking comment from an attorney for Awan was not immediately returned Wednesday.

Awan's sentencing is set for March 7.

Risk Of Attack Rising, Officials In Europe Say (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BERLIN, Dec. 20 -- The threat of a terrorist attack on European soil by Islamic radicals has increased substantially in recent months, reaching its highest levels since the London transit attacks of July 2005, according to European counterterrorism officials. Adding to the anxiety: fresh threats against Britain and France delivered Wednesday by al-Qaeda's deputy leader.

In a new videotape, Ayman al-Zawahiri, the second-in-command to al-Qaeda chief Osama bin Laden, singled out Britain as a historical enemy of Muslims, blaming it for the creation of the state of Israel and the downfall of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century.

He also said al-Qaeda would continue to plan attacks on the United States and its "Crusader" allies in Europe as long as Western powers remain in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon. "The animosity of Britain toward Islam stretches over centuries," Zawahiri said, according to a translation of his remarks by the SITE Institute, a terrorism research organization. "Isn't it the one who used to occupy most Islamic lands?"

It was the 15th recorded speech released this year by Zawahiri, a 55-year-old Egyptian physician who has shown little fear of speaking out despite a $25 million reward for his capture posted by the U.S. government.

Frequently wagging a finger to make a point, he spoke with a rifle displayed in the background. "I tell both the Republicans and Democrats . . . you try to negotiate with certain parties to secure your departure, although the parties don't have a way out for you" from Iraq. "You shall come back -- Allah permitting -- with no other choice but to negotiate with the real powers," an apparent reference to al-Qaeda's wing in Iraq.

Zawahiri's remarks followed a raft of general warnings by authorities in Britain, France and Germany that major attacks might be coming. They have given no specifics.

Last week, British Home Secretary John Reid declared that an attempted terrorist strike in his country was "highly likely" over the Christmas and New Year's holidays. There has not been a major terrorist attack in Europe since the July 7, 2005, bombings in London. But European counterterrorism officials have disrupted dozens of attempts since then and have far more suspected radicals under surveillance now than at any point since the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackings in the United States.

In November, the director general of Britain's MI5 intelligence service, Eliza Manningham-Buller, said the agency was tracking more than 1,600 members of suspected terrorist cells, more than triple the number under surveillance three years ago. Manningham-Buller, who rarely speaks in public, said investigators were monitoring about 30 major terrorism plots in the planning stages.

"The threat has really proliferated," said M.J. Gohel, chief executive of the Asia-Pacific Foundation, a London-based security research organization. "One of the reasons why Western intelligence and counterterrorism officials are so concerned is because they have unraveled so many plots involving so many different independent cells."

DOJ_NMG_0107980

Other European countries have been on heightened alert. Spanish investigators broke up a cell of Islamic militants last week that was allegedly plotting attacks on an arms depot and a supermarket.

On Friday, Germany's chief federal prosecutor, Monika Harms, said that "the threat posed by Islamist terrorism must not be underestimated" in that country, citing an alleged plot to blow up regional trains with suitcase bombs in July and a separate scheme to smuggle explosives onto an Israeli airliner at the Frankfurt airport.

Intelligence officials and analysts said the number of European Muslims who have become radicalized has escalated in recent years, especially since the Iraq invasion and the wars in Lebanon and Afghanistan. But they also cited factors closer to home, including rising anger among immigrants and later-generation Muslims who feel marginalized in European society.

Zawahiri's recent remarks have particularly concerned French counterterrorism officials. They have warned of a heightened risk of attacks because of a newly declared alliance between al-Qaeda and an Algerian-based network, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has developed an extensive collection of cells in France and elsewhere in Europe.

In September, Zawahiri announced the formation of the partnership and urged the Algerian network to become "a dagger in the hearts of the French traitors and apostates." On Wednesday, he repeated the command, predicting that the Algerians would soon defeat the "secularist sons of France."

French officials said this week that they have arrested 76 suspected members of the Algerian network since June 2005 in connection with three separate plots, including alleged plans to bomb the Paris subway and Orly airport.

Jean-Louis Bruguiere, France's chief anti-terrorism judge, said that France had become "the main target" of the Algerian group and that the risk of attacks had increased over the past six months. "We consider the threat level to be very high," he said in an interview published Wednesday by the International Herald Tribune. "What is new is that this organization has formally pledged allegiance to al-Qaeda."

In his statement, Zawahiri also criticized the radical Palestinian movement Hamas for taking part in elections in January and failing to insist on an Islamic constitution. In earlier messages, he has called on Islamic fighters to go to the Palestinian territories to fight alongside Hamas.

U.N. To Allow Appeals On Sanctions Tied To Al Qaeda, Taliban (WSJ)

By David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Alleged al Qaeda and Taliban supporters blacklisted by the United Nations Security Council will be able to petition directly to have their names removed and sanctions lifted, removing a top complaint of lawyers and civil-rights lobbies.

The security body cleared the way for a form of appeals process when it voted Tuesday to set up an office to handle requests by individuals to lift sanctions imposed under a range of U.N. resolutions dating back to 1992.

More than 300 people have been listed at the Security Council under one of those resolutions, 1267, which was passed in 1999 to pressure leaders of the then-Taliban government in Afghanistan to hand over Osama bin Laden. Since then, the resolution has been used more widely by governments to sanction people they believe to belong to or support al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Explaining why Denmark proposed the change while it was president of the Security Council, Danish Foreign Minister Per Stig Møller said, "Denmark wants to combine the fight against terrorism with respect for human rights and the rule of law."

The new Security Council office -- called a "focal point" -- will be able to receive petitions from individuals sanctioned under 1267, as well as 10 other resolutions directed at individuals in Somalia, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Congo, Ivory Coast, Sudan and North Korea.

Fix Needed (WP)

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

LAST WEEK a federal court in Washington threw out the lawsuit of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, whose successful challenge to the Bush administration's proposed military trials for accused terrorists led to a landmark Supreme Court decision earlier this year. The dismissal of the case is an ironic consequence of Mr. Hamdan's victory before the high court. The justices' decision forced Congress finally to take action to create a legal structure for the war on terrorism. But one of the actions Congress took in the hastily passed Military Commissions Act was to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over such lawsuits, including those, like Mr. Hamdan's, that were already pending. Under the act, many other important cases will probably have to be dismissed -- which is why Congress should promptly amend the law when it reconvenes in January.

DOJ_NMG_0107981

While the Supreme Court's rulings on this subject have been muddy, U.S. District Judge James Robertson may well have been legally correct in dismissing the case. The fault here lies with Congress, not with any judge. Judge Robertson held that the legislature had unambiguously stripped the courts of jurisdiction over all lawsuits challenging detentions at Guantanamo Bay -- so-called habeas corpus lawsuits. And he ruled as well that Congress had the power under the Constitution to do so -- at least for aliens held beyond American shores. But saying that Congress acted lawfully is not the same as saying it acted wisely.

Stripping the courts of habeas jurisdiction over Guantanamo was a profoundly foolish step to stop judicial review of an administration whose behavior has repeatedly illustrated the crucial importance of such oversight. Virtually every step the administration has taken toward a fairer and more open system for the detention and prosecution of enemy combatants has come as the result of pressure, direct and indirect, of litigation. The decision to respond to the Supreme Court's rebuke by, among other things, sharply limiting judicial review disabled the one mechanism that has consistently pushed policy in a constructive direction. Congress badly needs to reconsider.

Fortunately, the bipartisan leadership of the Senate Judiciary Committee is committed to doing just that. Incoming Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and ranking Republican Arlen Specter (Pa.) are pushing legislation to reestablish habeas jurisdiction for these cases. The new Congress would do a service if it acted swiftly to correct its error.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Discusses Goals, Responds To Critics (NJ)

By Shane Harris

National Journal, December 20, 2006

In February 2005, Michael Chertoff stepped down from a lifetime appointment to the federal bench to lead one of the most far-flung and disjointed bureaucracies in the federal government. Only six months into the job, Hurricane Katrina put the Homeland Security Department's disaster planning and response mission to the test -- and by most accounts it failed in almost every measurable way.

DHS's performance has "improved quite a bit in the past two years," Chertoff said in a December 5 interview with National Journal. But he acknowledged that he didn't anticipate just how high a hill he would have to climb when he became department secretary. "I don't think when I came in I had a clear sense of all the individual tasks that would have to be undertaken."

Looking at the final two years of the Bush administration, Chertoff said that much more needs to be done. He described some of his major goals, responded to his critics, and talked about what lawmakers and the public should -- and shouldn't -- expect from the Homeland Security Department. An edited transcript follows.

NJ: How do you rate the department's performance in one of its key missions, keeping terrorists out of the country?

Chertoff: We've got the watch lists for the known terrorists collected in one place and accessible across the government, which was an issue raised by the 9/11 commission. That's been done.

The next challenge is finding the unknown terrorist. There are two elements to doing that. One is getting more biographical information about people who want to come into the country. We did that by reaching an agreement on passenger name record data with the Europeans. [Homeland Security will collect certain personal information on European airline passengers and screen it for terrorist risk.] And then the second step is biometric data, collecting 10 fingerprints from visitors, which we can run against latent prints that we hold in databases from safe houses, or training camps, or battlefields all over the world. We're rolling out the 10-print collection at consulates in Riyadh, London, and El Salvador.

NJ: How did the new requirement that airline passengers pack carry-on liquids and gels in quart-size plastic bags fare during the biggest travel period of the year, the Thanksgiving holiday?

DOJ_NMG_0107982

Chertoff: Since there was very little in the news about it, I think it was a smashing success. There were some bumps in the road, but it was not the story that it was predicted to be. We would ideally like to get to a technology that would allow us to screen all liquids mechanically [for explosives], but it's got to be one that does it efficiently without becoming cumbersome and slow. I constantly have the experience of people telling me that they have a magic bullet, if only we would see it and buy it.

But it works great in a lab, and it doesn't work operationally. If you have to take every bottle out and scan it separately, you're going to be waiting three hours to get on your airplane.

There was a lot of work done training and preparing and communicating to the public [about the new liquids requirements], and the public responded well. One of the keys to success for us is communication and message, and getting it out there and making sure people understand what we're doing.

NJ: In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, does the public understand that the federal government will not respond immediately to a major catastrophe?

Chertoff: I think everyone intellectually knew that the feds weren't going to be there immediately. The federal government does not own all the response resources. The National Guard is the single biggest response resource. That is controlled by the governors. If you want to send a governor into orbit, suggest that maybe we should have the federal government reach out to control the National Guard in an emergency. They will go ballistic, and that's as it should be. But they must then take the responsibility to make sure that the National Guard is properly trained and able to work. What we have to do is make sure the National Guard training and planning is integrated with ours.

NJ: Does there need to be some public education program for preparing for a disaster?

Chertoff: The basics of preparedness, having a plan, should be the kind of thing we teach in school, in the same way that you were taught in fire drills to stop, drop, and roll. Everybody should have those basics down. I think Katrina shook people up. A lot of messaging and a lot of education, particularly at the local level, is the key.

NJ: What's the most underrated threat right now?

Chertoff: We put a lot of resources into nuclear, radiological, biological countermeasures. That doesn't get a lot of media attention, because the media tend to focus on plots that have already occurred -- aviation, rail. The problem is, the return on investments may never be visible. Maybe terrorists will never get their hands on a nuclear bomb. But if they did, the consequence of not being ready would be catastrophic.

NJ: What's a criticism you most often hear about the department, and how do you respond?

Chertoff: A typical criticism is contract management. Part of that is we get inconsistent signals. Going back to 2002, there were stories about TSA contracts. [Congress required the Transportation Security Administration, now part of DHS, to quickly hire tens of thousands of airport security screeners. Government audits found that contracts with private hiring firms were severely mismanaged and over budget.] What can I tell you? If you tell people you've got to build an organization and get it up and running, and it's a national emergency, you're not going to do the ordinary contracting process, because that takes about a year.

We have to be honest with Congress and the public. We ought to ask the question very directly: Do you want us to short-circuit the contracting rules in a time of national emergency? I don't think it's fair to tell the people in this department, "It's an emergency, get it done yesterday, but when you get it done then we're going to criticize you because you didn't do the full process." That's not fair to people. That's basically saying, heads I win, tails you lose. And that's not right.

I've become more and more convinced that one of the best things I can do is to be completely crystal clear about what it is you want us to do: What are our capabilities, what are you prepared to give us or not give us, what's it going to cost, and what can we deliver? Accountability is not about gotcha. It's about clarity of goal, accurate assessment of capability and of cost, and the deliberate decision-making about what you want to do.

NJ: How are your first interactions going with incoming House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., and other congressional overseers?

Chertoff: We're off to a very good start. I'm very happy to meet with everybody involved on the committee, either separately or together. I want to hear what's on their minds.

I want to tell them what's on my mind. We are all going to win or lose together on homeland security. We all share this responsibility. If we protect this country as much as reasonably possible, then we can all say we did the job the American public sent us here to do. I completely believe that everybody on the committee, on both sides, is seriously interested in doing the job and have the right goals. I don't have any doubt about people's objective and motives.

DOJ_NMG_0107983

NJ: Nancy Pelosi has said that one of her top priorities will be enacting all of the 9/11 commission recommendations. Where is the department on enacting those?

Chertoff: On the ones that affect us, we're implementing, as far as I know, all of them. I feel comfortable that any impulse to enact those recommendations is going to validate what we're doing.

NJ: Are you anticipating any areas where she's going to say that you're dragging your feet, not doing enough?

Chertoff: I'm not going to put myself in someone else's head. The challenge for us is always implementation. I'm as impatient as everyone else. I fully understand the frustration people feel; I would like everything done yesterday. But I also know that rushing something too quickly is going to wind up breaking it or not have it work properly. My task is to set a deadline and put things just a little bit out of reach so that people are always stretching, but not so far out of reach that I'm imposing a demand that can't possibly be met.

Acquisition Listed Among DHS Management Challenges (GovExec)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, December 20, 2006

The Homeland Security Department needs to establish a more comprehensive acquisition oversight program and better plan an initiative to secure the borders, according to an inspector general report released Wednesday.

The report on major management challenges said that DHS' contract writing systems are incompatible with the Federal Procurement Data System - Next Generation, a governmentwide repository for information on acquisitions. Department officials also sometimes fail to enter data on certain types of purchases, such as those using government purchase cards, into FPDS-NG, the auditors noted, leading to a potential understatement of contracting activity.

Some of DHS' contract writing systems "may need to be replaced," the IG said. The report did not project what such an effort might cost.

The report also criticized DHS' Secure Border Initiative to integrate technology, personnel and infrastructure along the nation's borders.

"Our main concern about SBInet is that DHS is embarking upon a multibillion-dollar acquisition project without having laid the foundation to effectively oversee and assess contractor performance and effectively control cost and schedule," the report stated. "DHS has not properly defined, validated and stabilized operational requirements."

The IG singled out DHS' Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau and the Coast Guard as needing better financial management. Another report by the auditors pointed at ICE and the Coast Guard as having the most material weaknesses in financial reporting within the department.

In addition, the IG, noting "significant interdependencies" between U.S. Customs and Border Protection and ICE, said "jurisdictional, operational and communication gaps exist between the two organizations that must be addressed by DHS leadership."

DHS Spokesman Jarrod Agen cited ICE's and CBP's joint efforts to end the United States' catch-and-release policy of dealing with illegal immigrants as an example of how both agencies "effectively worked together."

In a written response to the IG, DHS officials said the department will continue to build its acquisition workforce, and "initiatives to resolve personnel shortages will include a centralized recruiting system for contract personnel within DHS components."

Officials responded to an IG recommendation on improving the grants process by stating that DHS has added workshops to "provide grantees with more advance learning opportunities." This fiscal year, the department will initiate a monitoring program to check up on grants awarded, the response said.

DHS also said it will continue to increase staffing levels within its SBInet office and that it plans to expand the CBP Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility to create "collaborative work areas." It will deploy "field intelligence units" next month.

DOJ_NMG_0107984

After the report's release, Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee incoming Chairman Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said he intends to scrutinize DHS spending when he takes the gavel in 2007.

"No one expected that the department would automatically work as a well-oiled machine," he said, in a statement. "A merger of this size takes time, sometimes years, for all the various parts to work well together."

IG Outlines Homeland Security Department Management Challenges (FEDT)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, December 21, 2006

Disaster response, acquisition management and financial management remain major challenges for the Homeland Security Department, according to the department's independent watchdog.

In a report released Dec. 20, Inspector General Richard Skinner writes that almost four years after the government's largest reorganization in a half-century, the department "still has much to do to establish a cohesive, efficient and effective organization."

Citing Homeland Security's "failures" after Hurricane Katrina, Skinner said the event highlighted longstanding problems at the Federal Emergency Management Agency in managing assistance and housing for disaster evacuees, information and systems, contracts, grants and flood insurance.

The IG also is conducting reviews of FEMA's intake process for evacuees, its management of the national flood insurance program, and its acquisition management structure, the report says. And last month, the IG announced plans to investigate FEMA's spending and claims that the agency failed to properly consider small- and minority-owned businesses for some contracts.

This latest report calls upon FEMA to speed up efforts to share data with other agencies, noting that "FEMA and the federal community are not ready to meet the data sharing requirements of the next catastrophic disaster."

In the area of contract management, the report says the department should provide better ethics training for procurement officials, hire more program managers who have experience, and install program management controls. Among the seven agencies within DHS that have their own procurement offices, "many . . . reported that their lack of staffing prevents proper procurement planning and severely limits their ability to monitor contractor performance," the report stated.

The IG singled out DHS' Secure Border Initiative and the Coast Guard's troubled fleet modernization program, called Deepwater, as efforts that present substantial risk due to their size and complexity.

For the fourth straight year, DHS could not obtain an opinion on its financial statements in 2006, due to component agencies' inability to produce enough support for their stated financial positions. In September, the department's new chief financial officer, David Norquist, suspended efforts to merge the eight financial systems in the department, calling the effort too disruptive.

Auditors have identified material weaknesses in areas like budgetary accounting and undelivered orders at DHS agencies, particularly at the Coast Guard and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The components have corrective action plans for those problems, but a separate report by auditor KPMG LLP calls many of those plans insufficient and behind schedule.

How Biometric Security Is Far From Foolproof (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Growing numbers of companies are relying on biometric devices like fingerprint readers and iris scanners to identify customers and employees and make sure they aren't poseurs.

But with increasing use has come increasing worry that these security devices can be faked out. Deception methods including well-made copies of fingerprints, masks or contact lenses that replicate iris patterns might be used to defeat the new identification technologies.

In a sign of the growing fears, Financial Services Technology Consortium, a New York-based group of financial institutions, has hired a consulting firm to examine how successful biometric devices are at thwarting impersonation -- or "spoofing," as biometricians like to call it.

DOJ_NMG_0107985

The preliminary view of the consultants, International Biometric Group, based on an early look at research, is that the devices aren't spoof-proof.

"Any high-resolution fingerprint image will have a high chance of spoofing an optical sensor," says Ross Mitchell of International Biometric. He says most fingerprint-sensing technologies -- which essentially take a picture of a fingerprint and match it against a database -- are potentially vulnerable to spoofing. Systems that use sensors that aren't optical but rely on thermal or ultrasonic imaging, may be less vulnerable to fakery, "but they're still susceptible," Mr. Mitchell says.

In 2002, Tsutomu Matsumoto, a mathematician at Yokohama National University in Japan, reported he had fooled a number of fingerprint readers by creating fake fingers out of the kind of gelatin used in candy Gummy bears. Researchers at Biomedical Signal Analysis Laboratory at West Virginia University have reported they were able to fool various types of fingerprint readers between 40% and 94% of the time using cadaver fingers or fingers made of Play-Doh.

Use of biometrics in various applications is exploding. Scott Moody, chairman of AuthenTec Inc., a Melbourne, Fla., company that is the largest maker of chips used for reading fingerprints, says it will sell 6.7 million chips this year, more than double the three million last year. Fingerprint readers are increasingly common on cellphones in Japan and Korea.

Mr. Moody estimates that about 9% of all laptop computers shipped next year will have fingerprint readers to secure and simplify remote log-ons. John Morris, president of Solidus Networks Inc., a San Francisco company whose Pay By Touch system is used by a growing number of retailers, says it now has readers installed in almost 3,000 stores, up from 30 just 18 months ago.

International Biometric estimates the total market this year rose 47% to about $2.2 billion from $1.5 billion last year.

Makers of biometric devices downplay the risk of spoofing. Mr. Moody of AuthenTec says most reported spoofs have involved making a mold of a finger, which would be difficult without the individual's knowledge. Experts say it would be even more difficult to make an accurate finger replica from a latent print on a glass.

Mr. Morris -- whose Pay By Touch system is in use at 3,000 retail locations, up from just 30 two years ago -- says "the chances are extraordinarily low. We've never had an incident of any kind." He says that even if spoofing is theoretically possible, fingerprint readers are less vulnerable to thieves and hackers than credit-cards or passwords.

International Biometric says the testing it is doing will provide buyers useful guidance about potential risks. Mr. Mitchell says the researchers have proved that even sophisticated fingerprint scanners, "despite high matching accuracy, could be fooled using cheap materials." The tests will be completed during the 2007 third quarter with results reported to the sponsor in the fourth quarter.

Iris recognition technology, which is becoming increasingly popular because it is considered more accurate than fingerprint reading, may be more difficult to spoof. Mr. Mitchell says there have been informal reports that some scanners have been fooled by high-resolution photos of the eye.

Some eye scanners now include a flashing light designed to make the pupil contract to prove the eyeball is real. International Biometric plans to test whether it can design a contact lens with an imposter's iris pattern to fool a scanner. Currently it doesn't plan to test face recognition or handprint geometry biometric devices.

Quest For Anthrax Vaccine Lengthens (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

The cancellation of a high-profile contract to produce 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine leaves federal heath officials years away from a replacement for the version now in use but could raise the prospects for an alternative being developed by a British competitor.

VaxGen of Brisbane, Calif., was scheduled to begin delivering a new anthrax vaccine this year, but after delays and technical problems, the Department of Health and Human Services voided the $877.5 million contract Tuesday. The department has not announced plans to replace it, but an alternative version being developed by Avecia of Manchester, England, is being tested, and the National Institutes of Health is expected to award contracts next year for research into advanced vaccines.

The VaxGen contract was the largest piece of the Bush administration's $5.6 billion Project BioShield, which seeks to develop modern vaccines and drugs to counter chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear threats.

DOJ_NMG_0107986

"The first thing to do, on HHS's part, is to explain why this failed," said Tara O'Toole, director of the Center for Biosecurity at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center. "All of the companies are wondering, does this mean that HHS is an unreliable partner or that this was just kind of bad luck."

HHS canceled the contract after VaxGen missed its deadline Monday to begin human testing because of concerns at the Food and Drug Administration about the product's reliability. Agency officials declined to elaborate on the reasons for the cancellation.

VaxGen was to develop a replacement for a version of the vaccine currently used by the military and made by Emergent BioSolutions of Gaithersburg. That drug must be administered over 18 months in six shots and has been subject to controversy. Some soldiers have resisted being vaccinated and others have complained about side effects, but the FDA has said the drug is safe.

HHS had hoped that VaxGen's vaccine could be produced more quickly in an emergency and administered over a shorter period of time. "It just illustrates the uncertainty that surrounds developing a vaccine. Even in the best of circumstances, it's a risky undertaking," said Robert Kadlec, the former director for biodefense on the White House's Homeland Security Council. "But when you put it in the hands of a company that hasn't had a proven product, it's even chancier."

It is unclear how soon any of the alternatives could be produced. Emergent is working on improvements to its vaccine, including halving the number of shots required and extending its shelf life beyond three years, a company spokesman said. The U.S. Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases plans to spend $14 million in fiscal 2007 researching anthrax vaccines as well as treatments and diagnostic tools.

Avecia, which has an NIH contract to develop a vaccine, may be the closest to an alternative. The company has produced some preliminary data from human tests, Michael Kurilla, director of the Office of Biodefense Research Affairs at NIH, said. "So far the vaccine has been demonstrated to be safe," Kurilla said. But those human trials are not completed and the FDA will review the results, he said. It is unclear how long it would take for the product to be ready for wide distribution.

"There are still a number of specific actions you have to do in terms of bringing a product to commercial-scale production," Kurilla said.

In June, Avecia was awarded a $4 million grant from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases to develop another version of the vaccine that would not need refrigeration. "That is much earlier in the pipeline," Kurilla said. An Avecia spokesman did not return a call for comment.

The NIH is also spearheading research on a third generation of the vaccine. That version could be stored at room temperature, would require fewer doses, and would not require a needle, Kurilla said. One or more contracts will be awarded next year, he said. "This is not something that is going to be a short-term event," he said.

WAR NEWS:

President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP)

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

This 25-minute interview was conducted yesterday in the Oval Office by Washington Post staff writers Peter Baker, Michael A. Fletcher and Michael Abramowitz.

President Bush: Listen, a couple of things before we get going. Obviously, I've been thinking about -- and talking to a lot of people about -- the way forward in Iraq and the way forward in this ideological struggle. I want to share one thought I had with you, and I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops, the Army, the Marines. And I talked about this to [Defense] Secretary [Robert M.] Gates, and he is going to spend some time talking to the folks in the building, come back with a recommendation to me about how to proceed forward on this idea. I want to give him a little time to get his feet on the ground. And so I'll be addressing this after consultations with him. I just want to share that with you before we get going.

You're talking about troops in Iraq, not --

No, I'm talking about overall size.

-- overall size of the Army. Do you have a rough idea how much --

DOJ_NMG_0107987

I'm going to wait for Secretary Gates. As I say, I'm inclined to believe it's important and necessary to do so. The reason why is, it is an accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while, and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and to help us achieve peace.

So you've not made a decision about Iraq, per se, about what to do --

I have not, Mike, I have not. And we'll spend some more time -- Secretary Gates, as he indicated, is going to head to the region at some point in time. I need to talk to him when he gets back. I've got more consultations to do with the national security team, which will be consulting with other folks. And I'm going to take my time to make sure that the policy, when it comes out, the American people will see that we are -- have got a new way forward to achieve an important objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself.

And one thing that will be clear is that I want the American people to know that -- and the Iraqi people to know that -- we expect the Iraqi people to continue making hard choices and doing hard work necessary to succeed, and our job is to help them do so.

Are we winning in Iraq, in your estimation?

You know, I think an interesting construct that General [Peter] Pace uses is, "We're not winning, we're not losing." There's been some very positive developments. And you take a step back and look at progress in Iraq, you say, well, it's amazing -- constitutional democracy in the heart of the Middle East, which is a remarkable development in itself.

I think one of the -- obviously, the real problem we face is the sectarian violence that needs to be dealt with. So part of my policy review is how do we deal with that in a way that then enables the Iraqi people to live in a more secure society so that the government can prove its worth to the people -- saying, we can help you. And one of the main functions of government is to provide security for its people. Our job is to help the Iraqis provide that security. And I'll come forward with a plan that will enable us to achieve that objective.

There's other threats, by the way. It's a multiple-front war, if you really think about it. You got Shia discord in the south; you've got Sunni attacks, much of that -- many of them are caused by al-Qaeda. A lot of them, former Baathists and regimists who are angry that Saddam is no longer in power, and they are a source of conflict in al-Anbar province. And we've got a very robust effort -- I said the other day something that, I guess, people didn't pay that much attention to -- but for October and November and the first week of December, our actions on the ground have -- as a result of action on the ground, we killed or captured nearly 5,900 people. My point in making that point is our troops and coalition troops are on the offense in a lot of areas.

And then the third area of conflict, the one that gets a lot of attention, as it should, is the sectarian violence taking place in Baghdad. And I fully understand that we've got to help the Iraqis deal with that. So my thinking is -- and a lot of our strategy sessions revolve around how best to deal with this problem, and how best to help the Iraqis deal with it. And I've got some more work to do, and I'll come forth at the appropriate time and explain the way forward to the country.

Given the election results, is increasing the troop level in Iraq even a viable possibility or option?

Yes, Mike, all options are viable.

-- given the political will out there?

Well, all options are viable. I think what the people want is -- they want a couple of things. They want to see Democrats and Republicans work together to achieve a common objective, and they want us to win in Iraq. A lot of people understand that if we leave Iraq, there will be dire consequences -- in other words, if we leave before the job is done. There are some, a fair number of people, who say, "Get out now." So I view the election results as people are not satisfied with the progress being made in Iraq and expect to see a different strategy to achieve an important objective.

But the election results seemed people wanted to bring the venture in Iraq to closure. That seemed to be the strong lesson. And what indications are there that you're actually listening to that sentiment?

Oh, Mike, look, I want to achieve the objective. I think the American people -- I know the American people are very worried about an external threat and that they recognize that failure in Iraq would embolden that external threat, and they expect this administration to listen with people, to work with Democrats, to work with the military, to work with the Iraqis to put a plan in place that achieves the objective. There's not a lot of people saying, "Get out now." Most Americans are saying, "We want to achieve the objective."

DOJ_NMG_0107988

But there are a lot of people who are saying, "Let's get out with a phased deployment over a certain period of time."

If they felt -- if that leads to victory, it needs to be seriously considered. And I'm considering all options and listening very carefully to a lot of good people who have got different opinions about how to proceed.

Can we come back to General Pace's formulation about winning, not losing? You said October 24th, "Absolutely, we're winning." And I wanted to --

Yes, that was an indication of my belief we're going to win. Look, I've got four constituencies I speak to on a regular basis; one is the American people, who are justifiably frustrated at the progress in Iraq. And they expect the commander in chief and the people in Washington to support our troops. Supporting our troops not only means good equipment, good [pay], good housing -- it also means a plan that helps achieve the objective.

The second constituency is the enemy. I'm not through yet.

Sure.

The enemy wants to know whether or not the United States has the will to stay engaged in this ideological struggle. They don't believe we do. That's what they say. And I believe that's what they believe.

The third group of people I speak to are the Iraqis. They wonder whether the United States has got the will to help them achieve their objectives. That's what they wonder. The leaders I have talked to wonder whether or not -- what the elections mean, or what the Baker-Hamilton commission means, or what changing [former defense] secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld means -- that's what they wonder. But in the back of their mind, they're saying, "Are they going to leave us again?" And that's an important question for them to have answered, because in order to make difficult choices and to take risk for peace, they're going to have to be assured that they'll get support. This is a group of people that have had their hopes dashed in the past.

And the fourth group is the military. Our troops wonder whether or not our country supports them, and they do. They wonder whether or not the mission and the sacrifice and the toil that they're making is worth it. And they need to know from the commander in chief: Not only is it worth it, but I strongly support them and believe that their work will lead to victory. That's what I believe.

Anyway, you just need to know that's who I'm speaking to when I speak. And to you, of course. You're the objective filter through which my -- (Laughter.)

I suspect your message gets out. (Laughter.)

I do want to say something about the press. I hope you realize that, one, I enjoy the relationship, and two, know it is vital for my presidency. You can't exist without me, and I can't exist without you. And I generally respect the hard work of the press corps. I don't necessarily generally respect every word you write, but nevertheless, I do respect the fact that you're a hardworking group of people seeking the truth. And we're necessary for each other. And that relationship can either be a positive relationship or a suspicious, harmful relationship. And I have worked hard to make it a positive relationship. And I think it is, generally, I do believe it is. And I bear no ill will, and I don't think you do, either.

We appreciate that, and you've certainly been good for business --

Good. That's what decision-makers do, Peter, people who seize the moment and make decisions to lead give people things to write about.

Some of the supporters of the war and you from the beginning have begun to ask the question publicly: Was it, in fact, the idea that turned out not so great, or the execution that turned out not so great?

The idea of?

The idea of the war in the first place, and the --

I've never really asked that question. I believe it's justifiable and necessary. Obviously, the war has not -- the results on the ground haven't happened as quickly as I hoped, and part of this review process is to develop new strategies and tactics so that we can expedite success. Look, I of all people would like to see the troops come home. But I don't want them to come home without achieving our objective, because I understand what happens if there's failure. And I'm going to keep repeating this over and over again, that I believe we're in an ideological struggle that is -- that our country will be dealing with for a long time.

Can I ask you a question about history?

Yes.

DOJ_NMG_0107989

President Lincoln fired a number of his generals in the Civil War until he found Grant.

Is that what triggered your question, looking at Abe?

Why haven't you fired any generals? And does the fact that you haven't fired generals suggest that you are satisfied with the military strategy that they have pursued?

We're reviewing the strategy, because it has -- the results aren't -- we haven't achieved the results as quickly as we wanted -- precisely what the secretary of defense said, by the way. And the chain-of-command issues are issues that percolate up through the Pentagon. And there is a clear chain of command that I adhere to, and I think it's important for the commander in chief to do just that.

I've often talked about how it's important to trust the judgment of the military when they're making military plans as the key advisers to the president, as opposed to the president determining the tactics on the ground, which has happened in previous wars. And so I'm a strict adherer to the command structure.

But isn't there a point in which you say, "We screwed up the amount of troops we need there, we screwed up the WMD, someone ought to pay a penalty for that"?

There is a constant review of the commanders, and I support that constant review. And to the extent that people think they can do -- somebody can do a better job, those recommendations will come forward.

Sir, when you look back at last month's election, do you see that strictly as a repudiation of Iraq and the fact that we're not winning in Iraq, or is it also a judgment of your leadership in general?

Michael, I said in my press conference, I think it's -- no question Iraq was a significant part of the elections. People were troubled by the lack of progress. War is difficult for people, particularly the American people are very compassionate people. When you turn on your TV screens and see bombings and deaths, and read about beheadings or sectarian violence, it troubles America. And they wonder or not -- whether or not we have a plan that succeeds. And I can understand that level of frustration.

Secondly, there's a sense that people's votes were being taken for granted, in a way. We had ethics disputes, and just a lot of signals that said that it's time to -- that people wanted a change. There was a lot of -- look, you've got a guy using earmarks to enrich himself; there was sex and all kinds of issues that sent the signal that perhaps it was time to give another group a chance to lead. I also believe that people are sick and tired of the needless partisanship in Washington. And there's a lot of it. And for some, every expression of position by somebody is an opportunity to attack, and people are tired of it. And there's some big issues that we need to work together.

I will tell you that I view the elections as an opportunity to say to all of us in Washington, "Let's work together." People want that. And what are some issues we can work together on -- energy, or immigration, budgetary reforms. I mean, there's a lot -- education, No Child Left Behind reauthorization. I believe there are some wonderful opportunities --

So you don't think you're out of the policy business with the Democrats in charge on the Hill?

Do what now?

You're not out of the domestic policy business --

Quite the contrary. Quite the contrary. The microphone of the president has never been louder, and I think we have a good -- in other words, to talk about what I think is important. But it turns out that what I think is important, the Democrat leadership thinks is important, as well -- energy security, immigration reform, education -- and Republicans on the Hill agree. And so my task is going to be to talk about big issues that the American people expect us to work on, and work with both Republicans and Democrats.

Will it be easier with Democrats, in some ways? Are there some issues --

I think the legislative process, Peter, is always hard, from the executive-branch perspective. They're pretty independent-minded people, they -- no matter who's in charge, they tend to take some ideas from the president, but they've got their own minds. And the task is to work together in a collegial and constructive spirit to solve some big problems.

I'll tell you one I want to work on, as well, is entitlements. And that's a hard issue, as you know. Social Security is viewed as the third rail of American politics. I've campaigned on it every time -- two times I ran for president. I've talked about it in the State of the Union every time. It's an issue that's -- a president is just going to have to keep talking about to convince people it's worthwhile to take the risk, the political -- so-called political risk to work together to get something done. And we will continue to do so. [Treasury Secretary Henry M.] Paulson is going to take the lead for us up there, working with members of both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0107990

I will tell you this: In an issue like this, unless the president tries, nothing is going to happen. Without presidential involvement, nothing will happen. So we have a chance, and I'm going to work it. And I think that's -- I know that's the job of the president, is to say, "This is important to the future of the country, let us work together."

Yes, sir.

Just on that point, are you willing to sit down with Democrats in a commission that puts all the options on Social Security on the table? Not just reductions and benefits, not just private accounts, but also some kind of revenue increases, tax increases?

I don't see how you can move forward without people feeling comfortable about putting ideas on the table. I have made it clear that I've got a way forward that can do it and I want to hear other people's opinions. And that's what Hank Paulson is telling both Republicans and Democrats. It's going to be very important for people to feel there can be a full, wide-ranging discussion about how to move forward.

And specifically, tax increases on the table then?

Well, specifically, personal accounts; specifically, everything that the Democrats think will work, as well.

Well, they talk about tax increases.

Well, let them; that's fine. They can come to the table and talk about them. I proposed a way forward that doesn't require tax increases. Nevertheless, I look forward to hearing their opinions.

[Incoming Speaker of the House] Mrs. Pelosi has identified six or seven things that she wants the House to do in the first 100 hours. Can I just mention -- ask you in a bullet-point way just your point on this?

No. (Laughter.)

Minimum-wage increase -- generally supportive or against it?

Generally supportive. But, no, the answer is no, you can't. (Laughter.)

Look, here's the challenge. The challenge is to find out specifically what they have in mind and to explain to them areas where we can work together and can't work together. I'm pleased with our initial round of discussions. I fully understand that they're going to come out with this -- they made it very clear. And I want to work with them on issues where we can find common ground.

On immigration -- you mentioned immigration. Can you envision supporting a deal --

See, now you're getting me to negotiate with myself --

No, no, no, but this is a policy --

Same thing he's trying to do. (Laughter.) It's a classic ploy. (Laughter.)

This is about your policy, Sir, in terms of can you envision a deal in which you would agree with Democrats that would not necessarily have a majority support among Republicans --

Peter, remember the speech I gave right here in the Oval Office?

I remember several.

The one on immigration. I gave a comprehensive speech to the country from the Oval Office, prime time, about how I thought we ought to move forward on immigration. I still feel very strongly about that. And I hope that Congress will join me on a comprehensive bill, and I would hope that the majority of both parties support it.

[Former House] speaker Hastert had a policy that he would not put forward a bill that didn't have a majority support of his caucus. Is that important to you, having majority support of the Republican caucuses?

I'm interested in getting a comprehensive bill out, because I believe it is vital to solving the pressure we have on our border.

One of the interesting things that, if you notice from the recent enforcement activities that ICE took, there are a lot of people who are using forged documents to do jobs Americans are not doing. And my attitude is that there ought to be a way for people to come to this country on a temporary basis and fill those jobs in an open way, a transparent way, that doesn't cause there to be, one, a smuggling operation that's vibrant and making money, a housing operation that is illegal, and a document forgery operation that clearly is in effect.

DOJ_NMG_0107991

There is a better way to treat people, and there's a better way to deal with the issue of finding workers Americans are not doing, to fill on a temporary basis. And, therefore, there need -- and that in itself will take pressure off our border. In other words, if people feel like they can come in on a temporary, legal basis, they're not going to have to sneak in, which in itself does away with -- that in itself does away with this kind of underground industry that has sprung up.

The point I make to you on that is that it's a comprehensive reform of the immigration system that is going to make our borders more secure. I strongly believe that is important, and look forward to working with people on the way forward. It's hard for me to predict the dynamics yet on how the Congress is going to handle the immigration bill. The point I'm telling you is that I think it's vital and necessary, and this is an area where we can work together to get it done.

I'd like to come back to your first statement, because I'd like to expand a little bit. You talked about the size of the military. Colin Powell said on a Sunday show that the Army was nearly broken. Do you believe that's true? And, if so, do you feel responsible for that? Do you --

I heard -- we have been transforming our Army to make it lighter, more lethal and easier to move, and that transformation has been very important. Secondly, we have been changing our force posture around the world to reflect the threats of the 21st century, and that has been a very important reform.

I also believe that the suggestions I've heard from outside our government, plus people inside the government -- particularly, the Pentagon -- that we need to think about increasing our force structure makes sense, and I will work with Secretary Gates to do so. He's going to come back and report --

So is our Army nearly broken, or not?

The people that would know best are those in the Pentagon. I haven't heard the word "broken," but I've heard the word "stressed." I know that we need to -- and my budgetary requests will reflect what a lot of people in Congress have been saying and in the Pentagon, and that is we need to reset our military. There's no question the military has been used a lot. And the fundamental question is, will Republicans and Democrats be able to work with the administration to assure our military and the American people that we will position our military so that it is ready and able to stay engaged in a long war, and this ideological struggle?

Can I ask a hometown question?

Final question -- yes, which one, Crawford, Midland, Houston, Dallas or Washington?

Washington. Do you support a bill that would give the District of Columbia residents a vote in the House of Representatives?

This is a Fletcher question. This is a Fletcher question.

He's not asking about a specific question. We're asking about your broad view on --

Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?

I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes.

But what is your philosophical view of that? Because we've gone to Iraq to provide freedom for people in Iraq, and the people in this country --

I understand that. You're trying to get me to opine on specific legislation that may be forthcoming, and I look forward to working with Congress on that.

I'm actually asking you to opine on general --

That's my answer. (Laughter.)

-- philosophy on whether --

I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes.

Is Vice President Cheney correct, do you believe that secretary Rumsfeld was the best defense secretary?

I think he was one of the finest defense secretaries, and I said that there have been more profound change -- policy change under his leadership than at any time since the formation of the Defense Department.

Thank you.

Bush Concedes US 'not Winning' In Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

President George W. Bush publicly said on Wednesday that insurgents in Iraq had this year succeeded in fomenting sectarian violence, undermining the Iraqi government and thwarting US efforts to secure stability.

Replacing his confident assertion of October that "absolutely we are winning in Iraq", Mr Bush told The Washington Post on Tuesday: "We're not winning, we're not losing."

But the president seemed to retreat from this bleak assessment at a year-end press conference on Wednesday saying that comment "reflected the fact that we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted".

On the day that General John Abizaid, the US's top commander in the Middle East, announced his resignation, Mr Bush contrasted the optimism he had felt at the start of the year, when the Iraqis held elections, with a recognition that the insurgents had since enjoyed successes.

"The enemies of liberty...hurt our efforts to help the Iraqis rebuild their country," he said.

In the most visible sign that the administration recognises the need to radically change its military posture, Mr Bush said he wanted to increase the "permanent size of both the United States army and the United States marines".

Mr Bush said he was still considering whether he would increase troop numbers in Iraq.

His decision reflects a clear repudiation of the strategy adopted by Donald Rumsfeld, former defence secretary, to create a smaller, agile military.

The tone of the press conference reflected a hesitant president, conscious of his legacy, struggling to find a way out of Iraq and redefine his agenda after losing control of the House and Senate.

Bush Warns Of More U.S. Losses In Iraq (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, December 21, 2006

Acknowledging deepening frustration over Iraq, President Bush said Wednesday he is considering an increase in American forces and warned that next year will bring more painful U.S. losses. New Defense Secretary Robert Gates said in Baghdad that a troop surge was an obvious option.

Bush was unusually candid at a year-end news conference about U.S. setbacks and dashed hopes in the war, which has claimed the lives of more than 2,950 U.S. military members.

He said "2006 was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people. We began the year with optimism" but that faded as extremists fomented sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

"And over the course of the year they had success," the president acknowledged. "Their success hurt our efforts to help the Iraqis rebuild their country, it set back reconciliation, it kept Iraq's unity government and our coalition from establishing security and stability throughout the country."

Democrats are about to claim control of Congress and Americans are overwhelmingly unhappy about Bush's handling of the war, so the president is at a turning point as he searches for new approaches. Administration officials said Bush's remarks were intended to brace a war-weary nation for another tough year in Iraq.

The heavy cost of the war also came into focus as the Pentagon circulated a request for an additional $99.7 billion to pay for the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan. If embraced by Bush and approved by Congress, the proposal would boost this year's budget for those wars to about $170 billion.

So far, four years of war in Iraq have cost about $350 billion.

On just his third day as secretary, Gates made an unannounced visit to Baghdad to review options with senior American commanders. He said no decisions have been made.

"We discussed the obvious things," Gates told reporters. "We discussed the possibility of a surge and the potential for what it might accomplish."

DOJ_NMG_0107993

Gates said he was only beginning to determine how to reshape U.S. war policy. He also said he would confer with top Iraqi officials about what America's role should be in Iraq. Bush is awaiting Gates' recommendations before making a speech in January announcing changes in strategy and tactics.

The shift in policy is likely to be accompanied by a shuffle of top American generals in Iraq. Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, has submitted plans to go ahead with a retirement that is months overdue. And the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, has indicated he may not stay much longer than the end of this year.

Abizaid and Casey have opposed sending more troops to Iraq, and their departures could make it easier for Bush to send more soldiers to the war. One option calls for sending five or more additional combat brigades — roughly 20,000 or more troops.

Apart from any increase in Iraq, Bush said the military's overall size should be increased to relieve the heavy strain on U.S. troops, reversing the previous position of his administration during Donald Rumsfeld's Pentagon tenure. Bush also said a troop surge in Iraq would have to be for a specific mission.

His remarks appeared intended to address doubts voiced by prominent military officials who worry that sending more troops to Iraq would be ineffective and put more demands on an already-stretched U.S. military.

"There's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with the addition of more troops before, you know, I agree on that strategy," the president said.

The administration says many questions have to be answered about sending in more troops: What would be their purpose, what would they do, how long would they stay and what is the Iraqi government's view on the rules of engagement for more U.S. forces? Also, would the additional troops serve in training positions, in combat, to help civilian forces or for a combination of those roles?

"I'm not going to make predictions about what 2007 will look like in Iraq except that it's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices because the enemy is merciless and violent," the president said.

Bush was unwavering about U.S. goals for Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable," he said. "It hadn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would have. ...

"But I also don't believe most Americans want us just to get out now," the president said. "A lot of Americans understand the consequences of defeat. Retreat would embolden radicals. It would hurt the credibility of the United States."

Bush stepped back from his confident assertion two months ago that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq. Wednesday, he said, "We're not winning. We're not losing."

The president said he changed his formulation because "we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted ... and that the conditions are tough in Iraq, particularly in Baghdad."

He said his original remark, on Oct. 25, was made in the spirit that "I believe that we're going to win. I believe that — and, by the way, if I didn't think that, I wouldn't have our troops there."

Bush Asserts That Victory In Iraq Is Still 'Achievable' (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — President Bush warned Americans on Wednesday that the war in Iraq would require "difficult choices and additional sacrifices" in the coming year, but he firmly rejected the notion that the war could not be won and vowed that the United States would not be "run out of the Middle East" by extremists and radicals.

Mr. Bush, appearing somber and at times reflective during his traditional year-end news conference, conceded that 2006, which began on a note of optimism as nearly 12 million Iraqis voted in free elections, turned into "a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people." He cited "unspeakable sectarian violence," calling it "one aspect of this war that has not gone right."

But after a month in which he has been under pressure to change course in Iraq — from Democrats who want a gradual withdrawal of troops and from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose report implied that he should reframe his goals away from democracy toward mere stability — the president showed no indication that he was inclined to change goals or pull out of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0107994

"Victory in Iraq is achievable," Mr. Bush said, addressing reporters in the ornate Indian Treaty Room across the street from the White House, in a historic office building once used by the Navy. He added, "Our goal remains a free and democratic Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself and is an ally in the war on terror."

Mr. Bush also used the news conference to confirm his plans, disclosed Tuesday in an interview with The Washington Post, to propose an increase in the permanent size of both the Army and the Marines. He called the global campaign against terrorism "the calling of our generation," and he said the military needed to be beefed up to fight it.

"I want the enemy to understand that this is a tough task, but they can't run us out of the Middle East, that they can't intimidate America," Mr. Bush said.

But the president gave little hint of what he would do in Iraq. Though he has been considering proposals to send additional troops to Baghdad in the short term, Mr. Bush said he was still listening to military commanders — some of whom are said to be skeptical of a short-term increase — and had not yet made up his mind. He is expected to outline his Iraq strategy after the first of the year.

As Mr. Bush contemplates that new strategy, some advisers have been urging him to diminish public expectations by steering clear of talk about victory and of Iraq as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East. Some said his language on Wednesday was not helpful.

"Victory is not a good word to use," said Barry R. McCaffrey, a retired general who has been advising the administration and has said he believes that there is still time for Mr. Bush to turn around the situation in Iraq. "It implies that there is a military outcome in the short term that ends violence, and that's not going to happen."

Instead, the president has altered his language in another way. In the interview with The Post, he dropped his previous assertion — made before the November elections — that "we are winning" in favor of the murkier idea that the United States was neither winning nor losing. On Wednesday, he tried to explain.

"The first comment was done in this spirit: I believe that we're going to win," the president said, adding, "My comments yesterday reflected the fact that we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted, when I said it at the time, and that the conditions are tough in Iraq, particularly in Baghdad."

With Republicans having lost control of Congress after an election that was widely viewed as a referendum on the war, and polls showing public support for the war at record lows, Mr. Bush is caught in the difficult spot of coming up with a policy that will satisfy the public and Democrats, while also producing substantive change.

But his comments on Wednesday left Democrats cold.

The incoming speaker of the House, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, complained that the president gave no indication "that he is willing to make the changes needed to reverse the disastrous situation in Iraq."

A former adviser to the Democratic presidential campaign of Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts said the president owed an apology to Mr. Kerry, who proposed increasing the size of the military, only to be ridiculed by Republicans. "I think you could say that so far, in this re-evaluation process, he is only dressing up 'Stay the course,' " said the adviser, Richard C. Holbrooke, a former ambassador to the United Nations.

Some Republicans have said that until Mr. Bush gets the situation in Iraq under control, he will be unable to move forward with his domestic agenda on Capitol Hill. But the president expressed optimism on Wednesday that he could work with Democrats in 2007 — perhaps to the chagrin of some in his own party, who fear the president will cut them loose to join with the opposition on issues like Social Security, immigration and energy independence.

"You know, there's a lot of attitude here that says, 'Well, you lost the Congress, therefore you're not going to get anything done,' " Mr. Bush said. "Quite the contrary. I have an interest to get things done, and the Democrats have an interest to get something done."

Mr. Bush is not one for introspection, and he expressed little sense on Wednesday that he regretted his decisions in Iraq, other than to say, "The most painful aspect of my presidency is the fact that I know my decisions have caused young men and women to lose their lives."

Still, with just two years left in his administration, the president hinted that he was thinking about his legacy — even as he denied that it was foremost on his mind.

DOJ_NMG_0107995

"Look, everybody's trying to write the history of this administration even before it's over," Mr. Bush said. "I'm reading about George Washington still. My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it, and just do what he thinks is right, make the tough choices necessary."

Dour Bush Talks Of 'New Way Forward' (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush, saying he was still considering options for "a new way forward" in Iraq, delivered an uncharacteristically dour assessment Wednesday of the war there and called 2006 a "difficult year" in which extremists successfully thwarted efforts to establish security and stability in the country.

Appearing reflective in a year-end news conference, Bush said the optimism generated after Iraqis elected a new government last December had fallen away, as extremists undertook "a deliberate strategy to foment sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shia. And over the course of the year, they had success. Their success hurt our efforts to help the Iraqis rebuild their country."

With Bush reassessing his Iraq policy and expecting to announce changes early next month, his statements reflected a new willingness to acknowledge that the sectarian violence in Iraq has grown consistently worse and political cooperation there is flagging. He has come under intense pressure to change course in the war from Democrats, from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and because of mid-term elections that saw his party lose control of Congress.

Bush said he would work with Republicans and Democrats "and listen to ideas from every corridor" to redraw his approach. But the president also said he would not change his objective. "Our goal remains a free and democratic Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself, and is an ally in this war on terror," he said.

Moreover, he said that U.S. troops remained in Iraq because they will be successful. "Victory in Iraq is achievable," he said. "It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would have. ... But I also don't believe most Americans want us just to get out now."

Bush said he would not adjust his Iraq policies until talking with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who was sworn in on Monday and by Wednesday had landed in Baghdad to meet with U.S. commanders and others there. One option under consideration is a temporary increase in U.S. troop levels. Bush said such a surge was not certain, and that before he sends in additional troops, "there must be a specific mission that can be accomplished."

In Baghdad, Gates gave no hints as to what new strategy he preferred, but he acknowledged he and U.S. generals had discussed the possibility of a surge of U.S. forces into the Iraqi capital.

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, who has been resistant to proposals to increase troop levels, appeared to qualify his objections after meeting with Gates. "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea," he told a news conference.

"What I want to see happen is, if we do bring more American troops here, they help us progress toward our strategic objectives," Casey said.

Bush's comments on Wednesday did not satisfy senior Democratic leaders in Congress. In similar statements, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic Senate leader, and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming House speaker, said Bush did not understand the need for a more dramatic change in Iraq.

"The president seems lost within his own rhetoric," Reid said. "He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war." Reid, who has given qualified support to increasing troops in Iraq if it leads to Iraqis picking up security responsibilities, also said that Bush should follow the course that Democrats and the Iraq Study Group recommended for withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Sen. Hillary R. Clinton, D-N.Y., said on NBC's Today Show that her support for a temporary troop increase would depend on their mission.

"Everyone knows there is no military solution to the difficulties we face in Iraq," she said. "There has to be a broad-based, comprehensive approach that includes resolving some of the political issues, bringing the region together."

DOJ_NMG_0107996

Bush spoke in the Indian Treaty Room, an elaborate, marble-encrusted two-story at the top of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building next door to the White House.

Bush said he was optimistic about working on a range of issues with the Democrats who will lead Congress in January. He said he supported an increase in the minimum wage -- a proposal that is a top priority for Democrats. But Bush said he wanted to pair the increase with a cut in taxes and regulations to make it less costly for small businesses.

Efforts to link a hike in the minimum wage to tax cuts have repeatedly failed during Bush time in office, despite Republican control of Congress.

Democrats have objected to linking the wage increase to tax cuts, and Drew Hammill, a spokesman for Pelosi, said she was not interested in such an arrangement. But shortly afterward, Hammill altered his response. He said Pelosi "prefers" a bill unencumbered by tax cuts but that "House Democrats have long supported tax changes that would benefit small business" and would look at such proposals.

Still, there is strong opposition to the idea among Democrats.

"Given that nearly a decade has passed since the last minimum wage increase, no one can seriously believe that the proposed increase will harm the small business sector," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., the incoming chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee.

But Iraq dominated the 50-minute news conference, just as it has the bulk of his presidency.

Bush said that if he did not think the U.S. could accomplish its objectives in Iraq, then U.S. troops would not be there. "I want the enemy to understand that this is a tough task, but they can't run us out of the Middle East, that they can't intimidate America," he said. "They think they can. They think it's just a matter of time before America grows weary and leaves, abandons the people of Iraq, for example. And that's not going to happen."

The president also said he is "inclined to believe" that the Army and Marines must increase the size of their permanent forces.

"This war on terror is the calling of a new generation; it is the calling of our generation. ... We have an obligation to ensure our military is capable of sustaining this war over the long haul," he said. He said he had asked Gates "to determine how such an increase could take place and report back to me as quickly as possible."

White House officials had revealed on Tuesday that Bush was considering a boost in permanent force levels, and the president himself talked about the idea that day in an interview with The Washington Post.

Bush Seeks To Expand Military (BSUN/CTRIB)

By Mark Silva, Chicago Tribune

The Baltimore Sun, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As he attempts to chart a "new way forward" in Iraq, President Bush again is striving to frame the conflict there as central to a broader struggle against world terrorism -- despite analysis from inside and outside the administration that worsening sectarian violence inside Iraq is responsible for a greater share of the increasing casualties than any acts of terrorism.

Announcing today that he will order an overall expansion of the Army and Marines to better confront the "challenges" of the war on terror, and acknowledging that he is considering deploying more troops inside Iraq, the president stopped short of saying whether he will boost the U.S. deployment in Iraq as part of a new war strategy that he promises to unveil early in 2007.

"We enter this New Year clear-eyed about the challenges in Iraq," said Bush, warning Americans that the conflict there will require "additional sacrifices."

The president, who has maintained before that the U.S. is "absolutely" winning in Iraq, now offers a more sobering assessment of the war -- saying that American forces are neither winning nor losing, but still asserting that victory will be achieved. That victory, as he has defined it before, remains the promise of an Iraqi government that can govern the nation, sustain it and defend it against unrelenting violence.

"We're not succeeding as fast as I wanted," the president conceded at a news conference today, asked if he is willing to press ahead with a war that has lost support among a majority of Americans. "I am willing to follow a path that leads to victory. ... Victory in Iraq is achievable. It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would."

DOJ_NMG_0107997

Bush, conceding that the U.S. is neither winning nor losing at this stage of a war that has claimed nearly 3,000 American lives almost four years after the U.S.-led invasion that overthrew Saddam Hussein, maintained that victory is still possible.

"I believe that we're going to win," Bush asserted in the ornate old Indian Treaty Room of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building next door to the White House during his final news conference of the year. "If I didn't think that we would, I wouldn't have our troops over there."

The president, who has spent weeks consulting with military, diplomatic and political advisers as well as government leaders in Iraq, has promised to unveil a new strategy for victory in January. Saying that his new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, will "bring a fresh perspective to the Pentagon," Bush framed his ongoing "Iraq strategy review" as part of a broader mission of fighting the war on terror. Gates is visiting Iraq this week after being sworn in Monday.

"We have an obligation" to ensure that the U.S. military is capable of confronting that threat of terrorism, Bush said, announcing that the Army and Marines require an overall buildup in force and he is asking Gates to advise him how best to carry that out.

Yet the Department of Defense's own newest quarterly assessment of the situation in Iraq delivered to Congress, while citing the surging casualties of both Iraqis and coalition forces this year, has attributed the most recent uptick in violence not to terrorism but to sectarian violence inside Iraq.

"The most significant development in the Iraqi security environment was the growing role of Shi'a militants," the Pentagon analysis reported of the situation during the past three months. "It is likely that Shi'a militants were responsible for more civilian casualties than those associated with terrorist organizations. Shi'a militants were the most significant threat to the coalition presence in Baghdad and southern Iraq."

This internal assessment of violence in Iraq, which "poses a grave threat to political progress," echoes an assessment that the independent Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel appointed by Congress, issued in a recent report. The panel called the situation in Iraq "grave and deteriorating" and blamed violence there more on sectarian violence than on any terrorist acts.

Yet Bush, who has maintained that the war in Iraq is the central front in the broader conflict with terrorists, said today that, "The advance of liberty has never been easy, and Iraq is proving how hard it can be. ... I am predicting that it will take a while for the ideology of freedom to (win) over the ideology of hate. ... We will succeed in Iraq."

The president plans to spell out a detailed strategy for success in Iraq in 2007, but meanwhile used this news conference to deliver a direct message before holidays in a nation deeply divided over war.

"I'm appealing to the American people," he said. "I want them to know that I know how tough it is."

At the same time, he defiantly vowed that the U.S. will not back down in Iraq, saying of the enemy: "They think it's just a matter of time before America grows weary and leaves. ... That's not going to happen."

With some of the president's advisers privately proposing a "surge" of 20,000 or more additional troops in Iraq to confront the violence there, particularly in Baghdad, Bush insisted today that he has not decided if the force buildup should include an additional deployment of troops inside Iraq. He also insisted that there is no divide between him and military leaders who may be advising against a surge in forces.

"That's a dangerous hypothetical question," Bush said. "Let me wait and gather all the recommendations.

"I haven't made up my mind yet about more troops," he said. "Hypothetical questions -- I'm not going to answer those today. ... I will tell you, we are looking at all options, and one of those options is ... more troops." But, he added, "there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops before I agree."

The president appeared today in a regal room where President Eisenhower staged his first televised news conference, a hall with marbled walls and tiled floors ringed with wrought-iron railings on the balcony of the second floor. This president has never staged a press conference here.

But with the White House's main floor decorated for Christmas, this stately room provided a setting for what will likely be the last news conference of the year. Bush plans to spend the Christmas holiday weekend at Camp David and then head to his Texas ranch for a week.

DOJ_NMG_0107998

Bush, asked if he has undergone any "painful realization" about the war during the past, admittedly difficult year, said: "The most painful aspect of my presidency has been knowing that young men and woman have died in combat. ... When you ask about pain, that's pain."

Bush Seeks To Bolster Support For Sustained Iraq Engagement (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said the U.S. will have to make "additional sacrifices" in Iraq, stepping up an administration push to rally support for what it says will be an open-ended and costly U.S. presence there.

Speaking to reporters at the White House, Mr. Bush backed away from earlier assertions the U.S. was winning in Iraq and emphasized that violence is likely to continue well into the future. Success in Iraq and the broader war on terror is going to require a "sustained commitment" from the American public and his successor, Mr. Bush said.

The president said he asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates, now in Baghdad reviewing American military strategy, to devise plans for permanently increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps. Mr. Bush said the expansion was needed to ensure the armed forces, strained by deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, have sufficient manpower for the long war against Islamic extremists around the world.

"Securing this peace for the future is going to require a sustained commitment from the American people and our military," Mr. Bush said. "The next president, whoever the person is, will have the same charge, the same obligations to deal with terrorists so they don't hurt us, and to help young democracies survive the threats of radicalism and extremism."

Mr. Bush's comments highlighted the administration's search for a long-term strategy that is sustainable politically at a time when a majority of Americans have concluded the U.S. is losing in Iraq.

The president's belief that U.S. forces need to remain in Iraq indefinitely will face opposition from Congress's coming Democratic leaders, who want to see U.S. troops begin leaving Iraq early next year. Democrats won control of Congress in the midterm elections largely because of voter anger over how the administration handled Iraq. Many lawmakers from both parties assumed the White House would begin looking for a way out of Iraq to prevent further political damage. Instead, the White House has signaled it largely will maintain the current policy and may even bet heavily that Iraq can still be won by temporarily sending up to 20,000 more troops.

Mr. Bush acknowledged in March that the war in Iraq was likely to extend beyond his final two years in office, saying "future presidents" would be charged with determining when U.S. forces finally withdrew.

But in recent days Mr. Bush and other senior officials have stepped up efforts to persuade Americans to support what the administration envisions as an open-ended U.S. presence in Iraq -- and one that is likely to grow. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that the U.S. was at "the beginning of a long struggle, not the end of it" and emphasized it would take decades to make a final determination whether the U.S. mission in Iraq had succeeded.

The administration's rhetorical shift comes as Mr. Bush prepares to address the country early next year, laying out a way forward in Iraq. Administration officials say Mr. Bush is leaning toward ordering the temporary deployment of tens of thousands of troops in a bid to stabilize Iraq, though Mr. Bush said yesterday he hadn't made a decision.

It is far from certain that the administration will be able to persuade the public to be patient, since the war has lasted longer -- and been costlier in terms of lives and material resources -- than senior officials initially led the nation to expect. Americans have grown more pessimistic on the subject, pulling Mr. Bush's approval rating down to 34%, his lowest ever in The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll.

The White House's belief that American forces need to remain in Iraq indefinitely will also spark tension with the coming Democratic leadership of the House and Senate. Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, criticized the president for failing to "understand the need for urgent change in Iraq."

Administration officials acknowledge there is no guarantee the U.S. will be able to end Iraq's civil war, regardless of how many troops are deployed.

DOJ_NMG_0107999

Senior military commanders in the Pentagon have quietly warned that a surge of U.S. forces must be part of a long-term strategy to reinforce political progress in Iraq.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has told associates U.S. troop levels in Iraq should only be increased if Iraqi political leaders reach agreements about sharing Iraq's oil revenue and isolating Shiite extremists.

Bush Concedes U.S. Not Ready For Iraq (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

President Bush yesterday conceded that U.S. forces were inadequately prepared to handle sectarian violence that broke out in Iraq after the fall of Baghdad, but said any increase in American troops to establish security there must be tied to a specific mission "that can be accomplished."

The president also acknowledged that 2006 "was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people" and that "the enemies of liberty ... carried out a deliberate strategy to foment sectarian violence."

During an hourlong press conference in which Mr. Bush was both reflective and, at times, gloomy, the president called the war in Iraq "the beginning of a conflict between competing ideologies" and urged Congress to put aside partisanship for the long-term protection of the American people.

"I believe the next president, whoever the person is, will have the same charge, the same obligations to deal with terrorists so they don't hurt us and to help young democracies survive the threats of radicalism and extremism," the president said in the Indian Treaty Room of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building.

Mr. Bush's year-end press conference came as Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates made his first visit to Iraq since being sworn in Monday. The president has asked his new Pentagon chief to report to him as quickly as possible on long-term plans to enlarge the size of the Army and Marine Corps, an idea Mr. Bush said he supports.

Meanwhile yesterday, the Pentagon planned to ask the White House for $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, which would push the total cost to taxpayers to more than $500 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

Although Mr. Bush said he supports increasing the Army and Marines, he said he has not decided whether to add U.S. troops in Iraq in hopes of controlling sectarian violence that has made this year one of the most deadly of the nearly four-year war.

"We're looking at all options, and one of those options, of course, is increasing more troops. But in order to do so, there must be a specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops," he said.

Democrats wasted little time in condemning the president's comments.

"The president gave no indication in his press conference today that he is willing to make the changes needed to reverse the disastrous situation in Iraq," House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi said. "Unless there is a fundamental change in policy and in the mission of our troops in support of that policy, events in Iraq are unlikely to improve."

Said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid: "Unfortunately, it is troubling to see that he still does not understand the need for urgent change in Iraq. ... Democrats and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have both laid down a road map for the president to begin the withdrawal of American troops from the civil war in Iraq. It is now up to the president to follow that course."

Mr. Bush said he is still mulling his options as he prepares to announce early next month a change in strategy for the war in Iraq and is compiling recommendations from a slew of sources, including the bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana, which called for withdrawal of combat troops by early 2008.

Mr. Bush again expressed optimism that the United States can "win" in Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable. It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would have. ... But I also don't believe most Americans want us just to get out now. A lot of Americans understand the consequences of retreat," he said.

But the president was somber when asked about his legacy, breaking from his normal assertion that history will judge him well.

DOJ_NMG_0108000

"It's going to take awhile for people to ... determine whether or not the decisions made during the eight years I was president have affected history in a positive way," he said.

Mr. Bush also looked ahead to the long-term needs of the military, saying that although he still supports a light, agile Army, "that doesn't necessarily preclude increasing end strength for the Army and the Marines."

"The reason why I'm inclined to believe this is a good idea is because I understand that we're going to be in a long struggle against radicals and extremists, and we must make sure that our military has the capability to stay in the fight for a long period of time," he said.

That move is a break with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's push to build a lighter, more agile military. Mr. Rumsfeld took office under orders from Mr. Bush to transform the military for 21st-century threats, and the former secretary first moved to cut two divisions, from 10 to eight, a plan shelved after the September 11 attacks.

As the war on terrorism ground on, critics emerged again to say the Army had grown too small to fight two wars and keep other global commitments. Mr. Rumsfeld responded by authorizing 30,000 more soldiers, but refused to recommend it be put into law as "end strength."

He also moved to make the Army more agile by breaking down the division organization into combat brigade teams, which trained and deployed with their own support groups instead of joining up with them before deployment.

Contention Increases On Troop Numbers (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

The debate over sending more U.S. troops to Iraq intensified yesterday as President Bush signaled that he will listen but not necessarily defer to balky military officers, while Gen. John P. Abizaid, his top Middle East commander and a leading skeptic of a so-called surge, announced his retirement.

At an end-of-the-year news conference, Bush said he agrees with generals "that there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished" before he decides to dispatch an additional 15,000 to 30,000 troops to the war zone. But he declined to repeat his usual formulation that he will heed his commanders on the ground when it comes to troop levels.

Bush sought to use the 52-minute session, held in the ornate Indian Treaty Room in a building adjacent to the White House, to sum up what he called "a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people" and reassure the American public that "we enter this new year clear-eyed about the challenges in Iraq." Asked about his comment to The Washington Post this week that the United States is neither winning nor losing the war, Bush pivoted forward. "Victory in Iraq is achievable," he said.

The tension between the White House and the Joint Chiefs of Staff over the proposed troop increase has come to dominate the administration's post-election search for a new strategy in Iraq. The uniformed leadership has opposed sending additional forces without a clear mission, seeing the idea as ill-formed and driven by a desire in the White House to do something different even without a defined purpose.

Abizaid's announcement amid that debate could shift the dynamics. His retirement in March had been expected, given that he has led the U.S. Central Command longer than any predecessor and had already extended his assignment at the request of then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. But Abizaid has been a forceful voice of doubt about the utility of a surge, and his imminent departure could make it easier for the White House to shift direction.

During a news conference in Baghdad alongside newly installed Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Abizaid declined to discuss troop levels except to say "all options are on the table," and he characterized his retirement as appropriate. "No decision that anybody makes in a position like this is ever totally their decision," he said, "but I think the time is right, and it has nothing to do with dissatisfaction."

The internal struggle over troop levels in Iraq has exposed a schism between civilian and military leadership 45 months into a war that, at the moment, has no end in sight. Testifying before a Senate committee Nov. 15, Abizaid bluntly rejected the surge option, saying: "I do not believe that more American troops right now is the solution to the problem. I believe that the troop levels need to stay where they are." Other generals have been equally resistant in public and private comments.

DOJ_NMG_0108001

Bush has traditionally paid public deference to the generals, saying any decisions on moving U.S. forces in the region would depend on their views. At a Chicago news conference in July, for instance, Bush said he would yield to Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the Iraq commander.

"General Casey will make the decisions as to how many troops we have there," Bush said, adding: "He'll decide how best to achieve victory and the troop levels necessary to do so. I've spent a lot of time talking to him about troop levels. And I've told him this: I said, 'You decide, General.' "

By yesterday, however, Bush indicated that he will not necessarily let military leaders decide, ducking a question about whether he would overrule them. "The opinion of my commanders is very important," he said. "They are bright, capable, smart people whose opinion matters to me a lot." He added: "I agree with them that there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with the addition of more troops before I agree on that strategy."

A senior aide said later that Bush would not let the military decide the matter. "He's never left the decision to commanders," said the aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity so Bush's comments would be the only ones on the record. "He is the commander in chief. But he has said he will listen to those commanders when making these decisions. That hasn't changed."

As he consults with the Joint Chiefs on troop levels in Iraq, Bush has tried to address their broader concern about the overstretched armed forces. He told The Post on Tuesday that he plans to expand the size of the Army and Marines and repeated that intention yesterday while denying that his decision amounted to a repudiation of Rumsfeld's efforts to build a lighter, more agile military.

On his first tour of Iraq yesterday, Gates said "we're just beginning that process" of figuring out how much to expand ground forces overall. But he cautioned that the long-term project was not related to the immediate question of what to do in Iraq. "An increase in the size of the Army today really won't show up for some period of time," Gates said.

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), wrapping up his own visit to Iraq, said a surge might be helpful in Anbar, the western province that has been a haven for al-Qaeda. "But in Baghdad," he told reporters from Kuwait, "it's not going to help unless the Iraqis decide that they're going to get their act together and stop sectarian violence."

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said Bush's latest remarks indicate that he has not come to grips with the need for urgent change in Iraq. "The president seems lost within his own rhetoric," Reid said in a statement. "He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war."

Bush argued that failure in Iraq would be an even worse result and expressed confidence that many Americans "understand the consequences of retreat." As he prepared to begin his holiday break at Camp David and his ranch in Crawford, Tex., he ruminated in response to questions on the difficulty of wartime leadership but said he harbors no doubts about his decision to invade Iraq in 2003. "The most painful aspect of the presidency," he said, "is the fact that I know my decisions have caused young men and women to lose their lives."

An antiwar group reacted angrily to the comments.

"I know that my son's life was wasted, thrown away like it was nothing," Michelle Deford, whose son, Army Sgt. David Johnson, was killed in Iraq in 2004, said in a statement released by Gold Star Families Speak Out. "What we need to do is bring the rest of our sons and daughters home now."

Bush: 'Additional Sacrifices' In Iraq Required In 2007 (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a sober, end-of-the-year news conference Wednesday, President Bush said the "brutal" amount of violence in Baghdad must be prevented from spreading if the United States' mission in Iraq is to succeed.

"I'm not going to make predictions about what 2007 will look like in Iraq, except that it's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices because the enemy is merciless and violent," Bush said.

Bush acknowledged that U.S. forces in Iraq are "not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted," but he said he has not made up his mind on a new strategy for the war.

DOJ_NMG_0108002

He said 2006 "was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people." He said insurgent attacks "kept Iraq's unity government and our coalition from establishing security and stability."

Bush confirmed that one option he is considering is sending tens of thousands of additional troops to Iraq to try to establish control in key areas, particularly Baghdad.

The president said that before he would pursue such a strategy, he and his military planners would have to agree on a "specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops."

"We've got to help the (Iraqi) government prevent (violence) from spreading in order to be successful," he said. Bush is likely to outline his new Iraq strategy in the first weeks of 2007.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., issued a statement saying Bush "still does not understand the need for urgent change in Iraq. … He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war."

As Bush spoke, his new Defense secretary, Robert Gates, was in Iraq discussing with commanders the possibility of increasing U.S. troop numbers.

IRAQ: Gates discusses possible troop proposal

The Pentagon, meanwhile, wants the White House to seek an additional $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to information provided to the Associated Press. The information was provided by a person familiar with the proposal who asked for anonymity because that person was not authorized to release the information.

The request, if accepted by Bush and approved by Congress, would boost this year's spending for the two wars to about $170 billion. The non-partisan Congressional Research Service has estimated the costs of Iraq, Afghanistan and overall anti-terrorism efforts have topped $500 billion.

Bush, ending a year in which Democrats won control of Congress in the November elections, took more than a dozen questions in the nearly hour-long session. "I'm going to sprint to the finish," he said of the remaining two years of his second term.

Other highlights:

•Bush said U.S. forces are "going to win" in Iraq, despite comments on Tuesday to The Washington Post in which he said for the first time that the United States is not winning or losing the war. The president said that when he emphatically said earlier this year that the United States was "absolutely winning," he meant to convey his confidence in an ultimate victory.

•Bush said he hopes for bipartisan agreements with Congress on Social Security and immigration reform, as well as renewed efforts to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

The president said he would support one top Democratic priority — a $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage — but only if it was accompanied by tax and regulatory relief for small businesses.

•Asked about the pregnancy of Mary Cheney, the gay daughter of Vice President Cheney, Bush said: "I know Mary, and I like her, and I know she is going to be a fine, loving mother."

U.S. Commanders Wary Of Gates Proposal (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 21, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert Gates found American commanders wary of a proposal to rush more U.S. troops to Iraq as he visited the war-ravaged country Wednesday.

President Bush is considering that idea and others in his search for a fresh path in a 3 1/2-plus year war that has no end in sight and has lost the support of the American public.

On just his third day in charge of the Pentagon, Gates made the unannounced trip with the administration under intense pressure to forge a new strategy — and just hours after the president conceded, for the first time, that the U.S. is not winning the conflict.

After meeting with top U.S. generals at Camp Victory, Gates acknowledged concerns that rushing thousands more American troops to the battlefront could allow the Iraqis to slow their effort take control of the country. He said no decisions have been made.

DOJ_NMG_0108003

"It's clearly a consideration," Gates said of how an infusion of American troops might affect Iraqi leaders. "I think that the commanders out here have expressed a concern about that."

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq and one of several generals who met with Gates, said he supports boosting troop levels only when there is a specific purpose for their deployment. Other military leaders have expressed uncertainty over the purpose and results of injecting more troops.

"I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea, but what I want to see happen is when, if we do bring more American troops here, they help us progress to our strategic objectives," Casey told reporters during a news conference with Gates and other military leaders.

Gen. John Abizaid, top U.S. commander in the Middle East, sounded a more favorable tone. The military, he said, is "looking at every possible thing that might influence the situation to make Baghdad in particular more secure."

Bush said Wednesday he is considering sending more troops to Iraq but has not made up his mind. No timetables or troop totals have been mentioned publicly, but by some accounts roughly 20,000 troops would be added to the 140,000 already there.

The president is expected to announce his decisions next month — when a new Congress convenes, controlled by Democrats ready to make the war their top concern.

Echoing some of his commanders' questions about a troop surge, Bush said, "In order to do so, there must be a specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops."

Bush is considering choices ranging from a short-term increase of thousands of troops to bring the escalating violence in Baghdad and Anbar province under control, to removing combat U.S. forces and accelerating the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces. More than one-third of the U.S. troops in Iraq are combat forces.

Gates, on his third day on the job, said he would not form a judgment until he has spoken to Iraqi leaders, which he is scheduled to do during his visit.

Also on the trip was Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, plus officials from the State Department, the National Security Council and the White House.

The timing of Gates' trip, and his entourage, underscored how important the administration believes it is to set a new direction in the Iraq war.

Gates was noncommittal when asked whether the sectarian violence in Baghdad can be quashed without taking action against the Mahdi Army of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Sadr is a main supporter of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Gates said he is looking for ways to help the Iraqi government bring down the violence and "that will be a principle theme of discussions."

Bush and Gates also said they are considering increasing the overall size of the U.S. military following recent complaints by top generals that the forces have been stretched too thin by the worldwide campaign against terrorists. They used no figures, but Bush said he was asking Gates to produce a plan for the expansion.

Gates said he was just starting to study that idea. He expressed concern that the Army and Marine Corps are not large enough to face challenges of the 21st century that might include threats in Iran and North Korea, as well as natural disasters.

The debate over increasing troops has continued for months, as the military has been struggling to quell the escalating violence — particularly sectarian bloodshed — in Iraq. The war has claimed more than 2,950 U.S. casualties and cost roughly $350 billion.

Some top U.S. commanders have been wary of even a short-term troop increase, saying it might bring only a temporary respite to the violence while confronting the U.S. with shortages of fresh troops in the future.

Military leaders are also considering an increase in the number of American advisers for Iraqi security forces.

Gates Talks Over Options With U.S. Commanders In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108004

BAGHDAD, Dec. 20 -- Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates spent his third day as Pentagon chief in an intense series of discussions with top U.S. military commanders about next steps in Iraq, but said he wouldn't move toward any conclusions until he had talked with senior Iraqi officials.

"We discussed the obvious things," Gates said after meeting with Gen. John P. Abizaid, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and other top Army generals here. "We discussed the possibility of a surge and the potential for what it might accomplish." In recent days the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the White House have debated whether to conduct such a "surge," or short-term escalation of U.S. troops in Iraq, in an effort to bring more security to the country's turbulent capital, Baghdad.

Appearing relaxed but looking funereal in a black suit, white shirt and dark tie, Gates said he had received "candid, honest, firsthand assessments" from senior officers he met with here Wednesday.

"This trip is part of the overall assessment that the president asked me to do," he said. Underscoring that focus, Gates was accompanied on his aircraft by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as well as officials from the State Department, the staff of Vice President Cheney and the National Security Council. Defense secretaries rarely travel with the chairman of the Joint Chiefs or with such a broad delegation of officials from other agencies.

Abizaid and Casey, who have differed on a troop increase, appeared to engage in a bit of military rope-a-dope in which each seemed to embrace the other's stance. Abizaid, long known inside the military for his opposition to boosting the U.S. troop presence here, said flatly: "Absolutely every option is on the table." Casey, his immediate subordinate and old friend, who is said to favor an increase, said, "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea" -- if, he added, sending additional troops would help achieve strategic objectives.

There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Advocates of a short, sharp increase say an additional 20,000 to 30,000 might help quell the violence that is ripping apart Baghdad, while some top U.S. military officers caution that a smaller surge last summer turned out to be ineffective.

Gates rejected the notion that he is the "swing vote" in the discussion, although he stands between a Joint Chiefs of Staff extremely skeptical of a troop surge and many officials at the White House who appear to favor it. "Let me be very clear, I am not the swing vote," he said. "There is only one vote that matters, and that is the president of the United States."

A former CIA chief, Gates was last in Iraq in early September as a member of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan commission on Iraq policy led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.)

"I didn't dream at that time that I would have some responsibility for what goes forward," he said Wednesday.

Gates left that group after being nominated in early November to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary. About a month after he left, the group issued a scathing report that depicted the situation in Iraq in far bleaker terms than the Bush administration had been using.

The group concluded that the security situation was grave and deteriorating, that U.S. officials sometimes didn't understand the facts of the matter, and that U.S. policy was failing. That bleak diagnosis appears to have altered the debate over Iraq, with few people now claiming that "steady progress" is being made, as Bush administration officials did for several years.

The Iraq Study Group also issued 79 recommendations calling for the United States to step up diplomacy in the Middle East and to transform the U.S. military effort in Iraq from one focused on combat to one focused on training and advising Iraqi forces. This change, it argued, should enable the U.S. military to withdraw most of its combat brigades from Iraq by early 2008.

Since the report was issued, its recommendations have received only a lukewarm response, both from the White House and from members of Congress. However, Gates's presence at the Pentagon, and his ability there to implement some of the recommendations almost immediately, may give the report a boost when Congress meets in a few weeks to resume its review of the Iraq war.

Coleman Says He's Against Sending More Troops To Iraq (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Norm Coleman, following a two-day trip to Iraq, said Wednesday he opposes a plan President Bush is considering for a short-term surge of U.S. troops there.

DOJ_NMG_0108005

At the same time, Coleman said, he supports Bush's call this week for the U.S. to increase its overall number of troops to help a taxed military fight the global war on terror.

"I would not support a massive increase in troops in Baghdad," Coleman, R-Minn., said from Bahrain, on his way back to the United States. "I think it would create more targets, I think we'd put more life at risk."

He added that he hadn't heard anything in talks with U.S. military officials that led him to believe extra troops would solve problems there.

But he agreed that the United States needs more troops overall.

"I think our military is stretched too thin," Coleman said. "We need more soldiers so we're not taking these citizen-soldiers that we have and calling them back every year for another extended tour of duty. We need a larger army because we live in a very dangerous world."

Coleman, who traveled to Iraq with Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., said that they told Iraqi officials that they needed to stem the sectarian violence.

Coleman said that the U.S. should set a deadline for the Iraqi government, requiring Iraq to meet certain benchmarks, and that the U.S. should reposition its troops if those benchmarks are not reached.

"I anticipate we will be in Iraq for a long time, we're going to be in the Middle East for a long time," Coleman said. "But we can't be on the front line, we don't need to be patrolling the streets of Fallujah." He said that U.S. forces could move to a secondary position - and move toward that more quickly if the Iraqis don't make progress on reconciliation.

Coleman said he did not cross paths with Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who is in Iraq now. It was Coleman's second trip to Iraq.

Meanwhile, Sen.-elect Amy Klobuchar, D-Minn., appearing on Minnesota Public Radio's "Midday" program Wednesday, said she also opposes increasing troops in Iraq.

"The solution to this is not more boots on the ground," she said. "The answer to me is a different way of looking at this, which is to transition to Iraqi authority" - and to have Congress do a better oversight job of contracts.

On increasing the permanent size of the military, Klobuchar said, "I do think we're going to need to expand so we don't tax these people to the point they can't do their jobs. That's what's been happening and it's not been fair to them."

Bush's Move To Supersize US Military (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

Expanding the size of US armed forces could be an expensive and lengthy task - in essence, a redoubling of the national effort to grapple with the challenge posed by Islamic extremism.

The move would be irrelevant in the Iraq war, say some critics, because by the time more troops are recruited, trained, and deployed, the conflict there will probably be set in its course.

But in calling for such an increase, President Bush said the US military must be positioned to deal with terrorists for a generation to come.

"It's the calling of our time," he said at a press conference Wednesday.

Mr. Bush has not specified the degree to which he believes the Army and Marine Corps should increase. New Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, currently in Iraq, first must propose a plan that includes numbers and estimated cost, Bush said at his news conference and in an earlier interview with The Washington Post.

If approved by Bush, the plan will then be tucked into the budget the administration will submit to Congress early next year.

Currently, the Army has an authorized strength of some 514,000 troops, with about 30,000 of that total a temporary rise approved by Congress in the wake of the 9/11 attacks. The Marine Corps has 180,000 personnel.

Bush was careful to note that he was not telegraphing an increase in troops in Iraq by asking for an overall larger US ground force. The administration's new strategy to fight rising violence there won't be unveiled until early next year.

Instead, Bush billed a larger US military as essential for the security of today's children and their children.

DOJ_NMG_0108006

"Securing this peaceful future is going to require a sustained commitment from the American people and our military," said Bush. "We have an obligation to ensure our military is capable of sustaining this war over the long haul and performing the many tasks that we ask of them."

Ground forces may not be as glamorous as high-tech weaponry, but they are expensive nonetheless. Each increment of 10,000 soldiers added to the Army costs just a tick over $1 billion, according to a service estimate.

Thus, adding 30,000 troops a year for two years, as proposed by a recent American Enterprise Institute study co-written by military expert Robert Kagan, would add more than $6 billion to the military budget at a time when the cost of the Iraq conflict is exceeding $6 billion per month.

In addition, more troops mean more long-term spending on equipment, training, and future benefits, says Gordon Adams, senior White House official for national security budgeting under President Bill Clinton.

"At more than $500 billion a year, we are already overspending on defense," says Mr. Adams, now a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Any new forces would probably not be ready in time for use in the Iraq conflict, says Adams. It would take at least two years to get them ready. By then, events in Baghdad would have already determined whether the country has split apart or whether an Iraqi government has managed to establish security. The US is likely to be withdrawing from Iraq in two years, according to Adams.

An overall troop increase "is not about Iraq," he says. "It's about militarizing our national-security policy for the long war."

The White House, however, has some reason to believe that a call for a larger military may not be overly controversial. In the past, Democrats in Congress have called for such a move. In part, this reflects their criticism that the war in Iraq has been prosecuted with too few US troops, and that the pace of rotations in and out of Iraq is such that the Army is now close to breaking.

For instance, Rep. Ike Skelton (D) of Missouri, who will chair the House Armed Services Committee in the next Congress, has long supported a larger military as a means of breaking the deployment cycle of one year in Iraq, one year at home, and then another deployment.

Democrats remain wary, however, that Bush's call for a larger military is a means to make more politically palatable a separate decision to increase troop strength in Iraq. That is a move many of them oppose.

"More troops would get us in deeper and is a military response to a political problem," said Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, incoming Senate Armed Services chairman, in a statement.

Enlarging Military Poses Challenge (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush's plan to enlarge the Army and Marine Corps responds to pleas from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill, but finding more recruits will be expensive and challenging and have little immediate impact on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In a news conference Wednesday, the president said he has asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates to look into adding more troops to the nearly 1.4 million uniformed personnel on active duty — a force which has been strained by the two wars.

Bush also said he remains undecided on whether to send more troops to Iraq and expects to announce that decision early next year.

Bush's desire to expand the services — an abrupt turnaround — was cheered Wednesday by lawmakers and military analysts. They agreed, though, that boosting troop levels is costly and time-consuming and will do little to help in Iraq anytime soon.

"To get to the kind of levels both services want will be five to 10 years," said Anthony Cordesman, a national security expert with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "And by then the Iraq war on one level or the other will be over."

According to service officials, the Army wants to expand its force of 507,000 soldiers by 20,000 to 30,000, while the Marine Corps would like to add 5,000 to its nearly 180,000 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0108007

The unpopular war in Iraq — where more than 2,950 American troops have already died — complicates the task of finding more recruits and retaining current troops.

To find new troops, the military will have to hire more recruiters and offer incentives like increased bonuses and higher salaries. In recent years, it has accepted more recruits with minor criminal records and with lower scores on aptitude tests.

Once the recruits are found, the military must train and equip them, which takes months. Other expenses will come from additional health care and support programs for families.

"It takes a long time to train trigger-pullers. And that's what we need — more trigger-pullers," said retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, former assistant vice chief of staff for the Army.

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, increasing the Army by 40,000 troops would cost $2.6 billion the first year and more than $4 billion annually to maintain.

The estimate is similar to one provided by Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker, who says the service budget jumps $1.2 billion for every additional 10,000 soldiers. Schoomaker says the Army can add up to 7,000 troops per year.

There are about 6,700 recruiters trying to sign up 80,000 new active duty soldiers for the 2007 budget year, which began last October. Roughly 1,800 recruiters are working to sign up 35,000 for the Army Reserves for the same period, officials said.

To accomplish additional growth, the service will need to sweeten incentives. The Army failed to meet its recruiting goal in the 2005 budget year for the first time since 1999, but met its goal in 2006 after adding recruiters and incentives for new enlistees.

The Pentagon also will have to budget for the additional troops at a time of rising health care costs and an overall budget crunch caused in part by Iraq and Afghanistan, which cost $120 billion last year and are likely to get more expensive.

"If the president doesn't put forward a plan to pay for this in his annual budget request then this announcement is meaningless," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Armed Services Committee and longtime advocate of a bigger force.

So far, Congress has provided about $450 billion for the Pentagon for 2007. That includes $70 billion for the wars, but it excludes another $100 billion the military wants to request for additional war costs.

Last week, Schoomaker said the Army will break without more soldiers, but he had previously opposed congressional mandates to add more troops. He had argued the cost would overburden the Army's budget. But retired Pentagon officials say it doesn't have be an either-or situation if there is the political will to do it.

"You can certainly do it, but it takes time and it takes resources," said Les Brownlee, former acting Army secretary.

One reason adding several thousand troops would make a difference in the massive military is the types of jobs they do.

Only a fraction of the Army and Marines available are the kind needed in Iraq — combat infantry troops that can conduct security patrols and staff checkpoints. Of the 140,000 now in Iraq, just over one-third are combat forces.

As a result, many people serve repeated tours there and heavily used units must scramble to replace or fix battle-damaged equipment.

Gates' predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, staunchly opposed increasing the size of the force because of the cost. Instead, Rumsfeld advocated reorganizing the Army into small, more flexible units that would rely less on manpower and more on technology.

Bush sided with Rumsfeld until his departure last week.

"It's so frustrating to me we have to be four years into a war with the Marine Corps and Army on the verge of breaking that we decide we need more Army and Marines," said retired Maj. Gen. Robert Scales, former commandant of the Army War College.

Cost, Effort, Time Of Military Expansion Plan Likely To Have 'Enormous' Impact (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Meeting President Bush's goal of a larger Army and Marine Corps will require more time and money to recruit volunteers, retain the officers needed to lead them and outfit new units.

DOJ_NMG_0108008

Bush said Wednesday that he asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates to quickly come up with a plan for expanding U.S. ground forces, not just for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan but for the larger struggle against what he called "extremists and radicals." He pledged to work with Congress "to see that this becomes a reality."

The Pentagon has increased incentives and lowered standards in recent years to keep the military at its current size, particularly as recruiting fell short of goals. Enlarging the military will require more of that, experts say.

"It's not going to be easy, but it's certainly doable," says Bernard Rostker, a military manpower expert at the RAND Corp., a private advisory firm that often writes reports for the Pentagon.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said last month that it would take two years to recruit, train and equip a new division. Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri and Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, Democrats on the House and Senate armed services committees, say the extra 10,000 troops alone would cost the Pentagon about $1.2 billion a year.

The Iraq war's unpopularity is another challenge for recruiters, says Andrew Bacevich, a retired Army colonel and professor at Boston University. That adds to the costs of getting more people to enlist, he says.

"You would have to buy the additional volunteers by offering bonuses and educational benefits, and they would be bought at a substantial price," Bacevich says. "Even apart from the lengthy period of time this project would take to bring to fruition, the impact on the defense budget is going to be enormous."

Members of the Army and Marine Corps make up 97% — 2,852 — of the U.S. troops killed in Iraq, records show.

In 2005, the Army fell 8% short of its annual goal of 80,000 recruits. After adding recruiting incentives, it met that goal this year, records show. The Marines met their annual goal of about 32,000 recruits both years. This year, the Army has offered a series of bonuses for recruits and soldiers who re-enlist. They include:

•A maximum of $40,000 for Army recruits, which is double the previous $20,000 recruit bonus.

•An extra $1,000 bonus for high school seniors who join.

•A $2,000 referral bonus for soldiers and retirees who persuade friends or relatives to join. That's double the previous $1,000 bonus.

The Army also raised the age limit for recruits from 34 to 41. In October 2005, the Army also started taking more recruits who scored in the lowest brackets of the service's aptitude test, doubling the percentage of those recruits from 2% to 4%. The Army had the 2% limit since the 1980s.

That's not necessarily a problem, says David Armor, a former Pentagon manpower official in the Reagan administration.

"There are lots of jobs in the military that can use persons with average skills," says Armor, a professor at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va.

Leaned On As Never Before, Reservists Weigh Re-enlistment (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sgt. Vic Blazier and his wife, Capt. Carla Blazier, were sent to war in 2003, leaving an infant and a toddler with a grandfather who died while the couple served in Iraq.

The ex-Army reservists from Marion, Ohio, had become civilian soldiers out of patriotism. But the sacrifice proved overwhelming.

After a decade of service, she resigned her commission as an officer in late 2004 after a year in Iraq. He returned home on hardship leave in late 2003 after his father died. Last year he passed up re-enlistment and joined Iraq Veterans Against the War.

The Blaziers are part of what military experts see as a pattern as the Pentagon seeks to increase the burden on the Army's two reserve components, the Reserve and National Guard. Torn between family and the call to duty, many are taking a hard look at military commitment and choosing family when re-enlistment time arrives.

"I do a lot of volunteering. When you miss two birthdays, you try to make up for them," said Carla Blazier, 35, who joined the Reserves in 1993 as a software expert on a career path, but now puts family first. "I try to stay very involved and active in my children's life because I missed that year."

DOJ_NMG_0108009

Those deciding whether to remain in the Guard and Reserve must take into account the possibility that they'd have to serve longer and more frequently on active duty than they do now. Under current mobilization policies, part-time troops can be called on to serve involuntarily on active duty for no more than 24 months during a five-year period. Army officials want the Pentagon to lift those restrictions so that National Guard and Reserve troops can be pressed into service more often; specifics remain to be worked out.

National Guard and Reserve troops called for service in Iraq usually spend about six months training, then a year in Iraq.

"We're not close to burnout, but we're at an important point and we need to monitor the situation very closely," said Christine E. Wormuth of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, who authored a study on the future of the Guard and Reserves. "There is a recognition that you can't keep using the reserve component the way we've used it in the past three years."

Carla Blazier said that about half the 120 enlisted soldiers in her company didn't re-enlist or just stopped coming to drills.

It's the same story in Harlingen, Texas, near the Mexico border. The 100 soldiers in the 812th Quartermaster Company, an Army Reserve unit, are still fresh from a deployment in Iraq. Roughly 25 percent to 35 percent are considering getting out, said Sgt. Maj. William S. Patterson, the unit administrator.

Some are eager to rekindle civilian jobs, threatened by their long absences. Others want to complete their education, said Patterson, a Vietnam veteran.

"These people want to get on track with their lives," he said.

A twice-deployed member of the unit with a wife and two sons, Staff Sgt. Noel Cortez decided that it was time to "take a break" from the Reserves after seeing the hardship that his absences imposed on his family.

"I wasn't there for a whole year and I missed a whole lot," said Cortez, who plans to attend college in January and become a nurse. "I don't want to go through it again and I don't want them to go through it again."

The trend, military analysts said, certainly isn't a wholesale mutiny from the Reserve and Guard.

Officials at Fort Worth Naval Air Station, the nation's largest joint reserve base, see no evidence of manpower erosion or sagging morale among the more than 20 major units at the base, despite multiple deployments involving more than 4,000 guardsmen and reservists.

"I don't know anybody who says, `This is just too much for me that I've got to leave,'" said Col. Kevin Pottinger, the commander of the 301st Fighter Wing. "My problem is, quite honestly, I've got people who want to go (overseas) and I'm trying to hold people back."

Still, the nation's 522,000-member Army Reserve and National Guard force shows signs of strain from repeated assignments. The assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs, Thomas F. Hall, describes the balancing act as a "three-legged stool": the soldier, the family, the civilian employer.

"If any of those legs fall off," he said, "the stool tilts over."

A significant number of reservists and guardsmen are choosing "Fort Living Room," the buzz phrase for civilian life.

The Army Reserve fell about 15 percent short of its recruitment goal in 2005. It hired more recruiters, added to its advertising budget, eased age restrictions and added bonuses, and in 2006 it was just slightly short of the goal: It added 25,378 recruits and had a goal of 25,500.

The National Guard had recruitment problems in 2004 but is meeting its targets today thanks to bonuses and other incentives.

Still, some officials worry that many midlevel and noncommissioned officers are poised to leave the military to avoid falling behind in their civilian careers.

"That has really long-term implications for the quality of leadership we'll have 10 or 15 or 20 years from now," former Pentagon Comptroller Dov Zakheim said. "We're really losing our best and brightest young ones."

Certain guardsmen and reservists are particularly vulnerable to being called up because of their specialties, he said. "We keep going back to the same well, and so the pressure is actually greater than some people realize."

Many soldiers tell of the pressure of family separation.

DOJ_NMG_0108010

Sgt. 1st Class Lance Schneider of Raleigh, N.C., spent 11 months in Iraq in 2004 as a member of the 30th Heavy Brigade Combat Team of the North Carolina National Guard. His son was born less than a month after he reached the war zone. Before his deployment, he'd never been away from his wife longer than two weeks.

"It's hard on your employer, it's hard on you, it's hardest on your family," said Schneider, 41, who works as a project manager for IBM in civilian life and plans to remain in the Guard.

Loretta Cox, a sergeant major with the 648th Regional Support Group in St. Louis, relied on a supportive husband when she left their kids, ages 2 and 11, behind. She spent two years in a domestic deployment, singing lullabies over the phone.

"My kids will say, `Mommy's a soldier and she's protecting us,'" said Cox, who plans to stay in the Reserve. "Obviously, I've already missed two years of my children's lives, and I'm not going to be jumping up and down saying, `Pick me, pick me.' But if I'm asked to do so, I'll honor my commitment."

Despite hardships, morale among reservists remains good, said Lt. Col. Mack Griffith, an Army Reserve chaplain at Fort McPherson, Ga.

But he said soldiers faced big challenges when they returned. Many find it hard to resume their usual roles at home after months of combat and brutality in Iraq.

"This is not the time to be the drill sergeant," Griffith said. "This is the time to come back and regain loving relationships in the home."

The divorce rate among reservists spiked in 2004, Griffith said, but has eased down since as a result of intensified family support activities offered by the Army, such as weekend couples retreats.

But, the chaplain noted, this reality lingers like an unwanted guest: "It's impossible for the spouse to fully appreciate what the husband or wife have gone through."

A Soldier's Soldier, Outflanked (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Gen. John P. Abizaid rose to become the top American commander for the Middle East in July 2003 with impeccable credentials for the job: A Lebanese American who speaks Arabic with a master's degree in Middle Eastern studies from Harvard, Abizaid was considered a soldier's soldier. He led a Ranger company into battle in Grenada in 1983 and commanded an airborne battalion during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

But Abizaid's announcement yesterday that he will retire in March after almost four years as a chief architect of U.S. Iraq strategy comes as violence drives civilian and military casualties there to record highs and as officials broadly say the U.S. military campaign is at a stalemate.

The departure of the general, who has won wide respect for his candid advice to the administration as the head of U.S. Central Command, was expected and is not seen as an indication of his own displeasure or that of superiors over his performance. "I think the time is right, and it has nothing to do with dissatisfaction," Abizaid told reporters in Baghdad.

"After 50 months out here, I think it's okay to think about retiring," he said.

His decision creates an opportunity for President Bush, with the recommendation of Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, to name a commander who will take a fresh approach as they weigh alternative military strategies.

Supporters portray Abizaid, 55, as a brilliant commander who did his best, despite constraints from Washington, to adapt the U.S. military to fight an unanticipated guerrilla war -- which he was among the first to identify -- and later the unexpected outbreak of sectarian violence.

"Understanding how difficult the job is, nobody's done it better than John Abizaid," said a Pentagon official who as an Army general worked with Abizaid.

Yet critics say Abizaid has placed too much emphasis on Arab sensitivity to foreign occupation, and therefore never demanded enough U.S. troops to stabilize the country. "He was too smart by half," another U.S. officer said.

DOJ_NMG_0108011

"The bottom line is we are losing a war in his theater on his watch," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a defense expert at the Brookings Institution, saying Abizaid's popularity has dwindled in recent months as the situations in Iraq and Afghanistan have deteriorated. "We need a fresh approach."

Abizaid made clear his continued opposition to a major surge of U.S. troops in Iraq beyond the current 140,000, arguing that it would perpetuate a mentality of dependency by Iraqi forces and increase resistance among Iraq's population.

The widespread expectation within the military has been that Abizaid will be succeeded by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who led the 101st Airborne Division in the invasion and early occupation of Iraq and later returned to head the effort to train Iraqi army and police forces. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is also expected to leave his post in the spring, and some Pentagon officials predict he will be followed by Marine Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis. Casey is another candidate to replace Abizaid, one senior military official said. But all those moves will be dependent on the approval of Gates, whose views on the personnel changes are not well known.

Moreover, Abizaid's replacement will face the same immediate constraints: overstretched U.S. ground forces and the need to be able to respond to other contingencies in the region, such as a further escalation of fighting in Afghanistan or a serious showdown with Iran.

Abizaid recently acknowledged that more U.S. troops, as well as Iraqi forces and international forces, "should have been available" to stabilize Iraq in the immediate aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

"General Shinseki was right," Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee, referring to then-Army Chief of Staff Eric K. Shinseki's prediction before the war -- dismissed by the Pentagon -- that several hundred thousand troops would be required to occupy Iraq.

Abizaid also made clear that his plans for a significant withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq this year were aborted by a major, unanticipated outbreak of sectarian violence spurred by the February bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra. "We clearly did not achieve the force levels we had hoped to," Abizaid told reporters this fall, saying sectarian unrest could be "fatal" to Iraq.

Yet Abizaid has argued that the Army and Marine Corps, which face serious shortages of manpower and equipment, could simply not sustain a surge of 20,0000 troops into Iraq.

Some described Abizaid as having his hands tied by both the Bush administration in Washington and situations in Iraq that were beyond his control. Abizaid has also been frustrated over a lack of support in Iraq from other U.S. governmental agencies, believing military force is not the main tool for fighting what he has defined as the "long war" against violent extremists.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), who has been friends with Abizaid for more than three decades and served with him in the 82nd Airborne Division in the mid-1970s, said Abizaid is "probably the most capable person we could have had because of his experience and his talent and his commitment to the troops he leads."

But Reed, a member of the Armed Services Committee, said decisions made by former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other top government leaders put Abizaid in a difficult position.

Reed, who said he has had several personal conversations with Abizaid over the past few years, cited as particularly important the decision to limit the number of U.S. forces going into Iraq during the invasion in 2003 and the failure to plan for stabilizing Iraq after initial combat operations. "I always got the sense the mission was under-resourced and vaguely defined," Reed said.

Rudderless In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Anyone looking for new thinking on Iraq, or even candor, had to be disappointed by President Bush's news conference yesterday. Mr. Bush may want to defer unveiling his new strategy, but there will be no obliging pause in Iraq's unraveling.

The latest Pentagon status report confirms a spiraling death toll, ever deeper sectarian divisions and near total lawlessness on the streets of Baghdad, despite repeated American vows to secure the capital. In a further sign of Iraq's descent, our colleague James Glanz reported this week that Baghdad gets less than seven hours of electricity a day, as insurgents and looters dismantle the power grid.

DOJ_NMG_0108012

While Mr. Bush contemplates his fast-disappearing options, competing factions in the administration and the military have been less reticent about floating their ideas. Some urge a sharp, temporary increase in American troop strength in Baghdad. Others argue that Iraqi forces should take the lead, whether or not they're ready. Still others talk about different ways of reconfiguring Iraq's dysfunctional governing coalition.

The problem is not so much with the specific proposals — some deserve serious consideration — as with the illusion that the political and military components of American policy can be pursued in isolation from each other. That is the kind of made-in-Washington tunnel vision that produced the current disaster. Only a political strategy, embraced by Iraqis themselves and backed by American military muscle, can have even a remote chance of altering events, and even that may be too late.

Consider the talk of a temporary escalation of American forces to impose some order in Baghdad. That is guaranteed to fail, unless it is tightly integrated with a political strategy for producing an Iraqi government finally willing to move against Shiite militias and open a dialogue on national reconciliation. Without that, any temporary increase could slide seamlessly into a permanent escalation — something America's depleted ground forces cannot handle — with no chance of containing the chaos.

And while American diplomats report hints that Iraq's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, might be willing to support a genuine national unity government, it remains unclear whether he would countenance any loss of power for Shiite fundamentalists — and whether Washington has any leverage left to influence his decision.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush acknowledged the obvious and desperate need to rebuild America's overstretched ground forces, a subject he refrained from talking about so long as Donald Rumsfeld ran the Pentagon. But that will take time and won't be any help in Iraq. Mr. Bush also needs to acknowledge that his course there has reached a dead end. He needs to quickly define a new direction while he still has any choices left.

Uncle Sam Needs More (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WHEN PRESIDENT BUSH announced after the election that he was replacing Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld with Robert M. Gates, he promised that Gates would bring a "fresh perspective" to the Pentagon. The assumption was that Bush was referring to Iraq. But this week, Bush indicated that the biggest difference between the Rumsfeld and Gates eras may involve the size of the U.S. military over the next several years.

Bigger, Bush now seems to believe, is better. Amplifying an earlier comment in an interview with the Washington Post, the president said at a news conference Wednesday that "I'm inclined to believe that we need to increase … the permanent size of both the United States Army and the United States Marines."

Bush is right — regardless of what one thinks of the separate issue of whether he should approve a short-term "surge" in U.S. forces in Iraq to stabilize Baghdad. But the president will have to do a better job of explaining why this country needs a bigger military establishment.

On Wednesday, Bush couched his argument in excessively narrow terms, saying that a beefed-up military was necessary to prosecute the "war on terror [that] is the calling of a new generation." This argument jumbles together the (at least partly metaphorical) "war on terror" — a many-fronted effort to prevent the repetition of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 — with the amassing and deployment of military forces around the globe to protect all of the nation's vital interests.

Of course, the war on terror is one of the threats tying up resources. It took a conventional military operation in Afghanistan to topple Al Qaeda's Taliban patrons (and that one was fought on the cheap, relying mainly on Afghan warlords as U.S. surrogates). Further, opponents of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq — including Bush — argue that a pullout would embolden terrorists there and elsewhere.

The need for a larger military isn't confined to the Iraq war but to any number of possibilities — war on the Korean peninsula, genocide in Africa, the defense of Israel, you name it.

Hence, the case for repudiating the "leaner, meaner" posture identified with Rumsfeld — who presided over a slight reduction in active-duty military personnel despite engagements in Afghanistan and Iraq — transcends today's debates. Critics in both parties (and with a variety of views on Iraq) have supported an increase in the permanent size of the armed forces to increase flexibility in future crises, shorten tours of duty, ease the burden on military families and rely less on the Reserves and National Guard, which to some degree have been turned into a full-time fighting force.

DOJ_NMG_0108013

The U.S. remains the world's sole superpower, but the nation no longer has enough men and women under arms to shoulder its responsibilities. By that we don't mean ill-conceived adventures like the war in Iraq, but the preparedness to react to unforeseen crises. One reason the armed forces are too small is that the Pentagon's military-industrial complex favors spending money on costly gadgetry, some of it unnecessary, over such prosaic things as a foot soldier's pay. But the scary truth is that with roughly 150,000 troops tied down in Iraq, the U.S. is hardly in a position to react effectively to a major crisis elsewhere.

A significant increase in soldiers and Marines could be accomplished with ramped-up recruiting and pay incentives. In testimony to Congress last week, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker suggested that his branch of the service could efficiently add up to 7,000 troops a year. Many such increases could take place without the current size of the Army (507,000) approaching the level of the 1991 Persian Gulf War (780,000). Secretary Gates should be more aggressive and advocate the addition of 100,000 more troops, which would cost in the neighborhood of $20 billion — not an exorbitant amount in Pentagon terms.

There is no need for a draft. Better pay and incentives may be needed to entice more people to join, but there are more than 60 million Americans between the ages of 18 and 35 to recruit from.

To understand why an Army of half a million troops is inadequate, you have to consider that only about two-thirds of that number can be deployed overseas, and not all of those can be sent to trouble spots simultaneously. Ideally, military convention holds, you rotate active-duty combat troops in such a way that they get plenty of training and time with their families. Do the math, and you realize why the 150,000 troops stationed in Iraq are such a strain on the Pentagon.

What's worse, all that strain — the added burden on reserves, the training shortcuts, the extended tours of duty — translates into poor morale, which makes it difficult to recruit more troops. It's a Catch-22. And again, this should not be a partisan issue. Along with GOP Sen. John McCain, Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Hillary Rodham Clinton have been calling for a larger military for some time.

Until recently, the White House has been cool to such calls. A year ago, reflecting Rumsfeld's thinking, Secretary of the Army Francis J. Harvey assured Congress that his branch of the services would be able to roll back a temporary increase of 30,000 troops authorized in 2004, increasing available combat units through reorganization.

Bush took office disdainful of nation-building exercises and skeptical of the types of humanitarian interventions the military engaged in during the 1990s, and that is partly why this administration was reluctant to build troop strength. Bush's second thoughts are long overdue, even if he isn't doing his cause justice by simply pointing to the war on terror as his rationale.

U.S. Cannot Accept Defeat (USAT)

By Frederick W. Kagan

USA Today, December 21, 2006

America faces a critical moment in Iraq. Sectarian violence threatens to destroy Iraq's government and society and what's left of America's will to fight. Yet the consequences of accepting defeat would be horrendous. Iran and Iraq's Sunni neighbors would vie for dominance, and the conflict would likely expand throughout the Middle East. Al-Qaeda could establish a base in the ensuing vacuum. Abandoning Iraq to chaos would harm America's vital interests immeasurably.

It is essential, therefore, to adopt a new strategy. We must secure Iraq's population and thereby bring the violence under control, abandoning the failed attempt to hand responsibility over to the Iraqis prematurely.

As we saw in Bosnia and Kosovo in the 1990s, military forces, together with political and diplomatic initiatives, can control ethnic and sectarian conflict. A large scale two-year effort to clear and hold critical areas in Baghdad that are the center of sectarian violence in the capital can succeed today. U.S. forces secured Tal Afar in 2005 and parts of Sadr City in 2004.

U.S. commanders admit that recent attempts to gain control of Baghdad in Operation Together Forward II failed through lack of resources. Many neighborhoods were cleared, but there were too few American troops to maintain security in those areas. U.S. military forces know how to establish security and maintain it, but they cannot do so without the necessary resources and time.

DOJ_NMG_0108014

Securing the critical areas of Baghdad would require a surge of at least 35,000 more U.S. combat troops into Iraq (some would go into Anbar province and elsewhere to contain any spillover from Baghdad). This surge would come from extending the tours of soldiers already in Iraq and accelerating the deployment of a few brigades. It would require two years to succeed, accompanied by economic reconstruction and political efforts to strengthen the Iraqi government. Training of the Iraqi army would continue, and the Iraqis would have to take responsibility for their own security at the end of these efforts. They can only do so, however, if we bring the violence down as we train the Iraqis up.

Some argue that these actions would "break" our Army by destroying morale. But with more than a million men under arms, these claims are not credible. The extensions are modest and within the bounds of what the United States has done in this conflict. Above all, let us consider the alternative: A defeated Army would have to withdraw under fire, humiliated, watching as the enemy tortures and kills the Iraqis it had worked with and defended. Nothing would break the Army more surely than ignominious defeat.

The options in Iraq are stark: withdrawal, defeat and regional disaster, or an effort to secure the population to permit the political, economic and social development and national reconciliation needed for Iraq to move forward. The president's determination to win with a comprehensive new strategy isn't stubbornness. It is wisdom.

Frederick W. Kagan is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and the author of Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq.

Push To Add Troops Grows, But No One Knows What They'd Do (USAT)

USA Today, December 21, 2006

As the public and policymakers alike have begun to grasp the sobering choices in Iraq in recent weeks, one key option has seemed to gain currency: A temporary "surge" of 15,000 to 30,000 U.S. troops in a last-ditch effort to stabilize the violence-wracked nation.

It's an idea with surface political appeal: If it works, great; if not, we can claim that we did our best. Just one problem: No one seems to have a clear idea of what such a surge might achieve, and even key military leaders are questioning its value.

Though it's tempting to think that adding troops for a little while would solve the problem, this is a seductive and dangerous road. It's the same vague reasoning that led to sending hundreds of thousands of troops to Vietnam. Before it hardens into policy for Iraq, President Bush and his advisers should ask some tough questions:

•What's the mission? So far, there's not much specificity beyond "more troops in Baghdad." Where in a city of 5 million would they go? Which warring groups would they fight? How would this be different from what's not working? This is the most pointed criticism of the surge idea, and the president acknowledged it at a news conference Wednesday, saying he would only approve a "specific mission." The fact that he couldn't immediately articulate one suggests the surge is an idea in search of credibility, not a strategy developed to solve a defined problem.

•Could it work? Assuming the short-term goal is to stabilize Baghdad, which the administration has labeled the definitive battleground, the next question is whether that is achievable. U.S. and Iraqi forces have been trying to pacify the capital since summer by massing forces there, but an unusually downbeat Pentagon report revealed this week that "Operation Together Forward" seems only to have intensified the violence. The report notes that the effort to control the violence in Baghdad worked at first, but that the insurgents adapted and violence surged again in September. One factor: Iraqi police tipped insurgents to raids by U.S. and Iraqi troops, allowing the bad guys to melt away.

•Who are the bad guys? That's not easy to figure out. Baghdad is a cauldron of insurgents, terrorists, criminal gangs, rival sectarian militias, Iraqi police with questionable loyalties and ministries with their own security forces.

•Would the Iraqi government go along? Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has already clashed with U.S. officials and put restrictions on what U.S. troops can do, recently ordering them to stop blockading a neighborhood in their search for a kidnapped U.S. soldier. Would Maliki, a Shiite, approve a tough crackdown on the Shiite militias and death squads responsible for much of the sectarian violence?

DOJ_NMG_0108015

•What about the rest of Iraq? The borders are porous, and Anbar province, west of Baghdad, is a haven for al-Qaeda-linked terrorists, the primary U.S. concern. They are destroying the electrical grid in unguarded desert areas far from the city, eroding U.S. credibility in Baghdad, which has less electricity now than before the war.

•How long would it take? Most of the discussion involves a commitment of six to eight months, but those who argue most articulately for a surge say it would take two years or more to succeed. Less than two years from the next presidential election, this is a political non-starter. Three-quarters of Americans want U.S. troops out of Iraq altogether in about a year.

•Are there enough troops? This isn't a matter of scooping up an extra 15,000 or 30,000 troops idling at U.S. bases. Any influx would come from keeping troops in Iraq beyond the end of their tours and sending more troops there sooner than they had been promised. Both of these are morale-busters. Neither is a sustainable plan. This week, Bush endorsed increasing the overall size of the military. That would aid the long war against terrorism but wouldn't help in the immediate crisis.

Bush likes to say he listens to his commanders about troop levels, and two of the nation's wisest combat veterans — former secretary of State Colin Powell and Gen. John Abizaid, the outgoing top U.S. commander in the Middle East — have advised against surging U.S. troops.

Sending more troops to Iraq would have been a good idea in 2003 to stabilize the country after Saddam Hussein was toppled. Today, it has the scent of doubling down on a losing bet, a desperate option seized upon because the cost of others is so high.

Promoters of the more-troops option Bush is considering include Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and neoconservative think tanks that supported the war and are frustrated with its failures. Those supporters should ask themselves one more question: Would they want their own children "surged" into a chaotic environment with such an ill-defined mission and limited prospects of success?

A Military Of The Willing Works Best (WP)

By Berl Brechner

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Should we revive the military draft? There's been a lot of talk about it lately.

Conscription, as a social exercise, might instill discipline and respect while getting people to mix with all types and classes of their fellow Americans and perform a patriotic duty. It might also serve the political goals of some who oppose the Iraq war.

But if the purpose of the armed services is to be an effective force for defending and protecting the nation, and winning wars when engaged, I have to say this: The draft wasn't great when I got caught up in it 37 years ago, and it would be even worse today.

On March 24, 1969, I reported for duty at a draft board office in downtown Washington, as ordered by the government. I was processed into military service in Baltimore, assigned to the Army (two very surprised individuals of the 30 or so in my group were randomly picked to become Marines) and bused overnight to Fort Bragg, N.C. Eight weeks later, I was a soldier -- a graduate of Army basic training. And two years to the day after being drafted, I was a civilian again (but still available for recall for six more years, though no such call ever came).

I have no regrets about my service, though my view may be colored by the fact that I never went to Vietnam. (Drafted college graduates who could operate a typewriter generally ended up, despite their combat training, in some administrative capacity.) I learned about military discipline, doctrine and process; met and worked with an array of people I would not have met otherwise; and gained viewpoints different from those that college had provided. Looking back, I regard it as an honor to have served.

The reality of the moment, however, was that I didn't want to be there, didn't believe in the war being fought and despised the concept of conscription. And as it turned out, the Army didn't really want me either, or most other draftees for that matter. That was because as a group, with a questionable fight on our hands, we tended to be uncooperative, sometimes obstreperous (occasionally considered subversive), unmotivated and underpaid -- yet still expensive, since the military invested four to eight months, including advanced training, in readying us for a commitment of two years.

Of course plenty of draftees were brave, aggressive and dedicated, and many died for their country. Everyone in the military recognized and respected that fact. But as a whole, the system didn't work well, and on June 30, 1973, the last draftee of the modern era was sworn into service.

DOJ_NMG_0108016

The numbers in the year I was drafted were staggering: 283,586 men drafted in one year, principally for service in only two of the fighting forces. By comparison, enlistment in the non-officer ranks in the Army and Marines combined in fiscal 2006 totaled 112,972.

The ending of military conscription in 1973 wasn't just one more bit of fallout from an unpopular war. It had a lot to do with the real needs of the military. Cohesiveness, effectiveness and cooperation are best found in people who have made a decision to be where they are. The high-tech battlefield is best operated by soldiers who, after extensive training and field experience, use their advanced skills for some reasonable period thereafter.

A draft fits none of these needs. Army jobs for non-officer troops are categorized into more than 200 military occupational specialties. Infantrymen are 11Bs (some used to call them one-one-bullet-stoppers), and my guess is that the percentage of the Army in that classification is a lot less now than in my years. The new Army jobs carry labels such as "Multiple Launch Rocket System Operational Fire Direction Specialist" and "Satellite Communication Systems Operator/Maintainer."

An army has to have the right people to do the jobs that the mission and the equipment require. In Vietnam, when there were a lot more Redeye missile launchers available than trained Redeye gunners, clearly the system had broken down. More technology creates personnel demands different from those a draft was intended to fill. The two world wars required a draft. For the kind of fighting our services do now, we're better off without one.

And one more thing: We've had the latest version of the Selective Service System in place and registering potential draftees since 1976. Only males, at age 18, are required to register. For conscription into a military that now prides itself on its equality of opportunity, shouldn't we start registering women, too?

The writer has been a magazine editor and broadcasting executive.

CIA Exercise Reveals Consequences Of Defeat (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

The CIA this month conducted a simulation of how the Iraq war affects the global jihadist movement, and one conclusion was that a U.S. loss would embolden al Qaeda to expand its ranks of terrorists as well as pick new strategic targets, according to sources familiar with the two-day exercise.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield confirmed to The Washington Times yesterday that the simulation took place in Northern Virginia. He declined to discuss its findings, saying that a final report is not finished and that the report will not be the intelligence community's official view. It will, however, be circulated within the community and possibly to U.S. policy-makers.

The exercise involved 75 CIA analysts and outside specialists. It was conducted by the CIA's Office of Terrorism Analysis, within the agency's Counterterrorism Center.

A source familiar with the simulation said it was a "red team" exercise in which participants played the role of global jihadists and war-gamed how the U.S. involvement in Iraq will influence their terror movement.

Although it takes no policy positions, the simulation's key finding appears to bolster Mr. Bush's contention that a U.S. loss in Iraq will have far-reaching ramifications.

At a press conference yesterday, Mr. Bush said, "A lot of Americans understand the consequences of retreat. Retreat would embolden radicals. It would hurt the credibility of the United States. Retreat from Iraq would dash the hopes of millions who want to be free. Retreat from Iraq would enable the extremists and radicals to more likely be able to have safe haven from which to plot and plan further attacks."

Al Qaeda has made stopping democracy in Iraq a top priority, according to U.S. military officials. It has recruited hundreds of suicide bombers to come to Iraq and inflict mass casualties to spur a Sunni-Shi'ite Muslim civil war. The group wants to wear down U.S. troops to the point where they will retreat. Al Qaeda's ultimate goal is to turn Iraq and other Middle East countries into hard-line Islamic states, U.S. military officials say.

One key finding from the "red team" exercise is that al Qaeda will follow past practices. Jihadists perceived the victory over the Soviet Union in Afghanistan in 1988 as a seminal event that spawned the creation of al Qaeda under the direction of Osama bin Laden. Al Qaeda leaders thought that if jihadists could defeat a global power in one theater, it could bring down governments in other nations.

DOJ_NMG_0108017

Six years later, when U.S. troops left Somalia after taking casualties at the hands of al Qaeda-trained Muslim fighters, it reaffirmed its feeling of invincibility and its belief that Western powers have a low threshold for casualties. After Somalia, al Qaeda -- and like-minded jihadists -- began attacking U.S. targets in the Persian Gulf region and ultimately struck America on September 11, 2001.

The CIA-sponsored simulation predicts that al Qaeda will view a U.S. defeat in Iraq as another jihadist victory over a superpower and one that will bring it even more terrorist recruits.

"When we did the simulation, the ramifications were enormous," said the source, who asked not to be named. The source said al Qaeda will proclaim, "God has given us a second victory over a superpower.

"Imagine what defeat in Iraq would do," said the source. "Al Qaeda picks new targets after it thinks it's won."

This person expressed unhappiness that the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, devoted less than a page to what a loss in Iraq would mean for global terrorism.

The source said he hopes the CIA report is circulated within the administration to drive home the point that the stakes are high in Iraq. Mr. Bush is set to announce early next year new strategies and tactics for winning in Iraq. He previously has dismissed proposals from Democrats to pull out all 135,000 U.S. troops now or withdraw them on a set timetable regardless of events on the ground.

Mr. Mansfield said the Counterterrorism Center this year has sponsored 20 internal simulations, seminars and conferences using outside experts to examine issues related to the war on terror.

He added, "We frequently reach out to experts outside of government and solicit their views on a range of matters. It is done routinely, and it is a very important aspect of our work. The simulation consisted of officers from around the intelligence community as well as outside experts."

Such events are held, he said, "to better understand emerging threats to the United States."

AP: Pentagon Wants $99.7B More For Wars (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, December 21, 2006

The Pentagon wants the White House to seek an additional $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to information provided to The Associated Press.

The military's request, if embraced by President Bush and approved by Congress, would boost this year's budget for those wars to about $170 billion.

Military planners assembled the proposal at a time when Bush is developing new strategies for Iraq, such as sending thousands of more U.S. troops there, although it was put together before the president said the troop surge was under consideration.

Overall, the war in Iraq has cost about $350 billion. Combined with the conflict in Afghanistan and operations against terrorism elsewhere, the cost has topped $500 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

The additional funds, if approved, would push this year's cost of the war in Iraq to about $50 billion over last year's record. In September, Congress approved an initial $70 billion for the current budget year, which began Oct. 1.

A description of the Pentagon request was provided by a person familiar with the proposal who asked for anonymity because the person was not authorized to release the information.

The cost of the war has risen dramatically as the security situation has deteriorated and more equipment is destroyed or worn out in harsh conditions. The Army, which has borne the brunt of the fighting, would receive about half of the request, a reflection of the wear and tear that the war has had on soldiers and their equipment.

An additional $9.8 billion is being sought for training and equipping Iraq's and Afghanistan's security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0108018

The administration's request for more Iraq money will be submitted along with Bush's budget in February for the 2008 budget year, which starts next Oct. 1. The White House can add or subtract from the Pentagon request as it sees fit, and the total could grow if money is added for reconstruction costs.

In a memo several weeks ago, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England encouraged the services to include in their budget requests projects connected to the broader fight against terrorism, as opposed to costs strictly limited to Iraq and Afghanistan. Critics have said that could be interpreted to cover almost anything.

Earlier requests submitted by service branches to Pentagon brass were considerably higher, but were trimmed back after meeting resistance at the White House and from key lawmakers.

The budget request includes:

_$41.5 billion to cover the costs of ongoing military operations.

_$26.7 billion for replacing and repairing equipment damaged or destroyed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

_$10 billion for body armor and other equipment to protect U.S. troops from attack.

_$2.5 billion to combat roadside bombs and other improvised explosive devices.

_$2.7 billion for intelligence activities.

Whatever request emerges from the Bush administration will go to a new Congress controlled by Democrats highly critical of the Iraq war and Bush's handling of it.

Even so, there is much sentiment among Democrats to protect troops and much fear about being portrayed as unsympathetic to men and women in uniform. These factors probably would overwhelm any efforts by anti-war Democrats to use the debate over the Iraq money to take on Bush's conduct of the war.

Democrats have promised, however, to give the upcoming request greater scrutiny than Republicans did when considering Bush's previous requests.

"Democrats are committed to ensuring our troops have all that they need, but we're going to return oversight to spending on the war," said Jim Manley, spokesman for incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Our troops must have everything they need, but Halliburton shouldn't get everything it wants."

Halliburton Co. is a Texas-based oil services conglomerate once led by Vice President Dick Cheney. Bush administration officials have come under fire since the beginning of the war in Iraq for awarding more than $10 billion to the company and its subsidiaries in 2003 and 2004, some of it in a no-bid contract. There have been allegations of fraud, poor work, overpricing and other abuse, which the company has denied.

Democrats such as incoming Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad of North Dakota have grown increasingly critical of the fact that Iraq spending is kept on a set of books separate from the rest of government operations.

The Vietnam War cost an inflation-adjusted $121 billion at its height in 1968, according to the Congressional Research Service. The overall tally for Vietnam is $663 billion, adjusted for inflation, and Iraq costs are rapidly catching up.

Shiite Clerics' Rivalry Deepens In Fragile Iraq (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD -- In the quest to create a new Iraq, two powerful clerics compete for domination, one from within the government, the other from its shadows.

Both wear the black turban signifying their descent from the prophet Muhammad. They have fought each other since the days their fathers vied to lead Iraq's majority Shiites. They hold no official positions, but their parties each control 30 seats in the parliament. And they both lead militias that are widely alleged to run death squads.

But in the view of the Bush administration, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim is a moderate and Moqtada al-Sadr is an extremist. As the U.S. president faces mounting pressure to reshape his Iraq policy, administration officials say they are pursuing a Hakim-led moderate coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurdish parties in order to isolate extremists, in particular Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0108019

Hakim, who once verbally attacked U.S. policy, now senses a political opportunity and is softening his stance toward the Americans. Sadr's position is hardening. Young and aggressive, he has suspended his participation in Iraq's government and is intensifying his demands for U.S. troops to leave the country.

Their rivalry is rising as the moderating influence of Iraq's most revered Shiite figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, is fading on the streets of Baghdad and is being replaced by allegiance to militant clerics such as Sadr, according to Iraqi officials and analysts.

They question whether Hakim can counter Sadr's growing street power without worsening the chaos. As President Bush ponders limited alternatives in forging a new approach in Iraq, some wonder whether the United States is overestimating Hakim's ability.

The U.S. embrace of Hakim "will deepen their rivalry," said Mahmoud Othman, an independent Kurdish legislator. "And it will deepen the rifts between the United States and the Sadrists."

Across Baghdad, as the fourth year of war nears an end, many Iraqis are asking one question: Can their prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite politician backed by Sadr, balance U.S. demands to distance himself from the cleric and move their country forward?Competing Strategies

In Karrada, a mostly Shiite Baghdad neighborhood of large, tan houses owned by educated professionals and bureaucrats, the trim-bearded Hakim smiles from a large billboard in front of his headquarters.

The son of an ayatollah, Hakim wears the long black robes of an Islamic scholar. He spent years in exile in Iran, where his political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, was founded as an armed opposition group to President Saddam Hussein, who brutally oppressed Shiites.

Less than a mile away in a bustling, working-class section of Karrada, in a poster hanging in a grimy sidewalk restaurant, the thick-bearded Sadr weeps, his hands clasped.

The son of Iraq's most respected populist cleric, who was assassinated by Hussein's government in 1999, Sadr remained in Iraq during the repression. He has stayed faithful to his father's vision, deriving his power from the seminary and the followers he has mobilized from Iraq's streets.

After the invasion, as a Shiite religious revival blossomed, Iraq's clerics saw themselves as the caretakers of the nation's Islamic identity. They were as concerned about American power and ambitions for Iraq as they were about the importation of a decadent Western culture. Many refused to deal with U.S. officials, preferring to preserve their status as outsiders, a tactic that reaps immense rewards today from a population that is increasingly disenchanted with the United States.

"There's no necessity to meet the Americans," said Beirut-based Hamid al-Khafaf, the chief spokesman for Sistani. He added that Sistani favored a peaceful resistance to end the U.S. occupation.

Hakim and Sadr approached the Americans differently. Hakim joined the 25-seat Iraqi Governing Council set up by the interim U.S. administration of L. Paul Bremer. Through his involvement in the government and his allegiance to Sistani, Hakim built up his power base.

Sadr went to war against U.S. forces, launching two major uprisings in the spring and summer of 2004 in the southern holy city of Najaf. Soon, Hakim and Sadr turned on each other. In Iraq's Shiite-dominated south, Sadr's militias have attacked the offices of Hakim's party, SCIRI, and fought with his forces.

Today, the control Hakim's armed wing, the Badr Organization, exerts over Karrada is dwindling. Since the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, which triggered an ongoing cycle of revenge killings, Sadr's Mahdi Army has pushed into mixed Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods across Baghdad. In recent months, it has arrived in Karrada, its stated goal to protect Shiite brethren from Sunni Arab insurgents.'Pouring Their Poison In'

Inside the Sayyed Idris mosque, a large shrine in Karrada with an ornate blue-and-yellow tiled minaret, Haji Abbas al-Zubaidi is a witness to this changing world.

For years, the picture of Hakim's white-bearded brother, Ayatollah Mohammed Bakir Hakim, who was killed by a car bomb in 2003, hung in the mosque's library along with images of Sistani and a collection of revered Shiite saints. Now, the pictures of Sadr and his father hang along with them.

DOJ_NMG_0108020

Baghdad's sectarian strife now rules Zubaidi's life. In recent weeks, car bombs and mass kidnappings have rocked his neighborhood. So Zubaidi, who has lived in Karrada for 35 years, sees the Mahdi Army, not the Badr Organization, as his main source of protection. It has created "popular protection committees" that watch over blocks, as they do in the Mahdi Army's stronghold of Sadr City.

"The terrorists are pouring their poison into our neighborhood," said Zubaidi, slim with long, slender fingers and a narrow face, as he sat on a large red carpet inside the mosque. "The sons of Karrada who have joined the popular committees and the Mahdi Army are now 98 percent in control. We have noticed that many of the attempts have been foiled."

Zubaidi and other educated Karrada residents continue to obey Sistani's pacifist vision and view him as their preeminent leader. But younger Shiites, while still revering Sistani, have switched their allegiances.

"We imitate and follow Sayyed Sistani," said Zubaidi, using an honorific for Sistani. "As for the field commanders and the young men, they are followers of Moqtada Sadr."

As the militancy grew, U.S. officials viewed Sistani as the most influential voice of moderation in Iraq. A gray-bearded, Iranian-born cleric in Najaf, whose pronouncements carried the force of law, he stepped in with calming statements at momentous points in Iraq's post-invasion history. One Sistani appeal ended Sadr's last rebellion against U.S. forces.

But since the February bombing, Sistani's words have had little impact, Iraqi officials say. Shiite militias have attacked Sunni Arab mosques. Bodies of young Sunni men, blindfolded and tortured with drills, turn up daily in ditches and trash dumps. Sistani has made three fruitless statements to stop the killings.

"Now when you have daily mass killings, it makes such a call for restraint weak," said Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman with close ties to Sistani.

Sadr's Mahdi Army militia perpetrated many of the attacks, and Hakim's Badr Organization committed torture and other atrocities, U.S. and Iraqi officials say.Rivals Sharply Divided

The rivalry between Sadr and Hakim has unfolded mostly on the political stage. The two leaders joined the alliance that produced the current government, but soon their visions diverged. This year, Sadr threw his support behind Maliki largely to stop Hakim's candidate, current vice president Adel Abdul Mahdi, from becoming prime minister.

Hakim and Sadr are also sharply divided over whether Iraq should split into autonomous regions. Hakim is pushing for a separate Shiite region in the south, but Sadr, who views himself as an Iraqi nationalist, wants to keep the country unified.

Senior Sadr officials have circulated a petition among national lawmakers demanding a timetable for U.S. withdrawal. They have managed to get 131 signatures, nearly half of the parliament, Othman said.

"Politically we can make the occupation withdraw," said Mustafa Yacoubi, Sadr's top deputy and a cleric who wears a black turban.

Hakim, meanwhile, has shown his pragmatism, understanding that he needs U.S. troops and support to balance the growing power of Sadr. Last month, he met with Bush, an action that many observers saw as the U.S. hedging its gamble on the weak Maliki government. Bush also met with Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, who is also perceived by Washington as a moderate, although many Iraqis would disagree.

"Maliki is very worried about this turnabout," said Wamid Nadhmi, a political analyst in Baghdad. "This is because of his affiliation with Moqtada Sadr and the promotion that Mr. Bush is giving to Mr. Hakim. Maliki is seeing his political end, that they are trying to form a new government with the approval of the Americans."

U.S. pressure on Maliki to isolate Sadr is growing. American officials have declared Shiite militias -- particularly the Mahdi Army -- as the most significant threat to Iraq's stability. Maliki has not cracked down on the militia of his political benefactor. He and his Shiite Islamic Dawa Party are also resisting U.S. attempts to build a moderate coalition.

In many circles, Iraqis question whether Hakim and other so-called moderates can curb the growing power of Sadr.

"I have serious doubts about Mr. Hakim's influence among the Shiites, and I have serious doubts of Hashemi becoming the leader of Sunnis," Nadhmi said.

It's a sentiment shared in Karrada. "Al-Hakim is not loved by the people," said Abdul Amir Ali, a burly Shiite shopkeeper. "People love the Islamic Dawa Party and Maliki because they don't have militias."

DOJ_NMG_0108021

In the sidewalk restaurant where Sadr's poster hangs, its owner, Ali Hussein, points at clusters of young men nearby. They are all Mahdi Army, he said. And so is he.

Hakim, he said, made a fatal mistake by meeting Bush. In today's Iraq, credibility and power are measured by opposition to the United States.

"At this time, whoever has his hands with the Americans or Jews is not an Iraqi," said Hussein, as he chopped up cubes of lamb. "So how could Hakim put his hands with the Americans? There will be tensions because Sayyed Moqtada Sadr is a revolutionary man, like his father. Even if Hakim tries to come back to Sadr, Sadr will never receive his hand."

If the rift between Hakim and Sadr deepens, moderate Shiites fear, all Iraqis may suffer. "It should not leave any shadow on a fragile situation on Iraq," said Dabbagh, the government spokesman. "Iraq cannot absorb such a shock."

In Iraq, Let's Fight One War At A Time (NYT)

By Reuel Marc Gerecht

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

ONCE again American officials are growing dissatisfied with an Iraqi government. In Baghdad and in Washington, officials privately and the press publicly suggest that the Bush administration would prefer that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fell, and that Adil Abdul Mahdi, a French-educated economist who is a vice president, would replace him. Mr. Maliki is politically too dependent, the reasoning goes, on the young Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr, a scion of a prestigious clerical family and the boss of a pivotal bloc of votes in Iraq's Parliament.

Mr. Mahdi may look like a good bet for Washington. He is a far more amiable gentleman than Mr. Maliki, and doesn't appear to be emotionally distressed when he is in the company of Americans. His group, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, was created in exile in Iran; its militia, the Badr Organization, has never had a serious clash with the United States military and is less prominent in the sectarian strife than Mr. Sadr's followers, the Mahdi Army. In addition, the Supreme Council's top man, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, has long dealt directly and pleasantly with American officials.

Since President Bush is now immersed in a top-to-bottom Iraq review, in which a substantial surge of American soldiers into Baghdad seems ever more likely and the Army is again seriously considering directly confronting Mr. Sadr, the appeal of Mr. Mahdi and the Supreme Council may grow in Washington and Baghdad.

If so, the administration should nip in the bud such inclinations. Changing the Shiite parts of the Iraqi government and quickly taking on Mr. Sadr would do nothing to end the Sunni insurgency and the holy war of foreign jihadists against the new Iraq.

Indeed, such a tack would not likely diminish the appeal or the power of the Mahdi Army, which is largely made up of poor, radicalized young men whose families were brutalized by Saddam Hussein and have been savaged by Sunni Arab fighters since the fall of 2003.

Nor would changing prime ministers and confronting Mr. Sadr's militia advance the cause of reconciliation among the Sunni and Shiite Arabs and Kurds, allow the Iraqi government to operate more effectively, or let American troops leave Mesopotamia one day sooner.

In fact, attacking Mr. Sadr now and elevating the Supreme Council is likely to accomplish the exact opposite of what we want. And it shouldn't be that hard to see why: the sine qua non for peace in Iraq, and for a democratic future for the country, has always been unity among the Shiites. Any violent struggle between the Mahdi Army and Supreme Council could provoke anarchy throughout the entire Arab Shiite zone, including Iraq's holy cities and the oil-rich south. As bad as things seem now, such Shiite strife could impoverish all of Arab Iraq, dropping the non-Kurdish regions to an Afghan-like subsistence level.

In such a situation, we would likely see the hyper-radicalization of the Shiites, who have already become more militant owing to the tenacity and barbarism of the Sunni insurgency. In addition, whatever fraternal and nationalist bonds remain among moderate Sunni and Shiite Arabs would probably disappear in a Shiite-versus-Shiite bloodbath.

We would do well not to underestimate how these age-old familial and national ties and sympathies still diminish the sectarian strife. A genocidal Shiite-versus-Sunni conflict in Iraq — a real possibility — would be much more likely after an intra-

DOJ_NMG_0108022

Shiite war that destroys the traditional social and religious hierarchy that has remained vastly stronger among the Shiites than among Sunni Arabs since the American invasion.

Yes, the forces of the Supreme Council might be able to beat Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army. Trained by Iran's Revolutionary Guards Corps, the Badr Organization is a serious army that might handle Mr. Sadr's more numerous and passionate supporters. The mullahs in Tehran, who have aided both Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim, would probably throw their support to the latter's Supreme Council in the event of all-out war. Such a confrontation, beyond wrecking Iraq politically, would probably allow the worst elements in the Supreme Council — those who envision a religious dictatorship along the lines of Iran — to become more powerful within the party.

And an American assault on Sadr City, the impoverished Baghdad stronghold of the Mahdi Army, would be militarily and politically counterproductive if undertaken before the United States launches a serious new counterinsurgency against the Sunnis.

Even with a substantial surge of soldiers along the lines recommended by Jack Keane, a retired four-star general, and the military historian Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute — approximately 35,000 more combat troops — the United States still wouldn't have enough forces to fight a two-front war against the Sunnis and the Shiites, as it briefly did in 2004.

In Iraq, the United States is much weaker than in 2004. So is Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the moderate bulwark of the Shiite establishment — so the tentative support he gave yesterday for a plan to isolate Mr. Sadr should be taken with a grain of salt. Because of the nonstop insurgency, Shiite politics are fragile. We absolutely cannot afford to have an American effort to pacify Baghdad be seen as a "pro-Sunni" military assault on the capital's densely populated Shiite ghetto.

If the administration first focuses militarily on the Sunni insurgency, as called for in the Keane-Kagan plan — and the press indicates Mr. Bush is taking the two men very seriously — the United States and the Iraqi government would be better able to diminish sectarian violence. With more troops, we can clear and hold Sunni areas in Baghdad and thereby prevent Shiite militias from streaming out of Sadr City to attack defenseless Sunnis.

Shiite militias are clever predators. They fear American power — the confrontation in Najaf in 2004, during which thousands from the Mahdi Army perished, taught them about the destructive capacity of the American military. If the Americans leave sufficient forces in cleared Sunni areas, they will stay away. But if we pass the holding part of counterinsurgency campaigns to ill-equipped units of the Iraqi Army and to the Iraqi police, who often aid Shiite militias, they will pounce.

Only after Baghdad's Sunni neighborhoods are fully secured can the Americans turn their attention to the Shiite quarters, ensuring that American and reliable Iraqi forces control the streets and municipal facilities necessary to sustain city life. We may eventually have to confront militarily the Mahdi forces inside Sadr City, but we want to do this only as the last step in counterinsurgency operations in the capital.

Mr. Sadr and his radicalized followers — temperamentally, they are as much children of Saddam Hussein as are the savage Sunnis who glorify the murder of Americans and Shiite civilians — are unlikely to become peaceful players in Iraqi politics. But Mr. Sadr's reputation can be reduced and his charisma countered if ordinary Shiites have more moderate alternatives, backed by American power, who can protect them from insurgency-loving Sunnis and death-squad Shiites.

It's unclear how Prime Minister Maliki will react to any American effort to diminish Mr. Sadr. His party, Islamic Dawa, is a bundle of mostly militant contradictions. In the end, President Bush may have to ignore the prime minister if the latter sides with Mr. Sadr.

And some Shiites, and perhaps most Sunnis, may threaten to walk out of Iraq's government and forsake reconciliation talks if the Americans get serious about pacifying Baghdad and the insurgency elsewhere. Let them. If the city's and country's Shiites, who represent about 65 percent of Iraq's population, see that the Americans are committed to countering the insurgency, any protest from Mr. Maliki or call to arms by Mr. Sadr will have increasingly less power.

No, it won't be easy — but with American and Iraqi troops all over Baghdad and daily life returning to some normality, the situation will certainly be more manageable than what we confront now. The politics of peaceful Shiite consensus, which is what Grand Ayatollah Sistani has tried to advance since 2003, could again rapidly gain ground.

No progress can be made in Iraq, however, if the Sunni Arabs, who have regrettably embraced the insurgency and holy war in large numbers, are allowed politically to check counterinsurgency operations.

DOJ_NMG_0108023

The key for America is the same as it has been for years: to clear and hold the Sunni areas of Baghdad and the so-called Sunni triangle to the north. There will probably be no political solution among the Iraqi factions to save American troops from the bulk of this task. The sooner we start in Baghdad, the better the odds are that the radicalization of the Iraqi Shiites can be halted. As long as this community doesn't explode into total militia war, Iraq is not lost, and neither is Mr. Bush's presidency.

Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former Central Intelligence Agency officer, is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

Cleric Weighs 1-month Cease-fire In Iraq (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, December 21, 2006

Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who heads a militia feared by Iraq's Sunnis, is considering a one-month unilateral cease-fire and may push his followers to rejoin the political process after a three-week boycott, officials close to him said Wednesday.

The issue is expected to come up at a meeting Thursday in the holy city of Najaf between al-Sadr and a delegation representing the seven Shiite groups that form the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament, the Shiite officials said on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the talks.

In perhaps an even more important session, the delegation will also sit down with the country's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. Officials from several factions confirmed the planned trip to Najaf.

The visit is intended to allow the Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, to work out some of Iraq's biggest political obstacles in front of al-Sistani, and to pressure al-Sadr to rein in his fighters and rejoin politics — or face isolation, participants said.

Until the walkout, al-Sadr's faction had been an integral part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's governing coalition. Cabinet ministers and legislators who belong to al-Sadr's movement called the boycott after al-Maliki met with President Bush in Jordan three weeks ago. Al-Sadr's militia and its offshoots have been increasingly blamed for sectarian attacks.

As violence rages across Baghdad and much of Iraq, a new coalition taking shape among Shiites, Kurds and one Sunni party is seen as a last-ditch effort to form a government across sectarian divisions that have split the country. While al-Sadr's movement would not be part of this coalition, such an alliance — which reportedly is supported by the Bush administration — might pressure the radical cleric to soften his stance.

In Thursday's meeting, the group wants to assure al-Sistani that the new coalition would not break apart the Shiite bloc, said officials from several Shiite parties. Potential members of the coalition said they have been negotiating for two weeks, and now want the blessing of al-Sistani, whose word many Shiites consider binding.

The movement is backed by the U.S. government, said Sami al-Askari, a member of the Dawa party and an adviser to al-Maliki.

"I met the American ambassador in Baghdad and he named this front the 'front of the moderates,' and they (the Americans) support it," al-Askari said.

The U.S. Embassy in Baghdad could not comment on the ambassador's meeting or his position on the possible coalition deal.

However, two prominent figures in the proposed coalition went to Washington to meet Bush separately in the past three weeks: Tarek al-Hashemi of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party and Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, known as SCIRI. The U.S. supports two other potential members, the Kurdish Democratic Party and President Jalal Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

"The U.S. wants to see an Iraq that is united, stable, democratic and prosperous. We will continue to work with the democratically elected government of Iraq to reach this goal by improving security, promoting national reconciliation and the rule of law and helping the Iraqis deliver essential services," U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said.

After meeting al-Sistani, the delegation will visit al-Sadr to try to persuade him to tell his followers to return to politics, and to assure him that the new coalition — still being completed — will not isolate his movement, said officials from several factions, including al-Sadr's movement.

DOJ_NMG_0108024

"Tomorrow we will visit Grand Ayatollah al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr, though the (coalition) front has not yet been formed, due to the demands of the Iraqi Islamic Party," al-Askari said.

His and al-Maliki's Dawa faction has expressed willingness to join the coalition, but fears it could weaken the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, Dawa officials said on condition of anonymity because the deal was not final.

"We will inform al-Sistani about the latest developments and assure Muqtada al-Sadr that he will not be sidelined from the political process. We want him to change his mind and be a part of that process," al-Askari told The Associated Press.

Officials close to al-Sadr said they believe the firebrand cleric and his followers would turn a friendly ear to the coalition, out of fear of being sidelined in the future.

Fearing such political isolation as well as possible attack by U.S. forces, al-Sadr will secretly order his Mahdi Army militia to abide by a one-month halt in fighting, said a Shiite politician, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the negotiations. He did not give further details.

Another official close to al-Sadr did not speak about the planned truce directly, but said when asked about it that "the security situation will improve in the coming month."

Even if al-Sadr commands his militia, the Madhi Army, to halt sectarian attacks for a month, questions remain as to whether violence would decrease. The militia is believed to be increasingly fragmented, with some factions no longer reporting to him , and a call for a truce could further divide it.

In exchange for a halt in fighting, al-Sadr's followers want officials from al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq to make a promise in front of al-Sistani that they will not sideline al-Sadr's movement, said a member of al-Sadr's group.

The Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni coalition was not a done deal, though. Several Shiites complained about conditions set by the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party, which they said could jeopardize an agreement.

"The demands of the Iraqi Islamic Party are not logical and it is hard to implement them," said Humam Hamoudi, a SCIRI lawmaker. For example, the Sunni party wants all checkpoints leading to and from Baghdad to have an equal number of Shiite and Sunni guards, he said.

Al-Qaida Hints At Power Status In Iraq (AP)

By Maggie Michael

AP, December 21, 2006

The deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, told the United States it is negotiating with the wrong people in Iraq, suggesting in a video released Wednesday that his terror group was the real power broker in the country.

The terrorist chief warned that al-Qaida would keep fighting U.S. troops in the Muslim world and target Western nations in retaliation. But he also criticized rival Islamic militant groups, such as the Palestinian Hamas, for being too soft in waging "jihad" or holy war.

"The mujahedeen (holy warriors) will keep their weapons pointed at you until you leave our lands and cease backing our corrupt leaders," al-Zawahri said, addressing Americans in excerpts of the video aired on Al-Jazeera television.

The video — which bore the logo of al-Qaida's media production house al-Sahab — was the 14th time this year that al-Zawahri has issued a statement. As in previous videos, he appeared in a black turban and white robe with a rifle behind him leaning against a plain brown backdrop. He frequently wagged his finger at the camera for emphasis.

In his comments on Iraq, al-Zawahri appeared to suggest that Washington should be negotiating with al-Qaida over the fate of the country. The Bush administration has been reaching out to numerous players in Iraq and to allied Mideast governments in an attempt to calm escalating violence amid calls in the U.S. for a troop reduction.

"I want to tell the Republicans and the Democrats together ... you are trying to negotiate with some parties to secure your withdrawal, but these parties won't find you an exit" from Iraq, al-Zawahri said.

"It seems that you will go through a painful journey of failed negotiations until you will be forced to return to negotiate with the real powers," he said, referring to al-Qaida's branch in the country, which has allied with some Sunni Arab insurgent groups.

DOJ_NMG_0108025

But Diaa Rashwan, an Egyptian expert on radical Islamic groups, said al-Qaida had no intention to negotiate with Washington over Iraq. Al-Zawahri's statement was largely rhetorical and aimed at destabilizing U.S. opinion, he said.

"He's just trying to tell the American public that their government is failing in peace as it has failed in war in Iraq," Rashwan said.

In a January audiotape, al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden offered a "truce" to the United States for unspecified conditions — the only previous suggestion of a negotiation with Washington. But al-Zawahri said in a later video the offer was retracted after the U.S. rejected it.

In Wednesday's video, al-Zawahri vowed that al-Qaida would "never stop striking" at the United States and other countries that sent soldiers into Muslim nations such as Iraq and Afghanistan.

He addressed a range of topics in a video that appeared aimed at emphasizing al-Qaida's leadership of jihad and mobilizing support against the U.S. and a range of Middle Eastern players — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, Hamas and Iran and its Shiite allies in Iraq and elsewhere.

Al-Qaida's leaders "see the jihad as a global effort and all issues as interconnected," said Ben Venzke of the U.S.-based IntelCenter, a U.S. government contractor that studies al-Qaida messaging. He noted that al-Zawahri was increasingly responsive to regional developments and fast at broadcasting al-Qaida's take on recent news events.

Al-Zawahri made references to the call made by Abbas for early elections, indicating the video was made since the Palestinian president spoke out on Saturday.

A technical analysis of the tape indicated that the voice was al-Zawahri's, said one U.S. intelligence official. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about it on the record.

Al-Zawahri, who is largely regarded as al-Qaida's main theoretician, criticized Abbas for calling early elections and Hamas for having participated in January elections, then forming a government after it won.

"Aren't they an Islamic movement? Aren't they campaigning for the word of God to be supreme?" he said, adding Hamas should have insisted on "an Islamic constitution for Palestine."

Al-Zawahri "wants to remind the Muslim world and radical militants that jihad should not compromise with democracy," Rashwan said. But the attack on Hamas could backfire, because many Arabs may reject criticism of the Palestinian movement, he said.

Al-Zawahri's comments were expected to have little influence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Hamas has distanced itself from al-Qaida, saying its struggle is against Israel, not the West. In Gaza, Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum brushed off al-Zawahri's criticism.

"Our Palestinian institutions are in need of reform, and to fix them we need to participate in the parliament and other institutions," Barhoum said.

Al Qaeda Warns U.S. On Fighting In Muslim Lands (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

CAIRO, Dec. 20 — Ayman al-Zawahri, Al Qaeda's second in command, has threatened the United States with more attacks if it does not end its military activity in Muslim countries. He spoke on a videotape broadcast Wednesday on Al Jazeera's news channel.

"If we are attacked in our countries, then we will not stop attacking you in your countries," he said.

On the tape, he also appears to reproach Hamas, the militant Islamic group that won Palestinian elections in January and now heads the government, for taking part in the formal political process and undermining "holy war" or resistance efforts.

In his remarks aimed at the United States, Mr. Zawahri warned of "more failures" if the United States failed to negotiate with the "real force in the Islamic world."

"You are trying, in a panic, to find an exit from the disasters surrounding you in Iraq and Afghanistan," he says on the tape, appearing impassive. "It looks like you will go through a painful journey of failed negotiations until you come back, forced to negotiate with the real force."

DOJ_NMG_0108026

Mr. Zawahri has made about 15 taped appearances this year in which he has repeatedly threatened the United States and other Western countries with more attacks.

"Part of the reason for his appearance in the media is just to assert the presence of Al Qaeda on the scene," said Diaa Rashwan, an Egyptian expert in Islamic movements at the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "The other part is to counter the noticeable rise of political Islam in the region."

Mr. Rashwan was referring to groups like Hamas, the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and others that want to establish a state based on Islamic law but are seeking power through politics.

"How did they not demand an Islamic constitution for Palestine before entering these elections?" Mr. Zawahri said in a clear reference to Hamas. "Are they not an Islamic movement?" Al Qaeda deems any dealing that is "based on secular constitutions" un-Islamic.

Osama Hamdan, a representative of Hamas in Lebanon, said in response, "We do not see the contradiction in being an Islamic movement and taking part in democratic elections that are in accordance with general Islamic principles."

Anonymous Slayings, Car Bombs Plague Iraqi Capital (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The bodies of 76 unidentified people were recovered in Baghdad on Wednesday, police said, the highest 24-hour toll so far for the anonymous slayings that have become a grim part of life in the capital.

All of the victims were men between the ages of 20 and 50. Although they died violently, all shot with automatics weapons, the men were not slain execution-style as is often the case these days -- no handcuffs or blindfolds, morgue staff said. Only a few showed signs of torture.

And they were not the only bodies delivered to the morgue Wednesday.

There were victims of drive-by shootings, assassinations and bombings, police said. The corpses included a Yarmuk Hospital morgue work who usually receives the dead. In all, an additional 26 Iraqis were killed around the country during the day, most of them in the capital.

Two U.S. soldiers also were killed by separate roadside bomb explosions Wednesday. One soldier died while investigating an explosion on foot with a combat patrol southwest of the capital, the military said. Another soldier died after an explosion near his vehicle during a road-clearing mission in southern Baghdad. Six soldiers were wounded in the explosions.

Four bombs rocked the capital during the day with explosions loud enough to send jittery residents to their windows to see cars speeding from the scenes and plumes of black smoke visible from miles away.

The first came at 7 a.m. when a massive suicide car bomb exploded at an Iraqi police checkpoint near the entrance to Baghdad University. The blast killed 11 people, including six Iraqi police, and injuring at least two dozen, police said.

Students had crowded the area during the morning rush, police said. Buses also had pulled into the street, full of Muslim pilgrims on their way to the Saudi city of Mecca via Baghdad International Airport. Investigators believe the bomber intended to target the pilgrims. State-run Al Iraqiya television announced afterward that pilgrims' buses traveling to the airport would be rerouted.

Another suicide car bomb exploded at 9:45 a.m. near the government passport office at crowded Kasra Market in northeast Baghdad. Security guards stopped the car before it entered the market, and the driver detonated the bomb, killing one person and injuring four, police said.

Two more car bombs exploded later in the day in Camp Sara, a neighborhood in south Baghdad, and in Bayaa, to the west. No one was killed, although five people were injured in the attacks, according to the Interior Ministry.

Gunmen opened fire on the Bab Al Muadhem bus terminal at about 3:10 p.m., concentrating on buses headed to the mostly Shiite areas of Sadr City, Talibiya, Husseiniya and Shaab, police said. Three people were killed and at least seven injured, police said.

Gunmen also targeted three teachers Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0108027

Palestinian teacher Mahmoud Mohammed Rasheed, brother of Iraqi television star Zuhair Mohammed Rasheed, was killed in the eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Baladiyat, where he taught middle school, police said. Investigators say Rasheed may have been targeted for being Palestinian, or attackers may have mistaken him for his famous brother, who stars in a popular sketch comedy.

Gunmen also attacked professor Ali Arnoosi, deputy dean of the college of law at the University of Baghdad and fellow law professor Mohammed Hamdani, police said. The two were slain at 3 p.m. as they were on their way home. Their driver and guard were also killed, police said.

In the northern city of Mosul, gunmen killed five people in five different neighborhoods Wednesday, according to police spokesman Brig. Gen. Said Ahmed.

South of Baghdad, gunmen also killed Jamhooryia Aozaiyab, a former member of Saddam Hussein's Baathist party and leader in the Baathist Iraqi Women's Union, police said. The gunmen opened fire on Aozaiyab near her home in the city of Kut.

Elsewhere in the south, six farmers were kidnapped at a makeshift checkpoint morning. They were attempting to drive two trucks full of fruits and vegetables north from the mostly Shiite village of Lijij, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, to the city of Swaira when they were taken, their trucks abandoned, police said.

The U.S. military announced Wednesday that coalition soldiers on Dec. 14 captured an al-Qaida leader suspected of attacks last year in Baghdad and Mosul that resulted in hundreds of civilian deaths, including the downing of a coalition helicopter, kidnappings and suicide car bombings. The leader was identified in the military statement only as "The Military Emir of Mosul" and, later, "The Military Emir of Karkh."

Iraqi Comedian Shot To Death In Baghdad (AP)

By Mazin Yahya

AP, December 21, 2006

Gunmen killed a veteran Iraqi actor and comedian known for his stage portrayal of the lighter side of life in Baghdad during Ottoman rule in the early 1900s, police said Wednesday.

Mitashar al-Sudani, 60, was killed as he drove to theater offices on Haifa Street in Baghdad on Tuesday, a police officer and an official at Iraq's Theater and Cinema Ministry said. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

Al-Sudani was shot multiple times, suggesting that the gunmen had singled him out. Armed groups have often killed prominent figures in politics, sports, the media and other fields, apparently as part of a campaign to create a climate of fear and intimidation.

The actor, a native of the southern city of Basra, appeared on television and in stage comedies. In the 1980s, during the rule of Saddam Hussein, he starred in a play in which he used proverbs to poke fun at life in Baghdad when it was controlled by the declining Ottoman Empire.

But he also gave serious performances, and he was a familiar face to many Iraqis for decades — even though many of his roles were minor.

On Nov. 20, another popular comic actor was killed. Walid Hassan, 47, was the star of "Caricature," a weekend satire on Al-Sharqiyah TV known for its dark humor about Iraq's many problems.

His weekend program poked fun at the country's poor security, long gas lines, electricity blackouts and ineffective politicians, providing desperately needed comic relief.

After the 2003 U.S. invasion, Haifa Street for a time became the scene of almost daily gunfights between insurgents and U.S. and Iraqi troops.

In December 2004, gunmen pulled election workers from a car in morning traffic on the street and shot them. Security on the street has improved since then, but remains tenuous.

Meaty Ceremony Marks Shift Of Province Command (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske, Saad Fakhrildeen

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108028

NAJAF, Iraq — The local audience knew what to expect when Iraqi commandos took the stage at the stadium here Wednesday with frogs and a rabbit in hand, preparing to celebrate with a bloody flourish the transfer of local authority from U.S. to Iraqi troops.

The Americans were in for a surprise.

As U.S. commanders and guests looked on, the commandos in dark green T-shirts began taking bites out of the frogs.

One man knelt, placed the rabbit belly-up on his lap and proceeded to cut it open with his military knife. He screamed as he bit the rabbit's heart, then handed the carcass to companions who began gnawing away, blood flowing down their cheeks.

The ceremony marked the shifting of responsibility for security in Najaf province to Iraqi forces and was attended by U.S. and Iraqi dignitaries, including Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak Rubaie. It was the third such shift by the U.S.-led coalition, following the transfer of Muthanna province by the British in July and Dhi Qar province by the Italians in September.

The show of Iraqi machismo followed a tamer warmup by counterterrorism forces from the Interior Ministry. Dressed in karate uniforms, they performed martial arts moves before simulating the capture of a "terrorist," in this case a fellow policeman in civilian clothes.

The gory performance was familiar territory for many Iraqis, who grew up watching such shows of brute strength, either at mass gatherings or on Saddam Hussein's state-run television. The former president's special forces, or fedayeen, were known for devouring wolves, and commandos ate snakes, dogs and cats, as well as the usual frogs and rabbits.

"This is included in their training," said Mohammed Askari, an Iraqi Defense Ministry spokesman. "It's an indication that they can operate under any circumstances, whatever nature provides them."

But the display was not standard procedure for the Americans.

"Our soldiers do a lot of things, but I've never seen them do anything like that," Air Force Maj. Gen. Kurt Cichowski, who attended the ceremony, told the Associated Press.

U.S. commandos have long studied survival techniques that include devouring freshly killed animals. They're just usually dining under duress rather than on stage, military historians say.

Rich Baker, a military historian at the Army Military History Institute in Carlisle, Pa., said soldiers are often taught to eat small animals such as snails. The Army Field Manual contains dozens of examples, including culinary oddities such as insects, frogs, snakes and lizards.

Baker, who served in the Air Force, says he still remembers being taught how to kill and eat snake, "However, I didn't get to the point where I had to actually do it."

Certainly not on stage.

"That's not something you would find in the Western world," he said. "PETA, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, would probably roll over and scream bloody murder."

U.S. Transfers Control Of Najaf Province To Iraqi Security Forces (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 20 -- U.S. forces handed over control of the southern province of Najaf to Iraqi security forces Wednesday while violence continued in the Iraqi capital, with several car bombs killing at least 12 people.

Top Iraqi government and military leaders attended a handover ceremony in Najaf, a holy Shiite city that two years ago was the site of heavy fighting.

Najaf is the third province to be turned over to Iraqi forces. Fifteen more are still under the control of U.S.-led forces.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has said repeatedly that he wants to speed up the transfer of authority over Iraq's provinces from coalition forces to the Iraqi police and army. The U.S. military has troops embedded with Iraqi forces to train them to handle security responsibilities on their own.

During the ceremony, Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, reiterated Maliki's stance.

"Any interference in the country's internal affairs is a red line and an infraction in the Iraqi national security," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108029

Rubaie visited Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the country's most influential Shiite religious figure, and said afterward that he had informed Sistani of the government's plan to take control of its provinces as soon as possible. Sistani, Rubaie said, called for "national unity and closing ranks behind the elected Iraqi government, which represents the unity of Iraq."

But violence elsewhere showed that some parts of the country, particularly Baghdad, will be harder to tame than others.

At 7 a.m., a car bomb exploded near Baghdad University in the southwestern Jadriya district. Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said 11 people were killed and 17 wounded.

The U.S. military said the bomb detonated near a police-escorted bus on its way to the Baghdad airport. Iraqi police reported that two police officers and four civilians were killed, the military said. An additional six policemen and 22 civilians were injured, the military said, citing a police report.

According to Iraqi television, passengers on the bus were making a pilgrimage to Mecca in Saudi Arabia.

In Adhamiyah, a neighborhood in north Baghdad, a suicide bomber detonated explosives close to an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing two and wounding seven, Kinani said.

Another car bomb exploded in the Sinaa district of Baghdad, killing one civilian and injuring four, Kinani said.

Meanwhile, the U.S. military reported that a roadside bomb killed one soldier and wounded four Wednesday as they were on their way to investigate an explosion southwest of Baghdad. In a southern neighborhood of Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed one soldier and wounded two, the military said.

The U.S. military also reported that a female civilian was killed Tuesday by insurgents who attacked a police station in Ramadi with two rockets. A man, another female and a 12-year-old child were wounded, the military said.

Coalition forces captured a senior al-Qaeda leader and five other suspected insurgents in Mosul last Thursday, the military reported Wednesday.

As the military emir of Mosul in 2005, the al-Qaeda leader, who was not identified by name, housed foreign fighters who carried out suicide bombings, the U.S. military said. In late 2005, he became the military emir of Karkh, in Baghdad, coordinating car bombings and kidnappings, the U.S. military said. He is also suspected of organizing an attempt to shoot down a coalition forces helicopter in the Adhamiyah neighborhood in May, according to the U.S. military.

Home In Illinois May Lure Fugitive Former Iraqi Minister (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

OAK BROOK, Ill., Dec. 20 — It was an unremarkable scene on Wednesday outside a gated community here where the former Iraqi electricity minister, Aiham Alsammarae, now a fugitive from justice, keeps a palatial house.

Having escaped from a Baghdad jail over the weekend in what he boasted was the “Chicago way,” Mr. Alsammarae, whose whereabouts are unknown, could have been on the way back here.

Or perhaps he had already arrived, enjoying the serenity of the leafy surroundings of the Covington subdivision, about a half-hour west of Chicago.

Dennis Brugh, the property manager of the subdivision, where homes range in price from $1.5 million to $4 million, said that whatever trouble Mr. Alsammarae had found in Iraq, here “he was a homeowner in good standing.”

“He kept his house just like any other guy,” said Mr. Brugh, who works for Oak and Dale Properties, a management company. “He’d have to or else we’d be all over it.”

Mr. Alsammarae, who holds dual American and Iraqi citizenship, moved to the Chicago area in the late 1970s but returned to Iraq just after the American-led invasion.

He was jailed four months ago on corruption charges related to deals made when he was the electricity manager, from August 2003 to May 2005.

In a phone conversation with a reporter on Tuesday, Mr. Alsammarae said he escaped over the weekend and fled Iraq on a flight from Baghdad International Airport. Officials in Iraq acknowledged the escape but doubted some of the details he offered.

The watchman at the Covington entrance, who either stops or waves through every car that approaches, said Wednesday that he knew Mr. Alsammarae but that he had not seen him “in quite some time.”

DOJ_NMG_0108030

Was that days or months?

The watchman, who would not give his name, would not elaborate.

French Pulls Troops From Afghanistan (AP)

By Elaine Ganley

AP, December 21, 2006

As violence mounts in Afghanistan, France is pulling 200 of its best soldiers out. But military officials here insist France remains fully committed, with 1,100 troops still based in Kabul.

Nevertheless, France's decision to withdraw its Special Forces comes amid concerns in Paris that NATO's mission in Afghanistan has grown confused and that the alliance may be overreaching in its efforts to stabilize and rebuild the nation.

French officials and experts say that as fighting in Afghanistan has dragged on and the insurgency has grown in strength, the special forces were no longer ideal for the mission. Such elite units tend to be more lightly armed, and specialize in gathering intelligence or rapid attacks.

"The conditions no longer correspond to what the special forces do," said Capt. Christophe Prazuck, a spokesman for the French Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The French elite troops — deployed in southeastern Afghanistan since July 2003 — were France's contribution to a U.S. anti-terror mission code-named Operation Enduring Freedom that is separate from the NATO mission.

Seven of the 10 French troops killed in Afghanistan since 2003 were special forces. The soldiers combed the border with Pakistan for al-Qaida and Taliban fighters and looked for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden. Long based in Spin Boldak, a southern border town in Kandahar, the French rebased this year to Jalalabad in the east and are now expected home in January.

Enduring Freedom has been trimmed as NATO's International Security Assistance Force has evolved. By October, the NATO force's 32,800 troops became the prime fighting force, moving into special forces' terrain in Taliban-infested southern and eastern regions.

U.S. commanders say the work of special forces soldiers is still critical in Afghanistan, whether it's small-group reconnaissance missions, mentoring Afghan soldiers or supporting conventional NATO and Afghan troops in combat.

But State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the French pullout was understandable. France is heavily committed elsewhere in places like Lebanon and Africa.

"They have numerous other responsibilities around the globe where their military forces are deployed as peacekeepers, so we understand that there are other demands on these kind of particular forces," McCormack said.

Other countries have quietly pulled special forces from Afghanistan. Australia said in September that it was withdrawing some 200 commandos and Special Air Service Regiment troops. Germany has had special forces in Afghanistan, but Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung said none have been there since he took office in late 2005.

And while pulling out its elite troops, France is strengthening its commitment in other areas, maintaining Mirage jet fighters in neighboring Tajikistan and beefing up its mission to help Afghanistan form its own special forces, adding another 20 French trainers.

Paris also has agreed that its 1,100 soldiers in the Afghan capital, Kabul, can be used as reinforcements for NATO combat missions. That concession came at a NATO summit last month where all 26 member states agreed to aid each other in emergencies in Afghanistan.

However, a senior French defense official said any response by Kabul-based French forces would be "prompt and temporary" — with decisions made in Paris on a case-by-case basis.

France has been lukewarm about the decision to dovetail the NATO mission with Operation Enduring Freedom.

"There is strong skepticism about the relevance of NATO in Afghanistan if it is not for stabilization and rebuilding of the country," said Francois Gere, head of the French Institute of Strategic Analysis, a think tank. "If it is for waging nasty guerrilla warfare, there is no appetite in France and, I think, most European countries."

Pakistani City Serves As A Refuge For The Taliban (LAT)

By Laura King

DOJ_NMG_0108031

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

QUETTA, PAKISTAN — At a time when the Taliban is making its strongest push in years to regain influence and territory across the border in Afghanistan, this mountain-ringed provincial capital has become an increasingly brazen hub of activity by the Islamist militia.

Quetta serves as a place of rest and refuge for Taliban fighters between battles, a funneling point for cash and armaments, a fertile recruiting ground and a sometime meeting point for the group's fugitive leaders, say aid workers, local officials, diplomats and others.

"Everybody is here," said Mahmood Khan Achakzai, a Quetta-based member of Pakistan's National Assembly, describing the routine comings and goings of senior Taliban commanders in Quetta, the capital of the Pakistani province of Baluchistan.

The apparent ease of Taliban movement in and out of Quetta comes against a backdrop of increasingly bitter squabbling by authorities in Afghanistan and Pakistan over who bears responsibility for the militia's use of tribal areas on the Pakistani side of the border as a staging ground for attacks that have killed at least 180 North Atlantic Treaty Organization and allied troops this year.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai this month blamed Pakistan for orchestrating Taliban activity. Pakistan, a key ally in President Bush's "war on terror," in turn accused Karzai of seeking a scapegoat for his own failures of governance.

*

Nerve-racking encounters

Quetta is a microcosm for these tensions. Local Pakistani authorities insist that they keep a tight lid on Taliban activity — a claim derided by many residents of this city of about 1.5 million people, and one backed by little demonstrable evidence.

Residents described nerve-racking random encounters with Taliban convoys bristling with weaponry and hearing volleys of automatic-weapons fire echoing from within some walled-off madrasas. Taliban recruitment videos sell briskly in stalls tucked between the gun emporiums and carpet shops of Quetta's raucous main market.

"For the Taliban, this is considered to be a safe haven," said Syed Ali Shah, a journalist who writes for the Baluchistan Times. "They come here, they regroup and retrain."

At a local madrasa, or Islamic seminary, black-turbaned young men gathered around a makeshift fountain on a recent day, performing their ablutions before noon prayers. One, then two, then half a dozen of them aimed steely glares at outsiders lingering near the rusty green gate of the mud-brick compound.

The madrasa is one of dozens in and around Quetta at which Taliban ideology is openly preached. From these schools, willing foot soldiers emerge by the hundreds to join the fight against Western forces in Afghanistan.

*

Secretive society

The Taliban presence in Quetta is helped by the insular and secretive nature of Pashtun tribal society, the virtually unsecured border with Afghanistan and the city's large population of Afghan refugees, with whom the militia's members can readily blend.

The city also has close historic, ethnic and cultural ties to the Taliban's birthplace, the Afghan city of Kandahar, a bone-jarring five hours away by road. Many Pashtun clans have roots on both sides of the border.

Afghan provinces close to Baluchistan have been the scene of some of the heaviest fighting this year between Taliban and Western and allied forces. The bulk of more than 115 suicide attacks against coalition troops has taken place in and near Kandahar, which was the seat of Taliban power when the movement ruled Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001.

Today in Quetta, it's almost as if the Taliban never went away.

Some Taliban-affiliated madrasas operate almost in the shadow of police and military installations. On the main road that runs from the border town of Chaman to Quetta, there is only one police checkpoint. On a recent day, two police officers sat in a lean-to, drinking tea and barely glancing up at passing cars.

Pakistani police in Quetta say they have rounded up hundreds of suspected Taliban militants in the last year, and report frequent raids on madrasas suspected of militant ties.

"All the time we are harassing them," said Salman Syed Mohammed, Quetta's deputy police inspector-general.

But one Western aid official, speaking on condition of anonymity, described such roundups as a "catch-and-release" program, with most of the detainees seen on the streets again within a matter of days.

*

Mingling with refugees

Militants who are deported to Afghanistan can make their way back to Pakistan at will, either traveling by motorbike on unmarked border trails or joining the crush of up to 6,000 people, mainly Afghans, who cross the border daily at Chaman.

By mingling with refugees, wounded fighters are able to seek treatment in several Quetta hospitals, which on the whole are better equipped than those on the Afghan side of the frontier. The International Committee of the Red Cross helps arrange medical care in Quetta for injured civilians, and says that inevitably some fighters slip in among them.

"According to international law, once a wounded combatant has put down his weapon, it becomes a humanitarian case," said Paul Fruh, who heads the Red Cross office in Quetta.

Although most local people are afraid to talk about sightings of senior Taliban figures, commanders are said to have unimpeded access to the city, even highly recognizable ones.

"Dadullah roams these streets, and they know it," said Achakzai, the lawmaker, referring to Mullah Dadullah, a one-legged Taliban commander with a reputation for egregious brutality.

*

Westerners monitored

Pakistan's security branches demonstrate far more efficiency in keeping track of Western outsiders, including foreign journalists, whose movements in and around Quetta are closely monitored.

New York Times reporter Carlotta Gall was questioned this week by Pakistani security agents who forced their way into her Quetta hotel room and at one point struck her in the face, she said. Gall's notes and laptop were seized but later returned. The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad said it was looking into the incident.

For the families of young fighters from Quetta and its environs, the subject of their decision to take up arms for the Taliban is taboo. A local leader said the tiny hamlet of Charqol, about a dozen miles northwest of Quetta, had produced half a dozen suicide bombers this year alone. None of their relatives would talk.

The climate of fear extends to foreign humanitarian agencies, whose workers are required to have armed escorts whenever they venture outside Quetta. The Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees office in Quetta was briefly shut down this year in response to a Taliban threat.

"I'm afraid, not as an aid worker but as a citizen, as someone living here," said Duniya Khan of the refugee agency. "Everyone in this city feels insecure."

Al-Qaeda's Sanctuary (WP)

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

THREE MONTHS ago the Pakistani government struck a deal with pro-Taliban leaders in the district of North Waziristan, bordering Afghanistan: It agreed to abandon military operations, withdraw the army and release prisoners in exchange for promises that the militants would cease cross-border attacks and disarm the foreign terrorists in their midst. That the extremists would not respect the accord, and that attacks on U.S. forces in Afghanistan would increase rather than decline, obviously seemed likely at the time. Yet President Bush, ever indulgent of Pakistan's autocratic ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, accepted his promises. "When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be al-Qaeda, I believe him," Mr. Bush declared when he met Gen. Musharraf at the White House on Sept. 22.

As senior administration officials now acknowledge, Gen. Musharraf's assurances were empty -- as they have been many times before. According to multiple independent reports, Waziristan has been thoroughly Talibanized, and the fundamentalists are spreading their influence through adjacent border districts. Cross-border attacks and the deaths of American soldiers that they cause are up significantly. Al-Qaeda is reliably reported to be operating training camps in North Waziristan with the help of scores of foreign militants who are schooling recruits in suicide bombing and the use of improvised explosive devices. According to a stunning report in the current edition of Newsweek, they are also preparing Western citizens who could carry out major terrorist attacks in Britain or the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0108033

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte grossly understated the case last week when he told The Post that "tribal authorities are not living up to the deal" struck by Gen. Musharraf and that the Taliban cross-border activity "causes serious problems." Considering the grave threat to U.S. soldiers and the homeland itself posed by the Pakistani sanctuary, the intelligence chief sounded positively laconic. "Sooner or later the government will have to reckon with it," he said, before quickly offering excuses for Gen. Musharraf, who, he said, "has a domestic political balancing act to perform."

In fact the situation in Pakistan's border areas is starting to look a lot like eastern Afghanistan before Sept. 11, 2001. President Bush and Mr. Negroponte ought to be asking themselves if they are repeating history by tolerating the situation. They need not do so: The United States has provided Gen. Musharraf strategic cover and billions of dollars in military and economic aid since 2001. In return it should have the right to demand that he abandon his separate peace. Action must be taken against Taliban and al-Qaeda forces in Pakistan before spring, when another major offensive against U.S. and NATO forces can be expected unless the enemy bases and supply lines are disrupted.

As for Gen. Musharraf's political problems, these could be addressed if he stopped allying himself with Pakistan's own Muslim fundamentalists and rehabilitated the secular democratic political parties that he has repressed since his 1999 coup. He could also abolish the colonial governing system in the tribal areas, under which secular political parties are banned and mullahs empowered, and allow representative government. By tolerating the general's empty promises and excuses, the Bush administration is putting its mission in Afghanistan and homeland security into unacceptable jeopardy.

DOJ:

New US Attorney Sworn in For Little Rock District (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

Little Rock, AR (AP) - Tim Griffin, a former assistant to President Bush (website/newsbio) adviser Karl Rove, was sworn in today as the interim US attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The 38-year-old Griffin replaces Bud Cummins, who announced last week that his resignation would be effective today.

A native of Magnolia, Griffin served previously as special assistant U-S attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. He recently spent three months of active duty in Iraq in the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps.

Griffin had previously served as special assistant to President Bush and deputy director of political affairs at the White House, as well as deputy communications director for the Republican National Committee.

Griffin will serve as interim federal prosecutor until the Justice Department nominates a candidate to replace him.

Feds laud A-C police (ABH)

By Joe Johnson

Athens (CA) Banner Herald, December 21, 2006

Their duty is to protect and serve, so what does dressing up like Santa, waiting tables for tip money to buy toys and walking neighborhood streets have to do with being a good police officer?

Everything, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which highlighted Athens-Clarke police's Community Oriented Policing and Problem Solving (COPPS) program in the current edition of In-Sites, a magazine published by the department's crime prevention arm, the Office of Justice Programs.

"Imagine a successful, proactive police department, one that involves all levels of law enforcement management and strong community leadership," the magazine says. "The police force in Athens, Georgia, does more than imagine it - they practice it."

The magazine goes on to explain how since Athens-Clarke Police Chief Jack Lumpkin introduced the concept of community-oriented policing nearly 10 years ago, it has evolved so that individual officers now are "chiefs" of their beats, responsible for resolving quality of life issues and reducing crime.

DOJ_NMG_0108034

"Officers make concerted efforts to inform residents of their availability and involvement," the Justice Department magazine says. "They attend neighborhood meetings and offer their cell phone numbers and e-mail addresses. In return, the community recognizes the value of having a police presence in the neighborhood and law enforcement's willingness and ability to solve problems and improve residents' quality of life."

Lumpkin said the national recognition makes him proud for the officers, but steadily declining crime rates and growing community participation in crime fighting already has validated the concept he introduced after becoming police chief in 1997 .

"We have heroes every day doing something that may not be a front-page news story, but they are out there helping a citizen," he said.

When officers aren't trying to rid neighborhoods of drug dealing or cut down on car break-ins and other crime, Lumpkin said, they are attending neighborhood and business meetings to learn what the problems are. If the police can't help, he said, officers will refer residents to other government departments that deal with quality of life issues such as dilapidated houses and abandoned cars.

"There's been a cultural change by the citizens and police, and we have moved into partnerships in many areas of the community," Lumpkin said.

"It's the broken-window theory," Assistant Police Chief Alan Brown said. "If you don't fix the windows and allow things to get out of hand, then criminals have the perception that the community is in disorder and they feel empowered to go ahead and commit crimes."

One of the keys to the COPPS program is encouraging officers to spend more time out of their patrol cars, mingling with the people they are sworn to protect, Lumpkin said. They form relationships that allow residents to feel more comfortable passing along information.

"Perpetrators are strengthened and enhanced when they can operate in environments where anonymity exists," the police chief said.

The department has emphasized the return of the beat cop even more since last fall, when supervisors began to check patrol car odometers and gas gauges to see that officers are spending more time on foot.

"What I'm proud of is the citizens are our partners, and we're doing it in a tough environment," Lumpkin said. "Athens-Clarke County is a great place to live and work, but it's a tough environment for police because the expectations are much higher."

Loss of grant money clouds future for regional drug task force (BTF)

By Mark Caudill

Bucyrus (OH) Telegraph Forum, December 20, 2006

MANSFIELD — The METRICH Enforcement Unit annually spends $115,000 on drug buys.

But because of federal and state funding cuts, METRICH will receive a total of only $100,000 in 2007 after getting $260,000 this year.

Mansfield police Chief Phil Messer, also the program director for METRICH, made the cutback announcement today at the Holiday Inn at a luncheon celebrating the task force's 20th anniversary.

"One good thing about METRICH is we have prepared for cuts," Messer said. "We hope that most of our agencies have made plans to get us through 2007."

It's anyone's guess after that.

"After 2007, the cuts could be so deep you can't survive as a task force," Messer said.

Task forces in general could be in trouble. In 2002, $4.8 million of federal money was allocated from the U.S. Department of Justice through the Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services for task forces. That figure will drop to $1.2 million in 2007.

Messer said he hopes the 10 counties in the region would continue to work together even if they receive no funding.

"It would be difficult to do, but it's worth staying together," he said.

Messer said METRICH has avoided using grant money for personnel, opting to earmark the funds for training and equipment.

"Hopefully, that good planning will sustain us through what should be a very challenging year," the chief said.

DOJ_NMG_0108035

Another possible way to offset the budget cuts is a proposal to have participating agencies make a 50-50 match for any federal and state funding instead of the current 25 percent.

During the luncheon, METRICH recognized several people for their involvement.

Attorney John Allen and Mansfield Municipal Court Judge Jerry Ault, then members of the Richland County Prosecutor's Office, were two of the founding members.

Messer recalled them starting METRICH "because the police and the sheriff's office couldn't get along."

From those humble beginnings, METRICH has grown into the largest multi-jurisdictional task force in the state.

That includes Crawford County.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Juniper Takes Big Charge For Tainted Options (MERCN)

By Mark Schwanhausser

The San Jose Mercury News, December 21, 2006

Announcing one of the largest restatements stemming from the stock option scandal, Juniper Networks said today it will take a charge of about $900 million to account for tainted options issued to Chief Executive Scott Kriens and others during the frenzied tech boom.

``That tells me the profits of this company were massively overstated during this time period, that's what it tells me," said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues.

The Sunnyvale networking and security company's board and audit committee absolved Kriens of responsibility and ``expressed their continuing confidence" in him and the current management team. In a press release issued after the stock market had closed, the company said its seven-month investigation assigned blame to ``certain former management" whom the company declined to identify.

Still, some corporate governance experts say the company's probe left unanswered questions about Kriens' role -- questions that might not be resolved until the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department conclude their own probes.

Corporate investigations have triggered at least $8 billion in restatements nationwide so far, according to Bloomberg News. Juniper's restatement ranks behind UnitedHealth ($1.5 billion to $1.7 billion), Broadcom ($1.5 billion) and Brocade Communications Systems (about $1 billion, including adjustments not related to backdated options).

Some analysts downplayed the findings, saying the news shouldn't make Juniper a less-attractive acquisition target.

``You're talking about things that happened in 1999, and it's a non-cash charge," said Sam Wilson, an analyst with JMP Securities. ``It's now what's called old news. Wall Street looks ahead, they don't care what happened in 2002 and 2003. They care about 2006 and 2007."

Juniper's internal probe found ``numerous" cases of misdated options, with ``99.9 percent" of the problems occurring from just days before the company's initial public offering in June 1999 through December 2003. The company also cited lax controls by management to oversee the options program.

CEO Kriens received two tainted grants during that period, both issued at quarterly lows in Juniper's volatile stock price. In 2000, for example, his options were granted at $93.94 -- just weeks after the stock had hit its all-time high of $243.

Both of Kriens' grants were canceled in 2001. Company records indicate, however, that he exchanged 2.2 million ``underwater" options granted in 1999 and 2000 for 2.2 million options priced six months later at the going rate of $10.31 per share in May 2002.

Two corporate governance experts raised concerns that Kriens continues to benefit from the original tainted options.

``Follow the money trail: He got options that were backdated, and he turned them in for something else of value," said Las Vegas compensation expert Graef Crystal. ``He can't wiggle out of that. It isn't `no harm, no foul,' because he got something of value."

Despite the board's vote of confidence in Kriens, the scandal could continue to dog Kriens and Juniper, Fernandez said.

DOJ_NMG_0108036

``Here is a case where you have close to a $1 billion restatement, and it's the sitting CEO who is affected," he said. ``That probably won't be lost on the regulatory bodies or the lawyers" filing shareholder lawsuits.

IBM Ends Director Stock Options, Spotlighting Popular Perk's Decline (WSJ)

By Joann S. Lublin And William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Stock options, long touted by many companies as a vital tool for rewarding board members and aligning their interests with those of shareholders, are falling out of favor as a perk amid scandal and accounting and legal changes.

Yesterday, International Business Machines Corp. said it no longer will grant outside directors stock options -- which give recipients the right to purchase company shares in the future at a set price. Instead, starting Jan. 1, those directors will be paid an annual $200,000 retainer, which they can take either in IBM shares or partly in cash -- though rules strongly encourage them to take the shares.

IBM is only the latest big company to abandon options -- which are worthless unless a stock price rises -- in favor of compensation involving cash, restricted stock or outright equity stakes that both rise and fall with the share price. The move by the iconic company underscores a broader repudiation of options for board members two decades after many companies began to embrace them -- and could even accelerate the trend because of IBM's reputation as a bellwether of corporate behavior. Among others that have dropped the practice in recent years are retailer Gap Inc., recruiter Heidrick & Struggles International Inc. and food company Tyson Foods Inc.

In 2001, as the stock-market boom of the 1990s crested, nearly eight in 10 big companies were giving their directors options, according to a proxy analysis of 350 major companies conducted for The Wall Street Journal by Mercer Human Resource Consulting in New York. By last year, the figure was down to 53%.

The percentage may drop to as low as 10% by 2010, because boards now consider options "somewhat problematic," said Charles Elson, head of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware's business school, and a director of two public companies. Abandoning options "reduces the controversy" because "any potential for manipulation just goes away," said Peter Gleason, chief operating officer of the National Association of Corporate Directors in Washington.

Options are suffering a heavy backlash after big corporate scandals such as the accounting frauds at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. and the more recent backdating scandal, corporate-governance experts said. In those and other cases, critics have claimed directors, motivated to boost returns on their stock options, turned a blind eye to problems.

The backdating scandal has revealed that dozens of companies altered their grant dates to days when their stock was trading at a lower price -- thereby boosting profits on options. More than 130 companies currently are under investigation for the practice in the biggest corporate-fraud probe in decades. An academic study released this week suggested that as many as 1,400 outside board members at 160 companies received questionable option grants, though the study didn't address whether they knew about it.

Companies also are responding to new accounting rules requiring options to be counted as an expense after more than a decade in which they weren't. Under proxy-disclosure rules that took effect for fiscal years ending after Dec. 15, moreover, businesses must reveal far more detail about the elements and costs of board compensation packages -- which could make options less attractive.

More broadly, post-Enron changes in laws and corporate practices have imposed greater demands on outside directors -- that is, those who have no other ties to a company. The New York Stock Exchange, for instance, now requires that a majority of board seats, and all compensation- and audit-committee members, be independent.

That has prompted plenty of discussion about how best to compensate outside directors and keep them focused on shareholder interests while protecting their independence. Outside directors are supposed to play a special role safeguarding against cozy board relationships with management.

"The overall governance thrust today is to have board members be [stock] owners rather than optionees," said Pearl Meyer, senior managing director of Steven Hall & Partners, a pay consulting firm in New York. Options focus recipients "too much on short-term movements in the stock price," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0108037

Director compensation has been a subject of heated debate and experimentation for more than two decades. In the 1980s, corporate reformers and some large institutional investors argued that options would help motivate directors to focus harder on shareholder returns by giving them ownership incentives. The idea gained fuel thanks to tax and accounting policies that kept options tax- and expense-free, and the large fortunes that began to be made by companies going public in the early days of the 1990s boom.

According to Executive Compensation Reports, a newsletter that covered executive pay, just 1.6% of the nation's 1,000 largest companies gave directors some kind of stock in 1983. By 1994, nearly one in five did.

No one has suggested that IBM's directors received backdated grants. An IBM spokesman said the Armonk, N.Y., computer giant's action was consistent with its practice of "broadly reducing our reliance on stock options" as compensation for employees and officers.

IBM started expensing options in 2005 because of new accounting rules. But even before that, "we'd been saying we were reducing our reliance on equity compensation," he said. People familiar with the matter said IBM also believes options tend to make recipients more oriented toward short-term results than they are with other forms of compensation.

IBM said the additional cash compensation for directors is equal to the value of the stock options outside directors have been receiving; each year they were given 4,000.

Ironically, IBM's elimination of options increases the likelihood that outside directors will acquire sizable share stakes -- thanks to its substantial stock-ownership guidelines. The company pays 60% of these board members' annual retainer in a type of deferred stock known as "Promised Fee Shares," the latest proxy noted. Those shares are based on the market price of IBM stock. They accumulate dividends in the form of more Promised Fee Shares, and they can't be redeemed until retirement or departure from the board, at which time the director can receive either IBM stock or the cash equivalent.

Under IBM's corporate-governance guidelines, such directors are expected "to have stock-based holdings in IBM equal in value to five times the annual retainer," the proxy added. With the retainer doubled to $200,000, each outside IBM board member must now aim to own $1 million worth of shares.

The IBM spokesman said all the company's outside directors this year chose to invest all of their cash compensation in such shares. IBM directors include Lucio Noto, former chief executive of Mobil Corp.; James W. Owens, chief executive of Caterpillar Inc.; Kenneth I. Chennault, chief executive of American Express Co.; and Minoru Makihara, former chairman of Mitsubishi Corp. IBM Chairman and Chief Executive Samuel J. Palmisano is the only IBM employee on the board.

Recent years have seen companies take a wide range of approaches to compensating directors. Coca-Cola Co. earlier this year unveiled a plan to pay directors solely through annually allocated "equity-share units," which can't be cashed until three years have passed -- and then only if Coke posts compounded annual growth of 8% in earnings per share.

Similarly, Campbell Soup Co. board members will no longer get options as of Jan. 1. Instead they will receive an equal mixture of actual shares and cash, the big food maker disclosed in its latest proxy statement. "We have moved away from stock options as a form of compensation in part due to the change in accounting rules," a spokesman said.

When Heidrick & Struggles eliminated options for directors in 2002, it replaced them with restricted stock units, believing that "would better align the interests of the directors with our stockholders," its 2002 proxy said. In light of later controversy over options, "it looks like it was a wise decision," said Gerard Roche, senior chairman. "We're in a position where we don't have any worries" about director compensation.

Some companies eschew any stock-based compensation for directors at all. Those that pay outside directors only in cash include Alcoa Inc., Berkshire Hathaway Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp.

IBM won mixed reviews yesterday. "It's a welcome move" because options create incentives "that aren't in the interest of long-term shareholders," said Dan Pedrotty, head of the AFL-CIO's Office of Investment. But he said he wishes the company would go further and adopt a performance-share plan for directors. Union-sponsored pension funds have assets of about $400 billion.

But Mr. Elson, of the University of Delaware, said he was troubled by the move -- even though outside directors must hold a high multiple of their cash retainer in IBM shares. "To show continued confidence, you have to own stock over the long term" and also be partly paid in stock, he said. "You should increase your [stock] position over time."

DOJ_NMG_0108038

Separately, American Tower Corp. said yesterday that directors and officers who received options at prices below the fair-market value on the legal grant date have agreed to "eliminate any benefit" by compensating the company in cash, or by canceling vested but unexercised options. The company will increase the exercise price of any unexercised options to the fair-market value. American Tower, a Boston-based owner of cellphone towers, said that the value of eliminating the benefit is $7.5 million.

American Tower said it plans to eliminate similar options benefits totaling $7.6 billion for three former executives.

American Tower has said that "there were a number of deficiencies in the company's stock option granting practices." Last month it restated results for 2005 to reflect a review of the options. A spokesman didn't immediately return calls seeking comment on the options issue or the names of the executives and directors involved.

American Tower Will Cut Gains From Managers' Options (BLOOM)

By Ville Heiskanen, Alex Armitage

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

Dec. 20 (Bloomberg) -- American Tower Corp., the largest U.S. owner of sites for wireless telephone antennas, will eliminate about $7.5 million in gains from misdated stock option grants given to eight current executives and directors.

The company also plans to cut about $7.6 million in benefits received by three former officers, Boston-based American Tower said today in a statement. And the company said it will resume a half-finished $750 million stock buyback.

American Tower continues to cooperate with U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission options inquiries. The company reported on Nov. 8 that some managers routinely misdated option grants for at least six years, artificially inflating their worth. It is one of at least 190 companies to report internal or federal options probes.

``The stock option probe will not have significant consequences for the company," said Vance Edelson, a Morgan Stanley analyst in New York, in a note to investors today.

``Resumption of the share buyback program is a double positive for American Tower," Edelson said. He rates the shares ``overweight."

American Tower will resume a stock buyback program started a year ago and suspended in May. The company has already spent $358.3 million to buy 11.8 million shares, leaving $391.7 million to be spent by Feb. 28.

American Tower may decide to extend the buyback program, Edelson said in his note. He said the pace of the repurchases, at about $100 million a month, will be faster than a ``widely anticipated pace" of $80 million a month.

Shares of American Tower slipped 27 cents to $36.98 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have risen 36 percent this year.

Backdating options to days when prices were lower can boost gains to employees and directors who get them, if the underlying stock's price rises. American tower said the values of eliminated gains may be adjusted for taxes.

Chordiant Gets Nasdaq Noncompliance Note (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

Chordiant Receives Nasdaq Noncompliance Notice Over Delayed Reports From Options Probe

CUPERTINO, Calif. (AP) -- Chordiant Software Inc., a maker of customer relationship software for businesses, said Wednesday it received an anticipated Nasdaq Staff Determination letter for its failure to timely file its 2006 annual report as a result of a stock options probe.

Nasdaq initially informed the company in August that its common stock would be delisted because of its failure to timely file its Form 10-Q for the quarter ended June 30, unless it requested a hearing. Chordiant appeared before the Nasdaq Listing Qualifications Panel, which issued a decision granting it an exception until Dec. 29, to get into compliance with listing rules.

Last month, Chordiant decided to restate its historical financial statements for 2001 through 2003, the nine-month period ended Sept. 30, 2004, fiscal 2005, and the quarters ended Dec. 31, 2005 and March 31, 2006. The company said it intends to seek an additional extension to file its amended and delinquent reports, including its Form 10-K for 2006.

The restatements are necessary because of the conclusions of a historical stock option review concluded by its audit committee, which determined additional non-cash expense for the period 2001 through 2006 is expected to be about $8 million.

A total of 105 companies are currently under Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department stock-option grants scrutiny, and at least 90 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews, according to an AP review.

"No assurance can be made that the company will be granted an additional extension," according to Chordiant. "If the Listing Qualifications Panel does not grant the request, the company's common stock will be delisted."

Shares of Chordiant added 16 cents, or 5.1 percent, to $3.27 in afternoon trading.

4 Former Enterasys Officials Found Guilty (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

Jury can't decide former officer's fate in fraud case

CONCORD, N.H. -- A federal jury convicted four former Enterasys executives on securities fraud and conspiracy charges yesterday, but was unable to reach a verdict on five charges against the computer networking company's former chief operating officer.

The verdict came after more than a week of jury deliberations. The onetime executives were accused of scheming to inflate company revenues in the quarter ended Sept. 1, 2001.

The charges were related to sales contracts, investments, and revenue the company reported during and immediately after its spinoff from Cabletron Systems Inc.

The four former executives were convicted on 27 of 39 conspiracy, securities, and wire fraud charges against them. They included:

Former chief financial officer Robert Gagalis, 49, of Rye.

Former vice president Bruce Kay, 53, of Yarmouth, Maine.

Former accountant Robert Barber, 53, of Durham.

David Boey, 51, of Atlanta, who worked in the company's Singapore office.

Former chief operating officer Jerry Shanahan, the only defendant who was not a certified public accountant, was acquitted on one count of securities fraud. The jury returned no verdict on a wire fraud charge, three other securities fraud charges, and a conspiracy charge.

Shanahan, who is from Ireland, will remain free on bail while the US attorney's office decides whether to retry him on those charges, a spokeswoman said.

The securities fraud charges are each punishable by up to 10 years in prison, while conspiracy can draw up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The four executives will remain free until they are sentenced on March 21 and March 22.

Enterasys, which was publicly traded and based in Rochester, N.H., at the time, makes routers and switches for corporate networks.

The company has since moved to Andover, Mass., and was taken private in March.

Former Enterasys Executives Convicted In New Hampshire (IW)

By W. David Gardner

InformationWeek, December 20, 2006

SUBSCRIBE

EVENTS

HOME

For PDA and Phone

SEARCH

Management Tech Center: • Careers • Management/Careers Blog • Best Practices • Jobs • Careers Newsletter • Global • ROI/TCO • Business Processes

» Discuss

» Write To Editor

Prosecutors scored another victory over executives who played illegal financial games during the technology bubble when a federal jury convicted four former executives of telecom equipment provider Enterasys of securities fraud and conspiracy charges.

The jury on Tuesday convicted former chief financial officer Robert Gagalis and three others on charges that they illegally inflated Enterasys revenue in 2001. Also convicted were Bruce Kay, a former VP; Robert Barber, a former accountant; and David Boey, a former executive in the firm's Singapore office.

But the jury acquitted the firm's former chief operating officer Jerry Shanahan of one charge and failed to return a verdict on several other charges he was facing. Prosecutors are considering whether to seek a new trial against him.

Enterasys was the largest piece of the former Cabletron, a networking firm whose stock rocketed into the stratosphere before the company was broken up in the early 2000s.

Four other former Enterasys executives, including former chairman, president, and CEO Enrique Fiallo, had previously pleaded guilty to charges and testified in the jury trial, according to media reports.

Sentencing of all the executives is scheduled for March.

The company has a storied history, beginning in 1983 in a Massachusetts garage as Cabletron and eventually employing 6,000, most of them in New Hampshire.

Cabletron tracked the technology bubble, inflating in the late 1990s, but collapsing in the early 2000s. Cabletron was broken into different units, and Enterasys remained the largest operation. Enterasys later moved back to Massachusetts and the firm was taken private in March.

Convicted Enterasys execs use homes for bail (MUL)

By DENIS PAISTE

Manchester Union Leader, December 21, 2006

Concord – Two of four former Enterasys executives convicted of securities fraud and conspiracy Tuesday by a jury in U.S. District Court in Concord have posted equity in their homes as bail, while two others have been ordered to home confinement with electronic bracelet monitoring pending sentencing on the federal criminal charges in March.

Former Enterasys Chief Financial Officer Robert Gagalis, 49, of Rye, signed an agreement to forfeit his $2.5 million home in Rye if he fails to appear for his sentencing, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney William E. Morse. Gagalis has approximately $1.5 million in equity in the house, he said.

Bruce D. Kay, former vice president. 53, of Yarmouth, Maine, agreed to forfeit his principal home and a vacation home collectively valued at about $630,000, which he owns free and clear, Morse said.

Although Robert G. Barber, 53, of Durham, a former accountant, agreed to forfeit his $400,000 house in Durham in which he had about $170,000 of equity, Morse said Judge Paul Barbadoro determined Barber did not have enough equity to provide an adequate assurance of appearance and ordered him to confinement in his home with electronic bracelet monitoring.

David (Hor Chong) Boey, 51, of Atlanta, who is a Malaysian national, also was ordered to serve home confinement with electronic bracelet monitoring. Boey had already put up the $60,000 equity in his $300,000 Atlanta metropolitan area home, as well as $30,000 in cash for collateral, Morse said.

The four were convicted on key conspiracy and fraud charges in which the government alleged they illegally inflated Enterasys' revenues in the quarter ended Sept. 1, 2001. They were part of 27 guilty pleas returned on 39 criminal charges in U.S. District Court Tuesday afternoon.

Morse said they have 10 days to file notice of appeal.

The jury acquitted the fifth defendant, Jerry Shanahan, 42, former chief operating officer, on a charge of keeping false books and records and deadlocked on three others against him.

Morse said yesterday afternoon the government is still weighing whether to retry Shanahan on the three charges that resulted in a hung jury.

Andrew Good, Shanahan's attorney, said yesterday he hoped to meet with prosecutors before the weekend.

Acting U.S. Attorney Joseph N. Laplante praised the verdict, stating yesterday: "The investing public deserves and needs accurate financial information about public companies. The successful prosecutions in this case should serve as a substantial deterrent to others in similar circumstances who might otherwise be inclined to cook the books.'"

As a result of the fraudulent scheme, then Rochester-based Enterasys overstated its revenue by more than $11 million in the quarter ending Sept. 1, 2001, the Justice Department said. Enterasys' shareholders lost approximately $1.3 billion after the company disclosed one of the fraudulent transactions and a pending investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The company specializes in computer networking equipment.

Enterasys Networks Inc. was taken private earlier this year and is now based in Andover, Mass.

Those convicted face possible sentences of five years and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy charges and 10 years on the securities charges.

Sentence hearings are set for Gagalis at 9:30 a.m. on March 21; for Kay at 10:30 the same day; for Barber at 9:30 a.m. on March 22; and for Boey at 10:30 a.m. the same day.

Prison stay delayed for ex-Homestore CEO (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, December 20, 2006

Lawyers seek release pending appeal of conviction

Lawyers for Stuart Wolff, the former Homestore CEO who was sentenced in October to 15 years in federal prison for his role in an accounting fraud scheme that artificially inflated Homestore revenues and almost ruined the company, have filed a motion to keep him out of custody pending an appeal of his conviction.

The motion raises questions about a judge's financial interest in a company involved with Wolff's case and other aspects of his trial.

U.S. District Court Judge Percy Anderson on Nov. 30 ordered Wolff to surrender himself to federal custody on or before Dec. 13 to begin serving his sentence, though legal proceedings have so far postponed his prison time.

On Dec. 7, Wolff's lawyers submitted a motion to the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals for Wolff's release, and lawyers had earlier filed a motion with the district court to put off Wolff's payment of a $5 million fine plus about $8 million in restitution. Wolff remains under electronic monitoring in his Southern California home.

"We think he should start serving his sentence," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner, who is representing the government in the case against Wolff. "We are just waiting to hear what the court is going to do."

E. Lawrence Barcella Jr., one of the lawyers who is representing Wolff, said, "We think that there are a number of very significant issues that we will be appealing on what we think constituted error which will cause the case to be reversed." These issues warrant that Wolff should be allowed to remain free pending the appeal, he added. Court briefs related to Wolff's appeal are due in April and May.

The court had recommended that Wolff serve his sentence at a federal prison in either Lompoc, Calif., or Taft, Calif.

Wolff served as CEO and chairman for Homestore -- now known as Move Inc. -- from 1997 to 2002, when he resigned during an internal investigation.

A group of 11 other Homestore officials have also been convicted for their participation in illegal schemes that led the company to restate its earnings and almost led to the delisting of the company's stock, which had dropped to just pennies per share.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Justice Department in April 2005 filed criminal and civil cases against Wolff and Peter Tafeen, the company's former executive vice president of business development from 1997 to 2001.

Tafeen pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison and three years of supervised release.

The government's case has focused on multimillion-dollar advertising transactions that Homestore entered into with AOL and other companies through which Homestore essentially paid itself by routing money to and from other companies and disguising the true nature of those transactions.

DOJ_NMG_0108042

Wolff's appeal, according to the court filing, "will raise the highly 'substantial' question whether the trial judge -- the Honorable Percy Anderson -- should have presided over the matter in the first place," as Anderson "acknowledged that he owned AOL stock and recognized that he had a 'financial interest in AOL.' " And the court motion notes that four current or former AOL employees testified at Wolff's trial.

While Wolff's lawyers had earlier sought to excuse Anderson from the case on the basis of his financial interest in AOL, a separate U.S. District Court judge had considered the matter and denied that motion. About half of the $67.3 million in disputed Homestore revenue was related to AOL, "which acted as the 'third leg' in most of the disputed transactions," Wolff's lawyers state in court documents, and they also noted that "the Department of Justice has filed a criminal complaint against AOL ... regarding AOL's participation in at least one of the very transactions charged in the Wolff indictment."

The Dec. 8 motion by Wolff's lawyers also takes issue with Anderson's denial of requests to allow an accounting expert as a witness to explain the complexity of accounting rules, and separate instruction that would have explained to the jury that "triangular deals" with a similar structure to those that Homestore engaged in are not always improper.

Also, Wolff's lawyers charge in their court filing that the court's admission of evidence related to Homestore's financial restatements was improper, and "other courts have concluded in substantially identical circumstances that restatements are not admissible."

Wolff's legal team includes Barcella and Howard M. Privette from the Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker LLP law firm in Los Angeles, as well as Lawrence S. Robbins, Gregory L. Poe and Mark T. Stancil from the Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner LLP law firm in Washington, D.C. Move Inc. had reached an agreement through which the company would pay up to $15.2 million related to Wolff's legal fees and up to $11.9 million in Tafeen's legal costs. The company has also faced legal fees relating to other former employees.

Wilner said that the government has begun the process of collecting money related to the judgment in Wolff's trial. The restitution amount relates to Wolff's insider trading profits from the scheme, he said.

A Job He Couldn't Refuse (MRKTWTCH)

By Matt Andrejczak, Marketwatch

Market Watch, December 20, 2006

Former airline CEO takes over bookkeeping duties at Dell Inc.

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Faced with two investigations into its bookkeeping, Dell Inc. turned to the head of its audit committee and a close friend of the chairman and the chief executive to sort out the accounting mess.

Donald Carty was named Dell's chief financial officer late Tuesday.

The move comes as the world's No. 2 manufacturer of personal computers copes with investigations into its bookkeeping, corporate stumbles and a faltering stock price.

Carty, a former CEO at American Airlines and a Dell director for 14 years, will succeed James Schneider on Jan. 1.

"Michael's a very good friend and Kevin Rollins, the CEO, is a very good friend. They just asked me to get involved, and they're two people I couldn't say no to," Carty told the Dallas Morning News.

But there is doubt about whether Carty is best suited to the job.

The 60-year-old executive is Dell's longtime audit-committee chairman, and the company's accounting methods are under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney in New York. The inquiries forced Dell to delay its third-quarter results last month.

"We are not sure if Carty is the best choice as he has been a Dell board member since 1992 and was the audit committee chairman who oversaw financial activities that are now in question by the SEC," wrote Shaw Wu, analyst at American Technology Research, which has a neutral rating on Dell shares.

Carty was forced to resign from American Airlines in 2003 after failing to disclose large bonuses and pension protections for executives even as he was negotiating for concessions from unions.

Dell spokesman Dwayne Cox declined to make Carty available for comment.

DOJ_NMG_0108043

But Cox contended that the former airline CEO's "high level of familiarity with Dell's finances" makes him a good fit for the job, adding that Carty will help to "revitalize the company."

Merrill Lynch analyst Richard Farmer wrote that Carty's appointment "could be interpreted as a vote of confidence about the potential outcome of the ongoing SEC investigation."

Farmer, who rates Dell shares neutral, said it's typically tough to attract a new CFO when the outcome of an SEC investigation is far from certain.

Michael Dell has been trying to shore up the company he founded 22 years ago amid stiffer competition from Hewlett-Packard Co., Lenovo and Apple Computer Inc.

Dell lost its status as the world's No. 1 personal computer maker to rival Hewlett-Packard in September. To bolster its sales, Dell broke its exclusive-supply agreement with Intel Corp., the world's largest maker of computer chips, and started offering PCs and servers equipped with chips from Advanced Micro Devices Inc.

In other moves, Tom Luce, a former U.S. assistant secretary of education, is re-joining Dell's board. Luce, 66, had served on Dell's board from 1991 to 2005, much of that time on the company's audit committee.

Carty and Luce are expected to work closely together as the company responds to questions from SEC and Justice Department enforcement officials, Dell said.

Dell also tapped Steve Schuckenbrock to lead the company's global services organization. Schuckenbrock is a former senior executive of EDS and PepsiCo.

In trading Wednesday, Dell shares fell 1.4% at $25.77.

Dell Books Carty To Captain Its Finances (FOR)

By Matthew Kirdahy

Forbes, December 20, 2006

Don Carty left American Airlines under a cloud. Now he's returning to a marquee corporate job at Dell, which has some clouds of its own.

Carty was tapped to be the computer maker's chief financial officer, with a vice chairmanship thrown in for good measure. He's already on the company's board and was previously chairman of the audit committee.

Which is puzzling because Dell's problems have to do with its accounting, indirectly overseen by the panel that Carty chaired. A month ago, the computer maker said the Securities and Exchange Commission launched a formal probe into unspecified issues with its books. Both the SEC and the Justice Department are investigating whether prior financials were misstated regarding issues like revenue recognition, accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items.

American Technology Research analyst Shaw Wu questioned the move. “Frankly, we are not sure if naming an existing member allows Dell (nasdaq: DELL - news - people) to restart with a clean slate,” said Wu. “For now, Kevin Rollins remains chief executive; however, we would not be surprised to see further changes should Dell not make material progress over the next couple quarters.”

In a note to investors, Prudential Equity Group’s Jesse Tortora said he expects more changes down the road as Dell rebounds after two delays in quarterly reports and a recall of faulty batteries.

“We believe Dell will continue to surprise investors over the next several quarters as the company re-establishes its cost leadership, wins share in servers and storage, and expands its services business,” Tortora said. Dell, once the unchallenged leader in Windows-based personal computers, has been facing stiff competition from a rejuvenated Hewlett-Packard (nyse: HPQ - news - people).

The Carty move was certainly a surprise. It is unusual for the chairman of a major corporation to return to another as a CFO, and more unusual in this case.

Carty was chairman of AMR (nyse: AMR - news - people), the parent company of American Airlines from 1998 to 2003.

He was the boss after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, which was especially hard on the commercial airline industry, especially American, which had the unhappy distinction of having two of its planes commandeered. Two years later, the company was running low on cash, having lost about $6 billion after the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0108044

To overcome the company's shaky finances Carty said he needed $1.8 billion in annual concessions, including pay cuts, from employees or the carrier would file for bankruptcy protection. Workers complied but then learned that bonuses and pension benefits for Carty and other senior executives were secretly approved at the same time the workers were aiding the company.

Carty quickly headed for the door.

Wall Street Raises Privacy Fears Over Election-Law Overhauls (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

State-level election-law overhauls are bumping up against Wall Street executives who want to protect their privacy.

A Wall Street trade association has gone to court to challenge a new Connecticut election law that requires that state officials maintain an Internet database listing the names of the children and spouses of executives at companies that do business with the state.

The law is meant to discourage executives from hiding campaign contributions by funneling them through family members. The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, a combined group of the stock-market and bond-trading trade groups, contends the state's public-disclosure requirement would invade its members' privacy and put children at risk.

"How many Dateline NBC 'To Catch a Predators' do we have to watch to know it's not a good idea to put the name of a kid on the Internet?" said Ira Hammerman, the association's general counsel. He said the trade group supports campaign reform, but said state officials "have gone overboard" in their "zeal to do the right thing."

The disclosure requirement is part of a campaign package passed by the state legislature in December 2005 and amended in May 2006.

With the names set to go online Dec. 31, the trade group filed papers Dec. 15 in U.S. District Court in Connecticut asking a judge to stop the state from going forward. State officials agreed to hold off posting names at least until Jan. 2, when a judge will hear arguments in the case.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said the group's concerns are understandable, but its assertion of a privacy right "seems questionable." He said the law requires the state to publish only the names of top executives' family members; no home addresses, telephone numbers, email addresses or ages would be posted.

Connecticut's effort to toughen its election laws came in the wake of a series of high-profile corruption scandals that landed former Gov. John G. Rowland and former state Treasurer Paul Silvester in prison. Mr. Silvester admitted steering hundreds of millions in state funds to investment firms in exchange for campaign contributions and consulting contracts for his friends.

Andy Sauer, executive director of Connecticut Common Cause, said his group's research found contractors linked to the scandals frequently sidestepped contribution limits by channeling money through family members. Mr. Sauer said Common Cause hasn't taken a position on the disclosure requirement.

FBR Settles With SEC Over Insider Trading Case (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath And Kim Hart

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group, the Arlington investment firm, yesterday agreed to pay $7.8 million to settle charges that it engaged in insider trading and other violations in 2001 when in effect it bet that the stock price of a client company would decline.

Emanuel Friedman, former chairman of the firm, agreed to pay almost $1.3 million for his role in the episode. He was held responsible as a top executive at FBR who allegedly knew about the firm's trading, but he was not accused of personally selling shares on confidential information. Friedman was barred from supervising a brokerage firm for at least two years, and two other former FBR executives agreed to smaller settlements on related charges.

Regulators alleged that shares in CompuDyne, an Annapolis security firm, had been sold short by FBR while it was handling a private stock sale for the company that would sharply increase the number of shares available to the public and depress their price. The trading allegedly netted FBR a profit of $343,773.

Short-selling is a type of trading that enables the seller to profit if the price of the stock later declines.

DOJ_NMG_0108045

FBR's conduct breached its duty to CompuDyne and victimized investors who bought shares from FBR without knowing that the private stock sale was in the works, officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

"It is unusual and a rare event for the SEC to bring enforcement actions against broker-dealers for insider trading," said Daniel M. Hawke, district administrator of the SEC's Philadelphia office.

The long-running investigation has been a cloud over FBR, a local upstart that rose to national prominence and vied with top Wall Street firms.

Regulators had previously taken enforcement action against a hedge fund and two of its employees stemming from the same CompuDyne deal.

In settling the new charges, FBR and the former executives neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing. FBR, Friedman and the company's former compliance director, Nicholas Nichols, settled with both the SEC and the NASD. Scott Dreyer, the former head trader for FBR, settled with the SEC.

On Nov. 21, CompuDyne announced that FBR had agreed to pay $4.5 million to the company and a former shareholder over the allegations.

FBR declined to comment on the settlement, but the firm's lawyer, Wallace L. Timmeny, said the matter was "absolutely finished."

"We are all very pleased that it is completely over," Timmeny said.

Friedman, 60, who helped found FBR, resigned from his posts as co-chairman and co-chief executive in April 2005 and is now running EJF Capital, a $400 million hedge fund venture in Arlington. His decision to the leave the firm was not related to the insider trading investigation, an FBR news release said.

In an interview yesterday, Friedman said he did not intend to violate any rules and did not profit personally from the trading at issue. "There is no assertion that I acted with bad intent or improper motive," Friedman said.

The settlement does not affect his asset management activities, and he said he does not intend to go back into the brokerage business.

According to the SEC complaint filed yesterday in federal court, CompuDyne was a thinly traded stock before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. After the attacks, the security company's stock price surged and it hired FBR to help with a pair of private transactions. An investor planned to sell a major stake in CompuDyne and CompuDyne planned to sell a new batch of shares to other investors.

Together, the transactions would more than triple the number of CompuDyne shares available for public trading. They would also occur at a lower price than investors were paying on the open market.

While the private sales were pending, and before they were publicly disclosed, FBR sold short CompuDyne shares. Friedman knew about the short-selling and did not stop it, even after a member of FBR's risk management group notified him that the volume of the trading had exceeded the firm's internal limit on short-selling any one stock, the SEC alleged.

"Friedman told FBR's head trader that FBR needed to be 'very, very, active' in CompuDyne stock and that if the stock price continued moving up, FBR should not be afraid to sell short," the SEC complaint said.

After the private offering was announced, CompuDyne's share price plunged.

FBR collected a $1,764,000 underwriting fee from CompuDyne. FBR profited by an additional $97,831 when it improperly sold shares from the private offering before they were registered, the SEC alleged.

The Pump-and-Dump Economy (WSJ)

By Michael S. Malone

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Three major news events in the second half of 2006 offer hints of an underlying problem that may stifle, if not this economic boom, then certainly the next. The Dow Jones Industrial Average reaching a record high, Google's announcement of its acquisition of YouTube, and the spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard -- all seemed comparatively unrelated. And yet, each bears within it a clue to a growing menace of misguided and ultimately destructive new regulations that has gone almost unremarked in all of the overheated press coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0108046

Take the Dow industrials blowing past 12000, and the attendant stratospheric valuations of companies like Google and Apple. While it is a welcome rebuke to those who smugly proclaimed five years ago that the tech industry was being punished for its excesses and would never see such good times again -- Silicon Valley and other tech enclaves are now more prosperous than ever -- it is troubling to note that something is missing from this new boom: Where are the IPOs?

Historically, stock booms have seen an explosion in the number of young companies making their first public sale of stock. In high tech, where most of these IPOs now come from, the new company strategy is to start up during a downturn while big competitors are distracted, weakened or paralyzed, then ramp up product introductions to catch the beginning of the next wave, and then go public as the boom (and the market) starts to peak. Certainly that was true during the dot.com boom: 1999 and 2000 saw more than 450 young companies go public. But it was also true throughout the '90s, where on a much smaller base, in good times and bad, an average of 160 companies per year went public.

By comparison, by the end of the third quarter this year, only 37 companies had offered IPOs -- a figure comparable to 2001, when the entire economy seemed to be coming apart. The shortfall doesn't owe to a lack of entrepreneurial fervor. Venture capital funds are swollen with money right now. Nor is it a shortage of new companies: VCs have invested nearly $20 billion in start-ups this year, suggesting that this is one of the most productive periods for new company creation in modern business history.

To know why they aren't going public, just look at their business plans. In the past, the inevitable end-point of these plans, the so-called liquidation moment, was an IPO. Not any more. These days, the goal of almost every new start-up is to be acquired by an established company. And in that little shift in orientation lies a potentially radical change in the U.S. economy. * * *

Why do young private companies want to sell out now instead of becoming public corporations? After all, the potential long-term gains for a founder for owning a chunk of stock in a large corporation are far greater than those from a quick sale. To understand this sudden desire to pump and dump, put yourself in the entrepreneurs' shoes. Looking ahead at a possible IPO for your hot little start-up, all you see are minefields of legal precedents and new regulations created after the dot.com boom.

Not least -- but worst -- there is the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, whose self-monitoring rules Big Corporate initially resisted, but now embraces as an effective way to track internal financial operations. That alone should make you suspicious, because when established businesses like new rules it's usually because it makes them more competitive against start-ups. Entrepreneurs have no constituencies, they don't hire lobbyists or form PACs (like Google just did). Meanwhile, in an almost perfectly timed punchline, China's biggest bank, ICBC, recently went public on the Hong Kong and Shanghai exchanges. The $19-billion IPO was the largest in history, arriving as Hong Kong becomes the world leader in IPOs.

The closer you look at Sarbanes-Oxley the more you realize it is almost perfectly designed to crush new business creation. The latest estimate for the annual cost of implementing Sarbox in a public corporation is $3.5 million. Pocket change for a Fortune 500 company; the entire annual profit of a newly public firm. Is it really any wonder that smart entrepreneurs look for a corporate sugar daddy instead of an IPO?

Which brings us to Google. One reason that few people have noticed the IPO dearth is that the one real initial public offering -- Google's legendary Going Public Day in August 2004 -- was such a supernova that it blinded everyone to the changes taking place around it. Now rich and fat, Google has assumed a new role in the Silicon Valley ecology: buyer. The joke these days is that every new business plan has the same words on the last page: Sell to Google. That probably makes Chris Sacca, Google's director of new business development, the most influential businessman in America today.

Google's $1.65-billion acquisition of YouTube is emblematic of this shift. YouTube might eventually have become the Google of the Web 2.0 generation, the great IPO that put a valuation on the rest of that young industry. Instead, it is unlikely that any of the new crop of community-based Web companies will ever show up on any big board; rather, their fate is to become yet one more offering on an existing billion-dollar web service. The entrepreneurs who've started those companies know the situation better than anyone -- and right now you'd be hard-pressed to find a Silicon Valley start-up that is building itself for the long haul. And that in turn is going to put some serious financial stress on the big, later-term venture capital companies -- the folks who financed the digital revolution -- as they find their business model increasingly obsolete.

Meanwhile, the one traditional force that might have propelled these companies forward to an eventual IPO is gone as well, also thanks to recent regulations. The Financial Accounting Standards Board, which advises the SEC, has been itching for years to force tech companies to put a value on their stock options -- despite the fact that most such options end up valueless. As with Sarbox, these regulators used the supposed excesses of Frank Quattrone and all of the others in the dot.com bubble to finally ram through new rules on stock option valuation.

DOJ_NMG_0108047

The result, as anyone but an accountant would have known, is that start-ups are far less willing to throw options like monopoly money to everyone from the chief scientist to the guy who waters the office plants. If that sounds good in principle, keep in mind that easy options were probably the most effective form of wealth distribution in modern life. The great stories are not about a Steve Jobs becoming a billionaire, but about his secretary becoming a millionaire.

Under the new options rules there will still be new T-shirt tycoons like Mr. Jobs, but a whole lot fewer of his secretaries will be able to retire young. And it will be interesting to see just how many of those secretaries (and code writers and marketing specialists) will be willing to put up with the long hours in a job that could disappear overnight -- merely for wages. That is yet another argument for keeping your start-up to little more than the coterie of founders, and then selling out quickly to Google. No wonder big tech companies like Microsoft and Intel jumped on the stock option reporting bandwagon so quickly.

If all of this sounds like one giant conspiracy (conscious or not) to destroy new high tech company creation in America, take comfort in knowing that Big Tech hasn't been forgotten, either.

Consider the H-P scandal. One of the real curiosities of the case has been why a company with a reputation for probity and propriety would suddenly kick over the ethical traces and start illegally spying on its own directors, not to mention reporters. The usual answers -- that the Carly Fiorina era made everyone half-nuts, that the subject of the leak (talk of choosing AMD over Intel processors) was too serious to be ignored -- are likely true, but insufficient for a company like H-P to lose its moral compass.

A more believable explanation, one you hear from those inside the company when all of this was going on, is that Good Scout H-P started toward this disaster by trying to live up exactly to the letter of the law -- in this case the new Regulation FD ("Fair Disclosure") on selective disclosure and insider trading instituted by the SEC in 2000. For a notorious stickler to details like Chairman Patricia Dunn, the boardroom leak represented not just a betrayal but a true threat to the future of Hewlett-Packard -- and, in the face of Regulation FD, it's hard to disagree. That was enough to turn her into Inspector Javert, ultimately hurting the company's reputation and destroying her own career.

Tom Hayes, who was a senior marketing executive at H-P at the time, argues that if Ms. Dunn and company had sat idly by as insiders unevenly shared corporate information with the outside world, they would likely have violated their fiduciary duties. Indeed, says Mr. Hayes, if you set aside the questionable acts by the outside firm she hired, Ms. Dunn might have been applauded for her diligence in meeting the new rules. No wonder Regulation FD is nicknamed "Fear and Distrust" in America's boardrooms.

At H-P as elsewhere, under Regulation FD plugging the leaks became a moral crusade. Hewlett-Packard just couldn't deal with the moral dilemmas that pursuit created. Other, less honorable, companies are probably not having that problem. Congress is right to ask how much of this self-spying is going on, but it should also look in the mirror and ask why. * * *

Given a fate of living under the magnifying glasses of SOX and FD, who in their right mind would want to sit on a corporate board these days? The smart board-level people I know in Silicon Valley now reduce their involvement to being merely corporate "advisers." Thus, the intellectual capital of America's high tech company boards is falling by the month.

It is often noted in dismay that military academies teach the last war, not the next one. The same can be said for business regulation. In the zeal to punish the excesses of the dot.com boom, the federal government, with the tacit approval of the electorate, sought to not only punish the small number of real evildoers but also build the perfect universal plugs for all of the perceived holes in existing business practices.

The result was Sarbanes-Oxley, Regulation FD and stock option valuation -- three great lessons in the law of unintended consequences. Let's do our own accounting: Thanks to this troika, fewer new companies are going public; economic power is being concentrated in the hands of fewer companies; competition is reduced; new wealth is less widely distributed; the rich are getting richer; fewer talented people want to join entrepreneurial ventures; and corporate boards are getting stupider and more paranoid. And, please note, one of the crucial triggers for economic booms -- a burst of young tech company IPOs -- has now largely evaporated.

Just curious, but is this really what federal regulators, Congress and shareholder rights activists had in mind?

DOJ_NMG_0108048

Mr. Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, is author of "Bill and Dave: How Hewlett and Packard Built the World's Greatest Company," to be published next April.

Hedge Fund Secrets (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Phillip Goldstein is at it again. This time last year, the White Plains, N.Y., hedge-fund manager was in a federal appeals court in Washington fighting the Securities and Exchange Commission's ill-considered hedge fund regulation, an effort that bore fruit in June when the judges slapped down the SEC. Now he has the agency's portfolio disclosure rules in his sights, and the result could inform the broader debate over hedge fund regulation.

Specifically, Mr. Goldstein is seeking an exemption from Section 13(f) of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act, and if he doesn't get it he says he'll mount a legal challenge to the rule. The clause requires managers with more than $100 million in assets under their care to disclose their equity positions quarterly. Congress passed the law in 1975 amid a wave of anti-big-fund fervor, with the idea that the SEC could use the disclosures to figure out how to "clean up" large investment funds. In reality, the SEC merely makes the filings available to the public because staffers lack the time or mandate to do anything with the data. No one at the Commission could even tell us exactly how many of these filings come in each quarter.

Not so other investors, however, and that's the nub of Mr. Goldstein's complaint. Filers of 13(f) forms can request confidentiality but the bar is so high that, of all the managers covered by the rule, only about 60 ask for secrecy in any given quarter. So 13(f)-based articles frequently appear in the business press reporting the latest moves of savvy investors.

Mr. Goldstein argues that this is tantamount to theft, allowing others to capitalize on smart money managers' talents without paying for their services. And by facilitating this, Mr. Goldstein says, the SEC is essentially perpetrating an eminent domain seizure of managers' intellectual property rights.

It's a novel theory. Whether or not it succeeds, though, Mr. Goldstein's gambit promises to spark a much-needed discussion about the virtues of secrecy. Hedge funds, let it not be forgot, have come in for intense scrutiny because they are often "black boxes" that emit as little information as possible about their holdings.

Mr. Goldstein argues that such secrecy isn't sinister; it's protection of valuable intellectual property. Some disclosures, like the financials of publicly traded companies, benefit small investors. But there's no good reason to shine the light on everything, particularly when public disclosure benefits only large institutional investors with enough clout of their own to pry information from fund managers.

Hedge-fund secrecy has become something of a political issue on Capitol Hill, and now the five worthies who run the SEC find themselves confronted with it perhaps sooner than they wished; a vote of the commissioners will have to decide the fate of Mr. Goldstein's petition, probably within a few months. Chairman Chris Cox has been trying to carve out a reasoned position on hedge fund regulation, and here's a chance for him to do so.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Death Penalty May Follow A N.Y. Verdict (NYS)

By JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN

New York Sun, December 21, 2006

The first federal death penalty execution of a New York resident in more than 50 years may be on the horizon following the conviction yesterday of a Staten Island gang member who executed two undercover police detectives.

In the U.S. courthouse in Brooklyn yesterday, the foreman of the jury called out "guilty" in a loud voice for each of the 10 counts in Ronell Wilson's federal racketeering indictment. The jury will return to the courthouse January 10 to hear more testimony before deciding whether to impose a sentence of death or life in prison without parole.

Police officers unable to find seating in the crowded courtroom lined the hallway outside as the verdict was announced.

"The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public," Police Commissioner Kelly said in a statement. "They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice."

DOJ_NMG_0108049

The jury found that Wilson killed two detectives in the course of committing a carjacking and robbery on behalf of a violent organization. The crime occurred in northeastern Staten Island not far from the projects of the Stapleton Houses, which prosecutors say served as the base for the gang.

The two slain detectives, James Nemorin and Rodney Andrews, were members of the police department's elite Firearms Investigations Unit, which targets the city's illicit gun market. Nemorin had previously purchased a gun from a member of the gang, which prosecutors called the Stapleton Crew, and he returned on March 10, 2003, the evening of his murder, with his partner, Rodney Andrews, believing they would be able to buy another.

In response to yesterday's conviction, Mayor Bloomberg reaffirmed his commitment to seizing illegal guns.

Referring to the two slain detectives, Mr. Bloomberg said, "We will continue to honor their memory by doing everything possible to take illegal guns of the street and protect the safety of all New Yorkers."

At the beginning and end of the trial, prosecutors told the jury that Wilson had at least considered that the men could be police officers, although the criminal charges did not require that Wilson knew the true identity of the men.

Over the course of three weeks of testimony, prosecutors called two members of the Stapleton Crew to testify against Wilson. One of those witnesses, Mitchell Diaz, said members of the gang had discussed the possibility that Nemorin was a police officer. The other gang member prosecutors called to testify, Jessie Jacobus, was with Wilson when he murdered the two detectives. Jacobus, 17 at the time of the shootings, testified that Wilson, then 20, shot both detectives in the head suddenly and without warning. Jacobus testified that the plan had been to rob them.

Attorneys for Mr. Wilson pinned their efforts on undermining Jacobus's testimony and suggesting that it could have been Jacobus who committed to the murders.

Refrain Of 'Guilty' Ends Trial In Murder Of 2 Detectives (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

A street gang member who boasted of bloodshed and invincibility in his amateur rap lyrics was found guilty yesterday of capital murder for shooting two undercover detectives in the back of the head during a weapons sting on Staten Island.

The convicted man, Ronell Wilson, 24, known by the street name Rated R, cocked his head to watch sidelong and deadpan as the jury foreman announced the verdict, which could lead to his death by lethal injection. The same anonymous panel will reconvene next month in Federal District Court in Brooklyn to decide whether to impose a death sentence.

The verdict, after three and a half years of legal machinations, concluded an agonizing chapter for the Police Department. The two detectives, James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews, were killed on March 10, 2003, the first two officers killed by gunfire in a single day since 1988.

Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly called the decision a victory for police officers and for the people of New York. "They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice," he said in a written statement, adding that he hoped the verdict would provide a measure of comfort to the detectives' families. "We will never forget them or their sacrifice."

Outside the courtroom, officers who had worked alongside the two detectives whispered their relief. "It's finally over," said Detective Al Hawkins, who served with both men in the firearms unit. "I'm just happy. I guess there is a God."

The extended murder case bridged a passage from the aftermath of the 2001 terrorist attacks, when the nation warmly embraced the New York police, to the onset of new acrimony after several police shootings of civilians. It became a part of the debate over the state's death penalty law and was a catalyst for an ambitious weapons crackdown by the city.

In a written statement on the verdict, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said, "We will continue to honor their memory by doing everything possible to take illegal guns off the street and protect the safety of all New Yorkers."

The killings drew scrutiny to the work of undercover narcotics and firearms investigators, their mission perilous by nature and furtive by design. And by a twist of fate, the three-and-a-half-week trial of Mr. Wilson began two days after an undercover police team in Queens killed an unarmed man in a rain of 50 bullets.

DOJ_NMG_0108050

The coincidence made for uneasy parallels as such undercover terms of art as set (the area of operation) and ghost (for backup officer) were analyzed simultaneously in the Brooklyn courtroom and in protests and news conferences concerning the Queens case.

Within the walls of the courthouse, where a lunchroom telecast of the proceedings droned daily for overflow crowds of law enforcement officers and police union officials, there was solidarity and undiminished grief. Even as Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis banished police regalia from the courtroom at the outset so as not to prejudice the jury, officers attended in plainclothes, with flag pins on their lapels.

In the gallery, they sat grimfaced alongside the detectives' widows and kin, who lost control of their emotions at times and left for the makeshift cafeteria theater to regain their composure, with mixed success.

Across the courtroom aisle sat supporters of Mr. Wilson, including his mother, Cheryl Wilson. Another of her sons, Leonard Wilson, is serving 25 years to life for the murder of a rival drug dealer in 1999. At the center of the trial, her younger son sat calmly and impassively, betraying neither hope nor despair.

Family members on all sides declined to comment on the verdict, as many of them are likely to testify in the death penalty phase of the trial. In that proceeding, set to begin Jan. 10, prosecutors will offer lists of aggravating factors, and defense lawyers will offer lists of mitigating ones. In court yesterday, defense lawyers said they planned two weeks of testimony; prosecutors promised that their case would be "brief."

The forum allows room for arguments on residual doubt, a kind existing beyond the reasonable, as well as on penitence, continuing danger to society, congenital disadvantage, influence of rap culture and spark of humanity in him. Mr. Wilson's lyrics will almost certainly be discussed, especially lines like "I won't stop until I'm dead."

Only three men have been executed in federal prison since 1988, when the modern death penalty statute was enacted, though the states have put hundreds to death. The last federal inmate executed in a New York case was Gerhard A. Puff, a bank robber convicted of killing an F.B.I. agent and put to death in 1954.

The New York courts invalidated the latest version of the state death penalty law in 2004 midway through a series of turns that extended the prosecution of Mr. Wilson and his co-defendants, a gang of men based around the Stapleton Houses project in northeastern Staten Island. Federal prosecutors took over the case, endorsing existing plea bargains and striking others to build a racketeering case carrying the federal death penalty.

Seven members of the crew pleaded guilty to various crimes, including two men who testified against Mr. Wilson in exchange for letters to their sentencing judges.

It was never proved whether Mr. Wilson knew his victims were detectives, and an accomplice's recantation eventually prompted prosecutors to drop such charges. But a witness testified that Mr. Wilson gave a reason for the shootings in the minutes after he pulled the trigger. He did not care, the witness quoted him saying, "about anybody."

The prosecutors, Colleen Kavanagh, Morris J. Fodeman and Jack Smith, assisted by Special Agent Thomas Shelton of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, presented nearly three weeks of testimony and evidence from members of the crew, scientific experts, civilian eyewitnesses, investigators and audio and video surveillance recordings.

After nine hours of deliberations over two days, the seven men and five women of the jury notified the judge of a verdict at 1 p.m. yesterday. The gallery filled with spectators, including law officers, family members, television commentators, sketch artists and the United States attorney, Roslynn R. Mauskopf.

The lawyers packed their briefing papers and soda bottles, for something to do. Federal marshals lined the gallery in dark suits and holiday ties. The courtroom was nearly silent but for doors opening and closing.

Mr. Wilson walked in slowly and shook hands with a lawyer, then sat and surveyed this scene. He wore dark slacks and an argyle sweater. He maintained his even demeanor.

The judge asked for decorum, telling anyone who could not keep silent to watch from the overflow room. No one left. Mr. Wilson rocked side to side in his chair, slowly.

"Will the defendant please rise?" the judge said, and Mr. Wilson lifted himself from his chair, palms on the table. The widows and sisters of the detectives clutched hands tightly and sank in their pews.

DOJ_NMG_0108051

The jury foreman stood in a black suit, eyes on the judge. One by one, he declared Mr. Wilson guilty of two counts of murder in aid of racketeering, robbery conspiracy, attempted robbery and carjacking, each one a charge punishable by death. He continued, declaring him guilty of two counts of using a firearm, two of causing death with a firearm and another of robbery conspiracy, 10 crimes in all.

The gallery was hushed. There were many dry eyes. Mr. Wilson arched his brow for a second. His hands were clasped behind his back, and he gave a small shrug, then sat and leaned back in his padded chair. He glanced at his mother and then returned his gaze to some point far, far away.

Guilty In Killing Of 2 Detectives (NSDY)

By Herbert Lowe, Newsday Staff Writer

Newsday, December 21, 2006

A reputed Staten Island gang leader now awaits a federal jury's decision next month on whether he should live or die after the panel found him guilty yesterday in Brooklyn of killing two New York City police detectives.

"I just feel good that justice was served," said Al Hawkins, assigned to the same NYPD Firearms Investigation Unit as the slain detectives. "I'm just happy. There is a God. There is a silver lining. It's not going to bring them back. But the people ... have spoken."

After deliberating for nine hours over two days, the jury convicted Ronell Wilson, 24, in the deaths of undercover detectives James Nemorin, 36, of Baldwin Harbor and Rodney Andrews, 34, of Middle Village during an aborted gun buy on March 10, 2003.

Wilson calmly shifted his arms from front to back, then front again, but showed no emotion as he stood between his attorneys as the jury foreman announced "guilty" on all 10 charges in the racketeering murder case.

With U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis having warned against any outbursts from the packed gallery, Nemorin's widow, Rose, and Andrews' ex-wife, Maryann, sat quietly in the second row with seven other women, all relatives of the detectives, holding hands as the verdict was read.

Afterward, Nemorin and Andrews, herself a New York City police officer, declined to comment on the verdicts. So, too, did federal prosecutors and Wilson's attorneys.

But Hawkins praised the jury and said Wilson's conviction showed that "good citizens" will not tolerate the killing of police officers.

Prosecutors contend that Wilson, the reputed leader of the notorious Stapleton Crew, shot and killed Nemorin and Andrews in their undercover car as the detectives were seeking to purchase a Tec-9 gun from Wilson and an accomplice, who said both he and Wilson were planning to rob the two men of the $1,200 to $1,300 purchase money. Wilson used a .44-caliber handgun to murder the two detectives, prosecutors said.

"Detectives Rodney Andrews and James Nemorin were selfless heroes who put their lives on the line to get illegal guns off the streets of our city," Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in a statement after the verdict. "For their families, today's guilty verdict and the knowledge that a cop killer will not be allowed to roam free provides some small measure of comfort. We will never forget the sacrifice of Detectives Andrews and Nemorin. We will be forever grateful for their service, courage and dedication to our city."

"The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public," Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said in a separate statement. "They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice."

Garaufis told the panel of seven men and five women they must return to his courtroom on Jan. 10 to begin the trial's penalty phase.

Wilson's attorneys told the judge they expect to spend nearly two weeks presenting evidence and testimony in hopes of persuading the jury to spare his life. Garaufis said he expects a penalty verdict by late January.

While state appeals courts have voided the death penalty in New York, Michael Palladino, president of the New York City Detectives Benevolent Association, said he was hopeful a federal death sentence against Wilson could be carried out.

Q&A: What comes next

What's next in the Ronell Wilson murder trial?

DOJ_NMG_0108052

The same jury of seven men and five women that found him guilty must report back to U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis in Brooklyn federal court on Jan. 10 for the start of the trial's penalty phase.

Is the penalty phase the same as a normal trial?

In many respects, yes, but a major difference is that the defense is presumed to have the burden of proof in its bid to see that Wilson's life is spared.

How long is the penalty phase expected to last?

Wilson's attorneys said they plan to spend nearly two weeks presenting evidence and testimony on his behalf. Prosecutors have said they will be brief in their bid for the death penalty, but they were not more specific. Garaufis told the jury the penalty phase should be concluded in January.

What happens if the jury votes not to impose the death penalty?

Wilson is then likely to be sentenced to life in prison without parole.

Will Wilson personally ask the jury to spare his life?

That is not known yet.

- HERBERT LOWE

Cops' Killer Faces Needle (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, December 21, 2006

He took the lives of two NYPD detectives, killed them without any thought of remorse. Now Ronell Wilson will have time to think about his cold-blooded act - and whether he will lose his own life for it.

A Brooklyn federal jury will reconvene Jan. 10 to consider whether Wilson should face death by lethal injection for murdering undercover Detectives James Nemorin and Rodney Andrews.

The jury's decision to approve the death penalty must be unanimous. No one convicted of a capital crime in the Eastern District of New York - covering Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island and Long Island - has ever been executed.

But for those who were touched by the lives of Nemorin and Andrews, and left empty by their deaths, there is always room for a first.

"Cop killers will be brought to justice," Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said in a statement. "The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public."

Wilson was convicted yesterday of 10 counts of racketeering murder, carjacking, robbery and criminal use of a firearm.

The feds took on the case after the state's death penalty statute was ruled unconstitutional by the state Court of Appeals.

Federal Judge Nicholas Garaufis had warned spectators against any outbursts and the heroes' widows conducted themselves with quiet dignity.

Nemorin's widow, Rose, nodded her head at each guilty count. Andrews' widow, Maryann, leaned forward so the jurors could not see her crying - then text-messaged the verdict on her phone to their two young sons at school.

Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf wiped tears from her eyes after the verdict was read by the jury foreman in a loud, strong voice after only nine hours of deliberations.

But the 24-year-old killer from Staten Island stood with a blank look on his face.

Lead defense attorney Ephraim Savitt said Wilson wasn't surprised by the verdict.

"He took it stoically, very maturely and without any bitterness at all," Savitt said outside court. "He's ready to fight for his life."

Wilson's mother declined to speak to reporters.

Nemorin and Andrews were gunned down March 10, 2003, while negotiating the purchase of a submachine gun from members of a violent drug gang operating out of the Stapleton Houses.

The anonymous jury of 10 whites, one black and one Hispanic heard disturbing testimony from cooperating witnesses how Wilson planned to rob Nemorin of the $1,200 in buy money.

Fellow gang member Jessie Jacobus testified that Wilson shot Andrews in the temple without warning from the backseat of the undercovers' auto. Then Nemorin was executed with a bullet to the back of his head as the father of three pleaded for his life.

DOJ_NMG_0108053

"I popped them," the remorseless punk told fellow gang members when he returned to the housing project to change his bloody clothes.

Faced with overwhelming evidence that included forensics, testimony from snitches and demented rap lyrics that Wilson penned after the crime in which he boasted of leaving "slugs in the back of ya head ... cause I'm getting dat bread," defense attorneys had little to work with and called only four witnesses to attack the government's case.

It remains unclear whether Wilson knew the victims were cops, an issue that may be key during the upcoming penalty phase of the trial, which will last at least two weeks. The jury did conclude that Wilson was motivated in part to "increase his status" in the gang.

For the penalty phase, the government will call family members and colleagues of the detectives to give victim impact statements about the "loss, injury and harm" caused by their deaths.

Prosecutors also will highlight Wilson's threat to inmates and guards in prison if his life is spared, pointing to a note containing rap lyrics penned by Wilson after the double murder in which he proclaimed "aint goin stop to I'm dead."

Defense attorneys are expected to argue for mercy by calling Wilson's mother and other family members as witnesses, and offering psychiatric reports.

If Wilson gets death, years of appeals will follow. The sentence, if upheld, would likely be carried out at the death chamber in a federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind.

Anchorage Man Charged With Sex Trafficking, Drug Counts (AP)

By Dan Joling, Associated Press

AP, December 21, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska – An Anchorage man has been indicted on charges of coercing juvenile girls and adult women into prostitution and paying them off in crack cocaine.

Don Arthur Webster Jr., 49, who went by the name of Jerry Starr and “Daddy,” was indicted in federal court on 28 counts of sex and drug trafficking.

The indictment was made public Wednesday. Webster already was in custody on drug charges stemming from a Nov. 14 indictment, said U.S. Attorney for Alaska Nelson Cohen.

The yearlong investigation was a joint effort of the FBI, Anchorage police and the U.S. Attorney's office.

Cohen said Webster operated at least seven businesses – Foxy Roxies, Sunshine Girls, American Beauties, Kotton Kandy, Tiffani's, Tickle Your Fancy and Lickety Split – that purported to be companion services in which clients would pay for another person's time and company.

“It was, in fact, a prostitution ring,” Cohen said.

Prosecutors said the prostitution ring was operated on an out-call basis. When a client called, females would meet the caller at his home or a hotel.

Callers paid a fixed hourly fee plus a transportation fee. If requested, the girls and women would provide drugs from Webster for an additional fee, prosecutors said.

The girls and women were required to turn over all money they collected in return for sex acts, prosecutors said. Webster or his representative would pay them in drugs, typically a gram of crack cocaine, prosecutors said.

Webster provided housing for the females at six homes. Police and federal authorities said Webster was violent with the females and threatened them with harm if they disobeyed him or tried to leave.

He would take their personal property and identification when they moved into one of his homes, prosecutors said.

At least five girls and six women were victims of Webster, Cohen said.

Sgt. Kathy Lacey of the Anchorage Police Department vice squad said there may be other victims.

“I would like to encourage them to come forward,” she said.

Cohen revealed few details of the investigation outside of what was stated in the indictment, such as the ages of the juvenile prostitutes. He would not indicate whether the women were U.S. citizens or foreign nationals.

“We want to protect them,” Cohen said.

DOJ_NMG_0108054

Charges only include incidents back to 2000 when federal law governing human trafficking was revised.

FBI special agent Toni Marie Fogle said human trafficking crimes have been made a high priority of the agency and are considered to be a human rights violation.

Cohen said there were no plans to prosecute clients who used Webster's businesses.

The indictment unveiled Wednesday charges Webster with four counts of sex trafficking using force, fraud or coercion, two counts of attempted sex trafficking of a child, five counts of sex trafficking of an adult, three counts of distribution of cocaine base to a pregnant woman, four counts of distributing cocaine to a child and five counts of distribution of cocaine base.

They were added to the November indictment that included one count each of manufacturing cocaine, possessing cocaine with intent to distribute, and maintaining a place to manufacture, distribute and use cocaine.

Prosecutors are seeking forfeiture of a home belonging to Webster in the Spenard neighborhood of Anchorage. Homes can be seized if used in the commission of sex trafficking or drug distribution and the indictment seeks forfeiture under both provisions.

Federal prosecutors charge an Anchorage man with 28 counts of sex trafficking and drug-related offenses (KTVA)

By Steve O'Brien

KTVA-TV Anchorage, December 20, 2006

Five girls under the age of 18, may have been victimized in an Anchorage prostitution ring. Federal prosecutors have charged an Anchorage man with 28 counts of sex trafficking and drug-related offenses.

Investigators say they're dealing with a pimp who ran at least seven businesses that were really fronts for prostitution. If the charges are true, it's a disturbing case for the community.

Forty nine-year-old Don Arthur Webster Jr. is in hot water. Authorities say he's a pimp known on the street as Jerry Starr. Investigators believe he worked out of six houses throughout Anchorage, one of them on Oregon Drive.

The Feds announced he's been indicted on 28 counts of sex and drug crimes.

"This indictment is the culmination of an investigation that has taken place for over a year," said U.S. Attorney Nelson P. Cohen.

Webster is accused of operating seven so-called escort services. They have names like Foxy Roxies, Sunshine Girls, Tickle Your Fancy and Tiffani's. They are all listed in the phone book, but investigators say they're really a front for prostitution.

CBS 11 News called these numbers on Wednesday, and they're now out of service. Among the most startling accusations in the indictment is that among the 11 women allegedly victimized by Webster, five are underage.

"If we have one child who is affected by child exploitation in our city, we have a problem. If we have one person out there doing that, it's likely that person will be affecting far more than just one child," said Sergeant Kathy Lacey of the Vice Unit, A.P.D.

The story doesn't end there. Authorities say some of the adult women are pregnant. They accuse Webster of keeping the money he made off their bodies. He allegedly paid them with crack cocaine.

Meanwhile, the FBI, the U.S. Attorney and Anchorage police say the investigation isn't over and there could be more victims they don't know about yet.

"We want to get the message out that there is a task force to work on human trafficking. And so we encourage any victims to come forward," said Cohen.

Vice Unit: 786-2425

Investigators say the underage girls and the women involved are getting the proper support they need, especially from the Alaska Coalition Against Trafficking.

They want to get the word out in case there are more victims out there. So if you know of a victim, you are urged to call the Vice Unit at 786-2425.

Harsher penalties weighed for online sex offenders (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

DOJ_NMG_0108055

Washington Times, December 21, 2006

Virginia should establish stiffer sentencing guidelines against sexual predators convicted of hunting down victims on the Internet, and parents must be better educated about the risks their children face in cyberspace, according to a report released by a state task force yesterday.

The Youth Internet Safety Task Force was established by state Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, who said raising public awareness is the best way to shield unsuspecting children from attacks on the Internet.

"Today your children spend more time online than they do in playgrounds," said Mr. McDonnell, a father of five. "We need to protect kids in cyberspace by keeping them out of areas frequented by sexual predators."

There are 25 recommendations in the nearly 100-page report, which was compiled by more than 40 parents, business leaders and law-enforcement officials after six months of study.

"Here in the Internet capital of the world ... we must do everything possible to protect the Internet from child pornographers, sexual predators, identity thieves and other criminals," the report states. "The Internet is the new or last frontier for child predators."

The report recommends giving law-enforcement officials additional tools to police the "dark side of the Internet."

The proposals include mandatory minimum prison sentences for producing child pornography or soliciting children online.

For example, someone convicted of producing or financing child pornography now faces one to 10 years in prison. The report recommends raising the penalty to five to 30 years.

"That will significantly bump up the punishment," Mr. McDonnell said.

The report also includes the proposal of requiring convicted sex offenders to register their online identities with the state to help social networking sites such as MySpace.com to block access to those people. The move would make Virginia the first in the nation to take such action.

The Internet and social-networking sites have skyrocketed in popularity in recent years, giving youngsters a new avenue to meet people worldwide.

However, the sites also have given the estimated 50,000 sexual predators online at any given time a new venue to lure children by posing as a teen.

According to the U.S. Justice Department, one in five children ages 10 to 17 receive an unwanted sexual solicitation online.

The statewide media campaign to raise public awareness is scheduled to begin next month and estimated to cost about $1 million.

Mr. McDonnell said there already has been about $200,000 in private contributions, including $100,000 from AOL.

"This campaign is designed to use offline and online channels to raise the awareness of all parents -- not just those who are Internet savvy," said Charles Curran, AOL's chief counsel for policy and a task force member. "We need to take a good part of this training offline so that parents who are unfamiliar with Internet technology have the same opportunity to provide a safe Internet experience for their children."

Wilson Challenges Subpoena In CIA Case (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

Former ambassador Joseph Wilson asked a federal judge Wednesday not to force him to testify in the CIA leak case and accused former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby of trying to harass him on the witness stand.

Libby, who faces perjury and obstruction charges, subpoenaed Wilson as a defense witness this month. Libby's attorney, William Jeffress, said in court Tuesday that was a precautionary move and he did not expect to put Wilson on the stand.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding Wilson's wife, outed CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame and Wilson have sued Libby and other Bush administration officials, accusing them of plotting to leak Plame's identity as retribution for Wilson's criticism of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Mr. Libby should not be permitted to compel Mr. Wilson's testimony at trial either for the purpose of harassing Mr. Wilson or to gain an advantage in the civil case," Wilson's attorneys wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0108056

While Wilson and Plame are at the center of the CIA leak scandal, Wilson is a minor figure in Libby's perjury trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton has sought to keep much of the back story of the leak out of the case.

Katrina fraud in Yuba (AD)

By Rob Young

Yuba (CA) Appeal-Democrat, December 20, 2006

A Yuba County resident admitted Tuesday in federal court that she conspired to steal $6,000 in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Crystal J. Housley, 27, who has a Marysville mailing address but was living earlier this year in Olivehurst, pleaded guilty before Judge Lawrence K. Karlton in U.S. District Court in Sacramento.

Housley, along with defendants John P. Housley and Shawn R. Cudaback, said they lived in Gibson, La., at the time of the hurricane when they actually were in Arkansas, according to U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott.

The three allegedly gathered Sept. 15, 2005, at a Yuba County motel to defraud the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

John Housley, who also had an Olivehurst address earlier this year, is scheduled to be arraigned today. Crystal Housley will be sentenced Feb. 27 and Cudaback, who pleaded guilty earlier, on March 20.

Each defendant is facing a maximum prison term of 10 years and a fine up to $250,000.

The case was investigated by the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force.

According to an indictment filed Oct. 18, the three defendants learned from the American Red Cross how to apply for FEMA aid by telephone. They agreed to support each other's claims that they lived in a mobile home in Gibson, which was in the disaster area.

Each defendant received a U.S. Treasury check for $2,000, mailed to a general delivery address in Marysville.

As of September, more than 400 people nationwide had been charged with hurricane-related fraud, according to the latest progress report from the Task Force.

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Sacramento previously charged 72 people in connection with a scheme to defraud the American Red Cross of funds intended for Hurricane Katrina victims by submitting or causing others to submit fraudulent claims through the American Red Cross call center in Bakersfield.

Sixty-four of those defendants pleaded guilty to felonies, and 54 have been sentenced, according to the Task Force's report

CyberNET wife, others indicted in fed court

(WOOD-TV)

WOOD-TV Grand Rapids, December 21, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS - Krista Watson and two others were indicted Wednesday morning for their role in the CyberNET fraud uncovered in 2004.

Watson, 39, her mother-in-law Geraldine and Paul Wright are charged in a criminal conspiracy to commit bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering crimes. The charges lay out how they and others defrauded investors of approximately $100 million.

"CyberNET is a local example of a national problem," said US Attorney Margaret Chiara. "Prosecuting corporate officers for committing unconscionable acts against the public remains a top priority of my office and the Department of Justice."

The three are also charged with defrauding Huntington National Bank over a $17 million line of credit, as well as individual acts of money laundering.

Krista Watson was arrested in Chicago. Additionally, she is charged with spending money received through bank fraud, and three counts of income tax evasion for 2002, 2003 and 2004.

Geraldine Watson, 77, also faces a charge of making a false statement to a firearms dealer related to a gun purchase. She said the gun was for herself, but it's alleged she bought the Remington shotgun for her son Barton. He couldn't buy a gun because of a previous felony conviction. She bought the gun on November 22, 2004 and gave it to Barton the same day. Two days later, he killed himself with that gun.

DOJ_NMG_0108057

Wright, 57, is facing a mail fraud charge connected to his commercial mailbox accounts with CyberNET. He was arrested in Grand Rapids.

If convicted on all counts, the three are facing very long prison sentences as well as the forfeiture of $3,364,412.49 in nine bank accounts.

The arraignment is set for this afternoon, and the case has been assigned to Chief US District Judge Robert Holmes Bell.

CyberNET Widow, Mother, Executive Indicted (GRPRESS)

Grand Rapids Press, December 21, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- Federal authorities Wednesday indicted Krista Kotlarz-Watson, her mother-in-law and a former company vice president in connection with the CyberNET fraud scheme.

Geraldine Watson, mother of the company founder, the late Barton Watson, is charged with falsifying a federal form submitted to a gun dealer when she bought a 12-gauge shotgun Nov. 22, 2004. The indictment alleges that Mrs. Watson said the gun was for her when she in fact bought it for her son.

Watson, 44, shot himself with a 12-gauge shotgun after a standoff with police at his Ada Township home in the early hours of Nov. 24.

CyberNET, a high-tech Grand Rapids firm, collapsed in November 2004 after a federal raid on company headquarters at 25 S. Division Ave. that left about $90 million in unpaid debt to banks nationwide.

The indictment also accuses Kotlarz-Watson, 39, widow of CyberNET founder Barton Watson, Geraldine Watson, 77, and Paul Wright, 57, in a criminal conspiracy to commit bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering crimes with others at CyberNET.

Kotlarz-Watson was arrested today in Chicago, and Wright was arrested in Grand Rapids. They were to appear before a federal magistrate this afternoon.

The conspiracy charge outlines what investigators called a plan to deceive banks and other lenders to amass $100 million from 2002 to 2004. The charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

All three also are charged with defrauding Huntington National Bank through a $17 million line of credit extended to CyberNET. The maximum penalty for bank fraud is 30 years in prison, a $1 million fine and restitution. The indictment also charges each of them with individual acts of money laundering, carrying a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

Other charges against Kotlarz-Watson include one count of illegally spending money obtained through bank fraud and three counts of income tax evasion. Federal law prohibits spending proceeds from bank fraud for any purpose. That charge carries a maximum 10-year prison term. The income tax charges carry a maximum five-year prison term and $500,000 fine.

Wright faces charges of engaging in mail fraud by setting up commercial mailbox accounts as part of the CyberNET fraud scheme, which carries a maximum 30-year prison term and $1 million fine.

The indictment also states nine bank accounts, totaling more than $3.3 million, are subject to criminal forfeiture if the defendants are convicted.

Crete Man Gets 7 Years For $7M Pension Fraud

(STNG)

STNG Wire, December 21, 2006

ROCKFORD, Ill. (STNG) -- A 61-year-old Crete man was sentenced to seven years in prison for defrauding union members of nearly $7 million in pensions and benefits.

Michael G. Linder was sentenced to seven years in federal prison for paying to two union local officials and for embezzling from and defrauding numerous union local pensions and welfare benefit plans for more than $6.9 million, according to a release from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Linder pleaded guilty to defrauding eleven union local pension plans of $5 million and embezzling $1,930,154 from five union local pensions and health and welfare benefit plans on June 30, 2006, the release stated.

DOJ_NMG_0108058

The court also ordered Linder, who also pleaded guilty grafting charges on Dec. 10, 2004, to serve three years on supervised release after his prison sentence and pay $6,595,154 in restitution.

Linder was the president of Matteson-based Joseph/Anthony and Associates, Inc., a third party administrator for pension plans for various union locals, including Ironworkers Locals 498 in Rockford, 111 in Rock Island, 136 in River Grove and 465 in Kankakee.

Between 1997 and Sept. 23, 2003, Linder defrauded the union local pension benefit plans by recommending to the trustees of the plans that they change their investments to mutual funds being administered by Nationwide Life Insurance Company, the release stated.

Linder, however, invested the assets with Nationwide in group annuity contracts where Linder received more than $5 million in fees and commissions, the release stated. Linder did not fully disclose to the board of trustees that he would be receiving the fees, according to the release.

Linder also embezzled more than $1.9 million from three pension and two health and welfare plans between Jan. 1996 and Sept. 30, 2003, by setting up bank accounts for each plan to be used to pay premiums on life insurance or stop-loss insurance policies.

Linder then billed each plan purportedly for the insurance premiums that were due. The amounts billed, however, exceeded the actual amount of premiums that were due and owed, and Linder secretly kept the excess amounts, the release stated.

While Linder was defrauding the pension and welfare benefit plans, he provided union local officials with graft payments, including a 1999 Harley Davidson motorcycle valued at more than $19,000, the release stated. Thomas Kisting and Fred Schreier, who received the bikes, were also charged and convicted, the release stated.

Phone-fraud Ring Raided In Canada (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, working with U.S. law-enforcement authorities, have dismantled a Montreal-based telemarketing ring that victimized as many as 500 people a week, many of them U.S. citizens, for up to $13 million.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said the eight-month investigation, known as "Project Colt," culminated this week when nearly 200 Canadian police officers, led by the RCMP, conducted 50 raids, primarily in the Montreal region, that targeted the "boiler rooms" used to make misleading telephone calls.

Forty Canadian citizens were arrested on suspicion of fraud.

"These fraudulent telemarketers prey on some of our most vulnerable citizens, often victimizing them repeatedly until their savings are depleted," said Marcy Forman, ICE director of investigations. "This collaboration with our Canadian law-enforcement partners and other U.S. agencies continues to yield significant results, both in shutting down the criminal networks and in restoring some funds to the victims."

Ms. Koroma said the ring engaged in two types of telemarketing fraud: a lottery scheme and a mass telemarketing fraud. In the lottery scheme, she said, the fraudulent telemarketers persuaded their victims that they had won a large sum of money. In order to claim their prizes, the victims were told, they had to send in payments ranging from $1,500 to $60,000 to cover various costs, including customs charges, taxes and insurance.

In the mass telemarketing fraud, she said, the ring used various approaches, either telling persons they called that they were eligible to receive a $7,000 grant, or selling them health care kits or billing them for services never rendered. A common feature of every scheme of this kind is that the victims are asked to pay less than $500.

All the telemarketing schemes required the victims to send money in the form of a certified check or money order. Nearly 90 percent of the victims in this case were over 60 years of age.

The investigative task force included ICE, the U.S. Postal Service, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and the FBI working with the RCMP, the Surete du Quebec, Service de police de la Ville de Montreal and the Competition Bureau of Canada.

DOJ_NMG_0108059

Since its inception, the task force has recovered more than $15 million for U.S. victims of telemarketing fraud. ICE agents were instrumental in getting evidence from victims of the lottery scheme in the United States.

"Investigators draw connections between various forms of crime and link certain crime groups such as street gangs and traditional organized crime with the leaders of a telemarketing fraud ring," said Saverio Orlando, RCMP officer in charge of the Montreal commercial crime section. "This investigation shows that the fight against commercial crime is one of our priorities."

The Canadian anti-fraud call center estimates that 500 to 1,000 criminal telemarketing boiler-room operations are conducted on any given day in Canada, grossing about $1 billion a year.

Felons' DNA Missing From Va. Database (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Virginia authorities have launched a massive review of the state's DNA database after discovering that thousands of felons may have skirted a legal requirement to submit genetic samples, partly because local and state agencies may have failed to make them do so.

Public safety and crime lab officials estimate that at least 20 percent of felons' DNA profiles could be missing from the database, a flaw that could hamper criminal investigations across the state and nation. Investigators routinely take crime scene evidence and run it through Virginia's database and others looking for DNA matches.

"The good news is it appears that we have well over 80 percent of convicted felons in the database, but obviously we need to have 100 percent of them in the database," said Clyde Cristman, deputy secretary of the Virginia Department of Public Safety.

Virginia law requires all convicted felons and those arrested in connection with violent crimes such as rape or homicide to submit cheek swabs for DNA analysis and entry into the statewide database. Currently, there are more than 253,000 samples in the database, according to the Department of Forensic Science Web site.

The Public Safety Department is working with the departments of Corrections, Forensic Science and Juvenile Justice to determine how many offenders' profiles are missing and why. The multi-agency review will begin with a check of about 54,000 people on probation or parole to verify that their samples have been processed.

Cristman said that about 12,000 cases have been examined. He could not say how many of those offenders' samples were missing from the data bank but said the number is in the thousands. It could take about two months to complete the review and update the data.

Long considered a national leader in DNA crime technology, Virginia has logged about 3,600 "cold hits" from its database -- matching biological evidence from a crime scene to an offender's DNA profile. Scores of violent crimes, including some homicides, have been solved that way. Virginia's database, like that of other states, forms part of a larger national DNA network that has similarly produced millions of cold hits.

Gaps in the state database could diminish the effectiveness of DNA as a crime-fighting tool, officials said. "In order to maximize effectiveness of the national DNA database, it is important to collect DNA samples from all persons authorized by state and federal legislation," said Ann Todd, a spokeswoman for the FBI crime lab.

Louisiana, which has some of the nation's broadest DNA collection laws, has become the envy of many states for a highly advanced and centralized computer system that allows jails, courts and law enforcement agencies to track which offenders have submitted DNA samples.

Cristman said his office was alerted to the problem several weeks ago when an investigation into a series of rapes in Charlottesville revealed that suspects with criminal backgrounds were not listed in the database. Charlottesville police Capt. J.E. "Chip" Harding discovered missing profiles after an audit revealed that 125 felons -- or 20 percent of the 600 supervised felons in Charlottesville and Albemarle County -- were not in the database.

But Virginia crime lab director Paul Ferrara said this week that he became aware of a possible problem earlier when a review last year of the state's more than 13,000 registered sex offenders uncovered 3,149 missing DNA profiles, or about 24 percent of the state registry.

DOJ_NMG_0108060

"I'm not surprised that there are missing felons," Ferrara said. "What would be surprising is the magnitude. That's the thing we're not sure on."

Ferrara said some prisons and jails might have failed to take samples from offenders when the requirement was introduced in the 1990s because the importance of building a DNA database was not yet understood. The collection process might have been further complicated because until about 10 years ago, blood samples were to be taken by qualified medical technicians, who may not have been available, Ferrara said. But he and others pointed to clerical errors as another likely reason for the missing profiles.

"Sometimes you find they aren't missing, but it's just that if you query the database and you don't have the right Social Security number or right spelling on the name, you're not going to hit it," Cristman said.

He said that training on how to collect samples may need improvement and that the lack of a centralized state tracking system made it difficult to coordinate processing. "It's been a challenge in Virginia with various agencies working with different computer systems that don't talk to each other," Cristman said.

Experts say the problem in Virginia is symptomatic of growing gaps in DNA databases nationwide that have occurred as states have expanded the pool of offenders required to submit samples. Most states have long required DNA samples from people convicted of such violent crimes as murder or rape. But the increasing popularity of DNA as a crime-fighting tool has prompted widespread passage of laws to include samples for such lesser offenses as burglary. More recently some states -- including Virginia, California, Florida, Louisiana and Texas -- have begun to require samples from those arrested for certain crimes.

"Whenever you dump a tremendous increase in the samples to be tracked and collected, there's more chances of things being overlooked and things falling through the cracks," said Bill Marbaker, president of the American Society of Crime Laboratory Directors.

In Quest For A Killer, An Inmate Finds Vindication (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

AUBURN, N.Y., Dec. 20 — The day before Christmas three years ago, Inmate No. 92B-0448 sat in front of a computer at the Elmira Correctional Facility and typed a harsh letter to the man he thought should have been in prison in his place.

“Witnesses can commit perjury, judges can be fooled and juries can make mistakes,” the letter read. “When it comes to DNA testing, there’s no mistakes. DNA is GOD’s creation and GOD makes no mistakes.”

The inmate, Roy Brown, was serving 25 years to life for the 1991 murder of a social worker, Sabina Kulakowski, who was found naked, beaten, bitten and strangled outside the farmhouse where she lived in Aurelius, a town of 3,000 on the northern tip of Cayuga Lake.

Mr. Brown, a self-professed hard drinker who made a living at the time selling magazine subscriptions in Syracuse, 30 miles to the east, did not know Ms. Kulakowski. Just six days before her killing, though, he had been released from jail, where he spent eight months for making threatening phone calls to another social worker at the agency where she worked.

Nor did Mr. Brown know the man to whom he was writing, Barry Bench. It was only that year, 2003, that Mr. Brown had uncovered witness statements that pointed toward Mr. Bench, whose brother had been the victim’s boyfriend.

Five days after receiving Mr. Brown’s accusatory letter, Mr. Bench committed suicide by jumping in front of an Amtrak train.

Two weeks ago, DNA tests matched a sample provided by Mr. Bench’s daughter to saliva stains on a bloodied nightshirt found at the crime scene, and now Mr. Brown is scheduled to appear in court on Thursday to ask the judge who presided over his original trial to vacate the conviction.

“I used the old hunting technique here: if there’s a killer in the bush, I’m going to flush him out,” Mr. Brown, 46, said in a telephone interview from prison. “I know that they can keep me in jail after I show up in court. But the world will know that I’m innocent, and that was my main goal.”

Mr. Brown’s lawyers at the Innocence Project, a nonprofit legal clinic that has helped exonerate 188 people since 1989, said his case stood out because it was the first in which the convicted man essentially investigated and solved the crime himself.

DOJ_NMG_0108061

The lawyers, Peter Neufeld and Nina Morrison, have also questioned the reliability of forensic evidence in the case, since the conviction rested largely on expert testimony linking bite marks found on Ms. Kulakowski's body to Mr. Brown even though they showed indentations from six upper teeth and he had four.

The Cayuga County district attorney, James B. Vargason, did not respond to numerous requests for comment on Wednesday, but Mr. Brown's lawyers said they expected him to oppose their motion. Mr. Vargason took office two weeks before Mr. Brown's trial and tried the case personally; he has since used it to build a reputation as a get-tough prosecutor.

Help came to Mr. Brown from an unlikely source: Mr. Bench's 19-year-old daughter, Katherine Eckstadt, who volunteered a sample of her DNA. A private investigator had tracked her down through her mother, who had told sheriff's deputies in 1991 that Mr. Bench acted suspiciously the night of the murder.

The recent DNA tests have excluded Mr. Brown as the source of the saliva on Ms. Kulakowski's nightshirt and showed half of the DNA profile matched Ms. Eckstadt's, suggesting the saliva could have come from her father.

"I had to know the truth," Ms. Eckstadt said last week in an interview in the basement of a Baptist church in suburban Syracuse where her mother works as a secretary. "How was I supposed to live knowing that I could have helped Roy Brown, yet I let him rot in prison?"

Mr. Brown was arrested on May 26, 1991, three days after Ms. Kulakowski's battered body was found on a dirt road about 300 yards from the farmhouse, which had been set afire, investigators said, possibly by the killer in an attempt to cover his tracks. Mr. Brown had just been released from jail for making threatening calls to a county Social Services Department worker who had ordered his 7-year-old daughter removed from his home. Though Ms. Kulakowski also worked for the agency, she had no involvement in the case.

Mr. Bench, on the other hand, knew the victim well. His older brother, Ronald, had been romantically involved with Ms. Kulakowski for 17 years and had lived with her at the farmhouse, which their parents had given to Ronald. The couple separated in the spring of 1991, and Ronald Bench moved to Auburn, but he allowed Ms. Kulakowski, who was 49, to continue living at the farm.

"For a while, Barry was angry at his brother because he felt that he should have been the one to own the farm," said Tamara Eckstadt, Katherine's mother, who lived with Barry Bench for 13 years.

Mrs. Eckstadt said that Barry Bench did not seem to dislike Ms. Kulakowski, but that their relationship was "antagonistic," in part because of the farm.

The night of Ms. Kulakowski's murder, Barry Bench left his house at 5 p.m., after a fight with Mrs. Eckstadt, according to his and her statements to investigators at the time. Mr. Bench, a volunteer firefighter, went to a bar, carrying his fire monitor, which he rarely shut off. He left the bar at 12:30 a.m., their statements said. Mrs. Eckstadt told the police that he arrived home, drunk, about an hour later, even though the bar was just a half-mile from where they lived.

She said Mr. Bench never plugged the fire monitor back in after arriving home, which was unusual.

Though the farmhouse began to burn around the time Mr. Bench was unaccounted for, investigators did not question his whereabouts, instead focusing within days on Mr. Brown.

At the trial in 1992, Mr. Vargason argued that Mr. Brown had killed Ms. Kulakowski in a fit of rage against the social services agency. The case rested largely on testimony by Dr. Edward Mofson that Mr. Brown could have left the bite marks on Ms. Kulakowski's body despite the discrepancy in the number of upper teeth. He said that Mr. Brown could have twisted her skin while biting her, therefore filling the gaps that would have been left by his missing teeth.

The defense's lone witness, Dr. Homer Campbell, a forensic odontologist from New Mexico who has testified about bite-mark evidence in numerous criminal trials, sharply rebutted Dr. Mofson's assertion, but it was not enough to convince the jurors. Mr. Brown was convicted of second-degree murder after less than six hours of deliberation.

Ms. Kulakowski's parents and two sisters have all died. Thomas Murray, her brother-in-law, said in a telephone interview from his home in Omaha, Neb., that the family had never heard of Mr. Brown before his arrest, and that he was unaware of the evidence pointing toward Mr. Bench.

DOJ_NMG_0108062

"Sabina touched the lives of many people through her work, and we could never understand why someone would kill her," Mr. Murray said. "When that happened, we didn't have any reason to suspect anyone in the Bench family, or anybody else, for that matter."

Ronald Bench, a real estate broker in Auburn, refused to comment when reached on his cellphone Wednesday. "I don't have anything to say," he said.

The results of the DNA tests came back on Dec. 6; Mr. Brown has said that he has wondered since then what might have been had he laid his hands on Mrs. Eckstadt's statement — and others mentioning the unaccounted hour in Mr. Bench's night — at the time. "I could have showed them to the jury," he said.

One of Mr. Brown's original lawyers, Katy Karlovitz, said that when asked about the statements after Mr. Brown uncovered them in 2003, prosecutors said they had turned them over before trial. But Ms. Karlovitz said she never received them, and there are no records of the statements in a list of documents that is included in the court file.

Mr. Brown learned about the statements only because of a fire at his stepfather's house in 2003 that destroyed his trial records. He filed a request under Freedom of Information laws seeking new copies, and among the documents he received were statements from Mrs. Eckstadt, Mr. Bench and two of their neighbors.

Mr. Brown, a father of four, has been married four times, twice while in prison, where he teaches guitar and helps run counseling sessions. He has liver problems that leave his skin a pale yellow. He has never ceased to profess his innocence.

But his three appeals were denied, along with his 1995 request for DNA tests on the nightshirt. He took to drafting motions from prison, calling his stepfather, William Murphy, several times a week for help.

"I've lived from phone call to phone call, from one disappointment to another," Mr. Murphy, 63, said in an interview from his home in Boonville, N.Y., southwest of the Adirondack Park. "Sometimes I got discouraged, but Roy always came back with another motion, with another way out. He never let me give up."

At the same time, Mr. Brown's sister, Billie Jo Kuczynski, put together a petition asking people to support his request for DNA tests on the nightshirt. She distributed 36,000 copies around the state, even tucking them on car windshields at the Cayuga County courthouse.

In January 2005, the Innocence Project joined the case, eventually filing the motion for the DNA testing that ultimately led to the match with Mr. Bench's daughter.

"Whatever happens, I've already proven my innocence; I'm already free," Mr. Brown said. "I may be in prison, but my spirit is free."

5 Houston-Area Men Attacked By Rapist (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

BAYTOWN, Tex., Dec. 20 — A serial rapist appears to be responsible for five attacks and robberies of young men in an area east of Houston, the authorities here said.

The most recent attack took place on Nov. 30 in a prominent Baytown subdivision called Tanglewilde. The first attack occurred in April in eastern Harris County, Capt. Roger Clifford of the Baytown Police Department said Wednesday.

Another attack in eastern Harris County was in September, and the two others in Baytown took place in May and July.

All five victims have been white men who were alone and attacked in or near their homes in upscale neighborhoods, Captain Clifford said. The attacker is described as a black man in his mid-20s who is about 6 feet tall and 200 pounds with short hair and no discernible accent. He is also clean-cut and well dressed and sometimes wears an earring.

The assailant has used a gun and knife to abduct his victims, all of whom have been physically smaller than him, but he has not always been successful in forcing them into sexual acts, Captain Clifford said.

Concerns Raised About Security At Supermax Prison (WP)

By R. Scott Rappold, Mcclatchey Newspapers

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Town Residents Aren't Worried, But Guards Are

DOJ_NMG_0108063

FLORENCE, Colo. -- You can't see Supermax from the highway, but everyone knows it's there.

The prison, hidden by the rolling slopes of the high desert 50 miles south of Colorado Springs, houses 400 of the most dangerous inmates in the federal system -- psychopaths, gang leaders, Mafia bosses, multiple murderers and terrorists, including Eric Rudolph, Ramzi Yousef and Zacarias Moussaoui.

Daniel Garcia, who runs the Super 8 Motel a few minutes' dash from the prison, doesn't worry about one of Supermax's notorious inmates escaping and becoming his problem. "The ones that are really dangerous, I don't think they've got much of a chance of walking away," he said.

After all, it's the most secure prison in the nation. Or is it?

Although it was once taken as an article of faith that Supermax -- one of four federal prisons at the complex and officially known as ADX Florence -- is as secure as anyplace on Earth, some aren't so sure now.

The union representing prison guards is raising alarms about staff cuts. A federal report revealed inadequate scanning of terrorists' mail, and an arbitrator agreed that staff cuts had made the prison dangerous for employees.

The presence of a couple of dozen terrorists, while the war against Islamic extremists goes on around the globe, has made prison security a cause celebre for Colorado's U.S. senators, who have toured the facility and pushed for more staff and a perimeter fence.

But on the streets of Florence, there is little concern about a terrorist breaking out -- or his fellow terrorists breaking in.

"If they break out, they're running like crazy," Gail Clairemont said while shopping recently in a Florence coffee shop.

Across the street, gallery owner Rudl Mergelman doesn't lose sleep about Florence's notorious celebrities.

"The people from out of town are really more concerned about it than we are," he said.

Among those who think the danger has been overblown is the man who once was responsible for making sure Supermax lived up to its name.

"No one's getting out of the Supermax, period. End of story," said Robert Hood, warden of Supermax from 2002 to 2005.

Even union officials concede that an escape is unlikely. But they say staff cuts have made the prison dangerous for employees and vulnerable to attack from the outside.

This year, a federal arbitrator agreed.

The evidence, the arbitrator wrote, is clear: 3,147 critical shifts left unfilled; some housing units unsupervised for entire shifts; cells no longer being regularly searched; a rise in assaults on staff and threats of assaults by inmates angry they can't get their one hour per day of recreation; two murders at the prison in two months last year, after a decade without any.

Suddenly, the issue was viewed as more than union blustering over staff cuts.

"One of the problems we run into as a union is we're always dismissed as trying to pad federal jobs," said Mike Schnobrich, a correctional officer and secretary/treasurer of the American Federation of Government Employees Council of Prison Locals 1302. "We've been saying from the beginning this is not just a management-labor issue. This is a good-government issue."

Federal officials have acknowledged the problem and recently hired or will hire 18 staff members, bringing the total to at least 208 -- still fewer than the 240 the prison had when it opened in the mid-1990s.

The union says it is not enough and has filed a charge of unfair labor practice, saying the prison has not followed the arbitrator's order to create a safe workplace.

"We're talking about a continuing problem," Schnobrich said. "We can't wait two years for budgets to kick in and talk about how to make this facility more safe."

The lack of a fence around the complex has become the central issue for the lawmakers who have taken an interest in the Supermax. Sens. Ken Salazar (D) and Wayne Allard (R) have sought $12 million for a new fence.

State Rep. Liane "Buffie" McFadyen (D) believes a fence would slow down not only an escapee, but anyone trying to break in, such as Islamic extremists bent on rescuing an imprisoned comrade.

The union, although it supports a perimeter fence, agrees it would not be a complete solution. "A fence isn't going to solve every problem we have out here for security," Schnobrich said.

Despite the clamor, many in Florence are against the idea of a fence as an unnecessary blight that would only draw attention to the massive federal prison.

DOJ_NMG_0108064

"I don't have any particular concern about somebody getting out of Supermax. I've toured that facility twice," said Fremont County Commissioner Ed Norden (R). "A lot has been said about having a perimeter fence around the entire complex. I hope they give that some careful study."

He is more concerned that local police and emergency officials can't communicate with the prisons by radio. During one escape from the complex -- though not from the Supermax -- police didn't find out until after the inmate had been recaptured.

The Supermax warden, R. Wiley, declined an interview request. Prison spokeswoman Krista Rear, responding to questions in writing, said, "While a perimeter fence around the several buildings that comprise the Florence complex would enhance security, other measures can be taken in lieu of or in addition to the fence that would also assist in limiting access to the property." She did not elaborate.

The presence of terrorists has focused attention on the prison, but former warden Hood said they might not even be the most dangerous inmates at the complex.

Although Supermax is meant to be a transition facility, where inmates can earn through good behavior a transfer to other prisons, the terrorists are probably there to stay -- as much for their own protection as for society's.

"How could you take, anytime in the future, [1993 World Trade Center bomber] Ramzi Yousef and put him on the grounds of Leavenworth and let him walk around every day?" Hood said.

"They can stand on their heads every day for the next 50 years, and they're not going anywhere."

A Vexing Leap In US Robbery Rate (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 21, 2006

It's a crime chosen by those desperate for quick cash - and it's rising faster than a couple of hands during a stickup.

Possible explanations abound for the soaring robbery rate - 9.7 percent nationwide in the first half of 2006, according to federal crime statistics released this week. But a lead suspect in that troubling trend, say some criminologists, is added economic stress.

Small- to medium-size cities are the ones that saw the largest spikes in reported violent crime, especially robbery. In some of those, the poverty rate has also been climbing faster than the national average.

"It strikes me that many of the cities that have experienced increases in poverty and child poverty [in recent years] are the very same places experiencing increases in robbery right now," says Richard Rosenfeld, a criminologist at the University of Missouri.

The Rust Belt has seen large rises in poverty rates between 1999 and 2005, according to a report this month by the Brookings Institution in Washington - and many of the region's cities turn out to have seen sharp increases in robberies this year. In Lansing, Mich., reported robberies rose 34 percent through June 2006, after its poverty rate climbed 7.5 percentage points over the previous six years. In Cleveland, the robbery rate rose 13.1 percent, and the incidence of poverty went up 6.1 points. In Rochester, N.Y.: robbery is up 49.8 percent, and poverty 4.1 points.

But many cities show no such correlation, meaning the root of the problem is more complex than simple economics. In the West, for instance, some places report flat poverty rates and more robberies.

It's too early to pinpoint the causes of the jump in violent crime, caution Mr. Rosenfeld and others. The FBI report this week showed violent crime overall climbing for the second straight year, after more than a decade of declines.

A mix of factors could be contributing, say experts. Among them: overstretched police departments, convicts reentering society, a change in the illegal market for methamphetamine, and a baby-boom "echo" that's entering the 15- to 25-year-old prime crime bracket.

"Economic conditions are certainly not the whole story behind robbery," says Rosenfeld. But "when we're trying to understand year-to-year changes and why they're occurring in certain places and not others, then we need to focus on those factors that change relatively rapidly as opposed to those that don't."

Rosenfeld's previous research shows that robbery rates rise when consumer confidence measures turn negative. Robbery tempts those who see few economic options, he and others say.

DOJ_NMG_0108065

Robbery "provides cash immediately. So it's kind of a measure of how desperate people are for cash," says Richard Wright, chairman of the criminology department at the University of Missouri. He has studied differences between the crimes of burglary, in which victims are not present, and robbery, in which they are. Burglary rates spike with the introduction of new and valuable consumer goods, whereas robbery appeals to those seeking an immediate payoff - such as people who can't find work, are addicted to drugs like crack cocaine and methamphetamine, or have just left prison and have nowhere to go, says Mr. Wright.

The robbery statistic is "a kind of leading-edge indicator" of something amiss, says David Harris, professor of law and values at the University of Toledo in Ohio. "When you have an increasing demographic bubble in these crime-prone years [15 to 25], and you combine that with a ... willingness to do something like robbery, then you really do have reason to be concerned."

For his part, Mr. Harris suspects the worsening violent-crime rates may be related to less police presence on the streets. Touring the US to promote his new book, "Good Cops: The Case for Preventive Policing," Mr. Harris says he often hears that police departments have become overstretched. "They have a whole set of demands on their plates that simply didn't exist a few years ago," says Harris, referring to homeland-security duties and less assistance from federal agents reassigned to antiterrorism.

A Justice Department spokesman counters that view, noting that federal spending has never been more than 4 percent of state and local law-enforcement spending. The number of police officers has grown every year regardless of federal funding, he adds, and first responders have benefited from a windfall of homeland-security funding in recent years.

In parsing the crime data, few experts dwelled on illicit drugs. But "meth" was the first word off the lips of police officials in two cities where robbery rates climbed. Spokane, Wash., and Colorado Springs, Colo., are now battling the drug that has long beset the Midwest and rural areas. What's different now, say Spokane police, is that do-it-yourself meth production has been beaten back, and users are buying meth made in Mexico. Hence, a sudden need for cash among addicts.

Free Genarlow Wilson Now (NYT)

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Genarlow Wilson loves reading mystery novels and can't wait for the next Harry Potter book. The 20-year-old former high school football player and honor student works in a library, the perfect job for a young bookworm. Unfortunately, that is where the good news ends and a genuine horror story of this country's legal system begins.

The library in Georgia where Mr. Wilson works is in prison. He is two years into a sentence for engaging in consensual oral sex with a 15-year-old girl at a New Year's Eve party when he was 17. He won't be eligible for parole until he has served 10 years, essentially sacrificing his remaining youth to an obvious miscarriage of justice.

As Shaila Dewan reported in The Times this week, Mr. Wilson has been convicted of aggravated child molestation even though he and the girl were both minors at the time. Even if he could win an early release, Mr. Wilson could not go home to his family. He would have to register as a sex offender and would be prohibited from living with his 8-year-old sister. It is all the more disgraceful because the Georgia Supreme Court last week refused to hear his appeal.

The sexual act took place during a party involving sex, marijuana and alcohol, all captured on a graphic videotape. But that does not make Mr. Wilson a child molester. When high school students engage in consensual sexual activity, that is not the same as an adult molesting a teenager or a teenager molesting a child.

What makes this case more absurd is that if Mr. Wilson and the young woman had sexual intercourse, he would have been guilty only of a misdemeanor and not required to register as a sex offender, thanks to a provision in the law meant to avoid just this type of draconian punishment for consensual youthful indiscretions, the "Romeo and Juliet" exception. And since Mr. Wilson's conviction, the law has been changed to exempt oral sex as well. But the courts say that can't help Mr. Wilson retroactively.

His lawyer is planning to file a habeas petition seeking his release. The courts need to grant it and expunge his record so that Mr. Wilson can return to his family and his once promising academic career. Legislators in other states should take notice and make sure that their own laws do not catch children in dragnets designed for predatory adults.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Justice Department Moves Against Prosser in Bankruptcy Proceedings (STS)

DOJ_NMG_0108066

St. Thomas (USVI) Source, December 21, 2006

Dec. 20, 2006 -- An arm of the U.S. Justice Department has moved against Innovative Communication Corp. owner Jeffrey Prosser in the seemingly endless bankruptcy cases involving, indirectly, Vitelco, the V.I. phone company.

The government unit is the U.S. Trustee, a self-described "watchdog" of the bankruptcy courts. It is part of the U.S. Department of Justice and is separate from the U.S. Bankruptcy Courts, which are part of the judicial system.

The U.S. Trustee moved on Dec. 19 that a case trustee be appointed to manage Prosser's business operations until the bankruptcy case is concluded. The presiding judge, Judith K. Fitzgerald, has already indicated her positive interest in such an appointment.

The judge will decide, presumably in a few weeks, and after a hearing, if such a government-imposed manager is a good idea. If she does she will then order the U.S. Trustee to appoint the case trustee. (The U.S. Trustee deals with all bankruptcies, while a case trustee deals with a single case or group of cases.)

The U.S. Trustee for the southeast United States is Felicia S. Turner, headquartered in Atlanta. Her motion filed with the bankruptcy court was noteworthy because of the directness of the language, for example:

"Virtually no progress has been made in these cases since [they]... were filed almost a year ago...The Debtors [i.e. Prosser and his companies] have done little more than repeatedly request continuances and then fail to meet the extended deadlines … Additionally, since Debtors' management has completely lost the trust of its creditors and other parties in interest, no progress will ever be made in these cases if Debtors' management remains in control of estate assets …."

Turner continues: "Thus while some level of acrimony is to be expected in these circumstances, these cases have been paralyzed by such acrimony. This paralysis combined with the allegation of the Debtors? creditors regarding the Debtors? alleged breach of their fiduciary responsibilities to their creditors is sufficient justification for the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee...."

The appointment of a case trustee, according to the Justice Department publication Bankruptcy Basics, is "a rarity in a chapter 11 case … the court, on motion by a party in interest or the U.S. Trustee, shall order the appointment … for cause, including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement or if such an appointment is in the interest of creditors, any equity security holders, and other interests of the estate." (The estate being the property subject to the bankruptcy proceedings.)

The U.S. Trustee's motion, like several others over the past few months, has nibbled away at the secrecy of these proceedings in that it disclosed the size of the "discounted" settlement that Prosser had once worked out with his main adversaries. The settlement then collapsed, twice, when Prosser could not come up with the needed funding. That settlement – now moot – was set at $402 million.

The $402 million dealt only with debts Prosser and companies owe to his longtime bankers, the Virginia-based Rural Telephone Finance Cooperative, and to the one-time minority stockholders in the predecessor firm to Innovative Communications Co., represented by the Greenlight companies.

In addition, Prosser's group owes about $85 million to a group of Vitelco's preferred stockholders and another $60 million or so to the U.S. Treasury.

The full set of undiscounted debts, including unpaid interest and extensive legal bills, has been estimated as exceeding $800 million.

Meanwhile, on Dec. 19, both RTFC and Greenlight filed separate (and mutually-supporting) motions with the bankruptcy court seeking the appointment of a bankruptcy trustee in another manner. These two organizations asked the judge to transfer the case from the relatively pro-debtor chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, where it is now, to the harsher chapter 7 of the Code, which would entail the selection of such a trustee.

In their briefs, the two major creditors contended that Prosser should not continue to manage the bankrupt properties on the grounds of "irrefutable conflicts of interest" since he is the sole shareholder of the firms. "Prosser," RTFC argued, "should not be allowed to stay in control of this chapter 11 process through his insider-domination of the corporate Debtors."

A reading of the three briefs – by the U.S. Trustee, RTFC, and Greenlight – indicate that while the last two knew of each other's actions, there was no indication that the U.S. Trustee was aware of the RTFC-Greenlight filings or vice-versa.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

LaRoque discusses district attorney Nifong with Fox News (KFP)

Kinston (NC) Free Press, December 21, 2006

Translate to Español

Send to AIM Buddy

More...

N.C. 11 project takes break

Deep Run improves fire rating

Three-day holiday weekend should see record number of travelers

More XML Feeds

Story Statistics

Emailed

1

Viewed

45

December 21,2006

State Rep. Stephen LaRoque has joined U.S. Congressman Walter Jones in calling for the investigation of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong.

Jones, in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, said Nifong might have violated the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players accused of raping an exotic dancer last spring. He also could have committed prosecutorial misconduct in his investigation of the case, Jones said.

LaRoque, who represents the 10th House District, was expected to appear last night on Fox News channel's "On the Record," with Greta VanSusteren, to discuss his belief that state law should be changed to allow the Legislature to investigate charges of malfeasance by district attorneys. Currently, the N.C. Bar Association — or a superior court judge — conducts such investigations.

Nifong was running for the Durham County Democratic Party's nomination for district attorney during the early stages of the rape investigation. The alleged victim's accusation of being raped by three lacrosse players during an off-campus party brought national attention to Nifong and his department. He won his nomination, and went on to eventually win the election.

"The prosecutor seems to have put his own political aspirations ahead of justice for these three young men who appear to have been falsely accused," LaRoque said.

LaRoque contends that the N.C. Bar Association should not be the only entity with authority to punish incidents of legal misconduct.

"That's like having the fox guard the hen house," he said.

State lifts new patient moratorium at Fort Bayard (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

SILVER CITY, N.M. (AP) - The state Department of Health has lifted a yearlong-plus moratorium against admitting new long-term patients at its Fort Bayard Medical Center.

The state agency halted new admissions after a Justice Department review of the facility. On Monday, Health Secretary Michelle Lujan Grisham rescinded the motoratorium.

Fort Bayard, with a staff of 320, houses 133 patients.

Justice investigators said last spring they had serious concerns with the care at Fort Bayard. A report said an investigation "revealed a wide range of dangerously deficient medical and nursing care practices," and a failure to comply with federal regulations or meet professional standards.

DOJ_NMG_0108068

The state cited the center in December 2004 for failings in maintenance, staff training and administration. The center's administrator was placed on leave three months later, then was fired.

The Department of Health took over management of the hospital in the interim.

Grisham said in August 2005 said officials found a pattern of abuse, neglect and exploitation of residents at Fort Bayard.

Federal investigators who reviewed documents and visited Fort Bayard in July and October 2005 cited inadequate medical care and nutritional services, failure to ensure that residents were safe, the dangerous use of psychotropic medications and numerous incidents of violence against patients and nurses.

The state hired GEO Care Inc. of Florida to run the center in November 2005. GEO Care recently hired an administrator, an assistant administrator and a medical director.

GEO Care asked the state to lift the moratorium, and has proposed a gradual admission of new long-term residents.

The medical center has continued admitting short-term rehabilitation patients.

The state also determined that the center needs a new facility because of deficiencies in the current aging structure. GEO Care plans to build a new $30 million medical center which it would lease to the state.

Grant County residents made it clear they want the state hospital to remain on or near Fort Bayard.

The village of Santa Clara purchased land administered by the U.S. Forest Service for a new facility, and the county provided funds. The county now owns the land where a replacement would be built.

Groundbreaking is tentatively set for next year, and a new center could be ready by mid-2008.

Fort Bayard is one of two state-owned and operated long-term care facilities for low-income New Mexicans. The other is in Las Vegas.

ANTITRUST:

Delta lawyer: US Airways merger has 'antitrust issues' (NMBW)

New Mexico Business Weekly, December 20, 2006

Delta Chairman and CEO Jerry Grinstein continued his offensive against US Airways' hostile takeover bid in a conference call with analysts Tuesday, saying the merger would create too much of a monopoly in too many markets.

"If the suggestion is that we're going to put a for-sale sign on Delta airlines, we're just not going to do that," Grinstein said.

But "if the process of consolidation starts, you do not want to be left out," he added, explaining that all airlines are keeping tabs on each other.

And he touted "the huge amount of value" that has been created at Delta during the Atlanta-based airline's bankruptcy proceedings, essentially pointing to US Airways' $8.7 billion bid as being less than the up to $12 billion in value that Delta believes it is worth. Delta earlier on Thursday filed its standalone plan to emerge from bankruptcy and reported its board of directors unanimously rejected US Airways' takeover bid.

"I hope we'd be an acquirer rather than an 'aquiree,'" Grinstein said.

Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta Air Lines Inc. (Pink Sheets: DALRQ) and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. (NYSE: LCC). The two airlines serve New Mexico air travelers through the Albuquerque International Sunport.

"It appears from a factual standpoint this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it," said Jim Weiss, a Washington partner in the law firm Preston Gates & Ellis LLP. "The antitrust risk here is quite high."

Weiss, the former head of the DOJ's antitrust division and a hired gun for Delta since 1988, said he believes it would take the department about a year to review US Airways' hostile bid for Delta. That's because the DOJ will anticipate more merger proposals and would want to go over the Delta/US Airways merger with a fine-toothed comb.

In a detailed PowerPoint presentation available on Delta's Web site, Weiss showed why he believes the Delta/US Airways combination wouldn't pass muster. Chiefly, he said, a lot of small to mid-sized American cities would lose competition if the two airlines merged. The combined airline would be the largest carrier in 127 small communities. And Weiss contends that low cost carriers don't usually go into really small cities, so the competition isn't likely to be replaced.

DOJ_NMG_0108069

Other proof he offered for his position: the DOJ rejected a US Airways/United merger after a 14-month investigation. And that merger had even fewer overlapping routes and hubs, Weiss said.

Meanwhile, US Airways continued its public campaign for Delta. The airline sent out a statement from Chairman and CEO Doug Parker saying, "Combining US Airways and Delta will create at least $1.65 billion in annual synergies beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan. These synergies come on top of the certainty of $4 billion in cash and the upside potential of 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock."

But Grinstein said in the conference call that he expects Delta would be $8 billion in debt when it emerges from bankruptcy. By contrast, he said, a US Airways/Delta merger would be saddled with $23 billion in debt. If that sounds familiar, he quipped, that was the amount of debt Delta had when it filed for Chapter 11 in 2005.

Phone Carriers Win A Skirmish In Cable Wars (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Telephone companies got some help yesterday in elbowing their way into the video arena that the cable industry has dominated.

Arguing that cable television rates have surged in the absence of robust competition, federal regulators moved to speed up the local approval process for phone companies seeking to compete.

The action came in a 3-to-2 vote by the Federal Communications Commission. The ruling does not force municipalities to grant phone companies a video franchise, but it does require a decision within 90 days.

Phone carriers, notably Verizon, have asserted that some municipalities are slow to grant approvals, often in the face of cable industry lobbying.

If it succeeds in fostering competition, the decision could eventually affect the rates and services available to the roughly 100 million households that pay for access to television.

The decision is part of a fierce political, regulatory and business battle between the cable and telephone companies. They are battling town by town and household by household to get a share of the growing amount Americans spend on their monthly telecommunications bills.

Cable companies have made considerable inroads at offering telephone service and high-speed Internet access. Telephone companies have in the last year entered cable's traditional turf, television, and say this decision will fuel their offensive.

"This means an end to the automatic skyrocketing in cable prices and means greater choice in service and programming," said David Fish, a Verizon spokesman.

But industry analysts said that the decision would not prompt overnight change, in part because it is likely to face a court challenge, but also because the biggest challenge to the phone companies remains the technical and financial logistics of entering a costly new business.

The F.C.C. found that municipalities were unnecessarily and unfairly delaying approval of franchise agreements, refusing them unreasonably, or making unrelated demands, like requiring financing for public swimming pools or recreation centers.

Cable industry officials said they objected to the decision, arguing it creates an uneven playing field by not similarly expediting the process for renewal of their own franchises — the typically multiyear agreements that allow cable companies to provide television access in a community in exchange for a tax of around 5 percent of their sales.

The industry also rejected F.C.C. data indicating that cable television prices had risen steadily in recent years, even as competition had driven down the cost of other telecommunications services, like Internet and phone access.

The commission found that the average monthly rate for cable service increased 5.2 percent, to $43.04, in 2004 alone, and 93 percent in less than a decade.

Kyle McSlarrow, president and chief executive of the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, said those figures were taken from published rate cards, and thus ignored the reality that most subscribers get discounts or other deals.

DOJ_NMG_0108070

He said the prices also did not reflect the discounts offered when subscribers buy bundles of telephone, Internet and television service.

Roughly 66 million American households pay for cable service, compared with around 28 million who get satellite access. There are only a few million who get it through telephone lines.

Bills introduced in Congress this year would have eased the franchise approval process, either by making it national or creating a national standard, but no legislation was ultimately approved.

There have also been political battles at the state level, with the phone companies seeking a statewide approval process that would circumvent municipal franchising. They have prevailed in states including Texas, New Jersey and California.

Jessica Zufolo, an analyst who studies the telecommunications market on behalf of investors, called the F.C.C. decision "a huge victory for the Bells," but said "it's a somewhat pyrrhic victory because there's a high, high litigation risk." She said cities in particular might sue, arguing that the F.C.C. had overstepped its authority.

Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein, who voted against the proposal, asserted that the agency lacked the authority to rule as it had. And Jim L. Haggerton, vice chairman of the Information Technology and Communications Committee of the National League of Cities, said the ruling took away municipalities' rightful power.

"We're totally opposed to the federal government making the decisions for cities across the country," said Mr. Haggerton, who sits on the city council in Tukwila, Wash.

Kevin J. Martin, the commission chairman, who voted in favor of the new rule, emphasized the finding that insufficient competition was fueling a rise in cable rates.

"It is critical then that the commission act to remove regulatory barriers to the ability of a second cable operator to enter the market," he said in a statement.

The most aggressive effort to compete against cable companies has come from Verizon. The company said it provided television service to 1.2 million customers, and had franchise agreements in about 300 municipalities including 25 in New York State, mostly on Long Island. That is a small fraction of the more than 3,000 municipalities Verizon said it needed to reach to achieve its goal of providing television service in 60 percent of its telephone territory.

Mr. Fish of Verizon said agreements in other cities had taken many months; he said 83 percent of franchise negotiations with cities had been going on for more than a year.

AT&T, the nation's other big phone company, is so far offering television service in two markets, Houston and San Antonio.

Michael Balmoris, a company spokesman, said AT&T's position was that because it was delivering television service over telephone lines, it was not subject to local franchise regulation.

But it has already encountered local skirmishes over related issues. For example, he said that "multiple cities" in Illinois had not allowed AT&T to upgrade its network to high-speed fiber lines on the ground that doing so would effectively permit the company to offer video service without a franchise agreement.

"We can use the F.C.C. item today in litigation to show we should be able to upgrade" our lines, he said.

Still, analysts said the chief hurdle for telephone companies would be laying lines in the ground capable of delivering television, then convincing consumers to switch.

The F.C.C. decision "certainly alleviates something of a challenge that Verizon and AT&T have to go through," said Alan Bezoza, telecommunications industry analyst with Oppenheimer & Company. "But the biggest challenge will be just rolling this out."

FCC Vote A Victory For Phone Companies (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

A divided Federal Communications Commission yesterday approved a measure aimed at helping telephone companies move into cable television markets by significantly limiting what local officials can demand in return for franchises.

DOJ_NMG_0108071

The new rule reflects the intensifying battle between the phone and cable industries over who will control distribution of video, voice and Internet access in an increasingly wired country. But the telephone industry's victory could prove temporary because opponents say the measure will almost certainly be challenged in court.

The FCC voted 3 to 2 along party lines to change how local officials award television franchises to eliminate what Republican supporters said were unreasonable demands and delays.

The measure requires local regulators to rule on franchise applications within 90 days for companies such as Verizon Communications and AT&T that have wires in place. It also bars local officials from requiring that companies provide TV service to everyone in a jurisdiction and prevents them from demanding fees or in-kind contributions exceeding 5 percent of the television revenues.

Verizon has been seeking local TV franchises nationwide and has won more than 200, including agreements with most of the counties and cities in the Washington area. The company has said it plans to win 3,300 franchises nationwide and has been lobbying state legislatures and Congress to speed up the approval process.

The FCC's Republican majority said that removing unreasonable hurdles erected by local governments would translate into lower cable rates. Democratic members disagreed and accused the Republicans of overstepping the FCC's authority.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a leading proponent of the new federal rule, called it crucial for breaking the virtual monopoly held by cable companies in many areas and reversing the steady increase in cable bills over the past decade. Martin said the measure, which is to take effect next year, also would make broadband Internet access more widely available because telephone companies would gain revenue to continue building fiber-optic networks.

"The record collected by the commission in this proceeding cited instances where [local officials] sat on applications for more than a year or required extraordinary in-kind contributions such as the building of public swimming pools and recreation centers," Martin said.

But the commission's Democrats warned that the FCC, by exceeding its legal mandate, would face time-consuming challenges from opponents, including cable companies and local officials angered by what they say is a preemption of their authority.

"The end result will likely be litigation, confusion of the process and a certain amount of chaos," Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein said. He questioned the claim that local officials have unreasonably refused applications, saying the FCC had not cited a single instance in which a franchise was being unduly delayed or held up because of demands for exorbitant fees or concessions.

"The majority simply accepts in every case that the big phone companies are right and the local governments are wrong," Adelstein said.

In the District, where phone companies do not have franchises to provide television service, officials called the FCC decision troubling.

"People in the District would be concerned if control is taken away from local municipalities. Cities could be damaged in many different ways," said J. Carl Wilson, general counsel of the D.C. Office of Cable Television and Telecommunications. He said District residents could suffer if officials no longer asked providers for public channels.

Montgomery County Council President Marilyn Praisner (D-Eastern County) said consumers would suffer from the FCC ruling. "This is an early Christmas present of a stocking full of coal," she said, predicting that the county and other jurisdictions would challenge the decision in court.

Montgomery County and Verizon clashed this year over the company's ultimately successful bid to win a franchise there.

The United States Telecom Association, a telephone industry trade group, said the measure would give consumers more choice.

"The steps outlined today will help fix the franchising process and end the unnecessary delays caused by outdated regulations," said Walter B. McCormick Jr., president of the association.

Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, said the FCC gave phone companies an unfair advantage over longtime cable providers. FCC officials promised to study how cable providers should be treated when their franchises come up for renewal.

DOJ_NMG_0108072

Phone Giants Are Closer To TV Service (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, December 21, 2006

To jump-start competition for subscription TV service, the Federal Communications Commission passed new rules Wednesday designed to let the big phone companies obtain local video franchises more easily.

The move is expected to let AT&T and Verizon more quickly enter hundreds of markets in the next few years, spurring new competition for the cable giants and possibly bringing lower prices.

By a 3-2 party-line vote, the Republican-controlled FCC said cities and counties may not impose unreasonable barriers that delay rollout of the video services.

AT&T and Verizon are spending billions to build fiber-optic lines that deliver bundles of voice, broadband and pay-TV services. But when they seek TV franchises, the companies say, local officials often cause delays by making outrageous demands, such as to build swimming pools and recreation centers.

"Such requirements are especially troubling, because competition is desperately needed," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin says.

Phone companies say it typically takes 15 months or more to receive a franchise.

The new rules would force localities to act on the phone companies' franchise requests within 90 days and count the value of any sweeteners the company tosses in toward a 5% fee on revenue that it's already required to pay. Local officials won't be able to force a carrier to offer video to parts of a community it can't serve for technical or other practical reasons.

To lend support to its ruling, the FCC released a study showing that cable prices jumped 93%, to $43.04 a month, from 1995 to 2005. But prices were 17% lower in markets where there was a second landline rival. Satellite services did not manage to hold down cable prices, the FCC says. AT&T says its prices in San Antonio underpriced cable by as much as 42%.

But Kyle McSlarrow, head of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, says the study doesn't account for cable's discount bundles. He also says the FCC is unfairly favoring phone companies.

"We don't believe the commission has the legal authority to establish separate regimes for incumbents and new entrants," he says.

Carolyn Coleman of the National League of Cities says the FCC is overstepping its legal authority by "circumventing negotiations" when there's no evidence to support the phone companies' claims.

Democratic FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein accused the agency of "riding roughshod over local governments."

Martin acted after Congress failed this year to pass a bill that would have created a national video franchise. Eight states, including Texas, California and New Jersey, have streamlined franchising in their communities.

Bell Companies' FCC Victory Might Be Short-Lived (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Phone companies scored a win at the Federal Communications Commission when the agency agreed to change rules to let them enter the cable-television business faster, but the victory may be short-lived, as congressional Democrats complained and opponents threatened legal action.

The FCC, in a 3-2 party-line vote, passed rules that give state and local authorities a 90-day deadline to grant video-franchising agreements to new competitors. The commission also struck down rules requiring that the Bells do more to provide service to all residents in an area than current providers.

• What's New: The FCC changed the rules to make it easier for phone companies to enter the cable television business.

• The Background: The Bells have gotten states to change laws so they can offer video, but want a U.S. standard so they don't have to lobby state-by-state.

• What It Means: Local officials are likely to challenge the FCC action in court and states may be less willing to change their laws if there's a possibility the FCC will pre-empt their efforts anyway.

DOJ_NMG_0108073

The FCC action raises potentially significant issues for the Bells, which have persuaded eight states -- including California, New Jersey and Texas -- to change laws to accelerate entry to the video business. State and local officials say the FCC is trying to usurp their authority, and cable companies say the Bells are getting preferential treatment. The matter looks to be heading for court. Yesterday's decision may make it more difficult for the Bells to persuade other states to change some rules that are made somewhat moot by the FCC action.

Verizon Communications Inc. and AT&T Inc. lobbyists have argued to state legislatures that more competition will lead to lower prices and more broadband Internet services.

"We don't expect states [that] are interested in passing legislation to stop that work because of today's FCC action," said David Fish, a Verizon spokesman. Michael Balmoris, an AT&T spokesman, said the company intends to continue to press states to change franchising laws and said the FCC "expressly chose not to pre-empt existing state franchising law."

Verizon, AT&T and other phone companies argue it isn't in the public's best interest for them to have to seek approval from 30,000 local communities to offer digital television service. The Bells say community officials have demanded various incentives -- such as landscaping for parks and street lights -- before allowing them to offer local video service.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has argued that the FCC has authority to stop unreasonable delays by local officials in granting video franchises. Mr. Martin said changing the rules nationally to set time limits will promote video competition, increase the spread of high-speed Internet service across the U.S. and lower cable rates. He said he is "committed to seeing that consumers are able to realize the benefits of competition in the forms of better services and lower prices."

In recent weeks, organizations representing U.S. cities, mayors and governors challenged the FCC's authority to impose federal rules on what has been a state and local decision, essentially telling the FCC to back off. Along with cable operators, they argued there is scant evidence suggesting the Bells haven't had success getting approval from communities to offer competitive video service.

FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, a Democrat who voted against the change, argued the FCC was doing "legal gymnastics that would only impress an Olympic judge whose vote has been promised before the competition begins" to justify its authority.

The decision "undermines local franchising authority and enforcement, threatens local budgets, and limits the benefits of broadband video competition to a few well-to-do neighborhoods," said Larry Naake, executive director for the National Association of Counties.

"Fundamentally, as a matter of good policy, we're not too keen on any proposals that treat us and the telcos differently. We have serious questions about the FCC's ability to set legislative policy," said Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, a lobbying group.

Questions surrounding the FCC's authority over video franchising is the main reason phone companies tried to get Congress to make similar changes earlier this year. That effort died amid partisan bickering over Internet discrimination rules.

U.S. Clears CVS To Acquire Caremark Rx (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

CVS Corporation has won antitrust approval to purchase Caremark Rx, the pharmacy benefit manager, removing potential regulatory opposition to the pending $21 billion acquisition.

CVS, which is competing against Express Scripts's $26 billion bid for Caremark, received approval from the Federal Trade Commission, Caremark, which is based in Nashville, said in a statement yesterday.

Last month, CVS agreed to buy Caremark to gain more power to negotiate prices with drug makers and to prevent the loss of foot traffic to mail-order medicines from hurting sales of razors, sodas and makeup.

Should either CVS or Caremark scuttle the deal because of a competing offer, it would pay the other a breakup fee of $675 million, CVS's chief financial officer, David B. Rickard, said in an interview last month.

Shares of CVS, which is based in Woonsocket, R.I., fell 7 cents, to $29.91, on the New York Stock Exchange.

Caremark, which fell 28 cents, to $56 yesterday, has risen 11 percent since Dec. 15, the last trading day before the Express Scripts offer. Express Scripts rose $1.52, to $73.78, and has advanced 7.5 percent since Dec. 15.

DOJ_NMG_0108074

We Energies Sells Nuclear Plant to FPL (AP)

By Emily Fredrix

AP, December 21, 2006

MILWAUKEE (AP) -- Wisconsin Energy Corp. is selling its only nuclear power plant to Florida-based FPL Energy in a deal worth about $1 billion, the companies announced Wednesday.

We Energies' agreement with the subsidiary of FPL Group Inc. includes $783 million for the plant and $215 million for its nuclear fuel and other inventories.

Milwaukee-based We Energies will buy the entire output of the plant, whose two reactors generate about a quarter of the company's energy needs.

The sale means the company will no longer operate the plant in Two Rivers, Wis., north of Milwaukee, or pay to decommission it in about 20 years, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, said spokesman Barry McNulty.

As part of the deal, We Energies will give FPL Energy $560 million from a trust fund it had set aside to pay for the decommissioning, when the plant is taken offline and cleaned up, McNulty said.

The state's public service commission will consider what to do with the remainder of the trust fund, about $300 million, which customers contributed to, he said. More money could also be available depending on rulings from the Internal Revenue Service, McNulty said.

The commission will rule on the sale and could consider looking at returning some of the money to ratepayers. A message was left with the commission Wednesday seeking details.

Besides the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, other groups that have to rule on the deal include the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission.

One of the reactors at Point Beach, a 1,033-megawatt facility, is licensed to operate until 2030. The second reactor is licensed to operate until 2033.

The deal is expected to close in August 2007.

FPL Energy, based in Juno Beach, Fla., said it will keep the plant's 660 employees.

If the deal is approved, the plant will be FPL Energy's fifth, said Mike O'Sullivan, FPL Energy vice president.

Part of the company's strategy is to buy nuclear plants from utilities that only operate one because with FPL's size, it can run the plants more efficiently, he said. Nearly one year ago, FPL bought 70 percent ownership of Iowa's only nuclear power plant, the Duane Arnold Energy Center, near Palo, for about $373 million.

Wisconsin Energy announced in February its intent to look at selling the plant either outright or partially. The company received several offers of partial buyouts but decided selling the entire plant was the best option, the company's president and chief executive officer, Gale Klappa, told investors in a conference call Wednesday. Based on initial estimates, the deal means We Energies will get energy for 26 years below the cost of continuing to operate the plant, he said.

The deal means We Energies will get the same amount of energy it would have produced but for less money because it will not have to pay to operate the plant, a cost expected to rise in the future, or for its eventual decommission, McNulty said.

FPL Energy and its parent company, FPL Group, operate nuclear plants in Florida, Iowa and New England. FPL Energy is considered the largest wind energy producer in the country. It owns and operates 47 wind energy facilities, including the Montfort Wind Energy Center in Montfort, Wis.

Charlie Higley, the executive director of The Citizens Utility Board in Wisconsin, said the group opposes the sale because We Energies' 1 million customers will eventually pay more for their energy. We Energies was obligated to return any profits to customers as rebates, he said, but if the plant is sold to the out-of-state utility, Wisconsin cannot force the company to return profits to customers.

Shares of Wisconsin Energy fell 36 cents to close at $47.94 on the New York Stock Exchange Wednesday, while shares of FPL Group rose 38 cents to close at $55.10 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Wisconsin Energy to sell Point Beach nuclear plant for $1B (BJM)

DOJ_NMG_0108075

Business Journal of Milwaukee, December 20, 2006

Wisconsin Energy Corp. has agreed to sell the Point Beach Nuclear Plant in Two Rivers to a unit of Florida energy company FPL Group Inc. for nearly $1 billion.

Point Beach is a 1,033-megawatt power plant. The first unit at Point Beach went into commercial service in 1970 and is licensed to operate until 2030. The second unit was brought on line in 1973 and is licensed to operate until 2033.

FPL Group's FPL Energy Inc. subsidiary will purchase the plant, its nuclear fuel and associated inventories for approximately $998 million from Wisconsin Electric Power Co., a subsidiary of Wisconsin Energy.

FPL will enter into a long-term agreement under which FPL Energy will sell 100 percent of the output of Point Beach to We Energies. The price represents $783 million for the plant itself and $215 million for fuel, inventory and other items, Juno Beach, Fla.-based FPL Group said in a separate statement.

The transaction is expected to close in August 2007. The transaction is subject to a number of state and federal approvals, including the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and review by the Department of Justice.

As part of the transaction, FPL Energy will offer employment to all current employees at the plant. In addition, FPL Energy will be responsible for the ultimate decommissioning of the facility and the cost of that decommissioning.

After closing the transaction, We Energies also will receive approximately $300 million from a trust fund that had been established to pay for the decommissioning of the plant.

The Public Service Commission of Wisconsin will determine how the net proceeds from the sale will be used to benefit customers, Wisconsin Energy said.

Upon closing, FPL Energy will assume management and operation of the plant from Nuclear Management Co., Hudson, and will work with NMC to ensure a smooth transition. NMC, a joint venture of upper Midwest utilities, has managed the plant since 2000.

Wisconsin Energy said in February 2006 that it planned to launch a formal review of its ownership and operation in the Point Beach plant.

Service Corp. Seeks Approval For Sale (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON --Funeral home operator Service Corp. International requested government approval Wednesday to sell several properties in order to comply with an agreement reached with the Federal Trade Commission last month.

Service Corp. petitioned the FTC Wednesday to approve the sale of thirteen funeral homes and cemeteries in Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi to privately-held Legacy Holdings.

The company filed a similar petition Tuesday seeking approval for the sale of two properties in California to Carriage Services Inc. The FTC is seeking public comment on the petitions for thirty days, and will then decide whether to approve the transactions.

SCI agreed with the FTC Nov. 22 to sell a total of 55 properties in order to settle antitrust concerns stemming from its purchase of Alderwoods Group. SCI's purchase of Alderwoods closed Nov. 28.

The 40 funeral homes and 15 cemeteries that SCI was required to sell generated $57 million in revenue and $11 million in operating income annually, the company said in a November 22 statement. SCI expects to sell the properties for a total of $120 million to $130 million, the company said.

The SCI-Alderwoods combination will have 2,000 funeral home and cemetery locations after the divestitures, SCI said. Those properties are expected to generate $2.3 billion in annual revenue.

Mitchell Katz, an FTC spokesman, said the agency expects further petitions from the company as it sells off additional properties as called for in the agreement.

Shares of SCI dropped 22 cents to $10.13, while Carriage Services shares were unchanged at $5.05 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Lawsuit against Amway still stands (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0108076

By Dan Margolies

Kansas City Star/McClatchy, December 21, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Plaintiffs in a massive antitrust action against Amway Corp. overcame another hurdle this week in their long quest to get their case heard by a jury.

A federal judge on Monday refused to dismiss all but one of eight counts against the company, finding that the plaintiffs' allegations were legally sufficient to support claims of price fixing, conspiracy and other charges.

U.S. District Judge Richard E. Dorr agreed to dismiss only a civil racketeering claim, ruling that it failed to establish "a pattern of racketeering activity."

"We are obviously pleased with the ruling," said Kansas City lawyer Dan Boulware, who represents several Amway distributors, including Nitro Distributing Inc. of Springfield, Mo. "All of our claims survived with the exception of the racketeering claim, which was a new claim we had recently added, and the judge kept the door open for that."

Boulware said that he intended to refile the racketeering claim.

Amway, now known as Alticor Inc., said it was "pleased" that the court had rejected the plaintiffs' "misguided effort to sensationalize the case with its unfounded (racketeering) claims."

"The court decided that it would be premature to dismiss Nitro's remaining claims for alleged violations of the antitrust laws and various common law torts," the company said in a news release. "The court noted that, at this early stage of the proceeding, it was legally required to accept Nitro's unproven allegations as true.

"Alticor is confident that, as the litigation proceeds and Nitro is unable to produce evidence to support its claims, Nitro's misguided claims will be dismissed before trial."

The case, which was filed in mid-2003 in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Missouri, has been closely watched by Amway distributors nationwide. Most recently, a federal appeals court upheld Dorr's rejection of Amway's request to send the case to arbitration.

The lawsuit contends that Amway exaggerates the profits to be made selling its products and pressures distributors into buying its motivational materials. It alleges that a handful of Amway "kingpins" - those who bought into Amway early on - control thousands of down-line distributors and make most of their money by selling them the motivational materials, known at Amway as the "tool and function" business.

The lawsuit says that distributors are misled into thinking they can attain great wealth by selling Amway products. In reality, it says, distributors can only become wealthy by participating in the motivational business. But because that business is dominated by the kingpins, very few succeed.

Among other allegations, the lawsuit says the kingpins use a variety of tactics to exercise control, including illegal tying arrangements, price fixing and blackballing disfavored distributors.

The case is scheduled to go to trial in early 2008.

NYSE Gets OK On Euronext Deal (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 21, 2006

NEW YORK — Shareholders in the New York Stock Exchange voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to approve a $14 billion acquisition of Euronext that will create the first trans-Atlantic market for stocks.

"This is an historic day for NYSE Group and reaffirms our leadership position in global finance markets," said NYSE CEO John Thain. The merger will "enable us to move forward with our shared vision of building the first truly global exchange group," he said.

With more than 75% of NYSE shareholders voting, the merger received overwhelming approval, winning an estimated 99.7% of ballots cast. Euronext shareholders approved the deal Tuesday.

Thain spent the first half of the year negotiating the transaction with Euronext, which had also been in merger discussions with the Deutsche Börse. The German exchange finally abandoned its overtures last month, clearing the way for the NYSE deal.

DOJ_NMG_0108077

Approval of the Euronext deal comes one year after seat holders on the NYSE voted to approve a merger with Archipelago, an electronic stock exchange. That deal transformed the Big Board from a private club into a public company and also gave the NYSE a much stronger electronic trading platform to go along with its open-floor auction system.

After the approval of the Euronext deal, Thain met with reporters. He said the expansion into Europe was part of the three-pronged strategy he laid out after taking the job as head of the NYSE three years ago.

His first goal was to "de-mutualize" the exchange, and his second was to diversify the NYSE's product offerings. Both strategic goals were accomplished in the Archipelago deal.

The Euronext deal is the first step toward the "globalization" of the NYSE, the final piece of his strategy. The deal is expected to close within three months, since European regulators have already approved it.

Thain said he would look closely at further expansion opportunities in Asia, particularly in China, Japan and India. But he said there was no guarantee that he'd be able to keep rivals from expanding there first. "You have to be concerned about what competitors might do," he said.

Still, Thain's biggest rival, the Nasdaq, has stumbled so far in its own attempt to expand beyond the U.S. borders. It has made two offers to buy the London Stock Exchange in recent months but has been rebuffed both times. This week, LSE chief Clara Furse said she wouldn't even consider the Nasdaq's $5.3 billion takeover bid, calling it "wholly inadequate."

The NYSE's own shares closed at $102.19 Wednesday, down $1.17.

N.Y. Firm To Buy Harland Low-profile M&F Worldwide's $1.7 Billion All-cash Deal For Decatur Check Printing Firm Certain To Face Antitrust Scrutiny. (AJC)

By Péralte C. Paul, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 21, 2006

M&F Worldwide Corp. isn't exactly a household name.

The New York company — which said Wednesday it entered into a $1.7 billion deal to acquire John H. Harland Co., the Decatur-based check maker — owns Clarke American Corp., another big check printer. Its other holding is Mafco Worldwide Corp., a maker of licorice extract used in candies, pharmaceuticals and tobacco products.

OK, so licorice and check printing aren't what you'd call sexy businesses.

But one analyst said the all-cash transaction, which calls for M&F to give $52.75 per share to Harland stockholders, will allow Clarke American to leapfrog Deluxe Corp., the market leader in check printing.

And it fits in with the style of Ronald O. Perelman, an M&F board member and head of cosmetics giant Revlon Inc., said John Kraft, an analyst at D.A. Davidson & Co. who follows Harland.

Perelman is chairman and chief executive of MacAndrews & Forbes Holdings Inc. That company is the principal shareholder in M&F Worldwide.

"He doesn't need a glamorous industry," Kraft said of Perelman, who owns 500,000 shares of M&F, valued at more than $10.2 billion. "He's looking to milk the cash flows."

Printing checks is a business ripe for consolidation.

Check usage has declined dramatically — more than 30 percent since 1995 — as consumers increasingly migrate to other payment forms such as debit and credit cards and online bill paying, government statistics show.

Both Deluxe and Harland, the fiercest competitors in the business, have watched their revenues from their check printing operations decline as a result. Revenues were pushed further downward by the rivals' pricing wars designed to win over financial institutions as clients.

Harland recognized that long ago and sought to extend into other business lines: It bought up technology and software companies that provide services to banks, and it also has Scantron, a standardized testing business.

But Kraft said the check business still has a lot of life left, even as it declines.

"It's manageable," Kraft said. "It's not growing, but that doesn't mean you can't generate money on it."

Even so, Harland was likely to do something. Executives have long said they were looking at ways to maximize shareholder value.

DOJ_NMG_0108078

In business-speak, that's usually taken to mean selling off the company or spinning out a unit into a separate, publicly traded company.

Still, the pending acquisition, which the companies anticipate will close in the second half of next year, isn't necessarily a done deal.

Regulators will take their time in reviewing the proposal because of antitrust concerns, Kraft said.

Deluxe has about 40 percent of the check printing business, which is about $2 billion a year. Harland and Clarke American each have about 30 percent market share.

With both Harland and Clarke American under the same umbrella, M&F would control 60 percent of the market, which is almost certain to raise antitrust concerns, Kraft said.

"Antitrust is going to be the issue," Kraft said. "That's not a slam dunk with regulators."

Wall Street, however, didn't seem to have a problem.

Shares of both Harland and M&F rose dramatically. Even Deluxe got a bit of a boost.

Harland shares rose more than 13 percent Wednesday, climbing $5.84 to close at $50.31. M&F shares rose almost 12 percent, a gain of $2.19 to close at $20.49. Deluxe shares also rose, gaining nearly 3 percent, or 67 cents, to close at $24.17.

Neither executives of M&F nor Harland — both with historically conservative images — would provide additional details about the deal beyond what was said in a joint-issued news release.

"Combining the resources of Harland and Clarke American will provide significant value to customers and shareholders of both companies," said Harland's Timothy C. Tuff, chairman and chief executive.

"Financial institutions of all sizes will have a strategic partner that can provide a full suite of products and services designed to help them meet their business objectives."

Huntington, Sky To Merge Banks (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Huntington Bancshares Inc., a Columbus, Ohio, bank with 380 branches in five states, said it agreed to merge with Sky Financial Group Inc. in a stock-and-cash deal valued at roughly $3.29 billion, signaling that banking-industry consolidation is occurring even in less attractive markets like the Midwest.

Because there are many banks in the region vying for customers amid a relatively slow-growing economy, competition is even more fierce than elsewhere in the country. Sky Financial, Bowling Green, Ohio, has about 330 branches in five states, overlapping with Huntington's footprint in four: Indiana, Michigan, Ohio and West Virginia. The combined banks will have more than 700 branches, 1,384 ATMs and deposits of about $38 billion, the companies said.

The deal is expected to close in the third quarter of next year, subject to the approval of both banks' shareholders and of regulators.

Huntington ranks fourth by deposits in Ohio, with a nearly 8% share of the market as of June 30, according to the most recent Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. data. The bank said the merger will boost it to No. 3 in Ohio as ranked by deposits. The deal also will give Huntington the top spot in several Ohio cities, including Columbus and Toledo; will boost its share in Cleveland; and will give it the No. 3 spot in Indianapolis, which is one of the region's "faster growing" markets, Huntington CEO Thomas Hoaglin said.

Officials at the bank weren't available to discuss the deal, a spokeswoman said.

In 4 p.m. trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, shares of Huntington closed at $24.70, down seven cents, while shares of Sky Financial closed at $24.29, up 12 cents.

Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ)

By Bobby White And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108079

Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson's agreement to buy Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite.

Ericsson, a Swedish provider of equipment and services for telecommunications infrastructure, said it will pay holders of the Silicon Valley seller of routing equipment $25 a share, or 18% more than Redback's share price before the announcement. Ericsson characterized the price as a 60% premium above the 90-day average for Redback stock.

The companies said the deal will make them more effective suppliers for the fast-moving market. It also could help Redback contend with larger competitors such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Juniper Networks Inc.

"Some companies were reluctant to use our technology because of Redback's size," said Paul Giordano, chairman of Redback's board and chief executive of Tamalpais Asset Management, a hedge fund that is an investor in the company. "Redback can compete in a much stronger way now."

Redback was forced to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in 2003, after an expansion during the telecom boom left the company saddled with debt. It slashed costs, cut nearly 1,000 employees and invested millions of dollars on new technology.

At one point, the stock traded for less than $1. In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, before the deal was announced, the stock traded at $21.17, up 45 cents. In after-hours trading the shares were up $3.63, or 17%, to $24.80.

Kevin Denuccio, Redback's chief executive, said his company had been in talks with Ericsson off and on for months but discussions grew more intense in mid-November. He said Redback was interested in being acquired, hoping "to marry the size, reach and resources of Ericsson with Silicon Valley culture and expertise."

Ericsson, with a market value of $65 billion, is Europe's largest telecom-equipment maker. Its acquisition last year of most of the assets of Marconi PLC set off a wave of consolidation in the industry, which included the proposed combination of the networks divisions of Nokia Corp. and Siemens AG, as well as last month's purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by Alcatel SA of France to form Alcatel Lucent.

Marconi's technology, designed to help telecom carriers handle big increases in data traffic, gave Ericsson a foothold in the networks of Marconi's existing customers, which were concentrated in the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany. The Redback deal could further improve Ericsson's ability to sell to U.S. carriers rolling out Internet television services.

"There's a scramble right now between Ericsson and Cisco to become the alternative to Alcatel in Internet television," said Inder Singh, telecom analyst at Prudential Equity Group. He thinks Ericsson could still be in the market for high-speed optical devices that collect and send signals to hundreds of homes.

Redback, of San Jose, Calif., will retain its management team and will operate as a business unit of Ericsson. The deal is expected to close by early 2007.

Arcelor Mittal buys steel plants from Grupo Villacero (BLOOM)

By Alaric Nightingale, Matthew Craze

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

LONDON: Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel maker, said Wednesday that it had bought plants owned by Grupo Villacero for $1.4 billion to become the biggest producer of the metal in Mexico.

The purchase is the first since Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion combination with Arcelor this year.

Arcelor Mittal, based in Luxembourg, purchased the Sicartsa mill in Lázaro Cárdenas, Mexico, it said in a statement. It also acquired Border Steel, a mini-mill in Texas, as part of the deal. Arcelor Mittal and Villacero also created a joint venture to become the biggest supplier of steel products in Mexico and the U.S. Southwest.

Arcelor Mittal wants to strengthen its position as the biggest steel maker in the United States and tap growing demand for the metal in Latin America. Mexican steel demand may grow 6 percent a year in the next decade, according to Arcelor Mittal's chief financial officer, Aditya Mittal.

Michael Shillaker, an analyst at Credit Suisse in London, said, "This sends a clear signal to the market that the company will continue a growth path alongside its integration path."

DOJ_NMG_0108080

Brussels Approves MAN's Scania Bid (FT)

By Richard Milne In Munich, Tobias Buck In Brussels And David,ibison In Stockholm

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

MAN, the German truckmaker, last night won unconditional approval from Europe's top competition regulator for its €10.3bn ($13.7bn) hostile bid for Swedish rival Scania, removing a significant obstacle from the four-month take-over fight.

The European Commission said there was no reason to object to the transaction on antitrust grounds. TheBrussels-based regulator added that it had "found that European bus and truck markets would remain competitive even after the proposed acquisition, because the merged entity would still face strong competition from a number of other important manufacturers such as DaimlerChrysler, Volvo, Iveco and DAF".

The focus will now move to MAN's efforts to persuade Scania's two largest shareholders - German carmaker Volkswagen and the investment vehicle of the Wallenberg family, Investor - to accept its offer before aJanuary 31 deadline.

The approval by the regulator is a relief to MAN, because the European Commission had previously blocked an attempt by Volvo to take over Scania in 2000. But MAN's bid is still poised on a knife-edge as Scania and Investor, in particular, opposes it strongly.

MAN has said it believes its SKr475 a share is a fair price but admits it has "the theoretical possibility" to increase its offer. The German group is trying to present its offer as "a merger of equals" rather than a straight takeover.

Advisers to MAN say compromises may be possible on issues such as the name of the new company, a possible secondary listing in Stockholm, and the composition of its supervisory board.

But in spite of VW and Investor recognising the industrial logic of a combination, it is not clear whether the Swedish group is prepared to cede control to MAN and a system of corporate governance with which it has big problems.

VW's position is also unclear since Bernd Pischetsrieder, its chief executive, was forced to resign from the end of this month. VW eventually wants to control a company combining all three groups' truck assets, supervisory board members say.

Separately, the uneasy truce between the main labour unions of Scania and MAN collapsed yesterday after IF Metal, the Swedish truckmaker's main union, said the proposed deal was "unrealistic" and would lead to hundreds of job losses.

Its statement will reignite fears any deal will encounter politically explosive labour market opposition in Sweden. "We would lose jobs, and they would gain jobs," the union said.

Intesa Must Sell More Branches, Antitrust Says (BLOOM)

By Steve Scherer, Tommaso Ebhardt

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

Dec. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Banca Intesa SpA, Italy's second- biggest bank, must sell 748 bank branches and part of its insurance business to win approval from Italy's antitrust regulator for its purchase of Sanpaolo IMI SpA.

Credit Agricole SA, Intesa's biggest shareholder, ``must reduce significantly'' its stake in the new bank and may not play an ``administrative or management role,'' according to a faxed statement from the Rome-based antitrust authority. Intesa must also sell its Po Vita life insurance unit, and limit the sales of insurance products from its bank branches.

Intesa and Sanpaolo shareholders backed the 30.8 billion- euro ($41 billion) acquisition on Dec. 1. The new bank will have almost twice as many domestic customers as UniCredit SpA, Italy's biggest bank. Italian banking takeovers have reached a record $85 billion this year as lenders seek to cut costs and boost profit amid increasing competition from foreign companies.

``It doesn't change substantially the merger,'' said Fabrizio Barini, an analyst at Websim SpA in Milan. ``They won't have any problems selling the extra branches.''

Intesa and Sanpaolo welcomed the antitrust's decision in a statement distributed by the Italian exchange.

``This will allow the merger to be completed by the end of the year,'' the companies said in a joint statement.

Intesa won the support of Credit Agricole for the Sanpaolo transaction by agreeing to sell the French lender 650 branches in northern Italy. That means Intesa is going to have to shed about another hundred to satisfy the regulator.

Representatives of Generali SpA, Italy's biggest insurer, must not participate in discussions or votes that involve Eurizon SpA, which is Sanpaolo's insurance and asset management unit, the regulator said. Generali owns 7.5 percent of Intesa.

DOJ_NMG_0108081

ENVIRONMENT:

Reforestation Lags Amid Record Wildfires (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, December 21, 2006

DENVER — As severe wildfires scorch more of the USA each year, the Forest Service is falling further behind in replacing trees lost to fire, insects and disease because of shrinking budgets and mounting costs of fighting the blazes.

The Forest Service had a backlog of 1.1 million acres that needed replanting in 2005 — a combined area slightly larger than Rhode Island — according to the agency's latest reforestation report. Last year, it could replant only 153,000 acres.

John Rosenow, president of the National Arbor Day Foundation, calls it "a double whammy — the high need (to replant) because of fires, and then the funds having to be diverted."

The Forest Service had to borrow $200 million from other programs to cover firefighting costs this year. Most of that, $159 million, came from reforestation accounts, the agency says.

Wildfires last year scorched almost 8.7 million acres, the highest total in more than a half-century — until this year's record 9.6 million acres burned.

"I'll give you one word: crisis," says forest ecologist Tom Bonnicksen, an adviser to the Forest Foundation, a California-based group. "In California areas burned by wildfires in 2001, only 3.8% were reforested. That, to me, is a crisis."

Not all land burned in these record years are in the 193 million acres of national forests. Nor do all burned forests need intensive replanting. Wildfires can char some areas but only singe others, so some tracts can reseed naturally.

But millions of acres of forestland, especially in the West, are dangerously overgrown because federal policy for decades was to put out every fire. When those forests catch fire now, they can burn so severely that replanting is the only option. If the forests aren't restored, erosion can mar the land, damage wildlife habitat and ruin the water quality of streams that contribute to the nation's water supply.

The Forest Service report says the increased acreage in need of replanting is mostly attributable to major fires in the West since 2000. It also acknowledges a steady decline in replanting since 1990.

"I'm concerned about our ability to do the appropriate level of reforestation," Forest Service Chief Dale Bosworth says. "That is a core value of the Forest Service."

A 2005 study by the Government Accountability Office warned that neglected reforestation could make wildfires worse. The report said that without new trees, burned areas will fill in with brush and weeds, which can dry out quickly and become volatile fuel for more fires.

In an attempt to close the gap, groups and businesses are donating money and seedlings. In October, Enterprise Rent-A-Car, working with the National Arbor Day Foundation, pledged 1 million trees a year for the next 50 years. Earlier this year, Ikea, the home store chain, paired with American Forests, another conservation group, to plant 300,000 trees.

Bosworth says such donations accounted for 12% of reforestation spending in 2004: "I'd like to double that over time."

Two Lawsuits Filed Against ICC (BSUN)

By Timothy B. Wheeler, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 21, 2006

Actions are effort to block building of the highway in Maryland suburbs

GAITHERSBURG -- In a challenge to both the outgoing Ehrlich administration and the incoming O'Malley regime, opponents of the proposed Inter-County Connector filed a pair of lawsuits Wednesday seeking to block construction of the east-west toll highway through Washington's Maryland suburbs.

In suits filed in federal courts in the District of Columbia and in Greenbelt, four environmental groups and two Montgomery County residents who live near the proposed highway contend that federal transportation and environmental agencies abrogated their duties in approving the state's plans for the 18-mile, six-lane highway.

DOJ_NMG_0108082

Speaking at a news conference at a suburban home that would lose part of its leafy backyard to the highway, the opponents alleged that state and federal officials glossed over the environmental damage the project would do. They also contend that officials failed to consider other ways of easing Washington area traffic congestion that would be less costly and less harmful to human health and natural resources.

"We ask that the federal government go back and take an honest look," said Erik Bluemel, staff attorney for the Institute of Public Representation at Georgetown University Law Center, one of the lawyers representing highway opponents.

The suits name as defendants federal transportation and environmental agencies, along with regional planning entities that approved the state's ICC plans.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. had made the long-planned highway's construction one of his priorities. He revived the project, which his Democratic predecessor, Parris N. Glendening, had rejected on environmental grounds. Ehrlich also sought to "fast-track" approval by federal agencies of a new, more favorable environmental study of the ICC.

Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan defended Wednesday the state's efforts to minimize and mitigate the highway's environmental impact. He dismissed ICC opponents as "a tiny minority of people who are unhappy with the democratic process."

"It's not only the governor, but a very strong majority of legislators, state legislators from across the state, [who] support this project," Flanagan said. "They understand that it's going to be very good for the state of Maryland."

Flanagan said bids are being sought for construction of the first leg of the connector, 7.2 miles from Interstate 370 in Gaithersburg to Georgia Avenue near Silver Spring.

The entire project is expected to cost about $2.4 billion, he said, with about $280 million of that devoted to replacing parkland that would be taken for the highway and restoring woods ands wetlands that would be bulldozed.

A spokesman for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley said the governor-elect stood by his campaign statements in support of the project -- a rare point of agreement between him and the Republican incumbent he ousted. "We will defend the lawsuits, and the ICC will progress, will be built," said Rick Abbruzzese, O'Malley's spokesman.

But opponents said they hope O'Malley will rethink his position once in office.

"When the highway is running right by the swing set, what do you tell your children?" asked Connie McKenna, president of the Shady Grove Woods Homeowners Association, who lives several doors from where Wednesday's news conference was held. Her son, Artie Sadtler, 12, has asthma, she said, and she worries that air pollution from the 125,000 vehicles a day expected to use the highway would aggravate his breathing difficulties.

"The worst part of this," McKenna added, "is it's not going to solve the terrible traffic we've been living with."

Though transportation officials say the highway would reduce commute times and ease gridlock along some routes, opponents say traffic would increase, worsening congestion elsewhere.

In addition to displacing 11 businesses and 52 homes, the proposed highway would clear 746 acres of woodlands, fill in 47 acres of wetlands and disrupt about seven miles of streams, said John Parrish, vice president of the Maryland Native Plant Society.

The state plans to create almost twice as many acres of wetlands as the highway would destroy, according to a fact sheet from the state Department of Transportation. Similarly, every acre of parkland lost would be replaced by 8 acres elsewhere.

But the highway also would spawn additional development in the area, Parrish pointed out. He said that growth would level another 2,213 acres of woods, fill in 160 acres more of wetlands and disturb an additional 15 miles of stream bed.

tim.wheeler@baltsun.com

Federal Agency Sued Over Environmental Study (WP)

By Katherine Shaver

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Four environmental groups and a Montgomery County couple filed lawsuits yesterday arguing that federal transportation officials approved the intercounty connector project before adequately studying the highway's effects on wildlife and public health.

DOJ_NMG_0108083

The two federal lawsuits -- one filed in the District and the other in Maryland -- also allege that the federal environmental review did not meet legal requirements to consider other east-west transportation options. Building mass transit and improving local roads, among other measures, would cost less, do less environmental damage and combat traffic better than an 18-mile road cutting across Montgomery and Prince George's counties, the complaints say.

"The ICC has been steamrolled through the approval process without a thorough evaluation of smarter, more effective and, frankly, healthier alternatives," said one of the plaintiffs, John M. Balbus, director of the health program for Environmental Defense.

Balbus and other highway opponents spoke at a news conference in the back yard of a home on Briardale Road in the Derwood area of Rockville, where the six-lane highway would cut through a swath of woods between two neighborhoods. The road's right of way would take part of the yard and run within a few feet of the family's swing set and basketball hoop.

Doug Hecox, a spokesman for the Federal Highway Administration, said he had not seen the lawsuits. However, he said, the agency does not typically comment on pending litigation.

Maryland highway officials were not named in the lawsuits, but state Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan said he had expected them. Still, he said, he was confident the state's study -- and federal officials' approval of it -- would withstand legal scrutiny.

"Every highway project that's ever been built in modern times has had to face a lawsuit," Flanagan said, adding that he had not seen the complaints. "This highway meets and, in fact, probably exceeds all federal and state environmental laws and regulations."

The plaintiffs said they hope for decisions in the cases by late summer. Their attorneys said they are not seeking an immediate injunction because state highway officials said no work that could cause environmental damage, such as tree cutting or filling in wetlands, would occur while the suits are pending. The suits probably will be settled or decided by a federal judge before any trial, lawyers said.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) made building the highway his administration's top transportation priority, saying it would reduce congestion on dangerously crowded east-west local roads while speeding travel between the Interstate-270 corridor in Montgomery and the Interstate-95 corridor in Prince George's. Maryland officials have begun buying property in the path of the toll highway, estimated to cost $2.4 billion. The first major contract -- to design and build the westernmost section between I-270 and Georgia Avenue -- is scheduled to be awarded in March, Flanagan said.

But in U.S. District Court in Maryland, opponents will argue that federal officials didn't consider "reasonable alternatives" to a highway and didn't fully weigh such environmental effects as increased noise on parkland. The complaint listing those allegations was filed by the Audubon Naturalist Society, the Maryland Native Plant Society, and Roger Metcalf and Eve Burton, a Derwood couple who would lose their Cashell Estates home to the highway.

The other suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Washington by Environmental Defense and the Sierra Club, argues that the federal review did not properly analyze the road's effect on local pollution levels and the health of nearby residents and schoolchildren.

"It's terrifying for us having seen our kids in the hospital with asthma to know this road might be coming," said Connie McKenna, a highway opponent who lives near the proposed route.

Suits Seek To Block ICC Construction (WT/AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

Environmental groups filed two court challenges yesterday aimed at blocking construction of Maryland's Intercounty Connector, a highway that officials say will ease commutes and take vehicles off local streets.

The 18-mile, six-lane highway connecting Interstate 270 in Montgomery County with Interstate 95 in Prince George's County has long been championed by regional business groups, but faced stiff opposition from environmentalists as well as concerns over its cost. It finally won federal approval in May.

DOJ_NMG_0108084

In one lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in the District, Environmental Defense and the Sierra Club say the air quality analysis conducted by federal and regional officials was inadequate because it gauged the potential pollution from the ICC by using monitors that were more than 1½ miles from major highways.

The second lawsuit -- filed in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, by the Audubon Naturalist Society, the Maryland Native Plant Society and a family whose property is on the proposed route for the ICC -- says federal officials failed to consider reasonable alternatives to the road and the full environmental impact of the project.

The ICC "would bring 125,000 vehicles per day into quiet residential neighborhoods and scenic parks and in close proximity to five schools where children ... will be exposed to dangerous levels of toxic and particulate matter air pollution," the groups said in the suit filed in the District.

Maryland Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan said the environmental impact studies "exceed the requirements of state and federal regulations."

"Now and until the ICC is built there will be congestion on neighborhood roads in Montgomery County that is more harmful than any emissions emanating from the ICC in the future," Mr. Flanagan said. He noted that studies indicate that moving traffic onto the ICC would reduce the number of serious accidents by 340 a year.

AAA Mid-Atlantic was quick to condemn the lawsuit, as was the Greater Washington Board of Trade.

"The environmental work was very carefully put together in anticipation of these lawsuits," said Bob Grow, director of government relations at the board. "I'd be surprised if they have any traction whatsoever."

Build It (WP)

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

MOST OFFICIALS in Maryland understand that the planned intercounty connector, possibly history's must studied road, has been examined and assessed ad nauseam -- and approved. Still, the Montgomery County Planning Board has blocked the state's purchase of a few small parcels for the 18-mile ICC, thus prolonging the roadway's 40-year-plus odyssey just a little bit more.

Depending on who's doing the explaining, the board has held up sale of 87 acres along the planned route because:

? The precise location of a planned maintenance facility is in dispute.

? Further protection for environmentally sensitive watersheds is required from the state.

? The planning board wants Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) and the newly elected County Council to affirm that the connector will really be built.

Maybe the board members are also awaiting a bolt of lightning or some other heavenly sign before they give the go-ahead for the road, which would connect two vital corridors in the Maryland suburbs, Interstate 270 in Montgomery County and I-95 in Prince George's County. While they wait, they might consider that the connector has been on the drawing board since the 1950s; that it has been the subject of exhaustive efforts to mitigate possible environmental impacts; that the state and federal governments have given it the green light; that financing is in place; and that the 87 acres in dispute have been purchased, preserved and set aside for the roadway over the course of three decades. As for Mr. O'Malley, he has backed the ICC repeatedly.

Environmentalists filed lawsuits yesterday; that is their right. In the meantime, the planning board should stop its posturing, sell the parcels and get out of the way.

Big Profits, And Questions, In Effort To Cut Emissions (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

New York Times, December 21, 2006

QUZHOU, China — Foreign businesses have embraced an obscure United Nations-backed program as a favored approach to limiting global warming. But the early efforts have revealed some hidden problems.

Under the program, businesses in wealthier nations of Europe and in Japan help pay to reduce pollution in poorer ones as a way of staying within government limits for emitting climate-changing gases like carbon dioxide, as part of the Kyoto Protocol.

Among their targets is a large rusting chemical factory here in southeastern China. Its emissions of just one waste gas contribute as much to global warming each year as the emissions from a million American cars, each driven 12,000 miles.

DOJ_NMG_0108085

Cleaning up this factory will require an incinerator that costs $5 million — far less than the cost of cleaning up so many cars, or other sources of pollution in Europe and Japan.

Yet the foreign companies will pay roughly $500 million for the incinerator — 100 times what it cost. The high price is set in a European-based market in carbon dioxide emissions. Because the waste gas has a far more powerful effect on global warming than carbon dioxide emissions, the foreign businesses must pay a premium far beyond the cost of the actual cleanup.

The huge profits from that will be divided by the chemical factory's owners, a Chinese government energy fund, and the consultants and bankers who put together the deal from a mansion in the wealthy Mayfair district of London.

Arrangements like this still make sense to the foreign companies financing them because they are a lot less expensive, despite the large profit for others, than cleaning up their own operations.

Such efforts are being watched in the United States as an alternative more politically attractive than imposing taxes on fossil fuels like coal and oil that emit global-warming gases when burned.

But critics of the fast-growing program, through which European and Japanese companies are paying roughly $3 billion for credits this year, complain that it mostly enriches a few bankers, consultants and factory owners.

With so much money flowing to a few particularly lucrative cleanup deals, the danger is that they will distract attention from the broader effort to curb global warming gases, and that the lure of quick profit will encourage short-term fixes at the expense of fundamental, long-run solutions, including developing renewable energy sources like solar power.

As word of deals like this has spread, everyone involved in the nascent business is searching for other such potential jackpots in developing countries.

As for more modest deals, like small wind farms, "if you don't have a humongous margin, it's not worth it," said Pedro Moura Costa, chief operating officer of EcoSecurities, an emissions-trading company in Oxford, England.

The financing of the chemical factory's incinerator here and other deals like it are now drawing unfavorable attention. Canada's environment minister, Rona Ambrose, announced in October that her government would withdraw from the trading program.

"There is a lot of evidence now about the lack of accountability around these kinds of projects," she said.

Another concern is that the program can have unintended results. The waste gas to be incinerated here is emitted during the production of a refrigerant that will soon be banned in the United States and other industrial nations because it depletes the ozone layer that protects the earth from ultraviolet rays.

Handsome payments to clean up the waste gas have helped chemical companies to expand existing factories that make the old refrigerant and even build new factories, said Michael Wara, a carbon-trading lawyer at Holland & Knight in San Francisco.

Moreover, air-conditioners using this Freon-like refrigerant are much less efficient users of electricity than newer models. The expansion of large middle classes in India and China has led to soaring sales of cheap, inefficient air-conditioners, along with the building of coal-fired plants to power them, further contributing to global warming and the depletion of the ozone layer.

The program is at the forefront of efforts to address the most intractable problem in climate change: how to limit soaring emissions from the largest developing countries. Sometime in 2009, China's total emissions of carbon dioxide, the most important global warming gas, are expected to surpass those from the United States, according to the International Energy Agency.

While the challenge of addressing global warming is daunting, so are the consequences of inaction. Scientists warn that rising concentrations of carbon dioxide and other global warming gases could result in more severe storms, wide crop failures, the spread of tropical diseases and rising sea levels endangering some coastal cities.

Programs like the one the United Nations supports are increasingly common in Europe. In general, they allow companies to buy rights on the market to exceed their limits on global warming gases from other companies prepared to reduce emissions elsewhere at a lower cost. Many economists consider emissions-trading systems, which are driving participants to the cheapest cleanups with the biggest impact, as the most efficient way to address pollution.

But a study commissioned by the world organization has found that the profits are enormous in destroying trifluoromethane, or HFC-23, a very potent greenhouse gas that is produced at the factory here and several dozen other plants in developing countries. The study calculated that industrial nations could pay $800 million a year to buy credits, even though the cost of building and operating incinerators will be only $31 million a year.

DOJ_NMG_0108086

The situation has set in motion a diplomatic struggle pitting China, the biggest beneficiary from payments, against advanced industrial nations, particularly in Europe. At a global climate conference in Nairobi, Kenya, in November, European delegates suggested that in the case of Freon factories now under construction in developing countries, any payments for the incineration of the waste gas should go only into an international fund to help factories retool for the production of more modern refrigerants that do not deplete the ozone layer.

But the Chinese government blocked the initiative, insisting that money for Chinese factories go into the government's own clean energy fund. Negotiators ended up setting up a group to study the issue.

Even as hundreds of millions of dollars from the program are devoted to the refrigerant industry, countries in sub-Saharan Africa, which were originally envisioned as big beneficiaries of emissions trading, are receiving almost nothing. Just four nations — China, India, Brazil and South Korea — are collecting four-fifths of the payments under the program, with China alone collecting almost half.

Two-thirds of the payments are going to projects to eliminate HFC-23.

Those payments also illustrate conflicting goals under Kyoto and the Montreal Protocol, a 1987 agreement that requires the phasing out of ozone-depleting substances. The problem is that the trading program backed by the United Nations, known as the Clean Development Mechanism, is helping support an industry that another international organization is trying to phase out.

And while ozone depletion is a separate problem from global warming, some gases, like HFC-23, make both worse. The separate secretariats under the protocols have little legal authority to resolve this quandary.

"It's tricky in that we don't have a mechanism other than the Security Council, and who cares there about HFC's?" said Janos Pasztor, the acting coordinator of the organization that oversees the program.

In the end, officials say, there should be more projects aimed at providing renewable energy and sustainable economic development for the world's poorest people.

"If people only do HFC-23 projects, then they miss the whole idea," Mr. Pasztor said.

Richard Rosenzweig, chief operating officer of Natsource, a company in Washington arranging emissions deals between poor and rich countries, said it was not fair to look only at incineration costs and compare them with the size of payments from industrial nations. The administrative costs of the program are high, he said, and at least disposal of the waste gas is taking place.

If the world tried to reduce emissions through an outright ban or regulation alone, as many environmentalists recommend, it might not happen at all, he said. The United Nations-favored program may have flaws, he added, but "it's a pilot phase — this is a 100-year problem."

Environmental groups say that governments in developing countries should either require factories to incinerate the waste gas as a cost of doing business, or receive aid from wealthier countries to cover the relatively modest cost of incinerators.

"Couldn't we pay for the cost, or even twice the cost, of abatement and spend the rest of the money in better ways?" Mr. Wara asked.

DuPont produces HFC-23 as part of its output of Teflon, but has routinely burned the colorless, odorless waste gas without compensation for many years, even though it is not required by law to do so, a DuPont spokeswoman said.

The secretariat of the Clean Development Mechanism estimates that a ton of HFC-23 in the atmosphere has the same effect as 11,700 tons of carbon dioxide. James Cameron, the vice chairman of Climate Change Capital, which organized the chemical factory deal here, said there were considerable costs and risks in setting up plans that required elaborate certification by consultants, acceptance by developing-country governments and approval by a United Nations secretariat.

For small projects involving less than $250,000 worth of credits, fees for deal makers, consultants and lawyers can far exceed the cost of installing equipment to clean up emissions.

Even the Chinese government, the main seller of carbon credits and a defender of the program, is expressing some misgivings.

DOJ_NMG_0108087

"We do not encourage more HFC projects," a statement by Lu Xuedu, deputy director of the Office of Global Environment Affairs at the Ministry of Science and Technology, said. "We would prefer to have more energy efficiency and renewable-energy projects that could help alleviate poverty in the countryside."

But for now, the projects involving industrial gases like HFC-23 are where most of the action is.

"You can do those quickly," Mr. Rosenzweig of Natsource said, "and it's worth the investment."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Indicted On Drug Kingpin Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

A Mexican described by U.S. authorities as "one of the world's major drug traffickers" has been indicted by a federal grand jury in California on racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges that carry the death penalty.

U.S. Attorney Carol C. Lam in San Diego said the indictment, unsealed yesterday, accuses Francisco Javier Arellano-Felix of six counts of operating a continuing criminal enterprise, which dominated the Mexican drug trade for more than a decade and flooded the United States with hundreds of tons of cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin.

The indictment accuses Arellano-Felix of maintaining control of his drug trafficking empire by personally ordering kidnappings and up to 20 slayings, including beheadings, of rivals in the drug trade, law-enforcement officers and members of the press.

Arellano-Felix, who also oversaw the construction of sophisticated tunnels to smuggle drugs under the U.S.-Mexico border, was arrested in August by U.S. authorities while deep-sea fishing and is now in custody in San Diego. The U.S. Coast Guard apprehended him aboard a boat known as the "Dock Holiday," 15 miles off the shore of La Paz, Mexico.

An earlier indictment that sought his extradition in 2003 did not include the charges that could lead to his execution and is expected to be dismissed as moot. Mexico has balked at extraditing those facing a possible death sentence in this country.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Rusty Payne said a decision whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has described Arellano-Felix, 37, as "one of the world's major drug traffickers," citing his role as a leader of a brutal international drug gang that includes seven brothers and four sisters.

Mr. McNulty said the Arellano-Felix organization negotiated directly with Colombian cocaine-trafficking organizations, including the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia for the purchase of multiton shipments of cocaine, received those shipments by sea and air in Mexico, and then arranged for smuggling the cocaine into the U.S.

Also indicted was Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, described as a hired assassin for the Arellano-Felix organization. He also was taken into custody on the fishing boat and is held in San Diego.

The indictment describes Arellano-Felix as the gang's principal organizer and top leader since March 2000, and Villarreal as one of its top six under-bosses, in command of crews that carried out enforcement operations and drug trafficking activities.

It names Arellano-Felix and Villarreal in connection with the 2005 killing of Deputy Police Chief Hugo Gabrial Coronel Vargas in Tijuana, Mexico, and the kidnapping, slaying and beheading of three Rosarito Beach police officers in June 2006.

Arellano-Felix also was charged in Mexico in 1993 with conspiring to assassinate Roman Catholic Cardinal Juan Posadas Ocampo. Cardinal Posadas Ocampo, along with six other persons, was assassinated on May 24, 1993, in the parking lot at Guadalajara International Airport. He was shot 14 times.

In January, federal agents located a 2,400-foot-long tunnel built by the Tijuana-based Arellano-Felix organization, filled with 2 tons of marijuana and connecting warehouses in Tijuana to San Diego.

Suspected Drug Kingpin Pleads Not Guilty To New Charges In U.S. (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108088

SAN DIEGO - A man suspected of overseeing one of Mexico's most violent drug cartels and his top associate pleaded not guilty Wednesday to new charges detailing a criminal enterprise that included a hit on Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three officers.

The new charges could make Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, and his right-hand man Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, eligible for the death penalty if they are found guilty of crimes outlined in a seven-count indictment unsealed this week.

The two men, both looking pale and drawn, shuffled into the federal courtroom with hands shackled to their waists and ankles chained together. It was far different from the designer cruisewear and flip-flops the pair wore when they made their first court appearance in August, just days after their arrest aboard a sport fishing boat off La Paz, Mexico.

Not guilty pleas were entered on their behalf by their attorneys.

U.S. District Court Judge Jan M. Adler rejected requests by the defense to remove the shackles and ordered both men held without bail. A Jan. 2 hearing was scheduled.

The indictment charges the men with running a criminal enterprise, racketeering and conspiracy to commit racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering. According to the filing, the pair directed the smuggling of cocaine and marijuana shipments from Mexico into the U.S. and oversaw "enforcement operations" - threats and murders designed to reinforce the power of the cartel.

The indictment lists the 2005 murder of Tijuana's deputy police chief, a January shootout between the cartel and officers in Tijuana and the June beheadings of three officers in the Mexican resort town of Rosarito Beach as evidence of the criminal enterprise that authorities say extended into the United States.

Both men face charges for those crimes and broader racketeering charges in Mexican courts, according to the Mexican federal attorney general's office. Officials at Mexico's Foreign Relations Department and attorney general's office said Wednesday they had no immediate response to the new allegations or to the possibility of death sentences, which are illegal under Mexican law.

Villarreal's attorney Kerry Steigerwalt questioned whether his client, who holds dual citizenship and has been seeking extradition to Mexico, would be able to get a fair trial in the U.S.

"It is difficult for us to conduct a defense when we can't subpoena people in Mexico," Steigerwalt said outside court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy said the Mexican government had agreed to allow the U.S. to complete its prosecution of the pair before pursuing extradition requests. She said the criminal enterprise operated on both sides of the border and merited prosecution in U.S. courts.

"The U.S. has a big interest in this," said John Kirby, a former federal prosecutor who has worked on cartel cases. "A lot of drugs were brought over, and a lot of people were killed in the United States."

Arellano Felix and Villarreal have been held in a San Diego jail since the August raid aboard the yacht. The capture was the culmination of a manhunt triggered by a 2003 indictment charging Arellano Felix and 10 others of running the cartel, which authorities say smuggled tons of Colombian cocaine and Mexican marijuana into the United States.

The indictment also linked Arellano Felix to a 1996 killing in Coronado, near San Diego, and a 1992 shootout at a disco in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico.

Arellano Felix pleaded not guilty to those charges, which would have carried up to 40 years in prison. That case will likely be stayed as prosecution proceeds on the new indictment.

Villarreal was not named in the 2003 indictment and had previously been held as a material witness after the boat raid.

Web Site Puts Undercover Officers At Risk (KHOU)

KHOU-TV, December 21, 2006

What we see often looks easy - slip on the handcuffs for the trip to jail.

But getting the evidence to make an arrest often is a long road paved with trouble at every turn.

One Web site is putting undercover officers and their contacts in the public eye.

DOJ_NMG_0108089

"The whole point of putting someone in an undercover capacity is to get them close to the criminal element without them knowing that they are dealing with a police officer," said Lt. John Martin, Harris County Sheriff's Dept.

And it works.

So well that some folks want to make being undercover a little more difficult.

It is a Web site called 'Who's a Rat'.

Its operators say it was put together to provide defense attorneys with a resource that they may not have access to: searching court records for accusers' histories or hiring investigators to check out informants takes time and money.

The site is a collection of profiles of alleged confidential informants, submitted by the public.

Search 'Houston' and you'll find profiles of more than 250 people who are said to be helping police - some with pictures, others with court documents - to back up the claims.

Some defense attorneys call it a potentially important resource.

"The more information you have about an individual, especially if that individual is getting paid or is a criminal themselves. That information should come to light to the defense attorney so that the individual can get a fair trial," said Randall Kallinen, ACLU criminal defense attorney.

But that is not all that is there. Another section of profiles is a much bigger concern.

"Once that criminal element realizes that they are dealing with a peace officer, then his very life is endanger at that point," Lt. Martin said.

The site calls them "agents."

Search for the term 'Houston', and more than 200 profiles pop up with names and sometimes pictures of officers said to be working at agencies all over the area: state and local police, sheriff's deputies, and even the FBI and DEA.

Still civil libertarians defend the site's right to exist.

"In the world of crime and crime prevention there are some risks," Kallinen said, "However, it has not been shown that this site has led to the injuries of any law enforcement officer."

The site may not have caused damage yet, but law enforcement officials said you don't have to look far to see the potential risk.

Look at the Harris County Law Enforcement Memorial. One of the names is Deputy Rodney Scott Morgan.

"He was working in an undercover capacity, I believe he was a narcotics detective at the time," Lt. John Martin, Harris County Sheriff's Office.

Morgan was in a bar and was recognized by the bartender from his days on patrol.

He tried to play that off, but when he went to the restroom, "We had two very large individuals not letting anyone in while someone else inside was cutting his throat. His partner ended up noticing he had been gone for a very long time and went and intervened and took some of the suspects into custody, but he ended up getting killed from that incident," said Lt. Martin.

The site has gotten the attention of the Judicial Conference and that group sent an official memo last month to all federal judges, alerting them and asking that certain documents be sealed to protect the identities of informants and agents.

Some think that's dangerous.

"An individual needs to have a fair trial. The most common cause of wrongful capital convictions is due to confidential informants. These informants generally are criminals themselves," said Kallinen.

Informants are difficult to track but local law enforcement says no local officer listed on the site right now appears to be working undercover.

Yet with new posts coming each day it is extremely dangerous and of concern when someone takes the cover out of undercover.

KCK Man Sentenced To 121 Months In Connection To Marijuana Bust (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, December 21, 2006

A local medical marijuana dispensary may be in even more trouble now. CannaHelp in Palm Desert continues to do business, even after the city revoked their business license.

"They may well be in violation."

Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin won't discuss what possible action may be taken against CannaHelp, after the medicinal marijuana dispensary defied the city's cease and desist order to operate.

CannaHelp allegedly sold marijuana to an undercover cop who didn't have necessary credentials. Irwin says that's a city violation.

"They would service people who had certain identification and they didn't do that."

We visited CannaHelp to talk to owner, Stacy Hochanadel, to get his side of the story. He wasn't available for comment.

Feds and local police recently raided CannaHelp, suspecting it sold marijuana for profit. We spoke with Hochanadel after the raid. He said he was, indeed, drawing a salary from CannaHelp sales.

"If you look at the Compassionate Use Act, it specifically says, you shall not sell marijuana for a profit. So I think your interview was very interesting," said Erwin.

Caregivers in Palm Springs shut down after it was raided last month. Marijuana patients say they're the ones really affected.

"People voted a law in and it's kind of a bummer."

With Caregivers now out of business and CannaHelp in hot water, Capps is the only dispensary in the Valley that has not been in trouble. We tried to talk to them about the subject, but they refused.

Meanwhile, Palm Desert's city attorney and his staff are busy figuring out their next move.

"Several alternatives. I don't know which one we will take and I'm not even free to share the alternatives with you."

CannaHelp Still Open In Defiance Of City Order (DS)

Desert Sun, December 20, 2006

A medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Desert remained open for business today, in defiance of a cease-and-desist letter it received from the city Tuesday.

It was business as usual at CannaHelp at 73-350 El Paseo, with a mix of employees and volunteers keeping the doors open, said owner Stacy Hochanadel.

"Our patients are calling and asking us what they can do to let people know they need their medicine from a reliable safe source," Hochanadel said. "They all want to show up to the next City Council meeting."

Hochanadel justified his decision to keep the dispensary open because, he said, the City Council should have held a public hearing before voting to revoke his business license last Thursday.

The vote was taken in a closed session, based on a report stating that Hochanadel sold medical marijuana to an undercover police agent who did not have appropriate paperwork.

Hochanadel has had a business license from the city since he opened the dispensary in October 2005. He signed a letter with the city earlier this year, agreeing to sell medical marijuana only to patients with a state-issued medical marijuana ID card.

City Attorney David Erwin said Tuesday he had yet to determine what action he would recommend the city take if Hochanadel continues to keep the dispensary open despite the letter.

Secrets To Be Declassified Under New Rule At Age 25 (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — It will be a Cinderella moment for the band of researchers who study the hidden history of American government.

At midnight on Dec. 31, hundreds of millions of pages of secret documents will be instantly declassified, including many F.B.I. cold war files on investigations of people suspected of being Communist sympathizers. After years of extensions sought by federal agencies behaving like college students facing a term paper, the end of 2006 means the government's first automatic declassification of records.

Secret documents 25 years old or older will lose their classified status without so much as the stroke of a pen, unless agencies have sought exemptions on the ground that the material remains secret.

Historians say the deadline, created in the Clinton administration but enforced, to the surprise of some scholars, by the secrecy-prone Bush administration, has had huge effects on public access, despite the large numbers of intelligence documents that have been exempted.

And every year from now on, millions of additional documents will be automatically declassified as they reach the 25-year limit, reversing the traditional practice of releasing just what scholars request.

Many historians had expected President Bush to scrap the deadline. His administration has overseen the reclassification of many historical files and restricted access to presidential papers of past administrations, as well as contemporary records.

Practical considerations, including a growing backlog of records at the National Archives, mean that it could take months before the declassified papers are ready for researchers.

"Deadlines clarify the mind," said Thomas S. Blanton, director of the private National Security Archive at George Washington University, which obtains and publishes historical government documents.

Despite what he called a disappointing volume of exemptions, Mr. Blanton said automatic declassification had "given advocates of freedom of information a real lever."

Gearing up to review aging records to meet the deadline, agencies have declassified more than one billion pages, shedding light on the Cuban missile crisis, the Vietnam War and the network of Soviet agents in the American government.

Several hundred million pages will be declassified at midnight on Dec. 31, including 270 million pages at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has lagged most agencies. J. William Leonard, who oversees declassification as head of the Information Security Oversight Office at the National Archives, said the threat that files might be made public without a security review had sent a useful chill through the bureaucracy.

"Unfortunately, you sometimes need a two-by-four to get agencies to pay attention," Mr. Leonard said. "Automatic declassification was essentially that two-by-four."

What surprises await in the documents is impossible to predict.

"It is going to take a generation for scholars to go through the material declassified under this process," said Steven Aftergood, who runs a project on government secrecy for the Federation of American Scientists.

"It represents the classified history of a momentous period, the cold war," Mr. Aftergood said. "Almost every current headline has an echo in the declassified past, whether it's coping with nuclear weapons, understanding the Middle East or dictatorship and democracy in Latin America."

Anna K. Nelson, a historian at American University, said she hoped that the files would shed light on the Central Intelligence Agency role in Iran and deepen the documentation of the Jimmy Carter years, in particular the Camp David accords.

"Americans need to know this history, and the history is in those documents," Ms. Nelson said.

She said the National Archives staff was buried in a 400-million-page backlog that awaits processing and is not publicly available.

Also, a budget shortfall has cut back on evening and weekend access to the major research center of the archives, in College Park, Md.

"They can declassify the records, but the archives don't have the staff to handle them," Ms. Nelson said.

The first deadline was imposed in an executive order that President Bill Clinton signed in 1995, when officials realized that taxpayers were paying billions of dollars to protect a mountain of cold war documents.

The order gave agencies five years to declassify documents or show the need for continued secrecy.

When agencies protested that they could not meet the 2000 deadline, it was extended to 2003. Mr. Bush then granted another three-year extension, but put out the word that it was the last one, despite the new emphasis on security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and a new war in Iraq.

"The Bush administration could have said, 'This is a Clinton thing,' and abandoned it," Mr. Aftergood, said. "To their credit, they did not."

As an enforceable deadline loomed, the intelligence agencies that produce most secret material add workers to plow through files from World War II.

DOJ_NMG_0108092

The C.I.A. has reviewed more than 100 million pages, released 30 million pages and created a database of documents, Crest, that is accessible from terminals at the National Archives. Although most of the files are exempt, they can be requested under the Freedom of Information Act.

The National Security Agency, the eavesdropping and code-breaking agency, has released 35 million pages, including an extensive collection on the Gulf of Tonkin incident that led to the escalation of the Vietnam War. The agency plans a major release early next year on the Israeli attack on the Liberty, an American eavesdropping ship, in 1967.

The F.B.I., by contrast, negotiated an exemption from the 1995 executive order and concluded last year that the 2003 executive order ended its special status. It has rushed to review material, seeking exemption for 50 million pages on intelligence, counterintelligence and terrorism, but leaving 270 million pages to be automatically declassified now.

Among those files, said David M. Hardy, the bureau declassification chief, are those on investigations of Americans with suspected ties to the Communist Party. Reviewers will keep working on the exempt material to see what can be released, but it is a slow process, Mr. Hardy said.

"The numbers of documents are staggering," Mr. Hardy said.

The bureau is studying digitizing documents and using computers to search for classified material. Some experts say mass declassification is not the smartest approach. L. Britt Snider, a former intelligence official who heads the Public Interest Declassification Board, which advises the White House, said most government records, even top-secret ones, were pretty boring.

"Rather than take this blunderbuss approach," Mr. Snider said, "I'd like to see the agencies concentrate first on what's interesting and what's important."

Federal Inquiry Focuses On 2 Bruno Firms (NYT)

By Mike McIntire

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Federal investigators have issued subpoenas to at least two firms linked to the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, as part of their investigation into his business dealings, one of Mr. Bruno's former business partners and a legislative aide said yesterday.

One of the companies was a partnership involving Mr. Bruno and an influential Albany lobbyist that bought and sold lakeside property in Rensselaer County, including a parcel that was purchased by the wife of Jared E. Abbruzzese. Mr. Abbruzzese is an investor in a group seeking control of the state's thoroughbred racing franchise — a decision in which Mr. Bruno will play a key role.

The other company is a consulting firm that Mr. Bruno operated out of his home that he said had "a client relationship with lawyers and businesspeople." The senator has not identified the clients, but said his work involved providing advice on marketing and business development.

It was unclear whether any of Mr. Bruno's other business dealings have been drawn into the investigation, which Mr. Bruno has said is examining his "relationships and business interests" over the last six years. The two companies that received subpoenas are just a small part of Mr. Bruno's broad array of personal financial interests, several of which have intersected with his activities as the most powerful Republican in the State Legislature.

Mr. Bruno has purchased stock in about a half-dozen companies whose principals obtained state aid or contracts, sometimes with his help, according to a review of his financial-disclosure reports and other public records. He also once co-owned a small apartment building with an Albany-area businessman, who said that Mr. Bruno asked him to step in and replace the senator's son as an investment partner.

Mr. Bruno, who said he learned of the investigation into his business dealings several months ago, disclosed the inquiry at a news conference he called suddenly on Tuesday.

Yesterday, John McArdle, a spokesman for Mr. Bruno, confirmed the impression Mr. Bruno gave on Tuesday that his firm, Capital Business Consultants, was subpoenaed.

DOJ_NMG_0108093

The disclosure has rattled the marble-halled State Capitol and prompted speculation about his political viability. As recently as October, Mr. Bruno was calling on the embattled state comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, a Democrat, to resign in the face of claims that he used state employees to chauffer his wife.

The United States Attorney's office in Syracuse, which is directing the investigation, declined to comment yesterday.

William Dreyer, a lawyer for Mr. Bruno, also declined to comment.

The inquiry, according to a law enforcement official who has knowledge of the investigation and would speak only on the condition of anonymity, is focusing on how Mr. Bruno's personal affairs may relate to his activities as Senate majority leader.

While Mr. Bruno's revelation threw a broad spotlight on his personal financial affairs, much attention has focused on his relationship with Mr. Abbruzzese, a friend who is a founding investor in Empire Racing Associates, one of several groups vying for the horse racing franchise. Mr. Bruno will have a major role in awarding the franchise, along with the Assembly speaker, Sheldon Silver, and Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer.

One of the federal subpoenas was issued to the First Grafton Corporation, a real estate partnership involving Mr. Bruno that sold 17 housing lots — including one to Mr. Abbruzzese's wife, Sherrie, for $90,000 in November 2004.

Mr. Bruno had a 25 percent interest in the partnership, whose other major investors included James D. Featherstonhaugh, a prominent Albany lawyer and lobbyist. Yesterday, Mr. Featherstonhaugh (pronounced feather-stun-HAW), who kept the records for the partnership, said federal investigators had recently issued a subpoena for them.

Over the last four years, Mr. Bruno directed $500,000 in state funds to Evident Technologies, a company financed by Mr. Abbruzzese, and was instrumental in obtaining $2.5 million in state aid for a joint- development project involving Evident and Russell Sage College in Troy, N.Y., near Mr. Bruno's home.

Mr. Abbruzzese invited Mr. Bruno to fly on his private jet, contributed through his companies more than $118,000 to a campaign committee controlled by Mr. Bruno, and was involved in the senator's purchase of stock in Tejas Inc., a small securities brokerage in Texas that was closely connected to Mr. Abbruzzese. Mr. Bruno ultimately lost money on the stock purchase.

Mr. Bruno's investment in Tejas was one of several that he has made over the years in companies whose principals have interests before the state.

In July 2001, Mr. Bruno took credit for securing $500,000 in state money for a joint research project involving Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy and Plug Power Inc., a maker of fuel cells, near Albany, that has had contracts with the state and received other government assistance. At the time, Mr. Bruno was a shareholder in both Plug Power and a sister company, Mechanical Technology. He bought stock in both firms in 2000, according to his financial disclosure reports.

Mr. McArdle said the senator sold his shares in both companies in 2005 at a loss. Mr. Bruno is not alone in having been a Plug Power shareholder. Other lawmakers who have owned its stock include Mr. Silver, the Assembly speaker.

Mr. Bruno also has owned shares of at least two companies, Vytek and Interliant, run by Leonard Fassler, an information-technology entrepreneur from Westchester County. Vytek had part of a state contract to sell computer-networking equipment.

Last year, Mr. Bruno appeared with Mr. Hevesi to announce an investment of $1.7 million from the state pension fund in another of Mr. Fassler's companies. Mr. McArdle said Mr. Bruno was not involved in securing the investment, and only joined in the announcement because the company was located in his district.

In addition to stock investments, Mr. Bruno also owned an apartment house in Troy, initially taking his son, Joseph M. Bruno, as an investment partner in June 1999, according to county property records. But after a few months, the senator asked a close friend and local technology executive, Joseph Magno, to step in and replace his son as an owner and co-guarantor on a $235,000 bank loan related to the investment, Mr. Magno said yesterday. Mr. Magno agreed.

The following year, Mr. Bruno secured $150,000 in state money to help start up the New York State Software Network, a trade association of technology firms that was headed by Mr. Magno.

Mr. Magno, who became a lobbyist in 2004, said he was not involved in Mr. Bruno's decision to award money to his trade group. He added that he and the senator sold the apartment house in 2002 at a loss.

DOJ_NMG_0108094

“Joe is a good man who’s always asking if he can be helpful, but I always prefer to not accept his help,” Mr. Magno said in a telephone interview. “I try to stay away of him only because I understand the sensitivity of dealing with him because of his position and because we’re friends.”

Fear Over Scrutiny Of Bruno (NSDY)

By Errol A. Cockfield Jr. And John Moreno Gonzales, Newsday Albany Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 21, 2006

Republicans worry about what the result will be of the FBI investigation into the business interests of the State Senate leader.

ALBANY -- An FBI investigation of Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno's business interests has set off alarms among Senate Republicans who fear their flagbearer has been wounded as Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer, a tenacious Democrat, prepares to take office.

Members of the GOP held out hope Wednesday that Bruno, 77, can withstand the scrutiny of a federal inquiry, but those sentiments were clouded by apprehension, especially at a time when Democratic state Comptroller Alan Hevesi may be hours from indictment.

"There's a lot of angst about where this is going to go," said one Republican Senate official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "People are wondering whether Bruno can survive and whether he can lead."

Capital Business Consultants, the advisory firm Bruno runs out of his Brunswick home, has been under investigation since late spring, but Bruno tried to stay upbeat when he revealed the federal probe late Tuesday. He even wished members of the press corps "Merry Christmas" at the end of a news conference.

He returned to business Wednesday, but another Republican Senate source said members are in the dark about the gravity of the investigation and what its full ramifications may be.

Bruno now heads into a new session that starts Jan. 3 when Spitzer will lay out his agenda in his first State of the State address. Stanley Klein, a political scientist from Long Island University's C.W. Post Campus and a Suffolk GOP committeeman, said Bruno's legal worries could hurt him as he negotiates with Spitzer and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver (D-Manhattan).

"If he has any sort of Damocles hanging over his head, it weakens him," Klein said. "What the Republicans don't need is a scandal."

Republicans hold a 34 to 28 majority in the State Senate and are already gearing up for a fight to hold onto it in 2008, when Democratic turnout is expected to be strong in the presidential race. Democrats outnumber Republicans by a 5 to 3 margin in the state.

For now, Republicans are taking Bruno's word that the investigation will find nothing. Sources familiar with it said it focuses on Bruno's relationship with Jared Abbruzzese, a friend and businessman from Loudonville.

Evident Technologies in Troy, of which Abbruzzese is former co-chairman, has received $500,000 in taxpayer money from Bruno's selected appropriation fund since 2001. The funding of the small nanotechnology firm caught the eye of watchdog groups because such monies are usually funneled to nonprofits.

Abbruzzese's Albany attorney, Stephen R. Coffey, did not return telephone calls.

The connection between Bruno and Abbruzzese stems from their shared love of horse racing, according to published reports. But even that common ground has raised questions, as Abbruzzese, leader of a group called Empire Racing Associates, seeks a state racing franchise that Bruno will have a role in awarding.

The relationship between the men is also being investigated by the state Lobbying Commission, which is seeking to determine if Bruno's flights on Abbruzzese-owned aircraft were illegal gifts. Commission head David Grandeau, who has been accused by Abbruzzese's lawyer of having a vendetta against Bruno, also declined to comment.

Evident Technologies spokesman Steven Talbot did not return calls, but Bruno's office has defended the grants as a gift to a company that will generate jobs.

DOJ_NMG_0108095

According to business information listings, the company grew from seven employees three years ago to 25 this year. Its Web site says Evident is a leader in quantum dots, a material that can be drawn into fibers to detect radiation and "serve as Homeland Security devices."

Wednesday, James Featherstonhaugh, an Albany lobbyist and a friend of Bruno's, said investigators had asked him for records related to a now-dissolved real estate company both men were involved in, the Associated Press reported.

Featherstonhaugh said during an interview Wednesday that most of the records are public. "You can go down to the courthouse and get them," he said.

Feds Are Mining Joe's Biz (NYDN)

By Joe Mahoney In Albany, And Corky Siemaszko In New York Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, December 21, 2006

The FBI's corruption probe of New York's most powerful Republican gathered steam as a federal grand jury was going over state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno's business dealings, the Daily News learned last night.

The grand jury has authorized FBI subpoenas related to Bruno's dealings with Albany-area businessman Jared (Jerry) Abbruzzese, a principal of a Troy, N.Y., high-tech company to which Bruno steered $500,000 in pork-barrel grants over the past four years, sources said.

One specific subpoena was issued to a big-time Albany lobbyist, who confirmed the FBI rousted him for records on a land deal he and his pal Bruno were involved in until last year.

"Someone from the FBI dropped by with a subpoena and asked for the records," the lobbyist, James Featherstonhaugh, said. "They were provided."

A spokesman for Bruno, who revealed on Tuesday the FBI has been probing his "outside business interests" for seven months, said there was nothing fishy about First Grafton Corp. - Bruno's real estate venture with Featherstonhaugh.

Bruno placed his 25% stake in First Grafton in a blind trust in 1992 - before he became majority leader - and made no business decisions, the spokesman, John McArdle, said.

"Joe Bruno didn't have any contact with First Grafton for a decade," added Featherstonhaugh.

Abbruzzese also has ties to the Grafton deal. Last year, his wife, Sherrie Abbruzzese, bought a 12-acre waterfront lot from First Grafton for $90,000 in 2004.

The agent who earned the commission on the sale was Bruno's son, former lobbyist Kenneth Bruno. He handled the sale of a lot to his then-girlfriend, lobbyist Theresa Russo.

At the time, the younger Bruno was going through a bitter divorce from his wife, Mary Beth, the mother of their two daughters.

Reached yesterday by The News, Mary Beth Bruno would not say whether she was helping the FBI in the Bruno probe. But sources said records from all her ex's Grafton deals are now in the hands of federal investigators.

Bruno, 77, has denied any wrongdoing and claims he is cooperating with investigators. "I have nothing to hide," he said Tuesday.

Bruno, who earns $79,500 a year as a senator and gets another $41,500 as majority leader, is also a principal in a firm called Capital Business Consultants LLC. The FBI has subpoenaed those company records as well.

Federal prosecutors in Albany declined to comment on the Bruno probe yesterday. But Gov. Pataki stood by Bruno.

"I have confidence in Sen. Bruno, I have confidence in our judiciary system, and I'm confident things will work out fine in the end," the outgoing governor said.

Abbruzzese is also the subject of an ongoing state Lobbying Commission investigation into plane rides he arranged for Bruno after the senator steered $500,000 in pork-barrel money to Evident Technologies Inc. - a private company in which Abbruzzese is one of the principals.

At the time, Abbruzzese was a partner of Empire Racing, which is seeking the state's approval to replace the New York Racing Association. Bruno helps decide which group runs racing in the state.

Land Deal With Albany Lobbyist At Center Of Bruno Inquiry (NYS)

By Jacob Gershman

New York Sun, December 21, 2006

A federal investigation into the business interests of the Republican majority leader of the state Senate, Joseph Bruno, is reportedly connected to a land deal involving Mr. Bruno and a veteran Albany lobbyist who is one of the senator's closest friends.

The lobbyist, James Featherstonhaugh, told the Associated Press yesterday that federal investigators asked him to supply records of an apparently unsuccessful real estate venture in eastern Rensselaer County, First Grafton Corp., a company that dissolved last year.

"I did receive a request for some records and those records have been provided," Mr. Featherstonhaugh told the Associated Press.

On Tuesday, Mr. Bruno, 77, who is the most powerful Republican in Albany, announced that he was the subject of an FBI investigation into his outside business interests. He said he is cooperating with authorities but did not know details of the probe. Federal officials have refused to comment on the inquiry.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh and Douglas Rutnik, a lobbyist who is the father of Rep.-elect Kirsten Gillibrand, reportedly established First Grafton Corp. in the late 1980s, buying hundreds of acres of isolated swampland near Grafton.

After initial investors dropped out of the partnership with little of the land developed, Mr. Bruno, his brother Peter, and a Glenn Falls businessman Richard Carota invested in the venture, the Times Union reported.The newspaper reported that First Grafton bulldozed the land and built a 1.7-mile road without required permits from the Department of Environmental Conservation, prompting federal and state lawsuits that delayed development.

The Times Union reported in July 2005 that Mr. Bruno blocked the Senate from voting on wetlands legislation, the Clean Water Protection/Flood Protection Act, which would have further restricted development.

Prosecutors Eye Rolex To Show A Pattern Of Payoffs (MCS)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 21, 2006

December 21, 2006 Just when it seemed John Ford's legal troubles couldn't get worse, enter a $40,000 wristwatch of questionable origin.

Federal prosecutors alleged Wednesday that Ford received the watch -- a diamond-studded Rolex Masterpiece -- in 2004 from prominent Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman.

Advertisement

Ford once asserted he got the watch free of charge after using his influence to try to reduce state pollution fines levied against Hyneman, prosecutors said.

Neither Hyneman nor Ford has been charged in connection with the watch transaction, yet prosecutors plan to use it as evidence that Ford, who faces separate corruption charges in Memphis and Nashville, had a practice of taking payoffs.

"Ford stated that he had received the watch because he had done Hyneman a big favor, that is, saved him 1.3 million dollars," says a "Notice of Intervention to Introduce Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts," filed Wednesday.

The notice by U.S. Atty. David Kustoff and Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza seeks to introduce the watch as evidence in Ford's bribery trial set to start Feb. 5 in Memphis.

Ford's lawyer, Michael Scholl, said the watch wasn't a payoff or a gift and that he will emphatically fight to keep it out of evidence.

"The watch is completely irrelevant to any of this. It was never used for a payoff or anything else," Scholl said. "That truth will come out in our court filing."

Hyneman didn't return two phone messages left at his office.

Ford is charged in U.S. District Court in Memphis with taking $55,000 in cash bribes in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover sting. In an unrelated matter, Ford was indicted this week by a federal grand jury in Nashville on charges alleging huge kickbacks taken while he was in the General Assembly.

Ford, 64, denies the charges in both cases.

He resigned from the Senate in May 2005 after his Waltz indictment in Memphis.

According to the notice filed Wednesday, federal authorities relieved Ford of the Rolex when he was arrested. Evidence rules let prosecutors introduce "like and similar" acts by a defendant, but defense attorneys get an opportunity to quash the evidence. No hearing has been set.

Given the government's allegations about the watch, it's not clear why Ford or Hyneman haven't been charged. A retired University of Tennessee law professor said it could be a strategic move by prosecutors.

"It could be that they're after the developer and they're holding these prosecutions out as a stick" to get him to cooperate, said Neil P. Cohen, who has an expertise in criminal law.

The U.S. Attorney's Office won't comment on the case.

The notice says prosecutors will introduce statements by Ford -- presumably taped during the Waltz sting -- that he "had assisted a Memphis developer, Rusty Hyneman, in trying to clear up approximately two million dollars in fines ... ."

The notice said Ford met with state lawyers and a state commissioner and that Ford claimed "he had saved Hyneman one million dollars in fines as a result of the meeting ... .

"The United States will further prove that subsequent to the meeting with environmental officials, John Ford attempted to telephone Rusty Hyneman, and indicated that he wanted 'that watch' ... .

"Ford (later) showed (an) individual a Rolex watch, stating that it was worth fifty thousand dollars. Ford stated that he had received this watch from Rusty Hyneman, and that he had not paid anything for the watch."

The Commercial Appeal reported last year that Ford interceded on behalf of Hyneman, yet based on official accounts, it didn't appear he saved Hyneman any money or that fines were as high as the notice cites Ford as claiming.

After state Atty. Gen. Paul Summers filed suit against Hyneman and two other developers seeking penalties, Ford arranged a meeting to negotiate to reduce the penalties.

Ford, Hyneman and his attorney, Allan Wade, met with Betsy L. Child, then-commissioner of the Tennessee Department of Environment and Conservation, and other state officials on or about Oct. 4, 2004.

The topic was a case in which the state alleged widespread, ongoing water pollution violations at several East Shelby County subdivisions developed by Hyneman.

One of the meeting participants, TDEC general counsel Joseph Sanders, said at the time that he recalled Ford indicated his involvement on behalf of Hyneman was that of a legislator helping a constituent.

The meeting was relatively brief, Sanders said, because the state easily refuted claims by the Hyneman contingent that the enforcement action targeted "paperwork violations" instead of real pollution. State officials presented photos of muddy runoff pouring off construction sites as a result of inadequate erosion-control measures.

After viewing the photos, the Hyneman representatives indicated they were ready to settle the case, Sanders said. The state's response was "make us an offer," he said. But as far as he recalls, no offer was made.

Reached Wednesday, Attorney General chief of staff Leigh Ann Jones said the suit, filed in Davidson County Chancery Court, remains open and is set for trial in July.

Doral Case Comes Back To Bite Politician (MJS)

By Cary Spivak

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 21, 2006

Maybe you forgot all about Mequon-based Doral Dental and its controversial ties to a once-powerful Tennessee politician who has a bribery indictment hanging over his head.

Yeah, maybe you forgot about it, but the feds sure haven't.

Federal prosecutors in Nashville, Tenn., this week unsealed a six-count indictment charging former Tennessee Sen. John Ford with wire fraud and failing to disclose more than $400,000 in payments from Doral after he helped the Wisconsin company land a lucrative state contract.

DOJ_NMG_0108098

The feds say Ford and two others created a consulting firm, Managed Care Services Group, in 2001 that collected $1 million from Doral after it beat out other firms vying for the three-year, $18 million contract to administer dental payments for poor Tennessee children.

A member of one of the Volunteer State's most powerful political families, Ford received 40% of the Doral money, the feds allege. The consulting firm, the indictment says, had no other clients.

"As a public servant, Sen. Ford had a duty to provide honest services to the people of Tennessee," U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said in a statement. "The facts alleged in this indictment reveal an appalling willingness to violate that duty by using his public position for personal gain."

Through his lawyer, Ford denied wrongdoing, saying he was doing legitimate consulting services for Doral. He goes to trial in February on unrelated charges.

DentaQuest, the Boston company that now owns Doral, issued a statement saying the firm has been cooperative with state and federal authorities investigating the matter. DentaQuest's statement, however, pointedly did not offer a defense of the firm's prior owners - most notably Milwaukee entrepreneurs Craig Kasten and Greg Borca, Doral's co-founders.

"The consulting agreement between Doral Dental and Managed Care Services Group was entered into prior to the acquisition by the current ownership," the statement says. "Doral Dental has been advised that neither it, nor its current owners or management are a target of this investigation."

Kasten's attorney, Dennis Coffey, said he had long expected the charges against Ford. But Coffey said he doesn't expect the Tennessee grand jury to slap anyone else with charges.

"Based on my reading of the indictment, I do not have any reason to believe there will be further charges arising in the state of Tennessee," Coffey said.

But what about Wisconsin and the other states, including Pennsylvania, looking into Doral's dealings?

"I am making no comment whatsoever other than what I have said," Coffey replied. He refused to answer questions about whether Kasten had appeared before the grand jury or was cooperating with authorities.

Consistent with Borca's low-key public profile, his lawyer, Stephen Glynn, declined Wednesday even to confirm that he is representing the Milwaukee-area businessman. But Glynn did suggest that Borca is in the clear.

"Without acknowledging I'm his lawyer or not, in reading the indictment, there is nothing there that suggests that there is anybody at Doral, current or past, who has done anything wrong," Glynn said.

"There's nothing wrong, according to the indictment, with anybody paying him (Ford) that money to act as a consultant. And if he violated the law . . . that's a problem for him but not a problem for the company or the persons that retained him as a consultant."

Since the firm was launched in the '90s, Doral was a profitable but little-known entity in Milwaukee's business community. In 2004, DentaQuest paid $95 million to acquire the business.

But Doral landed in hot water early last year when it was disclosed that Doral had hired Managed Care of Pennsylvania, which began making payments to Ford, then an influential legislative committee chairman, shortly after Doral was awarded the Tennessee contract. Managed Care was paid 3 cents per month for every child enrolled in the dental program.

The indictment notes that Ford had argued in favor of carving out a state contract like the one that Doral ultimately won. He also hauled high-ranking state officials to his office to talk up Doral, with a company official attending at least one of those meetings, the indictment says.

Last year, Kasten acknowledged that Doral had hired Managed Care but said he was unaware that Ford was receiving any money from the partnership. The contract, however, said it would be voided "upon the death of the principal legislator associated" with Managed Care, and several old e-mails showed Ford and Kasten were working closely together.

In the midst of the Doral controversy, Ford and other Tennessee legislators were charged in May 2005 with bribery and threatening to shoot potential witnesses against him. The witnesses turned out to be undercover federal agents running a sting operation dubbed the Tennessee Waltz.

Though the two cases are not linked, Ford's lawyer suggested that it's no coincidence that the feds waited until now to lower the boom in the Doral matter.

DOJ_NMG_0108099

"Obviously, this indictment here (Nashville) comes out in December, and we're beginning to start trial in February in Memphis," attorney Michael Scholl said. "This was an investigation that was done years ago.

"You can draw your own conclusion. The dates are what the dates are."

3 Plead Guilty In Alabama Church Arsons (AP)

By Phillip Rawls

AP, December 21, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. - Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama.

Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February.

The three wore orange jail jumpsuits and leg chains as they stood before U.S. District Judge David Proctor, who told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences.

Cloyd, 21, and Moseley, 20, had a plea agreement with federal prosecutors that called for them to recommend a sentence of up to eight years and one month, but not less than seven years.

DeBusk, 20, did not have an agreement on a sentence with his plea but decided to plead guilty "to help those congregations and others hurt by his behavior continue to heal," defense attorney Brett Bloomston said. A prosecutor said he expects DeBusk to get a shorter sentence because he participated in only five fires.

Defense lawyer Tommy Spina said Cloyd "is incredibly remorseful, and he regrets creating this much misery in people's lives."

The three are also charged with state crimes in Bibb, Pickens, Greene and Sumter counties, including arson, burglary, criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for killing a cow. Defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached.

Prosecutors said that the first fires occurred during a night of illegal hunting and underage drinking, and that the second fires were set to throw off investigators.

All the churches have either rebuilt or are in the process after receiving an outpouring of donations.

The Rev. James Posey suffered a stroke and had to step down as pastor after Morning Star Baptist Church in Eutaw was destroyed. Posey, who blames his stroke on the stress of the fire, was pleased to hear of the pleas.

"It sends a message out that you are not going to run amok and not desecrate and destroy property, especially God's church," he said.

Uncle Sam's Private Equity Fund (FOR)

By Mary Crane

Forbes, December 20, 2006

Uncle Sam's got a thing for strip clubs. And banana plantations, horse farms and private prisons. These are just some of the businesses overseen by the federal government while their shady owners sit on trial for various crimes.

Administering this colorful portfolio is Len Briskman, deputy chief of business management for the U.S. Marshals Service. Call him Washington's own Warren Buffett. At any given time, Briskman presides over 30 businesses--many of them profitable and each with $20 million to $400 million in assets--while their owners get a fair trial, which could take up to seven years. Meanwhile, all of those honest employees get to keep working.

If the bad guys beat the rap, they get their businesses back, in tact and humming. If they don't, Briskman sells off the company, in whole or in pieces, at auction to the highest bidder. Proceeds go to fund the Department of Justice's Asset Forfeiture Program, which the USMS administers, as well as the other agencies that nabbed the criminals, like the Drug Enforcement Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

In Pictures: Crime And Entrepreneurship

How much do Briskman's efforts pull in? "Conservatively, [the government] makes a couple hundred million a year, at least" from selling those businesses (net of losses), he says. That's a pretty snazzy return for a relatively minuscule initial investment.

A deliberate speaker with a grandfatherly disposition and a charming chuckle, Briskman joined the Marshals Service in 1997, less than a year after he had finished selling off the last bits of a publicly held athletic shoe company, Diversified Retail Group, which he founded in the 1970s. "I was burned out from my business, and it looked like a very interesting position," says Briskman, 69.

Indeed, his latest gig is an entrepreneur's dream. Of the 60 businesses referred to him every year, he only takes on those he thinks are viable--or could be, sans the criminal contribution; the rest get sold for parts. The owners may know how to sell drugs, "but they're really dumb when it comes to their investments," he quips. Of the remaining 30 he chooses to look after, only five require close day-to-day management, while the rest simply report weekly or monthly financials.

The variety keeps things interesting, too: Restaurants, car dealerships, supermarkets, casinos, fitness centers, strip clubs and now even hedge funds are in the mix. While some businesses started off clean but turned wayward later, says Briskman, others were tainted from the get-go.

One of them, a Puerto Rican horse farm near San Juan, trained prize-winning Pasa Fino horses worth as much as $50,000 each. The owner, who was moonlighting as a drug-runner, got snared by the DEA in early 2001. As part of his plea agreement, he turned over the farm, which never made much money, to the government. Briskman switched gears and leased the farm to horse enthusiasts, who paid a monthly rental fee. "We ended up making a lot of money on the lease payments over a few years" before selling it all off, he says.

Briskman found himself in Puerto Rico again two years later, this time tending to a banana plantation in Guayanilla. The owner was arrested on drug charges in 2003, and the U.S. Marshals Service managed her banana farm while the Department of Justice worked her case. Briskman hired a Puerto Rican accounting firm to monitor the day-to-day operations, reconcile bank statements and send reports to Washington. Thanks to Briskman's yellow thumb and savvy business skills, the plantation added an extra 65 acres under his watch.

Sometimes, Briskman's stewardship simply amounts to running a sale. That was the case in 2002 with the Ritz Cabaret, Baltimore's most famous strip club. While the club's owner commanded a very valuable asset--one of the only all-nude cabaret licenses in town--he still sunk to underreporting income and money-laundering. Briskman didn't take this one on (the USMS doesn't operate adult-entertainment facilities), but he did manage to sell the club and the license for a cool $1.1 million when the owner was found guilty.

With the number of forfeited businesses growing in recent years, Eben Morales, deputy chief in charge of the Asset Forfeiture Program, wishes he could find "carbon copies" of Briskman to help distribute the workload.

Banana farming, anyone?

Alleged Bank Robber Captured In Florida (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. --A suspected bank robber from Manchester has been captured in Florida, according to the U.S. Marshals Service.

The federal marshals said Richard Villar, 33, was arrested and charged with the armed robbery of a St. Mary's Bank in Hudson on April 18.

His alleged accomplices, Joshua Gagnon, 21, of Nashua, and Debra Scott, 28, formerly of Manchester, were arrested in May by Hudson police, but Villar reportedly fled the state and was using an alias.

Federal marshals said they traced him to the St. Petersburg area where he had family and friends. Marshals said he was arrested without incident Tuesday.

Akron Man Accused Of Raping 12-Year-Old (WEWS)

WEWS-TV Cleveland, December 21, 2006

AKRON, Ohio - A rape suspect is in jail after being arrested by the Akron police gang unit and U.S. Marshals. Ryan Lawson, 19, was arrested on warrants for rape and gross sexual imposition involving a 12-year-old girl, NewsChannel5 reported.

Police said Lawson raped the girl sometime between February and March.

He is being held in the Summit County Jail.

DOJ_NMG_0108101

2 Tenn. fugitives arrested in New Orleans (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

JACKSON, Tenn. Two men wanted in Jackson, Tennessee, on charges of statutory rape have been arrested in New Orleans.Twenty-three-year-old William Paulus and 22-year-old Santo Camarillo were arrested while working construction jobs. That's according to the U-S Marshals Service.Paulus is from Tennessee while Camarillo, who is also known as Leo Chavez, is believed to be from Mexico.The men were arrested in Louisiana on federal charges they used cell phones to entice minors to engage in sexual acts.The two were wanted in Tennessee after they failed to appear in court on eight counts of statutory rape.

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Sued Over Dropping Of Benefits For Disabled (WP)

By Darryl Fears

Washington Post, December 21, 2006

For eight years, Shmul Kaplan lived alone in a suburban Philadelphia housing complex with hardly any furniture and barely enough food to eat. Two years ago, the government told the amputee he would have to make do with less.

Kaplan, who is from Ukraine, lost his $603 in Supplemental Security Income after he missed a seven-year deadline to become a U.S. citizen. The clock started ticking after he was granted asylum in 1997.

A class-action lawsuit filed in federal court in Pennsylvania recently on behalf of people such as Kaplan, 80, contends that they are not responsible for missing the deadline. Kaplan's citizenship application is among hundreds of thousands awaiting background checks by the FBI, a mountainous backlog that grew after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. More than 6,000 physically handicapped people who were granted asylum have had benefits cut as they wait, according to the suit.

"The Social Security Administration . . . projects that over 46,000 immigrants will be cut off from SSI in the years 2006-2012 as a result of delays in granting citizenship and the operation of the seven year rule," the lawsuit says.

The suit's plaintiffs include Eshetu Meri, 51, of Fairfax, a blind man who escaped from Ethiopia, where he was targeted for advocating democracy; Tasim Mandija, 80, of Philadelphia, a native of Albania who suffers from prostate cancer and neuropathy; and Rouzbeh Aliaghaei, 17, an Iranian who suffers from a rare genetic disorder that resulted in autism, seizures, mental retardation and an enlarged head. He came to the United States in 1998 when his parents escaped political persecution.

Kaplan, who is Jewish, claimed religious persecution and was granted asylum in January 1997. He was given humanitarian aid because one of his legs was severed when he ran to catch a train at age 18, slipped on ice and slid beneath the wheels. The other leg was so severely fractured that it arcs like a bow.

"I have a very sick leg," Kaplan said in a telephone interview. "It has a lot of fractures, and now it is a curved leg. My stump, it is not a normal stump. Sometimes I have to see a doctor. They take away my benefits, and, of course, it is very bad for me."

Others in the lawsuit declined to be interviewed, fearing that speaking out might interfere with the progress of their citizenship applications, or that they would be sought out for harm.

The suit was filed against top officials of the Social Security Administration, the Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) unit of DHS, the Justice Department and the FBI.

The National Name Check Program at the FBI receives more than 67,000 requests for background checks each week. Half the requests come from the USCIS, said Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman.

When requests from private entities are included, the total reaches several million each year, Bresson said. The USCIS is the FBI's biggest customer, accounting for about 128,000 background-check requests per month, plus 2.7 million that are backlogged from years past, Bresson said.

The FBI has struggled for years with a growing backlog of such requests from all entities. The Government Accountability Office reported earlier this year that, for immigration cases alone, 113,000 background checks had been pending for more than six months.

USCIS spokeswoman Chris Rhatigan said her agency processes citizenship applications as quickly as it can and is not responsible for the backlog that results from the delay in background checks.

Rhatigan said requests often stall because questions arising from the applications go unanswered. "There could be a number of different reasons," she said. "It could be a failure to respond or a request for additional information."

The Social Security Administration declined to comment on its decision to end the benefits, saying only that the law requires it to do so seven years after asylum is granted if U.S. citizenship has not been obtained.

That may be, said Jonathan Stein, an attorney for the group that has filed suit, but Congress never intended to cut those granted asylum from humanitarian aid when it approved in 1996 the legislation that provides it.

The benefit provides $603 monthly to single recipients and $904 to couples. Congress assumed that seven years was enough time for applicants to make it through the citizenship process. But the Sept. 11 attacks diverted large numbers of FBI agents to counterterrorism duties, greatly slowing the background checks.

Stein wondered why USCIS, FBI and Social Security officials could not flag citizenship requests from disabled applicants here on asylum. "Their lives depend on this," he said. "If they can't expedite their cases, let's at least continue their SSI until they become citizens."

Kaplan began to receive Supplemental Security Income payments in March 1997, two months after he was granted asylum. A year later, he applied for permanent residency, the first step toward naturalized citizenship. The process should have taken a year. But it took six years, according to Kaplan and his attorneys.

With time running out, Kaplan applied for citizenship as soon as he could in the spring of 2004. Fearing he would miss the deadline, aid workers took his letters and pleas for an expedited process to the Social Security office. "They said there was nothing they could do," Kaplan said in his deposition. His benefits were cut that summer.

Too old and too weak to work, Kaplan said he gets by on $215 a month that he uses for paying rent and $140 in food stamps. Regardless, Kaplan said he loves the United States and does not miss life in Ukraine or Russia, where he also lived.

"The food in grocery stores was rationed . . . and many times, I was told that I could not stay in line for the food because I was Jewish," he said in the deposition. "One winter, two men pushed me down when I was walking in the street.

"I knew that I had to leave Russia," he said in the deposition. "If they did not kill me today, I thought, they would kill me tomorrow."

For Divided Family, Border Is Sorrowful Barrier (NYT)

By Mireya Navarro

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

MONTERREY, Mexico — She tells her story from a windowless bedroom in a cinderblock house carved into four apartments that share two showers and two toilet stalls outside. Her kitchen has no refrigerator or sink. To cook, she buys perishables on the same day. To wash dishes, she fills buckets from a faucet in the front yard.

“Look how I live,” Irma tells a visitor. “I was used to something else.”

Not so long ago, Irma, 44, had achieved her own modest version of the American dream about 300 miles from here in San Antonio, where she lived illegally for more than six years. She had left Mexico with three of her four daughters, escaping financial turmoil and marriage to a man so violent that she considered suicide, twice slipping a rope over a beam to hang herself.

In Texas, she had learned how to drive and owned not one but two cars. She held two jobs and, after years of sharing homes with her older sister, Raquel Rodríguez, the family’s only legal resident, and other relatives and friends, moved with her daughters into a small rented house furnished from flea markets.

“My daughters were in peace,” Irma recalled, proud in that accomplishment, her last name and those of some relatives not being disclosed here because they have been illegal immigrants. “No one bothered us.”

Then one night over dinner, three years ago, her daughter Mayra, a high school senior, stunned her with the news that she was pregnant and intended to marry her boyfriend. Another daughter, Barbie, not yet 16, was adamant that said she, too, was getting married and moving out.

“I was so depressed,” Irma said. “All I wanted was to pick up my stuff and leave.”

DOJ_NMG_0108103

Disillusioned and feeling abandoned, she attended her daughters' courthouse weddings on a Wednesday but did not stick around for the weekend parties. She made a quick round of goodbyes to her sister Raquel and another sister, Verónica, who was also living illegally in San Antonio.

By Friday she was on her way back to Mexico with her youngest daughter, passengers in a pickup truck that joined the exodus of immigrants who at some point cross in the opposite direction to go back home. Even with the benefit of having sisters nearby, the kind of support that many immigrants cannot do without, Irma felt she could not stay without Mayra to give her a hand with the driving, child care and other needs that can become particularly daunting for a single mother.

She left one daughter her dining room set, washing machine and refrigerator; the other got her living room set, king-size bed and two dressers.

"I doled out everything," Irma said. "I cried so much because it took so much sacrifice to avail myself of things and I had to get rid of them."

Now all she has to show for her migration to the United States, she said, is the heartache of separation.

Her youngest daughter, Lupita, and another daughter, who is married and has three children, now live together just a few blocks from her. But the other two are still in Texas, still illegally, now with one American-born child each.

The border is now a barrier between the Mexican and American sides of her family, and now Irma feels the pull of her absent daughters. The older one has faced her own marital troubles, and both of their families recently moved into an uncle's house to share expenses. If some illness or emergency befell her girls, Irma worries, she could not be there to help them.

"I still feel that I should be with them, supporting them," Irma said. "They're still children."

Back to the Old Neighborhood

In sweltering heat one evening, with an ear out for "Duel of Passions," the telenovela on the television in the bedroom, Irma performed a culinary magic trick. She transformed $5 in groceries into a meal of rice with corn, fried potatoes and steamed nopales, cactus, with vegetables to feed two daughters, three grandchildren and two visitors, and still have enough waiting for Gilberto, a tractor-truck mechanic she fell in love with upon her return to Monterrey.

"I always got my daughters used to the food from over here," she said, perspiring heavily despite the gusts from a stand-up fan. "They're 100 percent Mexican. None of that pizza."

Irma has taken up once again in her old neighborhood, a cluster of lower-middle-class and poor homes at the foot of a mountain called Cerro de la Silla, or Saddle Mountain, in this industrial city of 1.1 million.

The streets in Irma's insular world are lined with ficus trees, and the homes are in varying stages of completion, giving the area the character of a work in progress. Residents buy the land and then build their houses over time, evolving at the pace of their means. Floors are still without tile and zinc roofs have yet to be replaced with cement, though gang graffiti spreads faster than kudzu on the exterior walls.

Irma works part time as a bar waitress and lives in the sparsely furnished home she shares with Gilberto, 35, who makes $120 a week and foots most of the couple's household expenses, including the $150 monthly rent. The house where she lived before meeting Gilberto is still in disrepair, with partly exposed rooms, missing walls and open sections of the roof. Her daughters still live there, their clothes hanging from bare walls moist from the recent rains and the sofas and light fixtures worn out or broken.

At first she stayed in her sister Raquel's second home, a large corner property with an empty swimming pool and rental units, known as La Quinta, that her family in Monterrey — Irma's mother, a sister and four brothers — used for celebrations.

Then she set out to rehabilitate her old five-room house — which she said her estranged husband had been using "as his little hotel" for trysts with women — and bring her family back under one roof. But like a recurring nightmare, her husband, whom she said she could not afford to divorce, still harassed her when he came to visit his daughters.

More and more, her days here are filled with daydreaming about crossing back. A six-hour drive is all that separates her from her daughters in San Antonio. But Irma said she was stuck, with no money to pay for an illegal crossing and no prospects for a tourist visa because she did not own property, hold a full-time job or offer any evidence that she had ties to Mexico that would compel her to return after a visit.

DOJ_NMG_0108104

For now, the telephone must do. Twice-a-week calls from San Antonio are her only connection to the life she once had. One morning in October, one of her daughters, Mayra, called and Irma savored each word, careful to shield her own emotions.

"It's been raining. Every day?" she asked. To her delight, Mayra stayed on the phone for more than two hours when her younger sister Lupita got on the line.

Adjusting to Mexico has been even tougher for Lupita, who turns 16 in December and wears her blond hair waist-long and favors outfits that expose her midriff. A drop earring cascades from her navel. She changed schools five times before she dropped out and took a job in customer service and billing with a cellphone company. Lupita hated the schedule of afternoon-only classes, and resented having to pay for her textbooks, something unheard of in Texas.

"It makes me quite sad that she's not in high school," Irma said. "I tell my daughters, 'You don't have to struggle like me.' If I had studied, I'd be in an office, not a bar."

'Over There'

Fanning herself with bare hands in the midday heat, Irma walks around a flea market, casting a disdainful eye over the secondhand shoes, clothes and trinkets spread out on blankets and tables, and sometimes in piles over the dirt of the soccer field. She settles on a pair of bright yellow beach thongs for $1 for herself and two pairs of jeans for Lupita.

She is starting over, from scratch. But she was not thrilled with today's finds. "Over there you pay less and it's new," she said with authority about Texas.

She says it again and again. "Over there" — that world that taught her what she is missing. Irma knew only poverty when she went to San Antonio.

She left school at 12 to start work cleaning houses. At 17 she learned to sew and worked in a factory. At 20, after three years of courtship, she married a neighbor and began a new cycle of deprivation. It was the untenable marriage, more than economic hardship, that compelled her to follow in the footsteps of her sister Raquel, the first in her family to immigrate north and who remains the family's mainstay in San Antonio.

A fading wedding picture in the living room of the home where her daughters live shows the couple in posed embrace, with a darker-haired Irma in white gown and long train and her mustachioed husband holding her by the waist. Irma said the newlywed bliss lasted only two years. Her husband soon started cheating and beating her, once even breaking her nose, she said.

At one point she left with the girls, staying with siblings and moving from house to house. The husband would not give her economic support. Things got so bad, she said, that twice she planned her suicide, but changed her mind when she heard her daughters coming into the house.

"I was tired and desperate," she said of her marital situation. "That wasn't a life."

Her daughter Mayra left for Texas first. The girl was driven across the border with false identification papers. She went to live with her Aunt Raquel in San Antonio and attended middle school there. Irma followed later, leaving her other daughters in Monterrey.

"It went badly for me," she said of that first and toughest year in the north. "I wasn't happy here or there. I had Mayra, who was my solace."

Irma eventually found work as a seamstress, making military uniforms in a maquiladora in San Antonio, a job that paid, by the piece, $400 to $500 in a good week, and enabled her to send $200 to $300 home weekly. But when her family sent word that her husband, a welder, had suffered a severe leg injury at work and was dying and asking for her forgiveness, she returned to Monterrey. A month later, he had recovered and she was back in San Antonio and at Raquel's, this time with two more daughters in tow.

The maquiladora jobs had vanished, so she went to work cleaning and washing dishes at a Mexican restaurant. She had been promoted to cook and substitute restaurant manager, making $5.75 an hour, by the time the two daughters announced their wedding plans.

A Chance Meeting

DOJ_NMG_0108105

Despite her sad eyes and unsmiling face, Irma presents a youthful exterior — brown eyes under tattooed eyebrows, short honey-colored hair pinned back with girlish barrettes, form-fitting tops over tight jeans, tattoos on her lower back and left leg and upper arm. A victim of domestic violence by both her father and husband, she said she had long stopped looking for a man.

Then last year, at a girlfriend's birthday party, she met Gilberto.

"We danced and we were giggling and all of a sudden we were kissing," she said. Gilberto has kind eyes and a calm demeanor, but he also had a drinking problem. Irma became his confidante, a supportive friend, but did not agree to live with him, she said, until last summer, when she was convinced he had dealt with his own demons.

Irma's days are now split between Gilberto, her work, her daughters, her grandchildren and, increasingly, her longing for "over there."

She first found work cleaning in a factory for $80 a week. Last March she got a better position as a waitress at a pool hall three days a week for $90. She works Thursday through Saturday, the 3 p.m. to 2 a.m. shift, also getting up at 5 a.m. on weekdays to cook Gilberto's breakfast and pack him a lunch of rice soup or potatoes with chorizo. She watches the news and then walks two blocks to play with her grandchildren.

"The family-oriented lifestyle has not changed for me," said Irma, who prefers a quiet home life after work, with the occasional outing to a karaoke bar or the public swimming pool.

One afternoon, she walked her 6-year-old granddaughter, Briseiry, to school for the United Nations World Food Day. Dressed as a strawberry, Briseiry performed two dance numbers in the school yard, with classmates in grape and potato costumes. Irma and her daughter Mireya laughed and clapped from the sidelines.

From the produce ranks, Briseiry flashed her grandmother a toothless smile, and Irma smiled back with tenderness. But even in this revelry, she pointed out the school's flaws — the chairs without desks and bathrooms that lacked doors and toilet lids.

"The differences are many," she said, comparing Monterrey with San Antonio.

Another American Grandchild

Her brush with American life has made Irma less tolerant of the poverty, quick to find fault with her surroundings. The urge to start over in Texas is the strongest it has been since she returned. Her daughter Barbie gave birth to a second child in December. Once again, Irma missed out on welcoming a new grandchild. And as usual, Irma will wait for one of her sister Raquel's visits to see pictures of her growing American family.

She has her fantasy return planned out. She would take Lupita and Gilberto with her, get a higher-paying job at a restaurant, or cleaning houses, that would allow her to help her daughters in Texas and send money to Mireya in Monterrey to get a tourist visa.

Getting through the border, Irma noted, is not as daunting as coming up with the $2,000 she said she would need to pay for fake identification papers and a coyote to drive her through as his wife or sister. When she first crossed by car in the late 1990s, as the coyote's "wife," she paid only $500.

"Imagine that, together we'd need $4,000," Irma told Gilberto one night.

It would be easier to buy a car, he replied.

Another hope is that Irma's daughters in San Antonio, or maybe her sister Raquel, would become citizens and sponsor her for permanent residency. But that would be years away.

Sometimes Irma looks so melancholic that Gilberto asks if she has misgivings about having returned. She tells him no, because she wouldn't have met him.

"I don't regret having come because, after so many years of being alone, I found Gilberto, who treats me well, who loves me and takes care of me," she says.

But that is only half the truth.

One Thursday afternoon, Irma left home shortly before 3 p.m. for her job at the billiard hall, a short walk through a busy commercial area with restaurants, tortillerias, clothing stores and auto repair shops.

A burly man yelled from across the avenue that he had the reconditioned refrigerator she had been looking for. When she signaled "how much?" he held up five fingers to signal 500 pesos, or about $50.

The rent was due, she said, so the purchase had to wait.

DOJ_NMG_0108106

"That's why you don't get ahead here," Irma said of the low salaries. "What you make here in a week, over there you collect daily, even just cleaning up yards."

Irma's workplace is a bar with six pool tables and wall décor that ranges from pictures of Pancho Villa to a calendar featuring topless women.

Three television sets are tuned to Animal Planet.

That night about a dozen men in their 20s and 30s focused on their game and $2 bets. Irma, in jeans and a sweater, moved about at a relaxed pace serving beer and picking up empties from tables.

Most customers summoned her with an "Irma, cerveza!" Many greeted her with a kiss. On busy nights, Irma and another waitress serve up to 200 patrons at a time. No one tips like in Texas, where Irma sometimes ended the night at the restaurant with an extra $40. She has to wait until Saturday to get paid for the three days.

And it is, after all, a bar. "The bad thing here is that people drink until they crawl," she said. "Over there, if they see you drunk, they don't sell to you."

During a break, sitting in a plastic chair and sipping a beer sent over by a customer, she fought back tears as she pondered her future. A customer was grilling meat over firewood in one corner for Irma and his friends. A childhood friend, Antonio Flores, walked in and kissed her on the cheek.

"She was very good and very beautiful," Mr. Flores said, reminiscing of Irma as a teenager.

Irma smiled in appreciation, but on this night, her cocoon in Monterrey felt like a prison.

"If I had the money I'd leave today," she repeated, barely audible over the ranchera playing on the jukebox.

Mr. Bush's Immigration Realism (NYT)

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Every now and then the public gets a glimpse of the George W. Bush who is a calm realist on immigration, a former governor of a border state who knows, likes and understands Latino immigrants. It's an identity sharply at odds with that of many other members of his Republican Party, especially the snarlers clustered on its right wing.

At his news conference yesterday, Mr. Bush commented on the raids at Swift & Company, the meatpacking giant that, to nobody's surprise, seems to have had hundreds of illegal immigrants with forged papers on its low-skill work force. Mr. Bush did not condemn the detainees as border-crossing evildoers. He spoke with startling tolerance.

"The system we have in place has caused people to rely upon smugglers and forgers in order to do work Americans aren't doing," Mr. Bush said. "It is a system that, frankly, leads to inhumane treatment of people."

He continued: "The best way to deal with an issue that Americans agree on — that we ought to enforce our borders in a humane way — is we've got to have a comprehensive bill."

Mr. Bush understands that many illegal immigrants are doing what they have to do to support families within a system that offers few routes to lawful entry. He understands that giving immigrants the opportunity to earn an honest foothold in this country — the path to citizenship despised by restrictionists as "amnesty" — is not giving a reward to criminals. It is not something for nothing. It is an attempt to fix a system that draws in millions of illegal immigrants each year, efficiently taking their labor but withholding hope.

Mr. Bush has shown a way to move the debate away from the "amnesty" trap by casting reform as a means to end an abusive system and remove the perverse incentives that allow illegality to flourish. It may sound shocking to say that illegal immigrants deserve better. But as long as this country keeps swallowing them up into a broken, unjust system, they do.

Mr. Bush showed yesterday that he gets it. He should do that more often.

TAX:

Judge Refuses To Split Trial In U.S. Case On Tax Shelters (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

New York Times, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108107

The federal judge overseeing a mammoth tax shelter case said yesterday that the delayed trial would begin next fall, but he rejected a proposal by prosecutors to try the defendants separately in two groups.

The judge, Lewis A. Kaplan of Federal District Court in Manhattan, ordered jury selection to begin on Sept. 17, 2007, in the criminal trial of the 18 defendants, 16 of whom are former employees of the accounting firm KPMG.

The judge also said that he had tentatively decided not to have separate trials. "Essentially what I have been offered is the opportunity to have two unmanageable trials rather than one," he said.

The judge said he preferred to have one. The trial — the largest criminal tax case in history, according to prosecutors — was originally due to begin last September, but Judge Kaplan postponed it twice, citing concerns over who would pay the defendants' legal bills.

The trial date could still be changed again, because of uncertainty over the issue of legal fees.

A federal appeals panel is weighing whether Judge Kaplan had the authority last June to dismiss KPMG's motion to compel the defendants to submit to arbitration over the fees issue. A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is hearing KPMG's appeal of the judge's ruling. The defendants had sued KPMG, seeking to force it to pay the fees.

The 18 defendants are accused of conspiracy and tax fraud by making, selling and, in some cases, using questionable tax shelters that cost the Treasury an estimated $2.5 billion in unpaid taxes.

In his June ruling, Judge Kaplan criticized KPMG, saying it had bowed to prosecutorial pressure to reverse its longstanding policy and cut off legal fees to the defendants or face a heightened risk of indictment. At the time, KPMG was under criminal investigation for its tax shelter work. Last year, the firm averted indictment and instead reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement, one of the largest of its kind.

In the June ruling, Judge Kaplan also criticized what he called the government's abusive prosecutorial guidelines. Last week, amid mounting criticism, the Justice Department changed the guidelines, making it unacceptable for prosecutors weighing whether to indict a company to consider whether the company was paying the legal fees of employees caught up in investigations.

It is unclear whether this policy shift may now strengthen the position of the defendants on the legal fees issue.

Prosecutors are continuing to turn over to the defense scores of documents, most of them from Deutsche Bank, which is itself under investigation over its work with questionable tax shelters.

At yesterday's court hearing, John Hillebrecht, an assistant United States attorney in Manhattan who is overseeing the broad inquiries, said there was "a wide-ranging investigation, and it's still ongoing," looking at accounting firms, banks, law firms and investment boutiques that made and sold questionable shelters.

IRS Scales Back Audits Of Big Firms, Study Finds (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

The Internal Revenue Service audited a smaller proportion of the nation's largest corporations this year than it did in 2005 and, over the past five years, it has cut the average number of hours spent on such audits, according to researchers at Syracuse University.

The university's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, which frequently issues reports based on IRS data obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, found that the number of hours the agency spent per audit of corporations with assets of $250 million or more dropped to a projected 958 for 2006 from 1,210 per audit in 2002. (The 2006 projection was based on data through the first six months of the year.)

In a report released yesterday, TRAC also pointed out that the percentage of big companies audited in 2006 dropped to 35.3% from 44.1% in 2005, after rising for two years. The audit rate this year was slightly higher than in 2002, but still far below rates from the early to mid-1990s, when audit coverage sometimes exceeded 50%.

IRS officials said part of the reason for the overall drop in audits of big corporations was that the agency hired hundreds of new auditors in 2006 who required training. The officials cited the decline in hours per audit as a sign of greater efficiency. They pointed out that the amount of money the IRS determined big companies owed as a result of audits was up markedly from 2002, even though the time spent on those audits dropped.

DOJ_NMG_0108108

For example, the sums sought from large corporations after audits of big companies were completed nearly doubled to $25.53 billion in 2006 from $13.67 billion in 2002. In that same period, the amount sought per hour spent by auditors on those companies also increased sharply, rising to $6,543 in 2006 from $2,957 in 2002.

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson has cited increased enforcement efforts, particularly those aimed at large corporations and high-income taxpayers, as a top priority.

Some tax analysts said the IRS effort to seek more money per company after audits could be because corporate profits have risen substantially in recent years, meaning there may be more uncollected tax to be found. Eric Toder, a tax economist at the Urban Institute and former IRS director of research, pointed out that the IRS is making comparisons with a very slow year for audits and enforcement activity in 2002.

Joel Slemrod, a professor of economics at the University of Michigan, said the data from both TRAC and the IRS didn't offer enough information to provide a complete picture of whether the IRS has become more or less efficient.

Yankton Firm Implicated In Tax Fraud Case (YDP)

By Nathan Johnson

Yankton (SD) Daily Press, December 21, 2006

A Yankton accounting firm has been implicated in a health care reimbursement tax fraud plan that was recently shut down by a Chicago federal court.

According to a press release issued by the Tax Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, the firm of Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. LLC of Yankton helped businesses in Illinois and Indiana sell "illegal or improper" health care reimbursement plans that the Internal Revenue Service estimates cost the U.S. Treasury between $12 and $63 million.

The district court in Illinois issued a permanent injunction Dec. 5, ordering Carmelo Zanfei of Steger, Ill., and William Crouse of Greenwood, Ind., and any individuals or entities working in association with them, to no longer sell their Health Incentive Plan and HealthIER Plan.

Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. is not named in the injunction but was named in an earlier memorandum opinion and order issued by the court.

Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Department of Justice, said the organization would not comment on whether there is a criminal investigation into the case.

However, a lawyer representing Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. said he has been assured by the Department of Justice that there will be no criminal investigation into his client's involvement.

"There has not been one hint of criminal accusations against Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co.," said Yankton attorney Mike Marlow. "In fact, they were told (by the Department of Justice) there was no further follow-up, that they were satisfied with the explanations given and were to take no further action -- and that was a couple of years ago."

The Department of Justice said the health care reimbursement plans created and sold by Zanfei and Crouse beginning in 1999 allowed "hundreds of businesses and thousands of employees avoid federal taxes and, in the case of the employees, resulted in the under-reporting of income."

The court found that, under the plans, items such as athletic shoes, health club fees, soaps and daycare were listed as reimbursable expenses. In reality, such expenses are reimbursable only under rare circumstances, according to the court.

Also, the court stated that medical expenses were often reimbursed without being substantiated.

The HI Plan, in particular, was illegal because it "allowed reimbursement for health insurance premiums as opposed to out-of-pocket health care expenses," according to the Department of Justice.

According to court documents, Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. became involved when it entered a formal agreement with the one of the entities selling the HI Plan to provide technical and consulting services. As part of the agreement, Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. prepared opinion letters that stated the plan was in compliance with the Internal Revenue Code and Treasury

DOJ_NMG_0108109

Regulations. The agreement also specified that the accounting firm would receive a $2,500 retainer and $1 for each participant enrolled in the program. It later entered a similar agreement with another company selling the HI Plan.

The court stated that the opinion letters, written by Blaine Meier, should be discounted because "he had a financial interest in the plans and thus had an incentive to find them legal."

Marlow said Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. stands by its opinion of the HI Program.

"Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. was asked to provide an opinion regarding the deductibility of certain medical expenses under plans proposed by other folks," he said. "Wohlenberg, Ritzman investigated and researched the applicable regulations and opinion letters from the IRS and felt that, as the plan was proposed, it was an appropriate and valid plan."

Additionally, a processing center for the health care plans was established in Yankton to authenticate medical expenses for employers and send them year-end adjustment reports at the cost of $20 per employee. Called Kuhlmann Enterprises, LLC, the processing center was housed in the Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. building and was staffed by Cynthia Nordstrom, a daughter of one of Wohlenberg's partners.

Court documents state the processing center "was created by WRC." However, Marlow contests that description, saying it was a separate company that rented space from Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co.

Either way, the court stated that the processing center did not function as it was supposed to and "failed to provide authentication to the majority of the HealthIER Plan customers." During 2004, for example, the center provided adjustment reports to well under 30 percent of the employers enrolled in the plan. For those companies that did receive adjustment reports, employee expenses substantiated whether or not there were receipts to validate them.

Nordstrom told the court that Zanfei and Crouse told her the center should consider all expenses were substantiated whether there was proof or not.

Ultimately, Marlow said it is important to note the Department of Justice has never said the work done by Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Company was inappropriate.

"What the Department of Justice has said is, they don't think (the health care plans), as they were applied by some employers, were the way to go," he said. "That doesn't have anything to do with Wohlenberg, Ritzman or whether it provided appropriate advice regarding this medical insurance deductibility program."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Report Says Berger Hid Archive Documents (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, December 21, 2006

President Clinton's national security adviser removed classified documents from the National Archives, hid them under a construction trailer and later tried to find the trash collector to retrieve them, the agency's internal watchdog said Wednesday.

The report was issued more than a year after Sandy Berger pleaded guilty to unlawfully removing and retaining classified documents.

Berger took the documents in the fall of 2003 while working to prepare himself and Clinton administration witnesses for testimony to the Sept. 11 commission. Berger was authorized as the Clinton administration's representative to make sure the commission got the correct classified materials.

Inspector General Paul Brachfeld reported that National Archives employees spotted Berger outside the building, bending down and fiddling with something white around his ankles.

The employees did not feel at the time that there was enough information to confront someone of Berger's stature, the report said.

Later, when Berger was confronted by Archives officials about the missing documents, he lied by saying he did not take them, the report said.

Brachfeld reported that on one visit, Berger took a break to go outside without an escort while it was dark outside.

"He headed toward a construction area. ... Mr. Berger looked up and down the street, up into the windows of the Archives and the DOJ (Department of Justice), and did not see anyone," said notes prepared by the inspector general's office.

He then slid the documents under a construction trailer, according to the inspector general. Berger acknowledged that he later retrieved the documents from the construction area and returned with them to his office.

"He was aware of the risk he was taking," the inspector general's notes said. Berger then returned to the Archives building without fearing the documents would slip out of his pockets or that staff would notice that his pockets were bulging.

The notes said Berger had not been aware that Archives staff had been tracking the documents he was provided because of earlier suspicions from previous visits that he was removing materials. Also, the employees had made copies of some documents.

In October 2003, the report said, an Archives official called Berger to discuss missing documents from his visit two days earlier. The investigator's notes said, "Mr. Berger panicked because he realized he was caught."

The notes said that Berger had "destroyed, cut into small pieces, three of the four documents. These were put in the trash."

After the trash had been picked up, Berger "tried to find the trash collector but had no luck," the notes said.

The significant portions of the inspector general's report were redacted to protect privacy or national security.

Berger's lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said in a statement that the contents of all the documents exist today and were made available to the commission.

For his guilty plea, Berger was fined $50,000, ordered to perform 100 hours of community service and barred from access to classified material for three years.

Report Details Archives Theft By Ex-Adviser (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — Samuel R. Berger, the former national security adviser to President Bill Clinton, went to such lengths to conceal his theft of classified material from the National Archives that he hid some of the documents under a trailer at a construction site, according to a government report released Wednesday.

The report, prepared by the National Archives inspector general, provided new details about an episode that caused a brief stir in the 2004 presidential campaign and led to a guilty plea to a misdemeanor charge by Mr. Berger a year later.

In 2003, Mr. Berger spent several days at the National Archives reviewing classified material as the Clinton administration's designated liaison to the Sept. 11 commission. He later admitted that he took and destroyed several versions of a classified report prepared in 2000 on the so-called millennium terrorist plots, although the commission had copies of the same reports.

The report on Wednesday disclosed that during a visit to the National Archives in October 2003, Mr. Berger removed four versions of the 2000 report and took them with him when he left the building for a walk after dark.

"He was aware of the risk he was taking," the report said, and "he did not want to run the risk of bringing the documents back in the building," where he might be detected. So he found a nearby construction site and, slid the documents under a trailer. He later returned to the construction site, retrieved the documents and later destroyed some of them. Several days later, archives staff members confronted him.

Still unresolved in the inspector general's report is one lingering mystery in the episode: Whether, as Mr. Berger's critics have charged, he was so cavalier as to stuff classified documents in his socks.

The report said one witness at the archives saw Mr. Berger bending down and "fiddling with something white, which could have been paper, around his ankle." But Mr. Berger denied he had ever stuffed documents in his socks, explaining the episode by saying that "his shoes frequently come untied and his socks frequently fall down."

When the episode first became public, in 2004, Mr. Berger was forced to step down as an adviser to Senator John Kerry's presidential campaign. In 2005, he agreed to plead guilty to unauthorized removal of classified documents. He was fined $50,000 but received no jail time.

Mr. Berger's lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said Wednesday that his client considered the matter closed and was seeking to move on.

Berger Hid Archives Papers Under A Trailer, Probe Shows (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

On the evening of Oct. 2, 2003, former White House national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger stashed highly classified documents he had taken from the National Archives beneath a construction trailer at the corner of Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW so he could surreptitiously retrieve them later and take them to his office, according to a newly disclosed government investigation.

The documents he took detailed how the Clinton administration had responded to the threat of terrorist attacks at the end of 1999. Berger removed a total of five copies of the same document without authorization and later used scissors to destroy three before placing them in his office trash, the National Archives inspector general concluded in a Nov. 4, 2005, report.

After archives officials accused him of taking the documents, Berger told investigators, he "tried to find the trash collector but had no luck." But instead of admitting he had removed them deliberately -- by stuffing them in his suit pockets on multiple occasions -- Berger initially said he had removed them by mistake.

The fact that Berger, one of President Bill Clinton's closest aides from 1997 to 2001, illicitly removed the documents is well-known: A federal judge in September 2005 ordered him to pay a $50,000 fine for his actions and forfeit his security clearance for three years.

What Berger did, and the ham-handed and comical methods by which he did it, are freshly detailed in the National Archives report, which the Associated Press obtained first under a Freedom of Information Act request.

Although the report reiterates that Berger's main motive was to prepare himself for testifying before a commission investigating the Sept. 11 attacks, it makes clear that he not only sought to study the documents but also destroyed some copies and -- when initially confronted -- denied he had done so.

His lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said in a statement yesterday that Berger "considers this matter closed, and he is pleased to have moved on." Berger is a principal with Stonebridge International, a consultant to large energy firms that recently opened an office in China.

In the statement, Breuer emphasized that the Justice Department concluded that other copies of the documents at issue existed and that they were provided to the Sept. 11 commission. He also said the Justice Department affirmed that Berger had no intent to hide the contents.

Berger made four visits to the Archives to inspect Clinton administration records in 2003. The inspector general's office attempted to retrieve the missing documents and probed how the archives handled each of his visits. In its report, the office criticized the fact that Berger was given special treatment and also said the archives' investigation of his actions was "improper" because the FBI and Justice Department were not promptly informed.

The report states that in 2003, an official whose name was deleted informed the White House that the documents Berger reviewed during his first two visits -- in May and June of that year -- were so poorly organized and tracked that the archives "would never know what if any original documents were missing." Berger has said he removed nothing during those visits, and a source close to him said last night that no one had accused him of doing so.

In September and October, Berger was able to sneak papers -- slight variations of a report titled "Millennium Alert After Action Review," which looked at U.S. vulnerabilities to terrorists, as well as the notes he took from other classified documents -- into his pockets, the report said, because an unnamed senior official left the room while Berger made or took phone calls.

Although one archives official claimed to have seen Berger fiddling with what appeared to be a piece of paper "rolled around his ankle and underneath his pant leg," Berger told investigators he was merely pulling up his socks, which he said "frequently fall down." He said "this story was absurd and embarrassing."

Berger said that after spending hours at the archives on Oct. 2, he took a walk outside past a construction fence to leave four classified copies of the millennium document beneath a trailer. He later explained that he needed to return to the building for several additional hours of work and was worried that guards would see the documents bulging in his suit.

DOJ_NMG_0108112

Berger got caught partly because suspicious archives employees secretly numbered the millennium document copies they showed him in October. When an official challenged him by telephone on Oct. 4, he turned over two copies of the millennium document that he said he had accidentally kept.

Berger Took Papers To A Hiding Place (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

Former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger, fined $50,000 for taking classified documents from the National Archives, hid the papers under a construction trailer where they later could easily be retrieved, a report yesterday said.

The National Archives Office of Inspector General said that during a 2003 visit to the facility, Mr. Berger left the building unescorted for a break, during which time he "placed the documents under a trailer in an accessible construction area outside Archives 1 (the main Archives building)."

The report said Mr. Berger acknowledged that he later retrieved the documents from the construction area and brought them to his office.

Mr. Berger, who served as national security adviser under President Clinton from 1997 to 2000, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material. The material included documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats in the United States during the 2000 New Year's celebration.

He was fined $50,000 by a federal judge, ordered to perform 100 hours of community service and barred from access to classified material for three years. The top Clinton adviser had faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but a plea agreement in the case reduced the fine and kept him out of jail.

The removal occurred while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the September 11 commission investigating intelligence and security failures, raising questions about whether he was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's counterterrorism policies and actions.

Mr. Berger, with authorization from Mr. Clinton, also was reviewing National Security Council documents on Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda, Sudan and related presidential correspondence to prepare for testimony before the House and Senate intelligence committees.

In his televised testimony to the September 11 commission, Mr. Berger said the Clinton administration's "sustained attention" to terrorist threats and "rigorous actions" had foiled a terrorist threat in December 1999 to bomb airports in the United States.

But Attorney General John Ashcroft told the commission that he saw some of the documents that had turned up missing from the Archives and that the plot was stopped with "luck playing a major role."

During his sentencing in September, Mr. Berger told the court that he let "considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material."

"In this case, I failed. I will not again," he said.

The inspector general's report, first made public by the Associated Press, said that when Archives employees first suspected Mr. Berger was removing classified documents, they failed to notify any law-enforcement agency. It also said Archives employees did not feel that there was enough information to confront someone of Mr. Berger's stature.

The report said Mr. Berger removed four documents from the facility.

The government charged that Mr. Berger "knowingly removed classified documents from the National Archives and Records Administration and stored and retained such documents at places," including his office in the District.

Mr. Berger initially claimed he took the documents as the result of an "honest mistake," but later admitted that he placed the classified records in his pants and jacket and put other classified documents in a leather portfolio.

In October, several top House Republicans asked for an investigation and committee hearings to determine which documents were "destroyed, removed or are missing" as a result of Mr. Berger's admitted theft.

DOJ_NMG_0108113

In a letter to the House Government Reform Committee, the lawmakers asked Chairman Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, to investigate whether there was criminal misconduct in the removal of the classified documents by the Clinton administration official.

Democrats will assume control of Congress next month, and the request for an investigation is expected to be shelved.

Bush Links Minimum Wage To Tax Break (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush endorsed one of the Democrats' top priorities for the new Congress, a $2.10-an-hour minimum wage increase — and on a faster timetable than they have proposed.

But his support comes with a catch.

Bush said at a Wednesday news conference that any pay hike should be accompanied by tax and regulatory relief for small businesses, potentially a tough sell for Democrats, who are about to reassume control of the House and Senate.

"Minimum wage workers have waited almost 10 long years for an increase," responded Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, who has said that boosting the federal minimum wage will be his chief goal when he takes over as chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. "We need to pass a clean bill giving them the raise they deserve as quickly as possible."

The president brought up the issue unprompted during the White House news conference that was dominated by Iraq but veered into domestic issues as well.

Eager to show he heard the message of voters who stripped his party of majorities in both the House and Senate in the November elections, Bush said he'll work hard on what he called "an interesting new challenge" — trying to find common ground with Democrats who will lead Congress for the first time in his presidency.

"I don't expect Democratic leaders to compromise on their principles, and they don't expect me to compromise on mine," he said. "But the American people do expect us to compromise on legislation that will benefit the country."

He said initial consultations with incoming Democratic leaders revealed openings for cooperation in several areas. One was an immigration policy overhaul, including a way for some illegal workers to move toward citizenship. That was stymied this year primarily by conservative Republicans who favored a get-tough-only approach.

Other openings Bush saw for cooperation were increased federal spending on alternate energy sources; reform of Congress' appropriations process that has made it common for lawmakers to slip pet projects into spending bills, and giving American workers new skills and businesses help investing in new innovations.

Despite Washington's changed political reality, Bush also did not shy away from issues that have less chance of being well-received by Democrats, who have felt ignored for the first six years of the president's tenure.

He said he wants to work on the looming insolvency of the Social Security program. But his one-time plan to add private accounts to the system, once the highest domestic priority of his administration, is considered dead by Democrats. Bush is sending Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to the Hill to gather ideas on how to restructure Social Security.

Bush also said he wants lawmakers to approve new trade deals. But Democrats have said they will insist bilateral trade agreements include tougher labor and environmental standards.

On other topics:

_Bush was asked about the pregnancy of Mary Cheney, Vice President Dick Cheney's openly gay daughter, in light of his previous statements that a child ideally should be raised by in a family headed by a married father and mother.

The president said "we ought to review law to make sure that people are treated fairly" but didn't provide specifics. Neither he nor his questioner referred to Cheney's partner, Heather Poe.

_The president said he first learned from a newspaper story Wednesday that the vice president will be called to testify in the CIA leak case on behalf of his former chief of staff. Defense attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, charged with perjury and obstruction, would not say whether Cheney was being subpoenaed — a potential separation-of-powers issue — but said they do not expect the vice president to resist.

DOJ_NMG_0108114

"It's an interesting piece of news. And that's all I'm going to comment about an ongoing case," Bush said.

Raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over three years is at the top of Democratic leaders' early to-do list for next year.

GOP-crafted legislation earlier this year combined an increase with a cut in inheritance taxes on multimillion-dollar estates and the resurrection of a number of popular tax breaks, but that combination did not get through the Republican-controlled Congress.

Bush said he supports a $2.10 raise for minimum-wage earners, but over a two-year period instead of three, and added that "we should do it in a way that does not punish" small businesses.

"I support pairing it with targeted tax and regulatory relief, to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing," he said.

Bush resisted any attempt to judge his presidency two years before it expires.

"I'm going to sprint to the finish. And we can get a lot done," he said. "I'm reading about George Washington still. My attitude is if they're still analyzing Number One, 43 ought not to worry about it, and just do what he think is right, and make the tough choices necessary."

Minimum-wage Battle May Be Brewing (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — During his news conference Wednesday, President Bush said he was optimistic about working on a range of issues with the Democrats who will lead Congress in January. He said he supported a $2.10 increase in the federal minimum wage, which is $5.15 an hour — a proposal that is a top priority for Democrats. But Bush said he wanted to pair the increase with a cut in taxes and regulations to make it less costly for small businesses.

Efforts to link a hike in the minimum wage to tax cuts have repeatedly failed during Bush's time in office, despite Republican control of Congress.

Democrats have objected to linking the wage increase to tax cuts, and Drew Hammill, a spokesman for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), said she was not interested in such an arrangement. But shortly afterward, Hammill altered his response. He said that Pelosi preferred a bill unencumbered by tax cuts but that "House Democrats have long supported tax changes that would benefit small business" and would look at such proposals.

Still, there is strong opposition to the idea among Democrats.

"Given that nearly a decade has passed since the last minimum-wage increase, no one can seriously believe that the proposed increase will harm the small-business sector," said Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), incoming chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee. "More than half the states already have laws setting their own minimum wages above $5.15 per hour."

Signaling a potentially difficult domestic policy road, the president said that in addition to the minimum wage, he hoped to work with Democrats on overhauling Social Security and Medicare — two issues that have defied such efforts for years.

Bush also said he would work with Democrats to pass free-trade agreements and a comprehensive rewriting of immigration laws, and to end the practice of "earmarking," in which lawmakers pepper broad spending bills with pet projects for districts.

Minimum-Wage Deal As Bellwether (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush signaled support for raising the federal minimum wage, suggesting the White House is looking for an early deal with Democrats on one of their priorities next year.

Still, Mr. Bush's insistence on tax breaks and regulatory relief for small business sets up a test that could determine the tenor of relations between the White House and Congress's new leaders for the rest of his term.

DOJ_NMG_0108115

Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi and House Democrats plan to pass an increase in the minimum wage in their first 100 hours of work next year. Other priorities include repealing tax breaks for big oil companies, allowing Medicare to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices and cutting interest rates on student loans.

Democrats hope to build enough momentum to move the provisions through the Senate and force Mr. Bush to accept them as they are. A coalition called "Change America Now," involving about 40 liberal and labor groups, is organizing support this week for passing the measures in the 100-hour package into law.

It is unlikely any of those measures will become law without concessions to Republicans, however. The federal minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour, last was raised in 1997 and its purchasing power has eroded. Democrats and some Republicans have pushed for years to raise it, and Democrats' sweep in the midterm elections significantly increased prospects for doing this. Yesterday, Mr. Bush gave the effort another boost, saying he is willing to sign legislation gradually raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour.

"I support the proposed $2.10 increase in the minimum wage over a two-year period," Mr. Bush told reporters at a year-end news conference, calling it an "area where we can work together" with Democratic leaders. At another point, he said that along with education, it is a "key" area where "we've got to work together" with Democrats.

Mr. Bush's comments were his strongest to date in support of a minimum-wage increase, but he also signaled he will expect concessions for business.

"I believe we should do it in a way that does not punish the millions of small businesses that are creating most of the new jobs in our country. So I support pairing it with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and help keep our economy growing." He didn't provide specifics about the tax and regulatory breaks that he will seek.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), incoming chairman of the Senate labor committee and the minimum-wage increase's lead sponsor, was cautious in his praise for Mr. Bush's announcement, noting that "we can't slow down this important legislation with other priorities unrelated to the minimum wage."

Rep. George Miller (D., Calif.), who will head the House Education and the Workforce Committee, also opposed the conditions Mr. Bush wants to attach. "A minimum-wage increase should not and need not be conditional on other legislation or policy changes," he said in a statement.

The House Republican leader, John Boehner of Ohio, was more supportive. "It's important for Congress to ensure a minimum-wage mandate does not have a harmful effect on small employers' ability to create jobs," he said.

Mr. Boehner challenged Democrats to allow Republicans to offer similar legislation on the floor. Democrats have promised not to block debate as strictly as Republicans did when they were in charge.

Past efforts to raise the minimum wage have collapsed over Republican demands for concessions. This year, Republicans tried unsuccessfully to link the minimum wage to a deal to extend relief from the estate tax. It is being gradually eliminated under Mr. Bush's 2001 tax cuts, but returns after the breaks expire.

Mr. Bush's demands for tax and regulatory relief for small business -- as yet relatively undefined -- appear to stand a better chance of drawing Democratic support.

Mr. Bush said he and the Democratic Congress can accomplish a lot working together in the final two years of his presidency. "The truth is the American people are sick of partisanship," he said. He promised to "do my part to elevate the tone."

Bush Supports Democrats' Minimum Wage Hike Plan (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

President Bush for the first time endorsed a specific plan for raising the federal minimum wage yesterday, as he embraced Democratic calls to boost it by $2.10, to $7.25 an hour, over two years.

The president's backing greatly enhances the prospects for congressional approval next year of the first hike in the federal minimum wage since 1997. He stressed, however, that it should be accompanied by tax breaks and regulatory relief that would cushion the blow for small businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0108116

"I believe we should do it in a way that does not punish the millions of small businesses that are creating most of the new jobs in our country," Bush said during a news conference. "So I support pairing it with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing."

The president's endorsement of a minimum wage increase breaks with the position long held by conservative Republicans that the increase would hurt business and ultimately the economy. But with the Democrats poised to take control of both chambers of Congress for the first time in more than a decade, Bush cited his support of the proposed increase as proof of his intent to operate in a more bipartisan manner during the remaining two years of his presidency.

Beyond increasing the minimum wage, the president said that he hopes to reach agreements with the new Congress on a guest-worker program for low-skill immigrants, renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law and measures aimed at encouraging the development of alternative fuels.

"To achieve these and other key goals, we need to put aside our partisan differences and work constructively to address the vital issues confronting our nation," Bush said.

Democrats and their supporters in organized labor responded warily to Bush's proposal to link a minimum wage hike to tax breaks for business, saying the increase should be passed on its own merits. Democratic leaders have promised to make increasing the $5.15-per-hour minimum wage one of the first orders of business when the new Congress convenes Jan. 4.

"Minimum wage workers have waited almost 10 long years for an increase -- we need to pass a clean bill giving them the raise they deserve as quickly as possible," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who sponsored legislation to increase the wage that failed in Congress earlier this year.

Democrats have pledged to reinstate budget rules that would require that any tax cut be offset by equivalent tax increases or spending cuts. Some Democrats say they do not want to complicate their effort to raise the minimum wage by linking that issue to business tax breaks, as Bush and many Republicans are insisting. House Democrats will vote early next month on a stand-alone wage increase, leadership aides said.

"Let's be clear, given that nearly a decade has passed since the last minimum wage increase, no one can seriously believe that the proposed increase will harm the small-business sector," said Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the incoming chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee. "A minimum wage increase should not and need not be conditional on other legislation or policy changes."

But House Democrats concede that the situation may be different in the Senate. Earlier this year, Senate Republicans voted down a stand-alone wage hike, and Democrats may need 60 votes to break a filibuster if they try to pass a minimum wage increase without tax cuts. Senate Finance Committee aides are already looking for small-business tax breaks that the incoming committee chairman, Max Baucus (D-Mont.) wants passed regardless of minimum wage legislation.

"Senator Baucus is looking at small-business tax breaks for sure," a Baucus aide said. "Whether they're paired with minimum wage or move at another time, he intends to help small business."

White House officials, meanwhile, say they are still working to identify tax cuts they would like to see accompany a minimum wage increase.

Across the country, about 1.9 million workers earn the minimum wage or less, and economists estimate that 14.9 million other workers would benefit from an increase in the standard. When adjusted for inflation, the buying power of the minimum wage has dwindled to its lowest level since 1955, and raising the rate has become a popular issue among voters.

Twenty-eight states and the District of Columbia have established minimum wages that surpass the federal standard. In November, voters ratified ballot initiatives, often backed by coalitions including both organized labor and religious groups, to increase the minimum wage in six states.

"America's workers deserve a clean vote on a $7.25 increase, with no strings attached," AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said. "Such an increase helps everyone and hurts no one."

At his news conference, Bush said that, despite the power shift in Congress, he will continue to have a strong voice in domestic policy even if it means reaching across the aisle to get things done. "There's a lot of attitude here that says, 'Well, you lost the Congress. Therefore, you're not going to get anything done.' Quite the contrary," he said. "I have an interest to get things done. And the Democrat leaders have an interest to get something done to show that they're worthy of their leadership roles."

DOJ_NMG_0108117

Bush Prepares To Make Deals With Democrats (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

President Bush yesterday said his top priorities for working together with Democrats in Congress will be raising the minimum wage, renewing the No Child Left Behind education act, boosting energy alternatives to oil and completing an overhaul of the immigration system that includes a guest-worker program.

On immigration, he called for a bill to be put on his desk soon, once again setting a timetable on an issue that has stymied Congress for the last two years.

And in a morning press conference the president pledged to support a $2.10 minimum wage increase over two years, the first time he has endorsed that large an increase, though he said it must be coupled with tax cuts and new regulations that will help businesses offset the costs.

The minimum wage is shaping up as the first major domestic battle next year, and a chance for Democrats to see how far they can press their advantage in Congress.

Mr. Bush said the lesson of November's congressional elections was bipartisanship.

"I don't expect Democratic leaders to compromise on their principles, and they don't expect me to compromise on mine. But the American people do expect us to compromise on legislation that will benefit the country," he said.

Mr. Bush highlighted the new dynamic at work on Capitol Hill, saying now he and the Democrats both have an interest in getting things done -- "to show that they're worthy of their leadership roles."

The president said he is willing to accept a deal with Democrats that raises the minimum wage to $7.25 as long as that doesn't hurt businesses. He said the way to protect businesses is to combine the increase "with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing."

Senate and House Republican leaders lined up behind Mr. Bush's position yesterday, with incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, saying pairing tax cuts and wage increases makes sense.

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and the new chairman of the key committee that handles the issue, rejected that approach.

"We can't slow down this important legislation with other priorities unrelated to the minimum wage," he said. "Minimum wage workers have waited almost 10 long years for an increase -- we need to pass a clean bill giving them the raise they deserve as quickly as possible."

Mr. Kennedy has proposed increasing the wage rate from $5.15 to $7.25 over a little more than two years, with the first 75-cent increase coming 60 days after the bill passes.

Mr. Bush did not say what taxes or regulatory changes he wants included in the bill.

In the past he has supported smaller minimum-wage increases that were tied in one case to research and development and estate-tax-cut provisions, and in another instance were tied to flex-time provisions that would have changed the rules for overtime pay.

Democrats opposed both of those alternatives, insisting on a clean increase.

It is not clear whether the election broke that logjam, especially given the possibility Republicans in the Senate might filibuster a bill that contains only wage increases with no sweeteners for businesses.

The president tried to strike a bipartisan tone on both domestic and international issues, promising to listen to Democrats as he plots a course in Iraq and to "do my part to elevate the tone" in Washington.

"I'm looking forward to working with them. It's going to be an interesting new challenge," Mr. Bush said, pointing out that he worked well with Democrats in the state legislature when he was governor of Texas.

On immigration, Mr. Bush said, "I strongly believe that we can and must get a comprehensive immigration plan on my desk this year." With Congress recessed until after the new year, it is certain he meant 2007.

The president repeated his call for a guest-worker program to handle future foreign workers, which he said is critical to reducing the flow of illegal aliens.

He also said energy policy is a prime spot for cooperation with Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0108118

"There is a consensus that we need to move forward with continued research on alternative forms of energy," he said.

Bush Signs Massive Tax And Trade Bill (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush revived some 20 tax breaks, extended trade benefits for developing countries and protected doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments by signing sweeping tax and trade legislation Wednesday.

The bill is a patchwork of must-do items that were left for the lame duck Congress. It was bundled together and passed by the House and Senate just before adjourning earlier this month.

"This is a good piece of pro-growth legislation," said Bush, just before putting his signature to the legislation at a White House ceremony.

Republican budget hawks bridled at the measure's approximately $40 billion price tag, and textile state senators objected to trade provisions benefiting Haiti.

The bill would:

_Extend through the end of next year a deduction for research and development initiatives.

_Renew a deduction of up to $4,000 for higher education costs.

_Give tax breaks for teachers who pay for supplies out of their own pockets.

_Let taxpayers deduct state and local sales taxes instead of state and local income taxes, a provision that primarily benefits those in states with no income taxes.

_Open up 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling, and offer a dozen credits promoting alternative and efficient uses of energy.

_Prevent a 5 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect on Jan. 1.

_Renew, with increased federal contributions, a program to help clean up abandoned coal mines and provide health care for miners who worked for companies that have gone out of business.

_Permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti.

Bush also signed a bill to upgrade and modernize the nation's tsunami warning system, nearly two years after an Indian Ocean tsunami killed some 230,000 people in a dozen countries.

Approved by Congress earlier this month, the legislation is intended to bolster the tsunami detection and warning system in the Pacific Ocean, as well as expand it to any area in the Atlantic and Caribbean considered at risk by federal officials.

___

The bills are H.R. 6111 and H.R. 1674

___

On the Net:

Congress: http://thomas.loc.gov/

Congress Closes With A Pork-filled Flourish (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Christmas arrived Wednesday for the kidney dialysis industry.

That's when President Bush signed into law the last major piece of legislation approved by the outgoing Congress. It was a lavish hodgepodge that included a $100 million-a-year boost in the Medicare reimbursement rates for dialysis providers who proved to be generous contributors to important legislators, notably House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of Bakersfield.

The dialysis folks were among many special interests benefiting from a piece of legislation that was designed to simply extend existing tax cuts and credits — but ended up freighted with billions of dollars in new spending earmarks for the coal industry, Brooks Brothers and various other interests.

DOJ_NMG_0108119

There have been more outrageous end-of-session bills, but following this election — when corruption and fiscal incompetence were campaign themes — some lawmakers found the latest package particularly offensive.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) termed the legislative spectacle "embarrassing." He offered a scathing review of the final bill on the Senate floor, citing its myriad earmarks and other expenditures that had never been reviewed by a congressional committee or subjected to debate.

His statement covered the big-ticket items: a budgetary sleight of hand that blocked a planned 5% reduction in Medicare fees to doctors, a top priority of the powerful American Medical Assn.; the insertion of a rum excise tax shift that benefits Puerto Rico; and the addition of a $35-million earmark to fund a healthcare program in Tennessee.

Gregg reserved special scorn for a $4.9-billion item requested by coal-state senators for health and mine-safety spending. The lawmakers said such spending was necessary because some coal companies had not fulfilled healthcare responsibilities to miners and because abandoned mines remained a serious problem in coal country.

Even Brooks Brothers, an upscale clothing purveyor, walked away a winner. The company was part of a coalition that won about $32 million in refunds of tariffs that it said had penalized the declining domestic shirt-manufacturing industry. The measure also aids domestic cotton growers, many of which are in California.

A Brooks Brothers vice president, Joe Dixon, said the company sought the tariff relief to "save clothing manufacturing jobs in Pennsylvania and North Carolina." The refunds, he said, would make it possible for Brooks Brothers and other U.S. shirt-makers to better modernize plants and compete with foreign manufacturers.

The watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense called the cotton measure "another example of special interests grabbing on to the last train leaving the station…. Obviously Congress didn't think enough of this proposal to pass it on its own during the past two years."

The dialysis earmark, like other nuggets in the bill, had not been authorized by a congressional committee, and its addition to the tax bill was made final in a secret middle-of-the-night meeting in the waning hours of the session on Dec. 7.

Dialysis scored "not because dialysis patients have the most meritorious case," said Sara Rosenbaum, professor of health law and policy at George Washington University, but because the industry is "effective on Capitol Hill."

One example: House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Thomas got $84,250 in donations during the last campaign cycle from DaVita Inc., a leading dialysis company. Thomas was among the negotiators at the late-night meeting who agreed on the dialysis earmark.

Thomas' former chief of staff, Cathy Abernathy, lobbies on DaVita's behalf.

After decades of working for Thomas, Abernathy has built a multimillion-dollar lobbying business focused on healthcare clients, including a coalition of dialysis providers, patients and manufacturers.

DaVita paid Abernathy fees of $20,000, part of the $1.14 million the company reported spending on federal lobbying in the first half of this year. Until recently, Abernathy was also a registered lobbyist for Kidney Care Partners, a nonprofit group representing patients, manufacturers and providers that has been chaired by DaVita's chief executive.

Tucked away in a Senate conference room with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Max Baucus (D-Mont.), and other leaders, Thomas led the charge for the dialysis coalition's proposals, according to a staffer who attended. Thomas recommended not only raising Medicare reimbursements for the dialysis industry but also including an automatic inflation adjustment. He also pushed for incentive bonuses for good healthcare results.

In the end, the negotiators agreed only to a one-time 1.6% increase in the Medicare reimbursement rate for dialysis, which will cost taxpayers $400 million over five years, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Thomas' staff and DaVita officials said the campaign contributions and the congressman's ties to Abernathy played no role in his championing of the dialysis cause.

"Bill Thomas makes policy decisions based on the merits of policy, not on campaign contributions," said Rob Vanden Heuvel, spokesman for the ways and means committee.

LeAnne Zumwalt, a DaVita vice president, said effective lobbying was important for the dialysis coalition.

"Dialysis is the only Medicare program without an annual update for inflation," Zumwalt said, noting that increased funding had earned support across both parties and houses of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0108120

DaVita executives called the final decision "a step in the right direction."

The company had also sent contributions to other lawmakers who participated in the secret conference, including the only Democratic lawmaker in the room, Baucus, who received $22,000 from DaVita this cycle, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

A Baucus aide said the Montana senator supported a rate hike because of his concerns about the financial stability of dialysis facilities in his home state. Baucus and other lawmakers also noted that an outside bipartisan advisory panel had recommended increasing the rate by twice the congressionally approved amount.

However, Rosenbaum said that the Medicare payment advisory panel made "tons of recommendations all the time" and that other worthy providers — such as community clinics serving the poor — were often overlooked.

Other factors, such as lobbying and the nature of last-minute legislation, explain more powerfully the willingness of Congress to legislate a rate increase for one group of healthcare providers, she said.

FEDERAL DIARY: Price Caps At The Old Stamping Ground (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, December 21, 2006

For almost 12 years, Rep. John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.) has championed legislation to overhaul the U.S. Postal Service. It has been a long and sometimes lonely journey.

McHugh has worked to balance the competing interests of postal management, postal competitors, unions and companies, including Hallmark Cards, L.L. Bean and American Express, that rely on the post office.

Yesterday, he was among a small group from Capitol Hill that saw President Bush sign the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act, the first change to the Postal Service since President Richard M. Nixon agreed to replace the old Post Office Department with a self-sustaining government corporation.

Thirty-six years ago, of course, the communications landscape was different. The Internet was an infant at the Defense Department, FedEx had not started operations and the United Parcel Service had a smaller market share than it does today.

Concerned that the post office might not be able to continue universal service at reasonable postage rates, McHugh in 1995 began his effort to update the Postal Service's business operations and create a less cumbersome system for setting postal rates. In June 1996, he introduced his first bill to revamp postal laws.

McHugh called the new law "a major achievement," and said it will provide the Postal Service with "the tools to both act and compete as a modern business."

The public, for the most part, will see no change in its dealings with the post office. But stamp prices will probably go up once or twice in the next year. The Postal Service has a request pending to raise first-class postage by 3 cents, to 42 cents, probably in May. Under the new law, the Postal Service can seek one more increase, no later than Dec. 20 next year, before new rules take effect.

The law offers some hope that subsequent increases in postage will be more predictable, especially for letters, magazines and advertising mail. For 10 years, the Postal Service will operate under a price cap that keeps it from raising postage prices above inflation. After that trial run, postal officials and regulators will review the effectiveness of the price cap to see if it should be modified.

The law imposes no price cap on "competitive products," such as Express Mail and Priority Mail. Those rates will be set by the postal board of governors, which will be guided by new regulations developed at the Postal Regulatory Commission (a new name for the Postal Rate Commission). The commission has 18 months to develop the regulations.

In an interview, Postmaster General John E. Potter said some parts of the law will take as long as three years to implement and that changes to postal service standards could take longer.

William Burrus, president of the American Postal Workers Union and a steady critic of the new law, has told his union members that the price cap will make it more difficult to bargain for higher salaries. "This limit on rate increases -- without regard to the actual costs the Postal Service incurs -- will result in an artificial cap on postal workers' wages," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108121

But Potter said the Postal Service plans to continue offering "wages that are comparable to the private sector. The goal here is not to harm postal employees."

The new law shifts responsibility for military pensions earned by postal workers to the Treasury Department, as is the practice for federal agencies. The law also redirects money set aside for postal retirement costs to a new trust fund that will finance retiree health benefits. Potter estimated that about $90 billion will be placed in the trust fund.

Although McHugh pushed the longest and hardest for postal overhaul, others in Congress played key roles in pulling together a compromise acceptable to the White House. Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.) and Reps. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) brokered the final bill, which passed in the hours before Congress adjourned for the year.

On the House floor, McHugh told colleagues, "If there is any truth in the old adage that anything worth having is worth waiting for, this is a very, very good night."Boost for Health Accounts

Federal employees and retirees will be able to take advantage of a tax law signed by the president yesterday and increase the amount of money they contribute to health savings accounts, the Office of Personnel Management announced.

Employees who had a 2006 flexible spending account also will have an opportunity to enroll in a high-deductible health plan with a savings account for 2007, the OPM said. They may roll over any used money in their FSA to their new health spending account.

Belated enrollments in a high-deductible plan and the transfer of FSA funds must be completed by midnight Dec. 31, the OPM said. In 2007, the maximum health savings contribution is $2,850 for an individual and $5,650 for a family, the OPM said. Previously, health savings contributions were limited to the amount of a person's deductible.

Bush OKs Billions To Clean Up Coal Mines (AP)

By Kimberly Hefling

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush signed legislation Wednesday that gives billions of dollars to coal-producing states to clean up hazardous abandoned coal mines and pay for health care for retired miners.

His signature ends a long fight that has pitted coal-producing states against each other over the best use of funds collected for the nation's coal mine reclamation program.

Coal-producing states will get an estimated $6.3 billion for abandoned mine cleanup and another $1.6 billion to pay for health care for retired miners who worked for coal companies that no longer exist, according to the federal Office of Surface Mining. The money will be distributed from 2007 to 2025.

The bill, part of a sweeping tax bill, renews the abandoned mines land reclamation program that was created in 1977.

Particularly in eastern coalfields, toxins from abandoned mines pollute streams. The unstable land from the abandoned mines has been blamed for fatal accidents by ATV riders and hikers — in Pennsylvania 24 deaths were reported last year on abandoned mine land. Mines sometimes catch fire and burn for years.

The program is based on a per-ton fee that coal companies pay into a fund. The bill makes spending for the reclamation program mandatory, which means it would not be controlled through the annual congressional appropriations process.

"This will provide us long term stability and continuity," said Ben Owens, a spokesman for the Office of Surface Mining, which oversees mine reclamation.

Since the program's creation, much of the nation's mining has shifted from states in the east like Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Kentucky to those in the west, like Wyoming.

The western states have not struggled as much with abandoned mine restoration issues because much of the mining has been done with more modern techniques.

The historic coal mining states have complained that Wyoming uses its abandoned mine land fund for public works. The western states, in turn, have complained of bearing the burden of funding the program.

The legislation signed Wednesday lowers the fees paid into the program and modifies the formula so that historic coal mining states with the more serious problems get a higher stake of the money.

DOJ_NMG_0108122

It was supported by a coalition of the coal industry, coalfield communities, environmental conservation organizations, sportsmen and mine workers, according to a joint statement from Pennsylvania Sens. Rick Santorum and Arlen Specter.

—

On the Net: Office of Surface Mining: http://www.osmre.gov/

New Congress To Toughen Oversight (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

With little prospect of funding bold spending initiatives, Democrats poised to take control of the 110th Congress are reviving the ability to investigate the executive branch.

With more workdays in Washington and the creation of subcommittees charged exclusively with investigation, Democratic leaders and new committee chairs aim to jump-start oversight on issues ranging from the Iraq war to homeland security and consumer protection.

But in a consistent disclaimer, they say the new probes will not be motivated by a spirit of revenge. And they will be conducted, to the extent possible, on a bipartisan basis.

This approach, Democrats say, rejects the example of Rep. Dan Burton (R) of Indiana, who, as chair of the House Government Reform Committee, paved the Clinton presidency with subpoenas. As early as May 2006, Nancy Pelosi also denied speculation that Democrats would try to impeach the president.

Democrats say they will not use their new powers to conduct a witch hunt on the Bush presidency, and will take a more careful tack instead. Time: key resource for investigations

To give committees the time for thorough investigations, Democrats say they will move to a five-day workweek on Capitol Hill. In contrast, under Republican control, the typical House workweek lasted from Tuesday evening to Thursday afternoon.

"We are going to provide the time for committees to do oversight of the executive department and of the way the people's money is being spent and the effectiveness of the policy implementation of the president," said House majority leader Steny Hoyer.

But that time - and the eagerness of new committee chairs - also poses dilemmas for the new Democratic leadership over how to aggressively question administration officials, without distracting them from their work fighting wars and securing the homeland.

"The problem is not that any one committee or subcommittee will suffer an excessive zeal of investigation. The problem is there is so much of it. And so much of it is directed at Iraq that it might become a distraction to people whose job it is to fight the war," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.

Even if no one committee chair takes on the scope of investigation that occurred during former GOP Sen. Joseph McCarthy's assault on alleged communists in government, the volume of appearances before congressional committees for key administration officials could have a demoralizing impact. On the war

In the new Congress, some of the most powerful critics of the Bush administration's conduct during the Iraq war will move into committee chairmanships.

Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, who opposed the decision to go into Iraq, is developing hearings on a phased withdrawal of forces from Iraq. In June, Senator Levin and Sen. Jack Reed (D) of Rhode Island proposed a non-binding amendment calling for US forces to begin a phrased withdrawal from Iraq in 2006. He is also planning probes into waste and abuse in contracting.

On the House side, Rep. Ike Skelton (D) of Missouri, has set as a top priority for the House Armed Services committee the "fixing of US forces." "They're stretched and strained, and I'm convinced the Army and the Marines are near the breaking point," he said in a press briefing on Tuesday.

As chairman, he is also opposing any move to send 20,000 to 30,000 more forces into Iraq, a move he says will only "exacerbate the situation."

DOJ_NMG_0108123

But both new chairmen say they are not prepared to resort to the ultimate congressional sanction on a commander-in-chief with whom they disagree: to cut off funding for the war.

Instead, Skelton is reviving his panel's Oversight Investigations Subcommittee, which was axed by Republicans when they took over control of the House in 1995. The new panel, he says, will focus on asking "the tough questions: Why did this happen? Why did you make a decision to do this or that?"

"That does influence behavior," he says. "It's a very solid tool that Congress has not been using." On homeland security

With control of the Senate capable of flipping with a single senator, few members have as much independence as Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut, the new chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

After losing the Democratic primary, Senator Lieberman won as an independent. He enjoys an unusually strong working relationship with the outgoing chairman, Sen. Susan Collins (R) of Maine. Together, they pushed for the creation of the 9/11 Commission. In the new Congress, the committee will first take up new legislation to implement some of the remaining 9/11 recommendations and to review those that were not implemented well.

"Not enough oversight has taken place of the Department of Homeland Security. This is a relatively new organization, but faces a multitude of management challenges. The senator will be very closely focusing on how the different agencies within DHS integrate with each other," says Lieberman spokeswoman Leslie Phillips.

Other issues that are likely to come up early on include the level of preparedness for a bioterrorist attack.

While the Republican-led Congress issued not one subpoena, Democrats say they will use that power more aggressively. Senators Lieberman and Collins disagreed over whether subpoenas should be issued over the federal government's response to hurricane Katrina. The next time such an issue comes up, he makes the call.

Despite a strong recommendation from the 9/11 Commission that Congress drastically streamline its oversight for intelligence - leaders of the Department of Homeland Security now appear before 88 committees and subcommittees, the panel reported - neither the House nor the Senate is prepared to take up the turf battles necessary to change this.

But citing recommendations of the 9/11 panel, House Democrats are proposing a new Select Intelligence Oversight Panel within the House Appropriations Committee. It's a move they say will "strengthen the oversight process" by considering intelligence funding from the combined perspective of the Appropriations and Intelligence Committees. On the economy

Democrats have lined up some of their sharpest investigators on panels relating to the economy. The incoming chair of the Government Reform Committee, Rep. Henry Waxman (D) of California directed landmark hearings on the tobacco industry and, more recently, produced his own investigations on no-bid contracts in Iraq. He has also peppered the Bush administration with questions on its response to hurricane Katrina and the cost of prescription drugs.

Aides say he has yet to set priorities for the 110th Congress, but is ideally positioned to develop probes on all these fronts. Waxman says he prefers to avoid subpoenas, and that voluntary appearances are better.

As chair of the House Banking Committee, Rep. Barney Frank (D) of Massachusetts is moving consumer protection back onto the legislative agenda. Look for hearings on issues such as predatory lending and data privacy. But in a forum on Dec. 11, he cautioned that "excessive regulation or ineffective regulation is bad for regulation. The market does need some corrections, but if you overdo it, then you weaken your case, he said.

Va. Congressman Fears Election Of 'Many More Muslims' To Office (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Responding to constituent e-mails about Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing-in, a Virginia congressman warned that "many more Muslims" will be elected demanding to use the Quran unless immigration is tightened.

Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., made the comments in a letter sent to hundreds of constituents about Ellison, D-Minn., the first Muslim elected to Congress. The letter triggered angry responses from a New Jersey congressman and an Islamic civil rights group.

DOJ_NMG_0108124

In the letter, Goode wrote, "The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

Goode said the U.S. needs to stop illegal immigration "totally" and reduce legal immigration.

Goode added: "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college. He did not return telephone messages left Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr., D-N.J., wrote to Goode saying he was "greatly disappointed and in fact startled" by Goode's letter.

"I take your remarks as personally offensive to the large community of Muslim-Americans I represent in the Eighth District of New Jersey," Pascrell wrote. "... Muslim-Americans do not threaten our American values and traditions, in fact they only add to them."

And the Council on American-Islamic Relations called on Goode to apologize.

"Representative Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," said CAIR's national legislative director, Corey Saylor. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

Goode spokesman Linwood Duncan said no apology was forthcoming.

"The only statement the congressman has is that he stands by the letter," Duncan said.

The letter was made public by John Cruickshank, the chairman of the Piedmont group of the Sierra Club in central Virginia, who had received it after writing to Goode about environmental issues. Duncan said Goode's office had sent the letter to Cruickshank by mistake.

Cruickshank said he was "deeply offended" by the letter.

"I felt like other people needed to know about it," he said.

Ellison's decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing in next month has generated heated controversy. Conservative talk radio host Dennis Prager has criticized Ellison for it, prompting CAIR to call on Prager's removal from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum board.

Va. Lawmaker's Remarks On Muslims Criticized (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.) is coming under sharp criticism for lashing out against the decision by Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), who will become the first Muslim member of Congress next month, to use the Koran during a swearing-in ceremony.

In a recent letter to constituents, Goode, a five-term congressman from Rocky Mount, wrote that he does "not subscribe to using the Koran in any way" and added: "The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration, there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations condemned Goode's remarks and called on him to apologize.

"Congressman Goode's ignorant and divisive statements are an affront to Muslims in his district and to Americans of all faiths who believe in our nation's longstanding traditions of religious tolerance and diversity," said Nihad Awad, executive director of the council.

Goode wrote the letter to constituents who had e-mailed him with concerns about Ellison using the Koran, he said in a written response to questions from The Washington Post. That letter was obtained by the C-Ville Weekly, a Charlottesville newspaper, and posted on its Web site.

"We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy . . . allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country," Goode said in the letter. "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America."

DOJ_NMG_0108125

When members of Congress are sworn in, they simply raise their right hand. In a ceremony afterward, they may take the oath of office on a Christian Bible, another religious book or no book at all.

In his written response, Goode said he will not apologize and does not see why his comments could be offensive to some Muslims. "The voters of each Congressional district select the representative that they choose to represent them, and perhaps voters in all districts will now ask prospective candidates whether they will use the Bible, the Koran, or anything else," Goode said.

Ellison, who was born in Detroit, could not be reached to comment.

Rep. William J. Pascrell Jr. (D-N.J.), who represents a congressional district with a large Muslim community, yesterday sent Goode a letter challenging his remarks.

"I was greatly disappointed and in fact startled by your recent constituent letter addressing the issue of Representative-elect Keith Ellison using a Koran for his swearing-in ceremony," Pascrell said in the letter. "Your letter also wrongfully equates the issue of immigration with a fear of Muslim integration in our society. I take your remarks as personally offensive to the large community of Muslim-Americans I represent."

Congressman Criticizes Election Of Muslim (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — In a letter sent to hundreds of voters this month, Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., Republican of Virginia, warned that the recent election of the first Muslim to Congress posed a serious threat to the nation's traditional values.

Mr. Goode was referring to Keith Ellison, the Minnesota Democrat and criminal defense lawyer who converted to Islam as a college student and was elected to the House in November. Mr. Ellison's plan to use the Koran during his private swearing-in ceremony in January had outraged some Virginia voters, prompting Mr. Goode to issue a written response to them, a spokesman for Mr. Goode said.

In his letter, which was dated Dec. 5, Mr. Goode said that Americans needed to "wake up" or else there would "likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped," said Mr. Goode, who vowed to use the Bible when taking his own oath of office.

Mr. Goode declined Wednesday to comment on his letter, which quickly stirred a furor among some Congressional Democrats and Muslim Americans, who accused him of bigotry and intolerance.

They noted that the Constitution specifically bars any religious screening of members of Congress and that the actual swearing in of those lawmakers occurs without any religious texts. The use of the Bible or Koran occurs only in private ceremonial events that take place after lawmakers have officially sworn to uphold the Constitution.

Mr. Ellison dismissed Mr. Goode's comments, saying they seemed ill informed about his personal origins as well as about Constitutional protections of religious freedom. "I'm not an immigrant," added Mr. Ellison, who traces his American ancestors back to 1742. "I'm an African-American."

Since the November election, Mr. Ellison said, he has received hostile phone calls and e-mail messages along with some death threats. But in an interview on Wednesday, he emphasized that members of Congress and ordinary citizens had been overwhelmingly supportive and said he was focusing on setting up his Congressional office, getting phone lines hooked up and staff members hired, not on negative comments.

"I'm not a religious scholar, I'm a politician, and I do what politicians do, which is hopefully pass legislation to help the nation," said Mr. Ellison, who said he planned to focus on secular issues like increasing the federal minimum wage and getting health insurance for the uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0108126

"I'm looking forward to making friends with Representative Goode, or at least getting to know him," Mr. Ellison said, speaking by telephone from Minneapolis. "I want to let him know that there's nothing to fear. The fact that there are many different faiths, many different colors and many different cultures in America is a great strength."

In Washington, Brendan Daly, a spokesman for the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, called Mr. Goode's letter "offensive." Corey Saylor, legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, criticized what he described as Mr. Goode's "message of intolerance."

Representative Bill Pascrell Jr., Democrat of New Jersey, urged Mr. Goode to reach out to Muslims in Virginia and learn "to dispel misconceptions instead of promoting them."

"Keith Ellison serves as a great example of Muslim Americans in our nation, and he does not have to answer to you, to me or anyone else in regards to questions about his faith," said Mr. Pascrell, whose district includes many Arab-Americans.

The fracas over Mr. Ellison's decision to use the Koran during his personal swearing-in ceremony began last month when Dennis Prager, a conservative columnist and radio host, condemned the decision as one that would undermine American civilization.

"Ellison's doing so will embolden Islamic extremists and make new ones, as Islamists, rightly or wrongly, see the first sign of the realization of their greatest goal — the Islamicization of America," said Mr. Prager, who said the Bible was the only relevant religious text in the United States.

"If you are incapable of taking an oath on that book, don't serve in Congress," Mr. Prager said.

In his letter, Mr. Goode echoed that view, saying that he did not "subscribe to using the Koran in any way." He also called for ending illegal immigration and reducing legal immigration.

Linwood Duncan, a spokesman for Mr. Goode, said the Virginia lawmaker had no intention of backing down, despite the furor.

"He stands by the letter," Mr. Duncan said. "He has no intention of apologizing."

Lawmaker Sees Muslims As Threat (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Muslim group is asking Virginia Republican Rep. Virgil Goode Jr. to apologize after he told hundreds of his constituents that more Muslims will follow Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, D-Minn., to Congress if strict immigration laws are not passed.

"The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district, and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran," Goode wrote.

The letter was written in response to constituents who contacted Goode after Ellison said he planned to bring his Qur'an with him when he takes the oath of office on Jan. 4.

In his letter, Goode said: "When I raise my hand to take the oath on Swearing In Day, I will have the Bible in my other hand. I do not subscribe to using the Koran in any way."

Goode, an attorney and former state senator who was first elected to Congress in 1996, said he wants to "stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped," Goode wrote.

Corey Saylor, national legislative director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), said Goode's "Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office."

Ellison, who will replace the retiring Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo, did not return phone calls. CAIR officials noted that Ellison traces his family roots in the United States back to 1742. He is a native of Detroit.

DOJ_NMG_0108127

Saylor said Goode should apologize, and he offered to arrange a meeting with Goode and Muslims in his district.

Linwood Duncan, Goode's press secretary, said that Goode sent the letter to hundreds of constituents who contacted his office after Ellison disclosed his plans. At about the same time, the head of the local Sierra Club contacted Goode about a different issue, and the letter was accidentally sent to him in response. The Sierra Club official gave a copy of the letter to a reporter.

"The congressman is not apologizing," Duncan said. "He stands by the letter."

John Cruickshank, the Sierra Club official from Earlysville, Va., said he was "deeply offended" when he received the letter from Goode. He said he's in regular contact with Goode on environmental issues.

Goode's letter drew a response from Democratic Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. of New Jersey, who wrote a letter to Goode saying he took his remarks as "personally offensive."I have learned a great deal from the Muslim community and have made it one of my priorities to educate other Americans about the common misconceptions regarding the peaceful faith of Islam," Pascrell wrote.

"There are many valid policy questions regarding immigration that should be addressed by Congress; however, promoting a fear and disrespect of Muslims is not only wrongheaded, but it is reckless. Muslim-Americans do not threaten our American values and traditions, in fact they only add to them."

Goode Stands By Comments On Muslims (RTD)

By Rex Bowman

Richmond Times Dispatch, December 21, 2006

ROCKY MOUNT -- U.S. Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. will not apologize to Islamic groups for a letter he wrote that decries Muslim immigration to America, his press aide said yesterday.

"He stands by the letter," said Linwood Duncan, aide to the 5th District Republican. Duncan refused to say more.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations demanded an apology Tuesday night for the letter, which Goode, of Rocky Mount, sent to hundreds of constituents and which the council labeled Islamophobic.

"We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country," Goode wrote.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

Corey Saylor, national legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, condemned the letter. "Representative Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," Saylor said. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

Duncan said Goode wrote the letter this month in response to hundreds of e-mails he had received from 5th District constituents concerned about Minnesota Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran in his swearing-in ceremony. Ellison, born in the United States, converted to Islam.

After one of Goode's letters miscarried, its contents were plastered online across the blogosphere.

"I do not subscribe to using the Koran [an alternate spelling of the Muslim holy book] in any way," Goode wrote in the letter's opening paragraph. "The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

"It's about as stupid a comment as I've ever heard from a legislator," said Mukit Hossain, president of the Potomac Falls-based Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, which estimates there are 60,000 Muslim voters in Virginia. "We will do everything we can to keep this issue alive. I think we can educate the people in his district that he is not the right candidate."

James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, said he was horrified when he read the letter. "I said to myself, the only thing that might make it not horrifying is if a staff person wrote it and he never saw it. But he's owning up to it. It's fundamentally wrong in so many ways . . . and ought to disqualify one for public service in so many other ways."

Goode could not be reached for comment by telephone or at his home.

DOJ_NMG_0108128

Among the chorus of critics was a fellow lawmaker, Democratic Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. of New Jersey. He took Goode to task in a letter for Goode's "personally offensive" remarks and for "promoting a fear and disrespect of Muslims."

Goode is Virginia's most outspoken advocate in Congress for clamping down on illegal immigration. He has pushed legislation to build a security fence across the border with Mexico and to make English the nation's official language.

The 5th Congressional District, largely rural, stretches from the North Carolina line between Henry and Brunswick counties north through Charlottesville to Greene County. It is home to few Muslims, but precise numbers are not available because the Census Bureau does not collect data based on religious adherence.

However, there is a small Muslims of America community in western Charlotte County. In recent weeks, members of an organization calling itself the Christian Action Network have sought to have changed the name of the main road, Sheikh Gilani Lane, that runs through the African-American community.

Tools: Save | Print | E-mail | Most Popular Lawmaker Won't Apologize For 'Islamophobic' Letter (CNN)

CNN.com, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- A Virginia congressman will not apologize for writing that without immigration reform "there will be many more Muslims elected to office demanding the use of the Quran," his spokesman said.

Republican Rep. Virgil Goode's letter to constituents also warns that without immigration reform "we will have many more Muslims in the United States."

Spokesman Linwood Duncan said Goode's letter was written in response to complaints his office received about Minnesota Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's request to be sworn in using the Quran.

Ellison is the first Muslim to be elected to Congress.

Goode's office released the letter to CNN Wednesday.

In it, Goode wrote, "When I raise my hand to take the oath on Swearing In Day, I will have the Bible in my other hand. I do not subscribe to using the Quran in any way.

"The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran.

"We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

He added, "The Ten Commandments and 'In God We Trust' are on the wall in my office. A Muslim student came by the office and asked why I did not have anything on my wall about the Quran.

"My response was clear, 'As long as I have the honor of representing the citizens of the 5th District of Virginia in the United States House of Representatives, the Quran is not going to be on the wall of my office.' "

The Council on American-Islamic Relations asked Goode to apologize.

"Rep. Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," the council's Corey Saylor said in a statement. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

Duncan told CNN that Goode stands by his comments.

Congress Asked To Intervene In Fla. Race (AP)

By David Royse

AP, December 21, 2006

The Democrat who narrowly lost to a Republican in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris asked Congress on Wednesday for an investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0108129

The state has declared that Democrat Christine Jennings lost to Republican Vern Buchanan by 369 votes. But 18,000 Sarasota County electronic ballots did not record a choice in the race, and Jennings contends that the number is abnormally high and that the machines lost the votes.

She filed with the House clerk an official contest of the election results in Florida's 13th Congressional District.

She said she will ask Congress to consider ordering a revote if her legal challenge in Florida fails. She is seeking to obtain the programming code for the touch-screen voting machines to determine whether a bug or malicious programming could have lost votes. The state has found no evidence of malfunction.

The company that makes the machines, Electronic Systems & Software Inc., is fighting the effort, saying its programming is a trade secret.

"It's not about me. It's about a revote," Jennings said by telephone from Washington. "I am not trying in any way to tell Congress what they should do. I am simply doing this for the integrity of our voting system."

Buchanan is to be sworn in Jan. 4. He has 30 days to respond to the challenge.

"Our primary concern is representing our constituency," Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts said. "Nevertheless, we fully intend to respond."

Congress is unlikely to intervene immediately, said Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration. The usual practice in such cases is to wait for the state-declared winner to be sworn in and a court to rule, then investigate if the candidate wishes to continue contesting the case.

Mass. Governor's Rightward Shift Raises Questions (WP)

By Dan Balz And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

As he prepares for a 2008 presidential campaign, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) has championed the conservative principles that guided President Ronald Reagan, become an outspoken opponent of same-sex marriage and supported overturning the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

It was not always so. Twelve years ago, Romney boasted that he would be more effective in fighting discrimination against gay men and lesbians than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), distanced himself from some conservative policies of the Reagan administration, and proudly recalled his family's record in support of abortion rights.

The apparent gulf between the candidate who ran for the Senate in 1994 and the one getting ready to run for president has raised questions as to who is the real Mitt Romney. Is he the self-described moderate who unsuccessfully challenged Kennedy in the year of the Republican landslide, the self-described conservative now ready to bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, or merely an ambitious and adaptable politician? The answer could be crucial to Romney's presidential ambitions.

In stressing his conservative views, Romney has sought to fill a vacuum on the right in the Republican nomination contest. Neither Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) nor former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who top the opinion polls among Republicans, has a comfortable relationship with social and cultural conservatives.

McCain has a long record of opposition to abortion rights, but many conservatives, nonetheless, remain wary of him because he went out of his way in 2000 to attack religious conservative leaders Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson. Giuliani supports abortion rights, gay rights and gun control, creating potentially irreconcilable differences with many conservatives.

Romney acknowledges that his positions on abortion and gay rights have changed. He told National Review Online last week that he would like to see the Supreme Court overturn the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision and return the issue to the states. He also said he no longer favors a federal non-discrimination law that would cover gay men and lesbians, and no longer backs accelerating the opening up of the military to gay men and lesbians.

Romney declined a request for an interview to discuss the evolution of his thinking on these issues. Aides said his schedule did not permit him to take the time for a telephone interview. They also said he has responded to questions on these subjects many times as he has explored a presidential candidacy.

Eric Fehrnstrom, his statehouse communications director, responded to questions about the apparent shift in Romney's beliefs. "The governor should be judged on his four-year record in office in one of the most liberal states in the country," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108130

"He has governed as a mainstream conservative. He's gone after wasteful spending; he's defended traditional marriage; he pushed to bring abstinence education to the classroom; he fought against embryonic cloning and stood up and vetoed an emergency-contraceptive bill."

But it will not just be that record that will attract attention as Romney leaves office in January and turns his attention toward a likely presidential campaign. The entire arc of his political career will be under examination, beginning with that 1994 race for the Senate.

When he challenged Kennedy, Romney was a young businessman with no firm ideological identity, the latest in a line of moderate Massachusetts Republicans that included former governor Francis W. Sargent and then-Gov. William F. Weld. Then 47, he had been a registered independent until 1993 and had voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 presidential primary. He took a tough, more conservative view of crime, immigration and welfare than Kennedy but shared the senator's liberal tolerance on social issues.

"It was a no-rocking-the-boat sort of reformism," said John Gorman, an independent Boston-based pollster.

As a Michigan-born Mormon, Romney was a cultural oddity in Massachusetts. Throughout the campaign, he sought to reassure voters that his religious faith would not influence his public actions. "One of the great things about our nation . . . is that we're each entitled to have strong, personal beliefs," Romney said during his first debate with Kennedy. "But, as a nation, we recognize the right of all people to believe as they want and not to impose our beliefs on other people."

One group he went out of his way to court was the gay rights community. While he noted that he opposed same-sex marriage, Romney said that "certain benefits and privileges should be offered to gay couples and lesbian couples." Acknowledging that Kennedy had a strong record on sexual-orientation issues, Romney said his GOP identity gave his words extra weight.

"There's something to be said for having a Republican who supports civil rights in this broader context, including sexual orientation," he told Bay Windows, a Boston-area newspaper for the gay community, in an Aug. 18, 1994, interview. "When Ted Kennedy speaks on gay rights, he's seen as an extremist. When Mitt Romney speaks on gay rights, he's seen as a centrist and a moderate."

He said he would push gay rights issues if elected. "I think the gay community needs more support from the Republican Party, and I would be a voice in the Republican Party to foster anti-discrimination efforts," he said then.

In an Oct. 6, 1994, letter to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts, a GOP gay and lesbian group, Romney endorsed broad federal anti-discrimination protections and the creation of a federal panel to address gay and lesbian youth suicide. He called President Bill Clinton's "don't ask, don't tell" military policy "the first of a number of steps that will ultimately lead to gays and lesbians being able to serve openly and honestly in our nation's military."

Romney has since backed away from his endorsement of that federal anti-discrimination statute and from his previously expansive position on gay people in the military. On that issue, he told National Review Online, he now defers to military leaders.

Fehrnstrom said Romney remains opposed to discrimination against gay men and lesbians, though his focus in the past few years has shifted to the issue of same-sex marriage. "Even as the governor has emerged nationally as a prime defender of traditional marriage, he always cloaks his rhetoric in tolerance and respect for people of all walks of life," he said.

Romney has long said he personally opposes abortion, and in an Oct. 25, 1994, debate with Kennedy, he was asked to reconcile his personal beliefs with his support for abortion rights.

"I believe that abortion should be safe and legal in this country," Romney responded. "I have, since the time when my mom took that position when she ran in 1970 as a U.S. Senate candidate. I believe that since Roe v. Wade has been the law for 20 years, we should sustain and support it. I sustain and support that law and the right of a woman to make that choice. And my personal beliefs, like the personal beliefs of other people, should not be brought into a political campaign."

He ran for governor in 2002 promising to preserve the status quo on abortion in Massachusetts, saying he would oppose changes that either liberalized or restricted access to abortion. He has lived up to that promise. But in late 2004, as he studied the issue of embryonic stem cell research, he underwent what he has called an awakening that led him to the conclusion that "the sanctity of life had been cheapened" by the Roe decision.

DOJ_NMG_0108131

That led him to describe himself as "pro-life." Still, he remained cagey about what that meant in terms of public policy, saying only that he would abide by his 2002 campaign promise. Asked in an interview with Washington Post reporters in February 2005 whether he favored making abortion illegal, he replied: "I'm telling you exactly what I will do as governor of Massachusetts, but I'm not going to tell you what I'd do as mayor of Boston or a congressman or any of those positions."

In the 1994 campaign, Romney also proudly labeled himself a moderate. "I'm not a partisan politician," he said in an interview with The Post that fall. "My hope is that, after this election, it will be the moderates of both parties who will control the Senate, not the Jesse Helmses."

Helms, the former Republican senator from North Carolina, was one of the most conservative elected officials in the country.

In his 1994 debate with Kennedy, Romney also refused to endorse the "Contract With America," which House Republicans had proudly presented as their campaign manifesto, and he balked when Kennedy tried to link him to the Reagan administration. "I was an independent during the time of Reagan-Bush," Romney retorted.

Questions about Romney's conservative credentials could provide an opening for several other Republicans exploring 2008 candidacies, among them Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and outgoing Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

Several conservative leaders, Falwell among them, declined to be interviewed for this article. One said it is premature to comment publicly. But Paul M. Weyrich, who is head of the Free Congress Foundation, said Romney should not underestimate the problem he may face as he prepares to launch his campaign.

"I think it's very serious," he said. "Our position is that, if a candidate can change his position sort of overnight, what would he do once he got in office? Would he do the same thing?"

The Courts Need This Watchdog (WP)

By Ronald D. Rotunda

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

The Judicial Transparency and Ethics Enhancement Act of 2006, now before Congress, would create an inspector general for the courts. It offers modest reforms that would keep our judiciary independent (because no one favors a dependent judiciary) and help keep it accountable (because no one favors a judiciary that is above the law).

Nonetheless, there are those who greet it the way Dracula would greet a bouquet of garlic. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, for example, has said of the proposal: "That's a really scary idea."

On the contrary, this bill would strengthen judicial independence because it would give people greater faith that if there were problems, the inspector general for the courts would deal with them and not sweep them under the rug. An inspector general would also protect judges from frivolous or false charges.

There are already 57 inspectors general for other organs of government -- for the Justice Department, Iraq reconstruction and so forth. The House of Representatives has imposed an inspector general on itself. Indeed, one wonders why it has taken so long to create one for the courts.

Giving an IG the power to audit federal judicial expenditures, to recommend changes in laws or regulations governing the judicial branch, and to investigate fraud, waste and abuse, is a modest reform that would not dislodge the heavens. That's why the House Judiciary Committee recently voted in favor of this bill by a bipartisan majority of 20 to 6.

After I testified in favor of the legislation in June, I received many supporting letters. For example, a federal judge, John Kane (who gave me permission to quote his e-mail), wrote, "I've been a district judge for 29 years and think the federal judicial house has brought this legislation on itself." He sat on the 10th Circuit Judicial Council when the first complaint about a judge came up for consideration: A district judge was trying to coerce counsel into establishing a library on product liability cases in honor of the judge.

Judge Kane's e-mail is worth quoting at length. He voted for discipline. The vote was 3 to 3, "and so the Chief Judge voted against sustaining the complaint because it was the first such complaint and he thought a close vote was too slender a reed upon which to proceed. As we were leaving the meeting, one of the judges who had voted to dismiss collared me and said, 'John, think about it. The next time it could be you or me. We've got to stick together.' "

DOJ_NMG_0108132

Kane added, "I've recently heard of a number of judges who ruled on cases involving companies in which they owned an interest, yet nothing was done about it. The point is that the current system is a 'kiss your sister' operation that hasn't worked and won't as long as judges are covering one another's butts. The present system is ineffectual and I think that could be demonstrated by the very sorry record."

Other judges may not favor these conclusions but they do not dispute the facts. Justice Stephen Breyer's commission on judicial discipline recently reported that the judiciary failed to conduct a proper investigation of judicial misconduct in five of 17 "high visibility cases" between 2001 and 2005. This error rate, the report admitted, is "far too high."

We can do better.

Right now the discipline process is conducted largely in secret. The proposed bill would give us sunlight, the best disinfectant. As for the independence of the judiciary, the proposed bill provides that the chief justice would appoint, and could remove, the inspector general. Federal judges already have lifetime tenure and salary protection. Giving them an inspector general whom the chief justice appoints and removes would not interfere with their independence.

Opponents of this bill say that the sky is falling. But it is not falling. There are no cracks in the sky. There are not even pre-fracture incipient fissures in the sky. Instead there is a real need for change.

The writer is university professor and a professor of law at George Mason University.

Discover America Partnership Lands Ridge (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

If a travel industry group wanted a big name with big credentials to speak up for opening U.S. borders to let in more business and recreational travelers, it couldn't have done much better than former homeland security secretary Tom Ridge.

And that's just who the Discover America Partnership got.

"It's a huge coup for us. There's no more credible source," Geoff Freeman, executive director of the Discover America Partnership, said yesterday.

The group wants Ridge to evaluate the entry process -- difficulties real and perceived with getting visas and going through airports -- and to propose strategies for a better balance between security and open doors. Freeman declined to say how much the group is paying Ridge.

The coalition and its multimillion-dollar advocacy campaign were launched in September to help boost the number of visitors by 10 million a year. Since Sept. 11, 2001, there has been a 17 percent decline in overseas travel to the United States, the group said.

Ridge said that he doesn't do lobbying, but that he will help devise "a tactical plan of which lobbying may be a part."

"Our borders are where our security and future prosperity intersect. The borders are getting more secure, but the doors are not opened enough," Ridge said. "We're not viewed as easily accessible because we're not."

Some of the coalition members are Steve Porter, president of the InterContinental Hotels Group, the Americas; Joseph A. McInerney, chief executive of the American Hotel and Lodging Association; Roger Dow, chief executive of the Travel Industry Association; and Jay Rasulo, chairman of Walt Disney Parks and Resorts.McCurdy Is Making a Move

Dave McCurdy, a Democratic survivor of the Republican K Street Project, is moving from the Electronic Industries Alliance to become president of the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers.

McCurdy, a former Democratic House member from Oklahoma, will take his post Feb. 12, succeeding Frederick L. Webber, who is retiring.

In 1998, Republicans tried to pressure the EIA into hiring a fellow Republican instead. Some GOP lawmakers told their staffs not to meet with EIA officials, and they delayed passage of legislation that the EIA supported.

Republicans were unsuccessful then -- McCurdy became chief executive of the EIA -- and the House ethics committee privately chastised then-Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for threatening retaliation.

McCurdy was unavailable to comment on his new appointment, a spokeswoman for the auto group said. Nels Olson of Korn-Ferry International helped with the executive search.

DOJ_NMG_0108133

Among the alliance's issues: The industry wants to avoid what it considers congressional meddling in government regulation of safety standards.

The alliance represents the BMW Group, DaimlerChrysler, Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp., Mazda, Mitsubishi Motors, Porsche, Toyota and Volkswagen.Shepherd Heading to Venable

Not to be outdone by other law firms snagging Hill investigator types for the much-anticipated oversight investigations in the Democratic-controlled Congress, Venable has signed one up, too.

Raymond Shepherd III, chief counsel of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is moving to Venable next month to be head of the law firm's new congressional investigation group.

Before going to work for Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) at the subcommittee, Shepherd was oversight counsel at the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Shepherd was involved with the panel's 25 hearings on such topics as abusive tax shelters, the United Nations oil-for-food program and the USA Patriot Act.

"I've seen a lot of companies prejudiced by counsel not knowing what Congress wants" and not realizing there are few rules that govern congressional investigations, he said.

Shepherd, who also will do some lobbying, will be covered by the one-year ethics ban from contacting former Senate colleagues.

Karl Racine of Venable said that Shepherd is a "special catch," particularly because the Coleman panel was known for its bipartisan approach.Lobby Shop Takes a Left Turn

Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland & Stewart has had strong Democratic -- and Republican -- credentials for years, and now it's getting a little more Democratic.

Jonathon Jones, a longtime aide to Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), most recently as chief of staff, joined the lobby shop Monday. Jones also helped create the Third Way, a centrist think tank, or "strategy center," for Senate Democrats.

David Johnson, a former executive director of the Senate Democratic Campaign Committee, said of Jones's work with Carper and Third Way: "In the Senate you have to have enough in the middle to get anything done."

Jones is covered by a one-year ban on lobbying Carper or his staff.Here and There

Also moving about town . . . Howard Waltzman, chief counsel for the House Energy and Commerce Committee, is leaving the Hill for Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw as a partner in the law firm.

Scott Gottlieb, deputy commissioner for medical and scientific affairs at the Food and Drug Administration, is leaving Jan. 16 to rejoin the American Enterprise Institute.

OTHER NEWS:

Chavez Accuses U.S. Envoy Of Lying On Drug Problem (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) -- The U.S. ambassador's suggestion that better ties were possible with Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez met a blunt reply on Wednesday when Chavez accused the ambassador of lying about drug trafficking.

The lack of counter-drug cooperation between Venezuela and the United States has been one of many diplomatic sticking points between the two countries -- one that has worsened as Chavez has accused American anti-drug agents of involvement in espionage.

"A little while ago, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas told a big lie. He should retract it if it's really true that [U.S. officials] want good relations like they've been saying," Chavez told reporters who questioned him during an unrelated event Wednesday.

Ambassador William Brownfield told the Venezuelan newspaper El Nacional this week that U.S. officials estimate that the amount of cocaine smuggled through Venezuela has increased by 22 to 33 tons (20 to 30 metric tons) a year over the last five years, reaching about 330 tons (300 metric tons) in 2006.

"The drug traffickers have identified a vacuum because there is less police collaboration than in any other country ... and as a result they take advantage of Venezuela to move their product toward the Caribbean," Brownfield told El Nacional.

Brownfield also told El Nacional that Washington is seeking a pragmatic relationship with Chavez's government, cooperating on trade, energy and drug issues despite political differences.

Chavez called Brownfield's claims about drugs "a lack of respect for the truth" and said they were "absolutely false."

He said consumption by Americans was the root of the drug problem and accused the U.S. government of turning from communism to the drug war as an excuse to intervene in Latin America and justify its military presence in the region.

The U.S. Embassy declined to comment Wednesday.

Venezuela, due to its location next to Colombia, is a major transit route for cocaine headed to the United States and Europe.

But Venezuelan officials said they are fighting the drug war with increasing success, claiming that since Chavez broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration last year, the amount of illegal drugs seized has doubled.

Brownfield has urged Venezuela to sign a new agreement with the DEA, but Chavez revived his earlier claims that officials of that agency had been involved in spying -- allegations that Washington denies.

"They had secret bases here ... the DEA blackmailed Venezuelan police and military officers in order to conduct political espionage," and support efforts to destabilize the country, Chavez said, without elaborating.

Following Chavez's re-election on December 3 by a wide margin, both the U.S. and Venezuelan governments have shown cautious hope for more dialogue despite deep differences.

But Chavez said Brownfield was playing the "bad cop" and was threatening the credibility of U.S. overtures: "It seems the ambassador here doesn't toe that line."

Chavez threatened to kick out Brownfield earlier this year, accusing him of trying to provoke confrontations with his frequent trips into pro-Chavez slums to hand out donations to libraries and youth baseball teams.

Bush Forcefully Rejects Direct Talks With Syria, Iran (MCT)

By William Douglas And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush on Wednesday voiced his strongest opposition yet to talking directly to Iran and Syria as other administration officials acknowledged secret U.S. funding of opponents to Syria's regime.

At a year-end White House news conference, the president insisted that he won't deal with Iran until it verifiably abandons its uranium enrichment program and won't talk with Syria until it stops interfering in Lebanon and Iraq. Both stands are rejections of a key recommendation made earlier this month by the Iraq Study Group.

On Iraq, Bush said he's still consulting and hasn't made up his mind whether to increase U.S. troops there, but he insisted that "victory in Iraq is achievable." The president will outline what he calls "a new way forward" in Iraq in an address to the nation next month.

In addition, Bush said the Army and Marines must grow to fight "radicals and extremists ... for a long period of time" around the world. He offered no specifics but has instructed new Defense Secretary Robert Gates to develop a plan to bolster the ranks of both services.

His strongest language Wednesday concerned Iran and Syria.

He called Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's government "out of step" with the rest of the world and chastised it for sponsoring a conference on the Holocaust that "heralded a really backward view of the history of the world."

"My message to the Iranian people is, `You can do better ...," Bush said. As for Syria, he said, "the message is the same."

He scolded the Syrian government for allowing money and weapons to flow through its borders to insurgents in Iraq and reiterated his call for Syria to end its efforts to destabilize Lebanon's fledgling democratic government.

With such comments, Bush rejected one of the key suggestions from the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member, bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, D-Ind.

Some analysts believe that Bush's refusal to talk to Syria could be a crucial mistake and undermine his hope of sponsoring a new push for an Israeli-Palestinian settlement. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East next month looking to reignite stalled peace efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0108135

"The idea that we can't talk with the Syrians when we had talks with the Evil Empire, the Soviet Union, for decades is ridiculous," said David Mack, vice president of the Middle East Institute, a nonprofit group devoted to fostering knowledge of the region.

Rather than talk with Iran and Syria, the White House is taking steps to bolster opponents of the two countries' governing regimes.

U.S. officials confirmed Wednesday that the State Department has been quietly funding meetings of opponents of Syrian President Bashar Assad in Europe.

One official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the meetings have been coordinated via the Berlin offices of the Aspen Institute, a private think tank, and are funded by the department's Middle East Partnership Initiative, an effort to promote democracy in Arab countries.

This is the first time that the U.S. government has acknowledged funding Syrian opposition groups. Syria holds legislative elections in March.

Ammar Abdulhamid, a critic of the Syrian government who's based in Washington, said the Berlin meetings have involved opposition groups of all stripes. Another is planned for late January or early February, he said.

Asked about the funding, which was first reported on Time magazine's Web site, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said it's "no different from any other programs that we have all throughout the rest of the world and especially in the Middle East, promoting those civil society groups who have an interest in greater freedom and democracy in the Middle East."

Other officials say that's not necessarily the case because the funding involves strengthening groups and individuals that favor replacing Assad's regime.

An administration working group, known as the Iran-Syria Operations Group, whose existence is technically classified, has been meeting almost weekly to discuss ways to promote change in Iran and Syria through U.S.-funded broadcasting and other methods. The ISOG and its sub-groups are co-chaired by the White House's National Security Council and the State Department.

Additionally, Bush aides met at the White House in late October with members of a coalition of Syrian opposition groups called the National Salvation Front. That awkward coalition includes secular Syrians who advocate democracy; members of the Muslim Brotherhood, the Middle East's largest Islamist group; and former vice president Abdul Halim Khaddam, once a leading member of the regime.

Rice has made clear that rather than engaging with Iran and Syria, the administration plans to try to reduce their influence. The plan is to bolster a coalition of "mainstream" states, which would include Egypt, Jordan and six Arab nations bordering the Persian Gulf, led by Saudi Arabia. Iran and Syria, which Rice and Bush have repeatedly denounced as destabilizing the region, would be excluded.

Rice, in an interview with McClatchy Newspapers and other news organizations Tuesday, said she plans to encourage the coalition during the rest of her tenure. "I think that's really the diplomacy of the next couple of years, is to try and solidify that alignment in the Middle East," she said.

But while Sunni Arab nations are worried over Shiite Iran's resurgence, they've made clear to Rice that their cooperation is dependent on greater U.S. involvement to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Syria could undermine any such effort in retaliation for U.S. efforts to undermine Syria.

Bush vowed to work with the new Democratic-controlled Congress next year on improving the situation in Iraq and adding more soldiers to the U.S. military.

But some Democrats were skeptical of Bush's comments Wednesday.

"Unfortunately, it is troubling to see that he does not understand the need for urgent change in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader-designate Harry Reid said in a written statement. "The president seems lost within his own rhetoric."

Bush also vowed to work with Democrats to increase the minimum wage by $2.10 over a two-year period, if the increase is coupled with a relaxation of regulations and taxes for small businesses.

And he pledged to try again to get a comprehensive immigration policy that includes a guest worker program.

DOJ_NMG_0108136

Kerry, Dodd Meet With Syria President (AP)

By Albert Aji

AP, December 21, 2006

Sens. John Kerry and Christopher Dodd met with Syrian President Bashar Assad on Wednesday and discussed the need for Damascus to cooperate with efforts to maintain the unity and stability of war-ravaged Iraq, state media reported.

The U.S. Embassy in Damascus said the meeting, which lasted two and a half hours, covered "a full-range of topics relating to U.S.-Syrian relations and regional issues."

"I feel quite confident in saying this was a conversation worth having and that the (Bush) administration ought to pursue it," Kerry said in a telephone interview with the Associated Press from Jerusalem where he traveled after the meeting with Assad. "I feel very strongly about that...It's worth following up on a number of avenues."

Kerry said he told Assad the new Democratic-controlled Congress has serious concerns about issues such as the flow of "money, weapons and terrorists" through Syria into Iraq and Lebanon.

Kerry has criticized the Bush administration for refusing to engage with Syria and Iran, a move that was recommended by the recently released Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel.

The Democratic senators, both prospective 2008 presidential candidates, and Assad "reviewed the situation in Iraq and stressed the importance of supporting the current political process to arrive at setting a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops," SANA said.

Talks also dealt with ways of stopping the escalating violence in the Palestinian territories, the agency said.

The Bush administration has accused Kerry, Dodd and other senators who have met with Assad of sending mixed signals and has insisted that the U.S. will not make concessions to Damascus to win its help in Iraq.

"We discourage the travel of members of Congress to Syria because we believe it undermines the cause of democracy in the region and particularly" Lebanon's government, White House spokesman Blair Jones said Wednesday night.

Syrian-U.S. relations have been strained for several years. The U.S. government has expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrians curb their support to radical Palestinian groups and to the Lebanese Hezbollah and reduce their influence in Lebanon.

The two American lawmakers arrived in Damascus on Tuesday as part of a Middle East tour to investigate Syria's readiness to help bring about stability and security to neighboring Iraq.

___

AP writers Barry Schweid and Andrew Miga in Washington contributed to this report.

Kerry: Syria Leader Wants To Assist In Iraq (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, December 21, 2006

Senator John F. Kerry said Wednesday that President Bashar Assad of Syria expressed a willingness to work with the United States to bring stability to Iraq, and said Assad personally offered assistance that Kerry plans to convey to the Bush administration.

Kerry -- who visited Syria along with Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, despite the administration's opposition to the trip -- said the meeting with Assad reinforced the need to follow the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the US government directly engage Syria and Iran to find a way forward in Iraq.

"He offered some very direct and concrete ways in which they could be helpful in Iraq," Kerry said in an interview conducted by telephone from Damascus. "I came away with a distinct feeling that there are opportunities here. There are fronts in which we can work together if people are inclined to."

Kerry said the Assad government is interested in approaching the Iraq war from a regional perspective, where other Middle East issues -- including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- are part of the equation. The Massachusetts Democrat said he would not publicly discuss the substance of his talks with Assad until he has fully briefed State Department officials about his visit.

DOJ_NMG_0108137

But Kerry reiterated his position that President Bush is wrong to rule out direct talks with Syria and Iran. He added that he is interested in visiting Iran as well at an "appropriate time" that's well-removed from the country's recent conference for Holocaust deniers, which Kerry labeled "absurd and insulting."

"I think you've got to talk with people," Kerry said. "You can disagree with them and disagree with them and disagree with them, and you may not get anywhere, but you've got to talk to people."

Wednesday's two-hour meeting involving Kerry, Dodd, and Assad is part of a growing diplomatic effort by senators to improve US relations with Syria. Last week, Senator Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, became the first senator in nearly two years to meet with Assad, and Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, is also due to visit Syria this week.

The Bush administration cut off high-level diplomatic contact with Syria in late 2004, saying that talks with the government had failed to convince Syria to stop the flow of insurgents into Iraq or to stop support for the anti-Israeli militant groups Hezbollah and Hamas.

State Department officials sought to dissuade Kerry, Dodd, and Nelson from going to Syria, though they helped set up logistics of the visits when the lawmakers insisted on making their trips. Last week, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow blasted the visits as "not appropriate," saying that such meetings hand the Syrian government "a PR victory" by allowing officials to showcase what they portray as improved relations with the West.

At a White House press conference Wednesday, Bush defended his administration's decision to rule out talks with Iran and Syria until the leaders of those countries change their behavior.

"We have talked to them about what is necessary for them to have a better relationship with the United States," Bush said. "And they're not unreasonable requests."

Still, Bush cited the fact that US lawmakers are visiting Syria as a signal to the Syrian government that they can work to repair relations with the United States. The Bush administration withdrew its ambassador to Syria in February 2005, after Syria was implicated in the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, a former prime minister of Lebanon, although lower-level staff remain in Damascus.

"We've had visits with the Syrians in the past. Congressmen and senators visit Syria," Bush said at the press conference. "What I would suggest, that if they're interested in better relations with the United States, that they take some concrete, positive steps that promote peace, as opposed to instability."

Nelson told reporters after his meeting with Assad that the Syrian president "clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate" with US and Iraqi forces to secure his country's border with Iraq.

Kerry said his meeting gave him and Dodd a chance to express the "unanimity of Democrats" about the need for an independent Lebanon, free of Syrian interference. In a joint statement, the senators said they laid out a series of steps the Assad government must take to improve its standing in the eyes of the United States.

"While we believe in resuming dialogue, our message is no different: Syria can and should play a more constructive role in the region," the senators said. "We conveyed our strong belief that only concrete and verifiable actions by the Syrian government would help convince Americans that Syria is willing to change course."

But the State Department continued to emphasize that it did not endorse the senators' trip to Syria. Officials' assistance in setting up the trip reflects only the "courtesy that you might expect we would [extend] to senior members of the Senate," said Sean McCormack, a department spokesman.

"Whether they're foreign visitors or US senators or US congressmen, it is their decision to take," McCormack said. "It doesn't mean that we support the fact that they are there or having these discussions."

Syria's official news agency cast Wednesday's meeting as a chance for the Syrian government to work toward an end to violence in Iraq -- and to press Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights, Syrian territory that has been occupied by Israel since 1967.

"The president and the two senators discussed the deteriorating situation in Palestine and the need to preserve Palestinian national unity," the SANA agency reported. "The Baker-Hamilton [Iraq Study Group] report was discussed and President Assad affirmed the need to stop violence in Iraq, and Syria's readiness to achieve Middle East peace under honest international auspices."

DOJ_NMG_0108138

Both Kerry and Dodd are considering running for president in 2008.

Kerry has said he would announce his decision shortly after the turn of the year.

U.S. And Britain To Add Ships To Persian Gulf In Signal To Iran (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — The United States and Britain will begin moving additional warships and strike aircraft into the Persian Gulf region in a display of military resolve toward Iran that will come as the United Nations continues to debate possible sanctions against the country, Pentagon and military officials said Wednesday.

The officials said that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was expected this week to approve a request by commanders for a second aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran by early next year.

Senior American officers said the increase in naval power should not be viewed as preparations for any offensive strike against Iran. But they acknowledged that the ability to hit Iran would be increased and that Iranian leaders might well call the growing presence provocative. One purpose of the deployment, they said, is to make clear that the focus on ground troops in Iraq has not made it impossible for the United States and its allies to maintain a military watch on Iran. That would also reassure Washington's allies in the region who are concerned about Iran's intentions.

The officials said the planned growth in naval power in the gulf and surrounding waters would be useful in enforcing any sanctions that the United Nations might impose as part of Washington's strategy to punish Iran for what it sees as ambitions to acquire nuclear weapons. And the buildup would address another concern: that Iran could try to block oil shipments from the gulf in retaliation for United Nations sanctions or other American-led pressure.

Steps are already being taken to increase the number of minesweeping vessels and magnetic "sleds" carried by helicopters to improve the ability to counter Iranian mines that could block oil-shipping lanes, Pentagon and military officials said.

As part of future deployments after the first of the year, the British Navy plans to add two mine-hunting vessels to its ships that already are part of the international coalition patrolling waters in the Persian Gulf.

A Royal Navy news release said the ship movements were aimed at "maintaining familiarity with the challenges of warm water mine-hunting conditions." But a senior British official said: "We are increasing our presence. That is only prudent." Military officers said doubling the aircraft carrier presence in the region could be accomplished quickly by a shift in sailing schedules.

As opposed to ground and air forces that require bases in the region, naval forces offer a capacity for projecting power in parts of the world where a large American footprint is controversial, and unwanted even by allies. Many of the ships could be kept over the horizon, out of sight, but close enough to project their power quickly if needed.

Vice Adm. Patrick M. Walsh, commander of naval forces across the military's Central Command, said that while "Iranian tone and rhetoric creates an environment of intimidation and fear," the United States "must be careful not to contribute to escalation." In an interview from his headquarters in Bahrain, Admiral Walsh declined to discuss the specifics of future deployments. "To assure our friends, we have to have capabilities to secure the critical sea lines of communication," he said.

"They need reassurances that we expect to be part of the effort here for the long term, that we will not run away from intimidation and that we will be part of the effort here for security and stability at sea for the long term," he added. "Our position must be visible and it must have muscle in order to be credible. That requires sustained presence."

Other military and Pentagon officials did describe specifics of the planned deployments in order to clarify the rationale for the movement of ships and aircraft, but they would not do so by name because Mr. Gates had not yet signed any deployment orders.

Pentagon officials said that the military's joint staff, which plans operations and manages deployments, had recently received what is called a "request for forces" from commanders asking for a second aircraft carrier strike group in the region, and that a deployment order was expected to be signed by the end of the week by Mr. Gates. That specific request was mentioned in various news accounts over the past few days.

The aircraft carrier Eisenhower and its strike group — including three escort ships, an attack submarine and 6,500 sailors in all — entered the Persian Gulf on Dec. 11 after a naval exercise to practice halting vessels suspected of smuggling nuclear materials in waters across the region. A carrier had not been inside the gulf since the Enterprise left in July, according to Pentagon officials. The next carrier scheduled to sail toward the Middle East is the Stennis, already set to depart Bremerton, Wash., for the region in late January, Navy officers said.

DOJ_NMG_0108139

Officials expressed doubt that the Stennis and its escorts would be asked to set sail before the holiday season, but it could be ordered to sea several weeks earlier than planned. It could then overlap for months with the Eisenhower, which is not scheduled to return home until May, offering ample time to decide whether to send another carrier or to extend the Eisenhower's tour to keep the carrier presence at two.

Doubling the number of carriers in the region offers commanders the flexibility of either keeping both strike groups in the gulf or keeping one near Iran while placing a second carrier group outside the gulf, where it would be in position to fly combat patrols over Afghanistan or cope with growing violence in the Horn of Africa.

But these same officials acknowledge that Iran is the focus of any new deployments, as administration officials view recent bold moves by Iran — and by North Korea, as well — as at least partly explained by assessments in Tehran and North Korea that the American military is bogged down in Iraq and incapable of fully projecting power elsewhere.

Adm. Mike Mullen, the chief of naval operations, has made the case that the United States should seek to create "a thousand-ship Navy." That would be impossible for the United States alone given current budgets, so instead it would be accomplished by operating more closely with allied warships to better cover critical areas like the Persian Gulf.

He said that such a cooperative naval concept would be a "global maritime partnership that unites navies, coast guards, maritime forces, port operators, commercial shippers and many other government and nongovernment agencies to address maritime concerns."

As an example, at present there are about 45 warships deployed in the Persian Gulf and waters across the region from the Red Sea to the Indian Ocean, with a third of those supplied by allies, which this month include Australia, Bahrain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Pakistan and Britain.

Security Council Set To Vote Friday On Iran Sanctions (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, December 21, 2006

Under pressure from the United States, the UN Security Council edged toward a Friday vote on a compromise draft resolution mandating sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear fuel work.

After the European sponsors offered concessions to overcome Russian objections, Britain's UN envoy Emyr Jones Parry announced: "The president of the council concluded there would be a vote on Friday morning" on the watered-down text.

The new draft, which watered down a contentious proposal for a travel ban on 12 officials directly linked to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, was circulated to the council's 15 members Wednesday.

"The travel ban is gone," said Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin, saying the issue was "addressed in a creative manner which is more in line with our original thinking."

The new draft, a copy of which was obtained by AFP, finessed the issue by making the travel ban voluntary.

It urged "all states to exercise vigilance regarding the entry into or transit through their territories of individuals who are engaged in, directly associated with or providing support for Iran's proliferation sensitive nuclear activities or for the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems."

It further says that all states shall notify a monitoring committee "of the entry into or transit through their territories of persons" designated in the draft's annex as well as additional persons found to be linked with Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

The compromise text drawn up by Britain, France and Germany emerged after several rounds of bargaining Wednesday involving envoys of the Security Council's five veto-wielding members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- as well as Germany.

"We are down to two or three issues to be tackled," Churkin said. "I hope they will be by tomorrow."

The new draft also eases some of the financial restrictions slapped on entities or persons linked to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

DOJ_NMG_0108140

"We believe there is no reason we should not have a vote tomorrow," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

US acting ambassador Alejandro Wolff said he was consulting with Washington over the latest changes to the draft.

Asked about the travel ban, which earlier this week he described as a "priority" issue for the US side, Wolff said: "We're still negotiating this... we want a vote early and we want a really good resolution."

"We have been working very hard on this resolution which unfortunately we have to do because Iran has not agreed to suspend certain activities which would have opened the door to negotiations," Churkin said.

The aim, he added, was to "make sure this is a careful targeted resolution, which would created some problems for Iran in pursuing activities which the Security Council does not want to pursue but also will make it very clear that the door is open for negotiation when Iran accepts the requirement for suspension."

Moscow, which like China has strong economic ties with Tehran, strongly backs Iran's right to civilian nuclear technology. The Russians are building the Islamic Republic's first atomic power station in Bushehr.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice meanwhile spoke by telephone Wednesday with her British counterpart Margaret Beckett to discuss "ways to close the remaining gaps" over the wording of the draft, McCormack said.

"I would caution that we're not there yet, we don't have a final agreement on a resolution," the US spokesman added.

The draft calls for a mandatory ban on trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programs and place financial restrictions on persons and entities involved in the sectors.

It demands that Iran "without further delay suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, including research and development and work on all heavy water related projects."

It calls for a report within 60 days by the head of the UN nuclear watchdog agency on whether Iran has complied with fully with UN demands.

It warns that if Tehran refuses to comply, the council "shall adopt further appropriate measures under Article 41 of Chapter Seven" of the UN charter," a reference to economic sanctions only.

The United States and other Western countries suspect that Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian nuclear energy program. Tehran denies this.

U.N. Draft Resolution On Iran Loosens Travel Ban And Time Limits (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 20 — The European sponsors of a resolution to take steps against Iran for its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear activities submitted a freshly revised draft to the Security Council on Wednesday evening and called for a vote on Friday.

In a major concession to Russia, the principal dissenter during the months it has taken to settle on the language of the resolution, the final revision eases a travel ban on people involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

Instead of directing countries to prevent entry of such people into their territory, it now "calls upon" states to "exercise vigilance" over those who cross their borders.

It also gives to a monitoring committee that would be set up under the resolution greater authority than earlier drafts did to restrict what people and entities should be listed as suspected participants in nuclear activities.

In addition, the new draft qualifies a freeze on assets of such people and gives countries more time — 60 days instead of 30 — to report to the committee on how they are complying with the demands of the resolution.

The major thrust of the resolution is to demand that Iran immediately end all enrichment of uranium, which can produce fuel for power plants but also for bombs, and cease all its research and development work on the kinds of activities that are aimed at making weapons.

The amendments were added to address complaints from Russia, a country with close economic ties to Iran. Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador to the United Nations, said the resolution appeared largely acceptable to his government.

"The travel ban is gone," he said, adding, "It is addressed in a more creative manner, which is more in line with our original thinking."

DOJ_NMG_0108141

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador who on Tuesday had called the ban an American priority, was asked if the new version could still be called a ban.

"Well, under the vigilance, obviously countries can take their decision on whether they are going to allow people to travel into their country or not, so it does not exclude a ban on travel," he said.

Mr. Wolff said that the United States was still studying the text, which was circulated among the 15 members of the Council only at 6 p.m. Countries were expected to seek guidance from their capitals overnight and present any final suggested changes to the text on Thursday.

"We are not necessarily quite there yet," said Emyr Jones Parry, Britain's ambassador. "We will vote this resolution Friday morning — that's what we intend to do."

The resolution bans imports and exports of materials and technology related to uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missile systems.

An earlier draft extended those restrictions to the light-water reactor that Russia is building in Bushehr in southern Iran, but, in another concession, all mention of the plant was dropped from the measure.

Settling on the language of the resolution has taken months of tough negotiating among ambassadors at the United Nations, periodic meetings in Europe of senior foreign ministry officials of the countries involved and frequent consultations between missions here and their capitals.

The participants have been Germany and the Council's five permanent members: the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia.

The principal stumbling block has been resistance from Russia and China to steps that would punish Iran for its defiance of the Security Council deadline on suspending the enrichment of uranium.

Iran says that it is exercising its sovereign right to develop nuclear power for peaceful energy purposes, but the United States and other Western governments believe Iran is developing nuclear weapons.

Who's Tough On Tehran? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Iranians made their feelings plain about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad last week by voting to reject his allies in municipal elections and in the Assembly of Experts, a clerical body that theoretically has authority over Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei. That doesn't mean reformers now run Iran, but it does suggest that international pressure and a policy of democracy promotion may produce the kinds of changes in Iran that three years of Western diplomacy have failed to achieve.

So it's all the more puzzling that, even as Iranians try to apply some pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad, the international community is about to prove his point that Iran will pay little price for its quest to develop an atomic bomb. Consider what's happening at the U.N., where the Security Council is expected to approve a sanctions resolution this week, nearly four months after its August 31 "deadline" for Tehran to stop enriching uranium.

We've seen the latest draft of the resolution, hashed out among the U.S., the Europeans and Russia. Iran will be forbidden from importing any items or technical assistance "which could contribute to [its] enrichment-related, reprocessing or heavy water related activities, or to the delivery of nuclear weapon delivery systems." The resolution also imposes travel restrictions, and it freezes the financial assets of certain individuals involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

This almost sounds tough. But then the resolution carves out exceptions that are broader than the actual rules. Consider the financial freeze: It shall apply in all cases, except where the money is necessary for "basic expenses," "extraordinary expenses," or is "the subject of a judicial, administrative or arbitral lien." Or take the travel ban, which has exceptions for "humanitarian need," "religious obligation," or when the sanctioned individuals need to travel in connection to some nuclear activities as opposed to others.

More dangerous is the exception for Bushehr, the civilian reactor that Russia has built for Iran at a cost of $1 billion and that is expected to be ready by October 2007. Conventional wisdom says "light-water" reactors such as Bushehr can't easily be used to make nukes, one reason the Clinton Administration arranged to build two of them for North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0108142

In fact, says proliferation expert Henry Sokolski, such reactors produce hundreds of tons of reactor-grade plutonium, which can be reprocessed into nuclear fuel for as many as 60 Nagasaki-type bombs in a matter of weeks. The Russians promise to safeguard the nuclear fuel. But the reactor's uranium pellets can be secretly removed by substituting dummy fuel rods and then quickly enriched to weapons-grade material in Iran's centrifuge cascades, without foreign inspectors ever being the wiser. Iranian scientists will also gain invaluable nuclear know-how simply by operating a civilian reactor.

In other words, the Security Council's resolution may well be worse than nothing at all. It reaffirms Iran's "right" to peaceful nuclear energy -- a right it has long since forfeited by violating the terms of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT). And by carving a legally binding exception around Bushehr, the Security Council gives Iran the foothold it needs to develop its nuclear program to within a screw's twist of an actual bomb, without ever trespassing against the sanctions.

The resolution's defenders, particularly at the State Department, tell us this is a price worth paying to accommodate the Russians and achieve an international consensus. They also say the resolution is just the latest incremental step. But at some point one has to ask whether consensus is helping to achieve U.S. policy goals, particularly when Iran keeps using international divisions to buy time for its nuclear programs. Perhaps the best the Administration can hope for is that Iran responds to even these minimal sanctions by making good on its threats to withdraw from the NPT, embarrassing even the U.N. Security Council into tougher action.

Which brings us back to the Iranian elections. It is wrong to imagine that the big winner -- former president and Ayatollah Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani -- is a moderate or a reformer, though he is more certainly presentable than his successor; he too has threatened Israel with nuclear annihilation. But given the limited political choices the regime offers voters, the election indicates that most Iranians dislike the regime and that they take no pleasure in their president's status as a moral pariah.

There's an opening here to promote change, provided the U.S. doesn't reward Mr. Ahmadinejad's bad behavior by failing to punish it, and provided President Bush reminds Iranians that while the U.S. opposes their government, it stands with Iranians who want more freedom.

Iran Admits Oil Projects Suffering (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

Iran's oil minister on Wednesday admitted that Tehran was having trouble financing oil projects, in a rare acknowledgment of the economic cost of its nuclear dispute.

"Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their co-operation," Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told the oil ministry news agency, Shana.

The statement underlined the impact of de facto financial sanctions on the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries' second biggest oil producer. As the controversy over Iran's nuclear programme has escalated, the US has applied pressure on European banks and financial institutions to curb dealings with Tehran.

The fact that the UN Security Council could soon impose the first – even if mild – sanctions against Iran has compounded the political uncertainty and risks of doing business with Tehran. Iranian officials insist there is international interest in investing in Iran's oil industry and European executives play down any impact on companies seeking deals in Iran.

The National Iranian Oil Company has signed a memorandum of understanding with China's CNOOC to develop the North Pars gas field. The memorandum, if it turns into a final deal, would bring $16bn worth of Chinese investments for the initial part of any deal, the semi-official Fars news agency reported on Wednesday.

But western officials hope the financial squeeze's effect on the oil industry, the backbone of Iran's economy, will help raise domestic pressure for a change of policy and persuade the regime to heed international calls for a suspension of its uranium enrichment programme.

Iran's oil production capacity, at 4.3m barrels per day, is set to reach 5m bpd, according to the country's latest five-year plan, which closes in 2009. This would involve $16bn of investment in the sector. But the International Energy Agency reckons that Iran's longer term plans to lift oil production to 6.8m bpd by 2030 would require nearly $80bn in investment, with expansion plans for the gas industry requiring an extra $85bn.

DOJ_NMG_0108143

"There's a growing awareness that de facto sanctions are beginning to hurt and everyone understands the future of the economy depends on the development of oil and gas," said a western diplomat. "Banks are not lending, partly because of US pressure, but the banks are also drawing their own conclusions."

Mr Vaziri-Hamaneh said projects would be financed from the Oil Stabilisation Fund, which accumulates oil windfalls to promote the private sector and save for periods of low oil prices.

Iran President Facing Revival Of Students' Ire (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

TEHRAN, Dec. 20 — As protests broke out last week at a prestigious university here, cutting short a speech by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Babak Zamanian could only watch from afar. He was on crutches, having been clubbed by supporters of the president and had his foot run over by a motorcycle during a less publicized student demonstration a few days earlier.

But the significance of the confrontation was easy to grasp, even from a distance, said Mr. Zamanian, a leader of a student political group.

The student movement, which planned the 1979 seizure of the American Embassy from the same university, Amir Kabir, is reawakening from its recent slumber and may even be spearheading a widespread resistance against Mr. Ahmadinejad. This time the catalysts were academic and personal freedom.

"It is not that simple to break up a president's speech," said Alireza Siassirad, a former student political organizer, explaining that an event of that magnitude takes meticulous planning. "I think what happened at Amir Kabir is a very important and a dangerous sign. Students are definitely becoming active again."

The protest, punctuated by shouts of "Death to the dictator," was the first widely publicized outcry against Mr. Ahmadinejad, one that was reflected Friday in local elections, where voters turned out in droves to vote for his opponents.

The students' complaints largely mirrored public frustrations over the president's crackdown on civil liberties, his blundering economic policies and his harsh oratory against the West, which they fear will isolate the country.

But the students had an additional and potent source of outrage: the president's campaign to purge the universities of all vestiges of the reform movement of his predecessor, Mohammad Khatami.

Last summer the newly installed head of the university, Alireza Rahai, ordered the demolition of the office of the Islamic Association, which had been the core of student political activities on campus since 1963 and had matured into a moderate, pro-reform group.

Since then, students say, more than 100 liberal professors have been forced into retirement and many popular figures have been demoted. At least 70 students were suspended for political activities, and two were jailed. Some 30 students were given warnings, and a prominent Ph.D. candidate, Matin Meshkin, was barred from finishing his studies.

The students also complain about overcrowded and crumbling dormitories and proscriptions against women wearing makeup or bright colors, rules that were relaxed when Mr. Khatami came to power in 1997.

Amir Kabir University of Technology, a major polytechnic institute, has been a hotbed of student activism since before Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's Islamic Revolution of 1979. Drawing on networks at universities around the country through an office that links their Islamic associations, students can organize large protests on a moment's notice. There are also student guilds, which are independent, and more than 2,000 student publications.

Mr. Zamanian, the head of public relations of the Islamic Association at Amir Kabir, said that while the situation had not been ideal in the Khatami years, Mr. Ahmadinejad's antireformist campaign had led students to value their previous freedoms.

They were permitted to hold meetings and invite opposition figures to speak, he said, and could freely publish their journals. Now, he said, their papers are forbidden to print anything but reports from official news agencies.

The students also complain about the president's failure to deliver economic growth and jobs. At last week's protest, which coincided with a now infamous Holocaust conference held by the Foreign Ministry, students chanted, "Forget the Holocaust — do something for us."

DOJ_NMG_0108144

A student who identified himself only as Ahmad, for fear of retribution, said: “A nuclear program is our right, but we fear that it will bring more damage than good.”

Another student said: “It is so hard and costly to come to this university, but I don’t see a bright future. Even if you are lucky enough to get a job, the pay would not be enough for you to pay your rent.”

Mr. Zamanian said that the protest had not been planned ahead of Mr. Ahmadinejad’s visit, but that students were further enraged when they saw supporters of the president being bused in.

Although the auditorium was almost filled with the president’s supporters by the time any students were let in, the protesters forced their way inside, chanted, “Death to the dictator,” and held banners calling him a “fascist president.” They also held up posters of the president with his picture upside down and set fire to three of them. Many of the students are now in hiding.

At one point, the head of a moderate student guild complained to Mr. Ahmadinejad that students were being expelled for political activities and given three stars next to their names in university records, barring them from re-entering. The president responded by ridiculing him, joking that the three stars made them sergeants in the army.

The president was eventually forced to cut his speech short and leave. But angry students stormed his car, kicking it and chanting slogans. His convoy of four cars collided several times as they tried to leave in a rush. Eventually the students were dispersed.

An entry on Mr. Ahmadinejad’s Web log, posted Wednesday, played down the scale and significance of the protest, writing that the president had a “good feeling when he saw a small group amid the dominant majority insulting him without any fear.”

A few days after the protest, former Amir Kabir students affiliated with the Islamic associations’ coordinating office wrote a letter to Mr. Ahmadinejad. In it, they turned down what they said was his invitation to share their problems with him, because they believed that he wanted to use the occasion to bolster his candidates in the local elections.

The students also wrote that the president had insulted their intelligence by talking to them in the same language he uses in remote villages on his provincial trips.

“You should know that what happened at Polytechnic University was the voice of universities and the real voice of the people,” they wrote. Tehran Polytechnic was the university’s name before the revolution.

Cleric's Star Rises In Iran After Vote (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, December 21, 2006

Elder statesman Hashemi Rafsanjani, a mercurial cleric who has played both sides of Iran's reformist-conservative divide, is rising again as a key challenger to Iran's president after local elections show deep discontent with the president's hard line.

Last week's elections for local councils in towns and cities across Iran were seen as a referendum on President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's 18 months in office, and results so far were showing widespread victories for his opponents.

Since taking power, Ahmadinejad has escalated Iran's confrontation with the United States and the West on multiple fronts, in particular drawing the threat of U.N. sanctions for pushing ahead with uranium enrichment in Iran's nuclear program. He has also sparked widespread international outrage for his comments against Israel and casting doubt on the Nazi Holocaust.

On Wednesday, a leading newspaper that usually reflects the thinking of many in Iran's conservative clerical leadership said in a blistering editorial that the election results showed it was time for Ahmadinejad to moderate his tone and concentrate on improving the ailing economy.

"The election could be very instructive to those who have been in power," the Jomhuri Eslami editorial said. "Arrogance, disregarding people's economic situation, insulting respected people and high-flying policies were among the elements of the failure of those who could not imagine such a failure."

Ahmadinejad, who has not commented on Friday's elections, felt the heat personally during a speech Tuesday in the western town of Kermanshah. During his address, some in the crowd chanted, "unemployment, unemployment, unemployment is a major problem," the pro-government daily Keyhan reported.

DOJ_NMG_0108145

The results showed a partial comeback for Iran's reformist movement, which was crushed over the past five years by hard-liners who drove them out of the local councils, parliament and the presidency. The reformers seek closer ties to the West — even the United States — and a loosening of the power of Iran's clerical rulers.

But the big winners were "moderate conservatives," who support the clerical regime but have become disillusioned by Ahmadinejad, saying he needlessly provokes the West, isolates Iran and ignores economic reform.

Many analysts were now predicting a coalition between reformers and moderate conservatives to oppose Ahmadinejad and his hard-line allies in parliament and presidential elections in 2009.

Talk of a political bloc was fueled after two top reformist politicians — former president Mohammad Khatami and Mehdi Karroubi — met on Sunday with Rafsanjani, a top moderate conservative.

Rafsanjani's status was boosted in a parallel election held Friday picking members of the Assembly of Experts, a body made up of 86 clerics that oversees Iran's supreme leader and picks his successor.

Rafsanjani won the most votes of any candidate in Tehran for the assembly — half a million more than his closest competitor — a strong show of support for Rafsanjani, who lost to Ahmadinejad in June 2005 presidential elections.

"The people's vote for Rafsanjani meant they hope he will create and improve the moderate line," said Amir Mohebbian, a political analyst and columnist in Resalat conservative daily.

Final results from the local council election in Tehran were expected on Thursday. The interior ministry said only a few thousand of the 1.9 million votes still remained to be tallied, blaming the delay on the large turnout and the simultaneous vote for the Experts Assembly.

But partial results showed Ahmadinejad's allies won only two seats on Tehran's 15-member council, one of them going to his sister, Parvin Ahmadinejad. Conservative moderates were on track to take eight seats, and reformers four. The last seat appeared set to go to an independent.

Final results were announced for the rest of the country and showed a heavy defeat for Ahmadinejad supporters. None of his candidates won seats on the councils in the cities of Shiraz, Bandar Abbas, Sari, Zanjan and Kerman. Many councils in other cities were divided along similar proportions as Tehran's.

The election does not directly effect Ahmadinejad's power. It chose 113,000 seats on councils that administer city affairs and pick mayors.

It was not clear whether Ahmadinejad will bow to pressure to at least change his tone, if not the substance, of his policies. The pro-government Keyhan called the election as a victory for Ahmadinejad — depicting all conservatives as his supporters — suggesting some in the hard-liner camp do not see it as a call for change.

But many see the vote as signs of an anti-Ahmadinejad moderate coalition rallying behind Rafsanjani.

The 72-year-old Rafsanjani — who served as president from 1989-1997 — has long been an elusive inside player in Iran's clerical leadership. He is mistrusted by reformists because of his closeness to supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei and by hard-liners because of his emphasis on pragmatism over ideology.

Rafsanjani has supported the Islamic republic's policy of shunning the United States, yet played a major role in the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal in which the U.S. sold arms to Iran in return for help in freeing hostages held in Lebanon. He also backs the line rejecting a suspension of Iran's uranium enrichment program, but has shown a willingness to compromise in backroom negotiations on the nuclear program.

Pro-reform students frequently jeered him in demonstrations in the past, and he suffered a humiliating defeat by reformists in 2000 parliament elections, when he failed to win a seat.

In the 2005 run-off presidential election, Rafsanjani was the more moderate candidate in the race against Ahmadinejad, but demoralized pro-reform voters failed to turn out in strength to support him.

But Khatami's meeting with him Sunday suggested reformers could turn to embrace him.

"People showed in the elections that they don't like hard-line policies," said Mohammad Atrianfar, a political activist and a leader of moderate Kargozaran Party. "From now on (Ahmadinejad's) hard-line current will lose its power and it will return to its place."

DOJ_NMG_0108146

U.S. Negotiator Notes An Improved Tone In Talks On North Korea (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 20 — The chief American negotiator at talks to address North Korea's nuclear program said Wednesday that the parties could reach a new agreement on rolling back North Korea's bomb-making effort this week, but the prospects for a meaningful breakthrough remained uncertain.

The chief negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, told reporters that the United States, North Korea and the four other countries participating in the Chinese-sponsored talks had begun discussing details of how to carry out a 2005 draft agreement on ending North Korea's nuclear program. He said the tenor of the often tortuous discussions had improved.

"The discussions for us have been very useful," said Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs. "Certainly we are talking about much more than just agreeing on things on paper. We're discussing actual developments on the ground, and for that reason these discussions are not easy."

The negotiations are part of a series of talks sponsored by China that have continued for more than three years and have failed to make tangible progress in slowing North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

On Oct. 9, North Korea exploded a nuclear device for the first time, prompting the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions. After a frenzied round of Chinese diplomacy, North Korea agreed to return to the six-nation talks for the first time in more than a year.

The talks opened on an unpromising note Monday, when the senior North Korean negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, declared that as a new nuclear power North Korea would engage only in "arms control" negotiations, implying that it had no intention of eliminating its nuclear program.

But during a series of one-on-one sessions on Tuesday and Wednesday, North Korea's attitude turned more pragmatic, Asian diplomats participating in the talks said, adding that concrete proposals for freezing North Korea's weapons program on the way to a broader accord were under active discussion.

Many analysts say that North Korea is not likely to give up its quest to become a full nuclear power and that any talks are merely a stalling tactic or an attempt to foster good will from China, its main aid supplier.

Others say that North Korea may at some point prove willing to make concessions on its nuclear program in exchange for a big aid program to bail out its closed, ailing economy.

Mr. Hill said he was pleasantly surprised that the talks had moved beyond posturing, and he raised the possibility that they could produce an agreement before the end of the current round this week.

"To be frank, Monday was kind of a difficult day, and the idea that I'd still be here Wednesday night telling you it was useful to continue — I frankly didn't think I would be saying that," he said.

He said China, as the host and mediator, had begun drafting the text of an accord that would commit the parties to concrete steps to carry out a vaguely worded 2005 agreement.

In September 2005, North Korea agreed to end its nuclear weapons program in exchange for security guarantees, diplomatic recognition and economic and energy aid from its neighbors and the United States.

The 2005 accord, though hailed as a breakthrough at the time, collapsed almost immediately after it was reached. North Korea publicly renounced the text.

"The whole purpose is to take the September agreement and start getting it implemented," Mr. Hill said of the current talks.

Faint Hopes Of Progress As NKorea Nuclear Talks Enter Fourth Day (AFP)

AFP, December 21, 2006

Six-nation talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear program have entered a fourth day amid a slightly warmer climate, with the US envoy saying negotiations were tough but offered a glimmer of hope.

The talks resumed on Monday after a 13-month break with North Korea, emboldened by its first-ever atomic test on October 9, outlining a long list of hardline demands to be met before it would even consider disarming.

DOJ_NMG_0108147

Delegates to the talks -- which involve the two Koreas, host China, the United States, Japan and Russia -- have said those demands are not acceptable and reported no breakthroughs this week.

However US envoy Christopher Hill said late Wednesday after a second straight day of direct talks with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-Gwan, that he had not given up hope of progress.

"The discussions are not easy -- actually, they are very difficult but we are encouraged by the process," Hill told reporters.

"I think discussions for us have been very useful in the last day and a half. Whether we are successful at the end of the week, I think time will tell."

Hill and the Chinese side have said they want North Korea to recommit to a six-party deal brokered in September last year in which it said it would give up its nuclear program in return for energy assistance and security guarantees.

Hill said Wednesday that was still the goal and that he hoped this could be achieved within one year.

But despite his cautiously upbeat comments, many analysts believe North Korea has no intention of surrendering its nuclear weapons, and it is using the six-party talks to give the impression of wanting to negotiate.

"The bomb is now a symbol of the legitimacy of Kim Jong-Il's regime," Scott Bruce, the program officer at the Nautilus Institute in Berkeley, which specializes in North Korean nuclear issues, told AFP at the start of the week.

"It will take a very large price for the North to trade it in... definitely a higher price than the United States is willing to pay right now."

Japan's chief envoy to the talks, Kenichiro Sasae, also offered a blunt assessment on Wednesday night of the likelihood of a major breakthrough in Beijing this week.

"Our basic stances remain far apart. At this point, I cannot say that the outlook is optimistic," Sasae said.

One of the top priorities for North Korea is the lifting of US sanctions imposed on Pyongyang late last year for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

The sanctions have seen bank accounts in Macau that are crucial to Pyongyang's ruling elite frozen, and North Korea has reiterated this week that it will not consider disarming until the financial curbs are removed.

Financial teams from the two nations met on Tuesday and Wednesday in Beijing on the sidelines of the six-party forum to discuss the standoff, but they finished without any agreement being reached.

The US chief negotiator to the sanctions talks, Daniel Glaser, told reporters late Wednesday only that the two sides may meet again in New York next month.

Glaser's confirmation that no breakthrough had been achieved on the sanctions dispute ensured that one of North Korea's key demands this week for disarming would not be met.

North Korean envoy Kim also said on Monday that United Nations sanctions imposed on his country following the atomic test must be lifted before it would consider surrendering its nuclear weapons.

Kim further demanded that North Korea be given help in building a nuclear reactor for power needs, and that the US policy of "hostility" towards it must be dropped.

North Korea Not Budging On Sanctions (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, December 21, 2006

North Korea is refusing to back down from its demand at international arms talks that U.S. financial restrictions be lifted before it dismantles its nuclear program, delegates said Wednesday.

North Korea agreed to end a 13-month boycott of the talks — which also include China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the U.S. — to discuss a Washington campaign seeking to isolate the communist nation from the international banking system. The U.S. alleges the North is involved in a range of illegal activity, including counterfeiting $100 bills and money laundering.

U.S. and North Korean experts discussed the U.S. financial restrictions for five hours Wednesday, their second day of meetings this week that are separate from the arms talks, but made no breakthroughs and planned no further meetings.

Daniel Glaser, the Treasury Department's deputy assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes who is leading the U.S. delegation, said the talks at the North Korean Embassy were "businesslike and useful."

DOJ_NMG_0108148

Glaser said he would possibly meet the North Koreans next month in New York.

"For this process moving forward to be productive and useful, it's going to have to start focusing very, very closely on the underlying concerns of illicit finance," he told reporters. "We hope to get to do that."

The separate, six-nation nuclear talks are to continue until at least Friday, but negotiators said that does not mean results are guaranteed by then.

"The financial issues are a major interest for North Korea," Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae said after the third day of discussions in Beijing.

Sasae pleaded with the North to put aside that issue at the nuclear talks.

"I think it is not realistic to treat the financial issue as a major block while putting the broader discussion on hold," Sasae said.

However, the North said it would be willing to halt operation of its main nuclear reactor and allow international inspectors "under the right conditions," a South Korean official said on condition of anonymity due to the ongoing negotiations

"We are focusing our discussion on what those conditions would be," he said.

Negotiators were addressing the implementation of a September 2005 agreement where the North pledged to abandon its nuclear weapons in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

"Whether we can start implementing the agreement this week, time will tell," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday evening.

He said the talks focused on specific steps toward the North's disarmament that the U.S. hoped would happen in a timeframe "a lot shorter than a year."

The North Koreans appeared interested and there were many questions between the sides, Hill said.

Hill declined to release details of U.S. proposals to North Korea, but a news report Wednesday said the Americans had outlined a process in which the North would first freeze its nuclear program, followed by inspections and eventual dismantlement.

Washington would be willing to give the North a written security guarantee — a pledge that it would not seek to topple the regime by force — as soon as the North allows the return of international nuclear inspectors, South Korea's Yonhap news agency said, citing "diplomatic sources" at the talks.

"We cannot be just optimistic about the situation since this round of talks opened after many difficulties," South Korea's main envoy Chun Yung-woo said, referring to the long break, the North's nuclear test and U.N. sanctions.

North Korea's state media kept up its tough rhetoric against Washington, saying U.S.-South Korean military preparations showed "the United States is trying to pull a dirty business against the (North) behind the curtain of talks."

"This is clear proof that it is seeking to vanquish (North Korea) with a military strong arm, whetting its sword of aggression under the mask of dialogue," the North's Communist Party newspaper Rodong Sinmun said in a commentary carried by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

U.S. Nuke Envoy Hopes Japan-N.Korea Meet (AP)

By Mari Yamaguchi

AP, December 21, 2006

The top U.S. envoy to the North Korean nuclear talks expressed hope Wednesday that Japan and North Korea would meet on the sidelines of the six-nation negotiations to discuss normalizing their relations.

Japan is the only participating nation that has not met separately with North Korean delegates since the talks resumed Monday in Beijing after a 13-month hiatus.

While the thrust is to dismantle the North's nuclear weapons program, the talks are also about improving diplomatic ties between the nations, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said.

"The normalization process depends on the discussion of ongoing issues and clearly the Japanese have some issues that need to be addressed," Hill told reporters.

"It's our hope that there can be a bilateral meeting between the DPRK and the Japanese aiming at these issues," he said. DPRK stands for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

DOJ_NMG_0108149

Hill did not specify the issues to be resolved between Tokyo and Pyongyang, but Japanese leaders have been demanding more information about Japanese citizens abducted by North Korea decades ago.

The North has acknowledged kidnapping 13 Japanese citizens in the 1970s and 1980s to tutor its spies in Japanese language and culture. Pyongyang allowed five to return home and says the others are dead. It has refused to respond to demands for more information.

Japan's top envoy Kenichiro Sasae said Wednesday that "Japan has always kept its door open for dialogue," indicating that Japan planned to wait for North Korea to make an approach.

China is hosting the talks, which also involve South Korea and Russia.

Somali Government, Islamic Militias Agree To Resume Peace Talks (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

NAIROBI, Dec. 20 -- Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts and the country's transitional government agreed Wednesday to resume peace talks without any preconditions, as fighting broke out between the two sides.

"The mission can be considered a full success," a European Union envoy, Louis Michel, said at a news conference in Nairobi. " . . . There was a broad agreement to de-escalate and refrain from hostile acts. . . . There are still issues that will have to be resolved. But I'm convinced of the sincerity of both parties to go forward."

While Michel discussed peace with their leaders, Islamic Courts militias and the Ethiopian-backed transitional government fought with rockets and heavy weapons in towns just southeast and southwest of Baidoa, the town where the government is based.

Michel said he had "noted" the fighting. "I'm in favor of the optimism of the will, and not the pessimism of reality," he said.

No place or date has been set for the talks, which would be a resumption of negotiations held in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, that fell apart after each side accused the other of violating agreements. Michel said Wednesday that both sides had "reaffirmed previous commitments" made in Khartoum.

The United States and Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi expressed support for the agreement, Michel said, adding that it offered an opportunity to avert a conflict that he and other diplomats say could spill across the Horn of Africa.

Ethiopia is estimated to have at least 8,000 troops in Somalia to protect the fragile transitional government, which it considers a buffer against an Islamic movement that has taken control over most of southern Somalia, including the capital, Mogadishu.

A recent U.N. report found that the Islamic movement has received arms from Eritrea, among other countries.

Michel said no agreement had been made on withdrawing the Ethiopian troops, a primary demand of the Islamic movement, which considers Ethiopia a U.S.-backed invading force.

The Ethiopian government has repeatedly denied having more than a few hundred military trainers in Somalia and accuses the Islamic Courts of backing secessionist groups in the ethnically Somali region of Ethiopia. Both the United States and Ethiopia accuse the Islamic Courts of harboring terrorists, a charge the movement has denied.

Initially a grouping of local clerics, the Islamic Courts came to power this year by defeating U.S.-backed warlords who marketed themselves as an "anti-terrorism" coalition but who mostly terrorized a Somali population that came to despise them.

Beleaguered Somalis embraced the Islamic Courts movement, which has created a semblance of order based on Islamic law in a country of warring clans that has been without a central government since 1991.

Somalia has historically been strategically important to the United States because of its proximity to the Middle East and lucrative Red Sea shipping lanes. But U.S. policy there, driven mostly by fears that Somalia could become an Afghanistan in the Horn of Africa, has been widely viewed as a failure.

The Islamic Court's foreign minister, Ibrahim Hassan Addou, accused the U.S. State Department on Wednesday of exacerbating the situation rather than trying to understand it. The Islamic Courts believe that the United States has given Ethiopia approval to launch an offensive in Somalia, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108150

"They could send a fact-finding mission, talk to leaders," Addou said in an interview from Dubai, United Arab Emirates. "But the U.S. has never bothered. . . . What the U.S. has been doing is intimidation and threats."

Addou praised European Union officials, who flew to Somalia on Wednesday in a delegation that included officials from the Arab League and the Kenyan ambassador to Somalia.

Michel met with the leaders of the transitional government in Baidoa, then jetted to Mogadishu, where he met with an Islamic Courts delegation that included Hassan Dahir Aweys, a top leader.

Aweys is on the State Department's terrorism list because he headed a group, now disbanded, that allegedly had connections with al-Qaeda in the 1990s and was linked to the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Analysts differ on whether he is genuinely striving for legitimacy or simply using negotiations to buy time to advance the Courts' control.

After having a "frank" and "tough" meeting with Aweys, Michel said he shared the former analysis.

"I had the perception that there is a strong goodwill in the ICU to resolve this by a political agreement," he said, referring to the Islamic movement, also known as the Islamic Courts Union. "Maybe I'm wrong, but this is my feeling."

Somalis Agree To Peace Talks Despite Clashes (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

A powerful Somali Islamic group and the transitional government on Wednesday agreed to resume peace talks, hours after fresh clashes had broken out between the two groups in central Somalia.

The fighting, which occurred about 15km from the town of Baidoa, the government's seat, had erupted as Louis Michel, the European commissioner for development and aid, visited Somalia to meet officials from both sides and push for a peaceful resolution to the crisis.

While in Mogadishu, the capital, Mr Michel announced the parties had agreed to resume talks in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum. Previous rounds of negotiations have made little progress, but the peace process is deemed crucial to avoiding all-out war in Somalia amid fears this could develop into a regional conflict. No date was given for the talks.

It was unclear how serious the latest fighting was. It followed a period when rhetoric from both the government and the Islamic movement had appeared to be toned down.

The two factions have been at loggerheads since the Islamists, an alliance of Islamic courts, seized Mogadishu from a group of US-backed warlords in June. The alliance has since spread its influence throughout much of southern Somalia, which has been without an effective central government and beset by violence since 1991.

The transitional administration, which is weak and plagued by divisions, has little influence outside Baidoa. But it is internationally recognised and has backing from Ethiopia, which is reported to have several thousand soldiers inside Somalia.

Fears have been mounting for months that the fighting could suck in neighbouring countries. Both Eritrea and Ethiopia have been accused of using Somalia as a proxy for their own border dispute.

However, there have been few big direct clashes between the Somali parties, both of which include hardliners and moderates with differing agendas, analysts say.

"There is still space for diplomacy to work, but something has to give soon. The standoff is unsustainable," said Matt Bryden, a Somalia expert. "The military deployments on both sides are too large and too costly to be sustained indefinitely. They are either going to have to fight or start standing down."

Still, diplomats and analysts say it would serve neither side to push for a military solution, which could lead to a protracted guerrilla war and mean international isolation for the Islamic courts.

Earlier this month the United Nations Security Council passed a US-drafted resolution that authorised the deployment of a regional peacekeeping force in Somalia. The mission, if it were to materialise, would ring-fence the government in Baidoa and be used to train the administration's forces.

DOJ_NMG_0108151

But it is unclear who would finance the mission or send troops, with neighbouring countries divided on the issue. There are also concerns that foreign intervention would exacerbate the situation and be seen as a proxy for US interests. Washington, which has a dire track record in Somalia, has accused the Islamists of containing and sheltering al-Qaida suspects.

"The UN Security Council resolution and US diplomacy have probably created a sense of urgency on the side of the courts who think maybe the US will weigh in on the side of Ethiopia and a regional force could be deployed to support the transitional government," Mr Bryden said.

Diplomat Pushes Peace Talks In Somalia (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, December 21, 2006

Somali fighters clashed with artillery, rocket-propelled grenades and anti-aircraft guns Wednesday, even as a European diplomat persuaded both the government and a rival Islamic movement to resume peace talks.

The heavy fighting outside the only town the government controls dragged on into the evening and underlined the difficulties of securing peace in this desperately poor country in the Horn of Africa.

European Union envoy Louis Michel said such skirmishes were likely to continue for now even though both sides had agreed to ease tensions and were committed to negotiations.

The talks will be held in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital where several rounds of talks have already been held. No date was given.

Somalia's Foreign Minister Ismail Hurre said that while the government seeks a peaceful settlement, it did not believe the Islamic Courts movement does.

Leaders of the Islamic movement said they were willing to attend discussions without conditions. Islamic leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys played down the significance of Wednesday's fighting.

The comments marked a shift in the position of Islamic movement leaders, who previously said they would not attend talks until Ethiopia withdrew its military support for the Somalian government.

Michel, speaking to reporters in neighboring Kenya after a day of diplomacy in Somalia, said he believed both hard liners and moderates in the Islamic movement backed Wednesday's agreement.

The diplomat said that the current conflict in Somalia is being driven by outside forces. In response to a question about Eritrea and Ethiopia, two neighboring states with a history of hostility toward each other, Michel said: "Somalia is suffering because some are using Somalia as a battlefield for other issues."

As many as 8,000 Ethiopian troops may be in Somalia supporting its government, United Nations officials say. Eritrea, the U.N. says, has deployed 2,000 troops in support of the Islamic group. Both countries deny these assertions.

Michel spoke Tuesday to Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who expressed support for the EU peace initiative. But the diplomat did not provide other details of their conversation.

Clashes first erupted Wednesday nine miles from the government garrison town of Baidoa, where the EU envoy was meeting with Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi and President Abdullahi Yusuf.

Mohamed Abdullahi Hassan, a Baidoa resident reached by telephone late Wednesday, said the fighting intensified after dark. He said he could hear mortars being fired on the outskirts of town. During a visit to the Baidoa hospital, he said he counted seven government soldiers killed and 18 injured.

The clashes occurred one day after a deadline set by the Islamic group for the withdrawal of Ethiopian troops. The religious movement's fighters had threatened a major attack if Ethiopian forces did not leave Somalia.

As the fighting began, several hundred Ethiopian troops boarded 13 military trucks and — with artillery support — were dispatched to reinforce government troops on the eastern side of the city. The information came from a government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

Somalia's internationally recognized central government holds only a small area around the central town of Baidoa, about 140 miles northwest of the capital of Mogadishu. The Islamic militiamen, meanwhile, control Mogadishu along with most of southern Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0108152

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991. The country's secular interim government, set up in 2004 and backed by the U.N., has rejected religious rule. Muslim leaders have insisted on an Islamic government.

The international community is concerned about the Islamic movement's alleged ties to terror groups, something Islamic leaders have repeatedly denied.

Jendayi Frazer, the top U.S. diplomat for Africa, has said al-Qaida militants are operating with "great comfort" in Somalia, providing training and assistance to the Islamic militia.

Somali and Ethiopian officials allege that men wanted in connection with the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania now hold senior command positions within the Islamic forces.

Somalia's deputy defense minister Salad Ali Jelle told reporters Wednesday that one of the embassy bombing suspects, Abu Talha al Sudani, had led Islamic militiamen in a battle with government troops Tuesday near Idale, 37 miles southwest of Baidoa. Ten people were killed.

Fears of a full-blown civil war have intensified in recent weeks. Both sides have moved fighters, fuel and ammunition to the front lines.

Clashes Raise Fears Of Civil War In Somalia (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — Clashes between Islamic fighters and Ethiopian-backed government soldiers heightened fears Wednesday that Somalia is inching toward a civil war that could drag in the entire Horn of Africa.

As international negotiators worked furiously to resolve the dispute, armed battles around Somalia's transitional capital of Baidoa killed at least one government soldier, according to Somali officials.

Islamic leaders, who seized control of Mogadishu, the traditional capital, and much of southern Somalia from warlords this summer, are calling for a "holy war" against Christian-dominated Ethiopia unless the neighboring nation withdraws its troops, which were sent across the border to prop up Somalia's weak transitional government.

Both sides have been massing weapons and troops in strategic points around southern Somalia in recent weeks.

It remained unclear who started Wednesday's fighting, but officials said skirmishes were ignited by a gunfight between two rival reconnaissance missions in the town of Idale, about 40 miles southwest of Baidoa, where Somalia's transitional government is based. Fighting spread to two other areas.

"We captured two technical vehicles [converted 4x4s with mounted heavy guns], killed nine soldiers from their side and have prisoners in hand," said Mohammed Ibrahim Bilal, a senior Islamist military official, speaking via telephone from the front line. "In the coming hours, Baidoa will be under our control. We will clean Ethiopians from our soil."

The transitional government's assistant defense minister, Salad Ali Jelle, said only one of his forces' soldiers was killed.

Islamic Courts Union leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys shed his usual religious robes for military fatigues Wednesday and spent much of the day monitoring the fighting, witnesses said. But by Wednesday evening, after meeting with European Union negotiators, he downplayed the skirmishes.

"The war has not started," he told reporters. "Fighting is happening, but it is not between Islamic courts and the government. It's between Islamic courts and Ethiopian invaders."

The Islamic Courts Union is an alliance of religious leaders and their militias that formed to restore order to Somalia. The country has been beset with internecine fighting between warlords since the 1991 collapse of the Mohamed Siad Barre regime, the country's last functioning government.

European Union Development Commissioner Louis Michel flew to Somalia on Wednesday to meet separately with leaders from the Islamic Courts Union and the transitional government, urging them to participate in a fourth round of peace talks, which are being mediated by the Arab League in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital.

At a news conference in Mogadishu, Michel announced that both sides had agreed to pursue mediation rather than war. Michel called the agreement a "breakthrough…. I believe that there is a chance to be able to relaunch the political dialogue."

DOJ_NMG_0108153

Experts nevertheless warn that renewed war in Somalia remains a risk and fighting could draw in its neighbors, including Eritrea and Kenya. A recent U.N.-commissioned study said that numerous nations already were sending fighters and guns to fuel the conflict.

"Everyone who knows something about Somalia knows that a real fight could easily spread to the region," said Mario Raffaelli, Italy's special envoy for Somalia.

Ethiopian and U.S. officials accuse the Islamists in Somalia of having links to terrorism and say the courts union seeks to install a Taliban-style regime. In her most blunt assessment yet, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi E. Frazer last week accused the Islamic union of being controlled by "East Africa Al Qaeda cell individuals."

Islamists dismiss such allegations as Western propaganda, though some concede that the union is struggling to strike a balance between its moderate and fundamentalist factions. One extremist sect is accused of masterminding the September killing of an Italian nun in Mogadishu.

Though Islamist leaders in Mogadishu have won praise from residents for restoring peace and order to the city, the rise of the courts union has stirred anxiety in neighboring Ethiopia. Somalia and Ethiopia have repeatedly gone to war over the years, often over a contested swath of land known as the Ogaden, in eastern Ethiopia. Some Somalis have made no secret of their desire to create a "Greater Somalia," including parts of current-day Ethiopia and Kenya.

In the 1990s, Aweys helped run an Islamic network in Somalia known as Itihaad al Islamiya, which was responsible for several terrorist bombings in Ethiopia.

The United States has taken a largely hands-off policy toward Somalia since 1993, when 18 American servicemen were killed during a failed raid in Mogadishu later chronicled in the book and film "Black Hawk Down." In recent years, however, the U.S. government began quietly funding some warlords as part of the war on terror. Earlier this year, U.S.-backed warlords were chased out of Mogadishu by Islamic soldiers.

Saudi Arabia Set To Name Jubeir As Ambassador (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Saudi Arabia has informed the State Department that it intends to appoint Adel al-Jubeir as the new ambassador to Washington, according to U.S. officials. Jubeir, who is one of King Abdullah's closest foreign policy advisers, has long been the public face of the oil-rich kingdom in the West.

Jubeir is a well-known figure in Washington who was put out front by the kingdom in an effort to dissociate the Saudi royal family from the Islamic extremism of al-Qaeda after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks by Saudi militant Osama bin Laden. He has often had to defend against tough criticism of one of the world's most autocratic governments.

On CNN "Late Edition" last year, Jubeir disputed reports that bin Laden is still widely popular in the kingdom. "You can talk to radicals in Europe and they'll tell you that their agenda is very popular with the masses when, in fact, it's not," he said. "If Osama bin Laden or al-Qaeda in Saudi Arabia were popular, we would see an increase in recruitment, not a decrease. We would see an increase in their ability to do damage, not a decrease. . . . We are winning the war on terrorism. It will take time, though."

In 2004, when then-Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah said that "Zionist hands" were "95 percent" behind recent terrorist attacks, Jubeir was again dispatched to defuse criticism in the United States. U.S. officials linked al-Qaeda sympathizers with the incidents.

"Bin Laden wants to destroy the Saudi government," Jubeir said, again on CNN. "So you should understand . . . that those who are most critical of Saudi Arabia in a very hostile way in the United States, as well as in Israel, share the same objective as Osama bin Laden and those who committed these acts."

The impending appointment represents a meteoric rise in Saudi diplomacy for a man who last served in Washington as special assistant to Prince Bandar bin Sultan, now the Saudi national security adviser. Jubeir will step in to replace Prince Turki al-Faisal, who quit this month after only 15 months on the job.

DOJ_NMG_0108154

The highly sensitive appointment has been shrouded in secrecy. The typed letter delivered to the State Department Friday left blank the name of the ambassador-designate, which was written in by the Saudi envoy shortly before he delivered it, according to well-informed sources who requested anonymity because no announcement has been made.

Jubeir, 44, attended the University of North Texas and Georgetown University. Bandar plucked him from graduate school to help him at the Saudi embassy. He once was featured in U.S. gossip columns for dating NBC news anchor Campbell Brown.

US Deeply Concerned Over Darfur After Visit By Bush Envoy (AFP)

AFP, December 21, 2006

The crisis in Sudan's Darfur region remains an issue of "deep concern" to the United States following a visit to Khartoum last week by a top US envoy, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice called again on Sudan to drop its objections to deployment of a hybrid African-UN peacekeeping force to halt resurgent violence against civilians in the war-torn region.

"It is extremely important (to deploy) a robust peacekeeping force that can actually help to end the violence and bring relief to the many innocent men, women and children who are suffering in Sudan," Rice said.

"This is an issue of deep concern to the United States and deep concern to the president of the United States," Rice said following a meeting with Andrew Natsios, President George W. Bush's personal envoy to Sudan.

Natsios met with Sudanese President Omar al-Beshir and other leaders in Khartoum last week but failed to gain their agreement to comply with a deal brokered last month by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to deploy some 20,000 UN-led peacekeepers to Darfur.

With violence against civilians again on the rise in Darfur, largely blamed on Arab militia allied to Beshir's government, US officials last week warned that tougher measures -- including enforcement of a no-fly zone over the region -- could be taken.

Rice said Natsios had "moved the ball forward" by reassuring Khartoum, via a statement issued Tuesday by the current president of the UN Security Council, that Washington and its partners remained committed to the peacekeeping plan rather than coercive options.

"Now we expect the government of Khartoum to respond positively to that action in the UN," Rice said.

The UN estimates that more than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million been displaced in Darfur since early 2003 when the region's ethnic African population revolted against the Arab-led government in Khartoum.

The hybrid peacekeeping force would replace an underfunded 7,000-strong African Union mission which has failed to end the violence.

Beshir has consistently rejected any UN troop presence in Darfur, accusing the West of seeking to partition his country.

U.S. Warns Sudan Of Possible Action (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, December 21, 2006

Sudan must open a path toward ending the Darfur crisis before the end of the year or the international community will take coercive action against the Islamic government, a top U.S. diplomat said Wednesday.

Andrew Natsios, special White House envoy to Sudan, said international patience is running out on Sudan almost four years deep into Darfur's humanitarian disaster.

But he declined to say what options are being considered. "It's not useful to make threats," said Natsios, briefing reporters. British officials have said that creation of a no-fly zone over Darfur is one option being considered.

Natsios said there have been so many threats against the Sudanese government to bring peace to Darfur that it no longer takes them seriously.

"None of the threats have been carried out. I think we should stop making threats," said Natsios, who met with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in Khartoum last week.

Hundreds of thousands of Darfurians have died and an estimated 2.5 million driven from their homes since early 2003.

A 7,000-member African Union force has not brought stability to Darfur. That has prompted proposals for a hybrid mission totaling some 20,000 troops from the African Union and the U.N. Sudan has been unwilling to go along.

DOJ_NMG_0108155

To avoid a crisis with the international community, Natsios said, Bashir must allow 60 U.N. troops and civilians stationed in Khartoum to be transported with their equipment to Darfur by the end of the year. Until now, he has forbidden a U.N. military presence in the area.

Another requirement, he said, is Bashir's approval of the combined U.N.-African Union peacekeeping proposal, which would be carried out over three phases. The proposal is spelled out in a letter U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan has sent to Bashir. A top aide to Annan will remain in Khartoum until Bashir responds, Natsios said.

Earlier Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Natsios and said afterward she expects the Sudanese government to respond positively to the proposal for a hybrid force.

It is "extremely important that a robust security force, a robust peacekeeping force" be created," Rice said.

A no-fly zone would be designed to prevent Sudanese military aircraft from continuing to assist government-backed Arab militias, believed to be responsible for most of the atrocities in Darfur. Another option is imposing an asset freeze and a travel ban on Sudanese officials who have abetted the abuses in Darfur.

Sudan Given January 1 Deadline To Accept Darfur Peacekeepers (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, December 21, 2006

A senior US official warned that Sudan faces a January 1 deadline to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers to Darfur or face coercive international action to halt violence in the region.

US Presidential envoy Andrew Natsios said he told Sudanese leaders in Khartoum last week they must allow an initial group of 60 UN peacekeeping staff currently "marooned" in the Sudanese capital to deploy to Darfur by year's end.

The also must "accept in writing" a plan put forward last month by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to place 20,000 UN-led troops in Darfur to halt violence which has left more than 200,000 people dead and 2.5 million displaced over the past four years.

"I have said publicly that I think making threats is not very useful, but we are going to take a different approach to this in January and there is a plan to do that," Natsios said.

"For us to continue on the process of quiet diplomacy, negotiation and a process to resolve Darfur, then we need progress that's operational, on the ground, in Darfur ... by the end of the year," he said.

Natsios refused to provide details of what he described as "Plan B" if Sudan persists in rejecting the UN deployment, saying it was classified.

But US officials confirmed last week that enforcing a no-fly zone over Darfur, imposing sanctions on Sudan and backing prosecution of some Khartoum officials for crimes against humanity were among available options.

Natsios said the "Plan B" had been discussed with key partners dealing with the crisis, which include the European Union, China and the Arab League.

"We have a consensus that action is going to be taken," he said.

The international community is also seeking to obtain a "humanitarian ceasefire" in fighting between government forces and Darfur rebels over the next 10 days to allow a resumption of aid shipments to camps housing tens of thousands of displaced people, he said.

Natsios spoke to reporters after meeting Wednesday with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and a half-dozen of her top policy advisors on the Darfur crisis.

Rice expressed her "deep concern" with the ongoing violence in Darfur, where government forces recently launched a new offensive against ethnic African rebels seeking greater autonomy from the Arab-led administration in Khartoum.

The government and one of three main rebel factions signed a much-heralded peace agreement earlier this year, but the pact failed to halt the bloodshed.

The UN Security Council then adopted a resolution in July demanding the deployment of 20,000 blue-helmeted peacekeepers to replace an under-funded and ineffective African Union force of 7,000.

DOJ_NMG_0108156

The government of President Omar al-Beshir rejected the plan, which he called a Western bid to partition his oil-rich country.

A compromise deal brokered by Annan last month called for the three-phased deployment of a hybrid force made up primarily of African troops but with UN command and logistics support.

While the Sudanese agreed to the plan in principle, Beshir later balked at allowing UN troops into the region, stranding 60 UN military advisors and civilian logistics experts in Khartoum.

Natsios said Wednesday that in order to avoid tougher international action, Khartoum had to let the 60 UN staff and their equipment into Darfur over the next 10 days and definitively accept the rest of the Annan plan.

A senior UN envoy, Ahmadou Ould Abdallah, arrived in Khartoum Wednesday with a letter from Annan laying out the world body's demands and will remain in Sudan until he obtains Beshir's written reply, he said.

During his week of talks in Khartoum, Natsios said the only assurance he received from the Sudanese was that they would "try very hard" to change their policy on rejecting UN troops.

Natsios also said China, which buys most of Sudan's oil and has resisted pressuring Khartoum in the past, was playing a "very helpful role" in the effort to resolve the Darfur crisis.

U.S. Gives Deadline Over Darfur (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

The United States has given Sudan until the end of the year to accept a three-stage U.N. proposal for an international peacekeeping force in Darfur before resorting to a harsher "Plan B," a senior U.S. envoy said yesterday.

The envoy, Andrew S. Natsios, declined to disclose details of the plan, saying it was classified. But diplomats say that a humanitarian corridor and a no-fly zone over Darfur are some of the measures being considered.

"Making threats is not very useful, but we are going to take a different approach to this in January, and there is a plan to do that," Mr. Natsios told reporters at the State Department after briefing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his trip to Sudan last week.

"For us to continue on the process of quiet diplomacy, negotiation and a process to resolve Darfur, then we need progress that's operational, on the ground in Darfur... by the end of the year," he said.

Mr. Natsios also said the Bush administration has been working closely with European allies on the fallback plan, although Arab and African countries have yet to be brought on board.

Many Arab governments back U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's proposal for a three-stage deployment of a 20,000-strong "hybrid" peacekeeping force that includes troops from the United Nations and African Union, he said.

Mr. Annan sent an envoy to Khartoum yesterday with a letter outlining the stages, and Mr. Natsios said Washington needs an official, written response from the Sudanese government.

The first phase calls for a team of about 100 U.N. military advisers and civilian logistics staff, about 60 of whom are stuck in Khartoum, awaiting permission to go to Darfur. In the second stage, 2,000 troops would be deployed, with the remaining troops arriving in the third phase.

Mr. Annan's proposal is a compromise after Khartoum's rejection of a July resolution by the U.N. Security Council calling for a U.N. force to take over from a largely ineffective AU force.

"It is extremely important [to deploy] a robust peacekeeping force that can actually help to end the violence and bring relief to the many innocent men, women and children who are suffering in Sudan," Miss Rice said yesterday.

The Darfur conflict between mostly non-Arab rebels and government-sponsored militias, which Washington has called genocide, began in 2003. The International Criminal Court is investigating possible war crimes in the region, where analysts estimate that 200,000 have been killed and more than 2 million displaced.

Recent attacks on Darfur aid workers' compounds in the town of Gereida have forced the evacuation of 71 staff members and severely restricted humanitarian aid reaching the region's largest population of war victims, officials said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0108157

About 20 armed men attacked the South Darfur town on Monday night, seizing a dozen vehicles and communications equipment and almost paralyzing aid operations, according to wire service reports.

"It's massive and hugely destructive and has severely disrupted aid operations," said Alun McDonald, spokesman for the British aid organization Oxfam, which had five vehicles stolen and whose compound was fired on during the attack.

US Hits At EU Emissions Plan For Airlines (FT)

By Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

The US on Wednesday condemned as illegal plans to include all airlines flying to and from the European Union in the bloc's greenhouse gas trading scheme from 2012.

"The inclusion of non-EU airlines on a non-consensual basis runs counter to EU member states' legal obligations under the Chicago convention...and their bilateral air transport agreements, including with the US," a government spokesman said.

The European Commission had taken the decision "despite strong objections raised by the US and many other countries," he added. It proposed to "circumvent the appropriate multilateral body", the United Nations-run International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO). The US called on the EU's 25 member states to block the proposal, saying that it jeopardised international efforts to tackle the effect of air travel on global warming. It could use a dispute procedure in the 1944 Chicago convention, Washington said.

Stavros Dimas, environment commissioner, stood firm. He said the scheme was legally watertight and that the ICAO, which is expected to produced guidelines on fighting climate change next year, would not act without a firm lead.

Mr Dimas said flights wholly within the EU would be included within the bloc's greenhouse gas trading scheme from 2011, with all flights arriving and departing from the EU being covered a year later. He admitted the fast rate of air travel growth would hardly slow as green groups attacked the plans as too weak.

The European parliament, as well as national governments, must approve the plans. Caroline Lucas, an MEP who drafted a report on the subject that was approved in July, said it was a "wasted opportunity".

Her report noted that airline emissions were up to four times more damaging because they were produced high in the atmosphere. Allowing them to buy cheap permits from other industries would diminish the impact of the scheme.

Mr Dimas's plans to auction 10 per cent of the permits were amended to avoid legal challenges. Instead, the average figure from the 25- member state national allocation plans for industry would be used, which is just under 3 per cent. The rest will be given away based on historic emissions between 2004-6. The World Wildlife Fund estimates the industry could make €3.5bn ($4.6bn, £2.3bn) a year in windfall profits by passing on the perceived costs to customers.

The airline industry welcomed the market-based scheme but said other measures such as a single air traffic control space in the EU would be more useful in cutting emissions.

Europe Acts To Penalize Jet Pollution (NYT)

By James Kanter

New York Times, December 21, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 20 — In the face of stiff opposition from the airline industry, the European Union moved forward Wednesday with plans to impose extra charges on foreign and domestic carriers that pollute too much.

"We are showing our determination to fight climate change," said Europe's environment commissioner, Stavros Dimas, who announced the proposal Wednesday in Brussels. "This is one way to persuade other countries to come along with us."

The rules, which would be legally binding, would apply to all flights within the bloc starting in 2011. Foreign carriers landing and taking off from busy airports like those in Frankfurt, London and Paris would be obliged to join the system the following year. If enacted, the measure could drive up costs for airlines, potentially leading to higher airfares for travelers.

The proposal draws from the principles of an established system that Europe now uses to help combat global warming and meet emissions goals set forth under the Kyoto Protocol.

Under that plan, which has so far exempted airlines, governments set goals for the carbon dioxide emissions of producers of power, cement, fuels, pulp and paper. If they exceed those goals, companies must purchase allocations, or credits. Many airlines, supported by the United States government, are seeking to blunt the European plans, calling them expensive and unworkable. They want the International Civil Aviation Organization, a United Nations agency, to draw up any rules for emissions trading so that all countries comply.

DOJ_NMG_0108158

Giovanni Bisignani, director general of the International Air Transport Association, a group that includes most of the world's airlines, said Wednesday that he would continue to seek changes before the plan was approved by European Union governments and the European Parliament, a process that is likely to take years.

"We are concerned about the legal implications of applying the scheme outside Europe from 2012," Mr. Bisignani said. "We must have a global approach for a global problem."

Mr. Dimas maintained that his plans were legal, and he encouraged governments and airlines to speed efforts to reach a global accord to cap emissions, rather than block European efforts.

Peter Lockley, a policy analyst at the Aviation Environment Federation in London, praised Mr. Dimas for "standing up to pressure from the U.S. and certain sections of the aviation industry" by including all flights landing at and taking off from European airports.

But Mr. Lockley criticized plans to give airlines most of their pollution credits free, rather than through more extensive auctions. Mr. Lockley also said that airlines, like other heavy polluters in Europe, should be required to reduce their emissions from 1990 levels, rather than from present levels.

Officials from the International Air Transport Association acknowledged that they had already won concessions from Europe in recent weeks, including a delay in specific plans to regulate nitrogen oxide, another pollutant emitted by aircraft engines.

British Airways said the planned legislation would "now treat aviation more similarly to other industries." But Lufthansa, a German carrier, sharply criticized the plan, saying that more rapid action to streamline air traffic control and reduce flight detours and holding patterns would be far more effective at cutting emissions.

The proposals "would tie up resources and capital by bureaucracy," Lufthansa said, warning that "important investments in environmentally friendly technologies would have to be postponed." Lufthansa is more dependent for overall sales than British Airways on flights that take off and land in the European Union.

The international air transport group said that Europe's proposal could still cost airlines globally up to 2.9 billion euros ($3.8 billion) a year to buy allowances starting in 2012, when the rules are expected to cover all flights in and out of the union.

But European officials said that airlines should be able to pass much of the extra costs on to passengers, who would face increases in ticket prices of $2 to $12 for a trip within the European Union over the next decade. Officials said a return flight to New York might cost an additional $10 to more than $50, depending on how much individual airlines would have to pay for extra carbon allowances.

Fliers Could See Fares Rise When EU Pollution Allowances Begin (AP)

By Aoife White

AP, December 21, 2006

BRUSSELS — Airlines that fly within the European Union will have to trade pollution allowances beginning in 2011, the European Commission said Wednesday, which could see travelers pay more for popular short-break trips.

Expanded rules covering all airlines that fly into the EU will take effect the next year, a move that would hit U.S. airlines on their lucrative trans-Atlantic routes.

Airlines are generally in favor of the plan, since EU officials had warned them that refusing to back a carbon emissions trading program would result in an aviation tax.

But the Commission urged the airline industry to cut down on releasing the greenhouse gas that causes climate change.

"EU emissions from international air transport are increasing faster than from any other sector," it said. "This growth threatens to undermine the EU's progress in cutting overall greenhouse gas emissions."

DOJ_NMG_0108159

The plan could add between 1.80 euros and 9 euros (about $2.40 to $11.80) to a typical return flight within Europe with higher price hikes for long-haul trips. The Commission said this would be "significantly lower" than recent oil price increases passed on to air travelers.

Bowing to pressure from trade partners, the EU's executive arm will give all flights to and from EU airports an extra year to join the program.

All airlines — based in the EU or elsewhere — will have to trade emissions beginning in 2012 for all flights to and from European airports, it said.

The plan is compatible with international rules, EU Environment Commissioner Stavros Dimas said, adding that he did not believe U.S. airlines would win a challenge to it. He called on them to play their part in the fight against climate change.

It's a global problem," Dimas told reporters. "It needs a global solution."

The emissions trading program gives airlines a financial incentive to reduce emissions because they can sell allowances that they don't use. But if they fail to convert to low-carbon technology or simply increase their flights, they will be punished by being forced to buy additional allowances to release more carbon dioxide.

The EU said aircraft emissions currently make up 3% of total greenhouse gas emissions — higher than any other industry — but are increasing fast as cheap flights multiply and would likely double by 2020.

"Without action, the growth in emissions from flights from EU airports will by 2012 cancel out more than a quarter of the 8% emission reduction the EU must achieve to reach its Kyoto Protocol target," it said.

Someone flying from London to New York and back generates about the same level of emissions as the average person in the EU does by heating their home for a year, the Commission said.

Emissions will be capped at the average from 2004 to 2006, it said. Some allowances will be auctioned by national governments but most will be given away.

Scandinavian airline operator SAS AB said carbon trading was the best option because it did not punish economic growth. But it said it would have preferred to start with a global plan "in environmental terms and from a competitive perspective."

The Association of European Airlines, which represents Air France SA and British Airways, backed emissions trading but warned that a poorly designed program could strip airlines of the funds they need to introduce cleaner technology. The International Air Transport Association also gave it a "cautious welcome."

But environmentalists claimed the EU plan was too weak, citing a report from a British research organization, the Institute for Public Policy Research, that said airlines could earn up to 2.7 billion pounds ($5.26 billion) because they will get emissions allowances for free and pass on the costs in higher ticket prices.

One group, Transport and Environment, said the plan would barely reduce overall emissions and more measures were needed such as a tax on fuel and sales tax on tickets.

"This looks like business as usual and the likelihood of massive windfall profits for the industry," said T&E director Jos Dings.

Caroline Lucas, a Green Party member of the European Parliament, said airlines produce other greenhouse gases not covered by the plan, meaning their total contribution to climate change is between two and four times greater than other industries.

The required adoption by the European Parliament was unlikely while the plan runs "completely counter to their clearly stated view that all flights into and out of the EU should be included, and that the non-CO2 emissions should be taken into account,", said Lucas, a British MEP.

EU governments and the Parliament must back the plan — and can make changes — before it takes effect.

Paper Chase China's Reporters Face A Backlash Over Investigations (WSJ)

By Geoffrey A. Fowler And Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

BEIJING -- In a country where media censorship is national policy, Liu Jianqiang has pulled off some remarkable journalistic scoops.

DOJ_NMG_0108160

When a wealthy socialite struck and killed a farmer with her BMW in northeastern China three years ago -- and then got off with a slap on the wrist -- it was Mr. Liu, an investigative reporter from out of town, who dug deep into the case. Local reporters who had been hushed up by government officials passed him information on irregularities in the way prosecutors handled the trial.

The result was a widely read story that suggested corruption influenced the verdict. Within days of the article's publication, the government ordered an official investigation. A prosecutor in the case was later convicted of receiving bribes on the BMW and other cases, and sentenced to six years in prison.

"There are people who don't want things to come out," says Mr. Liu. "But there are always other people who do."

Today, China's government is waging a media crackdown on such hard-hitting reports. Some officials fear that investigative reporting feeds public discontent over social ills such as rampant pollution, a growing wealth gap, and especially corruption. Prominent editors at publications around the country have lost their jobs. A law under review in China's legislature could make it much more difficult for reporters like Mr. Liu to investigate emergencies and dig up wrongdoing in distant towns and villages.

Mr. Liu's journalistic successes and the pressure he and his peers now face reflect the Chinese leadership's deep ambivalence toward the press. Journalists have become an effective tool for rooting out corruption, one of China's most intractable problems. They also unnerve Communist Party rulers fearful of unrest and any challenge to their authority.

In September the party ousted one of its highest-ranking members, Shanghai party secretary Chen Liangyu, as part of a probe into misuse of the city's $1.2 billion pension fund. The dismissal of Mr. Chen followed in-depth stories in several publications about the involvement of Mr. Chen's allies in the scandal.

For years, the government treated newspapers and TV stations -- all of which were at least partly state-owned -- as propaganda vehicles, and profitability wasn't a priority. Typical front-page news included tedious recitations of party leader speeches and profiles of model communist workers.

But as China's economic reforms gathered steam a decade ago, the government began cutting subsidies to media outlets and subjecting them to market forces. Many print media groups, increasingly forced to fend for themselves, produced commercial titles to draw readers and tap China's booming ad industry. At the same time, the party began officially encouraging watchdog journalism by state-run media outlets under the rubric "supervision by public opinion."

The changing atmosphere prompted some news outlets to pump up their investigative reporting, which quickly won over readers eager for an alternative to bland propaganda. Southern Weekend, the newspaper where Mr. Liu made his name, was among the first to make that shift. In 1992, the party-controlled Nanfang Daily Group transformed what had been a four-page entertainment newspaper into a hard-hitting weekly covering national news. It won more than a million readers, and advertising dollars flowed in. The paper, based in the booming southern city of Guangzhou, became famous for edgy interviews, such as one published in 2001 with members of a gang that had killed 28 people in a spree of murder and theft. The story analyzed the role of poverty in gang violence, and challenged China's growing inequality.

China's censors still wielded the authority to block sensitive stories about corruption and wrongdoing, and some topics -- such as direct criticism of senior leaders -- remained strictly off limits. But journalists at Southern Weekend and other publications found loopholes.

One of the most effective ones involved reporters digging for news in distant parts of the country, away from their own censors. China's censorship often relies on local officials using their influence over the local press. Out-of-towners escaped their reach.

The practice of sending reporters to investigate wrongdoing in other locations became known as yidi jiandu, or "cross-regional supervision." Journalists exploiting this regulatory gray zone helped expose such problems as China's massive rural HIV/AIDS crisis, which devastated the countryside in Henan province.

Aggrieved farmers and families of mining-disaster victims began seeking out journalists. Some papers, including Southern Weekend, set up special hotlines for calls from readers with grievances and story ideas. The growth of the Internet also helped enterprising reporters sniff out stories or get them published by faraway newspapers. Local government officials in provinces all around China soon feared visits from out-of-town reporters, especially from Southern Weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0108161

One of the paper's most aggressive news hounds was Mr. Liu, now 37 years old. During his childhood in rural Shandong province, China didn't have any investigative journalists. His father, who had worked in a small municipal waterworks, was banished with the rest of the family to the countryside during the decadelong Cultural Revolution that began in 1966. With no books in the house, Mr. Liu learned to read using the only written material available -- self-criticisms his father was forced to write for his purported political offenses.

In college, Mr. Liu studied Marxism and then went to work for a bank. Bored with his job, he took a writing test for his local Communist Party newspaper, and landed a reporting job in 1997. The work wasn't as exciting as he had hoped. "I would follow party leaders and write that they went to a place and had a very important speech," he says.

In 2000, Mr. Liu joined a journalism program at Tsinghua University, one of China's top schools. There, he began to read overseas newspapers. He studied the Pulitzer Prizes. "My whole world changed," he says. "I learned what real news was."

After completing his master's degree in 2003, Mr. Liu found a job in the Beijing bureau of Southern Weekend. There, his editors got wind of the BMW incident. Local journalists in Harbin, a major city in the northeast, had been filing uncritical stories on the trial of the wealthy driver. Then, Chinese Internet forum users and bloggers began commenting on the case, raising its national profile.

Mr. Liu went to Harbin to investigate. He says he set up lunch with local journalists, some of whom "had information they could share, but had been instructed by the local propaganda department not to do so." One journalist hinted to Mr. Liu that the trial was flawed, and passed him a videotape of the court proceedings.

Mr. Liu took a taxi to the tiny village where the victim's husband lived. But the husband, Dai Yiquan, didn't want to talk about the accident. As Mr. Liu tried to put him at ease, another farmer pulled up in a tractor with a machine to grind corn into feed. Mr. Liu, familiar with such chores from his childhood on a farm, offered to help Mr. Dai.

Several bushels later, Mr. Liu had won Mr. Dai's trust, and a major lead on the story. The husband, it turned out, had told police that the BMW driver had shouted and cursed at the couple before the collision, and had tried to hit him with her car before striking his wife. This belied the defendant's claims that the incident was a simple accident.

Back in town, Mr. Liu found a judge -- a friend of a friend -- who helped him review the videotape of the court proceedings. They found that the prosecutor never introduced Mr. Dai's recounting of the driver's verbal assault, nor his allegation that the collision was intentional. The judge told Mr. Liu this omission was a violation of Chinese court procedure. Mr. Liu's story ran in the following week's Southern Weekend. The headline read: "Harbin's 'BMW-Hits-Pedestrian' Case Clouded by Doubt: Numerous Problems Emerge in Legal Procedures."

Two officials connected with the case were eventually removed from office. One, a prosecutor named Pang Jiulin, was convicted in August of 2004 of corruption for having taken $10,125 in bribes in the BMW and other cases. He was sentenced to six years in prison. Zhang Yanbin, another local official, was dismissed in July for taking a $1,012 bribe. The court report said that the BMW bribe was from the driver's family, but never said who was doing the bribing in the other cases.

The provincial propaganda department office declined to comment on the case. Messrs. Pang and Zhang couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Liu later scored other journalistic coups. A front-page story he wrote last year helped prompt the government to abandon a project to seal the bottom of a Beijing lake after showing that the project was destroying the surrounding ecosystem. It won him an environmental reporting prize sponsored by DuPont Co. After he wrote a piece about an HIV prevention program for sex workers in Yunnan province, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation paid for him to attend the International AIDS Conference in Toronto.

But outwitting the system through yidi jiandu soon got a lot tougher for Mr. Liu and his colleagues. In the summer of 2005, Mr. Liu landed what he thought was another big scoop: a tip, he says, that the deputy governor of Henan province was being investigated for conspiring to have his wife killed.

Mr. Liu called the police for comment. "I knew that the story was sensitive and if I got one little thing wrong, they would use it to come after me," he says. When he called at 10:00 a.m. the day before the story was to run, police confirmed the case existed, but said they were still awaiting instruction from authorities on how to talk about it, Mr. Liu says.

DOJ_NMG_0108162

That afternoon, the propaganda department of Guangdong province, Southern Weekend's home, called Mr. Liu's editors and told them not to run the story, he says. He believes the call came because the Henan propaganda department asked the central government to intervene in the case. The Guangdong and Henan propaganda departments didn't respond to a request for an interview.

Only months later did China's high court release rudimentary details of the case. In October of 2005, the vice governor was sentenced to death for the murder of his wife, according to the court's official Web site.

The incident was a sign of bigger problems. As muckraking stirred up public angst, government officials grew frustrated. "The central government is using the media as a watchdog," says Li Xiguang, executive dean at the School of Journalism and Communication at Tsinghua University. But officials are also "very much worried about mistrust of the public toward the government."

In particular, the increasingly freewheeling media were criticized by some outside the government for shoddy journalistic practices. "Commercial pressure seeks readers, and people love negative news," Mr. Li says.

Such criticism resonated with the administration of President Hu Jintao, who has made building a "harmonious society" a big priority since he took office in 2003. Last fall, the government stepped up its curbs on the Internet and fired or censured several prominent editors. The central government also issued a guideline calling for an end to "cross-regional supervision" reporting.

When Southern Weekend's top editor heard the news, he held a somber staff meeting. "Everyone felt helpless," says Ruichun Yang, at the time Southern Weekend's page-one editor, who adds: "If yidi jiandu ends, so does watchdog journalism." Soon after, three of the weekly's front-page stories were yanked before they went to press, says Ms. Yang.

The guidance against yidi jiandu doesn't yet constitute Chinese law, and Southern Weekend still sends its staff to report in other provinces. But editors think twice now before doing so. Today as many as one in five of Southern Weekend's big stories end up getting axed, and many more ideas are killed before they're even reported, Ms. Yang says.

Officials at Nanfang Daily Group, Southern Weekend's owner, didn't respond to a request for an interview.

A frustrated Mr. Liu took a sabbatical last April to write a book about Tibetan culture, and returned only this month. He and other Chinese journalists say they haven't given up. "Even with the restrictions on political reporting, there is a lot of room for Chinese journalists to write meaningful articles," Mr. Liu says.

Last summer, China's legislature began debating a proposed law that would make yidi jiandu harder, by enabling heavy fines against journalists who report news without the authorization of local governments. But in a surprising show of defiance, some newspapers and magazines condemned the draft law almost immediately after lawmakers began considering it in June. The proposal remains under discussion.

Chinese Journalist Freed Five Years Early (WT/AP)

By Elaine Kurtenbach, Associated Press

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

SHANGHAI -- A journalist serving a 13-year jail term for reporting about a bogus irrigation project has been released five years early to unusually vocal official acclaim for his determination to fight corruption.

Gao Qinrong, previously an investigative journalist for a state-run newspaper in northern China's Shanxi province, was imprisoned in 1998 and released earlier this month, according to media activists and state press reports.

Such developments rarely win a mention in China's state-controlled press, given the political sensitivities over Beijing's violations of freedom of press and other civil liberties.

Yet, Mr. Gao's case is being touted as evidence of the country's willingness to empower the press to help fight corruption.

"That the local reporter Gao Qinrong was framed and imprisoned after revealing the frightful spectacle of local corruption is a highly irregular situation," the state-run newspaper Southern Weekend said in a commentary accompanying a lengthy interview with Mr. Gao after his release.

"Why should media today have to face this problem or that problem when reporting on the problem of corruption?" it stated. Mr. Gao, 51, was not immediately available for comment yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0108163

In the interview, he insisted he was right in publishing the reports that resulted in his imprisonment.

"To be a journalist, you have to speak for the people," Mr. Gao told Southern Weekend. "If I hadn't published that report, it would be as if the case never happened. We can't all be yes-men. If we are, what hope is there for our country?

"Corruption must be exposed," he said.

The authorities' motives in highlighting Mr. Gao's case are not clear.

Mr. Gao drew national attention with a 1998 report in the Shanxi Youth Daily that a $35 million irrigation project in Yuncheng, a city in northern China, was a scam meant to boost the careers of local officials. It was published in the Communist Party newspaper the People's Daily and followed on state-run television.

Months later, Mr. Gao was arrested by Yuncheng officials on charges of bribery and fraud, among others, and sentenced after a brief trial to 13 years in prison.

His release comes as China's top leaders are orchestrating simultaneous corruption crackdowns in several major Chinese cities, including Beijing and Shanghai.

The scandals appear to be aimed at appeasing public anger over corruption while shoring up the power base of President Hu Jintao ahead of an important party congress next year.

Welcome, Wal-Mart Comrades (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

For a peek into China's labor market, look no further than Wal-Mart. In North America, the world's biggest retailer prefers to close down stores rather than tolerate unionized staff. But in China, most of Wal-Mart's 68 stores not only have labor unions, but six locations now boast Communist Party branches as well. What's next? Comrade Sam's Clubs?

The latest Wal-Mart Party cell debuted Friday at the chain's headquarters in Shenzhen. This followed the company's decision in July to give in after years of pressure from the nationally sanctioned All-China Federation of Trade Unions. Thirty employees at a Wal-Mart store in Fujian province unionized. According to the ACFTU, it now has more than 6,000 members in Wal-Marts across China. The Party has followed the unions' path through the front doors.

Wal-Mart spokesman Jonathan Dong told China Daily that Wal-Mart supports the Shenzhen cadres. "We have had this attitude since the trade union was established [in July]," he said. "Both will be good for the development of Wal-Mart in China."

That's not a sure thing. For starters, the function of the new unions remains unclear. Labor lawyers tell us that Chinese unions aren't like those in the West. Relations with management are generally benign. Demonstrations are rare, as unions and party cells like to keep a low profile. So a company like Wal-Mart may not perceive much threat from opening its doors to union and Party. But there's nothing to guarantee that union members won't catch onto the practices of their Western peers.

Legal change is afoot, too. Sometime in the next week, Beijing's legislature is expected to hold a second reading of the Labor Contract Law. The document will redefine labor rights and the ACFTU's power. The first draft gave foreign investors a jolt. It made employee dismissals for poor performance difficult. The draft also required company policies and regulations to be negotiated between employer and "employee representatives," a la Germany.

More than 190,000 industry players registered comments on the draft law with the Party. Many believe the new version will be more employer friendly, though the draft still hasn't been made public. Many foreign-invested firms are waiting for the passage of the legislation before deciding whether to admit the ACFTU, as Wal-Mart did.

Which makes Wal-Mart's embrace of union and Party all the more puzzling. Perhaps Wal-Mart wasn't given much of a choice, and was chosen to send a message to other foreign-invested enterprises. Which is: We're watching you from outside, and inside.

DOJ_NMG_0108164

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Key Democrat wants to know why Arar still barred from U.S. (TS) ... 3
US Senator Seeks Answers In Botched Canadian Terror Case: Report (AFP) ... 4
Pakistani Man In NY Convicted Of Financing India Militant Group (AP) ... 5
Risk Of Attack Rising, Officials In Europe Say (WP) ... 5
U.N. To Allow Appeals On Sanctions Tied To Al Qaeda, Taliban (WSJ) ... 6
Fix Needed (WP) ... 6

Homeland Response:

Chertoff Discusses Goals, Responds To Critics (NJ) ... 7
Acquisition Listed Among DHS Management Challenges (GovExec) ... 9
IG Outlines Homeland Security Department Management Challenges (FEDT) ... 9
How Biometric Security Is Far From Foolproof (WSJ) ... 10
Quest For Anthrax Vaccine Lengthens (WP) ... 11

War News:

President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP) ... 12
Bush Concedes US 'not Winning' In Iraq (FT) ... 16
Bush Warns Of More U.S. Losses In Iraq (AP) ... 17
Bush Asserts That Victory In Iraq Is Still 'Achievable' (NYT) ... 18
Dour Bush Talks Of 'New Way Forward' (LAT) ... 19
Bush Seeks To Expand Military (BSUN/CTRIB) ... 20
Bush Seeks To Bolster Support For Sustained Iraq Engagement (WSJ) ... 21
Bush Concedes U.S. Not Ready For Iraq (WT) ... 22
Contention Increases On Troop Numbers (WP) ... 23
Bush: 'Additional Sacrifices' In Iraq Required In 2007 (USAT) ... 25
U.S. Commanders Wary Of Gates Proposal (AP) ... 26
Gates Talks Over Options With U.S. Commanders In Iraq (WP) 27
Coleman Says He's Against Sending More Troops To Iraq (AP) 27
Bush's Move To Supersize US Military (CSM) ... 28
Enlarging Military Poses Challenge (AP) ... 29
Cost, Effort, Time Of Military Expansion Plan Likely To Have 'Enormous' Impact (USAT) ... 30
Leaned On As Never Before, Reservists Weigh Re-enlistment (MCT) ... 31
A Soldier's Soldier, Outflanked (WP) ... 32
Rudderless In Iraq (NYT) ... 33
Uncle Sam Needs More (LAT) ... 34
U.S. Cannot Accept Defeat (USAT) ... 35
Push To Add Troops Grows, But No One Knows What They'd Do (USAT) ... 36
A Military Of The Willing Works Best (WP) ... 37
CIA Exercise Reveals Consequences Of Defeat (WT) ... 37
AP: Pentagon Wants $99.7B More For Wars (AP) ... 38
Shiite Clerics' Rivalry Deepens In Fragile Iraq (WP) ... 39
In Iraq, Let's Fight One War At A Time (NYT) ... 42
Cleric Weighs 1-month Cease-fire In Iraq (AP) ... 43
Al-Qaida Hints At Power Status In Iraq (AP) ... 44
Al Qaeda Warns U.S. On Fighting In Muslim Lands (NYT) ... 45
Anonymous Slayings, Car Bombs Plague Iraqi Capital (LAT) ... 46
Iraqi Comedian Shot To Death In Baghdad (AP) ... 47
Meaty Ceremony Marks Shift Of Province Command (LAT) ... 47
U.S. Transfers Control Of Najaf Province To Iraqi Security Forces (WP) ... 48
Home In Illinois May Lure Fugitive Former Iraqi Minister (NYT) ... 49
French Pulls Troops From Afghanistan (AP) ... 49
Pakistani City Serves As A Refuge For The Taliban (LAT) ... 50
Al-Qaeda's Sanctuary (WP) ... 52

DOJ:

New US Attorney Sworn in For Little Rock District (AP) ... 52
Feds laud A-C police (ABH) ... 52
Loss of grant money clouds future for regional drug task force (BTF) ... 53

Corporate Scandals:

Juniper Takes Big Charge For Tainted Options (MERCN) ... 54
IBM Ends Director Stock Options, Spotlighting Popular Perk's Decline (WSJ) ... 55
American Tower Will Cut Gains From Managers' Options (BLOOM) ... 56
Chordiant Gets Nasdaq Noncompliance Note (AP) ... 57
4 Former Enterasys Officials Found Guilty (AP) ... 57
Former Enterasys Executives Convicted In New Hampshire (IW) 58
Convicted Enterasys execs use homes for bail (MUL) ... 58
Prison stay delayed for ex-Homestore CEO (INMAN) ... 59
A Job He Couldn't Refuse (MRKTWTCH) ... 60
Dell Books Carty To Captain Its Finances (FOR) ... 61

Wall Street Raises Privacy Fears Over Election-Law Overhauls (WSJ) ... 62
FBR Settles With SEC Over Insider Trading Case (WP) ... 62
The Pump-and-Dump Economy (WSJ) ... 63
Hedge Fund Secrets (WSJ) ... 65

Criminal Law:

Death Penalty May Follow A N.Y. Verdict (NYS) ... 66
Refrain Of 'Guilty' Ends Trial In Murder Of 2 Detectives (NYT) ... 66
Guilty In Killing Of 2 Detectives (NSDY) ... 68
Cops' Killer Faces Needle (NYDN) ... 69
Anchorage Man Charged With Sex Trafficking, Drug Counts (AP) ... 70
Federal prosecutors charge an Anchorage man with 28 counts of sex trafficking and drug-related offenses (KTVA) ... 71
Harsher penalties weighed for online sex offenders (WT) ... 71
Wilson Challenges Subpoena In CIA Case (AP) ... 72
Katrina fraud in Yuba (AD) ... 72
CyberNET wife, others indicted in fed court ... 73
(WOOD-TV) ... 73
CyberNET Widow, Mother, Executive Indicted (GRPRESS) ... 73
Crete Man Gets 7 Years For $7M Pension Fraud ... 74
(STNG) ... 74
Phone-fraud Ring Raided In Canada (WT) ... 74
Felons' DNA Missing From Va. Database (WP) ... 75
In Quest For A Killer, An Inmate Finds Vindication (NYT) ... 76
5 Houston-Area Men Attacked By Rapist (NYT) ... 78
Concerns Raised About Security At Supermax Prison (WP) ... 78
A Vexing Leap In US Robbery Rate (CSM) ... 79
Free Genarlow Wilson Now (NYT) ... 80

Civil Law:

U.S. Justice Department Moves Against Prosser in Bankruptcy Proceedings (STS) ... 81

Civil Rights:

LaRoque discusses district attorney Nifong with Fox News (KFP) ... 82
State lifts new patient moratorium at Fort Bayard (AP) ... 82

Antitrust:

Delta lawyer: US Airways merger has 'antitrust issues' (NMBW) 83
Phone Carriers Win A Skirmish In Cable Wars (NYT) ... 84
FCC Vote A Victory For Phone Companies (WP) ... 85
Phone Giants Are Closer To TV Service (USAT) ... 86
Bell Companies' FCC Victory Might Be Short-Lived (WSJ) ... 87
U.S. Clears CVS To Acquire Caremark Rx (BLOOM) ... 88
We Energies Sells Nuclear Plant to FPL (AP) ... 88
Wisconsin Energy to sell Point Beach nuclear plant for $1B (BJM) ... 89
Service Corp. Seeks Approval For Sale (AP) ... 89
Lawsuit against Amway still stands (MCT) ... 90
NYSE Gets OK On Euronext Deal (USAT) ... 90
N.Y. Firm To Buy Harland Low-profile M&F Worldwide's $1.7 Billion All-cash Deal For Decatur Check Printing Firm Certain To Face Antitrust Scrutiny. (AJC) ... 91
Huntington, Sky To Merge Banks (WSJ) ... 92
Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ) ... 92
Arcelor Mittal buys steel plants from Grupo Villacero (BLOOM) . 93
Brussels Approves MAN's Scania Bid (FT) ... 93
Intesa Must Sell More Branches, Antitrust Says (BLOOM) ... 94

Environment:

Reforestation Lags Amid Record Wildfires (USAT) ... 94
Two Lawsuits Filed Against ICC (BSUN) ... 95
Federal Agency Sued Over Environmental Study (WP) ... 96
Suits Seek To Block ICC Construction (WT/AP) ... 97
Build It (WP) ... 97
Big Profits, And Questions, In Effort To Cut Emissions (NYT) ... 98

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Indicted On Drug Kingpin Charges (WT) ... 100
Suspected Drug Kingpin Pleads Not Guilty To New Charges In U.S. (AP) ... 100
Web Site Puts Undercover Officers At Risk (KHOU) ... 101
KCK Man Sentenced To 121 Months In Connection To Marijuana Bust (KESQ) ... 102
CannaHelp Still Open In Defiance Of City Order (DS) ... 102
Secrets To Be Declassified Under New Rule At Age 25 (NYT) 103
Federal Inquiry Focuses On 2 Bruno Firms (NYT) ... 104
Fear Over Scrutiny Of Bruno (NSDY) ... 106
Feds Are Mining Joe's Biz (NYDN) ... 106
Land Deal With Albany Lobbyist At Center Of Bruno Inquiry (NYS) ... 107
Prosecutors Eye Rolex To Show A Pattern Of Payoffs (MCS) . 108
Doral Case Comes Back To Bite Politician (MJS) ... 109
3 Plead Guilty In Alabama Church Arsons (AP) ... 110
Uncle Sam's Private Equity Fund (FOR) ... 110
Alleged Bank Robber Captured In Florida (AP) ... 111
Akron Man Accused Of Raping 12-Year-Old (WEWS) ... 112
2 Tenn. fugitives arrested in New Orleans (AP) ... 112

Immigration:

U.S. Sued Over Dropping Of Benefits For Disabled (WP) ... 112
For Divided Family, Border Is Sorrowful Barrier (NYT) ... 113
Mr. Bush's Immigration Realism (NYT) ... 116

Tax:

Judge Refuses To Split Trial In U.S. Case On Tax Shelters (NYT) ... 117
IRS Scales Back Audits Of Big Firms, Study Finds (WSJ) ... 117
Yankton Firm Implicated In Tax Fraud Case (YDP) ... 118

Congress-Administration:

Report Says Berger Hid Archive Documents (AP) ... 119
Report Details Archives Theft By Ex-Adviser (NYT) ... 120
Berger Hid Archives Papers Under A Trailer, Probe Shows (WP)120
Berger Took Papers To A Hiding Place (WT) ... 121
Bush Links Minimum Wage To Tax Break (AP) ... 122
Minimum-wage Battle May Be Brewing (LAT) ... 123
Minimum-Wage Deal As Bellwether (WSJ) ... 124
Bush Supports Democrats' Minimum Wage Hike Plan (WP) ... 125
Bush Prepares To Make Deals With Democrats (WT) ... 126

DOJ_NMG_0108166

Bush Signs Massive Tax And Trade Bill (AP)..... 126
Congress Closes With A Pork-filled Flourish (LAT)..... 127
FEDERAL DIARY: Price Caps At The Old Stamping Ground (WP)..... 128
Bush OKs Billions To Clean Up Coal Mines (AP)..... 129
New Congress To Toughen Oversight (CSM)..... 130
Va. Congressman Fears Election Of 'Many More Muslims' To Office (AP) 131
Va. Lawmaker's Remarks On Muslims Criticized (WP)..... 132
Congressman Criticizes Election Of Muslim (NYT)..... 133
Lawmaker Sees Muslims As Threat (MINNST)..... 134
Goode Stands By Comments On Muslims (RTD)..... 135
Tools: Save | Print | E-mail | Most Popular Lawmaker Won't Apologize For 'Islamophobic' Letter (CNN) 135
Congress Asked To Intervene In Fla. Race (AP) 136
Mass. Governor's Rightward Shift Raises Questions (WP)..... 136
The Courts Need This Watchdog (WP) 138
Discover America Partnership Lands Ridge (WP)..... 139

Other News:

Chavez Accuses U.S. Envoy Of Lying On Drug Problem (AP). 140
Bush Forcefully Rejects Direct Talks With Syria, Iran (MCT).... 141
Kerry, Dodd Meet With Syria President (AP)..... 142
Kerry: Syria Leader Wants To Assist In Iraq (BOS) 143
U.S. And Britain To Add Ships To Persian Gulf In Signal To Iran (NYT) 144
Security Council Set To Vote Friday On Iran Sanctions (AFP) . 145
U.N. Draft Resolution On Iran Loosens Travel Ban And Time Limits (NYT)..... 146
Who's Tough On Tehran? (WSJ) 147
Iran Admits Oil Projects Suffering (FT) 148
Iran President Facing Revival Of Students' Ire (NYT)..... 148
Cleric's Star Rises In Iran After Vote (AP) 150
U.S. Negotiator Notes An Improved Tone In Talks On North Korea (NYT)..... 151
Faint Hopes Of Progress As NKorea Nuclear Talks Enter Fourth Day (AFP) 152
North Korea Not Budging On Sanctions (AP)..... 152
U.S. Nuke Envoy Hopes Japan-N.Korea Meet (AP) 153
Somali Government, Islamic Militias Agree To Resume Peace Talks (WP) 154
Somalis Agree To Peace Talks Despite Clashes (FT) 155
Diplomat Pushes Peace Talks In Somalia (AP) 155
Clashes Raise Fears Of Civil War In Somalia (LAT) 156
Saudi Arabia Set To Name Jubeir As Ambassador (WP) 157
US Deeply Concerned Over Darfur After Visit By Bush Envoy (AFP)..... 158
U.S. Warns Sudan Of Possible Action (AP) 158
Sudan Given January 1 Deadline To Accept Darfur Peacekeepers (AFP) 159
U.S. Gives Deadline Over Darfur (WT)..... 160
US Hits At EU Emissions Plan For Airlines (FT)..... 161
Europe Acts To Penalize Jet Pollution (NYT) 161
Fliers Could See Fares Rise When EU Pollution Allowances Begin (AP)..... 162
Paper Chase China's Reporters Face A Backlash Over Investigations (WSJ)..... 163
Chinese Journalist Freed Five Years Early (WT/AP) 165
Welcome, Wal-Mart Comrades (WSJ) 166

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Key Democrat wants to know why Arar still barred from U.S. (TS)

By Tim Harper
Toronto Star, December 20, 2006

WASHINGTON–The incoming chair of a powerful Senate committee says he will summon U.S. Attorney-General Alberto Gonzales before American legislators to explain why Maher Arar is still barred from the U.S.

Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, who will chair the judiciary committee in the new Congress, said Arar has the right to know what suspicions the Bush administration still harbour against him after he was exonerated by a Canadian inquiry.

"The Canadian government has now documented that the wrong thing was done to the wrong man," Leahy said.

"It is time for the (Bush) administration to do what it can to redress this wrong, instead of perpetuating it."

Leahy, in an interview with the Toronto Star, also said he believed the new Congress would rewrite the law that will require Canadians and Americans crossing the international border by land to carry passports by June 2009, at the latest.

In the last Republican-controlled Congress, the Vermont senator co-sponsored an amendment to push the border regulations back from its original Jan. 1, 2008 start date.

He also called the administration's plans to install electronic sensors and satellite security along the border "insulting to Canada ... and beneath the United States, and I don't see that it accomplishes anything."

Leahy says he wants Gonzales before his committee to discuss the entire U.S. policy of rendition and he said in a speech last week he will no longer put up with non-answers shrouded in security concerns or promises to get back to him.

DOJ_NMG_0108167

"It's not just this individual case," Leahy said, "but what does this say when someone's plane stops here, they have citizenship in a neighbouring country and we ship them back to Syria.

"You know they are going to be tortured.

"This is beneath our country. And it does absolutely nothing to make us more secure and it is a gross human rights violation.

"One thing that can be done is our country should sit down with yours and say: How did we all screw up here?"

Arar's Toronto lawyer, Lorne Waldman, said he was "very encouraged" by Leahy's pledge.

"This moves the matter to the next level and we're quite pleased with that," he said.

Washington's ambassador to Ottawa, David Wilkins, said last week Arar remained on a "no-fly" list in the United States, but neither he nor the U.S. State Department would outline the reasons.

Leahy said Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian engineer, should be told by U.S. authorities what allegations they are making.

There are a number of lists held by American authorities that could ban Canadians from this country and since the U.S. justice department has classed Arar's case a "deportation" and not a "rendition," he was barred from the U.S. for five years from the 2002 date he was picked up at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York.

From there, he was sent to Syria where he was imprisoned and tortured.

On the border issue, Leahy said the fact he was able to co-sponsor an extension to the legislation with a conservative Republican, Ted Stevens of Alaska, shows there is bipartisan support to change the law.

He cautioned against reading too much into the Democratic pledge, often mentioned by incoming Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, to implement all the recommendations of the 9/11 commission that studied the terrorist attacks in this country.

The passport or secure card rules sprung from that commission.

"Will Rogers, the great American comedian once said, `I belong to no organized political party, I'm a Democrat,'" he said. "Certainly we want to implement a number of recommendations from the 9/11 commission, but we are not a parliamentary form of government and we don't take party positions.

"It's great to say we're going to implement a lot of things that haven't been implemented, but you're not just going to take the 9/11 commission report as a piece of legislation and just pass it.

"It's not going to happen."

Leahy said he has heard more and more senators, beyond border states, saying the security legislation doesn't make sense.

"I think we'll go back to the drawing board," he said. "It has to be rewritten."

US Senator Seeks Answers In Botched Canadian Terror Case: Report (AFP)

AFP, December 21, 2006

The incoming chair of the powerful US senate judiciary committee has vowed to get to the bottom of an alleged rendition of a Canadian man wrongly accused of terrorist ties, a Canadian newspaper said.

Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy told the Toronto Star in an interview published Wednesday that he would summon US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales before the committee to explain why Maher Arar is still barred from the United States, after he was cleared of terrorist links by a Canadian judicial inquiry.

"The Canadian government has now documented that the wrong thing was done to the wrong man," Leahy told the newspaper.

"It is time for the (Bush) administration to do what it can to redress this wrong, instead of perpetuating it."

Arar was stopped in New York, on his way to Canada from a trip to Tunisia in September 2002, and was deported to Syria where he was jailed and tortured for more than a year.

Ottawa asked Washington to remove the 36-year-old software engineer from their surveillance list after he was exonerated in September. But the US ambassador to Ottawa said last week that Arar remains on the watch list.

The botched terrorism case has gripped Canada and led to the resignation earlier this month of the nation's top cop, Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) Commissioner Guiliano Zaccardelli.

A Canadian government report found that faulty intelligence provided to US authorities by the RCMP had likely led to Arar's detention and deportation to Syria.

Ottawa protested to Washington and Damascus over Arar's treatment, but Syria denies the torture claims and the United states has refused to accept blame for any wrongdoing in the case.

Senator Leahy said he would also question Gonzales about the US government's alleged widespread use of "extraordinary rendition" -- the clandestine seizing and transfer of terror suspects to allied nations that condone torture.

DOJ_NMG_0108168

"It's not just this individual case," he said. "But what does this say when someone's plane stops here, they have citizenship in a neighboring country and we ship them back to Syria."

"This is beneath our country. And, it does absolutely nothing to make us more secure and it is a gross human rights violation."

Pakistani Man In NY Convicted Of Financing India Militant Group (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) _ A Pakistani man was convicted Wednesday of financially supporting a militant separatist group in India, federal prosecutors announced.

Khalid Awan, of Garden City, was convicted by a federal jury after a two-week trial in Brooklyn and faces up to 45 years in prison.

Awan, 44, was charged with helping the Khalistan Commando Force, a Sikh secessionist group that operated in India's Punjab state. The group, founded in 1986, is considered a terrorist organization in India and is said to be responsible for the deaths of thousands of people through bombings, sabotage and assassinations.

Awan came to the attention of federal authorities in 2003, when he was serving prison time on credit card fraud charges, the U.S. attorney's office said.

A fellow inmate at the Metropolitan Detention Center in Brooklyn reported that Awan had talked about his relationship with Paramjit Singh Panjwar, the leader of the KCF and one of India's most wanted fugitives, prosecutors said.

Evidence that prosecutors presented included recordings of Awan's prison phone calls to Panjwar in Pakistan, statements by Awan saying he sent the group hundreds of thousands of dollars and testimony by two New York-area fundraisers for the militants who said they had delivered money to Awan's home in Garden City. Prosecutors also said Awan introduced the fellow inmate as a potential recruit when talking to Panjwar.

The Indian government cooperated in the investigation, prosecutors said.

"The war on terror is a global battle," said Roslynn Mauskopf, U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of New York. "We will not permit individuals in our jurisdiction to finance terrorist groups responsible for murder and violence in any part of the world."

A telephone message seeking comment from an attorney for Awan was not immediately returned Wednesday.

Awan's sentencing is set for March 7.

Risk Of Attack Rising, Officials In Europe Say (WP)

By Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BERLIN, Dec. 20 -- The threat of a terrorist attack on European soil by Islamic radicals has increased substantially in recent months, reaching its highest levels since the London transit attacks of July 2005, according to European counterterrorism officials. Adding to the anxiety: fresh threats against Britain and France delivered Wednesday by al-Qaeda's deputy leader.

In a new videotape, Ayman al-Zawahiri, the second-in-command to al-Qaeda chief Osama bin Laden, singled out Britain as a historical enemy of Muslims, blaming it for the creation of the state of Israel and the downfall of the Ottoman Empire in the early 20th century.

He also said al-Qaeda would continue to plan attacks on the United States and its "Crusader" allies in Europe as long as Western powers remain in Iraq, Afghanistan and Lebanon. "The animosity of Britain toward Islam stretches over centuries," Zawahiri said, according to a translation of his remarks by the SITE Institute, a terrorism research organization. "Isn't it the one who used to occupy most Islamic lands?"

It was the 15th recorded speech released this year by Zawahiri, a 55-year-old Egyptian physician who has shown little fear of speaking out despite a $25 million reward for his capture posted by the U.S. government.

Frequently wagging a finger to make a point, he spoke with a rifle displayed in the background. "I tell both the Republicans and Democrats . . . you try to negotiate with certain parties to secure your departure, although the parties don't have a way out for you" from Iraq. "You shall come back -- Allah permitting -- with no other choice but to negotiate with the real powers," an apparent reference to al-Qaeda's wing in Iraq.

Zawahiri's remarks followed a raft of general warnings by authorities in Britain, France and Germany that major attacks might be coming. They have given no specifics.

Last week, British Home Secretary John Reid declared that an attempted terrorist strike in his country was "highly likely" over the Christmas and New Year's holidays. There has not been a major terrorist attack in Europe since the July 7, 2005, bombings in London. But European counterterrorism officials have disrupted dozens of attempts since then and have far more suspected radicals under surveillance now than at any point since the Sept. 11, 2001, hijackings in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0108169

In November, the director general of Britain's MI5 intelligence service, Eliza Manningham-Buller, said the agency was tracking more than 1,600 members of suspected terrorist cells, more than triple the number under surveillance three years ago. Manningham-Buller, who rarely speaks in public, said investigators were monitoring about 30 major terrorism plots in the planning stages.

"The threat has really proliferated," said M.J. Gohel, chief executive of the Asia-Pacific Foundation, a London-based security research organization. "One of the reasons why Western intelligence and counterterrorism officials are so concerned is because they have unraveled so many plots involving so many different independent cells."

Other European countries have been on heightened alert. Spanish investigators broke up a cell of Islamic militants last week that was allegedly plotting attacks on an arms depot and a supermarket.

On Friday, Germany's chief federal prosecutor, Monika Harms, said that "the threat posed by Islamist terrorism must not be underestimated" in that country, citing an alleged plot to blow up regional trains with suitcase bombs in July and a separate scheme to smuggle explosives onto an Israeli airliner at the Frankfurt airport.

Intelligence officials and analysts said the number of European Muslims who have become radicalized has escalated in recent years, especially since the Iraq invasion and the wars in Lebanon and Afghanistan. But they also cited factors closer to home, including rising anger among immigrants and later-generation Muslims who feel marginalized in European society.

Zawahiri's recent remarks have particularly concerned French counterterrorism officials. They have warned of a heightened risk of attacks because of a newly declared alliance between al-Qaeda and an Algerian-based network, the Salafist Group for Preaching and Combat, which has developed an extensive collection of cells in France and elsewhere in Europe.

In September, Zawahiri announced the formation of the partnership and urged the Algerian network to become "a dagger in the hearts of the French traitors and apostates." On Wednesday, he repeated the command, predicting that the Algerians would soon defeat the "secularist sons of France."

French officials said this week that they have arrested 76 suspected members of the Algerian network since June 2005 in connection with three separate plots, including alleged plans to bomb the Paris subway and Orly airport.

Jean-Louis Bruguiere, France's chief anti-terrorism judge, said that France had become "the main target" of the Algerian group and that the risk of attacks had increased over the past six months. "We consider the threat level to be very high," he said in an interview published Wednesday by the International Herald Tribune. "What is new is that this organization has formally pledged allegiance to al-Qaeda."

In his statement, Zawahiri also criticized the radical Palestinian movement Hamas for taking part in elections in January and failing to insist on an Islamic constitution. In earlier messages, he has called on Islamic fighters to go to the Palestinian territories to fight alongside Hamas.

U.N. To Allow Appeals On Sanctions Tied To Al Qaeda, Taliban (WSJ)

By David Crawford

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Alleged al Qaeda and Taliban supporters blacklisted by the United Nations Security Council will be able to petition directly to have their names removed and sanctions lifted, removing a top complaint of lawyers and civil-rights lobbies.

The security body cleared the way for a form of appeals process when it voted Tuesday to set up an office to handle requests by individuals to lift sanctions imposed under a range of U.N. resolutions dating back to 1992.

More than 300 people have been listed at the Security Council under one of those resolutions, 1267, which was passed in 1999 to pressure leaders of the then-Taliban government in Afghanistan to hand over Osama bin Laden. Since then, the resolution has been used more widely by governments to sanction people they believe to belong to or support al Qaeda and the Taliban.

Explaining why Denmark proposed the change while it was president of the Security Council, Danish Foreign Minister Per Stig Møller said, "Denmark wants to combine the fight against terrorism with respect for human rights and the rule of law."

The new Security Council office -- called a "focal point" -- will be able to receive petitions from individuals sanctioned under 1267, as well as 10 other resolutions directed at individuals in Somalia, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Congo, Ivory Coast, Sudan and North Korea.

Fix Needed (WP)

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

LAST WEEK a federal court in Washington threw out the lawsuit of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, the detainee at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, whose successful challenge to the Bush administration's proposed military trials for accused terrorists led to a landmark Supreme Court decision earlier this year. The dismissal of the case is an ironic consequence of Mr. Hamdan's victory before the high court. The justices' decision forced Congress finally to take action to create a legal structure for the war on terrorism. But one of the actions Congress took in the hastily passed Military Commissions Act was to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over such lawsuits, including those, like Mr. Hamdan's, that were already pending. Under the act, many other important cases will probably have to be dismissed -- which is why Congress should promptly amend the law when it reconvenes in January.

DOJ_NMG_0108170

While the Supreme Court's rulings on this subject have been muddy, U.S. District Judge James Robertson may well have been legally correct in dismissing the case. The fault here lies with Congress, not with any judge. Judge Robertson held that the legislature had unambiguously stripped the courts of jurisdiction over all lawsuits challenging detentions at Guantanamo Bay -- so-called habeas corpus lawsuits. And he ruled as well that Congress had the power under the Constitution to do so -- at least for aliens held beyond American shores. But saying that Congress acted lawfully is not the same as saying it acted wisely.

Stripping the courts of habeas jurisdiction over Guantanamo was a profoundly foolish step to stop judicial review of an administration whose behavior has repeatedly illustrated the crucial importance of such oversight. Virtually every step the administration has taken toward a fairer and more open system for the detention and prosecution of enemy combatants has come as the result of pressure, direct and indirect, of litigation. The decision to respond to the Supreme Court's rebuke by, among other things, sharply limiting judicial review disabled the one mechanism that has consistently pushed policy in a constructive direction. Congress badly needs to reconsider.

Fortunately, the bipartisan leadership of the Senate Judiciary Committee is committed to doing just that. Incoming Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and ranking Republican Arlen Specter (Pa.) are pushing legislation to reestablish habeas jurisdiction for these cases. The new Congress would do a service if it acted swiftly to correct its error.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Discusses Goals, Responds To Critics (NJ)

By Shane Harris

National Journal, December 20, 2006

In February 2005, Michael Chertoff stepped down from a lifetime appointment to the federal bench to lead one of the most far-flung and disjointed bureaucracies in the federal government. Only six months into the job, Hurricane Katrina put the Homeland Security Department's disaster planning and response mission to the test -- and by most accounts it failed in almost every measurable way.

DHS's performance has "improved quite a bit in the past two years," Chertoff said in a December 5 interview with National Journal. But he acknowledged that he didn't anticipate just how high a hill he would have to climb when he became department secretary. "I don't think when I came in I had a clear sense of all the individual tasks that would have to be undertaken."

Looking at the final two years of the Bush administration, Chertoff said that much more needs to be done. He described some of his major goals, responded to his critics, and talked about what lawmakers and the public should -- and shouldn't -- expect from the Homeland Security Department. An edited transcript follows.

NJ: How do you rate the department's performance in one of its key missions, keeping terrorists out of the country?

Chertoff: We've got the watch lists for the known terrorists collected in one place and accessible across the government, which was an issue raised by the 9/11 commission. That's been done.

The next challenge is finding the unknown terrorist. There are two elements to doing that. One is getting more biographical information about people who want to come into the country. We did that by reaching an agreement on passenger name record data with the Europeans. [Homeland Security will collect certain personal information on European airline passengers and screen it for terrorist risk.] And then the second step is biometric data, collecting 10 fingerprints from visitors, which we can run against latent prints that we hold in databases from safe houses, or training camps, or battlefields all over the world. We're rolling out the 10-print collection at consulates in Riyadh, London, and El Salvador.

NJ: How did the new requirement that airline passengers pack carry-on liquids and gels in quart-size plastic bags fare during the biggest travel period of the year, the Thanksgiving holiday?

Chertoff: Since there was very little in the news about it, I think it was a smashing success. There were some bumps in the road, but it was not the story that it was predicted to be. We would ideally like to get to a technology that would allow us to screen all liquids mechanically [for explosives], but it's got to be one that does it efficiently without becoming cumbersome and slow. I constantly have the experience of people telling me that they have a magic bullet, if only we would see it and buy it.

But it works great in a lab, and it doesn't work operationally. If you have to take every bottle out and scan it separately, you're going to be waiting three hours to get on your airplane.

DOJ_NMG_0108171

There was a lot of work done training and preparing and communicating to the public [about the new liquids requirements], and the public responded well. One of the keys to success for us is communication and message, and getting it out there and making sure people understand what we're doing.

NJ: In the wake of Hurricane Katrina, does the public understand that the federal government will not respond immediately to a major catastrophe?

Chertoff: I think everyone intellectually knew that the feds weren't going to be there immediately. The federal government does not own all the response resources. The National Guard is the single biggest response resource. That is controlled by the governors. If you want to send a governor into orbit, suggest that maybe we should have the federal government reach out to control the National Guard in an emergency. They will go ballistic, and that's as it should be. But they must then take the responsibility to make sure that the National Guard is properly trained and able to work. What we have to do is make sure the National Guard training and planning is integrated with ours.

NJ: Does there need to be some public education program for preparing for a disaster?

Chertoff: The basics of preparedness, having a plan, should be the kind of thing we teach in school, in the same way that you were taught in fire drills to stop, drop, and roll. Everybody should have those basics down. I think Katrina shook people up. A lot of messaging and a lot of education, particularly at the local level, is the key.

NJ: What's the most underrated threat right now?

Chertoff: We put a lot of resources into nuclear, radiological, biological countermeasures. That doesn't get a lot of media attention, because the media tend to focus on plots that have already occurred -- aviation, rail. The problem is, the return on investments may never be visible. Maybe terrorists will never get their hands on a nuclear bomb. But if they did, the consequence of not being ready would be catastrophic.

NJ: What's a criticism you most often hear about the department, and how do you respond?

Chertoff: A typical criticism is contract management. Part of that is we get inconsistent signals. Going back to 2002, there were stories about TSA contracts. [Congress required the Transportation Security Administration, now part of DHS, to quickly hire tens of thousands of airport security screeners. Government audits found that contracts with private hiring firms were severely mismanaged and over budget.] What can I tell you? If you tell people you've got to build an organization and get it up and running, and it's a national emergency, you're not going to do the ordinary contracting process, because that takes about a year.

We have to be honest with Congress and the public. We ought to ask the question very directly: Do you want us to short-circuit the contracting rules in a time of national emergency? I don't think it's fair to tell the people in this department, "It's an emergency, get it done yesterday, but when you get it done then we're going to criticize you because you didn't do the full process." That's not fair to people. That's basically saying, heads I win, tails you lose. And that's not right.

I've become more and more convinced that one of the best things I can do is to be completely crystal clear about what it is you want us to do: What are our capabilities, what are you prepared to give us or not give us, what's it going to cost, and what can we deliver? Accountability is not about gotcha. It's about clarity of goal, accurate assessment of capability and of cost, and the deliberate decision-making about what you want to do.

NJ: How are your first interactions going with incoming House Homeland Security Committee Chairman Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., and other congressional overseers?

Chertoff: We're off to a very good start. I'm very happy to meet with everybody involved on the committee, either separately or together. I want to hear what's on their minds.

I want to tell them what's on my mind. We are all going to win or lose together on homeland security. We all share this responsibility. If we protect this country as much as reasonably possible, then we can all say we did the job the American public sent us here to do. I completely believe that everybody on the committee, on both sides, is seriously interested in doing the job and have the right goals. I don't have any doubt about people's objective and motives.

NJ: Nancy Pelosi has said that one of her top priorities will be enacting all of the 9/11 commission recommendations. Where is the department on enacting those?

Chertoff: On the ones that affect us, we're implementing, as far as I know, all of them. I feel comfortable that any impulse to enact those recommendations is going to validate what we're doing.

NJ: Are you anticipating any areas where she's going to say that you're dragging your feet, not doing enough?

Chertoff: I'm not going to put myself in someone else's head. The challenge for us is always implementation. I'm as impatient as everyone else. I fully understand the frustration people feel; I would like everything done yesterday. But I also know that rushing something too quickly is going to wind up breaking it or not have it work properly. My task is to set a deadline and put things just a little bit out of reach so that people are always stretching, but not so far out of reach that I'm imposing a demand that can't possibly be met.

DOJ_NMG_0108172

Acquisition Listed Among DHS Management Challenges (GovExec)

By Jonathan Marino

Government Executive, December 20, 2006

The Homeland Security Department needs to establish a more comprehensive acquisition oversight program and better plan an initiative to secure the borders, according to an inspector general report released Wednesday.

The report on major management challenges said that DHS' contract writing systems are incompatible with the Federal Procurement Data System - Next Generation, a governmentwide repository for information on acquisitions. Department officials also sometimes fail to enter data on certain types of purchases, such as those using government purchase cards, into FPDS-NG, the auditors noted, leading to a potential understatement of contracting activity.

Some of DHS' contract writing systems "may need to be replaced," the IG said. The report did not project what such an effort might cost.

The report also criticized DHS' Secure Border Initiative to integrate technology, personnel and infrastructure along the nation's borders.

"Our main concern about SBInet is that DHS is embarking upon a multibillion-dollar acquisition project without having laid the foundation to effectively oversee and assess contractor performance and effectively control cost and schedule," the report stated. "DHS has not properly defined, validated and stabilized operational requirements."

The IG singled out DHS' Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau and the Coast Guard as needing better financial management. Another report by the auditors pointed at ICE and the Coast Guard as having the most material weaknesses in financial reporting within the department.

In addition, the IG, noting "significant interdependencies" between U.S. Customs and Border Protection and ICE, said "jurisdictional, operational and communication gaps exist between the two organizations that must be addressed by DHS leadership."

DHS Spokesman Jarrod Agen cited ICE's and CBP's joint efforts to end the United States' catch-and-release policy of dealing with illegal immigrants as an example of how both agencies "effectively worked together."

In a written response to the IG, DHS officials said the department will continue to build its acquisition workforce, and "initiatives to resolve personnel shortages will include a centralized recruiting system for contract personnel within DHS components."

Officials responded to an IG recommendation on improving the grants process by stating that DHS has added workshops to "provide grantees with more advance learning opportunities." This fiscal year, the department will initiate a monitoring program to check up on grants awarded, the response said.

DHS also said it will continue to increase staffing levels within its SBInet office and that it plans to expand the CBP Sensitive Compartmented Information Facility to create "collaborative work areas." It will deploy "field intelligence units" next month.

After the report's release, Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee incoming Chairman Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., said he intends to scrutinize DHS spending when he takes the gavel in 2007.

"No one expected that the department would automatically work as a well-oiled machine," he said, in a statement. "A merger of this size takes time, sometimes years, for all the various parts to work well together."

IG Outlines Homeland Security Department Management Challenges (FEDT)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, December 21, 2006

Disaster response, acquisition management and financial management remain major challenges for the Homeland Security Department, according to the department's independent watchdog.

In a report released Dec. 20, Inspector General Richard Skinner writes that almost four years after the government's largest reorganization in a half-century, the department "still has much to do to establish a cohesive, efficient and effective organization."

Citing Homeland Security's "failures" after Hurricane Katrina, Skinner said the event highlighted longstanding problems at the Federal Emergency Management Agency in managing assistance and housing for disaster evacuees, information and systems, contracts, grants and flood insurance.

The IG also is conducting reviews of FEMA's intake process for evacuees, its management of the national flood insurance program, and its acquisition management structure, the report says. And last month, the IG announced plans to investigate

DOJ_NMG_0108173

FEMA's spending and claims that the agency failed to properly consider small- and minority-owned businesses for some contracts.

This latest report calls upon FEMA to speed up efforts to share data with other agencies, noting that "FEMA and the federal community are not ready to meet the data sharing requirements of the next catastrophic disaster."

In the area of contract management, the report says the department should provide better ethics training for procurement officials, hire more program managers who have experience, and install program management controls. Among the seven agencies within DHS that have their own procurement offices, "many . . . reported that their lack of staffing prevents proper procurement planning and severely limits their ability to monitor contractor performance," the report stated.

The IG singled out DHS' Secure Border Initiative and the Coast Guard's troubled fleet modernization program, called Deepwater, as efforts that present substantial risk due to their size and complexity.

For the fourth straight year, DHS could not obtain an opinion on its financial statements in 2006, due to component agencies' inability to produce enough support for their stated financial positions. In September, the department's new chief financial officer, David Norquist, suspended efforts to merge the eight financial systems in the department, calling the effort too disruptive.

Auditors have identified material weaknesses in areas like budgetary accounting and undelivered orders at DHS agencies, particularly at the Coast Guard and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. The components have corrective action plans for those problems, but a separate report by auditor KPMG LLP calls many of those plans insufficient and behind schedule.

How Biometric Security Is Far From Foolproof (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Growing numbers of companies are relying on biometric devices like fingerprint readers and iris scanners to identify customers and employees and make sure they aren't poseurs.

But with increasing use has come increasing worry that these security devices can be faked out. Deception methods including well-made copies of fingerprints, masks or contact lenses that replicate iris patterns might be used to defeat the new identification technologies.

In a sign of the growing fears, Financial Services Technology Consortium, a New York-based group of financial institutions, has hired a consulting firm to examine how successful biometric devices are at thwarting impersonation -- or "spoofing," as biometricians like to call it.

The preliminary view of the consultants, International Biometric Group, based on an early look at research, is that the devices aren't spoof-proof.

"Any high-resolution fingerprint image will have a high chance of spoofing an optical sensor," says Ross Mitchell of International Biometric. He says most fingerprint-sensing technologies -- which essentially take a picture of a fingerprint and match it against a database -- are potentially vulnerable to spoofing. Systems that use sensors that aren't optical but rely on thermal or ultrasonic imaging, may be less vulnerable to fakery, "but they're still susceptible," Mr. Mitchell says.

In 2002, Tsutomu Matsumoto, a mathematician at Yokohama National University in Japan, reported he had fooled a number of fingerprint readers by creating fake fingers out of the kind of gelatin used in candy Gummy bears. Researchers at Biomedical Signal Analysis Laboratory at West Virginia University have reported they were able to fool various types of fingerprint readers between 40% and 94% of the time using cadaver fingers or fingers made of Play-Doh.

Use of biometrics in various applications is exploding. Scott Moody, chairman of AuthenTec Inc., a Melbourne, Fla., company that is the largest maker of chips used for reading fingerprints, says it will sell 6.7 million chips this year, more than double the three million last year. Fingerprint readers are increasingly common on cellphones in Japan and Korea.

Mr. Moody estimates that about 9% of all laptop computers shipped next year will have fingerprint readers to secure and simplify remote log-ons. John Morris, president of Solidus Networks Inc., a San Francisco company whose Pay By Touch system is used by a growing number of retailers, says it now has readers installed in almost 3,000 stores, up from 30 just 18 months ago.

International Biometric estimates the total market this year rose 47% to about $2.2 billion from $1.5 billion last year.

Makers of biometric devices downplay the risk of spoofing. Mr. Moody of AuthenTec says most reported spoofs have involved making a mold of a finger, which would be difficult without the individual's knowledge. Experts say it would be even more difficult to make an accurate finger replica from a latent print on a glass.

Mr. Morris -- whose Pay By Touch system is in use at 3,000 retail locations, up from just 30 two years ago -- says "the chances are extraordinarily low. We've never had an incident of any kind." He says that even if spoofing is theoretically possible, fingerprint readers are less vulnerable to thieves and hackers than credit-cards or passwords.

DOJ_NMG_0108174

International Biometric says the testing it is doing will provide buyers useful guidance about potential risks. Mr. Mitchell says the researchers have proved that even sophisticated fingerprint scanners, "despite high matching accuracy, could be fooled using cheap materials." The tests will be completed during the 2007 third quarter with results reported to the sponsor in the fourth quarter.

Iris recognition technology, which is becoming increasingly popular because it is considered more accurate than fingerprint reading, may be more difficult to spoof. Mr. Mitchell says there have been informal reports that some scanners have been fooled by high-resolution photos of the eye.

Some eye scanners now include a flashing light designed to make the pupil contract to prove the eyeball is real. International Biometric plans to test whether it can design a contact lens with an imposter's iris pattern to fool a scanner. Currently it doesn't plan to test face recognition or handprint geometry biometric devices.

Quest For Anthrax Vaccine Lengthens (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

The cancellation of a high-profile contract to produce 75 million doses of a new anthrax vaccine leaves federal heath officials years away from a replacement for the version now in use but could raise the prospects for an alternative being developed by a British competitor.

VaxGen of Brisbane, Calif., was scheduled to begin delivering a new anthrax vaccine this year, but after delays and technical problems, the Department of Health and Human Services voided the $877.5 million contract Tuesday. The department has not announced plans to replace it, but an alternative version being developed by Avecia of Manchester, England, is being tested, and the National Institutes of Health is expected to award contracts next year for research into advanced vaccines.

The VaxGen contract was the largest piece of the Bush administration's $5.6 billion Project BioShield, which seeks to develop modern vaccines and drugs to counter chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear threats.

"The first thing to do, on HHS's part, is to explain why this failed," said Tara O'Toole, director of the Center for Biosecurity at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center. "All of the companies are wondering, does this mean that HHS is an unreliable partner or that this was just kind of bad luck."

HHS canceled the contract after VaxGen missed its deadline Monday to begin human testing because of concerns at the Food and Drug Administration about the product's reliability. Agency officials declined to elaborate on the reasons for the cancellation.

VaxGen was to develop a replacement for a version of the vaccine currently used by the military and made by Emergent BioSolutions of Gaithersburg. That drug must be administered over 18 months in six shots and has been subject to controversy. Some soldiers have resisted being vaccinated and others have complained about side effects, but the FDA has said the drug is safe.

HHS had hoped that VaxGen's vaccine could be produced more quickly in an emergency and administered over a shorter period of time. "It just illustrates the uncertainty that surrounds developing a vaccine. Even in the best of circumstances, it's a risky undertaking," said Robert Kadlec, the former director for biodefense on the White House's Homeland Security Council. "But when you put it in the hands of a company that hasn't had a proven product, it's even chancier."

It is unclear how soon any of the alternatives could be produced. Emergent is working on improvements to its vaccine, including halving the number of shots required and extending its shelf life beyond three years, a company spokesman said. The U.S. Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases plans to spend $14 million in fiscal 2007 researching anthrax vaccines as well as treatments and diagnostic tools.

Avecia, which has an NIH contract to develop a vaccine, may be the closest to an alternative. The company has produced some preliminary data from human tests, Michael Kurilla, director of the Office of Biodefense Research Affairs at NIH, said. "So far the vaccine has been demonstrated to be safe," Kurilla said. But those human trials are not completed and the FDA will review the results, he said. It is unclear how long it would take for the product to be ready for wide distribution.

"There are still a number of specific actions you have to do in terms of bringing a product to commercial-scale production," Kurilla said.

In June, Avecia was awarded a $4 million grant from the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases to develop another version of the vaccine that would not need refrigeration. "That is much earlier in the pipeline," Kurilla said. An Avecia spokesman did not return a call for comment.

The NIH is also spearheading research on a third generation of the vaccine. That version could be stored at room temperature, would require fewer doses, and would not require a needle, Kurilla said. One or more contracts will be awarded next year, he said. "This is not something that is going to be a short-term event," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108175

WAR NEWS:

President Bush On Iraq, Elections And Immigration (WP)

The Washington Post, December 20, 2006

This 25-minute interview was conducted yesterday in the Oval Office by Washington Post staff writers Peter Baker, Michael A. Fletcher and Michael Abramowitz.

President Bush: Listen, a couple of things before we get going. Obviously, I've been thinking about -- and talking to a lot of people about -- the way forward in Iraq and the way forward in this ideological struggle. I want to share one thought I had with you, and I'm inclined to believe that we do need to increase our troops, the Army, the Marines. And I talked about this to [Defense] Secretary [Robert M.] Gates, and he is going to spend some time talking to the folks in the building, come back with a recommendation to me about how to proceed forward on this idea. I want to give him a little time to get his feet on the ground. And so I'll be addressing this after consultations with him. I just want to share that with you before we get going.

You're talking about troops in Iraq, not --

No, I'm talking about overall size.

-- overall size of the Army. Do you have a rough idea how much --

I'm going to wait for Secretary Gates. As I say, I'm inclined to believe it's important and necessary to do so. The reason why is, it is an accurate reflection that this ideological war we're in is going to last for a while, and that we're going to need a military that's capable of being able to sustain our efforts and to help us achieve peace.

So you've not made a decision about Iraq, per se, about what to do --

I have not, Mike, I have not. And we'll spend some more time -- Secretary Gates, as he indicated, is going to head to the region at some point in time. I need to talk to him when he gets back. I've got more consultations to do with the national security team, which will be consulting with other folks. And I'm going to take my time to make sure that the policy, when it comes out, the American people will see that we are -- have got a new way forward to achieve an important objective, which is a country that can govern, sustain and defend itself.

And one thing that will be clear is that I want the American people to know that -- and the Iraqi people to know that -- we expect the Iraqi people to continue making hard choices and doing hard work necessary to succeed, and our job is to help them do so.

Are we winning in Iraq, in your estimation?

You know, I think an interesting construct that General [Peter] Pace uses is, "We're not winning, we're not losing." There's been some very positive developments. And you take a step back and look at progress in Iraq, you say, well, it's amazing -- constitutional democracy in the heart of the Middle East, which is a remarkable development in itself.

I think one of the -- obviously, the real problem we face is the sectarian violence that needs to be dealt with. So part of my policy review is how do we deal with that in a way that then enables the Iraqi people to live in a more secure society so that the government can prove its worth to the people -- saying, we can help you. And one of the main functions of government is to provide security for its people. Our job is to help the Iraqis provide that security. And I'll come forward with a plan that will enable us to achieve that objective.

There's other threats, by the way. It's a multiple-front war, if you really think about it. You got Shia discord in the south; you've got Sunni attacks, much of that -- many of them are caused by al-Qaeda. A lot of them, former Baathists and regimists who are angry that Saddam is no longer in power, and they are a source of conflict in al-Anbar province. And we've got a very robust effort -- I said the other day something that, I guess, people didn't pay that much attention to -- but for October and November and the first week of December, our actions on the ground have -- as a result of action on the ground, we killed or captured nearly 5,900 people. My point in making that point is our troops and coalition troops are on the offense in a lot of areas.

And then the third area of conflict, the one that gets a lot of attention, as it should, is the sectarian violence taking place in Baghdad. And I fully understand that we've got to help the Iraqis deal with that. So my thinking is -- and a lot of our strategy sessions revolve around how best to deal with this problem, and how best to help the Iraqis deal with it. And I've got some more work to do, and I'll come forth at the appropriate time and explain the way forward to the country.

Given the election results, is increasing the troop level in Iraq even a viable possibility or option?

Yes, Mike, all options are viable.

-- given the political will out there?

Well, all options are viable. I think what the people want is -- they want a couple of things. They want to see Democrats and Republicans work together to achieve a common objective, and they want us to win in Iraq. A lot of people understand that if we leave Iraq, there will be dire consequences -- in other words, if we leave before the job is done. There are some, a fair number of people, who say, "Get out now." So I view the election results as people are not satisfied with the progress being made in Iraq and expect to see a different strategy to achieve an important objective.

DOJ_NMG_0108176

But the election results seemed people wanted to bring the venture in Iraq to closure. That seemed to be the strong lesson. And what indications are there that you're actually listening to that sentiment?

Oh, Mike, look, I want to achieve the objective. I think the American people -- I know the American people are very worried about an external threat and that they recognize that failure in Iraq would embolden that external threat, and they expect this administration to listen with people, to work with Democrats, to work with the military, to work with the Iraqis to put a plan in place that achieves the objective. There's not a lot of people saying, "Get out now." Most Americans are saying, "We want to achieve the objective."

But there are a lot of people who are saying, "Let's get out with a phased deployment over a certain period of time."

If they felt -- if that leads to victory, it needs to be seriously considered. And I'm considering all options and listening very carefully to a lot of good people who have got different opinions about how to proceed.

Can we come back to General Pace's formulation about winning, not losing? You said October 24th, "Absolutely, we're winning." And I wanted to --

Yes, that was an indication of my belief we're going to win. Look, I've got four constituencies I speak to on a regular basis; one is the American people, who are justifiably frustrated at the progress in Iraq. And they expect the commander in chief and the people in Washington to support our troops. Supporting our troops not only means good equipment, good [pay], good housing -- it also means a plan that helps achieve the objective.

The second constituency is the enemy. I'm not through yet.

Sure.

The enemy wants to know whether or not the United States has the will to stay engaged in this ideological struggle. They don't believe we do. That's what they say. And I believe that's what they believe.

The third group of people I speak to are the Iraqis. They wonder whether the United States has got the will to help them achieve their objectives. That's what they wonder. The leaders I have talked to wonder whether or not -- what the elections mean, or what the Baker-Hamilton commission means, or what changing [former defense] secretary [Donald H.] Rumsfeld means -- that's what they wonder. But in the back of their mind, they're saying, "Are they going to leave us again?" And that's an important question for them to have answered, because in order to make difficult choices and to take risk for peace, they're going to have to be assured that they'll get support. This is a group of people that have had their hopes dashed in the past.

And the fourth group is the military. Our troops wonder whether or not our country supports them, and they do. They wonder whether or not the mission and the sacrifice and the toil that they're making is worth it. And they need to know from the commander in chief: Not only is it worth it, but I strongly support them and believe that their work will lead to victory. That's what I believe.

Anyway, you just need to know that's who I'm speaking to when I speak. And to you, of course. You're the objective filter through which my -- (Laughter.)

I suspect your message gets out. (Laughter.)

I do want to say something about the press. I hope you realize that, one, I enjoy the relationship, and two, know it is vital for my presidency. You can't exist without me, and I can't exist without you. And I generally respect the hard work of the press corps. I don't necessarily generally respect every word you write, but nevertheless, I do respect the fact that you're a hardworking group of people seeking the truth. And we're necessary for each other. And that relationship can either be a positive relationship or a suspicious, harmful relationship. And I have worked hard to make it a positive relationship. And I think it is, generally, I do believe it is. And I bear no ill will, and I don't think you do, either.

We appreciate that, and you've certainly been good for business --

Good. That's what decision-makers do, Peter, people who seize the moment and make decisions to lead give people things to write about.

Some of the supporters of the war and you from the beginning have begun to ask the question publicly: Was it, in fact, the idea that turned out not so great, or the execution that turned out not so great?

The idea of?

The idea of the war in the first place, and the --

I've never really asked that question. I believe it's justifiable and necessary. Obviously, the war has not -- the results on the ground haven't happened as quickly as I hoped, and part of this review process is to develop new strategies and tactics so that we can expedite success. Look, I of all people would like to see the troops come home. But I don't want them to come home without achieving our objective, because I understand what happens if there's failure. And I'm going to keep repeating this over and over again, that I believe we're in an ideological struggle that is -- that our country will be dealing with for a long time.

DOJ_NMG_0108177

Can I ask you a question about history?

Yes.

President Lincoln fired a number of his generals in the Civil War until he found Grant.

Is that what triggered your question, looking at Abe?

Why haven't you fired any generals? And does the fact that you haven't fired generals suggest that you are satisfied with the military strategy that they have pursued?

We're reviewing the strategy, because it has -- the results aren't -- we haven't achieved the results as quickly as we wanted -- precisely what the secretary of defense said, by the way. And the chain-of-command issues are issues that percolate up through the Pentagon. And there is a clear chain of command that I adhere to, and I think it's important for the commander in chief to do just that.

I've often talked about how it's important to trust the judgment of the military when they're making military plans as the key advisers to the president, as opposed to the president determining the tactics on the ground, which has happened in previous wars. And so I'm a strict adherer to the command structure.

But isn't there a point in which you say, "We screwed up the amount of troops we need there, we screwed up the WMD, someone ought to pay a penalty for that"?

There is a constant review of the commanders, and I support that constant review. And to the extent that people think they can do -- somebody can do a better job, those recommendations will come forward.

Sir, when you look back at last month's election, do you see that strictly as a repudiation of Iraq and the fact that we're not winning in Iraq, or is it also a judgment of your leadership in general?

Michael, I said in my press conference, I think it's -- no question Iraq was a significant part of the elections. People were troubled by the lack of progress. War is difficult for people, particularly the American people are very compassionate people. When you turn on your TV screens and see bombings and deaths, and read about beheadings or sectarian violence, it troubles America. And they wonder or not -- whether or not we have a plan that succeeds. And I can understand that level of frustration.

Secondly, there's a sense that people's votes were being taken for granted, in a way. We had ethics disputes, and just a lot of signals that said that it's time to -- that people wanted a change. There was a lot of -- look, you've got a guy using earmarks to enrich himself; there was sex and all kinds of issues that sent the signal that perhaps it was time to give another group a chance to lead. I also believe that people are sick and tired of the needless partisanship in Washington. And there's a lot of it. And for some, every expression of position by somebody is an opportunity to attack, and people are tired of it. And there's some big issues that we need to work together.

I will tell you that I view the elections as an opportunity to say to all of us in Washington, "Let's work together." People want that. And what are some issues we can work together on -- energy, or immigration, budgetary reforms. I mean, there's a lot -- education, No Child Left Behind reauthorization. I believe there are some wonderful opportunities --

So you don't think you're out of the policy business with the Democrats in charge on the Hill?

Do what now?

You're not out of the domestic policy business --

Quite the contrary. Quite the contrary. The microphone of the president has never been louder, and I think we have a good -- in other words, to talk about what I think is important. But it turns out that what I think is important, the Democrat leadership thinks is important, as well -- energy security, immigration reform, education -- and Republicans on the Hill agree. And so my task is going to be to talk about big issues that the American people expect us to work on, and work with both Republicans and Democrats.

Will it be easier with Democrats, in some ways? Are there some issues --

I think the legislative process, Peter, is always hard, from the executive-branch perspective. They're pretty independent-minded people, they -- no matter who's in charge, they tend to take some ideas from the president, but they've got their own minds. And the task is to work together in a collegial and constructive spirit to solve some big problems.

I'll tell you one I want to work on, as well, is entitlements. And that's a hard issue, as you know. Social Security is viewed as the third rail of American politics. I've campaigned on it every time -- two times I ran for president. I've talked about it in the State of the Union every time. It's an issue that's -- a president is just going to have to keep talking about to convince people it's worthwhile to take the risk, the political -- so-called political risk to work together to get something done. And we will continue to do so. [Treasury Secretary Henry M.] Paulson is going to take the lead for us up there, working with members of both parties.

DOJ_NMG_0108178

I will tell you this: In an issue like this, unless the president tries, nothing is going to happen. Without presidential involvement, nothing will happen. So we have a chance, and I'm going to work it. And I think that's -- I know that's the job of the president, is to say, "This is important to the future of the country, let us work together."

Yes, sir.

Just on that point, are you willing to sit down with Democrats in a commission that puts all the options on Social Security on the table? Not just reductions and benefits, not just private accounts, but also some kind of revenue increases, tax increases?

I don't see how you can move forward without people feeling comfortable about putting ideas on the table. I have made it clear that I've got a way forward that can do it and I want to hear other people's opinions. And that's what Hank Paulson is telling both Republicans and Democrats. It's going to be very important for people to feel there can be a full, wide-ranging discussion about how to move forward.

And specifically, tax increases on the table then?

Well, specifically, personal accounts; specifically, everything that the Democrats think will work, as well.

Well, they talk about tax increases.

Well, let them; that's fine. They can come to the table and talk about them. I proposed a way forward that doesn't require tax increases. Nevertheless, I look forward to hearing their opinions.

[Incoming Speaker of the House] Mrs. Pelosi has identified six or seven things that she wants the House to do in the first 100 hours. Can I just mention -- ask you in a bullet-point way just your point on this?

No. (Laughter.)

Minimum-wage increase -- generally supportive or against it?

Generally supportive. But, no, the answer is no, you can't. (Laughter.)

Look, here's the challenge. The challenge is to find out specifically what they have in mind and to explain to them areas where we can work together and can't work together. I'm pleased with our initial round of discussions. I fully understand that they're going to come out with this -- they made it very clear. And I want to work with them on issues where we can find common ground.

On immigration -- you mentioned immigration. Can you envision supporting a deal --

See, now you're getting me to negotiate with myself --

No, no, no, but this is a policy --

Same thing he's trying to do. (Laughter.) It's a classic ploy. (Laughter.)

This is about your policy, Sir, in terms of can you envision a deal in which you would agree with Democrats that would not necessarily have a majority support among Republicans --

Peter, remember the speech I gave right here in the Oval Office?

I remember several.

The one on immigration. I gave a comprehensive speech to the country from the Oval Office, prime time, about how I thought we ought to move forward on immigration. I still feel very strongly about that. And I hope that Congress will join me on a comprehensive bill, and I would hope that the majority of both parties support it.

[Former House] speaker Hastert had a policy that he would not put forward a bill that didn't have a majority support of his caucus. Is that important to you, having majority support of the Republican caucuses?

I'm interested in getting a comprehensive bill out, because I believe it is vital to solving the pressure we have on our border.

One of the interesting things that, if you notice from the recent enforcement activities that ICE took, there are a lot of people who are using forged documents to do jobs Americans are not doing. And my attitude is that there ought to be a way for people to come to this country on a temporary basis and fill those jobs in an open way, a transparent way, that doesn't cause there to be, one, a smuggling operation that's vibrant and making money, a housing operation that is illegal, and a document forgery operation that clearly is in effect.

There is a better way to treat people, and there's a better way to deal with the issue of finding workers Americans are not doing, to fill on a temporary basis. And, therefore, there need -- and that in itself will take pressure off our border. In other words, if people feel like they can come in on a temporary, legal basis, they're not going to have to sneak in, which in itself does away with -- that in itself does away with this kind of underground industry that has sprung up.

The point I make to you on that is that it's a comprehensive reform of the immigration system that is going to make our borders more secure. I strongly believe that is important, and look forward to working with people on the way forward. It's hard for me to predict the dynamics yet on how the Congress is going to handle the immigration bill. The point I'm telling you is that I think it's vital and necessary, and this is an area where we can work together to get it done.

DOJ_NMG_0108179

I'd like to come back to your first statement, because I'd like to expand a little bit. You talked about the size of the military. Colin Powell said on a Sunday show that the Army was nearly broken. Do you believe that's true? And, if so, do you feel responsible for that? Do you --

I heard -- we have been transforming our Army to make it lighter, more lethal and easier to move, and that transformation has been very important. Secondly, we have been changing our force posture around the world to reflect the threats of the 21st century, and that has been a very important reform.

I also believe that the suggestions I've heard from outside our government, plus people inside the government -- particularly, the Pentagon -- that we need to think about increasing our force structure makes sense, and I will work with Secretary Gates to do so. He's going to come back and report --

So is our Army nearly broken, or not?

The people that would know best are those in the Pentagon. I haven't heard the word "broken," but I've heard the word "stressed." I know that we need to -- and my budgetary requests will reflect what a lot of people in Congress have been saying and in the Pentagon, and that is we need to reset our military. There's no question the military has been used a lot. And the fundamental question is, will Republicans and Democrats be able to work with the administration to assure our military and the American people that we will position our military so that it is ready and able to stay engaged in a long war, and this ideological struggle?

Can I ask a hometown question?

Final question -- yes, which one, Crawford, Midland, Houston, Dallas or Washington?

Washington. Do you support a bill that would give the District of Columbia residents a vote in the House of Representatives?

This is a Fletcher question. This is a Fletcher question.

He's not asking about a specific question. We're asking about your broad view on --

Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?

I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes.

But what is your philosophical view of that? Because we've gone to Iraq to provide freedom for people in Iraq, and the people in this country --

I understand that. You're trying to get me to opine on specific legislation that may be forthcoming, and I look forward to working with Congress on that.

I'm actually asking you to opine on general --

That's my answer. (Laughter.)

-- philosophy on whether --

I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes.

Is Vice President Cheney correct, do you believe that secretary Rumsfeld was the best defense secretary?

I think he was one of the finest defense secretaries, and I said that there have been more profound change -- policy change under his leadership than at any time since the formation of the Defense Department.

Thank you.

Bush Concedes US 'not Winning' In Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

President George W. Bush publicly said on Wednesday that insurgents in Iraq had this year succeeded in fomenting sectarian violence, undermining the Iraqi government and thwarting US efforts to secure stability.

Replacing his confident assertion of October that "absolutely we are winning in Iraq", Mr Bush told The Washington Post on Tuesday: "We're not winning, we're not losing."

But the president seemed to retreat from this bleak assessment at a year-end press conference on Wednesday saying that comment "reflected the fact that we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted".

On the day that General John Abizaid, the US's top commander in the Middle East, announced his resignation, Mr Bush contrasted the optimism he had felt at the start of the year, when the Iraqis held elections, with a recognition that the insurgents had since enjoyed successes.

"The enemies of liberty...hurt our efforts to help the Iraqis rebuild their country," he said.

In the most visible sign that the administration recognises the need to radically change its military posture, Mr Bush said he wanted to increase the "permanent size of both the United States army and the United States marines".

DOJ_NMG_0108180

Mr Bush said he was still considering whether he would increase troop numbers in Iraq.

His decision reflects a clear repudiation of the strategy adopted by Donald Rumsfeld, former defence secretary, to create a smaller, agile military.

The tone of the press conference reflected a hesitant president, conscious of his legacy, struggling to find a way out of Iraq and redefine his agenda after losing control of the House and Senate.

Bush Warns Of More U.S. Losses In Iraq (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, December 21, 2006

Acknowledging deepening frustration over Iraq, President Bush said Wednesday he is considering an increase in American forces and warned that next year will bring more painful U.S. losses. New Defense Secretary Robert Gates said in Baghdad that a troop surge was an obvious option.

Bush was unusually candid at a year-end news conference about U.S. setbacks and dashed hopes in the war, which has claimed the lives of more than 2,950 U.S. military members.

He said "2006 was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people. We began the year with optimism" but that faded as extremists fomented sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shiites.

"And over the course of the year they had success," the president acknowledged. "Their success hurt our efforts to help the Iraqis rebuild their country, it set back reconciliation, it kept Iraq's unity government and our coalition from establishing security and stability throughout the country."

Democrats are about to claim control of Congress and Americans are overwhelmingly unhappy about Bush's handling of the war, so the president is at a turning point as he searches for new approaches. Administration officials said Bush's remarks were intended to brace a war-weary nation for another tough year in Iraq.

The heavy cost of the war also came into focus as the Pentagon circulated a request for an additional $99.7 billion to pay for the fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan. If embraced by Bush and approved by Congress, the proposal would boost this year's budget for those wars to about $170 billion.

So far, four years of war in Iraq have cost about $350 billion.

On just his third day as secretary, Gates made an unannounced visit to Baghdad to review options with senior American commanders. He said no decisions have been made.

"We discussed the obvious things," Gates told reporters. "We discussed the possibility of a surge and the potential for what it might accomplish."

Gates said he was only beginning to determine how to reshape U.S. war policy. He also said he would confer with top Iraqi officials about what America's role should be in Iraq. Bush is awaiting Gates' recommendations before making a speech in January announcing changes in strategy and tactics.

The shift in policy is likely to be accompanied by a shuffle of top American generals in Iraq. Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, has submitted plans to go ahead with a retirement that is months overdue. And the top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, has indicated he may not stay much longer than the end of this year.

Abizaid and Casey have opposed sending more troops to Iraq, and their departures could make it easier for Bush to send more soldiers to the war. One option calls for sending five or more additional combat brigades — roughly 20,000 or more troops.

Apart from any increase in Iraq, Bush said the military's overall size should be increased to relieve the heavy strain on U.S. troops, reversing the previous position of his administration during Donald Rumsfeld's Pentagon tenure. Bush also said a troop surge in Iraq would have to be for a specific mission.

His remarks appeared intended to address doubts voiced by prominent military officials who worry that sending more troops to Iraq would be ineffective and put more demands on an already-stretched U.S. military.

"There's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with the addition of more troops before, you know, I agree on that strategy," the president said.

The administration says many questions have to be answered about sending in more troops: What would be their purpose, what would they do, how long would they stay and what is the Iraqi government's view on the rules of engagement for more U.S. forces? Also, would the additional troops serve in training positions, in combat, to help civilian forces or for a combination of those roles?

"I'm not going to make predictions about what 2007 will look like in Iraq except that it's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices because the enemy is merciless and violent," the president said.

Bush was unwavering about U.S. goals for Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable," he said. "It hadn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would have. ...

DOJ_NMG_0108181

"But I also don't believe most Americans want us just to get out now," the president said. "A lot of Americans understand the consequences of defeat. Retreat would embolden radicals. It would hurt the credibility of the United States."

Bush stepped back from his confident assertion two months ago that "absolutely, we're winning" in Iraq. Wednesday, he said, "We're not winning. We're not losing."

The president said he changed his formulation because "we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted ... and that the conditions are tough in Iraq, particularly in Baghdad."

He said his original remark, on Oct. 25, was made in the spirit that "I believe that we're going to win. I believe that — and, by the way, if I didn't think that, I wouldn't have our troops there."

Bush Asserts That Victory In Iraq Is Still 'Achievable' (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — President Bush warned Americans on Wednesday that the war in Iraq would require "difficult choices and additional sacrifices" in the coming year, but he firmly rejected the notion that the war could not be won and vowed that the United States would not be "run out of the Middle East" by extremists and radicals.

Mr. Bush, appearing somber and at times reflective during his traditional year-end news conference, conceded that 2006, which began on a note of optimism as nearly 12 million Iraqis voted in free elections, turned into "a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people." He cited "unspeakable sectarian violence," calling it "one aspect of this war that has not gone right."

But after a month in which he has been under pressure to change course in Iraq — from Democrats who want a gradual withdrawal of troops and from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, whose report implied that he should reframe his goals away from democracy toward mere stability — the president showed no indication that he was inclined to change goals or pull out of Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable," Mr. Bush said, addressing reporters in the ornate Indian Treaty Room across the street from the White House, in a historic office building once used by the Navy. He added, "Our goal remains a free and democratic Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself and is an ally in the war on terror."

Mr. Bush also used the news conference to confirm his plans, disclosed Tuesday in an interview with The Washington Post, to propose an increase in the permanent size of both the Army and the Marines. He called the global campaign against terrorism "the calling of our generation," and he said the military needed to be beefed up to fight it.

"I want the enemy to understand that this is a tough task, but they can't run us out of the Middle East, that they can't intimidate America," Mr. Bush said.

But the president gave little hint of what he would do in Iraq. Though he has been considering proposals to send additional troops to Baghdad in the short term, Mr. Bush said he was still listening to military commanders — some of whom are said to be skeptical of a short-term increase — and had not yet made up his mind. He is expected to outline his Iraq strategy after the first of the year.

As Mr. Bush contemplates that new strategy, some advisers have been urging him to diminish public expectations by steering clear of talk about victory and of Iraq as a beacon of democracy in the Middle East. Some said his language on Wednesday was not helpful.

"Victory is not a good word to use," said Barry R. McCaffrey, a retired general who has been advising the administration and has said he believes that there is still time for Mr. Bush to turn around the situation in Iraq. "It implies that there is a military outcome in the short term that ends violence, and that's not going to happen."

Instead, the president has altered his language in another way. In the interview with The Post, he dropped his previous assertion — made before the November elections — that "we are winning" in favor of the murkier idea that the United States was neither winning nor losing. On Wednesday, he tried to explain.

"The first comment was done in this spirit: I believe that we're going to win," the president said, adding, "My comments yesterday reflected the fact that we're not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted, when I said it at the time, and that the conditions are tough in Iraq, particularly in Baghdad."

With Republicans having lost control of Congress after an election that was widely viewed as a referendum on the war, and polls showing public support for the war at record lows, Mr. Bush is caught in the difficult spot of coming up with a policy that will satisfy the public and Democrats, while also producing substantive change.

But his comments on Wednesday left Democrats cold.

The incoming speaker of the House, Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, complained that the president gave no indication "that he is willing to make the changes needed to reverse the disastrous situation in Iraq."

A former adviser to the Democratic presidential campaign of Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts said the president owed an apology to Mr. Kerry, who proposed increasing the size of the military, only to be ridiculed by Republicans. "I think you could say that so far, in this re-evaluation process, he is only dressing up 'Stay the course,' " said the adviser, Richard C. Holbrooke, a former ambassador to the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0108182

Some Republicans have said that until Mr. Bush gets the situation in Iraq under control, he will be unable to move forward with his domestic agenda on Capitol Hill. But the president expressed optimism on Wednesday that he could work with Democrats in 2007 — perhaps to the chagrin of some in his own party, who fear the president will cut them loose to join with the opposition on issues like Social Security, immigration and energy independence.

"You know, there's a lot of attitude here that says, 'Well, you lost the Congress, therefore you're not going to get anything done,' " Mr. Bush said. "Quite the contrary. I have an interest to get things done, and the Democrats have an interest to get something done."

Mr. Bush is not one for introspection, and he expressed little sense on Wednesday that he regretted his decisions in Iraq, other than to say, "The most painful aspect of my presidency is the fact that I know my decisions have caused young men and women to lose their lives."

Still, with just two years left in his administration, the president hinted that he was thinking about his legacy — even as he denied that it was foremost on his mind.

"Look, everybody's trying to write the history of this administration even before it's over," Mr. Bush said. "I'm reading about George Washington still. My attitude is, if they're still analyzing No. 1, 43 ought not to worry about it, and just do what he thinks is right, make the tough choices necessary."

Dour Bush Talks Of 'New Way Forward' (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush, saying he was still considering options for "a new way forward" in Iraq, delivered an uncharacteristically dour assessment Wednesday of the war there and called 2006 a "difficult year" in which extremists successfully thwarted efforts to establish security and stability in the country.

Appearing reflective in a year-end news conference, Bush said the optimism generated after Iraqis elected a new government last December had fallen away, as extremists undertook "a deliberate strategy to foment sectarian violence between Sunnis and Shia. And over the course of the year, they had success. Their success hurt our efforts to help the Iraqis rebuild their country."

With Bush reassessing his Iraq policy and expecting to announce changes early next month, his statements reflected a new willingness to acknowledge that the sectarian violence in Iraq has grown consistently worse and political cooperation there is flagging. He has come under intense pressure to change course in the war from Democrats, from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and because of mid-term elections that saw his party lose control of Congress.

Bush said he would work with Republicans and Democrats "and listen to ideas from every corridor" to redraw his approach. But the president also said he would not change his objective. "Our goal remains a free and democratic Iraq that can govern itself, sustain itself, and defend itself, and is an ally in this war on terror," he said.

Moreover, he said that U.S. troops remained in Iraq because they will be successful. "Victory in Iraq is achievable," he said. "It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would have. ... But I also don't believe most Americans want us just to get out now."

Bush said he would not adjust his Iraq policies until talking with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, who was sworn in on Monday and by Wednesday had landed in Baghdad to meet with U.S. commanders and others there. One option under consideration is a temporary increase in U.S. troop levels. Bush said such a surge was not certain, and that before he sends in additional troops, "there must be a specific mission that can be accomplished."

In Baghdad, Gates gave no hints as to what new strategy he preferred, but he acknowledged he and U.S. generals had discussed the possibility of a surge of U.S. forces into the Iraqi capital.

Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the commander of U.S. forces in Iraq, who has been resistant to proposals to increase troop levels, appeared to qualify his objections after meeting with Gates. "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea," he told a news conference.

"What I want to see happen is, if we do bring more American troops here, they help us progress toward our strategic objectives," Casey said.

Bush's comments on Wednesday did not satisfy senior Democratic leaders in Congress. In similar statements, Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic Senate leader, and Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, the incoming House speaker, said Bush did not understand the need for a more dramatic change in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0108183

"The president seems lost within his own rhetoric," Reid said. "He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war." Reid, who has given qualified support to increasing troops in Iraq if it leads to Iraqis picking up security responsibilities, also said that Bush should follow the course that Democrats and the Iraq Study Group recommended for withdrawal of U.S. troops.

Sen. Hillary R. Clinton, D-N.Y., said on NBC's Today Show that her support for a temporary troop increase would depend on their mission.

"Everyone knows there is no military solution to the difficulties we face in Iraq," she said. "There has to be a broad-based, comprehensive approach that includes resolving some of the political issues, bringing the region together."

Bush spoke in the Indian Treaty Room, an elaborate, marble-encrusted two-story at the top of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building next door to the White House.

Bush said he was optimistic about working on a range of issues with the Democrats who will lead Congress in January. He said he supported an increase in the minimum wage -- a proposal that is a top priority for Democrats. But Bush said he wanted to pair the increase with a cut in taxes and regulations to make it less costly for small businesses.

Efforts to link a hike in the minimum wage to tax cuts have repeatedly failed during Bush time in office, despite Republican control of Congress.

Democrats have objected to linking the wage increase to tax cuts, and Drew Hammill, a spokesman for Pelosi, said she was not interested in such an arrangement. But shortly afterward, Hammill altered his response. He said Pelosi "prefers" a bill unencumbered by tax cuts but that "House Democrats have long supported tax changes that would benefit small business" and would look at such proposals.

Still, there is strong opposition to the idea among Democrats.

"Given that nearly a decade has passed since the last minimum wage increase, no one can seriously believe that the proposed increase will harm the small business sector," said Rep. George Miller, D-Calif., the incoming chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee.

But Iraq dominated the 50-minute news conference, just as it has the bulk of his presidency.

Bush said that if he did not think the U.S. could accomplish its objectives in Iraq, then U.S. troops would not be there. "I want the enemy to understand that this is a tough task, but they can't run us out of the Middle East, that they can't intimidate America," he said. "They think they can. They think it's just a matter of time before America grows weary and leaves, abandons the people of Iraq, for example. And that's not going to happen."

The president also said he is "inclined to believe" that the Army and Marines must increase the size of their permanent forces.

"This war on terror is the calling of a new generation; it is the calling of our generation. ... We have an obligation to ensure our military is capable of sustaining this war over the long haul," he said. He said he had asked Gates "to determine how such an increase could take place and report back to me as quickly as possible."

White House officials had revealed on Tuesday that Bush was considering a boost in permanent force levels, and the president himself talked about the idea that day in an interview with The Washington Post.

Bush Seeks To Expand Military (BSUN/CTRIB)

By Mark Silva, Chicago Tribune

The Baltimore Sun, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As he attempts to chart a "new way forward" in Iraq, President Bush again is striving to frame the conflict there as central to a broader struggle against world terrorism -- despite analysis from inside and outside the administration that worsening sectarian violence inside Iraq is responsible for a greater share of the increasing casualties than any acts of terrorism.

Announcing today that he will order an overall expansion of the Army and Marines to better confront the "challenges" of the war on terror, and acknowledging that he is considering deploying more troops inside Iraq, the president stopped short of saying whether he will boost the U.S. deployment in Iraq as part of a new war strategy that he promises to unveil early in 2007.

"We enter this New Year clear-eyed about the challenges in Iraq," said Bush, warning Americans that the conflict there will require "additional sacrifices."

The president, who has maintained before that the U.S. is "absolutely" winning in Iraq, now offers a more sobering assessment of the war -- saying that American forces are neither winning nor losing, but still asserting that victory will be achieved. That victory, as he has defined it before, remains the promise of an Iraqi government that can govern the nation, sustain it and defend it against unrelenting violence.

DOJ_NMG_0108184

"We're not succeeding as fast as I wanted," the president conceded at a news conference today, asked if he is willing to press ahead with a war that has lost support among a majority of Americans. "I am willing to follow a path that leads to victory. ... Victory in Iraq is achievable. It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would."

Bush, conceding that the U.S. is neither winning nor losing at this stage of a war that has claimed nearly 3,000 American lives almost four years after the U.S.-led invasion that overthrew Saddam Hussein, maintained that victory is still possible.

"I believe that we're going to win," Bush asserted in the ornate old Indian Treaty Room of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building next door to the White House during his final news conference of the year. "If I didn't think that we would, I wouldn't have our troops over there."

The president, who has spent weeks consulting with military, diplomatic and political advisers as well as government leaders in Iraq, has promised to unveil a new strategy for victory in January. Saying that his new secretary of defense, Robert Gates, will "bring a fresh perspective to the Pentagon," Bush framed his ongoing "Iraq strategy review" as part of a broader mission of fighting the war on terror. Gates is visiting Iraq this week after being sworn in Monday.

"We have an obligation" to ensure that the U.S. military is capable of confronting that threat of terrorism, Bush said, announcing that the Army and Marines require an overall buildup in force and he is asking Gates to advise him how best to carry that out.

Yet the Department of Defense's own newest quarterly assessment of the situation in Iraq delivered to Congress, while citing the surging casualties of both Iraqis and coalition forces this year, has attributed the most recent uptick in violence not to terrorism but to sectarian violence inside Iraq.

"The most significant development in the Iraqi security environment was the growing role of Shi'a militants," the Pentagon analysis reported of the situation during the past three months. "It is likely that Shi'a militants were responsible for more civilian casualties than those associated with terrorist organizations. Shi'a militants were the most significant threat to the coalition presence in Baghdad and southern Iraq."

This internal assessment of violence in Iraq, which "poses a grave threat to political progress," echoes an assessment that the independent Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel appointed by Congress, issued in a recent report. The panel called the situation in Iraq "grave and deteriorating" and blamed violence there more on sectarian violence than on any terrorist acts.

Yet Bush, who has maintained that the war in Iraq is the central front in the broader conflict with terrorists, said today that, "The advance of liberty has never been easy, and Iraq is proving how hard it can be. ... I am predicting that it will take a while for the ideology of freedom to (win) over the ideology of hate. ... We will succeed in Iraq."

The president plans to spell out a detailed strategy for success in Iraq in 2007, but meanwhile used this news conference to deliver a direct message before holidays in a nation deeply divided over war.

"I'm appealing to the American people," he said. "I want them to know that I know how tough it is."

At the same time, he defiantly vowed that the U.S. will not back down in Iraq, saying of the enemy: "They think it's just a matter of time before America grows weary and leaves. ... That's not going to happen."

With some of the president's advisers privately proposing a "surge" of 20,000 or more additional troops in Iraq to confront the violence there, particularly in Baghdad, Bush insisted today that he has not decided if the force buildup should include an additional deployment of troops inside Iraq. He also insisted that there is no divide between him and military leaders who may be advising against a surge in forces.

"That's a dangerous hypothetical question," Bush said. "Let me wait and gather all the recommendations.

"I haven't made up my mind yet about more troops," he said. "Hypothetical questions -- I'm not going to answer those today. ... I will tell you, we are looking at all options, and one of those options is ... more troops." But, he added, "there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops before I agree."

The president appeared today in a regal room where President Eisenhower staged his first televised news conference, a hall with marbled walls and tiled floors ringed with wrought-iron railings on the balcony of the second floor. This president has never staged a press conference here.

But with the White House's main floor decorated for Christmas, this stately room provided a setting for what will likely be the last news conference of the year. Bush plans to spend the Christmas holiday weekend at Camp David and then head to his Texas ranch for a week.

Bush, asked if he has undergone any "painful realization" about the war during the past, admittedly difficult year, said: "The most painful aspect of my presidency has been knowing that young men and woman have died in combat. ... When you ask about pain, that's pain."

Bush Seeks To Bolster Support For Sustained Iraq Engagement (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Greg Jaffe

DOJ_NMG_0108185

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said the U.S. will have to make "additional sacrifices" in Iraq, stepping up an administration push to rally support for what it says will be an open-ended and costly U.S. presence there.

Speaking to reporters at the White House, Mr. Bush backed away from earlier assertions the U.S. was winning in Iraq and emphasized that violence is likely to continue well into the future. Success in Iraq and the broader war on terror is going to require a "sustained commitment" from the American public and his successor, Mr. Bush said.

The president said he asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates, now in Baghdad reviewing American military strategy, to devise plans for permanently increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps. Mr. Bush said the expansion was needed to ensure the armed forces, strained by deployments to Iraq and Afghanistan, have sufficient manpower for the long war against Islamic extremists around the world.

"Securing this peace for the future is going to require a sustained commitment from the American people and our military," Mr. Bush said. "The next president, whoever the person is, will have the same charge, the same obligations to deal with terrorists so they don't hurt us, and to help young democracies survive the threats of radicalism and extremism."

Mr. Bush's comments highlighted the administration's search for a long-term strategy that is sustainable politically at a time when a majority of Americans have concluded the U.S. is losing in Iraq.

The president's belief that U.S. forces need to remain in Iraq indefinitely will face opposition from Congress's coming Democratic leaders, who want to see U.S. troops begin leaving Iraq early next year. Democrats won control of Congress in the midterm elections largely because of voter anger over how the administration handled Iraq. Many lawmakers from both parties assumed the White House would begin looking for a way out of Iraq to prevent further political damage. Instead, the White House has signaled it largely will maintain the current policy and may even bet heavily that Iraq can still be won by temporarily sending up to 20,000 more troops.

Mr. Bush acknowledged in March that the war in Iraq was likely to extend beyond his final two years in office, saying "future presidents" would be charged with determining when U.S. forces finally withdrew.

But in recent days Mr. Bush and other senior officials have stepped up efforts to persuade Americans to support what the administration envisions as an open-ended U.S. presence in Iraq -- and one that is likely to grow. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that the U.S. was at "the beginning of a long struggle, not the end of it" and emphasized it would take decades to make a final determination whether the U.S. mission in Iraq had succeeded.

The administration's rhetorical shift comes as Mr. Bush prepares to address the country early next year, laying out a way forward in Iraq. Administration officials say Mr. Bush is leaning toward ordering the temporary deployment of tens of thousands of troops in a bid to stabilize Iraq, though Mr. Bush said yesterday he hadn't made a decision.

It is far from certain that the administration will be able to persuade the public to be patient, since the war has lasted longer -- and been costlier in terms of lives and material resources -- than senior officials initially led the nation to expect. Americans have grown more pessimistic on the subject, pulling Mr. Bush's approval rating down to 34%, his lowest ever in The Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll.

The White House's belief that American forces need to remain in Iraq indefinitely will also spark tension with the coming Democratic leadership of the House and Senate. Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, the incoming majority leader, criticized the president for failing to "understand the need for urgent change in Iraq."

Administration officials acknowledge there is no guarantee the U.S. will be able to end Iraq's civil war, regardless of how many troops are deployed.

Senior military commanders in the Pentagon have quietly warned that a surge of U.S. forces must be part of a long-term strategy to reinforce political progress in Iraq.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has told associates U.S. troop levels in Iraq should only be increased if Iraqi political leaders reach agreements about sharing Iraq's oil revenue and isolating Shiite extremists.

Bush Concedes U.S. Not Ready For Iraq (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

President Bush yesterday conceded that U.S. forces were inadequately prepared to handle sectarian violence that broke out in Iraq after the fall of Baghdad, but said any increase in American troops to establish security there must be tied to a specific mission "that can be accomplished."

The president also acknowledged that 2006 "was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people" and that "the enemies of liberty ... carried out a deliberate strategy to foment sectarian violence."

DOJ_NMG_0108186

During an hourlong press conference in which Mr. Bush was both reflective and, at times, gloomy, the president called the war in Iraq "the beginning of a conflict between competing ideologies" and urged Congress to put aside partisanship for the long-term protection of the American people.

"I believe the next president, whoever the person is, will have the same charge, the same obligations to deal with terrorists so they don't hurt us and to help young democracies survive the threats of radicalism and extremism," the president said in the Indian Treaty Room of the Eisenhower Executive Office Building.

Mr. Bush's year-end press conference came as Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates made his first visit to Iraq since being sworn in Monday. The president has asked his new Pentagon chief to report to him as quickly as possible on long-term plans to enlarge the size of the Army and Marine Corps, an idea Mr. Bush said he supports.

Meanwhile yesterday, the Pentagon planned to ask the White House for $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, which would push the total cost to taxpayers to more than $500 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

Although Mr. Bush said he supports increasing the Army and Marines, he said he has not decided whether to add U.S. troops in Iraq in hopes of controlling sectarian violence that has made this year one of the most deadly of the nearly four-year war.

"We're looking at all options, and one of those options, of course, is increasing more troops. But in order to do so, there must be a specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops," he said.

Democrats wasted little time in condemning the president's comments.

"The president gave no indication in his press conference today that he is willing to make the changes needed to reverse the disastrous situation in Iraq," House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi said. "Unless there is a fundamental change in policy and in the mission of our troops in support of that policy, events in Iraq are unlikely to improve."

Said incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid: "Unfortunately, it is troubling to see that he still does not understand the need for urgent change in Iraq. ... Democrats and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have both laid down a road map for the president to begin the withdrawal of American troops from the civil war in Iraq. It is now up to the president to follow that course."

Mr. Bush said he is still mulling his options as he prepares to announce early next month a change in strategy for the war in Iraq and is compiling recommendations from a slew of sources, including the bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana, which called for withdrawal of combat troops by early 2008.

Mr. Bush again expressed optimism that the United States can "win" in Iraq.

"Victory in Iraq is achievable. It hasn't happened nearly as quickly as I hoped it would have. ... But I also don't believe most Americans want us just to get out now. A lot of Americans understand the consequences of retreat," he said.

But the president was somber when asked about his legacy, breaking from his normal assertion that history will judge him well.

"It's going to take awhile for people to ... determine whether or not the decisions made during the eight years I was president have affected history in a positive way," he said.

Mr. Bush also looked ahead to the long-term needs of the military, saying that although he still supports a light, agile Army, "that doesn't necessarily preclude increasing end strength for the Army and the Marines."

"The reason why I'm inclined to believe this is a good idea is because I understand that we're going to be in a long struggle against radicals and extremists, and we must make sure that our military has the capability to stay in the fight for a long period of time," he said.

That move is a break with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's push to build a lighter, more agile military. Mr. Rumsfeld took office under orders from Mr. Bush to transform the military for 21st-century threats, and the former secretary first moved to cut two divisions, from 10 to eight, a plan shelved after the September 11 attacks.

As the war on terrorism ground on, critics emerged again to say the Army had grown too small to fight two wars and keep other global commitments. Mr. Rumsfeld responded by authorizing 30,000 more soldiers, but refused to recommend it be put into law as "end strength."

He also moved to make the Army more agile by breaking down the division organization into combat brigade teams, which trained and deployed with their own support groups instead of joining up with them before deployment.

Contention Increases On Troop Numbers (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108187

The debate over sending more U.S. troops to Iraq intensified yesterday as President Bush signaled that he will listen but not necessarily defer to balky military officers, while Gen. John P. Abizaid, his top Middle East commander and a leading skeptic of a so-called surge, announced his retirement.

At an end-of-the-year news conference, Bush said he agrees with generals "that there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished" before he decides to dispatch an additional 15,000 to 30,000 troops to the war zone. But he declined to repeat his usual formulation that he will heed his commanders on the ground when it comes to troop levels.

Bush sought to use the 52-minute session, held in the ornate Indian Treaty Room in a building adjacent to the White House, to sum up what he called "a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people" and reassure the American public that "we enter this new year clear-eyed about the challenges in Iraq." Asked about his comment to The Washington Post this week that the United States is neither winning nor losing the war, Bush pivoted forward. "Victory in Iraq is achievable," he said.

The tension between the White House and the Joint Chiefs of Staff over the proposed troop increase has come to dominate the administration's post-election search for a new strategy in Iraq. The uniformed leadership has opposed sending additional forces without a clear mission, seeing the idea as ill-formed and driven by a desire in the White House to do something different even without a defined purpose.

Abizaid's announcement amid that debate could shift the dynamics. His retirement in March had been expected, given that he has led the U.S. Central Command longer than any predecessor and had already extended his assignment at the request of then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. But Abizaid has been a forceful voice of doubt about the utility of a surge, and his imminent departure could make it easier for the White House to shift direction.

During a news conference in Baghdad alongside newly installed Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, Abizaid declined to discuss troop levels except to say "all options are on the table," and he characterized his retirement as appropriate. "No decision that anybody makes in a position like this is ever totally their decision," he said, "but I think the time is right, and it has nothing to do with dissatisfaction."

The internal struggle over troop levels in Iraq has exposed a schism between civilian and military leadership 45 months into a war that, at the moment, has no end in sight. Testifying before a Senate committee Nov. 15, Abizaid bluntly rejected the surge option, saying: "I do not believe that more American troops right now is the solution to the problem. I believe that the troop levels need to stay where they are." Other generals have been equally resistant in public and private comments.

Bush has traditionally paid public deference to the generals, saying any decisions on moving U.S. forces in the region would depend on their views. At a Chicago news conference in July, for instance, Bush said he would yield to Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the Iraq commander.

"General Casey will make the decisions as to how many troops we have there," Bush said, adding: "He'll decide how best to achieve victory and the troop levels necessary to do so. I've spent a lot of time talking to him about troop levels. And I've told him this: I said, 'You decide, General.' "

By yesterday, however, Bush indicated that he will not necessarily let military leaders decide, ducking a question about whether he would overrule them. "The opinion of my commanders is very important," he said. "They are bright, capable, smart people whose opinion matters to me a lot." He added: "I agree with them that there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with the addition of more troops before I agree on that strategy."

A senior aide said later that Bush would not let the military decide the matter. "He's never left the decision to commanders," said the aide, who spoke on the condition of anonymity so Bush's comments would be the only ones on the record. "He is the commander in chief. But he has said he will listen to those commanders when making these decisions. That hasn't changed."

As he consults with the Joint Chiefs on troop levels in Iraq, Bush has tried to address their broader concern about the overstretched armed forces. He told The Post on Tuesday that he plans to expand the size of the Army and Marines and repeated that intention yesterday while denying that his decision amounted to a repudiation of Rumsfeld's efforts to build a lighter, more agile military.

On his first tour of Iraq yesterday, Gates said "we're just beginning that process" of figuring out how much to expand ground forces overall. But he cautioned that the long-term project was not related to the immediate question of what to do in Iraq. "An increase in the size of the Army today really won't show up for some period of time," Gates said.

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), wrapping up his own visit to Iraq, said a surge might be helpful in Anbar, the western province that has been a haven for al-Qaeda. "But in Baghdad," he told reporters from Kuwait, "it's not going to help unless the Iraqis decide that they're going to get their act together and stop sectarian violence."

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said Bush's latest remarks indicate that he has not come to grips with the need for urgent change in Iraq. "The president seems lost within his own rhetoric," Reid said in a statement. "He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war."

DOJ_NMG_0108188

Bush argued that failure in Iraq would be an even worse result and expressed confidence that many Americans "understand the consequences of retreat." As he prepared to begin his holiday break at Camp David and his ranch in Crawford, Tex., he ruminated in response to questions on the difficulty of wartime leadership but said he harbors no doubts about his decision to invade Iraq in 2003. "The most painful aspect of the presidency," he said, "is the fact that I know my decisions have caused young men and women to lose their lives."

An antiwar group reacted angrily to the comments.

"I know that my son's life was wasted, thrown away like it was nothing," Michelle Deford, whose son, Army Sgt. David Johnson, was killed in Iraq in 2004, said in a statement released by Gold Star Families Speak Out. "What we need to do is bring the rest of our sons and daughters home now."

Bush: 'Additional Sacrifices' In Iraq Required In 2007 (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a sober, end-of-the-year news conference Wednesday, President Bush said the "brutal" amount of violence in Baghdad must be prevented from spreading if the United States' mission in Iraq is to succeed.

"I'm not going to make predictions about what 2007 will look like in Iraq, except that it's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices because the enemy is merciless and violent," Bush said.

Bush acknowledged that U.S. forces in Iraq are "not succeeding nearly as fast as I wanted," but he said he has not made up his mind on a new strategy for the war.

He said 2006 "was a difficult year for our troops and the Iraqi people." He said insurgent attacks "kept Iraq's unity government and our coalition from establishing security and stability."

Bush confirmed that one option he is considering is sending tens of thousands of additional troops to Iraq to try to establish control in key areas, particularly Baghdad.

The president said that before he would pursue such a strategy, he and his military planners would have to agree on a "specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops."

"We've got to help the (Iraqi) government prevent (violence) from spreading in order to be successful," he said. Bush is likely to outline his new Iraq strategy in the first weeks of 2007.

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., issued a statement saying Bush "still does not understand the need for urgent change in Iraq. … He is grasping for a victory his current policies have put out of reach and leaving our troops stuck policing a civil war."

As Bush spoke, his new Defense secretary, Robert Gates, was in Iraq discussing with commanders the possibility of increasing U.S. troop numbers.

IRAQ: Gates discusses possible troop proposal

The Pentagon, meanwhile, wants the White House to seek an additional $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to information provided to the Associated Press. The information was provided by a person familiar with the proposal who asked for anonymity because that person was not authorized to release the information.

The request, if accepted by Bush and approved by Congress, would boost this year's spending for the two wars to about $170 billion. The non-partisan Congressional Research Service has estimated the costs of Iraq, Afghanistan and overall anti-terrorism efforts have topped $500 billion.

Bush, ending a year in which Democrats won control of Congress in the November elections, took more than a dozen questions in the nearly hour-long session. "I'm going to sprint to the finish," he said of the remaining two years of his second term.

Other highlights:

·Bush said U.S. forces are "going to win" in Iraq, despite comments on Tuesday to The Washington Post in which he said for the first time that the United States is not winning or losing the war. The president said that when he emphatically said earlier this year that the United States was "absolutely winning," he meant to convey his confidence in an ultimate victory.

·Bush said he hopes for bipartisan agreements with Congress on Social Security and immigration reform, as well as renewed efforts to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil.

The president said he would support one top Democratic priority — a $2.10-an-hour increase in the minimum wage — but only if it was accompanied by tax and regulatory relief for small businesses.

·Asked about the pregnancy of Mary Cheney, the gay daughter of Vice President Cheney, Bush said: "I know Mary, and I like her, and I know she is going to be a fine, loving mother."

DOJ_NMG_0108189

U.S. Commanders Wary Of Gates Proposal (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 21, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert Gates found American commanders wary of a proposal to rush more U.S. troops to Iraq as he visited the war-ravaged country Wednesday.

President Bush is considering that idea and others in his search for a fresh path in a 3 1/2-plus year war that has no end in sight and has lost the support of the American public.

On just his third day in charge of the Pentagon, Gates made the unannounced trip with the administration under intense pressure to forge a new strategy — and just hours after the president conceded, for the first time, that the U.S. is not winning the conflict.

After meeting with top U.S. generals at Camp Victory, Gates acknowledged concerns that rushing thousands more American troops to the battlefront could allow the Iraqis to slow their effort take control of the country. He said no decisions have been made.

"It's clearly a consideration," Gates said of how an infusion of American troops might affect Iraqi leaders. "I think that the commanders out here have expressed a concern about that."

Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq and one of several generals who met with Gates, said he supports boosting troop levels only when there is a specific purpose for their deployment. Other military leaders have expressed uncertainty over the purpose and results of injecting more troops.

"I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea, but what I want to see happen is when, if we do bring more American troops here, they help us progress to our strategic objectives," Casey told reporters during a news conference with Gates and other military leaders.

Gen. John Abizaid, top U.S. commander in the Middle East, sounded a more favorable tone. The military, he said, is "looking at every possible thing that might influence the situation to make Baghdad in particular more secure."

Bush said Wednesday he is considering sending more troops to Iraq but has not made up his mind. No timetables or troop totals have been mentioned publicly, but by some accounts roughly 20,000 troops would be added to the 140,000 already there.

The president is expected to announce his decisions next month — when a new Congress convenes, controlled by Democrats ready to make the war their top concern.

Echoing some of his commanders' questions about a troop surge, Bush said, "In order to do so, there must be a specific mission that can be accomplished with more troops."

Bush is considering choices ranging from a short-term increase of thousands of troops to bring the escalating violence in Baghdad and Anbar province under control, to removing combat U.S. forces and accelerating the training and equipping of Iraqi security forces. More than one-third of the U.S. troops in Iraq are combat forces.

Gates, on his third day on the job, said he would not form a judgment until he has spoken to Iraqi leaders, which he is scheduled to do during his visit.

Also on the trip was Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, plus officials from the State Department, the National Security Council and the White House.

The timing of Gates' trip, and his entourage, underscored how important the administration believes it is to set a new direction in the Iraq war.

Gates was noncommittal when asked whether the sectarian violence in Baghdad can be quashed without taking action against the Mahdi Army of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Sadr is a main supporter of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Gates said he is looking for ways to help the Iraqi government bring down the violence and "that will be a principle theme of discussions."

Bush and Gates also said they are considering increasing the overall size of the U.S. military following recent complaints by top generals that the forces have been stretched too thin by the worldwide campaign against terrorists. They used no figures, but Bush said he was asking Gates to produce a plan for the expansion.

Gates said he was just starting to study that idea. He expressed concern that the Army and Marine Corps are not large enough to face challenges of the 21st century that might include threats in Iran and North Korea, as well as natural disasters.

The debate over increasing troops has continued for months, as the military has been struggling to quell the escalating violence — particularly sectarian bloodshed — in Iraq. The war has claimed more than 2,950 U.S. casualties and cost roughly $350 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0108190

Some top U.S. commanders have been wary of even a short-term troop increase, saying it might bring only a temporary respite to the violence while confronting the U.S. with shortages of fresh troops in the future.

Military leaders are also considering an increase in the number of American advisers for Iraqi security forces.

Gates Talks Over Options With U.S. Commanders In Iraq (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 20 -- Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates spent his third day as Pentagon chief in an intense series of discussions with top U.S. military commanders about next steps in Iraq, but said he wouldn't move toward any conclusions until he had talked with senior Iraqi officials.

"We discussed the obvious things," Gates said after meeting with Gen. John P. Abizaid, Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and other top Army generals here. "We discussed the possibility of a surge and the potential for what it might accomplish." In recent days the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the White House have debated whether to conduct such a "surge," or short-term escalation of U.S. troops in Iraq, in an effort to bring more security to the country's turbulent capital, Baghdad.

Appearing relaxed but looking funereal in a black suit, white shirt and dark tie, Gates said he had received "candid, honest, firsthand assessments" from senior officers he met with here Wednesday.

"This trip is part of the overall assessment that the president asked me to do," he said. Underscoring that focus, Gates was accompanied on his aircraft by Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, as well as officials from the State Department, the staff of Vice President Cheney and the National Security Council. Defense secretaries rarely travel with the chairman of the Joint Chiefs or with such a broad delegation of officials from other agencies.

Abizaid and Casey, who have differed on a troop increase, appeared to engage in a bit of military rope-a-dope in which each seemed to embrace the other's stance. Abizaid, long known inside the military for his opposition to boosting the U.S. troop presence here, said flatly: "Absolutely every option is on the table." Casey, his immediate subordinate and old friend, who is said to favor an increase, said, "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea" -- if, he added, sending additional troops would help achieve strategic objectives.

There are about 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq. Advocates of a short, sharp increase say an additional 20,000 to 30,000 might help quell the violence that is ripping apart Baghdad, while some top U.S. military officers caution that a smaller surge last summer turned out to be ineffective.

Gates rejected the notion that he is the "swing vote" in the discussion, although he stands between a Joint Chiefs of Staff extremely skeptical of a troop surge and many officials at the White House who appear to favor it. "Let me be very clear, I am not the swing vote," he said. "There is only one vote that matters, and that is the president of the United States."

A former CIA chief, Gates was last in Iraq in early September as a member of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan commission on Iraq policy led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.)

"I didn't dream at that time that I would have some responsibility for what goes forward," he said Wednesday.

Gates left that group after being nominated in early November to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld as defense secretary. About a month after he left, the group issued a scathing report that depicted the situation in Iraq in far bleaker terms than the Bush administration had been using.

The group concluded that the security situation was grave and deteriorating, that U.S. officials sometimes didn't understand the facts of the matter, and that U.S. policy was failing. That bleak diagnosis appears to have altered the debate over Iraq, with few people now claiming that "steady progress" is being made, as Bush administration officials did for several years.

The Iraq Study Group also issued 79 recommendations calling for the United States to step up diplomacy in the Middle East and to transform the U.S. military effort in Iraq from one focused on combat to one focused on training and advising Iraqi forces. This change, it argued, should enable the U.S. military to withdraw most of its combat brigades from Iraq by early 2008.

Since the report was issued, its recommendations have received only a lukewarm response, both from the White House and from members of Congress. However, Gates's presence at the Pentagon, and his ability there to implement some of the recommendations almost immediately, may give the report a boost when Congress meets in a few weeks to resume its review of the Iraq war.

Coleman Says He's Against Sending More Troops To Iraq (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Norm Coleman, following a two-day trip to Iraq, said Wednesday he opposes a plan President Bush is considering for a short-term surge of U.S. troops there.

DOJ_NMG_0108191

At the same time, Coleman said, he supports Bush's call this week for the U.S. to increase its overall number of troops to help a taxed military fight the global war on terror.

"I would not support a massive increase in troops in Baghdad," Coleman, R-Minn., said from Bahrain, on his way back to the United States. "I think it would create more targets, I think we'd put more life at risk."

He added that he hadn't heard anything in talks with U.S. military officials that led him to believe extra troops would solve problems there.

But he agreed that the United States needs more troops overall.

"I think our military is stretched too thin," Coleman said. "We need more soldiers so we're not taking these citizen-soldiers that we have and calling them back every year for another extended tour of duty. We need a larger army because we live in a very dangerous world."

Coleman, who traveled to Iraq with Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., said that they told Iraqi officials that they needed to stem the sectarian violence.

Coleman said that the U.S. should set a deadline for the Iraqi government, requiring Iraq to meet certain benchmarks, and that the U.S. should reposition its troops if those benchmarks are not reached.

"I anticipate we will be in Iraq for a long time, we're going to be in the Middle East for a long time," Coleman said. "But we can't be on the front line, we don't need to be patrolling the streets of Fallujah." He said that U.S. forces could move to a secondary position - and move toward that more quickly if the Iraqis don't make progress on reconciliation.

Coleman said he did not cross paths with Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who is in Iraq now. It was Coleman's second trip to Iraq.

Meanwhile, Sen.-elect Amy Klobuchar, D-Minn., appearing on Minnesota Public Radio's "Midday" program Wednesday, said she also opposes increasing troops in Iraq.

"The solution to this is not more boots on the ground," she said. "The answer to me is a different way of looking at this, which is to transition to Iraqi authority" - and to have Congress do a better oversight job of contracts.

On increasing the permanent size of the military, Klobuchar said, "I do think we're going to need to expand so we don't tax these people to the point they can't do their jobs. That's what's been happening and it's not been fair to them."

Bush's Move To Supersize US Military (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

Expanding the size of US armed forces could be an expensive and lengthy task - in essence, a redoubling of the national effort to grapple with the challenge posed by Islamic extremism.

The move would be irrelevant in the Iraq war, say some critics, because by the time more troops are recruited, trained, and deployed, the conflict there will probably be set in its course.

But in calling for such an increase, President Bush said the US military must be positioned to deal with terrorists for a generation to come.

"It's the calling of our time," he said at a press conference Wednesday.

Mr. Bush has not specified the degree to which he believes the Army and Marine Corps should increase. New Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, currently in Iraq, first must propose a plan that includes numbers and estimated cost, Bush said at his news conference and in an earlier interview with The Washington Post.

If approved by Bush, the plan will then be tucked into the budget the administration will submit to Congress early next year.

Currently, the Army has an authorized strength of some 514,000 troops, with about 30,000 of that total a temporary rise approved by Congress in the wake of the 9/11 attacks. The Marine Corps has 180,000 personnel.

Bush was careful to note that he was not telegraphing an increase in troops in Iraq by asking for an overall larger US ground force. The administration's new strategy to fight rising violence there won't be unveiled until early next year.

Instead, Bush billed a larger US military as essential for the security of today's children and their children.

"Securing this peaceful future is going to require a sustained commitment from the American people and our military," said Bush. "We have an obligation to ensure our military is capable of sustaining this war over the long haul and performing the many tasks that we ask of them."

Ground forces may not be as glamorous as high-tech weaponry, but they are expensive nonetheless. Each increment of 10,000 soldiers added to the Army costs just a tick over $1 billion, according to a service estimate.

DOJ_NMG_0108192

Thus, adding 30,000 troops a year for two years, as proposed by a recent American Enterprise Institute study co-written by military expert Robert Kagan, would add more than $6 billion to the military budget at a time when the cost of the Iraq conflict is exceeding $6 billion per month.

In addition, more troops mean more long-term spending on equipment, training, and future benefits, says Gordon Adams, senior White House official for national security budgeting under President Bill Clinton.

"At more than $500 billion a year, we are already overspending on defense," says Mr. Adams, now a fellow at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Any new forces would probably not be ready in time for use in the Iraq conflict, says Adams. It would take at least two years to get them ready. By then, events in Baghdad would have already determined whether the country has split apart or whether an Iraqi government has managed to establish security. The US is likely to be withdrawing from Iraq in two years, according to Adams.

An overall troop increase "is not about Iraq," he says. "It's about militarizing our national-security policy for the long war."

The White House, however, has some reason to believe that a call for a larger military may not be overly controversial. In the past, Democrats in Congress have called for such a move. In part, this reflects their criticism that the war in Iraq has been prosecuted with too few US troops, and that the pace of rotations in and out of Iraq is such that the Army is now close to breaking.

For instance, Rep. Ike Skelton (D) of Missouri, who will chair the House Armed Services Committee in the next Congress, has long supported a larger military as a means of breaking the deployment cycle of one year in Iraq, one year at home, and then another deployment.

Democrats remain wary, however, that Bush's call for a larger military is a means to make more politically palatable a separate decision to increase troop strength in Iraq. That is a move many of them oppose.

"More troops would get us in deeper and is a military response to a political problem," said Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, incoming Senate Armed Services chairman, in a statement.

Enlarging Military Poses Challenge (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush's plan to enlarge the Army and Marine Corps responds to pleas from the Pentagon and Capitol Hill, but finding more recruits will be expensive and challenging and have little immediate impact on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In a news conference Wednesday, the president said he has asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates to look into adding more troops to the nearly 1.4 million uniformed personnel on active duty — a force which has been strained by the two wars.

Bush also said he remains undecided on whether to send more troops to Iraq and expects to announce that decision early next year.

Bush's desire to expand the services — an abrupt turnaround — was cheered Wednesday by lawmakers and military analysts. They agreed, though, that boosting troop levels is costly and time-consuming and will do little to help in Iraq anytime soon.

"To get to the kind of levels both services want will be five to 10 years," said Anthony Cordesman, a national security expert with the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "And by then the Iraq war on one level or the other will be over."

According to service officials, the Army wants to expand its force of 507,000 soldiers by 20,000 to 30,000, while the Marine Corps would like to add 5,000 to its nearly 180,000 troops.

The unpopular war in Iraq — where more than 2,950 American troops have already died — complicates the task of finding more recruits and retaining current troops.

To find new troops, the military will have to hire more recruiters and offer incentives like increased bonuses and higher salaries. In recent years, it has accepted more recruits with minor criminal records and with lower scores on aptitude tests.

Once the recruits are found, the military must train and equip them, which takes months. Other expenses will come from additional health care and support programs for families.

"It takes a long time to train trigger-pullers. And that's what we need — more trigger-pullers," said retired Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, former assistant vice chief of staff for the Army.

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, increasing the Army by 40,000 troops would cost $2.6 billion the first year and more than $4 billion annually to maintain.

The estimate is similar to one provided by Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker, who says the service budget jumps $1.2 billion for every additional 10,000 soldiers. Schoomaker says the Army can add up to 7,000 troops per year.

DOJ_NMG_0108193

There are about 6,700 recruiters trying to sign up 80,000 new active duty soldiers for the 2007 budget year, which began last October. Roughly 1,800 recruiters are working to sign up 35,000 for the Army Reserves for the same period, officials said.

To accomplish additional growth, the service will need to sweeten incentives. The Army failed to meet its recruiting goal in the 2005 budget year for the first time since 1999, but met its goal in 2006 after adding recruiters and incentives for new enlistees.

The Pentagon also will have to budget for the additional troops at a time of rising health care costs and an overall budget crunch caused in part by Iraq and Afghanistan, which cost $120 billion last year and are likely to get more expensive.

"If the president doesn't put forward a plan to pay for this in his annual budget request then this announcement is meaningless," said Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., a member of the Armed Services Committee and longtime advocate of a bigger force.

So far, Congress has provided about $450 billion for the Pentagon for 2007. That includes $70 billion for the wars, but it excludes another $100 billion the military wants to request for additional war costs.

Last week, Schoomaker said the Army will break without more soldiers, but he had previously opposed congressional mandates to add more troops. He had argued the cost would overburden the Army's budget. But retired Pentagon officials say it doesn't have be an either-or situation if there is the political will to do it.

"You can certainly do it, but it takes time and it takes resources," said Les Brownlee, former acting Army secretary.

One reason adding several thousand troops would make a difference in the massive military is the types of jobs they do.

Only a fraction of the Army and Marines available are the kind needed in Iraq — combat infantry troops that can conduct security patrols and staff checkpoints. Of the 140,000 now in Iraq, just over one-third are combat forces.

As a result, many people serve repeated tours there and heavily used units must scramble to replace or fix battle-damaged equipment.

Gates' predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, staunchly opposed increasing the size of the force because of the cost. Instead, Rumsfeld advocated reorganizing the Army into small, more flexible units that would rely less on manpower and more on technology.

Bush sided with Rumsfeld until his departure last week.

"It's so frustrating to me we have to be four years into a war with the Marine Corps and Army on the verge of breaking that we decide we need more Army and Marines," said retired Maj. Gen. Robert Scales, former commandant of the Army War College.

Cost, Effort, Time Of Military Expansion Plan Likely To Have 'Enormous' Impact (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Meeting President Bush's goal of a larger Army and Marine Corps will require more time and money to recruit volunteers, retain the officers needed to lead them and outfit new units.

Bush said Wednesday that he asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates to quickly come up with a plan for expanding U.S. ground forces, not just for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan but for the larger struggle against what he called "extremists and radicals." He pledged to work with Congress "to see that this becomes a reality."

The Pentagon has increased incentives and lowered standards in recent years to keep the military at its current size, particularly as recruiting fell short of goals. Enlarging the military will require more of that, experts say.

"It's not going to be easy, but it's certainly doable," says Bernard Rostker, a military manpower expert at the RAND Corp., a private advisory firm that often writes reports for the Pentagon.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said last month that it would take two years to recruit, train and equip a new division. Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri and Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, Democrats on the House and Senate armed services committees, say the extra 10,000 troops alone would cost the Pentagon about $1.2 billion a year.

The Iraq war's unpopularity is another challenge for recruiters, says Andrew Bacevich, a retired Army colonel and professor at Boston University. That adds to the costs of getting more people to enlist, he says.

"You would have to buy the additional volunteers by offering bonuses and educational benefits, and they would be bought at a substantial price," Bacevich says. "Even apart from the lengthy period of time this project would take to bring to fruition, the impact on the defense budget is going to be enormous."

Members of the Army and Marine Corps make up 97% — 2,852 — of the U.S. troops killed in Iraq, records show.

In 2005, the Army fell 8% short of its annual goal of 80,000 recruits. After adding recruiting incentives, it met that goal this year, records show. The Marines met their annual goal of about 32,000 recruits both years. This year, the Army has offered a series of bonuses for recruits and soldiers who re-enlist. They include:

DOJ_NMG_0108194

·A maximum of $40,000 for Army recruits, which is double the previous $20,000 recruit bonus.

·An extra $1,000 bonus for high school seniors who join.

·A $2,000 referral bonus for soldiers and retirees who persuade friends or relatives to join. That's double the previous $1,000 bonus.

The Army also raised the age limit for recruits from 34 to 41. In October 2005, the Army also started taking more recruits who scored in the lowest brackets of the service's aptitude test, doubling the percentage of those recruits from 2% to 4%. The Army had the 2% limit since the 1980s.

That's not necessarily a problem, says David Armor, a former Pentagon manpower official in the Reagan administration.

"There are lots of jobs in the military that can use persons with average skills," says Armor, a professor at George Mason University in Fairfax, Va.

Leaned On As Never Before, Reservists Weigh Re-enlistment (MCT)

By Dave Montgomery And Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sgt. Vic Blazier and his wife, Capt. Carla Blazier, were sent to war in 2003, leaving an infant and a toddler with a grandfather who died while the couple served in Iraq.

The ex-Army reservists from Marion, Ohio, had become civilian soldiers out of patriotism. But the sacrifice proved overwhelming.

After a decade of service, she resigned her commission as an officer in late 2004 after a year in Iraq. He returned home on hardship leave in late 2003 after his father died. Last year he passed up re-enlistment and joined Iraq Veterans Against the War.

The Blaziers are part of what military experts see as a pattern as the Pentagon seeks to increase the burden on the Army's two reserve components, the Reserve and National Guard. Torn between family and the call to duty, many are taking a hard look at military commitment and choosing family when re-enlistment time arrives.

"I do a lot of volunteering. When you miss two birthdays, you try to make up for them," said Carla Blazier, 35, who joined the Reserves in 1993 as a software expert on a career path, but now puts family first. "I try to stay very involved and active in my children's life because I missed that year."

Those deciding whether to remain in the Guard and Reserve must take into account the possibility that they'd have to serve longer and more frequently on active duty than they do now. Under current mobilization policies, part-time troops can be called on to serve involuntarily on active duty for no more than 24 months during a five-year period. Army officials want the Pentagon to lift those restrictions so that National Guard and Reserve troops can be pressed into service more often; specifics remain to be worked out.

National Guard and Reserve troops called for service in Iraq usually spend about six months training, then a year in Iraq.

"We're not close to burnout, but we're at an important point and we need to monitor the situation very closely," said Christine E. Wormuth of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, who authored a study on the future of the Guard and Reserves. "There is a recognition that you can't keep using the reserve component the way we've used it in the past three years."

Carla Blazier said that about half the 120 enlisted soldiers in her company didn't re-enlist or just stopped coming to drills.

It's the same story in Harlingen, Texas, near the Mexico border. The 100 soldiers in the 812th Quartermaster Company, an Army Reserve unit, are still fresh from a deployment in Iraq. Roughly 25 percent to 35 percent are considering getting out, said Sgt. Maj. William S. Patterson, the unit administrator.

Some are eager to rekindle civilian jobs, threatened by their long absences. Others want to complete their education, said Patterson, a Vietnam veteran.

"These people want to get on track with their lives," he said.

A twice-deployed member of the unit with a wife and two sons, Staff Sgt. Noel Cortez decided that it was time to "take a break" from the Reserves after seeing the hardship that his absences imposed on his family.

"I wasn't there for a whole year and I missed a whole lot," said Cortez, who plans to attend college in January and become a nurse. "I don't want to go through it again and I don't want them to go through it again."

The trend, military analysts said, certainly isn't a wholesale mutiny from the Reserve and Guard.

Officials at Fort Worth Naval Air Station, the nation's largest joint reserve base, see no evidence of manpower erosion or sagging morale among the more than 20 major units at the base, despite multiple deployments involving more than 4,000 guardsmen and reservists.

DOJ_NMG_0108195

"I don't know anybody who says, `This is just too much for me that I've got to leave,'" said Col. Kevin Pottinger, the commander of the 301st Fighter Wing. "My problem is, quite honestly, I've got people who want to go (overseas) and I'm trying to hold people back."

Still, the nation's 522,000-member Army Reserve and National Guard force shows signs of strain from repeated assignments. The assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs, Thomas F. Hall, describes the balancing act as a "three-legged stool": the soldier, the family, the civilian employer.

"If any of those legs fall off," he said, "the stool tilts over."

A significant number of reservists and guardsmen are choosing "Fort Living Room," the buzz phrase for civilian life.

The Army Reserve fell about 15 percent short of its recruitment goal in 2005. It hired more recruiters, added to its advertising budget, eased age restrictions and added bonuses, and in 2006 it was just slightly short of the goal: It added 25,378 recruits and had a goal of 25,500.

The National Guard had recruitment problems in 2004 but is meeting its targets today thanks to bonuses and other incentives.

Still, some officials worry that many midlevel and noncommissioned officers are poised to leave the military to avoid falling behind in their civilian careers.

"That has really long-term implications for the quality of leadership we'll have 10 or 15 or 20 years from now," former Pentagon Comptroller Dov Zakheim said. "We're really losing our best and brightest young ones."

Certain guardsmen and reservists are particularly vulnerable to being called up because of their specialties, he said. "We keep going back to the same well, and so the pressure is actually greater than some people realize."

Many soldiers tell of the pressure of family separation.

Sgt. 1st Class Lance Schneider of Raleigh, N.C., spent 11 months in Iraq in 2004 as a member of the 30th Heavy Brigade Combat Team of the North Carolina National Guard. His son was born less than a month after he reached the war zone. Before his deployment, he'd never been away from his wife longer than two weeks.

"It's hard on your employer, it's hard on you, it's hardest on your family," said Schneider, 41, who works as a project manager for IBM in civilian life and plans to remain in the Guard.

Loretta Cox, a sergeant major with the 648th Regional Support Group in St. Louis, relied on a supportive husband when she left their kids, ages 2 and 11, behind. She spent two years in a domestic deployment, singing lullabies over the phone.

"My kids will say, `Mommy's a soldier and she's protecting us,'" said Cox, who plans to stay in the Reserve. "Obviously, I've already missed two years of my children's lives, and I'm not going to be jumping up and down saying, `Pick me, pick me.' But if I'm asked to do so, I'll honor my commitment."

Despite hardships, morale among reservists remains good, said Lt. Col. Mack Griffith, an Army Reserve chaplain at Fort McPherson, Ga.

But he said soldiers faced big challenges when they returned. Many find it hard to resume their usual roles at home after months of combat and brutality in Iraq.

"This is not the time to be the drill sergeant," Griffith said. "This is the time to come back and regain loving relationships in the home."

The divorce rate among reservists spiked in 2004, Griffith said, but has eased down since as a result of intensified family support activities offered by the Army, such as weekend couples retreats.

But, the chaplain noted, this reality lingers like an unwanted guest: "It's impossible for the spouse to fully appreciate what the husband or wife have gone through."

A Soldier's Soldier, Outflanked (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Gen. John P. Abizaid rose to become the top American commander for the Middle East in July 2003 with impeccable credentials for the job: A Lebanese American who speaks Arabic with a master's degree in Middle Eastern studies from Harvard, Abizaid was considered a soldier's soldier. He led a Ranger company into battle in Grenada in 1983 and commanded an airborne battalion during the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

But Abizaid's announcement yesterday that he will retire in March after almost four years as a chief architect of U.S. Iraq strategy comes as violence drives civilian and military casualties there to record highs and as officials broadly say the U.S. military campaign is at a stalemate.

DOJ_NMG_0108196

The departure of the general, who has won wide respect for his candid advice to the administration as the head of U.S. Central Command, was expected and is not seen as an indication of his own displeasure or that of superiors over his performance. "I think the time is right, and it has nothing to do with dissatisfaction," Abizaid told reporters in Baghdad.

"After 50 months out here, I think it's okay to think about retiring," he said.

His decision creates an opportunity for President Bush, with the recommendation of Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, to name a commander who will take a fresh approach as they weigh alternative military strategies.

Supporters portray Abizaid, 55, as a brilliant commander who did his best, despite constraints from Washington, to adapt the U.S. military to fight an unanticipated guerrilla war -- which he was among the first to identify -- and later the unexpected outbreak of sectarian violence.

"Understanding how difficult the job is, nobody's done it better than John Abizaid," said a Pentagon official who as an Army general worked with Abizaid.

Yet critics say Abizaid has placed too much emphasis on Arab sensitivity to foreign occupation, and therefore never demanded enough U.S. troops to stabilize the country. "He was too smart by half," another U.S. officer said.

"The bottom line is we are losing a war in his theater on his watch," said Michael E. O'Hanlon, a defense expert at the Brookings Institution, saying Abizaid's popularity has dwindled in recent months as the situations in Iraq and Afghanistan have deteriorated. "We need a fresh approach."

Abizaid made clear his continued opposition to a major surge of U.S. troops in Iraq beyond the current 140,000, arguing that it would perpetuate a mentality of dependency by Iraqi forces and increase resistance among Iraq's population.

The widespread expectation within the military has been that Abizaid will be succeeded by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who led the 101st Airborne Division in the invasion and early occupation of Iraq and later returned to head the effort to train Iraqi army and police forces. Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander in Iraq, is also expected to leave his post in the spring, and some Pentagon officials predict he will be followed by Marine Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis. Casey is another candidate to replace Abizaid, one senior military official said. But all those moves will be dependent on the approval of Gates, whose views on the personnel changes are not well known.

Moreover, Abizaid's replacement will face the same immediate constraints: overstretched U.S. ground forces and the need to be able to respond to other contingencies in the region, such as a further escalation of fighting in Afghanistan or a serious showdown with Iran.

Abizaid recently acknowledged that more U.S. troops, as well as Iraqi forces and international forces, "should have been available" to stabilize Iraq in the immediate aftermath of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003.

"General Shinseki was right," Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee, referring to then-Army Chief of Staff Eric K. Shinseki's prediction before the war -- dismissed by the Pentagon -- that several hundred thousand troops would be required to occupy Iraq.

Abizaid also made clear that his plans for a significant withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq this year were aborted by a major, unanticipated outbreak of sectarian violence spurred by the February bombing of a Shiite mosque in Samarra. "We clearly did not achieve the force levels we had hoped to," Abizaid told reporters this fall, saying sectarian unrest could be "fatal" to Iraq.

Yet Abizaid has argued that the Army and Marine Corps, which face serious shortages of manpower and equipment, could simply not sustain a surge of 20,0000 troops into Iraq.

Some described Abizaid as having his hands tied by both the Bush administration in Washington and situations in Iraq that were beyond his control. Abizaid has also been frustrated over a lack of support in Iraq from other U.S. governmental agencies, believing military force is not the main tool for fighting what he has defined as the "long war" against violent extremists.

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.), who has been friends with Abizaid for more than three decades and served with him in the 82nd Airborne Division in the mid-1970s, said Abizaid is "probably the most capable person we could have had because of his experience and his talent and his commitment to the troops he leads."

But Reed, a member of the Armed Services Committee, said decisions made by former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other top government leaders put Abizaid in a difficult position.

Reed, who said he has had several personal conversations with Abizaid over the past few years, cited as particularly important the decision to limit the number of U.S. forces going into Iraq during the invasion in 2003 and the failure to plan for stabilizing Iraq after initial combat operations. "I always got the sense the mission was under-resourced and vaguely defined," Reed said.

Rudderless In Iraq (NYT)

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108197

Anyone looking for new thinking on Iraq, or even candor, had to be disappointed by President Bush's news conference yesterday. Mr. Bush may want to defer unveiling his new strategy, but there will be no obliging pause in Iraq's unraveling.

The latest Pentagon status report confirms a spiraling death toll, ever deeper sectarian divisions and near total lawlessness on the streets of Baghdad, despite repeated American vows to secure the capital. In a further sign of Iraq's descent, our colleague James Glanz reported this week that Baghdad gets less than seven hours of electricity a day, as insurgents and looters dismantle the power grid.

While Mr. Bush contemplates his fast-disappearing options, competing factions in the administration and the military have been less reticent about floating their ideas. Some urge a sharp, temporary increase in American troop strength in Baghdad. Others argue that Iraqi forces should take the lead, whether or not they're ready. Still others talk about different ways of reconfiguring Iraq's dysfunctional governing coalition.

The problem is not so much with the specific proposals — some deserve serious consideration — as with the illusion that the political and military components of American policy can be pursued in isolation from each other. That is the kind of made-in-Washington tunnel vision that produced the current disaster. Only a political strategy, embraced by Iraqis themselves and backed by American military muscle, can have even a remote chance of altering events, and even that may be too late.

Consider the talk of a temporary escalation of American forces to impose some order in Baghdad. That is guaranteed to fail, unless it is tightly integrated with a political strategy for producing an Iraqi government finally willing to move against Shiite militias and open a dialogue on national reconciliation. Without that, any temporary increase could slide seamlessly into a permanent escalation — something America's depleted ground forces cannot handle — with no chance of containing the chaos.

And while American diplomats report hints that Iraq's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, might be willing to support a genuine national unity government, it remains unclear whether he would countenance any loss of power for Shiite fundamentalists — and whether Washington has any leverage left to influence his decision.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush acknowledged the obvious and desperate need to rebuild America's overstretched ground forces, a subject he refrained from talking about so long as Donald Rumsfeld ran the Pentagon. But that will take time and won't be any help in Iraq. Mr. Bush also needs to acknowledge that his course there has reached a dead end. He needs to quickly define a new direction while he still has any choices left.

Uncle Sam Needs More (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WHEN PRESIDENT BUSH announced after the election that he was replacing Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld with Robert M. Gates, he promised that Gates would bring a "fresh perspective" to the Pentagon. The assumption was that Bush was referring to Iraq. But this week, Bush indicated that the biggest difference between the Rumsfeld and Gates eras may involve the size of the U.S. military over the next several years.

Bigger, Bush now seems to believe, is better. Amplifying an earlier comment in an interview with the Washington Post, the president said at a news conference Wednesday that "I'm inclined to believe that we need to increase … the permanent size of both the United States Army and the United States Marines."

Bush is right — regardless of what one thinks of the separate issue of whether he should approve a short-term "surge" in U.S. forces in Iraq to stabilize Baghdad. But the president will have to do a better job of explaining why this country needs a bigger military establishment.

On Wednesday, Bush couched his argument in excessively narrow terms, saying that a beefed-up military was necessary to prosecute the "war on terror [that] is the calling of a new generation." This argument jumbles together the (at least partly metaphorical) "war on terror" — a many-fronted effort to prevent the repetition of the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001 — with the amassing and deployment of military forces around the globe to protect all of the nation's vital interests.

Of course, the war on terror is one of the threats tying up resources. It took a conventional military operation in Afghanistan to topple Al Qaeda's Taliban patrons (and that one was fought on the cheap, relying mainly on Afghan warlords as U.S. surrogates). Further, opponents of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal from Iraq — including Bush — argue that a pullout would embolden terrorists there and elsewhere.

The need for a larger military isn't confined to the Iraq war but to any number of possibilities — war on the Korean peninsula, genocide in Africa, the defense of Israel, you name it.

Hence, the case for repudiating the "leaner, meaner" posture identified with Rumsfeld — who presided over a slight reduction in active-duty military personnel despite engagements in Afghanistan and Iraq — transcends today's debates. Critics in both parties (and with a variety of views on Iraq) have supported an increase in the permanent size of the armed forces to increase flexibility in future crises, shorten tours of duty, ease the burden on military families and rely less on the Reserves and National Guard, which to some degree have been turned into a full-time fighting force.

DOJ_NMG_0108198

The U.S. remains the world's sole superpower, but the nation no longer has enough men and women under arms to shoulder its responsibilities. By that we don't mean ill-conceived adventures like the war in Iraq, but the preparedness to react to unforeseen crises. One reason the armed forces are too small is that the Pentagon's military-industrial complex favors spending money on costly gadgetry, some of it unnecessary, over such prosaic things as a foot soldier's pay. But the scary truth is that with roughly 150,000 troops tied down in Iraq, the U.S. is hardly in a position to react effectively to a major crisis elsewhere.

A significant increase in soldiers and Marines could be accomplished with ramped-up recruiting and pay incentives. In testimony to Congress last week, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker suggested that his branch of the service could efficiently add up to 7,000 troops a year. Many such increases could take place without the current size of the Army (507,000) approaching the level of the 1991 Persian Gulf War (780,000). Secretary Gates should be more aggressive and advocate the addition of 100,000 more troops, which would cost in the neighborhood of $20 billion — not an exorbitant amount in Pentagon terms.

There is no need for a draft. Better pay and incentives may be needed to entice more people to join, but there are more than 60 million Americans between the ages of 18 and 35 to recruit from.

To understand why an Army of half a million troops is inadequate, you have to consider that only about two-thirds of that number can be deployed overseas, and not all of those can be sent to trouble spots simultaneously. Ideally, military convention holds, you rotate active-duty combat troops in such a way that they get plenty of training and time with their families. Do the math, and you realize why the 150,000 troops stationed in Iraq are such a strain on the Pentagon.

What's worse, all that strain — the added burden on reserves, the training shortcuts, the extended tours of duty — translates into poor morale, which makes it difficult to recruit more troops. It's a Catch-22. And again, this should not be a partisan issue. Along with GOP Sen. John McCain, Democratic Sens. John Kerry and Hillary Rodham Clinton have been calling for a larger military for some time.

Until recently, the White House has been cool to such calls. A year ago, reflecting Rumsfeld's thinking, Secretary of the Army Francis J. Harvey assured Congress that his branch of the services would be able to roll back a temporary increase of 30,000 troops authorized in 2004, increasing available combat units through reorganization.

Bush took office disdainful of nation-building exercises and skeptical of the types of humanitarian interventions the military engaged in during the 1990s, and that is partly why this administration was reluctant to build troop strength. Bush's second thoughts are long overdue, even if he isn't doing his cause justice by simply pointing to the war on terror as his rationale.

U.S. Cannot Accept Defeat (USAT)

By Frederick W. Kagan

USA Today, December 21, 2006

America faces a critical moment in Iraq. Sectarian violence threatens to destroy Iraq's government and society and what's left of America's will to fight. Yet the consequences of accepting defeat would be horrendous. Iran and Iraq's Sunni neighbors would vie for dominance, and the conflict would likely expand throughout the Middle East. Al-Qaeda could establish a base in the ensuing vacuum. Abandoning Iraq to chaos would harm America's vital interests immeasurably.

It is essential, therefore, to adopt a new strategy. We must secure Iraq's population and thereby bring the violence under control, abandoning the failed attempt to hand responsibility over to the Iraqis prematurely.

As we saw in Bosnia and Kosovo in the 1990s, military forces, together with political and diplomatic initiatives, can control ethnic and sectarian conflict. A large scale two-year effort to clear and hold critical areas in Baghdad that are the center of sectarian violence in the capital can succeed today. U.S. forces secured Tal Afar in 2005 and parts of Sadr City in 2004.

U.S. commanders admit that recent attempts to gain control of Baghdad in Operation Together Forward II failed through lack of resources. Many neighborhoods were cleared, but there were too few American troops to maintain security in those areas. U.S. military forces know how to establish security and maintain it, but they cannot do so without the necessary resources and time.

Securing the critical areas of Baghdad would require a surge of at least 35,000 more U.S. combat troops into Iraq (some would go into Anbar province and elsewhere to contain any spillover from Baghdad). This surge would come from extending the tours of soldiers already in Iraq and accelerating the deployment of a few brigades. It would require two years to succeed, accompanied by economic reconstruction and political efforts to strengthen the Iraqi government. Training of the Iraqi army would continue, and the Iraqis would have to take responsibility for their own security at the end of these efforts. They can only do so, however, if we bring the violence down as we train the Iraqis up.

Some argue that these actions would "break" our Army by destroying morale. But with more than a million men under arms, these claims are not credible. The extensions are modest and within the bounds of what the United States has done in this conflict. Above all, let us consider the alternative: A defeated Army would have to withdraw under fire, humiliated, watching as the enemy tortures and kills the Iraqis it had worked with and defended. Nothing would break the Army more surely than ignominious defeat.

DOJ_NMG_0108199

The options in Iraq are stark: withdrawal, defeat and regional disaster, or an effort to secure the population to permit the political, economic and social development and national reconciliation needed for Iraq to move forward. The president's determination to win with a comprehensive new strategy isn't stubbornness. It is wisdom.

Frederick W. Kagan is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute and the author of Choosing Victory: A Plan for Success in Iraq.

Push To Add Troops Grows, But No One Knows What They'd Do (USAT)

USA Today, December 21, 2006

As the public and policymakers alike have begun to grasp the sobering choices in Iraq in recent weeks, one key option has seemed to gain currency: A temporary "surge" of 15,000 to 30,000 U.S. troops in a last-ditch effort to stabilize the violence-wracked nation.

It's an idea with surface political appeal: If it works, great; if not, we can claim that we did our best. Just one problem: No one seems to have a clear idea of what such a surge might achieve, and even key military leaders are questioning its value.

Though it's tempting to think that adding troops for a little while would solve the problem, this is a seductive and dangerous road. It's the same vague reasoning that led to sending hundreds of thousands of troops to Vietnam. Before it hardens into policy for Iraq, President Bush and his advisers should ask some tough questions:

·What's the mission? So far, there's not much specificity beyond "more troops in Baghdad." Where in a city of 5 million would they go? Which warring groups would they fight? How would this be different from what's not working? This is the most pointed criticism of the surge idea, and the president acknowledged it at a news conference Wednesday, saying he would only approve a "specific mission." The fact that he couldn't immediately articulate one suggests the surge is an idea in search of credibility, not a strategy developed to solve a defined problem.

·Could it work? Assuming the short-term goal is to stabilize Baghdad, which the administration has labeled the definitive battleground, the next question is whether that is achievable. U.S. and Iraqi forces have been trying to pacify the capital since summer by massing forces there, but an unusually downbeat Pentagon report revealed this week that "Operation Together Forward" seems only to have intensified the violence. The report notes that the effort to control the violence in Baghdad worked at first, but that the insurgents adapted and violence surged again in September. One factor: Iraqi police tipped insurgents to raids by U.S. and Iraqi troops, allowing the bad guys to melt away.

·Who are the bad guys? That's not easy to figure out. Baghdad is a cauldron of insurgents, terrorists, criminal gangs, rival sectarian militias, Iraqi police with questionable loyalties and ministries with their own security forces.

·Would the Iraqi government go along? Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has already clashed with U.S. officials and put restrictions on what U.S. troops can do, recently ordering them to stop blockading a neighborhood in their search for a kidnapped U.S. soldier. Would Maliki, a Shiite, approve a tough crackdown on the Shiite militias and death squads responsible for much of the sectarian violence?

·What about the rest of Iraq? The borders are porous, and Anbar province, west of Baghdad, is a haven for al-Qaeda-linked terrorists, the primary U.S. concern. They are destroying the electrical grid in unguarded desert areas far from the city, eroding U.S. credibility in Baghdad, which has less electricity now than before the war.

·How long would it take? Most of the discussion involves a commitment of six to eight months, but those who argue most articulately for a surge say it would take two years or more to succeed. Less than two years from the next presidential election, this is a political non-starter. Three-quarters of Americans want U.S. troops out of Iraq altogether in about a year.

·Are there enough troops? This isn't a matter of scooping up an extra 15,000 or 30,000 troops idling at U.S. bases. Any influx would come from keeping troops in Iraq beyond the end of their tours and sending more troops there sooner than they had been promised. Both of these are morale-busters. Neither is a sustainable plan. This week, Bush endorsed increasing the overall size of the military. That would aid the long war against terrorism but wouldn't help in the immediate crisis.

Bush likes to say he listens to his commanders about troop levels, and two of the nation's wisest combat veterans — former secretary of State Colin Powell and Gen. John Abizaid, the outgoing top U.S. commander in the Middle East — have advised against surging U.S. troops.

Sending more troops to Iraq would have been a good idea in 2003 to stabilize the country after Saddam Hussein was toppled. Today, it has the scent of doubling down on a losing bet, a desperate option seized upon because the cost of others is so high.

Promoters of the more-troops option Bush is considering include Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and neoconservative think tanks that supported the war and are frustrated with its failures. Those supporters should ask themselves one more question:

DOJ_NMG_0108200

Would they want their own children "surged" into a chaotic environment with such an ill-defined mission and limited prospects of success?

A Military Of The Willing Works Best (WP)

By Berl Brechner

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Should we revive the military draft? There's been a lot of talk about it lately.

Conscription, as a social exercise, might instill discipline and respect while getting people to mix with all types and classes of their fellow Americans and perform a patriotic duty. It might also serve the political goals of some who oppose the Iraq war.

But if the purpose of the armed services is to be an effective force for defending and protecting the nation, and winning wars when engaged, I have to say this: The draft wasn't great when I got caught up in it 37 years ago, and it would be even worse today.

On March 24, 1969, I reported for duty at a draft board office in downtown Washington, as ordered by the government. I was processed into military service in Baltimore, assigned to the Army (two very surprised individuals of the 30 or so in my group were randomly picked to become Marines) and bused overnight to Fort Bragg, N.C. Eight weeks later, I was a soldier -- a graduate of Army basic training. And two years to the day after being drafted, I was a civilian again (but still available for recall for six more years, though no such call ever came).

I have no regrets about my service, though my view may be colored by the fact that I never went to Vietnam. (Drafted college graduates who could operate a typewriter generally ended up, despite their combat training, in some administrative capacity.) I learned about military discipline, doctrine and process; met and worked with an array of people I would not have met otherwise; and gained viewpoints different from those that college had provided. Looking back, I regard it as an honor to have served.

The reality of the moment, however, was that I didn't want to be there, didn't believe in the war being fought and despised the concept of conscription. And as it turned out, the Army didn't really want me either, or most other draftees for that matter. That was because as a group, with a questionable fight on our hands, we tended to be uncooperative, sometimes obstreperous (occasionally considered subversive), unmotivated and underpaid -- yet still expensive, since the military invested four to eight months, including advanced training, in readying us for a commitment of two years.

Of course plenty of draftees were brave, aggressive and dedicated, and many died for their country. Everyone in the military recognized and respected that fact. But as a whole, the system didn't work well, and on June 30, 1973, the last draftee of the modern era was sworn into service.

The numbers in the year I was drafted were staggering: 283,586 men drafted in one year, principally for service in only two of the fighting forces. By comparison, enlistment in the non-officer ranks in the Army and Marines combined in fiscal 2006 totaled 112,972.

The ending of military conscription in 1973 wasn't just one more bit of fallout from an unpopular war. It had a lot to do with the real needs of the military. Cohesiveness, effectiveness and cooperation are best found in people who have made a decision to be where they are. The high-tech battlefield is best operated by soldiers who, after extensive training and field experience, use their advanced skills for some reasonable period thereafter.

A draft fits none of these needs. Army jobs for non-officer troops are categorized into more than 200 military occupational specialties. Infantrymen are 11Bs (some used to call them one-one-bullet-stoppers), and my guess is that the percentage of the Army in that classification is a lot less now than in my years. The new Army jobs carry labels such as "Multiple Launch Rocket System Operational Fire Direction Specialist" and "Satellite Communication Systems Operator/Maintainer."

An army has to have the right people to do the jobs that the mission and the equipment require. In Vietnam, when there were a lot more Redeye missile launchers available than trained Redeye gunners, clearly the system had broken down. More technology creates personnel demands different from those a draft was intended to fill. The two world wars required a draft. For the kind of fighting our services do now, we're better off without one.

And one more thing: We've had the latest version of the Selective Service System in place and registering potential draftees since 1976. Only males, at age 18, are required to register. For conscription into a military that now prides itself on its equality of opportunity, shouldn't we start registering women, too?

The writer has been a magazine editor and broadcasting executive.

CIA Exercise Reveals Consequences Of Defeat (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108201

The CIA this month conducted a simulation of how the Iraq war affects the global jihadist movement, and one conclusion was that a U.S. loss would embolden al Qaeda to expand its ranks of terrorists as well as pick new strategic targets, according to sources familiar with the two-day exercise.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield confirmed to The Washington Times yesterday that the simulation took place in Northern Virginia. He declined to discuss its findings, saying that a final report is not finished and that the report will not be the intelligence community's official view. It will, however, be circulated within the community and possibly to U.S. policy-makers.

The exercise involved 75 CIA analysts and outside specialists. It was conducted by the CIA's Office of Terrorism Analysis, within the agency's Counterterrorism Center.

A source familiar with the simulation said it was a "red team" exercise in which participants played the role of global jihadists and war-gamed how the U.S. involvement in Iraq will influence their terror movement.

Although it takes no policy positions, the simulation's key finding appears to bolster Mr. Bush's contention that a U.S. loss in Iraq will have far-reaching ramifications.

At a press conference yesterday, Mr. Bush said, "A lot of Americans understand the consequences of retreat. Retreat would embolden radicals. It would hurt the credibility of the United States. Retreat from Iraq would dash the hopes of millions who want to be free. Retreat from Iraq would enable the extremists and radicals to more likely be able to have safe haven from which to plot and plan further attacks."

Al Qaeda has made stopping democracy in Iraq a top priority, according to U.S. military officials. It has recruited hundreds of suicide bombers to come to Iraq and inflict mass casualties to spur a Sunni-Shi'ite Muslim civil war. The group wants to wear down U.S. troops to the point where they will retreat. Al Qaeda's ultimate goal is to turn Iraq and other Middle East countries into hard-line Islamic states, U.S. military officials say.

One key finding from the "red team" exercise is that al Qaeda will follow past practices. Jihadists perceived the victory over the Soviet Union in Afghanistan in 1988 as a seminal event that spawned the creation of al Qaeda under the direction of Osama bin Laden. Al Qaeda leaders thought that if jihadists could defeat a global power in one theater, it could bring down governments in other nations.

Six years later, when U.S. troops left Somalia after taking casualties at the hands of al Qaeda-trained Muslim fighters, it reaffirmed its feeling of invincibility and its belief that Western powers have a low threshold for casualties. After Somalia, al Qaeda -- and like-minded jihadists -- began attacking U.S. targets in the Persian Gulf region and ultimately struck America on September 11, 2001.

The CIA-sponsored simulation predicts that al Qaeda will view a U.S. defeat in Iraq as another jihadist victory over a superpower and one that will bring it even more terrorist recruits.

"When we did the simulation, the ramifications were enormous," said the source, who asked not to be named. The source said al Qaeda will proclaim, "God has given us a second victory over a superpower.

"Imagine what defeat in Iraq would do," said the source. "Al Qaeda picks new targets after it thinks it's won."

This person expressed unhappiness that the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, devoted less than a page to what a loss in Iraq would mean for global terrorism.

The source said he hopes the CIA report is circulated within the administration to drive home the point that the stakes are high in Iraq. Mr. Bush is set to announce early next year new strategies and tactics for winning in Iraq. He previously has dismissed proposals from Democrats to pull out all 135,000 U.S. troops now or withdraw them on a set timetable regardless of events on the ground.

Mr. Mansfield said the Counterterrorism Center this year has sponsored 20 internal simulations, seminars and conferences using outside experts to examine issues related to the war on terror.

He added, "We frequently reach out to experts outside of government and solicit their views on a range of matters. It is done routinely, and it is a very important aspect of our work. The simulation consisted of officers from around the intelligence community as well as outside experts."

Such events are held, he said, "to better understand emerging threats to the United States."

AP: Pentagon Wants $99.7B More For Wars (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, December 21, 2006

The Pentagon wants the White House to seek an additional $99.7 billion to fund the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, according to information provided to The Associated Press.

The military's request, if embraced by President Bush and approved by Congress, would boost this year's budget for those wars to about $170 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0108202

Military planners assembled the proposal at a time when Bush is developing new strategies for Iraq, such as sending thousands of more U.S. troops there, although it was put together before the president said the troop surge was under consideration.

Overall, the war in Iraq has cost about $350 billion. Combined with the conflict in Afghanistan and operations against terrorism elsewhere, the cost has topped $500 billion, according to the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

The additional funds, if approved, would push this year's cost of the war in Iraq to about $50 billion over last year's record. In September, Congress approved an initial $70 billion for the current budget year, which began Oct. 1.

A description of the Pentagon request was provided by a person familiar with the proposal who asked for anonymity because the person was not authorized to release the information.

The cost of the war has risen dramatically as the security situation has deteriorated and more equipment is destroyed or worn out in harsh conditions. The Army, which has borne the brunt of the fighting, would receive about half of the request, a reflection of the wear and tear that the war has had on soldiers and their equipment.

An additional $9.8 billion is being sought for training and equipping Iraq's and Afghanistan's security forces.

The administration's request for more Iraq money will be submitted along with Bush's budget in February for the 2008 budget year, which starts next Oct. 1. The White House can add or subtract from the Pentagon request as it sees fit, and the total could grow if money is added for reconstruction costs.

In a memo several weeks ago, Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England encouraged the services to include in their budget requests projects connected to the broader fight against terrorism, as opposed to costs strictly limited to Iraq and Afghanistan. Critics have said that could be interpreted to cover almost anything.

Earlier requests submitted by service branches to Pentagon brass were considerably higher, but were trimmed back after meeting resistance at the White House and from key lawmakers.

The budget request includes:

_$41.5 billion to cover the costs of ongoing military operations.

_$26.7 billion for replacing and repairing equipment damaged or destroyed in Iraq and Afghanistan.

_$10 billion for body armor and other equipment to protect U.S. troops from attack.

_$2.5 billion to combat roadside bombs and other improvised explosive devices.

_$2.7 billion for intelligence activities.

Whatever request emerges from the Bush administration will go to a new Congress controlled by Democrats highly critical of the Iraq war and Bush's handling of it.

Even so, there is much sentiment among Democrats to protect troops and much fear about being portrayed as unsympathetic to men and women in uniform. These factors probably would overwhelm any efforts by anti-war Democrats to use the debate over the Iraq money to take on Bush's conduct of the war.

Democrats have promised, however, to give the upcoming request greater scrutiny than Republicans did when considering Bush's previous requests.

"Democrats are committed to ensuring our troops have all that they need, but we're going to return oversight to spending on the war," said Jim Manley, spokesman for incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "Our troops must have everything they need, but Halliburton shouldn't get everything it wants."

Halliburton Co. is a Texas-based oil services conglomerate once led by Vice President Dick Cheney. Bush administration officials have come under fire since the beginning of the war in Iraq for awarding more than $10 billion to the company and its subsidiaries in 2003 and 2004, some of it in a no-bid contract. There have been allegations of fraud, poor work, overpricing and other abuse, which the company has denied.

Democrats such as incoming Senate Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad of North Dakota have grown increasingly critical of the fact that Iraq spending is kept on a set of books separate from the rest of government operations.

The Vietnam War cost an inflation-adjusted $121 billion at its height in 1968, according to the Congressional Research Service. The overall tally for Vietnam is $663 billion, adjusted for inflation, and Iraq costs are rapidly catching up.

Shiite Clerics' Rivalry Deepens In Fragile Iraq (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD -- In the quest to create a new Iraq, two powerful clerics compete for domination, one from within the government, the other from its shadows.

DOJ_NMG_0108203

Both wear the black turban signifying their descent from the prophet Muhammad. They have fought each other since the days their fathers vied to lead Iraq's majority Shiites. They hold no official positions, but their parties each control 30 seats in the parliament. And they both lead militias that are widely alleged to run death squads.

But in the view of the Bush administration, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim is a moderate and Moqtada al-Sadr is an extremist. As the U.S. president faces mounting pressure to reshape his Iraq policy, administration officials say they are pursuing a Hakim-led moderate coalition of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurdish parties in order to isolate extremists, in particular Sadr.

Hakim, who once verbally attacked U.S. policy, now senses a political opportunity and is softening his stance toward the Americans. Sadr's position is hardening. Young and aggressive, he has suspended his participation in Iraq's government and is intensifying his demands for U.S. troops to leave the country.

Their rivalry is rising as the moderating influence of Iraq's most revered Shiite figure, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, is fading on the streets of Baghdad and is being replaced by allegiance to militant clerics such as Sadr, according to Iraqi officials and analysts.

They question whether Hakim can counter Sadr's growing street power without worsening the chaos. As President Bush ponders limited alternatives in forging a new approach in Iraq, some wonder whether the United States is overestimating Hakim's ability.

The U.S. embrace of Hakim "will deepen their rivalry," said Mahmoud Othman, an independent Kurdish legislator. "And it will deepen the rifts between the United States and the Sadrists."

Across Baghdad, as the fourth year of war nears an end, many Iraqis are asking one question: Can their prime minister, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite politician backed by Sadr, balance U.S. demands to distance himself from the cleric and move their country forward?Competing Strategies

In Karrada, a mostly Shiite Baghdad neighborhood of large, tan houses owned by educated professionals and bureaucrats, the trim-bearded Hakim smiles from a large billboard in front of his headquarters.

The son of an ayatollah, Hakim wears the long black robes of an Islamic scholar. He spent years in exile in Iran, where his political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, was founded as an armed opposition group to President Saddam Hussein, who brutally oppressed Shiites.

Less than a mile away in a bustling, working-class section of Karrada, in a poster hanging in a grimy sidewalk restaurant, the thick-bearded Sadr weeps, his hands clasped.

The son of Iraq's most respected populist cleric, who was assassinated by Hussein's government in 1999, Sadr remained in Iraq during the repression. He has stayed faithful to his father's vision, deriving his power from the seminary and the followers he has mobilized from Iraq's streets.

After the invasion, as a Shiite religious revival blossomed, Iraq's clerics saw themselves as the caretakers of the nation's Islamic identity. They were as concerned about American power and ambitions for Iraq as they were about the importation of a decadent Western culture. Many refused to deal with U.S. officials, preferring to preserve their status as outsiders, a tactic that reaps immense rewards today from a population that is increasingly disenchanted with the United States.

"There's no necessity to meet the Americans," said Beirut-based Hamid al-Khafaf, the chief spokesman for Sistani. He added that Sistani favored a peaceful resistance to end the U.S. occupation.

Hakim and Sadr approached the Americans differently. Hakim joined the 25-seat Iraqi Governing Council set up by the interim U.S. administration of L. Paul Bremer. Through his involvement in the government and his allegiance to Sistani, Hakim built up his power base.

Sadr went to war against U.S. forces, launching two major uprisings in the spring and summer of 2004 in the southern holy city of Najaf. Soon, Hakim and Sadr turned on each other. In Iraq's Shiite-dominated south, Sadr's militias have attacked the offices of Hakim's party, SCIRI, and fought with his forces.

Today, the control Hakim's armed wing, the Badr Organization, exerts over Karrada is dwindling. Since the February bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, which triggered an ongoing cycle of revenge killings, Sadr's Mahdi Army has pushed into mixed Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods across Baghdad. In recent months, it has arrived in Karrada, its stated goal to protect Shiite brethren from Sunni Arab insurgents.'Pouring Their Poison In'

Inside the Sayyed Idris mosque, a large shrine in Karrada with an ornate blue-and-yellow tiled minaret, Haji Abbas al-Zubaidi is a witness to this changing world.

For years, the picture of Hakim's white-bearded brother, Ayatollah Mohammed Bakir Hakim, who was killed by a car bomb in 2003, hung in the mosque's library along with images of Sistani and a collection of revered Shiite saints. Now, the pictures of Sadr and his father hang along with them.

Baghdad's sectarian strife now rules Zubaidi's life. In recent weeks, car bombs and mass kidnappings have rocked his neighborhood. So Zubaidi, who has lived in Karrada for 35 years, sees the Mahdi Army, not the Badr Organization, as his main source of protection. It has created "popular protection committees" that watch over blocks, as they do in the Mahdi Army's stronghold of Sadr City.

DOJ_NMG_0108204

"The terrorists are pouring their poison into our neighborhood," said Zubaidi, slim with long, slender fingers and a narrow face, as he sat on a large red carpet inside the mosque. "The sons of Karrada who have joined the popular committees and the Mahdi Army are now 98 percent in control. We have noticed that many of the attempts have been foiled."

Zubaidi and other educated Karrada residents continue to obey Sistani's pacifist vision and view him as their preeminent leader. But younger Shiites, while still revering Sistani, have switched their allegiances.

"We imitate and follow Sayyed Sistani," said Zubaidi, using an honorific for Sistani. "As for the field commanders and the young men, they are followers of Moqtada Sadr."

As the militancy grew, U.S. officials viewed Sistani as the most influential voice of moderation in Iraq. A gray-bearded, Iranian-born cleric in Najaf, whose pronouncements carried the force of law, he stepped in with calming statements at momentous points in Iraq's post-invasion history. One Sistani appeal ended Sadr's last rebellion against U.S. forces.

But since the February bombing, Sistani's words have had little impact, Iraqi officials say. Shiite militias have attacked Sunni Arab mosques. Bodies of young Sunni men, blindfolded and tortured with drills, turn up daily in ditches and trash dumps. Sistani has made three fruitless statements to stop the killings.

"Now when you have daily mass killings, it makes such a call for restraint weak," said Ali Dabbagh, an Iraqi government spokesman with close ties to Sistani.

Sadr's Mahdi Army militia perpetrated many of the attacks, and Hakim's Badr Organization committed torture and other atrocities, U.S. and Iraqi officials say.Rivals Sharply Divided

The rivalry between Sadr and Hakim has unfolded mostly on the political stage. The two leaders joined the alliance that produced the current government, but soon their visions diverged. This year, Sadr threw his support behind Maliki largely to stop Hakim's candidate, current vice president Adel Abdul Mahdi, from becoming prime minister.

Hakim and Sadr are also sharply divided over whether Iraq should split into autonomous regions. Hakim is pushing for a separate Shiite region in the south, but Sadr, who views himself as an Iraqi nationalist, wants to keep the country unified.

Senior Sadr officials have circulated a petition among national lawmakers demanding a timetable for U.S. withdrawal. They have managed to get 131 signatures, nearly half of the parliament, Othman said.

"Politically we can make the occupation withdraw," said Mustafa Yacoubi, Sadr's top deputy and a cleric who wears a black turban.

Hakim, meanwhile, has shown his pragmatism, understanding that he needs U.S. troops and support to balance the growing power of Sadr. Last month, he met with Bush, an action that many observers saw as the U.S. hedging its gamble on the weak Maliki government. Bush also met with Iraq's Sunni vice president, Tariq al-Hashemi, leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, who is also perceived by Washington as a moderate, although many Iraqis would disagree.

"Maliki is very worried about this turnabout," said Wamid Nadhmi, a political analyst in Baghdad. "This is because of his affiliation with Moqtada Sadr and the promotion that Mr. Bush is giving to Mr. Hakim. Maliki is seeing his political end, that they are trying to form a new government with the approval of the Americans."

U.S. pressure on Maliki to isolate Sadr is growing. American officials have declared Shiite militias -- particularly the Mahdi Army -- as the most significant threat to Iraq's stability. Maliki has not cracked down on the militia of his political benefactor. He and his Shiite Islamic Dawa Party are also resisting U.S. attempts to build a moderate coalition.

In many circles, Iraqis question whether Hakim and other so-called moderates can curb the growing power of Sadr.

"I have serious doubts about Mr. Hakim's influence among the Shiites, and I have serious doubts of Hashemi becoming the leader of Sunnis," Nadhmi said.

It's a sentiment shared in Karrada. "Al-Hakim is not loved by the people," said Abdul Amir Ali, a burly Shiite shopkeeper. "People love the Islamic Dawa Party and Maliki because they don't have militias."

In the sidewalk restaurant where Sadr's poster hangs, its owner, Ali Hussein, points at clusters of young men nearby. They are all Mahdi Army, he said. And so is he.

Hakim, he said, made a fatal mistake by meeting Bush. In today's Iraq, credibility and power are measured by opposition to the United States.

"At this time, whoever has his hands with the Americans or Jews is not an Iraqi," said Hussein, as he chopped up cubes of lamb. "So how could Hakim put his hands with the Americans? There will be tensions because Sayyed Moqtada Sadr is a revolutionary man, like his father. Even if Hakim tries to come back to Sadr, Sadr will never receive his hand."

If the rift between Hakim and Sadr deepens, moderate Shiites fear, all Iraqis may suffer. "It should not leave any shadow on a fragile situation on Iraq," said Dabbagh, the government spokesman. "Iraq cannot absorb such a shock."

DOJ_NMG_0108205

In Iraq, Let's Fight One War At A Time (NYT)

By Reuel Marc Gerecht

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

ONCE again American officials are growing dissatisfied with an Iraqi government. In Baghdad and in Washington, officials privately and the press publicly suggest that the Bush administration would prefer that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki fell, and that Adil Abdul Mahdi, a French-educated economist who is a vice president, would replace him. Mr. Maliki is politically too dependent, the reasoning goes, on the young Shiite militia leader Moktada al-Sadr, a scion of a prestigious clerical family and the boss of a pivotal bloc of votes in Iraq's Parliament.

Mr. Mahdi may look like a good bet for Washington. He is a far more amiable gentleman than Mr. Maliki, and doesn't appear to be emotionally distressed when he is in the company of Americans. His group, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, was created in exile in Iran; its militia, the Badr Organization, has never had a serious clash with the United States military and is less prominent in the sectarian strife than Mr. Sadr's followers, the Mahdi Army. In addition, the Supreme Council's top man, Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, has long dealt directly and pleasantly with American officials.

Since President Bush is now immersed in a top-to-bottom Iraq review, in which a substantial surge of American soldiers into Baghdad seems ever more likely and the Army is again seriously considering directly confronting Mr. Sadr, the appeal of Mr. Mahdi and the Supreme Council may grow in Washington and Baghdad.

If so, the administration should nip in the bud such inclinations. Changing the Shiite parts of the Iraqi government and quickly taking on Mr. Sadr would do nothing to end the Sunni insurgency and the holy war of foreign jihadists against the new Iraq.

Indeed, such a tack would not likely diminish the appeal or the power of the Mahdi Army, which is largely made up of poor, radicalized young men whose families were brutalized by Saddam Hussein and have been savaged by Sunni Arab fighters since the fall of 2003.

Nor would changing prime ministers and confronting Mr. Sadr's militia advance the cause of reconciliation among the Sunni and Shiite Arabs and Kurds, allow the Iraqi government to operate more effectively, or let American troops leave Mesopotamia one day sooner.

In fact, attacking Mr. Sadr now and elevating the Supreme Council is likely to accomplish the exact opposite of what we want. And it shouldn't be that hard to see why: the sine qua non for peace in Iraq, and for a democratic future for the country, has always been unity among the Shiites. Any violent struggle between the Mahdi Army and Supreme Council could provoke anarchy throughout the entire Arab Shiite zone, including Iraq's holy cities and the oil-rich south. As bad as things seem now, such Shiite strife could impoverish all of Arab Iraq, dropping the non-Kurdish regions to an Afghan-like subsistence level.

In such a situation, we would likely see the hyper-radicalization of the Shiites, who have already become more militant owing to the tenacity and barbarism of the Sunni insurgency. In addition, whatever fraternal and nationalist bonds remain among moderate Sunni and Shiite Arabs would probably disappear in a Shiite-versus-Shiite bloodbath.

We would do well not to underestimate how these age-old familial and national ties and sympathies still diminish the sectarian strife. A genocidal Shiite-versus-Sunni conflict in Iraq — a real possibility — would be much more likely after an intra-Shiite war that destroys the traditional social and religious hierarchy that has remained vastly stronger among the Shiites than among Sunni Arabs since the American invasion.

Yes, the forces of the Supreme Council might be able to beat Mr. Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army. Trained by Iran's Revolutionary Guards Corps, the Badr Organization is a serious army that might handle Mr. Sadr's more numerous and passionate supporters. The mullahs in Tehran, who have aided both Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim, would probably throw their support to the latter's Supreme Council in the event of all-out war. Such a confrontation, beyond wrecking Iraq politically, would probably allow the worst elements in the Supreme Council — those who envision a religious dictatorship along the lines of Iran — to become more powerful within the party.

And an American assault on Sadr City, the impoverished Baghdad stronghold of the Mahdi Army, would be militarily and politically counterproductive if undertaken before the United States launches a serious new counterinsurgency against the Sunnis.

Even with a substantial surge of soldiers along the lines recommended by Jack Keane, a retired four-star general, and the military historian Frederick Kagan of the American Enterprise Institute — approximately 35,000 more combat troops — the United States still wouldn't have enough forces to fight a two-front war against the Sunnis and the Shiites, as it briefly did in 2004.

In Iraq, the United States is much weaker than in 2004. So is Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the moderate bulwark of the Shiite establishment — so the tentative support he gave yesterday for a plan to isolate Mr. Sadr should be taken with a grain of salt. Because of the nonstop insurgency, Shiite politics are fragile. We absolutely cannot afford to have an American effort to pacify Baghdad be seen as a "pro-Sunni" military assault on the capital's densely populated Shiite ghetto.

DOJ_NMG_0108206

If the administration first focuses militarily on the Sunni insurgency, as called for in the Keane-Kagan plan — and the press indicates Mr. Bush is taking the two men very seriously — the United States and the Iraqi government would be better able to diminish sectarian violence. With more troops, we can clear and hold Sunni areas in Baghdad and thereby prevent Shiite militias from streaming out of Sadr City to attack defenseless Sunnis.

Shiite militias are clever predators. They fear American power — the confrontation in Najaf in 2004, during which thousands from the Mahdi Army perished, taught them about the destructive capacity of the American military. If the Americans leave sufficient forces in cleared Sunni areas, they will stay away. But if we pass the holding part of counterinsurgency campaigns to ill-equipped units of the Iraqi Army and to the Iraqi police, who often aid Shiite militias, they will pounce.

Only after Baghdad's Sunni neighborhoods are fully secured can the Americans turn their attention to the Shiite quarters, ensuring that American and reliable Iraqi forces control the streets and municipal facilities necessary to sustain city life. We may eventually have to confront militarily the Mahdi forces inside Sadr City, but we want to do this only as the last step in counterinsurgency operations in the capital.

Mr. Sadr and his radicalized followers — temperamentally, they are as much children of Saddam Hussein as are the savage Sunnis who glorify the murder of Americans and Shiite civilians — are unlikely to become peaceful players in Iraqi politics. But Mr. Sadr's reputation can be reduced and his charisma countered if ordinary Shiites have more moderate alternatives, backed by American power, who can protect them from insurgency-loving Sunnis and death-squad Shiites.

It's unclear how Prime Minister Maliki will react to any American effort to diminish Mr. Sadr. His party, Islamic Dawa, is a bundle of mostly militant contradictions. In the end, President Bush may have to ignore the prime minister if the latter sides with Mr. Sadr.

And some Shiites, and perhaps most Sunnis, may threaten to walk out of Iraq's government and forsake reconciliation talks if the Americans get serious about pacifying Baghdad and the insurgency elsewhere. Let them. If the city's and country's Shiites, who represent about 65 percent of Iraq's population, see that the Americans are committed to countering the insurgency, any protest from Mr. Maliki or call to arms by Mr. Sadr will have increasingly less power.

No, it won't be easy — but with American and Iraqi troops all over Baghdad and daily life returning to some normality, the situation will certainly be more manageable than what we confront now. The politics of peaceful Shiite consensus, which is what Grand Ayatollah Sistani has tried to advance since 2003, could again rapidly gain ground.

No progress can be made in Iraq, however, if the Sunni Arabs, who have regrettably embraced the insurgency and holy war in large numbers, are allowed politically to check counterinsurgency operations.

The key for America is the same as it has been for years: to clear and hold the Sunni areas of Baghdad and the so-called Sunni triangle to the north. There will probably be no political solution among the Iraqi factions to save American troops from the bulk of this task. The sooner we start in Baghdad, the better the odds are that the radicalization of the Iraqi Shiites can be halted. As long as this community doesn't explode into total militia war, Iraq is not lost, and neither is Mr. Bush's presidency.

Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former Central Intelligence Agency officer, is a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

Cleric Weighs 1-month Cease-fire In Iraq (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra

AP, December 21, 2006

Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who heads a militia feared by Iraq's Sunnis, is considering a one-month unilateral cease-fire and may push his followers to rejoin the political process after a three-week boycott, officials close to him said Wednesday.

The issue is expected to come up at a meeting Thursday in the holy city of Najaf between al-Sadr and a delegation representing the seven Shiite groups that form the largest bloc in Iraq's parliament, the Shiite officials said on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the talks.

In perhaps an even more important session, the delegation will also sit down with the country's top Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. Officials from several factions confirmed the planned trip to Najaf.

The visit is intended to allow the Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, to work out some of Iraq's biggest political obstacles in front of al-Sistani, and to pressure al-Sadr to rein in his fighters and rejoin politics — or face isolation, participants said.

Until the walkout, al-Sadr's faction had been an integral part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's governing coalition. Cabinet ministers and legislators who belong to al-Sadr's movement called the boycott after al-Maliki met with President Bush in Jordan three weeks ago. Al-Sadr's militia and its offshoots have been increasingly blamed for sectarian attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0108207

As violence rages across Baghdad and much of Iraq, a new coalition taking shape among Shiites, Kurds and one Sunni party is seen as a last-ditch effort to form a government across sectarian divisions that have split the country. While al-Sadr's movement would not be part of this coalition, such an alliance — which reportedly is supported by the Bush administration — might pressure the radical cleric to soften his stance.

In Thursday's meeting, the group wants to assure al-Sistani that the new coalition would not break apart the Shiite bloc, said officials from several Shiite parties. Potential members of the coalition said they have been negotiating for two weeks, and now want the blessing of al-Sistani, whose word many Shiites consider binding.

The movement is backed by the U.S. government, said Sami al-Askari, a member of the Dawa party and an adviser to al-Maliki.

"I met the American ambassador in Baghdad and he named this front the 'front of the moderates,' and they (the Americans) support it," al-Askari said.

The U.S. Embassy in Baghdad could not comment on the ambassador's meeting or his position on the possible coalition deal.

However, two prominent figures in the proposed coalition went to Washington to meet Bush separately in the past three weeks: Tarek al-Hashemi of the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party and Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, known as SCIRI. The U.S. supports two other potential members, the Kurdish Democratic Party and President Jalal Talabani's Patriotic Union of Kurdistan.

"The U.S. wants to see an Iraq that is united, stable, democratic and prosperous. We will continue to work with the democratically elected government of Iraq to reach this goal by improving security, promoting national reconciliation and the rule of law and helping the Iraqis deliver essential services," U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor said.

After meeting al-Sistani, the delegation will visit al-Sadr to try to persuade him to tell his followers to return to politics, and to assure him that the new coalition — still being completed — will not isolate his movement, said officials from several factions, including al-Sadr's movement.

"Tomorrow we will visit Grand Ayatollah al-Sistani and Muqtada al-Sadr, though the (coalition) front has not yet been formed, due to the demands of the Iraqi Islamic Party," al-Askari said.

His and al-Maliki's Dawa faction has expressed willingness to join the coalition, but fears it could weaken the Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, Dawa officials said on condition of anonymity because the deal was not final.

"We will inform al-Sistani about the latest developments and assure Muqtada al-Sadr that he will not be sidelined from the political process. We want him to change his mind and be a part of that process," al-Askari told The Associated Press.

Officials close to al-Sadr said they believe the firebrand cleric and his followers would turn a friendly ear to the coalition, out of fear of being sidelined in the future.

Fearing such political isolation as well as possible attack by U.S. forces, al-Sadr will secretly order his Mahdi Army militia to abide by a one-month halt in fighting, said a Shiite politician, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the delicacy of the negotiations. He did not give further details.

Another official close to al-Sadr did not speak about the planned truce directly, but said when asked about it that "the security situation will improve in the coming month."

Even if al-Sadr commands his militia, the Madhi Army, to halt sectarian attacks for a month, questions remain as to whether violence would decrease. The militia is believed to be increasingly fragmented, with some factions no longer reporting to him, and a call for a truce could further divide it.

In exchange for a halt in fighting, al-Sadr's followers want officials from al-Hakim's Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq to make a promise in front of al-Sistani that they will not sideline al-Sadr's movement, said a member of al-Sadr's group.

The Shiite, Kurdish and Sunni coalition was not a done deal, though. Several Shiites complained about conditions set by the Sunni Iraqi Islamic Party, which they said could jeopardize an agreement.

"The demands of the Iraqi Islamic Party are not logical and it is hard to implement them," said Humam Hamoudi, a SCIRI lawmaker. For example, the Sunni party wants all checkpoints leading to and from Baghdad to have an equal number of Shiite and Sunni guards, he said.

Al-Qaida Hints At Power Status In Iraq (AP)

By Maggie Michael

AP, December 21, 2006

The deputy leader of al-Qaida, Ayman al-Zawahri, told the United States it is negotiating with the wrong people in Iraq, suggesting in a video released Wednesday that his terror group was the real power broker in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0108208

The terrorist chief warned that al-Qaida would keep fighting U.S. troops in the Muslim world and target Western nations in retaliation. But he also criticized rival Islamic militant groups, such as the Palestinian Hamas, for being too soft in waging "jihad" or holy war.

"The mujahedeen (holy warriors) will keep their weapons pointed at you until you leave our lands and cease backing our corrupt leaders," al-Zawahri said, addressing Americans in excerpts of the video aired on Al-Jazeera television.

The video — which bore the logo of al-Qaida's media production house al-Sahab — was the 14th time this year that al-Zawahri has issued a statement. As in previous videos, he appeared in a black turban and white robe with a rifle behind him leaning against a plain brown backdrop. He frequently wagged his finger at the camera for emphasis.

In his comments on Iraq, al-Zawahri appeared to suggest that Washington should be negotiating with al-Qaida over the fate of the country. The Bush administration has been reaching out to numerous players in Iraq and to allied Mideast governments in an attempt to calm escalating violence amid calls in the U.S. for a troop reduction.

"I want to tell the Republicans and the Democrats together ... you are trying to negotiate with some parties to secure your withdrawal, but these parties won't find you an exit" from Iraq, al-Zawahri said.

"It seems that you will go through a painful journey of failed negotiations until you will be forced to return to negotiate with the real powers," he said, referring to al-Qaida's branch in the country, which has allied with some Sunni Arab insurgent groups.

But Diaa Rashwan, an Egyptian expert on radical Islamic groups, said al-Qaida had no intention to negotiate with Washington over Iraq. Al-Zawahri's statement was largely rhetorical and aimed at destabilizing U.S. opinion, he said.

"He's just trying to tell the American public that their government is failing in peace as it has failed in war in Iraq," Rashwan said.

In a January audiotape, al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden offered a "truce" to the United States for unspecified conditions — the only previous suggestion of a negotiation with Washington. But al-Zawahri said in a later video the offer was retracted after the U.S. rejected it.

In Wednesday's video, al-Zawahri vowed that al-Qaida would "never stop striking" at the United States and other countries that sent soldiers into Muslim nations such as Iraq and Afghanistan.

He addressed a range of topics in a video that appeared aimed at emphasizing al-Qaida's leadership of jihad and mobilizing support against the U.S. and a range of Middle Eastern players — Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, Hamas and Iran and its Shiite allies in Iraq and elsewhere.

Al-Qaida's leaders "see the jihad as a global effort and all issues as interconnected," said Ben Venzke of the U.S.-based IntelCenter, a U.S. government contractor that studies al-Qaida messaging. He noted that al-Zawahri was increasingly responsive to regional developments and fast at broadcasting al-Qaida's take on recent news events.

Al-Zawahri made references to the call made by Abbas for early elections, indicating the video was made since the Palestinian president spoke out on Saturday.

A technical analysis of the tape indicated that the voice was al-Zawahri's, said one U.S. intelligence official. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak about it on the record.

Al-Zawahri, who is largely regarded as al-Qaida's main theoretician, criticized Abbas for calling early elections and Hamas for having participated in January elections, then forming a government after it won.

"Aren't they an Islamic movement? Aren't they campaigning for the word of God to be supreme?" he said, adding Hamas should have insisted on "an Islamic constitution for Palestine."

Al-Zawahri "wants to remind the Muslim world and radical militants that jihad should not compromise with democracy," Rashwan said. But the attack on Hamas could backfire, because many Arabs may reject criticism of the Palestinian movement, he said.

Al-Zawahri's comments were expected to have little influence in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Hamas has distanced itself from al-Qaida, saying its struggle is against Israel, not the West. In Gaza, Hamas spokesman Fawzi Barhoum brushed off al-Zawahri's criticism.

"Our Palestinian institutions are in need of reform, and to fix them we need to participate in the parliament and other institutions," Barhoum said.

Al Qaeda Warns U.S. On Fighting In Muslim Lands (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

CAIRO, Dec. 20 — Ayman al-Zawahri, Al Qaeda's second in command, has threatened the United States with more attacks if it does not end its military activity in Muslim countries. He spoke on a videotape broadcast Wednesday on Al Jazeera's news channel.

DOJ_NMG_0108209

"If we are attacked in our countries, then we will not stop attacking you in your countries," he said.

On the tape, he also appears to reproach Hamas, the militant Islamic group that won Palestinian elections in January and now heads the government, for taking part in the formal political process and undermining "holy war" or resistance efforts.

In his remarks aimed at the United States, Mr. Zawahri warned of "more failures" if the United States failed to negotiate with the "real force in the Islamic world."

"You are trying, in a panic, to find an exit from the disasters surrounding you in Iraq and Afghanistan," he says on the tape, appearing impassive. "It looks like you will go through a painful journey of failed negotiations until you come back, forced to negotiate with the real force."

Mr. Zawahri has made about 15 taped appearances this year in which he has repeatedly threatened the United States and other Western countries with more attacks.

"Part of the reason for his appearance in the media is just to assert the presence of Al Qaeda on the scene," said Diaa Rashwan, an Egyptian expert in Islamic movements at the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies in Cairo. "The other part is to counter the noticeable rise of political Islam in the region."

Mr. Rashwan was referring to groups like Hamas, the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and others that want to establish a state based on Islamic law but are seeking power through politics.

"How did they not demand an Islamic constitution for Palestine before entering these elections?" Mr. Zawahri said in a clear reference to Hamas. "Are they not an Islamic movement?" Al Qaeda deems any dealing that is "based on secular constitutions" un-Islamic.

Osama Hamdan, a representative of Hamas in Lebanon, said in response, "We do not see the contradiction in being an Islamic movement and taking part in democratic elections that are in accordance with general Islamic principles."

Anonymous Slayings, Car Bombs Plague Iraqi Capital (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The bodies of 76 unidentified people were recovered in Baghdad on Wednesday, police said, the highest 24-hour toll so far for the anonymous slayings that have become a grim part of life in the capital.

All of the victims were men between the ages of 20 and 50. Although they died violently, all shot with automatics weapons, the men were not slain execution-style as is often the case these days -- no handcuffs or blindfolds, morgue staff said. Only a few showed signs of torture.

And they were not the only bodies delivered to the morgue Wednesday.

There were victims of drive-by shootings, assassinations and bombings, police said. The corpses included a Yarmuk Hospital morgue work who usually receives the dead. In all, an additional 26 Iraqis were killed around the country during the day, most of them in the capital.

Two U.S. soldiers also were killed by separate roadside bomb explosions Wednesday. One soldier died while investigating an explosion on foot with a combat patrol southwest of the capital, the military said. Another soldier died after an explosion near his vehicle during a road-clearing mission in southern Baghdad. Six soldiers were wounded in the explosions.

Four bombs rocked the capital during the day with explosions loud enough to send jittery residents to their windows to see cars speeding from the scenes and plumes of black smoke visible from miles away.

The first came at 7 a.m. when a massive suicide car bomb exploded at an Iraqi police checkpoint near the entrance to Baghdad University. The blast killed 11 people, including six Iraqi police, and injuring at least two dozen, police said.

Students had crowded the area during the morning rush, police said. Buses also had pulled into the street, full of Muslim pilgrims on their way to the Saudi city of Mecca via Baghdad International Airport. Investigators believe the bomber intended to target the pilgrims. State-run Al Iraqiya television announced afterward that pilgrims' buses traveling to the airport would be rerouted.

Another suicide car bomb exploded at 9:45 a.m. near the government passport office at crowded Kasra Market in northeast Baghdad. Security guards stopped the car before it entered the market, and the driver detonated the bomb, killing one person and injuring four, police said.

Two more car bombs exploded later in the day in Camp Sara, a neighborhood in south Baghdad, and in Bayaa, to the west. No one was killed, although five people were injured in the attacks, according to the Interior Ministry.

Gunmen opened fire on the Bab Al Muadhem bus terminal at about 3:10 p.m., concentrating on buses headed to the mostly Shiite areas of Sadr City, Talibiya, Husseiniya and Shaab, police said. Three people were killed and at least seven injured, police said.

Gunmen also targeted three teachers Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0108210

Palestinian teacher Mahmoud Mohammed Rasheed, brother of Iraqi television star Zuhair Mohammed Rasheed, was killed in the eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Baladiyat, where he taught middle school, police said. Investigators say Rasheed may have been targeted for being Palestinian, or attackers may have mistaken him for his famous brother, who stars in a popular sketch comedy.

Gunmen also attacked professor Ali Arnoosi, deputy dean of the college of law at the University of Baghdad and fellow law professor Mohammed Hamdani, police said. The two were slain at 3 p.m. as they were on their way home. Their driver and guard were also killed, police said.

In the northern city of Mosul, gunmen killed five people in five different neighborhoods Wednesday, according to police spokesman Brig. Gen. Said Ahmed.

South of Baghdad, gunmen also killed Jamhooryia Aozaiyab, a former member of Saddam Hussein's Baathist party and leader in the Baathist Iraqi Women's Union, police said. The gunmen opened fire on Aozaiyab near her home in the city of Kut.

Elsewhere in the south, six farmers were kidnapped at a makeshift checkpoint morning. They were attempting to drive two trucks full of fruits and vegetables north from the mostly Shiite village of Lijij, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, to the city of Swaira when they were taken, their trucks abandoned, police said.

The U.S. military announced Wednesday that coalition soldiers on Dec. 14 captured an al-Qaida leader suspected of attacks last year in Baghdad and Mosul that resulted in hundreds of civilian deaths, including the downing of a coalition helicopter, kidnappings and suicide car bombings. The leader was identified in the military statement only as "The Military Emir of Mosul" and, later, "The Military Emir of Karkh."

Iraqi Comedian Shot To Death In Baghdad (AP)

By Mazin Yahya

AP, December 21, 2006

Gunmen killed a veteran Iraqi actor and comedian known for his stage portrayal of the lighter side of life in Baghdad during Ottoman rule in the early 1900s, police said Wednesday.

Mitashar al-Sudani, 60, was killed as he drove to theater offices on Haifa Street in Baghdad on Tuesday, a police officer and an official at Iraq's Theater and Cinema Ministry said. Both officials spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

Al-Sudani was shot multiple times, suggesting that the gunmen had singled him out. Armed groups have often killed prominent figures in politics, sports, the media and other fields, apparently as part of a campaign to create a climate of fear and intimidation.

The actor, a native of the southern city of Basra, appeared on television and in stage comedies. In the 1980s, during the rule of Saddam Hussein, he starred in a play in which he used proverbs to poke fun at life in Baghdad when it was controlled by the declining Ottoman Empire.

But he also gave serious performances, and he was a familiar face to many Iraqis for decades — even though many of his roles were minor.

On Nov. 20, another popular comic actor was killed. Walid Hassan, 47, was the star of "Caricature," a weekend satire on Al-Sharqiyah TV known for its dark humor about Iraq's many problems.

His weekend program poked fun at the country's poor security, long gas lines, electricity blackouts and ineffective politicians, providing desperately needed comic relief.

After the 2003 U.S. invasion, Haifa Street for a time became the scene of almost daily gunfights between insurgents and U.S. and Iraqi troops.

In December 2004, gunmen pulled election workers from a car in morning traffic on the street and shot them. Security on the street has improved since then, but remains tenuous.

Meaty Ceremony Marks Shift Of Province Command (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske, Saad Fakhrildeen

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

NAJAF, Iraq — The local audience knew what to expect when Iraqi commandos took the stage at the stadium here Wednesday with frogs and a rabbit in hand, preparing to celebrate with a bloody flourish the transfer of local authority from U.S. to Iraqi troops.

The Americans were in for a surprise.

As U.S. commanders and guests looked on, the commandos in dark green T-shirts began taking bites out of the frogs.

DOJ_NMG_0108211

One man knelt, placed the rabbit belly-up on his lap and proceeded to cut it open with his military knife. He screamed as he bit the rabbit's heart, then handed the carcass to companions who began gnawing away, blood flowing down their cheeks.

The ceremony marked the shifting of responsibility for security in Najaf province to Iraqi forces and was attended by U.S. and Iraqi dignitaries, including Iraqi national security adviser Mowaffak Rubaie. It was the third such shift by the U.S.-led coalition, following the transfer of Muthanna province by the British in July and Dhi Qar province by the Italians in September.

The show of Iraqi machismo followed a tamer warmup by counterterrorism forces from the Interior Ministry. Dressed in karate uniforms, they performed martial arts moves before simulating the capture of a "terrorist," in this case a fellow policeman in civilian clothes.

The gory performance was familiar territory for many Iraqis, who grew up watching such shows of brute strength, either at mass gatherings or on Saddam Hussein's state-run television. The former president's special forces, or fedayeen, were known for devouring wolves, and commandos ate snakes, dogs and cats, as well as the usual frogs and rabbits.

"This is included in their training," said Mohammed Askari, an Iraqi Defense Ministry spokesman. "It's an indication that they can operate under any circumstances, whatever nature provides them."

But the display was not standard procedure for the Americans.

"Our soldiers do a lot of things, but I've never seen them do anything like that," Air Force Maj. Gen. Kurt Cichowski, who attended the ceremony, told the Associated Press.

U.S. commandos have long studied survival techniques that include devouring freshly killed animals. They're just usually dining under duress rather than on stage, military historians say.

Rich Baker, a military historian at the Army Military History Institute in Carlisle, Pa., said soldiers are often taught to eat small animals such as snails. The Army Field Manual contains dozens of examples, including culinary oddities such as insects, frogs, snakes and lizards.

Baker, who served in the Air Force, says he still remembers being taught how to kill and eat snake, "However, I didn't get to the point where I had to actually do it."

Certainly not on stage.

"That's not something you would find in the Western world," he said. "PETA, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, would probably roll over and scream bloody murder."

U.S. Transfers Control Of Najaf Province To Iraqi Security Forces (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 20 -- U.S. forces handed over control of the southern province of Najaf to Iraqi security forces Wednesday while violence continued in the Iraqi capital, with several car bombs killing at least 12 people.

Top Iraqi government and military leaders attended a handover ceremony in Najaf, a holy Shiite city that two years ago was the site of heavy fighting.

Najaf is the third province to be turned over to Iraqi forces. Fifteen more are still under the control of U.S.-led forces.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has said repeatedly that he wants to speed up the transfer of authority over Iraq's provinces from coalition forces to the Iraqi police and army. The U.S. military has troops embedded with Iraqi forces to train them to handle security responsibilities on their own.

During the ceremony, Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, reiterated Maliki's stance.

"Any interference in the country's internal affairs is a red line and an infraction in the Iraqi national security," he said.

Rubaie visited Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the country's most influential Shiite religious figure, and said afterward that he had informed Sistani of the government's plan to take control of its provinces as soon as possible. Sistani, Rubaie said, called for "national unity and closing ranks behind the elected Iraqi government, which represents the unity of Iraq."

But violence elsewhere showed that some parts of the country, particularly Baghdad, will be harder to tame than others.

At 7 a.m., a car bomb exploded near Baghdad University in the southwestern Jadriya district. Interior Ministry spokesman Abdul Kareem al-Kinani said 11 people were killed and 17 wounded.

The U.S. military said the bomb detonated near a police-escorted bus on its way to the Baghdad airport. Iraqi police reported that two police officers and four civilians were killed, the military said. An additional six policemen and 22 civilians were injured, the military said, citing a police report.

According to Iraqi television, passengers on the bus were making a pilgrimage to Mecca in Saudi Arabia.

In Adhamiyah, a neighborhood in north Baghdad, a suicide bomber detonated explosives close to an Iraqi army checkpoint, killing two and wounding seven, Kinani said.

Another car bomb exploded in the Sinaa district of Baghdad, killing one civilian and injuring four, Kinani said.

DOJ_NMG_0108212

Meanwhile, the U.S. military reported that a roadside bomb killed one soldier and wounded four Wednesday as they were on their way to investigate an explosion southwest of Baghdad. In a southern neighborhood of Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed one soldier and wounded two, the military said.

The U.S. military also reported that a female civilian was killed Tuesday by insurgents who attacked a police station in Ramadi with two rockets. A man, another female and a 12-year-old child were wounded, the military said.

Coalition forces captured a senior al-Qaeda leader and five other suspected insurgents in Mosul last Thursday, the military reported Wednesday.

As the military emir of Mosul in 2005, the al-Qaeda leader, who was not identified by name, housed foreign fighters who carried out suicide bombings, the U.S. military said. In late 2005, he became the military emir of Karkh, in Baghdad, coordinating car bombings and kidnappings, the U.S. military said. He is also suspected of organizing an attempt to shoot down a coalition forces helicopter in the Adhamiyah neighborhood in May, according to the U.S. military.

Home In Illinois May Lure Fugitive Former Iraqi Minister (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

OAK BROOK, Ill., Dec. 20 — It was an unremarkable scene on Wednesday outside a gated community here where the former Iraqi electricity minister, Aiham Alsammarae, now a fugitive from justice, keeps a palatial house.

Having escaped from a Baghdad jail over the weekend in what he boasted was the "Chicago way," Mr. Alsammarae, whose whereabouts are unknown, could have been on the way back here.

Or perhaps he had already arrived, enjoying the serenity of the leafy surroundings of the Covington subdivision, about a half-hour west of Chicago.

Dennis Brugh, the property manager of the subdivision, where homes range in price from $1.5 million to $4 million, said that whatever trouble Mr. Alsammarae had found in Iraq, here "he was a homeowner in good standing."

"He kept his house just like any other guy," said Mr. Brugh, who works for Oak and Dale Properties, a management company. "He'd have to or else we'd be all over it."

Mr. Alsammarae, who holds dual American and Iraqi citizenship, moved to the Chicago area in the late 1970s but returned to Iraq just after the American-led invasion.

He was jailed four months ago on corruption charges related to deals made when he was the electricity manager, from August 2003 to May 2005.

In a phone conversation with a reporter on Tuesday, Mr. Alsammarae said he escaped over the weekend and fled Iraq on a flight from Baghdad International Airport. Officials in Iraq acknowledged the escape but doubted some of the details he offered.

The watchman at the Covington entrance, who either stops or waves through every car that approaches, said Wednesday that he knew Mr. Alsammarae but that he had not seen him "in quite some time."

Was that days or months?

The watchman, who would not give his name, would not elaborate.

French Pulls Troops From Afghanistan (AP)

By Elaine Ganley

AP, December 21, 2006

As violence mounts in Afghanistan, France is pulling 200 of its best soldiers out. But military officials here insist France remains fully committed, with 1,100 troops still based in Kabul.

Nevertheless, France's decision to withdraw its Special Forces comes amid concerns in Paris that NATO's mission in Afghanistan has grown confused and that the alliance may be overreaching in its efforts to stabilize and rebuild the nation.

French officials and experts say that as fighting in Afghanistan has dragged on and the insurgency has grown in strength, the special forces were no longer ideal for the mission. Such elite units tend to be more lightly armed, and specialize in gathering intelligence or rapid attacks.

"The conditions no longer correspond to what the special forces do," said Capt. Christophe Prazuck, a spokesman for the French Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The French elite troops — deployed in southeastern Afghanistan since July 2003 — were France's contribution to a U.S. anti-terror mission code-named Operation Enduring Freedom that is separate from the NATO mission.

Seven of the 10 French troops killed in Afghanistan since 2003 were special forces. The soldiers combed the border with Pakistan for al-Qaida and Taliban fighters and looked for al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden. Long based in Spin Boldak, a southern border town in Kandahar, the French rebased this year to Jalalabad in the east and are now expected home in January.

DOJ_NMG_0108213

Enduring Freedom has been trimmed as NATO's International Security Assistance Force has evolved. By October, the NATO force's 32,800 troops became the prime fighting force, moving into special forces' terrain in Taliban-infested southern and eastern regions.

U.S. commanders say the work of special forces soldiers is still critical in Afghanistan, whether it's small-group reconnaissance missions, mentoring Afghan soldiers or supporting conventional NATO and Afghan troops in combat.

But State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the French pullout was understandable. France is heavily committed elsewhere in places like Lebanon and Africa.

"They have numerous other responsibilities around the globe where their military forces are deployed as peacekeepers, so we understand that there are other demands on these kind of particular forces," McCormack said.

Other countries have quietly pulled special forces from Afghanistan. Australia said in September that it was withdrawing some 200 commandos and Special Air Service Regiment troops. Germany has had special forces in Afghanistan, but Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung said none have been there since he took office in late 2005.

And while pulling out its elite troops, France is strengthening its commitment in other areas, maintaining Mirage jet fighters in neighboring Tajikistan and beefing up its mission to help Afghanistan form its own special forces, adding another 20 French trainers.

Paris also has agreed that its 1,100 soldiers in the Afghan capital, Kabul, can be used as reinforcements for NATO combat missions. That concession came at a NATO summit last month where all 26 member states agreed to aid each other in emergencies in Afghanistan.

However, a senior French defense official said any response by Kabul-based French forces would be "prompt and temporary" — with decisions made in Paris on a case-by-case basis.

France has been lukewarm about the decision to dovetail the NATO mission with Operation Enduring Freedom.

"There is strong skepticism about the relevance of NATO in Afghanistan if it is not for stabilization and rebuilding of the country," said Francois Gere, head of the French Institute of Strategic Analysis, a think tank. "If it is for waging nasty guerrilla warfare, there is no appetite in France and, I think, most European countries."

Pakistani City Serves As A Refuge For The Taliban (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

QUETTA, PAKISTAN — At a time when the Taliban is making its strongest push in years to regain influence and territory across the border in Afghanistan, this mountain-ringed provincial capital has become an increasingly brazen hub of activity by the Islamist militia.

Quetta serves as a place of rest and refuge for Taliban fighters between battles, a funneling point for cash and armaments, a fertile recruiting ground and a sometime meeting point for the group's fugitive leaders, say aid workers, local officials, diplomats and others.

"Everybody is here," said Mahmood Khan Achakzai, a Quetta-based member of Pakistan's National Assembly, describing the routine comings and goings of senior Taliban commanders in Quetta, the capital of the Pakistani province of Baluchistan.

The apparent ease of Taliban movement in and out of Quetta comes against a backdrop of increasingly bitter squabbling by authorities in Afghanistan and Pakistan over who bears responsibility for the militia's use of tribal areas on the Pakistani side of the border as a staging ground for attacks that have killed at least 180 North Atlantic Treaty Organization and allied troops this year.

Afghan President Hamid Karzai this month blamed Pakistan for orchestrating Taliban activity. Pakistan, a key ally in President Bush's "war on terror," in turn accused Karzai of seeking a scapegoat for his own failures of governance.

*

Nerve-racking encounters

Quetta is a microcosm for these tensions. Local Pakistani authorities insist that they keep a tight lid on Taliban activity — a claim derided by many residents of this city of about 1.5 million people, and one backed by little demonstrable evidence.

Residents described nerve-racking random encounters with Taliban convoys bristling with weaponry and hearing volleys of automatic-weapons fire echoing from within some walled-off madrasas. Taliban recruitment videos sell briskly in stalls tucked between the gun emporiums and carpet shops of Quetta's raucous main market.

"For the Taliban, this is considered to be a safe haven," said Syed Ali Shah, a journalist who writes for the Baluchistan Times. "They come here, they regroup and retrain."

DOJ_NMG_0108214

At a local madrasa, or Islamic seminary, black-turbaned young men gathered around a makeshift fountain on a recent day, performing their ablutions before noon prayers. One, then two, then half a dozen of them aimed steely glares at outsiders lingering near the rusty green gate of the mud-brick compound.

The madrasa is one of dozens in and around Quetta at which Taliban ideology is openly preached. From these schools, willing foot soldiers emerge by the hundreds to join the fight against Western forces in Afghanistan.

*

Secretive society

The Taliban presence in Quetta is helped by the insular and secretive nature of Pashtun tribal society, the virtually unsecured border with Afghanistan and the city's large population of Afghan refugees, with whom the militia's members can readily blend.

The city also has close historic, ethnic and cultural ties to the Taliban's birthplace, the Afghan city of Kandahar, a bone-jarring five hours away by road. Many Pashtun clans have roots on both sides of the border.

Afghan provinces close to Baluchistan have been the scene of some of the heaviest fighting this year between Taliban and Western and allied forces. The bulk of more than 115 suicide attacks against coalition troops has taken place in and near Kandahar, which was the seat of Taliban power when the movement ruled Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001.

Today in Quetta, it's almost as if the Taliban never went away.

Some Taliban-affiliated madrasas operate almost in the shadow of police and military installations. On the main road that runs from the border town of Chaman to Quetta, there is only one police checkpoint. On a recent day, two police officers sat in a lean-to, drinking tea and barely glancing up at passing cars.

Pakistani police in Quetta say they have rounded up hundreds of suspected Taliban militants in the last year, and report frequent raids on madrasas suspected of militant ties.

"All the time we are harassing them," said Salman Syed Mohammed, Quetta's deputy police inspector-general.

But one Western aid official, speaking on condition of anonymity, described such roundups as a "catch-and-release" program, with most of the detainees seen on the streets again within a matter of days.

*

Mingling with refugees

Militants who are deported to Afghanistan can make their way back to Pakistan at will, either traveling by motorbike on unmarked border trails or joining the crush of up to 6,000 people, mainly Afghans, who cross the border daily at Chaman.

By mingling with refugees, wounded fighters are able to seek treatment in several Quetta hospitals, which on the whole are better equipped than those on the Afghan side of the frontier. The International Committee of the Red Cross helps arrange medical care in Quetta for injured civilians, and says that inevitably some fighters slip in among them.

"According to international law, once a wounded combatant has put down his weapon, it becomes a humanitarian case," said Paul Fruh, who heads the Red Cross office in Quetta.

Although most local people are afraid to talk about sightings of senior Taliban figures, commanders are said to have unimpeded access to the city, even highly recognizable ones.

"Dadullah roams these streets, and they know it," said Achakzai, the lawmaker, referring to Mullah Dadullah, a one-legged Taliban commander with a reputation for egregious brutality.

*

Westerners monitored

Pakistan's security branches demonstrate far more efficiency in keeping track of Western outsiders, including foreign journalists, whose movements in and around Quetta are closely monitored.

New York Times reporter Carlotta Gall was questioned this week by Pakistani security agents who forced their way into her Quetta hotel room and at one point struck her in the face, she said. Gall's notes and laptop were seized but later returned. The U.S. Embassy in Islamabad said it was looking into the incident.

For the families of young fighters from Quetta and its environs, the subject of their decision to take up arms for the Taliban is taboo. A local leader said the tiny hamlet of Charqol, about a dozen miles northwest of Quetta, had produced half a dozen suicide bombers this year alone. None of their relatives would talk.

The climate of fear extends to foreign humanitarian agencies, whose workers are required to have armed escorts whenever they venture outside Quetta. The Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees office in Quetta was briefly shut down this year in response to a Taliban threat.

"I'm afraid, not as an aid worker but as a citizen, as someone living here," said Duniya Khan of the refugee agency. "Everyone in this city feels insecure."

DOJ_NMG_0108215

Al-Qaeda's Sanctuary (WP)

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

THREE MONTHS ago the Pakistani government struck a deal with pro-Taliban leaders in the district of North Waziristan, bordering Afghanistan: It agreed to abandon military operations, withdraw the army and release prisoners in exchange for promises that the militants would cease cross-border attacks and disarm the foreign terrorists in their midst. That the extremists would not respect the accord, and that attacks on U.S. forces in Afghanistan would increase rather than decline, obviously seemed likely at the time. Yet President Bush, ever indulgent of Pakistan's autocratic ruler, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, accepted his promises. "When the president looks me in the eye and says the tribal deal is intended to reject the Talibanization of the people, and that there won't be a Taliban and won't be al-Qaeda, I believe him," Mr. Bush declared when he met Gen. Musharraf at the White House on Sept. 22.

As senior administration officials now acknowledge, Gen. Musharraf's assurances were empty -- as they have been many times before. According to multiple independent reports, Waziristan has been thoroughly Talibanized, and the fundamentalists are spreading their influence through adjacent border districts. Cross-border attacks and the deaths of American soldiers that they cause are up significantly. Al-Qaeda is reliably reported to be operating training camps in North Waziristan with the help of scores of foreign militants who are schooling recruits in suicide bombing and the use of improvised explosive devices. According to a stunning report in the current edition of Newsweek, they are also preparing Western citizens who could carry out major terrorist attacks in Britain or the United States.

Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte grossly understated the case last week when he told The Post that "tribal authorities are not living up to the deal" struck by Gen. Musharraf and that the Taliban cross-border activity "causes serious problems." Considering the grave threat to U.S. soldiers and the homeland itself posed by the Pakistani sanctuary, the intelligence chief sounded positively laconic. "Sooner or later the government will have to reckon with it," he said, before quickly offering excuses for Gen. Musharraf, who, he said, "has a domestic political balancing act to perform."

In fact the situation in Pakistan's border areas is starting to look a lot like eastern Afghanistan before Sept. 11, 2001. President Bush and Mr. Negroponte ought to be asking themselves if they are repeating history by tolerating the situation. They need not do so: The United States has provided Gen. Musharraf strategic cover and billions of dollars in military and economic aid since 2001. In return it should have the right to demand that he abandon his separate peace. Action must be taken against Taliban and al-Qaeda forces in Pakistan before spring, when another major offensive against U.S. and NATO forces can be expected unless the enemy bases and supply lines are disrupted.

As for Gen. Musharraf's political problems, these could be addressed if he stopped allying himself with Pakistan's own Muslim fundamentalists and rehabilitated the secular democratic political parties that he has repressed since his 1999 coup. He could also abolish the colonial governing system in the tribal areas, under which secular political parties are banned and mullahs empowered, and allow representative government. By tolerating the general's empty promises and excuses, the Bush administration is putting its mission in Afghanistan and homeland security into unacceptable jeopardy.

DOJ:

New US Attorney Sworn in For Little Rock District (AP)

AP, December 20, 2006

Little Rock, AR (AP) - Tim Griffin, a former assistant to President Bush (website/newsbio) adviser Karl Rove, was sworn in today as the interim US attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

The 38-year-old Griffin replaces Bud Cummins, who announced last week that his resignation would be effective today.

A native of Magnolia, Griffin served previously as special assistant U-S attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. He recently spent three months of active duty in Iraq in the Army Judge Advocate General's Corps.

Griffin had previously served as special assistant to President Bush and deputy director of political affairs at the White House, as well as deputy communications director for the Republican National Committee.

Griffin will serve as interim federal prosecutor until the Justice Department nominates a candidate to replace him.

Feds laud A-C police (ABH)

By Joe Johnson

Athens (CA) Banner Herald, December 21, 2006

Their duty is to protect and serve, so what does dressing up like Santa, waiting tables for tip money to buy toys and walking neighborhood streets have to do with being a good police officer?

DOJ_NMG_0108216

Everything, according to the U.S. Department of Justice, which highlighted Athens-Clarke police's Community Oriented Policing and Problem Solving (COPPS) program in the current edition of In-Sites, a magazine published by the department's crime prevention arm, the Office of Justice Programs.

"Imagine a successful, proactive police department, one that involves all levels of law enforcement management and strong community leadership," the magazine says. "The police force in Athens, Georgia, does more than imagine it - they practice it."

The magazine goes on to explain how since Athens-Clarke Police Chief Jack Lumpkin introduced the concept of community-oriented policing nearly 10 years ago, it has evolved so that individual officers now are "chiefs" of their beats, responsible for resolving quality of life issues and reducing crime.

"Officers make concerted efforts to inform residents of their availability and involvement," the Justice Department magazine says. "They attend neighborhood meetings and offer their cell phone numbers and e-mail addresses. In return, the community recognizes the value of having a police presence in the neighborhood and law enforcement's willingness and ability to solve problems and improve residents' quality of life."

Lumpkin said the national recognition makes him proud for the officers, but steadily declining crime rates and growing community participation in crime fighting already has validated the concept he introduced after becoming police chief in 1997.

"We have heroes every day doing something that may not be a front-page news story, but they are out there helping a citizen," he said.

When officers aren't trying to rid neighborhoods of drug dealing or cut down on car break-ins and other crime, Lumpkin said, they are attending neighborhood and business meetings to learn what the problems are. If the police can't help, he said, officers will refer residents to other government departments that deal with quality of life issues such as dilapidated houses and abandoned cars.

"There's been a cultural change by the citizens and police, and we have moved into partnerships in many areas of the community," Lumpkin said.

"It's the broken-window theory," Assistant Police Chief Alan Brown said. "If you don't fix the windows and allow things to get out of hand, then criminals have the perception that the community is in disorder and they feel empowered to go ahead and commit crimes."

One of the keys to the COPPS program is encouraging officers to spend more time out of their patrol cars, mingling with the people they are sworn to protect, Lumpkin said. They form relationships that allow residents to feel more comfortable passing along information.

"Perpetrators are strengthened and enhanced when they can operate in environments where anonymity exists," the police chief said.

The department has emphasized the return of the beat cop even more since last fall, when supervisors began to check patrol car odometers and gas gauges to see that officers are spending more time on foot.

"What I'm proud of is the citizens are our partners, and we're doing it in a tough environment," Lumpkin said. "Athens-Clarke County is a great place to live and work, but it's a tough environment for police because the expectations are much higher."

Loss of grant money clouds future for regional drug task force (BTF)

By Mark Caudill

Bucyrus (OH) Telegraph Forum, December 20, 2006

MANSFIELD — The METRICH Enforcement Unit annually spends $115,000 on drug buys.

But because of federal and state funding cuts, METRICH will receive a total of only $100,000 in 2007 after getting $260,000 this year.

Mansfield police Chief Phil Messer, also the program director for METRICH, made the cutback announcement today at the Holiday Inn at a luncheon celebrating the task force's 20th anniversary.

"One good thing about METRICH is we have prepared for cuts," Messer said. "We hope that most of our agencies have made plans to get us through 2007."

It's anyone's guess after that.

"After 2007, the cuts could be so deep you can't survive as a task force," Messer said.

Task forces in general could be in trouble. In 2002, $4.8 million of federal money was allocated from the U.S. Department of Justice through the Ohio Office of Criminal Justice Services for task forces. That figure will drop to $1.2 million in 2007.

Messer said he hopes the 10 counties in the region would continue to work together even if they receive no funding.

"It would be difficult to do, but it's worth staying together," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108217

Messer said METRICH has avoided using grant money for personnel, opting to earmark the funds for training and equipment.

"Hopefully, that good planning will sustain us through what should be a very challenging year," the chief said.

Another possible way to offset the budget cuts is a proposal to have participating agencies make a 50-50 match for any federal and state funding instead of the current 25 percent.

During the luncheon, METRICH recognized several people for their involvement.

Attorney John Allen and Mansfield Municipal Court Judge Jerry Ault, then members of the Richland County Prosecutor's Office, were two of the founding members.

Messer recalled them starting METRICH "because the police and the sheriff's office couldn't get along."

From those humble beginnings, METRICH has grown into the largest multi-jurisdictional task force in the state.

That includes Crawford County.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Juniper Takes Big Charge For Tainted Options (MERCN)

By Mark Schwanhausser

The San Jose Mercury News, December 21, 2006

Announcing one of the largest restatements stemming from the stock option scandal, Juniper Networks said today it will take a charge of about $900 million to account for tainted options issued to Chief Executive Scott Kriens and others during the frenzied tech boom.

``That tells me the profits of this company were massively overstated during this time period, that's what it tells me," said Todd Fernandez, senior research analyst for Glass Lewis, which advises institutional investors on corporate governance issues.

The Sunnyvale networking and security company's board and audit committee absolved Kriens of responsibility and ``expressed their continuing confidence" in him and the current management team. In a press release issued after the stock market had closed, the company said its seven-month investigation assigned blame to ``certain former management" whom the company declined to identify.

Still, some corporate governance experts say the company's probe left unanswered questions about Kriens' role -- questions that might not be resolved until the Securities and Exchange Commission and Justice Department conclude their own probes.

Corporate investigations have triggered at least $8 billion in restatements nationwide so far, according to Bloomberg News. Juniper's restatement ranks behind UnitedHealth ($1.5 billion to $1.7 billion), Broadcom ($1.5 billion) and Brocade Communications Systems (about $1 billion, including adjustments not related to backdated options).

Some analysts downplayed the findings, saying the news shouldn't make Juniper a less-attractive acquisition target.

``You're talking about things that happened in 1999, and it's a non-cash charge," said Sam Wilson, an analyst with JMP Securities. ``It's now what's called old news. Wall Street looks ahead, they don't care what happened in 2002 and 2003. They care about 2006 and 2007."

Juniper's internal probe found ``numerous" cases of misdated options, with ``99.9 percent" of the problems occurring from just days before the company's initial public offering in June 1999 through December 2003. The company also cited lax controls by management to oversee the options program.

CEO Kriens received two tainted grants during that period, both issued at quarterly lows in Juniper's volatile stock price. In 2000, for example, his options were granted at $93.94 -- just weeks after the stock had hit its all-time high of $243.

Both of Kriens' grants were canceled in 2001. Company records indicate, however, that he exchanged 2.2 million ``underwater" options granted in 1999 and 2000 for 2.2 million options priced six months later at the going rate of $10.31 per share in May 2002.

Two corporate governance experts raised concerns that Kriens continues to benefit from the original tainted options.

``Follow the money trail: He got options that were backdated, and he turned them in for something else of value," said Las Vegas compensation expert Graef Crystal. ``He can't wiggle out of that. It isn't `no harm, no foul,' because he got something of value."

Despite the board's vote of confidence in Kriens, the scandal could continue to dog Kriens and Juniper, Fernandez said.

``Here is a case where you have close to a $1 billion restatement, and it's the sitting CEO who is affected," he said. ``That probably won't be lost on the regulatory bodies or the lawyers" filing shareholder lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0108218

IBM Ends Director Stock Options, Spotlighting Popular Perk's Decline (WSJ)

By Joann S. Lublin And William M. Bulkeley

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Stock options, long touted by many companies as a vital tool for rewarding board members and aligning their interests with those of shareholders, are falling out of favor as a perk amid scandal and accounting and legal changes.

Yesterday, International Business Machines Corp. said it no longer will grant outside directors stock options -- which give recipients the right to purchase company shares in the future at a set price. Instead, starting Jan. 1, those directors will be paid an annual $200,000 retainer, which they can take either in IBM shares or partly in cash -- though rules strongly encourage them to take the shares.

IBM is only the latest big company to abandon options -- which are worthless unless a stock price rises -- in favor of compensation involving cash, restricted stock or outright equity stakes that both rise and fall with the share price. The move by the iconic company underscores a broader repudiation of options for board members two decades after many companies began to embrace them -- and could even accelerate the trend because of IBM's reputation as a bellwether of corporate behavior. Among others that have dropped the practice in recent years are retailer Gap Inc., recruiter Heidrick & Struggles International Inc. and food company Tyson Foods Inc.

In 2001, as the stock-market boom of the 1990s crested, nearly eight in 10 big companies were giving their directors options, according to a proxy analysis of 350 major companies conducted for The Wall Street Journal by Mercer Human Resource Consulting in New York. By last year, the figure was down to 53%.

The percentage may drop to as low as 10% by 2010, because boards now consider options "somewhat problematic," said Charles Elson, head of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware's business school, and a director of two public companies. Abandoning options "reduces the controversy" because "any potential for manipulation just goes away," said Peter Gleason, chief operating officer of the National Association of Corporate Directors in Washington.

Options are suffering a heavy backlash after big corporate scandals such as the accounting frauds at Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc. and the more recent backdating scandal, corporate-governance experts said. In those and other cases, critics have claimed directors, motivated to boost returns on their stock options, turned a blind eye to problems.

The backdating scandal has revealed that dozens of companies altered their grant dates to days when their stock was trading at a lower price -- thereby boosting profits on options. More than 130 companies currently are under investigation for the practice in the biggest corporate-fraud probe in decades. An academic study released this week suggested that as many as 1,400 outside board members at 160 companies received questionable option grants, though the study didn't address whether they knew about it.

Companies also are responding to new accounting rules requiring options to be counted as an expense after more than a decade in which they weren't. Under proxy-disclosure rules that took effect for fiscal years ending after Dec. 15, moreover, businesses must reveal far more detail about the elements and costs of board compensation packages -- which could make options less attractive.

More broadly, post-Enron changes in laws and corporate practices have imposed greater demands on outside directors -- that is, those who have no other ties to a company. The New York Stock Exchange, for instance, now requires that a majority of board seats, and all compensation- and audit-committee members, be independent.

That has prompted plenty of discussion about how best to compensate outside directors and keep them focused on shareholder interests while protecting their independence. Outside directors are supposed to play a special role safeguarding against cozy board relationships with management.

"The overall governance thrust today is to have board members be [stock] owners rather than optionees," said Pearl Meyer, senior managing director of Steven Hall & Partners, a pay consulting firm in New York. Options focus recipients "too much on short-term movements in the stock price," she said.

Director compensation has been a subject of heated debate and experimentation for more than two decades. In the 1980s, corporate reformers and some large institutional investors argued that options would help motivate directors to focus harder on shareholder returns by giving them ownership incentives. The idea gained fuel thanks to tax and accounting policies that kept options tax- and expense-free, and the large fortunes that began to be made by companies going public in the early days of the 1990s boom.

According to Executive Compensation Reports, a newsletter that covered executive pay, just 1.6% of the nation's 1,000 largest companies gave directors some kind of stock in 1983. By 1994, nearly one in five did.

DOJ_NMG_0108219

No one has suggested that IBM's directors received backdated grants. An IBM spokesman said the Armonk, N.Y., computer giant's action was consistent with its practice of "broadly reducing our reliance on stock options" as compensation for employees and officers.

IBM started expensing options in 2005 because of new accounting rules. But even before that, "we'd been saying we were reducing our reliance on equity compensation," he said. People familiar with the matter said IBM also believes options tend to make recipients more oriented toward short-term results than they are with other forms of compensation.

IBM said the additional cash compensation for directors is equal to the value of the stock options outside directors have been receiving; each year they were given 4,000.

Ironically, IBM's elimination of options increases the likelihood that outside directors will acquire sizable share stakes -- thanks to its substantial stock-ownership guidelines. The company pays 60% of these board members' annual retainer in a type of deferred stock known as "Promised Fee Shares," the latest proxy noted. Those shares are based on the market price of IBM stock. They accumulate dividends in the form of more Promised Fee Shares, and they can't be redeemed until retirement or departure from the board, at which time the director can receive either IBM stock or the cash equivalent.

Under IBM's corporate-governance guidelines, such directors are expected "to have stock-based holdings in IBM equal in value to five times the annual retainer," the proxy added. With the retainer doubled to $200,000, each outside IBM board member must now aim to own $1 million worth of shares.

The IBM spokesman said all the company's outside directors this year chose to invest all of their cash compensation in such shares. IBM directors include Lucio Noto, former chief executive of Mobil Corp.; James W. Owens, chief executive of Caterpillar Inc.; Kenneth I. Chennault, chief executive of American Express Co.; and Minoru Makihara, former chairman of Mitsubishi Corp. IBM Chairman and Chief Executive Samuel J. Palmisano is the only IBM employee on the board.

Recent years have seen companies take a wide range of approaches to compensating directors. Coca-Cola Co. earlier this year unveiled a plan to pay directors solely through annually allocated "equity-share units," which can't be cashed until three years have passed -- and then only if Coke posts compounded annual growth of 8% in earnings per share.

Similarly, Campbell Soup Co. board members will no longer get options as of Jan. 1. Instead they will receive an equal mixture of actual shares and cash, the big food maker disclosed in its latest proxy statement. "We have moved away from stock options as a form of compensation in part due to the change in accounting rules," a spokesman said.

When Heidrick & Struggles eliminated options for directors in 2002, it replaced them with restricted stock units, believing that "would better align the interests of the directors with our stockholders," its 2002 proxy said. In light of later controversy over options, "it looks like it was a wise decision," said Gerard Roche, senior chairman. "We're in a position where we don't have any worries" about director compensation.

Some companies eschew any stock-based compensation for directors at all. Those that pay outside directors only in cash include Alcoa Inc., Berkshire Hathaway Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp.

IBM won mixed reviews yesterday. "It's a welcome move" because options create incentives "that aren't in the interest of long-term shareholders," said Dan Pedrotty, head of the AFL-CIO's Office of Investment. But he said he wishes the company would go further and adopt a performance-share plan for directors. Union-sponsored pension funds have assets of about $400 billion.

But Mr. Elson, of the University of Delaware, said he was troubled by the move -- even though outside directors must hold a high multiple of their cash retainer in IBM shares. "To show continued confidence, you have to own stock over the long term" and also be partly paid in stock, he said. "You should increase your [stock] position over time."

Separately, American Tower Corp. said yesterday that directors and officers who received options at prices below the fair-market value on the legal grant date have agreed to "eliminate any benefit" by compensating the company in cash, or by canceling vested but unexercised options. The company will increase the exercise price of any unexercised options to the fair-market value. American Tower, a Boston-based owner of cellphone towers, said that the value of eliminating the benefit is $7.5 million.

American Tower said it plans to eliminate similar options benefits totaling $7.6 billion for three former executives.

American Tower has said that "there were a number of deficiencies in the company's stock option granting practices." Last month it restated results for 2005 to reflect a review of the options. A spokesman didn't immediately return calls seeking comment on the options issue or the names of the executives and directors involved.

American Tower Will Cut Gains From Managers' Options (BLOOM)

By Ville Heiskanen, Alex Armitage
Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108220

Dec. 20 (Bloomberg) -- American Tower Corp., the largest U.S. owner of sites for wireless telephone antennas, will eliminate about $7.5 million in gains from misdated stock option grants given to eight current executives and directors.

The company also plans to cut about $7.6 million in benefits received by three former officers, Boston-based American Tower said today in a statement. And the company said it will resume a half-finished $750 million stock buyback.

American Tower continues to cooperate with U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission options inquiries. The company reported on Nov. 8 that some managers routinely misdated option grants for at least six years, artificially inflating their worth. It is one of at least 190 companies to report internal or federal options probes.

``The stock option probe will not have significant consequences for the company," said Vance Edelson, a Morgan Stanley analyst in New York, in a note to investors today.

``Resumption of the share buyback program is a double positive for American Tower," Edelson said. He rates the shares ``overweight."

American Tower will resume a stock buyback program started a year ago and suspended in May. The company has already spent $358.3 million to buy 11.8 million shares, leaving $391.7 million to be spent by Feb. 28.

American Tower may decide to extend the buyback program, Edelson said in his note. He said the pace of the repurchases, at about $100 million a month, will be faster than a ``widely anticipated pace" of $80 million a month.

Shares of American Tower slipped 27 cents to $36.98 at 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have risen 36 percent this year.

Backdating options to days when prices were lower can boost gains to employees and directors who get them, if the underlying stock's price rises. American tower said the values of eliminated gains may be adjusted for taxes.

Chordiant Gets Nasdaq Noncompliance Note (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

Chordiant Receives Nasdaq Noncompliance Notice Over Delayed Reports From Options Probe

CUPERTINO, Calif. (AP) -- Chordiant Software Inc., a maker of customer relationship software for businesses, said Wednesday it received an anticipated Nasdaq Staff Determination letter for its failure to timely file its 2006 annual report as a result of a stock options probe.

Nasdaq initially informed the company in August that its common stock would be delisted because of its failure to timely file its Form 10-Q for the quarter ended June 30, unless it requested a hearing. Chordiant appeared before the Nasdaq Listing Qualifications Panel, which issued a decision granting it an exception until Dec. 29, to get into compliance with listing rules.

Last month, Chordiant decided to restate its historical financial statements for 2001 through 2003, the nine-month period ended Sept. 30, 2004, fiscal 2005, and the quarters ended Dec. 31, 2005 and March 31, 2006. The company said it intends to seek an additional extension to file its amended and delinquent reports, including its Form 10-K for 2006.

The restatements are necessary because of the conclusions of a historical stock option review concluded by its audit committee, which determined additional non-cash expense for the period 2001 through 2006 is expected to be about $8 million.

A total of 105 companies are currently under Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department stock-option grants scrutiny, and at least 90 other firms have launched or completed internal reviews, according to an AP review.

"No assurance can be made that the company will be granted an additional extension," according to Chordiant. "If the Listing Qualifications Panel does not grant the request, the company's common stock will be delisted."

Shares of Chordiant added 16 cents, or 5.1 percent, to $3.27 in afternoon trading.

4 Former Enterasys Officials Found Guilty (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

Jury can't decide former officer's fate in fraud case

CONCORD, N.H. -- A federal jury convicted four former Enterasys executives on securities fraud and conspiracy charges yesterday, but was unable to reach a verdict on five charges against the computer networking company's former chief operating officer.

The verdict came after more than a week of jury deliberations. The onetime executives were accused of scheming to inflate company revenues in the quarter ended Sept. 1, 2001.

The charges were related to sales contracts, investments, and revenue the company reported during and immediately after its spinoff from Cabletron Systems Inc.

The four former executives were convicted on 27 of 39 conspiracy, securities, and wire fraud charges against them. They included:

Former chief financial officer Robert Gagalis, 49, of Rye.

DOJ_NMG_0108221

Former vice president Bruce Kay, 53, of Yarmouth, Maine.

Former accountant Robert Barber, 53, of Durham.

David Boey, 51, of Atlanta, who worked in the company's Singapore office.

Former chief operating officer Jerry Shanahan, the only defendant who was not a certified public accountant, was acquitted on one count of securities fraud. The jury returned no verdict on a wire fraud charge, three other securities fraud charges, and a conspiracy charge.

Shanahan, who is from Ireland, will remain free on bail while the US attorney's office decides whether to retry him on those charges, a spokeswoman said.

The securities fraud charges are each punishable by up to 10 years in prison, while conspiracy can draw up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. The four executives will remain free until they are sentenced on March 21 and March 22.

Enterasys, which was publicly traded and based in Rochester, N.H., at the time, makes routers and switches for corporate networks.

The company has since moved to Andover, Mass., and was taken private in March.

Former Enterasys Executives Convicted In New Hampshire (IW)

By W. David Gardner

InformationWeek, December 20, 2006

SUBSCRIBE

EVENTS

HOME

For PDA and Phone

SEARCH

Management Tech Center: · Careers · Management/Careers Blog · Best Practices · Jobs · Careers Newsletter · Global · ROI/TCO · Business Processes

» Discuss

» Write To Editor

Prosecutors scored another victory over executives who played illegal financial games during the technology bubble when a federal jury convicted four former executives of telecom equipment provider Enterasys of securities fraud and conspiracy charges.

The jury on Tuesday convicted former chief financial officer Robert Gagalis and three others on charges that they illegally inflated Enterasys revenue in 2001. Also convicted were Bruce Kay, a former VP; Robert Barber, a former accountant; and David Boey, a former executive in the firm's Singapore office.

But the jury acquitted the firm's former chief operating officer Jerry Shanahan of one charge and failed to return a verdict on several other charges he was facing. Prosecutors are considering whether to seek a new trial against him.

Enterasys was the largest piece of the former Cabletron, a networking firm whose stock rocketed into the stratosphere before the company was broken up in the early 2000s.

Four other former Enterasys executives, including former chairman, president, and CEO Enrique Fiallo, had previously pleaded guilty to charges and testified in the jury trial, according to media reports.

Sentencing of all the executives is scheduled for March.

The company has a storied history, beginning in 1983 in a Massachusetts garage as Cabletron and eventually employing 6,000, most of them in New Hampshire.

Cabletron tracked the technology bubble, inflating in the late 1990s, but collapsing in the early 2000s. Cabletron was broken into different units, and Enterasys remained the largest operation. Enterasys later moved back to Massachusetts and the firm was taken private in March.

Convicted Enterasys execs use homes for bail (MUL)

By DENIS PAISTE

Manchester Union Leader, December 21, 2006

Concord – Two of four former Enterasys executives convicted of securities fraud and conspiracy Tuesday by a jury in U.S. District Court in Concord have posted equity in their homes as bail, while two others have been ordered to home confinement with electronic bracelet monitoring pending sentencing on the federal criminal charges in March.

Former Enterasys Chief Financial Officer Robert Gagalis, 49, of Rye, signed an agreement to forfeit his $2.5 million home in Rye if he fails to appear for his sentencing, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney William E. Morse. Gagalis has approximately $1.5 million in equity in the house, he said.

Bruce D. Kay, former vice president. 53, of Yarmouth, Maine, agreed to forfeit his principal home and a vacation home collectively valued at about $630,000, which he owns free and clear, Morse said.

Although Robert G. Barber, 53, of Durham, a former accountant, agreed to forfeit his $400,000 house in Durham in which he had about $170,000 of equity, Morse said Judge Paul Barbadoro determined Barber did not have enough equity to provide an adequate assurance of appearance and ordered him to confinement in his home with electronic bracelet monitoring.

David (Hor Chong) Boey, 51, of Atlanta, who is a Malaysian national, also was ordered to serve home confinement with electronic bracelet monitoring. Boey had already put up the $60,000 equity in his $300,000 Atlanta metropolitan area home, as well as $30,000 in cash for collateral, Morse said.

The four were convicted on key conspiracy and fraud charges in which the government alleged they illegally inflated Enterasys' revenues in the quarter ended Sept. 1, 2001. They were part of 27 guilty pleas returned on 39 criminal charges in U.S. District Court Tuesday afternoon.

Morse said they have 10 days to file notice of appeal.

The jury acquitted the fifth defendant, Jerry Shanahan, 42, former chief operating officer, on a charge of keeping false books and records and deadlocked on three others against him.

Morse said yesterday afternoon the government is still weighing whether to retry Shanahan on the three charges that resulted in a hung jury.

Andrew Good, Shanahan's attorney, said yesterday he hoped to meet with prosecutors before the weekend.

Acting U.S. Attorney Joseph N. Laplante praised the verdict, stating yesterday: "The investing public deserves and needs accurate financial information about public companies. The successful prosecutions in this case should serve as a substantial deterrent to others in similar circumstances who might otherwise be inclined to cook the books.'"

As a result of the fraudulent scheme, then Rochester-based Enterasys overstated its revenue by more than $11 million in the quarter ending Sept. 1, 2001, the Justice Department said. Enterasys' shareholders lost approximately $1.3 billion after the company disclosed one of the fraudulent transactions and a pending investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The company specializes in computer networking equipment.

Enterasys Networks Inc. was taken private earlier this year and is now based in Andover, Mass.

Those convicted face possible sentences of five years and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy charges and 10 years on the securities charges.

Sentence hearings are set for Gagalis at 9:30 a.m. on March 21; for Kay at 10:30 the same day; for Barber at 9:30 a.m. on March 22; and for Boey at 10:30 a.m. the same day.

Prison stay delayed for ex-Homestore CEO (INMAN)

By Glenn Roberts Jr.

Inman News, December 20, 2006

Lawyers seek release pending appeal of conviction

Lawyers for Stuart Wolff, the former Homestore CEO who was sentenced in October to 15 years in federal prison for his role in an accounting fraud scheme that artificially inflated Homestore revenues and almost ruined the company, have filed a motion to keep him out of custody pending an appeal of his conviction.

The motion raises questions about a judge's financial interest in a company involved with Wolff's case and other aspects of his trial.

U.S. District Court Judge Percy Anderson on Nov. 30 ordered Wolff to surrender himself to federal custody on or before Dec. 13 to begin serving his sentence, though legal proceedings have so far postponed his prison time.

On Dec. 7, Wolff's lawyers submitted a motion to the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals for Wolff's release, and lawyers had earlier filed a motion with the district court to put off Wolff's payment of a $5 million fine plus about $8 million in restitution. Wolff remains under electronic monitoring in his Southern California home.

"We think he should start serving his sentence," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael R. Wilner, who is representing the government in the case against Wolff. "We are just waiting to hear what the court is going to do."

E. Lawrence Barcella Jr., one of the lawyers who is representing Wolff, said, "We think that there are a number of very significant issues that we will be appealing on what we think constituted error which will cause the case to be reversed." These issues warrant that Wolff should be allowed to remain free pending the appeal, he added. Court briefs related to Wolff's appeal are due in April and May.

The court had recommended that Wolff serve his sentence at a federal prison in either Lompoc, Calif., or Taft, Calif.

Wolff served as CEO and chairman for Homestore -- now known as Move Inc. -- from 1997 to 2002, when he resigned during an internal investigation.

A group of 11 other Homestore officials have also been convicted for their participation in illegal schemes that led the company to restate its earnings and almost led to the delisting of the company's stock, which had dropped to just pennies per share.

The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Justice Department in April 2005 filed criminal and civil cases against Wolff and Peter Tafeen, the company's former executive vice president of business development from 1997 to 2001.

Tafeen pleaded guilty to one count of securities fraud and was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison and three years of supervised release.

The government's case has focused on multimillion-dollar advertising transactions that Homestore entered into with AOL and other companies through which Homestore essentially paid itself by routing money to and from other companies and disguising the true nature of those transactions.

Wolff's appeal, according to the court filing, "will raise the highly 'substantial' question whether the trial judge -- the Honorable Percy Anderson -- should have presided over the matter in the first place," as Anderson "acknowledged that he owned AOL stock and recognized that he had a 'financial interest in AOL.' " And the court motion notes that four current or former AOL employees testified at Wolff's trial.

While Wolff's lawyers had earlier sought to excuse Anderson from the case on the basis of his financial interest in AOL, a separate U.S. District Court judge had considered the matter and denied that motion. About half of the $67.3 million in disputed Homestore revenue was related to AOL, "which acted as the 'third leg' in most of the disputed transactions," Wolff's lawyers state in court documents, and they also noted that "the Department of Justice has filed a criminal complaint against AOL ... regarding AOL's participation in at least one of the very transactions charged in the Wolff indictment."

The Dec. 8 motion by Wolff's lawyers also takes issue with Anderson's denial of requests to allow an accounting expert as a witness to explain the complexity of accounting rules, and separate instruction that would have explained to the jury that "triangular deals" with a similar structure to those that Homestore engaged in are not always improper.

Also, Wolff's lawyers charge in their court filing that the court's admission of evidence related to Homestore's financial restatements was improper, and "other courts have concluded in substantially identical circumstances that restatements are not admissible."

Wolff's legal team includes Barcella and Howard M. Privette from the Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker LLP law firm in Los Angeles, as well as Lawrence S. Robbins, Gregory L. Poe and Mark T. Stancil from the Robbins, Russell, Englert, Orseck & Untereiner LLP law firm in Washington, D.C. Move Inc. had reached an agreement through which the company would pay up to $15.2 million related to Wolff's legal fees and up to $11.9 million in Tafeen's legal costs. The company has also faced legal fees relating to other former employees.

Wilner said that the government has begun the process of collecting money related to the judgment in Wolff's trial. The restitution amount relates to Wolff's insider trading profits from the scheme, he said.

A Job He Couldn't Refuse (MRKTWTCH)

By Matt Andrejczak, Marketwatch

Market Watch, December 20, 2006

Former airline CEO takes over bookkeeping duties at Dell Inc.

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Faced with two investigations into its bookkeeping, Dell Inc. turned to the head of its audit committee and a close friend of the chairman and the chief executive to sort out the accounting mess.

Donald Carty was named Dell's chief financial officer late Tuesday.

The move comes as the world's No. 2 manufacturer of personal computers copes with investigations into its bookkeeping, corporate stumbles and a faltering stock price.

Carty, a former CEO at American Airlines and a Dell director for 14 years, will succeed James Schneider on Jan. 1.

"Michael's a very good friend and Kevin Rollins, the CEO, is a very good friend. They just asked me to get involved, and they're two people I couldn't say no to," Carty told the Dallas Morning News.

But there is doubt about whether Carty is best suited to the job.

The 60-year-old executive is Dell's longtime audit-committee chairman, and the company's accounting methods are under the scrutiny of the Securities and Exchange Commission and the U.S. Attorney in New York. The inquiries forced Dell to delay its third-quarter results last month.

DOJ_NMG_0108224

"We are not sure if Carty is the best choice as he has been a Dell board member since 1992 and was the audit committee chairman who oversaw financial activities that are now in question by the SEC," wrote Shaw Wu, analyst at American Technology Research, which has a neutral rating on Dell shares.

Carty was forced to resign from American Airlines in 2003 after failing to disclose large bonuses and pension protections for executives even as he was negotiating for concessions from unions.

Dell spokesman Dwayne Cox declined to make Carty available for comment.

But Cox contended that the former airline CEO's "high level of familiarity with Dell's finances" makes him a good fit for the job, adding that Carty will help to "revitalize the company."

Merrill Lynch analyst Richard Farmer wrote that Carty's appointment "could be interpreted as a vote of confidence about the potential outcome of the ongoing SEC investigation."

Farmer, who rates Dell shares neutral, said it's typically tough to attract a new CFO when the outcome of an SEC investigation is far from certain.

Michael Dell has been trying to shore up the company he founded 22 years ago amid stiffer competition from Hewlett-Packard Co., Lenovo and Apple Computer Inc.

Dell lost its status as the world's No. 1 personal computer maker to rival Hewlett-Packard in September. To bolster its sales, Dell broke its exclusive-supply agreement with Intel Corp., the world's largest maker of computer chips, and started offering PCs and servers equipped with chips from Advanced Micro Devices Inc.

In other moves, Tom Luce, a former U.S. assistant secretary of education, is re-joining Dell's board. Luce, 66, had served on Dell's board from 1991 to 2005, much of that time on the company's audit committee.

Carty and Luce are expected to work closely together as the company responds to questions from SEC and Justice Department enforcement officials, Dell said.

Dell also tapped Steve Schuckenbrock to lead the company's global services organization. Schuckenbrock is a former senior executive of EDS and PepsiCo.

In trading Wednesday, Dell shares fell 1.4% at $25.77.

Dell Books Carty To Captain Its Finances (FOR)

By Matthew Kirdahy

Forbes, December 20, 2006

Don Carty left American Airlines under a cloud. Now he's returning to a marquee corporate job at Dell, which has some clouds of its own.

Carty was tapped to be the computer maker's chief financial officer, with a vice chairmanship thrown in for good measure. He's already on the company's board and was previously chairman of the audit committee.

Which is puzzling because Dell's problems have to do with its accounting, indirectly overseen by the panel that Carty chaired. A month ago, the computer maker said the Securities and Exchange Commission launched a formal probe into unspecified issues with its books. Both the SEC and the Justice Department are investigating whether prior financials were misstated regarding issues like revenue recognition, accruals, reserves and other balance sheet items.

American Technology Research analyst Shaw Wu questioned the move. “Frankly, we are not sure if naming an existing member allows Dell (nasdaq: DELL - news - people) to restart with a clean slate,” said Wu. “For now, Kevin Rollins remains chief executive; however, we would not be surprised to see further changes should Dell not make material progress over the next couple quarters.”

In a note to investors, Prudential Equity Group’s Jesse Tortora said he expects more changes down the road as Dell rebounds after two delays in quarterly reports and a recall of faulty batteries.

“We believe Dell will continue to surprise investors over the next several quarters as the company re-establishes its cost leadership, wins share in servers and storage, and expands its services business,” Tortora said. Dell, once the unchallenged leader in Windows-based personal computers, has been facing stiff competition from a rejuvenated Hewlett-Packard (nyse: HPQ - news - people).

The Carty move was certainly a surprise. It is unusual for the chairman of a major corporation to return to another as a CFO, and more unusual in this case.

Carty was chairman of AMR (nyse: AMR - news - people), the parent company of American Airlines from 1998 to 2003.

He was the boss after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, which was especially hard on the commercial airline industry, especially American, which had the unhappy distinction of having two of its planes commandeered. Two years later, the company was running low on cash, having lost about $6 billion after the attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0108225

To overcome the company's shaky finances Carty said he needed $1.8 billion in annual concessions, including pay cuts, from employees or the carrier would file for bankruptcy protection. Workers complied but then learned that bonuses and pension benefits for Carty and other senior executives were secretly approved at the same time the workers were aiding the company.

Carty quickly headed for the door.

Wall Street Raises Privacy Fears Over Election-Law Overhauls (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

State-level election-law overhauls are bumping up against Wall Street executives who want to protect their privacy.

A Wall Street trade association has gone to court to challenge a new Connecticut election law that requires that state officials maintain an Internet database listing the names of the children and spouses of executives at companies that do business with the state.

The law is meant to discourage executives from hiding campaign contributions by funneling them through family members. The Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, a combined group of the stock-market and bond-trading trade groups, contends the state's public-disclosure requirement would invade its members' privacy and put children at risk.

"How many Dateline NBC 'To Catch a Predators' do we have to watch to know it's not a good idea to put the name of a kid on the Internet?" said Ira Hammerman, the association's general counsel. He said the trade group supports campaign reform, but said state officials "have gone overboard" in their "zeal to do the right thing."

The disclosure requirement is part of a campaign package passed by the state legislature in December 2005 and amended in May 2006.

With the names set to go online Dec. 31, the trade group filed papers Dec. 15 in U.S. District Court in Connecticut asking a judge to stop the state from going forward. State officials agreed to hold off posting names at least until Jan. 2, when a judge will hear arguments in the case.

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said the group's concerns are understandable, but its assertion of a privacy right "seems questionable." He said the law requires the state to publish only the names of top executives' family members; no home addresses, telephone numbers, email addresses or ages would be posted.

Connecticut's effort to toughen its election laws came in the wake of a series of high-profile corruption scandals that landed former Gov. John G. Rowland and former state Treasurer Paul Silvester in prison. Mr. Silvester admitted steering hundreds of millions in state funds to investment firms in exchange for campaign contributions and consulting contracts for his friends.

Andy Sauer, executive director of Connecticut Common Cause, said his group's research found contractors linked to the scandals frequently sidestepped contribution limits by channeling money through family members. Mr. Sauer said Common Cause hasn't taken a position on the disclosure requirement.

FBR Settles With SEC Over Insider Trading Case (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath And Kim Hart

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group, the Arlington investment firm, yesterday agreed to pay $7.8 million to settle charges that it engaged in insider trading and other violations in 2001 when in effect it bet that the stock price of a client company would decline.

Emanuel Friedman, former chairman of the firm, agreed to pay almost $1.3 million for his role in the episode. He was held responsible as a top executive at FBR who allegedly knew about the firm's trading, but he was not accused of personally selling shares on confidential information. Friedman was barred from supervising a brokerage firm for at least two years, and two other former FBR executives agreed to smaller settlements on related charges.

Regulators alleged that shares in CompuDyne, an Annapolis security firm, had been sold short by FBR while it was handling a private stock sale for the company that would sharply increase the number of shares available to the public and depress their price. The trading allegedly netted FBR a profit of $343,773.

Short-selling is a type of trading that enables the seller to profit if the price of the stock later declines.

FBR's conduct breached its duty to CompuDyne and victimized investors who bought shares from FBR without knowing that the private stock sale was in the works, officials at the Securities and Exchange Commission said.

"It is unusual and a rare event for the SEC to bring enforcement actions against broker-dealers for insider trading," said Daniel M. Hawke, district administrator of the SEC's Philadelphia office.

The long-running investigation has been a cloud over FBR, a local upstart that rose to national prominence and vied with top Wall Street firms.

DOJ_NMG_0108226

Regulators had previously taken enforcement action against a hedge fund and two of its employees stemming from the same CompuDyne deal.

In settling the new charges, FBR and the former executives neither admitted nor denied wrongdoing. FBR, Friedman and the company's former compliance director, Nicholas Nichols, settled with both the SEC and the NASD. Scott Dreyer, the former head trader for FBR, settled with the SEC.

On Nov. 21, CompuDyne announced that FBR had agreed to pay $4.5 million to the company and a former shareholder over the allegations.

FBR declined to comment on the settlement, but the firm's lawyer, Wallace L. Timmeny, said the matter was "absolutely finished."

"We are all very pleased that it is completely over," Timmeny said.

Friedman, 60, who helped found FBR, resigned from his posts as co-chairman and co-chief executive in April 2005 and is now running EJF Capital, a $400 million hedge fund venture in Arlington. His decision to the leave the firm was not related to the insider trading investigation, an FBR news release said.

In an interview yesterday, Friedman said he did not intend to violate any rules and did not profit personally from the trading at issue. "There is no assertion that I acted with bad intent or improper motive," Friedman said.

The settlement does not affect his asset management activities, and he said he does not intend to go back into the brokerage business.

According to the SEC complaint filed yesterday in federal court, CompuDyne was a thinly traded stock before the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. After the attacks, the security company's stock price surged and it hired FBR to help with a pair of private transactions. An investor planned to sell a major stake in CompuDyne and CompuDyne planned to sell a new batch of shares to other investors.

Together, the transactions would more than triple the number of CompuDyne shares available for public trading. They would also occur at a lower price than investors were paying on the open market.

While the private sales were pending, and before they were publicly disclosed, FBR sold short CompuDyne shares. Friedman knew about the short-selling and did not stop it, even after a member of FBR's risk management group notified him that the volume of the trading had exceeded the firm's internal limit on short-selling any one stock, the SEC alleged.

"Friedman told FBR's head trader that FBR needed to be 'very, very, active' in CompuDyne stock and that if the stock price continued moving up, FBR should not be afraid to sell short," the SEC complaint said.

After the private offering was announced, CompuDyne's share price plunged.

FBR collected a $1,764,000 underwriting fee from CompuDyne. FBR profited by an additional $97,831 when it improperly sold shares from the private offering before they were registered, the SEC alleged.

The Pump-and-Dump Economy (WSJ)

By Michael S. Malone

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Three major news events in the second half of 2006 offer hints of an underlying problem that may stifle, if not this economic boom, then certainly the next. The Dow Jones Industrial Average reaching a record high, Google's announcement of its acquisition of YouTube, and the spying scandal at Hewlett-Packard -- all seemed comparatively unrelated. And yet, each bears within it a clue to a growing menace of misguided and ultimately destructive new regulations that has gone almost unremarked in all of the overheated press coverage.

Take the Dow industrials blowing past 12000, and the attendant stratospheric valuations of companies like Google and Apple. While it is a welcome rebuke to those who smugly proclaimed five years ago that the tech industry was being punished for its excesses and would never see such good times again -- Silicon Valley and other tech enclaves are now more prosperous than ever -- it is troubling to note that something is missing from this new boom: Where are the IPOs?

Historically, stock booms have seen an explosion in the number of young companies making their first public sale of stock. In high tech, where most of these IPOs now come from, the new company strategy is to start up during a downturn while big competitors are distracted, weakened or paralyzed, then ramp up product introductions to catch the beginning of the next wave, and then go public as the boom (and the market) starts to peak. Certainly that was true during the dot.com boom: 1999 and 2000 saw more than 450 young companies go public. But it was also true throughout the '90s, where on a much smaller base, in good times and bad, an average of 160 companies per year went public.

By comparison, by the end of the third quarter this year, only 37 companies had offered IPOs -- a figure comparable to 2001, when the entire economy seemed to be coming apart. The shortfall doesn't owe to a lack of entrepreneurial fervor. Venture capital funds are swollen with money right now. Nor is it a shortage of new companies: VCs have invested nearly $20 billion in start-ups this year, suggesting that this is one of the most productive periods for new company creation in modern business history.

DOJ_NMG_0108227

To know why they aren't going public, just look at their business plans. In the past, the inevitable end-point of these plans, the so-called liquidation moment, was an IPO. Not any more. These days, the goal of almost every new start-up is to be acquired by an established company. And in that little shift in orientation lies a potentially radical change in the U.S. economy. * * *

Why do young private companies want to sell out now instead of becoming public corporations? After all, the potential long-term gains for a founder for owning a chunk of stock in a large corporation are far greater than those from a quick sale. To understand this sudden desire to pump and dump, put yourself in the entrepreneurs' shoes. Looking ahead at a possible IPO for your hot little start-up, all you see are minefields of legal precedents and new regulations created after the dot.com boom.

Not least -- but worst -- there is the Sarbanes-Oxley Act of 2002, whose self-monitoring rules Big Corporate initially resisted, but now embraces as an effective way to track internal financial operations. That alone should make you suspicious, because when established businesses like new rules it's usually because it makes them more competitive against start-ups. Entrepreneurs have no constituencies, they don't hire lobbyists or form PACs (like Google just did). Meanwhile, in an almost perfectly timed punchline, China's biggest bank, ICBC, recently went public on the Hong Kong and Shanghai exchanges. The $19-billion IPO was the largest in history, arriving as Hong Kong becomes the world leader in IPOs.

The closer you look at Sarbanes-Oxley the more you realize it is almost perfectly designed to crush new business creation. The latest estimate for the annual cost of implementing Sarbox in a public corporation is $3.5 million. Pocket change for a Fortune 500 company; the entire annual profit of a newly public firm. Is it really any wonder that smart entrepreneurs look for a corporate sugar daddy instead of an IPO?

Which brings us to Google. One reason that few people have noticed the IPO dearth is that the one real initial public offering -- Google's legendary Going Public Day in August 2004 -- was such a supernova that it blinded everyone to the changes taking place around it. Now rich and fat, Google has assumed a new role in the Silicon Valley ecology: buyer. The joke these days is that every new business plan has the same words on the last page: Sell to Google. That probably makes Chris Sacca, Google's director of new business development, the most influential businessman in America today.

Google's $1.65-billion acquisition of YouTube is emblematic of this shift. YouTube might eventually have become the Google of the Web 2.0 generation, the great IPO that put a valuation on the rest of that young industry. Instead, it is unlikely that any of the new crop of community-based Web companies will ever show up on any big board; rather, their fate is to become yet one more offering on an existing billion-dollar web service. The entrepreneurs who've started those companies know the situation better than anyone -- and right now you'd be hard-pressed to find a Silicon Valley start-up that is building itself for the long haul. And that in turn is going to put some serious financial stress on the big, later-term venture capital companies -- the folks who financed the digital revolution -- as they find their business model increasingly obsolete.

Meanwhile, the one traditional force that might have propelled these companies forward to an eventual IPO is gone as well, also thanks to recent regulations. The Financial Accounting Standards Board, which advises the SEC, has been itching for years to force tech companies to put a value on their stock options -- despite the fact that most such options end up valueless. As with Sarbox, these regulators used the supposed excesses of Frank Quattrone and all of the others in the dot.com bubble to finally ram through new rules on stock option valuation.

The result, as anyone but an accountant would have known, is that start-ups are far less willing to throw options like monopoly money to everyone from the chief scientist to the guy who waters the office plants. If that sounds good in principle, keep in mind that easy options were probably the most effective form of wealth distribution in modern life. The great stories are not about a Steve Jobs becoming a billionaire, but about his secretary becoming a millionaire.

Under the new options rules there will still be new T-shirt tycoons like Mr. Jobs, but a whole lot fewer of his secretaries will be able to retire young. And it will be interesting to see just how many of those secretaries (and code writers and marketing specialists) will be willing to put up with the long hours in a job that could disappear overnight -- merely for wages. That is yet another argument for keeping your start-up to little more than the coterie of founders, and then selling out quickly to Google. No wonder big tech companies like Microsoft and Intel jumped on the stock option reporting bandwagon so quickly.

If all of this sounds like one giant conspiracy (conscious or not) to destroy new high tech company creation in America, take comfort in knowing that Big Tech hasn't been forgotten, either.

Consider the H-P scandal. One of the real curiosities of the case has been why a company with a reputation for probity and propriety would suddenly kick over the ethical traces and start illegally spying on its own directors, not to mention reporters. The usual answers -- that the Carly Fiorina era made everyone half-nuts, that the subject of the leak (talk of choosing AMD over Intel processors) was too serious to be ignored -- are likely true, but insufficient for a company like H-P to lose its moral compass.

A more believable explanation, one you hear from those inside the company when all of this was going on, is that Good Scout H-P started toward this disaster by trying to live up exactly to the letter of the law -- in this case the new Regulation FD

DOJ_NMG_0108228

("Fair Disclosure") on selective disclosure and insider trading instituted by the SEC in 2000. For a notorious stickler to details like Chairman Patricia Dunn, the boardroom leak represented not just a betrayal but a true threat to the future of Hewlett-Packard -- and, in the face of Regulation FD, it's hard to disagree. That was enough to turn her into Inspector Javert, ultimately hurting the company's reputation and destroying her own career.

Tom Hayes, who was a senior marketing executive at H-P at the time, argues that if Ms. Dunn and company had sat idly by as insiders unevenly shared corporate information with the outside world, they would likely have violated their fiduciary duties. Indeed, says Mr. Hayes, if you set aside the questionable acts by the outside firm she hired, Ms. Dunn might have been applauded for her diligence in meeting the new rules. No wonder Regulation FD is nicknamed "Fear and Distrust" in America's boardrooms.

At H-P as elsewhere, under Regulation FD plugging the leaks became a moral crusade. Hewlett-Packard just couldn't deal with the moral dilemmas that pursuit created. Other, less honorable, companies are probably not having that problem. Congress is right to ask how much of this self-spying is going on, but it should also look in the mirror and ask why. * * *

Given a fate of living under the magnifying glasses of SOX and FD, who in their right mind would want to sit on a corporate board these days? The smart board-level people I know in Silicon Valley now reduce their involvement to being merely corporate "advisers." Thus, the intellectual capital of America's high tech company boards is falling by the month.

It is often noted in dismay that military academies teach the last war, not the next one. The same can be said for business regulation. In the zeal to punish the excesses of the dot.com boom, the federal government, with the tacit approval of the electorate, sought to not only punish the small number of real evildoers but also build the perfect universal plugs for all of the perceived holes in existing business practices.

The result was Sarbanes-Oxley, Regulation FD and stock option valuation -- three great lessons in the law of unintended consequences. Let's do our own accounting: Thanks to this troika, fewer new companies are going public; economic power is being concentrated in the hands of fewer companies; competition is reduced; new wealth is less widely distributed; the rich are getting richer; fewer talented people want to join entrepreneurial ventures; and corporate boards are getting stupider and more paranoid. And, please note, one of the crucial triggers for economic booms -- a burst of young tech company IPOs -- has now largely evaporated.

Just curious, but is this really what federal regulators, Congress and shareholder rights activists had in mind?

Mr. Malone, a columnist for ABCNews.com, is author of "Bill and Dave: How Hewlett and Packard Built the World's Greatest Company," to be published next April.

Hedge Fund Secrets (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Phillip Goldstein is at it again. This time last year, the White Plains, N.Y., hedge-fund manager was in a federal appeals court in Washington fighting the Securities and Exchange Commission's ill-considered hedge fund regulation, an effort that bore fruit in June when the judges slapped down the SEC. Now he has the agency's portfolio disclosure rules in his sights, and the result could inform the broader debate over hedge fund regulation.

Specifically, Mr. Goldstein is seeking an exemption from Section 13(f) of the 1934 Securities Exchange Act, and if he doesn't get it he says he'll mount a legal challenge to the rule. The clause requires managers with more than $100 million in assets under their care to disclose their equity positions quarterly. Congress passed the law in 1975 amid a wave of anti-big-fund fervor, with the idea that the SEC could use the disclosures to figure out how to "clean up" large investment funds. In reality, the SEC merely makes the filings available to the public because staffers lack the time or mandate to do anything with the data. No one at the Commission could even tell us exactly how many of these filings come in each quarter.

Not so other investors, however, and that's the nub of Mr. Goldstein's complaint. Filers of 13(f) forms can request confidentiality but the bar is so high that, of all the managers covered by the rule, only about 60 ask for secrecy in any given quarter. So 13(f)-based articles frequently appear in the business press reporting the latest moves of savvy investors.

Mr. Goldstein argues that this is tantamount to theft, allowing others to capitalize on smart money managers' talents without paying for their services. And by facilitating this, Mr. Goldstein says, the SEC is essentially perpetrating an eminent domain seizure of managers' intellectual property rights.

It's a novel theory. Whether or not it succeeds, though, Mr. Goldstein's gambit promises to spark a much-needed discussion about the virtues of secrecy. Hedge funds, let it not be forgot, have come in for intense scrutiny because they are often "black boxes" that emit as little information as possible about their holdings.

Mr. Goldstein argues that such secrecy isn't sinister; it's protection of valuable intellectual property. Some disclosures, like the financials of publicly traded companies, benefit small investors. But there's no good reason to shine the light on everything, particularly when public disclosure benefits only large institutional investors with enough clout of their own to pry information from fund managers.

DOJ_NMG_0108229

Hedge-fund secrecy has become something of a political issue on Capitol Hill, and now the five worthies who run the SEC find themselves confronted with it perhaps sooner than they wished; a vote of the commissioners will have to decide the fate of Mr. Goldstein's petition, probably within a few months. Chairman Chris Cox has been trying to carve out a reasoned position on hedge fund regulation, and here's a chance for him to do so.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Death Penalty May Follow A N.Y. Verdict (NYS)

By JOSEPH GOLDSTEIN

New York Sun, December 21, 2006

The first federal death penalty execution of a New York resident in more than 50 years may be on the horizon following the conviction yesterday of a Staten Island gang member who executed two undercover police detectives.

In the U.S. courthouse in Brooklyn yesterday, the foreman of the jury called out "guilty" in a loud voice for each of the 10 counts in Ronell Wilson's federal racketeering indictment. The jury will return to the courthouse January 10 to hear more testimony before deciding whether to impose a sentence of death or life in prison without parole.

Police officers unable to find seating in the crowded courtroom lined the hallway outside as the verdict was announced.

"The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public," Police Commissioner Kelly said in a statement. "They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice."

The jury found that Wilson killed two detectives in the course of committing a carjacking and robbery on behalf of a violent organization. The crime occurred in northeastern Staten Island not far from the projects of the Stapleton Houses, which prosecutors say served as the base for the gang.

The two slain detectives, James Nemorin and Rodney Andrews, were members of the police department's elite Firearms Investigations Unit, which targets the city's illicit gun market. Nemorin had previously purchased a gun from a member of the gang, which prosecutors called the Stapleton Crew, and he returned on March 10, 2003, the evening of his murder, with his partner, Rodney Andrews, believing they would be able to buy another.

In response to yesterday's conviction, Mayor Bloomberg reaffirmed his commitment to seizing illegal guns.

Referring to the two slain detectives, Mr. Bloomberg said, "We will continue to honor their memory by doing everything possible to take illegal guns of the street and protect the safety of all New Yorkers."

At the beginning and end of the trial, prosecutors told the jury that Wilson had at least considered that the men could be police officers, although the criminal charges did not require that Wilson knew the true identity of the men.

Over the course of three weeks of testimony, prosecutors called two members of the Stapleton Crew to testify against Wilson. One of those witnesses, Mitchell Diaz, said members of the gang had discussed the possibility that Nemorin was a police officer. The other gang member prosecutors called to testify, Jessie Jacobus, was with Wilson when he murdered the two detectives. Jacobus, 17 at the time of the shootings, testified that Wilson, then 20, shot both detectives in the head suddenly and without warning. Jacobus testified that the plan had been to rob them.

Attorneys for Mr. Wilson pinned their efforts on undermining Jacobus's testimony and suggesting that it could have been Jacobus who committed to the murders.

Refrain Of 'Guilty' Ends Trial In Murder Of 2 Detectives (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

A street gang member who boasted of bloodshed and invincibility in his amateur rap lyrics was found guilty yesterday of capital murder for shooting two undercover detectives in the back of the head during a weapons sting on Staten Island.

The convicted man, Ronell Wilson, 24, known by the street name Rated R, cocked his head to watch sidelong and deadpan as the jury foreman announced the verdict, which could lead to his death by lethal injection. The same anonymous panel will reconvene next month in Federal District Court in Brooklyn to decide whether to impose a death sentence.

The verdict, after three and a half years of legal machinations, concluded an agonizing chapter for the Police Department. The two detectives, James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews, were killed on March 10, 2003, the first two officers killed by gunfire in a single day since 1988.

DOJ_NMG_0108230

Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly called the decision a victory for police officers and for the people of New York. "They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice," he said in a written statement, adding that he hoped the verdict would provide a measure of comfort to the detectives' families. "We will never forget them or their sacrifice."

Outside the courtroom, officers who had worked alongside the two detectives whispered their relief. "It's finally over," said Detective Al Hawkins, who served with both men in the firearms unit. "I'm just happy. I guess there is a God."

The extended murder case bridged a passage from the aftermath of the 2001 terrorist attacks, when the nation warmly embraced the New York police, to the onset of new acrimony after several police shootings of civilians. It became a part of the debate over the state's death penalty law and was a catalyst for an ambitious weapons crackdown by the city.

In a written statement on the verdict, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said, "We will continue to honor their memory by doing everything possible to take illegal guns off the street and protect the safety of all New Yorkers."

The killings drew scrutiny to the work of undercover narcotics and firearms investigators, their mission perilous by nature and furtive by design. And by a twist of fate, the three-and-a-half-week trial of Mr. Wilson began two days after an undercover police team in Queens killed an unarmed man in a rain of 50 bullets.

The coincidence made for uneasy parallels as such undercover terms of art as set (the area of operation) and ghost (for backup officer) were analyzed simultaneously in the Brooklyn courtroom and in protests and news conferences concerning the Queens case.

Within the walls of the courthouse, where a lunchroom telecast of the proceedings droned daily for overflow crowds of law enforcement officers and police union officials, there was solidarity and undiminished grief. Even as Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis banished police regalia from the courtroom at the outset so as not to prejudice the jury, officers attended in plainclothes, with flag pins on their lapels.

In the gallery, they sat grimfaced alongside the detectives' widows and kin, who lost control of their emotions at times and left for the makeshift cafeteria theater to regain their composure, with mixed success.

Across the courtroom aisle sat supporters of Mr. Wilson, including his mother, Cheryl Wilson. Another of her sons, Leonard Wilson, is serving 25 years to life for the murder of a rival drug dealer in 1999. At the center of the trial, her younger son sat calmly and impassively, betraying neither hope nor despair.

Family members on all sides declined to comment on the verdict, as many of them are likely to testify in the death penalty phase of the trial. In that proceeding, set to begin Jan. 10, prosecutors will offer lists of aggravating factors, and defense lawyers will offer lists of mitigating ones. In court yesterday, defense lawyers said they planned two weeks of testimony; prosecutors promised that their case would be "brief."

The forum allows room for arguments on residual doubt, a kind existing beyond the reasonable, as well as on penitence, continuing danger to society, congenital disadvantage, influence of rap culture and spark of humanity in him. Mr. Wilson's lyrics will almost certainly be discussed, especially lines like "I won't stop until I'm dead."

Only three men have been executed in federal prison since 1988, when the modern death penalty statute was enacted, though the states have put hundreds to death. The last federal inmate executed in a New York case was Gerhard A. Puff, a bank robber convicted of killing an F.B.I. agent and put to death in 1954.

The New York courts invalidated the latest version of the state death penalty law in 2004 midway through a series of turns that extended the prosecution of Mr. Wilson and his co-defendants, a gang of men based around the Stapleton Houses project in northeastern Staten Island. Federal prosecutors took over the case, endorsing existing plea bargains and striking others to build a racketeering case carrying the federal death penalty.

Seven members of the crew pleaded guilty to various crimes, including two men who testified against Mr. Wilson in exchange for letters to their sentencing judges.

It was never proved whether Mr. Wilson knew his victims were detectives, and an accomplice's recantation eventually prompted prosecutors to drop such charges. But a witness testified that Mr. Wilson gave a reason for the shootings in the minutes after he pulled the trigger. He did not care, the witness quoted him saying, "about anybody."

The prosecutors, Colleen Kavanagh, Morris J. Fodeman and Jack Smith, assisted by Special Agent Thomas Shelton of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, presented nearly three weeks of testimony and evidence from members of the crew, scientific experts, civilian eyewitnesses, investigators and audio and video surveillance recordings.

After nine hours of deliberations over two days, the seven men and five women of the jury notified the judge of a verdict at 1 p.m. yesterday. The gallery filled with spectators, including law officers, family members, television commentators, sketch artists and the United States attorney, Roslynn R. Mauskopf.

The lawyers packed their briefing papers and soda bottles, for something to do. Federal marshals lined the gallery in dark suits and holiday ties. The courtroom was nearly silent but for doors opening and closing.

DOJ_NMG_0108231

Mr. Wilson walked in slowly and shook hands with a lawyer, then sat and surveyed this scene. He wore dark slacks and an argyle sweater. He maintained his even demeanor.

The judge asked for decorum, telling anyone who could not keep silent to watch from the overflow room. No one left. Mr. Wilson rocked side to side in his chair, slowly.

“Will the defendant please rise?” the judge said, and Mr. Wilson lifted himself from his chair, palms on the table. The widows and sisters of the detectives clutched hands tightly and sank in their pews.

The jury foreman stood in a black suit, eyes on the judge. One by one, he declared Mr. Wilson guilty of two counts of murder in aid of racketeering, robbery conspiracy, attempted robbery and carjacking, each one a charge punishable by death. He continued, declaring him guilty of two counts of using a firearm, two of causing death with a firearm and another of robbery conspiracy, 10 crimes in all.

The gallery was hushed. There were many dry eyes. Mr. Wilson arched his brow for a second. His hands were clasped behind his back, and he gave a small shrug, then sat and leaned back in his padded chair. He glanced at his mother and then returned his gaze to some point far, far away.

Guilty In Killing Of 2 Detectives (NSDY)

By Herbert Lowe, Newsday Staff Writer

Newsday, December 21, 2006

A reputed Staten Island gang leader now awaits a federal jury's decision next month on whether he should live or die after the panel found him guilty yesterday in Brooklyn of killing two New York City police detectives.

"I just feel good that justice was served," said Al Hawkins, assigned to the same NYPD Firearms Investigation Unit as the slain detectives. "I'm just happy. There is a God. There is a silver lining. It's not going to bring them back. But the people ... have spoken."

After deliberating for nine hours over two days, the jury convicted Ronell Wilson, 24, in the deaths of undercover detectives James Nemorin, 36, of Baldwin Harbor and Rodney Andrews, 34, of Middle Village during an aborted gun buy on March 10, 2003.

Wilson calmly shifted his arms from front to back, then front again, but showed no emotion as he stood between his attorneys as the jury foreman announced "guilty" on all 10 charges in the racketeering murder case.

With U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis having warned against any outbursts from the packed gallery, Nemorin's widow, Rose, and Andrews' ex-wife, Maryann, sat quietly in the second row with seven other women, all relatives of the detectives, holding hands as the verdict was read.

Afterward, Nemorin and Andrews, herself a New York City police officer, declined to comment on the verdicts. So, too, did federal prosecutors and Wilson's attorneys.

But Hawkins praised the jury and said Wilson's conviction showed that "good citizens" will not tolerate the killing of police officers.

Prosecutors contend that Wilson, the reputed leader of the notorious Stapleton Crew, shot and killed Nemorin and Andrews in their undercover car as the detectives were seeking to purchase a Tec-9 gun from Wilson and an accomplice, who said both he and Wilson were planning to rob the two men of the $1,200 to $1,300 purchase money. Wilson used a .44-caliber handgun to murder the two detectives, prosecutors said.

"Detectives Rodney Andrews and James Nemorin were selfless heroes who put their lives on the line to get illegal guns off the streets of our city," Mayor Michael Bloomberg said in a statement after the verdict. "For their families, today's guilty verdict and the knowledge that a cop killer will not be allowed to roam free provides some small measure of comfort. We will never forget the sacrifice of Detectives Andrews and Nemorin. We will be forever grateful for their service, courage and dedication to our city."

"The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public," Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said in a separate statement. "They need to know that cop killers will be brought to justice."

Garaufis told the panel of seven men and five women they must return to his courtroom on Jan. 10 to begin the trial's penalty phase.

Wilson's attorneys told the judge they expect to spend nearly two weeks presenting evidence and testimony in hopes of persuading the jury to spare his life. Garaufis said he expects a penalty verdict by late January.

While state appeals courts have voided the death penalty in New York, Michael Palladino, president of the New York City Detectives Benevolent Association, said he was hopeful a federal death sentence against Wilson could be carried out.

Q&A: What comes next

What's next in the Ronell Wilson murder trial?

DOJ_NMG_0108232

The same jury of seven men and five women that found him guilty must report back to U.S. District Judge Nicholas Garaufis in Brooklyn federal court on Jan. 10 for the start of the trial's penalty phase.

Is the penalty phase the same as a normal trial?

In many respects, yes, but a major difference is that the defense is presumed to have the burden of proof in its bid to see that Wilson's life is spared.

How long is the penalty phase expected to last?

Wilson's attorneys said they plan to spend nearly two weeks presenting evidence and testimony on his behalf. Prosecutors have said they will be brief in their bid for the death penalty, but they were not more specific. Garaufis told the jury the penalty phase should be concluded in January.

What happens if the jury votes not to impose the death penalty?

Wilson is then likely to be sentenced to life in prison without parole.

Will Wilson personally ask the jury to spare his life?

That is not known yet.

- HERBERT LOWE

Cops' Killer Faces Needle (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, December 21, 2006

He took the lives of two NYPD detectives, killed them without any thought of remorse. Now Ronell Wilson will have time to think about his cold-blooded act - and whether he will lose his own life for it.

A Brooklyn federal jury will reconvene Jan. 10 to consider whether Wilson should face death by lethal injection for murdering undercover Detectives James Nemorin and Rodney Andrews.

The jury's decision to approve the death penalty must be unanimous. No one convicted of a capital crime in the Eastern District of New York - covering Brooklyn, Queens, Staten Island and Long Island - has ever been executed.

But for those who were touched by the lives of Nemorin and Andrews, and left empty by their deaths, there is always room for a first.

"Cop killers will be brought to justice," Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said in a statement. "The verdict is a victory for justice and for police officers who continue to risk their lives for the public."

Wilson was convicted yesterday of 10 counts of racketeering murder, carjacking, robbery and criminal use of a firearm.

The feds took on the case after the state's death penalty statute was ruled unconstitutional by the state Court of Appeals.

Federal Judge Nicholas Garaufis had warned spectators against any outbursts and the heroes' widows conducted themselves with quiet dignity.

Nemorin's widow, Rose, nodded her head at each guilty count. Andrews' widow, Maryann, leaned forward so the jurors could not see her crying - then text-messaged the verdict on her phone to their two young sons at school.

Brooklyn U.S. Attorney Roslynn Mauskopf wiped tears from her eyes after the verdict was read by the jury foreman in a loud, strong voice after only nine hours of deliberations.

But the 24-year-old killer from Staten Island stood with a blank look on his face.

Lead defense attorney Ephraim Savitt said Wilson wasn't surprised by the verdict.

"He took it stoically, very maturely and without any bitterness at all," Savitt said outside court. "He's ready to fight for his life."

Wilson's mother declined to speak to reporters.

Nemorin and Andrews were gunned down March 10, 2003, while negotiating the purchase of a submachine gun from members of a violent drug gang operating out of the Stapleton Houses.

The anonymous jury of 10 whites, one black and one Hispanic heard disturbing testimony from cooperating witnesses how Wilson planned to rob Nemorin of the $1,200 in buy money.

Fellow gang member Jessie Jacobus testified that Wilson shot Andrews in the temple without warning from the backseat of the undercovers' auto. Then Nemorin was executed with a bullet to the back of his head as the father of three pleaded for his life.

"I popped them," the remorseless punk told fellow gang members when he returned to the housing project to change his bloody clothes.

Faced with overwhelming evidence that included forensics, testimony from snitches and demented rap lyrics that Wilson penned after the crime in which he boasted of leaving "slugs in the back of ya head ... cause I'm getting dat bread," defense attorneys had little to work with and called only four witnesses to attack the government's case.

DOJ_NMG_0108233

It remains unclear whether Wilson knew the victims were cops, an issue that may be key during the upcoming penalty phase of the trial, which will last at least two weeks. The jury did conclude that Wilson was motivated in part to "increase his status" in the gang.

For the penalty phase, the government will call family members and colleagues of the detectives to give victim impact statements about the "loss, injury and harm" caused by their deaths.

Prosecutors also will highlight Wilson's threat to inmates and guards in prison if his life is spared, pointing to a note containing rap lyrics penned by Wilson after the double murder in which he proclaimed "aint goin stop to I'm dead."

Defense attorneys are expected to argue for mercy by calling Wilson's mother and other family members as witnesses, and offering psychiatric reports.

If Wilson gets death, years of appeals will follow. The sentence, if upheld, would likely be carried out at the death chamber in a federal prison in Terre Haute, Ind.

Anchorage Man Charged With Sex Trafficking, Drug Counts (AP)

By Dan Joling, Associated Press

AP, December 21, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska – An Anchorage man has been indicted on charges of coercing juvenile girls and adult women into prostitution and paying them off in crack cocaine.

Don Arthur Webster Jr., 49, who went by the name of Jerry Starr and “Daddy,” was indicted in federal court on 28 counts of sex and drug trafficking.

The indictment was made public Wednesday. Webster already was in custody on drug charges stemming from a Nov. 14 indictment, said U.S. Attorney for Alaska Nelson Cohen.

The yearlong investigation was a joint effort of the FBI, Anchorage police and the U.S. Attorney's office.

Cohen said Webster operated at least seven businesses – Foxy Roxies, Sunshine Girls, American Beauties, Kotton Kandy, Tiffani's, Tickle Your Fancy and Lickety Split – that purported to be companion services in which clients would pay for another person's time and company.

“It was, in fact, a prostitution ring,” Cohen said.

Prosecutors said the prostitution ring was operated on an out-call basis. When a client called, females would meet the caller at his home or a hotel.

Callers paid a fixed hourly fee plus a transportation fee. If requested, the girls and women would provide drugs from Webster for an additional fee, prosecutors said.

The girls and women were required to turn over all money they collected in return for sex acts, prosecutors said. Webster or his representative would pay them in drugs, typically a gram of crack cocaine, prosecutors said.

Webster provided housing for the females at six homes. Police and federal authorities said Webster was violent with the females and threatened them with harm if they disobeyed him or tried to leave.

He would take their personal property and identification when they moved into one of his homes, prosecutors said.

At least five girls and six women were victims of Webster, Cohen said.

Sgt. Kathy Lacey of the Anchorage Police Department vice squad said there may be other victims.

“I would like to encourage them to come forward,” she said.

Cohen revealed few details of the investigation outside of what was stated in the indictment, such as the ages of the juvenile prostitutes. He would not indicate whether the women were U.S. citizens or foreign nationals.

“We want to protect them,” Cohen said.

Charges only include incidents back to 2000 when federal law governing human trafficking was revised.

FBI special agent Toni Marie Fogle said human trafficking crimes have been made a high priority of the agency and are considered to be a human rights violation.

Cohen said there were no plans to prosecute clients who used Webster's businesses.

The indictment unveiled Wednesday charges Webster with four counts of sex trafficking using force, fraud or coercion, two counts of attempted sex trafficking of a child, five counts of sex trafficking of an adult, three counts of distribution of cocaine base to a pregnant woman, four counts of distributing cocaine to a child and five counts of distribution of cocaine base.

They were added to the November indictment that included one count each of manufacturing cocaine, possessing cocaine with intent to distribute, and maintaining a place to manufacture, distribute and use cocaine.

Prosecutors are seeking forfeiture of a home belonging to Webster in the Spenard neighborhood of Anchorage. Homes can be seized if used in the commission of sex trafficking or drug distribution and the indictment seeks forfeiture under both provisions.

DOJ_NMG_0108234

Federal prosecutors charge an Anchorage man with 28 counts of sex trafficking and drug-related offenses (KTVA)

By Steve O'Brien

KTVA-TV Anchorage, December 20, 2006

Five girls under the age of 18, may have been victimized in an Anchorage prostitution ring. Federal prosecutors have charged an Anchorage man with 28 counts of sex trafficking and drug-related offenses.

Investigators say they're dealing with a pimp who ran at least seven businesses that were really fronts for prostitution. If the charges are true, it's a disturbing case for the community.

Forty nine-year-old Don Arthur Webster Jr. is in hot water. Authorities say he's a pimp known on the street as Jerry Starr. Investigators believe he worked out of six houses throughout Anchorage, one of them on Oregon Drive.

The Feds announced he's been indicted on 28 counts of sex and drug crimes.

"This indictment is the culmination of an investigation that has taken place for over a year," said U.S. Attorney Nelson P. Cohen.

Webster is accused of operating seven so-called escort services. They have names like Foxy Roxies, Sunshine Girls, Tickle Your Fancy and Tiffani's. They are all listed in the phone book, but investigators say they're really a front for prostitution.

CBS 11 News called these numbers on Wednesday, and they're now out of service. Among the most startling accusations in the indictment is that among the 11 women allegedly victimized by Webster, five are underage.

"If we have one child who is affected by child exploitation in our city, we have a problem. If we have one person out there doing that, it's likely that person will be affecting far more than just one child," said Sergeant Kathy Lacey of the Vice Unit, A.P.D.

The story doesn't end there. Authorities say some of the adult women are pregnant. They accuse Webster of keeping the money he made off their bodies. He allegedly paid them with crack cocaine.

Meanwhile, the FBI, the U.S. Attorney and Anchorage police say the investigation isn't over and there could be more victims they don't know about yet.

"We want to get the message out that there is a task force to work on human trafficking. And so we encourage any victims to come forward," said Cohen.

Vice Unit: 786-2425

Investigators say the underage girls and the women involved are getting the proper support they need, especially from the Alaska Coalition Against Trafficking.

They want to get the word out in case there are more victims out there. So if you know of a victim, you are urged to call the Vice Unit at 786-2425.

Harsher penalties weighed for online sex offenders (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin

Washington Times, December 21, 2006

Virginia should establish stiffer sentencing guidelines against sexual predators convicted of hunting down victims on the Internet, and parents must be better educated about the risks their children face in cyberspace, according to a report released by a state task force yesterday.

The Youth Internet Safety Task Force was established by state Attorney General Robert F. McDonnell, who said raising public awareness is the best way to shield unsuspecting children from attacks on the Internet.

"Today your children spend more time online than they do in playgrounds," said Mr. McDonnell, a father of five. "We need to protect kids in cyberspace by keeping them out of areas frequented by sexual predators."

There are 25 recommendations in the nearly 100-page report, which was compiled by more than 40 parents, business leaders and law-enforcement officials after six months of study.

"Here in the Internet capital of the world ... we must do everything possible to protect the Internet from child pornographers, sexual predators, identity thieves and other criminals," the report states. "The Internet is the new or last frontier for child predators."

The report recommends giving law-enforcement officials additional tools to police the "dark side of the Internet."

The proposals include mandatory minimum prison sentences for producing child pornography or soliciting children online.

For example, someone convicted of producing or financing child pornography now faces one to 10 years in prison. The report recommends raising the penalty to five to 30 years.

"That will significantly bump up the punishment," Mr. McDonnell said.

DOJ_NMG_0108235

The report also includes the proposal of requiring convicted sex offenders to register their online identities with the state to help social networking sites such as MySpace.com to block access to those people. The move would make Virginia the first in the nation to take such action.

The Internet and social-networking sites have skyrocketed in popularity in recent years, giving youngsters a new avenue to meet people worldwide.

However, the sites also have given the estimated 50,000 sexual predators online at any given time a new venue to lure children by posing as a teen.

According to the U.S. Justice Department, one in five children ages 10 to 17 receive an unwanted sexual solicitation online.

The statewide media campaign to raise public awareness is scheduled to begin next month and estimated to cost about $1 million.

Mr. McDonnell said there already has been about $200,000 in private contributions, including $100,000 from AOL.

"This campaign is designed to use offline and online channels to raise the awareness of all parents -- not just those who are Internet savvy," said Charles Curran, AOL's chief counsel for policy and a task force member. "We need to take a good part of this training offline so that parents who are unfamiliar with Internet technology have the same opportunity to provide a safe Internet experience for their children."

Wilson Challenges Subpoena In CIA Case (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

Former ambassador Joseph Wilson asked a federal judge Wednesday not to force him to testify in the CIA leak case and accused former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby of trying to harass him on the witness stand.

Libby, who faces perjury and obstruction charges, subpoenaed Wilson as a defense witness this month. Libby's attorney, William Jeffress, said in court Tuesday that was a precautionary move and he did not expect to put Wilson on the stand.

Libby is accused of lying to investigators about his conversations with reporters regarding Wilson's wife, outed CIA operative Valerie Plame. Plame and Wilson have sued Libby and other Bush administration officials, accusing them of plotting to leak Plame's identity as retribution for Wilson's criticism of prewar intelligence on Iraq.

"Mr. Libby should not be permitted to compel Mr. Wilson's testimony at trial either for the purpose of harassing Mr. Wilson or to gain an advantage in the civil case," Wilson's attorneys wrote.

While Wilson and Plame are at the center of the CIA leak scandal, Wilson is a minor figure in Libby's perjury trial. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton has sought to keep much of the back story of the leak out of the case.

Katrina fraud in Yuba (AD)

By Rob Young

Yuba (CA) Appeal-Democrat, December 20, 2006

A Yuba County resident admitted Tuesday in federal court that she conspired to steal $6,000 in Hurricane Katrina disaster relief, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Crystal J. Housley, 27, who has a Marysville mailing address but was living earlier this year in Olivehurst, pleaded guilty before Judge Lawrence K. Karlton in U.S. District Court in Sacramento.

Housley, along with defendants John P. Housley and Shawn R. Cudaback, said they lived in Gibson, La., at the time of the hurricane when they actually were in Arkansas, according to U.S. Attorney McGregor W. Scott.

The three allegedly gathered Sept. 15, 2005, at a Yuba County motel to defraud the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

John Housley, who also had an Olivehurst address earlier this year, is scheduled to be arraigned today. Crystal Housley will be sentenced Feb. 27 and Cudaback, who pleaded guilty earlier, on March 20.

Each defendant is facing a maximum prison term of 10 years and a fine up to $250,000.

The case was investigated by the Justice Department's Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force.

According to an indictment filed Oct. 18, the three defendants learned from the American Red Cross how to apply for FEMA aid by telephone. They agreed to support each other's claims that they lived in a mobile home in Gibson, which was in the disaster area.

Each defendant received a U.S. Treasury check for $2,000, mailed to a general delivery address in Marysville.

As of September, more than 400 people nationwide had been charged with hurricane-related fraud, according to the latest progress report from the Task Force.

DOJ_NMG_0108236

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Sacramento previously charged 72 people in connection with a scheme to defraud the American Red Cross of funds intended for Hurricane Katrina victims by submitting or causing others to submit fraudulent claims through the American Red Cross call center in Bakersfield.

Sixty-four of those defendants pleaded guilty to felonies, and 54 have been sentenced, according to the Task Force's report

CyberNET wife, others indicted in fed court

(WOOD-TV)

WOOD-TV Grand Rapids, December 21, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS - Krista Watson and two others were indicted Wednesday morning for their role in the CyberNET fraud uncovered in 2004.

Watson, 39, her mother-in-law Geraldine and Paul Wright are charged in a criminal conspiracy to commit bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering crimes. The charges lay out how they and others defrauded investors of approximately $100 million.

"CyberNET is a local example of a national problem," said US Attorney Margaret Chiara. "Prosecuting corporate officers for committing unconscionable acts against the public remains a top priority of my office and the Department of Justice."

The three are also charged with defrauding Huntington National Bank over a $17 million line of credit, as well as individual acts of money laundering.

Krista Watson was arrested in Chicago. Additionally, she is charged with spending money received through bank fraud, and three counts of income tax evasion for 2002, 2003 and 2004.

Geraldine Watson, 77, also faces a charge of making a false statement to a firearms dealer related to a gun purchase. She said the gun was for herself, but it's alleged she bought the Remington shotgun for her son Barton. He couldn't buy a gun because of a previous felony conviction. She bought the gun on November 22, 2004 and gave it to Barton the same day. Two days later, he killed himself with that gun.

Wright, 57, is facing a mail fraud charge connected to his commercial mailbox accounts with CyberNET. He was arrested in Grand Rapids.

If convicted on all counts, the three are facing very long prison sentences as well as the forfeiture of $3,364,412.49 in nine bank accounts.

The arraignment is set for this afternoon, and the case has been assigned to Chief US District Judge Robert Holmes Bell.

CyberNET Widow, Mother, Executive Indicted (GRPRESS)

Grand Rapids Press, December 21, 2006

GRAND RAPIDS -- Federal authorities Wednesday indicted Krista Kotlarz-Watson, her mother-in-law and a former company vice president in connection with the CyberNET fraud scheme.

Geraldine Watson, mother of the company founder, the late Barton Watson, is charged with falsifying a federal form submitted to a gun dealer when she bought a 12-gauge shotgun Nov. 22, 2004. The indictment alleges that Mrs. Watson said the gun was for her when she in fact bought it for her son.

Watson, 44, shot himself with a 12-gauge shotgun after a standoff with police at his Ada Township home in the early hours of Nov. 24.

CyberNET, a high-tech Grand Rapids firm, collapsed in November 2004 after a federal raid on company headquarters at 25 S. Division Ave. that left about $90 million in unpaid debt to banks nationwide.

The indictment also accuses Kotlarz-Watson, 39, widow of CyberNET founder Barton Watson, Geraldine Watson, 77, and Paul Wright, 57, in a criminal conspiracy to commit bank fraud, mail fraud and money laundering crimes with others at CyberNET.

Kotlarz-Watson was arrested today in Chicago, and Wright was arrested in Grand Rapids. They were to appear before a federal magistrate this afternoon.

The conspiracy charge outlines what investigators called a plan to deceive banks and other lenders to amass $100 million from 2002 to 2004. The charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

All three also are charged with defrauding Huntington National Bank through a $17 million line of credit extended to CyberNET. The maximum penalty for bank fraud is 30 years in prison, a $1 million fine and restitution. The indictment also charges each of them with individual acts of money laundering, carrying a maximum penalty of 20 years in prison and a $500,000 fine.

DOJ_NMG_0108237

Other charges against Kotlarz-Watson include one count of illegally spending money obtained through bank fraud and three counts of income tax evasion. Federal law prohibits spending proceeds from bank fraud for any purpose. That charge carries a maximum 10-year prison term. The income tax charges carry a maximum five-year prison term and $500,000 fine.

Wright faces charges of engaging in mail fraud by setting up commercial mailbox accounts as part of the CyberNET fraud scheme, which carries a maximum 30-year prison term and $1 million fine.

The indictment also states nine bank accounts, totaling more than $3.3 million, are subject to criminal forfeiture if the defendants are convicted.

Crete Man Gets 7 Years For $7M Pension Fraud

(STNG)

STNG Wire, December 21, 2006

ROCKFORD, Ill. (STNG) -- A 61-year-old Crete man was sentenced to seven years in prison for defrauding union members of nearly $7 million in pensions and benefits.

Michael G. Linder was sentenced to seven years in federal prison for paying to two union local officials and for embezzling from and defrauding numerous union local pensions and welfare benefit plans for more than $6.9 million, according to a release from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Linder pleaded guilty to defrauding eleven union local pension plans of $5 million and embezzling $1,930,154 from five union local pensions and health and welfare benefit plans on June 30, 2006, the release stated.

The court also ordered Linder, who also pleaded guilty grafting charges on Dec. 10, 2004, to serve three years on supervised release after his prison sentence and pay $6,595,154 in restitution.

Linder was the president of Matteson-based Joseph/Anthony and Associates, Inc., a third party administrator for pension plans for various union locals, including Ironworkers Locals 498 in Rockford, 111 in Rock Island, 136 in River Grove and 465 in Kankakee.

Between 1997 and Sept. 23, 2003, Linder defrauded the union local pension benefit plans by recommending to the trustees of the plans that they change their investments to mutual funds being administered by Nationwide Life Insurance Company, the release stated.

Linder, however, invested the assets with Nationwide in group annuity contracts where Linder received more than $5 million in fees and commissions, the release stated. Linder did not fully disclose to the board of trustees that he would be receiving the fees, according to the release.

Linder also embezzled more than $1.9 million from three pension and two health and welfare plans between Jan. 1996 and Sept. 30, 2003, by setting up bank accounts for each plan to be used to pay premiums on life insurance or stop-loss insurance policies.

Linder then billed each plan purportedly for the insurance premiums that were due. The amounts billed, however, exceeded the actual amount of premiums that were due and owed, and Linder secretly kept the excess amounts, the release stated.

While Linder was defrauding the pension and welfare benefit plans, he provided union local officials with graft payments, including a 1999 Harley Davidson motorcycle valued at more than $19,000, the release stated. Thomas Kisting and Fred Schreier, who received the bikes, were also charged and convicted, the release stated.

Phone-fraud Ring Raided In Canada (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, working with U.S. law-enforcement authorities, have dismantled a Montreal-based telemarketing ring that victimized as many as 500 people a week, many of them U.S. citizens, for up to $13 million.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said the eight-month investigation, known as "Project Colt," culminated this week when nearly 200 Canadian police officers, led by the RCMP, conducted 50 raids, primarily in the Montreal region, that targeted the "boiler rooms" used to make misleading telephone calls.

Forty Canadian citizens were arrested on suspicion of fraud.

"These fraudulent telemarketers prey on some of our most vulnerable citizens, often victimizing them repeatedly until their savings are depleted," said Marcy Forman, ICE director of investigations. "This collaboration with our Canadian law-enforcement partners and other U.S. agencies continues to yield significant results, both in shutting down the criminal networks and in restoring some funds to the victims."

DOJ_NMG_0108238

Ms. Koroma said the ring engaged in two types of telemarketing fraud: a lottery scheme and a mass telemarketing fraud. In the lottery scheme, she said, the fraudulent telemarketers persuaded their victims that they had won a large sum of money. In order to claim their prizes, the victims were told, they had to send in payments ranging from $1,500 to $60,000 to cover various costs, including customs charges, taxes and insurance.

In the mass telemarketing fraud, she said, the ring used various approaches, either telling persons they called that they were eligible to receive a $7,000 grant, or selling them health care kits or billing them for services never rendered. A common feature of every scheme of this kind is that the victims are asked to pay less than $500.

All the telemarketing schemes required the victims to send money in the form of a certified check or money order. Nearly 90 percent of the victims in this case were over 60 years of age.

The investigative task force included ICE, the U.S. Postal Service, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and the FBI working with the RCMP, the Surete du Quebec, Service de police de la Ville de Montreal and the Competition Bureau of Canada.

Since its inception, the task force has recovered more than $15 million for U.S. victims of telemarketing fraud. ICE agents were instrumental in getting evidence from victims of the lottery scheme in the United States.

"Investigators draw connections between various forms of crime and link certain crime groups such as street gangs and traditional organized crime with the leaders of a telemarketing fraud ring," said Saverio Orlando, RCMP officer in charge of the Montreal commercial crime section. "This investigation shows that the fight against commercial crime is one of our priorities."

The Canadian anti-fraud call center estimates that 500 to 1,000 criminal telemarketing boiler-room operations are conducted on any given day in Canada, grossing about $1 billion a year.

Felons' DNA Missing From Va. Database (WP)

By Candace Rondeaux

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Virginia authorities have launched a massive review of the state's DNA database after discovering that thousands of felons may have skirted a legal requirement to submit genetic samples, partly because local and state agencies may have failed to make them do so.

Public safety and crime lab officials estimate that at least 20 percent of felons' DNA profiles could be missing from the database, a flaw that could hamper criminal investigations across the state and nation. Investigators routinely take crime scene evidence and run it through Virginia's database and others looking for DNA matches.

"The good news is it appears that we have well over 80 percent of convicted felons in the database, but obviously we need to have 100 percent of them in the database," said Clyde Cristman, deputy secretary of the Virginia Department of Public Safety.

Virginia law requires all convicted felons and those arrested in connection with violent crimes such as rape or homicide to submit cheek swabs for DNA analysis and entry into the statewide database. Currently, there are more than 253,000 samples in the database, according to the Department of Forensic Science Web site.

The Public Safety Department is working with the departments of Corrections, Forensic Science and Juvenile Justice to determine how many offenders' profiles are missing and why. The multi-agency review will begin with a check of about 54,000 people on probation or parole to verify that their samples have been processed.

Cristman said that about 12,000 cases have been examined. He could not say how many of those offenders' samples were missing from the data bank but said the number is in the thousands. It could take about two months to complete the review and update the data.

Long considered a national leader in DNA crime technology, Virginia has logged about 3,600 "cold hits" from its database -- matching biological evidence from a crime scene to an offender's DNA profile. Scores of violent crimes, including some homicides, have been solved that way. Virginia's database, like that of other states, forms part of a larger national DNA network that has similarly produced millions of cold hits.

Gaps in the state database could diminish the effectiveness of DNA as a crime-fighting tool, officials said. "In order to maximize effectiveness of the national DNA database, it is important to collect DNA samples from all persons authorized by state and federal legislation," said Ann Todd, a spokeswoman for the FBI crime lab.

Louisiana, which has some of the nation's broadest DNA collection laws, has become the envy of many states for a highly advanced and centralized computer system that allows jails, courts and law enforcement agencies to track which offenders have submitted DNA samples.

Cristman said his office was alerted to the problem several weeks ago when an investigation into a series of rapes in Charlottesville revealed that suspects with criminal backgrounds were not listed in the database. Charlottesville police Capt. J.E. "Chip" Harding discovered missing profiles after an audit revealed that 125 felons -- or 20 percent of the 600 supervised felons in Charlottesville and Albemarle County -- were not in the database.

DOJ_NMG_0108239

But Virginia crime lab director Paul Ferrara said this week that he became aware of a possible problem earlier when a review last year of the state's more than 13,000 registered sex offenders uncovered 3,149 missing DNA profiles, or about 24 percent of the state registry.

"I'm not surprised that there are missing felons," Ferrara said. "What would be surprising is the magnitude. That's the thing we're not sure on."

Ferrara said some prisons and jails might have failed to take samples from offenders when the requirement was introduced in the 1990s because the importance of building a DNA database was not yet understood. The collection process might have been further complicated because until about 10 years ago, blood samples were to be taken by qualified medical technicians, who may not have been available, Ferrara said. But he and others pointed to clerical errors as another likely reason for the missing profiles.

"Sometimes you find they aren't missing, but it's just that if you query the database and you don't have the right Social Security number or right spelling on the name, you're not going to hit it," Cristman said.

He said that training on how to collect samples may need improvement and that the lack of a centralized state tracking system made it difficult to coordinate processing. "It's been a challenge in Virginia with various agencies working with different computer systems that don't talk to each other," Cristman said.

Experts say the problem in Virginia is symptomatic of growing gaps in DNA databases nationwide that have occurred as states have expanded the pool of offenders required to submit samples. Most states have long required DNA samples from people convicted of such violent crimes as murder or rape. But the increasing popularity of DNA as a crime-fighting tool has prompted widespread passage of laws to include samples for such lesser offenses as burglary. More recently some states -- including Virginia, California, Florida, Louisiana and Texas -- have begun to require samples from those arrested for certain crimes.

"Whenever you dump a tremendous increase in the samples to be tracked and collected, there's more chances of things being overlooked and things falling through the cracks," said Bill Marbaker, president of the American Society of Crime Laboratory Directors.

In Quest For A Killer, An Inmate Finds Vindication (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

AUBURN, N.Y., Dec. 20 — The day before Christmas three years ago, Inmate No. 92B-0448 sat in front of a computer at the Elmira Correctional Facility and typed a harsh letter to the man he thought should have been in prison in his place.

“Witnesses can commit perjury, judges can be fooled and juries can make mistakes,” the letter read. “When it comes to DNA testing, there’s no mistakes. DNA is GOD’s creation and GOD makes no mistakes.”

The inmate, Roy Brown, was serving 25 years to life for the 1991 murder of a social worker, Sabina Kulakowski, who was found naked, beaten, bitten and strangled outside the farmhouse where she lived in Aurelius, a town of 3,000 on the northern tip of Cayuga Lake.

Mr. Brown, a self-professed hard drinker who made a living at the time selling magazine subscriptions in Syracuse, 30 miles to the east, did not know Ms. Kulakowski. Just six days before her killing, though, he had been released from jail, where he spent eight months for making threatening phone calls to another social worker at the agency where she worked.

Nor did Mr. Brown know the man to whom he was writing, Barry Bench. It was only that year, 2003, that Mr. Brown had uncovered witness statements that pointed toward Mr. Bench, whose brother had been the victim’s boyfriend.

Five days after receiving Mr. Brown’s accusatory letter, Mr. Bench committed suicide by jumping in front of an Amtrak train.

Two weeks ago, DNA tests matched a sample provided by Mr. Bench’s daughter to saliva stains on a bloodied nightshirt found at the crime scene, and now Mr. Brown is scheduled to appear in court on Thursday to ask the judge who presided over his original trial to vacate the conviction.

“I used the old hunting technique here: if there’s a killer in the bush, I’m going to flush him out,” Mr. Brown, 46, said in a telephone interview from prison. “I know that they can keep me in jail after I show up in court. But the world will know that I’m innocent, and that was my main goal.”

Mr. Brown’s lawyers at the Innocence Project, a nonprofit legal clinic that has helped exonerate 188 people since 1989, said his case stood out because it was the first in which the convicted man essentially investigated and solved the crime himself.

The lawyers, Peter Neufeld and Nina Morrison, have also questioned the reliability of forensic evidence in the case, since the conviction rested largely on expert testimony linking bite marks found on Ms. Kulakowski’s body to Mr. Brown even though they showed indentations from six upper teeth and he had four.

DOJ_NMG_0108240

The Cayuga County district attorney, James B. Vargason, did not respond to numerous requests for comment on Wednesday, but Mr. Brown's lawyers said they expected him to oppose their motion. Mr. Vargason took office two weeks before Mr. Brown's trial and tried the case personally; he has since used it to build a reputation as a get-tough prosecutor.

Help came to Mr. Brown from an unlikely source: Mr. Bench's 19-year-old daughter, Katherine Eckstadt, who volunteered a sample of her DNA. A private investigator had tracked her down through her mother, who had told sheriff's deputies in 1991 that Mr. Bench acted suspiciously the night of the murder.

The recent DNA tests have excluded Mr. Brown as the source of the saliva on Ms. Kulakowski's nightshirt and showed half of the DNA profile matched Ms. Eckstadt's, suggesting the saliva could have come from her father.

"I had to know the truth," Ms. Eckstadt said last week in an interview in the basement of a Baptist church in suburban Syracuse where her mother works as a secretary. "How was I supposed to live knowing that I could have helped Roy Brown, yet I let him rot in prison?"

Mr. Brown was arrested on May 26, 1991, three days after Ms. Kulakowski's battered body was found on a dirt road about 300 yards from the farmhouse, which had been set afire, investigators said, possibly by the killer in an attempt to cover his tracks. Mr. Brown had just been released from jail for making threatening calls to a county Social Services Department worker who had ordered his 7-year-old daughter removed from his home. Though Ms. Kulakowski also worked for the agency, she had no involvement in the case.

Mr. Bench, on the other hand, knew the victim well. His older brother, Ronald, had been romantically involved with Ms. Kulakowski for 17 years and had lived with her at the farmhouse, which their parents had given to Ronald. The couple separated in the spring of 1991, and Ronald Bench moved to Auburn, but he allowed Ms. Kulakowski, who was 49, to continue living at the farm.

"For a while, Barry was angry at his brother because he felt that he should have been the one to own the farm," said Tamara Eckstadt, Katherine's mother, who lived with Barry Bench for 13 years.

Mrs. Eckstadt said that Barry Bench did not seem to dislike Ms. Kulakowski, but that their relationship was "antagonistic," in part because of the farm.

The night of Ms. Kulakowski's murder, Barry Bench left his house at 5 p.m., after a fight with Mrs. Eckstadt, according to his and her statements to investigators at the time. Mr. Bench, a volunteer firefighter, went to a bar, carrying his fire monitor, which he rarely shut off. He left the bar at 12:30 a.m., their statements said. Mrs. Eckstadt told the police that he arrived home, drunk, about an hour later, even though the bar was just a half-mile from where they lived.

She said Mr. Bench never plugged the fire monitor back in after arriving home, which was unusual.

Though the farmhouse began to burn around the time Mr. Bench was unaccounted for, investigators did not question his whereabouts, instead focusing within days on Mr. Brown.

At the trial in 1992, Mr. Vargason argued that Mr. Brown had killed Ms. Kulakowski in a fit of rage against the social services agency. The case rested largely on testimony by Dr. Edward Mofson that Mr. Brown could have left the bite marks on Ms. Kulakowski's body despite the discrepancy in the number of upper teeth. He said that Mr. Brown could have twisted her skin while biting her, therefore filling the gaps that would have been left by his missing teeth.

The defense's lone witness, Dr. Homer Campbell, a forensic odontologist from New Mexico who has testified about bite-mark evidence in numerous criminal trials, sharply rebutted Dr. Mofson's assertion, but it was not enough to convince the jurors. Mr. Brown was convicted of second-degree murder after less than six hours of deliberation.

Ms. Kulakowski's parents and two sisters have all died. Thomas Murray, her brother-in-law, said in a telephone interview from his home in Omaha, Neb., that the family had never heard of Mr. Brown before his arrest, and that he was unaware of the evidence pointing toward Mr. Bench.

"Sabina touched the lives of many people through her work, and we could never understand why someone would kill her," Mr. Murray said. "When that happened, we didn't have any reason to suspect anyone in the Bench family, or anybody else, for that matter."

Ronald Bench, a real estate broker in Auburn, refused to comment when reached on his cellphone Wednesday. "I don't have anything to say," he said.

The results of the DNA tests came back on Dec. 6; Mr. Brown has said that he has wondered since then what might have been had he laid his hands on Mrs. Eckstadt's statement — and others mentioning the unaccounted hour in Mr. Bench's night — at the time. "I could have showed them to the jury," he said.

One of Mr. Brown's original lawyers, Katy Karlovitz, said that when asked about the statements after Mr. Brown uncovered them in 2003, prosecutors said they had turned them over before trial. But Ms. Karlovitz said she never received them, and there are no records of the statements in a list of documents that is included in the court file.

DOJ_NMG_0108241

Mr. Brown learned about the statements only because of a fire at his stepfather's house in 2003 that destroyed his trial records. He filed a request under Freedom of Information laws seeking new copies, and among the documents he received were statements from Mrs. Eckstadt, Mr. Bench and two of their neighbors.

Mr. Brown, a father of four, has been married four times, twice while in prison, where he teaches guitar and helps run counseling sessions. He has liver problems that leave his skin a pale yellow. He has never ceased to profess his innocence.

But his three appeals were denied, along with his 1995 request for DNA tests on the nightshirt. He took to drafting motions from prison, calling his stepfather, William Murphy, several times a week for help.

"I've lived from phone call to phone call, from one disappointment to another," Mr. Murphy, 63, said in an interview from his home in Boonville, N.Y., southwest of the Adirondack Park. "Sometimes I got discouraged, but Roy always came back with another motion, with another way out. He never let me give up."

At the same time, Mr. Brown's sister, Billie Jo Kuczynski, put together a petition asking people to support his request for DNA tests on the nightshirt. She distributed 36,000 copies around the state, even tucking them on car windshields at the Cayuga County courthouse.

